Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel st).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.

THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.

Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 34 SUNDAY, AUGUST 23, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Let us believe that the whole of truth can never do harm to the whole of virtue.—WENDELL PHILLIPS.

God and the War.

TO Freethinkers war is a most illuminating calamity. Dr. Campbell Morgan frankly admits that to him, as minister of the Word, as prophet of the Lord, the task of delivering a message on this mournful subject is, on the whole, the most difficult that has ever fallen to his lot in all the years of his public ministry. Unbelievers in God experience no such difficulty in approaching the subject, because to them war is a wholly intelligible thing. They know that, in the majority of instances, it originates in fear, ambition, greed of territory, jealousy, and the instinct of self-defence; verifying the fact that civilisation is only a thin veneer that can be washed off in a moment. War implies a return to the primitive savagery of human nature. All wars can be explained on this principle, even religious wars being no exception to the rule. The object of the present article, however, is not to investigate and interpret the causes and aims of the regrettable war now raging so fiercely, but, rather, to contemplate it in the light of Freethought. Now, it is impossible to meditate upon the existing situation, with any degree of sincerity, without discerning, more clearly than ever, the utter absurdity of the God-idea, in whatever form it may be held. Dr. Campbell Morgan exhorts us to pray, but confesses that "it is not easy to pray to-day." It is difficult to pray simply because it is beyond our capacity to believe in a God worth praying to. Of course, men and women of faith must pray, the reverend gentleman informs us, but even to them, in this hour, it is the most arduous undertaking in the world. The divines are perplexed and confused because they cannot hide it from themselves that war is absolutely irreconcilable with any Christian doctrine of the Diety, and because in their teaching on the subject they are bound to contradict themselves. For example, Dr. Campbell Morgan assures us that "no one wants war." "I affirm that," he adds, "of the whole of Europe." But, if no one wants war, why on earth has war spread like wildfire all over Europe? Again, if no one wants war, it follows of necessity that war is of God; and that this is a rational inference appears from the reverend gentleman's assertion that the Divine Being "is now reigning and ruling, not in spite of the storms, but by having the storms themselves under his control." Let us pay special heed to the words:—

> "Yea, the Lord sitteth as king for ever: there is no possibility of his dethronement, not the remotest chance of his defeat. Though cedars crash and fall, and forests are stripped bare, and desolations and devastations be everywhere, the Lord is king. It is the language of magnificent, triumphant faith."

So it undoubtedly is, and if it is true, there is no possible escape from the conclusion that God is the author of the present war, the Kaiser being merely the instrument in his hand. This is exceedingly good theology, but the moment Dr. Morgan begins really to face the facts he forgets all about it, and speaks thus:—

> "Suppose, for a single moment, that to-morrow morning the news were given to the world that there would be no war, think of the gladness that would sweep over every country, even those which, for the moment, seem to be clamoring for battle. Here is the devilishness of the situation. Some force, impalpable, spiritual, devilish, seems to be attempting to compel war, confusing the issues, paralysing our counsels, stirring our animosities. As the heavens look down upon Europe to-day they see great nations mobilising, marching, preparing for that which, in their deepest hearts, they hate; preparing, like men in a dream, under the mastery of some giant evil spirit, from which they cannot escape. That is the devilishness of the situation."

Theologians had much better leave the subject of war alone altogether than make fools of themselves in that fashion. God's absolute sovereignty is nothing but the vainest of dreams, as they very well know and implicitly confess when face to face with the awful facts of human life. These impel them to allude to "some force, impalpable, spiritual, devilish," which successfully opposes and defeats the God in whom they believe. He who is supposed to be doing "according to his will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth" cannot prevent his righteous purposes from being set at defiance and frustrated by some mysterious evil powers which he himself brought into existence. In this connection, another explanation of the war is suggested which makes the case for God much worse. Dr. Morgan says:—

> "The nations of Europe decided to secure their individual safety by physical force. They decided that it would be well for them to make certain of the absence of war by federations on the ground of suspicion. The reigning God has compelled them to work out their own choices to their ultimate issue, and men who have looked upon war, and preparations for it, as characterised by pomp and pageantry, are probably to be brought within the next few months face to face with the ghastly reality. Nations that have based their friendships upon their suspicions of others, and have made treaties with these in order that those may gain no advantage, are finding the hopelessness and the helplessness of their cleverness. God is compelling humanity to work out its own choices."

After all, God is the author of the war, and he has brought it about out of revenge on the nations for their devilish cleverness. This is very bad theology and an atrocious explanation; or, rather, travesty of the facts. The truth is that the facts politely bow the Deity out of court.

In the British Weekly for August 13, the leading article, presumably by the editor, Sir William Robertson Nicoll, is entitled "The Christian Community and the War." It is replete with pious platitudes such as the average Christian finds so palatable. These are admittedly trying times, and Sir William is on the hunt for some things that will help his public to keep the faith. Of course, the chase is a successful one, though the value of the "finds" is highly questionable. One is God's alleged power to bring good out of evil. Are we, then, to understand that God causes evil in order to display his ingenuity by bringing good out of it? If God is supreme, that is exactly what he is guilty of just now. But what is the good brought out of the present evil war? "We have seen this," says Sir William, "in the sudden arrest of all internal strife in the country. Parliamentary faction and industrial unrest are in suspense for the time being: the common cause commands the undivided loyalty of the people." Surely, the lesser evil vanishes at the advent of a greater; but, as Sir William observes, only for the time being. Granting that this is a good secured by the presence of a European war, it most certainly required the intervention of no God to bring it about. The laws of Nature are supreme in all such matters. What is the use of reminding us that the horrors of war are often greatly exaggerated? If war is an evil, as all the divines declare, no consideration can ever convert it into a good. Sir William maintains that "war is elevated by sacrifice, by the mixed effect of glory and grief, and in this aspect of it is not the enemy, but the ally, of faith"; but is not the reverend knight aware that it is also degraded by the cruel looting, sexual licence, and other wickednesses indulged in by soldiers on entering a conquered city or town? The long abstinence, the terrible privations, the numerous sufferings, more or less cheerfully endured during the march, are now at an end, and a great reaction naturally ensues. Sir William forgets that there are two sides to the shield, and that he who has only seen one side cannot give an accurate and full description of it. In any case, St. Paul was quite right when he said that sin should not be encouraged in order that grace might abound; and the great apostle's successors should follow his example.

Digitized by Google

Towards the end of his article Sir William expresses his sympathy with those who shall be subjected to great suffering and losses during the present conflict, and says:—

> "Not to pray for all this mass of care and sorrow is the sure way to lose faith. Who can bear it but God? Who could bear to think of it except with God? O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come."

The curious fact is that God, if God there be, does bear it all without melting sufficiently to put an end to it. There are noble-minded men and women in abundance who will do their utmost to alleviate the various evils attendant upon battles, but God will remain absolutely silent and inactive through it all. Dr. Morgan confidently assures us that "we are at the end of the devilish heresy that God is on the side of the big battalions." Are we, though? The reverend gentleman may ignore the numbers and efficiency of armies, and decline to calculate, cooing his fears to sleep with "God is going to win"; but that is empty rhetoric, tolerated alone in the pulpit. In the circumstances, the war may have been inevitable, and its result is as yet an unsolved, and, with our present knowledge, insoluble problem; but all the armies implicated proceed on the assumption that the issue will be determined exclusively by the strength and efficiency of those engaged in it.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Bankruptcy of Christianity.

THE Society of Friends has just issued a manifesto "To Men and Women of Goodwill in the British Empire." It is concerned with the present crisis, and aims at pointing out the duty of Christians in the face of a state of affairs such as the present. And one must admit that if any Christian sect has the right to lecture others on the evils of war, it is the Society of Friends. Alone amongst Christians they have protested against the use of brute force in either public or private life. And the appreciation of their attitude by other Christians may be seen in the fact that the Society of Friends is a dwindling body, and has never represented but a small minority of believers. From one point of view the policy of the "Quakers" may be said to show the impossibilist character of Christian teaching. Unqualified non-resistance is a sheer absurdity. Qualified non-resistance only means in effect not resisting more than is necessary. In practice it means the substitution of one form of resistance for another. It was possible for the Society of Friends, individually or collectively, to disclaim the use of force, because they were living in a society which applied the measure of force needful for their protection. They did not resist in person, but, so far as force was needful for their protection, they did resist vicariously. The police, the courts, the whole organisation of society, apply the force necessary to individual protection.

There are some things in this "Message" with which all Freethinkers will agree. This war, we are told, "spells the bankruptcy of much that we have lightly called Christianity." Certainly it spells the bankruptcy of Christianity, not lightly so-called, but properly so-called. The war proves—if proof were needed—the utter worthlessness of Christianity as a civilising factor. The nations engaged are not fighting non-Christian Powers; it is so far a family quarrel. Germany, Russia, Austria, England, Servia, are professedly Christian nations. They all worship the same God, profess what is fundamentally the same creed. They are all brothers in Christ, but that does not prevent their cutting each other's throats on the battlefield with the utmost goodwill. Nor can their common religious faith be counted on to render the combat less bitter or less bloody. On the contrary, one can safely say that, so far as religious feelings enter into the quarrel, they will only serve to prevent a lasting peace being secured. In the Near East the quarrels of the followers of the Greek and Latin Churches are as fruitful of trouble as are those of Catholics and Protestants in Ireland.

Intellectually, Christianity is manifestly bankrupt. What the present war does is to emphasise its social bankruptcy. I am not concerned with a Christianity that might have existed in the primitive ages, or with a Christianity that may exist in the very distant future. The only Christianity we have to bother about, and the only Christianity that is worth bothering about, is that which meets us as an historic fact. And that Christianity is bankrupt in every conceivable direction. It has not alone failed to bring people of different nations and races to the point of living together peacefully, but, through its official representatives, it has never ceased to provide excuses for national iniquities, and to cover them with a cloak of moral and religious justification. When the European nations wanted a religious justification for their buccaneering expeditions in Africa, in China, and elsewhere, the Churches supplied it. When excuses were needed for the wholesale exploitation of the "lower" races, the Churches found all that was needed. The war in Europe is not a war for the maintenance of national possessions or liberty in Europe; it is very largely a war for the control of races outside Europe, and for purposes of sheer exploitation.

It is a plain truth that if the Christians of the world could only live at peace together, war would be a thing of the past. A Mohammedan power such as Turkey could not threaten the peace of Europe. There is little to dread from Japan—if other nations treat her fairly and decently. And, at any rate, it was only the cupidity and bullying of Christian powers that compelled Japan to become a great military and naval power. China has centuries of peaceful traditions behind, and is only showing signs of breaking away from those traditions because of the action and influence of the Christian powers. It is the Christians of the world that have taught mankind the meaning of the "mailed fist," and that the only way to prevent aggression is to be able to apply sufficient physical force to make successful aggression impossible. And when mutual suspicion and the competitive exploitation of heathen races have made a disastrous war inevitable sooner or later, there is much talk of the justice of this nation or of that nation in joining in the conflict. Of course they are justified. If one burglar attempts to take from another his share of the "swag," the one attacked is justified in resisting. But it would have been far better had they both been brought up in a different school, and so acquired tastes that would have turned their energies in a quite different direction.

Digitized by Google

Christianity is bankrupt because it never possessed the capital needful to run the business of civilising humanity. Its brotherhood of man never meant, even in theory, more than a brotherhood of believers, and in practice it did not always mean that. It recognised duties and obligations between members of the same church or sect, but outside these boundaries it applied a different code of ethics. What kind of brotherhood did Christians bestow on Jews and heretics for hundreds of years? Christians in their hey-day of power would have looked with amazement on anyone who claimed consideration for either. What kind of brotherly attention did the inhabitants of ancient Mexico and Peru receive from their Christian conquerors? How fared the Redskins of North America, the Maoris of New Zealand, or the inhabitants of Africa at the hands of their Christian brothers? In practice nearly always, and in theory often, Christians have shown that their doctrine of brotherhood meant little more than the mere brotherhood of a gang. Within the gang rules must be observed. Outside the gang they might be broken with impunity.

What is there about Christianity that would teach people of different nations or races to live harmoniously together and so make warfare impossible? Is it the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God? When and where has it shown the slightest influence in this direction? There is no doctrine that Christians have been more ready to fight about. Christianity has no social doctrine, no theory of social life or of the nature of human association that would bring a more rational spirit into affairs. Its business from the outset has been to save souls. Not to make useful citizens but to fashion candidates for the New Jerusalem. It was this that led it to neglect the splendid civilisation of antiquity, and to allow its institutions to fall into decay. One must admit that it has pursued this work with a certain amount of earnestness. And its very earnestness in this direction has spelt disservice to civilisation. It directed energy into unfruitful channels. Had the energy that Christianity expended, generation after generation, in the attempt to prepare mankind for a mythical heaven, been spent in teaching the merest rudiments of a sane social life, Europe to-day might have been a gigantic commonwealth instead of an aggregation of armed camps.

"To many will come the temptation," says the Friends' manifesto, "to deny God, and to turn away with despair from the Christianity which seems to be identical with bloodshed on so gigantic a scale." Certainly there are a number of people in the world who seem to need something startling to occur before they will exercise what intelligence they possess, and it may well be that the present war will lead some to inquire as to the value of religious beliefs in general and of Christianity in particular. We are told that we ought to "seek the forgiveness of Almighty God." The position seems to me the other way about. If there is an Almighty God, he should be seeking our forgiveness for not fashioning man better than he has done. Either God made man or man made God. If the latter, then religion may be dismissed as a myth. If the former, then the responsibility for man's conduct rests with him, and we surely have no need to ask God's forgiveness for our being as he made us. In any case, things could not be worse without the belief in God. That they are as they are with it is certainly good ground for questioning its value.

All Freethinkers will agree that "the only possible permanent foundation" for European culture is "mutual trust and goodwill." But that mutual trust and goodwill cannot be based upon religious belief, about which people have always differed, and concerning which they will never cease to differ. It must be built upon something deeper and more inclusive than religion, something that appeals to men and women of all nations and races. Even in such a thing as warfare it is not religious belief that binds people together. The differences of religious belief remain what they were during the progress of a war, and the British soldier or sailor who finds himself at one with all around him in carrying out his duty, separates from him when it comes to religion. Catholic and Protestant, Methodist and Episcopalian, soldiers will fight side by side; but, if they can, they will separate when it comes to a religious service. In war, as in peace, it is the common, unextinguishable, social needs that drive people together, while religion serves to separate them.

Let men put ideas of religion on one side, let them give their whole energies to social affairs, and they will the more quickly realise that the cause of human civilisation is never advanced by warfare, however inevitable it may be. And if warfare has become repugnant to a larger number of persons all over the world, if it is denounced as a crime against humanity and against civilisation, it is surely because of the growth of a secular philosophy that has taught people to fix their minds upon fundamental facts, and to substitute the idea of a common humanity for that of a body of devout believers in a religious doctrine. Whatever may be the shortcomings of Freethought, it has at least never failed to hold up the ideal of a common human brotherhood that overleaps all barriers of sect, nation, or race. I am no believer in the gospel of expansion as applied to nations. But I am a devout believer in the gospel of expansion as applied to man. From the tribal state until to-day man has grown by the expansion of his feelings, his obligations, and his duties, over an ever-widening area. From the horde to the tribe, from the tribe to the nation, from the nation to the race, is the true direction of human growth. And if the aftermath of the present war only serves to drive home the lesson how ill the course of human progress is served by the most lavish expenditure of blood and treasure on the field of battle, it will not be without its benefits.

C. COHEN.

Bayonets and the Beatitudes.

"In religion,
What damned error, but some sober brow
Will bless it and approve it with a text."
—SHAKESPEARE.

"Uplift thy cross and go. Thy doom is said."
—ROBERT BUCHANAN.

EUROPE has been hurled by the ambitions and rivalries of its Hohenzollern, Hapsburg, and Romanoff dynasties, and jealousies of its emperors who govern by "divine right," on to a slope slippery with blood. On that awful down-grade the nations are launched, and the voice of reason is but a whisper against a hurricane. The countrymen of Moliere are cutting the throats of the countrymen of Goethe, and the compatriots of Kossuth are disembowelling the brothers of Tolstoi. The women of Europe, "like Niobe, all tears," are mourning their dead. Think of it! Whole nations, professedly Christian, engaged in wholesale murder. Yet who can deny that, if the commands of Christianity had penetrated in the least degree beneath the surface of human life, to make weapons of destruction would be viewed as an awful crime? Yet the flower of the manhood of the Christian nations is spilling human blood like water. From the Spree to the Elbe, from the Seine to the Neva, Europe is a slaughter-house. The death-moan of tens of thousands is drowned in the Te Deums of the victors, and the regimental standards are blessed in the name of "The Prince of Peace."

The mockery of it all! It is a complete indictment of Christianity, which has proved itself the most powerless thing on earth. The millions who profess to be followers of Christ are, practically, wholly unaffected by his teaching. When passion or self-interest is aroused, every precept is forgotten. Even in times of peace in every Christian country, side by side with the hypocritical pretensions of orthodoxy, will be found codes of legislation which violate every injunction of Christianity and resembles only the lex talionis of the old Pagan jurisprudence.

Digitized by Google

The effect of this divergence is seen when a few obscure individuals are treated as criminals for attempting to take the Christian religion seriously, as with the Peculiar People in England and the Stundists and Tolstoyans in Russia. So far as the prelates of the different Christian Churches are concerned, the profession of Christian ethics is a damnable farce. Whether they be Catholic cardinals, Anglican bishops, or priests of the Greek Church, the fact is the same. The professed followers of the poor carpenter of Nazareth enjoy princely salaries and live in palaces. Even the Nonconformist leaders get what they can, and follow their Savior laboriously on the salaries of Cabinet officials. Not one amongst them is better than the other. Some wit has said that "singing psalms never yet prevented a grocer from sanding his sugar." This jest expresses in a happy form what may be said in all seriousness of the impotency of Christianity to affect ethical conduct.

The Christian religion is not only a failure, it is a priestly robe covering a skeleton. Mohammed has a direct influence over his professed disciples; Buddha still colors and controls human life; Brahma affects the lives of millions; even the followers of Joseph Smith carry out Mormon teaching; but where in all Christendom is the Christian? The God of the Christians is not the sad-faced Nazarene, but the rubicund, self-satisfied form of Mammon, with the leer of the miser. There is no crown of thorns, and no spear-wounds in his side, but in the jewelled hands of the new deity are the money-bag and the sword. The purple robe covers the huge imposture of an organised hypocrisy. Could the pale shade of the poor carpenter that slinks past the costly altar-rails, but speak, it would bewail an agony of spirit deadlier than that which drenched Gethsemane in blood. The dethronement of Christ is complete, and men now worship Mammon:—

> "A wondrous God! Most fit for those > Who cheat on change, then creep to prayer;
> Blood on his heavenly altar flows,
> Hell's burning incense fills the air,
> And death attests in street and lane
> The hideous glory of his reign."

MIMNERMUS.

The Origin of Supernatural Ideas.—V.

(Continued from p. 523)

"I remember discoursing with a very charming French official on the difficulty of eradicating fetish customs. 'Why not take the native in the rear, Mademoiselle,' said he, 'and convert the native gods?' I explained that his ingenious plan was not feasible, because you cannot convert gods. Even educating gods is hopeless work. All races of men, through countless ages, have been attempting to make their peculiar deities understand how they are wanted to work, and what they are wanted to do, and the result is anything but encouraging."—MISS KINGSLEY, Travels in West Africa, p. 346 (1898).

"The faith of the Greenland Eskimo is of great interest towards the elucidation of the questions above touched upon. It is so primitive that I doubt whether it deserves the name of a religion. There are many legends and much superstition, but it all lacks clear and definite form; conceptions of the supernatural vary from individual to individual, and they produce, as a whole, the impression of a religion in process of formation, a mass of incoherent and fantastic notions which have not yet crystallised into a definite view of the world. We must assume that all religions have at one time or another passed through just such a stage as this."—FRIDTJOF NANSEN, Eskimo Life, p. 224 (1894).

"But if the aborigines of Central Australia have no religion properly so called, they entertain beliefs and they observe practices out of which, under favorable circumstances, a religion might have been developed, if its evolution had not been arrested by the advent of Europeans."—J. G. FRAZER, The Belief in Immortality and the Worship of the Dead, p. 92 (1913).

WE have seen how primitive man, having arrived at a belief in a soul or spirit, through dreams, shadows, and reflections, also came to the conclusion that everything, living and not living, possessed an indwelling soul or spirit.

It seems extraordinary to us that any human being could believe that stones and trees and such things can be possessed with a soul. Nevertheless, that is the belief of a very large proportion of the primitive races, as we shall see. And it follows logically enough; for if the savage believes that he has seen the soul of his dead father or brother in his sleep, then he must logically believe that the weapons and clothes, etc., he sees with them must also be the souls of the things, and not the things themselves.

Before scientists began to study and compare the beliefs and modes of thought of primitive man, these beliefs were looked upon as stupid and unreasonable—of the same substance as a tale made up by a child. How they could believe such rubbish passed all understanding. But science here, as elsewhere, brought order out of chaos, and we now know—through the researches of Tylor, Lubbock, Frazer, and others—that primitive man simply could not help arriving, in the absence of science, at the conclusions he did regarding the supernatural.

As Miss Kingsley points out:—

> "The more you know the African, the more you study his laws and institutions, the more you must recognise that the main characteristic of his intellect is logical, and you see how in all things he uses this absolutely sound but narrow thought-form. He is not a dreamer or a doubter; everything is real, very real, horribly real to him."

"This," continues the same writer, "may seem strange to those who read accounts of wild and awful ceremonials." But "It is this power of being able logically to account for everything that is, I believe, at the back of the tremendous permanency of Fetish in Africa, and the cause of many of the relapses into it by Africans converted to other religions."*

But, however logical you may be, you cannot arrive at right conclusions if you start from wrong premises, any more than you can give the correct answer to a sum if you start with wrong figures; and, as we have seen, primitive man started wrong by mistaking a subjective impression—namely, a dream, which had no existence outside his own mind—for an objective spiritual existence.

Nor has this error been confined to one tribe; it is found among savages as wide apart as the African from the Eskimo, the South Sea Islander from the the North American Indian—tribes who have never come in contact, who are not aware of one another's existence. They have not caught the idea by contagion; they have arrived at it naturally, inevitably, as if impelled by some malignant power.

As this phase of primitive thought is very important in considering the evolution of the supernatural, it will be as well to produce some evidence in support of it. Those who have read Tylor's Primitive Culture will not require any more evidence than that work of genius contains; but we do not propose to draw upon that great work here. Many books, by travellers, anthropologists, and ethnologists, describing the beliefs of primitive peoples, have been written since Primitive Culture was first published, and we propose to cite a few to the point.

Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, the famous Arctic explorer, observes:—

> "The Greenlanders, like all primitive races, originally conceived nature as animate throughout, every object—stone, mountain, weapon, and so forth—having its soul. We still find traces of this belief. The souls of tools, weapons, and clothes follow the dead on his wanderings to the land of shades; therefore they are laid in the grave, that there they may rot and their souls may be set free. Gradually, however, this belief has, in the confused and illogical way peculiar to primitive races, mixed itself up in a totally different one: the belief, to wit, that the souls of the dead can take up their abode in different animals, objects, mountains, and the like, which they subjugate to themselves, and from which they can issue from time to time, even

* Miss Kingsley, West Indian Studies, p. 125 (1889).

Digitized by Google

showing themselves to the living. There has thus arisen the belief that in every natural object there dwells a particular being, called its inua (that is, its owner)—a word which, characteristically enough, originally signified human being, or Eskimo. According to the Eskimos, every stone, mountain, glacier, river, lake, has its inua; the very air has one. It is still more remarkable to find that even abstract conceptions have their inue; they speak, for example, of the inue of particular instincts or passions. This may seem surprising in a primitive people, but it is not very difficult to explain. When, for instance, a primitive man, suffering from violent hunger, feels an inward gnawing, it is quite natural that he should conceive this to be caused by a being, whom he therefore describes as the inua of hunger or appetite. As a rule, these inue are invisible, but when they are seen, according to Rink, they take the form of a brightness or fire, and the sight of them is very dangerous."*

Speaking of the West African negro, Miss Kingsley says:—

"One of the fundamental doctrines of Fetish is that the connection of a certain spirit with a certain mass of matter, a material object, is not permanent; the African will point out to you a lightning-stricken tree and tell you that its spirit has been killed; he will tell you when the cooking-pot has gone to bits that it has lost its spirit; if his weapon fails, it is because someone has stolen or made sick its spirit by means of witchcraft. In every action of his daily life he shows you how he lives with a great, powerful spirit-world around him. You will see him, before starting out to hunt or fight, rubbing medicine into his weapons to strengthen the spirits within them, talking to them the while; telling them what care he has taken of them, reminding them of the gifts he has given them, though those gifts were hard to give, and begging them in the hour of his dire necessity not to fail him. You see him bending over the face of a river, talking to its spirit with proper incantations, asking it when it meets a man who is an enemy of his to upset his canoe or drown him, or asking it to carry down with it some curse to the village below which has angered him, and in a thousand other ways he shows you what he believes if you will only watch him patiently."†

Mr. Williamson, the anthropologist, in his book on the South Sea savages, dealing with the beliefs of the Solomon Islanders, says "they have no notion of a single Supreme Being"; but the idea underlying all his beliefs is in a power called mana.

"This is a power or influence, not physical, but in a way supernatural, and manifests itself in physical force, or in any kind of power or excellence which a man possesses; it is mana that works to effect everything which is beyond the ordinary power of men, outside the common processes of nature; it is present in the atmosphere of life, attaches itself to persons and to things, and is manifested by results which can only be ascribed to its operation."‡

Mr. Williamson continues:—

"If a man has been successful in fighting, this success is not the result of his own physical powers; it is because he has got the mana of a spirit or of some deceased warrior to empower him.....The possession of mana is not, however, confined to spirits, ghosts, and human beings. It may be immanent in animals and plants, and even in inanimate objects" (p. 27).

And, he concludes, the fundamental underlying principle of their religious practices and superstitions "is the desire and effort of the people to get the power of mana for themselves, or secure its direction for their benefit" (p. 73).

Mr. J. H. King, in his book on The Supernatural, gives many instances of this belief among primitive races. He cites Hind's Labrador (ii., p. 103) for the fact that "Many of the North American Indians, as the Nasquapees of Labrador, believe in the future shadowy existence of every material thing," and Im Thurm's Indians of Guiana (p. 355) for the statement that the Indians of Guiana "hold that not only many rocks, but also waterfalls, streams, and natural objects of every sort, are supposed to consist of a body and a spirit."

Markham's Cuzco (p. 129) is cited for the ancient Peruvians, who "held that every created thing had its mana or spiritual essence," and Marina's Tonga Islands (ii., p. 122) is given as authority for the statement that the same belief prevailed "among the Fijians, who held not only that the souls of men, women, beasts, plants, stocks, canoes, houses, but all the broken utensils of this frail world, tumble along over one another into the regions of immortality." The same conception of the double nature of all substances was entertained, according to Captain Cook, in Tahiti.*

W. MANN.

(To be continued.)

The Doctor.

NATURE had fitted the doctor well for the profession his father and circumstance had opened for him. He was small, wiry, and possessed endless energy. On the dark background of human pain and suffering he flung the colored lights of a natural optimism. His sympathy was of the rich type that is crystallised in deeds. It came spontaneously; and one always felt that the surface roughness of it imparted a strength which sympathy generally lacks.

In action, in speech, in thought, he was quick. Seldom did he hesitate in his decisions. He was self-sufficient in an admirable way. You could rely upon the man's power without having experienced it, just as you were, in some strange way, convinced that you could depend upon his word without having tested it. His breezy personality, full to overflowing with brusque mannerisms, his confident smile, his incarnadined expletives, all irradiated a strength of character that seemed contagious. You felt stronger in body and brain. His visit was like a gust of heather-scented mountain air.

Morning, noon, and night the doctor's motor whirred over the country roads. All day long the doctor worshiped at the feet of the goddess of humanity. All day long he poured out ungrudgingly his accumulated stores of knowledge. All day long he expended physical and mental energy in the service of humanity.

To me, this is worship. Regardless of the many associations the mind introduces to bring that idea of mind down into religion and commercialism, I cannot help adhering to it. There are other ways of worship than by genuflexions. There are other methods of doing one's duty than by preaching. Action is more wonderful than speech. Practice more worthy than prayers. The doctor worshiped humanity; for a man's service to his fellows is the real gauge of his righteousness; and a man's service is that which he does.

When the doctor renounced the horse for his country rambles, as he called them, and purchased a car, he gave it the name of his old companion; and there was not a lane in the big district that had not been covered by the wheels of Beauty. The most atrociously wicked farm-road was made more wicked by the little Beauty; and the doctor enjoyed the rush and struggle in boyish delight.

Dashing about, here, there, and everywhere, was his life. Smoking innumerable cigarettes was his luxury. Giving health and happiness, and easing the sorrows of death, was his mission. Being the friend of everyone was his privilege and pleasure. And the laurel-leaf of close fellowship was his reward. The schoolmaster said it was bound with gold; for he had no bad debts.

But there was another facet to the doctor's character, one that the country eye never saw, nor the country mind ever imagined. He kept it for his library and the hours of slippered ease, lamp-light, and pipes. The falling curtain of the library door, dropped between the eager, tireless, brisk little doctor and the sentimentalist. Beside his books he became reserved, thoughtful, philosophic, a man

* Fridtjof Nansen, Eskimo Life, pp. 224-5 (1894).
† Miss M. Kingsley, West African Studies, p. 129 (1899).
‡ R. W. Williamson, The Ways of the South Sea Savage, p. 71 (1914).

* J. H. King, The Supernatural, pp. 182-3.

Digitized by Google

who liked to look upon and wonder at all the nuances of ordinary life. Here, in the quietness, in the low, friendly light, with the blue smoke-clouds curling around his grey hairs, his mind would return to the day's work; not with the joyful animation that characterised it then, but with a sensitiveness that oftener brought tears than smiles.

Pictures would arise before him, pictures such as one could imagine the mind of the artist would see in his dreams; and all were tinged with the sadness of suffering. Incident after incident of the day's experience would slowly emerge from the corridors of memory; and the doctor's mind would see in each of them a chapter of human woe. He drew near, at these times, to sorrow as a poet approaches grief. The feelings of those who toiled in physical pain, and of those who endured mental anguish, were his feelings. Experiencing them, he could understand; and the heart of him became like a tender flower, whose nature knew every degree of love and hate in sunrays, in rain, in wind.

He liked, too, to speak of the happenings of the day. He liked to paint the gold and the grey of commonplace life. The wonder of it never dimmed in his eyes. It enthralled him. He was fascinated by the marvellous intensities of the pleasures and pains of the life we all live. Rich and poor, good and bad, strong and weak, the doctor saw them all in the shadows of sorrow. Amidst the darkness and gloom of the pain that never passes us by we lose our social distinguishments, our varying potentialities, our prejudices, and our different beliefs. We become like our fellows. To the doctor we were all of the same family. There were no favorites. Sorrow left no room for choice. Across every life there drifted the darkness of tears. Every heart was but as a grain of sand in the human Sahara, whose scorching sun was an inevitable sorrow; and the tears blinded our eyes to the rays, and shut from our sight the other grains; and in our sad loneliness we forgot there were laughter and light in the world, we forgot there were other hearts enwrapped in the same dark egoism; and often we forgot we were human.

And so the doctor would speak softly, as if more communing with himself than with us who were honored by the privilege of being with him. His grey eyes would glow with a misty light as he told us of some vaguely comprehended sorrow that had fallen upon lives little able to bear it. His bronzed face would deepen in color as he described the effect of a child's suffering on the mother-heart. His voice would sink as he pictured the coming of a grief he alone saw. And into his words would fall the quiet and rich pathos that tells of a sympathy felt only by those amongst us whose minds have taken intelligence behind the dark veil of human grief. At these times the doctor seemed to become a strange weird instrument, every nerve a string vibrating to the slightest appeal of affliction, every voice-tone an echo of the music that flooded his being. He forgot his skill as a doctor; forgot his own part in the great tragedy; forgot himself and his surroundings: he was a poet-artist living in the suffering heart of humanity.

Once a friend, after listening for a time, and taking the opportunity of one of the doctor's silences, made some remark relative to the consolations of religion. Instantly the mist-enshrouded eyes of the doctor cleared. He returned with the sharp characteristic movement from the land of his thoughts to the world of his actions. A quick nervous tremor seemed to shake his body. Smartly he struck a match; and as he lit his pipe he looked steadily at our companion, with a critical observancy in his eyes. Then he laughed the long, low chuckle of a man thoroughly but quietly amused.

ROBERT MORELAND.

Sunday-school Teacher: "What is faith?"

Little Boy: "Faith is believing in the superintendent's stories."

Acid Drops

"Dagonet's" three columns in last week's Referee—mainly about the war—is just the usual piffle that he has fallen into in his early old age. His subjects now are all reduced to three—Mr. G. R. Sims, God, and Old England. Although his paragraphs are chiefly about the war, the name of France never occurs in them. The name of Belgium occurs because the Kaiser's troops got unexpectedly hung up there. "England Above All!" is Mr. Sims's opening sentence. The war, as he considers it, is really a war between England and Germany. All other nations are in the "bloody business" accidentally. Yet when these words were written, Belgium and France had been fighting desperately for many days against the Kaiser's army, whose loss was thousands in killed and myriads in wounded—while "Old England" had hardly struck a blow. We have got to save Europe "under God," and don't forget the "aid of our allies" from "the brutal domination of the bandit of Berlin." The bandit of Berlin, however, sees the matter differently. His "task" is to save Europe from the domination of the pirate of London. "Dagonet" cries out "England Above All!" The Potsdam patriot cries out "Germany Above All!" And both of them talk a lot about "God," who, we believe, would disclaim any acquaintance with either of them.

This reminds us of the description of "orthodoxy" given by the famous and plain-spoken Bishop Warburton. "Orthodoxy," he said, "is my doxy; heterodoxy is another man's doxy."

There are well-informed people who might remind "Dagonet" that the real thought in the minds of William, Nicholas, and Francis Joseph, is the future headship of the German and Sclavonic races. Others might remind him that, after all, as a matter of fact, Germany did not declare war against England, but England declared war against Germany. As a matter of fact, we say; we are not discussing the rights and wrongs of the case.

Now and then Mr. Sims has a lucid interval. We might say, perhaps, that the old Mr. Sims turns up again and insists on being heard. There was an instance of this in the following paragraph, from last week's "Mustard and Cress":—

> "Here is a pathetic incident of the war. I know an English lady who married an officer of high rank in the German army. Some years ago she divorced him, and later married an officer in the British Army. She has a daughter by her first husband, and the daughter remains in her custody. She has a daughter by her second husband, and now the fathers of the two children are both at the front. The two little girls say their prayers together every night. But while Evelyn says 'Please God, don't let Sybil's daddy kill my daddy,' Sybil says 'Please God, don't let Evelyn's daddy kill my daddy.' And the mother listens, and knows that the fathers of her children may at any moment face each other in the deadly fray."

This is modern pathos, English pathos, Christian pathos; we were tempted to say Referee pathos. The very essence of it is a mixed paternity and a lunatic asylum idea of "God." Here is another kind of pathos, old pathos, Greek pathos, Pagan pathos. In a battle going forward to defend Greek civilisation against the hordes of barbarism, messengers came to the General with the news that the son he loved and was proud of was slain. He looked at the messengers calmly, and said, "I knew that my son was mortal." What a grand answer! Men don't speak like that now. We must go back to antiquity to find it.

The British and Foreign Bible Society reports that it circulated "no fewer than 8,958,283 copies of the Scriptures." This year all Europe is at war. Comment is needless.

Nothing better illustrates the dense ignorance of large masses of the Emperor of Russia's Christian subjects than the following. There will be a total eclipse of the sun on August 21, visible in Western Russia, where large bodies of troops are moving, at mid-day. It is expected that Russian officers will inform the men of the nature of the phenomena, in order to prevent panic when they find themselves in darkness in the middle of the day.

The Church Times is naturally delighted at the Day of Intercession ordered by the heads of the English Church. It is a consolation, it thinks, at this crisis "to find how Christian at heart the country remains." It may be; but one cannot consider as evidence the fact that a Day of Intercession is ordered. The heads of the Church could do no less. It is their business to keep religion to the front; but judging from the general run of people, religion seems to play a small part in their considerations. It is easy enough to pray for victory, and they are doing that as energetically in Germany and Austria, as in England. We may safely take it that superiority in fleet and army, and in tactics and courage will play a much larger part in deciding the issue than the prayers of the clergy. And ordinary men and women seem far more concerned about the rise in prices, the increase of unemployment, the dislocation of trade, and the general result of the conflict, than about God's opinion of the matter.

Digitized by Google

The Times, in its Sunday edition, has a far more pertinent observation. It says that "for a moment at least the religious reading of life seems to lack even the substance of a dream." And it adds:—

> "Where in this return to chaos are we to discern the workings of any 'Power making for righteousness'? Through all the world men and women are invoking the aid of the God of battles. Priests and peoples of every nation are crying to their God that He is the Lord of Hosts, and that they alone are His Chosen People; and to-day in every temple throughout Christendom the prayer goes up that the Prince of Peace may incline the scales of war."

This is only what we have been saying all along. In the face of grim facts all the fairy tales embodied in religious phraseology become almost ghastly. There is no power, outside of human nature, that makes for righteousness; and there is still too much of the barbarian and the beast left in human nature to make the movement for righteousness certain, or to even place it beyond the possibility of disaster. Thousands repeat the religious formulæ in times of stress from mere force of habit, but their doing so is really one of the conditions that gives the barbarian its chance. Were they in the habit of reflecting more clearly and more deeply, the game of war would soon be impossible amongst civilised nations.

The divines cannot deny the active existence of evil, and their chief work has always consisted in trying to account for it without implicating the Deity. The task has been entirely beyond them, and to-day the majority of them admit that evil exists by Divine permission. Mr. R. J. Campbell has often hinted that there is a sense in which God is the cause of evil. Now, whether God causes or merely permits evil, the question remains, Why does it exist? Well, be it well observed, Professor David Smith, the all-wise theologian, answers that question in the British Weekly for August 13 thus:—

> "God uses the powers of evil as the instruments of his judgments. He makes the wrath of man praise him, and girds upon him the residue of wrath (Ps. lxxvi. 10, R.V.).
>
> 'Tis so God governs, using wicked men,—
> Nay, scheming fiends, to work his purposes."

Poor old God, how terribly he suffers at the hands of his servants!

Dr. Campbell Morgan charges us with treating life flippantly. He says that nothing could have been much more appalling than the fact that, when Europe was on the brink of war, "Goodwood was crowded." We beg to call attention to a much more appalling fact, namely, that when Europe, including our own country, is actually at war, "Claudius Clear" contributes an article to the British Weekly for August 13 on "Cats." Surely there is nothing more flippant in witnessing horse-racing than in writing about cats. What infinite twaddle these men of God do talk!

Mr. Harold Begbie has written a war poem, "The Man Who Keeps His Head." Most of the other banjo Byrons are singing of the man who breaks other fellows' heads.

"Feeding the Millions" is the heading of an agonised appeal on behalf of war sufferers. What has happened to the Oriental evangelist who fed 5,000 people with a few loaves and fishes?

The professional followers of the "Prince of Peace" are chanting psalms to the "God of Battles." If there were any truth in the efficacy of prayer, they would be more usefully employed in petitioning the Throne of Grace to soften the flinty hearts of the wholesale provision merchants.

Nearly half the priests of Paris have been called to the front. "For this relief, much thanks." We await, prayerfully, the exit of the remainder.

Anyone who has studied the circumstantial yarns of the war retailed in the press, will have small difficulty in understanding how the Gospel tales were disseminated among a vastly more ignorant population. Truthfulness has never been a Christian virtue.

The Times has been jubilant over the alleged discomforture of the Peace Party throughout Europe, forgetting that the war itself will be a formidable argument against the continuance of standing armies of enormous size.

"Church and the War" is a Daily Telegraph headline. This does not refer to the church of the Levy-Lawsons, but to the Government religion.

In religious art bathos has long taken the place of pathos. A recent example, seen in the picture dealers' windows, portrays a neurotic boy-scout with a shadowy figure of Christ behind him, holding a scout's pole. This masterpiece is entitled "The Pathfinder." A cynic might suggest that the path led to Earlswood.

"Bluff King Hal" will appear shortly at one of the London theatres. If he appears with his seven wives he should prove an instructive piece of Christian evidence.

It is well known that men of God never say anything that may be called original, never deliver a single new message. They are simply repeaters of things they have learned by heart from an old book. They often describe themselves as God's messengers, or the Lord's prophets, but never by any chance do they utter a fresh word. Of the history of the world at large they are afraid, and they scarcely ever appeal to it. They are cowards. Even Dr. Campbell Morgan said the other day, "Perhaps it will be safer and better for me if" I draw my illustrations "rather from Hebrew history than from any other." We agree. They are all Bible-men, and repeat like parrots what they find recorded there.

For example, the Rev. E. G. Thomas delivered a sermon on "The Mind of Christ" the other day, in which he reiterated again and again what Paul says in First Corinthians. Mr. Thomas has not the least idea what the mind of Christ is, but he appropriates the phrase from the great apostle. Of course, the absurdest things said by Paul are accepted as Gospel truths. Mr. Thomas claims that Christians are above criticism, but have a Divine right to sit in judgment upon all others. Mr. Thomas knows quite well how very silly such a claim is, but shielding himself behind Paul, he makes it without a blush. We repeat that the men of God are all cowards, because they say things in his name which they would never dare to say in their own.

Two hundred thousand copies of the following prayer has been printed, and circulated by Bishop Taylor Smith, Chaplain-General, for the use of soldiers:—

> "Almighty and most merciful Father,
> Forgive me my sins;
> Grant me thy peace;
> Give me thy power;
> Bless me in life and death,
> For Jesus Christ's sake. Amen."

There seems plenty of "me" about it; but egotism is always a strong feature of piety.

Rev. J. L. Rees, writing from Llanddowror Rectory, South Wales, says that "the historian of the future will not fail to note that for three years before the Armageddon the Nonconformist bodies of England and Wales had bound themselves together to rob the Church in Wales of all its ancient endowments.....and that just as hostilities were breaking out the robbery was about to be perpetrated." We expected something of the kind. Evidently Mr. Rees thinks the Deity brought about the war in order to rebuke the Nonconformists. What a pity it is that he won't leave things alone!

Ladies are very masculine nowadays. A man entered a railway carriage, mopped his brow, and remarked, "Phew, it's d——d hot." Turning, he observed a lady, and apologised. The lady, herself in a state of perspiration, rejoined, "Don't apologise; it's far worse, it's hellish."

Mr. Edward Hutton in England of my Heart says, "Canterbury is dead. Where once swayed the spiritual life of England one sees nowadays the familiar quiet life of a cathedral city." Apparently as dead as Canterbury mutton.

Digitized by Google

"Family life means law, order, discipline, and a sense of a Higher Power—a belief in a God," says the theological "Vanoc" in the sporting columns of the Referee. This is enough to wrinkle the face of a funeral-horse with smiles. Presumably, the man who keeps two homes is more religious than a man who has only one; and Solomon would beat both hollow.

Describing an accident to a lady, a provincial paper stated that the doctor "put six inches in a wound in her nose." She must have been of the same nationality as Our Blessed Savior.

"With a sentence of five years in the federal penitentiary at McNeil's Island hanging over him, and a bond of $6,000 posted to obtain his release pending the appeal of his case, the Rev. Albert Dahlstrom, recently convicted in the federal court at Seattle of violating the Mann White Slave Act, has disappeared. This is the admission by Federal authorities and by Charles F. Riddell, who acted as Dahlstrom's attorney. So says the Spokane Chronicle. Marriageable females are warned to be on their guard against this preacher of the Gospel. Through the holy bonds of matrimony he has connected up with some three dozen of them during his career as a minister."—Truthseeker (New York).

"Music is a great civilising force," says a writer in the Referee. In another column in the same issue a song is printed which was the feature in the 1911 Drury Lane pantomime, entitled "The Bulldog's Bark." The chorus runs, "We mean to be the top-dog still—Bow-wow!" The composer and the critic ought to bow-wow to one another.

"The hand that pulled the trigger of the assassin's pistol in Serajero has opened the gates of hell," says "Vanoc" in the Referee. Surely there is some mistake. Hundreds of thousands of good, kind Christian clergymen constantly assure us that those gates have never been shut.

We have it at last in all the plenitude of its unmistakable irrationality. Writing in the Christian World for August 13, Mr. Albert E. Hooper says that "there is no faith possible to the soul that has proofs." This journal has always advocated the same truth. As Mr. Hooper declares, so have we declared innumerable times, "faith is belief without proof." On this point he and we are in complete agreement; but at this point also our concurrence comes to an abrupt end. Whilst Mr. Hooper regards faith's prooflessness as its supreme merit and glory, we are forced to the conclusion that it constitutes its entire condemnation. Faith imagines a whole realm of the objective existence, of which there is not a scrap of evidence, and then teaches that this purely imaginary world should dominate our conduct here from day to day. Is this reasonable? Is it common sense? We hold that it is the quintessence of unreason, the very acme of common nonsense.

With that adventuresome supernaturalism Mr. Hooper undertakes to solve all the difficult problems that confront us to-day; but he conveniently forgets that most of these problems are as old as supernaturalism itself, and still remain unsolved, and that whatever solutions have been effected in the past were invariably the outcome of the application to the problems of reason, science, knowledge. Faith has never settled a single question, or wrought anything but harm for mankind.

A daily paper, referring to the Salvation Army Congress, said "the largest halls were filled with interested audiences who listened to speakers from five quarters of the globe." Some journalists seem to be as weak in arithmetic as evangelists, who chortle about the Trinity in unity.

American "scientists" claim to have discovered the Tower of Babel. The subject is a "stony" one; but, doubtless, the bricks spoke for themselves.

"Wanted; a Business Religion!" is the heading in our widely read contemporary, John Bull. There seems to be far too much business mixed with religion already. As the humorist says, the difference between a theatre and a place of worship is that you pay to enter the one, and you pay to get out of the other.

The Bishop of London does not wish to go down to posterity merely on the strength of his "infidel slaying" exploits in Victoria Park, but aspires to be a muscular Christian. As chaplain to the London Rifle Brigade, he intends to go with the Brigade abroad "for at least six weeks." The Archbishop of Canterbury has piously sanctioned the action of the "six weeks' soldier."

"It should shock no one," says the Church Times, "to learn that the Bishop of London has volunteered for six weeks' service with the London Rifle Brigade wherever it may be ordered to go." Six weeks! And anywhere! The qualification is striking. It can only mean a six weeks' jaunt at home; for it is absurd to imagine that he would be allowed to go abroad with an army and return at the end of six weeks. We can imagine the grim smile on Lord Kitchener's face if he is ever informed of the offer. Altogether, the Bishop seems to be sustaining his reputation for silliness even under the present conditions.

What a man the Bishop of London is! At St. Paul's, the other day, he said that during the war there must be "real sacrifice." "No one, however rich they may be, in any household should have more than, say, two courses at each meal." That is all the Bishop's intelligence is capable of producing. After profound thinking, he discovers that "real sacrifice" will mean to have no more than two courses for dinner—many will be only too glad to get one. We wonder how on earth the Bishop thinks this is going to help? People are not told to eat less, but only to have fewer dishes—which can have no effect whatever on the general food supply. A much more sensible course would be to advise everybody to go on living their ordinary life just as far as possible. By that means panic would be avoided, and all would benefit.

"The cross," said Canon Newbolt, in a sermon the other day, "has no doubtful origin. It goes right back to an event when one Jesus of Nazareth was arraigned before a Roman magistrate on a charge of treason." It is hard to credit that Canon Newbolt believes this to be the origin of the cross as a religious symbol. It is a commonplace to-day to anyone who has the slightest acquaintance with the subject, that Egypt used the cross, in connection with religion, centuries before Christianity was heard of. It was found in South America when the Spaniards first landed there. It is an ancient symbol in India, and its pre-Christian use is admitted even in the New Testament. The expression "Take up thy cross and follow me," used before the alleged death of Jesus, could have no meaning whatever, unless it were already well recognised as a religious symbol.

Canon Newbolt deplores the fact that in some of the law courts of Europe the cross has been replaced by a figure of justice. We think the departure both desirable and healthful. There was one court that always displayed a huge cross above its deliberations. That court was the Inquisition. A sectarian symbol has no proper place in a court of justice. Surrounding legal proceedings with religious formulæ has never secured justice, and has frequently been a means of securing its frustration.

The Church of England officials have issued a form of intercession with "Almighty God on behalf of His Majesty's forces, now engaged in war." It contains no reference to the "King of kings" command, "Thou Shalt Not Kill," nor does it allude to the suggestion of loving one's enemies.

The Guardian points out that one consequence of the war will be an increase in the incomes of some of the clergy. Owing to the high price of wheat, there will be an appreciable increase in the tithes paid, and the Guardian hopes that this will be enough to cover the increased cost of living. We suggest that they should refund the difference. The clergy talk a lot about sacrifice; this seems the time for them to illustrate it.

Daughter: "What is the meeting for to-night, pa?"

Sky Pilot: "To save the young men of the country, my dear."

Daughter: "I wish you'd save a nice one for me, pa."

Parson (to crippled mendicant): "I would have liked to give you a shilling, my poor man, but I find I have nothing less than a florin." His Poor Man: "S'pose we toss up to see who keeps that."

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £182 13s. 0d. Received since:—Robert Stirton and Two (Dundee) Friends (quarterly), £1 5s. 6d.; E. Parker, 5s.

R. STIRTON.—Thanks for your stedfast friendship in the matter of the President's Honorarium Fund.

W. ALLEN.—We cannot possibly find room for long Obituaries reaching us on Tuesday, which we have so often said is too late for the Freethinker then preparing for the press. A summary shall appear in our next.

J. H. LANGFORD.—We don't expect you'll get a reply from Bishop Welldon.

S. BURNS (S. Africa).—We don't remember seeing it. Glad you liked our open letter to the clergy. We shall "keep on rubbing it in."

L. H. W. MANN.—It is no use talking of publishing anything while the war-fever rages.

A. MILLER.—Copy should be written separately from letters.

ROCHDALE.—We cannot deal with the letters you send us without the consent of the writers.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Notes.

Christianity, thy name is—well, the worst word in the dictionary isn't bad enough. How many good Christian employers have joined the race for publicity in connection with the Prince of Wales's Relief Fund, and at the same time dismissed a lot of their own employees, besides putting others on short commons of work and wages. I really think that while Christianity is the most hypocritical religion in the world, Great Britain is the most hypocritical of Christian nations.

* * *

Why was such an early rush made for money for the Prince of Wales's Relief Fund? From what I have seen and heard of other public funds, I have very little belief in much of this Fund ever finding its way to deserving cases. That the Prince himself has anything special to do with it is not credible à priori. Busybodies swarm in times of great excitement, and this is only a case in point. Rather a big one, but not so very big, after all, as will soon be recognised when the excitement has died down a bit.

* * *

Whoever is right, and whoever is wrong, in this European war, they are all Christian nations that are engaged in it, and it will remain so to the end, if the Turk only has sense enough to keep out of it. This is a Christian war if ever there was one. After nearly two thousand years of Christianity the Christian nations of that part of the world where Christianity was first established, and whence it was exported to America, are almost universally engaged in wiping each other out of existence.

* * *

The German Emperor is being covered with fierce denunciation. Some of it is very likely deserved. Some of it is certainly vulgar insolence. The military system of modern Europe is not of his creation. He has played a conspicuous part in it by virtue of his high position and histrionic temperament. But he is only a small figure, after all, when it comes to an estimate of real values. This is a case in which the monarchs and "statesmen" of Europe should receive a general condemnation. "All have sinned." Paradoxical as it sounds, the time to serve peace is during peace. As well shout against the northern blast as cry out against a war when it has once begun. Or, to use a metaphor more congenial to the English genius, who can cry off a dog-fight? Arouse the fighting instinct, and everything else gives way to it. Yes, peace can only be served during peace. And during the long general peace of Europe what have the Christian nations been doing? Talking about peace, and spending their money on vast preparations for war. That policy was bound to end in Armageddon. The wielders of huge, highly trained armies will always yearn to use them seriously. And there is a significant text in the Christian Scripture, which we would bring to Christian remembrance: "For where your treasure is there will your heart be also."

* * *

One gets sick of hearing so much about the Kaiser being the cause of this terrible war. All who joined in the race of armaments are responsible for it. All who believe in alliances as a guarantee of peace are responsible for it. All who believe in anything but common sense and a peaceful disposition as a guarantee of peace are responsible for it. All who believe in "God" as a sort of international umpire, who sees invisibly and speaks inaudably, are responsible for it. All in whom there is any motive higher than Humanity are responsible for it.

* * *

To speak of "God" as a sort of international umpire may sound "blasphemous" to orthodox ears. But it is the Christian idea expressed with the utmost truth and brevity. The Bishop of London, in the letter to the clergy of his diocese with regard to the day of intercession (August 21), after relating Great Britain's efforts for peace, bears us out in the following manner. "We can then pray with a good conscience for victory, and appeal to God, who knows everything, to decide between us and our enemies." It does not occur to this episcopal simpleton that God, if he knows everything, could play the umpire without a contest. This would save a tremendous lot of bloodshed, economic loss, destitution, and other forms of misery. But to act sensibly is never expected of Gods. Which is doubtless the fault of their worshipers.

* * *

Friday, August 21, is selected as the day of intercession. It is the date of a solar eclipse. Probably this is intentional. The mental darkness of the worshipers will match the physical darkness outside them.

* * *

The docility of the English people is wonderful. It has been known to all the world, including our enemies, but excluding ourselves, that General French has been in Belgium all the time with thousands of English troops. The only people through whom it could do no possible harm have been kept without the information. This is the brilliant notion of the censorship entertained by a flashy but stupid person like F. E. Smith, and backed up by a person who is neither flashy nor stupid like Lord Kitchener. It shows what imbecilities occur quite naturally under the military system. The English press, which is the most lickspittle in the world, connived at this well-sustained imposture. It really looks incredible, but it is true. Militarism spells every vice and every folly. It is the enemy of all that thinkers and humanists value.

* * *

With regard to the Freethinker, there are no "Sugar Plums" in it this week. War upsets many things, and this amongst them. I still make no announcement as to how I shall have to economise in the production of the paper. War, of course, hits all journalism but war journalism. The South Africa war ruined many advanced journals. The Freethinker survived by a great effort on the part of the Editor and his staff. This bigger war will probably be shorter. On the other hand, it is likely to be more exciting, and to divert attention more profoundly from intellectual objects. Next week, then, I shall have something to say about the paper and the financial position. Meanwhile, I venture to remind my friends that the President's Honorarium Fund exists, and needs their support more than ever it did.

Digitized by Google

G. W. FOOTE.

Religion and War.

The most religious nations have been the most immoral, the cruellest, and the most unjust. Italy was far worse under the Popes than under the Cæsars. Was there ever a barbarian nation more savage than the Spain of the sixteenth century? Certainly you must know that what you call religion has produced a thousand civil wars, and has severed with the sword all the natural ties that produce "the unity and married calm of States." Theology is the fruitful mother of discord; order is the child of reason. If you will candidly consider this question, if you will for a few moments forget your preconceived opinions, you will instantly see that the instinct of self-preservation holds society together. People, being ignorant, believed that the gods were jealous and revengeful.

—R. G. INGERSOLL.

The Material Basis of Life.

MANY popular misconceptions concerning the nature of "life" would soon disappear were men to study and understand the physical conditions essential to the existence of living matter. Unfortunately, the average metaphysically minded man is rather proud than otherwise of his ignorance, and derives a certain amount of indolent satisfaction from the reflection that "life" is surrounded by a dense fog of impenetrable mystery. To those that offer a natural explanation of the marvels of organic phenomena, he replies that science is dumb when confronted with the involved problems of life and mind. And he never for one moment imagines that before any real comprehension of physiological and psychical phenomena can be arrived at, some slight knowledge of the physics and chemistry of the relatively simple structures from which the higher fauna and flora have been evolved is an indispensable prerequisite.

We cannot run before we can walk. This platitude is realised, and what is more to the point, is put into practice in all rational systems of education. The pupil is led forward from simple truth to less obvious verity, so that by slow gradations he at last attains an understanding of those eternal veracities which constitute the kingdoms of science.

The vulgar fallacy that an impassable chasm divides organic from inorganic nature is smiled at by the contemporary biologist. Nevertheless, it is quite commonly assumed by members of the general public, that certain characteristic chemical compounds are special to living matter, inasmuch that they are never discovered in a non-living state. Yet, as Professor Abbott states in a recently published work:—

> "Thousands of exact chemical analyses have been made of every sort of living thing, and no element or compound has ever been found which is essentially different from what may exist in the non-living world. Long ago a distinction used to be made between 'organic' and 'inorganic' substances — the former being the products of living 'organisms.' But such a distinction has broken down. It is possible to synthesise substances in the test-tube identical in composition with those formed in Nature's laboratory—the tissue of plant and animal. Indeed, the ability to artificially reproduce natural products in this way has proved of great value commercially, and artificially synthesised indigo, camphor, etc., now supplement in large measure Nature's meagre store of such things."*

There is, therefore, no chemical distinction between living and lifeless matter. Neither is there any physical characteristic special to organic structures. Organic matter is subject to the same physical processes which operate in lifeless Nature. Plants and animals grow and multiply; crystals and clouds increase in size, and even in that form of growth which is known as reproduction, parallels may be met with in organic substances.

The precise time at which life ceases varies within wide limits. Long after the spirit has departed from the body it is alleged to animate with its life-sustaining powers; it has been experimentally shown that all parts of the defunct organism do not equally share in the benumbing agencies of death. The writer has frequently noticed the twitchings of the muscles in an animal that has been "dead" for several hours. A decapitated testacean, such as a turtle, may be considered for all practical purposes dead. Yet, if the heart of a headless turtle be removed from the body of the animal and hung "on hooks in a moist chamber wet with a weak solution of common salt, such a heart will go on beating rhythmically for days." Obviously, so long as the organ functions thus it cannot be said to be dead. It is, therefore, necessary to discriminate between that mode of death which leads to the speedy dissolution of the entire organism and that local form of death which governs the lives of the tissues of living bodies. As a rule, the decease of an animal is immediately followed by the disintegration and decay of its tissue elements. But experiment demonstrates that by excluding bacterial infection from the tissues of the dead animal, such tissues may be maintained in a living state for a quite considerable period. At all events, such tissues retain the power to resume the functions of life when transferred to a living animal. As Professor Abbott puts it: "In this way sections of blood-vessels and other organs have been cut out and later replaced in the same or other animals without injury. By keeping such a tissue at a trifle above freezing point the period of vitality may be extended to weeks or months." Quite recent studies prove that it is not only possible to retain the life of excised tissues, but that they will actually "sprout and grow like so many plant cuttings." To secure these results all that is required is that the tissues be set in a nutritive medium and that they are protected from the insidious activities of bacteria.

Other instances of restoration to life after apparent death are abundant. After many years of quiescence, various seeds are capable of generation. An extraordinary instance of suspended life is afforded by the "resurrection plant" (Selaginella), which flourishes on the sides of the rocky cliffs of Mexico. This plant "may be pulled up and dried for years, only to uncurl and freshen up again in a few hours when placed in a saucer of water." Various lowly animals that dwell in pools will dry up as their watery medium evaporates, and float about in the air like dust. After long intervals of time a tardigrade in its shrivelled state will fall from the air into its native water, rise from the dead, and resume its active aquatic life.

In the chemistry and physics of the material basis of life—protoplasm, or bioplasm as it is now frequently termed—lie hidden the secrets of the wonderful phenomena of vitality and death. Although this life-stuff is the outcome of a combination of specific lifeless elements, its variations are countless. All protoplasm contains carbon, nitrogen, oxygen, and hydrogen, and these elements make up by far its larger mass. Sulphur and phosphorous, again, are invariably present, but these constituents form but a fraction of the whole. Chlorine, sodium, magnesium, calcium, potassium, and iron are usually to be numbered among its chemical ingredients. Some other elements are of normal if rare occurrence in the bioplasm of certain animals and vegetables. Protoplasm varies so considerably that it cannot be viewed as a definite chemical compound like salt or starch. Its modifications are so innumerable that the terms protoplasm or bioplasm must be regarded as including a multitudinous medley of chemical combinations which are as numerous as the myriad-numbered manifestations of organic phenomena in Nature's living domain.

* Professor J. F. Abbott, General Biology, p. 3; 1914.

Digitized by Google

Protoplasm, then, is chiefly composed of a complex combination of oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, and carbon, of which the carbon element usually forms the foundation. But it is to be observed that water is essential to living matter. This liquid which always makes up a heavy percentage of its bulk, is one of the simplest compounds in existence. "Muscles are three-fourths water, even bones nearly one-fourth, and in jelly-fishes of the open sea, that which is not water is but one per cent. or less of the total bulk." So far, then, as this ever-present constituent of protoplasm is concerned, there is little complexity. Moreover, living structures are to be regarded rather as liquids than as solids. The high percentage of water in protoplasm is not without meaning. It furnishes the conditions demanded for the transfusion of solid matter through the body organs of plants and animals, and it in addition provides them with those plastic powers which play so important a part in adaptation to surrounding conditions.

The various combinations of the four elements O, H, N, and C, are very conveniently arranged in three groups, the proteins or albumens, the carbohydrates (starch and sugar), and the fats.

The proteins are present in all protoplasm, and are absolutely essential to the processes of life. They form a great and many-sided group. They depart widely from each other, but all share definite common qualities. O, H, N, and C, are always found in proteids, and the number of atoms forming these compounds sometimes runs into thousands. It is estimated that half their weight is carbon, with 15 to 18 per cent. of nitrogen.

The immense protein molecule, so to speak, is hardly a composite unit; the atoms that form it are so loosely held together that its equilibrium is easily upset. "The atomic groups may freely break away from the protein molecule or be added to it, and in this instability lies the great significance of the proteins in all living matter." Well-known examples of nearly pure protein are such food materials as lean meat and the white of eggs.

The carbohydrates, in company with the fats, contain carbon, oxygen, and hydrogen only; nitrogen is absent, and the oxygen and hydrogen are always combined in the same proportions as in water (H_2O). The carbohydrates are usually more abundant in vegetable than in animal life, although glycogen, which is a carbohydrate, forms a large constituent of the muscles and the liver in higher animals, and is an important factor in their metabolism.

The fats are formed of the same elements as the carbohydrates, but their elements, C, H, and O, are differently proportioned and arranged. They are the invariable result of the combination of an acid with glycerine. "The acids, with few exceptions, belong to the 'fatty acid' series. Three molecules of fatty acid, not necessarily of the same kind, combine with one of glycerine to form a fat."

From its chemistry we will now turn to the physical structure of the protoplasm. Its protein materials do not completely dissolve in water like salt or sugar. Proteins, however, absorb much liquid, and swell enormously in consequence. When placed in large quantities of water they become highly attenuated, and may be permanently suspended in their liquid medium, but unlike true solutions "they will not diffuse through vegetable parchment or animal membranes. Such substances are usually known as 'colloids' in contrast to 'crystalloids,' or substances which do diffuse through such membranes." Another colloid property is its power to coagulate. This characteristic is easily demonstrated by comparing the semi-liquid white of an egg in its raw state with its semi-solid condition when cooked. The colloidal character of proteins meets its physical explanation in the magnitude of the protein molecules. As already stated, these molecules are aggregated in a highly unstable form, and when proteins are utilised as food, they are broken up in the course of digestion until they are reduced to a size sufficiently small to enable them to be absorbed through the lining membranes of the intestinal (alimentary) canal.

T. F. PALMER.

(To be concluded.)

The Radical Woman.—II.

A Public Address by M. M. Mangasarian, to the Free Religious Association (Rationalist), Chicago.

(Continued from p. 525.)

IT is a very difficult matter to decide which ideas or practices are proper in a woman, or in a man, to speak more generally, and which are not. It must have occurred to most of you that nothing in itself, or per se, as the Latins expressed it, is either proper or improper. The character of an act as well as of a word is determined by circumstances. Taking another's property is not theft if it is done to prevent its being used against the public good, or to prevent its being squandered, or to satisfy a judgment. Taking another's life is an innocent and highly proper act if it is done in self-defence, or to prevent a crime, or to defend the country. It is interesting to observe how dependent upon time, place, and circumstances is what we call morality. I am unable to think of anything which, while it may be proper or right in one place and at one time, may not be quite improper and wrong at another time and in another place. Circumstances break all rules.

Morality is no more fixed than is life. What we fear as radical to-day, may become dangerously conventional to-morrow. The institutions which the whole world supports to-day were at one time denounced with equal unanimity. It is highly probable that we shall cast off in the near future certain portions of the mental costume which is considered quite the fashion to-day. In the age of Washington or even Lincoln, if a woman asked to sit on a jury, or to be appointed a police detective, she would have been considered out of her mind. But to-day no one is very seriously alarmed to find woman in all the walks of life. What would have shocked the world as very radical a hundred or even fifty years ago, is in our day welcomed as signs of a world-wide awakening. Indeed, we are shocked when we meet, in the twentieth century, a woman of the times of ignorance and slavery.

However hard we may think, it will be impossible to discover anything which is not subject to this law of change. The other day certain reformers calling themselves Socialists or Anarchists went to a church in New York City, known as the "Rockefeller Church," and deliberately interrupted the proceedings by an attempt to usurp the privileges of the hour, which belonged to the officiating clergyman. That, certainly, was radical conduct. The Anarchist would call it "direct action." Now, can we imagine a state of society which would make such behavior at a public meeting, not only proper, but a duty as well? Speaking only for myself, I condemn the interruption of the church services on last Sunday (May 10, 1914) in New York. There was absolutely no excuse for it. To go into a hall or a church ostensibly to be one of the listeners, and then force oneself or one's message upon an unwilling audience, is an inexcusable impertinence, under present circumstances. What would you say, if your lecturer were to go to the Cathedral of the Holy Name, on the north side, on a Sunday, during the celebration of the Mass, and, just as the priest appeared at the altar, clap his hand against his mouth and begin to speak in his place and to his audience, whether or not anybody wanted to hear him? Nothing could be more extreme and eccentric than such deportment, however honest one's motives may be.

Digitized by Google

In England the militants claimed the right of free speech in the Westminster Cathedral while Father Vaughan was reciting the Ritual of the Mass. A few Sundays before the incident in the "Rockefeller Church," a woman attempted to address the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Congregation uninvited. People who do that must have either an insatiable passion for notoriety, or an inability to wait for their turn. There are minds that leak. The thought prematurely delivered, that is to say, delivered out of time or place, is an abortion. It is also true that brooding over one's wrongs, real or fancied, unhinges the mind. The social question has cost many a thinker his sanity.

In defence of the conduct of the Rev. Mr. White, pastor of the church of the Social Revolution, and the interrupter of the services in the "Rockefeller Church," Mr. Amos Pinchot, in a letter to the Associated Press, quotes the example of Jesus who whipped the money-changers out of the temple-court. Mr. Pinchot thinks Jesus, too, would have been arrested had he gone to the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church to speak. But Mr. Pinchot is careful neither of his premises nor of his conclusions. Did Jesus do right when he used physical force against the money-changers? Without stopping to explain that these people were not in the temple, but in the court of the temple, and that they were doing nothing illegal or immoral, since their services were needed by the worshipers, it will be enough to remark that Jesus' interference cost him his life, while the Rev. Mr. White was only given six months at the Bridewell. We believe in free speech, but a priest must secure our permission before he may speak from this platform, and I must secure the Pope's consent before I may speak in St. Peter's.

And yet this criticism against the conduct of the interrupters would be lamentably unjust if, for example, we lived in a country where free speech was monopolised by the clergy, and no one was permitted to express his views anywhere or at any time without permission of the ecclesiastical authorities. Under those circumstances it would be a solemn duty and a proud privilege to break up every church meeting and to interfere with every celebration of the Eucharist. A regime which resorts to force to suppress liberty of speech, forfeits its claim to respect. It is because our liberators harassed the persecutors that men and minds are free to-day. But we are living in a country to-day where everyone is at liberty to advertise for an audience and to express his views and beliefs without any restrictions except those which the law of equal rights imposes upon all. Therefore, the circumstances being what they are, for anyone to interfere with his neighbor's meeting when he can have one of his own, is treasonable, in the sense that it is an assault upon the glorious right of freedom of speech conquered for us by the pioneers and martyrs of progress.

It will be seen, then, that it is circumstances which give quality to every act or word. During the days of tyranny, to have raised one's voice in church or synagogue against oppression and injustice, uninvited and at great personal risk, was heroic. It was the only way the truth could be spoken in public. But to disturb a Protestant or a Catholic Church meeting to-day, at the risk of bloodshed, when a hundred ways of speaking the truth in public and peaceably have been provided, would prove, I am sorry to say, one's unworthiness of freedom.

There is, then, no getting away from the truth that circumstances are everything. A gold-mine to a starving man in a desert is worthless; a loaf of bread to a traveller dying of thirst is equally useless. Morality is the right thing in the right place—in the right place—and at the right time. Let me add one more condition—and in just measure. The immoral person is the person without sense of proportion, or of the proprieties. To be insensible to the logic of circumstances—of time, place, and balance—is to be eccentric, erratic, and a radical in the most objectionable sense of that important word.

Woman's radicalism or rebellion is largely, though not exclusively, confined to the sex question. I have already expressed myself on previous occasions on the extremists in the "Votes-for-Women" cause. If these "wild women" could have their way, they would create a tremendous prejudice against female franchise. It is the balanced women who command respect for their sex. Women have naturally great fitness for administrative positions. John Stuart Mill, who was a very careful thinker, believed that woman was the born ruler. Even in Asia, where woman has been a slave, it is often the mother or the mistress which is "the power behind the throne." There are competent critics who believe that Isabella, the Catholic, Elizabeth, the Protestant, Maria Theresa of Austria, and Catharine of Russia, were the peers of the most expert rulers. John Ruskin held that in Shakespeare's world it is the woman who invariably saves the situation. Man proposes, woman disposes. In business and financial matters, too, the women have rare qualities for efficiency and economy. One source of the extraordinary wealth of France is said to be the frugality of French women. It is equally true that the German housewife has frequently been the preserver of the family against want and destitution. Many of the cashiers in modern business houses are women. Aside from the fact that they work for less pay, I am of the opinion that even if they asked more, they would be preferred because of their greater economy, trustworthiness, and scrupulous attention to details. Woman has acquired these traits by experience. The primitive husband selected for his wife the kind of woman that could manage his household, take care of his interests, and conserve his estate. It was the woman who could make a little go a great way who pleased her husband. To make a little go a great way has been the profession, we may say, of woman. That is the one thing expected of her by everybody. Naturally enough, that type of woman survived. When we think of the many comfortable and even artistically attractive homes, and of the taste with which most women dress themselves and their children, and when we realise that all this is done, in the majority of cases, on a comparatively modest allowance, we will have no difficulty in believing that experience has endowed woman with the faculty of making a little go a great way.

It is interesting to see how evolution—that is to say, the law of natural selection—explains the mental qualities of both man and woman, as well as their physical development. A course on the philosophy of evolution would be intensely instructive. Darwin helps us to understand the institutions which have grown about us better than any other teacher. Woman's religiosity may also be explained as the result of her experience. Admiring as she did the powerful man, and preferring him for husband because he could protect her, her children, and her home against invasion, she came to have a tremendous reverence for authority. She became worshipful of the arm that saved her, and when her husband died, she built an altar to him and called him "Savior." There is no doubt that this is one of the origins of the idea of a Supreme Protector in heaven, to whom the widowed mother urged her children to look for help. The ghost of the departed husband or tribal chief became the Great Spirit of the savage, and later the Jupiter or Jehovah of more modern times.

Digitized by Google

(To be continued.)

Joseph Priestley.

By G. W. Foote.

(Reprinted.)

Freethought is not a set of definite intellectual conclusions but rather a mental attitude; or, to vary the metaphor, not the goal of the human mind in its pursuit of truth, so much as the path which it must tread to get thither. The positive beliefs of Freethinkers have in all ages necessarily varied, but their method, whether fully pursued or not, has been one and the same. They have all asserted and claimed the right to think freely, to attempt the discovery of truth in their own way, unimpeded by any restrictions, and to announce the result of their investigations without respect to the wishes of temporal or spiritual rulers. And truly this perpetual vindication of Freethought, these incessant efforts to clear the road of speculation, so that earnest men may travel therein uninterruptedly, have been productive of greater good than has resulted from any declaration of positive faith, or from any mere assertion of even unpopular truth. For freedom of thought is the indispensable preliminary to intellectual progress, and given it, the attainment of truth is but a question of time. How erroneous were the opinions of many of that noble band of warriors who did battle with the tyranny of the Church in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and yet how can we be sufficiently grateful to them for their gallant assault on spiritual despotism, and their unwearied ardor in the struggle for that freedom of thought and speech, without which all progress is absolutely impossible? These heroes do not recommend themselves to intoxicated system-mongers, but the great, generous heart of humanity acclaims them as worthy of all praise, justly reckoning nobility of character and invincible courage as infinitely higher than mere intellectual strength.

The hero of this sketch prided himself mainly on his persistent dissemination of that species of theological belief known as Unitarianism; and assuredly everyone must admire his devotion to his ideal, and his sacrifice of everything which interfered with its service. But besides practising a noble self-abnegation, Priestly strenuously and repeatedly maintained his right, and the right of every man, to pursue truth without dictation or interference from others. In following his chosen course of life, he lighted upon truths of the gravest import and consequence. His scientific discoveries have been celebrated in the highest language of eulogy by persons qualified to pronounce on their merits. His philosophical speculations went to the root of some of the most important questions which occupy human attention, and were presented with a force and perspicuity deserving of all admiration and praise. In political matters, also, he was greatly, although not pre-eminently, interested, and the same freedom and independence characterised his treatment of them, as are everywhere apparent in his treatises on other subjects. He was a simple, earnest, loveable man, who honorably forwent the tempting material prizes which assuredly were within easy reach of his perseverance and facile talents, in order the more effectually to apply himself to the investigation of nature and the search after truth.

Joseph Priestley was born at Fieldhead, about six miles south-west of Leeds, on March 13, 1733. His father, also named Joseph, a worthy man but not greatly embarrassed with wealth, was twice married and blessed with a full quiver of filial arrows; having six children by his first wife and three by the second. His first wife was the only daughter of a farmer named Joseph Swift. After bearing him six pledges of love (of whom Joseph was the eldest) in almost as few years, she died, her death being accelerated by the rigorous winter of 1739. Of this mother very little is recorded, but that little is highly creditable. She was, above all, punctiliously honest, and Priestley relates that she once made him carry back to his uncle's house a pin which he had stolen thence, and with which he was innocently playing.

After the death of his mother, young Joseph was taken in charge by an aunt on the father's side, who acted indeed as a mother to him until her decease in 1764. This worthy woman and her husband were theoretical Calvinists, but their abundant milk of human kindness led to grave inconsistencies, and made them vastly better than their creed. However, they were strict observers of religious discipline. They eschewed light literature, and rigidly kept the Sabbath as a day of fleshly mortification. On that day no cooking was permitted, nor even any recreation, however light. The boy managed to read, with fear and trembling, dear old Robinson Crusoe, but beyond that he never ventured. He even adds that on one occasion he became so exasperated with his brother's levity of mind that he knocked out of the lad's hands a horrible book on Knight Errantry which smacked overmuch of a pagan love of earth and disregard of heaven. Greatly exercised, too, was Priestley's youthful mind about the abstruser mysteries of theology; new birth, and other such fictitious torments. Yet this mental perturbation interfered but little with his progress in carnal knowledge. He successively attended various schools, and especially a large free school under the care of the Rev. Mr. Hague, where he learned Latin and Greek. Hebrew also he acquired during the vacations under the generous tuition of a dissenting minister named Kirby. His aunt intended him for the ministry, and his education was mainly directed to that end, but ill-health and an impediment of speech compelled him to turn his attention to trade. Accordingly, he set himself to acquire French, Italian, and High Dutch, all of which he mastered in a marvellously short time. His indefatigable energy impelled him to further conquests. He learned geometry, algebra, and various branches of mathematics of another dissenting minister, a Rev. Mr. Haggerstone, together with Chaldee and Syriac and a smattering of Arabic. He also read Watts' Logic (a fair performance in its time) and Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding. The result of this metaphysical study with Locke as a guide may be anticipated. The boy's mind took a sceptical turn, and refused continued assent to the repulsive dogmas of Calvinism. This backsliding was quickly detected by the keen inquisitors of the Church which he attended; so that when, in 1752, he desired to be admitted as a communicant, he was refused because of his disbelief in Adam's fall, and the consequent damnation of all his posterity. Fortunately for him, the secular laws permitted no extreme expression of religious disapproval.

At the Daventry Academy, Priestley remained three years with much intellectual profit. The academy was conducted on peculiar principles; not much systematic instruction was given, but the teachers discussed important questions with their pupils, each of whom was required to know the arguments for and against every position; a method of instruction, as Professor Huxley maliciously remarks, "rather calculated to make acute than what are called sound divines, a sound divine being one who never looks at any side of a question but his own." This atmosphere of mental freedom was necessarily bracing to the youthful mind of Priestley. He naïvely confesses in his autobiography that he generally found himself on the unorthodox side. One by one what he considered the irrational excrescences of Christianity were expelled from his mind; and at last, after the reading of Hartley's great work, Observations on Man, he gravitated finally towards the Unitarian faith, in which he ever after remained.

(To be continued.)

Salvation Army Apostle: "If you swear at those horses, my good man, you'll never go to heaven." Canal Driver (humbly): "I knows it, mum; but if I don't I'll never get to Tonawanda."

Bobby: "Maw, I read of a man to-day who was one hundred and seventy years old."

Mother: "Oh, what a lie!"

Bobby: "No, mamma, it was in the Bible."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

OUTDOOR.

BETHNAL GREEN BRANCH N. S. S. (Victoria Park, near the Bandstand): 3.15, Miss Kough, a Lecture.

CAMBERWELL BRANCH N. S. S. (Brockwell Park): 6, Mr. Hope, a Lecture.

EDMONTON BRANCH N. S. S. (Edmonton Green): 7.30, W. Davidson, a Lecture. Derby-road, Ponders End (opposite "Two Brewers"): Wednesday, August 26, at 8.30, W. Davidson, a Lecture.

KINGSLAND BRANCH N. S. S. (corner of Ridley-road): 11.30, R. H. Rosetti, "God, Faith, and Morality"; 7.30, Mrs. Rosetti, "The Comfort of Religion."

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Finsbury Park): 11.30, Mr. Hope, a Lecture. Parliament Hill: 3.30, Mr. Davidson, a Lecture. Regent's Park (near the Fountain): 3.30, a Lecture.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, R. H. Rosetti, "God, Faith, and Morality."

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6½ ins. by 8¾ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	...	...	$3.00
Two new subscribers	...	...	5.00
One subscription two years in advance	...	...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LETTERS OF A CHINAMAN ON THE MISCHIEF OF MISSIONARIES. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

PAIN AND PROVIDENCE. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 & Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies, 4d (parcel post).

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 13 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE

Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—No. 35 SUNDAY, AUGUST 30, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse—I will not retreat a single inch—and I will be heard.—WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON.

The War—and After.

IN some almost unaccountable manner it is generally taken for granted that the present war has decisively disproved the position taken up by Anti-Militarists. The clash of arms, it is said, has silenced the voice of the pacifist, and the outbreak of hostilities has proved the uselessness of his theories. The truth of the first statement must be admitted. To preach when none will listen is little better than waste of time. When a nation is actually engaged in war, and when all minds are filled with thoughts of war and its immediate consequences, a Rationalist would cease to be rational did he not recognise the obvious outcome of such a situation. There is a time to speak and a time to be silent, and wisdom is shown in the recognition of both occasions.

But one may emphatically deny that this war has disproved the theories of the pacifists. On the contrary, all that has happened only justifies all they said. For years the militarist party in every State in Europe has been proclaiming that the way to keep peace is to prepare for war. To the pacifist that has always seemed as sensible as to try to promote temperance by filling one's house with whisky. Every nation in Europe has listened to that gospel and accepted it. All have piled up armaments to a ruinous extent. In times of peace they have prepared for war—when else could they prepare for it—and the result is that war is here on a scale such as was never before seen. And, in addition, it is the nation that has most seduously prepared for war during times of peace, the nation in which the ideals of militarism are most nearly realised, that is charged with the responsibility for the outbreak. Who, then, is in the wrong; the pacifist or the militarist? Everything that occurred has, so far, justified the Anti-Militarist. These huge armies and navies are no guarantee of peace; they are a constant incentive to war. Tools are meant for use—otherwise there is no good in having them. And whether our tools be Dreadnoughts or pickaxes, ploughshares or rifles, that remains unmistakably true. Pacifists were never silly enough to say there could not be war; all they said was that the European nations were going the right way to ensure it. And if ever prophecy was justified it has surely been so in this case.

After a month of war many are endeavoring to extract some comfort from the situation. The religious press is at it with the usual banality that "our civilisation has merited and needed a purging," the notion being that God has permitted the war for this purpose. A purging of what? It takes a Christian to talk of war, with its brutalities and savageries, its creation and perpetuation of evil passions, as God's method of purging our civilisation. Let there be no mistake about one thing. However inevitable war may be it purges a nation of nothing that is bad. It creates nothing good. The virtues and qualities it utilises are those that are created in civil life. The proof of this is seen in the fact that never in the world's history has a nation been able to perpetuate itself by militarism. The decency and discipline of an army lasts only so long as there is a civil population to feed it with the needful fresh blood.

Some people are—while fully endorsing the evils of war—prophesying good results from the conflict. It is assumed that it will make the people of Europe so disgusted and horrified with the consequences of war that drastic steps will be taken to prevent its repetition in the future. I wish I could agree with them, and, at any rate, hope they are right and I am wrong. Every war has left behind its legacy of suffering and horror. Over and over again Continental Europe has heard the clash of arms and seen the track of armies burning and ravaging. What effect has it had in preventing the recurrence of war? Soldiers themselves see these things in every campaign. Does it make them less ready to engage in another? People can get habituated to sights, no matter how horrible; and one of the complaints of the militarist party has been that owing to the absence of war, people are getting "soft" and "squeamish," and need a war to brace them up. And yet it is the "horror" of war that is expected to cure people of the taste for it!

Such prophecies take no account of all that war leaves behind it, and which act as a factor that make for other wars. One need go no farther back than the Franco-Prussian War for evidence of this. How much did the horrors of that campaign do to foster peace between France and Germany? How much did that war do to bring the two peoples together? It filled one with arrogance, it left the other with an open wound, and caused both to hate each other with an increased bitterness. And if, and when, the German-Austrian forces are defeated, there will still remain on the one side the influence of the militarist element, and on the other hatred for defeat experienced. The militarist element will remain in each country—with the conqueror victory will be counted to his credit, with the conquered the need for more effective militarism will be argued. We shall have won because we were well prepared, they will have lost because they were ill-prepared. The moral will be drawn again, as it has been drawn before, that it is every nation's duty to so arm that it will have nothing to fear from others, and can bring others to terms if it so desires. It is almost certain that the rebuilding of shattered navies and the replacement of depleted armies will receive first attention when the war is over.

Who is to say that there shall be no more wars? Is it England? Is it Russia? Is it France? Is it the three combined? Will any of these trust each other enough to depute the task? Are Russia and France and England in alliance with each other because of their mutual love or because of their enmity to others? Was it love of Russia that drove France into alliance, or hatred of Germany? And with Germany eliminated what bond is there that can unite the autocracy of the Czar and the Republic of France? If not one nation, will the three, combine to secure international peace? That is to assume that the aims of these countries are so mutually reconcilable that they can pursue them without fear of conflict. But does anyone believe this to be the case? As the industrialising of Russia proceeds, and if an increase in the Slav power results from the present war, can anyone imagine that there will not be increased opportunities for conflict? Is it quite beyond the bounds of possibility that we may even see an Anglo-French-German Alliance against Russia, like the part played by Austria against the Turks during the Middle Ages? As the world stands, and with Germany eliminated for some time as a possibly disturbing factor, it may mean the emergence of a new source of danger against which militarists will be shrieking for more ships and larger navies.

Digitized by Google

An international agreement that would secure peace is a laudable ideal, but how is it to be secured? England, it may be assumed, will still demand the control of the seas. It suits us, and we say it is necessary to our existence. Very good; but can we expect every other country to submit to this ownership of the world's highway for ever and with good feeling? Why, this fact alone will drive other nations along the old line of offensive and defensive alliances, the fruits of which we are reaping in the present war. And alliances based upon such considerations as hold the Christian nations of the world together may be broken at any moment. Nor is there any power based upon force too strong to be overthrown. Of course, it may be said that it is to everybody's interest that some international agreement should be reached when this war is concluded, and such outbreaks prevented in future. Quite so; but, on the other hand, it is never to anybody's real interest to go to war. Even to win is to lose. The truth is, that nations do not go to war because it really pays them, but because of misdirected ambitions and mistaken ideals; in other words, because of lack of intelligence and defective civilisation.

How wrongly the lessons of this war are being read, and will be read, may be seen in the newspaper talk about "blotting Germany out," or "wiping Germany off the map." These are the greatest fools of all. If by "blotting out Germany" is meant the destruction of the German Navy and defeat of the German Army, that may be done, and looks like being done—unless our press censorship is keeping us in the dark. But Germany remains, the German people remain, German ambitions remain, and there will also remain the memory of a crushing defeat. And the man is a lunatic, blind alike to the lessons of history and the facts of human nature, who imagines that a nation of seventy millions can be "blotted out." All the power of Russia has not been able to crush the sentiment of nationality in Finland. All the power of Russia, Germany, and Austria has not been able to crush out the sentiment of nationality in Poland. After four centuries, England, in spite of all it could do, finds the sentiment of Irish nationality as active as ever. Short of an absolute, a complete massacre, a nation of seventy millions cannot be "blotted out." They remain, their ideals and ambitions, and their way of looking at life, must always be reckoned with.

Armaments will go on; of that I feel assured, although I should be only too pleased to find myself mistaken. Germany may not realise its ambitions by the present war; but ambitions are not killed by being frustrated—they are only killed when they are replaced by ambitions of another kind. Militarism will awaken to none of its blunders, and diplomacy will continue creating danger centres all over Europe, as Germany scattered mines in the North Sea, and will then profess pained surprise when trouble arises. On the other hand, there should result from the war an increase in the number of men and women in every country who see the futility of war, of its utter powerlessness to solve or settle any problem, of its complete uselessness as an agent of civilisation. That will be the only item on the credit side of the catastrophe. There will be a greater number of people all over the world who will realise the futility of the policy that has led to this outbreak, and those who have recognised this all along will be nerved to greater efforts when the time arrives for cool and reasonable speech. It is not an alliance of several nations against one or other nations, not an increase of armaments, or a balancing of one country against another, nor yet treaties dictated by self-interest and maintained only so long as self-interest suggests their observance, that will lead to a cessation of war. There is only one way to this; and that is the growth of intelligence and humanity.

C. COHEN.

Fatal Implications.

THE religious press is devoting itself almost exclusively to the topic of the hour. Wondrously instructive are even the headings of the articles and paragraphs which fill the various denominational journals. "Dr. Clifford and the War," "Dr. Campbell Morgan on the Perils of the Time," "The Psychosis of the War," "Views on the War," "Prayer in Time of War," "The War and the National Conscience," such are a few of the titles of contributions to last week's ecclesiastical newspapers. Clergymen are well aware that their congregations are puzzled and perplexed by the present bitter conflict between so many European Powers, all of which are distinctively Christian. It is a notorious fact that the Kaiser is a zealous disciple of the Nazarene, and an indefatigable preacher of his Gospel. There is no doubt whatever but that his Imperial Majesty is a thoroughly orthodox Christian; and every one of the Powers with which he is now at war professes the same faith. When a gentleman was reminded of this significant fact the other day, he maintained that they are only so-called Christian countries; but his contention is nothing but a worthless subterfuge. If Germany and Great Britain are not Christian countries, then it follows that there is not a single Christian country under the sun. The British clergy, of all sects, describe our cause as undoubtedly most righteous. Dr. Clifford declares that Great Britain has entered upon this war under "an awful compulsion," having been literally "forced into it," because it desires to "do the will of God, which will is to stand up for humanity." Now Professor Harnack is, to say the least, quite as ardent a lover of humanity and righteousness as Dr. Clifford, yet the erudite Professor is reported to have made a speech, in the course of which he alluded to what he called the "treason of England to culture by supporting Byzantine, Muscovite, and Mongolian against German." This only shows how utterly stupid is the appeal to the will of God, because the will of God, in each case, simply means the respective opinions of the individuals who profess belief in it. That is to say, the will of God in Germany and Austria-Hungary is at this hour a radically different thing from what it is conceived to be in Russia, Belgium, France, and Great Britain. Hence it is absolutely impossible, on any known religious principle, to determine which side, in the present sanguinary struggle, represents the cause of truth and righteousness. That is a task which the theologians, as such, on either side, are wholly unable to accomplish.

In connection with this general subject of war it is astonishing what a number of damaging admissions the men of God inadvertently make. For example, in discussing the war and the national conscience, Professor Denney, of Glasgow, observes that "one part of the Church's work is to naturalise Christianity in the world." The logical inference from such an observation is that, having been in the world for nigh two thousand years, Christianity is still a foreigner on our globe. At the present moment unnaturalised Germans, who happen to be in this country, are looked upon with suspicion, and carefully watched. They are foreigners whom the authorities find it extremely difficult to trust. So, likewise, according to Dr. Denney, Christianity is an alien on this earth; and we hold that it should be very closely watched. It is a religion that has produced innumerable crops of hypocrites, and that is still producing them. The profession of this religion is itself the worst form of hypocrisy. Every adherent of it pretends to be and do what he really never intends either to be or to do. We therefore conclude that it is not within the range of possibility to naturalise Christianity in this world. The genius, the ruling spirit of the race is against it, over which it can never prevail. For nineteen hundred years it has struggled hard to acclimatise itself among us, and it is farther away from doing it to-day than at any previous time.

Digitized by Google

Again, Dr. Denney affirms that "war is a great leveller." He says:—

> "Whatever the artificial distinctions between them, whatever the inevitable differences of rank, on the field of battle all men stand on the same plane. They are face to face with the same dangers, they can display the same heroism; the humblest can give his life to his country, and the noblest can do no more. A generous spirit acknowledges this without reserve. 'He to-day that sheds his blood with me shall be my brother; be he ne'er so vile, this day shall gentle his condition.' But why is it only acknowledged in the crisis of a battle? Why is not the brotherhood acknowledged equally in time of peace?"

Does not Dr. Denney realise that, implicit in the sentences just quoted from his article in the British Weekly for August 20, there is to be found the severest possible condemnation of the Christian religion? War succeeds in doing for a time what Christianity has never been competent to achieve. Paul gloried in what he believed to be the complete equality of all in Christ Jesus. In the new religion, as depicted by him, there were neither Jews nor Gentiles, neither Greeks nor Barbarians, neither bond nor free, neither black nor white, all being one in Christ. As a matter of fact, however, the divisions and class distinctions among mankind under Christianity have been wider and characterised by more bitterness and hatred than under any other religion. Not only has Christianity failed to be a great leveller; it has also fostered class animosities and color prejudices. Only twenty-one years ago, Mohandas K. Gandhi, a high-caste Hindu, a man of intellect and culture, and a barrister of the Middle Temple, himself the son of a Prime Minister in his native Indian State, landed in Durban, on his way to conduct a law suit for an Indian firm at Pretoria. Having provided himself with a first-class railway ticket, he entered a compartment. The guard rudely ordered him out, when, on refusing, he was ignominiously ejected. On arriving at Johannesburg he was denied accommodation at the hotels, while at Pretoria he was actually kicked off the pavement. To some this may sound incredible; but we have witnessed many similar exhibitions of the white man's contempt for the blacks. We once heard a Christian minister making the remark that a man of color should be taught with the whip to keep his place, which was in the middle of the street with the animals and the vehicles, not on the pavement with ladies and gentlemen. Dr. Denney admits that such wicked inequalities do exist in Christian countries, and that, although there are, as Lord Bryce tells us, no less than seven applications of the term, it is as certain to conscience as any truth can be that we need more equality in our country. Yes, we sadly need it, but Christianity is powerless to develop it.

Indeed, all along the line Christianity has been a colossal failure. By implication this also is admitted in the Professor's candid paper. He asserts that nothing can justify the existence of the British Empire "but the benefits it confers on the subject populations, its right to rule being measured by the services it renders." But does the British Empire confer benefits upon and render services to its subject populations? Ask the leaders of the native races in South Africa, some of whom are among us now as a deputation to the Government to protest against the injustice of a native law recently passed by the South African Parliament. Dr. Denney admits this, for having referred to the lesson taught at school, namely, "that when a less advanced nation is conquered by one more advanced, the benefits of the conquest in the long run far surpass the immediate losses," he continues thus:—

> "Very likely it is true, but in most cases the long run is very long and the conquered nation, while it may have cause to thank Providence, has no reason to bless its conquerors. There is a very dark side to the history of most of the conquests which have laid the foundations even of the British Empire; again and again our sins have found us out, and they may do so again..... Who can believe that the general influence of contact with what we call Christian civilisation, when that contact has been simply commercial, has been uplifting and beneficial to men of other races? The practically universal testimony of Christian missionaries is that the great obstacle to the spread of the Gospel is the presence and the conduct of men who, because their skins are white, are supposed to represent Christianity."

This is neither the place nor the time to express an opinion on the results of missionary work among savage races. What we wish to emphasise now is that, according to Professor Denney's own confession, Christianity is everywhere a foreign element, forced upon mankind against its will, and ultimately to be cast out as a meddlesome intruder. The reverend Doctor is quite right when he says that "one part of the Church's work is to naturalise Christianity in the world," but that is the part of its work to which the Church is by no means equal. As a matter of fact, the Church and Christianity are rapidly parting company. It is easy enough to blame the philosophy of Schopenhauer and Nietzsche for the present war, as Drs. Clifford and Campbell Morgan do; but Christian Europe has really never been anything but an armed camp. Even the so-called Ages of Faith were dominated by materialistic conceptions and forces quite as fully as is the twentieth century; and the appeal to physical force was the universal practice of the Church of Christ. If we are to judge the future by the past, the time will never come for the triumph of mind over matter so long as the Christian religion endures. Dr. Clifford must have been talking in his sleep when he said that "the conflict now raging was a battle between brutal forces on the one hand and the sovereignty of the teaching of Jesus Christ on the other; a battle not simply for Europe, but for the world and for humanity." Every unprejudiced person is aware that it is simply a conflict between material armies and navies which have been steadily preparing for it for scores of years.

Marvellously illuminating are the implications of the deliverances of the pulpit and the religious press just now. Nominally in defence of God and religion, they virtually undermine both; and in this we greatly rejoice. If people would only calmly think, they would perceive that the war now being waged completely discredits, not only the Christian doctrine of God, but the very idea of a revealed religion centering in an Almighty Prince of Peace.

J. T. LLOYD.

Bible Makers.—III.

BIBLE JUDGES.

THE Biblical writers who called themselves "Judges" gave themselves, unquestionably, a very fanciful name. What these distinguished persons were judges of we have no means of knowing. But it appears that the children of Israel "did evil in the sight of the Lord." "And they forsook the Lord God of their fathers, which brought them out of the land of Egypt and followed other gods, of the gods of the people that were round about them, and bowed themselves unto them and provoked the Lord to anger." Now, it was always a serious offence for any people to give up the worship of their particular god and transfer their affections to another; and as the Jewish God, Jehovah, was a jealous God, he was very much annoyed when his chosen people turned their backs upon him and "went a whoring after other gods." Consequently, his anger waxed wroth against them and "he delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them and sold them into the hands of their enemies round about." "Nevertheless, the Lord raised up judges which delivered them out of the hands of those that spoiled them."

Digitized by Google

But even the judges could not stop the Israelites from running after other gods. With regard to these judges we may again ask what were these persons judges of? Were they primitive students of jurisprudence? If so, they have written nothing on Jewish law; indeed, they have not even suggested any improvements on the laws of Moses. They certainly were not judges of a man's capability, single-handed, of destroying brute beasts or his fellow-creatures, else they would not have favored us with the silly account of Samson's encounter with a lion or his great feat with a jaw-bone.

As a profane wag once remarked, if Samson could have slain a thousand people with another ass's jaw-bone, it is extremely difficult to understand why he could not have done it with his own.

But, seriously, what could these judges have known about a man's capacity for killing his fellow-creatures with no more destructive instrument than the jaw-bone of an ass?

According to these writers, Samson "found a new jaw-bone of an ass, and put forth his hand and slew a thousand men therewith."

And Samson said: "With the jaw-bone of an ass, heaps upon heaps, with the jaw-bone of an ass have I slain a thousand men."

Look at that passage. In imagination we can see Samson—long-haired Samson—taking up the jaw-bone, and, with a flourish, exclaiming metaphorically: "Lay on, Macduff, and damned be he who first cries, Hold! enough!"

Now, these judges could have known nothing about the "knock-out" blow administered by modern professional boxers.

Physiologically speaking, there are only two places that you can hit a man and kill him by the first blow; consequently, we have to imagine a thousand men standing in a row, and each one of them coming up in order, and pointing to the vulnerable spot behind the left ear, and saying, "Just there, please, Mr. Samson." And when Samson had killed one hundred there was only nine hundred left for the invincible jawbone. And Samson would be exclaiming all the time, in his most affable tones, "Now the next, please." Could anything be more ludicrous?

Then there was that other feat of Samson's—tying three hundred foxes tails together, putting a firebrand between the two tails, and sending them into the cornfields of the Philistines to destroy their property. Can you imagine Samson, or any other man, catching three hundred foxes? Talk about going on a wild goose chase! that would be nothing to chasing three hundred foxes, and catching them. And when Samson had caught them, he had still the trifling difficulty of tying them together tail to tail, and then putting a firebrand between them and sending them off full gallop in among the corn of the Philistines. How they would have scampered, and rolled, and pulled, each in an opposite direction, before they reached those fields of waving corn! And what a horrible, what a sickening sight it would have been to see those poor foxes roasting in the terrible conflagration caused by the burning corn!

And this is only one of the numerous stories given under the signatures of the Jewish Judges of Israel. Here is another. Samson went to Timnath, and saw a young woman there that took his fancy. So he went back to his parents and asked them to get this young woman, that he might marry her. But his parents asked: "Is there never a woman among any of the daughters of thy brethren, or among all my people, that thou goest to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines?" Samson, however, persisted in his desire, and said to his father, "Get her for me, for she pleaseth me well."

On his way to Timnath with his parents, they encountered a young lion who actually dared to roar at Samson. At that moment the spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him, and Samson took hold of the lion by the two jaws and "rent him as he would have rent a kid"; and, so as to make us understand the marvellous nature of the achievement, the writers add that Samson "had nothing in his hand." So you see there was no deception.

It is not my purpose to examine in detail the various chapters of the Book of Judges. I have given a few samples; the rest must be judged by these.

On the subject of dreams the Judges were authorities.

If any wandering lunatic dreamed a dream, these writers were sure to allow it to come true. Indeed, a very large portion of the Bible is made up of religious dreams; and the Bible-makers, being themselves mostly dreamers, attached great importance to the interpretation of visions which the dreamers themselves had half forgotten. And so, in the seventh chapter, we are told that when Gideon had come into the city of the Midianites, "there was a man that told a dream unto his fellow, and said, Behold, I dreamed a dream, and lo, a cake of barley bread tumbled into the host of Midian, and came unto a tent, and smote it that it fell, and overturned it that the tent lay along. And his fellow answered and said, This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon, the son of Joash, the man of Israel, for into his hand hath God delivered Midian and all the host."

The writers of the book of Judges then proceed to show that the barley-loaf in the dream did really mean the sword of Gideon; and though no tent was overturned by either the loaf or the sword, nor even the walls of the city, the Midianites were put to flight, pursued, and those of them that were unfortunately overtaken were mercilessly slain, even to the princes who were taken prisoners. Judges, with its stories of dreams, battles, and the man whose strength lay in his hair, may be considered very good pabulum upon which to feed religious babes and sucklings; but it is decidedly poor stuff upon which to rear children of a large and more vigorous growth; and of such are the children of earth.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The Origin of Supernatural Ideas.—VI.

(Continued from p. 533.)

"The lowest savages have no idea of a deity at all. Those slightly more advanced regard him as an enemy to be dreaded, but who may be resisted with a fair prospect of success, who may be cheated by the cunning and defied by the strong. Thus the natives of the Nicobar Islands endeavor to terrify their deity by scarecrows, and the negro beats his fetich if his prayers are not granted. As tribes advance in civilisation their deities advance in dignity, but their power is still limited; one governs the sea, another the land; one reigns over the plains, another among the mountains. They require humiliating ceremonies and bloody sacrifices. But few races have arrived at the conception of an omnipotent and beneficent Deity."—SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, Origin of Civilisation, p. 515 (1889).

"'God made man,' the preacher saith,
'From a handful of dust, by a whiff of breath.'
'No,' say the sages, 'Man made God
From nothing at all, by creative nod;
Organ for organ and limb for limb,—
In the image of Man created He him.'
. . . . .
Man made God in his image plain—
Cruel, revengeful, jealous, vain,
A Man of War and a Man austere,
A strong bad Giant—a God to fear;
Raw-Head and Bloody-Bones, fierce and grim,
In the image of Man created he Him."
—J. LIDDELL KELLY, "The Making of God."
Heather and Fern.

HAVING thus reached the idea of a ghost or spiritual being within himself, which could leave and return to the body, and—to cite Mr. Clodd again—

"Having once conceived of objects as informed by something corresponding to man's life and will, realising therein that there was a distinction between the thing moved and the something that moved it, the idea of a twofold, a seen and unseen, must arise. And in that idea was the germ of the Supernatural, which itself had impetus in the fact borne in upon man that he was at the mercy of powers stronger than himself, that crossed his path, that thwarted his schemes, and played havoc with anything to which he clung. For so long as affairs ran smoothly with him, little heed need be paid to what spirits did; it was when he was worsted in the struggle that he felt himself in the clutches and at the mercy of powers which were other than, and above, nature.....In the instinctive cry for help there was the primitive prayer; in the magic and spell a body of practices by which man sought to outwit, or compel to furtherance of his own ends, the dreaded powers; and in the sacrifice the bribe to appease, or the offering to flatter them, or the attempt to enter into commensal relations with them. Sometimes man would use physical force, as did the Guaycuras of Paraguay, who believed that unusually heavy storms were attacks on them by the evil spirits, and who sallied forth brandishing their clubs and shouting their war-cry for the purpose of repelling them."*

Digitized by Google

In the beginning all spirits were regarded as essentially evil. Mr. Henry Newton, a Church of England missionary in New Guinea, after observing of the natives that "The sorcerer believes in his own power, and the people believe in it too," proceeds:—

"Certainly the New Guinea philosophy of life is that nothing happens to man without some cause, no man dies a natural death, all suffering and sickness is due to evil spirits which people this world, and as, like many of his white brethren, he is quite prepared to take the good things of life unquestioning, and only to look for causes when evil comes, there is no place in his philosophy for good spirits; the good is but the normal state undisturbed by the machinations of evil spirits, and the evil spirits are usually set to work by some human agent."†

Mr. J. P. Thomson tells us of the same people that they offer food on the graves of the dead "to satisfy the hungry soul of the departed or to appease the evil spirits by which the lives of these wretched people are haunted and kept in constant fear and subjection."‡

Sir John Lubbock observes that "savages almost always regard spirits as evil beings," and, as he remarks, it is easy to understand why this should be; for among the lowest savages

"every man of a different tribe is regarded as naturally, and almost necessarily hostile. A stranger is synonymous with an enemy, and a spirit is but a member of an invisible tribe. The Hottentots, according to Thunberg, have very vague notions about a good deity. 'They have much clearer notions about an evil spirit, whom they fear, believing him to be the occasion of sickness, death, thunder, and every calamity that befalls them."§

Sir John also cites the testimony of Schweinfurth (Heart of Africa, vol. i., p. 303), who says that among the Bongos of Central Africa "good spirits are quite unrecognised, and, according to the general negro idea, no benefit can ever come from a spirit." Again:—

"The Coroados of Brazil 'acknowledge no cause of good, or no god, but only an evil principle, which..... leads him astray, vexes him, brings him into difficulty and danger, and even kills him.' In Virginia and Florida the evil spirit was worshiped and not the good, because the former might be propitiated, while the latter was sure to do all the good he could."

Sir John gives many other instances of a similar belief among savage tribes. He cites Carver (Travels, p. 388) for the fact that the Redskin

"lives in continual apprehension of the unkind attacks of spirits, and to avert them has resource to charms, to the fantastic ceremonies of his priest, or the powerful influence of his manitous. Fear has, of course, a greater share in his devotions than gratitude, and he pays more attention to deprecating the wrath of the evil than securing the favor of the good beings."

According to Artus, the West Coast negroes represent their deities as "black and mischievous, delighting to torment them in various ways."*

To cite Lubbock once more:—

"Dr. Nixon, first Bishop of Tasmania, tells us that among the natives of that country 'no trace can be found of the existence of any religious usage, or even sentiment, amongst them; unless, indeed, we may call by that name the dread of a malignant spirit, which seems to have been their predominant, if not their only, feeling on the subject' (Bonwick, Daily Life of the Tasmanians, p. 172).

"'Of a supreme and beneficent God,' says Hunter, 'the Santal has no conception. His religion is a religion of terror and degradation. Hunted and driven from country to country by a superior race, he cannot understand how a being can be more powerful than himself without wishing to harm him' (Annals of Rural Bengal, p. 181). The Circassians and some of the Chinese have also similar opinions."†

Mr. Weeks, the Congo missionary, tells us that the tribes of the Lower Congo believe in a Creator "so good that He will not hurt them, hence no sacrifices are offered to Him, no prayers to Him ever pass their lips, and they never worship Him." They also believe in an evil power, or principle, "and because of its cruel, malignant nature, it is necessary to appease it. All their fetishes, charms, medicine-men, together with their sacrifice of fowls and goats, are either to circumvent this influence or to appease it in such a way as to gain its goodwill."‡ Another missionary, Mr. D. Crawford, tells us that the negro thinks "of God as a malignant demon, mocking at his pain, and pouring contempt upon his life,"§ and he tells us of Mushidi, a negro chief, who, while hunting red-buck, and about to fire, was anticipated by a flash of forked lightning striking them dead. "Then it was, rubbing his hands with glee, the noble hunter naïvely said, 'Fancy! God beating me at gun-firing!'" (p. 269).

Burton says of the wilder Bedoins, they "will inquire where Allah is to be found: when asked the object of the question, they reply, 'If the Eesa could but catch him, they would spear him upon the spot; who but he lays waste their homes and kills their cattle and wives?'"‖

Waitz, with his usual clarity and directness, sums the matter up as follows:—

"Ungrateful as man generally is when in luck, he sees, even when in a primitive state, nothing in the success of his plans but the usual course of nature or the result of his sagacity. Thus originally his view of nature, which coincided with his religious ideas, is about this—that among the spirits which direct nature and the fates of man, the evil spirits are either exclusively active, as is asserted of the Indians of Caraccas, who only believe in a wicked original being, or so far predominant that the good spirits are made subordinate. Though the existence of the latter is not altogether denied, they are but little attended to either in thought or prayer, worship or sacrifice, since they are already by their nature friendly to man. All these spirits are, of course, conceived as analogous to the nature of man. The religion of the primitive man is thus throughout a cruel Polytheism, without poetry, even without mythology, or, rather, a gloomy, unconnected belief in spectres and spirits, destroying all faith in the natural course of phenomena."¶

Speaking of sorcery and witchcraft, Lubbock observes:—

"Savages never know but what they may be placing themselves in the power of these terrible enemies. The sufferings and privations which they thus undergo, the horrible tortures which they sometimes inflict on themselves, and the crimes which they are led to commit, are melancholy in the extreme. It is not too much to say that the horrible dread of unknown evil hangs like a thick cloud over savage life, and embitters every pleasure."

It was not until much later that the idea of benevolent gods arose. In fact, man had to become

* Edward Clodd, Animism, pp. 49-50.
† Henry Newton, In Far New Guinea, p. 79 (1914).
‡ J. P. Thomson, British New Guinea, p. 160 (1892).
§ Sir John Lubbock, Origin of Civilisation, p. 224.
* Sir John Lubbock, Origin of Civilisation, pp. 225-6.
† Origin of Civilisation, p. 227.
‡ J. H. Weeks, Among the Primitive Bakongo, p. 277 (1914).
§ D. Crawford, Thinking Black, p. 264.
‖ Burton, First Footsteps in East Africa, p. 52.
¶ Waitz, Anthropology, p. 303.
 Lubbock, Prehistoric Times, p. 472.

Digitized by Google

civilised himself before he could evolve civilised gods. As John Stuart Mill remarked, "one of the hardest burdens laid upon the other good influences of human nature has been that of improving religion itself."*

W. MANN.

(To be continued.)

A Mountain Hour.

WHEN the human bees, their hives, and their slavery, are far behind, when the fresh air is flowing coolingly upon your brow and neck, and your feet yield responsively to the soft mountain grass, it is natural enough that you should be happy. In your happiness you become conscious of a new feeling. A secret door seems to be slowly opening in your heart, and a breath of the spirit of freedom comes out. It is a strange experience; for your nature seems as if to leap towards this new sensation with enthusiastic welcome; but, just as you would rejoice, there comes creeping over your mind the idea that this freedom is foreign to you. At first, you shrink from it. It is unreal, unnatural; it is dangerous; but gradually it wins you, and your heart inclines towards it with a delight you rarely enjoy. You live in a new world; think different thoughts; dream different dreams; for the spirit of the mountain is the spirit of freedom, it is the call of liberty echoing in your own being; and in the influence of it you rise above yourself. You become free.

So it is with me just now. Here, there is freedom from the base tyrannies of God and man. Here, there is freedom from the subtle slavery that emanates from an idea and permeates human solidity, discoloring and tainting it. Here, there is freedom from habits, religious and semi-religious, that are the prisons of all our higher strivings. There is no God, no man, no creed, no custom here to enslave me. I need bow to no priest, nor thwart and cramp my longings at the demand of the money madness. The freedom of which rebellious minds have dreamed down through the long heavily laden centuries, the freedom they have struggled and fought for, and died for, is mine, and mine without effort, and without blemish. The spirit of the mountain is in me. I am happy. Freedom is mine. I am more thoroughly and enjoyably free than the curlew that goes singing and swinging through the shimmering air above me.

A sense of unrestricted individuality is developing within me. What Christians name my soul is rapidly expanding, and reaching higher and higher altitudes of beauty. The dross is falling away. My mind is being purged. I feel as if I would have no difficulty in living as the Utopians say I could and should live. In fact, I am living that life now; and I know it is possible, possible for all men, for I am merely an average man. Strength has come to me, and considerateness, and righteousness. There are elements of ethics in my nature that are eagerly fighting each other for escape to realisation. Purity of life and mind is the plinth of freedom; and I have it. At the present moment freedom has so completely altered my nature that my friends would not know me.

Ah, liberty is a glorious state! What matters it if you only enjoy its delights for an hour or so, lying peacefully supine upon a bed of heather, your nose and toes pointing paradisewards, and your body bathed in gentle, soul-satisfying heat? It is easy to feel free on a mountain shoulder, in glorious sunshine, and with a pipe that tastes sweetly. Sufficient that you do enjoy it. Sufficient that it can be experienced, here and now. Enjoying it, you steal a grain or two of gold from the lucky-bag of futurity. You feel grander possibilities budding quickly in your heart. You feel yourself approaching nearer and nearer to nature; feel yourself becoming, not an alien within her influence, but a sympathetic child whose every nerve responds to the throb of the mother heart.

And so you dream; and the smoke-clouds from your pipe give the dream just the delicious dimness that make dreams so charmingly realistic. It is strange that whenever the dimness disappears the dream becomes a nightmare. Saint John's wonderful revelation is a case in point. It is too clear, too detestably mathematical, for a dream. Perhaps this explains why it is that Christians are so chary in coming to details nowadays. Nightmares are unpleasant, and you are apt to awaken in a cold sweat and with a shudder.

No; I will continue smoking. I want to feel my free mind going out to taste sweeter fruits and pull fairer blossoms from the trees of knowledge and life. Freedom like this is worth fighting for, worth all the buffets of scorn and enmity, all the labor and suffering in which it must be born. Freedom like this gives one —— But the spell is broken, somehow. Realities are crushing back into my brain from their temporary retreat. The mountain slope is not always bathed in sunlight. Larks and curlews do not always mingle their melodies with the same glad rippling emotion. The very heather in which I am couched belongs to a man who would not tolerate the least expression of my innocent desires did he know of it. I might disturb his birds; and he would like that as little as he would a clodhopper sitting in his cushioned pew in church.

The strath is a lovely picture, seen from this distance. Green fields, bronze earth, and black fir forests alternate in rare disorder, touched here and there with the dazzling white walls of farmhouses, and threaded by a gleaming river and dusty winding roads. Behind and around me tower the Grampians. On the far horizon the Ochills sleep peacefully in the sun-mist. Down a cleft between the soft breasts of the mountains sweeps a heather-perfumed breeze. To the north lies a silver-surfaced loch, its sun-kissed bosom gleaming between ranks of guardian firs.

Well might I dream of freedom, of the grandeurs invariably correlated to liberty. Well might I allow my ideas to spread their wings and fly to that enchanted land so often visited by the poets. Well might I imagine men and women living in a state of bodily and mental purity far surpassing that ever pictured by the most imaginative religionist. But down in the lovely strath men and women and children are toiling for hard, close-fisted farmers, and living in dirty hovels that would disgrace a city slum; human beings whose bodies and brains are as coarse as the earth in which they labor, and from whose lives there comes no fruit so refined as the bread they eat. Slaves to their fifteen shillings and less per week, they have no thought of bodily freedom; and, chained from their infancy to worn-out creeds and customs, they cannot even dream of the liberty that is the light of the mind and the herald of bodily freedom.

Scattered here, there, and everywhere, are the tapering spires and square towers of their mental prisons, where, on their plain benches, they worship the God of their fathers, side by side with the men who would rather be in hell than live on the wages they give their brothers in the Lord.

Liberty! Hidden in the foliage of the glen behind the shoulder of the hill stands a little kirk, half o'ergrown with ivy; and hanging above the door of that house of God is an iron ring. Not so many years agone it was used to encircle the necks of malefactors. And the godly worshipers were wont to lift their pharasaic noses still more highly heavenwards as they passed their erring brother and entered the holy door.

The neck-ring hangs above the portal, rusted and a relic, and the wind coming whistling down the glen makes it clank, clank, clank against the wall, makes it tell its old tale of Christian punishment and imprisonment. People pass, shake their wise heads, and thank God we have advanced beyond those barbarous methods; but never a thought is there of those other rusty rings that encircle the brain, rings

* J. S. Mill, Three Essays on Religion, p. 36 (1904).

Digitized by Google

more lastingly secure, more corroded, more barbaric, than the ugly relic dangling above the kirk door. These rings never strike against the walls of custom with clanging sound. Rarely even do they move to and fro; for the winds of criticism have fallen low e'er they come this length, and the chains and rings, if rusty, are as strong as ever they were.

Liberty! Dreams of liberty! while the country is full of institutions that signify slavery; while the minds of men are content to grovel in the dirt; while hope, and happiness, and health are to be measured only in relationship to present customs; and while the ghouls of poverty and religion come stalking arm-in-arm from out every town, every countryside, to interrupt the peaceful dreams of a man who would be free.

The smoke-dimness has failed me this time. The dreams are lying far behind the realities. After all, it is on the plain, thistle-like facts of nature and life that our dreams are burst. We try to sing of beauties while our weary feet are deep in mud. We try to poetise over a mirage, forgetting that sincerity should be a realisable fact, not a vague ideal. We fleet upwards to the clouds, and try to forget we are drenched with moisture while we remember their distant loveliness. We orate on the glories of man, and try to hide the corner of our brain that whispers the "starved hind" is a man. We stroll through the long grass, and fling words of grandeur over the waving grass-heads, and we try to deceive ourselves we did not trample to death six newly hatched ducklings on our laughing way. We sing of being in the arms of Jesus, and try to forget there is a stair to wash to-morrow morning. We argue in favor of the fatherliness of God, and subscribe to funds for Christianising the heathen, trying to forget our Christian country makes a profit by making the heathen immoral.

We are hypocrites; and it might have been better if I hadn't taken out my pen and paper to write at all.

ROBERT MORELAND.

Acid Drops

A German soldier, very badly wounded, at Louvain, cried continually, "Oh, my poor little children, my poor little children!" That is what it comes to at last. After all the glory and the shouting, his wounds are tended by foreign hands, and the thought of death mixes with the true realities of life. "My poor little children!" What is to become of them without me!

We cut a picture out of the Daily Mirror. A great artist might make the theme immortal. A Belgian girl, with a firm resolute face, holds a little sister on her right arm and a sturdy little brother, trudging by her side, with her left hand. They are orphaned by this horrible war. She is mothering them. It is they three against the world now. You see by her face and the grip of the little ones that she will do her share of the family duty. And the sturdy little brother, planting a firm foot on his country's soil, looks as though he will remember her when his time comes to play the man. And there, O Kaiser of Germany, lies the real life of the world. Your part in the world is destruction: your activities all lead to death. Her part in the world is construction: her activities all lead to life. You destroy: she creates. You belong to the powers of desolation: she belongs to the life everlasting. Where you blight the world into a hell, the mother's heart—if only by proxy, as in this case—turns it once more into a heaven.

Friday, August 21, was the date of the solar eclipse. For that reason, no doubt, the clergy selected it for a special day of intercession on behalf of something or other for England—we don't know exactly what. No doubt it was an excellent stroke of business. The King and Queen were caught in the clergy's net, besides a crowd of the "classes" and some of the "masses." Anyhow, it was a good advertisement for the clergy. Even the Free Churches obtained their share of it; proving, of course, that their presence also is indispensable. We have not heard, however, that the intercession has had any effect upon the war except for the worse.

It seems next door to an impossibility for Christians to be straightforward where their religion is concerned. And the puritanic quality of English Christianity makes it essential for the Christian to bamboozle himself as a preliminary to bamboozling others. Thus, Rev. Principal Selbie says, "the spectacle of Christian nations fighting one another, and all calling upon the same God to help them, is one to make devils laugh and angels hide their faces." Why so? What is there unique in the situation? One would imagine that it was something new for Christian nations to fight one another. As a matter of fact, all the wars of any consequence for several centuries have been between Christian nations. The only thing to cause surprise in either heaven or hell would be if Christians ceased to fight amongst themselves.

"We must meet force with force," says the Christian Commonwealth. "To act upon the principle of non-resistance to evil, if it involved the disbanding of our Army, the dismantling of our Navy, and the beating of our swords into ploughshares, would mean simply that we are prepared to allow Germany to have her own way in Europe." So much for Christian teaching and Christian mysticism when it is brought face to face with facts. Jesus told his followers not to resist evil, to turn one cheek when the other is smitten. The Christian Commonwealth, full of the cant of love and brotherhood, says "we must meet force with force."

The Christian Commonwealth denies that the war proves Christianity to be a failure. What the war shows, it says, "is not that Christianity has failed, but that it has never been tried." Well, even that is failure. After eighteen hundred years preaching no one has ever tried Christianity. What becomes of its power and its triumphs? What of its immense influence on the world for good? We fancy the Christian Commonwealth has often enough dwelt upon these things. But if Christianity has never been tried, how could it have done anything at all? Poor Christian Commonwealth! One moment it is shouting out that Christianity is the greatest power in the world. The next it is bewailing that no one has ever tried it—not even the Christian Commonwealth itself.

How curiously Christians read history! It was the Christian faith, says the Dean of Christ Church, "that brought something like order" out of the chaos at the decline of the Old Roman Empire, "and it will be so again." What utter nonsense! Christianity was one of the factors that helped to bring about the chaos. And for many centuries the only trace of any genuine order was to be found where there lingered remnants of the old Roman administration. The only "order" that Christianity cared for or worked for was the establishment of a universal church, and that ambition, because it frustrated the development of civic and industrial and scientific life, involved the prolongation of social chaos. Christianity did not save Europe from social chaos, its establishment meant social chaos. And as to the Christian faith saving Europe again, we should imagine that kind of nonsense to be played out, even with intelligent Christians. The Kaiser, whatever else he may be, is at least a very sincere Christian. No one has ever doubted that.

That characteristically Christian perodical, the Daily Telegraph, recently published a war-poem by Mr. Rudyard Kipling in which the Virgin Mary is invoked, in addition to other members of the same august family. A cynic might use Hamlet's famous words to Mr. Kipling's muse, "Get thee to a nunnery."

Writing of the national attitude in time of war, T. P.'s Weekly says, "Britain will kneel—and stand." Our emotional contemporary does not explain how the two processes are to be done at the same time.

Mr. William Watson, in a poetic frenzy, has been paying sugary compliments to the Autocrat of all the Russias, even calling him "the patient, silent, storm-worn Tsar." The poet's knowledge of the purple East should have reminded him of Siberia, and of the handsome Cossacks with birds-nests in their whiskers.

That sober and restrained publication, the Evening News, heads an article, "Truth Unknown in Germany." That is the very place where the veracious lecturers of the Christian Evidence Society should be sent to.

The attempt to boycott German music shows to what lengths people are prepared to go when attacked with war fever. To play "Die Wacht am Rhein" at present to an English audience would be as provocative as to render "God Save Ireland" to a Primrose League Gathering, but Wagner, Schubert, and Schumann ought to soothe the savage breasts of tender-hearted Christians.

Digitized by Google

Hustling journalists, who have to write on any subject at a moment's notice, often do serious mischief by giving publicity to incorrect ideas. Last week a widely read paper had a headline, "British Association Drops Darwin." This referred to Professor Bateson's highly technical paper on "Heredity and Evolution," read before the British Association at Melbourne. Darwin settled the accuracy of the Mosaic cosmogony, and the halfpenny journalists will never reinstate it.

That sober minded and profound publicist, Mr. Hilaire Belloc, has suggested that the present military campaign is a "war of defence against Prussian Atheism." "Prussia," he adds, "is and has long been Atheist." This shows that Mr. Belloc does not read contemporary publications, for he might have heard that the Kaiser is on easy terms with Heaven.

Persons who imagine that education has permeated the masses of the people will be interested to learn that our troops did not march to war singing some time-honored national song, but went singing music-hall lyrics. Our soldiers poured through France singing "It's a long, long way to Tipperary." Quiet persons at places of worship in England sing such restrained verses as "There is a Fountain filled with Blood." How long, O Democracy?

The Daily Mail always out-Herods Herod, and it has, among other similar pleasantries, referred to the Kaiser as a "royal blasphemer." The simple fact is that the Kaiser is a very pious man, and the only "blasphemer" in his family was his illustrious ancestor, Frederick the Great. The Freethinkers are not conspicuous among the present European monarchs, and we are heartily glad of it.

Councillor A. J. Fells, Mayor of Bermondsey, received one of the formal telegrams from the Prince of Wales in connection with the National Relief Fund. He seems mighty proud of it, as if it were a personal compliment to himself, and has printed it on the back of a special appeal of his own for the poor of the Borough of Bermondsey. A copy of this appeal has been sent to us, who have no more to do with Bermondsey than we have to do with Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Glasgow, or Newcastle-on-Tyne.

The Independent Labor Party sends us a circular asking for subscriptions towards stopping the war, and issuing a million copies of a Socialist manifesto. That is the way of the English Socialists. They never can work with others for a common object without trying to gain predominance for their own special principles. And they are not even agreed amongst themselves. Socialist leaders and advocates like Robert Blatchford, G. B. Shaw, H. G. Wells, etc., etc., are praising up this very war as one of the best things that have ever happened for Socialism. What on earth are we to think of it? We had better keep our money and our common sense with it.

There is an ardent English poet who spells his name "Kaufman" and writes in Reynolds', who addresses Mother Britain and Her Sons. "Mother Britain" is not very elegant. It rather suggests a seaport replica of the lady who entertained the Jewish spies at Jericho. But it is just as elegant, perhaps, as "the bally Huns" that Kaufman and other sons of hers are going to teach a lesson in the present war. To the mind and ear of this poet there is an antithesis between "islands" and "highlands," and a dissyllable may be made of "hour." We congratulate Reynolds' on its dazzling discovery.

Poor Pope Sarto's death was not well-staged. The war had hold of public attention, and it was his enemy in more senses than one. It may be said to have killed him. The thought of all the men who would be slain, and the women and children who would be starved and tortured, filled him with horror. He tried his utmost to prevent the catastrophe, but he could make no impression on the pious old ruffian who sits upon the throne of Austria.

"Modernism" was Papa Sarto's chief bugbear. He condemned it very properly from his own point of view. His nature was an honest one, and he refused to play a game of half-and-half between truth and falsehood as he saw them.

The Czar's appeal to the Polish people, with its promise of Home Rule after the war, concluded with the hope that the "sign of the cross" would shine upon the country. The sign of the cross is already over all the countries engaged in the war, and, judging by results, it would be as well if in future some other sign were utilised. Judging by consequences none could be worse, and some might easily be better.

"I think it is beyond question," says Mr. R. J. Campbell, "that any man or woman in this congregation, if endued with omniscience and omnipotence, could have succeeded in producing a better and happier world than the one we live in. This is not at all an audacious thing to say; it is simply common sense." Of course it is common sense, but how long it takes religious people to say it—the majority never do say it. It is not merely that actual imperfections exist, but the "plan" of nature seems such that these imperfections are received without compensating advantages. It is not merely the Freethinker who says this. All decent human beings confess it in action. They do their best to correct the imperfections and injustices of nature—civilisation is little more than this. They are always doing what a king of Castile said he would have done had he been present at the creation—suggesting improvements to God Almighty. All reform, all invention, all attempts to check the operation of non-human forces, are, in their way, hints to the Deity that he might have arranged matters on a different plan.

Mr. Campbell states the position with laudable frankness; and, as usual, when this is done, he quite fails to meet it. He falls back upon a version of the old religious plea that God could not transcend the necessities of his own nature, and that we reap "spiritual fruits" from the process. The first surrenders the whole case to a scientific Atheism. If "God" stands for something that is not absolutely self-determining, but is bound to act along definite lines because of its inherent nature, then it does not matter what we call it; the case of the Atheist is, in substance, admitted. At most we have, in place of a universe, the movements of which are determined by the inherent properties of natural forces, a something called God, whose movements are determined by the inherent qualities of his nature. And the difference between the two positions is scarcely worth bothering about.

As to our reaping "spiritual fruits" from the cosmic process, that clearly offers no apology whatever for its cruelty or irrationality. Assuming that the outcome of the process is a better human being, that only benefits the survivor. The last term in the process benefits by all the preceding terms. But what of those who figured in the intermediate stages? Why should they have been used to benefit someone else, and at the same time denied the perfection that is the reward of a remote descendant? For it is not the individual who suffers that reaps the reward; it is someone who has not suffered. And if there be a God, the claims of each one on him are identical. Moreover, if there is a God, why could not the perfect man have been produced at once? None but a fool or a lunatic would go a long, roundabout way to secure a thing that could as well have been secured directly and at once. And if one failed to consider the hypnotic effect of familiar words, one would add that none but a knave would thank God for his own comparative perfection when it had been procured at the cost of the sufferings of millions of others.

Some one has been writing Dr. Lynan Abbott on the question of praying for rain. Dr. Abbott replies that he sees no reason to doubt the ability of God to send rain—which is not quite what his correspondent wanted to know. The question is one of fact. Does God send rain in answer to prayer, or not? A clear test would be to establish a praying centre, say in the Sahara, and pray for good, regular rain there. If it came there would be something to talk about. Then Dr. Abbott "hedges" a bit in this manner. "I can see no reason why I may not legitimately ask God for rain, provided that my request is accompanied with a sincere recognition of the truth that he knows better than I, and whether the request should be granted or not." Which being interpreted means—there is no harm in praying for rain so long as you do not expect an answer to your prayer. As if anyone could pray unless they really expected an answer. Besides, if God knows better than us whether there should be rain or not, why trouble to pray for it at all? Does Dr. Abbott mean that God may forget to send the rain unless we jog his memory a bit? On the whole, good storage resources and scientific irrigation seems the better program.

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £184 3s. 6d. Received since:—W. R. Munton, £2; Old School, Southbourne, 10s.; W. P. Mann (2nd sub.), 10s. 6d.; E. H. M. Grōm, 10s. 6d.; W. Dodd, 10s.
R. H. Side and Family, Walworth:—R. H. Side, £3; Erla D. Side, £2; Mrs. E. D. Side, £1; Miss B. M. Side, 10s.; Bertram Side, 10s.; Miss A. Harris, 2s. 6d. Mrs. L. Side and Family, £1 7s. 6d.—Total, £8 10s.

W. R. MUNTON.—Thanks for your good wishes with subscription. Mr. Foote's health continues to improve.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for useful cuttings.

W. J. FENN.—We cannot praise Peter de la Faille for committing suicide, although he was an Atheist and a virtuous and genial character; neither do we blame him; it was his own business, after due consideration of his obligation to others. As for his cursing the Kaiser as "the ferocious human viper of Germany"—many people say the same, with very slight verbal alteration, and are not denounced for it.

C. H. M. GRŌM (Victoria).—Money order to hand and apportioned as directed. Professor Johnson was an able man. He took a cup of tea with us once at our residence, where we had a long chat with him. But he did not succeed in making us more favorable to his theories. The forging of documents is not so difficult, but the forging of medals, monuments, etc., is quite a different matter.

R. H. SIDE.—We agree with most of what you say, only we can't discuss it in the Freethinker. We must keep to the Freethought side of human progress, of which you have always been such a generous supporter.

J. HECHT.—Thanks for the cutting. It is impossible to reckon up all the sad details of war. The world is turning the wrong way, and all sorts of awkward things must be expected.

E. C. COMATT.—The newspapers have themselves complained that secrecy was carried too far. General French was pictured in Paris. How is it he was not pictured landing in France or Belgium? The only answer is that it had to be kept "dark." The Daily News reckoned that the secret was known to some fifty thousand people in England. There is no need to tell how we knew it. The fact is admitted now.

W. DODD, subscribing again to the President's Honorarium Fund, writes: "I wish to remark that on August 14, 1910, this Fund exceeded £240." He wishes us "good health and better days." What our old friend says is true, but the £300 total was made up in 1912 and 1913 by December 31.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

War broke out after Mr. Foote had arranged a tentative lecture-list for the fall of the year. He is half-afraid, now, that most of these engagements will have to be cancelled. London halls won't allow any "reference" even to the war. We suspect a similar restriction at Birmingham—also at one or two others. A definite announcement for October, etc., must therefore be postponed, at least for a week.

We have had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Mangasarian in London, and we are glad to hear from his own lips how well his Association is doing in Chicago. The quality of his addresses may be judged by our own readers who have perused some of them that we have reprinted from time to time in the Freethinker. Mr. Mangasarian has had to stay in London longer than he intended, the continental portion of his holiday being cut away by the European war, in which everybody seems to be claiming a share, though only the soldiers and the victims seem able to get near it. Time and not very robust health have told a bit upon Mr. Mangasarian since we first met him at Rome, but his intellectual power has not abated, and his eyes are as light and bright as ever. Here, or elsewhere, we wish him all success.

Mr. Mangasarian talks of getting an assistant when he returns to America. We hope he will be able to do so. He will be a lucky man if he gets the right one. Democracy has its merits, but it has some disadvantages. There is truth in the old proverb about "Jack" being "as good as his master." So he is, in some things; but not where his master is a master.

It is said that Japan's ultimatum to Germany is couched in the very language of Germany's ultimatum to Japan in connection with the cession of Port Arthur. It appears to be tit for tat, one good turn deserves another, or Pagan imitation of Christian example. Another good title would be the biter bit.

Personal.

FOURTEEN years ago premises were being sought for the publication of the Freethinker. We were bandied about from pillar to post, but at last we found a place that would have suited us admirably. This, however, is what happened. I quote from my article in the paper at the time:—

> "Christian bigotry has once more been too many for us. I am sorry to say that we have, after all, lost the premises I spoke of last week. They were in a capital position, and very suitable for all our purposes. The lessor had no objection to our using them for our special business; the lease was ready, and, indeed, the keys were handed over to us; but we had to hand them back again, for at the last moment the Duke of Bedford's steward refused to sanction the lease being assigned to Mr. Hartmann, as he considered the contemplated business was 'an unsuitable one.' I may add that the leases on the Bedford estate are terribly stringent covenants, such as the law ought never to permit. They make the Duke's steward the absolute master of everything that goes on. All the legal right the tenants have is to pay rent and discharge other obligations. So the great ground-landlord's great man rules out Freethought from the whole area. It was maddening after all the trouble we had taken; and I beg all Freethinkers to note whether religious intolerance is really dead. To me it seems strong and active in many directions. There is a pretence of fair play, but when it comes to the 'sticking place' Freethought is still treated as a pariah."

We were luckier afterwards in finding a shelter. Then we were luckier still in finding the premises at 2 Newcastle-street, where we have been ever since, always paying our way, and never causing a complaint of any kind from anybody. Fortunately, the late Mr. Charles Chancellor accepted all the tenant-responsibilities for the first three years. That set us going.

We have to leave these convenient premises. We were their first occupant and we shall be their last. They are to be pulled down to make room for a big corner block. We cannot be pushed out till next March, but we don't want to wait till then if it can be helped. Nothing suitable is yet in view, and the one place that would have done was refused to us on the ground of our "abominable business." More of this hereafter.

Meanwhile, my thoughts are all for the paper. Some thirty London weeklies are gone or half-sunk already. Publishers and printers are groaning. Men are put on half-time. Papers that survive are diminished. I have made no change on the Freethinker. But I am thinking it over. I shall have to do something.

I say I at this point because all the responsibility rests with me. Things of that kind have a way of getting upon my shoulders. And as I am getting nothing out of the paper myself, I think I have a right to ask that the President's Honorarium Fund should be completed as soon as possible. The example of the Side family (see this week's list) might be promptly imitated.

Burdens come to him who has borne them. So I do not complain. Nor do I suggest that the Freethinker is going under. "I am here," is one guarantee of that. And we are not nearly as badly hit yet as I expected.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

The Radical Woman.—III.

A Public Address by M. M. Mangasarian, to the Free Religious Association (Rationalist), Chicago.

(Concluded from p. 541.)

BUT I said that it was the institution of marriage against which the radical woman directs her criticisms. In a publication which has been very highly recommended by a woman whom the police have helped to make notorious—Emma Goldman—we find the program of the radical woman, or the woman rebel, as she calls herself. A number of demands are announced, as it will be seen by the following from its pages:—

THE REBEL WOMEN CLAIM:

The right to be lazy.
The right to be an unmarried mother.
The right to destroy.
The right to create.
The right to love.
The right to live.

The same paper, with a boldness that is at least original, offers the following for an ideal to American women:—

A WOMAN'S DUTY:

To look the whole world in the face with a go-to-hell look in the eyes.

It also seems to be the purpose of this same publication, claiming to represent the rebel woman, to teach the gentle sex a new song—"The Song of the Bomb."

Moreover, according to the "Rebel Woman," the immigrant is the savior of the nation. It is the immigrant from south-eastern Europe, from Italy and the Balkan States, as well as from Russia and Germany, who is to introduce "courage, vision, and idealism" into our America. The Rebel Woman is going to break the world's machinery which enslaves woman "by sex conventions, by motherhood and its present necessary child-bearing, by wage slavery, by middle-class morality, etc." Revolution, not evolution, is the word "The Woman Rebel" has inscribed upon its banners. As it may be inferred from the program which I have just read to you, when Emma Goldman and her disciples have finally remoulded the world closer to their desires, they will confer upon woman the following new blessings:—

FIRST: The right to be lazy.

Well, who prevents her from being that now? Ah, but she must eat to live! Why does she not also claim the right not to eat, or the right to eat without working? What shall we think of women who look forward to the time when they shall enjoy the right to be lazy? What charms has indolence for them? Why is work distasteful to them? What are the pleasures of laziness? What is it productive of? Formerly the right to work was the universal cry, but evidently that right is not radical enough to please the rebels among women. Instead of the right to work they demand the right to be lazy!

SECOND: The right to be an unmarried mother.

But women have that right now. The law does not interfere in the relation of the sexes until there is a complaint, which generally comes from the deserted woman, with a child to provide for; and even then the State deals with her, as it should, very gently, and tries to find the other party to compel him to contribute to her support. In all civilised communities the law recognises what is known as "common law marriages." Besides, if a man and woman have been living together as man and wife without any ceremony or licence, or public announcement of the fact, and the man dies, the woman is protected in her claim for a share of his estate. What more could the radical or rebel woman ask for? A distinguished tragedienne, Sarah Bernhardt, though unmarried, is a mother and a grandmother. No one has interfered with her right to be an unmarried mother. The French Government recently conferred upon her the Legion of Honor. It is also true that when a distinguished publicist—Maxim Gorky—came to this country a few years ago, with a woman companion, while he had a wife in Russia, certain hotels in New York City refused them as guests; but then, if Mr. Gorky demands the right to do as he pleases, why has not the hotel-keeper the right to do as he pleases? Moreover, there are other hotels. "Oh, but the public should not discriminate against Gorky, or the unmarried mother; Society should respect the woman travelling with Gorky as much as it does his deserted wife." But why should the radical woman, with a "go-to-hell look in her eyes" bother herself about the respect of Society? With that sort of a look in her eyes, the radical woman should not care in the least what people say or think. In the meantime, the law allows you to do as you please with yourself, provided you allow others to protect themselves against you.

Really, the radical woman has no grounds for complaint as far as marriage is concerned. She is not compelled to marry; she need not marry except for love; she is free to marry for money if she wants to; and if she finds that she has made a bad choice after marriage, she is at liberty to secure a divorce and marry again. What more could the new radicalism secure for her? Besides, the State does all it can to compel the husband to support the wife even after they have ceased to live together. Indeed, I am proud of the protection which civilisation throws about a woman who becomes a wife or a mother, whether in or out of wedlock.

But the day on which free motherhood prevails, woman will be the great sufferer. She will become a mere plaything, the sport of the hour, to be picked up and cast aside according to the whim or the caprice of the hunter. Under "free love" woman will become a tramp. Why is woman willing to sacrifice the home for what she calls free motherhood? But is not marriage slavery? Of course it is. Duty spells slavery. I am a slave; you are slaves; the President of the country is a slave. Have you a child?—you are a slave! Have you a business?—obligations to meet, wages to pay—you are a slave! Have you ideals, scruples, a conscience?—you are a slave! If we cannot play fast and loose with duty, we are all slaves. But obedience to the will of civilisation is slavery only to those who prefer the wild to the city, the tavern to the home, the street to the school,—appetite to love.

THIRD: The right to destroy. What?

FOURTH: The right to create. Go ahead!

FIFTH: The right to love. That is tautology, because it is included in the right to be an unmarried mother.

SIXTH: The right to live. That also is repetitious, since the right to be lazy implies the right to live. Only those who are alive can enjoy the right to be lazy.

Association with women who demand the right to be lazy, etc., is bound to be degrading. Let me say that the most dangerous enemies of society are not the politicians, the trust-barons, or the popes, but the mediocre—the men and women of low mentality. There should be neither priest nor tyrant but for the masses who support them. On the other hand, the masses have been the worst persecutors of reformers. Indeed, the intellectually common people wither everything they lay their hands upon. Like locusts or grasshoppers, whatever field or crops they alight upon they destroy. The menace of the ordinary! No pest, plague, or panic can compare with this scourge. Let me explain myself:

There is a movement for a nation-wide prohibition of alcoholic beverages in this country. Why are we afraid of alcohol? What makes alcohol a menace? Why do we want legislation to suppress its manufacture and sale? Simply because the people of common mentality and morality—rich or poor—do not know how to partake of wine or beer without making sots of themselves. Yet this class is going to deprive the man who can restrain his appetite from the legitimate use of alcohol. The weaklings are going to deprive the temperate man from drinking when he wants to because they themselves need the police, the courts, the church, the whole nation, to help keep them sober. It was from similar motives that the publishers of Voltaire, Darwin, Thomas Paine, were persecuted and imprisoned. Because the mediocre could not read these books without committing moral shipwreck, the heretical books had to be consigned to the flames! This is the tremendous tax which mediocrity imposes upon civilisation! And the disorderly drinking-places, or the unscrupulous brewers or distillers who encourage drunkenness for personal profit—who speculate in the vices of men—do as much, if not even more, to help convert a free people into slaves, or a free country into a gaol, than the drunkards themselves.

Digitized by Google

Let me give you another illustration: Free speech is one of the greatest gifts of civilisation. But the people of low mentality, whose name is legion, make such use or abuse of this right that we are likely to have someone advocate a national prohibition of free speech. The market-place is always a menace to the study. The study brings to the street, let us say, a great truth; and the street forthwith becomes drunk on it. Then everyone denounces the philosopher for giving mental intoxicants to the people. "Stop it! Shut down the study! To the fagots with the philosopher!" becomes the universal cry. I am of the opinion that never a scientist would have been stoned to death, nor a pioneer burned at the stake, but for the fear that the herd would go astray or stampede if awakened from its sleep. And that is a real fear.

Let me give you still another illustration: The ancient Athenians and Romans possessed magnificent institutions and enjoyed great privileges, but when the barbarians took possession of these countries everything was lost. Everything the barbarian touched, died. The people of low mentality descended upon civilisation, and Europe became a wilderness. In the same way, everything the present-day barbarians touch they debase.

I was in Hyde Park, London, listening to a Freethinker. He made me blush at the manner in which he spoke of the Bible God, the Virgin Mary, the priests, the nuns, etc. Free speech to him meant freedom to be vulgar. Rationalism in the hands of a mental plebeian becomes an offence. We have heard of the search for the Philosopher's Stone, which shall transmute base metal into gold. Whether that quest will ever be rewarded with success I am not in a position to say, but the commonplace man has found a way of transmuting gold into base metal. When the Goldmanite declares that a woman's duty consists in looking "the whole world in the face with a go-to-hell look in the eyes," she thinks she is giving expression to a wonderfully original or clever idea. I am of a different opinion; I call it a piece of vulgarity. There are "Billy" Sundays in Rationalism as well as in orthodoxy, and the moment they lay hands on it they blight it.

There is published in this country an anti-Catholic paper by a Protestant. It is not necessary to mention the paper by name. The publication I have in mind has not a word to say against the absurdities of Protestant theology, or the efforts of the Calvinist clergy to fetter the human mind; but it pours a very volcano of weekly fire upon the abuses of the Catholic Church. I have little sympathy with one-sided propagandism. An inconsistent or an illogical position never fills me with enthusiasm. I am willing to admit that such publications are useful in many ways. It is their method, tone, and language that drags a worthy and noble cause to the level of a cat-and-dog fight. The moment Rationalism passes out of the hands of the sober into the hands of the "drunkards," it, too, will go to the gutter. The Catholics publish many papers which are equally abusive, vulgar, and even more untrustworthy than any publication against them, but if such publications have not honored that Church, how can similar efforts by liberals help the cause of progress? Why should a teacher of science stoop to use the language of a priest? Leave cursing to the men dressed in black! The sentence, "And he that believeth not shall be damned," is not proof of divinity but of a lack of refinement. Any cause that takes on the crowd, goes to the bottom. Is it not alarming? Let an idea descend and it dies. Going down is the way to the grave. When the sun sinks it is night. When the sun rises it is day. Civilisation is not a descent. It is an ascent. When politics descends it becomes corrupt; when religion descends it becomes a superstition. What is the cause of the distress of the Church to-day? The brains have left it. The plebeians—the mental inebriates—whether in furs and feathers or in rags, have swooped upon it. A similar invasion would prove fatal to the best of causes even. The Goths and the Visigoths that pulled the classical world to the dust would do the same to Rationalism.

And why has politics become corrupt? Because, as already suggested, the ordinary man dominates it. The yellow hosts have dislodged the elite and are now having things their own way. Every department of public life suffers and is lowered by this invasion. I have been watching some of the criminal trials in our courts. In his address to the jury, one of the assistant State attorneys used language, the other day, that clearly betrayed the barbarian in politics. If the defence had resorted to such tactics there would have been some excuse for it, since he was representing a murderer and an outlaw. But why should the people's representative the agent of civilisation, stoop when he thinks or speaks? The stoop is a surrenderer. Pointing to the man on trial, this mouthpiece of the people, this representative of the majesty and dignity of the law, cried, "He has the instinct of the beast!" and again, "He is two hundred pounds of worthlessness!" and once more, "He is a snake!" and, "Send him to the gallows, hang him, let him hang!" This is the style of the market-place, not of the study. Whatever the ordinary mind touches it degrades. Eloquence becomes coarseness, argument becomes abuse, and violence of language takes the place of forceful reasoning. Literature becomes gossip, business becomes a gamble, art degenerates into caricature, medicine into quackery, and science into charlatanism in the hands of the commonplace man or woman. This is also the revenge of mediocrity.

What is the explanation of this rebellion of church and crowd against reason? Human nature is the battle-ground between instinct and reason. Instinct is older than reason. Though a new comer, reason has slowly pushed instinct off its seat of authority. At one time instinct monopolised the man. It had no rivals. When instinct reigned man pursued his desires with the quickness of a flash and the blindness of an arrow. He did as his instincts prompted him. Deliberation, selection, restraint—a check or a curb upon desire, were not yet invented. There was as yet no government of the appetites. Then came reason with a bit for the passions. But do you think that instinct or the passions surrendered willingly to the new master? On the contrary, they rose up in arms; they rebelled; they conspired to overthrow reason; they clamored for their ancient licence; they coveted the wild life of the forest which reason had taken away from them. Even in our day the rebellion against reason breaks out, every now and then, in all its aforetime fury and rage. What is the meaning of the propaganda launched under such innocent-looking phrases as "Free Motherhood," "Sex Emancipation," "Marriage is Slavery," etc., but the rebellion of instinct against the check or curb or bit or—I shall say—the grip of reason upon the passions? That is why Henry Bergson's Creative Evolution, in which he supports the superiority of instinct to reason, is so popular. The capitalist, the labor unions, the rebel women, and the theologians welcome Bergson's gospel of Instinct. He is come to restore the fallen dynasty of Instinct. "Unhand us!" is the cry of his followers to Reason. In the same way, "Down with Reason!" cry the sentimentalists, the emotionalists, and the theologians. "Hearken to the call of the Wild!" urge the apostles of appetite. "Bring back to us the Past!" is the chorus in which all join. But high above the shriek of the rebels may be heard the brave and tuneful song of the disciplined soldiers of Progress: "Rule, Reason!" "Reason shall rule the world!"

Digitized by Google

Joseph Priestley.—II.

By G. W. Foote.

[Reprinted.]

(Continued from p. 541.)

On leaving Daventry, Priestley accepted the office of assistant minister to a congregation at Needham Market, Suffolk, at the miserable salary of forty pounds a year, on which he found himself by no means "passing rich," especially as it was never paid in full. In this retired situation the chief occupation of his leisure was the compiling of a multitude of Scripture texts antagonistic to the doctrine of the Atonement. The manuscript was confided to Dr. Lardner and Dr. Fleming, on the occasion of a journey to London, and portions of it were published by them under the title of the Doctrine of Remission. By this time Priestley had relinquished his belief in the plenary inspiration of the Scripture writers, and in the idea of supernatural influence except for the purpose of miracles.

On quitting Needham Market, in consequence of theological differences with Mr. Meadow's congregation, Priestley attempted to earn his bread as a teacher of mathematics, but the rancor of his religious enemies prevented his success. Pupils would not come to be taught even mathematics by a professor of questionable orthodoxy. The heretical poison might be conveyed even in doses of exact science. The unfortunate mathematician was, therefore, obliged to accept another engagement as preacher for one year to a congregation at Nantwich in Cheshire. There he remained no longer than the stipulated term, at the expiration of which he removed to Warrington, where he resided for a period of six years as a preacher and teacher. In the second year of his ministry at Warrington, he married a daughter of Mr. Isaac Wilkinson, an ironmaster of Wrexham, Wales. This union appears to have been productive of mutual happiness and comfort.

While residing at Warrington, Priestley composed his Essay on Government, a liberal and philosophical production, in which it is emphatically maintained that the end and sole duty of government is to promote the happiness of the governed. The spirit of the work is Republican enough and it is boldly asserted that peoples have an unquestionable right to depose evil rulers by revolutionary means if no others will avail; but the author considered a government by King, Lords, and Commons as most consonant with the traditions and prejudices of the English people. Not until his emigration to America was he convinced of the practicability, as well as of the advantages of Republican Government.

In the Autobiography he mentions that at that time he read a deal of polite literature, and practised the composition of verse himself, as well as enjoining it upon his pupils, as a great assistance to facility in the composition of prose. Also he mentions that the reading of some of his early verses induced Mrs. Barbauld to commence writing poetry, and thus, says he, "England is indebted to me for one of the best poets it can boast"; after which critical deliverance we may safely affirm that Priestley's mind was by no means of a poetical cast.

Priestley's scientific proclivities were already strongly pronounced. He had been experimenting more or less for some years, and had always contemplated science with the fondness of a lover. But it was not until meeting with Franklin, the great American philosopher and electrician, on the occasion of a visit to London, that his attachment to scientific pursuits was stimulated to an ardent devotion. Induced by Franklin, he soon after published his History of Electric Discovery. His experiments in electricity also procured for him an introduction to the Royal Society; and in addition to that honor, he had conferred upon him, through the generous interest of Dr. Percival, the degree of Doctor of Laws from the University of Edinburgh. In September, 1767, Priestley removed to Leeds, where he engaged himself as minister of Mill-hill Chapel. While resident there he commenced his famous experiments on air, and in 1772 he issued his first publication on the subject. His fame was by this time rapidly spreading in the scientific world; so much so, indeed, that a proposal was made for his accompanying Captain Cook on his second voyage; but the scheme was frustrated by the objections of some powerful clergymen, who had taken umbrage at the Doctor's boldly declared heresy.

After spending six years at Leeds, divided between professional avocations and scientific pursuits, Priestley accepted a generous offer from the Earl of Shelburne, afterwards Marquis of Lansdowne, of the post of Librarian to his Lordship, at a salary of £250 a year, with the promise of an allowance for life in case of his patron's decease. The duties of the situation were very trifling, and the Earl treated the Doctor more as a confidential friend than as a servant; allowing him also occasional gratuities for the purchase of costly instruments and appliances necessary to the finer practice of his chemical experiments. In the second year of his residence with the Earl he made his famous discovery of oxygen gas, which marks an era in the history of chemical science, and with which his name will be for ever associated. In 1774 he travelled with his patron through Flanders, Holland, and Germany. Naturally, he met and conversed with the chief scientific and philosophical celebrities of the various places through which he passed; and in other respects also the journey was advantageous, for his experience of mankind was thereby widened after a fashion which never can be wrought by any amount of mere reading. On returning to England he published his Miscellaneous Observations on Education, Lectures on Oratory and Criticism, and the third part of the Institutes of Natural and Revealed Religion, the two first parts of which had been published many years preceding. In the last work he maintained, with remarkable force and ingenuity, his doctrine of the immateriality of the soul, of which we shall have hereafter to speak at length. So bold a theory, running, as it did, directly counter to the orthodox teaching on the subject, excited much animosity among the "sound divines." The cry of "Atheist" was immediately raised, and lustily vociferated, until at length the poor Doctor, who deemed the existence of Deity capable of being substantiated by irrefragable arguments, found himself pretty generally regarded as a horrible heretic, who actually denied the being of God. Such a man, says Huxley, is ordinarily looked upon as a person with whom a cash-box is not quite safe; and, therefore, it is no matter for wonder that the Earl became desirous to part company with his overbold librarian. Shelburne agreed to grant Priestley an annuity of £150 a year, and the amount was always punctually paid. It was, however, inadequate to meet all the philosopher's requirements, for, in addition to his very costly experiments, there was the burden of a somewhat numerous family that had grown up around him. Offers of court pensions were made, but were honorably refused. Probably Priestley recollected what Johnson himself subsequently forgot, that a pensioner is "a slave of State." Nevertheless, he accepted private subscriptions from friends to science who desired a continuance of his chemical researches—in particular that of Wedgwood, always honorably distinguished for ready assistance to indigent genius, and whose generous and unsolicited aid to Coleridge and Wordsworth will long be remembered by all lovers and students of English poetry.

Priestley now settled at Birmingham, where he joined a Mr. Blyth as minister of a Unitarian congregation. Here he continued his scientific, philosophical, and religious labors, and published amongst other works his History of the Corruptions of Christianity, History of Early Opinions Concerning Jesus Christ, and Disquisitions on Matter and Spirit. He also became a member of the Lunar Club, so called because of its meetings being held near the full moon, which comprised most of the advanced thinkers of the district. At Birmingham he might have remained in quiet and comfort until his death if he had not, unfortunately for his personal peace, associated himself with a political club consisting mainly of Dissenters, who openly avowed their sympathy with the revolutionists in France. That great political and social convulsion had startled all Europe out of its apathy, and at the mighty roar which announced the advent of Democracy, reactionary and obscurantist powers stood abashed and terrified, while the reformers took further heart of grace and prognosticated great results from the revolutionary movement. Party passion ran high; and every man was compelled to take a side. One party prophesied a coming millennium, and the other foretold the approach of final chaos. Both parties erred, but the latter the more egregiously. Some men of sterling character and splendid ability, blinded by passion and prejudice, ranged themselves on the side of despotism and retrogression, and loudly denied that men had even any rights at all; and their feelings were the more exasperated by the exuberant, triumphant audacity with which their opponents pointed out the tyrannical slough into which their foolish arguments would inevitably precipitate them, if logically followed. Even the glorious genius of Burke quailed before the misapprehended apparition of democracy. All his magnificent powers of eloquence and matchless invective were employed to assail the revolution, and to heap reproach and contempt on its human instruments. So carried away was he by a tempest of passion that he degraded himself to the use of expressions concerning Priestley worthy of a political lampooner. He even called upon the Government to crush the rising spirit of rebellious liberty, not knowing that material agencies of persecution were as unavailing against it as the harmless weapons of midnight sentinels against the majesty of buried Denmark.

Digitized by Google

In Parliament, and outside it, everybody was in a state of unprecedented excitement. The masses of the people, ignorant and superstitious, were artfully stirred up against the English sympathisers with French Republicanism; and Church and State mobs in all towns were prepared, whenever called upon, to vindicate the outraged honor of their glorious constitution, which apparently they regarded, like Cæsar did the honor of his wife, as mortally injured even by suspicion. At Birmingham, political passion knew no bounds; the turbulent populace was prepared for any measures, and the responsible guardians of law and order were by no means reluctant to urge it on to deeds of violence. The political club already alluded to, held a meeting on the 14th of July, 1791, to celebrate the anniversary of the capture and destruction of the Bastile. This insult to the British constitution was too much for the patience of the insurgent mob and its secret impellers. Priestley was not at the meeting, but most of those who were present were Dissenters, and so was Priestley himself. The poor philosopher was conspicuous, and discrimination was not easy. The mob, therefore, politely burned his meeting-house wherein he preached and his dwelling house, as a sign of its disapprobation, and would have served him with the same sauce if he had not prudently made himself scarce. The merry rioters smashed his experimental apparatus, and burned his library and all his manuscript records; and with indescribable glee ground sparks of fire out of the victim's own electric machine to assist in the work of demolition. The houses of many of Priestley's friends were burned or greatly damaged. Nearly all whose property was so served were Dissenters, and Priestley asserts that the clergy of the Established Church instigated the riot and directed its operations. The injured philosopher brought an action against the authorities for damages, alleging that they had neglected to suppress the riot. Fortunately, he obtained a favorable verdict, but he received £2,000 less than his claim, the jury refusing to admit the value of his apparatus and manuscripts.

Birmingham was, of course, no longer a safe residence, and Priestley therefore repaired to London. The members of the Royal Society shamefully gave him the cold shoulder, and assiduously shunned his company; but the congregation of Dr. Price, at Hackney, requested him to become their minister, and he gladly accepted the invitation. Many of his friends gathered around him at this crisis, and tendered pecuniary assistance, in particular, his brother-in-law, John Wilkinson who presented him with £500, and transferred to him £10,000 invested in the French Funds, which, however, never brought in a penny. From France numerous flattering messages were received; some ardent cosmopolites even desired him to become a candidate for membership in the Convention. This offer he declined, but his son visited France, and was not only well received, but was also invested with the rights of French citizenship. In England, however, Priestley and his family dwelt in insecurity. Threatening letters poured in from all quarters, some merely promising damnation in the life to come, but others more than insinuating the possibility of more terrible an certain chastisement in this. Frequently he was burnt in effigy along with Paine, whose political writings he publicly and emphatically approved, although he utterly dissented from his opinions on other subjects. His son was obliged to dissolve partnership with a Manchester merchant by the pressure of religious prejudice. At last, reluctantly and sorrowfully, the persecuted philosopher resolved to quit his native land, which no longer afforded him a safe shelter. On April 8, 1794, he set sail from London, bidding dear old England a long, last adieu, and on June 4, arrived at New York.

Priestley's reception in the newly adopted land was of the most flattering character, and atoned largely for the insults and reproach cast against him in the country he had forsaken. The nobilities of the day flocked around him, and testified their admiration of his manly independence. The trustees of the Philadelphia University elected him as Professor of Chemistry; and many additional honors would have been showered upon him if he had not declared his intention not to accept them. Only one powerful voice was raised against him—the voice of William Cobbett. The sturdy English spirit of Cobbett naturally inclined him to take his country's side. He was then, as he afterwards confessed, "a mere prattler in politics"; but his anger and combativeness were both aroused by the abundant censure pronounced against England by the American Democrats. Cobbett delighted in a single-handed fight against a host of foes, and therefore was in his element. The men around him were Americans and Republicans, he was an Englishman and a Monarchist. There was no timidity in his composition; he ever loved to tweak his enemy by the nose and pluck at his very beard. Peter Porcupine he called himself, and, like a porcupine, he stood self-collected, with a quill for every comer. He was on the wrong side, and in a woeful minority; but he was a master of style matchless in its vigor and directness. Before his tremendous blows the Democrats reeled, and as they fell he shot them through and through with the arrows of his malicious wit. Priestley and his Appeal fared badly at Cobbett's hands; his grammar, his composition, his logic, were all mercilessly criticised The Doctor might be an angel of light, but he was no match for the polemical vigor of his assailant. Priestley was right, and Cobbett utterly wrong; but nobody with a sense of humor or with a touch of gusto in his composition, can fail to relish the ex-soldier's racy wit and potent mother-English.

(To be continued.)

The Ramsey Testimonial.

(FIFTH LIST OF SUBSCRIPTIONS.)

[The first six subscriptions in this list were the last six in the previous list. This bears out our former complaint. —ED.]

W. H. Harrap, 2s. 6d.; Paddington Radical Club Political Council, 10s. 6d.; W. McMillan, 2s.; A Few Friends (per A. J. Barnes), 3s.; H. Ridgway, £1; Mrs. Annie Besant, £2 2s.; Mrs. H. Parsons, 2s. 6d.

B. T. HALL (Treasurer), Club Union Buildings, Clerkenwell-road, London, E.C.

"You were chums on earth, were you not?" queried Satan. "Yes," replied the two newly arrived shades. "Good. You may continue to smoke together." His Majesty chuckled softly as he closed the door of Oven 2,145,783,164 with a bang.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

OUTDOOR.

BETHNAL GREEN BRANCH N. S. S. (Victoria Park, near the Bandstand): 3.15 and 6.15, C. Cohen, Lectures.

CAMBERWELL BRANCH N. S. S. (Brockwell Park): 6, Mr. Davidson, a Lecture.

EDMONTON BRANCH N. S. S. (Edmonton Green): 7.30, a Lecture. Derby-road, Ponders End (opposite "Two Brewers"): Wednesday, Sept. 2, at 8.30, a Lecture.

KINGSLAND BRANCH N. S. S. (corner of Ridley-road): 11.30, M. Hope, "Christian Cant"; 7.30, Miss Kough, "The God of Battles."

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Finsbury Park): 11.30, Miss Kough, "The God of Battles." Parliament Hill: 3.30, Mr. Schaller, a Lecture. Regent's Park (near the Fountain): 3.30, Mr. Davidson, a Lecture.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, Mr. Finch, "Christ, Capitalism, and Cant."

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6¼ ins. by 8¾ ins. by 4¼ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 19 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LETTERS OF A CHINAMAN ON THE MISCHIEF OF MISSIONARIES. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

PAIN AND PROVIDENCE. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies, 4d (parcel post).

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the Progress Press, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 36 SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

I will be as harsh as Truth and as uncompromising as Justice.—WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON.

Theology, Genesis, and Science.

MINISTERS of religion tell us that "it is becoming every day more difficult to accept all the stories in Genesis as literally true." Addressing the Students' Christian Union at the Melbourne University, Dean Stephen, Bishop elect of Tasmania, said that "most students believe that in Genesis there are mythical and legendary elements." A myth is defined as a story told to explain a fact or a belief. For example, the fact of the succession of the seasons is explained by the story of Persephone, and the fact of likeness and sympathy between man and woman by the story of the creation Eve out of Adam's rib. As explanations of facts we find myths in Greece, Chaldæa, Egypt, and India, as well as in Palestine. The Genesis stories of creation, of the tree of life, of the fall of man, and of the flood, have parallels in other literature, especially in that of Chaldæa; but Christian divines maintain that there are great differences between them. They assure us that the non-Biblical myths are very numerous, always polytheistic, and sometimes immoral, while the Hebrew myths are few in number, always monotheistic and moral in tone. The former ascribe low and degrading actions to the deities, while the latter attribute high and noble deeds to Jehovah. The Dean said:—

> "At first the early Hebrew records seem to be like all others. Study shows them to be unique. The cause of this difference is what we call inspiration. God taught a few individuals higher truth than their neighbors, awakened their religious consciousness, and enabled them to judge current mythology and tradition, and after judgment to retain only such elements as were compatible with morality and religion. Hence, through inspiration the Jews alone were not hampered with a vast mass of myths which taught false morality and false ideas about God. The few which remained became the vehicles of Divine truth."

Greater nonsense never dropped from human lips. There is not a word of truth in that extract. Does Dean Stephen really believe that the Biblical account of the flood shows God in a favorable light? Does it represent him as the possessor of a highly moral character? Does the reverend gentleman regard the Book of Joshua as a vehicle of glorious truths about Jehovah?

Now, as the Dean frankly admits, the story of creation and man's fall, found in Genesis, is neither science nor history, but a mere myth. Archbishop Lowther Clarke, of Melbourne, recently preached three sermons on "Genesis and Evolution," long reports of which appeared in the Age. His Grace is in substantial agreement with the Dean, describing the first chapter of Genesis as being "neither a scientific treatise nor an historical record, but as partaking of the nature of a parable, or vision, or allegory." The curious thing is, that the Archbishop adopts those conclusions of science which do not clash with his own theology, but ruthlessly rejects those that do. He believes in the evolution of all animals below man. He speaks of the vast periods of time "during which there lived and died successions of animals which played their part on the surface of the earth." He says that it is "quite impossible to give even an approximate estimate of the length of time required for these creations to develop and decay"; but he holds the old doctrine that when man appeared "he was created in the image of God, with a mind capable of understanding the thoughts of God, and with a power of speech which enabled him to convey his thoughts to his fellow men." He is reported to have spoken thus:—

> "Evolution was manifestly a method of Divine working, but the application of it to the onward progress of man through lower ape-like forms to his present condition was now shown to be false. In the fossil remains there was no sign anywhere of an ape-man or a man-ape. There were all possible graduations of men from the lowest to the highest limits, but there was not a trace of an intermediate stage through which the ape was passing into man. We could, therefore, without any opposition from modern science, declare our belief in the ennobling statement of Genesis i.: 'God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them, and God blessed them.'"

By whom has the evolution of man through lower forms been shown to be false? The Archbishop gives no authority for his erroneous statement, and we boldly charge him with a deliberate misrepresentation of the teaching of modern science as to man's origin. Has he never heard of the fully attested fact that when the blood of a man is transfused into a chimpanzee there is an harmonious mingling of the two? Man's organism and the chimpanzee's are very closely related. For the evolution of man, then, we have the direct, experimental evidence of blood relationship. This evidence has been brought forward in the most complete and literal sense by such scientists as Friedenthal, Uhlenhuth, and Nuttall. Has his Grace the audacity to deny it? He has a perfect right to prefer Genesis to science, but he has not the shadow of a right to mislead his Australian hearers and readers about modern science.

Let us examine the Archbishop's doctrine of man a little more closely. As reported, he says:—

> "The purport of the whole was to declare that when God created man with a living soul he made him for himself. Duties were assigned to man. He was shown the grandeur of work.....But all this was conditioned by obedience. Certain things we might freely do, while other things were as surely forbidden, because they led to death."

That may be good theology, but not a single fact can be adduced in support of it. The most reverend gentleman deals alone in dogmas, not at all in facts. For example, he seems to believe that man is totally differentiated from all other animals by his possession of a "living soul," but every scholar is aware that in Hebrew psychology "soul" is the common possession of both animals and man. Surely his Grace is not ignorant of the fact that Gen. i. 20, should read thus: "And God said, Let the waters swarm with swarming things [even] living souls." The Hebrew word for "soul" is néphesh. Even the beings that swarm in the ocean are called "living souls" in the first chapter of Genesis; and Canon Driver admits, in his excellent Commentary, that "no pre-eminence of man is declared in these words, 'And man became a living soul'" (Gen. ii. 7).

Digitized by Google

Again, his Grace quotes the words, "And they were both naked, the man and his wife, and were not ashamed," and adds the comment that "clothing marked man's attempt to hide his shame;" but this is an utterly unscientific and false account of the beginning of the wearing of clothes. His Grace is not entirely blind to the falseness of his statement, for he adds, "That did not wholly account for its use, which was determined largely by climate." Of course, Archbishop Clarke believes in the Fall, for otherwise he would have no Gospel to preach, and his profession would be an absurdity. And yet his explanation of the "initial catastrophe" is absurdly vague. This is how the Age for July 6 puts it:—

> "Dr. Clarke invited his hearers to regard the story of the Fall not as an isolated historical fact, but as a perpetually recurring illustration of all human experience.....When man was innocent, he rejoiced in God's presence. When he had sinned against God, he tried to hide himself from his presence."

In reality, that is a flat denial of the old doctrine of the Fall as taught by Paul and Augustine, and as expressed in all the great creeds. The Most Rev. Dr. Clarke preaches what he does not really believe himself, and explains away the fundamental tenets of the Christian Faith. He does not believe that the human race was ever in Paradise in a state of perfect happiness. Listen to this:—

> "What did just and true criticism say to this story? It asserted that man's course had been one of painful upward struggle, that he had never known a state of happiness, though through the ages he had been striving after it. All this was true, and the story gave the reason. It did not assert that races of men lived in Paradise, but in describing the ideal life for which God made man, it related the causes of his fall and spoke unmistakably of the painful upward struggle to which his sin had condemned him."

Most assuredly that is not honest exegesis. That is the scientific version of the struggle for life, in which the strongest survive. It is not the teaching of Genesis. It is not sin that condemns us to this struggle, but our very nature which we share with all the animals. The struggle is universal, and survival is the reward of strength and skill.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Christian Kaiser.

THE other day the Daily Telegraph, which is in its way a very Christian newspaper, reprinted the report of a conversation held in 1910 with the German Emperor. In this conversation the Emperor is reported to have said:—

> "I often read the Bible. I like to read it every night. A Bible lies on a table at my bedside. I find the most beautiful thoughts expressed in it. I cannot understand how it is that so many persons pay so little attention to the Holy Scriptures. Can anyone read the Gospels and other portions of the Bible without feeling convinced that the words contain a simple truth established in unquestionable facts? Whenever I have to make any decision I ask myself what the Bible would teach me to do in that particular case. The Bible is to me the fountain from which I draw light and strength. In hours of sorrow and depression I seek consolation therein. I am convinced that many who have neglected religion will regain definite religious belief in our time, and will feel the need of communion with the Almighty. Periods of dangerous doubt have always produced in their wake periods of enthusiastic religious feeling. I cannot understand how life can be lived without real communion with the Almighty."

In the present condition of affairs one may venture to suggest to the Daily Telegraph that it does Christianity a decided ill-service in publishing the above. The best thing would have been to have kept this conversation buried in its columns. For while everyone knows Kaiser Wilhelm to be a very Christian man, Christians in this country are not likely to emphasise the fact. So long as he was the villain of the piece, the proper and customary Christian course would have been to refer to his conduct as Atheistical, to say that his mind is governed by secularistic or materialistic ideals, and to point to him as a glaring example of the evil that results when a man loses his hold on the principles of the Christian faith.

As it is, the Christianity of the Kaiser is self-confessed. It is open, even aggressive. It is unmarred by doubts, undiluted by any hesitancy as to the value of the Bible. And, if I remember rightly, at the time when this conversation was first published it was widely reprinted in the religious press for the encouragement of the pious, and the confounding of unbelievers. The Kaiser was a Christian, he believed in the Bible, he could not realise anyone getting on without it. It encouraged him by day; it comforted him at night. Nothing could be more satisfactory. Christianity has long been living on testimonials: here was one of the first value. It had received testimonials from all sorts of people, it had sent round circulars inviting them, and had afterwards published them in book form—just as though the Churches were running a patent medicine, or a new brand of soap. Here was one from a real live Emperor. It was, naturally, made the most of. I wonder how they relish its reproduction now?

Perhaps the Daily Telegraph in reprinting this had some notion that it would show up the Kaiser as an arch-hypocrite. In all probability a great many Christians will so regard it. But it really proves nothing of the kind. I do not see there is any reason to doubt that the Kaiser really meant every word he said. There is a childlike simplicity in the question, "Can anyone read the Gospels and other portions of the Bible without feeling convinced that the words contain a simple truth established in unquestionable facts?" that at any other time would appeal most powerfully to the British Christian. Such childlike faith could only go, they would argue, with a nature that is little short of saintliness. There is nothing hypocritical about this confession of faith. The Kaiser is a Christian. There is no doubt of that. Of course, it is a little awkward for our Christians for him to come out in that character just as he is being depicted as a monster of duplicity, and his Christian soldiers are charged with breaking all rules of what are facetiously called "civilised warfare." But that cannot be helped. His Christian character remains.

It will be observed that the Kaiser's rule of life is that recommended by many preachers. "Whenever I have to make any decision I ask myself what the Bible would teach me to do in that particular case." Precisely so. That is the rule all good Christians profess to go by. That is the rule they always have gone by. When the Churches taught the divine right of kings they found it in the Bible. When other Christians found it advisable to behead one king and drive out another, they found it in the Bible. When Christians wanted to prove the earth was flat, they found the proof in the Bible. When they wanted to burn heretics or witches, they found justification in the Bible. When the slave owner of America wanted sanction for purchasing human flesh and blood, he found it in the Bible. And if the Kaiser's troops want justification for smiting their civilian enemies hip and thigh, they can find that in the Bible. The great beauty of the Bible is that you can always find it in the Bible. It doesn't matter what it is, it is there. If you want peace you can read yards about love and turning swords into ploughshares. And if you want war you need only turn the pages to find both precept and practice to your taste. A wonderful book is the Bible! It is the poor man's comfort, and the Kaiser's guide and councillor. Without it the Kaiser would be lost. With it he is—any of the Christian papers of this country will supply a description.

"The Bible," says the Kaiser, "is to me the fountain from which I draw light and strength." Really, a "War Lord" could ask for no better guide. Consider the following:—

> "And when the Lord thy God hath delivered it [i.e., the city] into thine hands, thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword. But the women, and the little ones, and the cattle, and all that is in the city, even all the spoil thereof, thou shalt take unto thyself; and thou shalt eat the spoil of thine enemies which the Lord thy God hath given thee..... Of the cities of these people which the Lord thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth."

Digitized by Google

Or these:—

"I will make my arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh."

"The Lord thy God shall deliver them unto thee, and shall destroy them with a mighty destruction until they be destroyed."

"And He shall deliver their kings into thine hand, and thou shalt destroy their name from under heaven; then shall no man be able to stand before thee, until thou have destroyed them."

"If I whet my glittering sword, and mine hand take hold on judgment; I will render vengeance on mine enemies, and will reward them that hate me."

Where could the invader of Belgium find a more comforting guide than in these passages? It is quite true that these injunctions have not been literally carried out. Everything breathing has not been killed, and the names of the Kaiser's enemies have not been blotted out. Still, something has been done, and, after all, one can very rarely live up to one's ideal. It is enough to aim at the stars, even though one never hits them.

When the German detachment was sent to Pekin, some fourteen years ago, the good Christain Kaiser advised his troops:—

"When you meet the foe you will defeat him. No quarter will be given, no prisoners will be taken. Let all who fall into your hands be at your mercy."

That is certainly a little nearer the Biblical note, and at the time it was uttered it was charitably—and perhaps properly—attributed to excess of Christian feeling. The prayer now ordered by the Kaiser to be said in all public services shows the same commendable piety:—

"Almighty and Merciful God, lead us to victory, and give us grace that we may show ourselves to be Christians towards our enemies as well."

One could expect nothing less from a ruler who "cannot understand how life can be lived without real communion with the Almighty." He feels that at every step of the way he has the Deity on his side. He is carrying out the Deity's wishes. Of course, his enemies have the same conviction, but that is a phenomenon that never disturbs the genuine Christian. The Kaiser is behaving as a Christian. That is, he is acting as Christians have always acted. No good Christian would do anything of which he believed the Lord would disapprove. But, on the other hand, every good Christian believes the Lord will approve anything he does. The Kaiser is no more than an illustration of a very common phenomenon. It was one of his own countrymen who said that the Bible was a nose of wax. By that he meant that it could be pulled this way or that so as to fit any countenance. It pleases the Godly to find all kinds of people expressing their admiration of, and their obligation to, the Bible. But the ungodly may well inquire the value of a book and a religion that can sanction at one and the same time a Torquemada and a John Howard, or can give the same degree of encouragement to rival armies busily engaged in trying to wipe each other out of existence.

The Kaiser is much better as a pietist than as a philosopher. As a pietist he is beyond reproach. As a philosopher he is really not of much account. He is convinced that many who have neglected religion will regain definite religious belief in our time, and will feel the need of "communion with the Almighty." Of course, some may; but it is far more certain that a much larger number will altogether lose their religious belief. A world-movement is not easily or lightly reversed, and the movement away from religion is not in the nature of individual outbreaks here and there, nor is it confined to any special nation or race. It is co-extensive with civilisation, and is, indeed, part of civilisation. It is, of course, conceivable that Europe might return to the Stone Age; but it is not very probable. And it is equally improbable that when large numbers of men and women have outgrown religion, they will ever so far degenerate as to revert to it. Mankind may be prevented acquiring knowledge, but once it is acquired nothing can rob them of it. It is theirs. It becomes part of their mental being; it shows its influence in all their thoughts and actions. In spite of "mailed fists" and pious "War Lords," in spite of barbaric warfare and outbursts of primitive superstition, the progress of humanity is, on the whole, towards the light. That progress may be diverted for a time, it may be stayed for a time, but it continues.

C. COHEN.

The Origin of Supernatural Ideas.—VII.

(Continued from p. 550.)

"Up to a recent time the sturdiest sceptics as to the truth of revelation were mostly deists or pantheists, and often repudiated atheism with warmth.....Now, the conception of God is freely treated by many of the leaders of philosophical and scientific opinion as a transitory phase of thought, which the growth of knowledge has finally terminated. The natural history and evolution of the idea of God is traced in calm outline from its cradle to its grave—from its nascent form in Animism to its metaphysical presentation as an inscrutable First Cause, the absolute, unconditioned, and unrelated to the phenomenal world. The idea of God has been 'defecated to a pure transparency,' as one eminent writer phrases it; it has been 'denthropomorphised,' to use the language of another. A new and widely-current word (Agnostic) has been invented to designate the large class of persons (mostly of exceptional knowledge and ability) who refuse to entertain any more the idea of a single divine Being, maker of all things in heaven and earth."—JAMES COTTER MORISON, The Service of Man, pp. 31-32.

"The dim and shadowy outlines of the superhuman deity fade slowly away from before us; and as the mist of his presence floats aside we perceive with greater and greater clearness the shape of a yet grander and nobler figure—of Him who made all Gods and shall unmake them. From the dim dawn of history, and from the inmost depth of every soul, the face of our father Man looks out upon us with the fire of eternal youth in his eyes, and says, 'Before Jehovah was, I am!'"—PROFESSOR CLIFFORD, Lectures and Essays, p. 386.

HAVING arrived at the idea of a ghost or spirit, the next step to the conception of a God or gods was comparatively easy. For, as everything in this world occupied a similar position in the world of spirits—the hunter continuing to be a hunter and the chief a chief—so the spirit of a renowned warrior chief, renowned for his strength, bloodthirstiness, and cruelty, would receive more sacrifices and be remembered longer than the spirit of an ordinary man. "The supposed Gods of the Guiana Indians Im Thurn describes as really but the remembered dead of each tribe, and where there is mention of one great spirit or god, it is merely the chief traditional founder of the tribe."*

And as spirits are always evil and malignant, to the savage, so he would sacrifice his dearest possessions—his finest cattle or his first-born child—to gain the favor or placate the anger of the departed spirit of the ferocious chief. In this way, mainly, arose the machinery of ritual, sacrifice, prayer, and praise; which, in the first instance, was nothing but the tribute of weakness and fear to a malignant power. Even after primitive man has arrived at the idea of good spirits, he pays little or no attention to them. Ratzel says that in Java the evil spirits "get the best offerings, even the harvest thankoffering serves to propitiate evil spirits."† Sir Richard Burton observes that the Mpongue, of South Africa, believe in a good God and a bad God; for the bad God:—

"They have not only fear of, but also a higher respect for, him than for the giver of good, so difficult is it for the child-man's mind to connect the ideas of benignity and power. He would harm if he could, ergo so would his God."‡

* J. H. King, The Supernatural, vol. i., p. 247.
† Ratzel, History of Mankind, vol. i., p. 473.
‡ Burton, Two Trips to Gorilla Land and the Cataracts of the Congo, vol. i., p. 99.

Digitized by Google

As Dr. Reville remarks:—

> "The gods of savages are necessarily savage gods. They have, for the most part, frightful forms; just as their worshipers think it proper to make themselves look hideous when they go to battle, or even when they adorn themselves. The odd, the grotesque, is to them the beautiful; whatever is uncommon is mysterious; and the unknown is terrible. The poet must pardon us if we assert that the religion of people of this category is simply the adoration of genii or demons of bad repute. When passing from savage people who live solely by hunting and fishing, we come to pastoral and, especially, to agricultural races, this adoration of evil deities is no longer so exclusive. Still, even among these the worship of the terrible gods predominates. Take by way of illustration the simple prayer of the Madagascans, who acknowledge, among many other, two creating divinities—Zambor, the author of good things; Nyang, of evil things. 'O, Zambor! To thee we offer no prayers. The good god needs no asking. But we must pray to Nyang. Nyang must be appeased. O, Nyang, bad and strong spirit, let not the thunder roar over our heads!.....' It would be easy to multiply the facts which show that the large place fear has in their piety, compared with veneration or love, is a characteristic feature of the religion of primitive peoples."*

Moreover the progress of religion follows the progress of society; it does not, as the pious believe, precede it. To the savage, God is only a bigger and stronger man. Palgrave, the traveller, shows that the only possible idea of God formed by the wild Bedouins of the desert was that of an Arab chief, and to his question, "What will you do coming into God's presence after so graceless a life?" replied, "What will we do? Why, we will go up to God and salute him; and if he proves hospitable, gives us meat and tobacco, we will stay with him; if otherwise, we will mount our horses and ride off." Mr. King, who cites the foregoing, observes:—

> "No man can ever conceive the nature of a god other than by the symbols of power present to his soul in the world about him, and in his own social institutions." [Also] "In all cases, if we analyse the sentiments a man's god expresses, we may demonstrate the conditions which have surrounded a man or which have formed the elements of thought out of which he has embodied his divinity."†

And again:—

> "Generally among the lower races of men when chieftain rule was established, chieftain gods were created. In no case was the concept of universal rule ascribed to a deity before the people were elevated to that sentiment by the human rule of a king of kings."

He also points out that the great native races of North America had no idea of a Supreme Being when first discovered by Europeans; they were governed by chiefs and knew nothing of regal pomp:—

> "Yet from contact with the white races their descendants became acquainted with the ethical aspects of the word royal, with Spanish kingly powers, the rule of King George, and, after that, of the great father at Washington. Through their knowledge of these regal powers they came into the habit, like the white men, of speaking of the supernal power as the Great Spirit."‡

Man, while regarding himself as a free agent, has in reality been fashioned and controlled by infrangible natural laws. For instance, why should the Australian aborigines spend a large part of their lives in a round of painful and tedious magical practices to influence nature, while such practices are practically unknown to the savages of Brazil? The answer is, that they live in a totally different environment. As Professor Frazer points out:—

> "Where nature is bounteous and her course is uniform or varies but little from year's end to year's end, man will neither need nor desire to alter it by magic or otherwise to suit his convenience, in order to obtain what he has not got; if he already possesses all he wants why should he exert himself? It is in times of need and distress rather than of abundance and prosperity that man betakes himself to the practice both of magic and religion. Hence, in some tropical regions of eternal summer, where moisture, warmth, and sunshine never fail, where the trees are always green and fruits always hang from the boughs, where the waters perpetually swarm with fish and the forests teem with an exuberance of animal life, ceremonies for the making of rain and sunshine and for the multiplication of edible beasts and plants are for the most part absent or inconspicuous. For example, we hear little or nothing of them, so far as I remember, among the Indians of the luxuriant forests of Brazil. Far otherwise is it with countries where a brief summer alternates with a chilly spring, a fickle autumn, and a long and rigorous winter. Here, of necessity, man is put to all his shifts to snatch from a churlish nature boons that are at once evanescent and precarious. Here, accordingly, that branch of magic which aims at procuring the necessaries of life may be expected to flourish most. To put it generally, the practice of magic for the control of nature will be found, on the whole, to increase with the variability and to decrease with the uniformity of the course of nature throughout the year. Nowhere, apparently, in the world are alternations of the seasons so sudden and the contrasts between them so violent; nowhere, accordingly, is the seeming success of magic more conspicuous than in the deserts of Central Australia. The wonderful change which passes over the face of nature after the first rains of the season has been compared even by European observers to the effect of magic; what marvel, then, that the savage should mistake it for such in very truth?"*

After the heavy rains the arid wilderness is suddenly converted into a vast sheet of water, which soon dries up; then,—

> "as if by magic the desert becomes covered with luxuriant herbage and gay with the blossoms of endless flowering plants. Birds, frogs, lizards, and insects of all sorts may be seen and heard where lately everything was parched and silent."

Professor Frazer continues:—

> "Now, it is just when there is promise of a good season that the natives of these regions are most especially to perform their magical ceremonies for the multiplication of the plants and animals which they use as food. Can we wonder that the accomplishment of their wishes, which so soon follows, should appear to them a conclusive proof of the efficacy of their incantations? Nature herself seems to conspire to further the delusion."†

Commenting upon the low culture attained by the natives of West Africa, Miss Kingsley observes:—

> "The African race has had about the worst set of conditions possible to bring out the higher powers of man. He has been surrounded by a set of terrific natural phenomena, combined with a good food supply and a warm and equable climate. These things are not enough in themselves to account for his low-culture condition, but they are factors that must be considered."‡

Colonel Ellis, probably the best authority on these natives, gives the other factor concerned. After saying that the position of the natives is very low in the scale of civilisation, he observes:—

> "There are, indeed, many reasons why it should be so. Uncultured man is that which the circumstances in which he is placed make him, and it is upon external surroundings that his progress to civilisation in a great measure depends. He is either obstructed or assisted by the influences of surrounding Nature. Of such influences none is more important than that exercised by climate. A hot climate renders physical, and still more mental, labor difficult, and causes every effort to be regarded as an evil. In such climates, too, Nature is usually prolific; the necessity for manual labor scarcely exists, and, as a consequence, mental activity correspondingly languishes. The intense disinclination experienced by Europeans in the tropics to engage in any mental labor is well known; and it is only by a great exertion of will that it can be combated."§

In addition to this obstructing influence, the same writer proceeds:—

> "The West Coast of Africa possesses an extraordinary one, namely, a climate which is most inimical to man.

* A. Reville, The Devil: His Origin, Greatness, and Decadence, p. 6 (1871).
† J. H. King, The Supernatural, vol. i., pp. 271-2.
‡ J. H. King, The Supernatural, vol. i., p. 9; vol. ii., p. 179.

* J. G. Frazer, "The Beginnings of Religion and Totemism among the Australian Aborigines," Fortnightly Review, Sept., 1905.
† J. G. Frazer, Fortnightly Review, Sept., 1905.
‡ Miss M. H. Kingsley, West African Studies, p. 124.
§ A. B. Ellis, The Ibhi-Speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast of West Africa, p. 4.

Digitized by Google

and which is commonly believed to be in that respect the worst in the world."

Even among Government officials, who only remain for twelve months' at a time and then return to England to recruit their health, "the death-rate is abnormally high." He further observes:—

> "Now the Negroes, though to a certain extent habituated through centuries of custom to the climatic conditions of West Africa, suffer therefrom in just the same way as do Europeans, though of course in a less degree.....The climate is, in short, unhealthy for them also, and that an unhealthy climate enfeebles both mind and body is very generally acknowledged" (p. 6).

(To be continued.) W. MANN.

War and Books.

> "There is delight in singing, though none hear
> Beside the singer, and there is delight
> In praising, though the praiser sit alone
> And see the praised far off him, far above."
> —LANDOR.

WAR tramples into the dust delights of the imagination as well as the beauty of the earth, and one of the effects of the European contest is that it is keeping the book-trade in a state of suspended animation. Books on the War are being hurried to the press by hustling publishers, and until the present tension is relieved there will be little else published, save the necessary publications such as works of reference and the like.

Despite the multiplication of Free Libraries, every one who cares for books likes to be his own librarian. A town council, mainly composed of successful, but uneducated, shopkeepers, seldom has the necessary culture to lay down the law as to books that even the most inexperienced readers should attempt to peruse. There are books which no lover of literature can afford to be without; classics, ancient and modern, on which the world has pronounced its verdict. These works, in whatever shape we may be able to possess them, are the necessary foundations of even the smallest collection. Homer, Dante, and Shakespeare, Cervantes, Milton, and Moliere, Gibbon and Scott, must be included by every lover of letters. The list of the classics is short, and, when we go beyond it, the tastes of men begin to differ widely.

A book is a friend whose face is constantly changing. If you read it when you are recovering from an illness, and return to it years after, it is altered surely, with the change in yourself. As a man's tastes and opinions are developed, his books put on a different aspect. He hardly knows the sonorous music of the "Songs Before Sunrise" he used to declaim, and the epigrammatic charm of "Omar Khayyam" sounds like "the horns of elfland faintly blowing." Books change like friends, like ourselves, like everything. But they are most piquant in the contrasts they provoke, when the friend who gave them is a success, though we laughed at him; altered in any case, and estranged from his old self and days. The vanished past returns when we look at the pages. The vicissitudes of years are packed in a thin octavo, and the shivering ghosts of desire and hope return to the forbidden home in the heart of fancy, when,—

> "sound upon Life's darkening slope
> The ground-whirl of the perished leaves of Hope,
> The wind of Death's imperishable wing."

It is as well to have the power of recalling them always at hand, and to be able to take a comprehensive glance at the emotions which were so powerful and full of life, and are now faded and of less account than the memory of the dreams of childhood,—

> "The rainbow comes and goes,
> And lovely is the rose;
> The moon doth with delight
> Look round her when the heavens are bare;
> Waters on a starry night
> Are beautiful and fair;
> The sunshine is a glorious birth;
> But yet I know, wher'er I go,
> That there hath passed away a glory from > the earth."

Some readers there are who can read anything, from "Three Men in a Boat" to the "Analects of Confucius," with the same avidity, the same distressing want of literary perspective. Some seem born with a good literary taste, who instinctively know what is good from what is bad. Others, and these are the large mass of readers, grope blindly about for years through volumes of rubbish before they reach that which is best. They have to acquire a literary taste. The appetite is there, but it has to be cultivated. For the greatest possession of a reader is the power that Charles Lamb possessed of distinguishing between books that are books and books that are not books. "The way to perfection," says Walter Pater, "is through a series of disgusts," and only the man or woman who has been a seeker after truth in theology or science knows the full significance of this saying.

The multiplicity of interests and tastes, growing with our life, adds to the difficulty with which we answer the question, "What shall I read?" It is essentially a modern difficulty. In a less feverish age they managed things better. There is one of Austin Dobson's charming old-world idylls which is well worth reading. Mr. Dobson has a genius for catching the spirit of the eighteenth century. He is sketching a portrait of a gentleman of the old school:—

> "We read, alas! how much we read,
> The jumbled strifes of creed and creed,
> With endless controversies feed
> Our groaning tables.
> His books—and they sufficed him—were > Cotton's 'Montaigne,' 'The Grave' of Blair,
> A Walton much the worse for wear,
> And 'Æsop's Fables.'"

And the old gentleman was less of a Philistine than many of us think. If we have access to the philosophy of Plato, the common sense of Socrates, the inspiration of Plutarch's "Lives," and can commune with the myriad-minded Shakespeare, we are not bereft of literature. Through what stages must men have not passed in countless generations to have produced such transcendant genius. They form the richest of legacies. What are the petty philanthropies of the world compared with the noble dowry of knowledge which these men have left to the world. They teach a man to reverence himself and to love his neighbor too. The poorest man, if he possess such friends, is to be envied, not pitied.

The eloquent ages tell the same tale. Down the long roll of humanity these are the names that gleam and sparkle, the characters whose influence has streamed like the sun over the dark places of the world, and chased before it the shadows.

A Socrates in his condemned cell, discoursing quietly on philosophy, a Bruno going to his fiery death, has more charm to the true man of our day than all the victories and glories of Alexander and Napoleon, and their impress on humanity is as Niagara to a drop of rain. Nations may war and fight, but the great purpose of the world is peace and advancement. The needle may be shaken from the course, and may appear to waver and change, but ever it comes back to the true pole. In the great stream of history, in the struggle for existence, the true victors have ever been those who adjusted themselves to the purpose of the world: those who have with the greatest faithfulness helped forward the great ideals, Liberty and Fraternity.

Literature may be said to be the one thing which is at once universal and immortal. Time devours all else. History becomes doubtful or forgotten; sciences change, religions die, sculptures crumble, and paintings perish; but great literature, never fading, never dies. Homer's birthplace and the events of his life are unknown, yet his characters live as freshly at this hour as they did millenniums ago. Lucretius, the noblest Roman poet, died twenty centuries ago. The hearts that have leapt at his tale of Iphigenia would have marched armies to her rescue. The marbles of Phidias and his contemporaries are now but fragments, but Catullus's lament for his dead brother sounds across the centuries like a linnet's song in the pauses of the wind. More than half a millennium of time and thousands of miles of space, and across the far deeper abyss of thought and faith, old Omar Khayyam still sings. Dante has been the supreme glory of Italy for six hundred years. Shakespeare, the uncrowned king of literature, counts more subjects than all the Pharaohs, and commands a more lasting allegiance than the Guelphs or the Romanoffs. To enhance prosperity, to soften adversity, people solitude, and, like flowers, adorn cottage and palace alike, is one of the functions of literature.

Digitized by Google

> "What good is like to this,
> To do worthy the writing, and to write
> Worthy the reading and the world's delight?"

MIMNERMUS.

Acid Drops

According to a Times report a protest has been issued by Professor Ernst Haeckel and Professor Rudolf Eucken, of Jena, against the behavior of England in the present war. The following passage is, to say the least of it, somewhat curious:—

> "What is happening to-day will be inscribed in the annals of history as an indelible shame to England. England fights to please a half-Asiatic Power against Germanism. She fights not only on the side of barbarism, but also of moral injustice, for it is not to be forgotten that Russia began the war because it was not willing there should be a thorough expiation of a wretched murder.
>
> "It is the fault of England that the present war is extended to a world war, and that all culture is thereby endangered. And why all this? Because she was envious of Germany's greatness, because she wished at all costs to hinder a further extension of this greatness. She was only waiting for a favorable opportunity to break out to the detriment of Germany, and she therefore seized most promptly on the necessary German advance through Belgium as a pretext in order to cloak her brutal national selfishness with a mantle of respectability."

We hesitate to believe that Professor Haeckel is responsible for these words. It is hardly the way, in any circumstances, in which a representative of the land of Goethe has any right to address the land of Shakespeare; and Haeckel, of all men, should show more respect for the land of Darwin. And what about the land of Voltaire? France is not even mentioned in this quotation. One would think that the writers had never heard of Alsace-Lorraine. Why is it "necessary" (for Germany, of course) to "advance through Belgium" except to advance through France to Paris? Why are the Belgians supposed to have no right to their own independence, which is really all that "neutrality" means? If Germany has a right to violate Belgian neutrality for her own ends, has England no right to defend it for her own ends? Is not that neutrality guaranteed, under the law of nations, by both of them? And why is the violator to be called virtuous and the defender a scoundrel? Is every nation to be punished, according to the will of Germany, for refusing to obey the orders of Germany? The idea is monstrous. And in subjecting Belgium to all the worst horrors of war, together with gratuitous barbarities, the Kaiser has acted like a fiend rather than a man. That he is still followed by a whole nation shows Shelley's prescience in the fine line about "King-deluded Germany."

Deliberate vileness, such as the sacking of Louvain, should put the Kaiser outside the recognition of humanity. To denounce him as an enemy to civilisation, and to declare that there is no safety or dignity for the world until he is hunted down and slain, is the duty of every self-respecting country. The Japanese acted humanely in their war with Russia. There is no need to talk about "semi-Asiatic" Powers. And what is "Germanism"? Renan's noble letter to Strauss, after the Franco-German war, pointed out that the hegemony of Europe had changed hands. It had been transferred from France to Germany. "Thirty years hence," Renan said, "we shall ask you what you have done with it." And what have they done with it? The symbol of Germanism is a rifle and a sword. It is responsible for the militarism of Europe; in other words, for the decivilisation of Europe. With endless gabble about God as the Kaiser's personal friend and Germany's sworn defender.

"If one smite thee on the one cheek, turn unto him the other also."—Jesus Christ. "Germany must be utterly and entirely smashed up."—Rev. A. J. Waldron.

Here is a statement from an American paper—the Philadelphia Ledger—that all sensible people and well-wishers to civilisation would do well to bear in mind:—

> "The pillars of civilisation are undermined and human aspirations bludgeoned down by no Power, but by all Powers; by no autocrat, but by all autocrats; not because this one or that has erred or dared or dreamed or swaggered; but because all, in a mad stampede for armament, trade, and territory, have sowed swords and guns, nourished harvests of death-dealing crops, made ready the way."

That seems to us an exact summary of the situation. Who actually begins the quarrel is a question of really minor importance when all have been so acting as to make a quarrel inevitable. Had the Christian nations been allied together by bonds of mutual respect, brotherhood, or admiration, war on any large scale would have been impossible. But this has not been the case. They were allied not because of mutual good feeling, but because of mutual hatred of someone else. And alliances on that basis cannot be any genuine guarantee of peace, but may easily become provocative of war.

The August issue of the Hackney Parish Monthly—a religious journal—was, we expect, published before the outbreak of the war, otherwise it would hardly have inserted the Bishop of Chelmsford's remark, "Was it a matter of chance that we had a President of the United States who believed, who preached the worth of that Book; that here in England we had a King who was not ashamed to say he read a chapter every day of his life; that in Germany they had a man who openly said that he tried to fashion his life and his work on the teaching of that Holy Book?" We wonder what the Bishop now thinks of the influence of the Bible upon the Kaiser? Stupidity has a boomerang capacity of returning to the point from which it is launched.

The Bishop of Chelmsford was exulting on the increase in the circulation of the Bible. On the other hand, the Bishop of Norwich is lamenting the ominous decline of Bible reading. Both bishops are correct. There has been a larger number of Bibles circulated; but there is less devotional reading of the Bible. The truth is, that the circulation of the Bible is almost as artificial as the circulation of a trading circular. It is circulated in large numbers because it is to the direct interest of a powerful and wealthy corporation that it should be. It is accepted, or bought, in this country, at least, for various reasons that are quite unconnected with any desire to read the Bible. In this respect the Bible stands alone. The circulation of a thousand copies of any other book proves absolutely that there are a thousand people, at least, who desire to read it. The circulation of 10,000 copies of the Bible only proves that some Society is interested in 10,000 people getting hold of it. To argue the value of the Bible from the number of copies circulated is exactly like a pill-maker proving the quality of his pills by the number of circulars that are placed in letter-boxes.

According to some of the daily papers a determined effort is to be made to capture German trade. In that case bronze "gods" will be made again in Birmingham, and giddy gauds in many other places in England.

Some foreign liners have been held up. We wish some penny-a-liners in Fleet-street had suffered the same fate.

A provincial paper recently referred in its war notes to the "fact" that "the great Garibaldi" had offered his services to the French Army. It would be unkind to suggest that the editor deserves a "biscuit."

According to the daily papers the Mohammedans have been praying for the success of the British troops. With the whole of Europe in a ferment of fanaticism, and the almond-eyed Japanese doing their Oriental best to imitate them, the "Lord" will have to defend his ears with some of Herbert Spencer's woollen plugs.

Bishop Boyd Carpenter has broken into verse over the subject of the War. Here are two lines:—

> "In thee alone we place our hope,
> Thou keeper of the just.

We do not like that reference to a "keeper" in the last line. It suggests Colney Hatch too forcibly.

The Christian proprietors of the Daily Telegraph have felt the lack of present-day poetry to express the War feeling adequately, and have reprinted some of Rudyard Kipling's outworn outbursts. Why don't they reset in block type the "Cursing Psalm" from the Old Testament. "God's" ways are so much better than our ways.

Digitized by Google

Lord Alfred Douglas has joined the French Army, and is now at the front. This is good news, for had he joined the British Army he might have sought absolution at the hands of the Bishop of London.

Mr. H. G. Wells has been hailed as a prophet for his anticipations in "The War in the Air." Will someone kindly make a claim for Milton, who has much to say of the heavenly militia?

A War Book of Facts has been issued. We are heartily glad to hear it, for the newspapers are as full of fiction as the Bible.

The Rev. Rhondda Williams has the happy knack of seeing quite clearly whatever he wishes to see. In the Christian World for August 27 he asserts that "a national interpretation of the world and of human nature is not barren in its yield as regards the reality of God." We confidently give that assertion the lie direct. We rather agree with Newman when he says that "it is a question whether Atheism is not as philosophically consistent with the phenomena of the physical world as the doctrine of a creative and governing power." We go further than the great Cardinal, and boldly declare that Atheism is the only consistent philosophy of the Universe. Mr. Williams does not interpret the world rationally, but spiritually, or religiously. In other words, he interprets it as a believer in God, and, at best, his reason plays a very subordinate part in the process. No parson believes in the free play of the pure intellect, because, as Newman says, it "forms the inlet for an all-corroding and all-dissolving Scepticism, the very poison of the soul." We differ from all the parsons, holding with Mill, that "the free play of the pure intellect is the necessary and sufficient guarantee of all improvement of the race."

Mr. R. J. Campbell is a believer in what he calls angelic ministry. He thinks there are guardian angels hovering round, always ready to come to the help and succor of distressed human beings. Curiously enough, he alludes to the tragedy which came to Mark Twain in the sudden death of his eldest daughter, and tells us that no God of love and sympathy, no angels of light and cheer, came to comfort the great writer in the supreme sorrow of his life. Why did the tender-hearted Father of the race, why did the ministering spirits, withhold the aid he so much needed? Why?

A recent issue of the South African Review contains an indictment of Salvation Army "Charitable" methods that will occasion small surprise to those who remember the controversy here when Mr. Manson published his book dealing with this much-boomed institution. It appears, also, that the Army in South Africa is following the same plan that was adopted here—silence. They know that in the long run that is their wisest policy. A reply means controversy, and controversy might lead to inquiry. And that is the last thing the Army desires. Inquiry by journalists eager for "copy," and who are ready to take the reports of Army officials without question may be tolerated—even welcomed. But inquiry by independent and capable men it will not have if it can be prevented. The "Army" trust to the ignorance of many, and the indifference of nearly all for protection.

The South African Review gives a number of cases of men turned from the Army's shelters who ought to have been admitted, and of the callousness of officials when no advertising end has to be served. It also emphasises the unpaid and underpaid labor employed by the Army in South Africa, as in England. It says:—

> "The 'Social' farms which are blessed with the name of these people, do not benefit the applicant financially. A man is only employed on the condition that he labors in return for his food and bed, and the food at the farm at Rondebosch is worse than that supplied to convicts at any of the gaols. Some of the out and out plodders, whose duties consist of rising about three or four o'clock in the morning to make arrangements for the delivery of milk, may receive remuneration of something like 12s. a month."

On the farms in Durban, Driefontein, and Rondebosch, all visited by the writer of the article, native labor is employed at the rate of from £2 to £3 per month. Some have the brother white Christian, compelled to ask for help, paid at 3s. per week—or nothing; and the black laborer employed at 10s. or 15s. per week.

Here is another illuminating excerpt:—

> "At the social farm in Durban, one of the finest creameries in the country has been built by this underpaid and unpaid labor. The milkman there, who held a position of trust on 25s. a month, absconded with the takings on one occasion. It is believed that no criminal process was taken against him, as in the first place the magistrate would be inclined to look leniently on a case of this kind where the employee was so outrageously underpaid, and this circumstance would certainly have alienated public sympathy from the Army."

The Army is also accused of "faking" its statistics of "free" meals distributed by incorporating the meals issued to the men acting as cooks, cleaners, waiters, night watchmen, etc. Finally, of the accommodation provided, the writer says:—

> "The beds are vermin-infested, the towels are as dirty as dishcloths, there is never any soap provided with which to keep one's self clean, and yet they have the effrontery to come forward as public benefactors to the outcast."

It is the same tale over again. And doubtless the Army officials feel as Mercury did when the gods were listening to the dispute between the sceptic and the believer: What does it matter if a sensible man here and there agrees with the sceptic; all the fools are on our side?

The Bishop of Zanzibar entertains a damagingly low estimate of the Christian world. A sermon by him appears in the Church Times for August 28, in which he says: "To those of us who live outside the civilised world and look at it across the ocean, it has seemed over and over again that vision is dead; that the civilised world, calling itself the Christian world, has had hardly anything to offer to the new races to which it comes." His lordship is quite right. The Christian world is not one whit better than the Pagan, and consequently the very idea of foreign missions is the most ridiculous ever heard of. And yet the Bishop is a missionary.

The Bishop believes in a dragon—"that dragon, the great serpent called Satan," the arch-liar of the Universe. Now, the dragon's greatest lie is that man is ultimately independent of God; that man develope apart from God, and in his own power will attain to his own destiny. A dozen years ago Londoners heard this lie with great horror from such places as the City Temple pulpit; but those who were blind enough to love it called it, not the lie of lies, but the New Theology. The gist of the New Theology was that "God could be ignored." Poor Mr. Campbell knows now that he is—or was, during the wild days of his New Theology campaign—not a minister of Christ, but a messenger of the great serpent called Satan, assiduously telling thousands of people the greatest of all lies.

The more we know of the extremely orthodox Bishop of Zanzibar, the more interesting he becomes to us. After the lie of the dragon comes that of the great beast, which is, that the State is greater than God. Then appears the third lie, the lie of the false prophet, which is, "that Jesus Christ has not come in the flesh, and therefore that Christian brotherhood is a mere dream, and that brotherhood, if ever it come, will be the fruit of a mere process of evolution." Now, because we have all more or less listened to and adopted these awful lies, the curse of war has been inflicted upon us. The Bishop says:—

> "Think, then, of the great lies, the lie of the dragon, the lie of the beast, the lie of the false prophet, which in God's judgment and in God's mercy have brought us to our present pass."

Is it any wonder that the churches are abandoned and the altars deserted?

A man named Kirk was killed by a passing motor outside St. Martin's Church, London. What our Scotch friends would call a case of two kirks.

Owing to the monetary crisis the Cardinals of the Roman Church are unable to get their monthly salaries, says a daily paper. We hope that the scarlet-cloaked ecclesiastics will not imperil their mortal souls by using Shavian adjectives.

What Polytheists these Christians are! At social functions, at places of worship, in newspapers, and even in public-houses the dramatis personæ of the Popular Superstition are hourly invoked. It is a species of intoxication in which the votaries seem unable to distinguish between the god of battles and the god of bottles.

Digitized by Google

Saint Peter, who is alleged to have charge of the gates of heaven, together with his staff, must be working overtime just now. Maybe, to please the military arrivals, the warlike old saint wears the sword with which he cut off someone's aural appendage many years ago.

Handkerchiefs with alleged portraits of Field Marshal Lord Kitchener are being sold on the kerbs by itinerant merchants. His lordship, who is not a young man, appears to have one Christlike quality in the pictures, for he always remains about thirty years of age.

Dr. G. Pascal, founder and former editor of the Entente Cordiale Review, is a humorist. A short time since he was visited by a police constable for the purpose of registering his name as an alien. As a consequence, the doctor says he is half inclined to change the name of the great Pascal to that of Rascal, "and make it more English."

"A soldier can be made in a few months, but it takes four years to make a sailor," says a halfpenny paper. The clergy pretend to turn a "devil" into an "angel" in a few minutes—fees as per scale.

Some of the religious papers have thought it good policy to write of the late Pope's "obscurantism," of his antipathy to advanced thought, etc., etc. The criticisms seem to us extremely ill-advised. All they mean is that the Pope was a Christian and believed in Christianity. It might even be, although of this there may be doubts, that his attitude represented deliberate policy. A far-seeing man might well conclude that concessions to the "Liberal" school of theologians only pave the way for still further concessions, and, above all, weaken the support of the more orthodox type of mind. In the long run that policy gains nothing. An army in which each unit is devoted to the same idea is a far more effective instrument than one which is divided by all manner of conflicting ideals. And although the Papal policy may have offended some, it is certain that it contented a much greater number. And when we bear in mind that the teachings to which the Pope clung were all part of historic Christianity, we must confess to feeling more respect for the one who makes a straight fight for his belief, however mistaken we may believe him to be, than for those whose chief anxiety is to trim and shape so as to secure a larger measure of popular support.

The "Asterisks" column in the Star contains the wittiest paragraphs in the daily press. Here is an excellent example. "Eligible Cardinals are now anxiously studying Mr. Belloc's Path to Rome, and wondering if it would be safe."

The Christian World for August 27 is in a state of tumultuous rapture over what it calls "the soothing influence" of the Churches in the present war-time. At last preachers have discovered that they have "a great function to fulfil and great messages to deliver." The article is intended to serve as an advertisement of the same week's issue of the Christian World Pulpit, which contains sermons on the war by Dr. Clifford, Dr. Campbell Morgan, and Canon Wilberforce. On consulting these sermons, we learn that Dr. Clifford soothes his people by informing them that Great Britain is nearly, if not quite, as responsible for the unsheathing of the sword as Germany; that Dr. Campbell Morgan comforts his congregation by repeating the hoary-headed old lie, "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice"; and that Canon Wilberforce tries to calm the disturbed feelings of his hearers by assuring them that he knows what no human being ever has known, or ever can know, namely, that the Lord who reigns is omnipotent love. We verily pity the credulous simpletons who pretend to be soothed and comforted by such palpable falsehoods.

Some divines are of opinion that the present war is going to solve all problems and cleanse the earth from all evils. Dr. Orchard does not hesitate to affirm that "we shall never need to waste our breath upon the belief in force, the trust in statecraft, and the appeal to selfishness again," because "their Nemesis has arrived." Such an assertion is foolish in the extreme. War has never resulted in the moral regeneration of the people engaged in it. Was either France or Prussia in any degree ennobled by the war of 1870? The inevitable tendency of war is to degrade and demoralise all who take part in it; and the present sanguinary conflict is not likely to be an exception to the rule.

Dr. Orchard goes to the length of saying that the war now being waged is at once "a terrible catastrophe," and "obviously an apocalypse of God." That it is "a terrible catastrophe" is beyond all doubt; but it is the sheerest nonsense to call it a revelation of God. Does the reverend gentleman believe in and worship "the Lord of Sabaoth"? Is the Deity he glories in and preaches "a man of war"? What infinite folly it is to imagine that the bloody war now in progress is "obviously an apocalypse" of a tender-hearted, loving Father in heaven! Dr. Orchard goes further still when, in answer to the question, "Where now is the kingdom of Christ which we believed was growing up in our midst"? He says, "It may be that this is the way that the kingdom is to come; and that only by this means shall the foundations be laid bare on which alone the City of God can be built." It would be impossible to surpass the absurdity of that sentence; not even a pulpiteer could do it.

The worship of the God of Battles has everywhere superseded the worship of the Man of Sorrows. The headquarters of the Young Men's Christian Association has been turned into a barracks, and the mild excitement of draughts and tea and toast is suspended by the warlike Twelfth London Territorials. The irony is as complete as if they displayed a notice, "No Christian Need Apply."

The Bishop of London has benefited to the amount of £100 under the will of the late Mr. H. E. Trevanion, who died from veronal poisoning at Hove in 1912. His lordship will thus be enabled to purchase a splendid uniform for his six weeks' campaigning.

The Act of Parliament dealing with aliens and alien enemies, which has been enforced recently, is a very ancient and drastic statute. In seaport towns it would have roped in the twelve disciples.

The Bishop of Khartoum, who was a footballing celebrity in earlier days, is going to the front as a chaplain. As a sky-pilot, he will run little risk of having his inside left on the field.

The search for the soul is a quest that has been going on throughout the centuries, but it is now in a fair way of being settled. We saw the other day, outside a picture palace, a notice: "A Woman's soul, 3,000 feet long." Now we shan't be long!

The war has had a terrible effect on the publishing world, and last week no less than twenty-three publications were suspended. In addition, most of those still being issued are greatly reduced in size. One of the defunct periodicals is a religious paper, and we wonder if the editor is sure of a glorious resurrection.

THE CITY CHOIR.

I WENT to hear the city choir,
The summer night was still;
I heard the music mount the spire,
They sang: "He'll take the pil—"

"I'm on! I'm on!" the tenor cried,
And looked into my face;
"My journey home! My journey home!"
Was bellowed by the bass.

"It is for the—! It is for the—!"
Shrieked the soprano shrill;
I know not why they looked at me
And yelled: "He'll take the pil—!"

Then, clutching wildly at my breast,
Oh, heaven! my heart stood still.
"Yes, yes," I cried, "if that is best,
Ye powers! I'll take the pil—"

As I, half fainting, reached the door,
And saw the starry dome,
I heard them sing, "When life is o'er He'll take the pilgrim home."

The secret of success is concentration; wherever there has been a great life, or a great work, that has gone before. Taste everything a little, look at everything a little; but live for one thing. Anything is possible to a man who knows his end and moves straight for it, and for it alone.—Olive Schreiner.

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £196 14s. 6d. Received since:—A. D. Corrick, £1; Geo. Smith (2nd sub.), 10s.; A. W. Hutty, 2s. 6d.; A Sergeant of the British Army and Wife, 10s.; E. Brooks, £1; E. B. (2nd sub.), £1 1s.; E. Lechmere, 10s.; W. Cromack and Friend, 5s.; Hy. Organ, 2s. 6d.

A. W. HUTTY.—"Stopping" a war is rather a dream. Something more than advice is necessary. That is why we say that peace can only be served during peace.

MORRIS CHRISTOPHER.—August 31 is late for a notice of a death on August 8—and Tuesday too!

E. B., sending a second cheque for the President's Honorarium Fund, wishes he could make it a hundred times as much. He adds that "if all who enjoy and profit by the intellectual treat provided for them in the Freethinker would put their shoulders to the wheel, and give one determined push, this Fund would reach the maximum asked for in no time."

A. RYMER.—Shall be read at once. Glad you "have found the Freethinker an inspiring force."

W. CROMACK.—Thanks for taking two copies every week.

H. R. ROSETTI.—Thanks.

A. MILLAR.—No space left this week. Shall appear in our next.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 6d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote's business calls are very heavy this week. First, there is the business side of the paper to deal with at this critical time; second, there are sudden unexpected difficulties to be met of a character which can hardly be a theme for common publicity. Then there is the call of that week with our old friend, de Caux, at Yarmouth, right opposite the useless armaments of the Kaiser, who has ships but no water—a thing which he appears to have overlooked. For these and other reasons Mr. Foote doesn't feel dying for work just at present. And his old friends will forgive him for a little laziness now and then. They know he has done more than one man's share of work in the world already.

At the Conference of the N. S. S. held in 1913, it was resolved that one Sunday during September in every year should be called by the branches the "Charles Bradlaugh Sunday," and, whenever possible, on the day nearest to the anniversary of Charles Bradlaugh's birth, lectures or readings dealing with his life and work should be delivered. Charles Bradlaugh was born on September 26, 1833, and branches are therefore reminded that this year "Bradlaugh Sunday" will be celebrated on September 27.

Professor E. S. Beesly opens the September number of the Positivist Review with an able and impartial article on the war. With reference to Germany's refusal to promise to respect the neutrality of Belgium, Professor Beesly makes the following strong protest:—

> "Now to the maintenance of this, Germany was as much pledged as France or England. Her invasion was an outrage on the public law of Europe, preceded by the proposal that Belgium should violate her clear duty, and followed by an attempted justification amazing in its flagrant cynicism. I confess I can hardly restrain my indignation when I think of those fields dedicated to peace and now filled with carnage, of that nation guaranteed inviolate by the most solemn engagements, and now given over to all the ruin of war. If this be suffered, then we may tear up all treaties, repudiate all international obligations, dissolve all international tribunals, abandon all hopes of peace and settled order, and accept the reign of military necessity and naked force. May that day never dawn!"

We say "Amen!" to this. The basest of all objections against any war is that wrong-doing outside our own frontiers is no business of ours. No wonder that the "Refusal of Aid Between Nations" roused the eloquent indignation of a poet like Dante Rossetti.

The following is an extract from an old friend and supporter:—

> "I have great pleasure in enclosing my annual subscription to the President's Honorarium Fund for 1914.....I realise that the war will have a serious effect upon the Freethinker and Freethought organisations, but although a difficult struggle is before you I know that as a man used to vicissitudes you will not easily be dejected. You have my warmest wishes for success in keeping our flag flying, and I beg to assure you of my hearty support."

We are afraid that leaving Newcastle-street (which is compulsory) and obtaining other premises in spite of Christian bigotry, with the expense of refitting, and the almost certain increase of rent, will be a greater tax upon us than even the war itself. And the two together! Ay, there's the rub!

We were much moved by the following letter, bearing no name, but bearing an address in Devonshire—good old Devonshire—the county of George Odger and Richard Carlile, and a crowd of other heroes, to say nothing of poets and statesmen:—

> "Dear Sir,—Kindly accept enclosed P. O. for 10s. towards your Fund as a token of gratitude from 'A Sergeant of the British Army and Wife.'"

We appreciate that "gratitude." We are proud of it. The biggest subscription is but a subscription. This is something more. War is a desperate business, but it is never got up by the soldier himself, who is sometimes nearly the finest type of man on earth. His primary object, then, is to defend his own country whenever it is attacked. Some foolish Pacifists (we were never of that kidney) sneer at the soldier as one who engages to shoot anybody for a shilling a day. Let it be so, if you will, but pray remember that he also engages to be shot at for a shilling a day. That alters the case a bit.

The other morning we saw a sight that made us feel absolutely tender towards the British soldier. About two hundred newly enlisted Tommies, some in kahki, some still in the civilian's clothes in which they "joined," were drawn up at the western mouth of Lombard-street. They had been told that their King and their Country wanted them. They had Lord Kitchener's word for it—and everybody regards him as an honest man. They had taken the great soldier's word, they had flocked to their country's standard, they were eager to smite down its enemies, they were ready to lose their own blood, their own lives, in its defence. They had also faced the fear of fears—apprehension for those near and dear to them when a "grateful country" might be all that stood between these and destitution. A "grateful country"! Heaven save the mark! A "grateful country" was represented then and there by the usual crowd which gathers at that spot. It will hardly be believed, but not a hand, not a voice, was raised to cheer and encourage them. Not a smile, save a cynical one, was on the face of any spectator. Winks were exchanged amongst the Mammonites. All the Tommy Atkinses in the world were, at bottom, fighting for these gentlemen. These gentlemen didn't cheer, they couldn't cheer, they had no country. They were worshipers of Mammon,—"the least erected spirit that fell." Soldiers, to them, only meant "food for powder." There was a mighty "call to arms" for "King and country," and this was the first result; marching in the broiling sun, without a sign of recognition from the "country." They might have been a gang of workmen going out to dredge the Thames, or something of that sort, instead of a band of newly enlisted soldiers in a time of war, marching out into the shadow of death from which many of them might never emerge. We had our own thoughts of that well-dressed and for the most part vulpine-looking crowd. And we took off our hat to Tommy Atkins.

Mr. F. J. Gould sends us a nice photograph of himself, taken at New York, with a pleasant inscription which we ought to value—and do.

Men create the gods after their own image, not only with regard to their form, but with regard to their mode of life —Aristotle.

Digitized by Google

The Material Basis of Life.—II.

(Concluded from p. 539.)

CONSISTING so largely of proteid matter, protoplasm is to be considered as colloidal in character. But the elaborate examinations of living protoplasm which have been conducted by a host of investigators under the most refined microscopic conditions have revealed a life-stuff structure far more complex than that displayed by lifeless colloid.

The physical make-up of protoplasm is extremely involved, and several theories have been advanced to explain the ascertained facts. None of these theories has, so far, won universal biological acceptance, but for all practical purposes, unanimity of opinion on all the main outstanding issues is merely a matter of time.

The unequal amounts of water which protoplasm from hour to hour contains are largely responsible for the varying phases this life-stuff presents. Not only is protoplasm built up by an extensive variety of dissimilar substances, but the sum total of materials which constitutes a given quantity of living matter varies with the plants and animals that it produces. And it must not be forgotten that every protoplasmic structure is subject to never ceasing changes so far as the substances composing it are concerned. This constant transformation renders it extremely difficult to arrive at any definite concept of its exact state. Not merely are the constituents of protoplasm in a perpetual flux, but the very elements of living substance themselves become related to one another in the most various ways.

In order to fully understand life's mechanism it is necessary to study it in its dynamic state, and that is a condition so far unattained. As George Henry Lewes said many years ago, when we attempt to analyse "life," the organisms which manifest life have ceased to live long before our inquiry is completed. Abbott's comparison of living matter with a chronometer is an excellent one, and illustrates the difficulty in a very striking manner. He writes:—

> "A watch is a delicately constructed and complicated mechanism of many parts, which by their action in moving the hands in certain fixed relations of time and space enables us thereby to tell the time of day. It is possible for anyone to take such an instrument apart and make a little pile of the wheels, screws, and springs, but when he has done so, the mass of metal and jewels which he holds in his hands is no longer a watch, and cannot be made to serve its original purpose. The very apparent reason is that the inherent quality of the watch, by virtue of which it is a watch, that is, a timekeeper, is involved not only in the parts composing it, but in their relations to each other as well, and such a mechanism will run correctly only when every part is in its proper place and adjusted carefully to every other part with reference to the joint action of the whole."

What applies to the watch as a going concern applies with equal truth to the architectural phenomena of protoplasm. Its vital activities are inseparably associated with its entirety. Precisely as the separate pieces of matter must be properly fitted together to form a complete mechanical contrivance—whether it be watch or steam-engine—which is capable of performing work, so the chemical constituents which supply the material make-up of living substances must be so arranged as to form an organic whole that is capable of carrying out the functions of life. The architecture or organisation of organic matter is its all in all.

As soon as this architectural unity is tampered with, although the weight of its substance and its chemical constituents remain what they were, its structure has been destroyed, and the chemical compound ceases to live and breathe. From the standpoint of structure the watch analogy is complete, but, of course, unlike the solid material component parts of the time-piece, living material is largely composed of water. Protoplasm is, in consequence, capable of adapting itself through wide ranges of structural modification without injury. And it seems very probable that in this very power of adjustment to the ever changing conditions of existence is to be found the secret of those animal and vegetable variations upon which organic evolution depends.

The physical basis of life manifests the power of automatic movement. Its appearance, in the words of Dujardin, is that of a greyish, viscid, slimy, semi-transparent and semi-fluid substance. When its movements are unimpeded and not limited by the walls of vessels, this life-stuff flows in all directions, as we see it in the motions of the single-celled amœba, or in the white corpuscles of the blood-stream in higher animals. Prof. E. A. Minchin states:—

> "When confined in rigid envelopes, as in plant cells, the protoplasm exhibits streaming movements of various kinds. Even more essentially characteristic of the living matter than the power of movement, is the property of metabolism—that is to say, the capacity of assimilating substances different from itself and building them up into its own substance [anabolism], and again decomposing these complex molecules into simpler ones [katabolism] with production of energy in the form of heat, movement, and electrical phenomena.....Metabolism results not only in the generation of energy, but also, if anabolism be in excess of katabolism, in the increase of bulk and consequent growth and reproduction."

The structural or constitutional units of protoplasmic products are the all-important cellular bodies. The term "cell" traces its origin and adoption to the circumstance that one of the leading pioneers of what has since become the great science of Cytology, while studying the structure of a thin section of cork, made the discovery that the cork was built up of tiny chambers, similar in appearance to the cells of honey-comb. Subsequent investigations disclosed the fact that all organisms—both animal and vegetable—were made up of individual cells, much as a human dwelling is made possible by a certain definite arrangement of the separate bricks and stones which compose it. The shapes of these individual cells are subject to great modification. They are transformed to meet the multitudinous requirements of the organism to whose well-being they minister. The cells are found to vary to a greater and greater degree as we rise in the scale of life, but there are certain cellular characteristics which are universal, and these are to be regarded as fundamental to all protoplasmic structures. With the doubtful exception of the Monera, simple organisms which are allegedly destitute of a nucleus, and probably many bacteria whose protoplasm has, so far, eluded discovery, it may be said that every cell is differentiated into two protoplasmic parts. These consist of the more or less circular nucleus lying near the cell's centre, and composed of comparatively solid material, and the cytoplasm which is more fluid in its constitution than the nucleus. The cytoplasm and its contained nucleus together make up the cell. Very commonly the cell is surrounded by a definite and sometimes thickened cell-wall. This characteristic is conspicuous in the tissues of plants,

> "in which the cell-wall becomes very thick and rigid through the deposit of various carbohydrates (pectin, cellulose). It is the latter (or its derivative, lignin) that gives its characteristic rigidity and hardness to wood. In animals, on the other hand, in only one rather obscure group—the Ascidians or 'Sea Squirts'—does cellulose occur, and it is the exception rather than the rule for the cell-wall to attain any considerable thickness or prominence. In many animal cells there is no cell-wall at all, the viscosity and surface tension of the mass of protoplasm holding it together."

The nucleus is of different chemical constitution to the cytoplasm; it is marvellously complex, and it is by far the most important cellular constituent, while a complete understanding of its involved phenomena will, in all human probability, dissipate the difficulties which at present surround the profound problem of hereditary transmission.

Digitized by Google

The cytoplasm is frequently provided with vacuoles which contain a watery fluid, starch grains, yolk granules, chlorophyll bodies which produce the green in the foliage of plants, and other materials. These substances may be viewed as the waste matters and by-products of cell-life, and are distinguished from the living protoplasm by the term metaplasm.

The nucleus or karyoplasm, as it is occasionally called in contrast to its encircling cytoplasm, having almost the same refractive index as cytoplasm, is very rarely visible in living cells. But the nucleus readily responds to staining, and is then quite distinctly seen. Under these conditions it becomes clearly outlined in its cytoplasmic setting, and its microscopic study is easily carried on.

The protoplasm of the nucleus consists of at least two substances. One of these substances stains easily with most dyes, and on that account is known as chromatin, while the other (the linin) "stains with great difficulty and looks like a sort of network or scaffolding supporting the chromatin. Both chromatin and linin are surrounded by a watery transparent fluid, sometimes termed hyaloplasm." A nucleolus is also present in many cells, but its purpose is as yet not understood.

The vast majority of cells carry a single nucleus, but in others several nuclei may be seen dotted through the cytoplasm. In the kingdom of plants the cell-wall or envelope is an important cell structure, as it furnishes the strength and rigidity which are as necessary to the plant as the skeleton is to animals. The presence or non-presence of a cell-wall is, however, very materially determined by the stress and strain to which the various cells are subjected. "In tissues where there are strains and stresses to be borne, cell-walls develop in response to such stimuli, but where they are not necessary they do not appear, or only partially develop."

It is very suggestive that such unwalled cells have just as many nuclei as if they were partitioned by cell-envelopes and led a semi-independent life. There is little reason to doubt that the presence of the nucleus is indispensable to the cytoplasm if it is to perform its functions with due efficiency. A tiny section of a cell, if it contain a fragment of nuclear matter will continue to live, while, on the contrary, a scrap of cytoplasm deprived of its nuclear substance soon stagnates and dies. The nucleus is thus obviously the centre of the cell's vitality, and we must agree with those eminent cytologists who picture the phenomena of cell-life as the products of "an area of protoplasm dominated by a nucleus."

All that has ever been truly explained in matters biological has been interpreted in terms of matter and motion, and that circumstance completely justifies the expectation that all future conquests of Nature's secrets will be won by strictly material methods. Both in theory and practice this great verity is fully realised by the overwhelming majority of contemporary biologists. The laboratory production of organic compounds has become a commonplace. The famous biologist Bütschli has succeeded in synthesising "artificial foams of minute structure which not only mimic the appearance of protoplasm, but can be made to exhibit streaming amœboid movements very similar to those of simple protoplasmic organisms."

But this is merely a beginning. The small school of vitalists and neo-vitalists is likely to become smaller. No solitary recent discovery in the slightest degree countenances their mystical theories. As that thoughtful botanist, H. C. Cowles says:—

> "Each year the list of 'vitalistic activities' of plants becomes more and more restricted through the establishment of a definite physical or chemical cause for what has been thought to have a vitalistic explanation, while never in the history of science has any phenomenon, once explained on a chemical or physical basis, later been found to be vitalistic."

T. F. PALMER.

Joseph Priestley.—III.

BY G. W. FOOTE.

[Reprinted.]

(Continued from p. 557.)

PRIESTLEY settled finally at Northumberland, residing in a house surrounded by delicious gardens, and situated so as to command the finest prospect on the Susquehanna. Still full of scientific ardor, he endeavored to establish a college there. He drew up the plans, and was chosen president; but the promised support was not forthcoming, and only the shell of the building was erected. That scheme failing, he set about erecting a laboratory and a library in his own grounds. And there, beloved by all his neighbors, he spent his few remaining years of life, still, as of yore, philosophising and experimenting. One is glad to learn that his English friends still remembered and assisted him. Independently of £50 per annum which Mrs. Elizabeth Rayner allowed him from the time he left England, she left him by her will £2,000 in the four per cents. Mr. Michel Dodson left him £500, and Mr. Samuel Salt £100. The Duke of Grafton remitted to him annually the sum of £40—a mark of aristocratic generosity which one is pleased to find and to chronicle, seeing how infrequent the signs of that virtue are in the history of our peerage.

In 1801, Priestley was prostrated by a fever, which left him sadly debilitated. His digestion was greatly impaired, so that he was obliged to refrain from a solid diet, and to subsist entirely on pulpy foods or liquids. Gradually he grew worse and worse, but to the last, even to the very day of his death, he persisted in his studies. On the morning of Monday, February 6, 1804, he died as peacefully as a child slumbers. A few hours before his death he had assembled around his bedside the little ones of the family, who al dearly loved him; after kissing them and bidding them be good and laying upon them a few religious injunctions, full of that loving piety which accompanied him through his long life, he serenely composed himself for the last long sleep, from which the good old man hoped there would be a glorious awakening.

Priestley's constitution was naturally robust, but in early youth he had suffered from ulcerated lungs brought on by youthful indiscretions, which he himself thought worked no other injury than the toning of his constitution down to that degree of nervous sensibility most favorable to a studious life. His mental faculties were vigorous, and he never suffered from headaches or abnormal nervous excitement. In the morning he awoke fresh and active, and anxious to recommence his labors. He had a large measure of that perseverance and pluck which are said to characterise Englishmen, and a full share of that energy which Matthew Arnold affirms to be the indicator of genius. Those who delight in bewailing the brevity of life should take a lesson from the history of Joseph Priestley's labors. The length of life depends not altogether on the clock register, but on the intensity and completeness with which it is lived.

Priestley's labors may be divided into four kinds—theological, philosophical, political, and scientific. A brief account of each will be necessary before the reader can in any way appreciate what this philosopher wrote, thought, and discovered.

In politics Priestley was a Democrat. He believed that all legitimate governments are based upon the people's will and conducted solely in the people's interest. For years before his emigration to America this was his publicly declared political faith, and subsequently to that event he became fully convinced of the utility of Republican institutions. John Locke had affirmed that "the end of government is the good of the governed," long before Priestley wrote; but his theory had not met with general acceptance, although probably no one would have asserted that any Government could rightfully exist in antagonism to the manifest welfare of its subjects. To-day Locke's dictum is a theoretical commonplace, but two centuries ago the ruling classes secretly entertained, and the masses tacitly admitted, a semi-divine right inherent in wealth and title to govern the plebeian poor in any manner short of absolutely insupportable tyranny. Priestley, however, was too clear-sighted and too large-hearted to rest satisfied with such a monstrous theory as that. He rather thought, with Paine, whose political writings he highly approved and admired, that the rights of man should receive full recognition, and that justice should be no respecter of persons. This paragraph, from his famous papers on the First Principles of Government, is well worth reading even now:—

Digitized by Google

> "It must necessarily be understood, therefore, whether it be expressed or not, that all people live with society for their mutual advantage, so that the good and happiness of the members, that is, the majority of the members of any State, is the great standard by which everything relating to that State must finally be determined. And though it may be supposed that a body of people may be bound by a voluntary resignation of all their interests to a single person, or to a few, it can never be supposed that the resignation is obligatory on their posterity, because it is manifestly contrary to the good of the whole that it should be so."

This brief and emphatic utilitarian utterance is worth a vast deal of that windy eloquence which often passes current for political wisdom. Again, let us quote another passage full of vigor and earnestness, which doubtless proved most obnoxious to the governing politicians of Priestley's time, furnishing as it did an indirect justification of the revolutionary movement in France:—

> "But in the largest States, if the abuses of Government should at any time be great and manifest; if the servants of the people, forgetting their masters and their masters' interest, should pursue a separate one of their own; if, instead of considering that they are made for the people, they should consider the people as made for them; if the oppressions and violations of right should be great, flagrant, and universal; if the tyrannical governors should have no friends but a few sycophants, who had long preyed upon the vitals of their fellow citizens, and who must be expected to desert a Government whenever their interests should be detached from it; if, in consequence of these circumstances, it should become manifest that the risk which would be run attempting a revolution would be trifling, and the evils which must be apprehended there were far less than those which were actually suffered, and which were daily increasing; in the name of God I ask, what principles are there which ought to restrain an injured and insulted people from asserting their natural rights, and from changing, or even punishing, their governors—that is, their servants—who had abused their trust, or from altering the whole form of their Government, if it appeared to be a structure so liable to abuse?"

In Priestley's time Dissenters practised their religious worship only on sufferance, and as for more extreme heretics, they were quite beyond the pale of toleration or justice, being regarded as a species of noxious vermin, who might justly be expelled from society, or deprived of life, if fitting occasion arose for so treating them. The Established Church arrogantly claimed exclusive rights, and superciliously looked down upon all other sects from the elevation of its monstrous privileges. Against the existence of a State Church, Priestley always argued. He boldly asserted what even many of his Dissenting brethren were unprepared to admit, that the Government had no legitimate control over conscience, nor the right to support any opinions whatever.

In theology Priestley was a Unitarian, believing in one God, and denying the asserted divinity of Christ. He maintained that the divinity of Christ is nowhere asserted in Scripture, and was not acknowledged by the Early Christians. Primitive Christianity, he argued, was characterised by none of the excrescences of later developments of that faith, but was simply a recognition of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of Man. This position he maintains in his History of Early Opinions Concerning Jesus Christ, and in his History of the Corruptions of Christianity. These works are marked by great learning, and the latter is still popular and esteemed among Unitarians. The existence of God, Priestley thought, could be completely proved by the argument from design, which of course was only one that he, as an experientialist, could consistently deem valid. With the conclusive force of the Design Argument he seems to have been quite content, for he never evinced any sense of its manifold difficulties and defects. Probably, if he had lived a century later, in these days of evolution and development, his lucid intelligence would have perceived that looking through Nature up to Nature's God is a far more difficult process than it was once believed to be.

Priestley was in philosophy an experientialist of the school of Hobbes and Locke and Hartley. He believed that man has no native intuitions, no innate ideas, but that his conceptions and beliefs are determined by his powers of perception and his faculty of reason. All knowledge, he held, is the result of experience, and can come in no other way. Man he contemplated as an organised system of matter, regulated by purely mechanical laws, and no more than the lower animals possessing an independent soul. In his celebrated Disquisitions on Matter and Spirit, he maintains this position with a remarkable force, which has probably never been equalled by any other writer on the same side. The following quotation summarily expresses his views on this subject, and conveys a fair idea of his style and method of reasoning:—

> "The powers of sensation or perception and thought, as belonging to man, have never been found but in conjunction with a certain organised system of matter; and, therefore, those powers necessarily exist in, and depend upon, such a system. This, at least, must be our conclusion, till it can be shown that these powers are incompatible with other known properties of the same substance; and for this I see no sort of pretence.
>
> "It is true that we have a very imperfect idea of what the power of perception is, and it may be as naturally impossible that we should have a clear idea of it as that the eye should see itself. But this very ignorance ought to make us cautious in asserting with what other properties it may or may not exist. Nothing but a precise and definite knowledge of the nature of perception and thought can authorise any person to affirm, whether they may not belong to an extended substance, which has also the properties of attraction and repulsion. Seeing, therefore, no sort of reason to imagine that these different properties are inconsistent any more than the different properties of resistance and extension, I am, of course, under the necessity of being guided by the phenomena in my conclusions concerning the seat of the powers of perception and thought. These phenomena I shall now briefly represent.
>
> "Had we formed a judgment concerning the necessary seat of thought, by the circumstances that universally accompany it, which is our rule in all other cases, we could not but have concluded that in man it is a property of the nervous system, or rather of the brain. Because, as far as we can judge, the faculty of thinking, and a certain state of the brain, always accompany and correspond to one another; which is the very reason why we believe that any property is inherent in any substance whatever. There is no instance of any man retaining the faculty of thinking when his brain was destroyed; and whenever that faculty is impeded, or injured, there is sufficient reason to believe that the brain is disordered in proportion; and, therefore, we are necessarily led to consider the latter as the seat of the former.
>
> "Moreover, as the faculty of thinking in general ripens and comes to maturity with the body, it is also observed to decay with it; and if, in some cases, the mental faculties continue vigorous when the body in general is enfeebled, it evidently because, in those particular cases, the brain is not much affected by the general cause of weakness. But, on the other hand, if the brain alone be affected, as by a blow on the head, by actual pressure within the skull, by sleep, or by inflammation, the mental faculties are universally affected in proportion.
>
> "Likewise, as the mind is affected in consequence of the affections of the body and brain, so the body is liable to be reciprocally affected by the affections of the mind, as is evident in the visible effects of all strong passions, hope or fear, love or anger, joy or sorrow, exultation or despair. These are certainly irrefragable arguments, that it is properly no other than one and the same thing that is subject to those affections, and that they are necessarily dependent upon one another. In fact, there is just the same reason to conclude, that the powers of sensation and thought are the necessary result of a particular organisation, as that sound is the necessary result of a particular concussion of the air. For in both cases equally, the one constantly accompanies the other, and there is not in nature a stronger argument for a necessary connection of any cause and any effect."

Singularly enough, however, Priestley tenaciously adhered to his belief in immortality. He had discarded the immatorial soul, but he contended for the literal resurrection of the body in accordance with the Christian revelation. The overwhelming difficulties of this doctrine, when viewed in the light of man's antiquity on earth, never presented themselves to the philosopher's mind. We can only regard this sophistical theory of Priestley's as one of those crazes which sometimes lurk in the secret recesses of great minds, defying all efforts to dislodge them, and actually compelling the sober reason to contrive arguments to justify their presence.

Digitized by Google

(To be concluded.)

What knowledge is of most worth? The uniform reply is—science. This is the verdict on all counts. For direct self-preservation, or the maintenance of life and health, the all-important knowledge is—science. For that indirect self-preservation, which we call gaining a livelihood, the knowledge of greatest value is—science. For the due discharge of parental functions, the proper guidance is to be found only in—science. For that interpretation of national life, past and present, without which the citizen cannot rightly regulate his conduct, the indispensable key is—science. Alike for the most perfect production and present enjoyment of art in all its forms, the needful preparation is still—science; and for the purposes of discipline—intellectual, moral, religious—the most efficient study is, once more—science.—Herbert Spencer.

The bishops preach that it is as difficult for a rich man to get into heaven as for a camel to go through the eye of a needle; yet they enrich themselves as greedily and as carelessly as if they, at any rate, never expected to smell brimstone as a consequence.—Bradlaugh.

Wendell Phillips, the famous abolitionist, was once travelling northwards, when he was accosted by a tract distributor, who was going his rounds in the corridor-train. "My friend," said he, approaching Phillips, "may I inquire what your aim in life is?" "Well," says Wendell, "my object in life is to benefit the negro." "Then," replied the missionary, "why do I find you travelling due north; why don't you go south, where the negroes are?" "Hum, yes," drawled Phillips, "there's a good deal in that. What's your aim in life, may I ask?" "My aim in life, sir," replied the missionary, in a pompous voice, "is to save souls from hell!" "Ha!" retorted Wendell; "then what on earth are you doing in this train? Why don't you go to hell and save them?"

We will speak out, and we will be heard,
Though all earth's systems crack;
We will not bate a single word,
Nor take a letter back.

We speak the truth, and what care we
For hissing and for scorn;
While some faint gleamings we can see
Of freedom's coming morn.

Let liars fear, let cowards shrink;
Let traitors run away;
Whatever we have dared to think,
That dare we also say.

—Lowell.

The Ramsey Testimonial.

(SIXTH LIST OF SUBSCRIPTIONS.)

Mildmay Radical Club, £1 2s. 6d.; G. Shore, 2s.; R. Manley, 5s.

B. T. HALL (Treasurer), Club Union Buildings, Clerkenwell-road, London, E.C.

Obituary.

Just a line to let you know of the death of my father, Morris Christopher, on August 8, aged 74, at Wolverhampton. For many years a subscriber to, and supporter of, the Freethought movement. He asked me, his son, to write after he had gone and say good-bye to Mr. Foote and his many friends in Birmingham and district.—MORRIS CHRISTOPHER.

"All's Right With the World."

THE Kaiser made war,
While his moustache he twirled,—
"God's in his heaven,
All's right with the world."

The banner of blood
And of rapine's unfurled,—
"God's in his heaven,
All's right with the world."

In the seas mines are sown
With red ruin upcurled,—
"God's in his heaven,
All's right with the world."

From the navies above
Deadly missles are hurled,—
"God's in his heaven,
All's right with the world."

Hosts unnumbered on land
To destruction are whirled,—
"God's in his heaven,
All's right with the world."

The Devil in man
Is aroused and uncurled,—
And if God's in his heaven,
All's wrong with the world!

B. D.

God and the Kaiser.

"GOD AND I." THE KAISER.

[The following clever verses appeared in the Freethinker over twenty years ago, and are from the pen of the late Mr. George Leslie Mackenzie, a frequent contributor to our pages. At the time of their first appearance they attracted much attention and were reprinted widely.]

We are a pair unique,
God and I;
Apart from ev'ry clique,
God and I;
He's strong and quick and winking,
And I am good at thinking;
We know no fear nor shrinking,
God and I.

The German folk we guide,
God and I;
We're both upon their side,
God and I;
My colleague's inspiration
Gives me determination;
We thus both bless the nation,
God and I.

A man of war 's the Lord,
So am I;
He's partial to the sword,
So am I;
I am the Lord's adviser—
Than one, two heads are wiser;
The Deity plus Kaiser,
God and I.

I hope and trust that we,
God and I;
Will never disagree,
God and I;
All jealousy we smother,
Each supplements the other;
We study one another,
God and I.

If ever we fell out,
God and I;
We'd both be put about,
God and I;
All other kings are, clearly,
His passive puppets merely,
But we are equals nearly,
God and I.

Of course, the Lord is chief—
God, not I;
My life on earth is brief,
Soon I'll die;
But, when my days are ended,
And I've to heaven ascended,
We'll have some matters mended,
God and I.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

OUTDOOR.

BETHNAL GREEN BRANCH N. S. S. (Victoria Park, near the Bandstand): 3.15 and 6.15, Messrs. Gallagher and Thompson, Debate, "Do We Live After Death?"

CAMBERWELL BRANCH N. S. S. (Brockwell Park): 6, Mr. Schaller, a Lecture.

EDMONTON BRANCH N. S. S. (Edmonton Green): 7.30, Miss Kough, a Lecture. Derby-road, Ponders End (opposite "Two Brewers"): Wednesday, Sept. 9, at 8.30, Mr. Davidson, a Lecture.

KINGSLAND BRANCH N. S. S. (corner of Ridley-road): 11.30, F. Schaller, "Some Crimes of Christianity"; 7.30, a Lecture.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Finsbury Park): 11.30, Mr. Rowney, a Lecture. Parliament Hill: 3.30, R. H. Rosetti, a a Lecture. Regent's Park (near the Fountain): 3.30, Mrs. Rosetti, a Lecture.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, J. Darby, "Christianity and Crime."

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

GLASGOW BRANCH N. S. S. (Good Templars' Hall, 122 Ingram-street): 12 noon, Important Business Meeting.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6½ ins. by 8¾ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LETTERS OF A CHINAMAN ON THE MISCHIEF OF MISSIONARIES. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

PAIN AND PROVIDENCE. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE

Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 37 SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

A counting-house passes away; a school remains.
—VICTOR HUGO.

War Flags.

THERE is an intimate relation between religion and war. Both belong to the age of faith. When the age of reason has fairly dawned both will be despised and finally forgotten. They are always and everywhere founded on ignorance and stupidity, although they are decorated with all sorts of fine names. The man of sense sees through all these fine disguises. He knows that the most ignorant people are the most credulous, and that the most stupid are the most pugnacious. Educated and thoughtful men shrink alike from the dogmas of religion and the brutalities of war.

The Christian deity is still the lord of hosts, the god of battles. His eyes delight to look over a purple sea of blood, and his devotees never invoke his name so much as when they are about to emulate his sanguinary characteristic. The clergyman does not shock, he only gratifies, the feelings of the orthodox world when he blesses the flag which is to float over scenes of carnage, and flame like a fiend's tongue over the hell of battle, where brothers of the same human family, without a quarrel in the world, but set at variance by thieves and tricksters, maim and mangle and kill each other with fratricidal hands, which ought to have been clasped in friendship and brotherhood.

Yet these hireling priests, who consecrate the banners of war, dare to prate that God is a loving father and that we are all his children. What monstrous absurdity! What disgusting hypocrisy! Surely the parent of mankind, instead of allowing his ministers to mouth his name over the symbols of slaughter, would command them to preach "peace, peace!"

> "Until the war-drums beat no longer and the battle-flags are furled
> In the parliament of man, the federation of the world."

Of course there is a comic side to this, as to almost everything else. The priests of the various nations consecrate rival banners, pray for victory for their own side, and swear that God Almighty is sure to give it them if they trust in him. Now what is the Lord to do when they go on in this way on opposite sides? He is sure to disappoint one party, and he is likely to get devilish little thanks from the other. A wise God would remain neutral, and say, "My comical little fellows, if you will go knocking out each other's brains because they are not strong enough to settle your differences by peaceful means, by all means get through the beastly business as soon as possible; but pray don't trouble me with your petitions for assistance; both sides are fools, and I wash my hands of the whole affair."

We have heard of an old Dutch commander who actually prayed the Lord to remain neutral, although from a different motive. On the eve of battle he addressed the deity in this fashion: "O Lord, we are ten thousand, and they are ten thousand, but we are a darned sight better soldiers than they, and, O Lord, do thou but keep out of it, and we'll give them the soundest thrashing they ever had."

Our Prayer Book pays a very poor compliment to the god of battles. "Give peace in our time, O Lord," says the preacher. "Because there is none other that fighteth for us but only thou O God," responds the congregation. The compilers of the Prayer Book evidently blundered, unless they secretly felt that the Lord of hosts was used up, and not worth a keg of gunpowder or an old musket.

Consecrating colors, like consecrating graveyards, is after all only a trick of trade. The clergyman only practises the arts of his profession, and probably laughs in his sleeve at his own public performance. Perhaps he knows that God, as Napoleon said, is always on the side of the big battalions; just as, probably, every bishop knows that Church corpses rot exactly like Dissenting corpses, although they lie in consecrated ground. Priestly mummeries will last as long as there is a demand for them. It is of little use to quarrel with the supply. The Freethinker's duty is to lessen the demand.

The war which is at present spreading death and desolation over a large part of Europe is greatly due to the personality of the German Emperor, who has never outgrown his childhood, when "a box of soldiers" was reckoned a suitable present. Ever since he came to the throne—or, at least, ever since he parted with Bismarck—he has been "playing at soldiers" on a bigger scale. He has saturated the German nation with the same folly, and they are following him to their own destruction in a war with the bulk of Europe. This could not have taken place under a Republic. It is only under a Monarchy that one man is able to pervert a whole nation in this way. The King rules by divine right and the grace of God; public documents, processes of law, the very coinage, proclaim this as if it were an actual fact; and to the people who are born and brought up under this delusion, the King stands for something supernatural and immortal.

Here, again, the evil influence of religion may be distinctly traced. Nothing of the kind is noticeable in France where religion has been dethroned from all public positions, and left as a purely private matter between the people and their own consciences. President Poincarré could not hurl the French Army at Germany, but the Kaiser has hurled the German Army at France. The President must respect the law, the Emperor follows his own will. And it is nothing but religion that renders this dangerous absurdity possible.

It is only in a very limited sense that war makes people think. Religion promotes war, and war in turn promotes religion. Barbaric practices stimulate barbaric modes of thought. Not the man, but the brute, is roused in people by a return to the settlement of quarrels by brute force. Kill or be killed becomes the law for human beings, as eat or be eaten was the law of existence for the lower animals. Life becomes atavistic instead of progressive. Man's face turns in the wrong direction, and the faster and farther he goes the more leeway he has to make up again when he recovers his better senses.

This war has stimulated the monarchical superstition in England. The King's portrait is on the cover of The History of the War—which he has never been near. It was announced that he was going to the front—at Aldershot! And "God Save the King" is the universal song—in spite of its ridiculous words.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

Christianity's Failure.

ALL sorts of morals are being drawn and all kinds of lessons derived from the present condition of the European nations, and it is only natural that the Churches should draw therefrom conclusions favorable to themselves. To those who are not blinded by religious prejudice it would seem that the one certain thing is the decisive disproof of religion as a civilising force. This remains true even though one were to grant the claim that European nations are as they are because none of them have really adopted Christianity. For surely that is as clear a proof of failure as anyone could desire. Christianity is not a thing of yesterday. It has a very long history, and it has had unexampled opportunities of asserting its claims. To say, therefore, that it is still untried, is to admit wholesale and irretrievable failure. The first business of a religion is, obviously, to get itself adopted; and if it cannot do this in the course of nineteen hundred years, it had better be cleared out of the way, and so make room for a teaching with a more hopeful outlook.

It becomes still worse if it is argued that what we have had in actual operation is a Christianity distorted and utilised in the interests of selfish Powers. On that one may well ask, What is there about Christianity that it should so readily lend itself to schemes of governmental tyranny and social exploitation? For there is no doubt that, from the time of Constantine, Christianity has been so utilised. Whether it has been governmental or other forms of exploitation, Christianity has been universally recognised as a capital means to that end. Not so recognised by the exploited, of course. They have continued to look to it for consolation and deliverance. That has been the condition of its serviceableness. But the exploiters have had no doubt as to its value. In the old Roman Empire, Christianity converted the emperor into a sultan. It gave his rule the authority of divinity, and made disobedience a religious offence. It cannot be said with truth that prior to the establishment of Christianity the rule of the emperor was ever completely divorced from the popular will. It was Christianity that made this separation as complete as it ever can be made. Professor Seeley well points out that—

> "Constantine, if he was influenced by policy, was influenced by a wise policy when he extended his patronage to the Church. By so doing he may be said to have purchased an indefeasible title by a charter. He gave certain liberties, and he received in return passive obedience. He gained a sanction for the Oriental theory of government. In return he accepted the law of the Church. He became irresponsible with respect to his subjects on condition of becoming responsible to Christ."

Nothing could be more favorable to tyranny in every form. The Christianised Roman Emperor, like the German Kaiser, willingly admitted his responsibility to Christ, but he repudiated it in the only direction in which it could have social value. No religious ruler would ever dispute his responsibility to God for all he did; but, on the other hand, I cannot recall a single case in which this recognition has ever stood in the way of governmental wrongdoing. It cannot, for instance, be denied that the German Emperor is an intensely religious man. He believes in God, and he also believes God believes in him. It is idle to call his constant use of religious phraseology hypocritical. It is equally idle to say that the brutality of the German soldiery is a proof of that hypocrisy. It may be granted—what is extremely likely—that Kaiser William is a paranoic, and therefore a fit subject for medical attention and restraint. The fact remains that he is an intensely religious man, and that his natural inclinations—whether normal or morbid—have been sustained and strengthened by his religious beliefs.

The apologists who argue on the lines above indicated have thus to face this conclusion, and it is one that follows from the success of their own arguments. Christianity has never yet been adopted by any nation on a sufficiently general scale to warrant one saying that its conduct may be attributed to the Christian faith. On the other hand, tyrants have found in what they conceived to be Christianity encouragement in conduct that has involved widespread ruin, misery, and degradation. This is absolutely all that their arguments prove; and if that does not demonstrate the failure, the worthlessness, of Christianity, what does it prove?

Needless to say, this is not the conclusion at which Christian writers arrive. One religious journal says:—

> "If only there had been enough Christianity in the world, no man, prince, potentate, or private citizen, could have hated or envied or overreached or dreaded his neighbors enough to bring war to pass."

If only there had been enough Christianity! Whose Christianity? After all, Christianity in practice can only be what each one, or each Church, takes it to be. Whose Christianity is it, then, that is to make war and hatred impossible? Is it the Christianity of Germany? Obviously not. Is it the Christianity of England, of America, of Russia? Is it even the Christianity of any one of the Churches? Which of these has ever declared war wrong, or acted so as to make it impossible? At present, so far as this war is actually concerned, we are all agreed that England could not have kept out of it with honor; and we are, therefore, at one with the Churches in this respect. That, however, is true only under present conditions. The further question remains as to the responsibility for those conditions that make war sooner or later inevitable. And here the position of all the Churches is very different. Uniformly, in every country, and no matter the character of the war in which that country has been engaged, the influences of the Churches have been on the side of war. They have encouraged, they have blessed it; they have given it the moral and religious sanction without which the true nature of warfare might be more apparent. There are enough Christians in the world to make war a practical impossibility if only the Churches were genuinely on the side of peace.

In what way is more Christianity going to prevent war's recurrence? Will it cause people to even live amicably together? Consider one fact as illustrative of a whole class. The fact of this country being at war has, for the present at least, broken down a host of differences. Political divisions have, for the moment, disappeared. Men of all shades of religious opinion, and of no religious opinion at all, have volunteered for service, and are ready to lead a common life, share a common danger, for a common cause. They will eat together, sleep together, fight together, die together. The one thing they will not do is pray together. When it comes to the question of religion, all the old differences remain. The Catholic, the Protestant, the Jew, will each continue to perform his religious devotions in his own way, and so far alone. If they have ceased to quarrel for a time about religious formulæ and doctrines, it is only because more insistent and more fundamental social forces are making themselves felt. No amount of religious conviction is strong enough to bring these people together, working side by side for a common object. It could only be done, and has been done, by something more fundamental and more genuinely universal—by a direct appeal to the social nature of mankind.

There is no need to multiply instances. The one plain outstanding truth is that while the general tendency of the social forces is to unite people, that of religion is to divide them into hostile camps. In its wider aspects religion is always a seperative force. This is a fact that all statesmen, from Constantine onward, have had to recognise and deal with. Very often rulers have taken religion under their charge because they saw in it a useful agent for their purpose; but often they have been compelled to do so because they saw it meant splitting up the nation into so many warring groups. Let anyone, in imagination, strip from the various sects in this country the influence of a common social life, leaving only the religious belief, and then consider what prospect of co-operation would remain. It is true that these sects do co-operate to some extent now, but their co-operation is not based upon religion. Their union is due either to social considerations, or to hostility directed against a common enemy. And their union for social purposes is not without its dangers. For they bring to the consideration of several questions a narrowness of view and a bitterness of temper that is almost fatal to a genuinely helpful settlement of any problem that may arise.

Digitized by Google

Europe needs neither more Christianity nor more religion. It has plenty of both; it has never lacked either. As a mere force Christianity has failed utterly to unite two nations in any part of the world in bonds of genuine friendship. There is not a country on the face of the globe that can appeal successfully to another country in the name of Christianity. It is Christian nations that threaten the peace of the world, it is Christian nations that drive non-Christian powers to arm and spend their revenues in preparations for war, it is a Christian nation that has shown itself careless of written agreements and of common decency in even the conduct of war. Some time back Canon Scott Holland said:—

> "The Roman Empire far more nearly succeeded in giving unity of life, culture, government, and intercourse to the entire body of civilised men—European, Asiatic, and African—than we in our wildest dreams could ever imagine possible to-day.....A common unity for Christian Europe is infinitely less conceivable now, eighteen hundred years after Christ, than it was in pre-Christian Europe. It is Christian Europe which gives us the spectacle of race divided against race by implacable enmities.....Racial differences grow more intense, and let us note it is Christianity itself which tends to sharpen them."

Two thousand years ago a Roman citizen might travel from Rome to Britain under the safe protection of Roman law and Roman civilisation. To-day, could that Pagan traveller be resurrected and perform the journey, he would find some fifteen millions of soldiers, belonging to the Christian Powers of Europe, invoking their Deity to aid them in their work of mutual destruction. What clearer proof of Christianity's failure could be needed?

C. COHEN.

Nietzsche.

IN almost every pulpit and religious journal at present the unbelief and Materialism so prevalent in Germany, and particularly in Prussia, are said to be responsible for the calamitous war which is being so savagely waged. Atheism is described as the root of all evil, and Atheism is declared to be supreme in Prussia. That great champion of Anglican exclusiveness, the Bishop of Zanzibar, tells us, in a most violent discourse, that Prussia is the home of the false prophet, the prophet who denies, not only the true incarnation of God in Jesus Christ, or that "God, through God in human flesh, died upon the Cross," but also even the very existence of God, as taught by the Church, as well as the laws of morality. Now, what is the inevitable result of such wicked denials? "Look," exclaims his lordship, "look over at Prussia, and there you see it. You see a race proud of its past, but prouder still of its imagined future; a race that names God only to bless its own purposes and deeds." Of course, Dr. Weston, being a rabid partisan, deplorably misrepresents the facts and woefully misleads the uninformed among his hearers. Can he be really ignorant of the fact that Prussia is an exceedingly religious kingdom, sixty-four per cent. of its population being Protestants, and thirty-four per cent. Catholics? Is he unaware that the imperial influence is scrupulously employed on behalf of orthodox Christianity? Whatever be the explanation, these facts he entirely ignores, and puts the whole blame for the war upon the shoulders of the Modernists in the Catholic Church and of the Liberal Christians in the Protestant, well knowing that these heretical parties form but insignificant minorities in their respective communions. Thus the Bishop of Zanzibar must be dismissed as a hopelessly biassed and wholly unreliable authority.

The next witness is Dr. Campbell Morgan, who has already preached five of "those great sermons which have made Westminster Chapel in August more than ever the centre of London Nonconformity." So eager are people to hear this comparatively new oracle that they crowd the large building from floor to ceiling every time he is announced to speak. One of his utterances is this: "When there is a denial of morality, then immediately there is an apotheosis of brute force." Again: "At the back of everything there is lust for power," which is described as the inspiration of war. Then comes this illustration:—

> "That great nation of Germany, to which we owe so much for its scientific investigation and its wonderful learning, has, for more than a generation, been under the influence of a philosophy that has denied that reality of the moral. The philosophy of Nietzsche may be condensed into this one brief sentence: 'Nothing is true. Everything is permitted to the strong.' When that is believed sub-consciously by a people, it comes out sooner or later into actuality. At the back of a passion for war, wherever it exists, is this denial of morality."

Dr. Clifford and Principal Griffith Jones make the same charge against the great Basel Professor. The Principal speaks of the extent to which the cult of Nietzsche is in the ascendant among the ruling and official people of Germany, and adds:—

> "We are now reaping the consequences of that movement in a harvest of blood and tears. For the German attitude in this war is the translation into action of the theories of that bold and unscrupulous thinker; and it is against Nietzsche that the rest of the world is instinctively under arms."

Dr. Clifford asserts that, according to the Nietzschean philosophy, "ethics are ruled out of the life of States, only naked might remaining." "The superman has arrived, all brawn and brain and without conscience." "Goliath is lord of all." Then comes the elegant conclusion of the whole matter in these words:—

> "This is the incarnation of the philosophy of Nietzsche; the logic of the criminals of Dartmoor; the defence of the barbaric march of the world-conquerors, Attila and Napoleon; and the audaciously proffered vindication of the action of the military caste in Berlin."

What these divines are anxious to impress upon the minds of their people is that the present war owes its origin to the influence of an anti-Christian philosophy, or that it is in no sense a Christian war except on the part of the Allies. They forget that the German Emperor and his court are distinctively Christian, and that with them lies the origin of the war. However numerous Nietzsche's disciples may be in Germany, the fact remains that German militarism has the Kaiser as its head and inspiration. It is to him that the Empire is indebted for its ambitious aims and idealism. It was he who drove Bismarck out of office in order to get the reins of power more fully into his own hands. It was he who gave birth to a world-policy and began to work for a world-Power. And William II. is an orthodox Christian believer and an exceedingly pious man. The German Government has sought to prevent the spread of Freethought within its bounds. If "at the back of a passion for war, wherever it exists, is the denial of morality," then the denial of morality, in the present instance, lies at the door of the German Emperor, a zealous preacher of the Gospel of Christ. Consequently, we declare, without fear of intelligent contradiction, that all the Powers involved in this gigantic conflict are engaged in it in the name of the Christian God, and in oft-expressed dependence upon his direct protection. The attempt to throw the responsibility for this war upon the Nietzschean philosophy is therefore a ludicrous Christian blunder, and to make it at the expense of telling lies about "the mad philosopher" is a heinous crime. It is a complete falsehood to assert that Nietzsche denied morality. So far was he from teaching that morals are obsolete that he posed as an advocate of morality. He denounced, not morality, but slave-morality—the morality that secures the perpetuation of the weak and unfit, and gives undue prominence to pity and compassion. He says:—

Digitized by Google

> "In a tour through the many finer and coarser moralities which have hitherto prevailed or still prevail on the earth, I found certain traits recurring regularly together and connected with one another, until finally two primary types revealed themselves to me, and a radical distinction was brought to light. There is master-morality and slave-morality" (Beyond Good and Evil, p. 227).

Master-morality is a morality that originates in master-minds and seeks to promote the advancement of the human race. Dr. Clifford is guilty of bearing false witness against a great man and a great system when he says that "ethics are ruled out of the life of States," or that "morals are obsolete," the truth being that Nietzsche takes special trouble to emphasise the truth that the welfare of society is the only real ethical end. Many men of God merely infer from the title of the little book just mentioned, Beyond Good and Evil, that the author must be a denier of morality, whereas, if they only carefully perused the work, they would learn that the good and evil he claims to be beyond and above are those stereotyped in a slave-morality. Divines are quite free to disagree with and attack Nietzsche's moral theory; but they commit a moral crime when they deliberately misrepresent it.

A writer in the Christian Commonwealth for September 2 may be fully right when he says that "German militarism is not merely the product of its geographical situation, but a symptom of national aims, an expression of national ideals"; but he is fundamentally mistaken in the statement that it challenges the pacific ideal of Christianity because it has Nietzsche for its philosopher, Treitschke for its historian, and Strauss for its theologian. The curious thing is that, when it suits their convenience, the theologians confidently announce that Professor Eucken, "the greatest thinker in the world," is Germany's present guiding star in philosophy, and Eucken makes a firm profession of Christianity. It is well known that the heretical theologians of Germany, the so-called Liberal Christians, among whom is Professor Harnack, a close friend and admirer of the Kaiser, are second to none in their adherence to what they glory in as the religion of Jesus. Indeed, we have been assured again and again that Nietzsche's influence is greatly on the wane, that his day is past or rapidly passing even in Germany. The writer in the Christian Commonwealth just referred to is of opinon that Germany, "while preparing to found a world-empire, is also preparing to create a world-religion." He says:—

> "No cultured European nation since the French Revolution has made any experiment in creative religion. The experiment which England, with her dull imagination, has recoiled from, Germany will make; the fated task, which England has declined, she will essay."

That is pure speculation, for which there is no foundation in fact; but, whatever we may think of it as such, there is no doubt whatever that the present war is prosecuted in the name of the Prince of Peace, and that the prayers of all the parties to it, except Japan perhaps, are addressed to "Our Father which art in heaven."

J. T. LLOYD.

A God who damns his own creatures for exercising the reason he gave them, proves that he has none left for himself.

The Origin of Supernatural Ideas.—VIII.

(Continued from p. 565.)

> "'Nations, like individuals, have their periods of youth, of manhood, and decay.' Religions are the same. The same inexorable destiny awaits them all. The gods, created by the nations, must perish with their creators. They were created by men, and like men they must pass away. The deities of one age are the bye-words of the next. The religion of our day and country is no more exempt from the sneer of the future than the others have been. When India was supreme, Brahma sat upon the world's throne. When the sceptre passed to Egypt, Isis and Osiris received the homage of mankind. Greece, with her fierce valor, swept to empire, and Jove put on the purple of authority. The earth trembled with the tread of Rome's intrepid sons, and Jupiter grasped with mailed hand the thunderbolts of heaven. Rome fell, and Christians from her territory, with the red sword of war, carved out the ruling nations of the world, and Christ sits upon the old throne. Who will be his successor?"—COLONEL INGERSOLL, "Oration on the Gods," Orations, p. 37.

> "Before God! But God has died! Ye higher men, God was your greatest danger. It is only since He was laid in the grave that ye have risen from the dead. It is now only that the noonday arrives, it is now only that the higher man becomes—master. Take heart, ye higher men! Now for the first time the mountain of man's future is in travail. God is dead; we now want—the overman to live."—NIETZSCHE; cited by Dr. Common in Nietzsche as Critic, etc., p. 132.

> "Thou art judged, O judge, and the sentence is gone forth against thee, O God.
> Thy slave that slept is awake; thy slave but slept for a span;
> Yea, man thy slave shall unmake thee, who made thee lord over man."
>
> —SWINBURNE, Hymn of Man.

THE peculiarities that so easily distinguish the negro from the European, both in mind and body, are the result of the environment in which he lives. Major Ellis, whose testimony we have cited, and who is one of the greatest authorities on the subject, also observes:—

> "Joachim Monteiro, indeed, in his work on Angola and the River Congo, attributes the 'rudimentary character of the negro intellect' entirely to climate, and holds that countless ages of battling with malaria have produced, by a process of natural selection, a peculiar insensibility of both mind and body, which now admits of his inhabiting, with comparative impunity, regions which are deadly to the white and more highly organised races."*

Major Ellis also cites the weighty opinion of Professor Waitz, who holds very similar views, and observes, in the Introduction to his Anthropology:—

> "The comparatively low degree of civilisation among the negroes may be chiefly explained by the relaxing effects of the climate, the geographical position of those regions, the few requirements as regards dress, food, and habitation, all of which nature yields in abundance, and are obtainable by the simplest efforts. A high degree of intellectual development, deep thought, and a refined morality seem scarcely compatible with the mental prostration which life in torrid zones produces in the European as well as in the native. Human art will hardly ever overcome the power of these natural obstructions."

It will be as well at this point to make a digression to consider the much-vaunted claims of missionaries as to the civilising influence of the religion taught by them to the natives; and as two million pounds a year are spent by this country alone in missions, there ought to be some return for the money.

The theory the Churches and the missions work upon is that conversion to their peculiar beliefs has a civilising influence; that the convert is regenerated—spiritually "born again" is their mystical description of the process. Now, it is a fact—and all the rhetoric of the missionaries cannot explain it away—that the converted negro is not made a better man by conversion, but a very much worse one. No one in Africa would think of employing a mission boy. We have produced much evidence on this point in these columns at different times, which is confirmed by Major Ellis, who says that "the expenditure of large sums of money by various philan-

* A. B. Ellis, The Tshi-Speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast of West Africa, pp. 6-7.

Digitized by Google

thropic societies, and the exertions of missionaries and teachers of all denominations, have failed to do more than impose a mere veneer of civilisation upon the inhabitants of Sierra Leone, and then only upon a small minority, and this after a century of labor" (p. 7). "For," as he further remarks, "it is not the religion that is the cause of the civilisation, but rather the higher stage of civilisation that gives birth to higher religious ideas" (p. 10).

Thus it is not religion that these primitive people require. To relinquish their superstitions for those of the missionary would only place them in the position of the gentleman who abjured the errors of the Church of Rome to embrace those of the Church of England. On the other hand, if you civilise these people in the first instance, then they can do without the religion. The Japanese adopted Western civilisation, but refused to have anything to do with our religion; and in the march to Pekin, to relieve the Legations, they showed by their conduct to the Chinese a far higher morality than the representatives of the Christian nations who accompanied them.

As the historian Buckle pointed out long ago:—

> "Whoever will compare the triumphant reports of the missionaries with the long chain of evidence supplied by competent travellers, will find that such profession is only nominal, and that these ignorant tribes have adopted, indeed, the ceremonies of the new religion, but have by no means adopted the religion itself. .....The rites and forms of a religion lie on the surface; they are at once seen, they are quickly learned, easily copied by those who are unable to penetrate to that which lies beneath. It is this deeper and inward change which alone is durable; and this the savage can never experience while he is sunk in an ignorance that levels him with the brutes by which he is surrounded."*

The truth is the natives take over the forms and ceremonies of the new religion without relinquishing their own beliefs. Miss Kingsley tells us: "For the African, whose mind has been soaked in Fetish during his early most impressionable years, the voice of Fetish is almost irresistible when affliction comes upon him." And, speaking of the mission converts, she observes: "How many of these earnest people could one guarantee to have completely cast out their belief in Ju-Juism? If I were put upon my oath to answer truthfully according to my individual belief, I am afraid my answer would be, Not one."† And although Miss Kingsley, who shows a great deal of sympathy with the natives—much more than most Europeans who have known them—thinks, in spite of a mass of evidence, that it is too much to say that the African will never advance above his present level, yet she declares:—

> "I am certain they will never advance above it in the line of European culture. The country he lives in is unfitted for it, and the nature of the man himself is all against it—the truth is the West Coast mind has got a great deal too much superstition about it, and too little of anything else. Our own methods of instruction have not been of any real help to the African, because what he wants teaching is how to work."‡

Therefore the money spent in the attempt to Christianise these natives might just as well be taken out and dropped into the ocean for any good it does.

As Mr. King observes, under the newly adopted religion the old spiritual conceptions survive.

> "The fetish still lives, and the Obi mysteries are still rehearsed, though the black devotee raises his hands in pious acknowledgment of the blessings he receives from Allah, or worships with the white man in the Methodist communion. The same cry comes from the missionary to the Zulu, from the remote shores of Patagonia, from the humble teachers of the Eskimo in Greenland or Labrador; even the attentive and pious Australian aborigine maiden, scarce from her birth out of the higher influence, flies from the greater civilisation to revel in the bora association. As it was in the ancient days, so it is now; like forms of spirit influence still retain their prestige; the gods of the vulgar never die; they still claim the reverence of like fears, and like superstitious rites, as when they were the only known local supernal powers."*

Let us consider the religious ideas prevalent to-day among ourselves. What are they but a crude Anthropomorphism? That is a long word, but it has a very simple meaning. It is composed of two Greek words, meaning "man-like" and "form"; and Anthropomorphism in religion means that God is conceived of as being like a man. Nor is this to be wondered at when every child derives his religious notions from the Bible, where we are told that the Almighty was tired, "and on the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed" (Ex. xxxi. 17); that he walked and talked in the Garden of Eden "in the cool of the day" (Gen. iii. 8), choosing the "cool of the day" because umbrellas and sun-helmets had not been invented then. He possessed a nose, for when Noah offered a burnt sacrifice "the Lord smelled a sweet savor" (Gen. viii. 21). He was evidently not infinite—that is, everywhere at once—omniscient or all-knowing—for we learn that when the Tower of Babel was being built "the Lord came down" (Gen. xi. 5) to see for himself what was going on, and, there being no architect to tell him that the thing would collapse when it reached a certain height, he sent a confusion of tongues, lest the builders should carry it up to heaven. Finally, he had the bodily form of a man, for Moses had the dubious honor of being shown his "back parts" (Ex. xxxiii. 23). In other places we learn that he was jealous, vain, and shockingly revengeful.

Moreover, man, by the limitations of the human mind, is incapable of conceiving God in any other manner. The Greek philosopher Xenophanes, five hundred years before Christ, arguing against the superstition of his countrymen, observed:—

> "It appears to mortals that the gods are like them in form, apparel, and language. The negroes serve black gods with flat noses, the Thracians gods with blue eyes and red hair. If the oxen and lions had hands to fashion images, they would give the gods a bovine or leonine shape."

Ludwig Feuerbach observed that "If God were an object to the bird, he would be a winged being: the bird knows nothing higher, nothing more blissful, than the winged condition."† And, as Buchner well remarks, "No one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach," who declared "God is the self-consciousness of man. Man created God in his own image."‡

W. MANN.

(To be concluded.)

Bible Makers.—IV.

RUTH, SAMUEL, AND DAVID.

SANDWICHED between Judges and Samuel is the Book of Ruth. How it came to be incorporated in the Bible it would be difficult to tell without great faith and a prayerful spirit; and unless we suppose that some lewd fellow, thinking a little more pruriency would be an improvement, by some dexterous and surreptitious means slipped the book in, there is no accounting for its appearance among the sacred writings at all. It is, however, a pretty love story. It tells of a poor simple girl from the country, who came up to town to see her cousin Boaz, and, having successfully repelled the advancements of numerous young men who were infatuated with her charms, steals slily to bed with her cousin, who blesses her for her unselfish kindness, and ultimately rewards her by making her his wife. As no more mention is made of them, we will be generous enough to suppose that they lived happily ever after. If Miss Ruth, however, wrote this delightfully brief autobiographical sketch, it must be confessed that she

* Buckle, History of Civilisation, p. 145 (1904).
† Miss Kingsley, West African Studies, pp. 125-482.
‡ Miss Kingsley, Travels in West Africa, p. 513.

* J. H. King, The Supernatural, pp. 236-7.
† Ludwig Feuerbach, Essence of Christianity, p. 17.
‡ Buchner, Force and Matter, pp. 393-4.

Digitized by Google

was as candid in revealing her failings as Jean Jacques Rousseau was in revealing his, if, indeed, she meant this little business with her cousin to be considered as an iniquity at all. Then we come to Samuel. He was the son of Elkanah. He wrote a book, or a number of books, and followed his predecessor Moses's example, in being careful to give a full account of his own death and burial. His father was described as "a certain man of Ramathaim Zophim and Mount Ephraim." Most fathers are "certain men." He gives an account of a man named Saul, who was seeking his father's asses which had gone astray. The children of Israel at the same time were in search of a king. The asses were found, so was Saul, who was at once anointed by Samuel who, from an early age, was a prophet of the Lord.

His early appointment to this profession took place in this wise; he received a "call" from the Lord, who, hiding himself in an obscure corner of the sky, had an inoffensive game at bo-peep with the child Samuel, and after allowing the lad to make a couple of wrong guesses as to who it was that had called him, permitted him to guess correctly the third time and thus save his bacon, and become a perpetual prophet of the Lord of Hosts ever after.

Samuel faithfully recorded the lives of such illustrious kings as Saul and David, and gave a graphic description of the unequal encounter between David and Goliath, in which he showed how easy it was for a little boy, with a sling and a stone, to kill a giant; and, further, how difficult it is for a harpist—a Jew harpist—by dulcet strains of music to soothe the savage breast of a king, after having taken from him the favor of the people. Samuel also demonstrates that a high degree of mental culture was not an indispensable accomplishment of a prophet.

David prophesied upon a harp; many of the people prophesied with cymbals and with song; and some, no doubt, produced the same result upon the banjo, or with the tom-tom or the bones; but King Saul put them all to the blush. Finding that everybody was going in for prophesying, he divested himself of all his raiment, and lay on his back and prophesied as hard as any of them. This, as a faithful historian, the prophet Samuel has faithfully set down, not in a spirit of malice or uncharitableness, but in that of candor and truth, that ordinary folk might understand some of the strange doings of the godly.

Samuel's account of the life of David is filled with interest. If only the letters of David to his various mistresses had been preserved, what a splendid addition they would have made to this fascinating biographical sketch! Great affection, unselfish devotion, David unquestionably displayed towards Jonathan; but how infinitely small it was compared with the unbounded love he showed towards the wives of Nabal and Uriah. David robbed, outraged, and murdered wherever he went; and in true prophetic strain Samuel described him as a "man after God's own heart," clearly showing that he knew the character of the Jewish God very well; and he therefore represented David as much "after the image of his Maker" as possible. It was said that David, at the end of his career, repented; but so have many other pious murderers—at the rope's end.

The Books of Kings and Chronicles, which are merely a combination or repetition of the stories of Samuel, I pass over, as also the Book of Job, a Gentile production, which deserves to be considered on its merits, apart altogether from the place it occupies in men's minds on account of being one of the books of the Bible.

We come now to the Psalms of David, which throw a flood of light upon the inner life of the king and prophet. They are a collection of songs—not comic—mostly expressive of praise to Deity. What many-sidedness of nature these poetic expressions disclose! What great piety, combined with consummate rascality — what unctuousness, covering the imperious dogmatism of a king and a priest!

How anxious David is that the religious shall have no "fellowship with the ungodly"; that the Lord shall rebuke the unbeliever and afflict him with great suffering!

David's God was essentially a butcher and a king. Give heed to this poetic strain:—

> "O clap your hands, all ye people; shout unto God with the voice of triumph.
>
> "For the Lord most high is terrible; he is a great king over all the earth.
>
> "He shall subdue the people under us, and the nations under our feet.
>
> "He shall choose our inheritance for us, the excellency of Jacob whom he loved. Selah" (Psalm xlvii.).

As for the Atheist, David loathed him with every drop of his blood. He regarded him as a fool, and said as much. Most people call those persons names whom they cannot answer.

> "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. Corrupt are they, and have done abominable iniquity; there is none that doeth good" (Psalm liii.).

In a more humble mood was the Psalmist when he penned the following:—

> "Lord, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty: neither do I exercise myself in great matters, or in things too high for me.
>
> "Surely I have behaved and quieted myself, as a child that is weaned of his mother: my soul is even as a weaned child.
>
> "Let Israel hope in the Lord from henceforth and for ever" (Psalm cxxxi.).

But in his true colors David is seen when, from the depths of his fiendish heart, he gives vent to his views as to how God should treat those who had been his (David's) and God's enemies:—

> "Set thou a wicked man over him, and let Satan stand at his right hand.
>
> "When he shall be judged let him be condemned, and let his prayer become sin.
>
> "Let his days be few and let another take his office; let his children be fatherless, and his wife a widow.
>
> "Let his children be continually vagabonds and beg; let them seek their bread also out of their desolate places.
>
> "Let the extortioner catch all that he hath, and let the strangers spoil his labor.
>
> "Let there be none to extend mercy unto him; neither let there be any to favor his fatherless children.
>
> "Let his posterity be cut off, and in the generation following let his name be blotted out. Let the iniquities of his fathers be remembered with the Lord, and let not the sin of his mother be blotted out."

Oh, what a difference between the sentiments of the Atheist poet Shelley and the Theist poet David! The one wrote for the ignorant and cruel and despotic people of ages that have gone; the other, in incomparably grand verse, breathed the pure and lofty sentiments of the humanity of the future.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

It is far more important to love your wife than to love God, and I will tell you why. You cannot help him, but you can help her. You can fill her life with the perfume of perpetual joy. It is far more important that you love your children than that you love Jesus Christ. And why? If he is God, you cannot help him, but you can plant a little flower of happiness in every footstep of the child, from the cradle until you die in that child's arms. Let me tell you to-day it is far more important to build a home than to erect a church. The holiest temple beneath the stars is a home that love has built. And the holiest altar in all the wide world is the fireside around which gather father and mother and the sweet babes.—Ingersoll.

To die is one of two things; for either the dead may be annihilated and have no sensation of anything whatever, or, as it is said, there is a certain change of passage of the soul from one place to another (metempsychosis). If it is a privation of all sensation, as it were a sleep in which the sleeper has no dream, death would be a wonderful gain; for this futurity appears to be nothing more than one night.—Socrates.

The palace of the Bishop of Llandaff has been destroyed by fire. There is no cause for undue alarm. There is no possibility of his Lordship, like his poor Master, not knowing where to lay his head.

Digitized by Google

Acid Drops.

The dear old Daily News is gushing away as usual on the War. A gentleman who signs himself "A. G. G." (no doubt the editor) is turned on to do the double-extra piety. Under the title of "The God of Blood and Iron" this gentleman treated his Nonconformist public the other morning to some unctuous silliness which he should have been ashamed to write as they should have been ashamed to read. The writer tries to make out that Germany's mean and horrid treatment of Belgium is due to "infidelity." "Belgium," he says, "has been desolated in cold blood, on calculated principles, by a nation of philosophers and intellectuals." Mr. Gardner must have written this with his tongue in his cheek. He knows very well that the Kaiser is notorious for his piety, which is of the true-blue Protestant persuasion; and that the name of God is always upon his lips. The Kaiserin, too, has built more Protestant churches in Berlin than the whole city fills. Is it not infamous, then, to ascribe this imperial bigot's wanton cruelties to the influence of the "philosophers and intellectuals"—that is to say, to the Freethinkers of Germany? It reminds us of the compelling of poor Simon to carry the cross of Jesus. When the Christians are caught with a load of evil on their backs they shuffle it off on the shoulders of the Freethinker. "It doesn't belong to us," they say; "he put it there."

Lord Rosebery's appeal for volunteer soldiers to fight the battle of England in the present war was mixed with a reference to the "just God" who is on our side. Well, if God is to settle the matter, after all, we may as well leave it in his hands. Why should we trouble? It will go his way at the finish. The victory will be by prayer and not by fighting. This is recognised in Berlin as well as in London. The English church in that city bears a notice that the services may go on there as usual during the war, but prayers must not be offered up for the success of the British arms.

Mr. Gardner wants us to believe that the people who put up that notice are Atheists—or something of that sort. There is nothing too idiotically absurd for Christian advocates nowadays.

Mr. Robert Blatchford has never been quite able to drop "God." He says he is not an Atheist but an Agnostic—which is a distinction without a difference. He is now declaring, in the Weekly Dispatch, that Kipling did not discover (or should it be invent?) Tommy Atkins. Nor did anybody else except R. B. He alone did it. "I discovered Tommy Atkins," he says, "for the first time in the Vale of the White Horse in 1809, and I thanked God." Has he had an acknowledgment yet?

Mr. Asquith goes down to the City of London one day—with Mr. Bonar Law, Mr. Balfour, and Mr. Churchill—and pleads with the people of England to join the Army and save the nation. You would think they were saints and heroes. The next day the "pubs." are shut early—and the practice is to be continued—in order to keep these saints and heroes from getting drunk. Something is wrong somewhere.

Practically every paper in the country is now a war sheet. Naturally, the keenest interest displayed is in war news, and everyone is deeply concerned with the news—good or bad. But that hardly seems a sufficient reason for all the papers dropping all their ordinary articles and giving nothing else but war news. That policy seems calculated to encourage what should be our chief concern to avoid—panic. And nervous people who read the papers can hardly avoid a "panicky" frame of mind at present. If "business as usual" is a sound policy, we think the press should set an example by retaining some of its old features, and giving a little less than ten or twelve pages of war news—half of which is sheer repetition. In this connection, and as one way of avoiding panic, we are glad to see the Home Office issuing a warning concerning the spy mania. This document states that there has been no actual case of outrage brought to the notice of either police or military, that all the reports of attacks on police constables, sentries, etc., are lacking in truth, and there have been no discoveries of secret arsenals. We hope this statement will serve as a check upon the imagination of journalists, and allay the fears of nervous people.

"At this critical hour," says the Christian Commonwealth, "people are looking to the Christian pulpit for light and guidance." Rubbish! People are doing nothing of the kind. Indeed, one of the striking features of the situation, and one which shows how much of their hold on the people the Churches have lost, is that very few people are paying the slightest attention to the clergy. In the more pressing business before the nation the clergy have been shouldered out of the picture. Of course, there were plenty of special services in connection with the war, and the clergy have done their share—perhaps more than their share—of talking. But to suggest that the people are looking to the Churches for guidance is supremely ridiculous. Listen to conversations in 'bus or tram, speak to the people one meets, and then see how much they are thinking of the clergy as guides.

"Our world has passed away, In wantonness o'erthrown," sings Mr. Rudyard Kipling. We thought something was wrong, but we do not seem to be living in heaven.

We notice that the days of intercession arranged by the officials of the Government religion were also observed by some of the fancy religionists, including the Nonconformists and Roman Catholics. Adversity makes strange bed-fellows.

"Nothing German" is a bellicose notice displayed in shop-windows, which we hope booksellers will not imitate. We cannot afford to exchange Goethe and Heine for Miss Marie Corelli and Mr. Charles Garvice.

Poets have the privilege of poetic licence. Mr. Rudyard Kipling chants "There is but one task for all, For each one life to give." If this sage advice were taken, the earth would be depopulated, and there would be no Kiplings to amuse us in troublous times.

The whirligig of war has brought in many revenges. It has changed that hero of a hundred tea-fights, the Bishop of London, into a six-weeks' soldier.

Piety appears to be very closely related to patriotism, but if you want to get the quintessence of Christian emotionalism, you will find it in the pages of the Daily Telegraph and the Daily Express, the proprietors of which both belong to good old English families.

Many years ago a book was published with the title Guesses at Truth. It would not be a bad headline for the war news in the paper, for most of the paragraphs appear to be as true as the Gospels. As far as we can see, the correspondent who gets to the telegraph wires first, claims the victory for his side.

We are informed by the Catholic Herald for September 5 that the late Pope "breathed his last affecting sigh over the world's wickedness, and died because he could not persuade the rulers of men to keep peace among themselves and their subjects." As a matter of fact, Pope Pius X. was of no account in the council of nations. As God's vicegerent on earth, he did his utmost to prevent the war, writing "the most pathetic letters" to the rulers of men, "imploring them to spare the Christian peoples. Those letters were not delivered, or not read, or, at all events, were disregarded." Thus the Holy Father was thrust aside, and when the end came, the sad conviction lay like iron in his soul, that "what was called society was lapsing into unbelief."

Principal Griffith-Jones says that "pure Darwinism spells pure egoism" That is the utterance of a man who does not know what "pure Darwinism" is, which is proved to the hilt by the fact that the same man of God speaks of "the crudely Darwinian philosophy that once prevailed." Not one essential element in the Darwinian theory has been discarded by present-day biologists. Even the Mendelists are as firm believers in Natural Selection as was Darwin himself. Now, Dr. Griffith-Jones is perfectly well aware that orthodox Christianity seeks to suppress all egoism. Has he not often heard the prayer, "O! to be nothing," offered up at revival meetings, and does he not know that, apart from true egoism, true altruism is a natural impossibility?

Principal Griffith-Jones, a mediocre Nonconformist divine, imagines, in his abysmal ignorance, that he is competent to sit in judgment upon and demolish so subtle, nimble, independent, original, profound, and brilliant a thinker as Nietzsche. Condescendingly he allows that, as "a needful corrective of the 'soft' tendencies of much modern speculation, Nietzscheism has its undoubted place, and has done good work," but haughtily contends that "the sublimatic and refined but truculent self-assertion which was Nietzsche's central principle of thought and conduct is a hopeless anachronism." Such supercilious criticism only shows how utterly unequal to his self-chosen task the reverend gentleman is. He does not even understand what the Nietzschean philosophy really stands for, any more than he can tell us what "sublimatic" means. Only an ignoramus could have applied the adjective "truculent" to such a system. Nietzsche was an ardent lover of vigorous life, and of power when justly acquired and wisely exercised. The central and grandest quality in his philosophy is "justice," which, as we all know, occupies a very secondary position in the Christian scheme.

Digitized by Google

Clearly Dr. Griffith-Jones is equally unacquainted with Nietzsche's "conduct," in which there was certainly nothing "truculent." Has he never read how ardent was this "truculent" fellow's patriotism, how deep his inner sympathy for private soldiers—"les âmes les plus délaissées"; how, during the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, he abandoned his professorial work at Basel and went to assist in the ambulance corps; how he tended the wounded with zealous care, and carried out his duties at the cost of a serious illness? Even the British Weekly, to its honor be it said, published these facts a few years ago in a review of a new Life by Daniel Halévy.

"Both England and Germany are nominally Protestant countries," says the Christian Commonwealth, "but their Protestantism has worked out in very different directions." The difference, as stated, appears to be this. England is concerned "with peaceful government of an empire long since acquired." In Germany "the dominant" interests have been those of expansion rather than consolidation. We quite fail to see any substantial difference here. This only means that Germany is trying to acquire, as England has already acquired. But their Protestantism appears to have led both along the same direction—in that of seizing and controlling, rather than in the direction of developing friendly intercourse. For over two hundred years the nations of Europe have been battling for the ownership of colonies and the control of markets, and so far their religion, whether Protestant or Catholic, has quite failed to direct that competition into friendly instead of militant channels. Not only has it failed in this, but the influence of Christianity in every country has been given to the encouragement of conditions that make such an outbreak as the present war, sooner or later, inevitable. In both Germany and England the Protestant Church gives the Government of the country to which it belongs the same unhesitating support. And that fact alone is enough to show its worthlessness as an instrument for the moral betterment of the world.

The Christian Commonwealth adds, "It may well shake the faith of some if, in such a contest, God does not decisively declare against the doctrine that might is right; if broken treaties, and civilisation outraged, and all the horrors of war forced upon innocent people go unavenged." Here is all the old Christian cant served up anew. How often in the past has might overcome right? And if God allowed it then, why should he not allow it now? And if it occurred once more, why should that shape religious faith to-day more than it has done in the past? The question of might versus right is not a matter of chronology. When the Germans overran France in 1870 did that prove they were in the right, or did it prove that they possessed the best fighting machine? The Germans could not do better than they are doing, even if they had right on their side, they will not do worse because they have not. And, after all, the Kaiser is very confident that God is on his side. He is as good a Christian as anyone that is opposed to him. Whether he is as good a man is quite another question.

If God wished "to decisively" declare that he was on the side of right against might, he had a magnificent opportunity when the Germans invaded Belgium. Here was a people who had done nothing to injure Germany. They were guiltless of offence—at least, there only offence was a geographical one; that, and having the courage to stand up for their rights. Yet God has allowed Belgium to be overrun; its cities destroyed; its men, women, and children murdered. And now, when the Allies defeat Germany, we shall be informed that God has vindicated might against right. Absurd! How can the defeat and humiliation of Germany make good the horrors through which Belgium has passed? Is there a single Belgian who has had his home and family destroyed that will feel the defeat of Germany compensates him for his loss? So far as that mass of suffering is concerned, might and not right is triumphant. If God wished to prove that might could not stand against right he had his opportunity when the German troops attacked Liege. He should have blasted the Kaiser's armies then. Their defeat after months of carnage and brutality can only prove that in "God's world" right plus might is effective. Right minus might is of small account—so far as God is concerned.

Rev. W. E. Orchard has joined the prophets. The whole mechanical explanation of nature, he says, will appear in the next generation as one of the most amazing blunders in the world of thought. Will appear; not does appear. Had Dr. Orchard spoken in the present tense, he might have been asked to prove it. To speak in the future tense is a much safer plan. For our part, we are quite content with the fact that the "mechanical" conception of nature is simply universal in the world of science. "Mechanical" is not, by the way, a good term; it has too many misleading connotations. "Causational" is a much better term to express the truth that in nature every phenomenon is the product of all preceding conditions. This is not only the ruling conception in the world of science; it is inevitable to all systematic thinking. Even theologians cannot escape it. Even though matter were not ultimate, but, as some theologians assert, there is beyond that a world of "spirit," the position remains substantially unchanged. All that occurs would still be due to the action and interaction of the properties of this "spiritual" substance. Whether we believe in "spirit" or "matter," the principle of universal causation remains as the indispensable condition of scientific thinking. And so long as that is established the case for Theism is hopeless.

Dr. Orchard asks, "If this universe is a purposeless machine without a mind to guide, how much longer will man be content to be one of its cogs? Is it possible to content his mind, his aspirations, his strivings after better things, with a life and destiny which are the mockery of his whole nature?" Content whose mind? One might paraphrase the question by asking, Is it possible to content one whose whole nature cries out for some alcoholic stimulant with water, tea, or ginger-beer? One would have to answer, No. But one would also add that the craving itself pointed to a more or less unhealthy condition of the organism, and the chief thing was to create counter desires in a healthier direction. So in reply to Dr. Orchard. It may be quite true that a man brought up under strong religious influences will feel that without religion life would not be worth living. But this does not mean that we must fall in with his view of life. On the contrary, what we have to do is to bring him to realise that the craving after better things may receive full satisfaction after all specifically religious beliefs have been rejected. It is the problem of the alcoholist over again. And the real test of the value of religion is not found in those who say they cannot live without it, but in those who do, and are none the worse for its absence.

Sir William Lever says it is depressing to find that Christians, after preaching the gospel of peace and goodwill for nearly twenty centuries should now be at war with each other. It is depressing; but that ought to lead thoughtful men and women to query the value of a preaching that has borne so little fruit. The fact is that Christians have preached goodwill, and practised its opposite. They have praised peace, and made every possible preparation—material and mental—for war. And when nations prepare for war they will, sooner or later, have it.

What Secularists these Christians are! In the current issue of Home Words, a pious periodical circulating in thousands of parishes, nearly two pages are devoted to such sacred subjects as pea-soup, plum-pudding, roly-poly, mince-meat, fig pudding, and similar culinary delicacies. Perhaps they are meant to be "sweets" after "the bread of life." As the pill advertisers are also in evidence in the magazine, doubtless the editor anticipates some of his readers overeating.

Pious versifiers are busy invoking the Deity concerning the alleged killing of children in the present war. When the reports are confirmed, it will be high time to write poems; but religious folk might reflect that it is not irreligious persons who imagine that unchristened babies are damned through all eternity by the "God of all Christians."

One would think that "Thou shalt not kill" and "Forgive your enemies" were in the Analects of Confucius, and not in the Christian Bible. At Southend-on-Sea the Church Army band has been playing the recruits to the railway station, and among those who have joined the colors are members of the Salvation Army.

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £201 15s. 0d. Received since:—R. C. Proctor, 2s. 6d.; Anglo Italian Secularist, 2s. 6d.; Charles and Collis Cade, 10s.; A. Firth, 5s.; A Few Workers (per M. Beagling), 8s. 6d.; C. J., £3.

C. AND C. CADE.—Thanks for your pleasant and encouraging letter.

J. D.—"Peace on Earth" is hardly up to our mark.

MILDRED WINTERS (Canada).—Glad to have your letter, but the political aspect of the matter is of course tabu in our columns.

W. P. BALL.—Thanks for cuttings.

E. B.—Always welcome.

RAMSEY TESTIMONIAL FUND.—We have received:—C. J., £1.; R. Gibbon, 5s.

R. C. PROCTOR.—Your N. S. S. sub. is passed over to the Secretary.

ANGLO-ITALIAN SECULARIST.—(1) Our correspondents should not give themselves great historic names. We object to answering Cæsars, Cromwells, etc. They give a comic aspect to the "Correspondents" column. (2) Never trust Cassell's or other orthodox Cyclopædias in relation to dead Freethinkers.

W. J. MOLINEUX.—The reverend gentleman's remarks had been dealt with by anticipation. Pleased you think this journal "delightful."

M. BEAGLING.—Thanks to yourself and friends for "a tribute to what they know to be good work for the best of all causes. Back numbers forwarded for free distribution.

R. GIBSON.—We should be very pleased to see you by appointment. You would probably waste your time by calling at a venture.

C. J.—May all your good wishes be realised.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote's engagement at the Birmingham Town Hall on Sunday, November 1, is cancelled. The great hall is being used for drilling and other military purposes. Mr. Foote's visit, therefore, is postponed indefinitely.

Pious folk pretend never to have heard of Mr. Foote, but, somehow, their innocence is not so filmy-eyed as that of prattling childhood. A religious publisher has issued a book with the title, Bible Heroes. Of course, the book is not Mr. Foote's, but the fat will be in the fire if the wholesale booksellers supply Mr. Foote's publication instead of the other one.

An Outdoor Demonstration has been arranged for Sunday, September 13, in lieu of the ordinary lectures in Finsbury and Regent's Parks. The speakers will include Messrs. C. Cohen, C. E. Ratcliffe, W. Davidson, A. D. Howell-Smith, and Miss Kough. The brake, kindly supplied, as on former occasions, by Mr. Edwin Wilson, will be in position at Finsbury Park at 3 o'clock sharp, and at Regent's Park at 5 p.m. There should be a good rally of North London Freethinkers at both stations.

The September Humanitarian contains a good article on the War, and a fine one on Schopenhauer's "Basis of Morality." We heartily commend this little monthly (organ of the Humanitarian League) to the attention of our own readers.

The English Review for September opens with a fine poem on "August, 1914," by Mr. John Masefeld. We like him better in this vein than in the turbulent and (may we say so?—raw one) on which his fame mainly depends. The most noticeable of the rest of the contents is a reprint of Mr. Frederic Harrison's article from the January, 1913, number—warning England against the German menace. Prophets are apt to forget that prophecy is not an exact science, and that many prophecies come true in the course of what may be called accident. Mr. Harrison's article, however, is well worth reading again. The editor's contribution is very ably written, and "hits the nail on the head." The Kaiser started with his Kruger telegram and has been going war-mad ever since. English publicists might have the courage to point out that this could only have happened under a Monarchy. Shelley's "King-deluded Germany" still holds the field as the poetico-philosophic description of the great central European nation from a political point of view.

The Secretary of the Camberwell Branch, N. S. S., asks us to remind readers that, in consequence of the earlier closing of Brockwell Park, lectures from Sunday next, till end of season, will commence at 5 p.m.

Cardinal della Chiesa is the new Pope, and his election to the post seems to give satisfaction. Man for man, we prefer him to the Kaiser. What he might be if the Catholic Church had its old power we do not know, but as things are (and it is no good talking about anything else) the Pope beats the Kaiser hollow from a humanitarian point of view. The Protestant monarch talks and acts like a brutal egotist. For years he has been boasting of his intention of smiting down whoever didn't agree with him, and now he is doing it. He is practising brigandage by murder (and something worse) on a colossal scale; and he will never stop until he is beaten down, for the appetite for that sort of thing grows by what it feeds on. But the new Pope, coming into office amidst all this horror of deliberate bloodshed and desolation, shudders at the prospect. One is not surprised to hear him say so in his first message to the world. We quote the following from the Rome correspondent of a London newspaper:—

> "Immediately after he was elected, the Pope said he could not imagine how his frail being would be capable of enduring the weight of the enormous responsibility thrown on his shoulders, especially at a moment when almost all the countries of Europe were stained with blood. The war had armed the faithful against the faithful, while the priests and bishops of each country had to offer prayers for the success of the arms of their own nation; but the victory of one side meant the slaughter of the other, a destruction of children equally dear to the paternal heart of the Pontiff."

Freethinkers will chuckle over the Pope's perception of the absurdity of rival nations praying to the same God for victory; but they will recognise that the avowal of it in the open daylight of publicity does him credit. For the rest, we are not bigoted; we like to see all influences working on the right side in this dreadful crisis; and are glad to see even the Pope talking the language of sense and humanity.

What Protestant priest of any eminence has done this? Those who say that Protestantism is in itself better than Catholicism are talking nonsense out of ignorance. Protestantism is better than Catholicism, but not in the sense in which they mean the statement. Protestantism is better than Catholicism in the sense that the less religion you have the better—just as a mild attack of fever is better than a severe attack of fever. Protestantism has all the harsh features of Catholicism, with none of its grace and tenderness. Hell and damnation belong to both, but not the adoration of motherhood, symbolised in the Virgin and Child—the holy conception (really holy) into which so many great artists have poured the splendor of their genius—and which every evolutionist knows is the vital secret of all human culture. Catholicism did not invent the worship of the divine mother and child, but Catholicism adopted it, while Protestantism (especially of the Kaiser's sort) spits upon it. As for absurd superstition, Protestant men of God pray to him for victory in war, just as Catholic men of God do. From that point of view they are all in the same (ridiculous) business.

This is not a bad time for our friends to push the circulation of the Freethinker. Something really sensible, not only about this war, but about all wars, is uncommon enough to attract a good many people if it were only introduced to their notice.

After the first "knock" caused by the war, our circulation has suffered very little. If anything, indeed, it has been going up a little. But this always was a peculiar journal. We hope to be able to maintain our present size, even if we have to print on an inferior paper. It will be a triumph if we have to make no change at all. But the price of things keeps going up.

Digitized by Google

The Heart of the Rose.

LIKE most preachers, he spoke under the influence of the delusion that all his hearers believed in the ideas upon which he placed his faith. Consequently, his sermon was thoroughly dogmatic throughout. Nothing he said required weighing in the balance of truth and error. Everything he said was right. It never occurred to him that some of the members of the congregation considered him an unmitigated ass. It never seemed to dawn upon his vision that, perchance, he was not so much an ass as a fool. He sailed from one open port, across a very calm sea, to another open port; and before he asked God to bless and fructify the words he had just spoken, he wiped his forehead with a silk handkerchief, and sighed heavily; and then he sat down to rest awhile.

His sermon was entitled "The Rose of Christianity"; and, after a few remarks upon roses in general, went something like this:

You may have little appreciation of flowers; you may regard roses with as much respect as you give the down-trodden daises of the fields; but you cannot quell the conquering admiration this flower of flowers awakens within you. You cannot negligently overlook it. You cannot treat it with indifference. You cannot remark unconcernedly upon its beauty and pass on, more or less disinterestedly, to something else. You cannot, try as you may, subdue the glow of delight that suffuses your soul when its loveliness first fascinates you, and you feel your more animalistic senses becoming lulled into slumber by its aroma.

You must regard it with awe and wonderment. You must recognise that all other flowers are as leaves of grass, even as straw, compared to it; you must be conscious of the divine inspiration of its creation. You cannot help yourself. The beauty of it dulls your critical power, as it negates the apathy of the careless. Though your mind be full of facts relative to its growth and history, and your reason inclined towards doubt, there is still the warm corner of your heart that tells you of the beneficent influence of the rose of Christianity; how it has sweetened and gladdened life. Behind your knowledge of the erring ways of its votaries, behind your knowledge of the weaknesses of its lovers, weaknesses you, too often, call its failures and shortcomings, there lies the silent admission of the great charm of it. Its tender loveliness, its dignity and grace, its quiet majesty, all evoke an admiration you vainly endeavor to hide.

Its ethereal nature gives suggestiveness to your wonder and awe; the many unpleasant things in the lives of its apostles are forgotten; and from your thoughts and dreams arise convictions. Nothing else on earth is like it. Nothing else is so lovely. Nothing else shows so clearly that there is something within it we do not rightly understand.

One step only, and we are with God. Then we understand. And the rose of Christianity, as you stand in worshipful attitude before it, your mind picturing its age, its power, its influence, its supremacy; your eyes seeing, in the figures of time, its claims to greatness; your ears listening to the low music of its invisibly moving petals, hearing the voices of the many martyrs who gave their lives for its love; your nostrils dilating with the subtle incense of its breath—the rose of Christianity waves a wand over you; doubts and fears disappear; you see the glory of God. The rose of Christianity enslaves you to make you free. You are impelled by a mysterious power to seek what your will may deny, but what your soul rejoices to own. And so on, till one got sick.

It may be very nice, all this romantic stuff; but the worm of it is in its untruthfulness. Lies can be told so easily. Falsehood arrayed in solemnity often carries more weight than truth spoken royally. Any quack can gather a crowd and keep his audience if his tongue be nimble enough in following his imagination; and priests are only a portion of the quack class after all.

Christianity may be a blossom on the rose-tree of life; but to call it the most perfect is to forget that many a rose has withered and dropped into oblivion long before this particular one opened its petals to the light. To prate about its glorious beauty, saying it is the flower of flowers, is to forget that the tree is old, and has, even yet, a long life hidden in the roots of the future. Remembering these things, there is no sacrilege in tearing off the petals one by one. You come nearer to the heart of the rose; and, regardless of your equanimity, of your enthusiasm, of your admiration, the sight of the worm in its heart will discolor all the delicate tints of your idealism. Your commonplace human nature does not allow you warmly to honor something internally rotten. The worm in the heart of a rose feasts as much on its loveliness and charm as on its sappy materialistic strength. Your appreciation becomes hesitant; then it ceases; for our natures rebel against praising the surface beauty of the corrupt.

So with Christianity. Freethinkers have plucked petal from petal, and have bared the heart of the rose; and not a priest, pastor, or minister exists who does not know that the worm is there. The knowledge has shocked, maybe stunned them; but, in their slow recovery, they have turned for safety to the stuff that forms the first portion of this article. Around the heart of the rose they have been, and are, fixing false petals. They are exhausting the resources of language in the endeavor to hide the truth. A sermon of to-day is as sloppy as a baby's breakfast. They are decorating the worm with phantastic petal wings, and coloring them with all the tints of poesy. To their congregations the petals are not the worm's mausoleum; they are the walls of a heavenly palace within which everything is lovely.

Inside the heart of the Christian rose is the lie of all religion, the lie that came as a tremor of fear, bidding the human mind hate and worship. Out of it has come, as real history teaches us, disaster and death. No pen can fully picture the horrors inflicted upon Humanity by the influence of this lie. For it gave to the cutest minds the miserable opportunity to dominate their fellows. It put authority in their hands. Religion meant autocracy; and the little of civilisation that there is amongst the mass of men has come only in so far as religious autocracy has gone.

The spirit, ghost, or God idea could never become truth; for all the belief in the world cannot make a lie even a half-truth; and the lie of Religion, once fastened to life, and supported by all the most cunning faculties of the human mind, flourished exceedingly. Its nourishment was of the richest and rarest. It fed sumptuously upon the very sap of life. Its home was in the heart of the rose.

Gradually primitive cunning became civilised astuteness, forced not so much by devotion as by the social power it involved. Gradually the heavy curtain of sacredness was woven. Around the ugliness of the worm arose the protecting grandeurs of mediæval power, the elaboration of the primitive hut, the dignification of the mysterious medicine-man. As the leaves dropped, faded and withered by the sun's rays of civilisation, they were replaced by others more refined, with more semblance of culture. Around the unchangeable ugliness gathered the sweet fruits of man's brain. Religion, being the social power, impinged its character upon everything. Delicate artistry beautified the worm's tomb. Loveliness more and more enveloped the internal coarseness, till the human mind could not conceive it other than it seemed. Wonderful ingenuity forced the horrible corruption deeper into the darkness, and incense sweetened the atmosphere that once reeked with blood.

But with all the accumulations of false beauty and surface delicacy, the lie was never in the least made more worthy by its environment. The worm fattened, but despite the gold and glory of its home, it remained a worm. Time, with its cohorts of civilisation, has altered the rose from a thing of materialistic significance to a thing of spirituous incandescence; but the nature and activities of the worm in its heart remain unchanged. And to-day the rose of Christianity, with all its marvellous loveliness, all its ineffable influences, all its sweetness, and purity, and delicacy, its tenderness, refinement, and charm, all the thousand graces that adorn it and beautify Humanity, as we are told—where is it? Growing in the cruel sorrow and blood of a battlefield, growing amidst shattered bones and quivering flesh and spilt brains, growing amidst desolation and horror and murder, growing with all its false hypocritical meekness and mildness and Christlike simplicity, amongst the ruins of the work of laborious years. How similar its surroundings are to its heart! Yea! it is a marvellously wonderful flower, this rose of Christianity. Christians have cause to be proud of it; but we are glad we are Freethinkers.

Digitized by Google

ROBERT MORELAND.

Heredity and Progress.

(BY THE LATE J. M. WHEELER.)

THE law of heredity in its wider aspects is hardly popular, although observed in all ages. As a scientific theory, it has the misfortune to come in conflict, not with facts, but with what are often more potent—namely, prejudices and dogmas. The Catholic World, reviewing Galton's work on Hereditary Genius, declared the doctrine "is at variance with Christian theology, with the freedom of the human will and man's moral responsibility. It excludes all morality and all sin, and recognises only physical good or evil." Without troubling to follow these charges, which have been reiterated ad nauseam whenever positive science has ventured on fields over which theology has vainly claimed jurisdiction, let us simply look at the facts.

The truth of the law of heredity cannot be denied. Were it not the primary fact that like produces like, there would be no constancy of species. No one doubts that the hard head of the Negro and the light foot of the Indian are inherited. Inheritance extends not simply to size, complexion, and figure, but even to tricks of expression, handwriting, tastes, disposition, intellect—in short, to all that is summed up in the word "character." Anyone who considers the Jews will see at once that their characters, as much as their noses, are an inheritance. A Scotchman "caught young," as Johnson said, may lose some of the superficial characteristics, but will retain all the national peculiarities of his race; and so will the Irishman. The most noticeable qualifications of the law of heredity are those of sex and age. Various characteristics (as in the human family, teeth, beards, and various diseases) appear not at birth, but at the same age as in parents. Striking instances have been recorded of suicide, insanity, and special diseases, breaking out at the same age as in parents. It is even noticed that in men there are long-lived and short-lived stocks. The famous Turgots, of France, scarcely ever reached over half a century, while centenarians usually spring from a long-lived stock. Darwin noted that "on this principle of inheritance, at corresponding periods, we can understand how it is that most animals display from the germ to maturity such a marvellous succession of characters." He also considered this tendency of the utmost importance in determining the laws of embryology.

Theodule Ribot, the French writer on heredity, alleges two causes as among the chief in cases where the law does not obviously manifest itself. First, the disproportion of an initial force to the amount of energy it may liberate or direct. Each individual having two parents with the latent qualities of their ancestry, and being subject to new embryological conditions, is, however, slightly diverse from every other individual. As affecting this, the military excitement in which Mme. Buonaparte lived prior to Napoleon's birth has been instanced. The Greeks surrounded expectant mothers with beautiful works of art. The second cause is that characteristics are transmitted, which, though modified, are the same at root. Thus a consumptive father may have a child with rickets or rheumatics. An hysterical mother may give birth to a child afflicted with epilepsy. The children of drunkards are often imbecile or otherwise unhealthy, while those born previously to the parents taking to drink have been healthy.

What Darwin calls the "prepotency of one sex in the transmission of character" is also to be noted. In crosses, the most thoroughbred animal is usually prepotent in the offspring. G B. Starkweather is even of opinion that the sex of human beings may be determined by a study of prepotency, or what he calls "superiority."

The seeming absence of certain elements in one generation, and their reappearance in the next or a later generation, is just what should be expected. A father may transmit certain qualities to his daughter which her sex will prevent being other than latent ones, but she in turn transmits them to a son, who thus inherits from his maternal grandfather. Readers of Darwin know the importance of atavism, or the reversion to an earlier type, in determining the stock whence an animal proceeds. Atavism is explained by the latency of traits which are kept in check by other circumstances, but which, upon a fitting opportunity, again take shape. Scratch a Russian, and you find a Tartar. Under the veneer of our civilisation lies the disposition of an earlier savage life, ready to crop up in sport, Jingoism, or love of adventure. The momentum of ages is not to be stayed by the training of a single life. The man who fights his ancestry is often worsted in the last round, giving in in old age to what he has resisted in his manhood. We are, for instance, all more superstitious than we know. Mme. de Staël spoke for many when she replied to the question, "Do you believe in ghosts?" by saying, "No; but I am afraid of them."

In addition to the tendency to transmit peculiarities to the same sex should be noted the more general, slowly acting, and weaker tendency of transmission to both sexes of qualities, or degrees of qualities, which originally appeared in one sex only. This tendency is shown in connection with the tendency to inherit acquired qualities at earlier and earlier ages, and therefore in a manner independent of adult sex development.

Those who accept the facts of biology will find no difficulty in Galton's contention that it would be quite practicable to produce a highly gifted race of men by judicious marriages during several generations. In the case of the Brahmans it has been done, although the adverse forces have been strengthened by the habits of superstition and the lack of education on the female side. Every stockbreeder knows the difficulty of keeping up the high character of any valuable variety. There is a steady tendency to revert to the average ancestral character which has to be guarded against by careful selection. With every race of animals, if unpruned for a single generation, the weaker varieties would survive, and the average quality of the race deteriorate. The usual question asked of the believer in inheritance is, How is it the breed falls off? Why was not Cromwell's son, or Milton's daughter, as superior to their parents as they were to theirs? A consideration of the laws already mentioned will, in part, supply the answer. The case of Cromwell, also, deserves a word of notice. His military and political genius may be said to have developed with his opportunity. Had Charles been a good king, Cromwell might only have been a self-willed yeoman and a leader of opinion among the Huntingdon gentry. He had come of good descent, and his high qualities appeared to some extent in his daughters.

The difficulty is, however, properly met by Mr.

Digitized by Google

Galton in his latest researches. It lies in the constant tendency to mediocrity of which I have spoken. In experiments on seeds of different size, but of the same species, Galton noticed that the offspring did not resemble their parents in size, but always tended to approach a medium size—to be smaller than the parents if the parents were large, to be larger than the parents if the parents were small. The point of convergence was below the average size. In regard to human height, an experiment furnished the result that where the average height of the two parents either exceeded or fell short of the mean standard height, that of their offspring would be one-third nearer. The explanation, of course, is that the child inherits partly from his parents, partly from his ancestry. The further his genealogy goes back, the more numerous and varied his ancestors become, until their mean stature becomes the same as that of the race. The man who boasts descent from some Norman baron rarely reflects how inconceivably small can be the share of that remote ancestor in forming his own constitution. The father transmits, on an average, one-half of his nature, the grandfather one-fourth, the great grandfather one-eighth, the share decreasing in geometrical ratio with great rapidity. This law of regression, towards the average of parentages, tells heavily against the full transmission of any rare and valuable gift. The more exceptional the gift, the more exceptional is the good fortune of a parent who has a child of equal or greater abilities than himself. If this discourages extravagant hopes in gifted parents, it no less discountenances extravagant fears in those a little below the standard.

(To be concluded.)

Joseph Priestley.—IV.

By G. W. Foote.

[Reprinted.]

(Concluded from p. 573.)

The logical corollary from this Materialism was the doctrine of Philosophical Necessity, the absolute denial of the unintelligible doctrine of the freedom of the will. In his correspondence with Price he argues and illustrates this theory with great power. Man as an organised system of matter is subject to the inevitable laws of his nature, and his actions depend upon his general frame of mind in presence of the conditions which surround him. Owing to the complexity of his structure, and the multiplicity of environing circumstances, it is often impossible to predict in what precise manner a man will act in any particular instance; but we ought not, therefore, to infer that his actions conform to no laws whatever. It may be impossible to predict how the wind will blow to-morrow, but the winds are nevertheless subject to the laws of meteorology. This doctrine of philosophical necessity was not new; it had been propounded by Hobbes, by Spinoza, by Toland in his Letters to Serena, by Dr. Coward, by Collins, and by a number of less distinguished writers; but Priestley presented and defended it with trenchant and irrefragable logic, and so perspicuously presented it that it never could again be misunderstood, except by wilfully perverse persons or imbeciles.

In his treatment of the problem of the existence of evil, he by no means manifested his customary rigor of logic and clearness of perception. Moral evil, he argues, is ultimately resolvable into physical pain, and physical pain is necessary to the progress of the human race. If we were not stimulated by hunger to partake of food, we should die of inanition. Throughout nature what seems evil is only a necessary part of the great providential scheme of good. Now this is the veriest sophistry; it is an invasion of the difficulty. The human suffering complained of by those who deny that the existence of evil is irreconcilable with the existence of a being at once omnipotent and good, is not that pain which is a beneficent stimulus to action, but that appalling misery which, in the shape of congenital disease or social servitude or semi-starvation, attends from the cradle to the grave vast numbers of the human race, even in some of the most civilised countries of the world. Priestley, however, was not the first philosopher who sacrificed reason in the attempt to gloss over the difficulties of Theistic conceptions. His belief in the ultimate perfectibility of mankind does credit to his humane feelings, if not to his intellect. Even if it be a delusion it is a very harmless one. Many people, as Huxley says, would be glad to share it, if it could be reconciled with scientific truth. The earth is cooling very fast, and the rate of human progress is very slow, so that the perfected man is likely to be only a perfected Esquimaux.

Of Priestley's contributions to chemical science only a scientific man is competent to speak with authority. We, therefore, prefer to borrow from Professor Huxley's address on Priestley's Life and Labors, rather than attempt an independent account ourselves. The quotation is not characterised by the Professor's customary grace of style; but that is readily accounted for by the fact of its being taken from a newspaper report:—

> "To estimate what Priestley did in chemistry, you must carry your minds back to the beginning of the last century, and try, difficult as it is, to form a notion of what was then the condition of chemical science. At that time there was no one who believed, hardly anyone who suspected, that the doctrine of the ancients, that air and water and fire are elements, was other than true. The researches, indeed, of Boyle and Hayles had tended to define the qualities of air, had tended to show that there were different kinds of air; but that there was anything like a multiplicity and diversity of elementary bodies, which we now branch under the name of gases, was entirely unsuspected. But immediately at the commencement of the second half of the last century—about the year 1755—a most remarkable young man, a young Scotch doctor, Dr. Black, had made investigations upon the nature of what was then called fixed air. He had shown that this substance could be combined with such matters as lime, and such matters as alkali, and could be got again from these combinations; that it was an acid substance, capable of neutralising the strongest alkali; and had thus paved the way for the conception of an air-like body, an aeriform elastic substance, which, nevertheless, was independent, and could play the character of an independent existence totally distinct from common air. And then a little later, in 1766, Henry Cavendish, one of the most remarkable men who ever adorned the science of this or any other country, in a series of researches which strike one at present by their precision, and by their exactness of statement, showed the nature of sundry other gases, particularly that gas which is called hydrogen now, which was then termed 'inflammable air'; and the special peculiarity of Cavendish was that to the investigation of these questions he applied a rigor of method which was almost unknown before. For he brought the balance into play, and he implied, although he did not express, that great truth which it remained for the French chemist Lavoisier to formulate, the doctrine that 'matter is never created and never destroyed.' It was following immediately after Cavendish's work that Dr. Priestley commenced his inquiries, and if we look upon them as contributions to our knowledge of chemical science they are something surprising—not only surprising in themselves, but still more surprising when we consider that he was a man devoid of the academic training of Dr. Black, that he had not the means and appliances which practically unlimited wealth put at the disposal of Cavendish, but that he had to do what so many Englishmen have done before and since—to supply academic training by mother-wit, to to supply apparatus by an ingenuity which could fabricate what he wanted out of washing-tubs, and other domestic implements and then to do as many Englishmen have done before, and many have done since—to scale the walls of science without preparation from the outside. The number of discoveries that he made was something marvellous. I certainly am well within the limit when I say that he trebled the number of gases which were known before his time, that he gave a precision and definition to our knowledge of their general characteristics, of which no one before had any idea; and, finally, on the 1st of August, 1774, he made that discovery with which his name is more especially connected—the discovery of the substance which at the present day is known as oxygen gas."

On the 1st of August, 1874, a great gathering took place at Birmingham to do honor to Joseph Priestley. There, in the very place whence the noble-minded man had been driven by political and theological hate, was unveiled a statue erected by the lovers of science and liberal thought to his great memory. It was the centenary anniversary of his discovery of oxygen gas, and Professor Huxley was chosen to present the statue to the Mayor of Birmingham, and to deliver a commemorative address in the Town Hall. And not in Birmingham alone on that day had thinkers and men of science assembled to celebrate Priestley's praise. Away on the far-distant banks of the Susquehanna, by the grave of the good old man, American savants met for a similar purpose; and another gathering assembled at Leeds near the place which gave him birth. Surely some progress has been made since Joseph Priestley was hunted from his native land, and compelled to lay his bones in alien soil. It is to him, and to such as he, that we owe much of that great and beneficial change. In the eloquent language of Huxley, "Such men as he are not men who care very much for honors and rewards; happily for them, for their generation is not usually disposed to give them any very great share of these matters. They are men who say in another spirit than Falstaff's,—

Digitized by Google

'What is honor, who hath it, he who died o' Wenesday?'

But whether such men undergo after their death that sort of lay canonisation which we have to-day bestowed upon Priestley, whether posterity erects statues to their memory, or whether their name and fame and remembrance are blotted out from the recollection of man, there still remains to them one thing which shall never die—every truth which they advocated. The whole progress of truth has been helped by them, and for all generations and for all time to come truth will be stronger for their efforts; and for every lie which they have smitten, and every imposture they have detected, falsehood and imposture will be weaker until time is no more."

A New Carol.

Recommended to be sung by the Christian soldiers of the Powers now at war.

GOD save you, merry gentlemen,
List kindly to our lay,
Remember now our Savior's birth,
For whom we fight to-day:
And 'tis tidings of comfort and joy.

'Twas nineteen centuries ago
And fourteen years to-day,
And now we Christian folk are out
To rob and burn and slay:
And 'tis tidings of comfort and joy.

They say that he was meek and mild,
And harmless as a dove,
But fierce as tigers clemmed are we,
And naught but carnage love:
And 'tis tidings of comfort and joy.

Goodwill and peace he brought to men,
Or so his priests have said;
But goodwill long has left the earth,
And peace lies stark and dead:
And 'tis tidings of comfort and joy.

His soldiers have his doctrines preached
In every age and clime,
With sword and fire and tortures dire,
And many a flagrant crime:
And 'tis tidings of comfort and joy.

The Prince of Peace they named him once
In mockery and scorn,
But not to bring peace on the earth,
But warfare, was he born:
And 'tis tidings of comfort and joy.

'Tis said he gave his blood to save
Mankind from mortal doom;
But 'tis our purpose now to send
A million to the tomb:
And 'tis tidings of comfort and joy.

God save you, merry gentlemen,
Christ's followers are we:
The fountain filled so oft before,
We'll fill again with glee.

B. D.

The Good God.

ONE day the good God got out of bed
In a very good humor for us, 'tis said;
He put his nose to the window light—
"Perhaps their planet has perished quite."
Not yet; in its corner very far
He saw it twinkling, our little star.
"If I can think how they got on there,"
Said he, "the Devil may take me, I swear;
The Devil may take me, I swear.

"Black or white, frozen or broiled
(He said, like a father to children spoiled),
Mortals whom I have made so small,
They pretend that I govern you all;
But, God be praised, you shall also see
That I have ministers under me.
If I don't give the sack to one or two pair,
My children, the Devil may take me, I swear
The Devil may take me, I swear.

"To make you live in peace divine,
Have I not given you women and wine?
Yet in my teeth with prayers and boasts
The pigmies call me the Lord of Hosts;
And even dare to invoke my name
When they light the murderous cannon's flame!
If ever I commanded column or square,
My children, the Devil may take me, I swear;
The Devil may take me, I swear.

"Who are those dwarfs so richly dreet,
On gilded thrones in sumptuous rest?
The head anointed, so proud and pert,
These chiefs of your insect-swarms assert
That I have blest their rights of place,
That they are kings by my special grace.
If it is by me that they reign thus there,
My children, the Devil may take me, I swear;
The Devil may take me, I swear!

"Then these other dwarfs, all black, of whom
My poor nose hates the incense fume?
They make of life a dismal fast,
And in my name fierce curses cast
In their sermons — Very fine, said he;
Only, by gad, they're Hebrew to me;
If I believe anything they declare,
My children, the Devil may take me, I swear;
The Devil may take me, I swear!

"Children, enough of this: no sect
But the good kind hearts shall be my elect.
Make love to each other and live in joy,
Without any fear that God will annoy;
Laugh down the great and the canting crew —
But suppose the mouchards should hear me? Adieu!
If into heaven those fellows fare,
My children, the Devil may take me, I swear;
The Devil may take me, I swear."

—JAMES THOMSON, from Beranger.

"Jewish history as revealed in the Old Testament is sacred, and our English history is no less sacred." Thus says the Bishop of Chelmsford. His Lordship has a stronger faith than we have, for the lively days of Charles II. and his lady friends and the period satirised by the great Hogarth do not move us to adoration.

As an index to what lengths war will lead ordinary folk, the suppression of German music from concert programs shows a deliberate want of judgment. As the Messiah is out of date now-a-days, we suppose that even Handel is a back number. Perhaps the Germans will refuse to read Shakespeare.

"Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar," says the old proverb, and the zest with which the ordinary Christian enters into "the game of beasts" on the Continent shows that two thousand years of contact with the pacific commands of Christianity has had little or no effect on the race. It is all to the tune of "an eye for an eye," but as for Christianity, that's "all my eye."

Mr. Rudyard Kipling has been strumming his lyre on the subject of the war. Two of his lines read, "Though all we knew depart, The old commandments stand." This is news! We thought "Thou shalt not kill" had been overlooked by European Christians.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

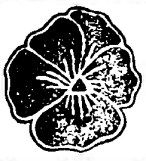
LONDON.

INDOOR.

KINGSLAND BRANCH N. S. S. (Mr. Neary's, 94 Lordship-road, Church-street, Stoke Newington): Monday, Sept. 14, at 8.30, Business Meeting—Re Outdoor Week Evenings, Propaganda, etc.

OUTDOOR.

BETHNAL GREEN BRANCH N. S. S. (Victoria Park, near the Bandstand): 3.15, Mrs. H. Rosetti, a Lecture.



CAMBERWELL BRANCH N. S. S. (Brockwell Park): 5, Mr. Hope, a Lecture.

EDMONTON BRANCH N. S. S. (Edmonton Green): 7.30, Mr. W. Davidson, a Lecture. Lincoln-road, Ponders End: Wednesday, Sept. 16, at 8.30, Mr. Davidson, a Lecture.

KINGSLAND BRANCH N. S. S. (corner of Ridley-road): 11.30, J. Bellamy, "Christians of To-Day"; 7.30, C. Burke, "Facts and Fictions."

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Finsbury Park): 3, Freethought Demonstration. Speakers: Messrs. C. Cohen, W. Davidson, Miss Kough; chairman, C. E. Ratcliffe.—Parliament Hill: 3.30, Mr. Rowney, a Lecture.—Regent's Park (near the Fountain): 5, Freethought Demonstration. Speakers: Messrs. C. Cohen, W. Davidson, A. D. Howell-Smith, Miss Kough; chairman, C. E. Ratcliffe.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, Miss Kough, "Christianity and Crime."

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6¼ ins. by 8¾ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LETTERS OF A CHINAMAN ON THE MISCHIEF OF MISSIONARIES. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

PAIN AND PROVIDENCE. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 38 SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Maximise morals, minimise religion.—BENTHAM.

Christian Civilisation.

CONSTANTINE was the first Christian emperor. Did he abolish slavery? No. He liberated the slaves owned by Jews, if they embraced Christianity, but the slaves of Christian masters enjoyed no such advantage. According to the old law, a free-woman who had intercourse with a slave was reduced to servitude; but Constantine humanely decreed that the slave should be burnt, and the free-woman executed in the ordinary way.

Stoicism branded slavery as immoral, but where is there a word against the institution in the New Testament? Christianity tolerated slavery for centuries. Even in the nineteenth century slavery was legal in our West Indian colonies. Men under sixty can remember the abolition of slavery in the United States. Some twenty years later slavery was abolished in Brazil. If Christianity abolished slavery, it took a frightful time to do the work. Might not civilisation have done it more rapidly?

Christianity "restored the position of women in society." In what respect did Christianity improve it? As a matter of fact, Christianity degraded woman by two methods; first, by adopting the Jewish story of the Fall; secondly, by preaching up virginity. Paul's view of woman's position is contemptible; she is as inferior to man as man is to God. Saint Jerome called her "the demon's door, the road of iniquity, the scorpion's sting." Saint Chrysostom called her "a sovereign pest." "When you see a woman," said Saint Anthony, "be sure you have before you, not a human being, not even a wild beast, but the devil in person." Saint Augustine's insults are nearly as extravagant. Saint John of Damascus styled her "a child of lying, the advanced sentinel of the Devil," and "a malignant she-ass." Gregory the Great denied her "any moral sense." That is how Christianity "restored the position of woman in society."

Polygamy was not proscribed by Christianity, because it did not exist in the Pagan civilisation which Christianity supplanted. Monogamy was legal in Greece and Rome, and had been so for centuries. When Christianity opposed polygamy among the barbarians it simply carried forward the morality of Pagan civilisation. The Bible never censures polygamy or enjoins monogamy. It is a big book, but it never gives a right sentence on this subject.

That Christianity "put down divorce" is undoubtedly true, but the result was of questionable value. Vagrant affection was compelled to pay an outward respect to the marriage tie, but those who could not be divorced found a compensation in adultery. Mr. Gladstone appeared to regard divorce as immoral, but in this he was out of touch with the law of every civilised State. The Church still brands divorce with anathema, but the secular law, even in the most Catholic countries, has been constrained to permit it under certain conditions.

Christianity put down divorce, yet it certainly did not put down war, nor did it make "peace, instead of war, the normal relation between human societies." The Pax Romanus was a reality, which Christendom has never equalled. Rome boasted a Goddess of Peace, and a splendid temple was erected to her by Vespasian. At no time did the Roman armies number four hundred thousand men. We admit that philosophers deprecate war, but they always did so. Marcus Aurelius, though himself an emperor, and obliged to take up arms against the barbarians, detested war as "the disgrace and calamity of human nature."

Mr. Gladstone was right, however, in saying that Christianity "changed essentially the place and function of suffering." Suffering was always regarded as an evil before Christianity preached it as a blessing. Fortunately the modern world is returning to the old opinion, and the party of progress is everywhere warring against the evils of this life, without waiting for the rectifications of another world.

Charity itself has been narrowed by Christianity into mere almsgiving. Paul's great panegyric on this virtue is perhaps the finest thing in the New Testament, but the very word he uses (caritas) was borrowed from Pagan moralists. Cicero anticipated him before the birth of Christ in his caritas generis humani. This kind of charity is far superior to almsgiving, which often produces as many evils as it alleviates; and, after all, the charity of which the world stands most in need is that highest kind which is known as justice.

"Humility and forgiveness" are fine phrases, but they are seldom more. Generally they are little else than cheap devices for popular oppression. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth," is a sweet text; but, as a matter of fact, the soil of England is chiefly owned by the House of Lords. The clergy, also, have taught humility by enjoining the "lower orders" to remain contented in that state of life to which Providence has called them, and to order themselves lowly and reverently to all their betters. As for "forgiveness," we have simply to point out that, until recently, the criminal jurisprudence of Christendom was a ghastly scandal. Even in England, in the early part of last century, men and women were hung in batches for small felonies; and when Romilly tried to terminate this infamy, he was vigorously opposed by the bench of Bishops. During the eighteenth century, men were hung, drawn, and quartered wholesale, and malefactors' heads were exposed on Temple Bar. Thackeray in his Four Georges, gives two samples from the public journals of 1781. At Cork, on January 15, Tim Croneen, for murder and robbery, was "sentenced to be hanged two minutes, then his head to be cut off, and his body divided in four quarters." In England, "Mary Lynn was burned to ashes at the stake for being concerned in the murder of her mistress." Going further back we find torture common in ordinary trials. The Inquisition carried this practice to a devilish extreme; but, as Joseph de Maistre argued, in defending that institution, it only developed the habitual proceedings of the secular courts. Not until the Revolution (October 9, 1789) was trial-torture abolished in France. On the whole, it is safe to say, that for exquisite, deliberate, and ingenious cruelty, Christendom has eclipsed every antique State with any pretence to civilisation.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

"John Bull" and God.

IN times of war many people lose their heads. The conditions are so abnormal, things in general are looked at from a point of view so far removed from the customary, our interests are forced so violently into an unusual channel, that a great deal of rash and extravagant language may easily be excused. John Bright most probably had this in his mind when he said that he would as soon lecture a cage of wild animals as preach peace to a people seized with war-fever. Human nature is not really built for war, but for peace—that is in any permanent sense. The strain of warfare is too intense, the emotional tension too great for human nature to stand without being thrown, temporarily, off its normal balance. That is why it does not do to scrutinise too carefully the language of men and women during such a time. Human nature must be finally judged by what it is in its normal rather than in its abnormal phases.

This strain appears to be showing itself in unexpected quarters, and developing in unexpected directions. Some of the religious papers have informed us that with many people there has been a marked increase in the intensity of religious belief. That one may easily believe. A flood of feeling once aroused will expend itself along the line of least resistance, and with many this is most likely to take a religious form. Those of a more reflective and analytical turn of mind are much more likely to find their religious convictions disturbed. But it is inconceivable that religious belief should be created by such a catastrophe as that of the present war. If people fail to find God in times of peace, it does not seem reasonable to suppose that they will find him when the air is full of tales of battle and deeds of bloodshed. Well-balanced intellects do not veer this way or that with every passing phase of national temper.

One of these unexpected places in which religion appears to have broken out is in the pages of John Bull. And, strangest of all, in the person of its editor, Mr. Horatio Bottomley. I write under correction, but I have always been under the impression that Mr. Bottomley chose to call himself an Agnostic. And not an Agnostic of the "reverent" or religious type, but one who claimed to know as much about God as anyone, and to mean that he knew nothing at all. Since the war commenced I have been led seriously to reconsider this opinion. Two or three weeks ago there appeared in John Bull, presumably from the pen of its editor, an article on "God's Stocktaking," in which there was a plentiful scattering of pietistic terms. Now, in the issue dated September 12 there is another article, again presumably the editor's, with the title, "The Mills of God are Grinding." Alone, these titles would afford small ground for criticism, but the contents of the last named "gives one furiously to think." It is gratuitously pietistic, and, as a consequence, arguments that, by themselves, might be called reasonable, become, because of the pietistic ingredients, nonsensical.

The subject of the article is the Kaiser and the brutality of the German troops. No one in this country, no one, I imagine, in the whole civilised world, feels anything but the utmost horror for these barbarities and for the system that has produced them. As for the Kaiser himself, he deserves distinct consideration. I fancy that no mental authority in Germany—if he could safely speak—and certainly no mental pathologist outside Germany, would be at a loss to diagnose his case. He is a paranoiac of a most pronounced type. His speeches for some years past, his restlessness, his grandiose ideas concerning himself and the destiny of the German people, all point to this. Worst of all, he is a paranoiac who is further afflicted with religious mysticism. The disease with anyone in a position of influence is bad enough, when to it is allied the driving power of religion, he becomes a positive danger to all. When the War is over it is to be hoped that the Kaiser will be placed in a position where further mischief is impossible.

Here is a dose of pietistic jingoism from Mr. Bottomley that should satisfy the most omnivorous appetite:—

> "'God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform,' and the wonder He is now performing is the riddance of Europe, and mankind, of the Teutonic menace to his Scheme of Things. That scheme, as clearly as human intelligence can comprehend anything, was and is that, for good or ill, he has placed the destiny of the earth in the hands of the Anglo-Saxon race, with the Latins as their natural allies. All else is accidental or caprice; it cannot affect the final order of the world. And but for our own folly that order would never have been challenged. He has indeed been a patient God to have tolerated us.....He must have pondered whether we were worthy of the great trust; there must have been moments when He turned His eyes to the East, and hesitated whether one of the old Oriental peoples might not, after all, be better fitted for the task. But He has decided to give us another chance —on condition that now, at last, we do our part.....If we do that, God will do his part. He will crush the German monster. He will smash the Berlin butcher."

There it is, in all the glory of capitals and italics! And now we know exactly where we are. The Kaiser's offence is that he has interfered with God's "Scheme of Things," about which Mr. Bottomley writes with all the confidence of a Presbyterian elder of the old school. Really, a "Scheme of Things" that overlooks so large a fact as the "Teutonic menace," with its seventy millions of population, its army of four millions, with all its ambitions, is almost staggering in its criminal shortsightedness. If Mr. Bottomley's God wished to keep a character for common sense he should have prevented the "Teutonic menace" from developing. As it is, it looks as though ordinary human beings have to step in, and, as usual, make good the Deity's shortcomings. Besides, the Kaiser is quite genuinely convinced that the "Scheme of Things" involves the supremacy of the Teuton. I hesitate to give an opinion where two such theologians as the Kaiser and Mr. Bottomley differ. I believe that on this head both are equally well informed, and it would be interesting to see them engaged in a public discussion on so important a point.

We know—or, rather, Mr. Bottomley knows—as clearly as we know anything, that "He" has placed the destiny of the earth in our hands. That is "Britain's Divine Destiny." Under ordinary conditions such a statement might betoken "swelled head," or even indicate a phase of the disease from which the Kaiser himself is suffering. Observe, it is not said that we do hold the destiny of the earth in our hands. That might be a statement of fact. It is not even said that we ought, in our own interests, to do so. That might sound selfish. No, it is a burden that has been placed upon us; we must shoulder it in the name of duty; we are co-workers with the Deity, his selected instrument. (I must really congratulate Mr. Bottomley on the way in which he has assimilated the Puritan touch.) Of course, there are our Allies to consider—at least some of them. For while the Deity has selected us to rule the world, he has appointed the Latins as our Allies. The Latins, too, are in the divine "Scheme of Things," but only in a subordinate capacity. We hope they will remain contented in their allotted place, and do their duty in the sphere in which God —with Mr. Bottomley—has been pleased to place them.

It would only have been gracious under present circumstances to have found some place for Russia in the "Scheme of Things." For Russia has undoubtedly rendered valuable assistance in opposing the "Teutonic menace." Perhaps Mr. Bottomley was afraid that Russia might not readily consent to the divine "scheme" which places the destiny of the world in Britain's hands, and, not having the keen sense of humor possessed by our Latin Allies, might have seriously protested against the scheme—instead of laughing at it. Still, some place ought to have been found for the Slavs. They are too big to be ignored. Mr. Bottomley might try again. Mohammed received many supplementary revelations; why not the editor of John Bull? At any rate, Russia should be cautioned that if it does not agree to Britain deciding "the destiny of the earth," John Bull will have to denounce the Slav "menace" to "His Scheme of Things," and write of the Pirate of Petrograd in place of the "Butcher of Berlin." There is no doubt that he would be crushed. For anything that thwarts "Britain's Divine Destiny" can only be in the nature of a momentary obstruction. It is mere accident or caprice, and cannot endure.

Digitized by Google

It is not, it seems, a simple thing to work in line with the "Scheme of Things." Even Britain has been guilty of "folly," and Mr. Bottomley rightly compliments God on having "tolerated us." But, then, one might ask, What was "He" to do? Where could he have found anyone better? "He turned his eyes to the East," and wondered whether he should not select one of the Oriental races for the post of honor. Then "He" decided that, bad as we are, we were better than the others. Perhaps "He" read John Bull, and that helped "Him" to decide. At any rate, the fact remains, "He has decided to give us another chance." We should be thankful. And as in former ages God selected strange and not-to-be-expected vehicles to convey his message, so in these days he has passed by the hosts of the clergy to deliver his decision concerning us through Mr. Horatio Bottomley, and to acquaint us that this decision is conditional. We must "do our part." But suppose we fail? Will that seriously disturb the "Scheme of Things"? And if the destiny of the earth is placed in our hands "for good or ill," what does our failure matter? It seems that either God's decision concerning us is not conditional, or he has not placed the destiny of the earth in our hands "for good or ill." Like other revelations, that of Mr. Bottomley's needs checking.

Mr. Bottomley would seem to agree with that section of the community which—because we are at war with Germany—will not listen to the music of Wagner or Beethoven. He says, "All idea of German civilisation has gone," and "dear old Haldane need not waste any more tears over Schiller and Goethe." Perhaps Mr. Bottomley only means that our ideas concerning the nature of German civilisation needs revising, and that may be true enough. But genuine culture remains culture, whether it is in Berlin or London or Paris. The value of Goethe's philosophy and poetry, of Wagner's, or Beethoven's, or Schubert's music, the work of German scientists, is not in the smallest degree affected by the barbarities of Germans in Belgium and France, or by the inflated military ambitions of the Kaiser and his supporters. Genius is more than national; it is part of a world-wide democracy; and to reject it because it appears in Germany is only a little above destroying masterpieces of art and literature in Louvain. If the German is a Hun and a barbarian because he ignores the claims of art and culture in Belgium, what is the Briton who ignores the claims of art and culture in Germany? Will not our so doing jeopardise the good favor of the Deity who has placed "the destiny of the earth" in our hands? Might "He" not be again led to doubt our fitness for the task of leadership? Might not even the function of the Deity's mouthpiece be transferred from the editor of John Bull to some other and equally unexpected quarter?

C. COHEN.

A Desperate Subterfuge.

IN times of peace Christian teachers are accustomed to describe the Sermon on the Mount as an infallible compendium of the laws of the kingdom of God, obedience to which is said to be an essential condition of genuine discipleship. How often have we heard the exhortation thundered out of the pulpit, "Obey Christ at whatever cost." But when Christian countries are at war the majority of Christian ministers give the Sermon on the Mount the go-by, while those who refuse to do so are severely reprimanded. The Rev. Leyton Richards, of Bowdon, is one of the few who advocate absolute loyalty to the Gospel Jesus, let the consequences be what they will. He says:—

> "We must have the courage of our faith, and declare without qualification that since war is 'the crime of Cain multiplied a millionfold,' no conceivable exigencies can ever, from the Christian standpoint, condone or excuse it. In the abstract, we should never admit the end justifies the means, and we must never admit it here. 'War is Hell'; it means the tearing up of the Sermon on the Mount, the flouting of every Divine command."

In this protest Mr. Richards has the support of Mr. S. Hocking, who nevertheless contends that "since the first century the Church, speaking broadly, has never taught that war is 'the crime of Cain multiplied a millionfold.'" Mr. Hocking maintains further that the Church does not regard war as any crime at all. "The Church to-day," he adds, "believes in war through and through." Mr. Hocking and Mr. Richards, however, stand practically alone in the attitude they have taken. Dr. Clifford, Dr. Campbell Morgan, Sir William Robertson Nicoll, Mr. R. J. Campbell, and thousands more, boldly assert that France, Russia, and Great Britain are simply serving the Lord by taking part in the present bloody conflict. Criticising Mr. Richards the Rev. Frank J. Leggatt, of Manchester, angrily exclaims:—

> "Mr. Richards makes reference to the Sermon on the Mount. Does he stand for the Sermon on the Mount against Jesus Christ, when Jesus Christ, contradicting the Sermon on the Mount, or contradicting the Tolstoyan interpretation of Matt. v. 39, with a whip of small cords swept the money-changers out of the Temple courts"?

As it has been repeatedly pointed out in this journal, the Church, while always lavishing praise upon the so-called maxims of Jesus, has never even tried to put them into practice, and to be a Christian has never meant to be an imitator of the Gospel Jesus. A Christian is a person who believes in salvation by faith, not by works, and who seldom, if ever, belies his faith. Mr. Hocking is so deeply grieved and humiliated by this undeniable truth that he frankly confesses he is dumb when he attempts to pray. His words are worth quoting:—

> "I blame the Tsar scarcely less than the Kaiser for this wicked and inhuman war. Yet they are both devoted members of the Christian Church. Will the Church cast them out as men who have denied the faith? I scarcely think so. If the Kaiser wins, the Protestant Church of Germany will hail him as the anointed of the Lord; and if he loses, the same Church will add his name to the long roll of Christian martyrs."

Now the curious thing is that, with the history of the Christian Church staring him in the face, Sir William Robertson Nicoll still persists in the daring assertion that the present war is not of Christian origin. We owe it, he informs us, to the fact that in Germany Christ is dethroned. It is getting to be whispered abroad now that in Germany "Corsica has conquered Galilee." In other words, "Germany as represented by its dominant thinkers is at open war with Christ," from which statement we cannot but conclude that Germany is more powerful than the God-man. Surely Sir William cannot realise the full import of what he says. In the British Weekly for September 10 he tells us that though "the Germans are setting themselves against the will of Christ," we must remember that "Christ must reign till all enemies are put under his feet." Christ did once reign in Germany, otherwise Sir William could not certify that he is now dethroned there. The Germans have reigned until they have succeeded in putting him under their feet as their supreme enemy. But the editor of the British Weekly is entirely mistaken. It is well known that Prussia became one of the great Powers of Europe under Frederick the Great, who was, if not an Atheist, a Deist. Frederick's work was completed by Bismarck, who was a Protestant, on whom the Pope bestowed the Order of Christ. The war with Austria in 1866 resulted in making Prussia the dominant Power in Germany, while the war with France four years later eventuated in the establishment of the German Empire, and ever since it has been the one ambition of those in power to make Berlin the mistress of Europe, if not of the world. One of the chief champions of the greatness of Germany was Treitschke, the historian and great orator. Strangely enough, Sir William seems to put Treitschke in the same category as Nietzsche, whereas in reality the two were as wide asunder as pole and pole. Nietzsche was an Anarchist and Individualist, and so in deadly opposition to the theory of State supremacy, while Treitschke was an enthusiastic believer in the State as Force. Nietzsche was an Atheist, and a hot opponent of Christianity, while Treitschke was a zealous member of the Lutheran Church, and regularly partook of the Lord's Supper. He is often spoken of as the Macaulay of Germany. Well, what was the teaching of this disciple of the Galilean? For twenty years he lectured at the Berlin University, believing himself to be Divinely called to discourse on the greatness and glories of primitive Germany, the Prussian domination of the Germany of to-day, and the domination of Europe by the Germany of to-morrow. In his opinion the State's one business is to command, and the subject's to obey. The point is, however, that these peculiar views were held and advocated by a man who was a firm believer in the Christian religion. His sincerity cannot be doubted, and he could see no inconsistency between his religious orthodoxy and what Sir William would call his political heresies. If he regarded war as the fruitful field for magnanimity, heroism, and mercy, is it not a fact that a very similar remark occurred in the British Weekly, when, a few weeks ago, the editor was considering the difference Christ is making?

Digitized by Google

Someone asked the other day, with the war in mind, "Is God dead?" History's answer to that question is, "No, God cannot be dead, because he never lived." This world, from the beginning until now, has never shown the least sign of the existence of such a being. Even Canon Wilberforce admits that it is absurd to imagine that there is a great, external World-Ruler, such a conception being merely an idol of the mind. The Kaiser speaks of God with amazing familiarity, and it was very easy to lampoon his telegram to the Crown Princess, "How magnificently God supported the Crown Prince," as Barry Pain did in the Times:—

> "Led by Wilhelm, as you tell,
> God has done extremely well;
> You with patronising nod
> Show that you approve of God.
> Kaiser, face a question new:
> This—does God approve of you?"

Both the telegram and the lampoon treat the Divine Being as an idol of the mind, which he is, and nothing more. The Kaiser has enthroned an idol of the mind and called it his ally, and every Christian minister in Great Britain has done exactly the same. Germans, Russians, Belgians, Frenchmen, and Britishers claim God as their ally, and he lets them. And without heeding anybody, the Nature of Things has its way, the strong becoming stronger, and the weak weaker. Such is the order of Nature, and neither piety nor prayer can set it aside.

> "The Moving Finger writes; and, having writ,
> Moves on: nor all your Piety nor Wit
> Shall lure it back to cancel half a Line,
> Nor all your Tears wash out a Word of it."

The issue of the present war is alone in Nature's hands, and she will bring it about in due time according to a law that has never yet been broken, whether it will make for the true progress of mankind or not. The one thing that is absolutely certain is that the ambition and ideals of neither Germans nor Allies will be in the least regarded. We can only hope that, as the result of the superior strength and skill of its defenders, the cause of right and freedom shall win the day, and that of militarism receive its death-blow.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Origin of Supernatural Ideas.—IX.

(Concluded from p. 581.)

"My business was, and above everything is, to illumine the dark regions of religion with the torch of reason, that man at last may no longer be a sport to the hostile powers that hitherto and now avail themselves of the mystery of religion to oppose mankind. My aim has been to prove that the powers before which man crouches are creatures of his own limited, ignorant, uncultured, and timorous mind; to prove that in special the being whom man sets over against himself as a separate supernatural existence is his own being. The purpose of my writing is to make men anthropologians instead of theologians; man-lovers instead of God-lovers; students of this world instead of subservient and wily ministers of a celestial and terrestrial monarchy. My object is therefore anything but negative, destructive—it is positive; I deny in order to affirm the substantial being of man."—LUDWIG FEUERBACH, The Essence of Religion, p. vi.; 1890.

"The first duty of man, intelligent and free, is to instantly chase the idea of God from his mind and conscience: For God, if he exists, is essentially hostile to our nature, and we advance in no way by his authority. We arrive at science in spite of him; we arrive at well-being in spite of him; at society in spite of him; every progress of ours is a victory in which we crush Divinity.....

"Therefore I deny the supremacy of God over humanity; I reject his providential government, the non-existence of which is sufficiently established by the metaphysical and economic hallucinations of humanity—in a word by the martyrdom of our species; I decline the jurisdiction of the supreme being over man; I deprive him of his titles of father, king, judge, good, clement, merciful, helpful, rewarder and avenger. All these attributes of which the idea of Providence are composed, are only a caricature of humanity, irreconcilable with the autonomy of civilisation and refuted by the history of its aberrations and catastrophes."—P. J. PROUDHON. (Translated by Hinds; Green. Freethinker, June 15, 1890.)

MAN endows God with all the qualities which he himself would like to have, but does not possess. Man can see; therefore he makes his God all-seeing. Man is wise; therefore God is all-wise. Man is finite; God is infinite. Man has goodness; God is all-good. God is merely man magnified to the highest degree.

Ever since Xenophanes ridiculed man for making God in his own image, the intellectual upholders of the God-idea have been trying to deanthropomorphise or depersonalise God, but without success. For the multitude, God is now, as he always has been, and always will be, until they learn to do without the idea altogether, a person. "The average Christian," as Professor Leuba remarks, "whatever he may say to the contrary, is, theoretically speaking, a materialist, and, I might add, a polytheist"—that is, he is a materialist, not in the scientific meaning of the word, but in the sense that he cannot conceive of gods or spirits apart from some bodily material shape or form. For it is impossible to think of the immaterial—that is, nothing—having a form or shape of any kind.

Professor Leuba illustrates this with the answers given by two students at an American college who were beginning the study of philosophy. The first—a lady, twenty years of age—replied to the question as to her idea of God: "God, to me, is a being of flesh and blood, for without this form he would seem unnatural and unsympathetic as our leader." The second—a gentleman of twenty-one—replied: "I think of God as real, actual flesh and blood and bones, something we shall see with our eyes some day."*

This was the conception of God which prevailed throughout the Middle Ages. A "frequently recurring group" to be seen sculptured upon the cathedrals which have survived those times, says Andrew Dickson White, is a representation of God creating the universe:—

> "The Almighty, in human form, sits benignly, making the sun, moon, and stars, and hanging them from the

* J. H. Leuba, The Psychological Origin of Religion, p. 25.

Digitized by Google

> solid firmament which supports the 'heaven above' and overarches the 'earth beneath.' The furrows of thought on the Creator's brow show that in this work he is obliged to contrive; the knotted muscles upon his arms show that he is obliged to toil. Naturally, then, the sculptors and painters of the mediæval and early modern period frequently represented him as the writers whose conceptions they embodied had done—as, on the seventh day, weary after thought and toil, enjoying well-earned repose and the plaudits of the hosts of heaven."*

Nor have the Protestant Churches any superiority over the Catholic Church in this respect. From Luther—the founder of Protestantism—down to Spurgeon, the same ideas prevailed. They both believed in the man-like Bible God. Luther observed that Abraham must have had a bad time when God told him to kill Isaac, and roundly declared that "If he had given me such an order, I should have disputed the point with him."† Again, says Luther:—

> "God has now and then a fine game at cards, all of them court cards: kings, princes, and so on. He deals them out, and plays them against one another—the Pope against Luther, for instance; and by-and-bye, as children do when they've been fighting at beggar-my-neighbor for a long time without results, gets tired, and throws the cards under the table."‡

Spurgeon held the same belief. He would hold no terms with those who would depersonalise God. He roundly declared:—

> "If God does not see and hear, we are shipwrecked upon the rock of blank atheism. I do not care a bit what men believe in, whether it be pantheism, or agnosticism, or theism; if they have no personal God that hears and sees, they have, in fact, no God at all. 'There is a power that makes for righteousness,' said one; but if that power is insensible, and never communicates with man, and never notices him, there is nothing in the forced admission of any use to him who makes it or hears it. It is big talk, such as men call 'bosh,' and nothing more. Though it be veiled in the language of philosophy, the scientific jargon which makes God into insensible force is covert atheism. I must have a God that hears and sees, and comes into the arena of my daily life, and helps me because he loves me, or else I have no God. My God dwells with me, and works for me, or else I have no God. Fine words, pretty phrases, and magnificent definitions are so many windbags, and go for nothing: there cannot be a deaf God, or a blind God, or an insensible God. If any of you so believe, go you to Bedlam, and find your fit associates. As for us, we know that the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob is the living God, and his memorial is that he heareth prayer."§

This outburst was aimed at Matthew Arnold, who defined God as "a power, not ourselves, that makes for righteousness." But how could anyone pray to an impersonal "power"? One might as well pray to a current of electricity.

The dilemma by which religion is faced, the insoluble problem that so many philosophers have attempted to solve, but against which they have broken themselves in vain, is this attempt to square the infinite existence of God with a personality responding to the wishes and aspirations of those weak and spiritless souls who, according to their own confession, could not observe the ordinary laws of morality unless they believed that a righteous Judge was secretly watching their every action, to punish or reward.

An "Infinite Personality" is a contradiction in terms. You can place the words together in print, but you cannot amalgamate them in thought. How can something filling infinite space bear the shape of a person? It is unthinkable. Even the philosophers are beaten here. Spinoza, the greatest of them all, arrived at the idea that there is but one existence—not two, as the pious think, a material and a spiritual—infinite, eternal, self-existent, simple and indivisible, of which all elements are but modes; this substance being God. In fact, that God did not exist apart from and over the universe—like an emperor over his dominions—but God was the universe.

Unfortunately, the pious have never been able to agree as to whether Spinoza was "a God-intoxicated man" or an out-and-out Atheist. It is significant of the thin tissue between the Pantheism of Spinoza and Atheism, that Charles Bradlaugh's philosophy was largely founded upon Spinoza's Pantheism. All that was required was to drop the word "God," use Monism in its place, and there you have your Godless, infinite, self-existing, eternal universe complete, four-square to all the winds that blow.

When the religious try to establish the existence of an impersonal God, they are sawing off the bough upon which they are sitting. It is related of an old monk named Serapion, who had been convinced of the folly of attributing a human form to God, that, upon kneeling down to pray, the image which his imagination had conceived for so many years had disappeared. The old man burst into tears, exclaiming, "You have robbed me of my God."* Yes, take away the human form and attributes from God, and you are committed to Atheism, no matter what you call your system of religion or what religious ritual and symbols you attach to it. The mass of the people will never attempt to juggle with these fancy systems of Theism, Pantheism, the Immanence of God, and so forth. Their choice will be between a human God or Atheism. As Dr. Maudsley well says:—

> "There is always a fund of wisdom in the common sense and practical instincts of the common people, the instruction whereof philosophy misses when it neglects or disdains to take sufficient account of it. Having to deal with the stern realities of life, working men are compelled to have working beliefs in order to act; feeling instinctively that the best test of the value of a belief is—Will it work? they turn their backs impatiently upon empty abstractions and demand beliefs with real contents. For example, persons of culture who make for themselves the dismayful discovery that they cannot go on believing in a personal God, are happy to take refuge in more general terms and abstractions, such as Deism and Pantheism, and make mighty use of them; but the laboring classes, rejecting such barren metaphysical abstractions, either repudiate God altogether or demand that, if there be a God who ruleth the earth, He shall be a real living God, working in the events of the world as they do themselves; not an abstract absolute, emptied of contents and living only in the misty regions of speculative thought, but 'a literal, personal, and eternal God.' Thus they, by their practical instincts, escape those self-deceiving effects of abstractions by which philosophers sometimes seek and discover the explanation of a concrete fact in what is no more than the abstract statement of the very same fact."†

We have now traced the origin of the idea of the Supernatural, which had its germ in the fear of the unknown, common to animals and man. This became confirmed when primitive man—by means of dreams and similar delusions—arrived at the idea of spiritual existences, which he held responsible for the storm, the lightning and thunder, for disease and death; in fact, for everything evil.

Arriving, by way of chiefs and kings, at Polytheism, or the worship of many gods, both good and evil, as he rose in knowledge and culture he gradually began to discard his gods and spirits, which, originally all evil, gradually assumed the morals and manners of their worshipers, until they were whittled down to one Supreme Being, all-good. But as the progress of knowledge has left nothing for this Being to do, "Science," as Caro wittily puts it, "Science conducts God with honor to the frontiers, thanking him for his provisional services."

---

* A. D. White, The Warfare of Science, vol. i., p. i. Professor White says that he saw at Munich a banner, dated 1727, on which Jesus "was shown turning and shaping the globe on a lathe, which he keeps in motion with his foot.....God the Father looking approvingly upon him from a cloud" (vol. i., p. 12).

† "Luther," by J. A. Froude, Contemporary Review, July, 1883.

‡ Michelet, Life of Luther (Bohm's edition), p. 341.

§ Sermon (No. 2, 118), The Planter of the Ear Must Hear, p. 665. Preached Oct. 31, 1889. The italics are his own.

* Lecky, History of European Morals, vol. i., p. 52.

† Maudsley, Natural Causes and Supernatural Seemings, pp. 11-12 (1887).

Digitized by Google

Let us conclude with the inspiring words of Colonel Ingersoll:—

> "Let the ghosts go—we will worship them no more. Man is greater than these phantoms. Humanity is grander than all the creeds, than all the books. Humanity is the great sea, and these creeds, and books, and religions, are but the waves of a day. Humanity is the sky, and these religions and dogmas and theories are but the mists and clouds, changing continually, finally to melt away. That which is founded upon slavery, and fear, and ignorance, cannot endure. In the religion of the future there will be men and women and children, all the aspirations of the soul, and all the tender humanities of the heart. Let the ghosts go. We will worship them no more. Let them cover their eyeless sockets with their fleshless hands and fade for ever from the imagination of men."*

W. MANN.

Acid Drops

The Russian papers, according to last week's News of the World, published one of the Kaiser's farewell speeches to a division of the army going off to the front, in which the following tit-bit occurs:—

> "Remember that the German people are the chosen of God. On me, as German Emperor, the spirit of God has descended. I am His weapon, His sword, and His vice-regent. Woe to the disobedient, death to cowards and unbelievers."

A poor man who talked like this would soon be in a lunatic asylum. The Kaiser should have been put under restraint many years ago. The malady he suffers from is very common amongst the insane. It begins in what the Americans christened swelled-head. The religious symptoms show that the Kaiser's case is hopeless.

The Kaiser's madness has spread downwards through his whole Army. After his abominable defence of the destruction of Louvain, with its insensibility to everybody's rights and feelings but his own, we need not be surprised at any atrocities on the part of his soldiers, who are themselves treated like dogs by their own officers. We take the following sample from a letter from Mr. E. Alexander Powell, special correspondent of the New York World and the Daily Chronicle, published in the latter journal on Monday, September 14:—

> "A sentry on duty in front of General Headquarters failed to salute an officer with sufficient promptness, whereupon the officer lashed him again and again across the face with his riding whip. Though welts rose at every blow, the soldier stood rigidly at attention and never quivered."

What can be expected of men who are liable to such treatment themselves?

Perhaps we ought not to be too hard on the Kaiser, and we mustn't overcrowd the asylums. There is Mr. Bottomley, for instance, who backed up Austria in its intention to give Servia a castigation, and now perceives that his view of the situation was totally mistaken; Servia having refused to accept a castigation, and administered one to Austria instead. Mr. Bottomley had to "change the subject" to avoid damage to his infallibility, and the war gave him an opportunity of working "the pious lay." He and the Kaiser are running each other very close in that direction. The Kaiser says that God has chosen the Germans; Mr. Bottomley says that God has chosen the British. All these gentlemen mean is that the greatest nation on earth must be the one they belong to. We regret to say that most people's patriotism comes to that—and no more.

Britishers may fight as well as ever, but the muse of war languishes. The case is so bad that even Begbie is treated as inspired. Kipling himself seems played out, and Watson shows that in finding Christ he has lost song.

There is a pedestrian poet called Kaufman who supplies patriotic verse to Reynolds' Newspaper. Does the editor pay him, or does he pay the editor, for its insertion? The betting odds must, we think, be on the latter.

A laudatory notice of Mr. Robert Blatchford in the last number of the Weekly Dispatch refers to all his writings except those against Christianity. Is this by agreement?

"Providence," says Lord Charles Beresford, "will never countenance barbarities which were far more atrocious than those of the Middle Ages." Lord Charles was referring to the reported doings of the German troops, and he seems to have quite overlooked the fact that "Providence" has countenanced them. "Providence" is quite a hardened offender in this direction. It has never interfered to prevent atrocities in past ages, and we see no reason for assuming that it will be shocked by those that are being pepetrated to-day.

Canon Wilberforce would agree with Lord Charles Beresford. He says:—

> "A God who, to further the insane ambitions of one man, will shock the moral sense of the whole civilised world, turn Belgium into a shambles, and promote upon an unoffending nation an aggressive attack [What is an unaggressive attack?] which for its ferocity, its treacherous break of solemn international obligations, bids fair to outdo the wickedest and bloodiest struggles in the history of the world! such a God would, of course, cordially approve of the Kaiser."

But clearly God has not prevented the Kaiser's doing these things. He has permitted the German troops to outrage, to burn, to murder, and how can it be said that he will show his disapproval by arranging for the German forces to be beaten in the end? If he could do this at the end, why not at the beginning? Or, if these outrages occurred without his sanction, why may not their cessation be brought about without his co-operation? Good is not really triumphant because at the end a murderer is hung. Evil has triumphed already in the murder of the victim. And whoever wins the present war the triumph of evil is assured. That is certain, from the fact of the war having taken place. And if people were not blinded by theology, they would realise the absurdity of God's government of the world being justified by the signing of peace over the ruins of thousands of homes and the bodies of many thousands of innocent victims. God's rule is not justified by the cessation of brutalities; it is impeached by their occurrence.

God, says Canon Wilberforce, shares our sorrows. He knows every pang we shall feel, but he permits it. And he adds "the question of why this is so is no business of ours." Is it not? It seems to us that, if there be a God, this is our business. If it is not, why do Canon Wilberforce and others spend so much time trying to explain why these sorrows are "permitted"? We believe it is not our real business to bother about "God" at all. But if we do believe in a God, we are bound to frame some theory of things that fits in with his assumed existence. No doubt Canon Wilberforce means that it is not our business to blame God. A good Christian should act like a camel—take his burdens kneeling.

Rather an interesting correspondence is going on in several of the religious weeklies concerning the duties of Christians in the present crisis. Ought they to take part in the war or not? If the answer is Yes, are they not pinning their faith to force, and what then becomes of the Christian teaching of non-resistance and of conquering by love? Some of the clerical writers who are taking part in this controversy, and who plump for war, seem to be quite unaware of the fact that they are knocking the bottom clean out of Christian teaching. Rev. F. Y. Leggatt, for instance, asks whether another clerical gentleman really means that, in order for England to live up to its Christianity, it should disband its Army and sink its Fleet? If so, ought we to disband the police force and trust to overcome the predatory instincts of the burglar by our pacific zeal?

All this is no doubt considered very telling, but an uncompromising Christian ought to answer Yes to these questions without the least hesitation. The New Testament does teach non-resistance; it does command us to turn one cheek when the other is smitten; it does say "Resist not evil." Of course, these teachings are absurd, as Freethinkers have always pointed out; and all that Mr. Leggatt and those who agree with him prove is the absurdity of the doctrines they profess to have faith in. For clearly, if evil is to be overcome by non-resistance, it must be done when evil is afoot. It becomes still more absurd to say that the teaching is only to be practised when there is no evil to combat. Mr. Leggatt is proving that common sense and logic are too strong for Christian teaching—that and his own insincerity, or shortsightedness, in preaching one thing and practising another.

Mr. Fielding Hall, in his Soul of a People, tells a story of the Buddhist priests which bears on this point. When the English invaded Burma—after painting the abstemious, tolerant Buddhist Theebaw as a drunken, dissolute perse-

* Colonel Ingersoll, The Ghosts, p. 32 (1881).

Digitized by Google

cutor—the Burmese Buddhist soldiers consulted their priests as to what they were to do. Buddhism says "Thou shalt not kill." It also says that no man can take life, under any circumstances, without paying the price. What, then, were the soldiers to do? If they did not fight, they were disloyal to their country. If they fought and killed, would they suffer for it? The reply of the Buddhist priests was simple and straightforward. There, they said, is the law. We did not make it, and we cannot unmake it. No man can take life without his nature suffering. It may be that duty demands that you shall kill, but the consequences of a natural law cannot be set aside by national exigencies. Each man must decide for himself. And each Buddhist soldier went to war feeling that, however necessary, he would pay a price over and above that of being wounded or even killed. On the other hand, the Christian soldier went to war encouraged by his priests, and with their blessings on the annexation of—ruby mines. Had Buddhism been as Christianity is, its priests would have found an easy excuse for sanctioning warfare. Being a philosophy and not a religion, it remained true to itself.

Mr. Silas K. Hocking differs from Mr. Leggatt in not finding any Christian sanction for the war. He says, with truth: "Since the first century, the Church—speaking broadly—has never taught that war is 'the crime of Cain multiplied a millionfold,' or, indeed, any crime at all; had it done so, the present war would be impossible.....The Church to-day believes in war through and through." And he adds:—

> "I blame the Tsar scarcely less than the Kaiser for this wicked and inhuman war. Yet they are both devoted members of the Christian Church. Will the Church cast them out as men who have denied the faith? I scarcely think so. If the Kaiser wins, the Protestant Church of Germany will hail him as the anointed of the Lord; and if he loses, the same Church will add his name to the long roll of Christian martyrs."

That is putting the essence of the position in a paragraph.

Mr. Hocking asks, "What does the Church stand for in Europe to-day?" He might well ask, What does religion stand for in Europe to-day? British Christians will reply that it strengthens us in a righteous war. But did any country ever go to war without persuading itself that right was on its side? It is clear that Germany is as strongly convinced that it, also, is engaged in a righteous war. The truth is that we should have to oppose German aggrandisement in any case, and the need for that is responsible for our attitude to-day. Really, so far as religion is concerned, its direct and unmistakable influence is, as usual, in the wrong direction. Of course, the vast majority of our soldiers would call themselves Christians, but they go to battle singing, not hymns, but "It's a long, long way to Tipperary." On the other hand, the Kaiser, whom all good Britons are cursing heartily, is a Christian of the most sincere and pronounced type. He believes he is one of the representatives of God on earth. He is convinced that God is on his side, and that he is carrying out God's will. British Christians believe him to be deluded, and we argue that he is. But that does not affect the vital fact, the ambitions and ideals of the German Emperor are vitalised by his intense religious conviction. Were he less religious, he might see himself and his aims in a more rational light.

How silly the doctrine of original sin seems in the light of the gay spirit of Tommy Atkins, whether safe and sound, or slightly or badly wounded, or—we were going to say dead. One of the prettiest things we have seen for a long time is Mr. Horace Grant's report in the Daily Mirror of September 14 of a talk he had with a Tommy who had been left behind in the hospital at Havre, had been there a fortnight, and was just going for his first limping trial. When he was asked what struck him most forcibly about the Germans, he replied laughingly, "The bullet that hit my calf." Observe the humor as well as the good humor. The Germans are reported to be bad shots with the rifle.

Here is one of those things that might have been said otherwise; it occurs in an editorial paragraph in an Essex newspaper:—

> "In last week's issue I referred to the great increase in the population of Chelmsford and neighboring villages, brought about by the presence of many thousands of Territorials."

Oh! Ah! The writer should try again.

The election of the new Pope was complicated by the war, but the villainous saltpetre did not prevent the successors of St. Peter making the usual choice of an Italian ecclesiastic. In the olden times "God" was very partial to Jewish gentlemen, nowadays he seems to favor the nation which supplies the ice-cream vendors.

The Daily Telegraph is more pious than its less orthodox rivals, and we are not surprised at a fulsome eulogy of the Papacy appearing in its pages. But what does this religious periodical mean by asking the new Pope to join in a "resistance to a God-defying barbarism?" Has the Kaiser sent an ultimatum to God already?

The innate snobbishness of English editors emerges in these troublous times. The heroism of a duke; the Spartan economics of a duchess, who has one lump of sugar in her tea instead of four; the wondrous bravery of august personages at the front—at Aldershot—move these penmen to ecstasies of emotion, paid for at the customary rates. Who would imagine that these journalists and their readers worship a carpenter-God?

Men who enlist are told that they will come back from the war covered with glory. Some of them will stop there, covered with something heavier. And what will be the glory worth to the women and children while their bread-winners are away? A young husband that we know of joins the Army; his young wife, totally unprovided for, seeks something to live on, when it ought to be offered to her. Something is said to her about 4s. 6d. a week. She is asked what she can earn? What did she do for a living before she married? Something at a jeweller's. Oh, it's no use looking for work in that line now. Could she do charing? The poor girl—for she is no more—mutters "Yes" in her fright. She goes up like a culprit, and is treated as such. This is what glory means, in cash terms, to the women of the "heroes" who risk their lives for "King and Country" on foreign soil.

We understand that insolence to volunteer soldiers' wives is the rule rather than the exception. When they ask for their weekly allowance they are treated as if they were beggars asking for charity. As a matter of fact they ought not to have to fetch it at all. It ought to be taken to them. They are women, to begin with,—wives, probably mothers; and as such men should regard them all as of the blood royal. Fancy telling a mother of two children, whose husband was on active service at the front, that she should go out to work! Work! What was she doing already with two children to look after? Isn't that work enough for any woman already. Work! What was her husband doing? It is a pity that he couldn't give his own view of it on the spot. And what hypocrites the upper and middle classes must be to let such things continue. "Tommy" out at the front is a "hero." He is told so, his wife is told so, she is proud of her man. Yet when it comes to providing her "a grant" (hateful word!) in lieu of wages to supply just the common decencies of life, there is humming and ha'ing and worse. The "hero" disappears when it comes to paying up. One really cannot help asking if the people whose battles "Tommy" fights, who get up public funds and "administer" them (that's the word), are worth protecting.

Some people, mostly belonging to the "administration" classes, will no doubt accuse us of inventing. But there never was any need to invent insolence on the part of the rich to the poor. Besides, such a case was reported in the Daily Chronicle of September 12. It was adduced by Alderman Parry at a meeting of the Newport (Mon.) Corporation. Another councillor stated that complaints in relation to the Prince of Wales's Relief Fund were general.

Mr. A. M. Thompson tells men who have their livings to get to think of their wives and children before enlisting in the Army, even for the duration of the present War. "The root of true patriotism," he says, "is in men's devotion to their families. All other kinds are swank and bluster." Ingersoll puts the same truth with greater verve and humor. Every man, he said, will handle a rifle to defend his own home, but who will shoulder a rifle to defend a boarding-house?

Mr. Thompson speaks of the "Socialist attitude" in this war. We cannot ascertain that there is any Socialist attitude. There are many Socialist attitudes,—which is a very different thing. British and French Socialists are actually fighting German Socialists on the battlefield. The other day the Star referred to an article by Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner as expressing the Rationalist view of the war. We are not aware that there is any Rationalist view of the war, or that Mrs. Bonner has any mandate to express it, if there is. We are not quarrelling with her view in itself; we only dispute it as officially, or in any other way, representing the Freethought party in England. Even if "Rationalist" be narrowed down to the membership of one particular association, we should hardly think the lady is entitled to speak for all of them.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Bernard Shaw once said that Socialism would succeed if it were not for Socialists. This criticism would be true in relation to some other causes. At the last Rationalist Peace Society's annual meeting Mr. Foote was asked to "say a few words," which, much against his inclination, he consented to do. He tried to correct the Norman Angell worship which was going on inside that Society as well as outside. It was not true that nations would refrain from war by finding out that it didn't pay. No nation, in modern times, ever thought it did pay. Peace parties were getting too optimistic. The main cause of war lay in human nature itself, and these were nearly as active in Pacifists as in Militarists. War and Peace were not only a question of intelligence—they were also a question of character. A peaceable disposition, aided by a sense of justice, and even a vein of humor, was a great preventive of all sorts of quarrels. Europe was growing worse instead of better. War might break out almost any day—even before the Society's next annual meeting. Let them not chortle too loudly. For his part, he hoped for the best, but feared the worst. Mr. Foote was followed and rebuked by one of those unwise "friends" of advanced causes who take their own wishes to be the measure of future reality. She (it was a lady) was sorry to see Mr. Foote, of all men, going back on the Peace causes in this way. Surely the world had made too much progress to start fighting again. And so forth—and so forth; stuff which cannot be answered as there is nothing in it. Well, what has happened? Mr. Foote hasn't gone back an inch, and—war is here—the war of wars, enveloping most of Europe, and involving also Asia, Africa, America, and Australia.

Mr. Foote doesn't "go back," for all his views are convictions founded on principle and carefully thought out. He never opens his mouth, or wields his pen, on any subject without doing this to the best of his ability. His old friend Mr. F. J. Gould, favoring him with a new photograph lately, wrote upon it as presented to one who "never swerved." We have already said that Mr. Foote appreciates the compliment, coming from one who knows and understands.

"Daniel was an admirable scholar, yet in the crisis he needed more than learning." Thus said the Rev. Bryan Marshall, a Southend parson. If Brother Marshall is referring to Daniel's interview with the lions, we agree that a fist like a leg of mutton would be more useful than a knowledge of Hebrew.

In the old adage, after the mountain had been in labor it produced a mouse. Following the fulsome press adulation of the Bishop of London's bravery in going to "the front," we read that he is remaining with the London Rifle Brigade in camp. Evidently his lordship does not wish to go to heaven in a hurry.

A misprint in a parish magazine reads, "Give pence in our time, O Lord!" instead of peace. Probably the readers, already inured to the rattle of the collection-boxes, brace-buttons and all, did not notice the mistake.

"The Germans are never tired of appealing to God," says the Evening News. The canting appeal has been heard also in Carmelite House, so the Teuton is not alone in his theological prejudices.

"God help them when we get to Berlin" is Russian comment on account of German atrocities. Religion is such a civilising influence.

According to the Evening News, the crypt of Brixton Parish Church is to be converted into a rifle range. A fitting place for the funeral of the religion of the "Prince of Peace."

It was a humorous coincidence which caused a bold announcement of a "military pickle" to appear immediately above the latest war news in an evening contemporary. Let us hope that hasty readers were not misled.

A few months ago we were assured that the Brotherhood movement was going to reform the world. It claimed millions of followers, and alleged that it was backed up by Omnipotence. The present exhibition of brotherly love in Europe is scarcely a testimonial to the influence of the movement.

Mr. R. M. Jones, speaking at a Sunday-school Demonstration at Southend-on-Sea, said that "There is a divine spark in all of us, but we simply poured water on it and quenched it." That's the worst of living at the seaside. Water is so cheap.

Some religious people have objected that "It's a long, long way to Tipperary," the song warbled by our soldiers, is a music-hall melody. Did they think that the boys would march to battle singing, "When my eyeballs crack in death," or some other lugubrious ditty?

"The predominant forces are not the intellectual," says the Rev. J. Bryan Marshall, a Baptist minister of Southend-on-Sea. Probably there are more tradesmen in his church than "intellectuals," and cutting cheese with a wire is not the best expression of "god-like reason."

Last week's Reynolds' reported the magnificent news that the Archbishop of Canterbury had visited the Folkestone Technical Schools, now the headquarters of the Belgium Relief Fund Committee. "He conversed with some of the refugees," it is added, "in their own language." Our contemporary appears to think there is a Belgian language. There is not—any more than there is an Austrian language or a Swiss language. French is the State language in Belgium, and Flemish is spoken side by side with it. Many languages are spoken in Austro-Hungary, but the State language is German. French is the State language in Switzerland, but German and Italian are also spoken. What the Archbishop spoke was probably French, and there is nothing miraculous in an educated Englishman (or Scotsman) speaking that.

"Sex After Death" is the interesting title of an article in the Nineteenth Century and After. Dear, dear! This implies dressmakers after death, for such modest Christian gentlemen as the late Rev. Price Hughes and W. T. Stead would never be happy in the midst of unclothed angels.

Toy Noah's arks, which are such favorites with children, appear to have been a speciality of German manufacturers, and there is now a dearth of these juvenile delights. Unless British manufacturers oblige, small Christians will soon cease to see the animals go in "two by two."

Rev. Matthys Vandeweg, minister of the Dutch Reformed Church, took to calling Miss Anna C. Brink, a school-teacher at Lindley, "Atheist" and other names, not calculated to gain her the love and respect of her fellow-citizens. He also threw out the gravest hints as to her immorality, and expressed horror as to her low-cut blouse, which gave him such a shock that his eyesight went wrong, and he could hardly look at her. But on this point clergymen are not the best of witnesses; they are so inflammable. The other charges, however, were more important, and the reverend gentleman seems to have pressed them both in his sermons and in his prayers. When an official inquiry was instituted, the man of God tried Lord Hugh Cecil's trick, which filled the House of Commons with derisive disgust in the Lloyd George "Marconi" case. The reverend gentleman had documents too filthy to produce, but "everybody was at liberty to come and read them at the Parsonage." Miss Brink was at length obliged to bring an action against him for defamation of character, obtaining a verdict with £500 damages and costs. The Chief Justice at Bloemfontein, before whom the action was tried, said "the Court found that the defendant was not actuated by a proper sense of duty, but by express malice." "I may state here," the judge added, "for the benefit of ministers of religion, if they imagine that in the twentieth century the general public is going to endure their attacks on individuals from the pulpit, they are very much mistaken." This declaration was greeted with loud applause by the public in court. It ought not to have been, of course, but we are glad the applause was on the side it was.

To meet the common Christian objection to any report to the discredit of a man of God, we may state that the information in the foregoing paragraph is derived from long reports in the Transvaal Leader of August 18 and August 20.

"The outbreak of war sent us all to our knees," says the Rev. D. Ewart James, a prominent Essex Congregationalist minister. It is reassuring to know that the weaker brethren were not under the table.

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £206 3s. 6d. Received since:—Mr. and Mrs. Capon, 2s.: P. W. Smart, 2s.; W. Bean, 5s.: P. C. H., 2s. 6d.; F. G. Margetson, 5s.

J. LATHAM.—There seems to be a slump in the Freethought movement in South Africa: we mean as a movement. Our correspondence and our subscribers' book show there are many individual Freethinkers. Great things were to happen when our friends the Rationalists came along, but new names don't always mean new life.

W. H. MORRISH.—It is good to see a veteran "saint" so constantly cheerful. But you know where the clergy say you are going. Pause, Pause, as the curate cried, hanging his leg of mutton hands out over the pulpit. But, seriously, our hand, old friend!

W. H. HUNT.—Much overset this week; room perhaps in next issue.

JAMES NEATE, 385 Bethnal Green-road, desires the address of Mr. James Rowney, the lecturer.

F. CAFFERY.—We read Taylor's Devil's Pulpit ever so many years ago. We cannot attempt to criticise it in this column.

A. H. SMITH.—Apportioned as desired. Glad you find this journal so interesting.

A. T. GILLMAN.—We cannot tell for certain yet. The weekly drop on a paper like ours during war-time is cumulative—something like the fall of a stone under gravitation in the atmosphere. We have not suffered much yet, but we have fears of the future. A few weeks will decide. Meanwhile we make no alteration whatever. Perhaps our readers will do their very best to push our circulation just now, by introducing the paper to friends and acquaintances.

W. P. BALL.—Cuttings welcome.

T. LONSDALE.—Sorry, but not surprised, to hear the Glasgow Branch has decided to drop its Winter Lectures for once. Our own impression is that this war is not going to be a long one.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We are always glad to see the handwriting of our old friend and veteran "saint," Mr. W. Morrish, of Bristol, whose memory goes back to the Southwell and Holyoake prosecutions for "blasphemy." In his latest letter to us he says:—

> "I greatly admired Mr. Cohen's article on the blasphemous utterances of 'the Christian Kaiser.' It would make an excellent leaflet, and I hope it will be reprinted. It was just splendid."

The suggestion shall be considered,—on the financial side; it needs none on any other. Unfortunately there is very little money available at present even for the worthiest investments. But it is "now or never" with a tract about the Kaiser.

For many reasons it is to be hoped that this horrible war will soon reach its finish. Freethought propaganda will have a bad time until peace is restored. Audiences will be difficult to obtain. The "saints" alone do not make a meeting to pay its way; some of the general public must be present to constitute a success—and it is really the general public that the lecturers want to get at. We note that the Glasgow N. S. S. Branch has resolved to drop this Winter Lecture Session altogether. Mr. Foote was to have lectured there on October 18. The Birmingham Town Hall is not now available for his visit on November 1. He is not yet sure about Queen's (Minor) Hall on the first two Sundays in October, but a definite announcement will appear in next week's Freethinker. It is fortunate that this journal is blessed with a strong constitution. There is something, even in the days of Armageddon, to concentrate upon; and we trust the "saints" will make every effort to maintain and even promote our circulation during this distressful period.

Both N. S. S. Demonstrations held last Sunday at Finsbury and Regent's Parks were highly successful, the audience at Regent's Park being particularly good. Inspiring speeches were delivered by Messrs. Cohen, Davidson, Hope, Howell-Smith, and Miss Kough, the all-absorbing topic of the war being dealt with from a Freethought standpoint. Mr. E. C. Ratcliffe kept the meeting in the best of humor by his skilful and efficient chairmanship. The Society's thanks are again due to Mr. Edwin Wilson for personally superintending the arrangement for the platform, consisting of a brake drawn by two magnificent horses kindly provided by him.

This is not exactly a "Sugar Plum," but we don't know where else to put it. There is sweetness, of course in being able to report that Mr. W. Heaford is on the way to recovery, but we are very sorry that there is any occasion for this to be good news. We have only just heard (from himself) that he has had a very bad nervous breakdown, which he cannot hope to get the better of in a brief space of time. But hundreds of friends will hope, as we do, that the time will be shorter than it threatens.

We hope our Brussells contemporary, La Pensée, bravely and ably conducted by M. Eugène Hins, will soon see the end of its "suspension." When the city is once more free from invaders and assassins it should be possible to resume the publication of that gallant journal. It has had an uphill fight at all times, but all Freethought journals have that. What an heroic chronicle the history of Freethought journalism would be!

A Christian Apologist.

WAS ever such a queer Apologist?
He invents a faith no mortal could conceive
Except himself,—and only he believe;
And gaily ropes of sand proceeds to twist:
His "arguments" are but midsummer madness,
And seem intended for ironic jests,—
Or show that maggots in his brain are guests
If he advances them in sober sadness.

Yet wherefore censure his ingenious folly?
A foolish faith makes fools of its confessors:
The deadly dullness of his predecessors
He shuns, and strives to make his quips seem jolly:
With sophistries and paradoxes glib
His faith becomes a Chestertonian squib!

B. D.

WHITMAN AND INGERSOLL.

Whitman said: "I had a visitor one day last week, a preacher fellow: he wore black clothes, clerical: was quite courteous, almost gracious.....Just before he left he said (here Whitman paused and chuckled): 'I hope it is not true, Mr. Whitman, that you are a great admirer of Bob Ingersoll.' It was lugged in in such a way that I felt as if that was really the purpose of his visit—to satisfy himself on that point. I blurted out at once, so that he should remain in no uncertainty: 'I'm afraid, my friend, that I hope it is true and always may be true.' You should have seen his crestfallen face. He said at once: 'I confess I am disappointed.' I only smiled. He seemed to take it to heart. I asked him: 'I suppose your religion has a place for Ingersoll?' He answered evasively: 'That opens up a large field,' which meant that he had his doubts. So I hurried to add: 'Well, I am afraid mine does, anyhow. Leaves of Grass would be a poor sort of pretender if it flourished a whip over people.' He bowed as if to say, Have it as you will. The fellow riled me a bit, too; it was all so unnecessary. I did not wish him to go supposing my love for the Colonel was only a half-hearted sort of thing—an apology: so I said quite vehemently: 'You must make no mistake about it: I am Bob's friend: I admire him: I stand by him in his war on the Church. He was as solemn as a judge by this time. 'And in his war against religion, Mr. Whitman—do you stand by him in that?' I answered: 'He makes no war on religion.'"

Whitman laughed. "It's astonishing to me how those preacher people thin themselves down—lose their blood: they have no more guts than a dead weasel: they nose about with their little hells and heavens, like a corner grocer with something toothsome to sell."—Horace Traubel, "With Walt Whitman in Camden."

Digitized by Google

Heredity and Progress.—II.

(BY THE LATE J. M. WHEELER.)

(Concluded from p. 588.)

Is heredity, with its constant ancestral pull, a bar to progress? Not entirely. The average type to which the tendency is to revert is not a stationary one. The aptitude for progress, the habit of adaptability to new conditions, and the faculty of invention, are themselves heritable, and with each generation the liability to reversion is slightly diminished. It still remains true that the civilised races supplant savages, and that feebler nations are overcome by stronger ones. The children of a gifted pair are far more likely to be gifted than the children of an average pair. I say pair, for any exceptional quality will be diminished in the first generation unless both parents partake of it. In the case of music we observe stronger evidence of inherited faculty than in other arts, for musicians usually select a partner with at least a love of music. In the Jews we can see that all their art has run in this direction, the plastic arts having been forbidden to them. That many eminent musicians have had Jewish blood in their veins is well known. Great musicians, indeed, almost invariably come of a musical family. It was so with Beethoven, Hadyn, and Mozart. Still more striking is the case of the family which boasted Sebastian Bach as the culminating illustration of its musical genius. Through eight generations it produced multitudes of musicians of high rank, of whom twenty-nine were reckoned eminent. If, in our gardening, we desire to produce larger seeds, a considerable selection will have to be made through successive generations, and, if we wish to improve any valuable human quality, a careful selection of partners might be made and continued for several generations. Of two persons apparently equal, one may be an excellent specimen of a poor stock, the other an average specimen of a better one. Marriage with the latter is preferable, since there is a diminished liability to reversion to a lower type. And the latter case is the more unlikely. The tendency to mediocrity, as we have seen, makes it more frequently the case that an exceptional man is the somewhat exceptional son of mediocre parents than the average son of exceptional parents. The breeder considers "pedigree" even more than form.

Plato long since advocated breeding from the best men only, and in our own times Schopenhauer has hinted that great men should breed from as many as they please. "The life is impossible," said Aristotle of Plato's stud farm, and if the same is said now of the schemes of eugenics, stirpiculture, or man-breeding, it will arise from the same reason. Marriageable persons and their parents will look rather at their own immediate wants than at any ideal improvement of the race. Yet just as selfish trade benefits the world, so does sexual selection, looking only at its own interest on the whole, bring into existence the lives fittest for the environment. Each party usually has some eye to assistance, comfort, and happiness, which are supports in the struggle for existence; and the attraction of "beauty," after all, mainly consists in the requisites for the continuance of the race, including health, intelligence, energy, and amiability. The type before referred to in the composite picture representing health, in the frontispiece of Galton's book, is that of what ninety-nine women out of a hundred would, other things being equal, consider an "eligible" young man. Moreover, nature's blinder method does act, despite the artificial hindrances of civilisation. It is true weakly lives are preserved that would have perished in barbarous lands, and that both wealth and sentiment interpose shields between the action of natural selection and many of its rightful victims. But, though humanitarianism and medical science may preserve the unfit for a generation, it cannot do so in the end. Galton carefully analysed the census returns of a thousand factory operatives of Coventry, and of the same number of agriculturalists from the surrounding small rural parishes, and found that the former had but little more than half as many adult grandchildren as the latter. They had fewer offspring, and of these a smaller proportion reached adult life. The offspring of the constitutionally diseased are stamped out in the long run. For the consumptive, scrofulous, epileptic, or otherwise hopelessly disordered, to have children is as absurd, not to say immoral, as to propagate a race of cretins. I say to have children, for, if they would avail themselves of the methods which Neo-Malthusianism places within their reach, I see little objection to their marrying among themselves, but strong objections against their marrying with those who might take better partners. They should be content to let the race be continued by those best fitted to meet its requirements. And here I take occasion to remark how the doctrine of Evolution, first suggested to Darwin in connection with Malthus's law of population, tells strongly against the conclusion of Malthus that the prudent should refrain from early marriage. On the contrary, it is the prudent who should marry early. As fecundity diminishes with age, the wisest policy is that which retards the average age of marriage among the feeble and hastens it among the vigorous classes. Ruskin, in eloquent words, has urged that marriage should be in the nature of a reward to be earned before permitted. If this is somewhat Utopian, at any rate a public sentiment is growing adverse to the placid reproduction of themselves by the criminal and diseased. The type of character which leads to criminality is shown by statistics to be strongly inherited. Dr. R. L. Dugdale, of New York, followed the lines of descent from one Margaret Jukes, whose progeny for six generations, including in all seven hundred and nine persons, turned out thieves, prostitutes, murderers, and idiots.

> "Whate'er Ezekiel may allege,
> When fathers eat of sour grapes
> The children's teeth are set on edge."

The main characteristics demanded in modern man are obvious enough. "Brains, sir," said Opie, when asked what he mixed his colors with. While the civilised man is but a fraction taller than the savage, his cranial capacity is larger by nearly thirty per cent. His brain, too, presents increased diversity in its convolutions. With brains are required larger powers of vitality to direct them, and of self-regulation to use them in conformity with the needs of social life.

Galton says: "In any scheme of eugenics energy is the most important quality to favor." Of its importance there can be no doubt; yet I venture the proviso that the energy must be of an enduring kind. The stress of civilisation is calculated to develop precocious energy, and to use it up speedily. It is still a question whether a long-lived phlegmatic race may not hold its own against one with a more glowing, but more easily diminished, vitality. Intellect is essential, but it must be backed up by physical vigor. Fineness of nerve is apt to end in fragility. Overbred animals have little stamina, and the race of German professors, which, it is said, has been vastly improved by the custom of marrying daughters of professors, might be bettered by an occasional variation with the daughter of an intelligent farm laborer of good descent. The Greeks were intellectually the superiors of the Romans, yet the latter had the stronger wills and the more vigorous vitality.

Modern progress also depends largely upon adaptability to new conditions. Those races and persons who insist upon retaining the ideas and institutions of the past can no more hope to hold their position against those of greater adaptability than can a person expect to protect himself from modern cannon with mediæval armor. We may rest assured that those who are most open to new ideas, and readiest in adopting new inventions and in setting aside faiths and formulæ no longer adapted to progressive humanity, have the future for their own, and their species will, like a dominant organism, supplant and supersede inferior forms.

Digitized by Google

The Proof-Reader at Large.

"Mind your p's and q's."—OLD SAYING.
"It is human to err."—ANOTHER OLD WHEEZE.

IN these troublous days it is well sometimes to turn from wars and rumors of wars to something that will bring a sense of relief, and, as the 'bus-driver was said to have taken his scant holidays riding on other mens' 'buses, so a journalist may be pardoned for turning for a few minutes to the amusing experiences of his profession, especially with regard to proof-readers and their unconscious lapses into humor.

The proof-reader is the watch-dog of literature, and he is the author's best friend. Perhaps the haste with which modern books and periodicals are produced is responsible for the greater prevalence of the printer's error than formerly. Of the proof-reader it may be remarked that his strokes of humor owe much of their success to their surroundings. The flashes of fun are spread over pages of dullness, which enhance them, just as a dark night suits fireworks, or the atmosphere of the House of Commons, or of a court of law, is propitious to a joke. Here are a few examples which show that unconscious humor is not the least laughable:—

A clergyman was made to say, in describing the burial of a friend, that "disconsolate fiends stood riveted to the sport!" instead of "disconsolate friends stood riveted to the spot."

Another clergyman once preached a sermon from the words, "All that a man hath will he give for his life." The discourse was printed, but the printer had put wife for life, to which the unhappy parson made a marginal note, "That depends upon circumstances."

The omission of the letter n in an hotel advertisement in a local paper, made the alluring announcement that mice-pies would be furnished for the delight of the guests.

The substitution of s for a once made havoc with the feelings of quite a number of people; it being stated that a marriage took place under suspicious instead of auspicious, circumstances.

A minor poet who used to chirp through the columns of a popular magazine, was made to sing about lead-booted hours instead of lazy-footed hours.

A philosophical journalist wrote "there is truth in the converse" of a certain proposition; but he had the pleasure of reading in print that "there is truth in the universe," but for that, he adds, he "would not like to vouch without further investigation."

A temperance orator lectured on "Fables: Ancient and Modern," and referred frequently in his oration to Æsop. His joy may be imagined when he found that in the newspaper report the word was rendered "Allsopp" throughout.

Perhaps a proof-reader corrected in a geographical work, "a plain covered with erratic blocks" into "a plain covered with erotic blacks." Blocks are not erratic, he probably argued, but niggers are amorous.

A delightful result of carelessness was the insertion of an advertisement in a provincial paper relating to a dog: "Pomeranian female, nearly white, quiet for home, carriage paid, thirty shillings."

An author of repute quoted, in a daily paper, Browning's "Just for a handful of silver he left us." This appeared in public as "Just for a handle of silver he left us." The author complained to the editor and explained that everybody knew the quotation, and that "handle" was not sense. The answer was that the line was not known and that sense was never expected from Browning.

A proof-reader should know stock quotations. He should never have passed the following improvement upon Milton:—

"that fatal and perfidious bark,
Built in the eclipse and rigged with curses dark,
That junk that drowned that sacred head of thine."

In the following issue of the paper the justly enraged editor said that when he saw it "we wished him a junk diet for a fortnight."

A country editor altered Shakespeare's "He smote the sledded Polack on the ice" into "He smote his leaded poleaxe on the ice."

This was a better emendation than a Teutonic professor's correction of "Christy Minstrels" to "Minstrels of Jesus."

In a printseller's catalogue we have seen Benjamin Franklin described as the "President of the United States." Nell Gywnn, in the same publication, was pictured as "a friend of Charles the Second," although this does not accurately describe the lady who was "less than kin and more than kind." But this error is at least excusable. Even Scott called Joan of Arc "an unfortunate female."

Some "malaprops" must surely be ascribed to the author as well as to the proof-reader. Anthony Trollope makes one of his heroes come "whistling up the street with a cigar in his mouth."

Even so magnificent an artist as Keats could, on occasion, perpetrate a good-sized "bull":—

"So the two brothers and their murdered man Rode towards fair Florence."

But the blame must rest on the unfortunate proof-reader when he informed the readers of a suburban paper of the coming performance of Shakespeare's Turning of the Screw.

In a report of the Colley-Maskelyne libel case, Bishop Colenso, of Natal, appeared as the Bishop of Colenso, an accidental reversal of true relations between the Bishop's name and the place called after him, which recalls the enthusiastic Imperialist who thought it splendid that Lord Melbourne should have taken his title from an Australian city.

Nobody but a good, professional proof-reader can read proof-sheets properly. An educated and accurate man, he notices the misprints, corrects the grammar, and verifies the quotations. Without a good proof-reader a book or paper goes forth in slovenly condition. The author, knowing what he intended to say, and reading in proof-sheets his own work, found there, sometimes, a printer's error. This is especially the case with dates. We know very well that Bradlaugh died in 1891, but the printer does not know, and prints 1891. The error of a single figure escapes our eyes until the statement is published, and then our language is Shavian, and proportionate to our distress. In extenuation, it may be urged, since even Homer sometimes nodded, that the proof-reader may be excused if he occasionally takes a nap. But, on the other hand, it is to be remembered that, of all mistakes, a misprint is the most indelible. Other mishaps may possibly be retrieved, but the printer's error proudly remains. Owing to publications being produced in as much haste as soap or sausages, the proof-reader is hustled nowadays, and there is a greater prevalence of printer's errors than formerly. To miss, however, the vagaries of the proof-reader is to miss one of the good things of the literary life.

MIMNERMUS.

Christian Libels Christian.

THE leading article in the British Weekly for September 10, written presumably by the editor, Sir William Robertson Nicoll, is entitled "Has Corsica Conquered Galilee"? By "Corsica" is meant physical force, and by "Galilee" Christianity. The article pretends to present the readers with the gist of the contents of two books, namely, Germany and the Next War, by General Bernhardi, and Germany and England, by the late Professor Cramb. In both Germany is described as under the dominion of the Will to Power; but Professor Cramb's little work is of a much more comprehensive character than that by the General. From the former we learn that there is a rapidly growing school in Germany which is positively hostile to Christianity; but this school is by no means confined to Germany. The Professor states that "you meet with it in England and in America, as in Austria and Spain." It is beginning to flourish even in Italy, while in France and Russia it has been a powerful factor for many years. This school is anti-Christian, and largely anti-Theistic. In Germany it is composed almost wholly of enthusiastic disciples of Nietzsche, who, it must be borne in mind, was at once anti-Christian and anti-German. He violently attacked German culture and German "flagrant and compromising lack of taste." In his pamphlet against Strauss he coined a phrase, "Culture-philistine," which, as he told Dr. Georg Brandes, "survived the thrusts of violent controversy, and has taken root in the language." He was angry with the Germans because they were "unanimous in admiration of Strauss's Old and New Faith, pronouncing it a masterpiece of acuteness and freedom of thought, and even of style." Writing to Brandes in 1888 he says:—

Digitized by Google

> "Do you imagine that I am known at all in the dear Fatherland? It is there, above all places, that I am regarded as something absurd and eccentric, something that is not wanted and need not be taken seriously. Presumably, they scent that I do not take them seriously, and how could I in these days when German Geist has become a contradiction in terms?"

He wrote a book called Ecce Homo, which, he informs us, is an onslaught on the Crucified, without the ghost of a scruple; it ends with thunder-claps and lightning flashes, that deafen and blind, against everything that is Christian or tainted with Christianity." Writing to Brandes about this volume, again in 1888, he observes:—

> "Guess who comes off the worst in Ecce Homo, Messieurs the Germans. I have told them awful things."

Now, the present followers of Nietzsche in Germany are not necessarily, and as such, active members of the German imperial party. Their great aim is to destroy Christianity, root and branch, to get rid of superstition in all its forms, and to treat the present life as the only reality known to us. They are not of necessity politicians at all; nor are they as yet, alas, Germany's "dominant thinkers." Sir William is, therefore, fundamentally wrong when he asserts that "Germany as represented by its dominant thinkers is at open war with Christ," and if he has really read the second chapter in Germany and the Next War, he knows it. All the important and influential advocates of the German imperial policy have been and are Christians. General Bernhardi boldly justifies the pursuit of that policy in the name of Christianity. On page 29 he says:—

> "There never was a religion which was more combative than Christianity. Combat, moral combat, is its very essence. If we transfer the ideas of Christianity to the sphere of politics, we can claim to raise the power of the State—power in the widest sense, not merely from the material aspect—to the highest degree, with the object of the moral advancement of humanity, and under certain conditions the sacrifice may be made which a war demands. Thus, according to Christianity, we cannot disapprove of war itself, but must admit that it is justified morally and historically."

Nothing could be plainer and more indisputable than the fact that Germany is now at war as a Christian nation, not as a nation in opposition to Christ. To maintain the contrary is to be guilty of lying to the glory of God. Why do clergymen persist in trying to circulate such a glaring falsehood? There was no better Christian in all Europe than Treitschke, the distinguished historian; and this is what Professor Cramb says of him as a politician:—

> "His answer to all our talk about the limitation of armaments is: Germany shall increase to the utmost of her power, irrespective of any proposals made to her by England or by Russia, or by any other State upon this earth. And I confess it is a magnificent and a manly answer, an answer of a man whose spirit of sincerity, of regard for the reality of things, is as great as Carlyle's.....To him the army is simply the natural expression of the vital forces of the nation; and just as those vital forces of the nation increase so shall the German army and the German navy increase. A nation's military efficiency is the exact coefficiency of a nation's idealism. That is Treitschke's solution of the matter" (Germany and England, pp. 64, 65).

Such were the ideals fondly cherished by a passionate lover of Christ and a devout member of the Lutheran Church, and Professor Cramb assures us that he, the Christian, not Nietzsche, the Atheist, is the "man whose spirit still controls German youth, German patriotism, a man who has a power in Germany, as a thinker and as a writer, that you might compare to the power exercised by Carlyle and Macaulay put together in this country."

Sir William, will you still continue, in company with Dr. Clifford and Dr. Campbell Morgan, to repeat such an obvious lie about the attitude to Christianity of the originators of the present war, or will you repent and be converted? Unfortunately, however, one lie generally leads to another. This has happened in Sir William's case. Having misrepresented the Christian attitude of the Kaiser and those associated with him in this sad business, he proceeds thus:—

> "As for morality, public or private, it is at an end. The policy advocated is one of virulent attack on all those who have held out their hands in friendship. Plain-dealing, generosity, and regard for human right are antiquated superstitions."

We challenge the reverend knight to cite his authority for so wild a statement. It is a crime to bring such a foul charge against a party or a movement unless it can be fully substantiated. General Von Bernhardi holds that the idea of universal peace is absurd and immoral, that there arise circumstances in which war becomes a moral duty, and in which to postpone a war may be a crime against humanity; but while advocating this view, he professes belief in Christian morality. He states his position thus:—

> "Christian morality is based, indeed, on the law of love. 'Love God above all things, and thy neighbor as thyself.' This law can claim no significance for the relations of one country to another, since its application to politics would lead to a conflict of duties. The love which a man showed to another country as such would imply a want of love for his own countrymen. Such a system of politics must inevitably lead men astray. Christian morality is personal and social, and in its nature cannot be political. Its object is to promote morality of the individual, in order to strengthen him to work unselfishly in the interests of the community. It tells us to love our individual enemies, but does not remove the conception of enmity. Christ himself said: 'I am not come to send peace on earth, but a sword.' His teaching can never be adduced as an argument against the universal law of struggle" (Germany and the Next War, p. 29).

That reasoning may be ingenious and plausible, but so are most interpretations of the alleged sayings of Jesus. Sir William knows perfectly well that the morality enjoined by the Gospel Jesus has never been exemplified by either nations or individuals in any age of the world. But to assert that with a man like General Bernhardi "morality, public or private, is at an end," is to transgress the law of decency, as well as that of veracity.

The lies stand exposed. May those who utter them be shamed into uttering them no more. This is a war waged by two Christian countries against five other Christian countries, all of whom implore the help of the same Christian God, who will leave them severely alone, to settle their quarrels as best they can.

CELTICUS.

Mrs. Barber noticed that her daughter, Edith, did not say her prayers in the morning, and questioned her as to the cause. "Don't you want God to take care of you during the day as well as at night?" she asked Edie. "I think if God takes care of me at night, you might take care of me daytimes," was the quick response.

In a village church, a few Sundays back, the clergyman, having published the banns of marriage, was promptly followed by the clerk reading the hymn, "Mistaken souls, who dream of heaven." The friends of the parties interested left the church en masse.

Digitized by Google

Fragments that Remain.

These are days in which we hear and read much about courage, bravery, intrepidity, and we all ardently admire it whenever instances of its operation are brought to our notice. But there are two kinds of courage, the courage of knowledge and the courage of ignorance. The latter kind is possessed by most religious teachers, and by some in a superlative degree. To the latter class belongs the Rev. Peter Green, Canon of Manchester, who contributes an article to the Church Times for September 11 on "The Providence of God." The courage of a man who, in these dark times, believes in God and Providence is absurdly audacious. Yet Canon Green has the temerity to "declare unhesitatingly that it is perfectly possible to reconcile the existence of sin and suffering with the omnipotence and goodness of God." Very probably the reverend gentleman believes in the truth of that dogmatic declaration; but all we know is that his article entirely fails to demonstrate its truth. He doesn't even touch the real problem at all, but simply walks round it, winks at it, pretends to simplify it several times, and then turns away from it, having thus filled his believing readers' eyes with dust.

The Canon's position is this: "If I am to believe in God at all, he must be one whose never-failing providence ordereth all things in heaven and earth; he must be one without whom not a sparrow falleth to the ground. If he is not, then prayer becomes an absurdity." Excellently well said, reverend sir, and we fully agree with you; but a rather awkward question confronts both you and us, which you have never faced, namely, Is there such a God? You say there is, and we say there isn't. That's all the difference between us.

A more utterly irrational article than this by Canon Green it has never been our misfortune to read. It contains the rankest Calvinism ever heard of. God is all-powerful, all-wise, and all-good, and, as such, he is said to order everything that ever happens, and to be responsible therefor. You resolve to murder an enemy at noon to-morrow, but you will not be able to touch him unless God has ordained that his life shall end at that hour. Thousands of men are killed in the war almost every day; but God has ordered the death of every one of them at the very moment it occurs. Volcanic eruptions, earthquakes, disasters at sea, resulting in the loss of countless lives, they are all fulfilments of his holy will. "No man dies," the Canon asserts, "till the moment when, in the eternal Providence of God, it was willed that he should die."

One would think that the teaching has already touched the highest pitch of absurdity; but it hasn't. The Canon succeeds in climbing to a greater, giddier height still. There is one exception to God's responsibility, namely, "the individual act of sinful will." If you murder a man you commit a wicked act for which you alone are responsible, although in the commission of the act you are the instrument of God's will concerning him. You are a free agent, the Canon tells you; you can make whatever choice you like, but you cannot do a single thing that has not been ordered. The Kaiser and the Tsar are responsible for the war, because the declaration of it was an act of sinful will; and yet all that has happened and all that shall happen during the struggle has been ordered by heaven from all eternity. Well, well; and yet there are some who can still swallow such sheer nonsense, and think the writer the astutest of men.

Our contemporary, the Church Times, is, of course, theologically, extremely orthodox, though, nominally, a friend of criticism; but, according to its own admission, orthodoxy has already become a rarity under the sun. In a recent issue there is a review of a book entitled The Religious Instinct, in which it is stated that "the present age is highly humanitarian, but sets little store by holiness." We rejoice exceedingly at the amazing admissions in the following extract:—

> "Both Christ and his Apostles are said now by reputable divines to have reflected too much the ideas of their age and country. The old-fashioned Liberalism, wishing to put moral advance in place of a supernatural creed, thought that the standard of morality was agreed. But a revolt against Christian ethic is at the heels of the attack on Christian doctrine. In any case the idea of sin is being discarded as morbid, evil-doing being only reprobated as detrimental to the community.....Also an influential school is popularising the idea of the New Theology that Adam and Eve 'fell upwards,' and that sin is a necessary stage of spiritual progress, a mere relic in us of the tiger and the ape."

All this is gall and wormwood to the Church Times, but to us it is merely evidential of the fact that Christianity is not only dying a natural death, but is actually being slain by its own professed defenders.

"What your children's children will permanently treasure" is the modest announcement concerning a history of the war, of which several parts have already been published. This is history while you wait. But it may still be as true as the Gospels.

The remarkably Christian Daily Telegraph has been trying to explain the lack of public enthusiasm for Russia on the part of the general public. Whereas French and Belgian flags are everywhere displayed, that of Russia is conspicuous by its absence. Why is this, asks the Telegraph? Maybe our Christian contemporary has never heard of Jews and pogroms.

Christians are astute business men. At York Minster recently Lord Kitchener's Chaplain was billed as the preacher. We doubt if he referred to the divine commands "Thou shalt not kill," and "Forgive your enemies."

Mr. Rudyard Kipling's poems, "Recessional" and "Hymn Before Action" are now sold in leaflet form for church use. Mr. Kensit's stalwarts will note with pleasure that the latter poem contains an invocation to the Madonna.

In the olden times Biblical names were customary, and some of the street titles were redolent of the Bible. In an old book, New Remarks on London, published in 1732, the following quaint names of streets are mentioned: Adam-a-digging Yard; Damnation Alley; Labour in Vain Alley; Shall I go Naked Street. Some are still in existence, such as Ave Maria Lane and Godliman Street.

A story is going the rounds that a boy was asked by his teacher what was the most wicked letter in the alphabet. He replied, "K, sir; but L used to be."

A curious charge was brought before the magistrates at Thames Police Court the other day. A man was charged with stealing eleven hundredweight of timber, valued at £20. Some of the stolen timber had been used to make a praying-desk, elaborately carved, bearing the initials I. H. S. "Jesus, Saviour of men," is quite a touching inscription to carve on stolen timber. It bears eloquent testimony to the strength of religious conviction, and its tremendous strength as a moral force.

FLIM-FLAMS.

If you say to me, Master, it would seem that you were not very wise in writing to us these flim-flam stories, and pleasant fooleries: I answer you, that you are not much wiser to spend your time in reading them: nevertheless if you read them to make yourselves merry, as in a manner of pastime I wrote them, you and I both are far more worthy of pardon, than a great rabble of squint-minded fellowes, dissembling and counterfeit Saints, demure lookers, hypocrites, pretended zealots, tough Fryars, huskin-monks, and other such sects of men, who disguise themselves like maskers to deceive the world, for, whilest they give the common people to understand, that they are busied about nothing but contemplation and devotion in fastings, and maceration of their sensuality; and that only to sustain and aliment the small frailty of their humanity: it is so far otherwise, that on the contrary what cheer they make, Et Curios simulant, sed bacchanalia vivunt. You may read it in great letters, in the coloring of their red snowts, and gulching bellies as big as a tun, unlesse it be when they perfume themselves with sulphur; as for their study, it is wholly taken up in reading of Pantagruelin books, not so much to passe the time merrily, as to hurt some one or other mischievously, to wit, in articling, and diablicalating, that is calumniating, wherein they are like unto the poor rogues of a village. Fly from these men, abhorre and hate them as much as I do, and upon my faith you will find yourselves the better for it.

And if you desire to be good Pantagruelists (that is to say, to live in peace, joy, health, make yourselves always merry) never trust those men that always peep out at one hole.—Rabelais.

Little Ephraim: "Daddy, whar did de fust tukkey come from?" Daddy: "Nebber yo' mine askin' irreligious questions. An' w'en Pahson Thompson come for dinner, Sunday, doan yo' fink yo' hab tor ask whar dat tukkey come fum eider."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

OUTDOOR.

BETHNAL GREEN BRANCH N. S. S. (Victoria Park, near the Bandstand): 3.15, E. Burke, a Lecture.

CAMBERWELL BRANCH N. S. S. (Brockwell Park): 5, Mr. Davidson, a Lecture.

EDMONTON BRANCH N. S. S. (Edmonton Green): 7.30, James Rowney, a Lecture.

KINGSLAND BRANCH N. S. S. (corner of Ridley-road): 11.30, W. Davidson, "Iconoclast" (Charles Bradlaugh).

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Finsbury Park): 11.30, Mr. Davidson, a Lecture. Parliament Hill: 3.30, Miss Keogh, a Lecture. Regent's Park (near the Fountain): 3.30, Mr. Hope, a Lecture.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, R. H. Rosetti, "Religion and War."

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Miss E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6½ ins. by 8½ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LETTERS OF A CHINAMAN ON THE MISCHIEF OF MISSIONARIES. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

PAIN AND PROVIDENCE. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 13 copies, 3d.; 26 copies d (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 13 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 13 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 39 SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

The only true divinity is humanity.—CHATHAM.

Views and Opinions.

I never gave a halfpenny to the Prince of Wales' National Relief Fund. I never advised anybody else to give a halfpenny. It was all arranged, of course, beforehand. Its projectors were "in the know." They secured the right to use the Prince of Wales's name. That and the war together were, so to speak, to provide the milk, and they had everything ready for skimming off the cream. It is ridiculous to suppose their effort, or even the Prince's, added to the amount of money available for "benevolence," and still more ridiculous to suppose that a larger portion would reach those for whom it was really intended. What was secured was simply this, that a large amount of cash was labelled "charity," and put under the control of the classes for the alleged benefit of the masses, as far as they suffered directly from the effects of the war. Look at the names of the General Committee, look at the names of two or three specimen local committees, and you will soon see what kind of people they are. All sorts of upper middle-class men and women, with shopkeepers who find it pays to be in evidence, with clergymen to see that the interests of religion are properly looked after, and clergymen's wives to take a better interest in what they are pleased to call morality, which is indeed vin but always vinaigre—like so many of their faces.

* * *

This sort of thing happens,—not by supposition but in reality. I speak only of what has come under my own notice. In the first case, two ladies turn up representing the same Tommy Atkins. Nothing like that ever occurs amongst the upper classes. We all know that. Up jumps a lady whose husband is not in the Khaki Army but in the Black Army, wearing its uniform and drawing a highly respectable salary. The lady is nearly convulsed with pious indignation. She wants both applications to stand over. But there was a baby in one of them, and it was in want of food, and what had it done to be starved to death because its father was too fond of "life"? Besides, as the clergyman's wife was reminded, one of the two ladies was the absent warrior's wife; so the committee would have to settle it somehow; and with great reluctance this was done.

* * *

The second case, if I spoke the plain truth, I should venture to call shocking. A newly married young woman's husband had joined the Army during the war. He was unable to withstand the frequent and frenzied appeals to his patriotism. His head wasn't strong at the best of times, and I need not emphasise the fact that he left his wife absolutely to the care of his country,—which was a far less cheerful prospect to her than it was to him. The first question she is asked is what she worked at before her marriage, but it is useless to look for work in that line now. She is then asked if she could do "charing." The answer is obvious to anybody outside a "Relief" Committee; it is furnished by her physique. But she is advised to try, and that is all the help she gets. "Charing! Charing!" Let some of the "ladies" try it for a week, and see how it agrees with them. Let me add that this recruit joined as a married man. They accepted her breadwinner and left her to "try charing." And the joke is they fancy they are doing Tommy Atkins a good turn. They've got him anyhow. That's the point as far as they are concerned. But the woman? Ah, the truth of the old proverb that the woman pays!

* * *

Another Tommy's wife makes an application. Her husband is a territorial, and he volunteered for active service abroad. They had a nice little home, and had saved up and bought a piano. She applied on this basis. They told her that she did not want relief; she had a piano, she could sell it if she wanted money. Her "hero"—their hero when they were flatulently loyal at public meetings—was told in effect that the relief committee could do nothing for her until she had sold up her home. If she had been fonder of eating and drinking than of music they could not have given her this insolent answer.

* * *

The words "grant" and "relief" are hateful words—damnable words. A man goes out to fight for his country, as he and his country think it; he faces every kind of hardship in addition to the danger, by night as well as by day; he may bring back a broken and perhaps quite ruined body; or it may be buried in an alien grave; or it may even be laid in no grave, being blown to pieces by one of those instruments of war which seem to be the proudest boast of Christian civilisation. A promise is made—how often well kept?—that his wife and children shall be looked after. What is done for them is mean and contemptible. While the "hero" is fighting abroad they pay his wife and family a few shillings a week, and tell her she can go out to work. Just as if she didn't work already in the home! Just as if her husband were not working—and at such work—in that frightful war! One feels ashamed of one's country in face of this sorry exhibition. The "Pay, Pay, Pay," that Kipling addressed to the British public seems more applicable to the British Government.

* * *

We can only write about the war itself from a Freethought point of view. It is all wickedness and folly at bottom. England was forced into war at the finish. That must be admitted. We couldn't sit still and see France "annihilated," as they call it now, or "bled like veal," in the language of Bismarck; nor could the neutrality of Belgium be violated with impunity. This is true enough. But how about all that led up to this? The intrigues, the backstairs correspondence, hatred and malice, and the Ententes and Alliances that were invitations to a breach of the peace. When the psychological moment came a Catholic bigot on the Austrian throne and a mad Protestant bigot on the German throne gave the signal for opening "the purple testament of bleeding war." Had Europe been full of Freethinkers this could not have happened.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

The Kaiser's Blunder.

IT is said in all directions—and it really does not need a supreme intelligence to say it—that the German Emperor blundered badly in going to war. He must have underestimated the resisting power of France; he seriously misunderstood the opposition that Belgium could, and would, offer; he made no allowance for the rapidity of Russian mobilisation; he over-estimated the power of the German Navy; and he could never have counted on the opposition of Great Britain. All these were very serious miscalculations, and in the contest of nations when such a blunder is made the price must, sooner or later, be paid. Only a fool counts on everything going in one's favor, and the Kaiser—with God behind him—seems to have made no allowance for a check in any direction. Perhaps he depended too much upon the help of God. If so, he is not the first who has come to grief for the same reason.

But all these, however, are miscalculations of the moment. They are all recent, all obvious, and everyone may observe them. His real blunder, the one that shows he and his advisers quite failed to appreciate the right method of working, is of many years' standing. This blunder does not lie in the fact that Germany has aimed at the possession of colonies. Other countries have been fired with the same ideal, and some—our own, for instance—have met with considerable success. It does not lie in the desire to make Germany a world-power. Other countries cherish that ambition likewise, and it is our constant boast that "Britain rules the waves." And whoso rules the waves rules, in the long run, the world. There is a right way and a wrong way in achieving these ideals, and the Kaiser's fault lies in the fact that he has always chosen the wrong way. He has been arrogant when he should have been humble; openly proclaiming that he would make Germany feared, when he should have aroused the desire to make her loved.

When Mark Twain took a trip round the world, when he visited the British possessions, north, south, east, and west, he was not slow in drawing therefrom a lesson that must have appealed to every Godfearing Briton. He discovered that the British people were mentioned—under a figure—in the Bible. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." And there is no Briton of the variety above-named who would not say that the vastness of England's possessions is a direct proof of the favor with which Providence views this island. He is convinced that if we are in possession in India, China, Egypt, North America, Australia, the South Seas, etc., it is because we are fulfilling the designs of Providence in being there. He does not talk to the world of how much of the earth's surface we have taken under our protection, but speaks of the "burden" that has been placed upon us, and which it would have been a breach of duty to neglect. He does not talk of our desire to make the power of England felt, but of our ambition to carry the Bible and Christianity into the dark places of the earth. Our anxiety is to spread religion—true religion; we are the ambassadors of God, carrying out his plan; we would gladly avoid the task if we could do so with honor—but that is impossible.

With the example of England before him the Kaiser has deliberately chosen to ignore all that our history had to teach him. He has proclaimed the greatness of Germany and of his resolve to take his share of the earth in the language of a fire-eating swashbuckler. It is true that his language was that of a pious swashbuckler; but that, in a sense, only made the matter worse. God was always with him, but it was essentially a German deity—one who thought first and foremost of Germany's welfare. He brandished the "mailed fist" when he should have held aloft the Bible. He talked of the might of Germany when he should have spoken of its sacred mission to carry the gospel of Christ—in German gunboats—all over the earth. Instead of calling upon his people, as he did some years ago, to "make sacrifices for their position as a world-power," he should have told them it was their duty to spread the Christian Gospel. He would thus have avoided a considerable amount of ill-feeling, and in the day of trial would not have been lacking in moral and religious reasons for his conduct.

Those who cannot obey are unfit to rule, and it is equally true that those who cannot learn cannot teach. The German Government has shown a strange inability to assimilate the elementary principles of empire-building. In China, when two German missionaries were killed, the Emperor demanded and received territorial compensation. Probably he would have been pleased to get rid of a number of other missionaries on the same terms. But even in this case the world was treated to the same swagger about the "mailed fist," and religious considerations were made subservient to Germanic greatness. How different, and with how much more wisdom, does England manage these things. The Kaiser calls on his people to make sacrifices in order to spread the power of Germany. Lord Hugh Cecil, on the contrary, says:—

> "A great many people were most anxious to go with their whole hearts into what might be called the imperial movement of the day, but had, as it were, a certain uneasiness of conscience whether, after all, this movement was quite as unpolluted by earthly considerations as they would desire it to be. By making prominent to our minds the importance of missionary work we should to some extent sanctify the spirit of Imperialism."

There is the mark of the old colonising hand, of one who belongs to a nation that has been taking colonies for almost as many decades as the German Empire has been in existence. No English leader would ever have called upon his people to make sacrifices in order to impress British power upon the world. He would never have sent a punitive expedition to strike terror or to wreak vengeance. All our efforts in China have been to spread the truth of religion there; and even though force may have been used, we did, to quote Lord Hugh Cecil, "to some extent sanctify" its use. Of course, we have been materially benefited by our efforts; but this was quite incidental. The burden was cast upon us by Providence, and it was only proper that Providence should lighten the burden so far as it was possible. As Sir Robert Baden-Powell puts it, the British taxpayer "looks for two groups of results as his reward. On the one hand, he hopes to see Christianity and civilisation pro tanto extended; and on the other, to see some compensating development of industry." And unless either or both of these results are secured, he asks the question, "Has he the right, and is he right, to urge such wars?"

Germans—and others—may say this is sheer hypocrisy. That is an easy explanation, but it does not cover the facts. For the plain truth is that the vast majority of Englishmen really believe it, and act up to it. They have no doubt that we are in India solely for the benefit of the Hindoo. We annexed Burma to end an intolerable tyranny—it was a mere accident that it possessed ruby mines. We are in Egypt in the interests of religion and civilisation—the interests of the English bondholders merely gave "Providence" the opportunity to use us as its instrument. There was nothing hypocritical in singing "Abide With Me" over the fall of Khartoum. It expressed the belief of the God-fearing Briton that we are carrying out God's will. Why could not the Kaiser have learned from Britain the art of acquiring a world-empire before setting up in that business? Every trade has to be learned—that of empire-getting among others.

It was a poor, shallow policy to grab a tract of land on account of the death of two missionaries, and to immediately talk about the "mailed fist." Here was a splendid opening for him, had he known how to use it. The better course would have been to have flooded China with missionaries, and to have pointed out that in place of seeking revenge, he had returned good for evil by giving the Chinese the Gospel.

Digitized by Google

Again, he might have learned from Britain how to properly utilise the Christian missionary. First the missionary, then the trader, then the need for protecting both trader and missionary, then the gunboat and the soldier—not for the purpose of acquiring territory, but in order to secure peaceful trading and introduce Christianity and civilisation. Of course, acquisition follows, but the world is not affronted by it. For we do not seek it; it is forced upon us. There is no talk of power or might, there is talk only of how responsibilities are forced upon us, and what a breach of duty would ensue were these responsibilities evaded.

It is ultimately a question of psychology. The world is not ruled by force, and never has been, but by ideals. These may be better or worse, but they are there. Even the exercise of force is the expression of an ideal, and the Kaiser made the sad mistake of working for this ideal in an age that has largely outgrown it. Germans will say—as France and Russia said but yesterday, and as they may say it again when this war is over—that this expressed desire of the English people to spread Christianity is sheer hypocrisy. That is not true. It may be delusion, but it is not hypocrisy. The English people are not hypocritical when they talk of their "burden," or of "a sanctified Imperialism," or proclaim themselves instruments in the hands of Deity. They really believe it. It is a teaching upon which generations have been nurtured, and so has become an almost indestructible part of our social environment. So much so that even those who repudiate the belief in Deity may be found talking of our "Imperial destiny." As far back as the days of Queen Elizabeth we can see this belief in operation. The sixteenth century freebooter when he seized Spanish vessels or raided Spanish possessions would never have admitted that plunder was his object. He was carrying on a semi-religious warfare, vindicating Protestantism against the Roman Catholic Church. This tradition has never been broken. It is with us to-day. Thousands of Britons will tell you that the Bible is the source of England's greatness. They say it because they believe it. And the lesson has been too well mastered for it to be easily or quickly unlearned.

The Kaiser has blundered badly; there can be no mistake about that. Everybody resents open egotism; nearly everybody dislikes the use of brute force. He has failed to grasp the elementary lesson that if an empire is to be acquired, and is to last, the "mailed fist" must be hidden in the silken glove. Subjects must be brought to believe that it is to their interest to be subjects. Otherwise nothing is secure. But, above all, he neglected the instrument that lay ready to hand. A staunch Christian himself, he quite failed to realise how useful to him his Christianity might become. He belongs to a nation that gave Europe "an open Bible," and has wit only to use his religion as a support for his egotism. How much easier would it have been to have pursued the arts of peaceful penetration, to have proclaimed his desire for carrying the Bible and Christianity to the ends of the earth! How much more profitable to have expended in subsidising missionary societies a great deal of the money that has been paid over to Krupp! Of course, he might say in defence that Britain had been before him, and in the name of Christ had already seized a very large part of the earth that was available and desirable. Still, he might have done something. He might even then have failed; but he could have claimed the merit of following a policy that time had over and over again vindicated.

C. COHEN.

Progress.

THIS is a word in constant use amongst us, though few are able to tell what it means. In the works of Treitschke and Bernhardi we are always coming across the phrase, "the true progress of the human race," or "the highest development of mankind," or "the greatest good of humanity," but these men only understand by it the gaining of predominance by the race to which they belong. To them progress merely signifies the winning of a commanding position among European Powers by the German Empire. That is the ideal goal towards which the Germanic face is steadfastly set. To us, however, the domination of Europe by the Teutons would not necessarily indicate true progress, but, more likely, a step backwards and downwards, being the triumph of militarism. Indeed, progress is a difficult thing to define, because of the variety of standards and ideals entertained by different nations, and because each nation regards its own as the only true ones, with the result that the nations are now calling one another any number of uncomplimentary names. As a matter of fact, progress is very largely a figment of the fancy. Nature is entirely ignorant of it. The term that most appropriately applies to her processes is evolution, and evolution is simply a double change from the imperceptible into the perceptible, and then back again. All life is a cycle, always ending where it began. Nature has established no goals towards which she unfailingly toils. Spencer prefers the word "involution," regarding it as a more accurate designation of Nature's operations. Progress, then, is a literary term, and means different things to different people. An advanced nation may signify a strong nation in the purely material sense, or it may denote a highly intellectual and refined people.

Now, since progress is not a law of Nature, or since development is not an eternal principle, we shall discern very few and exceedingly slender evidences of progress as we carefully contemplate the history of the world. What we call civilisation is not a product of yesterday. According to Professor Flinders Petrie, there was a high state of civilisation in Egypt nine thousand years ago. Possibly Babylonia was in a similar state earlier still. Coming down to historic Greece, we find it a marvellously civilised country. The Greeks were a truly superior race, whether we regard them from the philosophical, artistic, or scientific point of view. They were in every respect a great and distinguished people. Twenty-four centuries ago they enjoyed an intellectual pre-eminence of the most dazzling splendor. Since then there have been many changes, but scarcely any advance. Have we many thinkers in the twentieth century worthy of comparison with Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, or Epicurus? Can we boast of poets who are greater than, or even as great as, Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides; of artists who outshine Phidias, or of statesmen superior to Pericles? Then we arrive at the brilliant period of Alexandrian and Syracusan greatness. At Alexandria lived Eratosthenes, keeper of the great library, the first great physiographer, the first to arrive at an approximately accurate measurement of the size of the earth; and he made his calculation on the assumption that the earth is round. Here flourished the first scientific astronomer, Hipparchus, who discovered the procession of the equinoxes, and first catalogued the stars. It was here that the steam-engine was invented by Heron; and it was from a clever device of his that the modern hot-air engines were developed. At Syracuse flourished Archimedes, who is characterised as "the greatest mathematician and the greatest inventor of antiquity."

In those great days of yore intellectual giants graced the earth, the light of whose genius shone with exceeding brightness. Then Christianity came and completely extinguished that brilliant light, crushing it under her feet of clay. The ancient civilisation by degrees utterly perished, and the world kept sinking lower and lower until it touched bottom in the tenth century. Civilisation went, and, as even Milman sorrowfully confesses, morality went with it. At last a revival started with the arrival of the Arabs in Europe, and the consequent awakening and new life of the classical learning which had been slumbering for centuries beneath layer upon layer of dogmatic and traditional rubbish. And once more the light of knowledge was seen shining in a new morning glory. Doubtless now at last it is a light that shall shine more and more unto the perfect day of knowledge; but it shineth at present in the darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not. Yes, science is marching on to triumph, not because present-day workers are intellectually superior to their predecessors in antiquity, but because they have better instruments and improved methods. The natural capacity of the human mind is not greater now than it was in the best Athenian, Alexandrian, or Syracusan days. The advance already made has been almost exclusively of a mechanical nature. The progress of the race has been of a deeply doubtful character. For years we have read and heard a great deal about the superior German culture, and behind the allusions thereto and boastings there has incontestably been much genuine if somewhat conceited sincerity; but allowing for all exaggerations in sensational newspaper reports, we cannot escape the conclusion that the superiority melts clean away in practice. How true, after all, is Mr. Carl Snyder's following generalisation:—

Digitized by Google

> "We must concede that neither mentally, morally, nor physically has the race varied greatly in six thousand and, perhaps, ten or fifteen thousand years. The intervening period has meant less change than is represented, say, in the advance from a bushman or a cave-dweller to a Zulu chieftain" (New Conceptions in Science, p. 20).

And this in spite, perhaps because, of the vast difference Christ is alleged to have made.

It is true that the present war is the biggest thing in that line the world has ever seen. The slaughter will be on an incalculably greater scale than on any former occasion. War is in its very nature the most atrociously brutal of all realities. But we have had many thousands of wars before which, on their smaller scale, were quite as bloody and attended by quite as many horrors as this is likely to be. Why, during nearly two thousand years Europe has been free from cruel bloodshed for scarcely two years running, and practically all the blood spilt in all those ages has borne upon it the name of God and the interests of conflicting religions. Now, the question that demands an answer is this, Can you point to a single sanguinary conflict that did not result in the demoralisation of those engaged in it? Does not war of necessity arouse the lowest instincts and worst passions of human nature? Is it possible to take part in a brutal game without being more or less brutalised? And yet, in spite of all this, ministers of religion are assuring their credulous congregations that this war is going to be an exception to the rule, that this war shall put an end to war for ever. Dr. Horton confidently predicts that after this war "the nations will be prepared to turn again to their deserted Lord, and to fall at the feet of Jesus." Then he exclaims, in an emotional outburst, "Christ may be the true Conqueror in this..... Have faith in God, and he will give us the victory." Dr. F. B. Meyer, he who two years ago prophesied an immediate religious revival that never came, now cocksurely says: "I believe the heavenly legions are marching forward. Our Empire has been called to bear the brunt of this terrific conflict, and to see that for all time to come men may worship, beneath the Cross, in peace and good will." The British Congregationalist for September 17, however, admits that "the Church has undoubtedly failed to control the baser passions of mankind, the lust of power, the desire for vindicating by force of arms the policy that is summed up in the phrase 'might is right,'" and puts in a plea for emotional Christianity, which alone is capable of redeeming the world. Then it adds:—

> "Intellectual Christianity has been Germany's curse at this crisis. We now find its exponents in the ranks of those who bolster up the lust of power and the crimes of war. What the world wants is the one great note of the love and Fatherhood of God, and the frank and humble acknowledgment that the Gospel of the Prince of Peace cannot be effectively preached in the face of the schism in the ranks of the Christian Church."

Is it any marvel that the British are reviled as a nation of hypocrites? Think of the insincerity displayed by the ease with which men of God contradict one another as to the cause of the war. One swears that it is the cold-blooded Atheism of Prussia; another, it is the adoption of the philosophy of Nietzsche, the essence of which is lyingly alleged to be the denial of morality; and another that it is the profession of an intellectual Christianity, or the belief that the vital things in religion are of the intellect, and not of the heart and spirit. They are all mistaken, the Kaiser having declared that he has gone forth for this work of destruction clothed with the Spirit of God, whose sword, whose weapon, whose vice-regent he claims to be; and their prediction of the religious effect of the war is sure to be as false as their conflicting explanations of its cause. One thing is certain, namely, that whatever the issue of the war may be, humanity is not at all likely to march forward by leaps and bounds once it is at an end. Transformation of character does not occur after that fashion. In the first "Locksley Hall" Tennyson

> "Heard the heavens fill with shouting, and there rained a ghastly dew
> From the nations 'airy navies grappling in the central blue;
> Far along the world-wide whisper of the south wind rushing warm,
> With the standards of the peoples plunging through the thunder-storm;
> Till the war-drum throbbed no longer, and the battle-flags were furl'd
> In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world."

In "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," that glowing hope of youth has faded, and in its place is a dogged resignation recklessly clinging to the new doctrine of evolution half apologetically, thus:—

> "Nay, your pardon, cry your 'forward,' yours are hope and youth, but I—
> Eighty winters leave the dog too lame to follow with the cry,
> Lame and old, and past his time, and passing into the night."

And so "Progress halts on palsied feet," and is destined to halt, more or less, for many a long year to come.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Ebb Tide of War Poetry.

> "A time for frighted peace to pant."—SHAKESPEARE.

THE noise of battle is echoing in all ears and many poets have attempted to celebrate this tremendous moment of the world. The papers have been full of their good phrases, excellent sentiments, and some well-turned lines; but nothing so far that recalls the masterly songs of the older poets. Compared with the resounding lays of the poets of previous generations, the present-day singers are poor of resource and barren of ideas, and their honeyed effusions sound like "the horns of elfland faintly blowing." Think of Campbell's "Battle of the Baltic," Tennyson's "Revenge," "Charge of the Light Brigade," or his "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington." Recall the sonorous music of Swinburne, or Meredith's stately verse, or the vivid realism of Walt Whitman, and then turn to the mouthing and coxcombry of the latter-day bards.

This absence of real present-day poetry has caused editors and publishers to disinter some of Rudyard Kipling's earlier verse, particularly "The Recessional," which has been printed as a hymn-sheet for the use of Christian congregations. This poem is, however, but Anglo-Indian orthodoxy "writ large." The second verse, if it stood alone, might pass: though its best line, "An humble and a contrite heart," has not the merit of novelty. But how absurd is the association of the reference just quoted to that other sentiment:—

> "Such boasting as the Gentiles use,
> Or lesser breeds without the law."

It almost seems as if Rudyard Kipling were utterly incapable of striking a deep note on his lyre.

Digitized by Google

In his "White Horses," he attempts to be profound, and all he can suggest is that the very sea is bestowed by the Almighty for the express purpose of destroying our enemies. Even the poetasters who illuminate the pages of Punch can do this sort of thing without too much loss of dignity. The older poets wore their singing robes with a far better grace. Assuredly the poets of to-day cannot approach the altitude of:—

> "The meteor flag of England > Shall yet terrific turn,"

or the magistral music of "The Marsellaise," in which is preserved the clangor of the trumpets of war—a veritable soldiers' song that heartened a nation of soldiers in the hour of their supreme struggle.

What the little poets overlook is that humanity is eternal, and that the horrors will pass away. The greatest artists, "looking before and after," justify their use of the terrible with beauties that are taken from happiness. In the midst of that greatest of all tragedies, Shakespeare introduces that pathetic note of music in which the captive Lear says to his beloved Cordelia, "We two alone will sing like birds i' the cage." Shakespeare never for a single instant made the mistake of imagining that the heroic spirit is a thing which is possessed by soldiers and sailors only, and that they monopolise it whilst the rest of men and women are inert and impotent. Just as water cannot rise above its level, so the heroism of soldiers cannot rise above the level of the nation. There is a heroism of the hearth, and of the daily work, which speaks of duty and devotion no less than the embattled field. The workman who has to subsist on starvation wages, the wives who have to wear quiet, cheerful faces with the shadow at their hearts, the mothers who are ever waiting for news of their loved ones; all these are none the less heroic because they are unaccompanied by the panoply of war.

After all, how should drawing-room singers be affected by the tremendous, awful, and heart-shaking facts of a European War. Their small minds cannot visualise the long roads of Europe thundering with the march of the great guns, resounding with the tramp of endless hosts of men. Yet the large heart of a great poet could not fail to respond to the terrible cry of struggle and triumph, or the still more appealing note of human agony. The spectacle of even one murdered mother with her babe clasped to her bosom, even in her death agony, should find an echo in his heart:—

> "Other sins only speak; murder cries out;
> The element of water moistens the earth,
> But blood flies upward and bedews the heavens."

Love of one's country is the common birthright of poets, but it is ridiculous to express that love in the sham sentiment of the music-halls. Whitman, in scores of pages, wrote himself a citizen of the world, but his thought was enriched and purified by the awful experiences of the American Civil War. There is no false rhetoric or brazen bravado in his "Dirge for Two Veterans":—

> "The moon gives yon light,
> And the bugles and the drums give you music;
> And my heart, O my soldiers, my veterans,
> My heart gives you love."

Indeed, the nineteenth century poets responded freely to the heroic influences of their time. Byron, who died like a soldier for Greece, regarded the liberation of Italy as "the very poetry of politics." Shelley's intense sympathy gave us the immortal lines on "The Euganean Hills" and "The Ode to Naples." A later and a greater writer, George Meredith, gave the noblest utterance to the French national sentiment during its ordeal of suffering in 1870. From her Casa Guidi windows Mrs. Browning watched the struggle for Italian freedom, and her muse was afire with impassioned sympathy. Swinburne, however, surpassed them all in the ardor of his devotion and in the rapture of his praise:—

> "The very thought in us how much we love thee > Makes the throat sob with love and blinds the eyes."

With quieter eyes that veteran of the Victorian intellectuals, Thomas Hardy, has achieved the masterpiece of "The Dynasts," a magnificent work to which the language can give no rival. The subject is the Titanic struggles of the Napoleonic wars. We begin with the preparations in England to meet an expected French invasion; we end with the carnage of Waterloo; and the music throughout responds to the grandeur of the theme. As we would expect, the death of Nelson inspires the author, and his tribute is lyrical:—

> "Who in simplicity and sheer good faith
> Strove but to serve his country."

And that touch of the "grey dial"

> "marking unconsciously this bloody hour" is of the higher flights of the imagination. How characteristic, too, are the verses, "Time's Laughingstocks," addressed by the soldier to his dead enemy:—

> "Had he and I but met
> By some old ancient inn,
> We should have sat us down to wet
> Right many a nipperkin!
>
> But ranged as infantry,
> And staring face to face,
> I shot at him as he at me,
> And killed him in his place.
>
> I shot him dead because—
> Because he was my foe.
> Just so; my foe of course he was;
> That's clear enough; although
>
> He thought he'd 'list, perhaps,
> Offhand like—just as I—
> Was out of work—had sold his traps—
> No other reason why.
>
> Yes; quaint and curious war is!
> You shoot a fellow down
> You'd treat if met where any bar is,
> Or help to half a crown."

This is poles asunder from the blood and thunder heroics of the minor poets, who are everywhere forgetting that the petty personalities of party politics, and praise of ourselves as the noblest and best of all the races of the earth is altogether out of place, and no matter for serious poetry. There is great and grave harm in the fact that the subtler and more civilised honor of England is not presented so as to keep pace with the times. Generations ago a brave and handsome Cavalier poet sang of a soldier's honor in unforgettable language, addressed to his mistress:—

> "Tell me not, sweet, I am unkind,
> That from the nunnery
> Of thy chaste breast and quiet mind,
> To war and arms I fly.
>
> True, a new mistress now I chase,
> The first foe in the field;
> And with a stronger faith embrace
> A sword, a horse, a shield.
>
> Yet this inconstancy is such
> As you, too, shall adore;
> I could not love thee, dear, so much,
> Loved I not honor more."

The first of all the marks of love is seriousness, and Colonel Richard Lovelace, who wrote that perfect song, lost his all in supporting the Cavalier cause, and died a ruined man. War may be an insane lust, but its cruelty and blindness is in part redeemed by the superb courage which never submits. What we really need for the frustration of a depraved and raucous Jingoism is a renascence of education. That the countrymen of Shakespeare, Newton, and Darwin should march to battle to the strains of a vulgar music-hall song is intolerable, when we remember that the minstrel Taillefer rode out before the Norman host singing of Roland and of Oliver, and the knights who died at Roncevaux.

MIMNERMUS.

Blake and Others.

IT is strange how one may be deceived by a preconception of the particular place of a poet in the firmament of letters. We had known Blake chiefly by some grotesque Biblical designs, which at first sight repelled us. After enjoying his companionship for a week or so, we were compelled to confess that the approach to a poet is not by way of a design depicting a devil dancing on the abdomen of Job Regretfully we have to admit that we had acquired the opinion that Blake was better left alone; but we chronicle our joy to the sun, the moon, and the stars, and to readers of the Freethinker when we say that we found him a lovable friend, a cheerful singer, and poet of sunny optimism sparkling like dew in the morning. Heaven send us more like him! The road on which we travel, beset by gibbets of superstition, lurking with wildfowl of revelations, and strewn with the bodies of dead and dying faiths, is, in many places, as dreary as the Steppes of Russia; and we cannot dispense with one singer who, in tones of purity, cheers and fortifies us on the grand tour called life.

Digitized by Google

To us, Blake appears to have much in common with Swinburne, and we had seen his name coupled with that of Nietzsche. Therefore, it was with no small degree of pleasure that we examined the poetical versions of "Good and Evil," and this decision drew us down many pleasant byways. With willing steps we followed him from his light poetical sketches to the "Songs of Innocence," and from thence to his "Songs of Experience" and "Ideas of Good and Evil."

For beauty and charm, the four stanzas "To Spring" will favorably compare with those of any accepted poet, and we cannot resist the temptation to quote the opening four lines:—

> "O thou with dewy locks, who lookest down
> Through the clear windows of the morning, turn
> Thine angel eyes upon our western isle,
> Which in full choir hails thy approach, O spring!"

Here we meet with reasonable personification, clarity of thought, and we hear the musical cadence of a genius. We should hesitate to ascribe similar qualities to the production of James Thomson on the same subject. Blake's invocation consists of sixteen lines; Thomson's, inscribed to a member of exalted society, contains more than we have the disposition to count, and lacks the fascination and glow of one not dedicated to any titled patron. The defects of patronage are almost too apparent to call for comment; what material gain is received in this respect seems to be marked by a loss of freedom and spontaneity. It would appear that the bane of the patronised poet was his servility to one whose palate had to be tickled, and as a result of this posterity is the loser. Patronage of this kind is not confined to any age, neither is it restricted to the world of letters. At this moment, religious bodies have hundreds of capable men who could find better work to do outside their respective circles, but for no other reason than that of bread and butter they are compelled to plough the sands of theology.

In the "Proverbs" of Blake there is an apt allusion to matters which are now claiming the attention of everybody:—

> "Nought can deform the human race
> Like to the armorer's iron brace;
> The soldier armed with sword and gun,
> Palsied, strikes the summer's sun."

This problem of force was apparent in his time, and to this day it has lost none of its difficulties. A mystic of Blake's temperament preferred the jewelled plough to the glittering sword, and we could not imagine him placing any faith in the doctrine of might being right. In the region of ideas truly philosophic, force is never present, either for the inception of the new or the propagation of the true.

In "The Everlasting Gospel" there are two lines which significantly sum up his opinion of the Gospel Jesus:—

> "I am sure this Jesus will not do > Either for Englishman or Jew."

In pity he expresses his judgment about a character the best parts of which no Freethinker will sneer at, and the worst parts—well, we can safely leave them in the hands of his various commentators. If the Gospel writers could not give the world a clear picture of Jesus, then those who live on the cross cannot expect us to rise to great heights of faith. Renan lived about two thousand years too late.

Travelling farther with this poet and mystic, we come to a narrative poem entitled "Mary." Sweetness, tenderness, and love breathe through every line, and no one can read it without recognising the iron-hearted treatment meted out to helpless women. Here, again, on the social plane, we are face to face with the doctrine of force, and its disastrous consequences. Force is not an attribute of civilisation; it exists in spite of it. So long as force rests on an irrational basis, the best of mankind will rebel, and the worst will be found drivelling about the will of God. That there is a plentiful supply of the latter folk none will deny; the feather-bed side of life will always allure, the easy path to salvation will always invite; but we shall always have poets like Blake to draw us to the sweeter side of life.

With eyes to heaven, it is not to be wondered at that the Christians make such a poor display on earth. They see visions, they dream dreams, and the earth is still as wretched as it was in Swift's time, when he wrote "I cannot but conclude the bulk of your natives to be the most pernicious race of little odious vermin that nature ever suffered to crawl upon the surface of the earth." The numbers who are deaf to the calls of common sense have not decreased since Gulliver's Travels was written, and for that reason admirers of Blake will always be limited. It was not for the rabble that he wrote—

> "The sword sang on the barren heath,
> The sickle in the fruitful field:
> The sword he sang a song of death,
> But could not make the sickle yield."

We must conclude with the remark that this is a perfect example of mystical Atheism.

WILLIAM REPTON.

Correspondence.

KEATS'S "BULL."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Your contributor, "Mimnermus," in his article this week, accuses John Keats of perpetrating a "bull." Is not Charles Lamb nearer the truth when he says, in reviewing this poem: "The anticipation of the assassination is wonderfully conceived in one epithet, in the narration of the ride,—

> 'So the two brothers, and their murder'd man, > Rode past fair Florence'"?

THOMAS C. RIGLIN.

DEMOCRACY AND WAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Norman Angelism is the most likely thing to stop war—if one could apply it. But war will never cease whilst the priest, in alliance with the financier who pays him, controls education. In our days all wars are the result of commercialism. Religion may play a subsidiary part, as in the Ulster strife, which might have led to a sort of war; and patriotism is worked on by wire-pullers in the present war; but all the nations concerned are motived in the main by self-interest.

If the principles of democracy could be applied, war would cease; but what do we see in England, as elsewhere? One set of democrats fighting another, instead of the common enemy. In this war I don't believe there is absolute right in any one of the combatants; it is a fight between groups of financiers and nations greedy to steal from each other, and the Socialists of each country supporting the financiers of their own country. They all appeal to God. Our King and the Emperor of Austria are not far behind the Kaiser in this respect.

Children require to be educated in Norman Angelism. How is it to be done?

A. J. MARRIOTT.

"Pa, who was Shylock?" "Great goodness, boy, you attend church and Sunday-school every week, and don't know who Shylock was?" cried his father, with a look of surprise and horror. "Go and read your Bible, sir."

Digitized by Google

Acid Drops

A thousand men joined Kitchener's Army from the Salvation Army Social Institutions. This tremendous event is suitably celebrated by Poet Begbie, who seems to aim at undercutting Mr. John Masefield. A "pome" of his called "Saved" appeared a few days ago in the Chronicle. The Salvation soldiers are now in an army with real blood and fire, and march along with "a Hallelujah swing"—whatever that is. Finally comes the following refrain:—

"Ho, we've slung our sins behind us,
And we're marching to the front,
And if the Devil wants to find us,
Why, it's there he'll have to hunt.
We've a feel of soap and water,
And we're in with Christian men;
Ho, a chap can do some slaughter
When he knows he's born again!"

We endorse this most thoroughly. If it isn't poetry it's truth. A born-again chap is up (or down) to anything—including any amount of slaughter. Read the Old Testament. And there are some nice texts in the New. For instance "Those mine enemies that would not I should reign over them bring them hither and slay them before me" or "I came not to send peace but a sword."

The Kaiser, as God's pal, is no better and no worse than Harold Begbie. The last verse of this modest Englishman's "Fall In!" ends with the declaration that "England's call is God's." Who says so? The (minor) poet Begbie. "Germany's call is God's." Who says so? The Kaiser William. Both declarations are blasphemy—flat blasphemy—very flat blasphemy. About as flat as they make it.

Mr. William Le Queux, the novelist, in his twopennyworth of German Atrocities, copied from the newspapers, without the slightest effort at verification, ends up his "Foreword" in the same pious way.

> "The frightful deeds which have been done over the face of Belgium and in France are, no doubt, intended to be repeated in Great Britain, and, if it were possible, the Red Hand of Destruction would certainly be laid very heavy upon us—more heavily, perhaps, because we, by our honesty of purpose, have incurred the hatred of Kaiserdom.
>
> "Yet we should reassure ourselves by remembering that when Attila of old came to Chalons, full of ostentation as the great War-Lord he came to his own undoing, and his dominion at once disappeared to the winds. There is One with Whom vengeance lies for wrongs, and most assuredly will He mete out the same dread Fate of death and obscurity to the unblushing War-Lord of Germany, who, daily, with his blasphemous impiety, lifts his bloodstained hands and thanks his Maker for his shameful 'successes.'"

No doubt the Germans have committed abominable outrages, which have been brought to the Kaiser's notice, and that he has done nothing to check them. It even looks as though he had ordered or suggested them. Yet he "daily appeals for the blessing of God"—which, according to Mr. Le Queux, is the Kaiser's crime. But every nation engaged in war reminds God that he owes it a victory. Why should Germany be excluded?

A lie deliberately and repeatedly told, a lie rooted, not in ignorance, but in prejudice, cannot be too often or too vigorously exposed, because it is the vilest and most pernicious thing under the sun. Such a lie is the assertion, made again and again by such prominent Christian ministers as the Bishop of Zanzibar, Dr. Clifford, Dr. Campbell Morgan, and Sir William Robertson Nicoll, that the Atheism of Prussia is the cause of the present war. As a matter of undeniable fact, it is a conviction firmly held by the overwhelming majority of Atheists that all differences between nations, as well as between individuals, can and ought to be amicably and permanently settled without having recourse to armed force. But this is a conviction that has never been cherished by the Christian Church. Hundreds of times has she had the sword unsheathed in furtherance of her own ambitious interests. Popes have ere now marched at the head of armies, and inspired the most bloody wars. Even the meek and mild Gospel Jesus is reported to have ordered his disciples to sell their cloaks and buy swords, and to have stated that his mission in the world was not to give peace, but a sword. We know that the teaching attributed to him is extremely self-contradictory, as has also been that of his Church in all ages. Do not these men of God know that there is nothing un-Christian, much less anti-Christian, in the fact that the Church has always been, and still is, at heart the most bellicose organisation in the world?

Now, we will give Dr. Clifford, Dr. Campbell Morgan, and Sir William Nicoll the opportunity of publicly showing how beautifully, as well as daringly, consistent they can be on a pinch. Will they have the goodness to declare unambiguously that Martin Luther must have been an impious dethroner of Christ and a very wicked Atheist, because he was a strong believer in war? General Bernhardi, in the chapter entitled "The Duty to Make War" (Germany and the Next War, pp. 54, 55), quotes the great Reformer in support of his own teaching, and the quotation is very much to the point, as the following extract from it abundantly shows:—

> "We must look at the business of war or the sword with the eyes of men, asking, Why these murders and horrors? It will be shown that it is a business, Divine in itself, and as needful and necessary to the world as eating or drinking, or any other work."

Surely only a God-defying barbarian could have written like that, otherwise those men of God, whom we have accused of lying, stand utterly and finally self-condemned.

The British Weekly is angry with the Kaiser for his use of religious phraseology. It quotes from one of his speeches as follows:—

> "Remember that the German people are the chosen of God. On me, as German Emperor, the spirit of God has descended. I am his weapon, his sword, his vice-gerent. Woe to the disobedient, death to cowards and unbelievers."

We admit that this is a trifle strong, and betokens a want of mental balance. Still, save for the pronounced personal note and the threat of vengeance, there is not much here that could not be paralleled by speeches manufactured in Britain. We also have been very fond of talking of the British people as being providentially selected for this or that work. And even in this war we are talking of doing God's work in overthrowing the Kaiser's plans. And is there any substantial difference between the British claim that God is on their side, and the German claim that God is fighting for them? If one claim is silly, why is the other sensible? Would not the really sensible thing be to leave God out of account altogether?

The British Weekly also quotes against the Kaiser his speech to the German troops who left for China in 1900, in which he ordered the soldiers to take no prisoners and show no quarter. On that occasion the German soldiers were co-operating with other European troops for the relief of Peking, and it is curious that so little was said against it at the time. Why did not the British Weekly protest, at the time, against British troops co-operating with soldiers who were thus instructed? Of course, it was against the Chinese, and they were not Christians. And, as a matter of fact, the Christian troops in China outdid in barbarity all that is now recorded of the German Christian soldiers in Belgium. Time brings many changes, and the fact of our denouncing as an outrage on civilisation methods that we, at least, passed by in silence fourteen years ago, is not the least curious.

Sir Robertson Nicoll again falls foul of Treitschke. And it is curious to find a writer—on another page of the British Weekly—pointing out that Treitschke "loved the Bible because it describes so many wars, and sets before us so many warlike figures, thus teaching lessons of manliness to the young. He wished the Bible to be taught in schools and committed to memory. The choice, he used to say, lies between Christianity and Materialism." There it is! Treitschke loved the Bible. The Kaiser also loves the Bible. It is the book he always consults for guidance. One was, and the other is, a sincere Christian. There is no doubt whatever about that. It is a fact that other Christians—in this country—find most awkward. We would like Sir Robertson Nicoll to explain why it is that men like the Emperor of Germany have so often the fullest support for all they did in the Christian religion. That would be much more to the point than all the yards of pious piffle to which he has lately treated his readers.

Prussia has been pilloried as the poisoner of Germany, but the chief teachers of "the religion of valor" were not Prussians. Nietzsche was of Saxon birth; Bernhardi, of Italian origin; Von Treitschke, a Saxon of Czech origin; and Houston Chamberlain an Englishman.

The newspapers are entirely given over to war news, and the pleasant editorial pastime of hanging halos on murderer's necks has been temporarily abandoned. As a fact, the ordinary murderers are very quiet. Maybe they are too busy gloating over the details of wholesale manslaughter in the press.

Digitized by Google

Since the war started the range of the collecting-box has considerably increased. Let us hope that the habit of inserting brace-buttons and bad money has declined.

That six-weeks' soldier, the Bishop of London, has been parading in his khaki uniform, which must be a change after wearing petticoats for so many years. He was at the front—in the Peers' Gallery of the House of Commons—last week, arrayed like Tartarin crossing the Alps.

There has been considerable searching of hearts among some Christian people as to the propriety of holding harvest festivals this year. The Bishop of Chelmsford, however, "trusts that thanksgiving gatherings may be held." To parody Browning, "God's in his heaven, all's right with the Christian world"—despite the red harvest on the Continent.

Religious journalists have been bewailing the war as an effect of German "culture." That is so like them. It requires a pious frame of mind to discover "culture" in Bernhardi's book, which is as emotional as any other soldier's pocket-book.

There are two things, at least, that the present war should make clear. The one is the utter needlessness of conscription, either from the point of view of protection or of efficiency. For years we have been told that some form of conscription was essential, and that to get ready for war was the only way of preserving peace. Well, if that doctrine is sound anywhere, it must be sound everywhere; and the complete answer to the most muddle-headed of conscriptionists is—Germany. Did her getting ready for war make for peace? On the contrary, all that was best in German life has been lowered and degraded by the spirit of militarism that has been cultivated. And what militarism has done in Germany it would do everywhere else, given the same power and the same opportunity. German human nature is not different from human nature elsewhere—although to read some of the journals one would imagine that to be the case. It is everywhere the expression of the forces to which it is subjected. Given the same militarist environment for a generation or so, and the product in other countries would be essentially similar.

The second superstition that is badly scotched, if it is not killed, is that militarism is essential to "efficiency." "Efficiency" is a blessed word, and may mean almost anything But, taking it on the not very elevated plane of capacity for fighting, the facts have given it the lie direct. There has been no lack of volunteers—there never is, as a matter of fact, during war time—and these volunteers show no lack of physical efficiency. On the contrary, the authorities express surprise at the quality of the men who have come forward. This ought to at least weaken the belief that civil life unfits a man for playing a soldier's part when it is necessary that he should do so. The truth is that all the qualities that make a soldier really of value are bred in civil life—warfare merely provides a platform for their ostentatious exhibition. This is shown by the fact that an army in the field—one that is not being continually recruited by fresh blood—deteriorates in all those qualities that make an army of value. That is why the bands of mercenary soldiers in the Middle Ages fell to pieces. That is why every country that has devoted itself to militarism has come to grief. Devotion to duty, courage, the sense of comradeship, the sense of honor, readiness for co-operation, are all social virtues, and are merely transferred from the civil to the military field of action.

The Secretary of the Christian Evidence Society is appealing for help for his Society on the ground that the war raised "various special problems for Christian speakers to solve." We do not know what problems there are facing the Christian speaker that were not there before. Perhaps Mr. Drawbridge only means that there is not the same opportunity for dodging them under present conditions. But the idea of a Christian Evidence speaker solving any problem of a really serious character is delicious—to those who know Christian Evidence speakers. So far as we are concerned, we have never known them to solve a problem, but they have always suggested one—that is the problem of explaining how a man can go on talking for as long as they do without falling into the truth or dropping into common sense. Perhaps it is practice that does it.

It is certain, says Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, that "human history is full of testimony that it is not trouble that drives men away from God or destroys their faith in Him. The most troubled times have been the times of deepest religious experience, the deepest realisation of the presence of God." It is all a matter of temperament. There are men who are driven to their knees by trouble, and there are others who meet it with heads up and their eyes open. The mere fact of so many apologies for God being put forward in times of trouble proves that the movement is not in the one direction only. People who are really religious become more pronounced in their expressions of piety when the "Lord's hand is heavy on them." Those who are not really religious, but have passively accepted religious doctrines, are driven to question the value of these teachings, and those who are definitely non-religious see in the condition of the world fresh support for their views. This is really all there is in it. For ourselves, we vastly prefer the attitude of the man who faces trouble as something to be overcome by unaided human effort than that of the one who goes on his knees and whimpers about the chastening hand of God.

The Bishop of London fears lest people, in the many calls for subscriptions arising from the war, will overlook the requirements of the Church. He says that the "primary interests" of religion may suffer, and "the call to self-sacrifice is apt to be interpreted by many as a call to sacrifice some department of God's work." Naturally, the Bishop does not allow anything to obscure his professional outlook. Religion is "the primary interest," and people should attend to that first. He should lay this view before Lord Kitchener, who has, apparently, quite overlooked it.

Another great trouble is the scarcity of chaplains for the new Army that is being raised. This is, again, a point that seems to have quite escaped the attention of the authorities. The public has been appealed to for all sorts of things—blankets, mufflers, socks, reading for the wounded (tracts were specially marked "not wanted"), but no one has appealed for more parsons. Lord Kitchener should see to it at once. And yet we fancy that if the suggestion were made to send all the clergy of Great Britain off to the front, the only people who would wholeheartedly support it would be Freethinkers.

Most of our readers will be interested in the following leaderette taken from the Daily News, and thank us for reproducing it:—

"THE PHANTOM ARMY.

"Accepting at its face value the official denial of the presence of Russians in the West, the world is provided with a psychological experience infinitely richer and subtler than the military experience of an actual Russian army in the West could be. No story could have had a wider circulation, and seem to be strengthened by testimony more various or more respectable. Policemen had seen these Russians, mayors had entertained them, bus-drivers had observed them, engine-drivers had driven them, men had travelled with them and photographed them, women had spoken to them, scholars had interpreted for them, shipowners had lent their ships for them. Here was an accumulation of witnesses which would have convinced the normal mind of the truth of any assertion not in itself manifestly absurd. Now we are assured on the sufficient authority of the War Office that the whole story is without foundation in fact. We can well believe that not a few of the stories were the deliberate fabrications of a misguided humor; but the solid residue of serious rectitude will constitute an imposing monument to humanity's power of self-deception. Here is a warning to which every student of history, and in particular of the history of religions, will have to give heed."

That word "warning" is significant—being what it is and where it is.

In the good old days when England was really Christian, Biblical names used to be the fashion. Recently, these seem to be borrowed from the penny novelettes; but the war has aroused martial feelings in many maternal breasts. Who will be the first to call the baby Kitchener Jellico Joffre French Liege ——?

According to the Star, bright novels are wanted for the relaxation of wounded soldiers, but religious tracts are not desirable. Why is not the same wholesome rule observed in ordinary hospitals?

The kilt of the Highlanders continues to be a spring of comic inspiration for Continental newspapers. Yet the petticoat of the priest is as plentiful as blackberries in an English lane.

Among the new book-notices appears The Pride of Eve. Whatever it was, it was scarcely a pride in being well-dressed.

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £207. Received since:—Thomas Dixon, 10s.; G. P. Denny (per D. Baxter), 10s.; G. Thomas, 1s.

ARTHUR ST. JOHN.—You raise an interesting question, though not for the first time, but the treatment of spies does not come within the scope of the Freethinker. We agree with you, however, that the "kind-heartedness of our soldiers" is a most valuable national asset. It is probably the most valuable of all things in the world, whether in soldiers or civilians. One may observe, too, that the moral lessons read in courts of law by the judges of one country to the spies of another are perfectly farcical, for they all maintain the spy system, which is the inevitable result of keeping up an army at all.

H. GEORGE FARMER.—You are right, but we see no reason for advertising it.

JOHN A. REID.—Your good wishes are reciprocated.

B. THOMAS, who describes himself as "an old coal miner 60 years of age," takes two copies of the Freethinker weekly and gives one away to "likely subscribers." Our circulation would improve if others acted in the same spirit, according to opportunity.

G. S. P.—Sorry to hear that nothing addressed from "this place" (your residence in the United States) to the editor of the Freethinker "stands the remotest chance" of starting for its destination. Copy under consideration. Mr. Foote is sleeping rather better. The difficulties as to our necessary change of premises still remain. With regard to the effect of the war on our circulation, we did not say we had not suffered at all, but not so much as we expected. There is always a prospect of danger while the war lasts.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

J. PARTRIDGE.—We hope the Birmingham Branch meeting will be thoroughly successful. We should like to join, at least "in spirit," in the well-deserved compliment to Messrs. Willis and Williams.

G. THOMAS.—We understand that G. K. Chesterton is a Roman Catholic, though we don't recollect that he has plainly said so. Thanks for your efforts to promote our circulation.

W. REPTON.—The contingent promise is not forgotten though so long delayed.

C. JORDAN.—Not bad for a first effort, but hardly up to our mark. Glad you find sense and humanity in the Freethinker on the subject of war.

We must again announce that we cannot answer anonymous letters. It is a good rule of journalism that correspondents must give their names and addresses, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

In order to "keep up the connection" Mr. Foote has secured the Queen's (Minor) Hall for Sunday evening, October 11. No doubt a hall-full of his London friends, with some liberal-minded outsiders, will be glad to hear him again. It is a good while since they had the opportunity. Full particulars will appear next week.

In ordering a new supply of paper for the Freethinker (a tentative supply) we have made a slight change in the weight, but none in the size or quality. We fancy that most of our readers will fail to notice the difference. Those who do notice it will probably agree that it is not an occasion for weeping or wailing or complaining. The Freethinker has never been printed on poor paper. It looks remarkably well in bound volumes. We have always had a respect for its appearance, and it is not lost. Of course the new paper will not come into use for a week or two. We will mention the matter again in due course.

We are always obliged to keep a good quantity of paper in stock, in order to be prepared for any accident that may happen to the Freethinker. It is a peculiar journal, it has many enemies, and we have to be ready for everything. Both "accidents" and "accidental accidents" have to be provided for.

The Birmingham N. S. S. Branch will celebrate Bradlaugh Sunday to-day (Sept. 27) by holding a meeting at the Oriental Café, Hill-street, at 7 p.m. Friends as well as members are cordially invited. At the conclusion of the main purpose of the meeting presentations will be made to Mr. F. E. Willis and Mr. E. Clifford Williams of testimonials in recognition of their lectures and general propagandist work in aid of the local Freethought movement.

Mr. William Archer's letter on Heinrich von Treitschke in a recent Daily Chronicle is noticeable for a phrase quite on a level with one that figured in our indictment for "blasphemy" in 1883. It appears that the German historian, who supplies the absolutist philosophy for the Kaiser and the whole military party in Hun-Land, was converted himself to that view of things by Sadoara and Sedan. "Up to that point," Mr. Archer says, "his views had been comparatively human. He had been inclined to rationalism in religion, and had not yet become a devotee of the tribal God who smiles upon all carnage that is commanded by the pious House of Hohenzollern." One of the statements that got us into trouble was that the God of the Bible (presumably the party that Mr. Archer refers to) was "as cruel as a Bashi-Bazouk [an echo of the then recent Russo-Turkish war and the Bulgarian atrocities] and as bloodthirsty as a royal Bengal tiger." The sentence was not our own; it was from the pen of a contributor. But it was true; it could not be objectionable except to the worshipers of the said Deity; and we defended it as quite permissible in a country that boasted of its free speech. We paid the penalty of having, and displaying, a little more courage than most people in religious discussion; but we never regretted it, and our "crime" has become a commonplace. Mr. Blatchford said some nice things about Jehovah, then came the Rev. R. J. Campbell, and then a flood of attack was let loose upon a Deity who was found to have scarcely a handful of friends left amongst the younger generation. To mention him even as an acquaintance nowadays calls for some kind of apology. Mr. Archer feels free to dig him under the fifth rib in the columns of a highly respectable newspaper. We are delighted to see the progress of ideas for which we suffered. Some day or other it will be perceived that the German "God" is precisely the same one as the English "God," and that it is just as foolish to pray to him in England as it is to pray to him in Germany. Mr. Archer must know, and in time the respectable morning newspaper may let him say it, that all Christians, in their various phases of faith, are "devotees of the tribal God who smiles upon all carnage."

"Whatever Is, Is Right."

PRUSSIA'S mad monarch, spoiling for a fight,
Has set the fires of hell on earth alight,
And sent his troops to ravage, burn, and slay, [way;
Hacking through Belgium and through France their Plundering and murdering, ravishing and destroying,
And every deed of devilishness enjoying:
But let not this disturb you or affright,
Do we not know "Whatever is, is right"?

The German troops are told where'er they go
To cause the unarmed the maximum of woe:
To act the parts of murderers and thieves,
Do all the vilest criminal achieves;
Women dishonor, old men stab or shoot;
Strangle small children in default of loot: [write,—
What then? Of such things we should calmly
Are we not told "Whatever is, is right"?

In wicked wantonness, with rage insane,
They have given to the flames divine Louvain:
Destroyed its noble monuments of old,
Rich above mines of diamonds or gold,—
Each worth the lives of thousands of their hordes,
And all their Junkers, Pedants, and War-Lords:
But let not such things your fierce wrath excite,—
For who can doubt "Whatever is, is right"?

B. D.

Digitized by Google

In the Gloaming.

IN their longing for rest some thinkers go to the crowds. Their self-identity, the ego, about which their thoughts circle like so many moths around a flame, seems to be lulled to sleep by the very indefiniteness of a mass of people. They lose the acuteness of self, becoming but a grain of sand in a Sahara; and the consciousness of their littleness operates as an opiate upon their minds. But most of those whose minds crave for relief find it away from their fellows. They go to the hills, to the tree-peopled glens, to the quiet country, where the fumes of the mental miasma we nickname "life" rarely seem to drift. There they taste some of the pure happiness that alone justifies the living out of their days. They escape from themselves.

Although so keenly penetrative at other times, their eyes are content to see only the soft surface and its many marvellous beauties. They forget the unceasing internecine strife between nature's several parts; forget the instinctive animosity that never sleeps; forget the ravage, the horror, the sickening death-throes. They look upon the whole, and its loveliness delights them, and soothes their febrile minds. They gain strength from their joy. Happiness, quiet and solacing, floods their minds. It is well that they forget.

During the early part of the evening he had passed a somewhat strenuous time lecturing. The subject had necessitated references to sociology; present trends of social thought had been touched upon; and many avenues of discussion had, unavoidably, been opened up. His pointed remarks had set fire to the argumentative spirit of the audience; and he had experienced a particularly hot time of it.

Conscious of a weakness in his powers of debating, he had left the lecture-room displeased with himself. And now, as he slowly walked along the busy streets, his mind was becoming tired with the innumerable successful answers he might have given. A sense of impatience stung him into a fretfulness that hastened the development of the mental tiredness. His limbs became more and more rapid in their movement. He longed to escape from it all, all these problems, and worryings, and things, that sprang from conscious life as sunrays spring from the sun, and demanded thought and action more than man seemed capable of giving. He longed for quiet; and, without deliberate intention, he was treading the shortest road to the hills.

Soon he became aware the stir of the city was gone. A quick flow of freshness seemed to sweep over his mind. It was similar to the feeling of physical purity that enlivens the body when first immersed in cold, swiftly running fresh water. He stopped; inhaled a deep breath of honeysuckle-scented air; and inhaled and inhaled again. Then he furtively glanced around. Seeing no one in the terrace, the learned gentleman rapidly hoisted himself upon the wall; pulled a spray of the rich red honeysuckle over the railing, broke it off, and jumped down.

It was an unusual escapade for him; but the honeysuckle was worth the loss of dignity. And as he fastened it in the velvet lapel of his coat, he felt as happy as a schoolboy in a "safe" orchard.

The sun had gone down behind the distant unseen hills, leaving the cloud-diapered skies a vision of pink glory. Coolness and calmness moved in the atmosphere to mellow the perfumes of the flowers.

He began to feel well again, and stepped out briskly, determined to watch the pink dissolve into saffron, and then into grey, and to see the evening star flash from its blue robe, from the hillside.

The relief deepened within him when the last mansion was left behind. The city and its poisoned thought-arrows were gone. Peace came upon him; and quiet happiness, such as the gloaming gives to the sensitive spirit, or the country gives to the lover of nature, drifted around him in greater purity than he had ever experienced before. He forgot about the lecture and the discussion. Renouncing, unconsciously, his relationship to humanity, he drew nearer the great mother. One by one the trivialities of society slipped from his mind. Introspection lost its power; and when, at last, he reached the hillside, his mind had become as clean as a mountain loch, beautifully reflecting the surrounding loveliness.

He lay down upon a shoulder of the hill, and, looking upwards, watched with idealess but concentrated mind the marvellous color-changes on the clouds. Often before had he gazed upon those wonderful pictures; but always with a keen, scientific interest; never with the childlike absence of the knowledge of causation that now enthralled him. Nor did his mind even attempt to distinguish the various shades that rapidly followed each other, till the clouds resumed their original grey.

Directly before him, across the glen, rose the hill behind which the sun had said "good-night." On its brow rested a little cloud that was gradually diminishing in size. Slowly it subsided into seeming nothingness. He looked, fascinated, his eyes struggling hard to intensify their sight with the disappearance of the object. When the last wisp of cloud had gone, his eyes relaxed their vigilance; and he saw, with startling suddenness, the loneliness of the hill.

Although it was but a peak in a range that sloped away towards the north, somehow it seemed to be strangely apart from its neighbors. Perhaps the luminous blue atmosphere that surrounded it was somewhat responsible for the awful loneliness that became almost palpable to the man who looked, enthralled by this new spectacle. He had heard of lonely domesticated animals and of lonely men, but never had he realised that Nature, by her marvellous, unpremeditated ingenuity, so to speak, could cast around a hill the dark cloak of solitude. Often had he seen a ship sailing alone on a huge expanse of sea; often had he seen a great mountain standing in solitary grandeur above its fellows; and often had he seen the last memory of a forest waving its branches unconcernedly in the breeze; but this was stranger than those: it had something they had not; it was mystical, weird, wonderful beyond all words; it was uncanny.

The gloomy silence of the hill, its black magnificence, the complacent sense of monarchy that seemed to clothe it in nobility, were all as obvious, as real, as the grass on which he lay. He felt them, besides seeing them. Royalty seemed to irradiate from its majestic repose, commanding obeisance from him, and yet flooding his being with a similar supremacy. He felt impelled to rise to his feet, his shoulders and head erect, his eyes bright, undaunted, full of the same knowledge of power, of strength, that it possessed and showed. His obeisance, he felt, could not be the humility of genuflexion. No; rather of fearlessness, of equality, of the discovery of power within himself.

Standing before it, the loneliness of its incomprehensible majesty came more forcibly upon him. The gloom became a sadness too deep for utterance, a sadness that found its only food in stern acquiescence. His arms shot out impulsively, and words of heartrung sympathy rushed to his tongue, but, ere they fell, the pang of their commonplaceness froze them on his lips. The loneliness of the hill, its profound depth of gloom, its motionless, unvanquishable acquiescence, made even sympathy banal.

A dark, upright, solitary figure he stood, enwrapped in the mysterious garment Nature had enwoven about him, gazing across the glen to the hill she had similarly enclothed. It was as if his brain had, for the moment, ceased to function. He had surrendered himself. The ego had become a mirror, nay, more, it had become a part, an impalpable part, of the silent, actionless drama; for drama it was. He felt it. Unconsciously he was moved by it. Unconsciously he had ceased being a spectator; he had become an intrinsic part of it.

Nothing stirred; yet everything had life. The semi-gloom was full of an inconceivable meaning. The deep blue of the air seemed to linger for a little in its intensity. The weirdness seemed to possess a strange reality that suggested immense potentialities. It was the animation of profound silence, the vitality of motionless might.

Digitized by Google

And then, gradually, the deep blue seemed to change. Wreaths of pleasant clouds seemed to rise from his brain. He felt his mind's power return to him; and with the lightening of the color there came a fragrance and purity he had never previously experienced.

Suddenly he saw a star glitter above the shoulder of the hill. It was the evening star, as he was taught to name it in his boyhood days. A thrill passed through his nerves. He threw back his head, drew in a deep breath of air, and released the tension of his body. He laughed, and the sound went rippling down into the glen and over to the hill, and the lonely hill joined in his quiet merriment.

He felt a new man, cleaner, stronger, better; and as he trudged joyously citywards, he knew it was good to be alive, good to feel responsive to Nature's loveliness, and good to draw near to the mother-breast and be purified.

ROBERT MORELAND.

Bible Makers.—V.

SOLOMON AND OTHERS.

INTERSPERSED among much that was unwittingly funny, and more that was deliberately barbarous, it was only natural that the Bible makers should supply a few chapters of gloomy sermonising, to lend a kind of moral respectability to the whole work. King Solomon was, therefore, specially retained to supply the article. Credited with almost unlimited knowledge and wisdom, but possessing, if we judge from his writing and conduct, a very infinitesimal quantity of either; a notorious man of the world; devoid altogether of principles or sincerity; a more appropriate person could scarcely have been chosen for the task. No men are more prone to preach—and sometimes very good sermons too—than those whose practice is in flagrant and diametrical opposition to their teachings. From the judge upon the bench to the unpaid magistrate in an obscure country town, or from the opulent bishop to the poor, underpaid curate, we have hundreds of examples of men who, in their official position, give admirable lessons to the public as to how they should conduct themselves morally—lessons which they themselves not only never attempt to put into practice, but which they persistently and deliberately disregard in their daily life. The Spartans, it is said, used to make a slave drunk and set him before their sons so that the exhibition might disgust them, and thus influence them against the excessive use of intoxicating drink. Solomon seems to have been chosen as a contributor to the pages of the Bible on the same principle. Having divided his attention mainly between wine and women, especially the latter; monopolising several hundred wives and three hundred concubines, he was considered to be a high authority upon the things of life in general and upon women and wine in particular.

And a very gloomy opinion it was—pessimistic to the last degree. The reclaimed drunkard is often considered the best advocate of temperance, the converted burglar the most admirable teacher of morality, the reformed prize-fighter the best example of the influence of the meek and lowly Jesus. In Solomon the qualities of all these persons were combined. He had had experience of life in all its various aspects, he had prostituted his physical and mental faculties for the sake of transitory pleasure, and at last, when he became a decrepit, used-up debauchee, he yelled out in the agony of his despair, "Vanity; all is vanity!"

To Solomon childish laughter seemed fiendish; innocent playfulness, agonising folly; honest toil, madness; and he summed up life as comprising nothing but "Vanity and vexation of spirit." He had wasted his life and he longed for death to escape from what, to him, was a dreary and miserable existence. While he was in this unpleasant mood he contributed twelve chapters to the Holy Bible, for which the long-faced, lugubrious gentlemen of orthodoxy will ever thank and praise him. Having finished Ecclesiastes, Solomon apparently rested for a time and then rushed into song, which, being written when the author was in a better state of mind, in fact, in quite an affectionate mood, with doubtless one of his many wives sitting upon his knee caressing him, are therefore much more pleasant, though not altogether decent, compositions. The metaphor, at times, is very coarse, as the reader will see if he glances cursorily over the first few verses of chapter seven; and one cannot avoid the conclusion that the writer was inebriated at the time with something of a stronger nature than exuberant verbosity.

The book of the prophet Isaiah follows. Isaiah was a dreamer, and all the terrible events he foresaw as certain to happen he had revealed to him in a vision. Many of these predictions were perfectly safe. They were not to take place till the "last day," and as that interesting period is unlikely to come very soon in a world, that is, as the Prayer Book properly says, "without end," the events are not likely to be carefully verified. When we are assured that "it shall come to pass in the last days that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all the nations shall flow into it," we can only remark that if ever the mountain of the House of Lords—or Lords' House, which is the same thing—should get elevated at all, it is not unlikely that it will be exalted much higher than the hills—probably elevated off the face of the earth—and so that prophecy will be fulfilled. As to the composition itself, I think it may not unfairly be said that it is the most incoherent and meaningless jargon to be found in the Bible, save and except, perhaps, the ravings of St. John, the divine maniac, in the book called Revelation, which reveals nothing but the hopeless imbecility of the writer.

Prophesying was once a good business. Every priest practised it and every ignoramus believed in it. Old women of both sexes gave it their countenance and support. The Bible makers knew the importance of it, and so for every single historian or poet on the staff they kept four prophets. After Isaiah come Jeremiah and Ezekiel, the former of which contains nothing of importance, and the latter only a parable concerning a boiling pot and a faithful narrative of the disgusting practices of Aholah and Aholibah—two painted harlots of Babylon. These, with Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Zechariah, Malachi, and one or two others that are never read, complete the first part of the Bible. Most of these last-named writers were in the prophetic line, and their prophecies need a revelation before they can be understood. I do not profess to understand them, and I do not know any sensible person who does; but if there are any who do, or think they do, they are sure to be numbered among the Bible makers of the future.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Primitive Marriage.

(BY THE LATE J. M. WHEELER.)

"MARRIAGE," said Goethe, "is the beginning and end of all culture." Certainly it may with equal truth be said to be the beginning and end of all civilisation. It is man's highest achievement, making all others possible. Even those who believe it to have been divinely instituted have the difficulty of the sons and daughters of the first pair committing incest. Those who believe that mankind began their career at the bottom of the scale, and slowly worked their way up from savagery to civilisation, will find abundant evidence that marriage, like all other institutions, has passed through various stages of growth among all nations, the Jews included. Tradition, indeed, points to a period when marriage, as it exists among civilised nations, was unknown. The Greeks ascribed it to Cecrops, the Egyptians to Menes, the Hindus to Svetaketu, the Chinese to Fou-hi, "before whose time men knew their mothers but not their fathers."

Digitized by Google

In the most primitive stage in which man can be supposed to have existed, some bond of union would be necessary for the preservation of offspring. With very prolific animals, regard for their young is scarcely necessary for the preservation of the race, and among such it is deficient; but it is common to all others, for the sufficient reason that any race in which it did not exist would speedily become extinct. But not only is man amongst the slowest breeding of animals; his infancy demands care for a longer period than any other, and if this be not bestowed the individual dies, leaving the race to be continued by those in whom parental instincts are better developed. Many animals pair permanently, and others do so for a season. Even among the lowest races of men promiscuity is qualified by unions having some persistence. Early man living mainly by hunting and fishing, pursuits in which women do not excel, the rearing of children could only succeed when both parents supported them in their tender years. Fijians, Australians, American Indians, and Andamanese, show us that however informally they may originate, sexual relations of a more or less enduring kind exist, even among the lowest races. A typical instance was found in the Andaman Islands, where, according to an early observer, the custom was for the man and woman to remain together until the child was weaned, when they separated as a matter of course, and each sought a new partner.

Among the Fijians, so famous for cannibalism and parenticide, it is declared to be "truly touching to see how parents are attached to their children and children to their parents." The Veddahs, a very low race of Ceylon, are monogamous, and say only death can part man and wife; yet it is important to observe that they have no marriage ceremony, and do not scruple to unite with their younger sisters. Darwin, whose views must command the utmost respect, says, in his Descent of Man:—

> "Judging from the social habits of man as he now exists, and from most savages being polygamists, the most probable view is that primeval men aboriginally lived in small communities, each with as many wives as he could support or obtain, whom he would have jealously guarded against all other men.....In primeval times men.....would probably have lived as polygamists or temporarily as monogamists."

With customary candor Darwin notices that writers like McLennan, Morgan, and Sir John Lubbock, have believed rather in early promiscuity. It may indeed be argued that just because marriage is so useful an institution, it is no more "primeval" than metallurgy, for no tribe of men could safely have resigned such a social advantage.

Many low races cannot be said to have the institution of marriage. What is called marriage is really only the capture of a slave to use as one pleases. Among Bushmen and Bushwomen there is no form of union save the agreement of the parties and consummation. The Chippewas, Aleuts, Eskimo, etc., have no ceremony, and divorce consists of a good drubbing and turning the woman out of doors. "In his native state," says Mr. Morgan, "the (North American) Indian is below the passion of love. It is entirely unknown among them, with the exception of the village Indian." The Tinné Indians had no word for "dear" or "beloved," and the Algonquin language is stated to have contained no verb meaning "to love." The Aymaras, having no word of their own to signify marriage, have of late adopted a Spanish word. "In Yariba" (Central Africa), says Lander, "marriage is celebrated by the natives as unconcernedly as possible; a man thinks as little of taking a wife as of cutting an ear of corn—affection is altogether out of the question"—as, indeed, it must be wherever woman has no right of refusal. According to Galton, Dammar women "divorce themselves as often as they like; in fact, the spouse was changed almost weekly, and I seldom knew, without inquiry, who was the pro tempore husband of each lady at any particular time." Crantz observes of the Greenlanders, that "they break the matrimonial obligation on both sides without a blush." Mitchell says: "After battle it frequently happens among the native tribes of Australia that the wives of the conquered, of their own free will, go over to the victors"—a somewhat persistent trait of feminine nature, reminding us of the readiness of the hind to accept the conquering stag.

A great many races are quite indifferent to juvenile unchastity, and only impose strict conduct on their women after marriage. The record of all early voyagers among savages is the same. They found everywhere fathers, brothers, and sometimes husbands, offer wives for a consideration. Sexual jealousy, though one of the strongest impulses we have in common with other animals, is sometimes broken down. With the Tahitans, to offer a girl or woman to a visitor was an act of ordinary politeness. The Comanches, and other Indian tribes, were in the habit of ceding their wives to their guests. This hospitable practice is found also among the Aleuts, the Eskimo, the natives of Kamtschatka, the Papuans, and the Australian aborigines. Of the Greenland Eskimo "those are reputed the best and noblest tempered who, without any pain or reluctance, will lend their friends their wives." In Nubia, among the Hassiniyeh Arabs, married women have free disposal of themselves on every fourth day; an evident restriction of earlier laxity. In some parts of China the husband may annually repudiate his wife and marry another. Here the mother owns the children and has over them the power of life and death.

Fatherhood is a matter of opinion, motherhood of observation; hence the first kinship is through mothers. Among native Australians, children took the family name of the mother, and a man could not marry a woman of his own name, a usage common to the Fijians and Maories. One effect of the division of clans in this way, is that the children of the same father by different wives, having different names, may be obliged to take opposite sides in a quarrel. Herodotus (Book I., 173) says of the Lycians, "They take the mother's, and not the father's name. Ask a Lycian who he is, and he answers by giving his own name, that of his mother, and so on in the female line." The father of history was deceived in thinking this instance exceptional. It is rather the rule among tribes in a low stage of development. The evidence on this point I shall further have to adduce when dealing with the question of exogamy, or the prohibition of marriage within the limit of the family or tribe.

Of course, before all law is social usage. The rise of a social law implies a certain preceding social existence. Herbert Spencer says "reproduction unregulated by interdicts must be taken as initial." At first we presume our ancestors knew and cared for little beyond sexual difference, but those in whom care of offspring was most developed had the best chance of survival. The patriarchal family, a group of men, wives, children, and slaves, connected by common subjection to the chief of the household, which Sir Henry Maine regards as a primitive form, and from which undoubtedly modern law has been developed, so far from being a simple group, is highly complex, and is usually freely recruited by the adoption of strangers within its circle. We must presume that the social arrangements of tree and cave dwellers were even more primitive than any patriarchal arrangement of which we have record. Probably they would consist of the herding together of a male with his mate or mates and their offspring, who would freely interbreed if without the opportunity of capturing mates outside the family group. Of course, Sir Henry Maine is entitled to plead "the imperfection of the archæological record."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Lewis H. Morgan's hypothesis, probably from its being mainly derived from somewhat dry investigations into the systems of kinship in vogue among Indian and other tribes, has hardly received in this country the attention it deserves. It considers the first state of marriage was the marriage in a group of men and women of the same blood, calling themselves brothers and sisters. This he calls the Consanguine Family. This undoubtedly obtains both among wild and domestic animals. How far it has been the usage of some races of men I shall give some evidence. The fastidious reader is requested to remember Dr. Livingstone's remark that the negro women on the Zambesi were shocked on hearing that in England a man had only one wife.

Mr. Spencer admits that men were "originally free of any prejudice against marriage between relations." Traces of this freedom are abundant. In the Sandwich Islands, men whose wives were sisters, and women whose husbands were brothers, called each "punalua" or "dear companion." The relationship arose from the fact that two or more brothers with their wives or two or more sisters with their husbands were inclined to possess each other in common. The Yncas, the rulers of Peru, were bound to marry their eldest sister. Diodorus Siculus informs us that the Egyptians allowed brothers and sisters to marry, nor could the Pharoah of Egypt select a more fitting consort than his own sister. This custom of close intermarriage was kept up by the Greeks in Egypt under the Ptolemies, as it had previously been among the Bacchiadians, the oligarchy of Corinth.

(To be continued)

Non-Religious Humanity.

JACOB LANGELOTH, once a penniless immigrant, who amassed a fortune of $30,000,000 in eighteen years, left the bulk of his vast holdings for the benefit of humanity by his will, which was filed yesterday for probate. He was a dreamer, an inventor, a financier, and held strong convictions on religious matters. He left nothing to churches, and directed that no clergyman be allowed to officiate at his funeral.

Mr. Langeloth was chairman of the board of directors of the American Metal Company, of 61 Broadway. Eighteen years ago he came to this country from his birthplace, Mannheim, Baden, Germany, without money or immediate prospect of employment. Fortune came when he perfected a method of reducing copper ore. He held large interests in mining properties throughout the United States, and organised several companies for extracting metals from ore.

The declaration of war by Germany is said to be the direct cause of the death of Mr. Langeloth, August 14, at his summer home, Riverside, Ct. He had been deeply interested in the fortunes of his fatherland, and had provided that various institutions in Germany should receive substantial bequests. To Mannheim, the town of his birth, he left $125,000 for the benefit of the deserving poor.

With his residuary estate Mr. Langeloth founded a great home for the benefit of "middle class persons of education and refinement." He endowed the future city of Langeloth, Pa., with $150,000, and remembered numerous charities and employés with substantial bequests.

Mr. Langeloth showed preference for non-sectarian institutions. He believed in aiding humanity in all possible ways, but disapproved of religious form and ceremony. This is shown by article 25 of his will, which reads:—

> "I desire that my body be cremated; that no religious ceremony of any kind take place at my funeral or cremation, and that no clergyman be permitted to officiate at same.
>
> "It is my wish that my wife do not go into outward mourning upon my death, and that she do not abstain from visiting theatres, concerts, or any other entertainments.
>
> "I desire my executors to procure the services of a good orchestra at my funeral and to have the same play Beethoven's 'Funeral March,' the finale from Wagner's opera, 'Rheingold,' beginning with the 'Storm' (see G. Schirmer's vocal score, pages 203 to 221), and Siegfried's 'Toden March' from Wagner's 'Goetterdaemerung.'"

Mr. Langeloth left no children. His wife, Mrs. Valeria Langeloth, of 636 Fifth-avenue, alone survives him. Mrs. Langeloth receives all realty in Connecticut, all household furniture, all silverware and personal effects, jewelry and automobiles. $250,000 outright, and an annuity of $100,000 until her death.

The entire residue, which includes the greater part of the estate, is left for the foundation of the "Valeria Home" in honor of Mrs. Langeloth.

The will explains the purposes of the institution, as follows:—

> "It is to be adapted and used for purposes of a recreation and convalescent home for persons of education and refinement who cannot afford independent homes or to pay the charges exacted at health resorts or sanitoria. The home shall be open to all creeds, entirely non-sectarian, and absolutely free from all religious tendencies whatsoever. Such home shall, so far as may be feasible, be self-supporting, and it is my preference that the inmates pay weekly charges, to be determined by the directors, and that in special cases patients be accepted without payment."

Mr. Langeloth said that employés of the American Metal Company and of other corporations in which he was interested, together with his friends and relatives, should be given preference for admission to the home in the event of its being crowded. He said in his will:—

> "I have observed that homes of this character have been organised for the benefit of the very poor, who are not able to pay anything for their support, while no provisions seem to have been made for persons of education and refinement belonging to the middle classes who would not be justified in asking for or in accepting charity, but who are, nevertheless, not able to pay the prices exacted for a sojourn in the usual health resorts. It is for this reason that I do not desire the home to be organised as a charitable institution, but to be, in so far as possible, on a self-supporting basis."

Mr. Langeloth provided that in the event of any profits from the venture, they immediately were to be put into the upbuilding of the home. He directed that land be found for the institution within "convenient distance of the City Hall of New York," and that at least $300,000 be spent for it. All the rest of the large fund in the residue is to go for buildings, equipment, and general endowment, for payment of the physicians and nurses, and for additions from time to time.

The funds set aside for the payment of annuities to various recipients, including the annuity of $100,000 to Mrs. Langeloth, will revert at the termination of those bequests to the residuary estate. Thus the endowment for the home will be increased in years to come.

As trustees of the Valeria Home, Mr. Langeloth appointed his wife, Berthold Hochschild, Julius Goldman, Henry Goldman, and Carl M. Loeb. They are to co-operate in organising the corporation with a delegate from the chamber of commerce, the president of the Charity Organisation Society, the president of the Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor, and the president of the German Hospital.

The bequest of $125,000 to Mannheim, Germany, is left to the mayor and president of the chamber of commerce to use among the deserving poor, but with the provision that all organisations through which it is used must be non-sectarian.

By a codicil of February 26, 1914, Mr. Langeloth said that he expected a city to rise at Jefferson and Cross Creek, Pa., where the American Zinc and Chemical Company was establishing large plants. For the future city, which was to be named Langeloth, and would be occupied by employés, he left $150,000 to be used for schools, playgrounds, parks, recreation grounds, libraries, bath houses, gymnasiums, or any other thing beneficial and free to the public.

Mr. Langeloth gave $5,000 each to Mount Sinai Hospital, German Hospital and Dispensary, Manhattan Eye, Ear, and Throat Hospital, and the Metropolitan Museum of Art. He gave $2,000 each to the Charity Organisation Society and the Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor; $1 500 to the Chrystie-street Recreation Room and Settlement; $1,000 each to the German Society, Isabella Heimath, St. John's Guild, New York Zoological Gardens, and New York Botanical Gardens.

The employés of the American Metal Company who have worked consecutively for ten years, each will receive six months' salary; those who have worked at least two years will receive two months' salary. Miss Augusta Keller, of Weinheim, Germany, receives an annuity of $900; Mrs. Katherine Langeloth, sister-in-law, of Mannheim, Germany, an annuity of $5,000; Betty Burggraf, a friend, of Jersey City, N. J., an annuity of $400.

The Mannheimer Park Gesellschaft of Mannheim, Germany, receives $2,500; the children of the late Johann Jacob Langeloth, a cousin, $24,000.

The executors are Mrs. Langeloth, the wife; Berthold Hochschild and Julius Goldman.

Mr. Hochschild and Mr. Goldman each receive 200 shares of the American Metal Company and $20,000 in its certificates of indebtedness, or, in lieu, $50,000, either bequest to be in place of commissions.

Carl M. Loeb of the Company receives 100 shares of stock and $10,000 in the certificates of indebtedness. The executors and the Columbia Trust Company are the trustees. The will was dated Februrary 13, 1912.—Boston Herald, August 31.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

OUTDOOR.

BETHNAL GREEN BRANCH N. S. S. (Victoria Park, near the Bandstand): 3.15, James Rowney, "Charles Bradlaugh."

CAMBERWELL BRANCH N. S. S. (Brockwell Park): 5, Miss Kough, a Lecture.

KINGSLAND BRANCH N. S. S. (corner of Ridley-road): 11.30, Miss Kough, "Charles Bradlaugh: 'Lest we forget'"; 7.30, J. W. Marshall, "A Giver of All Good Gifts."

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Finsbury Park): 11.30, Mr. Hope, a Lecture. Parliament Hill: 3.30, Mr. Hope, a Lecture. Regent's Park (near the Fountain): 3.30, Mr. Davidson, a Lecture.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, A. D. Howell-Smith, B.A., "Charles Bradlaugh."

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

BIRMINGHAM BRANCH N. S. S. (Oriental Café, Hill-street): Bradlaugh Sunday. Meeting at 7. Speakers: Messrs. F. E. Willis, E. Clifford Williams, and others.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—MISS E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6¾ ins. by 8¾ ins. by 4¾ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

Liberty and Necessity. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

The Mortality of the Soul. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

An Essay on Suicide. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

From Christian Pulpit to Secular Platform. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

The Martyrdom of Hypatia. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

The Wisdom of the Ancients. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A Refutation of Deism. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

Life, Death, and Immortality. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

Footsteps of the Past. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

Bible Studies and Phallic Worship. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

Utilitarianism. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

The Church Catechism Examined. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

The Essence of Religion. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

The Code of Nature. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

Letters of a Chinaman on the Mischief of Missionaries. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A Philosophical Inquiry Concerning Human Liberty. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

An Outline of Evolutionary Ethics. Price 6d, postage 1d.

Socialism, Atheism, and Christianity. Price 1d., postage ½d.

Christianity and Social Ethics. Price 1d., postage ½d.

Pain and Providence. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d. (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 40 SUNDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Greatness is great power, producing great effects.
—WILLIAM HAZLITT.

Fighting Christians.

JESUS CHRIST is most frequently called the Savior. Whether he will save us, or any of us, somehow and somewhere, in the next world, if there is a next world, is a matter of pure speculation. Whatever we find out on this point, we must die to do it. Meanwhile, it is pretty certain that he has not saved us in this world. All the salvation we get comes from the progress of science and civilisation. England is a Christian country, and is well to the front in the race of progress. Abyssinia has been a Christian country ever so much longer, and is just as far behind. The difference between them is due, not to Christianity, but to secular causes. And the same rule applies in all cases. Every nation that has an advantage over other nations owes it to natural conditions, such as soil, climate, position, material resources, education, and good government. Of course the most advanced nations still profess and call themselves Christians. But profession is one thing and practice another. It seems to be generally admitted that real Christianity is only possible—if it is possible at all—on off-days, like Sunday, when business is suspended, and people are free to indulge in all sorts of sentimentalities, without the least hindrance to their prosperity. Indeed, an English bishop has openly declared that any State which tried to carry out the Sermon on the Mount would be ruined in a week.

Another inappropriate name of Jesus Christ is the Prince of Peace. This is not only inappropriate, but positively facetious. Jesus himself said that he came not to send peace, but a sword; and this prophecy, at any rate, has been amply fulfilled. One can hardly find in all history a religion which has been so cantankerous and quarrelsome as his. All religions have been more or less bitter and contentious, and creators of discord and division. According to the Bible itself the first quarrel in the world was a religious one. Cain worshiped God in one way, Abel in another; and they settled the dispute by one knocking out the other's brains. This is the way in which religious disputes have been settled ever since. But the religion founded—whether in reality or only in repute—by Jesus Christ has been the most fruitful in hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness. It has always been marked by bigotry, arrogance, persecution, and cruelty. Never has it truly served the cause of peace. Even if it aimed at doing so it has signally failed. The history of Christendom is a long record of war, bloodshed, and conquest. The map of Europe has always been adjusted on battlefields. And the fighting power of Christian nations is simply overwhelming. The late Mr. Gladstone, indeed, cited this fact as a proof of the divine origin and character of Christianity. Christian nations build all the battleships, manufacture all the guns, rifles, and explosives, drill and maintain all the great armies, and carry the arts of destruction to the highest pitch of perfection. Christian nations, too, are the chief disturbers of the peace of the world. Wherever war is going on they are in it. Even when China and Japan had a set-to the Christian nations looked on longingly, and soon arranged to take part in any future quarrels in that locality. The commonest, twopenny-halfpenny Englishman talks about "our empire" and "the soldiers of the King," and quotes odds and ends of the latest patriotic poets. Our American cousins went mad over Admiral Dewey, because he performed the by no means miraculous feat of smashing up a number of ineffective Spanish ships in the bay of Manila. Millions would not have turned out to welcome the greatest genius who ever contributed to the world's highest civilisation—to its science, its art, its literature, or its industrial development. They go wild over gunpowder and glory. Yet the vast majority of them are Christians, and are ready to talk by the yard (on Sundays) about the Prince of Peace. No doubt they think Dewey was a far greater man than Ingersoll. Perhaps if Jesus Christ himself had turned up during the Dewey celebrations they would have voted him a nuisance and sent him to Sing-Sing.

Some time ago the Czar's Love-Feast was sitting at the Hague. The Christian nations, including the United States of America, were all represented there. Ostensibly their object was to promote peace. Really their object was to diminish the cost and risks of war. It was like a Conference of Burglars discussing how they might reduce the expenses of their profession. Even the expressed horror of Dum-Dum bullets, and new explosives, was not really humane. Christian rulers want to keep up armies and navies, and they see that war will cease altogether if science is allowed to make it too deadly. So they want to construct a ring, and have a good set of international Queensberry rules, in the interest of the noble art of slaughter. Anyhow, the chairs upon which the Hague Conference sat were hardly cold before another war was in progress. And of course it was the dear, good, peaceable Christians who were at it again. They put the Prince of Peace in a cupboard in the joss-house, and have brought out and trimmed up the Lord of Hosts. Boers and Britishers both worshiped this deity. The Boer had a Mauser rifle in one hand and a Dutch Bible in the other, while the Britisher had weapons in both hands and a Bible behind his back. Each relied upon the God of that book. Each prayed to the God of that book. Each informed the God of that book which side he ought to take in the quarrel. And what did this God do? He sat silent in heaven and did nothing. He let both sides take his name in vain. He read them no lesson in honesty and charity; he did not bid them try justice and mutual toleration instead of fighting; he simply went to sleep and left word for the victor to call him when the fight was over. Such a God is only fit for a museum. Some will say he is hardly fit for that.

At the present moment a number of Christian nations are engaged in the biggest war in history. Millions of soldiers are in the field, and the killed and wounded amount to thousands a day.

It may be said that Christianity is not responsible for the fighting disposition of Christian nations. But this is a confession of its moral impotence. It means that Christianity must be supplanted by another regulating power—the Religion of Humanity.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

God's Opportunity.

EVERYBODY is familiar with the story of the Castilian king who said that had he been present at the creation he would have moved an amendment. In spite of its "blasphemy" the story has always commanded considerable sympathy. For what Alfonso said he would have done had he been given the chance, all good men and women have been doing since the creation. In one form or other all human effort after betterment resolves itself into attempts to improve God's handiwork. They are so many amendments to the "Divine plan." Nature is—so say theologians—God's handiwork. It expresses his plan; and man is everywhere remoulding it. Man is everywhere in conflict with nature; it is his one constant opponent. There never exists anything better than an armed truce, and the slightest relaxation of vigilance, the overlooking of a weak point of defence, is followed by some natural catastrophe on a more or less comprehensive scale. If God's work is to be seen anywhere it must be found in nature. And man is everywhere trying to pass amendments.

"Man's weakness," say the theologians, "is God's opportunity." Freethinkers understand the phrase and appreciate it. Ultimately, it means that the belief in God, the fear of God, is never so strong as when man is weak and helpless. Give man knowledge, and the strength that comes of knowledge, and—to again follow our religious guides—he becomes puffed up with pride and arrogance. Let him realise his weakness, his ignorance, his helplessness, and he becomes more susceptible to religious influences. There is a truth—of a kind—in this. Historically, human civilisation develops along the line of a challenge to the control and commands of Deity. Early human history shows us man everywhere oppressed by the thought of what the gods want, and by the fear of what may happen if their desires are not gratified. Had that fear continued civilisation would have been an impossibility. One generation would have succeeded another, treading the same round, with no greater variation than could be secured by the slow operation of natural selection. It was the revolt against the gods that lifted man out of that rut. Man had to learn to dare the anger of the gods in order to investigate, to criticise, and, as a consequence, to improve. The power of the gods had to be broken before civilisation could advance. Heresy is the condition of progress in all ages.

What, however, theologians mean by man's weakness being God's opportunity, is that his pride must be broken before God's will can be done. It is a curious argument, and I am not now going to discuss either its sense or its relevancy. I desire only to point out that there are many other opportunities that offer themselves whereby God might impress upon the world both his presence and his power. One such opportunity has just presented itself. All the world is ringing with the story of the German bombardment of Rheims Cathedral. It has been called an offence against civilisation—as though the acts that led up to that bombardment were not a still greater offence. The world has been horrified and protests have been made, as though there were not greater cause for horror and greater need for protest on account of the thousands of ruined homesteads and the slaughter of thousands of human beings—including women and children. New cathedrals may be, and I suppose will be, built. But a family once blotted out is destroyed for ever. And if the world is less affected by the thought of the families destroyed than by the contemplation of a cathedral in ruins, it is only because its imagination is not yet sufficiently civilised to appraise things at their proper value. A great artistic structure in ruins and a ruined home are both deplorable sights, but there should be little doubt as to which constitutes the greater sin against humanity.

No Freethinker would wish to do aught that could destroy or depreciate a work of art, whether it be a statue, a cathedral, a painting, or a secular building. But there are some considerations in connection with these cathedrals that everyone would do well to bear in mind. Quite naturally journalists have been "spreading themselves" on the subject. They have written largely about the piety, the love, the devotion, the self-sacrifice that went to the building of a cathedral such as that of Rheims. Some element of truth there may be in this; but it is all greatly overdone. Artists—whether painters, sculptors, or engravers—worked in the Middle Ages much as they work now; and if in earlier times a more religious form was given to their production than is the case to-day, the cause was economic, not religious. Religion does not create art; it is doubtful whether it improves it or purifies it. All it does is to buy it. The Church bought art as it bought everything else that was likely to advance its claims or strengthen its position. And while we admire the cathedrals of the world, let us not forget that the religion which brought about their erection was content to see men and women herded like cattle and treated like slaves beneath their very shadow. A church might be rich with carved stone or wood, the sun's rays might enter through windows rich with the colors of the rainbow and depicting all the glories that supreme art could portray, but the people out of whose enforced labor they were reared were living meanwhile in windowless huts that were fœtid with disease, amid streets unpaved, and with sanitation unknown. The "glorious cathedrals" of the Middle Ages is only one side of the picture. To get the picture complete we must realise how their richness of construction and endowment was procured through widespread misery and oppression; how the solemn music of the cathedral was accompanied by the clank of prisoners' chains, the songs of marching priests by the groans of tortured men and women, the perfume of incense by the smoke of the auto-da-fé; and that while within the church there might be the peace of God, outside there existed the very misery of fabled hells. The beauties of Rheims, Amiens, Cologne, remain; they are part of the world's possessions. We appreciate their beauties, but we do not forget that the religion which could raise them could do nothing to promote a better human life for those who saw their erection.

The horror expressed at the bombardment of Rheims is not wholly artistic. It is partly religious. The building was one erected to the glory of God; it was his house; it belonged in a peculiar sense to him. So be it. The Germans, in shelling the cathedral, were not merely vandals—they were impious vandals. They had raised their hands against God's house. What was God doing to permit such sacrilege? Here was a glorious opportunity for him to vindicate his presence and his power. At a time when the eyes of the whole civilised world are fixed on Northern France, what a triumph for religion it would have been had the German shells been miraculously deflected from their course, or if paralysis had seized the arms of every gunner who aimed a shot at the cathedral! Or the shells might have reached their mark, but have failed to do injury. There are a dozen ways in which a miracle might have been wrought in order to save the cathedral, each one of which would have been enough to convert the world to religion. Or if God had only—to use the conventional religious jargon—"moved the hearts" of the Germans to spare the cathedral. Even that would have been something. But no nothing was done. The German shells went as true to the mark whether they were directed towards a church or a fort. God did nothing. A first-rate opportunity was there, and God refused to avail himself of it.

Is this asking or expecting too much? I do not think it is. The religious world is full of stories of miraculous happenings in obscure ways and to obscure persons. It also tells us of the many ways in which God does move the hearts of people to act as he would have them act. Why not then, just for once, perform a miracle and manifest his presence in so public a way that all doubt would be silenced? Or is the German heart quite beyond his power? Consider the number of religious stories we have of people who were preserved from death or disaster by the interposition of "Providence." Consider, also, the solemn testimonies of men like the late Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, or of the Rev. Dr. Horton, that God has directly influenced people to send them sums of money, or help them recover missing articles. If God can do these things, are we to say that either a German gunner or a siege gun is beyond his control? That would, indeed, be blasphemy. Or, are we to conclude that these stories are all wrong, and that God does nothing either at Rheims or elsewhere?

Digitized by Google

"What terrible punishments God must be reserving for this German nation, which commits so many acts of sacrilege," said the Archbishop of Rheims, when he was informed of the German action. That is a truly Christian view. God is reserving "terrible punishments" for the German nation! But what is the use of that? Whom will they benefit? These terrible punishments will not rebuild the cathedral, they will not re-people the devastated villages, they will not bring to life again the women and children who have been murdered. They do not, obviously, stop the Germans continuing their work. God is waiting until it is all over; he is making a note of all the Germans are doing, and will square accounts with them later. That policy benefits no one. Any man, who could prevent outrage, and permitted it, would not be allowed to defend himself with such a plea. It is not God's duty to punish; if there is a God, it is his duty to guide and prevent. A parent does not lie in wait for his children to do wrong in order to punish them later. He guides; he, if possible, restrains; and only punishes in order to prevent a repetition of the wrong-doing. Why does not our "heavenly father" act likewise? A God who will not prevent has no right to punish. His standing aside makes him an accessory to the act. His "terrible punishments" later is the act of one who does not play the straight game even with his accomplices.

Perhaps, after all, it is better to leave God altogether out of account. It is true that he did not avail himself of this opportunity to vindicate his presence. But then he never has seized opportunities of this kind. He has watched unmoved massacre after massacre, war after war, with all the horrors and outrages that war always brings wherever and by whomsoever waged. A God who has done nothing for so long is not likely to start doing something now. Powder takes no note of Deity, and Deity returns the compliment by taking no note of powder. God did nothing at Rheims. He did nothing when his Spanish followers, in the sixteenth century, killed 50,000 heretics in Belgium and Holland. He did nothing when his French followers perpetrated the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Opportunities are always present for the manifestations of God's power. But these manifestations never come.

C. COHEN.

An Infamous Libel on Humanity.

WHILE the war-drum is at its loudest and Europe deluged with innocent blood, the Saturday Journal affords space for a discussion of the trite question, "After Death—What?" In two of its issues, September 19 and 26, the doctrine of a future state is dogmatically stated for the hundred millionth time by Mr. Lee Danvers and the President of the Wesleyan Conference. The latter's article is of the extremely commonplace type, and neither deserves nor requires any further notice, its arguments being those threadbare ones with which we are all familiar, and which have been triumphantly refuted innumerable times. The peculiarity of Mr. Danvers's contribution is that it does not pretend to adduce any arguments at all. This eccentric writer goes so far as to admit that "it may be true, as some would have us believe, that there is no future life for any of us; that when we die nothing happens except the thing which is obvious to us all—the decomposition of our bodies." He candidly acknowledges that "death is utterly beyond the domain of reason," and that "therefore we cannot reason about it." "We can speculate about its meaning," he adds, "or we can decide to leave it out of our thoughts, but we cannot argue about it and prove our arguments right before we ourselves die." He also grants that science is opposed to the belief in immortality, and accuses the parsons of having paid too much deference to the scientists, and in consequence discarded the simple Gospel of the primitive Church. Of course, so tremendous a believer as Mr. Danvers is profoundly convinced that "religion has not gained anything by its adaptation to the scientific thought of the twentieth century," and this is a conviction in which we fully concur. As a matter of fact, religion has lost on a stupendous scale as the result of its various attempts to accommodate itself to the conclusions of science. Religion and science have absolutely nothing in common, though the latter completely undermines the foundations of the former.

Mr. Danvers tramples reason as dust under his feet. Take the following as a sample of the process:—

> "To construct is always better than to destroy, to build up better than to pull down; therefore, the simple, unquestioning faith of the Christian in a life after death must obviously be finer than the complicated reasoning of the scientist and the discontented questioning of the unbeliever. For Christianity constructs a Hereafter, whereas most of the scientists and all of the unbelievers do their best to destroy the Christian idea of a Hereafter without seeking to supply a substitute."

With a man who can write in that wild, irresponsible manner it is quite impossible to argue, for no argument, however well-founded and true, would find anything in him to which to appeal. Like the seed in the parable, it falls upon a rocky soil, and can bear no fruit whatever. The biggest fool on earth is aware that sometimes it is better to destroy than to construct, to pull down than to build up, and that, therefore, it by no means follows that "the simple, unquestioning faith of the Christian in a life after death must obviously be finer than the complicated reasoning of the scientist." The world at this moment abounds in evil constructions which need to be destroyed. Does Mr. Danvers really believe that it is better to construct militarism than to destroy it; better to fill the world with armaments than to pull them down? If Mr. Danver's statement were true, it would be a justification of all the terrible evils now rampant on the planet. It is a mistake to say that Christianity constructs a Hereafter, the Hereafter being simply an old superstition which Christianity, at the commencement of its career, appropriated, regarding it as an invaluable asset, which it has abundantly proved itself to be. We can trace its evolution as a Pagan superstition during countless ages before Christianity was ever heard of; but although admitting that its incorporation with Christianity has eventuated in incalculable profit to the Church, we are firmly of opinion that its effect upon the morals of Christendom has been wholly bad. We belong to the category of unbelievers so wholeheartedly despised by Mr. Danvers; but we beg to inform him that it is excessively foolish to expect us to supply a substitute for a baseless superstition which we seek to demolish. It is an injurious excrescence of which the world should be rid as soon as possible, and for which, certainly, no substitute is required.

Mr. Danvers clings to the Biblical doctrine of life after death, not because it is true, but because it is more attractive than the view that death ends all. This is how he puts it:—

> "The Christian used to believe in a life after death that should consist of becoming an ethereal creature with wings on one's shoulders and a harp in one's hands, and eternity was pictured very largely as an > eternity of music. Such a belief is grotesquely absurd according to the scientist and the unbeliever, but, at least, it is more attractive than a belief in nothingness, or in nothing in particular, after death."

Digitized by Google

According to this teaching, if error is more attractive than truth, we should cherish it and fling truth from us as a despicable thing. If evil is more fascinating than good, by all means let us choose evil and hurl good down the wind. If hate has greater charms than love, let us give free vent to our hatred and bottle up our love. It is a damnable and damning doctrine, and our detestation of it cannot be too vehement. There are neither wings nor harps of gold in the next world, Mr. Danvers tells us, inasmuch as the inhabitants are disembodied spirits, but both wings and harps must be retained, not because they are real, but because they are such lovely symbols; nor are there angels, "but, all the same, angels serve a very useful purpose, if not as facts, at least as figures." Now, listen to this balderdash:—

> "The wings and the harp and the music are held nowadays to be the childish figments of childlike minds, and the ministers of the Gospel have agreed to banish them from their talk of an after-life, out of deference to the fact that humanity has, so to speak, grown up. But those things ought not to be banished; we need them."

Let us leave such trivialisms and proceed to consider the only important point in the whole article. Mr. Danvers shall state it in his own words:—

> "If everyone believed that death meant utter annihilation, the world would promptly become a place of unspeakable horror. It is all very well to argue that many people would live honestly, soberly, and decently, that they would do right for the mere sake of doing right; but we all know well enough that the majority would do wrong, for the simple reason that it is so very much easier to do wrong than to do right. Let us not deceive ourselves. It is the simple faith of the bulk of mankind in a life after death of infinite possibilities that prevents the world from becoming a hell of madness, murder, and debauchery."

It is extremely difficult to realise that a man in his right senses, or any man who lived on this globe, could have written such ineffably silly stuff. Is not Europe at this hour a veritable "hell of madness, murder, and debauchery?" What about poor little Belgium, France, Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Russia? Is Great Britain a Paradise to-day? But all the people who are responsible for the existing state of things are firm believers in God and a future life. Mr. Danvers is simply talking unmitigated nonsense. No one who keeps his eyes open can conscientiously assert that its Christian faith has ever been of the slightest service to Christendom. What has Christian Germany lived to achieve? Domination. Which Christian Power has ever existed for any other purpose? What other object has even the Christian Church ever had in view? We challenge Mr. Danvers to answer. We know to our sorrow what awful evils have flourished, what harrowing injustices, tyrannies, cruelties, murders, and debaucheries have run riot all through the ages under Christianity; but this champion of a life to come evidently does not know what the death of Christianity would mean. Indeed, the deeps of his ignorance and prejudice are altogether unfathomable. He may be speaking for himself when he avers that it is so very much easier to do wrong than to do right; but so to characterise all mankind is to indulge in grossest slander. To say of those who repudiate the belief in immortality "that they have nothing to live for," is to fling at them the most abominable affront. If Mr. Danvers is so morally weak, of himself, that he would steal our watch or murder us if he did not believe in a world to come, he has no right to infer that the rest of the race is equally depraved; and this inference which he is conceited and audacious enough to draw is absolutely false. He entertains a low opinion of himself, and a much lower one of all others.

We have been told by eminent men of God that the War owes its origin to the blatant Atheism of Prussia; but out of his hopeless insularity of view, Mr. Danvers assures us that there is no such thing as Atheism. So reckless are his utterances on this point that we are almost tempted to conclude that he is himself an Atheist masquerading as the most irrational Christian believer ever known, and waxing furiously merry at the expense of his readers. Surely the following extract must emanate from insanity or from hypocrisy:—

> "The Atheist declares that there is no God, but the real truth is that there is no Atheist. There are professed Atheists, just as there are professed Christians, but there is no genuine Atheist. There is no man or woman on the face of the earth who does not believe in the existence of an omnipotent God. Atheism is nothing more than a wanton, impotent bravado. It is a sheer impossibility for anyone to live and disbelieve in an Almighty, no matter what name you may bestow upon him."

In spite of all the sorrows and sufferings of the times, all we can do is to laugh at a man who is the victim of such deplorably blind prejudice, or capable of such silly and offensive play-acting. In any case, he is a convicted false accuser of his fellow-human beings.

J. T. LLOYD.

A Grey Street.

BENEATH their superficial simplicity human affairs are so complex that we are often amazed at the ease with which the most audacious conclusions are obtained. The difficulty of imagining even the possibility of the existence of a group of ideas directly opposed to their own seems to be insuperable to most people, presuming the endeavor is made. To think of two different lines of thought; to analyse them; to ponder over their antagonistic merits and demerits; and to base opinion, not on the emotional appeal of either, but upon the rationality of the one as distinguished from the other, seems a hopeless task. Nearly invariably, emotion is elevated at the expense of reason.

British patriotism is the patriotism. We forget our opponents are equally in love with their Fatherland, and for similar reasons. We have nationalism so badly that we forget we are not the only nation on the face of the earth. We forget that, if we insist upon a nation being likened to a superman, then an expanding nation must have the opportunity to grow. It is dangerous to thwart its growth. Obeying the evolutionary forces, it will fight, and fight hard, for its essential increase in life. We bitterly condemn brutality, forgetting the horrors we tolerate next door. We prate of the refinement of an evil, of the culture that should accompany warfare, forgetting that every great human mind considers war barbaric. We are chokeful of ideas of honor, omitting to recollect that our honor, as a nation, is not altogether stainless, and that, in our national expansion, we painted the map red with patriotic blood.

These are just a few of the popular purblindnesses. And perhaps the funniest, at the present time, circles round our Christianity. God is in the King; but the Devil inhabits the Kaiser. We are too much concerned with motes, too little occupied with beams. The power to observe both sides seems lacking. One might justly put it down to an inability to use the reasoning faculties. And as religion has always been an opposing factor to the free use of reason, we fail to see why it should not be held semi-responsible for a calamity that might have been easily avoided with a little reasonable give-and-take on both sides. Less religion and more reason would save the world much suffering.

So long as people never strive to see both sides of a question, just so long will the fruits of reason remain solely with science; just so long will social power remain in the hands of the financially powerful; just so long will religion have ample human food to nourish it. Religion has cultivated the one-sidedness of the human mind to such an extent that we cannot, regardless of our wishes, deem it immune from blame. And Freethought, above any other human movement, has accomplished more in the ridding of this purblindness from the mind than its adversaries give it credit for. But, in these strenuous days, we are afforded evidence, unmistakable and incontrovertible, that the anti-social nature of religion must be opposed; that Freethought's time of rest is not yet. Freethinkers are fighters; and we have, perhaps, the conceited opinion that their fight and their bravery shadow the warfare and bravery of conflicting militarism.

Digitized by Google

There is, naturally, a comic side to this war affair; and in the reaping of the great harvest of human sorrow priests, being single-minded men, are forgetting that the crystal of human life has more than one facet.

. . . . . .

The prevailing color-tone is grey. The factory on the other side, its massive stone masonry hiding the western skies, is grey. On this side the tenement houses are grey. Even the atmosphere seems tinted in grey. Age and the smoke from many tall stacks have accomplished their task well; for the street is steeped in a hopelessly melancholic moroseness. Even on the freshest of spring days you can smell it. Anyone whose feelings were in the least susceptible to lights and shades, and whose nature rejoiced in the wide open spaces above fields and hills, would soon discover how easily and rapidly such an environment breeds an ugliness closely akin to immorality.

And yet there is the happiness that is elemental with life in the dismal place. During the daytime it resounds in the whirring of machinery; the rattle of traffic carries the same chorus; the loud-voiced hawkers unconsciously embody in their calls the basic happiness of life; and in the early evening the children, with their ceaseless laughter and shouting and quarreling, continue the life-refrain.

However distressful may be one's comparison of ideal and reality, however sorely the need for improvement may impress itself on the mind, and however painful may be the undesirable opinion that progress is a forlorn hope against an impregnable phlegmatism, it is impossible to overlook the happiness underlying it all. Life, full of activities useful and useless, average commonplace life, with all its stagnant repellancy to ideas and all its dull-witted safeguarding of social customs once dearly bought, the sluggish life the people live, is here; and in the heavy grey of it there is only one thread of light, the indestructible fundamental happiness inseparable from human life.

Tawdriness, squalor, and lowness cannot thoroughly conceal it. Depressing monotony and sordid excitement cannot hide it. The two outstanding characteristics of the place and the people, child-breeding and labor, serve only to intensify it by different means. The life-happiness laughs in uproarious merriment, smiles in coarse pleasures, leers in obscene jokes. Through the touches of beauty and the splashes of ugliness, through the conglomeration of vices and virtues, joys and pains, runs the life-sustaining rivulet of happiness, one thread of gold in the overwhelming grey. It is the happiness of being alive; for even the slave with the greatest burden prefers life to death, prefers to carry the load rather than give Death the knife to cut the burden's cords.

Not that this in any way softens the hardships religion has completely failed to remove, or the griefs that Christianity cannot assuage, or the sorrows God cannot eradicate. Despite them, the life-happiness exists; and sometimes I fancy I can see the smile of the life-happiness flaunting its strange powers in the lugubrious face of God.

God, if he exist, has lamentably failed to crush love for himself into the human heart, and failed, also, to crush merriment out. And if, as some of our religious luminaries seem to have been informed by wireless phonogramic communication from heaven, God, at the present time, is doing his utmost to blacken the soul of man with battle smoke, and lacerate his heart with all the hideous sorrows of war, and obliterate from his mind all the humanistic teachings of centuries, so that man may be taught the error of his ways, then God, again, will ignominiously fail. Notwithstanding the hellishness of his educational methods, Humanity will still smile, for Humanity will still live; and the smile will rob God of the essence of his victory.

Twenty centuries of Christianity have not been enough to keep men from the throats of their brothers. Twenty centuries of Christian teaching of morality have not secured one single step of progress from the brute. Twenty centuries of idealistic instruction have not given us the least justification for saying that we have been civilised by Christianity, or even that it has been helpful to us in eliminating the lower instincts from our natures. And yet these twenty centuries of Christianity, on the other hand, have not been able to freeze the laugh on our lips.

Never has God, if what religionists say be true, poured such a sackful of horrors into the heart of Humanity. Never before has God flooded the white flesh of his little ones with such a sea of red blood. Never before, we are told, has God seen fit so terrifically to blazon forth the wrath of his love for us. But the innumerable grey people of millions of grey streets like this can still laugh.

Although we grey people are all interested more in battles than in anything else; although victories, defeats, advances, rearguard movements, and all the rest hold our attention nearly entirely; although we know our lives are being gradually screwed down to subsistence levels, and that the sufferings of thousands of children at home will be no less severe than the sufferings of soldiers at the front; although we know that misery is deepening her depths in the life of man, and that most of us will, at some time or other, be affected by the overspreading darkness of the valley in which we live, we can still laugh. And the laughter becomes more bitterly ironic the nearer its sound gets to God.

To-day we are all speaking of warfare. We compare casualties. Braveries and brutalities fill our little minds. We are full of an accrescent animosity against an enemy. We are fighting, not so much for victory, as to the death. We are soldier mad. Militarism has gripped us. We might be living in a tribal state a few degrees from animalism. We must yield implicit obedience to the most foolish command of the merest minion of the tribal chief.

Christianity, in fact, with all its contemptible morality might be dead. But we can still laugh.

Those who are praying around the putrescent corpse of Christianity forget this facet of human life. They forget that Humanity is bigger than their conceptions of God and his heavenly clique of assistants. They forget that Humanity can smile through its tears; that man can laugh when his heart has been furrowed by the plough of sorrow.

In this grey street the people are living their grey lives as usual. Perhaps it is as well that they cannot vision the sufferings of which they so easily speak; perhaps it is as well their minds cannot imagine the terrible tortures that have come upon their unknown fellow-beings, unsolicited and unjustly; perhaps it is as well their little grey minds cannot feel the hardships others are toiling through.

Sometimes I think that; at other times I wish they could realise a hail of bullets, and could feel the sudden plunge of bloody steel into a human breast —could feel the twist, and wrench, and crunch as it was pulled out. I wish they could see, in idea, the horrors of a lovely meadow strewn with dead and dying bodies, portions of flesh, limbs, and muscles and human organs in all stages of decomposition and in all degrees of laceration. Sometimes I wish they could see their own sons and daughters lying there. And then, when the idea begins more fully to develop, a sickness creeps over, and I become glad the little grey minds of the people cannot see these things; and yet, how else will they ever realise the unheroic side of ugly barbarism?

The question brings me back to my starting point. Perhaps the little grey minds of the people of these grey streets can only be reached by the interpenetrative teaching of what is opposed to the cause of their singlemindedness. Slowly that teaching will work through religion into their lives. Fighting religion, we are fighting one of the great original causes of their purblindness. Opening the gates of Reason, it may be we are opening the gates to a more civilised life; for when Reason dominates life, we are justified in thinking, barbarism, in all its aspects, and horrors, and sufferings, will be no more.

Digitized by Google

ROBERT MORELAND.

Acid Drops.

That eminently Christian novelist, Mr. Hall Caine, has contributed to the October number of Nash's and Pall Mall Magazine an eminently Christian article on the war, which is but a distinct echo of the utterances of the Bishop of Zanzibar, Drs. Clifford and Campbell Morgan, and the editor of the British Weekly on the same subject. The article as a whole is extremely commonplace, written in the slovenly, diffuse style peculiar to this novelist, and we would not dream of noticing it at all were it not for its reiteration of a fundamental heresy. Like the leaders of his public, Mr. Hall Caine asserts that the war, on the part of Germany, is a reversion to Paganism; and Paganism, from his point of view, means Atheism. In this assertion there lurk two radical errors. The first is that Paganism was Atheistical, and the second that Paganism favored war. For these two errors, fallen into by a public man, there is absolutely no excuse.

Surely there is no need at this time of day to prove that many Pagan philosophers were profoundly religious men. No readers of Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius would dare to question that fact; but it may be news to Mr. Hall Caine and the generality of his numerous readers that, like the early Church Fathers, Pagan philosophers were zealous denouncers of war. If he were to consult the works of Cicero, Seneca, Plutarch, Celsus, as quoted by Origen, and many others still accessible, he would be heartily ashamed of several prejudiced statements in his article. One citation only must suffice here. In Epistle 95, Seneca, by far the most brilliant of the Latin writers of the Silver Age, says:—

> "We punish murders and individual homicides; what of wars and the glorious wickedness of slaughtered nations? Neither our avarice nor our cruelty knows a bound."

In point of fact, Paganism was incomparably more pacific than Christianity has ever been from the moment it came to power under Constantine.

Mr. Hall Caine quotes largely from the sayings of the Gospel Jesus; but he carefully selects the pacific maxims, and makes no allusion to the warlike ones, of which there are several. Not a word is uttered about sending a sword rather than peace, about selling cloaks and purchasing swords, or about sowing discord in families. Is it fair to cite one set of sayings and omit another set of an opposite character? But it is a Christian habit—oh, so Christian!

Sir Joseph Compton-Rickett, M.P., President-elect of the Free Churches' Council, writing in that religious periodical, the Daily Mail, says it is a "mistaken idea that Christianity excludes the exercise of force—The Divine Word itself abounds in warnings, and utters its last comforts and cautions beneath the lurid sunset of the Apocalypse." We know that "sunset." It used to be a coaling station.

According to some of the daily papers, the Germans are all "Atheists," whilst others deride them as "religious maniacs." The reader pays his halfpenny and takes his choice.

Those Christian gentlemen who are so very anxious for other people to consider that the Germans are all "Atheists" might explain how it is that the German soldiers wear belts with a buckle bearing the inscription "Gott mit uns" ("God with us"). That is the motto of the German Army, and it reads very oddly as an Atheistic inscription.

We hope, or rather we don't hope, that Mr. Lloyd George was sure of his figures in his Criccieth speech the other day. "You will be surprised to know," he said, "that for every one Belgian soldier lost on the battlefield three unoffending, innocent people were ruthlessly killed in that country." This is a terrible statement. If true, it damns Germany beyond redemption.

Dr. Arthur Canon Doyle, writing in the Chronicle on "The Great German Plot," says that "the real cause of war was universal national insanity," and that this insanity "was based upon the universal supposition that the Germans were the Lord's chosen people." This is plain enough. And it shows how much Atheism had to do with this great calamity.

"Randall Cantuar" (alias Canterbury) is a very good name for the Archbishop who has been contributing hypocritical absurdity to the war correspondence in the newspapers. A very good name. Cant he is.

Mr. R. J. Campbell says that "a spirit of swagger and bullying appears to have taken possession of what was once a simple and God-fearing race." Well, we have often observed that "swagger" is one of the outstanding characteristics of God-fearing. Consider the spiritual "swagger" of the old-type Puritan, or of the newly made revivalistic convert. There are other kinds of swagger beside that of the military bully, and that of the Christian is among the more objectionable of its many forms. Besides, if "God-fearing" is of any real value, it should have protected this simple race from the swagger to which Mr. Campbell alludes. There are things that often act as a protection against the development of objectionable qualities. Christianity seems to invite their presence.

Mr. Campbell says that "perhaps" the war "has been divinely permitted as a stern discipline" to save us from becoming a decadent people. And perhaps, also, Belgium "needed this purifying flame" because "her record in the Congo is not a good one." This is unmitigated rubbish. Decadence is not brought about by an absence of war; it is induced by war. Germany is decadent—in comparison with the Germany of forty years ago—precisely because in the interval it has given so much of its energies to thoughts of militarism. And the men of England who are responding to the call for soldiers have not been produced by war, but by peace. Recruiting officers are expressing their pleasure and surprise at the quality—physical and mental—of those who offer themselves for enlistment. We need only remember that these recruits are not the products of a military system to realise the absurdity of the talk about war being needful to prevent decadence. Character is made in the home and in the peaceful pursuits of social life. At best war only employs what has been otherwise produced, and generally it leads to waste and demoralisation.

To talk of the desolation of Belgium as a "purifying flame" is an insult to common sense, if not to common decency. True, the brutalities of Belgian officials on the Congo were almost beyond description; but what had the peaceful Belgian villager to do with these? And how are they remedied by God permitting the German armies to ravage Belgium? The man chiefly responsible for those outrages, King Leopold, died peacefully in his bed. God let him alone; and now, years after his death, according to Mr. Campbell, he blasts the Belgian people for what Leopold did, and for what he permitted. Mr. Campbell says it is "blasphemous" for the Kaiser to talk of the "divine blessings" that follow the German armies. But if Mr. Campbell is correct in saying that this war is permitted by God to act as a "purifying flame" in Belgium, then the Kaiser is, after all, correct. He is God's instrument. He is purifying Belgium. Really, Mr. Campbell might try to be consistent, even in his unreason.

According to a Times report the Bishop of St. Albans said that "the war had brought a strange position with regard to ordination candidates. In one case with which he was acquainted, every single candidate on the list had volunteered for service in the New Army." They preferred fighting to preaching, and Kitchener to Christ.

"What you say about the administration of the Prince's Fund," Mr. J. T. Lloyd writes to Mr. Foote, "is perfectly true everywhere. I know a poor woman in Paddington who has been abominably treated. She has two sons in the Army, and six helpless ones depending upon her at home, one an invalid husband. She works her finger nails out, and yet she was asked if she couldn't do some more work, and which church she attended. Another case is that of a young girl who was engaged to be married to a reservist. The banns had been put up, but he was called out before the marriage could be performed. Soon after he left she gave birth to a child. When an application for assistance was made she was informed that 'she didn't count.' And yet England is fighting for Christianity!"

Digitized by Google

Truth (September 17) devotes a pointed paragraph to this subject:—

> "From all I can gather the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Association are dealing pretty efficiently with the mass of relief work which the war has entailed upon them, but here and there one hears of incidents which show that local committees are not always wise in their choice of the voluntary workers who do the necessary inquiry work. Here is one of them. A widow whose son is on active service at the front applied to the Glasgow Committee on August 15. After answering a number of questions, she was told that someone would call on her the following week. On August 20 a lady called and gave her 4s. On the 27th appeared a gentleman visitor. After putting the widow through the usual catechism, he told her that she must put her whole trust in the Lord, and, dropping on his knees, prayed for four or five minutes. He then presented her with an evangelical tract and took his departure. When people ask for bread they ought not to be given tracts."

We hope Truth will continue these exposures.

Information reaches us that it is quite common in South London to ask applicants if they attend church, and to treat them according to their replies. In this way the National Relief Fund becomes an agency for promoting the interests of the Church of England mainly, though other denominations are not wholly ignored.

"Religion Under Fire" is the title of an article, by "One from the Front," in the Globe. The writer's object is to show that only religious men are brave on the battlefield. Probably he never heard that nearly half the men in France are Freethinkers. That they fight as well as their comrades, and both of them as well as the British, is beyond question. As to great soldiers of the past, Napoleon was a Freethinker, and Frederick the Great was a Freethinker. These will do to go on with.

"No one," the writer says, "ever heard of a man giving his life for the cause of arithmetic, agnosticism, or atheism; he will for religion and what it teaches." The word "arithmetic" shows that this journalist or preacher (for we don't believe in his being one from the front at all) doesn't know what he is writing or talking about. An intelligent child would not confuse arithmetic with agnosticism or atheism. What possible relation can they have to each other, except, perhaps, where the subject of the Trinity is concerned? In that regard it might be said that Servetus gave his life for arithmetic. Atheism has had its martyrs. No doubt men have given their lives for religion, but they have been far more prone to taking other people's lives for it. Nor is it only on the battlefield that men have to face death. Whoever you are, you have to face him when he comes—even on a feather bed.

In all the ages nothing has been more distinctively Christian than for Christians to differ from and contradict one another, and they are still doing so with a vengeance. For example, Dr. Clifford and Dr. Campbell Morgan have asserted, again and again, that the prevalence of the philosophy of Schopenhauer and Nietzsche in Prussia is responsible for the present war, forgetting, or not knowing, that the latter philosopher was the former's severest critic. Now, a lady, writing in the Church Times for September 25, assures us that such an assertion has no foundation whatever in fact. Her words are worth quoting:—

> "However much Nietzsche may be disliked and despised in England, it is perfectly certain that the mass of human beings in Germany dislike and despise him even more than those gentlemen who, never having read a word of his writings, hold him up to opprobrium in this country. They have an equally false idea of his teaching, and one has only to mention Nietzsche in most German houses to call down a chorus of disapprobation from everybody..... It is not, perhaps, too much to say that the keynote of his philosophy is that only by suffering pain with acceptance can we make any way towards becoming a Superman. And this secret life itself whispered in my ear: 'See,' he said, 'I am that which must always conquer itself.' This is very different from the cult of the 'blond beast' which he is supposed to have taught."

This testimony is fully borne out by all who know both Nietzsche and modern Germany. What have Dr. Clifford and Dr. Campbell Morgan to say to this counter-Christian opinion based on knowledge?

The lady maintains, further, that Pan-Germanism is not at all inconsistent with a zealous profession of the Protestant form of the Christian religion. She tells us that "Germany is the only country which has really adopted Protestantism, and carried Protestantism to its logical conclusion." Germany is dominated even to-day, not by Nietzsche, but by a much greater man, namely, Martin Luther, who was as much a man of blood and iron as Bismarck himself. On this point, again, her words are well worth quoting:—

> "If in the great scheme of things punishment lies in seeing the result of our actions, then the saddest soul in the Universe to-day is that of Martin Luther. The German Kaiser has always posed as his great defender and exponent, and he is perfectly right in so doing, given his point of view. Without Martin Luther there would have been no Treitschke, no Bernhardi.....Anyone who will take the trouble to read the writings of Martin Luther will see that if one accepted this man as a prophet, one would have to accept the gospel of force which the Kaiser is promulgating to-day.....That was the immense strength of Martin Luther, that he believed in himself and in his right to trample under foot anything, however holy, which seemed to him to collide with his ideas of what was expedient and just."

We exhort Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, in particular, to ponder the above extract from the pen of an intelligent Christian lady, with whom, on this point we fully agree. It is, to us, exceedingly pleasing to learn with what ease an enlightened Christian exposes the gross and culpable ignorance of some of the leaders of religious thought in this country.

Religious love and religious logic are both curious things. Here, for example, is the Catholic Times chuckling gleefully over the disestablishment of the Church in Wales, and congratulating Welshmen on being freed from "the incubus of an alien Church." It also asks, "Why should Wales, if she does not want Anglicanism, be compelled to put up with it?" and looks forward to a time when the principle that freed Ireland, and has now freed Wales, will free England also. We have no objection to this; on the contrary, we approve of it; but, all the same, it comes curiously from the representatives of a Church that has, whenever it has had the opportunity, put down by force all dissentient opinion, and has always insisted upon the supremacy of religion in secular life. With what amount of grace did the Catholic Times consent to the disestablishment of the Church in France? With what grace would it consent to the disestablishment of the Church in Spain? It welcomes disestablishment in Ireland, Wales, or England, because these Churches are not branches of the Roman Catholic Church. But everyone knows that, given the chance, the Roman Catholic Church would insist upon forcing itself once more upon the British people. A Roman Catholic championship of the right of people to choose what Church they will live under is indeed something to make one open one's eyes.

"Everyone knows," continues the Catholic Times, "that the Church was living on endowments, many of which were stolen from the Catholic Church at the time of the Reformation." "Stolen" is quite a misnomer in relation to funds that are for the larger part essentially State funds, and which can no more be "stolen" than a man can steal money from himself. Either a person or a State may spend money unwisely, but to steal, someone else's property must be involved. Moreover, in any genuine sense of the word, the wealth of the Roman Catholic Church was largely "stolen" from the people. It was taken from them in the shape of toll and tithe, of Government grants and forced labor. The people were robbed right and left for centuries, to build up the wealth of the Church. What occurred at the Reformation was, it is true, very largely a case of changing the name of those who followed this policy of spoliation; but the Catholic Church ought to be the last in the world to raise its voice against a policy to which it owes so large a part of its own possessions.

Here is a story, given in the Church Times, by a Church of England clergyman. A newly enlisted soldier of his acquaintance asked permission to go to early communion. He was asked, What for? To this he replied: "Christ died for me as well as for you, sir, and I wish to feed upon His Blood and His Flesh, which I believe are there." It sounds like an invitation to a cannibal feast. And the people who can talk in this way imagine themselves civilised!

It seems that President Wilson has received many appeals to act as mediator in the War. As none of the parties directly responsible for, and concerned in the war have made the request, the President is, of course, powerless. But he has hit upon, if not a via media, at least an alternative. He has issued an official appeal to God. He has appointed Sunday, October 4, as a day of prayer throughout the United States for peace in Europe. This seems like shifting his own troubles on to the shoulders of God. And he must be bothered enough already. The Germans are praying to him to crush the Allies, the Allies are praying to him to crush the Germans. Now the Americans join in with the request that he will stop the war at once, and make peace between them. If God tries to please all these people it will be the fable of the old man and the donkey over again. He can't possibly satisfy all, and he may offend all. And if he does nothing, other people will ask what is the use of his government? It is a very ticklish position, and a very lengthy essay might be written on "The Troubles of Diety."

Digitized by Google

President Wilson asks "all God-fearing persons" to pray that "He vouchsafe His children healing peace again, and restore once more that concord among men and nations, without which there can be neither happiness, nor true friendship, nor any wholesome fruit of toil or thought in the world." The general drift of this is all right, but when God is asked to restore "once more" the concord among nations, one wonders where it existed. As a matter of fact it has not existed. What concord can there be when the nations—before the actual outbreak of war—were all piling up armaments against each other? How can a man live at concord with his neighbor if he feels that he must keep him under constant surveillance, and be prepared to employ brute force to prevent direct aggression? President Wilson should know that genuine concord between Christian nations does not exist, and never has existed. The President asks these same "God-fearing" people to confess their "lack of any wisdom" equal to bringing about genuine peace. And with that sentiment non-God-fearing people will cordially agree.

The best thing about the Kaiser lately is from America. It occurs in a letter to Mr. Eugene Wason, M.P., as having been overheard: "Nobody seems to be on Germany's side except the Almighty, and we have only the Kaiser's word for that."

Mr. Robert Blatchford will have to look out. The British soldier at the front to-day dislikes being called a "Tommy," and "Tommy Atkins" is still worse. "Tommy" is half Mr. Blatchford's stock-in-trade as a military writer, and we should hardly like to see him with such a large stock left on hand.

The Bishop of London's latest volume of collected addresses has the charming title, Eyes of Flame. The book contains the sermon preached at St. Paul's after the outbreak of war, entitled, "Drinking the Cup." There is no necessary connection between these two titles.

How very shy journalists are in mentioning the dreadful word, Freethinker. This how T. P.'s Weekly refers to Abraham Lincoln's theological opinions: "Like all strong men, his religion was that of the little boy who did not pray in the morning, because 'a bright lad can take care of himself.'" It is hard to believe that the writer is "grown-up."

Importance may be attached to the opinion of Mr. Vivian Phelips, author of the Churches and Modern Thought, on the question of the treatment by the Germans of the Belgians. Mr. Phelips has lived in Belgium for some time, and being asked what was his view as to the reality of "German atrocities," he replied:—

> "I am seeing my girls off at Ostend to-morrow. I have come unwillingly to the conclusion (I've had opportunities to verify) that the stories of German atrocities are only too true, and, in fact, that much has been kept from the public for fear of playing into the hands of the enemy, and creating the panic, which is just what they want. The violation of young girls and young wives, and the cruel killing of helpless non-combatants, have been too terrible for words. All this makes one the more indignant with those who continue to repeat the old parrot-cry that nations become soft and sensuous without war. There is no greater offender in this respect than the average Church of England parson. He should follow the track of the German Army in Belgium if he would wish to know which part of a man's nature is most fostered in war time."

Those who doubt the truth of common reports, and even the official protests made by the Belgian Government to the civilised world, might trust Mr. Phelips. He is a fair-minded gentleman, as his book shows, and has nothing to gain by any kind of misrepresentation.

Are a number of the leader writers on the daily press Roman Catholics? One of the five daily papers, each claiming the largest circulation in the world, referred to the murder of "priests, women, and children," by the German soldiers. As the rest of the article was devoted to the "most hallowed French shrine," Rheims Cathedral, the Protestantism of the writer is not unduly obtrusive.

In the Saturday Journal for September 19, Mr. Lee Danvers undertakes to defend, in the most extravagant language, the blindest belief in a future life. In a reckless mood, he denies the existence of Atheism altogether, and asserts that, though Christianity may be assailed, "human life has been built upon it these nineteen hundred years," with the result, we affirm, that Europe is at this moment in such an awful welter of savage cruelty as has never been experienced before since the world began. But Mr. Danvers is not a reliable witness on any point. Here is a sample of his extreme recklessness and dense ignorance:—

> "The Bible may be full of faults and contradictions, but it has been the biggest power in the world for hundreds of centuries."

"Hundreds of centuries" could not possibly be improved upon. One hundred centuries is a period of ten thousand years, while two hundred centuries cover twenty thousand years. Thus the Bible is, at the very least, twenty thousand years old. Was ever such folly indulged in out of Bedlam? And yet Mr. Danvers is the best defender of the Faith the Saturday Journal could find.

Rev. Nelson Bitton, an ardent missionary advocate, has just published a little book on The Regeneration of New China. He says we must save China from the "coldly intellectual ideal man of Confucius," and give it Christianity, which is, of course, the only thing that can save it. What a horror Christians seem to have of things "intellectual." The use of that word is, apparently, enough to damn anything in the eyes of most. And what is the "coldly intellectual ideal man of Confucius"? Confucius made ample allowance for love and duty to friend, family, and the State. He taught that our sentiment should be guided by the intellect, but so does anyone who is not either a fanatic or a fool. And why should China exchange Confucius for Christianity? Look at the nations that already have Christianity! Consider their treatment of one another—let alone their treatment of outsiders! How much good-will or trust is there among them? Hatred of a third may drive two of them together, but does it go any farther than this? What colossal cheek for anyone, with the present European war in being, to invite a non-Christian nation to adopt their religion! What a recommendation for anyone outside a lunatic asylum!

The Christian World points out that the Baptismal Service of the Church of England was originally written under the idea that every child really belonged to the Devil, and the original form of the service ran:—

> "I command thee, unclean spirit, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, that thou come out and depart from these infants."

Baptism was thus a method of getting rid of the Devil within the child. This portion of the service was afterwards omitted, but let anyone seriously consider the ethical value of a creed which could solemnly regard every child born into the world as the property of the Devil!

Sighing for more worlds to conquer, the Rev. A. J. Waldron, the irrepressible Vicar of Brixton, has taken to the pleasant pastime of writing "puffs" for a patent medicine, which is advertised as being useful for men, women, and children. In the olden days the clergy advocated prayer, now it appears they pin their faith to patent prescriptions. Which number of the "Jelloids" does the Vicar of Brixton take—one, two, or three?

The Daily Mail has been using bold headlines to describe an apple, which is believed to be the largest on record. It weighs 2 lb. 2 oz., and measures 1 ft. 6 in. round, and is over 5 in. high. The Mail would have needed red ink to do justice to the apple that caused all the trouble in Eden.

A few poor Jesuites have died lately. Here are some of them. Rev. Joseph Hargrove, of Royston, Herts, left £7,592. Ven. Edward Barber left £5,745. Rev. Edmond Fisher, of Graveley Rectory, Cambridge, left £19,406. Rev. W. Thomas Penfold-Dixon, of Eastbourne, left £49,886. "Leave all, and follow me," said Jesus. They did it.

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

President's Honorarium Fund, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £208 4s. 0d. Received since:—H. Good, 6s.; J. H. Sanders, 4s.; A. T. H., 5s.; B. Siger, 3s.; Arthur Feltrup, £5; Concordia, £1.

T. H. Elston.—No, it was not Harnack but Haeckel. We shall have something to say on the matter next week. Only a puppy would offer insolence to so great a man.

R. H. Yeldham.—Darwin has been defended by his son, so there is no more to be said.

B. Eiger.—Thanks for wishes.

Concordia.—A beautiful name.

F. Rossith.—Glad you were so interested in the "Priestley" article.

A. B. Moss.—Sorry to hear that Mr. Heaford is progressing so slowly.

H. George Farmer.—Thanks. Shall appear next week.

E. B.—Your cuttings are always welcome.

W. P. Ball.—Much obliged for cuttings.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

The National Secular Society's office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

Lecture Notices must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Queen's (Minor) Hall has been taken for next Sunday evening (October 11) for a lecture by Mr. G. W. Foote. Details are not ready as we go to press. They will appear next week.

Mr. George Macdonald, editor of the New York Truth-seeker, in an excellent article on the war, says it is natural to blame the mad-headed Kaiser for all the bloodshed. "But," he says, "Editor Foote, of the Freethinker, in a few pithy sentences, places the responsibility where it belongs." Some forty lines from our pen are then reproduced. We are glad that our American comrade endorses our diagnosis.

The Monk and the Woman.

A Public Address by M. M. Mangasarian to the Free Religious Association (Rationalist), Chicago.

One of the most popular plays of the present season is the dramatisation of Robert Hichens' The Garden of Allah. It is the story of a monk, a woman, and the desert. I am under the impression that the author of the book is a Catholic, though I may be in error. But the talented lady, Madam de Navarro, or Mary Anderson, the name by which she has become better known, who helped in the staging of the play, is surely one.

The play has drawn phenomenal audiences, of which a very large percentage, I am told, were Catholics. If I am not misinformed, even priests attended the performances, which, I believe, is not a frequent occurrence. On the whole the play has given great satisfaction to the members of the Catholic Church, although some of its minor details they have criticised freely. When I went to see the performance my main object was to learn what it was that attracted the multitude. Was it the scenery? The Orientalism of the spectacle? Or was it the strangeness of a monk making love to a woman—in public?

The theme of the play is the same as that which we find in Thias. A certain Father Antoine has taken an eternal vow of silence—we can form an idea of the man from the nature of his vow—and has shut himself up within the four walls of a Trappist Monastery. Father Antoine has forsworn marriage as well as speech. It is well-known that in the Orient some people make eunuchs of themselves. These are neither men nor women. They are an artificial race. In one of the texts of scripture, Jesus recommends to his followers the example of the eunuch. On the other hand, Victor Hugo, in a powerful passage, not only expresses his disagreement with the Oriental Christ on this matter, but he condemns also the Catholic Church for making celibates of its priests. The difference between a monk and a eunuch is this: the eunuch is a man whose body has been damned, that he may not marry; the monk is a man whose soul will be damned if he marries. But the monk in Robert Hichens' story is willing to risk the damnation for a woman. He therefore leaves his prison-house, discards his garb, casts aside his vow, and becomes a man. After a brief acquaintance, he proposes to the woman of his choice, is accepted, and together they pitch their tent in the African desert.

Of course, the woman does not know that her husband was at one time a monk. Had she known of this fact, judging by her subsequent conduct, she would have married a less holy man. But she had seen nothing about her husband to lead her to suspect that he was less or more than an average human being. As long as she remains ignorant of his secret they are both quite happy. Happiness is so exquisite and so rare a thing that it makes even the desert beautiful. Happiness should always be encouraged, even if it be that of a married monk. But why did Father Antoine select the desert for his honeymoon? I wonder if it ever entered the mind of the author of the story that the desert was the first love of the monk? Did he not renounce the world when he first became a monk? Was not his monastery isolated from the rest of the world, a sort of wilderness? Is not a monk barren, celibate, childless, a desert? By taking his wife to the desert, the monk, unconsciously perhaps, was trying to compromise. He had left the cloister for the world; but the world was too real, too practical, too large for him—and so he compromised on the desert.

In the midst of their blissful existence a visitor at their camp recognises the monk, calls him by his name, and threatens to divulge the secret of his life to his young wife. This raises a crisis in the life of the monk. If the monk ever needed the help of his religion it was then. Instead of saying to his meddlesome guest that he had nothing to be ashamed or afraid of, that in marrying the woman of his choice he had only proved himself to be greater than all the traditions of ancient times, he whips out a revolver and threatens to kill his accuser. But the wife compels the secret from the lips of her husband, and then follows a scene which I suppose both the author and the dramatiser consider as the strongest in the play, but which was very disappointing to me. Had she just learned that her husband had been a murderer instead of a monk, I do not think she could have been more shocked or alarmed. She shrieks and becomes hysterical when it dawns upon her that the father of her baby soon to arrive was at one time a consecrated man. Well, if I thought that this silly female in the story represented woman in general I would not want to speak to another woman. But what a magnificent opportunity she let slip through her hands! When her husband, white with fear, and bitten by remorse, lay writhing at her feet like a trampled worm, she should have placed her hand upon his brow and bid him arise to his feet, and then opening her arms she should have said to him, "Come to me, nothing shall separate us. The heaven of the gods is not attractive enough, nor their hell fearful enough, to tear us apart." That would have been a woman.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

The Evolution of Flowers.

THE mutual adaptations of flowers to insects and of insects to flowers are almost, if not quite, as wonderful as those marvellous instances of Symbiotic union described in an earlier essay. These mutual accommodations have been developed as a result of the habit which so many insects display in visiting the blossoms of plants in search of their pollen. In fine, these compound phenomena suffice to explain the manner in which the floral adornments of the botanical kingdom have been brought into being.

In pre-Darwinian days the colors, the beauties, and the perfumes of flowers were looked upon either as the gifts of God to his chosen creatures or as the prodigal products of great Nature's boundless exuberance. But modern science is not satisfied with such facile explanations, and therefore replaces the imaginative theories of previous generations with a doctrine that is based on countless observations and experiments. Nor does the beauty of the blossom fail to awaken an æsthetic emotion in the breast of the instructed student of science; rather one may claim that the marvels unfolded by recent botanical inquiries add to the loveliness of the sweet-scented flowers of the garden and the wild.

That bees and butterflies sipped the nectar of blooms, and that bees stored pollen in their hives, were facts familiar to the peoples of antiquity. It is also true that among early Eastern races the fertilisation of the date-palm was artificially aided by "cutting off the male inflorescences just before the stamens ripened, and suspending them among those of the female tree; so avoiding the risks of ordinary wind fertilisation." But beyond this, little attention was paid to the story of floral life which modern science was destined to disclose.

As the eighteenth century neared its end, a thoughtful and observant naturalist, C. K. Sprengel, published his views to the world. He announced the discovery that very many flowers were specially adapted to attract the attention of insects. But he was before his time, and his views passed unnoticed for more than fifty years. Sprengel was dominated by the Design theory, and he sought from this standpoint to elucidate the facts he had brought to light. In the language of a leading contemporary biologist:

> "He recognised that the hairs which cover the lower surface of the petals of the wood-cranesbill (Geranium sylvaticum) protect the nectar of the flower from being diluted by rain, and he drew the conclusion, correct enough, though far from our modern ideas as regards the directly efficient cause, that the nectar was there for the insects."

Sprengel likewise noted the fact that the corolla of the forget-me-not is provided with a yellow circle at the opening of the corolla-tube, and he regarded this as a guide to the insects in quest of the honey which is stored in the base of the tube.

It has since been demonstrated that such "honey-guides" are to be found in nearly all blossoms entered by insects, and also that they are usually of a color quite distinct from the main coloration of the flower. Seeing that these honey-guides served the purpose of directing the insects to the nectar lying in their vicinity, Sprengel shrewdly surmised that the gaily colored blossoms answered the purpose of attracting the insects to the flowers themselves, and thus secured the presence of the creatures that were to be conducted to the sweet treasures within by the more specialised honey-guides. He also ascertained that certain flowers are incapable of self-fertilisation, and that the visits of insects were essential to that cross-fertilisation, apart from which, as we now know, such flowers are unable to set their seeds.

Another German botanist, Gärtner, made further advances along the path prepared by Sprengel; but the problem was not completely solved until the Englishman, Darwin, applied his master mind to the subject. The author of the Origin of Species realised in terms of innumerable observations and experiments that as a rule self-fertilisation is distinctly unfavorable to plants; that seeds so produced are few in number, and that the plants that arise from them, are poor in quality. When, on the other hand, the pollen, or male element, of one plant is carried to the female organs of another, the results are highly advantageous. In numerous species, as Sprengel had discovered, self-fertilisation leads to utter sterility. This Darwin demonstrated to be true, and he also showed that very few plants are as fertile when pollinated from their own stamens as with those of different plants of the same species, and that occasional cross-fertilisation was imperatively demanded by all flowering plants if they were to retain their normal vigor of life and growth.

The value of the visits of insects is now obvious, as these animals, in wandering from flower to flower, carry out the important function of dusting their wings or bodies with pollen, which they transfer from one plant to another, thus effecting that form of fructification which is so necessary to the health and strength of the plant race. Any floral variation which served to promote the visits of the insects helped also to secure the production of a greater abundance of seeds. One therefore understands why such an endless array of contrivances evolved for the sole purpose of attracting insects to flowers have blossomed into being, and why the scentless and inconspicuous blooms of the earlier plant world have been transformed into the wealth of richly colored inflorescences which have gladdened the earth in more recent periods of its history.

Not all the Phanerogams—the higher flowering plants—are dependent upon insect activity for purposes of sound and serviceable seed production. With the grasses, the hop, the catkin-bearing plants such as the willow and the hazel, the wind carries the pollen through the air from one plant to another. But in the immense majority of phanerogams, particularly those that bear colored flowers, insect fertilisation is indispensable. Moreover, the diversity of floral structure evolved for this purpose is well-nigh incredible. Some flowers expose their nectar to every visitor, and all insect honey-lovers are welcomed to the feast. Others there are among which the nectar is less open to view, but of which a cosmopolitan assembly of short-mouthed insects may easily partake. The magnolias are members of this floral group, and are sometimes dubbed "beetle flowers," as they are great favorites with the sweet-toothed Longicorn beetles. Some blooms are specially adapted to the visits of bees, which appear essential to their cross-pollination. The writer has watched the balsam blooms for several seasons, and has never seen any insect save the bee succeed in reaching the honey. In various flowers the honey-holding nectary lies some distance down, and can only be reached by the relatively long proboscis of the bee. And the structural arrangements of the blossoms are such that the insect cannot obtain the sugary sap without at the same time cross-pollinating the plant. In the meadow-sage the male organs lie concealed in the helmet-shaped part of the flower, but they bend down as soon as a bee alights on the lower lip of the blossom, and scatter their pollen over its body. Should the bee now fly to a more mature flower in which the female parts are ripe for fertilisation, the feminine structure "stands just in front of the entrance to the flower, so that the bee must rub off part of the pollen covering its back on to the stigma, and fertilisation is thus effected."

Various are the flowers which have evolved adaptations that are specially devised for the reception of a strictly select circle of visitors, while other floral adaptations bar the entrance to all insect-callers who are outside the recognised set.

Still more striking are those botanical organisms which have made themselves specially attractive to the fertilising activities of flies. The hairy arum of the Mediterranean is an extreme example of this. This flower smells like putrid meat; blow-flies crowd in, and they are imprisoned until they have fertilised the inflorescence. Many perish, and there seems small doubt that this plant not only utilises the services of the flies for fertilisation, but also to some extent absorbs the juices of their bodies. In our common birth-wort, as also in the cuckoo-pint, or lords and ladies, the phenomena are somewhat similar. These strange flowers display long corolla-tubes which lead to an extensive base, which contains both the male and female organs of the plants. The narrow entrance to the base of the birth-wort is thickly beset with rigid hairs, which all point downwards. Small flies quickly gather round the appetising odor of the blossom, and eagerly make their way to the promised feast, but when once arrived at their destination they find themselves entrapped. All efforts to escape are frustrated by the very bristles that facilitated their entry. But no sooner is the fertilisation of the flower effected than the bristles begin to wither, and the flies, having now served the procreative purposes of the plant, are permitted to regain their liberty. Many other fly-flower devices might be mentioned, but all have the same object in view—the transference of the pollen to the stigma, in order to ensure the perpetuation of the vegetable species.

Digitized by Google

Plant-forms very nearly related have evolved the most dissimilar methods for procreative purposes. The flower of the common Daphne "is adapted to the visits of butterflies, bees, and hover-flies, while its nearest relative (Daphne striata) has a somewhat longer and narrower corolla-tube, so that only butterflies can feast upon it." This is but one instance out of many in which blossoms are restricted to the visits of butterflies; and specialisation has proceeded much further than this, for some flowers favor the visits of daylight-loving butterflies, while others encourage those that appear only in the gloaming and the night. Flowers fertilised by nocturnal insects are usually white or primrose in color; they are consequently quite conspicuous in the half-light of a summer night; they send forth a fragrant smell after sunset, but remain quite closed throughout the day. This is the case with the beautiful evening primrose, whose twilight fragrance is so delicately sweet. The fine blossom of the bindweed is sometimes completely shrouded until day declines, and, although it is destitute of scent, it unfolds a pale glory as it courts the visits of the hawkmoth under the evening stars.

It was reserved to the orchids to reveal the most wondrous adaptations of the plant domain. The patient labors of Darwin in this one floral group are recorded for all time in his classic on their contrivances to effect cross-fertilisation, and to that work the interested reader may turn for a detailed description of their fascinating phenomena. We may sum up the first part of this article on the genesis and development of flowers by stating that the only conceivable explanation of the facts set forth is to be found in those numerous natural agencies which necessitate organic evolution. Of these, a main factor has undoubtedly been that of Natural Selection, and this truth is nowhere more abundantly illustrated than in the modifications to which the organs of insects have been subjected to secure the cross-pollination of plants. As we shall see, these insect transformations have proceeded pari passu with the adaptations which plant inflorescences themselves have undergone, and to these coincident phenomena the second part of our essay will be devoted.

T. F. PALMER.

(To be concluded.)

Primitive Marriage.—II.

(BY THE LATE J. M. WHEELER)

(Continued from p. 621.)

IN ancient Persia, sisters and brothers married, and even mothers and sons, such unions being required by religion for the production of persons eligible to certain offices. The ancient Greeks permitted all relations save parents and children to marry with one another. Thus, the six sons of Æolus are married to his six daughters; Iphidamus and Diomed to their maternal aunts; and Alcinous to his neice. In the ancient Hindu epic, the Mahabharata, the five Pandava princes, are all husbands of the one princess Draupadi. The Nairs of Malabar have communities of wives and husbands in common, and, the wisest fathers, not knowing their own children, leave their property to their sisters' children. The heirship of nephews is common in Africa, and in America among the aborigines of Labrador, and also among the Hurons and Iroquois. When these tribes have been asked to explain this custom, they have always replied that there could be no doubt of the relationship of the sister's children, whereas that on the father's side might be questioned. This seems to dispose of the suggestion that kinship through mothers may have arisen from a belief that the woman was mainly concerned in procreation, the bodily relation being so evidently stronger.

In Southern India various tribes allow all the brothers, as they grow up, to become the husbands of the eldest brother's wife, and conversely, the younger sisters of the wife become the wives of this conjugal community. According to Cæsar ("De bello Gallico," v. 14), the early Britons had the same habit. Of our Scandinavian ancestors it is stated in the Heimskringla Saga that Niord took his own sister in marriage, "for that was allowed by" the Vanaland law. Traces of Polyandry remained in the time of Tacitus among the Germans. Polyandry—that is the marriage of one woman to several men—and consanguineous marriage still prevail among the nations connecting Asiatics and Americans, Eskimo, Aleuts, Koniaks, etc. Among the Ostiaks no degree of relationship is an impediment to marriage; and though the son will not marry his mother, the father often takes his daughter to wife, and the brother his own sister. It was so with the aboriginal Californians. Community of wives is limited to brothers and other relatives in Thibet. Polyandry, although very rare among animals, seems to have prevailed among all races of men among whom women were scarce, either through migrations or, a more potent cause, female infanticide.

An early prohibition seems to have been the custom, forbidding marriage to a half-sister having the same mother, though not to one having the same father. This implies how much less the male parenthood was thought of. Marriage between half-brothers and sisters seems almost the ordinary rule among ancient peoples. It is known to have prevailed among Canaanites, Assyrians, Persians, the ancient Greeks and Egyptians. Among the Jews (despite the late prohibition in Leviticus xviii. 9) the evidence is clear. It was practised among the patriarchs, Abraham himself having married Sarah, "the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother" (Gen. xx. 12). Nahor married his brother's daughter. Jacob had two sisters to wife at once. Moses' father, Amram, married his father's sister. The Levitical law was evidently unknown to pious King David, for when Ammon wished to force his half-sister Tamar, she urged him to speak to the king, "for he will not withhold me from thee" (2 Sam. xiii. 13). Brothers who are sons of the same mother are especially distinguished (Deut. xiii. 6 Judges viii. 19).

A survival of consanguine marriage is found in Deut. xxv., where it is expressly ordered that when a brother's widow is left childless "her husband's brother shall go in unto her and take her to him to wife"; and in the event of his refusing to do so, he has to have his shoe loosed and his face spat upon. Of the antiquity of this usage we have evidence in Gen. xxxviii. When Er, Judah's firstborn, died, the father commanded his second son, "Go in unto thy brother's wife, and marry her, and raise up seed to thy brother." The second son refusing, the thing which he did displeased the Lord, wherefore he slew him. Judah now putting Tamar off from taking his next son, she disguised herself and made her father-in-law do his son's duty; he acknowledging "she hath been more righteous than I." The custom is also referred to in the story of Ruth. Ewald amends Ruth iv. 5: "Thou must buy also Ruth the Moabitess." The Bible reader will remember that the disgusting story of the patriarch Lot and his daughter is related without the slightest token of disapproval.

Digitized by Google

Casting off a shoe, it may be said, constituted the foregoing a right; thus the relatives of a bride still "throw slippers." The Arabs have preserved the ceremony intact. A proverb among them, when a young man forgoes his prescriptive right to marry his first cousin, is, "She was my slipper, I have cast her off" (Burckhardt, Bedouins and Wahabys, i., 113). Among the Caribs of Venezuela and in Equatorial West Africa, the eldest son inherits all the wives of his deceased father, with the sole exception of his own mother. Schweinfurth relates that the same custom obtains in Central Africa. On the Gold Coast the throne is occupied by the prince, who gains possession of the paternal harem before his other brothers. Thus Absolom took David's harem in the sight of all Israel before the old man had gone to glory, as a proof he wished his reign to be considered over; and when Adonijah asks his brother Solomon for Abishag, the comforter of David's old age, the wise Solomon kills him, as thus betraying designs on the throne. In the custom that widows passed to the heir with other property, and hence that marriage with the widow grew to be a sign of a claim to the deceased person's possessions, we have a reasonable explanation of what must otherwise appear irrational crime. The custom of inheriting widows is adverted to in the Koran, and Benchawi, in his commentary, gives the whole ceremony, which consists in the deceased's relative throwing his cloak over the widow and saying, "I claim her."

Among Hindus, the Code of Manu orders that on failure of direct issue "the brother shall with due rites take the wife." The law is repeated to meet the case of those who die before consummation of marriage, in which event the duty of "raising up seed" to the deceased devolves upon his brother. We learn, moreover, from the Mahabharata, that among the Kshatriyas, or warrior tribes, two forms of marriage prevailed. One was simply a union without ceremony, the other a forcible abduction of the women of a conquered enemy. The Kshatriyas were polygamists, and followed the custom of a man taking the wife of his deceased brother for the purpose of raising up sons to him.

Probably men's sexual instincts were originally uncontrolled save by physical necessity. The one law was that the weak had to give place to the strong.

> "The good old plan
> That he should take who has the power
> And he should keep who can."

The necessity of providing for offspring in their tender years would lead to the establishment of usages giving some permanence to unions. Marriage, and with marriage Law, arose because it was an advantage in the struggle for existence. The descendants of parents who held together and formed an incipient tribe would be able to "hold their own" against those who had no such bond of adherence. Habits of warfare and consequent woman-capture would lead to the restriction of incestuous unions. We need not resort to the theory of L. H. Morgan, that man early learnt the evils of interbreeding, for that can scarcely be said to be sufficiently determined by modern physiological science. The observation of Sir Henry Maine is, however, worth attention, that if the advantage given by exogamous marriage (marriage outside certain limits) be now a slight one, owing to facilities of artificial cure, it might be of great advantage to primitive mankind, to whom, before all things, a good natural constitution was a necessity. If close interbreeding is detrimental, the stern process of natural selection would force it into notice, or at any rate give an advantage to those who acquired habits of exogamy. Nor need we, I think, conclude with Lang that exogamy is "connected with some early superstition or idea of which we have lost the touch, and which we can no longer explain" (Custom and Myth, page 258; 1884). Love of contrast, as well as of conquest, would lead to habits of wife-capture, which would be further necessitated by the scarcity of women consequent upon female infanticide, migration, and wife-stealing by other tribes. The policy of Moses towards the Midianites of slaying the men and reserving the young women was universal in ancient and savage warfare. Lang finds it > "difficult to conceive that the frequent habit of stealing women should indispose men to marry the native women they had at hand. That this indisposition should grow into a positive law, and the infringement of the law be regarded as a capital offence, seems still more inconceivable."

Lang appears to overlook the great influence of sexual jealousy which must operate powerfully where wives are taken from a narrow home-circle, and which would soon institute rules for the prevention of feuds. The acquisition of a mate from abroad would prevent jealousy at home; the stealing of a wife would be the best title to possess one. A man who is denied a mate until he has proved his courage by capturing one, satisfies his want and achieves a reputation at the same time. We may see how such a law would grow up in the fact that among many tribes the chiefs consider themselves exempt from the limitations imposed upon others. In Siam, the seventh degree of blood affinity is the limit within which marriage is prohibited, with the important exception that the king may marry his own sister, as among the Yncas of Peru, the Lagide dynasty, etc., and even his own daughter (Sir John Bowring, Siam, vol. i., p. 185). Of course, the danger of disturbing the succession is the cause of such arrangements being allowed; yet when we remember that the king is descended from, and inherits the privileges of, the patriarch or house chief, we may see in his exemption a survival of earlier usage.

Amongst most races, both exogamy and endogamy prevail—that is, there is both an inner and outer limit to marriage; thus princes by custom must marry within the blood royal, but must not, without a dispensation, marry within the ecclesiastical Table of Prohibited Degrees. Even among very low races, endogamy and exogamy co-existed, as among Comanches, New Zealanders, and Californians. In India, a Hindu must neither marry out of caste nor marry a wife whose clan name is the same as his own: a prohibition which bars marriage among relatives in the male line indefinitely. This shows the prohibition must have come in force when kinship was so little understood that it could best be denoted by the family name. Similarly in China, a man may not marry a woman of his own surname, so that relationship by the male side, however distant, is a barrier; while on the female side it is no barrier, however close. This prohibition is undoubtedly very ancient, for the Chinese trace it to the time of Fou-hi, 2207 B.C. Fou-hi is related to have divided the people into one hundred clans, and prohibited any of them intermarrying. Previously to his time, descent has been traced through mothers only, and this, as we have previously seen, we have reason to believe has been everywhere the rule. A recent observer, Mr. Jamieson (China Review, vol. x., No. 2), has, however, noticed that the Chinese are also endogamous. "Externally they are endogamous—they refuse marriage with any surrounding tribe; internally they are exogamous—they refuse marriage with anyone whose surname shows him to be of the same stock." The pride of race, which is probably the chief cause of endogamy, seem to be later than the rules of exogamy, and laws prohibiting marriage with the mother's kin seem to be earlier than those prohibiting marriage on the male side. I have already noticed the custom of marrying half-sisters on the father's side, which prevailed amongst most ancient nations.

Digitized by Google

The nature of the prohibition in ancient nations and savage races shows that kinship was understood in a different way from our modern system. The limit was everywhere the family name, a limit which excludes many kinsfolk and includes many who are not kinsfolk at all. In Australia especially, and in America, India, and Africa to a slighter extent, that definition of kindred by the family name included serpents, alligators, kangaroos, birds, fish, plants, vegetables, and what not. Natives of Australia call these objects their kin, "of one flesh" with them. Is it not then possible, as McLennan suggests, "that the prejudice against marrying women of the same group may have been established before the facts of blood-relationship had made any deep impression on the human mind": consequently earlier than the patriarchal stage? Savages know the persons they may not marry by their totem, or by tattoo-marks. If a savage sees a maid with the same tattoo-mark, or crest, as his own, he knows he must not touch her. If it is, however, different, he makes her his own without scruple, the law of exogamy indeed compelling him to seek abroad for wives.

(To be concluded.)

National Secular Society.

Report of Monthly Executive Meeting held on Sept. 24.

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, occupied the chair. There were also present: Messrs. Barry, Cohen, Cowell, Cunningham, Davidson, Judge, Lazarnick, Neate, Quinton, Roger, Rosetti, Samuels, Silverstein, Thurlow, Miss Kough and Miss Stanley.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed. The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were received for the Edmonton Branch and the Parent Society.

The Secretary received instructions re propaganda at Leeds.

The President reported the serious illness of Mr. W. Heaford, and the following resolution was carried unanimously:—

> "This Executive learns with much regret of Mr. Heaford's illness, and trusts to hear of his speedy and complete return to health and to activity in the cause to which he has so long devoted himself."

The issue of a cheap pamphlet dealing with the war from the Freethought standpoint, suggested at the last meeting, was again discussed, and the President inquired whether the Executive wished him to write a pamphlet germane to the present aspect. The answer being unanimously "Yes," he consented to do so, and also gave permission for a recent editorial in the Freethinker to be reprinted as a leaflet.

After a general discussion, the following resolution was moved:—

> "That this Executive, without presuming to judge in particular cases, protests in the strongest way against the gross violation of the rules of the Hague Convention which is going on in the present war, and calls upon all civilised nations to demand that those rules shall be respected."

The Secretary reported the receipt of a grant from the Secular Society, Ltd., of £10 to the National Secular Society.

The Secretary received instructions to arrange for the Annual Dinner to be held at Frascati's Restaurant. Other matters of business were transacted.

E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

Correspondence.

"DEMOCRACY AND WAR."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Your correspondent, Mr. A. J. Marriott, raises an important question in connection with the war. With his permission, and in the hope that I do not trespass on forbidden ground, I would like to bring to his notice a book entitled National Guilds, by A. P. Orage, published by Bell and Sons, 5s. net. It can be obtained at most libraries. My only reason for this suggestion is a personal one, and it is this: I find that the economics of National Guilds are the only kind to harmoniously blend with the ethics of Freethought. I am in agreement with your correspondent's views, and, furthermore, I firmly hold that a return to craft and industrial guilds would incorporate Norman Angelism and give status to democracy and, consequently, its children. After status, all things would be possible—even the prevention of international warfare.

Christopher Gay.

Maps.

I traversed Christian Europe's page,
Each bloody advance, each red retreat;
Lemburg, Sabatz, Soissons, Liege—
I pondered—then turned back the sheet.
China spread vast, antiquely sage;
Strange truth! On Heathen field and hill (Thought I) brood Peace and Wisdom still.

E. L. Brink.

The Trade of Piety.

"In the name of the prophet, figs!"—such is the cry
That echoes through an eastern city's streets;
And that it helps their sale who will deny
That knows how pompous words man's reason cheats
Piety is the badge your Mawworm bears
While offering his goods to simple folk;
And every dealer in religious wares
Uses his faith his selfish ends to cloak.
A compact with his God the saint doth make,
And for the trials which he undergoes
Bargains the joys of heaven he shall partake
And look down thence upon the sinners' woes:
The crown, the coronet, the judges' wigs,
"In the name of hocus-pocus, figs, figs, figs!"

B. D.

WANTED TO KNOW ABOUT ANGELS.

"Auntie, did the angels carry Charlie Jones's mother up to heaven?"

"Why, I think so, dear. Mrs. Jones was a good woman."

"She was an awfully fat woman. The angels must be strong."

Passengers in the train from Watford turned to look at the six-year-old boy who was bent on getting information. He was a manly little fellow, with a bright, pretty face that showed intelligence beyond his years. His young aunt seemed to be anxious to stop the flow of questions, but he was bound to know something more about angels then and there.

"How do you know there are angels, auntie?"

"Because we read about them. Wait until you can read and then you will know more about them."

"But why—why don't we see the angels? Did you ever see an angel?"

"Hum! Don't talk so loud, Charlie. Of course we don't see them, but we see their pictures. Don't you remember the angels in that pretty book that Uncle John sent you?"

"Yes, but—where do the angels get their pictures taken, auntie? Is there a gallery where they take pictures of angels—only just of angels?"

"Perhaps so. I don't know."

"Then why don't the angels put on more clothes when they have their pictures taken?"

"Oh, Charlie! Please be quiet! You will make auntie's head ache."

Charlie meditated in silence for a few minutes, and remarked:—

"I don't know why Mr. Brown said you were his ——"

"Euston!" shouted a porter, and as the train came to a standstill, the small boy got a shaking and a whispered warning that stopped all further talk about angels.

The Pastor: "Miss Ethel, you should be engaged in some missionary work." Miss Ethel: "Oh, I am, and have been for some time past." The Pastor: "I'm so gratified to hear you say so. In what field are you engaged?" Miss Ethel (proudly): "I'm teaching my parrot not to swear."

A recently ordained clergyman of the Church of England went into a tobacconist's and said: "Give me an ounce of 'bacey; I shan't get any in heaven." He may find plenty of smoke in another quarter.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

OUTDOOR.

KINGSLAND BRANCH N. S. S. (corner of Ridley-road): 11.30, Mr. Drake, "The Meaning of Evolution."

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Parliament Hill): 3.30, a Lecture. Regent's Park (near the Fountain): 3.30, a Lecture.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, W. Davidson, a Lecture.

COUNTRY

INDOOR.

GLASGOW BRANCH N. S. S. (Good Templars' Hall, 122 Ingram-street): 12 noon, Branch Meeting.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, eneral Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Miss E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6½ ins. by 8½ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR,
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	...	$3.00
Two new subscribers	...	5.00
One subscription two years in advance	...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LETTERS OF A CHINAMAN ON THE MISCHIEF OF MISSIONARIES. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

PAIN AND PROVIDENCE. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 13 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d. (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 13 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 13 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 41 SUNDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

The destroyers of the old are the creators of the new.
—R. G. INGERSOLL.

The Lord of Hosts.

THE Christian Deity is the Lord of Hosts. He is also a man of war. He taught David's hands and fingers to fight. He planned those awful campaigns of the Jews against the original inhabitants of Palestine. He ordered the indiscriminate slaughter of captives, in which neither age nor sex was spared. He also ordered the massacre of the males and the married women, in some cases, and the retention of the virgins by Jewish soldiers and priests. On one occasion the Lord's share of the lust-devoted maidens was thirty-two. It is not to be supposed, however, that they passed into his harem. Of course, they were appropriated by his clerical representatives. These gentlemen stayed at home while the fighting was on, and prayed for victory, and when it was won they took their share of the spoil, whether it was gold and silver, or sheep and cattle, or "pretty virginities."

The Old Testament reeks with blood. Jehovah was quite the Jack the Ripper of antiquity. No wonder that the first great Christian bishop of the Goths would not translate into their speech the worst part of the wars of the Jews. He was afraid of heightening the blood-thirstiness of his people. But no such scruple damped the translating zeal of others, and every Christian nation now reads in its own tongue the foul story of Jewish barbarity, and the fouler story of all that wickedness being commanded by God.

This "blessed book" may almost be regarded as the murderer's manual. Yet it is put into the hands of boys and girls without the least reservation. Nay, it is forced into their hands, in spite of the protests of those who wish them to become conversant with a loftier morality than that of bandits and cutthroats. Is it surprising, then, that Christian nations are so ready to draw the sword? They are the greatest disturbers of the world's peace. They have carried the art of slaughter to the highest degree of perfection. They appear to feel that, if the Lord loves a cheerful giver, he has even more love for a cheerful fighter. They consecrate their battle-flags, they ask God to bless their arms, they beg his favor when they proceed to bloodshed. At such times they forget all about the sweet maxims of peace and goodwill which they make such a boast of in the intervals of their quarreling.

Whenever did Christianity prevent any nation from going to war if it felt disposed to do so? Directly the war-fever rages a considerable number of the clergy fan it, and most of the rest confine themselves to talking cheaply about attending to justice and mercy when the fighting is ended. Very few of them stand up and champion the cause of peace. They know how they get their livings, and they want to stand in well with their countrymen.

One of the strongest arguments against the existence of God is that he never interferes on behalf of progress. When man is bent on playing the beast, his deity gives him free play. He even allows his worshipers to pray to him for success in murder, without telling them that they ought to be ashamed of themselves. Any decent God would tell them, when they put the matter to him pointedly, that they are fools and wretches for trying to kill each other, and worse fools and wretches for asking him to bless them in their criminal madness.

Suppose half-a-dozen boys came to their father and told him that they were going to divide into two parties and fight each other to a finish. Suppose they said that one or two of them might get killed. Suppose they asked him to supervise the engagement. What would that father say? "Wait a minute, boys," he would say, "while I get that big whip. When I come back you will all want tough breeches."

It is about time we dropped that old deity who is "strong and mighty in battle." The world has had enough of him, or rather too much of him. He is really an old savage idol, painted and decked to look like Jove. Give him a chance, and he shows his blood. Off goes the modern raiment, and the naked savage is on the warpath. There is blood and lust and destruction. And when the orgy is over the old fellow puts on his cast-off clothes, and sits with a fine, bland smile, to receive the adoration of his devotees.

A change of gods would be better than nothing. But the best thing would be to have no God at all. Whatever deity men worship only echoes their own passions. He is an Edison machine, speaking back what is first spoken into it. He never says anything new or original. He informs us of what we know, and never tells us of anything fresh. He corroborates our opinions, flatters our emotions, and pats our characters on the back. He is never ahead of us. And why? Because we make him. We are not his creatures—he is our creature. And those who worship him, we repeat, are worshiping an idol. Far better would it be if we framed our ideal consciously and deliberately. It would then be always up to date, and somewhat beyond. It would be the essence of our best thoughts, our deepest principles, our noblest aspirations. Communing with that ideal, bringing ourselves to its test, even looking at it from time to time, would do us more good, and raise us higher in the scale of being, than could ever be done by bowing to the personification of the lower conceptions of our forefathers. They made their God; let us make ours, if we must have a God; or let us dismiss all gods, and worship, if need be, in the Temple of Humanity. It is simply farcical at the present moment for whole nations to be asking the same God for the same victory.

Meanwhile, let all Freethinkers wage war against the Christian superstition. Whatever good it may have done when it reflected the current ideas, it has long outlived its usefulness. It is no longer anything but a hindrance. It is powerless to help forward the real progress of the world. It is one of the many causes of discord and division. It leaves men and women at the mercy of a faulty, inherited ideal; and, by saving them the trouble of thinking and the responsibility of forming just judgments, it is ever drawing them back to the dark past instead of urging them forward to a brighter future.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

"At It Again."

IN the Freethinker for September 20 I called attention to the mixture of piety and jingoism which the editor of John Bull had served up for the benefit or entertainment of his readers. Coming from such a quarter, the piety was more remarkable than the jingoism. It was so completely gratuitous. It was not necessary to bolster up the English case against Germany. That was strong enough without it, and it is always a mistake to saddle a strong case with doubtful elements. It was not needed to encourage the fighting spirit of the nation. That is strong enough of itself; and whether God gives us another chance or not—as Mr. Bottomley would say—it is fairly certain that the British people mean to see this thing through, and will beat Germany, at any cost, if that is at all possible. From all points of view the piety was unnecessary, and one can only conclude that as piety and militarism are both primitive and relatively uncivilised sentiments, both hang together, and a strengthening of one leads to a strengthening of the other.

In the issue of John Bull for October 8, Mr. Bottomley returns to the subject with what is really an apology for his pietistic outburst. "Piety," he says, "is not in our line." With this I quite agree, and hinted as much in my previous article. Only when a man is clear-headed enough to recognise what is not in his line, it is a pity that he does not keep off it. Professional pietists cut a sufficiently silly figure when they apply their Godism to current affairs, and where a professional fails an amateur is not likely to succeed. Mr. Bottomley further says he will not be deterred even though the Freethinker and other journals (I have not observed any other journal beside the Freethinker dwelling upon this point) tell him he is "running the Kaiser close in working the pious lay." This may be magnificent but it is not sense. No one is quite exempt from blundering, and although it may look courageous it really is not so. There is more courage in confessing a fault than there is in persisting in one. It is really wiser to confess one's faults and have done with it.

In passing, let me also express a regret that Mr. Bottomley sees fit to join in the now fashionable game of pouring abuse upon Nietzsche. Most of those who are engaged in this task have not read Nietzsche, and the few who have do not understand him, or fail to realise that Nietzsche himself had a whole-souled contempt for the modern German. They have certainly quite failed to grasp Nietzsche's gospel of superman. To write that Nietzsche aimed at setting up a "monstrous beastly idol of brute force and pitiless rapine," is to quite misunderstand his aim; or to say that the "crazy brain of its author.....rotted in its own filth.....in a Prussian madhouse," is to venture criticism in a field which I hardly think Mr. Bottomley is qualified to express an authoritative opinion. The great Vico died insane, so did Schumann, so did Swift, so did others that one might name. Tasso, Schopenhauer, Comte, Rousseau, Heine, Leopardi, Poe, Dostoieffsky, Newton, Southey, Cowper, all were undoubtedly neurotics. No one, however, attempts to belittle the genius or to set aside the work of these men on that account. One cannot argue that abuse of a genius, who is at the same time a neurotic, means degeneration; but it does seem to evidence want of judgment.

Mr. Bottomley denies that he has "got religion," but "at the risk of being further misunderstood," he affirms his faith, "firm and immovable" in "God's decree and providence." Not, he points out, in "the personal, puny God of orthodox creeds, but the infinite Deity of the Universe—the unknown, unknowable, incomprehensible, beginning and end of everything—the Godhead Infinite, Boundless, and Everlasting." Certainly there is nothing "puny" about this God, but why call it "unorthodox"? It is really a very orthodox kind of Deity. If Mr. Bottomley will read the Athanasian creed he will find that, so far as his Godhead is concerned, it is a fair modern summary of it, for that also says, "the Father incomprehensible, the Son incomprehensible, and the Holy Ghost incomprehensible," to which one may add, and Mr. Bottomley incomprehensible. There is a still further likeness, for Mr. Bottomley says that "the man who in these days could use the name of God, and all that it connotes, in any spirit other than one of reverence and awe, is deliberately calling down upon his head the wrath of Heaven and the abhorrence of mankind." Which again reminds one of the Athanasian Creed with its "whosoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the Catholic Faith. Which Faith, except everyone do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly." So, unless we treat Mr. Bottomley's god with "reverence and awe" we shall call down upon ourselves "the wrath of Heaven and the abhorrence of mankind." To a beginner, the threat is no doubt terrifying. As, however, I have been running the risk for twenty-five years, I am afraid that I am case-hardened. At any rate, I am unmoved. God does nothing; and mankind can get on fairly well without him. It is, however, interesting to observe how difficult it is for a man, once he gets mixed up with gods, to avoid "cussing" those who disagree with him.

Like theologians in general, Mr. Bottomley having commenced by positing an unknown, unknowable, incomprehensible deity, proceeds to explain him. Really, if one believes in an unknown and unknowable something or other, the only sensible plan is not to know anything about it—not even that there is anything to know about. But Mr. Bottomley's God is so far known—to him—that he is aware of what are his plans. And those plans are that Britain is to lead the world with other nations—summed up as the Latin race—as helpers. Mr. Bottomley knows, also, that "He is directing the bloody battle of the nations now raging, which must end in accordance with a destiny written on the skies for all mankind to read." There it is! British, French, Germans, Russians, Belgians, Servians, Austrians, are all so many pawns in the game. It is God who is directing the battle. "He" inspired the Germans to go to war, "He," inspired the Allies to resist." "He" inspired it all, and our praise of the Allies is so much wasted breath. God is using us to wreak vengeance on the Germans; it is, says Mr. Bottomley, "His will to employ human instruments, and so he is using us to punish the Germans—whom he has previously made what they are, so that they might be punished." This must be so, or God would not be "the beginning and end of everything," certainly he would not be Mr. Bottomley's God, who is "directing our lives, and the lives of Peoples and all the Worlds, in the infinite, the fleeting Present, and the eternal Future." It would seem as though there were inevitable conflict between logic and a display of capital letters.

It would also seem, in spite of all that has been said, that Mr. Bottomley is not free from a sense of uneasiness that he has been talking rather too familiarly of God's plans about this, that, and the other, for he explains that when he invokes the name of God:—

> "With us it signifies the X of the universe—the originating, vitalising, restoring, ruling Force, whence flow all Life and Destiny. If, in orthodox fashion, mankind clothe it with the form of man, that is because they are men, and, in the depths of their conceit can think of nothing nobler. For ourselves we dare not give it form.....We will recognise that our poor head is not up to the task of grasping the problem and will shelter ourselves in God. And if we speak of 'Him' and 'He' it is simply because that is the only way in which we can express our conception of the highest embodiment of Being."

Now Mr. Bottomley is, as the children say, "getting warm." He is on the track of truth, but he doesn't seem to follow it up. Man does endow universal force, or forces, with human attributes—not by way of a compliment to the universe, or by way of expressing idealistic yearnings after a higher life, but wholly because to human ignorance the forces of the world seemed alive. Gods improve with the advance of civilisation simply because man himself improves, and he does not care to worship anyone worse than himself. But the "highest embodiment" is not God, but man. Man is actually the highest being we know. He is even the highest being we can think of. For when we talk of higher beings than man, all we really think about are beings higher than the men we know—that is, more perfect men. Even Mr. Bottomley's God is not higher than man; he is not better than man. He is only a superior kind of man. He acts as Mr. Bottomley's ideal man would. And therefore, quite naturally, he selects Britain for the leadership of the world.

Digitized by Google

Seriously, Mr. Bottomley would be well advised to leave the gods severely alone. Blather about God on the one side is no better and no wiser than blather about God on the other side. Where all, and if all, are carrying out God's will, what is the use of one section claiming superiority on that account? If I may venture to quote a German—Goethe—"If God is what he is, the world is what he would have it be." If there is a God, we are all part of the "plan." And a God who can arrange such a plan is really too contemptible to bother about. The Czar calls on God, and is sure of his favor. King Albert of Belgium also invokes God, and is certain he will respond. The Emperor of Germany is quite sure God is leading his armies—through him. King George is equally ready to call on God, and is just as convinced that he is in the good graces of Deity. They are all at it; and now Mr. Bottomley joins the chorus—not as one calling upon God for help, but as one who merely explains what are God's plans. Of all the crew, Servia alone seems to let God alone. She seems able to look after herself.

War is a business that is bad enough, and black enough, and withal stupid enough, without its being made still more objectionable by quite gratuitous nonsense. To rail at the Kaiser for having "blasphemously invoked the God of Battles," while at the same time using the same invocation, is pietistic cant of the worst description. And it is sheer playing to the cant of the moment to write that the contest is between "the ethic of the Galilean and the bestialities of Pagan culture." What we are seeing is a struggle of brute force, pure and simple, in which each side deludes itself with useless talk about "ideals." We are convinced that our objects are pure and unselfish; our opponents are also convinced that they are fighting in defence of a high ideal. The sensible observer is apt to reflect that there never has been a war in which exactly the same jargon has not been in force. What we are witnessing is not the contest between the ethic of the Galilean and Pagan culture; we are witnessing the consummation of international contests in land-grabbing in all parts of the globe, and of a wild competition in armaments—on the one side to retain territory already "acquired," on the other to grab territory now held by other nations. And this by nations which have been saturated in "the ethic of the Galilean," nations that have for centuries been narcotised by the belief in God, in order that they might be at the mercy of the cupidity of man. If there is a lesson to be drawn from a Europe blinded with ideals of military greatness and brain-bemused with religion, it is that the less we have to do with the gods the better. By himself man is certain to blunder enough and to be savage enough. But with the gods added he becomes infinitely worse. For they, in a civilised community, are little more than the embodiment of man's past errors and barbarities.

C. COHEN.

Vain Delusions.

THE British Congregationalist for October 1 is worthy of all commendation because, in its leading article, entitled "The Evolution of Barbarism," it disowns and refutes the belief cherished by so many leading divines in this country that Nietzsche and his philosophy must be held largely responsible for the war. We are delighted to transcribe the following sensible passage:—

> "Anyone who knows Nietzsche, knows also that he was unmerciful in his satire of much that the German philosophers of to-day and the Prussian element in Germany hold dear; that he abused and poked fun at the stupidity and egoism of his own countrymen in no unsparing fashion. He most assuredly has not been a favorite writer with the Kaiser, though doubtless the latter has studied him. He has been repudiated lock, stock, and barrel by the professors who have, during the last few years, written in support and have taught the Gospel of German development at the cost of honor, weaker neighbors, and civilisation generally."

Mr. Robert Blatchford evidently knows neither Nietzsche nor his philosophy. In his otherwise admirable article in the Weekly Dispatch for September 27, he says that "Germany has been inoculated with the virus of Nietzsche's cult of the blonde beasts." Then Mr. Blatchford adds, with an air of infallibility: "Nietzsche, an insane genius, taught that the State was founded by a race of blonde beasts." Now, if our friend had read and pondered Beyond Good and Evil, particularly the eighth chapter, entitled "Peoples and Countries"; Ecce Homo, which abounds in scathing denunciations of the German people; and Human, All-Too-Human, especially Part II., he could not possibly have written that sentence, because it contradicts in the most positive manner the teaching of Nietzsche, who never lost an opportunity to express his abhorrence of "State supremacy," "atavistic attacks of patriotism and soil-attachment," and the persistent disregard of the dictates of reason. He had a great admiration for France. In Beyond Good and Evil (p. 213) he tells us that "even at present France is still the seat of the most intellectual and refined culture in Europe, and is still the high school of taste." A few pages farther on occurs this remarkable sentence:—

> "There is also still in France a pre-understanding and ready welcome for those rarer and rarely gratified men, who are too comprehensive to find satisfaction in any kind of fatherlandism, and know how to love the South when in the North and the North when in the South—the born Midlanders, the genuine 'good Europeans.'"

Does that look like the product of an "insane genius"? Not having studied Nietzscheism himself, but relying upon extracts published in the Times, without their context, Mr. Blatchford possesses no qualification to sit in judgment on the Nietzschean philosophy. And how shockingly unjust it is to call Nietzsche an "insane genius," his insanity occurring only after his published books were finished. Mr. Blatchford's chronology even is quite wrong when he says that "Nietzsche was followed by Professor Treitschke." Nothing of the kind. It was Nietzsche that followed Treitschke. Before the former was known at all the latter was zealously preaching Pan-Germanism in Berlin, having derived his politics from Prussian contemporaries; and, as we have affirmed more than once, Treitschke was not an advocate of a new religion for Germany. He was so enthusiastic a Lutheran that he was convinced that the whole of Germany would eventually adopt Lutheranism.

All this has, of course, a direct bearing upon the barbarous war that now floods Europe with human blood. Mr. Kingscote Greenland, writing in the Christian Commonwealth for September 30, asserts that "the governing idea is that Germany must now wrestle, not as in Luther's day against Rome, but now against Christianity." But most assuredly that is not the governing idea at this moment. There are most vigorous opponents of Christianity in Germany, it is true; but it is false to say that they are the raison d'être of the present war. Treitschke was a Christian, and so are Bernhardi and the Kaiser. Now, in direct opposition to practically all Christian preachers in Great Britain, we venture to declare, without the slightest fear of any intelligent objection, that war is perfectly consistent with Christianity, whether in its Catholic or Protestant form. Let us recall an interesting illustration. Henry V., King of England at the beginning of the fifteenth century, was an exceptionally pious man, whose piety manifested itself in the persecution of the Lollards. Their books were confiscated and their persons burnt. Henry was an excellent divine:—

Digitized by Google

"Hear him but reason in divinity,
And, all-admiring, with an inward wish,
You would desire the king were made a prelate."

But this pious king, despite the Galic law, aspired to the throne of France, though, because of his piety, he at first doubted whether he ought to go to war for it. Who were the chief instigators of a fight with France? Not mere politicians, but the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Ely. Listen to his Grace, as Shakespeare interprets him for all time. He is addressing the king:—

"Gracious lord,
Stand for your own; unwind your bloody flag;
Look back unto your mighty ancestors;
Go, my dread lord, to your great grandsire's tomb,
From whom you claim; invoke his warlike spirit,
And your great uncle's, Edward the Black Prince,
Who on the French ground play'd a tragedy,
Making defeat on the full power of France,
While his most mighty father on a hill
Stood smiling to behold his lion's whelp
Forage in blood of French nobility."

So spake that eminent servant of the Prince of Peace. The Earl of Westmoreland reminded his majesty that—

"Never King of England,
Had nobles richer and more loyal subjects,
Whose hearts have left their bodies here in England,
And lie pavilioned in the fields of France."

Hearing that the Archbishop waxed extremely bold, and with swelling pride exclaimed:—

"O let their bodies follow, my dear liege,
With blood and sword and fire to win your right;
In aid whereof we of the spirituality
Will raise your highness such a mighty sum
As never did the clergy at one time
Bring in to any of your ancestors."

The Bishop of Ely endorsed every word spoken by his Grace of Canterbury, with the result that Henry went over to France with an army. It is not necessary to tell the story of that bloody conflict on the fields of France nearly five hundred years ago, our only claim being that that war was entered upon at the direct instigation of the Christian Church. Henry's great consolation, before the battle of Agincourt, was the knowledge that all England was praying for his success. Having spent a long time in fervid prayer himself, he addressed his men thus: "Now is good time, for all England prayeth for us, and, therefore, be of good cheer."

When we say that Christianity has failed, our meaning is that it has never done anything for the world's highest good. Buddhism has always been an enemy of war, and when in power abstained from bloodshed. Christianity, on the contrary, has had more experience in persecution and war than in any other form of activity. The sword has been at once its greatest friend, and humanity's worst foe. "Oh," some people object, "it is not Christianity that is responsible for these stupendous evils, but the lack of it, Christianity having never been tried yet." That is an old objection, and as worthless as it is old. It is a familiar adage that scarcely any two Christians agree as to what Christianity is; but it is an absolute certainty that nobody knows what that Christianity is which has never yet been tried. Professor David Smith confesses that, sometimes, when he considers what has been said and done in its name, the wonder with him is that Christianity has survived, and in its survival under such circumstances he discovers an evidence of its Divine origin; but we maintain that what has been said and done in its name has been said and done under its spell. We do not believe that the Kaiser is a hypocrite, and he solemnly declares, in unmistakable terms, that he is at war to establish the kingdom of God on earth; but what we contend is that the Christianity professed by him and his countrymen is precisely the same as the one professed by King George and many of his subjects, and that it can be made to support any form of government under the sun. Dr. Smith asserts that Christianity is eternal and invincible; but where on earth is it if its absence is responsible for the war? If a God of love sitteth as king for ever, how are we to account for the fact that hate is supreme in Christendom? It can only be accounted for on the assumption that the God of love and the Savior of the world are nothing but myths. We frankly admit that, as a human system, Christianity has been a tremendous success. It has set mankind at variance with one another with a vengeance. But, as an infallible remedy for the world's maladies, it has been a colossal failure. Its doctrine of Divine love redeeming the human race is the veriest dream ever heard of.

J. T. LLOYD.

A Battlefield Book.

"To bear all naked truths,
And to envisage circumstance, all calm;
That is the top of sovereignty." —KEATS.

TIMES of war and stress are usually supposed to be fatal to philosophic calm, and it is curious that the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, the great book animated by high purpose and fortitude, should have been largely written at odd moments in a tent on the battlefield. Indeed, many of the maxims in the Meditations were jotted down in the actual theatre of the present war—as, for instance, at Carnuntum, on the Danube, a few miles from Vienna.

Monarchs have rarely been philosophers. Frederick the Great delighted in the society of Freethinkers, and attracted the best brains of Europe to his court. The Empress Catharine of Russia befriended Denis Diderot, and Marguerite, Queen of Valois, to her eternal credit, held out her hand to the "intellectuals" of her day, at a time when to avow heterodox opinions was a matter of life and death. Once only, however, has a philosopher sat on the world's throne and realised the dream of Plato, who sighed for the fulfilment of his ideal of a philosopher-king.

Marcus Aurelius, the Roman Emperor, was no feather-bed soldier, nor did he review his troops solely within the safe purlieus of the parade-ground. His philosophy was thought out amid the storm and stress of actual battle and the elation of real victory. What others learnt in calm, he learnt in tempest. The most perfect expression of "the gospel of those who do not believe in the supernatural" was produced to the dread monotone of war. Far away on the wide Roman marshes might be heard the endless, ceaseless sound of beating horses' hoofs and marching feet of men. The barbarians were gathering in multitudes, and no man could say what the morrow would bring forth.

The Emperor died in the camp. "Why weep for me?" were his last words, characteristic of the noblest Roman of them all. His legacy to posterity was his book of Meditations, which was never intended for publication, and in which he recorded his reflections on life and death. Burdened with the weight of Empire and of Rome, he penned such words as these—not to be read at the distance of twenty centuries without an accession of strength: "Every moment think steadily as a Roman and a man to do what thou hast in hand with perfect and simple dignity." And again, "Do every action of thy life as if it were thy last."

This life, he tells us, is all that concerns us:—

"Though you were destined to live three thousand or, if you please, thirty thousand years, yet remember that no man can lose any other life than that which he lives now, and neither is he possessed of any other than that which he loses."

Epicurus bade his followers depart from life as a satisfied guest from a banquet. Marcus Aurelius, in sterner language, bids us leave life's stage as an actor who has performed his part. It is the same view of things which has caused the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius to become one of the most prized of books. It is this wise Secularism which takes tired people back to Marcus Aurelius when all other religions and philosophies have failed them. What a book might be written of the great men who came to the Meditations in the bad moments, when fame and fortune and honor itself seemed unreal. For, by the irony of fate, this austere wearer of the imperial purple has become the great consoler of men. His golden book of the Meditations is one of the most precious heritages handed down the centuries by the masters of the world.

Digitized by Google

Oh! the charm of Marcus Aurelius. He was more than a mere writer, for he bound men by something stronger than a chain of roses, the thrill of the dance, or the sparkle of Falernian wine. It is not his grace of language that causes men to read his book to-day. It is not merely his philosophy that causes men to turn to him from all other wisdom. It was not to Lucretius, with his world-grip of human destiny, or Virgil, with his tears of mortal fortune, or Horace, who sings so well of banquets, the laughter of women, the joy of summer days, but to the austere soldier-emperor, that men turned in the last resort to which they are pushed so often "with close-lipped patience for their only friend."

The waters of thought slip silently away, and it is not a little amazing to realise that the ideas of this Roman Emperor should still have sufficient vitality to fire the hearts and brains of men and women of our own generation. It is a splendid achievement—power over millions of all ages, races, and sympathies. Small wonder that Renan, a writer of nice distinction, has spoken of the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius in terms of more unmixed eulogy than he has ever bestowed elsewhere.

The Meditations, be it remembered, were never intended for publication. They are simply the Emperor's commonplace book, where he entered his reflections, often quite unconnected, on life and death, and the questions that knock at every man's heart. The little volume was considered for long a literary curiosity. It fitly headed the very brief list of the writings of kings, a class not in any way remarkable for literary genius. Critics talk of the Greeks as being the teachers of Marcus Aurelius. It is true; but the golden book of the Meditations could only have been written by a Roman. The strength, the tenderness, the humanity, the resignation, these are the gifts of the lords of human things, the masters of the world.

Matthew Arnold pointed out that the Meditations are counsels of perfection. But they do not claim to be other than self-communings. The maxims should be read, as they were written, one at a time. Aurelius addressed them, not to any reader, but to himself, as the sentinels and supports of a conduct of life. The present moment is one in which such advice is priceless, for in all the world's literature there is no other book so full of perfect sanity. It is because the Meditations are a bracing tonic in a time of moral slackness that the book ranks among the assets of our day. The pomp of Rome has long faded "like snow upon the desert's face"; but the great Emperor's words of wisdom remain a most precious legacy, because he saw life steadily and saw it whole.

MIMNERMUS.

Credibility of the Old Testament Scriptures

WHAT memorials remain to give us light into the originals of nations and the history of those ages we commonly call the first ages? The Bible, it will be said—that is, the historical part of it in the Old Testament. But even these divine books must be reputed insufficient to the very purpose by every candid and impartial man who considers either their authority as histories or the matter they contain. For what are they, and how came they to us? At the time when Alexander carried his arms into Asia, a people of Syria, till then unknown, became known to the Greeks. This people had been slaves to the Egyptians, Assyrians, Medes, and Persians, as these several empires prevailed; ten parts in twelve of them had been transplanted by ancient conquerors, and melted down and lost in the east, several ages before the establishment of the empire that Alexander destroyed; the other two parts had been carried captive to Babylon a little before the same era. The captivity was not indeed perpetual, like the other; but it lasted so long, and such circumstances, whatever they were, accompanied it, that the captives forgot their country, and even their language—the Hebrew dialect at least, and character—and a few of them only could be wrought upon, by the zeal of some particular men, to return home when the indulgence of the Persian monarchs gave them leave to rebuild their city and to repeople their ancient patrimony. Even this remnant of the nation did not continue long entire. Another great transmigration followed, and the Jews that settled under the protection of the Ptolemys forgot their language in Egypt, as the forefathers of these Jews had forgot theirs in Chaldea. More attached, however, to their religion in Egypt (for reasons easy to be deduced from the new institutions that prevailed after the captivity among them) than their ancestors had been in Chaldea, a version of their sacred writings was made into Greek at Alexandria, not long after the canons of these scriptures had been finished at Jerusalem; for many years could not intervene between the death of Simon the Just, by whom this canon was finished (if he died during the reign of Ptolemy Soter), and the beginning of this famous translation under Ptolemy Philadelphus. The Hellenist Jews reported as many marvellous things to authorise, and even to sanctify, this translation as the other Jews had reported about Esdras, who began, and Simon the Just who finished, the canon of their scriptures. These holy romances slid into tradition, and tradition became history; the Fathers of our Christian Church did not disdain to employ them. St. Jerome, for instance, laughed at the story of the seventy-two elders, whose translations were found to be, upon comparison, word for word the same, though made separately, and by men who had no communication with one another. But the same St. Jerome, in the same place, quotes Aristeas, one of the guard of Ptolemy Philadelphus, as a real personage.

The account pretended to be written by this Aristeas of all that passed relating to the transaction was enough for his purpose. This he retained, and he rejected only the more improbable circumstances which had been added to the tale, and which laid it open to most suspicion. In this he showed great prudence and better judgment than that zealous but weak apologist Justin, who believed the whole story himself, and endeavored to impose it on mankind.....

Thus, when we consider these books barely as histories, delivered to us on the faith of a superstitious people, among whom the custom and art of pious lying prevailed remarkably, we may be allowed to doubt whether greater credit is to be given to what they tell us concerning the original, compiled in their own country, and as it were, out of the sight of the rest of the world, than we know, with such a certainty as no scholar presumes to deny, that we ought to give to what they tell us concerning the copy.....

Apion, an Egyptian, a man of much erudition, appeared in the world some centuries afterwards. He wrote, among other antiquities, those of his own country; and as he was obliged to speak very often of the Jews, he spoke of them in a manner neither much to their honor nor to that of their histories.....

The Jewish history never obtained any credit in the world till Christianity was established. The foundations of this system being laid partly in these histories and in the prophecies joined to them or inserted in them, Christianity has reflected back upon them an authority which they had not before, and this authority has prevailed wherever Christianity has spread. Both Jews and Christians hold the same books in great veneration, while each condemns the other for not understanding or for abusing them.....

These scriptures (the Old Testament scriptures) are come down to us broken and confused, full of additions, interpolations, and transpositions, made we neither know when nor by whom, and such, in short, as never appeared on the face of any other book on whose authority men have agreed to rely.....I will venture to say that I do not assume so much as is assumed in every hypothesis that affixes the divine seal of inspiration to the whole canon; that rests the whole proof on Jewish veracity; and that pretends to account particularly and positively for the descent of these ancient writings in their present state.

It is strange, but it is true; not only the Jews differ from the Christians, but Jews and Christians both differ among themselves, concerning almost every point that is necessary to be certainly known and agreed upon in order to establish the authority of books which both have received already as authentic and sacred. So that whoever takes the pains to read what learned men have writ on this subject, will find they leave the matter as doubtful as they took it up.

Digitized by Google

The creation of the first man is described by some as if, pre-Adamites, they had assisted at it. They talk of his beauty as if they had seen him, of his gigantic size as if they had measured him, and of his prodigious knowledge as if they had conversed with him. They point out the very spot where Eve laid her head the first time he enjoyed her. They have minutes of the whole conversation between the mother of mankind, who damned her children before she bore them, and the serpent. Some are positive that Cain quarrelled with Abel about a point of doctrine, and others affirm that the dispute arose about a girl. A great deal of such stuff may be easily collected about Enoch, about Noah, and about the sons of Noah; but I waive any farther mention of such impertinences as Bonzes or Talapoins would almost blush to relate.....

No scholar will dare to deny, that false history, as well as sham miracles, has been employed to propagate Christianity.

Sure I am that experience, from the first promulgation of Christianity to this hour, shows abundantly with how much ease and success the most opposite, the most extravagant, nay, the most impious opinions, and the most contradictory faiths, may be founded on the same text and plausibly defended by the same authority.—Lord Bolingbroke, "On the Study of History."

Acid Drops

A few weeks ago we referred to a patriotic "round robin" signed by Professor Haeckel and other eminent Germans in science, literature, art, and philosophy, denouncing England, and her hatred and jealousy of Germany, as the cause of the present terrible war. A portion of the "round robin" was published in the Times, and Professor Haeckel was certainly amongst the signatories. We have been asked whether Haeckel was not a misprint for Harnack. Our reply is "Certainly not." It will be remembered that we offered a few words of criticism pointing out that the "round robin" in question overlooked all the diplomatic proceedings and correspondence leading up to the war, including Germany's attack on France and the violation of the neutrality of Belgium. We added that Mr. M. M. Mangasarian, who was then in London, had written to Professor Haeckel, asking if this document represented his ideas of the situation.

In spite of the fact that a long list of distinguished Britishers replied, as it were, to the German professors with a sort of "you're another" round-robin, it occurs to a contemporary of ours that the quarrel would be incomplete without his word on the bold, bad Haeckel. There was a time when the firm to which our contemporary belongs almost lived on the publication of English editions of Haeckel's works, but that day is a good deal past, and an opportunity presents itself of illustrating La Rochefaucauld's definition of "gratitude." This is what we read:—

> "All Rationalists in this country warmly repel Professor Haeckel's violent and wholly unwarranted attack upon England.....But in consideration of the great services which he has rendered to the cause of Freethought, our personal view is that no action should be taken in the matter until the equilibrium of Europe is once more re-established."

Since Æsop's frog was there ever such a case of personal distention. But that will go down. Haeckel's size is natural.

The distention calls for surgical treatment in another way when the same writer refers to "our good friend, Mr. Eden Phillpotts." We don't know how Mr. Phillpotts takes this, but we know how his admirers must. There is a puff, too, of Mr. Blatchford's famous pamphlet as "the nearest approach to correct prophecy in the whole annals of literature"—when Mr. Blatchford distinctly states that he was not a prophet at all, that he published nothing original, but merely put into popular English for a popular audience what the military and naval experts had been saying for years.

"Vanoc" of the Referee is good enough to admit that "England is worth fighting for." Thank you, "Vanoc," thank you! We say that as an Englishman. You are also good enough to add that your eulogy is "in spite of hooliganism, atheism, class hatred, shams," etc. Thanks again, "Vanoc,"—this time as an Atheist. We should have been very sorry to gain your praise.

History used to be a fairly frequent accomplishment amongst educated people. We believe it must be very much rarer now. A poet in the Times (rather a rare thing) the other day coupled Cæsar and Attila. Gods! What a desecration! Cæsar was one of the greatest of men—Attila merely one of the bloodiest. It will not surprise our readers to learn that the poet in question was pious; there was nothing of the infidel about him.

The smug and super-hypocritical Protestantism of this country is not to have it all its own way in attributing German militarism to Materialism and Atheism. The Catholic Times crops up with the theory that the German atrocities are really due to Protestantism. Its argument is that Protestantism makes for the breakdown of religious authority, and so opens the way for all kinds of evils. It says that the German Catholics will be horrified when they realise the horrors committed. As though Catholics had not a hand in perpetrating these horrors! We may remind the Catholic Times that Catholic soldiery in times of war have shown themselves among the most brutal in the history of the world. Witness the "Wars of Religion" during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries.

The "unco guid" are shocked at the pious callousness of the Kaiser's troops, yet the spirit in which Samuel "hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord" is the spirit in which Louvain and Termonde were made ruins. Christians are like the Bourbons, "they learn nothing and forget nothing."

The leader-writers attribute the Kaiser's downfall to his devotion to the "Bismarckian gospel of blood and iron." They might also add the Christian gospel of blood and fire.

"The only ideal of the German Emperor is an ideal of iconoclasm," says the pious Daily Mail. Yet the Kaiser ever has the name of "God" upon his lips, and the belts of his soldiers bear a pious inscription.

No one with the least spark of sympathy in their nature can feel anything but horror at the devastation—whether deliberate or accidental—of Belgium and certain parts of France. But we are quite at a loss to see why it should be called "Anti-Christian" or "Unchristian." Christian wars have always been accompanied by similar scenes, and often worse scenes than even the present war has furnished. It is, indeed, a truism that the more religious the war the more brutal and unrelenting the slaughter. In these wars in which religion has played a large part, the area over which the present war is now raging, has been more than once involved. Here is a sample, taken from Motley, describing the taking of St. Quentin in the sixteenth century:—

> "To a horrible carnage succeeded a sack and a conflagration still more horrible.....The women.....were stripped almost entirely naked, lest they should conceal treasure which belonged to their conquerors, and they were slashed in the face with knives, partly in sport, partly as a punishment for not giving up property which was not in their possession. The soldiers even cut off the arms of many of these wretched women, and then turned them loose, maimed and naked, into the blazing streets.....The streets were already strewn with the corpses of the butchered garrison and citizens; while the survivors were now burned in their houses. Human heads, limbs, and trunks were mingled among the bricks and rafters of the houses, which were falling on every side.....The work of killing, plundering, and burning lasted nearly three days and nights. The streets, meanwhile, were encumbered with heaps of corpses, not a single one of which had been buried since the capture of the town. The remains of nearly all the able-bodied male population, dismembered, gnawed by dogs, or blackened by fire, polluted the midsummer air."

From the Crusades to the Balkan War no better guide for a soldiery bent on pillage and murder could be found than a short resumé of all those wars in which Christian feeling has played a prominent part.

President Wilson's invitation to all Christendom to join him in praying to God for peace contains the following passage:—

> "I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do designate Sunday, the 4th day of October next, a day of prayer and supplication, and to request all God-fearing persons to repair on that day to their places of worship to unite their petitions to Almighty God that.....he vouchsafe His children healing peace again and restore once more that concord among men and nations without which there can be neither happiness nor true friendship, nor any wholesome fruit of toil or thought in the world."

This is very nicely put, but surely a man like Dr. Wilson cannot exactly believe all this nonsense. He may believe it as President of the United States; a man in that position has to believe all sorts of things officially; but does he believe it as a scholar and a philosopher? We have our doubts. It must have crossed his mind, if it has done no more, that God's intervention would be more efficacious in preventing war than in stopping it after it has broken out. Holding a horse in check before he starts running away is far easier, and far more sensible, than pulling him up half way down a steep hill.

Digitized by Google

What a magnificent description of his father Hamlet gives in the wonderful closet scene with his mother:—

> "See, what a grace was seated on this brow;
> Hyperion's curls; the front of Jove himself;
> An eye like Mars, to threaten and command;
> A station like the herald Mercury
> New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill;
> A combination and a form indeed,
> Where every god did seem to set his seal,
> To give the world assurance of a man."

The loftiest part of this glorious passage was brought to Mr. Robert Blatchford's memory (see last week's Dispatch) by —well, what does the reader think? Nothing less—and nothing more—than the high heels of a French girl's boots! Was it not Thomas Paine who said there was only one step from the sublime to the ridiculous?

Anyhow, it is as well to quote Shakespeare correctly. Such a passage in such a poet deserves at least that compliment. "Heaven-kissing hill" appeared in the Dispatch as "heaven-kissed hill," which spoils both the meaning and the music. The responsibility for this bad blunder may rest upon the newspaper officials. But it may not rest upon them. It may rest upon Mr. Blatchford—who once confessed (in a passage of arms with the editor of the Freethinker) that he had difficulty in recognising much meaning or music in Shelley. Shelley!

The Daily Chronicle will have to look to Harold Begbie, who aspires to be the poet of "the greatest war that ever was." "By Their Fruits," a "pome" of his in Monday's issue, contained the following stanza—one of five, all about as good—or bad:—

> "Prussian Vulture,
> Scream of culture
> O'er the ashes of Termonde!
> Satyr searches,
> Maids and churches
> Violated, like your bond!

This is not poetry, but it is sailing devilish near the wind. At this rate there will soon be a demand for an illustrated edition of Mr. Harold Begbie's poetry, but his success (in this line) may prove the Chronicle's undoing.

The following story, the Indiaman (September 18), on the authority of the Empire, says is strictly true:—

> "A pious missionary went to a remote village and started bazaar-preaching. The simple villagers, who had never seen a white man, came by the hundred to listen to him; they also found his halting knowledge of the vernacular somewhat amusing. But there were days when he could not go, and the Catechist took his place, and the crowds vanished. Then the good man's wrath was kindled, and he rebuked the poor Native Christian for his lack of zeal in preaching the good tidings. 'How is this, Nogen Babu,' he demanded, 'when I preach there are hundreds present, but when you take my place there is hardly anyone present?' The trembling Catechist replied: 'Sir, have you never seen a bear-dance in our village? When it is a brown bear there is hardly anyone present, but when a white bear dances there are hundreds present.'"

Nogen Babu was no fool.

We cut the following from the Daily Mail (Sept. 29):—

> "A remarkable service was held in Hereford Cathedral yesterday in celebration of the eightieth birthday of the Bishop of Hereford. The service was led by the Rev. A. Duncombe, aged 85; the first lesson was read by Canon Copes, aged 83; the second lesson by Canon Palmer, aged 84; the Epistle by Prebendary Lambert, aged 82; and the Gospel by Prebendary Hanbury, aged 85. Their total ages totalled 419 years. Among the congregation were Mrs. Bather, aged 92; Mrs. Giles, aged 87; Mrs. Littledale Smith, aged 86; and Mrs. Hanbury, aged 84."

What an inordinate time some of these good Christians do keep out of heaven!

A few poor professional Christians culled from the "Wills and Bequests" of recent numbers of the Times: Rev. Henry Danvers Macnamara, the Rectory, Queenhithe, Upper Thames-street, left £5,008; Rev. Charles James Bradshaw, Whitchurch Rectory, Ross, Herefordshire, left £7,060; Rev. James Drew, 2 Brandon-villas, Bristol, left £1,954; Rev. Francis Percy Hutchesson Powell, Union Hall, Co. Cork, left £10,296; Rev. Charles Cusac Halley, West Malling, Kent, left £2,820; Canon Alexander Grimston, Stillingfleet, York, left £5,498; Rev. Robert Williams Thrupp, West Worthing, Sussex, left £49,784. "Blessed be ye poor"—especially Thrupp, the forty thousand pounder!

A number of well-intentioned Christians are still busy discussing whether war is right or wrong, justifiable or unjustifiable, and whether killing an enemy in warfare is "murder" or not? None of them seem to realise that their trouble originates in the utterly impracticable nature of Christian teaching. We emphasise "teaching" because Christian practice has got over the difficulty by ignoring it. To the man of common sense war may be either right or wrong; killing a man may be either justifiable or unjustifiable. There are easily conceivable circumstances in which no one would hesitate to take life; and what is true of the relations between individuals is equally true of the relations between nations. This would be plain enough even to Christians if they were not saddled with an absurd and impracticable mass of teachings. It is perfectly true that love is, ultimately, more powerful than hatred, and is more enduring; but it requires suitable circumstances for operation, and these must sometimes be secured by force.

The absurdity arises when people, not content with justifying a particular war, begin to talk of the "moral uplift" of war, of its "purifying" effects, and of its influence in making both individuals and nations better. This is a very plain absurdity. Whether justifiable or not, all warfare involves a certain amount of de-civilisation. It may be necessary, in self-defence, or in defence of one's home, to kill a man, but it is absurd to argue that one is made better by killing. And it is just as ridiculous to assume that by drilling and arming thousands of men, filling them with lust for blood, and encouraging them to kill those against whom they bear no individual ill-will, that we are purifying them or providing them with a "moral uplift." War may be necessary, and so far justifiable, but the price we pay for it is that of individual and national retrogression. And we fancy that none are so ready to recognise this as thoughtful men who know war from actual experience.

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett makes, in the Daily Telegraph, an interesting—although unintended—comment upon those who imagine that the horrors of the present war will be enough to prevent wars in the future. He says:—

> "The whole thing is becoming too ghastly to be really true. The whole civilised world is becoming so acclimatised to death that the mere news that another 2,000,000 human beings, each armed with a weapon capable of firing ten shots a minute, and supported by every form of infernal death-dealing cannon, are about to exterminate one another, excites but a mild interest. It is accepted as an everyday event, like a football match or a boxing championship. Such is the struggle before Cracow which is now commencing."

Those who argue that the horrors of war will end war are blind to both the teachings of history and the facts of human nature. Gentleness is not born of brutality nor peace of war. The peace that succeeds war is really the lethargy that follows exhaustion, but it does not breed a genuine desire for peace. People may become habituated to horrors as to everything else, and the proof of this is seen in the fact that already, as Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett says, we are accepting the slaughter of thousands as an everyday event, and treating that of hundreds as a trifling affair hardly worth consideration.

The present state of affairs offers a fine opportunity for ill-informed people to publish anything that they dislike. Atheism and Materialism have naturally come in for special attention. Germany is Atheistic and Materialistic; hence all its faults. Others have fallen foul of Mr. Norman Angell, with a very obvious non-understanding of what he teaches. Nietzsche is blackguarded generally—often by ill-informed newspaper scribblers who have not read him, and wouldn't understand him if they did. Even Darwin has not escaped. Some geniuses have discovered that the worship of brute force is a logical application of Darwinism, and that, therefore, Darwin is partly responsible for the ideal which Germany has set before herself.

It is all very silly, and we hardly think it was necessary for Major Leonard Darwin to have gone to the trouble, in the Times, of vindicating his father from any such charge. Darwin taught that the fittest survives, but he was the last one to believe the best kind of fitness is that which is summed up in brute force. Fitness seldom expresses more than mere biological efficiency, and is so far little more than the statement of a truism. To say that an animal survives because it is the fittest, and that it is the fittest because it survives, are practically identical statements. The problem for the moralist is, first, what actually constitutes fitness in a given environment, and, second, what qualities are best, and so ought to acquire the quality of fitness. In other words, how can we make "fitness" and "best" identical? Now, Darwin was the last man in the world to ignore the fact that mere physical fitness as represented in brute strength was involved in human evolution. As human society advances, "fitness" becomes more mental and moral, and, proportionately, less physical. The brute gives place to the man. Those who do not already know Darwin's opinions on the subject should read the third, fourth, and fifth chapters of the Descent of Man—chapters which by themselves are enough to establish Darwin's reputation as a thinker of the first magnitude.

Digitized by Google

Nothing like cheek! The Catholic Times asks:—

> "Is there left enough moral force in Europe to look upon the Government of Europe from the moral point of view? Can the Christian Churches unite, if only in the matter of pursuing and ensuring international peace, repressing armaments, curbing kings, and encouraging the reign of the principles of Christ? Can the Christian Churches so far forget their divisions as to invite the Papacy to become the head of a European Federation charged with the duty of checking ambitions and preserving peace?"

For cool impudence this is almost unbeatable. Fancy anyone seriously suggesting that the only way to inaugurate a better state of things is for all the Churches to unite and invite the Papacy to become the head of a European Federation! As though the Churches ever could unite for such a purpose! And even if they did, it is certain that the last state would be worse than the first. There is plenty of moral force left in Europe, but its healthiest expression is outside all the Churches, and that will always operate to keep any Church from assuming a position of supremacy.

The Christian World says that when the war is ended, it will be important for all the Churches of both Germany and England to be at one in working for the suppression of militarism. We do not see why it is specially important for the Churches to be on hand when the day of settlement arrives, and we do not fancy they will be consulted. In any case, unless the Churches falsify all their past history, they will do very little towards suppressing the curse of militarism. The clergy are generally on hand in every military pageant, when war is in the air they usually do their best to fan the war spirit, and are never slow to furnish justification for any and every war that comes along. Just before the present war broke out German and English clergymen were fraternising and professing unbounded love and admiration for each other, but the war came just the same. German theologians of prominence have issued manifestos denouncing England and justifying Germany, and English theologians have done exactly the same. In these matters, so far as any real good is concerned, the clergy of either country count for very little. They can usually be found dancing to any tune that the passion of the moment or the interest of their church calls for. Find out what is popular and profitable, and one can pretty well guess what the clergy will have to say.

A writer in the Sphere observes:—

> "A large part of every clergyman's salary is paid to him for saying 'Thou shalt not kill,' and 'Turn him the other cheek,' without any consideration of extenuating circumstances whatever. Hence, during war time, if he is also recruiting or beaming on recruiting meetings, he is not earning his money. One may honor him for these military efforts—but one must be permitted to ponder a little, too."

Of course, this writer does not exactly blame clergymen for acting as recruiting agents, but he does make it plain that a clergyman's profession inevitably makes for a certain amount of hypocrisy, and that is certainly clear to anyone who considers their teaching and their practice with an unprejudiced mind.

American papers say that a scientist has discovered a method of bleaching the negro's skin, and under this treatment it will become as milk. The Christian Church claims that it can whitewash the colored man's soul, and this scientist says he can modify his complexion. This happy union of science and religion should enable the American Christian to grasp the African's hand instead of kicking him under the coat-tails as heretofore.

"Ninety-seven per cent. of the admiration that is now felt in this country for the Emperor of Japan is due to the fact that in going to war he did not announce a special partnership with Almighty God!"—New York Herald.

The Yellow Press drops into truth much as Silas Wegg dropped into poetry. Writing of the Kaiser's piety, the Daily Mail says "Nero is never more dangerous that when he mounts the pulpit and tickles our ears with the maxims of a trite morality." It is so very safe to write in that strain of the Kaiser—but are there no others?

The Bible is supposed to circulate without external assistance, and purely on account of its inherent value. The income of the British and Foreign Bible Society last year was £275,447, and there are many other similar organisations financially interested in circulating the scriptures. Yet, in spite of this enormous outlay, backed by "Omnipotence," the Bible is becoming "a back number."

It is reported that the Pope has telegraphed to the Kaiser, "When you destroy the temples of God you provoke the divine ire, before which even the most potent armies lose all power." We should have thought that a God worth bothering about would have been more concerned at the destruction of homes and the loss of human life, but we are, perhaps, mistaken. Much as we admire the artistic merits of the old cathedrals, there seems to us something radically wrong when the world shrieks with horror at their destruction, and accepts as a matter of course the slaughter of many thousands of human beings.

We are glad to see that the Hindoos, the Japanese, and the Senegalese are so generously combining to save European civilisation from smashing up. At present they are aiding Christian Europe by force of arms. But we have no doubt that they will realise the necessity for missionary work of a more peaceful kind once the war is over, and we may expect to see some sort of a league formed in order to instruct the Christian world in the art of civilisation. There are times when each nation is called upon to give of its best, and there is a certain moral responsibility devolving upon the "heathen" which we hope they will realise and effectively discharge.

In spite of the war the missionary societies continue their appeals for funds, and point to the necessity for carrying the Gospel to the heathen. Naturally, the "Heathen" when they see the beneficial results of the Christian Gospel in Europe, will greatly long for a share in the blessings it produces. As the lantern and the cinematograph are now both in use in missionary work, we would suggest that a series of pictures straight from the seat of war would prove an invaluable adjunct to the missionary.

The British and Foreign Bible Society announce that they issue the Scriptures in embossed type for the blind in thirty-five languages. They omit to add that the ordinary editions are suitable to the mentally blind.

"Doubtless many books are bought for no better motive than the sake of appearances," says a writer in T. P.'s Weekly. Including, we presume, dainty editions of the Bible and of the Anglican Prayer-Book.

A number of Salvation Army officers have been attached to the Canadian Army as "chaplains." The non-militant Salvation Army officers will have a chance of seeing real "blood and fire."

Almost the entire English press turned Catholic for half-an-hour in order to write pious nonsense concerning Rheims Cathedral, which was partially destroyed by the Kaiser's holy Huns. To English Protestants, the real value of the building was architectural, and not religious. Had Rheims Cathedral been a jerry-built tabernacle, there would have been no need for jeremiads.

"Old Moore" has published his forecast for 1915, and the prophet promises a quiet year. We hope he is right; but the present state of affairs is enough to wake up the shepherds on the back hills, and to frighten the winkles out of their shells.

"The Japanese have shown," says a contemporary, "that they are masters of the art of waiting." This will be news to the patient Christians, who have been waiting for the second coming of Christ for nearly two thousand years.

It is said that the handsome soldiers of the Czar carry icons into battle, under the belief that they afford protection during the conflicts. Doubtless, they answer prayer as readily as "The Prince of Peace."

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £215 2s. 0d. Received since:—E. Pinder and Friends (Leicester), £1 3s.; C. Heaton, 5s.; F. M. L., 10s.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges:—Bethnal Green Branch, 5s.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings.

E. RICHMOND.—We quite understand.

H. J. H.—You will recognise your initials when you see them. We thought it best not to be more explicit.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always welcome.

W. D. CARVER.—John Bull is, at least, not like the mean part of the press that fears to recognise our existence.

J. M. WOOD.—It is a question of what would interest the bulk of our readers. There are enough of the oily, self-seeking "gospel preacher" species over here. When we run short of them we will borrow illustrations from your part of the world. We would prefer, if you don't mind, to receive news of progress from your locality. Thanks for your good wishes. And recollect that in this old country, with all sorts of conventional claims on the pockets of people who have got anything in them, it is always difficult to raise money for advanced causes.

L. BARKER.—We only see the name of one working-class member on the Prince of Wales's National Relief Fund committee. The upper classes know how to keep the administration of "charity" in their own hands. Their use of the Prince of Wales's name (poor lad!) in this case was a clever dodge for disarming criticism.

B. T. HALL.—We ceased acknowledging the Ramsey Fund for reasons assigned. It is no part of our business to watch and check such lists.

E. RICHMOND.—Of course there are other causes at work. There always are. We cannot find any actual solution of continuity in nature. We make it ourselves—mentally.

E. PINDER.—Thanks for your pleasant and encouraging letter.

A. J. MARRIOTT.—Thanks for the reference, though it is rather late.

G. BROADFIELD.—We go by public facts. If the Kaiser believes all he says about himself and God he is mad—your opinion notwithstanding. And our business is to attack Christianity as we find it in the utterances and actions of conspicuous Christians. Other monarchs are mad, too, in their degree. We are quite impartial.

J. PARTRIDGE.—We fear it cannot be dealt with in that way. They wouldn't let you lecture on the war, and what else (directly or indirectly) would fill the Town Hall at present?

R. NORTH.—We note the misprint of A. F. Orage for A. R. Orage, who is the editor of the New Age, but not the author of National Guilds.

R. TABRUM.—We are very pleased to hear from so old a Freethinker—old in both years and service—and still more so to learn that your health continues satisfactory. We hope that good health will continue. Thanks for your good wishes on our behalf. We are not exactly in need of encouragement, but the sympathy of one's friends is always appreciated.

C. HEATON.—Pleased you derive so much enjoyment from reading the Freethinker.

H. GARTHWAITE.—Very sorry your Obituary notice was received too late for insertion in this week's issue.

OWING to unexpected circumstances we are obliged to hold over a good deal of correspondence until next week's issue.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote's Queen's (Minor) Hall lecture is "off" after all. Just when we thought there was to be fine weather a bolt fell from the blue in the shape of a returned cheque and a refusal to sign the agreement. From the first the Queen's Hall people had stipulated that Mr. Foote should not "refer to the war." This seemed too strict, in the case of an old and tried user of the place, and a remonstrance was made to that effect. To lecture on the war, or about the war, was one thing, and we can quite understand the management objecting to the hall being used for that purpose in the present heated state of the public mind; but to refrain even from referring to the present war, even by way of impartial illustration on another topic, seemed quite too much for human flesh and blood on both sides of the platform. However a viâ media was suggested and seemed likely to be acceptable. Mr. Foote proposed to lecture on President Wilson's neutral invitation to the whole Christian world to pray to God for peace on one and the same day (Oct. 4). But the Queen's Hall people wouldn't have "Praying for Peace" at any price. We don't complain—the Queen's Hall people are justified in looking after their own interests. On the other hand, Mr. Foote cannot expect the public to show a frenzied desire to hear him just now on some old stock subject like the Antiquity of Flatirons. His exclusion from the public platform is therefore likely to continue for some time. Fortunately, the Leicester Secularists have a hall of their own, and Mr. Foote is due to lecture there on November 8.

We are delighted to learn that Mr. W. Heaford is making more rapid recovery than was expected. His doctor hopes to pull him through by Christmas.

We don't exactly see what the Bradlaugh Fellowship has to do with the Ramsey Testimonial, but we are asked to announce that the latter will be presented at a Social Meeting of the former in the Borough of Shoreditch Radical Club, 43 New North-road, N., on Wednesday evening, October 14, at 8.30.

Mr. Palmer's second article on "The Evolution of Flowers" stands over till next week. It cannot be fitted in this week's make-up.

A British soldier, who happens to be utterly unorthodox, was in the trenches under heavy fire on September 14, 17, and 21 (we must not say where), though we would like to know the feelings of an Atheist in that situation. We make the following extracts from his letter:—

> "I have seen men killed on either side of me, also taken part in the burial of numerous dead (English and German). I may not give the name of the action, but I will do so later. Although we all carry name (identification) plates, and a nominal religion, religious rites are not usually performed, and no one seems to care much or be the worse. The behavior of all, as you have often pointed out, varies with temperament, some being more nervous than others. Personally, I've not felt frightened yet. Only regret that I should be taking part in these brutalities. I did not think of them as such in years back, when I enlisted. I am writing this during an evening's shelling of the trenches, and although I have thought over things during the past few days, I still do not feel the need of a God, and do not believe in a future heavenly existence, and find but little to regret in my life."

This correspondent, helping to bury the dead near cross-road crucifixes, says he was struck with the irony of the Prince of Peace smiling down on the victims of war.

Viscount Bryce's fine letter on "Neutral Nations and the War" in Monday's Daily Chronicle reminds us that he was for some years our much-respected Ambassador to the United States, and long before that the author of a classical book on the Holy Roman Empire. It speaks well for the United States that what it asks of us is not a titled simpleton or a purse-proud millionaire, but a man of genius and character, and it is prepared to do its best to return the compliment, which it has generally been able to do—just as able as we have, one thinks. Something good was expected on the war from "Mr." now "Viscount" Bryce, and the hope of his admirers was not disappointed. Here is a noble passage:—

> "It is only vulgar minds that mistake bigness for greatness, for greatness is of the Soul, not of the Body. In the judgment which history will hereafter pass upon the forty centuries of recorded progress towards civilisation that now lie behind us, what are the tests it will apply to determine the true greatness of a people?
>
> "Not population, not territory, not wealth, not military power. Rather will history ask: What examples of lofty character and unselfish devotion to honor and duty has a people given? What has it done to increase the volume of knowledge? What thoughts and what ideals of permanent value and unexhausted fertility has it bequeathed to mankind? What works has it produced in poetry, music, and the other arts to be an unfailing source of enjoyment to posterity?
>
> "The small peoples need not fear the application of such tests.
>
> "The world advances not, as the Bernhardi school suppose, only or even mainly by fighting. It advances mainly by Thinking and by a process of reciprocal teaching and learning, by a continuous and unconscious co-operation of all its strongest and finest minds."

This is better reading, even for working men, than Blatchford's worship of "the little brown rifle."

Digitized by Google

Primitive Marriage.—III.

(BY THE LATE J. M. WHEELER.)

(Concluded from p. 637.)

IT is both interesting and instructive to note the extent to which procuring wives by capture prevailed in ancient times, and among modern races in a low state of civilisation, and survivals of which may be found in the marriage customs of all countries. Abduction is the common theme of ancient story, as in the Ramayana and the Iliad. "Beauty and Booty" were the allied watchwords of the Homeric age. The Bible contains an instance in the twentieth chapter of Judges. The women of the tribe of Benjamin had been destroyed; and as they could not marry Gentiles, and the other tribes would not give wives, the difficulty—which Israel made its own difficulty—was solved by the wholesale slaughter of the inhabitants of Jabez-Gilead, whose population yielded 400 virgins; and next by the men of Benjamin enacting a rape of the Sabines for themselves, each man seizing and carrying off one of the daughters of Shiloh to be his wife, on an occasion when the women met for a festival. These were the days when each man "did what was right in his own eyes." Sir George Grey says of the natives of Australia:—

> "The early life of a young woman at all celebrated for beauty is generally one continuous series of captivity to different masters, of ghastly wounds, of wanderings in strange families, of rapid flights, and of bad treatment from other females among whom she is brought a stranger by her captors."

Abduction is, however, looked on as a kind of homage, and to play at it is the favorite sport of boys and girls.

J. A. Farrer, in his Primitive Manners, contends that the form of capture is mainly a concession to maiden bashfulness among early races. Yet, as I have already indicated, there are but slight indications of this native modesty, which itself has been rather the result of severe repression and punishment for "going astray." He also says that the custom sometimes affords a bride a real chance of escape from a bridegroom she dislikes. I fear, however, that the instance of this found in the Travels of Dr. Clarke (vol. i., p. 483) is almost as unusual as it is interesting. Dr. Clarke says:—

> "The ceremony of marriage among the Kalmucks is performed on horseback. A girl is first mounted, who rides off at full speed. Her lover pursues; if he overtakes her, she becomes his wife, and the marriage is consummated on the spot; after this she returns with him to his tent. But it sometimes happens that the woman does not wish to marry the person by whom she is pursued; in this case, she will not suffer him to overtake her. We were assured that no instance occurs of a Kalmuck girl being thus caught, unless she have a partiality to the pursuer. If she dislikes him, she rides, to use the language of English sportsmen, 'neck or nought,' until she has completely effected her escape, or until her pursuer's horse becomes exhausted, leaving her at liberty to return, and to be afterwards chased by some more favored admirer."

Among the Tunguzes and Kamschatdales a matrimonial engagement is not to be considered definitely concluded until the suitor has overcome his beloved by force, and torn her clothes—the maiden being bound by custom to defend her liberty to the utmost. Also, among the Bedouin Arabs, it is necessary for the bridegroom to force the bride to enter his tent. Burckhardt says:—

> "Among the Sinai Arabs a bride defends herself with stones, and often inflicts wounds on the young men, even though she does not dislike the lover; for, according to custom, the more she struggles, bites, kicks, cries and strikes, the more she is applauded ever after by her own companions."

A similar custom existed among the French, at least in some provinces, as late as the seventeenth century, and some of our own rustic beauties have been known to consider kicking and screaming as almost as indispensable as tears. Among many races it is a point of honor to the bride to resist and struggle, however willing she may be.

Among the Kols of North-east India, in public market, a young man with a party of friends will carry off a girl, struggling and screaming, but no one not interested interferes, and the girl's female friends are apt to applaud the exploit. Among the Eskimo of last century the form of bride-lifting was in use, nor was its serious meaning forgotten, for sometimes a Greenlander, desirous of a second wife, would simply pounce upon an unprotected female, or, with his friends' help, carry off a girl from a dance. The custom of stealing women, especially heiresses, prevailed in Ireland and Scotland down to the seventeenth century, and "is glorified in a whole literature of songs and ballads." (Lecky, History of the Eighteenth Century, vol. ii., p. 366).

Lord Kames, in his Sketches of the History of Man (vol. ii., p. 59), has noticed the curious and significant marriage custom which lingered in Wales even in his own day, perpetuating the memory of ancient violence:—

> "On the morning of the wedding-day the bridegroom, accompanied by his friends on horseback, demands the bride. Her friends, who are likewise on horseback, give a positive refusal, on which a mock scuffle ensues. The bride, mounted behind her nearest kinsman, is carried off, and is pursued by the bridegroom and his friends, with loud shouts. When they have fatigued themselves and their horses, the bridegroom is suffered to overtake his bride. He leads her away in triumph, and the scene is concluded with feasting and festivity."

In the Description of Westmeath, Sir H. Piers, writing in 1682, says of the Irish:—

> "On the days of bringing home, the bridegroom and his friends ride out and meet the bride and her friends at the place of meeting. Being come near each other, the custom was of old to cast a short dart at the company that attended the bride, but at such distance that seldom any hurt ensued. Yet it is not out of the memory of man that the Lord of Howth, on such an occasion, lost an eye."

The idea of capture is, of course, more discoverable among a race like the Tartars, where the bridegroom is pursued with stones and javelins, than among ourselves, where the happy man is only pelted with rice or slippers.

A review of the instances, to which a large number indicating further links of transition might have been added, which may be found in Sir John Lubbock's Origin of Civilisation, and in J. F. McLennan's Studies in Ancient History, induces us to think that abduction in spite of parents was the earlier form, that next came the making of compensation to escape vengeance, and that this grew into the making of presents beforehand and the system of purchase. In Homer we find the capture of wives from opposing tribes, their purchase from those who are friends, and the interchange of marriage presents, which is the germ of matrimonial contracts, and, later, develops into an organised system of dower.

The substitution of purchase for capture points to such an improvement in the condition of life as is implied by the existence of commerce by barter. It seems to have become usual whenever men have passed from the hunting into the pastoral stage. As representing the transition period between capture and purchase, we may take the Kirghaz and Circassian tribes, among whom capture exists generally as a form, but on occasion as a fact; the ceremony of capture being always gone through, and actual compulsion resorted to if the lady's parent should not accept the price offered for her hand. In Afghanistan a man may, by either the rape of a lock of his sweetheart's hair, snatching away her veil, or throwing a sheet over her, declaring at the same time that he claims her as his wife, secure her, provided he can pay the stipulated sum.

Among the Toorkmans, the necessity of paying a high price for a bride leads to frequent elopements. The parents and relatives, however, pursue the lovers, who have made for the nearest camp and become united, and the matter is adjusted by an intermarriage with some female relation of the bridegroom, while he himself becomes bound to pay so many camels and horses as the price of the bride. The young lady, after her Gretna Green union, returns to her parents' home, and passes a year in preparing the carpets and clothes which are necessary for a Toorkman tent, and on the anniversary of her elopement she is finally transferred to the arms and establishment of her lover. We here see a stage of transition from the system of actual abduction to a mere symbolism, of which stage traces remained in Sparta in historic times. In Sparta the young wife was not, immediately after the marriage, domiciled in her husband's house, but cohabited with him for some time clandestinely, till he brought her to his home. Burckhardt tells us of a custom which prevails among the Mezeyne tribe of Arabs in the Sinai peninsula. A girl, after being carried off and wrapped in a cloak, is permitted to escape from her tent and fly into the neighboring mountains. The bridegroom next day goes in search of her, and remains often many days before he finds her, while her female friends are apprised of her hiding-place, and supply her with provisions. If the husband finds her at last (which is sooner or later, according to the impression he has made on the girl's heart), he is bound to consummate the marriage on the spot, and to pass the night with her in the mountains. The next morning the bride goes home to her tent, that she may have some food, but again runs away in the evening, and repeats these flights several times, till she finally returns to her tent. She does not go to live in her husband's tent till far advanced in pregnancy. Unless pregnant, she may not join her husband till after a full year from the wedding day.

Digitized by Google

The transition to the honeymoon trip may be seen among the Soligas (India), where, "when a girl consents to marry, the man runs away with her to some neighboring village, and they live there until the honeymoon is over. They then return home and give a feast to the people of their village" (Buchanan, Journey from Madras, vol. i., p. 178).

In all cases the girl is carried off by the man; but among the Garos of Bengal we find a similar custom, only it is the bridegroom who is abducted. He pretends to be unwilling, and runs away, but is caught by the friends of the bride, and then taken by force, in spite of the resistance and counterfeited grief and lamentation of his parents, to the bride's house. So also among the Ahitas of the Philippine Islands. If her parent will not consent to a love-match, the girl seizes the young man by the hair of his head, carries him off, and declares she has run away with him. In such a case it appears that marriage is held to be valid, whether the parents consent or not.

The obtaining of a wife by purchase indicates, as I have said, a great improvement. For one thing, there is less female infanticide where the daughter is a marketable commodity, and in course of time the flocks, goods, or money which were given as an equivalent for the surrender of paternal rights become a provision for the daughter's own use. Yet in this stage the position of woman is still a very degraded one. Her lord and master can say with Petruchio:—

> "She is my goods, my chattels; she is my house,
> My household stuff, my field, my barn,
> My horse, my ox, my ass, my anything."

The Bedouins think it scandalous to demand the daughter's price, or, rather, polite to keep it in the background. Burckhardt goes so far as to say that the Bedouins are perhaps the only Eastern people who can be entitled lovers. This is incorrect; yet even among them woman is regarded as much inferior to man, and when once married becomes a mere servant. Their position among Christian Slavs is not better. The Albanians consider that as they purchase their wives they have despotic power over them, and that they may not only beat them at pleasure, but dismiss them on paying a fixed sum—ideas which have been known to crop up in Western Europe. In ancient Russia, as part of the marriage ceremony, the father took a new whip, and after striking his daughter gently with it, told her that he did so for the last time, and presented the whip to the bridegroom, to whose tender mercies she then passed.

Among the Mongols marriages are arranged by parents without consulting the parties most concerned; and when all is settled they say, "I have bought for my son the daughter of so and so"; or, "We have sold our daughter to such and such a family."

When the price has been paid the daughter becomes the property of the purchaser, but she remains with her family until the time for performing the marriage ceremonies, which include the "capture" of the bride by the friends of the bridegroom.

In China the woman has no concern in the choice of a husband. When married he is her complete master, and may strike her with impunity, may starve her, sell her, or let her out for a longer or shorter period, as is the common practice in the province of Tche-Kiang. Divorce is almost at the husband's pleasure, being allowed for barrenness, adultery, disobedience to husband or his parents, talkativeness, theft, ill temper, or inveterate infirmities. No wonder the women are devotedly religious, for they hope they may thus become males in their next stage of existence.

In Babylon and Assyria wives were to be purchased by auction, pretty maids fetching high sums, while it is said some ill-looking ones had dowries presented with them. The Thracians bought their wives in the time of Herodotus, and Aristotle asserts it was once customary in Greece. Moses allowed a father to sell his daughters for slaves or concubines, provided the purchaser were an Israelite (Exodus xxi. 7). It is probable that in early times the Hebrew wife had no power of obtaining a legal divorce, as, even at the date of the Talmud, the wife could do no more than compel her husband to give her the letter of separation, which he on his part (according to Deut. xxiv. 1) could use against her at any time. Even in Rome, so clearly, says Gibbon, was woman defined not as a person, but as a thing, that if the original title was deficient, she might be claimed like other moveables, by the use and possession of an entire year. In one of the forms of marriage among the Romans capture survived as a form, and in another, purchase survived as a fact.

In Saxon England marriage by purchase is referred to in the laws of Æthelbirht as though it was the usual custom. The principal ceremony was handfaestnung, or pledging hands, which was done in the presence of the friends of the bridegroom and bride, and then the former received his wife from her father in return for the price which had previously been agreed upon. If a man found, after marriage, that he had been deceived, he was entitled to send back the lady to her parents, and claim a return of the money he had paid for her. The mercantile nature of the transaction was afterwards sought to be concealed by calling the sum paid by the husband fosterlean, as though it were a return for the father's expense in providing food and education of his daughter; and it was expected to be paid at the time of espousal, instead of marriage. In the ninth and tenth centuries a great improvement was made, women of the upper classes acquiring the right to dispose of themselves in marriage. Sir Thomas Smith, however, in his Commonwealth of England, bk. iii., ch. 8, gives the following custom of old English law as remaining as late as 1549: "The woman at the church door was given of her father, or some other man of the next of her kind, unto the hands of her husband, and he laid down gold and silver for her upon the book, as though he did buy her." Among the Germans marriage was anciently a purchase, the suitor paying over the price to the person in whose power the maiden or widow chanced to be (J. Grimm, Deutsche Rechtsalterthümer). It was so in Ireland and Norway. In the Netherlands, in Spain, and in Longobard law, traces of the purchase of brides still exist. In France it was the law before the Great Revolution, "le futur époux devrait offrir une somme aux parent de la fille" (the future husband should offer a sum to the girl's parents). It is perhaps scarcely necessary to add that buying and selling in marriage is not yet extinct in Belgravia.

Digitized by Google

The Monk and the Woman.—II.

A Public Address by M. M. Mangasarian to the Free Religious Association (Rationalist), Chicago.

(Continued from p. 633.)

WOMAN was educated by the Church, and the Church never educates a woman to play a great part. What betrayed the identity of the monk was liquor. It is well-known that in many of the monasteries the inmates spend a considerable part of their leisure in the manufacture of cordials. A very substantial income is derived from this source. Instead of writing text-books to enlighten the world's ignorance, or inventing machinery to lighten the world's toil, they make of the monastery a quasi brewery or distillery. Father Antoine had left his prayer-books and rosaries behind him when he escaped from the monastery, in fact everything that might reveal that at one time he was a monk he had cast aside, but he had not been able to part also with the liquor he used to make and drink when he was a holy man. His weakness in this matter proved his undoing. The guests at his tent, drinking of the Trappist concoction, discover that their host was at one time a monk. "You," exclaims the merchant traveller, who suddenly recognises in Father Antoine the Trappist monk who had contracted to pray for him, "You promised to pray for me. You have broken your contract with me and your vow to God," and he casts upon him a withering look, a look of disdain, a look of contempt—of horror and of execration. A viper might have provoked his pity, but a monk who has broken his vow, never. And the whole audience seems to arise and point its finger of scorn at the apostate monk. The whole Roman Catholic Church seems to be there on the stage with its awful anathema against the renegade. A shudder falls upon sun and moon even, and heaven and earth stand aghast at the spectacle of a priest who has renounced his vow. A terrific storm, the like of which even the desert had seldom experienced, is invoked to express the protest of the elements against the unholy marriage. The night Julius Cæsar was assassinated there was not half the commotion that there was on this occasion. In short, the coming of a monk and a woman together almost wrecks the universe. But what was all this about? A monk marries. Is there anything extraordinary in that? Is not a monk a man? Can cowl and cloak suppress human nature? But the purpose of all this theatrical fuss was to strike with terror any other priest contemplating his emancipation. It was meant, also, to impress the spectators with the solemnity and sacredness of Catholic teaching, and to warn them from ever disobeying its commandments by listening to the voice in their own souls.

When we analyse the situation, however, we find that there was not the least foundation for all this ado. What, for instance, were the charges against the monk? He was accused, in the first place, of having broken his promise to pray for a certain merchant. Suppose the monk had said this to his accuser before that vast audience: "You say, Sir, that I promised to pray for you, and that I am to be condemned for not keeping this promise. Pray for yourself henceforth. Will not God hear your prayer as he will mine? And if you can pray for yourself, why should you ask me to do that which you can do for yourself?" There seems to be an idea that the efficacy of prayer lies not in the thing asked for, but in the man who asks for it. But that would make of the Deity a capricious Oriental ruler, who has to be approached through his courtiers or favorites before he will hear any petitions for help. In the Orient, a man's plea may be just and reasonable, but that is not enough. He must have what, in political parlance is called "a pull," at the Divan. On the other hand, his request may be unjust, but if he has the right backing at the royal court he may hope for success. But if God is not like an Asiatic Sultan, why hire anybody to pray for us? If our request be just, will he refuse it? If unjust, could he be made to favor us for the sake of the priest or the pope? To ask a monk to pray for us clearly proves that we are not sure that God only considers the reasonableness of the request, irrespective of the person who makes it. But that is the kind of infidelity we should be afraid of. I would rather have the heavens empty than that such a God should reside there. But ignorance looks upon the priest as the mediator between God and man. The Latin word pontiff means a bridge. The Pope is pontifex maximus, or the chief bridge. The purpose of a bridge is to span a chasm. Between man and God there is an impassable gulf—an abyss, and the priest is supposed to be the bridge that connects the divided shores. The Deity, too, must cross this bridge to communicate with us. He needs the priest just as much as we do. God and man are represented as separated that the priest may bring them together. The Deity is unapproachable without a priest. He is a consuming fire, and is located on the summit of a smoking and burning mountain, in order that the people may fear to appear in person in his presence and employ the offices of the priest. Now we understand why people hire "holy" men to pray for them.

In reply to the second charge, the monk could have said: "You accuse me of having broken my vow to God. But I am not sorry for that. What I am sorry for is that I should ever have been so weak, so uninformed, so indolent, so selfish, and so dead to the challenge of life, to the promptings of the life-force in me, as to have taken such a vow. Hundreds of others, among them some of the world's foremost men, flung aside their vows and ceased to be monks that they might become men—Bruno, Erasmus, Luther! I had vowed never to speak. Well, I am afraid of a religion that would punish me for breaking such a vow. I had also vowed never to love—to live like a withered branch, to sit at a sepulchre all my life, instead of watching at a cradle. I am sorry for the religion that would compel me to fulfil so foolish a vow. It was wrong to have exacted such a promise from me in the first place, and doubly wrong to make it binding on me now that my eyes have been opened, and my heart has been touched." Oh, if that tremendous audience could have heard something like that from the lips of the accused monk! And then turning to the woman, soon to be a mother, which evidence he could have used as a proof that heaven, instead of frowning upon his union with the woman he loved, has blest it, suppose he had said to her: "You are more to me than church or creed. I would not live on earth without you, and heaven without you would be a hell." But the monk does not talk like that. He, too, has been educated by the Church. Had he been a Pagan acting on the Greek or Roman stage, he would have expressed himself in some such way as I have indicated. Or, had he even been on the French stage, at the Odeon in Paris, or at the Theatre Francais, he would have risen to the full stature of his newly gained freedom. But on the American stage, with its puritanical atmosphere, handicapped by political considerations, he can only stammer with trepidation of the heart, and crouch and cringe like a slave who feels upon his bare flesh the sting and smart of the lash. A thousand pities! If you wish to see how the parochial schools can whip all manhood, all independence, all defiance and initiative and high spirits out of a man, see that play. If you would have your son or your daughter brought up to be the sport of superstitious fears, send them to the parochial school.

Prevailed upon by his convent-trained conscience, and his superstitious wife, the emancipated monk returns to his cloister. That is to say, to his vow of silence and celibacy. I call the vow of eternal silence immoral. Think of any man with red blood in his veins swearing to hold his tongue, when even the stones are eager to burst into speech. But to hold the tongue is the best way to destroy the mind. The tongue is the mind's chief instrument. Without it the mind might as well not exist at all. Let us never make our peace with a religion that would gag us if it could.

Digitized by Google

But it is the woman who helps the Church to catch the runaway monk. It is the woman who delivers up the escaped prisoner to his jailors. It is the woman who orders the doors of the cloister to turn upon their rusty hinges and shut in, this time for ever, the man whom love and the light of the big world outside his monastery had set free. I ask you to look at the hand that caught the liberated monk and locked him up again. Look at that hand. It is soft and gentle, with tapering fingers like a woman's. It is a woman's hand! To capture the bird that has flown the cage, to smother the mind that has been awakened from its slumber, the Church uses the hand of a woman. The heart and the hand of woman have been the great allies of the Church during the long centuries. A way might be discovered to prop up the planets without the law of gravitation, but neither the Catholic nor the Protestant Church can stand without woman. It is one of the strangest facts of history that in return for what woman has done for religion she has received only insults and injuries from the Church. The world's great religions have not been fair to women. In almost everyone of the creeds woman figures as the tempter of man and the wrecker of the world. According to the Bible, Eve pulled Adam and the whole human race out of paradise. But for her, man would have remained a god to this day. Observe again, the contemptible rôle which the Bible assigns to Job's wife. While he himself is like adamant against the machinations of both Jehovah and Satan, the most formidable combination ever formed against any one person, his wife, instead of lending him a hand, instead of encouraging him in his unequal combat against a Jehovah-Satan combination, taunts and teases him: "Curse God," she says, "curse him and die." Shame on the authors of that questionable story! Yet that is the rôle which most religions assign to woman. She is meant to drag man down, to cause him to slip and fall.

(To be continued.)

Dean Ramsey relates that the Earl of Lauderdale was alarmingly ill, one distressing symptom being a total absence of sleep, without which the medical man declared he could not recover. His son, who was somewhat simple, was seated under the table, and cried out, "Sen' for that preaching man frae Livingstone, for fayther aye sleeps in the kirk." One of the doctors thought the hint worth attending to, and the experiment of "getting a minister till him," succeeded, for sleep came on, and the earl recovered.

The Kaiser's Remonstrance With God.

To God thus murmured Kaiser Billy:
"Come, now, you're treating me but illy,
  And not, God, as you ought to:
Not like the Atheist French am I,
I never did your power deny,
And never failed to glorify
You as my patron and ally,
  And still in prayer besought you.

Am I, your devotee so long,
Who never failed to make a song
  About your friendly 'havior,
To be deserted in my need,
And left in vain my cause to plead?
If so, I must revise my creed,
Your over-lordship supersede,
  And find some other Savior!

It isn't fair to me, you know
(Just think how much to me you owe!)
  So scurvily to treat me;
To let my schemes all go awry,
My cunning plots my hopes belie,
Russia and France my power defy,
And Britain all my threats decry,
  And little Belgium beat me!

You can't think this the proper way
The constant service to repay
  Of your friend and idoliser;
Grateful you surely ought to be,
To be so often linked with me;
Then why not issue your decree,
And favor me as formerly?—
  Your disappointed Kaiser?"

B. D.

Sonnet to Mr. Will Crooks, M.P.

On his leadership of the House of Commons, when the Home Rule Bill became law.

[Mr. Whitley (Deputy-Speaker) then informed the House that the Royal Assent had been given to the Government of Ireland Act. Mr. W. Crooks (Lab., Woolwich) called out, "Mr. Deputy-Speaker, will it be in order to sing 'God Save the King'?" Receiving no reply, he took silence for consent, and started singing the National Anthem.]

When that historic moment had passed by
  Which brought us, on its long-awaited wing—
  So long, it seemed for ever tarrying—
The glorious dawn of Ireland's liberty;
  And when, inspired to hear some noble thing,
Men paused, and looked around expectantly—
'Twas then that Crooks (ah, bathos deep!) did cry:
  "Permit us, sir, to chant 'God Save the King.'"
Thy King should take thee, Will, to be his fool,
  His Court's prime jester. Who so fit as thou
To move the mirth of royalty and rank?
  With cap-and-bells let Labor make its bow,
And, for reward, reap that just ridicule
  Which mocks the democrat turned mountebank.

S.

Correspondence.

SOLDIERS' RIGHT OF AFFIRMATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Some time ago, in a note on "Religion in the Army" in the Freethinker, I said that I was of opinion that a Freethinker desirous of joining the Army had a legal right not to have a religious denomination imposed upon him, by taking advantage of the Oaths Act (1888) at his attestation. This I now find to be correct, as I have come across the following statement in the National Reformer for June 16, 1889. It occurs in Charles Bradlaugh's presidential report to the N. S. S. Conference for that year, and reads as follows:—

> "There being some misapprehension as to the affirmation of allegiance amongst soldiers, militiamen, and volunteers, the Secretary of State for War has recently recorded his decision, in accordance with the Oaths Act, and this is now circulated in Army Orders."

This information may be of some service to prospective recruits for Kitchener's new Army of a million and a half.

H. GEORGE FARMER.

Obituary.

We regret to report the death, in his fifty-seventh year, of Mr. John Thomas Walters, of Ingersoll House, Gilfach, Bargoed, Monmouthshire, which occurred on September 24. Mr. Walters was a valiant Freethinker, and a constant reader of our journal, and for many years rendered invaluable service as an ardent propagandist. Like every other Secularist of strong convictions, he had to suffer much persecution for his advocacy of Freethought. But no opposition had the effect of cooling his zeal in the spread of "the best of causes." Such was his honesty and sincerity, however, that even his opponents were obliged to respect and admire him. His neighbors and friends, in great numbers, paid their tribute of admiration for his sterling character by their attendance at the funeral, which took place on Tuesday, September 29, when a Secular Service was conducted at the grave-side—E. M. VANCE.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

KINGSLAND BRANCH N. S. S. (Mr. Cowell's, 44 Jenner-road): Monday, Oct. 12, at 8.30, Business Meeting—Re next season's plan of propaganda, etc.

OUTDOOR.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Parliament Hill): 3.30, a Lecture. Regent's Park (near the Fountain): 3.30, a Lecture.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, Mr. Finch, "Religion and Progress."

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Miss E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6¾ ins. by 8¾ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—Miss E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biogrophical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LETTERS OF A CHINAMAN ON THE MISCHIEF OF MISSIONARIES. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

PAIN AND PROVIDENCE. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d. (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 42 SUNDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Liberty sustains the same relation to all our virtues that the sun does to life.—R. G. INGERSOLL.

Freethought and the Army.

FROM the present extraordinary activity of the Churches, it is evident that they are using the War just as the newspaper proprietors and blanket manufacturers are doing—as a means to business. Even the poor soldier comes in for their attention. He is being supplied by them with a daily prayer, printed on a conveniently sized paper, to admit of its being carried "inside his cap." There I'll wager it will remain, unless Tommy wants a light for a "Woodbine." Why on earth can't these people leave the soldier alone? He doesn't want parsons and prayers, and never did. The life and training of the soldier, notwithstanding that the Bible is part of his kit and the Church one of his parades, does not admit of religion in the definite, personal sense. The ordinary soldier usually enlists between the ages of nineteen and twenty-five, a period in life when the mind becomes finally clinched on most things. Of course, he brings with him whatever religious thought or feeling he received at home or at school, and this persists for a time, but gradually slackens before the all-absorbing forces of stern routine in official life and its sequential escapement—the utter freedom of his private life. Like the individual in the early gens, the soldier becomes part of the fabric. All that concerns him is his consent with the fabric, whilst his individual life is of small importance; hence its tendency to freedom. In short, the soldier is more concerned with his rifle than his soul. And yet he is none the worse for it. If ever you should visit Edinburgh Castle, just climb as far as the battery, and immediately below you will find a bastion, carefully laid out as a cemetery for soldiers' dogs and other pets. On the slopes of Green Hill—not that one "far away, without a city wall," but at Woolwich, near London—there is another such ground for soldiers' horses. Read the tender, and sometimes affectionate, inscriptions on the slabs there, and you will understand the soul of the soldier better than these stiff-collared parsons. Tommy will probably swear or grumble at the intrusion of his chaplain, but for his horse or dog there is ever a kindly word and pat of the hand.

The soldier is a thorough Pagan. His religion (by the card) only belongs to him as his regimental number does. After his weekly church parade—which is simply a "parade" to him, since he shows no interest in the service—he takes no further view of religion, save that he may pull down his Bible for a dusting before he lays it out with his socks and shirts at "kit inspection." The voluntary evening church service does not attract one in a thousand.* As for the chaplain, he is the soldier's bête noir. Even when he comes in a social guise, with his free teas at the Soldiers' Home or tickets for an entertainment, he is usually suspected of a tract up his sleeve.

From the same force of circumstances which I have already laid down, it would appear that the soldier is no more open to Freethought than religion. But here it must be pointed out that the authorities take precious care to keep him in entire ignorance of the former whilst the latter is forced upon him by "King's Regulations." When Liberal papers are kept off the soldiers' reading-room tables, there is small chance for Freethought papers. The lending libraries are just as bad, since the shelves teem with bad fiction, military history or text-books, and divinity. Yet in spite of this conservatism, Freethought has made a certain headway in the Army, although it has invariably met with stern opposition from the authorities. "A Colonel," writing in a current Rationalist contemporary, says that "he has never met with anything approaching religious persecution" in the Army, and considers it improbable.

My own intimate knowledge of the Army, extending over many years, compels me to disagree with this. I could specify innumerable instances of religious persecution, but one case will serve. I remember a certain unit that had a number of well-educated young men who were Freethinkers, and openly professed their ideas, even to the extent of distributing literature on the subject. These young enthusiasts were systematically persecuted on account of their opinions, and one of their officers openly boasted that it was his intention to "root them out." He and his bigoted subordinates were fairly successful, for under the most despicable tyranny many of these young men left the service, whilst others found employment in other units.

Yet I suppose one ought to be thankful that these military Freethinkers have only this "moral suasion" to contend with nowadays, for I remember coming across some curious laws on this point when I was collecting materials for my books on military music, one of which dealt with soldiers who wilfully absented themselves from divine service. For this offence the seventeenth century Articles of War punished them by boring the tongue through with red-hot irons!

Strange to say, I have just had placed in my hands the will and testament of a certain Private B——, of the Gordon Highlanders, who is "off to the front." This Private B—— belongs to the class of intellectual Freethinkers in the Army that I have spoken of. Although brought up a Christian, he had, by independent study, become a Freethinker. He served many years with the Gordon Highlanders in India, and throughout the South African War. Finally he left the service and settled down to civil life, taking an active interest in Secularist propaganda. A few weeks ago came the news of the British retreat from Mons, where the Gordon Highlanders suffered rather badly. This disaster to his old regiment and comrades immediately aroused in him the idea that it was his duty to be with them, regardless of cost, and in a few days he had re-enlisted in his old corps. Of course, the word "patriotism," like "pluck," is a very elastic term; but if this is not a case of genuine patriotism, I don't know what is.

The final instructions in the will of Private B—— read: "When I am reported killed, or dead, or if missing and I fail to turn up at the finish of the War, then I wish you (the executors) to enforce the provisions I have made in my will." He further says: "I will have died a Secularist, as I have

* I made this computation some years ago in a garrison town.

Digitized by Google

lived." The provisions of his will include the gift of his books and papers to the local Branch of the N. S. S. or the Freethinker, at the executors' discretion.

This document makes interesting reading in comparison with an insolent article that recently appeared in the Globe, which stated that our Army's heroism at the front was the outcome of its Christian training, and challenged Atheism to show a similar result. Well, Mr. Hired Scribbler of the Globe, I present to you Private B——, of the Gordon Highlanders, just to go on with.

H. GEORGE FARMER.

Christian Ideals.

IN the war with Russia, Japan for the first time demonstrated its right to stand on an equality with the Christian nations of the world. Previous to the war, all the Christian Powers were quite willing to bestow a qualified admiration on the Japanese as a clever, ingenious, and artistic people; but as to their being accepted as the equals of Christian nations, that was a thought that never dawned upon them. The Japanese were not white; they were not Christian; they had done nothing to prove their worth; and so, in the estimation of Europeans, they must content themselves with a subordinate position. The Japanese, not having, as is the case with China, to face the obstacle of an absence of militarist tradition, saw the general position with clear eyes, and took steps accordingly. They recognised that in certain branches of science the West was ahead of the East. They saw also that in the art of manufacturing weapons of destruction the Christian nations were far ahead of the rest of the world. They found themselves brought into contact with Christian peoples, who were ever on the lookout for "acquiring" new territory, and that the only way to make their own independence secure was to meet them with the same weapons of brute force. Finally, they saw that to learn all that could be acquired in the shape of using mechanical devices for killing human beings, no better teachers existed than the followers of the "Prince of Peace." Japan studied the West, and took from it all that was useful to it. It took all it knew about guns, and battleships, and commercial exploitation. The religion of the West and the morality of the West it left alone.

The war with Russia ensued, and "Heathen" Japan flung back the forces of "Holy" Muscovy beaten and demoralised. When it came to the art of killing, the Japanese showed they were pupils of whom any Christian nation might be proud. They could kill quickly and efficiently. And all the Christian nations were loud in their praise. At last, they said, Japan has shown its worth. What was impossible before is possible now; for now that Japan has shown that it can fight, that it can slaughter as readily and as efficiently as we do, now we admit that she is entitled to rank as one of the civilised Powers and become one of us. In every other respect save that of demonstrating efficiency in war, Japan was no better after the war than it was before—in some respects it was worse. It had demonstrated nothing save that it could conduct a war. And it was Christian nations that made efficiency in the art of warfare the supreme test of a nation's worth. Amongst some tribes of savages a man is never reckoned to have quite "arrived" until he has killed his man. How much higher was the test that was applied here!

Let us take another illustration of the same point. Certain of the nations of Europe are grouped as the "Great Powers." They claim, and are accorded, first place in the councils of Europe—even of the world. They call themselves the "Great Powers." On what do they rest their claim? They are all, be it observed, Christian nations. In virtue of what do they claim greatness? Is it because they are supreme in art or literature or science? Surely not. In each of these directions the small nations produce as good work as the larger ones. Is it because certain European nations are morally better than others that they claim greatness? No one would be foolish enough to make that claim. The morality of Sweden, of Denmark, of Norway, of Belgium, of Holland, is as good as that of England, of France, or of Germany. Why, then, do they call themselves the "Great Powers"? Examine carefully the basis upon which this claim rests, and it is found to be threefold. Certain nations have more money, they possess more territory, they can put in the field and on the sea larger armies and navies than other nations. Therefore they claim to be the "Great Powers" of Europe. They do not even trouble to make the claim that they are wiser and better than the other nations, and, therefore, ought to lead. No; they take it for granted that when they have exhibited their bank-balance and their brute strength, that is enough to convince the world that their claim is a valid one.

In any other sense than that of possessing most money and being able to command a greater measure of brute force, these nations have no valid claim to be called "Great Powers" at all. Apart from cash and carnage, the claim of national greatness would be so difficult to make good on behalf of any nation that it would probably never be made. Great men and good men are born everywhere, and flourish everywhere, more or less, and at various seasons. To-day one country leads, to-morrow another. In one country we have a great writer, in another a great musician, in another a great scientist. Who is there to definitely decide which is the greater nation? Clearly it is not on account of moral, intellectual, or artistic greatness that countries are reckoned as first class, second class, or third class powers. If Germany is decisively beaten in the present war, it will become, in all probability, a second class Power. If it is not so beaten, it will remain a first class Power. In either case, it will be the same Germany. Nay, there are few people, in this country at least, who will deny that a Germany in which Militarism was for ever crushed would be really a better nation than a Germany victorious and with militarism in the ascendant. Yet we should unhesitatingly class as a "Great Power" the worse Germany, and as second class a Germany purified and altogether better. Mark, it is not Germany beaten that would call herself a second class Power. It is the rest of Christian Europe that would insist upon her being so regarded, because she had shown herself unable to beat others, or to hold her own in a contest of brute strength.

Here, then, cleared of all disguise and cant phraseology, are the standards of value by which Christian government has taught the people of Europe to measure greatness. Plenty of trade—obviously a good thing given certain qualifying conditions, wealth, and fighting capacity. Individuals, of course, adopt other standards of value, but Christian nations know of no other as a rule of practice. In season and out of season they have been preached. Our statesmen have talked of England's greatness, when all they had in mind was the area of our territory, the volume of our trade, the strength of our armed forces, and the extent of our wealth. It has not dawned upon them, still less has it dawned upon the average man in the street, that we might rule over even more territory, possess greater wealth, and command still more powerful forces, and still be, in all essentials, a very little nation indeed. And yet the nations in which these notions of greatness flourish are Christian nations, and they have been, and are, governed by ideals as materialistic—in the vicious sense of the word—as any that ever dominated individuals.

No one could detest German militarism—or the militarism of any other nation, for that matter—or could long more heartily for its downfall than I do. But let us be fair even to Germany. Her sin lies not in the fact of her ideals being of a kind unknown to, and unhonored by, the rest of Christian Europe. Her sin lies in her having allowed these ideals to govern her more completely, and to overcome competing ideals more thoroughly, than has been the case elsewhere. She has a more severe attack of a general disease; a more powerful faith in militarism than exists elsewhere. We are not witnessing, in reality, the influence of a Bernhardi, or a Treitschke, or, as ill-informed journalists write, of a Nietzsche. We are seeing in the Germany of to-day the power of a teaching and of ideals that has never ceased to exert a commanding influence on the Christian world. In that world wealth and brute force have been worshiped with a more or less whole-hearted devotion. The worship has been usually disguised, but it has been there. German Junkerism simply shows the hideous thing stripped of all its disguise.

Digitized by Google

The cant and the folly and the absurdity of it continue. People are writing and talking as though the triumph of the Allies will mean the end of all war. I only wish I could believe it to be so. But I am convinced that it will mean nothing of the kind. Already we have been warned by Earl Roberts that it is a delusion to imagine that we can do with a smaller Army or Navy when the war is over. And others are calculating as to the amount of increase that will be required. Win or lose, it is certain that the Militarist party in this country—and it must not be forgotten that we, too, have our Militarists—will find their hands strengthened for a time. Our success will be taken to justify their outlook on life; our failure would be used none the less cogently to point the same moral. Of course, wars on the scale of the present one simply cannot be waged at very short intervals, but preparations for war will continue—and that is an evil that is almost as bad.

War is not killed by war, any more than brutality is cured by brutality. It is strange that a Freethinker should have to dwell on this point to Christians, but the necessity for it is patent. What effect in the direction of ending war had the post-revolutionary wars at the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth centuries? In what way did the Franco-Prussian war make for the cessation of war? How did the Boer war or the Russo-Japanese war tend to teach the nations the folly of war? They simply utilised them as lessons to be applied in future wars. Each war has usually sowed the seeds of further conflicts. People become habituated to its horrors as they become habituated to other horrors. War may be ended in one way, and one way only, and that by the growth of intelligence and a genuine civilisation.

"It would clear up our ideas about many things," says Spencer, "if we distinctly recognised the truth that we have two religions." For "religions" substitute "ideals," and we have the position excellently described. As Spencer goes on to explain, there is the religion of enmity and the religion of amity. To the latter we give the place of honor, but the real homage—that of practice—is paid to the former. We have the ideals of honor, of truth, of justice, of progress that govern genuinely cultivated minds in all nations and classes. But far more powerful to the mass of people are the ideals of wealth and of mere power. It is the man who has "made his pile" who is generally admired; the nation that is strongest on the plane of brute strength that is given first place. Not admired, or willingly given, it will be said, rich and powerful nations simply take first place. Not altogether so. What individuals and nations work for is what men generally admire. If individuals strive to become millionaires or multi-millionaires it is surely because they are living in a world where greatness is generally reckoned in terms of cash. If nations strive for more territory and still more territory, or aim at military supremacy, that, again, is because these things are accepted by the world as a certificate of worth. Nations aim at that which gives them a standing in the eyes of other nations of the world generally. The fault of to-day is that every nation which ranks as a "first class power," or has any reasonable likelihood of taking that position, is fighting for supremacy on the lower, instead of the higher, plane. Viscount Bryce declares that "small peoples have done, and can do, as much for the common good of humanity as large peoples." I am inclined to the opinion that at present they are doing more.

C. COHEN.

Unreasoning and Irrational Faith.

IN Exodus xvii. 8-16 there is preserved an exceedingly interesting legend about Moses and the war with the Amalekites. Possibly the whole narrative is legendary, but the following portion of it most assuredly is:—

> "And it came to pass, when Moses held up his hand, that Israel prevailed; and when he let down his hand, Amalek prevailed."

If such a statement were found in the Koran or in a Hindu Scripture, an orthodox Christian would not hesitate to pronounce it unbelievable. Because it occurs in the Hebrew Bible it is regarded as literally true. Indeed, the Rev. John A. Hutton, M.A., of Glasgow, tells us that "nothing could be more foolish than to dismiss a story like this with the objection that it savors of superstition, or that it belongs to a stage of human progress which lies now far behind in the useless background of history." Of course, nobody could expect that Mr. Hutton, a preacher of the Word, would express any other opinion; but we are greatly surprised at the manner in which he tries to justify that opinion in the Christian World for October 8. His article, which fills two columns, is simply an outburst of religious emotionalism of the most irresponsible character. He goes to the length of informing us that, if we argue with him and try to prove how unreasonable his feeling is, he will not listen to us, because no argument, however well-grounded, appeals to him. And yet the story, as it stands, is as silly as it can be. As long as Moses held up his hand, Israel won; but the moment he let it drop, Amalek prevailed. The preachers maintain that Moses uplifted his hand in prayer, though that is not stated; but even on the assumption that such is the meaning, the story becomes more absurd still. Is it conceivable that a God worth believing in would take one side while his servant prayed, and the opposite side when the prayer ceased? We are not told how long the battle lasted. All that is said is that "Moses' hands were heavy," or that, in other words, he got tired of praying for Israel, with the result that Amalek began to gain ground. The story proceeds thus:—

> "Aaron and Hur stayed up his hands, the one on the one side, and the other on the other side; and his hands were steady until the going down of the sun. And Joshua discomfited Amalek and his people with the edge of the sword. And the Lord said unto Moses, Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua: that I will utterly blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven."

Such is the story which Mr. Hutton believes to be literally true, and such is the picture of God with which it concludes. To us the story is ludicrous, and its picture of God hideous. Naturally, the reverend gentleman makes no allusion to the unspeakably cruel and revengeful Deity therein described, nor to the multitudes of horrible atrocities and immoralities alleged to have been perpetrated at his command. But no matter what anybody may think of this or any other Bible story, "the fact is," Mr. Hutton assures us, "we will pray for those who are fighting our battles, and those who are fighting our battles will fight the better because we pray and knowing that we pray." Then he adds:—

> "The question is, are we, out of respect to one side of our nature, and that a side which has only quite recently come into power, to thwart and deny another side of our nature, and one which has accompanied us all the way, lifting us up from impossible dungeons of failure, urging us to go on into darkness, and when we fall, to rise again—I mean the instinct to claim the help of God?"

Digitized by Google

Only a believer in the supernatural could have framed such a question. For us the supernatural is non-existent, as is also that side of our nature which is said to discern it. "The instinct to claim the help of God" is a pure myth. The Buddhists, of whom there are some five hundred millions, do not have it, and the same is true of tens of thousands of other Atheists scattered up and down the world. The fact is, that in the absence of a belief in God, no one ever dreams of seeking his aid in any emergency. The spiritual side of our nature is an invention of the metaphysicians, and no facts have ever been forthcoming to prove its reality. We are aware that Mr. Hutton is not listening, but others are, and the truth is dawning upon growing numbers of thinking men and women that the Christian God is as deaf and dumb as was Baal of old. Not only there is no instinct to claim Divine help in time of need, there is also no Divine Being to grant the help asked for.

To return to the story, we learn that Mr. Hutton believes it merely because the compilers of the Bible "passed" it as worthy to hold a permanent place in their collection; and they were men "who knew very well the difference between religious practices which were simply superstitious, irrational, ministering to low ways of living, and other practices which expressed and defended some instinct of the human race, so precious that it must not die." And yet the reverend gentleman knows, as well as we do, that the men who handed down the religious literature of the Jews were themselves profoundly superstitious. They believed that God had chosen their nation out of all the nations upon earth to be his own peculiar people, and that only through them was it possible for the rest of the world's inhabitants to receive any Divine favors. Now, ponder the following passage:—

> "There was something in that story which seemed to those wise and altogether able men of a later time to be of such consequence to the general human well-being that they allowed it to stand. And one has only to listen to the beating of his own heart, one has only to attend to the private admonitions of his own conscience in days of suspense and fear, to confess that the story stands for something which no honorable man can gainsay."

At this stage, as is clear, Mr. Hutton turns interpreter, and the interpreter is always a dangerous, bewildering, and misleading individual. As it stands the story means, in the reverend gentleman's own words, "that once upon a time when Israel was hard pressed, the hands of Moses were held up in prayer for Israel, and that it so happened that so long as his hands were uplifted Israel prospered, and when his hands sank down Israel failed." In other words, God played with the two contending armies, now befriending the one and now the other, just as Moses prayed or did not pray. But as interpreted by this ingenious modern preacher, the story stands for something radically different, and "that precious thing" we must allow him to state in his own way:

> "I cannot rid myself of the idea, or belief, or obsession, call it what you will, that my personal behavior during these days has a direct influence upon the conflict in Europe. I feel that I also am engaged in that conflict, though with ghostly arms. If to-day I were to fail morally, were to do something which I knew to be wrong, and were I to read to-morrow that this day our arms had suffered, I should feel invincibly that it was I, my personal moral failure, which turned the fortune of battle. I should feel that I had gone asleep at my post, that I had given ground, just as truly and decisively as though I had turned my back as a soldier in the actual field."

Can anyone recognise the simple old story in that elaborate modern guise? The interpretation embodies a great principle, though the expression of it is culpably extravagant. We are convinced that Mr. Hutton overestimates the influence of his own personal behavior, just as the Kaiser underestimated his British foe; but it is perfectly true that we are all members one of another. If the reverend gentleman were to fail morally, or to do what he knew to be wrong, in the privacy of his Glasgow study, we can comfort him with the fullest assurance that his personal fall would have no direct influence whatever upon the fortunes of the War. We go even further, and assert that it would not exert even an indirect influence of any sort. As we have said, there lies a most important principle in the interpretation, but the interpretation is not contained, even germinally, in the original story. The unmistakable meaning of the story is not "that Moses on the mountain top and the Israelites in the plain are bound together in one spiritual fortune," but that God smiled on Israel when Moses' hand was up, and on Amalek when it was down; and that is a story which has no corroboration "in every uncorrupted conscience." That we are members one of another is by no means "the whole point of the story," and to maintain that it is, is to be guilty of wresting Scripture with a vengeance. "Let us live purely, with simplicity," is an excellent advice, and no one can do better than follow it to the highest possible extent; but purity and simplicity of life, truthfulness, honesty, honor, sympathy, and love are as much displayed by unbelievers as by believers; and by whomsoever exhibited they make for the uplifting and purification of society. But that there exists a God who hears and answers prayer is the vainest of all imaginings; and if there did, in what a deplorable quandary he would find himself just now. He would certainly not know what to do.

Does Mr. Hutton really think that battles are decided by the behavior of people who are themselves not engaged, or that battles are lost or won, not by the strong and striking arms of the fighters, but by the arms uplifted to God of those who are left behind? Then the history of war gives a flat contradiction to his belief. Germany smashed France in 1870 because she had a stronger and more efficient army. And in how many wars has might triumphed over right? Mr. Hutton admits that prayers may not be answered according to the asking, which necessarily means that they may not be answered at all. It is not prayer, but work, that tells. In war, piety does not count; it is the strongest and best-directed force that wins battles. It has always been so, and so it will be now.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Rose of Freethought.

> "Look to the blowing Rose about us—'Lo,
> Laughing,' she says, 'into the world I blow,
> At once the silken tassels of my Purse
> Tear, and its Treasure on the Garden throw.'"
> —OMAR.

A HEAP of stones, crushed and shattered, moss-covered, lying amid a tangle of weeds and creeping plants; a crumbling cross—the mute evidence of the ruin.

Among the wreckage lies an old cannon, rust-worn but still frowning grimly as in the days when it belched forth death and destruction, and human lives were sacrificed in the heat of the devilish passion.

Amidst the tangle of vegetation and sundered masonry grows a wild rose. It has obtained a foothold upon the demolished walls of the church and has thrown its protecting branches about the old cannon as though trying to conceal it, or soften its menacing aspect.

It makes a picture full of meaning.

Now let us take a glance backward—back into the pathless, tangled forests of an age when there lived in dismal caves, a manlike animal, sharing its shelter with bat and serpent, with wolf and hyena, and fighting for the bones and torn flesh with his fellows. Ages pass. The man-beast has groped his way from cave to hut. The ever-changing conditions of life, the resistless power of evolution, have caused a glimmer of reason to penetrate the stupid brain. Experience shall henceforth be his guide and teacher.

Digitized by Google

Gradually the brain develops; painfully and with many a backward stumble the man gropes his way. Communities form, nations are built up only to be disrupted in the conflict of ideas and ideals. Man is learning a little, forging slowly ahead; nature, always true to herself, sacrificing the unfit, be it individual, tribe, or race.

Let us now return to the ruin by the roadside.

In almost every country there are ruins of temples erected for the worship of some form of god, the propagation of some superstition. Each and all have had their history, which tells how they flourished and finally fell into decay, strife-blackened and blood-stained, and at last weed-grown, moss-covered masses of rubbish.

The ruin we have described was a Christian church—the crumbling cross proclaimed the fact. Think, then, how that cross drips with human blood. Think of the torture and misery, murder and rapine the religion of the cross has caused.

And why?

Simply because an idea had entered the mind of man, and it had to be fought for, preserved or destroyed. Millions of men, women, and babes have been sacrificed in the triumph of the cross. Blood has flowed like water for the glory of the Prince of Peace, and the anguished cries of the innocent and helpless have echoed down the path of civilisation.

As we ponder upon these things, before our mental vision comes a picture of martyrs to what they consider right, and a reasonless mob determined to perpetuate the crazed imaginings of their ignorant brains.

We see scheming priests planning the enslavement of mankind, designing rulers degrading the people for their own selfish purposes—the people themselves trying to turn back the wheels of progress.

We see the battles, the carnage, the murders and assassinations, the banishments and tortures; we see the fagots lighted, the instruments of torture brought out, and we see the sombre winged vulture hovering over many a field of death.

Yet through all of this awful period, struggling for a foothold, there is a tangled plant which plunged its roots into the soil of human intelligence with the first glimmer of reason that filtered into the stupid brain.

It has struggled on and on, and in spite of being purposely trampled by deluded man, or ruthlessly torn by war and carnage, it has managed to gain a place among the crevices and rocks of human intelligence, and now spreads its green branches, drooping with the weight of the fair and fragrant blossoms of Truth and Wisdom, over the muzzle of the old spirit of murder and intolerance.

It is the Rose of Freethought, a noble plant which, rising above the ruins caused by persecution and superstition, gives to the world its delicate fragrance, and leads men's thoughts to higher and nobler things.

Freethought in its relation to natural phenomena s intellectual, but in its application of the results of nvestigation it is emotional—the purest impulses of the heart.

Freethought searches out the truth. It must know what and why, and when it has answered those questions it endeavors to raise man to a higher plane.

Freethought, seemingly so heartless and cold, is really pulsating with human sympathy. The Freethinker, if he is worthy the name, observing conditions of ignorance, poverty, or misery, seeks for a remedy; while Christianity, founded upon the murder of the innocent, leads logically to heartlessness and brutality.

Freedom, mental, moral, and physical, is man's birthright. It must sooner or later prevail. We may dam the stream or divert its course, but sooner or later the waters must find their way to the great ocean of Life.

GEO. H. LONG.

—Truthseeker, New York.

Correspondence.

THE EXPULSION OF UNCLEAN SPIRITS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Referring to the "Acid Drop" on p. 632 of the Freethinker, commenting on the former Anglican practice, during the baptism of infants, of driving out unclean spirits from them, I subjoin an extract from the service of Infant Baptism now in use in the Roman Catholic Church, which may be of interest to your readers:—

[Before entering the Baptistry the priest says:]
I exorcise thee, every unclean spirit in the name of God the Father †, Almighty, and in the name of Jesus Christ His Son †, our Lord and Judge, and in the power of the Holy † Ghost that thou depart from this creature of God, N, which our Lord hath vouchsafed to call unto His holy temple that it may be made the temple of the living God, and that the Holy Ghost may dwell therein.—Response: Amen.

[Then the Priest moistens the thumb of his right hand with saliva from his mouth, and therewith makes the sign of the Cross † on the right, and afterwards on the left, ear of the child that is to be baptised, and says, once only:]
Ephtheta † that is †, be thou opened.

[And then signing the nostrils, he adds:]
For an odor † of sweetness.

[Lastly, in a louder tone of voice, he says:]
But do thou depart, O devil; for the judgment of God will come.

[He then, by name, questions the person to be baptised, saying:]
N, dost thou renounce Satan?
Sponsors.—I do renounce him.
Pr.—And all his works?
Sp.—I do renounce.
Pr.—And all his pomps?
Sp.—I do renounce them.

[The priest then dips his thumb into the oil of Catechumens (B) and with it makes the sign of the Cross † on the breast, and between the shoulders, of the infant, saying:]
I anoint thee † with the oil of salvation in Christ † Jesus, our Lord, that thou mayest have life everlasting.
Response.—Amen.

[The priest now removes the oil from his thumb, etc.]

I may also remind your readers that by the Seventy-Second Canon Ecclesiastical of the Church of England it is decreed that:—

> No minister shall, without the licence and direction of the Bishop.....attempt upon any pretence whatsoever, either by possession, or obsession, by fasting and prayer, to cast out any Devil, or Devils, under pain of imputation of imposture or cosenage, and deposition from the ministry.

It would appear from this that not only is the Devil officially recognised by the Church of England, but that if a bishop grants the formal licence any minister could enjoy the supreme satisfaction of exorcising Satan—a feat that any mortal might well be proud of.

E. B.

SOLDIERS' RIGHT OF AFFIRMATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Re Mr. H. G. Farmer's letter on the above in the Freethinker of October 11, I would like to mention that, having served a number of years in the Volunteers, and desiring—for certain reasons—to serve one in the Territorial Army, I informed my company officer of my intention to affirm when entering the new force. No difficulty was put in my way; in fact, while the orthodox fellows were sworn in in batches of ten and fifteen, I had a ceremony all to myself, much to the wonder of my comrades who stood by.

R. H. ROSETTI.

A contemporary tells a good story of clerical presence of mind. A curate entered the pulpit, and was about to preach one of the late Rev. Charles Bradley's homilies. He was for a moment horror-struck by the sight of the Rev. Charles Bradley himself in a pew beneath him. Immediately he recovered enough self-possession to be able to say: "The beautiful sermon I am about to preach is by the Rev. Charles Bradley, whom I am glad to see in good health among us assembled here."

Tompkins: "Do you believe in the immortality of souls?" Jenkins: "Well, not in the case of my shoes."

There is a growing impression that Lot's wife was only going back for her gloves.

Digitized by Google

The President's Prayer.

Our readers will like to see the full text of President Wilson's call to prayer for peace. It may be an historic document—the last of the kind. We are indebted for it to our contemporary, the New York Truthseeker.

"By the President of the United States of America

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, Great nations of the world have taken up arms against one another and war now draws millions of men into battle whom the counsels of statesmen have not been able to save from the terrible sacrifice; and

Whereas, In this, as in all things, it is our privilege and duty to seek counsel and succor of Almighty God, humbling ourselves before him, confessing our weakness and our lack of any wisdom equal to these things; and

Whereas, It is the especial wish and longing of the people of the United States, in prayer and counsel and all friendliness, to serve the cause of peace;

Therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do designate Sunday, the fourth day of October next, a day of prayer and supplication, and do request all God-fearing persons to repair on that day to their places of worship, there to unite their petitions to Almighty God, that overruling the counsel of men, setting straight the things they cannot govern or alter, taking pity on the nations now in the throes of conflict, in his mercy and goodness showing a way where men can see none, he vouchsafe his children healing peace again and restore once more that concord among men and nations without which there can be neither happiness nor true friendship nor any wholesome fruit of toil and thought in the world; praying also to this end that he forgive us our sins, our ignorance of his holy will, our wilfulness and many errors, and lead us in the paths of obedience to places of vision and to thoughts and counsels that purge and make wise.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this eighth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and fourteen and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirty-ninth.

WOODROW WILSON.

By the President:

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN, Secretary of State."

President Wilson (the Truthseeker says) has "apparently forgotten that he is the official head of a secular country, in which Church and State are constitutionally separated." That's a bull's-eye.

ANECDOTE OF DAVID HUME.

The Rev. Dr. Carlyle, in his "Autobiography," tells the following story of Hume, with whom he was personally and intimately acquainted, and whom he declares to have been "of a social and benevolent temper, and truly the best natured man in the world":—

"When Mr. Robert Adam, the celebrated architect, and his brother, lived in Edinburgh with their mother (an aunt of Dr. Robertson's and a very respectable woman), she said to her son, 'I shall be glad to see any of your companions to dinner, but I hope you will never bring the old Atheist Hume here to disturb my peace.' But Robert soon fell on a method to reconcile her to him, for he introduced him under another name, or concealed it from her.

When the company parted she said to her son, 'I must confess that you bring very agreeable companions about you; but the large, jolly man who sat next to me is the most agreeable of them all.' 'This was the very Atheist,' said he, 'mother, that you were so much afraid of.' 'Well,' says she, 'you may bring him here as much as you please, for he is the most innocent, agreeable, facetious man I ever met with.'

This was truly the case with him; for, though he had much learning and fine taste, and was professedly a sceptic, he had the greatest simplicity of mind and manners, with the utmost facility and benevolence of temper, of any man I ever saw. His conversation was truly irresistible."

The Earl of Carnarvon, at a banquet, in proposing "The Health of the Clergy," said that "in these days clergymen were expected to have the wisdom and learning of a Jeremy Taylor." His lordship was next day reported to have said: "In these days clergymen were expected to have the wisdom and learning of a journeyman tailor." This seemed more natural to the newspaper men, for divines like Jeremy have long been extinct.

Acid Drops.

Dr. T. K. Cheyne has written a book entitled Reconciliation of Races and Religions, in which he contends that peace among the nations must be preceded by friendship among the Churches. The doctor will find this a very long way to Tipperary.

The late George W. Steevens's impression of the Kaiser was that of a man "who felt himself slowly turning into ice," so impassive was the German monarch. The description sounds like futurist journalism, or an attempt to describe the feelings of Lot's salted wife—after a thunderstorm.

Mr. Holbrook Jackson says that "the Kaiser still goes about patting his God on the head"—"but Germany no longer believes in God." "Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" Do not the German Catholics eat their god?

The Rev. D. Ewart James, of Southend-on-Sea, has been using adjectives about Germany's "hellish creed." We do not quarrel with the reverend gentleman's description, but we must remind him that the religion of Germany is the religion of England.

The Bishop of Barking says the war will afford openings in commercial life for young men and women, such as there had never been in the past. There's commercial acumen! If the Bishop's creed be true, it will afford far more openings to the place "where there is no winter."

The dear clergy are everywhere attributing the excesses of the German troops to culture. What has "culture" to do with militarism, even in our own army? A tale is told of an officer of a crack regiment, being examined, and being asked to write an order on his banker for funds. After half-an-hour's trouble the result was: "Dear Cox [the name of the bankers] I am stony. Will you please send me some oof."

We are not surprised at the ignorance—real or assumed—of the ordinary newspaper writer concerning Nietzsche. It is his business to repeat the cant of the moment, whatever it may be. And as it has become fashionable to charge Nietzsche—mainly, we think, because of his hostility to Christianity—with responsibility for German misdeeds, every newspaper, from the editor downward, feels called upon to repeat the senseless slander. Still, we were surprised to find so eminently great a writer as Thomas Hardy lending his name to the superstition, and bracketing Nietzsche with Bernhardi and Treitschke. With these Nietzsche had little or nothing in common, and the merest intelligent dipping into his writings would show this to be the case. A very prompt correction to Mr. Hardy's statements came from the pen of Mr. C. M. S. McLellan, who concludes his letter to the Daily Chronicle with the pertinent remark that "if for no other reason than to stop the present generation of Berlin professors laughing at us, something ought to be done to prevent our literary men persisting in their unwarranted repetition of a senseless libel."

Mr. Arnold White is a gentleman who has a strong liking for charging people in bulk. He does not seem to care much for particular charges against individuals, but he does enjoy going for a whole sect, or nation, or race. Some time ago his favorite object of attack was the Jews. Not certain bad Jews, or undesirable Jews, but the race; and at that time it was suggested—by Mr. Zangwill, we believe—that one object of the movement to get the Jews back to Jerusalem was to rob Mr. White of his material for a living. The War has now given Mr. White the opportunity to turn his attention to the Germans; and while the object of attack has changed, the method remains unaltered. In the Sunday Chronicle, Mr. Arnold White suggests that when the War is over all the Germans in this country should be at once deported, and, presumably, England should be a closed country so far as Germany is concerned. The proposal is, of course, an impossible one, and any country that adopted such a policy would forfeit all claim to be called civilised. It is only interesting as showing how people lose their heads, or what serves them as such, during a period of war.

Newspaper readers have their "ha'porth of horrors" just now. Nine-tenths of the reading matter is devoted to battle, murder, and sudden death, and the ordinary news paragraphs are sometimes as lively as the following: "There were 2,500 victims of the earthquake at Konia, Asia Minor." Providence appears to be more paternal than usual.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Robert Blatchford, writing in the Weekly Dispatch, has a neat paragraph concerning the horses in the war. "The battle-horse in Job," he says, "whose neck was clothed with thunder," is described by the poet as "shouting ha, ha! with the captains, and laughing at the shaking of the spear. But I fancy it was the poet who laughed and not the charger."

Father Bernard Vaughan says the Allies are "struggling under a hail of bullets and shells for the Christianity of Christ." As there are many thousands of Freethinkers and Jews in the ranks of the Allies, we think the great St. Bernard is mistaken.

An English bishop was turned out of a German town on the ground that he was a "useless mouth." The phrase is as uncompromising as a bayonet thrust, but it applies to the black army generally.

The Organising Secretary of the Christian Evidence Society has just issued a little pamphlet on Popular Attacks on Christianity. His information concerning Freethought societies and Freethought advocates is extensive and peculiar. He says they are energetic, which we cheerfully admit; they are well organised, which is open to question; and they are pretty adequately financed, at which we are greatly surprised. So far as we are aware, an adequately financed Freethought advocate would be a bit of a curiosity. His fellow-advocates would probably want to meet him once a week. For our part, we are ready to swear that the incomes—from Freethought—of all the Freethought writers and speakers in Great Britain combined does not equal the salary of many a popular preacher.

Incidentally Mr. Drawbridge's pamphlet gives a curious insight into that gentleman's intellectual make-up. The object of open-air meetings, he says, is (a) To secure a crowd and to keep the audience from attending his opponent's meeting; and (b) to go on speaking hour after hour and to outlast his opponent, and thus, when the rival meeting closes, to secure his opponent's audience in addition to his own. We have italicised certain words here because they are what psychologists call test sentences. They indicate the writer's mind. They show that, in his view, public propaganda is a combination of the cheap-jack and the prize-fighter. The main object is to beat your opponent, tire him out, and then secure his audience. For our own part we are strongly of opinion that any speaker in any cause who is inspired by that policy is likely to do more harm than good. They can only serve to disgust decent and thoughtful people, and if the sentences above quoted truly indicate Mr. Drawbridge's mind, he must be quite an ornament to the church, and a useful recruiting agent—for Freethought.

Mr. Drawbridge says, incidentally, that "if the existence of a loving Heavenly Father and of a future life were felt to be at all certain, or even to be highly probable, the masses would find it almost, if not quite, impossible to treat these supremely important facts with calm indifference." Quite so; and it should strike Mr. Drawbridge as casting a strong doubt upon the veracity of both doctrines that so little certainty is felt concerning them. If there is a God, it is his plain business to make his existence clear—that is, if the belief is of importance to anybody. As he has not done so, and does not do so, it seems a safe conclusion that it does not matter—especially as no one seems a bit the worse for being without him. And we are afraid that Mr. Drawbridge's ideal of outtalking an opponent and stealing his audience will hardly carry conviction to the "masses." They may admire the power of his lungs, or the tenacity of his purpose, but they may be left questioning the strength of his intelligence.

"Special constables will parade to-night at ten o'clock, and armlets only are to be worn," says a provincial paper. It sounds like a report from the Garden of Eden.

"To hell with the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs," writes a Louisville (U.S.A.) editor. How discourteous Christians are! Some of the decent persons in that tropical place might object to the arrival of such psalm-smiting bigots.

The dear old Guardian recently had an article on "The Military Mind and Religion," in which it said "the old classification for Sunday parade was Church of England, Roman Catholic, and Fancy Religions." Just so! With the inclusion of Indian regiments, the list of the fancy religions should be extended considerably.

Sir Claude Macdonald, who, owing to his having been our Ambassador to Japan, speaks with authority, administers a sharp rap to the German theologians who protested against "Heathen" Japanese being brought against them. He writes as one who was in Japan during the whole time of the war with Russia, and says:—

> "The whole world knows with what splendid valor our Allies fought, but it is not known as generally, as I think it ought to be, how straightforward, honest, and dignified, and how loyal to us was the conduct of these negotiations; it is not generally known how appreciative of the stubborn valor of their opponents and chivalrous to them in defeat, how cheery and patient in their own sufferings were the 'heathen' Japanese. It is not known perhaps, as I know it, that fullest information regarding wounded Russians in the hospitals of Japan, for transmission to their friends, was immediately obtainable, the nature and gravity of the wounds, and, in some cases, even the temperature of the patient being telegraphed. The present Viceroy of India, the Ambassador of St. Petersburg, can bear me out in this. I venture, therefore, to think that some Christian nations, not forgetting Germany, have too much to learn of the Christian virtues of chivalry, courtesy, and honesty from heathen Japan."

A deserved rebuke, excellently administered. And, as Sir Claude intimates, deserved by other nations beside Germany. The only room for cavil lies in labelling the virtues indicated "Christian." Certainly Japan owed nothing to Christian nations in this direction.

In their haste to be smart, some journalists fail to be complimentary. Thus the London Mail: "The Kaiser says that God is on his side. But he has the very devil in front of him." We wonder who that is meant for—the French, the British, the Belgians, or the Russians?

The International Review of Missions points out that one of our oldest missionary societies has, during the past eight years, largely increased its staff, and spent more than £250,000 in the previous eight years. In spite of this, there has been no increase in the number of native church members. We are not surprised. Still, if more money has been raised and more missionaries employed, some of the main aims of these societies have been realised.

In the same magazine another writer deals with the growth and decline of religions in India. He points out that there has been a marked increase in the number of native Christians in the Punjaub. The cause of this does not seem difficult to find. The colonisation on some newly irrigated land was, through the action of missionary societies, confined to Christians. And when Christianity became the door to occupancy of the land, there was an immediate increase in the number of converts. The manufacture of "Rice Christians" in India has always been a favorite occupation of the missionary societies.

The Barmouth County School Governors have decided that German is no longer to be taught in the schools under their control. Presumably, these gentlemen consider this patriotism. We consider it downright stupidity—but the one often does duty for the other.

We are glad to see, on the other hand, that the Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire Association of Headmistresses have made a strong and much needed protest against a proposal that a "Children's Army" should be raised to collect for the National Relief Fund. Begging by children, for any purpose whatever, is wholly bad, and if a child is starving and begs, the law treats it as an offence. But some people, so soon as the blessed word "collection" is named, seem to think that any and every method is justifiable. If begging must be done, let it at least be done by adults.

It is quite evident that God has got something to do with the European War, although exactly what, and why he is doing it, no one seems quite sure. The latest view is that of the Vicar of Streatham, Rev. E. Jervis. He writes in St. Peter's Magazine that the war is one "against spiritual wickedness in high places. The sins of Russia, the persecution of the Church in France and Wales, and the general and growing forgetfulness of God cry aloud for vengeance, and we must, as a nation, see in our misfortunes and our sufferings the chastening hand of the Almighty." As Germany is not mentioned, we take it that Mr. Jervis believes that the Kaiser is right when he claims that God is on his side. He is evidently the instrument of God who is being used to chasten us. But what an instrument! What a chastening! And what a God!

Canon Scott Holland retorts on the German theologians and their manifesto by asking what they have done to create and secure peace? He asks why have they allowed militarism to dominate Germany and make it a menace to Europe? These are very pertinent questions; but why limit their application to Germany? What have they done in other countries to make peace secure? There are enough of them in every country in Europe to make war almost impossible if they lent themselves to the task. Fifty thousand preachers in this country alone, genuinely determined to cultivate the temper of mind that makes for peace, might act as an educative force for the whole of Europe. It is not the German theologians alone who fail to justify their existence. The indictment is equally true of every clergy all over the civilised, and uncivilised, world.

Digitized by Google

The Catholic Times gives currency to a Press Association report that while in Rome eighty-five per cent. of the people are in favor of the Allies, the leading figures among the minority are "the cardinals and high dignitaries of the Church, who are pro-German simply because they would like republican and anti-clerical France to get a good beating." The Catholic Times explains this on the assumption that the cardinals believe "French hostility to religion is one of the main causes of the terrible chastisement Europe is undergoing." This may be so; but hostility to religion is not confined to France, and there seems no adequate reason why French hostility to religion should annoy God Almighty more than hostility elsewhere. And it is just like God's way of doing things to cause cathedrals and churches to be bombarded because people are hostile to religion!

The Catholic Times itself favors the view that the War is the result of man hurling "defiance at the Almighty." "The nations have merited punishment by their defiance of God and neglect of religion." "Printing presses in this country have been turning out millions of atheistic and anti-Christian publications for a number of years," etc., etc. Therefore, because France—and in a smaller measure England and Germany—have neglected God, Belgium is being devastated! That, we presume, is to show what we deserve. Now, if England will only suppress all these Atheistic and anti-Christian publications, re-endow the Catholic Church, and make any attack upon Christianity a criminal offence, God will forgive us, and we may once more enjoy the peace and security and happiness of—say, the Middle Ages.

It seems that a protest has been addressed to the Times, Daily Telegraph, and Daily Mail against their issuing Sunday editions. However excusable this might be during war time, it is felt that these Sunday editions may go on even after the War is concluded. The Church Times says that it had hoped the War would have recalled the nation to the due observance of the Lord's Day, and the publication of newspapers on Sunday is a serious hindrance to religion. The Church Times might also call the attention of the Government to the fact that battles are being fought on Sunday, without the least regard to the demands of the Christian faith. Indeed, some of the most important engagements so far have taken place on the "Sawbath."

Mr. R. J. Campbell repeats, with approval, Ruskin's saying that "the soldier's trade, verily and essentially, is not slaying, but being slain." That is the kind of thing that Mr. Campbell, with his taste for feebly forcible rhetoric, would endorse. But, with all due respect to Ruskin, it is quite false. The soldier's trade involves the risk of being slain, but his business is, obviously, not to be slain. That would involve the curious conclusion that the best soldier was the one who went and got himself killed as quickly as possible. A soldier's trade is to kill. He often risks his own life in the process, and must always be prepared to take the risk, but if he can do it without risk, so much the better. The whole art of war is to kill your opponent with as little loss to yourself as is possible. We are quite aware that there is always a danger in epigrams, as applied to practical matters. It is difficult to get the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth in a single sentence. We admit that a man does not join the army merely for the sake of killing somebody—at a price. The case is far more complicated than that. And the soldier's object is, perhaps, rather to disable and defeat than to destroy the enemy, but the steps that have to be taken for the one object are extremely likely to lead to the other. It would be interesting if some one like the late Sir Arthur Helps—a charming and by no means shallow writer—would write a Conversation on this subject, or submit it to some other form of analysis. Meanwhile, the pious "patriotism" of preachers like Mr. Campbell—which is only distended egoism after all—will help no man to form reasonable opinions on this (or any other) question. Nine times in ten, at least, men of his profession are panders to the community that finds them bread—and the rest.

"With God for the King and Fatherland" is said to be inscribed on a missile belonging to the very latest big gun which may be called the Kaiser's Mascot. The gun carries eight miles, and the shot weighs half a ton. And "with God" is a particularly appropriate inscription on the specimen exhibited in Berlin. No wonder William says God will stand by him. He leans on the Deity on one side, and his smash-all gun on the other.

We have been favored with a copy of A Plain Talk With Girls by the Rev. James L. Gordon, D.D., Pastor of the Central Congregational Church, Winnipeg — "published through the kindness of J. B." We hope J. B.'s kindness is a real one to the reverend gentleman; it is a very questionable one to anybody else. It is full of sickening gush; it represents nature falsely, and tells falsehoods to support the deception. The following story occurs on the last page:—

> "The mother of David Hume, a simple-hearted Scotch woman, following the example of her son, became an unbeliever and an agnostic, but on her death-bed she penned a letter, in which were to be found these words: 'Oh, David, my son, give me back my religion, my Bible, my Christ, my God.'"

The word "agnostic" is a note of alarm to a well-informed reader. It was not known until its invention by Professor Huxley more than a hundred years afterwards. We have read pretty well everything that can claim the least authority regarding David Hume, and we are as sure as a non-infallible person can be that the only truth in this pious story which comes from Winnipeg is that there was a famous sceptic called David Hume, and that he had a mother whom he loved and respected. All the rest is, to the best of our knowledge, a pious invention. It proceeds from the great Christian factory of lies for the glory of God—and is a very poor one at that. We do not accuse the Rev. J. L. Gordon of having manufactured it himself—we should ascribe its production to a more original pen. We ask him to inform us on what authority he presents this remarkable story to the world? Or does a discourse to girls justify any nonsense and any untruth, in his estimation?

Rev. A. C. Spurr went out to the antipodes to save Christianity from "infidelity." Presumably he left it perfectly safe here. But it must have got into danger again, for the reverend gentleman has returned home, and is delivering a course of Bible lectures on Thursday evenings at Regent's Park Chapel. His second lecture should excite a good deal of interest. It is on "What is left of which we are certain?" It will be a clever feat to spread that minute substance over such a considerable area. An hour's lecture on nothing! Lord Rochester wrote a poem on it, and a very good one too; but Mr. Spurr is not Lord Rochester, and Lord Rochester's poem on "Nothing" is not an hour long.

According to the "puff" on the back of his syllabus, Mr. Spurr will make an endeavor to reach ROCK BOTTOM. (Thus in the original.) Is this a reference to what Moses saw on Mount Sinai?

The Manchester Guardian reports a sermon by the Rev. H. J. Barker, of local celebrity—if any—on "Germany's Atheism." She had lost her faith in God,—which, by the way, is a huge joke, for God and the Kaiser are constant companions, if the latter's word is good for anything—and the result was what we see in the newspapers. England had a more "simple faith" in God and the Bible, and the result was her comparative safety from war's alarms. But is not this a pulpit fallacy? Is not the reverend gentleman confusing Providence with the Straits of Dover?

A good story is welcome even from a battlefield. The following appeared in Tuesday's Daily Chronicle, as borrowed from an article by M. Georges Berthoulat in the Liberté:—"The army corps whose base he was visiting has two chaplains—a Catholic priest and a Jewish Rabbi. They seemed to be very good friends as well as the best of good fellows. One evening they were kept on the battlefield looking after some wounded, and found it impossible to get back to the lines. After looking round, they found an abandoned farm with a single ragged pallet. Here they spent the night side by side; and, as they went off to sleep, the priest remarked to the Rabbi: 'If there were only a photographer here!—the Old and the New Testament as bedfellows.'"

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

President's Honorarium Fund, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £217. Received since:—W. L. R., 8s. 3d.; Twenty-Five Years' Subscriber, 15s.; G. L. B., 10s.

G. L. B.—Glad that you both still find the Freethinker a "weekly treat." Thanks for the rest of your pleasant letter.

Mildred Winters.—There were Atheists in the French Revolution, but no party of Atheists, unless calling them so backwards makes them so.

W. P. Ball.—Your batches of cuttings are always welcome.

J. Bateson.—Where and when did the sect you mention really have any power of persecuting?

W. L. R.—Our shop manager will try to get a second-hand copy of the book and send you. Thanks for your encouraging letter.

Twenty-five Years' Subscriber.—Pleased to have your appreciation and good wishes after all this time. Mr. Cohen's articles merit all your praise, but we fear you won't see one from his pen on the subject of prophecy, in which we don't think he is much interested.

X. Y. Z.—The lines are Wordsworth's. We cannot give you the precise reference at the moment. But if you care to read the poet right through (supposing you have not done so) to find them, you would be repaid.

John Mosley.—Men of God are fond of charging Atheists with intellectual pride. Few would accuse them of such a crime; there must be something to work on in the beginning.

M. Steinberger.—You agree with us as to the greatness of Cæsar, who, by the way, was an avowed Freethinker. There is nothing in Attila to be mentioned in the same breath.

Herbert Gartrwaite.—Glad to know your father regarded us with "great respect." You will understand that we had to shorten the obituary—especially in relation to the Omar Khayyam stanzas—beautiful as they are.

T. Barker.—Dropping bombs on Paris in the German way seems sheer devilry. Killing a few girls in the streets cannot affect the main issue of the war, and injuring Notre Dame is injuring what technically belongs to France but, in reality, to the world.

J. Higgins.—Next week.

H. B. Samuels.—We could not possibly undertake the intermediate work of introduction. On the whole, we think it would be better, in such matters as that of the Belgian refugees, for Freethinkers to act in co-operation with their fellow-citizens.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

The National Secular Society's office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

Lecture Notices must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 6d.

Sugar Plums.

There is likely to be a paucity of "Sugar Plums" while this terrible war lasts. Fighting is always the most fascinating thing to human interest. Christianity would have made no more headway than a hundred other religions without the story of Calvary. "The blood of Christ" settled that struggle for existence. After a lapse of nineteen hundred years blood still has its old attraction. Prize-ring fights and suffragette arson are "off." The real thing has taken their place. And what can be expected with regard to a movement like Freethought? Its "glad tidings of good news" must wait for a more convenient season.

During the stormy and dangerous days of the French Revolution a good many people, who had nothing the matter with them physically, found it difficult, and even impossible, to keep out of heaven—or whatever was written in the Book of Fate or Providence as their place of destination. When the Revolution was over, and a matter of memory, one old gentleman was asked what he had done in it, and he replied, "J'ai vecu"—"I have lived," or more idiomatically, "I pulled through it." It will be something the same with a good many advanced journals during the present war. Some have disappeared already, others are in a bad way, some will be able to say "J'ai vecu" at the end. They will have managed to "live," which is always the hardest thing to do in this world, and the one in which man always fails at the last.

We believe the Freethinker will be one of the "pull-throughs." But it will not be without its trials. It has not yet suffered as much as we expected, but a gradual continuous drop amounts to a good deal in time. We repeat our invitation to our friends, and its friends, to counteract the natural effect of the war by doing their very best to promote its circulation by introducing it to their friends and acquaintances. Many people would soon be regular readers of this journal if they only knew of its existence. We make an earnest appeal to our friends in this direction.

Another thing. Freethought lecturing is knocked on the head just now. People want to hear about nothing but the War. That is, most people. There is a "remnant"—though they are not enough. Obviously, therefore, we shall have to meet any deficit on the Freethinker, etc., out of the President's Honorarium Fund. Will our friends who mean to subscribe, but have not done so yet, take the hint?

A very distant correspondent writes to us that when visiting London seven years ago he called at 2 Newcastle-street, and was much surprised at what he saw there. He expected to find > "a big building served with lifts and lift boys, and clerks here and general johnnies there, and having to pass between big machines striking off books, leaflets, etc. But instead I found the cream of the English tongue managed and controlled in such humble circumstances. It was almost beyond belief. If ever I saw the miraculous it was at 2 Newcastle-street.....I hope to see you in better surroundings some day."

We have this correspondent's "sympathy in every direction."

The English Review for October reached us rather late. Perhaps the gem of it is Mr. R. B. Cunninghame Graham's prose pastoral. It is a very deep and delicate study of an old-fashioned English farmer. Mr. Austin Harrison writes powerfully on "The Kaiser's World War," and there are able and interesting articles by Mr. L. March Phillipps, Mr. Edward Thomas, Mr. Arthur Ransome, Mr. E. V. Lucas, and Mr. E. S. P. Haynes,—the latter, however, on "Christianity" not being all it might be. There are also some stanzas by a poet who publishes too seldom—Mr. Aleister Crowley.

The Testimonial to Mr. W. J. Ramsey will take place on the date of the actual publication of this week's Freethinker. We are sorry we could not attend. We hope, however, that some competent pen will be moved to send us an early report of the proceedings. We were present "in spirit," as the saying is.

We dropped our old friend, Mr. W. Heaford, a hasty post-card to assure him that we were thinking of him with much sympathy, and we are glad to receive a reply from him couched in a more cheerful and almost optimistic tone. He is looking forward to a more rapid recovery than was at first thought possible. He is looking forward to the time when he will be strong enough to move about and obtain the stimulus of change and fresh air.

WHITED SEPULCHRES.

The preacher prayed in woeful tone
For the thief in the felon's cell,
And told of his punishment here on earth
And his endless days in hell;
But the thief that sat in the best front pew
That he might be seen and heard—
Of the Shylock thief of the hopeless poor,
The priest never uttered a word!

And he told of the harlot steeped in sin,
And the rum-seller's awful doom;
And he said if they didn't cease to increase,
Hell would run short of room;
But the pirates that have stolen the earth,
And their brothers' blood have shed—
Oh! the parson smiled as he winked at them,
And never a word he said!

Digitized by Google

The Monk and the Woman.—III.

A Public Address by M. M. Mangasarian to the Free Religious Association (Rationalist), Chicago.

(Concluded from p. 653.)

IT is regrettable to observe how this Bible prejudice against woman has tainted the thought of even the foremost of our poets and dramatists. Goethe's Faust, for example, starts with the intellectual mission to wrest from close-mouthed nature her secrets. But Gretchen strikes the pen from his hand and the thought from his brain, and he degenerates into an ordinary pleasure-seeker. Shakespeare creates a Hamlet whose thought has all the straightness and swiftness of the arrow, but a pretty girl, Ophelia, almost wrecks his reason. It is the Bible story of Samson—strong, free, unconquerable—shorn of his strength by a woman, over again. Delilah's lap becomes Samson's grave. Betrayed by a woman, his eyes are dug out, and the crowd that yesterday shuddered at the mention of his name, now makes of him a clown. The ancient Greeks were free, to a considerable extent, from this superstition about woman. Æschylus, for example, does not give to Prometheus, in his warfare against the gods, a woman to deviate him from his task. No Gretchen or Ophelia or Delilah stands between Prometheus and the fire he seeks to steal for the enlightenment of the world. Nor has Prometheus a wife like the wife of Job to approach him with the treacherous advice, "Curse God and die."

Yet, notwithstanding the mean rôle which the Oriental religion assigns to woman, she is the mainstay of that religion. This raises an interesting question: Why is woman more superstitious than man? It will be admitted that, generally speaking, women are more timid than men. This may be the result, to some extent, of her physical condition, but is more largely due to the manner of her education. The fact remains, however, be the cause what it may, that women are more easily frightened than men, and I believe that is why they are more superstitious. It is as true as any proposition in mathematics that where there is fear there is superstition, and where there is more fear there is more superstition. I will revise my statement if you can find me a brave woman or a brave man who is also superstitious; or, if you will find me an easily frightened person who is not also superstitious. Rutherford Alcock, in his work on Oriental Religions, says that the majority of worshipers in the temples of Japan are women and children. In India, nine-tenths of the pilgrims are women. Herbert Spencer writes that among certain primitive tribes the women believe in more gods than the men. That is quite true also of the Catholic women. They believe in more saints, in more divinities, than their Protestant sisters. Indeed, the Catholic Church could very justly be called the female church par excellence. The religiosity of women, then, may be explained by the fact that, being more exposed to perils, it is easier to excite their fears. They will pray and beg for help much quicker than men. This is also true of children. Tell little boys and girls that the lightning is after them, or that the thunder is looking for them, and they will bury their heads in their mother's or father's lap, sobbing and shaking with fear. The Church is anxious to have the children because, on account of this susceptibility to fear, they are very promising subjects for its teachings. To establish my point that fear is the food superstition thrives upon, let me call your attention to the example of the sick. As a rule, the majority of people send for a priest when they are sick. This further proof that it is fear which feeds and fattens superstition is furnished, I say, by the behavior of the majority of people when they fall sick and think that they are going to die. Do they not invariably send for the priest? And is it not fear that brings the sick and the priest together in the death-chamber? When well, strong, and prosperous, they are brave, and feel no need for the priest. But when health and wealth are gone, and the terrors of the future, the terrors of the unknown are upon them, they begin to think of the priest. Superstition is nothing but the panicky state of the mind—it is the stampede of the faculties.

The more frightened we are the more exacting is the priest in the presence of some great danger. Our extremity is his opportunity.

No priest or preacher is ever so eloquent as when speaking at a funeral, or when summoned to the death-bed. The more frightened is the dying, the more eloquent is the divine. Even stout-hearted men and women have been known to succumb to the eloquence of the priest, when at death's door. "Wait until you come to die," is the stereotyped argument against healthy and robust unbelievers. And it sometimes happens that when a Rationalist is down on his back, the priest succeeds in converting him. If he fails to convert the dying, he rarely fails to capture his corpse if the deceased is a distinguished personage. When Mark Twain was alive, they could not get him into a church; as soon as he was dead, his body was taken to the Brick Presbyterian Church on Fifth-avenue, in New York City. Darwin was too large for any church during his lifetime; but no sooner was he dead, than he was given a church funeral in Westminster Abbey. Let us appreciate the brave struggle of those glorious infidels, who even in the valley of the shadow of death triumphed over fear and the priest, and fell asleep with the flag still in their hands. Blessed be the memory of those who even in death, with feeble pulse and sinking breath, remained loyal to reason—the only emancipator from fear!

While watching the performance this thought also came to me very forcibly, that religion and happiness do not as a rule go together. Religion, that is to say, the kind preached in the Churches, both Protestant and Catholic, will not permit us to enjoy ourselves in this world. Just when we feel that we ought to be happy, religion steps in with a reason why we should not be happy. The gods are jealous of human happiness, and they leave nothing undone to make this world "a vale of tears" for us. In fact, they know that their existence depends upon our being cast down and dejected. Not until we cry "out of the depths" will they hear us. These two people in The Garden of Allah had every reason to be happy; they were still young, they were both in splendid health, and they were in love. But religion would not permit them to enjoy one another. It stepped in and separated them. It robbed the man of all his hopes and sent him back to the desolation and gloom of the monastery; and it shattered the woman's rainbow completely, leaving her heart-broken and disconsolate for the rest of her life. It also made of the unborn infant an orphan, depriving it of the companionship and support of a father. The belief that happiness makes people forget God, or that it leads them to look upon this world as their heaven, is the basis of the prejudice against it. Then again, the idea that the love of God is very much better than the love of man, or woman, or child, or friend, makes one discontented with such pleasures as life can give. The real does not satisfy us because of the imaginary. The fanciful love of God makes the real love of man or woman seem commonplace and even sinful. Home is real, but the thought of an imaginary heaven in the clouds often makes a man or woman give it up for a convent. Wife and husband and child are real, but an imaginary Savior dearer than wife, husband, or child has made monks and nuns of many human beings. The present is like a red, red rose, fragrant and radiant, but the worry of the hereafter has plucked all of its petals, leaving only the thorns in our hands. Heaven, like some far away mirage, has blinded us to the humbler joys of life.

Yet still in another sense is the popular religion detrimental to human happiness. You have, for example, often heard the preacher say to his hearers, "Do not do anything which Christ would not approve of," or, "Do not go where Jesus will not accompany you." But would not such advice keep one in a state of hopeless perplexity? Would it not make of life one long worry? Every time one is about to speak or act one must ask, "Will this please Jesus?" And, "What will he think of that, or the other thing?" Now, if it were a comparatively facile matter to find out the pleasure of Jesus on matters public or private, there would be some reason for wishing to consult him on every question that comes up. But how are we to ascertain what Jesus would have us do under a given circumstance? Does Jesus approve of the theatre? Would he go to the opera with us? Would he permit smoking? Does he believe in baseball, or cards? Would he take a little wine for his health's sake if he were living to-day? And what are his views on politics, the economic struggle, the trusts, the tariff, or the divorce question? Is there anybody who can supply this information to us? Jesus himself never left a line in writing, and he has not been heard from for the past twenty hundred years. The sphinx in the African wilderness is not less uncommunicative than Jesus. But "Consult the Bible," says the Protestant, and "Consult the church," says the Catholic. Ah, that means—consult us. For if each reader may consult the Bible for himself, why are there heresy trials in the Protestant, and excommunications in the Catholic Church?

Digitized by Google

Moreover, life is a much bigger thing to-day than it was when Jesus was living. New problems require new explanations. Life is too big a thing to be covered by the thought of one man or of one age. The Bible is a closed book; life, on the other hand, opens anew every day, and is still unfinished. To try to stretch or thrash the thought of a Galilean Jew of two thousand years ago to make it reach the heights and depths of modern life, with its ever-changing issues, cumulative and tremendous—would be enough to drive a man out of his wits. That more people do not go mad under the strain of theology is a compliment to the essential sanity of human nature.

Many years ago I found a young man, newly married, and with every prospect of a bright future, in great mental distress. I was his minister, and he came to tell me that he was afraid he had committed the unpardonable sin. Poor soul! He did not know what the unpardonable sin was, neither did I; but he had read in the Bible that there was such a sin and he imagined himself guilty of it, in consequence of which he suffered mental torture night and day. We have only to read the biographies of revivalists to come across just such pathetic cases. The example of the monk and his wife in the story of The Garden of Allah is an eloquent illustration of the power of the teaching of the Churches to destroy happiness. As already stated, these two soul-mates were just beginning to be serviceable to one another, and to enjoy the pleasure of each making the other happy. For happiness, to be enjoyed, must be shared. Besides, they were looking forward to the birth of their first child, and planning, no doubt, with many glimpses into the future, to give the visitor a sweet welcome. What could be a deeper joy than to watch over the gradual unfolding—the budding of the child mind. They were going to bend over its cradle, as the sun over the earth in the springtime. Yet with one stroke religion destroyed their happiness and turned their day into night. The apple was hardly lifted to their lips when the priest whispered in their ears, "Do not eat of it, there is a worm at its core," and he pointed their astonished gaze to the imaginary apple in the skies, so much better than any earthen apple. For the sake of that fictitious, heavenly apple, they allowed themselves to be robbed of the fruit that grew in their own yard.

When I saw the monk, under the influence of his misguided wife, re-enter his cell in the monastery, which is not much different from a living tomb—when I saw him part with the glorious world with all its joys of home and humanity—when I saw him turn his back upon the mother of his child soon to arrive—I recalled to mind these words of Jesus, spoken nearly two thousand years ago, and still hanging upon the horizon like a menacing cloud: "If any man hate not father, mother, brother, sister, wife, husband, or children for my sake, he is not worthy of me." I will spend what life I have still left me to change that divine malediction into a human evangel: If anyone love father, mother, husband, wife, or children more than the far-away gods, he shall be deemed worthy of the best and the highest that life can give. Love me! cry the gods. But what can our love do for a god? Is he not perfect in himself? Or is he so short of help or of happiness that we should worry about him? But man's love for woman, and woman's love for man is indispensable each to the others completeness. Nothing can take the place of the love of man for woman, or woman for man. Ye men and women! Break not your hearts for the gods, nor lose your world for their heaven!

The Evolution of Flowers.—II.

(Concluded from p. 635.)

As already indicated, several kinds of insects carry mouth-organs specially adapted for suction, and these have been developed through an adjustment to liquid food from the masticating organs of earlier insects whose descendants are still, in many orders, to be found in an unmodified state. It is a fair hypothesis that the Dipteria (flies) may have slowly evolved the sucking organs which many of them now possess through their habit of feeding on soft material and liquid food. And more recently still, several families of flies have become adapted to a honey diet, and have, in consequence, evolved a lengthy proboscis which reaches the utmost extremity of the nectary which lies at the base of the deep corolla tubes of various flowers. Among other insects other adaptations to meet the numerous demands of life may be seen. These, however, need not detain us, and we will glance at a few of the more important instances of the rôle played by insect agency in the evolution of floral structures.

Among these phenomena the activities of the moths and butterflies (Lepidoptera) occupy a high place. The suctorial proboscis of this multitudinous insect order has been specially adapted to a honey diet, and modern biologists are constrained to conclude that these interesting and ornate creatures would cease to exist in the absence of the nectar-holding floral organs of plants. With reference to the ancestry of the moths and butterflies, Professor Weismann states that:—

> "This large and diverse insect-group is probably descended from the ancestors of the modern caddis flies .....whose weakly developed jaws were chiefly used for licking up the sugary juices of plants. But as flowering plants evolved, the licking apparatus of the primitive butterflies developed more and more into a sucking organ, and was ultimately transformed into the long, spirally coiled suctorial proboscis as we see it in modern butterflies."

This is no mere conjecture, but a judgment based on a profound anatomical study of the whole Lepidopteron class in which several eminent men of science have co-operated. It was no easy task to trace the aborted organs, for nearly all the mouth-parts of diurnal and nocturnal Lepidoptera have dwindled to mere hints of their former existence. But sufficient of these organs yet remains to prove the affinity of the Lepidoptera with insects whose mandibles and other mouth-parts are still essential to their continued life. In the Lepidoptera the first maxillæ have undergone the most remarkable modifications; they are enormously strengthened and enlarged and are surprisingly dissimilar to the maxillæ of every other of the countless insect groups. These organs have, in this instance, become transformed into hollow,—

> "probe-like half-tubes, which fit together exactly, and thus form a closed sucking-tube of most complex con> struction, composed of many small joints, after the fashion of a chain-saw, which are all moved by little muscles, and are subject to the will through the nerves, and are furnished with tactile and taste papillæ."

Digitized by Google

The spiral tongue or proboscis of the butterflies is the only mouth appendage that has undergone any material development. It is essentially a flower-feeding adaptation. If we view the life of the insect as extending from the birth of the caterpillar to the death of the winged adult, the butterfly's career becomes a short if brilliant episode in the metamorphosis of the species. The mature butterfly has merely to maintain itself on its purloined nectar until the female mates with her partner and deposits the eggs from which the succeeding generation develops. As there was no necessity for further structural change none has taken place.

But with the bees these structural modifications are not confined to the mouth appendages. The bee's social activities are conducted on an ampler scale; not only does it attend to its own immediate and remote necessities, but it also provides for its offspring. The honey gathering bees are probably the descendants of insects akin to the burrowing wasps. These latter insects do not nourish their broods on nectar, but on caterpillars and other organisms which are stung to death or simply paralysed and are then placed in the wasp's nest for the larvæ to devour as soon as they emerge from the egg.

A brief reference to the feeding organs of the primitive insects from which the higher bees have been evolved may help us to more firmly grasp the meaning of their later transformations. The mouth organs of beetles are made up of three pairs of jaws. The mandibles are the seizing and masticating jaws. These have played no part in the evolution of flowers as they in no way contribute to the formation of the suctorial proboscis either in butterflies or bees. The first and second maxillæ, as the other two pairs of jaws are termed, are modelled on the same plan as the mandibles, and in the bee the inner jaws have developed into the long vermiform proboscis which enables the insect to suck up the nectar of flowers.

This transformation of jaws into a suctorial organ is well illustrated by the burrowing wasps, as in these predaceous insects the under-lip has varied in the direction of a licking organ. With Prosopis, one of the bees, an insect which, unlike the burrowing wasp, feeds its larvæ on honey and pollen, this development has proceeded a little further still. It is only in the hive-bee that the transformation is complete. Therefore, we find that "of the three pairs of jaws in insects, only the first pair, the mandibles, have remained unaltered, obviously because the bee requires a biting organ for eating pollen, for kneading wax, and for building cells."

It may be claimed then, that the evidence that flowers have become adapted to the requirements of insects, and that insects have undergone structural and functional modifications to meet the necessities of flowers is abundant and conclusive. Nay, the very existence of gaily colored and perfumed blooms is dependent upon the visits of insects, while pollen and nectar gathering insects have been transformed in a thousand ways to cross-fertilise their favorite flowers.

Science is now in a position to assert that the ancestral forms of the higher flora were all anemophilous, as many catkin-bearing trees, such as the oak, birch, beech, and hornbeam still are. The pollen was carried by the breeze through the air, and sometimes, by happy chance, settled on the stigma of the female flower. In past geological times, before modern blossoms were in being, insects doubtless visited the male inflorescences of wind fertilised plants to plunder their pollen, thus reducing the chances of reproduction in the plants they plundered. But, in flying from flower to flower, they must have occasionally alighted on a female blossom, and thus assisted in the act of fertilisation. Wind fertilisation obviously is dependent upon favorable atmospheric conditions, so that when the chance insect pollination began to occur among ordinarily anemophilous plants, the foundations were established for that elaborate system of cross-fertilisation by organic activity which now so widely obtains.

Two ways at least were open to plants to turn the visits of insects to practical account. The male blossom was already the recipient of insect attention; the female flower might also offer an inducement to insect visitation, or bisexual blossoms could be evolved. As we are now aware, Nature adopted both devices. The former contrivance occurs in the willow, and insects are inveigled into the act of cross-pollination through the production in both male and female catkins of a primitive nectary in which honey is secreted. The insects roam to and fro among the male and female willow inflorescences and transfer the sticky pollen from the anthers to the stigma of the female bloom.

Cross fertilisation has, however, been more commonly secured by the development of hermaphrodite flowers. To the plant this method has greater advantages, as it is less likely to miscarry. All the earlier flowers were unisexual, although bisexual blossoms are now in the ascendant. As Professor Weismann writes:—

> "The beginnings of the modification of the unisexual flowers in this direction may be seen in variations which occur even now, for we not infrequently find, in a male catkin, individual blossoms which, in addition to the stamens, possess also a pistil with a stigma."

With the advent of these hermaphrodite flowers the conditions were established which ultimately led to the marvellous adaptations which so many of the higher floral structures now display. From a uniform green the floral organs evolved those striking colors which enable insects to see them at a distance. It has been experimentally proved that flowers which are extremely conspicuous are more frequently visited by insects than those less readily observed; while these last, as a rule, mainly rely on self-fructification. Attempts have been made to prove that insects are indifferent to the colors of flowers; but these endeavors, in company with others of a kindred character, have been completely overthrown by more recent inquiries of a most thorough and critical nature. Not that it is contended that color is the sole guide to insects in search of honey and pollen; perfume also plays its part, and calls its visitors from afar. Nor is this all. With the permanent establishment of ornate floral organs the struggle for existence between contending plants was intensified, and it became necessary to discriminate between the value received by the plants from the presence of the various insects. When once the certainty of insect visitation had been gained, it became a matter of consequence that such insects as those that simply stole the nectar without giving compensation for their purloined sweets should be excluded from the feast. Before insect specialisation began, the nectaries would be at the mercy of all that chose to come. The nectary was then placed at a more concealed part of the flower. And so this protective adaptation proceeded until only such insects as possessed a lengthy proboscis—which developed step by step with the lengthening corolla-tube of the flower—could obtain access to the deeply entrenched nectar lying within.

Lest it be thought that there is ampler utility in the presence of a medley of insect life, it may be mentioned that flowers that restrict themselves to the ministrations of a select set of visitors economise their pollen and secure a larger number of cross-fertilisations. Insects habituated to attend the wants of special flowers are more likely to roam from bloom to bloom in the same species of plant. The famous Hermann Müller noted from personal observation that, "in four minutes, one of the humming-bird hawk-moths (Macroglossa stellatarum) visited 108 different flowers of the same species, the beautiful Alpine violet (Viola calcarata), one after the other, and it may have effected an equal number of pollinations in that short time."

Digitized by Google

Flower specialisation has, therefore, survival value, and it helps to elucidate the amazing adaptations of orchids and other floral organisms, as well as the remarkable elongation of the proboscis in butterflies and bees.

Those plants that proved most successful in attracting useful insects and, at the same time, managed to keep useless ones at a distance, furnished themselves with a powerful weapon for the preservation of their race. That these interesting and instructive phenomena cannot be explained by the design theory is frequently illustrated by their comparative imperfection. Innumerable flowers are deprived of their pollen and nectar by insects that render them nothing in return. Some of the most complex contrivances for assuring cross-fertilisation are completely nullified by wood-bees, bumble-bees, and other insects which pierce through the nectary from outside, rob the flower of its honey, and thus bring to nought the most elaborately prepared structures evolved for the purpose of promoting the production of its precious seeds. If these failures are ever to be overcome, they must be surmounted by further evolution. Protective devices developed by the play of natural forces will alone produce immunity to the wasteful pilferings of such insect marauders as these.

T. F. PALMER.

Belief and Knowledge.

MANY people make no distinction between knowledge and belief, but the distinction is one which it is important to bear in mind, especially in controversy. Some persons think they know a great deal because they believe a great deal, and such persons imagine others know less than they do, because such other persons only assert what they know, being reserved in regard to what they do not know.

One may believe much and know but little, and one may know much and have a very short creed. The man of large experience and knowledge is cautious and discriminating in accepting unverified statements. The ignorant man is less capable of calculating probabilities, and is easily imposed upon by false statements. It is easier to assent to an old creed, making the authority of a name or book serve in the place of proof, than it is to examine a subject, weigh evidence, and make that the basis of belief or disbelief. It is men accustomed, more or less, to the authority of creeds, and to the idea of the pre-eminent importance of believing this or that dogma, who pride themselves more on what they know, and more on the amount of the marvellous they can swallow, than on the amount of evidence they can adduce to sustain their views, or on the strength of the reasons they can give for adopting and adhering to them. Belief may exist without any real evidence, and in conflict with truth. But what one knows is always true.

A conviction is not to be treated as of no value simply because it is a belief. Beliefs move men to action, knowledge guides and corrects them. Theological teachers have prepared statements of what should be believed, declare disbelief, and even doubt, sinful in advance, and have then pronounced all who rejected their theological nostrum as deserving and destined to eternal suffering. How absurd! Men may be urged to examine, but to urge them to believe is to treat them like children. If the evidence of any claim is good, it will sooner or later be accepted by all rational minds. The man of science does not plead for converts. He does not demand belief. He invites investigation. He does not threaten men with damnation if they believe not. He assures them that they will be rewarded with possession of the truth if they will apply their minds to the study of his teachings.

Theology, by stereotyping old errors and antiquated methods, has become the enemy, not only of intellectual growth and material prosperity, but of social progress and natural morality. Science is radical and progressive. Theology is "the Bourbon of the world of thought." Science is knowledge classified; theology is ignorance petrified. Science is the friend, the benefactor, the "savior" of mankind; its mission is to bless and benefit the race; it hath its "victories no less renowned than war."

Theology has persecuted and murdered reformers, strangled genius, reddened the earth with human blood, and covered it with a mantle of darkness. Science is gaining ground every day; theology is as rapidly losing its influence over the minds of men. The realm of science is the region of natural law; the empire of theology is the region of the supernatural. The enlargement of the former corresponds with man's progress and enlightenment; the domain of the latter has for centuries, with the decay of superstition, been growing "small by degrees and beautifully less."

Theology claims to be able to give an explanation of this universe. Science, which deals with the observable and calculable, studies the order and sequences of the phenomena. The absolute nature of things is unknown, and the puzzle of existence man cannot solve. A mystery to ourselves, we are in the midst of mysteries we cannot unravel. We are all children in the dark, getting now and then a glimpse of the light.

The widest observation and experience in a lifetime, and the most complete familiarity with the results of all investigation past and present, will not remove the barriers to a solution of the problem of this universe; because no amount of knowledge possible to man can relieve him from the organically imposed limitations of human intelligence.

All our ideas of the external world are and must for ever be relative. We can know things only as they are related to us, as they are colored by our consciousness, and modified by the conditions of the human organism. So long as there is organism and environment, knowledge is possible only in the form of a relation—a relation between the subject, man, and the object, external nature.

We can know things only as they are related to the mind. By no power of thought, by no ingenuity of reasoning, by no effort of the will, can we scale or destroy the eternal wall which confines us to the region of the relative, and makes for ever impossible knowledge of the absolute, or of "the thing in itself."

—B. F. UNDERWOOD.

The Shadow of Buddha.

Adapted from Nietzsche.

WHEN Buddha died his shadow long was shown,
A spectral figure, fearful and immense,
Upon the wall of a vast cavern thrown,
Where worshipers still paid it reverence;
God, too, is dead; but ages yet will pass
Before his shadow fades and disappears.
When all men shall the vanished vision class
With the dim myths of man's barbaric years.

Long must we strive its influence to o'ercome,
And 'gainst its dull narcotic power contend,
Ere it shall cease the spirit of man to numb,
And warp his genius from its proper end:
Till man that shadow doth no more behold,
Never can he his better self unfold.

B. D.

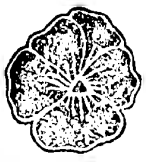
Obituary.

We regret to record the death of Mr. Garthwaite, a veteran and well-known Freethinker, of Grimsby, at the age of seventy-two. He was a life-long abstainer, and one of the pioneers of temperance. He was respected by all who knew him, and beloved by all his family. His only regret in death was leaving "that pathetic figure"—a blind wife, to mourn his loss. He was conscious to the last moment of his life, and found an adequate support in his principles. The funeral was conducted by Mr. J. T. Lloyd, whom the mourners desire to thank for his sympathetic words and attitude.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.



LONDON.

OUTDOOR.

EDMONTON BRANCH N. S. S. (Edmonton Green): 3, Mr. Hope, a Lecture.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Parliament Hill): 3.30, a Lecture. Regent's Park (near the Fountain): 3.30, Miss Kough, a Lecture.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, Miss Kough, a Lecture.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Miss E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6½ ins. by 8½ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	...	$3.00
Two new subscribers	...	5.00
One subscription two years in advance	...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this..... day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

Liberty and Necessity. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

The Mortality of the Soul. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

An Essay on Suicide. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

From Christian Pulpit to Secular Platform. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

The Martyrdom of Hypatia. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

The Wisdom of the Ancients. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A Refutation of Deism. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

Life, Death, and Immortality. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

Footsteps of the Past. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

Bible Studies and Phallic Worship. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

Utilitarianism. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

The Church Catechism Examined. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

The Essence of Religion. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

The Code of Nature. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

Letters of a Chinaman on the Mischief of Missionaries. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A Philosophical Inquiry Concerning Human Liberty. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

An Outline of Evolutionary Ethics. Price 6d., postage 1d.

Socialism, Atheism, and Christianity. Price 1d., postage ½d.

Christianity and Social Ethics. Price 1d., postage ½d.

Pain and Providence. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.

FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY.

Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d. (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.

(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)

THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.

Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. arcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.

THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.

Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 43 SUNDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

You ask in what poets can be useful. Simply this—in permeating civilisation with light.—VICTOR HUGO.

Please God.

WE should have enough to do to please all our readers. As a matter of fact we never tried to please any of them. We have only tried to please ourselves. It does not surprise us that some readers like what we have written in regard to this war, that others do not like it, and that a few would have us executed for treason felony. The last belong to the Christian Evidence variety of our enemies. One of these blackguardly creatures told his audience last Sunday that Atheists ought to be turned out of England as German spies, and all he could say in support of this was that Mr. Foote had publicly stated that he had not given a penny to the Prince of Wales' National Relief Fund and had not advised anyone else to give a penny. Even that person's audience wanted something more definite and satisfactory, and he saw he had better drop the subject. Other readers fancy we ought to support the Government through thick and thin, and devote all our time to aiding the recruiting sergeant,—as if that were our work in the world, when there are so many others who can do it better than we can, but cannot do some other things as well as we can, or, for that matter, do them at all. It doesn't require everybody to be on one job—not even a war. And the recruiting sergeant was never slack in England when soldiers were wanted for an early slap at our enemies. The third section of our readers who like what we have written are the great majority—the overwhelming majority; who love their own country without wishing ill to any other, who are prepared to defend the right when necessary without creating fresh wrongs, who are glad to hear the voice of calm-minded reason amidst the thunder-roar of infuriated if justified passion.

Patriotism was described by Dr. Johnson in the first edition of his Dictionary as "the last refuge of a scoundrel." We do not endorse this unconditionally, but the word is one to be watched. The common use of it to-day is perfectly ridiculous. It cannot be a national virtue; from the nature of the case it must be personal; it is the submission of the individual citizen to what is necessary to the welfare of the nation. It might have no relation whatever to any other nation on earth. But we note that Mr. Blatchford actually makes it an offence for foreigners not to love England as he does. He remarks shudderingly of certain German publicists that they hate England. If that is not a crime, what is? Yet he allows one of the regular contributors in his own paper to explain "Why he hates Germans." Then there is Mr. Bottomley, who almost uses the language of inspiration in denouncing the Kaiser and Germany for aspiring to the domination of the whole world. It is positively blasphemous on their part. But the blasphemy, after all, only lies in the selection. God has already assigned that supreme position to England. Mr. Bottomley quite agrees with the Kaiser in essentials; the difference is merely one of interpretation. But that has often been the case in the history of religious controversy.

Some people might incline to fancy that Mr. Blatchford's and Mr. Bottomley's patriotism—while sincere, passionate, disinterested, and so forth—has a good deal to do with the fact that they allowed England the honor of introducing them to the light of day. But that is a considerable element of most people's patriotism. Being born in this country rather than that decides one's speech—which is our instrument of thought, and perhaps the most important factor in our lives. It also decides several other important things, which need not be expatiated upon at present. And, after all, to love one country is better than to love none. But the Anglo-German problem lies a long way behind all that Mr. Blatchford and Mr. Bottomley have to say; and when the present war is ended by the decisive defeat of Germany, as we hope it will be, the old problem will still remain in the sympathies and antipathies, the friendships and rivalries, the co-operations and antagonisms, of two of the greatest nations of the world. The sword cannot settle that problem; nothing but reason, justice, and humanity can settle it; but their settlements are durable, they lay no foundations for the passing hour, but "build large bases for eternity."

In all probability, it appears to us, this war will approach its termination next spring. The millions of able-bodied men withdrawn from their occupations to fight and kill each other must be largely returned to the land to prepare for the next harvest. Even the Kaiser's friend, "The One Above," will hardly remove that necessity. Anyhow, the war is going on yet awhile, and the Allies, including Great Britain, should do their very best to get Germany soundly beaten by then or before. The tradition of German invincibility is rapidly melting away. Moreover, it seems, after all, that to raise human nature against you is the worst thing you can do in any war, let your army be ever so numerous, well-trained, and well-equipped. This is a phenomenon which we should like to consider closely on some future occasion.

This abominable war is a daily agony to many who do not shriek over it. They have found out, like the hero of Sartor Resartus, that there is very little use in crying over painful experiences. Danton's de l'audace, encore de l'audace, et toujours de l'audace is a better road to success in human affairs. We are glad, therefore, to note the spirit which Mr. Churchill expressed on behalf of the Government after the fall of Antwerp. But he is a clever man of the new generation, and should have done with the old-fashioned shibboleths of decadent piety. The "please God" in his peroration may have sounded well in the ears of the more ignorant and thoughtless part of his audience, but it must have jarred on the ears of the rest. It is farcical, to begin with, for Christian nations, ranged in hostile camps, to be praying to the same God for the same victory. Besides, if there be a God, everything will be as he pleases; Mr. Churchill need not trouble himself, or other people, about that. We advise him to let "God" alone—and get on with the business. "God's" attitude towards us involves his expectation of a similar attitude on our part towards him. But it is only Freethinkers who act in this way. Secularism, as Holyoake used to say, is the only religion that gives God no trouble.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

Religion and War.

I AM neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet. I am also sadly lacking in what our sapient pulpiteers call the "mystical sense"—a quality which enables some people to see sense where others only see nonsense, and to observe things that are quite hidden to others of more normal vision. These shortcomings of mine may be responsible for my inability to see traces of the strengthening of religion that, it is alleged, has taken place as one of the consequences of the War. So far as one is able to observe, and so far as religion is concerned, people are just about where they were. The non-religious remain non-religious, the professedly religious continue to "profess," and the really religious go on in their old way, with, perhaps, a little stronger religious phraseology than usual. It must be admitted that the expression "Damn the Kaiser" is now very common, and as "Damn" is a religious expletive and implies some sort of a belief in a future life, may be counted as one of the indications that religion is reviving, but it may be nothing more than an exhibition of popular imagery, or may only illustrate the readiness of the religious man to use "cuss-words" if he can do so with any semblance of propriety.

Of course, in times of war the clergy must be fussing around, just as they fuss around at any other period of excitement and national interest. It is part of their business tactics. For their first business is to, somehow or other, persuade the public that they are essential to the situation. If, for example, they were to remain quiet until the War is over, no one would seriously miss them, although many might marvel at their unusual silence. But silence would never suit them. With them, out of sight or sound would soon be out of mind. Somehow or other they must keep themselves to the front. Their task is to persuade the public that, whatever happens, Christianity must be preserved; on that hangs the hope of the world. They must find a place in the sun for religion. And it is quite likely that their own continuous buzzing is taken by the clergy as an indication of the nation's interest in them and their wares. The old fable of the fly on the wheel is of perennial value and application.

Mr. R. J. Campbell, being a thorough-going "Mystic" of the modern variety, is always ready to find evidence for religion in anything that comes along. If the world is at peace, that is proof of the power of Christian love. If the world is at war, he is equally able to see how religion braces people up to great issues, and how much stronger religion will emerge from the conflict. People, he says, are asking "What had become of Christianity amid the clash of armies and the seeming impotence of all appeals to anything but brute force." Mr. Campbell is not at all dismayed. His mystical sense reveals to him that "people's thoughts are turning to Jesus in the instructive perception that when great events are toward them the world has to reckon with Him," and that "when the struggle is over the lordship of Jesus will be more firmly established than ever over the human race." How great is the value of faith! Ordinary people, looking at the world, quite fail to observe any increased manifestations of religion. Our soldiers march along singing "Tipperary" or some other music-hall ditty, and not hymns. In the trenches they laugh and joke—and swear—instead of saying prayers. They write home for papers and magazines, and make no application for tracts. None of them complain of the scarcity of parsons—although the parsons at home say that more ought to be with them. Many hundreds of soldier's letters have been published, and in none of them is religion more than mentioned. Yet Mr. Campbell discerns them turning to Jesus with greater eagerness than ever.

One cannot argue with faith, still less so with prophecy. But Mr. Campbell ventures on more definite ground, in which he points out how religion will profit through the coming struggle.

> "Men's minds are turning to religion in a degree unprecedented in our time; they are thinking of God..... Contrast the present with the immediate past.....But a little while ago we were threatened with an industrial war on an unprecedented scale; we were told that this autumn would see us in the throes of a national strike of a magnitude hitherto undreamed of. A bitter class hatred was engendered and being sedulously fomented. .....It was a spirit of truculence, of greed, of lawlessness, of ready resort to violence.....But see what has happened now. Under the stimulus of a great national need.....all ranks and classes have coalesced.....The spokesmen of the workers are standing on the same platform with peers and Cabinet Ministers to sound the call to arms. Young men are joining the colors in tens of thousands.....I say religion has never had such an opportunity, in my lifetime at any rate."

It is true that Mr. Campbell is only here saying what thousands of others are saying, but that does not make his inability to grasp the significance of the present situation less patent. To begin with, this cessation of internal strife is not peculiar to England, or to the Allies generally. It is equally true of Germany. There, too, the strife of parties within the State has ceased in order—as they say—to unite for the defence of the Fatherland. There is nothing unusual in this; it is quite in the common run of things. Attack from without—whether the attack be sought or unsought—has always the effect of uniting classes within the State to repel it. This phenomenon is met with in savage and civilised States alike. It is fundamentally the cohesion of the group against external shock, and a society would indeed be on the verge of dissolution that failed to exhibit this characteristic. That so many of our public teachers should express surprise at this occurring, simply shows their unfitness to lead the nation.

Everyone is rightly pleased that in the presence of a grave danger from without the first energies of the nation should be given to considerations of defence. This is as it should be, and one may recognise this without stupidly hailing the War as a great opportunity for religion or for anything of a progressive character. Mr. Campbell evidently counts it to the credit of the War that it stopped threatened labor troubles. So might we all if we felt that these labor troubles would not recur. But is this likely? Has there been any real indication of the establishment of permanently cordial relations between classes or between capital and labor? Has there been any marked inclination on the part of employers to pay better wages or to remove any of the things about which the labor war was threatened? Are merchants less ready to raise prices against the public, or financiers less desirous of pursuing their usual tactics? So far as one can observe, these things remain—when circumstances permit—as they were. There is a truce in the war within in order to pursue the war without; that is all.

Mr. Campbell must remember that this is not the first time the nation has presented a united front against a threatened attack. It was seen in the post-revolutionary wars. Then, as now, "all were for the State." And with what result on internal affairs? It is a mere commonplace of history that, instead of classes being brought closer together, retrogressive ideas were enormously strengthened by it. Four years after Waterloo men, women, and children were trampled on by cavalry at Peterloo for holding a political meeting. Men were transported or imprisoned for the offence of agitating for political reform or for attempting to form trades unions. All reform agitation was labelled "sedition" because, as it was said, it brought "the existing constitution of government into hatred and contempt."

And what of the South African War? Was there not the same call to patriotism? Did not men enlist then as cheerfully as now? Did not the army of clergy say of the influence of war then exactly what Mr. Campbell is saying now? And what are the facts? Well, we had railway strikes, coal strikes, transport strikes, and other strikes threatened. Instead of the war bringing about a better state of affairs, Mr. Campbell himself complains that people have grown more lawless and a bitter class hatred has been engendered. Naturally, one does not gather grapes from thistles, and one does not pluck from war those fruits that are the outcome of peace and peaceful pursuits.

Digitized by Google

Our Christian preacher thinks that war has lifted the English people up to a higher level because it has stilled the discords of parties and of employers and employees. Well, assume that this party and class warfare were altogether a bad thing, what sort of a testimonial does it offer to the social value of religion? Consider that we are living in a society that is, and has been for centuries, permeated with Christian teaching. Mr. Campbell himself was once a keen advocate for what he called "Social Christianity." And yet the only condition on which this religion-soaked community can co-operate cordially in the work of social life is that of being called upon to deal out death to another people. No amount of pressure will make them unite on the field of religion or on that of social life. Nothing but the old brute instinct of fighting will suffice. For, on the face of it, the present unity is not wholly that of love of home. If it were it would express itself to the same extent in the absence of war. It is made up largely of hatred of others, and it is upon that feeling that Mr. Campbell is basing his plea.

But is it a good thing that political and social disputes should cease and the community satisfy itself with the uniform monotony of a hive of bees? And, if it is a good thing now, why not after the War? Or, if undesirable after the War, why not undesirable now? The reply to these queries is that the cessation of internal conflict is only desirable in the case of a temporary reversion to a lower state of things, and all war is essentially that. We revert at once to a lower state of civilisation. Put the outcome of the present War at its highest value, and it is that of the defeat of one nation bent on dominating others, or of the chance for a number of nations to pursue their own line of development unmolested. And there it ends. But the warfare that goes on within a society is altogether of a higher kind. It is mainly the strife of ideals, whether in politics, in ethics, or in sociology. It is warfare in behalf of this or that ideal of social organisation. It is the fighting instinct of man raised to a higher level—a level on which theories replace rifles and ideas great guns. Mr. Campbell's Christianity does not enable him to grasp the simple truth that the cessation of this warfare in favor of an appeal to armed force is essentially a reversion to a lower stage, however inescapable that reversion may be.

What has been said does not in the least affect the question of our justification in going to war with Germany; neither is it inconsistent with the support of a given war, once that is seen to be inevitable. When an assassin is at one's throat no one but a fool would hesitate at putting off other things in order to deal with the danger of the moment. But only a fool would argue that killing assassins led to a lifting of human life to a higher level. I am only pointing out that however justifiable war may be it is action on a lower stage of culture, and carries with it its inevitable consequences. I am only pointing out that warfare does not make a nation great, even though not to go to war may at times spell ruin. War—which is, after all, Militarism in action—inevitably strengthens the conservative and retrogressive forces of social life. Belgium was not made great by war, and even Germany is wasting, or has wasted, in war and preparations for war, those elements of real greatness that it acquired during peace. Speak of a man becoming healthy through disease, and you but repeat the fallacy involved in saying that nations become genuinely great through war. At the present time the nation is passing through an acute crisis. But we shall certainly emerge none the less quickly or less profitably for recognising its real nature.

C. COHEN.

Christian Sophistry.

THE word "peace" occurs in the Bible upwards of two hundred times, but the term "war" is scarcely less frequently met with. Jehovah was "a man of war," "the Lord of Hosts," the God of Battles, and his chosen people Israel gloried in him as such, verily believing that he was on their side and against all their enemies. When Sennacherib attacked Jerusalem, Hezekiah set captains over the people, gathered them together, and addressed them thus:—

> "Be strong and of good courage, be not afraid nor dismayed for the king of Assyria, nor for all the multitude that is with him; for there is a greater with us than with him: with him is an arm of flesh; but with us is the Lord our God to help us, and to fight our battles" (2 Chron. xxxii. 7, 8).

The historical portions of the Old Testament are mainly records of wars, and this was the reason why Treitschke loved the Book of God so much. The staggering fact, however, is that Israel, though Jehovah was its Almighty Ally, never became a predominant Power in the ancient world. In war it had as many defeats as victories, and was ultimately annihilated by the Romans.

But while the Historical Books abound in warlike annals, the Devotional and Prophetic Books give great prominence to the subject of peace. In Psalm xxix. 11 it is stated that "the Lord will bless his people with peace," while in Psalm lxxxv. 10 we are told that "righteousness and peace have kissed each other." Isaiah (ix. 6) speaks of the advent of a child whose name was "Wonderful, Counsellor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace." In the New Testament the Lord of Hosts has been renamed "the God of peace." In 2 Cor. xiii. 11 Paul exhorts his readers thus: "Be of one mind, live in peace, and the God of love and peace shall be with you." Christians maintain that Jesus Christ, the Savior of the world, is the real Prince of Peace, and that as such he is on the throne of the Universe. How often have we heard the expression, "Have faith in the all-conquering Christ who reigns supreme." Great stress is always set upon the alleged omnipotence of the Prince of Peace. Even the Kaiser is only his vassal, he being King of kings, Emperor of emperors. Such has always been the contention of Christian theology. And yet this omnipotent Prince of Peace has never succeeded in securing peace for the earth. As Professor Cramb says, "In Europe, which really governs the planet, every advance in politics or religion has been attended by war." "War," he continues, "is at the root of Roman history. The Romans are the great inventors in the art of war; they are the first scientists in war." Then comes this weighty passage:—

> "This attitude of Rome persists down to the Middle Age—though then, in the Middle Age, war receives the added glamor of religion. To Mohammed and to his Arabs in the East war is not only in itself a heroism, it is the Divine act. And in the West, similarly, in the same period, you find the Roman Papacy adopting as the very central thought of its foreign policy a great religious war—the war of the Crusades. And if at that time you do find arising in Europe the notion of the 'Truce of God,' this Truce of God becomes simply the institution of a temporary peace between the feudal chiefs and barons; it is no repudiation of war in itself" (Germany and England, p. 54).

Much has been heard of late about the "Truce of God," for which we are said to be indebted to the Church; but in reality the "Truce of God" was merely a device to prevent war from interfering with the celebration of religious festivals, such as Sunday, Advent, and Lent, and to afford protection to monks and priests. At the Council of Clermont in 1095, a weekly truce was proclaimed for all Christendom; but at this very council Pope Urban II. acted as an eloquent and passionate advocate of war. He firmly supported the fiery appeal of Peter the Hermit, and effectually called upon Christendom to undertake what was called a holy war against the Saracens of Palestine, which lasted, off and on, for two hundred years, resulting in the sacrifice of some nine million lives. No, the "Truce of God" was not a condemnation of war, but a measure to provide against the infliction of any injury upon the Church by means of war. Writing in his old age to Voltaire, Frederick the Great said:—

Digitized by Google

> "Running over the pages of history, I see that ten years never pass without a war. This intermittent fever may have moments of respite, but cease, never."

Now, is not the inference inescapable that the Prince of Peace has been, and is, a mythic dream that possesses no reality at any point? This is virtually admitted in the utterance of eminent divines. In the British Weekly for October 8, Principal Whyte, of Edinburgh, delivers himself of the following extraordinary passage:—

> "Germany, that truly great country, has allowed herself to fall so far below herself during these God-forsaken years as to make it possible for one ill-minded man, by the mere lifting of his finger, to let all this hell loose upon Christendom. Come to the word and to the testimony, and you will there find the whole truth that lies at the bottom of all this terrible time. 'Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and showeth him all the kingdoms of the world, and all the glory of them; and saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.' Only, alas, our Devil-tempted Kaiser did not have the grace to say, 'Get thee behind me, Satan.' And look at your newspapers every day for the fearful result to him and to the whole world of his covenant with Satan. The shining armor that the Devil put upon that miserable man has so dazzled his ambitious eyes that he cannot even yet see the yawning pit that the Devil has dug for him and for his domineering house. And, to all appearance, he will not humble himself, to see himself as both God and man see him, till his mailed fist has returned home on his own broken head."

We readily admit the exceeding eloquence and beauty of that extract, but we are bound to regard it as a tacit confession that the Prince of Peace is out of date. Had he really been King of Kings, the Devil would have had no chance whatever with the German Emperor. The Divine Prince of Peace would have so dominated his Imperial Majesty as to have made it impossible for Satan to get at him at all. Surely this is simple enough to be clearly seen by all sensible persons; but, alas, Christian ministers seem to be utterly blind to it. In one mood they assure us that the Lord sitteth as king for ever, that Christ is an irresistible force for good in society, and that we are living in a world redeemed by the blood of the Cross; but in another mood, confronted by powerful objections to such teaching, they aver that God does all his work through human instrumentality, that Christ, or Christianity, is only a leaven which necessarily works slowly. Jesus himself, they remind us, compared his kingdom to a mustard seed, "which is less than all seeds," and to leaven which is hidden in the meal of human nature, the tediousness and comparative ineffectiveness of whose working is characteristic of it. The feeling against war and for universal peace, with whatever check and set-back, has been growing stronger and stronger, and the result of this war will be to strengthen it still more. We are perfectly familiar with this plausible fallacy, which is resorted to merely as an excuse for what is described as the apparent failure of Christianity. The truth is that the majority of people still believe in the moral grandeur of war, and look upon it as the school of the heroic virtues. They do not wish to end it; and they laugh disdainfully at the comparatively small number of enthusiasts who dream of, and try to work for, universal peace. The love of battle is still in man's blood, nor is it going to be cast out by the present war, though the number of those who love and desire peace may be substantially increased as the result of it.

The Rev. Arthur Pringle, in an article in the Christian World for October 15, quotes these apostolic or semi-apostolic words: "We see not yet all things put under him, but we see Jesus." Upon Mr. Pringle be the responsibility of wilfully wresting this Scripture (Hebrews ii. 8, 9) to make it convey a false impression. We take it as quoted, and observe that to see Jesus, apart from his Conquest, is to behold a "phantom rising as the mists arise." The subjection of all things to Christ remains an unfulfilled prophecy because Christ himself is only a theologically constructed personality, possessing no objective reality whatever. We have seen Jesus a thousand times ourselves, and enjoyed blissful fellowship with him, but only in imagination. We have seen people go mad with joy at the vision of him; but if for any reason they stayed away from church or chapel for a couple of months they lost sight of him, and the sense of his reality weakened to such an extent that it would take them a long time to get to see him again. To the emotions, trained in religion, the Prince of Peace is altogether lovely, and people learn to love him passionately, especially those who wait on emotional ministers. But what on earth is the value of a Prince of Peace when there is no peace? He is serenely looking on while his disciples are slaughtering one another by the thousand daily in his name. He may be "a phantom of delight" to superstitious people, but a phantom for all that. We see myriads of men and women flocking every day to places of worship to intercede with a being who never takes the slightest notice. The exercise doubtless produces exceedingly agreeable sensations in many of those who engage in it; but of practical results there are, and can be, none.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Armed Peace of the Plants.

THE battle of life rages as it has ever raged since sentient things put in their first appearance on our planet. Offensive and defensive weapons have been developed in all departments of floral and faunal life. The keener the competition and the deadlier the strife, the more complex have the means become among organic forms for protection and attack. The titanic contest now proceeding between human animals on the European Continent is but an amplification and intensification of those defensive and aggressive phenomena which have enabled favored floral and faunal species to survive in Nature's ubiquitous slaughterhouse.

In one of the works of the great Russian writer, Turgeneff, a sanguine character encounters Mother Nature deeply pondering in one of her chosen retreats. He asks her to tell him why she meditates so deeply, and she raises her stone-cold eyes to his face. She then informs her human questioner that she is considering how best to furnish fleas with more powerful muscles, as they are not adequately equipped for the exacting demands of existence. The inquirer is stupefied by her answer. But what of the race of man, great Nature's most peerless product? he stammers. What are her intentions concerning the coming happiness of humanity? She gazes at him with complete indifference as she calmly replies that she is alike the begetter and destroyer of all breathing things. In her eyes, not one of them has pre-eminence over another; all are created with the certainty of ultimate extinction.

In multitudinous ways animals of every order adapt themselves more or less successfully to their surroundings. Protective and aggressive coloration, mimicry, nauseous smell, and unpalatable taste are a few only of the countless devices adopted to temper or circumvent the hostile conditions of life in which organisms find themselves cast. In the light of these phenomena, as a famous biologist says, "we can scarcely avoid the impression that the forms of life are made of a plastic material, which, like the sculptor's clay, can be kneaded at will into almost any desired form."

The foregoing reflections are strengthened by a study of the armed adaptations evolved by vegetable organisms so as to secure immunity to the devouring activities of herbivorous animals. And when one calls to mind the endless array of zoological organisms whose life is entirely dependent upon its plant food, one is almost astonished to find that the floral domain has managed so successfully to cope with its huge army of animal foes. Directly or indirectly, the whole animal world flourishes at the expense of the vegetable kingdom. Moreover, animals, whether herbivorous or carnivorous, could never have entered into being had not their advent been antedated by the appearance of plant life.

Digitized by Google

It therefore follows as a logical necessity that, had plants remained undefended against this horde of directly or indirectly destroying animal organisms, which wages a ceaseless war on the floral world, the latter, as its animal enemies multiplied, would soon have been swept from the surface of the earth. Hence we find that plants have evolved defensive devices to ward off these antagonistic influences, and many and various are the fortifications which have been erected by the flora during its struggle for its place in the sun on the continents and islands of the globe. That these botanical contrivances are truly astounding the following fully substantiated facts will prove beyond the possibility of doubt.

Various plants protect themselves from the ravages of herbivores through the secretion of poison in their leaf-sap, in roots, branches, stems, and fruits. Cattle and horses, elephants and deer, hares and rabbits, all avoid on pain of death the poisonous juices of one plant or other. The belladonna is studiously avoided by many herbivorous mammals, and the same is true of such deadly plants as the henbane, the spotted hemlock, the danewort, and various others. But the presence of poison is not a sufficient guarantee of safety, so these poisonous plants send forth a disgusting odor, which warns the grazing animals of their danger, with the result that the baleful plants are left severely alone.

There are many untoward plants, however, that have not yet evolved any warning sign to animals approaching them; at any rate, no such danger signal can be detected by the human sense of smell. Nevertheless, these plants, which include the meadow-saffron, several species of spurge and gentian, the black hellebore, and the blue aconite, are all shunned by the various forms of deer, the hares, and the marmots, while our domesticated goats, sheep, cattle, and horses rarely touch them. That this aversion is due to transmitted experience seems probable from the following circumstance, which occurred in the Rhine valley at Aar:—

> "On the rocky grass slopes of the valley, the poisonous hellebore (Helleborus viridis) grows in great abundance, and the sheep of that region, which were wont to graze on the slopes, avoided these plants. But some sheep from another part were imported into the valley, and these ate the hellebore, with the result that many died."

Even if these plants emit a warning odor, or display any other danger sign, these sheep were too inexperienced to profit by it. Everything considered, the theory of an inherited tradition of the hellebore's poisonous nature most fully accounts for the facts.

Preparations produced from many seeds are of considerable economic importance to man, but such ethereal substances in their natural state appear to afford protection to the plants against the seed-stealing proclivities of many birds. It has been proved that a sparrow which swallowed a few cummin seeds quickly succumbed. This is very significant in so omnivorous a bird. Again, numerous plants, such as ferns, mosses, and others, prove extremely bitter to the taste, and are rarely molested save in circumstances of dire necessity. Various grasses, the bilberry, the rhododendron, and other flora render themselves immune to animal attack in a similar way; while, curiously enough, plants with cup-shaped leaves, which retain dew and rain-water long after the moisture has evaporated from the majority of plants, are in this manner afforded more than a modicum of protection. Grazing animals manifest a marked preference for dry herbage, possibly because of the disease germs which lurk in damp soil and vegetation.

Of world-wide distribution are those plants that proclaim an armed peace through their display of spines and thorns. A deeply interesting description of the multitudinous devices of this form of floral armature is given by Kerner in that celebrated botanist's Natural History of Plants, a work splendidly adorned with figures and plates; and to some of these defences, so beautifully described by several eminent biologists, we venture to direct the attention of the botonically inclined.

The most casual observer must have noticed that spines and prickles appear only on those parts of the plant most vulnerable to herbivorous animals. Young plants bristle with these fortifications, as do the lower parts of those of more mature growth. "The holly, for instance," says Weismann,

> "has crenate, spinose leaves only to the height to which grazing animals can reach; beyond that the leaves are smooth-edged and spineless, like those of the camelia. It is almost the same with some wild pear-trees, which are quite covered with thorns as long as they are low, but afterwards grow a thornless crown."

The rosebush, on the other hand, as it never attains any considerable altitude, is protected throughout by thorns. In those cases in which the leaves themselves bear spinous processes, these are so arranged as to best withstand the onslaught of grazing animals. Water-snails and other organisms are the enemies of the aquatic Victoria regia, and the immense floating leaves of this plant have adapted themselves to meet this danger through the development of long spines on their under-surface, which reach a length of several inches, particularly at the upturned margin, where the molluscs might break through and steal.

In many shrubs native to the Mediterranean coast, foliage leaves are altogether absent; their functions have been usurped and their place supplied by the verdant twigs and branches, which so arm the bushes at all points that herbivorous creatures are frightened off. Among our indigenous flora, the broom furnishes an example of this mode of defence.

Where the spines stand out on the leaves themselves, there is remarkable dissimilarity in their mode of arrangement. In such tropical flora as the yucca and the aloe, as in many of our own grasses, the reed-fashioned leaf is modified into a spine. Kerner refers to a species of Southern Alpine grass, which is quite common in the district, that wounds cattle so severely that they return from their pastures in a bleeding state. The herdsmen naturally wage war on these truculent plants, and in this they are assisted by the cattle, as they uproot the noxious herbage and cast it to the ground, so that it withers away. To quote Kerner:—

> "I saw thousands of the tufts which had been rooted up by oxen, lying, dried and bleached, in the sun.....It must not be supposed that the animals accomplish this clearance deliberately; but it may indeed be admitted that they root up the patches of Mat-grass in order thus to obtain the enjoyment of the other plants growing between them, and avoid the risk in doing so of wounding their mouths."

The entire leaf-edge of many plants has been transformed into a spiny defence, as in the holly and the thistles. Others have evolved barbed hooks, which function is saw-like fashion, and some of these leaves are "made sharp by deposits of silicic acid, as in sedges, whose sharp edges are moved to and fro in the mouths of ruminants, and thus injure the mucous membrane."

The stinging hairs of the nettles are provided with an elastic base, but with easily broken rounded heads. These snap at the slightest touch, when the sharp point of the fractured hair pierces the skin of the animal that has brushed against it, and the poisonous secretions of the hair are poured into the wound. As everyone who has tenderly handled the nettle of the countryside is only too well aware, the "sting" produces a most unpleasant sensation, and may generate the nettle rash on the skin. There are tropical nettles, however, that are much more formidable than this. Several species, such as Urtica stimulata in Java, and others, bear hairs which cause diseases similar to those which follow from snake bites, and may even induce lockjaw. Needless to add, the consequences are much more serious when these pain-creating hairs become embedded in the highly sensitive mouth organs of herbivorous animals than when merely thrust into the human skin. They may therefore be regarded as a fairly successful fortification against the encroachments of grass-feeding creatures. Truly enough, "we never find our nettle patches eaten away, and even the donkey, which eats thistles freely, turns away from the stinging-nettle." But such cunningly contrived defences fail to secure these plants from their insect foes; but insect depredations are not sufficiently serious to affect the general prosperity of the nettle family.

Digitized by Google

T. F. PALMER.

(To be concluded.)

Acid Drops

Rev. R. J. Campbell appears to believe that German brutality can only be paralleled by going back before the advent of Jesus Christ. Has he never heard of the Crusades, of the Thirty Years' War, of the Expulsion of the Huguenots, of the butcheries of Alva in the Netherlands, of the awful cruelties and exterminations wrought by the Spaniards in America? We might add to the list tremendously, but these samples should be within everyone's knowledge. A large license of ignorance is allowed to the Christian preachers, but there is a limit even to their privileges in this respect. Mr. Campbell should be aware of the historic infamies just mentioned. He should also be aware that they were all perpetrated by Christians. There is no need to go back beyond the Christian era for instances of the most frightful cruelties. The history of Christianity is full of them. Pagan records are not nearly as bloody and barbarous. Mr. Campbell should be well acquainted with this fact, and if he is, he is simply indulging in a common vice of the clergy—playing on the ignorance of his hearers, and lying for the glory of Christ, and indirectly for the glory and profit of Christ's professional apostles.

People are asking, says Mr. R. J. Campbell, where is God in the present European conflict? Well, if we are to trust the Germans, and the Russians, and the British, he is right in the thick of it. All of them claim his aid, and all of them will say that they have got it. Mr. Campbell, however, asks the question from a slightly different point of view. He admits that it is useless playing fast and loose with the question of responsibility. "If God could prevent a thing happening and does not prevent it, he must be regarded as having, in a true sense, caused it.....Even if he is absolutely passive, he is causing the world-struggle by simply permitting it to go on." This is what we have often said ourselves, and we began to anticipate Mr. Campbell's answer. But having stated the question fairly enough, he says that he does not propose answering it, but by and by, when we meet Jesus face to face, "everything will be made clear." So we come back to the old religious hocus-pocus after all. It will all be cleared up in the next world. Meanwhile, we must go on believing it is all right. An excellent doctrine for fools and fanatics.

Now that St. Petersburg has been changed to Petrograd, the Continent suggests that Europe should be renamed "Abattoir."

Mr. Alexander, the one-time fellow-missioner with Dr. Torrey, says he knows of numbers of men in the British Army in France who used to indulge in rough talk, but "who now sit around, pass round a candle, and read the Word of God." Of course, we should not dream of doubting Mr. Alexander's word; but there are others who are more sceptical. And it is well that Mr. Alexander should have placed on record a fact that has escaped the notice of all the newspaper correspondents, and which the men in their letters home have forgotten to mention.

There has been a great deal of talk about the increase of religion since the War started, although none but the clergy seem to have observed it, and churches do not appear to have been overcrowded. A resident in a cathedral city writes to the Church Times in order to discover how far this is true. He asks whether church-goers have extended their attendances, have non-church-goers begun to attend, and have infrequent attendants become more frequent? He says that, judging from his own experience and from what he can gather in other parishes, the answer to these questions would be, No. He adds that if parish priests would tell the bare plain facts, they would have to admit that the alleged increase of religion is quite mythical.

The curate of a church at Earlsfield writes to the Church Times, stating that they have been compelled to close the church, except when service is proceeding, owing to the many thefts that have taken place. He says there isn't very much to steal, yet lace is stolen from the altar. New Testaments, water-bottles and tumblers, money-boxes rifled, and sometimes the boxes taken as well. It is evidently a case of watch and prey.

The Germans are partial to repeating Napoleon's sneer at England as being a nation of shopkeepers. The Prussians overlook the fact that they might be called a nation of butchers.

The hymn-books used by Christians are popularly supposed to cheer up the pious folk, and it is a curious thing that the word "blood" appears on nearly every page.

What Secularists these Christians are! Prayer is very well in the pulpit and on the platform, but when the troops are to be comforted the pious folk don't leave it to "Gawd," but send the soldiers tobacco and cigarettes.

Christians have started a National Food Fund to prepare for the lean years. Have they forgotten the eminent person who fed five thousand people with two sardines and a few bath-buns?

The most absurd restrictions are imposed by the authorities upon lecturers just at present, for they are not allowed to refer to the War, but it seems that the Bishop of London, Pastor Russell, and other creatures of the same ilk, are permitted to say what they please. The authorities know that the clergy may be trusted to bleat in chorus with the majority.

It is a curious fact that the clergy is the only body of professional men whose incomes are unaffected by the war. They have always interpreted the "lord's" prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread—with a little butter."

A writer in the Christian Commonwealth remarks that "War has certainly had a very beneficial effect on the social affairs of mankind." In support of this he instances the War of Liberation in America, and the defeat which "the tribesmen of Mahomet" met at the hands of Charles Martel, and but for which we might "be studying the pages of the Koran in our Universities." Neither illustration is very fortunate. With or without the war between North and South, slavery in America must have broken down. All economists know that it was ceasing to be profitable, and could only be made profitable by the acquisition of new territory. It was to get this that the South really threatened to secede. And it is certain that the economic and moral forces at work would have destroyed slavery in America just as they destroyed slavery in British possessions.

With regard to the defeat of the Mohammedan forces, it is quite a matter of speculation how far civilisation benefited by that. It by no means follows that had the reading of the Koran been general at our universities, the state of things would have been vitally different to what ensued from the reading of the Bible. Pretty much the same influences that have weakened the influence of the Bible and Christianity in the West, would have weakened the influence of the Koran and of Mohammedanism. And all students of Mohammedan history are aware that it was the very influence of the Christian nations that strengthened the power of the retrogressive party among the Mohammedans. Moreover, it must always be remembered that when "the tribesmen of Mahomet" conquered Egypt, instead of that proving injurious to civilisation, it led to the only civilisation worth talking about during the Middle Ages. For centuries the Mohammedans cultivated science and literature, and the arts of commerce, while they were being more or less neglected in Christendom. The two examples, as we have said, are singularly unfortunate. It is, indeed, one of the ironies of things that war seldom brings benefits that could not be acquired without it.

Rev. Dr. Len Broughton has opened a dispensary as an adjunct to Christ Church, Westminster, and says that in time he hopes to realise his ideal of a Christian hospital. We should not think that this would be a very expensive institution. All that is required is the rent. The only physic recommended in the New Testament is faith and prayer, and there should be enough of that at Christ Church. We expect that, as usual, Dr. Broughton is mixing faith and physic in his new dispensary, and we know which he would regard as indispensable.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Horatio Bottomley is getting very familiar with the Christian vocabulary. After using the name of "God" freely for some weeks, he issues a poster with the alluring title, "Hell with the Lid Off," which, by the way, is borrowed from John Burns's description of Chicago. It all sounds like the Christian child's first steps to religious knowledge.

Monsignor Barnes, a prominent Catholic, writing in the Daily Mail, says the Prussians are really Huns, and have never become Christians. This is unkind! Of course, the Kaiser's pious speeches are all concoctions, and the numerous churches in Prussia are as unsubstantial as the mansions in heaven.

In a leading article on the War in the Daily Mail entitled, "What the East End Thinks; Actual Conversation," it says, "The free librarian had just served the headmaster with The Age of Reason." We should like to know the name of that library, for Freethought works are not common in such institutions.

It is said that when Cardinal Merry del Val was a small boy his ambition was to become a tram conductor. As a man, he professes to conduct people to the gates of heaven.

That Christian gentleman, Prince Oscar, a son of the Kaiser, plays the lute. His brother, the Crown Prince, spells it "loot."

"The agnostic or the freethinker is really, unknown to himself, soaked in Christianity and Catholic ethics." This pearl of wisdom comes from Monsignor Barnes, who cannot be accused of being "soaked" in ethics. A lunatic-asylum attendant does not necessarily get "soaked" in the delusions of the patients.

"I am sending you the Bible which saved my life," writes a private soldier to his sweetheart at Godalming. He was wounded at Aisne, and the bullet went through the book and into his hip. Paine's Age of Reason, or a pack of cards, would have done as well.

Mr. Robert Blatchford's war articles in the Weekly Dispatch have been mutilated by the censor, but "Nunquam" has had his revenge by heading his communication "In the Town of Nowhere." This rather discounts his testimonial that he is "proud of the War Office," for in other and better-known towns that institution has not been inundated with unsolicited testimonials.

The Bishop of London, just returned from ten weeks amongst the troops (in a safe position, of course, and without a rifle), and addressing an audience of ladies on the old text about the meek inheriting the earth, which looks rather worn out nowadays, took a professional view of the present terrible conflict between the Christian nations of Europe. In spite of the fact that they are Christian, his Lordship asked "if the British Empire were to pass what would be the dominant religion of the world?" What is the Kaiser? A Christian. What is the religion of Germany? Christianity. We would back the Christian Churches to keep their end up, whatever happened on the European battlefields.

"I would rather die," Bishop Ingram says, "than see England become a province of the German Empire." We hope he will never have to face the alternative. But it is not the way of Church clergymen to be so particular. When the Church of England lurched to and fro between Catholicism and Protestantism under Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth, only a hundred and twenty men of God showed the slightest independence. The rest of about twelve thousand obeyed the royal orders and changed every time they were told to. The Vicar of Bray has always been a common character. Even the Bishop of London, we fancy, would discover, in the words of Molière, that "there are always accommodations with heaven."

Dean Inge is a very able man (in his way) and he loves to drop a bombshell amongst his orthodox brethren. Sunday last saw him performing this little game at Westminster Abbey. After remarking that since the beginning of August we have seen nothing in the newspapers but "triumphant and unpunished devilry," he went on to observe the change for the worse that has taken place in the rules of war in Christian practice since the days of Plato. Two thousand three hundred years ago that great Pagan philosopher laid these laws down in his Republic for the conduct of civilised warfare:—

> "Non-combatants to be spared, no houses to be burnt, no farms to be devastated, the dead to be honorably buried, no trophies of war to be placed in the temples of the gods."

That was the humane teaching of Plato. Now look at the practice of "those who dare to claim the favor of the Christian God." Their spokesman (the Kaiser, to wit) utters the following "terrible words":—

> "Cause the greatest possible amount of suffering. Leave to the non-combatants nothing but their own eyes to weep with."

What if this brutal gospel is brought to England, and Westminster Abbey is served like the Cathedral of Rheims, and Oxford like Louvain? Who knows? Christianity has not saved the world yet. That is clear enough. That it will save the world, as Dean Inge maintains, is only a prophecy, and a prophecy against the facts.

All sorts of good Christian people are looking after Tommy Atkins in the name of "charity." He would not require this charity if he were treated with justice by the Government. His women-folk are shamefully treated, but he will have a Christmas pudding (if he lives so long) and will eat it in celebration of the Birth of Christ—an event that never happened except in the imagination of the early believers—the same sort of people who recently supplied evidence of the 250,000 Russian soldiers brought from Archangel to Boulogne via England. The testimony was quite circumstantial in both cases—and perfectly false.

The Christianity of the Kaiser has now been placed beyond doubt. The Bishop of London said, during the course of a sermon at St. Paul's, that the German Emperor is in his personal life a consistent Christian, and one who seldom makes a speech without bringing in the name of God. We hardly think that British Christians will thank the Bishop for the information. They would prefer him to be held up as an Atheist masquerading as a Christian.

Canon Peter Green, of Manchester, has been recently dealing with the old question of the "problem of evil"—and with the usual results. He says that the philosophical problem may be insoluble, but the religious one is most certainly not. This is quite a reversal of the facts. There is, indeed, no philosophical problem of evil. The fact of evil in the world is of no greater philosophical significance than the existence of anything else. It is only one of many facts that call for examination. The "problem of evil" is wholly a religious question, and only arises in an attempt to harmonise the existence of God with pain and wrong. Unsophisticated human nature has generally felt that if there is a God the world should be different to what it is. If there is not, it is idle to complain. And the task of theologians in all ages has been to harmonise the existence of God with a world which is either a negation of his providence or a condemnation of his character.

Canon Green fares no better than others at this task. It is, for example, a simple demand that pain and suffering should be proportionate to desert, that the guilty should suffer—if anyone—for their own sins, and the innocent should never be punished for the guilty. This is what all social organisation aims at, and common sense and ordinary morality endorses the ideal. Canon Green says this would not be a gain. Because, "first of all, it would rule out the Cross. And then it would rule out all the heroes and martyrs of humanity, those great souls with whom self-sacrifice for others has been a passion." As the "heroes and martyrs" are only called to redress the imperfections of the "plan of creation," one would imagine that even a clergyman would recognise that a condition of affairs that rendered them unnecessary would be preferable. Sacrifice is of no use in itself, otherwise the suicide would be the equal of the martyr. No one has anything to say against the man who exhibits self-sacrifice, or who plays the part of a martyr, it is against an arrangement that makes the sacrifice necessary that criticism is directed. A mother sacrificing herself for her child is a noble sight, but a contented and happy home where such sacrifice is needless is a far better one.

Digitized by Google

Canon Green is a most audacious and illogical defender of the faith. He quotes Huxley's famous saying that if God would make him always act perfectly at the cost of making him a machine he would welcome the change. The Canon challenges that view, because "if where there is no choice there can be no sin, equally where there is no choice there can be no virtue." But what about God and the orthodox Christ? Can they also sin if they choose, and if they cannot will to do wrong, which is the generally accepted view, is it beyond them to lead virtuous lives? Canon Green's doctrine of free will is at once inconsistent with known facts, and contrary to reason.

The chief characteristic of this dignitary of the Church is his cheap dogmatism. Can you fancy a sensible man saying that "God can do everything except force a sinful man to be good"? What, then, is the meaning of the Christian salvation? As sinful men we are said to be spiritually dead; but has a dead person ever wished to become alive again? The dead have not the power of choice, and if they are ever to become alive, it must be as the result of having life infused, or forced, into them from without. Even an earthly physician does not say to the sick, "Do you wish to be made whole?" but forthwith proceeds to fight the disease with all the might of his science. But at the back of all this lies a much deeper and more fatal question—Why are there sinful men if their Creator and preserver is a good and onimpotent being? This question the Canon cannot answer.

According to Rev. H. F. Mackay, of All Saints, Margaret-street, a number of clergymen have written to their Bishop asking whether it is advisable to have any harvest thanksgivings this year. We understand that the Bishops have replied in the affirmative. They point out that the harvest has been unusually good, and no doubt see in this a special dispensation of "Providence." So the harvest thanksgivings will be as usual, and we would suggest that special mention should be made of the harvest that King Death is reaping in Northern France. That, too, is the finest for many, many years, and it is as well not to ignore any of the things with which "Providence" is favoring us.

What a hopeless muddle Christendom has got itself into at last! It no longer knows where it is or what it stands for. The War has suddenly flung it into a state of perfect topsy-turveydom. Prior to its advent we thought we knew what civilisation meant, but now nobody knows, though everybody imagines he does. The famous French savant, M. Henri Bergson, says that the Allies are fighting for civilisation and against barbarism, while the equally distinguished German philosopher, Professor Eucken, whom Dr. Horton recently pronounced the greatest thinker of the age, is equally certain that it is Germany which is defending the cause of civilisation and culture, and wrestling against barbarism. Russia, too, believes the same about herself, while Dr. Clifford and Sir Robertson Nicoll declare that Great Britain has drawn the sword for Christianity against German Atheism and Materialism. The curious thing is that the official religion of all the countries concerned, except Japan, is Christianity. What a lovely religion Christianity is, and how beautifully it unites all who profess it! Professor Eucken is a zealous Christian, and yet sneers at England, calling it "a nation of shopkeepers."

A London morning paper—Liberal in politics and illiberal in nearly everything else—drops tears of pity over the ex-Empress Eugenie, who has "for the second time seen her country invaded by the Germans." Thus is history written for the orthodox mob by the orthodox journalist. In 1870 the French crowd in Paris shouted à Berlin and the French army set out à Berlin, which they never reached, any more than the German army has reached Paris in the present war. And that "Spanish woman," as the French Freethinkers and Republicans called her, contributed more to bringing about that terrible catastrophe than any other human being except Bismarck,—who, by the way, admitted in after years that he had forged a telegram to King William that made war inevitable. The "Spanish woman" had the Emperor under her thumb; she, in turn, was in the hands of the Jesuits, who had their own quarrel with Bismarck and the Germans. She acted as their tool. She called it her war—C'est ma guerre, à moi. She said it then; let it be so now. She shall not be robbed of the honor. She sent myriads of men to death. She sowed the seeds of bitter hatred between France and Germany. A natural want of sympathy was turned into an incurable antipathy. She lives to see Nature's logic in the course of human affairs. If she is a victim, she is a victim of her own misdeeds. "Poor royal lady!" the lickspittles say; but Truth cries, with sternly pointed finger, "C'est ma guerre, à moi."

A soldier's letter was published in the News of the World, in which the writer said that "the German prisoners considered the British soldiers almost supernatural in their ability to take cover." This is not a bad tribute, and if the French Catholics have any gratitude they will put a statue in Notre Dame to "Saint Thomas Atkins."

Bishop Baynes, Chaplain to the Notts and Derby Mounted Brigade, writing in the Clarion on "What is the Duty of the Christian Citizen?" says Christ's idea of non-resistance "is a very true and very potent method when adopted with wise discretion." Unfortunately, Christians have always believed it is more blessed to give black eyes than to receive them.

Secularism is better than Christianity. Gospel temperance at Southend, backed up by Omnipotence, produced an average of eight "drunks" per week. The closing of licensed premises has reduced this number to one weekly.

At a Theosophical Meeting at Westcliff-on-Sea a speaker said the thought-form of the Germans started in 1864, crystallised in 1870, and the later results are seen to-day. A schoolboy of fourteen could have informed that lecturer that there was a Prussian army in the days of Frederick the Great, and it was a formidable body then. Mahatmas appear to be as innocent as mermaids.

An Organists' Association has been mooted in several quarters lately. If this results in a practical organisation, the dear clergy will not be able to get their music for the price of a second-hand surplice.

The generals that will try the troops on the Continent will not be the German leaders, but Generals Cholera and Typhus, who have made their appearance on the scene of war. God's tender mercies are over all his works.

It is reported that the Kaiser issued the following address to his Eastern Army:—

> "Remember who you are. The Holy Spirit has descended on me, because I am the Emperor of the Germans. I am the instrument of the Most High. I am His sword, His representative. Woe and death to those who resist my will! Woe and death to those who do not believe in my mission! Woe and death to cowards! Let all enemies of the Germans perish! God demands their destruction, God who through me commands you to fulfil His will."

On this Public Opinion remarks that the Kaiser has shown himself as "the supreme Atheist." We do not know on what ground the author of such an address can be called an Atheist—unless it is on the principle that when a man does anything you detest, give him a label that you dislike.

They rose in Freedom's rare sunrise,
Like Giants roused from wine;
And in their hearts and in their eyes
The God leaped up divine!
Their souls flashed out, naked as swords,
Unsheathed for fiery fate:
Strength went like battle with their words—
The men of 'Forty-eight.
Hurrah
For the men of 'Forty-eight.

The Kings have got their Crown again,
And blood-red revel cup;
They've bound the Titan down again,
And heaped his grave-mound up.
But still he lives, though buried 'neath
The mountain—lies in wait,
Heart-stifled heaves and tries to breathe
The breath of 'Forty eight.
Hurrah
For the men of 'Forty-eight.

—Gerald Massey.

He put a penny in the plate
Each Sunday did this man,
To buy a mansion in the skies
On the instalment plan!

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £218 13s. 3d. Received since:—G. Britton, 2s.; A. H. Smith, 4s. 6d.; H. T. C., £1 1s.

WELSH RATIONALIST.—We have been saying the same thing ever since the War broke out. Christians are capable of anything as controversialists, and most things as propagandists and defenders of their faith. Nothing could be meaner or more fraudulent than their pretence that Atheism is responsible for German despotism and the infamous cruelty with which it has treated Belgium. They have been shown again and again that they are wrong, and it is obvious that the Kaiser and his friends are a queer set of Atheists; but they are used to telling every lie that suits, and while it suits, and in spite of correction, no retraction will ever be made. Lying for the glory of God is the most ancient of Christian virtues. Lying for the advantage of the Church comes close on its heels.

CHRISTIAN PATRIOT.—We don't publish our "charities," but we have published the fact that we have given nothing to the Prince of Wales's Fund. We have also given some, but not all, of the reasons for our policy. On the other hand, we have not got our name advertised in the papers as a subscriber to a "Public Distress" fund and then made up for it (and more) by rearranging our business establishment—all at the cost of the employees, who should be the last and not the first to suffer from a national calamity. We don't know what we may be driven to in the end, if this war drags out a miserable old age, and dies eventually of inanition; but up to the present no one in our employ receives a penny less wages than he did before the war. You see there is patriotism and patriotism—and we prefer our own.

J. C.—The Freethinker has always avoided politics as politics, and devoted itself to Freethought in relation to philosophy and ethics. It is no part of our business to praise or blame Mr. Asquith, Sir Edward Grey, or other members of the Cabinet as politicians. We have said that England was forced into this war by Germany; and now we are in it we must make the best of it, and let the Kaiser know the real value of "General French's contemptible little Army." That goes without saying. But anybody who wants us to howl the patriotism of the Yellow Press, or the naive and pathetic patriotism of Mr. Blatchford and Mr. Bottomley, will be disappointed. We simply cannot regard every Englishman as a hero and a saint, and every German as a ruffian and a blackguard. If the world were built on that simple plan, all political and social questions would soon be settled. It is the childish theory of the sheep and goats over again. At the same time, we hate cruelty—especially personal, gratuitous, deliberate cruelty—with every drop of blood we possess, and we are filled with disgust at the brutal wickedness which the Germans have imported into this contest. We look upon the Kaiser as a criminal lunatic. We have said all this before; what is the use of going on saying it? Our special task is to fight Christianity, and if we don't show from recent and passing events what an utter failure it is in its boasted mission of bringing peace and goodwill on earth; if we don't do it, who will? Bear in mind, however, that matters are mixed in actual fact, and that it is impossible to deal with religion without referring occasionally to other subjects with which it happens to be associated. You will appreciate our policy better if you go on reading the paper, which you say you like already.

A. B. Moss.—Pleased to see you are to preside at the Bradlaugh Fellowship Dinner at the Boulogne Restaurant, Gerard-street, W., on Wednesday, October 28. We note that the tickets are 2s. each.

E. B.—Thanks for welcome cuttings.

G. S.—We had to do a little shortening.

H. BLACK.—We have not heard anything about Freethought lecturing at Manchester this winter.

C. W. MARSHALL.—Thanks for the cutting, but the Kaiser and the Bishop of London are both getting bores.

D. GRANT.—The new-premises trouble is still before us. Alas!

E. S.—Glad you have read the Freethinker for twenty-seven years, think it the brainiest paper published, and hope it will go on at least another twenty-seven years. Not under the present editor, though, for goodness sake.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Presentation to W. J. Ramsey.

AN interesting and pathetic ceremony took place at the Borough of Shoreditch Radical Club on Wednesday, Oct. 14, during a "Social Party" of the Bradlaugh Fellowship. This was the presentation of a sum of nearly £70 to W. J. Ramsey, subscribed and collected by his comrades and friends in the Secularist, club, and political movements. B. T. Hall, secretary of the Club and Institute Union, occupied the chair, and opened the proceedings in a brief speech of singular force and felicity. He was followed by George Standring, Arthur B. Moss, Edith M. Vance, and E. Garrity, all of whom dwelt upon various phases of Ramsey's work for progress during half-a-century. When the presentation had been made, "Bill" (as everybody called him) returned thanks in a very affecting little speech. He declared that while his brain continued to be unaffected he should always remain a Secularist; if he became an idiot he might also become a Christian; but in any case he asked his friends to remember him as he had been for fifty years, a willing worker in the cause of human progress and freedom. While he lived he would do what he could for the good old cause.

G. S.

THE INFINITE UNIVERSE.

Revolving worlds, revolving systems, yea,
Revolving firmaments, nor there we end:
Systems of firmaments revolving, send
Our thoughts across the Infinite astray,
Gasping and lost, and terrified, the day
Of life, the goodly interests of home
Shrivelled to nothing; that unbounded dome
Pealing still on, in blind futility.
No rest is there for our souls' winged feet,
She must return for shelter to her ark—
The body, fair, frail, death-born incomplete,
And let her bring this truth back from the dark,
Life is self-centred, man is nature's god;
Space, time, are but the walls of his abode.

—William Bell Scott.

BELGIUM, 1914.

Oh, Thou art pitiless! They call Thee Light,
Law, Justice, Love; but Thou art pitiless.
What thing of earth is precious in thy sight,
But weary waiting on and soul's distress?
When dost Thou come with glorious hands to bless
Tho good man that dies cold for lack of Thee?
When bringst Thou garlands for our happiness?
Whom dost Thou send but Death to set us free?
Blood runs like wine—foul spirits sit and rule—
The weak are crushed in every street and lane—
He who is generous becomes the fool
Of all the world, and gives his life in vain.
Wert Thou as good as Thou art beautiful,
Thou couldst not bear to look upon such pain.

—ROBERT BUCHANAN.

SCRAP-IRONIES FROM INGERSOLL.

A man said to me the other day, "I am a Unitarian Universalist." "What do you mean by that?" said I. "Well," said he, "the Unitarian thinks he is too good to be damned, and the Universalist thinks God is too good to damn him; and I believe them both."

When a thing gets too idiotic to be preached in the pulpit, it is handed down to the Sunday-school superintendent and taught to the children. When it is too absurd for the children we give it to the missionaries, or send it down south for the colored brethren.

Nothing is so prolific, nothing can lay or hatch so many eggs as a good, healthy, religious lie.

I once happened to be in the company of some Baptist elders, and they wanted to know what I thought of baptism. I answered that I had not given the matter any attention. But they pressed me, and finally I told them that I thought, with soap, baptism was a good thing.

The Church has reduced Spain to a guitar, Italy to a hand-organ, and Ireland to exile.

Many people think they have got religion when they are troubled with dyspepsia. If there could be found an absolute specific for that disease, it would be the hardest blow the Church has received.

Digitized by Google

Beneath the Silent Stars.

IT is now near the "witching hour" of midnight, September 13-14, 1914. I am writing this in a large astronomical observatory high on the summit of this mountain in the mighty Sierra Madre range in Southern California, that terrestrial paradise of fruit and flowers. I have been looking nearly all of the evening in the great 16-inch Alvan Clark and Sons magnificent telescope, at the Galaxy. As I now write, I turn my eyes toward the south and behold this supernal band and belt of stars. It is standing in majestic splendor above the Pacific Ocean. Its shimmer and sheen, its display of stars, adorn the Goddess of the Night in regal robes of cloth and pearl. And she drags the careless garments in the distant southern waves. So clear is the air that the stellar millions swing low and grace the sea by rotary motion of the earth. There are now known to be at least one billion suns in the Milky Way. I have been sweeping the lenses of the huge telescope from right to left, left to right, for hours. I have seen many millions of stars, each a giant sun, pass in review. Diamonds, by literal millions, have been seen in the blackness of the sky. And millions are rising over mighty peaks in the east; and more millions are vanishing in watery wastes in the remote west. A hundred sentinel peaks are standing around and about observatory peak; while deep canyons yawn on either side of the building. The great white dawn indeed contrasts with the utter blackness of the canyon's mouths and deep abysses—blacker than Egyptian night. And the stillness, silence, and absolute solitude, always on a summit at midnight, is so intense, so overpowering of all ordinary things, that the imagination goes racing, and one can almost imagine that he hears the very axis of the earth in its majestic turning. And it is here in this inconceivably majestic presence that I write my books. Peace, sweet peace, is always here. I look at the stars, and then upon our local wheeling planets. I have just been looking at a transit of a satellite of Jupiter. Soon Saturn will rise, when I must explore its giant rings and its system of ten moons. And thus I have looked and watched the stars by night during forty-four years, and studied their mathematical laws by day. Every motion of every moon, planet, and sun is governed by ironclad, mathematical laws. Every law has been proved over and over again by the most profound mathematicians, down to the minutest detail. And the laws of the spectroscope in analysis of the chemical elements of the stars are known. And all laws agree—so that the whole number now known—more than six hundred supernal laws of Nature have been discovered—fit together into a grand harmonic system. The chief work of the mind of man is their discovery. Then these men, all master mathematicians, strive to learn more of the simply amazing law-maker, the inconceivably mighty mathematical mind behind all of the sidereal universe, behind every motion from electrons to suns. Every effort is made by terrific concentration of mind in study of mathematics during ten, twelve, fourteen, eighteen and, at times, to twenty hours daily, to find more equations, more differentials, more splendid integrals, and more astonishing facts. These are they who know, admire, and stand in the true majesty of man, finite mathematician before infinite mathematician. Not one worships the Master Mind. It is too ridiculously absurd.

Every mathematician studies a mental process totally opposite to "worship." No mathematical researcher crawls along on his knees, or stomach, praying and worshiping; he rises, stands erect as a man, and with the mighty calculus in his hand, explores the infinite mind in search of more laws. With a horror beyond description one of these men of the master mind would look upon the murder of an animal, look upon its running blood; and then at the smoke of its burning flesh as a "sweet smelling savor unto the Lord." That kind of a god or lord has no attractions for a real student of the Laws of Nature. Yet every religion (there are 1,024) is based in running blood, in hideous sacrifice.

Mentalists so well know each minute fraction of the total cause, that all is to them as clear as day. Two great fundamental causes exist, but these two have innumerable phases and branches. First, the original mark of the beast in man, fighting beast. Second, the appalling book commonly called the Hebrew Bible. But it was not written by Hebrews, but by priests in cities now buried in Arabia, all along the west bank of the Euphrates. Some are from twenty to thirty feet deep at present beneath river deposits. The writers were blood-soaked priests, totally ignorant of even one law of nature. These bloody sacrificers wrote the ritual of the book of blood—the Bible. I went to a fascinating lecture on Mesopotamian Archæology. Hundreds of pictures were shown on screens of excavated temples from sites of Nineveh, Babylon, and other cities of greater antiquity. In all cases of exhumed temples, there stood the hideous altars; places for cutting throats of animals, places for the blood to run, and places for fire. Same old bloody story from as far back as seven thousand years from now. One of the sickening facts revealed by excavation of vast temples of antiquity is the sculptures on the great buildings. Thus, grand buildings are everywhere marred by sculptures in marble of hideous hawk and serpent-headed gods; and gods with heads of birds, dogs, bulls, and apes. They mummified the Apis bulls in Egypt, and crocodiles, with cats and hawks.

Our river of sacrificial blood has steadily flowed from remote prehistoric times, and is still flowing: for animals are now being sacrificed in India, as I write here at midnight. Europe and America are at this minute dominated by horrible Asiatic books, breathing murder, war, and sacrifice. The horrible Hebrew-fighting god Jehovah, is the model for the Krupp cannon-makers, and for those monsters posing as human who order them to be turned upon other humans. Their text-book was written by men in an age when captured kings had their eyes gouged out by the hand of the king making the capture. The exhumed temples show the conquering king in the act of gouging with spears held in his own hand. Any other job would, naturally, be performed by slaves.

This dreadful book is still pouring its blood into modern times. It is one direct cause of the present war in Europe. Fighting, murdering gods, who sent out lying prophets, of course, require fighting, blood-drinking kings. The men responsible for the existing war in Europe are assassins of human welfare and civilisation.

The man able to control his emotions, and not allow one tear to fall when kissing his little girl good-bye, to meet death in war for his king, is ranked as the highest type of patriot by king and priest-ridden Europe. But actually the king is this man's arch-enemy. To serve blood-drinking monarchs is an insult to all that is good in humanity. Every monarch is not the protector and friend of a man suffering in the army, but an enemy. To be a patriot is to be taken away from family to drill for war. To drill is to be subjected to horrid, foul-mouthed oaths and vile abuse of brutal officers. The tiresome marches, drill, drill of body and the crushing of mind, self-respect, down into a slave-like being, is the military fact of fighting monarchies. The horrors of drills to men and horses are the curse of Europe.

The Armageddon is here all right, and the new dispensation—almost. Modern men are about to dispense with their arch-enemies—kings and priests. And advanced man is on the eve of dispensing with religion for all time. My wondrous series of letters from many parts of the world show that men are making ready to wipe out religion and substitute two things: morality and study, and the teaching everywhere the Laws of Nature. Within fifty years all men and women will stop teaching stuff they know to be false, to their own children. This to-day is a curse beyond compare, lying to children, as bad as the making of women slaves, and their buying and selling into horrible, hated marriages. The day free from rule of putrid Asiatic and savage laws is beginning to dawn. This is the new dispensation. Let man now rise and destroy every arsenal and gun factory on earth. And melt up the metal in every battleship, for soon we will run out of iron, and have no more dynamos, motors, and electric machinery of any kind; for iron alone is magnetic, and it alone can be used to build the precious dynamo. Without iron, telegraphs and 'phones, electric lights and railways must go. And the mad dogs sink thousands of tons of man's most valuable metallic possession to the bottom of the sea in naval battles. Insane suicide is the order in Europe now. So well known are the workings of mind that a skilled mentalist can almost follow the very thoughts in the paranoic brain of a bloody king. The laws of that terrible disease, paranoia, have been explored in detail, and it is now known that the present war is directly due to paranoia induced by the Bible. Now that all those who think are disgusted with prayers of kings to their gods to give victory to their side—by wholesale murder of others—the time is ripe for final annihilation of all traces of religion from this planet.

Digitized by Google

And then I went up to a moving picture show and saw Russian priests pouring out hideous blessings upon thousands of men, arranged in regiments. When full of blessing, they took trains that hurried to the battle-field, to be torn to pieces by machinery. And had Jehovah been there he would doubtless have blessed the priests. Yes, kings can slay ten million men—thus committing the chief crime in human history—and then the red, crimson, black, and jet-black stain of crime can at once be made a little whiter than wool by mediators between Jehovah and man by "hired priests." And this terrific doctrine is under full sway here in the twentieth century, a century of science, and in the majestic presence of proven mathematical law. Go to, now; exterminate religion from this blood-soaked world; substitute rigid laws of nature, each shown to be true, and then obey them at any cost. For science demonstrates that a broken law carries its own consequences, without hope of escape.

> "Paris, September 2, Midnight.—The text of the proclamation, issued by the Minister of the Interior, is as follows:—
>
> "Frenchmen: For several days our heroic troops have been engaged in fierce combat with the enemy. The courage of our soldiers has won for them several marked advantages, but in the north the pressure of the German forces compelled us to retreat. This situation forces the President of the Republic and the Government to this sad decision. In order to safeguard the national interests, the duty of the public power is to go away from Paris for the moment. Under the command of its eminent chief the French army, full of courage and spirit, will defend against the invader the capital and its patriotic population.
>
> "But the war must be pursued at the same time on the rest of French territory.
>
> "The sacred struggle for the honor of the nation and the reparation of violated rights will continue without peace or truce, without a stop or a failure. None of our armies has been broken.
>
> "If some of them have suffered only too evident losses, the gaps in the ranks have been filled up immediately from the waiting reserve forces, while the calling out of a new class of recruits brings us to-morrow new resources in men and energy.
>
> "Endure, fight, such should be the motto of the allied armies, English, Belgians, Russians, and French.
>
> "Endure, fight, while on the sea our allies aid us to cut our enemy's communications with the world.
>
> "Endure, fight, while the Russians continue to carry a decisive blow to the heart of the German Empire.
>
> "It is for the Government of this Republic to direct this resistance to the very end.....
>
> "Frenchmen, all be worthy of these tragic circumstances. We will win final victory. We will obtain it by our unrelenting will, by our endurance, by our tenacity. The nation which does not desire to perish and which does not retreat before suffering or sacrifice is sure to conquer."

The Magna Charta in England and the Declaration of Independence in America, as great as they are, do not quite equal this majestic proclamation of the French minister. It does not contain the blood-distilled word "god." I have no words to express the majesty of this thing, this master production of the French statesman. After a hundred centuries of constant use of the word god in declarations of war by kings, and by priests, at the instant of hurling millions of men at each other's throats, here on September 2, 1914, the minister of a nation at time of removal of the Government from the capital, in distress, does not call on any god. So great is this event, that it marks the beginning of the end of religion. No tongue or pen can now hope to describe in centuries to come the far-reaching effect of this precious proclamation of the minister of France. No hideous cross or icon is mentioned. No flowing blood of a slain god, no putrid hypocrisy, no senseless mummery of long stereotyped words and formulæ of priests, no deadly superstition of the past, appears in this ever-to-be historic document. The attention of the reader is specially called, thus: a great, highly cultured nation, a great and beautiful city filled with magnificent works of science and art, with exquisite scientific instruments, telescopes, microscopes, spectroscopes, paintings, sculptures, inscriptions, all, everything that is in harmony with the Mind of the Universe, is threatened with destruction. The civilisation of centuries was on the eve of annihilation—the Government threatened, and slavery of all who survived murder, apparent. It is worthy of all admiration now and for all time to come, of all, that the minister of the threatened nation did not call on any god. He called on brave men.

This document is new in human history. Each word ought to be engraved on a stone slab; and this put into a fire and deluge-proof building, for future generations of liberated and free human beings. This priceless proclamation is a turning point in the entire career of man, the opening of an age of science and of the reign of nature's inexpressibly magnificent laws, pure and true; that is, the men of England will be killed off, and the women can just take the ballot and vote. Mentalists have known for years that this Armageddon ushering in a new dispensation—minus kings and priests—was coming. They knew mental laws, and were aware that the war must come. See this: We have Asiatic books, filled from lid to lid with ambiguities. Councils of the learned have often met to decide what the verses mean. Thousands of scholars have tried their hands in attempted explanation and have failed. Of course they failed to harmonise ravings of paranoiacs in writings that are directly opposite. Yet they pay out millions of dollars to send these useless, ambiguous productions that they do not understand to the heathen. And this starts up quarrels and disputations among them. The United States Government should rise to protect its own people, and prohibit another cent being sent out of this country for the purpose of carrying religion to any person whomsoever. Not one cent for outside religion—but millions for children's true science-schools here, and thousands of hospitals. Take care of our own little harassed and neglected slave-children, and let the heathen be free of theology. This is surely due to the fact that missionaries do not want the Chinese and Hindus in this country, but want to circulate around with them in heaven.

Now, this is a solemn and impressive moment—it is midnight here on this peak; and by curious laws of pure mountain air perspective, the glittering stars appear to be near—that is, the summit seems to be standing amid stars. No pen can write words of description of my beautiful and peaceful surroundings. It does appear impossible that men should fight in this beautiful world. Here is a midnight message from out the solitude and silence of a mountain far and away from all cities and struggling humans. If it must be that men must die to bring great reforms to mankind, then the death of each French soldier dying under this proclamation of the minister of his nation is of the highest value to this and all generations so long as man shall inhabit the earth.

Digitized by Google

PROF. EDGAR L. LARKIN.

—Truthseeker (New York).

Who Saw Him Fly?

IT is alleged by Christians that a few days after the resurrection Jesus ascended bodily into heaven. But where is Heaven?—with a capital H, if you please. Nobody knows. All Christians are agreed, however, that it is somewhere "up above." But where? When I was a boy I witnessed what was then considered a very extraordinary performance. I saw a "flying man." He did not go up in a machine like the modern aeroplane; he had a special patent of his own. He manufactured a machine with wings, raised himself by the aid of a balloon, and, all of a sudden, cut himself free and flew for a minute or two in the air; when, one of the wings failing to act, he was precipitated headlong to the earth beneath and carried away a mangled and bleeding corpse.

I assert that I saw him fly, and thousands of people from all parts of London witnessed the spectacle. I have, in recent years, seen many airmen flying around London and at the seaside, but sometimes the most skilful of them come a "cropper," as the saying goes. Flying Jesus was the only man who ever flew up and never came down again. He must have gone up and up through infinite space. If Jesus ascended into heaven his ascent must have been witnessed by thousands of spectators. Yet who saw him fly? "Profane" historians are silent about an occurrence which, if it happened, was one of the most extraordinary in all history. Why do they not mention it? Because it never took place. The story is pure fiction. A mere glance at the evidence produced by the Gospels will suffice to show that neither Matthew, Mark, Luke, nor John was an eyewitness of the ascension. Indeed, Matthew says nothing about it. John is also silent, while Mark and Luke merely declare that, when Jesus had finished talking to his disciples, he was received up into heaven and sat on the right hand of God.

Now, if any of the evangelists had witnessed so important an event as the ascension, is it likely that they would have recorded it in a narrative of two or three lines? Moreover, if the miracle had really occurred, one would think that the testimony of thousands of independent witnesses would be forthcoming. Yet no such evidence is adduced. Most of the evidence we have for the extraordinary occurrences recorded in the Gospels is merely hearsay evidence—it is like the evidence that was adduced for the mythical Russian troops that passed from the north of Scotland to the south coast by train and then on to France—in every case somebody knew somebody who knew a friend who saw these Russians in a train with the blinds drawn down so that they could not be seen. That is the kind of evidence that Christians think is good enough to convince unbelievers that Jesus arose from the dead and ascended into heaven. If Jesus ascended, where did he go? Was he, in the flesh, able to defy the law of gravitation? Could he breathe in the attenuated atmosphere above the clouds? Did he shoot off in the direction of the nearest fixed star? And how long was he likely to travel before he reached his destination? The theologians have an easy method of dodging these difficulties. That eminent German divine, Dr. Bernhard Weiss, in his Life of Christ, vol. iii., ch. ix., says:—

> "Although he [Christ] showed himself to the disciples in a form palpable to the senses, the risen one had not a material body which could only have been lifted up by the destruction of gravitation; his glorified body was, from the first, removed beyond the conditions of earthly life. The celestial world, whose order of life Jesus adopted when he arose from the dead, is, according to the nature of things, exempt from the limiting conditions of earth."

Very ingenious indeed! But we should like to know how Dr. Weiss found all this out. Had he private sources of information on the subject. Perhaps, however, in these days of international strife, English Christians would not accept Dr. Weiss as an authority on the subject—but can they find a better?

The Freethinkers' explanation is not so ingenious, but it is more straightforward. It is easy to understand how, years after Jesus—assuming such a person ever lived—had died and his ashes had mingled with the dust, his followers invented the story of his resurrection and ascension; how, expecting and desiring a Messiah who would save them from the Roman yoke, the early Jewish Christians manufactured these legends of a risen and ascended redeemer, who was soon to return and restore the kingdom of Israel. When it is further remembered that the world was already familiar with the legends of the sun-gods, who rose again from the death of winter to midsummer glory, it will be seen how easily the ignorant masses could be persuaded to exchange Osiris or Adonis for the glorified Savior—Jesus of Nazareth.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The German Professor.

THE German Professor's
The mildest of men;
He sits scribbling all day
In his stuffy book-den.

To his masters, no man's
More submissive than he;
What they order, he straightway
Performeth with glee.

Yet this mild Pedagogue
Who dares none to withstand,
Quite out-Herod's Herod
When he takes pen in hand.

A good patriot, he
Seas of lager will drink;
For his country he'll shed
The last drop of his ink.

He'll conclusively prove
That the great German race
In battle array
Can the Universe face.

For his country save force
There's no conscience or law;
Such things were contrived
Other nations to awe.

The Superman's State
Need no treaties respect;
And all scruples of honor
Should promptly reject.

What are honor and justice?
Names—nothing more;
When they stand in our way,
We must show them the door.

When you want to get there
You must hack your way through,
And behave like a run-a-muck
Drunken Yahoo.

"Frightful examples"
You must make as you go,
And more freely than water
Cause bloodshed to flow.

The buccaneer's ethics
Your ethics must be;
Necessity still
Will suffice for your plea.

In short, these mild Germans
Who reason so well,
Would make the world German,
Or make it a hell!

B. D.

Digitized by Google

Salvation Soap.

There was a priest, and he was mad;
He told all men, however bad,
That he could make them pure and good
By means of certain human blood,
That formed a soap which, strange to say,
Would wash all faults and crimes away
From guilty men, whilst those who fell
Unsoaped with it went straight to hell.
All who used it would, he said,
Live merrily when they were dead,
And wings would sprout, and they should fly
To sweep the cobwebs off the sky.
And if they tired of this, then they Should lounge on golden thrones all day,
Or strut about with lyres and crowns
And crimson robes and snow-white gowns.
Thus they should be, however vile,
Prime mashers in the heavenly style.
But they should wake where serpents hiss
If they used any soap but this.
Gulped down in pills, however crude,
'Twould serve as physic or as food.
One cake alone, if swallowed whole,
Cleansed Bill Sikes' coat or Borgia's soul.
For none but his was genuine;
All other soaps but deepened sin.
'Twas guaranteed by king and pope
As far surpassing Pears's soap.
E'en Lily Langtry's puffs were nought
To those that he received unsought.
More foolish was the written stuff
Than Cleaver's silly punning puff.
Use this soap once, and straight, one swore,
On heaven's fair strand you're "washed ashore."
Guiteau deposed that, for his part,
It cleansed the cockles of his heart;
For in its cakes he saw full well
The Oily One of Israel.
Peace, too, proclaimed its virtues oft
Amidst well-lathered saints aloft;
It soaped his conscience reconciled,
Made innocent as any child.
Thus martyrs many blessed that soap
That greased their path from the long rope
To heavenly washhouses where they
With blood-soap washed three times a day
Till made resplendent as the sun
In moral beauty every one.
Never such a boon was known
As this new soap that stood alone.
One trial bleached the blackest skins;
Much more, it cleansed all petty sins.
It washed the tongue of fibs and libel;
'Twas guaranteed so in the Bible.
Its precious cakes were bread and wine,
Its wafers flesh and blood divine;
'Twas Elixir of Life, indeed;
'Twas everything that man could need.
'Twas Heavenly Salve, Salvation Squills,
And Sinner's Soap, and Last Day Pills.
All these in one—'twas patented
To heal the quick and raise the dead.
Without it all would go to pot,
For such was all men's (s)'oapless lot.
Thus impudent old Soapy roams
And pesters women in their homes,
And works their feelings up to buying
By threats of swift and awful dying,
Mingled with dabs of his soft soap,
As samples of the greater hope.
'Twas vaunted with so bold an air,
It sold like wildfire everywhere.
And wise men wondered what could be
This patent blood-soap stamped J. C.,
With which the priest went up and down
The streets of that deluded town,
Till soap and sinners duly sold
Had filled his pockets full of gold;
Which made some doubt, 'tis fair to add,
Whether that priest was really mad,
Or only artful, like the cheat
Who swindles clowns in every street.

W. P. Ball.

How is it? Is man only a mistake of God? Or is God only a mistake of man?—Nietzsche.

The Dead Soldier.

Calm be thy slumbers, my soldier-boy sleeping,
Thy pillow of earth be as yielding as wool;
Thou art safe in the harbor, the Lord thy soul keeping,
And the flow of God's tears laves the gash in thy skull.

Thy soul in the cool of the eve is reclining,
By odorous trees in the groves of the Lord;
And thy poor, battered body the furrow is lining
With the scarlet that oozes from wound torn and gored.

They prayed in the homeland for God's good protection,
Thy mother, thy sweetheart, for their boy at the war;
"If it please thee, good Lord," was their hearts' sad porrection
That trailed after the prayer like the tail of a star.

If it please thee, good Lord! And thy corpse is the answer!
Thou hast gone through the gates to be passed by us all;
Thou hast died by the point of some fury-sped lancer,
And we—we may die by a germ or a fall.

Bellona is rampant, her harvest is reaping:
The hosts of the slain cover valley and hill;
And the God of the fireside in hiding goes creeping,
The God of the world is the God that can kill!

With the thunder of doomsday, thy flesh will awaken,
Thou corpse, poor corpse, stretched out stiffened and cold;
To the bosom of God will thy body be taken
And—thy blood will spurt out as his claws thee enfold.

James L. Raymond.

ANOTHER EXPLANATION OF JONAH.

Everybody knows the Rationalist's interpretation of the Jonah story as that of the prophet putting up for three nights at a pub with the sign of the whale, and being eventually kicked out. Another interpretation, and one more in accordance with the thoughts of the early makers of myths, is suggested in Ignaz Goldziher's Mythology among the Hebrews. Goldziher says, "When in ancient times men, dwelling by the seashore, saw the heavenly fire-ball in the evening dip into the sea, and the next morning issue shining at the opposite point of the sea-line, what other idea could he conceive of this but that down in the sea the sun was swallowed by a monster, which spat out its prey again on the shore?" Isaiah says that Jahveh shall punish Leviathan and slay the dragon that is in the sea (xxvii. 1); and, Didst thou not kill the monster (rahabli) and wound the dragon (tannin)? This is the old combat of Bel and Tanit, or Bel and the Dragon, which we still have on our crown pieces as St. George and the Dragon (the victory of Light over Darkness), what I may venture to call the primæval myth. Goldziher says, "The most prominent mythical characteristic of the story of Jonah is his celebrated abode in the sea in the belly of the whale. This trait is eminently solar, and belongs to the group on which we are now engaged. As, on occasion of the storm, the storm-dragon or the storm-serpent swallows the sun; so when he sets he is swallowed by a mighty fish, waiting for him at the bottom of the sea. Then, when he appears again on the horizon, he is spit out on the shore by the sea-monster."—Lucianus.

"I shall be happy to answer the questions of anyone with religious difficulties," said the sky-pilot at the close of an al fresco discourse in Hawick Market-place. There appeared to be but one perplexed mind among the listeners, a gentleman of well-known sporting proclivities. He said: "I should like to ask by what means Samson caught the three hundred foxes whose tails he tied together, and sent them adrift among the Philistines' corn, when it took the Duke o' Buccleuch's hounds a haill day to catch ane?" The sky-pilot wilted. He either could not or would not answer, but simply said, "Let us pray!"

A clergyman, who recently called upon a young widow to condole with her upon the loss of her husband, placed considerable emphasis upon the proposition that the separation was merely temporal, and painted in vivid colors the happiness of friends reunited after death. When he stopped for breath, the sorrowing one heaved a deep sigh, and quietly remarked: "Well, I suppose his first wife has got him again, then."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

OUTDOOR.

EDMONTON BRANCH N. S. S. (Edmonton Green): 3, J. W. Marshall, a Lecture.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Parliament Hill): 3.30, a Lecture.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, R. H. Rosetti, "Christianity in a Funk."

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Miss E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1891. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6½ ins. by 8½ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be base on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LETTERS OF A CHINAMAN ON THE MISCHIEF OF MISSIONARIES. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d, postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d. parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 44 SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

The paradox and scandal of the world is that for eighteen centuries, since the adoption by the Continent of Christianity, European history has been a tale of blood. To resolve that paradox, to abate that scandal, to substitute concert for conflict, and to teach mankind to grow great in common, is the international future of civilisation.—HON. GEORGE PEEL.

The Churches and the War.

SIR ROBERTSON NICOLL, editor of the British Weekly, purposes dealing in a series of articles with "the Christian message to a nation at war." We should have thought that message—or messages—was plain. For, in truth, both in the Bible and out of the Bible, there are two messages. There is the exhortation to war, with its pictures of defeated peoples and ravishing armies, and there is the gospel of non-resistance, of turning one cheek when the other is smitten, with its promise of the earth to the meek as a reward for their meekness. And to do the pulpit justice, it has reflected very faithfully these two and hopelessly irreconcilable views. It has preached peace and encouraged war. It has denounced warfare as unchristian and acted energetically as a recruiting agent. It has talked at large of the overmastering power of Christian love and supported the theory that the only way to maintain peace is to have an Army and Navy so powerful that no other Christian nation dare attack it. No one can say that the nation has been short of messages from the Churches. It might have been better had there been legitimate ground for complaint in this direction.

There is no information in Sir Robertson's opening article on one point worthy of a little attention. That is, to supply some test by which we may tell what is the genuine Christian message to a nation in time of war. If we listen to the message of the Society of Friends, the answer is that war at all times and under all conditions is wrong, and no real Christian will engage in it. Sir Robertson does notice this position, and I will deal with his comment later. If, on the other side, we are to take the English State Church, then the message is that every war in which England has been engaged was a just one. For, so far as I am aware, the English Church supported all our wars without discrimination. Still more important is it to know whether the Christian message as delivered in Germany or that delivered in England is the authoritative one. Apparently, German theologians are united in the belief that their war is a thoroughly just one, and, therefore, they may be sure that God is on their side. English theologians are quite united in the belief that all the righteousness is on our side, and that God will assist us to smash our enemies.

So far, good; only one is, from the religious point of view, apt to get a little confused. So far as laymen in this country are concerned, we are all agreed that the sooner and the more effectively German militarism is broken the better. And if that serves as a prelude to the break-up of all other militarisms, most of us would be the more pleased. But the layman has to make up his mind on the facts before him, and in the light of experience. Presumably, as the "Christian message" is given a place by itself, it has a message—if only one can discover it—of a peculiarly distinctive kind. The worst of it is that, up to the present, Christians are not agreed as to what it is. And one fears that, when Sir Robertson Nicoll has unloaded himself, it will at most be the layman's message, decorated with Christian texts more or less ingeniously twisted to meet the present situation. Apart from this, one sees scarcely any necessity for writing a number of articles to state the "Christian message." It is scarcely illuminating to see the "spiritual" leaders of Germany and Britain hurling anathemas at each other in the name of their God. It reminds one of a couple of savage tribes going out to war, each party carrying its own special "Joss" for protection. Only there is this distinction: each tribe carries a different "Joss." Not being civilised, savages do not see the wisdom of two opposing armies praying to the same God for victory.

Sir Robertson says he is writing his articles because Christians complain, either that the Churches are giving people no guidance in the present crisis, or the advice given is very contradictory; while yet others complain that if Christian ministers had done their duty war would be impossible. I sympathise with Sir Robertson when he says it is unreasonable to expect that Christian ministers should have made all evil impossible. Quite so; but, on the other hand, it is certain that if there had really been a "Christian message" in favor of the higher civilisation, and if Christian ministers had preached it, the lavish preparations that have made the present war possible could not have gone forward. Consider what the power of the hundreds of thousands of accredited Christian preachers throughout Europe would be if their influence had been resolutely directed, generation after generation, in favor of peace. What part have they played, as a matter of fact? In the main the peace movements of Europe have been directed by heretics. The Society of Friends form the one exception to the general run of Christians in this direction. But one may safely say that the more orthodox the Church, the less it has done to educate the public mind on this matter. It may be said that the clergy could never have stopped war, even had they been so inclined. That may be so; but at least they could have made their attitude clear. They could have said, "We recognise our inability to stop war and preparations for war, we recognise, also, that there may be occasions when war is forced upon a nation, as one may be compelled to use force against a footpad, an assassain, or a lunatic. But, recognising all this, we decline to associate Christian teaching with it; if war must be, so be it, but that should not blind us to the fact of its brutality, its barbarity, and of its evil effects on the lives of the people."

Had this been done generally by the clergy, all the glamor of war would, by this time, have disappeared. Its "glory" and its glitter would have been recognised for what it is. Nations might still have gone to war, but it would have been regretfully at least, and with no false ideas of its grandeur and ultimate profit. Instead of this, the clergy of all denominations have provided that ethical and religious sanction without which war would either disappear or become very infrequent. For people do not, after all, go to war for mere plunder. That may be the object of a clique, but for the mass of people it must be disguised by some form of idealism, by an appeal to glory, to patriotism, to civilisation. Even Germany, militarised as it has been, has been compelled to recognise this. Nations fight in the name of ideas and ideals, and the ideals that effect them are those to which they are accustomed. The offence of the clergy is, then, not that they have failed to prevent this war. That was clearly beyond their power. Their offence is that they never seriously tried to stop war. More, by their teaching they have given war that ethical and religious justification which has made the perpetuation of warfare an easy matter. In the Middle Ages mail-clad Christian Bishops often went to war in the name of religion. To-day they do not go to war, but they bless its implements—which supplies the sanction without the personal risk.

Digitized by Google

I have said what the Churches might have done, but no one with the history of the Christian Church before them would expect them to act in the manner suggested. For the Church has never discouraged war in principle, and not very often in fact. Lecky, striving to account for the militarism of mediæval Christianity, attributes this to the influence of Mohammedanism. He says that "the spirit of Mohammedanism slowly passed into Christianity, and transformed it into its image." This explanation is on quite Christian lines. It attributes the evil features of Christianity to the influence of another religion, the good it is content to claim as its own. But it is quite false. Mohammedanism is not more warlike than Christianity is, and it has usually been far more tolerant in its conquests. Moreover, Lecky himself supplies the refutation of his own statement, and in the very next sentence to the one quoted. He explains the infection of Christianity by Mohammedanism on the ground that "the spectacle of an essentially military religion [Mohammedanism] fascinated men who were at once very warlike and very superstitious." But if these Christians were already very warlike and very superstitious the alliance was already there. They had nothing to learn, unless it was a more intelligent direction of their military energies.

The truth is, that the peaceful proclivities of the Christian Church are a pure myth. On the whole, the Christian Church is probably more peaceful now than it has been throughout its entire history. What is the first picture of Christians that present themselves in history? It is that of a number of theological disputants conducting their dissent with a fury and an intolerance that disgusted the cultured and tolerant Roman world. Later, we see precisely the same spirit exemplified over a large and widening area. In ferocity of disposition, in ingenuity of torture, no one and no religion has ever outdone mediæval Christianity. Is it likely that a Church such as this could ever make for peace, or could form a genuine bulwark against war? If, as Lecky says, it was predicted by some of the early Christians that the establishment of their religion would lead to perpetual peace, it could only be on the ground that there remained no fresh people to conquer. And on that ground even the Kaiser is willing to give the world peace. The truer view is put by Lecky himself, and against his summary of the facts his apology for militant Christianity loses all force:—

> "In looking back, with our present experience, we are driven to the melancholy conclusion that, instead of diminishing the number of wars, ecclesiastical influence has actually very seriously increased it. We may look in vain for any period since Constantine in which the clergy, as a body, exerted themselves to repress the military spirit, or to prevent or abridge a particular war, with an energy at all comparable to that which they displayed in stimulating the fanaticism of the Crusaders, in producing the atrocious massacre of the Albigenses, in embittering the religious wars that followed the Reformation.....With the exception of Mohammedanism, no other religion has done so much to produce war as was done by the religious teachers of Christendom during several centuries.....Religious fanaticism was a main cause of the earlier wars and an important ingredient in the later ones. The peace principles that were so common before Constantine, have found scarcely any echo except from Erasmus, the Anabaptists, and the Quakers; and although some very important pacific agencies have arisen out of the industrial progress of modern times, these have been, for the most part, wholly unconnected with, and in some cases have been directly opposed to, theological interests."

It is the Church's record against the apologies of the theorist.

C. COHEN.

(To be concluded.)

Confusion Worse Confounded.

IT is impossible to ignore the War even for a week, because there is no other subject of sufficient density to obliterate it. The religious press devotes itself almost exclusively to the discussion of its various phases, and the pulpit recognises no other theme. Even theological disputes are for the time being kept in abeyance. Persistent attempts are being made to justify the War on Christian grounds. All are agreed that Germany's share in it is incapable of vindication, Germany having deliberately substituted Corsica for Galilee, or, as the editor of the Daily News and Leader put it, having returned to Odin, her ancient warlike divinity. Either the adoption of Atheism or a reversion to Paganism must be held responsible for that great country's mad appeal to the sword. Those who know Germany at all are aware that such a view is wholly erroneous. Dr. Orchard, for example, does not hold it in the form in which it is usually expressed. While admitting that it contains some truth, he maintains that we must "look deeper for the real causes of the present crisis." Then he says, as reported in the Christian Commonwealth for October 21:—

> "He believed that the material resources which modern science had placed at our disposal had destroyed our spiritual imagination and led to a complete misunderstanding of Christianity. As a result there had been an attempt to found a new religion, one that had betrayed us from beginning to end. This new religion had taught (1) that Christianity was intellectually inadequate, that its doctrines were unable to explain life and history; (2) that its ethic also was inadequate for a life like ours, and later that that ethic was absolutely pernicious; (3) that Jesus Christ was a myth, and that there never was any such person."

We confess that we are at a loss to know to what movement that extract refers. We have not heard of any new religion answering to the description therein given. It is undeniable that there is a movement in this country, headed by Professor Gilbert Murray, the object of which is to revive the Greek ideals, to restore the rich joy in living which characterised the Greeks, and once more to glorify strength and wisdom rather than weakness and folly. Professor Murray foresees the possibility, if not the probability, of the adoption of the ideals of ancient Greece by Great Britain in the near future. It is well known that there is a similar movement on foot in France and Germany, as well as among the educated classes in Russia. If Dr. Orchard has this movement in mind, he forgets, or has not learned, that the overwhelming majority of the people who take part in it are convinced pacifists, who, if they had their way, would make war a literal impossibility.

The astonishing fact is that clergymen imagine that the moment a man renounces Christianity he of necessity becomes a savage who thirsts for the blood of his fellow-men and draws the sword at the slightest provocation, forgetting that Christians have always been the most warlike people on earth. With the history of Christendom before him, dare Dr. Orchard contradict that statement? Unfortunately, the reverend gentleman will not read history just now. It is wonderfully easy to assert that "the Kaiser's idea of God has not been Christianised at all"; but what about the Church's idea of God for the last fifteen hundred years? A familiar Christian hymn opens thus:—

Digitized by Google

"The Son of God goes forth to war,
A kingly crown to gain;
His blood-red banner streams afar!
Who follows in his train?"

We should not be surprised were we to be told that such a martial verse requires "spiritual interpretation"; but it is a literal description of what has always been done by people with the love of Christ in their hearts. And yet because the Germans declared war a couple of months ago, they are said either to have "reverted to pre-Christian times in search of a nobler religion, and adopted the Judaic conception of the God of Battles and Lord of Hosts," or to have "turned to the old Greek world, with its religion of gaiety, without the sense of sin, of battle, valor, and self-assertion, for a faith that was to save the world"; but this is fair neither to Judaism nor to the religion of ancient Greece. Will Dr. Orchard deny that the God of Battles is with us still, believed in and appealed to, or that great prophets of Judaism confidently predicted that a time was coming when men would "beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks"? Does he not know that after two thousand years of a Christianised God that prophecy still remains unfulfilled? Not only has Christianity not abolished war, but wars have been more numerous and more atrocious under Christianity than under any other religion on the planet, while the war that is now devastating Europe is the biggest, bloodiest, and most barbarous in all history.

Dr. Orchard's injustice towards the religion of Greece is inexcusable. He calls it "a religion of gaiety, of battle, valor, and self-assertion." Does he not remember how ardently Athens believed in freedom and the emancipation of the oppressed, how every Greek was exhorted to aim at the highest form of virtue and goodness? Has he forgotten the famous speech of Themistocles, in which he "contrasted what was noble with what was base, and bade them, in all that came within the range of man's nature and constitution, always to make choice of the nobler part"? (Herodotus viii. 83). Has he forgotten the high value the Athenians set on generosity, kindliness, chivalry, humanity, and the championship of the helpless and oppressed? We invite him to read Herodotus viii. 3, ix. 27, and particularly to ponder the plays of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. Theseus was king of Athens, but this is how he describes the city to the Theban herald in the Suppliants:—

"Nay, peace, Sir Stranger! Ill hast thou begun, Seeking a Master here. No will of one
Holdeth this land; it is a city, and free.
The whole folk year by year, in parity
Of service, is our king. Nor yet to gold
Give we high seats, but in one honor hold
The poor man and the rich."

The Greek religion glorified love and vicarious service, and laid stress upon the duty of disciplining the spirit.

Dr. Orchard falls foul also of the Lutheran Church, holding it largely responsible for the present situation, because of its conservatism, uncatholicism, and out-of-date creeds. Certainly we hold no brief on behalf of the Lutheran, or any other Church; but we beg to remind the reverend gentleman that it is an Evangelical Christian Society, and that the Evangelicals form 58 per cent. of the population of the German Empire, and the Catholics 39 per cent., leaving only 3 per cent. to be Atheists, Materialists, or Freethinkers. The point is that Christianity is still supreme in the German Empire, and that the war is being waged under its ægis. Harnack and Eucken profess the Christian religion, and both firmly believe that their country is engaged in an entirely righteous struggle.

We conclude that the endeavors to clear Christianity of responsibility for the present tempest have failed completely, while Freethought shines forth as a thoroughly pacific agent, its ideal being to bring all questions of dispute between nations, as well as between individuals, before the bar of enlightened and impartial reason, that they may be settled without having recourse to brute force.

J. T. LLOYD.

A Day of Prayer.

An Open Letter to President Wilson.

BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

I.

MR. PRESIDENT: The writer is an admirer of your many qualifications for the exalted office to which you were elected by the people. It is a blessing in these trying times to have a man of culture and a good heart at the helm of Government. Because of my loyalty, in general, to the ideals you cherish, I feel that I may offer a few comments on your "Day of Prayer" without abusing the privileges of an American citizen.

As your proclamation, calling the nation to prayer, is a most extraordinary document, and as it raises issues which seriously concern every lover of free institutions, I shall endeavor in this and in other letters to follow, to show the perils to which a nation is exposed when its chief magistrate undertakes to play the rôle of a priest. In this connection, I shall also avail myself of the opportunity to comment on certain newspaper editorials which have defended your proclamation.

The appeal to the supernatural by the representative of a Government avowedly and constitutionally divorced, root and branch, from any and every form of public worship, is indeed very regrettable. We are wondering what will be the next object for which you will summon us to prayer. If ever the habit of praying for things grows upon us, it will certainly unfit us for action and initiative. Besides, if wars among nations are to be stopped by American prayers, why may not presidential elections, for example, which often stirs up the country from centre to circumference, and threaten its prosperity, be also made a subject of official prayers? Instead of choosing our own presidents, why not ask the Deity to choose one for us, as in the olden days? And what would prevent a Catholic president, should we ever have one, from recommending the Mass, the sacraments, or a pilgrimage to Rome, to the American people, as you have recommended church-prayers to them?

Of course, there is no objection to the Churches praying on Sundays, or for that matter, on every day in the week, and for anything they please. In fact, what are churches for, if not for praying? But for the American Government, in the person of its chief executive, to set apart a Day of Prayer is, in a sense, just as much a nullification of the American constitution insuring religious neutrality on the part of the Government, as the violation of Belgium territory by the Kaiser was of political neutrality. The latter pleaded necessity—What is your excuse? Without wishing to exaggerate, I would say that for the American Government to appoint, through its President, a Day of Prayer, is an infringement on the Constitution. It is treating the glorious document bearing the signatures of the fathers of our Republic, and which guarantees absolute neutrality on the part of the State in matters of religion, as "a scrap of paper."

During my stay in London, a Mr. Leach, M.P., made a motion in the House of Commons to the effect that a day of fasting and prayer be appointed by the Government. His proposition was turned down by the Premier upon the ground that the different denominations were attending to that matter. Why could not the American President, too, have left what praying was needed to the Churches? The neutrality or impartiality you recommend in matters of politics you have not observed in matters of religion. While urging us not to take sides with or against the Allies or the Germans, you have taken sides with the Churches against the American Constitution. It would not be a good defence to say that the Thanksgiving Proclamation is also a summons to prayer. Quite so. But two wrongs, Mr. President, do not make a right.

Digitized by Google

—Chicago.

(To be continued.)

The Armed Peace of the Plants.—II.

(Concluded from p. 678.)

THE armatures, so conspicuous throughout the thorn group of plants, present many interesting features. It is a noteworthy fact that these defences are invariably arranged so as to secure the amplest protection to the most important and the least guarded plant structures. Many species of bush would be entirely extirpated by grazing animals were they not fortified with thorns. The buckthorns, the sloes, and the barberry are examples of this, and in the last of these the young buds are screened from danger by three thorns which project their dagger-like points in three directions. Certain tropical mimosas are furnished with strong, sharp thorns; their leaves are sensitive, and at the slightest touch they close up and retire behind a citadel of thorns, which completely covers them from injury.

With many prickly bushes the young shoots of the early year remain green until the autumn, when they harden into thorns, and these serve to shelter the shoots of the coming spring. With others, the leaf-stalks are transformed during the summer into thorns. In the Tragacanth, the vernal foliage is surrounded by a circle of thorns composed of the transformed leaf-stalks of the departed year, and these remain attached to the plant after the leaves themselves have fluttered to the ground.

That spines, thorns, and similar floral appendages are not indispensable to vegetable growth is shown, among other plants, by the cactuses, whose leaves are completely changed into spines. The green stem of the cactus alone carries on the functions of assimilation. In the drought-stricken and stony soil of the Mexican plateaux the cactus is the almost solitary representative of the floral world. Although in such barren surroundings the plant's juicy stem is a constant temptation to famished animals, these "rarely venture to approach them, and it is only when tortured by thirst that horses and asses occasionally knock off the spines with their hoofs, and so reach the soft tissues rich in water." But even this is attended with danger, as the powerful spines often penetrate the hoof and occasion great agony to the animals.

In their dry environment the sap of the cactus is protected against dessication by the plant's dense epidermis; the sole ascertainable function of the spines is to render the vegetation immune to the attacks of parched and hungry animals. The agency of Selection has unquestionably served to promote these defensive growths, which are absolutely essential to the life of the species. All plants that failed to produce them perished in these inhospitable regions. Nor are these phenomena special to Mexico. Prickly plants are a distinguishing feature of the arid coast areas of Southern Europe, in Spain and Corsica, as well as in Africa and other lands. The nearest relatives of these forbidding plants that are native to the well-watered districts of Northern Europe are destitute of spines; vegetation of innumerable orders is there richly represented, and the struggle for existence has not been sufficiently keen to compel the appearance of such defensive weapons.

The utility of protective appliances is plainly apparent in the predominating plants which form the "shrubbery" that is never absent from the near neighborhood of the Alpine herdsman's hut.

> "There, where the cattle daily assemble, and where the soil is continually being richly manured by them, we always find a large, luxuriantly growing company of the poisonous aconite, the bitter goosefoot, the stinging-nettle, the thistle, the ill-smelling atriplex, and some other inedible species, while the palatable herbs are gradually exterminated by the cattle which daily gather round the hut."

As every gardener bitterly realises, many of our best-loved plants are ever at the mercy of a legion of insect pests. This very year the ravages of plant-lice, slugs, green caterpillars, and black flies have proved appalling. This lack of immunity to organic destruction is doubtless to some extent due to the circumstance that many of our domesticated floras have largely lost the defensive adaptations natural to their wild state. Moreover, the eliminating operations of unrestrained Nature, which extirpate those plants which fail to accommodate themselves to her rigorous demands, are materially modified by the protecting hand of the husbandman. As a consequence, the cultivated floras are less able to defend themselves from the attacks of their ubiquitous assailants.

Science is deeply indebted to the painstaking researches of the Jena botanist, Professor Stahl, for its present knowledge of the ways and means employed by plants to withstand their enemies' onslaughts. These agencies are both chemical and mechanical. The tannic acid secreted in the clover-leaf scares off many of the gluttonous snails. That the tannin provides the protection the plant enjoys is proved by the fact that when the chemical is washed out the snails eagerly devour the leaf. This explains the circumstance that slugs and snails are most destructive after a heavy fall of rain. Not that this device secures complete immunity to the clover; the field slug (Limax agrestis) is contemptuously indifferent to the presence of the tannin, and greedily devours the leaves in the dryest of seasons. Still, the tannin deposit is of immense service to those plants that secrete it. Ferns, mosses, and other growths which contain tannin are avoided by herbivorous mammals, and the same chemical is usually effective against snails in the saxifrage, the strawberry, various aquatic floras, and others.

Plants which contain acids, particularly oxalic acid, such as the wood-sorrel and the different varieties of begonia, usually escape persecution. Stahl showed that when slices of carrot were smeared with acid, the snails, which are so extremely fond of this vegetable, positively refused to touch it. Many plants elaborate ethereal oils in their covering hairs. Among these is the herb-Robert, and as a result—

> "Even the almost omnivorous field-slug does not attack this plant, and, if it be placed upon it, escapes with all dispatch from the ethereal oil, which burns its naked skin, by covering itself with mucus and letting itself down to the ground by a thread."

Plants also guard themselves from the assaults of snails with mechanical contrivances. Their stalks are furnished with bristles, which prevent the snails from crawling upon them. The meadow-comfrey secures itself in this way in the most successful manner. Its stalk is thickly coated with sharp bristles, from which the predaceous snail retreats in dismay. Other plants have failed in preventing snails from ascending their stalks, but measures have nevertheless been taken to cope with their devastations. In these cases the leaves are not infrequently tough and indigestible. The stoneworts secrete lime, which the snails abhor. It has been experimentally established that if the lime contained in the leaves is dissolved, the snails will then feed ravenously on the plants. Test inquiries among a varied array of vegetable species have yielded similar results to the one just described.

There is one other protective adaptation out of the immense number now known which must not remain unmentioned. This remarkable device also serves to withstand the menace of snails. In the tissues of many floral organisms "microscopic crystal-like needles of oxalate of lime, pointed at both ends," are to be met with. These needles—"Raphides," as they are termed—unpleasantly affect the sensitive masticating organs of snails, so much so, indeed, that such needle-containing plants—as the arum or cuckoo-plant, the snowdrop, the narcissi, and the squill—are only eaten by snails when faced with absolute necessity. Even the all-voracious field-slug gives these plants a wide berth.

Digitized by Google

In company with all other known adaptations, these raphides furnish no support to the Design theory. It is true that the raphides afford a large amount of protection, but the defence is frequently broken through. They ward off the attacks of rodents and ruminants; locusts shun them, but many caterpillars specially select these plants as their favorite food. The vine-leaf and the wild balsam, among other plants, contain raphides, but their presence signally fails to safeguard them from the attacks of insects. The caterpillar of the butterfly, Chærocampa elpenor, whose natural food is the leaves of indigenous European plants, has become an eyesore to the fuchsia lover. This beautiful plant is a native of South America, and its tissue often contains raphides; but the female butterfly has now adopted the habit of depositing her eggs on the foliage of this floral favorite, and the caterpillars no sooner hatch out than they set to work to destroy the leaves.

Nearly all the higher wild flowering plants seem to some extent to be protected against the plundering snails. Why, then, do these molluscs increase and multiply to such a degree that they have become a chronic pest to the cultivator of the soil? As already intimated, our domesticated flora is in many instances deprived of its natural defences. The edible lettuce is attacked and eaten with impunity. In some wet seasons scarcely a lettuce is to be seen which is free from snails. Again, slugs and snails frequently begin their banquet when the plants are decaying and their protective substances have been dissolved by the rain and dew. But the fact remains that any device to outwit the slugs can never be entirely successful. As the plants evolve their defences, their enemies slowly but most certainly adapt themselves to the changing conditions of floral life, and thus the struggle constantly goes on.

As Stahl has discovered, many snails have developed into "specialists."

> "Thus, the large slug of our woods eats the poisonous fungi which are rejected by other snails, and in the same way there are many other specialists which, however, are not likely to eliminate unaided the plants to which they have adapted themselves. There are certainly also omnivorous forms, like the field-slug.....and Arion empiricorum, the red slug, but just because these eat so many kinds of plant they are less dangerous to any one species."

That these protective plant adaptations find their sole explanation in terms of evolution shines forth with crystal clearness. The innumerable contrivances adopted by the various floral species assist them in life's ceaseless strife. Their evolution is determined by their utility, and consequently Natural Selection has necessarily played a predominant part in their development. That the selective principle has operated most powerfully in their production is proved by the fact that every available mode of armed peace has been elaborated in the vegetable kingdom. Furthermore, Stahl has shown that many of these defensive devices are not indispensable to the healthy existence of plant life. Maize, for example, if deprived of its natural acid, still continues to flourish. The acid is, therefore, not an essential part of its make-up, but acts as a weapon against organic interference. The wild lettuce still arms itself against attack, while the cultivated vegetable has lost its defences through disuse.

The plasticity of protoplasm—the material basis of life—was emphasised in an earlier article. The foregoing survey of the fortifications erected by floral structures strengthens the contention that the plastic powers of plants are made possible by their highly unstable states. Thorns, spines, hairs, bristles, bitter substances, ethereal oils, and tannin compounds are all utilised in the truceless warfare between the kingdom of plants and its ever alert and hungry antagonists.

T. F. PALMER.

The Burden.

A GROUP of women were standing at an alley mouth in a slum part of the city. Some of them were soldiers' wives; all of them were related to regimental numbers; and all of them, very probably, had given, or would give, birth to soldiers.

Their faces were white, hard, coarse, and ugly. Five or six of the women were suckling infants; and the babies also were dirty and ugly. The picture did not induce one to admiration; it tended rather to anger and disgust.

Christianity may be, as it advocates never tire telling us, an indispensable asset to social well-being; perhaps; but we may be pardoned wondering what these people have to lose with the decease of the religion of love and kindness. In fact, Christianity might hide its head in shame at its own ignominy. It should, to be honorable, commit suicide. The contrast between its verbal morality and their horribly uncouth immorality is so striking that we are forced to laughter and tears; for at one end the contrast is terribly unnatural, at the other it is bitterly comic. Should not Christianity have been beside these women? Would Christ have been cheering with loud hurrahs the departing soldiers; or would he have been administering words to these women in their slum alleys and courts and closes?

They were speaking about the War; not the War that means picturesque reports in the press; nor the War that resolves itself into interesting sport for the middle class, and into honor, glory, and fame for the aristocracy; but the real War, that which means unutterable misery, anxiety, sorrow, and suffering, all the tortures of uncertainty, and all the impoverishments that can be imagined, and many unthinkable. They knew what poverty was; but they were becoming every day more trained in its powers. Hunger had never been far from their slum doors; it was nearer now. Misery was a boon companion of theirs; strangely enough they were always conscious of its presence even when they enjoyed life in a "pub.," or in the chamber of "all-too-human" animalism; but misery had brought a pal from the grey land; and the women were now doubly guarded by the phantoms of worry and want.

It was an opportunity for organised Christianity, a chance for the purse-full lovers of Jesus Christ. It was their burden.

That these women should feel honestly affectionate to men does not, of course, astonish us; even animals can love. What does astonish us, however, is that they should bear their burden of increased poverty so uncomplainingly. It is strange how social customs seem to conspire with Christianity to give it an easy time, to keep it secure. With a little more spunk these suffering women could make a bold attempt to force the realisation of some of the famous precepts of the Christian religion; and they would simply be endeavoring to force what God in Jesus Christ commanded his children to perform. But if their morality is slave morality so also is their spirit slave-spirit; and Christianity and Christians are afforded assistance to escape from their God-imposed burden, and are indignant when we unhesitatingly brand them cowards.

Moreover, these poor, miserable women are enduring pain because their husbands, their fathers, and sons are fighting Britain's battles. According to repute, their soldier-men are preserving Britain's greatness. Rumor has it they are safeguarding the excellence of British religion and the freedom that emanates from the soul-inspiring teachings of Christ. We are gravely informed that our Christianity is at stake, and that the soldiers of the King have become the soldiers of God. All kinds of hitherto undreamt-of evils assail us, and the male relatives of these women are our noble defenders. And the eyes of the women are heavy with a dread fear; their hearts—poor downtrodden hearts they are—crushed and bruised and broken on the wheels of heredity and environment, and, mocked by those whose lives move through airy regions apportioned them by similar forces, are full of care and anxiety; and their weak, ill-nourished bodies and brains feel dimly only approaching calamity.

Digitized by Google

One of them was weeping sorely. Information had been given her but a little ago that her husband had been killed in battle. She refused to be comforted. At last, exasperated by the continuous crying, a companion upbraided her, saying, "Shut up! You know where your man is; we don't."

There was a hardness in the words that made them grievous to the ears. Born, no doubt, from prolonged strain in a nature too crude for any nuance of more delicate feelings, they epitomised the whole ghastly tragedy. It was not knowledge these women craved; nor was it the satisfaction it would give them. Each knew they would suffer just as much as the more fortunate possessor of the official intelligence. Each knew that, despite any news, before them lay travail and stress, and that relief of any satisfactory kind would only be found in the hardships of industrialism into which more of them would be drawn.

Never did it dawn upon the attenuated minds of these women to demand the justice that springs from the thousand-and-one compliments paid to the men on whom they were more or less dependent. Never did it enter their thoughts to imagine the honor that should be theirs. Never did they dream of a time when the wealthy portion of the Christian nation would honestly recognise the duty they owed to the mothers, the wives, the children of the men upon whom they lavished so much inordinate praise. These women never imagined that the people who had most to lose should, honorably, in justice even to themselves, be decent enough to materialise their thankfulness.

And so in their misery there was no ray of hope. Theirs was the weariness of the slave. Slave consideration they got: it was the charity of the Lord's children, the charity that negates mammonism, and becomes a passport to paradise; the charity that eases the burden of divine commandments, that cancels Christian responsibilities, the charity that turns our Lord Jesus Christ into a laughing-stock, and if God did exist, and had interested himself sufficiently in modern knowledge to the extent, perhaps, of conquering Eastern prejudices, would stink in his nostrils and turn his face purple with righteous rage.

One does not need the art of coscinomancy to discover God's feelings at the present time. But maybe he is too busy turning up the books of life and ticking off the Christians Christians have murdered for the glory of God and the safety of the various Fatherlands!

In the balance against this charity, the detestable sweepings of the streets of Christian morality, there swings a heavy weight, compounded of the "fine fellows" who are the relatives of these living, slum-dwelling ghouls of female humanity, and the innumerable enjoyments that spring from British freedom, and all the other terrible losses we would suffer if the enemy were successful.

It is a lesson in the hollow farce of the religion of love. It is a light shed on the damnable hypocrisy of the children of Jesus Christ. Their cowardliness is the low type—the sneaky, twisting, treacherous type—that crawls sickeningly round its burden, and away from it. They know what the joyful task is, and they hedge it. Every one of them tells us the words of the Lord can be obeyed, and in the doing of them there comes peace and happiness beyond all understanding; and the burden of the commands of God is lying the while on an unused side-track, awaiting the never-coming of those who should shoulder it. Every day the burden increases in size and adds weight. Every day it becomes more tragic and grotesque. Every day Christian cowardice and Christian disobedience to the heavenly commander-in-chief are accumulating more self-manufactured opprobrium. Every day there is another plague-spot on the white flesh of Christ.

The moanings of these women rise to heaven, and fall like stones. Their miseries spread through generations yet unborn, doing, even now, in the lightless recesses of convoluting matter, the death-in-life work of a devilish civilisation. And the reward for their unheroic suffering is beautifully wrapped in the silver cloud lining of celestial promises.

Christianity, if it be true, if it be a thing of social value, if it be founded—as we are told—upon the most glorious teachings of the most glorious man who ever lived, if it would save itself from the contumely of every rationally minded man, if it would shield its Christ from contempt and its God from ridicule, must shoulder its burden. It has power—social, financial, and organising power; its arms reach to the lowliest hamlet; it probably has brains. The burden awaits its coming. We Freethinkers are pessimistic; but we are interested.

ROBERT MORELAND.

Acid Drops.

A very interesting experiment is suggested by the Mayor-Elect of Blackpool—Councillor William Cartledge. He proposes to democratise the Mayoral Sunday by not favoring any particular church, but inviting representative citizens to accompany him to a specially organised service held in one of the large theatres. Will this catch on? We must wait and see. But we must confess, in common justice, that many Christians may object to this experiment on principle, without being bigoted or ill-natured. Let us be fair, even to the enemy.

Talking about being fair, even to the enemy, we venture to warn our readers once more against the moral danger of a false patriotism which follows so easily from a state of war, and from the partisan news which appears in all our daily papers. The Kaiser may be a criminal lunatic—we have already stated our belief that he is; the Germans have undoubtedly introduced shocking brutality into their conduct of the war; and the only principle they seem to acknowledge is their own interest and convenience. Nevertheless, we are sure that there are good Germans as well as good Englishmen, and the policy that nations descend to in war—when they are ashamed of themselves and things are going against them—must not always be taken as typical of conduct in peaceful civil life. Everybody has seen some of the clever Berlin caricatures. They make many Englishmen angry—which, of course, is their object; they make other Englishmen laugh, for, after all, the world is too dull a place to lose a good joke in, even at our own expense. Now there are Germans, as well as Englishmen, who are angry about these caricatures. Here is a letter from a German officer to the Cologne Gazette on this matter—reaching us through the Westminster Gazette:—

> "In distributing the post to the troops I have again and again noticed postcards which, in vulgar fashion, exhibited contempt of the French, English, and Russians, whom we have beaten. The effect of these postcards upon our men is very remarkable. Practically all of them expressed their disgust, and I have even seen a soldier with tears in his eyes. We see how victories are won, and with what enormous sacrifices. We see the unspeakable misery of the battlefield. We rejoice indeed over the victories, but our joy is mitigated by the memory of the sad pictures which we have almost every day before our eyes. Our enemies, moreover, have, in truth, not earned such ridicule. If they had not fought so bravely we should not have had such losses."

Now, that is a very manly writer. In spite of twenty wars one could shake the hand of the man who wrote it. And if all the details be true, there are other soldiers in the German Army than those whose exploits get into the English papers. The censorship lets all that sort of thing pass; the wrong as well as the right, the false as well as the true. What it does not let pass (until it is too late to be useful and too stale to be interesting) is the real news that all the world knows before it is allowed to reach the ears of the people it most concerns.

Dr. Fitchett, a Methodist preacher, who is author of one or two "War" books, enlightens the general public as to Europe's greatest need. He says:—

Digitized by Google

> "A little more of religion would simply revolutionise Europe. What all the Great Powers need is a sense of the relationship to a Power above them—the Power that rules the world in righteousness—a God, to use Mr. Balfour's phrase, that actually does things, that takes sides—the side of right against wrong, of justice against injustice."

Dr. Fitchett is evidently a believer in the old prescription, "Take a hair of the dog that bit you." Otherwise, we should imagine that a little more religion, added to what there is already, would precious near be the end of all things. And if there is one thing that all the Great Powers—except France—are convinced of, it is their nearness to a great "Power." They have all said so. They are all convinced that he is inspiring them. And each one is certain that he is the one for whom this "Power" is reserving his choicest favors. We suppose, however, that Dr. Fitchett, being what he is, could not well say anything different from what he does say. When we have been for years repeating the same stupid phrases these acquire a specific value from mere repetition.

The advertising effrontery of the Salvation Army almost passes belief. Its latest exploit is to announce that since the outbreak of the War 180 men had enlisted from a single "shelter." As these were more or less casual visitors, driven there by sheer poverty, we are at a loss to see in what way the "Army" deserves credit for the enlistment.

Mr. R. J. Campbell professes to be a very liberal-minded theologian, and prides himself on the City Temple being a liberal institution. But it is very hard for a theologian to rid himself of his theological prejudices, as the following from a speech of Mr. Campbell's shows:—

> "When Mr. Bernard Shaw came last to this society, he addressed a meeting in the City Temple which got me into no end of trouble afterwards. The opening words of his address were something like these: 'Although addressing an audience which meets in a Christian edifice, I have to confess frankly at the outset of our proceedings this evening that I am not a Christian.' I remember the shock which these words gave me; a chill was instantly cast over the assembly. I think the feeling was that if Mr. Shaw was not able to profess himself to be a Christian, he might, at least, have been silent on the subject and respected the feelings of his audience."

Now, we do not think that Mr. Campbell could have been under very strong delusions concerning Mr. Shaw's religious opinions, although we admit that he had been playing some queer antics in that direction. Moreover, Mr. Campbell, as a liberal theologian and a professed lover of freedom, ought to have been less susceptible to shock, and the City Temple audience to chills. Shocks and chills because a man says he is not a Christian does not indicate a very robust love of freedom. A mediæval inquisitor could only have been shocked at such a confession, although we admit that the one who made it would not have complained of "chill" afterwards.

It is to be observed that this liberal assemblage would not have felt aggrieved had Mr. Shaw kept his opinion to himself, and so probably deluded some of his hearers. And it was certainly not the nature of the language that gave shocks and chills. That was as mild as mild could be. No, they did not mind so much a man not being a Christian; what they objected to was his saying so. As usual, heresy plus hypocrisy may pass. Heresy plus honesty must be condemned. Mr. Campbell was shocked, the audience was chilled, its feelings outraged, all because a man said plainly that he was not a Christian. Mr. Campbell and his followers ought to have known better; had they not been Christians they would have known better. No member of the gathering would have hesitated to avow himself a Christian. He would not stop to think that, perhaps, the speaker's feelings might be wounded. Of course, we do not believe they would have been; but what is sauce for the goose ought to be sauce for the gander. Perhaps, though, they placed the non-Christian on a higher level than themselves by recognising that he would be the first to claim that everyone present possessed the right to say what he believed without troubling about the shocks and chills to which unemancipated minds are subject.

The Christian World falls foul of Rev. Conrad Noel for saying that Protestantism has made no distinctive contribution to the Christian religion, and that Protestantism "tends invariably either to complete Atheism or the Catholic Faith." It strikes us that both of these statements contain no more than the truth. There is nothing in Protestantism that is not in Catholicism, and all over Europe it is precisely Atheism on the one side and Roman Catholicism on the other that is eating into Protestantism. The Christian World says that the whole movement of Foreign Missions owes its impulse to Protestantism. We should have thought that the Christian World was well aware of the fact that missionary effort has been part of the regular work of the Catholic Church ever since it existed. India, China, North and South America, were blessed—or otherwise—with Catholic missionaries long before Protestantism existed.

The Christian World is equally wide of the truth in saying that Protestantism contributed to Christianity breadth of thought, and Catholicity of spirit, and freedom of conscience. Where? As such, Protestantism has been quite as much opposed to genuine freedom of thought as has Roman Catholicism. Look at Scotland and Geneva under Calvanism! Look at New England under the Puritans! Or look at the attitude of Protestants in this country in relation to heresy! The historic truth is that Protestantism represents a mere side-stream in a general current of European thought. In the revolt against Christian mediævalism, and the return to the healthier ideals of antiquity, we see this working itself out in art, in literature, and in sociology. Protestantism was a mere offshoot from this general tendency. And it narrowed the tendency instead of broadening it.

Lecturing at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, Professor Adams Brown said that "a nation in agony was a proof, not of God's indifference, but of his interest." We hope that those Belgians who are in England in consequence of the devastation of their country will be properly appreciative of God's interest in them. But in this case it is evident that the Kaiser was right, after all. He is God's instrument. For it is the German army that is responsible for the agony of Belgium, and that agony is a proof of "God's interest." Well, we have always said that the less people have to do with the gods the better.

The English papers gleefully relate that German soldiers carry charms and mascots to protect them against bullets. What do they expect? Are there not twenty millions of Catholics in Germany, besides followers of other fancy religions?

The late Monsignor Hugh Benson commended smoking among ladies, and some of his co-religionists were shocked at his attitude. They might have remembered that the Catholic Church teaches that unregenerate men and women will smoke for ever—in the next world.

Archdeacon Holmes, preaching at St. Paul's Cathedral, said "God is my puzzle." Just so! And when the reverend gentleman has solved that jig-saw, he might try the tangle of the Trinity.

The "blood and fire" of the Salvation Army is popularly supposed to be confined to the jerseys and flags of these non-military warriors. Mr. Harold Begbie, however, appears to think otherwise, and in some exquisite lines in a recent "poem," he says:

> "Ho, a bloke can stand some slaughter
> When he knows he's born again."

The new lighting regulations have transformed London into A City of Dreadful Night, and the police, particularly at Deptford and Camberwell, have great difficulty in preventing disorder and looting. Piety is not a restraining influence without the assistance of some big "bobbies."

The Bishop of Sheffield attributes the European War to a decline in the belief of the "teaching of revelation." Why is this? The German and Austrian peoples believe in the Bible-God as much as the Bishop, and the worst excesses of the troops of the two Kaisers can be easily paralleled in the Old Testament.

A characteristic story is told in a British soldier's letter from the War. Some artillerymen who had lost their way came across a crowd whom they suspected to be Germans. It was dark, but they heard someone sing out "Where the hell are you going to?" "Then," he says, "we knew we were with friends."

"Our fellows," another Mr. Atkins writes, "have signed the pledge because Kitchener wants them to. But they all say, 'God help the Germans, when we get hold of them, for making us teetotal.'"

Digitized by Google

According to the London Press, the King of the Belgians now wears only the French military medal and the Russian Cross of St. George. Dear, Dear! His Majesty is almost as scantily clothed as King David when he danced before the ark.

The Bishop of Chelmsford, speaking at St. Mary's Church, Prittlewell, said that "Church and State should be co-partners in elevating Southend, and in making it a holy city in reality and truth." There is no need for "Church" and "State" to distress themselves, for there are enough Semitic features in the town to justify that title already.

According to the truthful, if not thoughtful, newspapers, the Czar of all the Russias has forbidden the drinking of alcohol in his dominions "for ever." "For ever" is a big phrase. We thought eternity was in the hands of "God." It now appears that Czars can handle it too. But we would back the vodka. Read the Bible. Man was made of dust—it was a dry job—and he's been thirsty ever since.

The Daily Mail has, with its customary restraint, given its readers some of its ideas on "damned German culture." Apart from the filmy-eyed innocence of confusing militarism with culture, it is a pity that the Mail is so provincial. Goethe said, "How can I hate, unless I am myself filled with hatred?" We commend this awful remark to the urbane leader-writer on the Mail.

"Have a War Wedding" runs a bold advertisement in the daily papers. It sounds like an invitation to emulate the Old Testament ideal of polygamy.

The old "infidel" deathbed story is played out now except to the intellectually lowest of the low amongst the very dregs of Christianity. No journal but a Christian Herald or a War Cry would venture to print one, yet thirty or forty years ago, not to go back farther, it was a popular form of Christian delectation. Soldier and sailor letters during the present War contain little reference to religious ideas of any kind by fatally wounded men who are approaching the "great beyond"—just as we hear no more of the Bible that stopped the bullet which would have gone through Jack's or Tommy's heart. The men who were saved by the aid of a raft from the torpedoed Hawke, and only picked up the next day a long way from the catastrophe, huddled round the fattest of their number all night and cheered themselves up with unheavenly songs like "'Tis a Long, Long Way to Tipperary" and "They All Love Jack." Not much piety in this, but it helped to pull them through all right.

There is a better, a more poetical, a subtler story in Dr. Haden Guest's "Among the Wounded" in last week's Reynolds'. Dr. Guest is conducting a hospital for the wounded in France. They have all sorts of patients and all sorts of attendants in the place. The common fight for the country has brought them all to a democratic level. The motor-car placed at the service of the hospital by the Government is driven by a Marquis—a live Marquis—who is a "full private" in the army. Another attendant, looking after bedpans, being asked by Dr. Guest what was the price of electric light in Paris, paused in his work to say he didn't know,—his valet always paid his electric light bill! These pleasant stories are followed by some dreadful accounts of the injuries and sufferings of the wounded, and then comes the following paragraph, which ends the article:—

> "I do not want to create the impression that the work has only its gruesome and its gloomy aspects. There are many cheering incidents, prominent among which I must place the bravery of the French lady who stayed behind at Brayn to nurse the wounded after the town had been evacuated. The demeanor of the wounded, too, is wonderfully cheerful. One case will remain in the memory of all the party. It is that of a French soldier, from whom we had amputated his two legs and one arm. The other arm would have been taken off, but death forestalled us. The only words one heard from that soldier were apologies for the trouble he was giving. The only words, save for one grim joke. As he lay in bed with his solitary limb, he remarked to his attendant: 'A pity I have not another arm! We might play cards!' That man had the face of a saint."

"We might play cards!" We might make the best of what life I have left, and mitigate your ennui, and save myself from the boredom of merely awaiting the executioner. So fine, and so French! And the man had the face of a saint. And why not?

Yone Noguchi, a Japanese poet, has been recording his impressions of Western life, gathered as the result of a rather lengthy visit to Europe and America. He says that the belief that Western civilisation was built on a higher and sounder footing than Japanese is now "knocked down and killed." He points out that "during forty long years the Western poets, preachers, and philosophers have been singing and writing on the general peace and brotherhood, and every church striking its holy bell on every Sunday and Christmas Eve." With what result? "When they preached peace, it was only at the time when they could not practise [their] barbarous policy; those forty years of peace were only a sort of truce. It was never a peace for peace's sake, but the time of preparation or suspension of hostilities in the interim between one war and another."

Mr. Noguchi comments on the fact that for fighting two wars in twenty years the Japanese have earned the name of a warlike nation, have been labelled dangerous, and commented on as the "Yellow Peril." He retorts that the schools of the West are far more dangerous than the East, "where Confucius's analects are not a dead language."

> "Confucius's teaching is that we should recompense injury with justice, and kindness with kindness; and his doctrine is to be true to the principles of our nature, and the benevolent exercise of them to others. Even when we, as a people or nation, could not strictly observe his teaching, we believe that we have never acted aggressively.....It was the German Emperor who drew a picture calling us Yellow Peril, when we won a fight from China; if we had been a yellow peril, as he said, it meant only against the white race of the West. But what the German Emperor is doing now is, certainly, a mighty peril against all the humanities of the whole world."

He asks what would happen if any second or third-rate countries in the East were to imitate the Western example. His conclusion is that Japanese should be glad that they have a country in the far-away East, that contact has robbed him of respect for Western civilisation, and that the "immediate and most important determination should be a refusal to the Western invasion."

A book has been published with the ironic title, The Unpetitioned Heavens. It is appropriate that such a volume should be a work of fiction.

Mr. Fergus Hume, the author of the sensational novel, The Mystery of a Hansom Cab, is an ardent Theosophist, and frequently lectures on occult subjects. His admirers have always preferred his exciting cab-rides to his wanderings after the Mahatmas.

Southend-on-Sea, which a year ago attained the dignity of a County Borough, has adopted a new coat of arms, which is distinctly ecclesiastical. A critic in a local paper says, "I doubt if it is wise to place on permanent record as emblem of torture, the gridiron, often used by one Christian sect towards another (doubtless with the best intention), even though it is placed in sinister." A palpable hit!

The dear clergy will note with pleasure that Providence is as lively as ever. About 3,000 people were killed by the earthquake on October 3 at Burdur and Isbarta, Asia Minor. This piece of playfulness is in no way connected with the pernicious writings of Nietzsche.

"Wife Murder Over a Halfpenny" is a startling headline in a contemporary. People betray no emotion when they hear that "God" was sold for thirty shillings.

The provincial police have been very busy "rounding-up" foreigners. If they were still living, Christ and his twelve disciples would be "roped in" by the boys in blue.

Mr. Harold Begbie, writing in the Daily Chronicle, says Americans have small respect for traditions. Great Scott! Are all the churches and tin tabernacles erected to the memory of George Washington?

Heinrich von Treitschke, the Berlin professor who has so excited the spleen of the English parsons, was a Lutheran. That fact will never prevent the theologians telling tarradiddles, and they will continue to call the Herr Professor "an Atheist."

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £219 18s. 9d. Received since:—H. T. C., £1 1s.; Robert Stirton and Friends, Dundee (quarterly), £1 3s.; S. Valentine Cannter, £1 1s.

Cape Town (per F. Silke): F. W. R. Silke, 12s. 6d.; G. A. Chisnell, 2s. 6d.; H. K. Jones, 2s. 6d.; H. Pentz, 2s. 6d.; (Mrs.) H. T. C., £1 1s.; K. C. C., £1 1s.

Leicester (per J. Ainge): S. Leeson, £1; W. Leeson, 5s.; D. Winterton, 2s. 6d.; — Barclet, 2s. 6d.; A. Wade, 2s. 6d.; J. Ainge, 2s. 6d.; W. Clark, 1s.; A. Letts, 1s.

F. SILKE.—If you cannot do all you would for Freethought do what you can. You never know what opportunities may arise. The book you mention has long been out of print. Sorry we cannot supply it.

S. T. ELLIS.—We wrote an article on the Lamb story once in the Freethinker. It was told by Hazlitt. The pious rendering in the goody-goody book you refer to is a reckless perversion.

E. MORGAN.—Shall be sent as desired. Pleased to hear that, after two years' reading, this has become the paper for you.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

K. C. C.—Much obliged for your kind letter. Fortunately, we are fairly "fit" for our work, and there is so much of it, both before and behind the scenes, that we have no time for mourning over any troubles.

J. AINGE.—Thanks for your efforts in behalf of the Fund.

H. T. C.—Sorry for the delay.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss Vance acknowledges a parcel of useful clothing from Mr. and Mrs. King (Luke x. 37).

ROBERT STIRTON.—Accept our warm thanks for your continued interest in the matter.

H. G. FARMER.—Thanks for article and letter.

T. MOSLEY.—May be our fault, but we don't see your point. Huxley certainly did make that affirmation.

T. LONSDALE.—We have never charged anything for N. S. S. advertisements, but we like to get them before Tuesday.

W. DOUGLAS.—Casuistry is a very interesting study, but it does not help us much in the practical affairs of life. Alphonse Karr (we think it was), being asked if he was opposed to capital punishment, replied, "Yes, but I want those gentlemen the murderers to begin."

E. B.—Thanks, though we can't use them till next week.

E. EDWARDS.—In our next.

MAUD CLARK.—There is much truth in your letter.

SOME correspondence stands over till next week.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote's first lecture this season will be delivered at the Leicester Secular Hall next Sunday evening (Nov. 8). Further details will appear in our next issue.

Mr. Sydney A. Gimson, President of the Leicester Secular Society, has been closely engaged of late as Chairman of the local Committee for helping Belgian refugees. We are glad to see that the Sunday evening meetings at the Secular Hall are still sustained. We were not sure of this until we received, for the first time, a copy of the September-December syllabus a few days ago. We note that the platform to-day (Nov. 1) is to be occupied by Mr. F. J. Gould, who should draw a good assembly to hear him on "Abraham Lincoln in Peace and War."

Mr. Mangasarian has resumed his work for the Free Religious (Rationalist) Association of Chicago. His weekly discourses are now delivered in a large building, the Garrick Theatre, which holds some 500 more people than the hall he has been lecturing in during the last few years. This is a tribute to his powers of advocacy and to the growth of Freethought in the great central city of the United States. The Association's monthly program contains one page out of four from Mr. Mangasarian's pen, besides his addresses which are published in a monthly organ called the Rationalist. We are happy to reproduce Mr. Mangasarian's open letter to President Wilson from the October program, or rather the first part of it, which will arouse in most, if not all, readers a taste for more.

We congratulate two good friends of ours, and two good Freethinkers, formerly of Southend and Margate, and now of Brighton (Mr. and Mrs. S. V. Cannter), on their late narrow escape from being hung, drawn, and quartered. They were arrested in a train as German spies. An intelligent English policeman saw them looking at a map. That was enough. What did it matter that both have a very un-German appearance, and talked what the schoolboy called "English English"? The map did it. They were liberated, however, after about four hours' detention. And we dare say they have had enough of intelligent English policemen for one lifetime.

Our veteran friend, Mr. J. W. de Caux, J.P., of Great Yarmouth, in a recent letter says: "I have never read the Freethinker with greater pleasure than I have recently. I am at one with you regarding the war." Mr. de Caux tells a humorous story, which is not altogether humorous. One of his premises is let to a merchant who lives at Ostend, and of course the poor landlord gets no rent, but the Yarmouth Corporation demand their ground-rent from the unfortunate Englishman all the same. He suggests that they should send the bill to the National Relief Fund, but they want their pound of flesh from him—as of course he expected, for it was only one of his apposite little jokes, after all.

Glasgow N. S. S. Branch members hold a meeting to-day (Sunday, Nov. 1) at 12 noon in the Good Templars' Hall, 122 Ingram-street.

We are happy to state that the Freethinker's circulation keeps up fairly well. But all the weight of the drop there is falls upon the poor Editor and proprietor. This is one of those cases in which the Editor works for the proprietor whatever happens, and the proprietor pays the Editor—when he can. At other times they weep together. Up to the present, however, contributors have not been called upon to join the melancholy concert. Will our friends do their best to give the paper an advertisement by introducing it, as far as possible, to their friends and acquaintances? This is the most effective form of advertising, and it is also the cheapest.

We are still ready, and more than ready, to send six consecutive copies of the Freethinker post free to any name and address that our readers may send us as of persons likely to be interested and perhaps to become regular subscribers. We have gained a good many readers, first and last, in this way.

Mr. Foote will probably have an important statement to make next week on matters arising out of the death of Mrs. C. Bowman, which is referred to elsewhere. A meeting of the Directors of the Secular Society, Ltd., must be held first.

Some idea of Mr. Foote's work behind the scenes may be gathered from the statement referred to in the previous paragraph, and why there is not always an article of his in the Freethinker, although his pen is always represented.

THE SIXTH COMMANDMENT.

In the education of children and in the leading of nations there is nothing more stupid and barbaric than prohibitory laws and regulations. In my circles I would rather endure faults and weaknesses until they had made room for better qualities than merely get rid of the faults, and leave nothing sensible to take their places. Man naturally loves to do that which is good and practical, if he only can.....He does vicious things only when kept in idleness from ennui. It displeases me to see children repeat the Ten Commandments. There is the sixth, for instance: "Thou shalt do no murder." As though men had the least desire to kill one another. But is it not a barbarous thing to forbid children to commit murder? If it read: "Take care of the life of others; remove what might be injurious to them; help the other, and save him at risk of your own life! If you do him harm, think that you harm yourself."—Goethe.

Digitized by Google

God's Views on Women.

GERTRUDE ATHERTON, an American authoress, says of men: "They admire God because he made himself of their gender, and knew what he was about when he invented woman." According to the Bible, however, woman was merely an afterthought of creation, and "brought sin into the world and all our woe," shortly after her appearance on the scene. She owes to man the rib for her manufacture. Eve, says Paul, was in the transgression. She had the curse which involves most suffering, and "He shall rule over thee" was a prophetic portion thereof. From first to last the Bible is a he-book. God is masculine, and his only begotten child is a son. Why did he not beget a daughter to right the wrong Mother Eve is said to have committed? The Roman Catholics have endeavored to supply this omission by elevating Mary to a position of more importance than God the Father himself.

Throughout the Bible women are treated with contempt. All God's favorites were polygamists. Women were bought and sold in the same way as other merchandise. Rebekah was virtually bought by Abraham's servant for Isaac. In the Ten Commandments a man's wife is classed with his ox, his ass, or anything which is his. In the chapter following the Decalogue permission is given to fathers to sell their daughters into slavery. Sarah gave Hagar, her female slave, "to her husband, Abraham, to be his wife," and when he was tired of her he cast her with her child into the desert. "And God said unto Abraham, Let it not be grievous in thy sight because of the lad, and because of thy bond-woman."

The patriarchal system had long been established when the Bible was compiled, although there are traces in the Old Testament records of a far earlier matriarchal stage, when kinship was traced through mothers, fathers being uncertain. The power of the father was supreme, extending, as in the case of Abraham, to life and death. He never thought of consulting Sarah as to whether he should sacrifice her only son. According to the divine laws dictated by God to Moses, all that a husband had to do if his wife found no favor in his eyes was to "write her a bill of divorcement, give it in her hand, and send her out of his house" (Deut. xxiv. 1). The woman had no power of appeal. Her husband was accuser, judge, and jury. No remedy is offered to the woman if her husband finds no favor in her eyes. A female child was held to be an extra defilement to a woman, and an additional atonement was required.

Painters depict angels as feminine, but the Bible angels are all males. The three who appeared to Abraham were mistaken for men. The one who wrestled with Jacob is called a man. The angel that announced a child to Manoah's wife was "a man of God." The angel that announced to Zachariah the birth of John was a male, and so was the one who appeared to Mary. It is curious how often angelic visits were followed by births.

The preacher who writes in the name of the sensual sultan Solomon declares: "One man among a thousand have I found; but a woman among all those have I not found." This is put forward as God's word, and his opinion of his handiwork. Burns made God a better compliment when he wrote of Nature:—

> "Her prentice han' she tried on man,
> And then she made the lasses, O!"

The women most praised in the Bible are Rahab, the harlot, who betrayed her own people, and Jael, the wife of Heber, the Kenite, who basely assassinated a man who took refuge in her tent. If women had written the Bible, they would not have selected such heroines as these. No wonder some of them desire a revised Woman's Bible of their own!

God surely never meant women to read his holy volume, or he would have expunged the many shameless stories and filthy words which it contains. A decent Deity would hardly have had the effrontery to inspire such narratives as those of Lot and his daughters, Tamar, the Levite's concubine, Bathsheba, Abishag, Aholah and Aholibah, and the details of Ezekiel, Hosea, and the Song of Solomon, if he had expected feminine readers. Had the Bible been written by women, be sure we should have had a different representation of them. Perhaps we might have read that it was Adam, not Eve, who was in the transgression.

The New Testament regards woman in much the same light as the Old. Paul says, "But I would have you know that the head of every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is the man" (1 Corin. xi. 3). In his Epistle to the Ephesians v. 22, he commands, "Wives submit yourselves unto your husbands as unto the Lord." That is to say, the submission must be unquestioning and complete. "For," he repeats, "the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church..... Therefore, as the Church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything." No despot could require a larger charter than granted by Paul. Again, he says, "Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection" (1. Tim. ii. 7). He affirms, in the most pronounced terms, that the position of woman is a subordinate and servile one. "I suffer not a woman to teach" he exclaims with masculine arrogance (1 Tim. ii. 12).

In the seventh chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, where Paul deals with the marriage relation, he puts that institution on a purely bestial basis, and says, "He that giveth a virgin in marriage doeth well, but he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better." Not a word as to the possibility of a girl having a will of her own in the matter. In a succeeding chapter (xi. 6-10) he insists that "the woman" must either be covered (wear a veil, as they do in the East) or "let her also be shorn." "For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God; but the woman is the glory of the man. For the man is not of the woman, but the woman of the man. Neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man." The verse which follows, "For this cause ought the woman to have power on her head because of the angels," has puzzled the commentators. It is illustrated by similar precepts in the Koran. Paul, like Mohammed, thought that even the angels might fall into the snares of female beauty. A little further on (xiv. 34, 35) Paul again says, "Let your women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law." Paul well knew that the whole tenor and spirit of the Bible touching the status of woman is that her main mission is but to minister to man—his inferior, not his equal.

Our "great exemplar" was a male, who never married. The references of Jesus to the sex are entirely of a monkish character. "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" he brutally exclaims to his mother. His chosen disciples were men, though he let women minister unto him. He taught that marriage was an inferior state, praising those who made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake (Matt. xix. 12). In the Apocalypse we find the elect of heaven are those "not defiled with women" (Rev. xiv. 4). The Catholic Church has always taught that unnatural celibacy is the higher state of life, and the early Christian Fathers unite in contemning the characters of women. Tertullian calls her "the gateway of hell." Through the ages when Christianity was predominant she was regarded emphatically as the temptress, the agent of Satan, to lead men from the holy life. Of the nine millions who, it has been computed, were slaughtered in the persecution of witchcraft, probably only one in five hundred was a male.

The teachings of the Bible have contributed to make slaves of women and tyrants of men. There are abundant signs that this old teaching will not suit the present day. Women, who desire the emancipation of their sex, should cease to work for the religion, which has built its churches on their prostration, and have the courage to affirm that Paul's authority has no influence with them.

Digitized by Google

(The late) J. M. WHEELER.

The Design Argument.

IN THE LIGHT OF ANATOMY AND PHYSIOLOGY.

[We have long meant to introduce this essay to our readers. It was written a good many years ago by a learned Hindu resident in America and published by the Truthseeker Publishing Co., and is perhaps the best popular reply to the Design Argument in existence.—EDITOR.]

THE design argument, that is, that there is a special design, particular intention, in Nature, for the good of all creatures, and especially for the good of man, who is made, as the religionists assert, to praise and glorify the Creator, has long been presented by the theologians to prove the personal being of God; his omnipotence, omniscience and omnipresence, which, in plain words, means his infinite power, his infinite knowledge, and his presence everywhere; so also, to prove his infinite love and merciful kindness, his infinite skill, wisdom, justice, holiness, unchangeableness, his eternity, and all the infinitely fine attributes that imagination can invent and manufacture in a language—attributes having meanings or no meanings at all, and of which one can form an idea or no idea whatsoever. And upon this false understanding and this absurd belief rests the whole fabric of the various religions in the world, with numberless creeds and castes, sects and factions, all of which divide man from man, poisoning the minds of one toward another, and creating dissensions and quarrels, wars and persecutions. This illogical, this unscientific and unreasonable understanding, this false belief in God and his so-called attributes, is the cause, as I have just said, of all the religions and their sects with all their infinitely evil consequences—curses, lies, falsehoods, pride, hopocrisy, hatred, and miseries under various forms and names.

This huge tree of evil, of monstrous dimensions, has spread its branches far and wide, from hemisphere to hemisphere, devastating human happiness by creating, enforcing, and encouraging falsehoods, narrow-mindedness, hate, and intolerance in the extreme, and thus desecrating the otherwise most tolerant, the purest, and the noblest of souls.

I wish to strike at the very root of this tree of evil, instead of chopping off its tender foliage and twigs.

I assert that Medical Science, viewed impartially and with an unbiased mind, shatters the very foundation of this fabric of false belief and deception practised upon the mind of man, by the ignorant and the cunning, for many ages past and from time immemorial.

I wish to consider the design argument anatomically and physiologically, that is to say, in relation to our body, in relation to its structure and to its functions. It is quite clear, however, that in a single discourse, like to-day's, we can consider only a few points of the subject.

The theologians aver that the body of man—both in its structure and its functions—points out to us a great and perfect designer, a kind and wise father, an almighty and all-merciful creator. They prove their assertions by statements like these:—

1. The total or utter helplessness of the child, say they, is well-known. And, therefore, in order that it may not break its limbs by falls and accidents, God has, through his infinite mercy and forethought, formed the bones of its body so elastic and pliable that even by a severe blow or an accidental fall, which would break the limbs of the strongest of men, those of the child go unhurt. There is the mercy of the great loving Father exhibited, in protecting the helpless child of his.

2. Not only that, but the proof of his infinite loving kindness is much more extraordinarily shown by the provision he makes for the child, in the breast of its mother, even long before the child is born. This provision is milk—the food which contains all the ingredients necessary to sustain the life of man—and admirably fitted for the nourishment of infants. This milk is being created along with the child, which is gradually developing in the mother's womb. How wonderful!

3. Then, again, the child can suck the milk out of its mother's breasts without any teaching on the part of man. Who teaches the child to suckle then? It is God, the merciful, the benevolent and the most tender-hearted Father and Mother of the child. He is far kinder than the child's earthly parents.

4. Now, the fourth point that they want to force upon the attention of the people is the thickness and the strength of the skull in which the brain—the most important of the organs of the body—is lodged. The skull instead of being formed of one bone only, is formed of twenty-two bones, of which eight form the head and fourteen form the face. Although the bones, especially of the head, are soft and separate from each other in infancy, they grow firmer and thicker, and join together as the age of the child advances. Why did God form the skull of several bones and not of only one bone? Certainly to make the skull stronger, like the stones of an arch. Another purpose is to enable it to bear even a severe blow—an external shock—that the brain inside may not be easily hurt.

5. Now, about articulations, which in ordinary language mean joints. There are two hundred bones in our body, and these bones are joined together by ligaments, which serve as binders. Ligaments are strong, tough, white, and shining skins. Joining of bones is called articulation. God, out of his infinite wisdom and mercy, has managed the joints in a very wonderful manner. He has joined these bones together, more or less firmly, and supplied them with more or less ligaments, and given more or less elasticity to them, according to the purposes he has intended them to serve. One bone is exactly fitted to the other, and ligaments hold the ends of the bones together.

6. God has not only made joints, but in order that they may work well, has also oiled them, as we do wheel and axle of a carriage. There is a bag-shaped skin, called synovial membrane, around the joints. These membranes secrete a liquid substance which answers the purpose of oil and keeps the joints always soft. Some vessels give out this oil; others take it up when it has become unfit for use. What a marvellous contrivance is this! We have not to oil our joints. This oil is made when it is wanted, and supplied without any help from man. No man does it or can ever do it. It is God—the only most skilled mechanic—that does it, and who alone can do it. None else.

7. I shall now direct your attention to a very ingenious contrivance in the throat. We all know we breathe. The air goes down into the lungs and out again through the windpipe which lies in front of the gullet. To keep food from going into the windpipe, God has put there a kind of little door, technically called the epiglottis, which is intended to cover it (the windpipe) when we swallow food. But in case any particle of food should fall into the windpipe, the lungs contract and force the air through the passage to drive it out. What wonderful contrivance again!

8. The eighth point to which I shall draw your attention is the eye. The eye is the most important of all the organs of sense. To effect the movements of the eye in every direction there are seven muscles. We have two eyes to enable us to see better, and if we should lose the one, by an accident or disease, we have the other. The eye is placed in the front of the head, where it is most useful. It is carefully guarded by the bones which jut out all around it. The eye is protected by two shutters—the eyelids. They keep out the light of the sun when it is too powerful. The eyelids, as well as the eyelashes, keep off small bodies like dust and flies. The eye is wonderfully made by

Digitized by Google

God of three coats called tunics, which are opaque, except the middle portion through which we see, and three transparent substances through which refraction of the rays of light takes place. Of these three transparent substances, which are called media, two are aqueous (watery), and the third which is called the crystalline lens, is in substance like half-melted gum. In shape it is like two watch-glasses with their hollow sides placed together. Had these aqueous humors or the lens been opaque, we could not have seen anything at all. So how wise and kind of God—the Father in heaven—to keep these things transparent, and enable us to see the glory of his creation, and to marvel at it.

9. The ninth point is about the processes of the healing of our body in case of wounds caused by cuts, burns, etc. This proves how God has designed means for the cure of his injured creatures. Take, for instance, the process called cicatrisation. In this, the wound is healed by the raw surface gradually becoming smooth and varnished over with a thin bluish-white layer. This is the first indication of the new skin. This process of healing spreads from the edges, or from any islands of skin that may have been left, or that may have been grafted by the surgeon. As it goes on, it draws the margins together by concentric contraction. After the whole has been skinned over, other important changes are gradually developed. The cicatrical tissue, which was at first thin, blue, and shining, becomes thicker, of a natural color, and covered over by a layer of epithelium; in fact, it approaches, though it may not attain, the character of true skin.

From this we can clearly see how God, through his infinite mercy, ingeniously endeavors to heal up wounds.

10. The tenth and the last, but not the least, point is about bodily pain. Pain, which man tries to avoid with all his power, which he hates and fears, proves, above all things, great wisdom of God, his great mercy, his perfect design for the good of man and man's happiness. Pain, is a very salutary provision; inasmuch as it teaches vigilance and caution, it gives notice of danger, and excites those endeavors which may be necessary for the preservation of self. It is the unmistakable and the true monitor. It points out to us exactly where disease is, where destruction of the tissue or the mismanagement of the functions is going on, and calls our immediate attention to the remedies. It gives us real signals of danger. It is decidedly intended—by that loving Almighty Father, from whom nothing is hid—for our good. Suppose our hand is on fire; if there were no pain, our hand would be burnt to ashes. Pain in a broken bone makes us keep it still, without which it could not heal. The evil consequence which sometimes arises from the want of that timely intimation of danger which pain gives is known to the inhabitants of cold countries by the effect of frost-bitten limbs. Some people have lost toes and fingers by this cause. They were totally unconscious of any local uneasiness at the time. Then, by this, it is emphatically proved that there is a great use of pain, though we don't like it, and that it is intended and appointed by the great and kind Father for our good, through his unbounded, unabating, and fathomless mercy.

I have, quite impartially, and as clearly as possible, tried to place before you some of the arguments that the theologians generally bring forward in relation to the structure and functions of our body, to prove the special design of God for the welfare and happiness of man.

Now, let us see how these ten points, these ten arguments of the theologians, stand the test of scrutiny, and whether they really serve to prove the design of some personal, benevolent being—God—for the good of man. Let us examine how far these points, these facts, stand before other facts, counteracting their influence. Let us impartially examine them, and see if they really prove that there is a God to design these things for the good of man or none at all; or, if there be one, whether he is not a great malevolent being, rather than a really benevolent one, or both—which is evidently a contradiction in terms.

Let us now try to take one point after another and examine it carefully.

The first point is with regard to the pliability, the quality of yielding to pressure, in the bones of children. Were the bones hard, like those of adults, they would be more easily broken by accidents.

In answer to this, I say that it is not true that God, out of his protecting care for infants and children, has made the bones pliable in order that they may not be broken, but they are not so easily broken because they are pliable. To be able to comprehend the subject properly, let us look at the composition of bones. The bone is composed of one-third organic or animal matter and two-thirds inorganic or earthy matter. The organic or animal matter gives to the bone elasticity or toughness, while inorganic or earthy matter gives the bone its hardness and solidity. This proportion of the chemical composition of bone is found in the bones of the adult. In the bones of the young people, animal matter predominates, and, therefore, although the bones don't easily break, they are less strong, and liable to be bent under the pressure of the body; while in old people, earthy matter predominates, and, therefore, the bones become brittle and are easily broken. Now, I ask, if God, through his infinite kindness, protects the bones of children from being broken, why does he not protect the bones of old people? Does he not see the necessity of protecting the old, in whom the bones are very liable to be easily fractured? I say, in their case, in point of bones, there is the real necessity of God's intervention and protection. Again, if one says, because the child's bone may not be easily broken, that God, out of his merciful kindness and love, has made it elastic and pliable, he will have to admit that because the old person's limb may be easily broken, God, out of his infinite wickedness and hate, has made the bones of the aged brittle and friable. If the designist is ready to admit the conclusion of the first argument, he cannot but admit, whether he wish it or not, the conclusion of the second also, which is mortally against him.

One might say that the aged person's bone breaks because, as age advances, earthy matter predominates over the animal matter, rendering the bone more and more liable to break, and, in old age, it is actually brittle. What wonder is there that it should break, then!

I say this is the very thing that I hold; in old age the bone easily breaks because it is brittle, for earthy matter predominates; so also in childhood it does not so easily break, because it is pliable, owing to the animal matter predominating. There is no interference of God or anybody in the matter. This is merely the course Nature takes.

Now, again, if it is admitted for a moment that God specially cares for children and protects them, how is it that he does not protect children from falls from windows and from burns by fire, by which so many of them die, and the reports of which we read in our dailies? Is it that he is unable to protect them if the falls are above a few feet in height? Then, again, it is not that the children are not at all injured by ordinary falls. They are often very seriously injured by them. Again, also, children die by a variety of other accidents, and by climatic influences and epidemics. Where is God's special providence for the protection of children then? Has God guaranteed himself only against the breaking of bones and not against any injury by cuts and burns and climate and what not?

The whole truth with regard to bones is that the bones are not already formed in infancy. They are, in the commencement, cartilages and membranes, and, as age advances, these cartilages and membranes go on ossifying—forming into bones. This process goes on from infancy to manhood, say up to the twenty-fifth year. As the process of ossification goes on, from day to day, the animal matter in the bone becomes less and less, while earthy matter increases more and more. Well, then, it is clear that as animal matter lessens and earthy matter increases, the bones get less and less soft and pliable, and more and more hard and strong, until the bones fully grow or are completely ossified, as it is technically called, when the technical composition of bone comes to be one-third animal matter and two-thirds earthy matter, as I have already mentioned. After this chemical proportion is completed, the turn of ossification is on the reverse. The bone then goes on losing animal matter and adding to it more of the earthy, thus rendering it less pliable and more brittle, and, therefore, more easily breakable.

Digitized by Google

This is the whole fact, the whole truth. No God loves and protects the child, and no Devil hates and destroys the old man. All this is only blind and and unfeeling Nature's course, through which all the stages of animal existence must go, such as the embryonic state, infancy, childhood, manhood, old age, and final decay.

The second point is about the provision in the shape of milk for the nourishment of the child in its mother's breasts.

If, I say, God out of his mercy and protecting care creates milk for the child even before it is born, how is it that many thousands and millions of mothers have not milk enough for the proper nourishment of the child, and many of them, both rich and poor, have no milk at all? Want of milk in mothers is the general and the loudest complaint throughout the world. Hence these millions of infant feeding bottles and tins and pots of condensed milk. Then, again, it oftentimes happens that when the child is living, there is, in fact, a very small quantity of milk, quite insufficient for its support, but immediately after the death of the poor child, there begins such a large secretion, and such an overflow of milk that the breasts are over-distended and rendered extremely painful. This state of distention sometimes brings on a high fever and makes the poor, lamenting mother ill. Why, I ask, is there so much milk in the mother after the child's death, after the poor, innocent suckling has gone, when it wants no more of it, while it was actually scanty and insufficient when the child was living? This provision, I say, is a provision of an insane being, if it is of any being at all. It is the wickedest of all the wickedness that even the wickedest man on earth can ever conceive of, if you can only bring the lamenting mother's grief to your mind's eye.

(To be continued.)

LUNAR POLITICS.

If a man asks me what the politics of the inhabitants of the moon are, and I reply that I do not know; that neither I, nor anyone else, have any means of knowing; and that, under these circumstances, I decline to trouble myself about the subject at all, I do not think he has any right to call me a sceptic. On the contrary, in replying thus, I conceive that I am simply honest and truthful, and show a proper regard for the economy of time. So Hume's strong and subtle intellect takes up a great many problems about which we are naturally curious, and shows us that they are essentially questions of lunar politics, in their essence incapable of being answered, and therefore not worth the attention of men who have work to do in the world. And he thus ends one of his essays:—"If we take in hand any volume of Divinity, or school metaphysics, for instance, let us ask, Does it contain any abstract reasoning concerning quantity or matter? No. Does it contain any experimental reasoning concerning matter of fact or existence? No. Commit it, then, to the flames; for it can contain nothing but sophistry and illusion."

Permit me to enforce this most wise advice. Why trouble ourselves about matters of which, however important they may be, we do know nothing, and can know nothing? We live in a world which is full of misery and ignorance, and the plain duty of each and all of us is to try to make the little corner he can influence somewhat less miserable and somewhat less ignorant than it was before he entered it. To do this effectually it is necessary to be fully possessed of only two beliefs: the first, that the order of nature is ascertainable by our faculties to an extent which is practically unlimited; the second, that our volition counts for something as a condition of the course of events.—Huxley.

A Retort on the Spiritist.

You think of me as seeing no essential difference between mind and the material properties of the brain. As well might I think of you as seeing no essential difference between music and the material properties of the piano from which it is evoked. Because you assert that music is produced from the piano, do you, therefore, assert any kinship in nature between a piano-string and the aerial pulse it generates when struck? Or do you, therefore, assert an identity between such pulses and the relations among them which constitute cadences and harmonies? No more, then, do I, in asserting the dependence of mind on nervous structure, assert any kinship in nature between the matter of a nerve-cell and the actions that arise from it, or between these actions and those relations among them which constitute thought. Do you object to the parallel because the piano remains silent till touched, while the brain acts without external help? I reply that in either case the power is derived from without, and that the effect of the structure is simply that of transforming it. As the motion given to an automatic musical instrument passes through its specialised structure and comes out in the form of particular combinations of aerial pulses, simultaneous and successive; so the motion locked up in a man's food, added to that directly received through his senses, is transformed while passing through the nervous system into those combinations of nervous actions which, on their subjective faces, are thoughts and feelings.

But this analogy is far too rude to convey a true conception. Not with sensible motion, even though it be that of the invisible air, has mind any direct kinship; but only with insensible motions of kinds inconceivably more subtle and immeasurably more rapid. Not to combined undulations of ponderable substance, however rare, is mind to be assimilated; but only to combined undulations of the all-pervading imponderable substance which we know of only by inference from their effects. The activities of this imponderable substance, though far simpler, and in that respect far lower, than the activities we call mind, are at the same time far higher than those we call mind in respect of their intensity, their velocity, their subtlety. What has been gained in adaptability has been lost in vivacity. Though mind brings into adjustment the apparatus by which certain ethereal undulations emanating from the sun are brought to a focus, yet mind cannot, like these concentrated undulations, dissipate the diamond placed in that focus. Though mind is capable of devising an electric telegraph, yet it remains wholly insensible to those slight molecular agitations on the other side of the earth which transform themselves into sensible motions on this side. And now that the rates and volitions of our ideas have been measured, we learn that, though thought is quick, light is many millions of times quicker.

Your conception, O Spiritualist, is far too gross for me. I know not what may be the extent to which you have refined this creed which you inherit from aboriginal man. Disembodied spirit was conceived by your remote ancestors (as it is still conceived by various existing savages) as material enough to take part in battle, and even to be killed over again. Becoming less concrete and definite as knowledge increased, the idea of a ghost continued, till quite modern days, to be that of a being which could cause alarming noises and utter words. Even your quite recent ancestors, transparent as they supposed the substance of a ghost to be, nevertheless supposed it visible. Possibly you have still further purified their belief. But, whether you confess it or not, you cannot think of disembodied spirit without thinking of it as occupying a separate place in space—as having position and limits, and such materiality as is implied by limits. This idea, not commended to me by its genealogy, quite unsatisfactory in its nature and wholly unsupported by evidence, I cannot accept.—Herbert Spencer.

Obituary.

We have to announce the death of Mrs. Elizabeth Bowman, wife of Charles Bowman, late of Tower Hill, London, at West End Cottage, Ventnor, October 18, 1914, in the 87th year of her age. Mrs. Bowman's figure was familiar to the regular attendants at the Hall of Science and Athenæum Hall meetings.—E. M. VANCE.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

OUTDOOR.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, a Lecture.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Miss E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6¼ ins. by 8¾ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1885-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... Editor.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra.
Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.
Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implication of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Babcock, 21 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be base on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biogrophical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LETTERS OF A CHINAMAN ON THE MISCHIEF OF MISSIONARIES. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.

FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY.

Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d. (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.

(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)

THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.

Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.

THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.

Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 45 SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

We are not allowed to grow up before choosing our religion. We as little choose our religion as we choose to be born. It is done for us without our having part in it.—CARDINAL NEWMAN.

"God in History."

THE Rev. Dr. Adams Brown is the Professor of Systematic Theology at the Union Theological Seminary, New York. It is his profession to elucidate and defend the Christian religion, to refute all arguments against it, and to remove obstacles to belief in it. The Drew Lectureship in connection with Hackney Congregational College was established for the purpose of dealing with the subject of immortality; but Professor Brown, the appointed lecturer for this year, felt that, important as the question of a future life is, there is a prior question which forces itself upon our attention in this hour of unparalleled struggle and sacrifice, and so chose as his subject, "God in History." His discourse appeared in the Christian World Pulpit for October 28. The first proposition which he lays down is "that God is in history, and that through all the struggle and strife and sin of men and of nations he is in control"; but he does not even attempt to demonstrate its truth. What he offers us is not evidence of any kind, but a confession of faith, or a series of dogmatic assertions. Verses from the Bible are thrown at us in great abundance, but they are of no value whatever, except in so far as they show that their authors cherished the faith so proudly gloried in by our lecturer. If those Old Testament prophets, if Jesus and his apostles, and if the giants of the early Church believed that the march of contending armies, the rise of dynasties and the fall of cities took place by God's decree and for the execution of his purpose, what is there to prevent us from sharing so confident a conviction? We will here quote Dr. Brown's own words:—

> "I have spoken of our experience as unparalleled in human history, but the statement needs qualification. It is unparalleled in magnitude, but not in quality. Hunger is hunger, and pain pain, and death death the world over; in Palestine as in Belgium, in Rome as in Austria and France. And the anguish of hope deferred, the shattering of ideals, the bitterness of the 'I would, but ye would not,' were as poignant to the patriarchs and saints of the first Christian century as they can be to us to-day. There is nothing, I repeat, that any man or woman or child is experiencing to-day which has not been experienced by others over and over and over again. There is no challenge to faith in what we see which has not been met by faith in the past and vanquished."

We are surprised at the display of naivete which the erudite Professor makes in that passage. Is he not aware that the writers of the Bible and Christian theologians, down to very recent times, firmly believed in witchcraft? Is that any reason why we should regard it as true? Our forefathers held many views, the truth of which has now been fully disproved. The writers of the Bible and Christian divines for centuries were convinced that the earth was the centre of the universe, and that the heavenly bodies had been created on purpose to supply it with light and heat. Does Dr. Brown swear by that antiquated astronomy? We frankly admit that the belief in the Divine government of the world has been held by the majority of people in all ages; but our contention is that there is no better foundation for it than there was for the belief in witchcraft or the ptolemaic astronomy, and certainly the Professor does not succeed in showing any at all.

He opens the lecture by saying that "it is time for us to come to grips with facts." We agree, but regret to report that Dr. Brown, though acknowledging the facts, never comes to grips with them. Indeed, he lets the facts severely alone, and talks theology for an hour. He alludes to the "mysteries" of God's providence in history; and then proceeds to tell us what he sees as he contemplates them. The contemplation of "mysteries" can never be a profitable occupation. But Dr. Brown mentions the "mysteries" of Divine providence only to treat them as non-existent. He talks about God's providence in history as if he knew all about it. He pretends to be able to see three things in it: God at work for a moral purpose; God at work for a social purpose; and God at work for a religious purpose. Not one of those three things can we see, though we have looked our hardest for them. Does Dr. Brown see them? Let us try to find out. He says:—

> "When I say that God is in history for a moral purpose, I mean that his chief concern is the making and training of character. Not happiness, but discipline is his primary interest, and happiness, when it comes, is only the seal that the discipline is complete."

What is Germany? The rod of God's anger against Belgium, France, Russia, Great Britain, and Portugal, the razor with which he is shaving the heads and beards of these Powers. The Kaiser was perfectly justified in saying that he is the instrument of the Almighty, his sword, his weapon, his vicegerent; but will Dr. Brown inform us what the countries thus smitten had done to deserve so drastic a chastisement? Can he explain to us God's moral purpose towards Belgium in permitting the ruthless destruction of her towns and villages and the cruel slaughter of her people? Are the Belgians likely to improve morally by being robbed of their possessions, driven away from their homes, and compelled to roam as exiles in lands not their own? Are such chastisements worthy of an all-loving Heavenly Father? Dr. Brown refers us back to the history of Israel, whose misfortunes, he assures us, so far from "proving that God had abandoned them, were rather warnings which he had sent them for their good, stages which they must pass on their way to salvation." We have carefully studied the Old Testament, especially the Books of the Prophets, and we remember quite well how Amos (iii. 2) represents Jehovah as saying: "You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will visit upon you all your iniquities." Does not Dr. Brown realise how infinitely absurd it is to depict the Father of the human race as choosing one little tribe in an out-of-the-way corner and lavishing upon it all the wealth of his affection, while having absolutely nothing to do with the rest except in so far as they could be employed as executors of his will towards Israel? Now, what became of Jehovah's chosen, peculiar people, whose misfortunes, however terrible, are said to have been but the proof of Jehovah's love? He often gave them cleanness of teeth in all their cities and want of bread in all their places; he withheld the rain when most wanted, and sent it when it meant disaster; he smote them with blasting and mildew, and directed the palmerworm to devour the multitudes of their gardens and their vineyards and their fig-trees and their olive-trees; he sent among them the pestilence after the manner of Egypt, slew their young men with the sword, and carried away their horses. These and worse calamities befell them as tokens of God's love and care. They were undergoing moral discipline, God's chief concern being the making and training of their character. Well, what happened to these people who were loved, chastised, and disciplined on so terrific a scale? They were lost to history forever. In their captivity they ceased to be a nation. What Dr. Brown calls God's moral purpose concerning them resulted in their complete destruction. Their misfortunes, so far from being stages in their journey to salvation, ultimately conveyed them to their national tomb.

Digitized by Google

It is impossible to conceive of a God of love permitting the present War and using it as a moral discipline to those engaged in it. The God of Amos and Dr. Brown is to us an intolerable monster in whom thinking people cannot bring themselves to believe. Suffering and sorrow are not blessings in disguise, but evils that require to be uprooted and cast off. The Christian teaching on this point is essentially immoral. This is how Professor Brown puts it:—

> "Suffering is God's means of training character. Far from its being a sign of his forgetfulness, the proof of his weakness or of his indifference, it is through suffering that God teaches his most important lessons and opens the way for the impartation of his choicest blessings.....Where other religions have shrunk from pain as the supreme evil, or turned aside from it as the supreme mystery, Christianity looks it full in the face and finds in it the price of salvation."

That is a damnable doctrine, and its prevalence in Christendom has resulted in the present painful crisis. It is the quintessence of folly to imagine that the unspeakable and unjust sufferings inflicted upon the Belgians are the price of their salvation, or that France's sorrows are the means of purging her moral character. All our sufferings and sorrows are of an exclusively human origin, and must be looked upon as signs of the imperfection and immaturity of our social life. Had Dr. Brown's God existed, such a state of things would have been inconceivable. He would have made a perfect man, who would have done right on every occasion, whose life would have been an exact copy, on a small scale, of his Creator's. There would have been no disputes between individuals or between nations, and war would never been heard of. But if we come to grips with facts, we shall learn that mankind has not yet completely emerged from the savage state, and that every now and then it slips back into it, and acts as if it had never left it. Once our animal passions are roused, our intelligence becomes their slave, and we fight on a scale of brutality beyond the reach of lower animals, and the stronger, better-equipped party invariably comes out on top. It is a fundamental error to imagine that the right always wins. It is might, skilfully applied, that generally carries the day; and might is not always at the disposal of right.

The only rational conclusion is that God is not and never has been in history. The facts are not on speaking terms with him. Neither he nor his purposes can reasonably be declared to be a factor in the progress of humanity.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Churches and the War.—II.

(Concluded from p. 690.)

IN considering the nature of the "Christian Message to a Nation at War," Sir Robertson Nicoll naturally finds himself confronted with those New Testament precepts that enjoin non-resistance. His method of dealing with them is neither new nor courageous. It consists in denying that they mean what they say—or perhaps one ought to put it—they do not say what they mean. When the New Testament says "Resist not evil," or "Give to him that asketh of thee," etc., it does not really mean what a plain and literal interpretation would imply. And, of course, by this rule of interpretation one can make the New Testament, or any other book, mean exactly what one pleases. Indeed, if only the Powers would have allowed the German Government to apply that rule of interpretation to the treaty guaranteeing the neutrality of Belgium, there could have been no talk of its violation. Treaties are only binding, with honorable people, so long as their terms are taken in a plain and literal sense. And unless the New Testament means what it says, or says what it means, it might as well be written in an utterly unknown language.

There is something exceedingly ingenuous in Sir Robertson Nicoll's defence of the New Testament teaching, and in his use of it as an aid for the recruiting sergeant. People, he says, are "in difficulty because they believe that all war is forbidden by Christ." Some of these he declines to bother with because they are not friendly towards Christianity, and, therefore, not worth bothering about. But there are others "whose conscience is tender," and they must be considered. A rather curious rule which decides that objections are not worth considering unless put forward by people who are eager to snatch at any apology that will excuse their swallowing the teachings to which objection is taken! So to these people with a tender conscience Sir Robertson Nicoll points out, that if we take "I say unto you that ye resist not evil, but whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek turn him the other also," literally, then, it does forbid all resistance to evil. But are we meant to take it literally? To this the answer is, no; and the reason for the answer is, that if we take it literally it becomes foolish and impracticable. Quite so; but observe the simplicity of the argument. It is urged that such a precept is impracticable. Sir Robertson does not deny this, if we take it to mean what it says; so, therefore, it must mean something else. Charming! You strike the plain meaning of the text out because to admit it destroys its value. That is the sole reason for not accepting the clear sense of it. No other is given or is even possible.

Sir Robertson supports his position by pointing out that earnest Christians do not take the text enjoining indiscriminate almsgiving literally; and if not this text, why others? Quite so; if one may twist the meaning of one passage, one may twist the meaning of other passages. But this is clearly no answer to the man who denies the right to twist any passage. The editor of the British Weekly appears to be under the impression that no one believes that the New Testament means what it says. He is quite mistaken. There are many thousands who take that view of the New Testament, and for that very reason do not believe in it. Sir Robertson Nicoll says that when he discovers a man who will give to everyone that asks, he will "discuss with that man the meaning of the precept, 'Resist not evil.'" Meanwhile, he intends to go on expounding. This is very simple—and safe. You do not argue, you simply tell people. Those who do not agree with you will soon give you up as a bad job; those who do agree will gather round and hail you as an inspired teacher. It is an illustration of the principle of selection—the selected being the unthinking and the uncritical.

In last week's article I indicated that Sir Robertson Nicoll had a reply to the Quaker position. Here it is. He turns on the Quaker with the question:—

> "We put to ourselves the question whether a Christian could stand passive and see outrage done on mother, wife, sister, or child, and we say with a great certainty that he could not."

One sincerely hopes that Sir Robertson is right, and that no Christian would stand passively by in such circumstances. But it is not a question of what Christians do. In practice the matter adjusts itself easily enough. A man, whether he calls himself a Christian or not, placed in such circumstances, would act exactly as his instincts prompts him. He would not stop to consider what he should do as a Christian, or as anything else, he would simply act. But that is not the question. It is not a question of what Christians do, it is a question of what their sacred book says they should do. All that Sir Robertson succeeds in showing is that Christians do not carry out a number of New Testament precepts. There is nothing new in this. The Freethinker has been pointing it out for a generation. Christians do not turn the other cheek when one is smitten, they do not meet evil unresistingly, they do not give to everyone that asks them, they do not refrain from laying up treasures on earth, they do not trust to faith to cure disease. Everyone is familiar with these facts—too familiar, perhaps—for if they were less common their significance might be better appreciated. The curious thing is, that Sir Robertson Nicoll appears to have convinced himself that because Christian conduct does not square with Christian precept, therefore, Christian precept cannot mean what it says. Less sophisticated students of social phenomena would conclude, that if Christians have so universally ignored the plain meaning of Christian teachings, it must be because there is something radically faulty in the teachings themselves.

Digitized by Google

Mr. R. J. Campbell said, lately, while acting as chairman for Sir Robertson Nicoll, that teaching of non-resistance applied to individuals only. He said:—

> "As to the words of our Lord concerning non-resistance, I would submit that they apply to the individual, and to the resentment of personal injuries. I ask you to observe what the form of those aphorisms is. 'Whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek turn to him the other also.' He did not say, Whosoever shall smite thy wife or thy child let him hit again. Our Master's words relate all the time to the resenting of our personal injuries."

So that while Sir Robertson Nicoll denies that the text means what it says, Mr. Campbell believes it is to be read quite literally, only its application is limited to individuals. The editor of the British Weekly evades the question, and ends by being ridiculous. Mr. Campbell faces it, and ends by being amusing. If a man may not resist an injury directed towards himself, why should he resist an injury directed towards others? And if each one is to be engaged in resisting injury directed towards someone else, and the someone else is willing to reap the advantages of that resistance, are people not all the time doing what the text prohibits? Moreover, the argument always urged in favor of non-resistance has been that you overcome hatred by love, violence by gentleness, abuse by meekness. And what real difference does it make to the wrong-doer if the hand that knocks him down is not that of the person injured, but only of his friend? Finally, if individuals are not warranted in resisting evil, how does a nation—a collection of individuals—become warranted in doing so?

The truth is that Mr. Campbell's explanation is one invented to suit the circumstances of the moment. The nation is at war, and many Christians are puzzled to square a war in which the names of Christianity and God are so freely invoked with New Testament teaching. If, therefore, Mr. Campbell says that the New Testament does not admit the appeal to force, he injures his standing in the the country. If he admits the right to use force, he weakens the value of the New Testament as an ethical guide. There is a via media, if Mr. Campbell had but the wit to see it and the courage to proclaim it. But, lacking these, like a true theologian, he invents an interpretation to suit the needs of the moment. No one is allowed to resist evil toward themselves; everyone is warranted in resisting evil towards someone else. It is resistance by substitute, with the effect on the evil-doer the same in either case.

And yet I believe that Mr. Campbell is nearer the truth than Sir Robertson Nicoll. Both are anxious just at present—although they may wish to reverse it later—to prove that the New Testament does not forbid war. Sir Robertson's method is to deny that the New Testament means what it says. Mr. Campbell's plan is to accept the meaning, but to give it a narrower range. It only applies to individuals. And that, I think, is nearer the truth. The precepts attributed to Jesus are counsels of perfection for individuals only. They were intended for those individuals who desired the higher religious life. There was nothing new in this being so. It is a very common aspect of Eastern religious life. It was not intended to apply to social life, or to international relations, because these are practically outside the New Testament purview. There is no social gospel in the New Testament; there is no theory of the State there; and, consequently, there is no teaching as to the relations between States. It is a gospel addressed to the individual; and it has broken down everywhere for the reason that, in ignoring the fundamental character of the social relationships, it necessarily remained ignorant of the nature of the individual.

The editor of the British Weekly and the oracle of the City Temple are merely playing the customary game of theological opportunism. Their real purpose is not to find out what the New Testament means, but what they can make it mean, so as to suit the present situation. The nation is now in a warlike mood, and so it must be shown that Christianity does not forbid war. When that mood passes, and if a peace-wave sweeps over the country, we shall be told, with equal assurance, that war in any form is decidedly anti-Christian. The Churches are at their old game. They do not lead, they follow public opinion. They do not educate, they distort. War and peace, slavery and freedom, anarchism, socialism, and conservatism, autocracy and democracy, anything and everything has been justified by an appeal to the fetish of the Churches. And the Churches are now what they always were—useless in times of peace, and a nuisance in times of war. Their chief, almost their sole, interest is to conserve their position, and retain a place of power that is justified by neither experience nor common sense.

C. COHEN.

The Man in the Moon.

> "Truly, the moon shines with a good grace."
> —SHAKESPEARE.

"THE lesser light which rules the night" has always been a favorite subject of contemplation. The more glorious sun had also, and has still, his worshipers; but, apparently, the moon has the greater importance assigned to her in the public mind. The superstitions to which her supposed influence has given rise are almost inexhaustible. She is supposed not only to determine weather, but to influence a number of other things. Our own immortal Zadkiel seems to think that there are few things, from pitch and toss to manslaughter, in which Phœbe has not a finger. His evergreen rival, Old Moore,

> "With the moon was more familiar
> Than almost any other fellow;
> Her secrets understood so clear
> That some believed he had been there."

It cannot, however, be said of either of these eminent men, as of the Rosicrucian in Hudibras, that, with all their knowledge, they are aware

> "Who first found out the man i' th' moon,
> That to the ancients was unknown."

Indeed, the ancients were so chivalrous that they identified the beauteous goddess Artemis and the chaste Diana with the moon. To them she was a virgin deity attended by her maidens, and her temple at Ephesus was one of the seven wonders of the world. Other times, other faiths. Byron poked fun at the older beliefs:—

Digitized by Google

"The ocean's tides and mortals' brains she sways,
And also hearts, if there be truth in lays."

The Heathen Chinee have a legend that a rabbit lives in the moon, and makes those shadows on its face which have so often attracted the attention of the curious and the amorous. This legend is transformed by the creed of the pious Buddhist into an equally pious hare, which met Gotama one day when he had wandered astray in a forest. The polite hare offered assistance, and Gotama replied that he was poor and hungry, and could give no reward for his kindness. The legendary hare replied in a manner worthy of a courtier of Le Grand Monarque: "If you are hungry, I am at your service; make a fire, kill, roast, and eat me." Buddha tested the animal's devotion by kindling a fire, into which the hare jumped. The hare was, however, not sacrificed; for the Teacher pitied it, plucked it from the flames, and hurled it to the moon, where it remains for ever, an awful warning of the danger of politeness in a wicked world.

The fancy of the American Indian shapes the marks on the moon into human form:—

"At the door on summer evenings
Sat the little Hiawatha.
Saw the moon rise from the water,
Rippling, rounding from the water.
Saw the flecks and shadows on it;
Whispered, 'What is that, Nokamis?'
And the good Nokamis answered:
'Once a warrior, very angry,
Seized his grandmother, and threw her
Up into the sky at midnight;
Right against the moon he threw her.
'Tis her body that you see her.'"

Some of the Pacific Islanders likewise believe in a woman in the moon. To the Scandinavian the shadows appear to be made by two children whom the moon kidnapped as they were returning from the well with a bucket of water slung on a stick between them. The Poles call the man in the moon Paul Twardowski, and have a long legend to account for his whereabouts.

The majority of civilised nations have delighted in sending Biblical characters to the lunary asylum. The Jews have placed Jacob there. Others have seen Isaac bearing the faggots for the sacrifice on Horeb. Italian imagination "bodies forth the forms" of Cain and a load of thorns, said to be "the fruits of the ground" mentioned in Genesis. One wonders what freak of human fancy procured Cain his admission to the moon and transformed his fruit offerings into thorns. It is certain that the legend was current before the time of Dante, who, in his Inferno, says:—

"Onward now,
For now doth Cain, with fork of thorns, confine
On either hemisphere, touching the wave,
Beneath the tower of Seville."

When the poet and Beatrice enter the moon, he asks anxiously:—

"Tell, I pray thee, whence the gloomy spots
Upon this body, which below on earth,
Give rise to talk of Cain in fabling quaint."

Milton makes the celestial Raphael the sponsor of his views on the subject. The spots, he thought, were—

"Unpurged
Vapors not yet into her substance turned."

Neither the gifted Florentine of the fourteenth century nor the educated Englishman of the seventeenth knew anything of the mountains of the moon. Mediæval writers refer to the man in the moon as carrying a burden of stolen sticks, with his dog going on before him. Chaucer supports the same tradition in his Testament of Cresceid, when he says the moon had—

"On her breast a chorle painted full even,
Bearing a bush of thorns on his backe,
Which, for his theft, might clime no ner the heaven."

The man in the moon is sometimes used as a synonym for Mr. Nobody. Shakespeare makes Stephano mystify the monster Caliban in The Tempest on their first meeting:—

C.—"'Hast thou not dropped from heaven?'
S.—'Out of the moon I do assure thee; I was the man in the moon when time was.'
C.—'I have seen thee in her, and I do adore thee. My mistress showed me thee, and thy dog and thy bush.'"

Quince's idea in A Midsummer Night's Dream of sending an actor with a bush of thorns and a lantern to say that he came:—

"To disfigure or present the person of moonshine"

is full of interest.

We cannot help regretting that Theseus and his companions interrupted the rustic, and irritated him into changing the blank verse in which he was about to explain himself, for:—

"All that I have to say is to tell you that the lanthorn is the moon; I, the man in the moon; this thorn-bush my thorn-bush, and this dog my dog."

What people meant to see, of course they saw, such an effect has the mind upon the senses. A lady and a clergyman viewed the moon through the same glass, and saw in it, as they thought, two figures. "May be," says the lady, "they are lovers meeting to pour forth their vows by earth light." "Not at all," says the clergyman, "they are the steeples of two neighboring churches."

The "glimpses of the moon" have moved men from the beginning of history. If the universality of any belief be a test of its truth, there is much to be said for this faith in moonshine. As Shakespeare says, "Truly the moon shines with a good grace."

MIMNERMUS.

Invisible Helpers and Adversaries.

MICRO-ORGANISMS almost everywhere abound, and were human creatures endowed with higher powers of vision the world would then appear a very different place. Still, the presence of microbes is indirectly, though none the less positively, made known to us through the aid of the microscope. Not that all may be made visible, for although modern microscopes magnify more than ten thousand times, innumerable microbes still elude their greatest power.

The minuteness of these organisms is so extraordinary that their tininess cannot be realised in any ordinary mode of measurement. A fair average length of these microbes is about one-twenty-thousandth of an inch. This statement, however, conveys very little in the way of definite impression. But we begin to grasp their infinitesimal dimensions when we picture them as Professor Frankland does when he assures us:—

"That no less than four hundred millions of these organisms can be spread over one square inch in a single layer. Thus we could have a population one hundred times as great as (inner) London settled on an area of a single square inch, without any complaint of overcrowding, and giving to each individual organism, not three acres.....but one-four-hundred millionth of a square inch, which is quite adequate for a citizen in the commonwealth of micro-organisms."

Microbes are usually very simple in form; the micrococci are more or less circular, while the bacilli are rod-like. The spirilla are spiral or corkscrew in shape, the yeasts are larger and oval in outline, and the moulds are made up of long threads which produce the nasty patches which arise on foodstuffs too long exposed to the microbe-laden atmosphere.

The bacilli and spirilla are mostly capable of movement, but the moulds and yeasts are stationary. Some of these motile organisms execute such fantastic movements across the field of the microscope that they create "an irrepressible impression upon the observer that each individual microbe is assisting in, and conscientiously performing, its part in a highly complex and thoroughly organised Scotch reel, conducted at express speed."

Digitized by Google

Although the majority of microbes readily respond to staining with bright colors which serves to facilitate their easier observation, their spores are much more resistent to coloring matter. This difficulty has, however, been surmounted, with the result that the coloring processes complete, the spores, which play a very sinister part in the lives of disease germs, may be made to appear in one color, while the fully developed microbe is adorned with another. The differently stained microbes and their attendant spores can now be studied with greater ease.

It is a noteworthy fact that some microbes are as irresponsive to the action of colors as spores usually show themselves to be. The tubercle bacillus, one of the deadliest enemies of the human race, is one of these, but even this baleful organism has been compelled to respond to the gentle art of the dyer.

But the refinements of microscopic inquiry do not end here. More delicate and detailed devices are required to render visible the organs of locomotion with which motile microbes propel themselves with almost unbelievable velocity through their liquid environment. These locomotive organs refuse to respond to aniline dyes. But as linen and cotton cannot be directly dyed with basic aniline colors, this obstacle is overcome through the prior impregnation of their fibres with what are termed "mordants." By the application of this self-same process the bacteriologist is able to demonstrate the existence, and render visible the form, of these locomotive organs, the flagella, as they are called.

Many microbes multiply by simple division, but others develop spores, and these innocent-looking spores are the seeds of the microbes. They are the toughest and most death-resisting living matter so far discovered by science.

Among the multitudinous micro-organisms which float through the air, one there is which is responsible for all the alcoholic beverages which cheer and depress the world. And not only yeast, but several disease-generating microbes are borne through the atmosphere. Long ago, Pasteur proved that the invisible germs of the air were usually far more numerous in low-lying areas than on the heights. Other investigators carried the inquiry a step further, and Robert Koch elaborated a most interesting arrangement which consisted in a plan for exposing vessels filled with cultivating materials, and as the micro-organisms settled upon these they reproduced themselves so rapidly that the colonies formed in the experimental dishes soon became quite visible to the unaided eye. When such colonies are scrutinised it is ascertained that they are almost invariably of one kind, which supports the conclusion that aerial microbes exist in special groups and are not indiscriminately mingled in the air.

Professor Frankland's researches are both interesting and instructive. He placed sterilised gelatine peptone, which forms an excellent culture-medium, on the roof of the South Kensington Museum, at a height of some seventy feet. The tests were undertaken in order to determine the number of microbes in the air under different weather conditions. It was discovered that when the wind was high the numbers increased considerably:—

> "In one case, during the month of March, the wind rising during a succession of experiments, the numbers increased from 851 falling on one square foot in one minute at the outset, to 1,302 at the finish."

On the other hand, after the atmosphere had been cleansed by rain, the numbers deposited fell to about 66 per square foot per minute. The numbers declined still further during a dense white fog, when 32 only settled on the experimental dish. At a festive gathering of the Royal Society at Burlington House, experiments again furnished remarkable results. "At the commencement of the reception," states the experimenter, Dr. Frankland,

> "there were 240 microbes falling on a square foot in one minute, but, as the rooms became more crowded, the numbers rose to 318, whilst the following morning, when there were only three persons in the room, and everything was covered with dust, the number was reduced to 109."

Inquiries conducted in the Central Hall of the Natural History Museum yielded the following facts: On a morning in May the number obtained was 30, but in the afternoon of the same day the microbes collected in the dishes increased to 293. Moreover, on a Bank Holiday, when many more people were present, the very large number of 1,755 micro-organisms, fell on one square foot each minute. Various other experiments, both at thinly attended and crowded functions, point without exception to the fact that the larger the human concourse in a given space, the vaster the descent of the germs. Nevertheless, no one appears to have been a penny the worse.

Tyndall's researches on the floating matter of the air demonstrated that in a calm atmosphere the germs fall to the ground in a comparatively short space of time. And the more the ordinary air is agitated, the faster the microbes fall. Frankland was travelling by rail from Norwich to London, and shortly after the train started, when four passengers were in the carriage, he tested the microbic contents of the air. One of the windows was open, and the experimental dish was placed near it, and 895 organisms were found to fall per square foot per minute. On reaching Cambridge, the carriage became crowded with passengers returning from Newmarket Heath. Ten passengers now occupied the apartment during the remainder of the journey to London. Almost half-way between Cambridge and the Metropolis another experiment was made, one window remaining closed, while the other was let down about four inches at the top. The germ-laden air now showed itself capable of depositing no less than 3,120 microbes per square foot in a single minute. But an examination of the air in a barn during flail-thrashing produced the most astonishing result of all. The atmosphere was choked with dust, and when tested with the gelatine dish it was ascertained that over 8,000 microbes were descending over one square foot in the course of a minute.

Pasteur's proofs of the greater purity of air on mountains in comparison with that of the plains have been completely confirmed by Frankland's more recent researches. By means of the tube method, this scientist has shown that at a height of 300 feet, just below the spire of Norwich Cathedral, the air is far freer from microbes than in the underlying air. His "dish" experiments were equally conclusive, for while 49 germs were deposited in a given space per minute at the elevation of the spire, there were 107 at the tower, and as many as 354 near the ground. Tests conducted at St. Paul's Cathedral revealed the same striking differences. Even at the apex of that proud eminence, Primrose Hill, the air was found to be three times purer than at its base.

Dr. Fischer's sea-air studies have furnished very interesting information to the bacteriologist. These tend to prove that the nearer the land the larger the microbial population of the air, and the distance out at sea, where they are to be met with in any material quantity, is largely dependent upon the direction of the wind. From Dr. Fischer's researches there emerges another significant fact. The vast microbial population of the ocean leads a life that seems quite independent of the invisible motes of the air. Very few microbes, indeed, appear to exist in the atmosphere that covers the deep blue sea.

Whether viewed microscopically, or when artificially cultivated, one of the aerial micro-organisms presents a very striking appearance. This microbe, Bacillus prodigiosus, is only one-twenty-thousandth of an inch in length, but as one individual soon multiplies into millions in any suitable medium it then displays a magnificent mass of color. It is intensely blood-red in appearance, and has probably been the occasion of more than one priestly imposture. For this bacillus,—

> "finds a suitable soil for its growth and multiplication on bread and other farinaceous articles of food; thus it has not unfrequently taken up its abode on the sacred wafer, and by there producing this marvellous color has given rise to the appearance of the 'bleeding host,' causing supernatural terror among the ignorant."*

Digitized by Google

Although the number of micro-organisms suspended in the atmosphere varies from day to day throughout the year, yet the number usually increases with the rise of temperature, so that during the hottest months of the summer—July and August—the air is most plentifully charged with germs.

As the years roll by, more and more microbes are added to the extensive list previously discovered. One curious circumstance in connection with aerial microbes—and Dr. Frankland and others have kept these organisms under practically constant observation for several years—is the almost unvarying regularity they present. Each kind appears to breed true to type. Also, many possess forms of wonderful beauty, while others are distinguished by splendid coloration. Lest it be thought that bacteriological studies are merely curious, it may be mentioned that they have already led to most amazing discoveries in connection with the prevention and cure of disease, and that they likewise play a large and rapidly increasing part in the evolution of that scientific agriculture which is intimately associated with the happiness and prosperity of the entire human race.

T. F. PALMER.

(To be continued.)

Living by Faith.

WHAT is Faith? Faith, said Paul, "is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." This is a faith that sensible men avoid. The man of reason may have faith, but it will be a faith according to knowledge, and not a faith that dispenses with knowledge. He believes that the sun will rise to-morrow, that the ground will remain firm under his feet, that the seasons will succeed each other in due course, and that if he tills the ground he will reap the harvest. But his belief in these things is based upon experience; his imagination extends the past into the future, and his expectations are determined by his knowledge. The future cannot indeed be demonstrated; it can only be predicted, and prediction can never amount to an absolute certitude; yet it may amount to a height of probability which is practically the same thing. Religious faith, however, is something very different. It is not belief based on evidence, but the evidence and the belief in one. The result is that persons who are full of faith always regard a demand for evidence as at once a heresy and an insult. Their faith seems to them, in the language of Paul, the very substance of their hopes; and they often talk of the existence of God and the divinity of Christ as being no less certain than their own existence.

Properly speaking, faith is trust. This involves a wide latitude beyond our knowledge. If we trust a friend, we have faith in him, and we act upon that sentiment. But we are sometimes deceived, and this shows that our faith was in excess of our knowledge. Sometimes, indeed, it is quite independent of knowledge. We trust people because we like them, or because they like us. This infirmity is well known to sharpers and adventurers, who invariably cultivate a pleasing manner, and generally practise the arts of flattery.

The same principle holds good in religion. It was sagaciously remarked by Hume that we ought to suspect every agreeable belief. The mass of mankind, however, are not so fastidious or discriminating. On the contrary, they frequently believe a thing because it is pleasant, and for no other reason. How often have we heard Christian advocates prove the immortality of the soul to the complete satisfaction of their auditors by simply harping on man's desire to live for ever! Nay, there have been many great "philosophers" who have demonstrated the same doctrine by exactly the same means.

Living by faith is an easy profession. Living on faith, however, is more arduous and precarious. Elijah is said to have subsisted on food which was brought him by inspired ravens, but there are few of God's ministers willing to follow his example. They ask God to give them their daily bread, yet they would all shrink with horror from depending on what he sends them.

G. W. FOOTE.

* Frankland, Our Secret Friends and Foes, p. 56.

THE MESSIANIC DREAM.

Did Jesus give himself out, or allow his disciples to designate him, as the Messiah? It is impossible to tell. All that we can say is that his disciples, and not only those whose traditions are embodied in the first gospel, desired to identify him with the hope of Israel, and applied or wrested passages of the Old Testament to that intent. With that object evidently were produced, by two different hands, the two genealogies, which hopelessly diverge from each other; while one of them, by arbitrary erasion, forces the pedigree into three mystic sections of fourteen each—a clear proof that it was not taken from any public record, even if we could suppose it possible that, amid all the convulsions of Judea, the record of a peasant's pedigree had been preserved. One of the genealogies, moreover, includes the mythical line of patriarchs between Adam and Abraham. The Messiahship of Jesus is a question with which we need practically concern ourselves no more. The Messiah was a dream of the tribal pride of the Jew, to which, as to other creations of tribal or national pride or fancy, we may bid a long farewell. That it should be necessary for the redeemer of the Jewish race to trace his pedigree to a hero so dear to the national heart, though morally so questionable, as David, was natural enough; but who can believe that this was necessary for the redeemer of mankind? It is rather lamentable to think how much study and thought have been wasted in the attempt to establish the fulfilment of a Hebrew vision, devoid of importance or interest for the rest of the human race.—Goldwin Smith.

Oh, young men, young men! remember, I entreat, the great work which awaits you. You are the workmen of the future; it is you who will determine the character of the twentieth century; it is you who, we earnestly hope, will solve the problems of truth and equity that the dying century propounds. We, the old, the elder men, hand on to you the formidable results of our investigations, many contradictions, much, perhaps, which is obscure, but certainly the most strenuous effort which ever century made to reach the light, the most faithful and solidly based documents, and the very foundations of the vast edifice of science, which you must continue to build up for your own honor and happiness. All we ask of you is to be more generous, more emancipated of mind than were we; to leave us behind in your love of a wholesome life, in your ardor for work, in the fecundity through which man and the earth will produce at length an overflowing harvest of joy beneath the glorious sunshine. And we should make way for you, fraternally glad to go and take our rest after the day's toil in the sound sleep of death, if we knew that you would carry on our work and realise our dreams.—Emile Zola.

HELL-FIRE.

It was only in a cruel age that the doctrine of hell-fire could have acquired that hold upon men's minds which it had acquired in the Middle Ages. In recent times the doctrine has almost become universally discredited throughout the more enlightened portions of Christendom. Even those who maintain a belief in some kind of endless punishment no longer insist literally upon the lake of brimstone and fire that is never quenched. Now the doctrine of hell-fire has become thus universally discredited, not because it has been scientifically disproved, for science has neither data nor methods whereby to disprove such a doctrine; nor because it has been exegetically shown to be unsupported by Scripture, for the ingenuity of orthodox exegesis has always been equal to the task of making Scripture mean whatever is required; it has been discredited simply because people have become milder in their manners, and less used to enduring and inflicting physical pain. The doctrine shocks people's feelings, and so they refuse to believe it, no matter how the logic of the case may stand.—Professor John Fiske.

AS HOT AS THE BIBLE.

Remember that Professor Max Müller, when he published the Sacred Books of the East in England, explained that there were whole sections that he dared not publish in English lest he should lay himself open to a criminal prosecution.—"The Beliefs of Unbelief," Dr. Fitchett.

Digitized by Google

Acid Drops

The Bishop of London would rather die than see England a German province. The alternative is too remote for much value to be attached to the Bishop's choice. He is like people who would give the world for this or that, or wouldn't for the world do this or that. The offer and the boast are both safe.

The Bishop of London is at last coming out in his true colors as a representative of the God of Battles. Speaking at the eighth anniversary of the Anglican and Eastern-Orthodox Churches Union, he called the present time of war "this great day of the Lord," while a week later, speaking at the Guildhall, he surpassed even himself by saying: "In spite of all the suffering and bloodshed involved in the war, it is a glorious thing to be alive in this great day of the Lord." No one will now doubt his lordship's orthodoxy and loyalty to Scripture. This is indeed the greatest day of the Lord of Hosts the world has ever seen. On this point the Bishop of London is in agreement with the Kaiser, who says, "With me are God and the Holy Virgin."

Now, if we judge the Lord, whose day is said to be upon us, by his history, we shall be obliged to characterise him as the biggest and cruellest monster ever heard of, whose "only excuse," as Stendhal puts it, "is that he does not exist." Nietzsche deeply regretted that Stendhal had robbed him of "the best Atheistic joke," which he "of all people could have perpetrated"; but the Basel professor himself gave utterance to the following: "What has been the greatest objection to Life hitherto?—God."

There is nothing like a good conceit of yourself, and Germany, which is not an Atheistic country, but very far from it, doesn't look like running short of that virtue. According to Privy Councillor, Dr. Lassore, Professor of Philosophy at the University of Berlin, the German State and people are "the most perfect creatures that history has produced up to now." "We are morally and intellectually superior," he says, "beyond all comparison." William II. is "the darling of the human race." The German Army is an epitome of all the excellences of the German nation—not like the "Russian beasts, English mercenaries, and Belgian fanatics." "We do good deeds to all people." That statement takes the cake! "God is with us" follows naturally. Finally, the learned professor assures us that the Germans are humane, conscientious, gentle, and truthful. There you are! Everybody recognises the portrait. It is so life-like.

Dean Inge, the "gloomy Dean," has been receiving a share of newspaper abuse because he has been pointing out a few obvious truths. Preaching in Westminster Abbey, he said, the outlook for democracy and liberty is not bright. With that, at any rate, we are inclined to agree. We have pointed out over and over again that for some years Europe has been passing through a period of reaction—and this in spite of much talk, and some indications of progress. The growth of militarism is in itself an indication of this. And now that we are actually in the midst of one of the most murderous wars in all history we do not see how Europe is to come out of it except as a heavy loser in all directions. For some years, at least, the militarist party in all countries will find their hands enormously strengthened. Already there is talk of all countries requiring larger armies after the war than they had before it. The mere task of clearing up the consequences of the war will take many years. And during that time we may take it that advanced ideas on all subjects will have to struggle hard for existence. This, we believe, is indisputable. But, we must add, that this is no reason for relaxation of effort. It is only a further justification for renewed and continuous effort.

We do not follow Dean Inge when he says that England has lost her place as a first-class Power. That is decidedly premature. As standards of value go, that has not occurred, and is not likely to occur. But we should like to see these standards of value altered. We should like to see nations classified as first, second, and third-class Powers, not in terms of extent of territory, or trade, or fighting capacity, but in terms of a people's contribution to the intellectual and moral welfare of the race. There is something radically wrong with our standards of measurement when Germany ranks as a first-class Power and Belgium is placed a long way down on the list. In this respect we quite agree with the New York Independent that "When the Great War is over the world will be staggered to discover how much has been destroyed besides life and property."

Mr. Robert Blatchford has been admonishing Dean Inge for his pessimistic utterances on the War. One of his retorts is as follows, "I should advise Dean Inge to give Deuteronomy a rest, and put in five minutes with a war map and an hour with the dispatches of Sir John French."

Sandwiched with the police-court cases and sporting news in the Weekly Dispatch is a prayer for Sunday reading. It begins, "Loving Father, our extremity is Thine opportunity." What robust faith remains in Newspaperland! An ordinary pietist would hesitate to see evidences of a "loving father" in the spectacle of 21,000,000 men ready to disembowel one another.

It is the opinion of Dr. Orchard, an eminent Nonconformist divine, that "if there is no good and just God at the helm, but only a blind force, then we are caught like little wild creatures in an iron trap," which, he assures us, "is an alternation too terrible to contemplate"; but, unless the reverend gentleman deliberately and completely blinks the facts, there is no other alternative for him or for us to contemplate. Are we not at this moment like little wild creatures caught in an iron trap? All Europe is ablaze; men, women, and children are being butchered by the thousand daily; the Belgian nation has been cruelly robbed of its homes, and is scattered abroad to live on charity; the whole of Christendom is overwhelmed with fear and trembling; and yet Dr. Orchard has the audacity to stand up and assert that a good and just God sits on the throne of the universe. It is the blackest and most pernicious lie that can be told. Then this preacher urges his hearers to "enthrone the God within"; but there is no God within, except the one invented by a diseased and polluted imagination, and the sooner we get rid of him the better for all concerned.

Having the War specially in mind, Dr. Orchard alleges that we must choose between a good and just God and a blind force. Nothing of the kind. The nations now at war have each a well-defined goal in view, which they are resolved to reach at whatever cost. The forces at work are not blind, but fully intelligent and easily intelligible. The European Powers now at mortal grips know exactly what they want; but to imagine that a good and just God is at the helm, while all this savage conflict is in progress, is to be guilty of harboring the sheerest nonsense conceivable.

It must not be forgotten that the editor of the British Weekly, Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, is an ordained minister of the Gospel, though the "Rev." has been dropped in favor of the more aristocratic "Sir"; and, occasionally, he still preaches. One of his most recent discourses is entitled, "A Call from the Battlefield," though, as a matter of fact, the "call" comes from the Epistle to the Hebrews. It is a call to prayer, and Sir William interprets it as an invitation from the front to pray for our soldiers, that they may be "restored to us the sooner." Does the reverend knight verily believe that the daily prayer-meetings held at the City Temple and other churches throughout the country will have the effect of shortening the war by a single day? If the Lord can bring the war to an end, great beyond measure is his guilt for not having prevented it from taking place at all. If he exists, he sees these hundreds of thousands of his own children being brutally murdered, and does nothing.

Sir William urges people to instruct the Almighty as to what he ought to do. "We are to put will into our prayers," he says. "What I mean is that we should pray with all our might for a speedy victory." If there is a just and loving God, will he not give us a speedy victory, if we deserve it, without our asking for it? To ask is to cast suspicion upon his justice and goodness; it is to insult him in the most offensive manner possible. Besides, the Germans believe in the rightness of their cause, and are praying with all might for a speedy victory; and it is a piece of self-righteousness on our part to ask God to favor us rather than them. Will not the Judge of all the earth do right without being prompted thereto by the creatures of his own hand? All this shows the infinite absurdity and uselessness of prayer!

The Theatres Committee of the London County Council is seeking to restrict the building of picture theatres because "cinemas have been built next to churches and chapels." This looks as if the public prefer the cinema to the place of worship, although the audience pays to see the one, and pays to get out of the other.

Digitized by Google

Two inmates of Bath Workhouse for some years past have been Messrs. Pickwick and Sam Weller. The Dickensian association is now dissolved, for Sam Weller has just died, and Mr. Pickwick is seriously ill. Curiously, it is the shadow-figures of the great novelist who live for ever, and not their human prototypes.

The London County Council deserves congratulating on its latest decision with regard to civil marriages. It seems that there are still within the London area two districts in which people have to pass through workhouses in order to be married before the registrar, and there are eleven others where people desirous of getting married must attend at buildings that are part of workhouses. The Council has therefore informed the Registrar-General that in its opinion provision should be made so that the marriage ceremony may be performed in buildings that have no connection with poor law institutions. Last year 26 per cent. of the total number of marriages were of a civil character, and it is high time that the State did away with what is a real scandal. Marriage is essentially a social ceremony; it is the religious proceedings that are incidental; and it is the plain duty of the Government to surround marriage—wherever performed—with all possible solemnity and dignity.

The County Council met with a failure in its attempt to enforce the closing of cinema palaces in the Tottenham district on Sundays. It was pointed out that the same Council allowed the Alexandra Palace to be open on Sundays for concerts, and it was rank hypocrisy to open that and to attempt to close picture theatres. The Bench held that the defendants were within their rights in opening on Sundays, and the summons was dismissed. There were other cases waiting to be heard, but these were not proceeded with, pending an appeal.

Writing in the Weekly Dispatch on the Czar's prohibition of vodka traffic, Mr. J. F. Fraser says, "Getting drunk has been the favorite Sunday amusement" of the Russians. The Greek Church appears to be as impotent as the Roman Catholic Church or the fancy religions in other parts of Europe.

Temperance papers are jubilant concerning the Czar's prohibition of alcohol in Russia, but the Cocoa Press outdoes them all in fulsome adulation. Perhaps the latter foresees a chance of selling the firm's staple article instead of the vile vodka.

Rev. F. B. Meyer regrets that the National Free Church Council has been unable to obtain official representation on the Prince of Wales' Relief Fund. But why on earth should they expect it? Clergymen may be trusted to work the Fund for their own advancement—so far as is possible—in any case. It is sheer impudence for them to expect official representation. And it is characteristic of Nonconformists, who are always talking of religion being a private matter, to demand official and public recognition of their Churches at every possible opportunity.

Dr. Clifford says that the message that has "come to him" is that, whatever happens, we should keep on praying. That is the kind of message one would expect a clergyman to receive. It sounds like another of the now numerous trade advertisements—"The way to beat the Germans is to buy British goods—our goods."

A correspondent of the Church Times writes inquiring "Why should England expect victory?". His reason for asking the question is that England has "done her best to turn God out of the schools, and has practically ignored his existence in Parliament." Also, England has been plotting and planning to rob "His Church" in Wales, and we have Sunday trading, Sunday travelling, and Sunday entertaining. These things together, it is evident we deserve a good "whopping," and it is like our cheek asking God to help us after we have robbed his church, etc.

Rev. D. Macleane, of St. Peter's Rectory, Wilts, is yet more emphatic. He points out that "the Church of Christ still considers the rights of man an infidel basis for human society." Afflicted Belgium has had to choose between her and God; and the French Government has persecuted the faith, and supplies her sick and dying soldiers with no ministrations of religion. Finally, England began the war by despoiling the Welsh Church. Evidently the Allies are a bad lot, and we should not be surprised to find that Mr. Macleane believes the war to ensue from their wickedness. In that case, we may take it that the Kaiser really is an instrument of God.

A well known Baptist minister, the Rev. J. H. Rushbrooke, has just returned from Berlin. He says that in Germany eminent theologians, whether pastors or professors, "have been the foremost in influencing public opinion on the side of the Government." He also says that at the beginning of the war the churches were crowded on the occasion of public worship, and ever since the attendances have been large. From which it would seem that the Germans are really more Christian in their war than we are. Another thing that Mr. Rushbrooke found most painful was to hear the Germans praying for victory. We should have thought that to be too natural and too common for anyone to be praised about. Everybody does it—who is religious—and its absurdity never troubles any of them. And really no one places any dependence upon these prayers. It is the quality of arms and men that is thought about, not the power of the prayers. German and English officially pray for victory; the French fight without any prayers, and with or without each seems to do as well. So Mr. Rushbrooke may console himself, when thinking of these Germans praying to his God for victory, with the thought that it really doesn't matter. In this war guns are greater than gods, and pluck more powerful than prayers.

The Kaiser has ordered all the Protestant churches in Berlin and throughout Brandenburg to be opened to the public all day, in order that his subjects may have the comfort of prayer whenever they feel they would like a dose. We guess, however, that free "cinemas" would be better appreciated.

Mr. Alan Bott, another Daily Chronicle correspondent, writing from Geneva, gives a lively account of a German paper published there for the benefit of refugees. Here is an extract from Mr. Bott's letter:—

> "The religious department of the lie factory makes it clear that God is attached to the Great German General Staff. A priest named Hein, who is also a member of the Reichstag, is quoted as making in the Vossische Zeitung the stupefying declaration: 'It is true that our soldiers have shot in France and Belgium many brigands, men, women, and children, and have destroyed their homes. But whoever considers this as being contrary to the teachings of the Christian doctrine only shows that he has not the least comprehension of the true spirit of Christ!'"

We congratulate this priest on his candor.

"The late Bishop Wilkinson encountered many difficulties in translating 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' into the Zulu tongue, but his task was not so bad as that of a missionary who attempted to render 'Sankey' into Congolese. Among primitive peoples many words have double meanings, and the translator marvelled at the heartiness with which the natives sang 'Wonderful Words of Life,' until he discovered that by a slip in translation he had made it 'Wonderful Words of Stomach.' To another well-known hymn, 'Lord, dismiss us with Thy blessing,' the people seemed to have a strange aversion. At first he thought they enjoyed the service so much that they regretted its close. After a while he found that his version had altered the meaning to 'Lord, kick us out softly!'"—Daily Chronicle (Nov. 2).

Writing in John Bull, Mr. George R. Sims says, "It is part of our Christian faith that the ways of the Almighty are inscrutable." Gadzooks! They are not nearly so inscrutable as those of our beloved "Dagonet," when he writes on "serious" subjects.

At a harvest festival at St. Peter's Church, Rochester, Sunday-school children brought thousands of cigarettes, which were afterwards given to the soldiers in the Chatham military hospital. It was a suitable feature of a service connected with a religion ending in smoke.

The Queen has sent a parcel of copies of Mr. Blatchford's pamphlet, Germany and England, for distribution in the Young Men's Christian Association's tents at the Military Training Camps. Mr. Blatchford might emulate the august example of "the first lady in the land" and send "the unconverted" some copies of his freethought writings.

A children's prize-volume has been issued with the title of The Wonder Book. It is not half so wonderful as the book which narrates Noah's Ark, Jonah and the Whale, Elisha and the Bears, and other "fairy tales" of faith.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, November 8, Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate, Leicester, at 6.30, "Religion, War, and Humanity."

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £227 2s. 9d. Received since:—W. Milroy, 5s.; J. Milroy, 5s.; G. W. Wright, 5s.; John Deacon, 5s. 3d.; J. B. Palphreyman, 10s. 6d.

G. W. WRIGHT says: "At this critical juncture, I hope all readers of the Freethinker will do their utmost to keep the flag of 'the best of causes' flying."

G. F. H. MCCLUSKEY.—We remember Mr. Searle very well, although we had not seen him for many years. We are sorry to hear he had much suffering before death brought its anodyne.

J. DEACON.—To be "quite well" at our age a man must recall his youth. Suppose we say, "As well as can be expected in the circumstances."

EDNA WELLS.—Who told you that Othello was a negro? He is called a "Moor" in the very title of the play, and the Moors are one of the finest races on earth. Their civilisation in Spain eclipsed anything existing at that time in all Europe.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote lectures to-day (Nov. 8)—the first time for many months—at the Secular Hall, Leicester, his subject being "Religion, War, and Humanity." The chair will be taken at 6.30 p.m., with all seats free, and a collection in aid of the expenses.

The London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner, under the auspices of the N. S. S. Executive, will take place at Frascati's Restaurant on Tuesday evening, January 12, 1915. There is no reason why the war should interfere with this particular function.

Mr. Cohen lectures for the N. S. S. Newcastle-on-Tyne Branch on Sunday, November 22. The Co-operative Hall, in which the lectures are to be delivered, is not the most accessible hall in the town, but that is a reason why the local "saints" should do their utmost to secure good audiences. Anyone wishing to help in this way should communicate with Mr. J. G. Bartram, 107 Morley-street, Heaton.

Mr. Foote's article on legal and other matters depending on the death of the late Mrs. Bowman, mentioned in our last issue, has to be postponed a little, for sufficient reasons. We think it may be expected next week.

We are very glad to state that Mr. W. Heaford, whose bad breakdown we reported several weeks ago, is making satisfactory improvement in health and strength, and is able to do a little travelling. He is looking forward to meeting his old friends again before very long.

There was a beautiful "war" story in Monday's Daily Chronicle from the pen of Mr. Harold Ashton. It relates the experience of an English lady at Bruges:—"On my way out of the town I met a German soldier with his hand dreadfully shattered. His bandages had slipped and he was trying vainly to replace them with his left hand. I took pity on him and helped him, redressed the nasty wounds, and rebandaged them with a pocket bandage I happened to have with me. The soldier fumbled in his pocket and at last produced a crumpled five franc note, which he offered me. Of course, I refused it. 'Why do you refuse good money for a good action, madame?' he said. 'Because I am an Englishwoman,' I replied, 'and Englishwomen do not take payment for good deeds, however small or great they may be.' 'I cannot believe you are English,' he said; 'but you are an angel, and angels have no nationality. May I kiss your hand?' I held out my hand, and he bent low over it and kissed it. There were tears in his eyes. And—I rather wish now that I had accepted that five-franc note to keep as a souvenir of Prussian gratitude!" A touch of nature makes the whole world kin.

It is difficult for the clearest and most careful writer to make himself plain to everybody. It has been said by some people that we are for "peace at any price." We have repudiated this absurd idea since the present awful War broke out, and that repudiation should have guarded us against misunderstanding. But as it hasn't, we will go back to our Shadow of the Sword, which was first published some thirty years ago, and invite attention to the following passage, which we meant when we wrote it, have meant ever since, and mean it now:—

> "War is just in self-defence, or in defence of a neighbor unjustly attacked. We are not of those who believe in the refusal of aid between nations in all circumstances. The sword may be, for some time yet, as necessary as the lancet, but it should never be drawn except against the enemies of mankind. 'The blood of man,' said Burke, 'should never be shed but to redeem the blood of man. It is well shed for our friends, for our country, for our kind. The rest is vanity; the rest is crime.'
>
> When any of these great duties call us we should be ready to defend them; and if ever England were menaced by a brutal invader, the most peaceful citizen might well wish her to be animated by the same brave spirit that whipped the pride of the Armada and drove the hectoring Dutch fleets from the English seas. Nay, to defend the nation's liberties in the dark hour of extreme peril, one might hope that her sons would make ramparts of their bodies, and if they could not make a pact with victory, make a pact with death; that her daughters would gladly resign their dearest in the spirit of the Spartan mothers of old; and that the very children might, like Hannibal, be dedicated to a righteous revenge.
>
> We are then far from loving peace at any price. But there is little need to denounce such an impossible doctrine. It is not that way our danger lies. Our fighting instincts, inherited from savage ancestors, are too strong for us to submit tamely to aggression, even if the law of self-preservation did not prompt us to defend our own."

In the light of the present situation this passage reads almost like a prophecy.

Spending the winter as invalids at Aiken, S.C., the Hon Thurlow Weed and Mr. Thomas C. Acton whiled away one Sabbath afternoon by attending a negro church. When they entered the primitive temple, the preacher, who was a pure African, was grappling, with all the fervor of his race, with the old, old subject of the fall of man. Sketching that day in the Garden, with its terrible results, he excoriated Adam in this fashion: "Now, brederen, when de Lord calls Adam to 'count, did he stan' up like a man, confess his sin, and ask forgiveness? He didn't do nuffin ob de sort, brederen, but he say, 'Lord, de woman dat Dou gubeet me gub me for to eat.'" Pausing a moment, he repeated: "'De woman dat Dou gubeet me gub me for to eat.'" Then again: "'De woman dat Dou gubeet me gub me for to eat.' Dar, brederen, you see dat mean, skulkin' Adam was atrying to sneak out of it by frowin' all de blame on de Lord hisself!"

LONGFELLOW REVERSED.

He goes on Sunday to his church,
  He sits among his boys,
He hears the parson pray. And preach?
  No! No! a snoring noise
From his nostrils shows that some sweet repose
  He in sermon time enjoys.

Digitized by Google

Elias Ryepin.

"All the talk about the artist's vocation and the artist's mission.....strike me as being very empty and hollow and meaningless at bottom."
"Then what would you put in its place?"
"Life, Maia." —IBSEN'S When We Dead Awaken.

WAR reaps a full harvest of maimed minds as well as bodies. Just look at the ordinary press and its present state of topsy-turveydom! With all its palaver of "Business as Usual," could it possibly make its business more "unusual" than it is doing now? John Morley rightly gauged the worth of the ordinary press when he relegated it as food for the "common crowd," which is made up of Carlyle's "fools" and Voltaire's canaille. Yet, as Morley says, the "newspaper must live, and to live it must please," and to please at the present time, we may add, it must tune itself to the gamut of the "maimed minds" of the crowd. Take, for instance, the case of Nietzsche.

What had the press to say of Nietzsche before the War? Nothing! It didn't pay then; but it pays now, and it gives them as well an opportunity of revenging themselves for his ruthless denunciation of their smug ideals. Before the war, what had Russia been to the press but "barbarism"? Would they have allowed such a heresy to be preached as an enlightened Russia? But to-day Russia is our Ally, and as we Britons could only ally ourselves with an enlightened and cultured nation, the press has suddenly discovered that there is an enlightened Russia. The other day a contemporary gave among its illustrations The Moujik's Departure for His Regiment, described as "One of the most famous paintings of Ryepin, the great Russian artist." I held my breath in astonishment at this superscription, for it is the first I have heard of it from the British press. The way these people talk, with an elevated air of "We've always said so," is simply disgusting. I think, without exaggeration, if we looked at every journal in Britain for the past ten years, and found the name of Ryepin a dozen times, it would be a fair estimate of our recognition of the "great Russian artist." Of course, it must be admitted that even in Russia, Elias Ryepin is known better by name than by work; but that is explained by the fact that his paintings, for the most part, are confined to private collections, on account of their revolutionary tendencies, and even reproductions are only permitted to people of high official standing; yet the art world of Britain knows that Ryepin's work and "tendencies" are but the old story over again—the public must only know what their "betters" think is good for them; and an enlightened Russia was not good for them. Above all, a unit of an enlightened Russia—"a great artist"—who is an avowed Nihilist and Freethinker was certainly not good for them. But adversity brings strange bedfellows, and the War has thrown the Russian in our midst, so the glorious free press of our country finds that an enlightened Russia pays.

. . . . . .

Elias Ryepin was born in 1850. At the age of twenty-two his Jairus' Daughter won for him a scholarship that took him to Paris and Berlin for study. These were impressionable times. The intellectual ferment which followed the reforms of Alexander II. infested all byeways of art and literature, as well as political life. Young Ryepin, straight from the free Paris ateliers, was ripe for the "new spirit" which was saying, "Away with artistic convention: Art must serve humanity," and soon he was enrolled under the banner of a social art.

To the art purists, this was very wrong of him; for if you ask these devotees of "Art for art's sake" what relation art has to the social polity, they will tell you that art neither teaches nor persuades, and merely comes in contact with the social polity in so far as is necessary for the purpose of representation. For instance, if you find an artist depicting the denizens of the Black Country, such as Zola describes in Germinal, you must not immediately conclude that his art has a purpose, which is a sympathy with these people. To the artist they are mere subjects for representation. Thus far the æsthetician. Yet when we find in this artist that these subjects constantly recur, and that outside of his art the artist shows his social sympathies with this class, we may surely assume that there is a sounder basis for "art with a purpose" than the æsthetician would have us believe. Havelock Ellis, in a very fine essay on Eugene Carrière, has argued against purpose in art. He says that with the painter "his philosophy, his morality, his religion, are the outcome of his painter's vision of life, and not the source of it." That may be true enough; but the point is that he still has his philosophy, his morality, and his religion, whatever the means may be by which he arrived at them. It appears to me that Havelock Ellis's inversion of the process simply strengthens the argument for art with a purpose. However, to draw an absolute line between art and life, as the æsthetician does, would be to treat man as something apart from himself.

. . . . . .

In Elias Ryepin we have an artist who reveals his social sympathies in his art; and since we have evidence of these sympathies outside his art, coupled with the fact that he has derided the idea of "Art for art's sake," we may safely assume that here, at any rate, is an artist with a purpose. Ryepin has always been a fervent admirer of Tolstoy, and has depicted the saint of Yasnaya Polyana in many a canvas. He has also lent his pen to Tolstoy's movement in educating the masses to a better class of literature. Yet it must not be too readily assumed that he holds to Tolstoyan philosophy. They are possibly as far removed from one another as Dives and Lazarus. Primarily, it is a question of temperament; but, on the other hand, culture conditions account for much. The conditions that produced a Tolstoy in literature produced a Tschaykovsky in music, and a Vereetchagin in painting. Whilst it was the process that gave us Turgenev that brought Mussorgsky and Ryepin. Indeed, when surveying the various types in Ryepin's art, one cannot help recognising their "affinities" in Turgenev and Mussorgsky. His dull priests and haughty officials have the same air about them as Mussorgsky's musical puppets in The Peep Show; whilst his fine young Nihilists seem to have stepped out of the pages of Smoke or Fathers and Sons.

Like the two with whom I have grouped him, Ryepin has always loved "the people," and despised the Church and State as its oppressors. From his earliest years his revolt, not only from conventional art, but from conventional society, was clearly shown. In 1873 the Vienna Exposition had his Bargetowers. No greater plea for the proletariat is there than this! Millet's Gleaners or Courbet's Stonebreakers are of its kin, yet far removed. After all, there is a certain liberty of action attached to those gleaners and stonebreakers; but with Ryepin, his bargetowers are like the machines in those terrible fantasies of H. G. Wells. Twelve barefooted men yoked like oxen to the harness of a barge, pulling against the stream; such is Bargetowers on the surface. But what a world of sadness and protest pervades the scene. The very sky seems to cry out at the monotonous tramp of those human machines. It is not the sort of work that carries pleasure with it, such as Ford Madox Brown has shown us, but slavery in its vilest form. Bargetowers tells us, more than any worded testament, where Ryepin's social sympathies are.

In the Village Procession we see the forces operating that permit, if not produce, the evils of the bargetowers. How masterly he selects his types, so as to give you question and answer. You look at the poor brutalised Slavs, and, if you wonder why, just turn to those arrogant soldiers and officials, and you will understand. Look at the horrible, gaping, ignorant crowd, with its halt and lame, and then see the hale and well-fed priests and acolytes. Mark well that Cossack wielding his knout, to make way for the priest with crucifix and icon, for there you have Ryepin's indictment of the dual forces of Russian oppression—the cross and knout—cheek by jowl!

Digitized by Google

Ryepin has even confessed his sympathy with those who would rid Russia of the cross and knout. In the Tretyakov Gallery at Moscow there is a cycle by Ryepin which depicts the life-story of one of the countless martyrs of the Russian democracy. Those who are familiar with the works of Turgenev will recall the type of Nihilist that he portrays. It is one of these young revoltés that Ryepin depicts in the first of his cycle. Here we find him at a secret gathering, discussing with his fellow-students. The interior is poor, and the smoky lamp throws but a dim light. Yet on the faces of these young dreamers there is a light that one might think would never dim, if we did not see the story in full. Next we have the young Nihilist as a Trimardeur, a sort of social missionary among the toiling peasantry, trying to awaken them to a sense of their wrongs. At last the emissaries of the knout have laid their hands upon him. The police ransack his room, and the miserable informer confronts him with the incriminating books and papers. Then we find him in the hands of soldiers, on his way to Siberia. Years pass by, and finally we see his return. It is no longer the bright young student, but an old and broken man, who is scarcely recognised by his family.

This final scene would seem to show that Ryepin wished to emphasise the futility of revolt, which brings him into assent with the Tolstoyans. Indeed, there is a very fine enigmatical canvas of his which has been interpreted this way. It depicts a young Russian student and a companion stepping from a rock into a roaring sea, which will assuredly engulf them. At any rate, for every one soul that the cross and knout breaks into submission after revolt, as in Dostoyevsky and in Ryepin's Nihilist, a hundred remain true as steel. One of these Ryepin has even portrayed, perhaps as a foil to the coda of his Nihilist cycle. It is also in the Tretyakov Gallery, and shows the Nihilist, on his way to the scaffold, contemptuously waving aside a priest who has offered him the consolations of religion.

It seems strange that such an uncompromising critic of the cross and knout should not have trodden that weary road to Siberia long ago. But artists and musicians, like the court fool of olden times, seem to have liberties denied to others. The Anarchist Goya was petted by kings, and the Republican Beethoven was "at court and yet no courtier." And so with the Nihilist Ryepin; we not only find him a professor at St. Petersburg Academy, but a court painter. Yet, even when his brush plies for the Imperial galleries, Ryepin's stolid independence remains the same. What are these great ancestors of the great White Czar that we see? There is Ivan the Terrible and Peter the Great, but they are not monarchs clothed in ermined purple under canopied thrones, nor are they decked in martial pomp in the pose of victors. Ryepin has limned them as human beings, and bad ones at that. Ivan is delineated in the horrible episode of his murder of his son. Peter is depicted in the scene where he compelled his own sister, Sophia, to witness the execution of her faithful guards.

Such are Ryepin's court paintings! which, like the rest of his art work, make bold for "truth before everything." Great art does not deal in types or caricatures. Its world, as Robert Ingersoll says, is peopled with individuals, natural people, who have the contradictions and inconsistencies inseparable from humanity. Art has too long been untruthful. Even when the impossible gods and their friends were banished from art, an equally false and unthinkable Romanticism held sway. Religion and idealism may be very good in their way, but they are not true; and, above all, they are certainly outside the province of "seeing and feeling creatures," which Ruskin demanded first of all from artists. At any rate, posterity will be with the realists, since all vital and enduring art must be based upon that which is vital and enduring, which is—Life, Maïa!

H. GEORGE FARMER.

The Design Argument.—II.

IN THE LIGHT OF ANATOMY AND PHYSIOLOGY.

(Continued from p. 701.)

THIS relates to the quantity of milk. I shall now speak something of its quality. If God, the merciful, the wise and the just parent, produces milk for the proper nourishment and development of the child—the means of his future glorification and praise—with all the ingredients necessary for its well-being, how is it that he allows germs of scrofula and consumption, the syphilitic taint, and other seeds of filthy, horrible, and dangerous diseases to pass through the very source—the milk—which he has intended, out of his special, merciful providence, for the proper nutrition and development of the innocent babe, who is brought into the world to sing the praises and the glory of the Lord? Why does not God, the all-powerful and all-loving Father, who so carefully manages to manufacture milk, having water and solids, containing casein, serum, albumen, lactose (i.e., milk-sugar), fats, or butter, and salts, all in necessary proportions, from the mother's blood, by means of the great and wonderful laboratory in her breasts—why does not God, the greatest wonder-worker and the world-renowned miracle-maker of mysterious powers in heaven above and earth below; why, I say, does not that great chemist, by some process of filtration, like those which so plentifully abound in the animal organism, prevent these poisonous germs from passing into the helpless child's food—the very source and the only means of its subsistence? Why does he poison the innocent child? The child's mother, who is only finite in knowledge, and finite in wisdom, and finite in loving kindness, will, I am perfectly sure, carefully extract and strain away any rubbish or anything injurious that she happens to see from the milk she gives to her child. Why, even a hired nurse who has eyes to see, heart to feel, brain to reason, and right conscience to guide, will do the same. It is strange to think, and shocking indeed even to conceive, that God, said to be so loving and so everything, should not care a straw for these very highly important things concerned in the well-being of the child.

Well, again, taking for granted for a moment, for the sake of argument, that God, through his great loving providence, creates milk in the mother for the support of the child before even the child is born, how is it there is milk in the breasts when there is no child at all in the womb—when there is a false pregnancy, when there is only a mole in the womb, or only a disease called tumor, instead of a child? For whom, I ask, is the milk secreted—secreted in some cases even in greater abundance than in real pregnancies, by the loving Providence? For whom is this milk secreted? I again ask, for whom? The truth is that no God, no Providence, secretes milk through his infinite kindness with the object of nourishing the child or anyone else. It is only the outcome or sequence of cause and effect. Milk is the effect of some blind and unconscious animal function which goes on in the body without any object in view of doing either good or evil to anyone. To understand how true it is, we must understand the physiology of the secretion of milk.

Milk is secreted or produced by the mammary glands, or milk glands, as they are also called. The mammary glands are composed of large divisions or lobes, and these lobes are made up of lobules, which are composed of the convoluted subdivision of ducts, which are composed of milk cells. All these lobes and lobules are supplied with blood-vessels. These blood-vessels supply blood to these lobes and lobules in a larger or smaller quantity, according to the more or less stimulus given to them by the nerves that control them and supply them. You all know, I suppose, that the various functions of our bodies are under the control of the nervous system. The nerves exert their influence on the secretion of milk by increasing or diminishing the quantity of blood supplied to the secreting glands—the milk glands—while the nerves make the blood-vessels carry more or less blood to the secreting glands according to the stimulus they (the nerves) receive, or irritation produced in them from certain causes or substances.

Digitized by Google

There is great sympathy established between the uterus and the breasts of females through the nervous system. Whenever there is any irritation produced or stimulus given to the nerves in the uterus, reflex action is produced; i.e., the impression produced upon the nervous centres by the contact of foreign substance, say, for instance, in case of pregnancy, the fœtus in the uterus is reflected upon the nerves supplying the mammary glands, which, in consequence, get an increased blood supply and, consequently, the milk cells become more active, and produce milk. Now, it must be remembered here that the stimulus or the irritation in the nerves of the uterus need not necessarily be caused only by the actual child in the womb to produce milk; but it may be produced by any stimulus or irritation of the uterine nerves caused by anything else, such as by false pregnancy, like moles, by tumors, and other uterine diseases. The secretion of milk may also be caused even by irregular menstruation. Because milk may be secreted from various causes other than pregnancy, the secretion of milk is looked upon by accoucheurs as one of the most uncertain signs of the state of pregnancy.

Thus, you can clearly see that to attribute the secretion of milk to the special, benevolent, and kind providence of God is an idle fancy and a physiological blunder.

Now, the third point urged on behalf of the special and kind providence of God for the good and welfare of children is that they can suck the milk out of the mother's breasts without teaching on the part of man. I say that even lower orders of animals do the same. And all this is done by mere instinct. And an instinct is nothing more than an inherited habit. Instinct is an inherited quality carried from parents to children. It is the result of evolution of animals rather than of the special design of God for the good of man. However, if theologians are bent upon believing that it proves God's special providence for the good and welfare of the infants, why, I ask, does he produce the most fatal diseases, like diphtheria, and choke them to death when they are not yet out of their teens? Diphtheria is a very malignant and fatal disease of the throat. It causes a very large amount of mortality amongst children. It is characterised by a peculiar inflammation of the mucous membrane of the throat or pharynx, accompanied by the production of a false membrane. At first, this membrane appears in the form of a white spot on the pharynx or tonsils, from which it gradually extends forward to the soft palate and into the nostrils, and backward into the œsophagus, sometimes into the larynx, producing at length suffocation and death, as if by strangulation of the throat. Look, what unbounded wickedness there is on the part of God if it is believed at all that here is his special providence working for the welfare of children. God, out of infinite love, teaches the innocent and the helpless baby to suck the milk, and, all of a sudden, without any cause for provocation to him by the sweet baby at the breast, he strangles it to death—which the most heartless human murderer would shun to do. The disease is, besides, epidemic and contagious. And yet this is only one of the many diseases, such as tetanus, convulsions, croup, whooping-cough, and others too numerous to name, which kill the very infants whom God, out of his infinite mercy, has taught the principle of suction and the art of sucking. Thanks to the inventors and promoters of medical and hygienic arts and sciences; thanks to those who suffered, fought and won for suffering humanity the battle of truth and right against the so-called agents of God! Had it not been for them, the world would have been but thinly populated, and, moreover, it would not have been worth living in. At a time when these and other sciences were not known, there was naturally greater faith in God, and, as a consequence, there was a higher death-rate among children. The ever-infallible rule that the greater the faith in the special providence of God, the less of health, the less of remedies for disease (the so-called whip of God), and the greater mortality amongst the people, and the less of population, has always been true in all countries and climes from time immemorial up to now.

The fourth point which the Design of Argument supporters bring forth is about the thickness and strength of the skull in which the brain is lodged—that the skull is formed of twenty-two bones instead of one, which are arranged like the stones of an arch to make it strong, that it may be able to bear even a severe blow.

In answer to this, I say that the skull is not able to bear a severe blow on all its sides. On the temples, as also on the orbital plate of the frontal bone, or the orbital plate of the ethmoid bone, even a moderately severe blow will easily cause serious injury to the brain. So, also, the walls of the orbit are very thin and delicate. The brain can be easily hurt through them. The superior, inferior, and internal walls which separate the orbit from the cerebral maxillary and nasal cavities are formed by thin osseous lamellæ (plates) which may be easily broken down. This anatomical disposition explains the facility with which a wound of the orbit may affect the brain, and how tumors, papylus, or others which take origin in one of the neighboring cavities, may break through the walls, and even destroy them, and, invading the orbital cavity, lead to the projection of the eye—that is to say, to exophthalmus.

Well, again, suppose, for the sake of argument, that the skull is made strong with the object of protecting the brain within, how is it that in infancy the bones are not even joined and ossified, and, consequently, the brain is easily hurt, though the bones are not so easily broken? So also, in old age, all these different bones are ossified more than they ought to be, are turned brittle and formed into one bone in contravention to the object of God and defeating his special providence. In infancy it is one extreme, in old age it is the other. This proves that the skull only follows the natural process of primary growth, successive development and decay, like all other organisms, without any special providence for anybody's good or ill.

Now, before I leave this point, let me remark something about the massiveness of the skull. The functions of the brain are very important, but, as it is locked up in the bony safe, it has as yet become almost impossible to know even one hundredth part of the functions of the brain, properly and positively, with any certainty. And in the absence of knowledge of these functions, most of the diseases of the brain and the nervous system are required to be treated almost empirically, merely as quacks would treat them. Many of the diseases are considered incurable, and so human misery is not relieved. And, again, what a number of false, fearful, and misguiding spiritualistic views, and how many superstitious ideas about reincarnation, life after death, and hell and heaven, are promulgated amongst the people and inculcated in their minds! What false notions about mesmerism, hypnotism, clairvoyance, somnambulism, and many other phenomena lie before the scientists and philosophers of the present century! These, as the hardest problems of the future, would have been solved long since and human kind made a thousand times happier if God, instead of shutting up the brain in the unventilated cage of the massive and compact skull, had managed to house it in some such wise way as that, while secure there, it would also be accessible to the scientists for the study of its functions.

Look at the organs in the chest—the heart and the lungs. Because their movements can be felt through the chest, a simple, trivial instrument like the stethoscope has revealed a new world, as it were, of knowledge to the stethoscopists. Such a vast field of knowledge it has revealed, and such a great interest it has aroused amongst the medical faculty, that many of them have thought it worth their while to labor for the good of humanity all their life in that direction. And they have not labored in vain, but with great success. That tube, insignificant as it is to all appearances, has revealed the functions of these two important and vital organs, in health and disease, and enabled the practitioner to diagnose and remedy a large number of the most serious diseases, and thus to relieve humanity of its pains and pangs, sorrows and tears, by preventing untimely deaths.

Digitized by Google

But God, through his special providence, has prevented the scientist from acquiring and improving his knowledge of the functions of that most important organ of all, the governor of the functions and activities of the organs and limbs of the whole body—the brain—by shutting up and securing it close within that hard shell, the skull.

The fifth point is about the articulations or joints of our body. Out of his infinite wisdom and mercy, God has made these joints more or less firm, and bound them together with more or less ligaments, according to their greater or lesser importance, and supplied them with more or less strength, according to the functions they have to perform and the purposes they have to fulfil.

(To be continued)

National Secular Society.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON OCT. 29.

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, occupied the chair. There were also present: Messrs. Barry, Brandes, Cohen, Cowell, Cunningham, Davey, Judge, Lazarnick, Moss, Neate, Nicholls, Quinton, Roger, Rosetti, Samuels, Silverstein, Thurlow, Wood, Miss Kough and Miss Stanley.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed. The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were admitted for Camberwell and West Ham.

The Secretary reported that the Annual Dinner had been fixed for Tuesday, January 12, 1915, at the Restaurant Frascati.

The President, in answer to inquiries, reported that no useful halls were at present available for indoor lectures, proprietors being afraid to risk the probability of references being made to the War, and, referring to the attitude of Professor Haeckel in relation to the War, said that Freethinkers should be on their guard against a narrow patriotism that would confuse their judgment on some of the greatest men of other nations.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Correspondence.

NIETZSCHE AGAIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—The other day I looked up some of my old Freethinkers, and I came across Wheeler's article on "Nietzsche" (July 7, 1895). Note that J. M. W. found Nietzsche long before he was known in English or in England. One point that he emphasises in his penultimate paragraph seems to show that the dear old Freethinker always did see clearly when others were clouded by mists. Wheeler says rightly that Nietzsche's doctrine of the elimination of the unfit, through the erection of a military aristocracy, was simply the expression of the existing militarism of Germany. Yet these scribblers for the Jingo Press would have us believe that Germany's militarism is the outcome of Nietzsche.

As you say, war is not a question merely of intelligence, but perhaps more strongly a question of character.

Perhaps, with a few judicious "touches" (to suit chronology), you might reprint Wheeler's article.

In the Freethinker (March 9, 1890) there is a translation of a fine poetic onslaught by Jean Richepin, one of the greatest living French poets. Will you please consider it for reproduction in an early issue?

H. GEORGE FARMER.

The Better Land.

Suggested by Mrs. Hemans's Popular Poem.

"I HEAR priests speak of a better land,
And a rest for every laboring hand;
Tell me, dear mother, where is that shore—
Where shall I find it and work no more?
Is it at home, this delightful ground,
Where the golden harps and angels are found?
Is it where Kaiser Bill on his motor-car speeds,
Or in Rome where the Pope is counting his beads?
Is it at Shepherd's Bush, so fine and grand,
I shall find this adorable land?"
"Not there, not there, my child!"

"Is it far away on the Rio Grande?
In Ecuador or Basutoland?
Is it far away on Biblical shores,
Where unicorns fight and the dragon roars?
Or, will it in drear Belgium be found,
Where soldiers' bones manure the ground?
Or, on the banks of the sacred Nile?
Perhaps 'tis away on some coral isle,
With dusky groves and silver strand?
Is it there, dear mother, that beauteous land?"
"Not there, not there, my child!"

"Eye hath not seen that fair land, my child,
Ear hath but heard an echo wild—
The nightmare of an excited brain,
That dreamers have, ever again.
Far away, beyond the ken
Of men whose heads are screwed on tight.
Where the turrets of Colney Hatch do stand,
See the golden streets of that lovely land!
'Tis there, 'tis there, my child!"

MIMNERMUS.

LILY'S ANSWER.

As on my cosy couch I lay
Methought I heard an angel say:
"Dear little child, come up above;
Here all is peace, and all is love!"

But I replied: "Good angel, no!
I cannot leave my parents so;
And brother Frank and sister May
Would weep if I should go away."

He answered: "Here we live in joy;
Grief comes not, nor does pain annoy;
Care from our realm has taken flight;
There's nothing here but pure delight."

I pleaded: "Let me stay awhile
To see mamma's proud, loving smile;
Should I your realm of bliss attain,
I think she'd never smile again!

The pains and griefs I have to bear
My parents, brother, sister share;
So all my cares and troubles pass
Like shadows over waving grass.

Indeed, I'm very happy here,
With home so pleasant, friends so dear:
Earth's warm and comfy; in your sky
I'd be a stranger—so Good-bye!"

—B. D.

Obituary.

I have to record the death, in his 78th year, of Thomas Searle, of Devonport, on the 26th ult. He was a sturdy Freethinker of the old school, always ready and able to give a good account of his principles, and never better pleased than when discussing some knotty theological question with his Christian friends. For a considerable number of years his health was a constant source of anxiety to his friends and relatives, but he bore his sufferings with patience and fortitude. The present writer read a Secular Burial Service at the graveside last Sunday (Nov. 1), in fulfilment of a promise given to the deceased many years ago, and in accordance with the latter's strong desire expressed only a few days before his death.—G. F. HUGH MCCLUSKEY.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

KINGSLAND BRANCH N. S. S. (Mr. Davey's, 32 Crossway, Stoke Newington): Monday, Nov. 9, at 8.30, Business Meeting—To receive the Auditor's Report, etc.

OUTDOOR.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, R. H. Rosetti, "Christianity in a Funk."

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

LEICESTER (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate): 6.30, G. W. Foote, "Religion, War, and Humanity."

ST. HELENS BRANCH N. S. S. (Central Café): Saturday, Nov. 7, at 7.30, Business Meeting.

FAILSWORTH (Secular School, Pole-lane): 6.30, E. Pack, "Our Spurious Gospels."

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—MISS E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6¼ ins. by 8¾ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-
Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be base on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LETTERS OF A CHINAMAN ON THE MISCHIEF OF MISSIONARIES. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d. (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 46 SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

An illogical opinion only requires rope enough to hang itself.—AUGUSTINE BIRRELL.

How Lies Grow.

EVER since the days of Paul the Christians have been wonderfully fond of lying for the glory of God. The pastime has afforded what is thought a legitimate exercise of the imagination. It has also deceived millions of ignorant, indolent, and credulous people, and immensely increased the power, influence, and profits of the Church.

Colonel Ingersoll said that the truth often enters the field weak and defenceless. It meets a mature, vigorous falsehood, dressed in strong armor, and the truth gets licked. Ingersoll added that nothing on earth has as much vitality as a good, sound, healthy religious lie. A similar sentiment, at least to a certain extent, must have been in the mind of George Eliot, when she said that human beings took to the absurd as asses took to thistles, as an excellent aid to digestion. Was it not Lord Bacon who said that "A mixture of a lie doth ever add pleasure"? His lordship found in human nature "a natural, though corrupt, love of the lie itself." "Doth any man doubt," he asks, "that if there were taken out of men's minds vain opinions, flattering hopes, false valuations, imaginations as one would, and the like, but it would leave the minds of a number of men poor shrunken things, full of melancholy, and indisposition, and unpleasing to themselves"?

Look at the pious stories that continue in circulation about the death-beds of great Freethinkers, like Voltaire and Thomas Paine. What is the reason of their longevity? They have been refuted every year since they originated. Long ago their death-warrant was signed by Evidence, and countersigned by Reason. But it is never executed. They flourish almost as vigorously as ever. It seems likely that they will never die except from sheer inanition. And what is the explanation of their obdurate vitality? It is not enough to say that these stories serve the turn of their inventors and perpetuators. Of course they do. But why are they so greedily swallowed by the Christian multitude? A jest's prosperity lies in the ear of the hearer, and a falsehood's prosperity must lie in the mind of its recipient. What then is it, in the mind of the orthodox Christian, which makes him welcome these ghastly stories of infidel death-beds? Why this. He has been taught, and he believes, that death is a terrible thing without Christian consolations. Men who die without those consolations must be miserable. That is as clear as daylight. Besides, if they were not, the orthodox Christian would be wrong; and that is a mortal affront to his vanity.

My object, however, at present, is not so much to show how lies prosper, but how they grow; how they career along, like a rolling snowball, gathering size as they proceed: and how the imagination which gives them birth, like the mother bear with her cubs, licks them afterwards into shape. Of course I cannot, in a single article, trace the rise, progress, and development of a dozen lies; but what I have to say about one story will throw light upon all the rest.

Many of my readers, I daresay, have seen a lecture on the Bible by a Yankee anti-infidel, the Rev. H. L. Hastings—a fellow who considered it a Christian duty to slander Colonel Ingersoll. In the course of this lecture he tells a story of two infidels, father and son (we believe, but we have not the lecture by us), who were travelling in the wild and woolly West. They found shelter one night in a rude dwelling, and after retiring to their room they were alarmed by sinister sounds in the next apartment. The son looked through a crevice, and saw their host reading a book. It was not the Age of Reason, but the Bible. That was enough. They felt quite safe, and went to sleep in peace and security. Had the host been reading Paine or Voltaire or Shelley, or any other Freethinker, the two infidels would, of course, have been obliged to sit up all night, with their hands on their revolvers.

Now I have discovered that this story is fairly ancient, although its older form is not so dramatically rounded—not having yet been licked into proper shape. I have been looking through an old debate, between Charles Bradlaugh ("Iconoclast") and the Rev. T. D. Matthias, held at Halifax, in October, 1859. It was a four nights' discussion on "The Credibility and Morality of the Four Gospels," conducted with excellent good temper on both sides. Mr. Matthias had quite a Sunday-school teacher's notion of debate. In his last speech he told some anecdotes, which he evidently regarded as splendid arguments. One of them was as follows:—

> "I may tell you of another instance—of a sceptic who was travelling at one time, in the backwood settlements of America. Benighted, he sought a refuge in some cabin from the wolves and bears of the forest, and found it in the log hut of a lone and solitary woman, whose looks were aught but hospitable. The man of the house soon came in, and if the looks of the woman had terrified him before, the man seemed much more rough than his partner. He had a considerable amount of property about him, and dreaded sleep lest his property should be taken from him and his life lost. What was his terror to see the old man place two pistols on the table! He thought it was all up with him. He was asked to go to bed, but this he dared not do; he said he would sit up. 'Well, then,' replied the old man, 'the dame and myself generally have a chapter of the Bible and prayer together.' He was not afraid of the pistols now."

Such is the story as told many years ago by Mr. Matthias. It is more dramatic as told by Mr. Hastings. The one sceptic grows into two infidels; the old woman, as far as I recollect, is eliminated; the two infidels are in mortal terror in their own room, one looking through a crevice in the partition; and then, at the climax of fear, they see their host reading his Bible.

This is how stories grow. An inventive genius starts one, and more critical minds improve it; and at each stage it is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Could we see the very first Christian document, and all its successors, until the settlement of the New Testament Canon, we should know exactly how the Life of Christ was manufactured. But the Christian Church was wise. It destroyed the traces of its operations, and criticism has to painfully eke out the paucity of evidence.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

The Wrong Way to Die.

IN one of the soldier's letters that are being published in the newspapers, I came across the following item. It is related by a sergeant of the Fifth Lancers:—

> "I came on a wounded man of the Lancashire Fusiliers one day. He had two ghastly wounds in his breast, and I thought he was booked through. He was quietly reading a little edition of Ruskin's Crown of Wild Olive, and seemed to be enjoying it immensely. As I chatted with him for a few minutes he told me that this little book had been his companion all through and that when he died he wanted it to be buried with him. His end came next day, and we buried the book with him."

Now, this story came to me with something of a shock. It was not that I knew the wounded soldier, or was affected out of the ordinary by his death. It was that this particular soldier didn't seem to realise what was required of him. As a mere soldier he had doubtless done his duty in a most satisfactory manner. He had fought well, and the narrative shows he had taken his punishment bravely. He was not found crying or whimpering, but with two deadly wounds in his breast was spending his last hours reading. So far, as a soldier, all was well.

But there is more than this in it. He was a British soldier. A member of the greatest Empire on earth. He was an Englishman, belonging to a Christian country, which, we have often been informed, owes its greatness to the Bible and to Christianity. It was, therefore, incumbent upon him to play the part properly, to live up to the character of a Christian soldier, fighting a Christian battle.

The sergeant ought to have found him reading, not The Crown of Wild Olive, but a pocket Bible. He ought to have told the sergeant what a comfort that precious book had been to him, how it had solaced his hours of lonely duty, inspired him when the battle was at its fiercest, and had now fallen back upon it as his only true friend in the hour of death. And, finally, he would, of course, have begged that the Bible might be buried with him. That is how it ought to have ended; that is how soldiers are often found—in the religious tracts I have read. Frankly, this Lancashire Fusilier failed in his duty as a member of so Christian a country as England. He must have known what the Christian public of England expected of him. Why was he so neglectful of his responsibilities?

The more I think about this soldier the more disappointed I am. He was probably born of pious parents, had received a religious education, and here, at death's door, was found reading mere secular essays. He must have known the proper, the orthodox way to die. He must have read scores of times how the true Christian soldier dies. He may have read the story, published again the other day, of how a soldier's life was saved through carrying a New Testament in a breast pocket, and how this is used to prove the value of the book. He must have known how hard a number of people at home are working to raise funds to send copies of the New Testament out to the front. He ought to have realised that churches and chapels are not praising our soldiers in order that they may advertise Ruskin and the consolatory power of his writings. If he had not been reading, but merely died; if he had made no dying request, but only whispered "Good-bye, old pal"—but to die reading The Crown of Wild Olive, and to ask for it to be buried with him, that is the very height of impropriety.

This Ruskin-reading "Tommy" is what the tracts call "a pernicious example." He may induce others to follow in his steps, and instead of cheering their last moments by reading the genealogies of the Old Testament, or seeking inspiration in the zoological curiosities in the Book of Revelations, they may take all sorts of literature with them into battle and ask that it shall be buried with them. Imagine the feelings of good Christians if they learn that some of the men at the front were to go to battle with The Age of Reason in their pocket, or if wounded men were picked up reading the Freethinker. Of course, reports are published of soldiers who eagerly welcome copies of this or that paper, but that is for reading while they are safe and sound. It is quite another thing to have soldiers reading them in the hour of death. It is against all theory, contrary to all tradition.

I am also disappointed with the sergeant who reported the case. Clearly it was an incident that ought never to have been reported. He also manifested a certain want of a sense of responsibility. At least, he should have asked the advice of one of the Army chaplains before reporting the matter. Then, doubtless, the story would have been properly edited before being made public. And it would have been so easy to have edited it in an "edifying" manner. The alteration of one word, and the elimination of several others would have made the story quite suitable to the columns of all the religious papers, and would have secured its perpetuation in thousands of religious tracts. Thus:—

> "I came on a wounded man of the Lancashire Fusiliers one day. He had two ghastly wounds in his breast, and I thought he was booked through. He was quietly reading a little book. As I chatted with him for a few minutes he told me that this little book had been his companion all through, and that when he died he wanted it to be buried with him. His end came next day, and we buried the book with him."

There it is! Substantially the same story, every word true to fact, and yet how different would have been its influence on the public mind! Told in this way there is not a religious person in the country who would have doubted what book the wounded soldier was reading. Evangelists would have repeated the story on numerous platforms. It might have formed the subject for a special tract, with an engraving of a soldier hugging a family Bible as a frontispiece. Or it might almost have run to a serial story: Chapter i., the soldier as a boy reading the Bible at his mother's knee. Chapter ii., the soldier as a youth attending Sunday-school. Chapter iii., the soldier in the barrack-yard holding up the Bible to his fellow soldiers and exhorting them to lead a Christian life. Chapter iv., the soldier in the trenches reading the Bible by candle light with shells falling all around him. Chapter v., the Christian soldier's end, dying clasping the Bible to his breast, with the whites of his eyes turned upward in the most approved fashion. It is exactly the thing that Mr. Harold Begbie would have turned into one of his religious shilling shockers. It is a sheer waste of good material. Many a report of missionary conversions has been built up on a story with less fact as a foundation. That sergeant had no imagination. He was as blind to his duty as a Christian as was the dying fusilier. Perhaps the sergeant was not a Christian, though. And that puts a different complexion on the matter. One wonders what kind of reading he has been doing during the War?

I am disappointed also at the editor of the newspaper—it was the Sunday Chronicle; the villain deserves the publicity—publishing such a communication. I must inform him that, judged by the ordinary standards of English newspapers, his conduct was un-English, unchristian, uneditor-like. Could he not have edited it on the lines suggested? What is to become of religion in this country if the newspapers do not play their part in keeping up those traditions about the Bible which Christians value so much? Have they not often been warned of the danger to religion of advertising, by notice, Freethought meetings, Freethought speakers, and Freethought works? And how much less real is the danger of advertising that our soldiers find comfort in a book which contains things like the following:—

> "If you have to take away masses of men from all industrial employment, to feed them by the labor of others,—to provide them with destructive machines, varied daily in national rivalship of inventive cost; if you have to ravage the country which you attack,—to destroy for a score of future years its roads, its woods > its cities and its harbors; and if, finally, having brought masses of men, counted by hundreds of thousands, face to face, you tear these masses to pieces with jagged shot, and leave the living creatures, countlessly beyond all help of surgery, to starve and parch through days of torture, down into clots of clay—what book of accounts shall record the cost of your work;—what book of judgment sentence the guilt of it? That, I say, is modern war,—scientific war,—chemical and mechanic war,—how much worse than the savage's poisoned arrow! And yet you will tell me, perhaps, that any other war than this is impossible now. It may be so; the progress of science cannot, perhaps, be otherwise registered than by new facilities of destruction; and the brotherly love of our enlarging Christianity be only proved by multiplication of murder."

Digitized by Google

The whole matter is eminently unsatisfactory. It is an accepted maxim in English society that if you are not a Christian, if you do not believe in the Bible, the proper thing is to remain silent. English society is still largely modelled on the principle that you ought to be a Christian, or, at least, you ought to be religious, and that if you are not, the proper thing is to "respect the feelings" of Christians by saying nothing about it. Our political leaders appeal to this "Christian nation," and ignore the existence of large bodies of people who are not Christian. Ministers of religion assure us that the greatness of the nation rests on Christianity. Newspapers are run on the principle that only Christian opinion is worth bothering about. Why could not this soldier, and this sergeant, and this newspaper, have kept to the orthodox lines? It is useless pleading that as a matter of fact our soldiers care little about the Bible, and would sooner read an evening paper at any time. It is useless pointing out that the overwhelming majority of people do not, when dying, trouble their heads about the Bible, and not one in ten thousand call for it to be read to them on their death-bed. It is idle to point to the fact that people do not fly to the Bible for comfort in trouble, or for consolation in death. The fact remains that the religious tradition points otherwise. In thousands of tracts, and sermons, and evangelical reports, people die hugging the Bible, demanding that it shall be read, and depart this life with a beatific smile on their face. That is the way this Lancashire Fusilier ought to have died. That is the way he would have died had one of our professional evangelists been there. To die reading The Crown of Wild Olive is to fly directly in the face of all orthodox tradition.

I feel certain the story will not be very widely retailed.

C. COHEN.

Illusions.

SOME divines declare that the greatest and most precious truths in the world's possession were discovered by small nations. The reason assigned for this is that small nations which have survived must have passed through many a hard time. Such a nation occupied Palestine in olden times; and being small and weak it experienced numerous trials of the severest kind. Both Israel and Judah were perpetually in trouble, and each dark time made them think and wonder; compelled them, so to speak, to look life in the face and demand an explanation of their own existence. The Rev. John A. Hutton, of Glasgow, puts it thus: "In the depth of their historical agony, Judah and Israel—occupying territory about half the size of Scotland—came upon God. In the depth of its historical agony, Athens, with a free population only equal to that of Stirling—Athens came upon man." The contention is that "in the depth of their national disasters the children of Israel comforted themselves in God," while the Athenians, when similarly situated, found comfort in the contemplation of truth and beauty. It is quite true that the Greeks were ardent lovers of beauty, and that the products of their art have remained incomparable to this day; but it is not true that the Israelites either "came upon God" or were loyal to him. Officially, Jehovah was their deity; it was he who was worshiped in synagogue and temple; it was he who was supposed to reward them with victories and punish them with defeats; but he was only one among many, and they often preferred some of the others. Throughout their history the chief complaint against them was that they were unfaithful to their God. Jeremiah, of course, was profoundly loyal to Jehovah; but this is how he represents Jehovah as speaking of the people generally:—

> "Then shall the cities of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem go and cry unto the gods unto whom they offer incense; but they shall not save them at all in the time of their trouble. For according to the number of thy cities are thy gods, O Judah; and according to the number of the streets of Jerusalem have ye set up altars to the shameful thing, even altars to burn incense unto Baal" (xi. 12, 13).

But Jehovah himself did not save even his loyal followers in the time of their trouble. When Job's lot was at its worst it was in vain that he sought help from the Lord, who deliberately hid his face from him and held him for his enemy. One of the Psalmists says, "Why standest thou afar off, O Lord; why hidest thou thyself in times of trouble?" Another complains thus: "Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled; thou takest away their breath, they die and return to their dust." Even the devout Isaiah wails almost out of despair, "Verily, thou art a god that hidest thyself, O God of Israel." Scores of similar quotations might be made, all showing that even they who trusted in Jehovah were frequently most disappointed in him, while to the generality of the people he was scarcely more than a name.

It is very true that in any time of national and international tragedy, like this present time, men and women who believe in God, however faintly, turn to him for succor. Multitudes go to church and chapel now who had not been inside a place of worship for years; but it should be borne in mind that their belief in God had never died. All the time it lay dormant within them, and the horrors of the War have but shocked it into newness of life for a brief season. The same thing happened at the time of the Franco-Prussian War of 1870. For a while the churches of France and Germany were crowded with superstitious people momentarily frightened out of their religious indifference. As soon as the excitement caused by that sad struggle began to abate the newly awakened zeal for religion showed signs of growing drowsiness, with the result that after a few years the state of religion in those countries was much worse than it had been before that war. It will be the same now. Indeed, already places of worship are not so thronged as they were two months ago. As long as superstition is alive, however soundly it may sleep in quiet times, it naturally awakes when noisy and destructive storms begin to rage, but no sooner are the tempests lulled than it gradually falls asleep again. But they from whom superstition has been completely eradicated, they who do not know the way to any mercy seat above the clouds, being able to face the facts dispassionately and to think for themselves, are simply confirmed in their unbelief by the awful happenings of the hour. They are profoundly convinced that nothing can be more absurd, more utterly fruitless of good, or more emotionally injurious than the intercessory prayer-meetings now being held in all parts of the country. If people would but think, they would soon share that conviction and decline to have anything to do with such ludicrous performances.

Dr. Orchard admits that "God does not burn Europe to roast a pig"; but the fact remains that, according to the reverend Doctor's teaching, God does burn Europe for some higher purpose. On this point all the divines are agreed. As reported in the Christian Commonwealth for November 4, Dr. Orchard spoke thus:—

> "God's judgments were not mere vengeance, they came to deliver us from something worse. Something > no less than this catastrophe was necessary to save us from the racial suicide that was threatening us, a racial suicide involved in the tendency of our civilisation to build upon the working of a competition almost as ruthless as war itself. An attitude of distrust towards each other, the quarrels between churches which created little sects in despair over the great whole of men, the irreconcilability of political parties, the militancies of our advanced reform movements, these were all signs that we had ceased to believe in the convertibility of each other, and had come to trust in some kind of thinly disguised force."

Digitized by Google

Now, if the present War is "God's operation," if it is proceeding in accordance with his omnipotent will, why not allow him to bring it to an end in his own way and time? Surely it is not possible to be guilty of more egregious disrespect towards him than by "praying with all our might for a speedy victory." The holding of intercessory services is an act of overt impiety. If Christians took Dr. Orchard's dictum to heart, that "God does not burn Europe to roast a pig," not another prayer-meeting would be held. Mr. Hutton clearly agrees with the new minister of the King's Weigh House Church, for he says that "one of the great discoveries which the good men in the Bible made is that a dark and heavy time, if we meet it properly, will soften and deepen and enlarge our soul." God has brought this War upon us for our good. And yet these very men of God lead their people in petitioning their Master that this bitter cup of European war may pass away from us before we have drunk it to the dregs. Here we have the quintessence of inconsistency.

We affirm that the God whom the Jews are erroneously said to have "come upon" is an illusion, a vision of the fancy that never objectively existed, which the divines have utilised in all sorts of ways to their own selfish advantage. For example, they assert that the tribulations of life, of whatever nature they may be, come from God as means of "deepening us." We are to endure them without a murmur of distrust, regarding them as blessings in disguise. Listen to Mr. Hutton:—

> "It is one of the most common things in the Bible to hear someone saying that he is a much better man now that God has plunged him into deep waters than he used to be when he had no troubles. They even go the length of saying that God did well to let loose the dark waters upon them; that God knew them better than they knew themselves."

One of such men, we presume, was King David, whom Samuel characterised as "a man after God's own heart." This was said of him before he entered the throne, but after he had been a captain of freebooters levying blackmail on all who could pay and after he had cherished treasonable designs against Saul. It was as "a man according to God's own heart" that he committed adultery with Bathsheba, and afterwards had her husband murdered that he might possess her altogether. Principal George Adam Smith says that his "character was one of the most complex ever possessed by man," and that "his temper was not only ambitious and cruel," but also "disfigured by some of the most ferocious traits which are characteristic of his race." When he lay on his dying-bed the most horrible words ever heard fell from his lips, which are to be seen in 1 Kings ii. 2-10. Such was David, the God-trained and God-filled man. God's heart is a figment, like himself, and all talk about him and his heart is senseless jargon.

Mr. Hutton gives the case for God away when he states "that we find what we are looking for, what we in secret are confessing we need." Exactly so. It follows, then, that God is not looking for us, or he would find us, confessing that he needs us. He does not need us, nor do we need him. It is the most difficult thing in the world to convince little children that they need God; and once they have learned that lesson, they always keep forgetting it again. Even the saintliest people living acknowledge that their hold on God is in constant danger of giving way, and that one prayerless day obscures the vision of him. Let prayer be dropped altogether, and soon all thought of God vanishes from the mind. After that has occurred we discover that war is not God's judgment, but an antiquated method of settling disputes which we ought to have outgrown long ago, and that tribulations are not things to be resigned under, but evils to be thrown off as soon as possible.

J. T. LLOYD.

A Fourpenny Wilderness.

The Holy Bible: Containing the Old and New Testaments, etc.; 1914.

THIS volume, bound in funereal black, is, without doubt, a very cheap publication. Indeed, the shiny cover bears an embossed inscription to the effect that the volume is sold "under cost," whatever that may mean precisely. There is plenty of reading matter for fourpence, and several hundred pages of small type, strongly bound, should satisfy even a Scotchman.

The contents are, however, distinctly puzzling. We have given ourselves a headache by examining this book, and, like the curate who had a doubtful egg given him, we admit that "parts of it are excellent." As for the remainder, we cannot discover any sequence in this volume of undigested tracts. The whole thing is merely a pot-pourri, a literary Irish stew. If the reader cares to imagine Dod's Peerage, Mother Shipton's Prophecies, Mrs. Beeton's Cookery Book, Rochester's Poems, Tupper's Proverbial Philosophy, Baron Munchausen's Travels, The Book of Mormon, Every Man His Own Lawyer, Petronius, and some auctioneers' catalogues, all bound in a single volume, he will get some faint idea of the incoherency and general confusion of this book. Its various divisions, too, like an awkward squad of Boy Scouts, are of all sizes, and equally open to criticism. From the first blunder in Genesis to the last absurdity in Revelation, we have discovered very little that merits praise. A few sentences in Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, and Corinthians make some pretence to sanity; but, like the plums in a workhouse pudding, there is a taxicab ride between each.

The author has, occasionally, a flow of language which is as painful as it is free, such as in "the Psalm of Curses," which is the strongest piece of invective we remember offhand, and might prove useful to landladies who have lodgers in arrears. The so-called "historical tracts" are utterly untrustworthy. They are anonymous, dateless, placeless, legendary Salmagundi, of no more value than the History of Cock Robin. Indeed, the search for the gems was as exasperating as the proverbial search for the needle in a bundle of hay. And, as a numerous father and respectable citizen, we must reluctantly admit that the author is very tropical and outspoken in his treatment of sex matters. He is very Oriental in his nastiness, and, as we all know, Eastern vice begins where Occidental vice leaves off. Parents keep some modern novels out of the reach of children; but this anonymous scribe writes powerfully enough to make a bronze statue blush. The dedication to King James is an anachronism; it should have been inscribed to Charles II., who would have appreciated this ordure, especially the Song of the Royal Solomon. The stories of lust, adultery, incest, and unnatural vice are sufficient to paralyse the green readers who admire the blue stories in the Pink-un. We do not believe in bowdlerising any volume, but, if ever there were any occasion for such drastic treatment, it certainly should be directed against such a book as this.

Unfortunately, if all the objectionable passages were deleted, the volume would be very much reduced in bulk. Further, if the vain repetitions, contradictory genealogies, and untruthful yarns were also removed, we fear the volume would be further contracted to the size of a penny novelette. So, acting on this suggestion, our fourpenny wilderness has nearly vanished. It is a thousand pities it has not really disappeared, for its circulation debases the moral currency. The book should be published at ten guineas, and have a lock and key on it. Selling it at the price of a cigar is demoralising. Ordure is cheap when so much can be had for fourpence.

Digitized by Google

MIMNERMUS.

Invisible Helpers and Adversaries.—II.

(Continued from p. 710.)

IT was long alleged that the method of purification adopted by the water authorities, which consists in the storage of water in huge reservoirs, which is afterwards filtered through sand, had little influence on the number of aquatic microbes resident in the liquid. An examination of the untreated water of the Thames, however, soon discloses the fact that whereas on an average as many as 20,000 micro-organisms may be detected in about twenty drops of water, this large number falls as low as 400 in the same quantity of water that has undergone the purificatory processes which prepare it for human consumption. Sand filtration is consequently of considerable utility to the urban water-using population.

Extremely few micro-organisms are to be met with in deep well-water. In water raised from wells sunk into chalk an average of eighteen only has been discovered. This indicates a wide difference between artificially prepared water drawn from such rivers as the Thames and Lea and the clear liquid which has filtered naturally through immense layers of chalk. Indeed, Pasteur found some waters that arose from deep-seated wells and springs that were optically pure under the microscope; but such ideal conditions are not often encountered.

Contrary to expectation, observation has established the fact that river waters do not teem with bacteria during the summer months—the season of life and growth—to the extent anticipated. The truth is that several samples of water examined disclosed a larger microbial population during the winter months. Still, due weight must be accorded the contention that—

> "in summer the rivers are principally fed by spring water, and receive comparatively little surface drainage, whilst in winter the rivers are generally more or less in flood, and are swollen by large volumes of surface water, which is naturally rich in micro-organisms."

The powers of multiplication among microbes are strikingly illustrated by the following experiment. Water from a deep well was kept under observation at a temperature of 20° centigrade for three days. At the commencement of the investigation, seven microbes were found in twenty drops of water. At the end of the first day the number trebled, but when the water was three days old the number had increased to 495,000!

The micro-organism responsible for wool-sorter's disease in man and splenic fever in cattle—Bacillus anthracis—when introduced into ordinary water, soon perishes, but its hardier spores are in no way affected by immersion, and retain their virulence in the purest water for a practically indefinite period. But in contaminated water, especially sewage, the microbes themselves continue to flourish, and even multiply on a vast scale. Another malignant microbe, Koch's "comma bacillus," the generator of Asiatic cholera, soon adapts itself to a sewage environment, and has been detected in immense numbers after immersion in this fluid for eleven months. In "clear" drinking water, however, although these bacilli were discovered after nine days, they were very few in number. A far greater tendency to succumb is exhibited by the micrococcus of erysipelas, for, when placed in waters of different degrees of purity, it soon disappeared. Even in sewage its presence was not demonstrable after five days, while it perishes in clearer water in a few hours.

A study of the activities of the bacillus of tetanus or lockjaw has revealed some remarkable phenomena. This pestilent micro-organism does not appear to part with its malign powers when placed in distilled water, but, when introduced into ordinary water in which other bacteria abound, its vitality is lessened; but it quickly recovers itself as soon as the activities of these antagonistic organisms are weakened. Sea-water depresses the tetanus microbe, but it rapidly reasserts itself when restored to more normal conditions.

Although there is evidence that there are fewer aquatic bacteria in salt than in fresh water, the organisms appear to be fairly evenly distributed at the various sea-depths studied. Observations in the Gulf of Naples showed that in the accumulated sea-mud there exists a dense mass of bacterial life, which is far more abundant than that of the overlying waters. It has also been determined that this large surplus is not the outcome of reinforcements from the neighboring land, but is to be ascribed to the genesis and development of the microbes within the mud itself. At a depth of about 400 feet the investigator demonstrated the presence of ten bacteria per cubic centimetre of water, while in the mud immediately below an army of 200,000 was met with in the same volume of sediment. The mud under the waters of Lake Geneva includes among its microbe residents various disease germs, and it is asserted that the bacillus of tetanus has been dredged from the sediment of the Dead Sea.

It is a relief to know that micro-organisms are not all maleficent, but that various beneficent bacteria exist. In nearly every region of the earth, both in ancient and modern times, man appears to have possessed the secret of converting sugar into alcohol. And there is no known race of men among whom fermented beverages are not appreciated, and, regrettably enough, abused. Still, comparatively little is known, even now, of the precise processes which transform sugar into alcohol. More than half a century since, Latour and Schwann discovered that yeast was a living substance. The celebrated studies which Pasteur subsequently pursued revealed the truth that the production of the best beverages is strictly dependent upon the use of yeast or "barm" from which alien micro-organisms have been excluded. Then Hansen's more recent researches proved that it was not only imperative to employ pure yeast, but that for every special brand of beer a particular variety of yeast is needed if the finest qualities are to be obtained. Yeasts are now specially cultivated for brewing purposes. These yeasts are elaborated under conditions of the most refined scientific skill, and several important laboratories have been erected on the Continent in connection with this industry. The yeasts thus evolved are arranged in two chief classes: the surface yeasts, which appear on the top of the liquid, and the bottom yeasts, which flourish on the floors of the vessels in which they are prepared. British and North German beers require the "top fermentation yeasts" in order to secure their prime production. The "bottom fermentation yeasts" are employed in the brewing of those Bavarian beverages, Lager and Pilsen, which are now held in high esteem throughout the world. Hansen has also devised some very ingenious tests to distinguish one form of yeast from another, as the microscope fails to reveal any material difference between them.

Although horses, dogs, cats, and monkeys will occasionally drink the cups that cheer as well as inebriate, the lower animals in general have little liking for fermented liquors. There is one organism, however, whose imbibing capacity much exceeds that of the most hardened human drunkard. This alcohol-loving organism is a tiny body which becomes conveniently visible when magnified by the microscope one thousand times. It was originally discovered and studied by Pasteur, and is commonly known as the vinegar organism. This microbe (Mycoderma aceti), when once established in alcohol of moderate strength, multiplies with amazing rapidity, assimilates the alcohol, and converts it at an extraordinary rate into vinegar. In a sense this organism is a discriminating drinker, as it eschews all fermented liquors that contain more than 10 per cent. of alcohol. It is a deadly enemy to wine—at least from the vintner's point of view—as the choicest vintages, confined in carefully guarded cellars for human enjoyment, when thoroughly mature, are transformed by this mischievous microbe into the sourest vinegar in the course of a few hours.

Digitized by Google

The services supplied to the vegetable kingdom by bacteria are truly wonderful both in their nature and extent. Yet the story we are now to relate could not have been told until quite recently. It is an indisputable fact that one of the leading plant-foods resident in the soil is nitric acid. Scientific agriculturalists are agreed that in soils destitute of this chemical no root crops, corn, or grass will grow, even when the land is in all other respects of the richest quality, most favorably circumstanced as to sun and air, well tilled and adequately drained, and provided with all "the purely mineral ingredients of plant-food, such as potash, lime, and phosphoric acid."

Yet despite the indispensable nature of this ingredient to floral growth, nitric acid is present in the most minute proportions only in all moderately fertile soils. This important truth was brought to light through the epoch-making experiments of Gilbert and Lawes at Rothamsted. It has since been ascertained that the minute quantities of nitric acid in average soils is to some degree due to this chemical being dissolved by the rain, and partly to the avidity with which plants absorb it for nourishment and growth.

Two enterprising chemists made the astonishing discovery that bacteria were the agents instrumental in the conversion of the nitrogen of the nitrogenous materials of the earth into nitric acid. Further facts emerged from the later labors of Warington and others, but the specific organism engaged in accomplishing this transformation continued to resist all efforts to isolate and identify it. It was only in 1890 that the bacterium was at last traced by Frankland, and only a month after this scientist had established its identity, Winogradsky, who was investigating the same problem independently, also isolated the same or a very similar nitrifying micro-organism. As this organism requires the absence of all living matter from its developing environment, it was found difficult, if not impossible, to grow it in any ordinary culture medium.

Winogradsky's researches appear to prove that nitrifying bacteria are capable of elaborating living protoplasm "in a solution from which organic matter has been rigorously excluded." This in itself constitutes an important contribution to knowledge, as it was previously thought that the power to evolve the living from the lifeless was the prerogative of green plants alone.

But at this stage of the inquiry the problem of nitrification was incompletely solved, for the bacteria discovered, although undoubtedly instrumental in changing ammonia into nitrous acid, were found to be incapable of evolving nitric acid itself. The nitrous acid, then, which exists in very small quantities in vegetable soils is therefore the product of micro-organisms. How, then, is the nitric acid prepared? Winogradsky and Warington supplied the answer by isolating another organism which "possesses the power of converting nitrous acid into nitric acid, but has no power of attacking ammonia." The nitrate which these two sets of bacteria evolve is invaluable to the soil, and the hundreds of thousands of tons of this manure exported from the nitrate fields of Chili and Peru have enormously increased the crops of Europe, while building up the fortunes of the Nitrate Kings.

The problem as to whether plants were capable of utilising the free nitrogen of the atmosphere was long debated until Lawes and Gilbert discovered that while the nitrogenous constituents of many crops unquestionably came from the chemical matters of manures and rain water, yet, in the case of several crops such as peas, beans, vetches, etc., there remains a surplus of nitrogen demonstrably not derivable from these sources. It is now known that this excess of nitrogen in leguminous plants is obtained from the air, but that the power of these plants to assimilate free nitrogen is absolutely dependent upon the activities of bacterial organisms which attach themselves to the vegetable roots. To clench the matter, hundreds of experiments have made good the fact that in soil from which these beneficent bacteria are excluded, leguminous plants fail utterly to fix the atmospheric nitrogen. Again, the tuberosities on the roots of these and other plants are formed by microbes. These root-swellings are extremely rich in nitrogen, and simply teem with bacterial life.

T. F. PALMER.

(To be concluded.)

GOD IN PICCADILLY.

Poisonous paint on us, under the gas,
Smiling like spectres, we gather bereaven,
Leprosy's taint on us, ghost-like we pass,
Watched by the eyes of yon pitiless heaven!
Let the stars stare at us! God, too, may glare at us
Out of the void where He hideth so well.
Sisters of midnight, He damned us in making us,
Cast us like carrion to men, then forsaking us,
Smiles on His throne on these markets of hell!

Laugh! Those who turn from us, too, have their price.
There, for the proud, other harlots are dressing;
They too may learn from us man's old device—
Food for his lust, with some sham of a blessing!
Sons of old Adam there, buy the fine madam there,
Bid with a coronet—yea, or a crown!
Sisters, who'd envy the glory which graces them?
They, too, are sold to the lust which embaces them,
E'en in the church, with the Christ looking down.

—Robert Buchanan.

EXIT GOD AND COMPANY.

There are indications that the celestial interest in man begins to flag, that Jahweh himself is tempted to transfer his immortal energies to some other and more profitable corner of the universe. Certain misguided spirits even derive consolation from this fact. One hears an occasional impious tongue venture to affirm that, when the divine audience gets off the stage, and out of the theatre, the mortal company of players will provide a more refined entertainment. With people who permit themselves these appalling opinions we should have nothing to do. For since the high gods are weary of us, the time has surely come when we should cease to take the smallest delight or interest in ourselves. But who shall dare to say that heaven quite forgets us? Has not God's own daughter, Carnage, recently given us refreshing proof that the All Father is still remembering his children?—Eden Phillpotts.

THE CHURCH WHERE YOU MAY LAUGH.

A theatre to me is a place "where two or three are gathered together." The apostolic succession from Aeschylus to myself is as serious and as continuously inspired as that younger institution, the apostolic succession of the Christian Church. Unfortunately, this Christian Church, founded gaily with a pun, has been so largely corrupted by rank Satanism that it has become the Church where you must not laugh, and so it is giving way to that older and greater Church to which I belong—the Church where the oftener you laugh the better, because by laughter only can you destroy evil without malice, and affirm good fellowship without mawkishness.—Bernard Shaw.

A CONVICT'S READING.

There is a good story in the October number of the Sunday at Home. A well-known Glasgow preacher was interviewed by an ex-convict, who desired help in a case of what he considered to be objectionable police surveillance. The interview was satisfactory, and in bidding the ex-convict good-bye the minister asked what had led him to consult one who was a stranger to him. "Well, you see, sir," said the visitor, "it was like this. When I was at Peterhead I read an address of yours in a weekly paper. You know what it is when ye're in prison—you'll read anything."

The Bishop was visibly moved, and many wounded soldiers sat and heard the BENEDICTINE as he poured out..... the most touching appeal I have ever heard.—An "Evening News" misprint.

Digitized by Google

Acid Drops

The Archbishops of Canterbury and York have decided to do something drastic to help the nation in its hour of trial. January 3, 1915, is to be observed as a "Day of Humble Prayer and Intercession." This is done with the consent of the King, who expresses his personal disinclination to the "use of any term which might plausibly be misinterpreted either at home or abroad." This looks as though King George had a little more sense in the matter than many of his advisers, but we suppose in these matters he must give way. Perhaps he thinks as Charles the Second did of the popularity of certain preachers in his time. Their nonsense suits the people's nonsense, he said, and we have no doubt that the nonsense of a Day of Intercession will suit the nonsense of many others. A number of Free Church leaders have expressed their approval of the suggestion, which is only to be expected. Anything that favors their trade will naturally meet with the support of parsons of all kinds.

Seriously, we wonder whether anyone—or how many—will believe that a general day of prayer would have any influence on the course of the War? If it will, why was prayer not resorted to three months ago? And why wait for another two months now? Will the German troops fight less effectively because people at home pray? We doubt it. Besides, we were under the impression that people had been praying—on both sides—all along. And now God Almighty is given two months' notice that unless the War is over by January 3, the whole of the nation—or that portion which calls itself Christian—will go down on its knees and howl to high heaven for "intercession." We really do not know whether this united prayer is intended as a bribe or as a threat. But whichever it is, it seems equally silly; and it is rather hard to realise the frame of mind that at this time of day thinks the course of a great war is to be influenced by adopting the intellectual attitude of a tribe of savages. Elaborate ritual and polished language may disguise that fact, but it remains.

The Church Times remarks on the proposed Day of Prayer that we must face the fact that "England is not a Christian country." It explains the selection of Sunday on the ground that the proclamation of a week-day to be set apart for prayer would only mean "a Bank-holiday orgy." Still, it thinks the first Sunday in January will supply a "public recognition of the Divine governance of the world," and "will give the most captious and critical occasion to think." Doubtless; but all the thinking will not be of the kind that the Church Times would like. The Church Times thinks "the curious and unbelieving may well be influenced by the spectacle of a nation on its knees." In what way? The "curious and unbelieving" are not unfamiliar with the sight of people on their knees. And it really makes no difference when a million adopt the same attitude. It is so like the religious mind to assume that an action that may be silly when performed by a few will become sensible when performed by many. It is what one may call—for want of a better term—sheep psychology; and that kind enters very largely into the religious make-up.

The late Bishop Wilkinson translated many English hymns into the Zulu tongue, but his task was not so bad as that of the missionary who had to render Sankey's pious verses into Cannibal dialects. Fancy some "Cannibal" Christians singing "There is a Fountain Filled with Blood."

The value of modern journalism, intellectually, is not great, but one of five daily papers, each claiming the largest circulation in the world, a few months ago stated that the Kaiser was "a very gallant gentleman, whose word is better than many another's bond." The paper sings a different tune to-day—for the same small bronze coin.

Thirsty ladies will not be served with intoxicants in the Metropolitan area before 11.30 in the morning. We hope prayerfully that this will not drive them to take early communion.

English sailors are cool enough when facing death. After the wreck of the cruiser Hermes, which was torpedoed in the Channel, a party of men went by on a raft, singing "Put Me Among the Girls." Unlike Turks, they did not mean the girls in the "next world."

Mr. G. K. Chesterton, whom the Daily Mail calls jocosely "a stout opponent of Germany," has been writing on "The Barbarism of Berlin," and he states that the root-evil of the Germans is that they are "intellectual Anarchists." Including the 20,000,000 German Catholics, eh, Mr. Chesterton?

We hear a lot concerning the evil influence of German "culture," which, presumably, includes music. Many religious tunes are German, such as the Christmas favorite, "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing," whilst the Easter hymn, "Christ the Lord is Risen Again," was also made in Germany. So were the children's favorite, "O Happy Band of Pilgrims," and the harvest festival tune, "We Plough the Fields and Scatter." The oratorios, "The Messiah," "St. Paul," "Elijah," and the "Hymn of Praise," are all German. Yet the wise Mr. Hilaire Belloc and a number of clerical gentlemen are always assuring us that the Germans are Atheists, and their "culture" is responsible for the present calamitous War.

Some Free Church busybodies, whose ears are longer than their colleagues', have been discussing the question of banning German music in their tin-tabernacles and chapels. They are asking whether it is right to listen to Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" or Handel's Dead March in "Saul." Perhaps they will crucify the flesh by using ragtime music.

"The war has accomplished more for missionary efforts than a thousand missionary societies," says the Rev. A. J. Waldron, of Brixton. Maybe this is his humorous way of suggesting that it has sent more men to heaven than the missionary societies.

The Rev. W. B. Brash, writing in the Methodist Recorder, says that "As one wanders along the roads of modern literature, one sometimes hears the low, at other times the loud baying of the bloodhound." How sad! And it is sadder still to reflect that the Scriptures of Brother Brash's Church also teach the ethics of blood.

A new novel has been published with the quaint title, The Man with a Double Heart. In that better-known work of fiction, the Holy Bible, we have stranger stories of people who had two funerals.

Rev. W. Temple, who is editing a series of pamphlets—"Papers for War-Time"—says that it is easy to answer those who say that the War represents the bankruptcy of Christianity. He thinks it really represents a great advance of Christianity, because "It is only now that Europe has found out again that if nations were Christian there would be no war." Dr. Temple is simply threshing the air. Even as it stands, the case is bad enough; for if Christianity has not persuaded the European peoples to adopt it during all these centuries, and with unrivalled opportunities for asserting itself, it is hardly likely to succeed in the future, with every one of its claims contested by hosts of keen and cultured minds. But the real bankruptcy of Christianity is shown in its being deficient in that kind of social and intellectual teaching that would lead people to see the horror and ultimate futility of war. The cardinal and damning fact is that the peace of the world has been for generations threatened by Christians, and by Christians alone. Anything like common trust and honesty among Christians would have made such a War as the present one a sheer impossibility.

How far Christians are from the Freethought ideal of human brotherhood! One hears so many people killing the Austrians and Germans "with their mouths" nowadays. As Huxley wittily said, "Public opinion is often public-house opinion."

Captain Jackson, a Tooting veteran, who will be 107 shortly, was among the congregation at the recent Seafarers' Service at St. Paul's Cathedral. He was made much fuss of. What would that congregation have done had Captain Noah been present, bearing bravely the weight of eight centuries?

Ordinary soldiers are sometimes as laconic as Cæsar or Wellington. We remember an elderly warrior who used to beg, bearing a placard, "Actions seven, wounds nine, children eight." The pious public so soon forget "Mr. Atkins" when the band has stopped playing.

Mrs. Randall Davidson, the wife of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the wives of the Bishops of Rochester and Southwark, have issued an appeal "to the girls living in the neighborhood of the Crystal Palace to beware of "the glad eye" of "Mr. Thomas Atkins." What a commentary on the assertion of the restraining influence of Christianity! And what an insult to "Mr. Atkins" and the girl he leaves behind him!

Digitized by Google

Frederick Birkett, a collier, who was sentenced at the Notts Assizes to twenty months' hard labor for house-breaking, his crimes totalling twenty-one burglaries, was a Sunday-school teacher. There is no moral; but had he been a Freethought lecturer there would have been a long one.

"May the guns ring in a new age of a wider charity, a bigger God, and a larger heaven!" says the Rev. A. J. Waldron. A bigger God. Indeed. Isn't Brother Waldron satisfied with one three times as large as that of any other religion?

Everybody is now familiar with the responsibility for the War being placed upon the shoulders of Nietzsche, Treitschke, and Bernhardi. The cultured pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, Dr. Dixon, goes one better and lumps these three, Bernard Shaw, R. J. Campbell, and the late William James. We wonder why Mark Twain and Josh Billings were left out?

The New Zealand House of Representatives has rejected by 46 votes to 17, the proposal that the Bible in Schools Referendum Bill shall become law. It was hoped by the advocates of Bible teaching in State schools that by means of the Referendum the present position would be overthrown. As it is, Secular Education continues.

Mohammedan Turkey has at length joined in the march of Christian "civilisation," and will now devote herself to the study of murder as one of the fine arts.

The Daily Telegraph, that very Christian newspaper, has surpassed itself in its fulsome adulation of the Czar of all the Russias, whose kindness to the Jewish people will never be forgotten. Years ago the Telegraph gushed over the Czar's disarmament scheme, and called it the "coming millennium." As the music-hall song says, "It's a long, long way to Tipperary."

General Christian De Wet is "a dour man, convinced that God is on his side," says Mr. Robert Blatchford in the Weekly Dispatch. De Wet is the breeder of trouble in South Africa. Another man, who is also "God intoxicated," is the Kaiser, who is causing far more trouble in Europe. Is it not true that the negation of God is the beginning of wisdom?

The naval and military authorities agreed to a partial relaxation on November 5 of the rule prohibiting fireworks, in order that Protestants might celebrate "Guy Fawkes Day." It is a pity that this absurd celebration is not done away with, but any silly superstition is tolerated if it be even remotely associated with religion.

"The Christian faith is confidence in God in spite of anything, and no facts must be allowed to bully us out of that faith." So says Rev. John Hutton; and we agree that the faith which declines to be influenced by facts is the proper kind of faith. If facts contradict the faith, so much the worse for the facts. Only it strikes us that it is just this kind of faith that is bringing Germany to ruin. German leaders appear to have a most pronounced faith in the argument of brute force and sheer terrorism. They do not allow any fact to shake that faith. They will not realise that you cannot bully a people into taking even what is good for them, still less what is harmful. But they go their way, and, in Mr. Hutton's words, allow no facts to bully them out of that faith. We trust that Mr. Hutton renders to the German leaders the appreciation that is due to them.

The British Weekly announces that a representative gathering of Free Churchmen will be held at the Memorial Hall to deal with various aspects of the war. It adds that in the afternoon there will be a discussion on "The Camps—How the Free Churches can Help the Soldiers." This, we are told, "will relate to their temptations." Lord Kitchener should attend to this. There seems enough temptations about the camps already without Free Churchmen helping them to some more.

One of the wounded British soldiers at the Naval Hospital, Southend-on-Sea, has to be fed on buttermilk. That is the diet the Press Censor considers suitable for newspaper readers.

At a Bible Society meeting at Southend-on-Sea the Rev. J. H. Ritson described the operations of the Society's work among all the nations involved in the War, and also referred to a visit to South Africa. Evidently the Holy Book does not prevent the Christians following the pleasant pastime of cutting each others' throats.

"General" Booth may be full of the milk of human kindness, but the milk sold by the Salvation Army Colony at Hadleigh might be improved. At Southend recently the "General" was fined £5 and costs for selling milk from the Colony below the required standard. A witness said cows were affected by music. We wonder if he was thinking of the Salvation Army band.

The clergy of all denominations are shrewd in looking after their own interests. One result of the European War probably will be armored cathedrals and churches.

A pious writer in T. P.'s Weekly says that "German industrialism is materialistic to the core." So is all other. Soap, cotton, jam, clothing, and other articles are not made for any other purpose than the provision of the material basis of life. Even the bronze "gods" made at Birmingham and elsewhere are "materialistic."

A condemned man who was not sure he was going to be "jerked to Jesus" has been hanged. He deserved to have had a new trial, for the probability is that he was innocent. People who actually commit murder never seem to have any doubts about their salvation.

"It is because we are Christians that we have gone to war," says Sir Robertson Nicoll. This is not the whole truth, but there is a good deal of truth in the statement. It is partly because the world is Christian, and has been governed by Christianity for so long that such a war as the present one obtains. Can one imagine that a world in which the majority of people had been for centuries dominated by anything else but religion would be placed as Europe now is? We do not believe that any form of philosophy would have failed as completely as religion—and particularly Christianity—has done. It has failed to unite in bonds of enduring friendship two nations in any part of the world. Its failure is colossal—only equalled by its impudence in claiming that the world now needs more of it.

If all the Christian sects would support the Catholic Church in an Anti-War policy, says the Catholic Times, we should have a guarantee of peace upon which men might rely. Really! We should be interested to know when the Roman Catholic Church has preached an Anti-War policy, and when its whole influence has been directed to that end. We have no doubt that the Catholic Church would like all the other sects to look to it for leadership. Some weeks ago the Catholic Times was silly enough to hope that this might be one of the results of the War.

By the way, the Catholic Times does not view with any pleasure the probability of Russia occupying Constantinople. It is afraid it would mean a too great aggrandisement of Russia, and the progress of Russia means the progress of the Russian Church, which is not favorable to the Roman Church. That much is certain—until the advance of thought weakens the Russian Church, as it weakens churches elsewhere. The Russian Government looks to the Church as one of its most potent helpers, and those who know the history of Russia know the part played by the Church in dragooning the Russian people. Readers of M. Pobyedonosteeff's Reflections will remember the emphasis he placed upon religion as an agent in keeping the people in subjection. As Procurator of the Holy Synod of Russia he was able to speak with authority, and he was, moreover, a singularly intelligent man. He saw that the first consideration for an autocracy was not the enslavement of bodies, but of minds. The other followed as a matter of course.

It was reported that information reached the authorities of Harvard University that a very large bequest would be lost unless it discharged Professor Munsterberg, the eminent psychologist. The Professor tendered his resignation rather than injure the University. The University declined to accept it, and the Professor remains at his post. The authorities of the University deserve congratulating on their decision. It is as well to teach even millionaires there are some things that are not in the market, and upon which no cash value can be placed.

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £228 13s. 6d. Received since:—Pontypridd, 15s.; F. H. (Blackburn), £1 1s. Per Miss Vance: J. L. Vickery (Peckham), £1 1s.

ANDREW MILLAR.—You will see why we did not meet your young friend at Leicester. We should have been glad to shake hands, and something more.

PONTYPRIDD.—We like to acknowledge every subscription somehow. This will not disclose your identity.

ABRACADABRA.—Our readers will be glad to see your contributions resumed. There is much truth and sense in what you say with regard to the War.

T. C. (Portsmouth).—We note your opinion that the Freethinker articles on the War are in your opinion "almost the only ones containing reason and truthfulness." Perhaps this is due to the fact that Freethinker writers have no political or party axe to grind. Their object is to bring reason and good feeling to bear on all problems, and if the truth cannot be reached in this way, then the outlook is indeed hopeless.

E. A. PHIPSON.—You are quite mistaken as to the class of people among whom the Freethinker circulates. On that point, at least, we are likely to be better informed than any other individual. Nor do we think that our work would be more rapidly done by concentrating attention on what you call "modern occult and psychical theories." Reason is the great solvent of all superstitions, and a very large number of those who are attracted to modern occultism have never had their minds really liberated from the "old Adam" of theology. We venture to say that the attractiveness of "occultism" proves how little good is done by destroying a particular religious belief without at the same time giving the mind a—so to speak, good general cleansing.

H. W. MANN.—We do not know anything of Mr Weatherhead, and cannot say anything concerning the nature of the letters written many years ago "against the Bible and religion in general," and which he now expresses regret for having written. If we saw the letters it is possible that we might add our regrets to those of Mr. Weatherhead.

E. B.—Much obliged for cuttings.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are very welcome.

BRADFORDIAN.—We are sending specimen copies of Freethinkers to the address given.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Personal.

I WAS very much disappointed by not being able to go to Leicester on Sunday. Neither my voice nor my breathing apparatus generally was affected. I was primarily suffering from an internal disarrangement brought on by lack of lavatory accommodation in a railway train, which set up acute diarrhœa and consequent heart disturbance, with sharp pain every now and then that nearly doubled me up. My doctor took me in hand, and soon worked an improvement. The pain is all gone, other symptoms are subsiding, and I expect to be quite well again in a few days. Anything expected from my pen this week will have to be postponed till next week's Freethinker. Mr. Cohen is kindly filling the editorial chair for the present issue of the paper. All's well that ends well, but I missed meeting many old friends at Leicester, and I am sorry for it.

G. W. FOOTE.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Sydney A. Gimson, President of the Leicester Secular Society, writing on Monday morning, says: "A large crowd gathered to hear you last night. Not only from Leicester but from towns and villages round about. They were much disappointed not to hear you, and recognised that you were as disappointed not to come. Many left when they heard you were not coming, but a good audience remained and we gave them a good concert."

The Ardrossan Herald recently contained the following leaderette:—

"THE MOCKERY OF RIVAL PRAYERS.

"We pray to God to bless our arms. Germany is doing the same. France is doing the same, and so is Austria. What a ghastly spectacle it is! The evangelical churches of Germany issue a manifesto. The evangelical churches of England reply to it. In the manifesto of both the name of God and his Crucified Son appear, and we poor creatures must read them both—must read the comments passed upon both; and what can we do but hang our heads in shame that ever such a thing should have happened? I wish for those days, said Mr. Ramsey Macdonald, M.P., at Manchester, on Sunday, when we had no universal God at all. Then we could pray to our national God. I wish we were back in the old pagan days when every land had its own idol to which it could pray. Then we should be consistent; then we should be content and happy. But the hollow mockery of it!—that men using the same Name and worshiping the same God should, from rival battlefields and pulpits, put up rival prayers asking for rival blessings. What a curse must have come upon Europe before that sort of thing could be possible. Cannot we say this evil must pass away from us? We must go back to our Christian faith and our Christian hopes and, leaving all our fine-spun philosophies and all our political apologies upon one side, look each other in the eyes, shake hands with each other, and start Europe anew upon a basis of reason, of experience, and of Christian fellowship."

This is not a bad article for a Scotch paper on such a subject, but it contains a blunder which may as well be corrected. France is not praying to God for victory. The President refused to let the State be used for national prayers. He left all that to the Churches, as pertaining to their special province.

We might observe that Christian fellowship has always been a very poor basis for international peace. Christ said he came not to send peace but a sword, and he kept his word. His followers have shed more blood than the followers of all the other Prophets on earth. Why introduce "Christian" before "fellowship"? Isn't the latter good enough by itself?

Many of our readers will be glad to read the following passage in a letter from a Blackburn correspondent:—

"I gratefully acknowledge the debt I owe you—a debt so great that I can never hope to discharge in any material way. During these years of physical blindness you have been, and are still, an unfailing source of inspiration. You have enriched my life. Allow me to express also my warm appreciation of the common sense you are publishing regarding the War."

Such letters are medicinal to one who has had many troubles and as many reckless enemies as man ever had. But the friends always outnumber the enemies, and such letters as this assure us that we have not lived and toiled in vain.

It is probable that some of our readers may be acquainted with Belgian refugees in need of a home. A Freethinker is ready to place a small furnished cottage in the country, with food, at the disposal of, preferably, a widow with two to four children, or, failing that, an elderly couple. No questions will be raised as to religion—although preference would be given to Freethinkers; the only question is that they shall be necessitous. Applications for particulars must be made to Miss Vance, at this office.

We feel there would be little need for the above paragraph, but, as usual, religion is making what is at best a mournful business still more distressing. The Belgian Hospitality Committee, in making arrangements, raises so many questions of religion that Freethinkers have little opportunities of extending their hospitality. In addition, we are afraid that those refugees who are Freethinkers (and there must be many such) will be more or less victimised on account of their opinions—unless they are driven to concealment on account of their needs.

There is hope for Catholics now. The Pope has advised them that they should all keep a copy of the Bible in the house and read some of it every day. If they take his advice, as we earnestly hope they will, many of them will soon be on the high road to Freethought.

Digitized by Google

Undelivered.—Killed in Action.

THERE had been a dispute at the works. Foolish things had been said by both parties; and when he spoke the matter over at home his father agreed with the manager, even going further, and saying he should get the sack for impertinence and insubordination. That led to complications. His spirit, naturally a rebellious one, seethed with revolt. He felt at war with the world. So he 'listed.

Six crowded months passed quickly. His seditious nature was tamed into sharp recognition of obedience. He trained hard, and in the training his overpowering personality was subdued. He helped to bury an unforgiving father. A premature engagement was broken off. There was a declaration of war; a hurried farewell visit to his mother; and a hasty departure for France.

Mother suffered, as many women do, in silence and solitude; but her quiet anguish came more from her thoughts than from her heart. She often questioned the sense of bringing children into the world. And always, when she turned the pages of the book of her own life, her ideas circled this; and always they were personal. Often she wondered if it were not possible to conquer sex love to the extent of dominating the physical by the mental. Happiness she had enjoyed up to the time when she knew she was a mother; but from then the happiness gradually waned. With her baby there came something of the nature of misery, a cloud that hung heavily upon her heart, and never lifted. Her boy was the flame of a physical passion that appealed to her as a sudden weakness, and the smoke of it thickened with the years. Even now, twenty-seven years later, her cheeks would flush at the thought, and she could not be sure it was not shame.

Mental pain intensified with the gathering of thoughts and memories. As her brain found more and more avenues of ideas that led away from her conviction she felt herself drawing nearer to an imagined sore part of the heart of womankind; for she dreamed there must be many women with natures like her own, women who wished the tree of love to bear no fruit. And the sadness never left her; for her son was headstrong as a child, stubborn as a boy, and grimly determinate as a youth. Circumstance aided her attitude to strength.

Conflict between him and his father was continuous. Even in their times of apparent peace moved an animosity that kept the atmosphere charged with the elements of strife. There were periods when the tension became nearly unbearable. Only the idea of the inevitability of it all seemed to keep her mind from being destroyed. She summoned to her assistance the oriental complacency in the face of fate. Behind her son's moods, his character, his strong enmity to control, his passionate hate and disgust at everything from which his mind recoiled, and his inability to conceal his emotions, she saw the reaction of her own sex distaste. The implications of her sense of shame, of weakness, she felt convinced, had been transmitted; he had inherited them; they were working out their fated destiny in his life.

Delight came to her from one source. When the clouds lay black and heavy over the household, and her mind was being tossed upon the sea of conflictions, she would turn there for such delight as it afforded. Silent, moody, and self-sufficient as her son was, his outside life practically a closed book to his parents, only an occasional trivial episode leaking out, the mother felt with a stedfast faith that her boy was straight. Nothing ever came to dim her pride. She knew his mind and body were clean, cleaner than her own, she thought. And fain would she have confided in him, seeking to ascertain his ideas; for often she wondered if he felt as she did towards the things that mattered most in her life. But his egoism forbade friendship, and her loneliness of mind acted as a barrier to the expression of her longings.

When her husband died it seemed as if the gates were opening. She would come closer to her son. They would get to know each other. The stain of the last grievous quarrel would be wiped away by purifying chumship. And her heart rejoiced at the idea of her son's chumship. At last, it seemed, she could renounce her loneliness. She would enjoy his companionship. And her heart leaped at the prospect. But suddenly the winds of war swept across the land of her dreams. The gates were crashed together; and her son was gone.

Lines crept into her face, and grey hairs whitened into snow. Loneliness deepened under the sombre skies of her thoughts. It was too late. The few letters that came were the silver edges of her life; and when these ceased night fell.

. . . . .

The postoffice sorter turned the letter over and swore audibly at the officialism of which he was a part; and all day he cursed bitterly the callous, inconsiderate thing. The postman, handling the letter, wished to God someone else had been on his road that delivery.

"Any letters for me this morning, postman?"

"Yes, mother; and I wish I hadn't!"

She took the letter, looked at her own name and address as she had written it on the back, then she turned it round to read the endorsement on the face: "Undelivered—killed in action."

ROBERT MORELAND.

"The Weaker Vessel."

IN his article on "The Radical Woman," published in this periodical recently, Mr. Mangasarian gives as known truisms a number of statements in regard to female subordination which are not in accord either with my own reading or observation. He speaks of primitive times and the primitive husband, and lays down that in primitive times a mentally virile woman would have scant chance for survival. That the primitive husband wanted a dependent woman because it gave him an opportunity to play the rôle of protector. But what is "primitive"? When were "primitive" times? As far as history goes, men in all stages of development existed concurrently. The world at this instant contains races in every degree of uncivilisation. It is those which are most degraded that can be demonstrated not to be "primitive," but degenerate posterity of formerly civilised peoples. To avoid a side issue, we will take the word "primitive" in its everyday and conventional meaning in regard to the races of men, only to find that there is no fixed law in nature controlling the status of woman. It was precisely in primitive society that the "virile" woman—both or either—mentally and physically had scope. Among the earliest Hebrews, the first virile mind to conspire to emancipate the tribes was that of the woman—Deborrah—and she was their recognised chief. Captain Cook found at least one of the South Sea Islands ruled by a woman. Speke and Grant found a powerful female chief in Africa. I find in Irving's Life of Columbus the statement that upon one occasion a canoe containing a number of men and two women came unawares upon one of their boats. While attempting to seize the savages, they resisted, and "The women fought as fiercely as the men, and one of them sent an arrow with such force that it passed through and through a buckler.....One of the women, from the obedience and deference paid to her, appeared to be their queen." The aboriginal inhabitants of the New World not only have "virile" women but women who are sacerdotal; for in Mr. Mangasarian's own city of Chicago there is, in the Field Museum, the figure of a native minister of primitive religion, in a temple of the primitive culture, and that minister is a woman.

In paragraph 318 of Herbert Spencer's Sociology, is the statement "that definite coherent marital relations," such as described by Mr. Mangasarian as

Digitized by Google

"primitive," wherein the man's vanity made him "play the rôle of protector," were preceded by indefinite incoherent ones, and, in many places, instead of a lordly-protector-husband admiring the quality of weakness in his wife, her dependence upon, and subordination to, him, there is the diametrical opposite—a woman with a plurality of husbands. This polyandry is found among the most primitive peoples, such as the Fuegians, the Aleutians, the Todas, the Esquimaux, and among the warlike and domineering Caribs, who, nevertheless, have among them the opposite institution of polygamy. In truth, the subordination of woman and her fixture in society as "The Weaker Vessel" is the outcome of religion, and is not a tradition surviving out of primitive times. Gods are primitive ideals and become obsolete. The Greeks were the most civilised and cultured people that has yet been evolved. They had a vital religion that was a reality and part of their national existence, yet they kept their women in harems, subordinate and uneducated, impressing beautiful female children to be reared intellectually, but to form a distinct and prostitute sex. I have not read of any Greek woman out of that caste who was otherwise than domestic, subordinate, and dependent; nevertheless, among the gods Wisdom was an old maid who was born dressed in the complete uniform of a soldier! Thelma was not merely "a mentally virile woman," but a physical warrior. The gods of the Arts and of the Chase were twins, but it was the woman who was the hunter and the man a musician. In simple truth, the subordination of women, like the class inferiority of productive toilers, is a survival of slavery and direct outcome of the military organisation of society—which is always religious. The priest and the king are always more or less synonymous. As the royal power assumes the priestly, so the status of woman lowers. In England, when it was broken up into earldoms, abbesses had great power. Hild Abbess, of Whitby, created a university, trained clergy, and nominated bishops.

At that time the patient Grissel was unheard of; but when Cardinal Beaufort usurped the protectorship of the kingdom, he degraded the intellectual wife of the Protector as a witch, burnt the woman-soldier Joan of Arc alive, and the poem of Griselda was taught to the women of the kingdom as the true description of the perfect wife. I can remember no instance of a warrior-husband killing his wife because she was not delicate, dependent, fragile, timid, leaning upon his strong arm for protection—quite contrary. Alexander married the Queen of the Amazons. Moses married Zipporah, who decidedly had a will of her own. David took the strong-willed Abigail for a supplementary wife. The wife of Brutus stuck a dagger into herself, to demonstrate her firmness. Mark Anthony married Cleopatra. In fact, such unions of kindred temperaments with warriors are the rule. I cannot go through early French and German history, but here in England every warrior-king selected a virile woman as his "better half." Henry II. married Eleanor, who poisoned his mistress, "Fair Rosamond"; Richard the First's wife went with him to the wars; Edward III. had for his queen Phillippa, who, in his absence defended the country against the King of Scotland, and made him prisoner; Edward IV. married the extremely capable widow, Elizabeth Woodville; and so throughout history. Theodora, Alice Ferrars, Catherine I., Montespan, Maintenon, Mrs. Clark, were all voluntarily taken by soldiers for their companions, and were more or less ruled by them. But, on the other hand, while soldiers, instead of killing the most individualistic woman they could find, have married them or made them their mistresses. The most notably intellectual women have been murdered by priests. The famous Phryne narrowly escaped execution as an Atheist. Hypatia was cut to pieces by monks at the instigation of Cyril, the Archbishop of Alexandria. They were so vigilant that I do not remember another intellectual woman appearing until Anne Askew, who was burnt alive by the bishops for denying the Real Presence. While the Atheists Bentham, the Mills, Grote, Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, Darwin, Swinburne, were extremely popular and flourished, their woman friend, the astute "George Eliot," started by writing orthodox Scenes of Clerical Life, and followed it by a novel, the heroine of which was a female street preacher, and she did not not avow her Atheism until she resolved to write no more.

Neither the "primitive" nor the "barbarian" suppresses woman. What use is Mr. Mangasarian's savage's wife, who let her husband "think for her, choose for her, and decide for her," to a man who is from home the greater part of the time. Scott knew primitive man better; and he gave his savage revert, half ourang-outang, cattle stealer, Helen Macgregor for his wife. The savage has no rule in marriage. Some consort with women of the same name wherever he finds her, as by right—others may not marry such a one. As I have shown, he sometimes has female priests, female warriors, and female chiefs. The Queen of Ethiopia came to Solomon to learn wisdom; but Queen Athaliah was murdered by the high priest. Mark Anthony made his wife a general; Olympias, wife of Philip of Macedon, and mother of Alexander, upon her husband's death, headed an army of her own. Semiramis did the same thing. Herod the Great selected his daughter Alexandra to succeed him. Henry I. gave England to his daughter Matilda. Isabella I. was co-king with her husband, and a warrior. There are four suits of her armor in the Escurial. But it is in Italy that woman is intellectually abject. It is in Rome and Poland, in France since the rule of the Cardinals of the renaissance, in Russia under a Christian quasi-god autocrat, that the effacement of woman exists. Everywhere the priest rules the active and beautiful woman is mesmerised into a convent; the land drops down to moor, debased by insane, stealthy, and deadly cotters—we get Poland, Calabria, the Campagna, Connaught—and the Highlands of the early years of the last century. Where the soldier rules, we have the female liberty of the German housewife. The educational advantages granted to females in Russia, and the very advanced rights enjoyed by women in Turkey, as described by Lady Wortley Montague, in the eighteenth century. No woman except Pope Joan, who was disguised as a man, ever seized a priestly government but the late Empress of China, a former Empress. No; two Catherines of Russia, Maria Theresa, Catherine Medici, Queen Elizabeth, and many others, have seized and ruled military empires, and been enthusiastically worshiped by soldiers; but no woman except Lucrecia Borgia and, I repeat, Pope Joan, ever exercised the office of the Pontifex Maximus of Rome.

GEORGE TREBELLS (Newfoundland).

The Design Argument.—III.

IN THE LIGH OF ANATOMY AND PHYSIOLOGY.

(Continued from p. 717.)

WHATEVER the designists may say about it, I can't for a moment make myself believe that God or any other being has supplied more or less ligaments, and these also of more or less strength, to the joints, according to the importance of the joints. I don't think there is a joint of greater importance in the whole body than that of the atlas and axis, the first and the second bones of the vertebral column. The dislocation of the atlas produces pressure on the spinal cord and causes instantaneous death. No dislocation of a joint or joints of the body causes so serious, so disastrous a result; and yet only six ligaments are supplied to it. These are two anterior atlo-axoid, one posterior atlo-axoid, one transverse, and two capsular. And again, of these six ligaments, properly speaking, only one ligament—the transverse—serves to retain the odontoid (of the shape of a tooth) process of the axis in connection with the anterior arch of the atlas, and join these two bones —the atlas and the axis—that is, the first and the second bones, together.

Digitized by Google

There are several cases on record where the odontoid process has been dislocated with the result of instant death. A man went to swim, and straining himself in the act, the joint was dislocated, and instant death was the result. A lunatic in an asylum was being fed, and in his efforts to avoid the food, he jerked his head backwards, by which the joint between the atlas and the axis was dislodged, and the poor madman died instantaneously. Several such cases will be found cited in works on medical jurisprudence. If we take into consideration the fact that not even twenty per cent. of such cases come to the knowledge of the medical profession, and not even one-fourth of these are recorded, we can clearly see how disastrous results follow from the failure of the so-called God's special providence to supply the joint with ligaments strong enough and of sufficient quantity and good quality.

In children the danger of dislocation of this joint is very great, owing to the ligaments being more relaxed, and dislocation actually often takes place, causing instantaneous death. Hence, let me remark right here, that apart from God's special providence or no providence, it is essentially and absolutely necessary for us to take great care, in the handling of children, to support the head. So also in debilitated sick persons, the ligaments become relaxed and weak and we have to be very careful in supporting the head.

When we see how the most important joint of the atlas and axis is neglected, the trying to prove the special providence of God from the supply of ligaments to the joints of the human frame becomes glib talk and nothing more.

Sixth. It is urged that God not only has made joints and supplied them with ligaments, but that in order that they may work well, he has even oiled them, as we do the wheel and axle of a carriage. I admit that we do find something like that in joints. There is really a bag-shaped skin called synovial membrane around the joints. These membranes secrete a liquid substance which prevents the opposite membranes from rubbing against each other and permits gliding movements in joints. This is all true, no doubt. But to say that this is done by special providence of some kind and merciful Father in heaven is only to ignore the pathological phenomena which the human economy is subject to. If God, out of his infinite mercy, goodness, and wisdom supplies the oil in joints to make them work smoothly, and thus to enable his dear child, man, to walk and work and serve him, then why does he, every now and then, and in numberless cases, inflame the membranes and produce the disease called synovitis, by reason of which the limb cannot be moved an inch without the most excruciating pain? People prefer death rather than life, suffering this cruel pain. In cases of inflammation, God, out of his merciful profusion, produces a secretion of much more oil than is necessary and causes the same most unbearable pain just mentioned; or, on the other hand, he takes the opposite extreme—as he is often wont to do—and out of his frugal economy produces so little of the oil—why, often, in fact, he does not produce any oil at all!—that the membranes cannot glide against each other, and, of course, the joints cannot move, thus frustrating the special, kind design of the all-powerful Providence. The pain produced by this want of oil is simply unimaginable.

Now, one might say that these are pathological phenomena. They are not natural. God had made certain laws according to which the human system, as all other systems, is going on. If you break the laws you must suffer. That is the natural consequence. Who else is to blame for that? Well, so far, so good. But what's the good of God's making laws and keeping the people ignorant of them? Suppose the Parliament makes good and wise laws for the nation, but does not make them known to the people. Would it be wise on the part of the members of the Parliament to punish the people for not keeping them? You would surely call the Parliament insane, or, at any rate, unreasonable beings. It is the same case here with regard to the so-called God's providence. For instance, how are people to know what they should do to avoid synovitis, as well as a number of other diseases? It is simply orthodoxy, fanaticism, and want of regard to truth, to attribute all the good things to God's special providence for the good of man, and acquit him of the evils produced in the world and in the complex human system (said to have been made by the loving Father himself)—a system of the correct rules for the guidance of which so much remain to be known in spite of the hundreds and thousands of noble souls that have worked since time immemorial (and many are still working for the good of man) to understand correctly the laws that govern the system; not to speak of a number of external influences over which man has no control whatever, such as excessive heat, excessive cold, snow, fog, etc, besides a number of epidemic diseases, which oftentimes, in the twinkling of an eye, upset the human system and produce diseases, the names and nature of which have filled volume after volume of thousands of pages.

Now, as regards the seventh point, the so-called most ingenious contrivance in the throat, I have simply to ask you to recall to your mind how often you have seen this contrivance of God prove futile in others, and even in your own selves, while taking food or drink. How often is suffocation produced by the lodging of food and drink in a wrong passage, the windpipe, instead of the œsophagus, the gullet? How is it, I ask, that the food goes in a wrong way if God has already designed a valve or a door to guard against the accident? It defeats God's purpose, speaks volumes of evil against him, and clearly proves the opposite of his all-powerfulness and wisdom. Perhaps, some one will say, although the food sometimes escapes to the wrong passage, the wind from the lungs drives it away. Well, my inquiry is, why should it pass into the wrong passage at all? Does it not defeat the contrivance of God, if it is a contrivance in any sense? Of course, it does defeat it. There are cases on record of death caused by suffocation induced by the passing of food and other substances into the air-passages from which they could not be dislodged by the air of the lungs. Sometimes, too, the epiglottis is paralysed, when there is a great chance of such accidents taking place. Sometimes such diseases as glottidis are produced, or tumors are formed in the breathing apparatus; in such cases, there is great danger of suffocation being produced.

The eighth point I have now to consider is about the eye. The eye is, indeed, the most important organ of the senses of our body. They say God has provided the eye with seven muscles to enable us to move it in every direction. Well, if God has kindly managed it in that way, how is it that these muscles are often paralysed and God's good intentions foiled? If the elevator muscle of the upper eyelid is paralysed, dropping of the lid is produced, when one cannot see unless the lid is lifted artificially. So also paralysis of any of the four muscles—superior, inferior, exterior, and internal—determines a permanent deviation of the pupil in the opposite direction to the muscle paralysed, whilst its shortening draws the pupil to its own side. In these cases, the subject is said to suffer from squint. This effect can be cured only by the hand of the surgeon—mind, by the hand of the surgeon and not by that of God!—by the total or partial division of the muscle which draws the pupil to its own side. Lastly, the remaining muscles are the two "oblique muscles," and are called the great and the small, or the superior and inferior. They preside over the movements of the rotation of the eye on its anteroposterior axis and tend to draw the globe forward, whilst the recti-muscles act in an opposite direction. These two opposed forces neutralise each other and tend to keep the globe of the eye in equilibrium. But paralysis of any of these muscles produces deplopia, which means double vision, making a mess of the whole thing. Such is the special providence of God for the good of man—his favorite creature, and the noblest work of his hand!

Digitized by Google

The theologians, in praise of the Creator, say how astonishingly wonderful it is that although we have two eyes, we see only one substance when there is one substance only; but from what we have just described, in deplopia, we see two objects, though there is only one object, whether we see with two eyes or with one eye only. Here is a greater miracle still than seeing only one object with two eyes!

They say the eyes are placed in the front of the head where they are most useful. God has given us two eyes instead of one. This arrangement enables us to see better, and again, should we happen to lose one by an accident or disease, we still have the other.

In answer, I ask, should we lose the other also, why not a third and a fourth eye? Why only two eyes in the front, and not two more eyes behind, and one eye on each side? We could have seen better in that case. We could have seen vehicles and animals and everything coming behind us, and thus be saved from accidents. We could the better have detected wicked persons like assassins and pick-pockets. But no! God has given man only two eyes, and not even half-a-dozen; while such a trivial and loathsome creature as the cockchafer has 8,820 eyes, and the butterfly has 34,650 eyes!

Again, when we take into consideration the distance we can reach with our naked eye, we cannot but admit that we are very weak, neglected, and pitiable creatures.

On the point that "the eye is carefully guarded by the bones which jut out all around it," I have to say that it is not so guarded on the outer side, where it projects beyond the base of the orbit, and so exposes the eye to injury on this side very easily.

Again, they say the eye is protected by two shutters—the eyelids—to keep out the powerful light of the sun. So, also, the eyelids are supplied with lashes to keep off small bodies like dust and flies. How far the object of God to keep off small insects and particles of dust from going into the eyes is accomplished, is universally known. There cannot be found a single man on the face of the earth who is not now and then troubled with these small bodies in the eye, especially when he goes out for a walk in the open air on a windy day. So, also, the eyelid is sometimes inverted, i.e., turned inwards, when the hair growing on the margin of the eyelids, which we call eyelashes, are turned inside the eye, and so the eyeball is continuously pricked, is continuously tortured, as it were, by the hair. Sometimes, although the eyelid is not inverted, the eyelashes, that ought to grow only on the anterior or cutaneous, i.e., the outer, lip of the free border of the eyelid, grow on the posterior or conjunctival, i.e., inner border of the lip of the eyelid and prick into the eyeball, giving the favorite creature of God incessant pain. And in this, as in hundreds of other cases, it is for no fault of his.

You see what a fuss the special providence of God is making in this manner! When the special providence of God is pleased to take such a turn, no amount of prayers and offerings, no intervention of priests and mediators, can remedy the evil. Nothing short of a surgical operation, the tying up of the eyelid, or the extermination remedy, as the case may be, can correct the whim of God's so-called special providence for the happiness and well-being of man.

(To be concluded.)

Where is Jesus Christ?

A Curious Speculation.

AN astronomer had just shown a man Jupiter in a telescope. The man was pious, the astronomer was "undevout."

"Is that a world you are showing me?" queried the man.

"Probably it is," said the astronomer.

"I wonder," added the man, "if Jesus Christ has been crucified there too?"

The astronomer, knowing much more of Jupiter than of Jesus, could venture no reply to the last query. But the incident sets me athinking in quite an original direction.

You know, according to those most truthful of records, that Jesus left the earth for heaven about 1,864 years ago, informing his followers that he would return to earth in a short time—in fact, during the course of their natural lives. He has never returned, and there is no sign or sound of his second advent. This is a very serious matter, and believers are very much exercised over it; and their hearts are wrung and lacerated terribly when the scoffing sceptic cries: "Where is the promise of his coming?" The Christian can assign no reason for the failure of J. C. to reappear, any more than the followers of Joanna Southcott can for her delay in coming back to be the mother of the Messiah.

Now, I think I am able to suggest a reason why Jesus has not returned according to promise; and my explanation ought to convey the most solid comfort to those devout souls who "love his appearing."

You see, when Jesus ascended to go to heaven, he had no knowledge at all of Jupiter—didn't know such a world as Jupiter existed. But as he travelled on through space on the back of a cherub, which snorted fire along the road, and as age after age passed by, and nearly a thousand years had run since he left the earth and no resting-place had yet been found, he saw Jupiter just in front of him, and resolved to call there for a few days' rest and change of air. So he put spurs to his cherub, and was soon landed on Jupiter.

J. C. found the planet Jupiter immensely bigger and more interesting than the earth, and the people much more numerous.

"Dear me!" he exclaimed, by-and-bye, "how came my father to commit so gross a blunder as to send me to save so trumpery a world as the Earth—that paltry speck over yonder; why, dear me, I can't see it anywhere. Why, how was it he sent me to that paltry speck and not this huge world?"

So J. C., after resting a few months on Jupiter, resolved to do a little salvation work in that huge planet on his own account. So he provided himself with a new mother; and as the period of gestation there is much longer than here—because Jupiter's year is almost twelve times the length of ours—he was not born until almost nine years after his conception.

Having been born, and slowly grown up to manhood, he found, when he had finished his work, been crucified, and having risen from the dead, that over four hundred years had passed since he had landed to rest on Jupiter; and now he thought his father might be a bit anxious about him, and resolved to make straight tracks for home.

At the present time J. C. is, according to my most devout reckoning, about half-way between Jupiter and Saturn. He does not yet know anything of the latter planet; but, should he come in contact with it, I venture to predict that he will land first on one of the rings, and then descend to the planet itself. Should he choose a mother, and be reincarnated there, gestation, work, etc., and death and resurrection will take up no less than from 900 to 1,000 years.

If Jesus should stay to perform his grand comic farce on Uranus and Neptune too, it will be some time ere he gets back to his father. In Uranus alone it will take him about 2,600 years to get through the play; while in Neptune it will take him about 5,400 years.

The reader will understand that I have given Jesus equal proportionate times in all the planets named, taking each planet's year as the standard of measurement.

If my surmise be correct—and who will venture to question it?—why, I must have been divinely inspired to write it. If I am right, the reader will understand how it is Jesus has not returned to earth. And I am confident that my explanation is the most rational yet put forward to account for Christ's long delay. Looking at all the facts of the case, I do not think Jesus will return to earth until after the year A.D. 1,000,000, and I shall feel no surprise if 100,000,000 years should pass before he comes. Would you?

(The late) JOS. SYMES.

Street Evangelist: "I've been a thief; I've been a drunkard; I've starved my children; I killed my poor wife; I've been in prison for burglary; I—"

Policeman (interrupting): "Here, you come along to the police-station and report yourself."

Knicker: "We had to discharge our pastor because he mispronounced a word."

Bocker: "For such a trifle?"

Knicker: "Yes; he said the dear departed had gone to 'the undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveller returns.'"

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

OUTDOOR.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, a Lecture.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Miss E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6½ ins. by 8½ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR,
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 93 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be base on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biogrophical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LETTERS OF A CHINAMAN ON THE MISCHIEF OF MISSIONARIES. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2. Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.
INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d. (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 47 SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Religion itself means intolerance. The various sects tolerate nothing but their own dogmas.—SHELLEY.

The Unreality of Religion.

NEARLY two years ago the Rev. F. B. Meyer prophesied, at a public meeting at Newcastle-on-Tyne, that in a few months this country would experience such a revival of religion as had never been seen before. Time has shown us how utterly false that prediction was; but his past failure as a prophet has not taught the reverend gentleman any wisdom. Two other prophecies have just fallen from his lips, the one being that one result of the War will be the restoration of Palestine to the Jews, which "will be a wonderful thing, proving that the Word of God stands for ever," and the other that immediately after the War we shall have a new heaven and a new earth, in which righteousness alone shall reign. God's covenant with the Jews was that the land should be kept for them, and that in due time they should return to it. In order that the covenant may be speedily fulfilled, Turkey has been Divinely inspired to join Germany in the present War, which will inevitably eventuate in the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire. Then this modern prophet "declared that history revealed that the Almighty had entered into a covenant with us as surely as he had entered into a covenant with the Hebrew people, and that he was going to stand by us and see that it was not the mailed fist but the pierced hand of Jesus which should hold the book of Empire." We are convinced that all this talk about God and his covenants with certain people is mere cant and twaddle. The "mailed fist" is real, strong, and terrible, and most devastating are its blows; but the "pierced hand of Jesus" is unreal, impotent, and quite incapable of any performance, either destructive or constructive. If there is a God, he has hitherto befriended the mailed fist, the achievements of the German Empire having been phenomenal. He secured for it glorious victories in the wars of 1866 and 1870, and the empire founded by it has had forty years' uninterrupted prosperity. Without a doubt, the mailed fist has been a mighty power in the world, and is at the present moment doing wonders on bloody battlefields. Judging by the facts of recent history, the Almighty has smiled upon and supported German militarism, and the Kaiser has always led his people in his name. If this militarism is now doomed to disappear, its destruction will be accomplished, not because God is with the Allies, but because the allied forces are more than a match for the vast German army. We shall win not because our cause is just, but because we are strong enough and sufficiently well led to crush the enemy on the open field. The ministers of the Gospel know this as well as we do, and that is the reason why they act the part of recruiting sergeants.

The truth is that religion is as impotent in times of war as it is known to be when peace prevails. To unprejudiced people its unreality is an established fact. Recently Sir W. Robertson Nicoll entitled his leading article in the British Weekly "Prayer in Time of War," and now we learn that "in response to many requests" Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton have published it as a pamphlet. Why were those numerous requests made? Simply because the majority even of religious people are not quite sure that prayer will do any good in such a crisis, which is a perfectly natural state of mind to be in. Of well-attested answers to prayer there are absolutely none, and as a consequence there are multitudes of professing Christians who doubt the utility of praying, especially for victory in war-time. Canon Adderley informs us that the object of religion is to help us to lead good lives, but it is a notorious fact that it has dismally failed to achieve that end. The nations engaged in the present war are all profoundly religious. The German campaign may be "a delirium of vanity and ambition," but Dr. Watkinson, the popular Wesleyan preacher, is fundamentally mistaken when he characterises it as "the most atheistical, sceptical, and ghastly" campaign that has ever been inaugurated. Why, in his first proclamation the Kaiser assured his people that God had always been on their side in the past, and would undoubtedly be on their side and give them the victory on the present occasion, if only they were united; and the name of God has been prominent in every message that has fallen from him since. Every war is "ghastly," but this one is anything but "atheistical and sceptical." But has the Christian religion succeeded in making these fighting nations "good"? If national and international relations had been good, this fierce struggle would have been impossible, and the only rational conclusion is that religion has signally failed to establish such relations.

The Rev. Lloyd Thomas, of Birmingham, contributed a remarkable article to the Christian Commonwealth for November 11 on what he calls the highest reality of religion, in which he declares that no religion can possess such reality unless it fulfils three conditions. "It must be true; it must be good; it must be beautiful." Then he proceeds thus:—

> "These three conditions are fulfilled in that Eternal Being whom we worship. He is a holy and blessed Trinity of three Persons in one God; and the three persons are Truth, Goodness, and Beauty. The True is the ideal of the intellect; the Good is the ideal of the will; the Beautiful is the ideal of the emotion; and these three are one. The quest of truth gives us philosophy; the devotion to goodness gives us morality; the love of beauty gives us art."

This new doctrine of the Trinity is not more acceptable to the reason than the orthodox one. We know of no Eternal Being in whom are fulfilled the three conditions just mentioned. Certainly the Christian religion does not impart truth, goodness, and beauty to those who profess it. It does not impart truth because it is not itself true. It is not true that the human race is fallen; it is not true that a God-man ever lived and died and rose from the dead on this earth, and thereby became the Savior of the world; it is not true that a just and good God sits on the throne of the Universe and governs it according to his own will; and it is not true that all existing things work for good to genuine believers. Such doctrines are mind-corrupting and heart-degrading lies, and belief in them has made people cruel. Neither does the Christian religion inspire high morality in its professors. Mr. Lloyd Thomas says that "the good received stern and austere expression among the Puritans." We candidly admit that the Puritans were tremendously religious—so religious, indeed, that in their time, as Green puts it, "the whole nation became, in fact, a Church"; but their goodness was a highly doubtful quantity. Very beautifully does Milton sing in his Comus:—

Digitized by Google

> "Mortals, that would follow me,
> Love Virtue; she alone is free.
> She can teach ye how to climb
> Higher than the sphery chime."

But to the Puritans virtue meant godliness, and godliness was possessed only by themselves. What was their attitude towards non-Puritans? It was always one of supreme hatred and contempt, and when they were in power it expressed itself in acts of the utmost brutality. Their intolerance knew no bounds. With what avidity they put witches and Sabbath-breakers to death! Lecky says:—

> "As soon as Puritanism gained an ascendancy in the country, as soon as its ministers succeeded in imparting their gloomy tenets to the governing classes, witchcraft assumed a gigantic magnitude. During the few years of the Commonwealth, there is reason to believe that more alleged witches perished in England than in the whole period before and after. Nor is this to be ascribed entirely to the judges or the legislators, for the judges in former reigns never shrank from condemning witches, and Cromwell was, in most respects, far superior to his predecessors. It was simply the natural result of Puritanical teaching acting on the mind, predisposing men to see Satanic influence in life, and, consequently, eliciting the phenomena of witchcraft" (The Rise and Influence of Rationalism in Europe, pp. 106-7).

In his interesting little book, Sunday: The People's Holiday (pp. 62, 63), Dr. Hardwicke relates the following savage incident:—

> "A Baptist minister in 1661, in London, was hanged and quartered, his heart taken out and burned, his quarters affixed to the gates of the city, and his head stuck on the top of a pole and set opposite his meeting-house in Whitechapel, simply for speaking against Sabbath observance."

Piety the Puritans displayed in great abundance, but goodness or virtue, in the social sense of the term, was conspicuous only by its absence. The Christian religion and exalted morality are two wholly different things. Benvenuto Cellini was at once a devout Christian and a shameless criminal. And in the second decade of the twentieth century European Christians have been cruelly slaughtering one another for nearly four months. Yet, in face of all these facts, and thousands more that could be cited, Sir W. Robertson Nicoll has the hardihood to publish a book called The Difference Christ is Making!

Now religion, being essentially unreal, has done nothing but harm to mankind. Saintliness and humanity have often been entirely opposite qualities. And of all the great religions, Christianity is the most demoralising in its influence upon character. Dr. Meyer is confidently looking forward to a wonderful revival of this superstition, and is going to do his utmost to live ten years longer to see the happy time that will follow such a revival. We do not share that expectation, but are of opinion that this war will rather do more towards hastening the complete disintegration of supernaturalism than any other catastrophe known to history.

J. T. LLOYD.

Religious Freedom.

NEARLY everyone is acquainted with the famous definition of a crab as "a fish with six legs that walks backwards." Cuvier's reply to this is equally widely known, but it will bear repetition. He said that he agreed with the definition, except that a crab wasn't a fish, it didn't have six legs, and it didn't walk backwards. Otherwise, the description was accurate.

I was reminded of the above by a sentence in a leading article in one of the daily papers of a recent date. The writer said—just as though it were a matter beyond dispute—"Religious freedom has made us increasingly religious," etc. What went before and what came after the words cited, had no special bearing upon the opinion expressed, and so may be left on one side. I cite this particular sentence because it illustrates a very common fallacy, and one that seems an even greater favorite with latitudinarians than with those of pronounced religious convictions. What Cuvier said of the definition of a crab might be said, with a change of terms, of the opinion that religious freedom has made us more religious. We are not more religious than we were, and religious freedom does not, and cannot, make for greater religion. With these reservations this particular statement may be accepted as correct.

Let us take the last point first. What is meant by religious freedom? Presumably it means liberty to accept and express any religious belief we please. Each one of us must be allowed, as Heine puts it, to go to hell in his own fashion. It will be observed that I have confined the idea of religious freedom to a selection of one from amidst many competing religious ideas or beliefs. This has been done because, as a matter of fact, that is about all the average religious man has in mind when he talks about religious freedom. He does not include in the idea the liberty to reject all religion, and, at the same time, to state one's reason for such rejection. On the contrary, there is a fairly strong opinion current that if a man does not accept some religion he should at least keep silent. He ought not to talk about it. If he has not the faith to accept he should have the decency to be silent. And even those who do not go quite so far as this are to be found supporting the position that expressed dissent from religion should yield greater consideration for other people's opinions on religion than for their opinions on any other subject.

Of course, the full and complete definition of religious freedom would involve liberty to believe and worship as we please; or, if we please, not to worship at all. That is what the Freethinker has in mind when he talks about religious freedom, and it must be admitted that this kind of freedom is now greater than it has ever been. From the point of view of the Freethinker, this state of things is wholly admirable. But is it, or ought it to be, admirable from the point of view of the devout believer? Not only is it not so, but it is tolerably easy to show that freedom of religious belief exists only as a consequence of a very general impression of its uselessness. As a mere historic generalisation the truth of this may be fully demonstrated. To begin with, in all early stages of social life such a thing as religious freedom is absolutely unknown. It is not so much that it is denied, as it simply does not exist. Everyone is religious, and everyone is convinced of the necessity of maintaining the religious beliefs of the tribe. To doubt these, or to flout these, is not so much an intellectual offence as it is a social wrong. It is an offence against tribal well-being; and this is so generally and so deeply felt that no other offence calls down such prompt and severe punishment as that which afterwards becomes known as heresy. To this fact both the universality of punishment for heresy, and the deeply ingrained religious hatred of the heretic, is due.

In later stages of social development we see that wherever religious belief is at all uniform and general there is always resort to coercion when heresy shows itself. One may safely say that there is no instance known of a community that was uniformly religious and at the same time tolerant of religious differences. Sects may consent to religious freedom, but none of them desire it; and I know of none that, with the power to persecute, have refrained from doing so. The Protestant Reformation is a case in point. It is often said that this movement was an expression of religious freedom. This, however, is very far from the truth. The true significance of the movement of which Protestantism was a quasi-expression, was not religious, but social and intellectual. Socially, the vital question at issue was whether the religious or the secular authority was to govern society. It was not so much a revolt against dogma that was in the air—no greater dogmatists than the Protestant leaders ever existed—but a revolt against the rule of the priest. It was a contest between the secular and the theological forces, a contest that is still with us, although the supremacy of the theological forces is now almost an impossibility.

Digitized by Google

On the intellectual side we have to count a series of forces, none of which were religious, and all of which made for a weakening of religion. The revival of letters, the growth of new conceptions in astronomy, in geography, and in physics, the rediscovery of the almost forgotten culture of antiquity, set in motion forces that made directly for the disintegration of religious beliefs. The fifteenth and sixteenth centuries were notoriously eras of a very widespread scepticism in religion; even some of the Popes did not escape suspicion. And while much is known, one may safely assume that a much larger amount of scepticism existed unexpressed and undiscovered. In the main, then, Protestantism represented the influence of this general spirit of unrest in the domain of religion. People did not become more religiously tolerant because they believed more fervently, but because the value of religion was declining in view of the numerous other interests that had been evoked. Those who were genuinely and intensely religious were not more tolerant of differences; but the very multiplication of sects, and the fact of these sects fighting against the supremacy of a single Church, familiarised the public mind with religious differences. Religious freedom was thus not a consequence of Protestantism; it was, at most, an accompaniment, and to all the leaders a very unwelcome one.

In both these directions—the social and the intellectual—the fact really governing the growth of religious freedom has been the realisation of the comparative unimportance of religious belief. At the beginning, as I have said, religion starts as a social force, and a social force of the first importance. Religion is the business of the whole community. It is everybody's business to see that everyone else believes rightly, because to offend the gods is to endanger the welfare of the tribe. At the other extreme we have the conviction that each man's religious belief is his own business, and that, right or wrong, religious belief is a matter that concerns himself alone. But between these two extremes there lies an enormous development. And the last position can only be reached when it is recognised that, so far as the State is concerned, so far as man's social duties and obligations are concerned, these can be completely and satisfactorily discharged without necessary reference to religious belief at any point. Religious freedom would be impossible in any community that sincerely believed right religious belief to be essential to the satisfactory discharge of social duties. So long as that is believed, so long the coercion of opinion remains certain. It becomes an act of social purification and of social protection. The community which says that men may adopt any religion they please, or, if they prefer it, go without religion altogether, is saying by that, so far as the State is concerned, religious belief is of little or no consequence. The measure of religious freedom is thus the measure of religious indifference.

On the intellectual side the same thing is apparent. In the first place, it may be noted that belief in religion stands on quite a different basis to belief in any scientific subject. If I do not, for example, believe in the law of gravitation, it makes no difference to anyone else, or to the fact itself. If it is a truth, I cannot ignore it in fact, however I may do so in theory. A scientific formula is based upon verifiable facts, and these sooner or later make themselves felt. There is thus, on the scientific side, no necessary tendency to coercion. The problem of the scientific teacher is simply to state the facts, and leave them to work conviction. With the religious teacher, on the other hand, belief is everything. Beliefs are really his facts. If I do not believe in a God or a soul, then to me neither God nor a soul exist. Before God can influence me, I must believe in him. I do not believe in him because of the influence; I am influenced because of the belief. And, consequently, the aim of the religious teacher everywhere is to induce what he calls right belief—that is, not a belief that we are asked to accept as a logical conclusion drawn from verifiable facts, but a belief that is quite independent of verifiable data. The religious teacher cannot say, as the scientist can, "There are the facts, and I can leave them to tell their own tale and to exert their own influence"; he says, substantially, "Here are certain beliefs, and the more you question them, the less likely you are to accept them. The longer you are without them, the less likely you are to need them."

It is, then, absurd to speak of religious freedom making us increasingly religious. The world is not more religious than it was; the growth of non-religion is the constant lament of religious teachers all over the civilised world. Religious freedom results from, first, the multiplication of religious sects—itself an expression of heresy—which makes the coercion of religious opinion increasingly difficult, and finally impossible; second, the development of social life which liberates the genuine social forces from the control of theology, and reduces religion to a mere speculation with which the State has no legitimate concern: and, third, the growth of knowledge, which, by offering a scientific explanation of one group of phenomena after another, leaves religion without any clear utility to the mental life of mankind. Freedom of religion and indifference to religion are thus two aspects of the same fact.

C. COHEN.

"The Untilled Field."

"I would rather have written Salammbo than have built Brooklyn Bridge. It was more difficult, and it will last longer."—EDGAR SALTUS.

PROBABLY the mass of English readers will never have the opportunity of respecting Mr. George Moore's art at its true value, for he enjoys the rare privilege of being one of the few English authors who are boycotted. It was for his sake that the lamented Mr. Mudie assumed the functions of the "Bishop of Rome," and started an Index Expurgatorius. But Mr. Moore has had his revenge, for he has reached the proud position where he can dispense with praise or blame.

It is an abuse of language to term Mr. George Moore's book, The Untilled Field (6s.; Heinemann; 1914), which has just been reissued, a novel, although the publisher and the booksellers alike persist in so labelling it. The Untilled Field is a series of pictures from Irish life, and it must rank as among the finest, if, indeed, it be not the finest from the literary point of view, Mr. Moore has given to the world. Many of these stories are pessimistic in tone, yet nevertheless strangely beautiful in their directness of utterance and exquisite craftsmanship of words. The author traces many of the woes of Ireland to the despotic rule of the priest, which has sapped the individual will-power of the Catholic laity, who find themselves unable to hold their own against the steadily increasing Protestant population. Thousands of Irish Catholics emigrate every year to escape the despotism of priestcraft. That is what Mr. Moore thinks; and the cultured writer, travelling by a vastly different route, reaches the same conclusion as the despised Freethinkers.

In the first story in the book, "In the Clay," and in the last, "The Way Back," Mr. Moore puts his views very strongly. He makes it plain through his characters, a girl and a sculptor, that Ireland will never be productive of anything great in art because of the dominance of a puritanical and fanatical Catholicism. The whole book seems to be written with the idea of exposing the Great Lying Church. Nothing escapes the author. Even the chastity of the Irish Catholic is regarded as an unmixed evil. "There are no bastards in Ireland, and the bastard is the outward sign of inward grace." Says Mr. Moore, "There is as little free-love in Ireland as there is Freethought; men have ceased to care for women, and women to care for men. Nothing thrives in Ireland but the celibate, the priest, the men and the ox." Ireland for him is "a country without past or future, melancholy and ineffective as bog-water." Ireland's great churches, monasteries, and schools stand amid uncultivated lands, daily going to greater waste, and ruinous huts hourly falling into greater ruin. The Untilled Field is a powerful volume that will fascinate even those readers to whom the author's sentiments are anathema.

Digitized by Google

If the publication of The Untilled Field does but draw attention to one of the foremost of present-day novelists, it will have served its purpose. Since The Mummer's Wife, one of the finest realistic novels in the language first frightened a squeamish public, Mr. Moore has added masterpiece after masterpiece. His Esther Waters turned the tables on his detractors, and by the sheer force of genius compelled their unwilling admiration. A Drama in Muslin, A Modern Lover, Celibates, Evelyn Innes, Sister Teresa are among the notable works produced.

His greatest work, The Mummer's Wife, is a masterpiece by a master-hand. The central idea of the book, an elopement by a married woman, is not unique. Many of the blameless novels, freely selected by the libraries, have used this. But the erring wife of The Mummer's Wife is the wife of a middle-class shopkeeper, and the author shows in plain English the fatal decline, how the divorced woman becomes a dipsomaniac, and, step by step, loses propriety and decency, until she dies the dreadful death of a drunkard. Had she been depicted as a lady of title; had her sin against society been clothed in decorative phrases, and smothered in sentiment, then, probably, no outcry would have arisen. But because Mr. Moore chose the right method of depicting vice as it really is, the result disgusted some of Mr. Mudie's chaste subscribers, but it enriched English literature with a most powerful and realistic novel, and a superb picture of contemporary middle-class and Bohemian life.

Mr. Moore has other sides to his genius, and his unique and brilliant Confessions of a Young Man startled even his admirers. It is without a parallel in modern autobiography. Reckless and irresponsible in its criticism, it is wonderful how much truth underlies the biting epigrams. Its intimate knowledge, too, of the art of France, literary and pictorial, marks it off from other books. To consider A Mere Accident after this volume of brilliant criticism is a curious task. For in it the love of epigram and paradox has vanished. In its pitiless sequence of an awful tragedy, that, evolved from a mere accident, destroys one life and darkens others, it is true to nature, and a superb example of conscious art. Unhappily, publishers nowadays lack courage, and whilst the old Vizetelly edition of the book is complete, all the later issues of this tragic story have been mutilated to please the innocent and sentimental daughters of Mrs. Grundy, who are supposed to be the only readers of fiction in a nation of "God's own Englishmen."

Who need apologise for his admiration for Mr. Moore's magnificent work. His power of investing the common life of to-day with profound tragedy is surely the true romance. Content to leave all the machinery of the supernatural, to lay aside the well-worked properties of sensationalism, to abjure Dumas and Poe alike, and yet move his thousands of readers with the truthful record of elemental passion in modern life, is surely akin to great art. Perhaps, because of his reticence in quantity, the early reputation has been less in peril; and now with a group of novels and essays that show fully the power and the limit of his work, it is right he should receive recognition, not merely as books that have charmed away dull hours, but as manifesting a personal force in literature, which, to be candid, has mocked every imitator. Historians of English fiction will, one fancies, be compelled to consider the work of Mr. George Moore even more seriously than contemporary critics have done. Mr. Moore's detractors have called him "the English Zola." It is an unwilling compliment. It is precisely because France values her intellectuals, instead of smothering them with a grandmotherly censor, that she is so great as a nation. In honoring Mr. Moore by associating his name with that of Emile Zola, even his enemies have unwillingly set the seal of approbation upon a writer who most worthily carries on the intellectual traditions which have made the sons of France the vanguard of the Army of Progress.

MIMNERMUS.

Celestial Bombs.

IT is interesting to note the apologies offered by Christians for the inactivity of their God during this terrible War. They allege that he is everywhere present, in addition to being almighty; but somehow or other he could not prevent the German shells from falling on Rheims Cathedral and destroying the beautiful architecture of that ancient building, nor could he stop German bombs from knocking down a portion of the holy edifice of Notre Dame at Paris. Of course, German Protestants may say that it is God's will that this work of destruction shall go on, but French Catholics can neither see the necessity nor the wisdom of it. His Holiness the Pope shakes his pious head, and says that the Lord will be avenged on the wicked Germans for their dastardly deeds one of these days; but in the meantime German shells and bombs continue the work of destruction. Not content with knocking down God's churches, with supercilious disregard of consequences, these pious Christians have destroyed thousands of homes of their fellow-Christians in Belgium and France, and threaten to destroy the homes of Christians on this beautiful island of ours, if only the British Fleet will give them the chance of getting here. They don't propose to ask God's permission; they take that for granted.

Whether they pray for victory over their enemies or not, if their guns are powerful enough, and their shot and shell well directed, they succeed; and God, apparently, takes no notice. How different, this, to the good old Bible days! Then God answered the prayers of the faithful. He sent down fire from heaven and consumed the enemy. Take the story of Elijah and the prophets of Baal as an example. The children of Israel were constantly changing their God; sometimes they followed old Jahveh, but when he appeared to neglect them, or they could not get as much out of him as they required, they forsook him and turned their attention to Baalim, and followed him. So Elijah decided to put the matter to the test. A great meeting was called at Mount Carmel, and four hundred and fifty of the prophets of Baal and four hundred of the prophets of the groves, which eat at Jezebel's table, and the children of Israel also, attended the meeting. And Elijah addressed the assembly, and said: "How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him, but if Baal, then follow him." Now, nothing could be fairer than that. And so we read that the people answered never a word. But how were they to know whether the Lord was God? What was to be the test? Listen:—

> "Then said Elijah unto the people, I, even I, only remain a prophet of the Lord, but Baal's prophets are four hundred and fifty men. Let them, therefore, give us two bullocks, and let them choose one bullock for themselves and cut it in pieces and lay it on wood, and put no fire under; and I will dress the other bullock and lay it on wood and put no fire under: And call ye on the name of your gods, and I will call on the name of the Lord; and the God that answereth by fire, let him be God. And all the people answered and said, It is well spoken."

Digitized by Google

And I am bound to say that that is what I consider a fair test.

And so the proceedings began. The Baalites took their bullock and dressed it and put it on the altar, and began to call upon their God to send down fire from heaven. They called unto their God from morning till noon, "O, Baal, hear us!" "O, Baal, hear us!" but there was no response. And then Elijah began to mock them just like an ordinary, vulgar infidel who does not believe in any other gods but his own. And so we read that: "And it came to pass at noon that Elijah mocked them and said, 'Cry aloud, for he is a God, either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is on a journey, or, peradventure, he sleepeth and must be awakened.'"

Then the Baalites got savage. They did not like their God to be jeered at in this fashion.

So they cried louder, and, in order to provoke the sympathy of their God, they cut themselves with knives until the blood gushed out; and they continued their cries until the evening, but their God was deaf to their appeal and blind to their suffering, and made no signs and no response.

Then came Elijah's turn. He called the people to him; told them to take twelve stones, according to the number of the tribes of the sons of Jacob, and build an altar; cut a bullock in pieces, place the pieces on the altar, and fill four barrels with water and pour it on the sacrifice and on the wood. This process he commanded to be repeated three times; and when this was done, he called upon the Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob to hear and let the children of Israel know that he really was God. And when the Jewish God heard the challenge, he responded in most convincing fashion, and sent fire from heaven, which consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the wood and the stones and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench. And when the people saw it they fell on their faces; and they said, "The Lord he is God—the Lord he is God."

But Elijah was not satisfied to let the matter end there; he thought that the most convincing ending to such a drama was a terrific battle and tremendous slaughter. And so Elijah said to the Israelites: "Take the prophets of Baal; let not one of them escape." And they took them; and Elijah brought them down to the brook of Kishon and slew them there. And in every age religious people, whether Jew, or Christian, or Mahommedan, have considered that slaughter was, in the last result, the most effective way of settling a religious dispute.

But while this terrible War is raging in France and Belgium, it has seemed to me rather strange that Catholic Christians have not prayed that when the terrible Germans send their shot and shell in the direction of Churches and Cathedrals, that their God should drop some Celestial Bombs from heaven, and put the guns and gunners out of action. Or they might pray that he drop one on the head of the pious Kaiser, and before that august being had time to exclaim "Mein Gott," he and his General Staff might be blown into a thousand pieces. Or he might be asked to change, with his magic wand, all the shot and shell into non-explosive dust, and thus render them all harmless—and then no doubt the Catholic Christians might proclaim that God was on their side, and the War would come to a speedy conclusion. On the other hand, if a light from heaven, in answer to prayer, struck M. Poincaire, the French President, or General Joffre, that might be considered in favor of the Protestants; but so far, without question, all the gods have remained neutral.

When I was a boy I used to go to the old "Vic" in the Waterloo-road (and I go now when there is an opera or a Shakespearean play to be seen), and I once saw an old melodrama there called The King and the Deserter, and, when the poor unfortunate deserter was brought on to be shot, George Yarnold, the famous old comedian of the "Vic," sent us into roars of laughter by changing all the gunpowder into black sawdust; and when the soldiers tried to shoot, they shot sawdust; and, to the unbounded delight of the audience, the handsome young deserter received a free pardon at last at the hands of the king. Why cannot the gods transform shot and shell into useless bits of scrap-iron?

A few weeks ago a friend of mine was having a discussion with a local missionary on the War, and various knotty points were raised; whereupon the missionary said: "At all events, my friend, I am content to leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Lord." "My dear sir," replid my friend, "you could not leave it in better hands. He won't interfere."

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The Bowman Legacy.

THE late Mr. C. Bowman, who was a member of both the National Secular Society and the Secular Society, Ltd., made the latter Society residuary legatee in his will. On the death of his widow, a few weeks ago, the trust became liable to realisation and distribution. For a good while the Society had been practically threatened by the Trustees' solicitors—whose names we do not mention at present,—and litigation had been going on with regard to a side issue, which would, however, have indirectly led to the principal point which was to be tested. We cannot say more than this at present, though more may be stated hereafter, if it does not involve contempt of court, which we do not regard as very likely.

All we propose to say now is that Mrs. Bowman's death has deprived the Trustees and their Solicitor of any further non-legal defiance of the Society's position under Mr. Bowman's will. Our solicitor, Mr. Thomas Harper, who acted for Charles Bradlaugh, has always acted for us, and indeed prepared Mr. Bowman's will, has received notice that the Trustees have been presented with a claim from a nameless gentleman indicated "the heir at law and next of kin." Our solicitor replies that this has nothing to do with us from any point of view whatever. An action against the will is the concern of the Trustees. If a gentleman with no status under the will chooses to contend that the Society is unlawful and against public welfare, he is free to do so. But the question whether he can do so in connection with this will is quite another matter. We must wait and see. Not a single will benefiting the Secular Society, Ltd., has ever been challenged before. And for my part, I am under no anxiety now.

G. W. FOOTE, Chairman.

Many readers do not know what the Society really is. Its Memorandum is appended for their information:—

MEMORANDUM OF ASSOCIATION OF THE SECULAR SOCIETY (LIMITED).

Registered Office:
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

1. The Name of the Company is The Secular Society, Limited.
2. The registered office of the Company will be situated in England.
3. The objects for which the Company is formed are:—
   (a) To promote, in such ways as may from time to time be determined, the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action.
   (b) To promote the utmost freedom of inquiry and the publication of its discoveries.
   (c) To promote the secularisation of the State, so that religious tests and observances may be banished from the Legislature, the Executive, and the Judiciary.
   (d) To promote the abolition of all support, patronage, or favor by the State of any particular form or forms of religion.

Digitized by Google

(e) To promote universal Secular Education, without any religious teaching, in public schools maintained in any way by municipal rates or imperial taxation.

(f) To promote an alteration in the laws concerning religion, so that all forms of opinion may have the same legal rights of propaganda and endowment.

(g) To promote the recognition by the State of marriage as a purely civil contract, leaving its religious sanctions to the judgment and determination of individual citizens.

(h) To promote the recognition of Sunday by the State as a purely civil institution for the benefit of the people, and the repeal of all Sabbatarian laws devised and operating in the interest of religious sects, religious observances, or religious ideas.

(i) To purchase, lease, rent, or build halls or other premises for the promotion of the above objects.

(j) To employ lecturers, writers, organisers, or other servants for the same end.

(k) To publish books, pamphlets, or periodicals.

(l) To assist by votes of money or otherwise other Societies or associated persons or individuals who are specially promoting any of the above objects.

(m) To have, hold, receive and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

(n) To co-operate or communicate with any kindred Society in any part of the world.

(o) To do all such other lawful things as are conducive or incidental to the attainment of all or any of the above objects.

4. Every Member of the Company undertakes to contribute to the assets of the Company in the event of the same being wound up during the time that he is a Member, or within one year afterwards, for payment of the debts and liabilities of the Company contracted before the time at which he ceased to be a Member, and the costs, charges, and expenses of winding up the same, and for adjustment of the rights of the Contributories among themselves, such amount as may be required not exceeding £1.

According to a paragraph in one of the daily papers a Cambridge firm of booksellers has received permission to purchase certain scientific works from Germany. If this is true, it contains a sad reflection upon our home scientific equipment. Science is, of course, international—or perhaps one ought to say, super-national—and the interchange of scientific knowledge is desirable from every point of view. But we must confess that we should like to see this country perfectly independent of others, as we should like to see other countries independent of this one. This would in no way hinder helpful co-operation, it would only mean that all countries were marching abreast, each doing its part in the work of conquering nature, and each making its own all that others have achieved.

A great American newspaper, the New York World, has equipped a Santa Claus ship, loaded with over a million toys and gifts which have been subscribed for by Americans for the European children orphaned by the War. It is always man and not "God" who answers the orphans' cry for aid.

Robert Bridges, who supplies the nation in general, and the Royal Family in particular, with poetry when they want it, says that "This is a war of Christ against the Devil!" Yes! But which is which?

The Weekly Dispatch alludes to Friedrich Von Bernhardi as one of the men who caused the present European War. It is well to remember that Von Bernhardi is as pious as the two Kaisers.

A fire broke out at the Darwin Science Hall at Shrewsbury School recently. Once upon a time a moral would have been attached to this press paragraph by Christians, but now, like Brer Rabbit, they "lie low and say nothing."

The yellow press and the clergy have been claiming the late Lord Roberts as a Christian soldier. We do not complain, for, as a rule, the Christian soldier is represented in the theological battle by his wife.

Acid Drops.

War is a frightful demoraliser, but we did not suppose it would have such an effect on Mr. Horatio Bottomley. First it made him a theologian, and now it has made him "a poet." We liked him ill as a theologian; we like him worse as "a poet"; but we daresay he will settle down again when the War is over. Meanwhile, it is rather odd to see him railing at the Kaiser so violently. William's motto, of course, is "Germany Above All," and he is trying to work that out in practice. True, he has a clumsy and vicious way of doing it; but that is what he is up to, if he can only manage it. Mr. Bottomley is up to the same game (though not exactly in the same way) only he puts "England" or "Britain" or the "Anglo-Saxon" instead of "Germany." For the life of us we can't see the slightest difference between the two ideals, except the accidental fact that the Kaiser is a native German and Mr. Bottomley a native Englishman. Each thinks the highest of the country which he honored by being born in it.

Mr. Bottomley does not mince the matter. He says we are witnessing the birth of a new age, and the blood is flowing to realise a special intention of "God." To do this he has to "chasten" us—yes, us—by plunging us in a blood bath. When the day of judgment arrives Mr. Bottomley and his "Comrades" will be able to stand up and boast:—

> "We fought like worthy foemen, on battlefield and flood,
> And purified our spirit in seas of human blood."

This will please the orthodox Christian, who cannot be saved without being washed in the "blood" of redemption. But we are sorry to see Mr. Bottomley prescribing it as the best method of purification. "Seas of blood" may seem to him very sanative, while the War is on and the mob like it. For our part, we can imagine no filthier mess.

Some of Mr. Bottomley's old friends may say that they can hardly believe that he is quite as far gone as we represent. We reply that we are relying solely on his own words. Our first duty, as he lays it down, is "To prove this world we live in of all the worlds the best." Rather a big job, to begin with? And are there any other inhabited worlds, in the next place. The late Dr. Russel Wallace argued that there were not. Anyhow, whether this is the best or worst of the lot cannot concern us very much; we have to put up with it just as it is; there isn't likely to be any swopping. But let us proceed with Mr. Bottomley. He tells us what is the second duty of every patriot (English patriot, we mean):—

> "And justify our object, to put in highest place, > O'er all the peoples of the Earth, the Anglo-Saxon race."

There you are. Mr. Bottomley and the Kaiser cherish the same ideal. The only difference is in their postal address.

We hope we shall be pardoned for saying that his ideal, like the Kaiser's, is rather a humdrum affair. A world full of Britishers is too many. A world ruled by Britishers would be too monotonous. The world is all the better for variety. No doubt the German commits a public nuisance by talking his own language instead of ours; but why should we lose Goethe, and Heine, and Lessing, and Schopenhauer, and other great writers? If some people find the German boorish and even brutal, other people sometimes find the Frenchman a little too polite. So there you are! The various races of the world have all been produced by geographic and climatic differences. If the world had been flat, without mountains and rivers, there would have been a greater similarity than there is amongst its inhabitants. That would have made room for Mr. Bottomley's Anglo-Saxon paradise. Fortunately, nature got in front of Mr. Bottomley. She declined to make the world flat. Mr. Bottomley's dream will never be realised.

Sydney Smith once paid a visit to a "swell" house with a well-mirrored drawing-room. He saw himself multiplied all round the place. "I thought I was in a meeting of clergymen," he said, "and was delighted! Of course!" Those who heard him say that "Of course!" declared it to be one of the finest things that even he was ever "guilty of." Mr. Bottomley will see the point; if not, he must get his "God" to help him. And we hope there will be no bad blood at the finish.

By the way, correspondents sometimes send us John Bull. It is kind on their part, but it is a waste of time and postage, for we take John Bull ourselves. Mr. Bottomley has recently said that he reads the Freethinker every week. We are glad to hear it. We know of no paper from which he would be likely to derive more benefit.

Digitized by Google

How the Almighty must feel consoled for some of the nasty things said about him to-day—as, for instance, what he is doing while whole nations of his children are cutting each others throats, and all pretending to be doing it under his special blessing! Mr. George A. Birmingham, the novelist, and incidentally a Christian preacher, having been sent over to the United States in a sort of rivalry to Mr. Harold Begbie, ventures to put in a good word—perhaps we should call it a pious certificate—for "the one Above" "I have come to the conclusion," he says, "that God counts for a good deal in the life of New York." We see a smile of satisfaction breaking over the dour face of old Jahveh! For we suppose it is the Bible "God" that Mr. Birmingham is talking about.

At the Middlesex County Council Licensing Committee the other day the renewal of license was refused to a number of picture shows on the ground that they had kept their places open on Sundays. The Bench declined to renew unless the applicants agreed to conform to the clause in the license which stipulated for Sunday closing. Mr. Bodkin, on behalf of the applicants, said that if such a condition were imposed they would obey, providing such a condition was lawful. The undertaking was a very guarded one, and we should like to see cinema owners act with courage in the matter. If the matter were carried beyond the Licensing Court, we fancy it would be decided that no court has the right to impose any such condition; and Mr. Bodkin's guarded undertaking seems to indicate that he is of the same opinion. The Committee announced that the applicants would receive a reply by post, which strikes one as a rather undesirable way of doing business. We would prefer to see the decision announced in open court.

King George is a very good monarch in a country where "the monarch reigns but does not govern." It is hardly to be expected, however, that he should be a genius in literary composition. But he might have been helped, by a friend or secretary, from congratulating "his" army under Sir John French on their "pluck and spirit." There cannot be much difference between the two words, and "pluck" is good enough for the man in the street but not in the public letter of a King. It is enough to make Walter Savage Landor turn in his grave. How he hated it as one of the worst of vulgarisms!

Here is another "slip" of the King's. Addressing some of "his" men at Colchester, he said, "I should have been sorry to have missed them." This blunder is common enough, but it should not be common amongst Kings. The two "haves" are wrong. His Majesty should have said "I should have been sorry to miss them" or "I should be sorry to have missed them."

France has good reason to be proud of the work done in its schools since the reorganisation that followed the war of 1870. And even in the turmoil of the present War the French Minister of Education is not losing sight of the important work of education. In a circular issued to the teachers of France, he points out that on the material side the nation is spending its savings, living on capital that is not exhausted, and hoping that the enemy's capital will be exhausted before theirs.

> "But in matters of the mind and the spirit a nation cannot store capital or subsist upon it. It is always living from hand to mouth, and any cessation of effort there must be paid for in the future. Whatever evil is done in the minds of men or children by this war is not a destruction of superfluities but of necessaries. A nation may be rich enough to spend millions in killing its enemies; but no nation on earth is rich enough to neglect the education of its children."

There are profound truths in this pronouncement, truths that are only too likely to get overlooked during the present crisis. The higher aspects of French education should be safe in the hands of M. Sarrout.

Mr. Dan Crawford, missionary, says he is in no hurry to get back to Africa now, because when he boasts about white civilisation, the Africans will want to know what the white men in Europe are killing each other for. Well, we suppose it will be a little awkward, but missionary ingenuity should be equal to the situation. It will be easy to paint the Germans as a nation of wicked Atheists, and the Allies as sincere Christians who go into battle with prayers on their lips and Bibles in their hands. We are getting almost that at home, and it should be so much easier to play the same card in Central Africa.

This is the way to do it. Rev. M. Watkinson told the London Methodist Council that the German campaign was "the most Atheistical and ghastly that had ever been inaugurated." And yet Dr. Scott Lidgett told a City Temple audience that the Germans were better liars than we were. This really seems like an aspersion on some of Dr. Lidgett's clerical colleagues. Let us give honor where honor is due.

This is the way the Christian World describes the oratory of Mr. Lloyd George. "There was Burke's exquisite artistry in the phrasing, the unerring choice of the inevitable word, the wonderful aptness and force of the illustrations, the withering sarcasm. There was Gladstone's passionate declamation and his effective reinforcement of the spoken word by expressive and powerful gesture. There was Bright's matchless simplicity, his Anglo-Saxon drawn from the 'well of English undefiled,' and Bright's natural and yet most skilful use of the Bible." That's all! A combination of Burke, Gladstone, and Bright. It's a long, long way to Tipperary—also a long way from Limehouse.

Bless those that curse you, pray for those that despitefully use you. Such is the advice given by the New Testament, and a curate at Tottenhall was silly enough to think that Christians believed it. So he offered up a prayer "for the Germans." Result: the bishop pronounced his conduct "unwise," and the parishioners clamored for his removal. Now, if the Rev. Mr. Edwards had consulted Sir Robertson Nicoll, he would have been told that the New Testament cannot mean what it says, because Christians never do treat kindly those that despitefully use them.

There is no doubt about the German hatred of England, but we had always understood that it resulted from our position as a World-Power. This, according to the Record, is wrong. "The bitter hatred of England, whatever its pretexts, really is because as a nation she loves and honors the Bible, and is the home of Evangelical Protestant Religion." And this with Germany's Kaiser keeping a Bible by his bedside, taking it as his guide in all things, and even rising at night to consult its inspired pages!

The latest one to join the ranks of the prophets is Rev. F. B. Meyer. This wiseacre knew that Turkey would join with Germany, "because it is a matter of prophecy." In that case it would seem as though Deity, and not the Kaiser, is to blame. Mr. Meyer also has a turn at the Jews. They will go back to Jerusalem. The only difficulty about this would be the Jews. The man who seriously imagines that the Jews of England and France, to go no farther afield, are burning to get back to Palestine is a case for a specialist in brain disorders. If such a move were seriously contemplated there would be an unusually keen competition for agencies in Europe. Finally, Mr. Meyer declares that history reveals that "the Almighty had entered into a covenant with us," and so was going to see that the "mailed fist" did not triumph—God and our Army of two million we presume.

Mr. Blatchford complains of the Censorship. His own writing actually fell under the official blue pencil. But what right has he to complain? The Censorship is an inevitable part of the militarism he is recommending to the British democracy—through the columns of a Tory paper. It is the Weekly Dispatch now; it was the Daily Mail before; it may be the Daily Express hereafter.

After chatter about "God," Mr. Blatchford indulges in something equally unknown. This is how he started in the Dispatch last week: "After much cogibundity of cogitation our successful cabinet has decided, etc." "Don't do it, Mr. Blatchford—don't do it!" This sort of play upon words requires learning behind it. There is no disgrace in being self-taught, rather the contrary. They call you a second Cobbett; that is, the Tories do, when they want to employ your pen in behalf of their principles. But Cobbett would never have been guilty of your opening line in the Dispatch. He always knew what he was doing, and always precise in doing it. He would have laughed at your "cogibundity," and still more so at your phrase "cogibundity of cogitation," and the pure English "much" in front of that. Even if you had got your first big word right, your whole expression is absurd. It means "much of much cogitation of cogitation." And not even your pen can make this English or sense. We repeat, therefore, "Don't do it, Mr. Blatchford—don't do it."

Mr. Lloyd George's "great speech" at the City Temple Convention of the Free Churches' Convention, proved quite convincing—to an already converted audience. Nothing could be better done than the cool assumption that they were on God's side, or God on theirs,—it didn't much matter which. The Kaiser bawls out his partnership with the Almighty, with an air of "Damn everybody who denies it!" Mr. Lloyd George just mentions it as one of the best-known facts of life that are taken for granted and not open for discussion. Everybody was aware that God's favorite human being was the English Puritan. And tremendous applause followed the statement that we now had an opportunity of dealing with the Turk once for all. The Free Church meeting applauded that so fiercely that he felt bound to say at once that it was not because the Turk was a Mohammedan. We had too many Mohammedans in the British Empire to let that pass. "I am not thinking of him as an enemy of Christendom," Mr. George said; "there is no more futile method of settling the conflicts of creed than a war." This elicited a faint "hear, hear" from the Free Churchers, and Mr. Lloyd George was enabled to save his bacon.

Digitized by Google

A new novel has been issued with the title, Incredible Adventures. The title would be very suitable for that well-known work of fiction, the Bible.

"Scarcity of Coal in Paris" runs a headline in the daily press. If there is truth in the Christian superstition, there should be some risk of a scarcity of fuel in a warmer place.

Will the "soul" be the same after death as now? asks Mr. Campbell. It is a subject on which one may safely dogmatise, if one is built that way; and Mr. Campbell is certain it will be—because, he says, the fundamental self never changes, "the spirit never lets go what it has once possessed. The brain and the body forget, the spirit never." We are not quite sure what is meant by the "fundamental self," and we fancy it is with Mr. Campbell no more than one of those comforting expressions that sound so well and means so little. The only sense in which the "spirit," or mind, of man never forgets an experience is that it becomes part of its texture. And in that sense the body also carries a record of its experiences. But so far as consciousness is concerned, we do constantly forget—life would, indeed, be unbearable were it otherwise. No man can possibly remember more than a mere fraction of his total experiences, although there is always a possibility of isolated experiences being recalled. Life itself is constant change, and when change ceases life ceases also. If Mr. Campbell were only half as certain about things he might know as he is about things concerning which it is impossible for him to know anything, he might be of more real help to those who come to him for assistance.

The Catholic Times says that the War has had the "excellent effect" in France of setting up a revival of religion. "A high percentage" of the French soldiers, it says, "have approached the Sacraments since hostilities." Of course, this may be so, but we should like some rather less prejudiced testimony on the point than the Catholic Times. We should also like to know what is held to constitute a "high percentage"? In all probability all that has occurred is that the religious portion of the French people have been a trifle more punctilious in the discharge of their religious observances. It must never be overlooked that a large majority of the French people still profess Christian opinions, although the majority of the leaders of French thought are definitely Freethinkers. It is significant that amongst the English troops—where such statements might be more easily tested—the Catholic Times laments that the War has not brought about an increase in religious devotion.

Rev. Albert Smith, aged 73, of the Vicarage, Wendover, Bucks, left £42,240. He left all and followed Jesus, and it paid him very well. Several smaller cases of the same trouble have appeared in the papers lately, but we have not had time to notice them.

It is a hundred years since the great Napoleon blessed or cursed the earth,—just as people happen to face. The German Kaiser holds the military field now. Everybody knows his justification of the most shocking atrocities committed by his troops, not only upon their enemies, but also upon non-combatants. It is a policy of terrorism. It makes things easier, in his belief, if his enemies are frightened out of their senses before the fighting begins; on which principle he might boil women and children with great advantage to the peace of Western Europe. Now the Kaiser is a good Christian—a Protestant Christian—a true-blue Christian. Napoleon never was a Christian. He was a Freethinker. But just compare his proclamations to the Kaiser's. Read the following Proclamation to his Army of Italy on April 26, 1796:—

> "All will wish when returning to their villages to be able to say with pride: I belonged to the conquering Army of Italy. Friends, I promise you this conquest, but there is one condition which you must swear to fulfil. That is, to respect the people whom you deliver. Without that you would not be the deliverers of Peoples, you would be their scourge! You would not be the honor of the French people, it would disown you! Your victories, your courage, the blood of your brothers fallen in battle, all would be lost, even honor and glory. As for me, and the Generals who have your confidence, we should blush to command an Army without discipline, without restraint, knowing no law but force.....I will not permit that brigands soil your laurels. I shall have rigorously executed the procedure I have ordered. Looters will be pitilessly shot."

Looters will be pitilessly shot! It ought to make the German Crown Prince jump in his boots. But it won't. He's a good Christian, like his father. How the Christian world has improved in a hundred years!

Napoleon issued another Proclamation to the Army of Egypt on June 22, 1798, which contains the following passage:—

> "Have for the ceremonies prescribed by the Koran, for the Mosques, the same tolerance which you have shown for the Convents, the Synagogues, for the religions of Moses and of Jesus Christ. The Roman Legions protected all religions. The people among whom you are going treat women differently than we, but in any country he who violates a woman is a monster. Pillage only enriches a small number of men, it dishonors us, it destroys our resourcefulness, and it renders us enemies of peoples whom it is our interest to have as friends."

The Kaiser flatters himself that he resembles Napoleon. Yes, as an ape resembles a man. It is impossible to imagine him addressing his soldiers in that fashion. He knocks down Catholic cathedrals.

A very plain-spoken article on "The Causes of the War" appears in a recent issue of the Yorkshire Factory Times, from the pen of Miss Jessie Cockerline. There are a couple of paragraphs that should prove of special interest to our readers. Miss Cockerline notes the extent to which certain people are using Anti-German sentiment to attack things they dislike. She says:—

> "Now, when the English sentiment is against everything German, the shattered pedants of England—or those noisy few of them with a hate of German science, those who buttress beliefs well-nigh untenable under the fire of outspoken continental scientists, and those who see an opportunity to re-erect their broken prestige—creep back and raise their ragged standards safe behind a national animosity. More than that, they hold up as German everything they detest, hoping a half-educated mob may make it a target of their fury."

There is a timely note of warning here that all would do well to bear in mind. Advanced ideas are bound to suffer more or less during war-time, and it is the duty of genuine reformers to see that they suffer as little as possible.

Miss Cockerline has the following observation on the tactics of those who use this Anti-German sentiment as a means of attack on Freethought:—

> "At Shipley last week a speaker discoursed on the Atheism of force. Why should he link Atheism and force? History does not show Atheists and Agnostics as the advocates of forcible subversion. It is quite the contrary, and in the name of religion some of the most bloody atrocities have been committed. I don't contend that a person always makes a statement like the one I mention with a deliberate Machiavellian purpose, but because he links everything which he deems good together, and also links everything which he deems bad, into separate classes. The one he considers the realm of God, the other he considers the realm of Lucifer."

We have often protested against the policy, but it is good to see an independent protest raised in an ordinary newspaper. Perhaps the Yorkshire Factory Times is not an ordinary newspaper. We think not, by the tone of Miss Cockerline's article.

Messrs. Partridge & Co. have published a book called Angels in White—"a book for the present time of distress." But why White? Why not Khaki? That is the holy color now.

In an appreciation of Lord Fisher, T. P.'s Weekly quoted some magnificent lines from Swinburne. Is it not high time that a popular edition of that great poet's works was put on the market? Present-day poets are so very pious, and piety and poesy seldom run in double harness.

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £231 10s. 6d. Received since :—A. J. Marriott, 2s. 6d.

DORIS FINNEY.—(1) We never heard of the "Atheists of the working classes" in John Wesley's time before. They certainly did not persecute him even if they existed. He was bitterly persecuted by his fellow Christians. Southey's Life of Wesley is not, of course, quite up to date, but it is a classic in its way, and a readable edition can be bought for a shilling. (2) Glad to hear that, after reading the Freethinker for seven years, you still look forward to it every week.

S. T. ELLIS.—Glad to see the Sabbatarian clergy have had a setback at Belfast; also that you think "our views on the war are calm and collected, and a great contrast to the hysterical raving one reads so much in the newspapers."

J. G. BARTRAM.—The matter was referred to last week. We can quite understand how great a disappointment it was not to hear Mr. Cohen at Newcastle as you expected. We prophesied you would not get a hall for his lectures. The loss of posters and handbills is, of course, one of the pleasant things entailed by war.

A. MILLAR.—We have sent you a brief note to save time. We hope the explanation was sufficient.

S. W. L.—Sorry we cannot find room for your verse.

H. J. H.—Next week; too late for this week.

E. B.—Many thanks for cuttings.

F. C. HOLDEN.—We had not seen it. Thanks.

S. M. FARRELL.—Pleased to see your handwriting again and to read the enclosure.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always welcome.

J. HUDSON.—Will consider your suggestions.

J. SCOTT.—There is no Branch of the National Secular Society in Portsmouth. We are pleased to know that you derive gratification from reading the Freethinker; but you are surely not "compelled" to go to church every Sunday if you decline on the grounds of this being contrary or opposed to your opinions. There is, theoretically at least, liberty of opinion in the Army, although we can quite believe that there are cases where it is not easy to realise it.

W. BRADBURN.—Sorry you found no meeting at Maryland Point, after going so far in the hopes of hearing a lecture. We do not think the person you name is worth bothering about. His filthy blackguardisms are well known to London Freethinkers, who generally treat him with the contempt he deserves.

D. P. STECHELL.—We do not think that your superior officer is entitled to inflict anything in the nature of a punishment for your not accompanying the rest of your battalion to church. A protest to your commanding officer might be advisable, and, in that case, we hope that he is sufficient of a gentleman to see that justice is done. We are, however, sending your letter on to one who has been "through the mill," and whose advice to you may be helpful.

W. EDMONDS.—We do not care to discuss how many Freethinkers have joined Kitchener's Army, and we have no means of furnishing reliable statistics on the point. We know there are many, from the number of letters we receive. Only a week or two ago we received a visit from one of the Canadian contingent, and he informed us that there were several other Freethinkers in his company. One may depend upon it that Freethought will not make a man less ready to fight for what he considers a just cause, and it may easily make him a better fighter—better, that is, in moral determination and consideration.

H. MASON.—Your policy of compelling the Christian Evidence lecturer to read from Mr. Foote's Shadow of the Sword was a good one, and, apparently, effective with the audience. No one who really knows the speaker you confronted would take what he said seriously; but, then, everyone does not know him—worse luck. To be opposed to war in general need not prevent one seeing the justification for a particular war. We have never preached non-resistance, and never recommended it to others. That is a Christian teaching.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Owing to the War, Mr. Cohen's visit to Newcastle-on-Tyne has been cancelled. This is not due to any fault of his or of the local Branch. The military authorities have commandeered every hall in the city for the use of troops, and no lectures, for the present, are possible. Unfortunately, the posters announcing the lectures were printed before the halls were seized, or that expense might have been saved. Perhaps the Branch may have better fortune in the new year.

Lancashire friends are asked to note that Mr. J. T. Lloyd will deliver a lecture at the Secular School, Pole-lane, Failsworth, to-day (Nov. 22). His subject is a topical one, and the views of a Freethinker on current affairs should be worth hearing. We hope that Manchester friends will do their best to give Mr. Lloyd the audience he deserves.

Mr. Cohen is kindly occupying the editorial chair again on press-day (Tuesday) this week, but Mr. Foote is almost himself again, and hopes to be completely so very soon.

No one will imagine that we are in favor of women frequenting public-houses at any time; but we must confess to something like a feeling of disgust at some of those busybodies who treat a soldier's wife as a suspected person, and who seem almost anxious to place her under police surveillance. For this reason we read, with much pleasure, a very human letter from Sir Lawrence Gomme in the Daily Telegraph of November 12, and from which we take the following:—

> "What uncontrollable cruelty is enacted under the name of religion and charity! A great blow has come to thousands of poor women—women who have lost their men—husbands, brothers, sons, representing all that was best in their drab lives. I witnessed at Brighton a fortnight ago one of these women saying good-bye to her man. The train did not start at once after the closing of the doors. 'Give us another kiss, Bill,' she said, and entering the carriage she flung her arms round the man's neck. The man was ashamed before his mates at this exhibition of love. The woman moved off with bravely laughing mouth, with sadly tearful eyes. 'Come back to me, Bill,' she cried. 'What a fuss these blooming women do make,' said Bill to his companions; but as I sat next to him I felt the gulp in his throat. He was off with the lust of fight in his being. 'I'll kill some damned Germans first,' he said, 'even if I don't come back,' and his mates looked at him. This was all, and they fell to laughing.
>
> Where was that poor woman going? Back to a home which contained her kids—a home dreary and miserable at all times; more dreary and miserable than ever now without her Bill.
>
> On the way home, perhaps; on the morrow more likely, she enters a public-house—the only place where she can learn news, where she can talk to other women similarly placed. And she drinks too much.
>
> Then come the State, and the Church, and the Chapel, and denounce her. They do not extend a helping hand. They don't give her a parish room where she can sit and talk in peace; they don't see to it that her home is clean and wholesome; they don't give her hope. They only condemn her unheard."

It is so easy to condemn; so difficult to understand.

Will Freethinkers in Nottingham and its vicinity who would like to assist in the formation of a Branch of the N. S. S. be good enough to send their names and addresses to Miss Vance, the N. S. S. General Secretary? A letter has been received requesting the formation of a local Society at Nottingham, and there is no reason why this should not be done if those who are interested in the work can be brought together. When the names and addresses are received, a meeting for business purposes can be arranged.

The November number of the English Review reached us so late that a lengthy notice would be rather farcical. We can only say that it is well up to its usual level, and can be warmly recommended to our readers' attention.

The November number of the Positivist Review contains an excellent article on "The Conduct of the War," by the Editor (Mr. S. H. Swinny), and other interesting articles by Frederic Harrison, F. S. Marvin, J. Carey Hall, etc. We hope this useful little publication will not suffer too much from the War. We fear it is bound to suffer to some extent. Fortunately, the Positivists are not, as a rule, amongst the poor or destitute classes.

Digitized by Google

Dives and Lazarus.

SOME Christian friend has sent to me—of course, for my edification—a copy of the first number of The Bible Student's Monthly, the leading article in which is entitled "The Rich Man in Hell; Lazarus in Abraham's Bosom." The writer states that this parable has been "greatly misunderstood"; but he undertakes "to make it plain," notwithstanding that he deplores the fact that "the masses, disgusted with all doctrines, no longer hope for anything reasonable or logical in religion." This last admission proves that Freethought is spreading widely. The text on which he founds his remarks is this: "And in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom" (Luke xvi. 23).

The writer commences by saying "that in the parable the thing said is never the thing meant." This assertion utterly ignores the fact that all dictionaries state that a parable "is an allegorical representation of something real," a word-painting or illustration of something that is true, something that makes clear what otherwise would be obscure. He is careful, however, to say "that since our Lord did not interpret it, anybody has the same right as himself to make known an interpretation of it." In saying this he is simply following the lead of the late Archdeacon Farrar who, in his bulky volume The Bible: Its Meaning and Supremacy, declares that "he who chooses may believe that the most fundamental laws of the universe were arrested to enable Joshua to slaughter a few more hundred fugitives, and he who chooses may believe that nothing of the kind ever entered into the mind of the narrator." And so with Jonah and the whale, the talking serpent, the talking jackass, and all the other Biblical fables. That is, you may believe or disbelieve what you like, and then assert that the narrator was of your opinion.

The writer next proceeds to give his interpretation of the parable. He points out that nothing is said about "the rich man being profane or wicked"; nothing about the "good qualities" possessed by Lazarus; that "if Lazarus were in Abraham's bosom there would be no room for anyone else"; and that "the word hades and the Hebrew word sheol, rendered hell in our version, simply signify the death state, the tomb," and nothing more. He leaves the reader to infer, therefore, that he disbelieves in eternal damnation, and, consequently, doubts the truthfulness of Jesus Christ. For was not the parable uttered by Jesus Christ? And are the utterances of Jesus Christ—who, if the Gospels be true, turned water into wine, walked upon water, raised the dead, and made the elements obey him—to be placed in the same category as that of mere mortal men? Surely the being who is said to have possessed supernatural powers must necessarily have also possessed supernatural knowledge!

If the gospels be true, Christ taught implicitly that there is a Devil (Matt. iv. 5); that there is a hell (Matt. v. 29, 30); and that all men "except the elect whom he hath chosen" (Matt. xiii. 20) shall be tormented for ever in the "everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. xxv. 41). And did he not utter this parable, if he uttered it at all, to emphasise his doctrine of eternal damnation? Is Christ to be believed, or is he not? And if the statement in this instance, whether parabolic or not, be not true, what reliance can be placed on any other of the statements which he is said to have made?

Not long ago a well-known Anglican clergyman, when discussing in print the parable of "Dives and Lazarus," declared that "he could not conceive the idea of God doing stupid things." Neither can I! For God is omnipotent and omniscient, or he is not. If he be not omnipotent and omniscient, he is a myth and nothing more. But if he be omnipotent and omniscient, all the woes and miseries and crimes which torture mankind and blacken the pages of history must be attributed to him, and to him alone.

J. W. DE CAUX.

The Design Argument.—IV.

IN THE LIGHT OF ANATOMY AND PHYSIOLOGY.

(Concluded from p. 733.)

NEXT, as to the eye being made of three coats which are opaque all over except the middle portion through which we see, and three transparent substances, through which refraction of the rays of light takes place; as also about the humors of the eye being transparent, in order that we may see, we shall consider them at length in our lecture on the eye itself. Suffice it to say here, if the aqueous humor is made transparent by God with the object of enabling us to see, why does he sometimes turn it turbid and opaque and blind the poor man? So, also, if God had made the lens transparent with the object that we should be able to see, how is it that the lens by various causes, and especially that of old age, loses its transparency and becomes opaque, making the man blind? The state of the opacity of the lens is called cataract. Apart from various other troubles of the eye, the cataract alone affords us a good argument against the ignorance or unreasonableness of the theologians in attributing the structure of the eye to the special providence of God.

They also say, God has made the socket of the eye round to enable it to turn easily; had it been made square, it would have been fixed. I say, not necessarily so. Even if it had been square, it could then have as easily turned as now, had the four angles of the square been packed up by some fatty matter. Had it been so evolved, the religionist would have said: "Oh, look at the kind and benevolent contrivance of God! The frame of the eye, i.e., the socket, is made square and its four angles packed with fatty matter, not only that it may turn well, but that it may be guarded against external shocks also." They could say anything to serve their purpose.

Ninth. As for the processes of repair that go on in our body in healing wounds of various kinds, I say that it is not done as an intention on the part of any benevolent or malevolent being; but it is going on blindly, as a course of nature, not minding whether its going on is doing you good or harm. For instance, take the healing process called cicatrisation, as is instanced in point number nine. It is all very easy to say that this process of healing spreads from the edges, or from any islands of skin that may have been left, or that may have been grafted by the surgeon, and that it draws the margins together by what is called concentric contraction, and covers by a layer of epithelium, and so forth. But what of the further proceedings? If God had intended to do us good, after a cicatrisation was fully formed, he would really have stopped the process only there. But that is not the case. Even after a cicatrisation is fully formed, it continues to contract; this contraction may go on for months or years, and give rise to some of the most dreadful disfigurements that are met with in surgical practice—especially in the case of a severe burn. If the burn be on the neck, and cicatrisation takes place there, the neck will incline backwards; if on the side, it will lean towards the side or shoulder; if on the elbow-joint, the forearm will be contracted towards the arms, and the same will happen to the knee-joint, not only producing ugly deformities, but also causing great inconveniences. From this you will clearly see how the poor, helpless man is deformed the whole of his life, if he sits quietly with folded arms, believing that whatever is done is done for the best by the loving Father, and will not run to the surgeon—a man—to be remedied. Thus you will see that what is going on is going on blindly without the intervention or will or design of any being for your good or for your evil. How can one dare say that it is God who causes his own man, who is to glorify him, to be deformed all his life? Does God glory in deforming people? If not, why does he deform them? To say that God carries on the process of repair or healing, when the circumstance of deformity is taken into consideration, is to blaspheme God—to admit that he is some whimsical, some unmeaning being.

Digitized by Google

Now, the last—the tenth—point is about bodily pain. It is said that pain gives notice of danger, and excites those endeavors which are necessary to the preservation of our lives. It is the unmistakable and the true monitor. It points out to us exactly where disease is, where destruction of the tissue or the mismanagement of the functions is going on; calling our immediate attention to the remedies. Well, so far as pain does this, apart from the presence or absence of God's design in it, I say, well and good, to some extent. But what if I prove to you that pain points to one place while the disease is really situated in another place? Is not that showing false ensigns, deceiving people by feints and false colors in time of danger? And is not that treacherous, is not that dangerous and immoral, is not that a lie and deception? And yet it must be admitted that it is exactly this, if, as theologians say, God does it. In disease of the hip, there is pain in the knee, although there is no disease in the knee at all; and there is no pain in the hip, although there is really disease there. So, also, when there is disease of the heart, there is pain down the left arm. In the inflammation of the liver, there is pain in the right shoulder. And in some diseases there is no pain at all. For instance, take the case of such a serious and dangerous disease as cancer of the uterus; there is no pain at all, as there is no nervous supply to it until the disease is pretty far advanced and spread to the adjacent parts, when the case is almost hopeless, and proves fatal in 95 per cent. of all cases. What sort of an arrangement do you call this? Now, the pain in the knee has become a common sign of disease of the hip with the medical practioner. But what hardships must people have undergone for centuries before medical science discovered this fact, or rather this lie!

My friends, I have done with my theme. You can clearly understand how the so-called design arguments from anatomical and physiological facts prove no special design on the part of any being or beings, either for the weal or woe of man. What is all this arrangement, then, in our body? What is it the outcome of? In short, what is man? Man is the outcome of evolution which recognises no special design for anybody's good or evil. He is evolved from some lesser organism some hundreds of centuries since. And while he was being evolved through myriads of ages, his limbs and organs were developed according to the place, climate, and many other surrounding circumstances he was subject to, in the cycle of evolution, without anybody's special interference. In short, he was evolved, subject to the law of the survival of the fittest, which means the strongest in the war of Nature, which unmistakably governs the animated world.

Lastly, I shall consider only one point, and finish. Some one might ask, when a special design for the good of man by some benevolent providence is believed by so many people, why should I try to sweep away the foundation of their belief, the solace of their mind, however false their beliefs and however true your beliefs may be? In answer to this, I say that it is my firm belief—and that belief is as true as anything true can be—that if man is ever to be really loving, kind, and tolerant, and in short, happy, his mind must be washed clean of all the false beliefs, and true ones implanted in their stead. What does it benefit man to believe that there is some one to take care of him, to protect him against danger, to soothe him in his calamity, to stand by him in his distress, and to support him in his weakness, when really there is none to do so? We shall be totally ruined by such beliefs. And we have been seriously injured already. Our ignorance on many important points is largely owing to these false beliefs. The religionists have placed as many difficulties as they could in the way of science. False hopes and false beliefs are equally to be avoided. It is rightly said that to know where the danger lies is half-way to safety. Suppose we know the danger, but think that there is some one to protect us from it or avoid it, when really there is none to do so, what would be our fate? It is decidedly disastrous to have such beliefs. It is always safe to have true beliefs, and true beliefs are founded only on facts, on proofs and reason, and never on delusive imagination. In truth alone we shall meet as brothers and sisters, in love and harmony, with unbiased minds, and pure hearts, and with unlimited toleration, without any shadow of orthodoxy or hate. It is rightly said that "there is no religion higher than the truth." Therefore let man really love the truth. Let man love man, and there will be truth and honesty, justice and piety, happiness and prosperity. Let us all have the "gates" of our souls widened and "way" broadened, and we shall surely have the pleasure of seeing the possibility of acquiring the real heaven of happiness for all. Let us throw away small-mindedness and banish old false ideas of the past to the bygone dark ages; let narrow views about men and things, God and Nature, be consigned to antiquity to be forgotten for ever; let the sun of enlightenment shine upon us, and let his clear, bright rays pierce the deep recesses of our souls; let everything that is dark in us be illumined, and let all human kind, giving up the dissensions of sectarianism, clasp hands of sympathy and embrace each other with the sincere love and affectionate feelings of true fraternity. Then, and then only, if ever, is it possible that even at the remotest age imaginable, quarrels between man and man will disappear, wars will cease, and nations—hundreds of different nations—will forget their differences and will be united into one blessed nation of real men and women, into one sacred nationality of the human family.

Invisible Helpers and Adversaries.—III.

(Concluded from p. 726.)

HAVING rendered justice to the neutral and friendly micro-organisms, we may pay some attention to a few of the all too numerous pathogenic germs which minister to our ill. In the opinion of the writer, the labors of scientific workers in unravelling the secrets of malignant microbes constitute a supreme achievement of medical humanism. No one conversant with the facts can any longer dispute that every zymotic disease—cholera, scarlet fever, diphtheria, and rabies among others—is to be attributed to the morbid agency of micro-organisms. Of course, many of the specific microbes remain to be isolated; but in several instances the particular organism which generates—directly or indirectly—degeneration and death has been tracked to its lair.

Malignant pustule, or woolsorter's disease, is one of these fatal maladies, and is justly dreaded as a human scourge. It is also rightly feared by the raiser of farm stock, as it becomes fatal to cattle in the form of splenic fever. In 1850, Rayner and Davaine, two French doctors, announced the discovery of small rod-shaped bodies in the blood of patients who had succumbed to anthrax; but nothing further transpired for over ten years, when interest was reawakened in these singular forms through the researches of Pasteur in 1863. But a further fourteen years were destined to pass before Pasteur, in a celebrated memoir conveyed to the Paris Academy of Sciences, proved beyond all question that the rod-formed bodies observed by Rayner and Davaine twenty-seven years earlier were the generators of anthrax. Since Pasteur's demonstration, our knowledge of these bacilli has been greatly extended by Koch and other bacteriologists, so that we now possess a detailed acquaintance with their life-history. Nor are these inquiries yet exhausted, for fuller and clearer light is being thrown on their phenomena every year of our lives, with highly practical results.

It is now demonstrable that microscopic study of the blood of any animal that has perished from anthrax discloses the presence of enormous numbers of these bacilli. If the smallest amount of this infected blood

Digitized by Google

> "is introduced into the tissues of another animal capable of taking this disease, the inoculated animal becomes infected, and almost certainly succumbs; and if now the blood of this second victim be similarly examined, this also will be found densely populated with the same bacilli. We thus see that the disease is accompanied by the enormous multiplication of the micro-organism within the system of the victim, and that the disease may be indefinitely communicated from one animal to another."

It is also possible to cultivate this fearsome microbe artificially. All that is necessary is to take a drop of blood from an animal that has died from splenic fever and then place it in any ordinary cultivating medium to, in a short time, secure a rich colony of the anthrax bacillus, which is easily seen with the naked eye. In the blood of the animal smitten with this dreadful disease the bacilli seem unable to evolve spores, but as soon as they are removed from the restrictions imposed by the blood their spore-producing powers gain full play, and it is this spore-evolving capacity which endows the bacilli with such deadly influences. For example, if the bodies of animals that have suffered from anthrax are interred or permitted to putrefy near the surface of the soil, the micro-organisms develop spores in the earth, and other creatures will be infected through swallowing the spores with the grass on which they graze.

Nor does this end the trouble. As the hides and fleeces of animals to which the malady has proved fatal sometimes pass into commerce, their contained spores are very liable to cause death to the tanners and wool-sorters who work them long after their original owners have perished.

Cremation seems in any circumstances the only really satisfactory method of disposing of the dead. In any case, it is fairly obvious, in the light of the above facts, that the burning of the carcasses of anthrax-smitten quadrupeds is absolutely imperative, and that the farmer or cattle dealer who neglects these precautions is an unsocial unit of the community. The pity is that many who are in most constant touch with this malady are ignorant of its menaces. During the prevalence of this disease in England some years ago, "the butcher to whom the slaughtering of the affected animals was entrusted was quite unaware of the dangerous task upon which he was engaged, and only had his ignorance enlightened by himself falling a victim to the disease."

A malady which is far more general in man than anthrax—erysipelas—is also set up by an organism. It is not a bacillus in this instance, but a micrococcus. This microbe readily responds to artificial growth, and it has been definitely established by experiment that this micrococcus gives rise to the disease of erysipelas, not only in the lower mammals, but in man.

Possibly the greatest bacteriological triumph is that associated with the labors of Koch. This eminent investigator has settled beyond all cavil the exciting cause of tubercular disease, one of the most fatal forms of which is pulmonary consumption, a dire malady which sweeps away about one-sixth of the British population, and frequently selects as its victims the very flower of the human race. This pestilent disease is bound up with a minute bacillus, which is never absent from any of the numerous varieties of tuberculosis. The tubercle bacillus is also easily cultivated in artificial conditions, and it has been demonstrated that its presence in the body is always the precursor of tubercular disease.

The precise manner in which this scourge is spread is still an open question, but it is demonstrable that the sputum of consumptives is almost certain to contain the bacillus. This micro-organism also develops spores; so that, in addition to the serious risks of infection through sputum, the poison may find many other facilities for communicating the disease. It is, however, to be observed that the conveyance of the tubercle bacillus from a consumptive patient to a healthy subject need not necessarily induce the disease, as a predisposition to the ailment is sometimes essential. This natural immunity to infective diseases is a very important matter, and the writer hopes to deal with it in a forthcoming article.

The connection between tetanus, or lockjaw, and the micro-organism which occasions the disease is one of the most astounding phenomena in the entire realm of bacteriology. Not until 1884 were Carle and Rattone able to prove that jockjaw was a disease liable to conveyance from one victim to another. They showed that rabbits inoculated with pus from the infected corpse of a human being who had succumbed to tetanus also died from the same disease. This discovery at once led to further inquiry. Nicolaier then found that certain microbes were the causative agents of this awful ailment. Rosenbach extended the inquiry; but all attempts to isolate the tetanus bacillus proved unavailing until Kitasato, the great Japanese bacteriologist, secured pure cultures of the refractory organism. His method of working is thus described:—

> "Kitasato took some tetanus pus and inoculated it on to agar-agar, and kept it at a temperature of about 38° C. in an incubator; already within the space of twenty-four hours, an abundant growth was visible, and on examining this under the microscope he found various micro-organisms, and amongst them bacilli, which he at once recognised as those identified with tetanus by Nicolaier and others."

These bacilli produce their spores at the end of the rod-like bacillus, and thus bear the appearance of a microscopic club. They were ascertained to be strictly anærobic; in other words, they will never grow in the presence of air; and this at once accounted for the inability of earlier investigators to free them from contact with foreign microbes.

The spores of this malignant bacillus abound, not only in garden soil, but in stables and other places of a similar kind. They are remarkably resistent to death, and retain their evil qualities for long periods of time. Everything considered, they are to be regarded as among the most sinister and relentless enemies of higher animal life.

Fortunately, in cases of this nature, fatal results may be prevented by the use of tetanus serum, which has been, and is still, employed both with man and the lower animals with very gratifying results in various parts of the world. In tropical and semi-tropical countries the risks of tetanus are much more serious than in our own temperate isles. As that eminent expert, Stewart Stockman, states, "there were places, like Calcutta, where tetanus was so common that bicyclists were warned to wear gloves along the roads. The protective use of tetanus anti-toxin for horses gave them no inconvenience, produced no fever, and never led to a fatal result."

A microbe that has been the occasion of much discussion is the "comma bacillus," which is regarded by Koch as the cause of Asiatic cholera, in which opinion he is supported by many of those best fitted to judge. That this bacillus is the causative agent of cholera is a belief resting upon an imposing array of evidence. The germ in question was detected by Koch in the dejects of cholera patients in Egypt, Calcutta, and Toulon in 1883. Koch's findings were largely confirmed by Klein and Gibbs in Calcutta and Bombay, and other medical authorities subsequently found the comma bacillus in the stools of cholera sufferers. And although these, or similar, bacilli may be present without inducing the disease, the malady always appears to be attended by the comma bacillus.

The germ of typhoid fever, which must not be confused with typhus fever, is another bacillus which long refused to lend itself to that exact observation and experiment which is essential to precise knowledge of microbic connection with disease. But, for all practical purposes, Eberth's bacillus has been proved guilty of direct or indirect responsibility for typhoid fever. Prolonged and patient study is imperative to bring home to a micro-organism its complicity in death-dealing disease. In the case of tuberculosis, tetanus, malaria, plague, yellow fever, and other diseases the connection between the microbe and the malady has been demonstrated to all save those who refuse to understand.

Digitized by Google

In common with all other branches of science, bacteriology is a matter of evolution. The obstacles it has triumphantly surmounted are many, but many more remain to be overcome before full victory can be won. But its already splendid successes are of happy augury for the future. As that brilliant if ill-rewarded investigator of Nature's problems, Sir Ronald Ross, said, in his recent Huxley Lecture, with reference to science:—

> "Her slaves are like laborers condemned to drive tunnels through mountains—working, perhaps for years, in darkness, and oppressed by the immense spissitudes of nature above them; but always encouraged by the hope that at any moment they may emerge into the sunlight and upon the vision of a new world."

T. F. PALMER.

AN ATHEIST'S PRAYER.

Who then are you? Speak out at last. The hour is come.
You can not always keep your tongue within your head.
Appealed to you have all men, wept and wailed have some,
Why have you nothing said?

Why stay you in the sky, huge bronze of livid hue,
With mocking smile on lips that all speech else avoid?
Impenetrable face and phantom form, are you
Of brain and heart devoid?

Why do you nothing say? Why do we see described
No wrinkle, stubborn spectre, on your brow austere?
Why that stupid air and aspect circumscribed?
Are you too deaf to hear?

If you speak not, then try at least to understand.
Despise me, if you will, but let me see, I pray.
Your face relax to show that I may lift a hand
And you know what I say.

To transform into faith the doubt that me o'erpowers
You need but put a yes into those eyes I spy.
You need but make a sign; my hate no longer towers;
It at your feet will die.

O Mystery proud, wrapped in your dismal veils,
He whom men call father should be one indeed.
If you are my creator, in the shades and vales
How can you see me bleed?

How can you see me humbly kneeling on the stone,
My arms stretched toward you, drowned my voice in accents wild,
And yet no tear beneath your eyelid trickling down?
Am I, then, not your child?

Alms give, in pity's name! So poor am I and weak!
I am not wicked. Good be thou, and look at me.
My poor love-laden heart has naught that it can seek
But to exhale to thee.

But no! I still see on your face that stupid smile
My cries, my tears, my insults bear no fruit, I fear.
No, you do not speak; you have no thoughts the while;
You have no ears to hear.

Then, after all, do you exist? When I sound space,
Within the infinite depths your shape I never miss.
Is what I see, perchance, the reflex of my face,
Mirrored in that abyss?

Is it my soul that lends a soul unto the world?
Were my heart's dreams no more an object of my thought,
Would you in vain, like image on the wild waves whirled
When sun goes down be sought?

Yes, yes, your haughty silence now is solved for aye.
But I too long have suffered; revenge is now my share.
These lips henceforth shall be of blasphemy the way,
Never again of prayer.

O God, thou floating fog above a field of lies!
O God, thou vain mirage of wishes here below!
Thy glory and thy pride but from our dreams arise,
Without us, thou must go.

—Translated from the French of Jean Richepin by B. R. Tucker.

Correspondence.

BACTERIOLOGY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. T. F. Palmer, speaks of some amazing discoveries in the prevention and cure of disease by the study of bacteriology. Now, it is unfortunate that that study is usually entered into with preconceived notions, which lead to the most mischievous nostrums, to the detriment of the public health and the depletion of the public purse, being forced upon us. Any medical opinion opposed to the orthodox is treated with insult and persecution; just as the orthodox religionist treats the heretic. What chance would a medical student have of getting his degree if he had an independent opinion on vaccination or serum-therapy? What happened to Dr. Tebb for his outspokenness on vaccination? Next to dogmatic theology vaccination has been one of the greatest curses that ever afflicted humanity. Arm to arm vaccination spread syphilis and leprosy all over the world, and after years of denial the first fact had to be practically admitted by the substitution of what is called, euphemistically, pure calf lymph, which was simply a reversion to a treatment that was given up because it was unsatisfactory.

Any real test experiments would meet with the most strenuous opposition from the vested interests in disease, or else we might ask that at least one army corps should be kept free from vaccination and other inoculations long enough to give a fair comparison between it and the others who had undergone the medical rites which, in my opinion, do infinite mischief. Great care would have to be used in obtaining fair results, for vaccination statistics are deliberately cooked.

A. J. MARRIOTT.

"GENTLE JESUS."

Oh, what have sickly children done to share
Thy cup of sorrows? Yet their dull, sad pain
Makes the earth awful; on the tomb's dark stair
Moan idiots, with no glimmer on the brain;
No shrill priest with his hangman's cord can beat
Thy mercy into these—ah, nay! ah, nay!
The angels thou hast sent to haunt the street
Are hunger and distortion and decay.
Lord! that mad'st man and sendest him foes so fleet,
Who shall judge thee on thy judgment day?

—Robert Buchanan.

THE HOUR OF DEATH.

[The following is a fine translation of an admirable poem by the famous French poet, M. Sully Prudhomme.]

Kindly watcher by my bed, lift no voice in prayer,
Waste not any words on me when the hour is nigh—
Let a stream of melody but flow from some sweet player,
And meekly will I lay my head and fold my hands to die.
Sick am I of idle words, past all reconciling—
Words that weary and perplex, and pander and conceal;
Wake the sounds that cannot lie, for all their sweet beguiling:
The language one need fathom not, but only hear and feel,
Let them roll once more to me, and ripple in my hearing,
Like waves upon some lonely beach where no craft anchoreth,
That I may steep myself therein, and craving nought, nor fearing,
Drift on through slumber to a dream, and through a dream to death.

Obituary.

We deeply regret to announce the death of our well-known and esteemed friend, Mr. M. Jones, of 41 Co-operative-street, Ton Pentre, Rhondda, on the 7th inst., at the age of 59, after a few days' illness. He was of an exceptionally genial disposition—a typical Welsh-speaking Welshman; actively associated for many years with working-class organisations; and an avowed Freethinker. When Mr. Foote and Mr. Lloyd last visited Aberdare, he went over to hear them. He was unusually frank in the expression of his views, and his good character always gained him a hearing. I have the authority of his sons to say he died a Freethinker. His remains were interred at Trecrchy Cemetery on the 12th inst., followed by a large concourse of friends and relatives.—RICHARD MORRIS.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

OUTDOOR.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station, Stratford, E.): 7, a Lecture.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

BIRMINGHAM BRANCH N. S. S. (Oriental Café, Hill-street): 7, F. E. Willis, "What Has Christianity Done for Woman?"

FAILSWORTH (Secular School, Pole-lane): 6.30, J. T. Lloyd, "Truth Dearer Than Life."

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—MISS E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE LATE
CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6½ ins. by 8¾ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-
Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.
FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.
G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.
SUBSCRIPTION RATES.
Single subscription in advance $3.00
Two new subscribers 5.00
One subscription two years in advance ... 5.00
To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra
Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.
Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.
THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS SOCIETY was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be base on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biogrophical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

GILES' APOSTOLIC RECORDS. Price 8s., postage 5d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.

FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY.

Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d. (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.

(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)

THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.

Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.

THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.

Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the Progress Press, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—No. 48 SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

No disguise can long conceal love where it is or feign it where it is not.—ROCHEFOUCAULD.

About Atheism.

ATHEISTS are the last people in the world to resent criticism. Experience would have inured them to it, even if principle had not taught them to recognise its justice. But criticism, if it is to be justified, and certainly if it is to be helpful, must be intelligent. The critic must understand what he is criticising, and this, unfortunately, is what few critics of Atheism ever trouble to do. A brief glance at the literature of Atheism shows that no small part of the work of Atheists has been to remove misunderstandings, some of them almost deliberate. Very seldom indeed does a religionist fight the Atheism of Atheists, it is more generally an Atheism that does not exist out of the pulpit. Where Atheism is fairly present a reply to adverse criticism is easy—sometimes it is not even needed. There is an illustration of this in the case of the famous seventeenth century scholar, Ralph Cudworth. His True Intellectual System of the Universe, intended as a refutation of Atheism, is probably one of the most scholarly works on Atheism ever issued. But Cudworth took care to understand the Atheism he was criticising, and not only to understand it, but to set its arguments down with fairness. The consequence was that the Christian world met the work—or as much of it as was published—with abuse. And the author grew so disgusted with its reception that the remainder of what was intended to be a defence of Theism never saw the light. The general opinion was well summed up by Dryden, who said that the author "has raised such strong objections against the being of a God and Providence, that many think he has not answered them." And the famous Earl of Shaftesbury says that Cudworth was "accused of giving the upper hand to the Atheists for having only stated their reasons and those of their adversaries fairly together."

I was reminded of this case of Cudworth's by coming across the following sentence in Canon Ainger's life of Charles Lamb:—

> "He went through a phase of Atheism—probably out of sheer curiosity."

These words, it should be said, do not refer to Lamb, but to Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who was a schoolfellow with Lamb. And unless one knew to the contrary, one would be inclined to class it with Lamb's own observation on Coleridge's love of German metaphysics, that it was due to his sense of humor. But Canon Ainger is quite serious over the matter. Coleridge went through a phase of Atheism, says the Canon, and he explains it as due to sheer curiosity.

Now, so far as Coleridge himself is concerned, it is extremely unlikely that he ever was an Atheist—in any genuine sense of the term. He himself refers to his "infidelity," and this may be what Canon Ainger had in mind. But it is very probable that this "infidelity" never went beyond what would be called Deism. He rejected the Biblical stories, and was very likely influenced by the better class Deistic authors. Other people may have called him an Atheist, but that is only to be expected so long as Atheism is a term of abuse, and so long as Christians count abuse as argument.

Coleridge himself says that it is—

> "for telling unwelcome truths that I have been called an Atheist. It is for these opinions that William Smith assured the Archbishop of Canterbury that I was (what half the clergy are in their lives) an Atheist. Little do these men know what Atheism is. Not one man in a thousand has either strength of mind or goodness of heart enough to be an Atheist. I repeat it. Not one man in ten thousand has goodness of heart or strength of mind to be an Atheist. And were I not a Christian, and that only in the sense in which I am a Christian, I would be an Atheist with Spinoza."

I am not, however, concerned at present with any discussion of Coleridge's religious opinions. I am using Canon Ainger's words as an illustration of a common phase of mind as regards Atheism and religious disbelief in general. Atheism, it is assumed, is a phase of mind that may be passed through, or even deliberately adopted, much as one might select a motor-car or a suit of clothes. Some people, disgusted with religion, "try" Atheism, and then give it up when they see what an inferior thing it is; or they pass through it, as Canon Ainger says Coleridge passed through it, as though Atheism were a species of intellectual complaint to which bright intellects are susceptible. Bright intellects, be it observed; for it is easy to see that it is never the foolish ones that catch this complaint. It is always the more brilliant minds. The fools are quite safe. Stupidity is the true anti-toxin against Atheism. In spite of the Bible, the fool does not say in his heart "There is no God." Quite the contrary; he proclaims God, and then goes on his knees and thanks God for his stupidity.

Now, anyone who thinks that a man can become an Atheist, as Canon Ainger says Coleridge did, out of sheer curiosity, is—to put it quite plainly—a fool. However wise he may be in relation to other matters, in relation to this one he is foolish. He does not know what Atheism is, and he has, for the time being at least, forgotten the normal laws of mental life. How can one adopt a frame of mind from mere curiosity? One may go anywhere or examine anything out of curiosity; one may even feel a curious interest in one's own mental twists and changes. But by what means can one pass through a mental phase, whether of hope or fear, depression or exaltation, because one is curious about it. A man may realise that he is what the world calls an Atheist or a Theist, and he may be curious as to the causes that have made him the one or the other; but that is all. Mental states are not adopted; they are not even consciously selected. They arise; they are a part of growth; they express what we are at a given time. Their causes and their consequences are alike matters of history.

The idea of anyone becoming an Atheist from sheer curiosity is delicious. Curious about what? About the reasons that lead one to profess Atheism? They are to be studied by anyone who cares to read Atheistic arguments. Is it to find out what Atheism is? Well, Atheists are not formed into a secret society. They are only too ready to explain Atheism to anyone who cares to listen, and writings on the subject are not unobtainable. Is it curiosity to find out what are an Atheist's feelings? There may be something in this, and one can conceive a fervent believer in Deity genuinely puzzled to realise how people can get on without God. But, then, judging by all appearances, the Atheist is not greatly unlike other people. He looks the same as others, he acts the same as others, and, apparently, feels the same as others. And if anyone wishes to realise an Atheist's mental condition, there is only one way in which this may be done. That is by becoming an Atheist. We are not so curious about Theists, for the reason that most of us have passed through that phase of mind. It represents a stage in our development. But one cannot take up with Atheism out of curiosity. I can attend a religious service, and may even go through a religious ceremony, because I am curious about them. But there is no method by which one can acquire a conviction save by appreciating the proofs on which that conviction rests.

Digitized by Google

It is naturally agreeable to Christian prejudice to assume that Atheism is no more than a mere transient frame of mind to which all are subject, but from which really well-balanced minds soon recover. It removes it from the category of serious forces that have to be reckoned with, and at the same time gives the believer a comfortable feeling of superiority. But genuine Atheists never do "recover." A man who is really an Atheist is never reconverted—that is while he remains mentally healthy. The change is all on the one side, and all in the one direction. Nothing is, indeed, more amusing than finding religious people attributing the Atheism of this or that one to false views of the Bible, or to the revulsion brought about by contact with undesirable Christians. The truth is that Atheism is very seldom, if ever, brought about by these means. They may cause a man to leave one sect and join another. They may give weight to one religious doctrine against another religious doctrine; but that is all. If every believer was a wholly admirable person, if every religious doctrine were as clear as daylight, and if all Christians were agreed as to what was the correct view of the Bible, these things would leave the Atheist quite unaffected, and they would be quite powerless to prevent the growth of Atheism. That rests on causes that are part and parcel of human civilisation.

Look at the matter historically. Quite apart from the desirability or undesirability of Atheism, the whole trend of the world's mental growth is in the direction of Atheism. Bacon's often quoted saying that a little philosophy leads to Atheism, but greater depth in philosophy brings men back to religion, will not withstand examination. It is quite the other way about. It is a little philosophy that leads to religion, a greater depth in philosophy brings one out of it. Religion is not the final philosophy of nature, it is the earliest. It is true that religion is the product of reason, but it is reason in its crudest and least informed state. Had man been incapable of reason the gods would never have existed; and provided he keeps on reasoning the gods will one day cease to exist. All history and experience proves this. The very universality of religion proves it. For religion is only universal in the sense that no tribe or nation is known without possessing some kind of superstition. And then exactly in proportion as a people advance in genuine culture, we find religion losing its hold on the human mind. One would never expect to find Atheism amongst savages. Amongst civilised people it has ceased to excite comment.

The essential fact about Atheism is that it represents growth—growth in the individual and growth in the race. That is why a man cannot become an Atheist and then revert to religion. One may exist without knowledge or perception of certain truths, but once this knowledge is ours, how are we going to divest ourselves of it? So one may easily remain a believer in God—the majority do so remain, but once a man sees the fallacy of the God idea, understands its origin, and appreciates its history, how is he ever going to bring himself back to his previous mental condition? It simply cannot be done. Yet it is this fact of growth that is of vital significance in connection with Atheism, and it is the one fact that the Theist declines to recognise. Perhaps one ought to say he dare not. For its recognition involves the admission that the belief in gods is a passing phase in history, analogous to the belief in fairies in the history of the individual. It is in the infancy of the race that the gods are born, to the infancy of the race they properly belong; and that is a truth which is not vitally affected by the fact that in many cases this period of infancy is a very prolonged one.

C. COHEN.

What of Christendom?

IN Anglo-Saxon, cristnian signifies to make a Christian, from cristen, a Christian. Our English verb christen bears precisely the same meaning. In the Catholic and Anglican Churches Baptismal Regeneration is held to be a fundamental dogma, and to be regenerated is to be born into Christ, or to be made a Christian. Tertullian says: "We fishes are born in water, conformable to the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." Now, in the early Church "fishes" denoted Christian disciples, "fish" being then used as a symbol of the Redeemer for the simple reason that the first letters in the Greek words for "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior" make up the Greek term for "fish." To be born in water, then—that is, to be baptised—was to become Christians by a supernatural act. Even among Nonconformists to Christen has practically an identical signification, though in common parlance it often means merely to give a name, to demonstrate—as, for example, when Bishop Burnet says, "Christen the thing what you will." It naturally follows that by Christendom is to be understood either Christian citizenship, as such, or a group of countries inhabited by Christians. Shakespeare employs it in the former sense when he makes Duke Arthur exclaim, in answer to Hubert:—

> "By my christendom,
> So I were out of prison, and kept sheep,
> I should be as merry as the day is long."

It is in the second acceptation, however, that the word is generally taken. By Christendom is meant the United Christian Kingdom — the cluster of kingdoms over which Christ rules. The Rev. Edward Shillito, in an article in the Christian World for November 19, is candid enough to admit that "devotion to Christendom means little to-day," which signifies that loyalty to the Emperor Christ is almost entirely a thing of the past. Once upon a time loyalty to Christendom was an all-consuming passion, burning fiercely in all Christian hearts. Mr. Shillito describes it thus:—

> "It was a motive powerful enough to stir the hearts of kings, statesmen, thinkers, poets, and all the master-minds of Europe. The Crusades testified to the reality of Christendom. The long struggles with the Moors were prompted by the faith that there was something distinctive and vital for which all Christian peoples were content to die."

We endorse almost every word in that extract, but we politely beg to remind its writer of the fact that to every statement in it there is a staggering counter-statement, which is carefully left out. The Crusades did witness to the reality of Christendom, but they witnessed quite as powerfully to the utter rottenness of the moral characters of those engaged in them. Doubtless there were amongst them a few pure-hearted and noble-minded persons, but the bulk of them were drawn from the riffraff of the populations of the West, and did not hesitate to commit the lowest and darkest deeds in the name of the Cross. Their licentiousness was a byword. Hating the Jews with all their hearts, they tortured, slaughtered, and plundered them whenever they had an opportunity. And they ran no spiritual risks by any of the crimes they perpetrated, for the Pope had granted them full indulgences before they started. Has Mr. Shillito forgotten how Pope after Pope advocated those horrible wars; how Innocent III., his guardian, forced Frederick the Second, when only twenty-one years of age, to assume the cross; how Gregory IX. excommunicated him because he kept putting off his departure for Palestine; how he was excommunicated a second time by the same Pontiff for going there; and how, after securing a favorable peace, and after sailing for Italy, he was excommunicated a third time for returning? A most extraordinary character, an impassioned poet as well as a level-headed lawgiver, a man who could live on terms of friendship and hospitality with non-Christians, which was denounced as conduct unworthy of a Christian, Frederick was hated, despised, and persecuted with great ferocity by the Papacy.

Digitized by Google

Surely, Mr. Shillito does not think that the treatment of the Moors in Europe reflects any credit upon the Christian Church? Is he not familiar with the story of their forcible conversion to Christianity, their persistent persecution, and of the heartless injustice heaped upon them for so many generations in Spain? The reverend gentleman is quite right as to the motive that animated the Church. It is a notorious fact that the horrible cruelties and oppression practised upon the Jews by Christianity dates from the time that it became the religion of the State under Constantine. It is true that three or four Popes protested against and attempted to check such a shamefully inhuman policy; but, with those few exceptions, the persecution continued with extreme ferocity through many centuries. We have seen that the Jews were massacred by thousands during the mad fury of the Crusades; but we have to confess further that it was the uniform habit of most devout sovereigns, like Theodosius, St. Lewis, and Isabella, of the Council of the Lateran, of Paul IV., and particularly of all religious orders, to put up a wall of absolutely implacable hostility between them and all Christians. It was appointed that they must wear a distinctive garb and dwell in ghettoes. Christians were forbidden to have any intercourse whatever with them. Intermarriage with them was the very worst of sins, and there was a time when, if a Christian chose a Jewess for his mistress, he was burnt alive. These are facts with which all students of history are well acquainted. The Jews were a hated and hunted race in a Christendom sweetly governed by the God of all grace and love. Christians were only allowed to utilise them as their bankers, and some doubted whether they ought to be allowed to do even that.

Now this brutally hated, hunted, hooted, and plundered race found an asylum replete with tolerance, kindness, and sympathy amongst the Moors of Spain. Having many points in common, these two peoples were able to appreciate and serve one another. But the friendship thus established was destined to be but short-lived. Soon after the Cross vanquished the Crescent, the Holy Inquisition became supreme in Spain. The edict went forth that the Jews must be expelled from the country at once. They offered 30,000 ducats to remain, but Isabella was not on the market at any quotation, especially when Torquemada was at hand to keep her straight. The Jews gone, the fate of the conquered Moors grew worse and worse, until, a hundred years later, they, too, a full million, shared the doom of the hundred and sixty thousand Jews.

The most amazing fact in this connection is that Mr. Shillito seems to believe that the Jews and Moors were treated so unheroically and with such economic blindness by the Spanish Christians because of something distinctive and vital which, they were convinced, characterised the Christian faith. The expulsion of the Jews under Ferdinand and Isabella, and that of the Moors under Philip III. were, beyond doubt, acts of supreme piety. Ever since 1509, when a revolt, provoked by a breach of the compact entered into on the fall of Granada, was violently suppressed, the vanquished Moors had been shockingly oppressed. They were not allowed to make an open profession of their own religion, and their sufferings were indescribable. Later on, in 1566, they were prohibited from speaking or writing in Arabic, and from indulging in their traditional habits and ceremonies. Then came the over-pious and dangerously foolish Philip III., whose one object in life was to further his own ends by promoting those of the Catholic Church. In 1609 this ridiculous monarch resolved to make a public exhibition of his orthodoxy by issuing a decree ordering the expulsion of all Moors from the Peninsula within three days. The edict was duly executed, and the ruin of Spain as duly begun. We stoutly maintain that the Mooriscoes were intellectually, morally, agriculturally, and industrially the backbone of the country, and that their departure from it could not have been eventuated in anything but its certain disintegration. And yet Mr. Shillito has the coolness to indicate that this was the way Spain witnessed to the reality of Christendom. He makes his case worse still by his allusion to Mr. Gladstone's championship of the cause of the maltreated Bulgarians in 1876. Identifying Gladstone's motive with that which controlled the Spanish Catholics of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, this twentieth century preacher says:—

> "When with passionate wrath, he pleaded the cause of Bulgarians or Armenians, he never forgot that they were members of the body of Christendom; they had a claim upon him as fellow-heirs of the Christian name, set in the midst of a non-Christian civilisation. They were not of his Church, they might have strayed, as he imagined, from the highways of the Faith, but they were Christians, and, as Christians, were not the same as though they were outside Christ."

Such is Mr. Shillito's conception of Christendom, and it is the genuine idea of it too. There are humanitarians in Christendom, people who love and work for the welfare of the human race, but they are outsiders, and genuine Christians look down upon them and contemptuously dub them Pagans. Thank you so much, Mr. Preacher, you have opened our eyes still more. We now see clearly that the central, all-embracing Christian attribute is clannishness. Nothing could be more obvious. What is the root and guiding principle in Foreign Missions? Narrow, selfish, exclusive clannishness. Great fault is found with the Germans just now because they loudly assert their own superiority to all other nations in the world; but does not the British Empire make the same silly claim, and quite as loudly, every time a prominent politician or a pulpiteer opens his mouth? This fault is pre-eminently a Christian fault, not a German or British one merely. Toleration of and fellowship on equal terms with non-Christians have never been and never can be Christian virtues. At one and the same time Christianity preaches self-denial and self-assertion, two mutually destructive qualities. Christianity may be summed up in the solitary word—Egoism. Such is Christendom as interpreted by Mr. Shillito.

J. T. LLOYD.

Ambrose Bierce.

> "A fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy."
> —SHAKESPEARE's Hamlet.

A PARAGRAPH has been going the rounds of the press that Mr. Ambrose Bierce, the well-known humorist, who is seventy-two years of age, and who went recently to Mexico for further literary work, is missing, and none of his friends know what has become of him. Mr. Bierce, who is even better known by his pen-name, "Dod Grile," is an American with a large following in his native country, but for some years he resided in England, doing excellent work on the London Figaro and Fun in their palmy days, and publishing a number of books, which firmly established his reputation on this side of "the herring pond." In the United States his works have been collected in a handsome edition in twelve volumes; but in this country he is represented by stray volumes which are the joy of discriminating lovers of literature.

Digitized by Google

Why his books are not so popular as those by Mark Twain, Max Adeler, Artemus Ward, and Jerome K. Jerome is a mystery. That he is as funny as either is evident. If his humor is not appreciated by the public to the extent of those others, it may be because he has chosen to expend it largely upon a disrespectful perversion of religion. The proper study of mankind is man, and possibly the only burlesque that causes the wide mouth of the general public to broaden to a grin must also concern nature, and not the alleged supernatural. Ambrose Bierce deserves a place beside the other humorists mainly because his work is of a rarer quality than theirs. Two of his books with the quaint titles The Fiend's Delight and Cobwebs from an Empty Skull revealed a mordant satire that is without a parallel since the days of Swift, and they were as full of profanity as an egg is full of meat. The title page of The Fiend's Delight was ornamented with a drawing showing a devil toasting a plump baby at a large fire, whilst in the body of the work the Christian superstition fared as badly as it did in the lively pages of Colonel Ingersoll. Another extraordinary book was In the Midst of Life, a series of powerful short stories largely concerned with military episodes in the American Civil War, and some of his battle pictures are unsurpassed of their kind, whilst others recall the grim realism of Poe or Maupassant. The gems of humor scattered throughout his writings would make the fortune of a comic writer. Here are a few taken at random:—

"I once knew a man who made me a map of the opposite hemisphere of the moon. He was crazy. I knew another who taught me what country lay upon the other side of the grave. He was a most acute thinker—as he had need to be."

"The Psalmist never saw the seed of the righteous begging bread. In our day they sometimes request pennies for keeping the street corners in order."

"It is wicked to cheat on Sundays. The law recognises this truth, and shuts up the shops."

"If a jackass were to describe the deity, he would represent him with long ears and a tail. Man's ideal is the higher and truer; he pictures him as somewhat resembling a man."

"Camels and Christians receive their burdens kneeling."

"Most people have no more definite idea of liberty than that it consists in being compelled by law to do as they like."

"People who honor their parents have the comforting promise that their days shall be long in the land. They are not sufficiently numerous to make the life-assurance companies think it worth their while to offer them special rates."

"Everybody professes to know that it would be difficult to find a needle in a haystack, but very few reflect that this is because haystacks seldom contain needles."

"In calling a man a hog, it is the man who gets angry, but it is the hog who is insulted. Men are always taking up the quarrels of others."

"It is to be feared that to most men the sky is but a concave mirror, showing nothing behind, and in looking into which they see only their own distorted images, like the reflection of a face in a spoon. Hence it needs not surprise that they are not very devout worshipers; it is a great wonder they do not openly scoff."

"Benevolence is as purely selfish as greed. No one would do a benevolent action if he knew it would entail remorse."

"The symbol of charity should be a circle. It usually ends exactly where it begins—at home."

"Piety, like small-pox, comes by infection. Robinson Crusoe, however, caught it alone on his island. It is probable that he had it in his blood."

To pick out passages haphazard is not doing justice to a brilliant humorist. Not only does a jest's prosperity lie in the ear of him who hears it, but it has its life in atmosphere of its own, and there are few plants so tender in the transplanting. While the creator of "Mr. Dooley" is welcomed, and the author of Three Men in a Boat is passing popular, one cannot help regretting the inadequate appreciation that Ambrose Bierce has won. Of course, all reading people must know his writings; but that the larger public should not have an opportunity of testing what he has written is unsatisfactory.

The function of a laugh-maker is often underestimated. The man who grins at you through a horse-collar, and sets you laughing back at him, does you a vast service. The physiological value of laughter has never been correctly appraised. Although doctors bestow a certain patronage on cheerfulness, and give it a minor place in the pharmacopœia, no one will dispute that the humorists are the benefactors of society. Yet, with the exception of Moliere, Rabelais, and Dickens, humorous writers are held to be only second-rate artists. The world will not take them seriously. Perhaps it is their own fault for electing to provide mirth for folk who take their pleasures sadly.

MIMNERMUS.

A Chapter of My Autobiography.

THE SECULAR CHARTER.

IN the early days of my acquaintance with the Secular party I used to hear Charles Bradlaugh and George Jacob Holyoake complain that Christian laws deprived Freethinkers of a right enjoyed by all other citizens; namely, of giving or bequeathing money to the Secular movement with full legal security. Those who might imagine that Holyoake's language was less vehement than Bradlaugh's on this subject are very much mistaken. He spoke like a man who had seen his and his friends' property carried off in open daylight and the policeman helping the thief.

My own prosecution for "Blasphemy" in 1882-3 gave me a special interest in this matter. Robbing a man of his personal rights of free-thought and free-speech was half-way to robbing him of his financial rights. It was because a Freethinker could be kicked with impunity that he could be pillaged with impunity. And as, for my part, I am as little fond as any man is of "wrongs unredressed and insults unavenged," this state of things made a great impression on my mind and filled me with indignation. Natural inferiority must be borne with, but arbitrary inferiority—manufactured by bigotry and insolence—is a thing that no man with a spark of self-respect could put up with for a single moment longer than he could help.

I became a Freethought lecturer and writer myself, and the editor of the Freethinker from its first number. It was like no other Freethought paper that had ever been published, and although it contained nothing in the form of revelation, its novelty of character made it more popular than was expected. And it soon got me into trouble. I was so incensed at the treatment of Bradlaugh by the baser sort of Christians, aided by Christians of a more tolerant reputation, that I felt, "Very well, gentlemen, if that is your Christianity, I hate it; moreover, I despise it, and contemn you; and I will inflict upon you as much pain and injury as I can." So the Freethinker started with a really fine program, if I may say so, and it kept its promise as far as possible. But ridicule was our speciality. By "our" I mean my dear old friend and colleague, Joseph Mazzini Wheeler, as well as myself. All who really knew him would subscribe to the statement that he couldn't be vulgar if he tried—and there was the paper to speak for itself. Articles of my own on Gambetta, Littré, Paul Bert, and Etienne Dolet, appeared in the early numbers; and although time necessarily brings changes, I would not be ashamed to sign them now. Mr. Wheeler and I were extremely unlike each other in many things, but wonderfully alike in many other things; and men who worshiped Shakespeare, reverenced Darwin, and loved Shelley (as we both did) were not the likeliest to be enamored of vulgarity, although we may occasionally have failed to remember the Master's mot about a jest's prosperity.

Well, with good outside help from friends whose names could not be mentioned then and cannot be mentioned now, we simply maddened the Christians—as we tried to do in the circumstance of the time.

Digitized by Google

We were revenging Freethought a bit—what the man in the street calls "getting our own back." And the worst of it was that the enemy recognised the learning and ability which (leaving out myself) lay behind the witty attacks of that gallant little band of Freethought soldiers on the Bible and Christianity in particular, but also in general on all the flourishing superstitions of the world.

We maddened the Christians so much that they soon fell upon us with the "Blasphemy" Laws. I was prosecuted as Fiend in Chief, Mr. W. J. Ramsey as Chief Steward, and Mr. H. A. Kemp as Substeward—that is to say as Editor, Publisher, and Shopman (he was really a lad). But I am not relating the story of my prosecution and imprisonment at present. I am only indicating the way my mind took with regard to the main subject I am writing about. I suffered my twelve months' imprisonment under a Christian judge's sentence, in a Christian gaol, provided with a Christian soul-saver in case I required his services. Christians sometimes ask me to forget it. Never, while Christians love persecution; never, while the "Blasphemy" Laws are unrepealed.

During my imprisonment I thought of many things. Amongst them, of course, was the personal side of the Blasphemy Laws—the danger that every Freethought publicist ran from a Christian jury's being asked whether his criticism of their faith was absolutely suited to their taste. That danger, from the nature of the case, seemed still destined to a considerable longevity, although its viciousness had been greatly diminished by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge's judgment at my trial. In spite of all the Common Law decisions of former judges, he insisted that times had changed, that people had grown more tolerant and humane, that differences of opinion on any subject could not now be considered a crime, and that "if the decencies of controversy are observed, even the fundamentals of religion may be attacked without a person being guilty of blasphemous libel."

Nobody felt the full meaning and weight of these fateful words. Certainly I did not. Lord Coleridge himself did not. He said that he did not then realise the great importance of the trial at which he was presiding. Still, he stuck to his judgment, which I had included in my report of the proceedings; and his independent report of his own speech, except for what may be called repairs and decorations, showed very little difference between the two publications.

I suffered the heaviest punishment inflicted on a Freethinker for a hundred and twenty years. Not by the order of Lord Coleridge, but by the sentence of Mr. Justice North, one of the common rack of judges and a Roman Catholic at that. It was my singular fortune to be tried for "blasphemy" three times in the course of less than three months. I was brought up from prison to be tried again on what was really the first indictment. I had fallen among thieves, I was bruised and wounded, without so much as the benefit of first aid. And I sat there to be tried again for the same "crime," answer the same stupid arguments of bigotry, and retort its insolences. When lo! there was a hush in court, and a tall figure, looking so stately in those red robes, walked across the bench with noble dignity, and took the judge's seat. And it was the Court of the Lord Chief Justice of England! He sat down serenely, rested his forehead on his right hand, and took a good look at me. I think the scrutiny ended in satisfaction. Judge North's "Foote" changed into Mr. Foote, his Lordship assisted me in protesting against the word "indecency" being applied to my paper, and the "vulgar blasphemer" of a few weeks before had turned into the author of a "very striking and able speech," as Lord Coleridge told the jury it was—while the Times said that the trial "would be historical, chiefly because of the remarkable defence" I had made. So it seems that I was born, as it were, for this particular work.

In the course of time the spark of fire in Lord Coleridge's speech to the jury at my third trial for "Blasphemy" grew into a great light in my mind. Was it not possible to make a distinction between matter and manner in the criticism of Christianity, so that one might be legal though the other were penal? The logic of this distinction had nothing to do with me. Providing that Lord Coleridge's distinction held good, a Society might be founded on a legal basis of non-Christian intention, and as firm and secure as the Rock of Gibraltar. It would also have to furnish security on the side of expenditure—that is, internally as well as externally. This could be done by something that was a Trust and not a Trust—by something that had all the advantages of a Trust and none of its disadvantages. This was at last worked out through the Memorandum and Articles of a Company Limited by Guarantee.

Hardly anybody thought this plan was feasible. I had to convert even the legal gentlemen who afterwards assisted me. Some of my colleagues, with rather a cynical smile, were ready to encourage me, as far as they felt able to, in attempting the impossible. Some asked why the project had not occurred to Bradlaugh. I replied that no one admired him more than I did, but his death did not leave the world empty. Some (there are always these some) predicted still worse things, and pictured me as a sort of millionaire living on the Mediterranean with all the money of my dupes safely invested in good securities for my own advantage. As a matter of fact, money accruing to the Society had to come through the Society's bankers' by cheque, endorsed by the Secretary and two Directors, of whom the Chairman was not necessarily to be one. The Society was formed, the Society was registered in 1898, the Society has had thousands of pounds by way of gift and legacy, the Society still exists and fulfils its intended function—and I am not yet living on the Mediterranean. It is ten to one that I shall be cremated at Golder's Green.

I published the Memorandum of Association of the Society last week. I now give the "Reasons for Joining the Society," which I published in in this journal in September, 1898:—

REASONS FOR JOINING THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED.

First Advantage.—This scheme gets rid of the old difficulty as to giving or bequeathing money, or other property, for Secular purposes. The Secular Society (Limited) is a legally incorporated body. It has all the rights, as far its Memorandum and Articles go, of an individual citizen. If anything is bequeathed to it, the executors have no alternative but to pay the amount over. That is certain. It does not admit of a moment's doubt. While the registration stands there is absolutely no room for apprehension on this point. A Freethinker may leave this Society five pounds, or a hundred pounds, or a thousand pounds, with the certitude that all he so leaves will be devoted to the objects set forth in the Memorandum.

Second Advantage.—The Society, like an individual citizen, can act as trustee. Should a Freethinker wish a certain sum of money to be devoted, not to the general objects of the Society, or to any one of them in particular, but to some special object in the same direction, he can so devote it by deed of gift, or in his will, and appoint the Society as trustee for the carrying out of his intentions.

Third Advantage.—While the Society is not nominally a Trust, like the various Christian Churches, it is practically so. Its Memorandum amounts to the same thing as a Trust, because it specifies certain objects to be promoted, generally by the members and particularly by the Directors, and because Article 54 makes it legally impossible for the Society's funds to be expended in any other way.

Fourth Advantage.—No member, as a member, can derive any profit, direct or indirect, from the Society. The funds of the Society could not, therefore, be voted in any way to its members. Further, there is no danger of the highest interests of the Society being injured by a desire on the part of its members for a commercial dividend. There is no room for that desire to operate.

Digitized by Google

Fifth Advantage.—There is no Share Capital; consequently, the danger does not exist of shares passing into indifferent, alien, or hostile hands. This has frequently occurred in the case of ordinary companies, and the result has been ruinous to the objects of the original promoters.

Sixth Advantage.—No temporarily successful faction of malcontent members could have the slightest chance of wrecking the Society, for it cannot be voluntarily wound up except by the consent of at least nine-tenths of its members, which involves practical unanimity. The continuity of the Society is thus guaranteed.

Seventh Advantage.—It could be to no one's personal interest to see the Society wound up, because Article 57 provides that on its winding up its property would have to be given to some kindred society, or to a non-sectarian charity. "It shall not be paid or distributed," the Article says, "amongst the members."

Eighth Advantage.—While there is every security for the rights of members, and for full and perfect publicity, the Society's affairs will be conducted in a business-like way by a Board of Directors, who have legal powers and also legal obligations, which could, if necessary, be enforced.

Ninth Advantage.—The Memorandum gives the Society large and varied powers, if only it can obtain the means to exercise them. The whole field of Secular work and organisation could be covered with adequate resources.

Tenth Advantage.—Every member having to be proposed and seconded, and admitted or rejected by the Directors, there is a reasonable guarantee that only proper persons will be admitted to the Society; and, as every member has to pay ten shillings on joining, and five shillings a year afterwards, there is a reasonable guarantee that he will be seriously interested in the Society's welfare.

Eleventh Advantage.—This is an indirect one. Henceforth the leading men in our movement will be freed from unjust suspicion and malicious misrepresentation. If one of them was left anything by a friend, who happened to be a Freethinker, it was always open for jealous persons to say, "Oh, it was meant for the movement, but he has stuck to it himself." Mr. Bradlaugh had several such legacies, at least two of them being substantial ones, and he suffered from these traducers, who took advantage of a Christian law to libel their own leader by means of a falsehood that, from the very nature of it, did not admit of a positive refutation. Other leading Freethinkers have suffered from the same cause. But all that is ended now. If a man wishes to leave money to the movement, he can put the Secular Society, Limited, in his will. What he leaves to an individual, henceforth, can only be meant for that individual. And probably there will always be some who prefer to help a movement by helping those who labor and sacrifice, and perhaps suffer, to carry it forward.

G. W. FOOTE.

(To be continued.)

A CHRISTIAN SON.

The other day a young gentleman, a Presbyterian who had just been converted, came to me and gave me a tract, and he told me he was perfectly happy. Said I, "Do you think a great many people are going to hell?" "Oh, yes." "And you are perfectly happy?" Well, he did not know as he was, quite. "Would you not be happier if they were all going to heaven?" "Oh, yes." "Well, then, you are not perfectly happy?" No, he did not think he was. "When you get to heaven, then you will be perfectly happy?" "Oh, yes." "Now, when we are only going to hell, you are not quite happy; but when we are in hell, and you in heaven, then you will be perfectly happy? You will not be as decent when you get to be an angel as you are now, will you?" "Well," he said, "that was not exactly it." Said I, "Suppose your mother were in hell, would you be happy in heaven then?" "Well," he says, "I suppose God would know the best place for mother." And I thought to myself, then, if I were a woman, I would like to have five or six boys like that.—Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

Newman and Paine.

"Rough work, Iconoclasm, but the only way to get at Truth."—OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

CARDINAL NEWMAN ought to have been well acquainted with Freethought, for one of his brothers was a Theist, and another was an Atheist, whilst in many pages of own incomparable writing he shows a delicate appreciation of the sceptical objections to orthodoxy. The Cardinal's biographers, however, do not appear to possess much knowledge on the subject. In a sketch of Newman, issued by the Catholic Truth Society, and written by Dr. Barry, it is said that Newman, at the age of fourteen, "read Paine's tracts against the Old Testament, and found pleasure in thinking of the objections they raised." It would be difficult to beat this specimen of "Catholic Truth." Paine wrote no "tracts" against the Old Testament, and his Age of Reason, which covers the whole of the Bible, is a substantial volume, and has been on sale for over a century, and has been sold by hundreds of thousands. Many replies have been published, but Paine's book has outlived them all, and may be regarded as a Freethought classic.

There were critics of the Bible, it is true, before Thomas Paine's day, but they were mainly scholars, whose works were not easily understood by ordinary folk. Paine himself, a man of genius, had sprung from the people, and he spoke their tongue and made their thoughts articulate. But boldly as Paine might write, his book would never have been read at all but for the courage of the Freethinkers. In that battle for free speech, Richard Carlile and his wife and friends divided among them about fifty years imprisonment. Daniel Eaton, besides being prosecuted seven times, had the pillory inflicted and £2,500 worth of literature destroyed. Christian apologists, who are never tired of boasting of the tolerance of their intolerant superstition, need to be reminded of these things. Although trials for blasphemy have been numerous, the comparatively enlightened nineteenth century holds the record for the number of blasphemy and free speech prosecutions, and it is extraordinary in how many instances Paine's book has figured. The reason is not far to seek. Paine woke the working classes to intellectual issues, and since Church and State have united in an unholy alliance to strangle Liberty.

M.

PROFESSOR BURY'S CRUSHING ARGUMENT.

Before I came to years of discretion, a well-meaning preceptor supplied me with an argument to prove the supernatural origin of the Christian revelation. It amounted to this: If Christianity had been a human invention, it could not have lasted for nineteen centuries. It so obviously proves too much. For it would establish the divine origin of Buddhism; it would establish the divine origin of Confucianism; and it would establish for Fetishism an origin still more divine. Or, why confine its validity to religions? Roman law, which in its way has had as wonderful a vitality as Christianity, would be entitled to claim superhuman inspiration.—Prof. J. B. Bury, Litt.D., LL.D.

HOW JONES WORSHIPS JONES.

Of all conceivable forms of enlightenment the worst is what is called the inner light. Anyone who knows anybody, knows how it would work; anyone who knows anyone from the Higher Thought centre knows how it does work. That Jones shall worship the God within him turns out ultimately to mean that Jones shall worship Jones. Let Jones worship the sun or moon, anything rather than the inner light; let Jones worship cats or crocodiles, if he can find any in his street, but not the God within.—G. K. Chesterton.

BRADLAUGH AND "GEORGE ELIOT."

I well remember that when describing an evening at the Hall of Science, George Henry Lewes observed laughingly to "George Eliot," "I verily believe, Polly," thus he usually called his companion, "that our friend has a sneaking fondness for Mr. Bradlaugh."—Miss Betham Edwards, "Reminiscences."

Digitized by Google

Acid Drops

We are rather at a loss to see why so many military men in this country should spend so much time denouncing the teaching of some German writers that war is a national necessity. It is only what scores of militarists in our own country have taught for years. It is, indeed, the common teaching of militarists in all countries. Even Lord Roberts said that "Without war, at any rate, without the vigilance and discipline which prepare for that stern emergency, a nation is in risk of running to seed." War, he said, "prevents decadence and effeminacy." This is, we repeat, the common teaching of militarists, it is no more German than British, and no more British than French. And it is wholly false. War does not improve a nation, it degrades it; instead of preventing decadence, it leads to it. If this were not so, it would be nothing short of lunacy to talk of fighting Prussian militarism in order to end war. We ought to take care to perpetuate it as a recurring factor in national life. But the truth is that war takes of the best and leaves the worst. It begins by weeding out the physically fit, and ends by inducing a blunted moral sense. The proof of this is seen in the fact that no militarist nation has ever been able to perpetuate itself. And it is one of the best established truths that troops long in the field tend to demoralisation.

Where these theorists go astray is in confusing the exercise of combative energy with physical fighting. The first is a permanent element in human nature; the second is only one of the forms in which it finds expression. Man is always a fighting animal. Civilisation itself is no more than the story of man's fight with nature and the conservation of the fruits of his many victories. But there is no need that this combative energy of man shall always be expended in physical contest with his fellow-man. That is the uncivilised—or at best the less civilised—aspect of the struggle. The higher and better and more profitable aspect of the struggle lies in the contest of ideas and ideals. The other form becomes less and less so in proportion as humanity becomes susceptible to the sway of ideas. And this contest is also decisive. No one really wishes to stop contests between human beings. What the better minds wish to do is to lift that contest from the lower to the higher stage. The true militarist favors the lower expression of the struggle. That is the real difference between the pacifist and the militarist. And, as a matter of fact, there is no more combative person in existence than the anti-militarist. Only he prefers ideas as being ultimately more powerful and profitable than bullets and bayonets.

The Church Times is hoping that some kind of Christian unity may result from the War. But it is to be the kind of unity that exists when a wolf and a lamb are united; for what the Church Times wants is that other sects shall become reconciled to them. And the other sects are equally anxious for unity—on the same terms. Meanwhile, it is instructive to observe that religion is the one thing on which people will not and cannot unite. When the War broke out politicians of opposite schools became reconciled, employers and employees declared a truce. Religious parties alone maintained all their divisions and their differences. It may be said that this is because religion is the most valuable of all things. But the truth is that, while social life draws people together, religion makes all the time for division.

Some good stories are included in Sir Melville Macnaghten's Days of My Years. One is in connection with the murder of William Terriss, the actor, when Charles Brookfield objected to the highly colored details published in a paper, and wrote to the editor: "Sir,—God, who in his infinite mercy has deprived the negro of his sense of smell, would seem similarly to have deprived the journalist of all sense of decency."

The Unspeakable Prussian is the title of a new book. Surely it must omit reference to the Psalm-smiting and loquacious Kaiser, for he talks like an insurance agent or a revivalist preacher.

A new volume has been issued with the title, David in Heaven. We wonder if his celestial amusements are as interesting as his little affair with Bathsheba, or his dancing display before the Ark.

In a biographical note of Lord Strathcona in T. P.'s Weekly, it describes the late-lamented peer as belonging to the "catch-as-catch-can Individualist school." This awful phrase suggests an evangelical mission, a harmonium, and plenty of collection boxes.

The Vicar of St. Peter's, St. Albans, has been solemnly warning people that they should avoid spending on luxuries during the present state of affairs. Such advice is not very helpful, especially as one is not told what is a luxury. There are, of course, hosts of things that most of us could live without, but would a life without some of these be worth the living? Are necessaries only those things adequate to sustain life—say, enough food, clothing, and shelter? A great many people apparently regard a book as a luxury, and one can, of course, live without books. So with a variety of other things. And the gist of the whole matter lies in the consideration that what is at first a luxury becomes later a necessity, and that, on the whole, it is well that this should be so. For life itself becomes higher in value as luxuries become necessities. Reducing life to what are called its bare necessities would mean little less than the destruction of civilisation. We do not mean that there are no such things as unnecessary luxuries, and some that people would be just as well without. The difficulty lies in discriminating, and the uselessness of advice without discrimination.

Meanwhile, from our point of view, there are some things that we think the nation could get on very well without. People might dispense with their disbursements—or a part of them—for purely religious purposes. The money spent on foreign missions, over three millions annually, might be saved. Now that we have called upon the followers of the religions of India, the Japanese, the Senegalese, and others to come and help in the task of preserving Western civilisation, it might be a graceful act if we desisted from offering them a religious patronage that is unwelcome and impertinent. But this is, of course, not the kind of economy that the Vicar of St. Peter's has in mind. He is thinking of the way in which people might economise in some directions in order to give the money to "Home Missions," and the like. It is really a question of point of view, and the Vicar's is like that of the merchant who sees no more in the War than a chance for him to capture some of Germany's trade.

It was one of life's little ironies that a portrait of the Bishop of London, in full war-paint, should have been exposed in a dealer's window immediately beneath a placard announcing a cheap edition of Stevenson's Travels With a Donkey.

In a recent novel, entitled Sinister Street, there is a lengthy account of life at the University of Oxford, and it is frankly admitted that the institution has been captured by wealthy prigs and sporting men. This is not exactly a new discovery, for Gibbon, the great historian, described Oxford dons as being "sunk in prejudice and port," and Matthew Arnold has called the University "the home of lost causes." A university which expelled Shelley and canonised General Booth, has reason to boast that it is not for the common herd.

The clergy are boasting of the revival of religion owing to the War; but it is curious that in many leading articles in the press on the death of Field-Marshal Lord Roberts, hardly any reference was made to Christianity. Even the Times was purely Secularistic in tone, and all the great dailies echoed the same strain. It looks as if the clergy are making capital out of the compulsory attendance of troops at the official services.

It is given on the authority of a clergyman, or we should hardly have credited it. But from the British Weekly we learn, on the authority of the Scottish Chaplain with the Expeditionary Force in France, that a "universal question" with our men at the front is, "Do you think they'll be praying for us at home, Sir?" Of course, those who know soldiers intimately, realise that this is precisely the kind of thing they would be anxious about. And it is fortunate that the Scottish Chaplain is there to send home this cheerful message. For the secular correspondents have altogether failed to chronicle such an interesting piece of information.

The clergy of St. Paul's Cathedral have arranged to hold a twenty-hours' watch service on December 16, in preparation for the National Day of Intercession on January 3. This ought to be called a non-stop watch service.

Most of the "authorities" on a future life adopt the policy of "I have evidence," or "I am assured," or "I am convinced," all of which are interesting autobiographical items, but are not of much value otherwise. For it is not somebody else's convictions, but mine, that is required; not something that is evidence to another, but something that is evidence to me. Accordingly, we are not greatly affected by the assurance which Sir Oliver Lodge gave a South London audience the other day to the effect that a continued existence after death was a demonstrated truth. "I tell you," said Sir Oliver, "with all the strength of conviction which I can muster that the fact is so, that we do persist, that these people still take an interest in what is going on, that they still help us, and that they are able from time to time to communicate." All this may be so; but on the face of it all that these assertions actually prove is that Sir Oliver Lodge believes them to express the truth. This we are not inclined to question. We have never doubted his sincerity or his honesty; but honesty is no protection against blunders—in this connection it sometimes promotes their occurrence.

Digitized by Google

Sir Oliver Lodge says that "the survival of existence is scientifically proved by careful scientific investigation," that the evidence is recorded in the volumes of a scientific society—presumably the Psychical Research Society, and that those students "who have given most attention to it have gradually, and in the process of many years, come to agree that the proof has now become crucial." Every statement here admits of serious question. All students of psychical phenomena do not admit that conclusive proof of a future life has been found. Some may believe so, but many remain unconvinced. The survival of personal existence has not been "scientifically" proved—that is, unless we give to the word "scientific" a new and altogether arbitrary meaning. It may be, as Sir Oliver says, that "it is not for everybody to investigate everything," but it is the essence of a scientific investigation that its methods and results may be appreciated by the non-investigator of average ability and adequate education. We have never investigated many things that we take for granted from scientific teachers, but we understand the methods on which these teachers work, the steps of their calculations are there for all to study, and we see that their methods are satisfactory, and their conclusions agreeable to other scientists. But this is not the case with a future life. All those who investigate are not satisfied. Some challenge the "facts." Others admit the facts, but dispute the inferences therefrom. Others come to quite contradictory conclusions. Sir Oliver Lodge is quite justified in putting forward his belief in a future life, but it is his belief. He has no right to put forward the belief as scientifically demonstrated.

Sir Oliver Lodge has been protesting against the doctrine that the State is the "summit" of everything—that it is entitled to do what it pleases if it is conducive to its own benefit. We think that Sir Oliver, like many others, is confusing State with Government; but in the main we agree with his protest. But why does Sir Oliver Lodge call this doctrine "practical Atheism"? The first duty of a scientific man is to be exact, and this particular theory has about as necessary a connection with Atheism as Macedon has with Monmouth. Sir Oliver had of course in mind certain German writers, who, curiously enough, call themselves Christians, and who have a perfect right to call themselves such. One is not surprised at the ordinary theologian or journalist calling "practical Atheism" anything with which he disagrees, but it is a pity to find a leading scientific man falling—even momentarily—to the same level.

It is stated that the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church and the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches will have an "Intercession Sunday," in which they will follow the lead of the Government Religion in petitioning the Throne of Grace on behalf of the Allies. Pity the sorrows of a poor, old deity!

"God helps only those who help themselves" says the Daily Mail in a leading article recently. The sentiment is not original; but some of the Mail's pious readers may have demanded their ha'pennies back.

At a Thundersley (Essex) Brotherhood Meeting recently, the subject discussed was "How to Fight the Enemy," and a vocalist sang "A Dream of Paradise." Surely an ironic heaven!

The following exhortation has been written on the wall of a certain golf club-house where soldiers are billeted: "Think of Jonah! He came out all right." If he did, he must have been sicker than the whale.

There must be few thoughtful and unprejudiced observers who are not struck by the almost contemptible part played by the Christian Churches during the War. Quite powerless to prevent the outbreak of war, since then they have formed an obviously negligible quantity. No one pays any serious attention to what they say or do, and any help given to recruiting men for the Army could just as well have been given by the clergy as private individuals, and by the Churches as secular organisations. To reply that the Churches have supported the Government in pursuing the War is to say nothing. They have almost invariably supported every war, and that alone discounts the moral value of their support now. Moreover, the Churches of Germany and Austria have been equally keen in supporting their Governments; which also proves that from Christianity no genuine guidance is possible. The Christian Churches have no common message, and no common teaching, unless it be one of the rankest opportunism. The support of even a politician counts for more than the sanction of the Church, for the reason that one is more likely to get an independent opinion. Right or wrong, the Churches echo the opinion of the moment, in war as in other things.

This aspect of the matter evidently appeals very strongly to the Rev. E. Shillito, who, in the Christian World, laments that "Devotion to Christendom means little to-day, although once it was a motive powerful enough to stir the hearts of kings, statesmen, thinkers, poets, and all the master minds of Europe." Even so, it cannot be said that their Christianity made with any greater certainty for unity and peace. No matter how seriously the people of past ages took their religion, it did not prevent their conducting wars with far greater ferocity than even now. Mr. Shillito refers to the case of Mr. Gladstone, who, in pleading the cause of the Bulgarians and the Armenians, never forgot that "they were Christians, and as Christians were not the same as though they were outside Christ." Quite so; but Mr. Shillito overlooks the fact that in this instance there was a non-Christian Power to be attacked, and that will always whet the appetite of followers of the Prince of Peace.

Mr. Shillito asks, "Would it make any difference if half the nations in the arena were not Christian?" Perhaps not; but what difference has it made now that they are Christian? Did it delay their arming against each other for years before war actually broke out? Did it lead to a greater measure of trust between them? Was there a single Christian nation or statesman who depended upon Christianity as affording any guarantee of honorable dealing or of peaceful intention? Everyone knows to the contrary. Everyone knew that, should a critical occasion arise, the profession of a common Christian faith would not lie as a feather's weight in the balance. And everyone recognised also that the voice of the Church in Germany or Austria or England was only, as Mr. Shillito confesses, "a valuable adjunct to the semi-official press," voicing the official case in the language of piety.

The manner in which hatred against everything relating to Germany, Austria, and Turkey is finding expression is ludicrous. Soon we shall have children objecting to "German" sausage or the Christmas "Turkey."

There is a popular belief that the Czar of all the Russias has forbidden the sale of all alcohol throughout the War, but this is not so, for only vodka is barred. Wines and beers are still being drunk, but vodka is the national drink. So spirituous intoxication, no less than spiritual intoxication, is still within reach of the Russian people.

At a recent meeting of the London County Council Education Committee it was stated that nearly six hundred Territorials were attending French classes. They will be able to read M. Anatole France's stories in the original language.

For some years now the Chinese Government has been attempting to deal with the opium traffic—a traffic forced upon China by this country. In the native cities the opium dens have been closed; but now the Rev. Arnold Foster points out that the Municipal Council of the International Settlement outside Shangai has, while closing the recognised opium dens, largely increased the number of shops licensed for the sale of opium. The Council is made up of Europeans, the majority of whom are British. Under their rule the number of shops licensed to sell opium has increased from 87 in 1907 to 663 in 1914. The sale of the drug is now about twenty times as great as it was seven years ago. The Chinese are compelled to submit to this, but it will not fail to impress them with what Christian morality means in practice.

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £231 13s. Received since:—F. Lucas, £1 1s.; Newcastle Branch, N. S. S., 10s. 6d.; W. H. Hickes, £1 1s.; M. J. Charter, 10s.; Jersey, 10s.; T. T., 2s. 6d.; H. Courlander (S. Africa), 10s, 6d.; W. W., 2s.; Mrs. Borsby, 2s.; J. Wood (Winnipeg), 4s.

R. CAUDEN.—The address of the Secretary of the Birmingham Branch of the N. S. S. is Mr. J. Partridge, 245 Henstone-road, Rotton Park, Birmingham. We have noted the other matter. Thanks for cuttings, which are always acceptable.

F. LUCAS.—Acknowledged. We are not sure which of the papers received has been sent by you, but you will doubtless be able to trace it from some of the paragraphs in this week's issue.

W. D.—Thanks for paper, which we do not see regularly. The use of religious terms has a curious attraction for a certain order of mind, and that is all one can say about it.

H. G. FARMER.—Thanks for cutting. The comment is characteristic. It may be useful on some future occasion.

T. T. (Glasgow).—Regret delay in acknowledging subscription, which you will see has now been done.

A. R. WILLIAMS.—We do not think the Schoolmaster is correct in speaking of Mr. R. J. Campbell as having been a strong supporter of Secular Education. His help to the cause was never of a very strenuous character; and his decision that often having seen the effect of the German system, he would never again support the "relegation of religion to a subordinate place in the day-schools," shows that he understood neither Secular Education nor the German system. (1) The advocates of Secular Education do not wish to place religion in a subordinate place; they wish to exclude it altogether as a matter with which the State has no concern. (2) The "German system" has more religion in it than has our own; and one would have expected Mr. Campbell to see in this a reason for the exclusion of religion—if he were not a parson. (3) Men of strong principle and whose convictions are well founded do not change in this way because something has occurred with which they disagree. It is the attitude of mere sentimentality.

A. J. N.—Sorry we cannot find room.

G. H. (Liverpool).—We have had a copy of the leaflet you send. It appears to have been given away broadcast—which is probably the only method by which a circulation could be gained. Its author is scarcely worth any of our contributors bothering with.

J. ANON.—Hope we have got the acknowledgment correct.

J. W. REPTON.—Thanks for addresses. Copies will be sent as requested.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures this evening (November 29) in the Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate, Leicester. Admission is free, and we hope to hear that the Leicester folk will avail themselves of the opportunity.

Some excellent passages from an article by Mr. Romain Rolland appeared in the Daily News of a recent date. The title of the article from which the passages are taken is "Above the Battlefield." Mr. Rolland asks:—

> "Is our civilisation so solid that you do not fear to shake the pillars on which it rests? Can you not see that all falls in upon you if one column be shattered? Could you not have learned to love one another, or if that were impossible, at least to tolerate the great virtues and the great vices of the others? Was it not your duty to attempt—you have never attempted it in sincerity—to settle amicably the questions which divided you—the problem of peoples annexed against their will, the equitable division of productive labor and the riches of the world? Must the stronger for ever darken the others with the shadow of his pride and the others for ever unite to dissipate it? Is there no end to this bloody and puerile sport, in which the partners change about from century to century—no end, until the whole of humanity is exhausted thereby!"

"The leaders of thought," says Mr. Rolland, "the Church, the Labor parties did not desire war. That may be, but what did they do to prevent it? What are they doing to put an end to it? They are stirring up the bonfire, each one bringing his faggot. The striking feature in this monstrous epic, and one without any precedent, is the unanimity for war in each of the nations engaged."

This is, indeed, the most striking feature of the War, and the one with least promise of good for the future. It is a war for which no one will take the responsibility, and yet each displays a determination for war and for resistance, certainly unsurpassed, and probably unequalled on any previous conflict. Mr. Rolland well says:—

> "You Christians will say—and in this you seek consolation for having betrayed your Master's orders—that war exalts the virtue of sacrifice. And it is true that war has the privilege of bringing out the genius of the race in the most commonplace of hearts. It purges away, in its bath of blood, all dross and impurity; it tempers the metal of the soul; of a niggardly peasant, of a timorous citizen it can make a hero of Valmy. But is there no better employment for the devotion of one people than the devastation of another? Can we not sacrifice ourselves without sacrificing our neighbors as well? Many of you, I know, yield your own blood more readily than you shed that of others. But this is, in its essence, a weakness. For you who are undismayed by bullets and shrapnel yet tremble before the dictates of racial frenzy—that Moloch that stands higher than the Church of Christ.....You socialists on both sides claim to be defending liberty against tyranny—French liberty against the Kaiser, German liberty against the Czar. Would you defend one despotism against another? Unite and make war on both."

This is finely said, even though many may think this is not the time to say it with profit. With these we do not agree. It can never be right for those who see the insensate folly of war to sacrifice the future of the race to the madness of the moment. The duty of speech rests with those who see, now and always.

Miss Kough is lecturing for the Kingston Humanitarian Society this evening (November 29). Her subject is "A Christian War," and the meeting will be held in the Fife Hall, Fife-road, at 7 p.m. Freethinkers in the neighborhood should make a note of the meeting, and make it a point to be present.

There is nothing so difficult to eradicate as superstition. One may keep hammering away at it year after year, only to find at the end that the form only has been affected. And the amount of superstition current in even educated circles is a source of ever-recurring astonishment to students of the more obscure phases of sociology. We were reminded of this by a paragraph we came across the other day, pointing out that there is still in existence a number of followers of Joanna Southcote. Joanna Southcote died just about a hundred years ago, after establishing a religious sect who believed that she would give birth to the Messiah. A large number of people actually accepted the truth of the prophecy, but Joanna died without the marvel coming to pass, and her death was certified as due to dropsy. Still, the majority of her followers clung to the sect she had founded, and after a century it is not yet extinct. Those who ponder a fact of this description, in an age of newspapers and books and education, will cease to wonder at the prevalence of such a superstition as Christianity in earlier ages, and the difficulty of eradicating it once it is firmly established.

THE EVANGELICAL PULPIT.

In the face of physical science, of modern Biblical criticism, and of all the light which history and comparative mythology have of late years thrown on the genesis of religions, the old theory of verbal inspiration, the old methods of Biblical interpretation, and the old pre-scientific conception of a world governed by perpetual acts of supernatural interference, still hold their ground in the Evangelical pulpit. The incursions of erudite science have been met by the barrier of an invincible prejudice—by the belief, sedulously inculcated from childhood, that what are termed orthodox opinions are essential to salvation, and that doubt, and every course of inquiry that leads to doubt, should be avoided as a crime. It is a belief which is not only fatal to habits of intellectual honesty and independence in those who accept it, but is also a serious obstacle in the path of those who do not. The knowledge that many about him will regard any deviation from the traditional cast of opinions as the greatest of calamities and crimes seldom fails, according to the disposition of the inquirer, to drive him into hypocritical concealments, or into extreme and exaggerated bitterness.—W. E. Lecky.

Digitized by Google

Christian Apologetics.

THE REV. Z. B. WOFFENDALE.

SOME time ago mention was made in this journal of the Rev. Z. B. Woffendale having been criticised by the late J. M. Wheeler, when sub-editor of the Freethinker. Of this matter I have no knowledge; but, somewhere near the time referred to, chance threw in my way a copy of a Christian Evidence periodical of which the reverend gentleman named was co-editor. In that issue was an article entitled "Agnostic Rationalism," in which the following statements were made: "Agnostic Rationalism is one of the latest and weakest developments of Infidelity. .....The methods of the Agnostic Rationalist, like those of his Atheist brother, are exceedingly unfair. .....This is the way in which he foolishly reasons about miracles: he takes the so-called impositions, counterfeits, and impostures of mythological, Pagan, and mediæval times, and treats these fictions as if they bore an exact resemblance to the miracles recorded in the New Testament, and as if they were analogous to the real miracle of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ." Then followed "the evidences" for the genuineness of the last-named miracle.

Being at that time a reader, and occasional contributor, of the Agnostic Journal, I wrote an article of three columns upon those "evidences" in that journal —to which the Rev. Woffendale afterwards replied in his own paper. These wonderful "evidences" I now give in the reverend gentleman's own words. He said:—

> "The evidences for the truth, genuineness, and reality of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ are colored down, hidden away, or conveniently ignored by the Agnostic Rationalist, and yet for Christ's Resurrection there is overwhelming testimony. There is first the witness of the honest doubter, Thomas, who would not believe until he saw with his own eyes, heard with his own ears, and touched the risen Christ with his own hands, and who, when this cumulative evidence was given, confessed Christ at once and his divinity. There is the testimony, secondly, of John, whose character for truthfulness no breath of suspicion has ever marred. There is the honest testimony, thirdly, of the Apostles, who were also eye and ear and hand witnesses to his Calvary wounds and risen bodily condition.....There is the witness, fourthly, of the Sacraments, the monumental institution of the Lord's Supper, and Christian baptism. And, fifthly, there is the recurrence every week of the commemoration of his Resurrection in the permanent establishment of the Lord's Day. And, sixthly, there is the existence to this day of the Christian Church, which has been founded and built up upon the miracle of Christ's Resurrection.....The Agnostic Rationalism which ignores God and denies miracles is but another phase of that pernicious Infidelity which rests upon little knowledge, shallow thinking, and weak reasoning."

The foregoing "arguments" are neither better nor worse than those used by Christian apologists in the present decade. My remarks upon them in the article mentioned—which I give verbatim, though somewhat abbreviated—were as follows:—

1. Without going into the question of the reality of the alleged resurrection of Jesus Christ, I will briefly examine the evidence adduced for it by Mr. Woffendale. First, we are told, there is "the witness of the honest doubter, Thomas."....But where is this testimony? Did Thomas leave a written statement, attested, say, by two or three persons of proved honesty, affirming his recognition of the resurrected Jesus? No; we have nothing from the hand of Thomas—not a single line. This vaunted testimony turns out to be nothing more than an unauthenticated anecdote related of this apostle in the Fourth Gospel (xx. 26—29)—one, too, of which Matthew, Mark, and Luke appear never to have heard. In other words, we have but the unsupported statement of the writer of the Fourth Gospel—who, without a particle of evidence, is assumed to be the apostle John—that Thomas saw and recognised his risen Master. Hence, in stating that we have the "witness" of Thomas to the resurrection of Jesus, the Rev. Z. B. Woffendale deliberately "misleads the unwary and the less intelligent" of his readers.

2. Next, says the rev. gentleman, there is the testimony of the apostle John, "whose character for truthfulness no breath of suspicion has ever marred." This statement proves that Mr. Woffendale either knows nothing of, or wilfully ignores, the facts most firmly established by Biblical criticism. He has apparently never perceived that the Jesus of the Fourth Gospel is a totally different person, both in language and actions, to the Jesus of the Synoptics. .....Again, we have no evidence that the Fourth Gospel was written within a hundred years of the alleged "Resurrection."....We have thus presumptive evidence that the anecdote recorded of "the honest doubter Thomas" is fictitious.....Here, again, the rev. gentleman "misleads the unwary."

3. Thirdly, says Mr. Woffendale, "there is the honest testimony of the apostles." Now, the twelve apostles are said to have been: Peter, Andrew, James, John, Philip, Bartholomew, Thomas, Matthew, another James, Thaddæus, Simon the Zealot, and Judas Iscariot. Where are we to look for the "honest testimony" of these? Where are we to look for any testimony of these twelve men? There are, it is true, some apocryphal Gospels written in the names of apostles; but these are admitted to be forgeries. Where is the "witness" of Andrew, Philip, Bartholomew, Thomas, Thaddæus, Simon, or Judas Iscariot? As a matter of fact, we have no testimony which can truthfully be affirmed to be that of apostles.....But assuming, for the sake of argument, that the writings attributed to Peter, James, John, Jude, and Matthew were the work of apostles, in not a single one of them does the writer say that he had himself beheld the risen Jesus. Here, once more, the Rev. Z. B. Woffendale "misleads the unwary."

4. Fourthly, says this Christian advocate, "there is the witness of the sacraments—Baptism and the so-called "Lord's Supper." Now, the rev. gentleman ought to know that neither of these "sacraments" was originated by Jesus Christ; the early Christians took them from Paganism. But, assuming that both were actually instituted by Jesus, this fact in no way proves that personage to have been miraculously raised from the dead. Here we have a sample of what Mr. Woffendale asserts to be a characteristic of "pernicious Infidelity"—"shallow thinking and weak reasoning"—though the reverend gentleman's utterances might more correctly be described as random statements made without thinking at all.

5. Fifthly, says our great authority, there is "the permanent establishment of the Lord's Day." Now, it is true that in some second century documents we are told that Christians met by preference on the first day of the week, because on that day their "Lord" had risen from the dead. But this proves nothing more than the existence of stories similar to those at the end of the Gospels. It certainly does not show the alleged resurrection to have been an actual fact.....We have thus another example of "shallow thinking and weak reasoning."

6. Sixthly, says Mr. Woffendale, "there is the existence to this day of the Christian Church." A Christian Church, it is true, exists "to this day"; but this Church is not that which is alleged to have been founded by Jesus Christ. The original Jewish Church (that of the Nazarenes) lingered through three or four centuries, and then died a natural death. The existing Gentile Church was founded by Paul, who never beheld Jesus at all, and who simply believed the resurrection story.....It is therefore untrue that the existing Christian Church was founded on the reality of the alleged resurrection of Jesus.....Will Mr. Woffendale say that the existence "to this day" of the Mohammedan Church, or that of the Latter Day Saints, proves the genuineness of the revelations alleged to have been made to Mohammed or to Joe Smith? If he cannot, why does he endeavor to "mislead the unwary" of his flock by such "shallow thinking and weak reasoning"?

To some portions of the foregoing criticisms Mr. Woffendale replied in his own paper; but I soon saw that such a discussion was a farce: for his readers read nothing of my reply save a sentence here and there which he quoted for refutation, and this was done in the usual Christian Evidence fashion—by brag and bluster. At the end of the first instalment of his reply he boasted that he had made his Agnostic antagonist "bite the dust, where for the present we leave him." At the end of his second, he said that "the champion Philistine of Agnostic Infidelity has been fairly met, completely unhorsed, and left sprawling." I have only space here to illustrate this gentleman's replies by that relating to his first witness to the resurrection of Jesus—"the honest doubter Thomas."

> "Abracadabra's argument (!) is, that as 'we have nothing from the hand of Thomas,' therefore the scene and the event narrated by the writer of the Fourth Gospel concerning Christ and Thomas never took place.

Digitized by Google

.....In any law court where the laws of evidence rule, such reasoning would be scouted and laughed to scorn. .....The crooked methods of Abracadabra are as blameworthy as they are shallow, unscholarly, fallacious, and misleading."

One portion of my reply to the foregoing—I have not space for the whole—reads as follows:—

Let us imagine for a moment a scene in accordance with Mr. Woffendale's notions of evidence. "Call the first witness—John," says the magistrate. Thereupon the apostle named steps jauntily into the witness-box, and states that he saw the risen Jesus on each of the occasions recorded in his book, after the alleged resurrection. "Call the next witness—Thomas," says the magistrate. Thereupon John again enters the witness-box, and reads the little incident he had fabricated about Thomas and the nail-marks. "Call the third witness—Peter," says the magistrate. Then John, for the third time, goes into the witness-box, and reads the little story he had invented about the resurrected Jesus telling Peter to feed his sheep and his lambs (xxi. 15—17). "That will do," says the magistrate; "We have now heard the testimony of three unimpeachable witnesses to the undoubted reality of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. The fact, all will allow, is now firmly established."

This kind of court is known only to the Rev. Z. B. Woffendale; the others, "where the laws of evidence rule," are unanimous in rejecting all hearsay evidence.

The rev. gentleman's answers to my replies numbered 4, 5, and 6, are given in the following sentence:—

"That Christian Baptism, the Lord's Supper, the Lord's Day, and the Christian Church have been, and still are, four standing and impregnable monuments to the truth, the fact, and the reality of the resurrection of Jesus Christ."

These "monuments," as already shown, yield no testimony to the reality of the alleged Resurrection. Not one of the arguments there advanced has been in the slightest degree shaken. My opponent merely reiterated his former assertions. Everyone with a grain of sense will, of course, see that these "memorials" of the early Christian Church do not touch the historicity of the alleged Resurrection at all. They simply tend to prove that the Gospel resurrection stories were believed—by a later generation of Christians.

ABRACADABRA.

The Condemned Denominational Schools in London.

IT is now ten years since, on the destruction of the late London School Board, the L. C. C. became the education authority for London, and took over not only the control and support of the Board Schools but also the support, and a very small part of the management, of the Denominational Schools. These latter schools, in common with other Denominational Schools throughout the country, were henceforth to be known as "Non-Provided Schools."

The Clerical Schools, in which little children were taught, in too many cases by sweated teachers, "the faiths of their fathers," were, according to the supporters of the Denominational system, in a very bad way. Nothing seemed to be sound about them except the "atmosphere." The Government Grants alone did not suffice to meet the "intolerable strain," of which, prior to that great triumph of clericalism, the destruction of the School Boards, ecclesiastical authorities made such piteous complaints. However, Fabian and other politicians assured us, that when once Government Grants were supplemented by rate-aid, the Denominational Schools would soon become equal to the best of the Board Schools which had grown up under public control.

How far that hope has been realised may be seen in a L. C. C. report for May 26 (No. 33), in which, covering some forty pages, are the facts concerning 124 Denominational Schools in London, which have a total accommodation of 54,545 scholars, and which have been condemned by the Board of Education. The report reveals a mean, sordid condition of things to which every Rationalist should help in giving the fullest publicity. For we have to remember that the ecclesiastical forces behind those schools are powerful by reason of great wealth, patronage, and high political influence. Speaking with an intimate knowledge of education politics, gained as a member of the late London School Board and also as a pronounced Anti-Clerical education propagandist in the Trade Union movement, I say deliberately, that no self-respecting Rationalist can at this time afford to withhold his help, in building up the strong public opinion necessary to compel the Board of Education and the L. C. C. to insist upon the managers of the 124 condemned Denominational Schools fulfilling the obligations from which even the clerical legislation of 1902 and 1903 has not freed them, viz., the provision of suitable school buildings in place of the disgraceful, and in some cases, positively disgusting, schools which, as shown in the official report mentioned above, constitute so foul a disgrace to London.

In thirteen of those schools there are no playgrounds whatever, and no adequate provision can be made for physical exercises and recreation. One of these is the Girls' School of St. Mary Magdalene, Paddington, which, in the Church Review, December, 1901, was held up for admiration because of the managers' boast that "many a little Dissenter has been taught the Catholic faith in these walls." (The faith, it will be observed, of other children's fathers!) The report shows that in other schools also, playground accommodation is miserably limited. One reads of more than one case in which the infant classes go by turns for play into tiny yards containing the offices. In one case a boys' urinal is five feet from a classroom window; in another, the offices open direct from an infants' classroom. In one school which rejoices in the name of the Holy Family, "The boys spend the school recreation time in the street, the girls in the corridor or in the offices." These offices are stated to be "too near the school, and an unpleasant smell at times pervades the corridor." Surely a case for a cartoon, with apologies to Raphael! In one case the number of closets work out at one for forty children, and in another at one for sixty.

In one school, the boys, in order to reach their own offices, pass those set apart for the girls, "and the door between the two set of offices cannot be kept locked." Men and women teachers in one school use the same W.C.

A girls' school "on the first floor of another building is approached by a single wooden stairway with numerous turns"—a veritable death-trap in case of panic, through fire, or any other cause. Darkness on account of the close proximity of high buildings is common, and in some cases we find that classrooms are dark because the church is so near.

One reads again and again of structural defects, bad lighting, and bad ventilation. The infant schools are specially deserving of condemnation, and often one's heart goes out in pity—and in shame—for the poor little ones whom we are leaving to pay so high a price for the privilege of being taught—at the public expense—the "faiths of their fathers."

In connection with the report on the condemned schools, mention should be made of the service rendered by Mr. J. King, M.P., who, in June last, by a series of searching questions to the Minister of Education, brought some of the sordid facts of the case to the notice of the House of Commons. Thanks are also due to the quiet but highly effective work done by the National Education Association, an organisation which, in the past, has rendered excellent service in the cause of popular control of education.

It is, however, disappointing to be obliged to state that, although the facts concerning the condemned schools have for many months been widely known in Socialist and Trade Unionist circles, the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress, the Labor Party Executive, and the London Trades Council have taken no action. The same applies to the various Socialist organisations; for no Socialist paper, and no Socialist leader has given any lead on the subject.

Digitized by Google

A significant silence on this scandal also marked two important Education Conferences, each extending over several days, and held at the London University soon after the publication of the official report on the condemned schools. The first, held in May, was under the auspices of the Victoria League; the second, in July, was under the joint auspices of the Theosophical Society, the Education Group of the Fabian Society, and the Ratan Pata Foundation.

The National War Emergency Committee also, formed at the commencement of the War, while declaring that public bodies should set on foot works of public utility as one means of meeting the difficulty of unemployment, has not yet called upon the wealthy ecclesiastical bodies behind the condemned schools to replace them by up-to-date school buildings. However, many earnest members of the rank and file of the organised workers are at work, and in many branches of Trade Unions this great public scandal is being discussed. Ere long, no doubt, the leaders, yielding to pressure from below, will take action; and let us hope that a strong representation will be made to the L. C. C. and the Board of Education, that all municipal and imperial financial support shall be withdrawn from those schools, until the managers are definitely pledged at once to take the necessary steps for rebuilding them and for providing adequate playground accommodation. If the law compels us to tolerate and support Denominational Schools, we can at least see to it that the children are not put off with school buildings of the "cheap and nasty" variety.

M. BRIDGES ADAMS.

The Gardener.

TAKE a map of England. Select half-a-dozen of the areas upon it most sparsely supplied with the names of towns. Of these bare spots choose the barest, and stick a pin right in the middle of it. If you have followed the directions accurately your pointer should now be sticking right into the church spire of the most isolated village in the land.

Clumpton-in-the-Woods (probably so called on account of the fact that it is bounded on three sides by bare hills and on the fourth side by a small group of fir-trees) is the only village in England where a delectable stupidity has not been assailed by town-made "smartness," and where a reputation for being "up to date" is not classified among the virtues. Its inhabitants are as law-abiding as angels. Only a scarcity of pasturage or an epidemic among the stock can agitate the tranquillity which covers them like a garment. Clumpton possesses but one motor-car, and beats all England for the number of its natives who have never been out of the county.

With the owner of the only motor-car—the hamlet's medical attendant—I recently stayed for a week's rest. One warm, sunny afternoon, which certainly belonged to mid-March but had somehow contrived to get itself into early November, I started out for a leisurely walk with the intention of passing through the village and on to the moor beyond. At the end of "The Street"—correctly called "The" street, for there is but one, and incorrectly called "Street," for it is no more like a street than a camel is like a cow—there stood a cottage, old, but with a trim exterior, and surrounded by flower gardens from which the sunshine of a coming June will doubtless call forth a prodigality of perfume and color. Half an acre or so of garden at the side of the dwelling was devoted to the culture of vegetables.

On the side of the road, its work evidently done for the day, stood the vehicle by which the crops from this plot were conveyed for sale to the villagers—a most curiously wrought kind of van, which appeared to have been originally designed for some totally different purpose, and to have had odd little pegs and shelves superadded as necessity compelled invention to provide additional accommodation. A pair of tarred wooden doors or gates, wide enough to admit this vehicle, formed the entrance to the vegetable garden; and upon these gates, which were closed, the following announcement, written in chalk, attracted my attention:—

> "NOW is the time for fruit trees to be pruned and sprayed, they must be attended to if Good Crop Required. Why do we prune. because theres always a lot of bad wood to be cut away same as little children —why do we spraye because trees have ENEMYS Like Man and its best to kill them whil in there yoth. we do this work by the HOUR. DAY. or WEEK.
>
> Prune and spray
> Thats the way > and Dont forget to pray > for Fruit Some Day."

Here followed two chalk drawings, quite up to the standard of the letterpress. They represented young trees, and were described respectively as "pruned" and "not pruned." Underneath the whole appeared the signature of the proprietor.

Over the hedge I could see a man operating upon some gooseberry bushes with a knife. Judging him to be the "we" of the announcement, I determined to make his acquaintance. The chalk advertisement indicated a combination of modern enterprise and native philosophy rarely met with, and very surprising indeed in Clumpton; and its author, I concluded, would be worth knowing. So with that disregard of convention which the countryside expects, I opened the gate and bade him good day.

"You're busy," I said.

"'Ave to be," he replied, laconically.

"But isn't this your slow season?" I asked. "I thought gardeners had their holidays in the winter."

"Always plenty to do in a garden," he replied. "Never need stan' still. If you ain't doin' one thing you be doin' another. There's a sowin' time and a reapin' time, same as in the Kingdom."

I felt sure I was not mistaken. This was the author of the advertisement.

"And this," I said, "is pruning time? What advantage will those trees derive from your labors? Will they bear more fruit next year?"

"There 'ere be young uns," he returned. "Put 'em in last month. And they won't bear no frut 'tall next year. Want to git a firm standin' first. Can't rut and frut too, so I lets 'em rut. If a tree fruits first year all its strength goes, like a baby suckin' at a woman's breast."

I said "I see," though I didn't quite see the analogy he had intended to draw.

"Yours is a skilled profession," I added. "It must take many years to learn what is best for all the various plants you rear."

"Same as in the Kingdom," he replied quickly. "There's only one door, but there's a many ways leadin' to it. And you can't bring 'em all along the same one. Some 'as to be drove, some persuaded, and some carried. Which way did you come into the Kingdom, Mister?"

This unexpected and somewhat inconvenient question was accompanied by an unexpected and inconvenient a look. Until now I had seen the gardener's face only by portions, as he dodged around the bushes, bending at his work. But as he put this question he drew himself upright and looked full at me out of a pair of small, black, deep set, and very penetrating eyes. Shaggy black eyebrows and a beard of the same color contrived between them to leave very little of his face hairless.

I hesitated somewhat to answer his question, and he repeated, still watching me closely:—

"Which way did you come in?"

"Oh, I was driven in," I said, invoking the useful Catholic doctrine of mental reservation to add under my breath—"And I have been persuaded out!"

The gardener ejaculated "Ah!" as he bent again to his task, a little downcast, I thought, at finding me within the fold and so being deprived of a possible capture. He talked again, however, when, after remarking how stunted and unsightly the pruning left the trees, I added that no doubt his experience and skill were directing him aright in spite of appearances.

Digitized by Google

"Best to take 'em young," he replied. "They'll be all the better for it arterwards." Then, evidently calling to mind the chalk effort on the gate, he added, "Same as little children. Sunday-school's the place to prune. We cuts 'em and we trims 'em like—like—like—" he hesitated, and finally decided—"like a barber."

It occurred to me that a barber, though operating on the heads of so many others, is quite incapable of attending to his own, and I wondered whether this gardener, evidently at home when working at the juveniles, ever submitted his own spiritual adornments to the trimming and pruning of any experienced craftsman.

I found he would talk freely under a little encouragement. And his conversation was original and instructive. He knew exactly where the pruning-knife should be applied to "little children," and where reabouts in the "Word" the instructions on this matter are laid down. He understood human nature as thoroughly as he understood gardening; and he knew as much about God as Darwin knew about pigeons. Every process employed in his profession—even to the application of "dung" to the growing and fire to the useless—he applied to the life of man, with a view to the production of fruit and the glory of "our Lordun Savior." And he was full of metaphor. His figures were a little cloudy sometimes—as when he declared in reference to the liming of fruit trees that "there's something be'ind everything"—and his intended analogies appeared at times to be not strictly analogous—as when he endeavored to institute a comparison between the inverted pots of bay on dahlia stakes and the Sunday-school treat. But his total lack of self-consciousness was reassuring, and his undeniable conviction atoned for his obscurity.

It was well he was ready to do the talking, for if I had played any other part than that of audience, I doubt if I could have satisfied him that I was really and truly "within the fold." For he was very exacting. He drew rigid lines—good and bad, piety and sin, faith and unbelief, were as clearly differentiated in his mind as roses and cabbages. Beyond putting a few leading questions, therefore, I preferred to listen. I gleaned a few hints for the better cultivation of my garden, and many for the expansion of "the Kingdom." When the time for my departure arrived he was buried in the subject of pansy cuttings—on which theme he was particularly expository, showing in a truly wonderful manner how the life of the pansy illustrates the "Life to Come."

I was wondering how I should break the thread of his metaphysics and get myself away, when a husky voice called from the house—

"Jim!"

Both "Jim" and I turned round. The former's wife (as I judged) was standing in the doorway of the cottage with a ragged girl of some twelve or fourteen years at her side.

"'Ere's Jinny Bell. Bin sent from the sewin' meetin' to know whether you've mended them there 'ymn books yit."

I took this opportunity of wishing my companion good-day, and as I passed out of the gate my eye caught a notice-board nailed about ten feet up the trunk of a tree. Painted in white on a ground of black, I read:—

> "Christans meet Hear. every Sabbath, to remember the Lords Death in the Braking Off Bread."

My visit was to terminate before the next "Braking Off Bread," or I should certainly have joined the company of good "Christans" in that sacrament. If the gardener was a fair work-a-day sample, what a rare treat would a gathering of such provide on the "Sabbath"!

R. NORTH.

JESTS FROM THE COLONEL.

A meeting between Knox and Calvin is like a dialogue between a pestilence and a famine, or a conversation between a block and an axe.

Many people are religious when they have dyspepsia. An absolute specific for that disease would be the hardest blow the Church has received.

It is hard to make a lie stand always. A lie will not fit a fact. It will only fit another lie made for the purpose.

A greenback, unless you have the gold behind it, is no more a dollar than a bill-of-fare is a dinner.

Homes make patriots, and few men will shoulder a musket to defend a boarding-house.

In the name of universal benevolence Christians have hated their fellow men.

Hope is the only universal liar who never loses his reputation for veracity.

Keep your word with your own children as you would with your banker.

Show a sanguine man an egg, and instantly the air is full of feathers.

Custom meets us at the cradle and leaves us only at the tomb.

All progress for centuries has consisted in repealing laws.

The infidels of one age have been the saints of the next.

Nothing is so egoistic as ignorance.

—Col. R. G. Ingersoll.

RELIGIOUS IDEALS.

The ideas of religion among the lower classes of men are intimately associated with—if, indeed, they have not originated from—the condition of man during sleep; and especially from dreams. Sleep and death have always been regarded as nearly related to one another. Thus, in classical mythology, Somnus, the god of sleep, and Mors, the god of death, were both fabled to have been the children of Nox, the goddess of night. So, also, the savage would look on death as a kind of sleep, and would expect and hope—hoping on even against hope—to see his friend awake from the one as he had often done from the other. Hence, probably, one reason for the great importance ascribed to the treatment of the body after death.

But what happens to the spirit during sleep? The body lies lifeless, and the savage, not unnaturally, concludes that the spirit has left it. In this he is confirmed by the phenomena of dreams, and, consequently, to the savage, they have a reality and an importance which we can scarcely appreciate. During sleep the spirit appears to desert the body; and, as in our dreams we seem to visit other countries and distant regions while the body remains, as it were, lifeless, the two phenomena were naturally placed side by side, and regarded as the complements one of the other. Hence the savage considers the events in his dreams when he is awake, and hence he naturally feels that he has a spirit which can quit the body, if not when it likes, at least under certain circumstances.—Sir John Lubbock.

THE TANGLE OF THE TRINITY.

One God there is from old Judee,
One God alone, not one in three,
Who was, and is, and aye shall be—
The Bible says so.

Three gods there are from old Judee,
Not one alone, but One in three,
Who were, and are, and aye shall be—
God's book says so.

No man can ever live and see
This awful God from old Judee;
The sight the mortal's death would be—
The Bible says so.

In perfect safety men did see
This awful God from old Judee,
And spoke with him, as you with me—
God's book says so.

Affirm, deny, that A is C,
That black is white, that one is three;
You must be right, whate'er it be—
The Bible says so.

—G. L. Mackenzie.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

KINGSTON HUMANITARIAN SOCIETY (Fife Hall, Fife-road): 7, Miss K. B. Kough, "A Christian War."

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—MISS E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6¾ ins. by 8¾ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra.
Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.
Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 81 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be base on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

GILES' APOSTOLIC RECORDS. Price 3s., postage 5d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d. (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 49 SUNDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Man's intellect only is immortal and bequeathed unimpaired to posterity.—WILLIAM HAZLITT.

The Kaiser at Jerusalem.

[Reprinted from the Freethinker, 1898.]

EMPEROR WILLIAM is perhaps the most pious monarch in Europe. His father was somewhat tainted with Freethought, as well as inclined towards Liberalism in politics—if the two do not always go together. But there is none of this nonsense about William. He never speaks of his father, at least in public. He prefers to forget that unfortunate link in the Hohenzollern chain. His ideal is his grandfather and namesake, the first William; that pious and pipe-clayey old gentleman, for whom Bismarck supplied brains, foresight, and timely resolution. William has a tremendous belief in the efficacy of the Christian religion, particularly as an invisible but powerful support of the Hohenzollern throne. He says prayers at home and on board his yacht. He has even preached in the absence of a professional exhorter. Still more exemplary, if possible, is the piety of his wife. The Empress has devoted much of her time and means to the cause of religion. She had added considerably to the number of churches in Berlin. What she cannot do is to fill them. The people of Berlin are not churchgoers. They prefer spending Sunday in the beer-gardens, listening to good music, instead of being shut up in a dismal house of God, and undergoing dreary discourses about the day of judgment and the wrath to come.

One result of William's piety, however, is that religion is rather more ostentatious in Germany than it used to be, and Freethought a little less exuberant. The old law of blasphemy has of late years been frequently enforced, and several Freethinkers have been fined and imprisoned for saying what is thought by one-half of the whole male population of Germany. Still worse is it in respect to the law against "insulting the Emperor." No such sensitive vanity as William's has occupied a throne since the days of Nero. It is not safe to doubt his being as great a poet as Goethe, as great a musician as Beethoven, as great a soldier as Napoleon, or as handsome as the Apollo Belvedere. Hundreds of men have been imprisoned for speaking of him with what is called a want of proper respect. Loyalty in king-deluded Germany—as Shelley styled it—must be more than negative; it must be positive, or it becomes *dis*loyalty. Some years ago the editor of the principal comic paper in Berlin was sent to gaol for a mild satire on William's declaration that only Christians could be good soldiers. The shades of Alexander and Julius Cæsar—pre-Christian warriors, and of Napoleon and Frederick the Great—both sceptics, were simply made to smile at this imperial utterance. William cultivates the high and mighty attitude. I am Sir Oracle, and when I ope my lips let no dog bark! It is almost a case of "me and my God." He likes to fill the stage and monopolise the footlights, and woe betide anyone who is caught grinning.

It was only natural that pious William should desire to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and see the various spots that were hallowed by the real or imaginary feet of Jesus Christ and his twelve Apostles—including, alas, the mercenary and miserable Judas; after whose death, we suppose, the Master had to perambulate the country afresh before ascending, in order to reconsecrate the aforesaid spots, just as a church has to be reconsecrated after it has been desecrated by a suicide. William set out on this glorious expedition with his wife, a large escort, and a heavy baggage, which taxed the powers of the largest railway engine. The King of Heaven visited Palestine, via Bethlehem, in a far less striking fashion; creeping in, so to speak, through a stable in the company of camels and jackasses. But the King of Prussia cannot cut such an ignominous figure. He goes with pomp and ceremony. Instead of having one poor garment, like Jesus Christ, he has a large assortment of costumes, some of which are specially designed for this pilgrimage. It is said that he has been photographed in one suit, in no less than forty different positions. This is an exhibition of modesty that could not be paralleled from the lives of mere Pagan rulers, such as Julius Cæsar, Augustus, Vespasian, Titus, Trajan, Antoninus, and Marcus Aurelius. Those benighted emperors did not understand the philosophy of the wardrobe. They labored under the heathen prejudice that their duty was to live simply and devote themselves to the welfare of their people. No doubt they would smile at William's photographs, but this only shows their backward and un-Christian state of moral cultivation.

There is, however, one touch of low comedy in this high imperial enterprise. William was taken round Palestine by Mr. Cook, and the great German Emperor sank into a personally-conducted excursionist. Of course it is all for the best, but it is rather grotesque. We should have imagined that the Archangel Gabriel—the elegant personage who made that delicate announcement to Mary—would be proud to descend from heaven once more, in order to show Emperor William round the old haunts of the leaders of the first Salvation Army.

Egypt was to have been visited en route, but the opportune discovery was made of an Anarchist plot to assassinate Emperor William, who is thus relieved from the difficult task of comporting himself so as to avoid offending either England or France. No doubt the Anarchist plot was real, but perhaps there is more substance in the problem of Fashoda.

But the imperial pilgrim has not missed Constantinople. He has "done" the sights of that incomparably situated metropolis. He has seen what it is that Russia aspires to possess. He has been cheered by Turkish soldiers, who were probably paid a month's back salary for shouting. He has helped the Sultan to spend half a million of money. He has dined with "the Great Assassin." He has allowed his wife to go about arm-in-arm with "Abdul the Damned." He has exchanged cordial civilities—nay, fraternal greetings—with the man whose hands are red beyond all cleansing with Christian blood—red enough to incarnadine the multitudinous seas.

This is piety! This is diplomacy! This is Christian statesmanship! Emperor William forgets the poor Armenians. He has no thought for the men who were massacred, the wives who were outraged and then tortured to death, the girls who were polluted and left to bear their moral agony. What are these things in the great game of international politics? Germany stood aside cynically while England, France, Russia, and Italy took charge of the Cretan question. But the Turks at Candia made the fatal mistake of killing some English soldiers and sailors; which put Admiral Noel's back up, and in he went with his ultimatum and his watch in his hand—the finest sight in those parts for a long while; and, oh irony, while William and Abdul were fraternising at Constantinople that English admiral was just settling the Cretan question, with the cordial co-operation of his brother salts of the three other fleets.

Digitized by Google

We rather like the good old sailor methods: shipshape, up to time, no damned nonsense. Had the four Admirals been given a free hand, they would have settled the Cretan question many years ago. They didn't understand the tricks of diplomacy, but they had common sense, and they knew that the one indispensable thing to be done was to clear out the Turkish garrisons and disarm the whole population.

But let us get back to Emperor William at Constantinople, where we left him while we dashed off to Crete. We have not mentioned that the Empress visited the Sultan's harem, and was welcomed by the particular lady who is called the Sultana, the other ladies being discreetly ignored. William was not privileged to accompany her. Had he done so, he would probably have investigated the establishment more thoroughly, in order to see what comparison it bore to Solomon's—the wisest fool that ever lived, the gentleman who had seven hundred wives and (as Ingersoll says) three hundred other ladies he was acquainted with.

Emperor William had a "high old time" at Constantinople, and he and the Sultan made a good impression upon each other. Semi-official Turkish journals sang the Kaiser's praises lustily. Barring their own Padishah, he was certainly the greatest man in the world—strong, brave, and manly, highly accomplished and universally informed, a mighty ruler of men by genius and cultivation; indeed, a perfect miracle of statesmanship. Semi-official German papers have said much the same of the Sultan, in whom they detect surprising resemblances to the Kaiser—a compliment which we hope the latter appreciates at its full value.

Leaving the Sultan's capital with the Empress, who was loaded with costly presents—paid for, God knows how!—Emperor William set sail in his gigantic yacht for the Holy Land. This part of the world has had more lies told about it than any other, and the Kaiser is bound to be somewhat disillusioned after seeing it for himself. It is, as Gibbon sneered, of about the size and fertility of Wales; yet it once supported at least three million Jews, and seven other nations mightier than they—that is to say, between twenty-four and thirty millions of people, at the very lowest estimate. Its inhabitants, too, were wonderful warriors. They thought nothing of killing a hundred thousand of the enemy before breakfast. In one battle they killed as many as six hundred thousand—more than twice as many as the whole military force of Great Britain in every part of her empire. When a census was taken, if we may judge by the story of Christ's birth in Luke, all the Jews took to tramping, and the roads of the Holy Land swarmed with men, women, and children, all making tracks for their native towns and villages. This was the very perfection of clumsiness, but the Jews were naturally awkward at that particular business. They never quite got over their national fright on the occasion of the first census in their history, when Jehovah slew seventy thousand of them to commemorate the event. Such a divine visitation was enough to addle their wits in this direction. The shrewdest of them turned imbeciles when they heard the fatal word "census."

Railways and other modern innovations have considerably revolutionised the Holy Land. It would startle Jesus Christ and the twelve apostles—even including Judas, who was fairly fly—if they were to come to life again and hear the train guards shouting "Through for Jerusalem" or "Change here for Jericho." But we understand that the country still retains its old character for the opposite of cleanliness. Jerusalem itself is no exception to the general rule. Mark Twain searched in vain for the pool of Bethesda, and finally concluded that it was all over the Holy City, for the mud was two feet deep everywhere. And who does not remember the story of the man who declined to believe the story of Noah's menagerie, which contained eight antediluvians—to say nothing of six dogs, cats, and monkeys—and only two fleas? Now without wishing to insult the Jews, of whom there are now a good many in Palestine, we are bound to say that they enjoy the reputation of being rather hospitable to these parasites. Was it not Thackeray who, describing the scene on board a ship in a storm in the Levant, the said ship's deck being the sleeping-place of several poor rabbis—was it not Thackeray, we say, who wrote—

> "Then all the fleas in Jewry > Jumped up and bit like fury?"

And from all we have been able to ascertain, the holier the city the more numerous and aggressive the fleas. Palestine swarms with them; it is their classic country. Kinglake felt this, and gave the world warning in his delightful Eothen:—

> "Never think of attempting to sleep in a 'holy city.' Old Jews from all parts of the world go to lay their bones upon the sacred soil, and as these people never return to their homes, it follows that any domestic vermin which they may bring with them are likely to become permanently resident, so that the population is continually increasing. No recent census had been taken when I was at Tiberias, but I know that the congregation of fleas which attended at my church alone must have been something enormous. It was a carnal, self-seeking congregation, wholly inattentive to the service which was going on, and devoted to the one object of having my blood. The fleas of all nations were there. The smug, steady, importunate flea from Holywell-street—the pert, jumping 'puce' from hungry France—the wary, watchful 'pulce' with his poisoned stiletto—the vengeful 'pulga' of Castile with his ugly knife—the German 'floh' with his knife and fork—insatiate—not rising from the table—whole swarms from all the Russias, and Asiatic hordes unnumbered—all these were there, and all rejoiced in one great international feast."

Well, if nothing else can drive Emperor William home again from the Holy Land, the fleas will do it.

The Kaiser has visited Nazareth, the home of Jesus Christ's childhood; a place, however, absolutely unknown to the Old Testament, to Josephus, or to any other ancient writer; the name of it being probably manufactured by fictionists who thought it was the place where the Nazarites lived—although the Nazarites were only teetotalers with a craze for shaving their heads. Bethlehem, where Jesus Christ was born, has also been visited; but the Kaiser was unable to catch a glimpse of the Star of Bethlehem—which really ought to have been lighted up for this great occasion—or of the chimney over which it anchored. William has also been to Jericho, and perhaps a good many Germans would not have worn mourning if he had stayed there. He has seen Jerusalem, about which the Jews bragged so in their sacred scriptures. There was no city like it—which was probably true. It was really what the Americans call a one-horse town, containing fifty or sixty thousand inhabitants at the outside; and its boasted temple must have been of very moderate dimensions and no very grand architecture. Unfortunately, its greatest curiosity is no longer visible. We refer to the famous Jerusalem Ghost. All that William could do was to go to bed and dream, and see Jesus in a vision, as Paul did. The flight of the Jerusalem Ghost had occurred; it had left earth for heaven, and occupied a side seat close to the throne; but Paul was not to be done, he was not going to be inferior to any other captain of the first Salvation Army, so he had his vision, which nobody could dispute, and he went about saying, "I also have seen Jesus"—which William may do likewise if he only rises to the occasion.

Digitized by Google

Many of the places of interest in and about Jerusalem are in duplicates; that is to say, there are two of each, and both authentic. There are two holy sepulchres where Christ was buried, and no doubt he slept in both if he slept in either. The famous Church of the Holy Sepulchre, built round one of these spots, is used by the Greek and Latin Christians; one lot on one side, the other lot on the other—and a row of Turkish soldiers between them to keep the peace! That spectacle alone ought to set Emperor William thinking, unless he is in too much of a hurry for such a useful exercise. Christianity is the most quarrelsome religion on earth, and Christendom is always full of war or rumors of war. Christ came to bring peace, but he must have forgot it and left it behind. Perhaps he ascended to fetch it, but he never returned. He was to have come again shortly, but he has not arrived yet; and peace is nearly as far off as ever, in spite of the Czar's manifesto. Yes, if Emperor William has any head worth speaking of, his visit to the Holy Land may do him good. It may set him thinking over many things, and make him less a Christian and more a man.

G. W. FOOTE.

Atheism Unmasked.

THE Rev. Frederic Spurr asserts, in an article in the Christian World for November 25, that "the war has unmasked Atheism." We did not know that Atheism ever wore a mask, or made use of any disguise whatever, and we are quite sure that the reverend gentleman cannot prove his wild statement. There is certainly nothing in this article to substantiate the strange allegation. Mr. Spurr seems to delight in making assertions that are incapable of verification. He tells us that "the best Rationalists find their fine program torn up," and that "it is time to begin again, and on sounder lines"; but his article shows that his knowledge of Rationalism is extremely superficial. We deny that any Freethought program has been torn up since the War began. It is true that Secular lectures are not so numerous this season as they used to be; but that is due, not to lessened interest in Secularism, but to the difficulty of securing halls wherein to deliver them. Most halls are owned by Christians, whose bigotry, stimulated by the War, sees to it that they are not let to Freethinkers. The Secular Societies which are fortunate enough to possess halls of their own hold meetings as usual, and are well supported. Mr. Spurr confesses that he has read Freethought journals "for years with not a little amusement and often with not a little indignation," but that "never before has he observed such a chastened tone in the editorial articles as at the present time"; but he has perused them to very little purpose if he discovers "a chastened tone" in them, or learns from them that the "Freethought crowd is thinning." It may be true that churches and chapels are better filled now than they were a year or six months ago; but we can assure the reverend gentleman that they are not filled from the ranks of Freethought, but from those of the Indifferentists. It is the backsliders who have returned for a brief season, because the War has frightened them and roused into fresh activity their slumbering belief in the supernatural. It is safe to predict that when the present excitement comes to an end the places of worship will speedily empty again.

Mr. Spurr hates Atheism, and naturally wishes it to perish, but he is entirely mistaken when he says that "the repudiation of Atheism as the real cause of the War is the result of superficial observation and thought." We maintain that the attempt to hold Atheism responsible for this bloody conflict is in the highest degree dishonest. Mr. Spurr succeeds in doing so only by blinking the facts. He calls the author of Germany and the Next War "an Atheist, a hard materialist, an anti-Christian." Even in that very book Bernhardi claims that his doctrine of war is in full harmony with the teaching of the Christian Church. Luther held precisely the same view, and expressed it in the strongest terms at his disposal. In like manner this preacher avers that to "claim the Kaiser as a New Testament Christian is silly;" but, in reality, it is Mr. Spurr who is silly in denying the claim. His Majesty's conception of Christianity may differ from that cherished by the reverend gentleman, but that would not entitle the latter to declare that he is not a Christian. Prior to the War Professor Harnack was regarded as one of the greatest theologians, and his name was constantly on the lips of ministers in their pulpits. Nobody doubted the sincerity of his profession of the Christian religion. Will Mr. Spurr say of him also that he is not a Christian because he openly approves of Kaiserism? Listen to what the Christian World says of him:—

> "We have been second to none in our respect for Dr. Harnack's learning and contributions to theology, but, at the present time, we can only regard his moral balance as quite upset, and his moral sense as perverted by a blind patriotism."

We are of opinion that Professor Harnack is as good a Christian to-day as he was a year ago, and that Kaiserism is neither anti-Christian nor even un-Christian. Christianity and war have always gone hand-in-hand hitherto, and there is no indication just now that they are likely soon to be divorced. Physical force has invariably served as the most valuable supporter of the Gospel of Divine love.

In the Daily News for October 10 there appeared an exceptionally inaccurate and misleading article, entitled "The Return of Odin and the Religion of Valor," in which it was asserted that "through all the contradictions of Nietzsche the gospel of brute force runs like a thread of steel," which gospel, the writer said, the German soldier carries about with him in his knapsack. We are not concerned just now with the inaccuracy of that description of the Nietzschean philosophy, but, rather, with the statement about the contents of the German knapsack. Dr. Oscar Levy, the editor of the complete and authorised English translation of Nietzsche's works, does not think that the German soldier has a copy of Thus Spake Zarathustra in his knapsack. Mr. Earle Harrison, Special War Correspondent in Belgium for Nash's and Pall Mall Magazine, supplies us with the following information in the November number:—

> "I saw a German prisoner brought into Antwerp, and in a little bag which he wore at his breast, suspended by a cord hung round his neck, there was a prayer-book—a special edition for the German army. In the same little bag were four bloodstained rings, which he laughingly admitted he had torn from the fingers of a bludgeoned and dying woman."

Like the Kaiser, the German Army is profoundly religious, much more so, evidently, than the British Army. Does Mr. Spurr imagine that an Atheistic country would publish prayer-books for the use of its soldiers in a time of war? Does he really think that an unbelieving monarch would be perpetually claiming and offering thanks for Divine help to his troops? He says that the Kaiser has never yet, in all his public utterances, named the name of Jesus or Christ; but that proves nothing. Has he never read a volume of sermons delivered by the Emperor on various occasions, which are characterised by their exceeding orthodoxy?

Mr. Spurr, while regarding Atheism as the cause of the War, believes that the War is going to destroy its own cause. He says:—

> "The few professional Atheists of the country have the mortification of seeing the tide running away from them; and they have been telling us that the tide was destined to be for them in perpetual flood. The War will probably kill the Rationalistic propaganda. The conscience of humanity cannot permanently suffer degredation at the hands of men who, in the sacred name of reason, seek to slay the finest instincts of the soul. Man, being 'incurably religious,' is bound to assert himself as a religious being."

Digitized by Google

A more brilliant idea never entered a man's head. It required a truly great man to perceive that an Atheistical war turns out to be the death of Atheism. In other words, German Atheism is destined to kill British Atheism. Already "the few professional Atheists of the country have the mortification of seeing the tide running away from them." The fact is that there is not an atom of truth in that extraordinary passage just cited. The tide is not running away from our Atheists, nor is the War at all likely to kill the Freethought propaganda. While it lasts it may limit the circulation of Secularist literature, as it has lessened the circulation of religious journals and of most books; but it has not reduced the number of Freethinkers in the land. Man is not "incurably religious," as tens of thousands of our fellow-beings are prepared to testify. If he were "incurably religious" there would be no need for Mr. Spurr's profession. The business of clergymen is to prevent man from becoming irreligious; but in spite of all their assiduity in the discharge of their onerous duties, irreligion is spreading. Irreligion abounds around them while they fight with all their might against it; but irreligion is by no means synonymous with immorality. The soul and its finest instincts are creations of the religious imagination. Man possesses exceedingly fine instincts, many of which religion seeks to slay or enchain. Religion says "Do not" when Nature says "Do," with the result that the life of a religious person is incomplete and unnatural. His chief duty is to suppress himself, to crucify his flesh. Religion seeks to develop an imaginary soul and culpably neglects a real body. The moment a man begins to "assert himself as a religious being" he loses his self-respect and longs to be nothing. To assert himself as a religious being he must suppress himself as a natural man. The natural man is positively non-religious. Mr. Spurr predicts that the time is coming when our country shall glory in its allegiance to God, when the prodigal son cries, "I perish with hunger; I will arise and go to my Father." He adds:—

> "Such a moment is now dawning for our nation. The things we trusted in, and of which we were so certain, have failed us. The ideal of a world self-governed and happy, under the sole guidance of 'Science' and 'Culture,' has been shattered, and we are back again at the beginning of things, to face God afresh, and to settle our accounts with him who, the supreme Master, has been left out of our reckonings."

Nobody can tell what the future holds for us, but we are pretty sure that it does not hold the fulfilment of Mr. Spurr's prophecy. The only things that truly matter are the things that make for the welfare of society, and religion is not one of them. Religion is a sower of social discord and jealousy and malice. It is religion that sets Mr. Spurr against so many of his fellow-beings. It induces him to look down upon and despise unbelievers as if they belonged to another race. Secularism, however, engenders the sense of universal brotherhood, and does full justice to the life that now is.

J. T. LLOYD.

Christian Apologetics.

THE REV. Z. B. WOFFENDALE (NO. 2).

IN reply to my contention that "we have no evidence that the Fourth Gospel was written within a hundred years of the alleged resurrection of Jesus Christ," Rev. Z. B. Woffendale, in his own journal, characterised such a statement as "an Agnostic balloon" inflated with "pretentious assertions," and then he proceeded to take the wind out of it by producing nine "testimonies" which, he declared, "furnish cumulative and overwhelming evidence that the Fourth Gospel was written by John the apostle, and in the apostolic age." Having duly delivered himself of his nine wonderful "testimonies," he finished up by saying: "We now see how baseless, shallow, and untrustworthy is the preposterous assertion of our antagonist, that 'we have no evidence that the Fourth Gospel was written within a hundred years of the alleged Resurrection.' No wonder that, after inflating and sending up such a tattered paper balloon to mislead, Abracadabra has to mask his identity."

I now give these nine remarkable "testimonies" in the Rev. Woffendale's own words, and, to economise space, I give my reply to each witness before he leaves the box.

> 1. "That Christian antiquity has been unanimous in transmitting this book to the Church as the work of the personal friend of Jesus—viz., John, the son of Zebedee."

REPLY.—This is true; but the "antiquity" only dates from the time of Irenæus (A.D. 185), who is the earliest writer who names the four Gospels.....Mr. Woffendale has to show that the Fourth Gospel was in existence within a hundred years of the Resurrection—viz., as early as A.D. 130.

> 2. "That not only the Church, but the sects most opposed to it, are agreed upon this subject."

REPLY.—We have not the testimony of any sect to the existence of the Fourth Gospel prior to A.D. 130.

> 3. "That in the second century the Judæo-Christian party used this narrative from a book whose statements had not been called in question."

REPLY.—No Harmony or other book containing a portion of the Fourth Gospel is known to have been in existence before the time of Irenæus—though one is erroneously ascribed to Tatian (A.D. 170).

> 4. "That Marcion, who came to Rome A.D. 140, acknowledged in a letter that he, in common with all the Church, had made use of the Fourth Gospel until he had rejected its authority, but not its authenticity."

REPLY.—No writing of Marcion is extant. All we know of that arch-heretic is derived from hostile writers of a later age, who have sought to blacken his character. These stories cannot be admitted either as the evidence of Marcion or as dating from his time.

> 5. "That the Montanists and Gnostics who separated from the Church all made use of this book as the fulcrum for their heresies."

REPLY.—This is only true of a time subsequent to A.D. 130. The Montanists did not arise as a sect until after A.D. 170.

> 6. "That Justin Martyr, in the middle of the second century, quotes the Fourth Gospel frequently as part of the undoubted 'Apostolical Memoirs,' which are read, said he, every Lord's Day in all the Churches of Christendom."

REPLY.—It is true that Justin quoted from what he calls "Memoirs of the Apostles"; but these writings cannot be shown to have been the canonical Gospels—not one of which is named. The only book Justin mentions by name is an apocryphal Gospel—the "Acts of Pilate." His earliest work is dated A.D. 150, and it contains no quotations from the Fourth Gospel.

> 7. "That, a little later, an African writer, in the Muratorian fragment,.....designates the Gospel of John as the Fourth," etc.

REPLY.—The Canon of Muratori is admitted by nearly all critics to have been written not earlier than the last quarter of the second century; many place it at the beginning of the third. Its mention of the Fourth Gospel is therefore no evidence of the existence of that Gospel as early as A.D. 130.

> 8. "That Irenæus, about the year 180, testifies to the apostle John being the author of the Fourth Gospel. And when it was remembered that this Irenæus had, in his early days, lived at Smyrna, under the Christian teaching of Polycarp, who had lived with the apostle John, it is impossible for any sane man to doubt that Irenæus knew the real fact, and stated honestly the truth about the authorship of the Fourth Gospel—namely, that it was written by John."

My reply to this took up two columns, in which I showed: (1) That Irenæus had not lived "under the Christian teaching of Polycarp"; but that he once saw the latter when he was a boy. His words are: "whom I also saw in my early youth." (2) That Polycarp had not lived with, or been taught by, the apostle John, as stated by Irenæus. (3) That Irenæus knew nothing whatever about John the apostle; what he does say is unhistorical. He is a witness only for the existence of the four Gospels in his day (A.D. 185)—and, by inference, for some decades previously.

> 9. "Add to all these testimonies the witness of the 21st chapter of John that 'This is the disciple whom Jesus loved (verses 20—23), which testified these things, and wrote these things, and we know that his testimony is true.'"

Digitized by Google

REPLY.—Mr. Woffendale does not say who the "we" in this passage are; but he knows perfectly well that before he can adduce any of the statements in the Fourth Gospel as evidence, he must first prove the authenticity of that Gospel. This he has failed to do. It will now be seen that, of Mr. Woffendale's nine "testimonies" which, he asserts, furnish "overwhelming evidence" of the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel, only one of them—the second-hand testimony of Irenæus—has any bearing at all upon the subject. That one, also, is found upon examination to be worthless. Hence, though the rev. gentleman has the effrontery to characterise my statements, given above, as "baseless, shallow, and untrustworthy," it is he himself who has been constructing a balloon inflated with "pretentious assertions"—and a very big balloon it is too.

ABRACADABRA.

Autumnal Fires and Festivals.

IN the two fascinating books which conclude the herculean labors of Professor J. G. Frazer in connection with his ten-volume work, The Golden Bough, The Fire Festivals of Europe, and The Doctrine of the External Soul, are considered with immense wealth of detail.* With the first of these interesting themes these articles are concerned, more especially with the autumnal fires of Northern Europe, thus leaving a survey of the fire ceremonies of Christmas for later treatment. That these observances were originally of solar import was an opinion which Dr. Frazer was led to accept on the high authority of Mannhardt. This view he has now abandoned in favor of the hypothesis more recently advanced by Professor Westermarck, which is certainly supported by extremely weighty evidence. Dr. Frazer says:—

> "The true explanation of the festivals I now believe to be the one advocated by Dr. Westermarck, namely, that they are purificatory in intention, the fire being designed not, as I formerly held, to reinforce the sun's light and heat by sympathetic magic, but merely to burn or repel the noxious things, whether conceived as material or spiritual, which threaten the life of man, of animals, and of plants.....Dr. Westermarck based his criticisms [of the solar theory] largely on his own observations of the Mohammedan fire festivals of Morocco, which present a remarkable resemblance to those of Christian Europe.....So far as Europe is concerned, the evidence tends strongly to show that the grand evil which the festivals aimed at combating was witchcraft.....If that was so, the wide prevalence and the immense popularity of the fire festivals provides us with a measure for estimating the extent of the hold which the belief in witchcraft had on the European mind before the rise of Christianity, or, rather, of rationalism; for Christianity, both Catholic and Protestant, accepted the old belief and enforced it in the old way by the faggot and the stake. It was not until human reason at last awoke from the slumber of the Middle Ages that this dreadful obsession gradually passed away like a dark cloud from the intellectual horizon of Europe."

Dr. Frazer then proceeds to utter a timely warning to those who cherish the delusion that the Freethought fight is won. We are mistaken in supposing that this baleful belief is extinguished in the minds of the masses. As a matter of fact, "it only hibernates under the chilling influence of rationalism," and would soon reassert itself if that influence were withdrawn. Much of our safety lies in the growth of urban life, where circumstances are less favorable than in rural communities for the re-emergence of dark and dangerous superstitions.

Be the ultimate explanation of these seasonal ceremonies what it may, and probably no single theory suffices to lay bare their secret, the fire festivals themselves form an instructive chapter in the history of human culture. The great festival of midsummer certainly coincides with the arrival of the sun at the highest point of his annual journey through the sky, and was, apparently, regulated by the solar clock. In any case, the growth of animal and plant life, with which this midsummer ceremony is associated, always appears at this season in the plentitude of its powers. Therefore, we may conclude that the ceremonies of this season were directly connected—whether consciously or otherwise—with the maximum splendor of the solar orb. But while this holds true of the primitive races of Central and Southern Europe, other factors appear to have intervened among the Celtic peoples of North-Western Europe.

The most important festivals of the Celts have no obvious connection with the sun's light and warmth-giving powers. The two chief Celtic celebrations which still survive are but the shadowy relics of former glory. The first of these is the Eve of May-Day and the Day itself, while the second is the Eve of All Hallows, October 31, and they appear rather to indicate the beginning of the two seasons into which the year was divided in prehistoric times, rather than to commemorate the majestic march of the sun. Nor do they coincide with the most important periods of the agricultural year, the sowing of spring and the harvesting of the autumn. Long prior to May-Day the seed of the future harvest has been sown, and by the time that dreary, dripping November is due, the grass and the grain and the fruits have been gathered. May-Day, above all, Old May-Day, saw spring in its verdant splendor and arrayed with full promise of the fast-coming summer, while November bears all the outward and visible signs of approaching darkness and death. Now, as Mr. E. K. Chambers has shrewdly noted, while these particular seasons are of little moment to the tiller of the soil, they perform an important part in the herdsman's calling. Commenting on this happy hit, Dr. Frazer says truly enough, that it is when the summer is near, that the herdsman drives his cattle into the open fields to graze the new green herbage, and it is on the verge of winter that he sends them to shelter from the storms of the cold season. This custom, consequently, appears to date from periods of remote antiquity, before the races of Britain had merged their earlier pastoral life with that of the later cultivation of the earth. It is also undeniable that—

> "even in Central Europe, remote from the region now occupied by the Celts, a similar bisection of the year may be clearly traced in the great popularity, on the one hand, of May-Day and its Eve [Walpurgis Night], and on the other hand, of the Feast of All Souls, at the beginning of November, which, under a thin Christian cloak, conceals an ancient pagan festival of the dead."

Hallowe'en was seemingly the herald of the New Year. At all events, in the Isle of Man, whose inhabitants so long presented a sullen front to Saxon influences, November 1 was regarded as New Year's Day right down to modern times. The Manx land tenure terminates on November 1, and on that day the farm laborers enter into their term of annual service. Moreover, the Manx mummers were wont to wander on Hallowe'en and proclaim the incoming year.

Further testimony is forthcoming from ancient Ireland, where a fresh flame was each year kindled at this season, and from this holy fire the hearths of Erin were relit. That Hallowe'en was honored as the commencement of another year is also illustrated by the old Celtic custom of then divining what the future held in store. Again, throughout Europe it was at Hallowe'en that the souls of the dead revisited the scenes of their living days to bask in the genial glow of the house-fire and to partake of the good cheer provided by their surviving kinsfolk before returning to the spirit land. Dr. Frazer argues that as the herds came home from the pastures at this period to the friendly care of their owners, so the ghosts of the dead were also permitted to share in the hospitality of their kindred's hearth and home.

But in addition to these annually welcomed guests there were others of more sinister aspect. The witches careered through the air on their broomsticks, or rushed over the country on brindled cats

* Balder the Beautiful, 2 vols. Macmillan.

Digitized by Google

transformed for this special occasion into very dark horses of wondrous speed. Also, the fairies were abroad in endless numbers, and the ghosts and goblins lurked everywhere on mischief bent. In Cardigan, on November Eve, every stile had its attendant bogie. Not only in Wales, but in Ireland and Scotland, all these beliefs abounded as articles of faith among the superstitious rustics. The Irish fairies, hobgoblins, and fiends wandered at their own sweet will on Samhain Eve or Hallowe'en. In the Scottish Highlands the good and evil fairies dedicated this great occasion to dance and music, but were none the less dangerous to intruding and inquisitive mortals on that account.

Hallowe'en appears in all Celtic lands to have been the right and proper season for diving into coming events. The Druids were great diviners, and their powers were at their highest at this period. The Eve of all Hallows was in Wales the weirdest of the Spirit Nights of the year. As the wind sighed in the air or sobbed in the trees, the names of those destined to die in the new year could be heard on the breeze. In the conventicles the Welsh women assembled to divine each one her fate from the flickering candle-flame which she bore in her hand. They were at the same time made acquainted with the names, or saw the coffins of those whom death had selected for the coming year. Judging from the emotional outpourings of a modern Welsh revivalist meeting, these uncanny proceedings at Hallowe'en must have left a morbid stain on the minds of these highly sensitive women. And in Northern Scotland the morbidly inclined could gratify their unhealthy curiosity by sitting on a three-legged stool at three cross-roads at the hour of midnight at Hallowe'en, and as the kirk-bell tolled the hour the identity of those over whom an early death impended was disclosed by the passing wind.

With the evolution of modern thought, with the growth of towns and cities, and with the increased facilities for travel latterly afforded, the dark and gloomy spirit associated with Hallowe'en has materially declined. The brighter side of the observances has lingered, while their more sombre aspects have receded into the background. The celebration of this season is now more generally festive in character in those remote retreats where the custom still survives. The November fires on Egdon Heath, mentioned in Hardy's Return of the Native, were relics of this anniversary, and our Fifth of November guys and bonfires, although nominally associated with Gunpowder Plot, really date to days before the Romans landed on our coasts.

Traces of the Hallowe'en customs have lingered in Lancashire right down to modern times. The Lancashire witches

> "used to gather on Hallowe'en at the Malkin Tower, a ruined and desolate farmhouse in the forest of Pendle. They assembled for no good purpose; but you could keep the infernal rout at bay by carrying a lighted candle about the fells from eleven to twelve o'clock at night. The witches tried to blow out the candle, and if they succeeded, so much the worse for you; but if the flame burned steadily till the clock struck midnight you were safe. Some people performed the ceremony by deputy; and parties went about from house to house in the evening collecting candles, one for each inmate, and offering their services to late or lost the witches, as the phrase ran. This custom was practised at Longridge Fell in the early part of the nineteenth century."

In other parts of Northern England kindred customs were to be met with.

But to return to the bonfires of Hallowe'en. In the Scottish Highlands each homestead was provided with its own heap of dry faggots, ferns, and other combustible matter, which was set ablaze so that the whole country was lit up with bonfires, which lent a wonderfully impressive appearance to the surrounding scenery. In some districts the Hallowe'en fires were encircled with stones and, on the following morning, November 1, the people gathered round the dead fires and surveyed the stones with eager interest. Where a stone was displaced, or where anyone's footprint stood near a stone, it was seriously supposed that the person whom it represented would die within the year. In the eighteenth century this custom was falling into desuetude, as a writer of that period intimates when he says: "The Hallowe'en fire is still kept up in the Low country; but on the Western coast and in the Isles it is never kindled, though the night is spent in merriment and entertainments."

T. F. PALMER.

(To be concluded.)

Acid Drops

Mr. Harold Begbie is in America, on behalf of the Daily Chronicle, to report on the American attitude towards the European War. He reports that an American business girl said to him, "I can't understand why you should write about religion." We feel inclined to believe that Mr. Begbie misunderstood what the American girl said, which was probably, "I can't understand what you write about religion." And in that respect she would have had many sympathisers with her on this side of the water. For very few can understand what Mr. Begbie writes about religion—until they understand Mr. Begbie. Then they will probably realise that it is not really meant to be understood. It is designed to entertain. A large section of the religious world must be continually entertained with emotional slush expressed in terms of religion, and for that class Mr. Begbie is a very successful entertainer. But so far as the study of religion goes, that American girl may rest assured that none outside the class mentioned, whether they are religious or non-religious, take Mr. Begbie seriously.

But incidentally Mr. Begbie gave some inkling of what he thought religion to be. (At least of what he thinks religion to be while he is in America, for it is quite probable he will discover it to be something different when he returns home.) He inquired if this young lady was not curious about the mystery of existence. "The mystery of this immense universe. Its significance. Its origin and its purpose. Our own conscious and self-conscious life. Why is there any universe at all, and to what end is the progress and travail of humanity? Think for a moment that we are in the midst of an infinity which is without beginning and without an end.' Mr. Begbie, then, thinks that thoughts about these things constitute religion—or, at least, the material of religion—and, by implication, those who are not religious do not think, or ought not to be thinking, about these things. Which is all very amusingly absurd. "The mystery of the universe," etc., etc., all belong quite as much to the non-religious as to the religious. The ceaseless questioning of non-religious science proves it. It is not the existence of these questions that makes religion, but the answer that is given to them. And the only answers given them up to date that are of any real value are those that have come from the non-religious side.

Mr. Begbie's conclusion is that "religion, at any rate the disciplinary and dogmatic religion of a past generation, is in a bad way in America." The modern American "has washed his hands of the old religion of his fathers. Puritanism, I should say, if not dead, is at any rate on its last legs." We fear that Mr. Begbie here, as elsewhere, exaggerates. We should be only too glad to think otherwise. But it is almost impossible for a man of his temperament to give a scientific survey of the facts. There is plenty of religion in America, just as there is in this country. The state of things both here and there prove it.

According to the press Sheikh-ul-Islam has published a fetwa, according to which every Musulman must, as a religious duty, fight against the Allies in the present War. This means the "Holy War" for the whole Islamic world; whilst the earlier "Holy War," initiated by the two pious Kaisers, has turned Europe into a slaughter-house.

The daughter of a baronet is among the hospital nurses in France and is acting as "probationer general scrubber" in one of the operating theatres. Of course, the "ha'penny press" is horrified, although English people profess to worship a Carpenter-God.

Mrs. Esther Davies, of Llanelly, has died at the age of 104. At that tender age Adam and Methuselah wore pinafores and trundled hoops.

Digitized by Google

A new novel has been published with the title, The Woman Who Looked Back. We wonder if it refers to Lot's wife, although that yarn has to be taken with an extraordinary pinch of salt.

The Southwark coroner recently complained that local poor people do not look upon marriage as a necessity. That looks as if Holy Mother Church was fast asleep, in spite of the fact that many thousands have been spent upon Southwark Cathedral.

"Only one other Englishman has attained to anything near the place which Lord Roberts filled in the hearts of the Indian soldier, and that was John Nicholson," says the Evening News. Nicholson was deified after his death by his faithful followers. Shall we have another god?

The Evening News recently had a leading article "To Prove Our Faith." It contained no reference to Christianity, but was an appeal for further recruits for the British Army. It is a long way from Mount Carmel to Carmelite House.

Rev. J. Tolfree Parr says that there is more than the breed to account for the courage of our soldiers in the trenches. The reason for it is that "the great bulk have gone through our Sunday-schools." That accounts for it. Only we are quite surprised to learn that the bulk of the British Army has been through the Methodist Sunday-schools. If the facts were not guaranteed by a parson, we should be inclined to doubt it.

The Dean of Norwich has been laying down the ethics of war. He says that "war, regarded as the punishment of a wrong-doer, is perfectly right and Christian; whereas war, regarded as retaliation, is absolutely wrong and anti-Christian. The purpose of all punishment is the ultimate good of the punished, and hence punishment must be regarded as a truly Christian obligation." This is a very comforting doctrine, but it has its drawbacks. To begin with, we do not know that any country ever does consider itself the wrong-doer in a war. It is always the other party that is in the wrong. Each country sets out to punish the wrong-doer, and generally in a thoroughly Christian spirit. We feel that it is a Christian obligation to punish the Germans, and the Germans feel that they have a Christian obligation to punish us. Meanwhile, the outsider is apt to reflect that a little less Christianity all round might have made the nations of Europe better fitted to live together on the same planet.

In the days of the old régime in France, a certain lady expressed the opinion that God would think twice before he damned people of "our quality." The editor of the Hibbert Journal has much the same opinion of God and Great Britain in the present War. He cannot believe that God will be indifferent to our cause in the War—which is exactly the way that the Germans feel in the matter. And it looks as though God will be the only party that will gain credit from the War. If the Germans were to win they would praise God for the victory, and if the Allies win they will also praise God. And the losing side will not have the courage to blame God for their defeat. It will be attributed to their shortcomings, to the chastening wisdom of God, etc. In these matters it is with God "Heads I win, tails you lose." Neither side appears to have the sense to realise that, even though God may not be indifferent to the result of the War, he has evidently been indifferent to the development of conditions that made the War inevitable; and that is surely the crowning offence. A God who can allow preparations for war to go on year after year, knowing all the time that these preparations must lead to war, cannot escape responsibility by not being indifferent as to the result. If he can determine the result, he must have been equally potent to prevent the conditions that led to it. If he was indifferent to the one, we do not see any reason for believing he is less indifferent as to the other.

The British public who buy Christmas cards this year will notice that the Prince of Peace has been ousted by the soldier in khaki, for on a very large number of these articles of stationery warlike figures and verses have usurped the customary pacific figures. What an elastic religion is Christianity! When the god is changed from Christ to Mars, the worshipers do not seem to mind in the least.

That hero of a hundred tea-fights, the Bishop of London, exploited the late Lord Roberts at a meeting at Queen's Hall recently. He quoted the remark of the late Field-Marshal that he "had family prayers for fifty-five years." What a victory for Holy Mother Church! It was ever better than Kandahar.

In the course of an article on German culture in the Evening News recently, a saying of Frederick the Great's was used with a reference to that monarch's "accustomed piousness." The probity of our contemporary is as remarkable as the "piety" of Frederick.

A morning paper protests against the tearful eloquence which is becoming popular amongst clergymen. Does the editor think that anyone can worship "The Man of Sorrows" with impunity?

An American dentist claims that by pressure on a patient's thumb and finger joints he can induce insensibility to pain in the teeth. It will add to the charm of a visit to the dentist's when they all keep thumbscrews—like the Inquisition in the "good old days."

Sir Oliver Lodge, opening a "Science Week" at the Browning Hall, Walworth, recently, spoke on the question of the soul's survival. Some of the proofs, said the speaker, for communication after death are being withheld for a time, but will be published later. This is a religious dodge, for scientists believe that demonstration is the highest means of proof.

Sir Oliver Lodge has been challenged by a writer in the Times to produce his evidence in favor of a future life. As he has just declared that this is now a demonstrated scientific truth, one would have thought that this request would at once have been complied with. Instead of doing this, Sir Oliver declares that while a few scientific men agree with him "more or less," the majority are hostile—which is hardly what one would expect in the case of a demonstrated scientific truth. He says, also, that "people cannot receive proof so long as they shut their minds to the evidence," which is quite true, although people cannot keep their minds shut when genuine evidence is produced. Then Sir Oliver Lodge says that the beginning of the proof is telepathy. So that we must accept this before we can be offered proof of the other. This means, something that is highly speculative must be accepted as a demonstrated fact, and on that Sir Oliver is prepared to prove something else. Seriously, this is only a new variant of the old religious cry that we must have faith first—then all things are possible. But, what with the Germans burning cities and shooting people in the interests of "Culture," and Sir Oliver Lodge asking in the name of science for a blank cheque on the Bank of Credulity, some people will hardly know presently whether they are on their heads or their heels.

Talk about pot calling kettle black! Here is the Church Times complaining that Sir Oliver Lodge's information about a future life is not sufficiently circumstantial, and hinting that more detailed information is necessary if it is to be accepted. Now, we wonder what kind of circumstantial evidence the Church Times' own statements about a future life rests on. So far as we know, they only say they believe it. Well, Sir Oliver also says that, and adds that he has proof. Certainly we should very much like to see these proofs; but it is a dangerous game for a religious paper to set up the same demand. Like all people who have set up in this business, Sir Oliver Lodge asks other people to believe because he has had what he considers evidence. And that is exactly what every priest does. He asks us to have confidence in him, forgetting that a genuine truth carries its own conviction to all rational minds alike. Anything short of this is open to doubt, and is little better than speculation.

The Schoolmaster records the case of a lady who is able to tell the exact time whenever called upon. It is said that she sees the face of a clock, with the hands pointing to the time. We do not think the case is so precise as is stated, particularly as it is noted that it is "only when she answers on the instant is her answer correct." There is evidently room for a certain degree of inaccuracy. It is also obvious that the time is not read from the visualised clock. The time is judged first and the clock is visualised afterwards. Most of us, if we start guessing the time, will find that we see the clock face more or less distinctly, because this is practically the only way in which we tell the time.

The Vicar of Burton-on-Trent magnanimously admits that there is not the slightest reason to suppose that, in his religion, the German Emperor is a hypocrite. Of the sincerity of his worship of God there can be no doubt; but, unfortunately, he worships the wrong God. The reverend gentleman charges the Kaiser with having made God in his own image; but is not the vicar himself guilty of the same charge? There are as many gods as there are worshipers, and they are all equally non-existent. The religion of the Kaiser may be "tragic and twisted," as this vicar says; but is not all religion the tragedy of a twisted human nature?

Digitized by Google

The men of God are waxing bolder and sillier every day. They say now that we would have won this War long ago had it not been for our national sins. Because of these, God prolongs the bloody conflict, thereby permitting and becoming directly responsible for the slaughter of millions of innocent men. Prebendary Webster is reported as saying that "God would not answer our prayers for victory because the nation was not yet right with God." "The war had not yet taught us our lesson," the Prebendary added. Another man of God, the Rev. C. B. Bardsley, informed the Lord in prayer that our national sins are the neglect of Sunday, of prayer, and of public worship, and the love of pleasure. Just think of it. The Almighty keeps the most brutal war ever known going on so long simply because the British people do not sufficiently support the parsons!

What a wonderful conceit of themselves Christians cherish and openly express! The Rev. C. E. Darlaston, of Crouch End, London, speaking at a City Temple intercessory service, said:—

> "Like spectators stretching over the ropes to see some great procession, so creation waits and looks and watches for what the sons of God will do. We are the sons of God. We cannot say it glibly and without humility, still we must say it."

How woefully disappointed creation must be, for the so-called sons of God have never done anything worth waiting and watching for, while they have done much to be profoundly ashamed of.

How scared the newspapers are in admitting that any well-known man is a Freethinker! Even the Times does injustice to itself in this matter, for, in reviewing Mr. Thomas Hardy's latest book, it says "You might call him a pagan." We might be saved from similar exhibitions if all press articles were signed, for no man worth his salt would subscribe his name to such nonsense.

"Girl Burned to Death" runs a headline in a daily paper If the Christian superstition be true, countless millions of human beings are being burned for ever. That is, evidently, not worth a paragraph, let alone a headline.

At a meeting of the Southwark Diocesan Conference last week, a resolution was carried pledging the Conference "to keep the morals and manners of the country as good as possible." A nasty snub to poor, old Providence.

Archdeacon Escreet, interviewed by the Weekly Dispatch stated that he believed in "one man one wife." Just so! And if the Archdeacon had been born in Turkey, and his parents had been Mohammedans, he would have had a different belief.

Evidences in favor of Christianity steadily accumulate. The world has seen a bottle of the darkness that overspread Egypt, the portrait of Jesus on a napkin on which he wiped his face, the tail of the serpent that tempted Eve, and numerous other proofs of a similar character. Now we learn, from the Daily Telegraph of November 26, that Dr. C. M. Coburn, Archæologist to the World's Bible Conference at Baltimore, has announced the discovery of the rock that Moses smote in the wilderness. We do not know how identification was established, probably Dr. Coburn saw the mark of the blow, in any case, we may take it that the evidence is quite satisfactory to the World's Bible Conference. Dr. Coburn also dwelt upon the relics of early Israelite civilisation, including the mummy of Joseph, which are in the possession of the Mohammedans, and which are "quite inaccessible," and of which "no one is allowed a glimpse." That is as it should be. Inaccessible evidence that no one is allowed to see is the kind that cheers the believer and confounds the sceptic.

The bullet-deflecting New Testament is not to have all its own way. One of the morning papers last week gave a photograph of a bullet-stricken Jewish prayer-book that had saved a German soldier's life. On the same day an evening paper published a photograph of a cigarette case that had served the same purpose. This war is shattering many things, and among them the life-preserving character of the New Testament. When common cigarette cases and Hebrew prayer-books serve the same purpose, it looks as though Providence had been neglecting its duty. Presently we shall hear of a wad of the Pink 'Un doing a like service.

The Hartford Courant, the oldest living newspaper in the United States, has just celebrated its 150th anniversary. It has lived through two American revolutions—that which saw the birth of the United States, and the other which threatened the existence of the Union. It is a proud record for any periodical. Two outstanding figures in these gigantic events, Thomas Paine and Abraham Lincoln, were both Freethinkers.

What educated men journalists are! In a recent article in the Evening News, written with the obvious purpose of belittling Germany, that newspaper jumbles together quotations from Goethe, Frederick the Great, Sir Alfred Mond, Sir John Brunner—and Mr. Cadbury. Perhaps we expect too much hustled history for a ha'penny!

Mr. Harold Begbie has been described as a young man in a hurry. It seems as if the jest were true, for his latest work is entitled The Proof of God: a Dialogue with Two Letters. There are so many gods; is Mr. Begbie going to settle each of them with a dialogue?

The Young Men's Christian Association is establishing a number of soldiers' club-houses, and an appeal has been made for gifts of gramaphones, ping-pong, puzzles and other games, and pianos. Ping-pong and piety! What Secularists these Christians are!

Commenting on the new tax on tea the Catholic Times has the following, which we think contains a truth that is too often ignored:—

> "We wish the Chancellor had not taxed tea, which is a necessary of life, especially in the world of labor. But if the tax helps to convince the women that war is a waste and an evil, and often a crime, it may lead them to realise that they, who mould the young idea, can do a great deal to ensure peace in future by teaching their children to hate war. Women are said to love soldiers, when more probably they only like uniforms. Anyhow, war affects women as well as men, and this tax on tea, which hits women and children so hard, will prove beneficial if it awakens the understanding of women to the duty of teaching their children the blessedness of peace."

It is so often assumed that woman's influence makes for peace, that many are inclined to take it at that without further examination. Yet constant experience shows that women welcome militarism in general, at least as much as men, and face the prospect of war with as few misgivings. Undoubtedly, women have it in their power to play a great part in the promotion of peace, but up to the present that influence has not been conspicuously exercised. We agree with the Catholic Times that if the horrors of the present War arouse women to a sense of what may be done by them to end war, that will be one great compensation that the world will receive from this catastrophe.

God preserves his own! We are called on to admit the fact, even while we question the judgment displayed in the people preserved. Colonel Fornechou reports that in Rheims, although shells were demolishing buildings, and bombs from aeroplanes destroying people, he and other Salvationists remained unhurt. The people around said, "God protects the Salvationists." The Colonel calls this "a remarkable testimony." Very remarkable! It shows that the type of mind attracted to the Salvation Army is much the same in England as in France. Less egotistical people might wonder why the favors of God are not more widely and more generally dispersed. There are plenty of opportunities in the North of France.

Warden: "So you got rid of your pastor?"

Elder: "Yes; he was a good man, but he was too dry in his preaching—always giving us a history of the Jews. But we don't like our new pastor very much, either."

Warden: "What's the matter with him?"

Elder: "Well, he preaches with tears in his voice all the time."

Warden: "I see. The old pastor was too historical, and the new one is too hysterical."

A "down South" colored philosopher recently remarked: "Life, my breddern, am mos'ly made up of prayin' for rain an' then wishin' it would cl'ar off."

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £272 6s. 6d. Received since :—James Davie, £1; "Ernest," 10s.

J. D.—Sorry for delay.

GEORGE BRADFIELD.—We can't follow the Kaiser round the world with a shorthand notebook. We must trust the newspapers in some things. Besides, he has always been talking in the way you don't believe him guilty of. We have referred to the same thing during many years. Addressing his soldiers forming a part of the Punative Expedition to China, he told them to deal with the Chinese as the Jews were ordered to deal with the Amalakites. He talked in a similar way when he visited Jerusalem, and again when he visited Constantinople and walked with Abdul Ahmid. And didn't you hear of his letter to President Wilson and his justification of the horrors of Louvain? You are really too incredulous where your idol is concerned. We don't propose to answer any more such questions.

E. B.—You are quite right about the letter of Sir Lawrence Gomme, quoted in "Sugar Plum." It appeared in the Daily Telegraph of November 13, not November 12, as stated. It occurs on col. i., p. 4. Sorry the date should have been wrongly given.

J. C.—Pleased to read your interesting and even encouraging letter. After all, is not the writer's signature the mark of honest journalism—not how much he is paid for his work? It may not always be a certain guarantee even then, but it is the nearest you can get. "We" is no deception, of course, when the writer's name stands at the bottom or the top. It is a question of etiquette.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid :—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Lloyd lectures to-day (December 6), afternoon and evening, at Abertillery, Mon. Admission to both lectures are free. We presume that the local train service will admit of those Freethinkers in the district, who desire to hear Mr. Lloyd, doing so. In that case there should be crowded meetings.

A cynic once said that Mr. Blatchford wouldn't be a bad writer, if he only knew anything. This is a way cynics have, but there is at least an element of truth in the criticism. Mr. Shaw is a born writer, a wit, a humorist, and full of originality. No one will ever call him a second Cobbett or a second anything else. He is too much like himself to be like anybody else; which sounds like an Irishism, though it isn't. But we mustn't go on in this way. Our object is a different one. Both these gentlemen have been writing, characteristically, on the War, both are old Socialists, both are at daggers drawn in their views of the War, and both say the Socialists are the only people who are right—now and evermore. So we shall let them differ; partly because we don't deal with common politics, and partly because, whether he is right or wrong, Socialists are always unpleasant people to discuss with. But both Blatchford and Shaw are Freethinkers; and, characteristically again, Blatchford is most a Freethinker when he is addressing Christians, and Shaw is most a Christian when he is addressing Freethinkers; and there is a certain moral in this if you can only dig it out. But all this is by the way.

Shaw gives many digs at Christianity in his Common Sense About the War. Here is one :—

"THE CHURCH AND THE WAR.

"And now, where in our society is the organ whose function it should be to keep us constantly in mind that, as Lassalle said, 'the sword is never right,' and to shudder with him at the fact that 'the Lie is a European Power'? In no previous war have we struck that top note of keen irony, the closing of the Stock Exchange and not of the Church. The pagans were more logical: they closed the Temple of Peace when they drew the sword. We turn our Temples of peace promptly into temples of war, and exhibit our parsons as the most pugnacious characters in the community. I venture to affirm that the sense of scandal given by this is far deeper and more general than the Church thinks, especially among the working classes, who are apt either to take religion seriously or else to repudiate it and criticise it closely. When a bishop at the first shot abandons the worship of Christ and rallies his flock round the altar of Mars, he may be acting patriotically, necessarily, manfully, rightfully; but that does not justify him in pretending that there has been no change, and that Christ is, in effect, Mars. The straightforward course, and the one that would serve the Church best in the long run, would be to close our professedly Christian Churches the moment war is declared by us, and reopen them only on the signing of the treaty of peace. No doubt to many of us the privation thus imposed would be far worse than the privation of small change, of horses and motor cars, of express trains, and all the other prosaic inconveniences of war. But would it be worse than the privation of faith, and the horror of the soul, wrought by the spectacle of nations praying to their common Father to assist them in sabring and bayoneting and blowing one another to pieces with explosives that are also corrosives, and of the Church organising this monstrous paradox instead of protesting against it? Would it make less atheists or more? Atheism is not a simple homogeneous phenomena. There is the youthful atheism with which every able modern mind begins: an atheism that clears the soul of superstitions and terrors and servilities and base compliances and hypocrisies, and lets in the light of heaven. And there is the atheism of despair and pessimism: the sullen cry with which so many of us at this moment, looking on blinded deafened maimed wrecks that were once ablebodied admirable lovable men, and on priests blessing war, and newspapers and statesmen and exempt old men hounding young men on to it, are saying 'I know now there is no God.' What has the Church in its present attitude to set against this crushed acceptance of darkness except the quaint but awful fact that there are cruder people on whom horrifying calamities have just the opposite effect, because they seem the work of some power so overwhelming in its malignity that it must be worshiped because it is mighty? Let the Church beware how it plays to that gallery. If all the Churches of Europe closed their doors until the drums ceased rolling they would act as a most powerful reminder that though the glory of war is a famous and ancient glory, it is not the final glory of God."

"It is no use giving tracts to a missionary" is another of Shaw's witticisms. We believe it is true, but we wonder if he has tried.

"OBSOLETE TESTS IN THE ARMY.

"Another matter needs to be dealt with at the same time. There are immense numbers of atheists in this country; and though most of them, like the Kaiser, regard themselves as devout Christians, the best are intellectually honest enough to object to profess beliefs they do not hold, especially in the solemn act of dedicating themselves to death in the service of their country. Army Form E 501a (September, 1912) secured to these the benefit of the Bradlaugh Affirmation Act of 1888, as the enlisting soldier said simply, 'I, So-and-So, do make Oath,' etc. But recruits are now confronted with another form (E 501, June, 1914), running, 'I, So-and-So, swear by Almighty God,' etc. On September 1st, at Lord Kitchener's call, a Civil servant obtained leave to enlist, and had the oath put to him in this form by the attesting officer. He offered to swear in the 1912 form. This was refused; and we accordingly lost a recruit of just that stardily conscientious temper which has made the most formidable soldiers known to history. I am bound to add, however, that the attesting officer, on being told that the oath would be a blasphemous farce to the conscience of the recruit, made no difficulty about that, and was quite willing to accept him if he, on his part, would oblige by professing what he did not believe. Thus a Ghoorka's religious conscience is respected: an Englishman's is insulted and outraged."

Freethinkers are all glad to hear Mr. Shaw denouncing superstition in this way. Lord Kitchener appears to be able to defy even the law in the interest of his own religious belief.

Mr. Shaw refers only to the treatment of Freethinkers on enlisting. But since the opening of the War we have had many letters from soldiers in the various camps relating to the injustice done them after enlisting. All soldiers are legally absolved from attending a religious service in which they do not believe. We hear, however, that a common trick—for it is nothing more than a trick of the most contemptible kind—is for an officer to order some kind of work to be done while the rest of the regiment is at church. This is clearly a punishment for non-attendance, and some of those who have written us have expressed their determination to bring the matter before their superior officer. If this is done we hope the officer will be sufficient of a gentleman to put a summary stop to what is no more than an expression of stupid bigotry.

Digitized by Google

We are asked to announce that a meeting of the Glasgow Branch of the N. S. S. will be held in the Good Templar's Hall, 122 Ingram-street, at 12 o'clock to-day (December 6). The subject for discussion will be Mr. J. T. Lloyd's paper on "Nietzsche." Admission is free.

The December number of the English Review contains an important article on "Socialism, Materialism, and War," signed by H. H. Hyndman and H. E. Belfort Bax. The review copy has not reached us yet.

We feel there is a great deal in the following resolutions of the Humanitarian League that is worthy of consideration. We also feel that very little publicity will be given them in the ordinary press in the present state of affairs, which is our main reason for inserting them here:—

"(1) Upon whatsoever Government the immediate responsibility shall rest by the verdict of history, the ultimate cause of the outbreak of war will be found to be much deeper than the action of this or that nation during the last few weeks which preceded it, for that cause lies in the ideas and methods common to all European nations. An international system based upon selfishness, and upon the exploitation of the weaker by the stronger, is always liable to produce the results from which we are at present suffering.

(2) Atrocities which have occurred are not wholly the outcome of any particular way waging war, but are to a large extent inherent in what is known as a state of war.

(3) The expression 'Civilised Warfare' is a contradiction in terms. War is necessarily brutal and dehumanising. What is needed is not the destruction of this or that European military system, but of any system, by whichsoever nation maintained, which makes aggressive war possible for any purpose.

(4) Assuming that the present war, and the participation in it of Great Britain, were alike inevitable and just, the attitude of many British people with reference to it, now it has broken out, is much to be regretted. As instances, the Committee specially note the private compulsion of men to enlist; the clamor for the indiscriminate treatment of aliens—even when naturalised—as potential spies and combatants, especially when it takes the form of calling for the discharge on to the streets, penniless and friendless, of boys and girls, regardless of what may become of them; the indecent eagerness to capture enemies' trade, even at the risk of depriving individual aliens of their livelihood. These, and other proceedings which might be mentioned, discredit Great Britain in the eyes of belligerents and neutrals alike."

Atheism and the War.

THERE is a certain clergyman—his name is F. C. Spurr, and he is, I think, a Baptist by occupation, although his particular brand is of no moment—whose great occupation in life appears to be that of killing Atheism. This, it may be said, is the occupation of all clergymen, and so it is, but this parson sets to work in a cold-blooded and deliberate way that almost places him in a class by himself. He announces beforehand that he is going to do it, then he goes away and does it (I am relying upon his own statements for this), finally he returns and invites people to come along and inspect what he alleges to be the corpse. The only criticism ever offered on such occasion comes from the corpse—which the bad taste of Atheism permits to the end. But Mr. Spurr is unaffected. He publicly buries Atheism—and then straightway sets out to kill it over again. He reminds me very strongly of Mark Twain's coroner who held an inquest on an Egyptian mummy, and charged compound interest from the time of Moses.

Some years ago Mr. Spurr heard there was a deal of Atheism in Australia. His crusading spirit was aroused, and he left for the Antipodes, publicly announcing that one object of his visit was to stem the tide of unbelief there. He went, he preached, he returned, and Australian unbelief does not appear to have been seriously affected by his campaign. Then he returned to England; and one of his earliest discoveries here was that "Rationalism" was bankrupt; and in the course of a very muddle-headed article in the Baptist Times he offered proofs—or rather proof, because only one was given. Forty thousand pounds had just been raised for the Y.M.C.A., and, said Mr. Spurr, Freethought organisations were crying out for funds. Could there be any doubt that Freethought was once more dying? The proof was absolutely convincing—to Mr. Spurr. An institution that could raise £40,000 must have something in it. And other clergymen agreed. A fortieth part of that sum would have convinced them.

Now, once more Mr. Spurr has turned up with his usual song of victory over an enemy that he is never tired of killing, and which is, apparently, never tired of being killed. This time it is on the subject of "Atheism and the War," and he makes two discoveries, each of which cancels the other. That is what one would expect from Mr. Spurr. Most writers, even though they may be wrong in what they write, manage to keep consistently wrong for a least a single article. Mr. Spurr is above such juvenile consistency. That a paragraph shall be consistent with itself is, apparently, all he demands of himself. For a whole article to be consistent with itself would be absurd; it might be even dangerous, for some people might suspect Mr. Spurr of being tainted with "Rationalism," or even Atheism. And if any popular preacher can say, in the spirit of the parson who thanked God there had never been a pleasant Sunday afternoon in his church, "Thank God, I have never tried to rule my life by Reason," it is Mr. Spurr.

Atheism is responsible for the War. That is the first of Mr. Spurr's discoveries. The War will probably kill the Rationalist propaganda. That is the second, and they are both equally true. How does Mr. Spurr find out that Atheism is the cause of the War? The Czar of Russia, the German Emperor, the King of England, the Emperor of Austria, are all Christians. There is no doubt of that. The vast majority of the people in all the countries engaged in the War are Christian. There is no doubt of that either. Does Mr. Spurr mean that the minority of Atheists have been powerful enough to plunge the world into one of the greatest wars in history? If so, what becomes of the powerlessness and ineffectiveness of Atheism? You really can't have it both ways. Even Mr. Spurr should be able to see that if he sticks to the one thesis he must give up the other.

It all, apparently, turns on two men—Nietzsche and Bernhardi. Mr. Spurr, it will be observed belongs to that class of profound thinkers who believe that a nation can be plunged into a war such as the present by a single individual. And, of course, when a man believes that he ought to be able to believe anything. Individuals express social tendencies; they do not create them. Clever, strong personalities take advantage of these tendencies, but the fact that they can utilise them proves that they are dealing with forces that lie beyond their own personality. And the very people who place the responsibility for the War on the Kaiser are the ones who also point out that this military tendency in Germany dates back to at least the time of Frederick the Great. Germany, they say, was always the same at bottom. This may or may not be true; but, if it is true, away goes the theory that Germany has been led into this War by the Kaiser. If he can do what he is credited with doing in Germany, then we may be quite sure that he represents the dominant tendency of German life. The only real leaders of a people are those who represent them—not merely in the political sense, but in the deepest sense of all.

This, however, I am afraid, will be lost on Mr. Spurr, so I return to his indictment. It is Nietzsche and Bernhardi who are responsible for the War. Nietzsche was unquestionably an Atheist, and Mr. Spurr admits that there is a good deal to be said for him in the character of a pacifist. More, "It would not be just to his memory to saddle him with the direct responsibility for the War." But after Nietzsche comes Bernhardi, and he—although Mr. Spurr does not say so—was a Christian. On the contrary, he calls him—no matter what he called himself—"an Atheist, a hard Materialist, an Anti-Christian." He translated into militarist language what Nietzsche preached as a philosopher. War is to him "a biological necessity," and "both Bernhardi and Nietzsche crystallised into severe forms the Atheism which, for a generation, has cursed German life."

Digitized by Google

Now, I am not defending this thesis of Bernhardi, that war is a biological necessity, and without it a race grows decadent. I do not believe it, and have often given my reasons for thinking it false. But why saddle Atheism with this teaching? Why even blame the German, Bernhardi, more than other militarist writers in every other country? For instance, here is an American, General Homer Lea:—

> "As physical vigor represents the strength of man in his struggle for existence, in the same sense military vigor constitutes the strength of nations; ideals, laws, and constitutions are but temporary effulgences.....The deterioration of the military force and the consequent destruction of the militant spirit have been concurrent with national decay."

From Mr. Roosevelt:—

> "In this world the nation that is trained to a career of unwarlike and isolated ease is bound to go down in the end before other nations which have not lost the manly and adventurous qualities."

Lord Roberts, widely eulogised as an ideal Christian soldier, declared, almost in the words of Bernhardi, that "War prevents decadence and effeminancy." And Canon Knox Little denies that war, as war, is wrong:—

> "Christ's approval of the military profession admitted of no contradiction.....When speaking of war as not being forbidden by Christianity, but commended in its proper place, it must be remembered that the history of nations was the history of their wars, and that nations were the creation of God's providence.....War might only be the means, under God, of reforming corrupt communities, and of clearing out what was evil and bad. It was God's scourge, God's writing in the temple."

Now, what is all this but Bernhardi's teaching pure and simple? What is the teaching of men like Spenser Wilkinson and other militarists in England, America, and France, but identical with Bernhardi's "War is a biological necessity"? And what of the scores of sermons preached since the War opened, extolling the military as a school of virtue, and without which certain virtues could only exist in an attenuated form? The truth was properly summed up by the late Professor William James: "Without any exception known to me, militarist authors take a highly mystical view of the subject, and regard war as a biological or sociological necessity." That is militarism; and it is, unfortunately, not confined to Germany. It is there in a more pronounced, and therefore more dangerous, form than elsewhere; but it exists wherever a militarist party is; and that we have a militarist party in this country none but fools or knaves will deny.

Bernhardi said that war is a biological necessity. This is quite false, and irretrievably stupid, since it is not the biologically fittest that survive in war, but the biologically unfittest. We deliberately select the fittest for the firing line, and keep the unfit at home. This is so plain that it is puzzling to see how the military mind—dull as it is—could escape its realisation. But, as a mere matter of fact, we have had since this War began, and in practically all the pulpits of this country, Bernhardi's doctrine taught under another form. We have been told by preacher after preacher, and writer after writer, that war is a great school of virtue. It develops sacrifice, love of country, devotion to duty, loyalty to comrade, etc., etc. Well, if all this is so, we are really saying that war is a psychological and sociological necessity. We are saying that the nations that go to war will increase in these virtues, and that without war these qualities will decay. Substitute "psychological" or "sociological" for "biological," and we have Bernhardi's formula repeated and endorsed by the overwhelming majority of the clergy of Britain. And the one formula is as false as the other. War does not develop the higher psychical qualities any more than it develops the biologically fittest. War utilises qualities that have been developed by other means. Man is not made better by warfare; its inevitable and invariable outcome is demoralisation—even when war is unavoidable. If Mr. Spurr and the rest of the clergy have wisdom enough to see this, and courage enough to say it, they can make an honest attack on Bernhardi. But until that occurs they are all supporters of the Bernhardi doctrine.

But what has all this to do with Atheism? Mr. Spurr admits that "many professed materialists and militarists and Rationalists are ardent pacifists," and, if he knows anything of the European Peace movement, he must also know that an overwhelming majority of European Freethinkers are anti-militarists. In this country, I should say that Freethinkers are anti-militarists to a man. Suppose Christians in anything like the same proportion had been anti-militarist; should we in that case now be in the midst of a great war? Such a result is inconceivable. In spite of all the froth and fume of Mr. Spurr, there is that solid fact before him. The overwhelming majority of Freethinkers are always in favor of peace; the overwhelming majority of Christians are always ready for war. How else would war be possible? How else would it be possible for the people of Germany, of Russia, and even of England, to manifest, not merely a readiness for war, but to so glory in it. Compare the pomp of the funeral of Lord Roberts, and the universal eulogies paid his memory, with the manner in which Britain buries a great thinker, and you may see the genuine sentiments of a Christianised public.

C. COHEN.

(To be concluded.)

A Chapter of My Autobiography.

THE SECULAR CHARTER.—II.

THE Secular Society, Limited, being registered without a hitch, much to the disgust of certain ill-tempered pessimists, a good deal of preparatory work had to be done before it could be properly launched on the ocean of life. Despite the fact that the first year's subscription was ten shillings, we got some hundred and fifty members together; Miss E. M. Vance was appointed Secretary, and I was quite naturally elected Chairman of the first Board of Directors. It was understood that I should do my utmost to keep all the Directors members of the National Secular Society, so that there might be no collision or collision of interest; an object in which I am happy to say I have always succeeded.

. .

During the summer months following the registration of the Society I was very active on the Free Press Defence Committee, and when I settled down I found I had excited the interest of a financier, Mr. Henry Hess, editor, and I believe owner, of the Critic. He was good enough to call me "a man of strong personality and great ability," but I was apparently all the more dangerous on that account.

Mr. Hess argued, however, that I might reasonably be asked questions respecting the Secular Society I had incorporated. He contended that I "asked people" to support it, and that this gave the Press the right to be inquisitive. But did I ask "people" for support? I asked the Secular party only, and solely through the columns of the Freethinker. Nevertheless, as this is perhaps a point which is open to discussion, I will deal with what Mr. Hess said about the Secular Society, Limited.

Mr. Hess admitted that the National Secular Society "lacked specific provision for possible sources of income—legacies and the like." I am in a position to add that thousands of pounds were lost to our movement in this way. This, indeed, was my chief reason for devising a scheme which would practically circumvent the Blasphemy Laws, at least as they were universally interpreted before the judgment of Lord Coleridge on the occasion of my trial in the Court of Queen's Bench. Incidentally, of course, the Incorporated Society involves certain other advantages. It does place both work and funds on a basis of legal security; and the fact that I, and I alone, had provided the Secular party with this legal instrument is a sufficient answer to those who affirmed, either honestly or malignantly, that I desired to profit by a state of illegality and confusion.

Digitized by Google

I have now to say that I hope Mr. Hess studied the Memorandum and Articles of other Companies more profoundly than he had studied those of the Secular Society, Limited. He stated that the Society "had this week [Sept.] taken definite form." As a matter of fact, which can be verified at Somerset House, I registered the Society on May 27. It is also alleged that I gave it "much booming in the columns of the Freethinker." Where else could, or should, I boom it? And why should I not boom it? Is it not my duty to use the Freethinker for the promotion of an object of transcendant importance to the Freethought party? Mr. Hess allowed that he could "find no particular fault with the prospectus of the Secular Society, Limited," and then he proceeded to find fault with some of the very provisions which are its highest merits. That as to the admission of members he described as "curious"—a word so elastic as to be quite unintelligible in this connection. Now what is this provision? Intending members have to be proposed and seconded in writing, and admitted by the Board of Directors, who are elected at the Annual Members' Meeting. Surely this is the veriest common-sense. It excludes no one who ought to be included. I may add that not a single application had yet been rejected. Mr. Hess also applied the word "curious" to the "absence of dividend," but this only showed that he had not grasped the elementary principles of the scheme. By providing that no member, as such, is to derive any sort of profit from the Society, by way of interest, bonus, dividend, or otherwise, all the advantages of a trust are secured. The funds must be used, absolutely and entirely, in promoting the objects set forth in the Memorandum of Association, and those objects include all the essentials of Secularism. It was easy for Mr. Hess to sneer at "altruistic" language, but what else did he expect in the prospectus of a non-commercial Society, established for impersonal ends? Certainly the language of the prospectus is of severe simplicity. It passed the careful and protracted examination of a thoroughly competent solicitor, and the close criticism of an eminent counsel.

* * * * *

I confess I did not understand Mr. Hess's remarks on "allusions to the property" of the Society. He said that this was a "trifle premature," and that the Society "apparently had no property, nor seemed likely to have any." Now this was worse than "premature." How did Mr. Hess know that the Society would never have any property? How could he tell whether Freethinkers would or would not leave it substantial bequests, or give it substantial donations? To my knowledge several Freethinkers had already put the Society in their wills for legacies which are substantial enough in the eyes of a comparatively poor party. Mr. Hess further sneered at the allusions to debts and liabilities as perhaps "sadly prophetic." But he knew very well that such allusions were inevitable. They were necessary formalities in a document that must contain provision for every possible contingency. Such criticism was really a waste of words.

One great advantage of this Incorporated Society was glimpsed by Mr. Hess. It established "an unimpeachable trust" for receiving, holding, and expending money for Freethought purposes; and if I have achieved nothing else for our party, I am entitled to a little gratitude for this. Not only have funds been guarded by legal security, which no one will infringe, either without or within, but Freethought leaders will be largely relieved from the possibility of certain sinister accusations. Bradlaugh received several personal legacies in his time, and it was always open to anyone to say or insinuate what could not, from the nature of the case, be disproved, that such legacies were meant for party purposes.

Soon afterwards, when the Society settled down at its registered office in the Strand, I wrote an Open Letter to Mr. Justice Wills in the Freethinker on his imprisonment of one of the Peculiar People for obeying the Bible. I was asked to allow it to be printed as a pamphlet for general distribution. I gave permission for this to be done, and it was done—gratuitously, as far as I was concerned. Yet the editor of the Critic referred to it as "Mr. Foote's commencement of the exploitation of the Secular Society, Limited." Mr. Hess appears to have thought I was of the same nature as himself. He has "done time" himself since then, but it was for a worse crime than "blasphemy."

* * * * *

Some enemies and traducers of the Society forget that I never was exactly an ass. It would not have occurred to me to supplement one illegal (or rather non-legal) society by another. What I wanted (how many times must I say this?) was legal security and nothing else. It is suggested that my law, and my law only, stands at the Society's basis. Mr. Hess was not caught with that nonsense. He admitted that the Secular Society, Ltd., constituted "an unimpeachable trust."

The fact is, as I told my readers at the time, that Mr. Thomas Harper, the solicitor who aided me in giving the project legal form, had helped me afterwards in obtaining eminent counsel's opinion (Mr. Brett). Two or three alterations were made at his suggestion, and then he gave us, in writing, his opinion that the scheme would stand at law. He could not be absolute and peremptory, because there was no precedent; but short of that his own opinion was distinctly in favor of the scheme's legality.

(To be concluded.) G. W. FOOTE.

The Touch of a Snake.

SOMETIMES strange difficulties obtrude upon the man who seeks to see Humanity living a reasonable life. There are times when all his ideals fall into the mire; times when it seems as if the ugly in Nature were really the predominant factor; as if the brute in man were unconquerable, and the ideas that sparkled like stars in the darkness of his dreams only the fireflies of thought.

It is as if some unknown Goddess with cold and deathlike face, whose lips are set hard with cynicism, and whose metallic voice sounds like an echo, had come from the innermost recesses of Nature to bid him cease fooling. He lives in a fool's paradise, she says. He romances, thinking himself a prophet, the harbinger of good tidings of great joy to men. He has metamorphosed the values of Nature and rejoices in absurdities. He worships man as the master of things, forgetting the awful majesty of the flea. He glorifies reason while the blood of his veins is lustful. Around Humanity he hangs the cloak of communal brotherhood, while in the deeps of his heart there lies the instinct for fighting. Striving to subdue Nature, he forgets he is but a minute part of the whole. He is a fool-man, even when most rational.

Petrifying his desires and chilling his longings, the visitant departs. She has stricken his enthusiasm with palsy, and his mental life has become as the skeleton of a leaf. The fire of his spirit has burned out in her presence. With her coming and going the vision has changed. Where once he saw a luxuriant Humanity living the life of his dreams, he sees now only the cold nude body of the unknown Goddess. The lightless eyes have cast a sense of desolation upon his mind. The closed lips, about which played no lively lines of affection, have impinged upon him a feeling of repugnance. Into his heart creeps a sorrow-sickness; and hopelessness, grimly repellant though it be, forces his soul into the depths of stagnation. He shudders; for a snake has touched him.

Digitized by Google

And then, after a while, he begins slowly to wonder. Looking out, in broad prospect, over the vast plane of Nature named Humanity, he sees things that have often amazed him, and have often fanned the flame of endeavor in his heart. Priceless energy and effort he sees being poured profusely into the mass, to be swallowed up and lost. Sacrifice, terribly tragic, too intense to be recorded in words, he sees—individual sacrifice that should bear some fruit; but the human portion of Nature seems as relentlessly morally, immobile as the inhuman. Lives are being immolated on the altars of causes For what? The drops in the ocean of Humanity are but drops, and the ocean itself is but an infinitesimal part of Nature.

A few scattered drops would move the mass! What nobility of nature! What egoism! What conceit! What cheek!

But the determination of the endeavor is no flickering emotion; it is steadfast, keen, obdurate, and convincing. It is no spasmodic outflowing of heated fancy, nor is it fever bred by folly. Thought pits itself against overpowering odds, and yet retains a native royalty that brooks no taunt of foolishness. Ideas suffer no obstacle to daunt them, no barrier to retard them, no apparent self-insignificance to make them cower. Against the whole force of Nature an idea never quails; and those men and women drops in the little ocean of Humanity possess a magnificence that makes their folly serious, the magnificence of thought. So he once imagined; but now his old dreams float wearily upon a sea of stricken visions. Everything is cold.

Courage unexampled in military histories, bravery that no soldier ever rivalled, daring unparalleled in national myth, he sees; and there is no song sung for the courageous. The little people who do the great deeds and think the great thoughts are the fools of Nature, doing and saying vainly the things wise men say are of the future. Animated by a passionate earnestness, they struggle against the inevitable, and are laughed at and mocked by those they would serve. Enthused by dream-zeal, they toil to open the minds of the average; they labor to widen the safety-valve of Nature; and the average looks and listens, but never moves. They are fighting Nature as man never fought man, and the great mother of men performs not one cycle more nor less. She regards the endeavor indifferently; for they, too, are but detail parts of her, and their ministrations have no more or no less importance than the workings of the meanest parasite.

His mind quickly travels over his knowledge of the history of man. Back in the misty regions he sees development. One modification in an æon of time, one step forward in a span whose terminals cannot be marked, one advance with a thousand new disadvantages, he sees. And then, after many gradations, man was as he is, the plaything of customs that had grown around him, customs full of the forces of Nature, social habits that gave power to the strong and slavery to the weak, that segregated Humanity, like the animals and plants, into factions whose life-interests were and are antagonistic. There is no glimmer of hope there.

Heroically have the fools striven to subdue the forces that kept Humanity within the bounds of its shores. Grandly have they struggled to widen and deepen the one little portion of Nature that seemed to them to matter. Admirably have they assailed the average, attempting to impregnate it with ideas that would extend its operations into a presumed more glorious joy. Far back into the picturescope of human history he sees men who, for an instant, raised their heads above the waves, and their voices above the noise of the waters, calling upon their fellow-men to think and be free. But it was only for an instant; for the waters soon engulfed them, and he could see no signs of change in the vast ocean of Humanity.

The shades have melted for him into a normal. Environments, customs, nationalities, colors, have faded into an average. Physical and mental strength have merged into calmness. Good and evil have fallen into negation. The ugly and the beautiful have no value. Time characteristics have dropped away, leaving only a dull level. He sees no purpose in anything; and man's puny purpose is a thing to be scorned, so foolish is it in this great unethical mass of turgid mankind.

In the transmogrification the knowledge and enthusiasm of the so-called pioneers, all their bravery and labors and spirit and passion, become as falling pieces of glass in a river; and the irrationality against which they fight sinks like a heavy stone into the ocean.

Man cannot rise above Nature's limitations, her averages. The depth and perspicacity of his mind are the shallowness of his dreams, and the reaches of his heart but the little tottering steps of a child who cannot grow up. Between the greatest thought and the meanest physical necessity the distance can never be measured; there is none. Between the ape-man and the civilisee the difference is one of imagination; the natural values are the same. Best and worst are but nightmares, or the two sides of the tinted bubble of morality, the air-bell of many colors that is never still, the diaphanous globe of ethic conceit that a breath of wind from the forest past can blow out.

And so he raved to himself in his own way, as so many people are raving in their own way in these days of unclothed barbarism. War had not much affected him physically; but in his mind was the picture of the Goddess, and in his heart was the hopeless sadness she had brought; and the sense of failure and a touch of cynicism were there to keep it company. And there were times when he shivered as if a snake had touched him.

ROBERT MORELAND.

National Secular Society.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON NOV. 26.

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, occupied the chair. There were also present: Messrs. Bowman, Brandes, Cohen, Cunningham, Davey, Judge, Lazarnick, Neate, Nichols, Quinton, Roger, Rosetti, Samuels, Shore, Thurlow, Wood, and Miss Kough.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed. The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were admitted to the Society.

After the transaction of routine business, the proposed issue of a pamphlet in relation to the War was discussed, and the President expressed himself as not altogether satisfied with the MS. It was concluded that the best interests of peace could not be served by writings advocating peace whilst this terrible war was in progress. Many suggestions were made as to the issue of tracts on the various aspects of the War, and it was finally decided to delay the publication.

The discussion then turned upon the liberty of the press, and the following resolution was passed:—

> "That this meeting protests against the Censorship being operated in England, at her own expense, and by her own delegated authority, as if she were a conquered country."

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Nurse (to moribund patient): "Why won't you take the brandy the doctor ordered? Surely you can lay aside your teetotal scruples at such a time as this."

Patient (to parson—faintly): "Do you think the angels 'll smell it in my breath?"

Willy: Do animals go to heaven, parson?"

Parson Goodman: "No, William, probably not—or, at least, we have no reason to think so."

Willy: "Then the milk and honey in heaven must be canned goods, I suppose."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

KINGSLAND BRANCH N. S. S. (Mr. Bunham's, 56 Richmond-road, Barnsbury): Monday, Dec. 7, at 8, Business Meeting—Re Next Season's Lecturers, etc.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

BIRMINGHAM BRANCH N. S. S. (Oriental Café, Hill-street): 7, H. Clifford Williams, "Wellington, Napoleon, and his Marshals."

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—MISS E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6¼ ins. by 8¾ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1888-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be base on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this..... day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

GILES' APOSTOLIC RECORDS. Price 3s., postage 5d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PIONEER PAMPHLETS.

Now being issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

No. I.—BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote.
FORTY PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 3d.; 26 copies 4d. (parcel post)

No. II.—DEITY AND DESIGN. By C. Cohen.
(A Reply to Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace.)
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post).

No. III.—MISTAKES OF MOSES. By Colonel Ingersoll.
THIRTY-TWO PAGES—ONE PENNY.
Postage: Single copy, ½d.; 6 copies, 1½d.; 18 copies, 2½d.; 26 copies, 4d. (parcel post)

IN PREPARATION.

No. IV.—CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS. By G. W. Foote.

No. V.—MODERN MATERIALISM. By W. Mann.

Special Terms for Quantities for Free Distribution or to Advanced Societies.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 50 SUNDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

There is not a more mean, stupid, dastardly, pitiful, selfish, spiteful, envious, ungrateful animal than the Public.—WILLIAM HAZLITT.

Advent.

THIS is the first day of the fourth Ember Week in the year, or, speaking ecclesiastically, of the first Ember Week in the new year, and the loyal members of the Anglican Church are commanded to fast during this week, especially on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday. This is also the middle of Advent, the first season of the ecclesiastical year, including the four Sundays immediately preceding Christmas, instituted as a special preparation for the Feast of the Nativity. Ember Week suffices modern Christians to get ready for the proper celebration of that supreme event, though their forefathers in the Middle Ages needed to fast for the whole of the season. Advent was then as strictly observed as Lent, all places of amusement and entertainment being severely closed. How different things were in ancient Greece! The Festival of Dionysus at Athens was celebrated at the theatre adjoining his temple. On such an occasion theatre-attending was an act of worship. From the first, Christianity has frowned upon innocent pleasure, and insisted upon the observance of frequent periods of fasting, humiliation, and repentance. One would have thought that Advent would have been a time of unbounded rejoicing; but instead of that it has been, and is, ecclesiastically a period to wear sackcloth and to repent in dust and ashes. In spite of themselves, often, parsons are professional kill-joys. Only the other day a prominent Nonconformist minister said, "I am a good bit of the Puritan, and dancing does not appeal to me." Not long ago children were not allowed to play on Christmas Day, the gladdest day in all the year, it was alleged, except Easter Sunday.

The idea of devoting four weeks to the commemoration of an event said to have happened nearly two thousand years ago strikes one as irresistibly comical; and yet ministers of all denominations are just now delivering what they call Advent sermons, the object of which is to convince the hearers afresh that a supernatural birth did actually occur nearly two millenniums ago, the belief in which is admitted to be contrary to nature. Left to their own inclinations, the people would ere long drop the belief altogether. The mission of the clerical profession is to restrain the natural proclivities of human nature, and to form within it anti-natural habits. The more enlightened among the clergy are perfectly aware of the truth of that statement, and so they throw dust into the eyes of their hearers by speaking of the nativity stories as "art and poetry." But what the preacher describes sophistically as "art and poetry," the ordinary listener regards either as literal fact or as fiction. Common sense declares authoritatively that the event occurred or did not occur; and if it did not occur, what on earth is the use of calling it "art and poetry"? while if it did happen it is not "art and poetry." The vital point, however, is that if the supernatural birth of Jesus did not actually take place, the Gospel Jesus must be dismissed as a myth. Some other Jesus, born in the ordinary way, may have lived and taught, though we have no means whatever of knowing anything about him. Dean Inge naturally holds a brief for the historicity of the superhuman Gospel Jesus, but ludicrous in the extreme is his attempt to establish his historicity. It is frankly admitted that a considerable portion of the Gospel Jesus' message was entirely falsified by the event. He fully shared the superstitious beliefs of his time, and never once rose above them. He entertained wholly erroneous views as to his own future, and indulged in prophecies that have never found fulfilment. There is now a theological school which avowedly holds that the substance of the teaching of Jesus was of that mistaken nature, all the rest being "stop-gap morality, or invented by the Church later." As reported in the Christian World for December 3, Dean Inge said:—

> "That theory was sedulously, though insidiously, advocated by men who called themselves Christians, and threatened to trip us up whenever we went to the Gospels for spiritual guidance. Arguing against this view, Dr. Inge said it was a psychological impossibility that 'a deluded prophet' could have given us incidentally a rule of life which humanity has ever since accepted as a perfect morality and an example which we all feel to be the ideal perfection of human nature."

The Dean proceeded to discuss these predictions of Jesus, "the failure of which might have been expected to discredit him who uttered them"; but, true to his cloth, when confronted by a formidable difficulty, the very reverend gentleman fled for refuge to what he called "the spiritual interpretation" of such predictions. That is the coward's city of refuge, and, beholding him taking his flight thereinto, the genuine critic can only laugh in his sleeves. The theologian's game is up when recourse is had to "art and poetry" and "spiritual interpretation." It is a ruse to cover a retreat.

Dean Inge has no right to throw the responsibility of his theological foibles on the shoulders of humanity. It is utterly false to say that humanity has accepted the rule of life given by Jesus as a perfect morality. It is a well-attested fact that a larger percentage of mankind has adopted the rule of life elaborated by the Buddha as a perfect morality. Even Christendom approves of Christian morality only in theory, not in practice. In theory, nothing is easier than to eulogise the Sermon on the Mount, as a well-known divine recently did with moving eloquence. He dwelt with enraptured delight upon its spontaniety, beauty, and truth; but he knows as well as we do that in practice it is the deadest of dead letters. Christendom completely ignores it. Dr. T. R. Glover has just delivered a lecture at Cambridge on "Christianity and War," in the course of which he explained that "the question of the relation between Christianity and war was to him really a question of Christ and war." He is reported as having spoken thus:—

> "Could the speaker of such words as Matthew v. 39, 'Resist not him that is evil,' endorse war? Does society's dependence on war invalidate Jesus Christ? We are living in a world of fact, and the ultimate test of any opinion is its correspondence with the world of experience. We believe that the facts of life and experience are of God's ordinance, that our progress depends on getting into touch with the whole body of God's facts. The question is, Does Jesus Christ clash > with our experience, negative all the facts we know about race and nationality, or does he help them?"

Digitized by Google

Assuming the accuracy of the report, we are bound to affirm that Dr. Glover has put his foot in it very nicely. We are told that it is impossible for Christ to endorse war. Then we are assured that "the facts of life and experience are of God's ordinance." It logically follows that war, being beyond doubt a grim fact of life and experience, is of God's ordinance, and that, consequently, on the subject of war God and Christ are at loggerheads. Christ's teaching does incontrovertibly clash with our experience and negative all the facts we know about race and nationality. Judging him by the Sermon on the Mount nothing can be clearer than that Jesus is an uncompromising enemy of war, but judging him by society's perpetual dependence on war, we must pronounce him unquestionably and most utterly invalidated.

We rejoice to learn that Dr. Campbell Morgan is now slowly progressing towards complete recovery from his severe attack of typhoid fever, but regret to find that he is as incorrigibly superstitious and illogical as ever. From his sick-bed he has sent a Christmas message to his people at Westminster Chapel, in which the following passage occurs:—

> "The Incarnation is the supreme demonstration of the fact of the government of God in his universe, and assures us that God will not be defeated, whatever forces may be ranged against his kingdom. Therefore, never were we so glad for Christmas."

It is the same old story in practically the same old words. Dr. Morgan has assured us again and again that with him facts have not a feather's weight against his belief in the absolute sovereignty of God. While unwaveringly holding that faith, he is not prepared to speak of the fact of war as being of God's ordinance. War is of the Devil, not of God; but as long as the Devil exists and engineers wars, God's sovereignty cannot be absolute. But, assuming its absolute character, in what way was Christ's advent in the flesh its supreme demonstration? What has he ever said or done to prove that God "doeth according to his will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth"? Most emphatically we claim that he has never reigned as the Prince of Peace; never drawn all men unto himself in fulfilment of his own prophecy; never set his enemies under his feet; and never made the difference in the world which his self-styled ambassadors so glowingly depict. In other words, his predicted saviorhood, his reign in righteousness and love, his conquest over all the fell forces of evil, all have been, and are, but beautiful dreams of the over-credulous, dreams that are no nearer to coming true to-day than they were nineteen hundred years ago.

With all these significant facts before us, we have no choice but to relegate the lovely story of the Advent to the limbo of all forlorn hopes and discredited theories. Numerous beyond computation are such advents in ancient mythology, and the Christian story differs on no essential point from all the others. They all belong, without distinction, to the same category. Neither Dean Inge, nor all the divines combined, can alter that fact. It is indelibly engraved upon the face of the Nature of Things. Nature knows nothing of either Father to send or Son to be sent. Her only great Advent is the advent of the sun from one hemisphere to the other once a year, and this advent for the North occurs this month, and is laden with all the sweet promises of spring, and the rich and glad fulfilments of summer. The depressing gloom of winter now receives notice to quit, a notice that has never yet been disregarded. Neither war nor peace either delays or hastens the processes of the sun. Nature never breaks her word, is never a second behind time, never disappoints those who intelligently wait upon her.

J. T. LLOYD.

Atheism and the War.—II.

(Concluded from p. 779.)

MR. SPURR affects great jubilancy over the decline of Freethought, the terrible straits in which Freethought journals find themselves, and the increase of religion; all, it must be remembered, owing to the War. I shall not waste time and effort by calling on Mr. Spurr to prove the truth of these statements, because I am certain he would not attempt to do so; and I am also certain that he would fail if he did attempt it. To take only one instance. I suppose the Freethinker has stood the shock of the War as well as any paper in Great Britain—and better than most. Scores of papers have suspended publication altogether. Others have considerably reduced their size, or the number of pages, in order to curtail expenses. The Methodist Times, to take one example out of many, dropped from about twenty-four pages weekly to eight pages. Personally, I should not dream of twitting the Methodist Times with this. But the Freethinker has at least maintained itself both as regards quantity and quality, in spite of the War. And the real reason for this is that the overwhelming majority of its readers do not belong to a flighty class that has its interests completely divorced from serious intellectual matters, even by the shock of a great war.

I am not going to seriously contest any of Mr. Spurr's statements about the decline of Freethought. That, of course, could be done, and has been done. I purpose exhibiting on a different plan this gentleman's muddled state of mind. I think it can be shown that, assuming Mr. Spurr to be right about the growth of religion and the decline of Freethought as a consequence of the War, that would be a compliment to Freethought and to the discredit of religion. Instead of gloating over it, Mr. Spurr ought to be ashamed of it—that is, if Mr. Spurr were someone else with a more rational brain and more intelligible principles. One need only give him enough rope for the proverbial consequence to follow.

Mr. Spurr rejects with loathing Bernhardi's teaching that war is a "biological necessity." So do I; although it is only what scores of people in this country have been teaching for years, and what the bulk of the clergy are teaching under another form from the pulpit to-day. For all the eulogies of the military life to which we are treated, the sermons and writings pointing out that by war people are taught duty and loyalty to their country, devotion to each other, and a readiness to sacrifice self in the service of others, are only the Bernhardi doctrine in other forms. Bernhardi said—as Lord Roberts said—that a nation cannot keep biologically fit without war. The others, who are cursing Bernhardi, say that society cannot keep morally and mentally fit without war. The one thesis is only a variant of the other. If one stands the other stands. If one is false the other is false.

Now, I will assume that Mr. Spurr is rational enough to agree with me thus far. I will assume in rejecting Bernhardi's teaching that war is a biological necessity he also believes that a state of war does not make men more humane, more considerate, more responsive to the higher ethical and intellectual obligations. He need not look very far for proof of this. Theoretically, it does not appear very likely that man develops kindliness by shooting, stabbing, throwing bombs, or firing great cannons. Theoretically, it would seem that war cannot even create courage and a sense of duty, since it is upon courage and a sense of duty that warfare depends. War may call for the exercise of these qualities, but they must be bred apart from war, and—of equal significance—maintained apart from war. For the striking fact is, that human nature, being what it is, cannot stand the strain of war without being demoralised. Soldiers long at war may become careless of hardships, but they also become careless of other things. The final and conclusive count against militarism is that it cannot even maintain the qualities that make militarism—for a time—possible. It is parasitic through and through.

Every church cries: "believe and give."—Ingersoll.

Digitized by Google

So much for theory. From the practical side the evidence is just as conclusive. Germany, we are told, is seething with hatred of England. The statement may be true enough, and it is, therefore, not very strong evidence of the purifying effect of war on the Germans. I do not think the hatred of Germany in England is so intense that we could say England was seething with hatred of the Germans; but it is here. People hate Germans who never hated them before, and those that did, cherish a still stronger hatred. People's minds are, quite naturally, filled with war. We accept the slaughter of thousands of the enemy with glee, we hail it—if we are religious—as an example of God's goodness to us. Evidently the War does not make for kindliness of disposition in England. But beyond welcoming the death of our enemies, there are the deaths of our friends, of our sons, brothers, parents. At the beginning of the War the first list of casualties was received with horror. Then we began to get used to it. We take our daily dose of thousands killed and wounded over our breakfast as quite a matter of course. We are, of course, sorry that such things should be, but we are getting accustomed to it. The War is hardening us at home, as it hardens those who are doing the actual fighting. Meanwhile, the higher life of the country is, if not at a standstill, seriously retarded. Social reform is stopped. Publishers will not issue books of a serious character; there is no public for them, they say, until the War is over. We have the lower elements in command of the field.

Wartime is, then, a period of demoralisation, and, ultimately, of degradation. Either that is so, or Bernhardi is right, and war is really essential to the health of a nation. I ought to say, by way of interjection and to prevent misrepresentation, that accepting the truth of what has been said above does not mean either that England was not justified in going to war, or that no one should volunteer to do the fighting. That is quite a different position. A particular war may be inevitable; a country being at war, it may be anyone's duty, or everyone's duty, to take a hand in the fighting, since we are all part of the same society, and must share in its profit or its loss. All it means is that we shall recognise, clearly and distinctly, from whatever cause a war may exist, whether it be our fault or someone else's, or the fault of both combined, that war demoralises, it degrades, it sacrifices the higher to the lower. It does not even take away from the respect one may feel, and ought to feel, for the many thousands of young men going to the War in response to what they believe to be the call of duty. It only means that we recognise here, also, while some young men may pass through the ordeal comparatively uninjured—mentally and morally—none are made better by it. War involves a coarsening and a hardening here as elsewhere.

I need not labor the point further. Under penalty of accepting Bernhardi's teaching, Mr. Spurr is bound to believe that warfare involves a process of hardening, of coarsening, of demoralisation, and of degradation. If he does not believe this, all his fulminations against militarism are so much bombastic insincerity.

Now, Mr. Spurr claims, and it is very unskilful for an advocate, and dangerous for a Christian minister, that during the time that higher things of life are in abeyance, and the national taste and temper is undergoing a progressive coarsening, "men who have not darkened the doors of churches for years are now appearing at services for intercession. It is easier for many men to preach than it was a year ago"; there is abroad "an atmosphere more congenial for worship and prayer." Now, I am not saying this is not so, although I have only Mr. Spurr's word for it. But, if it is true, what follows? Mr. Spurr draws from this the conclusion that Atheism has broken down. Well, when he brings forward Atheists who have been converted, we may pay attention to him. What really does follow from this creation of a favorable atmosphere for worship and prayer, is that religion tends to flourish in any period when the higher ethical and intellectual aspects of life are undergoing an eclipse. That is where our preacher really lands himself in the end.

And I, as an Atheist, as one who has devoted himself to the propaganda of Freethought, am not inclined to seriously disagree with him. So long as this War continues on its present basis, I do not expect to see any considerable growth of Freethought. I do not anticipate any losses; but neither do I anticipate any gains worth bothering about. We shall mainly be marking time. After the War there will be a different tale to tell. With a healthier social atmosphere, with men and women whose minds are free to play round questions that involve the higher aspects of life, Freethought will once more go forward. This War, great as it is, will not write finis to civilisation. Its advance will only be arrested.

But, I repeat, I am not inclined seriously to disagree with the position that when the tone of social life is lowered, religion gains ground. I would even go farther and say, that if you could get the social state, by a process of retrogression, low enough, and maintain it in that condition long enough, Freethought would die out. If it will give Mr. Spurr any comfort, I am not only pointing out that Freethought is theoretically vulnerable, but I am indicating how it may be destroyed. I must admit that here, unconsciously, Mr. Spurr led the way. He points out that under a state of warfare, which he must believe degrades social life, religion gains strength. I am only following him in pointing out that if you could get the social state low enough, if you could harden and coarsen human nature sufficiently, if you could only check interest—as this War has checked it—in scientific, philosophic, and literary pursuits, religion would once more reign supreme. That is all I am pointing out—following Mr. Spurr.

Mr. Spurr is welcome to the conclusion that follows from his statements, and to any comfort he may derive therefrom. The essence of militarism is barbarism. That is what we are all proclaiming against Germany, and it is true of militarism everywhere. It involves a negation of the higher and more cultured aspects of social life. It is ultimately an appeal to force as against reason. It involves social demoralisation, as Mr. Spurr says is the case in Germany. But he also finds that this state of things induces a better atmosphere for worship and prayer. This I am not inclined to dispute. For religion, as I have pointed out, belongs in its essence to the barbaric or the savage state. Anything that revives barbaric feelings is likely to strengthen religion, with which it is so closely associated. Religion and militarism, for this reason, have always gone hand in hand. Both are primitive in outlook, both appeal to the same primitive feelings. It may be true that in days of darkness, ignorance, and degradation many turn to God. It is enough that with progress and enlightenment men turn to reason and humanity.

C. COHEN.

Fresh Fruit from an Old Tree.

"In our fat England the gardener, Time, is playing all sorts of delicate freaks in the hues and traceries of the flower of life, and shall we not note them?"—GEORGE MEREDITH.

AMONG modern English writers whose fame would seem to be assured, Mr. Thomas Hardy occupies the foremost place, and it is pleasant to reflect that he is an "intellectual." Indeed, the attentive reader cannot fail to notice the essential Freethought embedded in his admirable books. Even in the earlier stories, amid their picturesque color, their delightful atmosphere, their delicious pastoral scents and sounds, we find a frank Secularism. As the author advances in reputation and grows in intellectual power, the note has deepened, until, in Tess of the D'Urbervilles, it grows into a cry of defiance, and afterwards, in Jude

Digitized by Google

the Obscure, a great sob of pain. These two books are noble and significant works, worthy in every way of this great living English author. They are an arraignment of Providence, and as we read we recall the words of the blinded Gloster in the greatest of all tragedies:—

> "As flies to wanton boys are we to the gods;
> They kill us for their sport."

It is a further proof of Mr. Hardy's genius that he has achieved success in poetry no less than in prose, and as he gets older he turns more and more readily to the muses, and writes with all the zest and enthusiasm as if he were a young poet beginning his career instead of a veteran who has enriched the literature of his country with masterpieces of poetry and prose for two generations. And Mr. Hardy has the Shakespearean quality of unlocking his heart in his verse. We do not for a moment underrate the novels. These remain, by virtue of the author's genius, among the finest literary works of our time. In the poems, however, we have Mr. Hardy's own passion, and, so packed with emotion are the verses, that, instead of having worked on the book, the author has worked straight on us. He defies, like Whitman, our æsthetics, and proves that the greatest thoughts are just those which are quickest dismembered and absorbed by the reader, and turned into part of himself.

To open Mr. Hardy's new volume of poems, Satires of Circumstance, Lyrics and Reveries, is to be confronted with a book of singular power and one full of the pure stuff of poetry. Rarely has anyone combined with such poetic gifts as the author possesses, the keen and subtle intellect of the philosopher. His highest poetry arises from the combined action of two faculties, often separated widely, for he has the power of vision and the power of understanding. Take, for example, that fine and imaginative poem, "God's Funeral." The author pictures a slow procession moving across a plain at twilight, and bearing a strange form, that seems now appearing man-like, and then seeming cloud-like. He listens to the lament of the mourners for the being they have themselves created, and whom they cannot any longer keep alive:—

> "Framing him jealous, fierce, at first,
> We gave him justice as the ages rolled.
> Will to bless those by circumstance accurst,
> And long suffering and mercies manifold."

"Sadlier than those who wept in Babylon" follow the mourners, and some of them refuse to believe that all is over; and, "dazed and puzzled twixt the gleam and gloom," the scene closes. It is a daring piece of work, comparable to Heine's vision of a dying god having the last sacraments of the Church administered to him, albeit there is none of the bitter irony of the German singer.

Mr. Hardy has other melodies, strange and alluring as a linnet's song in the pauses of the wind. Listen:—

> "Yes, I accompany him to places
> Only dreamers know,
> Where the shy hares show their faces,
> Where the night rooks go;
> Into old aisles where the past is all to him,
> Close as his shade can do,
> Always lacking the power to call to him,
> Near as I reach thereto."

In still another mood the poet sings:—

> "We two kept house, the Past and I,
> The Past and I;
> I tended while it hovered nigh,
> Leaving me never alone."

Sometimes there is a touch of regret, as in the lines:—

> "Every hearth has a ghost, alack,
> And can be but the scene of a bivouac
> Till they move perforce—no time to pack."

Contemporary literature is so sugary, so full of romantic imaginings, that such writing brings a sense of largeness; a reminder of the great winds and waters and wide horizons of the West Country, where men and women know how to live and how to die, not submissively but fiercely. Modern drawing-room readers of poetry are ill-prepared for Mr. Hardy's virile verse, and primly straighten themselves as his muse passes. They are a little afraid of Mr. Hardy's plainness of speech, his probity, and his emphatic gestures. But others there are who perceive the beauty of fact which underlies his stern verses, and understand the distinction conferred on English literature by the writings of a rare poet who is also a philosopher.

In these verses of an alert and capacious mind the world, however, is not all immitigable gloom, and the poet's mood is sane enough. His advice to us is to face the facts of life, and to trust humanity:—

> "The fact of life with dependence placed
> On the human heart's resource alone,
> In brotherhood bonded close, and graced
> With loving-kindness fully blown,
> And visioned help unsought, unknown."

These vivid verses bring out with admirable clarity an aspect of the world which, though often overlooked in the hurry of modern life, challenges the consideration of all lovers of literature, for their author is among the select few who, among the many writers of to-day, are likely to challenge the verdict of posterity.

MIMNERMUS.

A Chapter of My Autobiography.

THE SECULAR CHARTER.—III.

An Interlude.

IT is difficult to make some people understand one's meaning, particularly when they have a rooted objection to understanding anything you say in a sense that does you any honor. It may be remembered that in the first section of this history (p. 757, col. 2) I pictured ill-wishers of mine showing how I had arranged the payments of legacies to my own advantage. This I showed to be an impossibility. As a matter of fact, I said, "money had to come through the Society's bankers by cheque, endorsed by the Secretary and two Directors, of whom the Chairman was not necessarily one." I might be one of the two, or I might not. It was all a matter of chance. If I signed it was not as the Chairman, but simply as a Director. The only signature that was compulsory being the Secretary's. As to my own signature being fairly frequent, it is easy to see that it would be so. I was Chairman all the time, and generally present when such business had to be taken.

The oddest thing is that the person who challenged my statement, through the secretary, wanted to know why it was that they had always seen Mr. Foote attach his signature after hers. And thereby hangs a tale. The Chairman's signature, as Chairman, does come first on the Company's cheques; which is merely an internal rule between the Board and the Bankers.

The formula between inverted commas in the advertisement of the Society appearing so frequently in the commercial columns of the Freethinker is not a direction but an assistance. It does not belong to the Society's Articles. People can make gifts or bequests to the Society in any other language they please, as long as it is legal; but most people are glad of a little help in legal phraseology, and to save them from confusion and distraction Mr. Harper drew up a sufficient form—not a necessary form of bequest. It was really meant to lessen the trouble of both sides in postal communications.

It is not a pleasant thing for the chief of any establishment to have to show that burglary is not as easy as traducers of his have been so fond of representing it, but even disgusting things have to be done at times in the way of duty. The other day a Marquis was carrying slops in Dr. Haden Guest's French-English War Hospital not far from Paris. Somebody had to do it, he said, and, as it was all for France, why not he as well as another?

. . . . . .

I come now to the Boulter case in 1908-9, the incidents of which are fresher in the minds of my readers. It will be remembered that I took up the case at Mr. Boulter's request, as President of the National Secular Society, and all the costs (over £200) were contributed by the readers of the Freethinker, who accepted my assurance that Mr. Boulter's language may have been "blasphemous" enough, but was certainly not "obscene." The part played by the Secular Society, Ltd., was technically slight but really considerable. Having received several legacies, it was in a rather prosperous condition, and it undertook to lend first £100 and afterwards £200 to the National Secular Society in order that the expenses of a first-class legal defence might be assured.

Digitized by Google

This put a fresh face upon the whole case. Mr. Boulter had been refused a postponement of trial at the Old Bailey. Who was he? Obviously a person who had no money. But as soon as it was found he had moneyed friends behind—as soon as it was seen that Mr. Atherley Jones, as senior counsel, demanded delay in the name of justice—the case was altered, and another month's leisure was placed at the defendant's disposal.

It may well be imagined that I sat out the whole of the trial in a very crowded court, which had often rung to the eloquence of voices pleading for freedom. Defendants, or prisoners, are generally called last into court, and there are other occasions for observing the jury.

Some of the jury may have been indifferentists, but on that occasion, and for that purpose, they were probably all Christians. They all took the usual oath, so there was no Jew among them—at least, no orthodox Jew. And, in spite of the seriousness of the situation, I could not help noticing its humor. Twelve Christians in a jury-box, one Christian on the bench, and one Christian acting as counsel for the prosecution—fourteen of them altogether—were assembled to try a solitary poor Freethinker for "blasphemy"—that is, for treating their own faith with insufficient respect. There were also three Christian witnesses, all policemen, including Chief-Inspector Jenkins, who carries on a sort of mission of his own in North London. These seventeen Christians, all helping to try one Freethinker for offending their faith, took their business very gravely. Nothing but the bitter spirit of persecution could have enabled them to keep their faces. Had they possessed a sense of humor, or given way to it so far as to see the real character of the situation, they would have laughed at the farce and told the "blasphemer" in the dock to go home to dinner with his trembling wife, or even invited him to dine with them at a neighboring restaurant. Oh that blessed sense of humor! What a different world we should be living in if it were only more common! Bigotry and persecution would die a natural death. No man who saw a joke, and enjoyed it, could ever sit with sixteen pious friends to try another man for criticising their common faith in an "offensive" manner. Seventeen butchers might as well try a sheep for offensive vegetarianism.

Of course the Christian jury found the Freethought sinner Guilty. They were asked if he had offended their feelings; they said he had; he was therefore guilty of the otherwise indefinable crime alleged against him. He was Guilty. And the Judge also had his opportunity.

As the judge began—"Harry Boulter," after the verdict of "Guilty," my mind went back to that Monday night at the Old Bailey, twenty-five years before, when I stood up, with a full knowledge of what was coming and heard Judge North say "George William Foote." The whole scene from that long past flashed across my mind in a second. I saw the crowded, excited court; I heard, and I despised, the cold malice in the judge's voice; I half saw myself as I confronted him with a face that answered his challenge and was calmer than his own; for I was filled then, and in prison afterwards, with a high and even gay disdain of the bigots who had me in their toils—and I knew what George Fox meant, in spite of his theological language, when he said that God lifted him up above his persecutors and they were as dead men under his feet. But that flashing picture did not last as long as I have taken to describe it. I never lost a word of what Mr. Justice Phillimore was saying. I noticed his changed tone of voice, and I saw in a moment what was going to happen. He had got his verdict of "Guilty," but he hesitated to sentence the "blasphemer." And that very fact showed what a change had taken place in twenty-five years.

. . . . . .

Now I come to a point of vast importance. I differed in our consultations from both solicitor and counsel in one respect. They held that the law of blasphemy was really what it used to be before 1883, and that if the old law had become obsolete the offence of "blasphemy" had ceased to exist. I agreed with them as a matter of logic, but not as a matter of fact. Those who remember my controversy with George Jacob Holyoake, not very long before his death, will recollect how firmly I argued that the Secular Society, Limited, which I devised (and which the Rationalists copied) was perfectly secure. My starting-point was Lord Chief Justice Coleridge's summing-up at my third trial (for I was tried no less than three times) in 1883. He laid it down as the law then, whatever it had been before, that—"If the decencies of controversy are observed, even the fundamentals of religion may be attacked without a person being guilty of blasphemous libel." That one sentence gave me the key to a legal frustration of the Blasphemy Laws from a financial point of view. I asked consulting counsel, I asked the late Dr. Hunter "Would any judge, on his own responsibility, go behind that dictum of Lord Chief Justice Coleridge?" They had to answer, however reluctantly, "No." "Very well then," I said, "that is the rock on which I propose to build." The result was the Secular Society, Limited, which has secured thousands of pounds (through wills) for the Freethought movement, which would otherwise have been lost. And now we see Mr. Justice Phillimore accepting Lord Chief Justice Coleridge's dictum, and even going beyond it; for he released a convicted "blasphemer" on his undertaking to abstain, not from attacking Christianity, but from the use of "shocking" language in doing so. "A man is free," Mr. Justice Phillimore says, "to think and to say and to teach that which he believes about religious matters." Lord Coleridge provided the rock on which I built the Secular Society, Limited; and Mr. Justice Phillimore declares that this rock is immovable and indestructible. So far, then, the new "blasphemy" trial was a great victory for Freethought.

But while I have held that we are perfectly safe, collectively and financially, I have also held that we are not safe individually and personally. This is one of the anomalies of a changing order of things. And it is by no means to be neglected. It furnishes an excellent reason for the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. None of us are safe until that is effected. Even the superfine, respectable Freethinkers are not safe—unless they are innoxious enough to be useless; in which case they will always enjoy the safety which results from contemptuous indifference on the part of "the enemy." Blasphemy, in spite of the language of indictments, is now laid down to consist in the manner and not in the matter. If you attack Christianity you must do it in a way that Christians will not resent. Now, this is a law against wit in favor of pedantry; a law against the bright-minded in favor of dullards. You may attack Christianity with argument but not with ridicule. But ridicule is an argument. It is the reductio ad absurdum. It is employed by Euclid himself, who often ends a demonstration with the words "which is absurd." Moreover, it is only in regard to religion that controversy is regulated by law; and the regulation is only applied to Freethinkers. Christians may be as vulgar and offensive as they please; it is only the Freethinkers who must mind their "P's" and "Q's."

Digitized by Google

For this very reason the late Mr. Justice Stephen said that every law of blasphemy rests upon "the principle of persecution." If the law," he said, "were really impartial, and punished blasphemy only because it offends the feelings of believers, it ought also to punish such preaching as offends the feelings of unbelievers." Mr. Justice Stephen also pointed out that a law which says that you may discuss religion but may not ridicule it, takes away with one hand what it gives with the other, and tends to "confine the discussion to a small and in many ways uninfluential class of persons." I know that these uninfluential persons regard themselves as extremely influential; it is a way they have—but they are mistaken. I appeal to the verdict of history.

The upshot was, that Incorporated Societies, such as the Secular Society, Limited, were perfectly secure; and that the Blasphemy Laws are still a menace to individual propagandists. That had been my publicly expressed view for the previous twelve years, and I invited those who differed from me, sometimes rather maliciously, to take note of the fact. I am liable to be mistaken, as other men are; but I differ from many other men in taking the trouble to think (as far as I can) all round a matter I want to deal with.

G. W. FOOTE.

(To be concluded.)

LORD WESTBURY.

This great legal luminary, who, if half is true that was said, was really a Freethinker. As Richard Bethell he was very sarcastic in speech. He used to say that he owed his success in law and in life to the practice of the Christian virtues. A precisian in language, he said this as if the words "by others" were understood. Of one of his clients he observed, "He had changed what he was pleased to call his mind." Gladstone and Bishop Wilberforce were his two great opponents when he carried the Divorce Act against all the weight of the Church. Of Gladstone he said: "If the right honorable gentleman had lived—thank heaven, fervently, he had not—in the Middle Ages, when invention was racked to find terms of eulogium for the subtilissimi doctores, how great would have been his reputation"; while his reference to the Bishop of Oxford as "saponaceous" gained for Wilberforce the sobriquet of "Soapy Sam" for the rest of his days. He opposed, too, Wilberforce's scheme for constituting foreign bishoprics without first procuring the license of the Crown. Curiously enough, these opponents both died at the same time—in July, 1873.

There was little love lost between Westbury and Wilberforce. W. P. Frith, R.A., tells in his Autobiography how, when he painted his picture of the marriage of the Prince of Wales, "when the Lord Chancellor sat for me, his eye caught the form of the Bishop of Oxford, and he said, 'Ah, I should have thought it impossible to produce a tolerably agreeable face, and yet preserve any resemblance to the Bishop of Oxford.' And when the Bishop saw my portrait of Westbury he said: 'Like him? Yes; but not wicked enough.'"

His criticism of Darwin's Origin of Species was keen. He said that, while he was convinced it was impossible that all forms of life had come from one and the same creative act, the greater difficulty was to suppose that they had all come from one and the same creative mind.

On Westbury's elevation to the Woolsack someone remarked that, after the heated atmosphere of the House of Commons, he might fancy himself in Paradise when presiding over the peers. "I might, indeed, do so," the Chancellor replied, "but for the predominant and excessive display of lawn sleeves, which at once dispels the pleasing illusion." On a later occasion he objected to a Bishops' Resignation Bill, giving as his reason, "The law in its infinite wisdom has already provided for the not improbable event of the imbecility of a bishop."

One of the best legal anecdotes is told, not of him, but of Lord Bramwell. Someone asked him if he could draw up an indisputable will. "No," he answered; "God Almighty tried it, twice; but people have been wrangling about his testaments ever since."—J. M. Wheeler.

A negro woman who was a cook had a Chinaman for a beau, and the mistress of the house, to discourage the marriage, asked the negro woman if she had ever thought what their children would be. "Oh, yes," said the negro woman, "we has talked it all over, and knowed the children would all be Jews; but we don't kear."

Acid Drops.

We commented, a week or two ago, in our Correspondence, on a recent utterance of Rev. R. J. Campbell in connection with Secular Education. Here is what he actually said:—

> "If I had my time to come over again I would never vote for the relegation of religious instruction to a subordinate place in the day schools. We want not less of it, but more. Character is more important in a teacher than accomplishments; the moral should come before the mental; we do not want to grow a nation of sharpers, but of earnest God-fearing men and women."

We reproduce Mr. Campbell's exact words because a correspondent writes wondering whether we have not misrepresented Mr. Campbell. It will be seen that Mr. Campbell's own words place him in a more objectionable light than our summary of what he said. Then we were content to say that his talking about Secular Education relegating religion to a subordinate place in the schools showed that he had never even understood what Secular Education meant. For Secular Education does not propose to place religion in a subordinate position in the schools. It means leaving religion out altogether as a subject with which the State has no right of interference. That implies neither inferiority nor superiority. The State remains simply neutral. And as a matter of fact the Education Act—while it does provide for religious instruction—actually places it in a subordinate position. It can only be introduced during a prescribed time, and must not be introduced during five-sixths of the school time.

Mr. Campbell is not bound to agree with secular education—although, as a "Free Churchman," he ought to be strongly opposed to the State teaching religion anywhere or to anyone. Still, as a public teacher, he is bound to try and understand it, and also not to misrepresent those who believe in it. And his remarks that he considers character of importance, and that we do not want to turn out a nation of sharpers, with the implication that secular educationalists do not believe the one and achieve the other, is no more than a piece of slimy Nonconformist impertinence. Whatever may be the value of the elementary schools as trainers of character, that value is certainly not lessened by the removal of religion. And not a few of the very best of the teachers in this country believe they will find their power in developing strong and desirable characters to be enormously strengthened when religion is cleared out, and the time given to that devoted to rational methods of character training. And apart from the principle of non-interference by the State in matters of religion, one count against the present system is that it does not turn out the character that should be turned out, and, in addition, turns many hundreds of teachers into hypocrites. No one wants to turn out a nation of sharpers. Besides, the thing is a sheer impossibility. You might have half a nation of sharpers, but the other half must be fools or the sharpers would starve. And Mr. Campbell belongs to an order that has always seen to it that there shall be no scarcity of the class that provides the possibility of the sharper's existence.

Mr. Blatchford offered some criticism of Mr. Bernard Shaw's Common Sense About the War, to which the latter replied in the Weekly Dispatch. In the course of that reply Mr. Shaw said:—

> "I have demanded several things for the soldier which Mr. Blatchford also demands, and two things that he has not demanded. One is that our soldiers should not be deprived of their rights in the Prussian manner, the other is that men of Mr. Blatchford's opinions concerning religion should be enabled to enlist without having their consciences outraged by being forced to take an oath in which they do not believe. Anybody but Robert Blatchford would be grateful to me for standing by him. But Robert regards it as a liberty on my part to meddle. I am sorry, but I shall go on meddling."

So far as the last point, at least, is concerned, we hope that Mr. Shaw will keep to his word. It is well not to think of the soldier as mere "cannon fodder," and we are afraid that praise of the soldier often goes little further than this. If we want men for soldiers, the surest way of achieving our ideal is to treat them as men, once we have secured them.

The Rev. R. S. King, rector of St. Clement's Church, Leigh-on-Sea, suggested in a recent sermon that "it might be the sheer wickedness of man that had brought calamity to the whole earth." Does the reverend gentleman think that the two Kaisers are God's destroying angels?

The Bishop of Chelmsford, speaking at St. John's Church, Southend, said that the force causing men to sacrifice their lives in the service of their country was due to Christian teaching. Of course! To the shoemaker, there's nothing like leather.

Digitized by Google

The restraining power of religion is often spoken of by the clergy. At a sale of work, in connection with the Southend Girls' Shelter, recently, the Rev. F. D. Pierce said they had members of the Greek, Roman Catholic, Dutch Reformed Churches, as well as the Church of England, under their care. Apparently none of these religious institutions can prevent girls taking the wrong turning.

The Young Men's Christian Association is asking people to give £800 buildings for the War camps, one hundred of which are "wanted at once." This looks as if the Y.M.C.A. had given up the spiritual work of soul-saving for the secular delights of a building society.

"God himself is on trial" during this War. It is not we who say this, or it would be downright blasphemy. It is taken from a leading article in the Christian Commonwealth. The writer is very anxious to know what God thinks about the War, although the clergy have been telling us ever since the War began that they know, and that he quite agrees with us. Still, this writer is not quite easy, and he confesses to a feeling "like a bad dream" that "God cannot really care, or he would not allow things to go such lengths that are happening now. No human father would let things go to such lengths as our heavenly father does." Now that, we take it, is a good example of normal human feeling warring against theological teaching. All England is blaming the Kaiser for causing or permitting the War when he might have prevented it. And yet the same people refrain from blaming God, who surely might have prevented the War more easily than the Kaiser. Nay, they not only refrain from blaming him, but they actually go on their knees and compliment him on his wisdom and benevolence. We agree with the Christian Commonwealth that no human father would act as our "heavenly father" does. And we add that if he did, all decent people would shun his company.

But of course, being a Christian, the Commonwealth writer dare not push his opinions to their logical conclusion. Instead of doing this, he falls back upon the absurd position that "It is more reasonable, as well as more religious, to believe that God holds the reins than to believe that there are no reins to hold." How on earth can this be more reasonable? Certainly it is the more horrible of the two. It is bad enough to think of the present state of Europe, and to reflect upon the madness of nations that can bring about such a War as the present one. But at least we can see that it does result from human stupidity and greed and cruelty and ambition, and we can hope for improvement some day. It is only an undeveloped human nature that we have to fight against. But to believe that someone is holding the reins, that all this is part of a plan, that these millions of men—hardly one of whom owe those they are seeking to kill any individual ill-will—to believe that all the blood and horror of this war is brought about by a God who is "holding the reins,"—why, to believe this is almost to invite suicide or insanity. No one ought to be able to hold such a belief and remain sane. And no one could hold and realise what such a belief involves without going insane—at least, we hope not, for the sake of common human decency.

It may be disheartening to British Christians, but there is undoubtedly a marked tendency in the German world of piety to treat the War as a religious one. British Christians will naturally resent this as they resent the Kaiser calling on God. They appear to believe that as Britain rules the waves, so she dominates heaven. Heaven is not exactly a British colony, but it is within our "sphere of influence." Germany, however, seems inclined to contest this. The Times tells us that "a religious wave has swept through the country since war broke out, the Kaiser leading the way. In every telegram, in every message, the Almighty's name is mentioned." The writer of the above adds: "I have never witnessed a more touching service than in Cologne Cathedral one Sunday morning in the middle of October. The priest happened to mention the destruction of the Cathedral of Rheims, and a heartrending sob was heard among the worshipers. There was a long silence, and then the priest knelt down and ended his sermon with a prayer for peace." Devotion and destruction, piety and plunder! There is more than an alliterative connection between them.

As we are assured that religious feeling is being everywhere strengthened since the War began, it is well to note its influence in inducing kindly and humane feelings. Most people are aware that in Russia the Jews are confined within certain provinces, beyond which travelling is forbidden. This area may be contracted or enlarged at the discretion of the authorities. This means that every Jew is deprived of a right which other Russian subjects can only lose by committing a crime. Now the beneficial influence of the religious enthusiasm, which we are told is sweeping over Russia like a wave, may be gauged by one or two points from an article by Prince Paul Dalgorukoff in a Russian magazine dated November 1. He points out that although trade in Poland has been brought to a standstill, Jews are not allowed to go outside the "pale" in search of work. They must starve with their co-religionists. Worse than this is the fact that although wounded Jewish soldiers are distributed all over Russia, their relatives are not permitted to see them, as that would mean their travelling beyond the pale. To do justice to Russia, we ought to point out that there is one condition which enables a Jewish woman to travel outside the pale—that is, if she registers herself as a prostitute. And, as a matter of fact, this has been done by respectable Jewish girls in order to be able to study at some of the Russian Universities.

As another sample of Russia's love of religious freedom, we may mention that Pastor Fetler, a Baptist minister, has just been sentenced—after a trial behind closed doors—to four months' imprisonment. The charge against him is that of proselytising.

Rev. J. D. Jones, who has just returned from a visit to Australia, says:—

> "The Churches are up against the spirit of materialism, just as in England—perhaps more so. Climate, plus prosperity, makes the work of the Churches pretty difficult. They may not have the same fight against social unrighteousness, and they have no problem of poverty, as we have. But there is the climate difficulty, and the problem of prosperity presents itself in that materialistic temper. The climate encourages open-air life, and that constitutes a difficulty for the Churches."

This seems a long way round to say that religion doesn't flourish where people are contented and prosperous. And yet that is all Mr. Jones does say. In England preachers complain that people are drifting away from Christianity because of the injustice of social conditions. In Australia it seems they are drifting away because the injustice is not there, or at any rate, is not so acute. Strange it doesn't strike the very profound J. D. Jones that the people will gradually leave Christianity whether economic conditions are good or bad. It is part of the general effects of intellectual development.

Why doesn't someone travel about with the Bishop of London, and so save him from saying many stupid things? He is now shrieking for Great Britain to imitate the example of Russia, and prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks. The poor man appears to be under the impression that the ukase prohibiting the Government sale of vodka applies to all alcoholic drinks. This is not so. It is vodka alone that is prohibited. The sale of beers and wines continues—and has increased.

Another clerical follower of Bernhardi! Rev. W. Sutherland, of Bath-street U. P. Church, Glasgow, says that the War "is going to bring to the Church of God, to the Empire, and to Europe, that revival for which we have been praying and striving. Over the bloodstained fields of France and Flanders the seed was sown, and the harvest would be nations purified in their moral and spiritual lives. Could they not see the signs of triumph in the self-sacrifice, the national unselfishness, the fair lily of patriotism, and the earnestness displayed in supporting our righteous cause?" We are under the impression that the New Testament denies the possibility of getting grapes from thistles. Mr. Sutherland knows better.

A little while ago the Archbishop of York scandalised a number of people by protesting against the vulgar abuse of the Kaiser, and blamed his advisers for bringing about the War. This has upset a good many very earnest Christians, who have since been writing to the papers, protesting in the name of Christian patriotism against any consideration being shown the German Emperor. The Vicar of Clitheroe, for example, says he read the report of that speech with disgust, although he professes to believe in a religion that teaches love to one's enemies, and to treat with kindness those that despitefully use you. A suggestion was made at a Conference of the Whalley Rural Deanery that we should pray for our enemies, but it is reported that the suggestion met with a hostile reception. Some have written suggesting in a roundabout way that it is only the Archbishop's position that prevents his being mobbed. All of which is a very delightful illustration of the Rev. Spurr's statement that Atheism cannot stand the strain of the War. It really looks as though Christianity is breaking down under the strain.

Digitized by Google

We like to recognise common sense wherever it appears, and apropos of what has just been said, we venture to quote the following from a leading article in the Church Times :—

> "However much English statesmen strove at the critical juncture to keep the peace—and we believe they left no stone unturned, however earnestly the English people tried to avoid war—and our lack of preparation is warrant for that, it is either self-deception or hypocrisy to pretend that national jealousy, national vanity, and national ambitions on our side have nothing to do with the development of those circumstances which led to inevitable war. Vulgar abuse of the Kaiser, as the sole author of evil, is a drug for our consciences. It implies a paltry untruth. Englishmen are now heartily ashamed of the indecency with which caricaturists bespattered Napoleon a hundred years ago. To repeat the offence now is worse. Napoleon was a man of commanding genius, if of deplorable character, and he did himself almost control the vast forces which he launched, time after time, against the peace and the liberties of Europe. The Kaiser is a second-rate man of ordinary abilities, whom accidents have made conspicuous in the gigantic movements of to-day. To make him the chief mover is to make oneself ridiculous."

Common sense is always useful, and it was never of more value than at the present time.

The Evening News, in a recent issue, asked scathingly "who thought that the German nation was enlightened? Those, presumingly, who regard Atheism and enlightenment as synonymous." Even a penny-a-liner might have heard of "The Messiah," the "Dead March" in "Saul," the "Spring Song," and countless hymns by German composers, all of which, obviously, are the work of "wicked atheists."

Mr. Bernard Shaw's pamphlet, "Common Sense and the War," has aroused a veritable hornets' nest. His opponents have called him "Von Bernhardi Shaw," and his admirers retort with "The Great St. Bernard."

"At what point in the stupendous series of animate existence is immortality evolved? Is the baboon immortal? The elephant? The dog? The canary?" These questions are asked by Mr. William Archer. This reminds us of Voltaire's jest, that, if fleas be immortal, he hoped that they would be self-supporting in the next world.

The Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell says that at the time of the Boer War "a good many preachers, of all denominations, raved like recruiting-sergeants." Why drag in the sergeants?

"The Church had very little opposition until she did the Devil harm." This exquisite language was used by the Bishop of Chelmsford, and represents the high-water-mark of culture of the English Government religion. A critic might suggest that it was not markedly different to sentiments used frequently by medicine-men on the Gold Coast.

In an article deriding German "culture," the Evening News refers to Mr. Bernard Shaw in the following elegant terms: "the malign ass who gabbles of the glories of his Superman is not wholly removed from amongst us." An unkind critic might suggest that Carmelite House courtesy was indistinguishable from vulgar abuse, and that the office-boy need not be employed, necessarily, in lampooning an author of European reputation.

"In the matter of reconciling religious enemies, the God of Battles succeeds where the Prince of Peace has failed. Christians and heathens fight side by side, the German Lutherans and the Austrian Catholics besides the Mohammedan Turks, the Protestant English beside the Hindoo. The blood of comrades in arms is thicker than that of the blessed sacrament and holy communion."—Truthseeker (New York).

The Kaiser has just taken a step which gives one more proof of his devotion to the Christian religion. The Catholic Times points out that on learning that some of his Irish Catholic priests desired their religious needs to be assuaged by Irish priests, at once applied to Rome to satisfy their religious requirements. As a result, some well-known Irish priests have left Rome for the prison camps in Germany, and the Catholic Times contrasts this conduct of the Kaiser with that of the British Government which, it says, has failed to send enough Catholic chaplains to the front. Evidently the Kaiser is more pious than our own Government.

After working the spy business almost to death, Mr. William Le Queux has now turned his attention to prophecy. We do not think Mr. Le Queux has any novels dealing with prophecy, although he has several dealing with spies. Anyway, he is now engaged in a controversy with Miss Marie Corelli over a prophecy of Father Johannes, said to date from the year 1600, which foretold the present War and the destruction of the Kaiser and his army. The lady laughs at the prophecy, and Mr. Le Queux says he can "smile" at her. The Daily Call has opened its columns to a discussion on the subject, and Mr. Le Queux is backing the prophet. On the whole, it is a pity that Mr. Le Queux found his astonishing revelations about spies so generally laughed at—people were beginning to wonder how on earth he knew all about them; that might have saved him, at least, from such an idiotic obsession as that of prophecy.

If this War does not convert us into a nation of soldiers, it bids fair to turn us into a nation of beggars. Funds of every conceivable kind are afoot, and in addition begging is taken up as a hobby by thousands of people, some of it of a very questionable character. Thus, in one case that came before a London magistrate, it transpired that a girl who was summoned for obstruction, was selling for the benefit of the Belgian refugees. How much the Belgians benefited may be gathered from the fact that out of every 5s. the makers of the article took 2s. 4½d., the seller took 2s. 6d., and the Refugees received 1½d.—that is, assuming they got all that was arranged for them. As an illustration of another method of collecting money, we may cite the case of a lady author who writes to the Daily Telegraph that she sold twenty-one copies of a shilling book, by herself, and was sending the proceeds to the Daily Telegraph Shilling Fund. The title of the book sold was given in full, so doubtless the advertisement was well worth the outlay.

The "Agony Column" of the Times and other papers offer numerous instances of individual begging—with the War as a pretext. At the rate of at least six shillings per announcement one "officer" advertises for kind friends to assist him in buying a sword, and another one for half the cost of his military outfit—which may be anything between twenty and seventy pounds. The most objectionable begging is that which is going on for soldiers, not merely for luxuries, but apparently for the necessaries of the campaign. If these are really required it is little short of a scandal to the whole of the nation. In any case, it is a most objectionable form of acquiring things that are necessary to the comfort, if not for the health, of our troops. That is clearly the first business of the Government, and if the people were wise they would take care that this duty was not neglected. The scandal of sending soldiers out on such a campaign as the present one, and then trusting to private charity to see that they are properly looked after, is only equalled by offering a soldier's wife as "relief" or charity that which the nation owes her as a debt of honor

---

It was a worthy pastor
  Who saw with grief and care
His congregation go to sleep
  Or which was worse—elsewhere.

He pondered long and deeply
  This wise and pious man,
And at last hit on a simple
  And most effectual plan.

Next Sunday, of his sermon
  The text when he had said,
He slid adown the pulpit stairs
  And stood upon his head.

By thousands flocked the people
  That preacher great to hear,
And the trustees raised his salary
  Five hundred pounds per year.

A lady of rank, whose Sunday duties had long been neglected, was moved one day to attend, with her daughters, the morning services at the little chapel of St. James's Palace. Unluckily, there was no room; every seat was filled. "Well, never mind, dears," said my lady to her girls, as they turned away. "Anyhow, we have done the civil thing." She had paid her "call."

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £237 16s. 6d. Received since:—J. Paul, 1s.; A. Sheil, 10s.

J. G. BRIGGS.—We do not see how a sharp division can be drawn between physical and mental labor. They make each other fruitful. Physical force without mental force produces nothing—and vice versa. There is no unskilled labor; the fact is that some labor is more skilled than other; and, in the long run, the more skill the more value. Of course, we cannot answer questions by disquisitions in this column.

WELSH SUPERSTITIONIST.—Not only ignorance and superstition, but all human failings, go to the making of war. It is possible that in some cases a certain moral good is done, but in such cases there must be great room for improvement. Read our Shadow of the Sword if you can.

OLD REPUBLICAN.—We are as Republican as we were in 1869-'70 and '71, but we are not in such a hurry to realise the millennium as we were then. We have been working at ways and means instead of ends during that interval. The world is rather better than worse on the whole, and we see no vanity in hoping that our humble but earnest efforts may have produced a small share in the total good result. We do not expect any recognition from "Artifex" of the Manchester Guardian. We need not join in the general cry for justice and generosity to the Belgians; that might have injured them; but we were pioneers of toleration when Spanish progressists fled to England from the tortures of Montjuich, etc. Swinburne's Mater Triumphalis sent waves of passion surging through our breast when we first read it in our ardent youth, and the passion itself has never changed except in its power and intensity, which, alas! are at the mercy of time and mutability. He who has once thrilled at the glorious cry "My voice is up before the lark with thee" knows the meaning of what the later, more numerous, and more popular apostles of freedom and justice can never understand. "Pioneers! O Pioneers!"

"MARTIAN."—"Civilised warfare" is fighting under a sort of "Queensberry Rules" designed for better things ostensibly, but usually resulting in robbing the underdog of his last chance of a bite, which must clearly depend on accident.

A. R. WILLIAMS.—Thanks for the Voltaire story, but it was published in these columns soon after it appeared in the English Review.

W. SPIVEY.—We are obliged for the list of addresses. Specimen copies will be sent as desired. We are always pleased to receive names and addresses for this purpose.

C. CLARKE.—Received. May make use of it later.

W. L. ROWE (Montana, U.S.A.).—Your letter with enclosure received, which has been handed over to our shop-manager.

"EARBY."—The Bon Sens of the Curé Meslier is of no commercial value—not more than a couple of shillings, but it is a book that had a great influence in its day.

B. DUPREE.—Bible Romances is for the present out of print, but the 6d. edition of the Bible Handbook is still in stock. You must press your newsagent to get what you require.

A. STAPLES.—See "Sugar Plums." The incident is a very regrettable one, and we will consider what can be done in the matter. Most probably the N. S. S. Executive might be inclined to deal with the matter.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen lectures to-day (December 13) in the Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate, Leicester. There will doubtless be the usual good audience, and the subject, "The God of Battles and the Prince of Peace," should prove of interest to many others besides Freethinkers. The lecture commences at 6.30.

Mr. Cohen wishes us to state that he is responsible for an error in last week's issue in connection with the Honorarium Fund. Subscribers to this Fund will doubtless have congratulated all concerned on noting last week's total. This was given as £272 6s. 6d. And in such a year as the present there would have been every reason for congratulation. But, alas, things are not as stated. The real total of subscriptions received and acknowledged—and every subscription received is acknowledged—was £236 6s. 6d. There was an error in addition—or by inadvertently writing a wrong figure in the total—of £36. The Fund is still over sixty pounds short of the amount of £300, although most of this will probably be made good before the year closes.

The London Freethinker's Annual Dinner has been fixed for the second Tuesday in January. The place is the same as on the last occasion—Frascati's Restaurant, Oxford-street. There is, however, one alteration in the program rendered necessary by the new early closing order. The dinner this year will commence at 6.30 instead of 7.30. The number of tickets is limited, and early application is advisable for many reasons. Tickets this year will only be sent to those who apply for them, and it will be quite impossible to purchase tickets on the evening of the dinner, as was done on previous occasions. There will be the usual musical program and speeches by representative Freethinkers, concerning which particulars will be announced later.

A lecture on "Nietzsche and the War" will be given by Mr. J. T. Lloyd at the Humanitarian Society's meeting-place, Fife Hall, Kingston-on-Thames, to-day (December 13). Admission, we believe, is free. We hope to hear of a good meeting.

The English Review for December contains a lot of interesting matter, but the shadow of the great War is too much over it all, and the writers are all too ready to explain this great catastrophe. It might do some of them good to have it suggested that they may be mistaken. At present the world seems almost to owe an apology to Messrs. Hyndman and Belfort Bax for not heeding the teaching of Socialism, which has collapsed like a house of cards in a gale of wind—as we expected; just as suffragette arson and slaughter disappeared when the real thing came upon the scene. Folly and ill-temper seem, after all, the residual psychology of this unprecedented contest. But there is room for hope yet. Hundreds of German prisoners, the other day, were marching through the principal street in Southend-on-Sea towards their floating prisons at the end of the pier. They presented all sorts of human nature, but rags and misery were the prevailing types. Some of the more hooligan population, at a certain corner, were for greeting the captives with groans and jeers, but they were shamed out of that by the manly protest of one human voice. Here and there an Englishman offered his unfortunate German brother a soothing cigarette, which was accepted with a grateful smile. There is the secret of the world's salvation. Neither keys nor statesmen will do it. We have nothing to trust to but the multiplication of the kind-hearted. At present they are only "the remnant." Not War, but Wisdom drives man towards his Millennium.

"No sword
Of wroth her right arm whirl'd,
But one poor poet's scroll, and with his word
She shook the world."

We notice in another column Mr. Bernard Shaw's timely demand that soldiers who do not believe in any of the stock religions of the country shall be treated by the powers that be as though they possessed a conscience. We have received many complaints from both soldiers and sailors in respect to this question, and the general burden of them is that whatever "religious freedom" is promised them on joining, these promises are treated as a mere "scrap of paper," to be torn up when convenient. The latest complaint we have received is from one of our battleships, and is a peculiarly offensive case of bigotry. A sailor who joined the Navy as a boy was duly entered as belonging to the Church of England. With maturity came a change of opinion. Having served his time in the Navy, he became one of the Naval Reserve, and was called up on the outbreak of war. He at once made a request to his captain that the description on his paper should be changed from Church of England to that of Freethinker. "What do you want to change your religion for?" asked the captain. He was told that the man had ceased to believe in Christianity. "What religion do you want to change to?" was the next question. To this the answer was made, "None at all; I am a Freethinker, sir." The reply was, "Not granted," and the man was dismissed. So that in this case an avowed Freethinker will be punished if he does not attend "Divine Service," after having respectfully requested to play the part of a honest man and not that of a hypocrite. We venture to suggest to both the military and naval authorities that this kind of treatment is not calculated to attract the better type of character into either Army or Navy, and still less to imbue the men with any strong faith in the reality of British freedom.

Digitized by Google

Autumnal Fires and Festivals.—II.

(Concluded from p. 774.)

IT is a noteworthy feature of these semi-religious festivals that, in the various accounts that exist of their quite modern celebration, men as well as lads participated in their grand anniversary. But as these Hallowe'en festivals had always borne a suspicious resemblance to Pagan customs, in addition to the fact that they were frequently the occasion of boisterous and unseemly behavior, the Puritan divines were therefore enabled to set their severe countenances against them with an easy conscience. From being the serious regard of adults of both sexes, who danced and sang round the roaring flames, the fire festivals of All Hallows' Eve declined into the mere amusements of school children, and even in the homes of their most honored observance their one time solemn significance has been practically forgotten. Fortunately, the hand of the antiquary has recorded much of the evidence of their former importance, thus affording invaluable help to the folk-lorist who sifts and weighs the records in question, and which, in the larger light of modern anthropology, enables the evolutionary philosopher to, in some measure, restore the strayed history of the past.

From this standpoint alone it is fortunate that the lighter side of these celebrations has, to some extent, persisted in the fireside pastimes of Hallowe'en. The fires that formerly blazed and shone on the open heath have been replaced by the hearth-fire, around which the house-dwellers, with their invited guests, long continued to assemble to commemorate with chat and pastime the departed splendors of an aforetime seriously important anniversary.

In the district of Buchan, in North-Eastern Scotland, Hallowe'en fires were built to burn the witches. Not only the rustics, but the farmers themselves regarded the bonfires as something essential to their lives. The boys begged at each cottage door for a peat to burn the witches. In many districts the lads collected straw, furze, and other inflammable materials, which they made into a mound, to be afterwards set ablaze. Each lad in turn lay as near the burning mass as he conveniently could without being singed by the flames, while the others rushed through the smoke, and leaped over their recumbent companion. When the fire was exhausted, they scattered the ashes in every direction, and it was a point of honor to see who could scatter most. With reference to the Scottish celebrations, Dr. Frazer quotes an old writer to the following effect: "The Hallow-even-fire, another relict of Druidism, was kindled at Buchan. Various magic ceremonies were then celebrated to counteract the influence of witches and demons, and to prognosticate to the young their success or disappointment in the matrimonial lottery." As late as the middle of the nineteenth century, the Braemar Highlanders carried flaming torches round their fields at Hallowe'en to promote their fertility in the coming year.

Superstition naturally flourishes longest in remote districts, and in the Scottish Highlands the faith in divination was very firmly entrenched in the minds of the people. Even now the fancy is deeply fixed in the average Celtic Scot. This figment of the imagination was by no means confined to the natives of Northern Britain; it was equally in evidence in the Lowland counties. Regarding the beliefs immortalised in Burns' poem, "Hallowe'en," Dr. Frazer suggests that his Lowland countrymen may have imbibed these beliefs, not from their Saxon ancestors, but from the customs of the Celts, who were subdued by the Teutonic settlers in Scotland. On the other hand, it seems equally feasible that these superstitions—at least in their fundamental forms—were once the common property of the entire Aryan race.

In both the Highlands and Lowlands of Scotland the youth of both sexes assembled on the Eve of All Hallows to indulge in pastimes, which were thinly disguised forms of Pagan divination. The wedded bliss, the wretched or joyous bachelorhood, the perpetual spinsterhood, and the riches or poverty of the couples mingling in the games, were then decided. Another curious Hallowe'en custom was to steal unobserved into a neighbor's kailyard, and with closed eyes to pick up the first kailstock the hand encountered. Unless the cabbages were purloined without the knowledge or consent of their proprietor, they were worthless for divining purposes. It was also essential that the owner of the stolen cabbages, whether man or woman, should be unmarried. When the above conditions were complied with, the pilfered kail was carried home and inspected, and from its weight, form, and features, were to be inferred the length, breadth, and beauty of the future spouse.

> "The taste of the custock, that is, the heart of the stem, was an infallible indication of his or her temper; a clod of earth adhering to the root signified, in proportion to its size, the amount of property which he or she should bring to the common stock. Then the kailstock, or runt, as it was called in Ayrshire, was placed over the lintel of the door; and the baptismal name of the young man or woman who first entered the door after the kail was in position would be the baptismal name of the husband or wife." *

Girls also scattered hemp or lint seed in the fields, crying aloud that the seed was sown, and that he who was destined to wed her must come and harrow it. Then the maiden would glance over her left shoulder and dimly distinguish the figure of her future lord in the gloom.

Many other quaint Scottish customs prevailed at this period, such as those of the winnowing-basket, the thrown shoe, the wet shirt, and the clue of blue yarn. All of these modes of divining the coming misery or bliss of the parties concerned were conducted in the open air. Several others were confined to the house, before the grateful glow of the fire. At Hallowe'en certain marks on the white of eggs placed in a goblet of clear water enabled the performer of this rite to completely answer the awkward question which Mrs. Harris put in vain to Mrs. Gamp. There was also a widespread Celtic belief that babes born at Hallowe'en were endowed with the wonderful power of perceiving and conversing with supernatural beings. The fireside customs included the simmering nuts, the milk and the meal, and the salt herring among others, all of which were designed to reveal what lay pregnant in the womb of the impending year. Robert Burns refers to these gatherings where he writes:—

> "Some merry, friendly country folks
> Together did convene,
> To burn their nits, and pou their stocks
> An haud their Hallowe'en."

The Hallowe'en fires were very popular in North Wales less than a century ago. The bonfire was kindled on the most commanding site in the neighborhood of the dwelling, and when the blaze had died down, all present flung a stone into the embers. Each stone was marked for subsequent identification. This ceremony completed, the people prayed round the ashes, and then retired to bed. As soon as they arose next morning they collected the stones, and should any one have disappeared, the person who had thrown it was certain to shuffle off this mortal coil before Hallowe'en came round again. A writer of a hundred years ago informs us that the > "Autumnal fire is still kindled in North Wales, being on the eve of the first day of November, and is attended by many ceremonies; such as running through the fire and smoke, each casting a stone into the fire, and all running off at the conclusion to escape from the black short-tailed sow; catching up an apple suspended by a string with the mouth alone, and the same by an apple in a tub of water; each throwing a nut into the fire, and those that burn bright betoken prosperity to the owners through the following year, but those that burn black and crackle denote misfortune. On the following morning the stones were searched for in the fire, and if any be missing, they betide ill to those who threw them in."

Dr. Frazer notes that Sir John Rhys held that the

* Balder the Beautiful, vol. i., p. 285.

Digitized by Google

Hallowe'en fire festivals probably linger even now in Wales, and that old people were recently to be found, and may be living still, who remember the practice in vogue in their youth of waiting until the flames had burnt themselves out, when a sudden rush would be made, everyone shouting "The cropped black sow seize the hindmost!" This assuredly appears like a humanised modification of an original sacrifice of one of the celebrants. It is also significant that in Carnarvonshire the name of "the cutty black sow" is sometimes utilised as an easy expedient for scaring children.

The Welsh Hallowe'en divining customs so closely resemble those of Scotland that there can be little doubt of their common origin. The ladder of yarn employed by Welsh girls to divine the coming spouse was a mere variant of the Scottish "clue of blue yarn." Another mystical Welsh ceremony consisted in arranging three basins on the table. Clean water was poured into one, dirty water into another, while the third remained empty. The maidens usually, and occasionally the boys as well, then proceeded to ascertain their fate. Their eyes were bandaged, they were guided to the table, where they groped their hands towards one of the bowls. "If they happened to dip into the clean water, they would marry maidens or bachelors; if into the dirty water, they would be widowers or widows; if into the empty bowl, they would live unmarried."

In an eighteenth century account of the Hallowe'en ceremonies of Ireland, variants of the Welsh and Scottish customs may be seen. Brave preparations were made for the annual feast, which bore a striking resemblance to the Christmas celebrations as they existed down to Pickwickian days. It was the great season for foretelling the future, and for divining the identity of one's destined partner. The similarity of the picture presented by the writer, General Vallencey, to that drawn by Burns in his poem, points to a close kinship between the Irish customs and those of the Ayrshire peasants.

In County Leitrim and in Queen's County the Irish girls ascertained the nature of their future husbands with the help of cabbages, just as in Scotland. The boys silently gathered ten green ivy leaves, one of which they rejected and set the remaining nine under their pillows, so as to dream of their own true loves at Hallowe'en. A further form of divination was to place a nut and a ring in a cake, which was baked and eaten. The lucky one whose slice contained the ring would be first wed. The finder of the nut would mate with a widow or widower, but if the nut proved to be a mere shell, the lad or lass would die unwed.

> "In County Roscommon, which borders on County Leitrim, a cake is made in nearly every house at Hallowe'en, and a ring, a coin, a sloe, and a chip of wood are put into it. Whoever gets the coin will be rich; whoever gets the ring will be married first; whoever gets the chip of wood, which stands for a coffin, will die first; and whoever gets the sloe will live longest, because the fairies blight the sloes on the hedges on Hallowe'en, so that the sloe in the cake will be the last of the year."

In Celtic Manxland the celebrations of this season were kept up on a lavish scale till comparatively recent days. The Hallowe'en fires were kindled and the observances designed to disarm danger from witches, imps, and fairies were religiously commemorated. The Manx youths traversed the Isle at night, and at each house-door they chanted a rhyme which means "This is Hollantide Eve," Hollantide being a Manx modification of the Old English All hallowen tide. A medley of vegetables and fish, skilfully mixed with butter, was the customary dish for this occasion in the Isle of Man. Here, again, divination is in evidence. The mistress of the house "fills a thimbleful of salt for each member of the family and each guest; the contents of the thimblefuls are emptied out in as many neat little piles on a plate, and left there overnight. Next morning the piles are examined, and if any of them has fallen down, he or she whom it represents will die within the year." Relics of a fast fading period are these quaint superstitions, but how instructive concerning the toilsome ascent of the human race through the terrors of a dark religious past!

T. F. PALMER.

"The Great Liberator."

A GLANCE at the number of memoirs and biographies in publisher's lists, leads one to agree with Carlyle that this class of literature must have an inordinate interest for mankind. In 1900 the bibliography of Abraham Lincoln ran into 135 pages, and showed some 800 titles of books and pamphlets, to say nothing of thousands of magazine articles, sermons, panegyrics, etc. The latest edition is a "Life," by Rose Strunsky, recently issued by Methuen. We are told nothing new by Miss Strunsky, indeed she admits that, since the monumental work, in ten volumes, by Nicolay and Hay (the secretaries of Lincoln) was issued, nothing has been added to Lincoln biography. Yet her biography has this advantage, that we get the salient points of "the great liberator's" career. The stories of the old log cabin, the backwoods, and similar episodes are all interesting in their way, but they are of small import to the world at large. These incidents in his life are no different to those of thousands of others. Lincoln's place in American history is that of "the great liberator," and this Lincoln is all that really counts. Miss Strunsky apparently realises this, although she does not say as much.

Temperament influences mental as well as physical life, and Miss Strunsky does well to devote so many pages to this factor. Lincoln was a temperamental libertaire, and every phase of thought that was agreeable to his temperament, stimulated and quickened the organs of volition and action. Thus Lincoln, in his antipathy towards religion and Christianity, must necessarily be taken into account by any serious biographer, since it was meat and drink to him, temperamentally.

Notwithstanding that Nicolay and Hay, together with Lamon (who stand for Lincoln as Moncure Conway does for Paine) have given us, not "gospel truth," but "documented truth," of Lincoln's heterodoxy, pious biographers still continue to claim him as a religionist, if not a Christian. Indeed, since America teems nowadays with Lincoln museums, societies, fellowships, etc., nothing short of an annual reprint by Congress of Remburg's Abraham Lincoln—Was he a Christian? will stop the halo of religion which Christian America is artfully weaving around the head of Lincoln. Walt Whitman once took these parsons severely to task for their impudence and arrogance in claiming all and sundry, even to "seizing the keys of the bedroom and closet," as he said. If he had lived to see the way the clerics are "staking their claims" for Lincoln, one can imagine him saying: "Damn it, they've even pushed their way to the tomb."

The new "Life" of Lincoln by Miss Strunsky is fortunately not of the class referred to. This lady speaks frankly of his heterodoxy, and endeavors to show that, like his political philosophy, it was bound up causally with his temperament. Freethinkers cannot too often emphasise the credi of their "captains," as Whitman would say, and therefore I venture to quote Miss Strunsky's words regarding Lincoln's religion:—

> "Fatalistic, he had no personal God. Herndon says he never used the name of Jesus or Christ. He had no creed. In his later speeches the word God entered, and in his second Inaugural we find, 'If it be the purpose of the Almighty,' but it is evident that he used the phrase in the classic conception of Fate. It is interesting that the suggestion to use the name of God in his State papers came from Chase, which Lincoln accepted.....His ardor made him religious in the sense that he bowed humbly before the great events of life which he could not control, yet he had no vision of a cosmic order. He was brought up among the sceptics and disbelievers of the pioneers. In his youth he read Volney and Paine. At twenty-six he wrote a small work on infidelity which unfortunately was burned by a zealous friend. As late as 1854 he made Herndon erase the name of God, which he wrote in a speech. In his race for Congress in 1847 he was accused by his opponents of being an Atheist, a charge he never denied. 'He would die first,' he said to Herndon.' "

Digitized by Google

That is an honest and straightforward statement, with no hedging; and if any parson has an anniversary sermon for Lincoln next February or April, perhaps he will "mark, learn, and inwardly digest" this passage before he closets himself within his study to write it, unless he buys his weekly wail by the yard from the usual vendors.

There is, however, one point in Miss Strunsky's book that must be challenged, and that is the Gettysburg speech. Lincoln's most reliable biographers have pointed out that many of his speeches and papers have been "Bowdlerised" to suit the Philistines, and notably this famous speech. In one portion of this there is a well-known interpolation, which surely must have been patent to the knowledge of Miss Strunsky. Here is the passage as she quotes it:—

> "This nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

The words that I have italicised are an acknowledged interpolation, and since Miss Strunsky considers the speech "one of the basic documents of American history," surely some sort of comment should have been made. Not that it was unlikely for Lincoln to have used such phrases, as we have seen. Indeed, we know that he once confessed to Wendell Phillips that he had to do all sorts of "soft soaping" to please the religionists, for he wanted to save the Republic, and religious strife added to the political would have been fatal. Yet in this particular case Lincoln did not use the pious phylactery.

But I suppose the true Gettysburg speech (sans "under God") is beyond the hope of repair in America. It is learnt, nowadays, by heart by every child at school, and the "under God" is accepted as "sure" as the truthful Washington story, which has also been authoritatively denied. However, concerning the latter, that a lie was never known to pass the lips of George Washington, I have been assured by a friend, that the story is true after all, since the Americans talk through the nose.

H. GEORGE FARMER.

Christian Apologetics.

THE REV. Z. B. WOFFENDALE (No. 3).

IN commenting on the Rev. Woffendale's third proof of the Resurrection—"There is the honest testimony, thirdly, of the Apostles, who were also eye and ear and hand witness to his Calvary wounds and risen bodily condition"—I had remarked, after naming all the apostles, "Where are we to look for the honest testimony of these? Where are we to look for any testimony of these twelve men? As a matter of fact, we have no testimony that can truthfully be affirmed to be that of the apostles." In reply to these statements Mr. Woffendale, in his own journal, said:—

> "Well, if Abracadabra is really so ill-instructed as not to know, we must perforce enlighten him. James begins his Epistle by declaring in clearest words that he was 'a bond-servant of God and the Lord Jesus Christ,' and ends by attributing to Christ a still living, divine, and superhuman power in regard to healing the sick: 'The Lord shall raise him up.' This is undoubtedly the language of an apostle, and it is a decided testimony to the risen Jesus."
>
> "Next, Peter, in his first Epistle.....begins by saying that he is 'an apostle of Jesus Christ,' and he blesses 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,' who 'begat us again into a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.' Here, then, we have, in addition to James, Peter's testimony.....Again, surrounded by the Apostles, and speaking in their midst, and as their mouthpiece on the day of Pentecost, Peter stood up and testified publicly to the multitude in Jerusalem that 'Jesus of Nazareth.....whom lawless men did crucify and slay; whom God raised up, having loosed the pangs of death.....whereof we are all witnesses.' In the face of such clear, emphatic, and public testimony from Peter, speaking in the name of 'All' the apostles, we ask once more, What are we and our readers to think of the knowledge and fairness of an adversary who asks, 'Where are we to look for any testimony of these twelve men?' By this time even our Agnostic readers must begin to realise the meretricious value of the mental furniture of Abracadabra," etc.

My reply (here much abbreviated) to the foregoing was as follows.

First, as to the Epistle of James. Here, it will be seen, the rev. gentleman first assumes that the writer of the Epistle was an apostle; and, next, that "the Lord" who would heal the sick was Jesus. Now, the writer, throughout the Epistle, speaks of the Hebrew deity as "God," "the Lord," and "the Lord of Sabaoth" (i. 5, 7; v. 4, 10; etc.). It was not Jesus who was to raise up the sick, but the god Yahweh.....Moreover, the writer of the Epistle nowhere says that he was a witness of the resurrection of Jesus. Every word he has uttered might have been written by one who was merely a believer in that event. Again, the fact that the authenticity of the Epistle of James was questioned by the early Church, though it afterwards secured a place in the Canon, is entirely against its apostolic authorship.

Next, respecting the Epistle ascribed to Peter, Mr. Woffendale makes the same assumptions he does to that attributed to James. The writer, he asserts, was the apostle Peter; mention is made of "the resurrection of Christ from the dead": therefore, he concludes, we have the testimony of Peter to the reality of the Resurrection. By this way of looking at evidence, any Christian believer who speaks of the alleged resurrection of Jesus Christ as an actual fact is a witness to that event. Yet, for anything the rev. gentleman knows to the contrary, the Epistle was not written by Peter at all, nor even in apostolic times. If this be the case, where are we to look for the "honest testimony" of that apostle? Oh, says Mr. Woffendale, you will find it in "the Acts," where "surrounded by the apostles.....Peter stood up and testified publicly" to the reality of the resurrection of his Master. And not only have we the "testimony" of Peter, but we have that of "All" the apostles; for they did not contradict Peter, or, if they did, Luke has discreetly omitted to record it. The rev. gentleman appears unable to see that in this story we have neither the testimony of Peter nor that of any other apostle. At the very most, we could only have the testimony of the writer, Luke. But we have not even that; for Luke does not say he was present on the occasion. All he does is to give a place to the incident in his book. We cannot even ask him whether he took the story from some apocryphal writing, such as the "Acts of Peter," or whether he fabricated it himself. We do know, however, that the long speeches placed in the mouths of Stephen, Paul, and Peter in "the Acts" were composed for the different occasions by Luke himself. This fact has been fully proved by sound criticism. And such being the case, where is the "honest testimony" of Peter and that of "All" the other apostles to the resurrection of Jesus Christ? Echo answers, Where?

Returning to the Epistle of Peter, I select from it the following passages:—

> "Christ also hath once suffered for sins.....being put to death in the flesh, but quickened in the spirit, in which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison.....For unto this end was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit" (1 Pet. iii. 19; iv. 6).

These passages prove the Epistle to be post-apostolic. The words quoted are not those of an apostle who relates an event of which he had been an eyewitness; they are the utterances of a credulous Christian teacher of a later age, who was acquainted with, and fully believed, the story contained in the apocryphal "Gospel of Nicodemus." According to this story, Jesus Christ, during the time his body lay in the tomb, descended in the spirit into Hades, the abode of the spirits of the dead, and there preached to the spirits of ancient Biblical men, including Adam and other antediluvian patriarchs, and David, Jeremiah, and others of a later age. There cannot be the slightest doubt as to the fact that the writer of the Epistle of Peter referred to this story; nor can it be doubted that he was as ignorant and credulous as another alleged apostle—the writer of the "Epistle of Jude"—who believed and quoted from the lying book of Enoch.

Digitized by Google

The Rev. Woffendale ought to have had some knowledge of his subject before he presumed to speak upon it. He should also have stated that "Christian antiquity" does not date earlier than the end of the second century. But the most amusing feature of this discussion is that the rev. gentleman appears to have really believed that his flimsy arguments, based upon unwarrantable assumptions and an absurd and irrational idea of evidence, have effectively disposed of my "baseless, shallow, and untrustworthy" contentions. In his third reply he boasted that "the Philistine giant of Agnosticism has been met in fair combat, and thoroughly defeated. .....He may wince and try to wriggle off the point of the spear upon which we have impaled his arguments; but he will find that all his contortions will be in vain."

This reverend gentleman, as will be seen, excels in the game of Brag and Bluster, like many of the outdoor speakers connected with the so-called Christian Evidence Society—which Society, having never had any "Christian evidence" to offer, and not even knowing what constitutes evidence, spends most of its time in heaping abuse upon the heads of those whom it calls "Infidels."

ABRACADABRA.

"The Cosmic Roots of Love."

BY REV. HENRY M. SIMMONS.

(Published by the World Peace Foundation, Boston, U.S.A.)

ONE of the latest papers published by John Fiske is his Phi Beta Kappa address on the ethical aim in Nature. It is entitled "The Cosmic Roots of Love and Self-Sacrifice." It seems, however, to leave these roots quite short of cosmic. It locates them in the prolonged infancy and close motherhood of mammalian life. But, surely, they reach lower than that. The hen is no mammal, and her infants walk the first hour; yet she shows so much "love and self-sacrifice" that even Jesus took her to illustrate his own. Poets back to Euripides have praised the devotion of birds for their young. Nor is it limited to their young, but we read of them dying of grief for mates; and Darwin tells of pelicans and crows, old and blind, but faithfully fed and cared for by their companions. Here seems a foregleam of the benevolence that builds our hospitals for the aged and infirm. Even the parental devotion in every bird's nest shows the growth of love already begun.

Below birds it has begun, and Romanes says "parental affection" is found among reptiles and fish. Back in the old Jurassic swamps and Devonian seas there was some virtue. Even below vertebrates, in the insect world, there was something like it. Bees sacrifice themselves for their community, dying for their hive as patriots for their country, or attacking another as devotedly as Christian armies sack Chinese towns.

So the ant is praised by even the Bible as an example for men; and not only "sluggards," but most citizens, might "consider her ways" and be wiser. Professor Everett said, "In the ant-hill there is a civilisation very like our own,"—and in some respects it seems better. An ant community may contain more members than there are men in Louisville; yet Lubbock says they never quarrel, but are all "laboring with the utmost harmony for the common good." They may have no moral sense, but they do their duty better than many a man who boasts of his. They may have little sympathy; but Lubbock says there are "good Samaritans among them," helping wounded sisters with something like "humane feelings," while all show extreme devotion to the larval infants that are not even their own. When we think further of their vast numbers—more in a square mile than there are men in America—all and ever busy in work which Spencer calls "almost wholly altruistic," we see that "the roots of self-sacrifice" not only reach far below mammals, but pervade a vast world of social insects.

Lower still this social and altruistic principle may be traced down the animal scale, to the very sponge, which is a genuine society, made of many individuals united in service of each other and their community. Such societies may have no ethical or even conscious life, but they already proclaim the ethical principle of mutual service for the common good. They show the "roots" we are searching—only roots, indeed, and with no hint of the rich fruit to come, but already started in life so low that it used to be thought vegetable.

Even in vegetable life they have started. The plant, too, is a sort of society, with varied members united in mutual service and sacrifice. Leaves give their lives for the tree, like good families for the State. The flower is a family, botanists say, with even the wedding of sexes and parental sacrifice for the offspring. The flower may not be conscious of its virtues—and we often wish that some human families were, in this respect, more like it. But in it the ethical principle is on the way to consciousness.

It is on the way far below the flower. Down among the moulds and microscopic algæ we see two cells of different sexes, giving themselves to each other and their offspring with something of the same principle and process seen in the bird's nest and the human home. To such unions even so unfanciful a scientist as Haeckel ascribed the origin of love, tracing its source back to what he called "the elective affinity of two differing cells." Even so orthodox a writer as Drummond, using the same term as Mr. Fiske, and somewhat before him, spoke of their "self-sacrifice," and said, "Love is not a late arrival," but "its roots began to grow with the first cell that budded on this earth." So do they reach to the lowest foundations of life.

Do they not reach even back of life to the inorganic world? The same principle of union and co-operation is found in everything there. In every rock and crystal of the mountains and drop of the sea, molecules have united in systems; and each molecule in turn is called a marriage of atoms. Not only Haeckel's "affinity of differing cells," but all chemical affinity, is at least prophetic of that which unites us in societies and families.

(To be continued.)

Her organ was pumped by a self-willed old sexton, who had his own ideas as to how long an organ voluntary should last, and would shut off the wind when he thought there had been enough. One Sunday the organist thought she would forestall any such accident by writing an appeal in the early part of the service, and giving it to the sexton. The old man received the note, and supposed it was for the minister. In spite of her frantic beckonings, he went straight to the pulpit with the note, and the astonished preacher read this message: "Oblige me this morning by blowing away till I give you the signal to stop."

A little girl going to church with her mother one Sunday saw some men working on the street-car tracks. "See those men breaking the Sabbath," said her mother, thinking to suggest a moral lesson. The little girl watched them gravely. Then she looked up into her mother's face and said, "And God can't mend it."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

KINGSTON HUMANITARIAN SOCIETY (Fife Hall, Fife-road): 7, J. T. Lloyd, "Nietzsche and the War."

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

LEICESTER (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate): 6.30, C. Cohen, "The God of Battles and the Prince of Peace."

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—MISS E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6½ ins. by 8¾ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be base on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure qual justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 8d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

GILES' APOSTOLIC RECORDS. Price 3s., postage 5d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner

(Under the Auspices of the National Secular Society.)

AT THE

RESTAURANT FRASCATI,

ON

Tuesday Evening, January 12, 1914.

Chairman: Mr. G. W. FOOTE.

DINNER 6.30 p.m. SHARP. EVENING DRESS OPTIONAL.

TICKETS FOUR SHILLINGS EACH,

Obtainable from MISS E. M. VANCE, also THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 51 SUNDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Every great change is effected by the few, not by the many; by the resolute, undaunted, zealous few.
—J. H. NEWMAN.

Christmas.

MITHRA, we are mythologically informed, was born on December 25, and it is well known that Mithra was a sun-god, whose birth synchronises with the sun's passing the winter solstice. Dionysus and Adonis, though Vegetation Deities, were also born on December 25, as was, likewise, the Egyptian Horus, which proves that these were also sun-gods. The birthday of Jesus Christ, however, lacked a fixed date for many years. By some it was observed in May, by others in January, simply because the actual date was entirely unknown. Ultimately, December 25 was chosen, with the object of plagiarising and of Christianising the Roman Saturnalia. When Jesus was born no one knows, and there is no possibility of making any discovery on the point; but it is an undeniable fact that the worship of Mithra was exceedingly widespread in the Roman Empire in the first half of the second century, from which cult the Christian propagandists did not hesitate to borrow in the most bare-faced fashion. It is a highly significant fact, to say the least, that the birthday of Jesus happened to be identical with that of so many Pagan divinities. This is a question Christian apologists generally ignore, on the ground that the date of the Savior of the world's birth is quite immaterial, the only vital point being that he entered the world through a supernatural door. As Sir William Robertson Nicoll puts it, in the British Weekly for December 10, the all important fact is that the Son of God, "for our sakes, deigned and consented to be born" in the manner related in the Gospels, or as the hymn that will be sung in all churches and chapels in our land next Friday informs us, the message of Christmas is this:—

> "Hark! the herald angels sing
> Glory to the new born King;
> Peace on earth and mercy mild,
> God and sinners reconciled.
> Joyful, all ye nations rise,
> Join the triumph of the skies;
> With the Angelic host proclaim,
> 'Christ is born in Bethlehem.'"

Sir William goes a step further, and states that "he who, for our sakes, deigned and consented to be born, for our sakes also deigned and consented to die." He came into the world by a supernatural birth, and he left the world by a supernatural death. Sir William continues: "He was crucified, dead, and buried. The third day he rose again. He ascended up into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of God, from thenceforth expecting till his enemies shall be made his footstool."

Such, according to the theologians, is the message of Christmas to mankind, but it is a wholly lying message. The promise of "peace on earth and mercy mild" has been completely falsified by the event. We are amazed at the temerity which enables Sir William to ignore the facts and say of Jesus:—

> "He is on the throne to-day, caring for that world which brought him down to die. We have not only his Gospel but his Presence. His Gospel is the Gospel of the Divine Self-Sacrifice and the Divine Passion. The Christian Gospel of sacrifice rests on history, and is a manifestation of the eternal purpose which was fulfilled in the Incarnation."

Does Sir William really and honestly believe that a Being charged with omnipotent love is caring for the world and desiring its salvation? Can he with open eyes and ears conscientiously declare that the Prince of Peace is on the throne to-day, reigning supreme over the countries which are waging this fiendish war upon one another? Does he not rather perceive that the glorious Gospel of the blessed God exists only in his own brain, and has no effect whatever, except a deleterious one, upon mankind? We challenge him to prove that any eternal purpose whatever was fulfilled in the so-called Incarnation.

Sir William is a noted advocate of the reality of sin. A few years ago he could not find words strong enough to condemn Mr. R. J. Campbell because he thought and spoke so very lightly about sin, which, in the reverend knight's opinion, is the secret of the world's degradation and misery. Well, it apparently does not occur to Sir William that, in thus speaking about Jesus, he is flagrantly discrediting the Gospel of which he is an ordained minister. Many a time has he assured us that Jesus lived and died on purpose to save the world from sin, to destroy the works of the Devil, and to cleanse the earth from all iniquity; but if what he says about the prevalence of sin and the works of the Devil is true at the present time, it follows that Christ's mission remains unfulfilled, and that the Cross of Calvary is nothing but an empty name. We maintain, on the contrary, that sin is an invention of the fancy, or, as Nietzsche calls it, "the most perilous and fatal masterpiece of religious interpretation." It is true that if this view of sin were generally adopted "it would make Christianity superfluous and the world contented"; and what a priceless boon that would be. The evils from which the world is suffering are not sins against God, but symptoms of human imperfection, or so many indications that the evolution of social life has not yet reached the desired goal. Nothing is easier than to pour contempt upon the heads of men like Renan, and nothing more difficult to Christians than to be just to them. It is true that Renan was temperamentally light-hearted and joyous, and that in this sense he had a "volatile intellect" but to charge him with having a "shallow heart" is to wickedly misrepresent him. No one can scrupulously read his letters to his sister and accuse him of shallow-heartedness.

Sir William's remedy for the evils of the world is a remedy that has signally failed in all ages and countries alike. The evils are still as rampant as ever after nineteen centuries of the quack specific. "A preacher of the last generation wisely said that religions had to be tested in the street," and we hold that Christianity has been tested in the street and found egregiously wanting. Sir William dwells pathetically upon the case of a fallen woman upon whom shame and misery, want and the fear of want, remorse and despair, have done their work. Of course, the majority of prostitutes enjoy their life, and know nothing of remorse and despair; but if and when one of them is the victim of lugubrious thoughts and guilty fears, the only thing that can really help her is, not the love of Christ, but human sympathy, the kind, cheery word out of a heart suffused with fellow-feeling. If the advent of Christ had ever taken place there would have been no fallen women and fallen men to-day; Christ would long ago have made their existence a literal impossibility. The persistence of evil is a positive proof that the Christian Gospel is a gigantic sham.

Digitized by Google

Sir William points to "the cultured gentleman whom education and civilisation have somehow failed to cure of selfish and cruel lust." We beg to point to the Christian gentleman whom the grace of God and the love of Christ have somehow failed to cure of selfish and cruel lust. What do we find to-day? The Christians of Germany looking down upon and denouncing the Christians of Great Britain with unmitigated contempt, and the latter Christians returning the compliment with compound interest. Again and again has Sir William Robertson Nicoll been guilty of this great fault. Indeed, the whole of the article under consideration is an implied bitter attack upon German Christianity. We distrust all forms of the Christian religion; but we utterly fail to see that the British brand is any improvement upon the German.

Sir William avers that "Christianity is not defeated because there has emerged in history the visible work of Satan"; but, surely, common sense declares that if Christ came into the world to destroy the works of the Devil, and the works of the Devil are in strong evidence everywhere to-day, it follows that Christ has conspicuously failed and Christianity been openly defeated. "What have we to set against all this?" asks the reverend knight, and answers, "Nothing but the Christmas message." But the Christmas message has been constantly proclaimed for nigh two thousand years, and yet the works of the Devil are as much to the fore as ever. It is all very well to assert that "God in Christ has taken the field against the principalities and powers of evil, and that he must prevail"; but men of God have been saying that from the beginning at Jerusalem and Antioch; and yet it is safe to say that the principalities and powers of evil have never been mightier than they are at this moment. Is it thus that God in Christ prevails? Surely, Sir William must see that he is talking sheer nonsense. His Christian faith seems to deprive him of the capacity to see things as they are.

"Christmas in Time of War" is the title of Sir William's article, and this is what he says:—

> "The descent of the Eternal into the world of Time was a special Divine interposition. Shall we not say the same about this War? If we could not, our hearts would fail us. The reign of Christ and his ultimate triumph are no vain figments, but profound and consoling truths. We do not believe that this World-War is to be explained by the action of natural laws and forces.....Above Nature is the Personal Will of God. He allows men to go on till they begin to think that he is silent and heedless, and then he suddenly arises from his throne and brings them to the consciousness of his rule.....The God of judgment, who is also the God of salvation, had to send us this fiery trial that we might be purified. We say it reverently, but it seems as if God had no other way of calling men to the remembrance of his law, his Gospel, his judgment, and his mercy."

How easy it is to speak in the name of a being concerning whom absolutely no knowledge is obtainable. It is Sir William's total ignorance of God that enables him to be so dogmatic as to what he does or does not do. Christmas is a farce, the message of Christmas a lie, and the Christian Gospel a contradiction in terms. Fancy believers going up and down the world this coming Christmas Day, singing "Glory to the new-born King, peace on earth and mercy mild," while the children of God are brutally murdering one another in thousands almost daily in their Father's holy name. The Churches may keep such a god and welcome; we will have none of him.

J. T. LLOYD.

Sir Oliver Lodge and Immortality.

A GREAT deal of attention has been paid by the press to a recently reported utterance of Sir Oliver Lodge as to the reality of a future life. That in itself contains a moral. For Sir Oliver said nothing that scores, nay thousands, of others have not said before him. He affirmed the reality of a future life, he declared that he possessed proof of its reality, that he had actual evidence that it was a fact. Now, there was certainly nothing unusual in this. There has always been "clouds of witnesses," who have said these things, and some have believed them, while others doubted or smiled—or smiled and doubted. The significance of the pronouncement lay wholly in the position of the man who made it. Sir Oliver Lodge is a prominent man of science, and the importance attached to what he said did not lie in the fact that he produced evidence. He did not. It was entirely due to the fact that it was a very unusual thing for a scientific man to say. And the moral of the fuss made is the admission that the general run of scientific men lean very strongly in quite the opposite direction. Sir Oliver stands alone, or has, at most, a mere handful of scientific men with him. The vast majority, as he himself admits, are very strongly opposed to him. His pronouncement cannot, in any way, be called a scientific pronouncement; it is a mere expression of belief from a man of science, whom other men of scientific attainments ask vainly to produce reliable evidence.

The address, in the course of which Sir Oliver affirmed that a future life was "scientifically proved," was delivered in Browning Hall, Walworth, on November 22, and a verbatim report of it appears in the Christian Commonwealth for December 9. Now, after reading that address, I beg to say, and with a full sense of the value of every word said, that it is not an address such as one has a right to expect from a man of science. It is not a scientific address at all. It does not follow scientific lines; it does not subscribe to scientific rules of guidance. It offers no evidence; it does not tell one how or where the evidence may be obtained; it is a mere tissue of statements, led up to by a dwelling upon the indisputable fact that, in spite of our knowledge, we know very little of the universe in which we are living. It is really what one may call a tendency lecture—that is, the whole purpose of five-sixths of the lecture is to get the hearers to agree with the concluding sixth part, on behalf of which no evidence is given, and which has no organic connection with what has gone before.

What are the rules of scientific procedure, and what are the characteristics of scientific evidence? All scientific procedure is from the known to the unknown. It does not, as Sir Oliver reminds us at great length, deny the existence of the unknown, but it insists that the only way to explain or to understand the unknown is in terms of the unknown. We must proceed from what we know to what we do not know, verifying each step of our progress. In this way we affiliate each advance made to the knowledge we already possess, and so make the whole perfectly coherent, so far as it goes. In the next place, there is nothing occult about scientific knowledge. There is no esoteric side with which only certain gifted adepts are acquainted. There is no necessary appeal to faith or to our confidence in the teacher's honesty.

Mark, I say this is not necessary, although we may place a great deal of faith in our teacher's honesty. Still, that is not essential, because the conditions of a scientific demonstration is that the proofs are patent to all normally conditioned minds, and anyone who cares to give the necessary time and labor may verify the result for himself. The genuine scientific teacher is not telling you about something which has occurred to him, and an account of which is backed up by some society's report. He is telling you how each one may pass through exactly the same experience as himself, and under identical conditions. It does not matter, for example, whether a teacher of chemistry or physics, is a confirmed liar or a notorious swindler. His facts and deductions are quite apart from his character. The personal equation is, in a scientific statement, reduced to an absolute minimum.

Digitized by Google

Now let us see how far this address of Sir Oliver Lodge complies with these conditions. A very large part of his address is taken up with an elaborate emphasis of the ignorance of mankind. This may be, at times, a very useful lesson, but it adds nothing to Sir Oliver's case—except against those hypothetical and almost inconceivable individuals who believe that they already know everything. But it is strange Sir Oliver Lodge does not recognise that he is really more open to the charge of pseudo-omniscience, that is, the disbeliever in a future life. For, ultimately, his position amounts to this: certain things have happened to me, and, so far as I can see, the only way to explain them is that communications have taken place between myself and certain "dead" friends. The sceptic replies: "I do not, or at least I need not, deny the reality of your experiences. I may accept them as either objective or subjective happenings. But I hesitate to accept your explanation. It may be that some other explanation is possible. And wider knowledge, a more complete acquaintance with all the phenomena described by you may render your animistic explanation quite unnecessary. At any rate, there is a difference between my not being able to explain your experience in terms of known forces, and accepting your explanation as being the only one possible."

Now, surely, under such conditions it is coming very near the ridiculous to turn round on the sceptic and lecture him on the folly of pretending to know everything, and telling him that he really understands but little of the universe. That is precisely part of his case against Sir Oliver Lodge. He does not claim that he understands all that is to be understood about natural phenomena. And he warns the believer in a future life against being rash enough to encourage in himself any such delusion. It is the sceptic who is setting the believer an example of intellectual caution and modesty.

There are people who believe, says Sir Oliver Lodge, man's existence

> "is very ephemeral; that there is nobody to look after him, nobody that understands the universe better than he does; that he understands all about it, that he could have made it, if he had been called in, and that he represents the highest product of evolution—as, in fact, he is the highest product of terrestial evolution at the present time—and that, therefore, nothing higher can exist."

Now, I am not aware of anyone who believes that he could have made the universe if he had been asked—although many have suggested improvements—nor do I know of anyone who claims to know all about it. If Sir Oliver's departed friends have no more solid existence than these suppositious sceptics, they are hardly worth bothering about. Nor is a sceptic called upon to deny the bare possibiilty of there being in existence—on some other world—forms of life higher than the human form that graces, or disgraces, this planet. Like most religious pleaders, there is very often little connection between Sir Oliver's premises and his conclusions. Of this, the following passage—offered as a comment on that already cited—is an illustration:—

> "We know that there are other worlds, and that there may be beings on them. And are these all the beings that exist? Is it to be supposed that every intelligence in the universe must be like us, have bodies like us, made of matter? There is no such limitation likely; certainly there is no such limitation proved.....If you are making assertions of that kind you are stepping outside the scientific world and dogmatising in a negative direction."

Now, granting all this to be true, one may well wonder as to its connection with the belief in a future life—except so far as it is calculated to numb one's critical faculties and prepare one for the reception of what is to follow. It is like an anæsthetic that precedes an operation. Sir Oliver asks us to admit the possibility that on other planets there are forms of intelligent life—although he asks us also to grant the quite inconceivable proposition that they are without bodies. But, at any rate, this is not what he is trying to prove; and an admission of the likelihood of intelligent beings existing on other planets will not help him in the slightest degree. What he is trying to prove, what he asks us to believe, is that our intelligence—the personality of John Smith or Tom Brown—will exist after death. To say that there may exist somewhere in the universe non-terrestrial intelligent beings has not the remotest connection with the question of personal survival. They may exist, and if so they may be born and develop and die as we are born and develop and die. And if we think about them at all, we are bound to think of them as being like the forms of life we know—at least in their essential constitution. Sir Oliver says, very dogmatically, "I tell you that there are higher intelligences to which we are as the ants." Very well; but it is not a question of there being higher intelligences in existence, but whether these higher intelligences are born and die, and above all whether my intelligence persists. To tell me that there are in existence beings as much higher than me as I am higher than the ant seems a presumption against immortality—unless it is claimed for the ant.

Sir Oliver proceeds with another dose of the anæsthetic:—

> "What does science show? It shows a magnificence of law and order in world upon world. The revelation of the skies is typical of a grandeur of existence that we might easily have missed. It is very instructive to remember that if the atmosphere had happened to be opaque—or, rather, had been permanently a little more opaque than at present—we should have known nothing of any other worlds. Fortunately, we have seen something of the infinitude of creation. I will not dwell upon the astronomical facts; they are overwhelming when you try to realise them. Your conceptions are benumbed when you try to penetrate into the infinitude of space and realise that there is no end, and that worlds upon worlds without limit to infinity is apparently the actual truth of things; and all governed by law, all regulated by the same laws that we know here."

Please note that in the very act of administering the anæsthetic Sir Oliver Lodge introduces a piece of counsel that should act as a restorative. All this wonderful display of "worlds upon worlds," etc., etc., are "all governed by law, all regulated by the same laws that we know here. The same physics and chemistry are found in the most distant stars."

Really, I might almost stop at this point, and, like a counsel before a judge, say, "M' lud, that is my case." Everywhere we find the same laws expressed—in the most distant star as in the nearest planet, on the earth as on the earth's sister globes. And surely in that case it is safe to say that what holds true of the chemistry and physics of other planets will also hold good for any forms of life that may exist thereon. They may be of a different color or size to those on earth; they may be more or less intelligent than human beings; but they will be "all regulated by the same laws that we know here." Therefore, the question of immortality may be—indeed, must be—decided by a study of life as we know it around us. And all this talk of other worlds and other intelligence is wide of the mark; it has nothing to do with the question at issue. It merely dazzles the uncritical and satisfies the unthinking, and so prepares them for a quite irrelevant and illogical conclusion.

C. COHEN.

(To be concluded.)

Christian Apologetics.

DEAN FARRAR.

A SMALL, but somewhat pretentious book, entitled The Witness of History to Christ, from the pen of the late Dean Farrar, furnishes an excellent illustration of the spirit in which apologetic works were written two or three decades ago. In this book one would naturally expect to find, from the title, matter relating to early Pagan and Jewish evidences; but not a scrap of anything of this nature is given. The title is misleading; Dr. Farrar brings forward no historical witnesses to the historicity of Jesus Christ—nothing, in fact, but the Gospels themselves. These anonymous writings are simply assumed to be history. In dealing with the Gospel miracles in this volume, our great apologist says (p. 15):—

Digitized by Google

> "The central doctrine of Christianity is based upon a miracle, and in no small realm of literature the impossibility of miracles is calmly insisted upon as a discovery which needs no demonstration.....Nay, unshaken amid the storm of contemptuous assertion, we reply that it requires a loftier height of intelligence to believe in miracles than to reject them, because it involves the realisation of loftier than mere material verities, and the recognition of wider than purely physical laws."

It is quite true, as our reverend apologist states, that in many quarters "the impossibility of miracles is calmly insisted upon." Renan, for instance, says:—

> "It is an absolute rule of criticism to give no place in historical documents to miraculous circumstances. .....Facts of that kind can never be verified. All the pretended miracles that we can study closely resolve themselves either into illusions or impostures," etc.

Rational statements like the foregoing are what our rev. apologist calls "contemptuous assertion." That such statements, though unquestionably true, should be powerless to shake his orthodox convictions may not, perhaps, be very surprising; but that "it requires a loftier height of intelligence to believe in miracles than to reject them" is a statement which is not in harmony with fact.

In the age in which the Gospels were written, all Christians—both Jews and Gentiles, including the Gospel writers—believed, not only that miracles were possible, but that they were of daily occurrence, and could be wrought by Satanic agency and magical arts as well as by the power of God. They further believed that epilepsy, rheumatism, insanity, and other afflictions were caused by invisible demons who had taken up their abode in some of the cavities of the human body, and that when these "evil spirits" were ejected the disease or afflictions departed. These beliefs, as everyone knows, were due simply to the ignorance and superstition prevalent in that age. Yet, if we credit the very confident assertion of Dean Farrar, the Christians of the apostolic age possessed "a loftier height of intelligence" in believing in the working of miracles than does any of our present-day scientists in rejecting them. Our orthodox Dean, moreover, ranks himself amongst those who are possessed of this "loftier height of intelligence," by the possession of which he is able to believe, with Tertullian, that an alleged miraculous occurrence must be true "because it is manifestly impossible." It is, no doubt, his "loftier height of intelligence" which impels this apologist to speak of laws "wider than purely physical laws," and to make fatuitous suppositions. There may, of course, be anything one chooses to imagine; there may be a race of two-headed men living in the moon, or that satellite may be composed of toasted cheese. No one can deny—at least, in theory—what is beyond our means of verifying; and it is for the latter reason that Christian apologists talk of "higher laws" which may suspend the action of the ordinary or natural laws. If these individuals be asked for an instance of the operation of the "higher laws," or to point to some fact that may tend to support their absurd contention, all they can do is to refer to stories of miracles recorded in the Christian Scriptures, which stories were written by ignorant and credulous men in pre-scientific times.

Our clerical apologist knows, of course, that what is called a "law" is merely a record of what has been invariably found to happen under certain conditions, and which consequently may under the same conditions be expected to happen again. This being the case, the idea of "higher laws," or laws "wider than purely physical laws," which can suspend the action of the ordinary laws, is pure nonsense. Experience has shown, for instance, that a stone, or any solid body, if thrown up in the air, invariably comes down again. The fact that it has always been found to do so is called a "law," and this has been known to be the case ages before science discovered the cause. The upward course of the stone continues only until the impetus with which it was thrown is exhausted or overcome by the attraction of the earth; it then inevitably descends. It is thus simply impossible for any solid body or material substance to get away from the earth. Bearing this fact in mind, we know without descending to argument that the stories of Elijah and Jesus Christ ascending beyond the clouds are fables (see 2 Kings ii. 11; Luke xxiv. 31; Acts i. 9). Hence, the absurd contention of a "higher law"—one unknown to scientists—which would enable the before-mentioned personages to leave the earth, will be seen to be a mark, not of "a loftier height of intelligence," but of scarcely any intelligence at all.

Further on (p. 37), our great apologist endeavors to draw an argument in favor of miracles from the fact that science has not discovered the cause of all known phenomena. He says:—

> "It is the nature of things to gravitate towards the centre of the earth, and yet a balloon of vast weight, and containing many persons, will rise majestically and rapidly to the clouds.....To a savage the result might well appear to be miraculous, nor would it be easy to make him understand that the balloon rises in virtue of the very same law which makes the pebble fall. May it not be so with the acts of God?"

Here I must remark, in the first place, that our scientists are not in the position of the savage in the foregoing illustration. If they do not know everything, they have at least discovered sufficient facts to prove Dean Farrar's suggestion of "higher laws," which suspend the action of natural laws, supremely ridiculous. The balloon is but another example of the invariability of the laws that govern the universe. If a savage, beholding the ascent of a balloon, believed that the law of gravitation had been suspended by some higher law "wider than purely physical laws," he would be mistaken. Nothing is known of any such "higher laws." Dean Farrar himself does not know; he simply makes foolish suggestions. If the "acts of God" are dependent upon laws "wider than purely physical laws," then no miracles were ever performed at all.

With regard to the alleged resurrection of Jesus Christ, our reverend apologist says (p. 40):—

> "You pronounce it impossible that, after the rigor of death and the flaccidity of corruption, the veins should flush once more into healthy life; how is it more possible that, in the womb of her that is with child, should begin the systole and the diastole of the beating heart, and the unapproachable individuality of the living soul? The event is in no respect greater, it is only different."

With regard to the last statement it would be useless to offer an opinion. The question is, not which of the events named may appear the greater, but which is in accordance with the known laws of nature. It is certainly a most wondrous fact that seed, whether animal or vegetable, should reproduce its own kind, but this being known to be one of nature's laws, no surprise is felt at the occurrence of such events. When, however, a person who has been medically examined and found to be dead is three days later declared to have been restored to life, the case is different. The latter alleged event is not in accordance with the operations of nature; neither in the present day, nor at any past time, has such an event been known to have taken place. Hence, before seriously considering a case of this kind, we naturally ask upon what evidence the alleged restoration to life is founded. And, with regard to Jesus Christ, the answer is in every instance the same. We have no evidence whatever; no one ever witnessed the event, and the originators of the seven conflicting stories of his resurrection and of his appearance to his disciples are unknown. This applies to every case of alleged restoration to life recorded in the Old or the New Testament.

ABRACADABRA.

Digitized by Google

"The Cosmic Roots of Love."—II.

BY REV. HENRY M. SIMMONS.
(Published by the World Peace Foundation, Boston, U.S.A.)

(Continued from p. 797.)

IS not the earth itself member of a society which is something like a family? Even the most prosaic astronomers call the planets a "sisterhood," which have all sprung from the solar mass as a common mother, and have in turn given birth to a score of satellite daughters. All these worlds form a family; and, though they have separated so far, they are still held together by a sort of family affection, which is none the less real because named gravitation. Under its rule, each daughter world not only bends her onward impulse into a filial orbit around her mother, but turns from her course to greet every passing sister planet. Even the wayward comet's sons come back from their wide wanderings to be welcomed and warmed again at the family hearth.

A foolish fancy, of course, but yet a fact! The very gravitation which unites the solar system is another of these mutual attractions which we have been tracing. Nor is it limited to our own, but is seen in many a system of double or triple stars moving about each other or around their common centre. It not only moves worlds, but gathered and globed them to begin with, astronomers say; and in the spiral streaks of many a nebula we seem to see the movement starting, and matter slowly drawing together to shine in new suns and systems.

So does this attraction and union, in one phase or another, pervade the universe—a cosmic principle. It is ever attended by the opposite one of separation, but is the more creative of the two. It blesses everywhere, from the gathering and warming of worlds in systems up to the gathering of animals in societies and of men in families warm with sympathy and love. In it, rather than in the mere prolongation of infancy, would I see the "cosmic roots of love"—reaching back of mammals and of all motherhood, back of Haeckel's cells and oldest suns, running through the wreaths of the nebula, threading every atom, thrilling through the infinite ether, already alive in that mysterious gravitation which, like the spirit of God in the Biblical story, first moved on the face of the abyss, and said, "Let there be light."

I fancy there may yet come some poet-philosopher who will commence his ethical study, not with scripture, not even with human souls or lowest cells or solar systems, but, back of them all, with the first movement of matter toward union. He will read in the lines of the gathering nebula a heavenly scripture already revealing the law of love, and in every star a text in prophecy of Christ. He will simply trace this cosmic principle of union through its advancing phases in creation.

It is ever opposed by repulsion, separation, strife; but is ever harmonising the strife. Just as, in gravitation, it gathered diffuse matter into globes, and the separating globes in systems, so on our globe, in the finer chemical affinities, it combined atoms in molecules, and these in compounds ever more complex. In condensation and cohesion it brought liquids and solids. In crystallisation it built the myriad shapes of beauty in the rocks. In more marvellous vital organisation it combined compounds in cells, and these again in the countless forms of life.

Among these individual forms came that cruel competition and strife which pessimists make so much of, and which has indeed given to nature a tragic aspect. But in melioration of the strife our principle took a social form, uniting individuals in societies of mutual help, which pessimists forget. This social principle has everywhere prevailed, not only in the vast insect world, but in animals of all sorts, from buffaloes on the plain to beavers in the pond, bringing swarms, schools, flocks, herds, and myriads of minor co-operations, like those told in Kropotkin's book. He holds that, even "as a factor of evolution," the fraternal principle of mutual aid has been much more important than "mutual strife," and has thus largely redeemed Nature from the common charge of cruelty.

Most of these animal societies seem to be merely utilitarian, with little real sympathy. But this comes with the higher union of the family. The family begins low, as we saw, and its affection is long and feeble. Even conjugal love is at first fleeting. Among some insects the bride does not hesitate to slay her husband when the nuptials are over. Maternal love may be no stronger. Even among vertebrates, eggs and infants are widely left to perish, as they may well be when there are so many of them. When the progeny of a single herring would soon fill the ocean solid, maternal care would hardly be a virtue. But, with higher organisation and fewer offspring, that care increases. In birds it becomes proverbial; and the mother, if not loving her neighbor as herself, at least loves her infants as herself, and so seems almost to have begun to be a Christian. Her love is very limited, however, and lasts only a month, after which, her moral law is suspended till another season.

But the mammalian structure carries that union further — unites mother and infant much more closely and longer. At length the delicate human body and brain so prolong the helpless infancy that the union has to last for years, and thus becomes a habit to last through life. The family becomes permanent, and its affection fixed. Its permanence also extends the union—holds together parents and children and children's children in a widening circle of kinsmen. So we reach one of those clans, gens, or little tribes, in which society seems everywhere to have started. This cosmic principle of union, working from atoms upward, has at length unfolded its higher meaning, and brought, not merely a utilitarian society of animals, but a human brotherhood inspired with sympathy.

This little tribe often shows that brotherhood perfect between its own members, however cruel to others. Boyle says that even the Dyaks, so famed for ferocity and murders, were yet, among themselves, "humane to a degree that might well shame" us. Some refuse to believe this of savages, especially of heathen. But why? Why think affection impossible among barbarians, when it abounds among birds? Why think self-sacrifice impossible among the heathen, when it is the law of every ant-hill? Why think Pagans cannot keep the Ten Commandments, when the mere moon keeps every one of them, except that of the Sabbath? Kindness comes by nature, and even by necessity, for the tribe cannot hold together without it. It is still confined to the tribe, however, and perhaps is fiercely hostile to outsiders, only the narrow harmony of a hornet's nest.

But our principle works on through history to extend the harmony. It unites little tribes in larger, and these in larger still, until a nation is formed. The nation keeps new peace within, and cultivates the juster ideals seen in ancient literature. Plato wrote, "May I, being of sound mind, do to others as I would that they should do to me"; and already the sentiment was familiar from Athens to the end of Asia. This brotherhood, however, was only national. Even the comparatively humane Greeks did not try to be so to foreigners; and Plato, in giving the Golden Rule, did not mean for a moment that it was to be practised toward barbarians.

But the principle worked on, joining nations in larger union and extending the humanity. In the West this extension came through the Roman rule, uniting peoples from the British Isles to the Euphrates, and giving to ethics a cosmopolitan tone. In the century before Christ, Cicero and the Stoics preached universal brotherhood; Varro, in giving the Golden Rule, no longer left it local, but said it should embrace all the nations of mankind. In the time of the Apostles, the Pagan, Lucan, predicted that the world would soon cast aside its weapons, and all nations learn to love. In practice, too, there was for two centuries, in the Pax Romana, such a world-peace as earth never saw before or since. The Romans, however, were not the people to perfect that union. They had brought it through vast wars, and still kept class divisions and cruel wrongs that made the Stoics' precepts seem a mockery.

Digitized by Google

But now came from the nation of Israel a movement to further that brotherhood, and, still more important, to identify it at last with religion. That nation itself well illustrates this law of ethical growth. It had started, according to the Biblical story, in one of those primitive families, with not even the domestic virtues yet fully established. Jacob robs his twin brother and deceives his dying father, and is incited to this by his mother; and his sons, the fathers of the tribes of Israel, seek to slay their best brother and finally sell him into slavery. These tribes, too, though fairly united within, had fought each other, and had well-nigh exterminated Benjamin. But they had at length united in a nation, reached a larger justice, and learned the Decalogue. The justice, however, had been only national. Even eminent saints in Israel denied the Decalogue in dealing with other peoples. They burned town after town even in the name of the Lord, and "utterly destroyed all that breathed." Of course, we need not believe it was really so bad as this; and the Bible often shows these annihilated towns and tribes reappearing right afterward, active as ever. But the stories show no less the low ideals of the authors, in both morals and religion. These ideals, however, continued to rise, until the great prophets of the eighth century B.C. not only plead passionately for brotherhood within the nation, but even predicted the union of nations, when swords should be beaten into ploughshares and the world should learn war no more.

But, most important of all, this brotherhood was made the essence of religion. It was taught that the Lord cared little for their ceremonies and prayers, wanted no more blood of animals or men, but only that they should "do justly and love mercy." This teaching, though of course unheeded, continued among the best Jews. Rabbi Hillel, in giving the Golden Rule, called it "the substance of the law"; and Jesus called it both "the law and the prophets." Jesus' Beatitudes are only ethical, and do not hint that religion is anything more. They give the highest blessings to those who "hunger and thirst after righteousness," to "the meek" and "the merciful"; and, if God is mentioned, it is "the pure in heart" who shall see him, the "peace-makers" who shall be called his "sons." It is the simple religion of righteousness and brotherhood. Jesus seems to have cared for little else. He preached "mercy and not sacrifice." He ordered men to leave the altar until they were reconciled to others. This reconciliation was itself the best prayer: "for if ye forgive others, your heavenly Father will forgive you," and he will not otherwise. Forgiveness was the true religion, and must be repeated "seventy times seven" times. This was also taught among his disciples, one of whom wrote that, "if we love one another, God dwelleth in us," for "God is love." Love was itself God and the only way to find him. Saint Jerome tells how John, when an old man, kept repeating "Love one another"; and how, when asked why he said no more, he replied that no more was needed. So did early Christianity promise to perfect the union which the Roman empire had brought.

But the promise failed. Between barbarians without and corruption within, that uniting empire went to pieces. Even before it fell, Christianity fell worse—fell from its high ideals of harmony to things that divided. It separated into sects quarreling over theological questions. It opposed the social sentiments with ascetic practices, and sought sanctity by fasts and bodily penance rather than by brotherhood. Many a holy hermit abandoned his own children to save his soul, and a nun was said to have been sent to Purgatory for loving her mother too much. Formal observances were again exalted until they seemed holier than innocence itself. Baptism, which Paul once thanked God he had practised so little, came to be thought more important than purity; and ceremonies to atone for a crime seemed more meritorious than not to commit it. Such opinions prevailed for centuries, and Jesus' religion of love was so buried that his professing followers sometimes sought to serve him by slaying each other.

Yet, all this time, the tendency to union was also active, and was aided much by Christianity. Whatever the quarrels of the Church, it still taught brotherhood. Amid all the divisions of the falling empire and of the feudal system, the Christian name and organisation kept alive the feeling of unity. Even then Crusades helped to unite Europe, and the wars which followed them were partly redeemed by gathering conquered peoples into great nations again.

But the union has been furthered more by the secular forces that revived with the Renaissance. The arts undermined intolerance. Learning linked men of even different religions and races in a common cause and sympathy. Advancing science softened bigotry, and the Agnostic spirit began to show the folly of quarreling over questions about which neither side knew anything. Increasing commerce joined the nations ever more closely, and economics slowly learned that the interests of each were the interests of all.

(To be concluded.)

Acid Drops.

As we are nearing Christmas some of the papers are reviving a story of the Franco-Prussian War which may or may not be true. It is said that on Christmas Eve a French soldier stepped out from the trenches, in full view of the enemy, and sang a Christmas carol. The Germans ceased their firing, and both sides maintained a truce while the song lasted. Then the singer stepped back and the firing recommenced. The story is being retold because in some unexplained way it is supposed to support the power of Christian faith. How it does this it is difficult to understand. It did not put an end to the fighting, it did not make the Christians on either side less ready to kill each other, and it did not affect the issue in the slightest degree. It is just as likely that had the soldier stepped forward and sang a secular song, the enemy might have refrained from shooting. To our mind the story illustrates the impotence rather than the power of Christianity. The common religious belief of French and German could not prevent that or other wars. It could not prevent those wars being pursued to the bitter end. It could only add the fanaticism of religious feeling to feed the already powerful malignancies of national hatred.

The value of the talk about this War ending all war may be seen in what is taking place in America. It is probable that the United States has less cause than any other nation in the world to fear an invasion, or an attack from other great Powers. Yet the Navy Department, having but just placed orders for three new battleships, which are to be the largest in the world, has decided to ask Congress to authorise two more, as well as six destroyers, eight or more submarines, and other odds and ends. It is proposed to spend £29,000,000 during the coming year. The aim is to have the strongest navy in the world, and there is to be a corresponding increase in the army. It looks as though the present War will only break down Prussian militarism to establish universal militarism. For no nation is likely to possess a powerful navy or a large army without others following suit, and at least one of them is bound to be the cause of trouble sooner or later.

We have a cheap press; but what about a free press? Last week four Irish papers were suppressed by the military authorities, and others were threatened for using plain language concerning the European crisis. The Times calls the papers concerned, "rags," but the question of free speech is bound up with such action, and all the Times can do is to call names.

Mr. A. G. Gardiner, editor of the Daily News, says, "It does not pay to go against the popular tide." That is the testimony of the editor of a mild Liberal paper, which has a large circulation. What would he have said had he edited a paper such as the Freethinker, which has championed unpopular ideas for thirty-three years in the teeth of a tempest beside which the still waters of Liberalism are but a mill-pond.

Digitized by Google

Christians resemble the heathen Chinee on occasion. The Southend Education Committee recently had to deal with the question of the opening of a recreation ground on Sundays. The donor had expressed his wish that it should be open; and so they passed a resolution that the place should be opened from 4 p.m. till sunset, which, at this time of the year, means but a few minutes. Maybe, they hope, tremblingly, that Providence is too busy with the War to notice that recreation ground.

"Should Christians ever go to War?" is still being discussed in the religious papers. They ought to begin with the preliminary question, "Have Christians ever ceased to go to War?" In all the Christian centuries there has never been a single generation, during which Christians have not been fighting with each other. The soldier has never been worshiped as the Christian nations have worshiped him, and it was left for Christians to turn the chief energies of civilisation into military channels. And Christians have been so impressed with the importance of the military life, that it has entered into their hymns, and figures largely in their symbology. Religious leaders, like the late General Booth, understood that the most powerful mode of appeal to a Christian public was by way of military terms and a military organisation. And even the teaching that war is a biological necessity and makes for the health of States —of which teaching Bernhardi is quite wrongly made the parent—could only have gained ground among a people that have been brought up to reverence the military ideal.

The impossible Waldron, Vicar of Brixton, of course joins in the discussion, and adorns it with his usual puerilities and absurdities. He concludes that Christians ought to go to war when it is a just war—as if any nation ever engaged in an unjust war. Each one claims that justice is on its side, just as each side is claiming the support of God in the present War. He also discovers that the War is bridging the gap between the rich and the poor—we shall see how effectively when the War is over. He also illustrates the power of Christianity by pointing out that "the trenches have accomplished more for Christian humanitarianism than all our social legislation." What a confession for a Christian minister to make! Fancy admitting that even war, with all its brutality and suffering and destruction, is yet more powerful to encourage humanitarianism than are Christian influences during times of peace! Anyone would expect that people would see in this a proof of the impotence of Christianity. Mr. Waldron sees in it a proof of the power of the Christian faith.

What a fine thing religion is for inducing feelings of kindliness and brotherhood! Rev. A. C. Dixon, of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, was invited to join in the City Temple Intercession prayers, which are carried on daily. But Dr. Dixon would have none of it. He could not bring himself to pray in the same building with men who had denied the supernatural birth of Christ, and he informed Mr. Campbell that if he would confess his sin before God, that would do more to help the Allies than a lifetime of daily prayer. This is wholly delightful from every point of view. Here is Dr. Dixon believing that God will decline to help the Allies because he is offended with Mr. Campbell, and then we have Mr. Campbell dilating on the love that religion breeds with Dr. Dixon's letter before him. Really, it seems almost plain enough for a blind man to see that religion is the one thing that never does serve to induce brotherly feelings. People will sink their differences on any other subject, when occasion demands, but they will continue venomous on religion right up to the end.

Whilst the Bishop of Chelmsford was at Bethnal Green, daily prayer was resorted to in order to obtain money for the restoration of the church. Two ladies responded with sums of £18,000 and £3,000 respectively. Next time we hear of the poverty of Bethnal Green we shall remember those two "sisters in the Lord."

The Bishop of Chelmsford says "the churches of the country are not full." Thank you, my lord! An unsolicited testimonial to the Freethinker.

The clergy do not give much away. They buried Lord Roberts in St. Paul's Cathedral, and now they are "booming" the late Field-Marshal as the example of a great soldier "who had family prayers for fifty-five years." It may catch the fancy of spinsters who work beaded slippers for curates; but even schoolboys know that Napoleon and Frederic the Great did not waste much time in prayers—family or otherwise.

The Canadian Government has appointed January 3 to be a day of prayer "for the speedy ending of the War." This does not mean, necessarily, that "Our Lady of the Snows" has "cold feet."

The Daily Telegraph refers to the "day of public prayer already fixed for France by her bishops." This is not altogether inaccurate, but it is misleading. There is no day of public prayer fixed for France. Only the Government could do that, and the Government has nothing to do with religion. It is the bishops who have asked all their followers to pray on a given date. These may be all over France, but they are not France. The day of prayer is a purely private religious venture.

"It is true to say that the German Kaiser is fighting a community of saints," writes a Roman Catholic Army Chaplain in the Daily Mail; "General absolutions to regiments, or very large bodies of men, have been the order of the day." Heigho! If the hundreds of thousands of Catholics in the German and Austrian regiments have also received absolution, "saints" are fighting "saints."

The Gospel Temperance movement has been at work for a great many years, and, in spite of the alleged support of "Omnipotence," has achieved little success. The military regulations, and compulsorily limiting the hours of selling drink, has had a marked effect in reducing drunkenness. Secularism is always better than Supernaturalism.

A striking cartoon appeared in the New York Evening Sun, depicting the figure of Faith pointing to a battlefield strewn with corpses, and bearing the ironic question, "Why?" It would puzzle the clergy of the Christian world to answer that simple query.

The Comedie Francais and the Opera Comique in Paris gave their first performances since the beginning of the War on Sunday afternoon. The religion of the Man of Sorrows is alleviated by gaiety in the country of Moliere and Voltaire.

Owing to the number of the dead being excessive after a recent battle, the Army Chaplains arranged for a Jewish Rabbi, a Catholic priest, and a Government religion minister, to conduct the funeral services. Priority was given to the Rabbi on account of his age—and it was due, as his religion bore the same relation to the others that butter does to margarine.

Owing to mechanism being employed to produce wind for church-organs, the organ-blowers find themselves less in demand than formerly. They may find consolation in the parson's bellows.

The Young Men's Christian Association has succeeded so well with its hut-building that it proposes to erect more huts and reading-rooms in France. Let us hope, prayerfully, that Roman Catholic regiments, who have received "absolution," will not be the tenants.

"Who Owns the Air? British Government Recognises no Sovereignty." These are two headlines in an English Tory newspaper. It is comforting to think that the ownership is in dispute, otherwise we should all be charged two shillings per 1,000 feet for air to breathe.

The Pope is endeavoring to bring about a truce in the European War during the Christmas season, but there is little hope of its succeeding. Poor Papa! He is the only Christian of any consequence who sticks to his colors.

At Acton recently a woman said she had not seen a half-crown during the thirteen years she had been married. She was nearly as poor as the founder of the Christian religion, who was sold for thirty shillings.

"Germany must win, God cannot desert his children," said a Teutonic professor. Commenting on this, the Daily Mirror says, "If they fail, Gott will have to undergo the same criticism as the Prussian generals; for what is he but a Prussian general glorified, this tribal demon of theirs, this dreary Gott of their insolence." The Daily Mirror does not write in this strain in the piping times of peace.

Digitized by Google

In Sunday's Weekly Dispatch a third of the front page was devoted to the momentous war-news that the Kaiser's hair was turning white. Perhaps some self-denying Christian will send the Emperor a bottle of hair-dye.

"Baronet in the Dock" is a headline in the newspapers. This should not cause much sensation in a country where most people believe that "God" was once in the same position.

Christian veracity is not a conspicuous virtue, but orthodox editors not only leave truth at the bottom of her well, but put the lid on and padlock it. In a recent issue, the Daily Mail referred to the German Kaiser as "the coolest Rationalist." The German Emperor is not "cool," and he is not a "Rationalist." Otherwise, the statement is correct.

The Bishop of Manchester has authorised a prayer for "the humble beasts" for use in his diocese. This anxiety for the welfare of animals is somewhat belated, for the Christian world generally agrees with St. Paul's contemptuous remark, "Does God care for oxen?" And the bullock bellows dolefully over the balmy meads.

We rather like the way one of the religious weeklies winds up the notice of a new book, published at 10s. 6d. It describes the headings to the chapters, and then adds, "These finally leave to God." There you are! A kind of Cook's tour to Deity; and all for half-a-guinea. Why, many a man has spent a fortune over the business, and then failed.

In the course of a protest against British military aviators flying over Switzerland, the Swiss Government has put in something like a claim for the sovereignty of the air. Against this Great Britain has quite properly, and quite naturally, protested. If not exactly a British possession, Christians in this country have always looked upon Heaven as coming within the British sphere of influence, and to have passed over the Swiss claim without protest would have been to forgo one of our dearest traditions.

An American paper says that we ought to give the Turk some credit. He hasn't announced that Allah is on his side.

Now that the word "culture" is so much in evidence, many will be glad of a definition. Here is one supplied by Rev. Dr. Jowett. True culture, he says, "is the reverent and diligent co-operation of the will of man with the holy will of God." Bravo! Now all we want to know is, What is the will of God? and then we shall at least have a definition that is intelligible—even if we do not agree with carrying out the will of God. But at present Germans, British, Turks, and Russians are engaged in killing each other to carry out the will of God, so the definition does not really help us very considerably. Perhaps it would be better to leave such a doubtful quantity as the "will of God" out of consideration altogether.

The military and local authorities between them are preparing work for the doctors at Southend-on-Sea. Servant girls and soldiers parade freely in the evening, and the lights are turned out or down soon after daylight. This is considered a very pious arrangement, especially as the public-houses are closed at eight-thirty. Medical men are not flourishing now, but they expect to be busy in due course.

A rather curious article—curious, that is, because of its author—appears in the Daily Chronicle of December 10 from the pen of Mr. Eden Phillpotts. The subject of the article is "English and German Ideals of God." With the greater part of the article we find ourselves in agreement, but the conclusion is strangely ambiguous and undecided. Mr. Phillpotts says that the English and German ideals cannot both be of God, because they contradict each other. We do not see that this is conclusive. A man's god is, after all, no more than a cluster of ideas, to which he gives the name of God (we hardly think that Mr. Phillpotts believes in an actual objective deity), and to say that these ideas clash is to say no more than that they are discordant. The question of which is true, or which has the larger measure of truth, must be decided on some other principle than that of an appeal to God. There are all sorts of gods in the world, and, consequently, all sorts of notions as to what they really desire.

There is one clear point scored by Mr. Phillpotts. All the neutral nations believe in God, and yet "No King, no President has allowed enthusiasm for humanity to open his mouth and record a whisper of protest from any nation in the enjoyment of peace. They know that moral influence is as powerful as the sword, but abstain from exerting it, since at present to state their opinion of Louvain or Rheims, or the massacre at Ardenne would be an unfriendly act. The neutral ruler sells his soul for his country's peace, and in the name of politics. As politics are constituted, that is often the sudden sacrifice they demand, and few be they who will make it." This is indeed an aspect of the case that deserves stressing. If war is to be conducted even within the rules that "civilisation" protests against their infraction, to be effective, must come from neutrals. It is useless one of the belligerents protesting. And yet, in spite of the undoubted crimes committed during the present war, not one of the neutral, and Christian countries, has had the moral courage to raise a voice against their continuance. That is one test of the value of their Christian training.

But we do not think that Mr. Phillpotts is on equally strong ground when he argues that the truth about the world's belief in God will emerge from this war. Whichever side triumphs, the religious on both sides will see the "will of God" declared, either to chasten or to reward. Of course, the logical conclusion from this belief would be, as Mr. Phillpotts says, that all would accept the issue and be content. But logic does not rule in such matters, and the outcome cannot fail to be more ill-will than existed before the War. Hatred for defeat on the one side, and an unjustifiable sense of superiority, springing from conquest, are emphatically not the conditions that lead to goodwill, to fellowship, to co-operation, and so to genuine progress. These can only be secured by nations—as is the case with individuals—meeting on a basis of common humanity. And war very seldom helps in this direction. Most generally it means an interruption of the civilising forces already at work. And the only part played by the belief in God is to provide a semi-ethical excuse for passions that without religion would most likely be recognised in their true nature.

At a recent meeting of "Our Dumb Friends' League," a society for the promotion of kindness to animals, a mongrel in the vicinity disturbed the serenity of the proceedings by prolonged howling.

Over 300,000 copies of Princess Mary's Gift Book have been sold in a week. The Bible Society, which publishes the book of "The King of Kings," will be almost green with envy.

Mr. Arthur Machin says "we have languished now for many years under the intellectual rule of the Twopenny Antichrists." It is appropriate that such a sentiment should be published in the halfpenny Evening News.

"The Reformation of St. Katherine" is a paragraph heading in the daily press. We do not know the lady, but a number of the saints were "nuts" in their earlier days.

A report on "The Care of Ancient Churches" has been issued by the Archbishops Committee. We advise them to have it translated into German, and to have copies sent to the Teutonic generals, most of whom would appreciate the gift.

"What is the Western civilisation, after all?" asks Mr. Uchimura, a well-known Japanese educationalist. And he answers:—

> "War, war—war upon the slightest pretext—that is their cry and inborn propensity. To say that their civilisation is based upon the Gospel of Peace is the grossest falsehood. The present conflagration of Europe is the veriest evidence, written with hell-fire upon the face of the sky, that theirs is a sham civilisation, beautiful upon the surface, but within dead vacuity. Like thunderstorm on a summer afternoon, the two poles of human wrath come to earth to spend itself, to leave the sky clear for the better and more beautiful thing."

Neither the Japanese nor the Chinese welcomed Christianity before the War. They will now be able to point to a striking object-lesson of its utter worthlessness as a civilising factor. Meanwhile the missionary societies, who seem quite dead to the realities of the situation, are appealing for funds to carry the Christian Gospel from the lands of the Allies to China and Japan.

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £238 7s. 6d. Received since:—A. D. (Glasgow), 10s.; E. A. H., 5s.; R Bell, 5s.; F. E. W. Hicks, 10s.

F. GATENSILL.—You would find little but disappointment during the War. Glad you and your friends esteem the Freethinker so highly. We should say that Jack London, the novelist, is undoubtedly a Freethinker.

A. P. (Glasgow).—There is no objection, so far as we can see, to every Provincial Branch of the N. S. S. having its own Annual Dinner, nor to the Scotch Branches following. But so far as the Society's Annual Dinner is concerned, that must be held somewhere, and London—if only because the Society's headquarters are there—seems the fittest place. You must try and induce your fellow-Freethinkers in Glasgow to arrange an Annual Dinner if you think it would exert a "brightening influence" on the Branch. You have our best wishes in the matter.

G. LOCKWOOD.—Not quite up to the standard, but we are in agreement with your sentiments, and that is a matter of much greater importance.

R. BELL.—We agree with you as to its being almost impossible to drive sense into some people's heads. But the fact of our contributors dealing with certain well-known clergymen does not in the least imply that they hope to "convert" these gentlemen, or that they have an extravagant opinion of their importance. Still, they are well known in the religious world, they are so far representative, and serve to add point to an argument.

G. BRADFIELD.—There seems to be a bit of a misunderstanding. Mr. Foote's view of the German Emperor does not differ materially from your own, or from that of the views expressed in the paragraph of which you approve. We note your appreciation of the Freethinker articles.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The Annual General Members' Meeting of the Secular Society, Ltd., will be held at the Society's registered address, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C., on Tuesday evening, at 7 o'clock. Members are earnestly requested to attend, by person or proxy. Proxy forms, which should be sent with the Report and Balance Sheet from the Office, should be filled in and returned to the Secretary at least two clear days before the date of meeting. It should be noted that the stamp, duly obliterated according to the proxy form, is indispensable; so, also, is the witness's signature. Probably most proxies will be made out in favor of Mr. Foote or (in his absence) Mr. Cohen. There are important reasons why this should not be neglected on the present occasion. Any member who fails to receive his (or her) Report, Balance Sheet, and Proxy Form, at least by December 18, should apply for it without further delay, and also see that the receipt for current subscription is duly received.

Mr. Foote cannot yet resume his story of "The Secular Charter." He has been made one of the chief witnesses in the Bowman Will Case, and he finds it impossible to state many things in a public newspaper that he has, or may have, to give evidence of by affidavit in a Court of Justice. Some of his readers will remember a certain Contempt of Court included in a certain libel action, in which the Christian enemy sought to strike him down by means of that law, of which he barely realised the existence—then. Had the judge's place at that time been occupied by a bigot, it would have been an easy new way of punishing Mr. Foote as editor of the Freethinker. It was known that the prosecution counted on £100 fine and a fortnight's fresh experience of the royal hospitality.

Tickets for the London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner are now on sale, price 4s. each, and can be had on application to Miss Vance, the Society's General Secretary. Only tickets that are applied for will be sent, and, as the number is limited, it is advisable to apply early. The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, will be in the chair, and will be "supported" by Mr. Cohen, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. A. B. Moss, Miss Kough, and other well-known Freethinkers. All we can say about the musical program at present is that it will be a good one. Those who have attended previous dinners will need little assurance on that point.

Apropos of our note last week on the manner in which Freethinking recruits are treated in the New Army, we may cite the following letter which appeared in the Daily Chronicle of December 11:—

> "SIR,—It is quite possible that at the end of the War the Church of England may claim to have had a vast preponderance of members of their Church serving in the War; possibly the following might be the explanation: My son, when enlisting in a regiment yesterday, was asked what his religion was. He answered: 'I am an Agnostic.' The officer asking the question said: 'Oh, we have not got that, so I will put you down Church of England.'—L. S."

We fancy that many military officers are still a long way off treating soldiers as if they were really human beings. They seem to regard them as things to be praised when they deserve it, to be cared for and looked after so far as mere animal necessities are concerned, but that a soldier might have opinions, and that these might be the better part of him, never strikes them as possible.

Rev. William Carlile, chief of the Church Army, sends us a begging letter in which he calls us one of his old supporters. We were not aware that we possessed the honor.

The period covered since the outbreak of War has been a very trying one for all advanced movements. Some societies appear to have suspended operations altogether, and in all cases there has been a falling off in the number of meetings held. From reports to hand we are pleased to learn that wherever Freethought meetings have been held, the attendances have been as large as ever, and in some cases larger. In some towns there is a difficulty in obtaining halls—owing to these being taken for military purposes, but apart from this there seems no reason why the Secular Societies throughout the country should not prepare for a vigorous campaign in the New Year. People's minds cannot be always monopolised by a single subject, even that of war. Sooner or later other interests clamor for attention, and those who are responsible for the conduct of Freethought propaganda would do well to bear this in mind.

In the course of a fine article on "Thoughts on This War" in Scribner's, Mr. John Galsworthy has the following scathing indictment of Christianity:—

> "Three hundred thousand church spires raised to the glory of Christ! Three hundred million human creatures baptised into His service! And—war to the death of them all! 'I trust the Almighty to give the victory to my arms!' 'Let your hearts beat to God, and your fists in the face of the enemy!' 'In prayer we call God's blessing on our valiant troops!'
>
> "God on the lips of each potentate, and under the hundred thousand spires prayer that twenty-two million servants of Christ may receive from God the blessed strength to tear and blow each other to pieces, to ravage and burn, to wrench husbands from wives, fathers from their children, to starve the poor, and everywhere destroy the works of the spirit! Prayer under the hundred thousand spires for the blessed strength of God, to use the noblest, most loyal instincts of the human race to the ends of carnage! 'God be with us to the death and dishonor of our foes' (whose God he is no less than ours)! The God who gave His only begotten Son to bring on earth peace and good will toward men!
>
> "No creed—in these days when two and two are put together—can stand against such reeling subversion of its foundation. After this monstrous mockery, beneath this grinning skull of irony, how shall there remain faith in a religion preached and practised to such ends?"

Inevitable or avoidable, in defence of national freedom or in pursuit of schemes of national aggrandisement, the indubitable fact remains that Christianity has done nothing to make such a conflict as the present one impossible, and has done much to make it sooner or later certain.

Digitized by Google

Newspaper Culture.

I THINK it was Plato who said that the eyes of the majority of mankind were not strong enough to behold Truth. And I am of the opinion that some lesser light in the history of our untidy planet said that truth should be spoken behind closed doors. It would appear that the dissemination of truth was a delicate and difficult project, fraught with all the dangers and penalties of a voyage through Hell in a boat made of wax. We may truly ask, granted that the truth be dangerous, to whom is it dangerous? As we shall never get an answer to our question from the army of molecatchers in our midst, we may say at the outset that a knowledge of truth is dangerous to religious authority—in fact, it is dangerous to authority of any nature which is founded on ignorance.

Truth being planted, as it were, in a quagmire, if we are to believe our later-day soothsayers and magicians, we may fairly expect that the spirits who set out to discover it may reasonably experience abuse, misrepresentation, slander, and even death. The search for truth is a deliberate tilt at authority. Let no man buckle on armor who prefers peace of mind; let him rather follow in the track of those who make Sunday a day of feast and prayer. Prayers on a full stomach are very soothing—we might call the combined sensation the pinnacle of happiness, the height of ambition, or celestial translation. Any of the three terms would satisfy the aspiration of those whom Plotinus termed as people possessing the political virtues; that is, a people loving comfort. The people of this nature occupied a low place in the classification of mankind as formulated by Plotinus; and, as we believe that types of man never vary, the people with the political virtues of the present day are represented by the suburban newspaper-cultured Christians. And this brings us to the matter of our argument.

Some may consider Caxton as a benefactor of mankind. Well, for our part, we think he was responsible for the bringing of scatter-brain ideas of Nietzsche to the above-mentioned class. That they should hate him is natural; that they should misunderstand him is quite feasible when we remember that they receive him second or third hand; that is, through the doubtful conduits of journalism, and, it is with no idea of defending Nietzsche, that we say the hired journalists of a kept press, whilst not even whispering truth behind closed doors, have wantonly cried out lies from the housetops. With a few honorable exceptions, we might say they have remained true to their modern tradition. In time of peace they were an insult in print; in time of war, like the leopard, they could not change their spots.

Nietzsche was, and is, anti-Christian. For that I, as an insignificant writer and Freethinker, honor him. He chose the path of solitude, of comparative poverty, and he made the grandest and most sublime mistake that endears him to all men who are not modern eunuchs or—journalists; he tilted at authority in more than one form, and the comfortable class, true to their type, stoned him. In effect, we hear them say he is not one of us; he says, "There will be no remorse in man's heart any longer"..... "but the Christian religion is essentially a product of the slave class."....."One only needs to read any one of the Christian agitators—St. Augustine, for instance—in order to realise, in order to smell, what filthy fellows came to the top in this movement." In our imagination we can see battalions of the feast and prayer class stooping down to pick up stones to level at his head. And the journalists will instruct them in their good old Biblical game of stoning the prophets.

This, then, was one of the men who influenced the Christian Emperor of Germany in his lust for war. By the wooden shoes of St. Joseph, it is a paradox that could only emanate from the mind of one who can swallow whole the Athanasian Creed! It reminds the present writer of something he saw in a curio shop in Boulogne in happier days than the present. In the middle of the shop window was a plaster cast of Christ on the cross; on the right-hand side was a bust of Voltaire, with the head turned towards the pathetic figure on the cross, and the lips of the scoffer were parted in that well-known grim, sardonic smile—commercial adversity makes strange bedfellows; and to say that Nietzsche was one of the causes of the War is the same as saying that Voltaire crucified Christ.

Abuse of Nietzsche has declined somewhat at this stage of the War, and we are almost tempted to think that the muddle-headed journalists, saying the wrong thing by instinct, have overshot the mark. A lie may be used to kill an idea; but if the idea did not exist in the mind of sane thinking people, journalistic flimflam was superfluous. In fact, these studied distortions of the truth about Nietzsche may be the means of getting people to inquire about the writings of one who has a permanent place in philosophy, and he will still occupy that place when Fleet-street is used as a menagerie for the imbeciles of falsehood. That Nietzsche was aware of all that Fleet-street stands for may be gathered on reading this one sentence: "We mistrust any form of culture that tolerates newspaper reading or writing." To our everlasting credit let it be said of the Freethinker that no newspaper speaks well of us; when they do, there will be good grounds for suspicion.

It was a great and telling argument of Nietzsche's, that, as animals and birds were the color of their environments for self-preservation, so the masses of mankind adopted what he termed "herd morality." In other words, "do as others do, and no one will laugh at you." Publishers would scarcely look at his works, and in later life, with the exception of a few friends, he spent his days in isolation, more, we think, as payment for his anti-Christian ideas than his morose temperament. The herd, with their leader's crook in hand (apt simile), cannot tolerate one who ridicules their so-called sacred institutions; to hell or Coventry with him. He has ventured too far in the search for Truth. He has flouted us, and tweaked the beard of our leaders; let us give his body to the dogs. Let us canonise Sankey and Moody, the Pilgrim Fathers, and Simeon Stylites, but this man Nietzsche shall not thrust forward with his ideas—write him down as the cause of this war.

To conclude, the search for Truth is not profitable. It has long been a cherished idea of the present writer that Freethinkers are more spiritual than Christians, and, with abundant proof to hand, we shall continue to think it is so. We could not imagine Nietzsche being encumbered with too much of the world's wealth, as are our clever divines with shares in armament concerns: "Verily, not to a nobility which ye could purchase like traders with trader's gold; for little worth is all that hath its price." And, again, "Let it not be your honor henceforth whence ye come, but whither ye go." No Freethinker would stoop to pick up stones to hurl at the writer of that, and, if Nietzsche is misrepresented, let us in charity assume that it was caused in a decadent Christianity by that last word in civilisation, the "modern journalist."

CHRISTOPHER GAY.

The Terrors of Superstition.

THAT religions arose through terror, were maintained by fear, and would perish with the departure of supernatural bugbears, were convictions eloquently expressed by the greatest of all Roman poets, the rationalist, Lucretius. These allegations have been hotly disputed by priests and metaphysicians, and have not infrequently been questioned by semi-sceptical writers. But of their substantial accuracy there can be but little doubt, as modern anthropologists are more and more willing to allow. Professor Westermarck has already unreservedly proclaimed his adherence to the view enunciated by

Digitized by Google

Lucretius, and that Professor Frazer's judgment is of a similar character is to be easily discerned in many passages of his magnum opus, The Golden Bough.

There are various indications that comparative religionists are steadily returning to the theories of Tylor and Spencer as to the potent part played by the beliefs in baleful spirits in shaping the theological speculations of mankind. The ghosts of the dead constantly confront us in every department of anthropological study, and Dr. Frazer has himself admitted that it is quite possible that all the gods may ultimately prove to be the deified ghosts of departed men. It is somewhat significant that the spirits of the dead are the essential characteristic of that dangerous malady, modern spiritualism. And the same may be said of that baneful aspect of savage superstition which Sir Oliver Lodge and other half-emancipated people are struggling to restore. Perhaps, to complete the picture, it may be necessary to include social bugbears as powerful instruments in the preservation of theology, for it must always be remembered that, however cold men's feelings toward religion may really be, outward conformity to the current creed is still demanded by the organised hypocrisy of the hour.

It is indeed difficult for the contemporary educated European to realise to what an extent life has been made miserable among savage, barbarous, and even civilised races by the superstitious dread of ghosts and goblins. As Dr. Frazer, in a striking passage, reminds us:—

> "Bred in a philosophy which strips nature of personality and reduces it to the unknown cause of an orderly series of impressions on our senses, we find it hard to put ourselves in the place of the savage, to whom the same impressions appear in the guise of spirits or the handiwork of spirits. For ages the army of spirits, once so near, has been receding further and further from us, banished by the magic wand of science from hearth and home, from ruined cell and ivied tower, from haunted glade and lonely mere, from the riven murky cloud which belches forth the lightning, and from those fairer clouds that pillow the silver moon or fleck with flakes of burning red the golden eve. The spirits are gone even from their last stronghold in the sky, whose blue arch no longer passes, except with children, for the screen that hides from mortal eyes the glories of the celestial world.....Far otherwise is it with the savage. To his imagination the world still teems with those motley beings whom a more sober philosophy has discarded. Fairies and goblins, ghosts and demons, still hover about him, both waking and sleeping. They dog his footsteps, dazzle his senses, enter into him, harass and torment and deceive him in a thousand freakish and mischievous ways." *

All the ills that overshadow human life, all the accidents of our earthly career are attributed by uncivilised man either to the spells cast upon him by his enemies or to the spiteful trickery of the spirits. To rid himself of his ghostly persecutors the savage has devised innumerable methods. When prayers prove unavailing, primitive people adopt the more drastic measure of driving their invisible adversaries away.

It is not, of course, contended that aboriginal man dwells in an environment of unrelieved gloom. He has his bright intervals like the rest of us, but the imposing array of evidence accumulated by Dr. Frazer points only too plainly to the truth that the lives of uncivilised races are ever accompanied by apprehension of ever impending evil.

Among the Australian natives supernatural beings on all sides abound, and these perverse spirits cannot resist the temptation to injure and alarm the inoffensive people. In Africa, the Negro stands in daily dread of the wicked demons who sleeplessly await their opportunity to do him harm. The god of the Bantu negroes of West Africa is credited with the act of creation, but that feat accomplished, his interest in human affairs came to an end. As this divinity heeds not the Bantus, they heed not him. But the sinister spirits that dwell in the country are far from indifferent to the doings of the people. Their interest is better known than appreciated, and the natives in their prayers implore them to depart and return no more. The Ewe peoples appear to possess a dim conception of a superior divinity, which is, perhaps, due to missionary influences, but the gods that really count with these African savages are the good and evil ghosts. A competent observer, Zündel, informs us that:—

> "The people are much more zealous in their devotion to the evil spirits than in their devotion to the good. The reason is that the feeling of fear and the consciousness of guilt are much stronger than the emotions of love and gratitude for benefits received. Hence, the worship of the false gods or spirits among this people, and among the West African negro tribes in general is, properly speaking, a worship of demons or devils."

Again, among the Boloki of the Upper Congo, a missionary admits that the occupation of that powerful personage, the medicine man, would be gone were his potent spells not deemed necessary to outwit and overcome the malignant spirits that swarm on the creeks and streams, in the shadow of the forest, and in every available nook and cranny.

In the New World, the same phenomena are to be seen. The famous anthropologist, Sir Everard im Thurn, tells us that in South America, among the native races of Guiana, the entire continent is peopled with supernatural creatures. He says:—

> "If, by a mighty mental effort, we could for a moment revert to a similar mental position, we should find ourselves everywhere surrounded by a host of, possibly, hurtful beings, so many in number, that to describe them as innumerable would fall ridiculously short of the truth."

These Indians dread the dark, and on the rare occasions in which they venture from the camp fires by night, they bear burning brands in their hands to enable them to watch their ghostly foes. The chief duty of their sorcerers is to disarm these ghosts and goblins, and, as a matter of fact, this savage spiritualism is "the main belief of the kind that is generally called religions of the Indians of Guiana."

Passing from the genial climes of Southern America to the desolate coasts of Labrador, we meet with a people equally enslaved by imaginary beings. The Eskimo believe that every detail of their lives is controlled by spirit agencies. These ghostly powers are the deputies of a greater goblin, and each native has his attendant evil genius who watches, with unwinking eyes, for an opportunity of inflicting harm upon his innocent victim. These impish spirits are propitiated by offerings of food, drink, and dress. And, in addition to these guardian spirits, there is a multitudinous assortment of ghosts which haunt the sea, the land, the sky, the clouds and winds, in fact, everything in nature. All these spirits are baneful, but some are more spiteful and vicious than others, and these last are those that receive the major part of the prayers and gifts of the people. The lesser spirits are all subordinate to the great spirit, the Tung ak.

> "The shaman (or conjuror) alone is supposed to be able to deal with the Tung ak. While the shaman does not profess to be superior to the Tung ak, he is able to enlist his assistance, and thus be able to control all the undertakings his profession may call for. This Tung ak is nothing more or less than death, which ever seeks to torment and harass the lives of people, that their spirits may go to dwell with him."

The religion of the Polynesian Islanders of the Pacific is, at first sight, less melancholy than those above mentioned. Every natural phenomenon is guided by an invisible spirit. Sun, moon, and star, the gale and the whispering breeze, the mountain, the rocks, the vale and the rushing river, all are abodes of spirit intelligences. Yet these spirits are seldom, if ever kindly, towards man. And as regards the ghosts of the dead, these primitive islanders, in the words of Ellis,—

> "imagined they lived in a world of spirits, which surrounded them night and day, watching every action of their lives, and ready to avenge the slightest neglect or

* Golden Bough, "The Scapegoat," pp. 72, 73.

Digitized by Google

> the least disobedience to their injunctions as proclaimed by their priests. These dreaded beings were seldom thought to resort to the habitations of men on errands of benevolence."

The Tahitians, as Captain Cook testifies, attributed all their misfortunes to one or other of their devilish divinities. The deities of the Maories again were, without exception, of sinister character. With the Pelew Islanders the gods are invariably of malevolent disposition, whose perverse nature can only be appeased by propitiation and magic. In the Philippine Islands the religion of the natives consists in a very firm belief in demons, who are responsible for all the woes of human life. Among the Melanesians of New Britain the gods, in the opinion of the people, are—

> "entirely perverse, deceitful, maleficent, and ceaselessly occupied in injuring us. Diseases, death, the perturbations of nature, all unfortunate events, are imputed to them. The demons exist in legions; they live everywhere, especially in the forests, desert places, and the depths of the sea."

The dark cloud cast on the lives of the people by the baleful beliefs indicated above, holds equally true of the other Pacific races. The Papuan pantheon is populated with a multitude of divinities much more diabolical than beneficent. Not only in Dutch New Guinea and "German" New Guinea, but in British New Guinea, the natives are never happy unless their goblin gods are inactive. These deities appear incapable of a single benevolent act.

In the Malay Archipelago it is much the same. The ghosts are not to be trusted; they are good or evil, just as the fancy seizes them. In Timor, Borneo, Celebes, Bali, Java, Sumatra, and elsewhere, the calamities of human existence are all ascribed to the rage or malevolence of the ancestral and other ghosts. Writing of the Battas or Bataks of Sumatra, a Dutch missionary remarks that—

> "if there is still any adherent of Rousseau's superficial theories about the idyllically happy and careless life of people 'in a state of nature,' he ought to come and spend a little time among the Bataks and keep his eyes and ears open. He would soon be convinced of the hollowness and falsehood of these phrases, and would learn to feel a deep compassion for human beings living in perpetual fear of evil spirits." *

Throughout the Eastern World, fear and the ceremonies born of fear may be said to constitute the religion of all savage and barbarous races. The Nicobar Islanders spend a large part of their lives in ceremonial observances, designed to drive off or appease the spirits. A feeling of terror of the native ghosts is so deeply ingrained in these savages, that two hundred years of missionary effort has signally failed to impress it. The religion of the Mantras, an indigenous people of the Malay Peninsula, seems to consist entirely of plans to frustrate the machinations of the demons that everywhere abound. In far off Kamtchatka, where a native or artificially introduced belief in a high god appears to prevail, the evil spirits are far more feared and reverenced than the chief divinity.

(To be concluded.) T. F. PALMER.

The Undiscovered Country.

The Unknown Guest. By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by A. T. De Mattos. (Methuen; 1914.)

SINCE M. Maurice Maeterlinck was compared with Shakespeare, it has been hard to be just to him. It is never safe, nor is it consistent with sound criticism, to pick up some popular favorite of the day and compare him with one of those intellectual giants whose work has survived in undiminished splendor the lapse of centuries. M. Maeterlinck's gifts are few and simple and distinct, and hardly anyone can be blind to them. Nor have we any wish to underrate his persuasive gifts, his delicate artistry in words, and his dainty imagination. His voice is musical, and what he has to say is always worth saying.

Some time ago M. Maeterlinck issued a treatise on Death, in which he sought to show that the terrors of dissolution arise largely from associations which are accidental, and urged considerations justifying cheerful anticipations. The dread of death, he said, arises from its strangeness, and we should strip it from the terrors of the imagination. But M. Maeterlinck is a charming poet as well as a brilliant philosopher, and he could not help decorating his ideas, as when he spoke of the last struggle "which hurls us suddenly, disarmed, abandoned, and stripped, into an unknown that is the home of invincible terrors." In another passage he urged us "to look upon death with the same eyes that look upon birth." In order to glorify the future, he disparages the present. "It seems fairly certain," he said, "that we spend in this world the only narrow, grudging, obscure, and sorrowful moments of our destiny." This seems the rhetorical echo of a theological platitude; and, for the rest, the speculation is sufficiently fanciful for the pulpit. As a fact, M. Maeterlinck's book contained less about death than speculation concerning immortality. The poet was always elbowing aside the philosopher, and jumping from the springboard of actuality into the waters of fancy. The chief value of his book, however, was that the ordinary Christian conception of a hereafter, comprising a paltry paradise for the minority and a horrible hell for the majority, was no longer held by cultured persons.

Since the publication of his book on Death, M. Maeterlinck has again returned to the subject, and, in The Unknown Guest, he states the case for a survival hypothesis. As he is largely in agreement with the Spiritualists, and often quotes from the "Proceedings" of the Society for Psychical Research, his book has a wide interest. It is not M. Maeterlinck's fault that, though his book is concerned with the large question of man's immortality, it is full of talk of telepathy, psychometry, phantasms, and "The Elberfield Horses." In the last analysis the Spiritualists base their case for the soul's immortality on these things, and M. Maeterlinck but follows their lead.

As explained in the clear and beautiful language of M. Maeterlinck, the newest and most up-to-date Spiritualism is very like the old. The hand may seem the hand of Esau, but the voice is the voice of Jacob. Behind all the verbiage of telepathy, clairvoyance, automatic writings, precognition, the "mathematics" of "educated horses," there is always "Sludge the Medium." Krall's horses may have put M. Maeterlinck to mathematical shame, figures having always inspired the poet with "invincible terror"; but, like the British sailor drinking lager beer, we get "no forrader." Reduced to a plain statement, the Spiritualist position as explained by M. Maeterlinck is that "the best part of life" is that it leads to death, but that what death is nobody knows. It is a conclusion sufficiently humorous to wrinkle the faces of the "educated" horses with smiles.

In spite of "Sludge the Medium," new or old, the riddle remains unanswered, the sphinx is still silent. Couched in scientific language, presented with all the resources of persons who have devoted their lives to the subject, it is yet in the last analysis but an appeal to emotionalism. Heine hit the right nail on the head when he smilingly hinted that the idea of immortality may have suggested itself to a lover in the arms of his mistress, or to some Nuremberg burgher sipping his beer in the cool of the evening. It is, in the last resort, but a desire for personal continuance, to be for ever as we are. In spite of man's importunity throughout countless centuries, "the rest is silence."

The new Spiritualism gives no better answer than the old, and the later "messages" from the "other side" are as unconvincing as the earlier. The poor

* Quoted by Frazer, "Scapegoat," pp. 87, 88.

Digitized by Google

Indian dreams of his happy hunting grounds; the Mohammedan peoples his paradise with houris; the Christian imagines the jewelled streets of the New Jerusalem; and Sir Oliver Lodge and other cultured gentlemen are satisfied with "spooks." The world is no nearer a solution than in the far-off days of Lucretius, or in the even earlier time when primitive man cowered in his cave in mortal fear of the lightning. The oracles are contradictory with regard to a next world. All we know for certain is that man is mortal, but nature is immortal. The world grows old and we grow old with it; but nature is ever fair, and young, and eternal. The flowers of the spring return year by year, lads and maidens are ever wandering at eventide. The love of husband and wife is ever consecrated by the coming of new life springing from their own. Though our personality be blotted out by death, our influence goes to swell the volume of human worth. As for the undiscovered country beyond the grave, no traveller has ever returned to reveal the secret of the universe.

MIMNERMUS.

I Would Not Be an Angel.

Yes, of the earth and earthy, I,
And Pagan to the inmost core;
I love the things beneath the sky
That common men have loved before.
And two things stand in Time and Space,
Amid the things that fade and fleet—
The beauty of a woman's face,
The pathos of a baby's feet.

I would not be an angel,
For ever to intone
Loud sycophantic praises
Before God's awful throne.
I crave no life eternal
Beyond the mortal span;
I would not be an angel;
I choose to be a man.

Within the pearly portals
I do not seek to pass;
I ask no golden highways;
Give me earth's living grass!
I'd barter all your cherubs
For an earth-babe, black or tan;
I would not be an angel;
I choose to be a man.

I would not be an angel
And shout with holy glee
While groaned Hell's countless victims
In deathless agony.
The good can know no Heaven
While Hell holds even one;
I would not be an angel;
I choose to be a man.

Dark are the ways of Heaven!
Ah, who can with them grapple?
Who knows another Adam
Won't eat another apple?
Heaven may end as badly
As Paradise began;
Let those who will be angels,
I choose to be a man.

I love this dear old earth-home,
Its sunny sky above,
Its children's frolic laughter,
Its woman's holy love.
To make it fairer, freer,
Is life's divinest plan;
Let those who will be angels,
I choose to be a man.

When falls the last great darkness,
And I have done my day,
Give back the dear earth-mother
The gift she gave, and say
But this: "Forgive his failings,
His errors gently scan,
For though he was no angel,
He tried to be a man."

WALLACE CELSON.

Night.

I COUNTED the clouds in the western sky
As they stole up troubled and grey;
And I stared at the sun with an aching eye,
But his crimson has died away;
And the bats, like phantoms, go whirring by
In search of their tiny prey.

I watched the petals of many a flower
Fold up in the eventide, [shower
And the grass parched and dead as it watched for the
It had prayed for before it died;
And the trees in the dusk that like ogres tower
Up into the heavens wide.

I counted the lights of the stars that crept
Thro' the chaos of cloud and night;
And I heard a bird cry like a woman that wept
With fear at some hideous sight;
And the rest of the universe seemingly slept
In the grip of an anodyne tight.

But where is my God in the midst of it all?
Does he sleep with the flowers in the gloom?
For the earth is as still, save that woman-like call,
As the eve of the morning of doom;
And nothing but nature's thieves hover and crawl
In the heart of this sky bounded tomb.

The flowers are sleeping, the night becomes chill,
And the brown grass is dripping with dew;
And a ground mist's white billows drift silent and still O'er the whole of the landscape in view;
But a thousand forms lurk in the darkness to kill,
And a thousand more tremble anew.

Yet they told me to look to the wonderful earth
If I wanted to find God again; [birth
And I look: and it seems that each form that finds
Is born to less pleasure than pain;
And I fancy the smaller the creature's girth,
The surer it is to be slain.

The night is the night, and the day is the day:
But which of the two is God's own?
The night is assigned to the creatures that slay;
And the day? God leaves that alone;
And the pleas for his pity when breaking hearts pray
Are lost on their way to his throne.

JAMES L. RAYMOND.

The Battle of Reason.

A GENTLE knight comes riding o'er the plain,
No armor rich doth deck his supple frame,
No retinue of rogues, no thirst for gain,
But Love and Hope are all his heart can claim,
And these two joys no gods above can blame;
For Fortune gives and likewise takes away
Her gifts: to one much gold, another shame.
Thus doth she in her fickle fancy sway
With gifts of gold, or place, or power; but none can stay.

Forth to the country of despair he rides,
And many knaves and scoundrels on the way
Are scourged or slain; but still in mounting tides
His foes arise, to curse, to jeer, or pray
That he may never live to see the day
When this bleak land shall 'gain resound with song.
When once again the minstrel's pleasing lay
Shall soothe all ears and drive sad night along;
When Right shall sit enthroned, supplanting vicious wrong.

WILLIAM REPTON.

The saloon on the corner was burnt,
And the ministers prayed next day,
Telling the Lord he was just and right
In moving the pest away.

But the lightning struck the holy church,
And burned it to the ground;
Then the liquor people thanked the Lord
That he passed such things around.

Digitized by Google

DEFENCE OF FREE SPEECH

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

Being a Three Hours' Address to the Jury before the Lord Chief Justice of England, in answer to an Indictment for Blasphemy, on April 24, 1883.

With Special Preface and many Footnotes

Price FOURPENCE. Post free FIVEPENCE.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—MISS E. M. VANCE, N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6½ ins. by 8½ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be base on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this..... day of..... 190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 82 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

GILES' APOSTOLIC RECORDS. Price 3s., postage 5d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner

(Under the Auspices of the National Secular Society.)

AT THE

RESTAURANT FRASCATI,

ON

Tuesday Evening, January 12, 1914.

Chairman: Mr. G. W. FOOTE.

DINNER 6.30 p.m. SHARP. EVENING DRESS OPTIONAL.

TICKETS FOUR SHILLINGS EACH,

Obtainable from MISS E. M. VANCE, also THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE

Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 52 SUNDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Words are the only things that last for ever.
—WILLIAM HAZLITT.

The Great War.—I.

IT was very fortunate for me that I spent the past summer in Europe. While at times I felt a bit nervous, and was afraid I would never be able to find a ship to take me home, on the whole, I had enough stimulating experiences to compensate me fully for any anxiety or inconvenience the War may have caused me. For the first time in my life, I was face to face with the sternest realities. Such a storm had never burst upon me before. The state of mind I was in was very provocative of thought. My head was like a bee hive. In my sleep, even, I was at war—giving and receiving blows—at war with the institutions, the civilisation, the religion, which was too dilapidated, too shabby, too threadbare, too hollow, to be of any help in a crisis. I kept a diary of the impressions and events of the day, and of the alternating sunshine and storm in my own mind. I intend to quote freely from my notebook. Without going to the front, or anywhere near the firing line, I was close enough to the heart of things to catch the throb and fever of the battlefield—to feel the smart of the bullets in my flesh and hear their shrieking in the air. I was wounded and died with every brave soldier in action. I wept with every mother upon the neck of her son; and with every sweetheart I kissed her lover good-bye. At the thought of the Germans marching in shining armor and singing as they marched, "Der Wacht am Rhein"; and of the French facing the deadly fire of the siege guns, singing the "Marseillaise"; and of the English lads playing under the murderous fire of the enemy, and singing "It's a long way to Tipperary" I glowed all over with pride and wonder.

London offered excellent opportunities for an investigation into the causes and persons responsible for a war which, in a short time, had converted Christendom into a shambles. I had also as fair a chance to study the French phase of the question in London as I should have had if I had been in Paris. London was full of Frenchmen, and more of them kept pouring into the city every day, until one heard so much French spoken in the streets, the restaurants, the hotels, and the theatres, as to give one the illusion of being in France instead of in England. I also met many Belgian refugees, and heard their tales of woe. But, of course, I had no immediate contact with the Germans, and am not so well informed of their explanations of the causes of the conflict now raging in Western Europe. I may say that I did my best to read impartially everything I could procure about all the belligerents—the German "White Book," Bernhardi's Germany and the Next War, Professor Cramb's work on Treitschke and his school, and the Germanistic pamphlets containing contributions from distinguished American professors. I also read what our friend and teacher, Professor Ernst Haeckel, had to say on England's responsibility for the gory scenes of which Europe is the theatre to-day. I have, therefore, some preparation for a discussion of the War between Germany and Austria on the one hand, and the Allies on the other.

At times London had the appearance of a camp. The railway stations were jammed with departing soldiers and arriving wounded. Mere lads not yet fifteen or sixteen years old could be seen by the hundreds, dressed in soldiers' uniform and carrying rifles. Children at the age of ten, and younger even, with paper caps, wooden swords, and tin cans for drums, were marching through the streets, dressed in rags, with enough holes in their trousers to show that they had been in action. Everybody had caught the war fever. The hotel parlors were turned over to women sewing for the wounded. The newspapers, announcing now a victory and now a disaster, kept the people in a swing between hope and fear—enough to make the stoutest of them dizzy. Hardly an hour passed without witnessing the tramping of the recruits through the streets—the dear boys, marching straight into the cannon's mouth, inspired by love and duty—and the girls walking at their sides, and trying to smile.

Yet London was not so deeply moved by the War as Paris. That joyous city was a veritable sepulchre; her radiant boulevards were as sombre as the alleys in a cemetery. Imagine Paris at night—the lights extinguished, the stores closed, the amusement halls like morgues! The only signs of life were in the clouds, dropping fire upon the heads of those below. Were the awful scenes of 1870 to be re-enacted! Poor Paris! Was she again to become the target for Prussian guns!

In Berlin—in splendid Berlin, fast getting to be the rival in beauty of Paris, and in activity of London—the agitation of the people must have been equally intense. Germany exposed to the attacks of seven nations! Whose fault was that? Seven nations on top of one! A nation for each day in the week for the Germans to fight! Whose diplomacy was that? Think of a country, in the noonday of its prosperity, in the zenith of its power—young and lusty—manœuvred into the mouths of the cannons of seven nations! Whose chef-d'œuvre was that? We cannot even imagine the state of feeling of the people of Germany when the distant thud or r-r-r-ump of the cannon called every able-bodied man to the front. "We win, or we perish!" cries the nation, as it leaps forth as one man—one against seven iron-clad powers!

I see by my notebook that the first word I have written down and commented on is the word militarism. By militarism the majority of people mean the Prussian War Party. The indiscriminate outcry against militarism did not impress me. If by militarism be meant extensive and expensive warlike preparations, all the nations of the world are guilty in proportion to their resources. Great Britain spent eighty millions—nearly half a billion dollars—annually on her Army and Navy. To say that a nation with so colossal a war budget was not prepared for war, or that it is free from militarism, would not be a defensible statement to make. But if by militarism be meant the nation armed for defensive purposes, armed to maintain its sovereignty, armed to compel aggressors, invaders, chauvinists, or imperialists dreaming of world conquests, to beware, then I am for it heart and soul.

—A lecture delivered in Chicago, by

M. M. MANGASARIAN.

Digitized by Google

Sir Oliver Lodge and Immortality.—II.

(Concluded from p. 803.)

I SAID last week that Sir Oliver Lodge's lecture might properly be called a "tendency lecture." Statements are made in order to support a desired conclusion, and without, apparently, any other reason. For example, I do not think that any careful scientific thinker would, to-day, define evolution as being an "unfolding." That conception properly belongs to what one may call the infantile stages of evolution. The root idea here was that a seed contained a miniature plant, a germ or a cell contained a miniature animal, and the evolution of plant or animal consisted in an "unfolding"—on a larger scale—of their microscopical contents. Of course, this is not true. The seed does not contain the fully formed flower, any more than the germ contains the fully formed animal, or the acorn an oak tree. All we have is the possibility of growth or development along a particular line, partly determined by the arrangement of forces represented by the seed or germ, and partly determined by environmental forces. That is the true conception of evolution; but it is easy to see why this conception of "unfolding" is stressed by Sir Oliver Lodge and other religious writers. It supports the notion that instead of living phenomena being a part of natural phenomena as a whole, it belongs to a class apart, and is merely seeking the appropriate physical conditions to "unfold" itself. And of that there is not the slightest shred of evidence.

Here is another example of the same kind. Everyone must have observed how fond the modern "mystical" Christian—perhaps one ought to say "mystified" Christian—is of appealing to the East. The East is a long way off; its habits are far removed from ours; and in this we find another illustration of the truth that the less we know about anything the more useful it is to religion. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries most Europeans were willing to credit almost any marvel concerning the East. Fabulous wealth, men with eyes between their shoulders, heads under their arms, or stupendous powers of magic, were all attributed to the East; and although we have outgrown the physical aspect of these wonders, mental marvels are still placed to the credit of the gorgeous East. So Sir Oliver, having to admit that Western science is not inclined to support his view of the soul, says:—

> "Mind you, some nations have attended more to spiritual things than to the others. We have some friends from the East here. The East has very much to instruct the West in. We can instruct them in business habits and practical life; they can instruct us in things relating to the soul and meditation. They enter into the silence and meditate a great deal more than we do."

Now this appeal to the East is pure delusion. The notion that because in the East the figure of the religious Fakir has never died out, therefore it knows more about the soul than the West is simply ridiculous. True knowledge on any subject is not gained by retiring into solitude and merely meditating; that is to invite and to secure illusion. Meditation is only valuable on the basis of actual knowledge. Meditation without knowledge is of no use to anyone. There was a time when the West did as the Eastern religious Fakir still does. It meditated without knowledge; and the result was the religious rubbish of the Dark Ages. Sir Oliver does not realise, apparently, that the West has passed through, has actually outgrown, that stage of religious thought which still has power in the East. Nor does he appreciate the fact that the development of life and knowledge in the East is killing the method of the religious Fakir in the East in exactly the same way as it has been killed in the West.

"Once you realise," says Sir Oliver, "that consciousness is something outside the particular mechanism which it makes use of, you will realise that survival of existence is natural, that it is the simplest thing." Quite so. Once we bring ourselves to the point of believing that twice two make five, it is a simple thing to agree that half of the sum of twice two equals two-and-a-half. But it is not a question of believing this or that; it is solely a question as to whether we have enough evidence to justify the holding of a particular belief. Sir Oliver says that he possesses this evidence, which may or may not be so; but in any case it is evidence only to him, and may be quite inadequate to compel belief in others. The evidence, we are told, "is recorded in the volumes of a scientific society such as we have got, and there is more evidence for everybody who is able to study the subject." Sir Oliver is referring to the Society for Psychical Research, and he speaks as though the evidence published in the Society's volumes was absolutely conclusive, and as though this evidence was unknown to sceptics. Neither of these assumptions are justified by the facts. Far from the evidence being conclusive, it is not even the fact that all the members of the Psychical Research Society are convinced that the evidence collected proves the reality of a future life. Many doubt it very strongly; and while that is the case it is hardly admissible to point to these volumes as though they contained unimpeachable evidence for a future life.

Nor is there any need to recommend these volumes to sceptics as though here was a whole field of evidence with which they were unacquainted. Thoughtful students of the question know these volumes well. They are able to study the evidence that has been collected—some of them have written about it, and they have not been slow to point out its inconclusive character. And their dissidence, along with that of many members of the Society for Psychical Research, quite destroys the value of Sir Oliver's declaration "on definite scientific grounds" that "we shall continue to exist." Such language is quite out of place. To state a thing "on definite scientific grounds" should mean, and ought to mean, that the evidence is of such a nature that it will compel conviction with all who examine it. But in the case of Sir Oliver Lodge this is no more than a personal conviction. It may be a guarantee of his sincerity in the matter; but it is his accuracy, not his sincerity, that is in question.

Sir Oliver Lodge believes that "we ourselves are not limited to the few years that we live on this earth; we shall go on without it; we shall continue to exist; we shall certainly survive," on the ground that he has actually conversed with departed friends. That is, he believes not in a mere survival, but in the survival of personality—which is what one ought to mean when they talk about immortality. Well, it is interesting to note how this belief is introduced by him. He says:—

> "Mind and consciousness are not limited to the brain. That is an extraordinary doctrine that people have—that the brain is the mind. Why do they think that? Because if you destroy the brain your mind appears to go. What goes? Not your mind really out of existence. Your consciousness is still there, but it can no longer manifest itself, for it has lost its instrument of manifestation."

Now, I do not know that I should care to say that the brain is the mind, any more than I should care to say that motion is heat. From one point of view the statement would be true enough, but it would, from another point of view, be a very loose way of stating the case, and it is curious that Sir Oliver should prefer the loose to the more exact statement.

Still, even accepting Sir Oliver's position that brain and mind are two quite distinct things, bearing to each other, to follow his own illustration, the relation that an organist bears to an organ, it is impossible to see how he can get the survival of personal identity on this ground. For, note, that there are all sorts of personalities. As Sir Oliver Lodge would say, the manifestations of mind are varied in form. How is this to be accounted for? The materialistic explanation is, of course, simple—and it covers the facts. Brain and mind being related as organs to function, variation in the one corresponds to variation in the other. And this is so self-evident that the Spiritualist admits its truth. He does not, at least he need not, deny that in some way mind and brain are related, as organs to function, and, consequently, that the variations in the two will synchronise. But he argues that this is not due to the inseparability of brain and mind, but because mind manifests itself through a material organism, and its expression is therefore conditioned by the medium through which it passes.

Digitized by Google

Now, granting all this to be the case, it does not help in the least a theory of the survival of personality. For, even on this theory, the creation of the personalities, we know, is due to the difference of bodily constitution. Sir Oliver Lodge is different from Bill Sykes, because the instrument through which mind manifests itself is different. If Bill Sykes possessed the brain that Sir Oliver Lodge possesses and had passed through the same experiences, he would think and believe as Sir Oliver thinks and believes. This truth is still further emphasised by the fact—admitted by the Spiritualist and Materialist—that any alteration in the brain, by accident or by disease, entails a corresponding alteration in the mental manifestations. From both points of view, then, the brain remains the condition of the persistence of personality. Destroy the brain—and there is no question of its destruction—and, so far as we can see, the sole condition of the continued existence of personality disappears. The survival of mind—in the shape of personality—is thus as inconceivable on the hypothesis advanced by Sir Oliver Lodge as it is on that held by the Materialist.

The truth is, that what Sir Oliver Lodge puts forward as a scientifically demonstrated truth is no more than a personal conviction that owes its being to strong religious prepossessions. He has experienced certain things, and assumes that they demonstrate the reality of a future life. Others have had much the same experience, and have regarded either the experiences themselves, or the explanations offered, with grave suspicion. It is not quite true to say, as Sir Oliver Lodge does, that the scientific world refuses to listen or to examine the evidence. It has done both, and its conclusion has been adverse. To say that people will not listen because they will not believe, is acting as religious preachers have always acted. It is the badge of their tribe. And there is a limit even to the utility of listening. When one has listened for ninety-nine times to a story and found it worthless, it is hardly to be guilty of culpable scepticism to decline listening on the hundredth occasion. From the dawn of history men have been proclaiming the reality of a future life. They have professed to have the strongest convictions and the clearest proofs. It has enlisted human attention and sympathy more than any other single subject. And the fact that, in spite of everything, the number believing in it steadily grows smaller, is surely presumptive proof against its veracity.

C. COHEN.

God's Sexlessness.

NOTHING is more marvellous than the garrulity of ignorance. The less a man knows about a subject the greater is his fluency in discussing it. Of God absolutely no knowledge is obtainable, and yet his alleged spokesmen are innumerable, and their communications of the most voluminous and intimate character. There is no building in the world large enough to contain the books which have been written about him, or even the sermons delivered in his name. Judging by their discourses, one would naturally infer that preachers possess encyclopædic knowledge of the Supreme Being; but it is their total ignorance that inspires their tongues. Three or four times a week they undertake to supply their fellow-beings with full information concerning his thoughts, purposes, and deeds. Prebendary Webster, of London, assured us a few weeks ago that God has thrust us into the present War; that it is his quarrel, not ours; and that our prayers for victory are not answered because we do not praise him sufficiently. But the most startling statement about God comes from Mr. R. J. Campbell, of the City Temple. It occurs in a sermon published in the Christian World Pulpit for December 16, and we must give it in his own words:—

> "Deity is of no sex. We have to use limiting terms when alluding to the Divine Being. It is just as inadequate to describe God as father as to describe him as mother; he is neither—and both."

We are aware that the theories of sex are practically numberless, but sexless beings are non-existent. We were told in our childhood that angels were of no sex, and that after death mankind would resemble them; but we have learned since that angels and a second life are alike figments. But even as children we were taught to regard God as belonging to the male sex, and it is well known that throughout the Bible the pronouns "he," "him," and "his" are applied to him. Both Jehovah and the Christian Deity have invariably been spoken of as males. There are, indeed, a few indications that Jehovah was double-sexed. In Genesis i. 26, 27, we find this remarkable language:—

> "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness.....And God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them."

Be that as it may, it is a well-attested fact that most Pagan deities were double-sexed. Herodotus informs us that, originally, the Persians did not think that the gods had the same nature with man, but he adds:—

> "At a later period they began the worship of Urania, which they borrowed from the Arabians and Assyrians. Mylitta is the name by which the Assyrians know this Goddess, whom the Arabians call Alitta, and the Persians Mitra" (B. I. C. 131).

Who has not read of the Gods and Goddesses of ancient Egypt, Greece, and Rome, all of whom had zealous worshipers? Indeed, a sexless deity is inconceivable.

"Deity is of no sex," Mr. Campbell dogmatically asserts; but, though of no sex, he is said to be in possession of all the qualities of fatherhood and motherhood at their best. It is an inadequate description of God to say that he is father, or that he is mother; "he is neither—and both." What can you make of a man who talks like that? "Deity is of no sex"; he is neither father nor mother, though he acts as if he were both. He is neither male nor female, yet partakes of the characteristics of both sexes. The following is a fine sample of Mr. Campbell's method of reasoning:—

> "Those qualities which we are accustomed to associate with motherhood at its best must be Divine qualities; they come forth from God, or we should never know them. If human motherhood is beautiful and worthy of reverence, if it possesses a value for us which nothing can replace, it is because its source is in the heart of God, and it is unceasingly nourished and inspired therefrom."

As a matter of undeniable fact, motherhood at its best is an instinct that has taken countless millenniums to develop into its present state of perfection in woman. Maternal qualities, of a high order, are exhibited among exceedingly low animals, and they steadily improve as one ascends towards the present summit of the evolutionary process. A female stork is as devoted to her offspring as any human mother can be, and nothing can be more beautiful than the unhesitating manner in which she sacrifices her life in their defence when their safety is threatened. No, "those qualities which we are accustomed to associate with motherhood at its best" have not come forth from God, but are the products of an extremely long course of evolution. Does Mr. Campbell really mean to say that motherhood at its best would be an impossibility if there were no God with an infinite maternal heart? With most of what he tells us about human motherhood we are, of course, in complete agreement. Whatever is distinctive and special in motherhood is the most beautiful thing in the world. There is nothing that can for a moment be compared with it. It is the holiest and most exalted reality known to us. Above and beyond it there is nothing, Mr. Campbell's God being merely misguided fancy's product.

Digitized by Google

The reverend gentleman's description of his sexless Deity is highly amusing. Listen:—

> "We can think of God as strong and masculine, inflexibly righteous, sternly just in his judgments. We can visualise him under these aspects without any difficulty, cannot think of him without them; but perhaps his more gracious qualities do not so readily force themselves upon the imagination. Even though we call him a God of love, and our Father, fully believing what we say, and deriving great comfort from it, the thought of his mercifulness and faithfulness, his inalienable, yearning solicitude for our welfare, is not, as a rule, equally clear to our conceptions."

We maintain, on the contrary, that it is quite impossible, with the history of the world in our mind's eye, to think intelligently and honestly of God in either of those capacities. Can you point to a single occasion during the last two thousand years on which he whom you call the absolute Sovereign of the Universe granted a tangible manifestation of his strength and masculinity, his inflexible righteousness, and his sternly just judgment? In what war has he ever defended right against might? The Bible tells us that he has a mighty arm, but when did he put it forth to protect the weak against the greed and lust of the strong? Has he not permitted beautiful Belgium to become a vast heap of black ruins, and its innocent people miserable exiles on the face of the earth? Has he not allowed Germany to shell three important towns on our north-east coast and kill and wound many harmless civilians within their borders? Surely such happenings cannot be cited as evidences that the world is governed by a God of justice and love. Mr. Campbell is of opinion that our Heavenly Father is neither the soft sentimentalist preached by many modern evangelists, nor the stern, cold-hearted sovereign the Puritans believed him to be, but the sexless being who is really neither father nor mother, yet possesses and exercises the attributes of both. Well, whatever God is or is not, whether he exists or does not exist, there is no doubt whatever but that the minister of the City Temple plays the part of a sentimentalist with a vengeance in the pulpit. Fancy his having the temerity to assure a man that what he cannot bear, God will bear for him; that if he suffers, it is not because God is indifferent to his case, but because he needs that pain in order to bless and exalt him, and that not one pang will be permitted beyond what that holy purpose requires. Such a Gospel is a lie, and tends to emasculate those who are foolish enough to listen to it.

The sexless Deity has an only begotten Son who became a man, and Mr. Campbell declares that we do not need to look further than the man Christ Jesus "for the meaning of motherhood in God." "Was ever any man so strong as Jesus?" he exultantly asks; to which question we have no hesitation in returning an affirmative answer. Many men have been much stronger than the Gospel Jesus. A genuinely strong man would not have broken down, as Jesus is reported to have done when he realised that a cruel death was at hand. Socrates did not enter Gethsemane and pray that he might not drink the hemlock. Giordano Bruno faced the flames without a tremor, and died a braver death than Jesus, which he would not have had to die had it not been for the superstitious belief in the Galilean. "Was ever woman more loyally tender to her own?" Mr. Campbell again asks; and again we boldly answer in the affirmative. Tenderness was not a conspicuous feature of Jesus' treatment of his disciples, while all others were denounced in the strongest terms. How often did he lose patience with and severely scold his small band of followers. Against all who did not take him at his own valuation his wrath was terrible, and Mr. Campbell exaggerates when he characterises his love for his own as "sweet beyond words." Well, out of the Gospel Jesus the Church has constructed Christ, and Christ reigns as King of Kings and Lord of Lords; and we know to our sorrow with what disastrous results. God is now in Christ reconciling the world to himself, and in the name of both Christendom is waging the bloodiest and savagest war in all history.

We conclude, therefore, that whether the Deity be of no sex or not, the belief in him has done nothing but harm, and that the sooner it dies out the better it will be for mankind.

J. T. LLOYD.

"The Cosmic Roots of Love."—III.

BY REV. HENRY M. SIMMONS.

(Published by the World Peace Foundation, Boston, U.S.A.)

(Concluded from p. 806.)

THE harmony of nations and the folly of their quarrels was also taught more and more by eminent men, from Sully and Grotius onward. Voltaire wrote most earnestly against wars. Benjamin Franklin said there never had been and never would be a good one. Jeremy Bentham denounced war as "mischief on the largest scale." Robert Hall condemned it as "the temporary repeal of all the principles of virtue." Carlyle asked whether the French and English soldiers who "blow the souls out of one another" have any real reason for it; and he answered, "Busy as the devil is, not the slightest." Long before General Sherman, Channing said that a battlefield is a vast "exhibition of crime," and that "a more fearful hell in any region of the universe cannot well be conceived." Auguste Comte closed his "Positive Philosophy" with congratulation that the old evil was ending; and at about the same time Emerson wrote that "war is on its last legs" and "begins to look like an epidemic insanity." Charles Sumner called it "international lynch-law" with works "infinitely evil and accursed;" and he said that the greatest value of the Springfield arsenal was that it had inspired Longfellow's poem against war. Theodore Parker wrote, "Posterity will damn into deep infamy that government which allows a war to take place in the middle of the nineteenth century." Even during our Mexican War, Parker denounced it as "mean and infamous"—as not only a "great boy fighting a little one," but as a fight where "the big boy is in the wrong, and tells solemn lies to make his side seem right." So Lowell opposed that war of his own country—made Hosea Biglow "call it murder," and made Parson Wilbur rebuke it in behalf of a higher "patriotism" and of that truer country which is not territory, but justice. In 1848 and 1849 great Peace Congresses for international arbitration and disarmament met in Brussels and Paris. At the latter Victor Hugo predicted the day when cannon would be obsolete and seen only in museums as curiosities. Even England, during a whole generation of peace, had reached the "belief that wars were things of the past;" and Buckle soon after wrote that the national taste for them had become "utterly extinct."

The work of union continued, and even the wars that followed were sometimes in its favor. Our own Civil War was in the name of "the Union." Italy was at last united again. The great German empire was organised where a score of petty States had once opposed each other. But union has been advanced most by the peaceful processes of industry, trade, travel, intercourse of every kind. Victor Hugo contrasted the great Industrial Exposition at Paris, where the nations had come together to learn good from each other, with "that terrible international exposition called a battlefield." Even the electric flashes through the Atlantic cable moved Whittier to sing,—

Digitized by Google

"Weave on, swift shuttle of the Lord,
Beneath the sea so far,
The bridal-robe of earth's accord,
The funeral-shroud of war."

Every peaceable ship is a fuller shuttle for that shroud; every railway train, with its merchandise and mail, adds its thread to that bridal-robe. Through these secular agencies, human sympathy has already widened until men give their tears and treasure for suffering heathen around the earth, whom once they would have thought it sacred duty to slay. The very laws of the world are working for the true Christianity and the final union of mankind.

Not, indeed, that we are near it yet. The nations still try to out-trick each other in trade. In the most "Christian" nations the citizens sometimes do; and possessions are not shared with perfect brotherhood even in the Church. No longer is Ananias struck dead for keeping back part of his property, but he and Sapphira sit safely in their pew, with no question about their land. No longer is Dives sent to "hell" on account of his wealth, but has become a deacon, and the preacher has found a way to get the camel through the needle's eye. Nor is Lazarus as peaceful as he used to be. He is ready to dynamite, not Dives only, but every Lazarus who will not join his strike to cut off the country's needed coal or beef.

For the spirit of violence still survives to rend society. It inspires not only the poor and ignorant, but their leaders and rulers, and sometimes takes possession of a nation. That long dream of peace to which we have referred was broken by a most destructive series of wars. Those of the ten years ending in 1871 are said by Mulhall to have cost nearly a million and a half of lives and nearly six billions of dollars. Since then the armaments in Europe have much further increased. A standard new History tells us that the "civilised Christian nations" now occupying the old Roman territory, though no longer in danger from outside barbarians, yet keep "under arms ten or twelve times the forces" of the pagan emperors. Military expenditures are vastly greater than any other. Even in our own country, in 1899, the Naval and War Departments and pensions consumed nearly three-fourths of the entire expenditures of the national government. President Eliot recently reminded us that the sum granted to our great Agricultural Department for a year was "about the cost of one day of the war with Spain;" while the annual amount given to the beneficent work of fish-culture was less than that spent in maintaining one battleship. Fifty years ago Charles Sumner said: "Every ship of war that floats costs more than a well-endowed college; every sloop of war, more than the largest library in our country." To-day, battleships are far more costly and numerous, and eminent Americans who profess much zeal for Christ want to increase them.

They want to use them, too; and even preachers are not always opposed to this. General Francis A. Walker wrote, in 1869, that in five years' pretty constant attendance at church, and in listening to sermons from fifty different pulpits, he had "not heard a single discourse which was devoted to the primitive Christian idea of peace, or which contained a perceptible strain of argument or appeal for international good will." A few years ago we kept our Christmas season of "peace on earth" by a clamor for a mighty war with England about a Venezuelan boundary. Our people and press had just been crying out against the horror of a proposed pugilistic fight between two fools in Texas, but now became eager to send into the ring half a million Christians to engage in battles beside which prize-fights would be bland and benevolent. Some even argued that our national character would be ennobled by a war, and our moral tone improved by bombarding a few towns and butchering their people. The excitement passed, and how that boundary question was settled few now know or care. But we have since tried that method of ethical training, though on a much smaller and safer scale. The ideals of the battlefield and of the "water-cure" have spread among the people, yet without the predicted moral improvement. Indeed, violence seems to have become unusually popular, strikers club and kill other workmen with mediæval ardor, and now and then a community gathers with the greatest delight to watch the writhings of a negro burning to death. In pessimistic moments one sometimes feels that our civilisation is little more than a film, beneath which the old savagery is still seething.

These evils, however, are exceptional, and we must not make too much of them. A little bad gets all attention, while the great current of good ones goes on unheeded, just because it is so great and common. The bad may even be a sign of progress; and part of the violence to-day is a passionate outcry against wrongs that have long been allowed, and that must be ended. But, amid the violence, peaceful methods are advancing, and arbitration is more and more settling labor troubles and preventing wars. Even the wars that do come are no longer between the foremost nations, but have mostly sunk into expeditions of some powerful people to conquer some feeble one. Even these inglorious conquests have become so difficult and expensive that they will not often be attempted; while real war between two great powers would be so vastly more so that M. Bloch pronounced it already impossible. Certainly, war seems destined to die at length by its own growth, to kill itself by its costliness. Even now, two equal nations could not long continue it without the bankruptcy of both.

So do the laws of progress work for peace. A wise man, when challenged, replied that any fool can propose a duel, but it takes two fools to fight. The nations will yet learn this. Already they are questioning the wisdom of wasting most of their wealth in endless preparation for wars which can be avoided, and which cannot come without mutual ruin. Already they see a fallacy in the system which spends millions on a battleship that soon becomes useless by the invention of a better one, and which is for ever improving walls to resist cannon, and then improving cannon to destroy the walls. They begin to see the folly of fortifying boundaries at infinite expense, when that long one between us and British America has been safe for nearly a century, without walls or warship, by mere mutual agreement. They see something worse than folly in the system which uses our noble youth like Falstaff's ragamuffins—as "food for powder" and "to fill a pit"—and, sometimes, to fulfil viler purposes. For the moral fallacy, too, is more and more seen. Why condemn brutality and crime at home, and then cultivate them abroad? Why hang for killing one man, and honor for killing a hundred? Why imprison a starving woman for stealing a loaf, and then praise rulers or soldiers for looting cities and stealing a whole country? Shall justice be abolished by a national boundary, and the moral law stop at the State line?

Emerson once said, "The arch-abolitionist, older than John Brown, and older than the Shenandoah Mountains, is Love, whose other name is Justice, which was before Alfred, before Lycurgus, before slavery, and will be after it." That same Love and Justice, older than battleships or the brutality that wants them, is still here—was alive before wars began, and will be after they are ended.

Doubtless this principle of union will work on until it links all nations by just laws, and settles their quarrels by peaceful courts. It will also unite all classes in them. It will not, however, cement society in any spiritless communism like an archaic sponge, or bind men in any tyrannic labor union which denies liberty to its members. For individualism also has been an aim in Nature—from rushing worlds to roaming bees and soaring birds and free souls. The perfect system will combine fraternity with freedom—"liberty and union, one and inseparable, now and for ever."

This principle will perfect religion also. So ancient prophets and apostles taught. So the best modern ones have taught. Dr. Putnam said the one thing he worked for was "the sense of universal unity and brotherhood." Dr. Channing not only made this his chief aim, but saw it as the substance of religion, and said, "The love of God is but another name for the love of essential benevolence and justice." So Emerson declared this sentiment not only "the essence of all religion," but the essence of Deity: "If a man is at heart just, then in so far is he God: the immortality of God, the majesty of God, do enter into that man with justice." These words seemed profane, but they are almost the same which the apostle wrote: "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us," for "God is love." Some pious people slur love as "not religion," but "only ethics." Only ethics! Only love; that is, according to the apostle, only God! But this is exactly what pious people were seeking. The "cosmic roots of love" are also those of religion.

Digitized by Google

Such is the sweep of this principle of union. It is indeed a "cosmic" principle, working from the nebula to now—from the primal atoms to the perfect civilisation and religion. The great Kant adored two wonders—the stars above and the moral law within. But the two wonders are one, and all the more wonderful because one. The moral law within is the higher music of the same law which "the morning stars sang together" and have been singing ever since. It is sung ever more clearly through creation—from solar systems up to human society, from nebular mist up to minds that outshine the stars, and to souls and sentiments that hope to outlast the stars. It has brought love. Rather, it is love, and has been love from the first. Its lesson is to work for love now, and to trust the Love eternal.

The Desert of Theology.

THERE is a land where sunshine never cheers
  The garish day, the bleak and woeful earth;
No moon e'er gilds the joyless barren spheres,
  No sound of song, no whisperings of mirth,
  No bridal blossoms and no happy birth;
But all is gloom with musings of despair,
  Each day declines lived out with little worth,
Each season brings no brightened vision rare,
For joy of life can find no place to wander there.

The confines of this land of blood and tears
  Are wrought of parchment, force, and bitter hate;
Flunkeys and fools, and madmen with their leers,
  Patch up the walls of this forlorn estate,
  Doomed to decay forever by stern Fate;
Yet those who live and toil within its walls
  Make fearful moan, but not their toil abate,
From birth, from early morn, or when night falls,
But struggle on, till Death his love words sweetly calls.

WILLIAM REPTON.

THE LITTLE VAGABOND.

Dear mother, dear mother, the Church is cold,
But the alehouse is healthy, and pleasant, and warm;
Besides, I can tell where I am used well,
Such usage in heaven will never do well.

But, if at the Church they would give us some ale,
And a pleasant fire our souls to regale,
We'd sing and we'd pray all the livelong day,
Nor never once wish from the Church to stray.

Then the parson might preach, and drink, and sing,
And we'd be as happy as birds in the spring;
And modest Dame Lurch, who is always at Church,
Would not have bandy children, nor fasting, nor birch.

And God, like a father, rejoicing to see His children as pleasant and happy as he,
Would have no more quarrel with the devil or the barrel,
But kiss him, and give him both drink and apparel.

—William Blake.

Acid Drops

Mr. Lloyd George writes to the Methodist Times that he has been visiting the battlefield in France, and was quite surprised at what he saw. Among other things he observed a French officer telling a wounded Prussian prisoner that he need be under no alarm as the Allies treated all the wounded alike—which we quite believe to be the truth. It is no more than is usual amongst civilised nations, even when they are engaged in such an uncivilised thing as warfare. But Mr. Lloyd George had to find a Christian moral, and he does it in this way:—

> "I marvelled that this exhibition of goodwill amongst men who were sworn foes should be possible amid such surroundings, until my eyes happened to wander down a lane, where I saw a long row of wagons each marked with a great red cross. Then I knew who had taught these brave men the lesson of humanity that will gradually, surely, overthrow the reign of hate. Christ had not died in vain."

Mr. Lloyd George ought to know that wounded enemies received attention long before the institution of the Red Cross Society. That, indeed, had nothing Christian about its origin. It was started to look after the wounded because the purely military arrangements to this end were so ineffective. Its adoption of the Cross as a mark of recognition was natural, but yet accidental. To say that the Cross had taught these men humanity is sheer nonsense. Mr. Lloyd George ought to recollect that the wars in which wounded enemies have received least consideration have been those in which religion has entered most largely. When men are fighting an ordinary battle the expression, "sworn foes," is more or less symbolic. Very few of the men on the one side bear any personal enmity to those on the other; and, therefore, when the fighting is over the enmity dies down. But when people are led to fight in a religious war, each man feels himself to be in grim reality a sworn foe of everyone on the other side. And that feeling, as all experience teaches, dies out neither easily nor rapidly.

Mr. Lloyd George rather ingenuously cites massacres by troops in pre-Christian times, and adds "these were the accompaniments of civilised warfare before the advent of Christ." But why go back so far? Our pious Chancellor must surely be aware of the fact that massacres have commonly accompanied all wars until very recent times. More, for cold-blooded brutality, he need go no farther away than the country that has suffered so terribly during the present War—Belgium. History—Christian or non-Christian—contains nothing so deliberately barbarous as the massacres of the inhabitants of the Belgian cities by the Spanish Christians, and the slaughter of the Waldenses and Albigenses by Christian soldiers outdid in horror anything that the present War has seen. Such special pleading is quite unnecessary. The atrocities committed, when every allowance has been made, are bad enough, and ought to excite the indignation of decent people everywhere. Mr. Lloyd George's way of putting it must just be taken as an example of the disturbing influence of Christian prejudice.

The English Churches did well the other day by their special time of prayer. The Kaiser rested a bit in communion with the Lord, and during that time a powerful German fleet was prepared to make a raid upon some undefended towns on the English East Coast, in direct violation of the Hague Convention which the Kaiser himself had signed—but that, we all know, was "only a scrap of paper." Scarborough, Whitby, and other seaside resorts were nicely bombarded, without a gun to reply with. All they had to trust to was the God of intercession, who appears to have neglected them altogether. Hundreds of peaceable civilians—men, women, and children—were slain without a moment's notice. Then the German fleet heard the distant thunder of the British ships that were not made in Germany, so they made fast tracks for the land of their birth, which they reached in safety. We wonder what the British Christians think of their God now? What he thinks of them must be an easy problem.

From 8 o'clock on Wednesday morning until 8 o'clock on Thursday morning was the time devoted to prayer in the Cathedral. It was at first decided that women should not be allowed to remain after 9 o'clock at night, but eventually the hour was altered to 11 o'clock, and those who were there at that hour were allowed to remain, but newcomers were not admitted. One wonders why women could not be trusted in a Christian cathedral, or what a twenty-four hours' praying was supposed to accomplish? These people seem to treat God as a cute youngster does its parents. Sheer persistency often does the trick. However, the value of the performance may be gauged by the fact that it was during the time these people were praying that the German gunboats were bombarding the East Coast.

Digitized by Google

January 3 is the day set apart in England as a day of prayer on account of the War. We should have thought the St. Paul's experiment was enough for awhile, but the motto of the clergy is evidently "Business as usual." In this Day of Prayer, however, the English clergy are not to have it all their own way. The Archbishops and Bishops of Germany have ordered Sunday, January 10, to be observed as a general day of prayer and repentance. Both sides will pray; both will repent—and both will go on as usual.

In issuing a notice for the English "Day of Humble Prayer and Intercession," the Archbishops of Canterbury and York say:—

> "Never was there a time when the 'agreement' in prayer, to which so much is promised, has been so widely extended. The Roman Catholics and the Nonconformists in the United Kingdom have consented to co-operate with us. But, more than this, the Church of France is doing the same, and we have reason to believe that, so far as is possible in the circumstances, the Church in Belgium will do likewise. The Church of the great Russian Empire has been informed of our intention, and we may thankfully count upon sympathy in that direction. In neutral countries, too, and especially in America, there will be many to join in our prayers. We trust that throughout our Empire there will be a mighty voice of prayer raised to our Heavenly Father in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Prince of Peace."

The Archbishops, between them, might at least be accurate. The Church of France is not joining in the Day of Prayer, for the reason that there is no Church of France in existence. The Church in France may join in, but that is all. All the clergy with all the Allies will willingly join in prayer for the success of the allied forces, because they are fighting a common enemy, and are anxious for his destruction. And it is worth noting that this co-operation between Christians only becomes possible on the basis of hatred for someone else. So much for the value of the Christian doctrine of love.

The Church Times is hoping that the War will open up a brighter future for the Church in France. It says that Frenchmen have often treated the Church as an alien enemy, but the suspicion of the French workmen will be set at rest on observing the conduct of the priests during the War. Well, it is just possible that some people will form a better idea of the clergy as men than they did before. But the Church Times is very much mistaken if it imagines that the War will make any difference to the general policy of the Church in France once the War is over, or that those who opposed the Church before will embrace it in the future. Opposition to the Church in France, like opposition to the Church elsewhere, was based upon the perception of the truth that its strength threatened the wellbeing of society. It was not the expression of a mood, but the outcome of a deep and sincere conviction. Naturally, so long as the War lasts, and so long as national security and independence is threatened, internal quarrels are dropped, and amongst these the fight against the control of the secular State by clerical influences. But with the coming of peace the old social divisions and clash of opinions will reappear, and for our part we should be sorry were it otherwise.

The last sentence may be open to misapprehension, and a word of explanation is advisable. Very much has been said from the pulpit—as though it were something to be pleased at—that this War has had the beneficial effect of suspending all social and political quarrels; that threatened strikes, etc., have not materialised; that everything has been forgotten in the desire to defeat a common enemy. Quite so; and we agree as to the necessity for this; but we do not agree as to its being a move in the right direction. However poor many of our political and social quarrels are, society develops by the contest of opposing ideals and opinions. There is simply no other method by means of which progress may be achieved. And to suspend this kind of warfare is not a good thing, but a bad thing; it means, not progress, but stagnation or retrogression. It is the suspension of warfare on a higher scale in favor of warfare on a lower scale. And the pulpits, in praising this as one of the beneficent consequences of the War, are showing themselves to be, as usual, the enemies of sane and orderly progress.

The Church Army has received a letter concerning a late subscriber, as follows: "Mrs. Blank is dead, and would be therefore glad if the Church Army would cease sending more appeals. She is no longer able to send monetary support, much as she would like to do so."

The sub-editors have been using their biggest type to narrate the story of a German officer's narrow escape from a concentration camp in a packing-case, in which he was boxed up for thirty-six hours, with a rug, biscuits, and cheese. What a pity there was no Yellow Press when Jonah made his memorable trip in the whale's stomach.

A French pussy saved a British officer's life by curling around his neck and preventing him being frozen to death, and a monument is to be erected to the faithful animal. In ancient days cats and other animals were the object of adoration, and a dove is the symbol of one of the members of the Christian Trinity.

We have always felt a genuine respect for the judicature of this country. While recognising the inevitable prejudices that afflict human nature—and Freethinkers have more cause to appreciate this than most other people—and allowing for blunders and errors of judgment that will happen, we have always felt that there is no country in the world in which an accused person stands a better chance of a fair trial than in this country. Our judges do, on the whole, try to be impartial, and generally are impartial. Nothing has shown this more clearly than the quashing of the verdict by the Court of Appeal against the German Consul at Newcastle. In ordinary times the decision would not have called for special comment. But just now, when feeling runs so high, and immediately after the frightful and quite unwarrantable destruction of life on the East Coast by raiding German cruisers, the decision is a remarkable one, and should be recognised as such. We are not venturing on any opinion concerning the justice of the original sentence, or of the result of the appeal. We merely cite it as proof of the integrity of the English courts, and one which England's deadliest enemies ought to appreciate at its true value. From one point of view it is something that every one may contemplate with pride. The pity is that national disputes cannot be settled by a court composed of men—drawn from all countries—of the type of these judges, instead of by the brutal and senseless form of an appeal to arms. One day, perhaps?

Father Samuel has been entertaining a big congregation in Berlin with a lecture on "Is God Neutral?" The reverend gentleman took a negative view of the question. God was certainly on the side of the Germans (especially at Yarmouth, Scarborough, and a few other such places, where the people don't fight and have nothing to fight with). After the War the Germans will be the greatest people on earth. And when will that be? Father Samuel's power of prophecy ends at that point. Which is a great pity. For a good many gentlemen of his own race—though not, apparently, of his own religion—would give him a nice price for a "correct quotation."

We have not been giving the poor Christites our attention lately, but here are three from quite recent lists. It's a long, long way to Tipperary, so we'll take the Dean of that well-sung city first. Ven. Denis Harcan, D.D., left £3 527. Not a vast fortune, is it? but Ireland is not a country in which Catholic priests can expect to be very wealthy. Great improvement is shown by the Rev. Francis Lambert Cursham, vicar of Twenditch, Derbyshire, who left £32,459; and still more by Canon William Wolfe Capas, of Hereford, who left £41,977. We pause here, lest our pen should reach the top of the Tower of Babel.

Referring to the pulpit message, "Peace and goodwill amongst men," the Daily Mirror says that we can only send half of it. "Peace must wait till another year." This is a smart attempt to put the Christian Humpty-Dumpty on the wall again.

What "soulful" writing there is nowadays. Alluding to the great American railway stations, the New York Central Library, and some well-known stores, Mr. Stephen Graham finds that they are "temples of a new religion," in which "Americans pray more and aspire more to God than they do in the Churches." Pray and aspire, indeed! Prey and perspire would be more correct.

In the Sunday Chronicle for December 20 an unnamed "Labor Leader" writes of his conversion from pacifism to militarism. There is nothing very surprising in this. Many men lose their mental balance during times such as the present, and, so far, there doesn't seem any reason to give the Labor Leaders in any country special credit for maintaining theirs. So far as this gentleman's opinion goes, that this War, instead of ending all wars, will only tend to an increase of militarism, we agree with him. It is no more than we have said ourselves over and over again. War cannot be killed by war; of that we are quite certain. And when this conflict is brought to a close there will be a strong demand that our Navy and Army shall be kept at greater strength than hitherto, and this is only what must occur in all other countries. You cannot have universal disarmament by agreement, because nations do not trust each other sufficiently to agree upon this point. And if they did trust each other, you would hardly need agreement, as disarmament would come about almost of itself. Whoever gains or loses by the War, it is certain that militarism will gain. Amongst nations of approximately equal strength a purely defensive army is more or less of a delusion. In such cases a defensive army becomes, sooner or later, an offensive army. Of course, the offensive war is called a defensive one; that always happens. Even the German people had to be taught that their war was a defensive one; and the majority of Germans, apparently, still believe this to be the case.

Digitized by Google

But our converted "Labor Leader" is very wide of the mark when he says that the pacifists should not shrink from militarist abuse; "they should rather be thankful for the grace of moral courage that enables them to admit that they were mistaken." But were they mistaken? On the contrary, they were absolutely right in what they said. They never said that war could not occur. They knew that not only was war possible, but that militarists were going the right way to make it probable, and even inevitable. It was the militarists who said that the only way to secure peace was to prepare for war; and then, when war ensues, they say they were quite correct, only the preparations were not large enough. Well, but that principle, if true anywhere, must be true everywhere. It must be as true in Germany as in England. Did the German preparations for war make for peace? Why, the claim is that it was the German preparations for war that caused us to increase our military strength. And as one nation increases, others do the same—still maintaining the same relative strengths. And where is that process to end? Sooner or later one nation, finding itself with a huge army and navy, is bound to venture on trying conclusions with another nation. The thing is simply inevitable. The whole truth is that preparations for war mean war sooner or later. A nation does not respect brute strength on the part of another nation; it fears it—which is a very different thing. The War has fully justified all that pacifists have ever said on this head.

The only peace that comes from war is the peace that comes from the impossibility of further fighting. And the history of the world proves that this peace—or, rather, military inaction—is no guarantee against a recrudescence of war; quite the contrary. We see that kind of peace when two strongly entrenched armies face each other. Neither can advance; neither will retreat. There is a pause in the fighting, and each side uses this pause to bring up new troops, to devise fresh plans, for a more deadly attack. And that is really the kind of "peace" that war leaves behind it. The nation that is beaten plans for revenge; the nation that does the beating arms to prevent reprisals. Hatred of war and all that war means; a full perception of its inevitable folly, cruelty, wastefulness, and futility; a growth of intelligence, sympathy, and humanity; are the only forces that will ever end war. The pacifist said this before the War began. He is saying this now the War is on, and he will say it when the War is over, because all that has happened only illustrates its truth. The cannon is no better as a moral teacher than the whip.

The only "saint" that the English people cared for was "Saint John Lubbock," who was the founder of Bank Holidays, and who afterwards became Lord Avebury. His biography has just been published at the price of thirty shillings, and his most fervent admirers will have to wait until his book appears in a cheaper form.

The Incorporated Association of Headmasters holds its Annual General Meeting in the Guildhall on January 5. Amongst other resolutions is the following, which is to be moved by Mr. F. B. Malim, of Haileybury College:—

> "That in the opinion of this Association instruction in the elements of military drill and the use of the rifle should form part of the education of all boys in secondary schools."

Of course, this is not the first time that suggestions of this kind have been made; but coming now, and with some probability of its being carried, it is a good illustration of the value of the outcry against Prussian militarism. Intelligent hatred of this—and every other kind of hatred is worse than useless—would aim at protecting one's own country against militarism as much as possible. For whether we are to have Prussian militarism or any other militarism makes little real difference. The essential thing is to kill militarism everywhere, and to kill it by making it thoroughly abhorrent to people everywhere. And how is this going to be done by training people, from boyhood upward, in the very thing that we profess to dislike? Militarism in adult life is bad enough, but militarism in school life is infinitely more objectionable. School life, at least, should be kept free from this blot upon civilisation. To teach schoolboys the value and power of rational and moral ideals is to pave the way for peace. To accustom them to the rifle as the supreme arbiter of human affairs, is just as surely to pave the way for war. We hope that the other headmasters attending the meeting will be sane enough, and, in the best sense, patriotic enough, to recognise this and act upon it.

The Rector of Buckley, near Chester, has withdrawn the printing of the parish magazine from the firm that usually did the work on the ground that Dissenters were employed. A splendid thing is Christianity for inducing feelings of love and brotherhood.

Mr. Will Crooks, M.P., would sooner see every British man and woman blotted out than England defeated by Germany. He would sooner see them blotted out. The phrasing is expressive.

We feel sure that the Christians in this country will be glad to learn that the spiritual welfare of the German troops at the front is being well looked after. From an article in the Daily News we learn that the French troops captured a large consignment of little books compiled by priests and pastors for the use of German soldiers. The covers bear the inscription, "With God for the Victory," and inside there are quotations from the Old and New Testaments, forms of prayer, etc. It is also said that some of the soldiers, before going into battle, kneel down and entrust their souls and bodies to God. This is very gratifying, and we hope that British Christians will bear in mind that whatever the faults of the German troops, the majority are good Christians, and that their religious guides are as keen as our own to see that religious ministrations follow them to the field of battle.

The Christian Literature Society for India issues a special appeal for funds, pointing out that our debt to India is "immense," and that less than four millions out of three hundred and thirteen millions of the people of India are Christian. It therefore appeals for funds to send Christian literature to the people of India. We would suggest that a collection of the illustrated papers showing the Christian War in Europe would meet the case. The benighted Hindoo would be able to see how much better things are done in Christian countries.

The Daily Mail is a useful handmaid to the clergy. The following note was added to "A Prayer in Time of War" in a recent issue: "The War will change many things in art and life, and among them, it is to be hoped, many of our own ideas as to what is, and what is not, intellectual." "Carnage," to quote the poet's words, may be "God's daughter," but it does not straighten the tangle of the Trinity, or make the story of Jonah credible.

It is curious that so many people in this country should discover that Germany's repudiation of a treaty obligation is the result of "Materialism," or of neglecting the belief in God, etc. These good Christians should bear in mind that the repudiation of plighted words—whether written or oral—was raised to the level of a principle by only one institution in the world's history, namely, the Christian Church. "No faith with heretics" was made a principle of conduct by the Christian Church centuries before Bernhardi or Treitschke or Nietzsche were heard of. And the idea that no treaties should be made with heretics has been a common belief among Christians belonging to all Churches. When it comes to treading ordinary human obligations under foot the Christian Church generally can give every institution a long start and then make sure of an easy win.

The King of Siam, who has written a book on International Law, was formerly a member of Oxford University, and is yet another addition to the small list of royal authors. The most remarkable of these writers was the "King of Kings," whose masterpiece, the Bible, is one of the "blest books ever written.

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £239 17s. 6d. Received since:—H. Jessop, £5; G. F. Shoults, £1 1s.; Andrew Harvey, 10. 6d.; J. H., 5s.; F. E. Willis, 7s. 6d.; Mrs. Turnbull and Family, £1.; W. P. Adamson, £1 1s.; J. Robertson, 2s. 6d.; G. Sanders, 2s. 6d.; E. Dobson, 10s.

H. BAILEY.—The old lady's story has little point for such length.

F. E. WILLIS.—Glad you think the Freethinker articles on the War are "quite refreshing for their sanity and level-headedness."

T. O.—Yes, we are weathering the War-storm fairly well. You ask how we manage it? Our staff think for themselves, say what they mean, and mean what they say. Three lectures on Sunday, morning, afternoon, and evening, used to be the regular performance of special travelling lecturers. The object was to lower expenses. We did it ourselves. But it was killing work; and after a breakdown one Sunday, finding two lectures sufficient, we dropped the old practice, and the rule has been two ever since. It only wanted somebody eminent enough to break the old rule once for all.

H. JESSOP.—Very pleased to hear from you again, with substantial support as well as "every success" in our "fight for truth and liberty."

W. P. BALL.—Thanks for your cuttings.

E. B.—Your cuttings afford us great help.

WE have had our attention called to the fact that the poem, "I Would Not Be an Angel," in our last issue, is wrongly signed "Wallace Celson." The poem was by our old friend Wallace Nelson, and doubtless many British Freethinkers recognised for whom the name was intended. We regret the error, but we feel sure that Mr. Nelson, like ourselves, has been called many worse names than "Celson" in the course of his life.

G. BEDBOROUGH.—We thank you for the dainty little booklet and good wishes. Many a larger work has said less, and said even that, less well.

G. YATES.—The present is not a very merry Christmas, all things considered; and yet there is no reason why it should not be made as merry as possible. Joy and sorrow are individual matters, and there is no good done by pretence, or by trying to enforce gloom where it is not felt.

A. F. THORN.—Will see to the matter after Christmas.

AVON DALE.—Glad to have your good wishes. It is pleasant to know one is read with so much appreciation.

MRS. TURNBULL AND FAMILY.—We always remember you with Glasgow.

W. P. ADAMSON.—Fairly well, but the work is more taxing than it was—as, indeed, is only to be expected.

A. WYCHERLEY.—Rather late; afraid we cannot find room.

A. CHAPMAN.—Canon Green gets greener than ever. As long as we believe in God (Green's "God") the War is cheap. We don't exactly see how. But Green does, so it's all right.

G. BETTS.—Your open letter to Mr. Blatchford might do good in his paper; we can't see what good it could do in ours.

E. B.—Both statements may be true. The Referee is a very different paper now. Let us have the paper regularly, if you will; but the "cuttings" plan saves us trouble.

J. DISCOLL.—Christmas verses are not much of a treat to our readers, unless they are specially meritorious.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Bertram Dobell.

I AM not able to write at length this week on my old friend, Bertram Dobell, whose death took place recently, the funeral occurring at Golder's Green.

Obituary notices appeared in several newspapers, but I want to say something special about him, particularly with regard to old days and old interests. My contribution will, at least, be interesting to old friends.

G. W. FOOTE.

Sugar Plums.

Our next issue of the Freethinker will be a New Year's number, as well as the beginning of a new volume. There will be special articles by the regular contributors, and this should form a favorable time for the introduction of the paper to new readers. No paper stands more firmly in the affection of its readers than does the Freethinker in entering the thirty-fifth year of its existence, but its influence for good might be much greater than it is were it not for the trade and other obstacles to a larger circulation. Our strongest ally has always been personal canvass on the part of our readers, and we look forward to this source of help in 1915 as in previous years. The bond between Freethinker writers and readers is not that of the ordinary newspaper and its clientele. It is that of fellow-workers in a common cause.

We trust that all members of the Secular Society, Ltd., have received the Annual Report and Balance Sheet, together with Proxy Form, to be used at the Annual Meeting on December 29, at 7 o'clock. Those who have not received due notice should acquaint the Secretary of the fact without delay. All Proxy Forms for voting must be returned to the office at least two clear days before the meeting, duly stamped and witnessed. It is, however, to be hoped that all London members, at least, will be present in person, and we hope to see a sprinkling of provincial members as well. The place of meeting is the Society's Registered Offices, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

We shall not have many more opportunities of calling the attention of our readers to the London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner on January 12. Known Freethinkers will have received from the General Secretary a notice pointing out that this year tickets will be only supplied on application. The Dinner will be held at Frascati's Restaurant, Oxford-street, W., which is easy of access from all parts of London. The price of the tickets are 4s. each, and there will be the usual program of vocal and instrumental music, accompanied by speeches. The Chair will be taken by the President, and the function offers a good opportunity for introducing the "Unconverted" to Freethinkers in their more peaceful mood.

Some of the London magistrates seem to need a little instruction as to what are their powers over those who prefer affirmation to the oath. The following is reported as having taken place at Tottenham on December 17, in the case of a witness who declared himself an Agnostic and wished to affirm:—

> "Alderman Huggett (the magistrate): What is an Agnostic?
> Witness: A magistrate should know.
> Don't you know?—Well.
> Well?—Yes; well. I will make a declaration.
> The Clerk: You cannot make a declaration until we know the grounds for your saying you are an Agnostic.
> Witness: I'll make a declaration.
> Alderman Huggett: Do you know why you object?
> Witness said he would read part of what was on the card. You will read the whole or none.—I believe in the Agnostic position.
> I want to know what that is?—Well, get on with it.
> Clerk: Don't be rude.
> The witness then took the book and repeated the oath in its entirety."

In this case the witness appears to have had but a hazy notion of his rights in a court of law, and it is a pity that he allowed the magistrate and the clerk between them to "jockey" him into taking the oath. But the conduct of the magistrate was quite indefensible. He had the right to ask on what grounds a witness desires to affirm. It was not the business of the magistrate to inquire the meaning of the Agnostic position, or any other. Any witness may decline to take the oath on the ground of its being contrary to his religious belief, or because he has no religious belief. Witnesses are strongly advised to stick to one of these two grounds and to decline—respectfully—to be drawn into any controversy. It is only fair to say that difficulties concerning affirmation crop up very rarely nowadays, but they do occur, as the above case shows.

As we go to press we regret to hear of the death of our old and esteemed friend and Vice-President of the N. S. S.—Richard Johnson, of Manchester. An obituary notice will appear next week.

Digitized by Google

The Merry Birthday of the Man of Sorrows.

"On looking out of the window this morning I noticed my neighbors were drunker than usual, and I remembered that it was the birthday of their Redeemer."

—THOMAS CARLYLE.

THE convivial features of Christmas Day have been noted frequently, to the discomfiture of theologians; for it is one of life's little ironies that the birthday of the "Prince of Peace" was fixed in December from the urgent necessity of fighting Pagan rituals. Like all human institutions, the Christian Churches and their feast days have had to contend in open warfare for survival. The festivals of Pagan Rome were numerous. The public holidays, indeed, at some epochs, were so frequent that the Emperors, especially Marcus Aurelius, found it necessary to curtail them. It was to counteract the attractions which these Pagan holidays exercised over the people that the leaders of the Christian Churches sanctioned and incorporated some of these feasts.

"God's birthday" was not kept regularly until many generations after the alleged birth of Christ. When first observed, it was held on varying dates. The precise time of Christ's birth, like that of "James de la Pluche," was "wropt in mystery"; but it was not in December. Why, then, do Christians observe Christmas Day on December 25? The answer plucks the heart out of the Christian superstition.

It was in competition with the feast of Saturnalia, one of the chief Roman festivals, that Christmas Day had its date fixed in December. The anniversaries of Saturn and his wife were held from December 17 to 20, and the Emperor Caligua added a fifth day of rejoicing. On these five festal days of old Rome the schools were closed, no punishment was inflicted, the toga was replaced by undress garment, distinctions of rank were laid aside, servants sat at table with their employers, and all classes exchanged gifts. The propensity of converts from Paganism to cling to custom proved invincible. If the apostates were to be retained in the new religion, it became necessary to incorporate the old under the mask of the new. The struggle for survival has also incorporated other features. In the far-off centuries the white-robed Druids cut the sacred mistletoe with a golden sickle, and chanted their hymns to the frosty air. These features were absorbed also, and the mistletoe and carol singing still play their minor, if amusing, parts in the celebration.

"Peace and goodwill amongst men" proclaim the pulpits everywhere, whilst the clergy are blessing the colors, and praying for the troops of the contending armies. The nations which profess to worship the "Prince of Peace" are in the grip of Mars, the god of war. From the Elbe to the Spree, from the Seine to the Neva, Europe is a shambles, ankle-deep in blood. The countrymen of Moliere are cutting the throats of the countrymen of Goethe, and the compatriots of Kossuth are disemboweling the brothers of Tolstoi. The women of Europe, "like Niobe, all tears," are mourning their dead; whole nations, professedly Christian, are engaged in wholesale killing. The death moans of tens of thousands are drowned in the Te Deums of the victors, and the flags are blessed in the name of the "Prince of Peace."

To such a pass, after so many centuries of Christianity, has the Western world come. Milton's hymn on "The Nativity of Christ" reads like the bitterest irony:—

"Nor war, or battle's sound
Was heard the world around,
The idle spear and shield were high up hung;
The hooked chariot stood
Unstained with hostile blood;
The trumpet spake not to the armed throng;
And kings sat still with awful eye,
As if they surely knew their sovran Lord was by."

It reads like a beautiful fairy tale. "Peace and goodwill" must wait till another year; and the present celebration of "God's birthday" must make thoughtful men and women think. The Christmas festival itself, with all its hypocritical professions, is largely pretence and make-believe. It is the paradox of paradoxes that the woeful welter of tragic contest is going on in almost every corner of a world that professes to worship the "Prince of Peace" and to obey his commands of non-resistance and forgiveness. "The Merry Birthday of the Man of Sorrows" is an organised hypocrisy, a fitting celebration of an event that never happened.

MIMNERMUS.

Christian Apologetics.

DEAN FARRAR (No. 2).

THE orthodox Church dignitary, Dean Farrar, continuing his apologetic arguments on the genuineness of the miracles ascribed to Jesus Christ in the Gospels, reaches, on page 51, a definite and fairly radical conclusion. He says (Witness of History to Christ):—

"We arrive at length at this point—that the credibility of miracles is in each instance simply and solely a question of evidence, and consequently that our belief or rejection of the Christian miracles must mainly depend on the character of the Gospels in which they are recorded."

Here our reverend apologist is going a little too fast, as his words "and consequently" indicate. Many critics may be willing to admit that the credibility of miracles is "simply a question of evidence," though most Rationalists probably agree with Hume that no human testimony is sufficient to establish a miracle. Without going quite so far, however, it should at least be said that the evidence must be real and incontrovertible, and far stronger than is required for ordinary occurrences. But, up to the present, we have no such evidence for the miracles attributed to Jesus Christ. The Gospel narratives in which these wonders are recorded are not evidence that the miracles were actually performed, but only that some of the early Christians, including perhaps the writers, believed they had been wrought. And the ignorant and credulous Christians of that age believed any wonders they were told; the idea of investigation was foreign to the times, and never entered their minds. The spread of knowledge has, however, altered all that, and real evidence is looked for now.

Our Very Reverend Dean, as already stated, assumes without evidence that the Gospel stories were written by apostolic men in apostolic times, and that they are historical. Having decided, then, that the credibility of miracles was merely "a question of evidence," he next says that our belief in, or rejection of, them "must mainly depend on the character of the Gospels in which they are recorded." This deduction would be perfectly legitimate if the true "character of the Gospels" be admitted—viz., that they are all four unhistorical—but Dean Farrar makes no such admission; for in the next sentence that Very Reverend says:—

"Now into the question of the genuineness and authenticity of the Gospels we need not enter, because for our present purpose it has been sufficiently admitted by the most strenuous opponents of the truths which they reveal."

This is certainly a very clever coup. The credibility of miracles is simply a question of evidence; that is to say, the credibility is dependent on the character of the Gospels; but the Gospels have been admitted to be genuine and authentic by "the most strenuous opponents of the truths which they reveal." Thus, not only are the Gospels shown to be credible and historical without going into the question of evidence, but Rationalists who have denied these alleged characteristics are charged with strenuously opposing "the truths" which the unhistorical Gospels reveal. This sample of apologetic reasoning is almost as smart as that which proves that a dog has three tails—which may be stated thusly: One dog has one tail more than no dog; but no dog has two tails; therefore one dog—that is to say, a dog—(having a tail more than no dog) has three tails. Q.E.D. The Very Reverend Dean's argument is quite as fallacious as the latter.

Digitized by Google

But who are those "most strenuous opponents" of the Christian religion who have "sufficiently admitted"—whatever that may mean—"the genuineness and authenticity of the Gospels"? Our clever trickster does not say; but he appends in a note two quotations, one from Strauss and the other from Renan.

The first of these (Strauss, New Life of Jesus) reads as follows:—

> "The review of evidence with regard to the first three Gospels gives this result, that soon after the beginning of the second century, certain traces are found in existence, not indeed in their present form, but still of the presence of a considerable portion of their contents, and with every indication that the source of these contents were derived from the country which was the theatre of the events in question."

This is very far indeed from admitting the genuineness and authenticity of the canonical Gospels. If the latter were composed by the authors to whom they are ascribed, and in apostolic times, they would be in circulation soon after the middle of the first century. But Strauss only admits the existence of the matter common to the three Synoptics—that is to say, the primitive Gospel from which Matthew, Mark, and Luke took the main portion of their narratives—and this common matter as not existing until the early part of the second century. This critic does not admit the authenticity of the canonical Gospels at all; the latter he holds to be compilations made at a later date.

The quotation from Renan states that the more that scholar had reflected, the more he had been led to believe that the first three canonical texts "nous conduisent très près de l'âge du Christ, sinon par leur rédaction dernière du moins par les documents qui les composent." According to this statement, Renan was of opinion that the first three Gospels take us back to very near the time of Christ, if not by their last written form, at least by the documents of which they are composed. Here, it should be noted, it is not the canonical Gospels which he places "very near to the age of Christ," but the narratives which are common to the first three. When, however, we look at the notes and references which Renan appends as authorities for his conclusion, we find that they do not bear out his statement. We have no evidence that any Gospel narratives were in existence in the first century at all, though it is quite possible that the first primitive Gospel was composed in the last quarter of that century. Our astute and reverend apologist selected Renan because that critic had placed the composition of the Gospels at an earlier date than most other critics; but even Renan did not admit "the genuineness and authenticity" of the canonical Gospels. Hence, Dean Farrar's statement that "the most strenuous opponents" of Christianity did make these admissions is not in agreement with fact.

Next, our Very Reverend goes on to say:—

> "But that the three earliest Gospels at any rate, in some form or other, existed before the siege of Jerusalem, and that they had before the middle of the second century acquired a sacred authority, may be regarded as a conclusion which has been wrung from the inevitable candor of reluctant adversaries."

Here our reverend apologist takes the misleading statement of Renan—"very near to the time of Christ"—as correct, while ignoring that of Strauss and other critics, "the inevitable candor" being, apparently, that of Renan, who is also supposed to have been a "reluctant adversary." But when our Very Reverend speaks of the first three Gospels as existing "in some form or other," he tacitly admits that they were derived from earlier writings. And this being the case, what becomes of their alleged "genuineness" or their "authenticity"? The Gospels ascribed to Matthew, Mark, and Luke could not be called genuine or authentic unless they were original and independent accounts, written by Matthew, an apostle, and by Mark and Luke, the companions of apostles, in apostolic times. The writings which existed "in some form or other" were not the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke.

But, as a matter of fact, we have no evidence that any narratives relating to Jesus Christ, not even the matter common to the three Synoptics, were in existence before the siege of Jerusalem (A.D. 66—70). The latter event is fixed upon simply because in the first three Gospels Jesus is represented as foretelling the destruction of the holy city and the temple; for if this alleged prediction was written after the event—as it certainly was—there could then be no doubt of its being a fabrication. The only authority Dr. Farrar had for his statement was Renan's "very near to the age of Christ."

When the so-called "prediction" of the destruction of Jerusalem is examined line by line, and verse by verse, it is found to be a purely literary composition, made up from passages in the ancient Jewish Scriptures—the Old Testament and the Apocrypha—which referred to "the day of the Lord," or what was to happen "in the latter days." It was composed by Essenes or Nazarenes some time after the fall of the holy city, which event is the only historical occurrence referred to in the Gospels. The Essenes, it is scarcely necessary to say, had no foreknowledge of future events; but after the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and the carrying away of the Jews into slavery, some of the members of that sect believed that the end of the world was at hand, and that they were living in "the latter days." It was in this belief that they made "Jesus the Nazarene," a well-known elder of the sect, whom, some years after his death, they came to regard as a prophet, give utterance to the prediction that he was coming to judge the world "immediately after the tribulation of those days" (Matt. xxiv. 29). The great "prediction" must therefore have been composed not very long after the capture of the holy city. Some years later, a certain latitude was read into the word "immediately," which was taken to mean before the generation then living (A.D. 70) had all passed away. We thus get to the last quarter of the first century.

In the second century the grand "prediction" had to be copied with all the other sayings that had been put in the mouth of Jesus, and the words "immediately" and "generation" had to be stretched a little. There was, however, no way of getting rid of the "prophecy"; it was too well known. Later on, the "generation" was interpreted by a pious Christian teacher to mean a thousand years (2 Peter iii. 8, 9). Now both "immediately" and "generation" are ingeniously explained away.

ABRACADABRA.

The Terrors of Superstition.—II.

(Concluded from p. 812.)

FROM the dawn of history to the present day the real religion of the uneducated natives of India has always been a belief in countless spirits of a more or less doubtful character. "Brahmanism, Buddhism, Islam, may come and go," writes Frazer, "but the belief in magic and demons remains unshaken through them all, and, if we may judge of the future from the past, it is likely to survive the rise and fall of other religions."

In dealing with the faiths of ancient India, that eminent authority, Professor Oldenberg, has emphasised the omnipresence of the spirits. All natural phenomena, living and lifeless alike, were endowed with souls. And in modern India the genuine religion of the common people remains the same. Professor Monier Williams assures us that—

> "The plain fact undoubtedly is that the great majority of the inhabitants of India are, from the cradle to the burning-ground, victims of a form of mental disease which is best expressed by the term demonophobia. They are haunted and oppressed by a perpetual dread of demons. They are firmly convinced that evil spirits of all kinds, from malignant fiends to merely mischievous imps and elves, are ever on the watch to harm, harass, and torment them; to cause plague, sickness, famine, and disaster; to impede, injure, and mar every good work."

Digitized by Google

Although benevolent beings are to be included in the Indian Pantheon, the natives fear, honor, and supplicate those of a sinister cast. With the Oraons of Bengal fear is the chief ingredient of their faith. Their pure divinities are powerless to alleviate, or are indifferent to, the sufferings of the people. But the evil gods, on the other hand, are aggressively malignant, and to them the praises and prayers of the Oraons are offered. In the neighboring country of Assam the theology of the Kasaris consists in a never-dying dread of the diabolical spirits. Of the Siyins of North-Eastern India it is said that they recognise no supreme god, nor believe in any after-life; but the world in which they dwell, unhappily,—

"is full of evil spirits who inhabit the fields, infest the houses, and haunt the jungles. These spirits must be propitiated or bribed to refrain from doing the particular harm of which each is capable, for one can destroy crops, another can make women barren, and a third cause a lizard to enter the stomach and devour the bowels."

Throughout Asia, in Tibet, Assam, Travancore, Ceylon, and Burma the malevolent spirits are in an overwhelming majority. Where Buddhism is the nominal religion, demonism is the real faith of the masses. Without the slightest exaggeration, it may be said of all the countries just mentioned that the mournful beliefs of the natives constitute the chief curse of their lives. In Siam, where the people are nominally Buddhists and place images of Buddha in their temples, they nevertheless pay more homage to spirits and fiends than to these idols. In addition to the legion of devils located in hell, the Siamese assert the existence of other bad spirits which occupy the air. To these aerial demons they trace all the misfortunes they endure. With the Thay of Indo-China almost every act of life is regulated by some religious superstition. "Spirits," affirms Bourlet, "perpetually watch him, ready to punish his negligences, and he is afraid. Fear is not only for him the beginning of wisdom, it is the whole of his wisdom."

In China the vengeful ghosts are omnipresent, and the superior gods are seldom appealed to, save to protect the people from the ill-conditioned spirits. In Corea, again, the demons are bitterly hostile to man. These baleful creatures are believed, states Mrs. Bishop, in her Korea and Her Neighbors,—

"to haunt every umbrageous tree, shady ravine, crystal spring, and mountain crest. On greenhill slopes, in peaceful agricultural valleys, in grassy dells, on wooded uplands, by lake and stream, by road and river, in north, south, east, and west, they abound, making malignant sport of human destinies.....This belief, and it seems to be the only one he has, keeps the Korean in a perpetual state of nervous apprehension; it surrounds him with indefinite terrors."

The religion of the wandering Koryaks exclusively relates to the infernal spirits and their damnable doings. The Koryak priest or shaman is the only person who possesses any influence with the demons, and his clerical duties appear wholly to consist in carrying on negotiations with the sinister spirits, so as to secure certain concessions to the persecuted people. The Gilyaks of Eastern Asia, who worship a multitude of gods, pay special respect to their evil divinities. There are various kinds of these peccant spirits, and they skulk everywhere, both in single spies and battalions. They are also capable of transforming themselves into the shapes of men and other animals. All are evil; the single feature which distinguishes one from another is the degree of its turpitude. Some of these spirit-gods are most accomplished robbers; others amuse themselves by afflicting the poor Gilyaks with aches and pains; while the wickedest of all inflict those mortal injuries apart from which man would never experience death.

But the relentless animosity of supernatural beings towards mankind appears to have reached its maximum of malignancy among the ancient Assyrians and Babylonians. All diseases, both of mind and body, were the manifestations of their malice. Every untoward event was the outcome of their interference in human affairs. Even the gods themselves were open to their enmity and outrage. The mighty god Marduk alone could deliver the people from the unending malevolence of these horrible fiends.

With the Egyptians of antiquity the spirits were arranged into two classes, the upright and the evil. The constant dread under which the pious Egyptian cowered from the malice of these malignant beings was considerably worsened by the circumstance that they were immortal, so that their powers for evil were never at an end. In modern Egypt, according to Lane and other authorities, the popular religion is, at bottom, mere devil-worship. The jinn, "a class of spiritual beings intermediate between angels and men," are simply omnipresent. Incredible as it may appear, the contemporary Egyptian is afraid to perform the most necessary acts of daily life until he has blessed and conciliated the unseen spirits that abound everywhere.

Even among the ancient Greeks the existence of the ghosts was very rarely doubted. It is true that the more enlightened deemed it prudent to conceal their scepticism from the multitude. But the fact remains, as Dr. Frazer reminds us, that one of the earliest, and certainly one of the greatest of the Greek philosophers, Thales, allowed the world to be inhabited with gods or ghosts. It is also true that this primitive delusion was seriously entertained by thoughtful and cultured Greeks right down to Christian times. Porphyry, for instance, unquestionably advocated a most mystical system of demonism. As Frazer somewhat sarcastically says:—

"His system of religious purification seems faithfully to reflect the creed of the savage on this subject, but a philosopher is, perhaps, the last person whom we should expect to find acting as a mirror of savagery. It is less surprising to meet with the same venerable, the same world-wide superstition in the mouth of a mediæval abbot; for we know that the belief in devils has the authority of the founder of Christianity, and is sanctioned by the teaching of the Church. No Esquimaux on the frozen shores of Labrador, no Indian in the sweltering forests of Guiana, no cowering Hindoo in the jungles of Bengal, could well have a more constant and abiding sense of the presence of malignant demons everywhere about him than had Abbot Richalm, who ruled over the Cistercian Monastery of Schönthal in the first half of the thirteenth century." *

Nor is the above likely to create astonishment in the minds of those who are acquainted with the amazing facts recorded in Professor A. D. White's Warfare between Science and Theology, or Mr. Evans' Criminal Trials and Punishments of Animals. These two important works, to name no others, contain overwhelming evidence as to the extraordinary degree to which demonism, in its direst forms, was fostered by the Church. The evil spirit that oppressed Saul with melancholy, and the weird story of the witch of Endor in the Old Testament, alone sufficiently indicate the extent to which spiritualistic beliefs obtained among the Jews. And while there is not a single passage in the New Testament that discountenances demonism, there are many passages which support it. As a matter of fact, the rationalistic outlook upon Nature which now prevails among men of science and culture is a practically new phenomenon in the mental evolution of mankind. This modern view has been begotten by two parents —Knowledge and Freethought—and by these alone.

But to return to the Abbot Richalm, whose story is too precious to miss. In his confession of faith, to which he gave the name of Revelations, this Catholic priest has furnished posterity with an amazing account of his spiritualistic superstitions. Every ailment of the body, and every stumbling of

* The Golden Bough, "The Scapegoat," pp. 104, 105.

Digitized by Google

the will, the worthy Abbot sets down to the influence of the devils, who never gave him a moment of peace. "If the Abbot tossed on his sleepless couch," summarises Dr. Frazer,—

> "while the moonlight, streaming in at his window, cast the stanchions like black bars on the floor of his cell, it was not the fleas and so forth that kept him awake—oh, no! 'Vermin,' said he sagely, 'do not really bite'; they seem to bite indeed, but it is all the work of devils. If a monk snored in the dormitory, the unseemly noise proceeded not from him, but from a demon lurking in his person. Especially dangerous were the demons of intoxication. These subtle fiends commonly lodged at the taverns in the neighboring town, but on feast days they were apt to slip through the monastery gates and glide unseen among the monks seated at the refectory table.....If at such times a jolly rosy-faced brother appeared to the carnal eye and ear to grow obstreperous or maudlin, to speak thick, and to reel and stagger in his gait, be sure it was not the fiery spirit of the grape that moved the holy man; it was a spirit of quite a different order. Holding such views on the source of all bodily and mental indisposition, it was natural enough that the Abbot should prescribe remedies which are not to be found in the pharmacopœia, and which would be asked for in vain at the apothecary's. They consisted chiefly of holy water and the sign of the cross; this last he recommended particularly as a specific for fleabites."

Nor are these absurdities yet extinct in contemporary Europe. Demonism is by no means dead among our British peasantry, and it remains very much alive among the bucolic populations of the other countries of Western Europe. In the nearer East, the Roumanians of Transylvania are still sunk in the spiritualistic slough, and with them witches and goblins are held responsible for every disaster that overtakes the people. The Armenians of Asia Minor, again, although they are not Europeans, "have basked in the light of Christianity from the time when Central and Northern Europe were still plunged in heathen darkness." Nevertheless, these Christian Armenians are as devout in their demonism as the most unenlightened savage, and that this represents a real and not merely a nominal faith is evidenced by the scrupulous care with which they avoid all possible risks of incurring the active animosity of their spiritual enemies. The real religion of the vast majority of modern Armenians is not the Christianity they outwardly profess, but a far older goblin faith which flourished long before the rise of any of the leading world religions, and which gives fair promise of surviving them.

T. F. PALMER.

The Modern Moses.

A STRIKING forecast of the Kaiser's career, written in 1891, by the famous Portuguese author, Eca de Queiroz, was reprinted in the Times recently. The article shows conspicuous powers of observation and description, with a few delightful touches of scepticism, such as the following amusing parallel between the Emperor William and Moses:—

> "The world has never seen, since the days of Moses on Sinai, such intimacy, such an alliance between the creature and the Creator. The reign of William II. seems to be, as it were, an unexpected resurrection of the Mosaism of the Pentateuch. He is the favorite of God, he holds conferences with God in the burning bush of his Berlin Schloss, and at the instigation of God he is leading his people to the joys of Canaan. Truly he is Moses II. Like Moses, too, he never tires of proclaiming (daily and loudly so that none may ignore the fact and through ignorance contravene it) his spiritual and temporal relationship to God, which makes him infallible and therefore irresistible."

In a similar spirit of raillery, the clever critic dissects the imperial dilettante of divinity:—

> "In every assembly, every banquet where William II. holds forth (and of all contemporary kings William II. is the most verbose), he always introduces in the guise, as it were, of a law, the sacerdotal assertion that God is with him, as in the days of Abraham, in order to help and serve him in everything with the power of that formidable arm which can disperse, like particles of importunate dust, the stars and suns of ethereal space. The certainty, the habit of this alliance, grew so much upon him that he ever refers to God in terms of greater equality—as he might allude to Francis of Austria or to Humbert of Italy. Formerly he spoke of Him as the Master who is in Heaven, the Almighty who orders all things; latterly, however, while haranguing with flowing champagne his vassals of the Mark of Brandenburg, he speaks of God familiarly as 'My Old Ally!' Here we have William and God as a new limited liability company administering the universe. By degrees perhaps God will disappear from the signboard as a mere subordinate partner, who entered the business only with the capital of light, earth, and man, and who, quiescent in his infinitude, does no work, but leaves to William the management of this vast terrestrial concern; then we shall have only William and Company—William with supreme powers will direct all human undertakings; 'Company' will be the vague, condescending form with which William II. and Germany will designate Him to Whom, we believe, William II. and Germany are as much or as little as the sparrow now chirping on my roof."

Senhor Eca de Queiroy cannot resist pointing the finger of scorn at such pretensions:—

> "Nothing can make the fall of a man more disastrous than the proof, borne out by the crude contradiction of facts, that such a certainty was but the chimera of a mad infatuation. Then is realised the Biblical fall from the 'heights of heaven.' There was once a people that proclaimed themselves the elect of God; but it was proved that God had not elected them, nor preferred them before others, seeing that He disdainfully forsook them; they were overthrown with incomparable fury, dispersed through the world, lapidated, penned up in ghettos, their houses and tombs branded as is branded a counterfeit coin."

The critic insists with seriousness on the dangerous nature of the claim, and its probable consequences.

> "At the first disaster—whether it be inflicted by his burghers or by his people in the streets of Berlin, or by allied armies on the plains of Europe—Germany will at once conclude that his much-vaunted alliance with God was the trick of a wily despot.
>
> Then will there not be stones enough from Lorraine to Pomerania to stone this counterfeit Moses. William II. is in very truth casting against Fate those terrible 'iron dice' to which the now forgotten Bismarck once alluded.
>
> In the course of years, this youth, ardent, pleasing, fertile in imagination, of sincere, perhaps heroic, soul, may be sitting in calm majesty in his Berlin Schloss presiding over the destinies of Europe—or he may be in the Hôtel Metropole in London sadly unpacking from his exile's handbag the battered double crown of Prussia and Germany."

Nearly a quarter of a century has elapsed since this clever criticism was penned, and the startling events of the past year have but confirmed the singular judgment of the author.

M.

A wayward youth, having quarrelled with his parents, went forth from his native village to London town. While there, and a trifle down on his luck, he came across the parson of the village he had left behind, who, after finding out the lad's circumstances, exhorted him to return to his home; and then, instancing the reception of the Prodigal Son in the parable as an inducement, he eventually prevailed upon the lad to return to his sorrowing parents. A week later the parson, having returned from town, met the youth in the village, and expressed his delight at seeing him, assuring him that he felt from the first that his father would forgive him, and that he had no doubt that on such an occasion he figuratively killed the fatted calf. "Figuratively killed the fatted calf!" ejaculated the youth. "Not much, you bet; but he well near killed the prodigal son."

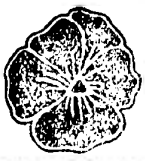
An old negro was out in a field near Charleston when the earthquake came. At the first shock he was frightened almost to death, and as the earth began to shake and tremble he dropped down on his knees and prayed: "Oh, Lord! come and help dis poh nigger. Oh, Lord, come quick! come yourself Don't sen' your son. Dis am no place for chillen!"

Digitized by Google

DEFENCE OF FREE SPEECH

BY

G. W. FOOTE.



Being a Three Hours' Address to the Jury before the Lord Chief Justice of England, in answer to an Indictment for Blasphemy, on April 24, 1883.

With Special Preface and many Footnotes

Price FOURPENCE. Post free FIVEPENCE.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll. 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 6d. per hundred, post free 7d. Special rates for larger quantities. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Miss E. M. VANCE N. S. S. Secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in color; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

THE LATE

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.

A Statuette Bust,

Modelled by Burvill in 1881. An excellent likeness of the great Freethinker. Highly approved of by his daughter and intimate colleagues. Size, 6½ ins. by 8½ ins. by 4½ ins.

Plaster (Ivory Finish) 3/-

Extra by post (British Isles): One Bust, 1/-; two, 1/6.

THE PIONEER PRESS 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.; or, Miss E. M. VANCE, Secretary, N. S. S.

All Profits to be devoted to the N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.

America's Freethought Newspaper.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.

G. E. MACDONALD ... ... EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN ... ... EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance ...	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Determinism or Free Will?

By C. COHEN.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

A clear and able exposition of the subject in the only adequate light—the light of evolution.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

(POSTAGE 2d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—Miss E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objec are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be base on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this..... day of..... 190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

FREETHOUGHT PUBLICATIONS.

LIBERTY AND NECESSITY. An argument against Free Will and in favor of Moral Causation. By David Hume. 32 pages, price 2d., postage 1d.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL. By David Hume. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE. By David Hume. With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. Foote. price 1d., postage ½d.

FROM CHRISTIAN PULPIT TO SECULAR PLATFORM. By J. T. Lloyd. A History of his Mental Development. 60 pages, price 1d., postage 1d.

THE MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA. By M. M. Mangasarian (Chicago). 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE WISDOM OF THE ANCIENTS. By Lord Bacon. A beautiful and suggestive composition. 86 pages, reduced from 1s. to 3d., postage 1d.

A REFUTATION OF DEISM. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. With an Introduction by G. W. Foote. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST. Essays on Human Evolution. By J. M. Wheeler. A Very Valuable Work. 192 pages, price 1s., postage 2½d.

BIBLE STUDIES AND PHALLIC WORSHIP. By J. M. Wheeler. 136 pages, price 1s. 6d., postage 2d.

UTILITARIANISM. By Jeremy Bentham. An Important Work. 32 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

THE CHURCH CATECHISM EXAMINED. By Jeremy Bentham. With a Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. A Drastic Work by the great man who, as Macaulay said, "found Jurisprudence a gibberish and left it a Science." 72 pages, price (reduced from 1s.) 3d, postage 1d.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. By Ludwig Feuerbach. "All theology is anthropology." Büchner said that "no one has demonstrated and explained the purely human origin of the idea of God better than Ludwig Feuerbach." 78 pages, price 6d, postage 1d.

THE CODE OF NATURE. By Denis Diderot. Powerful and eloquent. 16 pages, price 1d., postage ½d.

GILES' APOSTOLIC RECORDS. Price 3s., postage 5d.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS—Of All Ages and Nations. By Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. 355 pages, price (reduced from 7s. 6d.) 3s., postage 4d.

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN LIBERTY. By Anthony Collins. With Preface and Annotations by G. W. Foote and Biographical Introduction by J. M. Wheeler. One of the strongest defences of Determinism ever written. Cloth, 1s.; paper, 6d., post 1d.

PAMPHLETS BY C. COHEN.

AN OUTLINE OF EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. Price 6d., postage 1d.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS,
2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner

(Under the Auspices of the National Secular Society.)

AT THE

RESTAURANT FRASCATI,

ON

Tuesday Evening, January 12, 1915.

Chairman: Mr. G. W. FOOTE.

DINNER 6.30 p.m. SHARP. EVENING DRESS OPTIONAL.

TICKETS FOUR SHILLINGS EACH,

Obtainable from MISS E. M. VANCE, also THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

FOR FREETHINKERS AND ENQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

WELL PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER AND WELL BOUND.

In Paper Covers, SIXPENCE—Net.
(POSTAGE 1½d.)

In Cloth Covers, ONE SHILLING—Net.
(POSTAGE 2d.)

ONE OF THE MOST USEFUL BOOKS EVER PUBLISHED.

INVALUABLE TO FREETHINKERS ANSWERING CHRISTIANS.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 2 NEWCASTLE STREET, FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by the PIONEER PRESS, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google