The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen commences his Autumn lecturing campaign with two lectures in the Town Hall, Birmingham, on September 23. As the Town Hall has a seating capacity of between 2,000 and 3,000, we hope that local Freethinkers will do their best to see that it is well filled on both occasions. A well filled hall helps both speaker and audience.

A Freethinker writes from the Front:—

> Apropos of God's wonderful preservation of crucifixes, let me give you a true authenticated fact.
> On a recent part of the Front, during the German retreat, attached to a large roadside crucifix was a tin can, tied by wire. A Tommy, when releasing same, was, along with the crucifix, severely damaged, owing to a bomb, being concealed in tin can, exploding.
> A suitable postcard, subscribed by the boys, has been forwarded to the Rev. J. Thomas, of Chelmsford, who ascribed the heavy storms of late to the fact of Divine displeasure at people working on their allotments on Sunday. He will receive a shock. A pity these gentry, who are in such close touch with God, cannot ask him to stop the War. Probably that would be asking him too much.
> We had a parson lecturing last Monday on "Why Marry?" He is single.

Business as usual—on both sides.

The same correspondent vouches for the truth of the following story:—

> A body of troops entraining for the Front were being supplied with refreshments (on payment of course). Two or three men had been supplied with tea. Shortly afterwards they returned to the coffee-stall and told the lady helps that the tea just supplied to them they had used for making cocoa, could they have more, it was just as serviceable as hot water?

At the last moment considerations of space compel us to hold over a fresh instalment of Mr. Palmer's excellent articles on "The Rise and Progress of Mental Power." We much regret having to do this, but good things are worth waiting for, and Mr. Palmer's readers will kindly reserve their mildest malediction for the editorial head.

The North London Branch N. S. S. has arranged a Whist Drive for Wednesday, October 3, to be held in the Large Hall, St. Pancras Reform Club, Victoria Road, Kentish Town. Tickets, price 1s. (for members and friends only), may be obtained from the Secretary of the Branch, Miss Lane, 29 Burton Street, King's Cross, W.C.1; Miss Brandes, 89 Union Grove, Wandsworth, S.W.; and from all Branch Secretaries. Prizes, of course, will be given. Early applications for tickets should be made, as the number is limited.

The Prayer Importunate.

A CHANCE phrase often succeeds in making a sharp appeal to the imagination, opening out interesting fields of speculation. Such a phrase is "a daring Christian thinker" just encountered in a volume entitled Prayer in War Time, by Sir W. Robertson Nicoll. What can constitute "a daring Christian thinker" at this time of day? A generation ago such a reputation was easily gained. An attempt to soften the crudity of any demented dogma was quite enough. Dean Farrar, for instance, became an "advanced" thinker by merely doubting the number of thermal units in store for those who spurned the narrow way. Nowadays one can occupy a Christian pulpit in a state of complete dogmatic nudity, and play shuttlecock with the faith of our fathers without creating more than a mild sensation. And if one is capable of more or less skilfully punning on the terminology of the creeds and articles no sensation would be created at all. This is, in fact, theological modernism. Other avenues of hardihood have been opened out by publicly damning the Sultan, and, more recently, thanking God for the Zeppelins; though, in this latter case, we are willing to admit daring. Altogether, we are inclined to think that Dr. Nicoll himself is, perhaps, as deserving of such a distinction as anyone; to write a volume on the subject of prayer at this moment of the world's history is courageous to a degree.

It is more than courageous; it is audacious. For consider what the present situation is as expressed by John Galsworthy:—

> God on the lips of each potentate and under a hundred thousand spires prayer that twenty-two million servants of Christ may receive from God the blessed strength to tear and blow each other to pieces, to ravage and burn, to wrench husbands from wives, fathers from their children, to starve the poor, and everywhere destroy the works of the spirit. Prayer under the hundred thousand spires for the blessed strength of God, to use the noblest, most loyal instincts of the human race to the ends of carnage!
> No supernatural creed—in these days when two and two are put together—can stand against such reeling subversions.

But Galsworthy is but a humble uninspired scribe with a negligible following of thoughtful men with big hearts. The editor of the British Weekly leads religious Nonconformity, is an Honourable Knight, and has "done his bit" in the Great War by helping to raise to power a prayerful premier. Such a dignitary is not likely to yield with unseemly haste to the logic of the moment. Besides, Nonconformity has never struck us as being particularly interested in elementary mathematics, and reeling under subversions may be to it but a normal and blessed exercise of faith. It is British Nonconformity that constitutes Dr. Nicoll's public.

Pace Galsworthy then. Dr. Nicoll "is very deeply convinced that if we are to see the end of this horrible anarchy we must far more seriously as a nation and as individuals give ourselves to prayer." "It is our business to pray for victory on the battlefield." "We must pray for our soldiers and sailors, and pray, as far as possible, for each by name." It is both "lawful and right." The one thing wanted, in fact, above all, is a "nation of pray-ers." Not only pray-ers, but "good pray-ers." The distinction is important, and has interesting implications. Prayer is not, or should not be, a poor stuttering mode of communication between man and his maker. It should be based on principles which Dr. Nicoll, en rapport with the celestial mind, undertakes to "apply to our present circumstances." It is his knowledge of the ingredients of the "good prayer" which will make, one would think, his volume both useful and timely to believers. For none, we take it, cares to pray for an altogether unreasonable period without encouragement. The believer in Prayer without Ceasing, be he ever so enthusiastic for a "Wait and See" policy, is apt to faint by the wayside if the waiting is indefinite and the state of "low visibility" permanent. Learning that he is but a poor pray-er, he, naturally, turns to a celebrated divine for the correct form of incantation. Dr. Nicoll, being a veritable John Wellington Wells, can tell him how, when, and where to pray; in short, how to pray "with acceptation."

Our mind not being in tune with the Infinite, we are, naturally, puzzled over the recommendations. When Dr. Nicoll admits, as he is bound to, that God answers prayer as he thinks fit, one would expect him in logic to put in a good word for the prayer of resignation, expressed or unexpressed. But no, God does not mean our prayers to be "a mere sign of acquiescence." Some degree of garrulity is preferable to a simple "Thy will be done." The "prayer of yearning" also is damned with faint praise. No doubt it has its points, but "prayer succeeds by the intensity of the will power put into it." The prayer with the greatest chance of materializing, then, is the "importunate prayer." "God," we are told, "loves to be entreated, pleaded with, wrestled with." These are the prayers that tell, unless, of course, we are hopelessly literal-minded and expect to get what we pray for. "Ask and ye shall receive," says Holy Writ, but it is not promised, mark you, that you shall receive what you ask for. This is a shallow interpretation confined to fellows careless alike of ablutions and aspirates, who bellow out blasphemies from egg-boxes in public places. Students of High Olympus know better. They know how the gods delight in laying verbal pitfalls. Note how ingeniously Midas, for instance, was tripped up over a phrase, and his case was only one of thousands. Perfectly justifiable, then, and in strict accord with precedent is the reading: Ask for bread and you may receive a stone; seek for comfort and you may receive tribulation; knock at the door of Paradise but abandon hope all you that enter there.

If we accept, and we might as well, that the importunate prayer is the prayer that God loves best, then the Deity, for one, has managed to drain some satisfaction from the last three years. One importunate prayer has been urged with troublesome urgency and reiteration:—

> Fathers, mothers, wives, lovers pray that prayer and wonder how it is with their dearest in these vallies and heights of death.....Oftentimes they are stricken and blinded by receiving the tidings that this one prayer the nearest to the heart and the dearest can be uttered no more. Each name on the long list on which our eyes fasten every morning means the stilling of an importunate prayer, often of many importunate prayers, which for weeks and months and years have been lifted to God.....We know very well, however, that promises which attach to prayer do not and cannot attach to every petition. We know that not all of our prayers can be granted. Not everyone can come back whole or even wounded from the battlefield.

Still, "We must be importunate in prayer—importunate that is for that answer God is always willing to bestow." We have taken the liberty to italicize this last qualification, for it seems to us not only to discourage the Christian business man, but to chill into non-existence the importunity of the most devout. In spite of the puffs preliminary the prayer importunate is turning out to be but a sorry speculation. But we have Dr. Nicoll's word for it that it is the best line in prayer-going.

We know, with the writer, that many prayers are not answered; but this seems to be the only point where our information coincides. We do not know of any prayer that is answered, and here we are led to infer that our knowledge is much less than his. Still, we have something approaching a conviction that Dr. Nicoll also knows not of any such thing. We are convinced, also, that he is really profoundly ignorant of a Deity "that loves to be entreated, pleaded with, and wrestled with," and measures out his favours accordingly. We believe, in short, that he knows very little indeed about such matters, but that he has simply got into a habit of emulating Merlin when his followers clamour for a sign.

The circumstances responsible for the importunate prayer, the anguish and sincerity that characterize them, make an appeal to us if not to the Deity; and in no particular instance can one feel inclined for either remonstrance or criticism. We must content ourselves with the one satisfactory fact that from this plethora of petitionings, in every case one form or other of human love emerges. One member of the human family feels the presence of another to be in degree necessary to his or her happiness, and it is from this great outstanding fact of love that all hopes of human regeneration spring. There can be no doubt, either, that the value of prayer is being questioned by thousands owing to the failure of the one importunate prayer. All these, if desirous of helping on the time when the sum-total of human grief will be diminished, will be thrown back upon human effort and human resource. It may seem to some a black day when the help of Omnipotence is dispensed with. With the help of Omnipotence, the day is black enough—so black, indeed, that Humanists cannot afford to lose the help of anyone of heart and head at present endeavouring to alter the course of events by importuning the atmosphere. When the poignancy of their grief is over, and they are prepared for stouter counsel, they must be told once more of the evil that is wrought by want of thought, and learn that they must stand erect and with eyes very wide open indeed if they are ever to come to grips with the Infamous.

The "New Republic" and the New Religion.

MR. JOSEPH MCCABE has recently remarked upon the absence of anything like a weighty Freethought movement in the United States of America. When one considers in what manner the Churches in this country have been driven to theological re-statement and to social activity by the pressure of humanist movements outside them, one is not surprised to discover that organized religion in America, comparatively undisturbed by such movements, maintains much that has here been discarded.

In a recent issue (June 9, 1917), of the New Republic, a journal which in the realm of politics expresses the democratic ideals of President Wilson with marked distinction, and is consequently widely quoted in Europe, there was an article on "The Future of Religion," by Professor Kirsopp Lane, of Harvard. In this article there is expressed that vague, nebulous view of religion which one associates with the new theologians from Mr. Campbell to Mr. Wells. That such an article should appear in the New Republic is a remarkable evidence of the backwardness of our Trans-Atlantic cousins in those tasks of research and rational reconstruction to which, every year, an increasing body of the most intelligent of our population is devoting itself.

Professor Kirsopp Lane, for all he teaches early Christian history at Harvard, paints a picture of the theologians and preachers of America which is as black as any Rationalist could make it. "I am pessimistic," he writes, "about the present attitude and the future fate of the Churches."

His pessimism is, to be sure, justifiable enough on his own showing. He writes of "ministers of religion" who "are tragically ignorant of the history of religious thought"; of the God of their conception as "a God outside the universe which he created, playing, as it were, tricks with it, in alternating moments of superhuman love and infra-human wrath. He has unlimited power, but he does not use it to prevent evil." This sort of God, says the Professor bluntly, "is not conceivable by a rational mind."

There is growing up in America inevitably, as in every free country, a generation which cannot stomach this theological reaction, and is looking for more rational and nobler principles. What sort of provision can this learned Christian Professor make for it?

Just as his strictures on orthodox theologians and ministers are those which have been the commonplaces of criticism in this country for many years, so his notion of religion for the future is the commonplace and utterly unsatisfactory notion of a non-anthropomorphic view of God, and of religion as a part of life and not as something "added on to life."

Professor Kirsopp Lane gives no hint that it is being found possible to get along quite well without God; but he is greatly concerned to establish the possibility of a concept of God and of religion that shall not conflict with the best thought and the highest emotion of men.

I confess that some of his arguments are ingenious, but none of them are at all convincing. For example, he says:—

> It must be remembered that the exact phrase "a personal God" scarcely belongs to the great period of formative Christian theology. (If any doubt this let them try to translate "a personal God" into Greek.)

It is a little astonishing to be told that "a personal God" is a phrase that "scarcely belongs to the great period of formative Christian theology." Dr. Kirsopp Lane's stress is, of course, on the words "the exact phrase," and the theologian will readily perceive what he is driving at, and that he might be able to make an academic case of sorts for this contention. But what does it matter? The real question of the moderns is not as to this or that conception of God. It is as to whether any conception of God is possible, nay, is not in conflict with all that we know of the origins and development of the world and of makind?

In precisely the same manner—I had almost written the same tricky manner—the slightly more practical problem of the relations of religion and life are dealt with. Thus:—

> In early or mediæval thought the belief obtained that religion was something added on to life. A man might do his work well and be a good and useful member of society; but unless he was religious and did the extra things which religion demanded, he was a lost soul. This is the implication of extra ecclesiam nulla salus..... Now the situation is changed; religion is valued as a part of ordinary life, so far as it makes men good citizens, and the whole idea of salvation by some appendix to life, controlled by some special class, is in abeyance and to most of us repugnant. We agree with the poet, though perhaps not in his sense, that "the daily round, the common task, will furnish all we need to ask."

Now, this is an argument with which we are very familiar. When the supernatural faith has failed, when everything that the theologians have taught has proved futile to arrest the progress of enquiry and mental emancipation, when, despite all the obstacles of the Churches, men come face to face with realities; the people who provided the obstacles, the powers that veiled the realities, say—"these realities to which you have come—these are religion!"

It is an argument which could only be swallowed by a person of more than mediæval credulity, and one not without awkward consequences for those who make use of it. Professor Kirsopp Lane does make use of it thus recklessly:—

> .....This is religion. It is the real thing; and the religious nature of the whole mind of the modern man is being revealed to the student of historical theology, as he sees how, in war and in peace, men subordinate their own interests to those of some higher aim in which, express it how they may, they find the true purpose of life. Therefore, that this is religion I do not doubt; but whether it will officially retain that name is another question.

Digitized by Google

There is only one escape for the Professor from the charge of reckless superficiality. Is he not, after all, attempting to provide an easy road from faith to reason? For he says:—

> Faith is not the antithesis of doubt, which is only another name for intelligence, but of timidity. It is the power which leads men to go on, knowing that that which is beyond is good, and trusting themselves to the guidance of life. It means forgetting the things which are behind and reaching out to the things which are before. In his own sphere the business man of to-day has done this; in his own very different sphere the man of science has done this. To continue in Biblical language, they have used the talents entrusted to them and need not be afraid to stand before the Son of Man.

And he concludes:—

> But the professional ecclesiastic has insisted on keeping his talent unchanged, removed from the commerce of the market, and the time is approaching when it will be taken from him and be given to others; he himself will retain merely the hole in the ground in which he once hid it. He may continue to call that hole religion or God or Christianity or anything which he likes, and perhaps he will be allowed by others to do so, for men who are in earnest have little time and small inclination to contend about words. But the reality will be elsewhere, even if it be under another name, and the children of the new age will follow the reality, not the name.

Put into plain English, this means that religion for every man is the following out of truth and duty, that it is, in a word, the fine conception of enlightened humanity. Why, then, call it religion—a name with an ugly history; and why seek to attach to these antiquated legends and formulæ of the past the ever-growing body of truth which mankind has learned, despite the opposition of their professional defenders?

Professor Kirsopp Lane says he is an optimist about religion! But what he is optimistic about is humanity—like all the theologians of the modern school who are not really theologians at all.

INFANT MORTALITY AND THE BIRTH-RATE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Is "Y. C." quite justified in his contention that a high birth-rate necessarily connotes a high infant mortality rate?

The following points, I think, will show that there is at least another side to the question.

1. The Jews are strikingly prolific, yet both their infant and general mortality are low.
2. The Irish have a high birth-rate and a low infant mortality rate.
3. The birth-rate in England and Wales began to decrease since 1870, yet the infant mortality rate was never so high as it was in the decennium 1891-1900.
4. Some medical officers of health, particularly Dr. Hope, of Liverpool, have shown that there are families in which 50 per cent. of the children have died before reaching their second birthday, yet other families having the same number of children and living under similar conditions of sanitation, in the same streets and districts, have been enabled to rear all their children.

This point is also of importance in showing how small is the effect of sanitation in affecting infant mortality; and is now generally admitted by sanitary authorities. At a Public Health Conference, a few years ago, Dr. Buchan, Medical Officer of Health for Bradford, declared that there was a general consensus of opinion among sanitary experts that sanitation has little or no effect upon infant mortality. This opinion was generally endorsed by Dr. S. G. Moore, Medical Officer of Health for Huddersfield, in his Milroy Lectures of last year.

5. Have not the records of the Tribunal Courts constantly shown that the biggest families have often the most robust children?
6. That the factors of infant mortality are not quite so obvious as is generally supposed, may be gathered from the following facts:—
   (a) On the Isle of St. Kilda, off the north-west coast of Scotland, from 50 to 60 per cent. of the children born there died before they were nine days old. They were born apparently quite healthy, and if they succeeded in surviving the first fortnight after birth, there was no further danger. This remarkable mortality continued for about 150 years, until the beginning of this century.
   (b) Coal-mining villages throughout England and Wales have extraordinarily high infant mortality rates. Even when ideally situated, and when both the housing and sanitation are quite satisfactory (I am now speaking from actual personal experience), the rate of infant mortality is often much higher than that of the poorest parts of the East End of London.
   (c) The infant mortality of Malta is very high; averaging, for the past fifteen years, about 210 per 1,000 births. Yet its sanitation is quite up-to-date; and there is practically no industrial employment of mothers. Comparing Malta with the towns of Sicily and of Southern Italy, although their sanitation is in an extremely backward condition indeed; yet the infant mortality of the latter is much lower than that of Malta.

My own opinion is that the schools for mothers have provided the key to the solution of the problem: "Feed the expectant and nursing mother with an adequate supply of wholesome food, so that she may be able to feed her baby at the breast." I believe that also explains the low infant mortality obtaining among the Jews and the Irish.

SOCIALISM AND FREETHOUGHT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Although the Freethinker's special province is the exposure of religious fraud and the emancipation of the people from the religious superstitions which enervate and impoverish them, yet there are economic superstitions equally baneful, because the free expression of honest thought is now impossible except for the few who possess economic independence. And so I was very glad to read Mr. Thos. A. Jackson's article on the above subject in your issue of to-day, and thus learn so many details about the famous Karl Marx.

Mr. Jackson, however, concludes with the categorical statement that "every genuine Socialist must be a Freethinker," which is clearly meaningless unless we know just what the terms used connote. I certainly do not limit my definition of a Socialist to those only who accept the Marxian economic philosophy, any more than I limit my definition of a Freethinker to those only who accept the religious philosophy of our respected Editor. A Socialist seems to me to be one who sees the folly and injustice of our present social system, and thinks they can best be remedied by collective ownership and management of industry; while a Freethinker seems to me to be one who has enough independence of character to think out his opinions for himself, and who abjures all authority in the exercise of his reason or the expression of his views, and is, moreover, eager to allow the same freedom of thought and expression to those who differ from him.

In view of those two definitions, it is certainly not true that every Socialist must be a Freethinker. There are many degrees in Socialism, e.g., a man may believe in nationalizing the railways, the mines, and the shipping, in addition to what is already nationalized, viz., the Army and the Navy and the Post Office, without going any further; so far he would be a Socialist, without any reference to his belief in a God or the reverse. Besides that, if we had a complete system of State Socialism—every form of industry under the control of State officials—it is true that we should all be sure of good food, clothing, and shelter, so long as we behaved ourselves in accordance with the regulations, as in the Army and Navy now; but I very much fear that our freedom of thought and expression would not be nearly so great as in the present economic variety show.

Since the War broke out, we have had a fairly good experience of the tyranny and inefficiency of a socialistic bureaucracy, which have been endured solely because we are seriously threatened by an infinitely worse tyranny in the hands of a German bureaucracy.

And when we trace the present disparities of wealth to their source, they are found to rest on the two great monopolies of land and banking, causing enormous increments of unearned wealth to fall into the hands of a few privileged persons. A National Bank, furnishing banking facilities at their true labour cost of half per cent., would give us a non-interest-bearing currency. The land could then be nationalized by buying out its present owners, who would soon cease to enjoy unearned incomes, because the money they received would have lost its unjust power of automatic increase. So far, then, I am a Socialist; and as I acknowledge no authorities in forming my views on any subject, I am also a genuine Freethinker.

September 2, 1917. G. O. WARREN, MAJOR (retired).

Obituary.

It was with sincere regret that we learned recently of the death of Mr. George Taylor, of Liverpool, a man whose devotion to Freethought was well known and appreciated. We refrained from saying anything at the time, as we were informed, that a Church of England Service had been conducted at the cremation, which took place at Anfield Cemetery. On inquiry, we learned that this was done at the instance of Mrs. Taylor, against the desire of the dead man and also in spite of the protest of his son, who would, naturally and properly, have liked to see his father's wishes carried out. Unfortunately, the power of the next of kin in this matter is absolute; and where religious prejudice overcomes one's respect for the memory and the expressed wish of the dead, he or she orders matters to his or her liking. For ourselves, we can only regret that so sturdy a Freethinker was exposed to this last insult. Mr. Taylor made no secret of his opinions while living; he was prompt and generous in the support he gave to Freethought propaganda; and his death removes a much-respected member from the ranks of Liverpool Freethinkers.—C. C.

We regret to report the death of Mr. Alfred Ford, of Rotherhithe, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. He was a constant reader of the Freethinker, and a great admirer of the late G. W. Foote. He had a long and painful illness, which he endured with remarkable fortitude, and during which he availed himself of every opportunity to express his Freethought convictions. He had two sons in the Army, one of whom was killed some time ago. The funeral took place at Brockley Cemetery on Tuesday afternoon, September 4, when a Secular Service was conducted. He had asked his friend, Mr. G. Hollamby, to see that he was buried "without any of the men of God stepping in." "They had me at my birth and at my wedding," he added, "but I don't want them to have me at my death." We tender the widow and family our sincere sympathy in their bereavement.—J. T. L.

With deep regret I record the death of another young Freethinker, Private Robert William Warner, aged twenty-one, of Gateshead, who was killed in action on August 10. Deceased was the son of Mrs. Alice and the late George Warner, both pronounced Freethinkers, the latter being well known locally as an outdoor advocate of Freethought in Newcastle. Young Warner was of a more retiring disposition than his father, but his cheery voice and happy countenance will be greatly missed. Readers of the Freethinker will sympathize with his sorrowing mother and stepfather, Mr. Jas. Blackhall, in their sad bereavement.—J. G. B.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
> Name.....
> Address.....
> Occupation .....
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Agnostic or Atheist?

A correspondent asks apropos of our notes of September 16, if we can tell him the difference between Agnosticism and Atheism. Candidly, we can't—at least so far as the question of the existence of God is concerned, and in any other connection the subject is of no consequence here. In a philosophical discussion there is a question as to the nature of "Reality"—something which is assumed to exist beyond the world as it appears in consciousness, and is the cause of our conscious states—and in relation to that we can conceive a state of mind that may be correctly described as "Agnostic." But in relation to the existence of God, we can see no distinction whatever between a logical Agnosticism and Atheism. Neither have we ever met anyone who could explain wherein the difference lies. All we know is that some people prefer the name "Agnostic" to that of Atheist. They prefer the new name; we prefer the old one. But as the Agnostic is one who doesn't believe in a God, and the Atheist is one who is without belief in a God, we find ourselves quite unable to point the difference between the two. To use an alleged Hibernicism, they are both alike, but one is more so.

Science and God.

The peculiar thing is that so many people, of whom one would expect better things, persist in debating the question of belief in God as though they existed in the eighteenth century instead of the twentieth. Let us bear in mind that for considerably over half a century anthropologists have been collecting, classifying, and analyzing facts, all of which go to show how the idea of gods originated, and how it has developed. Now, we admit, that one may reject the story of the origin of the God-idea as told by anthropology, and logically profess a condition of mental uncertainty as regards the existence of God. But if one accepts this story as true in only a general way, what is their left for discussion? Is not Atheism the logical—the only issue? If people began to believe in gods because in their ignorance they misunderstood things, which we now understand, what is there left for discussion? A little more than two centuries ago the belief in witches was in full vogue. And, under the then existing conditions, one can conceive many people being genuinely puzzled as to whether witches really existed. But when the facts upon which this belief was based were properly understood, and differently interpreted, what room was there for doubt or debate? Clearly none at all. And this is quite on all fours with the belief in God. If the belief in gods began in a mistaken interpretation of natural facts, subjective or objective, what justification is there for regarding the conclusion as probably true when the premiss is dismissed as demonstrably false? No amount of reasoning can bring something out of nothing. You cannot extract a fact from a delusion. You may, if you like, dispute the anthropological date, but you cannot honestly ignore it, still less can you admit it, and then proceed with your argumentation as though it did not exist. If a reinterpretation of the facts upon which the belief in witches rested, warrants a complete rejection of the idea of witchcraft, why will not a reinterpretation of the facts upon which the belief in gods rest, warrant us in treating the God-idea in the same fashion?

Does Atheism Deny?

It may be said that the Atheist is one who denies the existence of God; the Agnostic merely suspends judgment. But this statement concerning the Atheist is, in one sense, not true, because it is impossible. In another sense it is as true of the Agnostic as it is of the Atheist. There is, even with the Agnostic, no hesitation in denying the existence of any of the god's figured by the religions of the world. The Agnostic is not in doubt concerning the existence of the God of the Bible any more than he is in doubt concerning the existence of the Mumbo Jumbo of an African tribe. The Agnostic is not in doubt here. His disbelief is complete and final. And if we reject the possibility of these particular gods one after the other, what have we left? All that remains is the bare word, and that by itself stands for nothing at all. Abstractions are—abstractions, they are not existences. Once all particular gods are negatived the word "God" loses all significance or value. The Atheist, therefore, cannot deny the existence of a "God" because by itself the word is unintelligible. It stands for nothing that will carry affirmation or negation. And in repudiating or denying the existence of particular gods, he is doing only what every Agnostic is bound to do, and does without the slightest hesitation.

On Behalf of Clarity.

It may be said that we are trying to prove a negative. But this is not so. One can only attempt to prove a negative when the terms of a proposition admit of being brought together in consciousness. Mark Twain said that he believed Adam was buried in the place pointed out to him, because no one had ever been able to prove that he wasn't. But if anyone had tried to do so the terms of the proposition—a dead man, a grave, an act of burial—were all realizable in thought. But in the case of the existence of "God" we are on different ground. Historically, "God" means a God believed in by some people, somewhere, at some time. Put on one side this consideration, and there is left the subject of neither affirmation nor negation. "God" in the abstract is not a possibly real existence any more than a tree in the abstract is a real existence. There is a pine tree, a pear tree, an apple tree, etc., but there is and can be no "tree" apart from known trees. So, if we accept the possibility of the existence of the gods worshipped by various peoples, "God does exist," or "God does not exist," becomes an intelligible proposition. Reject this existence, as Agnostics do, and there is nothing left. We have nothing of which we can plead ignorance, there is nothing concerning which we can profess a suspension of judgment. "God," by itself, means nothing. It is nothing. No one can deny its existence, for no one knows what it means. * * *

Atheism the Logical Issue.

The present position of affairs is curious. On the one side there is a crowd of theologians whose minds are naturally in the pre-evolutionary stage, and whose thinking is unaffected by the newer knowledge. From them no one expects a recognition of the truth that the gods have been explained out of existence, as witches and warlocks were several generations ago. But stranger still it is to see on the other side those who avow acceptance of the natural origin of the God-idea, and who yet, when they come to deal with current religion, talk as though it were a question of the inconclusiveness of religious arguments. It is nothing of the kind. The reply to the arguments set forth on behalf of Theism is not that they are inconclusive, and therefore leave one undecided, but that they are absolutely irrelevant to the question at issue. We cannot remain undecided because there is nothing to be undecided about. We know that the idea of God is pure myth, and that it was never anything else. A belief that began in error, and which has no other basis than error, cannot, by any possible argument, be converted into a truth. The old question was: "Can man by searching find out God?" The modern answer is an emphatic affirmative. Substantially we have, by searching, found out God. We know, substantially, the origin and history of one of the greatest delusions that ever obsessed the human mind. God has been found out. Analytically and synthetically we understand the God-idea as previous generations could not understand it. It has been explained; and the logical consequence of that explanation is—Atheism.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Reformation in Scotland.

I.

THE more we study the Protestant Reformation the more indubitable it becomes that it was a movement calculated ultimately to make, not for a higher type of spiritual religion than the prevailing one, but for the emancipation and glorification of the human reason. We do not affirm that it actually established religious liberty, or the right of private judgment. Its immediate object, as championed by Luther and Calvin, was to transfer the seat of authority from an infallible Church to an infallible Book. This change did secure religious liberty to the Reformers themselves, but not to the rank and file of their followers. There was absolutely no liberty to criticize any of the Reformed doctrines, and many were imprisoned, tortured, and put to death, simply because they had the courage to commit that heinous offence. Professor Bury is quite right when he says that "nothing was further from the minds of the leading Reformers than the toleration of doctrines differing from their own," and that "so far as the spirit of intolerance went, there was nothing to choose between the new and the old Churches" (History of Freedom of Thought, pp. 77, 78). Furthermore, the Protestant Reformation was not even a religious movement, pure and simple. No doubt, Luther and Calvin were pre-eminently religious men, but the changes which they were the means of introducing were more political and social than religious. Now, what was true of the movement in Germany, Switzerland, and, to a certain extent in France, was truer still in England. Henry VIII. broke with Rome and established the Anglican Church, not on religious grounds at all, but on grounds exclusively personal and political. Had the Pope sanctioned the divorce between him and Catherine, there would have been no Protestant Reformation in England, at least during his reign. In Scotland, the movement, in its origin, lacked the religious element altogether. The first Protestants did not even pretend to be led by the Holy Spirit for the purpose of restoring religion to its pristine simplicity and purity, but were influenced solely by a desire to be revenged upon the Court and the Church. Their desire to reform the Church was the offspring of a stronger desire to punish the ecclesiastical leaders who, acting conjointly with the Crown, had done them such gross injustice.

In order to understand the origin and nature of the Reformation in Scotland, we must take a glance at the problems which confronted that country as it emerged from the darkness of the Middle Ages. During the Dark Ages, the Scots, though intellectually a superior race, were in a state of deplorable ignorance and stupidity. We are told by one, whose disposition was to exaggerate the noble qualities of his countrymen, that "from the accession of Alexander III. to the death of David in 1370, it would be impossible, I believe, to produce a single instance of a Scottish baron who could sign his own name" (Tyler's History of Scotland, vol. ii., pp. 239, 240). Buckle says that having no trades, or arts, which required skill or dexterity, upon which to exercise their intellects, the people "remained so stupid and brutal, that an intelligent observer who visited Scotland in the year 1360, likens them to savages, so much was he struck by their barbarism and their unsocial manners" (History of Civilization in England, vol. iii., pp. 38, 39). Naturally, in such dense ignorance, superstition luxuriated and priestcraft bore high-handed sway. Every department of the country's life was controlled by the Church. Even the national conscience was in subjection to priestly authority. No other country in the world, except Spain, was so absolutely loyal to what was believed to be Divine rule. The Scots could put their kings to death without a scruple, but they never failed to respect and obey their priests.

Now, the Scottish Church was steeped in the grossest corruption. The lives of the clergy were notoriously dissolute and openly dishonest, and there was nothing they would not do to gratify their lust and their greed. Buckle describes them thus:—

> In the fourteenth century, when the sufferings of Scotland were at their height, the clergy flourished more than ever; so that as the country became poorer, the spiritual classes became richer in proportion to the rest of the nation. Even in the fifteenth, and first half of the sixteenth, century when industry began somewhat to advance, we are assured that notwithstanding the improvement in the position of laymen, the whole of their wealth put together, and including the possessions of all ranks, was barely equal to the wealth of the > Church. If the hierarchy were so rapacious and so successful during a period of comparative security, it would be difficult to overrate the enormous harvest they must have reaped in those earlier days, when danger being much more imminent, hardly had any one died without leaving something to them; all being anxious to testify their respect towards those who knew more than their fellows, and whose prayers could either avert present evil, or secure future happiness (History of Civilization in England, vol. iii., pp. 35, 36).

Wealth led to luxury, luxury to immorality, and the immorality of the clergy to that of the people generally. We know that in obedience to a papal order, issued in 1225, a council of Scottish ecclesiastics was held, at which the shameless licentiousness of the clergy was denounced "as a disgrace to the Church." But this violent denunciation of the assembled Fathers-in-God resulted in little if any improvement, for we find that towards the middle of the sixteenth century a Dominican, named William Arith, undertook the task of attacking the vices of his fellow-Churchmen. He preached several sermons at St. Andrew's, in one of which he argued "that the disorders of the clergy should be subjected to the jurisdiction of the civil authorities."

> He introduced an anecdote respecting Prior Patrick Hepburn, afterwards Bishop of Murray. That prelate once, in merry discourse with his gentlemen, asked of them the number of their mistresses, and what proportion of the fair dames were married. The first who answered confessed to five, of whom two were bound in wedlock; the next boasted of seven, with three married women among them; and so on until the turn came to Hepburn himself, who, proud of his bonnes fortunes, declared that, although he was the youngest man there, his mistresses numbered twelve, of whom seven were men's wives (Lea's History of Sacerdotal Celibacy, vol. ii., p. 156).

Curiously enough, however, the Scottish Reformation did not originate as a protest against the appalling degradation and corruption of the Church, but rather, as an expression of the hostility of the nobles towards both Crown and Church. For generations Crown and Church had co-operated in numerous attempts to crush the aristocracy. As Buckle says, "in Scotland the power of the nobles was a cruel malady, which preyed on the vitals of the nation"; but the same was true of Crown and Church. James I. systematically oppressed the nobles, his object being to establish his own sovereignty throughout the land. In the Parliament assembled at Perth in the spring of 1425, he suddenly arrested a large number of them, including the Duke of Albany and his two sons, whom, together with the Earl of Lennox, he put to death, and confiscated the estates of several of them. Two years later, at Inverness, he laid hands on Donald of the Isles and fifty of his chiefs, three of whom were executed, and forty sent to prison. But in 1436 the nobles turned upon his Majesty and put him to death. James II. pursued the same oppressive policy, in which he was cordially supported by the Church, his confidential adviser being Kennedy, Bishop of St. Andrews. James III. exerted himself to the utmost with the same purpose in view, and was in his turn slain by his enemies. Taking a comprehensive survey of the whole subject, we agree with Buckle's following observation:—

> Looking at the interest of the nation, it is evident that the power of the nobles, notwithstanding their gross abuse of it, was, on the whole, beneficial, since it was the only barrier against despotism. The evil they actually engendered was indeed immense. But they kept off other evils, which would have been worse. By causing present anarchy they secured future liberty (History of Civilization in England, vol. iii., p. 30).

In the Scottish commonwealth in the fifteenth century there were only three orders, namely, government, clergy, and nobles, and we find ourselves substantially at one with the same author in the following statement:—

> The two first being united against the last, it is certain that if they had won the day, Scotland would have been oppressed by the worst of all yokes to which a country can be subjected. It would have been ruled by an absolute king and an absolute Church, who, playing into each other's hands, would have tyrannized over a people, who, though coarse and ignorant, still loved a certain rude and barbarous liberty, which it was good for them to possess, but which, in the face of such a combination, they would most assuredly have forfeited (Ibid., vol. iii., p. 51).

As a matter of fact, the combined action of kings and priests utterly failed to break the power of the nobles. Between 1513 and 1524 they flourished abundantly until the management of affairs fell into the hands of the the Douglases, who seized the person of the king, deposed the powerful Beaton from the office of chancellor, and put themselves and their adherents into every official position. But their prosperity lasted but a day. Cardinal Beaton's political ingenuity and priestly cunning triumphed, and by a well-organized conspiracy he rescued the king from captivity and recaptured for the Church all it had so recently lost, with the result that the nobles were completely robbed of all their gains and became objects of cruel persecution. Now, without a doubt, this sudden triumph of the Church, and the consequent downfall of the nobles, must be regarded as, what Buckle calls, "the proximate cause of the establishment of Protestantism in Scotland." It was not the love of spiritual religion, it was not the working of the grace of God in pure hearts, that gave birth to the Reformation in Scotland, but hatred of the existing Church, and the very human instinct of revenge.

J. T. LLOYD.

Two Graves at Rome.

> Death, not armed with any dart,
> But crowned with poppies. —Julian Fane.

A NEWSPAPER paragraph states that an attempt is being made to bring into British ownership the German-owned English cemetery at Rome. Such a movement should not fail of its object, for even among the unnumbered wonders of the Eternal City the tree-clad burial-ground outside the Porta San Paola holds a place apart. Pilgrims come from remote corners of the earth to linger in the quiet corner where John Keats lies beside his friend, Joseph Severn, his gravestone bearing the bitter words: "Here lies one whose name was writ in water." Not far away rises the slope where the heart of Percy Bysshe Shelley lies buried beside the body of his friend, Edward Trelawny. It is curious that when Shelley visited the place years before his own death, he described it as "the most beautiful and solemn cemetery I ever beheld," and, in the preface to Adonais, he says, "It might make one in love with death, to think that one should be buried in so sweet a place." Nor is this all, for Shelley's little son, William, was buried in the same cemetery, which afterwards received the body of Keats and his own ashes. No stone marks the child's grave, for Shelley and Mary were unable to superintend the erection of a tombstone.

Shelley's death was untimely. He was drowned in the sea he loved so well, and whose praises he had so often sung. From his early years the sea ever had a fascination for him. Even in his boyhood days he loved to watch the drifting of paper boats down a stream, and thought that drowning would be the most beautiful of deaths. Thrice he had narrow escapes from shipwrecks —once flying with Mary across the English Channel, once with Byron on the Lake of Geneva, and, again, with his friend, Williams, in Italy. Shelley was luckless with all his boats. His unfortunate first wife, Harriet, sought the same mode of death which at last overwhelmed the poet. Shelley prophesied his own end, though few have noticed it. In Julian and Maddalo he makes Byron ("Count Maddalo") address to him a jesting warning:—

> You were ever still,
> Among Christ's flock a perilous infidel,
> A wolf for the meek lambs.

And the warning concludes:—

> Beware, if you can't swim.

A prophecy the more sinister for its levity, its unconsciousness of hastening destiny. The recurrence of this thought in Shelley's poetry is very singular. The last lines of Adonais might be read as an anticipation of his own death by drowning. In Alastor we read:—

> A restless impulse urged him to embark
> And meet lone death on the drear ocean's waste.

The glorious Ode to Liberty closes on the same fateful and pathetic note:—

> As waves, which lately paved his watery way,
> Hiss round a drowner's head in their tempestuous play.

The Stanzas Written in Dejection, near Naples, echo the same thought:—

> And I might feel in the warm air
> My cheek grow cold, and hear the sea
> Breathe o'er my dying brain its last monotony.

In a dirge, written in 1817, he gives vent to the idea:—

> That time is dead for ever, child—
> Drowned, frozen, dead for ever.

What Shelley might have done had he lived longer, or whether he would have lived much longer if he had not been drowned, are idle questions. His friend, Trelawny, was of opinion that the poet would have lived to a good age, as his father did. Shelley himself, shortly before the end, said, "I am ninety," meaning that he had lived and felt so intensely, that he felt older than his years. Nor was it an idle boast, for he was himself the Julian of his poem:—

> Me, who am as a nerve o'er which do creep
> The else unfelt oppressions of this earth.

Shelley was the poet of the Great Revolution, and the poet and the Revolution were contemporary. On Shelley's birthday, August 4, 1792, it was decreed by the National Assembly that all religious houses should be sold for the benefit of the nation; and Louis XVI. was no longer recognized as King of France. It was on this same day of August that the Emperor of Germany and the King of Prussia issued their famous manifesto announcing their mission to put down the Revolution and "console mankind" by giving up "the city of Paris to the most dreadful and terrible justice." Nor is this all, for Mary Wollstonecraft, the mother of Shelley's Mary, had just published her Vindication of the Rights of Women, and proclaimed that "liberty is the mother of virtue, and if women are, by their very constitution, slaves, and not allowed to breathe the sharp, invigorating air of freedom, they must ever languish like exotics, and be reckoned beautiful flaws in nature." This was the world in which men were living on that quiet day when the poet of the Revolution first saw the light in that little chamber looking out on the peaceful Sussex pastures.

Talk of miracles! What marvel is like to real genius? In that room, in that quiet rustic dwelling, from a rough, country squire, and from a mother who was nothing remarkable, sprang Adonais, Prometheus Unbound, and some of the loveliest lyrics of a thousand years of English literature. If, instead of Shelley, an infant Squire Western had been produced on that August day, everyone would have thought it natural, but instead of a bucolic squire, we have a master of poetical music, and a thinker five hundred years ahead of his own time. His own generation hated him, trampled upon him, and cast him out; but in the wilderness of exile he still delivered his message in deathless song, which a few brave spirits heard and treasured, and which now commands a wider audience, and which will be hailed ultimately as the Gospel of Humanity.

John Keats's grave is the older in this Roman cemetery. Shelley sang the younger poet's death-song in Adonais, having in that immortal rhapsody coupled the name of Keats with his own for ever. When Keats was dying of consumption, his friend, Joseph Severn, cheered his last days. "Poor Keats," he wrote, "has me ever by him, and shadows out the form of one solitary friend; he opens his eyes in great doubt and horror, but when they fall on me they close gently, open quickly, and close again, till he sinks to sleep." Is not this the true pathos and sublime of human life? Is there a diviner thing in the world than pure affection shining through the mists of death? At the last, Severn held his dying friend in his arms for seven hours. Severn outlived Keats for fifty-seven years, and his remains were removed from their original resting-place and buried beside those of Keats. It was well done. In the presence of such a perfect friendship—

> Death is a low mist which cannot blot
> The brightness it may veil.

Because of these infidel graves, generations of English and American visitors to Rome make pilgrimage to where they lie beside the Pauline Gate at the opening of the Ossian Way. Even Italians would desire that these few sacred acres should be for ever in English hands. The appeal itself is noteworthy, for it is a public confession that the two great Freethought poets confer glories upon one of the greatest cities of the civilized world, and that even the Eternal City is made more honourable and illustrious by their presence.

Science, Telepathy, and Communion with the Dead.

The intense desire for some assurance that the conscious personality does survive the Great Change has indeed been inbred and developed in man in many countries and under many systems, both of Philosophy and Religion, for many ages. So much so, that we, in Western countries at any rate, are almost unable to conceive of any other aspiration as animating the human soul.

And yet the fact remains, that probably the greater number of human beings who have inhabited this earth since man appeared upon it have held a Faith to which this idea of an eternally surviving personality is absolutely abhorrent. The Buddhist's "Nirvana" appears to mean, as nearly as European thought or language can define it, a State of Bliss in which the personality has ceased to exist.

Are these great questions to be solved for us at last by paid professional mediums? Have Messrs. and Mesdames Sludge and Co. the key to the great secret which has baffled both Philosophy and Science since their inception?

Can I, indeed, expect to buy for a guinea in Bond Street, or for half-a-crown in East London, some trick which will enable me to lift the curtain behind which lies—that which Religions have been divided upon since man was endowed with a soul?—W. Cook. "Reflections on Raymond," pp. 92-3-4.

MAJOR COOK comments on Peters' communication as follows:—

> Peters, on September 27th, refers to one group photograph in which Raymond appears with "other men"— an experience common to hundreds, or thousands, of other young officers in the new Army. He mentions Raymond's appearance in this group with a stick—an appendage to uniform also common to, practically, all officers of the new Army, and carried by apparently every other officer in the group photograph reproduced in Sir Oliver's book.

So far, Peters' general reference to a group photograph (in which Raymond appears) was a perfectly safe one to venture on as regards, practically, any young officer of the new Army. Peters' further particulars, however, show conclusively that his reference to a group photograph can apply correctly neither to the particular group reproduced in Sir Oliver Lodge's book (upon which Sir Oliver relies) nor to Raymond; because, in the latter group, Raymond's stick is not under his arm, but on the ground across his foot, and not held by him in any way; and also because neither in this, nor in any other photograph in Sir Oliver's book, does Raymond show the slightest vestige of the moustache with which Peters supplies him elsewhere in the same "sitting." No one, not even a medium making "shots" at random, could have made more mistakes than Peters crowds into his short reference to photographs of Raymond on September 27th.

Peters finally "plumps" for three photographs only as in possession of Raymond's family at the date on which he (Peters) is speaking. "Two where he is alone and one where he is in a group with other men."

Sir Oliver himself counters this assertion by the "note": "Fully as many as that," i.e., Peters has understated the number of photographs.[1]

But above all (and this puts the matter out of court altogether as evidence), Peters states that this one group photograph was in the possession of the family before Raymond went away. As we have seen, it was not taken until he reached France, as Sir Oliver well knew. And yet Sir Oliver takes no notice of all these glaring discrepancies. He is so determined to find proofs, that he turns a blind eye to everything that tells against his position.

As Major Cook emphatically remarks: "The inference is plain that Peters' reference to photographs, whether group or otherwise, on September 27th, was merely a general and impudent 'shot' at random at matters of which he had no definite knowledge, whether 'supernormal' or otherwise—a random and bad 'shot' similar to his later attempt, at the same 'sitting,' when he says: 'You have in your house prizes' (athletic) 'which he won,' and which Sir Oliver dismisses as 'incorrect.'"[2]

The second reference to the photograph was at the sitting with the medium, Mrs. Leonard, on December 3, 1915; the spirit of Raymond communicating through "Feda," Mrs. Leonard's control, supposed to be the spirit of a little Indian girl. It would take too long to reproduce this communication, but we may take the description of it given by Major Cook as correct. He describes it as "vague and shuffling as regards several details with regard to which one of those who had sat for the original could hardly be in any doubt, but strikingly accurate as regards other details easy enough to be remembered by one who had merely seen, or had heard a description by another person who had seen, a copy; and to whom the existence of a 'key' was not unknown, but who had not a particularly good memory for names."[3]

One of the details described by Raymond through "Feda" through Mrs. Leonard—what a journey!—were certain horizontal and vertical lines on the background of the photograph. These lines are caused by binders and joints of the woodwork of the hut which forms the background of the group. Now, as Major Cook points out, these lines would not have been visible to Raymond, as he was sitting with his back to the hut; neither, we may add, would he have thought them worth mentioning if he had noticed them. But to a person who had only seen the photo, they would appear most striking.

There is not the slightest doubt in the present writer's mind that Mrs. Leonard had seen the photo in question. Let us go over the dates again. Captain Boast sent the negatives to England, where they arrived on October 15, 1915. A large number of copies appear to have been printed—there were twenty-one officers and their friends to supply. On November 28, Mrs. Cheves had six in her possession, with a key to the names, and wrote offering a copy to Lady Lodge, but which was not sent until December 7, an interval of nine days.

On November 28, then, it was common knowledge in Sir Oliver's household that the photo existed. On December 3, five days later, Mrs. Leonard describes the photo at a sitting with Sir Oliver. Five days was ample time for her to obtain a copy of the photo, and the unfortunate delay of Mrs. Cheves in not sending her copy until the 7th gave just the chance needed to work the oracle.

Such is the evidence with which Sir Oliver Lodge would convert the world!

Sir Oliver Lodge prefaces this record of the photograph with the remark: "This is a long record, because I took verbatim notes, but I propose to inflict it all upon the reader, in accordance with promise to report unverifiable and possibly absurd matter, just as it comes, and even to encourage it."[1] But why should the spirits wish to communicate "absurd matter"? And why on earth should Sir Oliver encourage them in it?

That they did communicate absurd matter, the following extract from this sitting will show. Mrs. Leonard—we leave out the pretended spirits of "Feda" and Raymond—speaking of the spirit world, says:—

> People here try to provide everything that is wanted. A chap came over the other day, who would have a cigar. "That's finished them" he thought. He means he thought they would never be able to provide that. But there are laboratories over here, and they manufacture all sorts of things in them. Not like you do out of solid matter, but out of essences and ethers and gases. It's not the same as on the earth plane, but they were able to manufacture what looked like a cigar.....Some want meat and some strong drink; they call for whisky soda's. Don't think I'm stretching it, when I tell you that they can manufacture even that.[2]

In the same sitting the supposed spirit of Raymond says: "My suit I expect was made from damaged worsted on your side.....You know flowers, how they decay. We have got flowers here; your damaged flowers flower again with us—beautiful flowers." And further, we learn: "He (Raymond) has brought that doggie again, nice doggie.....He's got a cat too, plenty of animals he says."[3]

Certainly, Sir Oliver seems to have some glimmering of the absurdity of this spiritual information; for in a footnote to the episode about the decayed flowers he remarks: "I have not yet traced the source of all this supposed information." Well, it came from the same source as the information about the photograph; for it was delivered during the same sitting.

A great deal has been made by Spiritualists of what they call "cross-correspondences"—a cross-correspondence being similar words, or a similar idea, expressed in the automatic writings of two independent mediums. In this matter we are of the same opinion as Dr. Mercier, who observes: they "are so few, so ambiguous, and need so much amplification by the imaginative ingenuity of the believer, as to make very little impression upon anyone who is not ready and determined to believe in spite of his own reason.....There are very few of these so-called cross-correspondences on record; they are extremely obscure, and need a great deal of torturing and interpreting and glossing before they can be twisted into any appearance of referring to the same thing or of emanating from the same source."[1]

A great deal more could be written to expose the folly and fraud responsible for the prevalent beliefs in Telepathy and Spiritualism, but enough has been said to convince any unbiased reader of the utter want of scientific evidence in favour of these delusions. If any one, after reading the evidence, still believes in these things, it is unlikely that any further evidence in any quantity will have any effect. This subject has been too long neglected by Freethinkers; they have been too prone to dismiss the subject as not worth discussing. This is the first time the subject has been discussed at length in these columns, with the exception of the Blavatsky case—and that was solely on account of Mrs. Besant's defection. Several years ago the present writer offered to write on the subject, but it was not considered worth powder and shot. In the meanwhile, this superstition has been growing by leaps and bounds. "That it is very extensive," says Dr. Mercier, "is shown in the first place by the enormous sale of the book Raymond, a sale that might be envied by the writer of the most popular novels." These articles will be reprinted in pamphlet form when paper is available, and every Freethinker should help to put it in circulation, in the attempt to stem this tidal wave of superstition.

W. MANN.

Better than Nothing!

THE facility with which the Nonconformist of to-day can accommodate himself to schemes for unions with State Churches is very suggestive. Believers of all sects have come to realize the value of combination. In the common anxiety for self-preservation, the Nonconformist of to-day finds it possible to pocket the principles for which the stalwart Dissenters of former times so strenuously contended.

Nonconformity hath waxed fat. The material circumstances of the majority of Nonconformists have vastly improved, and we shall all one day understand that what is not material is not worth considering. Are fat stipends and clerical motors the outward and visible signs of a deeper spirituality within? Modern conditions are not unfavourable to the laying up of treasure on earth. We have advanced upon the primitive methods of the hoarders of 2,000 years ago because we live in a more scientific age. Moth and rust—or even thieves? Pshaw! In any view, Nonconformity has surrendered to kid gloves and silver slippers.

We can estimate the value of Nonconformists, who pose as pioneers of Freedom, when we contemplate their attitude, for instance, to State ceremonials. Provided that they are furnished with a box at the show, they will outvie the representatives of the Government religion in a chorus of adulation and in expressions of gaping wonder at the "spiritual" significance of proceedings which have been worked up and rehearsed for weeks, and at last staged—at enormous cost to the country.

[1] Dr. Mercier, Spiritualism and Sir Oliver Lodge, pp. 110-111.

Nonconformity stands condemned for its grievous failure to find a solution of the education problem. A Unitarian clergyman was once heard earnestly to declare that, rather than have no religious manual of instruction in the day schools at all, he would welcome the Shorter Catechism. It was better than nothing! Any religion rather than none at all! That is the ultimate position of even the most unclerical of Nonconformists, and Freethinkers do well to keep it in mind. The War has had the effect of stimulating efforts for a more general union of Christendom because the War has revealed to professional religionists that the influences at work undermining supernaturalism are more potent than they supposed. They affect in the pulpit to ignore or minimize these influences; but "facts are chields that winna ding," and all the juggling in the world cannot blind observant people to plain statistics demonstrating the decline of Nonconformity. Nonconformity may not be dead, but it is doomed. By this we do not mean to suggest that all those who leave the sinking ship will embrace Freethought. Many of them will find a "spiritual home" in Catholicism. There are plenty of astute clerics still about who are not slack in their efforts to bring about combines, and to take what advantage they can of human fear and human weakness.

The clear conclusion to which all the facts point us is, that if the average Nonconformist of to-day were shut up to a choice between two positions, he would far sooner be a Roman Catholic than an Atheist. This may not be news to all of us, but it is something we should all keep before us in weighing up the existing situation. We are speaking of the Nonconformist of to-day; but every morrow that dawns makes the prospects of Atheism the brighter, because every day man adds a little more to his knowledge; meaning thereby, in its widest connotation, that science is gradually but surely supplanting superstition.

Every man who has the tiniest drop of the virus of religion in his blood is a potential Romanist. When France disestablished the Church, we heard frequent exclamations of horror from Nonconformists in this country about the "disaster" that had befallen that country because it had rejected God for Reason. And if the Unitarian can embrace Presbyterianism, what is to prevent him from transferring to Episcopacy, and from that to the original fold? The old man of Rome knows there is nothing to prevent him; and the farthest-seeing Romanists are biding their time. They look forward to the day foretold of old when there shall be "one flock and one shepherd." The wise old man knows there is no traditional or historical basis for the sects that have sprung up since the so-called Reformation. They are all wanderers from the Father's house. But these errant children are returning, says the patient old man. One day they will all be back again. Just give them time—give them time. And 300 years ago Romanist and Protestant burned one another! If your Faith is not sacred enough to justify the extremest measures in its vindication against heretics, what is your Faith worth? Let us get back to mediævalism by all means! We may practise it better than the Huns.

An examination of recent history does not suggest that we need entertain any regrets about the impending fall of Nonconformity. It will bring release to many prisoned minds; it will serve to simplify the issues in the future contest between Rome and Reason; and it will convince a certain nebulous type of sceptic that oil and water will not mix. Christianity, it has been suggested, destroyed two great civilizations, and is menacing a third. This War, as a contemporary event, has proved what Freethinkers have ever been maintaining is proved from the Bible—that the most frightful savagery is quite possible in association with the most fervent and most orthodox piety. The ancient warrior Jew is reproduced in the modern Hun. God is not Love, whatever else he may be. Everywhere, in so far as savagery has been replaced by humane conduct, we owe it to the ever-widening and ever-deepening current of secular advancement—and to that alone.

Acid Drops.

By some means we missed an article in the Daily News of September 6, by the Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell—an omission rectified by the kindness of one of our readers. Mr. Russell's article is on the question of religious teaching by the State, and in that he frankly and fully accepts the principle of Secular Education. The following expressions are worth citing, not as anything new to Freethinker readers, but only as an endorsement of our position:—

> If the State compels its citizens to pay for religious teaching in which they do not believe, it commits, in my opinion, a palpable injustice.
> It is indeed unjust to make a Quaker pay for teaching the doctrine of the Sacraments, or a Unitarian for teaching the Deity of Christ; but it is equally unjust to make an Atheist pay for teaching the existence of God.
> Churchmen will best serve the religion which they profess by joining with other "men of goodwill," though of different faiths, who desire the Secular solution. In that way only, as far as I can see, can the interests of Education be reconciled with the higher interests of Justice.

The unfortunate thing is that, to the vast majority of Christians, considerations of justice on a question of religion carries no weight whatever.

The one false note in Mr. Russell's article is struck in connection with the use of the word "Secularism." This word, he says, "has been converted in the past with a blatant form of negation, and also with a social doctrine which all decent people repudiate." It is true that many speak of Secularism as a "blatant negation," and the only explanation for that is ignorance or wilful misrepresentation. With regard to the social doctrine "which all decent people repudiate," by that Mr. Russell means, presumably, Malthusianism. And while that has no necessary connection with Secularism, it is little less than a libel to speak of it as a doctrine repudiated by all decent people, as though only indecent ones advocated it. Mr. Russell should acquaint himself with the names of those who have publicly advocated, and advocate Malthusianism before making himself responsible for such senseless slander. Malthusianism may be either sound or unsound in its philosophy, but it is childish—when it is not worse—to label a thing "indecent" because one disagrees with it. We agree it is an effective method—with the British public. For there is nothing that that public fears more than to be called indecent. To be indecent is quite a different matter.

The John Rylands Library, in Manchester, has been enriched by some Syrian manuscripts, among which is one entitled, "Discourse written by Shem, Son of Noah." Doubtless, it is as true as the Bible story.

A good story is retailed by the Sunday Herald, which has quite a profane flavour. Mr. Asquith was told once that a frank and full exchange of views had taken place between M. Cambon and Sir E. Grey. "In that case," said the late Prime Minister, who knew the linguistic limitations of both, "the Holy Ghost must have been present."

A press paragraph states that pilgrims bearing the Holy Carpet have left Cairo for Mecca. This is a gentle reminder hat King George reigns over more non-Christians than Christians.

The playfulness of Providence has by no means been lessened by the world-War. At Weasenham, Norfolk, a cow has given birth to four calves, which the newspapers describe as a record.

A bogus matrimonial agent with three wives, who was sentenced to three years' penal servitude at the Old Bailey, was said to have been a missioner and preacher. Judge Rentoul described the case as one of the worst he had ever tried. The restraining power of religion is not very apparent in this instance.

Professor David Smith says that when we go to heaven our dogs who love us will join us there. That is an exceedingly delightful prospect; but if the Professor's gospel be true, the majority of us are doomed to enter the other place, and one wonders whether the animals who love the ungodly will share their sufferings in hell. Will Bill Sikes' faithful dog be at his side for ever as he endures the torment of the damned? The curious thing is that Dr. Smith, who promises heaven to animals, does not know that there is either a heaven or a hell even for ourselves, beyond the tomb.

Archdeacon Holmes is perfectly well aware that there is no God who answers prayer, whether there is one who hears it or not; and yet the venerable gentleman wants his hearers to believe in God and practise prayer. In his plausible but fundamentally fallacious apologia for God he falls back upon the plea that, normally, there is no Divine action save through instrumentalities. As reported in the Church Times for September 14, he says:—

> You must help. For remember this: to ask God to do without you what he will only do through you, is to make a mock at prayer.

Then there is absolutely no evidence that God does anything at all in human, or any other, affairs; and to pray at all is to make a mock at Nature's laws. Literally nothing happens or is done except in strict subjection to those firm laws.

It apparently never occurs to the Archdeacon that, if we do things ourselves, it is a piece of pious hypocrisy to ask God to do them. If parents must look after their children themselves, of what earthly or heavenly use can it be to invite the Heavenly Father to do it also? Mr. Holmes tacitly admits that if parents neglect their children, God won't act the part of "a glorified relieving officer." Quite so; then why drag an imaginary Divine Being into the case at all?

The Bishop of Hereford has always been regarded, and often violently denounced, as theologically a heretic; and yet it is he who, on his retirement, announces that he will not avail himself of the liberal pension to which he is legally entitled.

The Food Controller will be getting into serious trouble if he is not careful. The Vicar of Pinner says that to use War bread at Holy Communion is "absolutely illegal," since it is forbidden by the rubric, which declares for the best and purest wheat bread that may be obtained. But if the faith of the believer can transform bread into the body of Jesus Christ, it seems a little thing, by comparison, to change War bread into a pure wheaten loaf.

A correspondent wrote to the editor of a Sunday paper protesting against the constant abuse of the Kaiser, and adding, "in his private life he is a good, Christian man." Just so! He is a good man in the worst sense of the word.

The dear Daily News has been wondering how Cardinal Merry del Val came by his name, and says that an ancestor of his was an Irishman named "Merry." Not many followers of the Man of Sorrows can boast of being "merry."

The Daily Telegraph reports that the War has created a big demand in America for Bibles. We suspect the paragraph is one that has been sent round the press by some agency, but what we should like to know is the origin of the demand? Does it originate with the soldiers or with some professional money-collecting agency for providing the Army with free copies? We strongly suspect the latter.

Nearly three years ago Professor Griffith Jones contributed an article to the Christian World, in which he asserted that Nietzscheanism was supreme in Germany, and that the War was largely attributable to that fact. In the British Weekly for September 13, the same divine is reported to have recently admitted that "the Kaiser is a genuinely religious man," but to have claimed that "he believes in the God who commanded the Israelites to slay the Amalekites, sparing neither man, woman, nor child." The Principal is still a false witness, for the Kaiser is as evangelical a Christian as Dr. Griffith Jones himself, and, possibly, a great deal more orthodox. But his being a fervent Christian does not prevent him from ordering, permitting, or winking at the unspeakable horrors of which the Germans are guilty during this War.

"Salvation Army officers have arrived in France for service among the American troops," runs a newspaper paragraph. "Now we shan't be long."

The Young Men's Christian Association should be making a good thing out of the canteens for the soldiers. Money is freely subscribed by the public; much service is given free; and goods are sold to soldiers at cost price plus a percentage to cover working expenses.

The poor bishops have a hard struggle to keep up their positions, but they sometimes manage to leave small sums behind them. Miss Jane Monk, of Cadogan Square, Chelsea, one of the daughters of the late Bishop of Gloucester, left £43,533.

The four hundredth anniversary of the sailing of the Mayflower will be celebrated shortly. This was the famous boat on which the Pilgrim Fathers sailed to America, where they landed at Plymouth rock. Colonel Ingersoll said, jestingly, that it would have been better for the United States if the Plymouth rock had landed on the Pilgrims.

Apropos of our paragraph last week referring to the Peckham tradesman who changed his name from Davies to Christ, a correspondent sends us a letter from the States who reports the name of one of America's new Army as "Goodall Holy Bible." That is indeed, hard to beat.

A writer in the Sunday Chronicle provides the following as a specimen of the rhymes unwritten by soldiers sentenced to terms of detention:—

King David and King Solomon
Led rather naughty lives;
They enjoyed themselves immensely
With their concubines—and wives
But as old age came creeping o'er
They experienced serious qualms,
For King Solomon wrote the Proverbs
And King David wrote the Psalms.

The Rev. E. Shillito confesses that all is not well with the Free Churches. They are not what they used to be fifty years ago. The congregations are not only restless and listless during worship, but they are audacious enough to indulge in cool and peevish criticism there upon. And that is not all by any means. The Free Churches are being deserted by growing numbers every year. Mr. Shillito thinks that one reason for this desertion is dissatisfaction with the mode and quality of the worship; but we venture to submit as the chief reason the fact that Christianity's days are numbered, and that already it is a back number so far as individual or national life is concerned. Only cranks trouble their heads now about what Jesus would do if he were with us.

It is sheer bunkum on the part of the Rev. Tolefree Parr, President of the Primitive Methodist Church, to declare that a million children could be gathered into the Sunday-schools "if the Churches would focus their forces on this end, and if thousands of their leisured people would sacrifice themselves to become effective teachers." That "if" throws a flood of light upon the situation. The Churches are powerless because they lack faith, and they lack faith because Christianity has ceased to be a living reality to them. These men of God are wilfully blind to the fact, so patent to most others, namely, that the Christian religion is, to all intents and purposes, already obsolete, from which state no power on earth, or from heaven can recall it.

In the recent severe thunderstorm in Paris the cathedral of Notre Dame was struck by lightning, and in London's air-raid the windows of a church were blown out. "God" appears to care as little for his houses as for his children.

Lord Leverhulme says that after the War every able-bodied man and woman must work. This is a hard piece of advice for the clergy and others who play in the Lord's vineyard.

A correspondent sends the following true story. A man was trying to sell a copy of Jack London's When God Laughs. To him came a horrified member of the Plymouth Brethren with the query, "And when is that?" "Why," replied the other, "it is when you go round the doors with your tracts." A neat retort.

At Brentford, John Hopkins, a Wesleyan minister, and Superintendent of the Wesleyan Circuit, was summoned for obtaining sugar under false pretences. A form was filled up asking for 80 lb. of sugar for preserving own-grown fruit, and 36 lb. was sent. Inquiries showed that Mr. Hopkins possessed only four plum-trees, and that there had only been half a dozen plums on them. We like sweet things ourselves, but twelve pounds and a half of sugar to one plum does seem a trifle excessive. Mr. Hopkins was fined 40s.

"General" Booth is still spending money in advertisements asking for cheques for the "War Work" of the Salvation Army. The most warlike action of this "army" is the singing of "Onward, Christian Soldiers."

Churches are often advertised like cinemas and theatres. A prominent notice in the City reads: "St. Mary-at-Hill. Photos. Phonos." If the stories Noah's Ark and Jonah and the Whale were made the subjects of the films there ought to be full houses.

The wife of a Grimsby parson has given birth to triplets. There is at least one Christian family obeying the Biblical command, "Increase and multiply."

On a recent fete-day, the Vicar of St. Katherine's, Southbourne, Hants, the archdeacon called at the vicarage—in trousers. This reminds us of Mark Twain's description of church parade in one of the South Sea islands, where the congregation was partially dressed in European clothes. One wore a hat only, another a waistcoat, and a third was resplendent in a coat, which he wore as a pair of trousers with his legs crowded through the sleeves.

The Right to Affirm.

By the Oaths Amendment Act of 1888 affirmation may take the place of an oath in courts of law and in all other places where the taking of an oath is necessary.

Affimation may be claimed on one of two grounds. (1) On the ground of having no religious belief, (2) on the ground of an oath being contrary to one's religious belief.

A judge or other official may ask on what ground affirmation is claimed, but no further question is warranted, and all such additional questions should be respectfully and firmly declined.

In all cases where any trouble or difficulty occurs it would be well to inform us of the circumstances at once,

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

September 23, Birmingham Town Hall; September 30, Swansea; October 7, Failsworth; October 14, Leicester; October 21, Manchester; October 28, London; November 4, Abertillery.

A. Williams.—Pleased to hear from one so earnest in the Cause. The MSS. sent is promising, and although not up to our standard, we advise you not to be discouraged. Writing, like other things, is not learned in a day. And you have ideas. That is the main thing.

J. Hudson.—It is good that you wish you were able to send ten times as much. For your sake we wish you could. But we are quite content with each one doing his or her share.

Capt. Latham.—Thanks for card. The building looks fine. Pity such magnificent structures are not put to better uses. Glad to hear you are well.

J. Close.—We have no doubt your hope that "the rank and file of the Freethought Party" will do their share towards the Sustentation Fund will be realized.

J. Breese.—We agree with you as to your estimate of H. G. Wells. But a man who writes so much cannot be expected to think soundly—unless he happens to be a genius.

A. Harvey.—We are not surprised that your knowledge of "the business side of things" led you to anticipate the opening of a Sustentation Fund. Gratified to have your praise of the Freethinker. We are "dreaming dreams" of it's future, and if we do not break in the making, some of those dreams are going to be realized.

T. Fowler.—We remember the description, which was a very apt one.

F. C. Willis.—Help and appreciation from one who describes himself as "one of the workers" is doubly welcome. And we know that the description is deserved.

A. Clarke.—Thanks for cutting.

G. J. Rendle (Uganda).—Thanks for letter. Trust you will have a safe and pleasant trip home.

W. W. Ford.—The passage in Josephus commencing "About this time was Josephus" is given up by nearly every authority worth citing. Some of the older and more orthodox writers, such as Lardner, Giles, and even Dean Farrar, are emphatic in its rejection. The passage was unknown to anyone before the time of Eusebius, and he is generally credited with having inserted it. If you take the passage immediately before the one referring to Jesus, and the one after it, you will see they form a natural sequence. The Jesus passage interrupts the sense of the narrative and makes some of it nonsense. With reference to other quotations, it must be remembered that neither "Chrestus" nor "Christians" have a necessary reference to an historical Jesus. Both terms are independent of the New Testament story. Sorry we cannot use MSS.

E. G. Dawson.—There is no Branch of the N. S. S. at present in Southampton.

E. Lechmere and Others.—There is really no need to apologize for the smallness of a subscription to the Sustentation Fund. Those who help to the limit of their opportunities are doing their share equally with those who help in a larger way. And we have the best reason for knowing that nothing pleases the larger givers more than to see all showing in a concrete manner their interest in the common cause.

J. Stanway.—We are quite content. If we had been looking round for an easy, well-paid job, we should never have taken on this one. We are doing what we like, and that is everything.

F. S.—If we ever have to make that journey, we would not ask for better companionship on the road. We feel assured that you are helping in all ways to the limit of your opportunities, and no one could ask for more.

W. J.—(1) The title of "Freethinker" is fully warranted as a title for a paper in which opinions are expressed free from the distorting prejudice of social convention. (2) We do not agree that Huxley and Spencer used "agnostic" solely for the reason that the limitations of knowledge forbade dogmatism. The question of the limitations of knowledge had little or nothing to do with it. And they were confusing the "Problem of Reality" with the belief in God—two quite distinct things.

J. Blair Williams.—Thanks for letter, which shall appear in our next issue.

W. Dodd.—Your delight at the subscription list in last week's issue is shared by all our readers who have written. There seems a general determination "to be in it" this time.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

As will be seen, our Sustentation Fund is going along merrily. It looks, indeed, as though the wishes of many of our subscribers will be realized, and, in addition to clearing off last year's deficit, there will be left in hand a substantial contribution towards meeting the recurring weekly loss. In that direction I am quite in the hands of my readers. In any case, I can only thank in a general manner all who have subscribed, and even those who would have done so had their means permitted. I have been much encouraged by the letters which accompanied most of the subscriptions. It is good to feel that one's efforts are so appreciated, and that one has so warm, and even enthusiastic, a backing.

I am again compelled to severely restrict the number of letters from which I quote.

C. W. writes:—

> For well over a year I have been impressed by the fact that I have been receiving weekly for twopence a journal for which I ought to have paid at least threepence. I have now much pleasure in enclosing all these withheld pennies in one lump sum, and hope that all your readers will follow suit. Of course, in reckoning this way, I am looking at the Freethinker commercially. From any other point of view a cash computation is quite inadequate.

If considerably less than all our readers followed this plan, we should be free of all financial worries until the end of the War.

This is echoed by H. C. who, in sending P.O. for 4s. 4d., says:—

> I am willing and wishful to make my Freethinker 3d. per week. Its worth it. You have never written better than you are now doing.

Mrs. E. Adams encloses cheque, and writes:—

> I am so very glad to see so good a response towards the Sustentation Fund, and I do hope that it will continue for a time, so that you may be relieved of all financial worry. I think it is wonderful what you have done at a time like this.

Mr. O. Friedman writes:—

> I have been reading the Freethinker for seven years, in which I have gained much knowledge and good food for the intellectual part of my anatomy. So, for this pleasure, please find my cheque for £3 10s., and should your appeal not meet with the success I anticipate, I shall send you another cheque. Freethinkers should prove to such men as Mr. H. G. Wells and others their impertinence and calumny by supporting heartily and generously the cause of emancipation. The Freethinker is a great means of bringing light to those who, unfortunately, have had their brains cobwebbed and their ears closed to reason.

Mr. S. S. Leech regrets that his subscription was not among the first received, but adds:—

> I was extremely glad on opening my paper this morning to see how Freethinkers have responded. I am inclined to think that one of the reasons is this: To every other paper the definite article attaches, and we take the Morning Post or the Times, as the case may be. But with the Freethinker nothing but the possessive adjective fits the case. We look forward to receiving our paper with its brilliant incisive articles, all based on good common sense, and with profit and pleasure we hasten to help our editor out of his difficulties. Every good wish and success to him.

Mr. H. Irving wishes to know why it should be necessary to explain at length the reasons for needing so small a sum as £250 at a time like this, and wonders how much would be needed if the Editor and staff "were paid for the brilliant articles appearing weekly." He adds:—

> "The Guards want powder, and, by God! they shal have it," said Corporal Brewster. Editor Cohen should only say, "The best of causes wants £250," and every Freethinking son of a Brewster should get away and buy a P.O., saying, "And by George (Meredith or Foote)! he shall have it."

Mr. Irving will realize by now that this appears to be the spirit animating our readers. By the time the Fund is closed we have not the slightest doubt that not only will the loss of last year be cleared, but that a substantial contribution will be made towards meeting the deficit that is bound to recur under existing conditions. As to saying why it is needed, we prefer always that, where possible, reasons should be given. It prevents misunderstandings.

Mr. W. B. Columbine, in sending cheque, writes: "Great credit is due to you for the able manner in which you are conducting the Freethinker, and your efforts to keep the flag flying in these difficult times should receive generous support from the whole of the Freethought Party." We are, we think, getting it.

The West Ham Branch of the N. S. S. forwards a subscription in recognition of the high quality and the propagandist value of the Freethinker.

Mr. J. B. Palphryman, in wishing us health and strength to continue the work, says:—

> How you have kept the Freethought flag flying under the abnormal conditions which have obtained since the advent of War is little short of marvellous. That this is recognized by many of your readers is evident from the prompt and handsome response to your appeal as shown in the last issue of the Freethinker.

Mr. James Ralston writes:—

> The National Reformer did not survive the great personality of Charles Bradlaugh. The Agnostic Journal did not survive "Saladin." I am very pleased with your splendid and very successful effort. You have kept the Freethinker going through three of the worst years in the history of journalism.

We can only blush, and remark that but for the loyal support of friends and readers our "successful effort" would have been impossible.

Mr. S. Scott says: "Will you allow me once more to express my pleasure at the high standard still maintained —and even heightened—by the Freethinker since it has come under your editorship. It is really splendid."

Mr. J. Shields hopes that "the mental and financial anxieties which every business man knows must have been yours during the last three years will now be at an end."

Mr. J. Middleton hopes that all Freethinker readers will appreciate the difficulties of the situation and help accordingly.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (Sept. 23) Mr. Cohen lectures in the Town Hall, Birmingham. There will be two meetings—one in the afternoon, at 3, subject, "Morality Without God"; and in the evening, at 7, subject, "Why Men Believe in God," with special reference to Mr. H. G. Wells. Admission is free to both meetings, but there are reserved seats, tickets for which may be obtained of Mr. J. Partridge, 245 Shenstone Road, Rotton Park, Birmingham. We hope that Birmingham Freethinkers will do their best to see that the meetings are as widely known as possible.

Next Sunday (September 30) Mr. Cohen delivers two lectures in the Docker's Hall, High Street, Swansea. We are asked to state that visitors from a distance may have tea provided between the afternoon and evening meetings on communicating with Mr. B. Dupree, 12 Short Street, Swansea. It is necessary to write owing to war-time difficulties.

Mr. J. Turnbull (Falkirk) writes: "Does the following constitute a record. For every year of my life I can count a convert to the Cause of Freethought, not considering those who stopped at the half-way house for refreshment. The method I adopt is to send literature to any who have become interested, starting with the Age of Reason and ending with Determinism or Free Will?" Whether any of our readers has a better record than this we cannot tell. But we do say the record is a fine one. It is such disinterested labour that makes one proud of Freethought and Freethinkers.

The new Manchester Branch has arranged a series of monthly lectures, to be opened by Mr. Cohen on March 21, and followed by Mr. Lloyd, Mr. T. F. Palmer, and Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner. The Secretary of the Branch, Mr. H. Black, 446 Great Cheetham Street East, Higher Broughton, Salford, appeals for the support of both members and friends in making the meetings a success. Those who cannot help financially can help in making the meetings well known, and some may help in both ways. For the general work of the Branch, a large room has been taken in the Bakers' Hall, Swan Street, Shudehill, for Sunday evening meetings. The first meeting is to be held here on October 7, at 6.30.

We wonder how much of the interest in Songs of a Miner (Herbert Jenkins, Ltd., 2s. 6d., net), is due to an unaffected love of verse on the part of the reading public, and how much to the knowledge that the poet, Mr. James C. Welsh, has been a pitman for some twenty years, and is now employed as a checkweighman at the pit-head. For some of us the association of rhythmic emotion with the more elemental forms of labour seems natural enough; indeed, even more natural than its association with the dull routine of journalism or the duller routine of the Civil Service. Mr. Welsh, we are pleased to see, would have us judge him as a poet, not as a miner-poet. And in this we feel he is right. It is this insistence, in all probability, that prompted Mr. Bernard Shaw to decline to write an introduction to the book. But Mr. Shaw knows little about poetry and cares less. He would have introduced Mr. Welsh to us as a super-pitman, a sort of companion in verse to Mr. W. H. Davies, whom he once induced to pose as a super-tramp; and, most likely, we should have been tempted to give our new acquaintance the cold shoulder. Mr. Welsh, however, is well able to stand on his own legs, and needs the support of Mr. Shaw as little as did Mr. Davis.

The longest and most ambitious poem in the book is the one with which it begins, "The Crusade of Youth." Written in loosely rhymed pentameters, it is a dithyrambic indictment of the wrong done by man to man, especially the colossal stupidity and brutality of war. The words vibrate with genuine emotion, and at times glow with the white heat of an imagination purified by the fire of suffering. If, in the end, the dream of brotherhood is vague and unreal, the passion of the appeal is none the less moving. In "Labour" and "The Miner," Mr. Welsh has evidently forced himself to see only the violent, sombre, and ugly aspects of life, the result being a want of balance. Yet the majority of the shorter poems reflect a temperament which rejoices in beauty and sane emotions. The poems in Scots dialect, especially, have a rhythmical beauty marked enough to demand a musical setting. In a less obvious vein, "A Picture in Grey" curiously reminds us of Verlaine or Whistler. The best poem in the book are the four stanzas "To My Wife." It has a firmness of touch, a subtle simplicity of feeling, and a shapeliness which come as a pleasant surprise to those of us who have had the misfortune to be obliged to wade through the verse of our much-belauded soldier-poets.

We are asked to remind those of our friends who attend the outdoor lectures that in consequence of the earlier closing of the parks each Sunday, the time of all Evening Lectures has been changed. The exact hour will be found by reference to our Lecture List.

The Rise and Progress of Mental Power.

Although an awareness of self as an active and feeling organism exists in animals and infants, this consciousness is mainly objective in character. That conceptual self-consciousness which permits an animal to think of itself as such, in other words, subjectively, is feebly represented in organisms below man. Still, the germs of the higher ideation are there. As Darwin remarked in his Descent of Man:—

> It may be freely admitted that no animal is self-conscious, if by this term is implied that he reflects on such points as whence he comes or whither he will go, or what is life and death, and so forth. But how can we feel sure that an old dog with an excellent memory and some power of imagination, as shown by his dreams, never reflects on his past pleasures and pains in the chase? And this would be a form of self-consciousness.

The young child invariably regards itself objectively, although clearly conscious of its own personality. After the child commences to speak, it long refers to itself in the third person, and never as "I" or "me." And its phraseology does not, in this respect change, until its third year, while it is questionable whether this change would occur at a stage so early were it not hastened by the influence of example. As Sully says, the distinction between personal and outside existences, and the difference between the "I" and the "you" is constantly presented to the child's notice by the language of its elders. Step by step, from this stage onwards, complete awareness of self as a separate personality is steadily reached. Yet there appears to be a period in infant life when full consciousness of individual existence emerges. Wundt dated the dawn of this complete consciousness of self in his own case to the occasion when he, as a child, suddenly and unexpectedly rolled downstairs into a cellar.

But beyond this critical stage the increase of mental capacity in each creature becomes a matter of slow and sometimes painful progress. Little children long regard all moving objects as living things, and frequently fear them on that account. Savages, the surviving representatives of the pre-historic childhood of the civilized peoples, everywhere endow inanimate objects and the blind forces of Nature with psychic attributes, and our own growing children are apt to address their toys as if they were alive. Even European rustics habitually read their own thoughts and emotions into the involuntary activities of rain, wind, clouds, and streams. Yet, grotesque as such fancies appear to the educated rationalist, they survive in many unexpected quarters, and probably in the past have served to raise us to superior mental planes. The lower animals display alarm at novel sights and sounds of a harmless kind, until they are satisfied as to their nature. All such phenomena, whether ejectively or objectively considered, have helped to promote the mind's advance both in animals and in man.

It is now evident that the human mind has been evolved from that of the lower Primates. Yet the critics of the doctrine of the natural genesis and development of man's intellect have persistently asserted that language alone presents an insuperable obstacle to the acceptance of this truth. But, both in substance and in fact, this assertion is false. Blinded and bemused by traditional preconceptions, the majority of modern philologists were, until the nineteenth century, quite adverse to the idea of a natural development of language. Still, alike in ancient Greece and Rome, the problem had been studied from a scientific standpoint, while the yet earlier thinkers of India had made remarkable progress in their analysis of grammar. In later Europe a few pioneers, such as Sir William Jones, Grimm, Bopp, and Pott laid the foundation stones of that contemporary comparative philology which now furnishes some of the most conclusive evidences of mental evolution.

Philologists are all evolutionists now. Even the conservative Max Mueller candidly admitted in the preface to his Science of Thought that "no student of the science of language can be anything but an evolutionist, for wherever he looks he sees nothing but evolution going on around him." The eminent Schleicher declares that "the development of new forms from preceding forms can be much more easily traced, and this on an even larger scale in the province of words, than in that of plants and animals."

In addition to the various dead languages, more than one thousand tongues are still spoken on our planet, not one of which is ordinarily intelligible to the user of another. These numerous modes of speech may be arranged into one hundred families, and the latter lend themselves to further reduction to three orders. From these three forms the 1,000 living languages are the probable descendants.

The root terms out of which languages are evolved comprise their elementary constituents, although many of these radical words admit of still further reduction to still simpler forms. Chinese is a monosyllabic language, and consists of some 500 separate words. Renan reckoned the roots of Hebrew at the same number. Professor Skeat has traced English to 461 Aryan roots; Benfey discovered over 1,000 roots in ancient Sanskrit, but more critical researches reduce this estimate very considerably. Max Mueller found 121 roots only in Sanskrit, the tongue from which all the Indo-European languages have been developed. But comparatively simple as these "roots" are, investigation reveals them, not as original, natural words indicative of concrete ideas, but as terms expressing general or abstract notions, and far in advance of the lost language from which Sanskrit was elaborated. Moreover, the Sanskrit radicals betray a remarkable amount of repetition, which also proves that the language of ancient India was much removed from primitive speech. As a matter of fact, the Aryans of old had attained a relatively high stage of culture. Again, all the terms in Mueller's list denote actions or states. Now, substantives or nouns came before verbs, for as Farrar observes: "The invention of a verb requires a greater effort of abstraction than that of a noun.....We cannot accept it as even possible that from roots meaning to shine, to be bright, names were formed for sun, moon, stars, &c." Plainly, therefore, we must seek in far lower levels of culture for any approximation towards the speech of aboriginal man. In the words of Prof. Sayce, in "all savage and barbarous dialects, while individual objects of sense have a superabundance of names, general terms are correspondingly rare."

In the infancy of our race, as in the infancy of our children, the principle of onomatopœia—the formation of sounds or words which mimic and resemble the things signified—must have operated on a very extensive scale. Most of these primitive terms have become obscured as their applications have been enlarged. The same is to some extent true of the various interjections so naturally expressive of our several states of feeling or emotion. To a biological disciple, Darwin imparted some interesting particulars concerning one of his own grandchildren which prove how terms of onomatopœtic origin employed by the young become obscured as they become generalized. Thus:—

> The child who was just beginning to speak, called a duck "quack"; and by special association, it also called water "quack." By an appreciation of the resemblance of qualities, it next extended the word "quack" to denote all birds and insects on the one hand, and all fluid substances on the other. Lastly, by a still more delicate appreciation of resemblance, the child eventually called all coins "quack," because on the back of a French sou it had once seen the representation of an eagle. Hence, to the child, the sign "quack" from having originally a very specialized meaning, became more and more extended in its signification, until it now serves to designate such apparently different objects as "fly," "wine," and "coin."

A mere modicum of scientific insight is, therefore, needed to grasp the significance of Goethe's aphorism that the original meanings of words slowly wear away like the letters and image on a piece of money. And there remains this further fact to be observed with reference to imitative names, that in the early stages of articulation, the words derived from the sounds they mimicked, in large measure depended upon accompanying gestures for their complete intelligibility. Apart, however, from conjectural cases, overwhelming proofs exist of the onomatopœtic origin of numerous words in ancient, modern, and savage languages. Needless to state, such imitative terms are most common in uncivilized speech. To the formation of articulate language onomatopœia, instinctive cries and calls, and capricious naming have all contributed. Words otherwise entirely destitute of meaning are invented by most children to name recepts or pre-concepts, and many of these arbitrary inventions will persist in families and among neighbours as nicknames generations after their original significance has been obscured or forgotten.

A Note on Wilde's "De Profundis."

THERE are some people who like to think that every one of us in this world gets precisely what he deserves. No doubt, for many of us, this is true enough; but it is emphatically not true for the man of genius. Let us look for a moment at one or two examples. The official life of Walter Pater, a refined scholar and a master of English prose, is written, not as one would expect, by Mr. Gosse or Mr. Arthur Symons, but by a Mr. Wright, of Olney, who was apparently intended by Nature for the biographer of some company promoter or pushing "captain of industry." Pater may not have been the saint his friends are so anxious to make him out to be, but even Dante would not have punished him in so barbarous a fashion. Again, what had that dapper little prig, Canon Ainger, in common with the exquisite humourist and Freethinker, Charles Lamb? What he ought to have written was the life of another prig, say that of Jowett, who was not only a prig himself, but the fruitful cause of priggishness in others. That would have been a sort of poetic justice. But it may be that Nature is an ironist, and loves a paradox even better than does our friend Mr. Chesterton.

In the case of Oscar Wilde, all the moral depravity in the world would not justify the philistine denigration of his biographer in the Dictionary of National Biography. With a few honourable exceptions, notably an article by Mr. Ernest Newman in the Free Review (1895), and Mr. Ransome's little book, Wilde has suffered more than any other writer from vulgar and incompetent scribblers. He is just beginning to get the criticism he deserves. Still, it must be pointed out that he himself was partly to blame for the niggardly appreciation of his critics. He always found pleasure in saying—paradoxically, perhaps—that he had put his genius into his life, and into his books merely his talent. He said this so frequently, and it was echoed so faithfully by men of letters and journalists, that it came to be accepted as the truth by even the most intelligent of his critics. It was therefore possible for M. Andre Gide, in 1901, to insist upon reminding his French readers that Wilde was not a writer of any value. By 1910 the French critic's opinion had been profoundly modified, and he deplored the unjust severity of his earlier opinion. We are at last coming to see that Wilde stood in closer relation to the artistic ideals and inspirations of his time than any other writer; that he is a more representative man of letters than Pater, largely because of his richer vitality; that his prose style is perfection; that he handles the English language in his Intentions and De Profundis with a natural grace and a command of subtle rhythms that make even some of the finest styles appear lumbering and monotonous.

It must have been noticed by anyone who has given attention to the attitude of the critics to Wilde's work that many of his detractors were quite certain that they could detect the note of insincerity in De Profundis. But the charge of insincerity is as easy to make as it is difficult to make out. Some objected to the style as out of keeping with the subject. Others were annoyed by the paradox; the incoherence in the thought. They could not see that if Wilde had thought and written in any other way—that if his style, for instance, had been as plain and as unlovely as that of some of his critics—the charge of insincerity would have had a solid foundation. It was not the sort of book the critics would have written, therefore it was insincere. Imperfect sympathies have never been too scrupulous. The critics more or less unconsciously found insincerity where there was only inconsistency.

De Profundis, whatever else it may not be, is patently sincere. It was written, Mr. Ross tells us, during the last moments of Wilde's imprisonment. It was his last work in prose. The manuscript passed into the hands of Mr. Ross, but it was not printed in its entirety. The omitted portions, or a part of them, were made public through an incredibly foolish libel action. For the student of Wilde's work, there is as much of him in De

Profundis as there is in the Intentions. And yet the two books are, in some respects, worlds apart. The earlier one, written in his most prolific period, when his genius was at its highest and clearest, has all that exquisite feeling for form, all the blitheness, the acumen, the varied knowledge, which made Wilde as great, if not a greater, critic of art than J. A. Symonds or Walter Pater. De Profundis seems, in some respects, the antithesis of Intentions; M. Gide calls it a palinode. Throughout it is extremely confused and incoherent; the broken utterance of a man whose lamentable suffering has exhausted his cerebral energy. It is written in tears of blood. The saddest and deepest emotions of the human heart are vibrant on every page. Although for many of us analysis is an essential factor in all criticism, it seems rather unreasonable to bring to a book like De Profundis the test of absolutely clear thinking. From first to last Wilde was as much an impressionist as Ruskin. At times they both thought and spoke of the reasoning faculty as a kind of machine, and prided themselves on saying the first thing that came into their heads. It is futile to reject the good in such writers as Wilde and Emerson because they are not, as De Quincey would say, non-sequaceous. Inconsistency is, no doubt, irritating to the merely rational type of mind; but we do a foolish thing if we reject wisdom and beauty when they do not reach us by the way of a logical train of thought, by the discussive understanding. But a discussion of the claims of intuition or insight as against an abstract intellectualism, however interesting it may be, is outside the scope of this informal note.

Separation and Divorce.

[The following letter, written in reply to a communication from Lord Halifax, was refused publication by the Times. It has been sent to us with an application that it might be allowed to appear in the Freethinker, and we gladly comply with the request. The writer might have concluded appropriately with the following extract from an article which appeared in the Fortnightly Review for January, 1890, by the eminent churchman, Archbishop Magee: "It is not possible for the State to carry out, in all its relations, literally, all the precepts of Christ, and a State which attempted this, could not exist for a week." But if there be any person who maintains this, his proper place is in a lunatic asylum, and the only person called on to discuss this question with him would be his medical attendant.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

Sir,—Lord Halifax is undoubtedly correct in asserting that a very large number of people will oppose, "to the very utmost of their power," any legislation for the relaxation of the matrimonial bond. Large numbers opposed "the damnable heresy" of the Copernican Theory and the teaching that the world was spherical, and "the very utmost of their power" went to the extent of burning, at the stake, Giordano Bruno. The abolition of slavery was gained in the teeth of bitter opposition; the use of chloroform was strenuously opposed when it was first discovered; the education of the masses has plenty of opponents even yet. Cremation—the most sanitary method of disposal of the dead, marriage with a deceased wife's sister, the advance of scientific research, have all been assiduously opposed, and the antagonists of all liberal evolution have nearly always claimed God as their ally—very similarly to the way in which the Kaiser has constituted him his ally in the cruelties of Louvain and the present War generally. To ask you to give space for arguments would be more than inconsiderate, but I hope you will permit me to make two points. There may be such a thing as "holy matrimony," there is certainly such a thing as *un*holy matrimony, and it is the latter, not the former, on which the reformers seek to lay hands. Most of those whose opposing voices are heard on all occasions where reforms and benefits to suffering humanity are advocated, are in complacent ignorance of the suffering it is sought to alleviate:—

> The toad beneath the harrow knows
> Exactly where each tooth-point goes;
> The butterfly, upon the road,
> Preaches contentment to the toad!

To some of us, the suggestion that "God has joined together" many of the ill-assorted couples we know of is little short of blasphemous. It is an accusation of failure and incompetence. The next point is the amazing "lesson" which Lord Halifax has learnt from the War, viz., "that the real welfare of mankind depends on adherence to Christian principles"! This, the most murderous of all wars, a crime which has staggered the world, was engineered and is being prosecuted by adherents to Christian principles. No Buddhist, Confucian, Hindu, Mohammedan, Taoist, Parsee, Animist, or Jew, has had anything to do with it except to follow the dictates of the Christian nations. It is preeminently a war of the Christian nations. And yet Lord Halifax is conservative enough to suggest the old, old remedy of the hair of the dog which has bitten. I am not attacking the teaching of Christ. There is a limitless difference between the teaching of Christ and Christian teaching. Nietzsche once said: "There was one Christian; he died on the Cross."—Your obedient Servant,

Correspondence.

"COMMUNION WITH THE DEAD."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—I should like, if you will allow me to do so, to congratulate you upon the Freethinker. Until a copy of it came into my hands a few weeks ago, I did not know that any publication existed where plain facts are so simply and frankly stated. I once wrote the sentence, "I believe that those who are capable of thinking should think for themselves," and was jeered at by the reviewers for having uttered a self-evident truism. Yet there is nothing, in my experience, less free than thought. Probably not one man in a hundred thinks for himself upon every subject.

I am puzzled, however, by the attitude taken by your paper, which in other respects exhibits a conspicuous and refreshing freedom from prejudice, towards the question of the survival of personality over death. No real Freethinker, as it seems to me, can have a prejudice; he must approach every proposition on its merits, and either accept or reject it or suspend his judgment after weighing the evidence. In regard to matters resting solely upon "revelation," there is no evidence to be weighed; therefore, the Freethinker, bringing everything to the tribunal of his reason, is justified in brushing them immediately aside. But the question of the survival of personality is fundamentally a scientific question. It rests ultimately, not upon "revelation," not upon vague and pious beliefs, but upon experience. It rests also, in some measure, upon logic. Thus: If a thing once exists, it must always exist, for annihilation is inconceivable; you cannot turn something into nothing. The human personality is an existing, positive thing. How, then, can it be annihilated? It may be transmuted or disintegrated, certainly. But why is it more scientific that a thing should be transmuted or disintegrated than that it should remain what it is?

Mr. W. Mann's articles on this subject are clever, but they are candidly ex parte, they betray prejudice. They make no pretence to be judicial or investigatory. So far as I have read them, and so far as I know, there is nothing stated in them which is not true. But there is much omitted that is also true. By such selective methods as Mr. Mann permits himself to use, it would be easy to make it appear that the idea that the earth moves round the sun is stupid and farcical.

It is known—if for a moment, for convenience, I may look at the subject from an angle which appears to beg the question—that memory is carried over in a very imperfect state; it is known, too, that communications become involved with mental stuff belonging to the subconscious strata of the person through whom they come; and it is known, of course, more generally, that the world holds any number of impostors who are prepared to prey upon human credulity. It is unnecessary for Mr. Mann to labour those points; they form part of the data with which the investigation of this subject is approached. Nevertheless, your contributor thought it worth while, for example, to devote a whole article to the case of Mme. Blavatsky, who was exposed by the Society for Psychical Research so long ago as 1885.

If Mr. Mann has formed a deliberate opinion on this question, after weighing all the evidence available, and wishes to elucidate it for those who have not had similar opportunities or have not his analytical gifts, he should fasten, not on the incorrect statements, but on the true ones, those regarding matter demonstrably outside the possible knowledge of the percipient which have been verified—he will find a great quantity in the twenty-nine volumes of the impartial records of the Society for Psychical Research—and offer his alternative explanation. For it is the true statements that form the crux; anyone can explain the false ones. If responsibly conducted experiments had produced only one per cent. of veridical statements, they would amount to a considerable mass in the aggregate, and would need to be explained. But I think they have produced considerably more than one per cent. I myself have carefully studied the records of many of the investigations exhaustively reported in the voluminous Proceedings of the Society of Psychical Research; and I cannot but say, as an honest witness, that after all the incorrect statements and all the non-evidential matter have been eliminated, and after the theories of telepathy and of the "subliminal consciousness" have been stretched to the extreme (far further than the results of experiments warrant), there emerges a very considerable residuum, to explain which the prima facie hypothesis of discarnate communicating intelligence stands at present alone in the field. If Mr. Mann, instead of labouring admitted facts and telling us things which everybody knows or could know, apparently for no purpose—I hope I am not doing him an injustice—but to sow prejudice, will deal with this difficult residuum, he will be writing to the furtherance of the understanding of mankind, and, incidentally, will show that he approaches his task without bias and is thinking freely.

One word in conclusion. If anyone should have a thought that I may be inclined to superstition, will he read The Rationalist, my last published book?

BIRTH-RATE AND INFANT MORTALITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In his letter last week, Mr. McGhee has brought up a number of interesting points to set against the contention that high birth-rates and high infant mortality rates are in close correlation, and, doubtless, there are exceptional instances where the direct correlation between the two is obscured. It is, however, only by taking statistics for millions of people of all classes, over long periods, that we can arrive at a true generalization.

So far from the Jews having a high birth-rate, in Mr. Israel Cohen's book, Jewish Life in Modern Times, (Methuen, 1914), we find the following: "Although modern Jewry has such a favourable record in regard to morality and disease, it has a remarkably diminishing birth-rate, which is lower than the birth-rate of the general population in all the countries of Europe," which statement he then supports by the actual figures.

Ireland, also, is decidedly not a high birth-rate country. For the period 1881-1906 her birth-rate was between twenty-two and twenty-four per thousand. There are many parts of Ireland where families are large, and, as Dr. Prudence Gaffkin remarked in the Carnegie Report, infantile mortality is not deplored in Ireland, where the life here is considered but a prelude to the world to come, and the babies that are cut off short have at least gained the boon of everlasting life. Miss Rebecca West in the Sunday Pictorial of June 3, advises mothers to "disregard the advice of bishops who are unable to grasp the implications of the fact that the eight European countries with the highest birth-rate are also the eight with the highest infantile mortality rate." The most effectual answer to the whole argument would be to show a country that has a high birth-rate and low infantile mortality rate. Where is it?

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
> Name.....
> Address.....
> Occupation .....
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Views and Opinions.

Agnosticism Once More.

We were quite alive to the consideration that in dealing with Agnosticism versus Atheism we were inviting comment, and arousing dissent. But that is not a bad thing, even among friends; and it would be a queer kind of Freethought which could not indulge now and again in a dispute without the sacrifice of good temper or without gaining a clearer conception of the point at issue. So we do not regret that our reply to Mr. Clodd in the Freethinker for September 9, with the couple of "Acid Drops" in the issue of September 16, have caused several readers to write us on the subject, the general tenour of which communications is well represented by Mr. J. Blair Williams' letter on another page. For these correspondents, and we daresay for many others, the matter remains where it was. It may remain in the same position even after another, and for the time being final, attempt; but an endeavour to induce clarity of thought—with either writer or reader, or both—can never be quite wasted effort.

Clearing the Ground.

Let us clear the ground a little by pointing out that the dispute is one that is forced on the Atheist by the Agnostic; it is not the other way about. "Atheist" is a very old word with a very definite meaning. "Agnostic" is a very new word with a very ambiguous meaning. And the Agnostic forces the Atheist to defend himself by declaring that "Agnostic" is a more correct, a more philosophical, description of the non-theistic mind. It is on this point that the Atheist joins issue. He asserts that the older term is a quite correct one; that "Agnostic," in relation to the belief in God (we wish to emphasize this) is "Atheist" over again, and that the Agnostic only produces an apparent justification of a preference for the new word by misrepresenting or misunderstanding the older one. We do not, of course, mean that the misrepresentation is deliberate; but it is there all the same. And the proof is that, whenever the Agnostic attempts to justify his rejection of belief in "God," he is forced to restate the atheistic position, and whenever he attempts to justify his repudiation of Atheism, he invariably misstates it. As to the Christian Theist, he is a past master of misrepresentation, and one takes his conduct as a matter of course. But one may be excused looking round for a bludgeon or a whip when avowed Agnostics like Mr. William Archer—in the midst of an attack on Mr. Wells for not thinking clearly!—talks of those who deny progress as "the true and irredeemable Atheists." One cannot but feel suspicious of this readiness to join with Christians in tacking "Atheist" on to everything that is considered objectionable.

A Suspicious Origin.

Now, it is difficult for anyone who considers the way in which the word "Agnostic" gained currency in this country to resist the conviction that the underlying motive was to find a word that should not be offensive—or not so offensive as "Atheist"—to the religious ear. Spencer presented the religious world with his "Unknowable" as an object of worship—one of the greatest jokes in the history of philosophy. Huxley, always with a hankering after the "respectable," says he invented the word because he wished to proclaim that he knew nothing about "God." And a very acute French observer of English life, M. Emile Boutmy, has well pointed out that in France both Spencer and Huxley would have called themselves Atheists, and no one would have dreamed of calling them anything else. And it must be observed that on the Continent there is no vogue in Agnosticism. That remains substantially an English commodity. This cannot be because the Continent is behind England in philosophic strength or subtlety. French observers would not hesitate to say that in these matters English timidity is notorious.

Agnosticism and Atheism.

Mr. Williams does not agree that in relation to the belief in God "there are only two positions—either one believes in a God and is a Theist, or one does not believe in a God and is an Atheist." And he grounds his disagreement on the fact that before one can disbelieve one must have some idea of what is the subject of our disbelief. Granted, with all my heart. And that is precisely what every responsible Atheist has always said. When a Theist has come along and assured the Atheist that there exists a God who is omnipotent, or omniscient, or is a "First Cause," or who is "pure mind," etc., the Atheist has replied "I disbelieve in any such existence, because its existence is as impossible as a square circle or a round triangle." These things are all unthinkable. And if the Theists asks further do you believe in any "God," the reply of the Atheist has always been that "God" by itself means nothing at all. And of that which carries no meaning, neither affirmation nor denial, neither belief nor disbelief can be admitted. Both etymologically and philosophically an Atheist is one without belief in a God. The Agnostic is also without God. And we are still waiting to discover the difference between the two. It is not we who say that the Agnostic is wrong in being without a belief in God, it is the Agnostic who says the Atheist is wrong and attempts to prove it by stating Atheism in a way which all Atheists repudiate.

The Origin of God.

But our principal complaint against Agnosticism is that it so often connotes hesitancy where hesitancy ought not to exist. Mr. Williams rests his Agnosticism on the ground that "God" is a meaningless term, and with that we agree. But there are others who treat it as a case of suspended judgment. These say they neither affirm nor deny, they simply do not know. And we have been for years asking this class, and now ask again, what will they do with all that we know of the origin of the God-idea itself? Let it be remembered that the belief in God did not commence as an abstraction. Primitive gods are concrete enough in the minds of their worshippers. They only become abstractions as the process of development shows the original ideas to be quite untenable. But here is the question to which we desire to direct attention. Knowing, as we do, the conditions that gave rise to the belief in gods, we also know that the belief in gods represent a mistaken interpretation of known facts. These facts are still with us. But they are differently understood. But if this be admitted, what other basis is there, or has there ever been, for a belief in God? We know of none. And must not the Agnostic, who, with the Atheist, accepts the statement that the belief in gods sprang from a misunderstanding of natural facts, subjective or objective, physical, mental, or social, must he not dismiss the whole belief in God or gods as pure myth? There is really nothing to suspend judgment about. It is not a case of the Agnostic saying to the Atheist or the Theist, we confess our ignorance of what you are quarrelling over. The present state of knowledge concerning the origin and development of the gods gives the fullest warranty for dismissing the theory of God as pure delusion and nothing else. No one professes Agnosticism in relation to witches, or wizzards, or fairies, or gnomes. Will someone explain what better foundation there is for the belief in gods, or why the same mental attitude is not correct in all these instances?

The Simple Issue.

For the rest, while we quite agree with Mr. Williams that before a proposition admits of belief or disbelief, its terms must be realizable in thought, we do not see that this has any special claim to be called Agnosticism. It is a rule of mental guidance; or, if you will, a law of thought. Agnosticism implies this, as does Atheism, as does all thinking, for the thinking which ignores it is only pseudo-thought. In the sense with which we are concerned with the word, Agnostic is only of significance in relation to the belief in God. And here the matter resolves itself into a simple and definite issue. All the gods of the various religions are to Atheist and Agnostic alike admittedly myth. There is no hesitation here, there is no room for suspension of judgment, there is no room for doubt. We can say with absolute certainty that we disbelieve in their existence. Our correspondent will, we doubt not, say so, Mr. Clodd will say so, so would Huxley, or Spencer, or Stephen. And, with regard to any other conceivable Deity, the position is the same, for so soon as the proposition is stated within the limits of conceivability, it is seen to be on all fours with asserting the existence of square circles or four-sided triangles. Once more the Atheist and the Agnostic are at one. And in relation to anything else, i.e., some unknown inconceivable sort of existence, no one can believe or disbelieve, because no one knows what is affirmed. Thus, so far as "God" is used in a legitimate manner, and so far as it falls within the limits of conceivability, belief or disbelief follows. We can see no room for any middle term. And for the Agnostic to say that his Agnosticism implies want of knowledge of, or want of belief in, something which defies conception, would be to make Agnosticism more absurd than its bitterest enemy has yet asserted.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Reformation in Scotland.

II.

OUR main and most essential contention is that the Protestant Reformation was an exclusively human movement, being a revolt against ecclesiastical tyranny and corruption. In Scotland it was an aristocratic movement, designed to crush the combined power of Church and Crown, because the supreme object of both was to demolish the nobility. It was simply in self-defence and in order to wreak vengeance upon their tormentors that the nobles became Protestants. The Earl of Angus was banished and his estates were confiscated, while the Earl of Caithness had to confront an expedition sent out to destroy him. The Douglas family endured ruthless persecution at the hands of James V., and all members thereof were forbidden to approach "within twelve miles of the king, under pain of death." Buckle says:—

> In 1531, the king deprived the Earl of Crawford of most of his estates, and threw the Earl of Argyle into prison. Even those nobles who had been inclined to follow him, he now discouraged. He took every opportunity of treating them with coldness, while he filled the highest offices with their rivals, the clergy. Finally, he, in 1532, aimed a deadly blow at their order, by depriving them of a large part of the jurisdiction which they were wont to exercise in their own country, and to the possession of which they owed much of their power. At the instigation of the Archbishop of Glasgow, he established what was called the College of Justice, in which suits were to be decided, instead of being tried, as heretofore, by the barons, at home, in their castles. It was ordered that the new tribunal should consist of fifteen judges, eight of whom must be ecclesiastics; and, to make the intention still more clear, it was provided that the president should invariably be a clergyman (History of Civilization in England, vol. iii., pp. 56, 57).

It was such royal deeds of deliberate persecution, done at the suggestion and with the full approval of the Church, that converted the nobles to Protestantism, rather than any disinterested desire to reform the Church. After they had adopted the principles of Protestantism, they were persecuted as heretics, not merely as political enemies. On this point Buckle is most emphatic:—

> The love of innovation was encouraged by interested motives, until, in the course of a few years, an immense majority of the nobles adopted extreme Protestant opinions; hardly caring what heresy they embraced, so long as they were able, by its aid, to damage a Church from which they had recently received the greatest injuries, and with which they and their progenitors had been engaged in a contest of nearly a hundred and fifty years (Ibid., vol. iii., p. 58).

Keith, in his Affairs of Church and State, states that "several of our nobility found it their temporal interest, as much as their spiritual, to sway with the new opinions as to religious matters."

By the year 1560 the Reformation had been well established in Scotland, after a long-continued and painful struggle. In connection with the movement, two men stand out from among the crowd as born leaders, namely, Cardinal Beaton and John Knox. Beaton was eleven years older than Knox, and his public career closed tragically when the other's was about to open. The Archbishop was one of the ablest and most cunning men of his day, and his loyalty to the Catholic Church was beyond question. His enemies describe him as an unprincipled man, and by their testimony even Buckle is not uninfluenced. That he was immoral cannot be denied, for, though a bachelor, he was the father of many children; and of this fact he was by no means ashamed. In the year 1546, he gave his eldest daughter in marriage to the eldest son of the Earl of Crawford, and in the marriage articles, signed with his own hand, he boldly called her "my daughter." And there are evidences not a few that he was dishonest, even a forger. Like most men in authority at that time, he was capable of the most horrible cruelty to Protestant heretics. George Wishart (1513-46) was a Lutheran divine, who, in 1543, went on tour through Scotland, preaching Protestant doctrines. At Dundee, Montrose, and other places he made numerous converts. The Cardinal pursued him with biting hostility, and ultimately had been arrested at Ormiston. The poor man was kept in prolonged captivity; but in 1545, or 1546, he was tried and sentenced to death as a vile heretic. From a window in the castle the Archbishop witnessed the burning of the man he so cordially hated. The persecution was carried out on an extensive scale, but the majority of those who suffered were nobles.

George Wishart was the "spiritual" father of John Knox, "the most conspicuous character of those troublous times." In the estimation of not a few people, John Knox occupies a nitch by himself in the Temple of Fame as the greatest Scotsman that ever lived. We readily admit his sincerity, fearlessness, outspokenness, and incorruptibility; but Lecky does not hesitate to speak of him as "this apostle of murder" (The Rise and Influence of Rationalism in Europe, vol. ii., p. 44). It is well known that in the spring of 1545, a conspiracy to assassinate Archbishop Beaton was formed by the leading Protestants; but it was not until a year later, May 29, 1546, that the foul murder was actually committed "under circumstances of horrible mockery and atrocity." Protestant historians are very fond of relating that the Cardinal passed the night before his assassination with his mistress, Marion Ogilby, who was seen leaving his chamber shortly before the murderers, Norman Leslie and Kirkaldy of Grange forced their way into the castle; but they are not so ready to admit that when the French came to arrest his assassins who held the castle, John Knox was among them, and was taken as a prisoner to France. The fact is that he gave his sanction to the dark deed performed, and was, to a great extent, responsible for it. Nor are we surprised at this, for his whole life bears witness to his sternness, brutality, and unrelentingness. With what undisguised delight he stigmatized "the pestilent Papists and Massemongers" as "adulterers and whoremasters," whom he perpetually pointed at as objects of execration and ridicule. "One mass," he exclaimed, "is more fearful to me than if 10,000 armed enemies were landed in any part of the realm." Not only were priests prohibited from celebrating, but worshippers were by law prohibited from hearing mass, under pain of the confiscation of their goods for the first offence, of exile for the second, and of death for the third. The permission given to the Queen of Scotland to hear mass in her own private chapel was publicly characterized as an intolerable evil. John Knox was of opinion that those who were guilty of idolatry might justly be put to death, and for his authority he fell back upon the Old Testament. Listen to the following extracts from his Appellation.

> None provoking the people to idolatry ought to be exempted from the punishment of death.....The whole tribes did in verie dede execute that sharp judgment against the tribe of Benjamin for a lesse offence than for idolatrie. And the same ought to be done wheresoever Christ Jesus and his Evangill is so receaved in any realme province or citie that the magistrates and people have solemnly avowed and promised to defend the same, as under King Edward of late days was done in England. In such places, I say, it is not only lawful to punish to the death such as labour to subvert the true religion, but the magistrates and people are bound to do so onless they will provoke the wrath of God against themselves.

Then he called upon the nobles of Scotland not to spare the sword of justice, but to pay due heed to his accusation against the "bishops and the whole rabble of the Papistical clergie of idolatry, of murther, and of blasphemie against God committed."

After the assassination of Archbishop Beaton, Knox was condemned to the French galleys, and he was a prisoner in France for eighteen months. On his release, on the recommendation of Edward VI., he came over to England. When Mary Tudor ascended the throne he went to Geneva, where he stayed for nearly eighteen months, visiting such centres as Zurich and Frankfort-on-the-Main. In 1555 he returned to Scotland, where his advocacy of Protestantism was so full of bitterness and bigotry that he was compelled to quit the country. He sought refuge once more at Geneva where he spent some three years. During his absence the nobles worked hard in the dissemination of the new doctrines. They drew up a covenant, in which they vowed to stand by one another in their resistance to the tyranny that threatened them. Then they asked John Knox to return, which he did not do till 1559, by which time the nobles had practically won the victory for Protestantism. One of the first things the Reformer did after his arrival was to preach a sermon at Perth, which was followed by a riot resulting in the plundering of churches and the destruction of monasteries. Then a war ensued between the two religious factions which ended in the triumph of the Lords of the Congregation. Perth, Stirling, Linlithgow, and Edinburgh fell into their hands. Erelong the Protestant religion gained the supremacy in Scotland.

With such a history in mind who can honestly believe that the Reformation in Scotland was the work of God? It was simply a violent contest between two sets of superstition which differed but little the one from the other. Other struggles followed between Presbyterianism and Episcopacy, and between different schools of Presbyterianism. But in none of the religious revolutions and sectarian disputes through which Scotland has passed was there the slightest evidence of any supernatural interference. Scotland is still in the throes of a mighty conflict, not between two types of ignorant and superstitious faith, but between reason and credulity, between natural knowledge and supernatural belief, and we are confident that the outcome of it will be the complete downfall of supernaturalism, and the happy enthronement of the natural.

No great improvements in the lot of mankind are possible, until a great change takes place in the fundamental constitution of their modes of thought. The old opinions in religion, morals, and politics are so much discredited in the more intellectual minds as to have lost the greater part of their efficacy for good, while they have still life enough in them to be a powerful obstacle to the growing up of any better opinions on those subjects.—J. S. Mill.

I pray thee then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow men.
—Leigh Hunt, "Abou Ben Adhem."

"THE old guard dies, but never surrenders." The famous saying leaps to the memory at the mention of the name of the lion-hearted Richard Carlile. The story of his struggles is a part of the history of Freethought, and it is a romance of a hero fighting at fearful odds against "the whips and scorns of time, the oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely," and leaving an imperishable name. Carlile's was the true soldier's temperament, supported by the unshakable principles without which no great purpose can be achieved. No misfortune disconcerted him; no defeat cowed his indomitable spirit. He could not be bullied or frightened, although Freethought was fighting for its very existence in the days when he fought the good fight. Superstition, effectively disguised in the ermine of the judge, was strong in the land, and contemptuous enough of the little band of heroes and heroines, whose evangel has revolutionized every branch of knowledge, and rewritten the intellectual history of the world. In the darkest days of the Freethought Movement, Carlile and his colleagues never lost courage, for they knew the longer they lay in prison the greater triumph would be won for the cause they had at heart.

Think of it! Richard Carlile himself suffered nine and a half years' imprisonment for championing freedom of speech. His wife and other members of his family, and shop assistants, divided among them fifty years' confinement in gaols And what a man was the leader, that vivid, vital, radiant, restless, dynamic personality; all aglow with enthusiasm, who diffused energy all about him, and whose very presence caused stimulation.

A son of the West Country, Richard Carlile was self-educated. As a boy, he collected faggots to burn in effigy "Tom Paine," the Guy Fawkes of that period, whose virile writings were in after life to influence him so greatly. For he was twenty-five years old before he began to read Paine, whose books roused Carlile like a trumpet-blast. Henceforth he was the dauntless champion of Freethought and free speech. Taxes were then placed on knowledge, and fine and imprisonment faced all who dared to speak or write of religious or political liberty. England was then ruled by a crazy king, a profligate regent, and a corrupt government; but Carlile, a poor man, defied the Cerberus of Authority, and broke the fetters of press despotism. For, remember, the press to him was not a mere purveyor of news and dirt and scandal. It was a vehicle of ideas, a pulpit from which the evangel of liberty could be proclaimed with tongue of fire, a trumpet whose clarion note would summon men and women to the unending battle against wrong.

Alive in every fibre, Carlile was the very man to carry a forlorn cause to victory. Handcuffed and imprisoned, he roused the public conscience, and compelled the all-powerful authorities to cry "halt." It was impossible to suppress him; it was but punching a pillow. When a score of his assistants had been sent to prison for selling Freethought literature, the prosecuted books were sold through an aperture, so that the buyer was unable to identify the seller. Afterwards the volumes were sold by a slot-machine, probably the first of its kind. Among the books for sale were Paine's Age of Reason, Annet's Life of David, Voltaire's pamphlets, Palmer's Principles of Nature, and many other thunderous engines of revolt. When his stocks were seized by the authorities, Carlile read nearly the whole of Paine's Age of Reason in his speech for the defence, so that additional publicity should be given to the matter which was sought to be suppressed. Nor was imprisonment the only punishment inflicted, for fines, amounting to thousands of pounds, were imposed. To annoy his persecutors, Carlile dated his letters from gaol "the era of the carpenter's wife's son." Superior folk may lift their eyebrows at such audacity; but the fiery, restless courage which accounted for it is a quality which the world can very ill spare. What it can achieve needs no record; it is recorded on history's page in a life and actions as courageous as any recorded in the immortal pages of Plutarch. Fighting the embattled hosts of superstition, the victory remained to Carlile. Writing from gaol in the sixth year of his imprisonment, he was able to say, "All the publications that have been prosecuted have been, and are, continued in open sale." What matchless courage! "The sound of it is like the ring of Roman swords on the helmets of barbarians." Small wonder that the two greatest poets of his time, Keats and Shelley, recognized that he was a true hero battling for intellectual liberty.

Carlile's victory over his opponents was so complete that his later years were spent in comparative peace at Enfield, where he died in 1843. True to the end in his devotion to science and humanity, he bequeathed his body to Dr. Lawrence for the purpose of dissection and the advancement of knowledge. His funeral at Kensal Green Cemetery was the occasion of an exhibition of clerical spite. At the interment the Rev. Josiah Twigger appeared and insisted on reading the burial service. "Sir," said the eldest son, Richard, "we want no service over the body of our father; he lived in opposition to priestcraft, and we protest against the service being read." The clergyman persisted, and the last insult of the Church was hurled at the dead hero. Carlile's brave wife survived him only a few months, and she was buried in the same grave. Thus ended the career of one who, as Browning has it, was "ever a fighter," strenuous, eager, unsparing, often bitter and hard; but he had, as was said of Byron, the "imperishable excellence of sincerity and strength."

Such heroism was not without result. Twenty-three years after Carlile's death organized Freethought was an accomplished fact, for, in 1866, the National Secular Society was founded, the first President being the able and courageous Charles Bradlaugh. Under his leadership, and that of his brilliant successors, this Society has ever been in the vanguard of progress, sheltering behind it all the weaker heterodox people, who otherwise had been crushed by the weight of orthodoxy. Behind militant Freethought all forms of advanced thought have advanced to some measure of freedom. It has been a prolonged battle against enormous odds. As the little Revenge earned an undying name by hurling herself against the great battleships of Spain, so the Secularists have displayed extraordinary courage in attacking the tremendous armada of superstition. The greater the perils, the greater the victory; and in the ripe years to come recognition must be given to the superb courage, which, disregarding any reward, was satisfied with the proud knowledge that their action would diffuse the blessings of liberty to countless thousands. For in that happy time the stormy note of struggle and contention will be changed to the unfaltering trumpet-notes of ultimate victory. In that hour Carlile's noble dream will have come true, and the National Secular Society will share with him a lasting place in the history of intellectual progress by bringing it within the realities of life. So true is it:—

The greatest gift the hero leaves his race
Is to have been a hero. Say, we fail?
We feed the high tradition of this world,
And leave our spirits in our children's breasts.

The Rise and Progress of Mental Power.

Paradoxical as it may appear, the unit of language is not the word, as we understand that term, but the sentence. Thus the sentence is older than the words which compose it. But this apparently puzzling assertion loses much of its novelty when we discover that every separate term was primitively a proposition, because it constituted by itself, and of itself, a sign capable of conveying an affirmation. The sentence-word of aboriginal man, like the terms employed by our children, formed the raw materials from which the later parts of speech were developed. When infants commence to speak, as even Max Mueller recognized, a word such as "up" is to the child's mind "noun, verb, adjective, all in one. If an English child says Ta, that "ta" is both noun (thanks), and a verb (I thank you)." Another sentence-word is the infantile Ba-ba for sleep. But, as Prof. F. Mueller points out, this sentence-word "does not mean sleep only, as a particular kind of repose, but rather also all the circumstances which appertain to sleep, such as cot, bed, bolster, bed-clothes, &c." Infants and the uncivilized eke out their crude sentence-words with gestures which help to indicate the different meanings they attach to the same term.

As languages are traced further and further backwards their structures steadily become simplified. Suffixes, affixes, prepositions, in fact all those parts of speech which denote relationship between the several parts of a sentence, progressively shrink and disappear. When all these relational words have vanished, objective terms and their adjuncts alone remain. Gradually even the verb becomes indistinguishable from the substantive, while the adjectives become completely fused with the nouns. As we wander back in time, then, the more closely we approach the period when our various parts of speech were simplified into the primitive sentence-word. This last was the nucleus from which all the involved grammatical structures of the higher languages have arisen. Or, as Geiger puts it, "language diminishes the further we look back in such a way, that we cannot forbear concluding it must once have had no existence at all."

All contemporary philologists would, probably, subscribe to the foregoing reflections on the natural genesis of languages both living and extinct, and increased light is thrown on the problem by the study of the speech of savage man. That first-hand student of uncivilized tongues, Dr. Bleek, became convinced that all primitive words were concrete in character, and that every abstract term is the result of later growth. The evolutionist anticipates that the earliest language signs were concerned with those physical phenomena directly presented to the senses. Now this is exactly what he does find, while the more complex symbols arose with an advancing civilization. It is noteworthy that the famous John Locke, in his work on Human Understanding, foreshadowed more recent conclusions in this matter. For he states that:—

> It may lead us a little towards the original of all our notions and knowledge, if we remark how great a dependence our words have on common sensible ideas; and how those which are made use of to stand for actions and notions quite removed from sense, have their rise from thence, and from obvious sensible ideas are transferred to more abstruse significations, and made to stand for ideas that come out under the cognizance of our senses.

Even in a highly specialized tongue, such as English, the relics of gesture language still linger. The word supercilious, for instance, literally means a man who raises his eyebrows. As Clodd observes, from A to Z, our dictionaries are crammed with examples of the concrete roots from which ethical and philosophical terms have arisen. The highly abstract term "time" is related to the physical act of stretching an elastic body. Mallery and others adduce innumerable evidences of the same character from the languages of savage races. As a matter of fact, no word is known whose etymology can be traced which is not derived from a concrete root.

Further testimony is supplied in existing speech, for the Society Islanders use separate terms for sheep's-tail, dog's-tail, bird's-tail, etc., but have no word for tail itself. The Mohicans possess words which signify different modes of cutting, but are without the verb "to cut." The Eskimo, the natives of Australia, and numerous other races are remarkably deficient in abstract terms, and despite all the disadvantages of their lumbering languages the concreteness of their speech seems positively requisite to their rude intelligence. And this poverty of abstract words is more than compensated by a multiplicity of objective terms. While the Tasmanian tribes had a distinct name for each kind of tree—gum-tree, wattle-tree, etc., no term for tree itself existed in their tongue, "nor could they express abstract qualities, such as hard, soft, warm, cold, long, short, round." (Vocabulary of Aboriginal Tribes of Tasmania, p. 34). As Sayce sums up the subject:—

> All over the world, indeed, wherever we come across a savage race, or an individual who has been unaffected by the civilization around him, we find this primitive inability to separate the particular from the universal by isolating the individual word, and extracting it, as it were, from the ideas habitually associated with it.

The prodigious part played by the sense of sight in the progress of human brain power has been noted by several naturalists who have surveyed the subject from the standpoint of anthropology. Geiger reached the same conclusion from the view point of the linguist. It is not claimed that human or semi-human vision is necessarily superior to that of birds or quadrupeds but that man, owing to his erect posture and other attributes, more constantly employs his eyes than other animals. The experiences of infants are enriched as they gaze intently at objects placed in their hands, or follow with their eyes the moving existences within their range of vision. To an animal so observant as early man, thought Geiger, it became natural to employ gestures and grimaces for purposes of communication, and that from these arose movements of the mouth of a sympathetic character which, in turn, gave rise to sounds to which some special significance became gradually attached. In any case, it is certainly suggestive that the creature to which the visual sense is most important is also the creature which has enormously outdistanced all others in the sign-making faculty. Articulation once attained, however rudimentary its form, the path was clear for future progress. When once begun, this advance would, probably, proceed at an ever-increasing rate; gesture and vision would constantly supplement each other, while the division between man and his closest kindred would widen more and more.

Darwin's wonderful powers of penetration are splendidly shown in the appended passage from his Descent of Man. "I cannot doubt," he says, > that language owes its origin to the imitation and modification of various natural sounds, the voices of other animals, and man's own instinctive cries, aided by signs and gestures.....Since monkeys certainly understand much of what is said to them by man, and, when wild, utter signal cries of danger to their fellows; and since fowls give distinct warnings for danger on the ground, or in the sky from hawks.....may not some unusually wise ape-like animal have imitated the growl of a beast of prey, and thus told his fellow-monkeys the nature of the expected danger? This would have been a first step in the formation of language.

Conceivably, song also may have assisted in the evolution of articulation. Some of the apes utter what to them seem musical sounds. Calls, cries, shouts, and sounds expressive of endearment when embracing the female were other factors involved in the genesis of speech. It is certainly significant that all sounds which express purely emotional states proceed from the throat and larynx with small, if any, assistance from the lips and tongue. The earliest efforts towards articulation were, probably, chiefly composed of vowel sounds, and from these the liquid and, finally, the lingual consonants very gradually emerged. It is worth noting in this connection that in our own language it is quite impossible to pronounce the name of a single consonant without the aid of vowel sounds.

Clicks, again, must have formed a conspicuous part of all primitive speech. The clicking noises so prominent in the languages of the Bushmen and Hottentots of South Africa were carefully investigated by Dr. Bleek, and this authority states that the clicks which occur in most of their words are so important to the anthropologist that their thorough study is essential if science is to possess "even an approximate idea of the original vocal elements from which human language sprang." Prof. Sayce is convinced that these savage clicks still show how the sounds of speechless man could be employed to embody and communicate ideas. For when we bear in mind the Bushman's inarticulate clicks "it would seem as if no line of division could be drawn between man and beast, even when language is made the test" (Introduction to the Science of Language, ii., p. 302). After deprecating the comparative neglect among naturalists of the study of monkey language, in a letter to Dr. Bleek, Haeckel remarked that among the numerous sounds made by apes he had himself "frequently heard in zoological gardens, from apes of very different species, remarkable clicking sounds, which are produced with the lips, and also, though not so often, with the tongue."

In view of the preceding considerations, we may justly infer that given an animal slightly, or not at all superior to the higher apes in intelligence, but more erect in posture, and possessed of stronger social instincts than they; then the genesis and development of that speech which has played a part so tremendous in man's progress is fully accounted for without the least necessity for any mystical intervention whatsoever.

I HAVE been reading Byron, and I am again impressed with the thought that the Shakespeares and the Byrons are more honoured in the breach than the observance. The Bible is not the only neglected book. We honour the pigmies and slight the giants—all those unresentful dead, and over whose marble brows no hectic of a moment passes, but yet who win a terrible and undesired revenge; witness the War and the warriors, the widows and orphans; the pomp and circumstance, the misery and woe. Burns wished,—

> That I for poor old Scotland's sake
> Some useftn' plan or book could make
> Or sing a song at least.

Ours is, as perhaps was his, a wider wish. Cervantes smiled Spain's chivalry away. O for a new Cervantes to rid the world of this—this—this.....

I have been listening to the wind. There is wisdom in it—I speak metaphorically. It sounds every note, harmonizes every discord of life, rebukes every folly, and goes its viewless, careless, austere, incalculable way. Solemn in the echoing rumble in the chimney-top, in the solemn mood, as the Thinker sits by the fire that lisps and whispers as its red glow turns to grey, silent at last and dead while the requiem sounds, or we list the menacing march of the hosts of the air onward from and to all time and all eternity, under the black flag and stars of night or day's bright banner of blue. Robust and rousing at times, soothing and sweet, tender and tuneful, it is yet of the melancholy wind I speak, the prophetic, because remembering, the wise old wind! It goes for ever, and for ever comes, crooning its deathless lament, mingling with the memory of the long martyrdom of man, visiting every field of the dead, straying in every churchyard. Behold they know not anything, these dead; but even from the tomb the voice of Nature cries, and the wind grows yet more pregnant, poignant with the stilled yet clamorous innumerable voices of the past, and of those millions freshly slain.

Nor will the ocean yield its dead. As the first drowned seaman slept, he is sleeping now; the last will sleep as long.

> With Earth's first Clay they did the Last Man knead,
> And there of the Last Harvest sowed the Seed:
> And the first Morning on Creation wrote
> What the Last Dawn of Reckoning shall read.

But the tides remember, and the waves recall their sea-green sepulture; and, in the majesty of the ocean's voice, the silent sleepers, in hyalline halls and caves, become articulate for evermore!

And meanwhile the priestly Hence is growing more shadowy and dim, or vulgar and grotesque. It is lost in the noise of the winds and the waters of the present, in the thunders of cannon, the crash of wreckage, the yells of exultation and of agony; and in the midst of all the pious landshark prowls, grinding the faces of the poor. Now is the accepted time; here and now is the place and time and need of salvation. Awake to the perils of to-day, ye dreamers of to-morrow!

It is the sweet o' the year, and I have also been consulting the flowers. The yellow, sun-loving dandelion in hosts, and bevies of beauty by the rough line-side. Rude slag and iron contrasting with an enchanted atmosphere of green and gold. These, too, will pass like all the loveliest and best. But riches fineless are as poor as winter to him that ever fears he shall be poor; and so we e'en make the most of what we may yet spend. Nature, in due course, will stow us all away, and out of our crude clay may fashion more beautiful things. Meantime we may acquire—as a writer in the R.P.A. Annual suggests—that toughness of mind upon which the reasoning processes depend. In the words of John Keats—and one wonders how so young a mind could be so sage—we must learn,—

> To bear all naked truths,
> And to envisage circumstance all calm;
> This is the top of sovereignty.

Let us recognize the plain truth then, that it is these supernatural ideas that have obscured morality, corrupted politics, hindered the advance of the sciences, and extinguished happiness and peace, even in the very heart of man.—Holbach, "System of Nature."

The German reply to the Papal peace note is what might have been expected. Christian cant is answered by Christian cant. The Pope's Christian heart is torn at the sight of Christian nations butchering each other. The German Government's Christian conscience, after the sinking of hospital ships, the bombing of hospitals, air-raids over open towns, etc., yearns for a time "when moral strength" will take the place of "the might of arms." Cant meets cant, and then goes on its way, behaving in every respect as of old. And people ask, "Is Christianity a failure?"

And while these two Christians are exchanging hollow professions, another pietist, Mr. Horatio Bottomley, visits the Front, and comes back with the following:—

> I was talking with a young university undergraduate. He had left his college because his King and Country called him. "Shall you go back after the war?" I asked. He smiled, and pointing to the scene around us—we were in the trenches—said, "Go back? Isn't this a sufficient education for any man? I knew nothing before the war." There you have it. Neither did I. But in one week I have had my education. I know all I want to know—of life and of death.

Assuming the incidant to be a genuine one, if we were as pious as Mr. Bottomley, we should say, "God help the nation in which its young men regard the education of the battlefield as of more importance than that of the university!" Fortunately, the men who are going through what Mr. Bottomley calls "Hell" have for the most part drawn a different moral from their experience. Were it otherwise, it would indeed represent the supreme triumph of Prussianism—education in war the supreme thing in life. Mr. Bottomley himself is on a different level. The War brought him to God; it convinced him of immortality. Therefore he is thankful. Let's hope God is equally so.

A "Padre" writes to the Daily Mail complaining that in two plays now running the parson is represented as "a sort of village idiot." He complains also at Captain Bairnsfather not finding a better type of parson than he puts into his plays. All we can say is that Captain Bairnsfather is at the Front, and knows the average parson. "Padre" points to the casuality and honours lists. But we do not see that these disprove what is alleged to be the general type of parson in the War.

The Woolwich Crusade, under the control of the Bishop of Southwark, has been a stupendous failure. Among those taking part in it were the Archbishop of Canterbury and nine Bishops, who between them receive salaries amounting to upwards of £40,000 a year. There were three canons, seven noted clergymen, and over 150 other speakers. This illustrious galaxy of parsons and their satellites selected Woolwich for their objective as being "in some sense a testing-ground, upon the success or failure of the Church's great enterprise in which operations of far wider scope and importance depend." It was essentially a clerical or professional campaign, laymen being conspicuous by their absence. A Church Times report said that "lay speakers, men who can and will speak plainly to their brethren about the things that matter, bearing witness for God and his Church, are lamentably few in the ranks of the Crusaders," and that "their absence is disastrous."

In the Church Times for September 14, the report of the mission was not at all optimistic. Reference was made to "the Church's failure," and to "the appalling mass of indifference and ignorance which the Church has to meet and overcome before she can even begin to touch and convert the people of England." In the same journal for September 21, we are informed that "the stage of indifference has passed," and that now "the workers of the country regard the Church with undisguised hostility." The writer admits failure, but claims that "it is the failure—not of the Church, of course; she can never fail—but of men and women who represent her in their day and generation." We, for our part, confess our utter inability to distinguish between the Church and the men and women who represent her, for, surely, without such men and women there would be no Church.

The most noteworthy fact in connection with the Woolwich Crusade is that the Woolwich people actively resented and resisted it, regarding it as a brazen insult to their intelligence. When the Churchmen held open-air meetings in Beresford Square, the workmen held opposition meetings, and great was the ensuing turmoil. Even Bishops were asked awkward questions which they had not the courage to answer. Every now and then a speaker was asked, "Are you a workman?" "Are you a democrat?" The answer being in the affirmative, the next question was: "Then why don't you support your own class?" "The poor Churchman's efforts to justify himself were met with a continuous fusillade of, 'What about the Bishops' £15,000 a year?' 'What work have they ever done?' 'Look at 'em: never done a day's work in their lives.' 'Got soft jobs and we have to find the money.' 'Why are they trying to get at us now? They never troubled about us before. They're frightened the game's up.'"

The Church Times is entirely mistaken on two points. The Church is the most colossal failure in history. From the very start until now she has never been what she claims to be—a supernatural, world-renewing institution; she has always been, on the contrary, a world-disturbing and war-inciting factor. Another error fallen into by our contemporary is that there is or can be a Christianity apart from the Church, for the former is, without a doubt, the creation of the latter, and both, being equally false, are doomed to perish together. They who desert the Church renounce Christianity. Like most sensible people, the Woolwich workmen are hostile to the parsons because they are the official champions of an effete system, the fancied need for which we have outgrown.

A "Jewish Rabbi," aged nineteen, was handed over to the military authorities, and fined forty shillings, at the North London Police Court. In cross-examination the "minister" said that when he registered he described himself as a dealer in crockery, but he had never done any dealing, and did not intend to. It was also stated that the Chief Rabbi had no knowledge of the defendant. The ennobling effect of religion is sufficiently apparent in this case.

"It is a bad year for kings," says a writer in the Daily News. Including, presumably, God, the Invisible King.

Bishop Welldon persists in regarding Germany as anti-Christian, and says she is "the enemy of all Christian civilization." Yet a schoolboy of fourteen ought to know that Germany, Austria, and Bulgaria are all Christian nations, and the former the home of the Protestant Reformation.

N.C.O., who is probably a parson, writing to the Ardrossan Herald on the superstition of "The Evil Eye," remarks that the evil eye (or jealousy) was not unknown even in the "glorious company of the apostles." "But for 'the evil eye,'" he says, "there might have been no tragedy of the Cross." And therefore, of course, no "salvation of the world." Of two tragedies choose the least; but it seems to us the comedy overwhelms both.

We congratulate the Isle of Man Weekly Times on some of the articles appearing in its columns. In one of a series of articles on the "History of Douglas," the writer has some asides which will probably rouse the anger of Christians of all denominations. Thus, apropos of the effect of the War on religious belief, the writer of the articles says:—

> When, in the hour of trial and sorrow, the people should have returned in vast multitudes to the faith of their fathers, the tide has been all the other way. And no wonder. Have we not seen the Head of the largest Christian congregation in the world, so far from raising a voice for his suffering children in Belgium, siding—cruelly, painfully, and obviously siding with the oppressor? At home, have we not heard the black-clothed advocate of conscription for the other chap, calmly taking shelter himself behind the barrier of his priestly caste, and avoiding, with the connivance of his Archbishop, all share in the active forces of his native land?

We said at the time that the clergy made a terrible blunder in demanding exemption while acting as recruiting sergeants, and events have quite justified what we said.

Here is another paragraph from the same article:—

> The war, therefore, so far from strengthening religious conventions, has weakened them. At the outbreak of hostilities our Bishop traced the fault to a material-minded Germany, wholly oblivious to the fact that in no other land in all the world are the people so well grounded in Bible knowledge and Christian observances as they are in Germany; oblivious, too, of the fact that every evil act of the Kaiser in Belgium was an expression of exact obedience to the injunctions laid down by the God of the Bible. On the other hand, France, Agnostic France, where no Roman father is permitted to harry the sick and dying, as is the rule with our men, has conducted her warfare on lines that accord with modern civilization, not with the dark ages or the outrageous injunctions of the God of the Israelites, as expressed, say, in 1 Samuel xv. or Psalm lviii.
> The simple truth is that the war has shaken the foundations of all our faiths, and the inability of preachers to answer any one of the questions with which they have been deluged, has had its inevitable results. The priests' game is up. To-day we have no more faith in the Kaiser's God than we have in the God about whom Samuel spoke so gliby to Saul in Israel.

When articles of this description are admitted to the ordinary newspaper press, we may well count ourselves on the eve of a Freethought revival.

The late Rev. Dr. Hunter, formerly of the Weigh House Chapel, London, has been eulogised as "a pioneer of the New Theology." The most notable thing about the New Theology was that many of its points were anticipated by Paine and other Freethinkers a century earlier.

Many hard things have been said of science and its relation to the present War, principally by the clergy and their followers. It is, therefore, pleasant to find the Sunday Pictorial drawing attention to what science is actually doing. Our contemporary says, "The (British) Medical Service knows neither race nor colour or creed." The same thing could be said of the Medical Service in other armies than the British. What a contrast to the treatment of patients at some religious convalescent homes where they are forced to attend services.

The clergy prate of the blessings of poverty, but have no personal objection to substantial banking accounts. The late Rev. George Millar, of Pimlico, left £28,260. Another parson, Canon Edwards, of Lambeth, left £12,037.

It is said that, as shown by the returned papers, over 50 per cent. of the people lack either intelligence or education enough to fill up the sugar forms properly. One needn't go further for an explanation of the prevalence of Christianity and other things.

The City Temple has now a regularly-appointed woman preacher in the person of Miss Maudie Royden. There is quite a rollicking sound about the name, although we dare say the lady is demure enough. We would suggest to Miss Royden that a very interesting subject for a series of discourses by her would be the position of woman under the Christian Church from the fourth to the nineteen century.

Mr. Arnold Stephens, of Sutton, Surrey, is a Christian who has had the temerity to write to the Christian World for September 20 in decided depreciation of prayer-meetings, and in justification of non-attendance at them. He even ridicules the idea of meeting on Saturday night to "ask God a dozen times to bless the services of the coming Sabbath." He even casts doubt upon the efficacy of prayer, saying: "Many humble congregations in town and country continue in prayer, and also continue to see empty seats, because they lack the human conditions of success." We congratulate Mr. Stephens upon the manly courage and good sense displayed in his fine letter. What will Mr. Spurr have to say to it?

We don't know anything of the Rev. O. Rhodes, of Morpeth; and, judging from the sample lying before us, we have no great desire for enlightenment in that direction. In the Church Magazine for September, this gentleman says:—

> There are heaps of people in lunatic asylums, and there are heaps of people who can see no further than their nose. Such are the people who do not see their way to go to church.

When a man talks in that fashion, he is in a bad way. And we must remind Mr. Rhodes that people in lunatic asylums do not object to going to church. All lunatics are religious. An atheistic lunatic is unknown. We do not mean by this that Atheists do not go insane; only that they are not Atheists afterwards. And as for stupid people—well, whoever heard of stupidity as being a bar to church attendance? Many a man has been turned out of church for being too wise; but when was one turned out for being too stupid? And is not Mr. Rhodes himself in "Holy Orders"? It is bad to set up a thesis when one stands as its living disproof.

The officials of the British and Foreign Bible Society report that none of its branches in any enemy country has been closed during the War. Considering the statement, so widely circulated, that Germany had deliberately repudiated Christianity, simple folk will be surprised at the news. Others know the statement to be a deliberately concoted falsehood. Germany is as Christian as ever. If it were really less Christian, it would be far better than it is.

Charles Newland was, last week, sentenced to three years' penal servitude for bigamy and theft. Newland had been a "missioner" to marryings, and had often preached at services. Judge Rentoul said it was the worst case he had ever tried. We hope Judge Rentoul will bear this and other cases in mind when he has occasion to reflect or remark upon the relations of morality and religion.

The creation of a Jewish regiment appears to be as wise as to enrol a regiment of Catholics or of Wesleyan Methodists, or Plymouth Brethren, or Swedenborgians, or Muggletonians. In any event let us hope that the Jewish soldiers do not emulate the military heroes of the Old Testament.

Providence doeth all things well. The North China Daily News states that, owing to floods, three millions of people are homeless and destitute, and the number drowned cannot be estimated.

At the request of the Government, Doctors' Commons is granting marriage licenses "three at the price of one," says a newspaper paragraph. Does this suggest a return to Old Testament ideals of marriage?

The Advisory Committee of Coalville, Leicestershire, Tribunal are stated to have gone on strike owing to the War Office having secured exemption for six able-bodied monks at Mount St. Bernard Monastery, three of whom were passed for general service, and three for home service. Why is the War Office so solicitous concerning these monks when lay Christians receive such scant courtesy? Already 50,000 ministers of religion are exempted.

The clerical mind is deserving of attention on account of its infantile qualities. The Rev. A. M. Mitchell, Vicar of Burton Wood, near Warrington, writing in his parish magazine, says, "At an appalling time like the present, the fourth year of war, when parts of Europe are literally drenched with blood, some of the more superstitious among us would not be surprised to see blood-rain fall from the clouds." We wonder how many Christian folk look up to the Rev. A. M. Mitchell as a pastor and master?

"A man of seventy-two is not old nowadays," said the Chairman of the City Tribunal. In the giddy days of Adam and Methuselah he would have been still younger.

To Correspondents.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

September 30, Swansea; October 7, Failsworth; October 14, Leicester; October 21, Manchester; October 28, London; November 4, Abertillery.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—October 7, Birmingham; October 14, Swansea.

D. GOUDIE writes: "Allow me to congratulate 'Mimnermus' on his well written and pointed reply to H. G. Wells." We pass on the congratulation with the utmost pleasure. Mr. Wells must have felt himself in a bad way to strike out as he did. Writing for the religious, he probably felt anything would do. But he should have remembered that others might read him.

S. CLOWES.—We have no intention of altering the price of the Freethinker unless something quite unexpected and serious occurs. As you say, we must not lose a single possible new subscriber. We thank you for what you have done and are doing to gain new readers. We are much encouraged by your letter, as by the many others we have received during the past week or so.

J. ROSEBERRY.—Your letter proves that you have grasped the essence of what constitutes a Freethinker. A man may be as much a bigot on the right as on the wrong side. It is not what a man believes, but how he believes, that makes for intellectual salvation.

E. THURLOW.—We are flattered at you thinking no other man "could or would" stand the strain of present circumstances. We prefer to think that many would: and as for could, that is a question of endurance, and we have strong hopes in that direction also. A great idea finds a suitable instrument sooner or later.

W. J. HEPWORTH (Johannesburg).—Pleased to know you received parcel safely. Delays are unavoidable nowadays. Thanks for cutting.

L. EDMUNDS (Hong Kong).—We have a number of readers in various parts of China, but no regular agent there for this paper.

C. HARPUR.—If we are right in defining Atheism as being without belief in God, and Theism as having a belief in God, how can we be accused of "cocksureness" in writing as we did?

G. RUSSELL.—Thanks for report. It is like the resurrection of one's dead sins, but in this case we are glad to see them.

ALAN TYNDAL.—We quite share your appreciation of T. H. E.'s neat disposal of Dr. Robertson Nicoll.

J. H. ENGLISH.—We only know one way of stopping a parson talking nonsense, and that is to enlighten his congregation. Thanks for papers.

SAPPER CHEETHAM.—We are glad to have your help, and hope that peace will soon release you for other work.

G. F. LAWES (Vancouver).—The travelling evangelist is much the same everywhere. And that is not surprising, seeing that he can only appeal to the same class everywhere. An intelligent man would never undertake the job, or if he did, would soon give it up. Pleased to hear from you.

C. D. WESTON.—Paper is being redirected as requested. We saw the cutting you were good enough to enclose, but did not comment on it at the time.

C. W. MARSHALL.—Thanks for the good work you are doing in spreading abroad the Freethinker.

W. J.—It is not a question of attractiveness but of accuracy. And we think the word selected precisely defines what is the scope of this paper.

THOTH.—Chained Bibles were once very common—at a time when books were both scarce and expensive.

H. SHAW.—Shall appear. Thanks.

J. BURY.—Exactly, "every drop" tells, and many bearers help to lighten the burden.

J. GIBSON.—See "Acid Drops." We may return to this gentleman later.

H. BLACK.—Sorry we wrote "March 21" as the opening date of the Manchester lectures. It should, of course, be October 21.

E. B. sends us the following version of the lines quoted in last week's Freethinker, and which he says he has had by him some years. We think them an altogether better version:—

"And God blessed Noah and his sons, and said unto them be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth."—Genesis ix. 1.

King Solomon and King David, they both led naughty lives;
Each had three hundred concubines, and eke one hundred wives.
When they arrived at riper age, they both were seized with qualms,
So, one he wrote the Proverbs, and the other wrote the Psalms.

A. J. MARRIOTT.—The worst of opening such a discussion would be, that if it were thorough it would carry us into questions that lie outside our legitimate purpose. Other matters are receiving attention.

C. BARTRAM.—Glad to hear from you and to know that you are well. Try and keep so.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

WANT of time and space prevents our printing more than a bald list of subscriptions this week. We have a number of letters from which we should like to quote, but they must of necessity wait for our next issue. And for the reasons already given we must bespeak the patience of a number of correspondents whose letters, for the moment, remain unanswered. Meanwhile, it is pleasing to note that our subscription list is a very representative one, although I am sure there are very many more who mean to figure therein before we write "Finis" to the Fund.

Third List of Subscriptions.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Sugar Plums.

The Birmingham Branch of the N. S. S. opened its season with two fine meetings in the large town hall on Sunday last. Mr. Cohen's lectures were listened to with evident appreciation, and, it is to be hoped, will lead to new members for the local Branch. A new departure is being made in the arrangement for four Sunday evening meetings in the Repertory Theatre Station, Market Street. This course will be opened on October 7 by Mr. Lloyd, and will be closed by Mr. Cohen on November 18. Mr. E. C. Williams will lecture there on October 21, and Mr. F. C. Willis on November 4.

To-day (September 30) the Branch is holding a social evening in commemoration of Charles Bradlaugh, at the Cafe Oriental, Hill Street, at 6.30 There will be speeches, and light refreshments will be served. The meeting is not reserved for members. Friends will be warmly welcomed.

To-day (September 30) Mr. Cohen lectures twice in the Dockers' Hall, High Street, Swansea. The hall is a large one, and we hope local Freethinkers will do their best to see that it is filled. The afternoon subject, at 3, is "Christianity Before and After the War"; the evening one, at 7, "Do the Dead Live?" Admission is free, with a charge for reserved seats.

In the Freethinker for September 16, when referring to the death of the only son of Mr. and Mrs. Harden, we gave his rank as captain. In this we were in error, his rank being that of lance-corporal, D.C.M. The statement appeared in citing from a letter in connection with the Sustentation Fund. We regret the blunder, although we have no doubt that had Lance-corporal Harden lived to see further service, our description would have been anticipatory.

Liverpool Freethinkers are asked to note that a meeting to consider work for the winter season will be held at the Clarion Cafe, Cable Street, at 5.45 on Saturday, September 29. It is probable that many of our readers will receive their paper in time for the meeting, and we hope they will make a point of being present.

We fancy that our readers would be surprised did they know how many copies of this paper are with the British troops on the fighting fronts. Indeed, we might be surprised ourselves. We know that we have sent out, and are still sending, a goodly number, and that we should have sent many more had means permitted. We have good reason for knowing that copies of the "One and Only" are welcomed, widely read, and well discussed. We shall be greatly surprised if, when peace comes, it does not bring us many new readers and warm friends.

One of our readers, who receives the Freethinker regularly from home, writes his father:—

> I am enclosing a couple of pages of two different Freethinkers, both of them carried over the top, one of the 7th June and the other 16th August. On neither occasion, I can honestly tell you, did my opinions alter for one moment. Some people tell you that before going over, the biggest Atheist will send up a prayer, and all that rot. Don't you believe it. I suppose this last time over I had as narrow an escape as I ever wish for, but even at that terrible moment I trusted to a clear head and sane thinking, and put on one side all thoughts of God or the Church.

We are glad to learn that carrying a copy of the Freethinker over the top had quite as preservative an effect as the traditional copy of the Bible. Some time ago we sent this correspondent our best wishes for his safety, and we are flattered by his saying that he would sooner carry this paper into action than the best prayer-book ever issued.

A reference to our Guide Notice will show that from the platforms of all the London Branches of the N. S. S. the subject of "Charles Bradlaugh" will be dealt with from various aspects. Charles Bradlaugh was born on September 26, 1833, and died, all too soon, on January 30, 1891. As the number of those who had the honour of knowing him personally of necessity grows smaller, the influence of his life and work increases, and the world at large is just beginning to realize what a power he was for good in the cause of Progress.

We are asked to state that the Whist Drive arranged by the North London Branch N. S. S. as taking place on October 3 has been postponed. Notice will be given when a new date is arranged.

If you must pray.....pray for a healthy mind, for healthy limbs, courage, contempt of death, a Soul that deems mere length of days to be the least and last of Nature's gifts, a Soul that is steadfast under the heaviest load, that never knew anger, has no desires, and would go through the griefs and savage toils of Hercules rather than court vice, banquets, pageantries. That which yourself can for yourself procure, I show you. One road, one alone, is sure to end in peace of mind. It is the road of Virtue, free to all of us. No God is wanting if the man be wise and good. Fortune is not a Goddess on a throne in heaven. That's an invention of our own.—Juvenal, Satire 10.

A Note on Wilde's "De Profundis."

(Concluded from p. 605.)

THE amazing importance Wilde gives to sorrow as a factor in life and art is only the outcome of his personal experience unchecked by reason. Had he not been the victim of enraged British virtue, we should have heard little about the wonderful virtue of sorrow. His work is in itself a plain refutation of his assertions. It is fairly arguable that the best side of it is in its blitheness, its expansiveness. But let us see how far he can go in the way of paradox. "Prosperity, pleasure, and success," he tells us, > may be rough of grain and common in fibre, but sorrow is the most sensitive of all created things. There is nothing that stirs in the whole world of thought to which sorrow does not vibrate in terrible and exquisite pulsation. The thin beaten-out leaf of tremulous gold that chronicles the direction of forces the eye cannot see is in comparison coarse. It is a wound that bleeds when any hand but that of love touches it, and even then must bleed again, though not in pain. When there is sorrow there is holy ground.....Sorrow and all that it teaches is my new world.....I now see that sorrow, being the supreme emotion of which man is capable, is at once the type and test of all great art.....There are times when sorrow seems to me to be the only truth.

He points to passages in his books whereby this so-called truth is prepared or foreshadowed. It is incarnate, he tells us in the prose-poem of the man who, from the bronze of the image of Pleasure that liveth for a moment, has to make the image of the Sorrow that abideth for ever. "It could not be otherwise," he goes on; "At every single moment one is what one is going to be no less than what one has been." M. Andre Gide, however, has pointed out this prose-poem (The Artist) embodies a truth diametrically opposed to that of the De Profundis. It was out of the bronze of the image of Sorrow that endureth for ever that the artist fashioned an image of Pleasure that abideth for a moment. How pathetically eloquent is this curious lapse of memory of a mind overwrought by sorrow! Wilde's insistence on the spiritual value of humility is, I think, only another indication of a slackening of nervous tissues, of failure from sheer weariness. We see nothing of the old Wilde, in spite of his claim to individualism, in this passage:—

> I find hidden somewhere away in my nature something that tells me that nothing in the whole world is meaningless, and suffering least of all. That something hidden away in my nature, like a treasure in a field, is Humility. It is the last thing left to me, and the best; the ultimate discovery at which I have arrived, the starting point for a fresh development.....It is the one thing that has in it the elements of life, of a new life, a Vita Nuova for me. Of all things it is the strangest. One cannot acquire it, except by surrendering everything one has. It is only when one has lost all things that one knows that one possesses it.....My nature is seeking a fresh mode of self-realization.....I hope to be able to recreate my creative faculty.

The creative faculty of Wilde was to be recreated once more, and once only in the moving Ballad of Reading Gaol. The dominant notes of this great poem is not a Christian and servile humility, the negation of sane individualism, but, rather, a fierce demand for "common justice and brotherhood." What is more, the careful reader will find even in the pages of De Profundis itself many proofs that the old natural spirit of pride was not extinct. How little humility is there in this indictment of people who hounded him to death:—

> Many men on their release carry their prison about with them into the air, and hide it as a secret disgrace in their hearts, and at length, like poor poisoned things, creep into some hole and die. It is wretched that they should have to do so, and it is wrong, terribly wrong, of society that it should force them to do so. Society takes upon itself the right to inflict appalling punishment on the individual, but it also has the supreme vice of shallowness, and fails to realize what it has done. When the man's punishment is over, it leaves him to himself; that is to say, it abandons him at the very moment when its highest duty towards him begins. It is really ashamed of its own actions, and shuns those whom it has punished, as people shun a creditor whose debt they cannot pay, or one on whom they have inflicted an irreparable, an irremediable wrong. I can claim on my side that if I realize what I have suffered, society should realize what it has inflicted on me.

There is no perverse Christian doctrine of self-sacrifice or humility here, for Wilde was, what so many members of the Roman Catholic faith are, a natural Pagan, for whom religion had no meaning. "The faith that others give to what is unseen," he tells us,

> I give to what one can touch, and look at. The gods dwelt in temples made with hands; and within the circle of actual experience is my creed made perfect and complete.....When I think about religion at all, I feel as if I would like to found an order for those who cannot believe; the Confraternity of the Faithless, one might call it, where on an altar, on which no tapir burned, a priest, in whose heart peace had no dwelling, might celebrate with unblessed bread and a chalice empty of wine. Agnosticism should have its ritual no less than faith. It has sown its martyrs, it should reap its saints, and praise God daily for having hidden Himself from man. But whether it be faith or agnosticism, it must be nothing external to me. Its symbols must be of my own creating. Only that is spiritual which makes its own form.

The idea Wilde has of the real or mythical founder of Christianity, the Jesus of the Gospels, is as fanciful as that of Renan, whose Life of Jesus he wittily describes as "that gracious fifth gospel, the Gospel according to St. Thomas." For Wilde, as for Renan, Jesus was a divine dreamer, a poet of whose company are Sophocles and our own Shelley. To hold up their Lord as the supreme type of the artist must seem something very like blasphemy to all good Puritans if they happen to overcome their natural distrust of art and glance at Wilde's writings. They see in Jesus only the hard moralist, the forerunner of Jonathan Edwards, just as for our friends the Christian Socialists he is a sentimental Communist, the prototype (shall I say?) of Mr. Phillip Snowden. For Wilde, as also for many of us who avoid Socialism as we would the plague, he is an Individualist, like every artist who has imposed his vision of things upon the world. Not only was he an artist—he was also a Jew. And the Jew, with his vivid consciousness of racial difference, of the peculiar value of his contribution to the world's thought and work, with his intense pride of possession, intellectual and material, does not seem to be cut out by Nature for a Communist. If he has at times become the prophet of socialistic millenniums, it has been invariably in the interest of some revolutionary cause. I can hardly imagine a company of Jews, even the least sophisticated of the race, as quietly agreeing for one day to share all things in common; but I can imagine the more sophisticated ones using their persuasive eloquence to turn their enemies into Socialists. However that may be, Jesus was bracketed with Heine as a good Communist. But as, for Wilde, Communism was merely a preparation for a sort of artistic anarchism, and not an end in itself, there is not much gained, from the point of view of Socialism, by claiming Jesus and Heine as Communists.

Wilde was a Catholic, and for that reason more than half a Pagan. Catholicism, we are told by Remy de Gourmont, "is Christianity paganized." "A religion," he goes on to say, "at once mystic and sensual, it can satisfy and has satisfied for ages, the two primordial and contradictory tendencies of human nature, which are to live both in the finite and the infinite, or to put it in more acceptable terms, both in sensation and intelligence." De-paganized Christianity, or Puritanism, with its virulent hatred of every expression of the joy of life, every artistic impulse, Wilde distrusted as essentially unsocial. Instead of the Pagan miracle, the work of art—the only miracle upon which Wilde and we Freethinkers set any value—the Gospels give us the unnecessary miracles of raising a man from the dead, the bacchic conjuring of water into wine, the stupid bedevilment of an innocent drove of pigs, and suchlike pieces of trivial irrealism. The Christian miracle is a reality for those only who have never got beyond childhood; the Pagan miracle, a play by Sophocles, an ode by Catullus, take on a new meaning, a new beauty, as we ourselves grow in wisdom. The teaching generally of the Gospels exasperated and tormented the humanist in Wilde, and his most mordantly ironic parables were written to discredit in every sense the idealism of Christianity by setting it over against the naturalism of Pagan thought. This attitude is brought out clearly in one of of the prose-poems, "The Doer of Good," which has not a little of the subtlety of symbolism we admire in Nietzsche and Baudelaire.

> It was night-time and He was alone.
> And He saw afar-off the walls of a round city and went towards the city.
> And when He came near he heard within the city the tread of the feet of joy, and the laughter of the mouth of gladness and the loud noise of many lutes. And He knocked at the gate and certain of the gate-keepers opened to him.
> And He beheld a house that was of marble and had fair pillars of marble before it. The pillars were hung with garlands, and within and without there were torches of cedar. And he entered the house.
> And when He had passed through the hall of chalcedony and the long hall of feasting, He saw lying on a couch of sea-purple one whose hair was crowned with red roses and whose lips were red with wine.
> And He went behind him and touched him on the shoulder and said to him, "Why do you live like this?"
> And the young man turned round and recognized Him and made answer and said, "But I was a leper once, and you healed me. How else should I live?"
> And He passed out of the house and went again into the street.

And he passed out of the city.

And when He had passed out of the city he saw seated by the roadside a young man who was weeping.

And He went towards him and touched the long locks of his hair and said to him, "Why are you weeping?"

And the young man looked up and recognized Him and made answer, "But I was dead once and you raised me from the dead. What else should I do but weep?"

GEO. UNDERWOOD.

Biddy's First Communion.

ON the first Sunday of last May, little Biddy Murphy made her first communion. It was a beautiful morning, and as I was going for a stroll in the warm sunshine, I met Biddy and her mother coming home. I had never seen the child in anything else but rags and hand-me-downs, and here she was, all in spotless white, a very blushing bride. I gave her a sixpence, and told her how beautiful she looked, and to be sure to let my children see her pretty dress.

Biddy is not convincing as a bride. Her rosy cheeks, straight black hair, and roguish eyes seem to ask for scarlet and yellow, beads, sequins, bracelets, and a general appearance of the world and the flesh, of gratification and indulgence instead of self-sacrifice, renunciation, of God and the cloister. Now, had it been my Margaret, that would have filled the picture, for she has golden tresses, cerulean blue eyes, a delicate skin, and an ethereal expression—surely that's the correct combination for something angelic. If I were a scoundrel, I would paint a picture of Margaret in her nightie, kneeling at a bedside in a room in which was prominently displayed a framed portrait of a soldier, a beam of light from a mysterious source falling on the sweet upturned face and irradiating her hair. The title of the picture would be "Our Father," and it would carry conviction to thousands of hearts.

Now, to be truthful, Margaret is a perfect little devil (bless her!) with not the faintest spark of reverence in her composition, and Biddy may be naturally pious for aught I know.

I could see at a glance the tawdry nature of the dress; but after all, hadn't she everything complete—white shoes, gloves, stockings, veil, etc.? Biddy was delighted with the sense of her own importance, and her mother was too proud of her to think anyone could possibly be nicer.

The Murphys live above us, in the same house as we do. They occupy what is known as the "two-pair back," while we, being quite "classy," occupy the front and back "drawing-rooms." Only those who have experienced the advantages of the Dublin tenements can appreciate the social distinctions involved.

There being a rule that tenants perform some communal cleaning, and as my wife won't do it, as I'll be damned if I'll do it, and as Mrs. Murphy asks to be allowed, for a consideration, to do our dirty work, then she "does" the stair regularly. Not that it is any cleaner after she is finished, but it is probably as badly done as it deserves to be.

Mind you, Mrs. Murphy is not a professional char-lady. Her husband, however, a hard-working man, does not "earn" enough to keep his wife and six children in a sufficiency of bread and margarine. Therefore, that she may care more for the kiddies, the mother neglects them early and late, to earn coppers by the equal distribution of mud, ironically called "cleaning." Mrs. Murphy always wears dark clothes—they "don't show the dirt," and are, in consequence, more hygienic than light garments—and, poor soul, is very shabby.

There is one thing I have never ceased to marvel at during my sojourn in Dublin slums, and that is the simply wonderful way mothers dress and turn out their children from homes that are a disgrace to civilization. What a brave face these women put on their poverty, and how grossly they are labelled for the acts of the few for whom the conditions are overpowering!

On that beautiful Sunday in May, I saw scores of little children, of the class of Biddy, walking out with their proud grown up relatives, and I did not see a mother who was even tolerably well clad. And yet they were done up in their best. Although the day was oppressively hot, the long coat concealing any amount of raggedness was much in evidence. Hats of a few seasons ago had been faked up to make them presentable. Travesties of creations in all conscience, but now quite bizarre when rejuvenated with bits of obviously new and incongruously coloured trimmings. The feet were frowsy. Low shoes are not for the poor, as poverty uncovers a multitude of shins. Altogether, the mothers were a grotesque collection, and one who did not understand might be moved to merriment. But I have known too much to make a jest of tragedy. To my æsthetic perception, even the best dressed of the children was but in better or cleaner shoddy than the others, and the difference between the way the women were clad and how they might have been with a pound or two more would be trifling. But, when we think that each of those poor Dublin mothers might have been "dressed like a lady" had she not scraped up everything to deck her child out for her first communion, we can then appreciate the mother-love of these women. Priests may assure us that it is the solemnity of the occasion that calls forth the self-sacrifice, but observation proves that the instinct to see her child decorated and beautified actuates the mother most, and that the Church merely uses human vanity—as she uses everything—for her own ends.

Margaret thought Biddy's dress was "awful beauty," and asked wistfully, "Couldn't I be a first communion, daddy?" I am afraid she would cheerfully subscribe to any creed that offered a chance of a pretty frock.

The young communicants had a red-letter day, for every sane being likes to see a child happy and to help in that happiness, and pennies were plentiful. Biddy and her brothers and sisters had a glorious beano. I know that she had, among other things, pop-corn, chip potatoes, ice-cream, monkey nuts, liquorice, winkles, and fruit cakes. By all the rules of healthy well-being—made by the medicine-men, for whom it is a necessity that stomachs be turned into rubbish-heaps, requiring to be cleansed and purified by their obnoxious potions—Biddy ought to have been seriously ill; or, at least, discreetly bilious. But I fear she is a bold girl, for her "little Mary" didn't seem to have turned a hair.

Well, Biddy Murphy, at the age of seven, has been initiated in the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist. Now a communicant of the One True Church, she is supposed to have arrived at an age when she can discriminate between good and evil, is accountable to God (and incidentally to his earthly representatives) for her every action, and is under the dread threat of eternal hell fire for one unconfessed "mortal" sin. Quite a cheerful outlook on life for seven years old! In olden times the bodies of men were sold in the market-place in Rome. But a study of history shows us the progress we have made in a thousand years, for the souls of children are now given in the tabernacle. And when I think of the demands of the Church in attending services, in fasting and "mortification of the flesh," I am not sure but what the body is also given to Rome.

I think back to my first and subsequent communions, and I feel proud that my youngsters need not leave their comfortable beds to go out, without food, in the early morning to receive the Bread of Life, which has even less nourishment than the War commodity.

But I don't want my children to grow up free-minded in a nation of slaves; I want all to be freethinking men and women. Little short of a cataclysm can now save poor Biddy. She will grow up as other Catholics, accepting unquestioningly every ipse dixit of the priest, imbibing, as she blossoms into womanhood, the "morality" framed by sex-perverted men and women, and she will be ignorant of all that life really means—the joys to be tasted, the pitfalls to beware of; for her mother, blind fool, will keep her "innocent," and leave her to God's mercy!

She will, of course, be a "good" girl, unless she has become contaminated by the suggestive literature in the "examination of conscience," or set wondering by leading questions or innuendoes in the confessional. But the chances are that she will be too stupid to take any meaning whatever out of this ritual, and will just continue in her "duties" in a mechanical manner. She will marry quite young, and, of course, a good Catholic young man; the priests will see to that. No long courtships with them, no scandals, no War babies, or other irregularities—love doesn't even matter in Ireland, where they arrange marriages on a cash basis, the priest demanding his percentage on the sale—and get children quickly; that's the racket for Mother Church, and that's all mapped out for little Biddy. In all probability her life will be as dirty and dreary as that of her mother, and as socially demoralizing.

Hardly entreated Biddy! would that, even yet, you could be saved; for we who are Rationalists also know the value of the childish mind. But, unlike the priests, we do not want to "capture" the children; our work is to liberate them. We would talk to them of love and laughter, of beauty and the fairyland of Nature; of the knowledge of living things, of music, dancing, kisses, and fine clothes, and precious little about "good and evil." We would not be unmindful of their "morals" as the years went by; but, as our ethics are based on naturalism and physiology, we would place no barriers in the way of their free development, nor would we, being wise from experience, disguise real dangers from them. Our object would be that each would seek happiness in his own way, but we would teach nothing of "sin" and all the other dismal doctrines of the vampire celibate "fathers" who grasp in their holy and unclean tentacles the bodies and souls of sweet little infants of seven.

ATHEIST OR AGNOSTIC?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—As one who calls himself an Agnostic, may I be allowed to defend my position?

I cannot believe in anything of which my mind has no conception; but, on the other hand, neither can I disbelieve in it, for to do so I must first have some idea of what it means—in other words, some conception of it must be present to my mind, which, ex hypothesi, is not the case. This, I take it, is philosophic Agnosticism; and with all respect to you, Sir, I think it can be applied to the word "God."

Of the wonder called electricity, science has given me some idea: I can definitely say whether I believe or disbelieve in it; even of so elusive a thing as the ether I can form some conception, however inadequate, and accept it provisionally as an explanation of certain phenomena; Goodness, too, the abstract idea as mental integration of all that is good, I can conceive and enjoy; Truth and Beauty, likewise, I know, and my soul (not ghost-soul) can delight in. But what is God? Is he discarnate personality? disembodied mind? universal spirit? What, then, are all these things? I know them not.

I cannot agree with you that "there are only two positions—either one believes, and is a Theist; or, one does not believe in a God, and is an Atheist." There is a third: The Theist says, I believe in God; the Atheist says, I do not believe in God; the Agnostic answers, I do not know what either of you is talking about.

J. Blair Williams.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Your essay under the above heading in this Sunday's issue confirms an opinion I have long held that most men, and not least newspaper editors, as a class, are arrant cowards in regard to conventional religion, and slaves of phrases. In Reynolds' newspaper of a fortnight ago an article appeared from Professor A. A. Cook, under the heading "Politics in the School," in which he urged, inter alia, the teaching of "Theism." I wrote the subjoined letter to the editor of Reynolds' on the same day, but it has not appeared. Only those who, like myself, indulge occasionally in newspaper controversy as recreation, have any conception of the inflexible opposition of the press, as a rule, to the insertion of anything not strictly religiously orthodox. You, Sir, have more moral courage, and need it, than all the other editors combined. Anybody can shout with the mob:—

POLITICS IN THE SCHOOL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "REYNOLDS'."

Sir,—I am not unaware that it is somewhat temerarious to challenge the dictum of a professor, especially one with quasi-editorial authority, for it is not an unreasonable presumption that the article under the above heading, by Professor A. A. Cook, in Reynolds' of this date, has editorial sanction, if not editorial endorsement. Without any pretension to the academic status of the writer, I should like to offer a word of criticism. I can understand his advocacy of ethics, philosophy, economics, and sociology, and his arguments in support of them. These are based on universal experience, but why "Theism"? This rests on no clearly defined basis. It is an axiom of sound education that nothing should be taught that cannot be demonstrated. Theism, at best, is purely speculative, and its effect in all ages has been destructive, disruptive, and disintegrating to the social structure, as history testifies. It has retarded, as nothing else has, intellectual progress. It challenges science and philosophy alike. It rests on an inconceivable postulate, and demands support from an impossible, endless chain of cause and effect. It is a scientific as well as a philosophical axiom that every effect is the result of an antecedent cause. It is not less axiomatic that every effect is a cause. It follows, therefore, as night the day, that there could be no first cause. If there could be an exception to this law, why not a million, or an endless series of exceptions? Either human philosophy is a paradox, and yet all human conduct rests on it, or Theism is an impossibility. Even the nomenclature, as well as the thing itself, is an uncertain quantity, and "God" has been a title for potentates and those in authority from the earliest time. Why then waste time in teaching anything so grotesque, on which anything even approaching agreement is impossible, and at the same time so prolific in mischief as the bitter wranglings of the Theists have been in all ages? The daily practices of professed believers being a flat contradiction of their precepts. Nor is a belief in Theos by any means essential to the most perfect ethical code, adapted to every purpose of life—or death. Education, to be real and useful, must rest not on poetic fancy or idle speculation, but on the various factors constituting our political and social life.—Yours truly, Eastbourne, September 9. George R. Quirk.

INFANT MORTALITY AND SANITATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—As one who believes that at least 75 per cent. of the infant mortality is caused by bad and insanitary surroundings, I am inclined to disagree with your correspondent, J. McGhee, in the Freethinker for September 16; for, in the first place, I reside in a village of 4,000 people, i.e., Fodgate, which has the unenviable reputation of having the largest infantile mortality in the county, the County of Durham. Now, the population of this place is composed, for the most part, of Irish people, not that I attribute to them (the Irish) anything better or worse than others; I am simply trying to point out the fallacy of Mr. McGhee's arguments in respect to this class of people. It is well known (and upon this I base my contention) that the houses for the working-class in this locality are the poorest and most insanitary in the kingdom, belonging, as they do, to a rich and prosperous iron company; they have been stigmatized as a disgrace to civilization; hence my contentions and conclusions that bad housing and worse sanitary conditions are responsible for most of the infant mortality. The above can be proved and verified by statements from Dr. Hill, Medical Officer for the County of Durham.

COMMUNION WITH THE DEAD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In reply to the criticism by Mr. Hubert Wales, in last week's issue, I can only say I regret that I have not succeeded in convincing him from my point of view. I should much like to have enlisted the pen of so brilliant a novelist in our cause; one, moreover, who does not bow the knee to the idol of British Respectability. His novel, The Yoke, may fairly be said to have turned "the pudic snows of Mrs. Grundy's countenance to scarlet," to use the illuminating phrase of Mr. Gosse regarding the effect of the early poems of Swinburne upon the British public.

Mr. Wales says that I am prejudiced in my views. I will not retort the charge, as that would, probably, only lead to recriminations and personalities, in which our readers have not the smallest interest. Besides, I do not see that prejudice is wrong if it is well founded; nobody condemns a man for being prejudiced in favour of morality and virtue.

A more serious charge is that concerning my "selective methods" as exemplified by the Blavatsky case of thirty years ago. But Madame Blavatsky was the only one who succeeded in founding a new cult, the Theosophical Society, which to-day is a wealthy and flourishing concern. And if it happened thirty years ago, all the more reason the younger generation should be informed of the facts, which very few have the opportunity or the leisure to find out for themselves.

As to my selection of "spirit messages," they are nearly all cases relied upon by Sir Oliver Lodge as demonstrative proof of communion with dead, or of communications through Mrs. Piper, who Sir Oliver Lodge vouches for, and I selected them because everyone is asking: "How about Sir Oliver Lodge?" and I thought I would just show what his evidence amounted to. Did Sir Oliver, then, choose the weakest examples to prove his case? In justice to Sir Oliver Lodge, I must admit that the cases he brings forward are no better, or worse, than the bulk of the others, and if the rest were subjected to a similar analysis they, too, would appear weak and foolish. And if Mrs. Piper fails, as she does, where is the medium who can compare with her?

The case for telepathy and communion with the dead is on exactly the same footing as the case for miracles; there is an enormous amount of testimony to prove them, thousands of books have been written in their defence, but when you ask for the repetition of a single one, before a competent scientific commission, you cannot get it!

W. MANN.

When the time comes for us to take command of our own intellectual faculties, we are always impeded by a dust of early training and associations, which, without giving heed to it, without examining it to see if it be good or bad, sound or silly, we have allowed to settle about our minds, until in the course of time it has become encrusted. An enormous mass of what most people consider their opinions or beliefs or instincts have rusted upon them in this way. It accounts for almost everybody's religion and for almost everybody's politics. Nothing is more difficult to eradicate, even when it has become recognized as prejudice. Some people make no effort to dislodge it; or, if they do, soon give it up: they placidly accept their slavery.—Hubert Wales, "The Rationalist."

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
> Name.....
> Address.....
> Occupation .....
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Peace and War.

Mr. Asquith, in his speech at Leeds on September 22, struck a sound note in the following passage:—

> A peace however well initiated by the necessary ethnical and geographical changes, will not be worth many years' purchase if it permits the opening or re-opening of an era of what I may call veiled warfare. It is immaterial by what methods, whether of preparation or precaution, or in what form, naval, military, diplomatic, or economic, the disturbing and disruptive forces are allowed to operate. We must banish once for all from our maxims the time-worn fallacy that if you wish for peace you must make ready for war.

The italics in the above passage are ours, and they are emphasized because the concluding sentence represents a real advance in political thinking. As we have said time after time, and long before this War began, the notion that you can secure peace by everybody getting ready for war is a psychological and political absurdity. No people in their senses would submit to the burden of preparation for war unless they thought war probable. And the longer preparations are continued, the more complete they become, the stronger and more compulsive becomes the psychological atmosphere, without which war would be almost an impossibility. To think that peace can be maintained by everybody being stronger than everybody else is a banality of which only a politician or a parson could be capable.

A New Starting-Point.

If, then, we are really bent on preventing a recurrence of the present world catastrophe, our duty is clear, and the broad lines of our future policy plain. This is to create in each country a sentiment, not in favour of getting more battleships, or more guns, or more men than anyone else, but the creation of a sentiment, a public spirit, to which the very idea of war shall be repellant. And in this direction we have an obvious point of departure. It is useless trying to convert the older men of the present generation. In the mass, their minds are wedded to the "time-worn fallacy" denounced by Mr. Asquith. Under present conditions we may find our attempts to convert younger men partly frustrated by irrelevant talk about the necessity for prosecuting the War with vigour, etc., all of which may be admitted, but which remain quite irrelevant to the point at issue. That point is not how we are to finish the present War, but how we are to prevent future ones. And, we repeat, there is here a plain point of departure from the admittedly evil traditions of the past. Let us commence with the children. No one will claim that the children in our elementary schools will be needed in the present War. No one expects the War to last so long that the present generation of school children will be drafted into the Army. It follows, then, that every attempt to deliberately familiarize the minds of children with ideas of world empire, aggressive nationalism, with war, or militarism generally, is to furnish material for future wars. So long as warfare is believed to be an expression of national greatness and strength, instead of a proof of national weakness and blundering, war will be inevitable. The world has hitherto followed one line of education, with deplorable results. If we are to profit from the present War, we can only do so by pursuing a different policy.

Mobilizing the Schools.

We are indebted to the Nation for directing our attention to a recent article in the Teachers' World which exemplifies in a first-rate manner "How Not to Do It." This particular issue of the Teachers' World is devoted to lessons of "Endurance," which is quite a good thing in its way. But the peculiarly sinister thing is the advocacy of the mobilization of the childish mind for the purpose of carrying on the War. School children are to be encouraged—"encouraged" by teachers means, with the children, moral compulsion—to write letters to the men at the Front, telling them to fight on until Germany is beaten, that everyone at home is resolved to endure until victory is won, etc. Very young children may copy a letter from the teacher's blackboard, the older ones will get a little help from the teachers, and so on. "A million letters sent now to our gallant fighting men may make all the difference." Now, do not let us be mistaken. We are not arguing that Germany should not be beaten; we are not arguing that we should not endure to the end, we do not deny that a German victory would be a disaster to the whole world. We merely protest against this kind of thing being done in our elementary schools. If we are fighting for the future of the race, let us begin with the future of the coming generation. We do not believe that our soldiers need this stimulating by unreal letters from children concerning matters which they do not and cannot understand. A childish letter, filled with childish talk and childish news, will come to the soldier in the fighting line like a gleam of paradise, and bring a real inspiration to "carry on" and preserve the homeland from a repetition of the present miseries. A letter from a child filled with stilted talk about a "German peace," "We're proud of you," "We'll see it through with you," will, and ought to sadden, if not disgust everyone who receives it.

Save the Children.

One of the deadliest charges against Germany is not that its politicians have told lies and have broken treaties—neither thing is unique in the history of the world. The heaviest indictment was that drawn by Liebknicht in the words: "you have used the schools as a training stable for the Army." For years Germany had prostituted the minds of its children by militarizing the schools. Its military drill and discipline, its worship of the uniform, its distortion of history, had all the one end and aim. And we decline to believe that that which has wrought such evil in Germany can be without evil effects in Britain. We elders are bound, in some way or other, to bear the brunt of the War. We cannot escape it; we have no right to escape it. If we do not all share the actual dangers of the fighting line, we cannot escape war's brutalizing and demoralizing effects. Nor can we altogether save the children from its demoralizing influences. They must suffer from the relaxation of home life, and from the pervasive influence of the War spirit. But we ought, at least, to avoid lending our aid to the process. If we know anything at all of the minds of our soldiers then we can safely say that the vast majority of them would support us in saying, keep the children out of it. Let them know as little as possible about the War. Keep their minds as sweet and as clean as you can. Don't use the schools as training stables for militarism.

The Truth About War.

We agree with the Nation that it is our duty to keep Prussianism out of the schools. We have no fear whatever of the Prussian getting there, but we are not so certain about keeping out his methods. We do not want the children to associate War with high ideals of sacrifice, endurance, nobility of conduct, and the supreme expression of devotion to country. Every one of these qualities can be better expressed and developed in connection with other aspects of life, and should be so expressed. We would rather they learned with Shelley:

> War is a kind of superstition; the parade of arms and badges corrupts the imagination of men. How far more appropriate would be the symbols of an inconsolable grief, muffled drums, and melancholy music, and arms reversed, the livery of sorrow.....War waged for whatever motive extinguishes the sentiment of reason and justice in the mind. The motive is forgotten or only adverted to in a mechanical and habitual manner. A sentiment of confidence in brute force and in a contempt of death and danger is considered as the highest virtue, when in truth they are merely the means and the instruments capable of being perverted to destroy the cause they were assumed to promote.

If we are intelligently in earnest in a desire to end the era of war, let us take care that we paint war in its true colours. Hitherto it has lived on lies. Historians, poets, artists, teachers, have all lied about it—about its glory, and greatness, and nobility. Why not try telling the truth about it? Sacrifice, courage, devotion to duty, love of country, have no necessary connection with war. They are born of social life, and find their healthiest expression therein. War does but exploit these qualities to their own deterioration. To be alive to this fact is essential to real reform. It is above all essential to the true teacher. A glorification of militarism is bad enough in the outside world. It is still worse in the schools. The child of the present is the man of the future. A truism, and yet one that contains a truth too often ignored.

Chapman Cohen.

God and the War.

The Rev. W. Halliday Thompson, Vicar of St. Stephen's, Ealing, often lectures at Gresham College, and is generally known as a broad-minded, scholarly man, whose love of truth and fairplay make him eminently worth listening to on any subject. Such a clergyman, we may be sure, will only employ for the defence of God and Christianity the very soundest arguments available, and if he fails to win our assent to what he believes to be the truth, it will not be his fault, but that of the inherent weakness of his case. In his parish magazine he recently discussed the problem of war from various points of view, and we gladly admit, at the very outset, that the tone of the discussion is everything that could be desired. We deal with the article as reproduced in the Middlesex County Times for September 8. War is undoubtedly a most perplexing problem, especially to those who believe in the absolute and invincible sovereignty of God. Mr. Thompson declares that war, like every other event, has its causes and its meaning, and that "every one who has a theory of the Universe, must find some place in his theory for war." Broadly speaking, there are but two theories of the Universe, the Theistic and the Atheistic. Mr. Thompson mentions Agnosticism as another theory; but, on his own showing, Agnosticism is not a theory of the Universe, but a sorrowful confession that "we have not and can never have sufficient knowledge to form any theory at all," and, therefore, Agnosticism is dismissed as being of no account. With regard to the Atheistic or mechanical theory, Mr. Thompson has no remark of an illuminating character to make. He labours under the delusion that if all were matter and there were no spirit, mechanism or order, law and system, would be impossible; but he does not tell us why they would be impossible. He says:—

> Mechanism is surely a conception which implies and necessitates mind; matter alone in any world, and in such a vast and diverse world as ours, seems incapable of giving rise to anything like machinery. From a mechanical point of view, war simply means that the machinery is not running smoothly, the wheels and cogs are out of place. There is no more to be said. The machine has no purpose, now it is out of gear, may be it is running down.

Judging from that extract we must reluctantly infer that Mr. Thompson does not understand the mechanistic conception of the Universe. He seems to think that to Atheists the world is a machine in the same sense that a plough, a reaper, or a locomotive is a machine—a something constructed, as a watch is constructed, by a mind external to itself. It is true that a machine of that kind does imply a maker; but his study of science ought to have shown Mr. Thompson that, according to the mechanistic view, the laws of mechanics, physic, and chemistry satisfactorily account, not for the construction or creation of the Universe, but for its evolution from the primordial nebulæ, and that mind, like everything else, is a product of that process. Now, war is only a phase of the natural struggle for existence, modified by mind in the lower stages of its human development, and taking a comprehensive survey of its history, we learn that it has made for the Survival of the Fittest. At the root of it are ambition, jealousy, greed, lust of power, all quite human qualities. We are often told that the present War is to end war for all time to come; but there is absolutely nothing to suggest that so happy a result is in the least likely to be realized.

Mr. Thompson, strangely enough, candidly acknowledges the entire unprofitableness of all attempts to explain the War from the Divine side, saying:—

> We have all sorts of wild and outrageous opinions

> dogmatically supplying us with God's views of the War. Most of them do not hesitate to begin with the assumption that God sent the War. How consistently with the principle of Divine goodness, they reached that conviction it would be difficult to say. Others tell us that it is punishment sent upon us for our sins; it may be a punishment for sin, but only in a very indirect fashion can it be believed that the whip is wielded by perfect love. We have no justification whatever for asserting that all calamities are sent to punish us, and none, therefore, for believing or saying it about this or any other war.

This is thoroughly good sense, at any rate. Mr. Thompson takes all the responsibility, and boldly says that "we know it was not God but man who caused the War." "Then," he adds, "we are on safe grounds." Again :—

> It is an intolerable thing to intelligent faith to be told that war comes from God, and is a Divine punishment upon nations and people; it is a presumption of the worst kind to read divine intentions into what we do not like, and to interpret our misfortunes by bringing in the name of the Most Holy. It is no worse to say that God sent the War than to say such a foolish thing as that God sent us a week's rain because we had worked on our allotments during Sunday. That is ignorant theology of the worst and most harmful type.

On this point the vicar is most emphatic: "One thing is certain, man caused the War, and not God; let us hold to that consistently, and do not let us listen to those who arrogate to themselves membership in the privy council of heaven." So far so good, and we are in complete agreement. But, after all, this species of reasoning only lands a clergyman in more and greater difficulties than it surmounts. The vital question is, Where does God come in at all, or what becomes of the theological dogma of the absolute Divine sovereignty? We are not aware whether Mr. Thompson is an evolutionist or a creationist, all we know is that he regards the Universe as being, in some sense, the work of God. The reverend gentleman is not ignorant of the terrible struggle that has characterized the ascent of life, and of how the law of Natural Selection has secured the Survival of the Fittest. The assumption is that all animals are automata, simply obedient to instincts planted within them by their Maker, over which they have no control whatever, while man received from the same Creator the awful gift of freedom, which enables him to set God at defiance and to thwart all his purposes. That is to say, God is supreme autocrat throughout the Universe, until we reach man, who possesses the power not only to ignore his sovereignty, but also to successfully resist it. In other words, man is greater and stronger than his Creator and Governor, and can go his own way in spite of the Divine will. For all wars among animals God alone is responsible, for they can only do his will. Mr. Thompson does not openly say this, but his doctrine of human liberty inevitably implies it. If God is not directly responsible for human wars, it follows that his relation to man is totally different from his relation to the rest of the Universe, which is flatly inconceivable. We do not hesitate to assert that the doctrine of the freedom of the human will is at once a contemptible and futile device to relieve the Supreme Being of all responsibility for the evils and wrongs so frightfully prevalent in the world, of which war is by no means the worst.

To be a consistent teacher, Mr. Thompson must shed his belief in a Divine Creator and Sovereign. Were he but an Atheist, how eminently true and wise the following observations would be :—

> The War means the necessity of examination, not only of individual temper and aims, but of the plans upon which society is based. This present War is full of antagonisms and enmities, there is but little harmony in our social organizations, here in England, as well as in Germany, and it is just these antagonisms between classes and strata of people which give rise to struggle and strife, whether national or civil. Our present system is hopelessly breaking down, and so the foundations must be wrong. We need to revise and reconstruct them, and the War is the pain which warns us of the disease.

Unfortunately, the article closes thus: "When we make a big effort ourselves to redeem ourselves from the passions which are at the root of all war, and to redeem the world from war, God will be on our side to help and inspire." That is the usual conclusion of all parsonic utterances, and any other conclusion would give the profession away. Our surprise is that so sensible a man as Mr. Thompson is capable of such gigantic inconsistency. If we do our very best, God will be on our side to help and inspire; but how does the vicar know that? Big human efforts are Divinely blessed, while little ones enjoy no benediction; but history contains not a shred of evidence either way. Furthermore, history does bear witness to the fact that belief in God has been directly responsible for numerous most bloody struggles, and that the religion of the Cross has often seriously checked the progress of the cause of peace. In every European war, particularly in the present one, the God of peace is appealed to by both sides as the Lord of Hosts, and the object of the horrible bloodshed is said to be the establishment of the kingdom of Christ. It is our firm conviction that had Buddhism won Europe, instead of Christianity, war would have ceased long ago, and the essential brotherhood of the race would have been established on a rational and permanent foundation.

J. T. Lloyd.

A Friend of Shelley.

We have a kindness for Leigh Hunt.—Macaulay.

Amid thousands of unloved and obscure graves at Kensal Green Cemetery is one with the arresting inscription: "Write me as one who loved his fellow men." This is the last resting-place of Leigh Hunt, the friend of Shelley and Byron and so many poets, and himself a singer of no mean quality.

Of his ancestry, Leigh Hunt presents a delightful picture in his Autobiography, stating that on his mother's side they were "all sailors and rough subjects with a mitigation of Quakerism," as on his father's side "they were all creoles and claret drinkers, very polite and clerical." Hunt's father was a clergyman, with an incorrigible propensity for conviviality, and the earliest recollections of his distinguished son were associated with the King's Bench prison, in which his father was placed for debt.

Leigh Hunt was educated, like Charles Lamb and Coleridge, at Christ's Hospital School, of which he has left a pleasant impression. "I am grateful to the Hospital," he wrote, "for having bred me up in old cloisters, for its having made me acquainted with the languages of Homer and Ovid, and for its having secured to me, on the whole, a well-trained and cheerful boyhood. It pressed no superstition on me." For some time after his school-days Hunt, characteristically, haunted the bookstalls and wrote verse. His temperament unfitted him for commercialism, and Dickens has satirized, somewhat unkindly, his failings in "Horace Skimpole" in Bleak House.

At twenty-three years of age Leigh Hunt joined his brother, John, in starting the Examiner. The motto of the paper was taken from the caustic lines of Swift, "Party is the madness of the many and the gain of a few." During its fourteen years of strenuous existence the paper endured every species of good and bad fortune, and Leigh Hunt and his brother were sent to prison. The Morning Post published a fulsome article describing the Prince Regent (afterwards King George IV.) as an "Adonis in loveliness," and the Examiner staff dipped their pens in vitriol, and retorted that this "Adonis" was a fat man of fifty, a violator of his word, a libertine over head and ears in disgrace, a despiser of domestic ties, the companion of gamblers and demireps, a man who had just closed half a century without one single claim on the gratitude of his country or the respect of posterity. The two brothers were prosecuted, and fined £500 each with two years' imprisonment.

Leigh Hunt's incarceration was not a holiday, nor was it a silent meditation among the tombs. He could not go beyond the prison walls, but he had rooms furnished by himself, and he enjoyed the society of his wife and family, and had frequent visitors. The learned Jeremy Bentham came and played battledore with him. The imprisonment may have affected Hunt's health, but it was a comedy compared to the treatment of Holyoake and Foote, condemned to their cells and the prison-yard. Besides, Hunt had facilities for writing, and composed A Feast of the Poets, The Story of Rimini, in addition to doing a vast amount of journalistic work.

Hunt's imprisonment brought him into unusual prominence. He had known Charles Lamb from boyhood, and Shelley some years. He now made the acquaintance of Keats, Byron, and Hazlitt. Indeed, he was always happy and fortunate in his friendships. Later in life he added to the circle the names of Carlyle, Dickens, Macaulay, Lytton, and Lord Houghton.

For this reason Leigh Hunt's Autobiography is most excellent company, for he always writes naturally and unaffectedly, and his description of his famous friends is vastly entertaining. His accounts of his Italian travels, too, is an example of the best kind of such writing. His humour is never forced. A typical example is his youthful recollection of how he used, after a childish indulgence in bad language, to think with a shudder, when he received any mark of favour, "Ah! they little think I'm the boy who said damn."

An omniverous reader, Hunt secured the rare commendation of Macaulay for his "Catholic taste." Of all authors, indeed, and of most readers, Leigh Hunt had the keenest eye for merit, and the warmest appreciation of it wherever found. An active politician, he was never blind to the abilities of an opponent. Blameless himself in morals, he could admire the wit of Congreve, Vanbrugh, and Wycherley; and a Freethinker, he could see both wisdom and beauty in the old divines. It is to his credit that this universal knowledge, instead of puffing him up, only moved him to impart it. Next to the pleasure he took in books was that he derived from pointing out to others the pleasure in them. Witness his Wit and Humour and Imagination and Fancy, two of the finest and most readable handbooks in English literature. Hunt was always genuine in his criticisms. It was nothing to him whether an author was new or old, an Englishman or a foreigner, for his sympathies crossed all frontiers. Nor did he shrink from any literary comparison between two writers when he thought it appropriate. Thackeray had this same outspoken honesty, and in speaking of Fenimore Cooper's hero in the "Leather-Stocking" novels he says, "I think he is better than any of Scott's lot."

Few critics would deny Leigh Hunt's talent for poetry. There is no doubt that his verse had a very strong influence on his contemporaries, and that it inspired music much better than itself. After all, the poems, or some of them, form the only part of Leigh Hunt's voluminous literary work likely to survive. Perhaps one of his happiest lyrics is the charming trifle addressed to Jane Welsh, afterwards Mrs. Carlyle:—

Jenny kissed me when we met,
Jumping from the chair she sat in!
Time, you thief, who love to get Sweets into your list, put that in!
Say I'm weary, say I'm sad,
Say that health and wealth have missed me,
Say I'm growing old—but add,
Jenny kissed me.

Some of his sonnets are excellent. One of the best is that on the Nile, written in rivalry with Shelley and Keats, commencing:—

It flows through old hushed Egypt and its sands,
Like some grave mighty thought threading a dream.

This includes the magnificent description of—

The laughing queen that caught the world's great hands, which is not only a very fine line, but the discovery of a cadence which has been imitated ever since. Hunt's sonnet on "A Lock of Milton's Hair" is a superb example of his enthusiasm for great writers:—

It lies before me there, and my own breath
Stirs its thin threads, as though beside
The living head I stood in honoured pride,
Talking of lovely things that conquer death.
Perhaps he pressed it once, or underneath
Ran his fine fingers, when he leant blank-eyed,
And saw in fancy Adam and his bride,
With their rich locks, or his own Delphic wreath.

In "Abou Ben Adhem," the poem that has found its way into every anthology and every heart, he shows an unexpected depth and tenderness. It is Ariel turned Prospero, and showing in the transformation how antic and irresponsible a spirit Ariel is. It is appropriate that on Hunt's tombstone should appear lines from that fine poem which alone should make his name immortal. Hunt's first claim on posterity is genius, but he was more than a mere writer, for he fought in the Army of Human Liberation. He loved Liberty without misgiving, and Liberty, loving him in return, has crowned his grave with honour.

Mimnermus.

The Invisible Demon King.

For several weeks past my sleep at night has been very much disturbed by dreams—mostly unpleasant—but always extremely interesting while they lasted. Often when I have laid my head upon the pillow I have seen a strange light through the venetian blinds, and heard the propellers of an aeroplane as it glided along in the still air of a summer's night; and as I turned on my right side to get a more comfortable position before dozing gradually off to sleep, I have been suddenly aroused by what sounded like the booming of distant guns. When, however, I have examined into the cause of this startling noise, I have soon satisfied myself that it was only some foolish person a few doors off who had shut the door of his house with a quite unnecessary and violent bang. Sometimes a banging noise seemed to proceed from a covering up of my right ear, and then I would turn over on to my back and try to get some sleep in this position, but always with the consciousness that whatever sleep I got would be disturbed by dreams. One night while I lay drowsily in this position I had a most interesting vision. I dreamt that I had a visit from the Invisible Demon King. He came and stood by my bedside, and entered into a long conversation with me on the all-absorbing topic of the Great War, and I found, to my astonishment, that his views on the subject corresponded very closely to those of my own.

I beckoned him to take a chair, and when I said that I could see him quite plainly, he said, with a smile: "In your mind's eye, Horatio," and I was not at all surprised to hear him quote from Shakespeare. Further, he explained in a very affable way, that he understood that most Freethinkers were "able to see through him." When I asked him whether he was the same demon that appeared in the garden of Eden six thousand years ago and tempted Madame Eve with an apple? or the more ferocious Devil who afflicted such terrible sufferings upon poor old Job? or whether he was the more autocratic demon who commanded Jesus to transform stones into bread? or, worse still, whether he was the fiendish spirit that Christians said had become the eternal stoker in hell? he replied, with a merry twinkle in his eye, that he could see quite plainly that I was well acquainted with the malignant falsehoods Christians had circulated about him in all the centuries of the Christian faith, and he was glad of an opportunity of contradicting, in the most emphatic way, all the infamous lies that had been told concerning him. When I said that I would take the earliest opportunity of acquainting my friends of this denial he seemed quite pleased.

"But," I said, "will you be good enough to inform me what part you have taken in bringing about the terrible War which is now raging all over Europe, and what you would do if you had the power to bring it to a speedy termination?"

At this point he rose from his seat, and in the most polite fashion said: "I am truly glad, my friend, that you have asked me these questions, and I will try and answer them with perfect candour and honesty. I had nothing to do with bringing about this terrible War. I have never been consulted by any of the belligerents from the moment of its inception to the present time."

"Oh!" I exclaimed, "Then you have not been in conflict with 'The Invisible King' of Mr. Wells' imagination, or any of the Gods, ancient or modern, concerning this matter?"

"Certainly not," replied my mysterious visitor; "as I have said, I have taken no part in the matter. All the plotting and scheming have emanated from the fertile brains of Kings, Kaisers, and Czars; of Ambassadors, and Politicians, and Statesmen, and spies of all nationalities, and of the great military authorities—they have done it all. It is to their machinations that all this crime and suffering and misery have been brought about, and terrible wars like this will never cease until the people become intelligent enough to understand their absolute futility and uselessness, and build up a civilization founded upon reason and human well-being."

I was going to interrupt by saying those were entirely my own sentiments, when my enlightened visitor smiled and continued: "But do not suppose for one moment that this result will be brought about in a short space of time. The processes of evolution are slow, very slow; but subsequent generations of men will live to see the realization in some measure of this noble ideal."

"Well spoken, my friend," I exclaimed; "I never imagined for a moment that you entertained such ideas, although I have always been satisfied that religious folk have grossly misrepresented your thoughts and aspirations. But never mind; I will try and put the matter right as soon as I get an opportunity of addressing my fellow-countrymen. But tell me, what part do you think the gods have played in this great War?"

"None whatever, and for a very sufficient reason—they have no existence apart from the brains of the men who conceive them and believe in them."

"Is it possible," I exclaimed with delight, "that you have no belief in the gods—that you are an Atheist?"

"I am, most assuredly. Why, if any of the gods existed who had infinite power and infinite goodness, would he not have stopped the terrible slaughter by the exercise of his power?"

"That is exactly what I have said a thousand times."

"Yes, and that is exactly what any thoughtful person would have said who gave the matter a moment's consideration. A good God would never have allowed the War to have begun, let alone the awful crime that has followed in its wake—the horrible carnage, the wholesale massacre of women and children, and old men well-nigh verging on the grave. No, he could never have allowed it. His whole nature would have revolted against it. Neither gods nor devils have anything to do with these things. They are entirely the work of man. You may be sure of that."

"Thank you for this assurance," I said. "And I suppose, then, that man alone can supply the remedy?"

"Certainly," he replied, with a nod. He seemed, however, to speak more in a whisper, and I had great difficulty in following him. Presently his voice became so feeble that I could not hear him at all.

* * * *

All of a sudden I heard a tremendous crash. I opened my eyes and looked around. My mysterious visitor had vanished, and in his place my daughter was by my bedside, telling me that I had better get up as there was a moonlight air-raid on; and what I had heard in reality was the falling of bombs on London, that some poor creatures at that very moment were being done to death by the murderers in the air. So I got up and dressed myself, and sought shelter in the passage; but when the raid was all over, I turned my thoughts to the strange vision I had had, and my conversation with the more modern representative of the old-fashioned theological conception of the Invisible Demon King. It was strange, passing strange, my friends, was it not?

Doing His Bit.

A Study from Life of an English Clergyman.

Psalm lviii. which ventures to support the idea of reprisals, has been placed under the ban of the Church. The verses in the Psalm to which particular objection is taken are as follows:—

The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance, he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked.

So that a man shall say, Verily there is a reward for the righteous. He is a God that judgeth the earth.

He is a doctrinarian whose life consists of the things which are of no real importance, and have no relationship with the actual living world.

The light of reason cannot penetrate the intense darkness of his mind. His brain, under the influence of that deadly narcotic, Orthodox Christianity, refuses to function. The bones of the young manhood of Europe are bleaching, and the soul of Europe is perishing, but he pursues his daily routine quite contented in the knowledge that his soul is saved.

What are the death-throes of Europe compared to the doctrines of "The Blessed Trinity," "The Real Presence," and "The Virgin Birth"?

These and a hundred other theological dogmas are of more importance than the lives of millions of human beings.

He conceives God as an English clergyman—an enlarged edition of himself, very jealous about the exact significance of the doctrines of "The Real Presence," and "The Holy Trinity," a God who presides over the War, keeping a "Fatherly" eye upon the destinies of his people—a God to whom he can pray for a victory that will exterminate his enemies, but who would be righteously indignant if his people continued to sing Psalm lviii.

The will of God can only be made manifest through his divinely appointed ministers the English clergy. Knowledge is given only unto him, and he expounds with unlimited self-assurance, and an air of infinite condescension the mysteries of God and the soul, life, death, and immortality, to men who have faced the hell of modern warfare without flinching, but he knows nothing of their souls or their lives.

He has never really lived, but he dogmatizes about life; never struggled for existence, but he minimizes the difficulties of those who have; never faced the ordeal of battle, but he offers his patronage and advice: "Be strong and of good courage" to those who have been through hell for him and his class.

He sings a hymn of praise as they go to their calvary. Murder, rapine, and hunger are stalking hand-in-hand through Europe; death rains from the firmament above, and crawls on treacherous feet in the waters beneath; little children, mothers, and wives are crushed to pulp; strong men are maimed; the human debris is scattered throughout the land. "In Europe is a voice heard—lamentation and weeping."

Bloody sunset is succeeded by still more bloody dawn, but he is "always merry and bright" in the consciousness that God has revealed his purpose to him, and saved his soul.

His courage and equanimity are such that, unmoved by the death-pangs of Humanity, he can find time to "do his bit" for righteousness and justice.

The wickedness of David has moved him to righteous indignation; he has placed Psalm lviii. under the "ban of Holy Church"; but he still administers "Holy Communion" to the profiteers.

Truly the way of the righteous clergyman passeth all understanding; verily, he moves in a mysterious way, his wonders to perform.

Reflections.

I conclude that all the laws with which a minister swells his portfolio are vain documents that can neither make us live nor prevent us from living.

It is well-nigh a matter of indifference whether we are governed one way or another, and ministers are only imposing because of their clothes and their carriages.

I have observed that the trade most natural to mankind is that of soldiering; it is the one towards which he is most carried by his instincts and his tastes, which are not all good. And apart from rare exceptions, of which I am one, man may be defined as an animal with a musket. Give him a handsome uniform and the hope of going to fight, he will be content. The military condition has this also in keeping with human nature, that one is never forced to think; and it is clear that we were not made to think.

Thought is a disease peculiar to certain individuals, and could not be propagated without bringing about promptly the end of the race. Soldiers live in bands, and man is a sociable animal. They wear costumes of blue and white, blue and red, gray and blue, ribbons, medals, plumes, and cockades; and these give to them the same prestige with women that the cock has with the hen. They go forth marauding and to war, and man is naturally thieving, libidinous, destructive, and sensible to glory.

It is astounding, Tournebroche, my son, that war and the chase, the mere thought of which ought to overwhelm us with shame and remorse in recalling to us the miserable necessities of our nature and our wickedness, should, on the contrary, serve as matter for the pride of men; that Christians should continue to honour the trade of butcher and headsman when it is hereditary in the family; and that, in effect, among civilized peoples the greatness of the citizens is measured by the quantity of murder and carnage they carry in their blood.

I hold man free in his acts because my religion teaches it, but outside the Church (which is unequivocal), there is so little reason to believe in human liberty that I shudder in thinking of the verdicts of a justice that punishes actions of which the motives and the causes equally elude us, in which the will has often little part, and which are sometimes accomplished unconsciously.

Tournebroche, my son, consider that I am speaking of human justice, which is generally opposed and different to, the justice of God.

Judges do not sound the loins and do not read the heart, and the justice is crude and superficial. They are men; that is to say, feeble and corruptible, gentle to the strong and pitiless to the weak. They consecrate in their sentences the cruellest social iniquities; and it is difficult to distinguish in this partiality, what comes from their personal baseness and what is imposed on them by the duty of their profession, this duty being, in reality, to support the State in what it has of evil as well as what it has of good; to watch over the conservation of public morals, whether they are good or bad. Furthermore, it should be said that the magistrate is the defender, by virtue of his function, not only of the current prejudices to which we are all subject, but also of the time-worn prejudices which are conserved in the laws after they have been effaced from our minds and habits. And there is not a spirit ever so little meditative and free that does not feel how much there is of Gothic in the law, while the judge has not the right to feel it.

By the very nature of their profession, judges are inclined to see a culprit in every prisoner; and their zeal is so terrible to certain European peoples that they have them assisted, in important cases, by citizens chosen by lot. From which it appears that chance, in its blindness, secures the life and liberty of the accused better than the enlightenment of the judges can. It is true that these impromptu bourgeois judges, being ignorant of the law, they are summoned, not to apply them, but simply to decide, in one word, if there be occasion to apply them. We are told that in assizes of this character, absurd results are sometimes given, but the peoples that possess these institutions, cling to them as to a highly precious protection. I easily believe it. And I understand the acceptance of verdicts, rendered in this fashion, which may be inept and cruel, but of which the absurdity and barbarity are, so to speak, attributable to nobody. Injustice seems tolerable when it is sufficiently incoherent to appear involuntary.

Just now, this officer, who has so strong a sentiment of justice, suspected me of belonging to a party of robbers. I so far disapprove of theft and assassination, that I cannot endure even the copy of them regularized by the laws; and it is painful for me to see that judges have found no better means of punishing robbers and homicides than by imitating them. For, after all, Tournebroche, my son, what are fines and the death penalty, if not robbery and assassination perpetrated with an august exactitude? And do you not see that our justice merely tends, in all its pride, to this shame of avenging an evil by an evil, a suffering by a suffering, and in doubling misdemeanours and crimes in the name of equilibrium and symmetry?

Customs have more force than laws. Gentleness of demeanour and sweetness of soul are the only remedies which can reasonably be applied to legal barbarity. For to correct laws by laws is to take a slow and uncertain route.

My son, I have always observed that the troubles of men come to them from their prejudices, as spiders and beetles come from the dimness of cellars, and from the dampness of vaults. It is good to flourish the broom and the brush a little in all the dark corners. It is good even to give a little blow of the pick here and there in the walls of the cellar and garden to frighten the vermin and prepare the necessary ruins.—Anatole France, "The Sayings of Jerome Coignard."

A False Quest.

Man strives for things that are not worth the striving for,
And in his strenuous search for something that his soul
Has set itself to seize, he misses that which makes
This life a thing to be desired, and sears his soul.
Or else, caught in the toils of never-ending strife
That soulless men have made the thing that should be life,
He fails to feel the soul-destroying subtle stream
That bears him onward, till at length the sea is reached.
And there, engulfed in waters, cold and turgid,
Too late, he seeks his soul to save.....the mocking sea
For ever hides his soulless corse beneath the waves,
And earth and sky join in the chorus of the lost.

Acid Drops.

What is sadly needed in connection with the controversy between Theism and Atheism, or between scientific Determinism and its opponents, is a work that shall clear away the mass of accumulated irrelevances, and place the problem before new readers in its essential terms. Anyone with time and ability to do this, would be performing a public service. But Theists so habitually misstate the points at issue, and writers and speakers so often follow them over a mass of irrelevances, that the essential question seldom emerges into a clear light. The consequence is, that critics of scientific Determinism are confirmed in their misstatements, and the newcomer is often inclined to give the whole thing up as hopeless.

Thus, in the British Medical Journal for September 15, there occurs a review of a work by Professor Haldane on Organism and Environment as Illustrated by the Physiology of Breathing. We have not yet read the work, but we note that Professor Haldane believes, "It is not from the data of physiology, and still more clearly not from those of the physical sciences that we derive our conception of God." So far, good. But we gather from the reviewer that Professor Haldane believes we can get from the facts of the conscious life some idea of Deity. Why? Because "the conception of life is just as inadequate in connection with personality as are the conceptions of matter and energy in connection with life." Now, this is an example of sheer irrelevancy. An Atheist may fully agree with what is said without his Atheism being in the least disturbed. Closer attention to the philosophy of science would have enabled both Professor Haldane and his reviewer to realize that our conception of matter and energy is intended to cover a specific group of phenomena, the conception of life to cover another group, and so on. To say, therefore, that one conception cannot do duty for another is to proclaim a mare's nest. And only ignorance or thoughtlessness concerning the nature of scientific conceptions can make such comments of importance. All it means is, that as "conscious personality" gives us a group of phenomena presenting new features, a new conception is required to cover all the facts. But that is true of every rise in the scale of natural complexity. It has simply nothing to do with the question of God.

Still, after that, we are not surprised at the reviewer ending his article with the banalistic remark, "The life of such a man as Charles Darwin is, in truth a standing proof of the existence of God." Why Charles Darwin more than Charles Peace? The personality of the one is no more baffling than is the other. We should much enjoy putting the man who wrote that sentence through a five minutes' examination. We do not think there would be much difficulty in showing it to be pure nonsense, nor would one be entitled to feel conceited over the performance.

Why is it that when men "find God" they repeat, like parrots, the stock "arguments" of the clergy? Mr. H. G. Wells is writing like a Christian Evidence lecturer, and Mr. Horatio Bottomley, who ought to know better, is "out-Heroding Herod." Referring to the risks from mines and submarines at sea, Mr. Bottomley adds that this takes place "in the year of Our Lord 1917—after two thousand years of Christianity—in the twentieth century of Human Civilization." Surely it is an insult to the general reader to presuppose that he has never heard of ancient civilizations. The present civilization is nothing to boast of, otherwise there would not be thirty millions of men ready to murder one another.

The Deanery of Windsor is the "cushiest" job in the Church of England, says the Daily News. The Dean has absolutely nothing to do except to preside over the Chapter (which also does nothing) and to supervise the chapel services. He has £2,000 a year, and a capital house in the very Garden of England. "Blessed be ye poor!"

The Australian Young Men's Christian Association has leased the Aldwych Theatre, and high-class plays and operas will be produced. An up-to-date canteen and cinema and orchestra will be among the principal attractions. Old-fashioned Christians will rub their eyes and wonder if the Y.M.C.A. is not treading the primrose path to perdition.

"Bread is by no means an essential food," says Dr. Reinhardt-Rutland. The clergy will hasten to assure us that the expression, "Give us this day our daily bread," means something else.

"R. H. C.," who is on the staff of the New Age, is a consummate egotist. In his article on "Readers and Writers," which appeared in the issue for September 6, he girds with great vehemence at the Rationalists, and particularly at the works published by the R.P.A. He finds such writers as Mr. Arnold Bennett and Mr. Eden Phillpotts "unfortunately limited by a nineteenth century Rationalism," which Rationalism he pronounces dead. Mr. R. B. Kerr declares, on the contrary, that "the twentieth century is even more rationalistic than the nineteenth." "R. H. C." is bound to admit that there are Rationalists even to-day, but he charges them with being old fashioned. In the estimation of "reasonable observers," they are said to have lost "atmosphere." That "R. H. C." has "atmosphere" goes without saying, though there is nothing in his articles to indicate his possession of it.

"R. H. C.'s" article betrays either deliberate dishonesty or crass ignorance. He either does not know what Rationalism is, or he intentionally misrepresents it. When he says "what has alone distinguished the great Rationalists has not been their reason, but their hostility to every other faculty than reason." That is a wickedly mendacious statement. No great Rationalist has ever been so unutterably foolish as to despise all mental faculties other than the intellect, and certainly neither Mr. Eden Phillpotts nor Mr. Arnold Bennett has been guilty of such folly. It is a pity that a publication of such high literary merits opens its columns to such unpardonable trash.

The poor bishops are always declaring that they spend their stipends in keeping up their positions, but the Bishop of Hereford is more frank, and admits that he has saved enough cash to be able to dispense with a pension.

Speaking of a reformed Second Chamber, Lord Burnham suggested that "true leaders of Labour" should have a place there. It would be more to the purpose if he had suggested the removal of the bishops.

Mr. Vince, a well-known local Free Churchman, died in the pulpit while preaching near Reading. Had he been a Freethought lecturer there would have been a terrible moral.

Father Bernard Vaughan has been speaking at Dundee on the need of a higher birth-rate. He forgot to mention that the Roman Catholic Church had filled Europe with monasteries and nunneries.

Dr. Fogarty, Bishop of Killaloe, says "the world is sick of this accursed war and of the hypocrisy that surrounds it." Yet Christian ecclesiastics consecrated the regimental colours and christened the battleships.

A newspaper paragraph advertises Rochester Cathedral crypt as a raid shelter. What Secularists those Christians are! In moments of real danger the last thing they think of is the value of prayer.

Modern Palestine cannot be said to be flowing with milk and honey, but a member of the Egyptian Expeditionary Force writes that "cigarettes are cheap, and each man is allowed a small quantity of beer." If a man does not like the food, he can buy from "a wide assortment of tinned luxuries." There is also "a small lending library." It all sounds so tempting that there seems some risk of a new crusade.

Newspaper editors have been making headlines concerning a munition-maker who earned £12 a week. The editors do not make headlines on the subject of bishops' salaries.

"If the war lasts another fifty or sixty years," says Mr. Justice Darling, "there will be no priests or ministers left." Why not? The dear clergy are very tender of their precious skins.

The Rev. Thomas Phillips, of Bloomsbury Chapel, is an exceedingly resourceful man, who leaves no stone unturned in the attempt to draw people to his church. Recently he spent a whole Sunday with "the outsiders," visiting streets, parks, public-houses, and cinemas during the hours services were being conducted in churches and chapels. He found all such places, except the public-houses, crowded with all sorts and conditions of people. He entered seven or eight cinemas, all of which were simply packed. The very sight of such throngs made his heart heavy with regret and pity. Of course, in thus spending the day, "he left the preachers and the saints severely alone and consorted with publicans and sinners." The sinners he first noticed were the Bohemians, who "were there in their thousands, knowing and caring nothing about the churches, and with no regard whatever for the Sabbath or for worship." Them he characterized as "the gipsies of our modern civilization," and the questions he asked were: "Are these the pioneers of the future, or the waste, the by-product, of the past? Do they represent the England that is coming, or is the true England in and of the Churches?" We know what his answer would be.

Mr. Phillips conversed with many working-men and women, and "found no doubt at all about God or religion. No working-man had anything but good to say of the churches," though he never darkened their doors. With how many working-men did the reverend gentleman get into conversation? If he addressed himself to more than two or three, we should doubt the accuracy of his report. We know thousands of working-people in London who are positively hostile to the Churches; and it is well known that the workers of Woolwich vigorously opposed the Anglican Crusade recently held there.

A writer in the Star says, "Frederick the Great and Bismarck have imposed upon them (the German people) a hideous religion of force." There is some confusion of thought in the remark. Frederick was a Freethinker and imposed no "religion." Bismarck was a Protestant, but was concerned with politics, even in his encounters with the Jesuits. Protestantism in Germany is derived from Martin Luther, and Catholicism is "imposed" from Rome.

Over ten million books and magazines have been sent to the troops through the generosity of the public and by the agency of the Post Office. If these are all read by the soldiers, it does not seem probable that the millions of Bibles are perused also.

"The world still is God's and not the Devil's," says a writer in the Daily Mail. The sentiment is familiar in the sermons of the Bishop of London, and in the utterances of Negro theologians.

Much spiritual meaning has been read into the red triangle sign of the Young Men's Christian Association. It is therefore, amusing to recall that the trade mark of Bass's beer is also a red triangle.

The great religious revival which the clergy said was to be the outcome of the War is conspicuous by its absence. There is, however, a great increase in petty thefts by new offenders, and the Courts have been kept unduly busy with cases of war-time pilfering.

The Vice-Chairman of the Council of St. Anne's Home, Bridlington, the institution in which the soldiers revolted against the regulation compelling attendance at a religious service twice daily, with the alternative of going to bed, has written a defence of the Home to the Yorkshire Post. His defence is that the Home has been established for forty years, and all inmates know the rule. We do not see that this quite meets the case. If the Home is kept going for the purpose of doing good, and if the soldiers were received there—with a payment from the Pensions Committee—because they had been wounded in the country's service, compulsory attendance at religious service is an act of tyranny. If the Home is an attempt to force religion upon people under the guise or bribe of philanthropy, then its pretence of doing good is an act of hypocrisy.

The Vice-Chairman seems to think he has justified the Home when he says this has always been the rule. Sensible people will reply that it is high time that it was abolished, and that age in such a connection is no recommendation. And let us say quite plainly that to assume men and women who can justify such a rule have any real regard for liberty, or that they are intelligently concerned in a war for freedom is in the highest degree absurd. People who can champion or submit to such a regulation have not yet mastered the alphabet of real freedom.

The glorious free press of England is going from bad to worse, especially in the pandering to public ignorance. The tales of angels in Essex are obviously inserted for the mere purposes of sensationalism, without the slightest regard to truth. If this sort of thing results in increased circulations, we may expect further developments, such as "Cherubs in Cumberland," "Seraphs in Surrey," or "Fiends in Fleet Street."

From Mr. H. G. Wells' latest book, The Soul of a Bishop, it appears that the author considers that these ecclesiastics are of little use in war-time. Judging by the bishops' votes in the House of Lords, they are of no use in peace time either.

The Rev. Alfred Brandon, a former Baptist minister, has attained his 101st birthday, and the editors have been busy making headlines concerning the centenarian. Some of the Bible patriarchs were trundling hoops at that tender age.

We wonder who is responsible for plastering over the pedestal of Cleopatra's Needle with war posters? It surely marks the limit in stupid vandalism. The Houses of Parliament, or Buckingham Palace, we could have understood, but why the Needle? If the spirits of ancient Egypt hover round that ancient monument, how they must smile! And they might well wonder whether the advance between their day and ours is really worth talking about. We are a civilized people! An artistic people! See how readily we cleared the museums and art galleries! And how ready we were to economise on education! And, above all, we are a Christian people! That is the most significant thing of all.

Most of the London Churches are altering the hour of the evening service so that it may be over before air-raid time. Some have given up the evening service altogether. One could understand this policy in relation to a secular meeting, but to go to Church to demonstrate one's trust in the providence of God, and then close the service early in case Providence is not able to protect its devotees against air-raids strikes one as peculiar. The Bishop of Birmingham denies that God has anything to do with the weather. We know that he has nothing to do with many other things; one wonders what on earth he really does. Perhaps some Christian will explain?

We should have had no objection to giving a free advertisement to a day of "United Prayer" which was held at the Queen's Hall on Tuesday last. But we observe that there is to be no evening meeting, and we suggest that a good chance of proving the efficacy of prayer would be to arrange for prayer-meetings on fine moonlit nights, and pray for the absence of German aeroplanes.

"Have we anything to be thankful for?" was the subject which a Croydon minister used for a sermon. We wonder if he referred to the exemption of the clergy from military service.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

October 7, Failsworth; October 14, Leicester; October 21, Manchester; October 28, London; November 4, Abertillery; November 18, Birmingham.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—October 7, Birmingham; October 14, Swansea; November 18, Manchester.

J. T. Hellwell.—Yes, we think we have "a splendid staff of contributors." We venture to think it is the subject that brings the best out of them. And we have plenty other good contributors in reserve.

Bristolian.—It is almost impossible to answer your question in a paragraph. The relation of objects to consciousness is fundamentally a consciousness of the relation. Any construction of the external world must be based upon sensation primarily, and this applies to "reality." "Reality" can mean no more than a hypothetical basis of experience. Its use is justifiable, so far as it serves, to make experience intelligible, but no farther.

A. Wildman.—Hope you will be successful in forming a Branch of the N.S.S. in Southampton. If we can help, please let us know.

S. Edmonds.—We are proud to have the warm support of a reader of twenty-four years' standing.

G. H. Murphy.—Sorry we cannot recommend anything of the kind you require. It is out of our line, but as an outsider we would suggest that studying the technique of masters in the art would be the best guide.

J. H. Rollins (Dublin).—We have read Benjamin Swift's book and intended writing on it, but other things got in the way. Have we your name correctly?

W. G. Harris.—Glad to know you had a "Pleasant Sunday Afternoon and Evening" at Mr. Cohen's Birmingham lectures. May you have many more.

J. Lloyd Jones (Capetown).—Our congratulations and compliments to your wife.

G. Gilleti.—Good wishes are always acceptable. Yes, mental courage always was, and, we suppose, always will be, rare.

J. McManus.—There are no direct grants of State money to the Church of England now. But the Church does receive an indirect grant of money in the shape of release from taxation, and many grants have been made for the purpose of Church building. Tithes, mining royalties, etc., also represent, in many cases, examples of State aid. When compulsory Church rates were abolished, a sum of money was often paid out of the rates in the shape of commutation.

Jas. Railton.—We are flattered by your opinion that we have "put new life into the movement." Thanks for subscription.

A. G. Lye.—Yes; a record, as you say.

R. Morris.—The Freethinker has never had the circulation it deserved, but if we possessed the means for advertising it, we haven't the ghost of a doubt we could make it very much larger than it is.

Remiat.—Translation received; shall appear.

Arthur King.—Your letter to the Archbishop was very much to the point; but you could hardly expect him to receive it gratefully.

A. Spencer.—We don't know of any English translation, but there may have been one. There is no Society now in the place you name.

A. J. Reid.—Certainly, if the press and our public men had greater moral courage, the hollowness of modern religion would soon be plain to all.

D. Goudie.—We noticed the error, but thought it best to acknowledge as written. Thanks

J. Gibson.—We cheerfully take the will for the deed, and in introducing the paper to new readers you are doing us a real and valuable service. You know our motto with regard to readers—You find, we keep.

Mr. A. W. B. Shaw, in sending subscription to our Sustentation Fund, writes: "It is gratifying to see that the subscriptions are coming in so well, and I hope you may soon be relieved of all anxiety about matters financial. It is no easy task to edit such a paper as the Freethinker, which is better each week, and to have to look after the business side as well."

W. Gregory.—We are pleased to have the appreciation of your Branch for what you call our "noble work." All we can say is it is enjoyable work.

F. W. Walsh.—It is more than good of you to send from your sick bed your mite towards the Sustentation Fund. We appreciate your good wishes and support more than we can say.

A. J. Marriott.—It was quite a question of space, and we hope all correspondents will bear in mind that this is an editor's constant consideration. We quite agree that it is ridiculous to suppose that reprisals will stop air-raids. Besides, the Allies are bombing wherever they can. Our newspapers publish daily reports. Of course, little is said about civilians being killed; but the German papers are equally silent about the killing of English civilians by their raiders.

J. Thompson.—It is very good of you to have secured so many new readers, and to try for more.

Jno Hudson.—Pleased to hear from you. The paper is making many new friends—and keeping them.

H. Kennedy.—Certainly, a corner will be found for the anecdote.

H. L. Voight.—We hope you will be able to resume your old activities when the War is over. Pleased to know that you take up so impartial an attitude in your business relations. We wish that all followed your example.

Chapman Cohen.

Sugar Plums.

In spite of the brilliant summer weather of Sunday last, Mr. Cohen had two capital meetings at Swansea on Sunday last. On each occasion the hall was crowded—uncomfortably so in fact—but all present appeared to enjoy themselves. The members of the new Swansea Branch have worked with a will, and their efforts fully deserved the success achieved. The Branch has a very energetic secretary in the person of Mr. B. Dupree, and we congratulate the local Society on having so capable an official.

To-day (October 7) Mr. Cohen lectures twice, afternoon and evening, in the Secular School, Pole Lane, Failsworth. Manchester friends will please note.

A new departure is being made in Birmingham by the local Branch of the N. S. S., which has taken the Repertory Theatre for a course of four lectures. The first lecture will be delivered this evening (Oct. 7) by Mr. J. T. Lloyd. If the meetings receive the support they deserve, they will be continued beyond those already arranged. In any case, we hope that all Birmingham Freethinkers will see that Mr. Lloyd gets the audience he deserves. It is a capital opportunity to introduce an inquiring Christian friend to the meetings. The lecture commences at 7 o'clock.

An Edinburgh correspondent complains of the irregular delivery of his paper by the local newsagent. We can only say that the delay is due to no fault at this end, and where we receive complaints we do all we can to remedy them. We hope our friends will do all they can to help by applying pressure at their end. The same gentleman writes that he was told the Freethinker had been charged to him by the wholesale agent as a threepenny paper. Perhaps he thought it was well worth it.

From the Cape Argus:—

> A young lady witness in a charge of theft, dealt with by the A.R.M. at the Second Criminal Court yesterday, declined to be sworn. "I am an atheist," she declared, "and will speak only the truth."

The lady in question is, we are proud to say, the wife of one of our readers. We hope her example will have its proper influence on all members of the "sterner" sex. She is, certainly, a fine example to her own.

The National Weekly had no less than three quotations from the Freethinker in a single issue of recent date. We are glad to note this as an indication of the way in which the press boycott is being slowly broken down. The National Weekly was a sixpenny journal, but is now under new management, and has been reduced to twopence. It is characterized by a breadth of view and sanity of utterance much to be commended. We say this because we feel it to be deserved, not from any ulterior motive.

Encouraged by the success of their last winter's meetings, the North London Branch are continuing their debates on Sunday evenings at the St. Pancras Reform Club, 15, Victoria Road, Kentish Town, at 7.30. An interesting little syllabus of fixtures up to Christmas has reached us, from which we learn that several well-known Freethought speakers and writers are taking part in the discussions. Admission is free, and every member of the audience has an opportunity of presenting his or her view. The subjects will be announced in our Guide Notice every week, and we wish the venture the success it deserves.

A young Dublinite, from whom we hope to hear more, writes:—

> I have to smile when I read your outbursts against British molehills of superstition. Have you ever been in Ireland, holy Ireland, where, even at the present moment—in this year of science, 1917—our numerous shops of piety display postcards of a soldier miraculously reinvested with speech and hearing, last August, in one of our hospitals, through the God-sent intervention of the "Little Flower"! Ireland, where a word against the supreme pontiff produces, on the part of females, undue displays of the whites of the eyes: Ireland, where a fictitious freedom is demanded by slaves blinded to a greater thraldom, a greater need? Your columns are as empty of notes on Irish progress—I say progress, for a worm will turn and a snail ascend—as our shops are empty of your paper. I know but one shop that sells it. Truly we are a rich pasture, watered by a divine hand! Really, I think, you should do something for our regeneration. Yet what could you do? Were all hoardings to display propagandist leaflets, were every person the recipient of pamphlets, the only result would be the indignant assertion of divine authority and its sympathetic reception. Come over to Ireland and help us. You could include our chief cities in your itinerant lectures—but no, don't do that; the time for martyrdom is not yet. For a first attempt, perhaps, this letter is a trifle long, but I cannot refrain from adding that the Freethinker affords me genuine pleasure, reminiscent and anticipatory, and a feeling of fellowship I have never yet known.

We do not in the least complain of the length of this letter. Nor will our readers. It is too racy for complaint. The only part of Ireland we have lectured in is Belfast. And our experience there was quite gratifying.

"Arley Lane" writes a two-column descriptive account of Mr. Cohen's evening lecture in the Birmingham Town Hall on September 23rd. The report is well done, and is written in "Arley Lane's" well known racy and reflective manner. He notes that the audience was large, attentive, appreciative, and, he adds, possessed the quality of being early which proved an interest, and sat eager and attentive during the lecture.

New Testament Legends for Young Readers.

V.—More Healing and Preaching.

A group of grey-bearded Jews came to Jesus and salaamed, and said politely,

"We beg you to do a favour to our Roman friend, the Captain of the Hundred. Though he belongs to the nation that conquered us, this centurion loves our Hebrew nation, and he has even built us a synagogue in this city of Capernaum. He has a sick servant whom he wishes you to save from death. Sir, we beseech you to do this."

Jesus set out for the Roman officer's house. He had nearly reached the door, when two or three people came out to say the Captain felt he ought not to trouble the Master of the Jinn to enter; for just as he—a Roman officer—was readily obeyed by his men, even at one short command, so the sickness demons would fly if Jesus would but speak one masterly word.

"Do you hear that?" asked Jesus of the crowd who followed him. "This man has more faith in my power than any Jew has."

The servant was able to shake off the demon the very next moment.

The day after, Jesus went into a city called Nain, and many of his disciples went with him, and much people. From the city gate came forth a sad procession, following a bier, on which lay a young man dead. The dead man's mother wept. She had lost first her husband, and now her only son.

When Jesus saw her, he had pity on her, and said, "Weep not."

He touched the bier. The bearers stood still.

"Young man," cried Jesus, "rise!"

The dead sat up, began to speak, and embraced his mother.

"A prophet, a prophet!" shouted the people. "Praise God! A great prophet has come among us!"

From village to village, and from Galilee in the north to Judea in the south, the report of this wonder flew.

John the Baptist heard the story. He was now in prison. He had dared, in his plain, blunt way, to rebuke King Herod Antipas for his bad deeds. The King's answer was to clap the pioneer in jail. And John the prisoner sent two of his friends to put the question to Jesus,—

"Are you the Mighty Prophet who will baptize folk with fire, and fan the evil chaff away from the good wheat?"

They followed the Master of the Jinn from place to place, watching his acts of power; and then returned to tell the prisoner how the blind eyes saw, deaf ears heard, lame legs walked easily, lepers lost their impure skins, and the dead sat up on their biers.

Alas for the brave pioneer! We saw him, as a baby, named Heaven's Gift (John). We saw him living in the desert. We saw him baptizing in Jordan's stream. We saw him rebuke a king. And the last scene takes place in the prison cell. By order of Herod Antipas, the valiant and honest John is beheaded. When old Zacharias smiled for joy, and sang the hymn of triumph, and called the child "The Prophet of the Highest," he little thought John would die a martyr's death in the darkness of a royal jail.

One day, a Pharisee invited Jesus to eat with him. But he supposed that Jesus, being a sort of peasant-prophet, and not a gentlemanly scribe, would not care for the usual good manners. So he brought no water to wash his feet; he gave him no kiss of welcome; he sprinkled no perfumed oil on his guest's hair.

An outcast woman—not poor, but not at all respectable—entered the dining-room, for such rooms had open doors, and passers-by might enter without being thought rude.

She knelt beside the couch on which the Prophet sat, and she cried, and her tears fell on his feet, and she wiped the drops with her long hair. She opened an alabaster box of ointment, and poured the sweet scent upon the feet of the teacher whose words she loved to hear.

A grimace and a frown from the Pharisee made Jesus say,—

"Simon, my friend,"—

"Yes, master?"

"It may interest you to hear what a man did to two debtors, neither of whom had a penny to pay the debt with. One owed 500 silver pence, the other 50. He let both go free. And which do you think loved him most for his kindness?"

"The 500 pence debtor, I have doubt."

"Just so. And now look at this woman. She is a sinner, and has lived a life not at all respectable; while you, friend Simon, have been genteel and correct. She is the 500 debtor, you the 50. You gave me no washing-water, no kiss, no perfumed oil. She, in her thankfulness, gave me her tears, pressed a kiss upon my feet, and anointed them with oil. And her many sins are forgiven."

The genteel and correct persons who sat round the dining-table looked disgusted. Jesus quietly told the woman to go in peace.

She had heard him tell how the kingdom was open to those who, as honest trees, bare honest fruit. Even if sinners sinned they could repent; they could step out on a new road; they could become good trees. She was glad.

Thus, some folk, like Simon the Pharisee, paid little heed to the Prophet; others, like the crying woman, admired him, and listened with respect to his words. He made all this clear to the people one day by reciting a simple story:—

> A sower went out over a ploughed field to sow his corn seed; and the field had different sorts of soil in it, and different things happened to the seed. Some grains fell on the beaten path, trodden hard by the feet of men, and of course they could not sink into the earth. Birds swooped down, and ate the grains. Some seeds fell on rock, where there was but a slight layer of soil; and the corn plants, unable to strike deep root, grew but a little while, and then withered away. Some grains got scattered among thorn bushes, and the bushes choked off the growing corn. Other grains fell on splendid soil, and sprang up in fine, healthy plants; and the ears of corn were full of grain, yielding a hundredfold profit to the farmer.

That is to say, some people were poor scholars, and did not take in the teacher's lessons; others took in the grains of wise teaching, and bore fruit in plenty, by leading a kindly life.

When the crowds of villagers, fishermen, and all the rest had gone home, Jesus would chat with his twelve Missionaries (Apostles), and show them how to interest the people by such stories. For it was of no use to bore the folk with dull and harsh sermons. They must tell lively and charming tales, or parables. A man (said he) who wants to light a room, must put his candle on a candlestick, so that it can throw its rays on all sides of a room. A good story-teller threw a light that cheered and helped. But dull and stodgy preachers, who told no happy tales, were like silly men who put the candle inside a pot, or under a bed, where none could enjoy the blessed light.[1]

[1] So I interpret Luke viii. 16, 17.

It was at this time, when Jesus began his parable-telling, that a message was brought to him. His mother, Mary, and his brothers, wished to come and talk with him; but, so great was the crowd that gathered to listen to his stories, his family were not able to get near. He called to the people's mind his tale of the sower who sowed words of wise teaching, and then he exclaimed,—

"Who is my mother, and who are my brothers? All who hear the word and do it as well as hear it,—these folk I count as my mother and my brethren."

* * * *

In the time when the Gospels were written (second century), people believed many stories of rising from the dead.

A Greek myth told how a lady, named Alcestis, so loved her husband that she gave her own life to the Death-god in order to save that of her beloved. As she sickened, he got stronger. As she died, he felt quite well. He placed her body in a vault. Just then, who should call at his house but his friend Herakles, the lion-killer? When Herakles heard what had happened, he offered to fetch Alcestis back from the tomb, and he stepped into the vault just as Death came in to bear the heroic woman away. Herakles gripped hold of Death, and would not let him go until he promised to spare Alcestis; and she sat up, and began to speak, and returned to her husband.

Another Greek story is that of the musician Orpheus, who went down into the shadow-world of Hades, hoping to bring back his dead wife. His music on the stringed lyre so pleased the queen of the Underworld that she allowed Orpheus to take his wife away with him on condition that he did not look at his beloved until they reached the upper world and the sunlight. He could not wait; he looked; and she fled away down, and he saw her no more. In the Gospel times, people formed Orpheus societies, or Orphic societies, and worshipped the Raiser of the Dead, and sang songs, and repeated prayers to Gods and Demons; and they claimed to know what happened to souls that passed into the Kingdom of Death. They delighted in pictures of Orpheus, holding his lyre, and surrounded by beasts which had once been wild, but had been tamed by the sweet power of his music. The lyre of Orpheus could even make rocks and trees move and dance to the charming tunes.

The Myth of God.

The idea of God is a myth. It is a "false hypothesis" put forward as an explanation of the origin, constitution, and continuance of the universe.

Ever since the feelings of awe and wonder were evolved in man, the human mind has endeavoured to explain the phenomena of existence in harmony with those feelings. But, unfortunately, awe and wonder have often proved too strong for man's desire for accuracy, and the emotions have been allowed to usurp the place of reason. As man has looked out upon surrounding objects, and as those objects have made certain impressions upon his sense-organs, he has felt in varying degrees a desire to formulate some sort of explanation of the origin and nature of things. Idea after idea has been put forward to account for the universe; theory has followed theory; and philosophy has given place to philosophy, as regards prominence in the minds of men, until the whole sea of human thought is seething with conflicting systems of science, philosophy, and theology.

It has been impossible, and is likely to continue to be impossible, for man to live without trying to frame for himself some hypothesis concerning the universe, and particularly the earth on which we live. It is only natural that it should be so. Life would, indeed, be sordid to many of us if we did not at some time or other exercise our minds in trying to solve the perplexing problems with which we are surrounded.

Not the least prominent among the theories put forward to explain universal phenomena is the idea of God in all its variations. Many of us have come to the conclusion that there is no evidence of the existence of a supernatural being in objective actuality, and corresponding to any one of the myriad variations of the God-idea with which the minds of men have been troubled; but the field of thought has yet to be cleared of a great deal of confusion which has gathered around this question.

The days of mythical thinking have not yet passed away, nor are there signs that they are likely to do so with any great rapidity. Men of the twentieth century can evolve myths as easily as they were evolved by the ancients. No doubt modern myths often differ in form from those of passed ages, but they are to be found in every branch of literature. Much of our thinking will appear to be as mythical to future generations as ancient stories of gods and nymphs appear to us now.

We must learn to accustom ourselves to the idea that a myth is not necessarily a story that was told in the early days of man's history. It is not necessarily something gross and unseemly, or something foolish and fantastical said about an ancient deity. A myth may be an argument that is considered to be one of the most profound and acceptable arguments put forward to account for some phenomena, religious, sociological, or otherwise. An argument or belief which finds wide acceptance is mythical in proportion to the degree of fallacy which it contains.[1] One of the greatest tasks before those who are engaged in guiding the education of the world is that of training the human mind to avoid creating myths. This would be difficult enough if there were no ideas about supernaturalism to be contended with; but with such ideas holding vast sway the work is colossal.

It is interesting, yet often saddening, to note the various forms which have been given to the God-idea as man has tried to frame some conception of a being more mighty and wiser than himself but after his own image.

That the idea of God has had only one mode of origin is a position that is not capable of being proved in view of the fact that while we are able to obtain a great deal of information concerning the early development of religious ideas, it is impossible to be accurate in every detail.

Corpse-worship was, no doubt, one origin of the God idea. For some time the mind of early man would not realize that a dead relative had fallen into anything more than a sleep, from which he would ultimately awake and return to his daily toils. For a few days he would be looked upon as someone acting mysteriously, and his awakening would be anxiously looked for. But as the sleep continued, the relatives of the dead man would begin to form new ideas concerning him. They would gradually realize that he was no more to join them in their daily tasks. Probably it would be recollected that when the man was awake he was usually active, and was able to speak and make signs to his fellows. But it would now be observed that for the past few days the corpse had been motionless; it had neither spoken nor made signs. The mystery would thus be increased, and lacking the spiritualistic theory, those to whom the dead man belonged might feel disposed to worship the corpse. If the dead man were loved and respected by his kinsmen during his life, he would be worshipped with feelings of love; but if he had been a tyrant, then fear would be the motive for worshipping the corpse. As the corpse decayed and vanished, it might occur to those who loved their now dead relative that he must be living somewhere, as they cannot bear to think he has ceased to exist. And those who feared their former tyrant might think that the tyrant had tricked them, and having got up again was now going about in a mysterious manner trying to do them harm. Gradually the worship of the corpse might evolve into the worship of something spiritual.

In other tribes dreams were probably the germ of the God-idea. During sleep we have subjective experiences which are often similar to our experiences in everyday life. To primitive man his dream experiences would be proof that he was able to live apart from his body, and confirmation of this would be given when several members of the same tribe related their dream experiences. In this way belief in another life would be evolved, and the deification of a relative or friend would be made possible. When it was found that the departed spirit of a dead person did not return, as after an ordinary sleep, it might be thought that he had gone to another land where he might be of importance. This being so, he must be communicated with by prayer, and useful things must be sent to him by being placed at or in his grave. Sacrifices must be made to appease him if he is feared, and to do him honour if he is loved. In time beloved and highly respected persons would become family or tribal gods.

It is probable that some tribes of early man formed their first God-idea by reflecting about the heavenly bodies. These would be looked upon as mysterious beings who could influence mankind for good or evil, and, therefore, would require to be prayed to and offered sacrifice by all who desired prosperity. In this way the sun has been worshipped as the god of light and warmth —the God of fertilization and giver of all life. The moon has been rendered homage as the queen of heaven or spirit of the night, while the planets and stars have been reverenced as the guardian gods of various departments of life, and as influencing the destiny of individuals believed to be under their power.

Fetish worship, or the worship of natural and artificial objects, has held sway over the minds of many primitive men, and in many places has not lost its sway up to the present time.

The fetish worshipped by men of primitive culture was made of wood, stone, and the bones of animals, or, perhaps, a drop of water was taken from a sacred river and carried about by the person who had taken a fancy to it. The fetish was believed to have some magical power by which it protected its devotee, but if it failed to do this, the worshipper often took the liberty of throwing his little god away. Man often judges and condemns his God while professing to be a most devout worshipper. It is to be feared that fetishism has been much more wider spread than we are usually prepared to admit, as we not infrequently meet with people, living amidst modern civilization, who carry on their persons relics of fetishism in the shape of a cross, an anchor, or some other charm or symbol.

Another widespread belief was that men were under the influence of good and evil demons to whom prosperity or failure in life was largely due, and at death the souls of men were escorted either to heaven or hell by good or bad demons. Among so-called Pagan peoples the demons were believed to be in the service of the gods, a belief transmitted to both Roman Catholic and Protestant Christians who believe in God and his kingdom of angels and the Devil with his progeny of imps.

Animals, rivers, trees, etc., have also been objects of worship owing to their usefulness to man. Or, in many instances, nothing but a peculiar fancy for a certain animal, river, or tree may have been the origin of its ultimately becoming the god or goddess of a tribe. So, too, natural objects have been looked upon as being under the guardianship of gods, and the imagination of superstitious man has filled pantheons with flower-gods, river-gods, rain-gods, tree-gods, fire-gods, storm-gods, and gods of the hills and dales, with a host of corresponding goddesses, and a multitude of nymphs and fairies. Virtues and vices have been deified, hearth and home have received their protecting and sanctifying gods and goddesses, and nations have been advised, guided, and reproved by a supernatural ruler.

In this way has the human mind tried to explain the many problems presented to it by the mysterious phenomena of nature. Man has professed to see, in what has been going on around him, evidence of the existence and constant activity of supernatural power. Sometimes this power was thought to belong to many gods, at other times it has been attributed to two or three gods, and a portion of the human race has believed in one Almighty and solitary governor of the universe. But Monotheism is a no less mythical attempt to explain universal phenomena than Polytheism, as we shall discover if we examine the various and often-learned arguments put forward in support of Monotheism. There is no reason why we should apply the term "myth" to the false ideas and beliefs of antiquity and not to those of modern times. This being so, we should not hesitate to describe as mythical any modern idea of God which can be proved to be untenable on grounds of reason. Let us turn our attention to some of the chief arguments for belief in the existence of a wise, loying, and all-powerful God, who is father to all mankind. As Dr. James Orr has said in The Christian View of God and the World: "If God is a reality, the whole universe rests on a supernatural basis." On the other hand, if God is a myth, then the universe is natural in its origin, constitution, and continuance. Here the theologically minded, and all who take a purely natural view of things, come to the parting of the ways.

(To be concluded.)

"We Don't Want to Fight, but".....

We are covered with shame. We apologise. We abjectly apologise. We sit in sackcloth and ashes. We have suggested that the clergy are patriotic, but not to the extent of risking their skins. Again, we apologise. We have been brought to a realization of facts through reading "Our Correspondence Column" in The Dawn of Day, a magazine published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. This column purports to answer "Questions commonly asked about the Bible or Church, or other religious matters.....provided they are of sufficient general interest," and it is significant that two of the answers are to such questions as "Why do not the Clergy fight?" and "Why do French priests fight?"

We had thought that the clergy did not fight because they did not want to, but we were mistaken. We are informed "that the clergy are under orders, in their case 'Holy Orders,' and it is their duty to obey their bishops .....but the bishops have felt bound to keep the old rule by which the clergy are forbidden to fight."

Bishops did not always respect the rule not to kill with the sword, to the extent of avoiding battle, but with a fine reading of the law went into battle with a very serviceable weapon—the mace. The name of Morton, Bishop of Ely, in the Lancastrian plots; or Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, afterwards Cardinal, suggests much; while the warlike tendencies of the clergy are strongly emphasized by the four abbots who led the "Pilgrimage of Grace" to defend their incomes.

The answer, however, discovers that some priests still have fighting blood, so "when a priest has found himself impelled by conscience to offer himself as a combatant, and the bishop is satisfied that arrangements can be made for carrying on the parish in his absence, leave to go has been granted in a number of instances."

Notice that artistic touch, "a number of instances." Beautiful! Considering that those who want to fight are breaking a rule, ordinary mortals would conclude that the fighting parsons would require to satisfy the bishop as to their conscientious desire to fight. But 'tis not so.

Next we are informed that, "Of course, it might happen that the State called up every man to fight, including ministers of religion; then the clergy would gladly go." This reads well, but it is rather unfortunate that the answer to "Why do the French priests fight?" should be, "They are compelled to fight by a law of the French Republic, which was introduced as part of a deliberate policy of persecuting the French Church. This should not be quoted as a model for imitation by the British State."

In other words, the clergy would gladly fight if they were forced to, but for goodness sake don't force them. Extraordinarily courageous are the clergy—The Dawn of Day says so.

But, again, we must apologise. "The young priests generally have felt that their right place is where the young men of the country are, and so nearly all have offered their services as chaplains to the Forces, though it has not been possible to accept all who volunteered."

There are only two slight omissions here which necessitate the insertion after services of, "well behind the firing line," and after Forces, "with officers' emoluments." The desperate plight of the clergy is shown in these two replies. They have lost the power to gull the mass of the people, and they know it. The unquestioning attitude of the people has gone, and with it the power of the priest. It is, indeed, the dawn of day, of the glorious day when the scales shall have dropped from the eyes of man; and, he, seeing, cease to flounder in the morass of superstition, but struggling to the path of Reason, move quickly to the goals of Humanity, Intellectual Freedom, and Economic Equity.

PREJUDICE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—I should like to thank Mr. W. Mann for his courteous reply to my letter. Upon the main question we must, I fear, agree to differ—by which I would not be understood as saying that I regard the survival of personality as a proven fact, I merely suspend judgment; but his letter introduces a very interesting side-issue, upon which I would welcome the opportunity, with your permission, to say a word or two.

"Nobody," Mr. Mann writes, "condemns a man for being prejudiced in favour of morality and virtue." I did not, I think, say anything in respect of condemning prejudice; I said only that prejudice appeared to me to be inconsistent with free thought. I say it again; and I would not be prepared to qualify that opinion in any way, to allow excuses or exemptions on whatever account, to grant to the Freethinker special dispensations in favour of certain ideas embodied in certain words. He must bring everything to the unfettered tribunal of his intellect. A particular face value has grown upon such words as "morality" and "virtue"; but that does not relieve every intelligent man from his individual responsibility to enquire into the basis of that value; he is not entitled comfortably to imbibe it with his mother's milk and leave it unexamined. For my own part, I think that a standard of conduct, roughly—though only roughly—corresponding with that which in modern civilization is called morality, is necessary and desirable in the interests of orderly social life. That is not a prejudice; it is the fruit of elementary reason.

If our minds are held in the thraldom of prejudice in the respects which appear to Mr. Mann to be excusable, we are debarred from changing or modifying our ethical code to suit changing conditions. Let us take out a single instance. It is a principle of morality that a man shall have only one wife. It is a principle that has suited the majority of people, and which, therefore, on the whole, has worked fairly well, though some of us may have thought that it was unwisely and unjustly overstrained in its application. Now, assume, for argument's sake, that this War lasts for four or five years longer and denudes the world of twenty millions of young men from the white races. If we are "prejudiced in favour of morality and virtue," the monogamous principle must stand, in spite of that denudation; our minds are not free to deal with it, we cannot modify it, however desirable, and otherwise, such a course might appear to be in the interests of society, or of a particular nation. I believe that if even fifty millions of young men were lost, such a frankly prejudiced man, for example, as Lord Halifax would be found standing upon the disappearing remnant of the white world, proudly waving his flag of opposition "to the very utmost of our power," while the submerging waves of black, and brown, and yellow gathered round it. Mr. Mann, logically, would have to stand with him.

ATHEIST OR AGNOSTIC?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—May I set out, as shortly as your valuable space demands, the reasons why, even after reading your able comments on my letter in to-day's issue of the Freethinker, I still prefer to call myself Agnostic?

The difference between us seems to lie in our different ideas as to what is conceivable and what is not. About the word "God" by itself, we agree that it means nothing, and therefore, as you well say, "neither belief nor disbelief can be admitted." But where I differ from you is in your reply (to use your own words—italics mine), "I disbelieve in any such existence," to a Theist who assures you that "there exists a God who is omnipotent, or omniscient, or is a 'First Cause,' or who is 'pure mind,' etc." These adjectives, "omnipotent," "omniscient," etc., tacked on to the word "God," evidently bring it, for you, within the limits of conceivability, so that you can definitely say, "I disbelieve."

In my view, this is not so. Any special God, such as the God of the Christians, is still for me the word "God" with certain attributes—"infinitely good," "omnipotent," etc.—attached to it; and these attributes do not interest me: to have any meaning at all, they must themselves be attached to something with a meaning. The question for me is, What is it that is omnipotent? and to this I can get no reply. So my answer to your Theist would still be not "I disbelieve," but "I am an Agnostic—one who does not know what you mean." But if anyone chooses to call me an Atheist, they can do so. I certainly do not use the word "Agnostic" as a sop to the foolish bigotry of the pious.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

Miss E. M. Vance, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
> Name.....
> Address.....
> Occupation .....
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

God's Opportunity.

"Providence" has had many chances during the past three years of vindicating its existence. Putting on one side the credit it might have gained by preventing the War altogether, there was the affair of the Lusitania, the torpedoing of hospital ships, the bombing of hospitals, the slaughter of women and children during air raids, all of which might have been prevented in such a way as to make the workings of God clear to all. Last of all there was the failure of the Papal peace note. That having failed, as it was bound to fail, for the Pope dare not denounce his Catholic supporters, and Protestant Christians naturally looked askance at Roman Catholic interference, "Providence" again had its chance. Some spectacular move might have been attempted. We do not say how; it is not within our province to advise omnipotence. But something might have been done. For, after all, the problem is really God's problem. We are all his children, and when the children fall out it is a parent's duty to make peace—if he can. But all we are certain of is the bald fact that "Providence" has shamefully neglected its opportunities. It is leaving the War to be finished by purely mundane methods, and if sensible people draw a logical conclusion from the situation Providence will have only itself to blame.

The World With and Without God.

We Londoners have sat night after night listening to the roar of guns and the crashing of bombs, with the realization of all the misery and horror these sounds implied. And many, as they sat quite helpless amid the infernal din, may have reflected, as we did, that this was the year of our Lord 1917, that this brutal warfare was not being waged by "Heathen" or "Pagan" peoples, but by the foremost Christian nations of the world. These nations have "enjoyed" Christian teaching for centuries. They have been energetic in fitting out missionary societies to carry the Gospel to the ends of the earth—or, at least, such parts of the earth as promised some kind of commercial return. Churches have been planted everywhere, Bibles distributed with almost the profusion of tradesmen's circulars, while parsons wander about by the thousand. Whatever else Europe has lacked, there has been no shortage of religion. And so we sat and listened to the roar of guns and bombs, and wondered how much worse the world could have been had it never heard of Christianity. It is easily conceivable that it might have been better. It is hardly likely that it would have been worse. Christians are fond of saying what will happen if the world gives up its faith in Christ. Well, the world retains its faith in Christ, and we know what has happened. We can place the fears of interested prophecy against the evidence of recorded fact. The world with and the world without Christianity. We know what it is in the one case. It doesn't seem to demand extraordinary courage to risk what it may become in the other eventuality. It might be better. It could hardly be worse.

Is God Dead?

"God," said the Bishop of London, the other day, "is not dead." "If 'no sparrow falls to the ground without your Father'.....then no life in this great city is unwatched and unmarked by God. It is not his will that one of his little ones shall perish, and therefore it is blasphemous to say or think that bombing defenceless women and children is according to the will of God." But if there is no life unwatched and unmarked by God, by whose will does it happen that women and children are bombed? How can anything happen without his will? He can change men's hearts—that is the true significance of the Christian doctrine of grace. Why doesn't he change the hearts of the German High Command? And if these things happen against God's will, are we to believe that God's will can only be done if the Kaiser and Hindenburg and Von Tirpitz agree with it? Is Providence a dependency of Germany? God knows all about it; he marks every life in this "great city"! Well, we know all about it. The Government knows all about it. But this gives precious little satisfaction. Nay, the people are shrieking against the Government because adequate steps have not been taken to prevent these raids. Can it be wondered at if God is included in the same condemnation? God, says the Bishop, is not dead. Maybe not; perhaps he has only retired from active service. If not, will some Christian be good enough to tell us what God is doing in this War? America has joined the Allies. Japan has come to the help of Christendom, and the followers of Confucius have decided to prevent Christians butchering each other without end. Europe sent China Christian missionaries to teach her Christianity. She retorts by sending us help to recover decency. It is a magnificent reprisal. What is God doing? If, with the power to do something, he does nothing, is he not helping the wrong against the right? God is not dead. That is the Bishop's opinion. But he is impotent. That is a fact—at least it is the only conclusion consonant with elementary decency.

What the War Does.

Is it to be wondered that, when people reflect on all that is going on, they end by dismissing a God who, while knowing all and marking all, does nothing? Says "Vexatus," in the Sunday Chronicle:—

> There were preachers who affirmed that we needed this war as a regenerator. They are now, I hope, disillusioned. War is not a regenerator. It is a brutalizing curse.
> This war has revived the jungle instincts and dragged us back. It has shown us the profiteer, pitiless as the shark or the tiger. It has made vast numbers of people Atheists. It has inflicted unspeakable agony on humanity, and destroyed the noblest of our kind.

We agree with all this; it is only what we have ourselves said many times since the War commenced. But we do not understand why the making of people Atheists should be associated with a process of brutalization. For it was not Atheists who made the War; it was not Atheism that led up to the War. They were Christians who prepared the War and who made it possible. All the brutality, the greed, the lying that have been expressed during the War were fostered before the War actually began. This War began in a world saturated with Christianity, and if it ends with a world in which Atheism is more pronounced, there will be small cause for regret. Men cannot be more like the shark and tiger as Atheists than they have been, and are, as believers in God. Of course, the War is making many Atheists. That is undeniable. But this is not due to the brutalizing effects of war, but because the War has opened the eyes of thousands to the utter uselessness and falsity of religion. The "Providence of God" is an insult to human intelligence in the light of the last three years, the "Heavenly Father" an outrage on human decency when mumbled by a well-paid Bishop over the bodies of newly slaughtered children.

Missing His Chance.

This War has been for God a period of lost opportunities. Nothing has been done to end it that could not have been done without him. Belgium was overrun by Germany, and he did nothing. Serbia was laid waste, and he remained quiescent. Poland was ravaged, and he remained silent. Towns were bombed and children murdered, still he gave no sign. More, over and over again on the Western Front the British advance has been stayed, and the German defence helped, by a sudden change in the weather from fair to stormy. And we have a right to expect better treatment. For in this War we are God's Ally. The Bishop of London and hundreds of clergymen have told us so. More, Mr. Bottomley has told us so; and, as Omar says, "He knows, He knows." We have a right to demand that God shall do something to prove that he is not leaving his Allies in the lurch. If we are to trust Mr. Harold Begbie, he has sent angels to cheer up the wounded on the battlefield. Let him send a few to paralyse the arms of German gunners, or blind the eyes of raiding airmen. There are scores of ways in which God might help; there is not a single way in which he does help. Men and women are learning the moral of the situation. We live in strenuous times, and we have no use for a God who does nothing. And whether he cannot or will not help, he does not. God does nothing. We knew it before the War began. Thousands have realized it since. To them the War gave God a superb chance for vindicating his power. He failed to rise to the occasion; and in the minds of multitudes the Deity's epitaph has been written, "Died of lost opportunities."

Chapman Cohen.

A False Apology for God.

The Rev. John A. Hutton, D.D., of Glasgow, is a Presbyterian divine of world-wide reputation, who is in great demand both as preacher and as writer of semi-theological articles for the religious press. In the Christian World for October 4, he discusses the subject of "Repentance and Reconciliation" in a style peculiar to himself. He begins by declaring that in these times of terror there is only one thing that needs to be said. With much truth he avers that in his own view, "the one thing which seems to touch the seat of the present misery is that the dominant peoples of the earth are not at one as to the Nature and Will of God." A truer and more pertinent observation was never made. There never has been among mankind anything like unanimity of belief as to the nature and will of God. Not only is the German conception of the Supreme Being different from the British conception, but scarcely any two persons in any nation are theologically at one. Dr. Hutton himself admits that to men of the world this diversity of views on God is "an abstract and impalpable cause with which to associate such concrete and disastrous things as hatred and the shedding of blood." He makes another admission:—

> Men of the world will even go so far as to say that the idea of God is one that never occurred to those who were responsible first and last for the present outrage.

So far as the argument is concerned, it is wholly immaterial who are responsible for the War, the fact being that any nation's Deity is its own character objectified—nothing more and nothing less. Carlyle pointed this out long ago in his Heroes and Hero Worship, and Matthew Arnold elaborated it in several of his works, particularly in Literature and Dogma and God and the Bible. Of the existence of any other Divinity there is no evidence whatever. Dr. Hutton contends that "the things which have greatest influence with us are the things which work unconsciously," which may be perfectly true; but, surely, if there were a God, he would make himself known, and exert the wholesomest influence consciously. It is easy enough to say "that it was the absence of any controlling thought of God which made it possible for nations to harden into such a condition of hatred and suspicion and fear that open war becomes a kind of relief to them"; but it is not so easy to explain why the Christian God, if he exists, did not exercise such a controlling influence upon his children as to prevent their hardening into such a deplorable condition. If there be no God, the War is no mystery; but if there is, he is fully as incomprehensible as the Athanasian Creed represents him to be.

Of course, Dr. Hutton is professionally bound to retain and defend the idea of God; but his method of doing so is open to serious criticism. He says:—

> The putting away of God, the neglect to cultivate that delicate apprehension of the Unseen which is at once the strongest and the weakest thing in man, is followed inevitably not by an indifference towards God, but by an attitude of deepening hostility to all the ideas about life, about the nature of man, about our task here in this world, about the secret treacheries of our human nature, ideas which found their reason and source in the great idea of a Holy God. The denial or neglect of God is not the end of a process, on attaining which man may continue his journey with some slight adjustment of himself to the new outlook. The denial of God, sooner or later, comes to be the denial of the ultimate decency of the Universe.

That extract is eminently worthy of the parsonic mind. Every statement in it is false. It is utterly untrue to say that all ideas about life, about the nature of man, and so forth, find "their reason and source in the great idea of a Holy God." That may accurately be said of all Christian ideas about man and his destiny; but there is no escape from the conclusion that all natural ideas find their reason and source in Nature itself, being the direct products of the evolutionary process. Ideas do not descend from above, but ascend from beneath. It is quite true that Atheists maintain an attitude of deepening hostility to all ideas of an alleged supernatural origin, and towards that religion "whose heart is in the other world," their belief being in this world alone. The crowning falsehood of the extract is in the closing sentence: "The denial of God, sooner or later, comes to be the denial of the ultimate decency of the Universe." The natural inference from that statement is that at present the Universe is in a state of lamentable indecency, which, surely, cannot be creditable to the God Dr. Hutton so enthusiastically champions. Is not an indecent Universe the complete negation of a God of infinite power, justice, and love? And yet, in spite of his faith in such a Deity, who sits on the throne as invincible Sovereign, the reverend gentleman is unable to announce anything better than the ultimate decency of the Universe.

Without the belief in God, Dr. Hutton does not see "how in the long run men and nations are to continue to live in harmony, or are to continue to be able to resist the predatory instincts of licentious human nature"; but is he blind to the fact that when the belief in God was strongest there was the least harmony in society? Has he forgotten the Thirty Years' War, which was waged simply because men did believe in God, but could not see eye to eye as to the best method of serving him? Again and again has the belief in God been made the pretext for war in Christendom. Dr. Hutton knows as well as we do that the tendency of religion has always been, not to unite, but to divide mankind into opposing factions, and so cause all sorts of decimating conflicts. And yet he has the audacity to predict that the denial of God would make an harmonious human life impossible.

The curious thing is that nations which pretend to be at peace with God are now at war with one another, and that they all claim God as their invisible but effective Ally. Germans, Austrians, Bulgarians, and Turks are sure that God is fighting for and with them, and will eventually give them a glorious victory. All the powers on the other side cherish the like conviction and hope, and are buoyed up thereby. Now, Dr. Hutton assures us that without repentance can we have peace, neither with God nor with one another as individuals or as nations. He claims, and rightly claims, that we have all done wrong, that we have a hundred causes for self-abasement, that we have permitted and have honoured courses, and policies, and sayings of the most ignoble character, and that the only way to permanent peace lies in repentance and reconciliation. All this is, doubtless, only too true; but to drag the name of God into it is to proclaim God's dismal failure as Governor of the world. When Jesus was born the legend says that the angels were heard singing "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men." The legend further declares that when he faced the end, he exclaimed: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." We know that neither the angelic song, nor Jesus' prediction of his own triumph, has been fulfilled; and the unavoidable inference is that the religion of the Cross, lacking all reality as a supernatural factor, has mainly served, in the hands of its priests, as an instrument to raise them into a position of iniquitous lordship over the minds and consciences of credulous people. Survey the history of the Church and assert, if you dare, that there ever has been a time when Christianity proved itself to be a supernatural force for the world's redemption. We frankly admit that the Church has been a tremendous power in the world, and that many Christians have been exceedingly good and useful people, but, at the same time, we do not hesitate to characterize the Church as an institution that has never justified its own claims, or to affirm that the excellent character displayed by many professing Christians is a purely human product. Neither God nor Christ has ever demonstrated his existence by any interference in human affairs.

Dr. Hutton does not know what a world without God would be like; and yet China, according to the testimony of those who know it best, is a highly moral country, in which there are millions of beautiful, almost ideal homes, though, to all intents and purposes, it has never had any definite doctrine of God, nor felt the need of the Christian religion. The same thing is true of Japan also. Is it not also true that even in Christendom the conditions of life have improved in proportion as the Christian faith has declined? A hundred years ago Great Britain was more religious than it is to-day; but would Dr. Hutton like the country to revert to the moral, social, and political state which then prevailed?

J. T. Lloyd.

The Exodus from Houndsditch.

Miching mallecho—this means mischief.
—Shakespeare, "Hamlet."

Uplift thy cross and go. Thy doom is said.
—Robert Buchanan, "The Wandering Jew."

Charles Bradlaugh who was, in his own characteristic way, a keen theologian, declared that religions did not die, but they changed; and Christianity itself is undergoing a transformation. The alteration has been taking place so quietly that it appears to have been wrought with the complete unconsciousness of clergy and congregations alike.

In England, the lamented Canon Farrar and other clergymen seem to have been the prime movers in this silent revolution. With quiet persistence they persuaded a very large number of their co-religionists that "hell," contrary to belief, was slightly less monotonous than "heaven" itself, and that everlasting punishment meant only an eternity of unpleasantness. Blood and brimstone were eliminated from the dictionary of the educated clergy. After that came the deluge, which has brought upon its flood undogmatic religionism and the rest of the beautiful nonsense which now passes for the religion of Christ. This dilution of dogma has had its disintegrating effect upon all the Churches. Painful Sabbaths have been replaced by pleasant Sunday afternoons. String bands and soloists take the place of leather-lunged preachers. Labour Members of Parliament, lady preachers, and other notorieties, threaten to oust the very parsons from their pulpits. This can have but one meaning; it is the secularizing of Christianity. Some time since, at a leading London Nonconformist place of worship, a well-known actor and a famous contributor to Punch occupied the pulpit to pronounce eulogiums upon a world-renowned Freethinker. The great queue of people outside the chapel gave the finishing touch of comedy. It was magnificent, but it was not Christianity as taught for twenty centuries. It shocks one; it is like meeting one's pet dog in the form of sausages.

Nor is this all. The Prayer Book itself has suffered. Changes have been made in the hallowed volume, and barbarous portions of the Psalms eliminated. It has even been suggested that the "strong language" in the Marriage Service is to be toned down. "Angels and ministers of grace defend us." If this sort of thing goes on, the Holy Bible and the Winning Post will be the only publications untouched by the dainty blue pencil of the censor.

The Christian superstition is crumbling. Never was there so little religion, never so much Secularism, as at the present day. Never have men attended churches and chapels so little; never have they attended hospital and philanthropic meetings so assiduously. Christianity is being absorbed by Secularism. The supernatural element in Christianity no longer satisfies, for no faith can satisfy which is based upon outworn ideas and outgrown ignorance. The mind of man is vigorously bestirring itself. Scepticism means approach to the truth, and truth cannot consort with the superstitions of the past. Men nowadays no longer accept upon mere trust the religious misbeliefs of their remote and ignorant ancestors. Over the pulpits of the fast emptying churches is inscribed: "To the glory of God." That is the voice of the past. Secularism sounds the triumphant note of the future, "to the service of man." For nearly twenty centuries the Churches have been praying "Our Father," and the day of human brotherhood seems farther off than ever. Secularism does not pray, but it works for the ennobling service of man for man, which will lead ultimately to the elimination of Christian superstition and to the glorification of humanity.

Straws show which way the wind is blowing. A statement of the task of the Free Churches after the War, published recently in the Daily Chronicle, shows clearly the Secularistic tendencies of the Nonconformist Churches. It mentions that the Free Church Council represents the local councils, to which 10,000 Free Churches send delegates, and then adds:—

> The local councils are composed of men and women who are peculiarly interested in the exemplary behaviour of the people, in the education, welfare, and health of the children, in fair wages, in sound housing conditions—in a word, in religion.

In this precious definition of religion the empty dogmas of orthodoxy have become of less importance than the snows of yesteryear. Nor, in the particular circumstances, is this so entirely surprising. Such awful facts as the world-war, with its attendant horrors, must make thoughtful men and women pause in reciting the Christian shibboleths. Few, we imagine, feel inclined to refer to a Heavenly Father at the moment when the conception implies that he is devouring his own children by hundreds of thousands. Their hands would be less inclined than usual to go up to "that inverted bowl we call the sky." Such unspeakable horrors as this world-war are hard to reconcile with any consolatory scheme of religion.

And, mark you, who hears the pathetic cry of humanity in anguish? Is it the thorn-crowned Messiah with his thousands of angels, or the Divine Mother with cohorts of cherubim, who come to succour the unhappy victims? Not at all! Mankind is left to its own resources, and it is to the ready sympathy of other men and women that the victims have to turn in the bitterest hours of sorrow and disaster.

Such a spectacle brings home to everyone the growth and change of ideas. Knowledge has widened in ways never dreamed of in the Eastern philosophy of the Christian religion. New tones have grown into human sentiment. All the lights and shadows of life have shifted, and its whole surface has been dyed in different colours. Naturally, we are progressing beyond the reach of outworn ideals. They voice different views which men have outgrown. They can make no direct response to them. At their note their minds and feelings rouse to no movement except amazement. They come like the "horns of Elfland, faintly blowing," and men realize that they were meant for other ears than ours, and are but an echo from the far-off days of ignorance and bigotry. The conscience of the race is rising above dogmas. A new impulse is at hand to make men join hands and hearts. This impulse is Secularism, which marches to certain victory under the glorious banners of Liberty and Fraternity.

Light on the Present Crisis.

An orthodox friend of long standing, who believes the Bible from cover to cover, has the habit of enclosing, whenever he writes, a religious tract for my especial benefit. Most of these have been of the usual character; but the last to come to hand relates to the War, and bears the title, Light on the Present Crisis. It is a small sixteen-page pamphlet, written by the Rev. Leonard Newby, of St. Julian's Vicarage, Shrewsbury, and furnishes a good example of the War being a fulfilment of prophecy. The "light" which this reverend gentleman sheds on the present crisis commences as follows:—

> And ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars; see that ye be not troubled: for all must come to pass, but the end is not yet. For nation shall rise against nation and kingdom against kingdom: and there shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes, in divers places. All these are the beginning of sorrows (Matt. xxiv. 6-8).

The italics are the reverend's own, and in case the reader should not perceive that the foregoing is really a "light" upon the subject, the Rev. L. Newby undertakes to expound the passage and make the matter clear to him. He says:—

> The prophetic period to which the words of the above passage refer has now arrived. Nation is rising against nation and kingdom against kingdom, and the sword is being bathed in human blood to an extent which hitherto has been unknown in this sad and weary world's history. Men and women are propounding questions one to another to which they can find no satisfactory answer, and no wonder, for the vexed question of the hour can only be answered by intelligent students of the prophetic Word.

Here we see that the Rev. L. Newby naturally ranks himself among "the intelligent students of the prophetic Word" who are adepts in the correct interpretation of prophecy. He assumes as a matter of course that the so-called "prediction" of the destruction of Jerusalem, from which the foregoing three verses are taken, was uttered by an historical Jesus about the year A.D. 30. But, as an "intelligent student" of Gospel history, he ought to have known that this grand "prophecy" could not have been written until after the event to which it refers had taken place. The reasons for the conclusion are many. I will only say here that there was nothing in the history of the Jews up to the year A.D. 66 (when the war with the Romans commenced) that could lead anyone to suppose that such a terrible and unforeseen event was ever likely to occur. Neither could anyone who lived in the time of Jesus know that in A.D. 65 the emperor Nero would send such an unjust, tyrannical, and senseless creature as Gessius Florus to be procurator of Judæa; nor could anybody know that it was the bullying and injustice of this man that goaded the Jews into taking up arms against the Romans. This great war was not foreseen in the time of Jesus. Matt. xxiv. is not a prediction, though written in that form. The writer could with perfect confidence say that Jerusalem and the temple would be destroyed; for he wrote after

A.D. 70. We know, also, that this great "prophecy" is a purely literary composition, modelled upon passages selected from the Old Testament and Apocryphal writings, and was never spoken, as represented.

The reverend gentleman then goes on to say: "It would be impossible to answer a tithe of the questions which perplexed men and women are asking concerning this great European War; but by God's grace I will try and answer five questions, not out of my imagination, but out of the Word of Truth."

Here it may be necessary to reassure the reader by saying that I have no intention of going into those "five questions"; the first will be sufficient. This reads:—

> Does not this terrible war with its unnameable atrocities justify us in fearing that there may be no God after all? If there was a God, would He not stretch forth His mighty hand and confound the politics and frustrate the knavish tricks of those whose creed is that might is right, and that the weakest must be crushed?

The mere fact that such a question is propounded by a clergyman may be taken as indicating that it had been seriously asked by professing Christians in his district. But whether there is, or is not, a being called "God" in some part of the Universe is a matter of very little importance. One fact, however, is certain: as far back as human records go, this God, if God there be, has given no sign of his existence. Wherever it is possible to verify ancient history, events ascribed to the action of this Being are found to be either fictitious or due to natural causes. Hence, whether a God exists or not, he never speaks, he never acts, or in any way makes his presence known; neither does he interfere in human affairs.

Leaving this matter, let us now see what is the Rev. Newby's answer to his own question. That reverend gentleman, in reply, says that if the great European War "had not come sooner or later, God's Word would have been falsified, for the prophetic period described as 'the times of the Gentiles' is rapidly running out."

Here it should be noted that the words in italics are an addition to Matthew's version of the grand "prophecy" inserted by Luke (xxi. 24) apparently on his own authority. Continuing his "enlightening" remarks, the Rev. L. Newby says:—

> Instead of this war proving that God does not exist, it is rather a testimony to His faithfulness, and an overwhelming reminder that not a word He has spoken shall fail to come to pass.....The European war writes the fact in large letters "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away."....But if there were a God, would he not intervene at a crisis like this? My answer is He Will. Read the second Psalm—"the Lord shall have the nations in derision.....He shall break them with a rod of iron, and dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel."

Thus, when the British, French, and Americans, with an overwhelming number of men, guns, and aeroplanes, have broken the German armies, and have driven them out of Belgium and France, the Lord God will intervene in order that his words in Matt. xxiv. and Luke xxi. shall not be falsified. This is really amusing.

Let us now look at the three verses in Matt. xxiv. which the Rev. Newby quotes as a prediction of the present War. He does not tell us how he knew them to be such; he merely says that the fact could only be known to "intelligent students of the prophetic Word"—of whom "by God's grace" he was one. This is, no doubt, interesting; but, like everything connected with religion, it requires verification.

In Matt. xxiv. the disciples drew the attention of Jesus to "the buildings of the temple," whereupon their Master said, "Verily I say unto you, There shall not be left here one stone upon another." Shortly afterwards the disciples asked him, "When shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" The reply of Jesus to the first question—When shall the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple take place?—is given in Matt. xxiv. 4-28; the events relating to his second coming and the end of the world occupy the remainder of the chapter.

With regard to the first question, Jesus might have said, had he possessed foreknowledge, that the holy city and the temple would be destroyed forty years later; but the method he adopted was that of naming a number of supposed notable events which should precede the destruction of Jerusalem. Now, during those forty years prior to A.D. 70, the first notable event specified is the appearance of many false Christs; after which comes the passage under consideration, that "nation shall rise against nation and kingdom against kingdom," etc. This event was therefore to happen many years before the destruction of the holy city—say about A.D. 35. Yet it is this statement that the Rev. Newby quotes as a "prophecy" referring to the present European War. Anyone with a grain of sense will see that this so-called "prophecy" must refer to wars between A.D. 30 and 70, and to no other period. Even if no such wars of nations occurred during that interval, as history shows to be the case, those falsely predicted wars could not be shifted to any later period. Our "intelligent student" of prophecy is thus shewn to be hopelessly blind, and "as wrong as wrong can be."

Again, the writer of Matt. xxiv. had no idea that there ever could be such a war as that now in progress; for he says that the Jewish-Roman war was "such as hath not been from the beginning of the world until now, no, nor ever shall be."

Furthermore, the writer of Matt. xxiv. says that "immediately after the tribulation of those days" all the tribes of the earth "shall see the Son of man coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send forth his angels.....and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds," etc. There could thus, according to the prediction, be no European War in 1914-1917. But as the "Son of man" did not come to judge the world "immediately after" the destruction of Jerusalem, as he had promised, then the so-called "Word of God" which gave that promise is undoubtedly "falsified," whether the Rev. Leonard Newby may think so or not. The question, in this case, is simply one of fact

Home Our Heaven.

Dublin people have reason to be inordinately proud of their splendid slums, but when they boast that their poor have quite the worst dwellings in the world, as a superior slumologist, I must beg to differ. In every country I have honoured with my presence, I have always chosen my home among the the most wretched habitations, for experience has taught me that a rotten house is invariably cheaper than a good one, and society has ever decreed that even the cheapest was always too dear for me.

Leaving the States out of the question, and confining our attention to Europe, some real rotters of houses may be found in what my wife, with excellent reason, called La Smell France. Oh, Nantes, where is thy stink? The lovely Loire, with malodorous melancholy more niffy than the Liffey, flows past the stately maison from the cinquieme etage of which we had to descend en bas to a loathsome cellar where water trickled down the walls, and rats nestled lovingly in the canopy over our bed. We sought not the shelter of the cellar for our children fearful of bombs, for those were days of "peace," but the country being in flood, the law of supply and demand (and the rapacity of the Bretons) made dry, habitable rooms expensive. We got rather friendly with the rats, who had decidedly anti-Malthusian principles. One patriarchal old chap with a white beard was a particular friend of mine. We called him Tolstoy, and on maturer acquaintance Leo. He had an ugly weal on his left posterior, some militant Christian, doubtless, taking a mean advantage of Leo's attitude of non-resistance, having endeavoured to make a sacrifice of him.

Ah, me, the beauties of Brittainy are vividly brought back to mind on reading the Mesopotamia report!

The essential difference between the poor of France and those of Dublin is that the etageries of the Republic throw their refuse out of the windows—readers of Candide are aware of this—while the Dublin tenementers, not having achieved their republic yet, still retain their respectability, and store all their waste products in a whited sepulchre called "the yard."

Now, lest readers wonder what all this has to do with Freethought, I hasten to assure them that one's method of worshipping, or one's attitude towards creation, is very largely bound up with the manner in which garbage is disposed of. In Scottish tenements the rule is that the "bucket" must be carried out to the street in early morning. Many a cold winter morning in my fifty-storey garret (nine stories from the back) have I cursed Protestantism, hygiene, flights of stairs, and the east wind of Edinburgh. Frequently I have lain awake all night, oppressed by thoughts of that ghastly bucket, and the early advent of the muck cart, when the previous evening, I could have shot the contents out of the nine storey window, and then enjoyed sweet repose.

Now, Scottish Presbyterians admit that the accumulation of egg-shells, potato parings, and ashes, is a corollary of civilized Christian life, and think highly of one assiduous in the emptying of buckets, provided always that the rite is performed orderly, and at an early hour, and with becoming gravity.

On the contrary, Catholics making a virtue of ignorance, it is in keeping with their Agnosticism about life generally that they could not discuss the subject, and as for throwing rubbish out of the window—why that would not be decent; and, though we may be poor, we are all respectable in Dublin. First, we have no rubbish, then, if we have just a little, we, with becoming Catholic shame furtively convey it to the bin in "the yard." There our responsibility ends. Occasionally, when the landlord has been nearly "gassed"—by the vegetable matter outside the house—while endeavouring to collect rent from the human vegetation inside, he deputes "a boy" to "do" the yard.

This youth—an old age pensioner—sets about cleaning the Augean gables. He wields a brush charged with whitewash—Ireland's emblem of purity—and is said to possess miraculous powers, for by his gestures effluvium is exorcized, the yard is "done," and we may again resume our offerings.

True, if it were not for the yards and their abominations, infant mortality might not be so high in Dublin; but then we would not have the ministrations of elderly spinsters who visit us for our health, and tell us that "John has rickets, Margaret adenoids; take Malcolm to Dr. Sawbones to get hacked about to see what's wrong with him; baby ought to have been weaned last Wednesday—must be taken to hospital to be weighed; kill all flies, keep that window open to let in fresh air" (from he yard!), etc.

I like a joke, and these social workers (salaried) sometimes amuse me; but I am no mathematician, and when they ask conundrums about cubic space, I am sarcastic to them—that is, I tell them to go to hell. Now, although "To hell with the King" is chalked outside our house, and similar sentiments are commonplaces in Dublin, the slum-dwellers are extremely docile and respectful, and take meekly all "insolence of office." The ladies of the locality, in friendly badinage, occasionally characterize each other as the illegitimate offspring of an ensanguined female of commercialized passion; but that merely shows their veneration for the sacrament of matrimony. The poor, I regret to say, are a disappointment everywhere, and in Dublin they are particularly subservient. Poverty, as a passing phase, I can endure, with an utter disregard of the conventions, a frank acceptance of all the makeshifts required to keep in life, and a healthy hatred of interfering busybodies; but poverty as a permanent condition, with a "dud" suit, celluloid collar, a reputation for respectability, and a wife who has to char—well, I wouldn't look quite as contented as Murphy. Confound the fellow; so long as he smiles, we will never make any progress.

After all, morality is for the poor. Let us congratulate them on their cleanliness (fancy a man being pleased that his wife was thought clean!), commend them for their thrift, admire them for their honesty (meaning their acceptance of the principle of being stolen from), insist, of course, on their humility (a "humble person" is frequently advertised for in Dublin); then, if we want to finish the job properly, let us turn the priests on them with all their lies, and they are now at our mercy, to use for our political ends, to exploit for our economic aggrandizement, to experiment on their dirty bodies that we may have knowledge to patch up our bodies, and to foozle their minds that they may always remain fools.

A Scottish bailie of my acquaintance once told me a touching story of Andrew Carnegie. The millionaire was having a pow-wow with some parochial body on the cadge. "Ah," said Andrew, unctuously, as his eye lighted on the text, "Heaven our Home," "now that's just my philosophy, only I would express it differently, and make it 'Home our Heaven.'" I expressed wonder to my friend that that doctrine had not carried conviction in America, for I had heard of quite a large number of Carnegie's workers who, during a labour dispute, suddenly left this world, at the sound of firearms; probably they had interpreted the text as "Heaven our Homestead." The bailie called me a blaspheming ruffian, and a man incapable of any right feeling.

Truth to tell, I agree with the Laird of Skibo. I do believe in making our home—however mean it may be, a temple of love and joy. And, believing as I do that this life is all, I am tremendously keen on seeing that my children shall enjoy all the really good things of the world. If the inhabitants of slums only felt debased and degraded by their vile environment, and longed for something better, and were prepared to fight everything and everybody that stood in their way, there might be hope. But they have neither imagination nor vision to think a full and beautiful life. A room passes for a house, window-boxes in lieu of a garden, floorcloth for carpet, and an annual half-day in the country for the children's "fresh air"; for, to the poor, all thing are poor, as Bernard Shaw would like to have said.

I may be told that the housing problem is an economic one, and I do not lose sight of that factor. I do not accuse the Church of being the basic cause of the slums in Dublin. This, however, I do say, that wherever Catholicism flourishes (look at the "Irish" quarter anywhere), there also is squalor, degradation, and ignorance; and the Church always strives to perpetuate poverty. Here and there we may find a priest of "forward" social opinions; but, just as the Church takes advantage of the Sinn Fein Movement up to a point, she knows full well that republics on earth don't usually think kindly of kingdoms in heaven. That is how it seems to a rationalist mind; but to the complex, scientific, nay, supernormal intelligence of Mr. Holy Ghost Wells (B.Sc.), it appears simple to visualize an invisible monarch of an unearthly Republic. So, whenever there is any agitation about Dublin slums, the priests will get the wire to butt in, but should there be the remotest chance of any drastic change for the better, rest assured they will resist with all their strength; for with better housing, more leisure, and increase of knowledge, a spirit of independence and fearlessness would be created, and the priests would soon find their occupation like that of Othello.

Acid Drops.

The War has shaken the faith of a great many people; it appears to have affected even that of Mr. Bottomley. "Never again," he says, "if there be a God, can there be such a Devil's Holiday." "If there be a God"! Can it be possible that after solemnly assuring everybody—on the guarantee of an increasing circulation—that there is a God and a future life, that Mr. Bottomley is beginning to have doubts? May we suggest that, if there be a God, the War ought never to have happened at all? And if God couldn't prevent it in 1914, what reason have we for believing he will or can prevent another war in, say, 1924? Still, it is good to note the evidence of a chastened spirit. Mr. Bottomley has even promised not to prophesy any more. He solemnly announces that he has "discarded the mantle of the Prophet." This, he explains, is not because his data was wrong, but because other people prevented his prophecies being realized. That is really the funniest excuse we have ever seen for the non-realization of a prophecy.

The other Monday morning a Swansea fruiterer displayed a box of large mouldy plums bearing the inscription "In affectionate remembrance of the Swansea Council and the Sunday Observance Act of 1676." We congratulate the shopkeeper on his wit. It is too much to hope that it will have any effect on Swansea Sabbatarians.

Unconscious humour is often excellent. Mr. Horatio Bottomley has been advertising on a large scale a series of articles on the War, and a prominent part of the notice was occupied by a portrait of himself, with the words underneath in large type, "Somewhere in Hell."

Tales of angels having been seen at Grays and Waltham Abbey have been current, but a real specimen was brought into a case at Willesden Police Court. A woman, asking for a summons against her husband, told the Bench, "On Saturdays and Sundays he's a little angel, but the rest of the week he isn't worth living with."

A boy, who had been placed on probation at the Home for Working Boys at Maida Vale, was charged at the Guildhall with failing to attend church. He was ordered to attend church in the future. If he does not, we presume he will be punished. If he does, he will be forgiven. So, as a first step in the process of moralizing, the Alderman proposes to make him a hypocrite.

A forty-line paragraph appeared in the press describing the "coolness" of the Archbishop of Canterbury and other clergy in conducting an induction service during an air-raid. There is nothing very heroic in their action, for the church in which they officiated is a substantial building. Far greater heroism was displayed by tens of thousands of poor mothers and children in small, jerry-built houses; but ordinary folk do not have press agents.

When the Zeppelins raided the Metropolis the Bishop of London cheered us up by saying that the present War was a "day of God," and that we ought to thank God for being "allowed the honour of a little danger." We think everybody has had enough honour during the past week or two, and the honour's list, in the shape of casualties, is unpleasantly large. The Bishop is now not quite so certain on the matter, but he still says of the recent raids that "this is our lot of danger" and we should "be proud of it." We really don't know what there is to be proud of. We have sat for nights with the guns roaring and bombs bursting all around, and we did not feel in the least proud. The Bishop says each murdered child is being carried one by one to Paradise. We wonder how he knows. And we wonder how many parents will be comforted by this stupid cant? If the "white wings of the Holy Ghost" would protect the children from bombs, we are quite sure that parents would prefer it to those same wings being used as transport waggons to heaven.

When Christians are in a tight corner they act much as other folk do. In view of the air-raids a large number of churches altered the time of their evening services. This shows the decay of belief in the efficacy of prayer.

A Sunday paper published recently an article on "Oriental Fictions." No mention was made of the fairy tales of the Bible.

Christ said "Swear not at all," but Christians almost invariably swear in courts—and elsewhere. Court "swearing" is not so simple as it appears, for Mr. Herbert Nield, K.C., recently uttered the reproof, "A police-officer ought never to say 'I swear by the Almighty God,' as though there were many deities, and they were choosing one." This was sufficient to make the poor policeman turn as blue as his uniform.

The Rev. P. J. Kelly, a Yorkshire vicar, has resigned his living and joined the Royal Garrison Artillery as a gunner. The living is worth £500 a year, and a gunner gets about a shilling a day. The reverend gentleman's example should be emulated by the thousands of clergy of military age.

A writer in the Daily Chronicle states that "it wasn't war that first brought death into the world and all our woe." Surely, a most chaste reference to Eve and the apple.

The Times-Picayune (New Orleans) of September 2, reports a striking case of the effects of ardent preaching. The Rev. G. J. Kelly delivered two sermons one Sunday, and returned home thinking out a new sermon on the text "Slay Utterly." He went to bed, but was unable to sleep. After a while he rose and went out towards the house of a family named Moore. As he approached the house he heard a voice saying: "Go in and slay utterly." He found an axe, and went into a room where four children were sleeping. Then came the voice again: "Suffer little children to come unto me." Kelly replied: "Lord, they're coming now," and killed the children. He then entered another room, found the mother and father asleep, and killed them. Of course, Kelly was insane. But equally, of course, there is nothing worse than religion for ill-balanced minds. And well-balanced minds have no need of it.

Pious folk always had a sneaking fondness for profiteering, and it shows itself in their hymns, as, for instance, in the lines:—

> Whatever, Lord, we lend to Thee
> Repaid a thousandfold will be;
> Then gladly will we give to Thee
> Who givest all.

"Scholar and saint" is the way in which a Daily Telegraph reviewer describes the Rev. R. F. Horton, of Hampstead. "Scholar" is a very elastic term, and we are quite willing to concede the title of "saint." Many better men than he have been called that. And we remember that this saint once openly professed the opinion that all people who did not believe in immortality bestialized life, and ought to be shut out from human society. We do not suggest that this conviction is incompatible with saintship; far from it. Men of a most "saintly" character have before now been notable for extreme narrowness of view, and even savagery of persecution. It is often, in fact, the saint that spoils the man. On the whole, we incline to the opinion that the world has suffered more from its saints than from its sinners.

A Spiritualist, of Grimsby, was summoned the other day by his charwoman for maintenance of her illegitimate child. The defendant said he had consulted the spirits, and they had denied that he was the father of the child. The testimony of spirits evidently does not count for much in Grimsby Police Court, as the magistrate made the usual order. A foolish girl, and a designing rogue.

The congregation was singing—

God is our refuge and our strength:
n straits a present aid;
Therefore, although the earth remove,
We will not be afraid.

The Church officer—a wag—to test their faith, put his head in at the door and shouted "Fire!" In the rush for the exits the parson led.

The Midland Daily Telegraph, of October 1, contains an account of the prosecution of twelve boys charged with stealing from the Market Hall, Coventry. The Chairman of the court said it was a most painful thing to find such boys becoming thieves in view of the fact that most of the boys were attending Sunday-school. Some of the thefts were committed by the boys on their way from Sunday-school. Now, if they had been attending schools where religious instruction was non-existent, we have no doubt the Chairman would have delivered a homily on the evils of Secular Education. As these boys were getting plenty of religious education, no moral was necessary.

From the Christian World:—

> Rev. W. Pedr Williams visited an Essex town on Friday to preach at the harvest thanksgiving service. But Mr. Williams had just got to close grips with his subject when warning of an air-raid was received, the gas failed, and the audience quietly dispersed.

Italics are ours. We have been wondering whose, or what, gas was it that failed?

The Daily News quotes the following from a morning paper:—

> AIR-RAIDS.—Peaceful country rectory, Hampshire, well out of danger zone, can receive three or four paying guests. Large garden, beautiful scenery, high, bracing. Simple life. £1 0 each weekly. References exchanged.

It may be a simple life, but evidently not a very simple parson.

The Daily Mirror says that on an ocean liner leaving port the other day, it was observed that a number of passengers threw pennies into the sea. This was done in the belief that it would secure immunity from submarines. Students of folk-lore will see in the action a survival of a primitive form of sacrifice, and also how little removed from the primitive mind is the intelligence of a large number of our "civilized" fellow-beings.

Private Woodhouse, of the King's Own Lancaster Regiment, is said to have had his life saved through carrying a New Testament. He was shot through the arm, but a bullet failed to enter his breast owing to his carrying God's Word. We are glad to hear it, but we would remark that some of our readers who have carried the Freethinker into action have never been hit at all. Now, if every soldier carried a copy of this paper with him ——

A little Acton girl, who had been much impressed by a visit to the "pictures," rose from her knees at her bedside, looking unusually thoughtful. "What is the matter?" asked her mother. The unexpected reply was: "I was just thinking, won't God laugh when Charlie Chaplin goes to heaven!"

The President of the Free Church Council, Rev. W. B. Selbie, says that 85 to 90 per cent. of the men in the Army are out of any vital relation to the Christian Church. But he doesn't believe the Church has failed. We wonder what Dr. Selbie would consider failure. If, with all the generations during which the Churches have controlled life, they can now claim only 10 per cent. of the people. What greater proof of failure is required?

Some of our schoolmasters appear to be men of robust faith. The Rev. J. Gow, of Westminster School, says, "I believe in miracles, and by prayer miracles more wonderful than those of long ago are being wrought every day." We do not recall any contemporary instances of persons being raised from the dead, or even of cases of thousands of people being fed with a few sardines and rolls, but perhaps the reverend gentleman will narrate his experience. The nearest approach to the miraculous that we remember are the cases of the angels at Mons and elsewhere—and they were bogeys.

The Rev. Principal Selbie says that "the Church is more self-sacrificing than ever." Have the dear bishops and leading ministers forgone part of their salaries, or are they deciding that the clergy shall take their share of military service?

The commercial side of Christianity is emphasized in the transference of Sir A. Yapp from the Young Men's Christian Association to the Food Economy Campaign. So smart was he at gathering subscriptions on behalf of the Y.M.C.A. that wags insisted that those letters stood for "Yapp's Money-Collecting Association."

Parish magazines, like all other mundane things, change with the times. Even in their treatment of Freethinkers, Christians are becoming more polite. In the Crown Magazine, edited by the Rev. G. E. Thorn, of Peckham, there is a reference to Abraham Lincoln: "He was a man of strict morality, abstemious, and familiar with the Bible, though not a professed member of any Church." We wonder how many innocent readers of this magazine will realize that Abraham Lincoln was a Freethinker? For our own part, we prefer the bad manners of older days to the nebulous and unctuous insolence in use to-day.

The Daily Chronicle announces that "the Free Church Council contemplates a great 'push' throughout the country during the autumn and winter." It would be far more to the purpose if the Free Church Council released all able-bodied Nonconformist ministers for active service in the real "push" abroad.

Church congregations are not the brainiest folk, but surely it was unnecessary for the Rev. C. Hutchinson, Rector of Rayne, Essex, to ask his parishioners not to bring wheat and corn to church for harvest festival decorations this year.

A brand of matches bears the fascinating name "Adam and Eve." It is a happy title, for it suggests an ancient attempt at match-making.

The Romish Church appears to possess an excellent press agency, for paragraphs are always appearing in the newspapers. A recent paragraph mentions the names of converts, one of whom is the Rev. R. A. Knox, youngest son of the Bishop of Manchester. This conversion will scarcely undo the work of the Protestant Reformation.

Father Bernard Vaughan has been poking fun at Mr. H. G. Wells and his "brand-new God," and says that in The Soul of a Bishop the popular novelist "has created a brand-new Jesus Christ of his own. The Jesus of Mr. Wells has given his followers neither a creed nor a morality, neither a Church organization, nor a priesthood." Father Vaughan is in too much of a hurry. Rome itself was not built in a day.

A. G. Barker.—We should say that this particular author regrets having tried to boom his own book. Unfortunately, there are many writers whose chief concern in writing is not whether a subject in itself is worth writing about, but whether there will be a demand for a book on that topic. And more harm is done in this way than in any other. Beware of the writer who has always a book ready for every passing phase of opinion.

H. R. Swift.—We are never "bored" with the experiences of Freethinkers such as yourself. We get many such letters, and our only regret is that we cannot make all public.

Mr. and Mrs. H. Rosetti, in sending their contribution to the Fund, write. "It is the only way in which we can attempt to discharge a debt of gratitude towards so admirable a paper. We hope our little son may grow to have as much pleasure in reading it as his father and mother have had." We sincerely hope so.

J. H. Minett.—Pleased you find "Views and Opinions" so much to your taste.

F. C. Wykes.—We do not intend increasing the price. Thanks for appreciation.

J. Goudie.—Appeared in the Freethinker some years ago.

H. Robson.—We saw the report. The stupidity of the Bishop of London commands almost admiration—it is so near perfection of its kind.

J. Sanders.—Thanks. We sincerely hope that things will be brighter in the near future.

Mr. G. W. Ogilvie thinks the Freethinker "deserves to be in the highest niche in the temple of literature." Well, it already holds a high place in the esteem of thousands of intelligent men and women. And the only way to command the unthinking is to sink to their level.

T. Fisher.—It seems to be part of a pseudo-philosophical and very verbose book in defence of Theism. But the pages are not very appetizing.

Adelaide Gray (Toronto).—We have received letter enclosing a one-dollar bill; but you do not say to what purpose you wish this put. Will you please instruct us on the subject?

G. Lunn.—Yes, the ready help of our readers has been very gratifying. Pleased to know you regard it as a means by which readers can record their thanks for anything we may have done. And to help the Cause is the kind of thanks we value most.

T. H. How.—It is nothing new to find "leading" men expressing the views voiced by Freethinkers years ago. Mr. Asquith's remarks, which, we cited, are, as you say, a case in point.

W. Birdon.—Will write on the subject you name when an opportunity presents itself.

Miss Vance, General Secretary N.S.S., would be glad to hear from any Freethinker, resident in Bristol, who could find time to visit "one of ours" home from the front and awaiting an operation, in the Southern General Hospital, Bristol Royal Infirmary, who is a long distance from his own home and friends.

H. Dawson.—Doan's Bible Myths is, probably, the book you mean. It is published by the Truthseeker Co., New York.

T. C.—We quite agree that the sentence was a monstrous one. Four months' hard labour for a boy of sixteen seems a capital way of manufacturing a criminal.

R. Stirton.—Glad to know you think the Freethinker worthy of its best traditions.

B. Dunlop and H. Irving.—Next week.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Chapman Cohen.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen lectures this evening, October 14, in the Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate, Leicester. His subject is: "Why Men Believe in God, with Special Reference to Mr. H. G. Wells."

To-day (October 14) Mr. Lloyd lectures, afternoon and evening, in the Elysium, High Street, Swansea. This is Mr. Lloyd's first visit to Swansea as a Freethought speaker, and we hope to hear that he has had the audience he deserves. Freethinkers will do well to bring their Christian friends and acquaintances to the meetings. We venture to predict that they will be pleased they attended.

We have a whole batch of letters from soldiers awaiting notice, and while we cannot quote from all, we think our readers will be interested in the following. From a South African reader we get this:—

> I was born and brought up a Freethinker, so I suppose there is no particular credit due to me in that I am an Atheist. I have signed on on three separate occasions since the outbreak of the War. On the two first occasions there were no objections raised when I asked to affirm instead of taking the oath. But on the last occasion, at Potchefstroom, when they were filling in my attestation form, they asked the usual question, "What religion?" and when I said nil, the sergeant said I must have some religion or they wouldn't be able to accept me as a recruit. Thanks to the Freethinker, I knew my position exactly, and told him he couldn't possibly refuse me on such grounds. I was then taken before the C. O. of the regiment. He also was of the opinion that unless I took the oath I wasn't eligible as a recruit; but after I had explained matters to him, he had my papers filled in and sent me to the Staff-Colonel to be fixed up. The Colonel, who is a Roman Catholic, tried to bully me into changing my mind. He went so far as to suggest that I would be put on all sorts of unpleasant fatigues while the rest of the regiment were on Church Parade when I got over on this side. But I stuck to my guns and in the end I affirmed.
> I have since found that there is at least one avowed Atheist with us, and there are several who call themselves Agnostics, but they are all down as Church of England.
> I am, naturally, rather notorious in the regiment, and several pious gentlemen have made it their duty to try and convert me. But although not too well lettered, I have found that a good memory, combined with regular reading of the Freethinker, is all that is needed to squash all their arguments.

Pte. J. Scott writes:—

> Nothing cheered me up more in France than the Freethinker. I had six Freethinkers in my push in the last fight at Ypres. It is all rot about a religious revival after the War.

Digitized by Google

> Men are more willing and ready to listen to Atheism than religion in France. I have been four times wounded, and been through most of the fighting, but I never experienced any fears about a future life, nor did I get hardened to the awful and hellish sights of war. The person who writes about the glory of war is a fool, or has some ulterior motive.

This correspondent points out what an important factor the weather is in this War, and also how frequently the British advance has been prevented, and the Germans favoured, by the weather. In Arras, "we had grand weather up to the morning of the battle, and then it rained all day. At night it snowed, and in the morning there were four inches of snow, and thousands of poor wounded lay out in it all night." Other instances of the same kind are given, and Pte. Scott concludes:—

> Now, both sides pray, and I suppose both believe in an answer to prayer. If I did believe in God, I should say he was certainly on the German side.

Which seems a not illogical conclusion. Indeed, some of our own clergy, it will be remembered, have dwelt on the way in which the weather has helped the Germans in order to reprove our sins, and have asserted that it was God's method of bringing us to a more religious frame of mind.

Mr. G. Brady writes:—

> I have great pleasure in enclosing two postal orders, value £2, being subscription to the Sustentation Fund (sounds rather "Free Kirky" to a Scotsman), and trust the amount, when realized, will prove a record. I cannot help thinking the number of contributors is very small, but probably that is accounted for by the sadly abnormal times. In conclusion, let me add my congratulations on the manner in which you are proving yourself a worthy successor to our late wise and valiant leader.

With regard to the latter part of the letter, we can only say we have done our best. As to the first part, we would remind our correspondent that all have not yet contributed who intend doing so. We have every confidence that the number will be materially increased, and the sum realized will go a good way towards meeting the loss during the present year.

Mr. E. B. Side writes on behalf of himself and brother, two members of a united freethinking family:—

> Your road has been all uphill, and sheer courage in what you know to be a righteous cause is taking you slowly but surely to the summit.
> If others could only imagine what is at the other side of that hill, then the milestones would present the appearance of a graveyard.
> I have sent many copies of the Freethinker to various military and naval depots during the War, and have received pleasing results from same.

H. Dawson sends the following reminder of our early days:—

> To the pale-faced, curly-headed youth who, years ago, "beneath the spreading chestnut tree" at Wood Green, faced a howling, half-demented Christian mob unmoved, and declared, "I came here to deliver an address on ——, and I am going to deliver it, with or without your sanction." And he delivered it, and many others; and has ever since, fine weather or storm, fought the same battle against the enemies of mankind, with the same conquering composure. I am just getting out of the results of a twelve months' ago accident, and can testify that in the months of grave danger I never for a moment had a doubt of the wisdom of my position as an Atheist. Please put the enclosed dollar to the Sustentation Fund, and accept thanks; and every good wish to you and yours in the almost herculean task of making our Society what it should and can be.

We are pleased to learn that the Birmingham experiment in the Repertory Theatre opened with a very successful meeting on Sunday last. Mr. Lloyd was the lecturer, and there was a good audience, and, we need hardly say, a good lecture. It is hoped that the meetings will be continued beyond the present course; and they will be, if local friends do their duty. The next meeting will be held on October 21.

The author of A History of Penal Methods, Mr. George Ives, M.A., whose valuable work was reviewed in these columns some few months ago, opens a discussion on "The Treatment of Crime" for the North London Branch this evening (Oct. 14). Mr. Ives is well qualified to speak on this subject, and should attract a large audience. For further particulars, see our Guide Notices.

We are asked to announce that the Whist Drive originally arranged by this Branch for members and friends for Wednesday, October 3, and postponed in consequence of their engagements clashing with those of the German air-raiders, will now be held on Wednesday, October 17, at 7 p.m. Tickets, price 1s., may be obtained from all Branch Secretaries and direct from Miss H. Lane, 29 Burton Street, W.C.1. For the information of the nervous, we may say the St. Pancras Reform Club, where the Drive will be held, has a concrete and commodious basement.

We were pleased to see in the local press an appreciative notice of Mr. S. M. Peacock, of South Shields, whose obituary appears in another column. Our acquaintance with Mr. Peacock goes back now about a quarter of a century, and we desire to take this opportunity of paying our tribute of respect to a brave and single-minded soldier in the Army of Freethought. All Freethinkers in South Shields looked upon him as their leader, and we never knew him as aught but worthy of their respect and confidence.

The Secretary of the South Shields Branch writes, that it was felt there remained so much that could not be said at the graveside of its former leader by those more or less intimately associated with him in his over thirty years' service to Secularism, a special meeting should be called to consider the above and other matters in connection with the movement locally. Hence a meeting is called for to-day, Sunday, October 14, in order to give those a chance who were unable, owing to the call of work or business, to attend the funeral.

We are asked to announce that the South London Branch inaugurates its winter meetings with a Social Evening on October 14, to be held in the Trade Union Hall, 30 Brixton Road, S.W. The function commences at 7.30, and the nearest Tube station is Kennington Gate. The hall may also be reached by tram or 'bus.

The senior member for Northampton is Mr. C. A. McCurdy. The other day this gentleman visited the works of the the Integral Propellers Company, and, in introducing the M.P. to the workmen, the manager said that Mr. McCurdy represented a constituency which returned one of the greatest friends the working classes ever had. We can only hope that the present representative acts up to the example set by his great predecessor.

Our readers will be pleased to see the pen of "Abracadabra" once more active in these columns. Various causes—among them, we regret to say, ill-health—have prevented his writing of late; but in the future we hope to see his pen more regularly employed in the great war against superstition.

Death of S. M. Peacock.

Tyneside Freethinkers have lost a widely known and well-respected worker by the death of Samuel Morley Peacock, of South Shields. For very many years—dating back to the earlier Bradlaugh days—Mr. Peacock had been well known as a Militant Freethinker, and one who had also taken an active part in the public life of his adopted town. During the days of the old School Board he sat for many years on that body, and the respect in which he was generally held, in view of his active identification with Freethought propaganda—says much for the sterling worth of his character. Unlike many public men, his Freethought was an avowed part of his public life. At the beginning of his career he encountered a deal of prejudice, but his strength and independence gradually wore this down. Everybody knew him for what he was, and his efforts at personal propaganda were sustained and vigorous. His interest in the Freethinker and the cause it represented remained unweakened to the end.

The funeral took place on Saturday, October 6, at Harton Cemetery, in the presence of a large and representative gathering, which included the Mayor, Alderman Allen, a number of members of the Council, and representatives of other public bodies. A prior engagement prevented Mr. Cohen being present and conducting the service, or he would certainly have paid this tribute of respect to so old and esteemed a worker. In his absence the service was read by the Branch Secretary, Mr. R. Chapman, and a speech was made by Alderman John Taylor, ex-mayor, of South Shields, who dwelt specially upon Mr. Peacock's services in connection with the School Board, and his continuous and ungrudging labours in everything that concerned the school life of the town.

Singularly destitute of personal ambition, Samuel Morley Peacock played a valuable part in that movement of ideas which ultimately weighs heaviest in the world's affairs. His death has robbed Freethought of a staunch friend, and an indefatigable propagandist. The deepest sympathy will be felt by all with Mrs. Peacock, his constant and unfailing associate, in their long and happy married life.—C. C.

The Story of the Sugar Industry.

In 1850 the price of sugar in England was 7d. or 8d. a pound, and, as the years rolled by, it steadily fell to 1½d. or 2d. It was universally assumed that this commodity would never again become either scarce or dear. The consumption of sugar in our Isles and in the United States was, in 1913, per head of population, nearly three times that of France or Germany, while it completely dwarfed that of most other European countries. Italy's average consumption of a mere 6·7 per head was very different to the British consumption of 78·7 lb. per unit of population.

With the world in arms, the prices of most necessaries of life rapidly rose, and the grocers' shops have been besieged by the exasperated housewife in her frequently frustrated search for that now precious sugar which had long been so plentiful that its constant supply was taken for granted everywhere and practically by all.

Until sugar became almost unprocurable, few people realized its real value as an article of diet, or possessed any adequate idea of its importance as a preservative. Yet the use of sugar, like that of tea and coffee, is comparatively modern, and our rude forefathers had no direct sweetening substance save honey. The sugar, so plentiful and inexpensive, and of a quality so excellent, until the great catastrophe led to a scarcity which is almost a famine, is a striking example of what Sir William Tilden describes as "a practically pure chemical compound which serves as an important food-stuff, and is very rapidly assimilated when taken into the stomach."

Sugar is a common constituent of plants. It occurs in many of the grasses, notably in the sugar-cane, a gigantic grass, of which several varieties exist in a state of cultivation. Sugar is found in the sap of numerous forest trees; in various roots and seeds; in sweet fruits, and in the honey of flowers. Thousands of years ago the sugar cane was cultivated in India, and from that country the knowledge of sugar spread to adjacent lands. The classical writers, Herodotus, Strabo, and Seneca, among others, refer to sugar as "honey of canes," or "honey made with human hands." The Chinese admit their debt to ancient India for their acquaintance with the sugar-making art. Two passages in the Hebrew Bible prove that old Israel had heard of sugar canes. Its culture seems to have disappeared with the downfall of Pagan civilization in Europe, to reappear when the Arabs began to grow the cane in their Mediterranean colonies; and by the tenth century of our era the Moors had established their plantations in Spain. At a later date Egyptian cane sugar became an article of commerce which was shipped by the Venetian merchants to London, from which port English wool was sent in exchange.

After the discovery of America in the fifteenth century, the cane was grown and its juices elaborated into sugar in the Spanish and Portuguese settlements in the West Indies and Brazil. In 1563 that bold seaman, Hawkins, brought sugar from San Domingo to England, while our own planters were cultivating the cane in Barbadoes.

In addition to the cane, sugar-beet, sugar maple, and sorgum are grown for the sugar they yield. The cane flourishes best in warm, humid countries, where sea-breezes prevail, and in which there occur fair intervals of sunshine. In these the plant is extensively raised. The stem of the various varieties of sugar cane ranges from 6 feet to 14 feet in height. The cane is propagated by placing pieces of the stem in the soil, and the new plants arise from the buds which grow out of the stem. Once planted, the cane throws up from its underground "stoles" or roots new plants every season, sometimes for a score of years, when replanting becomes necessary. When ripe the rind of the cane is covered on its exterior with a waxy substance. The interior of the cane contains the cells holding the sugar juice, and there also are found long bundles of fibres whose function it is to send from the soil the nutriment and moisture essential to the growth and maturity of the plant. A most important office is served by the leaves which, in the presence of sun-light, absorb carbonic acid from the atmosphere. And it is this assimilation of carbon by the plant that, in combination with the water conveyed by the fibres, elaborates the invaluable compound which we term sugar.

In the full vigour of its growth the plant's stem from base to apex is adorned with huge tropical leaves, and the cane is crowned by a mass of verdure spread before the sun. When ripe the slender cane is richly stored with choice sugar. Harvesting is expeditiously conducted, for when the cane is cut down and the tops cast aside, it is loaded up on waggons and despatched without delay to the factory. When mature the sugar content demands prompt attention as it deteriorates very quickly. Primitive methods prevail in Formosa and elsewhere, but those growers who supply the world annually with its 7,000,000 tons of cane sugar utilize the resources of science in preparing their commodity for human consumption. The successful cane cultivator is now as much concerned in his tropical home with the problems of soil, moisture, fertilizers, and the chemical constituents of this or that variety of cane as his stern competitor the sugar beet grower in the temperate regions of the globe.

The East and West Indies, British Guiana, and Queensland are all noted for their cane sugar. During recent years, however, the beet sugar industry has proved a serious rival to that of the Indian planter.

Curiously enough the rise of the beet trade was incidentally due to the Napoleonic campaigns. As a consequence of these wars Continental Europe was deprived of the West Indian product, and the several countries were driven to extract sugar from the beet which is so readily cultivated in Europe; Belgium, Austria, Hungary, Northern France, Southern Russia, and Germany all materially increased their acreage of sugar beet. In the British Isles the plant was not grown, although our climate is favourable to its culture. Owing to this and other circumstances, when the present War came we were practically dependent upon Germany, France, and the Netherlands for two-thirds of our imported raw sugar.

The Board of Trade returns for 1913 sufficiently indicate the vast imports of sugar into the United Kingdom in normal times. Apart from molasses, glucose, jams, confectionery, etc., nearly forty million hundredweight of sugar itself (loaf, crystal, and powdered) valued at £23,000,000 was imported into Britain.

Our best white sugar is mainly a mixture of cane and beet sugar which is chiefly manufactured for table use in Germany, the Low Countries, and Austria-Hungary, our leading sources of supply. There is no warranty for the prejudice against beet sugar which many still cherish. As Professor Tilden, the eminent chemist states:—

> Forty or more years ago there was substantial foundation for the prevalent objection to beet sugar which in those days retained.....a peculiar evil smell and an appreciable quantity of potassium chloride by which its sweetening power was sensibly diminished. With the removal of these impurities by the processes of refining, sugar from whatever source it is derived has, like every other definite chemical compound, specific properties of its own by which it is always distinguished from every other chemical compound. Hence until it has been shown that sugar derived from beet differs from sugar obtained from the cane in crystalline form, in its action on polarized light, in solubility in water and sweetening power.....there is no justification for the suspicion that they are not identical" (Chemical Discovery and Invention in the Twentieth Century, p. 412, 1916).

It is interesting to observe the profound changes which have occurred in the course of the evolution of the modern sugar industry. Sixty years since London was our chief sugar centre. Half our imports were unloaded on the Thames, the other half being distributed on the Clyde, in Liverpool, Bristol, and other ports. In 1860 nearly all imported sugar arrived in a raw state, and the later refining processes were conducted in this country. In 1900, 63 per cent. of the commodity came to us fully prepared for use. The total imports of sugar were, in 1860, the raw article, 434,776 tons; refined 13,303. Forty years afterwards imported raw sugar had risen to 661,747 tons, while foreign refined sugar had bounded from 13,000 to nearly one million tons.

These remarkable changes are explained by the fact that in 1860 our sugar was mainly imported from British possessions, notably the West Indies, Mauritius, and India. The other chief sources of supply were the Spanish Indies, Manilla, and Brazil. In those days the Metropolis was the principal centre of the then very important sugar refining industry, which manufactured nearly all the loaf sugar consumed in Britain. The "sugar houses" formed the staple industry of the East End of London. In the words of George Martineau:—

> From Whitechapel eastward to Mile End, and southward through St. George's-in-the-East to the gates of London Docks, their chimneys were to be seen on all hands. The London Docks and the East and West India Docks were full of raw sugar destined for these various refineries.

Great waggons drawn by fine horses, each loaded with six hogsheads—about five tons of sugar—largely from Jamaica, rolled near the Jamaica Road to the score of busy refineries of the district, while smaller vehicles were actively occupied in delivering the finished commodity destined for the use of the consumer.

Better machinery and improved methods of manufacture then led to a great advance in the art of sugar refining on the banks of the Clyde. From 1854 to 1880 the total production of refined sugar at Greenock and Glasgow increased more than fivefold. A period of stagnation then supervened, and then a rapid decline set in. Despite the enormously increased consumption of sugar, the business of the Clyde refiners had dwindled in the period 1897-1900 to about half that of the 'eighties.

Bristol's once world-famous sugar refineries have all passed away. The leading port for the Brazilian trade, Liverpool, was long celebrated for its sugar and its syrup, but its former glories as a sugar centre have become dimmed. Manchester had at the head of its once noted refinery the versatile Alfred Fryer, the inventor of Fryer's concretor and the recognized spokesman of the British refiners in their conflicts with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Half a century ago there were twenty refineries in London, and now two alone survive. After the closure of Duncan's great factories at Clyde wharf at the London Victoria Docks in 1886, another remarkable man arose in the person of Henry Tate, who seized the occasion to place cube sugar on the market, and this he accomplished with triumphant success.

The Myth of God.

II.

(Concluded from p. 637.)

It is affirmed by theologians that in the existence of the universe we have a presupposition of the existence of a being who is the necessary basis and cause of the universe. Nothing with which we are acquainted through the study of natural phenomena is independent in its existence; everything is at all points dependent upon something else. This being so, the universe is not made up of self-subsistent parts. Therefore the universe, as a whole, is not self-subsistent. Everything around us is in a state of fluctuation; we see nothing that is permanent and so constituted that it can be relied upon to continue in existence throughout externity, and act as basis for the existence of other parts of the universe. But, continues the theologian, the human mind, by its very nature, is not capable of believing that there is no necessary being existing as a foundation for all the interdependent parts of the universe of which we have knowledge. The mind must consequently draw the inference that there is a self-existent being which is the everlasting basis of the universe. That is, there must be something upon which all things else can depend, or the human mind can only conceive of everything as in a state of chaos.

Such is the theological argument. It is admitted, however, that this line of argument is not strong enough of itself to prove that there is a God in the full religious sense of the term. Still, when the theologian has proved to his own satisfaction that we cannot escape the conclusion that the existence of many interdependent beings implies the existence of a self-subsistent being, and when he has assumed that the self-subsistent being must be outside of the universe, the first step towards creating a God of a highly abstract type has been taken.

It is true that, by a process of strictly logical thought, the human mind works its way back to the idea that the transitory parts of the universe had their origin in something that is by nature self-existent. Nevertheless the religious use of the argument is unwarranted by facts.

The fallacy of the argument, as developed by the theologians, lies in the assumption that the universe cannot be self-existent, and, therefore, we must seek for its origin in some being apart from itself. This, however, is not necessary. The fact that the various parts of the universe, as seen by us, are not permanent and self-existent, is no proof that the universe as a whole, in its fundamental reality, is not self-existent and eternal. The individual parts of the universe, which we distinguish as being separate from and yet dependent upon each other, and which appear to be subject to destruction, are only so with regard to form. The various forms which the underlying reality or real substance of the universe takes on are transitory; but it must be remembered that a change of form is not a destruction of reality beyond that of form. This being so, the term "universe" stands for the sum-total of an indestructible reality, which is eternally in motion and is perpetually taking on new forms. And until it is proved that there was a time when the substance of which the universe consists was not in existence, or, if in existence, was not in motion and ever changing its forms of manifestation, it is not necessary to assume that there is a being of which we can speak as the cause and basis of the existence of the universe. If, as far as we are able to ascertain, indestructibility is at present the inherent nature of the fundamental substance of the universe; if only the forms under which things appear can be destroyed; and if we have no evidence of the possible non-existence of the universe, then it is unreasonable to assume that the universe was created. Whatever can be created can also be destroyed, and we are contradicting the theory of the indestructibility of matter and motion when we affirm that the existence of the universe was caused by some eternal being distinct from the universe. The ideas of the indestructibility of matter and motion cannot be reconciled with the idea of a being that is the cause of all things. If we accept the indestructibility of matter and motion as facts, they destroy the idea that there was a time when matter and motion were not, and this latter idea is essential to the idea of a creator.

Perhaps the most popular of the arguments put forward in support of belief in the existence of a Divine Creator is the Design Argument, now so often tricked out in an evolutionary guise. It may be summarized thus: In organisms we see an adaptation of means to ends, just the same as in human art. The variations in organisms are not indefinite; they occur in the direction of producing given organisms of a higher order. As one theologian puts it, an ear does not appear where an eye has begun to develop, because a ground plan is adhered to in the midst of all variations. The whole evolution of the universe gives evidence of order, plan, harmony, and beauty; and this leads us to conclude that there is a divine mind at work in the universe.....

Any attempt to draw an analogy between design in human art and design in Nature, for the purpose of proving a designer of Nature to be in existence, must be inaccurate. In the case of human art, there is ample opportunity for someone to see not only the art, which gives evidence of the existence of a designer, but also the designer himself. But we know of no possibility of man being able to go to the back of Nature in order to look at some God employed at the task of executing his designs. Until this can be done, the analogy is false. We know that men make things according to design, and therefore we are justified in concluding that a designer has been at work whenever we see something like the things which we know men design and make—that is, unless we have evidence to the contrary. But we do not know what a god would be likely to make, so we are not justified in concluding that Nature has a god for its author because we see many things that seem to have come into being according to a plan. That certain causes have worked towards the production of a particular effect must not be taken as evidence of design unless the probabilities of design being necessary are greater than the contrary, or unless it is possible to produce the designer. Given a quantity of matter in a state of motion, and something must result; but it is illogical to infer that there is a mind directing the movements of the matter, because every atom of it has contributed its quota towards bringing about the result.

Not infrequently human beings are considered to be the chief causes of events which they did not design. When intending to secure peace, a statesman may, by an unfortunate remark, bring about war. A careless person, without designing it, may set a building on fire by throwing down a lighted match. Without planning to do it, a business man may ruin himself by a single speculation. Yet in these cases there may be at first sight an appearance of design; but experience has taught us that results are not always to be relied upon to indicate whether they were designed or not.

As to Dr. Orr's remark that an ear does not come where an eye has begun to develop, and that a ground plan is adhered to in the midst of all variations, one would like to ask the learned theologian whether a ground plan is adhered to when an eye incapable of seeing is produced, and, if so, wherein lies the wisdom of his divine and all-wise Designer? That ears should not develop where eyes have begun to grow is, no doubt, a very useful arrangement; at least, some of us would look rather funny if ears did develop in so capricious a manner.

It is sometimes argued that the presence of reason in man, and in Nature at large, bespeaks the existence of an absolute thinker, who is the fountain from which all thought flows. But there can be no absolute thinker in a universe where there are many thinkers, because the existence of more than one thinker implies relativity. And with regard to reason in man, and in the order of things around us, we must note that at best man's reason is not perfect, but is continually struggling after accuracy of thought, and is comparatively small when placed in contrast to the vast amount of unreason in humanity; while we too often suffer from the habit of projecting our own reason into Nature around us, and then imagining that we see things developing according to a very rational method. But the method of which we are often conscious is in our own minds, and is reasonable in proportion to the degree of reasonableness of our own thought. A person with a distorted mind may see in Nature around him nothing but chaos, while a man of sound mind sees a sequence of events, which he may call reasonable according to his conception of what constitutes rationality.

Theologians are not satisfied with a wise and powerful God; they desire one who is moral, and able to take care of humanity in a fatherly way. The desire is laudable enough, but it increases the theologian's difficulties. The presence of conscience as man's indwelling representative of a divine being who is entitled to impose his will upon us, is adduced as evidence that the universe is evolved on moral lines, and, therefore, must be the product of a moral God. By the assumption that conscience is the representative of a God, a halo of mysticism and mystification is thrown around an otherwise harmless word. Conscience, which is nothing more than a feeling that we ought to do what we believe to be right, and ought not to do what we believe to be wrong, has developed with human society. As men have experienced pain and pleasure, and realized that they do not like the one, but desire the other, they have developed a feeling that they ought not to treat their fellows so as to cause them pain, while they ought to try to give them pleasure, if they themselves desire their fellows to avoid giving them pain, and to act so as to give them pleasure. Actions causing pleasure came to be acknowledged as duties, and actions causing avoidable pain were looked upon as the opposite to duty. In this way conscience developed, as reason discovered what was right and what was wrong, and classified our actions accordingly. In some men, conscience, or the sense of doing right and avoiding wrongdoing, developed until it became imperative, or nearly so. But in others it evolved to a lesser degree of authority, and throughout the world the power of conscience may be observed to vary with different individuals, and in many persons seems scarcely to exist. Not only so; but many of us need only to reflect on our past experience to discover that our own conscience is less imperative when we are about to do one kind of wrong than when we are about to do another. In some people, conscience is very imperative when they would stay away from church; but in the same persons it is not imperative when they wish to pervert the truth.

The fatherhood of God is a mere fiction in face of the misery, poverty, disease, injustice, and all kinds of suffering which are in this sorrow-stricken world. The coming into the world of millions of people who will never be adequately provided for; the ignorance of millions who should be educated, and who desire to be educated: the slow and often unnecessarily painful process of both individual and social development; the wreck of empires when a high, though as yet imperfect, stage of civilization has been reached, are facts which indisputably contradict the doctrine of the fatherhood of God.

In spite of all that may be said against the idea of God as an explanation of the universe, it is still put forward as the best working hypothesis for theological thought, or as an adequate explanation of philosophical and religious problems. But the idea of God is mythical, as we are unable to discover an objective reality corresponding to the idea; and so far as our knowledge of the universe goes, the idea of God is an unnecessary hypothesis, which adds to the difficulty of our problems, the solution of which can only be attained by the exercise of unfettered reason, to which the God of modern theology is as much a myth as any of the gods of the ancients.

Correspondence.

ATHEIST OR AGNOSTIC?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—With reference to the recent correspondence on the above subject, it may be of interest to see Coleridge's opinion:—

> Little do these men know what atheism is. Not one man in a thousand has either strength of mind, or goodness of heart, to be an Atheist.

In this connection, the old philosophical question seems pertinent:—

> Is the difference between a difference in kind and a difference in degree, in itself, a difference in kind, or a difference in degree?

Views and Opinions.

The War and a Future Life.

Has the War really intensified the interest people feel in the question of a future life? For our own part we see no reason why it should have had this effect, and certainly no evidence of it is observable. Some of those who have always believed in a future life may have more energetically asserted their conviction, but those who did not are where they were. Naturally, the clergy, like the rest of the army of profiteers, do their best to exploit the War. For some time after the War began they talked about the revival of religion, and this was kept up until the presence of evidence to the contrary became too strong for even the "Black Army" to resist. Again, on the face of it, there is no reason why the War should excite a belief in a future life. Death is not peculiar to war time—there are only more deaths in a given period. And death must always be an individual matter, bringing its keenest sorrow to individual circles. Finally, we have the consideration that there is, so to speak, a saturation point in human emotion. And the War has lasted so long, the death roll has been so gigantic, that the edge of feeling has been blunted. We are all more callous to death than we were. One does not start or shriek in the presence of the usual, and death is now an everyday affair to all.

Spiritualism and Sir Arthur Conan Doyle.

The other day Sir Arthur Conan Doyle delivered an address before the Eastbrook Brotherhood, Bradford, and in dealing with his belief in Spiritualism he said:—

> When the War came it brought earnestness unto all our souls, and made us look more closely at our own beliefs and reassess their values. In the presence of an agonized world, hearing every day of the deaths of the flower of our race in the first promise of their unfulfilled youth, seeing around us wives and mothers who had no clear conception whither their loved ones had gone. I seemed suddenly to see that this subject with which I had so long dallied, was not merely a force outside the rules of science but that it was really.....a breaking down of the walls between two worlds.....The objective side of it ceased to interest me, for having made up my mind that it was true, there was an end of the matter. A new revelation seemed to me to be in course of delivery to the human race.

We may well be excused preferring Conan Doyle, the novelist, to Conan Doyle, the philosopher, for it appears from this that Sir Arthur's convictions as to the truth of Spiritualism is little more than a sudden yielding to emotional tension. And there is a certain ingenuousness in the confession that the objective side of the phenomena ceased to interest him, seeing that it is the objective aspect that is of crucial importance. For if the phenomena is subjective, all question of fraud might be set on one side; it would still leave Spiritualism unproven. True, Sir Arthur remarks later, that the "physical phenomena" "had been proved up to the hilt for all who cared to examine the evidence," but to that one can enter a flat contradiction. Many people have examined the evidence and found it quite inconclusive. The same evidence, produced before the same audience, has left some entirely sceptical, and even antagonistic. And this represents a clear line of demarcation between the evidence for Spiritualism and normal scientific proof. A scientific demonstration duly and properly carried out is conclusive to all normal minds. It is a peculiarity of the evidence for Spiritualism that while it convinces one here and there, it leaves the majority as they were.

Religion and Death.

It has been part of the talk of the pulpit since the War opened that our soldiers are nerved to face death by their belief in God and a future life, and that those who remain are consoled for the loss of those dear to them by the belief in a continued existence elsewhere. One regrets to find Sir Arthur Conan Doyle descending to the same kind of chatter. For both statements are essentially untrue. It has been our lot—as it has doubtless been the lot of others—to come into contact with both Freethinkers and Christians whose sons—sometimes an only son, and sometimes an only child—were reported killed. We have tried, honestly tried, to detect a difference in these parents that could be attributed to their views on religion, and have been unable to do so. Differences there have been; but these are all explainable in terms of temperament of character, of training. The religious ones have used a religious formula in expressing their feelings, as one might expect; the non-religious have expressed their feelings in another way. But apart from these superficial and accidental differences, there was a substantial and deeply underlying identity. The religious belief has not consoled; the absence of it has not led to undue or intensified depression. Indeed, those who looked below the surface could detect an underlying community of heartfelt sorrow in the presence of an irrecoverable loss. And well it is that it should be so. It is well that in the face of so great and universal a fact as death, mankind should realize its own unity, even though it be but a momentary glimpse seen through tear-dimmed eyes over an open grave.

Facing Death.

And of those who actually face death, whether in civil life or in the fighting line, what is to be said? Is there any difference here? Those who are in the fighting line will best appreciate the absurdity of the question. The soldier, like the civilian, dies as he has lived, and the thought of a future life troubles him not at all. It is not that they all have definite opinions on the subject; they have not. It is simply that the future life does not enter into their calculations. Here, for example, is a letter published in the Spectator of a recent date. It is written by a boy who was killed on his twenty-first birthday:—

> My dear Dad,—This letter is being written on the eve of our "going over the top" in a big attack. It is only because I know by this time what are the odds against one's returning unhurt that I write it. It will only be sent in the event of my being killed in action. You, I know, my dear Dad, will bear the shock as bravely as you have always borne the strain of my being out here. Yet I should like, if possible, to help you to carry on with as stout a heart as I hope to jump "the bags." I believe I have told you before that I do not fear death itself; the "Beyond" has no terrors for me. I am quite content to die for the cause for which I have given up nearly three years of my life, and I only hope that I may meet death with as brave a front as I have seen other men do before. My one regret is that the opportunity has been denied me to repay you to the best of my ability for the lavish kindness and devotedness which you have always shown me.

Now, that is not what would be called a religious letter; but it is better—it is a manly letter. It is written by one who is resolved to do his duty as he sees it. He is more concerned for the sorrow his death will cause to those he leaves than he is about his own fate. And the man is built of poor stuff indeed who would not rather see his fellow man facing death in this spirit than with his mouth filled with the traditional jargon of religion.

Affection and the Grave.

We detest, far more than we can express in mere words, this exploitation of a great human sorrow in the interest of this or that particular superstition. The endeavour to minister to a mind distressed, we can all, we hope, understand and appreciate. The comfort that may be derived from a friendly hand-clasp or from human association, we all admit. But to claim that the inculcation of a belief in a future life dulls the edge of grief, or reconciles a parent to the death of a child, is sheer cant. It has no such effect; it never has had any such effect; it would not be well that it should have such an effect. Human affection is centred as much on the fact of death as on the fact of life. The grave that takes, gives; and human mortality is the ultimate condition of human love. And I am certain that even though men and women, without exception, believed in a future life, the main currents of human joy and sorrow would remain the same. It is this world that remains dominant. And while we shall, we hope, never see the death of our friends without sorrow, we may all learn to face death in their case and our own without fear.

Chapman Cohen.

We hear much of martyrs and confessors—of those who were slain by the sword or consumed in the fire; but we know little of that still larger number who by the mere threat of persecution have been driven into an outward abandonment of their real opinions, and who thus forced into an apostasy the heart abhors, have passed the remainder of their life in the practice of a constant and humiliating hypocrisy.—T. H. Buckle.

One Horizon, or Two?

The Rev. Professor W. M. Clow, D.D., was for some years a regular contributor to the British Weekly, and is now a writer in The Life of Faith. He is an exceedingly orthodox divine who avails himself of every opportunity to defend the faith once delivered to the saints. In an article, entitled "Spiritual Issues in the Light of the War," which appeared in The Life of Faith for September 26, he admits that "this world-wide War is not only raising questions which trouble our minds and vex our hearts," but is also "setting the things which have been most surely believed on their trial." Like all his brethren, he feels quite sure that the ultimate effect of the War on religion will be in every sense beneficial. Already "it is opening men's eyes to the value and the power of the solemn certainties of the Christian faith." We are assured that "the Christian certainties are being purged from the alloy which trivial interpretations have mingled with them, and the pure gold of the truth in Jesus is shining out before men's eyes." Many chaplains at the Front, and not a few clergymen at home, find no justification for Dr. Clow's optimistic conclusions. Indeed, the Professor contradicts himself in the very article just mentioned. He says:—

> This War, with its merciless cruelties, its coarse passions, its callous wrongs, and its pitiful hypocrisies, is the handwriting on the broad page of history which proclaims that men have ceased to live in the fear of God.

What about "the Christian doctrine that every man, as a spiritual being and a child of God, has two horizons?" It is probably true that to such a doctrine "the whole New Testament bears witness," and that Paul recognizes its truth and sums it up when he speaks of "things seen and temporal," and "things unseen and eternal"; but the fact remains that the majority of mankind live with only one horizon, and are quite content. Professor Clow cannot close his eyes to the truth that—

> To-day the sea of faith which was once at the full is now
> Retreating to the breath
> Of the night-wind, down the vast edges drear
> And naked shingles of the world.

For this serious decline of faith the Professor assigns three causes, namely, our over-absorption in this present world, the haze which has fallen upon the great certainties, and the failure of the witness of believers, the chief of which is the last. We are confidently assured that "if Christian men and women were living supernatural lives no man would doubt the supernatural." As a matter of fact, no human being has ever lived such a life. Christians profess to have been supernaturally born the moment they gave their hearts to Christ; but not one of them has ever shown the least evidence of such a birth. It is in their professions alone that they are superior to other people. To talk of the failure of their witness is, therefore, sheer folly, for they cannot bear witness to that of which they have no experience. "We have but faith," says Tennyson; "we cannot know"; and everybody is aware that the irresistible tendency of faith is to decay. Even a veteran like Dr. Clifford recently confessed that to believe is the most difficult task in the world. Even clergymen often complain that, in spite of never-ceasing prayer, doubt assails them again and again, for which they hold the Devil responsible. Poor old Devil must have an extremely broad back to bear all the blame heaped upon it; but the truth is that nothing is more natural than to doubt the supernatural. The haze spoken of by Dr. Clow rests, not upon the supernatural, but upon the belief in it, the supernatural being, not a thing that exists, but a thing imagined; not an object of knowledge, but of faith.

Dr. Clow repeatedly refers to the Christian certainties, or the solemn certainties of the Christian faith. In reality there are no such certainties. Nothing is certain except the world in which we live. In Browning's poems we meet characters who are very sure of God and their own souls; but we have it on the authority of his intimate friend, Mrs. Sutherland Orr, that Browning himself was a thoroughgoing Agnostic, who professed to know nothing of any supernatural certainties. Dr. Clow alludes to Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, of which he says:—

> The reader will remember that when he had closed the volumes of that marvellous history, where the very thought of God has been stubbornly excluded, the spiritual world had passed almost out of sight. The reader had become so engrossed by the splendid pageant of history, with its record of the proud ambitions of emperors, the achievements of statesmen, the tramp of armies, and all the lustre of those famous centuries, that God and heaven and the love of Christ had become a fading dream. In this time we are all absorbed by this present world. Never was it more interesting, more fascinating, more engrossing.

The Professor has not the hardihood to declare that Gibbon's history is inaccurate, or that its record of the ambitions, motives, achievements, and failures of men and women is not reliable; but he forgets that there was nothing in the falling empire that reflected credit on the justice and goodness of God, or upon the cleansing love of Christ. Does Dr. Clow really see much lustre or splendour in those dark centuries covered by Gibbon's history? Whatever God may be to the imagination of zealous Christians, it is incontrovertible that God has never been active in history, so that Gibbon was perfectly justified in ignoring him.

The Professor affirms that with most people faith is either an inheritance or a contagion. We are surprised that a scholarly man should fall into the error of regarding religion as an inheritance. Religion is no more inheritable than learning or carpentry. In no sense whatever can it be pronounced a legacy. A sire cannot bequeath his faith to his son, as he can a sum of money or a family heirloom. And yet Dr. Clow, ignoring or misrepresenting the great law of heredity, tells us again and again that there is a faith which is merely an inheritance, and that it is of but very little use. That religion is a contagion is beyond all doubt. Contagion means the communication of disease from person to person by contact, direct or indirect. In the overwhelming majority of cases the contagion occurs in early childhood, the agents being parents and teachers. Like many other diseases, the natural tendency of religion is to cure itself out of existence. Experience shows clearly how supremely difficult it is to prevent the faith from working itself out of a child's mind. Most of us retain vivid recollections of supperless nights as punishment for religious forgetfulness. Religion was not congenial to us; our very constitution rebelled against it, and often effected its ejection. Parents, Sunday-school teachers, and clergymen worked hard to prevent the religious virus from oozing out of us; and in numerous instances their efforts were defeated by purely natural causes. Religion is really a child's complaint, and those who escape it in childhood seldom take it after they have reached years of intelligence. Moreover, even those who remain religious in mature life know full well how often their nature revolts against the habit of prayer and so-called communion with God. Dr. Clow himself says:—

> The faith in the unseen is like a fire which burns low, a tide whose waters ebb, a light whose shining grows dim. There is needed, for every period of life as our years advance, a fresh baptism of the Holy Spirit. We are all familiar with those times which may last for years, when the things once surely believed, the great and solemn certainties, seem to pale, and we are in danger of living with one horizon. This baptism may be ours almost for the asking. It cannot be ours unless we ask.

That extract supports our contention that the belief in the supernatural is foreign to our nature, that religion is a disease which our constitution is ever trying to throw off, and that if we are true to ourselves we will have nothing to do with horizon number two. One horizon at a time is sufficient. This world is all we need, and more than many of us are able to put to the best advantage. Dr. Clow gives his whole case away when he states that the Holy Spirit will do nothing unless he is asked, and that we must become what we ought to be before we are entitled to ask him. In reality, we must be our own saviours while giving God all the credit and glory.

J. T. Lloyd.

Swinburne's Literary Father.

> The stormy sophist with his mouth of thunder, > Clothed with loud words and mantled in the might
> Of darkness and magnificence of night.—Swinburne.

Thackeray, in the beginning of his famous lectures on the "The Four Georges," makes affectionate mention of an old friend whose life extended back into the eighteenth century. "I often thought," he says, "as I took my kind old friend's hand, how, with it, I held on to the old society." Even such a link with the past is Walter Savage Landor, whose virile writings bridge the gulf between great Freethinkers at the commencement and the end of the nineteenth century.

Shelley, who died whilst the century was yet young, was an enthusiastic admirer of Landor; and Swinburne, the most golden-voiced of our recent poets, sat at Landor's feet and found inspiration in his wisdom. How lovingly Swinburne refers to the elder singer:—

> I found him whom I shall not find
> Till all grief end,
> In holiest age our mightiest mind,
> Father and friend.

Nor was this a mere tribute of affection. Landor cast the spell of genius upon all who came near him. Robert Southey, who had so many opportunities of judging, has left a magnificent tribute to his memory. De Quincey, Dickens, Emerson, and Charles Lamb have all combined in their various ways to render affectionate tribute to that "deep-mouthed Boetian," as Byron called him. Robert Browning dedicated his Luria to Landor. It is given to few to inspire such love among friends, or fear among enemies. Carlyle, visiting him in old age, found him "stirring company; a proud, irascible, trenchant, yet generous, veracious, and very dignified old man; quite a ducal or royal man in the temper of him."

Landor's literary activity extended over seventy years. He was a poet embodying revolutionary aspirations in classic language. He was a literary dramatist of great power, and, above all, he was a critic in the widest sense of that much abused word. The Imaginary Conversations, on which competent judges have bestowed unstinted praise, is his masterpiece. There is nothing like it in the range of English literature. It is a great panorama of historic persons, and includes such famous characters as Plato, in far-off Greece, to our own Porson; Hannibal, of old-world Carthage, to David Hume; Seneca to his own friend, Robert Southey. He has painted them all with masterly touches; kings, and greater than kings, statesmen and fair ladies, philosophers and prelates, writers and scientists, of all ages and of all types. Epicurus discusses philosophy in his garden; Montaigne smiles at the worthy Scaliger; Melancthon reproves Calvin.

How perfectly, too, has Landor caught the relation of the French Court and the great lying Church in the bitterly ironic conversation between Louis XIV. and Pere La Chaise, when the monarch confesses the most heinous crimes and the courtly and obsequious confessor imposes the most trifling penances. Scene succeeds scene, each richer and fuller than its predecessor, supplementing one another, and all go to make a magnificent picture of "life, like a dome of many-coloured glass."

When Landor is at his best, not many are so perfect as he. There are few things more pathetic than his portrait of the unhappy Anne Boleyn. He represents the pious and hypocritical Henry coming disguised to see Anne in the condemned cell. Very touchingly does he express her womanly desire to see her child, "Could I but kiss her once again, it would comfort my heart or break it."

For long Landor's work was "caviare to the general." His masterpiece was venomously and ignorantly described as "the adventures of seven volumes, which are seven valleys of dry bones." This lack of contemporary appreciation is the more remarkable because Landor was a real and remarkable genius. In nearly every page of his writing there is high thinking and rare eloquence. Indeed, a well-edited selection of his works would be one of the most beautiful books in the language. Although Landor addressed a small audience while he lived, he looked confidently to the future; "I shall dine late; but the drawing-room will be well-lighted, the guests few and select."

The chief of Landor's other books is undoubtedly Pericles and Aspasia. Another of his works, The Citation and Examination of William Shakespeare for Deer-Stealing, evoked Charles Lamb's happy epigram that it could only have been written by "the man who did write it, or he of whom it was written." Landor's poetry is not bulky in quantity, for few poets have won such recognition with such a small nosegay of verse. The exquisite lines on Rose Aylmer have found their way into many anthologies and many hearts, while the sympathetic lines on the death of Charles Lamb are an exquisite tribute to a splendid genius and an heroic man. The single stanza, in his own inimitable manner, prefixed to one of his last books, epitomizes his life and aims in four lines:—

> I strove with none, for none was worth my strife.
> Nature I loved; and next to Nature, Art;
> I warmed both hands before the fire of life;
> It sinks, and I am ready to depart.

For those who care for concentration and restraint in literature, Landor's writings are full of delight. As a man he was dowered with the hate of hate, the scorn of scorn, the love of love. Withal, he was a typical Englishman, with an appetite for the heroic. He showed this when, on Napoleon's invasion of Spain, he went over, and, with his own energy and money, raised a regiment, with whom he marched to the seat of war. A man of letters, he was also a man of action.

Landor has been called a grand old Pagan, and his sympathies were always secular rather than religious. The eternal arrogance of priests always roused his opposition, and he never forgot Milton's advice that "Presbyter is priest writ large." There are many sceptical thrusts in his writings. Writing of the Bible, he makes Melancthon say of Calvin:—

> The book of good news, under your interpretation, tells people not only that they may go and be damned, but, unless they are lucky, they must inevitably.

And, again, referring to religious persecution:—

> The unsoundness of doctrine is not cut off nor cauterised; the professor is. The head falls on the scaffold, or fire surrounds the stake, because a doctrine is bloodless and incombustible. Fierce, outrageous animals, for want of the man who has escaped them, lacerate and trample his cloak or bonnet. This, although the work of brutes, is not half so brutal as the practice of theologians, seizing the man himself, instead of bonnet or cloak.

In another page he returns to the attack:—

> There is scarcely a text in the Holy Scriptures to which there is not an opposite text, written in characters equally large and legible; and there has usually been a sword laid upon each.

He has some sly hits at spiritual intoxication:—

> At last the zealot is so infatuated by the serious mockeries he imitates and repeats that he really takes his own voice for God's. Is it not wonderful that the words of eternal life should have hitherto produced only eternal litigation?

One of his "conversations" closes with the magnificent words: "There is nothing on earth divine besides humanity," and that was the keynote of his writings from the time when, at college, he was dubbed "a mad Jacobin," until his death, when he had made an imperishable name for himself. A Warwickshire man, he was cradled in the same county as Shakespeare, and there was something of "the Master" in Landor's genius. Carlyle said finely of one of Landor's best literary efforts, published when the "old lion" was over eighty years of age: "The sound of it is like the ring of Roman swords on the helmets of barbarians. The unsubduable old Roman!"

The last years of Landor's stormy life were spent in peace. On reading of Algernon Swinburne's visit to the old man shortly before his death, one is reminded of Turner's supreme picture, "The Fighting Temeraire," where the old battleship is being towed to her last berth, and transfigured by the last glance of day's expiring glory. The symbolism of that great painting is exalted in the harmony between the memories of brave old Landor and his abiding quiet, for whom for ever "All winds are quiet as the sun, all waters as the shore."

The Enigma of Death: A Solution.

Not very long ago, a friend who takes a great interest in Spiritualism sent me an article bearing the above title, written by Mr. J. J. Morse, the editor of The Two Worlds, which has been reprinted in pamphlet form. It is apparently an attempt to prove the survival of the soul after death on grounds quite apart from Spiritualism. As readers will doubtless perceive by the extracts here given, it is a chapter based upon big assumptions, and, as such, does not require much comment. I give all the main points.

> The torn and mangled bodies of men strew the blood-stained fields, and science has been prostituted to serve the most appalling methods of effecting separation between spirits and their habiliments of flesh (p. 1).

Here is the first big assumption, the object of the pamphlet being to show that the so-called "spirits" could separate from "their habiliments of flesh."

> Can we find the reason for the enigma death in the living organism?.....If we can find in the thing that IS the evidence of the thing THAT IS TO BE, then the enigma is solvable (p. 5).

Here, again, is the assumption of a soul or spirit that will survive the death of the body. Needless to say, we have no evidence of the existence of such a "thing" in the body.

> Is the dissolution of the body synchronous with the dissipating of that which we call self-consciousness. If the latter is not the case, by what means is self-consciousness continued after bodily death? (p. 7).

Here is another tacit assumption, and it is made without evidence of any kind that self-consciousness can survive the death of the body. It rests with those who assert that self-consciousness can survive to adduce some evidence in support of that assertion, or in corroboration of the belief.

> Is it conceivable that all this vast expenditure of time and energy on the part of nature in the making of a man has only resulted in the production of a mannikin to shuffle across the stage for threescore years and ten, and then at the end to be "cast as rubbish to the void"? If so, our man is but a mannikin, who jabbers and struts a space, and then falls to pieces (p. 8).

Just so; but is it seemly to speak in this way of rational men who know perfectly well that cosmic evolution in the past was not carried on for "the making of man," though the advent of the animal kingdom happened to be one of the results?

> My thought is on something we call energy, but which to my mind may more suitably be called God, and it is because of my belief in the inextinguishable nature of this, may I call it, Divine energy, that I hold not only that the human is not the limits for the expression of that energy, nor either the so-called material universe, that I claim that our survival of bodily death is an inevitable sequence of the mighty processes that have resulted in bringing man upon the scene (p. 9).

This is rather a long sentence, and somewhat mixed; but if Mr. Morse elects to call the energy in Nature "God" and "Divine," he is, of course, at perfect liberty to do so. This change of name, however, does not alter the character of the energy in any part of the Universe; neither does it give anything supposed to reside in the body—the "soul" or "spirit," for instance—the power to live after death. Even the claim that this survival is "inevitable" does not affect the matter in the least.

> Is this life a rudimentary state preceding further and higher stages of personal being? If so, the enigma of death is resolvable. If not, then death is dying in very truth (p. 10).

Here I would suggest that Mr. Morse should get on with his proof of immortality, and not ask so many foolish questions. This life is the only one known to science; the future state to which Spiritualists look forward is a lower one, in which people who on earth had sterling common sense speak the most outrageous nonsense.

> From the day of Anton Mesmer the world has had presented evidence of the functioning of consciousness along supra-normal lines of action.....There is abundant and irrefragable evidence that men can see without eyes.....that men hear independently of the ordinary methods of audation, that they feel independently of the ordinary process of sensation (p. 11).

The first statement here refers to the fact of a strong, masterful will dominating a very weak one; the second is a reference to clairvoyance and clairaudience, in which the medium professes to see and hold converse with "spirits" of the dead—which no one else present in the room can see. As an example, I take the case of Mr. Horace Leaf, Spiritualist lecturer and clairvoyant, who told a lady who visited him that he could see "a form called Elizabeth" behind her chair, and said that there were "a crowd of spirits" beside her, including "Grandfather Edward, Uncle John, and Maria." The lady informed the magistrate that not one of those "spirits" was known to her, either as deceased relatives or friends.

To another lady who came to him, Mr. Leaf said, "I see an elderly lady with grey hair behind your chair. I get the name of Annie or Anna Manning." Upon being told by his visitor that she did not know any such person, he said, "It must be a relative or something of that sort." Then, after a pause, he said, "I get the name of a man, a spirit with a short beard. He is brought in by the spirit of a woman, so that you may recognize the woman. I get Edward." His visitor said that she knew of no such deceased person of that name in her family or among her acquaintances. She gave him his fee—5s.—and left the premises. After hearing other witnesses, the magistrate fined Mr. Leaf £25 and costs, or two months in the second division. On the same day (Feb. 24, 1917) three other mediums were convicted of fraud—Madame Vox, Mrs. Fielder, and Madame Leslie—the first being fined, and the other two sentenced to two months' imprisonment. Not one of the four mediums was able to see without eyes or hear without ears, as they professed to do.

> If the supra functions exist they require organs adapted to their expressions. Then this supra organism must be in organized form, and will be emitted from the body at death in a corresponding form (p. 12).

Here we see that the claims made by clairvoyants and others are assumed to be conclusive evidence of the existence of "supra functions" in the body, which necessitate "supra organs" to perform those functions. Mr. Morse does not, however, explain how it is that science knows nothing of such organs.

> Andrew Jackson Davis has described what he observed of the process of dying.....He tells us that the central pivot (really the point of consciousness) emerged from the superior brain, and attracted it to the ethereal elements constituting the supra body. That these enveloped the head of the dying form, and presently this sunlike halo assumed shape and form. In appearance this form, Davis tells us, was human (p. 13).

"Davis tells us!" And who in the name of all that's sane is "Davis"? Mr. Morse does not tell us. The question, however, can be answered. Andrew Jackson Davis, also called the "Poughkeepsie Seer," was a religious crank in America of the Swedenborg type, who "held forth" in the early days of Spiritualism half a century ago. Having read that Paul was "caught up to the third heaven," he claimed to have clairvoyant visions of several heavens, one above the other, to which disembodied spirits rose as they grew in wisdom and love. He never, of course, saw anything of the kind; neither did he "observe the process of dying," as here stated. He fraudulently invented the latter scene, knowing that it could not be proved that he had not seen what he described. And it is to the inane utterances of this mendacious crank that Mr. Morse appeals in support of his ridiculous theories.

Having got nearly to the end of his pamphlet without being able to advance one single scrap of evidence in support of a future life, Mr. Morse is compelled at last to fall back upon Spiritualism. He says:—

> The facts of Spiritualism do establish man's survival. .....Our mediums are the present day living witnesses of the existence of the supra-normal powers to which reference has been made.....Their psychic faculties are the link between the normal world and the supra-normal world. Those faculties are the points of contact between the two states of life (p. 15).

Here, it will be seen, all the alleged "facts of Spiritualism" are entirely dependent upon the "psychic faculties" of the mediums. If the latter fail, there are no other Spiritualistic "facts" to put in their place. In the earlier forms of Spiritualism many of the mediums were detected in deliberate acts of fraud; but in the new forms of that "ism" the automatists, whether fraudulent or not, run little risk of detection—unless a fee is demanded of inquirers, as in the case of Mr. Leaf and others. The question then arises, Are the mediums of the present day more moral or more reliable than their "physical phenomena" predecessors? The answer is, that we have no reason for supposing that they are; neither have we any evidence known to science that there is a living entity in the human body which is capable of surviving death.

After reading this one-sided "solution" of what is called "the enigma of death," it has occurred to me that it might not be amiss to examine the Christian idea of immortality in the endeavour to see where and when it arose, what was actually believed, and what facts, if any, might be adduced in support of it. This I shall commence in the next paper.

Abracadabra.

"A Field Card to God."

How to begin to address you is in itself problematical—an enigma. You, whom nobody can define, and whose mysterious depths remain unprobed, are surely deserving of a title so exalted and so superb, even as no poet of the highest calibre has yet created. No mere majestic titles for you; these sink into an abyss of indignity and are, apparently, superficial before your vast greatness. And as I, poor little mortal, cannot coin the terms of sublimity soaring high enough into the empyrean such as befit your great immortality, I begin humbly as I would to one who has my reverence and deep respect, and trust that you, in your infinite greatness, will not think me too presumptive or familiar.

The few queries which I am about to submit to you—I deem necessary to acquaint you with the fact—are echoed and re-echoed in thousands of hearts; in hearts torn asunder with grief and sorrow; in minds turned by despair and misery. Tell me, O God, whether it is your wish that we were cast into this great inferno of war; whether you preordained that hell be let loose on earth and the Devil play havoc with the universe; whether it was your wish that death, grief, misery, despair, and heartrending sorrow walk hand in hand, reaping their rich harvest among mankind? Now, let us be logical.

The Bible teaches us that you are Almighty. So be it. Then you could have prevented this worldly scourge, and even never have fashioned it; wherefore, my little mind cannot comprehend why you did fashion it, and still permit it to continue. We are told that you move in a mysterious way. Aye, verily you do.

Merciful God, it surely cannot be your wish that your children die the awful death of the battlefield—to perish by the hand of man. Can it be your wish to sever limbs of multitudes of your own likeness and creation; to inflict pain and anguish broadcast, and to drown your own world in sorrow? If it is your wish, O where is your mercy? If it is not, where is your almightyness? I entreat you not to be angry with your humble child for questioning those properties of yours, which we are assured by the chroniclers of the Scriptures, that you possess. We do not understand, and because we do not understand, we begin to waver in our faith in you.

If it is your wish to punish offenders, show us a symbol that you are at work, so that they who have invoked your wrath may know that they are receiving their deserts justly, and at whose powerful hands; but all who have known the pangs of suffering, the tortues of hell itself in this great ordeal, are surely not invariably steeped in iniquity, deserving of your terrible chastisement.

We, who had implicit faith in your great power, and sought of you for guidance, as do the little children and the stricken blind, are we to be left to our own limited resources? Are we to be forsaken in the hour of need? O, surely not. Is not this the opportune moment for exhibiting your limitless power; for teaching us the power of God Almighty? Remember, O God, that millions are wavering in their belief in you. We are perilously near a brink from which you can save us. We are but frail humans, and blind tolerance has its limitations. This diabolical conflict has been instrumental in hurling thousands of believers in you into the gulf of doubt; and your stupendous unlimited capabilities, with which you are credited, are by many now only accepted with reserve. Symptoms of doubt are beginning to be entertained by many a brokenhearted woman smitten by the loss of a dear one. Staunch and devout believers in you heretofore are now uttering the question almost in the throes of despair, "Can there be a God to allow all this?" Behold! Open the gates of the city of refuge to your children; O respond to our cry with a token of enlightenment, guiding us in your Divine path.

I am writing from the scene of devastation, of destruction, and of annihilation of innocent manhood. I have witnessed death in cruel forms—limbless misshapes of beloved fathers, sons, husbands, and brothers—all lain low by the vile scourge of battle. The gruesomeness and tragedy of it all eat deeply into my soul—and set me pondering. Many a strange and fleeting thought passes me, and innumerable questions arise to my lips. Why? Why?

It has been said that the whole responsibility for this great happening is attributable to the wiles and evil desires of an individual. Many think that it is the actual work of the Devil. Others vouch that they are but synonymous. "Ha, Ha!" even in my bitterness I must laugh—though I am sure it is an offence to do so when addressing you seriously—for which I beseech your pardon. These puny mortals who profess to knowledge have surely forgotten that you are Almighty, and that an insignificant human—though he be a Teuton Majesty—is but clay in your mighty hands, to be moulded at your will. Do you not reign supreme? It is, therefore, unquestionably your will that all this be. Again occur a paradox and a question. A merciful, just, and loving God has willed evil and destruction. Again, Why? Why?

Perhaps there is an explanation, a solution to the bewildering mystery, which is denied us. But until we comprehend, we waver in our faith. So come, I beseech you, show us, teach us to know that there is a God, supreme, Almighty, merciful, and just. Vanish our doubts. Testify that God is not a mythological character, but of Divine existence. Then Atheists, Agnostics, and the multitudes of waverers will flock to you, O God, in all sincerity and everlasting hope.

The Sphinx.

I saw the sphinx in a wasted land,
Broken and old and brown;
I followed its gaze with a steady hand
Where the skies go bending down.

I thought of the years those unshut eyes
Had stared away to the east;
I wondered if under the ancient skies
They had builded a man as a beast.

But the stone spoke not, it eyes were blind.
It gave neither sign nor nod;
Surely, I said, "our ancient kind
Have builded an image of God."

Acid Drops.

Another attempt is to be made to induce the Prime Minister to agree to a National Day of Prayer. The World's Evangelical Alliance is to interview Mr. Lloyd George in order to find out why such a day has not, up to the present, been appointed. The reason seems obvious. It would have served no useful purpose. Mr. Lloyd George has said that various things were essential to winning the War, but he never mentioned prayer as a national necessity. The other day he did say we intended giving the Germans "Hell," but he said nothing about giving them prayer. A National Day of Prayer would be the one thing to make England ridiculous in the eyes of the world.

The crowning impudence of the proposal is contained in the remark: "The Prime Minister would be informed that a day of prayer was wanted, not merely by a section of the Christian people, but by all classes, not only in England, but throughout the Empire." Of course, if one sets out to tell a lie, it may as well be a "thumping" lie, and the Alliance must be more stupid than even we think it if it imagines that the Prime Minister will swallow such a story. He knows better. If all classes want a day of prayer they can easily have it by praying. No one will stop them. Besides, Mr. Lloyd George is a politician, and if there had been a general demand for a day of prayer he would have long since found that essential to winning the War. The real aim is to engineer a colossal act of mingled stupidity and hypocrisy. And, we observe, that the Alliance has cancelled its evening meetings on account of probable air-raids. Why not hold them, and trust to prayer for protection?

Writing on the subject of the work of the National Sunday League, Mr. Pett Ridge says, "The League extended the Sabbath day's journey which, under the old law, was limited to one mile." Just so. And the League also introduced a little sweetness and light into the English Sunday, which, until a few years ago, was devoted to spirituous and spiritual intoxication.

Speaking at the Annual Assembly of the Congregational Union, the Rev. Stanley Wicks said "children should not be pitch-forked into the Church at the age of sixteen after a talk with the minister in the vestry." This shows how Church membership returns are compiled.

Some controversy has arisen in the press as to whether Mr. Lloyd George, in a recent interview, used the expression: "We'll give them (the Germans) hell." Mr. George states that he has no recollection of using it, but the language was reproduced in several papers. After all, the sentiment is Christian, if not statesmanlike.

Theological prejudice too frequently mars the pages of the liberal and fair-minded Daily News. In a recent article, with the pleasing title of "Pan-Anglicanism," Bishop Colenso is referred to as "the arithmetical bishop who could not forgive Moses for having written a book of Numbers." The fact is that Colenso made a slashing attack on the Pentateuch, and thousands of people had their faith undermined in consequence of the bishop's criticisms. The religious world was too ignorant to know that most of Colenso's arguments were borrowed from Paine and other Freethinkers, but the Christians read the bishop when they would not have read the iconoclasts. To-day the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch is discredited, and Colenso had his share in the work. As it was, it took the bright and brainy Christians many generations to realize that poor old Moses could hardly have written an account of his own funeral.

Some of the present-day novelists appear to be taking themselves very seriously on religious matters. Mr. H. G. Wells has "found God"—a brand new one—and now Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, the author of Sherlock Holmes, announces "a new revelation," which makes religion no longer a matter of faith, but of experience. Sir Arthur's panacea is based on "psychical phenomena," which sounds suspiciously like our old friend "Sludge the Medium." Perhaps this outbreak of fancy religionism is the boasted "revival of piety" which the clergy so often speak of. If so, the novelists will be more pleased than the parsons.

"A U.F.C. Bishop" writes to the Dundee Courier in defence of reprisals. He argues that the policy is quite Christian, since God said "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." He conveniently forgets the saying attributed to Jesus, "Ye have heard that it has been said by them of old, An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, but I say unto you, Love your enemies." If there is any meaning in language, that means a clear abrogation of the old rule. A reply to that is, we are loving our enemies when we correct their bad habits—which is exactly what the Germans say of us. We do not believe them, neither do they believe us. It will take a lot of argument to persuade Englishmen that German airmen are animated by a desire for our improvement when they drop bombs on London or Ramsgate; and it will be equally hard to convince the enemy that we are inspired by philanthropy in dropping bombs on German towns. And the cant of religion only makes a bad business the more detestable.

If we believe that the killing of English women and children by German airmen serves but to nerve us to more strenuous efforts to beat the enemy, one would like to know on what ground we believe that the killing of German women and children by English airmen will have any other result on the enemy? If we are not sending our airmen to attack women and children, but only to bomb munition works, etc., in Germany, then the killing of civilians is incidental—is not a matter of reprisals at all; it is part of the normal operations of war. If we really wish to kill German women and children, is it necessary to go to Germany at all? There are plenty in this country. If, again, the bombing of ammunition works is legitimate warfare, how many parts of Britain are there that could not be legitimately bombed? We are not arguing that German towns should not be bombed. We are only wishful for a little serious and straightforward thinking on the matter. The whole business of the War is, as we have often said, a competition in brutality. When one side used gas, the other was compelled to follow, or be beaten. And so with other things. One side sets the pace, and the other is compelled to follow. If we must have reprisals, let us have them; only do let us import courage and honesty into our doings.

The ancient wheeze of the camel and the eye of the needle will be recalled by the announcement that the late Rev. Sir V. D. Vyvyan, of Withiel, Cornwall, left estate to the value of £213,997.

Blessed be ye poor! £33,843 was all the Rev. A. Hanburg, of Bayswater, left of this world's goods, and the Rev. W. G. Walker, of Knockie, Salop, left only £22,253. Neither wished to leave it—they would have preferred to take it with them.

The most curious will we have seen for some time is that of the Rev. H. E. Robson, of Caversham, Reading. According to a Daily Telegraph report:—

> He desired that some of the principal arteries of his body shall be severed, to make sure life is extinct, and the doctor who shall do this operation is to receive £20 for such operation; and his remains are to be cremated and disposed of as the executors may determine, and he directed that no religious rite or ceremony of any description shall be held over his uncremated remains.

We do not know what this means—whether Mr. Robson was waiting until he was dead to let the world know his real opinions, or simply that he disliked ceremonies. It is a strange will—for a clergyman.

An apologist for the clergy says that parsons who fight run counter to Canon law. The point raised is purely ecclesiastic, for the clergy have no objection to consecrating regimental flags and christening battleships. Nor do they object to drawing decent salaries as Army Chaplains. In olden times priests were not so tender of their skins.

People who were allowed to shelter in a London police-station during a recent air-raid stole a clock, some boots, and provisions. At an East London Police-Court a thief stole the Testament. The last item shows that one of the thieves was pious.

The Spectator is responsible for the following addition to child-Scripture stories:—

> One little boy, told to write all he knew of Elijah, speaking truly for himself, wrote: "We do not know much of this holy man," and added: "But we know that he went for a cruise with a widow."

The Bishop of Bath and Wells has issued a solemn caution against using wafers at Holy Communion in place of even war-time bread. Bearing in mind that the food-controller prohibited the giving of bread to pigeons, we wonder he has not had courage enough to prohibit it being used for this kind of ecclesiastical tomfoolery.

Man, says the Rev. Bernard J. Snell, cannot do without religion. We have heard this before, and from many others beside Mr. Snell. Perhaps some of these gentlemen will one day set themselves the task of dealing with the fact that millions of men and women are without religion, and are none the worse for its absence. We fancy that all such a generalization means is that the clergy cannot get along without religion—and that is quite obvious.

Mr. Walter Winans writes a very vigorous article in the Star for October 8, on "The Horse in War-Time." Mr. Winans points out that cruelty to horses has been on the increase during the War, the number of half-starved-looking horses having greatly increased. We are not surprised at this, and it is one more proof of the brutalization that overtakes a world at war. Mr. Winans says he has received hundreds of letters from "all classes" joining in his protest against this cruelty to horses, and then adds:—

> I said "from all classes," but there I was wrong—I have not yet received one from a clergyman, nor has a clergyman come to my assistance when I have interfered in a case of cruelty.

This is a good example of the humanity encouraged by religion.

The "Divine-Human personality"—by which, we suppose, is meant Jesus Christ—"was never more strongly evidenced than in the War." So says the Bishop of London; and he knows as much about it as anyone else. This "Divine-Human personality," says the Bishop, saved the Worcesters in October, 1914; it preserved Paris and safeguarded the Channel ports, and stimulated "the miraculous outburst of national endeavour and sacrifice which had made the past years memorable." But the "Divine-Human personality" has very obvious limitations. It could preserve Paris—"Infidel Paris"—but not pious London. It could safeguard the Channel ports, but not Belgium or Serbia. It could stimulate sacrifice, but could do nothing to prevent the acquisition of huge profits by those who were gambling in the food-stuffs of the people. Finally, it could not prevent the destruction of thousands of useful members of society, but it could protect the Bishop of London and his kind. Really, it is time the work of this "Divine-Human personality" was handed over to a committee of level-headed men and women.

The inappropriateness of hymns is often so striking as almost to suggest a deliberate attempt at sarcasm. Thus, the Daily Chronicle reports that during the recent London air-raids a woman told her children to sing, "Hark, hark, my soul, it is the Lord," while the bombs were falling around. Of course, from the Theistic point of view, it was the Lord behind it all; but most people would be content to say it was the Germans.

"The Dean of Durham says the fearful experiences of the last three years have unsettled many beliefs and on many devout minds the dark shadow of doubt had fallen, and, he asks, who can wonder? Well, at any rate, the 'beliefs' existed during the time the war was fructifying, especially among the priesthood of Prussia. As far as the priests of Prussia are concerned, at any rate, we may ask not what effect the War has had on beliefs, but how far beliefs were responsible for the War. The 'belief' embodied in the phrase 'Gott mit uns' was certainly a formidable factor in Germany's preparations."—The South African Review.

The Church Times is very angry with the Daily Telegraph for having written a sensible article on the question of divorce. The D. T. had written that it sees no reason why "men and women who have unfortunately found in one another not the affinities they had hoped for but their very antipathies should not be able, after a proper interval of time, to try again in other quarters, if they feel disposed to embark upon such an adventure twice." That, we think, is a view that will commend itself to many; but the Church Times points out austerely that "marriage is not an appointment of the State"; all the State does is to legalize it, "securing to the married couple and their issue rights of property and inheritance and so forth. What the State has conferred it can withdraw, but it cannot touch marriage." This strikes us as being delightfully mixed. So far as marriage is the equivalent of the union of two people, it is a natural fact, and antedates both theology and the State. But so far as it is a legalized condition, it is essentially a State-conferred right, and nothing else. It is true that the Church claimed precedence of the State here, but it is precisely this claim that the modern mind rejects. The form of marriage—like all other institutions—must ultimately be determined by its effect on human welfare. There is no other test that will commend itself to common sense.

An organization, with the resounding title of The World's Evangelical Alliance, is attempting to arrange a Day of National Prayer to ask for a "victory over the Devil incarnate." The prospect is a terrible one for the clergy, for, if their request is granted, their occupation will be gone.

Jesus commanded his apostles to take nothing with them in the shape of gold and silver when they went on their journeys. But that is a long while ago, and they didn't know everything down in Judee. The American Episcopal Church is sending a real live bishop out to the War zone, and is appealing for five hundred thousand dollars for his maintenance. Luckily, this move is not a measure of the intelligence which America brings to bear on the War. If it were, we should wish her on the side of Germany.

We don't pretend to be at all interested or concerned over the question of Sunday Matins, and we haven't the slightest trace of respect for people who can discuss such a topic with gravity. Its intellectual value is no greater than that of a mob of savages discussing the value of some particular piece of primitive magic. But we note that day after day the Times is giving its space to a discussion of the topic, and this, with the constant assurance of the great danger fronting the nation, and of the need for economy, and for the intelligent direction of all our efforts, gives one occasion to think furiously. Men who can spend their time discussing such topics are of doubtful value to any community.

Mr. James Douglas, writing to the Star, calls Dr. Horton "a saint." The popular Nonconformist minister has one saintly quality: he cannot mind his own business.

Mr. Pett Ridge had a clever hit at the open-air evangelists who frequent the street corners with an harmonium and three lady friends. He parodies one of the orators: "I've broken nearly every one of the ten commandments over and over again. Sometimes I've done scarcely anything else. But, thank goodness, I've never failed, whatever was 'appening, to keep my religion."

To Correspondents.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

October 21, Manchester; October 28, London; November 4, Abertillery; November 18, Birmingham; November 25, Nuneaton.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—November 18, Manchester.

J. Roberts.—The Freethinker has been sent regularly, so that the non-arrival is not due to any fault at this end. We are glad to know that the men look for it with such eagerness. Always pleased to hear from you.

Mr. S. Pulman writes:—"I enclose £1, to be placed to the Freethinker Sustentation Fund. The ready response to your appeal is in itself a great tribute to the high order of your editorship and the excellency of the matter contributed by your staff. Fifty years ago I became a reader of the National Reformer, and have been a constant reader of the Freethinker since its birth, under the auspices of our late President and Editor, G. W. Foote. If I may dare an opinion here, permit me to say that the contents of the paper to-day is all that can be desired."

E. Starling.—The local Secretary is Mr. J. Bartram, 107 Morley Street, Heaton. He will be very pleased to put you in touch with Newcastle Freethinkers. We note your remark about the Y.M.C.A. huts. Without at all detracting from whatever help they have been to the men, it is quite obvious that the organization has utilized the War as a great advertising opportunity, and of many of their operations we know there is a story to be told very different from that which appears in the press.

A. J. Marriott.—We quite appreciate your concern for the preservation of British liberty, and agree that while we are fighting for it abroad, we stand no small danger of losing it at home. We have pointed this out several times, and also that our own particular "Prussians" are making use of the War to that end. For our own part, we object to slavery, whether the collar be placed round our neck by German or Briton.

W. Mendez.—We have not seen the book you name, but if you think it worth our reading, we should be pleased to see the work.

G. R.—Pleased to have your opinion that the Freethinker is one of the few "fair and intelligent papers on the market." We do try to be fair, and we hope we are intelligent. We already had a couple of paragraphs written on the subject, but the cutting will be useful in other directions.

C. Harpur.—Sorry that the length of your letter prevented publication. All we can say now is, that there is not the direct antithesis between believing and not believing that you seem to infer. If I do not believe that Smith stole a watch, it does not follow that I believe he did not steal it. It may mean that I have no belief on the subject. Belief must rest on some sort of evidence, and where there is no evidence there should be no belief. To take your own illustration. I may not believe that Bacon wrote Hamlet, but I may also be without the belief that he did not write it. I may be without any belief on the subject either way.

J. W. Gilliam (Capetown).—Used, as you will see. Very pleased to add your congratulations to the store. The good wishes of friends are always welcome.

Ignotus.—Thanks. Shall appear shortly.

E. A. McDonald.—Have passed on the cutting. Perhaps the secret of the vogue of such articles is the fact that there is an enormous mass of latent superstition among the people, and an appeal to this, in however indirect a manner, arouses interest. And that is all the ordinary newspaper appears to care about.

W. M.—An edition of Schopenhauer's chief work, The World as Will and Idea, is published in three vols., price 31s. 6d. There are several volumes of essays published by Swan Sonnenschein at about 2s. 6d. per vol., and a volume of selected essays in Bohn's Popular Library at 1s. We know nothing of the Society you name.

C. Budge.—As you say, it is a game of sheer humbug. But that gentleman knows the kind of intelligence to which he appeals. And the humbug gets more flagrant each week.

H. Carrwey (Partick).—Sorry we have not the figures by us, but should say that the Church of England Year Book would give you as much information as is available.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (Oct. 21) Mr. Cohen delivers two lectures—afternoon at 3, evening at 6.30—in the Co-operative Hall, Downing Street, Manchester. Those who wish to obtain tickets for the meetings beforehand may do so from the Secretary, Mr. H. Black, 446 Great Cheetham Street, E. Higher Broughton; Messrs. S. Pulman, 68 Tib Street; H. Mountain, 50 York Avenue; R. Owen, 368 Collyhurst Road; G. Brown, 22 Fairfield Road; F. F. Greenhall, 34 Goulden Street, Pendleton; and Mrs. Bayfield, 61 Claude Road, Chorlton. We hope that Manchester friends generally will do their best to see that the hall is well filled on both occasions. To meet the convenience of visitors from a distance, arrangements have been made to provide tea between the afternoon and evening meetings.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures to-day (October 21) in the Institute, Abertillery, both afternoon and evening. Mr. Lloyd is always sure of a warm welcome, and we hope to hear the "Standing Room Only" notice has had to be utilized.

Mr. H. Irving writes in reference to the recent discussion on Atheism and Agnosticism:—

> In his debate with the Rev. W. T. Lee, at Derby, G. W. Foote, with a fine scorn for lexicographers, explained the meaning of Atheism per se; and fully detailed what Atheists meant by it, using the arguments of Charles Bradlaugh as a representative Atheist. The only difference between Mr. J. Blair Williams and Charles Bradlaugh appears to lie in the notice they take of the Theist's conception of God. Mr. Williams, like the raven with its eternal "Nevermore," reiterates to every proposition of the Theist, "I don't know what you mean." Bradlaugh exhausted thought to combat every conception of the Inconceivable put before him. The Atheist is without God. The Agnostic has less than a fraction of God. Where is the difference?

Miss Vance informs us that a number of N.S.S. members have not yet habituated themselves to the new rule that all subscriptions to the Society become due in January. At any rate, some who should have remitted have not yet done so. We are asked, therefore, to give all members a reminder to this effect, and we gladly do so. And we expect and hope to hear that all overdue subscriptions have been received. If those who send increase their subscription, by way of a self-inflicted penance, everybody concerned will be delighted.

On Sunday last the South London Branch inaugurated its winter course of lectures with a successful "Social" in the Trade Union Hall, 30, Brixton Road, S.W. An excellent programme of instrumental and vocal music had been arranged by Mr. Holland, and was thoroughly enjoyed by an appreciative audience. The members are highly pleased with their new place of meeting, which is both "cosy" and conveniently situated—being close to the Oval Tube Station, and the L.C.C. tram centre, Kennington Gate. There is also available another hall in the basement which would afford safe shelter during an air-raid.

At the Executive Meeting on Thursday last permission was given for the formation of a Branch of the N.S.S. at Goldthorpe, near Rotherham. We wish the new Branch every success, and we are hoping to see many more such Branches established in the near future. It can be done, if only Freethinkers resolve it shall be done. During the past two years no application for help has been refused to any area where there was a prospect of doing Freethought work. But it is obvious that local Freethinkers must bestir themselves first.

We understand that Mr. Heinemann has acquired the copyright in Swinburne's works published and unpublished. It will be good news to Freethinking lovers of the poet to know that there are in preparation cheap pocket editions of "Poems and Ballads" (first and second series), "Songs before Sunrise," "Atalanta in Calydon," "Erectheus," and "Tristan of Lyonesse." We are sorry that Mr. Heinemann cannot give us any definite date of issue.

The following is interesting as a specimen of the other sort of warfare that is going on in the midst of the more material combat. It is the reply of a young man of eighteen in response to a letter from one of religious opinions:—

> Whether the War ends this year or not, the bare fact remains, and I hope the people will remember it, that the Church, supposed to be the greatest moral uplifting teacher in the world, has had nearly 2,000 years in which to teach the fact that wars can be averted and are useless, and has failed utterly and most awfully to do so: in fact, the clergy of the belligerents openly applaud and assist the ruthless slaughter of thousands of the children of God, as they smugly call them, from their secure pulpits. Do away with, if you will, this rotten system, and, I say with you, substitute sound moral and common-sense teaching culled from the greatest progressive thinkers and philosophers of the centuries, irrespective of their caste, colour, and religious thoughts, then, I believe, you will have a basis on which a grand democratic system of society can be built. The work of Jesus was, as you say, grand, but it stands out so distinctly simply because his was the first recorded of that type. Other men since his time have done as much, and more, for the welfare of humanity, even to laying down their lives in the cause they loved; but they have not been the victims of circumstances, prophecies, and such ancient superstitions as Jesus was in his time, consequently, their work has not been thrust forward so greatly. Set Jesus up as an example and a teacher, and set forth those of his teachings which would help to reconstruct society, if you like, but don't set him up as an impossible son of a impossible God, and you will get some good out of his work.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

I HAD intended this week fixing a very early date for the closing of this Fund, but refrain from doing so for several reasons. Last year it was complained that I closed the list too peremptorily, and so prevented many sending who would have liked to contribute.

There are always some who will not send until the last minute, although as I must soon name a closing date, I hope those who wish to subscribe will do so as early as possible. It will have been observed that the deficit on last year was very promptly cleared off, and a good step made towards meeting the weekly loss that must be regarded as inevitable during the continuance of the War. This, of course, makes the situation so much easier for me, and if the deficit is met in advance, it will do away with the necessity for borrowing the money, which I have had to do up to now.

Lastly, and this finally determined me to keep the Fund open for awhile longer, the outlook is none too cheerful. This month I have been compelled to arrange for a supply of paper at a still further advanced price, and, in addition to this, there is another increase coming in the wages of compositors. The men ask for an advance of six shillings per week, and the employers have offered three. The matter is still under discussion, and the advance will be something between these two amounts. In any case the advance is to date from the first of October.

The future, as will be seen, is very uncertain. I do not fear for the paper, readers may rest content on that head. I had thought of meeting these further increases by reducing the paper to twelve pages, but I have now decided to struggle along with the paper unchanged. But it is a struggle. The paper is still forging ahead in the matter of circulation—the increase is small each month, but it is steadily mounting. The disappointing thing is that every time one puts on a few extra shillings a week from sales, all of it, and often more, is swallowed up in increased cost of production. Still, it is promising for the time when conditions once more become normal.

But I am not in the least disheartened. I know I have the full support of Freethinker readers, and I have every confidence in our united ability to weather the storm. We must just keep smiling and keep fighting. Whatever sacrifice that fighting involves, we have the supreme satisfaction of knowing that it could not be made in the furtherance of a better cause.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Story of the Sugar Industry.

II.

THE once scorned sugar beet is an unassuming vegetable of northern lands. A near relative of the mangel-wurzel, a cattle-feeding root, the beet is an excellent pickle, and forms a decided addition to a salad. The plant's modest leaves absorb the rays of the sun; they serve to preserve the soil's moisture by hindering evaporation, while preparing the sugar, which is stored in the small bulging root, whose tapering rootlets are thrust into the earth in search of water and food. This seemingly insignificant plant, with a root weighing thirty-two ounces only, not merely furnishes man with half his sugar, but it supplies a larger percentage of the sweetening substance than is at present obtained from the opulent cane. Nevertheless, where soil and climate are favourable the sugar-yielding powers of the cane prove twice those of the beet per acre.

The most bountiful cane crops are grown where the plant is intensively cultivated. In the West Indies and other centres the crop is grown in one plantation for several years, but in Java and elsewhere it is cultivated as a rotation crop, and other plants occupy the soil in alternate seasons. While fifty years ago West Indian planters were elated when a couple of hogsheads (about one and a half tons) of muscovado sugar were yielded by an acre of land, to-day, in Java, the average return has risen to the gratifying total of over four tons per acre. Indeed, many Javan estates produce at least five tons an acre, an achievement which constitutes a splendid tribute to scientific agriculture.

Beet culture has been artificially stimulated by various States with serious consequences to the cane grower. The policy pursued by European Governments in developing the beet industry has been copied by the United States both with regard to the beet products of its own northern growers and those of the planters in the more tropical American possessions. As a result of this preferential treatment, the sugar industry has increased enormously in the Western Republic. Since the Brussels Convention of 1902, little sugar has entered the United States from Europe. But the internal resources of the States are sufficient to maintain a constant supply for American use. The total consumption of the States is about 3,000,000 tons, but its own sugar areas, with the assistance of Hawaii, Porto Rico, Cuba, and other American possessions, can easily furnish all the sugar needed. Cuba revels in the sunshine of Government preference, and that island's production of cane sugar has risen enormously in consequence. Cuban sugar is annually turned out to the tune of nearly 2,000,000 tons.

The coarse, unclean sugar, so long produced in Formosa for the Chinese stomach has been replaced since the Japanese occupation of the island by modern methods of manufacture. The Japanese first ascertained how the heaviest crops, both of beet and cane, were obtained. The native planters were then instructed in the art of successful cane cultivation. Various forms of waste were eliminated, suitable manures were introduced, and factories have been established for the purpose of supplying Japan with high grade sugar. Should this experiment succeed, and its prospects are good, it is probable that Japan will enter the world's markets as a sugar refining State to the detriment of Hong Kong refineries which have so long been predominant in the Chinese trade.

Even in Peru, a rainless land, some of the finest crops in the world have beea grown where the parched soil has been irrigated. And in the Sandwich Islands, in exceptional seasons, the yield of the cane has proved even more remunerative than the magnificent Javan crops. The flower of the cultivated cane so rarely sets its seed, that, until a few years ago, the plant was invariably propagated with cuttings. The wild varieties of the sugar cane, however, develop seed which is capable of reproduction. From plants produced from seed a selection has been made, and it is found that many of these are equal and sometimes superior to the cultivated kinds. There is, now, every prospect of a permanent improvement in the quality, yield, and disease-proof powers of the novel varieties called into existence by the magic voice of science. Now that the selective principle is at last being applied by planters, the cane is assured of a lengthy career as a sugar-producing crop.

In the Old World the evolution of the sugar beet has been in operation for more than a century. Magraff discovered sugar in the common beet in 1747, but its sugar content proved to be 2 to 4 per cent. only. Fifty years rolled away, when Archard, another German, succeeded in extracting this sugar from the root. In the early stages of the industry the beet was made to yield five or six per cent. of sugar, which has since increased to an average of 16 per cent. The year 1908 proved a record period, and the yield for the German Empire was about 17 per cent., while the Bohemian crop was even more generous. These remarkable results are almost entirely attributable to the scientific seedsman. Through a rigorous selection of the choicest seeds each season the nurseryman has obtained this invaluable advance.

Beet is a costly crop to the grower, and, unfortnnately, the seasons are frequently unfavourable to the plant's growth and maturity, and a dearth of beet usually means a serious shortage in the world's sugar supplies. There remains ample scope for a far larger acreage and productivity, both in cane and beet, if the requirements of the sugar consumers are to be permanently met. The yielding powers of the beet-raising countries vary considerably. While the German farmers raise between ten and fourteen tons of roots to the acre, the Austrian return is considerably below this, while Russia produces per acre some six or seven tons only.

The planters possess one important advantage over their beet producing rivals. Their crops are ripe at very various seasons of the year in the several cane regions of the tropical area. Cane sugar is, therefore, available for the refiner at different periods. In this respect it is quite unlike the beet product which is thrown on the market at a stated time. In one year two crops are grown in British Guiana, and these are gathered in May and October. The sugar season commences in January in the West Indies, save in Cuba, where it begins in December, while the Argentine is active in June. Java's crops are ready in May, Australia's sugar is ripe in June, and August is the harvesting time in Mauritius and Natal.

In primitive countries antiquated methods are still employed in extracting the juice of the sugar from the cane. But in the leading sugar fabricating centres modern machinery has followed in the wake of intensive husbandry. Half the juice was at one time left in the canes when the stems were simply crushed by rude rollers worked by human or animal labour. In Barbadoes windmills are still engaged in sugar manufacture. But this prosperous island is admirably adapted to the use of wind power which forms a fairly constant and, certainly cheap substitute for the steam utilized elsewhere. In districts where sugar is elaborated on a very large scale, the three roller mill propelled by steam power soon became the order of the day. About 60 per cent. of the juice was thus extracted, but further improvement became a great desideratum when the beet industry threatened the cane. The apparatus now in use is described as > a combination of three of these roller-mills set tandem fashion, with carriers to convey the crushed cane from the first to the second, and from the second to the third. It might be imagined that when the crushed cane, called megass—or, in French, bagasse—issues from the third mill it has lost all its juice. Unfortunately, this is not so, and therefore other expedients have been adopted to still further reduce the quantity of sugar left in the megass. The rollers in the second and third mill are placed closer together in order more completely to squeeze the now attenuated strips of crushed cane. These mills are also driven at a slightly slower speed. But.....it was found that the first of the two crushings in the front mill did not do much more than break the outside rind of the cane, and that a larger quantity of cane could be worked with the same power if the cane could be cut or torn up to a certain extent before entering the first rollers.—(Martineau, Sugar, pp. 27, 28, 1910).

Cane cutters and other contrivances were therefore adopted, and more sugar was extracted. But further economy became necessary, and more efficient methods were devised. Still, even now there remains considerable scope for further improvement.

As previously stated, the delicate sugar cane must be promptly harvested when ripe, and its subsequent treatment admits of no delay. The hardy beetroot, on the contrary, does not readily lose its sugar-yielding powers, and may be delivered at the sugar factory in prime condition weeks after it is removed from the soil. When completely cleaned, with its rootlets cut away and its leaves shorn off, the root is ready for the refiner's hand. Formerly the beets were pulped in a machine, and the juice driven out of the pulp by hydraulic pressure. This wasteful process was at one time considered the acme of perfection. But some doubted, and Robert, an Austrian refiner, introduced a new system of beet juice extraction, known as the diffusion method. Robert's reform was so revolutionary that within ten years his process was everywhere in use throughout Austria and Germany. Both from the scientific and industrial standpoint, the diffusion principle has proved so extremely important that a brief description of its applications will be appreciated by the thoughtful as attractive and informative alike.

Some New Swinburne Poems.

I was once afflicted with a freethinking friend who successfully disguised a distaste, I may almost say a contempt, for English poetry under a yeasty enthusiasm for Swinburne. I must confess to have been taken in by his rampant eulogies until one day he began to anoint with unctuous adulation the head of another freethinking poet—or shall I say poetess?—who is known to the illiterate on both sides of the Atlantic as the "divine Ella," and as Mrs. Wheeler Wilcox to those who have the misfortune not to be numbered among her admirers. But that is neither here nor there. What I want to suggest, without, I trust, giving needless offence to any serious and well-meaning person, is that an admiration for Swinburne unqualified by reservations unmistakably points to a want of critical balance. I yield to no one in my appreciation of the poet's superb lyrical gift, his passionate hatred of tyranny and hypocrisy, and, on the technical side of the art, his discovery of new and wonderful verse-rhythms; but I do not agree with some of my friends who seem to think that his most flamboyant anti-clerical and anti-theistic diatribes are his principal claim to remembrance. These attacks are, no doubt, sincere enough, and in some moods one enjoys their violence; but however stimulating they may be at first reading, one is wearied in the end by these screaming and unintermittent imprecations. Those of us who know the whole of his work have, however, the satisfaction of being certain that his splenetic attacks on priestcraft are but an insignificant part, insignificant alike in quantity and quality, and that his best poetry draws upon the more permanent and more human emotions.

A book of new poems by Swinburne, although they may not add anything to his reputation, is an event of some importance, especially for those of us who are old enough to remember the thrill of anticipatory delight with which we opened the pages of Tristan of Lyonesse. The volume now before us (Posthumous Poems. Heinemann; 6s. net) is edited by Mr. Edmund Gosse and Mr. T. J. Wise. With one exception, noted below, it is made up of poems which Swinburne wrote between 1887 and 1907, and left unprinted for some reason or other. The manuscripts were sold to Mr. Wise by Watts-Dunton, whose interest in his friend's work, Mr. Gosse uncharitably avers, had become entirely a financial one. But when a man has been a sort of male nurse to an irritable and ailing poet for twenty years, he has probably had enough of him and his work for all time, and it is hardly to be wondered at if his interest be partly, or even wholly, financial. There was no shrewder critic of modern verse than Watts-Dunton, and no one knew better than he did the weak places in his friend's poetical armour. However that may be, Mr. Gosse has given us a number of poems for the first time, or comparatively for the first time, because some of them I have seen in the British Museum in privately printed copies. The place of honour is given to eleven Border Ballads in imitation of the old songs before they had suffered from restoration at the hands of Bishop Percy, and others who were irritated by the rough versification and crude romantic passion. Swinburne had in him an element of barbaric violence that made him a ready sympathiser with the quarrelsome and amorous spirit of his ancestral raiders of cattle and maids. In confirmation of this sympathy with primitive modes of feeling, Mr. Gosse tells us that when William Morris was printing some of the old ballads at the Kelmscott Press, he was not well enough to continue to work. On looking round for a likely man to take his place as editor, Swinburne's name was mentioned. "Oh, no!" said Morris, "that would never do. He would be writing-in verses that none of us would be able to tell from the original stuff." There is a little exaggeration here. Swinburne was not less a decorative artist than Rossetti and Morris. His imitations, although interesting to us and valuable to him as exercises in narrative verse, in which his strength did not naturally lie, have by no means the simplicity and directness of the best of the traditional ballads. His gravest defect is that he did not know when he had said enough. The pathos is too often wrapped up in the cotton-wool of verbiage. The inspiration is literary instead of being natural. A comparison with "Clerk Saunders," or the fine Scots ballad "Tam-lane," would bring out clearly the difference. But, after all, Swinburne's poems are imitations, and, in spite of Morris' judgment, would deceive no one sufficiently practised in the two forms of poetry.

Swinburne's undergraduate verse is represented by "The Death of Sir John Franklin" and an "Ode to Mazzini." The first of these is supposed by Mr. Gosse to have been sent in for the Newdigate for 1858. This date is disputed by competent authorities, who assign the poem to 1860. The subject set for 1858 was "The Discovery of the North-West Passage"; but this, it will be noted, was not the theme of Swinburne's poem, which is written, by the way, not in heroic couplets, as required by the Prize-rules, but with an elaborate scheme of rhymes. The punctuation, if Mr. Gosse represents the manuscript correctly, is bad enough to damn the verses even with the least academic of examiners. However that may be, and in spite of its inflation and wordiness, the poem has some moving passages, and a long, rhythmic swing that indicated the direction in which our greatest master of metre achieved success. He pictures the brave companions of the great Arctic explorer winter-bound among the ice lying gigantic to either hand, remembering how in England the "warm land were starred with gracious flowers in the green front of spring," and recalling with moving pathos:—

> Slight words they used to say, slight work to do
> When every day was more than many springs,
> And the strong April moved at heart, and made
> Sweet mock at fortune and the seat of kings .....
> And now they know not if such things be done,
> Nor how the old ways and old places fare,
> Nor whether there be change in the glad sun,
> Defect and loss in all the fragrant air.
> New feet are in the waymarks of their feet,
> The bitter savour of remembered sweet
> No doubt did touch their lips in some sharp guise,
> No doubt the pain of thought and fever-heat
> Put passion in the patience of their eyes.

The tribute to Mazzini is a long, pseudo-Pindaric ode, inchoate, rhetorical, and violent, with not even one of those felicitous passages which come as a surprise to us in Cowley's experiments with the much-abused form. The subject affords free play to the poet's genius for vigorous imprecation. He curses with hearty emphasis all the things he holds most vile—the tyranny and stupidity of kings, the trustless lips and bloody hand of Austria, the guile of Rome and her minions, prepared to sell Italy as Judas sold his Master. The ode was written when Swinburne was twenty, and if it be not poetry, it is at least resounding rhetoric.

As a contrast to these more serious exercises in the poet's art, Mr. Gosse prints an amusing parody of

Digitized by Google

Tennyson's "Despair." Swinburne calls his poem "Disgust: a Dramatic Monologue." A note prefixed to the verses tells us that "a woman and her husband having been converted from Freethought to Calvinism, and being utterly miserable in consequence, resolve to end themselves by poison. The man dies, but the woman is rescued by application of the stomach-pump." The wife speaks:—

You would like to know, if I please, how it was that our troubles began?
You see, we were brought up Agnostics, I and my poor old man.
And we got some idea of selection and evolution, you know—
Professor Huxley's doing—where does he expect to go!

Well, then came trouble on trouble on trouble, I may say, a peck—
And his cousin was wanted one day on the charge of forging a cheque—
And his puppy died of the mange—my parrot choked on its perch.
This was the consequence, was it, of not going weekly to church?

The manifold disasters which, if we are to believe M. Paul Bourget, ever dog the steps of those who forsake the Gospel for a more rational creed, turn the head of the unfortunate husband, and he sends to the chemist for two packets of strychnine.

Nay—but first we thought it was rational—only fair—
To give both parties a hearing—and went to the meeting-house there,
At the curve of the street that runs from the Stag to the old Blue Lion,
"Little Zion" they call it—a deal more "little" than "Zion."

And the preacher preached from the text, "Come out of her."
Hadn't we come?
And we thought of the shepherd in Pickwick—and fancied a flavour of rum
Balmily borne on the wind of his words—and my man said, "Well,
Let's get out of this, my dear—for his text has a brimstone smell."

So we went, O God, out of the chapel—and gazed, ah God, at the sea.
And I said nothing to him. And he said nothing to me.

This is a much better parody than any one of those printed under the title of Heptalogia: Specimens of Seven Poets, but it is a long way from perfection. Swinburne had too strongly marked an individuality to shine as a parodist, for whose art is needed much mental adaptability. He could not have written anything to equal Mr. J. C. Squire's "Merciful Widow."

The shorter poems include tributes to Shelley, Landor, Leconte de Lisle, and Karl Blind, some stupid abuse of Parnell, a few pleasant lyrical efforts, and a version of the Dies Irae. One of the poems, "To a Leeds Poet," is included by mistake, as the two stanzas are a part of a set of verses to the memory of J. W. Inchbold that appeared in the third series of Poems and Ballads (Collected Works, vol. iii., p. 252).

Interim Conference.

At the last Annual Conference a resolution was passed approving the holding of an Interim Conference for the purpose of discussing such matters as do not affect the constitution of the Society. War conditions prevent this Conference being held in any other place than London, and also limits the choice of halls. The Executive has, however, secured the use of Chandos Hall for Sunday, October 28, and two meetings will be held on that date. The afternoon meeting will commence at 2.30, and will be for Members of the N. S. S. and Branch Delegates only. The order of business will be (a) the discussion of such special resolutions as have been sent to the Executive; and (b) a general discussion of the position of the N. S. S. in relation to social, ethical, and political questions. The evening meeting, commencing at 6.30, will be open to the public. The proceedings will take the form of a general discussion on "The Present Position of Freethought." The Churches are all busy discussing their future as affected by the War, and it is well that Freethinkers should also be getting ready for the strenuous times before them. The discussion is to be a general one, and by that is meant that it will not be confined to set platform speeches. The President of the N. S. S. will take the chair at both gatherings.

Chapman Cohen, President, N. S. S.

The Fugitive.

It had been a field day—each Freethinker will recall many of his own experience; great moments, red letter days, purple passages in his life. We had gone—the little leaven of idealists in our litte north-western town—to hear a famous miners' leader, a man of the people, above all, a man of trusted renown, combining in his person those three great qualities so rarely found in one man—courage, honesty, and intelligence; and which presuppose the minor virtues—tact, sagacity, judgment, eloquence, etc. He sounded the sanest human and the wisest political note on the War. At least, the large audience thought so, and cheered and cheered and cheered. "Honours" were nothing to him. He could meet kings, dukes, diplomatists, ministers, face to face, as man to man—provided, he said, always provided, I have "my own people" behind me. One of us, at the close, stepped on the platform and shook hands with the speaker, assured him there was one other promising movement on foot, and handed him a copy of the Freethinker. This War, said the speaker, patting the title with his hand, this War has gone a long way to kill the old faith. We all came home jubilant and hopeful. Such is the magic of the human voice and the common aspiration.

One of us that night talked with a friend till very late on certain superficial aspects of sociology, with only occasional revelations of the deeps and the fundamentals. Small talk is very boring just after being enthused by the significant things. I, for it was the writer, escaped at last into the quiet of my own home, and found within those walls what the hunted hare in its form may find—the great peace of the wilderness—the sheltering rushes swaying in the wind, sighing overhead—divinest lullaby! The fugitive was free, and at ease for an hour; what blessed ease, what rich reflection; this is the reward of the battle of life. I turned out the lights. In the dim glow of the fire the solid chairs were fantastic, shadowy things. Shadows were all around, and seemed to descend like slumber on the soul. Within that flickering firelight and those quiet, dim, answering walls was peace, perfect peace, and home sweet home with its household gods, familiar things, and nearest, dearest loves, and the soft yet strident, far yet near, menacing yet soothing monotone of the "homeless sea" kept sounding evermore!

And the War, as I sat there, in that precious fugitive hour seemed far away, impossible, grotesque, absurd. Surely the soul of man is fugitive from such slaughter; surely the trend is toward a better world. If not, then you and I and all of us are fugitive indeed.

SOCIALISM AND FREETHOUGHT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—A correspondent said in a recent issue that if we had Socialism we should all be sure of food. Yes, if the birth-rate were sufficiently restricted. For example, it is inconceivable that in a country with a birth-rate of 44 per thousand per annum, like Russia, the food supply could be increased rapidly enough to provide an adequate allowance for all. With food enough for all, Russia's death-rate would be less than 10 per thousand; so the survival-rate would be over 34 per thousand. Yet the highest steady survival-rate in the world is only 17 per thousand; and this occurs in New Zealand which, being a new and rich country, is exceptionally favourable for rapid increase of population. Surely, therefore, no country could, under any social system, maintain a survival-rate of twice 17. Russia is bound to have terrible poverty and trouble until her birth-rate is greatly reduced.

Freethinkers, whether Socialists or Individualists, should all be Malthusians (indeed, what are evolutionists but Malthusians?), and should realize that every fall of the birth-rate is a nail in the coffin of religion, poverty, and war. I entreat them to realize that there could be no poverty and war if wage-earners ceased to have more than two children per family.

"GOD AND THE WAR."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—I enjoyed reading last week's Freethinker. Among other things, I was interested in Mr. Lloyd's article on "God and the War." There is, however, a point on which I would like to ask him a question or two. He says in one place:—

> War is only a phase of the natural struggle for existence..... at the root of it are ambition, jealousy, greed, lust of power, all quite human qualities.....We are often told that the present War is to end war for all time, but there is absolutely nothing to suggest that so happy a result is the least likely to be realized.

Then, at the end of the article, he says:—

> It is our firm conviction that, had Buddhism won Europe instead of Christianity, war would have ceased long ago, and the essential brotherhood of the race would have been established on a rational and permanent foundation.

The two statements appear to be rather contradictory, and I would like Mr. Lloyd to explain:—

(1) Does he think that any religion—Buddhism, Christianity, or other—will ever abolish the natural struggle for existence, of which he admits war is a phase?

(2) Does he mean that, while Buddhism is pacific in its teaching, Christianity encourages militarism?

(3) If so, will he kindly point out where, in his teaching, the Founder of Christianity countenances or sanctions international war?

National Secular Society.

Report of Monthly Executive Meeting Postponed from September 27 on Account of Air-Raids.

President: C. Cohen in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Braddock, Brandes, Eagar, Lazarnick, Leat, Neary, Palmer, Samuels, Spence, Thurlow, Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, and the Secretary.

A large number of new members were received for Battersea, Birmingham, Goldthorpe, Manchester, Newcastle, North London, South London, Sheffield, and Swansea.

Permission was also given for the formation of a new Branch at Goldthorpe, near Rotherham.

The report of the Joint Committee of Protest was received, from which it was gathered that the hearing of the Mandamus calling upon the Council to show cause for their action in prohibiting sales of literature in the Parks, would be before the High Court in a few days. As this action would incur heavy legal expenses, Mr. Cohen promised his assistance, if necessary, as Editor of the Freethinker, in making the Committee's appeal for funds widely known.

The death of Mr. Samuel Morley Peacock, a highly esteemed Vice-President of the National Secular Society, was reported, and the Secretary was instructed to send a message of sympathy to his widow.

Arrangements for the Interim Conference were discussed. It was reported that the greatest difficulty had been experienced in obtaining halls, and it was arranged to hold it at Chandos Hall on October 28, commencing at 2.30.

Notices of motion from Branches for the Agenda were considered and accepted, and it was resolved that at the conclusion of the formal business of the Conference a discussion be opened on the relation of Freethought to general subjects now and after the War.

Various items of official business were transacted, and the calling of the next meeting was left to the President and Secretary.

E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

Views and Opinions.

Conservatism and Progress.

Quite naturally and inevitably man is a conservative animal. Walter Bagehot pictured a time when the great task was to break man to the social yoke, and he conceived religion as playing this useful part in primitive life. But this is purely speculative, and is open to serious question. The first glimpse we get of man is as a member of a group, and the laws and customs of group life hold him firmly in their grip. In innumerable directions, and in a manner unbearable to the modern mind, the life of each is regulated by that of all. The tendency to rebel comes later, and slowly. Inclination also lends its aid to custom. It is easier to follow the old ruts than to seek new paths; the courage that inspires the pioneer is always the property of the few. And there is the underlying truth that while progress is due to the rebellious attitude of the few, the stability of society is ensured by the conservatism of the mass. They represent the centrifugal and centripetal forces of social life. The reformer easily recognizes the place of the conservative in social evolution. If others recognized with equal readiness the function of the rebel, progress would be a much more uniform thing in human history than it is.

Physical versus Mental Force.

While disagreeing with Bagehot's proposition that the need of early man was to be broken in, we quite endorse his statement that being broken in, the great thing was to get man to break out, and that chief amongst the perpetuating forces of an unreasoning conservatism is religion. Physical force plays a much smaller part in human evolution than is usually conceived. People are misled by seeing physical force everywhere applied, without recognizing that it is really an instrument at the service of a much more insistent and more pervasive power. Even in the present world-upheaval, where physical force is being applied on a quite unprecedented scale, it is really the instrument of other and greater forces. The social sense of a community of interest, the ideals of devotion to duty, to the interests of civilization, of patriotism, etc., are the real forces that have brought the world to arms. It is idle to talk of the rule of physical force when millions fly to arms at the bidding of a few. Force, in such cases, is the instrument of mind. In ultimate analysis the true social forces are constituted by the psychic life of man as represented by his ideas, his ideals, his customs, and institutions. And any modification of the social structure must, of necessity, be by way of an attack upon dominant ideals and beliefs.

The Great Obstruction.

This is why we agree with the latter generalization of Bagehot while disagreeing with his primary one. There is need to teach men to break out, and it is true that the greatest of all conservative forces is religion. In primitive life religion is the seed-plot of all that makes man a slave to stupid and brutal customs. Down to the smallest details the life of early man is dominated by religious fears. He dare not move from the customary path for fear of offending the gods. And behind this all-enslaving fear are entrenched those sinister interests that threaten the development of social life. Generation after generation passes; the form of both the attack and the defence varies, but the issue remains ever the same. To-day, man no longer moves—in civilized societies, at least—in direct fear of the gods, but the fear of religion is still active, and if it is not always expressed in a clinging to orthodox forms, it is manifested with disquieting frequency in the shape of a clinging to old formulæ and phrases that rob the rebel of much of his effectiveness, and so play into the hands of the common enemy.

That "Blessed" Word.

Consider the curious clinging of so many people to the word "religion." When it is not grotesque, it is pathetic. Now, "religion" is a word that has a very definite meaning in common usage, and that meaning cannot be altered by a more or less fanciful derivation of the word. Religion has always had to do with the supernatural—with the belief in God, or gods, and a future life. And if a man believes in the supernatural, he has every title to the word. But what legitimate use can anyone have for the word who has no belief in the supernatural? It is all very well for such a person to offer his own definition of the word, and to say, "I mean by it devotion to art or morality or duty." There seems no earthly reason, on these lines, why he should not also include a fondness for plum-pudding or Government beer. The fact remains that others will not understand it as he defines it. All custom, all usage, is against it. And the significance of a word is fixed by usage, not by a dictionary. What the religious man understands by people using the word is an act of homage to his own position, and we venture to say that he is in the right in so taking it. It is a grain of incense burned by the rebel in honour of conservatism. These people have lost the substance of religion, but they keep to the name. And the real religionist is justified in assuming that if the name itself is valuable, the thing itself must be still more precious.

Playing with "God."

With another class—substantially unbelievers—the word "God" plays a similar part. That, too, has a fairly definable meaning in common use. Substantially, the followers of religion mean by "God" one who, as Mr. Balfour says, loves and hates, can take sides, listen to our complaints, and heed our wants. Such a God may be—in fact is—quite absurd to a modern mind, but it is so far intelligible. But to take some sort of an ethical abstraction, as with Mr. Wells, or a hypothetical life-force, as with Bernard Shaw, or an unknown something behind phenomena, and call that God, is neither intelligible nor useful—or, at least, it is intelligible only as a dislike to being without something which the world declares needful and useful as a subterfuge. If one believes Nature is all, and natural law universal, there is no room for God, and no use for God. Again, we are flattering the religionist by retaining the name. We, too, say they, believe in God. True, it is not your God; we do not know what our God does; in fact, we do not believe he does anything at all; but still we believe in something we call God. "We cannot admit ourselves to be so stupid as those who believe in a real God. But we beg you to observe that we are not so wicked as those who dispense with God altogether."

The Function of the Reformer.

There are numberless other examples that one might cite to the same end. They all illustrate, more or less clearly, the tremendous power of conservatism in human affairs. This conservative element is not in itself bad; on the contrary, it has its good side. A universal readiness to depart from accepted customs and standards would mean disruption, not progress, and natural selection has seen to it that this danger shall be only speculative and remote. The mass will always remain relatively conservative, attached to what is usual, governed by what is traditional, and looking with suspicion upon all that is new and unusual. The more reason that reformers in general and Freethinkers in particular should set a good and strong example. Let us cease paltering with religious ways and religious phrases. When we say that the world can do well without orthodox religion, let us prove that we mean what we say by going without it. We do not believe that anything good really comes from religion, although we admit that much that is good has been associated with religion. Our task should be to find words that should express this view. It is neither honest nor ultimately useful to go on using words that are meaningless to Freethinkers and misleading to religionists, and which play their part in confirming the very errors we profess an anxiety to remove. There is not an idea, an ideal, or an aspiration that cannot be expressed without recourse to religious phraseology. Why, then, keep a name when we have discarded the thing for which it stands? The true majesty of man must always be degraded by the livery of the gods.

"God and the War."

Mr. A. Russell does me the honour of raising a few points of criticism in connection with my recent article under the above title. In his letter, which appeared in this journal for October 21, he calls attention to my statement that "war is only a phase of the natural struggle for existence," and asks how it can be reconciled with the later intimation that "had Buddhism won Europe instead of Christianity war would have ceased long ago." As every student of evolution is aware the natural struggle for existence has undergone many changes, a fact which justifies the inference that war is by no means the final phase of it. It is true that General Friedrich von Bernhardi teaches, in his famous book, Germany and the Next War, that the "desire for peace has rendered most civilized nations anæmic, and marks a decay of spirit and political courage," and that, therefore, only "the weary, spiritless, and exhausted ages have played with the dream of perpetual peace." He quotes with approval Schiller's martial lines:—

> Man is stunted by peaceful days,
> In idle repose his courage decays.
> Law is the weakling's game,
> Law makes the world the same.
> But in war man's strength is seen,
> War ennobles all that is mean;
> Even the coward belies his name.

Consequently, we are not surprised to find that Bernhardi believes, not only in the right, but also in the duty, to make war. When Germany covets certain territories, she regards war as a legitimate method of securing them. In Great Britain and America, however, there has been a rapidly growing sentiment which looks upon war with unspeakable horror, and condemns it as an evil in itself. I need not say that I heartily share that sentiment, and loathe the very idea of an appeal to physical force. In saying that war is a phase of the natural struggle for existence, all I intended to convey was that a Supreme Being had absolutely nothing to do with it either as punishment or as discipline. It is a phase we ought to have outgrown long ago.

I now come to Mr. Russell's questions, the first of which is: "Does he think that any religion—Buddhism, Christianity, or other—will ever abolish the natural struggle for existence?" I hasten to declare that, in my opinion, the struggle for existence will never be abolished. Struggle is, indeed, a potent tonic of which we all stand in never-ceasing need; but I am equally certain that of this perpetual struggle war is only a phase, destined to be superseded. Under Humanism, as interpreted in modern sociology, it would be an entirely friendly and mutually helpful struggle. Now, between Christianity and early Buddhism there is practically nothing in common. As everyone fairly familiar with its teaching and history is aware, Buddhism is not a supernatural religion at all. It is rather a philosophy of life, a system of ethics, and it would be an accurate definition of it to call it Secularism, or Humanism. The supreme emphasis of the Buddha was upon self-reliance, and he hated war with perfect hatred. King Osoka's Edict, No. xiv., is as follows:—

> Piyadasi, the friend of the Devas, values alone the harvest of the next world. For this alone has this inscription been chiselled, that our sons and our grandsons should make no new conquests. Let them not think that conquests by the sword merit the name of conquests. Let them see their ruin, confusion, and violence. True conquests alone are the conquests of Dharma (Law).

Christianity, on the contrary, has never prohibited war, but has been directly responsible for an enormous amount of bloodshed. We are assured, however, that although Christianity has not put an end to war, it has introduced humaner methods of conducting war. This was the contention of Christian leaders, like Sir Robertson Nicoll, four and five years ago; but the present War has taken the ground completely from under their feet, for there never was a war more callously brutal and barbarous. As a matter of fact, what is now being so violently denounced as Prussian militarism is justified by Bernhardi on the ground that it is not at all out of harmony with Christian teaching. It is, indeed, claimed that the teaching of Christ "can never be adduced as an argument against the universal law of struggle, because "there never was a religion which was more combative than Christianity."

Let it be emphasized, then, that in practice Christianity has always encouraged militarism. While Origen was bound to maintain, in his controversy with Celsus, that Christianity was incompatible with military service in a Pagan State, he affirmed that "the prayers of the Christians were more efficacious than the swords of the legions." As Lecky puts it, "a great battle, on the issue of which the fortunes of a people or of a monarch depended, was supposed to be the special occasion of Providential interposition, and the hope of obtaining military success became one of the most frequent motives of conversion" (History of European Morals, vol. ii., p. 250). It is well known that Pope after Pope zealously advocated war, the Crusades, in particular, with all their unspeakable horrors, being directly due to their influence.

I am asked, if Christianity encourages militarism, "to point out where, in his teaching, the Founder of Christianity countenances or sanctions international war." Mr. Russell cannot be ignorant of the fact that Christianity encourages and has been responsible for many things which are neither directly nor indirectly sanctioned in the teaching of the Gospel Jesus. A short time prior to his secession to the Anglican Church, the Rev. R. J. Campbell read a paper on Christianity and the War before the Congregational Union, in which he argued that inasmuch as the Church has both permitted and caused numerous wars, we must conclude that in so doing she did not wholly misrepresent her Divine Head; or, in other words, that the Holy Spirit must have so guided her that she did but carry out the will of her Lord on the subject. That was an ingenious subterfuge not at all creditable to a man of God. The truth is that in the Four Gospels there is no expression of opinion on the subject of war. Though Jesus mentions the topic more than once, he utters not one word either for or against it. He declares that his supreme legacy to his disciples is peace, but the peace he promises to give them is not of a social or a political nature, but the peace which he enjoyed himself while at war with the beliefs and practices of his contemporaries. There are among us to-day many conscientious objectors to the War, who decline to enter upon military service on the ground that it would be an act of disloyalty to Christ; but neither in the Gospels nor the Epistles is war, as such, condemned. In Luke xxii. 37, 38, these strange words occur:—

> For I say unto you, that this which is written must be fulfilled in me, And he was reckoned with transgressors: for that which concerneth me hath fulfilment. And they said, Lord, behold here are two swords. And he said unto them, It is enough.

Equally significant is the following passage:—

> Think not that I came to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword (Matt. x. 34).

On another occasion (Luke xxii. 36), Jesus advised the disciple, who had neither purse nor wallet, to sell his cloke and buy a sword.

The conclusion to which I am inevitably brought is, first, that Christianity as a peace-making religion has been a tragic failure, and, secondly, that even in the New Testament war is simply taken for granted and used as an illustration, while in the Sacred Writings of Buddhism war is represented as an evil to be crushed out of existence. Our only hope for the future peace of the world lies in the upward evolution of mankind, which has been so seriously retarded hitherto by the prevalence of superstition. We are looking forward to the reorganization of society on the basis of security, equality, brotherhood, and universal goodwill, when we shall be able to clasp one another's hands and look into one another's eyes as members of a happy family, animated and governed by the royal law of love.

J. T. Lloyd.

The Tyranny of Theology.

> 'Tis life, whereof our nerves are scant,
> Oh life, not death, for which we pant,
> More life, and fuller, than we want.—Tennyson.

Christians are justified in making the most of their men and women of genius, and Freethinkers do not quarrel with them on that account. For this reason we welcome the publication of a single volume edition of the works of Christina Rossetti, which sets the final seal of honour on a deserved reputation. That such fame will lessen there is not much reason to anticipate, for it has been founded on the slowly formed but sure appreciation of all good critics and lovers of real literature. It is, indeed, noteworthy that one family should have produced two such eminent poets as Christina and Dante Gabriel Rossetti. Christina shared with her brother the delight in mediæval colouring and theme, and in the sensuous appeal of verse; but, unlike Dante Gabriel, she had a strong strain of superstition in her character, and she soon lost her vision of a brightly hued and romantic world, and turned her tired eyes to the contemplation of purely religious subjects.

At the first Christina Rossetti's verse exhibited a definite personality. It is, perhaps, her sex which renders her lyrics more bird-like than her brother's verses. It can be nothing but her constant experience of ill-health which made her dwell constantly on the morbid side of religion.

Death, which to Shelley and Swinburne and the Freethought poets seemed own brother to sleep, was to her a more horrific shape, and was a perennial subject for her verse. The constant burden of her muse was the mutability of human affairs. And when to physical ailments were added love disappointments, entirely caused by religious bigotry, there is small difficulty in understanding how Christina Rossetti became a devotional poet; and one of such distinction that only Crashaw, Donne, Vaughan, and Francis Thompson can be held her compeers. And Dr. Donne, be it remembered, mitigated his raptures concerning the Saviour by writing poems on such less sacred and more welcome subjects, as seeing his mistress getting into bed.

Many of Christina Rossetti's poems are very short, and are concerned with trite theological themes. In nothing is her undoubted power so much shown as in the fact that so few are commonplace. Had she not had genius, they might have sunk to the dead level of pious verse, orthodox in purpose, and contemptible in execution. The only trait she has in common with the ordinary hymn-writers is a certain morbidity in dwelling on the idea of immortality and the pathological side of religion.

Digitized by Google

She disembowelled the Scriptures, and her brother, W. M. Rossetti, said, with justice, that if "all those passages which were directly or indirectly dependent upon what can be found in the Bible" had been taken out of Christina's verse, it "would have been reduced to something approaching a vacuum."

Starting her poetical career as the one woman member of the Pre-Raphaelite enthusiasts, she, naturally, showed the effect of that romantic spirit in her first mature poem, "Goblin Market," and in the less extravagant "Prince's Progress," both of which have all the glow and rich tints of Dante Rossetti's and William Morris's early works. The meditative and introspective sonnets of even her later years have something in common with this early artistic impulse. But what a change was there! It is impossible not to deplore the narrowing down and petrifying of Christina Rossetti's poetic interest. Here was a woman of warm blood and a passionate sense of beauty, who, with better health and satisfied affections, might have interpreted the joy of life. Instead, she turned with morbid pleasure to the contemplation of the sickly delights of a barren religiosity. She was a paradox, an anamoly; a Puritan among Anglo-Catholics; a nun outside the walls of the great lying Church. Necessarily preoccupied, as she was, with attenuated religious emotions, her melodies with difficulty escape monotony. And yet, again and again, Nature will out, and the old, half-forgotten romantic instinct asserts itself. The truth is, she was not a sacred, but a secular poet. Her religious bias forced her sympathies into wrong channels. To the real world she became indifferent. With actual life, its questionings, its humours, its perplexities, its despairs, its hopes, its loves, there is no sympathy in her poetry. Beyond the walls of her residence her tired eyes saw but a mad world rushing to perdition. Her idea of wisdom is to withdraw from the tumult into an inner shrine of pious meditation, disturbed only by feminine anxiety for the fate of the Christian Church.

Her piety was essentially of the womanly, prayerful, submissive kind, so attractive to priests of all ages and all countries. It asks no questions, it is posed by no problems. It only kneels in adoring awe, and gives money and service freely.

Naturally, her picture of "the world" is grim and forbidding:—

> Loathsome and foul with hideous leprosy,
> And subtle serpents gliding in her hair.

And she fears lest her feet "cloven too, take hold on hell." This view of life blinds her eyes. When she notices the beauties of Nature, it is always through a religious haze. She could not rise to the art of Coleridge's—

> Hidden brook,
> In the leafy month of June,
> That to the sleeping woods all night
> Singeth a quiet tune.

Or to the magic of Meredith's—

> Hear the heart of wildness beat
> Like a centaur's hoof on sward.

Nor could she utter the brave defiance of Emily Bronte:—

> No coward soul is mine.

But she has a haunting music all her own:—

> When I am dead, my dearest,
> Sing no sad songs for me,
> Plant thou no roses at my head,
> Nor shady cypress tree;
> Be the grass green above me,
> With showers and dewdrops wet;
> And, if thou wilt, remember,
> And, if thou wilt, forget.

This, however, is an exception. Usually, her emotions were regulated and refined by ascetic priestly traditions, and this places her at a great disadvantage among singers of free utterance. At the worst, she is never crude, extravagant, or commonplace. She challenges comparison with the greatest of her sex. Mrs. Browning is the inevitable foil of Christina Rossetti, and the two suggest each other by the mere force of contrast. The author of Sonnets from the Portuguese, Casa Guidi Windows, and The Cry of the Children is the very antipodes of the woman who gave us the shy, devotional New Poems. There is none, of course, of Mrs. Browning's fluency in Miss Rossetti's work, but the sister-poet lacks the splendid humanity of the other. Christina Rossetti, despite her lyric gifts, hardly stands the comparison. How should she? A delicate spinster, she held the Christian superstition in the most absolute and most literal manner. Shadow, not light, was her nourishment, and her music was a delicate undertone. We long for something individual. Like the dying farm labourer, we like something concrete. His friends tried to solace him with the golden joys of heaven. He raised himself for a last word, "'Tis all very well for thee; but give I the "Pig and Whistle." His mortality, like that of most of us, was unequal to raptures "too severe." Christina Rossetti's life-work is, in its way, an impeachment of orthodoxy. In spite of its beautiful language, it explains nothing, and adds nothing to human knowledge, but leaves the world in the meshes of devilry, darkness, and despair.

The Story of the Sugar Industry.

III.

The modern discovery that two liquids of different densities when separated by a membrane, undergo the process of diffusion has had important bearings on the development of the sugar industry. When liquids diffuse through a membranous partition the lighter liquid passes into the heavier, while the denser diffuses into the less dense. When the denser liquid holds in solution a mixture of crystallizable and uncrystallizable constituents, the crystallizable ingredients will diffuse readily into the lighter liquid, while the uncrystallizable matters scarcely diffuse at all. This constitutes the remarkable phenomenon known as osmosis.

Those substances in solution which diffuse easily are termed crystalloids, while those that diffuse languidly or not at all are called colloids. Therefore, when a membrane separates a quantity of beetroot or sugar-cane juice containing crystallizable sugar mixed with gelatinous and other colloidal substances from the water lying on the other side of a membrane, the sugar solution which is crystalline, diffuses into the water, while the latter diffuses into the sugar juice until the liquids are of equal density. "If," we are told, > the water containing the sugar were then drawn off and fresh water substituted the diffusion would recommence, and this process might be continued until the whole of the sugar had passed away in the form of a nearly pure solution, while the impurities would remain alone in the solution which was originally sugar juice. The membrane may be animal or vegetable—parchment paper, for instance, answers the purpose.

Now, the walls of plant cells form a natural diffusion medium, and the sugar contents of the beet or cane are immured within the cells. By the above outlined process of diffusion it was ascertained that sugar juice might be very conveniently extracted, especially in the case of the beet. With the cane the diffusion method is still in the course of development.

After the sugar juice from the cane has been pressed out by rollers a small quantity of lime is added to it, and the juice is then raised to the boiling point to secure the coagulation of its albuminous constituents. The liquid is then skimmed, after which it is conducted into a vacuum pan and boiled under reduced pressure until it becomes sufficiently concentrated to cool into a crystalline mass. The treacle is then separated from the sugar. At this stage the sugar is brown in colour. To obtain white sugar the raw material is dissolved in water, and the syrup left to slowly percolate through a bed of bone charcoal some 30 or 40 feet thick. This bone layer absorbs the colouring matter, and a white syrup runs through. When run into a frame a solid crystalline sugar loaf will be produced.

With the beet the roots are thinly sliced, and the slices are plunged into a series of vessels containing hot water, and, as a result of diffusion, a strong solution is obtained. This solution is ultimately drawn off, purified, and the clarified solution is concentrated in vacuum pans. In the sugar refiner's art the vacuum pan is important. For when the juice is overheated it suffers severely, and it is therefore essential to boil the sugar at a low temperature. In an ordinary vessel a solution of sugar must be heated above the boiling point of water (212 deg. F.) before it boils. In a partial vacuum, however, the solution boils violently at 160 deg. F., while it boils at a still lower temperature in a more perfect vacuum.

Some who are qualified to speak entertain the theory that the day is rapidly dawning when the inferior by-products of the refinery will be very substantially reduced. A larger and larger percentage of high quality sugar is anticipated with a material lessening in the quantity of exhausted molasses. Geerligs, the famous expert, holds this opinion, and few are better able to gauge the possibilities of recent departures in sugar manufacture.

In Jamaica, Demerara, and other places celebrated for their rum, the molasses is despatched to the distillery and manufactured into a stimulant, which, when taken in moderation, is an excellent drink. In other cane sugar regions the disposal of molasses is a more difficult task. It finds a market in some of the beet-sugar countries with the ordinary distillery, while in Germany it is sent to special refineries which actually evolve sugar from it by chemical agencies. But in several countries molasses is at a discount. Mixed with the pith of the sugar cane, molasses forms a nourishing cattle food, but where the syrup cannot otherwise be disposed of, it serves as fuel, or is utilized as a manure for the land.

The old sugar loaf lingered until the 'eighties of the past century, but it has now disappeared from England. The lengthy, laborious, and expensive processes essential to its production have been superseded by the highly efficient and economical methods which provide us with our cube sugar. The name of Eugen Langen must ever be identified with this reform, for he was the pioneer in the revolution which furnished cheap, clean, and conveniently cut sugar. As an English expert says:—

> To see Langen's beetroot sugar factory at Elsdorf turning out fine cube sugar straight from the beetroot juice was a real treat to anyone who appreciates the pleasure of seeing things well done; everything clean, everything tidy and handy, no mess on the floors, and a complete chemical control of all the operators. He used to describe every sugar refinery devoid of these virtues as a Schweinerei—pigsty.

The world's cane sugar crop for the season 1908-9 totalled 7,664,631 tons, and of this aggregate over seven million tons were grown in Asia and America. In later years marked progress has occurred in Louisiana despite the disadvantage of occasional frosts, but the cane industry is there treated by the United States authorities as a youthful undertaking, and its products enter the home markets duty free. Porto Rico, a tropical island with a splendid soil, enjoys the same paternal favours as Louisiana, and its planters pursue a progressive system of culture. Since their absorption by the States the Sandwich Islands have made extraordinary progress. While under Spanish rule in 1857, the output of these islands was a beggarly 313 tons of sugar, and their production increased very slowly. But, in 1898, when the isles were annexed to America, the crop was over a quarter of a million tons, a total now considerably more than doubled.

Were the Cuban sugar producers to find their Burbank their prospects would be bright indeed. Prior to the insurrection in Cuba that island's output approached 1,000,000 tons annually, but its internal troubles nearly ruined the industry. With more settled conditions and a guaranteed market for her supplies, Cuba is rapidly rising to the premier position among cane-growing communities. At present there is a race for supremacy between the West Indian island and the Dutch pearl of the Orient, the beautiful land of Java. Cuba is busily promoting her transit improvements to link up plantation with factory and factory with port.

In consequence of the European beet sugar bounties and other adverse circumstances, the British West Indies were heavily handicapped, so much so, that in some old sugar centres, the cane was abandoned. Now that beet sugar is no longer unfairly fostered, these famous sugar colonies are returning to cane production. India is a great sugar region, but, owing to various detrimental factors, that wonderful peninsula lags sadly in the rear. In Australia the sugar industry flourishes in North Queensland. The primitive methods of last century have been supplanted by modern scientific processes; the Australians have composed their labour difficulties in their own way, and the cane is assisted by preferential treatment in the colonial markets. Mauritius was much esteemed for its splendid sugar, but the people failed to move with the times. Falling places told against the colony, and the country was smitten with a disease which exterminated its cattle, thus depriving it of its only beasts of burden. To make matters worse a most disastrous cyclone swept over Mauritius. Fortunately the Colonial Office helped the colonists to build light railways to carry the crops previously drawn by the cattle to the mills. Prices improved; the old-fashioned factories were replaced by modern buildings. Labour is still a serious problem, and cyclones may occur at any time, but otherwise prospects of complete recovery are very good.

The Philippine Islands are being encouraged by their American masters in the cane planter's art. It was decided to admit 300,000 tons of sugar yearly from the Philippines into the United States free of duty, but the Senate stipulated that this favoured sugar must be produced in the factories already in existence in the islands, which are mainly the property of the native population. But a coach and six will almost certainly be driven through this safeguard by the eager and enterprizing American capitalists.

The Need for Definition.

The essential condition of Freethought is clearness. Conversely, a fruitful cause of muddled thought, and therefore of superstition and surrender to dogmatism, is the use of words without a clear conception of their meaning. Many a contradiction in terms passes muster as good mental currency, simply because the terms are left so vague as to leave the contradiction unperceived. Freethinkers will do well, when engaged in controversy, to insist on their opponents defining in advance every term they use, the meaning of which is not too obvious to juggle with; and, of course, they should be ready to do the same with their own. I propose in this article to advance a few such definitions, and to illustrate their utility in controversy, especially in the stock controversies as to "God, freedom and immortality."

1. Body or Matter. Anything which, under any conditions whatever, can cause sensation.

Nuttall's Dictionary gives, for "matter," "that which occupies space, and is perceptible to the senses"—a definition which has the drawback of saying too much. It is better to leave "space" out of the definition. One thing is quite certain, namely, that the ordinary man means by "matter" something objective, and not (as Berkeleyans allege) a mere "idea" of his own. When we say that the sun contains a given quantity of matter at a high temperature, we do not mean that the sun contains a given quantity of "ideas" at a high temperature—which is meaningless. I prefer, therefore, to define matter simply as above, emphasizing its objective character (as the cause of sensation) and leaving open the question of the nature of space.

The bearing of this definition on "spirit" phenomena is obvious. Nothing perceived by the senses can be evidence of anything immaterial, except by a chain of reasoning, the onus of establishing which, rests with those who uphold that conclusion.

2. Mind or soul. Anything capable of consciousness. I can find no other definition of these terms which gives a clear notion of what is intended. Nor have I ever met with anyone who could give an intelligible account of the distinction between "mind" and "soul." It will be well, for practical purposes, to treat them as synonymous, and thereby effectively "dish" at once the clerical profession, who would import into the word "soul" an indefinable, emotional significance which serves no purpose but to assist their theological jugglery, and the Spiritualists, who make free use of such a word as "psychical," trusting to the ignorance of the public, or else ignorant themselves of the fact that it means simply "mental" and nothing more.

The definition of "mind" and "soul" given above disposes, firstly, of the alleged incompatibility between the attributes of mind and matter. No reason can be shown why mind, or that which is capable of consciousness, should be necessarily immaterial, or incapable under any conditions of affecting the senses; and no argument, therefore, can be admitted which begins by assuming this.

Secondly, our definitions of mind and matter have a certain bearing on that much-used expression, "a disembodied spirit." A soul without a body would mean something capable of consciousness, yet deprived of sight, touch, hearing, and every other avenue of sensation, and unable therefore to be conscious even of itself, since we distinguish ourselves from our surroundings only through our bodies! It is difficult to think that those who uphold the existence of disembodied spirits fully realize what they are out to maintain. As a matter of fact, nearly every reference to the "spirit world" in literature, from the Bible to the latest work of Sir Oliver Lodge, implies physical organization in the "spirits"—implies sight, hearing, touch, and susceptibility to pleasure and pain of distinctly physical sorts: a sure sign, that however much people may speak and write of "discarnate" beings, they are totally unable to think of them. Once admit, however, that these alleged beings have any sort of body, and they become subject-matter for the zoologist. We want to know what they look like, how they are organized, how they subsist, how they move and communicate. The writers of the Bible at least vouchsafe some information on these points; but the modern Spiritualist is regrettably evasive!

3. Freedom. Absence of compulsion by a given agency, or by any agency whatever.

As this definition indicates, "freedom" is a word used either relatively or absolutely. Its use in common speech is invariably relative. A free man, as distinct from a slave, is one exempt from the relation of ownership by another. We also call a bachelor or spinster "free," as being exempt from the tie of matrimony. Freethought means thought emancipated from the obligation to accept dogmas on authority. All these are cases of the relative use of the word, and present no difficulty. And if the term "free will" were used equally in a relative sense to denote acts which were directly due to causes within, and not outside, the mind of the doer, there would be no dispute as to its legitimacy; though there would remain a class of acts "on the borderline" of freedom, such as acts done in delirium, mania, or intoxication, which would be as impossible to classify as the colour of a dirty collar. This is not, however, the sense in which the advocates of "free will" use the term. They mean to imply the existence of acts of volition which have no cause at all, and which could have been different without any difference in their antecedents. This is what "free will" means in the strict sense; and perhaps the best comment on it is that its own advocates do not uphold it, except when actually engaged in controversy. Whenever it is asked why so-and-so did this when he might have done that, it is implied that the act must have had a determining cause. Whenever we remark that a certain act "shows what the man's made of," or that it is "what you would expect of him," or "not what you would expect," we take for granted that it is the necessary outcome of elements in his nature, suspected or unsuspected by us. The sole motive for the advocacy of "free will" will be found to be an idea that it is practically desirable to uphold the doctrine in the interests of morality—a consideration totally irrelevant to scientific or philosophic truth. The fuller discussion of this would take too long for me to venture on it here, and I must rest content with having stated the issue.

4. God. A supposed superhuman mind or minds, exercising immense, if not infinite, power over the universe, possessing ideal moral attributes, and therefore claiming the worship and obedience of mankind.

The definition of this term is the most thorny, and also the most important, preliminary problem of any discussion on religion. The definition I have given would not by any means cover all the notions of godhead which have been put forward by man, from the writers of cuneiform tablets to Mr. Wells; but I defy anyone to frame a definition which would do this. Down to the time of Plato, at any rate, moral perfection was no essential part of the attributes of deity; and in modern times, from Spinoza on, there has been a tendency in philosophic circles to whittle down the idea of God to little more than that of an underlying unity pervading phenomena. Apart from this last tendency, which has little or no popular vogue (and is not meant to have any), the definition I have given covers pretty well the ideas of God prevalent in civilized countries since the rise of Christianity.

The first thing to do with any disputant who upholds the existence of God is to pin him down to a statement as to whether he believes his God to be almighty or not. Generally he will decide in the affirmative. He can then be impaled on the horns of the historic dilemma as to the compatibility of divine omnipotence with divine perfection, which every Freethinker worth his salt will know how to press home. If he elects for a God of limited power (and, therefore, a God who is not the creator of the universe, and not supreme over it), it lies with him to show reasons for believing in such a being. He will probably attempt to get away from the difficulty with a reference to conscience, or to man's ideas of truth, beauty, and goodness. If he tries this, it will be time gently but firmly to remind him that he set out to prove, not the existence of these things, but the existence of God, as above defined, and that the shortest distance to a point is not to describe a circle round it, but to go straight at it!

I hope hereby to have illustrated with sufficient brevity the great use in controversy of framing definitions and insisting on their being adhered to. In practice, it will be found that religious apologists are one of three kinds. Either they are dogmatists who do not try to think freely, and who resent your trying, in which case argument with them is waste of time; or they are people who have not defined their terms, and are consequently the slaves of words, in which case a course of definition will do them no harm; or they are Freethinkers at heart, who, for reasons best known to themselves, use words in an esoteric sense, and not in that which plain people appreciate. In this case it is the duty of Freethinkers who prefer plain speaking to see to it that the issue is not confused by such equivocation.

Acid Drops.

We have had the Angels of Mons legends exploited by various people, but Mr. Bottomley is evidently convinced that this legend didn't exhaust the gullability of the more ignorant section of the British public. And, writing in the Sunday Pictorial, in between hints as to what he said to Haig and Haig said to him, he proceeds to tell his readers all about the miracle of the Virgin of Albert. This is the way Mr. Bottomley writes:—

> Now come with me to Albert Cathedral, and be prepared for an even more wonderful "freak." How it haunts me! And how grateful I shall be to you very clever and learned men, who understand these matters, if you will kindly explain it all to me! Towering above the cathedral was a big square steeple. Surmounting the steeple was a magnificent figure, in carved and gilded wood, of the Madonna and Child—it was one of the great sights of France.....That steeple formed a fine target for the enemy guns, and it was badly hit. Great, gaping wounds show you its interior; huge stones are suspended by the iron "braces" which once held them in position. Just below the base of that figure of the Madonna there had been a direct hit by a shell. The place was pointed out to me by an officer who was in the battle. "Our eyes instinctively turned to the Madonna," he said; "the beautiful thing trembled and then suddenly bent over at right angles to the steeple. We held our breath and waited for the crash—but it never came, as you see." And, sure enough, there is the Madonna still, leaning over the old desolated town, with the holy infant in her arms. Many shells have burst round her since she fell, but none has touched her. It is the most impressive spectacle that human eye ever looked upon.....
> Again, I know I shall be told it was mere "coincidence." .....Well, perhaps you are right. But the fact remains that the faithful, patient folk of Arras and of Albert will never believe any other theory than that in the zenith of the Devil's triumph God raised His hand to shield from harm the sacred emblems which the souls of men and women for two thousand years have endowed with the sanctity of the story of the birth of His son—at Whose shrine they have worshipped and found comfort, and Whose stately presence still amongst them helps them to believe that deep down in all this tragedy of blood and tears there may yet be some divine purpose which it is not for them, they think, to question or to understand.

We might be moved to tears by Mr. Bottomley's pathos (or bathos) were it not that we happen to know the truth of this miracle of the Virgin. If Mr. Bottomley has really been to Albert, and if the officer spoke to him as above, then we can only say that Mr. Bottomley failed to use his eyes, and the British officer was simply "pulling his leg." There is no miracle whatever about the present position of the statue. And the explanation is a prosaic one. We go further and say that the Germans would be very pleased if the statue stood in its original position. We do not care to say more at present, but we challenge Mr. Bottomley to tell his readers the truth on this point. The confidant of Haig, and the guide of the Government must know the truth on this matter.

"God has called us by name," says a German officer. So have other people; but the names are quite unprintable.

The suggestion at a London Military Tribunal that the manufacture of women's hats is not of national importance roused the ire of some editors, who, probably, remembered the millinery advertisers. One editor interviewed a lady, who said, pointedly, "What are we to do on Sundays? Are we not to go to church?"

An evening paper has been protesting against the payment of £10,000 a year to two judges. The Bench of Bishops absorbs a very large sum of money annually, but pious editors never think of protesting.

The Bishop of London has been trying to gloss the parsons' share in the War. He says that fifty-nine chaplains have been killed and seventy wounded, "so we are taking our part in the thickest of the battle." The Bishop did not add that there are about 25,000 Church of England clergy, and that the Army chaplains are non-combatants, and receive officers' pay. Nor did he say anything concerning the special exemption from military service of all ministers of religion. Most parsons prefer to read of "the thickest of the battle" in the security of their own homes.

"The City needs cheering up in this fourth year of the War," says this delightful Bishop of London. The emptiness of the City Churches shows that the cup that cheers is not the communion cup.

A bequest of £1,700 to George Muller's Orphanage, Bristol, reminds us that the founder of that Christian institution was born in Prussia, and he boasted that it was supported by voluntary contributions given in answer to prayer. Yet the dear, truthful, clergy will insist that all Prussians are Atheists.

"Get down as low as possible," advises Sir Francis Lloyd. The lowest thing we know is the Christian Evidence Society.

The War is not hastening the promised revival of religion. Sir W. F. Barrett, F.R.S., writing in the Sunday Times, says "the consolations of religion are not felt as they might or ought to be." It is as well, for one of the consolations of religion is that so many people go to Hades.

Rev. P. J. Kelly, Vicar of Collingham, who left home recently, ostensibly to join the R. G. A., has been unfrocked by his Bishop for immorality. He left a wife and six children at the rectory, and a young woman, a nurse, left the village at the same time as the vicar. The Eastern Daily Press of October 19 reports the conviction of John Kells, aged 15½, for an offence against a girl of eleven. The rector said the lad was a member of the Sunday-school and the church choir. There is no moral—for Christians—in either of these cases.

The dear Daily News has been airing the perplexity of a "London minister," presumably a Nonconformist, concerning the copyright of the Bible, and says that the copyright being the property of the Syndics of the University Presses of Oxford and Cambridge is a "monopoly," and a little like "profiteering." The plain fact is that, by Act of Parliament, the printing of the Bible is entrusted to the University Presses to ensure accuracy of the text. If any publisher could print an edition of the Bible, the text would soon become inexact, and the Christian fold would be, if possible, still more full of malice, hatred, and all uncharitableness.

It is fashionable to sneer at the educational value of lectures, but Mr. Will Thorne, M.P., tells a different story. He says that he went to work so young that he had no schooling, but received his education at the corners of factories and workshops, and by listening to lecturers.

"All the English history that I know," says Sir R. Baden-Powell, "was learnt from the cinema." This suggests filmy eyed innocence.

What quaint ideas are circulated by the pious press. The Daily News recently printed a letter stating that "the main qualifications for a parson seem to be the ability to live on love and air." This is beautiful nonsense. Thirty-nine ecclesiastics of the Established Church share £180,700 annually, whilst the leading Nonconformist ministers follow in the footsteps of the Carpenter of Nazareth with salaries equal to those of Cabinet Ministers.

The Divine Valley News of a recent date contains an interesting letter from a Conscientious Objector on his prison experience. Dealing with the warders he says:—

> Now we come to the warders. What shall we say of them? I know how I feel about them. But then, in Philosophy, I'm a Determinist. I believe that man does what he must, and, after all, a warder is a man, however much he may resemble a beast. It is his misfortune to be what he is, as it is mine to be what I am, therefore, let us be lenient. Warders are drawn from two sources—the Highlands in Scotland, the Army in England. When they want a batch of warders for Scottish prisons a party is sent to the Highlands to lasso a number of Highland ghillies and bring them to the Lowlands, where they are taught how to put on trousers and open and shut doors, and then their training is complete! In England they are recruited from the Army—discharged men who have been unable to find work as billiard-markers, etc. Both classes possess the same qualifications—the fewness of their ideas! The one has been driving sheep for years, the other has been driven like sheep. Both are susceptible to that prison disease "systematus," and generally "take" with the first inoculation. When I pray at nights I sometimes wonder who I shall mention first—the prisoner or the warder. Both have a good case for a first call. Both are prisoners, only the warder dines outside; but for this privilege he pays a heavy price—he's a life-sentence man.

We gather from the article that the writer is not an avowed Freethinker, and his remarks on religion in prison are, for that reason the more interesting:—

> We have another strange specimen in prison—the Prison Chaplain. No friend of "Charlie's," but equally humorous. What he has done to be kept there I don't know, and what he does that he should be kept there I also don't know. The first one who came to console me in my sorrow had a breath that was sufficient to put a man "on the fuddle" for a month. We didn't agree, somehow, and he, being a Biblical man, acted on Paul's advice—i.e., if you cannot love your enemies, avoid them. He never came back again. I remember a funny little incident happening in church one day. In church you sit apart, and a warder sits on an elevated chair, built at the end of every second seat. He watches while we pray. You must open your Bible whether you can read or not. Well, this day a little Englishman was sitting with his Bible closed. Mr. Warder got his eye on him. "Open your Bible," he cried. "I can't read," replied Mr. Cockney. "It disna' matter, a damn, open your Bible." Then we all prayed.

Is not England the land of the open Bible?

"Stanley converted Mutesa [King of Uganda died 1884] to Christianity, which he professed for a time; he actually ordered the Christian Sabbath to be kept throughout the land, and not only promised Stanley that he would build churches throughout his kingdom, but he asked him to go back to England and send missionaries out to Uganda. The missionaries were sent, and they were welcomed by Mutesa. But their quarrels and disputes disgusted him so much that he asked both parties to return to Europe and decide which was the true religion, and said that when they had settled the problem amongst themselves, they could come back and tell him."—By the Waters of Africa, 1917, by Norma Lorimer, a lady-traveller. She cites Dr. J. W. Gregory.

A picture was published in an illustrated daily paper showing the students at Birmingham University marching to church, and the procession was headed by Sir Oliver Lodge in full robes. Perhaps that was one of the reasons why the editor styled Sir Oliver "a distinguished scientist."

Dr. Horton's Autobiography throws considerable light on clerical methods. He once determined to preach in support of a crusade against the music-halls. "Then it occurred to me," he says, "that I had never been to a music-hall." So he went once, and preached his sermon. Judging by their remarks, that is how most parsons treat social matters.

At Hascombe, Surrey, the local Wesleyans have a room, over a public-house, where harvest festival was celebrated. Those aloft sang "Come, ye thankful people, come," while down below the worshippers of Bacchus emptied tankards.

The clergy like to mix a little business with their philanthropy. A South London parson, who opened his church hall for shelter from air-raids, conducted short services with prayers and hymns.

The Rev. Bernard Snell, President of the Congregational Union, quoted Lord Morley in his presidential address. The words are worth repeating, "The pulpit is a belt which has slipped off the driving wheel of the world."

The Bishop of Birmingham says our boys at the Front can do without haloes. Of course they can. The muscular curates of military age have so much more need of that sacred ornament.

An attempt is being made to introduce more definite religious teaching into the elementary schools in Wales. The initial programme is a religious service each day, to consist of a Welsh hymn, the Lord's Prayer, a reading from the Bible, and an English hymn. More, we presume, is to follow if this aim is accomplished. The scheme is supported, it is said, by leading Nonconformists as well as Churchmen. We hope that Freethinkers and other reformers in Wales will keep their eyes on this new move. The work of education is being taken very seriously in Wales just now, and it would be a pity to allow this energy to be turned into the wrong channels.

An article in a monthly review by a clergyman bears the alluring title, "Our Sons Have Shown Us God." It is hard to discover what is meant in the dimness of a rhetorical twilight; but the sons of the British Empire patronise a varied selection of gods, ranging from Mumbo Jumbo to the Man of Sorrows.

An article in a daily paper bore the quaint title, "The Soldier with Nothing to Do." It sounds as if it referred to the Church or Salvation Armies.

An article appeared in a daily newspaper with the title of "The Great Unpaid Profession." It did not refer to the clergy.

E. Brace (West Africa).—The history of the War seems against your position. War itself is an act of reprisal, and the whole progress of this War has shown that there is an ascending—or descending—scale of "frightfulness." Germany uses gas, and we are forced to follow suit in self-protection. We blockade Germany, and Germany retorts by declaring a blockade of England with submarines. Gas is followed by jets of flame and burning oil, etc. Whatever may be said for reprisals, it is clear they do not make for less brutal methods of warfare.

Mr. W. Mann is anxious to obtain copies of the Reports of the Seybert Commission on Spiritualism published in Philadelphia. The Reports are out of print, but some of our readers may be able to help. If any possessing copies do not wish to sell, perhaps they would not mind loaning the Reports. Address this office.

F. Lonsdale.—No notice reached us. It would have appeared had it done so.

H. Elliot.—We sincerely hope that you will more than equal your past twenty years' reading of the Freethinker.

E. R.—We are very grateful indeed for all that our readers are doing all over the country to secure new readers. The results of their efforts are both encouraging and helpful.

A. Lester.—We much regret to hear of the death—in action—of F. Lester. Please accept our sincere condolence.

G. Garrett.—Thanks for good wishes. If each does their share, the burden will be practically imperceptible.

C. G. Crooke.—We were not aware of what you state, but will bear the matter in mind. So far as we are concerned, we should certainly check any such disposition.

W. R.—Please call. We are always pleased to see those interested in the Cause. Time is never wasted in that direction.

Hugh Devlin.—The journal you name is no longer in existence.

E. Butler.—The omission is very obvious. Will deal with it next week.

W. P. Jacob.—All slaveholders were compensated by the British Government when the shares were liberated in Jamaica. We cannot say at the moment whether the Church Missionary Society then held slaves there. It is certain that Christians did.

We offer our apologies to many correspondents whose letters are obliged to stand over until next week. We have also to refrain from noticing quite a number of interesting newspaper cuttings to hand. These will, in most cases, be dealt with in our next issue.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We do not care to let October pass without an "In Memoriam" note on the death of our late editor and leader, G. W. Foote. His death, two years ago, robbed the Freethought world of a fearless and uncompromising fighter, and we have the best of reasons for knowing in what great appreciation his work was held. Had he chosen any other walk in life—either politics or literature—his success would have been assured. It is our gain and, ultimately, the world's gain that he preferred a task which, while it meant a smaller measure of public recognition, meant also a concentration of energy on a work the importance of which cannot well be over-estimated. Thirty-five years' editorship of this journal, with twenty-five years' presidency of the N. S. S., represents a record of which any man might feel proud. G. W. Foote was content to be known only as a soldier in the service of humanity. In that war of human liberation his zeal never flagged. He wielded a sword to the end, and when the weapon fell from his grasp, the world of Freethought freely recognized that it had lost one of its most brilliant champions. The recognition of his qualities and services by a larger public belongs to history and the future.

We hope London readers will make a special note of the Interim Conference held in London to-day, afternoon and evening. Full particulars will be found in another column. Mr. Cohen takes the chair at both meetings.

The winter programme at Manchester opened well with two lectures by Mr. Cohen on Sunday last. Both meetings were good, and the audience enthusiastic. The Secretary, Mr. Black, occupied the chair on both occasions, and made a very pressing appeal for new members. We were glad to learn that this resulted in a number of membership forms being duly filled up and handed in. A very pleasing feature of the meetings was the large number of ladies present. It was good to know that there was a very brisk sale of literature. Altogether a gratifying day.

Next week (Sunday, November 4) Mr. Cohen lectures in Abertillery. There will be two meetings, afternoon and evening, and we expect there will be the usual gathering of friends from the surrounding districts.

We have received the following from a correspondent known to us many years ago in England:—

> The first meeting of the "Society of Freethinkers of the Caucasus" to take place in Baku was held on August 30 last (September 12), the audience numbering over three hundred. M. Ooshakoff, of Tiflis, was the speaker, and dwelt at length on the trend of modern Freethought in religious matters and the objects of the Society. Referring to the abuses prevalent among the clergy under the late inglorious reign and the attitude of the Church towards all reform, the lecturer invited his audience to welcome the law of July 14, which guarantees absolute freedom of conscience, and to avail themselves of the new institutions of civil marriage and divorce. He also appealed to them to lend their assistance towards bringing about an early dissolution between the Church and the State. Notwithstanding the decidedly heated character of the discussion which followed the lecture, and in which two priests of the orthodox Church took part, there was no disorder, and the meeting dispersed at midnight, many of the audience collecting in knots outside the building to discuss points that had arisen in the course of the debate. The Society has appointed a permanent secretary at Baku for the enrolment of members.

The Secretary of the Swansea Branch of the N. S. S. wishes to make a special appeal to all Freethinkers in the locality for assistance in conducting their winter campaign. The Committee is full of enthusiasm, and we hope that this will not be damped by any lack of ardour on the part of those who are desirous of seeing the work go forward. There are all the elements in Swansea for the creation of a really strong Society, and we sincerely trust that this will not be prevented by even an apparent lukewarmness on the part of Freethinkers. The Secretary is Mr. B. Dupree, 12 Short Street, Swansea.

Will Freethinkers in Southampton and neighbourhood who are desirous of forming a Branch of the N. S. S. please communicate with Mr. A. A. Wildman, 100 Clovelly Road, Southampton? We are informed that the address of the local Freethinker newsagent is Messrs. Woodger & Son, St. Mary's, Southampton.

We are glad to learn that the Birmingham experiment in the Repertory Theatre is proceeding well. Mr. Clifford Williams had a good, and improved, audience on Sunday last, and there is every prospect of the course being continued throughout the winter. Mr. Willis is the next lecturer, and we hope the meeting will mark a still further advance.

God and Gold.

It is hard to estimate the vast sum of human misery caused by the superstitious belief in God as a necessary factor in Nature and in gold as a necessary factor in that easy exchange of goods and services which makes civilized life possible. Not only so, but many intelligent men who have emancipated themselves from the God superstition still go in bondage to the great Gold Fetish, as Mr. Arthur Kitson so well calls it in his last book, Trade Fallacies.

Yet these two false beliefs, so potent for social harm, have many points of similarity, a consideration of which will help to clear the mental atmosphere, and thus lead to a higher stage of civilization than the present sordid scramble for wealth-without-work, and the unnatural solace of an impossible heaven beyond the sky for the inevitable dissatisfaction which is the lot of rich and poor alike. As T. L. M'Cready so finely says:—

> Man learns to conquer the universe; to produce wealth with ever-diminishing effort, to harness Natures forces and make them do his bidding. But, like Dead Sea apples, his wealth turns to ashes in his mouth and yields him no satisfaction. For with wealth comes poverty, hand in hand, making the vast majority of the workers to toil in hopeless misery and the few thousands of idle millionaires to stagnate in a slough of unearned luxury.
> Day by day, this spectre of undeserved and unnecessary Poverty grows and swells, repulsive, threatening, terrifying our souls. We must dig down into the roots of things and find its cause, and digging thus we lay bare superstition after superstition.

You will observe that the high priests of God—the Popes and Cardinals, Archbishops and Bishops—all reside in fine mansions, well supplied by the workers with every kind of comfort and luxury. And the high priests of Gold—the cosmopolitan financiers, banking magnates, and cunning Stock Exchange manipulators—also reside in their palatial mansions in Park Lane and Fifth Avenue. Not one of these men has rendered any useful service to the workers in exchange for the unearned wealth at their command, and yet so profound is the public ignorance of finance that they are regarded as the very pillars of society.

Again, consider the places devoted to the worship of these two great fetishes, God and Gold. Every civilized country is studded with great cathedrals and churches adorned with costly carvings and painted windows, where an ornate service is carried on to placate a God so incomprehensible that not one of those who profess to believe in his existence can give a reasonable definition of him, or point to a single instance of his interference with the well-known laws of Nature.

And the Gold Fetish is also honoured with magnificent buildings—palatial Banks and Stock Exchanges; while a vast amount of labour is constantly expended on extracting him from the bowels of the earth in distant lands, carrying him carefully to the great commercial centres, and again consigning him to the earth in some great Bank; yet not one of his worshippers can tell you in what way he is of the slightest use in exchanging goods and services, or why he should be produced at all, save for a few trifling purposes of decoration.

Just as the religious devotee is led by an acolyte into a shrine to gaze with awe at some picture of his useless God, whom he fondly imagines to be the very pivot of the natural universe, so is the economic devotee led into the vault of a bank to gaze at the blocks of useless bullion, which he imagines to be the very pivot of the commercial universe.

Furthermore, just as many books have been written to expound the nature and function of the useless God, so also have many been written about Gold and its imaginary powers.

Again, the high priests of the useless God make huge claims on the workers for their services to them in placating the useless God, and thus enabling them to obtain admission to an impossible heaven; while the high priests of the useless Gold pile up mountains of ever-increasing spurious claims on the workers for their services in enabling them to exchange their goods and services.

Furthermore, as the high priests of Gold have tried to prevent sceptics in the divinity of their fetish from putting their ideas of a currency, based on the productive power of the workers, into actual practice, by their Bank Charter Acts and Legal Tender Laws, on the specious plea of saving their bodies from robbery, so also have the high priests of God tried to prevent sceptics from preaching and practising their views by their Blasphemy Laws, on the specious plea of saving their souls from everlasting torment.

Again, the high priests of God teach their deluded victims that eternal happiness is only obtainable by abstinence from all the natural pleasures of this life, and through the vicarious suffering and labour of the Man of Cavalry; while the high priests of Gold maintain that the pleasures of an everlasting unearned income are a fair reward for abstinence, and obtainable through the vicarious suffering and labour of the men of the mines and factories. And it will be observed that this lauded abstinence is not practised by the high priests of either fetish themselves; the luxurious lives of the millionaires and their friends, the dignitaries of the Church, being somewhat notorious. As the monks and nuns were denied the wholesome gratification of their appetites, so are the rank and file of the army of Gold denied decent marriage at the proper age, and the streets in consequence swarm with prostitutes, driven there by the cunning and greed of the high priests of Gold.

Now, to anybody who has emancipated himself from the baneful belief in the Gold Fetish, it is manifest that banking is nothing more than the bookkeeping of commerce, and that the money now in use, to wit, cheques and currency notes, are simply claims to wealth, conveying credit from hand to hand. From this it is obvious that no exchange is completed until the money received by the creditor is converted into the goods or services he may require, or passed on by him in liquidation of some debt he owes. In short, the principle that goods and services are always exchanged for other goods—and services of equal value, remains as true now as in the old days of barter, the money nexus not altering it in the least.

Applying this principle to the many exchanges necessitated by this great War, it at once becomes apparent that all the persons engaged in it, i.e., the actual fighters and all those who are supplying them with everything they want, are being paid from day to day in the goods and services they are receiving daily in exchange for their services. To make my meaning clear, consider the position in the old days before the invention of money, which is merely a contrivance for avoiding the great loss of time and labour involved by barter. When a nation was attacked, most of the able-bodied men were withdrawn from their usual productive work in order to fight against the foe, while the rest of their co-workers, including many of the women, had not only to work ever so much harder in order to supply the fighters with everything they required, and also to support themselves and the children, and other helpless people. The only war debts that could then have existed were pensions for disabled fighters or indemnities exacted by a victorious foe, which were paid in kind.

This should be precisely the position with us to-day, the money nexus not altering it in any essential respect. But instead of our gallant fighters returning home to a well-earned rest after their arduous exertions in the field, and the enjoyment of ample pensions by such as have been disabled, they will find themselves confronted with the preposterous claims of a few thousand idle millionaires who have rendered them no service and contributed no goods for the War. So high are these claims already that Mr. A. D. Hall, the Permanent secretary of the Board of Agriculture, said the other day: "We have to recognize that the mere claims of the debt which will weigh upon the nation mean that every working man and woman will have to put in about a quarter of the working day in paying off that debt." And this spurious debt and interest charges are rising rapidly all the time, so that they will probably be double their present size before the War is over, which means that every working man and woman will have to surrender one-half of their hard-earned wages to meet these preposterous claims!

On page 169 of Trade Fallacies, Mr. Arthur Kitson says:—

> The future victims of this frenzied finance will regard this war loan as the greatest monument to British financial lunacy that has ever been raised!.....The Government have contracted to pay first a bonus of 5 per cent. and second an annuity of 5 per cent. to every subscriber for contributing towards a sum of credit which the Government already controlled, and which could have been made effective by the mere stroke of a pen.

Of course, the Government could have paid all its creditors (sailors, soldiers, and contractors) with currency notes or cheques drawn against the vast credit of the Empire, which includes and far exceeds the credit of all the banks against which the cheques of subscribers to the War Loan are drawn. But instead of doing this simple and obvious thing, the Government has exchanged its own superior credit for the inferior credit of the banks, and paid both a 5 per cent. bonus and annuity for this accommodation.

You see, the high priests of the great Gold Fetish were consulted by the Government, and asserted that no money was sound unless based on him, notwithstanding the patent fact that he had miserably failed at the first breath of war. The small investors will make no profits out of the War Loan, because their taxes will far exceed the interest they receive, and they have been brought into this scheme as mere "camouflage" for the operations of the cosmopolitan financiers, who are quite able to prevent the super-tax from being raised highly enough to stop them from raking in millions of unearned wealth.

If it be asked how it is that every other nation has adopted the same plan of financing the War, I answer that they are all under the spell of the great Gold Fetish, whose high priests care nothing for patriotism, and regard the workers of the world as mere pawns in their great game for attaining power and wealth. Not one of these nations has yet started a State Bank, basing its paper credit-instruments on the productive power of its workers, save only the Australian Commonwealth. All financial questions are blindly submitted to the high priests of the Gold Fetish, who are thus enabled to cause contractions and expansions of the currency, which involve the ruin of thousands of honest merchants and manufacturers, but always add to their own power and vast unearned wealth.

Now, what is the shortest and safest way out of this financial morass? Convert the present Post Office Savings Bank into a fully equipped State Bank on the lines of the Australian Commonwealth's State Bank; then call in all War scrip, and credit its owners with its value. This will put a stop to all further payments of interest. Finance all further operations by means of cheques drawn against the abounding credit of the Empire as registered at the State Bank. Increase the super-tax, so that the idle millionaires shall be forced to contribute handsomely to the hard-earned pensions of the disabled fighters who have so bravely and ungrudgingly sacrificed their youth and health and limbs in defence of us all.

Both God and Gold have had their power for evil rudely shocked by this great War, their utter uselessness having been demonstrated beyond the possibility of doubt. The stern necessities of war have in a few years taught lessons which, if properly driven home, may compensate humanity for the vast misery it has undergone.

New Testament Legends for Young Readers.

VI.—The Tempest.

Thirteen men in a small wooden ship on the Galilean lake. There was tax-man, Levi, and there was fisherman Andrew; another was Peter the pilot.[1] The Twelve Apostles were wide awake; the thirteenth man, Jesus, master of the Jinn, fell asleep. He slept even when a tempest arose and howled, and a thousand thunders roared.

"Master, master, we perish!" shrieked the Twelve.

Jesus woke, lifted his hands, spoke in a stern voice to winds and waves, and there was a great calm.

"Have you no faith in me?" he asked. "Why should you fear?"

They looked at one another, and whispered,

"Wonderful! What sort of man is this? He orders the blasts and the waters, and they obey him!

When they landed on the lake side, a poor lunatic, all naked, rushed out from a place of dead men's graves, and yelled, as if a whole regiment of jinn were screaming inside him. Broken chains dangled from his wrists and ankles.

"Out of him, out!" cried Jesus to the jinn.

"No, no," groaned the demons from inside the lunatic, "send us not to our Pit![1] We would prefer to dwell in the swine yonder."

"Into the vile pigs, then," ordered Jesus, pointing to a herd of many swine which fed on the slope of the hill.

Then there was a sound of tempest! The swine—animals hated by Jews—felt the jinn inside them, rushed with a storm of grunts and squeals down the rocky descent, and plunged headlong into the lake. The swine-keepers fled in terror. As to the jinn, no doubt they returned, all wet and wretched, to their home in the Abyss, or Pit. Meanwhile the lunatic had borrowed garments from bystanders, and sat at the feet of Jesus, clothed, and in his right mind.

"I will follow you, master," said the man.

"No," replied Jesus. "Go and tell the folk of your city what I have done for you."

And this he did; and, in many a street, crowds gathered round him, and listened, wide-eyed and open-mouthed, as he told the story of the devils that had once made him more like a pig than a human being.

The next tempest was one of grief and tears.

A young girl lay dying. Her father, a chief officer in a synagogue, had knelt at the feet of Jesus, begging help. At once, followed by a chattering crowd, the Wonder-worker set out for the officer's house.

All of a sudden, Jesus halted.

"Who touched me?" he cried.

Peter and others replied that, in the hurrying, many people could not help jostling him. But a woman, shy and trembling, seeing the Wonder-worker's eye fixed on her, came forward, made a deep salaam, and said—

"Sir, I touched just the edge of your robe; and forthwith I felt healed of a sad trouble in my blood which I had suffered twelve years; and not a doctor in the place could do me the least good."

"Daughter, go in peace," said Jesus, gently; and then he hastened, the dying girl's father keeping close to his side.

A man ran to meet them.

"All is over," he exclaimed. "The child is dead."

The Wonder-worker made no pause. He reached the house, where women, sitting on the floor, were raising the Keening-cry of "O way-lee, O way-lee, hoi ah-ee, ah-ee, ah-ee!"

"The girl is only asleep," said Jesus, and he sent out of the sick-chamber the howling women and the crowd, all except the child's parents, and Peter the pilot, and the fishermen, James and John.

"Maid, arise!"

As the Wonder-worker uttered these words, the girl sat up.

"Give her something to eat," said Jesus, "and do not go gossiping about what happened."

Shortly afterwards the Master of Jinn called his Twelve Apostles together.

"You are now my delegates," said he. "Go into villages and towns, and do as I have done. Preach the Kingdom of God. Heal the sick. Drive out demons. Take no baggage, no food, no wallets, no walking-sticks, no money, no extra clothes. Go simply as you are. If people won't welcome you, don't quarrel or scold; just walk away, and shake off the dust from your feet to show them you have quit their place, their presence, and their soil."

The Twelve—all humble fellows, not one of them being a scholar, or a rabbi, or a high-class man—started out, full of zeal and faith; and you can imagine the noise, and mobbing, and astonishment that ensued in the hamlets, farm-yards, village streets, and city market-places, wherever the Wonder-worker's delegates travelled.

Some weeks or months later, one by one, the Apostles wandered back—Peter of the Keys, fisherman John, Judas Iscariot (he that loved silver shekels), and the rest, with their reports about crowds of listeners, and jinn conquered, and diseases cured.

"Now, come and rest," said the Master.

But there was no rest, even in the quiet countryside to which he led them, for a multitude followed, wanting to hear Jesus preach, wanting to have their wounds and pains healed; and so the day wore on towards sunset.

"Send the folk away," said his disciples, "for twilight will soon be here."

"Let them sup first," he answered.

"All we have for supper is five loaves and two fishes."

"Go and divide the people into fifties, and make them sit down on the grass," he ordered.

Then the Wonder-worker looked up to heaven, and said a holy spell over the loaves and fishes, and began handing portions quickly—bread and fish, bread and fish—to the Apostles, and they ran in and out among the seated people.

When the feast was ended, and the five thousand mouths were satisfied, the Twelve Apostles picked up twelve basket-loads of pieces left. Meanwhile, the people, talking and exclaiming, trudged homewards by the light of the moon.

"What do the folk say about me?" he asked his twelve friends.

"Some think you are John the Baptist come back from the tomb; some say you are Elijah, the prophet of Yahweh, who rode in the fire-car."

"And what do you say?"

"You are the Good One, the Christ; the man on whose head God has dropped the holy oil,"[1] cried Peter.

"Say nought of Christ to the people," he replied. "And now mark my words—I shall be a martyr soon; I shall be killed by the priests and Pharisees of Jerusalem; and for three days I shall lie dead, and then I shall rise up. And you who follow me will have a bitter path to travel. You must bear the Cross."

The cross was the tree of death. Many a slave had been nailed to a wooden cross by his Roman masters, and so died a lingering death; for none could withstand the power of Rome, and the Roman legions, and the Roman eagles.

About a week later, the Christ of the Cross, followed by three of his Cross-bearers,—Peter, James, John,—climbed a mountain, and he kneeled down under the stars, and prayed. As he kneeled, his face shone like the sun, his garments glittered and sparkled. At his right hand stood a shining man,—Moses, the prophet of Yahweh, the Fire and Storm God; on his left, the shining man, Elijah, the rider in the Fire-chariot of heaven.

The three apostles had fallen asleep. When they awoke, they heard the three shining ones talk of Jerusalem, the Cross, and Death.

"Master," cried Peter, dazzled by the glittering scene, "it is good for us to be here. Let us build three booths, one for you, one for Moses, one for Elijah!"

A cloud floated over their heads, and a voice came from the cloud,—

"This is my beloved son; hear him!"

Then Moses, Elijah, cloud, and all the glory vanished.

A few days later, the twelve apostles had high words and arguments over the question as to which was the greatest? Was it Peter? Was it John? Was it Judas Iscariot? Was it Matthew? And so on.

Jesus called a little child, and the small boy approached, shy and simple.

"This wee lad," said he, "is the least person standing here. But whoever is kind to him is kind to me. Love the least, and be ready to take the least rank. He that is least among you, the same shall be great."

* * * *

The Roman poet Virgil tells the tale of Æneas sailing with his fleet of wooden ships (the prows were brass) across the Mediterranean Sea. Some day he would land in Italy, and take possession, and his children's children would be the Roman people, and their power would build up the Empire of Rome.

But the goddess Juno hated Æneas, and resolved to wreck his fleet. She persuaded the King of the Winds to send some terrible blasts over the waters. Thunder and lightning added their horrors, and poor Æneas thought the hour of death had come.

The god Neptune, however, was his friend. Hearing the noise of the tempest, old Neptune, three-pointed trident in hand, raised his head above the billows, and shouted to the King of the Winds to recall his unruly servants. The king obeyed; the winds ceased; and there was a great calm; and Æneas was able to sail in peace to the coast of Africa; and in due time (that was after many years) he reached Italy.[1]

The Gospel made Jesus as great a wonder-worker as Neptune.

The Romans also had a story of the shining king, Romulus, who was really the son of the god Mars. Once he was but a humble shepherd, but he became a leader of men, and a king, and builder of the city of Rome. On his death, he was carried by his father up to heaven in a chariot of fire; and soon after that, he was seen by a Roman elder on earth, looking beautiful and shining.

"I am now a god," said the shining Romulus to the elder; "tell the Romans to worship me as their Founder, and let them call me Quirinus."

Barristers and Bishops.

The great and enlightened and generous-minded British public have their weaknesses. One of them is their belief that they enjoy self-government. Whatever else they enjoy, they certainly do not enjoy that. And we may depend upon it that the reactionaries will take advantage of the demoralizing and disintegrating effects of war to keep the great British public and self-government still further apart. It is the policy of these reactionaries to keep the great British public wholesomely afraid of—bogeys. But it is still more their policy—and interest—to blind such sections of the said B.P. as are disposed to listen to suggestions for change, as to who their rulers actually are. It is thus impossible for the said B.P. to spot their masters; for each and every one whom they take to be such clamours fervently, "Nay, friend, I am but thy servant." Meantime the ruled live on bread and margarine—sometimes bread alone (of sorts)—and weak tea; and these unctuous "servants" retain their money-bags and well-stocked cellars, and they do furnish their fair boards with toothsome delicacies.

After much pondering, I have arrived at the conclusion that the agitators have been banging the wrong knockers and pulling the wrong bells. They may as soon as possible—and it cannot be too soon—cease grousing about kings and the expense of them, about office-seeking parties out of power and axe-grinding parties in power, about circumlocution offices and red tape, and barnacles and peculators. These, my friends, are but effects—excrescences, superstructures. The root causes—the vital sap, the fount and foundation of these things—are to be found in the power you accord to the Barrister and the Bishop.

Did not Dickens realize something of this truth when he depicted "Bar" and "Bishop" like courtiers hanging round Merdle, the financier, in Little Dorrit? In a spirit of love for the "Terewth" brethren, let us inquire.

How could privilege or vested interest live for an hour without Barristers and Bishops? They are the pillars of the Temple of Property, whose "duty" is to restrain the Samson of Democracy. Oh, we know the various labels of the various political parties; we have listened to the soul-moving, lachrymose pathos of these philanthropists and well-wishers of humanity! We have been there. But we are sick at heart because our hopes have been so long deferred. There seems, after all, to be so little dynamic in talk, that one feels one could do with a little less of it. It would be interesting to see some eloquence translated into action.

Now, consider what, after all, are the chief tools of Barrister and Bishop. Surely they are their tongues. What they write is negligible. What they make is imperceptible. But by the tongues of themselves and their satellites, they can do mighty things. In the British House of Commons alone there are nearly two hundred barristers, to ensure—in the masses outside—a proper veneration for the Law. Ah, and the great bulk of the remainder of our M.P.'s are good boys, who would never have the temerity to contradict a bishop! Why, in the twentieth century, these noble, holy, divinely ordained bishops sit (without election) on every piece of legislation proposed for the governance of the British Empire—even for that part thereof called Scotland, which professes to repudiate bishops! A strange world, i' faith!

You picture the successful barrister emerging from Court. How the client and solicitor hang on his every word! But the barrister who has reached the Bench is more powerful than any king. His only restraints are imposed by the laws which he and his brethren agree to enact. What a happy convenience for all concerned! And you picture him and My Lord Bishop dining at another Merdle's to-night, each with his tongue in his cheek, and honey on that tongue. Concentrate on them, you pioneers; concentrate on them, the props of privilege—Barrister and Bishop!

A Surrey Vale.

I know a vale by man forgot,
'Tis Beauty's perfect home;
The hand of man hath marred it not,
There would I gladly roam.

Far from this hell of noise and strife;
These prison walls of fate;
The God of Beauty reigneth there—
The God of Love—not Hate.

I'll build a home for thee my love,
Within a mossy dell;
And we will live in Eden there,
And bid the world farewell.

National Secular Society.

Interim Conference, to be held at Chandos Hall, Maiden Lane, Charing Cross, on Sunday, Oct. 28.

The Conference will sit at 2.30 prompt for the discussion of the Agenda, already in the hands of the Secretaries of the Branches and the Delegates. At the conclusion of the formal business, the meeting will be thrown open for the discussion of papers on "Why Our Reformed Educational System Should Promote Patriotism," by Mr. A. Eagar, and "Freethought and the Family," by Mr. T. F. Palmer.

All members of the Society are entitled to speak and vote. Admission to the Afternoon Session, as usual, will be by production of the card of membership. Individual members should be particularly interested in this gathering.

The Evening Public Meeting will commence at 6.30, and is open to all London Freethinkers. The subject for discussion will be "The Position of the Freethought Movement, Now and After the War."

The best possible arrangement will be made for a plain tea on the premises, between the meetings, provided that notification reaches the N.S.S. office not later than ½ p.m. on Friday. The office Telephone number is City 41. This stipulation will be strictly adhered to in consequence of the difficulty in obtaining provisions.

The premises at Chandos Hall include a proportionately commodious and sound basement. Air-raiders may accept the intimation that not being invited, no welcome will be extended to them!

E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

SAINTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—The verse in question (Freethinker, Sept. 23) is a variation of a rhyme in a book of doggerel verses by Professor Marshall Hall, Professor of Music at the Melbourne University and President of the Conservatoire of Music. My memory gives it:—

King David and King Solomon
Lived merry, merry lives,
With their many, many lady friends,
And their many, many wives;
But, when Old Age came o'er them,
With its many, many qualms,
The Younger wrote the Proverbs,
And the Elder wrote the Psalms.

A heresy hunt was started by the local Calvin, a certain Dr. Rentoul, Presbyterian, who claimed that the Professor was an Atheist, a free-lover, and a general corrupter of youth, and cited this thin booklet of "pomes" as proof.

In the legal wrangle which ensued a great lot of money was, I doubt not, raked in by the counsel on each side, and in the end the Professor had to accept notice at the end of two more years, when the contract under which he held one of his posts came to an end. I believe he is a still in his University chair.

The only other rhyme of interest in the book was, perhaps, the one that chiefly wrankled in the Presbyterians hide. It ran:—

Some think this and some think that,
According as they're lean or fat.
Those that cannot think at all,
Theologians we call.

Mr. Joseph Symes published a series of articles pouring scorn on the heresy hunters, and Prof. Marshall Hall was sufficiently courageous to pay him one or two visits, to thank him for his support.

This happened about 1899 when I was on the staff of the paper.

Views and Opinions.

"Blasphemy" in Nigeria.

Some timo ago we received a letter from Lagos, Nigeria, asking our advice about conducting Freethought propaganda. We gave what advice we could, and promised any assistance possible at so great a distance, and under conditions that must be very different from those existing in this country. A week ago we received a communication—very much delayed in transmission—which informed us that the work had been commenced and a little journal started, followed by the not unprecedented result of a prosecution. On August 31 the editor of the Lagos Literary Magazine was fined £100 or six months' imprisonment. The fine has been paid, but as it is now proposed to form a properly constituted Secular Society, it does not appear that the prosecution will reap any great benefit from their action.

A Thanksgiving.

The ground of prosecution was an article in the June issue of the magazine entitled "General Thanksgiving." The article would fill about two-thirds of a column of the Freethinker, and its nature may be gauged by the following :—

> We thank thee, O God, for creating us weak and then blaming and punishing us for being weak and sinful.....We thank thee O God, for allowing War, so that men may slay and maim each other. We thank thee, O God, for allowing hatred to continue in the world, when with one word thou could'st have put an end to all hatred.....We thank thee, O God, for creating smallpox, yellow fever, and epilepsy.....We thank thee, O God, for creating Lunatics and Idiots, so that a portion of thy children may be entertained at the expense of the others.....We thank thee, O God, for creating lions and tigers to devour us.....We thank thee, O God, for creating mosquitoes to pest our lives, and introduce disease into our systems..... We thank thee, O God, for sending Thy Only Son into the world to save it, although nearly 2,000 years after the birth of the Saviour the world is as much under the influence of sin and wickedness as ever..... We thank thee, O God, for creating Hell for those of thy children whom thou hast made too weak to resist evil.

This is a fair specimen of the article on which the prosecution was based, and the reason for the prosecution, and for the conviction was that it was offensive to certain people. Who these were we shall see in a moment.

Bigotry in Power.

Section 204 of the Criminal Code for the Colony and Protectorate of Nigeria provides that :—

> Any person who does an act which any class of persons consider as a public insult on their religion, with the intention that they should consider the act such an insult, and any person who does an unlawful act with the knowledge than any class of persons will consider it such an insult, is guilty of a misdemeanour, and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

This, then, is the law of blasphemy in Nigeria. Any class of persons who consider a man has insulted their religion may initiate a prosecution; and, despite the expression "any class," one may reasonably suspect the true reading to be "any class of Christians." Christians will be allowed the same licence of speech with regard to others that they are permitted here. In this case the "class of person" on whose behalf the Attorney-General prosecuted were Bishop Herbert Tugwell, of the Church Missionary Society, Rev. A. W. Howells, Rev. T. A. J. Ogunbiyi, C. W. Wakeman, and H. C. Chanceller, all of the C.M.S., with O. J. Griffen, Superintendant of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, and Rev. Father Terien, of the Roman Catholic Mission. The professional interest is naked and unashamed. And the regulation is one which is, in practice, wholly in the interest of Christian missionary religion. It not only reduces blasphemy to a plain absurdity, but it places the freedom of all non-Christians at the mercy of any "class of persons" who feel themselves insulted. That is, unless the non-Christian is content to be a coward and a hypocrite. In that case the Christian will treat him as a brother beloved. It is the normal consequence of all punishments for opinion to place a tax on honesty and a premium upon hypocrisy.

Getting at the Facts.

Now let us return to the prosecuted article. Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, and Wesleyan Methodist say it is an insult to their religion. Why? Is it untrue that God is responsible for all the evils particularized in the "General Thanksgiving"? If God is not responsible, who is? Surely it is the burden of numerous apologies that God does allow them, either because to prevent them would be an interference with human freedom or because they are part of God's plan of educating the world. Mr. White, the editor of the magazine, was only saying quite plainly what thousands of Christians say with much circumlocution. Bishop Tugwell, for example, is a member of the Church of England, and in the Prayer Book, under the heading "The Visitation of the Sick," the minister is instructed to say to the sick person :—

> Dearly beloved, know this that Almighty God is the Lord of life and death and of all things to them pertaining, as youth, strength, health, age, weakness, and sickness. Wherefore, whatsoever your sickness is, know you certainly that it is God's visitation.

That is clear enough. And it cannot be held that God is certainly the cause of sickness in England but not in Nigeria. And for the other Christians, we may surely refer them to Isaiah :—

> Behold the Lord maketh the earth empty, and maketh it waste, and turneth it upside down.
> I form the light and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil; I the Lord do all these things.

This, again, is quite clear. God does everything. That is the main teaching of the Bible; it is the general teaching of the best Christian theology. God must have created the mosquito, and the lion, and the tiger, and the germs of disease. They are all part of the plan of creation. Lagos Freethinkers are only putting plainly before Christians the teachings of their creed. We are not surprised they feel aggrieved. That is usual with all shams and hypocrisies when threatened with exposure.

A Plea for Reason.

One can readily understand that Bishop Tugwell and his fellow-preachers find it much easier to lock the Freethinker up or fine him than it is to answer him. That is the historic way of dealing with the heretic; and in these out-of-the-way places, where the white officials hang more or less together, it is a method easily put into operation. Bishop Tugwell feels himself insulted on being told that his God made the evil things of the world. Well, in God's name—if we may be permitted a pious ejaculation—if he didn't make them, who did? If the germ of smallpox came without his aid or against his will, by whose will or with whose aid did it come? If one thing could exist without God, why not all? And is there not good scriptural warranty for saying that God prepared hell for the Devil and his angels? One can hardly imagine Satan preparing it for himself. Would the Bishop have been better pleased if, instead of thanking God for all the evils in the world, Freethinkers had blamed him? Let us try and cultivate a little logic. If God is, if he is what Christians say he is, the world is as he would have it be. He could have made it otherwise. He preferred it as it is. And if we are to praise him for the good in the world, must we not also blame him for the bad? It is not the fault of the Freethinker that he draws a logical conclusion from the Christian premises. The fault lies with those who propound a creed which is at once an insult to human intelligence and an outrage on human decency.

We all must come to Thee at last.
(Pile up the Dough).
And though Thy Son said other things;
We'll cinch the quids and quit the wings;
An empty pocket misery brings.
(Pile up the Dough).

The Lord, through light, He led the weak.

He blessed the poor and praised the meek.

And though in Hell with pain you'll stew;
The Bishops know a thing or two
Worth three that Jesus tried to do.

A. F. T.

The Essence of Christianity.

As is well known, there is no authoritative definition of the Christian religion, with the result that after an existence of two thousand years scarcely any two among the millions who profess it are agreed as to what it really is and seeks to accomplish. Indeed, it is safe to conclude that existing definitions of it are literally innumerable. This being the case, it naturally follows that there is no agreement as to that in which the real character of Christianity consists, or as to what quality constitutes or marks its true nature. One popular preacher of a generation ago was in the habit of saying that the essence of Christianity is self-denial, and the same opinion is being frequently expressed to-day. Others declare that the predominant Christian quality is love—love to God manifesting itself in social service. Some who hold this view are convinced that "Christianity and war are incompatible, and that Christianity truly lived is the antidote to war." This is tantamount to a confession that the prevailing religion has never justified its existence. The Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, of Brighton, accounts for its failure by saying that the Churches have never realized what its central message is, and that, consequently, the pulpit has neglected to give it the prominence which it demands. The truth is, however, that social service is not a distinctively Christian duty, but has been enjoined by all the great religions of the world. Others still assure us that the essence of Christianity is "the saving of man in spite of Humanity by One whose life transcended the limits of his birth and nation." Such is the opinion held by Professor J. M. Thompson, of Oxford, to which he commits himself (in the Christian Commonwealth for October 24) and we are bound to admit that there is more truth in it than in any of the other views. Neither self-denial nor vicarious service has ever been exemplified on any large scale by the followers of Christ, except under priestly tyranny, and ministers of the Gospel have more than once, even in the twentieth century, dissociated themselves from mere social reformers, and expressed their pride at being preachers of the Gospel of personal salvation by a mystic union with a crucified and risen Saviour. And, surely, they are right, if the Pauline Epistles and the Creeds are to be relied upon. Paul's one message was that now at length God is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, and the Nicene Creed speaks of Jesus Christ as "the Son of God, begotten of the Father before all worlds, the only begotten, Light of Light, very God of very God,"

> Who for us men, and for our salvation, came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made man, he was crucified for us under Pontius Pilate, and suffered and was buried. And the third day he rose again according to the Scriptures, and ascended into heaven.

With that teaching all subsequent creeds are in full harmony, so that we are perfectly right in affirming that the essence of Christianity is justification by faith through the merits of the crucified Redeemer.

Christianity presupposes human depravity or lostness. Behind all other ideas in it is that of man's total inability to save himself, and of God in Christ's gracious intervention on his behalf. In his timely article on this subject in the R. P. A. Annual for 1918, Professor Gilbert Murray says :—

> It seems to me that the greatest source of the religious emotion is exactly this feeling of "lostness," this feeling that a man "cannot live without Christ." I doubt if a man engaged in full successful activity, satisfying all his social instincts, ever discovers God or the need of God, though, of course, he may continue to use > the "discovery" when once made. It is when the social approval, the sympathy, the human friendship which we normally enjoy, and without which we feel desolate, is taken away that we crave so suddenly for a Friend who will never fail us, and whose support will make up for the world's opposition.

Nothing is more undeniable than the fact that the first duty of the Christian pulpit is to create this sense of lostness and need of a Saviour in all who listen to its voice. Without the doctrine of the Fall there would have been no use for the Christian dogma of the Atonement. Until a man is brought to a realization of his lost condition as a child of Adam, he will never dream of accepting Christ as his deliverer. Some years ago the Rev. Silas Hocking, in a speech at the City Temple, threw vitriolic ridicule on the people who concentrated their attention on the Salvation of their own "miserable souls"; but the audience showed its total disapproval of his action in the most emphatic manner at its disposal, and, without a doubt, the attitude displayed by the distinguished novelist was anti-Christian to the last degree. According to the New Testament and the Orthodox Church, we are all doomed to perish for ever in hell-fire, and our only hope of escape is by putting our trust in the finished work of Christ. And there are facts in the lives of the generality of people which the preacher utilizes in his attempt to bring home to us our need of a Divine Friend that sticketh closer than a brother. As the Professor puts it:—

> Most of us have in our lives periods of desolation or exile, when the world seems to have betrayed us and we crave for some social support—some sympathy or agreement or affection—which is not forthcoming. In the space where we can see clearly, there is no one; but beyond that there is a space that is dim and hidden, and beyond that again the vastness of the invisible; and if in the very great distance we begin to feel that there is a Friend, a Friend very powerful, full of intimate understanding, absolutely faithful, and unlike all the friends who have failed us; a Friend with hardly any distinctive characteristics except those which will satisfy our own hungry desire; how can we escape the suspicion that the very existence of the Friend, and not merely the details of his character, is only the creation and projection of that Desire?

Professor Murray is a fine poet as well as a keen critic. What he discerns with absolute clearness is that there are real human wants which Christianity pretends to be able to supply to our entire satisfaction, and that to multitudes who attend church or chapel the supply is all that could be desired. Clergymen are aware, however, how extremely difficult it often is to convince anxious inquirers that the Gospel story is true; that there is a God who truly loves and cares for them; that Christ died for them and is longing to befriend them; or that there is a Spirit of all grace who longs to accompany them through life. Painfully small, at best, is their success in such a mission. The number of people who verily believe that there is "a Friend behind phenomena" who never fails, is never large, and even they pass through times of doubt and fear. Even they must confess, with Tennyson, that—

> We have but faith; we cannot know.

Every supernatural religion is fundamentally the same. There is no material difference between Christianity and Mithraism. The Saviour God, who dies and comes to life again, is common to most religions. Osiris, Adonis, Attis, Mithra, and Christ are all in the same category. Man's ignorance of Nature has always bred within him the desire to escape from her. This is how Meredith expresses it:—

> Therefore the wretch inclines
> Afresh to the Invisible, who, he saith,
> Can raise him high: with vows of living faith
> For little signs.
> Some signs he must demand,
> Some proofs of slaughtered nature; some prized few,
> To satisfy the senses it is true,
> And in his hand.
> This miracle which saves
> Himself, himself doth from extinction clutch,
> By virtue of his worth, contrasting much
> With brutes and knaves,
> From dust, of him abhorred,
> He would be snatched by Grace discovering worth,
> "Sever me from the hollowness of Earth!
> Me take, dear Lord!"

But escape from Nature is utterly impossible. She is our only real Friend, and that "Friend behind phenomena" is nothing but a myth. Professor Murray says:—

> As long as the discussion of Christianity is concerned mainly with the question of its "truth" or "falsehood," I confess that the orthodox position seems to me as completely remote from the possibility of defence as that of any other traditional religion. Neither the doctrines stated in the creeds nor the supposed history contained in the Gospels will, in my judgment, bear examination.

Thus, even in its very essence, Christianity is a system of incredible myths, which fully accounts for its moral impotence, and justifies the rising generation for its attitude of indifference towards it. Dr. Orchard admitted, in a recent interview, that there is no sign whatever of any revival of interest in it, and that the outlook for the Churches is extremely gloomy.

J. T. Lloyd.

In the Name of the Prophet.

> Who shall persuade the kings that God is not,
> The politicians, usurers, financiers,
> Priests, warriors, that depend on God to bear
> The burden of their inhumanities?—John Davidson.

The clergy assert constantly that England is a Christian country, but the fact remains that the British Empire contains more non-Christian inhabitants than Christian. Prominent among the great religions incorporated within the Empire is Mohammedanism, which, under the Moorish banner, once threatened to overrun Europe. Had not the defeat of Islam resulted, a large part of the world might have become Mohammedan; or, as Edward Gibbon tersely declared, Oxford University might to-day be expounding the Koran.

Yet the Koran, the Bible of the Mohammedans, revered by over two hundred and thirty millions, of whom eighty millions are British subjects, is a little known book in Christian countries. It is a wonderful volume, and, if the arguments by which the divine inspiration of the Christian Bible are worth a straw, this must be inspired also. There is the same apparent incompatibility of the author with the writing: a morality as impressive, the same beauty of language and wealth of Oriental imagery; the same claim to prophecy and fulfilment of prophecy.

The outstanding divergence is that there is no claim on the part of the prophet to work miracles, although the Koran is based manifestly on Jewish legends. The same fictitious characters, Noah, Abraham, Lot, Moses, Solomon, and others, appear again and again. The conception of duty is simplicity itself compared with the tangle of the Christian Trinity. Take the first Sura: "Glory to God, Master of the Universe, the Merciful, the Compassionate, Lord of the Day of Judgment, we adore Thee and implore Thy aid; guide us in the right path." Then, again: "There is no God, but God; God is most great," was a bold message for an Arabian shepherd to bring to a nation that had gods by the dozen, and sharp swords to defend them.

Take the faith as laid down in the Second Sura: "Piety does not consist in turning your faces to the East or the West. He is pious who believes in God, and in the prophets; who, for the love of God, gives of his own to his neighbour; to the orphans, to the poor, to the traveller, and to those who ask; who ransoms the captives, who observes prayer, who gives alms, fulfils the engagements he contracts, who is patient in adversity, in hard times, and times of violence. These are just and fear the Lord."

Chivalry originated in the courts of the Emirs. The knight and the troubadour came from Islam. Together they resummoned civilization, which had gone out in darkness, at the break-up of the Roman Empire. The world at the time was divided. Long since Europe and Asia had gone their separate ways. When they caught sight of each other, the Christian Church sickened with envy and bigotry. There ensued the eight Crusades in which the Papacy pitted Christianity against Mohammedanism, and staked the authenticity of each in the result. The result was that Mohammedanism proved its claim. The Koran was the Bible of the people who, when the Saxons were living in rude huts, had developed a poetic civilization, a social order which had a superstructure of art and of science. It was this that hundreds of thousands of Christians in rusty mail went forth to destroy. But though they could not crush Islam, the chivalry of the Moslems taught them how to conquer themselves. From the victory contemporaneous civilization proceeds.

The conduct of the great Saladin, the Moslem ruler, illustrates the chivalry of the race. When the Crusaders captured Jerusalem, they turned it into a shambles; but when Saladin recaptured it he did not shed civilian blood. On the contrary, he spent large sums of money in alleviating distress. At his death he ordered gifts to be distributed to the poor, without distinction of creed, a noble act in that age. "Take this cloak," he said to one of his servants, "show it to the faithful and tell them that the Ruler of the East could take but one garment into the grave."

The place filled by the founder of Mohammedanism is very prominent. As compared with some other religious systems, Islam possesses great advantages. The text of the Koran was finally settled within thirty years of Mohammed's death, and, so far as his own life is concerned, eulogists and detractors are agreed as to main facts of his career, however their judgment of it may differ. The career of Mohammed may be traced in the stately pages of Gibbon, the picturesque phrases of Carlyle, and in many another volume. An ardent propagandist, the prophet made only thirteen converts in three years. In most communities such propaganda meant death or severe punishment. The execution of Socrates took place after a legal trial in a highly civilized state of antiquity. The charge was that Socrates did not worship the gods and shook other people's belief in them. In the nineteenth century Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism, met his death in a Republican country at the hands of the State soldiery. The reason why Mohammed escaped death was that there was no orderly government. When forced to take the sword in hand, it took him ten years' fighting before he prevailed. The motto on his banner was "God is Great," a motto which has challenged the Trinitarian Christian world for centuries.

Mohammed was a very remarkable man, and his religious system is still a powerful factor in life. Whilst the number of Mohammedans show a tendency to decrease in Europe, and to increase with the growth of population in Asia; in Africa, Islam is being steadily propagated among the tribes, and is increasing constantly. Mohammed's life story is a plain tale. When he first meets us he is in middle life. Several of his relations play an important part in his career. We know the name of his first wife, Kadijah, said to have been fifteen years his senior, yet the mother of a family. The daughters were all married to men of note. He seems, like most of the Meccans, to have carried on a trade; at first accompanying caravans, afterwards selling goods. We even know the name of his business partner. Passionate and well-meaning, he never forgot a benefit. In his age, Ayesha, his young favourite wife, a woman who distinguished herself by all manner of qualities, questioned him concerning Kadijah, his first wife. "Now, am not I better than Kadijah? She was a widow, old, and had lost her looks. You love me better than you did her?" "No! by Allah!" answered Mohammed, "she believed in me when none else would. In the whole world I had but one friend, and she was that."

Yet, after the death of Mohammed, the doom of Islam was sounded. It seems strange that this should be so, for hundreds of cities shimmered with mosques. From thousands of filagreed pulpits the glory of Allah and of Mohammed his Prophet were daily proclaimed. And Moslems possess a good share of the simple virtues. They are said to be temperate, truthful, honest, and hospitable. Yet, as a ruling power, they become a curse to all who fall under their power. They have been trained up under despotism and superstition, and they are capable of the wildest fanaticism. They are proud of their deficiencies, and have an obstinacy in their natures which flames into something worse in the face of opposition.

Islam has a noble and ancient history; but no people can live on its past. She has given to the world one of the immortal books in The Arabian Nights. She has incarnated dreams in architectural marble. Her poets penned manuscripts which throughout the ages retain the perfume of scented gardens. For a long period she was truly powerful in the world, and now she is at the foot of the ladder of progress.

What is the reason of this terrible downfall? The answer is simple. She is the victim of stereotyped religion. To the Moslem, religion is not an amusement, or a social decoration, or a social police force. It is a passion that inflames his nature, and makes all other things trivial. Christianity is open to much of these objections; only there is less religion in it. It is only better as a mild attack of fever is better than a severe attack of fever. Most Christians have the disease at recurring periods, coming on once a week. The followers of Mohammed were more fanatical than the Prophet. The Caliph Omar wished to burn all books except the Koran, which he regarded as the beginning and end of wisdom. This spirit has destroyed the value of Islamism. During the past five centuries Moslems have done nothing for human advancement. They have not made a single contribution to art, literature, science, manufacture, or invention; they have not produced an engineer, or a chemist, or a biologist, or an historian, or a painter, or a musician of the first rank. Its doom is said.

Throughout the civilized world the shadow of death has fallen. The fair fields of Europe are covered with corpses, and the flower of the manhood of many nations is arrayed for slaughter. A world-epoch is dying. While gravediggers are at work at their grim task, a fresh page of history is being turned. On the other side was a dawn which will presently be daylight. The knell of expiring night Nature answers with words of hope. Into a shroud she tosses flowers. Of these many are frail, but one is the white flower of Liberty. It symbolizes the eternal quest of mankind which will one day make all things new, and will change the face of the earth. In that day superstitions will be transformed into the religion of Humanity, and both Christianity and Islamism will be as remote as when the star of Ormuzd burned out in the unquiet skies.

MIMNERMUS.

The Bible and Immortality.

THE OLD TESTAMENT.

ONE of the many superstitions which the Christian religion has borrowed from a remote and ignorant past is the belief that something within man, variously designated mind, soul, or spirit, is capable of existing apart from and independent of the body to which it belongs. Hence, what is usually spoken of as "death" is declared to be only the separation of the "spiritual" part of man from the material portion—the former being an invisible entity that survives death and continues to exist in some unknown locality, and the latter ultimately crumbling into dust. Of the correctness of the last statement there can be no doubt; the only point open to question is the existence of an internal spiritual entity that survives the death of the body. Much inflated nonsense has been written upon the "pro" side of the question, in which reason has been thrown to the winds and well-known facts ignored. It may not, then, be out of place to see if any real evidence can be produced, either for or against, of sufficient weight to be submitted to the Court of Common Sense, whose verdict is the only one of value to-day.

Before entering upon the subject generally, it will be well to see what the Bible has to say respecting immortality. In that ancient volume we find the ideas that were prevalent in two periods of the world's history, with an interval between them of several hundred years. We turn first, then, to the books of the earlier period, those of the Old Testament, written originally in Hebrew, but afterwards translated into Greek some time before the Christian era. It was this Greek translation, usually called the Septuagint, which was used by the New Testament writers, as well as by the historian Josephus. In our search for evidence of immortality in the Old Testament, we have no less than thirty-nine books to examine; but this work can be very much curtailed by the aid of a concordance.

Writing in an old religious publication, Professor Sayce says of the ancient Egyptians:—

> Educated and uneducated alike, all believed after a fashion in the resurrection of the body, the immortality of the soul, a judgment to come, and a heaven and hell. It was in connection with the belief in the resurrection of the body that embalming was practised. But Egyptian superstitions never attracted the Hebrews.

Just so; the Hebrews took all their superstitions from the Assyrians and Phœnicians, who were of the same Semitic race and spoke nearly the same dialect. The Egyptians carried on their embalming during the whole period of Old Testament times in which Israel was a nation, so that the Hebrews must have known of the practice, though they never adopted it. One reason for their not doing so is, that at no period in Old Testament times did the Israelites believe in the resurrection of the body or in a future life. This conclusion is the only one that results from an examination of the thirty-nine books. Nowhere in the pages of the sacred volume, if we search from Genesis to Malachi, do we find it stated that man is an immortal being who would after death "inherit eternal life."

In the story of the "Fall" we are told that Adam was expelled from Eden lest he should "eat of the tree of life and live for ever." He was not immortal then, neither was he told that he possessed a soul that would live in another life; not one word was said upon this subject. Similarly, the Lord God, in his dealings with the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, whom he had taken under his special protection, several times pronounced blessings upon all three; but these had solely to do with their earthly lives. They were to enjoy peace, prosperity, and have a numerous progeny, and after spending a happy time on earth, "be buried in a good old age" (Gen. xv. 15; xviii. 8; xxii. 17; etc.); but nothing was said about such an important matter as life after death—not even to Abraham, whom the Lord called his "friend" (Isaiah xli. 8). The Lord God gave to his three faithful servants every earthly blessing known to him, but he had apparently never thought of "eternal life."

Again, where one would naturally expect to find some mention of immortality, there, as elsewhere, the promise is conspicuous by its absence. In four of the books forming the Pentateuch there are scores of long paragraphs giving instructions to the Israelites through Moses respecting the priests, Levites, sacrifices, the tabernacle, dress and furniture, penalties for various offences, and a host of other matters; but in the whole of the Mosaic law there is not one word respecting a future life. It is thus clearly evident that the Lord God had never thought of giving man such a life.

Furthermore, that the Hebrew deity had no "eternal life" in store for his chosen people is fully proved by the twenty-eighth chapter of Deuteronomy, in which is set forth at length all the "blessings" that would be showered upon them if they remained faithful in their allegiance and continued to worship him (Deut. xxviii. 1-14). These blessings are followed by a long string of the most terrible "curses" that were to come upon all those who forsook him for other gods (Deut. xxviii. 15-68). Every one of these blessings and curses had reference only to their earthly life; there was no heaven, nor no hell; no rewards nor punishments in a future life; there was nothing beyond this world. If the fourteen verses describing the blessings be read, it will immediately be perceived that the Hebrew God knew nothing of any other life than the present; another life after death had evidently never once entered his mind. After carefully reading these verses, it is simply impossible to imagine that a God who had decided to bestow "eternal life" on all who served and obeyed him could intentionally withhold all mention of that future life here.

The same may be said of the Decalogue (Exod. xx.; Deut. v.), in which the only incentive to good conduct is the promise "that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." In 2 Kings ii. 11 it is recorded that the prophet Elijah "went up by a whirlwind into heaven." Assuming the story to be true, this reward was granted as a special favour; but the fact that he went to heaven without dying tacitly implies that there was no life after death.

It may, of course, be contended that an argument based upon silence cannot be valid; that because a future life is nowhere mentioned, that is no reason for supposing that it had not been promised to the nation by the local deity, or that the people themselves did not look forward to it. Such might, perhaps, be the case with regard to some minor question, but it could not possibly be so with respect to such an important matter as a life after death. Such an omission would be like a play of Hamlet without the ghost. If "eternal life" had really been promised, then there must have been a "conspiracy of silence" on the part of all the writers of the thirty-nine books—which, as Euclid says, "is absurd."

There is, however, one paragraph in the Old Testament which should perhaps be noticed. This is the story of the "Witch of Endor." Here, it is often asserted, is a conclusive proof of the immortality of the soul. In our Bibles this woman is stated to have possessed "a familiar spirit"; in the Greek Septuagint she is said to have had "a divining spirit"—the latter being evidently the more correct. This paragraph reads:—

> 1 Sam. xxviii. 8-20.—Saul said to the woman, Divine unto me, I pray thee, by the familiar spirit, and bring one up whomsoever I shall name.....Then said the woman, Whom shall I bring up unto thee? And he said, Bring me up Samuel. And when the woman saw Samuel, she cried with a loud voice.....And the king said unto her, Be not afraid: what seest thou? And the woman said, I see a god coming up out of the earth. And he said unto her, What form is he of? And she said, An old man cometh up; and he is covered with a robe [or mantle]. And Saul perceived that it was Samuel.....And Samuel said to Saul, Why hast thou disquieted me, to bring me up? etc.

According to this story, king Saul saw nothing; he had to ask the woman what she saw. The narrative thus reminds one of a scene at a modern Spiritualistic meeting, in which a lady or gentleman professing to be a "clairvoyant" declares from the platform that he or she sees a "spirit" standing behind one of the persons present, and then, after naming the sex, goes on to describe the apparent age, form, and dress of the alleged apparition. As in the case of Saul, no one among the spectators are able to see the "spirit." The Bible story, if true, proves nothing more than the existence of a number of sharp-witted individuals among the ancient Jewish people, who traded on the ignorance and credulity of the majority. The only point in the story demanding explanation is, Who did the talking (which is here omitted) ascribed to the spirit of Samuel? Assuming the presence of a "spirit" at the seance, that abnormal being was invisible and without vocal organs, its body being in the grave. If, then, any words were spoken, it was the woman who uttered them, and, in doing so, she might probably counterfeit the quavering voice of an old man. Among Spiritualists it is, I believe, generally assumed that a "spirit," whenever it speaks at all, does so by employing the vocal organs of the medium. The two cases are thus very nearly parallel. There is, however, one point in this story that I will have to refer to again.

That the Endor seance is a Hebrew fiction appears evident from the fact that the words supposed to be uttered by the spirit of Samuel are precisely the same as those uttered on a previous occasion by the living Samuel when reproving king Saul in the name of Yahweh (1 Sam. xv. 17-23). Now, the words spoken by the living Samuel were known only to himself and king Saul; consequently the woman could not have repeated them at the seance. That a spirit-Samuel, without brain or vocal organs, could have uttered them cannot for a moment be admitted. We are thus thrown back upon the compiler of the book, who did know of Samuel rebuking Saul in 1 Sam. xv.; for he had written that incident himself—and he probably fabricated it, as he certainly did the story of the seance. All through the book the compiler has glorified the acts of David and disparaged those of Saul, though the latter was one of the best kings that reigned over Israel, and a better man than David.

Having now seen that no promise of "eternal life" is found in the Old Testament, it is not surprising to be told by Christian commentators that immortality is plainly implied in various passages of that volume in which life, soul, or spirit is mentioned. This remains to be verified.

AGNOSTICISM AGAIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Every Freethinker admires the life-work and reveres the memory of Charles Bradlaugh, but I confess that up till now I must have underrated his prowess.

According to Mr. H. Irving, in "Sugar Plums" last week, Bradlaugh appears to have been able to "combat every conception of the Inconceivable." That, truly, must have been a most magnificent tour de force—if it ever occurred! I have my doubts. Will Mr. Irving set them at rest by giving me, not "every," but just one single "conception of the Inconceivable?" If he succeeds, I assure him, I will at once proclaim myself an Atheist, and exhaust all my thought in combating anything so monstrously self-contradictory. Until then, "God," pure or applied, must mean nothing to me; and I must continue to call myself an Agnostic, for, really, my "scorn for lexicographers" is not yet sufficiently developed to reconcile me to a name derived from a word which my philosophy tells me is meaningless.

But this stiff-necked attitude, I am sure, is temporary only, for if your editorial patience be not exhausted, and Mr. Irving be willing to oblige me, I hope soon to see in the pages of the Freethinker the remarkable phenomenon of a man conceiving the inconceivable.

The Blank Wall.

I.

THE stupidity of the modern mind, and more especially of the modern official mind, is well demonstrated by the amazing lack of even elementary psychological knowledge displayed during the progress of this War.

Here, it must or should be obvious to all, we have a flood-tide of barbarism involving both body and mind, which has swept men like an avalanche swiftly away from their homes, wives, children, and peaceful civilian life; all the refining influences of normal human existence have been destroyed in the deluge of war; men have been forcibly dislodged from groves of ordinary civil toil; they have been sucked without mercy into the ravenous maw of an enormous military machine whose sole function is to emphasize their purely animal and primitive propensities. They have been drilled, lectured, trained, and "educated" in the "art of war," that is, in the science of legalized slaughter; prizes in the shape of medals, etc., have been, and still are, offered to those men who are most successful in the business of war. Yet, despite the psychological re-actions inevitable in such a process of organized demoralization, there are a host of terrified official persons raising up their beautiful white hands in horror, not because of war or its natural violation of ideals, but because there seems to be an increase in crime and disorderly conduct at home; or an increase in beer-drinking; or an increase in lust and in animal recreations generally!

During the now almost universal and popular "Picture Paper" ideal of war and the right to kill, men are to remain respectable, law-abiding citizens; models of good behaviour, and, at all times, worthy of the good-conduct medal!

"The Church of to-morrow is not to be built up of prodigal sons," said the Rev. L. Beaumont at the Congregational Conference. It is far more likely to be "built" of daughters who have taken the wrong turning.

The disaster to the raiding Zeppelin fleet has given the ultra pious an opportunity. A Mr. Noel Friston led off with a letter to the Star, asking for general thanksgiving because "God blew with his winds, and they were scattered." Quite a number of other letters followed, calling upon the churches and chapels to appoint a day on which to thank God for his help. But there has been, as is not unusual, a striking paucity of letters on the other side. We have good reason for knowing that this was not because letters were unsent. One Freethinker reader pertinently asked, in a letter to the Star, "If God was responsible for the wind, I cannot imagine why it was not sent before many women and children were mutilated and killed? A Te Deum might have been excusable had this terrible War been avoided, not when it has been in progress over three years."

That seems to go to the root of the matter, and, presumably, the letter was not printed because it went straight to the point. Imagine thanking God for dispersing the Zeppelins after he had permitted them to kill seven children in one family, in addition to many others! And what of the Zeppelins which came and killed, and escaped unscathed? And of the various aeroplane raids? If God can scatter the one, why not the other? And what are we to think of a God who can only do something after the mischief has been accomplished? The crowning irony is that God permitted the Zepps to kill in Christian England and brought them down in Freethought France! All these newspaper pietists succeed in doing is to make God as ridiculous as themselves. If a man really believed that God could and did disperse the Zeppelins, it would be far more manly to "curse God and die" than to live and praise such culpable negligence or gross brutality.

The Bishop of Woolwich is resigning after Christmas. He thinks Woolwich requires a younger man, with more energy than he possesses, to deal with the new problems that exist. We suppose this is a diplomatic way of saying that all is not well with the Church in Woolwich. We know Freethinkers are active in Woolwich, and their efforts are bound to have some effect. We suggest to them the need for organization. Isolated effort is bound to involve a deal of wasted energy.

On Friday, October 26, Mr. Lloyd George entertained at breakfast about thirty ministers of all denominations. We may take it for granted that Mr. Lloyd George would not have done this unless he had wanted the clergy to do something for the Government. And we may be equally sure that the clergy will not do it unless they get something in return. So we shall await developments with some little interest.

An evening paper says, "Every piece of bread saved brings us an hour nearer complete victory." Perhaps the 50,000 clergymen in this country, who are too proud to fight, will help matters by suspending communion services.

With the fear of Disestablishment in their hearts, pious penmen are writing of "The Awakening of the Welsh Church." Quite poetic. The trump of doom ought to wake the dead.

Writing in the Sunday Pictorial, Mr. Horatio Bottomley says that "the simple French peasantry are keeping their faith, humbly believing in the undestroyed Madonna and in the indestructible Child." This is really very thin, even for the readers of a Sunday paper with a large circulation. "Simple peasantry" everywhere are very liable to "keep their faith." They have very little else to keep.

Brother Bottomley is one of the toughest converts that Christians have ever had. Christ said: "Love your enemies," but Brother Horatio shouts: "Give them Hell, now!" And there can be no question that the latest convert is far more popular than the founder of Christianity. This gives point to the Gallic jest that Christ was the first and last Christian.

The Bible says that the Lord slumbereth not nor sleepeth. Even if he had any inclination that way, the Christians would not grant him a moment's indulgence. Just now they are committing assault and battery on his holy ears. The Americans have held a "national day" of prayer for success in this War. This has meant a great outpouring of talk; but all the other Christian Churches are also bombarding "the Throne of Grace." Every humane person will ejaculate, "Pity the sorrows of a poor old Deity!"

Journalists are often very inaccurate. The Nonconformist Daily News recently referred to Richard Baxter, the dissenting divine, as the author of The Saint's Rest. Baxter wrote a famous work, entitled The Saint's Everlasting Rest, and he also wrote a number of tracts, one of which was entitled A Shove for A Short A —— d Christian. The Daily News scribe is, in all probability, unacquainted with either.

The refusal of the House of Commons to sanction the proposal of the Government to pay a royalty to the ground landlords on all petroleum found on their land has brought to the front the question of mining royalties in general. While this is before the public, we hope the question of the mining royalties enjoyed by the Church of England will be remembered. From Durham alone the royalties amount to between two and three hundred thousand annually.

The action of the Convocation of Canterbury in deleting some baharic portions of the Bible from the Prayer Book has aroused the ire of some of their fellow Christians. The Council of the Church Association has passed a resolution regretting "the public slight put upon certain of the Psalms by the recent high-handed action of Convocation." The resolution concludes that such Psalms express a "righteous vengeance upon the working of evil." The best comment upon this precious resolution is to take a typical instance from the Psalms, such as "Happy shall he be, that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones." There is a great deal of "frightfulness" in the Holy Book, as well as much Oriental nastiness.

The Bishop of Chelmsford is in the doleful dumps. In his address to the Diocesan Conference he had very little of an encouraging character to say. He charged the newspapers with general unfairness to the clergy in their relation to the War, and he could cherish no hope of any improvement until the editors got born again. "Until newspapers are controlled by regenerate editors," he said, "the Church, and especially her clergy, must expect to be misrepresented." Editors ought to be profoundly thankful that there is a Lord Bishop who knows exactly what is wrong with them, and what they must do in order to be set right.

But the Church herself, as well as newspaper editors stands in need of regeneration. The Bishop pointed out "that to allow the present state of affairs in the Church to continue was to head straight for disestablishment." Disestablishment would be a fearful calamity for both Church and State; but even that would be infinitely better than a continuation of existing conditions. So the Bishop's motto is "Church Reform or Disestablishment." As a matter of fact, the State has grown almost hopelessly degenerate, and is now seriously considering whether concubinage should not be adopted as a legal substitute for marriage. His lordship's demand is this: "If you, the State, won't grant us self-government in conformity to the laws of God, then disestablish and disendow us as quickly as you can."

The Bishop of London's public utterances aid the gaiety of life. Recently he said: "Many people are doing very little to win the War." Was he thinking of the thousands of clergy who are exempted from military service?

The clergy are notorious for their reckless statements. One much in favour is the libel concerning the heavy increase of drinking among women. At the Stratford Police

Digitized by Google

Court, near which there is a population of over half a million, the presiding magistrate said: "People who did not know what they were talking of were complaining of heavy drinking amongst women, but it was an absolute libel on the district."

"The educated woman is becoming more and more the backbone of civil life," says the Bishop of London. In the ages of faith the dear clergy moderately regarded woman as a mere sub.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle says that "Christianity must change or perish. It had delayed the change overlong, until the Churches were half empty, women its chief supporters, and both the learned classes and the poorest were largely alienated from it." The parsons will be delighted at this unsolicited testimonial.

The War Office has declined the offer of the Bishop of London to raise a Parsons' Ambulance Corps, on the ground that it "would be most difficult to work and maintain, and experience showed that it was doubtful whether, if established, it would last." This is a fine example of the snub courteous.

At Prescot, near Liverpool, there lives a family named Duddle. Mr. Duddle and his wife quarrelled, and the husband turned her out of the house at the point of a poker. Mrs. Duddle then summoned her husband for desertion, and, in adjourning the case, the chairman said the Bench would ask Mr. Case, the court missionary, to report. And Mr. Case, the dear good man, said that in his opinion one of the parties—we do not know which as the report is somewhat mixed—was "totally unfit" to have charge of children, as he, or she, did not believe in a hell. What a nice man Mr. Case must be! For our part we should hesitate to give Mr. Case control of a dissipated tom cat.

The Church has been described as a sleepy institution, but a London daily paper recently expressed the sentiment in felicitous language. It stated that the Rev. W. Summers, of Dane Hill, Sussex, "has passed away in his sleep. Deceased who was in his eighty-fifth year, had always expressed a wish to die in harness."

The dear and dull Daily News never forgets to cater for its Nonconformist readers. A short time since it published a couple of paragraphs entitled "Ezekiel on War Bread," and referred to the verses as a "Biblical precedent" of present-day conditions. What nonsense is this? Ezekiel's "cookery" would be sufficient to make the bronze lions in Trafalgar Square roar defiance.

It is curious how many minor writers and journalists are dropping into a theological vocabulary. Here is Mr. James Douglas, who is old enough to know better, describing a tenth-rate foreign poet as "the devil, the very devil." So many pious folk bestow that title on the religious maniac who occupies the throne of Germany.

Apparently, some of the Y.M.C.A. huts are not entirely given over to refreshment catering, billiards, and entertainments. A newspaper paragraph announces that a Royal Princess attends the religious services at one of the huts, and takes charge of the music. A princess at the piano should be quite a star attraction.

How hysterical some of the clergy are! The Rev. R. J. Campbell says that the present is "an age of Agnosticism in theory, and Materialism in practice." Is that the reason he left the Nonconformists and joined the ranks of the Government religion?

We were pleased to see Earl Russell calling attention, in a letter to the Daily News, to the distinction between Conscientious Objectors who are religious and those who are not, as drawn by the Bishop of Exeter. The Bishop argued for respect and consideration in the one case and harsh treatment in the other. As Earl Russell says, few have exposed the intolerance of the Church so openly as this Bishop. What we now desire to point out is that this attitude is much more common than Earl Russell imagines. It has been the usual attitude of most members of Tribunals. Many of the ignoramuses have said plainly that an objection that was not based on religious grounds could not be a conscientious one. Conscientiousness and religion were to them synonymous terms, even while they were demonstrating their own weakness in the possession of the former quality.

The Harrogate Advertiser gives an account of a most remarkable clergyman. The Rev. J. Chalmer Lyons, of a local Presbyterian church, is in the habit of giving ventriloquial entertainments. He gave a performance before a soldiers' camp, and greatly interested an Atheist soldier. This same Atheist soldier was so taken up with the entertainment that he came again and again, and "this led to his conversion by Mr. Lyons." There is excellent authority for this story—namely, Mr. Lyon himself. All the same, we should dearly like to know the name of this converted Atheist. And why will converted Atheists always conceal their names? But Mr. Lyon is evidently a remarkable man, and so truthful.

There was no need for the Daily News to begin it, but having begun it, it should have ended it. The writer of the "Daily Notes" on the leader page gave the other day what it called a Bible precedent for War bread. It quoted Ezekiel iv., verse 9-12: "Take thou also unto thee wheat, and barley, and beans, and lentils, and millet, and fitches, and put them in a vessel, and make thee bread thereof.....And thou shalt eat thereof." At this point the dear D. N. breaks off, right in the middle of the twelfth verse. It left out the instructions as to what the mixture was to be baked with. The crowning ingredient was evidently too much for the stomach of our pious contemporary.

The Sunday Herald says that "the heads of the Catholic Church in England can be trusted to look after themselves." The same remark may be applied to the clergy of all the Churches.

A new book bears the title, The Great Unmarried. Happy thought! Perhaps it refers to the Bishop of London.

The Rev. R. J. Campbell says: "Psychical research is not a substitute for religion, and neither is spiritualism." The 50,000 clergy in this country need have no fear of unemployment at present.

The Russian Executive has decided to dispense with the assistance of the clergy in the government of the country. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why the English Tory press is dissembling its love for the Russian Revolution.

The newspapers state that leaflets are being circulated in the German trenches advocating the advantages of polygamy. It is really wonderful how these German "Atheists" derive their ideas from the Bible.

Sir Arthur Yapp, director of food economy, says, "I want the Churches to lend a hand." Does this imply fewer tea-fights, or communion services without bread and wine?

The Bishop of London poses as an admirable Crichton, and, although a bachelor, often advises married folk as to their duties. One of the latest examples of episcopal wisdom was, "Beef steak and gin are not the best things for children three months old." Does his lordship realize that there is a war? At the present prices of these luxuries, only wealthy persons could so indulge their offspring.

Dr. Horton has published his Autobiography, but he omits a good story of him once popular at Oxford University. He once said in a sermon: "I wear no clothes to distinguish myself from my Christian brethren." This resulted in a local caricature representing the reverend doctor in the pulpit wearing nothing except a white tie and black gloves.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

November 4, Abertillery; November 18, Birmingham; November 25, Nuneaton. December, 2, South Shields.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—November 18, Manchester; November 11, Glasgow; November 12, Falkirk.

F. H. BLAKEY.—You appear to be doing all that lies within your power to help the Cause, and no one can do more. See "Acid Drops."

C. W. MARSHALL.—Many thanks. The citations are extremely interesting and useful. Your interest in the Freethinker is very encouraging, and we think we are doing the best thing in keeping it unchanged as long as possible, however hard the struggle.

T. DOBSON.—We are proud to have the good opinion of so old a Freethinker as yourself. We feel quite sure that your steady devotion to the Cause has influenced many others in the right direction.

ROGERS GEORGE.—"My host has the look of a good sportsman" is a very near rendering of the passage sent.

J. H. LANGFORD.—Glad you think the Manchester meetings were full of good promise for the future. We think so, too.

J. W. WHITE.—We shall not fail to take advantage of your suggestion when we are in that neighbourhood. In most places propagandist movements have their ups and downs, but one need not get discouraged over that.

F. BARRACLOUGH.—We presume your idea is that the very absurdity of a "National Day of Prayer" would help to drive many into Freethought. In that we agree.

E. H. OLD (Dunedin).—Mr. Cohen has not had a portrait taken for very many years, and we regret that he has not one he could send. We are afraid yours is not the only place in which religious influences control the press.

A. SPENCER.—Will try and find room as soon as possible.

F. CHADWICK.—Sorry want of space prevents our publishing your communication.

W. WHILEHAVEN.—When the Curate of St. John's said to the soldiers "We have all done our best; you as soldiers on the battlefield, I silently did mine. You fought and got badged, I prayed and cadged"; he must have raised a smile on the faces of many who listened.

J. G. DOBSON.—We are not surprised to hear that since you induced your newsageut to take a number of copies of the Freethinker on the condition to take back all unsold copies, you have only had a "chance one" now and again to take back. This is an excellent plan, and others have found similar results when it has been adopted.

J. A. REID.—That the late Professor Kingdon Clifford was a much more accurate thinker than Sir Oliver Lodge will not, we think, be disputed by anyone who has carefully studied and compared the two.

A. M.—Our point was, that in allocating to religion the sphere of the "Unknowable," Spencer was really endorsing the opinion that belief in God rests on no other basis than that of ignorance.

DR. B. DUNLOP writes: "Mr. J. T. Lloyd says that the struggle for existence will never be abolished. But surely the era of Freethought is coming when very few people in the world will have more than two children."

E. POYNTON.—Please send on the MSS. Very pleased that an avowal of Atheism has led to no unpleasantness in the Army so far as you are concerned.

T. MOSLEY.—We saw the notice of Determinism to which you refer. Naturally, we agree with it.

R. WILSON.—A Church magazine which says so little about Jesus or Christianity, as the one you enclose, may certainly be regarded as a sign of the times.

WEKERMTHEMES.—Sorry we can't offer an explanation of what you say you saw. We should have to know very much more of the incident before we could venture. It is probably a case of counting the hit and forgetting the misses.

E. B.—Thanks for more than usually interesting batch of cuttings. We hope to notice at some length, so soon as we can find space, some of the works referred to.

G. D. SIDE.—See "Acid Drops." You were evidently too logical and too straight—unforgivable sins in connection with religion.

R. H. ROSETTI.—Yes; your letter must have gone astray. We never received it. Pleased to hear from you, however, and to know you are well.

G. B. TAYLOR.—After fifty years at sea, no one will deny your having done your share, or contest your right to a rest. We wish you continued good health to enjoy it. Pleased to hear that you get more sense out of the Freetkinker than from any other paper.

D. D.—For your own sake we wish your contribution was equal to your ambition, but it would make no difference to our appreciation of what is done.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

By some means a paragraph we had written on Mr. Lloyd's visit to Abertillery on October 21 got mislaid, and so failed to appear in our last issue. We were glad to learn that the meetings were very successful, the hall being crowded both afternoon and evening. Everyone was highly delighted with the visit. To-day (November 4) Mr. Cohen lectures there in the same hall, and we hope the experience will be repeated.

The Interim Conference, held last Sunday at the Chandos Hall, resolved itself, as it was bound to do under present conditions, into a meeting of London members. The only exception was Mr. R. Chapman (South Shields), whom we were very pleased to see present. After some formal resolutions were disposed of, the rest of the afternoon and evening was devoted to a general discussion of topics in which all Freethinkers are more or less interested. That is an idea which may admit of greater development in the future.

The meeting on Sunday last expressed regret that Branches of the N. S. S. had not availed themselves of the resolution passed at the Annual Conference, asking that reports of meetings be sent to the Freethinker, and which the editor had promised to insert. The General Secretary had reminded Branches of this, but without avail. And, of course, the editor cannot insert what he does not receive. Branches are helped in every possible way by the Freethinker, and if enough reports are sent in, they could be placed under a separate heading. But they must reach this office by Monday evening or first post on Tuesday. The better way would be for Secretaries to send their reports on Sunday evening. Only a few lines are needed, and that could easily be done after the meeting had concluded.

As announced in another column, we have decided to close the Sustentation Fund on November 20. This will enable the last list of subscriptions to appear in the issue dated November 25. When the Bowman Bequest Case was decided in the House of Lords we had to explain, as a result of letters that reached us, that the Freethinker benefited in no way from that bequest. Other communications that have been received since force us to again make this clear. The Freethinker does not receive anything, either by way of subvention, or by way of payment for advertisement, from either the National Secular Society or from the Secular Society, Limited. And it, therefore, has no pecuniary interest in the Bowman Bequest. The whole of that bequest is intended, and will be available, for propagandist purposes in the shape of lectures and publications.

Although we have not said much lately about the fight with the L.C.C. over the sale of literature in the parks, it has been going on all the time. Following the hearing of the case in the Police Court, when a fine was inflicted, the Committee of Protest instructed Counsel to make application for a rule nisi for a mandamus ordering the Council to set on one side its resolution prohibiting all sales, and to decide each case on its merits. The rule was at once granted, and came on for hearing before Justices Darling, Avory, and Sankey, on October 23. After arguments from Counsel, the Court, by a unanimous decision, made the rule absolute, Mr. Justice Darling remarking that he "was unable to see how the Court could give judgment in any other way without disregarding the rule and construction of the law."

This decision represents a complete rebuff for the L.C.C., the members of which were evidently under the impression that they could wipe out a public right by a general resolution. The Council has still the right of appeal, but it would be well advised to let the matter rest where it is. If it does, then the London ratepayers may be asked to express an opinion on what the Star well called "an insane waste of time and money." Of course, so far as the Protest Committee is concerned, this result has not been gained without much hard work and a considerable expenditure. On that latter point something may be said later. But Mr. Verinder, who is Chairman of the Committee, has spared no time or trouble in the matter, and there has been a considerable addition to the work of Miss Vance, who has acted as Secretary. Mr. Cohen is on the Committee as representing the National Secular Society.

Freethinkers will welcome the appearance of Mr J. M. Robertson's new work, The Jesus Problem: a Restatement of the Myth Theory (Watts & Co., 5s. net). The present work is a following up of The Historical Jesus published last year and is intended to be a concise exposition of the myth theory of the origin of Christianity. Starting from a primitive and pre-Christian-Saviour-God cult, Mr. Robertson attempts—we think successfully attempts—to recreate the conditions, religious, social, and economic, that led to the establishment of historic Christianity. And, while the very nature of the subject precludes anything in the nature of demonstration, most unprejudiced readers will grant that Mr. Robertson makes out a strong, and, in most respects, an unanswerable case. In this connection the two chapters on "The Evolution of the Cult" and "Organization and Economics" stand out with special strength. The only word of criticism we have to offer is that, in our opinion, this work, as well as the one that preceded it, would have an added value for the general reader if it pursued a more uniform line of exposition, with less attention paid to the utterances of other writers on the same subject. We say this without in the least detracting from the value of an important piece of constructive writing.

The Cambridge Magazine records the death of Mr. F. C. Thompson, of Trinity, wounded on October 2, and who died on the following day, at the age of 29. He was placed in the first class, first division of the Classical Tripos, and, says the Cambridge Magazine,— > in spite of the fact that few men ever did more hard work in the space of three years, he found time, unlike most classics, to take sufficient interest in ideology to lose his Faith completely. He was one of those "Undergraduates mostly scholars of their Colleges" who, in 1909, addressed a letter of congratulation to the late Master of Emmanuel, Mr. Chawner, assuring him of their support in his courageous attempt to expose the Conspiracy of Silence by which the majority of Deans and Tutors succeed in preserving their charges from heterodox discussion.

We are indebted to a correspondent for a priced catalogue of a recent sale of autograph letters, in which four by Shelley realized no less than £369. One letter on eternal punishment is described by the auctioneers as "very extraordinary," and the catalogue gives from it the following sentence:—

> I am not convinced. If God damns me, even by making me my own hell [as indeed sometimes, when I am in an ill-humour, he does in this life] it by no means follows that I must desire to be so damned. I may think it extremely disagreeable, as I do, to be in an ill-temper, and wish to God that God would not have damned me in this or in any other manner.

We should very much like to see the whole of this letter. Coming from Shelley, who deliberately wrote himself Atheist, we suspect that much better things remain unquoted.

This evening the North London Branch debate is on the question "Should an Industrial Conscription Scheme include Women?" It will be opened by Miss Evans of the Women's Freedom League, and replied to by Mr. A. Eagar. Ample opportunity is afforded for discussion by Members of the audience, and the Committee cordially invite women of all shades of opinion. For time, etc., see Guide Notice.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

WE have decided to fix November 20 as the closing date of this Fund. This means three more issues of the Freethinker in which acknowledgments will be made, and by that time everyone who wishes to subscribe will have had an opportunity of doing so. Some subscribers have suggested keeping the Fund open during the continuance of the War, and others that the anticipated deficit for the current year should be subscribed in advance. So far as the first suggestion is concerned, we have a dislike to keeping a subscription list open indefinitely if it can be avoided. So far as its success is concerned, if enough were raised to meet the recurring deficit our task would be so much easier, and there would be no need to reopen the Fund next year. In that matter we are quite in the hands of our readers. But all will please note that the Fund closes on November 20.

Below is the list of acknowledgments to date:—

Eighth List of Subscriptions.

Previously acknowledged, £323 8s. 5d. S. Dobson, 4s. Anon (Manchester Meeting), 2s. 6d. Deneb (2nd sub.), 2s. 6d. T. Mosley, 2s. 6d. E. Pankhurst, 2s. 6d. M. Pankhurst, 2s. 6d. G. B. Taylor, 2s. 6d. AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL.

It was as a young curate in Trinidad that doubt first assailed my soul. I mention this because it was doubt in the end that sealed my career as an Anglican clergyman—the utter inability I experienced to believe implicitly all I was required to teach, and the hopelessness, the misery, the impossibility, of remaining in a calling which every tradition of honour and honesty, and every vestige of decency and good feeling, demanded I should abandon once and for all. But it took me seven years to reach a final decision and to arrive at a moment when, penniless and without a single earthly prospect, I threw off my black coat and white tie and emerged once again in the world a free man. All this, of course, I will describe later; for the present I will endeavour, as best I can, to describe the actual working life, as well as the mental condition, of a man into whose heart and mind was gradually creeping a doubt as to the possibility, let alone the probability, or the truthfulness or otherwise, of the dogmas and doctrines he was required to teach, with behind him that very infallibility, at which even the Anglican clergy jeer when they denounce it as it thunders out its decrees from the papal chair of Rome. In a way, so far as my ecclesiastical education was concerned, I never had a chance.—Raymond Blathwayt, "Through Life and Round the World."

The Story of the Sugar Industry.

IV.

(Concluded from p. 677.)

In 1871 France was the foremost beet sugar-producing State; Germany was then far in the rear of her rival. The German Government, however, promptly busied itself in establishing its native sugar industry on a firm foundation, while the French producers and refiners remained without State aid. And while the German producer paid a duty on the weight of his roots a powerful inducement was furnished to the farmer to raise roots containing an increased percentage of sugar juice, as he was taxed on the weight of his crops and not on their sugar-yielding capacity. This system promoted both a rapid increase in the richness of the roots and a constant improvement in the extractor's art. Superior culture and refining were thus rewarded by handsome profits. In France, unfortunately, the factories were forced to pay the full sugar duty, and no encouragement seems to have been offered to the progressive farmer or manufacturer.

In 1871 the French produced 284,444 tons of sugar, but in 1884 no increase was apparent. On the other hand, the German output had risen during the same period from 186,000 to 1,123,000 tons. Confronted with this startling disparity, while realizing that their rivals had not only vastly increased their production, but that the percentage of sugar yielded by their beets had advanced from 8·28 to 11 per cent., whereas the yielding qualities of French roots had remained stationary at a mere 6 per cent., the Republic determined in 1884 to imitate the German example. A low duty based on the very poor yield of the French crops was imposed with revolutionary results. The author of The Statistical Aspect of the Sugar Question, George Martineau, states that:—

> Better seed was sown in France, better methods of manufacture were adopted, the diffusion process was substituted for the old hydraulic presses, and the yield of the sugar began to rise by leaps and bounds. From 6 per cent. it soon went up to 7, 8, 9, and 10 per cent. But as the French producers were allowed the full drawback (the money refunded by the excise on the exportation of excisable commodities of home manufacture) on exportation although they were paying only a small fraction off the duty on the sugar they produced, the revenue began to show a great and constantly increasing loss.

The profits of the French manufacturers reached in 1886-7 the huge sum of 91,966,437 francs (£3,678,657). Sugar was then taxed in a more discriminating manner; profits fell, but from 1884 to 1896 the yield of beet sugar had risen from 6 to 11 per cent., while the crop had increased from 265,000 to 668,000 tons.

In 1888 the German Government began to modify its earlier policy and slowly changed the system, whereby it charged a duty on the roots to a method which taxed the sugar actually manufactured. In 1892 this change was completely accomplished, and all the sugar produced became liable to duty, while the makers continued to enjoy a bonus on exported sugar. In 1871 the German exports of refined sugar were 5,809 tons, but the expansion was so immense that in 1896 they were 760,657 out of a total production of 2,000,000 tons.

In France, Austria, and Germany, great sugar industries have been developed, although Austria has proved itself an expert in the art of muddling through. In that country for a long period State interference was of very questionable benefit either to the Exchequer or the consumer. Prior to the War, Russia produced more than one million tons of beet sugar annually, but the price has always been extravagant to her own people. The production in Russia in 1875 was 159,000 tons only. From the same year onwards German raw beet sugar exports, although subject to variation, have been fairly steady, while the Austrian exports have varied widely from season to season. The exports from France have fluctuated enormously. They have fallen to 3,000, and have risen to 300,000 tons in different years.

In its infancy and adolescence the beet industry was artificially fostered, developed with giant strides, and easily outran its competitor the sugar-cane in the world's markets. Now that the beet product is of age, it is supposed to be able to stand alone. A few support the view that the cane still possesses a promising future. But that is no reason why the beet should not be extensively cultivated in the British Isles where we ought, at least, to produce a third of the sugar we consume.

From the standpoint of production the cane—a tropical or sub-tropical plant—has several advantages over the beet. Its yield per acre is much heavier, and its methods of manufacture have undergone great improvements, but the cane sugar plantations are thousands of miles across the ocean, while the European beet growers and refiners have their customers near at hand. At present the largest sugar-consuming population of the Old World is shut off from its usual sources of supply. Hence the sugar famine. In the words of a shrewd observer:—

> With a market for 1,600,000 tons of sugar at our doors, and a good soil and climate, we import it all and read the sugar market report day by day under the cheerful heading of "Foreign Produce." Germany, in the meantime, with a home demand not much more than half of ours, not only supplies all her own sugar but has, every year, more than a million tons for exportation, half of which is refined sugar. These are curious facts, of which the general public, and even our rulers, know little and care less.

The American Government having sugar industries of its own to care for was determined that these should not suffer ruin at the hands of European bounty-fed sugar. The astute Americans were perfectly agreeable to an extensive importation of this artificially fostered commodity, but they were careful to see that their Customs reaped the advantages arising from the receipt of foreign sugar at less than its real cost of production. Hundreds of thousands of tons of beet root sugar were unloaded at American ports. The United States revenue was enriched at the expense of Germany and Austria, and the price at which the sugar was retailed in American markets permitted the home producer to realize his sugar at a profit. Incidentally the policy pursued by the States proved the salvation of the West Indian planters who found in North America the only market in which they were protected from cut-throat competition. In a similar manner the Indian authorities secured relief to our own Eastern planters.

When, after much contention, the findings of the Brussels Convention came into force in 1903, and the bounty-fed sugar supply ceased, all the wise men predicted that the price of sugar would at once rise by leaps and bounds. But, somehow or other, the price of the article continued to be regulated by supply and demand. With an abundant suger crop prices were low, and when the yield was below the average, prices rose. In 1904-5 the European beet crop suffered keenly from the prolonged drought, and the sugar yield was nearly one and a quarter million tons below the estimated return. Naturally prices advanced, but many people completely lost sight of the fact that the consumers had placed too much reliance on the products of a small European area for their permanent sugar supplies. This utterly anomalous state of things was the direct consequence of our great dependence upon bounty-fed beets. In 1905 a larger acreage was sown with roots, mainly because of the high prices then ruling. The season proved successful, and a splendid crop was gathered. Prices fell so low that sugar was marketed below the cost of production in August, 1905. More recently consumption has increased faster than production in sugar as in cereals. The high prices of meat and grain cause agriculturists even in the beet countries to favour an increased production of live stock and grain.

In the cane lands these particular factors do not materially enter. Therefore, other things equal, we shall probably in the future depend to a greater degree than at present on cane sugar. Among other, if less important sweetening substances, Palmyra Jaggery deserves mention. This sugar is well known in India, where its juice is drawn from one of the native palm-trees, and run into earthern vessels suspended from a furrowed stick, which permits the flow of the juice into the receiving-pot. A daily collection of the sugar-pots takes place, and the juice is boiled down to the point of crystallization. Noel Paton estimates that this excellent palm sugar yields the respectable total of 560,000 tons annually. In extracting the sugar, the bark of the palm-tree is not incised, as some writers have erroneously stated. "The long flower is tied up and a piece cut off at the top. The pot is tied on, and the juice flows into it. from the wound. It is cut again when the juice ceases to flow, and so from day to day."

With the American sugar maple, however, the juice is extracted by tapping the bark. The annual consumption of this divine sugar in America amounts to 11,000 tons; but the luxury is so highly prized in the land of its origin that it is all consumed there. Sorgum is another kind of sugar extracted from the stalk of a grain-producing plant, but it is very inferior in quality, and is never likely to enter into serious competition with the beet or cane.

The Mincing Lane sugar market still survives, but its glories have sadly faded. The decline and fall of the old West Indian imports led to mournful changes in the Lane sugar centre. Down to the 'sixties, a vast amount of solid business was transacted where a busy speculative market now reigns. The British refiner continues to produce the finest sugar, but he is denied the facilities for delivery which his foreign competitor commands. At every port in our sea-girt isles sugar is unloaded from the vessels as they arrive, and then forwarded to its destination.

There is little doubt that the furiously assailed Brussels Convention, in abolishing the bounty system, helped to preserve the cane industry from destruction. The world requires all the sugar it can obtain, and let us trust that both the cane and beet industries will continue to flourish. After the comparative failure of the beet crop in 1909, Europe was short of sugar, but its troubles were eased by larger supplies of the cane commodity. As a careful writer stated in December, 1909, we should then have been "faced with a shortage of about half-a-million tons in the European needs for sugar were it not for the most welcome increase in the production of cane sugar, and that increase could not and would not have occurred under the bounty system."

"Cleanliness is next to godliness," says the proverb. Yet English people lived without soap till the seventeenth century.

Is There a Religious Revival in France?

I.

IT is an old saying that the wish is often father to the thought. We find how true it is when we note—as we so often do—the emphatic assurance of our religious friends that there is a great revival of the sentiment and practice of religion, and that this alleged rebirth is an outcome of the gigantic efforts we are making to keep the freedom we have so long enjoyed, and to bring the "blonde beast," the Teutonic barbarian, by his own methods of blood and iron, into line with civilization as we know it. Now, it is not unreasonable to think that anything that tends to concentrate a man's efforts, to make him more deeply serious, will also make him more religious if he be already a believer. But, on the other hand, it will also confirm many in their Freethought; for it is not an easy thing to reconcile the bellicose exhortations of the Bishop of Oxford, and others of his type, with the ideal of the brotherhood of man, with the conscientious objections of their Lord and Master. The clerical mind runs naturally to hypocrisy, to humbug, conscious and unconscious. The one thing that will save humanity, we are told, is a revival of worship; therefore, signs of this revival must be found, even if common sense and logic go by the board. I, for one, must confess not to have found any trace of such a rebirth, although I have kept a sharp look-out. The Churches are certainly not better filled now than before the War, when the papers were lamenting their emptiness. The men who are now in the trenches may all be profoundly religious, or they may not. It is possible that they may not want to hurt the feelings of a chaplain whom they have found a good fellow, although a bit of a fool. With the prospect, at any moment, of a violent issue out of all their afflictions, they may regard a man's belief or unbelief as a small affair in comparison with what the man is in himself. If the parson be wise—which is perhaps too much to expect of him—he will discount the complaisance of men who are busy with more important affairs, and seek consolation at home in the opportune, if not opportunist, conversion of those buttresses of our intellectual life—Mr. Bottomley and Mr. H. G. Wells. I am assured, by my religious friends, that the support of the combined theological authority of these two gentlemen means a new lease of life for Theism. Yet there are malicious people who insinuate that these earnest seekers after spiritual truth are really pragmatists at heart. They have the impudence to say that for Mr. Bottomley the Deity is a business proposition, and Mr. Wells had found that his studies in sexual ethics were cut out by the profounder knowledge of what the public wants, as displayed by "Victoria Cross" and Mr. Hubert Wales. Not caring to repeat his earlier successes, from the delightful Time-machine to Tono-Bungay, we are told that, heartened by the conversion of his friend, Mr. Bottomley, he determined to discover a new God.

II.

However that may be, and it would no doubt be foolish to attach too much importance to a criticism obviously prompted by malice and envy, my subject here is not the conversion of two distinguished publicists, but the alleged religious revival in France. I must, therefore, ask my reader to look with me at a little book just published, called Recent French Tendencies, by the Rev. G. C. Rawlinson. My excuse for analysing what is really a flimsy piece of work is that it reflects a familiar type of the clerical mind, a type which is complacently satisfied with inadequate knowledge and loose thinking. It has also an airy assumption of omniscience, which is calculated to impose on those who have no means of checking the assertions. It begins with some silly observations about the closing years of the centuries, when, we are assured, writers seem to look back to what has gone before, rather than to what is to come. Now, the hastiest glance at our literature in the periods 1580-1600, 1680-1700, 1780-1800, is sufficient to convince anyone who is not a parson, or has not a theory to support at any cost, that they were pre eminently periods of expansion, of a forward movement, rather than of relaxed vigour and decadence. To labour this point would be to take the reverend gentleman more seriously than he deserves. But if these periods were full of creative and forward-reaching activity, what shall we say of 1880-1900? We are asked to believe that there was nothing but exhaustion in the twenty years that gave us the work in poetry of Francis Thompson, John Davidson, Mr. Yeats, Dowson; the fiction, at the ripest, of Mr. Hardy, Mr. George Moore, Henry James, Mr. Kipling, Mr. Wells, Mr. Frank Harris, and Hubert Crackanthorpe; the literary criticism of Mr. Arthur Symons and Mr. A. C. Bradley; the sociology of Mr. J. M. Robertson and Mr. Havelock Ellis. Did any period ever show fewer signs of being played out?

III.

Mr. Rawlinson is so little acquainted with the history of Freethought in the nineteenth century that he imagines that Huxley dominated the Rationalism of the period, and, what is more amazing, he assures his readers that this amusing, if somewhat belated opponent of Mr. Gladstone and the bishops is still living, as he puts it, a precarious life-in-death in the columns of the Freethinker, and in the books of Mr. Joseph McCabe. I am, unfortunately, not in a position to question his justice to the anti-Christian polemic of Mr. McCabe, for the only things of his I have looked into are a novel and a book on Mr. Bernard Shaw. The novel is an anæmic picture of the full-blooded life of the Italian Renaissance. It might have appeared in the pages of the Christian World under the name of Annie Swan, so little does it remind us of Cellini, or our own Webster. The depreciation of Shaw is as dull as the appreciations of M. Hamon and Mr. Henderson. None of them seem to see that Mr. Shaw is, or rather was—because the War has killed him—a twentieth century W. S. Gilbert. However that may be, the suggestion that the spirit of Huxley lives in the pages of this paper, or in the books of unacademic Rationalists is the last thing in silliness. Huxley was merely doing for educated people what had been done more effectively for the artizan thinker a generation before, and his method, often enough, came in for strongly adverse criticism in these pages, and in the work of Mr. J. M. Robertson.

IV.

So much, then, for Mr. Rawlinson's knowledge of English literature and the Freethought Movement. We shall proceed to note if he is any better qualified to instruct the earnest inquirer to the movement of French thought. Naturally, the Rationalism of the Voltairean type is as hateful to him as it was to Joseph de Maistre, and he has this in common with the earlier writer—he sticks at nothing in the way of abuse. The bitterness he puts into his account of Renan is the measure of the immense effectiveness of the Frenchman's method. He cannot forgive Renan and M. Anatole France their tone of urbane condescension, their smiling refusal to accept Christianity at the valuation of those who believe in it. He notes how, in his witty short story "The Procurator of Judea," M. France makes a point of wounding the susceptibility of Christians. But this was in 1892, and now, of course, M. France has lost his hold on the youth of the country. Presumably they are all mystics, or political pragmatists like M. Bourget! I know some, however, who find Remy de Gourmont more to their taste, his dissociation of ideas being a more powerful dissolvent than anything in Renan's or M. France's critical laboratory. But it is possible that Mr. Rawlinson and his friends have never heard of Remy de Gourmont, whose strong point was the cultivation of ideas.

After disposing of the Voltairean sceptics and wicked writers of naturalistic fiction like Flaubert and Zola, he fills in, in a sketchy manner, the history of Modernism, which I may describe as a sort of Freethought within the Catholic Church. It has attracted some of the best and most thoughtful minds in France; but salvation seemingly does not lie in the direction of reason, it lies rather in that of faith. Much comfort is found in the conversion of Huysmans, who returned to the Church of his ancestors when he had exhausted all the possibilities of sensation. This, however, is not a matter of wonder in a country where Catholicism is a part of the literary tradition. Nor is the return of M. Bourget or Brunetiere to the religion of their childhood any indication of a religious revival. Its significance was in the main personal. Believing and practising Catholics in France have not attached much importance to it. There was always the uncomfortable feeling, as M. Dimnet confesses, that these "intellectual converts might be Catholics—as Voltaire was a Deist—from practical necessities postulating higher principles." In a word, they might be, as so many are, mere political or social pragmatists.

V.

But it is in the younger generation of writers that Mr. Rawlinson finds proof of the revival of belief in France. He makes a parade of three of them: Psichari, a grandson of Renan, Peguy, and M. Paul Claudel, the last being a writer of mediæval mystery dramas in a Whitmanesque prose, and odes that may be sound expositions of Catholic faith, if nothing else. Only a critic who has no reputation to lose would claim them as great writers. They were, or are, good patriots, but not better patriots because of their belief. Now, the misfortune is that for the reader whom Mr. Rawlinson has in mind, a reader but little versed in contemporary French letters, they may seem to represent current thought in France. Nothing could be more misleading. If a few writers and a number of friends make noise enough, there will always be a crowd of noisier acclaimers. We have an example here in the group of gentlemen, young and middle-aged, who are kind enough to afford us amusement and instruction in the pages of the New Witness and the Dublin Review. With the exception of Mr. Chesterton, who is a man of genius, although he is unfortunate in not possessing the "first-class intellectual apparatus" which Mr. Arnold Bennett modestly claims for himself and his Rationalist friends, the bulk of them are men of talent, whose only fault is that they shout a little too much. Now, they do not impose on many of us, but a Frenchman might easily mistake them for an important factor in English thought.

But, after all, an English cleric with a leaning to Roman Catholic dogma and a superficial knowledge of his subject is hardly the best witness to an alleged revival of Catholic belief and practice in France. We have only to take up M. Alfred Loisy's The War and Religion to get at the truth of the matter. He admits that there may be a revival of faith, but only among those who believe already. Those who have not abandoned the religion of their childhood, through conviction and faith, he says, have practised it again with enthusiasm. It is probable, too, that some half-believers have persuaded themselves that they do believe, and so perform the outward acts of faith. The mere taking part in religious acts in camp or hospital does not imply that a man has abandoned his Freethought; rather it is a friendly act towards believers—it is to please the kindly sister or pious lady whose days are devoted to the care of the wounded. For the same reasons an unbeliever may wear a pious medal. He has no wish to hurt the feelings of a mother or sister, or, indeed, of any kindly person who offers one. The Catholic journalists delude themselves if they imagine a Freethinker will be any the less a Freethinker after the War, because the differences between believer and unbeliever do not count in face of the absorbing interest of the moment.

"Among those who die gloriously for their country," M. Loisy tells us, > are some who have retained the feeling of Christian hope, while there are others, and large numbers of them, to whom these feelings are unknown. It is not becoming, that Catholic journalists should have the assurance to try to persuade us that only priests and believers in the old faith know how to die.....A young soldier, who had the faith once but no longer has it, being asked about this spirit of Catholicism, which is said to pervade our whole army, answered thus: "Without any prejudice, I can affirm that I have never known a single soldier, either in the trenches or in the rear, give any proof of the least anxiety about religion." Nevertheless these men do not ignore the fact that they are in continual and immediate peril of death. "They know by daily experience that death may overtake them at any minute; and they do not even think about a future life. I firmly believe that nothing pertaining to religion exists any longer so far as they are concerned."..... It is not for the sake of the God of the Christians that those die who believe on him, nor do they die in order that they may go to him. Certainly it is an august life for which a man will sacrifice his own without grudging it; but it is not for a blessed immortality in the company of Christ and the saints: it is for the life of the country.

Leisure.

(THE CRY OF THE WORKER.)

The murmuring breezes sweetly sing
The music of the spheres;
Within these dreary walls I bow
My weary head in tears.

The honeysuckle fragrance sheds;
The lark sings loud and free;
The cowslip droops its golden head—
Such joys are not for me.

The sunshine cannot enter here,
And laughter dies at birth;
My soul within me faints to taste
The goodly joys of earth.

For those who toil not, neither spin,
My weary fingers ply;
I give them leisure, wealth, and hope—
They grudge me time to die.

Obituary.

The Birmingham Branch has just lost in Mr. J. Terry, who died on the 22nd inst., and was buried at Lodge Hill Cemetery on the 26th, one of its oldest members. Throughout the long period of his membership he was a consistent worker and supporter of the Branch. Always ready to proclaim his opinions and pour scorn on the creations of superstition. He survived his wife only a few months, and the severance of a long and happy union was a heavy blow to him. A Secular Service was read at the grave side, and the sympathy of the members of the Branch goes out to the surviving members of the family.—J. P.

Views and Opinions.

The Decline of Faith.

Following the burst of—call it imaginative rhetoric, concerning the great revival of religion that followed the outbreak of War, preachers are now generally declaring that religion is in a bad way, and that unless something drastic is done the end of the War will bring disaster. But while this change of attitude is striking there is nothing new in the lament. Christian preachers have hardly ever ceased lamenting the lack of interest in religion. And in modern times the complaint has been continuous. People will not attend church; or, if they do, they pay little attention to the teachings delivered or the amount of disbelief is growing. The situation is a curious one. An all-conquering creed is always in danger of defeat. People throw off a religion which, we are told, answers their deepest needs, and for which their whole nature clamours; the intentions of an omnipotent God are baffled by the creatures he has called into existence. A sense of the ridiculous would surely prevent preachers making claims one moment and demolishing them the next. But a sense of the ridiculous might well prevent their being preachers, and even wipe out their religion altogether.

A Cardinal Truth.

Now, as Freethinkers, we are not questioning the truth of the complaint. Every Freethinker knows it is true, and it would be well if Christians, even of the professing variety, set themselves to find out why it is true. Every civilized country in the world grows steadily less religious. That is a statement which does not admit of serious question. And the civilized world grows less religious in the face of enormously powerful influences to keep it Christian. In this country, for example, Christianity is still the official faith. Its financial resources are great, and its social influence extensive. No one gains anything—in a material sense—by rejecting Christianity, its profession opens up many an avenue to advancement. A large army of writers still find it to their interest to support Christianity. Some deliberately write what they know to be untrue; others suppress the truth so that its expression will not interfere with their market. Current periodical literature is "controlled" in a far more efficient way than is sugar. This procedure is sometimes excused on the plea of "deference to public opinion," or because "the public is not ripe for the whole truth to be told." But it is a pitiable condition of things at the best. Yet the facts are, first, that every inducement is held out to a person to profess Christianity; second, that Christianity is admittedly losing ground. Why is this the case?

An Alien Creed.

The answer is partly given, or at least suggested, in the remark made above, namely, the complaint of the preacher is an old one. In the Western world people have been always, more or less, giving up Christianity. That religion has always sat uneasily on the shoulders of the progressive races of the world. And the Churches have in turn been engaged in a constant attempt to modify their teachings so as to suit newer ideas, varied with spasms of persecution to perpetuate orthodox ones. The history of the heresies and persecutions of the Christian Church have at bottom this significance. Sometimes the official Churches have been strong enough to suppress the revolt for a time, only for it to break out in another form. Moreover, Christianity was, to the West, from the first, an alien creed. Its teachings, its ideals, are essentially Eastern. Indeed, it may be said that none of the Western nations possess a religion born of the soil. It was forced upon the West from without, and it has been maintained more or less by force all along. And the unsuitability of the imposed religion is shown by the fact that the revolts against it have been continuous. The underlying fact in nearly all the revolts against the rule of the Christian Church is, that the Western mind was struggling against the dominance of a religious creed alien to it in origin, in spirit, in idea, and in ideal.

Rival Aims.

A religion that was born of contemporary knowledge and needs, one which reflected life, would not need an elaborate official machinery to guard it from attack and to keep it alive. It would keep itself alive; the difficult thing would be to diminish either its vitality or its influence. The aim of Christianity and that of Freethought is here in striking and significant opposition. The purpose of Christianity is to erect a wall round man, to create a world within a world, to perpetuate an artificial environment in which certain ideas may flourish. The aim of Freethought is to break down the barriers which shut off man from the influence of the widest and best knowledge, to expose him to the full current of contemporary life, and to leave all ideas subject to that healthy competition without which the best is robbed of the greater part of their value. The aim of the one is crystallized as "Keep yourself unspotted from the world"; the ideal of the other is "Keep the world free from spot." And these two aims are seen in clear and sharp contrast in the matter of education. For several generations the object of the Churches has been to seclude the child from the full play of contemporary life. The purpose of the religious teacher is to keep certain knowledge away from the child, in order that certain other ideas may develop unchecked and uncorrected. The aim of the secular teacher is to give the child the full benefit of all the world has to offer it, and to so train its faculties that it may use them to the best advantage.

Digitized by Google

The Clash of Cultures.

In addition, Christianity suffers from a disadvantage common to all religions. In a civilized country, religion is not something that man creates, as he creates his art, his literature, or his politics. It is something he inherits. The religions of all civilized people, the gods of every civilized race, come to them from the past. They reflect, of necessity, the life of the time to which they properly belong. Can anyone imagine a modern Englishman, or Frenchman, or American, creating a religion like Christianity with its Virgin born Saviour, its doctrine of blood sacrifice, its heaven and hell, its angels and devils? On the face of it, these represent ideas that belong to another stage of culture than ours. And the attempt to force them upon a people to whom they are wholly unsuited, creates that opposition to progressive ideas that religion manifests all over the world. This struggle is not accidental; it is inevitable. Ideas are like organisms, inasmuch as if they are to live, they must find a suitable environment. And a modern environment is, of all, most unsuitable to religious beliefs. The result is, that in sheer self-preservation, Christianity is driven to perpetuate the past so long as it can. It must obstruct if it is to live. And, of necessity, the fight becomes more difficult with the growth of each generation. Every advance makes the next step easier. The freer human life becomes, the easier for more modern and more progressive ideals to find expression. Long ago the physical sciences freed themselves from the control of religion. The science of biology has almost, if not quite, run the same course. Morals and sociology are, because of their greater complexity and later development, still under the influence of religion. But the same process is at work here; it is evident to all who care to observe it. Life, as a whole, is shaking itself free of religion, and those who are working for the complete emancipation of the human mind know that the wailings of a professional priesthood cannot permanently affect the final result.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Essence of Christianity.

II.

WE cannot call attention too frequently or too emphatically to the fact, now incontestably established by the comparative study of religions, that Christianity possesses no uniqueness or originality whatever. It is simply one of many similar cults. This fact is frankly acknowledged by the most enlightened theologians, who account for it by affirming that in no nation under the sun has God left himself without witness, but that the supreme, final witness is Christ. Their contention is that whilst to all peoples God made a partial and imperfect revelation of himself, the complete and perfect manifestation of his redemptive purpose was granted only to the Jews. According to them, there is some truth in every religion, but the whole truth, in the dazzling splendour of its power, is to be found in Christianity alone. When it is scrutinized with critical minuteness, this claim is seen to be founded on the sand of prejudice, the truth being that the adherent of each cult thinks his own is the truest and most holy of all, and that, in reality, there is very little to choose between them. When they are told this fact, Christians generally are shocked beyond measure, and refuse to believe it; but they are led by ministers who are hopelessly biased against the truth, while the majority are culpably ignorant of its very existence. The essence of Christianity, according to the New Testament and the Creeds, is the doctrine of personal salvation by faith in the atoning sacrifice of Christ on Calvary; and there are thousands of Christians in this country alone who regard this as the distinguishing characteristic of their religion. We have heard it asserted again and again, not so long ago, that the fact of the God-man dying for the sins of the world is peculiar to Christianity, whereas, as now wholly proved, it is common to all the great religions. Pagan mythology abounds with strange stories of God-men and Saviour-Gods doing precisely the same thing. In his incomparable article in the R.P.A. Annual for 1918, Professor Gilbert Murray says:—

> "The Faithful Son" is a protector to the helpless. The women, children, and old men huddle together in their hiding-place from some object of terror; the Young Man goes out and faces the Terrible Thing, slays it or beats it back. Sometimes he dies; then they know he has died for them, and only then their passionate gratitude rises to its full height. Of course, in those religions where human sacrifice was customary the death which the Redeemer faced was often—perhaps most often—the voluntary death at the altar; voluntary death to atone for the sins of others. Ancient religion thrills and reverberates with the splendour or horror of these stories. .....You need a Friend like that; one who has died for you, willingly, deliberately, though he was so much finer and better than you. Only of course he must also be alive; otherwise he would not be there. He died and now lives.

Such is the teaching of mythology on the theme under consideration, and we learn that all the great religions are at once concerning it. For lost and ruined humanity the only possible salvation is through faith in a slain and risen Redeemer. The story, differently told in different religions, but essentially the same, falls to pieces the moment the eye of criticism alights upon it. Now, in mythology, the next in importance to the idea of the Faithful Son is that of the Ideal Mother, and the one is quite as unnatural and absurd as the other. This is what Professor Murray says about the second idea:—

> The Christian Mother has rejected all elements of fertility; she has neither lover nor husband, nor even children except the One. She has as little difficulty as Ishtar herself in combining the attributes of Mother and Virgin; but she rejects from both every element that is not consistent with the utmost ideal of spirituality. The Virgin's purity, the Mother's compassion—these she accepts, but no more. Even the joy and pride of motherhood, a birthright of every mother, is too earthly for her.

The Madonna, though exquisitely beautiful, is a contradiction in terms, and the Faithful Son is equally so. They are both anachronisms, and their survival is exclusively due to the persistence of superstition.

Of course, myths have not been created out of nothing, any more than the material world and its contents. Like logos, muthos etymologically means a word, saying, speech, fable, fiction, story, and is generally employed to signify "a conjectural narrative presented as historical, but without any basis of fact." Myth, then, is a purely imaginary product, or an idea converted into a fact. God is a myth, so is the Christ of theology, and pre-eminently so is the Virgin Mother. Such beings never existed at all save as creatures of the fancy. And yet we would not be justified in concluding that a myth does not rest on a basis of truth. Indeed, behind almost every myth there lies an imperishable truth, which the myth, as a rule, succeeds in effectually concealing. That is to say, the myth itself is entirely false, but the idea out of which it was made represented some fact or truth of Nature. God is man supernaturalized; a chimera; and genuine believers in God have very little, if any, faith in man. The result is, that an imaginary Deity throws real man into the shade and causes him to depreciate himself as a lost and guilty sinner, or a despicable worm. Now, what is the truth of Nature out of which the Christian myth grew, but which, instead of revealing, it in reality hides? Professor Murray says:—

> It speaks to those who are oppressed by the struggle of life, who are half blinded by the brutishness and the cruelty of the mutual devouring that rages round them, and it tells them that the struggle is not the whole of life. In the midst of the struggle there is a seed, weak but for ever growing, which is the antithesis of the struggle. Amid all the wrongs done by man to man, man is not all brute, but he is also God; there is an Eternal Mother brooding over her children; there is an Eternal Brother or Champion who, through love, dies for his fellow-man.

On one point, with due deference, we are forced to differ from the learned Professor. It seems to us incredible that a Supernatural myth expresses a natural truth. Is it not rather true that the Supernatural is conceived as stepping in for the purpose of covering and making up for the defects of the natural? What Professor Murray says about the redeeming forces inherent in humanity is, doubtless, perfectly true; but it is not a truth taught by revealed religion. The Son of God is represented as coming into the world to do for man what man could not possibly have done for himself; not to reveal man to himself, but to save him from himself. Self-trust is a crime, and trust in God the only saving virtue. This is the Gospel story which constitutes the inner essence of Christianity. Well, this Gospel story the Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford calls a myth; but he goes on to say that, if this story were disproved, as it easily can be, "the result would probably be the re-birth of a purified Christianity, because, then, Christianity would be set free from its dogmas, which are incredible, and its historical statements, which are improbable in the extreme, and we should be able to see what it was really aiming at." We maintain, on the contrary, that the result would be the complete disappearance of Christianity. Disprove its dogmas, discredit its historical statements, and how much of the religion of the Cross would there be left? As the late Professor Drummond used to say in his orthodox days, humanity is doomed to remain lost for ever on the natural plane unless the Supernatural dips down, lays hold of it, and lifts it up into its own sphere. This is what Christianity has always claimed to be both able and eager to do, but which it has never succeeded in actually doing. What we need is not "the re-birth of a purified Christianity," but the rediscovery of man as at once the child and the potential Lord of Nature, and as possessing within himself all the faculties calculated, when intelligently utilized, to bring out into full activity the glorious possibilities slumbering within him. He has it in him to be his own saviour and the Saviour of all his fellows.

The reproach has often been levelled against our insular art that it is Philistine. The French artistic sense lifts itself out of that ruck. It may go to the dogs, but it is not Philistine. As a fact, art in France, in all its divisions, is Bohemian. There is no risk that the bulk of our English writers and artists will ever be Bohemian. Miss Marie Corelli and Mr. Hall Caine are eminently respectable, and Mr. Rudyard Kipling is a robust Tory. Nowadays, with us, James Thomsons are exceptional; but so is the genius of that gifted poet who sang of The City of Dreadful Night. If any foreigner shall throw this up in our faces we may take refuge behind the broad backs of Algernon Swinburne and John Davidson. Neither of these singers dwelt beside the still waters. To think of their literary careers is to think of alarums and excursions, of the goddess Grundy in hysterics, of tabernacle calling unto conventicle, of manifold recriminations and vituperations. We may wish that these two poets had not been compelled so often to exchange their pens for their swords; but on their careers all will look with pride to whom the glory of English literature is dear. The bright flame of their enthusiasm has always burned for right issues and nobles causes. Their eagerness for battle has been in the cause of Freedom against conventions and traditions. Swinburne is already a classic, and beyond praise or blame; but John Davidson deserves our attention as he so worthily carried on the splendid tradition of his illustrious predecessor.

John Davidson won his separate place in the literature of our country by his Fleet Street Eclogues and his Ballads and Songs. The appearance of the latter volume raised a storm, for the frequenters of Exeter Hall could not endure his Ballads of a Nun and Thirty Bob a Week. Respectable folk were, indeed, startled. Admirers of the placid and comfortable verses of Lewis Morris were not accustomed to the beauty or the freedom of John Davidson's poems. It was a very long way from the sugary Epic of Hades, which was irreverently called the "Hades of an Epic," to John Davidson's powerful muse.

Like most pioneers, John Davidson had to be content with soldier's wages. In one of his latest books, The Triumph of Mammon, published in 1907, he told his readers he was fifty years old, and that nine-tenths of his time, and that which is more precious, had been wasted in the endeavour to earn a livelihood. He also complained that the age was too commercial, too entirely in the grip of economics, too immoderate in its pleasures of every kind of temporary interest and ephemeral issue, to care for poetry. He pointed out that the mind, the imagination of our time, was not healthy enough, not serious enough, not joyful enough, not passionate enough, for the highest in literature. So John Davidson cast his book upon the waters, and appealed to a court of supremacy—"the dozen superior persons scattered throughout the universe," as it has been called wittily.

Small wonder that John Davidson's later books made a noise in the literary world but brought him little profit. In them he emphasized his belief that Christianity was near its end, and it was upon the great change that this belief involved that he based his poetic visions. For the Christian cosmogony he substituted that of man and science. Being a poet of genius, he breathed life into the terminology of science; for, like Swinburne, he blew everything to melody through his golden trumpet.

The poet's description of a world without Christianity palpitates with passion:—

I, Mammon, mean to make
This mighty world a hundredfold itself,
There shall be deeper depths of poverty,
A more distressing toil, more warlike war,
An agony of spirit deadlier
Than that which drenched Gethsemane with blood;
A rapture of dominion hitherto
Unfelt by conquerors, kings, or priests; a power,
A beauty, and a glory of the world
Emerged from Christendom, like love's belov'd
With April from the wrinkled womb of death,
Delivered fresh to Aphrodite's arms.

Now listen to another passage in which Mammon delivers his message:—

The fanes are ruined, spent,
The adoration that was only fond
Expedient, frantic makeshift for delayed
Self consciousness in men; the truest creed
Dies like a mollusc when you crack the shell.
Instead of temples I bring the universe;
Instead of creeds I offer you yourselves,
The greatness of the universe become self conscious
In flames and crimson seas we shall advance
Against the ancient immaterial reign
Of spirit and our watchword shall be still "Get thee behind me, God; I follow Mammon.

With all its thunder and earthquake, John Davidson's poetry never fails in the sweeter and kindlier note:—

As vibrant as an octave bell that hums
Harmonic mirth to hear his neighbour chime.

There are passages which are very glories of charm and imagination:—

Hush!
The murmur of the seaboard: surges beat
Their slow, uncertain, softly swelling fugue—
The brooding surges fingering the shore.

Life's heavy fruitage and imperial nights
When naked darkness gluts the sky with stars.

As keen as dawn that with a crimson slash
Hews out the darkness and delivers day,

And thunder of the thought shall seem to wait
Upon the nimbler lightning of the deed.

The little child
That lives a year and holds its parents' hearts
In dimpled hands for ever.

High hearts and youth are destiny enough.

It is by means of passages such as these that the reader can see the genius of the poet who found eclogues in the rawness, hugeness, and noise of modern Babylon. As a dramatist, John Davidson was very unlike ordinary playwrights. He regarded Christianity with abhorrence, and he wrote plays with the deliberate object of converting people to his opinions in this matter. He hits the orthodox God hard, and his orthodox worshippers harder. When you read Davidson's God and Mammon, for example, you do not greatly care what befalls Prince Mammon or King Christian; what you care for is the beautiful language, oftentimes as resistless as the honeyed perfection of Kit Marlowe. When you think of a really great play you do not think of any single person or passage. The glory of that most perfect tragedy, Othello, is neither the Moor, nor Desdemona, nor Iago, but each and all. To recall John Davidson's plays is mainly to think of isolated passages of great charm. His life was a tragedy, deeper than any that he wrote. He possessed literary ability that would have enabled him to make plenty of money had he prostituted his talents. But his mind was set on something higher. He dedicated himself to the service of principles. He was entitled, in his degree, to echo the noble words of Heine: "Lay a sword upon my coffin, for I was a loyal soldier in the war of the liberation of humanity."

When lion-hearted Richard Carlile was fighting the good fight for Freedom, he was unaware that his deeds of daring were watched by Keats and Shelley, two great poets, both Freethinkers and Republicans, who looked out from their towers of song and recognized that he was a hero battling for the most precious possession of humanity. Nearly a hundred years later, G. W. Foote, fighting bravely in the same good cause, was heartened by the encouragement of George Meredith and John Davidson. It was well and happily done. For the Freethought leaders look beyond the tumult and the shoutings of the day, and are touched by what Shakespeare calls "the prophetic soul of the wide world dreaming on things to come."

MIMNERMUS.

The Bible and Immortality.

THE OLD TESTAMENT—(continued).

As we have seen in the last paper, no mention is made in the Hebrew scriptures of a future life, or of man possessing an internal "something" that will continue to live after the death of the body. We will now examine some of the statements made in those scriptures respecting life, soul, and spirit, in order to see if any of these so-called entities are said or implied to be immortal.

In the Genesis creation story we find the following passages:—

Gen. i. 20.—Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creatures that hath life.

Gen. i. 24.—Let the earth bring forth.....beast of the earth, etc.

Gen. i. 28.—Every living thing that moveth upon the earth.

In the foregoing passages the words italicized are in Hebrew all one and the same—the expression "living thing" being merely a revised substitute for "beast." In all three cases the word in the original is khay-yah, which means: "life, animal, wild beast."

Having cleared the way, so far, we can now look at the following passage:—

Gen. ii. 7.—And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath (nish-math) of life; and man became a living soul (nephesh).

In this passage the words "life" and "living" are the same—khay-yah. We have therefore only to consider man's nish math and his nephesh. This is soon done. Turning to a Hebrew lexicon, we find that the word nish-math signifies: "breath, life, a human being, the wind," and is therefore correctly translated "breath"; also, that nephesh, which is translated "soul," means: "breath, an animal that breathes, a living person." The latter word (nephesh) is further said to be sometimes applied to the feelings, desire, and inclination; but whether this be so or not, it does not affect the primary signification. Hence, in the passage under consideration there cannot be the smallest doubt as to the meaning. Having formed the figure of a man in clay, the Lord God—who was conceived to be a man-shaped being—breathed into the figure his own living breath, whereupon the clay man immediately became a living, breathing animal. The story is, of course, pure fiction, like that related of Pygmalion, a celebrated sculptor, whose marble Venus was changed into a living woman. In both stories the internal organs of the figure and its flesh and blood constituents would seem to have never entered the minds of the originators.

In the narrative recording the death of Rachel (who died in childbirth) we find the following statement:—

> Gen. xxxv. 18.—And it came to pass, as her soul (nephesh) was in departing, for she died, that she called his name Ben-oni.

In the Hebrew version the literal reading of the passage is: "And it was—in going out her breath—that she died—and she called his name, Son of my pain." In the first of these readings (that of the Revised Version) the word Ben-oni is left untranslated. Now, in this case, as in that of the formation and vivifying of the first man, there can be no doubt whatever as to the meaning. This is not that an immortal "soul" was leaving the body, but that consciousness and the power to breathe were departing. Rachel spoke with her last breath, and then ceased to live.

We find, furthermore, that the word nephesh was applied to the whole animal creation, as well as to human beings, as in the following examples:—

> Gen. ix. 16.—The covenant between God and every living creature (nephesh) upon the earth.
> Gen. xlvi. 7.—All the souls of the house of Jacob, which came into Egypt, were three score and ten.

In the chapter last quoted, the word nephesh, translated "souls," is employed in the plural in the sense of "living persons" (the word "living" being omitted) no less than eight times. The word "soul" thus means nothing more than a living being, whether used in reference to man or to one of the lower animals.

We come next to the word "spirit," whose first appearance in the Bible is in Gen. i. 2. In this verse it is stated that "The spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." Here the word "spirit" is ruakh, which in the lexicon signifies: "breath, breeze, the wind, spirit." Josephus, in the first paragraph of his Antiquities, paraphrazes this sentence by saying "and a wind moved upon its surface"—which, of course, is correct. With the first three interpretations assigned to ruakh—breath, breeze, the wind—we are all familiar; but we do not know what were the ideas of the ancient Hebrew writers in many of the cases which our translators have rendered "spirit." The following are examples in which ruakh is found:—

> Gen. vi. 17.—I do bring the flood of waters.....to destroy all flesh wherein is the breath (ruakh) of life.
> Gen. viii. 1.—And God made a wind (ruakh) to pass over the earth.
> Job xxvii. 3.—My life is whole in me, and the spirit (ruakh) of God is in my nostrils.
> Gen. vi. 3.—And the Lord said, My spirit (ruakh) shall not strive with man for ever.

In the third and fourth of these examples the word translated "spirit" means nothing more than "breath." As regards the third passage, a comparison with Gen. ii. 7 (already quoted) will make this evident. Job was speaking of the breath supposed to have been given to him by God at his birth—and, as in the case of the first man, through the nostrils. In the fourth example, the Lord is represented as saying that he had long striven with men by giving them warning, reproof, and exhortation (with his breath); but as these had not been heeded, he would waste no more words upon them, but would destroy them by a flood. Similarly, the word "spirit" in Gen. xli. 38, Job xxvi. 4 and 12, Eccl. iii. 21, and many other passages which I have noticed, can all be resolved into "breath." When, however, neither "breath" nor "wind" appears to give sense to the passage, the word ruakh should be rendered "spirit"; but, as I have already stated, this leaves the exact signification uncertain.

In any case, whatever may be the meaning of the word ruakh in some places, there is nothing in any of the passages in which "spirit" is found that refers to any other life than the present; this fact settles the question of immortality in the Old Testament.

As already stated, the most important point in this connection is that upon the question of a future life there is everywhere a complete silence throughout the whole of the Hebrew scriptures, which plainly implies that in the Old Testament times a life after death had never been seriously thought of. So far from "eternal life" having been bestowed upon man, or the promise of it made to him as a reward for serving the tribal God, we find that the lower animals were raised to his level (save in the matter of dominion), and were given the same earthly life, with its attributes of soul and spirit, as their natural possession. And such being the case, it is not in the least surprising to note that nowhere in the Jewish scriptures is it stated, or even implied, that man's life, soul, or spirit shall continue to exist after the body to which it belonged had crumbled into dust. There was, however, to some extent a belief in "spirits of the dead"—which will be fully considered in the next paper.

The ancient Hebrews, as we know, were very ignorant and credulous, and believed many things which we now know to be absurd. They believed, as we have seen, that one of their prophets had been taken up in the air by a whirlwind, which carried him safely to the dwelling-place of the Lord God and his holy angels, who resided just above the clouds. This belief, though pure superstition, is at least comprehensible; for assuming that no such thing as immortality was known, the prophet, if he was to be rewarded for his good works by being taken to heaven, would have to go there before his death, or not at all; and, being alive, he would take with him his soul and spirit, as well as his brain, without which there could be neither soul nor spirit. But to imagine that at death all the qualities, feelings, thoughts, and emotions, which constitute the mind or soul, would arrange themselves into an impalpable, invisible Something whose personality should live for ever—to imagine such an absurdity was beyond even the credulity of the credulous Hebrew writers, and their "conspiracy of silence" upon this subject is a clear proof that they never believed anything so ridiculous. This form of credulity is found only among Christians and Spiritualists of the present day.

We see from Gen. l. 2 and 26 that the Hebrew writers were acquainted with the Egyptian practice of embalming the dead; for the bodies of the patriarchs Jacob and Joseph, who are recorded as dying in Egypt, are stated to have undergone this process, in order, apparently, to prevent disintegration until they could be conveyed to Canaan for burial.

The City of Dreams.

WHEN I first saw the Thames, it was under a midnight moon. I was alone in London, and free to rove and muse at my own sweet will. That was a decade ago. The river has been flowing steadily since then. Father Thames and Father Time keep even pace, and outlive all other fathers, temporal and spiritual. I have stood by the river in many moods and on many occasions since, but never with the wild, free, rapt, reverent abandon of that first midnight hour. So the far-travelled Hindoo, if with different emotions, might behold the sacred Ganges. To me it was no sacred flood, but symbolical of much. Perhaps I thought first of the very human Thomas Hood and The Bridge of Sighs; of Dickens, and his quaint and curious pageant faded. Sympathy, memory, the association of ideas, all the pathos of history and hopes and fears of the present time, mingled with the broken moonbeam as it lit the ripples of the venerable stream. Such, according to varying psychology, explain the passionate pilgrim and the shrine of his adoration.

There be many shrines, many thrones, much pomp and circumstance, civil and military, secular and religious, deeply rooted in the past, but still superficial and inessential. The permanent and fundamental things are more important, if less imposing. One has in mind the few wise heads, in London and elsewhere; common men of common sense, of simplicity, sincerity, and intelligence; quiet, earnest, unassuming men; exalted, too, but only in ideal and aspiration; advanced, also, some five hundred years ahead of their generation. These are the true legislators, and compared with whom our civil, military, and ecclesiastical grandees are but painted savages.

* * * * *

On this, my latest, visit to London, I saw that chivalrous knight and "bonnie fechter" for Freethought, Mr. ——. But, no; let him still be "Mimnermus the Mysterious," and charm us incognita with the magic of his pen. Older readers may remember, in the early Stevenson days, the Young Folks' Paper, that used to issue from Red Lion Court. How we used to thrill at the exploits of that knight in shining armour, Don Zalva the Brave, of Selim the Moor, the Young Swordsman of Warsaw, Desdichado, Chairon the Charioteer, etc., all by that voluminous author, Alfred R. Phillips. These great serials are still running in the painted "comics" that now issue from the same Court. Our boys read them still, and why should we forbid them? We can but hope they will follow on, and ultimately find their more modern heroes in the pages of the Freethinker.

I spent a most delightful hour in the quiet old Temple Gardens, Inns of Court, etc., with our Chief of Staff as guide, philosopher, and friend. No small honour, surely. It may even seem boastful; but I cannot help that. The marble effigy of Oliver Goldsmith, over his quiet, shady tomb, seemed to await our coming. We spoke of that useful, simple, generous soul, who was "nobody's enemy but his own." We leaned over the prostrate bronze of the Knights Templars, some with legs crossed to show that they had been to the Holy City, and who, my guide facetiously remarked, were perhaps performing a more useful purpose thus supine and still, than they had ever performed in life. The remarkably beautiful interior of the little church of the Crusades period called forth our unstinted admiration, and I am creditably informed the musical services held here are the finest of their kind. In Fleet Street we passed the Temple Bar, which now only exists as a side snow in gilt miniature. A winged effigy in stone, however, has taken the place of the older obstruction.

Later, and still greatly daring, or merely devoted, I saw the affable and energetic manager of the R.P.A., Mr. Charles Watts, and for old time's sake visited Red Lion Court, and Pitman's, at Amen Corner, in the shadow of St. Paul's. Thence to Euston, for the North. Experienced a "midnight alarm," and just left as our friends from Germany arrived. This last was mere nightmare, all the rest a vision of hope and peace and sanity. It was but yesterday, but already it is a memory and a dream. Great old London has hummed itself to repose, and Father Thames flows on for ever "through the mist and shadow of sleep." The City of Dreams will wake to life again when I return.....The wind is rustling softly in the trees beside a quiet road.....It is night, and the household has retired to rest. The fire is smouldering low; the pipe of nutty flavour forgets to burn; the wind growls distantly aloft in the chimney, and more familiarly at the window-pane, and then goes hurrying on, sounding hollowly across the plain.....I have an idea: the world might be saved by simple, honest, and intelligent men. The Bismarcks, Wellingtons, Napoleons, have failed—the War Lord and the Prince of Peace. The normal man is the saviour of the world.

ANDREW MILLAR.

Immortality—A Narcotic.

THE Rev. Dr. Norman Maclean, of St. Cuthbert's Church, Edinburgh, is one of Scotland's outstanding preachers, and one whose teaching is followed by many In an address, which he recently delivered in Edinburgh at a war-time service, he remarked that the "great doctrine of immortality was presented in these days in a coarse and material form, as if it were a narcotic that ought to reconcile us to the horrors of war; and that nothing sadder had happened in the world than the way people had become indifferent to the great truth of immortality."

It is a striking fact that it should be found necessary in these times to defend the doctrine of immortality, as if it were recognized that it was being heavily assailed; for, with primitive barbarism in the ascendant, it would be but natural that primitive superstition should spring up with renewed life. When hopes are dashed to the ground, the stars in their courses fight against man, loved ones fall, and aching voids are created in the heart, it would not be surprising were large numbers of people, who were normally indifferent, to adhere to a belief which promised reparation for ills and reunion with friends. Yet here we have the confession of an eminent divine that nothing sadder had happened than the indifference of the people.

It exemplifies the peculiar attitude of mind developed by theological training that indifference to a doctrine, the interpretations of which have filled many books, should be considered sad beyond all this murder, glorified by the name of war; sad beyond the shame of that intellectual paucity which has rendered international arbitration impossible; sad beyond man's ignorance of man. No stronger condemnation of religion as a factor in social welfare has been admitted than this, that it so warps a man's judgment that slavery, pillage, rapine, and murder are as nothing compared with a disbelief in a doctrine.

Dr. Maclean's statements form a serious indictment. They charge some persons with having, for ulterior purposes, taken a despicable advantage of the nation's predicament to present the doctrine of immortality as a narcotic.

Freethinkers have not used this doctrine as a narcotic, in fact, they have offered the antidote. The indictment not having been framed against them, who then are the culprits? Obviously it must be ministers of religion. It is indicative of the use to which parsons put the misfortunes of women, that a preacher of so outstanding ability as Dr. Maclean should reprove them. It is doubtful if there is any body of men, except priests, who would seize on the private misfortunes of a man or woman, with the rapacity of a tiger tearing out the entrails of its prey, and seek to profit thereby. For is it not profit? Do they not make their livelihood out of the gullibility of the people? Do they not label as criminal or indecent all those who will not pay tribute to them? Where abuse fails, and threats of eternal torture are unheeded, do they not seek to have the rights of citizenship withheld? Think of Spinoza, Paine, Carlile, Servetus, and Bruno; think of de Heretico Comburendo and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; think of the fires of Smithfield and the extermination of the Waldenses, and say that the tiger has not been outdone. And were not these things done that the immortal soul might be saved?

We recently attended the funeral of a dear friend. The parson who officiated bade us be of good cheer, that our friend only slept, and that in his very flesh should we see him again. This was scriptural, and it was refreshing to hear a parson speak with some regard for what was laid down in the Bible. Was not this a narcotic? Justifiable in the circumstances—perhaps, but, nevertheless, a narcotic.

It is when dealing with social matters that the grave danger of the doctrine of immortality is discovered. There are many who bow to the will of God; who feel that all effort to better life is not only vain, but sin; who, when told that the proletariat require to work longer hours than is really necessary, reply that man must live by the sweat of his brow; who uncomplainingly suffer the indignities of poverty because it is written that the poor shall be always with us and are blessed; and these reply thus because they believe in a future life.

The difference between a "truth" and a "great truth" is a theological subtlety which we have never comprehended; but we have formed a tentative opinion that a great truth is something about which nothing is known. So far as immortality is concerned, we have found no evidence to support it. Were mankind to recognize that the idea of immortality is a figment of the dawning intelligence of humanity, and that life gone, is the candle extinguished, so soon would it set out to put the world to rights. Were that energy which is wasted in logomachy, that thought concentrated on religion, that organization defending superstition, and that teaching spreading ignorance, to be taken from these useless and harmful pursuits, and combined to elucidate the causes of world misery, how soon would progress be made!

The doctrine of immortality is indeed a narcotic—a dangerous narcotic.

Acid Drops.

The debate in the House of Lords on the sale of "honours" contained nothing of which well-informed people were not aware. We do not see how one party can well blame the other, since all are guilty. And the thing is so flagrant that no one had the hardihood to deny it. A clear way out of the difficulty would be to abolish these absurd titles altogether, with the pantomimic and semi-barbaric accessories. But that would be too drastic a step for the British public; and so we would suggest that, instead of passing resolutions against the sale of titles—resolutions which will be useless when passed—there should be a regular and recognized scale of charges, from a dukedom to a knighthood. Anyone who wanted a title could then have one—if he could pay the price. And we are certain that, even under those conditions, the British public would furnish plenty of purchasers. We have to travel a long way yet before the servility of spirit which gives a mere title importance is sufficiently weakened to divest it of value.

The Universe, the weekly Catholic newspaper, has an interesting note concerning priests. It says: "In this War, for the first time, the Navy has provided Catholic chaplains not only at the naval bases, but also in the sea-going squadrons." It would be interesting to learn what the cost of the numerous chaplains attached to the Army and Navy amounts to during the present War.

The pill of religion has to be heavily coated with sugar nowadays. At a recent Presbyterian Church's Sunday meeting at Westcliff-on-Sea, solos were rendered by a lady-singer, selections were given by an orchestra, and trombone solos were indulged in. An address was given by an Army chaplain, in which he said that "outside the hospital, he was a mixture of Whiteley's and Lyons."

Mr. Silas K. Hocking, a former Free Church minister, complains "that Sectarianism has not been kept out of the camps. I wish it had been otherwise. I stood at the door of a (Y.M.C.A.) hut the other day and looked about me. A little to the right was a "Church Army Hut," to the left a "Salvation Army Hut," and I had passed a "Wesleyan Hut" on the way.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, who is a Spiritualist, says that "Reports are agreed as to the pleasant conditions of life beyond the grave." Kind-hearted Christians will notice, with alarm, that this puts the lid on hell.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle says there is no reason why an angel "could speak to Jews in Judæa and not to Englishmen in England." Why limit the speech to angels? In the Bible days Balaam's ass was as loquacious as the snake in Eden.

Munition workers must be in a bad way. We wonder why? Recently there was the much-advertised Woolwich Crusade for the Moral and Spiritual Betterment of the Munition Workers. That was a dead failure, from the religious point of view, at least, and now Canon Baillie is appealing for £150,000 to meet the "spiritual needs" of Worcester munition workers. Observe, it is not the munition workers who ask for the help, but the Canon. The money must be spent through the Church. One day we hope to see people generally resent the impertinence of the clergy in thus posing as moral regenerators.

The Prime Minister, who is a Welsh Baptist, has been ingratiating himself with the clergy, and recently entertained a large number of parsons of all denominations at breakfast at Downing Street. The obsequious press made as much fuss as if it had been reporting the Last Supper.

The discussion on "Spiritualism and Life After Death" is still running merrily in the Sunday Times, and Spiritualists have sought to make capital of the adhesion of Sir Oliver Lodge and Sir William Barrett, principally because they are scientists. Mr. Nevil Maskelyne, who has had thirty years acquaintance with spiritualistic phenomena, says it is largely a matter of sense deception. "Professed scientists," he adds, "as a rule, have no such knowledge. I very much doubt if Sir Oliver Lodge, for example, even knows there is such a thing as a theory of magic."

"Faith is the only panacea for human woes," says Mr. Bottomley. Indeed! Is it a little thing that grown men and women should have faith in plaster images?

Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, President of the Board of Education, said "the education rate should be the most popular in the country." Unfortunately, so many Nonconformists regard the education rate as being little better than a Church rate.

"The bishops enjoy enormous influence at the Foreign Office," says Mr. E. Ashmead-Bartlett. Now we know who is responsible for Britain being a Continental Power.

According to the Sunday Times, the Bishop of London says "a man is much the same five minutes after death, as he was five minutes before." It is, however, a difficult matter to persuade the man's relatives that this is the case, in spite of the Bishop's dictum.

"The Church of England has hitherto been more intensive than diffused," said the Rev. Dr. Chilton, the clerical headmaster of the City of London School. The same thing may be said of the wealth of the Church, for the Bench of Bishops enjoy the lion's share of emoluments.

Reactionaries everywhere are trying to take advantage of the national crisis to further their own ends. Among others, Sabbatariaps have been active with prosecutions of their more broad-minded fellow-citizens; but, happily, they do not always win their cases. At Grimsby, a soldier was charged with buying cigarettes on Sunday. When before the magistrates, the soldier said that he had to fight on Sundays, and the Bench at once dismissed the case.

Ecclesiastics appear to be imitating theatrical folk in the use of press notices. A short time since a quarter-column announcement appeared in the press extolling the bravery of Cardinal Bourne during a visit of some days to France. The Cardinal's most courageous acts seem to be those of lunching at General Headquarters and visiting the King of the Belgians.

The present can hardly be described as an age of robust faith. The shrine of Saint Edward the Confessor, in Westminster Abbey, is "hidden by a huge pyramid of sandbags built up to protect it from possible destruction in an air-raid." Fancy a "saint" needing the protection of sandbags!

The Herald Republican (U.S.A.) has a full-page article on a new translation of the Bible. The translation seems a very convenient one: "Thou shall not kill," being rather an awkward command at the present moment, the new reading has "Thou shalt not murder." Many having stumbled over "Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a child," the new version meets the objection with "Behold, the young woman," etc. This is a most comfortable method of translating. All you have to do is to find out what is required and translate accordingly. We shall expect to see presently a verse translated which makes the "great fish" in which Jonah took his memorable voyage into a "submarine." The possibilities of this method are infinite.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton has written A Short History of England. He says the most important thing that happened in the Victorian era "was that nothing happened." Mr. Chesterton is as accurate as the writers of the Gospels.

The Ven. Archdeacon Holmes, preaching at St. Paul's Cathedral, told the congregation, "Satan is not God." Indeed! But, as the schoolboy said, "Why don't God kill the Devil?"

A new publication has the title, A Young Eve and an Old Adam. The Bible Adam is said to have lived 960 years; but he had the advantage of starting life at full age.

A series of articles by a "Jewish Catholic" have been published in the Universe. We have heard of "Chinese Presbyterians," but this latest combination makes us wonder.

The Westminster Gazette recently published a protest against compulsory church parades in the Army, and pointed out that "we do not attempt to force attendance at religious services on any other branch of Government servants except the fighting forces." A palpable hit! The protest, however, might have been made some years earlier.

"A debate on the question, 'Where do the clergy fail?' took place a day or two ago at the Base Hospital in connection with the 5th Northern General Hospital Debating Society. Lieut. M. E. Golby (the Queen's) presided. The opener, Lieut. Dick Fletcher (27th Canadians) made a breezy speech, in which he brought forward twelve reasons for the clergy's failure. Lieut. N. E. Carden (K.O.Y.L.I.) replied, and this was followed by a number of short speeches by the R.A.M.C. Company and patients, together with a vigorous defence of the clergy by Capt. the Rev. C. F. Stevens, C.F. After brief replies by the opener and opposer, and a summing up by the chairman, a vote was taken as to whether the clergy do fail, and by a majority of 22 the meeting agreed that they did!"—Leicester Daily Mercury.

General Smuts says: "The longer people keep cheerful faces, the quicker the war will be over." Unfortunately, so many Christian folk habitually wear an expression of tired funeral horses.

The Catholic Review contains an article by Captain H. N. Gibson on Spiritualism, under the title of "The Direct Attack." The writer sets himself to show that Spiritism is a frontal attack by the Devil on Christianity. Evidently the world-war has roused Satan from his slumber.

A beggar who, it was said, could make tears roll down his cheeks at will, was charged with begging at Thames Police Court. This is not so remarkable as the story of the stone statue in a church which wept on high and holy occasions. Probably, the priest who handled the water-can could explain how the trick was done.

"As an expression of sympathy with sufferers from air raids, the Bishop of Dover has promised to sleep at Ramsgate on a moonlight night and share the anxieties of the population." So runs a paragraph in the Daily News; and we are really astounded at such heroism. But we wonder where the Bishop will sleep? Will it be in one of the poorer sort of houses likely to be shaken down by the explosion of a bomb? And why one night? Why not sleep there altogether? And we wonder whether the people of Ramsgate really will be comforted by knowing that a real Bishop is in their midst? The curious thing is that the Bishop does not say he will pray for the people. Perhaps that is taken for granted. Perhaps not.

We have many times referred to the way in which religious organizations are utilized to back up vested interests. We see from the Call for November 1 that in one military camp all men in uniform are prohibited attending political or Trades Union meetings. This we can quite understand. The curious thing is that in the same camp meetings are being held in the Y.M.C.A. huts on "The Abolition of Trades Unions."

Mr. Horatio Bottomley says that he speaks "with all the humility of a layman." If he were proud he could hardly make more noise.

What beautiful nonsense gets into prints! Mr. James Douglas writes: "Perhaps we are over-educated and over-civilized." Not yet, Mr. Douglas! Not whilst children leave school at fourteen years of age; nor whilst families reside in single and two-room tenements.

Theosophy seems to be as much a nose of wax as the Christian religion. Many years ago, when Mrs. Besant embraced Theosophy, she dropped all her social and political work because it conflicted with her new opinions. To-day, she takes a vast interest in Indian politics, and has been interned for her activity. The mighty Mahatmas seem powerless before a handful of policemen.

THE SUBMARINE.

Clarence:

O Lord! methought what pain it was to drown!
What dreadful noise of water in mine ears!
What sights of ugly death within mine eyes!
Methought I saw a thousand fearful wrecks;
A thousand men that fishes gnaw'd upon;
Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearl,
Inestimable stones, unvalu'd jewels,
All scatter'd in the bottom of the sea:
Some lay in dead men's skulls; and in those holes
Where eyes did once inhabit there were crept,—
As 'twere in scorn of eyes,—reflecting gems,
That woo'd the slimy bottom of the deep,
And mock'd the dead bones that lay scatter'd by.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

November 18, Birmingham; November 25, Nuneaton; December, 2, South Shields; December 9, Glasgow.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—November 18, Manchester; November 11, Glasgow; November 12, Falkirk.

W. DEAN.—Thanks for offer, which we shall be pleased to accept.

H. BLACK.—Mr. Cohen's Determinism or Free Will? is out of print at the moment, but it will be reprinted at as early a date as possible.

R. L. (Southport).—Shall be pleased to see you when you come to London. But please advise us as to the day and time of calling at this office.

G. T. BOWMAN.—We are also hopeful of pulling through without having to make any alteration in either the size or price of the Freethinker. We note your appreciation of the "varied and satisfying menu" provided.

MR. F. C. HOLDEN (Utah, U.S.A.) writes: "Leaflets on the 'Massacre of the Innocents' have arrived, and caused many an eye-opener amongst the intellectually lazy people in this pious community." Very pleased to hear it.

J. L.—We are taking no risks. Our information comes from several sources, and is as authoritative as it can well be.

S. CLOWES.—Thanks for news. It is a common policy to leave untold things we ought to know, assuming that others will be sure to tell us. But it is a mistake. Better be told twice than not at all.

A. R. D.—Your appreciation is very encouraging.

M. W.—Arrived too late for notice.

T. H. E.—Received. Pleased to hear from you.

H. G. MARSHALL.—We note that you succeeded in getting one letter, on the right lines, into the Star correspondence on the Zeppelins and God. Our comments referred, of course, to the disproportion of space allotted to the two sides of the controversy.

H. ROSETTI.—Capital! It is a bit of practical and valuable work.

E. PINDER.—Thanks for cuttting. But the clergy seldom profit by open discussion, do they?

CPL. J. BENTON.—If parsons will come round the camp lecturing the men on religion, they ought not to resent questions being asked and opposition offered. Anyway, we are pleased to know that you offered both. It is not surprising the parson did not like your opposition. The clergy prefer silence. Then they can return with a story of how eagerly the men listened, etc.

G. CROOKSON.—We are very pleased to hear from you, and we remember you quite well, in spite of the lapse of time. Will bear your suggestions in mind.

R. V.—We do not think we were unfair to the Star. We admit that the Star is more liberal than our other London papers, but our remarks referred to the space allotted to the Freethought side of the question.

D. GLOAT.—Next week.

ARTHUR DANNATT.—Order, with remittance, received, but address for despatch of book is lacking. Please send it on.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Some time ago we asked the upholders of Secular Education to get their Trades Unions, etc., to pass resolutions in favour of this policy. We were pleased to observe that several had taken our advice, and we have just received notice of the following, passed at the instance of the West Ham Branch of the Operative Bricklayers' Society, at the General Meeting of West Ham and District Trades and Labour Council on October 31:—

> That in the interests of education, and as a means of preventing the obstruction of educational progress by what is known as the "religious question," this West Ham Branch, Operative Bricklayers' Society, is of opinion that education in State schools should be strictly confined to the subjects defined as "secular" in the Education Code, thus maintaining an attitude of complete neutrality towards all questions of religious belief or doctrine.

It was also agreed to send the motion to all Trades Councils in England, to Mr. Fisher, and to the local M.P.'s. This is capital work, and we hope Freethinkers in all parts of the country will see what they can do in the same direction.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures to-day (November 11) in the City Hall, Glasgow. The lectures are at 12 o'clock and 6.30. We hope that Glasgow Freethinkers will see to it that the hall is crowded on both occasions.

We have more than once referred to the impression we have as to South Wales being a most favourable ground for Freethought work. It was something to start a Branch of the N. S. S. at Swansea, one of the strongholds of Welsh Dissent, and we are hoping to see something done at Cardiff soon. Mr. Cohen's visit to Abertillery last Sunday showed what is possible. The hall was filled in the afternoon and crowded out in the evening. Many of the audience did a long tramp over the mountains in order to be present, and the number of keen-faced, intelligent-looking young men present gave excellent promise for the future.

This Sunday Mr. Cohen is not lecturing, but on the following Sunday (November 18) he lectures in the Repertory Theatre, Birmingham. On the following Sunday he breaks new ground at Nuneaton. From all we hear the meetings there are likely to rouse considerable interest.

Pte J. Scott writes apropos of our remarks, in the Freethinker of October 28, on Mr, Bottomley's foolish exploitation of "the miracle of the Virgin at Albert":—

> I am on sick furlough and just out of hospital. I have just received my Freethinker and was glancing through it when my eye caught the assumption from John Bull in "Acid Drops" about the beaming "Madonna and Child of the Albert Cathedral" Now, Sir, I have been right along the whole Front, from Ypres to Albert and Albert to Ypres Front —participating in the fighting all along.
> Mr. Bottomley, Sir, is indeed very gullible, but you hit the mark when you say the British officer was pulling Mr. Bottomley's leg The Monument of the Madonna was not knocked into its present beaming position by a German shell ..... Had Mr. Bottomley used his eyes as well as his superstitious mind, he would have seen several high chimney stalks. They also had not been hit, yet everything round about was ruin and desolation. These stalks were left alone for the same purpose as the Cathedral with the beaming Madonna and Child, and were just a gunnery direction for the enemy.....If Mr. Bottomley had spent the time under the conditions at the Somme as I have, perhaps he would not be so superstitious. Mr. Bottomley would then have seen graves of brave men with crosses at their heads and Madonnas on their graves. Yet the cross or the Madonna did not prevent a German shell from turning up body after body that had been laid to rest, perhaps a few days since, perhaps months. If he had to gather up the parts of the maimed bodies of those dead men in a waterproof sheet, as I have done, and think of their wives and mothers and children, he would talk less about the glory of war; if he had to stand up to his middle in water for six nights in a shell hole in "No Man's Land" and be frozen in every morning in that shell hole, and be continually under shell fire; if he saw his chums blown to pieces before his eyes, and men lying huddled in heaps dead in shell holes and had laid there for months; if Mr. Bottomley had the real experience of war, perhaps his pen then would not be controlled by his passions or emotions, though he might wonder what the Hell his God is doing. That is a common expression from the soldier's lips in France to-day. Mr. Bottomley, Sir, to use a soldier's phrase, has opened his mouth and let it say what it liked.

We have left out Mr. Scott's account of the cause of the present position of the statue, which we said we knew, and which Mr. Bottomley, must know, because we think it lies with him to tell the truth to his readers. At any rate, we give him the opportunity of doing so.

Mr. B. Siger writes:—

My son in Salonica writes to say that the Freethinker is eagerly read by many of his chums who, at the beginning of the War, laughed at him for reading it. He says he enjoys it more every week, and is quite disappointed when he does not get it through some accident in transit.

This is good but not unusual news. We are convinced, and we have the best of reasons for saying it, that owing to the number of copies read among the troops and the way it is passed round, the Freethinker is at present doing a greater propagandist work than it has ever done in its history. Owing to the War, hundreds read the paper who, under ordinary conditions, would never have seen it.

A definite arrangement has now been reached with compositors regarding an additional war bonus. This is to be 4s. a week per man, dating from November 1, and 6s. per week dating from January 1. What with continuous increases in the wages bill and a steady rise in the price of materials, running a paper in War can scarcely be called a humdrum occupation.

The best way of meeting this continuously increasing expense is by pushing the circulation of the Freethinker wherever possible; and we are seeing what can be done by a little judicious advertising in local newspapers. One day we hope to embark on a comprehensive advertising scheme; at present, for financial and other reasons, we are forced to move very cautiously. But our experience is, so far, that well-planned advertising always pays.

We beg to remind all intending subscribers to the Sustentation Fund that the closing date is November 20. This will enable the last list of subscriptions to be published in the issue dated November 25.

Mr. R. Chapman writes: "Having arranged with Mr. Cohen for Sunday, December 2, the South Shields Branch is filling in the interval with local talent. Last Sunday, Mr. J. Fothergill opened an interesting discussion on 'The Two Paths,' and Mr. J. Hannan presided over a good meeting. Next week (Nov. 18) the subject is a report of the London Interim Conference, and the separation and divorce question section will undoubtedly prove a centre of controversy, friendly even where antagonistic."

The R. P. A. Annual is, this year, raised to one shilling, which, considering the greatly increased cost of production, is not surprising. And no one who lays out a shilling on it will regret the expenditure. Mr. Eden Phillpotts is in his best poetic vein in the "The Rationalists," and Professor Gilbert Murray contributes a cleverly subtle essay on "The Essence of Christianity." It is an essay which destroys Christianity in the act of demonstrating its real character. Professor Bury writes on "Christianity and Roman Criminal Law," and shows what little it was that Christianity added to this department of sociology, while hinting at the ill it did in checking certain developments already at work. Mr. McCabe has written upon the subject of Christianity in Russia, and Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner dwells on the importance of the recently decided Bowman Case. But the great significance of this decision is, to us, not that it established the legality of a bequest to an incorporated body, such as the Secular Society, Limited, but that it established the legality of a bequest to any Secular Society whether registered or not. An article by Mr. C. T. Gorham, on "The World after the War," the optimism of which will, we hope, be justified by results, concludes the issue, which contains other articles of an almost equally interesting nature with those noted.

Freethinkers in the Army in Egypt are keeping the (Freethought) ball rolling. In the Egyptian Mail a discussion on religion has been proceeding, and there is a long letter in a recent issue from "J. J. B.," one of our subscribers, who puts the case against Old Testament teaching with much force.

The Ardrossan Herald is a paper much nearer this office in which a discussion is being carried on by Freethinkers and Christians. The special subject here is "Beethoven's Religion"; and we observe letters, well written and to the point, from quite a number of heretics. We are always glad to see these discussions in progress, and also to find that some editors have a due sense of their responsibility to all sections of the community.

Messrs. Funk & Wagnells publish a useful little Dictionary of Grammar by an American Freethinker, Mr. J. A. Hennesy, which appears designed to meet the needs of the busy person. It is a small pocket volume, price 35 cents, and a noticeable feature is the number of illustrative passages from writers such as Thomas Paine, Ingersoll, etc. We are glad to observe the author's silent protest against a number of slang Americanisms which are making headway among writers on this side the Atlantic.

Impressions.

CHILDREN can be safely trusted to say the unexpected, and, generally, it is the unexpected which is true. The significant story, where a naked king walks the streets surrounded by flatterers, will illustrate our point. Sometimes the unexpected is the obvious, and sometimes the obvious is not true. Yet, mes amis, truth is a strange bird; a fleeting vision of the flash of a kingfisher's colours in the sunlight is, perhaps, as near to absolute truth as mortals may attain.

Winchester is one of the most beautiful cities in the world. It has some of the strange beauty of a sorcerer; it has also some qualities which are downright English; finally, it possesses some aspects which are repellant. We hope we shall not incur the charge of being a disgruntled Freethinker if we attempt to justify our last assertion. Once again, mes amis, we dissatisfied ones are hard to satisfy, and, if we flaunt our likes and desires to the four corners of the earth, we shall also give adequate reasons for disliking those matters which pass muster with the easy-going fat-headed public. It is our penalty to see through the eye, and not with it.

Autumn was singing its swan-song on a lovely day in October. A blue sky, with Jove's cattle scattered across it, the sun making rainbow colours in running water, leaves with colours of delicious green, yellow, and brown, dog-rose berries, mountain-ash berries looking red and fierce in contrast, purple elderberries, and the useful sloe, orchards with rosy apples in profusion; this was our first impression of Winchester. We had forgotten, for the time being, the Cathedral. As a tribute to man's labour this edifice is magnificent; as a mark of anything else, it is as naked as the king whom we have mentioned. Man's ingenuity, man's vision of beauty in this "frozen music," as Schopenhauer's phrase has it, is wonderful, and a thing of perpetual delight. The priests say it is dedicated to God, and we must make no mistake about the intense subtlety of this suggestion. Three parts out of four of our countrymen are fed on assertion. It is the old story of defence by attack, and none know the method better than the members of organized religion. Assert! Assert! Assert! Do not bother about explanations, they will look after themselves, and if you can only tell mankind often enough that it is a sinner there is every chance of it being believed. For the moment we are not concerned with the history of Winchester Cathedral. Sufficient for our purpose it is to know that it was built by human hands, and the design emanated from the human brain. It is also safe to say that leisure in that time was the rule and not the exception; furthermore, as history painfully states, the times were extremely superstitious. In the light of present-day revelations the point is not worth labouring. Therefore, it would be an easy matter to impose this assertion that the Cathedral was dedicated to God with the virtual ownership in the hands of those who made that assertion. In this way is the labour of man perverted, and a beautiful human place (since human hands have made it) dedicated to God. It is the assertion Gloria in excelsis.

Yes, it was quite possible for us to wander round the massive pillars, to note the many superb arches, the sunlight falling in slanting rays on to the carved oak pews—it was quite possible to do this without the slightest reverence to anyone but those who were dead and gone. Dead hands that had fashioned the stone to curves and spirals, cherubs' heads and dragons' tails; hands that had carved out of oak so many lovely patterns; these all spoke of simple tastes. The oak leaf, the head of wheat, with here and there a trace of a design from the honeysuckle or a sea-shell; these were the outward and visible signs of a simple taste in life to which we shall have to return. There was one little matter we noted indicating an absence of the fitness of things. A tablet erected to the memory of a man bore the inscription after the name: "Angler, author, and traveller." Two lines of doggerel followed in praise of angling in which the name of God was mentioned as having been the creator of the piscatorial art for the benefit of man. We smiled and passed on. Byron wrote to the point about angling:—

> And angling, too, that solitary vice,
> Whatever Izaak Walton sings or says:
> The quaint, old, cruel coxcomb, in his gullet
> Should have a hook, and a small trout to pull it.

Well, well; we thought they might leave angling as a doubtful sport without attributing it as a gift from the Almighty; but everyone to their taste, as the old lady said when she kissed the cow.

Reader, have you ever been in prison? Have you ever slept on planks, partaken of plain diet, and been alone with your own thoughts? When the gates open for you, does not the wind through the trees sing a melody sweeter than the tongues of nightingales? Every blade of grass seems to greet you. Flowers, like many wondrous coloured stars on earth smile at you, and the touch of a loving human hand completes the change.

From Winchester to the village of St. Cross is a short distance. If you turn to your right from the statue of King Alfred, you may walk by the side of a clear stream until you reach one of the prettiest villages in England. Quaint, old-fashioned cottages seem to grow out of the roads and fields. You will find, even in October, that roses still laugh over the doorways; our best wish to you is that you shall feel the beauty of many a peaceful scene that is to be found between the arrogant and lordly Winchester and the meek little village of St. Cross, where custom hath it, that the good folk wash their linen every Monday. The church is approached through a large courtyard with cloisters on the left, and there is an old-world atmosphere surrounding the place. The interior lacked the magnificence of Winchester Cathedral, but what caught our eye was a facsimile of the document on which is recorded the surrendering of a Charter by a body of men to a bishop! We would give our ears or a shilling for a true record of the transaction. When we remember how dearly a Secular Charter has been bought.....

But there, we set out to register a few impressions. Winchester is a place knee-deep in power and privilege, living on the past, and, needless to say, it is ecclesiastical. You will find great houses with vast lawns and gardens surrounded with walls higher than a pulpit. On the top of the walls you will see broken glass set in an irregular fashion in cement. By our boots we swear that there must be peach and apricot trees the other side. Brick walls and broken glass! God save us gentlemen! the trade of religion is a profitable one from buildings dedicated to God and constructed by human hands. The ramparts of this profession are brick walls and broken glass along with the usual supply of black magic. When you and I have passed to the great beyond (if we may be prophetical) probably a little child will say: "Why, they are not wearing any clothes!" Is this too mystical, too obscure, my readers? We think we can hear you say No. We are a goodly few now; some day we shall be "a people."

Joan says she likes Winchester apples very much; Ellen declares that the folk are good-hearted and kind, though inclined to be narrow; whilst we think that the wood carvings under the choir seats in the Cathedral tell some pretty stories.

Religion in Madeira.

The "Catholics" of this unfortunate land continue, with revolting unconsciousness, making feasts to the whole caste of saints that the criminal and inventive imagination of the Church has created.

They spend rivers of money without any kind of usefulness whatever, when there are so many unfortunates falling with hunger in these streets, and so much misery within the huts that these poor wretches "inhabit"!

It grieves us to the heart to see, day by day, in this city, unfortunate mothers, surrounded by rickety children, dressed in rags that badly cover their flesh, extending their hands to public charity, which, already worn out, is unable to relieve them.

There they go, the poor and unhappy mothers; out in the streets, bewailing their misfortune and cursing the niggard fate that proportions to some all the commodities and comforts, and gives to the others, to the great, immense, majority, only misery and pain!

Meanwhile, the Church dressed itself up with galas and flowers, while within the temple are clouds of incense mixed with bad Latin, stinking of mouldiness; outside, the people are writhing in convulsions of agony, and dying without a protest that may shake their tormenters, they may frighten those that insult them in their infinite misery!

Only hardened characters can have no pity for these unfortunates! Only low creatures that treat these poor wretches with contempt can assist at those religious feasts without a phrase of revolt on their lips against this corrupt Church that sacrifices everything to its brightness, as the most base prostitute sacrifices everything to luxury and pleasure!

Traffickers of the Christ and the Virgin, monopolizers of consciences, robbers of their fellow-creatures' pockets, any and every method serves to fill up their coffers and to attain their own ends.

What does it matter that misery might enter millions of homes, that women and children might die of hunger, if to them, to the padres and their followers, nothing is wanting, because in the shadow of Christ and the Church they are exploring the great mine [1] that is the belief of the fanatics of the unfortunate land?

Dastards! Hired assassins of Torquemada and Loyola, putrid excrescence of the worst in the human race, you might, if you wished, do so much good!

It is in your hands to alleviate many pains, much unhappiness! You well know it; yet, nevertheless, you do nothing in that direction.

It is because there does not beat in you a heart that feels and suffers the pains of your fellow-being, but a heart of an insatiable and voracious vulture.

It is satiated, bandits, for the time being! When the people of my land, instructed and conscious of your power, make amends for your lies and trickery, they will go for you with gun and knife, as one does to the foxes that come down on the villages.

Yes! When they day of liberty dawns, when the people of Madeira know how to read, you, oh! sinister cassocks, will have to hold the hoe, or go and work amongst the coal—employment, this, that is in harmony with your black conscience—then, when your "industry" will no longer be "profitable."

Hawkers of the Temple, for whom religion serves only as a business, your hour will strike! As the proverb says: "There is no good that always endures, nor bad that always lasts." This saying, which is applied to you, must be once more complied with. We, and if it be not for us, then our children, must assist in the "debacle" of your well-paying "industry," and the demolition of that home of bestialization and fanaticism, the Church, where is taught only the practice of lying, of vice, and of hypocrisy, and to plant in its place, splendid and radiant, the Temple of Love, of order, and work—the school—where only is taught the practice of Good, of Virtue, and Love of Truth!—Translated from Work and Union (Funchal) by

GOD AND THE WAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I have to thank Mr. Lloyd very cordially for his courteous reply, in the Freethinker of October 28, to my letter.

I quite agree with him that a Supreme Being has nothing to do with the War. So far as can be judged, no one could have exercised a stricter neutrality nor a more sublime indifference to the War than God has done.

(1) In his reply Mr. Lloyd admits that, in his opinion, the struggle for existence will never be abolished. The struggle for existence is essentially a fight for food for oneself and one's dependents. It may, of course, have other phases than war. It may take, and does take, the form of competition for commercial and industrial supremacy, the capture of foreign markets, etc. With all deference to what Mr. Lloyd has said, his hope of a "reorganization of society on the basis of security, equality, brotherhood, and universal goodwill, when we shall be able to clasp one another's hands and look into one another's eyes as members of a happy family animated and governed by the royal law of love," while, as he admits, the struggle for existence inevitably goes on, and we are busily engaged fighting one another for food, is a condition of matters which though undoubtedly highly desirable, is not at all likely to be realized. Indeed, as populations increase, the struggle in one form or another seems likely to become more intense and ruthless.

(2) Mr. Lloyd uses the term "Christianity" not as meaning the teaching of the Founder of Christianity, but as the teaching and practice of the Church nominally Christian. In that sense, Christianity has no doubt encouraged Militarism, though he admits that "Origen was bound to maintain that Christianity was incompatible with military service in a Pagan State," and, as a matter of fact, in the first two centuries Christians contemned and abstained from war. This is clearly shown in Gibbons' Decline and Fall, chaps. xv. and xvi. Mr. Lloyd therefore is not quite right when he says that Christianity, even in the sense in which he uses the term, always encouraged militarism. With the conversion of the Emperor Constantine, Christianity became a State affair, and necessarily favoured war.

(3) Mr. Lloyd says quite truly that neither in the Gospels nor in the Epistles is war, as such, condemned. He regards as significant, in the sense of favouring war, the text, "Think not that I came to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword" (Matt. x. 34). The passage, however, continues (verses 35 and 36) "For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law, and a man's foes shall be they of his own household." I think there is really no doubt that the word "sword" is here used in a figurative sense. This view is borne out by the parallel passage in Luke's Gospel, where we read: "Suppose ye that I am come to give peace on earth. I tell you nay, but rather division" (Luke xii. 51), and then it goes on very much the same as in Matthew. What is meant is simply that members of one household would be divided in their attitude to himself. It could hardly be intended that the mother and daughter were to fight a duel with swords. I don't think anything worse than lingual warfare was contemplated.

Then Mr. Lloyd quotes the passage (Luke xxii. 36-38) where immediately before the betrayal, Jesus said "He that hath no sword let him sell his garment and buy one.....And they said, Lord, behold here are two swords. And he said unto them, it is enough." Now, it seems to me, Jesus meant simply to indicate the hostility and opposition which the disciples would meet in the world after he himself was taken and put to death. He could not have intended them to use the sword, because when subsequently at the arrest in the garden, Peter drew a sword and wounded a servant of the high priest, Jesus severely reprimanded him and said, "Put up again thy sword into its place; for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." This prohibition is corroborated by Luke xxii. 50 and 51, and by John xviii. 11.

These passages, taken in conjunction with the life of Jesus and the whole spirit of his teaching, indicate that early Christianity, like early Buddhism, was opposed to war, and that the general practice of the ethical teaching of Jesus would bring about that era of universal goodwill and brotherhood to which Mr. Lloyd looks forward. The question is, however, "Can the teaching of Jesus be applied to rational politics, or is it an unpractical idealism attainable only by a comparatively few individuals?"

As to the Epistles, I don't think Paul specially condemns war, but he definitely forbids litigation by Christians (1 Cor. vii. 1-8). If contests in law for one's rights are to be condemned, much more one would think contests in battle.

ATHEIST OR AGNOSTIC?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—It may interest your readers to know that John Davidson wrote to the late Mr. G. W. Foote in reference to Atheism. In a letter dated August 27, 1907, he says:—

> If we accept the name atheist we limit ourselves, we distort our growth; we will become depraved; we will develop a cancer or a wen. The power of a name when the name stands for a tenet is incalculable, and the effect of its adoption is always disastrous; because a name is adopted only when the tenet is ripe and ready to decay. Consider, for example, Conservatism and Liberalism; the moment they were named and known they began to putrefy. I think the time has come for Freethinkers to rise above theism and athgism, to come out of it altogether. We must, if we are to grow. There is the word, Man, a virgin word, a zero. Let us call ourselves Man, and begin all things over again.....

National Secular Society.

Our Interim Conference opened at Chandos Hall, Charing Cross, W.C., on Sunday, October 28. Despite the threatened air raids, the attendance was exceedingly good. The Branches represented were: Battersea, Bethnal Green, Glasgow, Kingsland, North London, South Shields, South London, Regent's Park, Swansea, and West Ham.

Amongst the Vice-Presidents who attended were: Messrs. Heaford, Leat, Quinton, Roger, Samuels, Silverstein, Thurlow, and Wood, Mrs. Rolf, Miss Stanley, and Miss Kough. There was also a good muster of individual members.

The President opened the meeting by reading the resolution convening the Conference.

Motion No. 2, by J. W. Hackett, Birmingham:—

> This Conference deplores the fact that Provincial Branches of the N.S.S. have failed to imitate London Branches in conducting Open Air Propaganda during the summer months, whereby the desired increased circulation of Freethought literature has been much impeded, and an opportunity lost at a most favourable time for the presentation of our aims and objects. It records its opinion that in consequence of the War the present time is in the highest degree favourable to the systematic propagation of Freethought principles was moved by Mr. J. T. Lloyd and seconded by Mr. R. Chapman (South Shields). It met with general approval and was carried unanimously.

Motion No. 3, by North London Branch:—

> The North London Branch greatly regrets that other Branches have not availed themselves of the facilities afforded for the insertion of brief notices of Meetings in the columns of the Freethinker through the Motion No. 12, Section B., unanimously carried at the last Annual Conference. This gathering, therefore, requests the President, in his capacity as Editor of the Freethinker, to exercise his influence towards this end was discussed at some length. Various suggestions were offered, and it was finally carried with a reminder from the President that the matter lay with the Branches, who alone could supply the information.

Motion No. 4, by South London Branch:—

> That inasmuch as the National Secular Society has insufficient funds directly under its control for the purposes of propagating Freethought principles, this Conference recommends that the Executive take immediate steps to raise a Propagandist Fund, thus making it possible that the objects for which the Society was formed be successfully carried out gave rise to a somewhat contentious discussion, during which a considerable amount of ancient history was reviewed. It was ultimately brought to the vote by the reminder of the clock and the Chairman's hammer, and carried by a large majority.

Motions by the West Ham Branch:—

> (a). That this Conference enters its protest against the clergy being exempt from the military duties of citizens whilst claiming all other civil rights, and further protests against all places of worship being free from rates and taxes.
> (b). That this Conference views with regret the tendency to introduce the spirit of Militarism into the State schools.
> (c). That this Conference desires to call the attention of the Minister of Education to the need for the exclusion of all religious instruction from the curriculum of the State schools as the only fair solution of the question were all carried unanimously.

An interesting innovation then followed in the shape of a discussion, opened by Mr. A. Eagar, on "Why Our Reformed Educational System Should Promote Patriotism," and in which the President, Messrs. Wilde, Howell Smith, Chapman, Miller, and Palmer took part.

After an interlude for tea, the evening Public Meeting opened at 6.30. The President again occupied the chair, and the subject on the Agenda not reached in the afternoon, i.e., a discussion on "Freethought and the Family," was opened by Mr. T. F. Palmer. Of the several phases of the question touched upon, the greatest interest was shown in the references to the subject of Divorce. Valuable suggestions as to the part Freethinkers should, and do, play in social reconstruction were made by a member of the Bethnal Green Branch, and in closing the meeting the President announced that the success of the day's proceedings warranted the convening of similar gatherings early in the future.

E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

The Three Princes.

Once there lived a wise king who had three sons. When this king was growing old he called his sons together and said: "I am now old, my end is near, and I would fain give each of you that which he deserves before I die. All that I know I have taught you. It now rests with yourselves what fortune shall be yours. Each of you shall rule my kingdom for a year. At the end of three years, that son who has won the love of my people will be king."

Now, the eldest son, who ruled first, thought: "I am the eldest prince, and heir to the throne. The kingdom is sure to be mine. Why should I worry?" And he spent his year wearing fine clothes and following pleasure. The king was ill pleased, but said nothing until the year was up. Then he took his son and cast him in a monastery and the second prince ascended the throne.

This prince was crafty, and reasoned with himself: "If I rule ill, I shall lose the people's love, and also the kingdom; if I rule well, I shall lose my brothers' love, there will be war between us, and I may lose the kingdom to boot. To what end, therefore, should I rule?" And he considered long, and said: "I will wait and see who is to be king." And he spent his year waiting. His father marvelled at such craft, and, when the time was come, banished his son to a far country to complete his education.

Then the youngest prince ruled. And he thought: "I am here for one year only. My father would never trust his kingdom to one so young as I. Ruling is work for the wise and old. I am but a boy. The king has put me here for a jest. When my brothers return, the wisest will be crowned, and I shall be sent to seek my fortune. Why not make my fortune now?" So he granted himself many treasures, and taxed the people heavily, and when his time was up he had much wealth, and his father was pleased in secret.

Meanwhile the people, wronged by neglect and robbery, rose and cried: "The old king is nearly dead, and the three would-be kings would be better dead; let us have no more kings to spoil the land. And the king heard the people murmuring, and said: "Have I not always ruled you well? Have I not fed and clothed you, and taken all your cares upon myself? Have I done ill by you?—or have I done well? And the people answered: "O king, thou didst well always, and we were content; but thy sons do ill only, and we will not have them to rule us when thou art gone. Thy sons will die when thou diest."

And the king knew the day of kings had passed, and looked upon the ground. Then he said sadly: "Let it be even as my people say; let there be no more kings, lest evil men govern. But what wilt thou have in place of kings?" And the people were dumb, for they had not considered that. Then the king said: "In a far country are many wise men called Priests and Politicians and Policemen. Those wise men turn their backs upon the world and its joys, and live only to serve the common people. Priests bear the burdens of conscience, and relieve you of all questions of right and wrong. Politicians carry the worries of daily life upon their shoulders, and leave you free to work with unburdened minds. Policemen guard your property, and teach the beauties of liberty. Three of these wise men are now leaving their country in search of people to succour. Is it your will that they come here to take from my hands the guiding of this kingdom?" And the people cried with a loud voice:

Digitized by Google

"Yea, yea! Send us the Priest and the Politician and the Policeman, O wise old king!"

Then the king sent for his sons, and disguised them secretly as Priest and Politician and Policeman, and taught them how to act, and presented them to the people, who rejoiced and were glad that the days of kings had gone. But the wise old king retired to his couch, and said: "Now I can close my eyes in peace, for my sons will rule for ever."

The Faithful Disciple.

And a certain Bishop went down from his palace to the poor quarter of the city (in a motor car) and spake unto the multitude;

For though he was a mighty man, he was humble before God, and despised not the poor.

And being a faithful servant of the Lord, he went without purse and without scrip, taking only his cheque book with him.

And he came to the place where he was to preach the Gospel, and there were many people gathered together.

And they were poorly clothed and wan looking, and seemed bearers of great burdens.

And the Bishop prayed and thanked God for his mercy and lovingkindness.

And seeing some little children, he raised his hands and blessed them, saying: Suffer the little children.

And they did suffer, for they were much hungered, and disease was in many of them.

And he preached unto the people, and spake of God's great love and compassion.

And the people were much moved, and many believed and were saved, and went back to starvation and misery praising the Lord.

At eventide, having fared sumptuously, the Bishop called his household unto prayer; his family, and his maidservants, and his menservants, and the stranger that was within his gates.

And blessed the name of the Lord, and praised him with a loud voice for the wondrous works he had wrought that day;

And wrestled earnestly in prayer for other sheep who had not yet found their Shepherd.

And, lo, when he had finished, as many as were gathered together did exclaim with a thankful voice, Amen.

POPE'S EPITAPH ON GAY.

Of manners gentle, of affections mild;
In wit, a man; simplicity, a child:
With native humour tempering virtuous rage,
Form'd to delight at once and lash the age:
Above temptation in a low estate,
And uncorrupted, e'en among the great:
A safe companion, and an easy friend,
Unblamed through life, lamented in thy end.
These are thy honours! Not that here thy bust
Is mix'd with heroes, or with kings thy dust;
But that the worthy and the good shall say,
Striking their pensive bosoms—"Here lies Gay!"

Obituary.

I regret to state that our friend and fellow-Freethinker, Mr. Stirton, died on October 24 after a brief illness. That he was highly respected amongst us is borne out by the fact that his remains were followed to the grave at Balgay Cemetery by members of Dundee Trades Council, of which he was President for a number of years. Also by the members of I.L. Party, Rechabites, J.P., and Military Tribunal, and Town Council, and kindred bodies, all of which he had in various ways laboured for. In compliance with his own request, there was no religious mummery at his funeral. Speeches were delivered by Messrs. John Ogilvy and Ex-Bailie John Reid, both of whom did justice to his memory.—David F. Gloak (Dundee).

Views and Opinions.

God and the War.

Why doesn't God end the War? Thousands of persons are asking that question to-day, and thousands of others are thinking it. Large numbers have already answered it to their own satisfaction, and the answer has been fatal to their Christianity. Being without any professional or vested interest in religious beliefs, they bring a relatively unsophisticated mind to bear upon the problem. And to them it appears plain that if there is a God, and he can bring the War to a satisfactory conclusion, he ought to do so. If he cannot bring it to a close, what is the use of all the talk of fatherly love, and of the divine control of the universe in the face of the brutal slaughter of the world's manhood? Our leaders in the War have declared it to be a crime to continue the contest for an hour longer than is absolutely necessary. The nations are fighting for peace, for humanity, and for civilization. The people are giving their all. God alone does nothing. He remains the great neutral, under conditions where neutrality spells an evasion of responsibility, and a callousness which outrivals by infinitude the callousness of man. If the world were governed by the orthodox Devil, he could vindicate his traditional character in no more thorough-going manner.

Pain and Providence.

In the Manchester City News for November 10, the Rev. A. L. Humphries, M.A., devotes a column to the consideration of the question put above, and, as is to be expected, leaves the question where he found it. He prefers to discuss it upon the broad issue of the function of pain and suffering in the world; and if he faced that question as we think it should be faced, one could find no fault with the method. Suffering, he says, is educational, it is disciplinary, or it is minatory—it warns us of a danger to which we are exposed. Neither statement meets the point at issue; and even if their relevancy were admitted, their ineffectiveness would be patent. For however educational pain may be, it is quite clear that large numbers fail to derive any educational benefit from its presence. And it is equally clear that pain is just as ineffective as a warning. What kind of a warning has war been to the world. War is nothing new. People went to war thousands of years ago; they are at war to-day. And Mr. Humphries' professional brethren sing of the righteousness of war, and of its influence in developing character. Mr. Humphries says that much suffering comes as the sequel "to some breach of the laws which have been ordained to us." That is untrue. There is no such thing possible as a breach of natural law. Natural law is no more than the expression of causes and consequences. And a true picture of the world would be—granting a Deity—that of a God watchful to punish with the utmost severity, and the most unrelenting cruelty, every false step that human weakness and ignorance takes.

The Problem.

The real problem of the world's suffering, says Mr. Humphries, is that a large part of it "springs from malignity or folly, and is visited less upon the offenders themselves than upon their helpless and unoffending victims." This is, indeed, a real and a serious problem—to the Theist. It is no problem whatever to the Atheist. His problem is how to reduce the sum of suffering in the world, deserved or undeserved. But the believer in deity has to reconcile the fact to the theory of unmerited suffering, with the existence of a deity who should have prevented its occurrence. How does Mr. Humphries meet the question? In quite the old-fashioned and ineffective manner. Suffering is a sensation, and you cannot have sensations that are pleasant without running the risk of having those that are unpleasant. We are all, moreover, parts of a social whole. We reap the harvests that others have sown, and we cannot complain because we suffer the ills that others have wrought. This may be admitted, but it quite misses the point. For we have here only the bald truism that, given the present constitution of the universe, it is impossible to see how development can be achieved without the infliction of pain. But this obviously does not touch the root of the question. The objection is that, given a deity of the kind posited by the Theist, suffering should not be, and it is simply beside the point to reply that some benefit is derived from the suffering. The old difficulty remains, and it is accentuated by modern conditions. Either God could have brought about the same result by a different plan or he could not. On the first assumption you limit his goodness by implying that he deliberately chose the existing plan with its admitted imperfections. On the second assumption you limit his power by asserting his inability to act differently, and then reduce him to impotence by conditioning his activity to forces and conditions that defy his power of manipulation.

The Bogey of Freedom.

Mr. Humphries' final argument is that God has given man "freedom." God has given man a free will, and "however misguided its action, He must treat it as the reality it is." And then, becoming alive to the danger of positing a God who sets the world going and then does nothing throughout eternity but watch it go, Mr.

Humphries reminds us that God, as in this War, "kindles human wills" to effect the defeat of evil. "The non-intervention of God is only apparent." In that case, what becomes of the previous plea that God cannot interfere lest he infringes human freedom? God does, after all, interfere; and once more the question arises, Why does he not interfere effectively? If he can influence human wills to the extent of getting men to fight, why does he not influence them to the extent of getting them to live together in peace? Besides, what are we doing in the War but seeking to interfere with the "freedom" of the German will, as they wish to interfere with the "freedom" of our will? If the Allies had followed the example of God Almighty, and respected the "freedom" of the German will to the extent of non-interference, Germany by this time would have been all over Europe. If man imitated God, in what a state would the world be! If God imitated man at his best, how much a better place the world might become!

The Nightmare of God.

Well may men ask "Why does not God end the War?" Well may they also ask "Why did he not prevent the War beginning?" If he does indeed "kindle human wills," why did he not influence the will of William of Germany and his advisers? Does anyone, we wonder, really find conviction in apologies, such as those offered by Mr. Humphries? Does anyone really believe that pain and suffering are always, or even generally, beneficial? We doubt it. Of all the idle tales told by defenders of Deity, this is the most idle. How many homes can each of us count in our experience as having been purified through suffering? How many lives can we not count that have been broken, and their usefulness destroyed, through pain and hardship? The problem of how to harmonize God and the world did not commence with the War, nor has the War added anything new to that question. All the War has done is to arouse many to the utter falsity and uselessness of the theistic philosophy. Lurid pictures have been drawn of what Europe dominated by a war-drunken military class would be like. But it could scarcely be worse than the prospect of the world dominated by an intelligence to which all this three years' horror was part of the divine plan of human education.

A SONG OF SIGHING.

Would some little joy to-day
Visit us, heart!
Could it but a moment stay,
Then depart;
With the flutter of its wings
Stirring sense of brighter things.
Like a butterfly astray
In a dark room,
Telling outside there is day,
Sweet flowers bloom,
Birds are singing, trees are green,
Runnels ripple silver sheen.
Heart, we have now been so long
Sad without change;
Shut in deep from shine and song,
Nor can range:
It would do us good to know
That the world is not all woe.
Would some little joy to-day
Visit us, heart!
Could it but a moment stay,
Then depart;
With the lustre of its wings
Lighting dreams of happy things,
O sad my heart!

Faith and Doubt.

WE congratulate the Rev. Dr. Fort Newton upon his having crossed and recrossed the Atlantic Ocean with safety during the ruthless submarine warfare, and wish him a prosperous career in his adopted country. His first Sunday sermon after his return from America appeared in the Christian Commonwealth for November 7, and proves to be, in some respects, eminently suggestive, if not instructive. It is certainly one of the most remarkable discourses ever delivered from a pulpit, as well as one of the truest. Dr. Newton's admissions are delightfully refreshing, and their sincerity is undeniable. Even the text is perilously illuminating: "Lord, I belive; help thou mine unbelief" (Mark ix. 24). The preacher's first important admission is that "faith and doubt jostle one another in the multitude of our thoughts"; "the two struggle in every heart, and the struggle never ends." We do not accept as true the statement that "even the hardest Sceptic must be tempted at times to believe," for we know many unbelievers who are never subjected to such a temptation. Of course, we are aware that if the term "Sceptic" be taken in its etymological sense of one who reflects, suspends his judgment, or is in a state of uncertainty as to what is true, the statement quoted may be right; but even the dictionaries tell us that a Sceptic is "one who doubts or disbelieves the statements and doctrines of revealed religion, especially of Christianity." Surely, then, the "hardest Sceptic" is not at all likely to be much troubled, at any time, by the temptation to believe. This is a point, however, to which we do not attach any serious importance; but we are in complete agreement with the other admission, namely, that "the loftiest saint is often tempted to doubt." Dr. Newton says:—

> Only a few years ago it was a fashion to say that doubt in respect to the truths of faith is due to moral impurity. Not so. Happily, the tendency was checked somewhat by Edna Lyall in her story entitled Donovan, which had a great vogue. There is a doubt born of moral impurity, but it is easily identified, being flippant, cynical, and irreverent. But not all doubt may be so defined or dealt with so glibly. They have learned little of life who do not know that the warfare with doubt is no incident, but a part of the life of faith. Each believing soul—aye, and each doubting soul—is a battlefield, and there is no discharge from the war.

We are convinced that the reverend gentleman is wrong when he affirms that doubt born of moral impurity is easily identified by its flippancy, cynicism, and irreverence. Are not flippancy and kindred qualities more matters of temperament than of character? Is not the reverend gentleman aware that a person may be flippant, cynical, and what he calls irreverent, without being morally impure? In the argument, however, this may be dismissed as a very minor point, the point of supreme importance being that in every believing soul there is going on a never-ending conflict between belief and unbelief, belief being never, for any length of time, absolutely cloudless and serene. In his Holy War, Bunyan describes Incredulity as unexpectedly stepping in and confounding Christian. "Such is the testimony of saintly lives in all ages."

> One day a friend came to Luther, sorely grieved, complaining that he found himself at times unable to believe anything. Whereupon, to his amazement, the Reformer began praising God loudly for the confession, saying that he had long thought himself alone in that temptation, and had feared it might be a token of Divine displeasure. Thus the eternal debate lasts on into the Christian life, half the soul mistrusting God and the other half adoring him.

Dr. Newton goes on piling up the evidence. During a voyage in the summer he re-read the lives of Maurice, Kingsley, and John Stirling, and what he found therein was further testimony of the same import. Maurice and Kingsley were, each in his own way, leaders of religious thought, and yet both were tormented almost continually by doubt. "More than once Kingsley wrote to Maurice telling him that his faith was all gone, and asking him for a word of comfort and cheer." But Maurice was himself generally in the same predicament, and had very little real comfort and cheer to impart to his friend. Why does the minister of the City Temple tell his congregation all these darksome facts? This is his own answer:—

> My purpose in recalling these inner struggles of noble minds is that we may learn that our experience of uncertainty, of misgiving, of dark doubt is not unique, and that the knowledge of how it was with others may bring solid comfort and help.

We frankly admit that Dr. Newton puts his case in a highly plausible, if not, cogent, manner, which is as follows:—

> Surely if great, pure, and beautiful souls were thus pursued by doubt, and in spite of their doubts—perhaps because of them—wrought so richly, we may take new heart and new hope. By knowing that this conflict of faith and doubt has been appointed, for ends we can imagine if we cannot define them, we are forearmed in advance.

Such is the argument of the sermon under discussion. It is a reasonable assumption that Dr. Newton is himself often, if not chronically, in a state of uncertainty as to whether Christianity is true or false. This is a fact which he does not even wish to hide from his congregation, and the only comfort he offers is, "We are all in the same boat." There is, naturally, some consolation in the possession of that knowledge, man being, after all, a gregarious animal. According to the reverend gentleman the only questions that matter are the following:—

> Is there a God? What is the purpose and worth of life? Has it a purpose? Or is all mere chance, a ship on a shoreless sea, drifting—if we can speak of drifting when there is no direction, no star? Does death end all? Compared with these questions, all else sinks into insignificance.

And yet these are the questions concerning which the firmest and loftiest believers are, most of the time, in a state of painful uncertainty! This is amazingly curious, to say the least. Dr. Newton inclines to the opinion that "this conflict of faith and doubt has been appointed," though he cannot explain the reason why. "Appointed" by whom? Is it conceivable God has appointed that his own servants, the offspring of his love, should go through life without knowing for certain whether their Father and Employer exists or not? Is it thinkable that he has flung them on time's theatre without giving them the ghost of an idea for what purpose?

In reality, Dr. Newton's argument is left woefully unfinished. Had he proceeded but one step further into it, the inevitable conclusion would have startled both him and his hearers. Why is there a perpetual conflict between faith and doubt? Because doubt is natural, and faith unnatural. Supernatural religion was born in the mists of the race's "Primal Stupidity." It is the child of fear based on ignorance. It is one of the incontrovertible facts of evolution that in proportion as knowledge of the natural advances faith in the supernatural declines. Superstition thrives only in the dark. What is being borne in upon us more and more is that we are in the hands, not of a Supernatural Being, but of the great law of universal causation, a law that operates infallibly and unceasingly everywhere in spite of the preaching of all the clergymen in the world. And, by-the-bye, why are there clergymen, and what is their business? In a word, clergymen are living witnesses to the truth that belief in a supernatural religion is by no means natural to mankind, but must be forced down its throat in the days of its childhood and youth, and then prevented by all sorts of persuasive and even coercive ministries, in school and church, from oozing out again, which, on Dr. Newton's own showing, it is all through life threatening to do, and, in so many instances, actually succeeds in doing.

Towards Dr. Newton, personally, we entertain the kindliest feelings, and our criticism is conceived in the friendliest spirit. There are a few points on which we should like to set him right. In the minds of convinced Freethinkers there is never the faintest shadow of a disposition to believe in the Supernatural. They know nothing of any conflict between unbelief and faith. It is our privilege to be acquainted with Atheists of the third generation, and they have never had the least experience of the struggle. They are totally ignorant of "the lonely horror of unbelief which no one escapes." Dr. Newton is entirely wrong in his characterization of the effect of unbelief upon those who conscientiously hold and profess it. Besides, there is no such thing as chance in the universe. We are all under law, and in knowledge of and obedience to that law alone can life be found which is worth living.

J. T. Lloyd.

Christianity in the Melting-Pot.

> Shall quips and sentences and these paper bullets of the brain awe a man from the career of his humour?
> —Shakespeare, "Much Ado About Nothing."

Science and religion have ever been mortal enemies. Scientific teaching and investigation, or, indeed, any form of intellectual liberty, has always been incompatible with assent to the dogmas of religion. The entire organization of priestcraft has invariably been brought to bear against science on the ground that it is a most powerful solvent of religious faith. This resistance of the Church of Christ to the prevalent opinions of scientists has no indisputable claim to our respect. When we remember that the system of Copernicus, the discoveries of Galileo, the law of gravitation of Newton, and the Darwinian theory were all in turn received in the same venerable quarter with all the firmness of a mule, we are inclined to attribute that resistance, not to the weakness of the arguments of the scientists, but to the priestly dislike of knowledge itself.

Chemistry was opposed as an impious prying into the secrets of God, and the early chemists were regarded, charitably, as agents of the Devil. Physiology and medicine were opposed on similar grounds. Geology and biology were also opposed tooth and nail by the Bride of Christ. She bitterly resented all inquiry, and preferred explaining natural phenomena by mythological invention.

After these many centuries of opposition, however, a lady attempted to build a golden bridge between religion and science. As the lady hailed from the land of tall buildings and tall statements, the new evangel was not hid under a bushel. It was spread abroad in the approved methods of patent medicine advertising, and the Gospel according to Mary Baker Glover Eddy bids fair to-day to rival the older evangel of Jesus Christ. The newest of new Bibles, Christian Science: A Key to the Scriptures, of which the American lady-saviour was the author appeared in 1866, and is now nearing its two hundredth edition.

Digitized by Google

The new evangel has been received by tens of thousands of half-educated religious men and women, reverent of learning, quite unable to discriminate it from its adulterated imitation. And Mrs. Eddy, quite as indiscriminating as any of her readers, was equipped admirably by a nodding acquaintance with theology, metaphysics, and a pseudo-scientific vocabulary, and the gift of a tenacious memory, to give them the thing they longed for. Words were Mrs. Eddy's stock-in-trade. Her pomp of court and her priesthood were verbosity. There are five hundred pages of polysyllabic words in her book. To a reader familiar with the sober use of scientific terms, her explanations and definitions are delirious jargon. They are the bastard offspring of a riotous imagination playing, in the light of half-grasped ideas from the scientists, upon resonant polysyllables. For example, here is a—definition:—

> Matter, mythology, mortality; another name for mortal mind; illusion, intelligence, substance, and life in non-intelligence and mortality; life resulting in death, and death in life; sensation in the sensationless; mind originating in matter; the opposite of truth; the opposite of God; that of which immortal mind takes no cognizance; that which mortal mind sees, feels, tastes, and smells in belief.

The author of this evangel from Earlswood, this farrago of nonsense, has been appropriately hailed as a teacher "second only to" Jesus Christ. It was only proper, therefore, that she should regard matter, mythology, and mortality as synonymous. Even the Master, who considered a "whale" was a "fish," could not improve upon this colossal blunder.

The topsy-turvy nature of the new evangel is shown by another quotation from the divine revelation:—

> The metaphysics of Christian science prove the rule by inversion.

For example:—

> There is no pain in truth, and there is no truth in pain.

Yet Mrs. Eddy, with pain, regrets that ontology receives less attention than physiology, and relates the following improving anecdote, worthy of the saucy and mendacious Baron Munchausen:—

> It is related that a father, anxious to try such an experiment, plunged his infant babe, only a few hours old, into water for several minutes, and repeated this operation daily, until the child could remain under water twenty minutes, moving and playing without harm like a fish. Parents should remember this, and so learn how to develop their children properly on dry land.

"Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" This beats the audacity of the story of Jonah and the Whale. What, in the name of common sense, did the lady-saviour suppose ontology to mean? It is fitting that such a teacher should give her disciples a form of prayer and a confession of faith which bears the same resemblance to the "Lord's Prayer" that margarine does to butter. The high-priestess of the new faith strutted in borrowed plumes, and charged three hundred dollars for a dozen lessons. No American oil-king, no provision profiteer, ever kept a keener eye or a tighter fist on money—the only material thing in existence which Christian Science allows to be real. She never allowed a dollar that had no friends to get by her alive. In short, Mrs. Eddy was a religious "boss," like the late-lamented "General" Booth.

Fortunately, the high-priestess of the newest and most successful form of religiosity did not escape ridicule. Mark Twain, the prince of jesters, with that characteristic twinkle in his eye, that irresistible drawl in his voice, that gravity of manner, tried to convince the lady-saviour's devotees that they might be mistaken. This is the way Mark burlesqued the Yankee Abracadabra:—

> There is an account of the restoration to perfect health, in a single night, of a fatally injured horse, by the application of Christian science. I can stand a good deal, but I recognize that the ice is getting thin here. That horse had as many as fifty claims; how could he demonstrate over them? Could he do the All Good, Good Good, Good Gracious, Liver, Bones, Truth, all down but nine, set them up on the other alley? Could he intone the scientific Statement of Being? Now, could he? Wouldn't it give him a relapse? Let us draw the line at horses. Horses and furniture.

This is genuine fun, and more effective than reams of prosaic argument. It never affected the enormous popularity of the Eddy evangel. For when a person joins the Christian Science temples, he must leave his brains at home. He must leave them locked up in an iron safe, or else have them removed by a skilled surgeon. If he should forget himself, and think but once, the bye-laws provide that he shall be fired out—instantly—for ever—no return ticket.

We set out in a spirit of inquiry to make a serious examination of the claims made by Mrs. Eddy. But this nonsensical system makes us giddy and tired; for, of all the strange, frantic, and incomprehensible books which have emanated from the half-crazy brains of religious maniacs, this book takes the first prize. It is more incoherent than the ravings of Joanna Southcott. Beside it Joe Smith's Book of Mormon is a plain, unvarnished tale. The Forty Coming Wonders of the late Prophet Baxter is shrinking modesty compared with the impudent effusion of Mary Eddy. This Yankee Bible fairly takes the breath away, and makes the head swim. No other less colloquial phrase can so aptly describe the effect of claims so far transcending sanity. One reels back from the insane heights of "Christian" Science to the simplicity of a rational system like Secularism, suited to the requirements of the age, and freed from the absurd aberrations of ignorance.

MIMNERMUS.

The Bible and Immortality.

THE UNDERWORLD.

IN the story of the "Witch of Endor," king Saul said to the woman "Bring me up Samuel," and when the spirit of that prophet appeared, it asked "Why hast thou disquieted me, to bring me up?" Samuel had died some time before, and his body was then in the "grave." This last word, as well as that translated "hell," is in the Hebrew termed Sheol, which the lexicon defines as "the abode of the soul after death."

We have incontrovertible evidence that many ancient peoples believed that man possessed within him something that was able to leave the body during sleep and go wandering about, seeing and acting just as the man himself did during the day, after which it returned and re-entered the body. Upon waking up in the middle of a dream, and remembering what he had been doing in it, the primitive man, after having it proved to him that he had never moved from his couch, naturally came to the conclusion that the actions which he remembered in the dream must have been performed by a second self that had power to leave the body at will. Later, when this idea became a settled conviction, the question would arise as to what would become of the "double" at death. By the more rational of the people the answer would be that it died with the body; but many among them would think otherwise—and hence we come to Sheol, "the abode of the soul after death."

The decipherment of the cuneiform inscriptions of Assyria has thrown much new light upon Old Testament literature, and amongst other matters, upon the origin and meaning of Sheol. From this source we find that the Hebrew Sheol was derived from the Assyrian al-Sualu —"the great city of the dead." The Assyrian idea of the abode of the so-called "spirits of the dead" was that of an immense tract of ground enclosed and surrounded by seven walls, each having a gate guarded by two cherubim for entrance, outside which, and flowing all around it, was the dark river of death—across which the dead were ferried by a pilot in his boat. Finally, this last home of the "departed spirits," where complete silence reigned, was imagined to be somewhere under the earth, and to be wrapped in total darkness. The names by which this "city of the dead" was most generally referred to are: "the land whence none return"—"the house of darkness"—"the house of corruption." The Assyrian legend of the descent of the goddess Ishtar into this region thus commences:—

> To the land whence none returned, to the land of corruption, Ishtar, the daughter of the Moon-god, turned her mind.....To the house of darkness.....to the house from which none come back, by the road which none can return, to the house from which light is excluded.

The Greeks, as we know, had a similar underworld called Hades, around which flowed the river Styx, with a pilot named Charon to ferry the spirits across.

The ancient Hebrews were of the same race as the Assyrians, and were acquainted with much of the literature pertaining to those people. From the Assyrians they took the names of their months, their sabbath, and the plan of their temple, as well as a large portion of their civil laws. It is not surprising, then, that they should adopt some of the Assyrian ideas respecting Sheol. Hence, we find that some of the Hebrew people also believed in a vast underworld, a dark, dreary, subterranean region, in which lay past generations of the "spirits of the dead" who amidst filth, worms, stench, and corruption, were sleeping their long last sleep, which would continue unbroken until the end of time. The story of the Witch of Endor, even admitting it to be a fiction, plainly indicates that there were individuals amongst the Hebrews who professed to have the power to call up spirits from Sheol, to which place, when done with, they were compelled to return. These wizards and witches are denounced in the Pentateuch as wicked impostors that should not be allowed to live. The Endor story also shows that inquiries such as there described were practised in Old Testament times in the later period of the Jewish kings. Thus Manasseh, king of Judah, who "did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord," in addition to other delinquencies "used enchantments, and dealt with them that had familiar spirits and with wizards" (2 Kings xxi. 6). The words in italics signify "appointed" or "placed in office."

We will now see what the Hebrew writers say upon the subject, and will commence with what the Lord is reported as saying to the prophet Ezekiel.

> Ezek. xxxii. 18-29.—Son of man, wail for the multitude of Egypt, and cast them down.....unto the nether parts of the earth, with them that go down into the pit. .....The strong among the mighty.....in the midst of Sheol.....they are gone down, they lie still, even the uncircumcised, slain by the sword. Asher is there and all her company.....all of them slain, fallen by the sword——Elam and all her multitude.....all of them slain by the sword, are gone down into the nether parts of the earth——Meshech, Tubal, and all her multitude .....slain by the sword.....shall they not lie with the mighty that are fallen, which are gone down to Sheol with their weapons of war?

Here we see nations that were enemies of the Israelites doomed to go down to "the pit," which is but another name for Sheol, as was also the expression "the nether parts of the earth."

In Isaiah xiv. 3-20 we find a long "parable" directed against a nameless king of Babylon, who was "the great oppressor of nations," in which the sleeping inhabitants of Sheol, having somehow heard of his death, wake up to await his coming.

> Isa. xiv. 9.—Sheol down beneath is moved for thee (i.e., the king of Babylon) to meet thee at thy coming: it stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth: it hath raised up upon their thrones all the kings of the nations.

Upon the appearance in Sheol of the king of Babylon, the kings and princes there greet him with the questions "Art thou also become as weak as we?" "Art thou become like unto us?" Then, looking at him from head to foot, they turn to each other and ask "Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms, and overthrow the cities thereof?" One verse in this "parable" appears almost startling. This reads:—

> All the kings of the nations (in Sheol) sleep in glory, every one in his own house.

According to this statement, the spirits of the dead kings in Sheol had each a small chamber to himself, and sat there propped up dressed in his robes of state.

We will next see what some other Hebrew writers have to say of Sheol.

> Psalm xlix. 14.—Like sheep they are laid in Sheol; death shall feed on them.
> Job vii. 9.—As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to Sheol shall come up no more.
> Job. xvii. 13.—If I look for Sheol as mine house; if I have spread my couch in the darkness; if I have said to corruption, Thou art my father; to the worm, Thou art my mother and my sister; where then is my hope? It shall go down to the bars of Sheol, where there is rest in the dust.
> Job x. 21, 22.—I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death; a land of thick darkness, as darkness itself; a land of the shadow of death, without any order, where the light is as darkness. (See also Job xi. 8; xiv. 10-12; xvi. 22; Psalm xxxiii. 4; xlix. 19.)

Looking now at the foregoing passages, there can be no doubt as to the belief of many of the ancient Hebrews with respect to death. That condition of the body, or of the imaginary "spirit" within the body, was regarded as an eternal sleep, from which there was no awakening. There can be no doubt, also, that they knew nothing of a life after death, to be passed in eternal bliss in heaven or in eternal torments in hell, as taught in the New Testament. It is clear, then, that the only life they had ever heard of was the natural one lived on the earth. It may, further, be noted that the books in which reference is made to the underworld are of late date. The book of Ezekiel was written during the Exile; that of Isaiah is made up of paragraphs composed both before and after the Exile; the date of the book of Job is unknown, but its long discussions clearly indicate a late period in Jewish history.

There is a paragraph in Ecclesiastes, which is often quoted, that may here be noticed. This reads:—

> Eccl. iii. 19-21.—For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath (or spirit); and man hath no pre-eminence above the beasts.....All go into one place: all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. Who knoweth the spirit of man whether it goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast whether it goeth downward to the earth.

Here the writer makes no distinction between body and spirit, and plainly implies that the body, when living, constitutes the whole man. Both man and beast had the same breath or spirit, which, he seems to have imagined, kept them alive; after death both man and beast returned to dust. He appears to have thought that people died simply because the breath placed in the body by God at birth had departed, and that in the case of man this breath or spirit went upward "unto God who gave it," while in that of the beast, it went downward to the earth. Thus the same writer, or possibly another, says:—

Digitized by Google

> Eccl. xii. 3, 7.—Because man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets.....and the dust (i.e., man) shall return to the earth as it was, and the spirit return unto God who gave it.

As we have already seen, the so-called "soul" or "spirit" in man was in the majority of cases nothing more than "breath"—the chief exception being the "spirit of the dead," which, apparently, was supposed to be a species of ghost or phantom. That the "abode of departed spirits" was a purely imaginary place goes, of course, without saying.

ABRACADABRA.

A Shepherd's Death.

[The following story is published by the Librejo Esperanto, Moscow, in Orienta Almanako, a collection of Eastern stories translated into Esperanto, and was originally written by J. Bukurauli in the language of the Karfvelians, one of the many races of the Caucasus.]

IT was the end of September. The sky over Trialeti was covered with brown-grey clouds. The cold mountain breeze made one shiver.

On the summit of a mountain a shepherd pastured his flock. The sheep, huddling close together owing to the cold, greedily ate the sweet mountain grass, and the shepherd, sitting by a stream, began his miserable breakfast.

Too modest was the shepherd's meal, but his lively and healthy youthfulness was enviable. Having lived from an early age on the very breast of nature, and hardened by unfavourable winds, he looked as healthy and blooming as nature, whose son he was. On his sunburnt face there was no sign of evil; he looked about him sincerely and without affectation. It was cold, but he did not even think of complaining about that. He would have been a bad shepherd if he had not been contented with his lot, if he would not have tolerated uncomplainingly hunger and cold, or would not have passed the night in only his burka[1] without sleeping.

He had been accustomed for some time to what one calls "a dog's life," but, at the same time, there flamed in his heart the hope that, in the near future, he would have his own flock of sheep.....

Dreaming attracted him: he recalled his unhappy childhood, when he, an orphan, trembled in the presence of his uncle's second wife; he remembered how she mercilessly beat and tormented him, turned him out of doors, and he, hungry and clad in rags, lay the whole day and night under the open sky. He remembered, too, how he quietly disappeared and came on to the Shiraka steppe. There a good hearted old man gave him shelter and "made a man of him." The disagreeable thoughts gave place to pleasant musings: Behold, he looks and almost sees his loving and unselfish young wife. She sits by the fire cuddling their sturdy little child. He kicks, smiles, and triumphantly watches the roaring fire throwing out golden-coloured flames.

Then comes the long-waited minute: one week will pass, then a second, and he will go home, rest in his own house, be among his acquaintances, and see once again his native village, the fields, and his friends.....

The sky became more and more disturbed, it grew angry and enraged. It began to thunder and blow terribly, it darkened. The stormy tempest and lightning and thunder terrified everything round about, and seemed to wish to wipe out of existence every being on the earth. The sheep bleated pitifully with fear, wildly running here and there, and, in the end, looking for a calm place, they ran without understanding, towards a chasm. The first running sheep, failing to preserve its balance, fell in and was killed; a second and a third followed. Wishing to save his flock from death, the shepherd barred the way. He ran now to this side, now to that, shouting and beating the sheep with his crook, almost beating some to death, but in vain; they madly pushed one another and innocently fell into the depths. The shepherd, seeing that they would all perish, threw away his burka and took off his long fur in order to act more freely. Convinced that his crook was not effective, he started to shoot, but again without success: the chasm was becoming filled with living bodies. The wind strengthened and scattered around grains of sand and little stones. The shepherd hopelessly lowered his hands and looked on. Drops of sweat appeared on his sunburnt face, which was getting blue.....

The tempest ceased and the sky became calm. It began to snow. Gradually the sheep became covered by a white shroud, and in only a few hours they were entombed in the snow. All perished. Only the shepherd remained alive, standing motionless and looking into the chasm with sorrowful eyes, and with him, his faithful shepherd dog.

"Oh! God, where then is thy justice?" groaned the shepherd, throwing his gun into the chasm and sitting down by the edge.

Night fell. Clouds covered the mountain top.....The stars began to shine. The moon appeared also, lighting up with its rays the snow-covered Mount Trialeti. The mountain slept, while somewhere at the base, shepherds guarded their flocks.

Two days later, a villager brought on an ass from the village some salt for the sheep, and food for the shepherd. He searched in vain. "Perhaps he is on the top," he thought.

"Ah-oo-oo!" he called to the shepherd. There came back in reply only the heartrending whining of the dog. He turned towards the latter, who seeing him, whined more pitifully. He came nearer, and found the shepherd on the ground.

"Alex! Alex!" He commenced to shake him. Alas! he did not succeed in waking him. Alex, like his flock, was no longer alive.

The Blank Wall.

II.

UNDER the abnormal stress of war the mind of man contrives to associate moral ideals with those actions which are naturally involved in the manifestation of war, such as the killing of men, etc.; and, indeed, all the various inhuman and monstrous objects contained in the fact of brute force. These things are now being associated with the popular picture paper idealism which seeks to melt "Christianity" with War; Love with Hate; Justice with Cant; Dignity with Degradation; and Truth with Lies.

"Ministers of God," agents for the "Spiritual Father of all Men," parade solemnly into their Churches in order to induce their congregations to swell the money-bags of the State, so that a Great War may be won as efficiently as possible. The result is this, that the concept of money as a power is immeasurably intensified. The triumphant evilness of the money-fetish is brought home with such force into the minds of the populace, that it will be a truism for the majority that hard cash has done as much for the success of brute force in a war as the primitive instincts of the men who have been sacrificed in the trenches.

This will, doubtless, be a correct impression. In this lies the stupefying tragedy of the popular mentality. War, as a barbaric argument which chokes Reason with blood, and being the negation of all idealism and sanity, must, logically, be substantially aided by so low and corrupt a force as the commercial force.

By investing money in the War Loan a man may feel that he is indirectly firing bullets at the enemy. He may sit comfortably at home in his arm-chair and visualize his five pounds "doing their bit."

Every fit man into the trenches for slaughter, and the rest obsessed by the power of money to win the War.

Acid Drops.

A young Belfast girl of 23 years of age, summoning a printer for the recovery of wages, declined to take the oath, and professed herself an Agnostic. The affirmation was allowed, but the following conversation occurred between the Recorder and the plaintiff:—

> His Honour—You don't see agnosticism running about the country. Where did you pick it up?
> Plaintiff—I read books of Ingersoll.
> His Honour—That is very bad reading for a young girl like you.

We take this report from the Belfast Evening Telegraph as one more example of the "insolence of office," on which we have so often commented. The judge's remarks were uncalled for, and insulting. The slander on Ingersoll may pass, his reputation is not likely to suffer from the remarks of an Irish judge. But the insult to the young lady is unpardonable. Had she been a reader of some of the erotic piety of the Catholic Church, no such remarks would have been made. Miss Mitchell was not there on any criminal charge, and that made the comment the worse.

About the same date as the above case an inquest was being held at Dromore, Co. Tyrone, on the bodies of Patrick and Michael M'Gurgan. The latter had not been reading "bad" literature, such as was given to the world by Ingersoll. He had been reading "good" literature, of the kind provided by the Churches. Result—a religious mania, which led Michael to shoot his brother and then himself. Had he read Ingersoll and other Freethinkers, there might have been one tragedy the less in Ireland.

How history repeats itself! During the Napoleonic wars, Mr. Edmund Gosse tells us, "the average Englishman believed the French to be a race of dissolute Atheists." During the present War the same pleasant opinion is held concerning the Germans.

The Rev. H. C. Walker, of Warley, Essex, who has been an Army Chaplain in Mesopotamia, says that the Arabs did a good trade with our soldiers in selling them chips from the "tree of knowledge of Good and Evil" on the site of the Garden of Eden. Evidently, soldiers are not classified as "Church of England" for nothing.

The Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell, writing in the Daily News, says "the Church professes to place in each parish an official teacher of religion and morality." "Professes" is quite good. A large number of citizens regard the clergy as exponents of superstition and conventionality.

Oh, those dear bishops! What would the poor world do without their precious words of wisdom? Here is Bishop Welldon telling us that "the War has brought men like Mr. Wells and Mr. Bottomley back, not, indeed, to Christian orthodoxy, but to the religious or spiritual way of looking at the universe." Is that the only consolation that the Bishop can derive from the spectacle of thirty-five millions of men arrayed for murder?

The Church Times continues in a state of disturbance over the marriage question. Its great dread appears to be that of a general recognition of the supremacy of the Civil Law in determining the conditions of the marital relation. It is even willing to accept the Scotch principle of agreement before witnesses so long as the State has not the decisive word. "The fundamental truth," it says, "is that marriage is a natural relation, not an artificial relation created by law." So far we agree; but that misses the point at issue. The State does not claim to create the natural relation of marriage, nor to order it. All it does is to decree the conditions under which it should exist, and the conditions under which it is prepared to enforce the agreement. What the Church Times is aiming at is the recognition that husband and wife "are joined together by God," and that, as Euclid says, is absurd.

The story of a Sunday-school superintendent, who took advantage of a man's absence in France to lead his wife astray, was told in the Divorce Court recently. The superintendent's letters were pious. In one he wrote: "My great consolation is that I have not put asunder those who God has joined together, because I know that God is the God of Love, and He would not permit those who do not dearly love one another to be joined together." The husband, on his return, gave the co-respondent a sound thrashing, and a decree nisi was granted by the Court, with costs against the superintendent. The restraining power of religion is not apparent in the case.

There were 134,029 lunatics in England and Wales at the beginning of the year—3,159 less than last year. Providence is getting quite tender-hearted.

Canon Chichester, speaking at Weybridge, said "a serious defect of the times is the starvation pay of the clergy." Perhaps the dear bishops will devote a portion of their salaries to provide bread for the unfortunate rectors and vicars.

From John Bull for November 10:—

> Apropos of our story of the Madonna and Child leaning over the town of Albert, from the heavily shelled tower of the ruined Cathedral, the Freethinker charges us with "gulling" the public, and says it "happens to know the truth." Then why not tell it?

So we could; but we gave, and still give, Mr. Bottomley an opportunity of stating the facts. And we repeat that neither German nor English shells have anything to do with the present position of the statue. Some religious papers saw a chance of working a "miracle," at the expense of truth, and Mr. Bottomley followed their lead. Mr. Bottomley's picture of the "folk of Arras and Albert" believing that "God raised His hand to shield from harm" the statue of the Virgin is ridiculous. Pious folk away from Arras and Albert may believe it. The people at Arras and Albert know better. So do our own soldiers who are near the spot.

Christian institutions have benefited largely by the death of Mr. W. P. Hampton, house furnisher, of Pall Mall, who left estate of the value of £153,325. He gave £5,000 to the British Foreign Bible Society; £2,000 each to the London Missionary Society, Barnardo's Homes, and the Salvation Army, and smaller bequests to other organizations. This is a wholesale endowment of superstition.

As a result of the recent breakfast-table conference between the clergy and the Premier at Downing Street, there will shortly be a big pulpit campaign advocating self-sacrifice during the War. So a Sunday paper informs its readers. What the public would like to hear is what sacrifice the clergy themselves propose to make in the fourth year of the War. So far they have done nothing except give advice, often unsound.

No fewer than 200,000 out of 250,000 members of the Brotherhood Movement are serving their country, said Dr. Clifford, president of the movement. And, presumably, enforcing the idea of brotherhood at the point of the bayonet.

While cycling to church at Kingston-on-Thames, Annie Keane was run over by a motor-lorry and killed. Had she been on her way to a Freethought meeting, there would have been an awful and impressive moral.

Caradoc Evans, the author of My People, the novel which greatly annoyed Welsh Nonconformists, replies vigorously to one of his critics in a recent issue of Everyman. His critic, he says,— > is angry that I have discovered Welsh Nonconformity, showing the three evils by which it thrives: hypocrisy, brutality, lust. Its god is wicked and crafty; he rules by the hand of his preachers—black-coated, cunning rascals, whose avarice is never appeased. They demand offerings from the widow and the orphan, and they fill their stomachs and clothe their bodies as though they were princes in the land. Their arrogance is awful.....

> Fashioned by such rulers, is it surprising that we are the most backward race in Europe? Spiritually and morally we are unsound. I know a Welshman who asked God to help him to cheat his brother. I know another who, while despoiling a young girl, sang one of Pantycelyn's hymns. I know another who committed a sin with the chapel-keeper in an open grave. I know a man who hated his sister so much that he set an angry bull upon her. I know a preacher who condoned incest in a member of his congregation and who practised it himself.....
> We are as Welsh Nonconformity has made us. Not until the last chapel is a cowhouse and the last black-coated worker of abomination is hanged shall we set forth on our march to the light.

There is nothing wanting here in the direction of vigour. It is small wonder that young Wales, which is taking the task of education very seriously indeed, should be in a state of revolt against all the Churches.

A farmer, fined at Widnes for selling carcases above the maximum price, made the excuse, "Everybody's doing it." "Pity 'tis, 'tis true." You can always trust Christians to rob one another.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, replying to a criticism that "spirits" needed clothes, said that "modesty does not cease with this life. Has it ever been the custom for any of the churches to describe the angels as nude?" This reminds us that some of the celestial visitors mentioned in the Bible had some of the qualities of Don Juan. Whilst it may be correct to say theologians do not describe angels as nude, it must be borne in mind that cherubs have nowhere to put any clothes.

Germany, says the Church Times, "is what Protestantism has made it. Protestantism is morally and spiritually bankrupt." This, after being told so frequently that the state of Germany was due to its rejection of Christianity. But if Protestantism is morally and spiritually bankrupt, we should like to know what form of Christianity is in a better condition?

Fireworks being prohibited on Guy Fawkes Day probably means the end of this once popular festival. It is interesting to recall that not until the middle of the nineteenth century was the Guy Fawkes service deleted from the Prayer Book.

Addressing the members of the National Liberal Club, Mr. Augustine Birrell urged that "everybody should dedicate some small part of each day to a good book, as, for example, Gibbon's Decline and Fall or Tristram Shandy." Oh, Mr. Birrell! Fancy Nonconformist politicians reading "Gibbon" and "Sterne," for the former was a Freethinker and the latter a Churchman.

The myth of a Germany formally repudiating Christianity, and perpetrating all the atrocities with which it has stained its reputation as a consequence, is almost dead. The lie was too gross even for a time when credulity in some directions has surpassed itself. And the myth of our own soldiers made religious as a result of the War is rapidly breaking down. We have given numerous instances, from religious sources, of the carelessness of our men about religion, and our columns have provided evidence of the number who have formally repudiated religious belief since the War began. Now we see, from a report in the Birmingham Gazette of November 7, Canon Adderley admits that "the sense of prayer, of other worldliness, of mystery, is almost dead among our common people." And speaking of his experience in a hospital in France he says: "It was the German prisoners, with their little Christmas tapers by their bed-side—and they were Protestants, who seemed to be more mystical and other-worldly than our own dear Tommies who mixed up "Tipperary" with "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing." We wish Canon Adderley had given his audience the actual words sung by many of the "dear Tommies" to hymn tunes.

Evidence to the same end is given in "As Tommy Sees Us," by A. Herbert Gray. He says: "It remains true that the majority of men in our Army are almost quite indifferent to the Church, if not contemptuous about it.....It is an extraordinary thing how the average man dislikes ministers." This is quite a different picture from that drawn by the Bishop of London. He found the men quite eager to listen to parsons—at least, he said he found them so. And who are we that we should cast doubt upon the word of a Bishop?

Mr. Elliott O'Donnell, speaking at a meeting of the Psychical Research Society, suggested that "spirits" may be untruthful. Surely that is an open question. There is no doubt, however, that Spiritualists are not all George Washingtons.

The Rev. W. M. Pitcher, curate at Whitkirk, near Leeds, is reported in the Yorkshire Evening Post of November 5 to have said: "We will not follow a King who does not follow Christ, but we will follow the Kaiser if he follows Christ." This was said in connection with the proposed reform of the Divorce Laws. But all it means is that the Church will support anyone or anything that supports it. And there is nothing new. That is the policy of all the Churches.

Mr. Alfred Ewen, who has been for twenty-seven years Official Receiver at Northampton, is retiring from office under the age limit, and will enter "Holy Orders." He is to take up a curacy near Truro. This we regard as a direct instance of the fitness of things. Having had a long experience in winding up bankrupt concerns, we can foresee a busy time for Mr. Ewen in dealing with the Church.

The Pall Mall Gazette reports a meeting of the Congress of Christian Workmen, representing 1,750,000 members, of whom 737,000 are serving with the Army, which strongly condemned all peace talk as being against the interests of Germany. The Secretary declares: "We went to war by the side of the Kaiser and the Princes, and we will return side by side with them." We hope the Bishop of London will note the activity of his brother Christians in Germany.

"Our business is to see that the enemy starves before we do," says the Daily Mail. A beautiful and touching Christian sentiment!

The Rev. A. D. Belden, speaking at Leigh-on-Sea, said that "the broken condition of the Church before the War was evidenced in Disestablishment and the New Theology." What does the reverend gentleman mean? Disestablishment is not yet an accomplished fact, and the New Theology is as dead as Queen Anne. The statement is as confusing as the tangle of the Trinity.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

November 18, Birmingham; November 25, Nuneaton; December, 2, South Shields; December 9, Glasgow.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—November 18, Manchester.

F. Steiner (New York).—Sorry both works are out of print. Pleased to have your good opinion of our reply to Mr. Clodd.

W. Barton.—We are obliged for your good offices in getting new readers. We should say that if twenty out of one hundred soldiers said they had prayed, the proportion was a good one as things go. But we presume they did not have to produce evidence.

Mr D. G. Gloak (Dundee) writes that he is willing to act as agent for the receipt of all such commissions in connection with the support of the Freethinker as were undertaken by Mr. R. Stirton, whose death we recorded last week. Mr. Stirton was a staunch friend of this paper; we know he has a worthy successor in the case of Mr. Gloak.

Mrs. E. Taylor.—Mr. Cohen will be delighted to meet you when he is again in Manchester, which will be on the first Sunday in January.

H. Irving.—Sorry we couldn't find space for your note last week. It is hardly worth while reopening the matter now.

W. T. Newman.—We are obliged. Shall be pleased to make an early use of your communication.

R. S.—We have no special organization for sending out literature to the men at the Front. We do send out a fair quantity, so far as our means permit, and we are pleased to know that it is read and is evidently doing useful work.

H. Black.—We are not thinking of reprinting that particular article as a leaflet. But we do intend writing some special leaflets, so soon as we can get sufficient time from our other occupations.

T. Dixon.—Thanks for contribution to Fund, and good wishes for a good big total before the Fund closes.

T. Clunin.—The value of Paley's theological writings is much greater of late years—owing to the increased price of waste paper.

Mr. J. A. Reid suggests that, when finished, readers should send their copies of the Freethinker to their local papers. That is an idea well worth following up.

J. B. Selby.—A religious service cannot be "forced" at any funeral against the wishes of the next-of-kin. A burial without a service of any sort is quite in order, and many occur.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

We have one more issue of the Freethinker in which to acknowledge additions to this Fund, which means that all subscriptions should reach me by Tuesday, November 20, the day on which next week's issue goes to press. We are gratified at the prompt and generous response made to our appeal, and we continue to receive letters from readers, which serve as an added encouragement to press on. We have not had space to quote from many of these of late, but we venture on two or three in this last time of writing.

Mr. W. Moore writes from Belfast:—

> May I congratulate you on the sustained excellence of the paper these troublous times. It is a marvel how you "carry on" under present difficulties. Considering the number of periodicals that have gone under in the struggle, and the much greater number that have increased in price and decreased in size, you should feel extremely proud of your very fine work in the cause of Freethought. I sincerely hope sufficient will be contributed to free you from further anxiety until the end of next year. In my opinion, you have a big enough burden to bear without having to shoulder so much worry through lack of funds to obtain supplies.

"Deneb," in sending a further subscription, writes:—

> In view of the fact that the King has decided to win the War at the latest by January 7 by means of a National Day of Prayer, I feel justified in dipping into my very limited funds and sending you a third small subscription.

That is a very prompt answer to the prayers that are to be offered. We hope the clergy will be satisfied.

From Captain Sinclair:—

> To have kept the Freethinker going during these three years of War is a triumph, as signal as any ever achieved by our paper. It would be a thousand pities, now that you have so brilliantly conquered the ridges, if you were prevented peppering the enemy well through want of ammunition. Please find herewith a few bullets, and, believe me, it is not lack of will that prevents my sending a high explosive shell of the largest calibre.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen lectures to-day in the Repertory Theatre, Station Street, Birmingham. The lecture commences at 7 o'clock. Subject: "Do the Dead Live?" Birmingham friends are looking forward to a crowded house and we hope they will not be disappointed.

The Pioneer Press has just added to its list of bargains a volume that will be of interest to a large number of readers. This is The Positive Evolution of Religion; Its Moral and Social Reaction, by Mr. Frederic Harrison. Mr. Harrison has been for many years one of the leading Positivists in England, and the volume summarizes his—to use the author's words—"final thoughts in the general problem of religion." It is a sustained criticism of all forms of established supernaturalistic religion, and written in Mr. Harrison's attractive style. The work was published in 1913 at 8s. 6d. net, and is now offered for sale at 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

To-day (November 18) Mr. Lloyd lectures at the Co-operative Hall, Downing Street, Ardwick, Manchester. The afternoon meeting is at 3 o'clock; the evening at 6.30. We hope there will be a good rally of Freethinkers, and also of Christians. Both are sure to be repaid for their attendance. Tickets, 6d. and 1s., may be obtained from the hall-keeper, from 68 Tib Street, and from 4,6 Great Cheetham Street East, Higher Broughton. There are a few free seats. Tea will be provided for visitors from a distance.

We are pleased to learn that Mr. Lloyd's meetings on Sunday were highly successful. Mr. Lonsdale, Local N. S. S. Secretary, writes in high praise of both the audience and of Mr. Lloyd's lectures. In the evening a resolution, moved by Mr. Pairney and seconded by Mr. Howitt, protesting against the proposed "Day of Prayer" as being calculated to bring the country into ridicule, was moved and carried unanimously. Our Glasgow friends evidently had a field day, and we wish them many others.

The Secretary of the North London Branch asks us to draw the attention of our readers to the debate on "Nietzsche, the Immoralist," to be opened by Mr. A. D. Howell-Smith at the St. Pancras Reform Club at 7.30 this evening. No modern writer has been more widely misunderstood and misrepresented than Nietzsche, and Mr. Smith's careful study of the life and writings of the great philosopher has made him most competent to deal with the subject, and we hope the debate will be well attended. There will be ample opportunity for discussion.

English readers will welcome a translation of M. Deshumbert's La Morale Fondee sur les Lois de la Nature, under the title of An Ethical System Based on the Laws of Nature. The work is an able attempt to base morality upon natural considerations, and the author shows considerable ability in arguing his case, and great ingenuity in the illustrations he provides his readers. The only adverse criticism that may be passed upon the work is a too great a tendency to justify Nature to man, and the anthropomorphism involved in expressions about Nature's "aims" and "ends" and "desires." Nor is M. Deshumbert sufficiently alive to the consideration that things may be inevitable without their being desirable or admitting of justification. And the function of the naturalistic philosopher is not to justify Nature so much as it is to point out how man may control natural forces and direct them to his own betterment. M. Deshumbert achieves this task with considerable success, in spite of his laying himself open to criticism in other directions. The book is published by The Open Court Co. at 2s. 6d. net.

Owing to the vagaries of the Post Office, a parcel containing "copy," posted from Mr. Cohen's private address to the office, failed to reach its destination. This involved an unusual amount of writing on Tuesday (publishing day), and many letters have had to remain unanswered until next week in consequence.

OUR HEAVENLY FATHER.

Our love and hate have aims, but Thine
Are idle bolts at random hurled;
Impotent, hidden, yet divine,
Brood o'er Thy broken-hearted world.

Cold to the prayer of human sorrow,
Deaf to the sob of human strife,
Thou workest grandly, night and morrow,
On Thy great masterpiece of life!

For Thine own pleasure is it done,
Since art's delight is in the doing;
Thine own enjoyment, slowly won,
Is the sole end Thou art pursuing.

The Everlasting Hills.

In all countries and ages where the mountains have formed an imposing feature of the landscape, the myths and marvels of religion have largely centred themselves among the inaccessible peaks that rise from the plains beneath. Ruskin's eloquently expressed conviction that mountains "are as a great and noble architecture, first giving shelter, comfort, and rest; and covered also with mighty sculpture and painted legend" is a quite modern conception. Among primitive peoples, and even with the cultured Romans and Greeks, the hills were regarded with feelings of wonder and fear. In our more prosaic period when science has proved to us that the uplands, so long supposed to date from the world's beginning, are really quite recent in origin; when the very Alps are tunnelled, and the altitudes of the most majestic mountains are determined; when roads or railways approach or traverse the earth's noblest elevations; much of the old-time romance has been shattered, and then replaced in the instructed mind with far loftier concepts of the mountain ranges of the globe. We have discovered that > those desolate and threatening ranges which.....men have looked upon with aversion or with horror, and shrunk back from as if they were haunted by perpetual images of death, are in reality sources of life and happiness, far fuller and more beneficent than all the bright fruitfulness of the plain. The valleys only feed; the mountains feed and guard and strengthen us.—(Ruskin, Modern Painters).

The literary masterpieces of classic civilization provide abundant proof that the lowlands and valleys, the meandering rivers and lower eminences, with all their floral and faunal treasures, were themes which inspired the poets with thoughts sublime. But the mysterious mountains that seemed to ascend to heaven itself appeared too sacred for secular speculation, and were viewed as the everlasting abodes of the eternal gods. In their high dwelling-place the divinities ruled the winds, the thunder, the lightning, and the rain, for all these came from above. Unwilling for religious reasons to trespass upon holy ground, there was in addition small inducement to wander among the harsh and barren highlands in search of plant or animal food.

In the Dark Centuries of Christian ascendancy in Europe every secret place was the haunt of nymphs, fairies, elves, and other weird beings. Nor need we now travel outside our own islands to meet rustic communities which still cherish a firm belief in the existence of dwarfs, fairies, and other uncanny folk who preside over the destiny of hill and heath in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales.

The children of Israel looked upon the mountains as the house of the Lord. On Mount Sinai Moses is reported to have received the Law from Jahveh, although owing to the long absence of their leader the people became restless, and demanded new gods which Aaron the priest promptly provided in the guise of the golden calf. Thus:—

> Israel made their gods of gold
> Altho' the trumpet blew so loud.

In India the story is much the same. From the earliest ages the Himalayas have been venerated by the native races of Hindostan. As Hutchinson writes in his Story of the Hills:—

> Thousands of people from all parts of that vast country still continue to seek salvation in the holy waters of the Ganges, and at its sacred sources in the snowy Himalayas. And to those who know India the wondrous snow-clad peaks of the Himalayas still seem to be surrounded with somewhat of the same halo of glory as of old.

Before the coming of the aviator's art, the possibilities of which we are only beginning to surmise, there was, probably, no more exhilarating experience available than that afforded by mountaineering. Those who have been privileged to enjoy the scenery, inhale the bracing breezes, and, at the close of a hard day's climbing among the Alps, or amid the rugged Scottish Highlands, have felt themselves ready to sleep, if necessary, on the hardest of stones, may be said to have truly lived. A sunset over the sea is unspeakably beautiful, but the effects of an Alpine sunset and afterglow, perhaps, defy portrayal, save from the pen of the poet, or the artist's brush. And when in the twilight of eve pale mists softly ascend, the peaks stand out in imperial grandeur, until the queen of night rising in the eastern sky sets her seal of loveliness alike on earth and heaven. Ruskin's worship of the mountains is displayed in many passages of deathless prose, while Wordsworth, one of the grandest of Nature poets, has immortalized the hills. The divine genius of Turner has transferred the painter's vision of mountain scenery to pictures precious beyond all praise. Tyndall's description of an Alpine evening is very striking:—

> After sunset the purple of the east changed to a deep neutral tint; and against the faded red which spread above it, the sun-forsaken mountains laid their cold and ghostly heads. The ruddy colour vanished more and more; the stars strengthened in lustre, until finally the moon and they held undisputed possession of the blue sky.

There is no known instance of a mountain race that is destitute of the qualities of hardiness, physical power, and bravery. Their stern surroundings have stamped themselves upon the people. In such circumstances there is little chance for weaklings. These last are weeded out, and only those endowed with muscular strength and endurance are permitted to perpetuate the race. The fighting propensities of mountain stocks are notorious. The Balkan peninsula has long provided a mournful instance of this verity. The dwellers in the Afghan hills are famed for their fierceness in warfare. The martial spirit of the Scottish Highlanders continued to burst forth at the slightest provocation centuries after the Lowlanders had learnt to properly appreciate the blessings of peace. Although other factors are unquestionably involved in the maintenance of the martial spirit, there can be little doubt that a mountainous environment promotes the passion for adventure, a passion that is closely related to the readiness for strife.

Professor Bonney, in his instructive Alpine Regions of Switzerland, has adduced a number of quaint superstitions which still prevail in what Leslie Stephen termed "the playground of Europe." Credulous peasants solemnly attest that they hear the wail of the wild huntsman as he and his spectral companions rush past the solitary chalet. Then there is the bold, bad boy who crucified an aged male goat, and compelled the herd to worship it. As a penalty for his sin the wicked youth was smitten by lightning, and ever since he has wandered among the mountains bewailing his crime. Satan himself figures in these legends, and ghostly animals, brownies, and pigmies are common, while traditions of the havoc occasioned by the fall of rocks and avalanches have given birth to a host of fabulous beliefs.

Men marvelled in antiquity when Hannibal invaded Italy by crossing the Alps, and many centuries later Napoleon's successful march over the same formidable barrier was the occasion of much astonishment. Nevertheless, mountain ranges have in all ages served to separate State from State. One need only to glance at the map to note the extent to which elevated areas and rivers have operated in establishing political boundaries. Austria's chief defence against the armies of Italy consisted in her Alpine barrier. The possession of the heights is immensely important just now on the Western Front. The Pyrenees separate France and Spain. England and Scotland again are divided by the Cheviots in conjunction with the Tweed.

Our planet's true mountain masses are the huge continents which rise above the level of the sea, for, in comparison with these, our mountain chains are insignificant wrinkles. But, although when related to the entire earth, our elevations are so small, yet, to a little land mammal like man they appear supremely great. Still, however inferior absolutely, relatively the mountains are sufficiently important to exercise a potent influence on animal and vegetable life. The average annual snowfall on the Alps is estimated at 33 feet. Were this snow to accumulate from year to year by the end of a century the height of these mountains would increase to the extent of 3,300 feet. But much of the snow is melted by the sun and evaporated by the action of the atmosphere, while, above all, stupendous snow fields gradually sweep down the declivities and become transformed into rivers of ice whose terminals are thawed by the warmer air which embraces them, thus producing the glacier streams which course down the hills.

The sublimities of these magnificent mountains are tempered by their terrors. At certain seasons of the year the avalanche is a source of constant dread to the Alpine population, although familiarity with the ever present danger tends to promote a spirit of resignation. The avalanche is classified into three kinds. The fury of the first of these is expended on the mountains with little harm to man. The minor glaciers in the upper Alpine regions frequently end abruptly on the margin of a precipice. This arrested ice is subjected to the pressure of the growing masses of ice above it until it is dashed down the cliffs. The fall of these crystalline masses is a wonderful sight, and when the great cloud of powdered snow has disappeared below, and silence once more reigns, "the thunder of the avalanche is suddenly heard reverberating in deep echoes in the mountain gorges, as if it were the voice of the mountain itself."

In winter the fresh fallen snow, when disturbed, slides down the declivities and overwhelms the valley beneath. From time to time whole villages have been buried in huge graves of snow with tragic results. This is the second or dust avalanche.

The third variety of avalanche is the ground avalanche which is caused by the descent of dense and indurated masses of weathered snow. The ground avalanche is the most destructive, and trees are thickly planted on the mountain slopes to prevent its fall. The Swiss death-roll from these catastrophes is a serious one. In the Rhone valley in 1720 one of these accidents caused the death of eighty-eight human beings, the destruction of 120 cottages, and the loss of 400 head of cattle.

(To be continued.) T. F. Palmer.

Science, no less than common sense, dispels Christian superstition. Evolution destroys the idea of a general catastrophe. There was a time when life could not exist on the earth, and there will probably come a time when it will cease to exist. Long before then man will have disappeared. But the æon of our race may extend to millions of years. Is not this time practically infinite? And do not those who make it a cause for lamentation and despair resemble the man that Spinoza ridicules, who refuses to eat his dinner today because he is not sure of a dinner for ever and ever? Sit down, you fool, and eat.

The Church and Liberty.

MANY who think Mr. G. K. Chesterton most impossible as a philosopher, historian, and publicist, will agree that he is hard to beat as a poet and a rhetorician. He once wrote a poem on the English working-classes which contained these lines:—

Smile at us, pay us, pass us; but do not quite forget,
For we are the people of England, that never has spoken yet.

. . . . . .

There are no folk in the whole world so helpless or so wise.
There is hunger in our bellies, there is laughter in our eyes;
You laugh at us and love us, both mugs and eyes are wet:
Only you do not know us. For we have not spoken yet.

Mr. Chesterton's Short History of England, just published, is an essay in amplification of this poem. I have read the book and several reviews of it, including a very stupid review in the Morning Post. That review exhibits the ignorance of its writer by denouncing Mr. Chesterton's History as a revolutionary Socialist pamphlet. Socialists and Freethinkers differ from Mr. Chesterton more profoundly than the Morning Post does, and they will know better than that. What his book reveals to me, at any rate, is simply the extraordinary limitation of his understanding. Again and again, in the course of it, he has occasion to refer to some important movement, which he not only does not understand, but which he seems too lazy or too impatient to try to understand. It is not surprising to find him failing in this way to understand Mohammedanism, or Puritanism, or modern science. But we open our eyes when he apparently fails to understand the French Revolution, in which he has always posed as something of a specialist; and when it turns out that he does not even understand the Christian religion, of which he is a distinguished champion, we feel instinctively for a penny that we may present him with the proverbial bun.

The thesis of Mr. Chesterton, on which his book centres, is that the liberties of the English people were created by Catholic Christianity, and destroyed by the rejection of Catholic Christianity. He naturally begins with the old assertion that the Church put an end to slavery; and not content with this historical misrepresentation, he gives reasons a priori why it had to be true. Christianity, he tells us, "was the most revolutionary of all revolutions, since it identified the dead body on a servile gibbet with the fatherhood in the skies." I am afraid that if Mr. Chesterton had written this when Catholic dogma was a living force, instead of a mere political convenience as now, he would have been sharply dealt with as a Sabellian, or, at the very least, as a Monophysite. It would have been more profitable if, instead of explaining what the Church should, a priori, have taught about slavery, and explaining it wrongly, Mr. Chesterton had told us simply what it did teach.

At no period of its history has the Catholic Church declared slavery to be wrong. Paul exhorts slaves to be obedient, and masters to be kind to their slaves; he nowhere enjoins emancipation. Between the time of Paul and the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the Roman Empire, slavery had considerably weakened from economic causes. The high-water mark of ancient slavery was about the date of the Christian era, when the rapid expansion of the Roman Empire by successful war had thrown on the market a flood of captives of all races, and made slaves a cheap and profitable investment. When Rome ceased to extend her conquests, slavery ceased to be so cheap or profitable. As the basis of industry, the institution had serious disadvantages. Slaves could not be trusted to perform other than the most elementary and least skilled tasks, to which they could be kept by the whip of the overseer. Hence ancient slavery lasted longest on agricultural estates; and even there the soil was ruined by this form of cultivation. By the time Christianity became politically supreme, the effects of these disadvantages were being felt, and slavery was slowly receding before serfdom. The last traces of slavery, however, as distinct from serfdom, did not disappear from Europe until the twelfth century. That the much-praised "efforts" of the Church should have taken eight centuries to extinguish an institution, which was already on the down grade economically, does not say much for the seriousness with which the Church went to work on this question. That the Church had no rooted objection to slavery is, moreover, proved by the fact of its revival, with the blessing of the Church, so soon as European nations began to seek expansion in the East, and later in the New World. Negro slavery, in the modern world, began with the conquests of Catholic Portugal and Catholic Spain.

The place of slavery in Europe as the basis of society was taken by serfdom; that is, instead of the labourer being a chattel to be bought and sold, he became a fixture on the soil, with a right to his holding subject to the due performance of various services to the feudal lord. Mr. Chesterton, not being able to make out that the Church was opposed to serfdom, has to argue that serfdom was really rather a good thing. The serf "could not be evicted; he could not even, in the modern fashion, have his rent raised. At the beginning it was merely that the slave was owned, but at least he could not be disowned. At the end he had really become a small landlord, merely because it was not the lord that owned him, but the land. It is hardly unsafe to suggest that in this (by one of the paradoxes of this extraordinary period) the very fixity of serfdom was a service to freedom." We would be the last to deny that there is something in all this; serfdom was an improvement on slavery. But how Mr. Chesterton would foam at the mouth if anyone ventured to apply similar reasoning to modern social conditions! In dealing with modern social reform, he continually harps on the theme that the tendency of such measures as Workmen's Compensation and Old Age Pensions is, not to make the wage-earner cease to be a wage-earner, but to enable "employees to claim certain advantages as employees, and as something permanently different from employers"—which he calls "the Servile State." Surely, on Mr. Chesterton's own principles, the modern social reformer might reply that in securing the worker against unemployment, and providing him with a minimum wage, we should make for liberty and not for slavery. "At the end he would really become a small capitalist, merely because it would not be the employer who owned him, but the industry. It is hardly unsafe to suggest that in this (by one of the paradoxes of this extraordinary period) the very fixity of employment would be a service to freedom." Mr. Chesterton's argument!

This, however, is a digression, which I permit myself to make because I cannot resist the temptation of cornering Mr. Chesterton on his favourite battle-ground. To return to the Church and mediæval serfdom. The Church, no doubt, could not reasonably be expected to oppose the system from the outset; but we are fairly entitled to scrutinize the attitude of the Church when others began to attack it in the interests of freedom. In describing the great peasant rising of 1381, Mr. Chesterton significantly omits all reference to the attitude of the Church. Let me supply the omission. John Ball, the prime mover of the revolt, was a heterodox priest, who had been imprisoned by the Archbishop of Canterbury for the tendencies of his sermons. The whole official influence of the Church was on the side of repression.

Digitized by Google

The Archbishop was beheaded by the peasants when they were masters of London. After the betrayal and suppression of the insurgents, in which the Church gleefully assisted, her representatives in Parliament, the abbots and bishops, joined with barons and knights in declaring that their serfs were their goods, and that they would never consent to free them. All this Mr. Chesterton omits.

He suggests that the unpopularity of the Catholic system was started by the "diseased energy" of the fifteenth century bishops who persecuted the Lollards. It is very gratifying to find that Mr. Chesterton's Catholicism actually permits him to express a mild disapproval of persecution. The unpopularity of the Church, however, dated from before the persecution of the Lollards. What the laity thought of the clergy in the later Middle Ages may be gathered from Chaucer's descriptions of the "summoner" and "pardoner," and from the satire of Langland. The gilt was off the Catholic gingerbread. The Church had sponged on society for centuries, and swallowed the livelihood of the poor and the abundance of the rich with equal avidity, on the pretence of being able, for these considerations, to insure people against everlasting torture by slow fire after death. Men were beginning to doubt if this claim was well founded—that was all.

Mr. Chesterton speaks of it as "a commonplace" that the monks "kept the world's diary, faced the plagues of all flesh, taught the first technical arts, preserved the pagan literature, and, above all, by a perpetual patchwork of charity, kept the poor from the most distant sight of their modern despair." There is an element of truth in this. The monks "kept the world's diary"—that is, they belauded every potentate who endowed them, no matter how ruffianly, and vilified every potentate who flouted them, no matter how beneficent. They "faced the plagues of all flesh"—after doing a great deal to aggravate them by their filthy cult of dirt for dirt's sake, of which we have abundant records in the lives of the saints. They "preserved the pagan literature"—so much of it, at least, as they did not destroy, or deface by scrawling their wretched martyrological romances over the original.

I must pass over Mr. Chesterton's modern history, much as I should like to dissect it. His essential perversion is summed up in that passage where, after attributing "complete and complacent paganism" to the English ruling class of the eighteenth century, he calls the French Revolution "a riot that broke up the very formal funeral of Christianity, and was followed by various other complications, including the corpse coming to life." No one would guess, from Mr. Chesterton's references to it, that the French Revolution, so far from being a revival of Christianity, was the culmination of eighteenth century scepticism; that its precursors, Voltaire and Rousseau, were the men of whom Dr. Johnson said that "it was difficult to settle the proportion of iniquity between them"; that the Revolution confiscated the estates of the Church in France, just as Henry VIII. had confiscated the estates of the Church in England, only far more completely; that relics were burnt and churches smashed by the Revolutionists in France, as by the Puritans in England; that the Englishmen of the nineteenth century who did try to revive Catholicism, such as Newman, loathed the Revolution and all its works; and that a modern stanza added to the revolutionary song, "La Carmagnole," runs as follows:—

Que demande un republicain?
Vivre et mourir sans calotin:
Le Christ a la voirie,
La Vierge a l'ecurie,
Et le Saint-Pere au diable—
Vive le son, vive le son—
Et le Saint-Pere au diable—
Vive le son du canon!

Economic Superstition.

The total of the world's War Debts now exceeds £25,000,000,000, and will probably be the double of that before the War is over. Moreover, every £1 subscribed now will be worth £2 when the present universal inflation of the currency is overtaken by the productive labour of the millions of workers now engaged in nothing but destructive work.

The population of the world is estimated at 1,640 millions, so that allowing one millionaire to every million would give 1,640 millionaires. Many of these, however, are multi-millionaires, e.g., John D. Rockefeller is said to have control of £100,000,000, and there are some thousands of men with fortunes but little less than £1,000,000. I am, therefore, not far out when I say that about 25,000 persons own £25,000,000,000.

Now these cosmopolitan millionaires, among whom are several German-Jews, have trustworthy agents in every country, and by their control of the currency they make a prey of every public enterprise. Peaceful enterprises now being at a standstill, they have, of course, subscribed largely to all the War Loans, of which they very likely now hold one half, amounting to £25,000,000,000. And as inflation is overtaken, this holding will increase to £50,000,000,000 without any effort on their part, not even the signing of another cheque. In a few years, therefore, the workers of the world, including, of course, all the professional classes, will find themselves confronted with a fraudulent War Debt of £50,000,000,000, compelling them to contribute goods and services of the value of £2,500,000,000 annually to these 25,000 millionaires.

Tolstoy said that the rouble would be made a more powerful instrument of oppression than the knout, and our professional classes, with an income tax of 10s. in the £ for many years to come, are likely to have this driven well home. Every worker in the world will be the virtual slave, for one half of every working day, of these millionaires who are quite able to evade any attempt to impose an adequate super-tax on their huge unearned incomes. On p. 128 of his Trade Fallacies, Mr. Arthur Kitson says: "The late Pierpoint Morgan could make and unmake whom he chose, and woe to the man who opposed him! His power far exceeded that of the President of the United States."

Their mode of operation is quite simple, e.g., the Government wants £950,000 to pay the soldiers. It gives an Exchequer Bond for £1,000,000 to Midas and receives in exchange his cheque for £950,000. The Government then cashes this cheque at the bank and receives 950,000 Currency Notes for £1 each, which it has itself given to the bank to save it from bankruptcy. Besides that the Government undertakes to pay Midas £50,000 annually until it can repay him the £1,000,000 which he has not advanced. Socialism has been described as something for nothing, so Midas must be a Socialist of a very pronounced type.

Now, an Exchequer Bond for £1,000,000 is a promise to pay bearer goods and services of that value, based on the honour and productive power of the British Empire. A Currency Note for £1 is precisely the same for the smaller amount, and both are, therefore, the best kind of money now in circulation.

On the other hand, Midas' cheque for £950,000 is an order to his bank to pay the Government £950,000 in gold, which he knows the bank has not got, and even if it had, it would be of no more use than the Government's own Currency Notes, because both are merely so many contrivances, for enabling the soldiers to obtain the goods and services they are entitled to. Thus we see another striking analogy between the twin superstitious beliefs in God and gold.

Here is some common bread and wine; a priest of God mutters some unmeaning words over them, and lo! they have become the actual flesh and blood of the useless God, and the poor devotee will gratefully hand over a large part of his hard-earned wealth for the imaginary service thus rendered to him by the priest of the useless God. Here is a piece of common paper, on which Midas writes a few untruthful words, and the poor devotee, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, gives him £50,000 of the people's hard-earned wages and an annuity of £50,000 for many years to come; and not one out of every ten thousand educated men can see anything queer in this performance—nay, positively resents any interference with it as destructive of the Empire! It has been well said that when God flies in at the window, common sense walks out at the door; and the same may be truthfully remarked about gold.[1]

ANECDOTAL.

Being junior curate in this gigantic parish of 20,000 souls I was allotted to the old women's almshouses; the old women there were the joy of my life. One of them was ninety-five years of age, exactly seventy years my senior, and she ruled the clergy, and especially myself, with a rod of iron. One snowy midnight I received an urgent summons to her bedside, and I hastened thither, fully expecting she might be dead by the time I reached her. Nothing of the kind.

"A nice time you've been, Mr. Blackpool"—they never could manage my name, anything with a B and two syllables served their purpose—that was her greeting. "I want yer to wind that yer eight-day clock o' mine."

"What, at one in the morning!" I indignantly cried. "Drag me out of bed into the snow to wind up your confounded old clock! Really, it's too bad of you, Mrs. Johnson."

"Nice languidge for a parson!" she ejaculated; raising her eyes to the heavens with irritating piety. "Yes, Mr. Brassplate, wind up my clock; them's my very words. The vicar says 'isself, the very last time he was 'ere, you was to do anything I required. Them's his orders, and well you knows it, Mr. Blackpool! So there's no good swearin' about it, which I don't 'old with parsons usin' such disgustin' languidge in my 'ouse. I allus tells a servant-gal wot I thinks of her, straight and done with it, and I allus tell a curick the same; then you know where you are!"

Of course, one wasn't not only one little bit angry with the dear old soul; but, as a matter of fact, I absolutely enjoyed her violent denunciations of me.—Raymond Blathwayt, "Through Life and Round the World."

Obituary.

It is with regret we report the death of Mr. Alfred W. M. Buscall, of 46 Newington Green Road, London, N., which occurred on November 6, in the 72nd year of his age. Mr. Buscall was a working member of the Mildmay Radical Club for upwards of twenty years. He was also a convinced Atheist, and made no secret of the fact. He left a will in which he requested the Secretary of the Club to arrange for a Secular Service at his funeral, which was accordingly done. He was held in high esteem by those who knew him. His burial took place at St. Pancras Cemetery on Friday, Nov. 9, in the presence of relations and friends.—J. T. Lloyd.

[1] Exchequer Bonds are now being used as currency, and by simply making them legal tender, the same as currency notes, the huge fictitious War Debt can be cancelled and every British worker's home relieved from the incubus that now threatens it.

Views and Opinions.

Boloism.

"Bolo" is the word of the hour. It has taken its place as one of the many words, sinister or otherwise, given us by the War, and is a new name for an old thing. There is nothing new in men selling their services for a cash equivalent, nor in the consequent manipulation of public opinion. It occurs at all times, and thrives lustily during a war period. During the French revolutionary period the French saw English gold everywhere, and "Pitt's money" became a veritable bugbear. To-day German gold occupies the same position. Mr. Lloyd George warns us to look out for "Boloism" in all its forms, and our flesh is made to creep by the pictures of German emissaries bribing men and women right and left to sell the interests of their country. Hair-raising revelations are foreshadowed, without materialization, and one is left marvelling at the wickedness of human nature, and at the almost criminal negligence of a Government which fails to lay by the heels people who so vilely sell the interests of the community to which they belong.

The Day of Prayer.

If "Boloism" had to do only with the world of politics, we should not concern ourselves with it here. Indeed, if the only Boloism were political boloism, we should be inclined to dismiss it with the reflection that it is in its proper habitat. But it covers a much wider sphere. Two or three weeks ago, in commenting upon the number of clergymen entertained at breakfast by Mr. Lloyd George, we warned our readers to be on the lookout for developments. These have not been long in coming. The King has issued a "Call for United Prayer." But it is a part of our constitution that the King acts only by and with the advice of his ministers. That relieves the King of responsibility—and dooms him to impotence. And, therefore, although it can only be a suspicion, we may be excused the assumption that this is one of the developments we anticipated. Moreover, Mr. H. W. Gooch, Secretary of the World's Evangelical Alliance, has announced that a national day of prayer has been considered by the War Cabinet and by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and a statement from Mr. Lloyd George may be expected. The clergy do not give something for nothing. They are the profiteers of the spiritual world. If they are to help the Government the Government must help them. Very early in the days of Christianity one of the disciples of Jesus sold his services to the enemy for thirty pieces of silver. Judas was the first Christian Boloist. And the professional Christian preacher is, in the main, descended from that stock. The price has gone up; that is the main difference.

The Day of Prayer.

January 6, 1918, is fixed for a special day of "prayer and thanksgiving." Thanksgiving! For what? Is it thanksgiving for the overrunning by Germany of Belgium, of France, of Poland, of Serbia, of Roumania, of Italy? Or are we to thank God that, while he has not preserved these countries, he has preserved us from a like calamity? Thanks to the men who have stood between us and disaster we can understand, and such gratitude is richly deserved. But thanks to God! That is a dangerous experiment. It may invite reflection, and people may ask what it is they have to thank God for And why a day of prayer by command? Anyone can pray who wants to. And voluntary service, even in prayer, looks better, and is better than conscription. Perhaps it is thought that as heaven is obdurate against individual sniping, it may yield to a mass attack. Everybody praying at once may be more effective than each one praying separately; and "high heaven" dazed into complaisance by the concerted din of millions of animated praying machines, may yield to noise the assistance it declines to human necessity. Above all, it will enable the clergy to pretend they are playing a useful part in the national life, and they will be able to present to the world a picture of Britain animated by the spirit of prayer and filled with a zeal for religion. In a world stricken with a great sorrow there is, perhaps, something to be said for even that poor joke.

Our Christian Bolos.

Now, I call this "Boloism" because the Day of Prayer, if carried through, will represent no more than the efforts of an interested professional priesthood. In this respect the Christian clergy represent the greatest organization of Boloism in the world. Germany spends, it is said, large sums of money all over the world in creating and fostering a public opinion favourable to its own designs. But what is this beside the millions spent every year by the Christian Churches to the same end? What opinion is there that would not secure champions under the same conditions? Christianity buys its defenders, and its emissaries are largely advocates arguing a brief, not men stating a conviction. As Boloism buys its advocates, so does Christianity. As Boloism corrupts the press, so does Christianity. As Boloism, by the suppression of facts, by the dissemination of falsehoods, by the cultivation of an artificially created opinion, is able to represent the product as the expression of a normal and healthy conviction, so is Christianity. Look out for Boloism in all its forms, cries Mr. Lloyd George. That is good advice; only let us bear in mind that it has wider and more permanent application than Germany and the War. Let us by all means make a clean sweep of our Bolos—and let us not forget the pulpit in the course of our operations.

Digitized by Google

Boloism and the Poor.

As our religious Boloism buys one class, so it bribes another. Consider the intense anxiety of the Churches to control the charities of the world! Careless, criminally careless, of the causes of extreme poverty, they are feverishly anxious to control the distribution of money given to meet some of its consequences. Some years back, Mr. Charles Booth, in his great survey of London life, spoke of the churches competing with all the eagerness of commercial travellers for the patronage of the poor. The purpose is patent. To share in these charities, attendance at church is imperative. In that way only are the poor known to the parson, and considered properly deserving. The church or chapel "mumper" is a well-known character in all poor districts. There is small wonder that the more far-seeing of the leaders of the working classes see in the church-controlled charities a fruitful cause of demoralization. Servility and acquiescence in religious formulæ become the condition of relief. Servility takes the place of independence. The support of the poor is purchased by the bribe of charity, just as surely as the advocacy of the better educated is purchased by the funds which the Churches have at their disposal. The removal of all endowed charities from the control of the Churches would strike a deadly blow at the prevalence of Christianity among the poor.

Boloism in Education.

Only one more example can now be given of the prevalence of "Boloism" in connection with Christianity. Much has been heard of late on the subject of education. And it is being urged, none too soon, that the position of the teacher should be surrounded with all due honour and importance, while he should bring to his work a character marked by dignity and independence. What are the facts? All over the country there are large numbers of teachers who are convinced of the inutility, if not the positive harm, of religious education in schools. There is another section which, while believing in Christianity, would willingly leave it out of the school course, recognizing that, in the present state of society, it should be given, if at all, in other than school hours and by hands other than theirs. And yet how few of these teachers dare say what they really think on the subject of religious education. Everyone knows that for them to speak out would mean endless annoyance at the hands of petty councils and managers and inspectors, with a loss of promotion, if not of position. How can we expect the right kind of teacher under such conditions? The better type is largely eliminated. The subservient chiefly remain; while those who assert their independence pay a price they should never be called upon to pay. The power of the purse is again in evidence in the interests of Christianity. It is a case of Boloism in the schools. It buys the advocacy of one class, it bribes the sullen acquiescence of another, and it cows yet a third class into silence. Let us, to again quote Mr. Lloyd George, beware of Boloism in all its forms, and let us bear in mind that its political aspect is neither the only, nor the most dangerous, form of its activity.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

"The Impetuous Lord."

ST. AUGUSTINE maintains that God is wholly everywhere, yet so that nothing contains the whole of him. The whole of God is in this room, but the whole of him is in every other room as well. According to this doctrine, nothing can be more absurd than the habit of praying for his presence. At religious meetings it seems to be taken for granted that the Lord is absent, for the burden of every prayer is, "Come to us, O God," or "Make thy presence felt." In his Confessions, St. Augustine gives expression to the unreasonableness of many of the petitions addressed to Heaven. He says: "And how shall I call upon my God, my God and Lord? For in truth when I call upon him I call him to enter into me.....Why then do I pray that thou shouldest enter into me seeing that I also am? For I should not be, if thou wert not in me." In an article entitled "The Impetuous Lord" in the Christian World for November 15, the Rev. Herbert Brook says that some Christians do not need to look forward to the second coming of Christ because they "are thrilled, subdued, solemnized, by the deep conviction and experience that he is already here. The prospect of our Lord's future advent is an alluring vision, but the certainty of his contemporary presence is a living, fruitful, working faith." And yet Mr. Brook himself appears to ignore this alleged truth in this very article. He assures us that "many of our painters and artists are obsessed with the idea of Christ's presence in our midst." He thinks that this is specially the case with pictures painted during the War:—

> In one scene Christ stands near the young widow who has lost her young husband in battle—and their sturdy boy is playing unconcernedly on the bed. In another, he is near to the young lad lying dead in the trench—with his face upturned to the stars.....Such pictures are plentiful, and one feels that they would not be painted if they did not express and satisfy some deep conviction and experience in modern life.

Mr. Brooks singles Mr. H. G. Wells out as a man of letters who "is obsessed with an idea that is somewhat similar to that of the painters." He reads Mr. Britling Sees It Through in the light of Mr. Wells' later work, God the Invisible King, in which is expressed the author's faith in an ever-present Deity of some sort.

But later on in the article Mr. Brook forgets the Divine omnipresence, and speaks of the Lord's peripatetic habit. No other interpretation can be put on the following words: "Prepare ye in the wilderness the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a high way for our God." Evidently the whole of Jehovah was not everywhere, and Mr. Brook is of opinion that the same limitation applies to the Christian God. He says:—

> What can we Christians do to help him in his work? Surely one great task is literally to prepare the pathways for the feet of our Lord.....They are the paths that Christ treads. Christ is to be met on them, just as surely as the disciples met Christ on the lonely path leading to Emmaus.

The idea of helping God in his work is preposterous in the extreme. Surely if God existed he would require no help to do his work. Clergymen sometimes admit that he could do without their services well enough, but that in his infinite wisdom and mercy he had seen fit to confer upon them the honour of being his helpers. What is meant by preparing the ways of the Lord we are not told; but the fact that he is supposed to have ways shows that he is by no means omnipresent. Mr. Brook tells us that "Make his paths straight" would be more accurately rendered thus, "Make his paths easy to run on"; but he does not inform us what to make them easy to run on signifies, or how it can be done. From the new version, however, he draws the inference that the Lord is in a big hurry to accomplish his work:—

> What kind of Lord is he who treads these well-worn by-paths? Obviously an eager and impetuous Lord. Some people seem to think of the Divine One as always moving through the world with leisurely and unhurried tread.....We get the inspiring interpretation, "Make the well-worn by-paths easy to run on." Why should this be done? Because the paths must be prepared for the passing, not of a leisurely, slow moving, but an eager, impetuous Lord. Christ is eager to get there..... Is not that the true picture of our Lord—eager, impetuous, anxious to reach the sinful, the repentant, the bereaved, the lonely? Make his well-worn paths easy to run on—that is the duty of all modern Christians.

In a closing sentence Mr. Brook ventures to point out that we can make God's paths straight by doing the work which he alone is usually supposed to be able to perform. We are called upon to blast national or individual sins into fragments by the dynamite of righteous denunciation and to awaken indifferent churches out of their lethargy. In other words, we must set a disjointed world right before the Lord can come to us. Furthermore, "here are ourselves, cold, hard, cynical, unbelieving—always standing in the way of the eager advance of an impetuous Lord—let us get off the path." When we shall have done the work, then God will appear and receive all the glory.

The portrait of God presented to us in Mr. Brook's article is by no means a flattering one. He is at once omnipresent and a traveller; omnipotent and yet dependent upon us. The whole of him is everywhere, and yet there are paths along which he moves. He is eager, impetuous, anxious to reach the sinful, the repentant, the bereaved, the lonely, and yet after nineteen centuries of his so-called redeeming career the world is still groaning under its sin and misery. The only inference we can intelligently make is that, like King Arthur and his Round Table, he and his salvation are merely the creation of the religious imagination. It is delightfully easy to talk and write about him with the utmost cocksureness; but not one of his official representatives has ever adduced the slightest evidence of his objective existence. They pray to him; they claim to be his spokesmen, delivering messages entrusted to them by him; whilst nominally giving him the credit for all their accomplishments, they hold him responsible for all their blunders and failures; but they have not a single shred of proof that he exists at all. The work they do is his; it is his cause that they have at heart, and the money they collect is for him. Ministers often excuse themselves for begging so pressingly for liberal contributions, on the ground that it is the Lord who needs them. Now, there are people who verily believe that all religious work is the Lord's and that the money spent in carrying it on is money given to the Lord; but ministers not a few are fully aware of the hypocritical character of all such representations. They know only too well that the Church has never been what she pretends to be, and that what she calls God's work is wholly her own. As already stated, the Church and her work are of such a nature and on such a scale that the Christian God, if he existed, could not think of them except with infinite shame. The only possible conclusion is that the Christian God is a myth, and that the Church is an exclusively human institution. Mr. Brook's "impetuous Lord" has never made his appearance, and his anxiety to reach and save mankind is an empty dream of the pulpit. Had he been a living reality there would have been no need of the Church and her ministrations. He would have done the work himself with complete success. The pulpit has been necessary simply because of the absolute powerlessness of the supernatural. The need for preaching testifies to the non-existence of the Holy Ghost.

J. T. Lloyd.

The Genius of "George Sand."

> Authors who have influence are merely those who express perfectly what other men are thinking; who reveal in people's minds ideas or sentiments which were tending to the birth.
> —Joseph Joubert.

Among the cheap reprints of the works of the French classic authors it is doubtful if there has been one that is more satisfactory than the fine edition of some of the works of "George Sand," which has been issued by the enterprising house of Messrs. George Bell & Co. Beautifully printed, and finely illustrated, these books form a welcome addition to any bookshelf.

Literary reputations are set up and demolished with such provoking rapidity, that it is pleasant to turn to a really great writer who is beyond the reach of the journalistic turmoil of the day. Long ago, Sainte-Beuve, the prince of critics, placed "George Sand" at the head of the then living French writers. How far "George Sand" deserved the exact place indicated by the foremost of French critics we cannot venture to determine, but her name has since been inscribed among the Olympians.

The life-story of Amantine Dupin, better known by her pen-name of "George Sand," is a veritable romance. She was a descendant of the famous Marshal Saxe, a natural son of Augustus of Poland, and one of the bravest of Marlborough's companions-in-arms. Little Amantine was brought up by a grandmother, and a tutor who held Voltairean views; consequently, she was left with no religious teaching at all during her early years. Some stories, impartially told her, of Jupiter and Christ, and other mythical personages, were all the theology that she remembered at this time. At the age of ten, with the precosity of genius, she had invented a god of her own, but this deity was dethroned as she grew older. Unfortunately, the young girl was sent to a convent school at Paris to complete her education. The Christian superstition was there presented in its most winning form by the nuns, who adapted themselves to her highly imaginative and sympathetic nature.

After two years' pressure the poor girl succumbed, and was on the verge of spoiling her life by taking the veil. Her grandmother became seriously alarmed, and removed the girl not a moment too soon. The nuns had done their work only too well, and Mdlle. Dupin's faith and her wish to renounce a life of which she was wholly ignorant, persisted long after the gates of the convent had clanged behind her.

She was not like other girls, however. Her mind was too virile to be permanently affected by priests' opium. Recovery came slowly, but surely. Her first shock came from reading Chateaubriand's Genie du Christianisme, a book, unwittingly, recommended by her unsuspicious confessor. She found the ideas so antagonistic to her preconceived views founded on the Imitatio Christi, that she was led finally to doubt the truth and unity of a religious system which could thus be expounded in two different senses. She then glided gently and imperceptibly into Freethought.

Family troubles supervened. Her grandmother died, and her home was broken up. Her father's family was alienated by her mother's relations. Her mother, who should have been her best friend, proved to be the worst guardian possible to such a girl. In her pitiable distress, deserted by her own kindred, Mdlle. Dupin committed the great mistake of her life. A few years before she had, by the help of her sceptical grandmother, escaped from the life-long imprisonment of a convent. Her wise old counsellor was now dead, and she wrecked, unknowingly, her life on a marriage of convenience. Only eighteen years of age, troubled and lonely, she allowed Baron Dudevant to persuade her that he would be a true friend, and, in an evil moment, she married him. She never loved him, and he never loved anybody but himself. He got drunk, kept low company, and was a beast. He found his wife's cleverness a nuisance. After nine years of torture, after the agony of a miserable marriage, the unhappy wife procured a judicial separation and the custody of her two children. During these wretched years her eyes opened. She lost her trust in a vague optimism. Like Candide, she was disillusioned by the logic of facts.

Her first novel, Rose et Blanche, was published as the work of "Jules Sand"; but she used her famous pen-name of "George Sand" on the publication of Indiana. From this time she continued to write an immense number of works, which reflect the strange shifts of her life. Lelia, and other novels, reveal the tumult and revolt that mark her early years in Paris. Consuelo, Spiridion, and many another volume show her engaged with political, philosophical, and religious speculation. Elle et Lui and Lucrezia Floriani are the outcome of her relations with Alfred de Musset and Chopin. The calm of her later years is reflected in La Petite Fadette, Francois le Champi, and other charming studies of rustic life.

As a novelist, "George Sand" is inferior to Balzac. Her stories are too didactic to be perfect. Novels with a purpose have been effective and, at the same time, artistic. Voltaire, whose swift, live pen was always wielded in the service of liberty, wrote many masterpieces filled with propaganda. His Candide, in spite of its obvious purpose, remains the wittiest book in the world. Rousseau, who flamed his social views over the civilized world, influenced men through the medium of prose fiction. In a lesser degree this is true of Bernardin de St. Pierre, Chateaubriand, and even Charles Dickens.

"George Sand," aiming at the same power, almost overloads her stories with masses of reverie. Her language is beautifully rich and pure, and her sentences melodious and full. She never runs her thoughts to death, but leaves the reader at the end of one of her opulent sentences, with plenty of food for future thought. Especially is this noticeable in Spiridion, in which she openly attacks the Christian superstition; and in Consuelo, which treats of the rights of women.

A great woman, "George Sand," is free from the effusive egoism so common with Continental writers. There was something of the Stoic in her nature, and she soared above the uneasy vanities of her contemporaries. Indifferent to luxury and fame, she did her work bravely. Intellectuals welcome in her a sister, not silenced by the terrors of theology, or limited by the bonds of conventionalism; but capable of pioneer work in life.

A woman of this stamp, like our own "George Eliot," must be judged charitably. With all the inevitable drawbacks of her womanliness, this gifted woman fought the battle for Freedom. It was a warfare not without scars; with rallyings on the stricken field; with its moments of triumph. If her works exhibit this warfare and this perplexity on too many eloquent pages, we judge with the forbearance springing from that larger wisdom which tempers justice with sympathy. Her first claim on us is, indeed, genius; but we should be hardly less interested in the record of a woman born of that heroic temper to which, after life-long recognition of the vanity of vanities, Liberty never waxed old, nor Love failed of its loveliness.

The Everlasting Hills.

II.

THE destructive snow and ice-slips are, however, mild visitations in comparison with other evils which befall the Alpine folk. Rocks may at any moment come rattling down in bomb-like fashion, or the entire side of a mountain may crash into the valleys, occasioning far-flung ruin. This form of landslip is termed the Bergfall, and all the Alpine countries bear sorrowful witness to its capacity in spreading desolation and woe. In Roman times the ancient city of Velleja was blotted out by the sudden crumbling of the mountain of Rovinazzo, and there is little evidence that any of the population escaped injury and death. Taurentum was overwhelmed in the sixth century, A.D., by falling rocks. The waters of Lake Geneva are still strewn with the mountain fragments then hurled into them. The dwellers throughout the Alpine regions have been the victims of many hundreds of such bergfalls within the historical period. Happy and prosperous villages, and immense tracts of cultivated land have been swept away. Streams have been diverted from their beds, and new lakes have arisen. Once smiling valleys remain as pitiful spectacles of utter desolation. For the second time Rossberg collapsed in 1806, when a wet summer having saturated the underlying clay, the mountain broke away. In the words of Hutchinson:—

> The part which fell was about three miles long and 350 yards wide and 33 yards thick. In five minutes one of the most fertile valleys in Switzerland was changed to a stony desert. Three whole villages, six churches, 120 houses, 200 chalets or stables, 225 head of cattle, and much land were buried under the ruins of Rossberg; 484 persons lost their lives.

The sudden collapse of Monte Conto in 1618 proved even more disastrous, when 2,400 people were entombed in the debris. Every effort to save the victims was useless, for all that could be recovered consisted in a few mangled corpses and the bell of the village church. To these happenings may be added the earthquakes which occur more frequently in highland regions than elsewhere.

The apparently frozen pinnacles are not destitute of organic forms. Plants and animals have admirably adapted themselves to their Arctic environment. Much as we see the crocus and the snowdrop timidly peeping above the softening snow during winter's stern reign, so do blooms of most exquisite beauty make themselves a home on the storm-lashed hills. Alpine shrubs and blossoms are diminutive when contrasted with those that thrive in more genial surroundings, but this in no way detracts from their loveliness. Temperature has much to do with the proportions of plants. As we journey northwards in Europe the monarchs of the woodlands dwindle in size until they ultimately shrink to mere shrubs and shrublets. It is stated that the dwarf willow, which extends to the Arctic regions, becomes so tiny that seven perfect trees may be placed on the page of an octavo volume.

Alpine flowers flourish on the fringes of the splendid forests which rise above the fertile valley lands. They grow in multitudinous masses on the sloping pastures, thus adding to the splendour of the landscape. They emblazon the emerald grasses with their glowing colours, while still higher, where the turf no longer grows, the flowers find a refuge in nooks and crannies, and even adorn the edges of the glaciers as they bud and blossom at their appointed season. Probably all these flowering plants would perish were they not protected from the terrible winter frosts by their warm mantle of snow. The more delicate forms are preserved during severe seasons by lying concealed under the snow throughout the year while patiently awaiting more favourable times. An extraordinary diversity of vegetable life dwells on the mountains, and the Alpine floras present us, at some altitude or other, with miniature representatives of almost every plant-type native to the temperate and northern climes. Among plants selected for special mention are the > tiny orchids quite as interesting in their way as those from the tropics; liliputian trees, and a tree-like moss branching into an erect little pyramid as if in imitation of a mountain pine; ferns that peep cautiously from narrow rocky crevices as if clinging to the rocks for shelter from cold blasts; bulbous plants from lilies to bluebells; evergreen shrubs, perfect in leaf and blossom and fruit, yet so small that one's hat will cover them.

The climate of the lower southern slopes and openings of the Alpine valleys is more propitious than that of the plains of Lombardy. There the evergreen oak flourishes, and the wild olive ripens its fruits. Other spots enjoying a sunward aspect are, unfortunately, exposed to the cold mountain blasts, and although their plant population is extensive, only the most hardy perennials can withstand the severity of the winter. The vine is widely cultivated in higher regions than the olive. The olive thrives on the lowest slopes, while the tougher vine grows vigorously on the higher levels. Vineyards abound among the Alps, and even in their northern regions splendid grapes are ripened at a considerable height where the vines are protected from the nipping and eager winds. The vine has apparently adapted itself to the bitter Alpine winters, and it almost invariably resists a temperature which proves fatal to it in warmer climes.

In the upper regions, where the vine grows indifferently, various cereals are extensively sown. This zone also coincides with the area of trees whose leaves are shed as winter approaches. Our deciduous trees, such as the beech, the ash, and the oak, mingle in the woods and forests; but in the Alps these plants seldom grow in company. Still, the Alpine areas in which deciduous trees thin out and disappear represent fairly accurately the beginning of the arctic girdle of the hills. This frigid region varies in altitude, but its average may be reckoned at about 4,000 feet above sea level on its northern side, while it rises to 5,500 feet on the southern slopes, for these are favoured with warmer air currents and an ampler supply of sunshine. In the Austrian Alps beech forests flourish, but in other Alpine districts the woodlands are merely a shadow of their former glory. Much of their timber has been utilized for building, and numerous forests have been uprooted to prepare the soil for pasture and mown crops. In some places the scenery is almost Scottish, for the pine and Scotch fir now stand on sites once occupied by the oak and beech. The mountain goats ravage the saplings of the beech and oak, but the pines and firs prove less vulnerable to the attacks of these animals. The dwarf pine figures prominently on heights to which other trees do not climb. The peasantry are alive to the fact that the mountain forests not only exercise a beneficent influence on rainfall and climate, but also serve as a barrier against the baleful powers of the vernal avalanche. The destruction of trees is viewed with aversion; the felling of timber in certain forests is sternly forbidden; while, where it is permitted, timber cutting is very carefully supervised by the authorities.

In the upper Alpine retreats peculiar plants live, and some of these thrive even above the permanent snowline. Yet the rhododendron, willow, and other familiar friends display their dwarfed forms in this frigid habitat. Chalets are met with in Piedmont at a height of 8,500 feet, and plants are quite numerous 1,000 feet higher. Below these great altitudes many strange and beautiful growths bloom in sheltered spots, and derive their moisture from the streamlets leaping from the melted snow. Giant anemones, sky-blue gentians, asters, daisies, primulas, forget-me-nots, saxifrages, poppies, solandellas, the edelweiss, and countless other floral gems flourish in such sweet profusion that a glorious flower garden gladdens the eye and refreshes the mind. Even on the very heights themselves, where glacial conditions prevail, in retreats free from snow and ice, where a modicum of soil and moisture is at hand, various species of flowering plants bloom at an altitude of 11,000 feet. Most of these vegetable organisms are arctic in character, and date from the Great Ice Age. From foothill to mountain-top, in one zone or another, most modes of floral life are encountered. There we meet the "Tree for the builder's yard—flowers for the bride's chamber—corn for the granary—moss for the grave."

The rocky retreats of the Alps provide a refuge for several large mammals now rare elsewhere in Western Europe. The urus, which roamed through the forests of prehistoric times, has long since passed away in company with the marsh-hog and many other animals. The wild boar lingers, and the black and brown bears tremble on the brink of extinction in the Tyrol, and perhaps in the Jura mountains. The black bear plunders the crops, while the brown variety is a serious enemy to the sheep and goats. The wolf survives in several secluded Alpine areas, but his doom is certain. This fierce and intelligent beast devours any kind of flesh available, but the domesticated animals form its favourite prey. Only in the depth of winter, when driven by hunger, will the Alpine wolf venture near the habitations of man. The crafty fox is common, but he carefully shuns observation. The sheep-stealing lynx is now rare, but the wild cat continues to lead a precarious existence in the more remote regions. The streams and lakes have their otter residents, while the weasel, stoat, and polecat wage war upon the poultry. The beaver is probably extinct, but the squirrels are abundant. Mountain hares are few, but rabbits are very numerous. The active chamois ranges throughout the Alps, but its numbers sadly decline. The steinbok, recently so common, is now confined to certain spots, where it is preserved. The roe, the fallow, and red deer, once so familiar in the Swiss and French Alps, are now rarely seen there, although they are still found in the Austrian and Bavarian highlands. The bearded vulture—the lammergeier, a rapacious bird of prey, originally widely distributed—now only persists in the least frequented mountains. Normally a carrion feeder, this fierce bird appears to prefer living prey, and will attack wild or domesticated animals with equal impartiality. The golden eagle, ten or a dozen species of owls, and other carnivorous birds abound, while game birds are plentiful, and the smaller songsters are well in evidence. Most of the tarns and lakes contain fine fresh-water fish, the trout and pike being remarkably large. Reptile life is poorly represented, but the common frog is extraordinarily abundant in the Rhone valley. Snakes, including a couple of adders, are not unknown. Among insects, moths and butterflies are richly represented, and various magnificent species rare in Britain are ubiquitous in the Alps. An Alpine tour has therefore been recommended to the collector as affording the fullest opportunity presented in temperate regions for the exercise of his art.

Priests and Politics.

THERE is an opinion abroad that the political power of the priest is, if not dead, moribund, and it is well that Freethinkers should have their attention drawn to the significant appearance of the priest in various quasi-political guises, the more especially as these are such as to mislead effectively the ordinary citizens who, having left school with a bias that what priests do is honourable and that what newspapers print is above suspicion and therefore requires no analysing, is neither inclined nor, if inclined, energetic enough to draw original conclusions. Such a one cannot admit the failure of Christianity because he has not been taught so; cannot admit the loss of liberty because he does not see the chains; cannot believe that religion is still intolerant because the fires of Smithfield are not burning. It is this "healthy stupidity" which makes the work of the pioneer so difficult as almost to exhaust his patience.

Bismarck saw the uses to which religion might be put when he encouraged the Roman Catholic Church in Germany that he might—as an inelegant phrase has it—"dish the Socialists." Although he did not succeed completely in his project, yet this move rendered their propaganda more difficult of accomplishment and at the same time fostered a recognition of the need for respectability, by which all revolutionary tendency was effectively damned. A cloak for hypocrisy, an ogre for fainthearts, a refuge for the weak and an excuse for folly, respectability is a brake which politicians and parsons apply to the wheels of an energetic progressive movement.

As one can examine dispassionately a cause operating in a foreign country, whilst the same examination conducted with regard to this country would have to surmount not only the ordinary difficulties inherent in the problem but the greater difficulties interposed by prejudice, it might be as well to call to remembrance the political power of the priest in Russia aud the reactionary tendencies of the Orthodox Church. We are reminded of the evil effects of priestly control by a criticism of The Fall of the Romanoffs, in which it is stated that Russian aristocratic circles held the view that the security of that country lay in the invulnerability of Czarism with its powerful religious sanction. When we remember that Czarism stands for political repression, serfdom, vodka, ignorance, and Siberia, we recognize what a meet husband Religion has clasped to her bosom. It is rather curious that in the same paper in which the criticism of The Fall of the Romanoffs appeared should be published the summary of a speech by Professor Russell, before the Medical Guild, in which he said that he had too great an admiration for, and appreciation of, what Christianity and Christian Ethics had done for the English-speaking people to yield to the proposal that voluntary hospitals should be abolished. Why Christianity should be for the benefit of English-speaking peoples and in the same age should support such a soul-destroying institution as Czarism is not very apparent.

Priests, however, even in English-speaking countries, are taking steps to ensure that their political power will be wielded, whether for the general welfare or not, is a matter upon which there is little doubt. It probably was overlooked by many Freethinkers that there were a number of priests at the Sinn Fein Conference held in Dublin, and that at least three spoke. The most amazing suggestion came from a priest. It was that the Conference should constitute itself a constituent assembly! The president sat severely upon him by pointing out that the Conference had no power to do that, as that power rested with the Irish people.

We cannot see that priests have any reason for attending a Sinn Fein Conference, unless it be that, fearful that the Irish people will fall away from the Church as the result of an enlightened educational policy which must follow so soon as Irish political aspirations for political autonomy are fulfilled, and that people concentrate on removing from its life such evils as at present sicken it, they must needs do anything which will discredit any movement which might result in domestic peace. Had the Conference accepted the suggestion, the feeling of the Sinn Feiners can better be imagined than described. It would have been the French Convention over again, and the resulting political turmoil would keep men's minds off the question of religious domination.

That religion should have become national, instead of remaining international, as it was intended to be by the early Church, is a problem which has suggested itself to many. We know how actively ministers of religion, both in allied and enemy countries, supported the idea of war, and how, in those countries where voluntary enlistment obtained, they were active workers in recruiting campaigns. From this it is obvious that the opinions of those in charge of a Church are such as obtain general acquiescence in the nation to which they belong and in which they usually work. In political matters such steps have to be taken as will obtain the greatest benefit to the form of religion which chances to be supreme, and each step tends to render that Church more susceptible to national opinion. It is, therefore, necessary that that opinion should not be inimical, with which purpose in view we find priests of all denominations on the School Boards, fighting tooth and nail for the retention of the Bible in schools, and, where they find an indifferent electorate, attempting to bind posterity to perpetuating Biblical teaching by putting denominational schools under public control. It is, perhaps, insidious quasi-political action such as this which requires watching. The general public does not look ahead: to it the future means nothing. No greater duty devolves upon Freethinkers than that of educating the public to inquire closely into all the suggestions of priests, as these, even though apparently of temporary effect, may have such an aftermath as to make shudder all who look upon freedom as the birthright of man.

JOHN MCMILLAN.

The Book of the Words of Americus the Prophet. 1917.

1. The words of Americus the son of Americ which he spake in the ears of the people:

2. List unto me ye children of the earth, give ear while I show you the folly of your ways and doings.

3. For behold the cunning men have got you in their toils, and the men of Belial, yea, the sons of the strange women triumph over you.

4. And ye say wherein have the cunning men obtained the mastery over us, and in what manner do the men of Belial triumph over us?

5. Verily I say unto you, that inasmuch as ye are satisfied with your state of life; insomuch are ye stumbling blocks to your own progress, evolution, and happiness.

6. For if ye would inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, ye must make it for yourselves.

7. And, moreover, if ye desire a double portion thereof (as do the priests) ye must make it for yourselves, on earth.

8. But some men will say, What know ye of the Kingdom of Heaven; and who hath enlightened thee as to life after death?

9. Hearken unto me ye children of men, Listen to the words of Americus the son of Americ.

10. I know not, and no man knoweth, the secret of the grave. No soul returneth from the other side of the river of death.

11. For death hath been, for ever, the greatest marvel of life; the King of Terrors; the Stock in Trade of all who profit by the ignorance of their fellow-men.

12. For behold the ignorance that pertaineth to death goeth back to the beginning of life upon the earth. Yea, and man knoweth no more thereof than the beasts of the field.

13. Science toucheth it not, and study taketh not away the veil which hideth it. Priests and prophets are alike unacquainted with it.

14. Wherefore, O man, take thy soul unto thine own keeping. Search for wisdom and learn the ways of life, but leave thy death and destiny in the hands of the Allwise.

15. For he speaketh not into the ears of men. His silence is as the silence of the Stars. No man hath seen him at any time, and none has heard his speech.

16. No archbishop, nor archdeacon, hath heard his voice, No Pope nor Nonconformist hath seen his face.

17. Neither did Moses the lawgiver, as he hath himself declared.

18. Then how cometh it that men claim a knowledge of his thoughts and desires, his jealousy, his vengeance, his dark designs for punishment of evildoers?

19. Are not the men who profit by this doctrine more sinful than the sinners?

20. Doth not the little chapel minister receive £5 per week for explaining the mysteries?

21. Lo! he is clothed in comfort, and fareth sumptuously. He hath a bath-room and a library, a study, and a with-drawing-room.

22. He urgeth the working-man to be content, and unto him that hath but little he saith: Ye shall receive the balance due when ye shall be dead.

23. This hath been the teaching of the priests for many generations; yea, for many centuries; and the people murmur not.

24. They walk in darkness and do reverence to the priesthood, yea, they are astonished at their knowledge and respectability.

25. They call upon them when they marry, and when they die. They pay them fees, and bring their little ones to be admitted to the Church.

26. With their guidance the world has gone astray. We have heard the sound of the trumpet, the alarm of war, the terror that flyeth by night.

Acid Drops.

The German advance into Italy gives God another chance to work a miracle, and incidently an opportunity for Mr. Bottomley to advertise it. The Campaniles, those slender towers which are so conspicuous a feature of Italian landscapes, are in danger—some in process of destruction. Serving as they may for observation posts and target directors, both sides, Italian and German, are compelled to remove them. There is, therefore, going on what military correspondents have well called a "massacre of Campaniles." Hence the opportunity for a miracle. And it would be quite easy for "Providence" to either divert the shell or upset calculations—that is, if Providence really cared about the matter.

A decree nisi was granted in the Divorce Court to a driver in the R.F.A., owing to the misconduct of his wife with a W. W. A. Phillips, superintendent of a Sunday-school. No moral this time.

The Bishop of London complains that young men leaving public schools seem "to have no enthusiasm about the Church." Why should they? If the Bishop of London could only see it, he might find the explanation close at hand. How could any decently educated and intelligent young man feel any enthusiasm about a set of doctrines that are not worth the paper they are printed on, or a set of religious leaders that are monuments of opportunism and intellectually inefficient?

When journalists drop into theology, they usually distinguish themselves. Referring to the victory at Gaza, the Star opened a leading article with the words: "Since the first of war correspondents wrote the Book of Joshua." As God is popularly supposed to be the author of the Bible, it follows that our contemporary regards the Deity as a journalist. Which, as old Euclid says, is absurd.

The Daily Express printed a bold headline, "Archbishop as Labour Leader." It referred to a soft-soapy speech made by the Archbishop of York in the House of Lords on the question of labour unrest. Why is the Church displaying so much zeal in wooing the working man? "Aye, there's the rub."

Cosmo Gordon Lang, who is posing as the friend of labour, lives in a palace, and has a modest income of £10,000 yearly. He should be an authority on the blessings of poverty.

The War does not appear to benefit Christianity. "Religion," says the Star, "was never at so low an ebb, so openly repudiated, or, what is worse, so travestied by charlatans and blackguards." The latter remark seems to be a sly dig at some journalistic Christians.

The holding of the Lord Mayor's show and banquet this year has been described as an "expensive and possibly dangerous farce." Among those present at the banquet were the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London.

The Bishop of Norwich writes in the Sunday Times on the question of education. In the course of a couple of columns he succeeds in saying very little about education, but does succeed in showing his professional interest in the subject. His great concern is for religious instruction, and not that alone, but for religious teachers.

> We are not drawing a sharp line between the religious training to be given in the Church schools and the Council schools. It is our wish that the religious instruction in both kinds of schools should be efficient, and this will not be the case unless the religious education is in the hands of those who believe and care, and all the teachers of religion have had satisfactory preparation.

If that means anything, it means that none but teachers who believe in religion are to be employed in our schools. There will be religious tests, and the non-religious will be eliminated. We quite agree that there is a certain amount of reason in the Bishop's contention—if religion is retained in the schools. But we hope that one result of reconstruction after the War will be to leave religion to the clergy and to the parents, who alone should be responsible for its inculcation.

Already the Food Controller has knocked the stuffing out of the Christmas pudding, and if our lords and governors get their way, the Merry Birthday of the Man of Sorrows will be a fast-rather than a feast. This will affect adversely the ancient association between godliness and gluttony.

An advertisement in an Essex paper states that the Vicar of South Benfleet is prepared to offer £28 yearly for the services of a church organist. Does he want a Christian martyr as well as a musician?

Miss Rebecca West, writing in the Daily News, says we "must cease to think of Charles the Second as 'the merry monarch,'" and learn to think of him as "our only king with sufficiently mental movement to indulge in religious speculation." If this modern Solomon is the most intellectual of British monarchs, it does not say much for the others.

In an illuminating article on the Sinn Fein Movement by Mr. Arnold Bennett, the following significant sentence occurs: "There are priests who remain in the movement chiefly in order to keep the movement in order." This remark is true of other political organizations.

It is curious that Christians should be so reluctant to admit Thomas Paine's undoubted gifts as a writer. For a century he has been abused, and yet his written words still have vitality. Recently the Daily News, in an impressive editorial on the Russian crisis, quoted Paine's vigorous phrase concerning an earlier revolution as the times that "try men's souls."

The British Government has recognized Zionism, and this has provoked a very witty remark from the Jewish Chronicle that the Jewish people will become "a nation, and not a hyphenation."

Mr. S. P. Willis, a member of the well-known Bristol family, has published a pamphlet on Teetotalism, Arrested, Examined, and Exposed. In dealing with Paul's advice to Timothy, he says:—

> We need not dwell long on the advice of Paul to Timothy to "take a little Wine for thy stomach's sake" and his often infirmities. How was it Paul recommended Wine? He was not a doctor! He was giving advice to one too abstemious, and he desired him to take a little stimulant. What would have been the benefit of liquor of grapes or grape juice? Why, he might as well have advised him to take jams, jellies, lollypops, and treacle. No mother would give these to a sick child with a weak stomach. Paul's advice shows there must have been Wine which did good to a weak stomach, and to take it was no sin in his judgment.

We do not know whether Mr. Willis has read Mr. G. W. Foote's Bible and Beer, but we are sending him a copy. And we take this occasion of commending that pamphlet to all our readers who are desirous of seeing how far Christianity supports teetotalism. The published price is one penny, and some good propagandist work might be done with it just now.

The latest appeal for cash of the Salvation Army is on behalf of "the refugees of North Italy." We had the idea that the Italians mostly belong to an older and more respectable religious organization.

Sabbatarians are busy taking advantage of the national preoccupation with the War. At Wareham, Dorset, five Army officers have been fined for shooting game on a Sunday. When will these Christians realize that they are living in the British Empire, and not in Ancient Judæa?

American papers state that Harry Lauder is speaking and singing on behalf of the Young Men's Christian Association. Billy Sunday and other Transatlantic revivalists will be pleased.

Bishop Welldon sneered recently at Spiritualist mediums receiving money for their services. This provoked an answer from the Rev. G. V. Owen, of Warrington, who said the "Christian ministry go to the length of foretelling the future, of groups as of individuals, of wicked as of good. I have heard Bishop Welldon do this most eloquently, in public and unashamed, and I believe that, in payment for such good service, to use an old phrase, his hand is crossed with silver."

The dear Bishop of London says that "there was no more religious body of men in the country than our public school masters." Exactly! But so many of these gentlemen are clergymen.

There are moments, says the Daily News, commenting on the Bishop of London's utterances on the divorce question, "when he appears to rival the prophet Habakkuk and to be capable of anything. It is a great pity in all seriousness that such grotesque utterances should be allowed to proceed as the considered opinions of a distinguished ecclesiastical dignitary. Rank blasphemy would be a less grave occasion to the enemy than such humourless and almost indecent lack of sense." Very strong for the pious Daily News, but not undeserved.

The Sunday papers are not entirely given to religion. The Sunday Pictorial says: "The Bible tells us how Samson carried the gates of Gaza. Now General Allenby has gone one better and carried the whole city."

Some of the newspapers have been getting highly indignant with Dr. Lyttleton, late Headmaster of Eton, for having said that newspapers were primarily commercial undertakings, and were mainly concerned with those things that make for increased circulation. But everyone knows this to be the cold truth. Why are certain classes of opinion boycotted in the press, if not because they would offend readers and so lead to a diminished circulation? It is not because editors always disagree with these opinions, often they are identical with their own. But they are dealing with a public that values independence of opinion less than anything else, and the aim of the successful newspaper editor becomes largely that of giving the readers what they want. They become a sounding-board for prejudice instead of a platform for the free expression of opinion. And it is surely the last word in smug hypocrisy to pretend that most newspapers are not commercial undertakings.

"Should the Parson Pay?" was the neat paraphristic heading to a report of the Rev. A. J. Waldron's dispute with a money-lender over payment of a promissory note for £100. In the end the Court decided that this parson should, with costs.

Sir Harry Johnson finds, in the course of a short article in Reynolds, a rather curious reason for recommending missionary activity amongst savages—non-European it should be said. Sir Harry admits that he "is not a believer in the phantasmagora" of the Churches, but he says: "A variety of religions tend to hamper human intercourse, and is among the reasons why the black races are uneducated." He thinks, therefore, that the missionaries by breaking down native religions make for civilization. There seems quite a nest of fallacies here. (1) We do not agree that the Africans are uneducated because they are religious. Primarily they are religious because they are uneducated. (2) Missionaries do not civilize in virtue of their religion; whatever civilizing influences follow are due to the secular and scientific developments that accompany them. And is there any need, save a commercial one, for the missionaries being there at all?

Intercession.

Oh, God in Heaven! cease thou to be dumb;
We crowd into thy Church this day with pride,
To pray that thou wilt beat our Army drum,
And beating, take thy stand upon our side.
Oh, put thine arm into the War with zest
(Our soldiers fight on Sundays at their best).

Stand thou aloof from all our enemies;
Help with the guns our foes to overthrow:
Slumber no more in peaceful Paradise;
Send all thy winds the wicked Zepps to blow;
Smash with thy power this military pest
(Our soldiers fight on Sundays at their best).

So, when the War at last is surely won,
And we once more assemble in thy Church,
We shall give thanks for all that thou hast done:
Oh, God! thou wilt not leave us in the lurch.
The Allies make thee here and now their guest
(Our soldiers fight on Sundays at their best).

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

November 25, Nuneaton; December 2, South Shields; December 9, Glasgow.

To Correspondents.

G. J. GRASSIE.—After reading your letter, we are gratified at your thinking our leaflet on "The Massacre of the Innocents" "blasphemous, scornful, and derisive."

A. SPENCER.—Thanks. Came in quite useful.

W. H. QUINLIVAN.—Pleased to hear from a new reader, and still more pleased to know that you have been the means of introducing the paper to others. That is as it should be. The Freethinker is too good to keep to one's self.

W. R.—Received. Thanks.

TWO BROTHERS.—We very much appreciate your help in securing new readers. Pleased also to have your good opinion of our work.

E. A. MCDONALD (Johannesburg).—Your second donation to Fund safely received. The first was acknowledged in our issue for September 16. You will be pleased to learn that the outlook for Freethought is very cheering, and although the struggle is a hard one, it brings its own compensations. And there is much pleasure in a good fight in a good cause, and with the right kind of weapons.

H. MCLEOD.—The lecture was under the auspices of an Association of Continental Freethinkers in London.

(MRS.) A. ANDREWS.—We are pleased, but not surprised, to find that you so much enjoyed Mr. Lloyd's Glasgow lectures. Not to have done so would have been uncomplimentary to yourself. It is good to know that the Freethinker serves as a weekly stimulant.

PHOENIX.—It is good to find so many new readers—yourself among them—keenly interested in the paper, and bent on securing new readers.

G. MOORE.—You do not say in what way you think we can help you. We shall be pleased to do anything that lies within our power.

J. BREESE.—Paper sent as directed. Thanks.

MRS. TURNBULL (Glasgow).—Your many years' devotion to Freethought makes one proud of the Cause which can enlist such unselfish devotion. We hope to see you in the near future.

W. S. WHITE.—Naturally your soldier son was able to give you the reason—which, as you say, is a prosaic one—for the present position of the Virgin of Albert. But we are still waiting for Mr. Bottomley to own up. Shall be very pleased to see the portrait.

G. WEBB.—Of course, the belief that the human race is the aim and object of the universe is, scientifically, rubbish; but we have to deal with things as other people take them. We note your subscription is sent as "a thankoffering to Almighty God for having successfully piloted the Freethinker through these troublous times."

F. MARSON.—To send 4s. 4d. to the Sustentation Fund, being one penny per week for the year during which you have bought the Freethinker, is a quite nice form of "conscience money."

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings.

W. J. ROBINS.—Considerations of space and the nature of the subject—which is a little outside our scope—prevents our publishing your interesting communication.

F. W. LLOYD.—Yes, we have thought of reprinting. It is the paper trouble that is in the way. But we may surmount that in the New Year, if not before.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

This Fund is now closed.

Sugar Plums.

We close the Sustentation Fund in this issue with a total of £366 5s. 7d. The deficit of last year is quite wiped out, and a balance left to meet the recurring weekly loss. The response has been generous, and we beg to thank most heartily all who have contributed to the result. We have had ample evidence in the letters received of the affectionate esteem in which the Freethinker is held, and it is gratifying to note the number of new readers who have expressed their warm admiration of this journal. From the older readers we have been much encouraged by the many expressions of appreciation of all we have done, and of confidence in our judgment in the conduct of affairs. Some few of these letters we have given to our readers in these columns, but we value them all as a source of inspiration for the—we are afaid—very troublous times ahead. And so we press on with the courage born of a good cause, and a confidence desired from the whole-hearted support of our readers.

We cannot resist the temptation to publish the following letter which we hope we deserve—at least we have tried to deserve it:—

> Dear Mr. Cohen,—Mails just received, and I note from the Freethinker that the annual Sustentation Fund is on the carpet again. I therefore lose no time in sending you the enclosed draft for £5, as my contribution to the worthy cause. The £250 loss incurred during the past year is only really a flea-bite, which I feel sure your readers will easily and quickly make good.
> I do not think there is much chance of the Freethinker either "departing this life" or deteriorating in tone as long as you are in charge of it, and I hope that the time is not far distant when a man of your abilities will get a better respectable living wage out of the job than you at present appear to be getting.
> Since our late Editor died, you have done wonders—no one could have done more—and I only hope that you are looking after your health, to enable you to keep on with the good work for many, many more years yet.
>
> You are a business man as well as editor.
> Hoping you are in the best of health and with kindest regards, I remain, yours sincerely, G. F. DIXON.

To-day (Nov. 25) Mr. Cohen lectures twice in The Palace, Nuneaton. The afternoon meeting is at 2.45, evening at 6.30. Mr. Cohen is breaking new ground here, and it is hoped that all Freethinkers in the neighbourhood will make the occasion a special one. The meetings are being well advertised, and the intention is to start a Branch of the N. S. S. There should be no difficulty in doing this, or in starting a dozen new Branches in other places within the next few months.

There was a fine audience at Birmingham on Sunday last to listen to Mr. Cohen's lecture on "Do the Dead Live?" The address was followed with the closest attention, and frequent outbursts of applause. It is intended to continue the lectures, and we sincerely hope the Committee will receive the support of all local Freethinkers. The Repertory Theatre is centrally situated; it is a new and tastefully decorated building, and provided the proper amount of local help is given, the Movement in Birmingham should profit considerably by having its lectures in this place.

We were pleased to receive a letter the other day from Mr. R. H. Rosetti, who writes that he is fit and well, despite the unasked for and unwelcome attentions of "Fritz.":—

> The clerk of the weather still appears to have plenty of water on hand, and lavishes a good portion of it this side of the channel. God has apparently been with us on the Western Front, for we are slowly pushing ahead; but to appear strictly impartial, he has done a bit for Fritz on the Italian Front: so it gives both sides an opportunity of offering thanks.
> I notice dear old, but hypercritical England is to have the farce of a National Day of Prayer. With two or three hundreds of thousands of its young men killed, with countless war hospitals full of wounded, with the civil population struggling for the bare necessities of life, and being killed, injured, and harassed by bombs from enemy aircraft, God is to be asked for his guidance during the assumed last phase of the War, apparently along the same lines as the preceding phases.
>
> With the newly inspired Mr. Bottomley insisting on a Christmas peace, whilst the Church, whose inspiration is encrusted with age, intends on the first Sunday in the New Year to ask for God's guidance during the last phase of the War, one has a striking example of the value of inspiration, whether amatuer or professional, when weighed in the scales of common sense.
> Will you please remember me very kindly to all at home. I hope they are in the very best of health and spirits, despite the attentions of Fritz. Needless to say, I wish the same to yourself.

Freethinking friends residing in the neighbourhood of Goldthorpe, Bolton, or Thurnscoe, are cordially invited by the Committee of the new Goldthorpe Branch to attend the Branch meeting to-day, November 25. Further particulars can be obtained on application to the Secretary, Mr. Harold Austin, 2, Nora Street, Goldthorpe. For the time of meeting, etc., see Lecture Notice.

We are glad to hear that Mr. Lloyd had good meetings at Manchester last Sunday. The Secretary writes that the audiences were good and enthusiastic. There were plenty of questions and discussion, with a good sale of literature, and many applications for membership forms. The new Branch is working well, and bids fair to have one of the largest memberships in the country. Anyway, the Committee mean to get it if it is at all possible.

The Daily Chronicle, after holding out as long as it was able against an increase of price, has been compelled, despite a decrease in the number of pages, to advance from a halfpenny to a penny. Its reason is, it says, paper at 500 per cent. above pre-war prices, and a generally increased cost of production. We can appreciate the reason, and we count every month that we can keep the Freethinker unchanged in size and price as so much gain.

Mr. Cohen is booked for South Shields, and for the convenience of friends at a distance who may find it difficult travelling these nights, an afternoon meeting is being arranged. The meetings will be at 3 o'clock and 6.30. Will any friends interested in these meetings, and who feel themselves able to give assistance of any kind, please communicate with the Secretary of the Local Branch, Mr. R. Chapman, 6 Wenlock Road, Simonside, South Shields? Mr. Chapman will welcome suggestions as well as actual help.

The Bible and Immortality.

The Apocrypha.

We come next to the interval between the Old and New Testaments, in which we find a number of writings that are collectively called "the Apocrypha."

These apocryphal writings are the following: the books of Baruch and Judith, both relating to the time of Nebuchadnezzar; the history of Susanna, the Song of the Three holy children, and Bel and the Dragon, which are later additions to the book of Daniel; the Prayer of Manasses, which is referred to in 2 Chron. xxxiii.; the book of Tobit, a fictitious story of the exile in Babylon; an addition to the book of Esther; 1 Esdras, a later addition to the books of 2 Chronicles and Ezra; 2 Esdras, a pseudo-apocalypse; 1 Maccabees, which contains a history of the Jewish people under the tyrant Antiochus Epiphanes and for a generation later; 2 Maccabees, a work giving a more detailed account of the persecutions of the last-named Syrian monarch; the Wisdom of Solomon, a dissertation in praise of the works of God and the acquirement of wisdom; the book of Ecclesiasticus, containing no less than fifty-one chapters, of a similar character to the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes.

Of these writings, we find evidence of the belief in "eternal life" in three; namely, the Wisdom of Solomon, 2 Maccabees, and 2 Esdras. In none of the others is any such belief expressed or implied. In Ecclesiasticus, however, there are many passages which show that the writer did not share that belief. The following are examples:—

> Eccl. xvii. 27-30.—Who shall give praise to the Most High in Hades?.....Thanksgiving perisheth from the dead, as from one that is not: he that is in life and health shall praise the Lord.....For all things cannot be in man, because the son of man is not immortal.
> Eccl. xxxviii. 23.—When the dead is at rest, let his remembrance rest; and be comforted for him, when his spirit departeth from him.
> Eccl. xli. 3.—Fear not the sentence of death; remember them that have been before thee, and that come after; this is the sentence from the Lord upon all flesh.

The apocryphal books were nearly all written in Greek; we therefore find Hades employed instead of Sheol. We will now look at some of the passages in the three books mentioned which refer to a future life, commencing with the "Wisdom of Solomon." Speaking to "the ungodly," the writer of "Wisdom" says:—

> Wisd. i. 12-16.—Court not death in the error of your life; neither draw upon yourselves destruction by your works: because God made not death, neither delighteth he when the living perish: for he created all things that they might have being.....for righteousness is immortal. But ungodly men by their works and words called death unto them.....and they made a covenant with him (or it),

The ideas expressed in this passage were evidently those only of the writer himself, not of the people of his time. Of the latter, whom he calls "the ungodly," he says:—

> Wisd. ii. 1, 2.—For they say among themselves, reasoning not aright, Short and sorrowful is our life; and there is no healing when a man cometh to his end, and none was ever known that returned out of Hades. Because by mere chance were we born, and hereafter we shall be as though we had never existed.

These ungodly men, it will be perceived, showed far more sense than the godly writer, who appears to have been a religious crank standing almost alone amongst a rational people. His ideas of immortality will be seen in the following passages:—

> Wisd. iii. 1-8.—The souls of the righteous are in the hands of God, and no torment shall touch them. In the > eyes of the foolish they seemed to have died.....But they are in peace.....their hope is full of immortality. They shall judge nations, and have dominion over peoples, and the Lord shall reign over them for evermore.

> Wisd. iv. 7-11.—But a righteous man, though he die before his time, shall be at rest.....Being found well-pleasing unto God he was beloved of him, and while living among sinners he was translated: he was caught away lest wickedness should change his understanding, or guile deceive his soul.

Thus, according to the first passage, every godly man who obtained "eternal life" was to be a ruler of nations—that were then, or would be in the future, sleeping in Hades or Sheol. What a truly grand idea! It reminds us of the twelve apostles that were to sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. But how would it be if there were more godly men than nations or tribes? According to the second passage, the spirit of the righteous man did not, apparently, enter Sheol at all, but was prematurely "caught away" into heaven, lest he became ungodly if allowed to live long upon the earth.

Coming next to the book of 2 Maccabees, we find in chapter vii. an account of seven brothers who, with their mother, were all barbarously tortured and slain, one after the other, by order of Antiochus Epiphanes, because they refused "to taste swine's flesh" which had been offered in sacrifice—such being forbidden by the Jewish law. In this frightful drama all seven sons, as they were undergoing torture and mutilation, censured the king, who was present, and gave utterance to their hopes of a future life. The following are the last words of three of these martyrs:—

> 2 Macc. vii. 9 (second son): Thou, miscreant, dost release us out of this present life; but the King of heaven shall raise up us, who have died for his laws, unto an eternal renewal of life.
> 2 Macc. vii. 14 (fourth son): It is good to die at the hands of men and look for the hopes which are given by God, that we shall be raised up again by him; but as for thee, thou shalt have no resurrection unto life.
> 2 Macc. vii. 36 (seventh son): For these my brethren, having endured a short pain that bringeth everlasting life, have now died under God's covenant; but thou, through the judgment of God, shalt receive in just measure the penalties of thine arrogancy.

These three young men would seem not to have known that no such promise of "eternal life" had ever been given by the "King of heaven." They might, however, have heard of the immortality taught by the writer of "Wisdom," or they might have imagined that as martyrs they deserved it.

We come, lastly, to the unhistorical book of 2 Esdras. In this work of fiction the writer, who calls himself Esdras, discusses matters relating to the future life of man with "the Most High," who replies to him by the mouth of an angel named Uriel. Foremost among the information which he thus received is the following statement respecting the last judgment:—

> 2 Esd. vii. 32-38.—And the earth shall restore those that are asleep in her, and the secret places shall deliver those souls that were in them. And the Most High shall be revealed upon the seat of judgment.....And the pit of torment shall appear, and over against it shall be the place of rest: and the furnace of Gehenna shall be shewed, and over against it the paradise of delight. And then shall the Most High say to the nations who are raised from the dead.....Look on this side and on that: here is delight and rest, and there fire and torments.

After hearing the foregoing conditions of the proposed "eternal life," Esdras pleads for more mercy to be shown to men, but without success. He then says he sees that "the world to come shall bring delight to few, but torments unto many"—a reflection which suggests the Gospel words "Many are called, but few chosen." The reason assigned by the Most High for the age-long torments about to be inflicted upon the ungodly of the human race are thus stated by the angel:—

> 2 Esd. vii. 72.—They that dwell upon the earth shall be tormented for this reason, that having understanding they have wrought iniquity, and receiving commandments have not kept them, and having obtained a law they dealt unfaithfully with that which they received.

The reference here is to the commands supposed to be given to the Jews by Moses in the Pentateuch—which were unknown to nearly all the other nations that were to be tormented for not keeping them.

We will now look at the three forms of belief respecting "eternal life" held by a small minority among the Jews in the period which preceded Christianity. The first of these is that found in the "Wisdom of Solomon." In this book a future life of peace and bliss was to be given only to "the righteous" of the Hebrew nation; all the remaining people—the so-called "ungodly"—were to lie in Hades for ever. The next form of eternal life is that of 2 Maccabees, in which those who gave up their lives by refusal to act contrary to the laws of Moses were to receive them again, and, presumably, were to live for ever—all the rest of the Hebrew nation, apparently, going to the land from which there was no return. The third form of "eternal life" is that described by Esdras, in which the whole of mankind were called up for judgment, after which a few thousands were to be conducted into a "paradise of delight," and the countless millions remaining were to be cast into a lake of fire. It was this last form of immortality, after it had been adopted by the primitive Christians, which has been handed down to our day.

But, it may be asked, whence did the writer of 2 Esdras get this inhuman doctrine? The answer is that he probably borrowed it from another work of fiction—the "Book of Enoch the Prophet"—which came into circulation among the Jews half a century before his time. This will be noticed in the next paper.

Abracadabra.

New Testament Legends for Young Readers.

VII.—The Rich, the Proud, the Poor, the Lowly.

Onwards the Pioneer and his band travelled to Jerusalem city, on one side of which was the Mount of Olives, and on another, a hill with a round top like a man's skull. Though it was yet miles away across the stony hills, Jesus spoke to the city:—

"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you kill the prophets; you stone the pioneers. But how happy would I be to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her brood under her wings; but no! you refuse, you refuse; and your house shall be desolate!"

Crowds followed. He would often halt, and, to the multitude that sat on a hillside, as in an open-air theatre, he would tell his tales, or parables.

"None of you," said he, "not even the lowliest, need be lost. A shepherd who misses a sheep from his flock roams the hills till he discovers it, and he carries it home on his shoulders. A woman lights a candle when she has lost a piece of silver at night, and she searches till she finds it. So the King of Heaven will search for you, and the angels will be joyful when you are found."

Digitized by Google

The crowd murmured their applause,—except the learned Lecturers and the Pharisees.

"A certain man had two sons," so Jesus went on. "The younger son was wild of spirit, and loved adventure. Having got from his father all the money and jewels the good-natured old man could spare, he left home, and took his journey into a far country. There he lived a gay life, spent his money freely, and at last had not a coin left; and just then, a famine brought woe and want to all the land. The spendthrift was obliged to labour as a pig-keeper, in order to earn a little bread. As he watched his grunting herd one day, out on the moors, he remembered the old home, the old days, the old father, and thought how even the slaves had plenty to eat, while he was perishing with hunger. He rose up, and tramped the weary way homewards. When he was yet a distance off, his father saw him, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. The spendthrift, with breaking voice and tears, said he was not worthy to be called a son, but would work for his bread.....The old man would hear nought of such talk, but he bade the servants take off the spendthrift's rags, and give him shoes, a good robe, and a ring for his right hand; and before long the whole household was merry-making, eating a feast of roast veal, and tuning joyously on pipe and harp. But the elder son, coming from the plough-field, and learning how the good-for-nothing spendthrift was being feasted, was angry and would not come in".....

At this point in the tale, the common people could not help glancing at the Lawyers and the pious Make-believes.

"And the old father went out to beg him to enter; for it was a jolly time when a lost brother returned; the dead had, as it were, come to life again; the spendthrift was lost, and now was found."

The people all hung upon him, listening.

"There was a certain rich man," said Jesus,—

A great silence fell on the crowd. Not many rich folk were among them! They were a poor and lowly multitude. They were the "masses."

"His dress was white linen, and fine purple; and he fared sumptuously every day. And there was a certain beggar, named Lazarus, who was laid at his gate, full of sores; and he very much desired to eat the scraps that fell from the rich man's table. The beggar died, and was carried by the angels to heaven, where he sat at meat on the seat next to Abraham, the patriarch; and he leaned on Abraham's bosom. The rich man also died, and the place he went to was the fire of hell, below; and from hell he looked up, and he saw the heavenly table, and the feast, and Lazarus. He cried to Father Abraham, and besought him to send Lazarus with water, if only to cool his parched tongue. Abraham replied that a wide pit yawned between heaven and hell, and none could cross the gulf. He reminded the rich man that the Poor Man had had a horrible time on earth, and he, the Rich Man, had had a very easy and delightful time; and now affairs had changed to the opposite. The rich man thought a few moments, and then put in a word for his five kinsmen, who were still enjoying a fat living on earth. Could not Lazarus take a message and warn these five gentlemen? To this Abraham answered No; for if they had sense to read the old books for themselves, instead of listening to make-believe Lecturers and Pharisees, they could find in the teachings of Moses and the Prophets that it was their duty to think of their neighbours. The rich man argued that surely they would repent, and change their selfish life if a man from the tomb came and spoke to them. But no; Abraham thought that that hard-hearted sort of person would not be moved, even though Lazarus rose from the dead."

"True, it is true," murmured the crowd of peasants, slaves, fish-picklers, fruit-pickers, and women whom none called "ladies."

Nearer to Jerusalem; nearer to the cross the Pioneer and Wonder-worker journeyed; and he was still passing through Samaria.

Ten men stood at a hundred paces from the road. A dreadful row of ten they were, ragged, with scant hair, with skins scarred and blotched by disease. They were lepers.

"Master, mercy!" all the ten shouted in chorus.

"All is well," he replied, "and you can now go to the priests to show that your skins are healed; and when the priests have spoken the sacred words, you will be able to go back to home and friends."

Nine of them rushed towards Jerusalem, hot-foot! One turned back, and raised a cry of joy, and he made a most reverent salaam to the Master of the jinn, and gave thanks.

He was a Samaritan.

Ten had been cleansed. Only one had the good heart—and good manners—to utter a word of gratitude.

At every step of the road, Jesus met the jealous lawyers and the Long-prayer Men. They hated to see him surrounded by the common villagers and working-class; yet they could not help listening to his tales and speeches. And here is a tale that stung them deep:—

"Two men," said Jesus, "went up to the Temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, the other a tax-collector, whom Scribes and Pious Ones despised as low-class fellows who squeezed money out of unwilling tax-payers. The Pharisee stood bolt upright, and exclaimed in a voice which the bystanders could hear: 'God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are—grabbers, unjust, adulterers, or such a cad as this tax-man! I fast twice in the week, I pay away to the priests Tenths of everything I possess.' The tax-man stood much farther from the Holy Altar than the Pharisee, for he was a modest and simple man; nor would he even lift his eyes skywards. He bent his head, and smote upon his breast, and said the few words: 'God, be merciful to me, a sinner!'"

The peasants and common townsfolk understood. They knew that the tax-man was genuine. He meant what he said. He did not pretend to be better than he really was. They loved him.

A very different way Jesus had with the children. Mothers and fathers brought little maids and lads for him to touch with kindly hands of blessing. In these small folk he saw no make-believe, no pretence, no vain and priggish airs.

The Apostles, however, snubbed the parents, thinking the Master of the jinn would not care to be bothered with infants. They were mistaken. He said,—

"Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the Kingdom of God."

And, on the other hand, it was very difficult for wealthy men to enter that Kingdom. When a young man, who had large estates, was told to sell all that he had, and give the sale-money to the poor, and follow the Pioneer, he was sorrowful, and withdrew; for he could not give up his treasure. Then said Jesus,—

"It is easier for a camel to wriggle through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to get into the Kingdom of God."

Anybody can see that the man who wrote the Gospel of Luke had a very low opinion of riches and rich men; and you see that his way of dealing with the selfish rich was to send them to the flames of Hades Below.

It may be worth while to note the good-humoured and smiling way in which the ancient Greeks expressed their scorn of the selfish rich. Their parable ran thus:

An Old Man of the Woods, pug-nosed, with bristle-hair, and goat-ears, wandered into the rose-gardens of rich Midas, King of Phrygia in Asia Minor. Servants seized the comic creature, tied him with rose-garlands, and led him to the King, who treated him with courtesy for ten days, and then took him back to his master, the god Dionysos.

"Well done," said Dionysos. "This is good of you, Midas. Ask of me any favour you like."

After thinking a short while, the King said,—

"Let all I touch turn to gold."

Yet he had heaps of treasure already!

The boon was granted. How charming! He touched grass, it changed to golden blades; trees became gold; the very stones were turned to nuggets. But, alas! when a meal was set before royalty, the gift appeared a misery. Who could drink gold? Who could eat it? Who could live on it? Who would not long to lose the fatal favour? And Dionysos, in pity and in laughter, bade Midas bathe in the stream of Pactolus, and wash away the beautiful, but horrible, spell! We are not surprised to hear that it was the same thick-headed Midas who said he thought the tootle of Pan's mouth-organ was more musical than the glorious sound of Apollo's seven-stringed lyre; whereupon Apollo gave Midas the ears of an ass. For there are some unhappy people who neither know the use of ears, nor the use of wealth.

GOD AND THE WAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Your correspondent, Mr. A. Russell, claims that God has been absolutely neutral during the present War. It is really very difficult to come to any other conclusion. We have witnessed so-called Christian nations killing and mutilating one another with all the weapons that science has put into their hands. These same Christian nations have been long praying to God to give them the victory, because they each claim that they are fighting for a just cause.

So far, we have seen victory resting with the big battalions, rather than with the half-trained crowds. The question is, What are we fighting about? The answer undoubtedly is, That we are fighting for the food that is in the world. We may call it "Economic Pressure," but it is really for the food that we are fighting.

The teachings of Christ and the early Christian Church do not appear to give any countenance to warfare, and the Christian religion is, on that account, quite at variance with the old Jewish religion, which undoubtedly spelt "Militarism" and the destruction of one's enemies.

The law of "The Struggle for Existence and Survival of the Fittest" rules the world, and so long as that law holds good, so long must we go on fighting, and shall continue to turn this fair world into a hell more awful than anything dreamt of by Dante. All the religions of the world have proved themselves to be but empty cymbals.

Our salvation lies in studying Nature's laws and their effects. The Book of Nature lies open before us, her writing is easy to decipher, and we should make it our business to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest the lessons she teaches us.

C. Russell (Major).

MEN, MONEY, AND THE WAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—I protest at the tone and temper of an article entitled "The Blank Wall" in your current issue. To sneer at the War Loan and those who invest in it is to sneer at the cause of the Allies and humanity's effort to destroy Prussian militarism. The Freethinker desires to percolate the trenches; then let it be loyal to the men in the trenches, and not come between them and those who can shorten their torments by helping to defeat the enemy of civilization with the resources of civilization. The best thing that could be recorded to the credit of money would be a victory over the Prussian ideal; and failure to achieve that victory by applying our money to any meaner purpose will redound to our everlasting shame.

If men and money are not the only means to destroy for ever Prussian militarism, let us hear what others exist.

The "commercial force" which has lately found silver bullets to keep the flag of the Freethinker flying was not "low and corrupt." Does it become so when employed to keep the national flag flying?

That is a dangerous opinion, and can be called by a very hard and ugly name.

I venture to hope we may have an editorial pronouncement on the Freethinker's attitude to the War, for sentiments of this sort will make enemies of our friends.

Eden Phillpotts.

[The policy of the Freethinker is to provide a platform, so far as is possible, for all questions having a broad human interest. Each article is signed, and the writer is alone responsible for the opinions expressed. The editorial responsibility consists in seeing that the writer represents a point of view worthy of consideration. This has always been the policy of the Freethinker, and that policy is now more than ever necessary, when the ordinary press will, for the most part, publish only standardized opinions.

For the rest, we do not see that Mr. Thorn's note is at all disloyal to the men in the trenches, or that it is intended as a discouragement to any prospective investor in War Loan. No one admires more than ourselves the heroism of the men in the trenches, or appreciates more deeply all they are doing to bring this War to a desirable end. These things may be taken for granted between men of decency and intelligence. We take Mr. Thorn to be making a protest against the picture of preachers of a universal religion playing the part of recruiting agents—a protest which does not deny either the justice of the War or the necessity for the State receiving financial support in its prosecution. A second protest is against the over-emphasis of the power of money as a deciding factor in human affairs, and the exaltation of the "money-fetish." This protest against the exaltation of money over and above the more human and idealistic elements in the War, is, in our opinion, deserving of publicity, and in this, we think, Mr. Phillpotts himself will concur. And certainly the picture of a man growing wealthy by forcing up prices, and then salving his conscience by investing part of his war profits—at a high rate of interest—is anything but a desirable one. Finally, in order to avoid misunderstanding, it may be as well to say that we have no greater desire to "percolate the trenches," than we have to penetrate other sections of the community. We desire to be read by all.—Editor.]

Society News.

We have not anything of a very exciting nature to report concerning our season's open-air work. The meetings have been continued throughout the whole of the summer months, and the audiences have been large and attentive. This, in spite of the rowdy attentions of a certain Christian Evidence champion, who seems to be a survival of the worst type of Christian blackguardism of thirty years ago. He appears to take an insane enjoyment in exhibiting himself in the most ridiculous light, and as this in itself does not constitute a legal offence, he must be left with his hobby.

Our collections are always small, but that is not so discouraging as appears at first sight. An audience of Freethinkers would contribute more liberally, and the smallness of the collections argues that the vast majority of our listeners are not wholly sympathetic with us—which is exactly the class we are desirous of reaching.

May I be permitted a grumble? I have been often struck by the frequency with which those who have given up their Christianity, as a result of our propaganda, fail to do all they might to help others to attain the same liberation as themselves. This should not be, and I hope this complaint will have the desired effect.

Still, we congratulate ourselves on having so successfully carried through the season in the midst of war, and in spite of very many difficulties. We are content that we have done our duty to the grand cause of humanity and freedom.—W. GREGORY, Hon. Sec., Kingsland Branch, N. S. S.

On Sunday evening last Mr. T. F. Palmer delivered a very able lecture on "Christianity at the Bar of History" at the Trade Union Hall, 30, Brixton Road. The lecturer formulated an unanswerable indictment against Christianity as an obstacle to national and social progress throughout the centuries from its invention to the present time. He invited the attention of an appreciative audience (numbering about fifty) and elicited an interesting discussion. Mr. Victor Roger occupied the chair in the absence of their President at the commencement of the meeting.—W. OWEN, Sec., South London Branch N.S.S.

A WITCH TRIAL.

In the Good Old (Christian) Times.

Towards the end of 1593 there was trouble in the family of the Earl of Orkney. His brother laid a plot to murder him, and was said to have sought the help of a "notorious witch" called Alison Balfour. When Alison Balfour's life was looked into, no evidence could be found connecting her either with the particular offence or with witchcraft in general; but it was enough in these matters to be accused. She swore she was innocent; but her guilt was only held to be aggravated by perjury. She was tortured again and again. Her legs were put in the caschilaws—an iron frame which was gradually heated till it burned into the flesh—but no confession could be wrung from her. The caschilaws failed utterly, and something else had to be tried. She had a husband, a son, and a daughter, a child seven years old. As her own sufferings did not work upon her, she might be touched, perhaps, by the sufferings of those who were dear to her. They were brought into court, and placed at her side; and the husband first was placed in the "lang irons"—some accursed instrument; I know not what. Still, the Devil did not yield. She bore this; and her son was next operated on. The boy's legs were set in "the boot,"—the iron boot you may have heard of. The wedges were driven in, which, when forced home, crushed the very bone and marrow. Fifty-seven mallet strokes were delivered upon the wedges. Yet this, too, failed. There was no confession yet. So, last of all, the little daughter was taken. There was a machine called the piniwinkies—a kind of thumb-screw, which brought blood from under the finger nails, with a pain successfully terrible. These things were applied to the poor child's hands, and the mother's constancy broke down, and she said she would admit anything they wished. She confessed her witchcraft—so tried, she would have confessed to the seven deadly sins—and then she was burned, recalling her confession, and with her last breath protesting her innocence.—J. A. Froude, "Short Studies on Great Subjects."

Obituary.

Leicester friends will be sorry to hear of the death of Anna Maria Coltman (aged 56), daughter-in-law of Thomas Coltman, who was a colleague of Josiah Gimson, Michael Wright, W. H. Holyoak, and other prominent members of the Secular Society, before and after the opening of the Hall in 1881. Mrs. Coltman was active in the Society's work till she left Leicester in 1903; she aided the South London Ethical Society, and supported the Socialist Movement. The address at her cremation at Norwood was given by F. J. Gould, on Wednesday, November 14.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

Miss E. M. Vance, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
> Occupation .....
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE WORLD'S WONDER STORIES

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

By ADAM GOWANS WHYTE,

Author of "A Comedy of Ambition," "The Templeton Tradition," "Yellowsands," etc.

Here is a really novel book for children. It responds to their elemental desire to "see the wheels go round." And the subject is not one little corner of Nature presented like a piece of seaweed in a pretty frame or like an animal in a cage. It is Nature itself. The wheels are those of the Universe and of Life. They are shown in movement, weaving suns and planets and satellites out of star-mist, shaping living things ever more complex and wonderful until man himself appears, bearing man upwards from the savage state along the paths of progress.

Never before has so broad a theme been attempted in a book for children. "THE WORLD'S WONDER STORIES" brings it well within the capacity of children from twelve to fifteen years of age. It is made easy for them by the unstudied simplicity of the language; and it is made as attractive as a story of adventure by the charm of a bright conversational style. Both matter and manner are admirably suited to awaken interest in the world of real things, and to encourage the love of knowledge and of truth.

Liberal use has been made of pictures to illumine the text. "THE WORLD'S WONDER STORIES" is a book which will make an instant appeal to every child, both because of its novel contents and its attractive form. It will be treasured by many of them as the first book to open their eyes to the romance of reality. It is, in short, an ideal presentation book for Freethinkers.

Complete catalogue, with copy of "Literary Guide" (16 large pp.), free to every applicant.

Views and Opinions.

The Clergy and Education.

Nothing shows the meanness of disposition generated by a professional advocacy of Christianity more than the attitude of the clergy in relation to Germany during the course of the War. No sooner had the War commenced, and the stories of German barbarities in Belgium been received in this country, than the "Black Army" saw its opportunity. German conduct was due to the growth of "Materialism" and of freethinking. Germany had, so it was said, "repudiated Christianity," and ignorant persons were led to conceive an assembly of German leaders formally rejecting Christianity and solemnly adopting Freethought. Before the War commenced, these same people had dwelt upon the natural piety of the German character as against France, which was painted as decadent, and growing in immorality in consequence of the complete disestablishment of Christianity in all departments of the State. Ignored was the fact that, with the exception of France, all the countries engaged in the War were officially and overwhelmingly Christian; as also was the more important consideration that the nations of Europe had centuries of Christian tradition behind them, and that if Christian education had really made for peace, war would by now have been impossible. The clergy played their old mean and dishonest game. Their policy is, "Whatever is bad or objectionable, label unchristian, or atheistic, or infidel." The sensible ones may smile, but the foolish ones will be deceived. And sensible people always represent a minority of the population.

The Secular Solution.

When the question of education began to force its way to the front—owing to the action of a handful of enthusiasts, for the British public cares very little about education at any time—the clergy saw their opportunity for a little more propaganda. For years the clergy have been watching with dread the approach of what is known as the Secular Solution of the education question. All this means in practice is that the State shall concern itself only with such subjects as are the common concern of all citizens. It does not oppose Christianity, neither does it help it. It leaves Christian parents and Christian parsons complete freedom to teach whatever religion they like to the children, while it confines its own efforts to such subjects as are defined in the Education Code as "secular." But this will not suit the clergy. If they cannot get the children, whom can they hope to get? Not the mature adult. He is quite beyond their reach. With them it is a case of the child or nothing. If they cannot capture the lamb, they can never hope to control the sheep. And the main purpose of breeding sheep is shearing. So the clergy know that, once the children escape their hands, the source of supply for church and chapel is cut off. Hence the resistance to what is so generally admitted amongst men of understanding with no ulterior purpose to serve, as the only logical and honest way out. If the child is not caught, the adult is lost. Religious belief is the one thing that cannot wait for acceptance until people are old enough to understand it.

A Timely Corrective.

So when the question of the reconstruction of our educational system arose for discussion, the clergy saw, or thought they saw, their chance. Warnings began to multiply as to the danger of our imitating Germany by not giving religion a very prominent place in the State schools. Thus, the Rev. Stanley Rogers, a leading dissenter, said:—

> Do we not need to keep in mind the Duke of Wellington's warning: "Educate children without religion, and you will make a race of clever devils?" German Kultur has achieved this result. Do we wish to imitate Germany in this?

And the Hon. Sec. of the Chichester Diocesan Committee of Religious Education declared:—

> Unless religion were to be the guiding principle of our system of education, the only effect of educational reforms might be that their children would be more efficiently trained to earn their livelihood than before. .....Who, with the repulsive example of Germany before us, would be satisfied with such a result?

Finally, Lord Pormoor assured the public that:—

> In the German schools and in German life the people were taught that the nation came first, and all that was moral and Christian came second.

Many similar statements are made, all equally dogmatic, and all equally false. Their falsity has been promptly noted and pilloried in an admirable four-page pamphlet issued by the Secular Education League, and from which we have taken the above expressions of opinion. We are, indeed, writing these notes chiefly with the object of calling the attention of Freethinker readers to its existence. It is a trenchant and serviceable piece of writing, and we would like Freethinkers everywhere to get to work and see that it is distributed broadcast. Particulars will be found on the back page of this issue, and its widespread circulation may serve to do something to check this latest clerical lie on behalf of a mischievous and unjust system.

Germany and Christian Education.

German Crime and Secular Education is the title of the pamphlet, and the Committee meets the charge that German crime is due to the prevalence of Secular Education in a most effective way. It cites from the clergy themselves, and from educational authorities, to prove that German education is saturated with Christian instruction of the most pronounced form. Thus :—

> The children are religiously instructed in Germany, the religious teaching is as definite as heart could desire in Germany.—Canon Edward Rees, Church Quarterly Review, p. 324, January, 1908.
> The religious lesson is regarded as the most important, and a religious atmosphere is expected to pervade the school.—From the Report of an International Inquiry into Moral Instruction, vol. ii., p. 218, edited by Professor Sadler.
> It must not be imagined, however, that in the reforms suggested there is any thought of abandoning religious instruction in the schools. Such an idea would be entirely repugnant to the German mind.—Dr. Garber, Annals of Educational Progress in 1910, p. 311.
> In Germany the Luthern child carries in his knapsack three books—a Bible, a Hymn Book, and Luther's Catechism—in which he receives instruction every morning by teachers of his own faith and at the public cost.....the same right is extended to all religious bodies.....there are no timid half measures.—The Rev. G. Longridge, National Education (Mirfield Manuals, No. 45).
> The Prussian systems remains to-day both for Catholics and Protestants essentially denominational. All schools, whether elementary or secondary, are Evangelical, Catholic, Jewish, or mixed.....In all cases the teachers are appointed with reference to religious faith; religious instruction is given compulsorily in school hours, and is inspected by the clergy.—Encycl. Britannica ; 11th ed. s.v. "Education," 8, p. 965 d.
> Religious instruction is a compulsory subject in all German schools, and very great importance is attributed to it. Special teaching is provided for children of each different faith—for Evangelical, Roman Catholic, and Jewish. The aim of the instruction is clearly stated.—Board of Education.
> Special importance is attached to religious instruction.....History, whether sacred or profane, is always history in which the child may learn to see the hand of Providence at work, to admire what is noble and despise what is base.....When the children first come to school they are about six years old. Driving Home the Moral.

It would be almost impossible to give a more crushing or more effective reply to the clerical calumny than is here given. It is not alone a calumny on Freethought; it is an insult to the noblest and the most sanely idealistic of our Allies—the French nation. For there Secular Education is an accomplished fact; and if the assumed neglect of religious education has led to demoralization in Germany, if the establishment of Secular Education will lead to demoralization in England, what are we to say of France? Are we to say the French are merely a race of "clever devils"; that the same "repulsive example" will ensue in France as in Germany, and as we are warned will occur here? Or are we to conclude that we have here one more example of the lack of truthfulness and responsibility that almost habitually accompany the utterances of our clergy? The pamphlet from which we have so lengthily, but we think so serviceably quoted, well says :—

> If the German crimes are falsely attributed to the Secular Solution, it may be legitimately pointed out that it is not the Germans, but the French, who have established complete Secular National Education. And if the Secular Solution v. Religious Teaching by the State were brought before the entire world for judgment, to be tested by their respective moral results in Germany and France, the world condemnation of that German brutality which marks the lowest degradation of humanity would put out of court a State System of Religious Teaching, which has been powerless to prevent that degradation, and award the palm to a Secular System of State Education such as obtains in France, whose standard of honour in the conduct of the War commands the homage of the civilized world.

This is finely put, and we hope that all friends of Secular Education will see to it that this pamphlet is widely circulated. It is an appeal to facts; and the facts, here as elsewhere, are fatal to the claims of orthodox and established Christianity.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Befogged Apologetics.

IT is a notorious characteristic of Christianity that from the beginning of its history until now it has been adapting itself to the ever-varying conditions of intellectual and moral life among its actual and potential converts. At bottom it has always been the sworn enemy of natural knowledge, and during the days of its supremacy succeeded in almost entirely suppressing it. To this day Spain has never recovered her intellectual independence which the brutal Inquisition so completely destroyed. In most other lands, however, the Ages of Faith, or Dark Ages, came to an end, and as an inevitable accompaniment of the Renaissance came the Protestant Reformation, with its religiously undermining principle of Private Judgment. No history has yet disclosed the true inwardness of the Revival of Learning; and all we feel justified in saying about the movement here is that it was totally non-Christian in its origin and essentially anti-Christian in its influence. It may be generally described as the revival of a learning which Christianity had doomed, by means of physical force, to a deplorably long period of suspended animation. We may say that ever since the conquest of Spain by the Arabs in the eighth century, the Renaissance had been in active operation, but only as a sort of underground movement, while in the twelfth century it came to the surface, and was enthusiastically welcomed by some Popes and other dignitaries of the Church, a few of whom came perilously near to renouncing Christianity in its favour. Later on a powerful reaction occurred which proved the salvation of the Catholic Church; but Protestantism, splitting up into numerous more or less hostile sects, became, in spite of itself, an ally of the Renaissance. At first, many of these sects vigorously opposed every scientific advance, dreading its triumph as a menace to its own existence, but ultimately relinquishing, as quietly as possible, some of its formerly most dearly cherished dogmas in order to adopt the new knowledge as a perfectly harmonious adjunct to itself. The divines explained that curious process by declaring that the discarded tenets had never been essential articles in the Christian Creed.

The foregoing observations were suggested by the leading article, entitled, "Religion which is not Religious," in the Christian Commonwealth for November 21, presumably from the pen of the editor, Mr. Dawson, who possesses a commendably hospitable mind. The leader opens thus:—

> The Christian religion has been greatly overweighted with things not essentially religious—that is, ethical and spiritual in their influence. It has not, like the Samaritan, fallen among thieves who have stripped it, but it has rather fallen among those who have encumbered it with things alien from its essential spirit, and which have proved impediments to its work and influence in the world.

Mr. Dawson is a man whom we, for several reasons, greatly admire; but we are bound to characterize his attitude to the divines of the past as the opposite to complimentary. He evidently forgets that the things which he regards as non-essential to Christianity were looked upon by Paul, Augustine, and Calvin as vital parts thereof, and that no idea of challenging them occurred to the generality of believers until science had made discoveries which discredited them. Mr. Dawson is not at all happy in his illustrations. He says:—

> For example, it has been deemed essential that its adherents should accept certain views as to the origin of the physical world, the time of man's appearance upon it, the mode of his development, and many other similar questions. These are not really religious questions: they belong to the realm of geology, physics, astronomy, anthropology. All that is vital to belief in these realms is faith in the Divine origin of the world and humanity.

This is the New Theology with a vengeance, and, as usual, it confuses the issues without a qualm. We do not know to what extent Mr. Dawson treats the Bible as Divinely inspired; but his being a Christian at all bears witness to the fact that he considers some part of it to be of Divine authority. The point is, however, that prior to the birth of modern science the Church taught, in the most dogmatic manner, that the origin of the physical universe and of man were pre-eminently religious questions. The first three chapters of Genesis were accepted as a purely historical record. Christianity is presented in the New Testament as a Divine provision to counteract and eradicate all the consequences of the fall sustained in Eden. Among those disastrous penalties was death, the death of the body no less than of the soul. Christ was the second Adam, whose mission was to give humanity a new start. Paul believed that "through one man sin entered into the world, and death through sin," and the Gospel he had to preach is summed up thus: "If by the trespass of one the many died, much more did the grace of God, and the gift by the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ, abound unto the many." Is Mr. Dawson prepared to say openly that Paul's evangel was fundamentally false? Mr. Campbell indulged in that admission in his heretical days, and was applauded by a Thursday noon congregation. It should be borne in mind that Paul claimed to have received his Gospel by a special revelation from heaven. If it be admitted that he was radically mistaken, are we not thereby entitled to doubt every other claim of a like nature? But, in that case, on what ground does Mr. Dawson believe in "the Divine origin of the world and humanity"? Science knows nothing of such an origin of either, evolution being the only process it has to deal with. Even Sir Oliver Lodge is scientifically orthodox on this point.

We are in substantial agreement with Mr. Dawson as to the non-religious character of the evolutionary process. Like him we prefer the testimony of the rocks to that of Genesis; but, then, we do not believe in the Divine origin either of the world or of man. We also endorse much of what he avers concerning the future of the world. We heartily concur in his condemnation of a manifesto signed by ten clergymen, entitled "The Significance of the Hour." We have not seen that manifesto; but among its details, our editor tells us, are the following:—

> That the present crisis points towards the close of the times of the Gentiles; that the revelation of our Lord may be expected at any moment, when he will be manifested as evidently to the disciples as on the evening of his resurrection; that the completed Church will be translated to be for ever with the Lord; that Israel will be restored to its own land in unbelief, and be afterwards converted by the appearance of Christ on its behalf; that all human schemes of reconstruction must be subsidiary to the coming of our Lord, because all nations will then be subject to his rule.

We beg to remind Mr. Dawson that the manifesto is not without Scriptural warrant, not only in the Books of Daniel and Revelation, but also in the Gospels and Pauline Epistles. We even venture to exonerate those ten clergymen from the charge of founding their manifesto upon an "unbalanced interpretation" of Holy Writ. We are convinced that all they advocate in the extract just given is a fair deduction from Biblical statements. We repudiate the manifesto only on the score that the Scripture warrant for it is as valueless as itself. It is true, no doubt, that "in a vast library like the Bible, by an unbalanced interpretation almost anything can be supported"; but it is equally true that the Gospel Jesus speaks of the expediency of his departure from his disciples, and of the certainty of his returning to them again; and the latter event is described with as much emphasis as the former. Just here Mr. Dawson is guilty of considerable quibbling. The Gospel Jesus is by no means consistent in his various references to his own future. He tells the disciples that it is expedient for him to go away, that the Holy Ghost may come and take his place, and yet in the same breath he assures them that he himself will be present with them to the end of time. The curious thing is that it does not occur to Mr. Dawson that the truth on this whole subject is expressed by Professor Gilbert Murray in his suggestive article in the R. P. A. Annual for 1918, when he declares that "neither the doctrines stated in the Creeds nor the supposed history contained in the Gospels will bear examination." If the Professor is right, as we think he is, then all appeals to the Gospels are absolutely in vain, whatever interpretation of the mere words may be adopted.

We are further convinced that all appeals to Christian history are fully as vain. Are not the supposed reign of Christ in the world, and his never-failing presence in the hearts of his people, guiding them in all their ways, the emptiest of dreams? Are the conditions of life in Europe at this moment a credit to the all-loving, all-powerful, and all-conquering Saviour of the world? We do not hesitate to assert that the Christian religion, judged by its history and present influence in the world, must be pronounced, not only a tragic failure, but also fundamentally and absolutely false.

The Tradesman's Touch.

The art of the pen is to rouse the inward vision, instead of labouring with a drop-scene brush.—George Meredith.

Who is Mr. Hall Caine?—Bernard Shaw.

THAT modest writer, Mr. Hall Caine, is fortunate in having publishers who are unlike himself, for seldom are any books heralded with such blare of trumpets as his novels. These industrious and enterprising tradesmen announce a cheap edition of Mr. Caine's The Woman Thou Gavest Me as "a love-story for all the world and for all time," and add that 400,000 copies have already been sold. They also inform the reading public that hundreds of thousands of his previous novels have been sold, and that the latest story has been translated into sixteen languages, including Japanese and Yiddish.

The reasons for a popularity such as this are worth considering, for, if foreign sales come anywhere near the English purchases, it may be assumed that contemporary English fiction is represented in Europe by Mr. Caine, as French literary art is by Anatole France, Belgian by Maurice Maeterlinck, Italian by Gabriele D'Annunzio, Russian by Maxim Gorky, and German by Herman Suderman.

Yet some people, not wholly illiterate, have been known to admit that they could only regard Mr. Caine's tremendous popularity with wonder and amazement. The genius of Hardy and Meredith, as of Shelley and Keats before them, dawned slowly upon the general reader. But here is a writer of novels whose books run into new editions as fast as the printing presses and the bookbinders can supply them. Like Miss Marie Corelli and Mr. Charles Garvice, he has succeeded in winning the hearts of myriads of readers. What these stern moralists are to the worldly minded, Mr. Hall Caine is to the other worldly minded. In each, vulgar, but virtuous ordinary folk and grotesque villains win the appreciation of their readers. Mr. Caine represents this taste, with the addition of an affectation of realism, and the ethics of an invertebrate Christianity.

In his latest work, The Woman Thou Gavest Me, Mr. Caine breaks no fresh ground, but tells a commonplace love-story in strident tones, and with much elaboration of detail. Although occupying many pages of close print, the plot can be told in a few words. A woman is married by force to a profligate brute; gets disgusted with her husband; loves an Arctic explorer; gives birth to an illegitimate child; and dies of consumption. The characters in the novel are older than the everlasting hills. There is not a single portrait of an actual personality; but only personifications of bravery, self-sacrifice, profligacy, greed, and so forth.

The story, it will be seen, is frankly popular, and, incidentally, presents a considerable opportunity for introducing theatrical effects, and the author's fondness for the Roman Catholic Church. Indeed, Mr. Caine takes nothing for granted, and "wallows naked in the pathetic." Naturally, the explorer must be an Arctic one, and, when his mistress is suffering, by some theatrical telepathy, he hears her voice calling him over thousands of miles of space. Mary O'Neill, the heroine, is what our American cousins call "a Continental idiot." Forced into a loveless marriage with an almost unknown man, she has not sufficient sense to earn her own living after leaving her husband, and gets consumption through drying her baby's wet clothes on her own body. Although madly in love with an explorer, she does not read the newspapers to be informed of the expedition, and she starves herself in order that her child may be strong and healthy. Frankly, the book is altogether unreal and melodramatic, for, when the heroine is forced by poverty to solicit in Piccadilly, the only person she accosts is her long-lost explorer.

Mr. Caine tickles the long ears of the groundlings with Biblical phrases. The title strikes the key-note, and Mary's narrative begins with the following words:—

> Out of the depths, O Lord, out of the depths, begins the most beautiful of the services of our Church, and it is out of the depths of my life that I must bring the incidents of this story.

The ending has the same air of striking novelty:—

> Very soon the mist will rise, and the day will break, and the sun will come again and—there will be no more night.
> These were the last words penned by Mary before her gentle and tortured spirit took flight from earth.

It is enough to break a "gentle and tortured" critic's heart. However, Mr. Hall Caine is giving pleasure to hundreds of thousands of English, Yiddish, Japanese, and other readers; and no great harm is done, if, in reading his work, they cherish the pleasing delusion that they are reading really great English literature, fresh from the hand of a master of his art. Since, however, Mr. Caine plainly labours under the belief that he is a great writer, it is a pity that he cannot be enlightened. He has won an enormous body of readers precisely because he is not a genius. Why should he not be content? Why should he dream that he is a brother to Thomas Hardy and George Meredith, to Anatole France and Gabriele D'Annunzio? He is the universal provider of the circulating libraries, and is as little an artist as any other manufacturer.

The Bible and Immortality.

THE BOOK OF ENOCH THE PROPHET.

ABOUT a century before the commencement of the Christian Era, a new book of an apocalyptic nature came into circulation among the Jewish people; but for some unknown reason it failed to secure a place in the Hebrew canon or even in the so-called Apocrypha. This book was widely read, and after being handed down to apostolic and later times, was received by Christians as "the word of God." The work of fiction to which reference is here made was called "The Book of Enoch the Prophet," and it claimed in its pages to have been written by the Enoch who is said to have lived before the Deluge. Of this mythical individual it is recorded in Genesis v. 24:—

> And Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God took him.

The latter statement is generally understood to mean that Enoch, like the prophet Elijah, was taken to heaven without dying—and such is implied in the book itself. This literary forgery is named in the New Testament by the apostle Jude, who quotes from it as a genuine and inspired prophetical writing. After speaking of the "ungodly men" of his own day, who denied "our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ," and railed at things they did not understand, Jude says:—

> And of these also Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his holy ones, to execute Judgment upon all, and to convict all the ungodly of all their works of ungodliness which they have ungodly committed, etc.—(Jude 14, 15).

The line of ante-diluvian patriarchs in Genesis v. reads: Adam, Seth, Enosh, Kenan, Mahalalel, Jared, Enoch, etc. The last-named patriarch was, in the opinion of Jude, the writer of the book from which he had quoted. The Christian "father," Tertullian, who was of the same opinion, tells us that when the great flood came upon the earth three generations later, Noah saved the book from destruction by taking it into the ark.

For many years the Book of Enoch, which was frequently quoted by the early Christians, was believed to have been lost; but, in 1773, Bruce, the Abyssinian traveller, found an Ethiopian version in the Abyssinian Bible, and brought three copies to Europe, one of which was presented to the University of Oxford—where it remained untranslated until 1821. In the recovered "Enoch" Jude's quotation is found. Jude says again:—

> And angels which kept not their own principality, but left their proper habitation, He hath kept in everlasting bonds under darkness unto the judgment of the great day.—(Jude 6).

This is not a quotation from "Enoch"; it is merely a statement of matter contained in the book. The "angels" mentioned by Jude were the "sons of God" who left heaven to take the "daughters of men" as wives (Gen. vi. 2, 4). Those angels figure in the Book of Enoch, where they are temporarily punished as Jude states; but their doom on the day of judgment, an angel informed Enoch, was already sealed; they are to be cast alive into a valley of liquid fire. It was from this book that the writer of the Book of Revelation took his "lake of fire" (Rev. xix. 20; xx. 10, 14, 15; xxi. 6). The term "sons of God" in Gen. vi. is rendered "angels" in the Alexandrian MS., and also by Josephus.

The Book of Enoch calls for a thorough re-arrangement; in many places it reads like a number of independent tracts, without beginning or end, that have become intermixed; statements are made again and again in nearly the same words, though the praise of the righteous and the condemnation of the ungodly pervade the whole book. The Hebrew deity is mostly spoken of as the "Lord of spirits" or the "Mighty One," though sometimes called "the Lord." Mention is made in several parts of the book of a "Son of man," also called "the Elect One," into whose hand is to be given the judgment of the nations upon the Great day—which personage is evidently the "Son of man" in the Gospels. The Book of Enoch is, in some respects, a key to the evolution of Christianity, much of its language and ideas being found in the New Testament.

Coming now to the question of immortality, there are many statements on the subject throughout the book, the examples selected here being those most clearly expressed:—

> Chap. 61.—Then shall the Lord of spirits hasten to expel the ungodly from his presence.....The angels shall take them to punishment, that vengeance may be inflicted on those who have oppressed his elect.....But the saints and the elect shall be safe in that day. The Lord of spirits shall remain over them: and with the Son of man shall they dwell, eat, lie down, and rise up, for ever and ever.
> Chap. 66.—Blessed are ye, O saints and elect, for glorious is your lot. The saints shall exist in the light of the sun, and the elect in the light of everlasting life, the days of whose life shall never terminate; nor shall the days of the saints be numbered, who seek for light and obtain righteousness with the Lord of spirits.
> Chap. 99.—In that day shall the Most High execute judgment upon all sinners, and commit the guardianship of all the righteous to the holy angels.....Woe to you, ye sinners; for with the words of your mouths, and with the works of your hands, have you acted impiously: in the flame of blazing fire shall you be burnt.

From the foregoing paragraphs it would seem that it was not merely the soul or spirit that should enjoy a peaceful life after death, but the whole man, with his earthly body. To eat, lie down to rest, and wake up refreshed, clearly point to the latter. Towards the end of the book, however, the spirit of man is mentioned—a fact which suggests a later writer and date. The book is considered by all competent critics to contain several strata, all pre-Christian. The following are examples:—

> Chap. 102.—Fear not, ye souls of the righteous; but wait with patient hope for the day of your death in righteousness. Grieve not because your souls descend in great trouble to the receptacle of the dead.....And when you die, sinners say concerning you, As we die, the righteous die. What profit have they in their works? Behold they are dead; and never will they again perceive the light.
> Chap. 103.—But now I swear to you, ye righteous..... that all goodness, joy, and glory has been prepared for you, and for the spirits of them who die righteous and good.....The spirits of you who die in righteousness shall exist and rejoice. Your spirits shall exult before the face of the Mighty One from generation to generation.
> Chap. 103.—Woe to you, ye sinners, when you die in your sins; and they who are like you say, Blessed are these sinners: they have lived out their whole life, and now they die in happiness and wealth.....But has it not been shown to them that, when to the receptacle of the dead their souls shall be made to descend, their evil deeds shall become their greatest torment? Into darkness, into the snare, and into the flame, which shall burn at the great judgment, shall their spirits enter; and the great judgment shall take effect for ever and ever.

In these later paragraphs the "receptacle of the dead" is, of course, the Underworld, which the veracious Enoch states had been shown to him by an angel. All the "spirits of the dead" were to lie in this dark and dreary place until the day of judgment. In the Old Testament times they remained there for ever, as in the following example:—

> Chap. 22.—A receptacle of this sort has been made for the souls of unrighteous men and of sinners..... Their souls shall not be annihilated in the day of judgment, neither shall they arise from this place.

The "receptacle" here spoken of had been shown to Enoch, and was, apparently, a huge tunnel under a mountain, with a smooth floor. It was deep and dark, and it contained no fire.

One useful purpose, from another point of view, is served by the book: in its pages we learn something of what was thought of the Universe and natural phenomena at the time it was written. This portion can best be described in the words of a certain American reviewer of Carlyle's Sartor Resartus as "a heap of clotted nonsense." The following are examples: Enoch tells us that an angel showed him "the receptacle of light and thunder," in which places he saw "bows and arrows of fire, a sword of fire, and every species of lightning." He also "surveyed the receptacles of all the winds" as well as the receptacles in which the Lord of spirits kept the hail, snow, and clouds before they were sent out upon the earth. He saw "the stone which supports one of the corners of the earth," and he "beheld the four winds which bear up the earth and the firmament of heaven," as well as "the winds which turn the sky, and cause the sun and stars to set." At the "extremities of the earth, where heaven ceased," he saw "the gates of heaven open and the celestial stars come forth." He "numbered them as they proceeded out of the gates," and the angel Uriel told him their names. He says of the sun and moon "the dimensions of both are equal," and that each is carried through the air on a chariot, which "the wind blows." Light, he says, "is given to the moon by measure," and Uriel showed him how "the light is poured into the moon from the sun."

Digitized by Google

Thus, besides being an inspired guide to heaven, the Book of Enoch was a complete text-book of science, from which the early Christians, including Jude and the other apostles, took their ideas of the Universe.

ABRACADABRA.

The Bhagavad Gita.

IT is one of the chief delights of Freethought to be able to roam at will over the world's philosophy, to stand on hills breathing the pure air of truths that never caused a tear, to walk in valleys where bloom the fairest flowers of contentment, or to stand, like Plato, in the shadow of a wall. Therefore, without misgivings, we shall endeavour to examine the book with the above title—a labour of love to perform, and, we trust, with profit and delight to our readers.

At the outset, there is one quality in Freethought which is identical with Hindu philosophy, and that is meditation. No man or woman was ever convinced in a day of the truth of Freethought. Needless to say, a man may be an orthodox Christian, without thinking at all, and we believe that the last thing a priest would complain of would be the ignorance of his flock. If anyone, on the contrary, should take up a definite anti-Christian attitude, it cannot be maintained by any of the specious arguments gyrating round the Trinity. In brief, opposition to the fundamental beliefs of Christianity is not based on likes or dislikes, nor is it supported by dogmatism, nor can it be maintained by an easy-going indifference to truth.

Freethought demands from its followers that which priests desire to suppress. Whether it be compliment to Freethought from Hindu philosophy, or vice-versa, that they have meditation or thought in common must be left to each individual's choice—it is no great matter either way.

In the edition before us, Mrs. Annie Besant contributes a preface. With toleration we regard her remarks in reference to some one personified as "Him," and we find ourselves in agreement with the emphasis on the discharge of duty. However, we differ from her when she implies that this function must be discharged without seeking the result. To the mildly passive East this may be acceptable; but, as Freethinkers, we trust we shall always retain our true vision of cause and effect. If the Hindu sows regardless of the harvest, we can say that this attitude is noble and disinterested and worthy of admiration. Freethought has a definite function to perform, and its results can be judged by what organized religion has been forced to relinquish. If our propaganda had any material gain then we should have no case; but, as it is, our progress is slow and sure. It is safe to say that a thousand "leading" articles in such papers as the Daily Mail and the Daily Mirror against Freethought could not injure the movement. As "A.E.R.," in the New Age, has wittily said, the former daily paper was founded by Lord Northcliffe for those who could not think, and the latter for those who could not read; what the press has not made it cannot destroy; for the strength of Freethought does not lie in its popular appeal. If we discharge our duties as citizens of the world, it is with a definite object in view; and, therefore, we sow with a definite purpose. In this respect Freethought differs from the teachings of the East. We are informed in the preface that "the spiritual man need not be a recluse, that union with the divine life may be achieved and maintained in the midst of worldly affairs, that the obstacles to that union lie not outside us but within us—such is the central lesson of the Bhagavad-Gita." The passivity of this doctrine is alluring, and in marked contrast to Christianity with its low water mark of brass bands as used by the Salvation Army; in fact, we are able to see that there is a difference between a religion and a philosophy. Philosophy starts on its journey from the East, and, during transit through Jerusalem and Rome, it becomes distorted by the time it reaches England. Trumpets and cymbals organs and incense—by these brutal and subtle methods shall mankind's sense be inclined into the necessary attitude towards one of the biggest shams ever erected on a foundation of ignorance. Beautiful truths that would lead man to the heaven of contentment—truths with laughter in them, these have been twisted by our modern bogeymen, called priests, who present them as a religion. Philosophy demands thought, religion whines for faith, and thought and faith are as fire and water.

In our copy we have made many underlinings. The first passage captivated us by its supreme nobility. Arjuna, the warrior-prince, is about to engage in conflict. To Krishna he says: "For I desire not victory, O Krishna, nor kingdom, nor pleasures; what is kingdom to us, O Govindu, what enjoyment, or even life?" We shall find it difficult to match this passage for detachment and disinterestedness. Again, this attitude, a purely philosophical one, differs from the modern religious view—a view, one might say, intensely materialistic, and, by temporal possessions ruling it out of the court where men do not wear spiritual blinkers.

Speaking of emotions and the senses, Krishna says: "The man whom these torment not, O chief of men, balanced in pain and pleasure, steadfast, he is fitted for immortality." These words will fall strangely on Western ears; yet, are they not the essentials of philosophy? Can Christians hunt with the hound of gold and ride with the hare of renunciation? They can, and do so; and we are apparently the only people who persist in pointing out the commercialism of this Western hotch-potch called Christianity. With this inconsistency of Materialism, false ethics flourish like the green bay-tree.

We should like to quote again and again from this little book; for us, it is ripe with ethical wisdom, and the reader will find that his study of the world's literature will assist him in understanding the teaching embodied in this volume. It is true to say that the ethics of Freethought are identical with those expounded in its pages. We part company, however, with this philosophy when it stresses the supernatural element and designates it as "Him" or the "Eternal."

"It is said that the senses are great; greater than the senses is the mind: greater than the mind is the Reason; but what is greater than the Reason, is He." If we had any proof of the existence of the being in the climax in this extract, we might abandon reason. Is not all this talk about "Him" but another aspect of the God idea? It is easy to conceive matter as being indestructible; we cannot take the evidence or suggestion of evidence as positive and final on the existence of the Eternal with its Hindu connotation. In the future, at some happier period, philosophy may have time to expand. Philosophy may even occupy then the prominent position now given to horse-racing. Until then, we must be content to work for the good of mankind in our own particular way. Looking back through the pages of history, we behold the God of the Old Testament, whose voice is the thunder. In the New Testament he has changed, and we find him as a spirit. Later on, God is Love. Then the dissatisfied ones would say Love is God. Matthew Arnold revalued the God-idea when he wrote that "God is the eternal spirit making for righteousness"—which, of course, was only stating the matter in the same terms as the Hebrews, who valued righteousness chiefly as a social virtue. The art of God-making is quite easy to learn. Through looking steadfastly at the sun, we can imagine that we are a part of it; for the sake of convenience, we may call this the metaphysical side of the question. On the other hand, it is quite safe to say that we are a part of it, since we cannot exist without the sun. The warmth in our bodies is derived from it; through our eyes flow light, and our physical demands cannot be satisfied without the sun. Therefore, the sun is God to anyone who is content to accept this kind of reasoning. In the same way, we think the idea of "Him" or the "Eternal" came to life in the "Bhagavad Gita."

We feel sure that our readers will be well repaid by reading this little book, which is issued by the Theosophical Publishing House, at the modest price of sixpence. Whilst many will not subscribe to the idea we have remarked upon, all will enjoy the fruits of divine philosophy to be found in its pages. Pater made a broad sweep of a broad subject when he wrote:—

> For the essence of humanism is that belief of which he seems never to have doubted, that nothing which has ever interested living men and women can wholly lose its vitality—no language they have spoken, nor oracle beside which they have hushed their voices, no dream which has once been entertained by actual human minds, nothing about which they have ever been passionate, or expended time and zeal.

This was the belief of Pica Della Mirandola. In this spirit we offer these few remarks on the "Bhagavad Gita," and conclude with a note of interrogation. Arjuna, the central figure in the story, receives inspiration to act regardless of consequences. The Arjuna type of person is one who neither desires anything nor fears anything. What are we to call this attitude to life? It has the appearance of dynamic passivity. How many Freethinkers would care to call themselves Arjunas?

WILLIAM REPTON.

Acid Drops.

We are glad to see that the American military authorities than our own are more alive to the freedom of the Army. The Commanding Officer at Fort Hamilton issued an order for all men to attend divine service. On this Mr. G. E. Macdonald, editor of the Truthseeker, wrote to the War Department asking what had become of the constitutional right to religious freedom? The reply of the Department was prompt and satisfactory, it contained the following passage:—

> The Department Commander does not approve of the action of the Coast Defence Commander in requiring compulsory attendance at divine service of persons under his command. Necessary action will be taken accordingly.

This is quite to the point, and we wonder how long it will be before the British soldier will possess the same freedom. France can manage the War without official "divine service" of any kind. America can manage with "divine service" only for those who care to have it. Great Britain continues the policy of driving the men to Church whether they wish to go or not.

Apropos of the above, we were pleased to see a trenchant letter in a recent issue of the Southampton Times, from Mr. J. W. Wood, asking, as we have just done, "How long it will take Britain to level up to the American standard of liberty." Letters in such places do a considerable amount of good. And the protest against "compulsory Christianity" is sadly needed. Men join the Army to do their duty as soldiers. To make them compulsory helpers at a ridiculous ceremony is an outrage on their manhood.

The Catholic magazine, the Month, contains an article, entitled "A Shakespeare Discovery—his Schoolmaster afterwards a Jesuit." This will hardly set the Thames afire. Shakespeare himself did not often trouble the pewopeners.

"Catholic Game. Day to Heaven" is the title of an advertisement in the Universe.

A memorial, signed by a number of leading Churchmen and Nonconformists, is being presented to the Prime Minister protesting against the proposed reform of the divine laws on the ground that it runs "counter to the consistent teaching of the Church of Christ from the beginning. But what has the Church of Christ to do with it? Any amendment of the marriage laws ought to rest upon the common sense and common needs of the community. To bother what the Church of Christ—with a celibate figurehead, and one half that Church with a celibate clergy—has to say about it is sheer absurdity. Of course the "Church of Christ" is against the charge. Its game is to keep the control of marriage in its own hands. If it controls marriage, it controls the mother, and through her the child. That is the bed-rock fact in the anxiety of the clergy.

One of our readers, at present "Somewhere in the Holy Land," sends us the following:—

> A soldier was riding a mule up through a portion of the desert, and, being in a hurry, he was using a stick frequently. A padre stopped him and remonstrated with him. Said he: "Don't you know that our Lord rode up this very way and did not labour his mule. "That may be so," replied the soldier, "but he was not in such a hell of a hurry as I am. Gee-up."

The Duke of Argyll has been writing in the Glasgow Herald, and pointing out that Scotch Protestants do not appear to be in a hurry to celebrate the Reformation and "Dr. and Mrs. Martin Luther." The sneer at Luther is an unworthy one, for celibacy, as Horace Smith said wittily, is "a vow a man takes that he will enjoy none but other men's wives."

This is not the only example of the Duke of Argyll's humour, for he calls Luther and his wife "a couple of arch aliens." This is a hard saying, for all the Bible heroes and heroines were aliens.

The action of the House of Commons with regard to Conscientious Objectors is a fresh proof of how dangerous it is to do things with a total disregard of logic or common sense. When the question was first raised, we pointed out what we considered the common sense of the situation. If the State had a right to force any of the community into the Army, it had a right to force all. And when the principle of compulsion was adopted, it should have been adopted for all. This would have left the man with a conscientious objection free to make his protest in his own way and on his own responsibility. It would also have prevented any abuse of the principle. The man who objected to military service would have done so, as has been done in France and elsewhere. He would have counted the cost and paid the price, and would have deserved the respect due to such conduct. But when the State made the plea of conscientious objection a legal one, it acted illogically, and when it punished men for claiming a right which the State itself conferred, it added injustice to folly.

Now the House of Commons has decided to go further, and invent a new punishment—the disfranchisement of the Conscientious Objector—for an old offence. And that is a principle absolutely foreign to English law and, to what used to be, British ideas of freedom. At law, offenders can only be punished according to the law as it exists at the time the offence is committed. To invent a new punishment, unknown to the offender at the time, and only introduced a long time after, is quite indefensible. It is not often we find ourselves in agreement with Lord Hugh Cecil, but we are in accord with the fine protest made by him in the House of Commons. And the reply of Mr. Bonar Law made the matter worse. To say, as he did, that the State must consider itself first, makes one open one's eyes. As Lord Hugh Cecil pointed out, this is the very charge we bring against Germany—that it believes the State has the right to override all ethical and other considerations in considering its own welfare. It is absurd and dangerous to argue that these few thousand Conscientious Objectors are a danger to the State. It was exactly upon that ground that freethinking opinions were for so long harried and Freethinkers oppressed. It is a dangerous principle to admit, and one never knows where its application will end. It is the objector to military service to-day; it may well be someone else to-morrow. Given a strong religious party in power, they could apply it to any heretical opinion it wished to punish.

The Church Times defends the disfranchising of the Conscientious Objector on the ground that "It is a sound principle that the claim to the rights of citizenship must be supported by the exercise of the duties of citizenship." An excellent principle; but it has nothing whatever do do with this issue. For here the State legalized the position of the genuine Conscientious Objector. It gave him the right to withdraw from military service. And having given him a right, on what ground can anyone justify punishing him for its exercise? And both the Church Times and the Government overlook the fact that if the Conscientious Objector is not allowed to vote, he cannot be prevented influencing the votes of others. That is, unless he is shot out of hand. But perhaps that is to come.

Dr. Fort Newton is undergoing an interesting process of evolution. He is becoming more and more the victim of a vague, unintelligent, and well-nigh unintelligible mysticism. While ostentatiously opposed to dogmas and dogmatism, he yet displays the dogmatic spirit, and, like all his brethren, lays down dogmas of his own, which are as irrational as any found in the most orthodox system of theologians. For example, in a recent sermon, speaking of Jesus, he says: "Into that world where we are free from the tyranny of time he seeks to lead us, adding a new dimension to our lives." Whether time be a tyrant or not, there is no possibility of getting free from it, except by ceasing to live. Even Dr. Newton himself is by no means independent of it.

The Rev. Dr. Jowett, minister-elect of Westminster Chapel, paints a beautifully alluring picture of the Church in the Christian World for November 22. She is the repairer of breaches and restorer of broken roads. She is placed in a disjointed world to set it right. Ideally, she is the most glorious institution known to history. Practically, however, the Church is the biggest swindle conceivable—the author of breaches and the breaker-up of roads. Instead of uniting people in the bond of peace and love, she divides them into a thousand hostile factions. And yet Dr. Jowett disdainfully ignores the reality and hugs the seductive but empty dream, in which he has visions of the day when, as a result of the Church's work of repair and restoration, "all strife shall be over, when there shall be no more breaches in human fellowship, when men shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and when they shall not learn war any more." Meantime, Holy Church is ardently worshipping and faithfully serving the God of War, and is beating all available material into weapons of destruction.

Sir Arthur Yapp, speaking at Glasgow, said that a Y.M.C.A. hut had been started at Gaza, and another would be shortly erected at Jerusalem. It looks as if the Y.M.C.A. intended to introduce religion to the Holy Land.

A man asked the other day, "What would Jesus do if he lived to-day?" Then he gave a list of reactionary deeds which he was sure Jesus would perform were he with us now. For example, he would abolish the liquor traffic, close all places of amusement, restore the Sabbath to its holy uses, and so on. That is, Jesus would be a bigot, and do what this man would do if he had the power. Probably Jesus never lived at all; but as an imaginary character he can conveniently be held responsible for all the follies and absurdities that ever enter the heart of man.

The slump in Christianity is, as we have often pointed out, world wide. A correspondent sends us a cutting from the Diamond Fields Advertiser of October 10, which reports a discussion at one of the Church Synods on the reason "why so many male members seldom attend Church service," and why so many children of Church members are finally "lost." There was a lengthy discussion, and the Rev. W. H. Lillie brought forward a number of reasons, but hit the nail on the head in the first: "The advance of education so that the parson has not the same authority." We congratulate Mr. Lillie on having had the courage to say what all the clergy must know. And the only real remedy is for the clergy to stop this advance or to control it.

The clergy are continually asserting that the world-war is helping the cause of religion, but there is little proof of this. The Rev. C. Sharp, of Byfleet, Surrey, declares that "more money is spent on golf balls than is collected in the churches for foreign missions."

"Many people are too much inclined to take a gloomy view of things," says the Bishop of Willesden. It is hardly surprising that worshippers of the Man of Sorrows should be gloomy.

"People who talk of the failure of the Church do not know what they are talking about," declares the Bishop of London. Unfortunately, these poor folk do not get £10,000 yearly from the Church.

With the sanction of the Austrian Government, the Jewish rabbis pronounced the rabbinical curse against food usury. In this country the clergy leave ordinary people to do the cursing.

The anxiety of pious folk to provide huts for the use of soldiers is not entirely humanitarian. The Church Army is appealing for devotional huts and small chapels in connection with the huts.

We hope we shall not be accused of trenching on a political issue if we call attention to the action of the Government in censoring all pamphlets dealing with peace and war. The question of freedom of publication cannot be a political issue, even though it be raised in connection with a political question. We have nothing to say against compelling the names of publishers of all pamphlets to be printed; that strikes us as a sensible regulation. Nor do we say anything against anyone being prosecuted who publishes a treasonable pamphlet. If a man breaks a law, he must be prepared for the consequences. But a regulation which demands that all publications dealing with so vital a question as war or peace shall be submitted to a censor, who cannot be legally called to account for his action, is a practice altogether foreign to British traditions. And the Freethinker would be false to its traditions if it did not raise a protest against this. We believe the freedom of publication to be the most important thing we possess, and one can faintly imagine what men like Carlile or Bradlaugh, both of whom fought Government after Government in defence of the freedom of publication, would have said to this proposed regulation. It means, in practice, that only an opinion which commends itself to the authorities will be allowed. And Freethinkers, above all, have most cause to be alarmed about legislation of this character. We are glad to see that an attempt is to be made in the House of Commons to rescind the resolution. If an opinion is punishable it should at least be punished in open court after open trial.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

December 2, South Shields; December 9, Glasgow.

To Correspondents.

J. & E. PUGH.—We feel quite sure from your letter that you will not let slip any opportunity of helping the Freethinker, and we appreciate very much the tone of your letter.

P. A.—Glad to learn that you found our advice so helpful, and the course of action recommended successful.

W. MAURICE.—Certainly, the existence of suffering as a result of earthquakes, etc., can be attributed to neither malignity nor folly—unless it be the malignity or folly of the "Divine Ruler." And we think it would puzzle anyone to find much educationa value in an earthquake.

S. OWEN.—We have a rod in pickle for that particular piece of folly which will be applied in due time.

SEEKER AFTER TRUTH.—Thanks. Mr. Humphries may reply, but we doubt it.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—J Blackhall, (2nd sub.), 2s. 6d.; J. & E. Pugh,, 5s ; D. Seddon, 10s.; T. Fisher, 10s.; Mr. and Mrs. T. Love, 10s.; Vivian Phelips, £1 1s.; James T. Watkins, Jun., 2s. 6d.

S. AVES.—(1) A most exhaustive treatise on the subject is Criminality and Economic Conditions, by W. A. Bonger (Heinemann, 21s.). You will find therein the views of most leading writers on the topic. (2) Macniven's Community, a Sociological Study (Macmillan, 12s. net) will give you what you need on the other topics. It is a sound piece of writing.

F. BETTS.—Thanks for good wishes. Shall appear.

C. M. HOLDEN.—Certainly you might start a Branch of the N. S. S. at Kingston-on-Thames. Shall be pleased to give any help possible.

T. W. HAUGHTON.—See Mr. Phillpott's letter in another column. We do not claim to write without bias; we hardly think such a thing is possible. The main point seems to us whether one's bias is justifiable or not. And there are surely certain broad social issues on which comments in a paper such as the Freethinker are advisable and useful. And when these comments are made, we expect disagreement with some. The basis of genuine Freethought is not so much agreement as toleration of disagreement.

WE regret that, by an error of transcription, the name of Mr. Cairney, the mover of the resolution at Mr. Lloyd's Glasgow meeting, reported in "Sugar Plums" a fortnight ago, should have been printed "Pairney."

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

On Tyneside, South Shields is keeping the Freethought flag flying, and to-day (Sunday, December 2) in the Victoria Hall, Fowlers Street (near the Municipal Buildings—Ogle Terrace tram stop). Mr. Cohen is announced to lecture at 3—"The Cradle, the Altar, and the Grave"; and at 6.30 (music at 6) "Christianity Before and After the War." Everything possible locally is being done to make the meetings a thorough success, and it is fully anticipated that the innovation of an afternoon gathering will afford outsiders in the district a better opportunity of hearing Mr. Cohen while he is on the North-Eastern circuit.

The campaign at Nuneaton opened well on Sunday last with two lectures from Mr. Cohen. Both meetings were well attended, the audience behaved in a most admirable manner, and a number of membership forms were signed in order to form a Branch of the N. S. S. in the town. Mr. Wilks in the afternoon, and Mrs. King in the evening, presided over the meetings with tact and good humour, and a little music and a couple of solos kept the audience interested until the lecture commenced. Visitors were present from Rugby, Coventry, and other places. This was the first time Freethought meetings had been held in Nuneaton, and we wish the new Branch every success.

From the New York Truthseeker:—

> Headed by Robert Underwood Johnson, the poets of America have been organized to furnish an ambulance service for Italy, each ambulance to be given in honour and memory of an American poet. Mr. F. F. Ayer, a New York Agnostic, makes Ingersoll his choice, and writes the following letter:
>
> "DEAR MR. JOHNSON: Your kind letter which invites me to describe my Ambulance in Italy to the memory of some American Poet who is past and gone, is very welcome. I shall be only too glad to do so, if you will allow me to inscribe it
> To the Memory of
> ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,
> one of our imperial poets, our poet of freedom. No other tongue or pen so mightily and songfully poured the strains of that very Liberty and Democracy for which we are spilling souls and sovereigns. In the presence of such a monarch of the lyre, such an adjutant of humanity, my choice and conscience will not allow me to volunteer any second nomination. Sincerely yours.—F. F. AYER."
> There can, of course, be no doubt that this offer will be gladly accepted by the poets' organization, and that Mr. Ayer's ambulance, inscribed to the memory of Robert G. Ingersoll, will be among the one hundred sent to Italy. The donation that pays for the ambulance is $2,000.

The ambulance may relieve the sufferings of the soldiers; it will certainly add to those of the chaplains.

Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner lectures this evening (December 2) in the Repertory Theatre, Birmingham, on "Belief, Makebelief, and Unbelief." We hope there will be a good rally of Birmingham Freethinkers and others.

Miss Kough lectures this evening for the Kingston Humanitarian Society, Fife Hall, Fife Road, Kingston-on-Thames, at 3 o'clock. Her subject is "Freethought, Woman, and War." Local Freethinkers will please note.

We are near the season when Freethinkers, along with other people, will be looking round for suitable gift-books for their young friends. Not Only Men, by Mr. George Bedborough (Garden City Press, Letchworth, 3s. 6d.), seems well designed for this purpose. The work is made up of eighteen stories, chiefly written round the War, dealing with the faithfulness of the dog, the horse, and all inculcating the lesson of kindness to the animal world. The spirit of the book is well set out in the following from the preface:—

> We do not need to go far for our lessons of humanity..... To those of military age you may find it necessary to explain, with a breaking heart and through tears, that their duty is to enter the fray and fight in wars which never ought to be. But what will you say to the very young, to those who have to live with their neighbours after the War is ended? The War cannot last for ever. We are right to face the problems it brings, but the young who cannot help in the fight might at this time learn some truths which will make wars less frequent when they are men and women. The seed sown now, watere indeed with many tears, may yet save mankind when the harvest of ideas ripen.

This seems to us to strike a note that is sadly wanting in much of the writing of to-day.

A Vision of God.

I KNOW not how, but I was borne in an instant of time through the infinite space of "chaos and old night" up to the battlements of Heaven. They loomed above me higher than a dozen Alps piled one above the other, almost beyond the bounds of visibility, black, and gloomy, and forbidding. Over the lofty crenelated top of the walls poured streams of black vapour, lighted occasionally by lurid beams of blood-red fire and flashes of lightning. Niagara Falls, rain-clouds from the Atlantic borne by western gales, "war-clouds rolling dun," masses of mist rolling up mountain-valleys, all these are feeble comparisons with the oceans of vaporous matter that came spume-like from the inside of the Celestial City.

Almost unknowingly I found myself on the inner side of the great walls, within the sacred precincts of Heaven itself. I looked about apprehensively, but nothing was yet to be seen. Behind me loomed the immense walls, and in every other direction my gaze was closed by the vapours I had seen issuing over the battlements. Gray and black, heavy and slow-moving, impenetrable to the sight, oppressive so as to be felt as a tangible weight, the surging fog heaved round like ocean stirred to its depths by a hurricane. The beams of blood-red light glared intermittently, and lightnings flashed fitfully. I heard noises—thunders and rumblings, deep calling unto deep, the tumult of many waters upon rocky shores, fearful sounds comparable to nothing on earth. The lights and noises seemed at once far off and near, as if proceeding from immeasurable distances, and yet so tremendous that I stood within the confines of their birthplace.

Nervously expectant and trembling I stood and gazed with straining eyes. The red light diminished, the lightnings played but faintly, the uproar lessened, and the density of the circumambient vapour reduced. I became aware that before me a great dark object was emerging from its wrappings of black and gray. I could distinguish something pyramid-shaped revealing itself through the haze. All sounds ended, and deathly silence followed. The scarlet light ceased to gleam, and the lightnings flashed no longer. The dark towering shape took form as the masses of opaque atmosphere thinned and cleared. The last lingering wisps of gray lifted, and everything was revealed to my astonished sight.

All distances seemed alike. Near and far were equally distinct. Before me stretched a boundless plain, occupied by one feature. Between it and I lay an immense space, yet every detail of it was visible, cameo cut in its exactness. A huge platform of stone, black, but resembling granite, rose in seven step-like tiers. Centreing the top level stood a great throne of burnished brass.

I had little time for wondering at the massiveness and craftsmanship of platform and throne, for the figure seated thereon held me spellbound. It had the form of a man, yet of such colossal size and strength that no man or earth has ever been his equal, nor the giants of myth and legend. His legs, knotted with cable-like muscles, rivalled oak trunks in their gnarled massiveness. His feet were planted firmly on heaps of parti-coloured objects faintly resembling human bodies. Looking again I saw that they were the souls of those who had been great potentates on earth. His body was hideous in its gigantesque muscularity, fold upon fold of thews and sinews clothing him like a garment. His arms, vibrant with coarse energy like the legs of a war-horse, lay along the brazen arm-rests of the throne. His hands, huge out of all proportion, terminated in fingers and nails curved like the claws of a carnivorous bird. Most awful of all was the head. Carried on a neck strong as a tower, dew-lapped like a bull, this Deity's head typified all his assembled qualities of strength, ferocity, cruelty, and lust. The skull was bald. Two ridges ran down to the low forehead nearly reaching the eyes. The eyes protruded, and shone dimly like suppressed furnaces, or as if a volcano heaved and struggled to burst through their sockets. The short upturned nose had wide nostrils which drew in all scents and savours, good or ill. Big pointed ears reached to the top of the head, the jaws were square and wider than the forehead, and the thin red lips set like a vice. The colour of this ultra-man was gray, with scarlet under the hands and feet. Leaning against the right hand side of the throne stood a great two-edged sword glittering like burnished silver, and by it a large bowl half-full of blood.

The plain seemed to move, and I wrenched my shuddering gaze from the horrible form, and became aware that the boundless expanse was completely covered with human shapes, all in the attitude of abject adoration, foreheads bowed to the ground. The prostrate myriads raised themselves together, leaned towards their seated monarch, and lifting their naked skeleton arms chanted hoarsely (and their voices were as the rushing of mighty winds)—"Great is our God, for He is God of War!" Their God raised his hand, and there was silence in Heaven. Faintly, as having come through immensity of space, were heard the sounds of earth. Priests chanted praises of Him who fought for right; preachers called upon him to strike for his chosen people; princes and subjects, great and small, wise and simple of every nation, and tongue and kindred could be heard praying and beseeching the Lord of Hosts to reveal himself; orators and poets proclaimed the infinite mercy and wisdom of Him who was on the side of truth and justice. The seated Deity stirred slightly, and his face assumed a look of triumphant but hideous glee; an evil distortion of the already loathsome ugliness. Then the noises of earth were wavering and confused, mingled cries of anger and agony, remorse and anguish, battle-shouts, yells of revenge, and wails of despair, groans of dying men, and the roar of millions in deadly combat. Through it all God's face took on an expression of sardonic and contemptuous satisfaction. Again the myriads of souls raised themselves and cried with one voice: "Great is our God, for He is a God of War!" And God nodded.

Then silence reigned again in heaven, and the sounds of the world were heard once more. Sorrowing of widows and orphans, desperation of beleaguered cities, distressed mariners on sinking ships, hunger-vibrant plaints of starving famine-stricken multitudes, death rattles of thousands, to these God sat and listened as a man would to sublimest music, whilst his nostrils dilated at the smell of blood, and his eyes glowed, like fire in deep caverns, at the scenes of slaughter and destruction. Here the adorant millions raised their pæan of praise: "God is our God, for He is God of War!" at which he nodded with grim and frightful graciousness.

Now the sounds of earth were confused and fainter. The praise and appeals for victory ceased. Instead were shrieks of doubt and uncertainty, oaths and cursings, men reviling God and themselves, despairing appeals, timid challengings and rejections of faith. Occasionally through this babel of discords were audible prayers for peace and entreaties for mercy. God's eye blazed like furnaces stirred for the melting of hardest steel, his hitherto set lips parted, and he ground together teeth resembling the whited sepulchres of man, with a noise akin to the grinding of pebbles on the beach. Under his gray blood-spattered skin the muscles worked like the rolling of ocean billows, and he reached a claw-like hand for his sword. With one accord his worshippers chanted louder and longer, and many times repeated: "Great is our God, for He is God of War!" The indignant Deity sank back on his throne, his stiffened limbs relaxed, and the malicious anger faded from his features. Again the sickening odour of human blood floated up, and he drank it in as it were incense. The cavernous jaws opened in a prodigious yawn which shook his whole frame, and made the kneeling millions tremble. He slowly raised one great claw-like hand to support his heavy head, stared dully round upon his sycophants with fast-closing eyes, the lips fell into a hideous grin, and God slept as his servile wretches murmured softly: "Great is our God, for He is God of War!" whilst the terrestial globe weltered and agonized in battle and bloodshed. Then the mountains of vapour rolled over all again, and I saw no more.

The Everlasting Hills.

III.

As our planet's integument cooled and solidified various portions hardened sooner than others. These areas formed buttresses destined to sustain the pressure brought against them by later movements of the earth's less stable parts. Professor Suess has termed these more stable regions "Horsts," a designation which has been adopted by British scientists as we possess no English equivalent. There are numerous reasons for thinking that during untold ages our globe has undergone a process of gradual contraction. Some parts have subsided, become folded, and been subjected to greater stress, strain, and fracture than others. Those regions which first assumed the solid state were least influenced by outside pressure; they sank comparatively little, and formed the great plains or "horsts" of the earth's exterior.

When the spectator surveys the immense mountain ranges, he is quite naturally inclined to the view that these vast accumulations of rocks represent those aspects of the planet's surface which have most persistently resisted the atmospheric and fluviatile forces which have transported their softer materials along the rivers to the sea. Composed as they are of adamantine rock, they have shown themselves more successful in withstanding assault. Therefore it might plausibly be contended that our elevated areas are the remnants of even mightier mountains which towered when the world was young. In this opinion there is more than an element of truth, for many of our mountains have been greatly reduced by the wear and tear of time. But the established truth remains that the loftier hills rise in solemn grandeur high above the surrounding country, not only because they are built of harder material, but because during immense geological periods they have been gradually upheaved many thousands of feet above the ocean's level. All our chalk formations, thousands of feet thick, were slowly laid down at the bottom of ancient seas. Fossils of marine organisms are common in those deposits which occasionally form part of huge mountain ranges. For instance, the fossilized remains of sea animals have been discovered in the Alps at an altitude of 10,000 feet. They have been found at a greater elevation in the Rocky Mountains, while similar fossils have been unearthed in the Himalayas at the immense height of 16,500 feet.

Geologists are agreed that all the enormous layers of stratified rocks distributed throughout the earth were gently deposited on the bed of some large lake or sea. These aqueous deposits or sediments are invariably disposed in layers termed "strata" which are usually arranged in the form of horizontal layers. It is noteworthy that strata are frequently encountered, particularly in the mountains, which clearly indicate that they have been pushed out of their original position. In the hills, the once horizontal strata slope or dip slightly or deeply, and may even stand upright, thus compelling the conclusion that they have been driven upwards, or twisted and squeezed into their present position by agencies which have operated since the strata were first laid down. Lord Avebury has well expressed the wonder with which even the scientist notes these phenomena. "These wonderful contortions and fractures," he remarks,— > give in the first place the impression of sudden and catastrophic changes; and in the second place it is difficult to believe our own eyes, as it seems almost impossible that solid rocks could be bent without breaking. No doubt, however, the process was very slow. If we take a stick of sealing-wax and bend it quickly it will at once snap, but if the pressure is applied very slowly it may be bent almost to a circle. Again, it must be remembered that the strata which were folded were covered by others, and in many cases were at a great depth. The bending may also have been facilitated by heat and moisture.—(Scenery of England, pp. 224, 225).

Not only have elevations and depressions formed a constant feature of the earth's past history but such changes are still in progress. As Lyell pointed out in his immortal Principles of Geology, the land environing the Gulf of Bothnia is steadily rising. About a century and a half since, the attention of Celsius, the astronomer, was drawn to this fact, and as a result of his inquiries he arrived at the erroneous conclusion that the waters of the Baltic were changing their level. It is now demonstrable that the ocean level is fairly uniform all over the earth, and the discovery that towns once situated on the coast are now far inland finds its true explanation in the circumstance that the land is rising at the rate of over three feet each century. Later researches prove that nearly all parts of Scandinavia are ascending above the sea. Nor is this emergence uniform, for while the northern region of the Gulf of Bothnia is moving upward at the rate of more than five feet per century, the area adjoining the Aland Isles rises in the same period at the rate of three-and-a-quarter feet only. Southwards the movement is still less, while some parts of the peninsula are stationary. But more surprising still is the discovery that the most southern areas of Scandinavia are subsiding. Proof of this is furnished by the forests which have become submerged, as well as by the encroachments of the waves which now cover the sites of old coast-towns and village streets.

The ascent of the chief part of the peninsula has been in operation for a prolonged period, even if we assume that the rate of its upheaval has been more rapid in the past, because layers of sea-shells of living species are met with at heights of 650 feet above sea level. Again:—

> Great dead branches of a certain pink coral, found in the sea at a depth of over 150 to 300 fathoms, are now seen in water only 10 or 15 fathoms deep. It must have been killed as it was brought up into the upper and warmer layers of water.

Further striking testimony is afforded by the pine forests on the hill slopes, for these are slowly being uplifted towards the snow-line, and are dying by degrees in their colder habitat. Moreover, extensive woodland fringes consist entirely of dead pines, many of which have been defunct for centuries. The Baltic was once in wide and direct communication with the salt waters of the North Sea, and the great lakes of Southern Sweden were at that time the deepest depressions of this channel. It is practically certain that the numerous wide sheets of water which occupy the granite basins of Finland are the shrunken remains of a stretch of sea which once joined the waters of the Baltic with those of the Arctic Ocean. Here, also, the land has been raised far above the sea, while much beyond the reach of contemporary tides, ancient sea-beaches along the Scottish, Scandinavian, and other coasts, stand as unimpeachable witnesses of the recession of the ocean.

Between the reaches of high and low tide, the waves are busily engaged in the production of shingle and sand; depositing them on the beach; interspersing them with the shells and skeletons of marine animals, and remains of plants; now massing them in heaps, and now washing them away. A beach is in this manner transformed into a terrace. When the shore rises fast enough to lift these beach fragments beyond the reach of the waves, they form a flat terrace, or what is termed a "raised beach." The earlier high-water mark is no longer invaded by the sea; moisture-loving vegetation appears in the caverns, and the old beach provides an excellent site for hamlets, villages, and arable and pasture lands. Then the retreating waves sculpture a new beach seawards.

On the shores of Scotland, several of these terraced beaches may be seen rising in succession at heights ranging from twenty to seventy-five feet above the present high-water limit. Each of these abandoned beaches represents an earlier lower level at which the beach was swept by the sea, and the intervening spaces signify the successive elevations of the shore. Each terrace was constructed during a resting interval in the ascent, for in the stationary periods the waves were able to form terraces, whereas, during the constant upward movements, they were interrupted from their work. We thus realize that the elevation of the land was here suspended by periods of rest.

Innumerable evidences of the rise of the Scottish coast-line exist. The ancient Roman port of Alaterva—Cramond—now lies at a considerable distance from the sea. The celebrated wall of Antoninus, which in Roman times bridged the land from shore to shore, now terminates some twenty-six feet beyond the high-tide mark. Once more, the tides rose several feet above their present high level 2,000 years ago in the estuary of the Clyde. Kindred phenomena occur in England, notably on our south-western coasts, while on the slopes of the hilly fiords of Norway raised beaches around. Some of these terraces stand more than 600 feet above the level of the sea, while at a distance of fifty miles inland, even more elevated beaches, once fashioned by the waves of the sea, arrest the attention. Nova Zembla, Northern Greenland, Spitzbergen, and a range of coast extending for 600 miles in Siberia, have all participated in this upward movement. The Andes of the Pacific Coast in South America have risen very appreciably during recent times. Raised beaches are found near the Chilian Andes at a height of 1,000 feet, while in the vicinity of Valparaiso they are encountered at a height of 1,300 feet above the sea.

It is more than surmised that, while the western region of South America is being raised up, important parts of its eastern coasts are sinking. This see-saw movement is also in action in North America; for while portions of the eastern coast are subsiding slowly, some regions in Labrador are rising. It is estimated that New Jersey is being depressed at the rate of a couple of feet each century.

Upward, and occasionally downward, movements of the earth are apt to be associated with earthquakes. For instance, after the devastating earthquake in Chili in 1835, the country near the Bay of Conceptcion was raised four or five feet. The most cursory examination of the rocks furnishes unmistakable evidence of their subjection to tremendous stress and strain. Rock fractures range from a few inches up to thousands of feet, and the comparatively sudden shocks known as earthquakes are similar in character to those which cause the gradual and almost imperceptible upheaval of a mountain mass. Our globe is a cooling body which shrinks as it cools, and the crushing and folding of its strata necessarily follow. Composed of substances of unequal strength, certain parts of the planet's crust yield more easily than others, and as the rocks readjust themselves, their pressure inevitably urges the earth's surface into a series of wrinkles like those on the skin of a dried fruit. In other words, the globe's internal energies have slowly fashioned those irregularities of its surface which appear to us as the giant mountain ranges of the world.

A Rich New World.

THE most striking characteristics of the world to-day are its poverty of thought, its shabby religion, and its lack of material enjoyment. Mankind is about as developed as a ten day old puppy. A puppy gets its eyes open in nine days, so that on the tenth day it must be just beginning to have a faint notion of the place in which it finds itself. Just in the same way, we now have a faint notion of what it means really to live. Until one hundred years ago men were practically asleep. Up to then no great progress had been made in labour-saving machinery, and telegraphy and aeronautics were absolutely undreamt of. The poets and prophets of the past had a dim notion of a glorious future, but it was very dim, because nothing was then known, or even suspected, of what could be done with machinery. How could they who lived under the tyranny of religious and economic superstition dream of the possibilities of the liberated mind, as we can who live in a land where thought and speech are beginning to be free? We are now slowly coming to understand that mankind is to be made happy by having things and not by doing without them; that righteousness is to come by general wealth and not by the superabundant wealth of a few idlers among millions of poverty-stricken workers condemned to hopeless drudgery.

That human desires are not only righteous, but almost endless, and that, through co-operation, human power to gratify those desires is almost boundless. It is, indeed, hard to conceive any limit to the production of wealth when we once grasp the idea that the right way to live is to spend and not to save. All the silly talk about thrift being the greatest of virtues is based on the fallacy that interest on money lent is the fair reward of the saver for his abstinence, whereas it is really due to the monopoly of banking, and the superstition that gold is the only reliable basis for a paper currency. Besides, it is impossible to save wealth, because the moment any form of wealth is produced it must be consumed. Man may consume it if he will, but if not Nature will do it for him—this economic law holds good from a loaf of bread to a Tower Bridge.

You can save money (claims to wealth), but you cannot save wealth, and any general attempt to do so would lead to general stagnation of trade and widespread misery.

Digitized by Google

There is practically no limit to our co-operative power to make the things we ought all to have, if we can get rid of the political and social bars which our ignorant ancestors set up, and we stupidly perpetuate, to prevent us from supplying our wants.

Just imagine how wealth would be increased if all the vacant land were thrown freely open for the workers to use. Cannot one see what a tremendous bar to general wealth is the unjust privilege now given to idle landlords to keep the workers in constant subjection, and take from them a large part of their just wages? The land must be nationalized, and all rents would then go into the public treasury, and be used for the benefit of the workers.

But this is by no means all that is necessary. The workers must also be relieved of all restrictions on the exchange of their wealth after they have produced it. And as money is the tool of exchange, and consists to-day of cheques and currency notes (silver and bronze coins are merely tokens used in trifling exchanges), the manufacture and sale of these tools must be taken out of the hands of the present ring of private banks which now control the currency and levy an enormous tribute from the workers in the form of interest.

The size of this tribute is well shown by the present War Loan now amounting to £4,000 millions, involving an annual payment by the workers of £200 millions, the great bulk of which goes in satisfaction of the preposterous claims of a few thousands of over-rich investors, who, as such, have done nothing and contributed nothing towards carrying on the War. And this fictitious War Debt is steadily increasing so that if the War lasts another two years, it will probably amount to £8,000 millions, bearing interest at the rate of £400 milliions annually, every penny of which must be produced by the workers before they can claim anything of their just wages. Now, the whole mechanism of exchange consists of nothing but bookkeeping, and the printing of the cheques and currency notes, by means of which credit is passed from hand to hand, so that the actual labour cost of thus financing the War should not have exceeded five million pounds annually, and ceased altogether when the War was over. Yet it has been made to swallow up the cost of all the battleships, and guns, and æroplanes, and munitions, and food, and clothing several times over, and will continue to hang like a millstone round the necks of the workers for many years to come!

Thus you see that nationalizing the land will be of little use unless we also have a State Bank, owned and controlled by the workers for the benefit of the workers, and supplying them with a cheap and abundant paper currency based on their own productive power, as all money, which is merely a claim to wealth, manifestly should be. No gold whatever has been used in making our home exchanges since the Currency Notes were forced into use by the failure of the gold-based banks at the first breath of war, and is, therefore, plainly unnecessary.

That all the poverty which disgraces us is due to our own artificial arrangements of society is manifest when we see that not a single wild animal, if left alone by man, cannot make a comfortable living and have plenty of time besides for play and love-making and rest. Yet we men have now learned to harness the forces of Nature—steam and electricity—and make them do our bidding, and should, therefore, be able to have more enjoyment and rest than any wild animal. There is really no reason why each worker in a co-operative commonwealth should not have an income of £1,000 a year at pre-war prices. Think of the power that is running to waste all the time in our rivers, tides, and waterfalls, all of which might, and should be, utilized for producing electricity to drive our trains, cook our food, and warm our houses. Think again of the great advance in aeronautics forced on by the War, so that we may soon expect to have a regular postal service carried on through the air at three times the speed of our present service. None of these great inventions have hitherto been of any benefit to the vast majority of the workers, simply because their low wages have not allowed them to derive any advantage from them, while the idle rich have so much unearned wealth that they are quite unable to spend it, and are driven into every kind of pernicious excitement to help them to get some spice into their useless lives.

Yes, the coming co-operative commonwealth will make us all truly rich beyond the dreams of the dreamers. And when we all have a feeling of perfect security about the future because we know that no man can shut off our plentiful livelihood, then there will be no intellectual cowards. Just think what a rich world of thought that will be in which the professors will say to their pupils: "Young men and women, it is your first duty to doubt everything that comes from someone else's authority. Your first duty is to examine everything for yourselves, and to use your own reason in coming to any conclusion. Your highest honour should be to have found a new line of thought, and worked it out for the benefit of both yourself and your co-workers, whose interests are interdependent. On the subject before us this is what I think, but I wish you to try to prove that I am mistaken, and shall be far more pleased if you can show that I am wrong than right." What a lovely world that would be! What a philosophy we should then get, and what a religion!

How can we in this poverty-stricken world, full of constant anxiety about the provision of a bare livelihood, find out anything worthy of reverence? Just think of the wretched stuff that is taught in our Churches to-day—where they have dolls and candles, and where the clergy dress themselves up in fancy costumes to make people believe that they are different from ordinary human beings—stuff that makes righteousness to consist in tamely submitting to any vile conditions of life as the will of God, and in believing a lot of impossible things in order to escape being eternally burned alive.

But when we are all rich we shall have time to think and explore, and thus gain an adequate conception of the great universe of which we are a part. Just as there is no limit to what we can produce in material things, so also, when our minds are liberated from the drudgery of to-day, shall we penetrate into regions of mentality of which our greatest thinkers now give us but dim and suggestive hints.

Now, this great War has broken down many old prejudices and false beliefs, among which none are more powerful for evil than the superstition that gold is a necessary factor in the mechanics of exchange. The workers, in striking against their organizers and superintendents, have been "barking up the wrong tree."

Let them now unite in demanding a State Bank, as described by Mr. Arthur Kitson in his books, Trade Fallacies and A Fraudulent Standard, just published by Messrs. King & Son, and the Nationalization of the Land, because these two things are the keys to economi freedom, finding its true expression in a voluntary Co-operative Commonwealth.

Ring out the false, ring in the true;
Ring out a slowly dying cause,
And ancient forms of party strife.
Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.

MEN, MONEY, AND THE WAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—It was only because Mr. Thorn did appear to deny the justice of the necessity of the State to receive financial support in the prosecution of a just War, that I pointed out the error of so doing. I rejoice to know that he did not mean any such thing, but cannot admit his words did not imply it. For the rest, of course, we are all with him to a man.

EDEN PHILLPOTTS.

III.

THE conception that the history of man is the record of a continuous Progress, and that each year added to the official almanac is a year's improvement upon the one that has passed, is a fallacy that continues to obsess the average brain.

But does not the realization that the trend of evolution is unmistakably upon a downward line prove the inability of the modern brain to perceive a reality as insistent as the fact of scientific war, or the increasing struggle for existence?

That the great majority of people should conceive this process of insidious corruption as "Progress" is sufficiently indicative of the real position. The People of Civilization are "progressing" downwards, believing it to be the opposite direction! Life is like the famous pyramid—inverted—and tottering upon its point! The brain of humanity has inverted itself without being conscious of what has happened!

At the present time it is almost impossible to print ordinary common sense. Vicious newspapers, whose sole object is to increase capital through the War, are praised to the utmost by every dissolute and degenerate mind, while those who attempt to disseminate sanity and idealism, are regarded as being guilty of the most intolerable kind of reactionary stupidity and maliciousness! Great ideals, however, are being expressed through the medium of obscure and neglected individuals, as, indeed, they have always been expressed. Great men and women are in this hour crying in the wilderness which adds acres to its boundaries as the centuries pass. They cry, it seems, in vain. We can offer humanity Ideals and Truth, but it seems that we are unable to bestow the requisite mental power of understanding these precious things.

Society News.

THE debate last Sunday on "The Transmission of Acquired Characteristics," as expected, proved extremely interesting. The subject, being one upon which Freethinkers differ, was keenly followed by those present, and many questions were asked of Mr. Wilde and Mr. Palmer, showing how stimulating the debate had been. It was gratifying to notice some new faces in the audience, and it is hoped that those who read this column will send a postcard, giving name and address, to the undersigned, or to the Head Office, for a syllabus of these debates, which we hope to continue to the end of March. Friends desiring to speak publicly on behalf of the Freethought cause, will find in these debates a good opportunity of trying their 'prentice hand before a sympathetic audience. No topical subject is barred. Next Sunday evening, Dr. Binnie Dunlop, the Secretary of the Malthusian League, will open on "Freethought and Neo-Malthusianism." This subject should be of special interest to our women friends, at the present time, and we hope Dr. Dunlop will find a large audience of women to greet him.—H. V. Lane, Hon. Sec., N. NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Views and Opinions.

Viscount Morley's Recollections.[1]

Viscount Morley's life covers one of the most interesting periods of English intellectual history. When he was born, 1838, the old order still presented an apparently unbroken front to the world. Not till nineteen years later did Darwin publish his Origin of Species, one of the most revolutionary books ever issued. Spencer had at the date of Lord Morley's birth written nothing, and Lyell's epoch-marking Principles of Geology had appeared five or six years earlier. In his own lifetime, therefore, Lord Morley saw the inception and witnessed the conquering career of a reasoned philosophy of evolution. He was a contemporary—in many cases an acquaintance—of Mill, George Eliot, Lewes, Swinburne, Meredith, Huxley, Hardy, and numerous others who made the latter half of the nineteenth century what it was. He saw the rise to popularity, if not to power, of the Socialist movement. He was a witness of the whole career of Charles Bradlaugh—a career which has left a larger impress on English history than is generally recognized. And in the latter part of his life his immersion in politics made him acquainted with all, or nearly all, of the leading figures in our political history. Added to this, he was himself a writer of eminence, and a thinker, even when through some constitutional flaw lacking the courage to carry his thinking into action. Consequently, the life of such a man is one that thousands will turn to as a work that cannot be missed without loss. And yet one lays down the work feeling not only that more might have been said, but that more ought to have been said. On the appearance of Mr. Holyoake's Sixty Years of an Agitator's Life, a Chronicle reviewer said that the author remembered everything that had occurred, and many things that hadn't. One might say of the present work that Viscount Morley recollects much, but, apparently forgets a great deal. And what is omitted would interest many of his readers more than much that is included.

The Test of the Future.

Three-fourths of Lord Morley's work is taken up with political reminiscences. The remainder is concerned with writers of various sorts, and one would have wished the proportions reversed. It is true the politician looms larger at the moment than the poet, the scientist, or the philosopher; but time, which, as Carlyle says, has "a strange contracting influence on many a wide-spread fame," often buries the politician with the circumstances that gave him reputation. Palmerstone, Chamberlain, Gladstone, and a score of others fill the stage for awhile, and then pass into a comparative oblivion. The writer lives on in virtue of the ideas of which he was the mouthpiece. Theirs is often the hardest lot, but they are destined to a more lasting fame. We may even be excused the regret that John Morley, the writer, the author of that fine series of works on the French Encyclopedists, ever allowed himself to become immersed in politics. For politicians are plenty, and thinkers are few; nor can one combine with equal benefit to both the functions of teacher and legislator. One is essentially a game of compromise, and in the realm of ideas compromise should have no place.

Some Striking Omissions.

We have mentioned some curious omissions in Lord Morley's Recollections. We are not the only ones that have drawn attention to this feature of the work, as we see the Rev. Alexander Whyte says, in the British Weekly, that he put down the volumes "with a great chill in my heart," because he had not found therein a single mention of Jesus Christ. To that the reply might be made that the work is called Recollections, and in not remembering Jesus, Lord Morley was repeating the omission of other writers who lived about the date of the alleged founder of Christianity. The omissions we wish to note are more curious. Viscount Morley gives us a noble gallery of brilliant Freethinkers. There is Arthur Morison, the author of The Service of Man (we fail to see what is meant by calling it a "miscarriage," both of thought and composition), and who, he says, exerted an influence at Oxford beyond that of "any tutor or professor." George Meredith, George Eliot, Matthew Arnold, Spencer, John Stuart Mill, Lewes, Carlyle, Ruskin, Swinburne, Bagehot, Leslie Stephen, and other well-known names; and full homage is paid to some—Mill, Meredith, and Spencer, for example. But their heresy is never thrust on the reader. Stranger still, the names of two such publicists as Holyoake and Bradlaugh are never once mentioned. This would not have been remarkable had he never have come into contact with either. But he knew both by correspondence, if not personally, and, we believe, attended Charles Bradlaugh's funeral. To Holyoake he once wrote how much he "valued his good opinion," and it was to Morley himself that Meredith wrote after hearing Bradlaugh :—

Did I tell you that Fred and I went to sit under

> Bradlaugh one evening? The man is neither to be laughed nor sneered down nor trampled. He will be a powerful speaker. I did my best to make Greenwood understand that. It was really pleasant to hear those things spoken which the parsonry provoke.

Meredith evidently knew a man when he saw one, and his admiration for the Freethinker and its late Editor is well known to all readers of this paper.

An Appreciation.

Now, we do not say that Viscount Morley was bound to mention either Bradlaugh or Holyoake, or even Bradlaugh's constitutional struggle, which must have appealed to a mind of his calibre. The former certainly played an important part in the life of the century, and Bradlaugh's fight for a free press and his constitutional struggle were of even greater importance. We note these omissions because they seem to have a bearing upon our impression of the writer's mental make-up. His is a good, clear, logical intellect; but some trick of temperament seems to keep him this side of great mental courage. He is no leader of forlorn hopes, and one can scarcely picture him going into a fight knowing and feeling that all one can count on is the pleasure of the contest, and enjoying the strength that comes from a knowledge of impregnable truth. And one has a suspicion that much of the strength he displayed was, so to speak, environmental. Association with men like Mill, of whom he speaks with a tone of genuine reverence; of Meredith, of whom he speaks with great affection; of Lewes, and of Spencer, must have had a fine tonic effect upon a character which we fancy was always healthily impressionable. But the mental chivalry which led Mill to pay a public compliment to Bradlaugh in his harassed days seems lacking. Otherwise, because Freethought is tabooed by the general run of writers, and great Freethinkers so systematically ignored, that their work is unknown to succeeding generations, there would have been adequate ground for even straining a point to see that full justice was done them. A marked feature of Mr. Edward Clodd's Memories—a feature which upset some of his reviewers—was that he made the freethinking of famous men and women very apparent. Viscount Morley's work will not incur the same blame.

Weighing the Past.

And having had our grumble—a well-merited one, we believe—let us say that Recollections is an intensely interesting work. It could hardly have been otherwise. It is not a life of the author, neither is it packed with "revelations" that will agitate the prurient nostrils of journalistic busybodies. It is, indeed, in its way, a veiled confession of faith. The man-of-letters, the philosophic thinker, cannot be suppressed even when dealing with politics. And in the midst of his political reminiscences there is inserted a chapter on Lucretius which comes like a breath of flower-laden evening after a sultry day. And to his credit, it should be said, that his only criticism of Mill, "My chief master," and whose appearance is drawn with a singularly loving touch, is in connection with an essay on Theism which he justifiably condemns as weak in logic and defective in its historical perspective. And, in another passage, replying to the charge that his criticism of Christianity was "sub-silently" sapping faith without reconstruction, he quotes from one of his own books in defence:—

> We will not attack you as Voltaire did; we shall not exterminate you; we shall explain you. History will place your dogmas in its class, above or below a hundred competing dogmas, exactly as the naturalist classifies his species. From being a guide to millions of lives, it will become a chapter in a book. The mental climate will gradually deprive your symbols of their nourishment, and men will turn away from your system, not because they have confuted it, but because like witchcraft or astrology it has ceased to affect or hold them.

That is finely said, and it depicts a true developmental process. One would have liked more of that sort of diet and less of politics. Not, as we have said, that the philosopher is buried, even there. Sixty years ago George Henry Lewes wrote a little book on physiology, which, although naturally now out of date, is, because of the philosophic quality which distinguished all Lewes wrote, better worth reading than many a work written by a mere cataloguer of scientific facts. And Morley the philosopher is always hard at the heels of Morley the politician. It is, indeed, upon the philosophic note that the work ends. At the end of the Recollections, and of a long and busy life, he says:—

> A painful interrogatory, I must confess, emerges Has not your school—the Darwins, Spencers, Renans, and the rest—held the civilized world, both old and new alike, European and transatlantic, in the hollow of their hands, for two long generations past? Is it quite clear that their influence has been so much more potent than the gospel of the various churches? Circumspice. Is not diplomacy, unkindly called by Voltaire the field of lies, as able as it ever was to dupe governments and governed by grand abstract catchwords veiling obscure and inexplicable purposes, and turning the whole world over with blood and tears to a strange Witches' Sabbath? These were queries of pith and moment indeed, but for something better weighed and more deliberative than an autumn reverie.

A natural query. And yet the Darwins, and Spencers, and others, have an apt reply. They might answer:—

> True, we have exerted a great influence over the world for two generations. But behind these two lies the thousands of generations, during which the world has been bound in ignorance, and held in subjection to tyranny and superstition. We have the whole weight of the past against us, and the marvel is not that we have done so little, but that we have done so much. Give us but a tithe of the time during which the world has been so ruled, and but a fraction of the power, and the result will be worth the having. We have already excited the desire for a better human society, we are building up the knowledge that will give that desire force and direction. And though the dawn breaks slowly, still the darkness is less dense than it was.

Recollections is a book to be read, and we have been able to do it but scant justice in the space at our disposal. But we hope to return to other aspects of the work on another occasion.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Palpable Fallacies.

THE well-known writer, Mr. Arthur Machen, has favoured the readers of the Evening News with a series of articles entitled "God and the War." On most subjects Mr. Machen writes exceedingly well; but it must be confessed that we have read the articles on "God and the War" with great disappointment. This is specially true of numbers iv. and v., in the issues for November 23 and 26. In the former he irrelevantly tells us that "the chief aim of prayer is to raise us to the condition and state of the beasts," his silly contention being "that it was we, not the beasts, who were driven out of paradise." This revelation came to him seven years ago, and he has been assiduously pondering it ever since, regarding it as the most profound and precious truth which man has had the good fortune to receive. As a matter of fact, neither we nor the beasts were driven out of paradise. If the beasts could but speak, they would inform us that they too have their sufferings and sorrows as well as we. When Mr. Machen proceeds to affirm that we are distracted and miserable "because we do not realize, because we cannot keep on realizing, that we have only one business: and that is God; God immanent and transcendent, in all and above all," he is guilty of darkening counsel by words without knowledge. Neither God nor his eternal will is a perceptible object, Nature alone being discernible by us. The saying that "our true order and true life is the Divine will" is a mere religious cant to which no intelligible meaning can be attached. Of course, Mr. Machen is fully aware that millions of people do not believe in an immanent and transcendent Deity whose will is the rule of life; but their inability to share his beliefs is put down to a constitutional defect for which they are not to blame. Allusion is made to people who are tone-deaf, colour-blind, unable to distinguish one flavour from another, and to people "who are born without the sense of literature, who are utterly incapable of relishing the exquisite savours of La Belle Dame Sans Merci, or of that great chapter which is intituled 'How they Chirruped over their Cups'"; and then comes the following caustic comment:—

> Very well; it is a great pity, and we are sorry for them. We know that they miss a great deal of the pleasures of life—which are none too many. We will not, perhaps, go all the way with Shakespeare and declare them fit for murders, treasons, stratagems, and spoils, though, by the way, Shakespeare usually knew what he was talking about. But we, not having the title to use the high wrath of Shakespeare, are sorry for those poor people who say they "see nothing" in this masterpiece, and can't understand "why people make such a fuss" over that, and are "bored to tears" by the other. We are sorry for them; but if they called their state of mind Freethought, I believe we should feel somewhat cross with them.

That is a hoary fallacy, and as obvious as it is ancient; and one is amazed to find a man of Mr. Machen's intelligence condescending to utilize it. He who so cleverly created and afterwards so completely annihilated the angels of Mons ought not to have allowed himself to be led astray by an argument so fundamentally false as the one just quoted. And yet, assuming an air of superiority, this is how he reasons:—

> The Freethought I have in view is the Freethought of the tone-deaf man who insists on becoming a musical critic, so that he may prove to the world that there is no such thing as music, and that the people who say they enjoy music are fools or knaves or both. We could pity him for his lack of one of the most exquisite—and irrational—of pleasures, if he would but hold his tongue. But the Freethinker will not hold his tongue. He is not content to keep silence and shrug his shoulders, wondering internally "what on earth these people see in it all." He is not even content to say out loud, "Well, I see nothing in it all, and that's an end of it." He will invent reasons, which are not real reasons, to justify his own incapacity. He is not able to relish a good dinner; so he finds out all kinds of "reasons" to prove that dinner is nonsense, and poisonous nonsense at that.

Such is Mr. Machen's argument against Freethought, and a more fallacious argument was never elaborated against any cause. The first thing to be borne in mind is that tone-deafness and colour-blindness are not acquired defects. A great musician never loses his faith in music as the result of a long and exhaustive examination of the subject, and then systematically attacks the art as a thoroughly unreal one. Tone-deafness is a fault of Nature, for which the victim is not in the least responsible But in the overwhelming majority of cases Freethought is the outcome of a critical investigation of the religious question in all its aspects. In many cases, an exceptionally ardent believer becomes a thoroughgoing unbeliever, and advocates Freethought from a deep sense of duty. By a severe process of reasoning, the capacity to believe in the supernatural is converted into a necessity to disbelieve in it. We know a man who, for upwards of twenty-five years, not only fervently cherished the belief in God, but enthusiastically preached him as the loving Father and Saviour of mankind. Twenty years ago, as a consequence of facing the facts of life, he lost his faith and became an Atheist. And the worst of it is, according to Mr. Machen, that he will not hold his tongue, but insists upon his right and duty to express and defend his present views. Simply because he has the courage of his convictions, Mr. Machen feels somewhat cross with him. But most assuredly his Freethought is by no means the Freethought of the tone-deaf man who condemns music merely because he lacks the faculty to appreciate music.

Mr. Machen deals in word-jugglery without a qualm. For example, he states that music is at once, "one of the most exquisite and irrational of pleasures," and then he adds:—

> If you come to think of it, you will find that all the exquisite things of life, even the exquisite things of material life, are irrational.

We have no hesitation whatever in giving that assertion an emphatic denial. Indeed, most of the truly exquisite things of life are in a high degree rational, though some of them may not be directly enjoined by the reason. There is absolutely nothing against reason in music, or even in dancing. Music means harmonic sounds, scientifically combined, which please and inspire the mind; and to dance is to trip or leap rhythmically, or to move with measured steps, or to a musical accompaniment, which is conducive at once to pleasure and health; but there is no irrational element in either music or dancing. Having thus trifled with the terms "rational" and "irrational," Mr. Machen says:—

> Very good; but the most frequent of the sham arguments of the Freethinker is that the Faith is irrational. Of course, it is irrational; like all the things of life which are worth anything or worth talking about.

By "irrational" we understand contrary to reason; does Mr. Machen intend to convey the impression that the Faith is irrational in that sense? When we declare that the belief in the Supernatural is irrational, all we mean is that it contradicts all the facts of life as we know them. It is quite true that our knowledge of Nature is, as yet, woefully inadequate; but we have not a single scrap of knowledge of the Supernatural, nor any means of acquiring it. Mr. Machen admits this, and seems to be proud of it. His idea is that if the Faith were either proved or provable it would no longer be faith. We are entirely ignorant of the distinguished journalist's religious associations, if he has any; but there is much in his language which reminds us of the teaching of the Catholic Church, according to which faith, to be meritorious, must be blind. Many of our readers remember the famous Papal Encyclical on "Modernism," which committed the Church definitely and explicitly to the absolute rejection of all modern modes of thought, and of the results of scientific and historical research, and in which belief on the sole authority of the Papacy was solemnly insisted upon. Mr. Machen asks: "Is it reasonable to spend time reading about Mr. Pickwick, who never existed?" and we answer in the affirmative, on the score that time so spent contributes to the enjoyments of life. The truth is that readers of the history of Mr. Pickwick are in no danger of falling into the habit of regarding him as a real person, whereas Christians who read about God and Christ in the Bible do regard and treat them as objective realities, to whom they pray, and have been praying for upwards of three years, for a speedy victory for their side in the War. Mr. Machen admits that their existence is unprovable; and, surely, he must also admit that the fact of their hearing and answering prayer is equally unprovable. What, then, can be the use of believing in and praying to them?

In attempting to discredit Freethought, Mr. Machen has only succeeded in making the Christian Faith look uncommonly ridiculous. He might have lived in the Dark Ages, in utter ignorance of modern science, for he entirely ignores natural knowledge in all its forms. The articles under consideration will not render the slightest service to religion, nor do the least injury to Freethought.

J. T. LLOYD.

A Pious Profiteer.

> What gasconading rascals those saints must have been, if they first boasted these exploits or invented these miracles! These legends, however, were no more than monkish extravagances, over which one laughed inwardly:
> —Charlotte Bronte.

PROTESTANTS are supposed to be averse to saints. But, like so many other things connected with Protestantism, this is far more accurate in theory than in fact. For there is one saint—Saint George—who is treated with great respect in this Protestant country. The saint's portrait is on the gold coinage and on some of the banknotes. Or, rather, there is a design of a man on horseback, apparently killing a militant cockroach with a carving-knife. This is meant to portray Saint George and the Dragon, and the man is supposed to be the patron saint of our "tight little island."

The inclusion, during recent years, of the harmless, necessary Union Jack among the symbols of the most holy religion of the Prince of Peace has led to a renewed interest in the personality of Saint George. It was, indeed, fondly hoped that, by the help of the Almighty and Lord Northcliffe, many otherwise decent citizens might be persuaded to observe Saint George's Day by wearing roses. The suggestion, unhappily, fell flat; but it may prove of interest to many to be informed who Saint George was, his connection with English history, and his association with the national flower.

It is with regret that we find the saint's biography is unpleasant reading, and quite unsuited for the perusal of young persons, and he still more youthful "buds" of the Primrose League. Historians agree in disclosing a pitiable story of a misspent life. From the highest to the lowest, from the great Edward Gibbon to the popular Professor William Smith, they describe the saint as an unadulterated scoundrel. Even Emerson can find no redeeming traits in the saintly sinner's character. Hear what the cultured American critic has to say:—

> George, of Cappodocia, born at Epephania, in Cilicia, was a low parasite, who got a lucrative contract to supply the army with bacon.

This is a bad start; but for the moment we refrain from levelling the guns of our criticism at the pious profiteer.

> A rogue and informer, he got rich, and was forced to run from justice.

This seems to suggest that Saint George sold pigs which had died natural deaths, was a swindler, and had learned to efface himself at the psychological moment.

> He saved his money, embraced Arianism, collected a library, and got promoted by a faction to the episcopal throne of Alexandria.

Like the Army contractors who did business in the South African and other wars, Saint George had his saintly head screwed on the right way. As for his collecting a library, his previous commercial reputation was sufficiently bad to prevent the booksellers allowing the saint credit. We may be equally certain that his ordination as a right reverend father-in-God was also against public interest.

> When Julian came, A.D. 361, George was dragged to prison. The prison was burst open by the mob, and George was lynched as he deserved.

There is something very distressing in the idea of a dear bishop being "jerked to Jesus." If the saint had died of delirium tremens we might still have remembered, prayerfully, that even ecclesiastics are but human beings. This lynching, however, is a dreadful business, and we read through a mist of tears Emerson's peroration:—

> And this precious knave became in good time Saint George, of England, patron of chivalry, emblem of victory and civility, and the pride of the best blood of the modern world.

A lemon-hearted cynic might liken the history of the patron saint of England to a purple page from the earlier books of the Bible, or the Newgate Calendar. Some modern historians, realizing the ethical drawbacks of the saint's career, have made desperate attempts to whitewash the life of the holy man. They have succeeded, after silent meditation among the tombs, in deceiving themselves that George was not George, but another man of the same name. Criticism, sharp as Shylock's knife, cuts their nonsense to pieces. The tutelary saint of England, like so many Biblical heroes, was a blackguard, and there is an end of it.

Saint George is not an English saint, and he never did anything for England. The chief exploit that we connect him with, the slaying of the dragon, is the one incident that is confessed, even by his warmest supporters, to be a mere solar myth—just another version of Apollo and the Python, Bellerophon and the Chimera, Perseus and the Sea-monster. Even the alternative and more respectable George, who is said to have suffered martyrdom under Diocetian, was a ludicrous personage. This Saint George was, we are told, killed three times, coming to life again on two of the occasions. Among the trifling things that happened to him were that he was roasted, beaten with iron rods, decapitated, and then exposed to wild animals. Coming to life again, he was set on a wooden horse, and a fire kindled under him. Sixty nails were driven into his head, and he was sawn in four pieces. These were thrown into boiling pitch. Again he came to life, and he was finally despatched on a wheel spiked with swords.

All this, of course, is very edifying, but of what value is this imaginative nonsense to-day? So far from recommending any citizen to honour such a saint, we suggest that it would be a kindness to strew the poppy of oblivion over the grave of such a saintly sinner. Saint George is a disappointment, and one of the most pathetic shams from which ever a great nation sought to extract exalting sentiment. So far as the saint is concerned, there is nothing to celebrate.

The Bible and Immortality.

NEW TESTAMENT TIMES.

WE come now to the period in the first century at which the Christian religion took its rise. This period is placed by the Gospels at A.D. 28-30; but there are good reasons for believing that it was several decades later. In any case there were no written Gospels until after the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70). Soon after the latter date we have the following statements by Josephus respecting the three sects among the Jews in his day—the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes:—

Digitized by Google

> Wars ii. viii. 14, 11, 13.—The Pharisees say that all souls are incorruptible; but that the souls of good men are only removed into other bodies, but that the souls of bad men are subject to eternal punishment.....The Sadducees do not believe in the immortal duration of the soul, and the punishments and rewards in Hades. .....The doctrine of the Essenes is this: that the souls are immortal, and continue for ever.....but that when they are set free from the bonds of the flesh, they then rejoice and mount upward.....that good souls have habitations beyond the ocean, in a region neither oppressive with severe cold nor intense heat; while they allot to bad souls a dark and tempestuous den full of never-ceasing punishments. And indeed the Greeks seem to have followed the same notion, when they allot the islands of the blessed to their brave men whom they call heroes and demigods.....and to the souls of the wicked, the region of the ungodly in Hades, where certain wicked persons are punished.....There is another order of Essenes, who agree with the rest.....but differ from them in the point of marriage.

Some years later Josephus wrote his Antiquities, in which he says of the Pharisees and Sadducees:—

> Antiq. xviii. i. 3, 4.—The Pharisees believe that souls have an immortal vigour in them, and that under the earth there will be rewards or punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; and that the latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again. But the doctrine of the Sadducees is this: that souls die with the bodies.

In the latter paragraph, it should be noticed, there is no torment for the wicked in Hades, only eternal imprisonment, as in the Old Testament Sheol. The Greeks, however, imagined a place of punishment in a part of Hades which they called Tartaros: the latter place is named in 2 Peter ii. 4, where it is translated "hell."

The first Christians were Jews who belonged to the second order of Essenes mentioned by Josephus. These called themselves Nazarenes, a name mentioned as a sect only once in the New Testament (Acts xxiv. 5); but we find it again in the title given to Jesus in the Gospels and the Acts—"Jesus the Nazarene"—which is everywhere mistranslated "Jesus of Nazareth." This Jesus was not the founder of the sect, but merely a prominent member belonging to it, who was regarded by the other members as a prophet: it was Paul and his Gentile converts who exalted him to the position of a god and worshipped him. In the second century the Nazarenes were ranked as heretics because they still maintained that Jesus was only a man. The Nazarenes existed as a Christian sect until the fourth century, and then we hear of them no more. We will now look at some passages in the New Testament in which Hades is mentioned.

> Matt. xi. 23.—And thou, Capernaum, shalt thou be exalted unto Heaven? thou shalt go down into Hades.
> Matt. xvi. 18.—Thou art Peter (Petros), and upon this rock (petra) I will build my church; and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it.
>
> Luke xvi. 23.—And in Hades he lifted up his eyes, being in torment.
> Acts ii., 27, 31.—Because thou wilt not leave my soul in Hades, neither wilt thou give thy holy one to see corruption.....He foreseeing this spake of the resurrection of the Christ, that neither was he left in Hades, nor did his flesh see corruption.
> Rev. i. 18.—Christ says: I was dead, and behold, I am alive for evermore, and I have the keys of death and of Hades.

In the second passage there is a play upon the name Petros, which means a stone or rock. In the quotation from Luke, the rich man in Hades was "in torments," and "in anguish in this flame." This appears to have been a mistake on the part of the writer, unless he meant Tartaros; for Hades was not the Christian place of punishment. In the passage in the Acts, verse 27 is a quotation from Psalm xvi. 10, which the writer represents as a prediction referring to Jesus Christ—which, of course, it is not.

In the following passages Hades or Sheol is plainly referred to, though not expressly named:—

> 1 Peter iii. 18-20.—Because Christ also suffered for sins .....being put to death in the flesh, but quickened in the spirit; in which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison, which aforetime were disobedient, when the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah.
> 1 Peter iv. 6.—For unto this end was the gospel preached even to the dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.

The two foregoing passages are the only Scripture foundation for the following italicized words in the Apostle's Creed—"He descended into hell, the third day he rose again from the dead." The word "hell" here refers to Sheol or Hades, "the abode of the spirits of the dead"—not to a place of punishment. We are to understand that during the time the body of Christ lay in the tomb, his spirit left the body and descended to the underworld to preach the gospel to the spirits there imprisoned. Amongst the New Testament apocryphal writings, now extant, is one entitled the "Gospel of Nicodemus" or the "Acts of Pilate." This work, as it has come down to us, is in two parts—the Acts of Pilate, properly so called, and the Descent of Christ into Hades. The first part narrates the trial, condemnation, and crucifixion of Christ in a different manner to that of the Four Gospels. The second part gives a somewhat confused account of Jesus going down into Hades, where he finds Adam, David, Jeremiah, and a host of other Bible characters. His first act is to bind Satan and plunge him into an abyss, there to await his second coming. This done, he preaches to the spirits assembled there, and invites them to believe his gospel and gain admission into heaven. "For behold," he says, "I again raise you up through the power of the cross." It was from this fraudulent Gospel that the author of the "First Epistle of Peter" drew his information respecting the visit of Jesus to Hades—a fact which proves the great credulity of the early Christians, and the pious frauds perpetrated by some of the most zealous among them.

We come next to the place of eternal punishment—the so-called "Gehenna of fire." The name "Gehenna" is derived from the "Valley of Hinnom" (Ge-hinnom), a vale south of Jerusalem, where, in the later Old Testament times, sacrifices were offered to the local gods of Canaan, and where also young children were burnt alive; or, as it was styled, were made "to pass through the fire" to Molech, or some other local deity. Speaking in the name of the Lord God, Jeremiah says:—

> Jer. xxxii. 35.—They built the high places of Baal, which are in the valley of Hinnom, to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; which I commanded them not, neither came it into my mind that they should do this abomination (also Jer. vii. 31).

In this valley Ahaz, king of Judah, "burnt his children in the fire," as did also Manasseh king of Judah (2 Chron. xxviii. 3; xxxiii. 6). At a subsequent period, when only the god Yahweh was worshipped, all kinds of insanitary matter and refuse were carried from Jerusalem into this vale to be burnt, and there fires were kept constantly burning. These never-dying fires suggested to Esdras and others a name for the place of torment—which name was borrowed by the early Christians from 2 Esdras. We will now see what the Gospels have to say on this subject:—

> Matt. v. 22.—And whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of the Gehenna of fire.
> Matt. xviii. 9.—It is good for thee to enter into [eternal] life with one eye, rather than having two eyes to be cast into the Gehenna of fire (also Matt. v. 29).
> Matt. x. 28.—And be not afraid of them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna.
> Matt. xxiii. 33.—Ye serpents, ye off-spring of vipers, how shall ye escape the judgment of Gehenna?
> Matt. xxv. 41.—Depart from me, ye cursed, into the eternal fire which is prepared for the devil and his angels.
> Matt. xiii. 41, 42.—The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all them that do iniquity, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.—(See also Matt. xiii. 49, 50).

In the foregoing passages we find "the Gehenna of fire" and "the furnace of fire." Both were taken from 2 Esdras, whose writer says: "And the pit of torment shall appear, and over against it shall be the place of rest: and the furnace of Gehenna shall be shewed, and over against it the paradise of delight." In the parable of the "Rich man and Lazarus" (Luke xvi. 19-31) the furnace of Gehenna and the paradise of delight are described as "over against" each other, so that the rich man in one place could see Lazarus in the other. In "Enoch" (chap. xxii.) it is stated that the two places are separated "by a chasm, by water, and by light above it." In the parable in Luke (xvi. 26) it is said that between the two places "there is a great gulf fixed.....that none may cross over." This is how the writer of the parable understood "Enoch."

ABRACADABRA.

In the Shades.

IT was night in Hell, or Hades, or the Shades—the temperature, etc., of the place not being a mathematical conception; but it is, nevertheless, an august region, and a delectable one, for no one who goes there is ever troubled with a wish to return. Some say it is always night in Hell; but no, it has its sun-kissed Olympian heights, and its valleys flooded with the strange, still, wistful moonlight of memory. Far and near have no meaning, here or there. What is now the one is now the other. There the long perspective lies in the shadow of the hills. The middle distance is often dim and obscure, with only mellow-radiant patches here and there. Now the apex is the base, the past the present; the ancient mingles with the modern. As on our mundane and mathematical sphere objects on the terrestrial horizon fade and disappear, but the sun and moon keep pace with us, and all the starry host, and are there before us—and after us. It was night in Hell—beautiful, blissful, brooding, meditative night.

Socrates was sitting by a rude bench, but one shaped to artistry by the touch of time and the atmosphere of antique association. He was scantily but picturesquely clad, and rubbed his bare shins as though the irons had just been removed from them, and kept sipping happily and harmlessly from certain urn-like cups with the word hemlock curiously scrawled upon them. He was also talking to his disciples in that strain of very human, imperturbable, and absolute philosophy.

Shakespeare was playing with Ariel—the spirit and the poet now twin spirits. Sing, sir, sing! commanded the Master, and all Hell smiled to hear:—

> Full fathom five thy father lies,
> Of his bones are coral made,
> Nothing of him that doth fade,
> But doth suffer a sea change
> Into something rich and strange;
> Sea-nymphs hourly ring his knell;
> Hark! now I hear them,
> Ding, dong, bell.

The voice died away, and innumerable melodious liquid bells took up the strain, clamouring from roof to floor, near and clear, and faint and far, and gradually dropping to slow and solemn single beats, with now and then a quick reviving cadence clang of solitary startling and intense but exquisite sound, passing at length in a dying fall, when all was still again.

A deaf, disappointed-looking man in black, named Charles Haddon Spurgeon, was preoccupied with the bellows of an extinct hearth, poking the dead ashes and stoking it with the faggots of fanaticism that would no longer burn. If the fire was quenched, the fireman's faith in it was unquenchable, and so he was happy and hopeful in a way, and the great spirits about him were fain to tolerate his now harmless hobby.

Burns and Milton—the two poets who had done so much on earth to rehabilitate the Devil—were holding converse with that once potent Personage. Milton still addressed him royally and respectfully, as thus: Oh, Prince, oh, Chief, of many throned powers! Burns was still sceptical and satirical, reminding him—in the past tense,—

> Ah, Nick, ah, Nick, it wasna fair
> To show us first the temptin' ware,
> Bright wines and bonnie lassies rare,
> To put us daft,
> Syne weave unseen your spider's snare,
> O' Hell's damned waft.

The Devil, in Doric, answered and said: Man, Burns, ye havna fared sae ill after a'; and, lo, as he spoke, Tam o' Shanter came galloping through Hell with a troup of hizzies after him in scantiest attire, some leaping, some running, some flying, one perched acroup behind him clasping his waist, scattering the embers and raising the stoure of Spurgeon's smithy fire, and disappearing all in one whisk of the grey mare's tail. Upon my soul, said Rabbie, a heavenly sight to be seen in Hell, whereat he roared in contagious explosions of laughter.

The grotesque had passed as a cloud obscures the moon, and the Shades were classic again. Voltaire and Paine were seated on a bank in silent telepathic communion. Ingersoll and Henry Ward Beecher were walking together. Byron and Shelley were boating in a mountain lake, and the moonbeams steeped the oars in liquid gold. Keats, "that Greek who knew no Greek," was sitting astern with a book. All these, with their peers, an innumerable company, appear in those Shades again, in their habit as they lived.

The figure of a Freethinker, familiar to latter day "Saints," was seen half-sitting, half-reclining, on a grassy bank, by a grey wall, reflected in an amber stream. His index-finger was inserted between the leaves of an otherwise closed book. He looked beyond it into the bosom of the stream, and into the clear deeps of his inner thought. The marble Wilberforce in Westminster Abbey, but living, breathing force and feeling, reason, justice, humanity, with flitting gleams of scorn, amusement, satire, and contempt, and intervals of deep recreative repose; and resting on the sward beside him, Joseph Mazzini Wheeler, closely regarding his friend and chief, G. W. Foote, and reading his thoughts. The latter lays down his book, and leans upon the old, grey wall, and over his profile, in this relief, steals a seeming deeper, more indifferent, monchalant abstraction, but the permanent lines of mutable expression remain, the "channels," as it were, of emotion, character, and resolution; the firm set mouth in particular conveying and preserving the record of many a battle fought and won, betraying always rather than disguising the ever alert and active mind; grim a little, wistful and trustful, but always strong; the flags of battle furled; the lines of care erased; a benevolent, genial, incipient smile, like sunshine in the cloud.

Walt Whitman was disporting in the stream, waving his hand to the Pioneers of all time and eternity; anon wading ashore, dripping diamond drops, to climb a tree, and rock himself in the azure, as the touch of Mother Nature thrilled his every fibre. It was night, but it was also noon.

Two Titans had met in the grove, and the forms of Bradlaugh and James Thomson, B.V., were seen amongst the trees.

It was dawn in Hell, a silvery, golden glow was illumining the crests of the sun-smitten mountains of memory. Francisco Ferrer was seen wending his way in the morning dews from his prison, now his castle, of Montjuich. A breeze stirred the Shades. A terrestrial wind. A door had opened. Someone had been admitted. Thousands came every day, but mostly in at the more popular gate. A blood-stained, khaki-clad figure approached. G. W. Foote saluted. The soldier spirit had just come from the hell of the battlefield to this Eden of rest, so long misnamed and misunderstood. The soldier stood at attention, and said:

"I have a message for you, Mr. Foote."

"Ah! From the battlefield?"

"No. From London, from the Law Courts, from the House of Lords."

"Ah!"

"The Bowman Bequest Case....."

"What of it?"

"Is settled in our (your) favour."

"Then indeed is my life's work complete; and these valleys of eternal rest will be more restful still. We have both been soldiers; you a soldier of the King, I a soldier of progress. Come with me!" The sages were gathering round. There was great rejoicing in the quiet Shades. But at this moment the sun in splendour appeared above the hills, the valleys were flooded with light, the vision faded, to reappear again and again in the moonlight of memory.

A. MILLAR.

Acid Drops.

The latest Christian apologist is the well-known writer, Mr. Arthur Machen, and he is also the most unique. In Article VI. on "God and the War," which appeared in the Evening News for November 30, he informs us that "The plain man in the street, the Sir Arthur Conan Doyle type of man, demands of religion, in the first place, that it shall be entirely incredible." Will Christianity successfully and completely supply that demand? This has always been the contention of Freethinkers, to which believers, generally, vigorously give the lie direct. Indeed, the divines boldly assert that Christianity is entirely credible.

Curiously enough, Mr. Machen declares that the office of religion is to "remove the veils of enigmas which are about these Holy Mysteries that they may become gloriously manifest"; but how on earth can a religion which is "utterly irrational" and "entirely incredible" unravel any mystery whatsoever? Surely the distinguished literatus cannot be in earnest, but is skilfully pulling the legs of the pious readers of the Evening News.

Once upon a time Mr. Machen used to try to argue with bishops, endeavouring to convince them that "religion was not primarily concerned with attendance at four-ale bars, or with the state of Piccadilly Circus between eleven and twelve-thirty p.m."; but he has discontinued that task as wholly hopeless, and now devotes himself to the pleasanter and easier labour of showing that religion is "entirely incredibe."

The Archbishop of York has reminded Convocation that the only source of supply for future candidates for the ministry is the Army. He says a "considerable number" of Nonconformist ministers have applied for ordination, but the colleges are empty. We do not say that many young men coming from the Army will not enter the Church, but we are quite sure—knowing what we do of the feeling in the Army, and the shock the War has given to religious beliefs—that the mental calibre of those who take "Holy Orders" will be lower than ever. After the War, "the fool of the family for the pulpit" will be truer than ever.

Billy Sunday says: "If I were God, I would keep the gravediggers busy for a month." Don't be in a hurry, Sunday; God is doing his best in that direction.

The Yellow Press is advocating no votes for the Conscientious Objector. One journal declares: "All he wants to do is to go on living in comparative comfort, thanks to the fact that other men are fighting and toiling and dying for him. He also demands a voice in the affairs of the country. This is too much for most of us." This description applies equally well to the 50,000 parsons who are exempted from military service.

The following delightful paragraph appeared recently in the newspapers: "In Jaffa the Church Army is hoping to establish a centre in the house supposed to be that of Simon the Tanner." It looks like an attempt to find "tanners" in England.

The Rev. Thomas Phillips, of Bloomsbury, declares that "the Bible is being displaced by the Yellow Press." It is not surprising to find that readers of the Bible are supporters of the sensational papers.

Our readers will remember that some months ago the Rev. F. E. Powell, then Vicar of Bromyard, but now of Ladbrooke, contributed to this journal several exceedingly able articles, in which he evinced a progressiveness of thought not usually displayed by a clergyman. Preaching recently at the Priory Church, Leominster, he is reported, in the Leominster News for November 16, to have given expression to eminently broad views, which are too seldom heard from the pulpit. He enlarged upon the methods of Nature and the necessity of paying even greater heed to science in all departments of life, especially in education. Towards the end of the discourse he boldly said:—

> After the War there would be insistence upon intellectual sincerity. They would not be afraid of the truth. They would no longer bolster up things that were obsolete. The dead past must bury its dead. He asked them to beware of leaving that reconstruction and reformation to ecclesiastical bodies.

On the evening of the same day there was a Patriotic Demonstration in the Corn Exchange Hall, at which several addresses were delivered, one of which was by Mr. Powell. The reverend gentleman's speech was exceptionally courageous, hitting the nail on the head each time. One of the points was that, while he was a patriot, "he was a humanitarian first." He condemned, in scathing terms, the spirit of hatred and revenge so common in this country at the present time, and eloquently advocated the fostering of the forgiving, brotherly disposition. He was cheered to the echo when he declared that "for the life of him he could not understand why there should not be, while the fighting was going on, a meeting of the representatives of the belligerents in order to see what terms of peace might be arrived at." We heartily congratulate the reverend gentleman upon his wise, timely, and heroic utterances.

A "Food Economy" service was held at St. Paul's, the Bishop of London preaching the sermon. Of course, economy is necessary and advisable. But we recall an incident when thousands of people were fed on a handful of fishes and a few loaves. Why cannot a similar miracle be worked nowadays? Why can't God do something in the War? We wonder whether it would be considered "blasphemy" if a poster were exhibited depicting a crowd of starved and murdered men, women, and children standing before God Almighty, and asking him, "What did you do in the great War?" We are quite sure many are thinking that question now.

Says the Bishop of Oxford:—

> The Christian religion is totally without obscurantism, and loves light for its own sake, coming from whatsoever quarter. You can hardly exaggerate the disaster it has been to the education of children that they have been taught to associate with religion things about the Creation, the Flood, and the beginnings of our race which it was infallibly certain when they grew up to read the literature of their time, they would find false and would reject as alien to the whole trend of the philosophy, science, and history of their time. If we are to maintain the great tradition of the Word of God, we must purge it from everything that gives the germinating intellect of man the excuse for saying, "This is a ridiculous and old wives' fable."

But the Bishop knows as well as we do that all the things he denounces as "old wives' fables" are really part of the Christian religion. The story of Jesus Christ is based on the garden of Eden, and there is no reason whatever in rejecting the former and accepting the latter. Besides, is the story of the resurrection less ridiculous than that of the creation of man? Or the belief in heaven and hell less absurd than that of the garden of Eden? All it comes to is this. The Bishop will reject all generally admitted falsities and absurdities as not part of Christianity, and will keep all those not generally rejected. And to that sensible people reply: "Thank you, for nothing."

We note that among the sums disbursed for advertising "National Service" the Times received £1,050, Daily Mail, £2,680, Daily News, £1,434, Daily Chronicle, £1,082, Daily Telegraph, £1,007, Morning Post, £737, Yorkshire Post, £655, etc. The Freethinker is in the habit of giving its advertising space to a movement with which it sympathizes. But, then, we are only poor benighted Freethinkers, and cannot pretend to exhibit the lofty unselfishness possessed by these Christian-owned journals.

Referring to the living of St. James's, Piccadilly, London, the Daily Sketch says: "the most attractive part of the job of rectoring at St. James's is the rectory. I have often cast covetous eyes at this large, square, comfortable-looking house in the very heart of fashionable London. What the site must be worth, and the rent it could command, the imagination boggles at."

The suggestion that no one may write a leaflet on war or peace without leave of the Press Bureau has aroused the ire of the Daily News, which remarks tartly: "The next step will be to submit the Bible and the Book of Common Prayer to the censorship." There is something in the objection, for the Bible contains the passage, "Blessed are the peacemakers," and the Prayer Book has the aspiration, "Give peace in our time, O Lord."

Mr. Bottomley returns to the question of his miracle of the leaning Virgin, and says:—

> The Freethinker still protests that we have not told the truth about that figure of the Madonna and Child hanging from the tower of Albert Cathedral, and gives us "an opportunity of stating the facts." That is just what we have done. We are not easily fooled in such matters.

We protest once more. We did not say that Mr. Bottomley was fooled in this matter. Quite the contrary. We protested against Mr. Bottomley presenting the position of the statue as being due to an interposition of Providence. And we suggested that if Mr. Bottomley had been to Albert, he must know the facts, and must know that the explanation of the position of the statue is a simple and a prosaic one. It was these facts on which we invited the truth. And if, by some strange chance, Mr. Bottomley does not know the facts, we suggest that he inquires of the Royal Engineers. They might cast light on the matter.

God having failed to bring peace back to the world in response to one section of his followers, Cardinal Logue advises prayers to Mary, so as to "enlist the powerful aid of this Queen of Peace in moving Almighty God to mercifully grant our petition." Well, it wouldn't be the first time affairs of State have been brought to a head through feminine influence.

A daily paper objects to Grimm, the German writer, as an author of "sanguinary fairy tales." The Bible also contains "sanguinary fairy tales."

How these Christians love one another! A Catholic War-shrine erected at Ramsgate has been wrecked by rival religionists.

A case was before the Probate Court the other day in which a son asked that his father's will should be set aside on the ground of religious insanity. The deceased had left his son £20, and to the Hull City Mission £700 a year. Many people will agree that the son made out a strong prima facie case.

The East Anglian Daily Times reports the case of a young woman charged with stealing jewellery from a visitor staying at Frinton-on-Sea. The defendant said she had been tempted by the "evil one," and a police sergeant told the magistrate that the girl had hitherto borne a good character, but she had "met some bad companions at the Young Women's Christian Association." Now, if she had met them at a Secularist meeting-place, no one would have been surprised —at least, no Christian would.

Rev. Dr. R. J. Fletcher asks in the Church Family Newspaper "Is Prayer of Use?" To that we reply, certainly. It is of considerable use to every parson in existence. The question is like asking "Is an unfastened window of use to a burglar?" Mr. Fletcher thinks he can prove prayer is useful to anyone but the "dogmatic Agnostic." But these are the very people who need the proof most. All that Mr. Fletcher means, apparently, is that he can prove prayer is useful to anyone who already believes in it. In that case proof is unnecessary. Those who want proof can't get it, and those who don't need it can have it in bushels. And yet man is called a rational being!

"Spook Shows Pay" was a headline in a Sunday paper. Don't the Spiritualists know that?

Nonconformists are very stolid and serious people. A writer in the Daily News recently quoted Voltaire's famous jest that the prophet Habakkuk was "capable of anything." A number of readers immediately reproached the writer for defaming the prophet.

One of the activities of the late Mr. Jesse Collins, M.P., was in connection with the Sunday opening of museums and art galleries. Indeed, in this matter, Birmingham was one of the pioneer towns.

At a meeting of the United Free Church Presbytery it was proposed to mark the Luther Centenary, but the Presbytery decided not to celebrate the occasion. Poor old Martin Luther! It was his misfortune not to have been born a Scotsman.

Lord Sydenham has upset the clergy over his marriage law reforms, and the two archbishops and many of the bishops are up in arms. Sir William Robertson is one of the clerical supporters, but it is an old story that generals are very orthodox.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

December 9, Glasgow.

To Correspondents.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—Colonel Stuart Graham, £1 1s.; Miss M. Rogerson, 10s.; W. Hopper, £1 1s.

H. J. BAYLE.—Thanks for cutting. Sorry we cannot find space at present.

R. PECKOVER.—We note you write from hospital, and hope your wound is not serious. Pleased you found your Freethinker so acceptable on your return. We are not surprised your fellow-patients—who had been in the Arras district—were amused at Mr. Bottomley's "miracle." Naturally your friends were able to tell you how the statue is retained in its present position.

J. O. HARDING.—Pleased to have your appreciation of "Abracadabra's" articles. We note your observation of A. G. G., in the Daily News, having referred to Paine as one of the great men America produced. It is good to see Paine getting the recognition he richly deserved; but it is hardly correct to put it in that way. Paine was an Englishman—much as the official and "respectable" England of the day showed itself unworthy of such a man.

V. H. SMITH.—Obliged for reference. May be useful.

F. C. HOLDEN forwards us some specimens of clerical wisdom from the United States, and claims that the American clergy can compete with the Bishop of London and other English divines in imbecility. We admit, on the evidence produced, that a good case is made out.

J. E. C.—The copyright edition of Fitzgerald's Omar Khayyam is published by Macmillans in a number of forms. Perhaps the handiest is the "Golden Treasury" edition, which is cheap, and handy in size

G. I. writes: "With reference to 'Abracadabra's' article on the Book of Enoch, some of your readers might care to consult the work of G. Schiaparelli, Astronomy in the Old Testament (Oxford; 1905). On page 38, this author shows a most interesting diagram of the world as it was conceived, including the solid arch of the firmament, the roof, which we call the sky, that was supported at the horizon, and which contained the stores of water and hail and snow, as well as the caves where the winds were kept."

J. B. MIDDLETON.—Very gratifying indeed, as we said. All our contributors will rejoice in the many warm friends they make through their writings. That is one of the compensations given to fighters in a good cause.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen pays a visit to-day to Glasgow, and will ecture twice in the City Hall (Saloon) at 12 noon on "Do the Dead Live"; 6.30, "Why Men Believe in God." We have no doubt there will be good attendances, and he will be pleased to once more face a keen and critical Scotch audience. He will then cease lecturing until January 6, and with so much travelling, and so many other things demanding attention, he will be heartily glad for a couple of Sundays in his own home.

We publish this week a new pamphlet by our late leader, G. W. Foote. It was left all but finished, and is now issued for the first time, with a preface by Mr. Cohen. We feel sure that every Freethinker reader will wish to have a copy, and we have printed a large edition, bearing this in mind. There is no need to say anything about the quality of the pamphlet; to say it is by G. W. Foote is enough. The title of the pamphlet is The Mother of God, and it deals with one of the most fundamental of Christian superstitions. The pamphlet is in a neat cover, and published at the low price of twopence. Postage one halfpenny.

Early in the new year we intend—if our paper supply doesn't break down—publishing a number of pamphlets, some of which, we feel sure, will arouse considerable attention among all sections of Freethinkers. Reprints of pamphlets that have long been out of print will also follow. The present is, in our opinion, a good time for pushing home the Freethought attack, and we intend to either break a big hole in the Christian defences or to break ourselves in the attempt.

Mr. Cohen had two very successful meetings in the Victoria Hall, South Shields, on Sunday last. Many of the old and familiar faces were absent, death having been only too busy in their ranks during the past few years, and one missed the presence of Mr. S. M. Peacock, without whom no meeting seemed complete. But the pain of separation is the price one has to pay for friendship, and one must be always prepared to settle the reckoning. Mr. Chapman, the local N. S. S. Secretary, was as active and as enthusiastic as ever, and the success of the day has encouraged the Branch to invite a visit from Mr. Lloyd early in the new year.

Visitors were present from, among other places, Newcastle; and as there seems some probability of overcoming the difficulty about a hall, Mr. Cohen hopes to pay that city a visit early in February. This should mean the recommencement of active work there once more.

The Christian World, in a notice of the Secular Education League's pamphlet German Crime and Secular Education, says:—

> Propagandists of denominational education, far too eager to seize any argument to support their cause, have been loudly—but very rashly—pointing to German character and conduct as exemplified in the war as an awful instance of the results of educating children without giving a "definite" religious teaching a prominent place. Leading Anglicans, clerical and lay, have loudly and publicly enunciated this view Unfortunately most people have not the knowledge to correct their errors, and the Secular Education League has done really good service in publishing a leaflet to show how absolutely false these statements are. Anglican publications—even a "Catholic" Mirfield handbook; Professor Sadler and prominent educationists and educational journals; the Encyclopædia Britannica and other unimpeachable authorities, are all quoted, chapter and verse, to show that not only has religious teaching a deliberately prominent place in the German scheme of education and in the training of teachers, but that also this teaching is always and everywhere denominational. Therefore if any party in the religious education controversy is entitled to draw a moral from the facts, it is those who are opposed to denominational and dogmatic teaching. All Germans, high and low, have passed through a rigorous course of such teaching"

We welcome praise of the pamphlet from this quarter, and hope that our readers will act on the advice we gave last week. We are sure they will be doing a useful piece of work by giving this tract a wide circulation.

It should be said that the pamphlet is being sold at cost price. No one was paid anything for writing it, and no one is getting any profit by selling it. The Freethinker is giving its advertising space free, and is selling it without any profit on the sale, or any charge for labour, etc, in sending out the pamphlet. Not being a wealthy concern, we can afford—and are even pleased—to give all we can to such a cause as that of Secular Education.

The difficulty of obtaining halls—so many are being used by the military—is the chief obstacle at present to increased propaganda. Wherever they can be obtained, the work goes on. We take this opportunity of inviting the co-operation in this matter of groups of Freethinkers all over the country—whether there is a Branch of the N. S. S. in their locality or not. If a hall is obtainable, and they are willing to look after local arrangements, let them write to the General Secretary at once, and the work will be proceeded with.

Another Victory:

With a Special Appeal to Londoners.

A FEW months ago I was able to record a great Freethought victory with the House of Lords' decision in the Bowman Case. It is now possible to announce another striking triumph in connection with the attempt of the London County Council to suppress the sale of literature in the public parks. This does not, of course, rank in importance with the decision in the Bowman litigation, but it is important to all who value freedom of thought, speech, and propaganda.

The battle opened with my article in the Freethinker for June 11, 1916. It was there made public that the L.C.C. intended suppressing altogether the sale of literature at public meetings. And it was quite plain that this was only the first step towards a suppression of the meetings themselves. The sale of literature is as much a part of these meetings as the delivery of lectures, and there is no reason why if the one be prohibited the other should be allowed. Sooner or later we should have to fight, and it is always best to resist first encroachments.

The next step was the formation of a committee of London organizations. This was done with great success, and about forty organizations were banded together to resist a quite unwarranted attack on one of the oldest and most valuable privileges in connection with public propaganda.

A deliberate campaign was at once organized. Literature was sold, in defiance of the Council's regulation.

The Council, after some delay, issued a number of summonses. The Committee replied by taking the matter into the High Court, with the result that the regulation prohibiting the sale of literature was set aside. After some delay the Council, on November 27, surrendered by formally rescinding the resolution it ought never to have passed.

The work of the Protest Committee has thus ended in a victory, and, but for one circumstance, it might now meet and formerly declare itself at an end. But the fight, although carried on without a continuous flourish of trumpets, has involved constant watchfulness and considerable expense. All the Police Court cases had to be defended, and when it is said that counsel and solicitor made two appearances before the High Court, and that there were numerous consultations besides, no one will be surprised to learn that the cost of the fight has been over £200. But for the extreme moderation of the Committee's legal representatives the sum would have been larger. Over half the expense has been already met. There remains nearly £100 to be raised. And, at the request of the Committee, I am inviting subscriptions from Freethinker readers to wipe off this liability.

I am making this appeal primarily to Londoners, because the issue is one which concerns Londoners first of all. Of course sympathetic contributions from the Provinces are not barred, but I feel there should be enough people in London itself interested to provide the sum needed. A hundred might easily do it between them. It has been a great fight, and it has ended in a complete win so far.

On p. 781 of this issue will be found a full statement of the case in an appeal issued by the Committee. I have written the above merely to enforce that appeal—which was written, it should be said, before the last meeting of the L.C.C.

I am loth to close this appeal without saying how much the Committee is indebted to the Rev. Stewart Headlam, who so manfully and so ably upheld our cause on the Council itself. And also to Mr. F. Verinder, who has acted as Chairman and Treasurer to the Committee. He has spared neither time nor energy in the matter, and more is owing to him than I can now say. As a Freethinker I feel bound and pleased to place on record my personal appreciation of the work of these two Churchmen, in which their sole motive was their devotion to principle.

At its last meeting the Executive of the N.S.S., which had already voted £5 to the Committee, voted a second and similar amount. I am adding my own mite in order to be "in it."

I feel apologetic having to again ask readers of this paper to contribute, but it is unavoidable. And I feel sure they will be with me in thinking the fight worthy of the expenditure.

Subscriptions had better be sent direct to me at 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., 4, and the total will be handed over to the Treasurer when the list is closed, which should be this side of Christmas.

IV.

THE giant forces of Nature are not only endlessly engaged in elevating the earth's mighty battlements, but are also occupied in their unwearying labour of reducing them to ruin. The furious storms of wind and rain that rage, the burning sun, the merciless frosts, and the roaring torrents all co-operate in the ceaseless work of destruction. Peak, glen, and valley have all been sculptured out of an originally dreary and monotonous rocky mass.

Although our native scenery is so splendid, Great Britain possesses no great mountain ranges. But what our hills lack in height they make up in age. That eminent geologist, the late Dr. Geikie, the famous brother of the illustrious Archibald Geikie, championed the opinion that the Scottish Highlands have "remained more or less continuously in the condition of land" ever since the beginning of Old Red Sandstone times. It is an established truth that the Highlands, the Welsh mountains, and the Lake eminences, are immensely ancient. In comparison with these the Alps and Himalayas are quite modern. It is highly probable that the British hills were the sites of majestic mountains millions of years before the chalk beds were deposited on the ocean floor. Yet, although the Alps are so youthful when compared with the immemorial mountains of Britain, they were in the prime of their mountainhood nearly twice their present height:—

The delta of the Rhone, the plain of Lombardy, Belgium, Holland, and the Dobrudscha are all built > up in part of materials from the tops of the Alps, which, if no fresh elevation take place, will be gradually lowered until nothing but the stumps remain."

Now, owing to their far greater antiquity, the amount of denudation in the Welsh, and Westmoreland, and Cumberland mountains have been far greater, and our island's elevations are insignificant because their age is so extreme. A careful study of the deposits around Snowdon reveals the fact that from 15,000 to 20,000 feet of solid rocks have been swept away, while in the Lake District the denudation suffered by that beauty spot totals 26,000 feet.

The highest mountain in South Britain is Snowdon, 3,571 feet in height, while our lowest hill of any importance, Crowborough Beacon, reaches a mere 803 feet. Among the most ancient of English hills are the Malverns, Charnwood Forest, the Wrekin, the granites of Cornwall and Devon, and the mountains of the Lake Country and Wales. In Shropshire there is a group of hills called the Wrekin, some twenty-nine miles in length, or if the uplands west of Kington in Herefordshire and Radnorshire are included, they extend for fifty miles. Dr. Callaway regards the Wrekin as the remains of an island surrounded in remote ages by a deep sea. In any case, this region is one of the oldest in our Isles. A well preserved worm-burrow from these rocks is, perhaps, the earliest British fossil so far discovered.

The magnificent Malvern Hills rising to a height of 1,400 feet when viewed from the Severn Valley, form one of the grandest examples of English scenery. To Raggedstone Hill in the Malverns superstition has attached itself. According to local tradition, this hill's shadow casts the curse of ruin on those upon whom it falls. Cardinal Wolsey's downfall was long attributed to the circumstance that as a youthful chaplain at Morton Court he once slumbered in the garden, and the baleful shadow rested over him.

Caer Caradoc, near Wenlock, was named, it is said, after Caractacus, and is alleged to have been the scene of the British chief's final struggle with the conquering Romans. Charnwood Forest is an English upland which is quite unlike the adjacent country, and bears a distinct resemblance to Welsh scenery. It is, indeed, an outlier of Welsh strata which has been thrust through environing rocks of later origin. Avebury describes it as "a tract of high ground enthroned in the midst of plains, a solitude in the midst of a thickly peopled district, a wilderness in the middle of mines and manufactures." The rocks which compose it date back to the period when the earliest fossils lived. In truth the western areas of Britain form the most venerable parts of the island, while the eastern and south-eastern regions are, geologically speaking, modern.

Snowdon, the monarch of English mountains, with its encircling summits, forms the loftiest and wildest part of Northern Wales. As their fossils show, the mountain rocks are of Silurian age. During the Silurian Period vast rivers of lava flowed from the volcanoes which then occupied what is now the Lake District, and North and South Wales. When these volcanoes were active, enormous quantities of volcanic ash were discharged into the sea, thus depositing strata in the ocean in which the extinct marine organisms whose shells are found in the rocks were buried. Snowdon and other mountains are extensively composed of such ancient volcanic substances. From beds of fine volcanic ash at their summits fossil shell-fish may be gathered.

There are in the world to-day about 350 active volcanoes, while if the mountains that were once eruptive are included about 1,000 are known. Many British hills were formerly living volcanoes, such as Arthur's Seat, the famous eminence near Edinburgh, the Bass Rock, and others. Volcanoes were long regarded as "burning mountains," and legion are the superstitions which have clustered round them. Etna, as Virgil informs us, was to the pagan Romans the spot where the incensed divinites buried Enceladus, one of the turbulent giants. Another eruptive mountain in the Lipa Islands—Volcano—was viewed as the forge of Vulcan or Volcan, the god of fire. Hence the name volcano arises from the ancient title of a celebrated smoking mountain in the Mediterranean Sea.

Volcanoes consist of alternating layers of ashes and lava, which all descend from the centre. In the volcano's centre itself is a chimney, which expands towards the top, so as to look like a funnel or cup. This is the crater. The form and inclination of a volcano depend upon the nature of the substances ejected. Every known volcano has been erected on a foundation of stratified rocks, and invariably after these rocks, which were originally laid down under the ocean, had been elevated high above sea level. Volcanoes are built usually through successive eruptions, and during several centuries. The earth shocks which herald the first eruption probably dislocate and fracture the sedimentary strata, thus opening a passage for the ascending lava.

Volcanoes, therefore, are quite unlike the more stable mountains previously described, inasmuch as they are never evolved by upheaval. As Hutchinson intimates, volcanic masses have not been fashioned by the upheaval of strata,— > but have been gradually piled up, something like rubbish heaps that accumulate in the Thames barges as the dustmen empty their carts into them, only in the case of volcanoes the "rubbish" comes from below. It is not necessary to suppose that the reservoir down below from which the molten rock is supplied exists at any very great depth below the original land surface on which the volcano grows up.

The hypothesis which assumed that volcanoes were developed by upheaval has been abandoned. The current theory was necessitated by careful investigation, and is strongly supported by observation. For instance, Monte Nuovo (the New Mountain), a small volcano near Vesuvius, about 430 feet high, arose during a single night in the year 1538. Two eye-witnesses have left on record their observations of the eruption to which Monte Nuovo owes its existence. These sixteenth century narratives have been amply corroborated by more recent inquiries. Various other volcanoes, such as Jorulla, the huge Mexican fire-mountain, present unmistakable evidences that they were formed in similar fashion.

A volcanic eruption is preceded by earth movements which shake the mountain and the surrounding country. Subterranean explosions set up vibrations which affect the environing area, while the volcano is convulsed by the pent-up energies of the steam and liquid rocks which are struggling to secure an outlet. Wells and springs disappear in the rock fractures occasioned by the internal turmoil. At last these imprisoned energies find a vent, and then the eruption commences, as a rule, with one titanic outburst which makes the entire mountain quiver from its apex to its very base. After this overture, explosions rapidly succeed one another with constantly increasing violence. Usually, the crater forms the centre of these disturbances, but at times the whole mountain appears to participate in these convulsions.

In the stupendous eruption which occurred at Krakatoa, in the Sunda Straits, which separate Java and Sumatra, in 1883, the sounds of the explosions were heard two thousand miles distant. Layers of volcanic dust descended within a radius of 1,000 miles; the more microscopic dust and vapour were urged to a height of from fifteen to twenty miles, and were carried by the air currents all round the globe, while the particles suspended in the atmosphere caused most magnificent sunsets in many countries, including our own. It was even said that the English sunsets were beginning to imitate the paintings of Turner.

A hillside view of an air-raid on a clear, calm, moonlit night is completely eclipsed by the spectacle presented by a volcano in furious eruption. Volumes of liquid or semi-liquid lava may be hurled into the atmosphere. These volumes assume a spherical form, and are called "bombs." Viewed at a distance, they seem to be sheets of flame. So mighty are the forces of the imprisoned gases that, in their efforts to escape, they sometimes fling the volcano into space, and thus entire mountains have been shattered. The enormous discharges of steam issuing from the volcano expand, and ascend into the upper and colder regions of the air. There the steam condenses, and the rain descends in torrents. Immense masses of volcanic dust are transformed by the rain into mud, which tears down the declivities of the mountain. These mud rivers flow with enormous rapidity, and such streams of lava-water, as they are termed, were largely responsible for the calamity which destroyed the celebrated cities of Pompeii and Herculaneum at the time of the terrible eruption of Vesuvius in A.D. 79. Lava streams are sometimes small, but the effects of a giant stream may be gathered from what occurred in Iceland in 1783. Streams spread on all sides from the volcano Skaptar Jokull. They swept over the country, filled river courses 600 feet deep, and for nearly fifty miles the lava currents extended far and wide. A vivid impression of what this implies will be gained when we realize that if this eruption had occurred "in the south of England, all the country from the neighbourhood of London to that of Gloucester might have been covered by a flood of basalt of considerable thickness."

Booth to Scotland's Rescue!

EDINBURGH, in the estimation of several of her representative men, is apparently in a bad way. In an Edinburgh newspaper we see that "General" Booth has been visiting Edinburgh, where he received a welcome from various municipal dignitaries and a live M.P. The last-mentioned gentleman went the length of describing the Salvation Army's work as "a miracle." The "General" himself had been so impressed by the importance of the Army's work in Scotland "that he had decided to make Scotland a unit of the Army life and to appoint Commissioner and Mrs. Hoggard to the command of the territory." What this exactly means is best known to the "General," but his audience applauded the announcement, so perhaps they had been let into the secret. All the same, considering the length of time the Salvation Army has been in existence, the step seems a rather belated one. Its not having been taken earlier may imply a subtle compliment to Scotch piety; but its having to be taken at all suggests what we remarked at the outset, namely, that Edinburgh—nay, Scotland itself—has been falling from grace, and the only power that can restore the land to its pristine godliness is that whose emblems are the scarlet jersey and the tambourine.

There was one significant feature in the report of the "General's" meeting, and that was the absence of the names of any of the Edinburgh clergy. Was it not said long ago that the "Army" and the Churches were pulling happily together? All the "meenisters" are not away abroad in connection with the real War. Yet not one cassock—not one dog-collar—was to be seen in any part of good Booth's Councillor-bestudded platform. Has there been a rift in the lute? Are there fewer converts being passed on by the Army into the Churches as potential members? In any view, the "General" himself lent colour to the suggestion that the reason for the absence of the reverends was a certain coolness, because in the course of his address, he said that in the work of the Army they had eschewed fine dress, tobacco, and strong drink—and in that respect he wished the Churches would follow the Army. That is certainly a nippy one. And it is two-edged. Not only are Church people greedy for luxuries, but also, they ignore the shining example of the musical band whose motto is "Blood and Fire." Alas! it is to be feared that the Scots parsons and the Army are not what they used to be to each other.

And by implication, at any rate, the "General" passed another slight upon God's chosen ambassadors in black. He went on to say that he believed the secret of the Army's "success" was that they had been able to use the people of every class for the saving of others of their class. This, one sees, cuts off at least half of the existing functions of the clergy. Can it be that the designing Booth sees fissures in the walls of the Temple of Clericalism? Does he make a bid for the laity who make not obeisance to the lordly priest? Drat us, what times we live in! Meantime, Scotsmen have the satisfaction of knowing that some one has flown to the succour of their land in her dire hour of need, and has made her a unit of the Salvation Army's life!

MEN, MONEY, AND THE WAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—The following extracts from an article called "War-Bondage, 1920," in the Nation of November 17, are so true to the actual facts, that they will go far to clear up any doubts about the question raised by Mr. Eden Phillpotts in your issue of November 25:—

> Capitalism has been steadily working towards the final form of a free financial dynasty. This, the War brings about by substituting for the countless forms of stocks and shares and mortgages in many hands a single financial form, anchored in the safes of a few great Banks, Finance Houses, and Insurance Companies. These little groups of financiers already hold the mortgage deeds of Britain. Its lands and houses, mines and factories, ships and shops, belong to them. Such has been the secret achievement of the accumulating War Loans.....

It is true that many thousands of ordinary men and women hold small parcels of War Loan, in name at least.

> But since all the later loans have been financed, partly by pledging earlier War Scrip and all sorts of other securities with the banks, partly by bolder fabrication of bank credit; when the War ends it will transpire that the War Financiers are the owners of all the property. For by that time the War Debt will have mounted up to a mortgage covering the whole estimated value of the national assets, and so the holders will virtually possess the country. Not only its capital, but its labour. For the labour of Britain will have to give up all the wealth it makes, beyond its necessary subsistence, to pay the interest.

Thus, when the men in the trenches and aboard ship return from their terrible ordeals, they will be forced to spend the rest of their lives in grinding out profits for the handful of cosmopolitan financial millionaires who will hold the great bulk of the huge War Debt. Any revolt by the workers is highly improbable because—> they will not know what has really happened, for the legend of financial ruin, universally believed, will continue to deceive them. The wail of the small investors over their depreciated securities will help to furnish a curtain of fiction, behind which our real capitalist smiles, contented and secure.

All this is equally true of every other country engaged in the War, because the cosmopolitan financiers will hold over one-half of their War Loans, and each country's share of the War might have been financed, without any borrowing, through the agency of a State Bank, thus defeating the designs of these great financiers for the conquest of the world.

Digitized by Google

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON NOV. 29.

The President, Mr. C. Cohen, in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Baker, Braddock, Eager, Gorniot, Leat, Lazarnick, Neary, Owen, Palmer, Quinton, Roger, Samuels, Thurlow, and Wood; Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, Mrs. Rolf, and the Secretary.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed. The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members (46 in all) were received from Birmingham, Goldthorpe, Liverpool, Manchester, Southampton, Swansea, South London, and the Parent Society.

Permission was granted for the formation of a new Branch at Southampton.

Out of the report of the business transacted at the Interim Conference, a discussion arose upon the best methods of carrying out the South London Branch's resolution. After a statement by the President, expressing his view on the situation, it was resolved that the matter be adjourned until the next Executive meeting.

The President and Secretary gave a report as to the result of the application of the Protest Committee against the L.C.C. in the High Courts, and it was gathered from more recent happenings in connection with the meetings of the Parks Committee that the matter was nearing a satisfactory conclusion. The Protest Committee's appeal for funds was received, and a further donation of £5 voted.

The new regulations under D.O.R.A. affecting pamphlets were discussed, and the following resolution—

> This Executive of the National Secular Society strongly protests against the proposed regulation under the Defence of the Realm Act ordering that all pamphlets dealing with war and peace shall be submitted to a Government censor before publication; it regards such a regulation as a direct attack upon the freedom of publication, and as foreign to British traditions of freedom of speech and writing. This Executive is of opinion that a decision as to the legality or illegality of any publication should be decided by a court of law, and not by a political censorship; and hopes that all lovers of freedom will unite in demanding the withdrawal of a regulation which must be regarded as mischievous in the highest degree—was carried unanimously.

It was further reported that a series of Sunday afternoon lectures were arranged for January, to be held at 31 Alfred Place, Store Street, Tottenham Court Road, under the auspices of the National Secular Society, and that a grant of £15 had been made by Mr. Cohen from his Propagandist Fund.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Society News.

THE Birmingham Branch of the N. S. S. opened its Autumn Lecture Session on September 23 with two lectures in the Town Hall by Mr. C. Cohen, President of the N. S. S. The lectures were well attended, and it was very gratifying to old and new members and friends to note the large audiences and the marked manner in which the lectures were followed. Questions and answers at the close were interesting and enjoyed. On September 30 (Bradlaugh Sunday) a Social Gathering was held at the Cafe Oriental, Hill Street. Speeches suitable to the occasion were made by Messrs. F. E. Willis and E. C. Williams. The difficulty of obtaining a suitable hall for lectures was overcome when the Branch found itself able to book the Repertory Theatre, Station Street, and Mr. Lloyd delivered the first lecture there on October 7. He was followed by Mr. E. Clifford Williams, Mr. F. E. Willis, Mr. Cohen, and Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner. The venture has been in every respect satisfactory. The audiences have been large, and the sale of literature excellent. Many people, strangers to our movement, have attended, expressed pleasure at the lectures, and purchased liberally at the bookstall. In the New Year the committee hope to fill dates in larger number than fortnightly as at present, and asks the support of all local friends in making the meetings widely known and getting strangers to attend.—J. PARTRIDGE.

Dr. Binnie Dunlop, Hon. Sec. to the Malthusian League, addressed a good audience—a very fair proportion being composed of ladies—on Sunday night last. Dr. Dunlop gave a particularly clear and lucid exposition of the rise and fall of the birth-rate, and stressed the connection between the Secular and Neo-Malthusian Movements. Many questions were asked and much interest shown. To-night Mr. J. K. Harris will open on "Freethought and Judaism." North Londoners, please note.—H. V. LANE, Hon. Sec. North London Branch.

On Sunday Mr. P. S. Wilde delivered a carefully prepared lecture on "God's Beginnings," which elicited some thoughtful discussion, including some very courteous opposition from a Christian Evidence lecturer. A pleasing feature was that a considerable proportion of the audience were total strangers to our meetings. Mr. Somerville occupied the chair.—V. ROGER, South London Branch.

Joint Committee of Protest Against Prohibition of Sale of Literature in London County Council Parks and Open Spaces.

THE legal victory gained over the London County Council on October 23rd has brought this Committee a long step nearer the achievement of its end; but this only serves to emphasize the critical importance of the present position.

Nearly 18 months ago, the "Joint Committee of Protest" was formed to resist a quite uncalled-for attack by the L.C.C. on the freedom of propaganda. The right to hold meetings in Parks and Open Spaces, where suitable accommodation exists, has never been questioned by any public body. When the L.C.C. assumed control of the London Parks it found this right in existence, and this right has been recognized in more than one of the Acts dealing with the powers and duties of the Council. Along with the right to hold meetings went the right to sell literature at the meetings—always subject in either case to such regulation as might be necessary in the general public interest—such sale being, indeed, an integral part of the educational work carried on at the meetings. An attack on the one right could not but be an attack on the other.

There has been no complaint from the public as to the nature of the literature sold, all of which had passed the censorship of the Council. No one has complained of annoyance: the literature is only offered to those who attend the meetings on the sites set apart for that purpose. There has been no complaint from the Council's Officials, who, on the contrary, reported that the arrangements had worked smoothly and without friction. It is confessed that there has been no complaint from the military authority.

When, therefore, the L.C.C. passed a resolution that the sale of literature should, after September 30, 1916, be prohibited, a number of Societies—including, among many others, such representative bodies as the London Trades Council, the English League for the Taxation of Land Values, the National Secular Society, etc.—rightly regarded this as an attack on the Right of Public Meeting, and this Committee was called into existence to resist by every means in its power the arbitrary action of the Council.

The Committee tried by every possible means, by deputation, correspondence, resolutions, etc., to induce the Council to alter its decision. Every attempt failed; and the Committee felt that the only way to bring the question to an issue was to continue the exercise of a right which had existed before the Council came into being. Meetings were held and literature sold at them. After considerable delay, a summons was issued, and the magistrate fined the defendant. Several other prosecutions followed, defended in every case by the solicitor and counsel of the Committee.

The next step was taken in the High Court. Counsel was instructed to apply for a Rule calling upon the L.C.C. to show whether it had rightly exercised the powers granted to it in passing the Resolution of which this Committee complains. The application was at once granted; and, a few weeks later, a Divisional Court, consisting of Justices Darling, Avory, and Sankey, made the Rule nisi for a Mandamus absolute, the first-named Judge remarking that "he was unable to see how they could give judgment in any other way without disregarding the rules and construction of the law." This decision was in the nature of a severe rebuff to the Council, and Sir Ernest Pollock, K.C., on its behalf, said that it would consider the question of an appeal. The Committee awaits its decision with the utmost confidence.

It is well within the knowledge of this Committee that this action of the Council is regarded in some quarters as only the prelude to a more daring attack on the Right of Public Meeting. To allow the Council—whose life is prolonged beyond its natural term by the accident of war—to take advantage of the distraction caused by the war to destroy this cherished and well-established public right is to offer the strongest encouragement to the reactionaries of the L.C.C. Resistance in the end would become inevitable. It is far better to fight the enemy on the frontier than to wait till he is in the flush of a successful invasion.

The matter is of first-rate importance, and the need for funds is urgent. The fight is being conducted with the utmost economy, but it nevertheless involves considerable expenditure. The indebtedness of the Committee for legal expenses amounts at present to over £100; and, if the L.C.C. is so ill advised as to carry the matter further, more money will be needed. It would indeed be regrettable if the Committee were compelled to suspend its operations owing to lack of funds.

The Committee does not think that more need be said to impress upon all lovers of freedom the need for an immediate and generous response to this appeal. The issue is one which affects all interested in the education of public opinion. If the L.C.C. were to succeed in this endeavour, every attempt to appeal to public opinion by the sale of literature at Park Meetings would be stopped. The next step would almost certainly be to prohibit free distribution, and then to stop the meetings altogether.

The Committee has refrained from issuing this appeal until the latest possible moment. They are fighting for a public right, and they confidently rely upon public support.

The whirligig of time brings in its revenges. Once Thomas Paine's name was execrated by all Christians. To-day his name is held in honour, and even the Nonconformist Daily News writes of him with respect, and includes him among "a succession of great men" who were "inspired by the single idea of saving the New World from the tragedy of the Old."

Obituary.

I regret to have to mention that Bradford Freethinkers have sustained a loss in the death of an old sympathiser in the person of John Seymour, of 7, Burrow Street. He had been ill for some time, and resided with a married daughter at above address. I feel pleased to say that when he was occasionally visited and a copy of this paper left him he derived much pleasure in reading the same.—J. G.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Views and Opinions.

The Art of Dying.

We see that a book is announced for publication under the title of The Book of the Craft of Dying. It is a collection of mediæval tracts, edited by a lady, with a preface by a clergyman. The work can hardly fail to be interesting, and to those acquainted with the output of a mediæval mind the title is reminiscent. It carries one back to a time when dying might well be called a "craft." For it was studied with all the care which many normally give to mastering an ordinary occupation. Nowadays, when so much attention is given, and rightly given, to the craft of living, it seems strange to think of a society in which the leaders of thought placed chief emphasis on the art of dying. Life was then valuable only as it prepared one for death and for what lay beyond. Nor was this frame of mind wholly mediæval. It was prominent less than a hundred years ago. "Prepare to meet thy God" was the burden of a deal of the theology then preached, and religious literature generally was well calculated to produce chronic melancholy in a Mark Tapley. Whatever claim Christianity may have to be called the religion of eternal life, it was certainly the religion of terrestrial death. So far as it could, it made death supreme in the human mind, and if its supremacy was never more than transient, and was finally broken, this was due to the fact that the conditions of human existence are that natural solution works on the side of the supremacy of the "will to live." The closing sorrow of the grave must give place to the dawning joy of the cradle.

Living on Death.

The Artes bene Moriendi was a well-known mediæval treatise, and its scope is well described by Mr. Lionel Cust in his History of Engraving during the Fifteenth Century:—

> At this date the keys of knowledge, as of salvation, were entirely in the hands of the Church, and the lay public, both high and low, were, generally speaking, ignorant and illiterate. One of the secrets of the great power exercised by the Church lay in its ability to represent the life of man as environed from the outset by legions of horrible and insidious demons, who beset his path throughout life at every stage up to his very last breath, and are eminently active and often triumphant when man's fortitude is undermined by sickness, suffering, and the prospect of dissolution. From such attacks and pitfalls only the continuous presence and protection of the Church could protect the hopeless pilgrim.

Men turned to the Church for protection against the terror of death which the Church itself taught. The poisoner did a lucrative trade in selling a doubtful remedy for his own toxic preparation. More than anything else the fear of death and hell laid the foundation of the wealth and power of the Churches. Even to-day these Churches exert the most power that keep to the older line of teaching. The two truths engraved on the face of European history is that the power of the Christian Church was rooted in death, and that it flourished in dishonour.

Pagan and Christian.

And let it be noted that the intense fear of death is a product of Christian teaching. The fear of death played but a small part in the life of Greece and Rome, and none at all in the life of its best representatives. Of the Greek sculpture concerning death, Professor Mahaffy says: "They are simple pictures of the grief of parting, of the recollection of pleasant days of love and friendship, of the gloom of the unknown future. But there is no exaggeration in the picture." And throughout Roman art and letters there runs the conception of death as the necessary converse of birth. Pliny clearly puts this in the following: "Unto all the state of being often the last day is the same as it was before the first day of life; neither is there any more variation of it in either body or soul after death than there was before death." Among the uneducated people some fear of the after world did exist, and it was upon that fear Christianity rested itself in its successful appeal to ignorance as against knowledge, to blind fear against enlightenment. And Freethinkers at least can sympathize with Lucretius, who saw the great danger and sought to guard men by pointing out the unreality of this death-bed terror.

> So shalt thou feed on Death who feeds on men,
> And Death once dead, there's no more dying then.

A Mediæval Nightmare.

It was Christianity, and Christianity alone, which made death so fearsome a thing to the European mind. And society once Christianized, the uneducated could find no corrective from the more educated. The baser elements existing in the non-Christian world were seized by Christian teachers and amplified and developed. Plato had speculated in a hell of a thousand years' duration. Christianity stretched it to eternity. Plutarch and others had discredited the popular notions of a future life. Christianity reaffirmed them with all the extravagant embellishments of a diseased imagination. The Pagan teachers held death to be as normal and as natural as birth; with Christian teachers it was a penal infliction.

Digitized by Google

The Pagan Art of Life gave place to the Christian Art of Death. "How to die" took the place of "How to live," and Christian teachers lacked the perception that one could only answer the first by discovering the second. Human ingenuity exhausted itself in describing the nature of hell and the torments of the damned, and when one remembers the powers of the Church and the murderous suppression of all opposing opinion, there is small wonder that, under Christian rule, the fear of death gained a strength it had never possessed before or since.

Christianity and Science.

Two causes are chiefly responsible for the changed attitude towards—perhaps one ought to say for the return of the modern mind to the Pagan point of view. The first is scientific, the second is social. In the state of universal ignorance amid which Christianity flourished, it was easy enough to believe in a literal heaven and hell, and the fear-creating stories of the Church. While the sky was a solid dome of scanty extent, the earth was the small central body of a small universe, and man himself the centre of creation, surrounded by legions of angels and devils, there was nothing essentially incongruous between them and the accepted cosmology. The growth of science broke down the harmony of centuries, and people found themselves confronted by a universe utterly at variance with Christian teaching, and in the re-establishment of an equilibrium Christianity lost heavily. Beliefs that appeared reasonable in the old world of science were glaringly absurd in the new. A new and critical spirit of investigation were evolved, and this, when applied to religious beliefs, began to make it plain that an after life was a subject upon which all were at liberty to guess, but upon which none were in a position to pronounce with certainty.

The Saner View.

The development of a saner view of social life also operated powerfully to the same end. The fear of death had gained its chief strength from the conviction that happiness hereafter was dependent upon right belief here. The value of this life was expressed in terms of a life hereafter. The grave was the entrance hall to a chamber from which issued decrees that determined man's eternal welfare, and death was the summons to attend. But when the point of view was reversed, this life became more and more an end in itself; death and after death ceased to be the determining factors of conduct, and the belief in a future life gradually assumed its true character as a pure speculation grafted upon the psychology of primitive man. Sociology is the enemy of theology; science is the true solvent of superstition. The world is rapidly reaching the conclusion that this life can be made adequate as an end if we will only make it so. Life is part of Nature, and Nature is neither good nor bad. It is to each what his organization and education fits him for. To the Christian the fear of death may well be strong and ever present. To the liberated mind death brings no fear. If life has been smooth and pleasant, death is but the close of an agreeable interlude. If it has been otherwise, it can still be said:—

> After life's fitful fever he sleeps well;
> Treason has done his worst; nor steel, nor poison,
> Malice domestic, foreign levy, nothing
> Can touch him further.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The advocate of what is false has every reason to make his advances stealthily and to curry favour with the world The man who feels that he has truth on his side must step firmly. Truth is not to be dallied with.—Goethe.

"The New Thinking."

SUCH is the title of a Thursday noon sermon recently delivered in the City Temple by Dr. Fort Newton, and reported in the Christian Commonwealth for November 28. Seeing such a novel title one naturally expected to find the discourse bristling with startlingly fresh and original ideas. The text, too, "What think ye of Christ?" lent zest to the hope that, now at last, an old subject was about to receive a perfectly unique treatment. Of course, there was no escape from the suspicion that the title must be misleading, and there is no text upon which more sermons have been founded. But one was comforted by the fact that Dr. Newton is a new man who is generally believed to have come all the way from America because he has a new message to deliver to the British public. It is but fair to admit that the address opens well with the statement that "to-day men are thinking faster, further, and more searchingly than they have thought for many a day." One distinct blessing of the War is that "out of the suffering and the breaking of hearts new thought patterns are being woven, which, by inevitable logic, will become action-patterns, and that means a new way of living in times to be." But the examples cited are scarcely convincing. No doubt the trenches are exerting a powerful influence upon the soldiers, many of whom are, doubtless, genuine heroes; but there is no evidence whatever that, when they come back to the days of peace, they will be altogether new men, animated by new ideas, nobler motives, and higher aims. Whatever Coningsby Dawson and Dr. Newton may say to the contrary, we do not believe that war has ever been, or ever will be, a regenerator of character. It is true that it often brings out the best there is in a man, but it cannot be denied that it also tends to develop the very worst qualities. We are fully aware that, speaking generally, mankind is slowly evolving from lower to higher levels of life, and that, as an inevitable consequence, a new social order will ultimately be established. By the operation of a purely natural law, we are by degrees, in spite of numerous backsets, learning the art of living by actually living.

At this point Dr. Newton declares that the same process is going on in the religious world. He says:—

> Inevitably, the new thinking is finding its way into religion, and that is why things are upside down. From statistics taken not so very long ago, it was found that, in London, only about fifteen or twenty per cent. of the people attend Church or Chapel. It is much the same in America, as witness a very striking story by Kibb Turner, entitled "The Last Christian," in which we are shown the situation as it is. It portrays the slow decadence and final death of the typical "big white church" in a New England village. The last Christian, in the story, is the faithful, devoted, scholarly pastor of the church, who kept true to his creed and his vows through thirty years of ministry. But, in spite of his loyalty, he saw the church disintegrating under his hand. Young men went to college and never again returned to the fellowship. Women, whose hearts were breaking from the sorrows of life, found no comfort in the creed of the pastor, and turned to some cult for help. The pastor lived long enough to see the old church sold to a secret fraternity, and the remnant of his flock united with a neighbouring church whose minister had a proclivity to quote Browning.

That is a highly interesting and profoundly true tale, and it conclusively proves the truth of the Freethought tenet that natural knowledge of necessity undermines supernatural belief. This Dr. Newton fails to realize. The facts are as stated by the novelist, and to dispute them would be the quintessence of folly; but instead of taking them as they are, the reverend gentleman insists upon interpreting them. Being interpreted, then, the facts do not show that "the men of to-day are indifferent to religion, as we are so often told. No, no; they are thinking about it as they have never done for years, thinking deeply, seriously, and very much to the point." Evidently Dr. Newton speaks for thousands upon thousands of people in this country, of whom he clearly knows absolutely nothing, and his statement is in consequence utterly false. Moreover, he deliberately misrepresents non-religious people by taking for granted that they are sodden masses, "dead to all high appeals." To the claims of supernatural religion, as such, they are completely indifferent; but the bulk of them display wonderful humanity, benevolence, and mildness of disposition. Dr. Newton is guilty of bearing false witness against them through ignorance and prejudice; but as a public man he has no right to speak ex cathedra on matters concerning which he is ignorant and biased.

His main point, however, is that "men are thinking differently about religion from what they did in days gone by." In a sense that is quite true, but not in the sense intended by the preacher. Belief in God is impossible to an ever-growing multitude of thoughtful people, with the result that religion as Divine fellowship has no meaning for them. The new thinking, in their case, is natural, scientific thinking, the thinking that confines itself to the present world and life; and for them life at its highest and best signifies life devoted to fellowship with, and service of, their fellow-beings. For Dr Newton, however, the new thinking "is the simple but mighty Gospel of Jesus, enriched by science, illustrated by democracy, and applied by the educational method." According to the New Testament, the message of the Gospel of Jesus is that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life." Surely, such a Gospel cannot possibly be enriched by science, illustrated by democracy, or applied by any educational methods. To derive all the benefits in its gift, all we have to do is to believe it, or put our trust in him whose Gospel it is. On the preacher's own showing, the Gospel of Jesus, on its ethical side, is as old as the hills, containing not a single new idea. The Golden Rule, which it is said to make central, was in existence at least five hundred years before Jesus was ever heard of. The path of righteousness, to which it points, is simply the eightfold path of the Buddha. But, after all, where does the Christ come in, and what does the minister of the City Temple really think of him? We have read his sermon most carefully more than once; but we have totally failed to discover what Christ is to him. The terms he employs in speaking of him are so vague and ambiguous that it is impossible to determine whether he is a Trinitarian or a Unitarian, or in what respect Christ is the Saviour of the world. The only thing of which we are positively certain is that here we are not brought into touch with any new thinking whatsoever. Take the following:—

> And Christ! Are men thinking of him in these strange and tangled days? Indeed, yes, they are thinking of him lovingly and wistfully, wondering if, after all, he is not the wisest and most practical of all the teachers of men. For most men of to-day the Christ of dogma has vanished, or is vanishing. They are not interested in the ancient debates which agitated their fathers:
> Draw if thou canst the mystic line
> Severing rightly his from thine,
> Which is human, which Divine?
> With these speculative mysteries they have not to do, because their problems are of another kind. What they want is to know God as he is disclosed and interpreted in terms of our common life, and this they find in Jesus—in his growth, his manhood, his mingled joys and sorrows, his fellowship with humanity, his sufferings, his death, his victory.

The chief characteristic of that extract is its vagueness. It is true that the Christs of dogma are vanishing, but there are no others. Christ is an interpretation, and that is why there are so many different Christs. Even the Gospel Jesus is an interpretation, and that is why there are so many contradictions in the Gospels. Historical facts are conspicuous only by their absence. Dr. Newton is fully as dogmatic as Dean Wace, only in a different way; and the one dogmatism is no better founded than the other. We are never at a loss to know what the Dean means, but are never wholly certain what significations Dr. Newton attaches to his terms.

Now, the conclusion to which we are forced by an examination of the sermon under consideration is that it registers no new thinking whatever, and that religion is a theme upon which literally nothing new can be said. Usually there is in Dr. Newton's discourses a considerable amount of Humanism, but it is so interwoven with supernatural threads that its beauty is greatly marred and its ethical elements lose their value.

J. T. LLOYD.

Through Christian Spectacles.

> The miraculous has become absurd, the impossible. Gods and phantoms have been driven from the earth and sky. We are living in a natural world.—Ingersoll.

THE small but fierce tribe of Christian Evidence exponents have a new ally in Mr. Arthur Machen, the well-known journalist, who has published a column article in the Evening News dealing with Freethinkers and their attitude to religion. But Mr. Machen wears his rue with a difference. Like that placid dachshund which Mark Twain saw in the possession of a sportsman who was taking it out to hunt elephants, he lacks bitterness. He also lacks other things—the ability to murder the King's English, and the power of talking very loudly in the open air.

Nevertheless, I find myself in a rebellious humour. For there is an irritating air of dilettantism in Mr. Machen's propaganda, and a note of patronage. There is also an echo of the Oxford University manner, which has been jocosely described as the attitude of the Almighty addressing a bug. It will probably be grateful to the sentimentalists who still cling to the name of Christian; but I imagine it will irritate rather than satisfy other readers of more virile intelligence.

Mr. Machen suggests that the fault of Freethinkers, or rather their misfortune, for they are born that way, is that they lack the religious sense. The Freethinker, he tells us, resembles the unhappy folk who are "tone-deaf," and "colour-blind," and who cannot enjoy the delights of literature. "He is not able to relish a good dinner; so he finds out all kinds of reasons to prove that dinner is nonsense, and poisonous nonsense at that." Mr. Machen is "sorry" for the poor, demented Freethinker, and in the heat of his argument, "somewhat cross." "Freethought," he points out politely, "is found to some extent in all minds save in the two extremes of saints and simpletons." And, since journalists are not saints, it is terrible to reflect to which group Mr. Machen himself belongs.

Mr. Machen's simile of the dinner is beautiful and ineffectual nonsense. Freethinkers are as able to relish a good dinner as the most credulous clergyman "with good capon lined"; but they are not so simple as to mistake a menu for a banquet. The Christian menu has no correspondence with the meal that follows, and the price charged is too high. A bird in the hand is worth any number in the bush. A slender chance of profit in the next life does not compensate for mental slavery in this life. An honest man, with a sense of human dignity, would hesitate to play fast and loose with his intellect, and accept a creed because it appeals to his selfish hopes and fears. Living by faith is an easy profession, as the clergy well know. Living on faith, however, is a precarious business. Elijah is said to have subsisted on food brought him by inspired ravens, and 50,000 parsons to-day in this country subsist on the offerings of the pious. The starving people of Europe ask God to give them their daily bread, and the answer is that they die. If there were no other indictment of Christianity, the awful sufferings of helpless women and children would condemn it everlastingly.

According to Mr. Machen, the religious sense is but a common faculty, and Christians have little reason to plume themselves as members of God's own aristocracy. The senses of beauty and wonder, and, indeed, the love of æsthetics, are not necessarily religious, but are perfectly natural. How, then, can there be anything "spiritual" in their combinations? Is it reasonable to gibe at the Freethinker as like a man "utterly incapable" of relishing the exquisite savours of La Belle Dame Sans Merci, and as one who prefer novelettes before Shakespeare when one remembers that Shakespeare and Keats were both Freethinkers. Mr. Machen is obsessed with a gross illusion. Christians have no monopoly of the finer feelings. It is very doubtful if the average hymn of to-day has any more claim to be considered as real literature than the usual music-hall song. And the glaring lithographs of Sacred subjects framed in so many Christian homes suggests that colour-blindness is not confined to the heterodox.

As a defender of the faith, Mr. Machen is not a great success. One of his ruses has been to misrepresent and slander heretics. The way he does this is as follows:—

> But the man who is convinced that the early martyrs were designing and crafty rogues is, often for some obscure reason, anxious to proclaim his conviction to the world, whereby he becomes a burden and a bore.

This is as absurd as the story of Noah's Ark or of the adventures of Jonah and the whale. Mr. Machen, being an instructed citizen of an educated nation, should know better than that. There is always something exhilarating in the infatuation of an heroic ignoramus, but this holy simplicity of Mr. Machen's is overdone. Conceivably, on reflection, and after consultation of Paine, Renan, and Strauss, to mention no others, he will recognize that sobriety of statement is not precisely the quality in which his talents shine.

Mr. Machen is not so childlike and bland as he appears to be. He follows the beaten track of theology in talking of mysteries, which is a subterfuge to cover the retreat of a defender of the faith. Here are his words:—

> The truth is that, whether we like it or not, we live, if we live well, in and by and through mysteries.

Mysteries, forsooth! And Mr. Machen has not illuminated them with his camouflage of controversy. Wishing to keep the religious instinct in mystery, or obscurity, he objects to explanations. He cannot tolerate that men should talk of these things too inquiringly. Even if the critics are right, the subject is taboo. The older theologians were definite; the modern defenders of the faith are indefinite. As man advances, God retires. With each increase of our knowledge of Nature the sphere of the "supernatural" is lessened. Presently people will find that deities and devils are but the reflections of man's imagination and symbols of his ignorance. So religion develops, "till by broad spreading it disperse to nought."

When the Sultan of Zanzibar sent a second-hand tramp steamer to sink the British Fleet, a hearty laugh rang through the civilized world. Mr. Machen's acting the part of St. George attacking the dragon of Freethought is equally exhilarating. "Is it reasonable," asks the amusing Mr. Machen, "to spend time in reading about Mr. Pickwick, who never existed?" Christians, it might be retorted, worship a being who never existed, and employ fifty thousand parsons to perpetuate the comedy. There is a world of difference between the Freethinker, who labours for rational progress, and the journalist, who turns Christian for half an hour, to bolster up the delusions of faith. Christians are surrounded by the waters of Rationalism, and stand a bad chance of drowning. And the matter will not be unduly prolonged because a journalist essays the part of Mrs. Partington, the courageous woman who sought to sweep back the Atlantic with a mop.

MIMNERMUS.

The Bible and Immortality.

THE NEW TESTAMENT SOUL AND SPIRIT.

OUR search for "eternal life" necessitates an examination of the New Testament, where we naturally expect to find it; and we do find something which looks like it in connection with the words life, soul, and spirit; but, as in the case of the Old Testament, we must ascertain what these words really mean. This is rendered more necessary by the confused and conflicting ideas which many Christians have upon the subject. With this object in view I will commence with the word "soul" which occurs twice in the following extract:—

> Mark viii. 36, 37.—For what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?

In this passage the Greek word translated "soul" is psyche, which is said to mean "soul or life." Now, we all know what is meant by "life," though we may, perhaps, find some difficulty in defining it; but we do not know what is meant by "soul." This we have to discover. In the foregoing passage, then, the word psyche in both cases means "life," and is so translated in the Revised Version, the alternative reading "soul" being placed in the margin. Hence, in this passage, we are asked a perfectly rational question—What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his life? We find, also, that the word psyche is rendered "life" in the following passages even in the Authorised Version:—

> Matt. ii. 20.—They are dead that sought the young child's life (psyche).
> Matt. vi. 25.—Be not anxious for your life (psyche) what ye shall eat, &c.

Again, we find the word psyche used in the New Testament to designate the whole man, regardless of any soul or spirit which he might possess. Thus we read:—

> Act ii. 43—And fear came upon every soul.
>
> Acts vii. 14.—All his kindred, three score and fifteen souls.
> Rev. xvi. 3.—And every living soul died.
> 1 Peter iii. 20.—In the days of Noah.....only eight souls were saved.

In each of these examples the word translated "soul" is psyche. We are told by orthodox Christians that the soul is the "spiritual part" of man, and that, being immortal, it lives in some unknown locality after the death of the body. Yet in the examples we have noticed so far, we find that in some cases psyche signifies nothing more than "life," and in others it means merely a "living person." In the last four examples the word is applied, not to an imaginary spiritual part of man, but to the whole natural body—like the Hebrew word nephesh.

In the expression "eternal life," however, the word used is zoe, even when the word "eternal" is not expressed but only implied. The following are some examples in which zoe appears: Matt. xviii. 9; xix. 29; Mark x. 17; Luke x. 25; xviii. 30; John iii. 36; and throughout the New Testament. The following are further examples of the use of psyche:—

> Matt. xxii. 37.—Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul (psyche), and with all thy mind.
> Heb. x. 39.—But we are of them that have faith unto the saving of the soul (psyche).
> Rev. xx. 4.—I saw the souls (psychas) of them that had been beheaded, etc.

According to the first of these passages the heart, soul, and mind in man had all three the power to love; according to the second, the soul was something within man which it was thought desirable to "save"—his life, for instance. In the third passage the writer does not tell us what the objects which he calls "souls" really were, or what they looked like—whether they appeared to be headless bodies, the heads only, pools of blood, or phantoms.

We will now look at two Greek words, empsychos and apsychos, the first of which signifies "living, animated"; the second, "lifeless, spiritless." The prefix "em" signifies "in" or "with"; the prefix "a" denotes "not" or "without": the literal meanings of the two words are thus "with life" and "without life." From this fact we have positive proof that the original meaning of psyche, before new words were formed from it, was simply "life" or something internal, such as the blood, which was necessary to life.

Leaving the word "soul" for the present, we will next look at some examples of "spirit."

> Mark i. 10.—He saw.....the Spirit as a dove descending upon him.
> Mark i. 12.—And straightway the Spirit driveth him forth into the wilderness.

In these passages the Greek word pneuma (without a capital letter) is translated "Spirit"; but this "spirit," sometimes called "Holy," is an imaginary being or influence from another realm. Setting aside, therefore, this class of spirits, I will select examples connected with man.

> Luke viii. 55.—Jesus "called, saying, Maiden arise. And her spirit (pneuma) returned, and she rose up immediately.
> Acts vii. 59.—And they stoned Stephen.....he saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit (pneuma).
> John iii. 8.—The wind (pneuma) bloweth where it listeth.....so is everyone that is born of the spirit (pneuma).

In the Greek the word pneuma is said to signify: "breath, life, soul, air, a gentle wind." As a matter of fact, pneuma was derived from the verb pneo, "I breathe": hence the word was given both to the breath and to some supposed force within all living persons which enabled them to breathe. When this breath or force had left the body, those from whom it had departed were dead. In the first of the passages quoted, Jesus is stated to have caused this indispensable self-acting energy to return. In the second passage, the breath or spirit was returned "to the Lord who gave it" (Eccl. xii. 7). In the third passage we have an example in which pneuma denotes "the wind," and another in which it is applied to an imaginary divine influence; but from Acts ii. 2, 4, this also appears to be wind. It is in the latter sense—as a holy wind—that the word most often appears in the New Testament. In the following example the pneuma is said to be "troubled" and "refreshed":—

> John xiii. 21.—Jesus was "troubled in the spirit."
> 2 Cor. vii. 13.—Paul says of Titus: "his spirit hat been refreshed."

These two passages refer to conditions of the mind. In the first case, a thought had arisen that things were not progressing favourably, which is called being "troubled in spirit"; in the second case, a feeling of relief was experienced upon hearing that things were not so bad as had been thought—which sensation is spoken of as being "refreshed in spirit." In neither case had "the spirit" anything to do with the matter referred to in the context.

We have seen that the original meaning of psyche was "life," and that of pneuma "breath or a gentle wind"; but as the years rolled on the two words were employed in several other senses. With the latter I have nothing to do. The primary signification of psyche and pneuma are sufficient to show that the so-called "soul" and "spirit" in man are purely materialistic, and could not by any possibility survive the death of the body. To say, then, that the life and breath could be separated from the body and live after death is to utter pure, unadulterated nonsense.

If there be an immortal part of the body, it must have the power to think and reason, and to feel that it was a complete personality in itself. Now, according to the New Testament, there really is an internal part of the human organism which is the seat of the will, the understanding, the moral sense, the affections, desires, and passions. This great internal organ is the heart, which was known to contain four cavities, in which it was conceived were stored up all kinds of thoughts imaginable. The latter were called the "abundance" or "treasure" of the heart (Luke vi. 45; Matt. xii. 34, 35), from which store might be brought forth any of the thoughts at will. In the case of the righteous these thoughts were all good, in that of the ungodly they were all evil. The following are examples:—

> Matt. ix. 4.—Wherefore think ye evil in your heart?
> Matt. xii. 34.—Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.
>
> Luke ii. 19.—Mary kept all these sayings, pondering them in her heart.
>
> Luke iii. 15.—Men reasoned in their hearts concerning John.
>
> Luke xxiv. 38.—Wherefore do reasonings arise in your heart?
>
> Acts viii. 22.—Repent.....perhaps the thoughts of thy heart may be forgiven thee.
> Rom. x. 10.—For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness.
> Heb. iv. 12.—To discern the thoughts and intents of the heart.

The foregoing are but a few of the many passages which might be cited. We are also told that "the heart was glad" or that there was "sorrow in the heart," showing that this organ was the seat of those sensations. It may, of course, be said that these and all other references to the heart were merely metaphorical, and that we ourselves have in a large measure adopted the same manner of speaking. The latter statement is, no doubt, true; but we never could have done so had it not been believed in past times that everything stated in the New Testament was inspired, and therefore correct. But that the early Christians believed the heart was the seat of all thoughts, reasoning, and emotions is evident from the fact that the word employed is kardia, the common name for the material fleshly heart, and also because all the New Testament writers speak as if there could be no possible doubt upon the subject. Take the following, for instance, as an example:—

> Mark vii. 18-22.—Are ye so without understanding? Perceive ye not that whatsoever from without goeth into the man.....goeth not into his heart, but into his belly, and goeth out into the draught.....But from within, out of the heart of men proceed evil thoughts, fornications, thefts, murders, adulteries, covetings, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, railing, pride, foolishness.

There is nothing metaphorical here: the writer plainly refers to organs of the body—the stomach, the intestines, and the heart—and he undoubtedly believed that the feelings and desires which might result in the iniquities mentioned proceeded from the heart. The Hebrews in Old Testament times had the same ideas respecting that organ, which were handed down without being questioned. The ancient Assyrians, however, believed that the seat of all sensations and emotions was the liver; so in their writings we hear of the latter organ rejoicing, or being grieved or troubled. In the passage last quoted, Jesus is represented as endeavouring to prove to his disciples that the heart was the seat of all the mental faculties; of this there can be no doubt whatever. In this connection it should also be remembered that prior to the year 1628 not a single medical man in all Christendom knew what was the real function of the heart.

A Fable.

ONCE upon a time, a child was born. It was nameless, but its father's name was Eternal Right, and its mother's name was Instinct. In its right hand was a cluster of grapes; in its left a harp with only one string. In its hair were almond blossoms, and over its head a golden nimbus shone faintly.

Now, having been born in a respectable land where everyone is respectable (yes, you may smile), and where all are naked under their clothes, as was befitting, the child had to be christened. Therefore, a number of people took the child and set out on journey to a church. The walls of the church were made of the golden pollen from bees' legs; for the roof violet petals were used; and, would you believe it? segments of a rainbow were used instead of mortar. I think that now you would like to know who were the people who went with the child. Well, I will tell you. In the company there was a mystical Atheist, a man who sang pretty songs, a smiling woman who said something about heaven being near the hearth; and—oh bother, everyone was there who did not have locks on their doors and did not mind whether you wore low heels or high heels. To me they cried, "Come with us." But I replied, "No; I cannot. I am busy trying to explain the universe in my prospective book on the game of 'Tiddley Winks, or what a little Ignorance governs the World.' Call him," I shouted, "Tosspot or Tinklenob."

So they went to the church, and the Friar took the child in his arms. "What shall we name him?" he asked. Before there was time for an answer the infant was transformed into a torch. The Friar ran like hell, and has not been seen since. The smiling woman grasped the torch, which did not burn her, as she had had dealings with worse things than fire, and they are matters which I must not talk about in a fable. "God bless my soul!" said the mystical Atheist, as he brushed a fly off his nose. The man who sang pretty songs laughed, right down from his mouth to the tip of his toes, and they all agreed that the name of the torch should be Reason.

THE mind sufficiently virile to detach itself from the local conventions of commonplace existence and resist the stream of mediocrity is rare. This natural docility of the normal mind, intensified by the daily deluge of fatuous newspapers, creates a mental atmosphere in society which is hostile to all ideas outside the most elementary and obvious manifestations of life; and absorbs every cunning tyranny and sly despotism with an almost incredible eagerness. No lie is too great or too fantastic for the normal mind, providing that the lie is based upon the continued acceptance of commonplace ideas and conventional thought.

The evolving of character in such a diseased environment where servile emotions must predominate, is almost an impossibility. By character it is not intended to convey the orthodox conception. The mechanical devotion to a mechanical and joyless labour; the feverish slavery of body and mind to the immoralities of modern business and trade do not involve the necessity of character at all; they demand the lifeless infallibility of the electric clock. "Character" which submits without even a minimum of mental protest to the insistent demands of modern conventional ideas, either in religion, art, or in commerce, cannot correctly be termed character—it is inertia, indifference to the reality of life, contentment, mental vacuity, the cessation of growth, and death.

The modern civilized world is peopled with that type of devitalized individual whose mental and intellectual qualities have never even commenced to function. You can do very little or nothing for them, or with them. Everything seems to fail. Religion, Art, Science, Philosophy, Freethought, Mysticism, Materialism. It seems that the whole gamut of human thought is entirely unable to aid or develop the normal civilized brain.

The capture of Jerusalem by the British has quite naturally given rise to a lot of pious "gush" in some of the newspapers, and later we quite expect columns concerning the feelings of devotion with which the Christians, and Jews, and Atheists, and Agnostics, etc., which make up the Army, approached the "Holy City." Informed readers will smile, even though pious ones are moved to tears. And one thing we have observed is that our English papers are wisely discreet when dealing with the former conquests of Jerusalem, in their handling of the earlier Christian captures. Jerusalem has suffered more from the presence of Christians than from that of Mohammedans, and for hundreds of years they set Christians an example of tolerance and enlightenment.

Even modern Christians ought to feel grateful to the Mohammedans for one thing. Until the War broke out they provided, at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, a guard of soldiers, for the purpose of keeping peace between Christians when they came to worship at the grave of their Saviour. This form of entertainment between brethren in the Christian faith was suspended when Europe offered a wider theatre for the exhibition of their activities.

At the Home Ruridiaconal Council, the Rev. W. S. Flynn read a paper on "The Difficulties of the Church with regard to Children." We admit that this is a difficulty. There is the difficulty of getting hold of them, and there is the difficulty of keeping them afterwards. And there is the increasing difficulty of inducing parents to hand over their children to the manipulation of these organized kidnappers.

The Young Men's Christian Association is nothing if not modest. A Christmas appeal on its behalf for half a million of money has been made. Christian finance is more flourishing nowadays than when the Founder was sold for thirty shillings.

The newspapers have been publishing bold headlines concerning the death of the Rev. Alfred Brandon, of Chelsea, who died at the age of 101. What would those editors have done had they had to record the deaths of Adam, Methuselah, or Noah, who each lived nine centuries?

Defenders of the Design Argument will note with pleasure that the wife of a labourer at Mold, Flintshire, has given birth to four children, and that the quartette are living.

The Evening News is to be congratulated upon having discovered and engaged the services of the newest and most unique of all Christian apologists. Week after week Mr. Machen's contributions become more and more astounding and bewildering, and there must be boundless rejoicing in the camp of the orthodox. He began by declaring that we live "in and by and through mysteries." Then he affirmed that "to remove the veils of enigmas is the office of religion." His next statement was that religion is irrational and "entirely incredible." The Faith is the supreme mystery, and yet its office is to remove the veils.

Mr. Machen's last article, which appeared in the Evening News for December 7, surpasses all its predecessors in irrationality. This is the seventh article on "God and the War," and for a wonder the War is at last alluded to thus:—

> We say we do not understand how an Almighty and most merciful Father can allow the abomination of the War—can allow any pain or anguish of body or spirit. But have we the slightest ground for expecting to understand this or any other problem?

We unhesitatingly answer that question in the negative; and we maintain that we have no more ground for believing in "an Almighty and most merciful Father." Mr. Machen admits this himself when he tells us that even God is nothing but an hypothesis. Surely, apologetics never fell to such depths of absurdity before.

Mr. Machen seems incapable of stating a case accurately. For example, he says that it is idle for a man "to declare himself a purely rational creature, living in a rational, demonstrable universe"; but no Freethinker worth his salt ever even imagined that he lived in a rational universe. Our claim is that we are rational beings, trying our best to understand and utilize the chemical and physical laws under which we live. Mr. Machen also asserts that Atheism is "the confession that there is no riddle of the Universe." A falser statement was never made. Science takes the riddle for granted, and has for its only aim the solution of the same by observation and experiment. Really, Mr. Machen is either wickedly trifling with a great subject, or else mischievously pulling the legs of credulous readers.

Although there are many hundreds of Church of England army chaplains, the result of their work is questionable. "Seventy per cent. of the men at the front do not know that the Church has a message at all," says Dr. Lyttleton.

The Rev. W. M. Davidson, vicar of Christ Church, Tottenham, dropped dead whilst acting as referee in a hockey match. There is no moral.

Gipsy Smith has written an article with the title "Behind the Firing Line." Many of the clergy are behind the rectory door.

"The chief fault of the Conscientious Objector is to have taken Jesus and His Gospel too seriously," says the Rev. Thomas Phillips. Most Christians jocularly regard the Prince of Peace as the God of Battles.

Mr. Macpherson, M.P., stated recently in the House of Commons that there were 2,082 Army chaplains serving abroad. As these gentlemen rank as officers, we may estimate their pay at £300 a year each, and the total represents an annual outlay of £624,000. The rest of the Black Army is exempted from military service.

An Anti-Semitic bias seems to be one of the many attractive features of our amusing contemporary, the New Witness. There is nothing to be ashamed of in a bias. We are willing to admit that we have an anti-Christian bias. We are not certain that the Brothers Chesterton would be equally candid. They would probably dodge the question by telling us that some of their best friends are Jews. We cannot see that there can be any reasonable objection to a bias if the criticism it prompts is well-informed as well as witty and malicious. Our English Jews, more particularly those of politics, finance, and commerce, have their weak spots, which are fair enough game for ridicule. You cannot pay them a greater compliment than to mistake them for blue-blooded Englishmen; and if by any means they acquire an old English surname, they prize it more than platinum, gold, or precious stones. It may be a subtle compliment paid to the qualities of the British race when Samuel becomes Montagu; Cohen, Palgrave; and Levy is disguised as Lee. We could point out other idiosyncrasies less amusing in the English Jew; but, no doubt, the editor of the New Witness has already noted them in his friends.

While we have no occasion here to dispute seriously Mr. Chesterton's knowledge of the social and mental habits of English Jews, we are afraid we cannot but think that he and his readers are amusingly ignorant of many things they ought to know before they abuse the foreign Jews. A week or so ago we noticed that a Mr. Ashton had ventured, presumably for the first time in his life, so far East as Houndsditch, which, as everyone knows, is only Semi-Semitic. Yet even on the fringe of Jewry he had made a wonderful discovery. We can imagine how great would have been his success if he had had the courage to voyage so far as Brick Lane. He returned West with his marvellous addition to the world's knowledge verified by laborious studies in the British Museum, and then amazed Mr. Chesterton and the guileless readers of the New Witness with an article called "The Truth about Yiddish."

What, then, is the truth about Yiddish? It is really no more than what every schoolboy in the East End knows. Who, except the Editor of the New Witness and his readers, needs to be told that Yiddish is only the English form of Judisch = Jewish; that the basis of the language is German; that, although written in Hebrew characters, the percentage of Hebrew words is only small, say about ten per cent.? All this is damning evidence of the pro-German sympathies of the foreign Jew, he thinks in German, of course, in spite of the fact that he can neither speak nor understand literary or spoken German, and that no German can understand him. How did Mr. Ashton come by his great discovery? Probably some more intelligent Anti-Semite told him that Yiddish was, of course, Judæo-German, and then our truth-loving young gentleman rushes to the British Museum Reading Room, finds nothing under Yiddish in the ordinary encyclopædia, misses, in his feverish hurry, an informative article under this heading in an American encyclopædia, but comes across what he wants in the Jewish Encyclopædia in a learned article by Professor Leo Wiener of Harvard. The amazing truth about Yiddish, as known to the New Witness, is nothing more than a few quotations from Professor Wiener, a fatuous suggestion that the Jew uses the Hebrew characters to disguise the Teutonic basis of the language, and a stupid sneer at the Jews having an encyclopædia of their own, as if none of us had heard of or used The Catholic Encyclopædia. It is, perhaps, too much to expect an Anti-Semite to learn Yiddish; but if he makes inquiries, he will find that it is not a mere jargon, but a language with more "than mere historical importance, grammatically constructed, and possessing something of the straightforward word-arrangement of English." We do not want to discourage Mr. Ashton. We hope he will make many excursions to the real East End Jewry, and we hope his future discoveries will be not less amusing and instructive than his Truth about Yiddish.

Witchcraft, says the Daily Express, "still flourishes apace in Germany." But we understood that Germany had given up everything Christian, and was devoted to freethinking and Materialism! As a matter of fact, witchcraft "flourishes" in all parts of Christendom—Britain included. And look at the trade in charms that is carried on. The truth is that in every country in the world there are large numbers of people who are little removed—mentally—from savages. And the clergy everywhere make full use of the circumstance.

Immediately after reading the above statement concerning Germany, we came across an account of stones and pieces of rock that were lifted from the ground during the digging of a dug-out at Embrook Manor, Cheriton. Our readers will not have forgotten the Angels of Mons, and, later, the angels seen at Grays, Essex. How much removed are the people who believe these stories from the mental conditions amid which witchcraft flourishes? And when we have done with these affairs, what are we to say of the beliefs that go to make up orthodox Christianity? Is there any difference in quality between these and the other beliefs noted above? Hobbes' statement remains eternally true; religion is superstition allowed, superstition is religion not allowed.

"Romance is perpetually illustrated in the history of the Church," says the Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell. Fiction also has its place in the same history.

A publisher announces a new publication with the alluring title, The Tree of Heaven. That tree should look well in the golden streets.

A newspaper paragraph states: "The death has occurred of Captain Robert Hoare, an Elder Brother of the Trinity." A cynic might add that this makes the tangle of the Trinity still more complicated.

Sir Robert Perks condemns State public-houses on the ground that they would be rivals of the Sunday-schools and the Church Institutes. Yet the alternatives are between spirituous and spiritual intoxication.

We have said the same thing times out of number, but we are none the less pleased to find it re-echoed in the columns of the Daily Mail. It is from a Reading correspondent of that paper:—

> My work in life takes me a great deal into various parts of the country, and as I go about I am surprised at the growing number of people who, like myself, are Churchmen, and who are saying that "the Church is one of the biggest failures of the war."

The Church has given neither effective help towards winning the War nor reasonable help towards creating a frame of mind for making future wars impossible. It has shown all the timidity and indecision of the opportunist; and that type of person, if he makes no deadly enemies, makes no warm friends.

A movement is on foot to close all public-houses, picture palaces, etc., on January 6—the "national" day of prayer. We would suggest that a more effective way of filling the Churches on that day would be to make abstention from church an offence under the D.O.R.A., or giving a pound of sugar to everyone who attends. Where humbug is in evidence, bribery or force seem not unfit accompaniments. And it is in line with Christian tradition for parsons to call God's attention to the worshippers in church—many of whom are there because they can't get either into a "pub" or a picture palace.

At a conference held at Birmingham of representatives of the Church of England, the Roman Catholic Church, and the Free Church Council, a protest was made against proposed interference with the present marriage laws. It is highly significant that the proposed extension of divorce, which will chiefly benefit the working classes, should have united these three ecclesiastical opponents.

While worshipping in Merthyr Catholic Church, John Killaher died suddenly. Had he been attending a Freethought lecture, there would have been an awful warning to others.

Many a true word is spoken in jest. Also the deepest truths are sometimes uttered by children. According to an educational periodical, a boy in a school examination wrote as follows in an essay on the Japanese: "Until recently the Japanese used to fight with bows and arrows, but now they are equipped with the dreadful arms of Christians."

The Prussianizing of the nation goes on apace, and even the Churches are imitating the officials. The National Free Church Council is considering a scheme of home visitation. In each district "Church messengers" will undertake to call at the houses, especially those of "wives, widows, and dependents of soldiers and sailors." We hope that these busy-bodies will meet with the reception they deserve.

A "Y.M.C.A. synagogue" is an unexpected feature of the camp of the Jewish Regiment stationed in the West Country declares the Daily News, and adds that the colonel is "an Irishman and a Christian." It looks as if the age of miracles had not passed.

The Bishop of Southwark will introduce a Bill in the House of Lords to close St. Olave's Church, Tooley Street, London. Is this a symptom of the long-promised revival of religion?

Rev. R. F. Horton, Dean Inge, Rev. Principal Garvie, and a number of others have just issued a manifesto declaring that only Christianity can bring healing to the world, and suggesting that "belligerents and neutrals" should meet together in prayer. We haven't much doubt that if the people of the different countries could meet together, the War might be soon brought to a close. But it will need something better than prayer to either bring them together or to produce good from the meeting. It is lack of sense, not want of prayer, that is mainly responsible for the present trouble. Religion did not prevent the trouble occurring, and it will certainly not put an end to it. And what is the matter with the piety of Germany? It is as Christian as any other country in the War, and more Christian than some.

Referring to the Romanes lectures, the Daily News points out that Dr. Romanes was, "for the greater part of his life," an Agnostic, "but he died an extreme High Churchman." It did not add, however, that Romanes change of opinion was preceded by a lingering and terrible illness.

Canon B. H. Streeter, writing on "Immortality," says he would "not be satisfied by a future life from which the element of kindly humour was excluded." The worthy canon will have some difficulty in finding what he wants in the religion of the Man of Sorrows.

Some pious folk assert that Providence imposed the world-war on account of our "sins," but there are few signs that the War is improving morals. At Kent Assizes in one day thirteen cases of bigamy were dealt with.

Dr. Charles Sarolea, in his new book, German Problems and Personalities, denounces "the poison of Lutheranism," which he considers has aided and abetted Prussian militarism. Yet the dear clergy will insist that the Prussians are "Atheists."

The Sydney Bulletin recently referred to the Kaiser as "The man who slew his God." Before the War religious folk professed to admire the Kaiser's piety.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

January 6, Manchester; January 13, London; January 20, Southampton; January 27, Swansea; February 3, Birmingham; February 17, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

C. M.—Of course, it is not "business," in the commercial sense, to sell pamphlets at cost price, and make no charge for labour, etc. But it is excellent business from the point of view of propaganda, and it is for that the Freethinker exists.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—From a Brother O. A. S., £1; B. Jenkins (Johannesburg), £1; P. Morris (Bechuanaland), 5s.; R. Viedge (South Africa), £1 1s.; A. Cayford, 10s.

A CORRESPONDENT is very anxious to possess a copy of Shelley's Refutation of Deism. This was issued as a pamphlet a few years back, and if any of our readers would care to part with his copy, will he please let us know.

T. HERLOTT.—Pleased to have so hearty an appreciation of the Freethinker from a friend of Charles Bradlaugh. Your order has received attention from our shop-manager.

R. L. (Plymouth).—We should ourselves like to more frequently deal with new books that are of interest to Freethinkers. But there are so many other things that need attention, and we have only 16 pages—and 24 hours per day. Morley's Recollections was one of the things that could not be put off.

H. KEANE.—We have very pleasant memories of Blackburn. Why not see what can be done to revive the Movement in that town?

F. DORRINGTON.—Something on the same subject may have been done, but not this pamphlet. The Mother of God is a quite new pamphlet.

S. LONDON BRANCH N. S. S.—Reports of meetings must have the signature of the writer attached, who should be an official of the Branch.

W. M.—Glad to see the letters in the Essex Chronicle. Such communications do much good to the cause.

WE are reminded by a correspondent that the "Acid Drop" in our issue for December 2, reading "Catholic Game. Day to Heaven," should have read "Way to Heaven."

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We have space to do no more than barely acknowledge here the response to our appeal, on behalf of the Committee, for funds to discharge the balance of the liabilities incurred in connection with the fight with the L.C.C. A full list of acknowledgments to date appears in another column. All our correspondents agree it is a great victory, and we hope the Council will be content to leave it as it is. If not, we shall all just have to buckle to again. The entire sum to be raised is between £80 and £100, and this we hope to see accomplished in the course of a week or two.

There were two splendid audiences at Glasgow to listen to Mr. Cohen's lectures on Sunday last. The hall was comfortably filled in the forenoon and crowded in the evening. The audiences followed both lectures with the keenest appreciation, and no lecturer ought to expect more than that. There is a prospect of a real forward movement being initiated from Glasgow in the near future, and the West of Scotland will thus take its part in the new advance of Freethought that is taking place all over the country.

Travelling to and from Glasgow takes up practically the whole of Saturday and Monday, and, with Sunday on the platform, a great hole is made in the week. A number of letters remain, in consequence, undealt with this week. Correspondents will, we have no doubt, appreciate the difficulty, and excuse the delay. As it is, a deal of the writing in this week's issue has had to be done in the train going to and from Scotland. The compositors are the chief sufferers by this, as it makes our "copy" a little less legible than usual.

It seems there is now a chance—even though a small one—of Mr. Fisher's Education Bill coming before Parliament at an early date. In the circumstances we should like Freethinkers all over the country to see what can be done in connection with Trades Unions, labour groups, and other local bodies to get a resolution passed in favour of Secular Education, and to see that the same is forwarded to the Minister of Education. We gave this advice some time back, and some of our readers acted on it, with good results. The resolution should move along three lines: (1) The long-standing quarrel over the control of the schools by the clergy, and its obstructive effect on our educational policy; (2) The manifest injustice of compelling all citizens to support the religious opinions of one section of the community; (3) The duty of the modern State to maintain an attitude of strict neutrality with regard to all forms of religious or anti-religious opinion. We hope Freethinkers will take this counsel seriously to heart. We must clear the clergy out of the schools if our work is to bear its full fruits.

Freethought papers, which have always a struggle to exist under the most favourable conditions, naturally feel the War pressure acutely. Our gallant contemporary, the New York Truthseeker, announces that it is compelled to raise its subscription price from $3 to $3.50. This is owing to the increased wages of compositors, etc., and to an advance of 60 per cent. in the price of paper. The Truthseeker is dirt cheap at the advanced price, and we do not think that any American Freethinker—or English one either—will begrudge the advance.

In this country the paper shortage is becoming more acute, and the price is rising week by week. It is now nearly 600 per cent. above pre-War prices. But the shortage is bothering us even more than the price. The latter may be got over somehow; but we can't print without paper, and early in the new year we may have to take a fresh review of the situation. But we shall put off making any alteration so long as we can. The Freethinker is one of the few papers that has continued unchanged, and we should like to keep it so during what we hope are the closing months of the War.

Manchester friends will please note that Mr. T. F. Palmer, whose articles will have made his name familiar to all Freethinker readers, lectures twice at Manchester to-day (Dec. 16). The afternoon lecture is at 3 o'clock, subject: "The Birth and Death of Worlds"; evening, at 6.30: "The Antiquity of Man." We hope to hear that the Co-operative Hall (Downing Street) is well filled, if not crowded, on both occasions.

One of our friends at the Front writes Miss Vance:—

> We had a parade on Sunday morning, and were addressed by the Assistant Chaplain-General to the Forces. Knowing your horror of war, I feel sure you will be delighted to know that the A.C.G. promises that Christianity will banish war in the future. He was very emphatic about it. Unfortunately, we were not invited to ask questions, so I was unable to find out why it (Christianity) had always bolstered up war in the past. Neither could I understand why its leaders, from Benedict XII. to the Archbishop of Canterbury, seem to have made no protest at the beginning. Indeed, that brilliant intellect, the Bishop of London, called it a "holy war" the other day. To do the A.C.G. justice, he didn't do that: he termed it "a hellish business": but he thought it wiser not to go into the matter of proving that Christianity could stop it. Or perhaps he thought that was a little too deep for us.

He also said that he knew most of us didn't believe the Bible, but rather had some idea of evolution at the back of our heads. He didn't attempt to disprove our ideas, but he went on to make a few nasty remarks about "those brutes of the R.P.A." I felt horribly guilty then, because in my pocket reposed the Freethinker.

Most of the men took the Daily Mail to read in the back benches, while waiting for the service to follow, of course, and I took the Free. I refrained, because I found him so interesting. However, all is well, now that we know that a sans-war future is assured to humanity.

Mr. P. M. Killop writes us from Cape Town:—

I have noticed with very much pleasure that you have lately had several correspondents from this part of the world. I have been in this country some thirty-six or thirty-seven years, and have travelled all over it. I think that I may fairly claim to know a little about its people, both Dutch and those born in other countries than this. In almost every part—more particularly in Johannesburg and Cape Town—there has been for the last ten years, at least, a pretty vigorous Freethought campaign carried on. Of course, I know very well that the work done would appear to be very small compared with the work carried on in such centres of huge populations as London, Paris, or Berlin; but taking the small number of even our largest towns, and the shifting nature of their inhabitants into consideration, the few Freethought stalwart residents here have done wonders. A few years ago in Johannesburg there was a very strong Freethought organization which held meetings regularly every Sunday evening with great success, and distributed large quantities of Freethought literature. These meetings were well attended, and had some very able lectures. I have forgotten most of their names. After the lectures the meetings were open for questions and discussion, and we used to have a real good time. But, alas, the meetings gradually died a natural death—not from lack of interest or enthusiasm—but through the dispersion of its members. That is the real cause of the failure of all organizations in this country. The settled population is so very small. Here to-day and in Pretoria, Durban, or some other town to-morrow. This, I believe, has its advantages as well as its disadvantages. Your real Freethinker is always at work, no matter where he may be. I call to mind one man—a Frenchman, named Strauss—one of the first to leave here for Europe when this horrible War started, and, poor fellow, one of the first to die for the France which he devotedly loved—carried on a Freethought campaign, almost unaided, in Cape Town for years with great success. Since then the work has been done by several others, including George Martin (who has also gone over to the great majority), and Messrs. Evans and Rafter. I sometimes put in a word or two, but I am now well on for seventy years of age, and, I suppose, am getting either tired or lazy, and do not feel equal to doing much outdoor speaking. There are not near enough copies of your paper find their way here I am perfectly sure ever so many more could be sold if they were available. There is plenty of literature in the shape of pamphlets and books which a few of us purchase, and, after reading, pass round, and in that way, I have no doubt, do a little good. I would like to tell you that I read every line of your paper. It is my weekly treat. No other paper that I get has anything like the attraction for me that yours has.

We are quite sure from what we have learned that South Africa needs at present a capable organizer. Perhaps the man will arise one day. With regard to the Freethinker, when the War is over, we hope to make arrangements for a more effective supply of the paper, both in South Africa and elsewhere—not forgetting the United States.

We have often complained of the Post Office; it is only just to give a word of praise when it is deserved. The other week we wrote an article at home, and posted it to the office. There was no indication inside the envelope, save the signature, that could lead to delivery. The letter did not turn up, and then we said things—particularly as we had to turn to on Tuesday afternoon (press day) and write a second article. After a time the letter arrived at the Freethinker office, and we then found that we omitted to address the envelope. Someone had "spotted" its destination, either through the signature or the nature of the article. So we again said things—about ourselves.

(Concluded from p. 780.)

THE Nebular Hypothesis, originally propounded by Kant and other thinkers, and subsequently amplified by Laplace and Herschel, has since been subjected to a searching criticism by a succession of scientists. From this ordeal it has emerged purified and strengthened, and has now attained "a degree of probability amounting to proof." The Nebular Theory assumes that the space now occupied by the solar system was, at a period immeasurably remote, filled up by a rotating spheroid of high tenuity and tremendous heat. This nebulous haze was the probable outcome of the collision of two previously separate bodies. The stupendous heat thus generated having gradually radiated into space, the glowing gases cooled, and shrank into a nucleus now represented by the sun.

Although astronomers and astro-physicists may differ concerning the precise details of these phenomena, they remain practically unanimous in their adhesion to some form of Nebular doctrine. They all take for granted a natural genesis and development of all the starry systems of the universe. Ball, Newcomb, and other eminent astronomers espoused the brilliant hypothesis that, for a time, the tendency on the part of the nebula to contract was counterbalanced by centrifugal force, but ultimately this disruptive force gained the ascendancy, and the outer region of the nucleus became detached from the remainder of the sphere. Rings similar to the first were successively detached, and from these the planets and their moons were formed. Plateau's fascinating experiment proves that by rotating a sphere of oil in a mixture of spirit and water this phenomenon may be repeated on a minor scale.

Many of the phenomena displayed in the solar system lend strong support to the Nebular explanation. For example, the planets lie much in the same plane. Their orbital and axial revolutions proceed in the same direction, thus providing numerous coincidences which are hardly accidental, the chances against which are many millions to one.

> Again, the rate of cooling would of course follow the size: a small body cools more rapidly than a large one. The moon is cold and rigid; the earth is solid at the surface, but intensely hot within; Jupiter and Saturn, which are immensely larger, still retain much of their original heat, and have a much lower density than the earth.

The earth's rotation has fashioned it into the form of an orange. In other words, our planet is an oblate spheroid flattened at the poles. Its outline is also influenced by contraction caused by a gradual lowering of its temperature. When the earth had cooled down sufficiently, a thin crust appeared on its surface which slowly increased in thickness as the centuries rolled away. The present thickness of our planet's crust is still a matter of conjecture. But in the light of the fact that the density of the globe is about five and a half times that of water, its interior must be extremely dense. For various weighty reasons many men of science have concluded that the earth is solid throughout, and possesses the elasticity of steel, a substance which is vastly more elastic than any other solid, even india rubber. Other scientific experts, however, favour Sir George Darwin's contention that the greater inequalities of the earth's surface require the support of a crust as rigid as that of granite, and extending to a depth of 1,000 miles only.

In any case, the constant cooling of the earth was certain to mould its crust into giant folds. The distribution of continents and oceans appears at the first glance to be so irregular that one might reasonably conclude that even the leading features of our planet's surface could scarcely be explained on any general principles. Deeper reflection, however, reveals the existence of certain peculiar features of the earth's configuration. There are the three main oceans—the Pacific, Indian, and Atlantic, with the lesser Arctic Sea. There exist also three huge land masses—North and South America, Africa—Europe, Asia—Australia, with a smaller Antarctic continent. It is true that Europe and Asia form a continuous land surface, but there are cogent reasons for considering them as separate continents. There lies a profound depression to the east of the Urals, and a slight lowering of the land-level would submerge the soil in the Caspian and Black Sea regions northwards to the Arctic Ocean. As Green insisted, the three chief continents have all been carved across by the hungry waves—Australia—Asia by the Sunda Straits, America by the Mexican Gulf, Europe—Africa by the Mediterranean. Moreover, each land area tends eastwards to the south. Nearly all South America is situated to the east of the Northern continent, while similar phenomena occur in South Africa and Australia.

Obviously, in a spinning sphere, its different parts would revolve concordantly, but as its continents emerged, the northern land masses, in consequence of their increased distance from the earth's centre, would revolve with a diminished and insufficient velocity. Therefore, it is claimed, there would occur "a tendency to torsion, giving rise to a line of rupture between the north and south, and carrying the Southern lands somewhat to the east. This consideration may account for the remarkable depression which runs round the world, forming the Gulf of Mexico, the Mediterranean, the Persian Gulf, and the sea between Asia and Australia."

The Arctic Ocean was long regarded as a comparatively shallow sea, but recent investigations, notably those of Nansen, prove that it is very deep. It is now estimated that the oceans cover three-fourths of the earth's surface, but this statement conveys an extremely inadequate idea of its vast volume of water. But this vastness becomes apparent when we remember that the average elevation of the continents is about 1,000 feet only, while the average depth of the oceans is probably 13,000; so that if our seas were spread evenly over the globe's surface, their depth would exceed 8,000 feet.

Although our earth has been the theatre of enormous changes in the distribution of land and water during the course of its protracted career, still, should the foregoing hypothesis prove sound, its chief protuberances must have persisted from primitive geological times. This theory has found eminent advocates, but many geologists of the first rank agree with Dr. Gregory's contention that the early aspects of our continents have long "been obliterated by the changes of geological times." Or, in the language of the famous Hutton: "The ruins of an older world are visible in the present state of our planet." hemisphere is very striking, whatever its causes may be.

The marked inclination displayed by continental areas to project southwards occurs in the case of India, South Africa, Southern America, and other regions. Again, several peninsulas show at their extremity an island or island group. Sicily stands near the southern end of Italy. Greenland has at its extremity an island chain. The peninsula of Alaska terminates with a group of isles. Lying off the extremity of India, we find Ceylon; the Terra del Fuego isles are adjacent to South America, while Australia ends southwards in Tasmania or Van Diemen's Land.

The preponderence of the ocean in the Southern Avebury argued that folded mountains arose from a diminution in the earth's diameter, and therefore "every great circle must have participated equally in the contraction." The earth's mountains running east and west would, therefore, broadly speaking, counterbalance those ranging from north to south. Now, the principal mountain masses of the Old World run more or less from east to west, while the tendency of the American mountains is to travel north and south. The one series of elevations thus appears to balance the other to a very material degree. Moreover, in the Northern hemisphere the mountain chains range east and west; for instance, the Pyrenees, Carpathians, Alps, and Himalayas; while the leading elevations of the Southern hemisphere extend north and south. This is true of the African ridge, the Andes, and others.

Lord Avebury also contended that the north and south directions of the mountains in the Southern hemisphere, combined with the presence of the vast ocean in the same region, suffice to explain the existence of southern promontories. Sir Francis Galton, however, replied that no conceivable accumulation of water could possibly give us promontories with a northerly direction. As a matter of fact, nearly all our northern promontories point south. But Avebury's rejoinder to this objection is very suggestive. "No such prepondérance in the northern hemisphere would give us northerly pointing promontories, because there the great folds run not from north to south, but from east to west."

The map plainly shows the mountains stretching through Europe in a general east and west direction, but the fact is less apparent that, commencing with the Pyrenees, and passing through the Central Alps, the Carpathians, the Caucasus, and the chain of Elbruz to the Hindoo-Koosh, we at last reach the elevated plateau of Pamir, which towers at a height of 15,000 feet. Resuming our journey, we arrive at the still loftier tracts of Tibet—giant plains which exceed in altitude the greatest Alpine summits. These elevated plains lie enclosed between the stupendous heights of the Himalayas to the south and the Kuen-Lun range on the north. From this region the mountain fortresses ramify into other ranges until they finally reach the Pacific Ocean at Behring's Strait. These far-flung elevations form the backbone of the Eastern World, just as the mountain ranges of the Western Continent form the backbone of America.

In our own Alps the last important upheaval elevated the Mont Blanc range, and although at present no considerable changes are occurring there, the occasional earth movements which invade the Alpine area indicate that the processes of mountain-building are still in operation.

Writers and Readers.

THE Editor has been kind enough to invite me to write a monthly article, wherein I am to talk about writers and their readers, and any other bookish matters of interest to Freethinkers. I am thus given plenty of scope, since of all people, Freethinkers are the most catholic in their tastes. Preferences we all have, undoubtedly; but, I trust, few or no exclusions where good literature is concerned. Unlike our Catholic friends, we have no Index expurgatorius; or, at least, we have no black list of the world's greatest books. What all of us can do, and what a few of us have done, is to draw up for ourselves a list of books that are really bad. My own list is becoming a rather long one, and one day I intend to print a short guide to the worst books in our language, which, I trust, will delight and perhaps, surprise, my literary friends. But here I shall avoid, if possible, any reference to worthless books, except when they are necessary for the pointing of a moral. My concern will be to recommend books that I have myself found valuable, or suggestive in thought or style, or in both. Another thing I want to say is, that I shall be glad to consider any relevant comments my readers may be inclined to make, if they will put themselves to the trouble of writing to me in care of the Editor. Many things that appear difficult turn out to be easy enough when once you have altered your point of view, when you try hard to see a book from some other person's angle. My aspiration is to be a sort of literary father-confessor, to absolve you from your sins of commission or omission, to set you, with your own assistance, on the narrow path of literary rectitude.

Let me give an example! An earnest young friend of mine once went in fear of damnation, because, with the best intentions, he could not bring himself to believe in George Meredith. Mr. Foote, he knew, had a sort of discipular veneration for the master, and this knowledge did but serve to make his own want of faith all the more glaring. In the end he came to me for ghostly advice. What could he do to be saved? I found, as I had shrewdly expected, that he had approached Meredith in the wrong way. He had been told that the novels were among the finest pictures of modern life, and, having no guide, he had begun with The Shaving of Shagpat. He could make neither head nor tale of this somewhat difficult allegory; it was not what he had been led to expect. He then turned to One of our Conquerors, in which the story for the first hundred pages moves about as easily as a fly in a glue-pot. He tried again, being attracted by the title of Diana of the Crossways. Those who know that abortive attempt at epigrammatic brilliance can imagine his feelings. I hardly think that Mr. Foote, with all his ardent will-to-believe could have stood such a strain upon his faith My earnest young friend, at my suggestion, began again; this time, with Evan Harrington, Harey Richmond, Rhoda Fleming, and the incomparable Richard Feverel. He is now a confirmed Meredithian, albeit with certain wise reservations on the score of the master's style and treatment in fiction. To any writer the method of approach is important, to the more difficult it is everything.

Any reason is good enough which prompts us to read, or read again, a book that has something of a solid value; and the centenary of the birth or death of a writer, or the year of publication of a book, is generally felt to be a valid excuse for a permanent, or, at least, a passing, interest. It is certainly so for those of us who have no more than an average share of intellectual curiosity. The year just coming to a close has seen quite a number of centenaries of birth. Holyoake, G. H. Lewes, Jowett, and H. D. Thoreau, a sort of American blend of Rousseau and Carlyle, the "Bachelor of Nature," as Emerson called him—all these began their sublunary careers in 1817. Holyoake, one of the pioneers of popular Freethought, is known to most of us nowadays only by repute, and through his books. He seldom lectured, I believe, in the latter part of his life, and when he did, he gave us the impression of being out of touch with the militant methods of current Rationalism, of being just a little too anxious to show himself amiable to everybody. I don't think that he was consciously a "trimmer," but he seems to have prided himself on the number of his acquaintances among the kind of people who have little sympathy with advanced thought. Mr. McCabe's biography, which is, or ought to be, known to all Freethinkers, is padded out with complimentary letters from political bigwigs. Yet, in the main, it is a painstaking piece of work, if not quite critical enough, the subject being touched up after the manner of the popular painters of literary full-length portraits. Holyoake was a ready writer, with a natural turn for eloquence and picturesque phrasing. His volumes of recollections are entertaining and instructive. The best side of him is seen in his Trial of Theism, which was first published in 1857, and later, with revisions and additions, in 1877. I suggest that the Rationalist Press Association might do much worse than include it in their valuable series of cheap reprints.

Lewes (1817-1878), who was one of Holyoake's acquaintances, was, like him, a pioneer of Rationalism, but of a somewhat less popular kind. He was a versatile writer, with the born journalist's knack of putting difficult matter in an engaging way. His Biographical History of Philosophy is a good example of bright expository criticism from the anti-metaphysical or Positivist standpoint. The Problems of Life and Mind (1874-9) was the result of a lifetime's study of nature and mind, and he became, as he went on, more critical of the Comtean doctrine. As one of his admirers rightly says, "he rejected as 'metempirical' what lay beyond experience, but he would not, like Spencer, affect to derive comfort from the unknowable. He was one of the first to emphasize the importance of the social factor in the development of the mind." To literary criticism Lewes brought an excursive understanding and a well-developed taste unhampered by a preconceived system. His Life of Goethe, if supplemented by Carlyle, Scherer, and Dowden, is quite the best introduction to the poet and thinker. In a more popular manner, his little book on the Spanish Drama (1847)—Studies of Calderon and Lope de Vega—has long been a favourite of mine. It brings out in a luminous way the world of difference between the dramatic art of Catholic Spain and that of our freethinking Elizabethan England. The little book has not been reprinted, but copies are often to be met with on the stalls. Many of Lewes' essays are hidden away in the volumes of the more scholarly reviews of the time, and to the Fortnightly (Feb., 1872) we have to turn for the best all-round appreciation of Dickens ever written.

Benjamin Jowett (1817-1893) was Regius Professor of Greek, the Master of Balliol, and the authority on Plato for those of us who have little or no acquaintance with the language. He did a good deal to undermine the faith of the young men of what are called the ruling classes, who came under his influence, but I am afraid he would have had an epileptic fit if he had seen his name associated with those of Holyoake and Lewes. His paper on the "Interpretation of Scripture," in Essays and Reviews (1860), is said to have created a panic in the Church, and he came near losing his Oxford post. This taught him—if, indeed, he had much need of teaching, being at bottom a Pragmatist—the value of compromise, and henceforward undermined, rather than assaulted, the theological positions. His dictum that the "practice of divinity has permanently lowered the standard of truth," and many others equally severe, no doubt helped many to avoid a theological career. Jowett remained a priest of the Established Church, believing, as so many of its members do, in a Christianity without Christ. A witty and malicious caricature of his style and religious ideas will be found by the curious in Mr. W. H. Mallock's New Republic.

. . . . .

Thoreau (1817-1861) is as stimulating a writer as his friend Emerson; but his readers, unfortunately, are few and far between. Laziness seems to be the only excuse for not reading him, as "Walden," "A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers," and a volume of essays, poems, and letters are reprinted in the "Scott Library." His father was a phlegmatic and sober Frenchman, and his mother a volatile and voluble Scotswoman. It is small wonder that the son was given to paradox. Thoreau was a sickly boy, and no great lover of work, and his parents decided to send him to Harvard and make a pedagogue of him. But there was as little of the schoolmaster in Thoreau as in Hartley Coleridge. He left Harvard without a diploma which, he told the authorities, was not worth the five dollars he was asked to pay for it. In 1843 he began the experiment of living by himself in a shanty near Walden Pond, some few miles from Concord, Mass. His craving for the open air was perhaps less symptomatic of a lover of Nature than of bodily disease. A consumptive man needs a sanitorium and a liberal diet, not a draughty and damp hut, and a diet of nuts and ill-cooked or uncooked vegetables. Add to this all too "plain living" an abundant exercise of mind and body in the observation and recording of Nature's secrets, and no wonder the man was worn out at the early age of forty-four, when he was just at the height of his power to see, to think, and to enjoy. But to turn from the man to his books; if you have no more interest in Nature than she has in you, if a minute and poetical enumeration of her beauties means nothing to you—I do not suggest you are any the worse for this—you had better begin with the volume of essays. You will be an exceptionally dull person if you do not find on every page thoughts that throw a new light on existence, and paradoxes that leave you amused or angry. I promise you that you will not have one dull quarter of an hour. Try the essay on "Civil Disobedience," or the plea for John Brown, the tribute to the power of Carlyle. Read "Walking," or "The Landlord," if you prefer the flavour of the imaginative essay, the quality—albeit, with a Yankee twang—which you get in Hazlitt and Lamb. When you have got as much nutriment as you can digest out of the essays, go on to the other books; but make a point of never reading as a mere duty. It is better to read Mr. Garvice or Mr. Begbie with genuine enjoyment than it is to read Meredith or Mr. J. M. Robertson with a feeling that you are doing the right thing as a Freethinker, while really you are just bored.

Society News.

North London Branch.—On Sunday evening, owing to miserable weather, a small but very appreciative audience assembled to hear Mr. J. K. Harris's address on "Judaism and Christianity." Next Sunday Mr. Saphin will open the discussion: "Does the Solar Myth Explain the Bible?" This will be our last meeting in 1917. We re-open on January 6, 1918, and hope to continue until the end of March. We are very much gratified by the interest shown in our discussions and debates, and hope our friends will make them still more widely known. Our new syllabus will be ready next week, and I shall be delighted to send it to anyone forwarding me name and address.—H. V. Lane (Hon. Sec.), 29, Burton Street, King's Cross, W.C., 1.

Swansea Branch N. S. S.—The success of our autumn campaign has so pleased our members that they have decided on another "push" for the new year. The audiences throughout were good, and attentive. Little opposition was offered, which argues either "conversions" or the exercise of discretion. I take this opportunity of thanking all local friends and supporters for so well assisting in achieving the success attained. It is a source of joy and inspiration to all who are working in the front line, and has maintained the enthusiasm of members at a high level. We are looking forward to our next "offensive" with pleasurable excitement. We have made a good breach in the walls of pious Wales. —B. Dupree (Hon. Sec.), 12 Short Street, Swansea.

South London Branch N. S. S.—On Sunday we were favoured with a thoughtful lecture on "Essential Christianity," by Mr. F. A. Davies. Opposition was offered by a well-known Christian Evidence speaker, who, in the course of his opposition, threw out a challenge to a debate. Arrangements may be made to bring this about.—G. Shambrook.

GOD AND THE WAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Dear Sir,—In the Freethinker for November 25 there is a letter from Major C. Russell, in which he makes the following statement:—

> The law of "The Struggle for Existence and Survival of the Fittest" rules the world, and so long as that law holds good, so long must we go on fighting, and shall continue to turn this fair world into a hell more awful than anything dreamt of by Dante (p. 749)

In the first place, this law no more "rules" the world than does any other law. Like all other so-called laws of nature, it is no more than a mental summary of processes which have been observed to go on in nature. If such a law, or if such processes, did "rule," the world, I am afraid, there would be little hope for humanity in the direction of nations ever overcoming the habit of going to war in order to settle disputes. But it is a well-known fact that we can check and modify the processes of nature, and from that fact springs our hope of improvement in more than one direction. In the second place, as I pointed out some time ago in an article on "Biology, Economics, and War," the "struggle for existence" does not necessarily mean that men must continue to fight each other in order to settle their international disputes. "Struggle for Existence" will no doubt continue in some form or other, until the end of the world; but there may come a time when men will realize that, in order to reach a high standard of development, they will have to cease fighting each other, and turn their energies more and more in the direction of the struggle between man and non-human nature. Then it will be possible for international warfare to cease, and possible for the struggle for human existence to take on a more elevating form than that of inter-human slaughter.

I would also like to remark that the "Survival of the Fittest" does not always mean the survival of the best. This is especially so in war. Many of the best sons of Europe have already gone under; many have been mentally or physically disabled for life.

THE STRUGGLE FOR EXISTENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I should like to protest against half a dozen statements in Mr. G. O. Warren's article, "A Rich New World"—such, for instance, as:—

> Thrift, being the greatest of virtues, is based on the fallacy, etc.
>
> It is impossible to save wealth, because the moment any form of wealth is produced it must be consumed.
>
> Any general attempt to save wealth would lead to general stagnation of trade and widespread misery.
> The actual labour cost of thus (by book-keeping) financing the War should not have exceeded five millions annually.

The plain facts of existence prove each of the above statements to be utterly false. Then, further on, we find that our "artificial arrangements" are the cause of poverty, for "we see that there is not a single wild animal, if left alone by man, which cannot make a comfortable living." Here, in a single sentence, the proverbial tin hat is placed on the head of our devoted Darwin and all his followers, and Freethinkers are left without either God or Evolution.

Spencer advised the would-be sociologist to study biology; and the salient and universal law in the world of living things is the struggle for existence, due to the tendency to outstrip the means of subsistence. How few Freethinkers there are, however, with sufficient digestive apparatus to chuck up God, who really take the trouble to study Evolution from fundamental principles upwards.

It may be quite an arguable proposition that the nationalization of land and the abolition of a gold currency will bring about the millennium; but, in any case, such a theory cannot be bolstered up by misrepresenting ascertained biological truths. In conclusion, who is Mr. Arthur Kitson? He should write a short reply to Huxley's foolish essay on The Struggle for Existence in Human Society.

Meantime, we can be certain that, with a currency of gold, paper, brass, or none at all, so long as unrestricted multiplication goes on, the struggle will continue.

YOUNG COLQUHOUN.

HELL FIRE.

Those persons who terrify the young with the fear of hell and purgatory do not often enough get a chance of hearing what is thought of them by decent people. It is the merest cant for anyone who defends Drummond or Moody to pretend to be shocked at the German Kaiser or Bernhardi. If there is any man on earth who deserves the punishment described by Dank of being shut up in a red-hot coffin for all eternity, it is the man who talks to boys and girls of seventeen about being "lost." There are still a great many such preachers, and millions of human beings are still terrorized by them.—Extract from a letter to the "New Age."

Religions have seized upon the metaphysical faculties of men, which they first of all lame by the early instilling of their dogmas, respecting which they taboo all free and unprejudiced expressions of opinion, so that free research respecting the most important and interesting of problems, respecting man's existence itself, is in part directly forbidden, in part indirectly hindered, being rendered subjectively well-nigh impossible by mutilation, and thus the most noble of man's faculties lies in fetters.—Schopenhauer.

Obituary.

We regret to record the death of Mr. Charles Green, of 16 Balaam Street, Plaistow, E., which occurred on November 27, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. Mr. Green was a staunch Freethinker, who lived and died in the Secular faith. He was held in high esteem by all who knew him, and will be greatly missed as husband, father, and neighbour. He was buried at the East London Cemetery on Thursday, December 4, when a Secular Service was rendered at the grave-side, in the presence of sympathizing friends. We tender our sincere condolences to the bereaved family.—J. T. L.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Christmas in the Trenches.

For the fourth time in succession our soldiers are spending Christmas at death-grips with the enemy, while our sailors hold their less spectacular but more vital watch at sea. It is over three years since the Christian peoples of Europe flew at each other with a ferocity and a hatred to which no other war holds a parallel. But it is over 1900 years—if we follow Christian chronology and the Christian myth—since angels sang of the peace and goodwill born into the world through the incarnation of Jesus Christ. They sang it to a Pagan world, the civilized portion of which was mainly under the dominion of Rome. Pagan Rome was without the glorious Gospel of Christ, but it nevertheless came nearer establishing universal peace and a genuine liberty than any other empire has ever done. More; surrounded on all sides by barbarian enemies, it could in its greatest day keep the peace of the world with 400,000 soldiers. At present, Christmas will be celebrated with over 20,000,000 armed men engaged in actual warfare. The difference in the two figures is the measure of the success that has crowned the Christian Gospel. There is no need to discuss theories. The facts are there, damning and damnable. The nations of Europe Christianized have not learned to trust each other more than they did Pagan. Suspicion, hatred, greed, fear, tyranny, all those forces from which wars spring, have flourished under Christian domination. Christmas A.D. 1 with angels singing the inauguration of a new era of peace and brotherhood; Christmas 1917 with the Christian peoples of the world engaged in the most universal and the most bloodthirsty war the world has ever seen! Was there ever a more damnable failure in the whole history of mankind? * * *

Ammunition for "Infidels."

In The Outlook for Religion the Rev. W. E. Orchard warns his fellow-clergymen that the attitude of the Churches during the War, and their impotency to prevent the War, will be "collected and served up for purposes of infidel propaganda." Why should they not be? Look at the Churches in all the belligerent countries. Everywhere they have blindly followed the leads of their respective Governments. And one feels that had the decisions of these Governments been different to what they were, the support of the Churches would have been not less wavering. It is not upon a particular decision of the Churches that shrewd observers base their judgments, but upon the fact that whenever there is war, whether the cause that leads a country into war be clearly just or as clearly unjust, the support of the Churches is certain. "Theirs not to reason why"; their function to find a justification for whatever course the ruling powers adopt. In Germany, the militaristic Government has no stronger supporter than the Church. That is equally true of the Church's relation to the Government in this country. And when men see this, they realize that the conviction of the Church counts for nothing in arriving at an unprejudiced decision on the truth of a situation. The Christian Church is consistent only in one thing—in supporting anything and everything that will advance its own interests. No wonder Karl Marx said that the Church of England would rather sacrifice thirty-eight out of its thirty-nine Articles than lose one thirty-ninth of its income.

Christian Germany.

So far as we are concerned, we intend to see to it that the lesson of the War in relation to the Churches is well utilized. Freethinkers would be fools to allow so forceful a weapon to remain unused. Look at Germany! It was, and is, one of the most Christian countries in Europe. Its educational system is saturated with Christian teaching of the most pronounced type. Its soldiers bear "God with Us" on their caps. Its militaristic leaders are almost wholly Christian. It is the home of Protestant Christianity. And it has conducted the War with a ferocity and a barbarity unknown at least in the annals of modern warfare. Think of these things, and then assume that Germany, by some strange chance, had remained outside the current of European life, and had never been Christian. Can anyone imagine that had it continued the current of Pagan civilization, it would have been worse than it is? Might it not easily have been better than it is? Make German deceit, German lying, German barbarity as bad as you will, the worse it is, the stronger the indictment of Christian influence. Germany is as generations of Christian training have left her. Said Dean Inge, speaking in London on December 14:—

> It is the deepest tragedy of modern history that every civilized nation seems compelled to choose one or two forms of government, both so bad that it is not easy to see which is the worse. On the one side is the Prussian system, efficient, economical, and honest, but which ends in putting the civilian under the heel of the soldier with his brutal, blundering diplomacy, and methods of frightfulness, until the nation now stands without justice, chivalry, generosity, sympathy, or mercy.
> On the other side there is a squalid anarchy of democracy, wasteful, inefficient, and generally corrupt, > with a Government which quails before every agitation, and pays blackmail to every conspiracy, and in which sooner or later those who pay the taxes are systematically pillaged by those who impose them, until the economic structure of the State is destroyed.

Digitized by Google

And to that we need only add that this is a picture of the European world after having been for centuries under Christian control. Christianity could cover the world with churches, and keep armies of priests at work. It could make its influence felt in all governments and in all classes of society. It could permeate education and control the press. But it could evolve neither a desirable form of government, nor create durable feelings of goodwill among men. Decidedly, Freethinkers will not lack ammunition to carry on their warfare against the most hopeless and most useless of superstitions. And it will be their own fault if this ammunition is not fired with shattering effect.

Waking Up to the Facts.

Let us hope that the millions of soldiers who are spending this Christmas amid the discomfort of the mud, and cold, and filth of Flanders and Northern France, will reflect a little upon the moral of the situation. Thousands of them, we know, have already done so, and have drawn therefrom a sound conclusion. They have seen the clergy eloquent in sending men to war, and yet demanding complete exemption from their own order. They have seen them silent, while thousands of people have made fortunes out of the nation's necessity —silent while the very food of the people has been raised to famine price, and yet eloquent to turn the War to the advantage of their own order. They have seen, and properly seen, in the impotence of the Churches to prevent these things a proof of their worthlessness, and have learned to appreciate the cant of Christian love and brotherhood at its true value. A question often put to the Freethinker before the War was: "How can you explain the world without God?" To-day thousands are reversing the question and are asking: "How can you explain the world with God?" How can any reasonable being reconcile belief in the Christian deity with this world War? Try how one may, the theory will not fit the facts. The War has shattered many theories, and exploded many reputations. The theory of God and the reputation of Christianity, if not completely shattered, are, at least, so damaged that, in thousands of cases, they now excite derision where they formerly commanded respect.

Peace on Earth.

More now than ever does mankind feel the urgency of this message and the need for its realization. And it may well be that in making plain the brutality, the savagery, and the inconclusiveness of war, Germany has unconsciously done the world a service. But peace on earth will never come through the prevalence of the Christian religion. If the centuries have made nothing else plain that lesson is clear. You cannot keep men on the level of savages intellectually and have them highly civilized in other directions. You cannot place a Church in a position of commanding influence without its working harm to the social structure. Professor Kingdon Clifford wisely warned us that Christianity wrecked two civilizations and came very near wrecking a third, and that warning has had a peculiar urgency given it by this War. Peace and goodwill comes not by the Christianizing but by the humanizing of mankind. And if that humanizing process has hitherto proceeded but slowly, a large part of the blame must be given to those superstitious fears and teachings which have so universally prepared man for tyranny and exploitation.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Bibliolatry.

THE Bible has a most marvellous history, some knowledge of which every literary critic is in duty bound to acquire. The Bible is at once the creature and god of the Church, and were it to be lost the Church would cease to exist. It has always been regarded as the objective rule of faith, and as the court of final appeal on all religious matters. Augustine was "most deeply impressed with the evidences of Divine inspiration in the Scriptures," with the result that he could write thus: "To the canonical Scriptures alone I owe agreement without any dissent." That great divine had faith in the absolute inerrancy of Holy Writ. To the Protestant Reformers the central principle was that of the exclusive authority of the Scriptures. Luther positively denied the infallibility of the Pope, and declared that Councils often erred. Even in our own day there are a few who verily believe that God's Book is infallible from cover to cover, and who dismiss the conclusions of the Higher Criticism as groundless fancies. Professor Sayce, the distinguished Egyptologist, published a book with the bold title, Monument Facts and Critical Fancies in which, however, he has the candour to say that "the doctrine of verbal inerrancy is Hindu and not Christian." The amazing fact is that the overwhelming majority of present-day divines no longer hold that absurd dogma. They even grant that the Bible contains numerous errors; that much of its history is unreliable; that large portions of it are purely legendary; and that in no sense can it be looked upon as infallible. And yet, whilst making such concessions to criticism, they still believe in inspiration. In the Christian World for December 13, there is an article entitled "The Condition of Evangelicalism," in which such a position is vigorously defended, and the Evangelical Party is warned that, unless it adopts it, it is in danger of shrinking into "an obscurantist sect more Biblicist than Scriptural." The Correspondent says:—

> Everywhere else the modern method is accepted in principle. The principle of an historical scholarship, at once critical of the record, conservative for the Gospel, and constructive for theology, is now as secure as Copernican astronomy. The particular conclusions from that method may be those of the conservative right wing That is a minor matter. The main thing is that they shall flow from that method, which is the invention of no one man and no one movement, but is the gift of the modern Church of the same spirit that put the Bible there; and which is also a completion of the Reformation, reconstructing the perennial Bible by the Gospel of the Kingdom which made it. But, rightly or wrongly, the general belief is that the Evangelical side of the Church (which is the vital side) is committed to the obscurantist view of the Bible (which the High Churchmen have rejected). And for the Bible's sake and the Gospel's, it becomes of great moment that the prospects of evangelical religion should not be water-logged by the old infallibilism of the record.

We maintain that the policy recommended in that extract is at once illogical and immoral. The Evangelical Party is fully justified in adhering to the orthodox tenet of the verbal inerrancy of the Word of God. The Bible, if fallible, cannot be Divinely inspired. The Rev. Mr. Webb-Peploe is perfectly consistent in the statement that he has in this Book "not some words of God which are to be discovered by human wisdom and human selection, but the Word of God from cover to cover." Mr. Peploe admits that there are errors of transcription in all copies now extant; but he entertains the hope that some day we may be permitted to see a complete edition of God's original gift to man. For him there is absolutely no escape from "the conclusion that the Book, if it be of God, must be perfect originally, and that all that lies with man as a critic is this—to discover the Original—if he can." It was to us incomprehensible how the late Professor Robertson Smith could be a Higher Critic of the most iconoclastic kind, and yet continue to subscribe to the Westminster Confession of Faith. Sir George Adam Smith puzzles us in precisely the same way. In his Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament, several lectures are devoted to the task of proving the legendary character of many Old Testament books; and yet the fourth lecture is called "The Proof of a Divine Revelation in the Old Testament." We have read that chapter with great care, but we have failed to find in it any proof whatsoever of any Divine Revelation in any part of the Old Testament. Indeed, in endeavouring to prove his proposition, Sir George presents us with a highly derogatory conception of the Divine character :—

Digitized by Google

> The Hebrew writers claim for Israel a special choice and providence by God in order that he may make known to them, as he directly does to no other people of mankind, himself (p. 113).

Equally inconclusive is the reasoning of the Christian World. In no sense whatever is the Bible record infallible. The Correspondent tells us that "a fact or a truth is not true just because it is in the Bible," and that "in no such sense is the Bible infallible." Then comes the following conundrum :—

> Infallible as it is, it is infallible not for information, but for salvation. Pietism may be a flush on the face of truth, but it is neither its base nor its method. Unction does not qualify us to judge of historic fact or even theological reality. And a mental gerontocracy is no fit form of rule for a Church of the Spirit.

What that extract really means is an insoluble mystery. The Bible is infallible, after all, but not for information. Here is what purports to be an item of vital information: "Faithful is the saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners"; but the Correspondent assures us that it is not infallible—that, in fact, it may not be true. Paul had his share of unction, but unction did not qualify him to "judge of historic fact or even theological reality." His pietism might have been a flush on the face of truth, but it was neither its base nor its method. In other words, the information about salvation he pretended to supply his converts was by no means infallible. What on earth we are to understand by the statement that the Bible is "infallible for salvation" we have no means whatever of ascertaining.

At this point the Correspondent loses himself in vagueness and barren verbiage. What he means by "competent knowledge" and "inspired divination" no one can tell. If we have it, he says, it will "deliver us from the dilettantists"; but who are the dilettantists and what do they teach? And what does "inspired divination" signify? The dictionary defines "divination" as "the pretended forecast of future events or discovery of what is lost or hidden, by supernatural or magical means." In Roman law it denoted the operation of choosing one of several accusers to conduct a criminal prosecution, and also the address in which the appointment of the prosecutor was proposed. It surely cannot be that the Correspondent uses the term in that sense; and yet he avers that "we need the divination of moral faith," whatever that may be. "A penetrative conscience on the scale of the kingdom of God" is a hopelessly ambiguous expression, as is also "the large ethical tact to read historic judgment unto salvation, whether it be the judgment of the Cross or the judgment of the War." To call the Bible "the charter of the kingdom of God among the nations," "the organic centre of human history and Christian civilization," "the treasury of mankind's ruling power and the revelation of his moral destiny," is but a mere "mapping" of it which "ends in undermining it." This is a new species of Bibliolatry which is more injurious than the worship of the mere letter so bitterly denounced.

The curious thing is that the Correspondent characterizes this method of treating the Bible as scientific, and declares that the neglect of it has resulted in "the corresponding slackness of moral fibre and moral flair in the grasp of revelation." The truth is that the genuinely scientific method of treating the Bible robs it of all title to be regarded either as being or as containing a supernatural revelation. The historic and atoning Cross is an adaptation by the theologians of a superstition common to all the great religions. This is the view to which scholars are gradually coming round. The Correspondent, whose strange views and stilted style remind us so forcibly of Principal Forsyth, is fully aware of this, and significantly says: "The ship wants docking and scraping. Or must it be scrapped?" It is a scrapping process that is now going on, with the result that Bibliolatry in all its forms is doomed.

J. T. Lloyd.

A Festival of Falsehood.

> The divine stands wrapt up in his cloud of mysteries, and the amused laity must pay tithes and venerations to be kept in obscurity, grounding their hope of future knowledge on a competent stock of present ignorance.—George Farquhar.

There is a legend as old as any in the Christian Church, which has put a premium upon gloom and has made it part and parcel of the orthodox superstition. It is that Christ was never seen to smile, but often to weep. This does not concern Freethinkers overmuch, for those unrepentant sinners do not think it likely that the "Man of Sorrows" would, as Shakespeare says, "laugh mortal." Man is, however, a laughing animal, and in this he is superior, if in nothing else. To be ashamed of laughter, to hold back merriment and mirth, to live in gloom and seriousness, may suit the ascetics, but is unworthy of men, who love sunshine and the song of children, and the open breezy day, rather than the spectral quiet and gloom of the cloister.

Hence the convivial nature of Christmas Day, alleged to be the birthday of Christ, has frequently been noted to the discomfiture of theologians, who object to the rationalistic explanation of Christianity. "God's birthday" is an annual orgy of gluttony and godliness, and the reason for this is an excellent piece of Christian evidence, for it plucks the heart out of the orthodox superstition.

Christmas Day was not kept regularly as a holiday until many generations after the alleged birth of Christ. When first observed, it was kept on varying dates. The precise time of Jesus's birth, like that of Jeames de la Pluche, was "wropt in mystery"; but it certainly was not in December. Why, then, do Christians observe Christmas Day on December 25, and why is the birthday of the ascetic "Man of Sorrows" a veritable carnival of conviviality?

Like all human institutions, the Christian Churches and their feast days have had to contend in open warfare for survival. The festivals of Pagan Rome were numerous, and it was in competition with the feast of the Saturnalia, one of the principal Roman festivals, that Christmas Day came to be instituted by the Christians, and the date fixed as December 25. The anniversary of Saturn was an old-established institution, and the propensity of converts from Paganism to cling to custom proved invincible. If the apostates were to be retained in the folds of the new religion, it was imperative for the Christians to incorporate the old under the mask of the new.

This struggle for survival has also incorporated other Pagan features. In the far-off centuries, white-robed Druids cut the sacred mistletoe with a golden sickle, and chanted their hymns to the frosty air. These features were absorbed also, and the mistletoe and carol-singing still play their minor, if amusing, parts in the celebration. The clergy have always had a keen instinct for proselytising. In the past the Church sought for adherents by increasing her festal days, and she crushed opposition by bribing the weak and silencing the strong. In the twentieth century she is cajoling apostates all over the non-Christian world by means of medical missionaries, and at home by instituting Pleasant Sunday Afternoons in the place of painful Sabbaths, and by hypocritically identifying herself with social measures which appeal to the working classes.

Nor is this all, for the bitterest irony is everywhere interwoven in this celebration of the birthday of a man-god who never lived. "Peace and goodwill amongst men" proclaim tens of thousands of pulpits, and the clergy also bless regimental colours, and pray for the troops of contending armies. The nations which profess to worship the "Prince of Peace" are in the stronger grip of Mars, the god of war. From the Elbe to the Spree, from the Seine to the Neva, the roads of Europe resound to the tread of armed men, and the continent is a shambles, ankle-deep in human blood. The countrymen of Moliere are cutting the throats of the countrymen of Martin Luther, and the compatriots of Kossuth are disembowelling the brothers of Mazzini. The women of Europe, "like Niobe, all tears," are mourning their dead fathers, husbands, and sons; and whole nations, professedly Christian, are engaged in wholesale killing. The death-moans of hundreds of thousands are drowned in the Te Deums of the victors, and the survivors are blessed in the name of the Prince of Peace.

To such a pass, after so many centuries of the Christian superstition, has the Western world come. Milton's hymn on "The Nativity of Christ reads like the bitterest mockery:—

> Nor war, nor battle's sound
> Was heard the world around,
> The idle spear and shield were high up hung;
> The hooked chariot stood
> Unstained with human blood;
> The trumpet spake not to the armed throng;
> The kings sat still with awful eye,
> As if they knew their sovran Lord was by.

It reads like a beautiful fairy-tale. "Peace and goodwill" must wait till another year; and the present celebration of "God's birthday" must make serious men and women think. The Christmas festival itself, with all its hypocritical professions and its legendary associations, is largely pretence and make-believe. It is the paradox of paradoxes that the woeful welter of a tragic contest is going on in almost every corner of a world that professes to worship a God who commanded his followers not to kill and to obey his behests of non-resistance and forgiveness. Christmas, so far as the Christian Church is concerned, is an organized hypocrisy, a fitting celebration of an event that never happened.

CONFIDENCE.

A motorist, stopping his car at a country hotel, called to a man who was passing to look after his car. With much dignity the man replied, "Do you know that I belong to the Salvation Army."

"Oh!" replied the motorist, "that doesn't matter. I'll trust you."

The Bible and Immortality.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

RESUMING our examination of the New Testament statements, we have next to notice those relating to the resurrection of the body and the last judgment. With regard to the latter there appears to be no doubt; but in the case of the resurrection this is not quite so certain. Thus, in the following paragraphs, no raising from the dead is mentioned:—

> Matt. xxiv. 30, 31.—Then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn.....And he shall send forth his angels .....and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other.
> Matt. xxv. 31-33.—But when the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the angels with him.....before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another as the shepherd separateth the sheep from the goats: and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left.

In the latter case the sheep are all "blessed," and are to "inherit the kingdom prepared for them"; while the goats are all "cursed," and are to receive "eternal punishment." From the foregoing passages it would seem that only those alive at the "second coming" would be judged, and rewarded or punished. In the following passages, however, a resurrection is distinctly stated:—

> John v. 28, 29.—For the hour cometh, in which all that are in the tombs shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and shall come forth: they that have done good unto the resurrection of eternal life; and they that have done ill, unto the resurrection of judgment.
> Rev. xx. 13, 15.—And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and Death and Hades gave up the dead which were in them: and they were judged every man according to their works.....And if any was not found written in the book of life, he was cast into the lake of fire.
> 1 Thess. iv. 15-18.—The Lord himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we that are alive, that are left, shall together with them be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord.

According to the first two of these extracts there is to be a resurrection of all men, to be followed by a judgment; but, according to the third, it would seem that only those believers in Christ who had died while awaiting the "second coming" are to be raised from the dead, and that they and the believers then living are all to mount up to heaven without a judgment. This, in some measure, agrees with the first quotation from Matthew, in which the angels are to gather together all the elect then alive from the four winds. We thus arrive at the theory that all believers in Christ who are living on the day of judgment will be taken to heaven just as they are, and that the believers who are dead will be raised and given earthly bodies before entering Paradise. But we have next to see what the great apostle of the Gentiles has to say on the subject. In 1 Cor. xv. 35 to 53 that apostle endeavours to explain the resurrection by the sowing of a grain of wheat, to which he says, God gives "a body of its own." In the case of a human body in the tomb he states:—

> 1 Cor. xv. 42, 44.—So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption.....It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body.

In this passage the word "natural" (psychikos) is derived from psyche (life), and the word "spiritual"

Digitized by Google

(pneumatikos) is formed from pneuma (breath, air, wind). Here Pauls says that the natural body of flesh and blood is the psychic, thereby recognizing the fact that psyche means animal life; he also says that the spiritual body, which is given to those raised from the dead, is pneumatic (i.e., pertaining to air or breath). According to this statement all our writers on Psychology have chosen the wrong word, probably because psyche is generally translated "soul," whereas that word has nothing to do with soul or mind. Paul further says:—

> 1 Cor. xv. 50-53.—Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.....We shall not all sleep, but we shall be changed.....For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed, and this mortal must put on immortality.

Paul says nothing of a judgment of all nations or of the punishment of the wicked. The ideas of the early Christians upon the subject of "eternal life" would appear to be expressed in the paragraphs quoted from 1 Thess. iv. and 1 Cor. xv., though they are not in complete agreement. Thus, in 1 Cor. xv., the bodies of those raised from the dead, as well as those then alive, were both to be "changed" into "spiritual bodies" before entering the abode of bliss. But in 1 Thess. iv. nothing is said about any such change, though it appears to be implied that those raised from the dead were to be given the same bodies which they possessed before death. This metamorphosis presented no difficulties to the primitive Christians, who believed that "with God all things are possible." In any case, those living at the time were to go straight up to heaven in their natural bodies, accompanied by their resurgent brethren who, we must assume, could not enter paradise in their mouldering post-mortem bodies.

According to the apostle of the Gentiles, the natural physical body of flesh and blood could not enter heaven: the heavenly body must be spiritual (pneumatical), that is to say, possessing the qualities of pneuma (breath, air, wind). We may perhaps conceive this spiritual body to be a living, breathing phantom; but, as a simple matter of fact, Paul knew nothing about such a body. He simply imagined what he has described, just as he imagined that he had been "caught up to the third heaven" where he heard "unspeakable words" (2 Cor. xii. 1-4). Moreover, in neither 1 Thess. iv. nor in 1 Cor. xv. is there a single word said about "the spirits of the dead" in Hades; in both the reference is to the crumbling bodies in the tombs, as is also the case in John v. Setting aside, then, the theories of Paul—for they are nothing more—it would seem that the resurrection to which the majority of the early Christians looked forward was the raising of the bodies in the grave, which were to be changed into their former living bodies of flesh and blood—the resuscitated beings eating, drinking, and sleeping as they did before death. That this was the conception of the future life by the early Christians receives confirmation from the following circumstances recorded in the Gospels.

1. Jesus is represented as saying to his disciples at his Last Supper—"I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine until the day when I drink it anew with you in my Father's kingdom (Matt. xxvi. 29).

2. In the hypothetical case of the woman who had had seven husbands (Matt. xxii. 23-30) it is clearly implied that in heaven men and women would appear in their former earthly bodies.

3. In the parable of the Rich man and Lazarus (Luke xvi. 24) it is assumed that these two individuals were clothed in their earthly bodies, and that each saw and recognized the other.

4. Jesus himself, after his resurrection, appeared to his disciples in his natural body. When they "supposed that they beheld a spirit" he said, "Why are ye troubled? .....Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me having. And he shewed them his hands and his feet." After this he asked, "Have ye here anything to eat? And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish. And he took it, and did eat before them" (Luke xxiv. 38-43). Jesus also showed the sceptical Thomas "the prints of the nails" in his hands and the wound in his side (John xx. 27).

5. Others are stated to have been raised from the dead in their natural bodies. Thus in Matt. xxvii. 52, 53, we read that "the tombs were opened, and many bodies of the saints that had fallen asleep were raised; and coming forth out of the tombs, they entered into the holy city and appeared unto many." Admitting that this story and also that of Jesus are pious fictions, they at least show what was the belief in apostolic times. We have, again, the case of Lazarus, who was raised from the dead after he had been in the tomb four days and disintegration had commenced (John xi. 17, 39).

6. In Matt. xviii. 7-9 Jesus is represented as saying that if a hand or a foot caused a believer to sin, that person should "cut it off and cast it from him"; for it would be better for him "to enter into eternal life maimed or halt, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into the eternal fire." These words, it is true, have been given a metaphorical interpretation; but, all the same, the fact of going into the abode of bliss with only one hand or foot plainly indicates that the believer would, as a matter of course, enter that abode in his former earthly body. There is no getting away from this inference; for if an entirely new body would be given after the resurrection, the mutilation of the old earthly body could not affect the new heavenly one.

The New Testament idea of the resurrection of the dead would thus appear to be that of the entire body—changed in the raising into the former earthly body, when in health. Of this belief it need only be said that it is utopian, and one which can never be realized; for we have no evidence of the existence of a being "with whom all things are possible." The same is the case with the heart (the supposed seat of reason, thought, and feeling), and of the psyche and pneuma: these all perish with the body.

There remains now but one point in connection with "eternal life" to be noticed: this will form the subject of the next paper, and bring this series to a conclusion.

ABRACADABRA.

Why Was Christ Born?

WERE a visitor from a distant planet, knowing nothing of this world's religions, to walk about in a Christian country, say in England, on the day of that ancient Pagan festival which is now called Christmas; were he to observe the eating and drinking, dancing and card-playing, and general jollification; he would never suspect that the people around him were celebrating the birthday of their God.

Were the visitor informed of this fact, and resolved to pursue his inquiries, he would discover that the celebrants were, for the most part, as ignorant as stones of the whole matter; that they were, in fact, the dupes of a long train of imposture.

Jesus Christ, whom the Christians worship as God, was not born on the twenty-fifth of December; at least the chances are very much against it. If he ever lived, he must have been born on some day; but, in the absence of all positive information on this point, the odds are three hundred and sixty-four to one against any day that is selected being right. The orthodox date is, indeed, quite inconsistent with the Gospel narrative. The birth of Jesus Christ is related to have been proclaimed to shepherds who were watching their flocks by night. This is impossible in Palestine in the depth of winter. The flocks are not pastured out at night until the spring.

Jesus Christ had been dead for generations before his birthday became an object of interest. According to the Acts of the Apostles, it was at Antioch that his followers were first called Christians; yet it was at Antioch that St. Chrysostom said—three hundred and fifty years after the Crucifixion—that they had but lately heard of the twenty-fifth of December as their Saviour's birthday.

The twenty-fifth of December was, as we have already said, a Pagan festival. It celebrated the new birth of the sun. The twenty-first of December is the shortest day, and is assigned in the Roman Calendar to St. Thomas, who doubted his Master's resurrection. For three days (as may be seen by the Almanack) the orb of light appears to be stagnant; but the fourth day begins to lengthen, the sun decisively commences another progression, and the Pagans expressed their joy at the auspicious occurrence. This festival was seized upon by the Christian Church; the SUN was turned into the SON; and the Pagans who were weaned or forced into Christianity, under Constantine and his successors, were gratified to learn that the new religion, while it altered their shibboleths, made very little difference with regard to their rites and customs.

But if the day of Jesus Christ's birth is uncertain, the determination of the year is equally difficult. We are informed by the third Gospel that Jesus was born when Cyrenius was governor of Syria. This was at least six years after the commencement of the Christian era. Jewish chronology assigns a much earlier date for the birth of the Nazarene; a point on which the reader may consult the Jewish Life of Christ, a remarkable production that should be read by every student of the origins of Christianity.

All this would be discovered by our imaginary visitor from a distant planet. He would also find that the deity of Jesus Christ was never suspected during his lifetime; that the doctrine grew up gradually, with many fluctuations of fortune, in the Christian Church; and that it was only imposed on the whole Christian world after generations of fierce controversy and cruel bloodshed.

Supposing, however, that Jesus Christ was God, or part of God, or a messenger from God, we may still ask —Why was he born? What was his object? And how has he carried it out?

Jesus Christ was certainly not born to teach the world anything new in religion, philosophy, or morals. Every good (or bad) text in the Gospels is a repetition of what had been previously uttered. Originality was not one of his characteristics. Even the assertion that he brought immortality to light is false in the light of Jewish doctrine before his birth, and ridiculous in the light of the ancient systems of Egypt and India.

Christ did not come as a man to illuminate the world, but as a god to redeem it. Such is the teaching of orthodox Christianity. But if Christ's object was the world's redemption, his failure is "gross as a mountain, open, palpable."

"Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," was the command of Christ to his apostles. He also said, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end." This can only mean that they, or their successors, were to convert the world to Christianity; it must at least mean that they were to preach the gospel to all ears, so that all might have an opportunity of embracing it. But has this been done? And after the lapse of nearly two thousand years, more than half of the world's inhabitants have never heard the gospel preached. Only a quarter of the human race are professed Christians, and among them how many are real? Buddhism, which was founded by a man, includes more millions than Christianity. Nor is there the slightest prospect of further success. The races that stood outside Christianity at first are outside it still. Missionary effort makes no considerable impression on the vast populations of Asia and Africa. The heathen who are converted in distant lands do not equal the number of persons in Christian countries who are either sceptics or indifferent.

Jesus Christ is called the Prince of Peace. Angels sang at his birth of "peace on earth and good-will among men." Surely this was ironical. More blood has been shed in the name of Christ than in the name of any other deity. It is an indisputable fact, also, that all other differences—racial, political, or social—are aggravated by difference in religion. Englishmen and Irishmen are both Christians, but they worship Christ in different ways, and this diversity is the principal secret of their long antagonism. Had Ireland been Protestant, or England been Catholic, the two nations would have found a speedier way to reconciliation. The last great war in Europe was between Catholic France and Protestant Germany. It was fomented by the Jesuits, who used the Empress Eugenie as their tool. Christ's priests never shrank from crime to win their ends. They have ever been ready to drench the earth with tears or blood to promote the interest of their Church.

Peace was not brought by Christ. If it was it ascended with him. He was born at a time of peace, during the reign of the mild and wise Augustus. Less than half a million soldiers sufficed to maintain the peace of that far stretching empire, and to secure its frontiers against the outer barbarians. At present, in Europe alone, six millions of soldiers grasp arms in readiness for mutual slaughter. At the close of every winter we speculate on war in the spring. After all these centuries of the reign of Christ the military systems of Europe are crushing the nations. Young men spend their days in barracks, two hundred millions are wrung from the people to support armies and navies, and another two hundred millions to pay the interest on national debts.

Peace on earth! The brotherhood of man! Yes, the peace of kings and priests; the brotherhood of Cain and Abel.

Christians dwell on the love for the poor and oppressed displayed by the Hebrew prophets, and declare that Christ, as the last and greatest prophet, was to be the best friend of the needy and the desolate. But is this a fact? So far as the poor are concerned, Jesus Christ might as well have remained in heaven. Poverty is a standing curse of Christian societies. Men die worth millions, and their ignominious corpses repose in a marble-pillared mausoleum. Many of their fellow-citizens die daily from starvation, or the diseases of ill-fed bodies, and are buried out of the way as public nuisances. Dives and Lazarus still live in the same city. The beggar's stomach is as empty, and his sores as painful, as ever; and Dives is never frightened by that little parable about the dry tongue and the missing drop of water. Christ said, "The poor ye have always with you," and the remark was a prophecy. The poor are always with us. They have not been redeemed. They owe nothing to Christ. He was not born for them.

Peace has not come, poverty has not gone; the people still suffer, and are still cheated with "kingdom-come." Christ was not born to redeem us in this world. Oh, they say, he will redeem us in the next world. He was born to lead us to heaven and save us from hell. But if he cannot help us here, how will he help us there? Let the truth be told—He is a failure. As a god he is contemptible. He came to this world to no purpose. It would have been better if he had left us Home Rulers to manage our own affairs. Jehovah was a curse to the Jews, and Christ has been a curse to Christendom. We at least are not grateful to him. We hope he will soon go the way of other gods into oblivion. We believe he is going there rapidly. He is perishing because he is being found out. His pretensions are belied by the history of nineteen hundred years. He was born once, but it was a mistake. All he has now to do is to die.

Acid Drops.

Hundreds of years ago the Jews took a great revenge for all the injuries that were to be inflicted on them. They gave the Christian their God, and that was one of the most cold-blooded acts of cruelty in history. Now, Mr. Balfour proposes another act of retaliation. He is going to give the Jews Jerusalem, and found a Jewish State. This game of reprisals ought to be stopped. It will only lead to fresh trouble in the future.

To be quite serious, the foundation of a State for Jews is only of value so long as there are large numbers of Jews suffering oppression, and to whom any place is preferable to the one wherein they live. Where Jews are not persecuted they neither desire a Jewish State, nor will they avail themselves of one if it is offered. English, French, or Dutch Jews are Englishmen, Frenchmen, and Dutchmen. Their religion no more expresses nationality than does Roman Catholicism and Protestantism. True, they profess a longing for Jerusalem—in their prayers. But that is about as real as the Christian's longing for heaven. And we are quite sure that nothing short of forcible deportation will ever induce Jews to leave countries where they have been settled for generations and are fairly treated.

And what is meant by a "Jewish State?" Does it mean a theocracy on the Biblical plan with Jewish regulations enforced? That would mean a tyranny so intolerable that it would soon have to be suppressed. And if the State is to give absolute freedom to all, with no State religion, and no compulsion or restriction in any form, it is a travesty of language to call it a Jewish State. Perhaps, one day, people will recognize that the "Jewish Question" is really a sociological question.

In a recent issue of the Daily News, a nineteen-line extract from Paine's Rights of Man was published as a quotation for the day. We hope the editor did not give his readers too much pain.

Although there is a shortage of paper, and periodicals are greatly reduced in size, editors still find room for religious news. A Sunday paper actually had a bold headline: "200 Eton Boys Confirmed," with following letterpress. Perhaps the editor thought it a big bag of prisoners for the Church offensive.

Considerable interest has been excited by the Morning Post attack on the Papacy as having been partly responsible for the recent disaster to the Italian Army, and, of course, Roman Catholics in general are highly indignant. So far as individual English Roman Catholics are concerned, their indignation may be genuine enough. But with the Vatican itself that is quite another affair. There is a very powerful Roman Catholic party in Germany, and Austria is a stronghold of the Papacy. Here are two good reasons why the Roman Church should oblige these powers as much as is possible. Added to this, the Vatican has never relinquished its aspirations after temporal power, and the dream of a Pope who shall exercise a temporal sovereignty over Italy itself is not too fantastic for its ambitions. Finally, the Roman Catholic Church is a Christian Church, and all history teaches that a Christian Church will support any and every cause that promises help. The principles of the Christian Churches are not exactly up for sale, but they can always be so explained as to assist any cause or government that supports them.

The Referee calls attention to the fact that just one hundred years ago the vicar of Sutton summoned Sir Montague Burgoyne, the Lord of the Manor, for non-attendance at Church. The case was tried at the Bedfordshire Assizes, and Sir Montague pleaded that he was an "invalid and had prayers read at home." So the jury found him "Not guilty." But how the clergy to-day, with their empty churches, must long for a return of the good old days!

"This hath God wrought," says the Church Times, with reference to the recent capture of Jerusalem. And the C. T. is grateful for the "privilege" accorded to the English people in this matter. It is not for us to say what "God" had to do with the capture of Jerusalem, but we do suggest that his presence—if he can achieve this kind of thing—is sadly needed on the Western Front. What God can do in the East, he might attempt in the West, and it would be far more effective there than elsewhere. It would be blasphemous to suggest that "God" is only powerful against a weak force, and powerless against a strong one. Perhaps the Church Times will explain the success of "Providence" in the one case, and its failure or carelessness in the other.

It was characteristic of the thoughtfulness of "Providence" that, after the terrible explosion at Halifax, Newfoundland, which killed about 1,500 people, it came along with a severe blizzard while thousands of people were homeless. And people who are indignant over German atrocities thank God for his "loving mercy."

Bristol clergy have also been holding a conference to consider the serious aspect of the future. The Bishop of Bristol dwelt strongly upon the responsibility of the clergy at the present crisis. We do not see it. Had he spoken of the responsibility of the clergy for the present crisis, we might have agreed. But no sensible person cares to the value of a mouldy communion wafer about the "highfalutin" talk of the clergy. All that is required of them is to get out of the way.

We cannot congratulate the members of the House of Commons on the success of their opposition to the 27C Regulation. It was first proposed that all leaflets and pamphlets relating to War and Peace should be passed by a censor before publication. This was such a glaring piece of autocratic legislation that the Government was driven to make concessions. The concessions amount to this: every pamphlet dealing with War and Peace must be placed before the censor three days before it is printed. If the censor decides that it must not be printed, it is forbidden. And the aggrieved party may seek a remedy in the Courts if he so desires.

We fail to see the value of the "concession." The right way, the way of real freedom, would be for the censor—who must be a Government censor—to take the pamphlet into the courts and allow judges to decide whether it really infringes the law or not. That has hitherto been the English way. To condemn it first, to seize type, etc., on the strength of the condemnation, and leave it for the aggrieved party to seek redress, is the way of Russia in its worst days. Moreover, the concession concedes nothing. To appeal to the courts was a privilege the subject always possessed, and still has, in spite of D.O.R.A. Finally moving the courts is an expensive matter, and an organization without plenty of money cannot act. It is only wealthy men, and wealthy societies that can threaten the Government, and the Government does not attack men of money.

We are not concerned in the least with the political aspect of the matter, and we protest against the fashion of labelling all criticism of this regulation as "Pacifist." That is a mere political trick. Our sole concern is with the setting up of a practice that is foreign to our traditions and to our institutions. Freedom is the one thing in the world worth fighting for, and one must be prepared to risk something in its maintenance. Make the penalties for illegal, for treasonable, action as heavy as you please, but let the decision as to what is illegal rest with the courts of law. That is the only guarantee of freedom the subject has. That gone, everything is gone.

Patriotism and piety is a sad mixture. A poor woman at Bradford cut the throat of her boy of sixteen because she thought that her "sacrifice" would help the Allies. She had been a regular attendant at Christian Science meetings.

It looks as though "Providence" had been running amok amongst the clergy. In one newspaper paragraph the other day it was recorded that the Rev. J. W. Thorndike, of St. James the Less, Vauxhall Bridge Road, died suddenly in his church; Rev. W. T. Nicholson died after an operation for apendicitis; and Prebendary F. Wodehouse died suddenly at Exmouth.

The Illustrated Record of the Tower Hamlets Mission believes in making one's flesh creep—as the best means of raising subscriptions. In its Annual Christmas Appeal it darkly hints that it could give "numerous pathetic accounts" of those who have come to their teas and been converted. We are not quite certain whether the pathetic stories belong to the tea or the Gospel, but we can quite believe it of either.

In another portion of the same "Appeal" we read that the Mission is accumulating information "of a most terrible character as to the demoralization of boys and girls" in cinema shows. These "horrible centres of corruption" are open on Sundays to all, etc. Of course, we are not given particulars; so that every pious reader is given the utmost freedom to indulge his or her pruricut imagination without check. But it is very thoughtless of Mr. Charrington to give the game away by saying: "Our immediate object will now be to arouse the Churches to their danger, and the terrible effect Sunday opening is having on the attendance at churches and Sunday-schools." And that, apparently, is the "corruption" that is at work. So it looks like a case of trade jealousy, after all.

A general dealer of Merthyr, S. Wales, was summoned for driving a motor cycle with side-car, thus infringing the Motor Spirit Restriction Order. The defence was that the car was being used to fetch some butter and eggs. The essence of the offence appears to have been that the cycle was being ridden on a Sunday, and one suspects that it was the Sabbatarian feelings of the Chief Constable that were hurt rather than the Motor Spirit Restriction order. Piety plus patriotism is a strong combination.

"The name of Father Christmas is on the lips and in the minds of all children," declares a London newspaper writer. The dear little Pagans.

The forthcoming celebration of the merry birthday of the Man of Sorrows led to an order of the Liquor Control Board relaxing in England and Wales some of the drink restrictions.

The campaign in Palestine has given the journalists an opportunity of re-hashing much Biblical knowledge. The Times had a lengthy note on Hebron, the City of Abraham, and said "the oak of Mamre under which the patriarch camped is still pointed out a little to the north of the town." This is the stuff that is retailed in the columns of one of the foremost daily papers.

"Take no thought for the morrow" does not, in the opinion of the vicar of Krodeshall, Suffolk, apply to sugar. At least, we assume such to be the case, seeing that this gentlemen was found in possession of a sack of sugar. When charged under the Food Control Order, the defendant was unaware of the Control Order. The vicar was fined £3, and the local grocer who supplied the sugar £5. We do not understand why the grocer was fined more than the vicar, particularly as, in small country places, the clergy have a way of bringing considerable pressure to bear upon local tradesmen. And in these days grocers are not exactly begging people to take sugar off their hands.

The War Office has issued the information that "clerks in holy office" who volunteer for military service "are permitted to select the corps to which they wish to be posted." If they do not come up to the requirements of the selected corps, they will be permitted to return to civil life. Will anyone please explain why a clergyman joining the Army should be given a privilege denied to other people? And why, if he is not suitable to that particular corps, should a clergyman be permitted to return to civil life? Under this regulation a parson has only to select a corps for which he is clearly unfitted to escape service altogether, and retain the credit for being anxious to do "his bit." And we may trust the members of the "Black Army" to make the most of the occasion.

The relation between religion and conduct, says "Vanoc," in the Referee, is always a mystery to the average layman. We daresay; but it is only a mystery because theology has deliberately caused the confusion. Whatever relation exists between the two, in fact, is purely accidental; it is never causal. Religion operates on morality precisely as does politics. It may lead people to regard things as right that are wholly wrong, or it may induce them to brand as crimes qualities that are of quite an opposite character. That is why religious belief forms no guide whatever as to how a person will behave. He may have enough native goodness to overcome the influence of religion, or enough inborn "cussedness" to fly in the face of its better teaching. Religion and morality spring from different roots, and it is regrettable that "Vanoc" makes such a mystery of a problem that could be answered by a very casual study of moral development.

"Vanoc's" wonderment is due to an article written by Commodore Henderson, at present interned in Holland. The Commodore finds that some of the prisoners in his camp go to church, but "there are plenty of men who never go near a church. Yet they are living straight, upright, clean lives which many Churchmen might do well to imitate." If Commodore Henderson is surprised at this, it only shows that, like "Vanoc," he also has much to learn on the question of ethics. And the value of "Vanoc's" philosophy is well shown by the following:—

> Commodore Henderson's creed, which is shared by innumerable thinking souls, is that no dogmas are necessary unless belief in an All-good God can be called a dogma. With the evidence of our own existence, Nature, and the laws of Nature before us, the existence of a Supreme Being is a self-evident fact which nobody except Conchies of the baser sort, degenerates, and arrogant and unobservant ignoramuses can dispute.

We do not know in which category we are to be placed, but it is long since we came across a more ignorant outburst than this: "Nature and the laws of nature!" The poor man thinks they are distinct, evidently. We have no space or time to disentangle all the absurdities in the passage cited, they will be clear enough to Freethinker readers. We can only regret that "Vanoc" was not with General Allenby when he entered Jerusalem. Assuming "Vanoc's" ability and willingness to bear the burden, the General might then have entered the city in the same way as Jesus is said to have done.

At Broadstairs Sunday cinema shows are restricted to soldiers and sailors, and humorous films are excluded from the programme. The pious folk evidently wish the soldiers and sailors to take their pleasures sadly.

The Daily News anxiously asks the question, "Will there be Feasting As Usual" at Christmas? Presumably, the birthday of the "Man of Sorrows" will be shorn of some of its merriment.

To Correspondents.

A. L. (Glasgow).—Pleased to hear of the increased sales at your newsagents. That is becoming a very general experience, but we are hungry for still more.

PTE. J. SCOTT.—Your suggestion of a fund for the distribution of literature among soldiers is a good one, but we have had to ask our readers for help in other directions, and we do not feel warranted in making any further appeals that are avoidable. We do send out literature on our own account, so far as our means permit, and we have the gratification of knowing that it does good. Thanks for your efforts in distributing pamphlets. The literature ordered has been sent.

PTE. STARLING writes: "Freethought is, in my opinion, making great strides among the soldiers, and it would be well worth getting the parodies the boys sing to the hymns they have been forced to learn" We shall be very pleased to receive specimens. Some may be quite usable.

PEDRO.—Sorry we are not able to use the MSS. you have been good enough to send.

S. R. (Belfast).—We do not know what you mean by "details of the death-bed" of G. W. Foote. The only pertinent details are that he died in his own home, with none but members of his own family in the house. And he died as he had lived, a firm Freethinker.

B. DUNLOP.—Next week. Thanks.

R. ELMES.—It is a very foolish policy to offer an explanation before you are quite sure the statements made are a record of facts.

E. RAWLINGS.—You have misunderstood Mr. Holyoake's discussion with Bradlaugh, it was not of the nature you assume. Mr. Holyoake made many professions of his authentic opinions in quite plain and unequivocal language.

J. BREESE.—We are obliged for your promise of further help in the event of there being more trouble with the L.C.C. But we do not think that likely. We can quite appreciate the worries of a business man at the present time.

J. ROBERTSON.—We quite agree with your view that in winning the fight in London against the L.C.C. it will have its influence elsewhere. By the way, is it not time Edinburgh did some work again in the shape of propagandist lectures? We shall be glad to give any assistance we can.

W. H. DEAKIN.—Thanks for good wishes. The letter to which you refer is not yet to hand, but trust it will arrive in due course.

W. JONES. G. E. GILL, AND OTHERS.—We are obliged for offers of pamphlet, but a parcel, wrongly labelled, was discovered in stock.

PIPER W. H. FYFE.—We are sending you a small parcel of literature for distribution.

J. LIVESY.—Will see about an article on the subject you name; but there are so many other things that call for attention. Thanks for your good opinion of the paper.

N. S. S. GENERAL FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges:—"Ernest," 2s. 6d.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges:—"Ernest," 2s. 6d.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The impudence of some officials almost passes belief. A friend at Goldthorpe, near Sheffield, was good enough to display a Freethinker poster in his shop window. The shop is situated in the central part of the town, and opposite the police station. The poster had been displayed for some weeks without anything being said, but on December 10 a police sergeant, accompanied by a constable, arrived on the scene, and informed the shopkeeper's wife that it was illegal to display such a poster, and that he had "gone into the matter fully with his superiors and they had concluded it was against the law." Our friend's wife properly asked this official to call again when her husband was at home. The reply was that there was enough trouble these times and he didn't want any more. Of course, the whole proceeding was quite illegal, and nothing else than an attempt to bully our friend into taking the poster down. We have instructed that the poster be kept where it has been, and that in case of any further trouble to let us know at once. There is nothing at all illegal in displaying the poster, and if any trouble occurs, our friends may rely upon our full support. Meanwhile, we have written for further particulars with a view to bringing this particular police officer to book.

Under the heading of "An Earnest Thinker," the Cambridge Magazine (December 15) has a notice of the death of a well-known Cambridge figure, Mr. H. J. Wolstenholme, of Christ's College:—

> Those who knew him well would agree that his grasp of social and general philosophy was in many ways unrivalled in this country. Trained originally for the Ministry in some Nonconformist sect, his inquiring mind soon found itself unable to accept the fundamentals which others allowed to pass unquestioned, and though he retained an understanding of and a respect for the convictions of those from whom he parted company, he was reluctantly faced to the conclusion that the hypothesis of the existence of a God was amongt the least helpful and least fruitful of all the cosmogonief that mankind has devised.

We were pleased to see a letter, in the Wine and Spirit Trade Record, from Mr. H. Latimer Voigt, strongly recommending Mr. Foote's Bible and Beer as a "crushing" reply to the contention that the wine mentioned in the Bible is unfermented. The pamphlet is a crushing answer to other things beside this, and we should like to see it circulated by the tens of thousands.

We regret that by the transposition of a line in Mr. Palmer's article in our last issue one paragraph was robbed of part of its meaning. The last line at the bottom of p. 795 should have appeared as the second line in the second paragraph in the second column. The line must have been displaced in making up the columns.

We are asked to state that the "Social" arranged for Boxing Day by the Manchester Branch, N.S.S., has had to be postponed owing to local circumstances. We are glad to learn that this Branch is winding up its quarter's work with plenty of enthusiasm to recommence early in the New Year.

THE POLITIC CHRISTIANITY OF THE KAISER.

The mainstay of the (Roman) Catholic Church rests with the Austrian monarchy and with the death of the old Emperor (written in July, 1914) they would have to look to some other country and ruler for protection. There is no Catholic ruler in a Catholic country to-day able to support and protect the dignity of the Church. The German Emperor is a Protestant monarch, but he is first and last a Christian, and thanks to his usual keen and far-sighted policy, backed up by his strong spiritual convictions, religious dissensions are almost unknown in his Empire. The Catholic religion enjoys in no country, save the United States and the British Empire, more real freedom from persecution than it does in Germany. And the Emperor's personal standing with the Vatican is excellent.—Armgaard Karl Graves, "The Secrets of the German War Office."

Fund for Fighting the L.C.C.

THE purpose of this Fund is to clear off a portion of the liability incurred in fighting—and defeating—the attempt of the L.C.C. to prohibit the sale of literature in the London parks and open spaces. The legal expenses incurred amounted to about £250. Of this, between £80 and £100 remains unpaid, and the Protest Committee is appealing for contributions from all who appreciate the value of the triumph achieved. This is a question that should appeal to Londoners with special force, and it is hoped to raise the required amount by the end of the year. The following is the list of subscriptions to date:—

Previously acknowledged, £21 19s. E. Whitehorn, £2. Dr. B. Dunlop, £1 1s. H. Jessop, £1. J. Burrell, 1s. J. Breese, £1. G. Saunders, 2s. J. Robertson, 2s. T. Dunbar, 2s. 6d. Mrs. Annie Poole, 1s. Dr. R. T. Nichols, 10s. 6d. W. H. Hicks, £1 1s. Manchester Branch N. S. S., £1 1s. T. Underwood, 2s. E. Reynolds, 2s. 6d. "Ernest," 2s. 6d.

The Prayers of the Righteous.

THE REV. CHAS. GOODHEART is the vicar of a fine old church in one of the suburbs of London. Most of his parishioners regard him as a real old English gentleman, and a sincere Christian. Obviously, he has never critically examined the tenets of the faith in which he believes, and he knows nothing, or comparatively speaking nothing, of the heretical views of many of the more learned members of his own church. All along he has said that he has accepted his religion on faith. He believes that the Bible is God's Word—every word alike, from the first verse of the first chapter of Genesis to the last verse in Revelation; and every man, whether he is a brother in Holy Orders or only a layman, who dares to throw the slightest doubt on the authenticity or genuineness of the Gospels, he regards as a heretic who will ultimately find his portion in the lake of fire that burns without ceasing for ever and ever. And he not only believes in Christianity, but he tried to practise it in his daily life. One thing he believes in most fervently—and that is, in the efficacy of prayer.

Throughout this long and terrible War he has insisted that the one thing wanted is the united prayers of Christians, offered up in all sincerity to God, so that He would turn the hearts of men to nobler and better purposes than human destruction.

But since hostile air-raids have become very frequent in London, many have noticed that the kind face of the dear old vicar has worn a very troubled expression. People have come to church more regularly, and joined with him in prayer to God to stop this merciless and horrible murder of innocent citizens—men, women, and children; but let them pray never so hard, the air-raids continue, and not even the shot and shell of hundreds of guns can keep the infernal machines away from the London area.

One evening they had a special service of prayer at the church, and the vicar appealed in very eloquent language to the Great God of Battles to save the poor innocent children from destruction by bombs. He appealed to God more especially as "Our Heavenly Father," who watched over and protected his children; but even in the midst of his prayer, a churchwarden was observed to walk up the middle aisle, and, to the astonishment of the congregation, proceeded up the steps to the pulpit, and presented the vicar with a note. The anxiety of the congregation was soon increased, for the vicar made the solemn announcement that he had just received notice from the police that an air-raid was taking place, and that they must "take cover" as soon as possible. The vicar said that he was inclined to continue the service and offer up further prayers, and trust to the Lord. But no sooner had he made the announcement than he observed that nearly all the members of the congregation were hurrying out of the church into the crypt, where no doubt they thought they could find safer shelter than in the church itself. Before they had been in the crypt a quarter of an hour, the members of the congregation, largely augmented by strangers, who had also sought what they considered the safest cover, were engaged in singing hymns and songs alternately, and making all kinds of noises, to drown the booming sound of the guns.

But as they proceeded with their singing a terrible sound was heard outside, as though in close proximity to the Church, although as a matter of fact it was some distance away. A dull, heavy, thud, like the falling of a bomb, followed by a terrible crash, like the tumbling down and the destruction of a great building. The boys in the crypt kept up the singing and shouting and clapping of hands to cheer up the women and children, many of whom were hysterical and in tears. For over two hours this kind of thing went on before the sound of bugles could be heard, and people knew that all was "clear" once more, and those who had sought the shelter of the crypt emerged into the streets and proceeded homewards. Some among the crowd, however, met friends who informed them that a terrible calamity had happened not far away—that several dwelling-places in a crowded thoroughfare had been reduced to ruins, and that many people had been buried beneath the débris. Many of them joined the constant stream of people who were going in search of the scene of the great catastrophe.

When they arrived the sight was terrible to behold. People were running about the streets in a dazed condition. The police were trying to keep the crowd back, and every now and then men appeared with stretchers carrying the bodies of those who had been killed or maimed in the destruction of the buildings. Many of the women fainted as they saw the dead and dying being taken away on ambulances. Somebody in the crowd mentioned that about a dozen children were buried beneath the ruins of the building in the cellar where they had sought shelter with their parents.

One man, who was evidently a Freethinker, said that God might at least have spared the innocent little kiddies. Another, who was probably a Christian or a Nothingarian, said that these awful calamities were enough to make a man doubt whether there was a good God or not.

"Ah," said one, who joined in the conversation, "all these disasters were brought about by the wickedness of the people. People had given up going to church and were seeking a life of pleasure, and forgetting all about God."

"What about the poor kiddies who are buried in the ruins—what have they done to offend God?" asked the Freethinker.

"God, in his wrath, sometimes destroys the children as a punishment for the sins of the parents."

"Oh, does he?" exclaimed the Freethinker. "Then all I can say is that he is very unjust, and not at all like a good father who would certainly try and protect the young, who could not help themselves."

But the Christian still persisted in saying that it was the wickedness of the people that had brought all the trouble upon us, and that what we wanted was more prayers.

"Don't talk nonsense," said the Freethinker, "there are plenty of prayers being offered up. They don't stop the enemy from dropping bombs. What we want is more guns and a stronger barrage."

"Ah, I see you are one of those who are in favour of using force against force; but that will never do," said the Christian. "We want some higher force. The Bible says the prayers of the righteous availeth much."

"Yes—but," said the other, "the Bible also says, 'There are none righteous—no, not one.' But let us cease this talk, they are bringing out some more dead. Let me quote Shakespeare: 'If you have tears, prepare to shed them now.'"

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The Storm Cloud's Burden.

I.—CATS.

A CAT is a diminutive tiger conspicuous for its love of comfort, its dexterity in lapping milk, and its ability to see in the dark with its whiskers. It obtains access to the Englishman's home because of a pleasing purr which, by some subtle alchemy, succeeds in creating around it an atmosphere of deep content. It enters the Englishwoman's home because it is rough on mice, and, occasionally, as a substitute for a husband.

The cat population tends to rapidly increase beyond the means of subsistence, but here God proposes and man disposes. The murder of the cat's young is according to a section of the unwritten law. We do not care for recent extensions of this law to human beings, but a moderately worded clause providing for the painless extermination of juries would meet with our approval.

The whereabouts of a cat is easily located in the daytime (at night-time it is a matter of grave difficulty). Presuming that the larder door has been slammed, barred, and bolted, puss will be found in the position which would have been chosen as the most comfortable seat in the house. This, although not proving the animal to be of great intelligence, proves it to be, in some respects, of equal intelligence to man.

If, perchance, this position should be unoccupied, we are afraid it will be necessary to re-inspect the larder.

The young cat, or kitten, is a delightful object. The play of a kitten is an altogether joyous spectacle, albeit there is something in it of pathos to one who has seen a few decades roll away. The blot on the kitten's escutcheon is the refinement of torture it displays towards the luckless mouse before consuming it. This trait, however, disappears with age and experience, the older cat considering the mouse as a meal, and, therefore, too solemn a thing to be trifled with. Similarly a Scotsman may be observed to drink his glass of whisky with avidity, fearing lest the whirligig of time should bring about its downfall. The progress towards a kindlier spirit is often in an inverse ratio in the human race, sixty years often finding a man bubbling over with bloodthirstiness. The symptoms first become apparent, though in a restrained form, about the age of forty-five.

Owing to a cat's gentleness, affectionate disposition, and playful little ways, chivalry has fixed upon the term "cat" as a generally appropriate term to apply to the fair sex.

Where food is concerned, the ability to make distinctions between meum and tuum is not over-conspicuous in a cat. This peculiarity is not, however, confined to them. The National Anthem of Wales, in fact, is written round one Welshman—Taffy, to wit—who had quick and easy methods of dealing with a food shortage. Because of the patriotic entente, we hasten to remark that this was a very long time ago, and that it was in Scotland where the blind beggar missed his decoy shilling.

Many mis-spent years in lodgings have convinced the writer that the cat, in these matters, often sins vicariously.

A cat has nine lives, and herein it possesses a great pull over man, as it need never think of turning over a new leaf and attending to its religious exercises until it has spent seven or eight of them. This is no small advantage. On the off-chance of influencing the character of our next re-incarnation, we here and now publicly plump for the career of a well-fed cat.

The love of a cat for its keepers has been described as cupboard love by those in whom any old kind of love would be a refreshing discovery. Yet, surely, there could be nothing more rational[1] than cupboard love.

> Blow, blow, thou winter wind,
> Thou art not so unkind
> As man's ingratitude.

Puss can be relied on, at least, to love the hand that feeds her.

II.—AND DOGS.

One need not say so much of dogs. They speak for themselves.

A dog is an animate object with a bark, a bite, and one or two tails. Those with two tails are quite unreasonably happy. A tail over two and a half inches in length on dogs of certain breeds is considered by connoisseurs to be a defect. Consequently, the excess is removed, the dog whose property it is not being consulted. The only effective permanent method of removal is to have it bitten off. The gentleman told off for this duty it has been observed has rarely, if ever, had a classical education; neither is he bound over to keep the peace.

In all impartial investigations conducted by man, he is found to be a much superior creature to a dog. The foregoing paragraph lends point to this finding.

We only know a dog to be a dog by an act of faith. Artemus Ward once said he couldn't define an elephant but he knew one when he saw one. This is a very clever remark, indeed, but it doesn't apply to a dog, for the more dogs you see the less inclined you are to dogmatize. You wouldn't mistake a Dandy Dinmont for a Newfoundland even on the darkest of War-time nights. Yet many estimable people are ready to swear that they are both dogs, so we leave it there.

When they had fashioned a few dogs up aloft in the canine department the artificers were so pleased with their work that they decided not to add further ingredients, but to leave well alone. That's how a dog comes not to have a soul.

We are inclined to agree with this judgment, for a dog is a highly creditable piece of work, and, obviously, not the work of a first-year man. We make an exception, of course, of the Daschund, which is a low-down crawling beast—for the duration of the War.

Similar caution, unfortunately, was not observed in the Adam and Eve department. There the soul was introduced, probably as a make-weight for the lack of a tail. This led to original sin, saints and sinners, the Prince of Peace, the Crusades, the Inquisition, and the rarity of Christian charity under the sun. It also led to a most infernal row in the celestial pattern shops, since which time there has been no further experimentation.

Defining a dog is child's play compared to defining a soul. For this task many years of theological training are necessary, and, even then, the definition must be launched in an atmosphere of reverential calm for it to have even an equivocal success. But we do know that, because of it, a man doesn't die like a dog. No matter how snivelling a lout he may be, when he's dead he is as objectionably alive as ever, and he goes either to heaven to be, for all eternity, a nuisance to the less unworthy of those who have backed the winning formulæ, or to hell, where he'll be a damned nuisance for a like period.

[1] We have written it, so let it stand.

What happens to men, women, children, and kind words doesn't happen to a dog. A dog just dies. No canine celestial celebrations, no dead dog's Derby days, no post-mortem prowls for puppies. Let him wag his tail, then, while he may, for when he's dead he's done for.

But dogs can be faithful unto death; they can love with a love that wavers not; they can grieve with a grief that kills.

So what matters?

A Winter's Day.

In the gloomy month of November when the people of England hang and drown themselves.—From the French.

THE poet asks, When Winter's here can Spring be far behind? And one reflects that the "great War" is three years and some months nearer an end than it was in the beginning. That is some comfort. To be quite exact, it was Thursday—a notable day with Freethinkers; for on that day the up-to-date one arrives, and when it does not, said Sceptics swear softly, and console themselves with a "back number," and find there, perhaps, much they had missed, and would not have missed for money. Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, these, since our unhappy school days, were somewhat forbidding days, and simply appalled. Thursday was brighter, Friday lighter, Saturday was jour de fete! Sunday was somewhat irksome to the juvenile; but to the emancipated adult, or even to the patriarchal sceptic, it is a Pagan day of joy.

We awoke in the morning in those distant years and wondered what day was it; and the warm or cold tints of the "spectrum lines," cast on the white bedroom walls by the rising sun in at the window, were prophetic of the weather. It was Saturday, with its free and errant happiness; or merely the beginning of the week, and we trudged to the house of correction, but even this penance redeemed by azure pools in the roadway, in seeming deeps profound, but clear and fresh as the childish mind itself, reflecting the rolling skies. It was "Alice in Wonderland," and "Through the Looking Glass," as we learned later from that creator of realest fairylands, Lewis Carrol.

But to return to our Thursday and our November day. There is a conical islet in our misty Firth known as Holy Isle. It is clothed these days in glooms opaque; or only partly dwelling in the cloud—cloud, edged with the serene silv'ry splendour of filtered light from the lower horizon. Close at hand are the vandyke woods and rusty vegetation of November—landscape of sombre sere. Suddenly the sun illumines the scene, turning the bronze to gold, in the glow, as it might seem, of some Vulcan's milder, deeper, softer fire; field and wood are for the moment steeped in a rich glory the Summer never knew. Life itself is made up of mere contrast, light and shade; nor is this mere analogy—man is compounded of the elements, just as are the clouds and skies—he is gay and gloomy, good and bad; remove one quality and he is something else. No one, says the Hebrew Bible, has seen God at any time. In like manner, it may be said, no one has ever seen himself. Perhaps no one could endure himself if he had. Illusion there must be; natural illusion—distinct from delusion—and in our own minds we rear an artificial metaphysical environment in which, complacently contented, but much beguiled, we live and move and have our being.

And now it is the evening, and all is still as we peruse the dying glories of the short November day. The great furnace of the sun would seem to be extinguished every night. Its calm, mellow radiance steeps in amber-yellow light the quiet interstices of the clouds, and turning the cloud itself to glowing embers and the ruddy hue of consuming charcoal. Slowly and softly, noiselessly, the shadows fall. It is peace. And yet we are at war. I never could understand this lust of empire. I have all the empire I desire. I have just suggested it. No; I would rather be the fuddled farmer of whom Burns wrote:—

> Kings may be blest, but Tam was glorious, and go down to the tongueless silence of the dreamless dust, than to be one of those iron advocates of force and murder variously known in the various countries they represent and curse alike. A clear, pearly glow lights all the encircling horizon beneath the grey and dun of the beautiful, brooding, beneficent night.
> O'er a' the ills o' life victorious!

And out of the misty seas and cloudy twilight, dim shapes appear, the shoulders of huger hills, massive but mild, gigantic yet gentle, shrouded, softened, sublimed, faded at length in the folds of night's descending pall. Perhaps out there, in intervals in the rolling mists, the fitful hermit moon looks down and gleams on rock and scaur, on peak and dark ravine, lighting the solemn, solitary wild, refulgent, recluse, immune; and the sea surrounds it sobbingly and goeth forth, "dread, fathomless, alone."

ANDREW MILLAR.

A Sounding-Board for Prejudice.

THIS suggestive—and comparatively mild—description of our daily British Press has been borrowed from a paragraph in "Acid Drops" (November 25) referring to Dr. Lyttleton's expressions about newspapers. Anybody who has seen anything of the inner workings of newspaper offices knows quite well that newspapers are primarily commercial undertakings. But one effect of the War has been to make it more difficult for newspaper proprietors to ascertain what current public opinion on many questions is. Circulation is being kept up because all classes want to have the latest news about the progress of the War; but some editors would find their cynicism tinged with surprise if they saw the sneers of many thinking members of the public when they glance at the trashy pabulum often offered for public consumption. There was never war bread like it!

"Give us this day our daily thrill" used to be the peace-time prayer of the editor of the orthodox daily paper. The universal sensation of the War has bewildered the editorial brain, and the Government has "controlled" the editorial right hand—which, incidentally, has not yet quite lost its cunning. If it cannot do anything else, it can boom the "National" Mission of Repentance and Hope or the "National" Day of Prayer, and so try again to test the condition of the public mind; and—well, if the "National" Mission results have neither materialized nor spiritualized—and if the "National" Day of Prayer does not come up to the most sanguine expectations—we make no rash prediction one way or another—can the poor editor be blamed after he has done his best? Now, can he?

Some of the leading dailies have, unfortunately, afforded evidence to justify the description of the daily press which forms the title of this article. In these columns, more than once, have appeared reasonable, temperately worded letters containing unfashionable opinions which, though supported by arguments of general interest, had been refused the hospitality of the columns of leading daily newspapers. And as the big cock crows, the little one learns; so, with one or two praiseworthy exceptions, we find the provincial press following in the wake of the big organs, and cutting out with valiant censoriousness any contributions which would be likely to offend the susceptibilities of the old ladies—male and female—who form the most important part of their clientele.

But we have another—and, we fear, a graver—criticism to offer about the daily press. It has of late been placing itself in a sinister light by its lack of taste in recording news about individuals. One may take leave to say that every decent person's susceptibilities were shocked by the gross and inconsiderate way in which the proceedings at the inquest on the late Mr. Fred Billington were reported. We refrain from repeating the details. Many who had no personal acquaintance with the gifted actor, but who had frequently seen him perform, and in a sense felt he was their friend, could not finish the paragraph without a sense of outrage. Such an unbecoming business accentuates the prejudice of which the daily press is the sounding-board. Independence of opinion on unpopular topics they boycott; but they are quick enough to flourish any personal matter about an actor—however offensive it may be to the man's friends. This is not the liberty; it is the licence of the Press. The Press is not free; it is the slave of convention.

THE STRUGGLE FOR EXISTENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Your correspondent, "Young Colquhoun," tries to discredit my claims for a Voluntary Co-operative Commonwealth on the ground that population tends to outrun subsistence, so that there must always be a struggle for existence, in which the weakest go to the wall. This is the exploded theory of Dr. Malthus, who was a Church of England parson, and propounded his plausible theory over one hundred years ago to ease the consciences of himself and his wealthy patrons. It is not a question of tendency, but a question of fact. Never mind what the tendency may be, but is it a fact that the world is now overcrowded? Is it true at this present time that every available acre of land, and every machine, and every man, woman, and child are utilized to their utmost capacity in the production of wealth, and yet found to be insufficient to maintain the population? So far is this from being true that there are millions of acres of land in the British Islands lying absolutely uncultivated, and that plenty of food for double our present population could be raised without the least difficulty.

The late Professor Huxley was a clever comparative anatomist, but showed himself to be quite ignorant of economic science when he tried to prove in a leading magazine, some thirty years ago, that capital employs labour. The idea of a spade employing a man might have occurred to him as being too ludicrous for sober assertion, yet he wasted much thought in his ill-fated attempt to prove it, and thereby lost all claim to be an authority in economic science.

If "Young Colquhoun" will study Mr. Arthur Kitson's valuable works on finance, he will find out all about the War Debt, and how easily it could have been avoided.

G. O. Warren, Major (retired).

GOD AND THE WAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Please allow me to thank your correspondent, Mr. E. Egerton Stafford, for his letter with reference to mine, on the above subject. I fear I did not make my meaning sufficiently clear. As a firm believer in evolution and the Darwinian theory, I hold that some force, which, possibly, I erroneously called a law, compels us periodically to fight for our very existence, because we constantly tend to increase beyond the means of subsistence. Man being the most highly developed of all animals has attained largely the command over the rest of creation, and, consequently, his struggle with the lower animals is comparatively a minor matter. Probably the whole world is, at all times, populated up to the limit of subsistence.

Although we see little of the struggle amongst the lower animals, the struggle is, nevertheless, intense, and instantly that an animal falters on the way there are innumerable foes at hand to assist in administering the final coup.

Now what could look more peaceful than the picture which Nature presents to us on a fine spring or summer day? Yet all the time the struggle for existence is there.

On the other hand, what could be more unrestful than the appearance of any of our large and busy towns during working hours—at least, to those of us who have eyes to see? Avarice, toil, vice and misery meet us at every corner, and one wonders how such a mass of numbers manage to exist at all.

The cause of all this hopelessness is, of course, "over-population," but, as your correspondent says: "it is a well-known fact that we can check and modify the processes of nature." Man has now attained to "reason," but of which, alas, he has so far made but little use!

Margarine.

The parsons write stale sermons in their sleep,
And church bells ring on Sunday by the score;
The bishops on their "Holy Missions" creep,
Mumbling the platitudes that we ignore.
Oh! wondrous wheels of God's divine machine;
For though in pain, with contrite hearts we weep;
Our soldier's wives must fight for margarine.

The Sunday-school may "cleanse the infant soul,"
And Christian ladies walk in fear of God;
The chapel may become life's highest goal,
And Baptist aisles the best that can be trod.
But though we stick to God like secotine,
And walk beneath the everlasting rod;
Our soldier's wives must fight for margarine.

Arthur F. Thorn.

The people have begun to suspect that one particular form of their past misgovernment has been that their masters have set them to do all the work, and have themselves taken all the wages. In a word, that what was called governing them, means only wearing fine clothes, and living on good fare at their expense. And I am sorry to say the people are quite right in this opinion also. If you inquire into the vital fact of the matter, this you will find to be the constant structure of European society for the thousand years of the feudal system; it was divided into peasants who lived by working; priests who lived by begging; and knights who lived by pillaging.—John Ruskin.

The great remedy for calumny, as for afflictions of the heart, is time. If people find fault with our principles or our conduct, good or bad, the best course is to pay no regard to them, and go on as before. After a short time the subject will become stale, and the slanderers will cease talking about it, in order to hunt the trail of some fresh scandal. And the more we show ourselves steadfast and consistent in pursuing our own course, regardless of all idle gossip, so much the sooner will that which was at first condemned as strange or unreasonable be seen in another light and acknowledged as rational and sensible. The world always comes round in the end to the views of those who firmly persist in following their own path, and ends finally by giving up its own opinions and adopting theirs. Whence it results, as is well known, that the weak live as the world wills, and the strong as they will themselves.—Leopardi.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Views and Opinions.

Religion and History.

A correspondent asks, apropos of the capture of Jerusalem, What is the function of the Jew in history? We can only reply, in the words of the famous essay on snakes in Ireland, "There isn't any." The question strikes us as a spilling over of theology into the realm of sociology. It is essentially a theological notion that certain peoples have particular parts to play in the development of the world, and it is responsible for a great deal of confused thinking and social harm. We have seen this kind of thing illustrated in the talk of its being part of the mission of Britain to carry civilization to various parts of the world. We see it in the German appeal to God as to the "destiny" of the Germanic race. And it is also seen in the familiar Christian apologetic that while to the Greeks was assigned one function, and to the Romans another, to the Jews was given a genius for religion. And all this is pure nonsense. A nation or a people may play a certain part in the history of the world, but that part is dependent upon the accident of position, of its relations to other peoples, and of a hundred and one other factors. The Jew has no greater innate genius for religion or for finance than anyone else. His clinging to religion and his devotion to finance is an easily imaginable result of discernible historic forces. Modify these and he loses his religion as quickly as anyone else, just as the Jewish people produce quite as freely as other peoples an idealistic non-commercial type. There is no "destiny" driving a people to a set goal. There are numerous forces that determine the direction of a people's development. God in history is as ridiculous as is God elsewhere.

Life and Religion.

Apart from the view of the subject—a full discussion of which would occupy more space than we have at our disposal—there is one aspect of the part played by religion in history that is worthy of a little attention. At present the case of the German Empire is being held up to us as an awful example of what happens to a nation when it forsakes religion—a warning usually accompanied by the saving qualification that the religion forsaken is the "true" religion. Little more than a century ago it was France that furnished the example to English conservatives and clericals. A few years hence it may be Russia. And these special examples are part of a general theory that religion promotes the welfare of a nation, and neglect of religion leads to its decline. This theory is not only held in the absence of evidence in its support, it is proclaimed in defiance of the clearest evidence to its disproof. The ordinary apologist, even when better informed himself, knows that ninety-nine people out of every hundred are supremely deficient in anything approaching a philosophy of history, or of even a working knowledge of historic processes. And thus, while on the one hand there is the plainest proof that nations have declined in proportion as they have allowed their secular life to be overshadowed by religious considerations; we have, on the other hand, the confident assertion that nothing is of value to a people once they have lost their grip of "true" religion.

The Case of the Jew.

Take as an example the case of the Jews. On the Christian thesis, the Jews alone among the people of antiquity possessed the "true" religion. With what result? Instead of this producing a strong, healthy national life, we see them being continually overrun by less religious peoples; while whatever of value the Jew has contributed to the world, he gave after the destruction of his national life. In art or in science the Jews, so long as they remained a nation, gave the world absolutely nothing. Egypt, Assyria, Phœnicia, Greece, Rome, have all left enduring records of a healthy national life. Ancient Judea left positively nothing at all. And it lies on the face of the facts that whatever position the Jew assumed later in the world was due to forces causally unconnected with his religion. That the Jew became great in physical, medical, chemical, and mathematical science in the mediæval period—under Mohammedan protection—was due not to his religion, but to his following the line of Greek and Roman developments, and to the boycotting of science by the Christian Church. That he became the financier of mediæval Christendom was again due to the attitude of the same Church towards the Jew and to the development of secular life. And even the preservation of the Jews as a distinct people was wholly due to the sustained persecution of the Christian world. Without that, the Jewish people and the Jewish religion might long since have disappeared. The Jews were preserved as a people by the very means adopted to exterminate them. Persecution here, as is so often the case, defeated its own ends. Persecution, when it does not annihilate, preserves. But the religion of the Jew gave him nothing worth having, and gave the world nothing worth the having. It made for unprogressiveness before Rome finally scattered the Jews over the world. And in common with all religions, it makes for unprogressiveness wherever it is in a position to exercise coercive influence.

Rome, Pagan and Christian.

Take, again, the case of Rome. Of all the peoples of antiquity the Romans were, probably, the least religious. A formal religion existed, but, as Gladstone admitted, it exerted but little active influence on their life. This was certainly the case before the time of Julius Cæsar. And we see Rome extending its sway over one people after another, in each case more religious than itself. The history of Rome after Cæsar conveys the same lesson. As it became more religious, it became less open to the influence of progressive ideas, its social life began to contract, its statesmanship narrower and more repressive, culminating finally in the welter of superstition and obscurantism that sat enthroned on the ruins of ancient civilization as the Mediæval Christian Church. No Christian will deny that Europe had more of the "true" religion from the fourth to the fourteenth century than it had prior to that period. And no one but a priest would hesitate to place the pre-Christian period as greater in all that makes for a healthy and progressive social life.

The Case of Spain.

Or consider the case of Spain. Under Rome we have that country sharing in the progressive life of the Empire. Till the eighth century we have it under the sway of Christian ideas, and as stagnant as the rest of the Christian world. Under the Mohammedan conquerors —themselves saved from the consequences of their own religious belief by a succession of wise, liberal, and, probably, Freethinking caliphs, we see it for over 500 years developing a civilization that was without a competitor, and laying the foundations of a general Renaissance in science and philosophy. Reconquered by the Christians, we see Spain becoming the most Christian nation in Europe, and sinking lower and lower in the scale of civilization with every advance of Christian influence. Spain owed its greatness to its liberal Mohammedan rulers, as it owed its decline to the rise to power of the Christian Church. Under the one it was great in commercial, scientific, and social life. Under the other it became a synonym for intolerance, obscurantism, and national decay. And, as with Christianity, so with Mohammedanism. Just so soon as the religious forces in the Moslem world gained the upper hand, decay set in. Christian or non-Christian, the lesson is everywhere the same. National greatness and a controlling religion cannot both exist with the same people.

The Writing on the Wall.

Examples are to be found in all directions that will illustrate the truth on which we have dwelt. They can be found in primitive as in more advanced communities. And the reasons are not hard to discover. By their very nature religions are committed to unprogressiveness. Every new idea is a threat to an established religion, which whether Christian or non-Christian, whether ancient or modern, stands committed to perpetuate the past to the utmost of its power. Everywhere the development of a nation is proportionate to the degree with which religion is checked and controlled by secularizing and rationalizing forces. In brief, no State yet has ever found it possible to give religion a free hand without endangering its own existence. When it has allowed religion to rule it has offered the world such spectacles as Spain or Byzantium, or, in a milder form, Geneva under Calvinism. But in general the State has been compelled to step in and moderate the zeal of religionists in the interests of its own well-being. That is why the history of civilization—genuine civilization—is everywhere a history of the rationalizing and secularizing of the State. The process is a slow one, but it is nevertheless a sure one. Churches may fight against it with varying degrees of success. Their tactics may delay the march of the army of reason and of humanity, but they are quite powerless against its ultimate triumph.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Apologetic Absurdities.

"VIATOR," of the Church Times, tells us of an old Baptist minister, who had learnt Hebrew for the express purpose of studying the first chapter of Genesis in the language in which it was written. To the critical examination of that portion of Holy Writ he devoted seven years. His all-satisfying reward was the discovery that the first chapter of Genesis anticipated all the discoveries of modern science. "And all those that are yet to be made," mischievously suggested a roguish bystander. The reverend gentleman was silent, with good reason, and possibly the bantering remark opened his eyes to the absurdity of his position. Not only Genesis did not anticipate the modern findings of astronomy and geology, but several of its most important statements are flatly contradicted by them. "Viator" does not deny this, but only hints that, in the opinion of his friend, "the text contains nothing inconsistent with such discovories," the theory being that the author was Divinely guarded against error in relating the story of Creation. As "Viator" says, "on any hypothesis of Divine inspiration there is no intrinsic absurdity in the supposition of such guarding"; but as a matter of indubitable fact there is absolutely no foundation for the theory. "Viator" goes so far as to make the following significant admission:—

> I do not expect Divinely inspired writings of two or three thousand years ago to be free from error concerning matters which have more recently come to light. If my friend's object was to justify Holy Scripture in this respect, I am afraid that he wasted his seven years, and perhaps also the preliminary months spent in the acquisition of Hebrew.

On December 19, 1891, Colonel Ingersoll's famous Christmas Sermon appeared in the Evening Telegram, the central teaching of which was thus summarized: "The good part of Christmas is not always Christian—it is generally Pagan; that is to say, human, natural." Everybody knows how literally true that statement is. Then came the addition:—

> Christianity did not come with tidings of great joy but with a message of eternal grief. It came with the threat of everlasting torture on its lips. It meant war on earth and perdition hereafter.

In reality the short discourse was a vigorous attack on Christianity, claiming that, though "it taught some good things—the beauty of love and kindness in man," yet "as a torch-bearer, as a bringer of joy, it has been a failure." Perhaps the most characteristic and mordant passage in it is the following:—

> It (Christianity) has given infinite consequences to the acts of finite beings, crushing the soul with a responsibility too great for mortals to bear. It has filled the future with fear and flame, and made God the keeper of an eternal penitentiary destined to be the home of nearly all the sons of men. Not satisfied with that, it has deprived God of the pardoning power.

While thus assailing the Christian religion, the Colonel expressed his gratitude to it for having borrowed from Paganism the joyous old festival called Christmas. Christmas had been in existence for countless ages before Christ was heard of, and throughout all its history in Christendom its Pagan elements have been the most conspicuous and by far the most popular. It celebrates the triumph of the sun over all the forces of darkness and cold. In the imaginary foretaste of spring and summer, all hearts rejoice. Washington Irving laments the disappearance of many games and ceremonials which used to characterize Christmas. "They flourished," he informs us, "in times full of spirit and lustihood, when men enjoyed life roughly, but heartily and vigorously: times wild and picturesque, which furnished poetry with its richest materials, and the drama with its most attractive variety of characters and manners" (The Sketch Book, p. 204). Colonel Ingersoll closed his celebrated Sermon in the following benevolent strain:—

> Christmas is a good day to forgive and forget—a good day to throw away prejudices and hatreds—a good day to fill your heart and your house, and the hearts and houses of others, with sunshine.

In publishing that "Christmas Sermon" the Evening Telegram displayed no little courage and impartiality, little dreaming, perhaps, how its action would excite the wrath of the self-appointed ambassadors of the Prince of Peace. The effect was much worse than that of stirring up a hornet's nest. A swarm of malicious enemies hastened to wreak their rage on both the Colonel and the journal. The first of these was the Rev. Dr. J. M. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, the recognized organ of the Methodist Church, who headed his attack "Lies That Are Mountainous." This servant of the God of love called upon the public to boycott the Evening Telegram for its audacity in publishing such blasphemous stuff. He wanted all religious people to unite for the purpose of destroying the God-denying sheet. The Telegram unhesitatingly accepted the issue thus raised, and dared Dr. Buckley to do his utmost. A bitter controversy ensued, which was kept going for more than a year; and every now and then Ingersoll condescended to reply to his angry critics. All the leading clergymen of New York and Brooklyn took part in the attempt to demolish the wicked Infidel, which they vainly imagined they could do by heaping personal abuse upon his head. They called him a devil, a liar, a blasphemer, an enemy of God and man, but left his arguments unanswered. Dr. Buckley charged him with having written "gigantic falsehoods," but utterly failed to prove the charge. Another, unable to refute his statements, looked forward with great glee to the time when the Atheist would be finally discomfited, saying:—

> Let the world wait but for a few years at the most, when death's icy fingers feel for the heartstrings of the boaster, and, as most of his like who have gone before him have done, he will sing another strain.

Another, Dr. Deems, a popular New York preacher, and, in many respects, an excellent man, comparing Ingersoll to the Devil, said:—

> The Devil is an organizing, imperial intellect, vindictive, sharp, shrewd, persevering, the aim of whose works is to overthrow the authority of God's law.

That typical controversy took place twenty-six years ago, and the fact to be emphasized is that it serves as an instance of the complete futility of all attempts to demonstrate the truth of the Christian religion. Ingersoll was not answered; he was simply vilified for daring to criticize the popular creed. His crime consisted in holding views which differed from those cherished by the clergy. They had a perfect right to differ from one another, but they denied his right to think for himself. This was his retort:—

> What right has Dr. Buckley to disagree with Cardinal Gibbons, and what right has Cardinal Gibbons to disagree with Dr. Buckley? The same right that I have to disagree with them both.

Dr. Fort Newton assures his hearers that the unbelief so common twenty and thirty years ago has passed away never to return; but he is radically mistaken. Unbelievers are more numerous to-day than at any former time, and they are still multiplying. Why is it that only some ten or fifteen per cent. of the population of London attend places of worship, while the few picture palaces permitted to open on Sunday are crowded to their utmost capacity? Why is it that doctors of theology have lost their power and their anathemas do not count? Why is it that at places of amusement all allusions to the clerical profession are received with contemptuous laughter? The only explanation is that for the overwhelming majority of people the religion of the Cross possesses no reality whatever. Christmas is nothing but a national holiday for the bulk of the people, and not a religious festival, simply because they do not believe in the Incarnation, or in the God-man whose miraculous birth is commemorated by a few in churches and chapels. How can intelligent people honestly join in the singing of such lines as the following:—

> Hark; the herald angels sing
> Glory to the new-born King,
> Peace on earth and mercy mild,
> God and sinners reconciled.
> Joyful, all ye nations, rise
> Join the triumph of the skies, when we are in the midst of the horrors of the most inhuman War ever waged? It is an exploded superstition—a myth that ought to have died centuries ago, and the only rational thing to do is to keep Christmas in honour of the triumph and glory of the sun, and all the good things which therefrom accrue.

The Voltaire of Our Day.

> I am now of all humours that have showed themselves humours since the days of goodman Adam to the pupil age of this present twelve o'clock at midnight.
> Shakespeare, "Henry IV."

Of all the notable Continental writers, M. Anatole France is the most Voltairean, for he carries on the same splendid literary tradition. As he has himself wittily expressed it, he is a symbol, as the citizen Momoro represented the Goddess of Reason at the festivals of the French Revolution. The word Voltairean means also something of tone and character, something of an alert and indulgent regard, a delicacy of touch, a subtle irony which immediately suggests the very ideal of the French intellect:—

> Ravishing as red wine in woman's form,
> A splendid Mœnad, she of the delirious laugh,
> Her body twisted flame with the smoke cap crowned.

Over seventy years of age by the book, M. Anatole France has built up a splendid reputation, "four square to all the winds that blow." Not only is he known throughout the civilized world as a writer, but he is also a humanitarian. A convinced Freethinker, it was only natural that he should take up the brilliant sword of his wit by the side of the Atheist, Emile Zola, in the terrible days of the Dreyfus struggle, when the heroic Zola championed truth and justice in the supreme hour of danger. It was an abiding example of magnificent courage. Honest to their own injury, brave against the enmity of tens of thousands, these Freethinkers, in defending a poor, persecuted Jew, raised the world's opinion of human nature.

M. France's literary forefathers are Rabelais, Swift, and Voltaire; three of the most significant and virile names in literature. Yet he is no copyist, but strikingly original, modern, and Parisian. The thing he has in common with these great predecessors is his whole-hearted hatred of injustice and his power over language. Although a master of the lash, he uses his whip caressingly. He does not cut his subject to ribbons like Swift; nor, like Voltaire, overflow with an adroit and subtle humour, which stings like a thousand wasps. Rather is he like Rabelais, who shifts satire into the realm of imaginative comedy, and pities while he smiles.

Rabelais was so much more tolerant than Swift, who, writing in the shadow of the Christian superstition, found all the world a dunghill, and man the most loathsome thing that squatted upon it. But Rabelais, out in the open air, with all the winds of the Renaissance blowing upon him, was more than a mere satirist. Under the motley of the jester beat as generous and as kindly a heart as ever throbbed in the service of humanity. M. France possesses no small share of the tolerant humour of Rabelais, and at a distance of several centuries carries on the same intellectual tradition.

Although M. France has written quite a number of books, his works have a uniform excellence, and it is difficult to pick out any representative masterpieces. He has written no Candide, no Les Miserables, those seminal masterpieces which represent the sum total of their author's genius. Like his illustrious countryman, Montaigne, he is not to be judged by a single essay. And, like Montaigne, he is a philosopher in disguise. He has used the novel as a medium of expression, personal, and intellectual. In those ever-charming pages of La Vie Litteraire he has smilingly told us that he is not speaking pontifically, but only talking of himself, sending his mind adventuring among masterpieces. Similarly in his novels, he is always as personal and as intimate as Charles Lamb. In his Isle of the Penguins he puts modern society under the microscope, and in The Gods Athirst he unfolds himself on the subject of the French Revolution. With exquisite art and tender understanding, he gets to the heart of the Revolution. With what sympathy does he show the rebel Gamelin starving himself that a poor mother might be fed, or apologizing to the nine-years old child for his fanaticism:—

> Child, you will grow up free and happy, and you will owe it to the infamous Gamelin. I am ferocious that you may be happy; I am cruel that you may be kind, I am pitiless that to-morrow the whole French people may embrace each other with tears of joy.

This genial satirist can, in another mood, give us delightful glimpses of his own childhood. My Friend's Book is as delightful and trifling as a heart could desire, and in that perfect chapter, "The Hermitage of the Jardin des Plantes," he describes Pierre Noziere's childish passion towards saintship with inimitable grace and irony:—

> My sole idea was to live the life of an ascetic. In order to lose no time in putting my ideas in operation, I refused to eat my breakfast. My mother, who knew nothing of my new vocation, thought I was ill, and looked at me with an anxiety that it pained me to behold. Nevertheless, I persevered with my fasting, and then, remembering the example of Saint Simeon Stylites, who spent his life on a pillar, I climbed up on the kitchen cistern, but it was impossible to live there, for Julie, our cook, promptly dislodged me. Though I had thus been ousted from the cistern, I pursued with undiminished ardour the way of perfection, and next decided to imitate Saint Nicholas, of Patras, who gave all his riches to the poor. My father's study window looked out on the quay, and from it I proceeded to fling down a dozen coppers or so which had been presented to me because they were new and bright. These I followed up with marbles, humming tops, whip top, and eelskin whip.
> "The child is crazy," exciaimed my father, as he shut the window.
> I felt angry and mortified at hearing this judgment passed upon me, but I remembered that my father, not being a saint like myself, would not share with me in the glories of the blessed, a reflection from which I derived great consolation.

No one but a Frenchman could have wtitten this passage, and of this delicate and delightful stuff is woven the golden fabric of his genius. So original, so modern, is this great author, who, among other names, has been called the Pope of Freethought. Anatole France was born in a bookseller's shop, and has "ink in his blood." During the most impressionable years of his life he was surrounded by old folios, illuminated manuscripts, and artistic missals. At every pore of a sensitive nature he drew in the love of literature, and splendid use he has made of his intimate and peculiar knowledge. To-day he is the greatest living writer of French, a magnificent scholar, a student of the bye-ways of knowledge, psychologist, publicist, humourist, humanitarian, and wit. When, by a natural fitness of things, he became librarian to the French Senate, the environment was suitable for changing the bookworm into a delightful writer. Never a hustler, he was near forty years of age when his first notable story, The Crime of Sylvester Bonnard, was published, and this proved a veritable triumph. Crowned by the Academy, M. France has taken the tide at the flood which was to lead him to fortune. Later, he issued masterpiece after masterpiece until he had all Europe at his feet.

To this most distinguished of living continental writers we owe much of the present proud position of Freethought, for scepticism is nothing if not intellectual. In the far-off days, Francois Rabelais caught a glimpse of the dawn of liberty, and largely through the magnificent genius of his successors it has now permeated all classes of society. M. Anatole France stands for the liberation of the intellect no less than Rabelais. Like his illustrious predecessor, he is first and last a Freethinker, and has the same abiding faith in the triumph of what our own George Meredith has called "the best of causes."

The Bible and Immortality.

THE SON OF MAN.

IN searching the Bible for evidence of the belief in the resurrection of the dead and a future life, we find those doctrines in but one period of history—that of the so-called apostolic times. If we add to the canonical books those of the Apocrypha, written during the interval between the Old and New Testaments, we find that the belief in immortality had arisen among a small section of the Jewish people, not as a revelation from heaven, but merely as a speculative philosophy. In the New Testament, however, both the resurrection of the body and eternal life are stated to be undoubted facts, made known to the world by God's only son, Jesus Christ. It is this statement, found in all the New Testament books, which still remains to be verified.

The case stands thus: The God of the New Testament is also the God of the Old, who is represented as saying "I am the Lord; I change not" (Mal. iii. 6). This unchangeable deity chose the Hebrews as a people specially his own, and watched over them for 1460 years (from Abraham to Nehemiah). During the whole of this long period the utmost he ever bestowed on this people may be summed up in peace, prosperity, and longevity upon earth, so that they might enjoy a peaceful national life and die at a good old age: he never thought of giving them another life after death, and therefore never referred to the subject. This system was continued down to the year A.D. 28, when he suddenly decided that he would grant to all mankind a new life after death, to be passed by some in a paradise of delight, and by others in a place of torment. In accordance with this alleged project we read:—

> John iii. 16.—For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life.

In the same Gospel it is recorded that a Jewish teacher named Jesus went about the country proclaiming himself to be this "only begotten son," and declaring that he had been sent by God, his "Father," to promise all believers a post-mortem life of bliss. Now, with regard to this unique plan of redemption, the first point to be noticed is that not one of the writers of the thirty-nine books in the Hebrew scriptures appears ever to have heard that his God had an "only begotten son," or that that deity ever had thoughts at any time of devising a scheme of salvation other than that in force in Old Testament times. These Biblical writers, too, are alleged to have written under the direct inspiration of their God, and to have recorded that deity's will to mankind: but in all these writings there is not a single word, from Genesis to Malachi, which conveys the smallest intimation either that the Hebrew God was blessed with a son, or that he had any intention of drawing up a new plan of salvation for the human race. On the contrary, there are many passages which tend to prove that the "Lord God" lived in blissful ignorance of having any male offspring, and also that he had not the remotest idea of employing a new method of redemption for his people. We read, for instance:—

> Deut. iv. 39.—Know therefore this day, and lay it to thine heart, that the Lord he is God in heaven above, and upon the earth beneath: there is none else.
> Isaiah xliv. 6, 9.—Thus saith the Lord, the King of Israel, and his Redeemer, the Lord of hosts; I am the first, and I am the last; and beside me there is no God. Is there a God beside me? Yea, there is no rock. I know not any.

Thus, the Lord God of the Hebrews, who must surely have known whether he had any divine relatives, knew of no other God or Redeemer save himself—which fact excludes the godhead of Jesus Christ. Again, we learn from the Jewish Scriptures that the only plan which the Lord had conceived for the benefit of all mankind was the conversion of the Gentile nations to Judaism. In accordance with this project all nations, it is stated, would at some future time go up to Jerusalem from year to year to worship the Hebrew deity. Witness the following:—

> Zech. xiv. 16.—And it shall come to pass that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem shall go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of Tabernacles.
> Isaiah lxvi. 21, 23.—And of the Gentile nations also will I take for priests and for Levites, saith the Lord. .....And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, said the Lord.

Here we see that the Lord God had no idea of ever giving up the Mosaic ritual. The offering of animals in sacrifice, the duties of priests and Levites, the observance of the Jewish feasts and holy days, as prescribed in the Law, were to be continued for ever. The following are some examples of these ordinances. The office of high priest was to be "a perpetual statute .....throughout their generations" (Exod. xxix. 9; xl. 15); the feast of Passover was to be "an ordinance to them and their sons for ever" (Exod. xii. 14, 17, 24); the feast of Weeks, the Day of Atonement, and the feast of Tabernacles were each to be "a statute for ever in their generations" (Lev. xxiii. 14, 31, 41); the Sabbath was to be observed "throughout their generations for a perpetual covenant" (Exod. xxxi. 16); the Peace offerings, and all other sacrifices were to be continued for ever (Lev. iii. 17; xvi. 29, 34; xxiii. 21; Num. xviii. 8, etc.).

Since, then, all the ordinances in the Mosaic ritual were to be continued throughout all the Hebrew generations for ever, no place is left for the New Testament Saviour: that Redeemer and his office are absolutely excluded. Upon this subject the great theorist, Paul, says that: "Since through one man sin entered into the world, and death through sin, so death passed upon all men, for that all sinned.....For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive" (Rom. v. 12; 1 Cor. xv. 22). The reference here is to the story of the "Fall of man" (Gen. iii.); but Paul is wrong here, as he is in all his other theories. The Genesis account of the "Fall" is pure fable, and, as a matter of fact, the doctrine of original sin is nowhere to be found in the Old Testament. Atonement was made for the Hebrew nation as a whole by regular animal sacrifices, and for individual sins by peace offerings. A man who remained faithful to the national God, and was careful in the observance of the appointed festivals, not forgetting the tithes to the priests, was free from all sin in the sight of the Hebrew deity. There was, therefore, no need for a redeemer, or for an atonement by Jesus Christ. Hence, if the latter personage really went about proclaiming "eternal life" to the people of Palestine, he did so without the authorization or sanction of the "Father" in heaven. Neither, again, is any prediction to be found in the Old Testament of the coming of a divine teacher who should preach a new doctrine of immortality, and suffer death for the sins of the world. Every passage which has been cited for this purpose (including Isaiah liii.) can be shown to refer to some other matter.

We come now to the name which Jesus is represented as giving to himself in the Gospels—"the Son of man." This was probably suggested, in the first instance, by reading the book of Ezekiel, in which the Lord God employed that appellation over ninety times in addressing its prophetical writer; but in that book we find nothing but the name. In Dan. vii. 9-14 someone called "the ancient of days" is seated upon a throne ready to judge the nations; then comes "one like unto a son of man," to whom is given "dominion, glory, and a kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages should serve him." By reference to verse 27 this "son of man" is seen to be a king or Jewish messiah, and the kingdom that of Israel—which agrees with the plan that all nations shall be converted to Judaism. In this paragraph verses 9 and 10 are misplaced; they should follow verse 12.

We now turn to the Book of Enoch, which was in the hands of Jude and other early Christians. In this book the "Son of man"—who is also named the "Elect One"—is found in seven or eight different chapters, from two of which I make the following extracts:—

> Chap. xlvi.—There I beheld the Ancient of days whose head was like white wool, and with him another, whose countenance resembled that of man. His countenance was full of grace, like that of one of the holy angels.....This is the Son of man, to whom righteousness belongs.....The Lord of Spirits has chosen him, and he has surpassed all in everlasting uprightness.
> Chap. lxviii.—He sat upon the throne of his glory; and the principal part of the judgment was assigned to him, the Son of man. Sinners shall disappear and perish from the face of the earth.....According to their ranks of corruption shall they be imprisoned.....Everything wicked shall disappear and depart from before his face; and the word of the Son of man shall become powerful in the presence of the Lord of spirits.

The writer of the book of Enoch, there can be little doubt, took his "Ancient of days" and "Son of man" from the book of Daniel, and then drew upon his imagination for all he has to say respecting the latter. The Gospel writers took their "Son of man" from "Enoch." This appears evident from the fact that only in the last-named book is the "principal part of the judgment" placed in the hands of the Son of man. Moreover, in the Fourth Gospel the Son of man is stated to have been "with God" before the creation of the world (John i. 1-4; xvii. 5). Where did this evangelist get his information? This, again, could only have been taken from "Enoch," where it is stated:—

> Chap. xlviii.—In that hour was the Son of man invoked before the Lord of spirits.....Before the sun and the signs were created, before the stars were formed, his name was invoked in the presence of the Lord of spirits.

The writer of the Fourth Gospel represents Jesus as saying:—

> The Father hath given all judgment unto the Son..... and he gave him authority to execute judgment because he is the Son of man (John v. 22, 27).

In the words here italicized we have the conundrum: Why did the "Father" give "authority to execute judgment" to Jesus because he was the Son of man? Was it because that saviour spoke of himself by this title? No; it was because the Son of man in "Enoch" had received that authority, and the writer of the Fourth Gospel believed that book to be the word of God; and since Jesus was the Son of man predicted in "Enoch," therefore he must of necessity be given that authority. Here I conclude the subject of Immortality so far as the Bible is concerned, to be taken up shortly when I shall have more leisure to consider the question apart from religion.

THE collective mind of humanity cannot claim to have answered the most important questions concerning its destiny. It has not even arrived at that stage of mentality which inquires these fundamental things.....What caused life?..... What is the meaning of death?.....What is the real purpose of human life?.....etc. This collective mind of humanity cares not whether life be worth living, or whether the mind of man can make it worth living. A few individuals have asked these important questions in every age, but with no apparent effect on the general scheme of existence. The mind of humanity, to put it crudely, cannot determine in what direction it is developing, nor in which direction it wishes to develop. It has not sufficient mental vitality to arrive at these fundamental problems.

The War has proved conclusively that humanity drifts into most indescribable barbarism at ten minutes' notice, yet cannot be settled upon one vitally humanitarian tenet in millions of years! It cannot decide to have a condition of life which would most certainly improve the mental and physical qualities of man, neither is it sufficiently rational to utilize what power exists in those rare and high types who strive against impossible odds to help it. Gods themselves have, throughout history, descended from the skies in a never-ending procession for the specific purpose of saving humanity from itself, but they have accomplished little unless it be additional friction and misery.....Priests gabble in the pulpits; journalists lie with hysterical reiteration in the press; politicians play their odious games of bluff in Parliament, and God says nothing. The voice of reason and common sense is drowned and overwhelmed in a continuous roar of cant, hypocrisy, chicanery, society scandal-mongering, and general mental degeneration. Nor is the worst manifestation of modern civilization to be found in all this, bad enough as indeed it is; the worst manifestation is to be found where monstrous instruments of war are, in this hour, blasting and rending the bodies of our fellow-creatures..... This is the play that humanity has devised for itself; this is the drama of the people.

ARTHUR F. THORN.

Acid Drops.

In the discussion on the new censorship of leaflets it appears to have escaped observation—or perhaps it is that only a paper like the Freethinker would make it—that a licensing of books and pamphlets is quite a Christian institution. In ancient Rome and Greece people might be punished for having written and published certain things, but it never dawned upon these States to license a man's thinking and punish him if he did not submit his work for their approval. And for some centuries even the Christian Church did not venture on so drastic a step. The Christian Church is the first historic instance of regulating, with punishment for infraction, not only what men did, but also what they should think.

This much was pointed out by Milton. In his Areopagitica, after tracing the practice of licensing books to the Inquisition, he says:—

> And thus we have the inventors and the original of book licensing ripped up and drawn as regularly as any pedigree. We have it not that can be heard of from any ancient state, or polity, or church, nor by any statute left us by our ancestors elder or later; nor from the modern custom of any reformed city or church abroad; but from the most unchristian council, and the most tyrannous inquisition that ever inquired. Till then books were as freely admitted into the world as any other birth; the issue of the brain was no more stifled than the issue of the womb; no envious Juno sat cross-legged over the nativity of any man's intellectual birth.....But that a book, in worse condition than a peccant soul, should be to stand before a jury ere it be born to the world, and undergo yet in darkness the judgment of Radamanah and his colleagues, ere it can pass the ferry backward into light, was never heard before, till that mysterious iniquity.....sought out new limboes and new hells wherein they might include our books also within the number of the damned.

Those who ponder this fine passage will perhaps realize how incompatible are Christianity and real freedom.

We cannot forbear quoting another splendid passage from the same work:—

> I cannot set so lightly all the invention, the art, the wit, the grave and solid judgement which is in England, as that it can be comprehended in any twenty capacities, how good soever; much less that it should not pass except their superintendance be over it, except it be sifted and strained with their strainers, that it should be uncurrent without their mutual stamp. Truth and understanding are not such wares as to be monopolised and traded in by tickets, and statutes, and standards. We must not think to make a staple commodity of all the knowledge in the land, to mark and license it like our broad cloth and our woolpacks.....Nor is it to the common people less than a reproach; for if we be so jealous over them, as that we dare not trust them with an English pamphlet, what do we but censure them for a giddy, vicious and ungrounded people; in such a weak state of faith and discretion, as to be able to take nothing down but through the pipe of a licenser.

What would Milton have said had he lived in 1917?

In a letter published in the Sunday Times, Lord Alfred Douglas laments that his father, the Marquis of Queensberry, "was at one time unfortunately associated with agnostic views and propaganda," and adds that the Marquis died in the Christian Faith, and "absolution" was given him on his death-bed by Canon Lord Archibald Douglas. This recantation story is quite a family affair, like so many Catholic conversions.

The piety of journalists is a mercurial quality. The Daily Express refers to the Garden of Eden as the place "where Adam and Eve frivolled." In the ages of faith, Eden was regarded as the place "that brought death into the world, and all our woe," as Milton puts it.

The Catholic Universe, reviewing Lord Morley's Recollections, says that "his was one of those minds which, had circumstances been different, would have found their way into this City of God." Most people are glad that Lord Morley took the wrong turning.

Dean Hensley Henson has been appointed to the bishopric of Hereford, and the new bishop has been the subject of much eulogy in the press. In 1909 he was inhibited for preaching in a Nonconformist chapel. Even that heroic action scarcely entitles him to the position of a Christian martyr.

A Frenchman, after a visit to Scotland, was relating some of his experiences. "Ah," he observed, "the Scots they are usually good fellows, but what they do say one day they do not say on another. In Edinbourg I visit ze great music hall on ze Saturday night and ven an exciting event is happening on the stage I and others rise up to see more perfectly. How are we greeted? From ze place that is called 'ze gods' come great shouts of 'Sit down, sit down, for Christ's sake.' Then, on the following day, I visit ze grand church, and ven I am sitting quietly vaiting for ze service—a crowd of people jump up and shout: 'Stand up, stand up, for Jesus.' A country minister of the old school had occasion to rebuke a slow-witted but fiery-tongued parishioner for a violent outburst of profane swearing: "I'm tellin' ye what it is, Weelum, if this gangs on there's only wan end for you. One of the Y.M.C.A. officials announces that after the war the recreation huts will be used as working-men's clubs. It will be like tempting an earthquake with a penny bun.

As the result of a breakdown of his motor-car, the Rev. G. W. Dauberry, rector of Knodishall, Suffolk, was fined £3 and costs for being in possession of a sack of sugar, contrary to the Food Control Order. A local grocer was fined £5 for supplying the sugar. The ethical value of religion is not conspicuous in this instance.

The refrain of the national song in Canada has been revised from "God save the king" to "God save our men." Nothing is gained in effectiveness, since the song may be sung a million times without saving a king or a man, but the amendment nevertheless has a more democratic sound.—Truthseeker, New York.

The clergy do not like any opposition, and the organizers of the Intercession Day are endeavouring to obtain an order closing cinemas, public houses, and theatres on that day.

Dr. Horton, in his Autobiography, says: "I knew that in Dissent it is absolutely impossible to obtain a distinction which gives you any acknowledged place in the national life." Yet Dr. Horton belonged to the Congregationalists, one of the oldest and most respectable Nonconformist bodies, whose leading ministers earn the salaries of Cabinet Ministers. What would he have said had he been in the position of a Bradlaugh or a Holyoake?

The official organ of the Saxon Protestant Community laments the absence of English co-religionists from the annual conference, and refers to them as "those brothers in Christ from across the Channel." This is strange language for "Atheists."

The Rev. W. Temple says: "The Church of England is not given to hasty or reckless action." This is profoundly true, for dear Mother Church has not yet decided whether the working-man is a brute or a human being.

In the Nation for December 15 there is an interesting article by "An Officer" on "What do Soldiers Believe?" He says, inter alia:—

> Organized religion seems to have no influence on the soldier. I should say that the Roman Catholic Church has the strongest hold, and, in its numbers, the various Nonconformist sects the second strongest hold, and the Church of England the least. Numerically, in my regiment at all events, the Church of England leads the Nonconformists and Roman Catholics, but it is perfectly obvious that many of the Anglicans are Anglicans but nominally .....
> I should say that, on the whole, Christianity has singularly little influence on the mass of men in the ranks, and since most of them have lately been in civil life, that is tantamount to saying that Christianity has singularly little influence on the whole life of these islands.....
> One detects in the conversation of the rank and file a curious strain of disappointment when they talk, as they sometimes do, of religion. There is something, they seem to say, which ought to have made this war impossible, but has not done so; and in that disappointment I find a strong strain of contempt, or failing that, indifference. Certainly the failure of Christianity to influence the lives of these men does not appear to me to be datable from August, 1914. The beginning of the decline was longer ago than that. The curious flippancy with which men speak of the Deity was not acquired in a couple of years, nor is the blasphemy—sometimes perfectly outrageous—which I frequently hear in the barracks, a thing of recent origin.

As a sample, the writer quotes this saying of a sergeant to his men just before entering church for divine service one Sunday morning: "Form two deep, for Christ's sake." He doubts if this style of exhortation assists one to get into a devotional frame of mind. After further analysing the soldier's psychology, the writer concludes:—

> There is no indication whatever—apart from exceptional individuals—that the Christian faith has any deep hold on our soldiers' minds. There are signs of an entirely non-commital belief in God, vaguely held. There are more definite signs of difficulty in understanding just what is God's purpose, and a strong suspicion that perhaps that purpose is not quite so beneficent as they had sometimes imagined. Another is an unshakable belief that, in this case at all events, Something has settled definitely and irrevocably that for some men, as my drill sergeant says, it is "thumbs up," and for some other men it is "thumbs down."
> Beyond that there is nothing more to be said.

The slump in Christianity continues. Here, for example, are three items from a Scottish paper, one following the other. The first is a plea from the Rev. J. White, that the Churches must present a united front in order to reach the outlying population of the cities. Then comes Rev. D. Watson, who warns people that they must work for a "National Re-Dedication" if they are to hold their own. Finally, the Rev. Professor Reid, advises that when there is a poor attendance at morning service people should spend the afternoon rounding up absentees for the evening. But all agree that the situation is a serious one. Whereat the parson mourns and sensible people rejoice.

Referring to a recent publication, the British Weekly says enthusiastically that it is "a book which must be taken into account for ever." Such rhapsodies are usually reserved for the Jewish Scriptures.

Nearly 10,000 cards signed at Y.M.C.A. huts by soldiers are being sent to local councils by the National Free Church Council. The families and dependents, whose addresses are given on the cards, will be personally visited by the representatives of local churches. In the case of Anglicans, the cards will be handed to the vicar of the parish. This information is published in the newspapers, and it shows the method by which the Churches hope to use the recreation huts for their own ends.

Much beautiful nonsense has been written concerning the Holy land recently, but the cold facts discount a great deal of the pietistic platitudes copied from the Bible. A writer in the Daily News declares that Palestine is a tiny land, and adds that "an athlete could cross it from west to east in a day, and from north to south it is only a hundred miles."

Religion is a fearful and wonderful thing. A writer in the Daily News, referring to caste in India, says "it is humiliating that people should believe themselves polluted at a distance of sixty-four feet by a man who eats beef."

Mr. Ben Tillett, M.P., has the courage of his convictions, and, in an interview, published in the Daily Sketch, he has some very pertinent observations on the clergy and the War. "Comb out the parsons," he says, "There are two army corps of men of military age, some of them among the best athletes in the land, and engaged in a very healthy occupation. Longevity among them is especially high, and they ought to be in khaki. Many of them are more afraid of going to heaven than the average Tommy is going to the opposite region."

According to a London evening paper, Father Bernard Vaughan has been flying in an aeroplane. There is at least one real "sky pilot."

The call to a National Day of Prayer is meeting with a response from the Licensed Victuallers' Central Protection Society. That body has decided to recommend that the license holders in Greater London should close on January 6—Intercession Day. We daresay that they will remind their customers on the Saturday of the need for taking home an extra drop to last them till Monday. The newspaper paragraph announcing the resolution is headed "Publican's Sacrifice!" All that is needed now is for the clergy to follow the example and close their place of business for a day.

The piety of Germany is quite affecting. We must, says the Rev. Dr. Von Anon, clutch at the mantle of God, and he adds: "The mantle of this God, who has been with us from the first, is represented by Belgium, which has been forced into our hands by high Providence.....This is the mantle of God which we must clutch and retain in our hands." We expect the rest of the world will have something to say on this point; but one can trust the clergy for finding a religious justification for the worst features of even this War.

The Rev. H. J. F. Tringham, vicar of Longcross, Chertsey, is rendering assistance in other parishes where the staffs of clergy have been reduced. The reverend gentleman might be described as a "war loan."

Pious folk say that the War is the result of sin, but the chastening process is not beyond criticism. The Old Bailey Recorder declared that "bigamy is rampant all over the country." It almost appears as if the remedy were as bad as the disease.

Consoling itself for a war-time Christmas, the Catholic Universe says "plum-pudding and mince pies were not exactly served at Bethlehem." Just so! But they cooked enough trouble for the human race.

The Y.M.C.A. has invaded St. James's Square, London, and, according to the Daily News, is providing "sleeping accommodation for American officers" at the cost of some thousands of pounds. Doss houses for officers appears to be a novelty in Christian philanthropy.

The following curious advertisement appeared in the Catholic Universe: "Will good Catholic family adopt, for the love of Mary Immaculate, bonny, intelligent, good-natured boy (3 years 9 months), nursed from six weeks in religious institution? Never seen mother; no father; good references required."

Wanted, A New Year's Gift.

Is there any reason why the Editor of the Freethinker should not ask his readers for a New Year's Gift? Anyway, we are going to risk it, and we shall be greatly surprised if it is not forthcoming.

Everyone is to some extent alive to the difficulties under which a paper like the Freethinker is being carried on. Never in the whole thirty-six years of its existence have these difficulties been so great as at present. Month after month the cost of paper rises, and one is fortunate now to buy paper at five times the old price. Part of this increased cost has been met by our Sustentation Fund, part by profit from increased sales, part by the practice of the most careful economy, in which we have not spared ourself.

The steady, but gratifying, increase in the circulation of the Freethinker is mainly due to the loyalty and energy of our readers. They have done so well, we are now asking them to do more, and we are also asking others to join this band of willing workers.

That new readers can be got, the experience of the last two years has demonstrated. But there are thousands of others who are to be had almost for the asking. And we want them all without a week's unnecessary delay. Every hundred new readers means a larger sphere of usefulness for the paper; it means also a fresh contribution towards easing a heavy financial burden.

This, then, is the New Year's Gift we are asking for. Let, say, a thousand of our readers resolve to find a new subscriber within the next month. We would sooner have that gift than anything else that could be devised. We are not sparing ourselves, and, to be quite candid, we do not mean to spare others. We want everyone who can do something to do it. We have made a great advance during this now all but defunct 1917, but that should be but a new starting point for a still further move forward. The more readers we get, the more we want—and, we are proud to add, the more we keep.

That venerable structure, the Egyptian constitution, had been raised by no human hands. As the gods had appointed certain animals to swim in the water, and others to fly in the air, and others to move upon the earth, so they had decreed that one man should be a priest, and that another should be a soldier, and that another should till the ground. There are times when every man feels discontented with his lot. But it is evident that if men were able to change their occupations whenever they chose, there would be a continual passing to and fro. Nobody would have patience to learn a trade; nobody would settle down in life. In a short time the land would become a desert, and society would be dissolved. To provide against this the gods had ordained that each man should do his duty in that state of life into which he had been called; and woe be to him that disobeys the gods! Their laws are eternal and can never change; their vengeance is speedy and can never fail.—Reade, "Martyrdom of Man."

The modern Christian is a man who has consented to say all the prayers in the liturgy, provided you will let him go straight to bed and sleep quietly afterward. All his prayers begin with "Now I lay me down to sleep," and he is for ever looking forward to the time when he shall go to his "long rest." He has consented to perform certain old-established charities, too, after a fashion, but he does not wish to hear of any new-fangled ones; he doesn't wish to have any supplementary articles added to the contract, to fit it to the present time. He shows the whites of his eyes on the Sabbath, and the blacks all the rest of the week. The evil is not merely a stagnation of blood, but a stagnation of spirit.—Thoreau.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

January 6, Manchester; January 13, London; January 20, Southampton; January 27, Swansea; February 3, Birmingham; February 17, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—January 6, Birmingham; January 20, London; January 27, South Shields; February 3, Failsworth; February 10, Swansea; February 24, Manchester; March 17, Abertillery; March 24, Leicester.

E. RAWLINGS.—We do not know on what authority you are relying. We can only say G. J. Holyoake's profession of Atheism was definite and precise.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—A. E. Maddock, £2; W. H. Deakin, £4.

A. E. MADDOCK.—Received. Many thanks.

F. E. WYKES.—Thanks for extremely tasty calendar. Also for subscription to L.C.C. Fund.

R. M.—We do not object to advertisements. They are not in evidence because they are not forthcoming. And we venture to think this a mistake, even from a business point of view. We are sure that a larger proportion of subscribers read this paper through from cover to cover than is the case with most journals, and Freethinkers—and others—in business would soon find the Freethinker columns a really good medium for advertising. We should certainly be surprised if they did not.

J. THOMPSON.—The quotation from Connoly is very striking, and is full of "horse sense." Your plan of getting the paper into new hands is a good one, and it often produces good results.

H. AUSTIN.—Information to hand, for which thanks. We are taking steps in the matter.

J. L. LIVESEY.—One of the names—the latter is from Browning's poems. The former is a piece of mediæval gibberish, and means nothing in particular. See "Views and Opinions." We may write more fully on the subject some other time.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen resumes his lecturing next Sunday, January 6, with two lectures at Manchester. He hopes to see there all the old faces, and also a large number of new ones. There can easily be too few of the former, and there can never be too many of the latter. The reformed Manchester Branch has made good progress, and a good rally will give extra encouragement to all who are working to make the meetings a success.

The N. S. S. is arranging a course of Sunday afternoon lectures at the West Central Hall, 31 Alfred Place, Store Street, Tottenham Court Road, W. The course will be opened on January 6 by Mr. Harry Snell, who will lecture on "King George's Day of National Prayer." This is a quite topical subject, and, we hope, will attract a good audience. Admission is free, and the lecture commences at 3.15.

Owing to the Christmas holidays, we are compelled to bring out two numbers of the Freethinker in one week. The issue dated December 23 was finished on December 18—to the accompaniment of the booming of guns and the dropping of bombs; and the present issue had to be finished on the Saturday of the same week. This will explain the shortage of paragraphic material in this issue; but in other respects we do not think the concluding number for 1917 has suffered.

Members of the National Secular Society and Branch Secretaries are requested to kindly note that annual subscriptions are due on Tuesday, January 1, except in the case of those who have joined the Society since September, 1917, whose subscriptions are reckoned already as dating from January, 1918. Both old and new friends may desire to save the time, stamps, and stationery involved in the sending out of reminders, and a letter-box overflowing with old cards and fresh remittances on New Year's Day at 62 Farringdon Street, E.C.4, will be an undeniable proof of the good wishes of the senders for a happy and prosperous year for the Movement and for the officials responsible for the conduct of its business.

It is with pleasure that we quote the following sentences from a notice of Sir Henry Newbolt's A New Study of English Poetry by our witty and intelligent contemporary, the Cambridge Magazine:—

> It is a sign of the times that the Poet par excellence of the Public Schools should be entering the lists against expurgated editions! In future in art, as in science, there is to be "neither decorous nor indecorous, only relevant and irrelevant." If the vice of Catullus and the indecency of Donne are no longer to be taboo, merely on the ground that "they involve ideas which are contrary to the accepted moral code," it is possible that the irreligion of Lucretius and the atheism of Swinburne will no longer be dexterously glazed over. We foresee that not a few staid persons will tend to raise their eyebrows, when they contemplate the possibilities thus succinctly adumbrated by Sir Henry.

In noticing a little volume of sermons addressed to village congregations, the Church Times rather ungratefully—certainly unphilosophically—objects to the exercise of the imagination as shown in this passage:—

> Pilate in his palace, eating his mid-day meal of the daintiest luxuries procurable, with the choice vintages of Italy, was not at ease. His mind influenced his body. The good things provided seemed to pall upon him. Why so? Ah! Conscience, that inward monitor, would give him no rest.

We are more reasonable than our friends of the Church Times; we do not object to an imaginative interpretation of history, if only it be based on common sense and common knowledge. Pontius Pilate was hardly the man to be troubled with qualms of conscience for the mere suppressing of an obscure and troublesome Nazarene sect. The intelligent critic of Christianity is more likely to agree with M. Anatole France's idea of the effect of Christism on a Roman ruler of the period. Some while after the crucifixion, the Procurator of Judea is visiting a fashionable spa, and chatting with an old friend on bygone times and events. The conversation winds round to those silly and obstinate Jews who used to squabble over their wretched schisms at Jerusalem. The friends talk of the beauty of Mary Magdalene, "how in her prescriptural days she would dance on a dirty strip of carpet, by the light of a smoky lamp. Her back arched, her head thrown back, as if drawn down by the dead weight of her red-gold hair, her eyes drowned in lust, ardent and languishing, she would have caused Cleopatra to blush for envy." The friends sigh, for Mary was very beautiful in those days. Then the friend recalls how she followed a young Nazarean thaumaturge who was crucified for some crime or other. Pontius Pilate thinks for a long time, for crucifixion was common enough in those days. After a while he says: "Jesus? Jesus of Nazareth? No, I don't remember him." This is the sort of imaginative reconstruction, smiling and ironical, which is gall and wormwood to our religious friends

Fund for Fighting the L.C.C.

THE purpose of this Fund is to raise the balance of expenses—estimated at between £8 and £100 incurred in defending the right to sell literature at public meetings in the London parks. On the initiative of the N.S.S. a Protest Committee was formed, and after carrying the question into the High Court, the London County Council was induced to rescind the offending resolution. It was a splendid victory, and one which should specially appeal to all Londoners.

Religious Education.

THE question of secular versus religious education is generally discussed from the point of view of the rightness or wrongness of compelling one man to pay for teaching the beliefs of another, in which he does not himself share, or from the more abstract standpoint of the propriety or otherwise of State interference with belief as such. From both these points of view much can be said on the subject. There is, however, a more vital consideration to be entertained, and one which the egoism and lack of imagination of the adult controversialist tends to overlook: viz., the rights of the child. If we define the rights of the citizen generally as claims to certain liberties or opportunities for the realization of which the State exists, it follows that the aim of education should be to enable the child, when it grows up, to take advantage of and enjoy to the full those liberties or opportunities. Of those liberties one, and not the least important, is freedom of thought. One function of education, therefore, should be to enable the growing citizen to use his or her intellect freely and fully, unclogged by prejudice, and conformably to the natural faculty of reason. This is a debt which the adult community owes to each rising generation.

Let us see how we pay it. Here I can only generalize from what comes within my knowledge. I know nothing directly of the kind of religious education given to the majority of children in public elementary schools, or of instruction given by parents to their children in Nonconformist, Jewish, or Catholic families. But I know what religion I was myself taught; and I have no reason to suppose it less rational than that given in most middle-class households of the Church of England, or than that which is deemed suitable for working-class children. In fact, the latter is probably much worse; so in generalizing from personal experience, I have no fear of unduly blackening the picture.

At an early age the child's curiosity is awakened by the question, "Who made him?" and satisfied by the answer, "God." The child naturally finds nothing absurd in thinking that he and other people are manufactured articles, like dolls or furniture; and when he comes to read it, the Biblical statement that God "formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul," corroborates this view. He is taught that God wishes him to be good, and will take him to heaven when he dies, if he behaves. The doctrine of hell may or may not be thrown in; in most educated families, I should imagine, it is not; but this makes little difference, since a very little reading of the Scriptures will soon reveal that grim article of faith, and even parents and teachers who refrain from inculcating it do not venture, in many cases, to deny it to children. Inevitably the child, if curious enough to retain its interest in these matters, acquires the idea of God as, in Mr. Wells' words, "an old gentleman with a long beard and uncertain temper." A painting by an old master (I forget whom), familiar to me from very early years, actually portrays the Almighty in this guise, and depicts, underneath, what is meant to be heaven, an attractive green landscape peopled by saints in flowing robes, grouped round "the Lamb of God," who stands on an elevated throne or altar, spurting blood into a chalice from a wound in the chest. A truly edifying picture!

We hear much nowadays of the dangers of bad literature and films in their influence on the young; but I say emphatically - and it cannot be said too often—that the Bible is a worse thing from this point of view than any film likely to escape the attention of the police. No one would dream of putting Rabelais or Smollett, unexpurgated, into the hands of boys and girls; but our upright Christian parents and our sage educational authorities do not hesitate to afford the young every facility for the perusal of the purplest passages of Genesis, Leviticus, Judges, Samuel, the Song of Songs, Ezekiel, etc. Naturally, the facility is taken advantage of. This is bad enough; but it must not be supposed that the evil effect of early and uncritical Bible-reading is confined to this. The bloody and ferocious spirit of the Old Testament, where indiscriminate massacres are represented as the literal commands of God, to be fulfilled on pain of his extreme displeasure, and the equally ferocious threats of eternal torment against sinners and unbelievers in the New, have a moral influence which can only be called vile. Five centuries before Christ, old Xenophanes declared that "Homer and Hesiod had ascribed to the gods all things that were a shame and a disgrace among men, thefts and adulteries and deceptions of one another"; and Christians nod approvingly, thinking how superior they are to these heathen. But the God of the Bible licks the heathen gods into fits; he is Phalaris, Nero, Tamerlane, and Torquemada rolled into one, and raised to the "nth" power; beside him Von Tirpitz is a humanitarian, and the Kaiser a public benefactor.

All this is obvious to us Freethinkers; but it is not obvious to the child into whose hands the open Bible is put. When he is told that God, the author of his being, commands him to believe a certain creed on pain of everlasting perdition, he naturally does his best to believe it; he is much too frightened to question it. When he is told that this same God has, in the past, commanded his followers to "slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass," and punished them for non-compliance; the natural result is that he regards acts such as this, not as atrocities in themselves, but as acts evidently praiseworthy in certain circumstances. When Christians talk of German atrocities as due to German "atheism"; I think we might do more than merely rebut the falsehood; there is, at any rate, a good case for carrying the war into the Christians' camp, and pointing out the high probability of a casual connection between the strictly religious education given in Germany and the callousness which has marked the conduct of the War by that nation.

Bible-reading is thus calculated to uproot in young people both intellectual honesty and common humanity, the former by the fearful penalty denounced on unbelief, the latter by the atrocious conduct set forth as directly commanded by God. In the case of Anglican families, the undermining of intellectual honesty is aided by the teaching of the Catechism, in which the child is informed that his godfathers and godmothers at his baptism promised that he should "believe all the articles of the Christian faith," and that he is bound to believe as they promised for him. The influence of the Catechism is, however, secondary; it is, at any rate, not put forward as a divinely inspired document, as the Bible is.

It may well be wondered how any so brought up contrive to escape from this bondage, and to regain a measure of intellectual freedom. Many, perhaps most, never do. That some do is, I think, due to the fact that the Church of England is, after all, a bungler at its business. It makes the mistake of trying to influence the children chiefly, if not entirely, by word and precept. Now, words are the vehicle of thought, and thought can never be wholly divorced from reason. With the best will in the world, one can never quite believe what is flatly self-contradictory. That is why, among Protestants at any rate, a shade of unreality always attaches to the dogma of the Incarnation. You cannot, when it is put to you coldly in so many words, quite believe that Jesus Christ is "perfect God, and perfect man." "Perfect God" implies omnipotence and omniscience; "perfect man," on the other hand, implies a man's limitations, infirmities, inabilities—everything, in fact, that the notion of God excludes. To set the young mind thinking about such things is, from the Church's point of view, a fatal mistake; but it is the inevitable result, if the child is intelligent, of teaching religion mainly by word and precept. The Catholic Church knows better. There, the forces of unreason are backed up by sensuous appeals, by vestments and pictures, banners and processions, the smell of incense and the music of Gregorian chants and hymns, and not least, by the hypnotic power of repetition. I was once in a Catholic Church, where I observed that a great part of the service consisted of the words of the "Ave Maria," repeated over and over and over at break-neck pace, half by the priest and half by the congregation. I understood at once; it was sheer mesmerism. Give me leave to bring up a child on that sort of thing, and I will undertake to make him believe that the earth is flat and the moon made of Cheshire cheese.

In spite of the comparative clumsiness of the Protestant method, its effect can be relied on to last as long as the belief in hell is unimpaired. But let that belief be unimpaired—say by an indiscreet admission on the part of a pastor or teacher that "it ain't so"—and the slippery slope of Rationalism is reached. If that goes, the rest is in jeopardy, and the result will depend merely on the proportions of habit and reason, inertia and originality, in the individual's composition. He may become merely indifferent; he may try to make sense out of his religion, and compromise on a sort of "liberal Christianity"; or he may pass out of this stage into genuine Freethought. Cases of this last are, unfortunately, a minority.

Even when this happy issue is reached, the individual's development will have been retarded, his time will have been wasted, and his intellect may have suffered appreciable harm, from the involuntary pilgrimage he has made through the backwoods of superstition. After acquiring the habit for many years of believing certain things as a duty, it takes a strong counter-effort to accustom oneself to reasoning and weighing evidence. The faculty of reasoned judgment should be encouraged from the first. Deliberately to warp it, as our religious educators do, is a crime against mankind, the enormity of which is in no way diminished by the fact that a few of the victims are able, with toil and trouble, to straighten the warped faculty again in after life.

The only consistent position for a Freethinker to adopt is that the child, if it is to enter fully into its civic heritage of intellectual liberty, has a right to be protected against indoctrination with a particular hypothesis about the universe, until it is of an age to judge of such matters for itself. The difficulty is that so many parents—most parents, very likely—are of an opposite opinion. Holding, definitely or vaguely, some religious opinion themselves, they consider that they have a natural right to dose their children with it. Even parents who are indifferent to religion hold that it is "the thing" to have it taught to children. In the face of this "damned compact majority," as Ibsen has it, it is to be feared that a frontal attack on such parental tyranny over the rights of the child would be fore-doomed to failure. The only way to combat it is to make Freethinkers. But, in the meantime, in practical educational politics, we can at least insist that, if parents and clergy must do this dirty thing to the children's minds, they shall do it without help from the State, in their own time, on their own premises, and at their own expense; and that in the people's schools, at any rate, only such teaching shall be given as is by common consent necessary for the common good, and to make each child an intelligent citizen of a free country.

ROBERT ARCH.

Tales of Our Times.

I.

THE boys in Dame Europa's school have now got thoroughly out of hand.[1] It all started by those two bullies Fritz and Carl knocking two of the smaller boys—quite little chaps—on the head, and appropriating their belongings, whereupon John Bull and the other big boys set upon the offenders with all their might But Fritz and Carl, besides being openly helped by one or two of the smaller boys, and secretly helped by some other little sneaks among them, have proved themselves much stronger than had been expected; so the fight rages with ever increasing ferocity, and poor old Dame Europa is at the end of her wits—which were never very bright at the best of times.

Every day, when school closes, the boys, barely waiting for the conclusion of Prayers, rush pell mell into the playground and fall upon each other like tigers. All the rules of fair fighting are disregarded, and hitting below the belt, blows delivered from behind the back, kicking, tripping up, and even biting are resorted to. To make matters worse some of the village boys have joined the fray, and the boys of U.S.A. (Uncle Sam's Academy), a big school some distance away on the other side of the village duck-pond, are getting ready to join in.

However, terribly sad though it all is, it yet presents an element of humour. This is furnished by an old gentleman named Benedict, who lives next door to the school, in an old house surrounded by a garden with high walls called The Vatican. Occasionally the old gentleman, mounting a step ladder, peers over his wall into the playground, and calls out in distressful tones, "Now, boys, this is very wrong. Stop this fight at once, please, and be friends again. The noise you make every day is really very disturbing to me. Shake hands with the others, and don't bear them any ill-will."

But as the old gentleman never has a word of blame for Fritz and Carl for their disgraceful conduct in bullying and robbing the little boys, his admonitions are received with contempt by all except Fritz and Carl themselves, who are known to be rather favourites of his. They take off their caps respectfully to old Benedict when he addresses the combatants, and thank him for his advice, but they go on fighting all the same.

So the old gentleman continues periodically to peer over the wall and plaintively call out, "Now, boys, boys," etc., thus furnishing that saving element of comedy with which even the saddest and most tragic situations are sometimes blessed.

II.

The small craft, Humanity, lay becalmed and motionless on the deep and placid ocean of Existence. The people in the boat wore a restless and anxious look as they gazed at the unbroken horizon all around them. "We must move," they all were thinking. "We must move onward, and find out whether this awful ocean has any shore. If we remain motionless we shall go mad and perish. Humanity must progress."

Some Priests spoke first. "Put up a sail," they said.

"But there is no wind," said the others. "What is the use of a sail?"

[1] See "Tales of Our Times" in the Freethinker of March 24, 1912.

"We will pray to God," said the priests. "He will send a wind in answer to our prayers, and then humanity will progress."

So they put up a sail, and the Priests started praying for a wind. But though they prayed for a long time and grew weary over it, not a breath stirred, and humanity made not an inch of progress.

Next spoke the Metaphysicians—men with solemn, dreamy faces, and an absent-minded air. They used long words and pronounced them with sonorous emphasis, as though trying to make sound take the place of meaning.

"The only way to make humanity progress," said they, "is to take cognizance of the Infinite and the Absolute. We must ascertain the properties of the Thing-in-Itself and make use of them. Now we have found out that this ocean of Existence on which we float is the Thing-in-Itself, and we have discovered two of its properties which, if rightly applied, will bring about the progress of Humanity. Firstly, Existence has the property of flowing from a higher to a lower level; and, secondly, its Pressure is proportionate to its distance from the surface. Now, let there be two openings made in the boat at different heights, and let the lower opening be in the stern of the boat. In accordance with the first principle the waters of Existence will enter at the higher opening and pass out at the lower, while, in accordance with the second principle, they will exert greater Pressure in passing out than they do in entering, and this excess of Pressure, acting against the waters of Existence outside, will propel our boat forward."

This suggestion was promptly acted on, but no sooner were the two openings made than the waters of the ocean of Existence poured in at both of them, and it was only by quickly plugging up the openings and vigorously baling out the rapidly filling boat that poor Humanity was saved from being swamped.

"We quite anticipated this result," said another group of men who called themselves Deductive Philosophers, and who always spoke with an air of complete finality and certitude. "The Metaphysicians reason from wrong premises, and are therefore bound to reach erroneous conclusions. Now we, reasoning on the Deductive Method from a priori premises, have discovered that the moving principle of Existence is not Pressure but Tension, and this Tension, if properly applied, is sure to effect the progress of Humanity. Let two masts be erected of equal height, and let a pulley be fixed to the top of the front mast. Then let a rope be attached to the top of the other mast, taken over the pulley, and fastened to a heavy weight hanging vertically. Now, Tension has the property of exerting a pull from the point of attachment toward the point where the force is exerted, so it is obvious that in this case the pull of Tension will be in a forward direction, and will cause our boat to move forward in a straight line with uniform velocity for an indefinite period."

This reasoning, delivered with the complete cocksureness which always characterized the utterances of these philosophers, carried immediate conviction to most of their hearers, and their directions were eagerly carried out. But alas! the predicted result did not follow, and, as before, Humanity progressed not a single inch.

Meanwhile, some quiet, thoughtful-looking men had been engaged near the prow of the boat dipping pieces of flat wood into the water and moving them steadily and carefully, now in one direction, now in another, and observing the results. Presently they noticed that the prow of the boat stirred a little as the boards were pushed this way or that. No one had paid much attention to these men so far, and they had spoken little with the others, but one of them now stood up and spoke, with the light of victory in his eyes.

"You have been proceeding on a wrong assumption, my friends," said he, "an assumption which is as false in theory as it is futile in practice. You have been trying to get Movement out of Rest—to create Progress out of Stagnation. You have been expecting that some imaginary God who answers prayer or some imaginary principle of Existence will do the work of progress for us, while we sit down lazily and look on. The principle of progress is not Prayer, nor Pressure, nor Tension, but action on the part of ourselves. If we want movement, we ourselves must supply its motive power. Now make you some instruments called oars, the use of which we will teach you, and we can promise that, provided you exert yourselves in the use of them, Humanity will progress, and its advance will be in exact proportion to the strength and efficiency of your exertions."

This advice, though not quite so agreeable and encouraging as that of the others, was eventually acted on, and the promise of the Scientists was amply fulfilled. Thus it was discovered that the Progress of Humanity can only be achieved by Human Effort.

New Testament Legends for Young Readers.

VIII.—ON THE WAY TO THE CROSS.

You remember how, as a boy, the Wonder-worker had trod the road with Joseph and Mary to the city of Jerusalem. It was a place with high walls round it; and just outside it was a hill where olive-trees grew in gardens, and another hill called Calvary, with a round top like a man's skull.

Day by day Jesus approached this city. At nights he would lodge in any house where the folk were friendly; and, even if he found it uncomfortable, he would not change to another. One or two of his Delegates would go on in front and fix where he might stay.

"Master," said his messengers one day, "not a single house in yonder village will have you to-night."

"Why?"

"Because they say you are a Jew going to your Jerusalem, and they will not deal with Jews.

The village was in the country or province of Samaria, where the people were a mixed race—only Jewish in part. Hundreds of years ago the King of Assyria had taken away many thousands of the Israelites, and brought in strange tribes in their place. The Jews scowled at these neighbours, and when the Samaritans (as they were now called) built a temple of their own, the men of Jerusalem were more bitter than ever.[1]

Fisherman John and fishermen James were very angry.

"Call down fire from heaven to burn the village and the villagers," they cried.

"No, no," said Jesus; "I came to save men's lives, not to destroy. We will go to another village."

As they toiled across the stony hill to reach some other night-shelter, a man ran up saying—

"Lord, let me be a follower. Wherever you go I will go."

"Ah," replied Jesus, with a sigh, as he looked back on the village which had cast him off, "foxes have holes in the earth, and birds have nests, but I have no where to lay my head."

[1] About 150 Samaritans lived at Nablous in the early years of the twentieth century—the last members of the Samaritan race. They had a High Priest and a synagogue.

However, in spite of the hard life of the pioneer, his band of followers grew, and he made a plan for sending out seventy forerunners who should go on in front, two and two, to preach the kingdom and to drive out the jinn. To them, as to the Twelve, he gave marching orders as to carrying no wallet or money, and shaking the dust from their feet, and so on.

After a while the seventy returned with a glowing account of their deeds.

"Master," they said, "we found your name was a powerful spell! When we bade demons come out of the sick and the mad, out the jinn came!"

"Yes, of course," answered Jesus. "I knew it would be so; and I saw the Prince of the Air—that evil and cunning Satan who tempted me in the wilderness—fall like a flash of lightning, for his power is being taken from him. My friends, you will do other extraordinary feats".....

The seventy forerunners and the Twelve Apostles waited, breathless, to hear the news.

"You will tread poison-snakes under foot; you will tread vile scorpions to death, and you will receive no harm from their poison or their stings. But, beware! Do not become proud of your power over jinn. Rather be glad that you are my comrades in the new Kingdom, and that your names are written in the book of Heaven."

The Delegates and the seventy forerunners smiled for joy to think that their names were entered in the book of life—everlasting heavenly life. And any humble fisherman, shepherd, ploughman, tanner, coppersmith, beggar, or slave might join the Kingdom.

A lecturer salaamed to Jesus one day. He was a man who stood up in pulpits to talk, in a learned way, about the Law of Moses, and what to do or not do on the Sabbath, and how to eat and drink, and how to fast, and how to say prayers, and how a thousand other things. Such lecturers were called Scribes, or Writers of the Law; or you could call them Grammar Men, and Holy Clerks.[1]

"Master," asked the scribe, "what shall I do to get everlasting life?"

"Well, you are a holy clerk; you know the Law; what does it say about life?"

"It says," replied the lawyer, "we should love God, and love our neighbour."

"Very good; that is the way of life."

"Ah, but, Master, who is my neighbour?"

"Who is your neighbour? Well, let me tell you a little tale," said Jesus. "You know the road that runs through the valley, between rocky hills, from Jerusalem to Jericho city?"

"I do."

"A man was travelling along that road when a gang of robbers sprang out from a hiding-place, set upon him, beat him cruelly, stripped his clothes off, and went away with clothes, money, and all, leaving him half dead. Presently, a priest of the Temple of God came by; and when he caught sight of the poor wounded traveller, he guessed there were robbers about, and had no mind to stop; and he kept the other side of the road, and hastened out of the place of danger. Then came along a Levite, an attendant in the Holy Temple of God. He approached the wounded man, looked on him, and passed by on the other side. A third man came that way,—a Samaritan merchant, with a camel, or ass. When he saw the unfortunate traveller, his heart was touched with pity. He went to him, mixed olive-oil and wine in the palm of his hand, and gently moistened the poor fellow's bruises, bound up his wounds with bandages, hoisted him on the beast, and so brought him some miles further on to a roadside caravan shelter. There he laid him on a bed, and took care of him during the night. Next daybreak, when he must go off on his business, the Samaritan gave two silver coins to the inn-keeper, and said, 'Look after this poor fellow till I pass this way again; and if you go to more expense, I will repay you.' Now, my good Scribe and learned Lecturer, which of the three was neighbour unto him that fell among thieves?"

"The merciful Samaritan, no doubt."

"Very well; now you go and do likewise."

This did not mean that Jesus always wanted people to be doing things, even merciful and useful things; he thought that listening was sometimes good, too. For instance, he dined at the house of a village dame, named Martha. She was a bustling woman, full of pride in her pots, pans, cookery, wash-basins for guests, well-arranged seats, and all the rest; and her cheeks were red with her hard labour in waiting on the company. For the Twelve Apostles had good appetites. But Martha's sister Mary sat on the ground at Jesus feet, listening eagerly to his talk of life, and the Kingdom, and crosses, and good Samaritans.

"Master," exclaimed Martha, vexed, "you do not seem to mind my sister leaving me to do all the work!"

"Martha, Martha," said Jesus, with good humour, "you are fearfully anxious about many things, and worry without reason. But one thing is needful, and that is to find what really matters, and what does not matter. And Mary has chosen the good part, which shall not be taken away from her."

It was about this time that one of his companions asked him to teach the folk of the new kingdom a new prayer. He then repeated what has ever since been called the "Lord's Prayer,"[1] which ran something like this:—

> Father dear in heaven,
> With respect we say your name;
> Let the Kingdom come soon;
> And we, poor simple folk, will do your bidding here quite as truly as it is done by the folk in heaven.
> Give us bread every day, for every day we hunger.
> Wipe out our debts to you, and we will forgive our neighbours their little debts to us.
> Don't let the trials of life be too cruel for us, for the world is a hard place for the poor;
> And save us from the evil things that tempt us.

"It is quite easy to get gifts from God," added Jesus. "You just knock at the door, and he opens; perhaps not at once, but he will if you keep knocking."

The prayers of the common people were short. The prayers of the Lecturers and the Pharisee prigs were long and loud. A common man—a shepherd or fish-pickler—would often go to his meal with hands unwashed; but the same man might have a great, good heart, like the Samaritan who showed mercy.

A Pharisee once asked Jesus to dine with him, and other Lecturers and Writers sat at the table. Horror of horrors! The Master of the Jinn did not wash his hands before eating. Catching sight of the Pharisee's scornful glance, Jesus said,—

"You Pharisees make the outside of the pot nice and clean; but inside the pot is a beastly mess. You march about in pious style, boasting of the Tenth Parts that you give from your stores to the use of God and his priests. You even give a tenth part of the wretched little herbs in your kitchen-garden plots; and yet you do not move a hand to help a neighbour. You make-believes! You hypocrites! Woe unto you, lawyers!"

A shout of rage arose from the lawyers, learned Lecturers, holy Clerks, and pious synagogue men!

But the common folk listened gladly to the pioneer of the Kingdom.

* * * *

If you would hear a little more about prayer, let me tell of a famous Greek and of two English poets.

Socrates and his friends rested one summer morning under a spreading plane-tree on the bank of the Ilyssus stream; and the waters ran cool. Here they talked of man's Thoughts and man's Speech, and other things of interest. And at the end they rose to go home to Athens, and Socrates prayed thus to the Gods of the Woods and Open Air:—

> Beloved Pan, and all ye other Gods who haunt this place, give me beauty of the inward soul, and may the outward and inward man be one. May I reckon the Wise to be the Wealthy; and may I have such a quantity of gold as a temperate man, and he only, can bear and carry.[1]

We may be sure Socrates did not want much gold.

In our Shakespeare's play of Coriolanus we have a scene before the city of Rome. This Roman general, Coriolanus, is about to lay the city waste with fire and sword, though, in doing so, he will be injuring his own kith and kin. His mother, his wife, and his young son, kneel before him, and pray him to show mercy. Their tears move his heart from anger to pity, and the women's prayer does what armies could not do. Coriolanus spares Rome, and says to his mother and wife:—

> Ladies, you deserve
> To have a temple built you: all the swords
> In Italy, and her confederate arms,
> Could not have made this peace.
>
> (Act V, scene 3).

It was a prayer from human lips to the human heart.

> Then every man of every clime
> That prays in his distress,
> Prays to the human form divine,
> Love, Mercy, Pity, Peace.
> For mercy has a human heart,
> Pity a human face,
> And love the human form divine,
> And Peace the human dress.

The two verses just repeated are from the Songs of Innocence, by the poet-artist, William Blake, who lived in a humble lodging near the Strand, London, and died there in 1827.

THE TWO STRUGGLES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Lately there has been quite an epidemic of protesting. Let me protest against the latest protestations. I have had to rub my eyes on reading the last few issues of the Freethinker. Surely Major Russell and young Colquhoun have been playing Rip van Winkle when it is necessary at this time of day to explain to them that the survival of the fittest does not necessarily mean the survival of the best.

I think Mr. Warren may safely be left to defend himself, but the letter of young Colquhoun illustrates clearly the purport of Mr. Thorn's admirable articles—that virile and independent thought is a very rare quality.

Why, in the name of common sense—merely because their works are widely known—should I, or anyone else, accept, unquestionably, what Spencer or Huxley has said? The "Unknowable" and the "Agnostic" tangles were created by these two writers. When I was a boy, I thought something of Spencer's little brochure on "Education"; but, as the father of a family, I can think of most of it only with amusement, and pity for Spencer's small knowledge of life. And although Mr. Colquhoun asks: "Who is Mr. Arthur Kitson?" (that stunt is getting a bit stale now, Oscar Wilde with "Where is Liverpool?" and Shaw with "Who is Hall Caine?" to one of whose books G. B. Shaw wrote a preface, have worn the wheeze thin), I am sure the writer on the gold currency would have little difficulty in disposing of the economic fallacies of Herbert Spencer. It is hard that, in the Freethinker, one has to state that it is not who a man is, but what he says that matters.

Oh, to the devil with all your so-called "laws," divine, human, and "natural," and all your philosophy, which seems only "the losing of oneself by method." When Mark Antony said: "Judgment, thou art fled to brutish beasts, and men have lost their reason," he demonstrated that Shakespeare had not studied biology; for, as Cunninghame Graham points out, it is the possession of reason that makes a man inferior to the beasts!

If it is fated that "We must turn this fair world into a hell more awful than anything dreamt of by Dante," and "So long as unrestricted multiplication goes on the struggle will continue," then let us, in the name of Malthus, realize our doom. But it is all confounded nonsense. The biological struggle for existence is totally different from the mad, artificial, scramble for food which persists only because men have not the wit to manage their affairs sensibly, and are side-tracked by all manner of "reasoning" on biology, government, law, eugenics, two in a family, science, Dr. Saleeby, and all the other "flowers that bloom in the spring!"

Never mind the dead opinions of dead philosophers, or the exploded political economy of the Freethought God and his earthly representative, Dr. Binnie Dunlop. Nature is bountiful, and, as Mr. Warren says, there is abundance for all—if only we had a little sense.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation .....

Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.
