PUBLIC LIBRARY
578470A
ASTOR, LENOX AND TILDEN FOUNDATIONS
1917 L

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 1 SUNDAY JANUARY 7, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
A New Year's Motto.—The Editor	1
Religion in West Wales.—J. T. Lloyd	2
Christian Cacophony.—Mimnermus	3
Thomas Paine's International Influence.—Ignotus	5
The Picnic.—Coila	6
Apprehension.—A. M.	6
Acid Drops	7
From Darkness Into Light.—L.	8
To Correspondents	9
Our Sustentation Fund	9
Sugar Plums	9
For the New Year.—William Repton	11
The Passing of Helen.—F. L. B. G.	11
Skeleton Sermons.—The Owl	13
Letter to the Editor—Food Production and the Birth Rate	13
Miscarried.—A. F. T.	13

Views and Opinions.

A New Year's Motto.

One of the few writers of European celebrity who has kept a level head during the last two-and-a-half years, Romain Rolland, has suggested that in the New Year all writers should adopt as their motto, "An end to lying." We must, he said, "rid our social conscience of the lies which education, the State, the vested interests of tradition, the habit of indolent pride, the fear of trouble or of effort, are stifling modern life." And for himself M. Rolland adds, "I desire nothing more than the right to think freely." Nothing more than that! But that is everything! Given that, and all else follows. It is the supreme gift which Nature, the State, Society can bestow on mankind. To paraphrase an old saying, "Seek ye first the kingdom of mental freedom, and all other things shall be added unto you."

* * *

A Gigantic Revolution.

An army of Knights of the Pen sworn to write nothing but the truth! What a revolution that would mean in the world's affairs! The proposed League of Nations—after the War—would be nothing in comparison therewith. It would mean the creation of the greatest revolutionary force known to history. It is nothing to the point that the difficulty of ascertaining what is truth would still remain; it would be enough if all wrote nothing but the truth as they saw it. It would mean an end to the journalist who, with his finger on the pulse of popular passion or prejudice, spends his life pandering to the one and hardening the other. Consider the effect on life if politicians, diplomats, and parsons—the three classes which cultivate falsification with the greatest assiduity—were to resolve that henceforth they would write and speak nothing but the truth! Half the pulpits would be empty to-morrow. The present generation of European diplomatists and politicians would, for the greater part, have to relearn their trade. Newspapers that thrive by the exploitation of ignorance would suspend publication. An end to lying would mean an end to so much—and to so many. It is too much to expect. The disruption would be too great. M. Rolland presents the world with a high explosive bomb as though it were a harmless New Year's card. A German submarine sinking a hospital ship is nothing compared with this attempt to wreck so many of our cherished institutions with a motto.

* * *

Other Need for Clear Thinking.

Mark the phrase, "I desire nothing more than to think freely." But freethinking, if it is to be profitable, means clear thinking; and that is of all things the most difficult, and, therefore, the least practised. For two years and a half this country has been at war, and the mind of the people is as much muddled as ever; is, as much as ever, at the mercy of any catchpenny phrase that happens to be current. Only the other day we were reading an article in one of the papers to the effect that this War had shown the ineffectiveness of Internationalism. The War has shown exactly the contrary. It has demonstrated that the only way to end war is by the cultivation of a genuine spirit of Internationalism. To what else is the War due but to that exaggerated Nationalism which believes it to be the "destiny" of this or that nation to impose its culture, or its institutions, or its rule upon the rest of the earth? Germany, it is said, began the War because it suffered from the mania of desiring to impose German rule upon the European world. And what is that but Nationalism run mad? And have we not had in this country much talk for years about Britain's destiny to cultivate the waste, but profitable, parts of the earth? Have we not seen, since the War started, the creation of a sixpenny weekly with the object of obtaining "British supremacy on the sea, in the air, on the land, and in the markets of the world"? Supremacy, mark. Not the need for Britain to play its part in the development of the earth, but our supremacy—with all the rest of the earth, of necessity, playing second fiddle. Wars will never be stopped by that ambition. It is the seed-plot of all militarism—past, present, and future. The world does not need the supremacy of this nation or of that. It needs the co-operation of all—the cultivation of a wise Nationalism, purified and kept within the bounds of reasonable service by the ideal of international help and brotherhood.

* * *

Way for the Young.

"An end to lying" as a New Year's motto is excellent, and to rid ourselves of the lies with which education and tradition have saddled us is an essential to any useful social reorganization. Last week we suggested, in a paragraph in another part of this journal, that since our wars—whether they be justifiable or no—are made by old men, it might be as well if the age for military service were fixed at fifty and upwards. And the fact of the control of the world's affairs being in the hands of old men is a consideration of the gravest import. Consider the position of affairs. In this country—the same truth, it may be remarked, holds equally well of other countries—the control of affairs lies in the hands of the old men. Not only that, but in the political world this power runs very largely in families. Consequently, on both the personal and the family side, we have largely government by tradition; not by the needs of time, but by the more or less questionable wisdom of the past. It is notoriously difficult to get new ideas considered in governmental circles—as difficult almost as to introduce new ideas into the Church. And a very powerful cause of this is the fact that our rulers come to their task with formed ideas of what is to be done, and how it is to be done, and at an age when it is a matter of the utmost difficulty to get them to take new views. The result of all this is that just as in all the Churches we have a priesthood which lives to perpetuate ideas that ought to have died out several centuries ago, so in the State we have a Secular priesthood which habitually lives and thinks in an intellectual atmosphere of four or five generations ago. Between these rulers of the various peoples relations are created which have no organic connection with the vital life of the present. It would be a wise plan, therefore, to raise the age limit in one direction, and lower it in another. Make it lower for the direction of the world's affairs, make it higher for military service, if we must have war. Let it be the work of the old to advise, but let it be the work of the young to direct. They at least belong to the present, and are far more likely to feel its needs and pay regard to its real demands.

Digitized by Google

* * *

An Experiment Worth Trying.

What a world this might be if only it would take for its motto "an end to lying," and acted upon it. And not only an end to the small and petty lying of everyday life, but to the lies that are embodied in institutions and elaborated in codes. Education should be a preparation for life, real life; but only too often it is little more than a preparation for carrying over to the next generation ideas that have outworn their utility, even if they ever possessed any. The aim of the statesman should be to adapt existing institutions to new needs, and to guide public thought along progressive channels. Instead of that, he is often little more than one who seeks to stem development, and preserve the power of the few by directing the energies of the many into unproductive channels. And was ever there a phrase more finely descriptive of established religion than the "vested interests of tradition"? That is almost the sole function of our numerous priesthoods—Jewish and Christian, Catholic and Protestant, established or disestablished. One and all of these are little better than organized falsehoods. The ideas upon which they are based are false, the teachings they exist to disseminate are discredited. Every educated man is more or less aware of these things. A large proportion of the clergy are equally alive to the truth. By all means let us adopt Romain Rolland's motto, "an end to lying," and let us also bear in mind that when the lie of religion goes, other lies will find it exceedingly difficult to maintain their existence.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Religion in West Wales.

IT has been the boast of Wales for many generations that she is the most religious country under the sun, and there is a sense in which the boast is perfectly justified. It must be borne in mind, however, that only two hundred years ago the Welsh people had scarcely any religion at all, and were intellectually at an extremely low level. Dr. Erasmus Saunders, writing in 1721, states that the Church in Wales was in a deplorable condition, both materially and spiritually, many places of worship serving only as "the solitary habitations of owls and jackdaws." Some years later, Wesley says that "the people were as ignorant as the Creek or Cherokee Indians." Indeed, "it is probable that the Welsh farmers and their families had hardly progressed intellectually as a class from the time of the Conquest. Every indication that we possess shows that hardly any of them could read or write, and it is clear that the provision for education was of the scantiest possible description" (The Welsh People, by John Rhys and D. Brynmor-Jones, pp. 470-1). But about the middle of the eighteenth century the Methodist revival occurred and, in a wonderfully short time, transformed the whole country. As the authors of The Welsh People (p. 472) put it: "In 1730 the Welsh-speaking people were probably as a whole the least religious and most intellectually backward in England and Wales. By 1830 they had become the most earnest and religious people in the whole kingdom." In connection with that revival are closely associated the names of Griffith Jones, of Llandowror, Howell Harries, and Rowlands, of Llangeitho, by whose instrumentality religion became a tremendous power in the land. Whether this mighty wave of religious interest was of any real service to the nation or not is a problem differently solved by different people. It is noteworthy that in The Welsh People (p. 475) the result of the movement is summed up thus:—

> First, it was the chief agent in the preservation of the Welsh language. It is probable that but for the immense impetus given to the study and use of the Welsh language by reading the Welsh Bible and by listening to pulpit oratory it would have tended more and more to die out as the habitual language of the majority of the inhabitants of the whole of Wales. Secondly, it led to general and greater literary activity. This is shown by the increase, gradual but certain, of the number of books, in the early days chiefly of a religious character, published from time to time, and by the rise of Welsh periodical literature and Welsh journalism. Thirdly, it stimulated a demand for education.....Fourthly, it operated continually in the direction of improved morality.

Now, of those four results of the Methodist revival, two are of an exceedingly doubtful value. There are those who believe that the preservation of the Welsh vernacular and the increased literary activity have not contributed to the welfare of the people, and others are equally confident that religious revivals do not "operate continually in the direction of improved morality."

Let it be clearly understood, then, that for a hundred and fifty years Wales has been by far the most religious country in the world. Religion has been her one subject of absorbing interest, her solace in sorrow, and her strength in weakness. Whenever two Welshmen meet on the road, some debatable point in theology monopolizes their attention. At the smithy, the mill, the chapel house, and even the tavern, the relative merits of different preachers, the soundness or heterodoxy of certain recent sermons, or the quality of the last article or book on the Atonement,—to some such topic the conversation always turns. In the agricultural districts, specially, numerous meetings are held for the study of the Bible or of some recent work dealing with God, Christ, or the Holy Spirit. The religious life consists almost exclusively of Sabbath observance, abstention from all forms of carnal pleasure, and participation in religious exercises of all sorts. The Welsh people have been more puritanical than the Puritans, and greater lovers of rites and ceremonies than the Pharisees. Their Puritanism is, perhaps, their most prominent characteristic. Unfortunately, the most religious country under the sun is by no means the most moral. In Wales Christianity is not a system of morality, but a scheme of reconciliation between God and man, or a way of escape from the wrath to come, and a guarantee to believers of endless felicity in the world to come. Consequently, the contemplation of it is an emotional luxury in which the redeemed love to indulge.

Digitized by Google

Recently two books of extraordinary vividness and power have appeared, dealing with the religious life among the peasantry of West Wales. They are My People and Capel Sion, by Caradoc Evans, containing fifteen stories each. Caradoc Evans describes what he has experienced and seen among his own people, and the description is so truthful that it has made his countrymen furiously angry with him. A well-known Welsh bard once said to a friend, "If you wish to know the meaning of the word 'repentance,' publish a volume of Welsh poetry." The publication of these two volumes on Welsh religion has taught the author the true signification of the term "persecution." The Welsh people can never forgive a man for holding their religion up to ridicule. It matters not that he is pronounced "a very fine artist" by no less an authority than H. G. Wells, and that in literary circles his books have been hailed as works of genius, the accuracy of his narratives has driven his countrymen mad with indignation. They curse and swear at him, denouncing him as an Atheist and a liar. Dozens of sermons have been preached in which the volumes were fiercely attacked, and the Cardiff police went to the absurd length of forbidding the sale of My People. The result of such foolish opposition is that the book is now in its fourth edition. Most of the people described are farmers in Cardiganshire and members of Capel Sion (Sion Chapel). They call God "The Big Man," heaven "The Palace of White Shirts," and hell "The Fiery Pool," and these figure largely in almost every story. Sadrach of Danyrefail was a father in Sion, "whose thoughts were continually employed upon sacred subjects," and who "began the day and ended the day with the words of a chapter" from the Book and a prayer on his lips. The Sabbath he observed from first to last; he neither laboured himself nor allowed any in his household to labour. He married a woman ten years his senior, and "six months after the wedding Sadrach the Small was born and tongues wagged that the boy was a child of sin." Poor Achsah lost her reason, and was confined in a loft. Three months later Sadrach went to Aberystwith and returned with "a strange woman beside him in the horse car; and the coming of this strange woman made life different in Danyrefail." People whispered evil things, predicted his dismissal from "among the First Men of the Big Seat," but he justified himself by saying, "Martha is a gift from the Big Man. She has been sent to comfort me in my tribulation, and to mother you, my children." His daughter Rachel "knew that Martha was more than a servant," and rebuked her father for his sinful conduct. The truth is that Sadrach was a bad man, devoid of conjugal and parental affection, and capable of most cruel deeds under the cloak of religion.

The first story in Capel Sion is entitled "Redemption," and opens thus:—

> There was a young man whose piety was an adage, for his heart was filled with the glory of Sion. His manner was humble; on the Sabbath his face was habited in a religious smile and his lips framed the words "Big Man," or "White Jesus bach." Once in the Seiet the Ruler of the Pulpit said to him: "Eevan Rhos, man, mouth your experience." He answered: "Not saintly enough is my voice to be raised." Of him this was spoken; "He breathes to the Big Man."

This exceptionally pious young man, being a rich farmer, engaged a domestic servant named Hannah Harelip, who was from the workhouse at Castellybryn. Hannah was ambitious and covetous, aspiring to be mistress over all that Evan had; but the "Big Man" freed Evan and joined him and Jane Pant in marriage. Hannah Harelip was jealous of Jane Pant, "and she set her affection to Evan." She resolved to ensnare him [illegible]h the result that he said to her, "Come you, small [illegible], and I will fondle you."

> Hannah, who knew a little of the [illegible] of man, ran from Evan as one alarmed, and as s[illegible] moved her petticoats fell upon the ground, and she pretended to be greatly ashamed. "O Mishter bach," she cried, "here's dishonour. Bare as a bald pate am I." While she bent to settle her garments, Evan seized her, and whispered: "Wench, very all right you are."
>
> "Eevan Rhos," said Hannah, "frisky you feel, man."
>
> After many days were passed, Hannah spoke to her master: "Well, well—mishtress of Rhos I shall be, for sure."
>
> Her saying did not please Evan because she was become odious in his eyes. "What iobishness you speech, you bad boar! Go you about your business in a great haste, you adder."
>
> But Hannah neither departed nor remained silent "Have I not served you as a woman?"
>
> "Iss, indeed, laboured very well you have on my land. Don't you blobber old things, good maid. Off you, then."
>
> "Lively are things in me, Mishter bach. Better now that I sit in your pew in Sion."
>
> "Go away, female," Evan rebuked Hannah. "An hireling you are. Born you were in sin. Has not the Big Man put a heated poker on your lips? Dirty smell of a mule, pray for forgiveness for your awful act. High Father, an innocent boy bach was the male o Rhos until I was provoked by Satan's daughter."

Poor Hannah was with child by her master, and her master knew it; but this is what he said to her:—

> Listen you, now, wench: if persons inquire of you by whom you are big, say you by a boy of a weaver from Drefach. A religious sampler am I in Sion. Do you act then as I say.

This God-fearing young farmer attempted to get rid of pregnant Hannah in various ways. "Am I not of great regard in Sion?" he said, and tried to turn the wretched girl to her death by making her walk over a concealed well. This was the man of whom people said, "Too religious was poor Evan to know what to do; he breathes to the Big Man."

J. T. LLOYD.

(To be concluded.)

Christian Cacophony.

> Talk about it as we like, a man's breeding shows itself nowhere more than in his religion.—O. W. Holmes.

WE are told by a distinguished metaphysician that literature is but a branch of social science, that he is greatest among authors who appeals to the widest circle of readers. If this were true, then were the hymn-writers the princes of poets. Is there a church or chapel where their effusions are not sung? Is there a tin-tabernacle from John o' Groats to Land's End but derives morality and intelligence from the lilt of the hymns? We trow not! Recognizing that all who run can read, the Christian Churches have circulated a poetic literature, and provided nothing to read which is beyond the understanding of the stupidest of their congregations. We raise our hats to the clergy as astute men of business; but our admiration is diluted by the thought that, after all, they have "collared" their congregations because they have never been able to rise above their level of intelligence. Clerical culture is largely taken for granted, whereas the truth is that the people in the pews are often better informed than the men in the pulpits. Punch, some years ago, hit this off in an excellent picture, which depicted the Rev. Robert Elsmere on his knees before the sceptical squire, saying, "Pray, pray, don't mention the name of another foreign author, or I shall have to resign my living."

Digitized by Google

It is very doubtful if the average hymn of to-day has any more claim to be considered as real literature than the usual music-hall song, about which the clergy are so indignant. This may well appear a grave indictment, but the hymns which are regarded as being eminently suited for public worship are far too frequently antiquated, unrhythmical, and nonsensical. Under the soporific influence of religion, the public has been far too ready to accept bombast and bleat as the fine gold of poetry, and has hailed hysteria in adjectives as the quintessence of reverence.

The hymns used by Churchmen and Nonconformists alike are not really much better than those painfully familiar and disgraceful compositions which are used by Salvationists, Revivalists, and other howling Dervishes of our streets and open spaces, and which make educated people almost ashamed of their own species. The charge of sentimentalism is not the only one that can be brought. Some hymns are brutal in tone and language, written in the worst possible taste, and are full of sanguinary details and a glowing satisfaction which is repulsive. Here are some samples:—

There is a fountain filled with blood
Drawn from Emanuel's veins.

Come, let us stand beneath Thy cross;
So may the blood from out His side
Fall gently on us drop by drop;
Jesus, our Lord is crucified.

Here I rest, for ever viewing
Mercy poured in streams of blood.

By thy red wounds streaming
With thy life-blood gleaming.

Lift up Thy bleeding hand, O Lord,
Unseal that cleansing tide.

O those limbs, how gaunt their leanness,
Tortured, torn from our uncleanness,
On these stiff branches weltering.

If we turn to the purely literary aspect of those hymns, we find some of them bad enough to break a critic's heart. For sheer, downright bathos this triplet is worth noting:—

Upon the Crucified One look
And thou shalt read, as in a book,
What well is worth thy learning.

The solitary attempt at rhyme in the following is sufficient to disqualify an amateur in a limerick competition:—

Mercy, good Lord, mercy I ask,
This is the total sum:
For mercy, Lord, is all my suit,
Then let Thy mercy come.

The author's reason must have been tottering on its throne when he penned this pious outburst:—

Faithful Cross, above all other
One and only Noble Tree,
None in foliage, none in blossom,
None in fruit thy peer may be:
Sweetest wood and sweetest iron,
Sweetest weight is hung on Thee.

But the most nonsensical couplet of all occurs in the following:—

May all these our spirits sate,
And with love inebriate.

"These," as a reference to the preceding lines in the masterpiece show, refer to nails, wounds, vinegar, thorns, and other articles associated with the crucifixion. Toplady's "Rock of Ages" is a perfect medley of irrational images and misapplied metaphors. "Cleft rock," "riven side," "to Thy cross I cling," and "to the fountain fly" are examples. The confused imagery drowns the sense in the veriest verbiage.

Another popular favourite, "Hark! Hark! my Soul," has upset even the Christians. Bishop Alexander, who knew something of literature, has said of this gem that "it combines every conceivable violation of every conceivable rule with every conceivable beauty." "Onward, Christian Soldiers!" which is more popular than "Keep the Home Fires Burning," is by no means above criticism. The last line of the chorus is commonplace in expression, and atrocious in rhyme.

There is a frankness of Materialism in some of these so-called "spiritual" hymns, which is sufficient to make an undertaker smile.

Lord, I believe, Thou hast prepared,
Unworthy though I be,
For me a blood-bought free reward,
A golden harp for me.

And, again:—

Oh! for the pearly gates of heaven,
Oh! for the golden floor.

Plummet cannot sound the depths of feeble-mindedness revealed in some of these effusions. The bewildered reader feels that he has glanced at an album of an asylum of idiots, so painful and so obvious is the comparison.

These quotations, be it remembered, are from the most distinguished Christian collections, and they are by no means the worst of their class. If any reader wishes his raven hair turned white, let him turn to the pages of the War Cry, where he will find the work of bold versifiers, weak in their mother-tongue, and yet unaffrighted by the awful spectacle of their first "General" in the robes of Oxford University.

As miracles do not happen, a literary standard in hymns is more than we hope for. The Church is notoriously weak among the upper and working-classes, and especially among men. Hence we are not surprised at the inclusion of some appeals to the British workingman. Listen to the dulcet tones of the clerical syren:—

Sons of Labour think of Jesus
As you rest your homes within,
Think of that sweet Babe of Mary
In the stable of the inn.
Think, now, in the sacred story
Jesus took a humble grade.
And the Lord of Life and Glory
Worked with Joseph at his trade.

The enormous popularity of certain hymns is due to the music.

As long as the tune has a right good swing,
It doesn't much matter what trash you sing.

And Lewis Carroll's advice to speakers, "Take care of the sense, and the sounds will take care of themselves," is commonly inverted when applied to hymn-writing. Such hymns as have a slight claim to literary merit are little esteemed by the public mind compared with "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," "The Glory Song," "Tell Mother I'll be There," and "The Bells of Hell go Ting-a-ling."

To an outsider, hymns would suggest restraint, sobriety, the dignity of reverence; but the Torrey and Alexander Mission, like the Moody and Sankey crusade, and the Billy Sunday revivals, amply prove the association of Christianity with hysteria and theatricality. What is worse, these evangelists gauged their public to a nicety. Their audiences were, perhaps, better dressed and better schooled than those who listen spellbound to the trombones and tambourines of the Church and Salvation Armies, yet they sing hymns of the most rank and fulsome sentimentality. Christian congregations seem unable to distinguish between poetry and doggerel, pathos and bathos. Singing their delirious rhymes, they are intellectually on a level with barbarians. Savages do this one way, and the countrymen of Gipsy Smith and the Bishop of London another, but the nature of the act, and the results, are much the same.

Digitized by Google

MIMNERMUS.

Thomas Paine's International Influence.

THAT very much overrated monarchist, Edmund Burke, did a great service by his pamphlet against the French Revolution. For if it had not been for Burke's pamphlet, we should not have Paine's Rights of Man. It is safe to predict that when Burke the sentimentalist is quite forgotten, the name of Thomas Paine, the world citizen, will be remembered and enshrined in the hearts of grateful millions. As yet we are too near Paine in point of time. The great apostle of Reason will not come fully into his own until superstition is dead.

But we do get on—however small the advance rational thinkers may help us to make. At last, for example, Great Britain has adopted in principle Paine's scheme of Old Age Pensions. People of ignorance (and you meet them every day in every street—particularly people who are ignorant of history) generally imagine that Joseph Chamberlain was the first to advocate Old Age Pensions. Even more educated people think that Ruskin was the first to suggest them.

And the profound ignorance of some prominent men is amazing. Thus Roosevelt—that violent jingoistic swashbuckler—once described Paine as a "dirty little Atheist." Three lies in three words. Paine was not dirty—either in body or mind. He was nearly six feet high. And he was not an Atheist, but a Theist. Suffice it to say that he did not get his God from the Bible. He saw him reflected in the wonders of Nature.

Roosevelt's ignorance is all the more incomprehensible and unpardonable when one reads the cordial letters exchanged between George Washington and Paine. In a letter dated September 10, 1783, Washington, inviting Paine to Rocky Hill, wrote:—

> Your presence may remind Congress of your past services to this country, and if it is in my power to impress them, command my best exertions with freedom, as they will be rendered cheerfully by one who entertains a lively sense of the importance of your works, and who with much pleasure subscribes himself your sincere friend.—G. WASHINGTON.

Paine, dedicating The Rights of Man to Washington, wrote: "I present you with a small treatise in defence of those principles of freedom which your exemplary virtue hath so eminently contributed to establish." The Americans of a century ago had some of the enthusiasm for liberty. It is a big drop from Washington to Roosevelt. Paine is far more highly esteemed in France than he is in America or England even yet. France did him honour. We threw mud at him, and canonized the conventional Burke with his stupid reverence for the divine right of kings. John Stuart Mill got his first posthumous public honour not in his own country, but in France. We are grateful people—we and our Yankee cousins—to our deliverers. France has ever honoured hers—and other people's too.

Paine helped very materially in the Republican Movement in France and in directing the enthusiasm of the rebel colonists in America, whose cause Lord Chatham championed in the House of Lords. As to France, there would not have been such long fruitless and profitless enmity between her and England had it not been for the swallowing of the teaching of false prophets like Burke. A careful study of history shows that rationalistic France has ever been in the van of Freedom and Progress. By her sufferings and self-sacrifice the rest of mankind have benefited.

Burke was not consistent in his adhesion to the constitution of his own country. He bitterly attacked the French Revolutionists, and did more than anyone else to stir up bad blood between France and ourselves. Yet he was with the American Revolutionists. And what is more remarkable historically is the fact that the French pioneers were fighting a battle for the whole civilized world. They were supplanting an old monarchy—buttressed by an ancient and wealthy Church—with its roots deep in the past. The American colonists, in a sense, could only be said to be fighting their own battle. They were new settlers in a new land. They were not in close proximity to the clashing and divisive political and ecclesiastical intrigues of Europe. Still, they are deserving of honourable recognition. They had their own difficulties in all conscience, not least of which was the stupid brutality of British "Statesmen." They, too, stood for the ideal of liberty.

Paine gets in some home-thrusts in his Rights of Man by means of which he—as the Scot would say—"flypes," that is, turns inside out, the egregious Burke as one would skin a rabbit. Of the idol of "Divine Right," he says this: "The key of St. Peter and the key of the Treasury became quartered on one another, and the wondering cheated multitude worshipped the invention." As to the making of governments, he writes:—

> The fact therefore must be that the individuals themselves, each in his own personal and sovereign right, entered into a compact with each other to produce a Government; and this is the only mode in which governments have a right to arise, and the only principle on which they have a right to exist.

But he is probably at his best in his comments upon the ludicrous vanity attaching to titles and artificial dignities. He says:—

> Titles are but nicknames, and every nickname is a title. The thing is perfectly harmless in itself, but it makes a sort of foppery in the human character which degrades it. It reduces man into the diminutive of man in things which are great; and the counterfeit of women in things which are little. It talks about its fine blue ribbon like a girl, and shows its new garter like a child. A certain writer of some antiquity says: "When I was a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things."

France, he says, has not levelled, it has exalted.

> It has put down the dwarf to set up the man. The punyism of a senseless word like Duke, Count, or Earl has ceased to please. Even those who possessed them have disowned the gibberish, and as they outgrew the rickets have despised the rattle.

Writing of hereditary aristocrats as legislators, he asks:—

> With what ideas of justice or honour can that man enter a house of legislation who absorbs in his own person the inheritance of a whole family of children, or doles out to them some pitiful portion with the insolence of a gift?

It is this idea of patriarchal autocracy which the pioneer of Freedom has to fight most against. Not Charity, but Justice, is the demand of the social regenerator. We boast of our British Constitution; but, as Paine points out, "The House of Commons did not originate as a matter of right in the people to delegate or elect, but as a grant or boon." He also later on says, "The President of the National Assembly of France does not ask the King to grant to the Assembly liberty of speech, as is the case with the English House of Commons."

But to what purpose should I proceed farther when The Rights of Man is happily now procurable for the modest sum of sixpence, and there may be perused within its covers the noble "Declaration of the Rights of Man and of Citizens, by the National Assembly of France," with Paine's observations thereon? What I have written may send others to that notable book—a fitting companion to Paine's other great work, The Age of Reason.

Digitized by Google

IGNOTUS.

The Picnic.

Of these am I, Coila my name.
—Burns, "The Vision"

1796.—JANUARY 25, 1917.—1759.

IN winter, too, amidst the bare trees in the glen, the wind sounding aloft, silence below, save for the babble of the stream, the prattle of the weans; music, peace, happiness, freedom—freedom of the rough blast, breathing its robust philosophy; something to remember, something being written on the plastic mind; and even the mind, set and matured with the monotony of repetition, loosening its crust of winter, betraying leaf and bud of latent spring. Such is the spell of the woodland. Here and there a late campion; here and there, flattened on the green moss, the rough green under-leaves of the primrose past, cradle of those to come, and everywhere the ivy—lusty, lustrous, evergreen, beautiful parasite. Here, in winter, we dream of spring, or the winter of our discontent is made glorious summer by the flowers of Freethought. Here, in the cold, the heart is warm, and the mind basks in fecund rays of truth, wisdom, joy, hope, memory, and anticipation. Call this religion if you will; to us it is mere humanism, and is no relation of your upstart "skies."

The father and his four boys, all eager, interested, content with simple joy and frugal fare, or in their proper selves the very epitomes of happiness. Our worst of griefs, our greatest fears, are largely artificial and avoidable; we need bow only to essential facts, and let childhood cherish each wholesome and inevitable illusion, the moths and butterflies of fancy. Do not break the spell. Nature, life, experience, reason, the logic of events, these in due season will do it in their own way—as trees bud, as leaves decay, beautiful through all, tranquil to the end.

The grandfather was there with his daughter's child, another boy, no "blood" relation of the rest, but kin enough in the universal consanguinity of man. The tinker's and the gipsy's boy might have—

Claimed kindred there, and had their claims allowed.

Such kinship as denies and disdains "divine right" and "royal blood," and proves one pedigree for prince and peasant. Remembering this, a man, when he knows he is a man, and that a monarch is no more, can stand unabashed before kings. Only knowledge is power, and love casteth out fear.

The old man was the "youngest" of the party. His smile was beautiful, habitual, and serene; his voice like the sound of the waters amongst the pebbles, or now strident and growling like boulder-impeded flood, as, with clouded brow, contracted lip, and stabbing fingers, he declaimed against the evils of society. Amused at but admiring his vehemence, and not forgetful in momentary superiority of outbursts of his own, the other waited till the sky was clear again and the music returned; for, why, it was the hour of joy, not the Day of Judgment; and the trees, the children, and the brook were non-offenders. And, indeed, the better must ever be the criterion of the worse; and that there is a better no student of comparative psychology will deny, and emulation, however mistaken in its objective, is always towards the best. The waves of thought cannot for ever beat upon even dull craniums in vain. Experience is destructive and creative. Like the slow glacier or the sudden avalanche, it rends its way, leaving faint but unequivocal and lasting traces on the rocks of the actual and eternal; it is substance and consequence, cause and effect, force and matter, not the impalpable and traceless passage of a dream. Thus morality may ultimately take care of itself.

The alfresco feed, the concrete gastronomic fact, may be taken as read; it passed merrily enough, and was gone like the reek of our great fire among the wintry trees. There was the green and spongy moss, the wet litter of leaves—copper and gold and common brown—the noisy waterfall, and the still and solemn further reaches of the stream stealing away under the chequered glade, tarrying dreamily, reluctant to depart, muttering its wayward fancies, the pilgrim of eternity.....The ideal, the abstract, survives. The picnic never happened, and it never will; but in the subtle alchemy of thought and feeling, in shadows and dreams of memory and anticipation, it is "told o'er a thousand times." The real can never attain to the ideal; the latter, like the rainbow, flits with each remove, or is shattered and broken, to be remoulded in the heart's desire; or we have outpaced it, and it is behind us in the mist of years, in the moonlight of memory chaste and still. It is all around, and mundane and temporal; not "an heavenly," but of the dear old earth. For the true native of earth sighs not for mansions in the skies. Whatever heaven exists is made up of just such half-fact, half-fancy of human life. Do not deceive yourself, says the wise man, with the hope of perfect happiness; there is no such thing in the world. For why? Perfection is a mere paradox, a poetical superlative, as when, in the ear of Robert Burns,—

Perfection whispered, passing by,
Behold the Lass o' Ballochmyle!

Such song and the subject of it is Nature's, and the nearest we may come to perfection. With that immortal apostrophe of those memorable words on this famous anniversary we may fitly close. The feast is ended, and the fragments remaining are much more than two basketsful; and yet it is no miracle.

COILA.

Apprehension.

Circumstances are like clouds, continually gathering and bursting; while we are laughing, the seed of trouble is put into the wide arable land of events.—Keats.

STAY thy hand, Avenger, stay,
We would live our little day,
And as ripely fall as those
Leaves autumnal at the close.

What Avenger? wherefore wreak
On those ignorant and weak
Death untimely, senseless, dire?
Whence the sin, and what the ire?

"Sin" of man, and "wrath" of God,
But qualities of earthly clod;
Glib, we call it accident,
But each hap is consequent.

Certain cause, if hid the cure,
For each ill man may endure.
Stay thy hand, Avenger, stay!
Hush thy clamour; watch, not pray.

But, oh, list! I pray thee, list!
Though I am no fatalist,
Still I dread the unforeseen,
That may be that once has been.

A. M.

Digitized by Google

Acid Drops.

A telling Punch cartoon—telling, that is for Punch, which has for some considerable time been chiefly noticeable for the lack of courage and "bite" in its drawings—represents the Kaiser dressed a la Chadband, singing a "Hymn to Humanity," and saying to the angry women and children around him "Stop that screaming! I can't hear myself sing." The cartoon, as we have said, is a good one, but a really striking thing about it is the commentary it forms to the claims of Christianity as a moralizing force. Quite naturally the satirist when he writes to depict a thorough going hypocrisy, dresses his character in a Christian garb. And this could not be unless long experience had habituated the public mind to the combination of the two. And when the combination is effected, as in the cartoon before us, everyone—Christian and non-Christian alike—recognizes its appropriateness. The unconscious testimony of so instinctive a delineation far outweighs the elaborate apologies of the pulpit. The logic of fact is greater than the theory of religion.

The late Mr. Harry Marks, M.P. for Thanet, was very popular with his constituents, and on one occasion he gave a handsome donation towards a church, and it was suggested that the new building should bear the title of "St. Mark's" Doubtless, the subscribers thought that as the Christian religion was founded by a Jew, there was little harm in naming a church after another.

Although Mr. H. G. Wells, like Mr. Bottomley and the late-lamented "Spring" Onions, is credited with having found "God," his conversion is not so complete as pious folk would wish. Writing of Christian Conscientious Objectors, he remarks that these people "do not hold any life sacred but their own."

A correspondent of the Record writes suggesting that doctors might give a hint to clergymen of the sick people in their care whom they (the clergy) might visit. We cannot imagine any self-respecting medical man doing anything of the kind. Probably a hint has been taken from the Defence of the Realm Act which converts every employer into a kind of military policeman over those whom he employs, but a doctor in a house is a confidential adviser, and they have a higher sense of professional honour than this pious person seems to cultivate.

The editor of the British Weekly says that many are now passing through a period of doubt in religion, but they will not be able to abide in it. We quite agree. They must either go backward or forward. If they go backward, they will revert to their earlier Christianity. If they go forward, they will throw off Christianity altogether. And for one who goes back there will be two go forward.

Railway officials declare that the number of people attempting to travel free on pretence of holding a season ticket has greatly increased during the past twelve months. It is evident that the "moral uplift," consequent on the War, has not been so thorough as the clergy would have us believe.

The Daily Chronicle describes "Saint Thomas" as the "first Agnostic." Our contemporary had better read the Gospel stories again. We fancy "Saint Joseph" was earlier with his scepticism, and on a more vital question.

How tenderly the journalists treat the Christian superstition. A Sunday paper, in a Christmas editorial, says the present world-conflict "has torn Christendom asunder and seems to mock the message of the Nativity." The spectacle of thirty millions of Christians trying to murder one another ought to leave very little room for doubt.

The Rev. F. J. Miles, a chaplain with the Australian Force, writing in a Sunday paper, says he distributed "a consignment of Bibles and tracts. The former were very welcome the latter had a cool reception." Cans, containing confectionery and useful gifts, were also given to each man. It seems to us that with such bribes the chaplain could have induced the men to take almost any number of Bibles and tracts.

"A sad Chaplain to the Forces" voices his sorrow in the Church Times. His sadness is due to the fact that while in charge of a military hospital he "did not give Holy Communion to ten women in four months, and amongst the 'boys,' there is no need to say, very few." Which, being interpreted, means that unless religion is forced on soldiers and nurses, they care very little about it. And that casts a bright light on the stories still being circulated about the demand for religion in the Army.

Very frankly this "sad chaplain" says that this neglect of religion by the nurses and sisters "has caused me to sever my interest in the woman's cause." That interest, it is quite clear, was only a professional quid pro quo. If the nurses would help him to force religion on the soldiers—and in this connection a wounded soldier would not reject religious ministrations unless he had a very strong objection to it—the chaplain would in turn help the "woman's cause." If not they must get along without his help. But help given in such a spirit would not be worth much.

Dr. Aked explains in the Christian Commonwealth that his statement that he was "a fugitive on the face of the earth" does not imply that he was a pauper. On the contrary, the real danger for the minister of the Gospel is that he will become "wickedly rich." Curiously, so many parsons seem quite willing to risk their "immortal souls" in amassing wealth.

Canon Carnegie, preaching at St Margaret's Westminster, said that Pacifism was inconsistent. It certainly is within the Churches, for the clergy worship the Prince of Peace and christen battleships.

A Trafalgar Square demonstration, at which prayers were to have been offered on behalf of peace, was broken up on a recent Sunday by a hostile crowd, who sang "God Save the King."

A new publication bears the happy title, A Glimmering of Goddesses. It should attract pious folk, for the gods are played out.

The Dean of Rochester is going to Egypt in connection with the National Mission. Many people wish that all the clergy would go to Jericho.

In a list of Sunday services in a London paper, appeared the following notice: "Druid Temple. At 7 p.m. Cavendish Road, Clapham. Chief Druid on Christ-Mass, Its Meaning. All welcome." This suggests an unexpected revival of religion.

Mr. Bottomley assures the readers of a Sunday newspaper that "the Star of Bethlehem still shines in the sky." In the primers of astronomy this star is conspicuous by its absence.

Dr. Saleeby describes Christmas as the celebration of "a helpless infant in its mother's arms as the hope of the world." He might have added that the child was two thousand years old.

A daily paper had a Christmas article entitled, "New Ghosts for Old." Are Christians getting weary of the Jerusalem Ghost?

The Press is devoting much space to the discussion of the question of "Work For All." This should interest the clergy, so many of whom only work one day weekly.

There is only one religion, but there are many forms. In the same way there is only one priesthood, but there are many varieties. Catholic or Protestant, Christian or Jew, they are alike in their attitude towards, and in their reasoning on behalf, of religion. Thus, the Daily Telegraph reproduced the other day the report of a sermon by a Jewish Rabbi which might as well have been preached by a Christian parson. It said the old things in the same way, and if it had been intended to show that the synagogue can cherish the same fallacies as the Church, everyone would have to compliment the preacher upon its success.

Digitized by Google

This Jewish Rabbi notes "the wonderful and unprecedented way.....in which Jews and Christians are learning to know one another (in the trenches) as they never did before." This may be quite true; but what was it that prevented Jews and Christians knowing each other before the War? Quite clearly, nothing but religion. The gulf between these people was created and sustained by religion. Abolish this, and the cause of the division disappears. It has been to some extent abolished by life at the Front, because the conditions there drive men from the unessential to the essential, and in such circumstances Christianity gets left behind. And it is worth noting that even war can do more than religion has ever been able to accomplish. It can teach men to appreciate one another upon purely moral or human grounds; that religion never has and never will do.

Curiously enough, Mr. Simmons, the Rabbi in question, illustrates what has been said in his immediately following remarks. People of different religious views will mingle more freely after the War than before. And, therefore, the problem will be how to admit this "without encouraging the tendency to assimilation." There is the whole problem in a nutshell. If people are to be kept religious, they must be kept separate. If they mingle freely together, the tendency is to weaken religion. This is a question that faces Judaism with peculiar force, but it also confronts Catholicism, Protestantism, and all forms of religious belief. How can a Catholic keep alive a fitting hatred of Protestantism if he mixes with Protestants and sees that in all the business of life they are as good as he is? How can a Christian regard a Freethinker with the proper degree of Christian hatred if he makes a similar discovery? The vitality of religion depends upon isolation. It is kept vigorous by the maintenance of artificial boundaries which serve to keep people of different beliefs from knowing and appreciating one another. And when the realities of life drive people of different religious views into association, then there occurs what both Christian priest and Jewish Rabbi dread—association. A good result for humanity, a bad one for religion.

We are told that Jesus declared "all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." Of course it isn't true, and nobody believes it, least of all professing Christians; but the Rev. E. J. R. Briggs, formerly curate of Christ Church, Crouch End, has been killed at the Front. Against the advice and command of the ecclesiastical authorities he gave up his position and joined the Army as a combatant. This is one of the exceptions to the rule followed by the clergy, and shames the body to which he previously belonged. That is from a patriotic point of view, but of course his original professions may have been only "make-believe."

A Sunday paper asks "Why is the Church throughout England not that effective force and moral witness that she is meant to be?" Well, without cavilling as to what she was, or was not, "meant to be," and which is open to much doubt, the answer is plain to all who have found out the Church professions. The question can best be answered by a quotation from their own and special book; "Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles?"

Rev. Professor Cooper, during the delivery of the Croal Lecture, said that the doctrine of the Trinity was a possession of the Christian Church all over the world before any of the four Gospels were in existence. He might have added that the doctrine of the Trinity was as widely spread before anyone heard of the Christian Church. But that would have let people into a little of the truth, and that was not the purpose of the Croal Lecture.

One of the contributors to the Tatler, Richard King, writes as follows:—

> From the average sermon—good Lord deliver us! When I listen to the dreary "bosh" which comes from the pulpit—"bosh" which no modern or even human appeal, "bosh" which, were it delivered in the market-place, would not collect a handful of mental weaklings to listen to it—when I listen to those preachers who know neither what life is nor what are the needs of humanity struggling blindly towards Beauty and Peace, I feel inclined to stand up and say, "Good heavens, man! Have you never read the works of the great thinkers, the great poets, the writers who have influenced and are influencing men's thoughts? And if you have—in the name of heaven read them to us in the place of these blind-alley dissertations, which have long since ceased to have any human, and never had any divine, appeal."

The pious myth-makers are at it again. At the beginning of the War they fabricated in this country the absurd story of "The Angels of Mons," which has been pretty well laid to rest now, no doubt. In Germany the mythologists are now at work, with Hindenburg as the hero of their attentions. In the Sunday Times of December 30 the following particulars, under a column of News from Germany, appeared. They are worth putting on record in the Freethinker in case someone should be looking for material to bring the story of superstition down to date.

> During a certain battle Hindenburg said to the Kaiser: "Your Majesty, at ten o'clock the victory is ours." When ten o'clock came, the Emperor pulled his watch out of his pocket and said: "Hindenburg, it is two minutes past ten!" In the same moment a staff officer rode up with the report that the Russians were giving way on all sides. Whereupon Hindenburg: "Your Majesty, I crave leave to withdraw myself from your presence for a few minutes." To which the Kaiser replied: "Hindenburg, I know what you wish to do—you are going to pray. That is also my desire. Come, we will go and pray together." And that is what actually happened.
>
> The story, which is said to have spread a "sweet religious feeling" throughout Germany, is now categorically denied by several papers, apparently inspired. It is pointed out that the Kaiser has never been with Hindenburg during the progress of a battle; that the Marshal, if he is a religious man, has never been known to make any reference to the subject at any time; that the story of a staff officer riding up with the report of the enemy giving way everywhere belongs to war of the past, and is absurd under present conditions.

This is a pretty good denial, anyhow; but if the German will-to-believe is as strong as the British, the story will take some killing.

Canon Carnegie says that "fealty to Christ" forced English Christians into the War. We believe German Christians make the same claim. We prefer the attitude of the French, who find honour and love of country enough.

From Darkness Into Light.

AWAY with superstition, let the light
Of clear-eyed reason shine, and chase away
The night of useless myths. To keep at bay
Whatever fetters human thought, to fight
Untruthful creeds which blind the sight,
Are duties nobly done. Soon will the day
Of mental freedom dawn, if all essay
To strike the stubborn foe with power and might.
Can we forget the strife of bygone days,
The martyrdom of those who for us won
The liberty of thought? For them, the ways
Were trackless and unmade, yet pressed they on
To make a level pathway through the maze
Of doubt and error, truest work, well done.

L.

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

January 14, Nottingham; January 28, Swansea; February 4, Abertillery; February 11, Liverpool; February 25, Brixton; March 11 Birmingham; March 18, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—January 14, Leicester.

OUR warmest appreciations to all of our readers who have sent us so many seasonable good wishes. They will, we are sure, excuse us answering each one individually.

H. ROBERTS (Christchurch, N.Z.).—Glad to have your appreciation of what you call "the high standard of excellence" maintained by the Freethinker.

W. G. BRUCE.—The English translations of Eugene Brieux's plays are published by Fifield at 5s., and by Jenkins at 6s.

J. G. FINLAY.—We are pleased to see the lines from Lucretius. There is a very powerful rendering by Dryden of the part dealing with death—if you are not already acquainted with it, which has often made us regret that he did not translate the whole of the poem.

F. S. K.—The Freethinker is taken in a number of public libraries, and fresh efforts are constantly being made to introduce it into new ones. We are always ready to supply it free for such a purpose.

R. OGDEN.—Far from being "bored," your letter has been most interesting. But you set us a hard problem, and we can only say here, and now, that you appear to have acted with the utmost consideration. Had as much consideration been shown for your opinions, it would have raised one's opinion of the influence of religious belief on character. And we do not see how anyone can blame you for withdrawing support which was being used in the way you indicate. Thanks for printed matter.

TURPENTINE.—There are a number of translations of the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, ranging from the seventeenth century onward. A very handy one is issued in Dent's "Everyman" series. There is also one in Routledge's "People's Library" (1s.), by George Long.

J. B. MIDDLETON.—We do not think the curate who tried to induce your newsagent to cease displaying the Freethinker will relish a talk with an avowed "infidel." If this reverend person's blood boils whenever he sees the Freethinker, the only remedy we can suggest is that he should look the other way. But it is like his impudence, anyway. Thanks for your interest in the paper.

S. G. HARRIS.—Isn't it a bit of a trick to ask for a detailed application of Secularism to "everyday domestic, business, and recreative life"? Naturally, every complete philosophy and every religion is meant to apply to all these things; but their particular application must always be determined by existing circumstances. When Secularism says that the happiness of human society is the supreme test of morality, it is laying down a general rule, and it is intended to apply it to "domestic, business, and recreative life." But its application must depend upon the amount of common sense available with those who put the rule into practice. And this last circumstance is as true of Christianity as it is of Secularism.

G. BEDBOROUGH.—Thanks for New Year's booklet and inscription. The thoughts are indeed subtly simple. Their subtlety lies in their simplicity, and many a reader will find himself embarked on a voyage of philosophy before he is aware of it.

J. BLACKHALL.—Your letter is receiving attention.

M. R.—We can only hope we deserve something of the praise you give. Anyway, you make us feel prouder than ever of our women readers.

L. L. BROOME (U.S.A.).—You quite convince us of your own sincerity—that is all.

CASUAL READER.—"How can a man get along without God?" you ask. Well, we manage fairly well, and so do millions of others.

T. GAUNT.—Pleased to hear that War and Civilization is doing its intended work so effectively.

F. WYKES.—Thanks for very pretty Omar Calendar, and for New Year good wishes. The latter we cordially reciprocate.

O. EVANS.—The statement referring to the salaries of Welsh Baptist ministers was based upon information given in one of the religious papers, but we cannot now say which.

J. DE B. (South Africa).—Received with thanks. We are always pleased to send copies of the paper, and will see that it is done in this case. Pleased to have your tribute to the "sustained excellence" of the Freethinker.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Our Sustentation Fund.

THE object of this Fund is to make good the loss on the Freethinker—entirely due to increased cost of materials, etc.—from October, 1915, to October, 1916, and to provide against the inevitable further losses during the continuation of the War. This Fund will close on January 14.

LIST OF SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Previously acknowledged, £228 5s. 9d.—Joshua Ratcliff, £1; W. L. and J. S. W., 10s.; Postman, 2s. 6d.; F. S. Keeble, 2s; Rosa Ogden, 2s. 6d.; Dr. R. T. Nichols, 10s.; E. Simpson, 2s. 6d.; J. F. Aust, 5s.; M. Beale, 5s.; W. Wright, 2s. 6d.; D. Wright, 5s.; F. Wykes, 2s. 6d.; G. Gee, 2s. 6d.; C. D. Weston, £1 1s.; J. W. Hill, 1s. 6d.; R. Ogden (second sub.), 2s. 6d.; John Robinson, 2s.; D. S., £2; J. De B. and Wife, £2. Per Miss Vance: Walter Stewart, 1s.; E. A. Reynolds, 5s.; Miss Harriet Baker, 5s.

Sugar Plums.

A Happy New Year to all our readers. And as the best gift that 1917 can bestow is Peace, let us hope that this year will see the end of a war which, while it lasts, is a constant menace to the security of Western civilization.

Although 1916 has not presented the most favourable of conditions for Freethought propaganda, the work has been more vigorously pursued than has been the case for some years past. Thanks to the Special Propaganda Fund, which was raised in the earlier part of the year, courses of lectures have been arranged in London, and provincial places visited in which Freethought has been long quiescent. Provincial Societies have also been financially assisted, and the Executive of the Society helped in the same manner. That Fund, as we said at the time, came at a very opportune moment, and those who subscribed will, we think, feel satisfied when they reflect upon the general activity that has been maintained. The Fund is being expended in the most economical manner, and no opportunity of breaking new ground, or of helping old centres, is being neglected. As one result of the year's activity, we can say with the utmost sincerity that a new feeling of confidence and endeavour has been revived in the ranks of fighting Freethought.

The great difficulty, as we said a week or two back, lies in securing halls for meetings. Many of these are now taken for military purposes, and will remain out of the market until the end of the War. But there must be others available, and our readers would be giving a very real help if they would make it their business to inquire and inform either ourselves or the General Secretary of the N. S. S., Miss Vance, of the result. We had hoped to have seen work recommenced at Manchester, for example, but inability to secure a suitable hall has prevented it. That difficulty we hope to overcome in the near future. And there are other places to which the same remark applies. So we shall be pleased to see local friends giving what aid they can in this matter. There are, of course, other difficulties in the way of propaganda—increased railway fares, for example. But as we did not stop work on account of the European War, we have no intention of suspending propaganda because of dearer railway travelling. That we must manage as we best can.

Digitized by Google

We feel quite convinced that the present is the "psychological moment" for vigorous Freethought work. Many thousands have been awakened by the War to a sense of their mental attitude towards religion, with the result that they have become more pronounced in their hostility to Christianity, and more alive to the necessity of some active help on their part. Our correspondence from all parts of the world is quite enough to prove this, and there has been, in addition, a larger number of applications for membership to the N. S. S. than for a number of years. That influx we should like to see more than maintained in 1917. And if we are to utilize this awakened and liberated thought after the War, we must lay our plans now. It will be too late to start then. All the Churches are laying plans for the time when peace is declared, and it will not be well for Freethinkers to be "too late."

With regard to the Freethinker. Those who wrote us so anxiously, directly after Mr. Foote's death, concerning the future of the paper, will by now have realized that we were not speaking wildly when we assured them that the Freethinker would continue. We had the situation well in hand, although we must confess that the financial difficulties turned out to be more serious than we had anticipated. Had we realized these at the time, we might have been a little less confident in our prediction. But no one could have foreseen the very expensive price of paper; and there is now another dark time ahead. Still, we have taken all reasonable precautions, and we are as hopeful as ever of pulling through all right.

Our success would have been impossible but for the hearty and loyal support of friends all over the country. And for that we thank them most cordially. The response to the Sustentation Fund was prompt and generous. The deficit of last year has been cleared, and something done towards meeting the weekly deficit which one must take as settled until normal conditions again exist. We believe there are still a large number of readers who intend to subscribe, and we would remind them that this is the last opportunity we shall have of formally bringing the matter before them. The Fund closes on January 14, and we should like to see a really good rally for the last week. If all interested subscribed, there would be quite enough forthcoming to remove every anxiety. And every week's deficit that is met makes the task so much easier.

Last January we asked the help of our readers in securing a thousand new readers. We can assure them that their help was most effective. Some helped by personally getting new readers. Others induced their newsagents to display copies of the paper, making themselves personally responsible for the sales, and also persuaded shopkeepers to display Freethinker posters. As a result of this, we more than made good the loss of readers from enlistments in the Army and Navy, and actually improved our circulation. May we, therefore, repeat last year's request, and ask for the continued help of all our readers in getting new readers? A new reader often means a new worker, and the Cause benefits all round. And as we have often said, once we get readers, we keep them. The only trouble is bringing the paper before their notice.

Two other matters may be mentioned before we close these New Year Notes. We have been asked many times lately concerning the Bowman Bequest litigation. There is really nothing to be said about it further than has been said. The appeal is still down for hearing in the House of Lords, and may come on any day. The Board of the Secular Society, Limited, has done what could be done; solicitors have been instructed and counsel engaged. And the battle will be fought along the right lines. Apart from this, the matter is really out of the hands of the Board. It can only await the pleasure of the law—and that is never noted for its lightning-like speed.

The quarrel with the London County Council also looks like coming to a head shortly. It is probable that summonses will shortly be issued against those who have sold literature in the Parks; but a most curious letter has been received from the Council's solicitor, and on that we prefer to say nothing for the moment. In a war of wits, the N. S. S. is not likely to be left behind. But the unprovoked attack on the sale of literature has called forth a very widespread protest, and if the case does come before the Courts there is all the material prepared for an effective fight. A long-standing liberty, which some members of the Council hoped to extinguish while public opinion was diverted elsewhere, has met with—to these gentlemen—unexpected opposition, and, thanks to the initiative of the N. S. S., a large number of organizations are ready to assist in maintaining for the people of London a privilege which existed long before the County Council came into existence. At any rate, one way and another, 1917 will not be lacking in interest for the Freethought Party.

Next Sunday (January 14) Mr. Cohen lectures twice at Nottingham. In the afternoon he will speak before the Cosmopolitan Debating Society on "Determinism," and in the evening will lecture on "Christianity and the Logic of Life." It is many years since Freethought lectures were delivered at Nottingham, and it is hoped that Mr. Cohen's visit will pave the way for more work in the future.

The North London Branch will resume operations at the St. Pancras Reform Club, Victoria Road, off the Kentish Town Road, N.W., on Sunday evening, January 7. The subject for discussion will be "Is Science Superior to Revelation?" Our contributor, Mr. T. F. Palmer, will take the affirmative, while that excellent Catholic speaker and debater, Mr. Stephen Fry, will strenuously uphold the negative. A general discussion will follow. Chair taken at 7.30.

Miss E. M. Vance, the General Secretary of the National Secular Society, asks us to remind the members that by a resolution passed at the Annual Conference in June, 1916, all future subscriptions become due on January 1. Subscriptions of members who have joined since September, 1916, date as from January 1, 1917. Members who accept this as a polite reminder, and send on their subscriptions to Miss Vance without further notice, will help her to economize materially in both printing and postage.

Too late for insertion last week, we were asked to inform those interested that the Discussion Class directed by Mr. A. D. Howell Smith resumes its meetings at 62 Farringdon Street on Thursday, January 4 at 7.30 p.m. This notice may be still in time to catch the eye of some of our London readers. We are glad to learn that these meetings are well appreciated by all who take part therein.

We are pleased to learn that, in spite of bad weather, Mr. Lloyd had two excellent meetings at Abertillery on Sunday last. Freethought is making good headway in this part of Monmouthshire, and we should like to see similar activity over the whole of South Wales. The field is quite ripe.

Robespierre had the typic sacerdotal temperament, its sense of personal importance, its thin unction, its private leanings to the stake and the cord; and he had one of those deplorable natures that seem as if they had never in their lives known the careless joys of a springtime. By and by, from mere priest he developed into the deadlier carnivora, the Inquisitor.—Lord Morley.

Digitized by Google

For the New Year.

IF all calendars were destroyed, the first day of the new year would arrive as usual. We apologize for this statement; but Christianity is not the only form of superstition that prevents man from becoming like a god. Clocks, trains, moving staircases, and newspapers are the minor devils lurking behind the bushes on the wayside of human life, and we must beware of becoming mechanical.

Pope, one of Nature's artistic Christians, said all there was to be said about hope in one line:—

Hope springs eternal in the human breast.

It is with the same feelings that we see the first faint flushes of the new year; to take any other view would be to say "Nay" to life; and, although we are reminded by musical Jeremiahs that brief life is here our portion, our song about it shall not be pitched in a minor key. Therefore, with this aspiration, we stand on the threshold of 1917, the songs of peace and goodwill having dwindled to a calm. Shall we mock the singers of those songs? We cannot; rather let us pity them, for pity is akin to contempt. They, in their strength, were not content to play the fool in their own house; a mightier force than dogmatism has crowned their stupendous folly. Three anniversaries of the birth of the Prince of Peace have come and gone to the sound of the clang of battle, and although his votaries say one thing with their lips, hideous facts thrust forward their ugly faces and say another. This, we fear, will not prevent a repetition of the cant of Christian brotherhood. Let that pass; turn we now to matters more attractive.

The Book of Job was the first great drama. It is significant that the first signs of Freethought are to be found in a drama. Matter so dynamic as emphatic questioning could not emerge from any other source, least of all from the light comedy which is now once-a-week piety. Scepticism is a quality as positive as belief, and those responsible for the creation of the factors which make for the latter could easily prevent the birth of the former. In bodily form are we here, dissatisfied with the paltry rubbish hidden beneath such words as transubstantiation, ultramontanism, and many other high-sounding names which the reader will readily call to mind. In a dead language, most fitting for practices of an anthropomorphic character, do these retrogressive high priests couch their terms; and man, with his faculty for being deceived, falls a victim. We count it as nothing to rejoice about, this deception of the ignorant.

As we look forward into the future, what can we see? Black as the outlook may be, we can surely discern a few rays of light. If we read these signs aright, we interpret them as a terrible judgment on the pretensions of Christian religion. They pronounce a final doom to the claim of Christianity as a religion of love. With what words shall the heathen greet the missionary? With what scales will all sensible people weigh this Christian claim against international chaos. Chaos and Hatred, Love and Unity, this pair of opposites, as simple to understand as the antagonism between fire and water is beyond and above the ethical grasp of a religion not yet out of its swaddling clothes. Love—yes, say they, as far as our parish extends; as wide as the young curate's, whose vine being affected with the blight, devoutly reasoned that God must be angry with the world. Unity—yes, as embracing as twenty sects in one small area will permit. If we exaggerate, then we shall be pleased to be proved in error; if we underestimate the aims and endeavours of the truly enlightened, then our only answer is Europe. Like a bent tin sword in their hands do we see the Atheism of the enemy; the first flash of reality revealed the failure of that as a weapon. Nor must we forget the efforts of one whom we should like to esteem—we mean Mr. G. K. Chesterton—in his desire to be on the side of the angels. Not even this master of paradox can prove the enemy to be irreligious.

With these considerations in view, it may be well to look round our own armoury. Reason, as opposed to faith, has not failed us; common sense against superstition is our best weapon; and toleration of all plain and fancy religions which are not aggressive is thoroughly consonant with our ideas. Logically, with good precedent too, we are entitled to persecute believing unbelievers, thus proving that imitation is not the sincerest form of flattery. With this form of retaliation we have no concern; let us rather turn our thoughts towards the betterment of society, each in the best manner possible under individual circumstances. The world of thought is in a state of flux. Time will finish the drama at present being enacted, and official religion has nearly run its course. Such a gigantic imposture as organized religion cannot withstand the battering by facts which cannot be avoided, and, above all, a terrific reaction is bound to follow on the cessation of hostilities. To this, Freethinkers may calmly look, with the assurance that, if they had no heaven to attract and no hell to frighten, they remained steadfast in their opinions, which have never been enforced by fire or the sword. If that was our history, then the world would be a still greater menagerie, and it would rather tend to complicate the problem of the Prince of Peace; this, of course, would be absurd.

WILLIAM REPTON.

The Passing of Helen.

HELEN LINDSAY lay on the edge of Eternity. Beaten, exhausted, weary, and careless, she waited the end; gazing with dull eyes at vacancy; only vaguely conscious of a hand slipping into and fondling hers.

Her husband sat at the bedside, dumbly watching his wife's eyes. A half-suppressed moan occasionally escaped him—suggesting some wounded dog suffering agonies in the darkness of night. Steeped to the lips in sorrow, John Lindsay was oblivious of everything but the twitching of his wife's features. And his two little ones—who were twittering with excitement over the discovery of a nest of kittens in the kitchen dresser—unable to engage their father's attention, and still more unable to account for his strange neglect of them, gave up all attempts to attract his notice, and returned to the field of their discovery.

From the dim recesses of the kitchen dresser weird and wonderful sounds soon arose. Alarums and excursions! Feline feelings were violated. Blind and sleepy kittens protested bitterly against midnight attacks and foreign invasions. And the joyous prattle of children chimed merrily. Helen's eyes turned towards the kitchen door; and John's senses stirred. Thoughts slowly shaped themselves in his stupefied mind and fluttered lazily through the corridors of his brain, beating their soft wings in aimless flight until the rising of the Morning Star of Memory. John looked down the past.

How happy he had been with her those eight years! How sweet and thoughful she was always! How shy in the early days of their wedded life, but how confident in their future! When the young came into being, and the future loomed in view, what plans they had laid, what schemes they had made together! The bairns had ever been in her thoughts. As she dreamed and talked, in the long evenings by the fire, of her ideals and ambitions, how her grey eyes, filled with happiness and beaming with hope, could inspire a man! She was the best and bravest chum in the world. One could always reach out without fear to touch the future in Helen's company. And now the end had come. So soon! Oh, how blank life would be when she was gone! Dull, colourless, trailing years dragging their empty days and lonely nights from gloom to gloom. It was hard. And John could catch hold of no comforting thought. Philosophy? Poor broken-backed philosophy—a plaything for fools sporting in the sun. Religion? Religion mocked at human suffering; and the professional prating of its ministers was worse than an insult. He was glad no clergyman had called to repeat his cheap chatter at Helen's bedside, as if the empty twaddle uttered at every death-bed were fitting comment on his separation from her. Oh, if he could have but one more smile of recognition! If she could but know him for a little longer!

Digitized by Google

A few yards from the house seven-year-old Johnnie was discussing the situation with Andy Broon. The friends were gathering dandelions for Johnnie's rabbits.

"An' will ye nae greet when she dees, Johnnie?" asked Andy.

"No," said Johnnie, with a confident shake of the head. "My father hasna grutten yet; nor yet 'll I. The lassies 'll greet I suppose," he added; "but, of coorse, they're just lassies, an' canna help it."

"Man, what did she say when she gied ye chairge o' them?" questioned Andy; the light of his admiring eyes caressing the sober face of his companion. He had heard the story three times already, but could not get enough of such a rare experience, even if it were only by proxy. He envied Johnnie his coming responsibilities, and was almost prepared to sacrifice his own mother if she would but leave to him the care of the family when she died. "What did she say, Johnnie, man?"

"Oh, she didna say awfu' muckle," said Johnnie, placing his gathered dandelions in a heap. "Ye see, it was i' the deid o' the nicht on Thursday last, an' I was sleepin' soun' when my father waukened me. He was awfu' queer an' quate, an' glum, an' I couldna stop lookin' at him as he lifted the lassies in his airms an' cairried them ben the hoose——"

"But what did she say?" Andy never had had "a death i' the hoose," and he wanted to hear of the "deein' woman," and smacked his lips over the anticipated "last words" like any hired mourner. "What did she say, man?"

"She said terrible little to the bairns." (Johnnie was three years older than his twin-sisters.) "She just took them in her airms, an' kissed them, an' cuddled them, an' grat ower them a whilie, an' lookit at them as gin she'd never seen them afore, until my father took them frae her an' bedded them again. Syne she held oot her airms to me an' said, 'Johnnie!'" And the little prig paused for effect.

"Ay?" encouraged Andy.

"Johnnie," says she——

"An' did ye think she was deein' at the time?" interrupted Andy.

"Weel, I wadna say. She was sair awa' wi't that nicht, but we thocht she wad maybe see the mornin'," replied the mannikin, with the air of having had a world's experience in such matters. "It was hersel' that believed she was slippin' awa'; an' that's what garred her want to speak to me an' the bairns."

"An' ye didna greet ava?"

"The never a greet," assured the young stoic. And he proceeded again to relate what had passed in the night, enlarging on every point that would add to his own importance in the eyes of his friend.

But as he described how his mother had "spoken till him an' lippen't till him as gin he'd been a man," how she had charged him to look after his two little sisters all his life, always to be gentle and helpful to them, keeping ever in his mind how she would like him to act towards them—as Johnnie described this, the scene took shape in the mind's eye of the little chap; his father standing in the light of the shaded lamp, with that doomed expression which had settled on his face; himself lying on the breast of his mother, hugged closer and closer to her bosom, white and soft as sun-kissed snow, and now almost as cold; her hands pushing back his shaggy hair from his forehead, and her eyes glaring at him—gorging themselves with the sight of her boy before they closed in eternal darkness. Johnnie imagined he felt himself cuddling in her arms again, and the poor little fellow's stoicism gave way. His eyes filled. A fact Andy Broon was not slow to observe.

"Man, ye're greetin'!" he exclaimed in disgust.

"I'm nae!" Johnnie protested, winking hard.

"Ye are, man. Ye canna deny 't. Yer e'en's watterin' like onything." And he shouted in derision.

"I am not, Andra Broon," reiterated Johnnie, as the tears began to trickle. "I'm nae greetin'.....an'—an'—an' ye needna m-mind gatherin' ony m-mair meat for my rabbits. I can feed them mysel'."

"Ye shouldna pretend ye're a man, then. Ye're naething but a littlin, aifter a'!" mocked Andy, as Johnnie marched down the road. Sluggishly ebbed the crimson element of life in Helen's veins, but Johnnie's tears flowed fast and free as the rabbits were fed that afternoon.....

Mrs. Brown offered to "sit up" that night with John Lindsay, and Johnnie slept with Andy—their quarrel of the afternoon forgotten.

Next morning, as the boys were inspecting Andy's doe's, Rob Smith, the carpenter's son, hailed them from the road. "Hullo, Johnnie, yer mither's deid!"

"Ye're a leear, Rob Smith," exclaimed Johnnie. "She couldna dee withoot me kennin'."

"She is deid. My father's makin' the coffin for her. Man, I was haudin' the nails mysel'."

"She's nae. She canna be. She wasna deid yesterday," insisted Johnnie. And turning with an appealing look to his friend, he said, "You dinna believe 't, Andy. Dae ye, Andy?"

"No, I dinna," replied Andy, stoutly. "Rob Smith was aye kent for a big leear."

"I tell ye my father's workin' at her coffin the noo. Wad he be makin' a coffin for a woman that wasna deid, think ye?" observed the joiner's son.

Johnnie's lips were trembling. He stared wildly at Rob.

"Fecht him for 't, Johnnie," suggested Andy, in hot anger at the pain Rob was causing his chum. "Fecht the devil for 't. That'll settle 't."

"I will!" howled Johnnie, throwing off his jacket, his teeth set hard. "Come on to the mill-course wi' ye, Rob Smith. Na!" He paused as a sudden thought struck him. "Na, nae there. They can see the mill-course frae oor windows, Andy, an' I wadna like them to see me fechtin' an' her lyin' there."

"Roond i' the corn-yaird, then," proposed Andy. "Will the corn-yaird suit ye, Rob?"

"Onywe ye like," assented Bob, sullenly. He felt himself hardly used for no reason. "It doesna mak' whaur we hae 't. His mither's deid whatever."

"Shut up, Rob Smith!" shouted Johnnie, his eyes smarting with the effort of keeping back those tears which would come in spite of him. "Shut up, man! That's nae settled yet, my mannie. There's the coordielick. Gin ye beat me she's deid, an' gin I beat you she's nae deid."

Digitized by Google

"Ay, an' gin ye gie him his licks, Johnnie," added Andy, "I'll gie him anither hidin' for sayin' she was deid. An' that'll maybe ser' him for a while."

The combatants faced each other.

"Johnnie Lindsay," cried Mrs. Brown, appearing on the scene at this moment, "what in the world are ye daein?"

"He's fechtin' for 's mither," explained Andy.

Mrs. Brown turned aside. "Ye'd better rin awa' hame, Johnnie, lad. Ye'll need to fecht for yer sisters in a whilie."

"My sisters?" faltered Johnnie. Then he understood.

"I telled ye," said Rob. F. L. B. G.

Skeleton Sermons.

"Shindikits!"

JUST now the air is full of rings and corners and monopolies, notwithstanding the great War. Syndicates are being formed to annex the South Pole, while the British Government intends establishing on a colossal scale a State beer monopoly, and people seem to think they are a novelty evolved out of the teeming brain of the twentieth century speculator. No such thing! Monopolies have existed from the creation of the world. Didn't Adam have a monopoly in garden produce? Yes, and he was able to monopolize the cider business, having a corner in apples. Noah had a monoply in the carrying trade during at least forty days and forty nights, enabling him to plant a vineyard with the proceeds and embark in the native wine business, monopolizing that for a time. Job worked up a corner in boils very successfully, and Lot's wife put everything she had into chloride of sodium. Goliath carried everything with a high hand until David introduced him to a sling, of which he had the monopoly, that went to his head and floored him. Methuselah had a monopoly in the oldest inhabitant business, and Samson monopolized the hair trade, until a woman named Delilah cut him out. He was the first to go into the stencil business, stamping foxes tails with brands of fire.

Solomon monopolized nearly all the wisdom and a good proportion of the women in his time, though he could not have done it had Brigham Young been alive. Pharaoh's daughter may not have had a monopoly in the milk business, though it is on record that she got a great "prophet" out of water. St. Paul had a monopoly in many things, until Minneapolis started up—and so it goes.

It will be seen that the monopolist is by no means of modern origin, but I hope the above samples will be enough to swear by or swear at. There is scarcely a commodity that can be mentioned but what is run by some "corner" or other. Take politicians for example. My advice is to avoid, as far as possible, breeding politicians. Strive only for patriots. Keep on trying, and also set higher standards and ideals before them. A few stuffed specimens of our present-day politicians might be kept in the museums, and their portraits in the National Gallery, their statues in the parks and public places, all labelled, "Stumbling-blocks to human progress in the dark ages of the twentieth century."

As to millionaires, if Carnegie, Rockefeller, Jay Gould, and a few others want the earth, they have one distinguished character — a prototype — in the New Testament, who, being on a high mountain, thought he owned it, but he found out his mistake; and those who try to get up "corners" ought to be put in that place of infantile punishment themselves. THE OWL.

Correspondence.

FOOD PRODUCTION AND THE BIRTH-RATE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I should like to thank Mr. E. Egerton Stafford for his article maintaining that war, owing to excessive birth-rates, has often been a biologic and economic necessity. His conclusion, however, that "when nations realize that the true way to solve all economic problems is to exploit the earth for the benefit of all, and to colonize unoccupied parts of the earth on international lines, then war will cease to be a biologic and economic necessity," will make some of his readers feel that even more European wars are inevitable as the nations will not agree on the foregoing. Therefore I greatly regret the implication in his conclusion that the birth-rate factor, which he rightly contends has been so important in the past, can now be ignored.

But can this factor now be ignored? The world's birth-rate before the War was at least 35 per thousand per annum; so if everyone had sufficient food the death-rate would at most be 10, as in New Zealand, and the population would increase by at least 25 per thousand per annum. It was, however, only increasing at a fifth of that rate! Is it conceivable that even if the whole world were voluntarily to come under one ideal Socialist government, the rate of increase of the earth's food supply could be accelerated five-fold? Or consider Russia and the Balkan States. Before the War they still had birth-rates of over 40 per thousand, and dearh-rates of about 30. Is it conceivable that anything but a big reduction of their savage birth-rates could eliminate their dangerous pressure of population? Or take the United Kingdom. Thanks to Bradlaugh, her birth-rate had fallen from 34 per thousand per annum in 1876 to 24 in 1913, and her death-rate from about 20 to 14. But had everyone been adequately fed, her death-rate would not have been more than 10. Thus even a birth-rate of only 24 ought to give us a rate of natural increase of population of 14 per thousand per annum. Is it likely that any social reform, especially after this terribly impoverishing War, could enable our population to increase by about half again of her pre-War rapid rate?

But in addition to communal exploiting of the earth for the benefit of all, Mr. Stafford mentions colonization. This suggests keeping the population stationary by emigrating each year's increase. Emigration, however, practically means emigration of able-bodied childless adults, which means diminishing the food-growing and food-buying powers of the Mother Country and aggravating any poverty existing here. Naturally, the colonies specially want adults, and not children, just as we should prefer to emigrate children and retain the far more useful men whom we have also had the burden of bringing up and training. Thus emigration would increase poverty, and would prove to be no safety-valve for the high birth-rates that tend to produce wars.

So on both counts I most earnestly beg Mr. Stafford to make his conclusion the freethinking one which his article was so well leading up to, namely, that when the nations realize that the quickest way to solve all economic problems is to encourage the poor to have only two children per family, then war will cease to be a biologic and economic necessity.

B. DUNLOP, M.B.

Miscarried.

HUMANITY'S a letter
Addressed to heaven by God;
But the postman knew no better,
A different path he trod.

He could not read the writing,
'Twas fearful scrawl, he said;
His comments were most biting,
So it went to hell instead.

A. F. T.

Digitized by Google

Where to Obtain the "Freethinker."

The following is not a complete list of newsagents who supply the "Freethinker," and we shall be obliged for other addresses for publication. The "Freethinker" may be obtained on order from any newsagent or railway bookstall.

London.

E.—E. T. Pendrill, 26 Bushfield Street, Bishopsgate, M. Papier, 86 Commercial Street. B. Ruderman, 71 Hanbury Street, Spitalfields J. Knight & Co., 3 Ripple Road, Barking. Messrs. Duncumb & Sons, 287 High Street, Stratford.

E.C.—W. S. Dexter, 6, Byward Street. Rose & Co., 133 Clerkenwell Road. Mr. Siveridge, 88 Fenchurch Street. J. J. Joques, 191 Old Street. Mr. Henderson, 66 Charing Cross Road.

N.—C. Walker & Son, 84 Grove Road, Holloway. Mr. Keogh, Seven Sisters Road (near Finsbury Park). Mr. West, New Road, Lower Edmonton. T. Perry, 17 Fore Street, Edmonton. H. Hampton, 80 Holloway Road. E. S. Smith, 7 Turnpike Lane, Hornsey.

N.W.—W. I. Tarbart, 316 Kentish Town Road. W. Lloyd, 5 Falkland Road, Kentish Town.

S.E.—J. H. Killick, 1 Tyler Street, East Greenwich. Mr. Clayton, High Street, Woodside, South Norwood. W. T. Andrews, 35 Meetinghouse Lane, Peckham. B. Dean, Southwark Bridge.

S.W.—R. Offer. 58 Kenyon Street, Fulham. A. Toleman, 54 Battersea Rise. A. Green, 29 Felsham Road, Putney. F. Locke, 500 Fulham Road. F. Lucas, 683 Fulham Road.

W.—Mr. Fox, 154 King Street, Hammersmith. Mr. Harvey, 1 Becklow Road, Shepherds Bush. Mr. Baker, Northfield Avenue, West Ealing. Thomas Dunbar, 82, Seaford Road, West Ealing.

W.C.—J. Bull, 24 Grays Inn Road.

Country.

Aberdeenshire.—J. Grieg, 16 Marischol Street, Peterhead.

Barrow-in-Furness.—J. Jowett, 56 Forshaw Street. E. L. Jowett, 84 Dalton Road.

Beccles.—C. Chase, Station Road.

Birkenhead.—Mr. Capper, Boundary Road, Port Sunlight.

Birmingham.—J. C. Aston, 39-40 Smallbrook Street. A. G. Beacon & Co., 67 & 68 Wocester Street. F. Holder, 42 Hurst Street. Mr. Benton, High Street, Erdington. Mr. Kimber, Ash Road Post Office, Saltley. W. H. Smith & Son, 34 Union Street. Messrs. Stanford & Mann, New Street.

Bolton.—E. Basnett, Church Street, Westhoughton. W. Atkinson, 364 Blackburn Road.

Brighton.—W. Hillman, 4 Little Western Street.

Bristol.—W. H. Smith a Son, Victoria Street.

Cardiff.—W. H. Smith & Son, Penarth Road.

Carshalton.—Mr. Simmons, 29 North Street.

Gateshead.—Henderson & Birkett, 4 & 5 Hills Street.

Cheltenham.—S. Norris, Ambrose Street.

Cullompton.—A. W. Clitsome, The Square.

Derbyshire.—Mr. Featherstone, Chapel-en-le-Firth.

Dublin.—Mr. Kearney, Upper Stephen Street.

Dundee.—Mr. Cunningham, St. Andrew's Street. "The Hub," High Street. Mr. Lamb, 121 Overgate.

Falkirk.—James Wilson, 76 Graham's Road.

Glasgow.—David Baxter, 32 Brunswick Street.

Gravesend.—Mrs. Troke, 10 Passock Street. Mr. Love, Gassick Street. Mr. Gould, Milton Road. Mr. Troke, Clarence Place.

Hastings.—King Bros., 2 Queen's Road.

Ipswich.—A. E. Hiskey, 1 Old Cattle Market. T. Shelbourne, St. Matthew Street. Mr. Fox, Fore Street. Mr. Fox, St. Helen's Street. Mr. Roberson, Back Hamlet. Mr. Joyce, Fore Street.

Jarrow.—L. Prescod, Railway Street.

Kent.—E. J. Voss, 148 Broadway, Bexley Heath.

Lancashire.—John Turner, Scourbottom, Waterford. W. Restall, Station Bridge, Urmston. J. T. Middlehurst, 43 Water Lane, Preston.

Leeds.—C. H. Pickles, Ltd., 117 Albion Street. J. Bray, 95 Park Lane. J. Sutcliffe, West Street.

Liverpool.—S. Reeves, 316 Derby Road, Bootle. W. H. Smith and Son, 61 Dale Street.

Manchester.—Mrs. Tole, Whitelow Road, Chorlton-cum-Hardy. John Heywood, Ltd., Deansgate. Abel Heywood & Son, 47-61 Lever Street. W. H. Smith & Son, Blackfriars Street.

Monmouth.—Mr. Davies, Pontnewynidd. Wm. Morris, Windsor Road, Griffithatoon. Wyman & Son, Station Bookstall, Pontypool Road.

Neath.—W. G. Maybury, 57 Windsor Road.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—W. H. Smith & Son, 2 Forth Place.

Northampton.—Mr. Bates, Bridge Street. A. Bryan, Barracks Road.

Southend-on-Sea.—Harold Elliott, 1 Belle Vue Terrace.

Stockton-on-Tees.—Mr. Elgie, Bowesfield Lane.

Teddington.—H. H. Holwill, 105 High Street.

Torquay.—L. Priston, 103 Union Street. A. Priston, 47 Market Street. A. Peters, Old Mill Road, Chelston. Mr. Ronayne Walnut Road. H. Peters, 193 Union Street. W. J. Peters, 37 Union Street. Mr. Hunt, Lucius Street.

Yarmouth.—C. H. Knights, 87 & 88 Northgate Street. H. Bird, 19 Howard Street South. J. M. Headley, North Howard Street.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, off Kentish Town Road, N.W.): 7.30, Debate, "Is Science Superior to Revelation?" Opener, Mr. T. F. Palmer; Opposer, Mr. Stephen Fry —Thursday, Jan. 11, at N. S. S. Offices, at 7.30, Mr. A. D. Howell Smith's Discussion Class.

OUTDOOR.

HYDE PARK: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Dales and Kells, "The Why and the Wherefore"; 6.30, Messrs. Kells, Saphin, and Yates.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

LIVERPOOL BRANCH N. S. S. (Clarion Cafe, 25 Cable Street); 7, J. Hammond, "Sir Oliver Lodge and the Spirits."

Population Question and Birth-Control.

POST FREE THREE HALFPENCE.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
QUEEN ANNE'S CHAMBERS, WESTMINSTER, S.W.

RATIONALIST PEACE SOCIETY
38 CURSITOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

President: THE RT. HON. J. M. ROBERTSON, M.P.
Chairman: MRS. H. BRADLAUGH BONNER.

The Rationalist Peace Society was formed in 1910 to carry on a propaganda in the interest of International Peace on essentially and avowedly Rationalist lines, without reference to religious sanctions of any kind. The annual subscription is fixed at a minimum of one shilling.

The Religion of Famous Men.
BY
WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

A
BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY
OF FREETHINKERS
OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.
BY
J. M. WHEELER.

Price THREE SHILLINGS Net.
(Postage 6d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. LEA.
In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
By E. A. ASHCROFT.
440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By CARVETH READ.
8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.
By D. B. HART, M.D.
Crown 8vo. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

THE THEORIES OF EVOLUTION.
By YVES DELAGE.
1912. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.
For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. MILL.
Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

HISTORY OF THE TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.
By C. D. COLLET.
Two vols., published at 7s. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By CHAPMAN COHEN.
Price 1s. net, postage 2d.

EVOLUTION AND ITS BEARING ON RELIGIONS.
By A. J. DADSON.
An outline of the doctrine of Evolution, with a study of Religion and Religious History from the standpoint of the evolutionary hopothesis. Five plates, published at 6s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 3d.

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. WHEELER.
Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or othe Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all aws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp. ...	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp....	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE PASSING OF JESUS. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 58 pp.	,, 1d.		3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	2
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
COMING CIVILIZATION. 30 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Mangasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 32 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 32 pp.	Nett. ,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY, by Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 1,852

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 2 SUNDAY JANUARY 14, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
A Challenge to the Churches.—The Editor	17
Religion in West Wales.—J. T. Lloyd	18
"The War and Religion."—Mimnermus	19
A Scientific and Sceptical Saint.—T. F. Palmer	21
Another New Hymn.—Arthur F. Thorn	22
Acid Drops	23
To Correspondents	25
Our Sustentation Fund	25
Sugar Plums	25
"Free Will."—Jerl. Nirra	26
"Christian Evidence."—W. A. V.	27
A Hasty Judgment.—Alan Tyndall	28
Letter to the Editor—Colonization and the Birth-Rate	29
Death of William Platt Ball	29
Notice of Meetings	30
Books and Pamphlets	31

Views and Opinions.

A Challenge to the Churches.

We said last week that if there were an epidemic of truth-telling, and the clergy fell victims to its ravages, half the pulpits would be empty. A few days after we had written this, a Church newspaper, the Challenge, substantially endorsed the truth of what was said by publishing the following in its leading article:—

> We challenge the Church to proclaim aloud the ascertained results and the prevailing tendencies alike of science and of Biblical criticism. Often the clergy do not speak for fear of shocking the laity, and the laity conceal their views from the clergy for fear of shocking them. There is a conspiracy of silence where silence means deception.

The editor is quite safe in issuing this challenge, for none of the clergy are likely to accept it. And this, we fancy, he knows as well as we do. For it is not the appointed and historic task of the clergy to either discover the truth or to proclaim it. Their function is to teach specific doctrines, to maintain them in face of all opposition, to keep from their congregations all knowledge likely to disturb their faith, and, if some knowledge cannot be kept from them, to harmonize it with established teaching, so that it becomes quite innocuous.

* * *

Reciprocal Hypocrisy.

Apart from this, there is no doubt whatever that the Challenge is proclaiming a vital truth of the religious situation. And the picture of the laity refraining from saying what they think about current religion for fear of shocking the poor clergy is not without piquancy. "Poor fellow," they say in effect of their parson, "we must humour him as far as we can. If he knew what we know about religion, he would be made quite miserable, and would have to leave the pulpit. So we must keep up the pretence that he is our guide and instructor. We must pity his weakness, and have compassion on his ignorance." And things go their way; the pulpit pretending for the sake of the pew, the pew pretending for the sake of the pulpit. Nor does the game stop at the church doors; it extends to the outside world. What the Challenge pictures as the relation between the clergy and the laity exists also as between large sections of the laity itself. Smith professes to believe in Christianity so that he may not shock Jones. Jones says he is a Christian so that he may set a good example to Smith. The "upper classes" patronize religion so that the "common" people may be kept in order. The "common" people pretend to believe so that the "superior" classes may not be offended. Robinson won't allow his children to play in the garden on Sunday because it would shock his neighbour Jones; and Jones keeps his youngsters indoors for the sake of Robinson's feelings. Each plays the hypocrite for the moral improvement of the other. Half the world is engaged in inoculating the other half with insincerity, to encourage straightforwardness. What a revelation there would be if the world were stricken with honesty for only twenty-four hours!

* * *

Our Greatest Need.

The longer one lives, the more one reflects, the stronger becomes one's conviction that the world's greatest needs lie in the cultivation of clear thinking and of moral courage. Both are among the rarest qualities possessed by human beings. Clear thinking means ultimately a trained and informed thinking, and there are comparatively few whose intelligence is either one or the other. Of how many people can we say that they have earned the right to express an opinion on any subject whatever? Usually you will catch the echo of the last morning's or evening's paper, or of some inanity they have been accustomed to repeat from childhood. Of an independent and informed opinion not a trace. Look at the kind of reading provided for popular consumption, and you will see evidence to the same end. We were looking recently over a whole batch of illustrated newspapers, and it was enough to make one despair of human nature. A picture of Lady —— watching soldiers play billiards, King —— walking down the street, Lord —— entering his motor car, and so on through an unending series of similar inanities. What kind of intelligence is it to which such things appeal? And yet such productions are circulated literally by the million! It may safely be said that among a people who did any real thinking there would be no demand for puerilities of this kind.

* * *

The Herd Mind.

But there is more in the hesitancy of people to speak out on matters of religion than is glimpsed by the Challenge. At the root of the matter lies a lack of moral courage. People are mentally gregarious to a frightful degree. They cannot think with comfort save in a crowd. Analyse the majority of the apologies put forward on behalf of a rationalized religion or a rationalized Christianity, and we must come to this conclusion. They talk glibly enough of "essential Christianity" and "pure religion," but what is meant by either phrase? Essential Christianity should mean Christianity untouched by modern thought, and that leads us straight in the demonism and crass supernaturalism of the New Testament and of the Apostolic period. And "pure religion," again, is religion as it exists with the primitive savage. Neither modern Christianity nor modern religion are "pure." They are highly impure—adulterated with the refinements and humanitarian impulses of a more civilized age. There is only one reason for this cant of a purified or a rationalized religion, and that is the fear of standing alone without a religion in a world where it is accepted as a badge of respectability.

Digitized by Google

* * *

The Dangers of Independent Thought.

The mass of people do not think clearly. But why should they? No one can say that thinking is encouraged or that the thinker is held in high honour. In our national economy the thinker receives the smallest consideration. In our State functions it is the Soldier and the Priest who figures, the Scientist and the Philosopher and the Man of Letters are left on one side. Under prevailing conditions we have no right to expect a real honesty of expression. In the mass mankind will always seek to get through life as comfortably as they can. And so long as independent thinking involves severe discomfort, so long will it remain a rarity. This is not so much the fault of the individual as it is the fault of society as a whole. In the very nature of the case the martyr—upon even the smallest scale—must be an exception. Exceptional virtues will only be practised by exceptional people; it is the commoner ones that will be exercised by humanity at large. And when society offers the same inducements to moral courage and independent thinking that it now offers to mental sluggishness and hypocrisy, it will have made the honest thinker a far commoner phenomenon than he is at present.

* * *

Christianity's Capital Crime.

We are the product of our tradition and training here as elsewhere. For over fifteen centuries the peoples of Europe have been under the influence of Christianity, and the one thing on which the Churches have agreed has been hatred of nonconformity, a desire to press all minds into one mould, a determination to suppress freedom of thought and speech. Generation after generation, heretics have been punished, the truth hidden, questions suppressed, critics damned. People have been made to feel that the one thing a Christian community cannot tolerate, and rarely forgives, is freedom of thought and plainness of speech. And this, as a matter of fact, is Christianity's capital crime against the race. Other offences have a more dramatic aspect. The myriads of people put to death in the name of the religion of peace and brotherhood, the lingering martyrdom of brave men and women in Christian prisons, may make more moving reading, but these things are as nothing compared with the influence of Christianity on race development. The constant elimination of a strong mental type, the preservation of a type unthinking, credulous, and sheepish, have combined to keep the race at a low level of development. Every generation is moulded by the beliefs, the customs, the institutions by which it is surrounded, and we have been moulded by ours. To rail against the individual is useless; it is the whole social tone that needs modification. Christianity has worked hard to create a race of moral cowards and mental hypocrites, and its efforts have been all but completely successful. It is something to the good to find a religious paper challenging the Churches to speak the truth, even though one is without hope of the challenge being accepted. And it is just possible that the challenge may be boldly offered because it is felt there is not the least danger of its being acted on.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Religion in West Wales.

II.

(Concluded from p. 3.)

IT cannot be repeated too often that Christianity is a religion not for time but for eternity, and that its primary object is to set a man right, not with his fellow beings, but with God. To be saved signifies to be "delivered from the wrath to come," to become a citizen of heaven. Neither in the New Testament nor in the creeds of the Church do we find any allusion whatever to the reorganization of society. The ransomed of the Lord are but strangers and pilgrims on the earth, constantly looking for the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come. The Christian life is, therefore, a life devoted to the pursuit of heavenly ideals. The apostolic admonition is, "Seek the things that are above where Christ is, seated on the right hand of God. Set your mind on the things that are above, not on the things that are upon the earth" (Col. iii. 1, 2). This world is not a permissible object of love, and the saints are solemnly warned against being of it while passing through it to the next. In the "Seiet," as Caradoc Evans calls the meeting at which church members relate their experiences, the subjects talked about are God, Christ, salvation, and the glory that awaits the faithful in heaven; and the complaint oftenest heard is that the earth and its things prove too attractive, or that the Devil succeeds too well in drawing the mind away from spiritual realities. To be religious, then, means to occupy the mind with supernatural concerns, to attend church or chapel, to read the Bible and sing hymns, to pray, and to converse as frequently as possible about the unseen world and its denizens. In Wales, especially in the agricultural districts, religion is a source of unspeakable joy to those who possess it, owing chiefly to the sense of eternal safety which it affords them. All their sins are blotted out, and they can read their title clear to mansions in the skies.

Now, it is quite possible to be sincerely and profoundly religious without being morally upright and honourable. There are, alas, many people to whom religion is an emotional luxury of the most ardent kind. The Big Man is on their side; they are accepted in the Beloved; they are free from condemnation; no matter what happens, hell's door is closed against them for ever, and heaven's ineffable bliss awaits them. They may do wrong on a large scale, but Christ has purchased full forgiveness for them, and all they have to do is to ask for it. Caradoc Evans tells us that Lias Carpenter was "a mighty man in Sion," his piety entitling him to sit in the Big Seat. Yet his being "full of the White Jesus bach" did not prevent him from going to Tycornel and deliberately robbing Ellen Pugh of her chastity.

> Thereafter, Lias frequented Tycornel whither he arrived and quitted in darkness and away from the common track.
>
> It came to be that Ellen said to him, "Boy bach ("bach" being a term of endearment) wed me you must."
>
> "Speak will I to mam," answered Lias.
>
> "Iss, do you in a haste."
>
> "Indeed, speak will I. Fair day for now."
>
> Ellen was troubled that Lias did not come any more to Tycornel, and she contrived that men and women should not discover her plight. She drew in her clothes, and as her size increased she eased them; her contrivings, did not withhold her state. Folk said to her, "Many handfuls of gravel have been thrown at your window. Whisper the name of the thrower" (Capel Sion, p. 123.)

Lias not only refused to marry her, but flatly denied that he was the father of the child. Ellen "pleaded in the hearing of Lias's mother, Shanni: 'Woman bach without wickedness, make your son verify his pledge.' Old Shanni laughed in the girl's face and spoke rudely. 'Don't laugh, foolish Shanni,' Ellen retorted, 'Serious is affairs.'"

Digitized by Google

> Old Shanni tightened her lips and called to her Lias, who had kept himself close: "The strumpet of Tycornel says you are the father."
>
> Lias opened his mouth, and a frothy spittle fell therefrom upon his beard. "Dear me," he said. "Bad lies you talk."
>
> Ellen bare a child and she named him "Lias," and after she was recovered fury possessed her; she cried, as a peevish child cries, on the Tramping road, and in shop Rhys, and at the Gates of Sion that Lias Carpenter was the father of her infant (Ibid, p. 124).

Lias was terribly vexed, and he shammed innocence before the minister of Sion Chapel, "to whom he sacrificed a hen." Poor Ellen was ordered to attend the Seiet and to stand in the Big Seat, in the face of all the people. The wily men of the High Places showered questions on her, and lastly the Rev. Bern Davydd lifted his voice:—

> "Name the man bach you tempted." Truly Ellen answered.
>
> "Sparrow of a pig, no-no. A liar you are. Very religious is Lias. Is he not in the Big Seat?"
>
> "He was bad with me," Ellen said. Bern Davydd interrupted her: "Shut your head, you bull. Your bastard is by old Satan. Congregation, here's a sin. Shaking and redding you are. Good that I am here, for am I not the Big Man's son?" (Ibid, pp. 125-6).

Having refused to listen to the woman's story, this man of God requested Lias Carpenter to state his case, which he did thus:—

> "Dear people, shedding tears am I, and they are salter than the weepings of Mishtress Lot. Evil was she, but very, very pious was Lot. Changed was she into a rock of salt; a rock bigger than the biggest in shop Rhys. Let out tears will I this minute." Lias wept. "Look you on the marks of the tears on my whiskers. So-ho, the wench says: 'Lias Carpenter was naughty with me.' No, dear me. Am I not full of the white Jesus bach? A carpenter was the Big Jesus. He made coffins. Iss, people bach, religious is the male that makes coffins" (Ibid, p. 126).

Lias was very religious, and he boldly stood in the Big Seat, lying in the face of the Big Man himself. He pretended to be on the friendliest terms possible with the Lord; but his saintliness was no barrier to his wrongdoing and lying.

Dan, a farm servant, "assumed that he was above all the religious men in Capel Sion, and in the Seiet he rose and exclaimed: 'Boys bach, a photograph of the Big Man am I.'" The minister laughed his claim to scorn, saying, "The fool is lame in the foot: old club is at the bottom of his leg, and light is the weight of his sense." Shan, his mother, adored him, and muttered: "Murmurirg, dear congregation, is always the boy bach to the One in the sky. Large joy he makes of his religion." Bern Davydd scolded her: "Serious to goodness, off is your temper. Lunatic is Dan. Boys Capel Sion laugh provokingly at Dan Groesfordd. Know you all that I am the Big Man's photograph." Dan professed to be the Big Man's most highly valued servant, to whom he once said: "Dan bach, Jesus is on my right hand, and you are on my left hand." While he was preaching one day, a strange woman asked, "What does the boy bach say?" She was a rich widow, called Sali Blaenpant, her husband having gone to the palace of White Shirts.

> "Dear me," said Dan. "Dear me. Abide do I with the Big Man. Not anything concerns me but him." Then sang Dan Groesfordd: "Sali Blaenpant, is not the Big Man the landlord of all the fields? Even the land under the old potators he owns. Good he is to ones religious and bad to unbelievers. He did say to me: 'Dan bach, don't you now let an old razor touch the hairs of your face, because I will make you a photograph of the White Jesus bach'" (Ibid, p. 196).

Sali took him at his own valuation, saying, "The second Jesus is Dan Groesfordd." She wrote him a letter, in which she described him as "greater than all the rulers." She loved him with all her heart, and supplied him with plenty of money. The farm of ninety acres was her own property. On hearing this, Dan said:—

> "Well and well, an old bother is a mortgage."
>
> "Iss, boy bach. But there's no mortgage on Blaenpant."
>
> "Happy you are in your offences," said Dan. "What will Blaenpant profit you in the Palace of White Shirts? Give did I all to the Big Man. Speechify religion will I now. This is what the Angel said to me the first night: 'Grand for you to preach preaches in a Capel.'"
>
> "Wise was the Angel," said Sali.
>
> "Poor am I in silver and gold," said Dan, "and rich in religion. How say you to a Capel Sink? White will be your Shirt."

Dan did not rest until he had swindled Sali out of her farm, which he sold for five hundred and fifty pounds. Besides, Sali gave birth to a boy of whom he was the father, but he declined to marry the mother. Afterwards—

> Dan wept in the Seiet that women had caused him to meddle with them to his hurt, and he glorified God that his hand had been stayed from marrying Sali Blaenpant (Ibid, p. 207).

In all the stories told in My People and Capel Sion religious humbug plays a prominent part, vice finds even the clerical profession a useful medium through which to work, and covetousness thrives in the guise of giving to the Lord for the carrying on of his work in the world.

Mr. Evans' two books, My People and Capel Sion, are distinguished by two great qualities. In the first place, they represent the first successful attempt to give in English a literal translation of the popular idioms of the Welsh language. Of course, the success is only partial, because idioms are really untranslatable. "Big Man" does not by any means convey the Welsh idea of God contained in the term "Gwr Mawr," nor is "White Shirts" an equivalent of the Welsh "gynau gwynion"; but there are no English equivalents to such idiomatic Welsh expressions. On the whole, however, these volumes afford English readers an accurate idea of the idiomatic manner in which the Welsh people talk about religion. But their most characteristic feature is the accuracy with which they represent the influence of chapel religion upon the Welsh character. We do not know what Caradoc Evans' attitude to supernatural religion is, but it is incontrovertible that the Welsh people do things in the name of God which, as members of society, they would never dream of doing. Like Joshua of old, they hold the Supreme Being responsible for their evil deeds. The sooner they get rid of Christianity the better it will be for the land of song.

J. T. Lloyd.

"The War and Religion."

> We were all brothers, because we had one work, and one hope, and one All-Father.—Henry Kingsley.

The European War has disturbed the Churches. Already the theological literature of the War comprises a library, and there is every prospect that before Armageddon has died down, the load of books and pamphlets it has occasioned will be as prodigious as itself. The large majority are ephemeral, mere dust and bluff driven on the breath of the storm; but some have a passing interest.

Digitized by Google

Anyone who reads the utterances of the clergy, and their apologists, in periodical literature will perceive that they are conscious of the reproach which this present War implies. It had been the clerical boast that the Christian religion had civilized Europe, and none, except the Kaiser and his obsequious Lutheran pastors, have the courage to claim that such a war is in harmony with the principles and ideals of the Christian religion. The clergy of all denominations have preached brotherhood and peace for centuries, and this present War means that the big stick of brute force has been thrust suddenly into the mechanism of religion. The wheels cease turning, and the familiar hymn-tunes die into a silence, broken by the clangour of guns, the groans of the dying, and the noise of falling thrones. Not only religion, but philosophy, literature, science, and art, are suddenly arrested. At one terrible stroke we are back in the times of barbarism and savagery, and millions of dead men are shovelled under crimson soil. The pre-war conditions were the fruit of centuries of evolution, centuries of moral and intellectual advance; a labour not of yesterday, but very many yesteryears of European civilization. Humanity has been hoodwinked, and just too late the clergy discover the state of affairs, and apologize for them.

One of the most remarkable of these orthodox deliverances is a pamphlet, entitled The War and Religion, printed as a supplement to the Athenæum, a paper that has concerned itself with weighty and serious matters for over eighty years. For this reason we give it prominence. That the writer's pen is pointed with pious bias is natural enough; his bias does not, however, degenerate into the gross unfairness and hysterical emotionalism that usually distinguishes soulful utterances on religion. Here are his comments on the boasted revival of religion:—

> The revival of interest in religion has not so far issued in a revival of positive religious faith. The first broad effect of the War has been to stimulate criticism of the Churches and to raise doubts as to the truth of Christianity itself. "The failure of the Churches," "the failure of Christianity," are phrases in constant use at the present time. Surely professing Christians ought to have done more. They ought to have been able to prevent this War. A widespread popular sentiment harps on the degradation of Europe in coming to this pass after two thousand years of Christianity. The responsibility of the failure is laid at the doors of the Churches. In some quarters this means despair of organized Christianity. The complicity of the Churches with the existing social order precludes any hope for their future. The Church is indeed the captive city of God, and not a few doubt the possibility of her recovery.

Nor is this all, for the writer carries his argument further:—

> The critical processes initiated by the War is by no means confined to dissatisfaction with the Churches. Observers at the Front report that soldiers feel themselves to be in the grip of an evil fate whose very existence contradicts the Christian's faith in a God of love. The problem of evil is accentuated. How can God be good when he permits such a catastrophe to overtake mankind and inflict untold suffering on the innocent? The fundamental article of the Christian creed is thus called in question, and relegated to the land of dreams.

The effect of the War, he admits, is felt by the Churches, like all other institutions:—

> The churches are understaffed. There is a prospect of a shortage of ministers as of doctors. The churches at home are often hard put to it to keep things going. Sunday-school work, especially on the boys' side, suffers from lack of workers. Indeed, all the activities of the churches are crippled not only by enlistment, but also by perpetual overtime and the strain of daily business. The problem of finance is an additional embarrassment in many instances.

Equally plain-spoken are his remarks on the usual pulpit-talk concerning the "supreme sacrifice" of the troops:—

> Eagerly, and sometimes perhaps too easily, the sacrifice of the soldier has been associated with the Cross of Christ, usually along the line of the passage, "Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friends." But this does not really carry thought beyond Thermopylæ.

The writer is not on such firm ground in his remarks on Protestant theology:—

> The Protestant used to be content with heaven and hell, but he now finds he needs something like purgatory, and there are some signs of a return to the use of prayers for the dead. The cause of such a change is simple. No one is willing to believe that a man who dies for his country is eternally lost. Yet it is not easy to believe that soldiers pass at once into heaven in virtue of their self-sacrifice. Such a belief seems more Mohammedan than Christian, and there is some doubt whether all soldiers pass from earth in a state of salvation. Consequently, it seems that the conception of that other world needs to be completed by the restoration of the idea of purgatory.

This extraordinary conclusion, together with an insistence on the value of the purely Secularistic work of the Young Men's Christian Association, and kindred organizations, appears to be all of value in his apologetics. The young soldiers of Europe, who have died in millions, are the very flower of our civilization, and to the orthodox mind their fate only suggests the necessity of "the restoration of the idea of purgatory." Not a word of pity for the destruction of brains which might have carried on the intellectual traditions of ages; not a tear for the killing of men who might have enlarged the boundaries of knowledge, or have discovered easements for human pain, and solutions for social danger. These splendid youths were destroyed, apparently, to quicken our senses for the rehabilitation of a church dogma.

O, most impotent conclusion! If this is all a Christian apologist can get from his creed, small wonder that it has failed, and failed utterly. So long as men's theological conceptions remain radically unchanged, so long as no new Humanism flames into being with a passionate sense of brotherhood, and a new scale of human values, so long will men seek peace in vain. Christianity is a great illusion, and the clergy fail invariably to get to grips with vital affairs. In this nightmare of civilization the comforting theory that purgatory should be restored is uttered to eager ears. The War has produced horrors and evil enough, but there is a silver lining to the blackest of clouds if this European outbreak but shows clearly and unmistakably that Christianity is but a superstition, and that the Gospel of Christ is of the things that perish. The failure of Christianity is too complete to be glossed over by the glamour of false sentiment and false heroics. Christians are so immersed in their own dogmas that they cannot see that Brute Force has usurped the seat of Reason. We, whose fathers built up in generations of suffering and toil, this fair fabric of Western civilization, can no longer rely on an outworn superstition. Let the clergy leave the peoples of Europe free to work out their Secular salvation, without the fears and trembling of a foolish faith. Humanity has outgrown the dogmas of Oriental creeds, and civilized man is better than the deities of decadent superstitions.

MIMNERMUS.

Digitized by Google

A Scientific and Sceptical Saint.

THE biography of Lord Avebury, better known as St. Lubbock, the creator of the August Bank Holiday, is distinctly readable and informative. Considering Lubbock's standing in business and in social circles, the reticence of his biographer, Mr. Horace G. Hutchinson, concerning his subject's religious beliefs need awaken no surprise. Extremely reticent himself, Lubbock did, however, on one occasion, when delivering the Huxley Lecture, avow himself "a reverent Agnostic"; a position he shared, he said, with many of his scientific and philosophical friends. As these included Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, and Herbert Spencer, this declaration of his own Agnosticism is worthy of note. No discerning reader of Lubbock's more important scientific works, such as Prehistoric Times, The Origin of Civilization, and other evolutionary writings, not to mention his Marriage, Totemism, and Religion, published as late as 1911, could possibly have entertained the slightest doubt as to what his religious views really were.

After showing that Lubbock was a good fighter on the side of science in its conflict with clericalism, Mr. Hutchinson states, quite truly, that Sir John outwardly conformed to the religious demands of the day, although several of his very intimate friends were determined antagonists of any spiritual explanation of the universe. Nevertheless, the following passage may perhaps be regarded as a sop to Cerberus, as Mr. Hutchinson appears by no means orthodox in his own theological beliefs. When Darwin died, scientific Materialism was supreme; but, we are told,—

> In the midst of that extreme materialism we find Sir John, though many of his best friends were among the extremists, surprisingly moderate in his attitude. He was ever reticent as to his mental outlook on the great mysteries, but I believe he had arrived at the conclusion.....that there was some room, after all, among the atoms for the spirits; that the human intellect did rightly and according to the intention of its Maker in reading as accurately as may be the story which Lyell found in the rocks, and Wallace and Darwin in the whole life history of the globe; but that besides these records there was, as man's special gift, through his evolutionary development, that religious sense or intuition, or whatever term you choose to give it, which was of other stuff than to be subject to the test of human reason. That I believe to have been his attitude, though I do not claim to have heard him explicit in regard to it (vol. i., pp. 186, 187).

Of ancient lineage, the pedigree of his family extending back to the fifteenth century in the county of Norfolk, Sir John Lubbock was the eldest son of Sir John William Lubbock, third baronet, banker, astronomer, author, among other works, of the Theory of Probabilities, and Treasurer to the Royal Society. The son first saw the light in London, where he was born in April, 1834, and the boy's natural bent was shown at the age of eight, when, at the coronation of Queen Victoria, he watched with interest "a large insect under a glass." When the child was only four years' old, his mother, who seems to have been an exceptional woman, noted in her diary: "His great delight is in Insects. Butterflies, Caterpillars, or Beetles, are great treasures, and he is watching a large Spider outside my window most anxiously."

That pioneer of photography, Daguerre, forwarded the first of his newly invented appliances that crossed the Channel to the elder Lubbock, and the boy was present when the first picture recorded by the sun was taken in our Isles.

Like most born sceptics, young Lubbock early displayed a propensity for putting inconvenient questions concerning religion. "We were talking," testifies Lady Lubbock,— > about resisting the Devil, and what that meant, and John said, "Mama, do you think it's right in us to hate the Devil? I don't. I thought we ought to hate no one?" I said, "Very true, my dear; but the Devil is the personification of Sin, and we must hate sin." "True, mama; but the Devil was once an Angel; so I think we ought to wish that he may some day grow good again, instead of hating him."

Sound sense and excellent ethics neatly combined by a small boy!

From a private school at Abingdon Abbey he proceeded to Eton, where he remained until, at the early age of fourteen, his "educational" days ended, and he entered into the busy banking world. Lubbock was thus one of those numerous instances of men destined to obtain world-wide celebrity in the realm of mental achievement who were without that university training which many still imagine to be indispensable to the complete culture of the intellect. In 1849 he joined the banking firm of Lubbock, Forster & Co., as it then was. This step was decided upon owing to the declining health of his father's two partners, in addition to the circumstance that there were several brothers and sisters to be provided for.

When Lubbock was seven years old, as he himself records,—

> My father came home one evening in 1841, quite excited, and said he had a great piece of news for me. He made us guess what it was, and I suggested that he was going to give me a pony. "Oh," he said, "it is much better than that. Mr. Darwin is coming to live at Down."

Quite naturally, the boy's countenance fell, and little could he suspect the potent part that the immortal evolutionist was to play in shaping the current of his maturer thoughts.

Despite the demands of the bank, in which young Lubbock practically occupied the position of a partner, in his seventeenth year he delivered his maiden address. This lecture was given, he narrates,— > at Down on the wireworm, and was well attended by the villagers. Now I began to realize how right my father was in saying that Mr. Darwin's coming to live at Down was an immense advantage to me. He induced my father to give me a microscope, he let me do drawings for some of his books, and I greatly enjoyed my walks and talks with him. My first scientific original work was on some of his collections, and appeared in the Natural History Magazine for January, 1853. In 1849 I was elected a member of the Royal Institution, and in 1853 I attended my first meeting of the British Association. In 1854 I was introduced to Sir C. Lyell and Sir Joseph Hooker, in 1855 to Kingsley, Prestwich, and Sir John Evans, and joined the Geological Society. In 1856 I met George Busk, Huxley, and Tyndall, and the following year was elected a member of the Royal Society. It would be impossible for me to express how much of my real education I owe to the advice, the sympathy, and the example of these kind friends.

What a group of eminent men for a lad to number among his guides, philosophers, and friends.

Residing at High Elms, a beautiful place in Kent, it was necessary to travel daily by road and rail to the City and back; and the facility with which he studied books in crowded trains in later life, becoming, indeed, in such circumstances, unconscious of his fellow-passengers, indicates that he acquired this habit in his youth. He also possessed a wonderful aptitude for moving easily from one theme to another. In mentioning this, Mr. Hutchinson remarks that—> it was always a surprise to me to note how instantly, and without any apparent effort, he could switch off his mind, > as it were, from the discussion of some intricate point of finance—say the involved fortunes of the Peruvian bondholders—and discuss such a problem of biology as parthenogenesis.

Digitized by Google

Having turned twenty or so, Lubbock elaborated a scheme, which he submitted to the London Bankers, for the purpose of economizing time and money. Up to the time of the eighteen-fifties, metropolitan bankers accepted for collection from their customers cheques drawn on provincial banks and sent them by post to the country banks on which they were drawn. These banks then authorized payment, frequently less a commission. Lubbock now suggested that the London Bankers "should hold a 'clearing' and present to one another all the cheques on the Country Banks for which each London Banker was agent, and that Country Banks should send up all such cheques to London to be dealt with in the same way." Many of the City Bankers shook their heads over this novel proposal, but they were wise enough to consider it, and even to adopt it, and it has been in operation ever since.

In 1859 The Origin of Species startled the world, and Lubbock eagerly embraced the new gospel. And, at the famous gathering of the British Association at Oxford in 1860, when Bishop Wilberforce's ignorance and arrogance were so scathingly rebuked by Huxley, the young convert instanced the testimony so strikingly afforded by embryology in favour of evolution.

There is a capital story relating to Mrs. Lowe, the wife of Robert Lowe, of Match Tax renown. Busk and Lowe were staying at High Elms, and,— > on Saturday evening Mrs. Lowe was between young Lubbock and Mr. Busk (President of the College of Surgeons), and the conversation turned on the great book. Mrs. Lowe asked Mr. Busk "just to explain' why one germ should develop into a man and another into a kangaroo. He suggested that she should read the book, and she took it upstairs. Next day she sat in the drawing-room with it, and finished it about 4.30, shutting it up with a clap, and saying; "Well, I don't see much in your Mr. Darwin after all; if I had had his facts I should have come to the same conclusion myself."

Yet people still linger in the world who fail to grasp the simple truth which this sharp lady seized nearly sixty years ago. What a difference it would make if the general public only understood the facts!

In 1860 appeared the once execrated Essays and Reviews, and the uproar this publication occasioned appears extraordinary in the days of the Encyclopædia Biblica. But in the far-off 'sixties the sacerdotal and lay obscurantists who so furiously assailed the volume, and those who contributed to it, made themselves the objects of scorn and amusement to intellectual England.

The writers, among whom were scholars so distinguished as Dr. Jowett and Mark Pattison, had dared to state in the most temperate terms the truth in relation to theology, as revealed by modern science and criticism. Yet they were denounced with unmitigated bitterness, and the palpable earnestness and sincerity of several of the leading orthodox religionists in their stern antagonism to the truth, proved most painfully how utterly unaware they were of the fully demonstrated scientific discoveries of their time. Men of letters and of science were not merely amused and amazed by the display of clerical ignorance, but became alarmed at the sinister spirit of persecution manifested by the men of God. A committee was therefore formed, of which Spottiswoode and Lubbock became secretaries, and an address was despatched to Dr. Temple, whose essay occupied the place of honour in the offending volume, in which the contributors were warmly thanked for their valued services to honesty and truth. This address was signed by many of the leading writers and thinkers of the period, the signatures including those of Darwin and Lyell, Graham the great chemist, Airy the celebrated astronomer and mathematician, and Bentham the eminent botanist.

T. F. PALMER.

(To be continued.)

Another New Hymn.

Dedicated to the "National Mission."

LET the gladsome joy-bells ring,
Let the little children sing,
Christ is here!
Let the Guardians raise their voice,
Let the Government rejoice,
Let all sinners take their choice.
Christ is here!

Let the Army raise a cheer.
Let the Rank and File adhere
To the truth that Christ is here,
Oh, so near!
Let the nations fight it out,
Put the enemy to rout,
Christian soldiers have no doubt,
Christ is here!

See, the Saviour lifts his hand,
And the soldiers take their stand.
Christ their own!
See the heroes of the War,
Wiping blood from many a sore.
Wondering what their guns are for.
At his throne!

Let the buglers sound "retreat,"
While they lie at Jesu's feet,
Peace at last!
See the clergy standing by,
Meet their God with flashing eye,
Never having told a lie,
Safe at last!

Let the gladsome joy-bells ring,
Let the little children sing,
Christ is here!
Let the soldiers raise their voice,
Let civilians, too, rejoice,
Let all sinners take their choice,
Christ is here!

ARTHUR F. THORN.

WHY VOLTAIRE FOUGHT CHRISTIANITY.

Men spoke to Voltaire of the mild beams of Christian charity, and where they pointed he saw only the yellow glare of the stake; they talked of the gentle solace of Christian faith, and he heard only the shrieks of the thousands and tens of thousands whom faithful Christian persecutors had racked, strangled, gibbeted, burnt, broken on the wheel. Through the stream of innocent blood which Christians, for the honour of their belief, had spilt in every quarter of the known world, the blood of Jews, Moors, Indians, and all the vast holocausts of heretical sects, and people in eastern and western Europe, he saw only dismal tracts of intellectual darkness, and heard only the humming of the doctors, as they served forth to congregations of poor men hungering for spiritual sustenance the draff of theological superstition.—Lord Morley.

MISSIONARIES.

The missionaries who teach and insist on clothing amongst races accustomed to nudity by heredity are responsible for three evils; firstly, the appearances of lung diseases amongst them; secondly, the spread of vermin amongst them; and thirdly, the disappearance from amongst them of inherent and natural modesty.—J. Theodore Bent, "Nineteenth Century," November, 1894.

Digitized by Google

Acid Drops.

Dr. Gilbert Murray, in his address as President of the Teachers' Union, said that "a great hindrance to educational reform is the venomous religious difficulty. The Church Times quite agrees with the epithet "venomous," but says the solution is perfectly simple. "Nothing more is needed than the mutual recognition of each other's rights. We all pay the Education Rate, and are all equally entitled to the benefits for which we all alike pay. It has been proved over and over again that Church people will not submit to being deprived of their rights." This is very specious. We agree that so long as religion is included in State Education, something is to be said on behalf of the Church Times' case. But the whole question really turns upon whether religious instruction should remain a part of the school curriculum. And it is quite clear that it cannot so remain without inflicting injustice on some people, and doing injury to the cause of education.

It is not only Christians who pay an Education Rate. Non-Christians of all kinds pay also. And if justice demands that teachers shall instruct children in the religion of their parents, will the Church Times hold that teachers should also be appointed to instruct children in Mohammedanism, and Buddhism, and Judaism, and Positivism, and Atheism? If not, what becomes of their rights? Of course, the Church Times has in mind Christians only, and how they can be satisfied. Or, if the various creeds—Christian and non-Christian—were allowed to be taught, what effect would that have upon the children generally? A State Education teaching all religions must refrain from expressing an opinion in favour of any, and the religious lessons would be reduced to a "you—pay—your—money—and—you—take—your—choice" kind of an affair. There is only one way out. Let the State leave religion alone. No one is then defrauded of any "right." Everybody gets what they pay for, and all they pay for. They pay for education, and that the children receive. Anything a parent wishes above that he must provide himself in his own way, and at his own expense.

Now we may sleep in comfort. Not alone have we the great Lloyd-George at the head of affairs—with Mr. Bottomley and his God supporting, but a correspondent of the British Weekly says that as Mr. Lloyd-George has been "very faithful to the Little Bethel," so he may rest assured that he has behind him the support of the "men of God" of his native land, who are "praying that he may prevail." It is quite evident, therefore, that a triumphant peace is at hand.

The Daily News claims that John Wesley was the inventor of Watch Night services. Surely pious men and maidens met oft in the stilly night before Wesley's time.

Articles of luxury have been prohibited in Russia, says a daily newspaper. This should cause a slump in ikons and sacred images, and cause Biblical language among the dealers.

A new book bears the arresting title, Much Ado About Peter. We wonder if it refers to the loquacious apostle who made a cock crow with his terminological inexactitudes?

In their New Year Letters, the Bishops of Chelmsford and Bristol deal with the War and National Service. Neither of the bishops suggest the conscription of able-bodied clergymen of military age.

Farmers are not the only ones who benefit by the high price of corn. It will also benefit the Church; though whether that will compensate for the increased cost of bread is doubtful. But a tithe rent charge of £70 value before the War is now £83. Whereat the hearts of the parsons rejoice.

"Thank God that the War has come!" says Pastor Phillipps, of Berlin. We do not question the sincerity of the preacher; it is merely a sample of the kind of idiocy that flourishes in the pulpit.

Is it not time, by the way, that our newspapers left off treating expressions of this kind, when made by Germans, from the Kaiser downwards, as proofs of hypocrisy? They are nothing of the kind. If the history of man proves anything at all, it proves that intense and sincere religious conviction is perfectly consonant with the most stupid and the most villainous of sentiments. It will be remembered that the notorious Charles Peace hurried away from a prayer-meeting to commit a burglary; and if there is one thing certain about the Kaiser, for instance, it is the sincerity of his religious convictions. And before the War there was not a Christian in England who doubted it.

The Weekly Dispatch is responsible for a story that a child-dancer was refused admission to appear at a Christmas entertainment at the Y.M.C.A., Tottenham Court Road, on account of the scantiness of her clothing. We should like to know the precise association between Christianity and calisthenics.

From the Globe of January 3:—

> We have no wish to be hypercritical, but it is the plain fact that the Anglican clergy know less about their work on its intellectual side than the members of any other learned profession, and that the majority of them are entirely oblivious of what has been accomplished in other spheres of thought. We say it with deep regret, but no thoughtful man who forces himself to listen to the average sermon will deny it—least of all the best among the clergy themselves. The people are no longer ignorant, and if the Church is to regain her influence over the masses, her clergy must be educated to deal honestly and competently with the tremendous problems presented by the Higher Criticism and by Science in general. That is not the case at present.

It is only what we have said over and over again, but we are pleased to have it repeated elsewhere.

According to the Bishop of Lichfield, Christianity is the religion of progress. We do not wish to retort, "Look at the War," although that retort is obvious, and quite justifiable. But when and where is it that Christianity has made progress? It inherited Greek and Roman culture. What became of that culture under Christian control? Surely the rule of the monk was a sorry exchange for the intellectual dominance of the Greek and Latin thinkers, and the rule of the Church a poor substitute for that of the Roman State. Look at the Dark and Middle Ages that were Christian, or nothing. Compare the modern Greek with the ancient Greek, the modern Roman with the ancient Roman! Look at Abyssinia, one of the oldest of Christian countries! Look at Christianity in the East! What kind of progress was that which had witch hunts, Jew baitings, miracle cures, and heretic burnings? Where nations have advanced it is not because of Christianity, but because of other forces which Christianity has been unable to crush or control.

One day it will be recognized that, even religiously, Christianity spelt retrogression. Superstitions were current in Greece and Rome as crude as anything that flourished in the Dark Ages. But there was a steady development in a higher direction. With the conquest of Christianity the higher lost its power, the lower gained strength. The triumph of Christianity involved a revival of demonism, of miracle working, of supernaturalism generally. Compare the Middle Ages—even religiously—with Greece and Rome at their best, and we do not hesitate to say that one moves on an altogether lower plane. Christian leaders of the Middle Ages would have felt quite at home with the most ignorant of the Pagan believers. The educated Pagans would have been horrified could they have returned and seen the gross superstitions of leaders of mediæval Christian thought.

There is a chance for a new miracle at the famous St. Winifred's Well, Holywell. The spring has been running—longer than Charlie's Aunt—for centuries in fact, but it has now ceased to flow, and unless the monks discover some substitute miracle there will be a grievous falling off in revenue. Like Lourdes, thousands of people have professed a cure as a result of using the miraculous water, and, provided faith was strong enough, we quite believe many have really benefited. Anything else would have done quite as well.

Digitized by Google

"A Week of Prayer" was held at the Queen's Hall and King George's Hall, London, and the meetings were advertised as being "in touch with Christians of all communions throughout the civilized world." Apart from the comment that the prayerful folk might as well try to tempt an earthquake with a penny bun, we wonder what the Abyssinian Christians think about it.

Sir Oliver Lodge's spiritualistic book, Raymond, has attracted considerable notice in the press. Mr. Clement Shorter, writing in the Sphere, says that "most spiritually minded people in the Christian world have thought otherwise" than Sir Oliver, and he characterizes Raymond's post-mortem messages as "feeble and futile."

An evening paper announces that the clergy are to assist the mass levy. This probably means that the parsons will see the boys off at the railway stations—and afterwards console the girls left behind.

Providence watches the sparrows fall, but did not prevent the deaths of forty-one persons who lost their lives in fires in London during December. The majority of the victims were women.

A Catholic critic in the Dublin Review has been attacking the veracity of Gibbon, the historian of The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. The critic might have remembered the striking tribute of Cardinal Newman, "It is melancholy to say it, but the chief, perhaps the only, English writer who has any claim to be considered an ecclesiastical historian, is the unbeliever, Gibbon."

We pointed out some weeks ago that the clergy made a fatal blunder when they played so energetically the part of recruiting sergeants. It disgusted many of their followers, and made a much larger number feel uneasy. It was not that either of these classes were out of sympathy with the War; they were not; but they felt that it was not quite the business of the clergy, with their talk of love and brotherhood, etc., and their claim to rank as ethical teachers, to encourage war even when the War was defensible. It might be the business of the soldier, the politician, or the layman; the clergyman's business was of a quite different character. The net result is that the clergy have lost caste heavily. Their influence to-day is weaker than it was when the War opened. We think it will be weaker before the War ends.

We find this view of the matter endorsed by Mr. James Douglas in an article in the Star, the other evening. He says, in reply to an attack made upon him by the Vicar of St. Luke's, Camberwell:—

> I do not claim the right to interpret either the Old Testament or the New. My attitude towards the soldier-parson is instinctive. I think he ought to stick to his parsonship. As to the Christian layman, the problem is different. I decline to dogmatise about it. But I feel that the less we mix up religion with war the better. The Kaiser is an awful warning. He also holds just war to be a Christian duty. His theologians back him up. There's the rub. There are Christians on both sides. Each set claims that its cause is just. If, as we believe, our cause is just, what about the Christians in Germany who hold that their cause is just? If the good Vicar of St. Luke's were the Vicar of Potsdam, he might hold that it is a Christian duty to murder Belgians.

That is a neat satire on the Christian conscience. It is determined by the country in which the Christian happens to dwell. For ourselves, we haven't much doubt that, if many of our bellicose parsons were in Germany, they would be just as bellicose—on the other side.

How these Christians love one another! The Catholic Tablet points out that "Mr. Lloyd George, who is a devout Baptist, will now have the appointment of the Bishops of the Establishment in his hands." Just so! And his predecessor, Mr. Asquith, is an unattached Nonconformist, and an earlier Premier was Lord Beaconsfield, whose "Christianity" was more remarkable than his successors' Nonconformity.

A musical comedy star appearing in "High Jinks" has presented a war-shrine to her native town. There will be "high jinks" in the church as well as the theatre.

The Bishops of Lichfield and Stafford state that a vast number of Church people do not even attempt to understand the aspirations of labour, and that the Church has not taken an active part in fighting social ills. A striking commentary on this statement is contained in the newspaper paragraph stating that at Exhall, Warwickshire, an eighteen year old youth is discharging the duties of parish clerk and verger. He is a printer, also a bell-ringer and organ-blower at the parish church. This gifted youth ought to enjoy the salary of a bishop.

"Does the Providence of God make it certain that the right must always win?" This is the question put by the editor of the British Weekly, and the proper reply would be, If it doesn't, what's the good of it? Sir Robertson Nicol answers the question in another way. He says, "Yes, if we hold fast to the truth of another life." We may be defeated here, but we shall conquer somewhere else. But if the right is defeated here, what is the use of the "Providence of God"? So far as we can see, so far as we know, it simply doesn't act. And unless "Providence" acts every time, no one can be certain that it acts at any time.

Putting it off to the next world won't do. In the first place, we have no proof that there is a next world. And even if there were, we have no reasonable grounds for assuming that things will be any better there than here. A "Providence" that allows itself to be defeated here may get defeated elsewhere also. And at most it is only giving "Providence" another chance to retrieve its character. It is a case of the First Offenders' Act applied to Deity. And what kind of gratification is it to learn that right will triumph? How many Belgians who have seen their homes destroyed, or their relatives killed, will feel it enough to learn that all will be put right in the next world? How can it be put right in the next world? It won't do, Men found God in this world; the parsons declare it is his world; and he must be judged by the course of affairs in this world alone.

There is nothing very unusual in the case of Thomas Coleman, of Chester, who was charged with breaking into a shop and stealing groceries. Nor is the fact that for a "long period," while "posing" as a religious man and acting as a local preacher, Coleman had been robbing the same stores. But why does the newspaper say he was "posing" as a religious man? Being religious is not incompatible with stealing. Being moral is; but there have been religious thieves in plenty at all times. Mental derangement was suggested as a defence, but without avail. Really, that might have been associated with greater reason with his zeal as a preacher. Those two things have often gone together; but between stealing and insanity there is no very close connection.

A paragraph in the press, probably inspired, states that during the twenty-eight months of the War, the British and Foreign Bible Society has sent out 5,000,000 Bibles and Testaments to the troops, and suggests that the sacred volume may be the favourite literature of the soldiers. As this modest figure is exclusive of all Bibles sent out by rival organizations, we wonder the troops find any time to read the millions of magazines, books, and periodicals.

Some time ago, a silk undervest, worn by Charles the First on the scaffold, was sold for two hundred guineas. This was a genuine relic. Priests must have laughed at such a small return. At Treves they have made many thousands of pounds out of a curious coat of a man who never lived.

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

January 14, Nottingham; January 28, Swansea; February 4, Abertillery; February 11, Liverpool; February 25, Clapham; March 11 Birmingham; March 18, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—January 14, Leicester; February 11, Walsall.

S. L.—Charles Bradlaugh never called himself anything but an Atheist, and would have repudiated any other title. Naturally, many timid persons thought it indiscreet, but a real leader's first concern is to get his own position correctly described. That was all Bradlaugh cared about.

W. T. HOLMES.—It would be necessary to get the author's or publisher's permission before reprinting. Thanks for sending.

J. BEATON (Alexandria).—We shall have much pleasure in sending you a free parcel of Freethinkers, etc., for distribution, and hope it will do good.

E. CLARK.—We are quite willing to accept your word that the meeting was not broken up by a hostile crowd. Our comment was based upon a newspaper paragraph. Probably the paper had some purpose to serve in misrepresenting.

T. SINCLAIR.—We have no intention of reprinting as a leaflet our "Views and Opinions" of last week's issue, but we have no objection to anyone else doing so who may feel inclined.

W. MATHER.—Pleased to have so cheerful a letter concerning both yourself and your friend. Our best wishes for the New Year to you both.

W. DODD.—We are obliged for your further subscription to the Sustentation Fund. We knew we had your good wishes and hearty support.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges J. Pendlebury, £2 10s.

E. MORRISON.—Quite willing to take the will for the deed. Thanks.

D. CORNOCK.—No apology is necessary. We recognize that people have all sorts of calls upon them. So long as each does his, or her, best, that is all we ask or expect.

H. MARVIN.—In the course of a month, we hope. As you will see from the advertisement, War and Civilization, or Religion and the Child, will be sent at 6s. per 100.

S. SCOTT.—We are not at all surprised at the nature of your confession, and are pleased at its happy ending. We note your suggestion re "Acid Drops," with which we quite agree.

W. WILMER.—The support of one who was a subscriber to the first issue of the Freethinker is very gratifying. Shall be glad to have your aid in any way. Posters are being sent.

R. WILSON.—Membership subscription to N. S. S. has been handed to N. S. S. Secretary. We agree with you that "after the War is over our strides will be rapid." That is why we are so anxious to get the Movement into as good a fighting trim as is possible.

T. S. NEWALL writes:—"Good luck to you in your plucky swim against the tide; and congratulations on your maintenance of the editorial high-level of the fearless and peerless little journal."

F. W. LLOYD.—Mr. Mann's articles may be reprinted. The chief difficulty in the way at present is the excessive price of paper.

L. MARSHALL.—We are much obliged for your efforts in securing new subscribers.

T. E. STAFFORD.—Mr. Cohen is writing you.

F. R. GLOVER.—We hope that Mr. Cohen's visit to Nottingham will have the effect of stirring up interest in Freethought.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Our Sustentation Fund.

THE object of this Fund is to make good the loss on the Freethinker—entirely due to increased cost of materials, etc.—from October, 1915, to October, 1916, and to provide against the inevitable further losses during the continuation of the War. This Fund will close on Jan. 14.

LIST OF SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Previously acknowledged, £236 14s. 9d.—A. Johnson, £1 V. M. Phelips, 10s. 6d.; H. J. Slack, 4s.; D. Cornock, 2s.; J. Murphy, 2s. 6d.; E. Morrison, 5s.; W. Dodd, 10s. 6d.; W. Mather, £1; J. W. Arnott, 10s. 6d.; R. Allen (N.Z.), £1; Debtor, 5s.; S. Scott, 10s.; J. J. B., 3s.; F. W. S. (Portsmouth), 10s.; S. Wilcomer, 2s. 6d.; Ormyc, 10s.; A. H. Smith, £1; T. J. W. (Pontypridd), 2s. 6d.; R. Wilson, £1; F. S. Newall, 4s.; P. M. McDermott, £2 2s.; E. Poynton, 4s.; Marshall and Friend (Tottenham), 5s. Per Miss Vance; W. Wilmer, 10s.; W. Newman, 2s.; Mrs. Helena Parsons, £1 1s.; Mr. Hinley, 2s.; Richard Moore, 2s. 6d.; W. Barton, 1s.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (January 14) Mr. Cohen visits Nottingham. The afternoon lecture will be given on "Determinism" before the Cosmopolitan Debating Society, and it is expected that a good discussion will follow the address. The evening meeting is independently arranged by Mr. Cohen, and his subject will be "Christianity and the Logic of Life." This ought also to lead to a good discussion. Whether it will or not remains to be seen. Both meetings will be held in the hall of the Mechanic's Institute.

At the close of the evening meeting Mr. Cohen will be pleased to meet local Freethinkers who are interested in future propaganda in Nottingham. It is many years since Freethought lectures were delivered there, and it is high time the town received attention.

There is something about the following expression of opinion which induces us to suppress our blushes and publish it. In sending subscription to Sustentation Fund Mr. S. Scott writes:—

> And now shall I make you a confession? When Mr. Foote died I had fears—grave fears—for the future of my favourite paper. Mr. Foote's genius, ability, and loyalty to "the best of causes" had been for so many years tried and proved, and the paper had been so powerful and successful under his guidance, that I dreaded once his personality was removed the Freethinker might deteriorate, and eventually perish. But I am more delighted than I can tell you to find that all my fears were vain, and that our dear old "guide, companion, and friend" is as good as ever, if not better. I congratulate you, Sir, on its improved appearance, and on the sustained brilliancy of its articles—articles equal to any that have ever appeared in it—and that is saying a great deal. If it is any satisfaction to you, be assured that one constant reader and admirer, at any rate, thoroughly approves of and is thankful for the new editorship of the Freethinker.

We feel that our readers will pardon the publication of the above, in the circumstances. No one can appreciate more than ourselves the difficulty of stepping into the editorial shoes of a writer like G. W. Foote. And for the Freethinker to have maintained its position and its hold on the affections of its readers is a reward for the anxiety and worry of the past year and a half.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures to-day (Jan. 14) at the Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate, Leicester. We have no doubt there will be the usual good audience—the usual good lecture is certain.

The death of Dr. E. B. Tylor, on January 2, has removed a great figure from the world of anthropology and comparative mythology. Born in 1832, the son of a brassfounder, he retired from his father's business because he was threatened with consumption. A visit to Mexico created an interest in anthropology, of which science he may truly be said to be one of the great lawgivers—if not the lawgiver. Certainly his principal work, Primitive Culture, published in 1871, reduced chaos to order, and anthropologists have been compelled to very largely work along the lines laid down therein. In 1907 a sense of the debt due to his labours was marked by a collection of essays that were dedicated and presented to him And whatever the corrections or modifications made necessary by the labours of later workers, it may be safely said that no more stimulative work has ever been published on the subject with which it deals.

Digitized by Google

While stopping short of a direct and detailed application of his theories to current religious beliefs, Dr. Tylor left every intelligent reader in no doubt as to his belief that he regarded these as the direct descendants of primitive savage beliefs, and resting on no other or better foundations. In saying "Animism is, in fact, the groundwork of the philosophy of religion, from that of savages up to that of civilized men," he reduced all religious beliefs to their proper level. And to his credit, be it noted, there was with him little or none of that coquetting with the word religion—which is usually an indication of a timid nature or confused thought. So, again, in the expression, "The animism of savages stands by itself; it explains its own origin," we have an illuminating expression for those who grasp its full significance. And at the close of the first volume of his greatest work, we have the following:—

> It is evident that, notwithstanding all this profound change, the conception of the human soul is, as to its most essential nature, continuous from the philosophy of the savage thinker to that of the modern professor of theology. The definition has remained from the first that of an animating, separable, surviving entity, the vehicle of individual personal existence. The theory of the soul is one principal part of a system of religious philosophy, which unites, in an unbroken line of mental connexion, the savage fetish worshipper and the civilized Christian.

No one could have said much more plainly that the true parent of the Christian theology is the primitive savage. When that is realized, all the stupid chatter about "essential Christianity," "a purified religion," etc., will cease to be heard because it will appeal to none worth appealing to.

There is one point in connection with Dr. Tylor on which we have long waited for information. In 1888 he delivered the Gifford Lectures in Aberdeen. His subject was "Natural Religion," and the publication of these lectures was expected. But they never appeared, and one would like to know why. Was the fault Dr. Tylor's or that of the Gifford Trustees? It is a point on which we should appreciate enlightenment.

The following experience of a young soldier, just arrived at military age, and handed to us by the young man's father, will be of interest to our readers:—

> I am glad you sent me down the Freethinker. The last one I gave to a man who went out in the first draft. He was a fine man. I think he was past forty. He was like a father to us all, and would help us in any way, and he was always sorry for us young chaps—not like the usual run who are always shouting "single men first." He never thought of himself; it was the hardest job out to treat him, and yet if he knew you wanted anything, he would be the first to help you. One night we had an argument on religion, and he told us then that he was an Atheist. When we saw the draft off I gave him the Freethinker, and it would have done your eyesight good to see how he thanked me for it. We all liked him, and he is missed by everyone.

The boyish frankness of the letter is delightful. We hope he will return from the War with the same boyish nature unspoiled.

Fear not the tyrants shall live for ever,
Or the priests of the bloody faith;
They stand on the brink of that mighty river,
Whose waves they have tainted with death:
It is fed from the depths of a thousand dells,
Around them it foams, and rages, and swells,
And their swords and their sceptres I floating see,
Like wrecks, in the surge of eternity. —Shelley.

"Free Will."

THE average person unskilled in debate, and intent on earning his daily bread, is frequently apathetic towards hundreds of questions which excite keen controversy among thinkers. For thinkers are not always inclined to accept trite commonplaces as truth without further inquiry. Such a trite commonplace is the doctrine of Free Will. The former, therefore, receives something of a shock when the other denies pointblank that Free Will exists at all. He is prone to become furiously indignant when it is pointed out that this doctrine can no longer find lodgment in rationalistic minds; that, indeed, it has been a homeless wanderer for many years, in so far as the latter type is concerned. Doubtless the doctrine has served a useful purpose. Almost any evil can serve thus under certain circumstances. The spilled ink which obliterates the falsified entries of the dishonest bank clerk is an evil serving a useful end—to the evildoer. In a precisely similar fashion, the Free Will doctrine has cemented theological fatuities in behalf of the vested interests which theology as a whole subserves. But if the will were free, it would be the only phenomenon in the cosmos, standing alone, and unconditioned. It would thus come under the category of an absolute. Even were it true, it would remain unknown and unknowable, for any means by which it reached man's consciousness would to that extent condition it. Its absolutism would instantly cease. It seems clear that the mere assertion, "I know the will is free," negatives its own predicate.

Let us now examine the position in more detail.

What does Free Will mean? We often hear some such remark as this, "A has murdered X. He is condemned to death, and he deserves his fate. Having a Free Will, he could have refused to kill him." Thus, here Free Will could have led—by implication—to what jurists call an "act of commission." Again, "B sees W running towards the edge of a cliff. B could stop him, but does not do so. Having 'Free Will,' he could have saved a life. He is guilty of W's death by an act of omission." "Believers," in their strictures against "sin," almost always argue that Free Will can lead to right action, either by commission or omission. The point we would emphasize is, that action, or some phase of physical activity, is implied in their use of the term "Free Will." From these examples we can deduce the definition as Religionists view it. For them "Free Will" is the faculty in man whereby he can either act or remain passive, undetermined by any factor save that same "will." Let us classify this as the theological definition. We may do this the more reasonably since the argument expressed, or implied, is that God gave man a Free Will, or the faculty so described, to avoid the alternative of man's being something akin to an automatic machine.

There is another aspect of Free Will. An Agnostic—supposedly—hears a discourse on the "truths" taught by the Holy Roman and Apostolic Church, from the lips of a Roman Catholic. He remains an Agnostic. The Roman Catholic may, and frequently does, argue "this man has heard the truth; he is obdurate, and hence sinful. He has a Free Will, and could for that reason accept what an infallible Church teaches. He wilfully prefers darkness and infidelity to light and belief." This view leads to another definition, i.e., "Free Will is the faculty by which a man can accept and believe as true that which he knows to be false." We might label this the fanatic definition.

Again, a man hears shots in a neighbouring street. It is said that possessing a Free Will, he can either go to the spot and ascertain the cause, or he can remain where he is.

Digitized by Google

Before dealing with each case in turn, we must dispose of one pitfall, due to theological-minded tricksters. It is this: "The will is, of course, partly determined by physical circumstances, it is all the same Free Will." This is proceeding too fast. "Partly determined" is not reconcilable with freedom. Free Will means exactly what it says. Free admits of no degree. "The eagle is freer than the caged linnet," is quite allowable in ordinary conversation, but in critical dialectics "free" ceases to be susceptible of graduated degree. In this latter, neither eagle nor linnet is free. A simpler example is the adjective "dead." If one asserts "My cat died yesterday, and his last month, hence his is deader than mine," the absurdity is plainly visible to anyone. "Dead," "free," "crystallized," "bisected," and many other qualifying terms, are inherently devoid of comparative or superlative degree.

Now for the case where A killed X. Before doing it, he made up his mind to do it. This is true even in the so-called "impulsive act," which Statute Law recognizes as a mitigation of the offence. But criticism takes the matter in hand, and deems the impulsive act equally as "willed," or as the result of making up his mind to do it. In the latter case the process of decision was exceedingly rapid. Thus, before killing X, A desired to do it. He willed it. If he did not desire to kill him, but yet did it, then he was impelled by a power innocent of desire. He was in the position of a ton of coal falling on a child, due to a breaking chain. There was no will in it. It was a circumstantial impulsion. Such a man is insane, hence has no conscious will, and that which is not cannot have any qualification attached to it. No, will cannot be said to be free or coerced. As well say, "Was no horse white or roan?"

An insane man, at any rate, cannot have Free Will. If he was sane, he willed or desired to kill X. He had a motive. A motiveless act in a sane man is unthinkable. What was the motive? Revenge, greed, anger, lust, hate.

Could he have willed not to feel revengeful? No. The victim had wronged him twenty times. It was a natural emotion. Could he have willed not to feel greedy, angry, lustful, hating? No. He might be starving and the victim rich; he had been insulted grossly; or he had been robbed of the woman he loved, and the victim had won her by poisoned tales told falsely against the lover. Every emotion was natural and inevitable, given the circumstances. We see that his mental attitude towards his enemy was the direct result of his enemy's actions towards him. His act of will was the lineal, and as it were, instant, descendant in his consciousness of sensations produced by the enemy acts towards him. A man has no control whatever over a sensation. He is insulted; anger wells up inevitably. He cannot will to be devoid of anger; as well expect one to be devoid of pain when a hot metal presses against his flesh. Anger is the reciprocal emotion to insult, as pain is the reciprocal sensation to the touch of hot iron. The will cannot refuse to allow this sequence of phenomena. If it cannot, it is not free; it is determined, hedged in, or controlled.

Having appreciated the lack of control over the emotion by the will at the moment preceding the possible act of murder, let us advance the argument a step further. Impelled by a mental attitude, by a willing not free, but most undoubtedly held in the grip of determining factors, he now kills or he does not. He is now about to be faced with the problem of choosing between them. One set of factors comprises tendency to savagery, love of conquest, desire to balance wrongs received, by retaliation, as against restraint from former teaching, self-conquest in loyal adherence to a moral code, desires towards right doing, pathetic reference introspectively to noble precepts inculcated by some early friend—a mother, perchance—and perhaps fear of consequences or a passionate disregard of them. If the balance lies with the former, he slays his man; if the latter, he refrains. But is it not plain that in either case the act—or its omission—is determined, is controlled, is driven, is dominated?

Thus the will, whether regarded as conforming to the "theological" or "fanatic" definition is not free. The mental make-up determines it. This mental equipment is the result, and indeed total, of education, surroundings, former associates, previous sensations, habits of thought and cogitation, inherited tendencies, transmitted taints or blemishes, a host of factors ontogenetic and phylogenetic, possible to grasp only under the comprehensive terms, "heredity" and "environment." These two, and these only, determine the will; hence the will is not free, i.e., there is no Free Will.

Perchance the protagonists of Free Will are dissatisfied with the definitions of will which we ascribe to them as theirs. Is will simply a mental attitude, or is it of necessity this attitude plus its translation, or shall we say fruition, into activity? We care not which they claim; we shall prove still further it is not free. Consider these examples. A woman in a factory has her hair, by accident, caught in some machinery. She is in imminent danger of being scalped. Does any man doubt that she wills to be released? that a passionate and overwhelming desire to extricate herself floods the totality of her consciousness? Is this overmastering desire will, or is it not? If it is, who dare assert that it is free? Can she help willing her release? Is it not the inevitable outcome of pain, danger, fear, love of life, self-preservative instinct? Here, then, if will is the mental attitude, it is not free.

But, on the other definition, will must be followed by the act desired or willed. Since she cannot, and does not extricate herself, but is maimed or killed, will is again controlled, and hence not free.

In the last case, will is controlled by the exigencies of physical happenings.

JERL. NIRRA.

(To be concluded.)

"Christian Evidence."

He who will not reason is a bigot,
He who cannot is a fool,
And he who dares not is a slave.

IT is a fact that Freethinkers study the Bible more thoroughly than Christians; consequently, a Freethinker is often privileged to correct Biblical quotations and to give Scripture-knowledge lessons to an opponent.

A case in point occurred when the Cambridge University Press declared the Bible "correct." Their attention was respectfully directed to Acts xvii., verse 18: "And some said, What would this babbler say? other some, He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange gods."

The phrase "other some" is wrong, nonsensical; and the publishers, together with others responsible for the production of the Revised Version, were told so. And here is their reply: "Compare your own Bible with some other or others of a different size, and if the reading is the same in them all, you may depend upon it that it is correct."

Correct, indeed! Why, the Revised Version, "the pure Word of God in the purest English," contains hundreds of errors against truth and morals; and an office-boy knows grammar better than the whole company of over a hundred "learned divines," who resorted to voting in order to determine right from wrong. Consequently, "37,000" renderings were decided differently, but all of them printed as "correct." Those figures are given by one of the revising company, the Rev. Professor Moulton, D.D., sometime Master of the Leys School, Cambridge, and he ought to be "correct."

Digitized by Google

With such information, we understand now why there is so little of that precious faculty of the mind, common sense.

It is because "this well of pure English," with its thirty-seven thousand muddling renderings and hundreds of other pernicious teachings, contaminates both parent and child. But the sign of the Cross is always the sign of an ignoramus.

Fraud, cowardice, vice, and ignorance are grave charges. These are deliberately levelled at "the right reverends" and their puny progeny. The Right Rev. Samuel Thornton, D.D., Assistant Bishop of Manchester, deliberately stated that men of letters have "access to the original"; as if its existence were a verity. Why, of the sixty-six books constituting the Bible, there is not one "original." The earliest MS. of the Old Testament of which the age is certainly known, is dated A.D. 916, and no "copies" agree.

In the Authorised Version we read that a man was born two years before his father (2 Chron. xxi. 20 and xii. 2), but the revisers had not the courage to expunge this monstrosity. The clergy also condone their predecessors' disgusting teaching (1 Cor. vii. 36), which actually advocates incest; adding, it is not a sin to practise a most degrading obscenity. This revolting and "inspired" vice is placed indiscriminately in the hands of youths and maidens by clergymen whom the nation tolerate and the State encourage with payments!

With regard to ignorance, university prelates have yet to learn that pronouns in the English language refer to nouns nearest to them of the same number and person; this is very elementary grammar, but they do not know it.

In John i. 6 we read: "There came a man, sent from God, whose name was John." That sentence gives God a new name—JOHN GOD! Again, "Jesus answered..... he that delivered me hath greater sin" (John xix. 10-11). Now, remembering that Jesus was delivered up by God (Acts ii. 23), Jesus therefore not only declares that act as a sin, but deliberately charges God as the great sinner. Also, according to Acts xii. 21-23, God was eaten by worms: "He gave not God the glory, and he [i.e., God] was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghost." "What blasphemy!" exclaims the man who puts his collar on backwards. Maybe, Christian, but these are evidences from your own "blessed" book, which also states that God has a big brother! Such is the rendering of 1 John iv. 21, and it necessarily follows as a duty binding all Christians who loveth God to love God's brother also.

The Bible expressly states these ideas with utmost clearness. They could not possibly be rendered in plainer language, as the "learned" revisers declare in the preface: "As to pronouns and the place they occupy in the sentence, we have been particularly careful."

Consider one proof in 1 Tim. iii. 2, and in conjunction with it 1 Tim. iii. 12. In verse 2 of the Revised Version a definite article, "the," is inserted before the word "husband." The bishops thereby are prevented from having a licence for whoredom. But in the twelfth verse no such alteration has been made; therefore, permission for unlawful sexual intercourse is given to the deacons.

Upon this statement relative to bishops, the Rev. A. Edgar, D.D., remarks:—

> Such a rendering (i.e., with an "a" instead of "the") would present unutterable horror to the episcopal mind: for, while forbidding the bishop to indulge in polygamy, it would give Scripture sanction for his wife's luxuriating in barbaric dignity of polyandrism. Therefore, for the bishops' sake, the "Revisers" did not revise the passage, but continue to make the rules of grammar succumb to the dictates of sober theology.

But why attempt to preserve the bishops and wholly neglect a poor deacon? This is clearly a case of bless the bishops and damn the deacons. And the evidence is quite lucid. The Bible states that the "one wife" is to be the common property of "deacons" who are to be her "husbands" and she their prostitute. And this is what the Right Rev. Samuel Thornton, D.D., Assistant Bishop, calls "light in all its purity and clearness"!

Poor old Job is made to swallow his riches and vomit them up again (Job xx. 15). In explanation, before anything can be vomited up again—but, verily, verily, it is too sickly; so we leave the full explanation to the "revisers." Moreover, this is a gratuitously foul simile, because a Freethinker—Mr. E. J. Dillon, Professor of Oriental Languages—is privileged to convey a cleaner and more sensible meaning in his Poem of Job than that repulsive translation of the "learned revisers," who know little Hebrew and less English.

Similar offensive expressions—e.g., filthiness of a woman's latter end (Lam. i. 9)—are gratuitous insults to both sexes. "Light in all its purity," indeed!

A specimen of "particular carefulness" is offered in Mark vi. 16—"him that was possessed with devils, and concerning the swine. And they began to beseech him." What extraordinary swine! and the more so since they had previously been drowned (Mark v. 13).

Truly the "learned" divines have well said: "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools" (Rom. x. 22).

W. A. V.

A Hasty Judgment.

IT has always seemed to me that the punishment meted out to Ananias and his good lady was a trifle severe. His case stands out as a tremendous warning against landed proprietors who may intend to make a little out of a sound business transaction. Of course, neither of them should have fabricated that little fib about the price of their freehold. Still, they might have argued that, even if their statements did not quite accord with the whole truth, yet their slip was "only a little one." They might have alleged that even amongst the apostles themselves were to be found small attempts at "terminological inexactitudes." They might have mentioned Peter, who, at a very critical moment, deliberately said the thing that was not. Or, if they cared to ransack Bible history, they could have found many instances of religious prevarication without being attended with fatal results. Why, then, was this worthy couple brought to an untimely end in their prime, just when the new commonwealth was about to be successfully established?

Firstly, I think their "story" must have lacked artistic quality. Though they had evidently rehearsed the part they each had to play, yet in the telling of it there must have been absent that polished verisimilitude which is so necessary to the stamina of a healthy religious lie. One must admit—we all admit—that if lying is imperative, it ought to be done, especially if it be for the glory of God, with some concern for artistic effect. No mere tyro should be allowed to bungle this business; it should be left to the adept at romancing; one who is glib at tongue-twisters, one who can easily persuade you that black is white and that scarlet is no colour at all. It requires a proficient mathematician, who not only knows how many beans make five, but who can add two and two together and secure the wished-for result. If we had the documents at hand, I think it would be found that the pair had blundered, and blundered badly, as they very soon found to their cost. They received a lesson which lasted the rest of their lives.

Digitized by Google

Secondly, the tragic affair of the property-vendors was an example of the swiftness of Nemesis. As our rector says, he was judged on the spot. We must all agree to that. Though we have certain differences of opinion—the rector and I—yet we agree to his verdict in this case. It makes one happy to find oneself in harmony with our rector. How many Freethought lecturers have been struck down dead! but it was generally after the lapse of five minutes. Though they tempted Providence too rashly, yet they chose the time for their exit, and they probably could have escaped had they so wished. But here our landed speculator and his wife had no choice. Like Hamlet's father, they were—

> Cut off even in the blossom of their sin,
> Unhousel'd, disappointed, unanel'd.

The retribution was swift and inexorable. There was no dalliance on the part of Omnipotence.

Thirdly (as this is a sermon I might as well keep to the beaten path), one may discover a wonderful instance of how the bad name of a dog sticks to him after he has been christened. Down the ages the name of Ananias has been synonymous with a disregard for truth. You may call a man by a shorter name, but if you call him "Ananias" he will understand you perfectly. The lady does not figure quite so prominently, yet if her name was used in a family squabble, most people would perceive the significance. Perhaps "Jezebel" has outshone her humbler sister in the Billingsgate firmament, but that may be because the former was a kind of encyclopædia for the termagant. The epithet "Jezebel," hurled at a neighbour with sufficient vigour, is almost certain to bring about strained relations. It is one of the most bellicose terms in our language.

Please do not misunderstand my motive in attempting to state a case for Ananias. It may have been that he committed "a grievous fault." But, surely, "grievously" he had to answer it. It was a case of "Jeddart" justice, where they hanged a man first and judged him afterwards. He may have been "on the make" in his deal with that little plot; but the punishment did not fit the crime. And, again, what would our politicians do without Judas and Ananias? They come in very handy at times for these gentlemen.

ALAN TYNDALL.

Correspondence.

COLONIZATION AND THE BIRTH-RATE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Permit me to thank Dr. Dunlop, M.B., for his letter in the Freethinker (Jan. 7), in reply to my article on "Biology, Economics, and War."

I am sorry he has drawn the implication that I think the birth-rate factor can now be entirely neglected. Widespread intelligent birth-rate control is needed now, and will continue to be needed if man is ever to become master of his "fate" in the fullest possible way. But I hope Dr. Dunlop realizes that the necessity for birth-rate control is conditioned by the methods of food production and food distribution that prevail from time to time. Consequently, control of the birth-rate can only become fully effective when it takes place along with national control of other important factors in social evolution, such as the means of food production and distribution, etc. Might I suggest that birth-rate control need not imply keeping the population of a country stationary? The birth-rate only needs to be kept within the limits of man's capacity for socially producing and socially distributing food and other essentials of life, with a reasonable degree of comfort for all.

Dr. Dunlop's difficulty with regard to international colonization could, I think, be overcome. (1) Each nation concerned would only have to supply a proportion of the adult emigrants that would have to be supplied by a nation doing the work on its own account. (2) If nations exploited the earth for the benefit of all, a large number of able-bodied men, who in past years have lived in unproductive idleness, would be brought into the field of labour. Hence, each nation could afford to draft off some of the adults for the purpose of colonization.

The necessity of birth-rate control might have been mentioned in my article, but I was limited with regard to space.

E. EGERTON STAFFORD.

Death of William Platt Ball.

IT is with the very deepest regret that we learn of the death of William Platt Ball, whose name will be familiar to all the older Freethinkers and to a large number of younger ones. Born in 1844, Mr. Ball gave up his earlier profession of school-teaching from a disinclination to teach religion. He became associated with the Freethought Movement during the days of the Bradlaugh struggle in the early 'eighties, and, after Mr. Foote's imprisonment, joined the staff of the Freethinker. It is pleasant to have to say that he always regarded the five years' work in connection with this paper as amongst the happiest years of his life, and only ill-health compelled him to give it up. But his interest in the paper and in the Freethought Cause continued undiminished. For some time he contributed occasional articles, but later only a weekly useful batch of newspaper cuttings. We received the last only a day before his death.

Mr. Ball's quiet and unassuming nature was apt to mislead superficial observers as to the mental resources at his disposal. He was naturally of a genuine scientific cast of mind, and whatever subject he took in hand was studied with a rare patience and a quiet homage to the supremacy of facts. Those who are acquainted with his small work, Are the Effects of Use and Disuse Inherited?—a really excellent piece of work, will appreciate what is meant. And perhaps the best compliment paid to that work of Mr. Ball's, was the one paid by Herbert Spencer. There were numerous other critics of the Spencerian position with reference to the Inheritance of Acquired Characters, and most of these Spencer ignored. But amongst the few to whom he did reply was W. P. Ball.

Brave and modest, a steady supporter of a Cause that has the quality of selecting the best for its servants, W. P. Ball leaves behind him more friends than he knew of, and more mourners than he would care to have. For his chief desire was not to give those around him pain or trouble—even in mourning for his death. He would have them face his death as he faced it himself. Fortunately, perhaps, for human nature, that cannot be. We mourn for our dead, even though that mourning is unaccompanied by foolish and superstitious fears. And those who knew William Platt Ball know that the world is the poorer for the death of a brave, honest, and simple soul.

By Mr. Ball's own request, the funeral is to be without ceremony of any kind, and also without—in the customary sense—mourners.

Digitized by Google

Where to Obtain the "Freethinker."

The following is not a complete list of newsagents who supply the "Freethinker," and we shall be obliged for other addresses for publication. The "Freethinker" may be obtained on order from any newsagent or railway bookstall.

London.

E.—E. T. Pendrill, 26 Bushfield Street, Bishopsgate, M. Papier, 86 Commercial Street. B. Ruderman. 71 Hanbury Street, Spitalfields J. Knight & Co., 3 Ripple Road, Barking. Messrs. Duncumb & Sons, 287 High Street, Stratford.

E.C.—W. S. Dexter, 6, Byward Street. Rose & Co., 133 Clerkenwell Road. Mr. Siveridge, 88 Fenchurch Street. J. J. Joques, 191 Old Street. Mr. Henderson, 66 Charing Cross Road.

N.—C. Walker & Son, 84 Grove Road, Holloway. Mr. Keogh, Seven Sisters Road (near Finsbury Park). Mr. West, New Road, Lower Edmonton. T. Perry, 17 Fore Street, Edmonton. H. Hampton, 80 Holloway Road. E. S. Smith, 7 Turnpike Lane, Hornsey.

N.W.—W. I. Tarbart, 316 Kentish Town Road. W. Lloyd, 5 Falkland Road, Kentish Town.

S.E.—J. H. Killick, 1 Tyler Street, East Greenwich. Mr. Clayton, High Street, Woodside, South Norwood. W. T. Andrews, 35 Meetinghouse Lane, Peckham. B. Dean, Southwark Bridge.

S.W.—R. Offer. 58 Kenyon Street, Fulham. A. Toleman, 54 Battersea Rise. A. Green, 29 Felsham Road, Putney. F. Locke, 500 Fulham Road. F. Lucas, 683 Fulham Road.

W.—Mr. Fox, 154 King Street, Hammersmith. Mr. Harvey, 1 Becklow Road, Shepherds Bush. Mr. Baker, Northfield Avenue, West Ealing. Thomas Dunbar, 82, Seaford Road, West Ealing.

W.C.—J. Bull, 24 Grays Inn Road.

Country.

Aberdeenshire.—J. Grieg, 16 Marischol Street, Peterhead.

Barrow-in-Furness,—J. Jowett, 56 Forshaw Street. E. L. Jowett, 84 Dalton Road.

Beccles.—C. Chase, Station Road.

Birkenhead.—Mr. Capper, Boundary Road, Port Sunlight.

Birmingham.—J. C. Aston, 39-40 Smallbrook Street. A. G. Beacon & Co., 67 & 68 Wocester Street. F. Holder, 42 Hurst Street. Mr. Benton, High Street, Erdington. Mr. Kimber, Ash Road Post Office, Saltley. W. H. Smith & Son, 34 Union Street. Messrs. Stanford & Mann, New Street.

Bolton.—E. Basnett, Church Street, Westhoughton. W. Atkinson, 364 Blackburn Road.

Brighton.—W. Hillman, 4 Little Western Street.

Bristol.—W. H. Smith a Son, Victoria Street.

Cardiff.—W. H. Smith & Son, Penarth Road.

Carshalton.—Mr. Simmons, 29 North Street.

Gateshead.—Henderson & Birkett, 4 & 5 Hills Street.

Cheltenham.—S. Norris, Ambrose Street.

Cullompton.—A. W. Clitsome, The Square.

Derbyshire.—Mr. Featherstone, Chapel-en-le-Firth.

Dublin.—Mr. Kearney, Upper Stephen Street.

Dundee.—Mr. Cunningham, St. Andrew's Street. "The Hub," High Street. Mr. Lamb, 121 Overgate.

Falkirk.—James Wilson, 76 Graham's Road.

Glasgow.—David Baxter, 32 Brunswick Street.

Gravesend.—Mrs. Troke, 10 Passock Street. Mr. Love, Gassick Street. Mr. Gould, Milton Road. Mr. Troke, Clarence Place.

Hastings.—King Bros., 2 Queen's Road.

pswich.—A. E. Hiskey, 1 Old Cattle Market. T. Shelbourne, St. Matthew Street. Mr. Fox, Fore Street. Mr. Fox, St. Helen's Street. Mr. Roberson, Back Hamlet. Mr. Joyce, Fore Street.

Jarrow.—L. Prescod, Railway Street.

Kent.—E. J. Voss, 148 Broadway, Bexley Heath.

Lancashire.—John Turner, Scourbottom, Waterford. W. Restall, Station Bridge, Urmston. J. T. Middleburst, 43 Water Lane, Preston.

Leeds.—C. H. Pickles, Ltd., 117 Albion Street. J. Bray, 95 Park Lane. J. Sutcliffe, West Street.

Liverpool.—S. Reeves, 316 Derby Road, Bootle. W. H. Smith and Son, 61 Dale Street.

Manchester.—Mrs. Tole, Whitelow Road, Chorlton-cum-Hardy. John Heywood, Ltd., Deansgate. Abel Heywood & Son, 47-61 Lever Street. W. H. Smith & Son, Blackfriars Street.

Monmouth.—Mr. Davies, Pontnewynidd. Wm. Morris, Windsor Road, Griffithatoon. Wyman & Son, Station Bookstall, Pontypool Road.

Neath.—W. G. Maybury, 57 Windsor Road.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—W. H. Smith & Son, 2 Forth Place.

Northampton.—Mr. Bates, Bridge Street. A. Bryan, Barracks Road.

Southend-on-Sea.—Harold Elliott, 1 Belle Vue Terrace.

Stockton-on-Tees.—Mr. Elgie, Bowesfield Lane.

Teddington.—H. H. Holwill, 105 High Street.

Torquay.—L. Priston, 103 Union Street. A. Priston, 47 Market Street. A. Peters, Old Mill Road, Chelston. Mr. Konayne Walnut Road. H. Peters, 193 Union Street. W. J. Peters, 37 Union Street. Mr. Hunt, Lucius Street.

Yarmouth.—C. H. Knights, 87 & 88 Northgate Street. H. Bird, 19 Howard Street South. J. M. Headley, North Howard Street.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, off Kentish Town Road, N.W.): 7.30, Debate, "Republicanism versus Royalism." Opened by H. V. Storey.

MR. HOWELL SMITH'S DISCUSSION CLASS (N. S. S. Office): Jan. 18, at 7.30.

OUTDOOR.

HYDE PARK: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Dales and Kells, "Give Truth a Chance"; 6.30, Messrs. Beale and Yates.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

LEICESTER (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate): J. T. Lloyd, a Lecture.

NOTTINGHAM (Mechanics' Institute): 7, C. Cohen, "Christianity and the Logic of Life."

Population Question and Birth-Control.

POST FREE THREE HALFPENCE.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,

QUEEN ANNE'S CHAMBERS, WESTMINSTER, S.W.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.
G. E. MACDONALD - - - - EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN - - EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

Subscription Rates:

Single subscription in advance - - -	$3.00
Two new subscribers - - - - -	5.00
One subscription two years in advance -	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra.
Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.
Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.
THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

TEH PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

A

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

OF FREETHINKERS
OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY

J. M. WHEELER.

Price THREE SHILLINGS Net.
(Postage 6d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp. ...	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE PASSING OF JESUS. 24 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 68 pp.	,, 1d.		3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	2
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
COMING CIVILIZATION. 30 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Mangasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 32 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 32 pp.	Nett. ,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY, by Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. LEA.
In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
By E. A. ASHCROFT.
440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By CARVETH READ.
8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.
By D. B. HART, M.D.
Crown 8vo. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

THE THEORIES OF EVOLUTION.
By YVES DELAGE.
1912. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.
For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. MILL.
Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

HISTORY OF THE TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.
By C. D. COLLET.
Two vols., published at 7s. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By CHAPMAN COHEN.
Price 1s. net, postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By G. W. FOOTE.
First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. WHEELER.
Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 1,853

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 3 SUNDAY JANUARY 21, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
Religion in the Army.—The Editor	33
The Self-Abolishing Deity.—J. T. Lloyd	34
The Freethought Valhalla.—Mimnermus	36
A Sceptical Scientist and Saint.—T. F. Palmer	37
Acid Drops	38
Jack London and Religion	40
To Correspondents	41
Our Sustentation Fund	41
Sugar Plums	41
"Free Will."—Jerl. Nirra	42
Critical Chat.—Geo. Underwood	45
A Modern Bishop's Move.—Arthur F. Thorn	45
Letter to the Editor—Attack on Democracy	45
Notice of Meetings	46
Books and Pamphlets	47

Views and Opinions.

Stick to your Last.

Woman, said Artemus Ward, in the course of one of his inimitable lectures, is a very necessary institution. "She is good in sickness and in wellness," but when she forsakes her proper "spear," and goes round "like a roaring lion seeking whom she may devour, she becomes a darned nuisance." We have no wish to discuss now what is woman's proper "spear." We were reminded of this deliverance by two or three recent expressions of opinion by military officers on religion in the Army. And after reading these we feel inclined to paraphraze Artemus Ward, and say that while the military man may be a more or less necessary institution, useful enough in his proper "spear," when he finishes that and goes round expressing opinions on matters outside his craft, he is apt to become a "darned nuisance" in the sight of those who have a conviction that people should understand their subject before posing as public instructors. And taking the records of military men, their success outside their particular department has not been such as to encourage a blind confidence in their leadership. If the cobbler should stick to his last, the soldier should stick to the work on which he is entitled to be heard with respect.

* * *

Religion in the Army.

The other day Field-Marshal Lord French opened a Salvation Army hostel for soldiers in Southampton Row, and in the course of his address said (we quote from a report in the Christian World):—

> The British soldier to-day was possessed of a very extraordinary spiritual power; in no other way could he explain the almost supernatural courage, tenacity, and endurance shown throughout the war. Only those who had served with him knew how terribly he had been tried, and could realize, what he had no hesitation in saying, that only those who were imbued with the spirit of noblest self-sacrifice and duty to God and country, could possibly have attained such results in such circumstances.

The language is vague enough, and the thought underlying it is doubtless correspondingly indefinite, but it serves. So long as expressions of such doubtful meaning as "spiritual," "duty to God and country," etc., are used, the religious world will not fail to see evidence of the strong religious feeling of our soldiers, and as in this country religion is closely identified with the Christian religion, the further step that all our soldiers are Christian is one easily made. Of course, it may be that Lord French had only in mind the desire to pay a compliment to the courage, tenacity, and self-sacrifice of men he has commanded. And that, we are quite ready to believe, those men have well earned. It is the use made of his remarks with which we are chiefly concerned, and when the Christian World caps its excerpt from Lord French, with a statement by Field-Marshal Lord Grenfell, that "the soldier has a strong religious instinct and rarely goes into action without some ejaculation of a prayerful kind," one is not left in much doubt as to how readers are asked to interpret the statement cited.

* * *

Are Soldiers Pious?

Now, this Army of ours is not composed of men who are strangers to us. We know them intimately. We have all walked with them, talked with them, worked with them, and played with them. We know just how much religion they had in times of peace, and we know just how much they had when they left for France or elsewhere, and—more important still—we can see how much religion they have when they come home on furlough. And we observe no marked change in their feelings towards religion—unless it be one of hostility. They do not, when they come home, rush off to church and chapel; they make no requests of their friends to send them out religious literature. They are certainly not more religious now than before they entered the Army. We may appeal to everyone's experience in support of what has been said. Of course, it may be said—it is said, as a matter of fact—that the men have become religious but are too shy to make any public profession. This, however, will not do in the case of religion, When a man has got religion he doesn't keep it to himself. We wish he did—in the interests of decency and good manners. The tendency, then, is to parade it, to thrust it upon every one and to make it a general nuisance. Lord Grenfell may be correct in saying that soldiers go into action with "a prayerful ejaculation" on their lips. But this is nothing new. Such things are heard on all sorts of occasions in the streets at home, but they are not usually taken as indications of intense piety. We have ourselves heard a man exclaim, "Oh, Christ!" when his feet have been stepped on, and in the classic precincts of Fleet Street. And the author of Fragments From France has depicted our soldiers as burning to give the Germans "'ell," because of the unwelcome intrusion of a high explosive shell. That pious ejaculations are often on the lips of our soldiers in France we quite believe. That is in accord with our experience of people at home.

Digitized by Google

Religion Unnecessary.

That this War has called for a display of courage, endurance, tenacity, and self-sacrifice greater than other wars we believe; but what has the supernatural, what has God, to do with it? There are some forty millions of men under arms, and a large proportion of that number are enduring, or have endured, similar hardships. And, apparently, British, French, Russians, Italians, Austrians, Germans, etc., all display much the same kind of courage and endurance, as they all have to face substantially the same kind of dangers and discomforts. Is it the supernatural that is aiding all? Or does Lord French mean that it is only our own soldiers who are being helped by God and the supernatural? In that case, we beg to protest. As our readers know, we are no lover of the soldier as such. Our dislike for militarism grows the more we see of it, and our hatred of warfare gains strength, if possible, with the passing of the days. But we decline to believe that our soldiers need either the belief in God or the inspiration of the supernatural to nerve them to do all they have done. It seems to us that a sense of duty alone is enough. When General Joffre was asked some time ago about religion in the French Army, he replied that love of country was enough to account for all they did. We do not think Englishmen fall below Frenchmen in this respect. Love of country, a sense of duty, a sentiment of comradeship, and the power of discipline are enough to account for all that the War has furnished. And we must protest once more against this picture of the British soldier made suddenly religious because he is faced with the prospect of meeting an enemy in the field.

* * *

That "Blessed" Word!

It is not, as we have said, ultimately a question of what Lord French meant so much as the use that is made of his words. He meant, probably, as little as did the Master of Balliol, who, in addressing a meeting at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields on January 9, said "There was in Army recruits a vast reservoir of religion in the deepest sense." The same stupid use of a baleful word. There is a reservoir of religion in men because they can be roused to a sense of duty and self-sacrifice! Rubbish! Duty and self-sacrifice have no more to do with religion than with the differential calculus. It is part of the old game. If a man is a rogue, call him a Freethinker, or say he is non-religious, and in this way the Churches will escape the odium of possessing him. But if he is honest and straightforward, say he is "essentially religious," or "truly religious," and the Churches will escape the difficulty of explaining how he came to exist without religion, and will, perhaps, get some little reflected glory from his being thus. If a man is religious, let him say so. And if he is not religious, let him also say so plainly and openly. The pity is that, while so many millions possess the courage that enables them to face a violent death, there are so few who possess the kind of courage which enables them to withstand the frowns of "respectable" society.

* * *

Freethought and Religion.

Freethinkers would do well to steer clear of that baleful word "Religion." It is a bad word, with a bad history and bad associations. Right through human history religion has involved—and rightly involved—a belief in supernaturalism of some kind. And it is idle—nay, dangerous—for one who does not believe in supernaturalism to drape his naturalism in that cloak. Surely human nature is strong enough to stand without it! Surely ethics, science, and philosophy gain nothing by having the word "Religion" associated with them! By all means let the Churches keep the word "Religion." Let us see that they do keep it. It will at least make the line of demarcation clear. And it will enable a man to say with pride and without misunderstanding that he is without religion. Whether the stories be true or false, I have an admiration for those early Christians who declined to purchase salvation by dropping a pinch of incense on the altar of an alien god. Their own God was equally absurd; but their stubbornness indicated conviction. They could have purchased safety so easily, but it would have cost them their self-respect, and their courage reflected credit on their manhood. And as we admire their action, so we are convinced that no man can go on sacrificing, day by day, a pinch of incense to the Mammon of respectability without undermining his own character and injuring the cause he professes to serve. The Freethinker takes his stand, not on religion, but upon reason and humanity; and the way to make our enemies respect these symbols is to pay due reverence to them in our own person.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Self-Abolishing Deity.

THE non-interference of the Christian or any other God in the affairs of the world is an absolutely insoluble problem to those who really believe in his existence. Some treat this problem as if it were the special creation of the present War; but in reality it is the oldest and most difficult of all Theistic problems, though it must be admitted that the savage European conflict which has been going on for two years and a half has added fresh and heavier emphasis thereto. Ever since the War broke out the divines have been feverishly discussing God's relation to it, and scarcely any two of them have been in agreement as to the nature and extent of that relation. Some have boldly maintained that the War is the Deity's peculiar operation, that he sent it as a judgment upon nations that had been rapidly repudiating his right to their worship and service, and some of them wickedly denying his very existence. At times the Bishop of London seems to glory in the horrible carnage as a revelation of the Divine love and care, and as constituting a glorious day of the Lord. Others, like Dr. Campbell Morgan, find the cause of the War in the momentary ascendancy of some malign forces always more or less operative in the world, and declare that God has permitted it in order to bring about most effectually the overthrow of those evil influences. A third school of divines teach that it is not indifference, but love, which compels the Divine Being "to limit his interference on behalf of men." A leading light of this school is the Rev. W. Garrett Horder, a popular Congregational minister at Ealing, who recently preached a sermon, entitled "The Self-Limitation of God," which appeared in the Middlesex County Times for January 6. The main points of this discourse are these three: "that God's essential nature is love"; "that such love must of necessity make him suffer with the objects of his love"; and "that it is not indifference, but love, which compels him to limit his interference on behalf of men." It will be very interesting to see how Mr. Horder arrives at these curious positions.

The assertion that "God's essential nature is love" Mr. Horder fails to confirm by the adduction of a single fact. He merely repeats, parrot-like, what the Bible says, without presenting one scrap of evidence in support of it. He dogmatizes thus:—

> God is love. For my part, I believe that had there not been love in the nature of God, there would have been no world nor men upon it.....That love is manifest > in Nature and Humanity I am fully persuaded—manifest far more fully than is commonly supposed.....For myself, I am prepared to say that the world, taken as a whole, is witness to a loving purpose in the mind of its author. But for that the world would have been without beauty —without the multitude of things which give delight. It would have been a mere dwelling-place, and not as it is a veritable palace. It would have been constructed as men used to construct workhouses, into which they put the least they could—where they catered for mere existence, and not for life.

Digitized by Google

There is surely no argument in that extract. It contains nothing but empty rhetoric, skilfully adapted to the believing ear. Mr. Horder believes that God is love, and consequently discerns the presence of his love everywhere. To say that had there not been love in God there would have been no beauty in the world is to ignore the fact that the world contains ugliness as well as beauty. Besides, the world is all either a wilderness or a desert until man's intelligent toil converts it into a garden; and when man first appeared he did not find it a ready-made palace awaiting his arrival.

Mr. Horder girds repeatedly at the pessimists, as if indulgence in that alluring exercise could establish the reality of God's love; but pessimism is largely a matter of temperament. The reverend gentleman forgets that there are pessimistic Christians and optimistic Atheists. If Huxley was constitutionally inclined to pessimism, Darwin, despite his intimate acquaintance with Nature and her ways, cherished optimism. Jack London was an Atheist, familiar with and inured to the hardships of a strenuous and incessantly struggling life, was yet an invincible, glowing optimist throughout his brief career. One of the touching stories in his Children of the Frost is entitled "The Law of Life." In far off Alaska, Koskoosh, a very old man, was patiently waiting for death. Camp had just been broken; he had listened for the last time to the men lashing the sleds and drawing tight the thongs. The tribe over which his son ruled had left to return no more. He could still hear the whip-lashes snarling and biting among the dogs, who whined dolefully, hating the work and the trail. "Sled after sled churned slowly away into the silence. They were gone. They had passed out of his life, and he faced the last bitter hour alone." But his son came back for one last look at the father he loved. "Is it well with you?" he ashed, and Koskoosh answered, "It is well." He was alone once more. Beside him lay a pile of wood and the fire was burning brightly. It was snowing heavily, and the bundle of faggots alone stood between him and his end, and once the last faggot ceased to burn his blind eyes would close and his tired feet would be at rest for ever.

> He did not complain. It was the way of life, and it was just. He had been born close to the earth, close to the earth had he lived, and the law thereof was not new to him. It was the law of all flesh. Nature was not kindly to the flesh. She had no concern for that concrete thing called the individual. Her interest lay in the species, the race. This was the deepest abstraction old Koskoosh's barbaric mind was capable of, but he grasped it firmly. He saw it exemplified in all life. The rise of the sap, the bursting greenness of the willow bud, the fall of the yellow leaf—in this alone was told the whole history (Children of the Frost, pp. 40, 41).

Yet, face to face with all these natural facts, which even Mr. Horder dare not deny, and knowing absolutely nothing of the love of God, this raw Alaskan savage winced not, nor cried aloud, but from a sane and serene outlook upon life confidently exclaimed, "It is well." The constant refrain in many of Jack London's charming stories is, "Nature does not care," and it surely follows that, if Nature, in whose hands we are, does not care, there is no ground whatever for believing that Nature's maker and governor exercises any care for anybody or anything.

Of course, in the absence of any evidence that an all-loving Heavenly Father exists, there can be no proof that he suffers either for or with mankind; and in this entire lack of evidence, it follows of necessity that the testimonies of either Isaiah or Jesus can possess no value whatever. The God who counts all the hairs on our heads, and who falls with every dying sparrow, is but one of the myths that have unfortunately outlived the ages of ignorance and credulity in which they were born. The doctrine of the loving, suffering, and dying God, mystical union with whom alone secures salvation, is wholly mythological, whether preached in ancient India and Egypt, or in twentieth century Christendom.

At this point Mr. Horder is obliged to halt, because the facts are so many and so stubborn that he cannot possibly run away from them. Amazingly illuminating are the following words:—

> But then this love in God, which makes him to suffer with us, obliges him to limit himself, to refrain from doing what his love would like to do.

How astonishingly audacious is this terribly humiliating apology which the servant makes for his Master? Unlike several divines of to-day, Mr. Horder still holds the doctrine of the Divine omnipotence. He asserts that God could deliver all mankind from the wrath to come and make them heirs of heavenly glory, could banish all evil from the Universe forthwith, could have prevented this awful War, or put an end to it to-morrow, if he only would; but he respects the world far too much to will to exercise his power for its benefit without first getting its permission to do so. Surely, this is a new doctrine, and the most irrational ever offered to a credulous congregation. Love issuing in compulsion, the reverend gentleman assures us, "would be a lower love than one which so respected men and their freedom that, though it would appeal and persuade, it would never compel." Then love is, after all, not the greatest and strongest, but the weakest thing in the world. At the commencement of his discourse this preacher said that power in God is but the instrument of his love which he essentially is, but now he excuses God's non-interference in human affairs by declaring that the love that has omnipotence as its instrument is yet too timid and shy, too respectful towards human freedom, to employ it without first getting leave to do so. In our simplicity, we had thought that pure love's compulsion was the noblest and holiest thing in life, but at last we learn that the pleading and persuading done by God's love have been wholly ineffectual. Horrible evils, gigantic wrongs, shameful and most degrading forms of injustice and oppression, and devastating wars have been allowed to flourish and often to achieve their nefarious ends throughout the ages simply because the Creator, Sustainer, Sovereign, and Father of mankind has always respected his creatures, subjects, and children far too much to boldly step in and set things right amongst them.

All we wish to say in conclusion is that such a self-limiting Deity is also self-abolishing. In reality, however, both the self-limiting and self-abolishing are done by God's self-appointed champions. It is they, after all, who are the most successful manufacturers of Atheists.

J. T. LLOYD.

Contempt for human life, taught as every day by Nature, and alas! by man himself; all war intensifies that. But the more permanent forces, alike of human nature and of the natural world are, on the whole, in the interest of tranquility and sanity, and of the sentiments proper to man.—Pater.

Digitized by Google

The Freethought Valhalla.

Yet doth remembrance, like a sovereign prince,
For you a stately gallery maintain
Of gay and tragic pictures. —Wordsworth.

To the meditative mind there is no better reading than a list of names of note. We can well understand the sober joy of the old Puritans, who, taking their Bibles seriously, loved to grapple with the lengthy genealogies of Israel and Judah. Even a gazeteer is a mine of suggestion, and in a London directory you can lose yourself among the strange lanes from Pie Corner to Hanging Sword Alley. But a biographical dictionary or an encyclopædia is certain to make large inroads on our time. Take, for example, Joseph Wheeler's Dictionary of Freethinkers. In it there are thousands of entries, taken from all ages and all countries. That means thousands of names of interest, thousands of men and women who have played their part on life's stage, and who played it in a sufficiently remarkable manner to give their names a distinct interest to their descendants. We know of few more interesting occupations than the reading of such a book, and it is a pity that Freethought publishers are not sufficiently wealthy to include the portraits of many of the persons mentioned.

Such a book is informative, and turns the handles of many doors. We turn a page and encounter the name of Charles Bradlaugh, as brave as any soldier who ever drew a sword. He fought a great battle for thirteen years against overwhelming odds, and his was the cool head and the calm judgment of the great captains of men. He gave his life for liberty, and our children will remember something of this Freethought leader when they have forgotten the names of his opponents. A few pages further and there is the name of Richard Carlile. What an indomitable spirit does it not conjure up. There flits into our memory the terrible martyrdom of this bravest of the brave soldiers of liberty. Think of it! Carlile, the lion-hearted, suffered nine and a half years imprisonment for championing the liberty of the Press. His wife and other members of his family, and shop assistants, divided among them fifty years' confinement. Further, we see the splendid name of Edward Gibbon, the greatest of English historians, who in his Decline and Fall, "sapped a solemn creed with solemn sneer." He walks for ever as to the clash of martial music under an imperial banner. Without exploration we have found the magnetic and powerful name of Voltaire. What a man! His epigrams stung like wasps—rankled for years. At sixty-four, when other men are thinking of slippered ease, he was writing Candide, the wittiest book in the world. Writing Œdipus at seventeen, Irene at eighty-three, he crowded between these two masterpieces the accomplishments of a giant. And Edward Fitzgerald, the East Coast recluse, who turned the quatrains of the old Freethinking Persian, Omar Khayyam, into a great masterpiece of English poetry. "A planet larger than the sun which cast it," his friend Tennyson described it. The name of Thomas Paine is homely, but what a personalty does it recall? A character of outstanding ability, a maker of nations, and far removed from the uncouth and unlettered figure of popular imaginings.

There is a very significant entry in the name of the Empress Catherine of Russia. How many innocent critics of Freethought know that the evangel of Reason appeals equally to the monarch on the throne as to the toiler in his garret. Catherine was a Freethinker in word and in deed. When Denis Diderot was compelled by dire poverty to sell his library, she bought it back for him and installed him as librarian. Another Royal "intellectual" was Frederick the Great. What must it have been to have been present at those festal nights at Frederick's palace when the nimble wit of Voltaire challenged the choicest brains of Europe? It must have been a rich memory and an abiding delight, like those ever-memorable nights at the "Mermaid," when Ben Jonson exchanged quips and cranks with the smiling Shakespeare. Napoleon, the little Corsican, who shook the world before he was thirty, is here, too, in this volume. A more shadowy figure is that of Kit Marlowe, the Elizabethan dramatist, whose untimely death prevented his trial for blasphemy. Sir Richard Burton, the master of many languages, and the untiring traveller, who penetrated to the Holy of Holies at Mecca at the peril of his life, is another of the glorious company of Freethinkers.

The "intellectuals" of France are represented by a magnificent procession from Abelard to Anatole France. Who can see the name of Robert Ingersoll without a quickening of the pulses? He comes riding down the wind like a knight in shining armour to attack the embattled hosts of superstition. And the lonely student, Charles Darwin, who turned "Adam" and "Eve" out of the "Garden of Eden," not with a flaming sword, but with a steel pen. Here is Heinrich Heine dying upon his mattress-grave in Paris with a jest upon his lips, and Shelley, the sweetest-souled of the English poets, whom Christians sought to deprive of his children, and imprisoned men for selling his works. A sense of fellowship with the fled centuries invades us as we see the name of Giordano Bruno, one of the most fearless martyrs for Truth. And Time seems poised for a moment upon his spread wings as we encounter the puissant personality of Lucretius, one of the sublimest poets who ever attuned his lyre under the eagles of the Cæsars.

Names such as these are but signposts to meet the reader and direct him towards the wonderful universality of Freethought. And, mind you, there are many hundreds of such signposts. "Wonderful" is the only adjective which will serve for this maze of surprises; this patient account of the men and women who have cared, not for wealth and notoriety, but for intellectual honesty, written by a wise and careful student who himself emptied many an inkpot in the service of a great cause.

Here under one roof, we may say, is the temple of Liberty and the house of Wisdom, compared with which the churches and mosques of the superstitions are but charnel-houses full of bones. For each of these men and women were, in their way, the apostles of Freedom. They were knight-errants of the evangel of Liberty. From the dim twilight when Lucretius rolled his richest thunders against the infamies of religion in his day, until twenty centuries later Swinburne and Meredith rallied the soldiers of Freethought with the golden trumpets of their genius, Liberty never failed of her votaries. The bare records of the doings of these pioneers thrill and fascinate by very reason of their simplicity. The feats of Freethinkers have needed little of the embellishment which high-sounding language could give them. From Hypatia, murdered by a Christian rabble, to Ferrer, "butchered to make a Roman holiday," they strike our imaginations and hold our wonder in thrall. They are potent because of their very sincerity. Who could fail to recognize the splendid courage which held so steadfastly to the last moment, or fail to appreciate the iron nerve which bent only before the impossible?

We come to this in the end, that freethinking "saints" are the best. It is significant that even in Christian Scotland the popularity of St. Andrew's Day is far less than that of Burns's Night. Is it not true that in the sheer fight of personalities for the possession of England's day, Shakespeare has beaten St. George, as our American friends say, "to a frazzle."

Digitized by Google

This is but a little cloud of biographical dust, and, if an apology is needed for such trifling, we point to the fact that the interest of such a volume is inexhaustible. It reaches from the greatest names in history to hundreds of men and women whose achievements were less important, but, who, because they dedicated their lives to the service of intellectual liberty, laid the deep foundations of the future greatness of the human race.

MIMNERMUS.

A Sceptical Scientist and Saint.

II.

(Continued from p. 22.)

IN 1864 was formed the X Club. X being the unknown quantity, the only club rule was that it should possess no specified number of members, and nine was the original membership; and this number was never exceeded. The original members were Huxley, Tyndall, Herbert Spencer, Hirst, Busk, Frankland, Hooker, Spottiswoode, and Lubbock, and all these men reached high eminence either in science or philosophy. No formal dissolution of the Club ever took place, but at the last regular gathering in 1893 the attendance had fallen to three. Lubbock, Hooker, and Frankland formed this gathering. In a sense, the Club's final meeting occurred in 1911, when Lubbock visited the venerable Hooker. That great botanist died soon afterwards, and Lubbock himself passed away in 1913.

In the early 'sixties Lubbock was invited to stand for the City of London, then a safe Liberal seat. He regarded the proposal with favour, but his father set his face against it. In 1865, Warde Norman, the economist, invited young Lubbock to contest West Kent. The invitation was issued on behalf of the Liberals in that division, but, remembering his parent's opposition to the suggested candidature for the City—the great commercial and banking constituency—Lubbock declined the offer. From the progressive standpoint, West Kent seemed a forlorn hope, as there was a Conservative majority of 2,000 to pull down. Norman, however, refused to take "No" for an answer from the son, and appealed to the father, who, to the younger man's astonishment, promptly acceded to Norman's request. Lubbock's scientific friends murmured at the prospect of his wasting his energies in political life, and Darwin, while congratulating him on a speech at Maidstone, regretted his young disciple's desertion. "Even in the moment of triumph," wrote Darwin, "I must let a little groan escape me for poor deserted Science. Anyhow, I know that you will always love your first-born child, and not despise her for the sake of gaudy politicks."

The famous John Stuart Mill, who subscribed a little later towards the election expenses of Bradlaugh at Northampton, was a member of Lubbock's committee, whose list included other eminent names. Yet, despite his highly successful meetings, Lubbock was soundly beaten at the poll. And a contributory factor in his defeat was the appearance during the contest of his Prehistoric Times, which contained so many arguments and illustrations that were antagonistic to the almost universally treasured belief in the Old Testament story of the creation of man. Lubbock was advised to suspend the publication of this work until after the election, but he intimated that "such a course would be scarcely honourable." And the few years that divide us from this despotism of theological darkness will be vividly realized when we learn that—> as late as 1871, a meeting was held to reply to a lecture he (Lubbock) had recently given. The speaker, the Rev. J. B. McCrea, considered that "Science was the cause, science is the cause, of the degeneracy of man. It was not man's natural tendency and development that made him scientific. Science did it. The Bible told us distinctly and plainly it was not the devil that did it. A great deal more was laid at the door of the devil than belonged to the devil, although he cannot be made worse than he is."

Evidently we have made some progress since then, for the most illiterate ranter in the most benighted little Bethel could hardly descend at our time of day to such drivel as this. The reviewers who addressed the better-instructed circles were loud in their praises, and Prehistoric Times received generous recognition from those whose opinions were of value in the world of science. The Athenæum notice was penned by Russel Wallace, who wrote that the work "teems with information on everything that has been yet discovered bearing on the early history of our race, and is written in so clear and agreeable a manner that it is sure to gratify and instruct every class of reader."

Prehistoric Times, nevertheless, abounds in arguments, verities, and implications with which Wallace in later life must have strongly dissented. The first edition was soon translated into the leading European tongues. Three editions have appeared in France, and in the sixth and final English edition we possess one of the finest of our anthropological masterpieces. A note to Lady Lubbock from Walter Bagehot, dated 1866, shows how novel appeared the views presented in this volume. The famous essayist, economist, and author of Physics and Politics, wrote:—

> I am afraid it will be a very long time before people will give up talking nonsense on Prehistoric Times. They have not quite given it up as to present times, and views so new as Sir John's and so entirely contrary to strong traditions will not be thoroughly understood, much less universally accepted, for many years. Argument moves men but very slowly.

In 1865, while journeying with his wife to the Science gathering at Birmingham, he met with a serious mishap. When a little beyond Banbury, most of the train left the rails. Lubbock was bruised and shaken, his hands and coat were drenched with blood, and, although the lady suffered no serious bodily hurt, her nervous system was subjected to a severe strain, and she was never the same woman again. She was at the moment well advanced in pregnancy, so much so that several weeks later she gave birth to their son Rolfe.

In 1870 Lubbock wooed and won the electors of Maidstone, and his maiden speech at Westminster was delivered in April. Military Education was his theme, and the new member told the House how our Army suffered for lack of science. After deploring the absence of chemical teaching, he turned to geology, and pointed out that—

> Portsdown great fort was built on the summit of a chalk ridge.....The strata sloped in each direction away from the summit; a very deep well had been sunk here; but as the rain which fell on the hill drained away along the line of the strata, this was the worst possible place for such a purpose. When the Military Authorities were building the College at Sandhurst, they had a quantity of bricks made of the Blackwater Valley or river alluvium. These consequently fell to pieces, and others had to be made. Along our South Coast, groins were placed to arrest the movement of the shingle caused by the prevalent winds and tides. The military engineers were ordered to set groins on the Dover Coast, and they slanted them the wrong way, thus helping the shingle on. Some of the forts on our Southern Coast, having been built in yielding strata, had given way, and though the damage might be repaired, it had caused great > expense. When our Army went to the Crimea, Sir Roderick Murchison applied to the Government to send out a geologist, but that request was not complied with. An unhealthy position was chosen for our troops in the Crimea from want of a scientific acquaintance with the geological conformation of the ground.

Digitized by Google

Yet thirty years rolled away before a Government-appointed Committee mildly recommended these very reforms. And so on, and so on; but we must be a wonderful people, for we have somehow managed to muddle along with at least the semblance of success.

Although Lubbock was actively engaged both in Parliament and in the City, there appeared in 1870 another important work from his pen. This was his Origin of Civilization and the Primitive Condition of Man, which is now in its sixth edition. The book proved an immediate success, and, although an expensive volume, the first edition was soon exhausted. Prehistoric Times was filled with facts, but the new work contained weighty deductions and pregnant theories relating to aboriginal man's efforts to control and direct the forces of Nature to his own advantage, as well as to his rude struggles to rear a social structure. It also endeavoured to picture early forms of religious belief. Sir John's views concerning the genesis of savage religion were similar to those of Herbert Spencer, Sir Edward Tylor, and other evolutionists. He was convinced that dreams were largely responsible for the theologies of primitive humanity. He shows us the savage puzzling over the problem as to—

> What happens to the spirit during sleep? The body lies lifeless, and the savage not unnaturally concludes that the spirit has left it. In this he is confirmed by the phenomena of dreams, which consequently to the savage have a reality and importance which we can hardly appreciate. During sleep the spirit seems to desert the body; and as in dreams we visit other localities, and even other worlds, living, as it were, a separate and different life, the two phenomena are not unnaturally regarded as the complements of one another. Hence the savage considers the events in his dreams to be as real as those of his waking hours, and hence he likes to feel that he has a spirit which can quit the body.

Contrary to the settled convictions of the astute Parliamentarians, he was successful, in 1871, in placing his Bank Holidays' Bill on the Statute Book. Ever an enthusiastic advocate of the lessening of the hours of labour in shops and warehouses, Lubbock lost no time in providing the public with Bank Holidays. The holiday with which his name is inseparably associated is that which falls in August, and he was convinced that this summer season furnished fuller facilities for open-air benefit and enjoyment than any other part of the year. Critics have asserted that it was quite by accident that the wording of the Bill extended its provisions beyond the banking world. This is, however, entirely erroneous, as the subjoined note in Lubbock's own handwriting shows. "As regards the Bank Holiday," he states:—

> I will only say that I never intended it to apply solely to the Banks. In fact, the Bill expressly provides that nobody shall be compelled to do anything on a Bank Holiday which he cannot be compelled to do on Xmas Day or Good Friday. The term Bank Holiday was used for a technical reason; on other holidays, Bills of Exchange are payable the previous day. On our holidays, on the following day. Now, if we had used the expression "General" or "National," the provision would have been doubtful, and we therefore chose the special distinguishing term "Bank Holiday."

The August festival proved a magnificent success. All the scenes of rowdyism and drunkenness confidently predicted by the wiseacres were conspicuous by their absence. It is the privilege of few legislators to perform a deed of such widespread usefulness at the early age of thirty-seven. In the same year in which St. Lubbock's Day received the Royal Assent, Lubbock interested himself with Huxley and others in preparing food supplies to be sent to Paris, to relieve the famished population of that splendid city from the fatal consequence of the German invasion of France. And it was also in 1871 that Lubbock began that intimate interest in Avebury, the spot from which he in after years assumed his title. He had long been interested in the preservation of ancient ruins and public monuments, and Avebury is one of our chief national treasures. It was first mentioned by the antiquary Aubrey, who declares that "Avebury doth as much exceed Stonehenge in grandeur as a Cathedral doth a Parish Church." This venerable ruin stood in imminent danger of falling into the hands of the builder, and, although local protests were raised, its fate seemed settled. An enlightened clergyman sought Lubbock's assistance, and he willingly purchased the site, thus securing the lovers of archæology against the Vandals. All who know the Hardy country of Wessex will bear Sir John in grateful remembrance for his prompt act. Thus was conserved a priceless relic of far remote times.

T. F. PALMER.

(To be continued.)

Acid Drops.

We have heard of trouble in China because engineers tried to run a railway track through a graveyard. This was because it outraged the respect and veneration which Chinese feel towards their ancestors. We were reminded of this by a case before the War Losses Commission the other day. The military authorities found it necessary to lay an electric cable under a churchyard path at Willesden. The rector objected, but the Electric Light Company were informed that the "outrage" would be assuaged if £200 were paid to the Church Fund, with an additional £30 for expenses. The Company objected to this as "blackmail," and the military authorities exercised their power and laid down the cable. Then the vicar claimed for professional charges. Hence the case before the Commission. We have by this time got quite used to patriotism at five per cent., and to everybody making all they can out of the War by way of doing their bit; and doubtless the rector and the vicar felt that here was the chance of "doing" something, or someone. The outrage on their religious feelings would disappear if £230 were handed over! So much for the sacred character of religious susceptibilities!

Sir Ronald Ross, who is world-famous for his discoveries in connection with malaria, retorts, in a controversial letter to the British Medical Journal: "Surely the All-Maker can at any moment stop a practice of which He disapproves." That Sir Ronald made this, in any case, pregnant observation with his tongue in his cheek is shown by his further one that Tennyson's "believing where we cannot prove" he considers "dishonest."

The Sabbatarians are at it again. The Chief Constable of Grimsby and the Deputy Chief Constable of Lincolnshire have both definitely decided to stop Sunday trading by prosecuting customers on a charge of aiding and abetting. These little local gods, dressed in brief authority, evidently do not read their Bibles. They should turn to the second chapter of Mark and then put on sackcloth and ashes. We wonder what parson is at the bottom of the game.

Mr. W. L. Hichens, Chairman of Cammel, Laird & Co., gave a very thoughtful address before the Headmaster's Conference the other day. In such an expression as "The true function of education is to teach a man to live, and not how to make a living," he showed that he had a much truer conception of the higher function of education than many of our statesmen who can see in it no more than a society decoration on the one side, or an instrument for beating a commercial rival on the other. If a man knows how to live, he will sooner find a way of getting a living, than by knowing how to get a living, find out how to live.

Digitized by Google

There was another expression used by Mr. Hichens that was worthy of note. "The code of honour which regulated the modern schoolboy's everyday life was derived, not from religious teaching, but from the cricket field and the football ground. He grew to understand that he must play the game in the affairs of everyday." We commend this observation to those who are fond of sentimentalizing over the power of religious education. The obligation of straightforward conduct comes from life, not from theology, or even from moral instruction. The one may turn a boy into a hypocrite and the other into a prig. But it is in association with his fellows, in the cultivation of his powers of imagination, and in a quickening of his sympathies that the real springs of moral development are reached.

Another poor wandering sheep is James Harry Thorburn who was sentenced to three months for frauds extending over six years and involving £1,300, the money of his employers. Thorburn was a choirmaster at Bradford. He will have plenty of time now to learn new tunes.

The New Year's Gathering of the Commercial Travellers' Christian Association has been held. Did it help those who attended to "tell the tale" more plausibly, or whitewash them for booking orders they never received? Perhaps they found consolation in the text, "I opened my door to the traveller." There is very little in the Bible which is appropriate for men on the road.

Mrs. Cornwallis West, who figured prominently in the recent War Office case, is a clergyman's daughter. And, curiously, Mrs. Langtry, who was considered to be her great rival, is the daughter of a former Dean of Jersey. The careers of both these charming ladies illustrate the value of early religious training.

Lord Curzon, speaking at a Primrose League meeting, said the soldiers were fighting in this War for the principles of the League. There's statesmanship made easy! One of the objects of the Primrose League is the maintenance of the Protestant Church of England, and he would be a bold man who would assert that French and Italian Catholics, and Russian and Rumanian members of the Greek Church care a button whether English Protestants worship cats or crocodiles.

At the Central Hall, Westminster, General and Mrs. Booth advertise "Two Days with God." The Kaiser will be cross.

"Food or Alcohol?" runs a headline in the press. Perhaps the clergy will respond by limiting the use of communion wine.

A facetious journalist has pointed out that the chief holy days of the Christian Church are associated with gluttony. Just so! The merry birthday of the Man of Sorrows is quite an old joke, and the hot cross buns on Good Friday appeal far more powerfully to the young than the trial and execution of the Trinity.

The forthcoming Spring meetings of the various Churches are likely to be seriously affected by the restricted train services, and the Godly are much perturbed in consequence. Probably, some of them will pray for the wings they expect to wear in another place.

Pious relics are a standing disgrace to priests. The "true cross" must have been the height of St. Paul's Cathedral, and the "real crown of thorns" the size of Lord's Cricket Ground, judging by the extremely numerous fragments scattered throughout Europe.

Enormous sums of money were spent at the coronation of the Emperor Charles as King of Hungary, despite the fact that his subjects are dying of hunger. When the King of Kings entered Jerusalem the sole decorations were palm-leaves. Probably the Emperor Charles agrees with Hosea Biglow that "they didn't know everything down in Judee."

Ever since the War began nothing has been more characteristic of British Christianity than the persistency and audacity with which it has sought to paint the Germans as a nation of Materialists and Atheists, even from the Kaiser downwards. The Bishop of London, Dr, Clifford, Dr. Campbell Morgan, the editor of the British Weekly, Mr. Spurr, A. G. Gardiner, in the Daily News, and many others, announced, several of them a score of times, with dogmatic certitude, that Germany had repudiated the Christian religion in favour of Nietzscheanism, according to some, or, according to others, in consequence of a return to the religion of Odin. This journal has availed itself of every opportunity to expose that monstrous lie, not because it hates Christianity but because it loves truth above all else. But the clergy of all denominations, from the Bishop of London down to the most ignorant curate or Nonconformist minister, continued to repeat the falsehood whenever they had a chance.

And yet all these more or less eminent men of God knew, or ought to have known, that they were lying in order to convince their fellow-countrymen that the War did not originate in a Christian nation, or that Christianity was in no sense responsible for it. Prior to the War they used to assert that there were scarcely any Atheists in the whole world; but after the War broke out they discovered that the hateful people were numerous enough to have caused it. They were willing to take their oath that it was so.

But that is not all. Before the War, they were in the habit of calling special attention to the fact that in Germany Christianity was triumphant. To refresh their memory we will here cite the testimony of the late Right Reverend Dr. Wilkinson, Anglican Bishop of North and Central Europe, published in the Year Book of the Churches for 1908. The editor of that work described Dr. Wilkinson as "a great authority on this matter." Said his lordship:—

> Germany is a religious nation. Germans, from their great Kaiser downwards, are a God-fearing people. The sense of duty, so strong in every German, plays a larger part in religious observances than with us. And God has blessed and is wonderfully blessing that nation.

The Bishop went on to emphasize the fact that "religious education in all the primary and secondary schools of Germany is compulsory." He contended that in many respects England might learn good lessons from Germany. As far as we know, no objection arose, in any quarter, in 1908, to that eulogistic characterization of the German nation; but soon after the outbreak of the War, the pulpit rang from end to end of the land with the declaration that a nation capable of pronouncing treaties as "scraps of paper," of violating the neutrality of Belgium, and of committing the unspeakable horrors laid to its charge, could not be a Christian nation. Appalling is the hypocrisy thus disclosed!

The early Christians believed in a community of property, as well as a host of fairy tales. This may account for the fact that one cannot go into any hotel or boarding-house without finding the touching text hanging in a conspicuous position, "The proprietor is not responsible for any articles left in the bedrooms."

"General Booth needs immediate help" was the headline in a bold advertisement in the press recently. We do not remember the time when this gentleman did not require assistance, but why does he not rely on the spiritual uses of prayer instead of the material methods of newspaper advertising?

The Rev. J. F. Newton, of Cedar Rapids, U.S.A., who has accepted the pastorate of the City Temple, London, says that his Nonconformist chapel is a "house of the Eternal." Bless his innocent heart! When he comes to England he should find out that there are many thousands of "houses of the Eternal," some of them tin-tabernacles, and many heavily mortgaged.

Digitized by Google

Surgeon-General Sir Alfred Keogh, who, as head of the R.A.M.C., has been responsible for the medical service of the British Army during the War, made a biting reference recently to the mental equipment of so many people in high positions. "I have to work with these men," he says, "and press scientific decisions upon them, and it is exceedingly difficult to get low enough to find yourself upon their level. They possess no knowledge whatever of the facts of science and nature." Perhaps this accounts for piety in high places.

"Buffalo Bill" (Col. F. Cody) is dead. On hearing that his death was near, he requested various Freemason societies to arrange his funeral. Then he called for a pack of cards, and insisted on playing a game of poker. Of course, the religious world will be shocked. He ought to have called for the Bible; and it is possible that the pack of cards may become a Bible in the future. But our respect for Col. Cody goes up in consequence of that request. We feel certain there was a man behind it. Whining for a Bible or a parson would only have proved there was a knave or a coward.

Rev. G. McLuckie, of Yarmouth, says he likes to think of the Allies as "God's chosen instruments." We do not say they are not; but if they are, it is a pity God does not look better after them. If he had warned them what was coming, it might—if we may so put it—never have happened. A God who knew his business would have prevented this horrible mess ever occurring. But to let it happen, and then merely select "instruments" to settle it, is only doing what a mere mortal could do. One thing seems certain. If theology doesn't find a man foolish, it leaves him so.

It looks as if that distinguished Christian, Mr. Horatio Bottomley, aspires to be among the prophets, for he has written an article with the title, "If I were Old Moore." We hope that Mr. Bottomley will never write like the prophet Ezekiel.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has been ill, and doctors have been in attendance. Evidently, His Grace has not much faith in prayer alone.

It is said that dear old Providence takes a special interest in sparrows. Leicestershire folk will have to look out for trouble, for they are trapping sparrows in thousands and using them as a substitute for meat. Agricultural experts state that sparrows destroy annually the produce of 185,000 acres.

Juvenile humour is sometimes very pointed. In an essay on "The Church," a schoolboy thus classified the clergy: "There are three kinds of parsons—bishops, vicars, and curates. The bishops tell the vicars to work, and the curates do it. Curates are mostly thin, but get fuller when they are vicars, and podgy when they are bishops."

Miss Picton-Turberville told a meeting held to consider the subject of "Women in the Church": "In an invitation recently issued on a Church anniversary it was announced that the vicar would speak on the history of the Church, the curate on woman's work for the Church, and in small print it was announced that the ladies would give the tea and coffee." We are not surprised; but it is women's own fault. So long as they are content to act as handmaidens to the clergy, they will be used as such. And, after all, the arrangement was quite scriptural. Jesus selected no women disciples, although he permitted one to wash his feet. And that is an old Eastern symbol of abject submission.

We are indebted to the Daily Sketch for a tale of a man at the front which is highly enlightening as well as amusing. The censor opened two letters from the same soldier, one addressed to the vicar of his parish and another to a friend in the same village. The holy tone of the first was beautiful, the plain, or rather flowery, language of the other, describing the weather and conditions he was experiencing would have made the vicars's hair curl. But the clergy can use "some" language at times, and take a lot of beating.

The Church of Christ has always opposed everything new. It brought all sorts of charges against the cinemas, and in many London districts will not allow the "movies" to be shown on Sunday. There is positively nothing for the people to do in Tottenham, East Ham, and other places, if the people do not want to go to church, since the public houses are open for so short a time. Now another proposal is mooted. It is proposed that the Church take over the picture palaces, but about £17,000,000 has been invested in the industry, and this would take some finding. Anyway, the owners of that capital are not likely to hand it over to the clergy.

There is a proposal on foot to create a new Bishopric of Bradford. For this purpose a sum of £700,000 is required, and the public is earnestly requested to subscribe. Of course, at a time like the present, when the Government is urging everybody to invest in War Loan, the proposal might be called unpatriotic, for certainly the country is in no crying need of a new bishopric. But the authors of the scheme are alert, and they promise that every penny subscribed shall be invested in War Loan. Which means that, after having obtained £700,000 for a quite absurd purpose, the rest of the country will be called upon to pay 5 per cent. interest on it for thirty years in the name of religion and patriotism.

Jack London and Religion.

THE late Jack London, the author who had perhaps achieved greater success than any other American expert, except Mark Twain, was never suspected of being pious. Mr. Nathan Shapiro, a Californian reader of the Truth Seeker, who enjoyed a personal acquaintance with London, says:—"He was a sincere Freethinker." Jack London was all for brain and muscle, and could not give anything to religion and dogma. Living and not believing was his business. His experience with the professors of religion, from the Salvation Army promoter to the church-endowing, Bible-class capitalist, convinced him that they were grafters and hypocrites. Of one of the latter he said:—

> This man, talking soberly and earnestly about the beauties of idealism and the goodness of God, had just betrayed his comrades in a business deal. This man, a pillar of the church and heavy contributor to foreign missions, worked his shop-girls ten hours a day on a starvation wage, and thereby directly encouraged prostitution. This man, who endowed chairs in universities, perjured himself in courts of law over a matter of dollars and cents. And this raidroad magnate broke his word as a gentleman and a Christian when he granted a secret rebate to one or two captains of industry locked together in a struggle to the death.

He had opportunities to know the church at both ends, where the Salvation Army type of exhorter works his game, and where the pious millionaire or business man acts his part, for he had been a down-and-outer and he had entered the portals of "society." He had no use for either nor for types of religionists found between them. His friends among the clergy were the unorthodox and unfrocked. His economic heresies made him the idol of the radicals. He was not conservative enough to remain with the Socialist organization, although he promoted its objects. When the fragments of his work are collected, it will be found, as with Mark Twain (from whom he was otherwise altogether different), that Christianity not only never tempted his belief, but had his contempt rather than his admiration.

—Truth Seeker (New York).

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

January 28, Swansea; February 4, Abertillery; February 11, Liverpool; February 25, Clapham; March 11 Birmingham; March 18, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—February 11, Walsall. March 25, Avondale Hall, Clapham.

MRS. TURNBULL.—Very pleased indeed to hear from you. Thanks for good wishes to self and family. We hope that you are yourself keeping well.

W. MATHER.—We hope to publish that pamphlet, with many others, before long. It is a question of getting a little capital to be used for that purpose and securing a supply of paper at a reasonable price. We shall overcome both difficulties one day, we have no doubt.

DENEB.—We don't at all share your despair of Scotland. Of course, Christianity is still strong there, and we should like to see it weaker. But the Scott is a hard-headed "cuss." He doesn't rush, but once he has moved one can depend upon him, and his strength in the service of superstition is an earnest of equal strength in the service of Freethought. And he is the better worth fighting for on that account.

F. C.—Pleased to hear from one who attended our lectures at Blackburn, although these were given many years ago. We quite share your opinion of the priest—Roman Catholic and other.

M. BAXTER (Cape Town).—Thanks for cuttings and congratulations.

R. OGDEN.—We will not say "Courage," as we believe you already possess it. But we fancy that the stand you have made will in the future be looked back on by you as something of which to be proud—if that is not already the case. And nothing could really compensate for the sacrifice of one's sense of right.

G. E. WEBB.—You say, "If you keep on hammering away.....you will come out on top." We hope so. At any rate, we intend doing it whether we come out on top or go under. We note your neat comment on the "Mutual Admiration Society." It is all a matter of temperament. Some are born to fight, and others to be spectators.

A. BUTTON desires to thank all the writers in the Freethinker for the weekly treat he receives every Thursday. Thanks.

MR. B. SIGER.—We hope to keep on doing "nowt" else for a long time. Our best wishes to your son in Salonica.

G. L. B.—Very sorry to hear of your loss. We hope to have the pleasure of meeting you soon.

S. HEALING asks whether we could not induce our readers to make an effort to get the Freethinker into all public reading-rooms. We should be pleased to give any help we could to this effort, which is a desirable one.

A. SIMPSON.—The Athenæum is now a monthly, and can be ordered through any newsagent, price 1s.

J. BREESE.—We dealt with the article on "Religion at the Front" some time ago. We may recur to it again as opportunity offers.

B. DUNLOP.—Want of space compels; that is all.

J. EVANS.—Sorry we have not space to spare for a lengthy discussion as to the verisimilitude of Caradoc Evans' sketches of the Welsh peasantry. We can only say we have not seen their accuracy challenged, and Caradoc Evans asserts he is writing from personal observation. We must let the matter rest at that.

H. SILVERSTEIN writes that the word "live" in the quotation from Shelley on p. 26 of last week's Freethinker should be "rule." We are glad to find that the paper is read so carefully. The mistake was due to an error of transcription. "Rule" is obviously the correct word.

R. W. BLAKELY.—We don't quite see the point of your criticism.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Our Sustentation Fund.

LIST OF SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Previously acknowledged, £250 15s. 3d.—G. E. Webb, 10s. 6d.; Deneb, 7s. 6d.; E. Beardall, 2s.; W. Dunlop (Torquay), 5s.; Kepler, 2s. 6d.; J. Bryce, 8s.; F. C., 2s. 6d.; R. Ogden (3rd sub.), 2s. 6d.; Capt. J. Latham, £2 10s.; Mrs. Turnbull, 10s.; T. M. Mosley, 2s. 6d.; W. Mather (2nd sub.), 10s.; Harry Randell, 4s.; C. T. Simpson, £1 1s.; W. D. and R. (Portsmouth), 3s.; A. Button, 2s. 6d.; Mrs. B. Siger, 3s. G. L. B., 2s.; S. Healing, 2s.; R. L. M., £1; R. A. Downes, 10s. 6d.; Bonnie Dundee, 4s. 6d.; J. Pemberton, 3s.; J. Bryan, 5s.; C. Bridger, 2s.; F. Webb, 5s.; R. Viedge, £1 2s.; S. Hartley, 4s.; A. Little, 2s. 6d.; J. H. Gastrell, 10s.; Nelsonian, 2s. 6d.; A. Waymark, 2s. 6d.; Mrs. A. Knoll, 2s.; E. Oliver, £2 2s.; T. Dunbar, 2s.; D. Richards, 2s.; T. Chalmers, 5s.; S. E., 2s.; H. Black, 10s.; W. Shelley, 1s.; W. Pitt, 10s.; F. Smith, 2s. 6d. Per H. E. Anderson (Leicester): G. Sharman, 5s.; Gordon Tate, 1s.; W. Leeson, 5s.; S. Leeson, 5s.; H. E. Anderson, 2s. 6d.; F. J. Smith, 2s.; E. Pinder, 5s.; W. H. Scott, 5s.; W. Wilber, 1s.; S. Woolley, 2s. 6d.; W. H. Woolley, 1s.; M. F. Frear, £1 1s.; total, £2 16s. Per Miss Vance: H. P. K., 2s. 6d.; "A Friend" (Blackburn), 5s.; John Halliwell, sen., 1s.; "J. L. F. Aberdeen," 5s.; Mr. and Mrs. Cross, 5s. Total—£270 12s. 3d.

Sugar Plums.

Next week (Jan. 28) Mr. Cohen pays a visit to Swansea. It is the first time he has visited that town, but both this and Cardiff should prove profitable ground for propagandist work. South Wales is a most promising ground altogether. Perhaps this is because the older generation there was very religious, and the reaction has been greater than in other parts. At any rate and whatever the cause, it is our business to take advantage of favourable conditions when they present themselves.

The Sustentation Fund has realised £270 12s. 3d., and we take this opportunity of thanking all those who have so generously contributed to this result. We have been greatly encouraged by so prompt a response, accompanied, as most of the subscriptions were, by warm letters of appreciation for what we have done. We have had so many of these during the past week, that we can only take this method of saying how deeply we appreciate them. As we now stand, the whole of last year's loss—entirely due to the excessive cost of paper—has been cleared, with more than enough over to meet the deficit to date. There will be some months of the year to face, but we dare say we shall manage somehow. Without doubt had we adopted the suggestion of many, and kept the Fund open until the War ceased, we could have cleared the loss, week by week, but we think the plan we have adopted the better one. There are always some who will not send until closing day, and others who wait until the day after. But to ask for money is the worst—perhaps the only distasteful part of our work, and we are very pleased to cease from this for awhile. So, once more, we thank those who have helped. We also thank those who would have helped had circumstances permitted, and we shall not be misunderstood if we say the sooner we can get along without this kind of help the better we shall like it.

Please note that we have said this kind of help. Other help a paper like the Freethinker will always need. We always need the help of our readers in securing new subscribers to the paper. That help has enabled us to weather as well as we have done one of the worst periods in the history of the Freethinker. This journal remains one of the few in Great Britain that has remained practically unchanged during the war, while scores have ceased to make their appearance. That is a result of which we feel very proud, and it has been accomplished because so many have worked so hard and so effectively in securing new readers. May we ask, therefore, for a continuance of their help in this direction. We will send specimen copies when names and addresses are forwarded, or posters to newsagents who will display them. The more readers we can get the better —better to enable us to meet the expenses that must be met somehow, and better also for the great cause which the Freethinker exists to serve.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Cohen had two fine meetings on Sunday last at Nottingham. In the afternoon the hall was packed to the doors, and in the evening the place was well filled, despite the dark night and a snowstorm. No speaker could have wished for a more attentive or a more critical audience. There was quite a rush of people anxious to join in the discussion, and as many as a liberal extension of the time would allow were accommodated. And there were many requests for Mr. Cohen to pay Nottingham another visit.

We are rather sanguine as to the results of these meetings. Some very likely gentlemen expressed their willingness to co-operate in forming and helping a Branch of the N. S. S. in Nottingham, and, for the time being at least, Mr. T. Mosley, of 3 Carnarvon Grove, Gedling, has consented to act as secretary. We should be obliged if those who are willing to co-operate in any way will write Mr. Mosley without delay. There is nothing like striking while the iron is hot, There are hundreds of Freethinkers in Nottingham, we know. And they should get to work at once.

Mr. Lloyd was caught, like ourselves, in a snowstorm at Leicester on Sunday, but we are glad to learn that he had a good and a pleasant meeting in spite of the weather. We have no details to hand, so cannot say more.

The South London Branch re-opened its meetings on Sunday last with a lecture from Mr. P. S. Wilde, on the "Antiquity of Man." To-day (Jan. 21) Mr. A. D. Howell-Smith lectures on "Evil, evolution, and God." The meetings commence at 7 o'clock, and admission is free, with a few reserved seats at 6d. South London friends will please notice.

Mr. Harry Snell will deliver a course of lectures at the Emerson Club, 19 Buckingham Street, Strand, on Tuesday evenings, commencing January 23. The titles of the lectures are: "Modern Civilization in the Melting-Pot," "Religion and the Reformation of 1517," "Four Centuries of Religious Progress," and "The New Reformation; the Principles of a Universal Religion." We should have thought the world had had enough of religions—universal and otherwise; but if people are hankering after that sort of thing, we feel sure Mr. Snell will provide them with as good a one as can be found. The lectures will commence at 6.15, and admission to a single lecture is one shilling. A ticket for the four can be obtained for 2s. 6d.

A discussion on "Why I am Interested in Politics" (from a Mother's Point of View) will be opened by Mrs. Drake, of the Woman's Suffrage Association, at the Victoria Reform Club, 15, Victoria Road, Kentish Town Road, to-day (Jan. 21) at 7.30. These meetings are held under the auspices of the North London Branch of the N.S.S., and we hope that Freethinkers in the locality will do their best to make them a success.

"Free Will."

II.

(Concluded from p. 27.)

YET another example. A man is starving; he has been three days without food. He passes a stall on which some savoury and hot pies are exposed. He begs one from the proprietor, who refuses in scorn, adding an insult relative to "work-shys" as he turns away and enters his adjoining shop. The famished beggar gazes on the longed-for food and, with a last remnant of "respectability," turns, too, away. His tattered boot, with projecting rusty leather, strikes the trestle. The board falls, and he falls. A pie, still steaming, rolls within an inch of his face as he lies full length on the ground. He inhales the aroma, and he is starving. Does he desire to eat? No one doubts it. Does he will to eat? Then he will snatch at the food and soften the pangs of hunger. Does he will to be honest? Then he will refrain. Different readers will reply differently, but two alternatives of action alone present themselves. These, again, sub-divide into four, according to the definition chosen.

1. Will, including mental attitude, plus activity mentally pictured.
   - (a) He steals a pie.
   - (b) He crawls away unfed.
2. Will, signifying mental attitude only.
   - (a) He steals a pie.
   - (b) He crawls away unfed.

Now let us deal analytically with all four cases.

1 (a) He steals a pie.

That is he wills to eat, and eats. Or, more consistently with definition temporarily accepted, his mental attitude is decision to eat, and he actually does eat. Incidentally, his mental attitude is decision to steal, and he actually does steal. But hunger precedes both mental attitude and subsequent act. Hunger, the overwhelming and agonizing incentive, controls both. Thus the "will" is controlled, hence not free. Again, suppose his mental attitude were decision to eat; and the subsequent act to crawl away unfed. Then we have (a^1) a flagrant departure from the definition, for the mental attitude is not followed by act pictured in that attitude; (a^2) and we have an act consciously performed, either unwilled or contrary to the mental attitude preceding it. That is, (a^1) is not susceptible of discussion under heading 1 at all, for it opposes the definition postulated, and (a^2) both violates the same definition, or comes under the class of conscious involuntary acts, i.e., like the live-blood twitching of the eyelids occasionally, or the spasmodic knotting of certain muscles in the leg, an uncanny pathological condition most people are familiar with. If will, of any kind conceivable, can be predicated of these, and freedom tacked on in addition, our opponents are welcome to the position. To us it appears too absurd to seek words with which to oppose it.

1 (b) He crawls away unfed.

That is his mental attitude—is decision to remain honest, and the act to crawl away, and sustain the attitude. Very well, but they both follow from the previous honesty in the man's training. They both result from earlier and repeated introspective views and conclusions as to the great ethical value of probity. Hence these past thoughts imprinted and retained mentally, control this example of will, and, again, what is controlled is not free. We need not consider here that he might (b^1) in mental attitude decide to be dishonest, and in act crawl away. All the strictures applied to cases (a^1) and (a^2) equally fit (b^1) and (b^2) decision to eat, and then a crawling away. Thus we have now class 2 only.

2. Will signifying mental attitude only, irrespective of what follows actually.

A. He steals a pie.

A^1. He willed it. A 2. He did not.

A 1. The willing followed the hunger; result as before, will controlled, not free.

A 2. He willed to be honest, and then stole. The will, as before, follows the bent and training, hence it is not free, and then conscious involuntary act follows, and absurdity as exposed above, again apparent.

Digitized by Google

2. (b) He crawls away unfed.

(b) 1. He wills to be honest, and act following is in agreement. But the latter is unimportant on the postulated definition of this group 2, the will being the mental act. Adnauseum we have shown why he wills to be honest.

B 2. He wills to be diskonest and crawls away, unfed and honest.

Hunger controls the mental attitude, and the act leads us to the old absurdity.

Let us now gather all the loose ends of the argument and endeavour to plait or weave them into a coherent strand.

We assert with conviction, and we hope without undue dogmatism, the following theses.

1. Will is a mental attitude, which consists of two stages.
   (a) Intense desire, culminating in (b) Decision.
   (c) Will, as such, is independent of any act except a possible other mental attitude which may follow.
2. The physical act pictured in "will" follows the will accurately in the vast majority of cases. Nevertheless, the reverse or another physical act may occur.
3. No voluntary and conscious act can occur which opposes the will preceding it.
4. Physical acts which occur consciously and involuntarily prove nothing as to the freedom or captivity of the will. They are totally unconnected with it.
5. The will is always, and consistently, determined or controlled or impelled by one or more (usually myriads) of factors in thought or sensation which preceded it. It, the will, is never, in any circumstances nor in any conceivable manner, free.

The basic belief of most religions is in an all-beneficent Deity. Now, it would soon become apparent to even the lay mind that all-goodness could neither create nor permit evil; that evil could not exist in the work of such a deity and be due to that deity. The clergy, keen to anticipate any possible objection to their teaching; the clergy who have ever armed the fortress with all weapons possible, before risking attack unprepared, naturally saw the possibility of a raid still earlier. Evil exists. Poverty, death, injustice, cruelty, squalor, pain, sorrow, exist. They are as apparent to boor as to bishop. Beneficent omnipotence created all things they taught, but they dared not attribute the evil to the same source. The glaring contradiction was too vivid even for stultified and chloroformed believers. The evil must be accounted for, and the deity thereby exonerated. Obviously, the easiest method is to blame man himself. Teach us that man can do right when and if he wills, because will is free, and the thing is done. Man becomes the source of all evil, and Sin conveniently covers the whole ghastly connotation of it. Thus Free Will which masquerades as an added dignity to the attributes of men, is no more than a mean subterfuge to whitewash the deeds of a naughty God. It is immaterial to us that few, if any, of the Sable Herd in all denominations really believe this doctrine. The point is, they tell us to do so. Nay, more, they must counter one stupidity by another, or their credit with the masses, already not a little on the wane, were well nigh vanished altogether. Lest it might seem that we hint, and by innuendo oppose that which we dare not expose, we may state that the first stupidity referred to is a beneficent deity or any deity whatsoever, and the other is the moribund doctrine of Free Will.

In a word, then, Free Will in man was the inevitable invention to follow the earlier one of all-beneficent deity.

Hence we are prepared to find that the more orthodox the form of religion accepted, the more strenuous the loyalty to the false notion "Free Will."

For the priest, irrespective of which particular religion he upholds, Free Will serves to buttress a bias. It contributes to the support of a vested interest.

One can imagine a Peer-brewer waxing eloquent over the cases where alcohol has prolonged life. And were the said noble follower of "spirit" the poorer for every drink taken, even a prohibitionist might listen to the tale. But when we see that exactly as in the case of the devotee of another "Spirit" the stronger the pleas, the longer the lease, we may be pardoned for doubting, and forgiven for examining the case critically and independently.

That the masses of the people accept Free Will is plainly to be found in this. They are told that its absence would reduce man to a machine—an automaton—and degrade him even in his own eyes. Vanity, sometimes exorbitant, is a human quality. To learn from childhood, for a thousand generations, that man is himself a potential god, made in the image of his transcendant creator, with a Free Will, able to gradually climb to dazzling heights of beatitude in a future life of eternal glory, is not a picture so devoid of flattery as to be easily cast aside as idle babblement. The mental bravery, the unflinching heroism which can receive the news as "glad tidings" (because it is true), that man is a risen beast, with a will fettered and controlled and determined by environment and heredity, with a termination to his individual consciousness, exactly parallel with that of a mosquito, or a hippopotamus, with nearest surviving blood relatives among the tailless anthropoid apes; that heroism is to be found solely among men who prostrate themselves before one idol only—Truth. For these we make no apology, for these we crave no indulgence. Their glory is indeed eternal, for it is an heirloom which passes along from generation to generation, from the present to the future. It can never fade nor fail, neither shall it wear away nor pass into darkness nor death.

JERL. NIRRA.

Critical Chat.

THE GRIEVANCES OF SIR GEORGE GREENWOOD.

THOSE of my readers who have not had the misfortune to forsake literature for Freethought will remember that some while ago I drew attention to a promising quarrel between Mr. J. M. Robertson and Sir George Greenwood. As I remarked at the time, a number of unsportsmanlike conscientious objectors got at the editor of the Literary Guide, and persuaded, or forced, him to stop the fight, presumably in the name of ethics, the higher humanism, or some other dismal abstraction. That, at any rate, is the impression I received; but it may be that he needed more space for the abuse of the German nation in general. Those of us who were beginning to get a little tired of vague international indictments expected to find a pleasant relief in the more definite, if not more refined, art of literary invective. As I said above, this interesting display of the art of controversial amenity was stopped just when it was promising to become exciting. Mr. Robertson and Sir George would have made short and sanguinary work of each other's reputation, and the reader who knew nothing of their books would have gone away thinking there was not much to choose between them.

Here, if Sir George Greenwood had been wise, he would have let the matter drop. But he appears to have found Mr. Robertson's implied and direct abuse too galling, especially—and here he has my sympathy—the irritating harping upon an imaginary pathological cause for some more or less trivial error in statement or deduction. He has just printed with Messrs. Watts & Co. his part in the controversy, and calls his pamphlet Shakespeare's Law and Latin. I recommend anyone who admires Mr. Robertson's literary criticism to spend two shillings on this pamphlet. It will be all to the good if he takes the trouble to look carefully into the Shakespeare studies of Sir George Greenwood. He will then, I imagine, have no doubt as to which writer has more of the real spirit of scholarship and literary humanism.

Digitized by Google

The brochure is not, as one would expect from the title, a discussion of Shakespeare's legal and classical knowledge, but rather an attempt to show that Mr. Robertson has little Latin, and even less law. For my part, I do not profess to be very much shocked by these revelations. Mr. Robertson has quite enough learning for the matter he has in hand, the discrediting of the Baconians and their allies. It is to be regretted that he went astray in his discussion of certain legal phrases in the plays. Evidently he had only the vaguest notion of what was meant by "fine and recovery" in Merry Wives of Windsor (Act iv., sc. ii., 219, etc.). A candid confession of his ignorance would have made a better impression. The same criticism applies to his refusál to recognize any special legal sense of the word "purchase," which implies a "contrast between acquisition by such means as are recognized by law as purchase, and acquisition by inheritance." The passages in Henry IV., pt. ii., and in Antony and Cleopatra, where the word occurs, are meaningless if this distinction is not borne in mind. Mr. Robertson seems to have misunderstood a few other legal expressions with which, as a critic of Shakespeare's knowledge of law, he ought to have been familiar. But, after all, I don't imagine that his errors amount to very much. I have among my friends two or three barristers who are also students of the Elizabethan drama, and they dismiss the legal part of Sir George Greenwood's theory with amused contempt.

For the support of this heretical theory that the plays were not written by the young man who came to London to make a living, who had only his genius to recommend him, but by a highly educated man, presumably of the same name, it is necessary to show that he had more than the ordinary classical culture of the average gentleman. Why it should be necessary to prove he was also a lawyer, I cannot understand. The frequent occurrence of legal expressions in the plays would rather tend to show that he was not a lawyer; and, on the other hand, their comparative absence in the work of Francis Beaumont would, I suppose, prove that he was no lawyer, if we had no direct evidence that he was "of the craft." It seems to me that the theory is a kind of half-way house to the Baconian heresy—if I may say so, a feather bed for a falling Shakespearean; and I should never be surprised to hear that Sir George had embraced the simple and edifying doctrine that Bacon wrote every work of any literary importance in his period. Mr Robertson, in spite of his error, is really on the side of critical sanity, and, what is more, he has the support of a learned lawyer like Mr. A. Underhill, who writes that the dramatist's knowledge of the law was neither profound nor accurate.

Another point which Sir George Greenwood tries to make against the Stratford Shakespeare is to prove that the writer of the plays was a classical scholar with a good deal of Latin and not a little Greek. This is a theory usually associated with the name of Churton Collins, a man who did more to encourage a dislike of English literature than a dozen University Extension Lectures. A friend of mind who had the misfortune to attend his lectures at Scoones' tells me that his overestimation of Shakespeare was only an insidious form of depreciation. In any case, his attempt to trace the Greek and Latin poets everywhere in the plays is a performance that comes but little short of farce. Nothing could be less Greek in spirit than the Shakespearean stage, it would have been no different in spirit and in form if the dramatist had never read a line of North's version of Plutarch. It would seem that Collins and the Baconians are responsible for Sir George Greenwood's heresy.

Mr. Robertson is told that he is not a classical scholar, and that any pronouncement on Shakespeare acquirements must be left to scholars. But scholars show no anxiety to take up the task; they leave it to a man like Collins, whose only qualification was a prodigious memory. The balanced scholar, ignoring the question as frivolous, is contented to leave it to Sir George and the Baconians. Mr. A. C. Bradley, whose scholarship will satisfy even the most exacting critics, nowhere suggests Shakespeare's indebtedness to the Greek dramatists, and has no word to say of any classical culture. "Shakespeare," says Sir Walter Raleigh, wittily, "is a live man; he is sometimes wrongly judged by slower wits to be a learned man." We notice that both of them agree with Mr. Robertson, who has no classical scholarship. But as we can see in the case of Churton Collins, and no doubt in that of Sir George Greenwood, a long training in Greek and Latin is no guarantee of sane scholarship; it depends largely on the spirit. Mr. Robertson undoubtedly went astray; he was wrong in saying that a good classical scholar would not scan the word "Academe" as Shakespeare does in Love's Labour Lost. A few more errors are noticed, and they serve to show that Mr. Robertson is not always as accurate as he might be; but in all candour, and while sympathizing with Sir George in his state of critical soreness, I can hardly think that he has damaged Mr. Robertson's reputation, which rests upon a fairly solid and broad foundation.

Indeed, by some of his censures, implied and direct, Sir George stands to lose his own reputation with an ingenuous reader who is inclined to have an interest in the matter discussed. When it is claimed that, while Mr. Robertson is an acknowledged authority in the history of Freethought and in some branches of economics, we must not assume that his studies in Shakespearean criticism are equally authoritative, the implied censure will have weight only for those who have no acquaintance with Mr. Robertson's work. Let us assume that the ingenuous reader begins with Sir George Greenwood's books. He will find some amusing criticism of the orthodox belief in the three or four books; he will reject emphatically the Greenwood Theory as insubstantial, as raising more difficulties than it explains—in fact, as a mere academic amusement a lawyer for whom politics is not a very strenuous occupation. He will then turn to Mr. Robertson's books In Montaigne and Shakespeare he will find one of the most shapely pieces of Shakespeare-criticism of modern times. Many a man has obtained a University fellowship for work of not a tenth its value. He will find in Did Shakespeare Write Titus Andronicus? not only a study of that play, but also an elaborate investigation into the authorship of the body of anonymous drama vaguely associated with Greene, Peele, Kyd, and Marlowe. Only those who have worked in that chaotic period of the early drama can really appreciate the immense value of Mr. Robertson's work. He will find some scattered essays on Hamlet, notably an early one on the Upshot of Hamlet (1885), by far the most illuminating criticism of that perplexing drama. If the Baconian Heresy is less satisfactory, it may be accounted for by its hasty passage through the press. Finally, I am afraid that our ingenuous literary Freethinker will have no very high opinion of Sir George Greenwood's pamphlet when he reads it again, and this time in the light of his new knowledge.

Digitized by Google

GEO. UNDERWOOD.

A Modern Bishop's Move.

"TOSH," muttered Bishop Bloom irritably, as he twisted his latch-key in the massive fumed-oak door of the vicarage and banged into the dimly lighted hall. "Once more I venture to remark—tosh! What's the world coming to?" He threw his soft, black hat upon the hall stand and removed his overcoat, which he flung irritably over a chair, then, with much inaudible muttering, he marched into his study and switched on the electric light. The study was in a condition of chaos; books, magazines, copies of the Heavenly Hooter and Bishop's Bathos littered the floor in profusion. Bishop Bloom walked over to his armchair, lit the gas-fire, and sat down with a sigh. For over a minute he sat tapping his knee nervously with his fingers and rolling his eyes anxiously. "So it has come at last," he muttered in a low voice. "At last. Who could have foreseen it?" The thought agitated him so much that he rose suddenly from his armchair and paced quickly up and down the room with his hands clasped tightly behind his back. He visualized the immediate future—he saw quite clearly the position he was in—how hopeless the situation was. There seemed to be no way out; he frowned heavily. "I must act at once," he muttered, with emotion. "At once. This Woman in the Pulpit business is not only monstrous, but dangerous. Not only blasphemous, but calculated to take the very bread out of my mouth. I must think of something immediately." He sank into his armchair again and produced a notebook. He scribbled a few words absently; and then, a smile spreading over his previously gloomy countenance, he chuckled aloud. "I have it," he exclaimed with enthusiasm, springing from his chair and running his fingers through his hair rapidly. "The very thing. I must wire to Monsieur Clarkson at once. A splendid idea. The only way out. No one will detect—it is my only hope." He seized a telephone directory and raced through the pages until he discovered the number he wanted, then, placing the directory back upon the table, he raised the receiver and shouted a number. "Hello, hello! Is that Clarkson. Yes, Clarkson—it is, ah!—well, its me—er Mr.—er Mr. Dorgcollar. Yes, in fact—well I—er—want a complete female rig-out—hair—yes, I mean a wig—and, er—ah! you know. Splendid! Send it at once. Thanks so much. Yes, dark hair, of course. Splendid! Thanks! As soon as possible. Good-bye." Bishop Bloom replaced the receiver and staggered towards the armchair, where he sat with closed eyes. His breathing was slow and irregular, large drops of perspiration hung upon his brow, and he trembled in every limb. Then, with the electric light on and the gas-fire burning, he fell asleep.

* * * *

A week later, in the Heavenly Hooter, a special leading article, in extra large type, appeared on the front page. It read as follows:—

"No longer can we be said to place any reliance whatever in old bottles. Our new wine must have new bottles. We have been accused by many modern satirists and social reformers of a lack of, shall we say, scientific perception and moral courage in not supporting revolutionary ideas. But, to-day, this charge of apathy cannot be reasonably lodged against us. Our tentative attitude towards change has itself undergone a change! Our pre-war narrowness of vision, our lack of sympathy with the great working-class movement, our persistent ignoring of all the vital issues of the age, all these things have vanished, we have been, indeed, 'born again.' The point at issue is the new movement in the Church against women preachers. Well, we here and now state our attitude, fearlessly and without bias or party cant. We believe in this new idea. We believe that female bishops and women clergymen (or should we say clergy-women) have come to stay. Furthermore, that it is the duty of every sane Christian journal to help forward this great movement for the benefit of humanity. No one who had the pleasure last Sunday of hearing Mrs. Blossom preach at St. Margaret's, will deny that women can preach. In fact, we will go so far as to say that Mrs. Blossom possesses qualities which very many clergymen we are afraid do not possess. One thing in particular was very noticeable: her remarkably strong voice, her dominating personality, masculine in its power, her short vivid sentences, her masterly gestures, and freedom from narrowness. In fact, everything was as it should be. The sermon itself was splendid. No bishop, with the exception, perhaps, of Bishop Bloom, ever preached a better. We take this opportunity of urging our readers to hear Mrs. Blossom as soon as they can."

STOP PRESS.

A sensational event has just been reported from the Central News. Bishop Bloom, whose work is so well-known to readers of Bishop's Bathos, has suddenly disappeared and no trace of him can be found. Whether the reverend gentleman has joined the Army as a private, we cannot say; but it is exactly the modest sort of thing he would do, avoiding all ostentation, show, or vulgar advertisement. Let us hope so.

ARTHUR F. THORN.

Correspondence.

ATTACK ON DEMOCRACY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—More signs are appearing that something is being prepared behind the scenes for an attempt to use the position caused by the War to filch from the British people the representative method of Government.

In the Freethinker of December 31, I had occasion to deal with this matter in regard to a weekly journal under the title of "Bogus Lessons of History," I now find the particularly respectable daily, the Morning Post, has taken up the question, and in an article discussing the coming Imperial Conference, it says, "If the War be used as a test of efficiency, the Democratic form of Government does not come out very well." This is a beautiful expression for a supporter of the Law and Order Party and the mouthpiece of the so-called Constitutional clubs. It is not only a piece of unmitigated inaccuracy, but it is also calculated to upset the good relations between this country and its Republican Allies, France and Portugal, to say nothing of the United States.

We are pleased to find that the Star has joined us in denouncing this move of the "hidden hand." In a leader of January 3 it says ".....what amuses us most of all is the cool assumption that the Democratic form of Government does not come out very well in war. We think it comes out very well. We are not afraid to back the French Republic and the British Democracy against the Russian Autocracy."

The Freethinker has always championed the free expression of opinion, at the same time exposing chicanery and lies, and therefore it denounces here and now this new movement, which can only be propagated with such disgraceful methods. Truth is great and will prevail, and such attempts as that referred to will end in ignominy and failure if the people are on their guard.

BON GRE

Digitized by Google

Where to Obtain the "Freethinker."

The following is not a complete list of newsagents who supply the "Freethinker," and we shall be obliged for other addresses for publication. The "Freethinker" may be obtained on order from any newsagent or railway bookstall.

London.

E.—E. T. Pendrill, 26 Bushfield Street, Bishopsgate, M. Papier, 86 Commercial Street. B. Ruderman. 71 Hanbury Street, Spitalfields J. Knight & Co., 3 Ripple Road, Barking. Messrs. Duncumb & Sons, 287 High Street, Stratford.

E.C.—W. S. Dexter, 6, Byward Street. Rose & Co., 133 Clerkenwell Road. Mr. Siveridge, 88 Fenchurch Street. J. J. Joques, 191 Old Street. Mr. Henderson, 66 Charing Cross Road.

N.—C. Walker & Son, 84 Grove Road, Holloway. Mr. Keogh, Seven Sisters Road (near Finsbury Park). Mr. West, New Road, Lower Edmonton. T. Perry, 17 Fore Street, Edmonton. H. Hampton, 80 Holloway Road. E. S. Smith, 7 Turnpike Lane, Hornsey.

N.W.—W. I. Tarbart, 316 Kentish Town Road. W. Lloyd, 5 Falkland Road, Kentish Town.

S.E.—J. H. Killick, 1 Tyler Street, East Greenwich. Mr. Clayton, High Street, Woodside, South Norwood. W. T. Andrews, 35 Meetinghouse Lane, Peckham. B. Dean, Southwark Bridge.

S.W.—R. Offer. 58 Kenyon Street, Fulham. A. Toleman, 54 Battersea Rise. A. Green, 29 Felsham Road, Putney. F. Locke, 500 Fulham Road. F. Lucas, 683 Fulham Road.

W.—Mr. Fox, 154 King Street, Hammersmith. Mr. Harvey, 1 Becklow Road, Shepherds Bush. Mr. Baker, Northfield Avenue, West Ealing. Thomas Dunbar, 82, Seaford Road, West Ealing.

W.C.—J. Bull, 24 Grays Inn Road.

Country.

Aberdeenshire.—J. Grieg, 16 Marischol Street, Peterhead.

Barrow-in-Furness.—J. Jowett, 56 Forshaw Street. E. L. Jowett, 84 Dalton Road.

Beccles.—C. Chase, Station Road.

Birkenhead.—Mr. Capper, Boundary Road, Port Sunlight.

Birmingham.—J. C. Aston, 39-40 Smallbrook Street. A. G. Beacon & Co., 67 & 68 Worcester Street. F. Holder, 42 Hurst Street. Mr. Benton, High Street, Erdington. Mr. Kimber, Ash Road Post Office, Saltley. W. H. Smith & Son, 34 Union Street. Messrs. Stanford & Mann, New Street.

Bolton.—E. Basnett, Church Street, Westhoughton. W. Atkinson, 364 Blackburn Road.

Brighton.—W. Hillman, 4 Little Western Street.

Bristol.—W. H. Smith a Son, Victoria Street.

Cardiff.—W. H. Smith & Son, Penarth Road.

Carshalton.—Mr. Simmons, 29 North Street.

Gateshead.—Henderson & Birkett, 4 & 5 Hills Street.

Cheltenham.—S. Norris, Ambrose Street.

Cullompton.—A. W. Clitsome, The Square.

Derbyshire.—Mr. Featherstone, Chapel-en-le-Firth.

Dublin.—Mr. Kearney, Upper Stephen Street.

Dundee.—Mr. Cunningham, St. Andrew's Street. "The Hub," High Street. Mr. Lamb, 121 Overgate.

Falkirk.—James Wilson, 76 Graham's Road.

Glasgow.—David Baxter, 32 Brunswick Street.

Gravesend.—Mrs. Troke, 10 Passock Street. Mr. Love, Gassick Street. Mr. Gould, Milton Road. Mr. Troke, Clarence Place.

Hastings.—King Bros., 2 Queen's Road.

Ipswich.—A. E. Hiskey, 1 Old Cattle Market. T. Shelbourne, St. Matthew Street. Mr. Fox, Fore Street. Mr. Fox, St. Helen's Street. Mr. Roberson, Back Hamlet. Mr. Joyce, Fore Street.

Jarrow.—L. Prescod, Railway Street.

Kent.—E. J. Voss, 148 Broadway, Bexley Heath.

Lancashire.—John Turner, Scourbottom, Waterford. W. Restall, Station Bridge, Urmston. J. T. Middlehurst, 43 Water Lane, Preston.

Leeds.—C. H. Pickles, Ltd., 117 Albion Street. J. Bray, 95 Park Lane. J. Sutcliffe, West Street.

Liverpool.—S. Reeves, 316 Derby Road, Bootle. W. H. Smith and Son, 61 Dale Street.

Manchester.—Mrs. Tole, Whitelow Road, Chorlton-cum-Hardy. John Heywood, Ltd., Deansgate. Abel Heywood & Son, 47-61 Lever Street. W. H. Smith & Son, Blackfriars Street.

Monmouth.—Mr. Davies, Pontnewynidd. Wm. Morris, Windsor Road, Griffithstoon. Wyman & Son, Station Bookstall, Pontypool Road.

Neath.—W. G. Maybury, 57 Windsor Road.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—W. H. Smith & Son, 2 Forth Place.

Northampton.—Mr. Bates, Bridge Street. A. Bryan, Barracks Road.

Southend-on-Sea.—Harold Elliott, 1 Belle Vue Terrace.

Stockton-on-Tees.—Mr. Elgie, Bowesfield Lane.

Teddington.—H. H. Holwill, 105 High Street.

Torquay.—L. Priston, 103 Union Street. A. Priston, 47 Market Street. A. Peters, Old Mill Road, Chelston. Mr. Ronayne Walnut Road. H. Peters, 193 Union Street. W. J. Peters, 37 Union Street. Mr. Hunt, Lucius Street.

Yarmouth.—C. H. Knights, 87 & 88 Northgate Street. H. Bird, 19 Howard Street South. J. M. Headley, North Howard Street.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, off Kentish Town Road, N.W.): 7.30, Debate, "Why I am Interested in Politics" (from a Mother's point of view). Introduced by Mrs. Drake (Workers' Suffrage Federation).

SOUTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Avondale Hall, Landor Road, Clapham, S.W.): 7, A. D. Howell Smith, B.A., "Evil, Evolution, and God."

OUTDOOR.

HYDE PARK: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Kells and Dales, "The Worst Religion"; 6.30, Messrs. Beale and Saphin.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

LEICESTER (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate): 6.30, Mrs. H. Bredlaugh Bonner, "The Church and the Babe."

YOUNG LADY, 25, domesticated, desires position as Companion-Help with homely people in Midlands; town or country.—Apply MISS R. JONES, Berry Cottage, Denton, N'ants.

MSS. of every kind Promptly and Accurately Typed. 6d. 1,000 words. Copying, Duplicating. Translations —all languages.—C. R. PARRY, 43 Palatine Road, Stoke Newington, N.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

POST FREE THREE HALFPENCE.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
QUEEN ANNE'S CHAMBERS, WESTMINSTER, S.W.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

TEH PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

A

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

OF FREETHINKERS
OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY

J. M. WHEELER.

Price THREE SHILLINGS Net.
(Postage 6d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp. ...	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE PASSING OF JESUS. 24 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 58 pp.	,, 1d.		3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	3
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
COMING CIVILIZATION. 30 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp....	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Maugasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 32 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 32 pp.	Nett. ,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY, by Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. LEA.
In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
By E. A. ASHCROFT.
440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By CARVETH READ.
8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.
By D. B. HART, M.D.
Crown 8vo. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

THE THEORIES OF EVOLUTION.
By YVES DELAGE.
1912. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.
For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. MILL.
Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

HISTORY OF THE TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.
By C. D. COLLET.
Two vols., published at 7s. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By CHAPMAN COHEN.
Price 1s. net, postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By G. W. FOOTE.
First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net. postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. WHEELER.
Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:
CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:
MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all aws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 1,854

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 4 SUNDAY JANUARY 28, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
God Help Us!—The Editor	49
"Have Faith in God."—J. T. Lloyd	50
Chartered Libertines.—Mimnermus	51
A Sceptical Scientist and Saint.—T. F. Palmer	52
The Avenues of Time.—Robert Morcland	53
Chorus of Life.—Andrew Millar	54
Acid Drops	55
To Correspondents	57
Sugar Plums	57
The French Revolution.—Robert Arch	58
Paulatim Retrorsum.—Mathematicus	59
Christian Susceptibilities.—Ignotus	60
The Right to Affirm	61
Letters to the Editor—The Competition of the Future, 61; Was Napoleon a Freethinker?	61
Notice of Meetings	62
Books and Pamphlets	63

Views and Opinions.

God Help Us!

Two men were out in a small boat during a storm. They were only a little distance from the shore, but the chance of landing seemed small. It was, clearly, an occasion for prayer. "Oh, God," prayed one, "save our lives, and we promise"—— "Hold on," suddenly cried the other, "don't promise anything, we're ashore." The story puts the philosophy of "God help us" in a nutshell. It expresses both the occasion and the nature of the exclamation. No one invokes God while there is a good prospect of help elsewhere. No one trusts in Providence who can get credit elsewhere. No one drags in the name of God until human knowledge has reached its limits. "God help us!" is a synonym of helplessness. "God only knows!" is a synonym of ignorance. The will of God, said Spinoza, in a fine phrase, is the asylum of ignorance. No one has ever bettered that phrase, and no one ever will. It is the philosophy of religion in a nutshell. A really scientific study of religion can be no more than a commentary upon that generalization. From the dawn of human philosophy until to-day "God" has never been more than the phrase with which hopeless ignorance or despairing helplessness seeks to narcotize the consciousness of its own impotence.

* * *

God and Right.

For two and a half years the world has been at war, and during that time thousands of parsons—to say nothing of laymen—have been trying to explain God's part in the conflict. What has been the use of it all? Has it helped us to understand the cause of the outburst? Has it helped us to bring it to a close? Will it help us to prevent its recurrence? God will see to it, says one of these men of God, that in this world-conflict right will not be trampled under foot. What guarantee have we of that? Is right never trampled under foot? God, if there be a God, seems remarkably impartial in the distribution of his favours. In 1870 he helped the Germans to conquer the French. Later he helped the Agnostic Japanese to conquer the pious Russians. Then he helped the Mohammedan Turk to conquer the Christian Greek; and, by way of levelling up matters, he helped the Christian Balkan States to conquer the Turk. One cannot count with any certainty upon so variable a factor. And, surely, if there is one thing certain, it is that whoever wins the War, Right will have been trampled under foot. Every innocent man or woman or child who has suffered in this War is proof of that. If the Kaiser and his advisers, with everyone else responsible for the War—in every country, were all hung sky high, it would not alter that fact or diminish the force of that truth. Right is trampled under foot whenever and wherever wrong is done. We may prevent its recurrence, but we cannot undo it once it has occurred. And it is God's business—if there is a God—to see that it never does occur. A God who does not or cannot do this should abdicate, or hand over his functions to a more competent tribunal.

* * *

Why Should God Help?

Why should we, from even the Christian point of view, believe that God will help us? The troubles and difficulties of life—including the force of human passions—do not exist uncaused. Such as they are, such as the world is, they are God's creations; and why should we expect him to remove difficulties he has himself been at the trouble to provide? If God really intended helping us, he would have helped us much more effectively by doing so at the beginning. And to Deity this would have been such an easy task. A very slight difference in the make-up of the Kaiser—we select the Kaiser because he presents a clear case to British readers—just a little difference in the chemical constituents of his body and in the structure or quality of his nervous system, would have made him quite a different man—as great a lover of freedom and progress as, say, the Czar of Russia. And if God did not choose to so arrange things, why should we assume that he will now help us to alter them. If God does all things well, to ask him to alter them or to help us alter them is ridiculous. And if otherwise, the correction must come from man himself, even though he is magnanimous enough to give God credit for the change.

* * *

A Sham Belief.

Is there anyone who really believes that God does help? The clergy. They say so; but it is their business to say so. We may readily grant that God—or the belief in God—helps them; the comfortable positions secured by clerical mediocrities is evidence of that. But do even the clergy trust in God while help is to be obtained elsewhere? Looking at them generally, one quite fails to detect any difference between their behaviour and that of other people. If a parson is sick, he visits a doctor or a health resort. If he is in trouble, he appeals for sympathy or help as readily as other people. Strip him of his collar and coat, dress him in ordinary clothes, and you cannot distinguish the parson from the layman. And the layman is equally contemptuous of God's help. The lesson of experience tells on him with even greater force than it does on the parson, because he has no obvious self-interest to serve in ignoring its lessons. During the course of the absurd National Mission of Repentance and Hope, the standing complaint has been that the nation has forgotten God. But a God who did anything useful would not be forgotten. A God who can be overlooked is a God who deserves to be overlooked. Man's forgetfulness is the measure of our appreciation of his services.

Digitized by Google

* * *

Facts versus Theory.

How glibly the phrase, "The protecting providence of God," rolls off the lips of the average preacher. And what a bitter satire life presents to such a phrase! While we write, the papers are full of the accounts of a horrible disaster in a munition factory in the East of London. The death roll is incomplete, but it is large, and, says one of the reports, "one of the saddest features in the terrible calamity is the number of little children who have been killed or injured." The clergy have told us that in this War we are fighting God's fight; and this is the way God looks after his own. Men and women, boys and girls, were toiling at the work of making munitions, and in a moment they were blasted out of existence. And around the factory itself rows of houses are shattered and little children killed or crippled. What was "Providence" doing there? Religious papers have told us how God miraculously preserved crucifixes on the wayside in France and Belgium. Why could he not have paid a little attention to East London? A Scotch elder once excused himself from attending a harvest thanksgiving after a bad harvest on the plea that he did not wish to approach the Lord in a spirit of sarcasm. To prate of "Providence" and "God's help" in the face of the horrors of the past two years is more than sarcasm; it is an insult to human intelligence, an outrage on human decency.

* * *

God or Man?

Of course, it will be said that God had nothing to do with this explosion, or with any of the other disasters. And that we quite believe. It is not, after all, the Atheist who charges God with the responsibility for these things. It is the believer in God who, by his belief, makes him responsible. We agree that if a man applies a match to a barrel of powder he must expect certain consequences. That is precisely the Atheistic position. And the moral of that position—not disputed, be it noted, by the believer—is that, if you are doing anything in this world, it doesn't matter the value of a brass farthing whether you believe in a God or not. Natural forces operate with absolute impartiality, and the question of the existence of God may be set on one side as of no practical importance whatever. If there is no protecting Providence, human safety and human welfare resolves itself into a question of understanding, controlling, and applying natural forces in a sensible and beneficial manner. And if that be granted, religion may be dismissed once and for all as a gigantic imposture. Years ago Carlyle said, "God does nothing." By sheer force of facts religious philosophy is being driven to the same conclusion. God does nothing; that is the real inference from the whole of human experience. Civilization is the work of man, not of God; and not a small part of our task is to relieve the human mind of the incubus of a belief that rests on no other and no better foundation than the fear-stricken fancies of primitive man.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

"Have Faith in God."

THAT is the British Weekly's motto for the New Year, and the leading article for January 4 is a sermonic exposition of it. To see the absurdity of such a motto we only need to set it in its original context:—

> Have faith in God. Verily I say unto you, whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou taken up and cast into the sea; and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that what he saith cometh to pass; he shall have it. Therefore I say unto you, All things whatsoever ye pray and ask for, believe that ye have received them, and ye shall have them (Mark xi. 22—25).

Everybody who thinks knows that those words are not true. No prayer addressed to a god has ever been answered by him. This is an obvious truism that cannot be too often repeated. As a matter of fact, nobody believes that the Gospel Jesus himself expected his words to be taken seriously, nor have they been so taken by any sensible people. And yet the editor of the British Weekly counsels his readers to take the clause, "Have faith in God," as their motto during the present year. Sir William Robertson Nicoll is simply mistaken when he says that what Britain needs more than anything else is God, and most certainly the British people, as such, do not feel their need of him. Sir William assures us that "he governs all things in heaven and in earth," and that he keeps his servants "as the apple of his eye," folding them "under the shadow of his wings," and guiding them "with his counsel," in which case he affords them no occasion to feel their need of him. The reverend knight pretends to "set forth the presence and the action of the living God, who is the master and not the slave of Nature," but the task is too difficult for him. He can do nothing but multiply assertions, not one of which is susceptible of demonstration. He does not know that Nature has a master who "governs, interferes, and answers prayer." When has Nature been interfered with, and what evidence is there that prayer has ever been answered? It is easy enough to assert that not a sparrow falls to the ground without the Father in heaven, that "not one dies in the shock of battle but God knows it and marks it," and that "the very hairs of our head are all numbered"; but such assertions are incapable of verification. All that can be proved is that sparrows fall, often most cruelly, and that men and women die, whether in the shock of battle or in quiet homes. Equally easy is it for any believer to assert that he can see the hand of God in the ordering of his life from day to day; but this assertion, also, lies beyond the sphere of substantiation. Seemingly, a religious man credits himself with nothing; all that is good in him being of God, and all that is bad, of the Devil—he being but a machine which they run in turns.

Sir William is also able to see the hand of God in history. It was by the hand of God that Napoleon was vanquished and American slavery abolished; but was it by the hand of Satan that Napoleon was raised and slavery established? But the editor of the British Weekly has already declared that God "governs all things in heaven and in earth," a statement which shuts the Devil out completely. He is aware, however, that all is not well with that declaration, and so he adds:—

> And yet we do not walk by sight. We walk by faith, and are often unable to see why such things as happen should be. But the elemental convictions are more certain than the surface and transitory appearances of the world, and the heart is anchored deep in them.

Digitized by Google

> Whether we succeed or fail for the time, still Jesus says to us, "Have faith in God."

We are profoundly convinced that if we study history impartially we shall be forced to the conclusion that faith in God entirely lacks justification. Even the history of the Church, the very temple of the Holy Ghost, reflects no credit on its Divine Head.

Yes, Sir Robertson Nicoll is fully conscious of the essential weakness of his argument; and it is marvellous with what naivette he gives his case away:—

> Does the Providence of God make it certain that the right must always win? The answer is, Yes, if we hold fast to the truth of another life. We may be defeated in this world, and to all appearances utterly defeated. Even that must not shake our faith. "Have faith in God" is still the message for times when everything seems to go against us, and the cause of righteousness apparently grows weaker every hour. The Christian must never say less than this, "Though he slay me yet will I trust in him."

It is admitted that in this world the right does not always win, and we ourselves may be utterly defeated. In this world the cause of righteousness is not always triumphant.

> The annals of the world are full of darkness and confusion. There are crushing misfortunes that befall the righteous. Many a good cause has been overborne for a long season. Truth is on the scaffold and falsehood is on the throne.

Does Sir William really think that the world could be in such a woeful condition if an infinitely powerful and good God "governed all things in heaven and in earth"? All he says is that "the plan of our commander is not known to us." Surely, had there been a Commander, his plan would have been known to us long ago. The God in whom we are exhorted to have faith "gave Christ for the redemption of the world" two thousand years ago, and to-day the world is full of darkness and confusion and crushing misfortunes, and there is no certainty that the right shall ever be wholly victorious in it. Even a minister of the Gospel like Sir Robertson Nicoll can find no satisfaction, no light, no explanation except in the belief that there is another life. But even if there is another life, what is there to show that all things will be set right in it?

The curious thing is that, amid the welter and confusion so prevalent in the world, we are calmly told that even during the present brutal War in Europe "God has been working his own ends," and that "in his hands is the power of life and death." If this is true, he is directly responsible for the War and for all the unspeakable atrocities that have characterized it. Indeed, Sir William throws out the suggestion that to believers in God "it may be a privilege to live through a time like this," and an agony only to the unbeliever. "If we have faith in God it is well. It will be well with us even if we do not live to see the victory on earth." What the ends are at which God is working just now we are not informed, nor do we understand the prediction that "he will vindicate those who in a day of travail and blasphemy have taken him at his word." When has he spoken and what has he said? Thousands upon thousands in this land of ours have never heard his voice, neither have they ever had any ground on which to believe that he even exists at all; and to them the War only affords an additional evidence that the belief in him is one of the many illusions and delusions which have come down to us from the ignorance and stupidity of the past. All the words of which we have any knowledge are of human origin and character, and man is the highest living being of whom there is any trace.

The editor of the British Weekly is not ignorant of the fact that the conceptions of God are innumerable, and that scarcely any two of them are alike. In all ages his so-called servants have been disputing and wrangling concerning him, and putting one another to death because they could not agree in their descriptions of him. Having carefully considered the British Weekly's teaching on the subject, the only conclusion to which we can come is that its God is not deserving of our faith because of his utter silence and inactivity. Were it true that he "governed all things in heaven and in earth," to dethrone him would be the most benevolent act that could be performed. Such government would be a disgrace of the highest order to a super-human potentate.

J. T. LLOYD.

Chartered Libertines.

> Hebrew mythology contains things which are both insulting and injurious.—J. A. Froude.
>
> The "Zolaism" of the Bible is far more pernicious than the "Zolaism" of fiction.—G. W. Foote.

THE clergy are past masters at stifling or circumventing any movement likely to prove dangerous to them. The original Sunday-schools were initiated by laymen with the sole idea of imparting real education to children on the one day of the week on which, in the time prior to the passing of the Factory Acts, they were free to receive it. Nowadays, Sunday-schools are not concerned with other than purely theological instruction, and the average Sunday-school teacher cares as much for real education as a pigeon cares for hydrostatics.

Similarly, the clergy circumvented the great Public Library movement, which was intended to place knowledge within reach of the people. They have always had enormous influence on the local committees of the public libraries, and their one aim has been to render such institutions, from their point of view, entirely innocuous. So long as the shelves of these libraries were stocked with the books of Messrs. Charles Garvice and the Brothers Hocking, Miss Marie Corelli, and other purveyors of sentimental pap for intellectual infants, they were content. The instant any attempt was made to place before the reading public works which made for sanity or ordered thought, they at once displayed their hostility. The boycott was introduced, and the modern index expurgatories contains the name of practically every author who is worth reading from Bernard Shaw to Swinburne. Even popular novelists have not escaped, and Hall Caine has suffered in the company of H. G. Wells.

The latest clerical move is quite as astute as those already noted. Some clerical members of the recent Conference of Headmasters have issued a warning to the parents of schoolboys, in which they call attention to the danger of books, magazines, and plays, which verge upon indecency. "We venture to do so," say the headmasters, "because we have special opportunities of observing the actual effect upon boys and young men of suggestions so conveyed to which we feel bound to bear witness." And they add, "too little care is exercised to exclude them from the lives of the young."

To read such allusion to the books, magazines, and plays of the day, as if many of them were a noisome danger to society, is not pleasant. When such insults come from priests and their satellites, who thrust the open Bible into the hands of innocent childhood, one's sense of justice is outraged. For there are things in the sacred volume which are calculated to bring the blush of modesty on any face except that of a priest. Raw, naked filth, which cannot be read aloud to a mixed congregation, is forced compulsorily into the hands of every child; but masters of literature, who would present their puppets as sentient beings, must emasculate and etherealize them until they are the merest shadows of men and women, swayed by motives and temptations that would be held blameless by the Rev. Mr. Stiggins and gain approval of Mr. Pecksniff himself. Clergymen attach such loose meanings to the words they fling about so recklessly, but how such men can read the account of Ezekiel's banquet, or the story of Onan, and the adventures of Lot, without remark, and point the finger of scorn at modern novelists and playwrights is inexplicable, except on the hypothesis that they are insincere.

Digitized by Google

If the novels, plays, and magazines of the day are likely to corrupt the morals of the rising generation, what, in the name of common sense, is the Old Testament calculated to do? There may be found plain, unvarnished accounts of rape, adultery, and unnatural vice, written with all the nasty particularity and love of detail, which is the peculiar birthright of all Eastern writers. The florid, heated rhetoric of "The Song of Solomon" leaves nothing to the imagination, and the least lettered reader can appreciate the glowing periods. In fact, Oriental nastiness begins where Occidental pornography leaves off.

The overt action of the clerical headmasters is unnecessary. If they had any real reason for safeguarding the interests of the young, they would see at once, that, if an ordinary novel or a play will corrupt a young boy, the Bible will corrupt a regiment. No novelist or playwright would dare to fill his pages with detailed accounts of incest, rape, and unmentionable crimes. He would be imprisoned, and his books destroyed. Yet the clergy force the Bible, which contains all these things, into the hands of every child. We do not believe in bowdlerizing books, but if ever there were any occasion for such drastic treatment it certainly should be directed against the Bible. Unfortunately, if all the objectionable passages were deleted, "God's Holy Word" would be so reduced as to be unrecognisable. Instead of prating of indecent literature, let the clergy set an example. Let them cease to force into the innocent hands of little children a volume which they dare no longer read aloud in its completeness to a mixed audience of adults. Until they consent to do this they merit the title of "Chartered Libertines."

MIMNERMUS.

A Sceptical Scientist and Saint.

III.

(Continued from p. 38.)

IN 1872 Lubbock began his researches on the mental endowments of insects. These inquiries initiated the studies which subsequently gave the reading public his fascinating volume on Ants, Bees, and Wasps. That a busy banker and successful legislator should interest himself in the activities of insects struck the general fancy, and doubtless assisted in the circulation of the book. In the autumn he travelled along the Danube, and visited Turkey and Greece; and during a visit to France he tamed a wasp, which he introduced to his scientific friends. In a leading article, the Daily Telegraph stated that:—

> One of the most curious attendants this year at the gathering of the British Association in Brighton was a little gentleman in a brown overcoat, with black and yellow nether garments, wearing a sharp sword poisoned at the tip.....It was Sir John Lubbock's pet wasp; and the respect which would naturally be paid to the benevolent savant, who has given London its new holidays, was really due to this insect on its own account.

Excited by envy, among other evil human weaknesses, a rumour was spread broadcast that Lubbock was regarded as "a great scientist among the bankers, a great banker among the scientists." But the high estimation in which he was held by the great masters of science in what was a Golden Age of natural knowledge, completely disproves one half of the rumour, while, as to the other, the evidence is conclusive that the bankers did not hold him lightly as an authority on their calling. They accepted his Clearing system, and they valued his Falsification of Accounts Bill, which was passed into law in 1874. The circumstances which led to this enactment were somewhat strange:—

> A clerk at Stuckey's Bank had overpaid his account, and had deceived the auditors by falsifying the books, so that his frauds remained for a considerable time undetected. To everyone's surprise, it appeared that this was no offence in the eye of the law.

Lubbock's Act, for the first time, made this a criminal offence. This proved a very useful measure, as it had been no uncommon occurrence for clerks to rob the banks by means of false entries, and then escape punishment for their misdeeds.

Again, the Bankers' Association very heartily thanked Lubbock for the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, which he piloted through Parliament in 1876. Previous to this Act, bankers were bound on demand to produce their books in Court. "Many accounts being in the same ledger, it sometimes happened that a customer wished to consult his ledger, but could not do so as the ledger was in Court." Under the new Act, bankers were permitted to present a signed duplicate.

In the same year Lubbock went among the Wiltshire archæologists at Salisbury, and formed one of a party to Stonehenge that was conveyed there in some score or more carriages. A landowning agriculturist, busy with his harvest, was astonished when he noticed a procession of vehicles so imposing in an outlandish lane. He inquired of his bailiff as to its meaning. "I reckon, sir," said the man, who seems to have been uncertain as to the pronunciation of the word "archæologists," "it's them Archangels from Salisbury."

A curious slip of the pen occurs on page 165 of the first volume of Mr. Hutchinson's biography. Referring to Lubbock's Bill to amend the law relating to Companies, introduced into the House in 1879, Mr. Hutchinson mentions Lord Halsbury as Chancellor. Of course, the first Earl Cairns occupied the woolsack during Disraeli's lease of power from 1874 to 1880, while Halsbury was then Hardinge Giffard, afterwards Charles Bradlaugh's spiteful antagonist in the Courts of Law, and later still Lord Chancellor, or, as Labouchere preferred to term him, "Lord High Jobber."

This same year Sir John lost his first wife, to whom he was dearly attached, and her early decease was doubtless in large measure due to the effects of the railway accident previously spoken of.

When Gladstone swept the country at the General Election of 1880, Lubbock, although a Liberal, lost his seat for Maidstone, owing to his colleague, Sir Sidney Waterlow's, removal of slum property in the town. It was the old blunder of pulling down human dwellings before others were erected in their stead. Superior houses were subsequently built, which gave general satisfaction; but the election was fought while the houseless inhabitants were suffering considerable inconvenience. The angry people who were driven from their homes, and the tradesmen who relied on their custom, avenged themselves by voting for the Conservatives, who won the seats. As a sequel, on the elevation of Robert Lowe, the Member for London University, to the peerage, Sir John succeeded him as Parliamentary representative. He was returned unopposed, and retained the seat for twenty years, until he in turn accepted a barony.

Digitized by Google

In 1888 Lubbock was President of the British Association, and his Address secured the hearty admiration of Darwin. This gathering—the Jubilee meeting—was held at York, and in the afternoon of the opening day Lubbock strolled into the Cathedral with Huxley:—

> At the entrance they met Prof. H. J. Smith, who put up his hands with a look of mock surprise. "Ah," said Huxley, "you did not expect to see me here." "Well," said Smith, looking up, "if I had it would have been on a pinnacle."

Although a remarkably abstemious man, Lubbock suffered for the sins of his ancestors, and was afflicted with gout. This fiendish disease threatened at times to restrict his multifarious activities. But the busy man was busy still when, in 1882, the death of Darwin came. Sir John composed a memorial to the Dean of Westminster, suggesting the burial of the mighty naturalist in the Abbey. This was signed, among others, by Professor Fawcett, Thomas Burt, Sir Charles Dilke, and Sir George Trevelyan. Darwin was consequently laid to rest in what should be the National Mausoleum, and the pall-bearers included Huxley, Wallace, Hooker, J. R. Lowell, and Lubbock Although Darwin had passed the alloted span of three score years and ten, his death was a sad blow to Lubbock. Their early friendship had deepened into affection, and the younger man looked up to the philosopher of Down as a second father. Darwin's influence in shaping Lubbock's scientific studies was enormous. And, as Mr. Hutchinson states:—

> Nor is it on the intellectual side alone that the counsel and the example of the great Darwin counted for much with him. He was immensely indebted, too, to the example of his fine and serene character—cheerful, uncomplaining, courageous—in the midst of the attacks of ill-health, and of enemies who were unable to appreciate his work.

Relieved to some extent from personal attendance at the Bank, Lubbock became extremely active in science and politics. He conclusively proved that the Bank Holidays had not led to increased drunkenness, a charge constantly brought against them; he strove to secure the reduction of the National Debt, and was, if possible, more interested in archæology than ever. In August, 1883, Punch selected him as a subject for one of that entertaining organ's "Fancy Portraits." Sir John was cleverly portrayed as a big humble-bee, while below the drawing ran the lines:—

> How doth the Busy Banking Bee
> Improve the shining hours,
> By studying on Bank Holidays
> Strange insects and wild flowers.

Lubbock paid his first visit to Rushmore in 1883. This was the noble residence of General Pitt Rivers, the learned evolutionary anthropologist, who once offered that well-known heretic, Moncure Conway, the biographer of Thomas Paine, a nice living in the Church. There Lubbock met Alice Fox Pitt, who afterwards became his second wife.

The introduction of the measure to enfranchise the agricultural labourer gave an impetus to the cause of Proportional Representation, and Lubbock, who was a strong supporter of this system, took a prominent part in the formation of the Proportional Representation Society. This body was born in January, 1884, in Mr. Beaumont Lubbock's residence. And unquestionably, were such a scheme capable of satisfactory application, it would constitute a great improvement on our present methods of election.

Apropos of long dinner courses and interminable orations, the following is not bad. At a Cambridge celebration there were innumerable speeches, and, after midnight, Sir Frederick Bramwell was on the list to return thanks for "Applied Science." Overwhelmed by the oratory of the many preceding speakers, Bramwell delivered a commendably brief address. This is the verbatim report:—

> At an earlier hour there is much that I should have liked to have said about applied science; but as it is nearly one o'clock, the only application that strikes me as at all appropriate would be the application of a domestic lucifer to a bedroom candle.

With that he resumed his seat, when J. R. Lowell, who sat opposite, dashed off a verse, which he tossed over to Sir Frederick Bramwell:—

> O wise Sir Frederick,
> Who thy wit could catch,
> Hold thee a candle
> Or supply thy match?

As soon as Parliament reassembled in 1886, Lubbock toiled earnestly to persuade the House to accept his Shop Hours Regulation Bill, which limited the working hours of youths and maidens under eighteen years of age to seventy-four a week. The Bill survived its second reading, and was then hung up in Committee. Many opposed legislative interference in this matter in the name of liberty, and the Lord Mayor convened a general gathering in London, composed of tradespeople, which, it was supposed, would with practical unanimity condemn Lubbock's or any other similar Bill. Sir John made a point of being present at the demonstration, and asked the meeting to grant him a hearing. He then presented his case, and moved an amendment to the official resolution in favour of his own proposals. With wonderful success he brought home to the assembly the painfully long hours of shop assistants by quoting the old Norfolk epitaph:—

> Here lies a poor woman, who always was tired,
> For she lived in a world where too much was required.
> Weep not for me, friends, she said, for I'm going
> Where there'll neither be cooking nor washing nor sewing.
>
> I go where the loud Hallelujahs are ringing,
> But I shall not take any part in the singing.
> Then weep not for me, friends, if death do us sever,
> For I'm going to do nothing for ever and ever.

These lines made such an impression that Lubbock carried his amendment, much to the consternation of his critics. He was now more determined than before to secure the passage of his Bill, and laboured ceaselessly to achieve this object. And in a late note for the year 1887 he was able to write, "In Parliament I did not speak often, but succeeded at length in carrying the Shop Hours Bill, which limits the hours of young persons in shops to seventy-four hours a week."

T. F. PALMER.

(To be concluded.)

The Avenues of Time.

AVENUES have a strange charm. Meditation, the broad browed goddess of the silent, solitary places, seems to make them her home. To rush through an avenue is to be guilty of sacrilege. For the life of me, I could not say why this is so; but the peaceful seclusion, the quietude, the restfulness, seem to demand more consideration. Your steps, naturally, move more and more slowly. Your mind becomes more and more sombre. Everything within and without you quietens into repose; and a mellow happiness seems to pervade you and your environment. An avenue tempts you leisurely to live. In the kindliness of the shadows of the wings of Meditation you unconsciously become reflective; your mind becomes more quietly attuned to truth.

Digitized by Google

But it is a different kind of avenue of which I am thinking. I like the poetic phrase, the avenues of time. I like to wander down these serene retreats, where the perfumed dust of death is scattered, and the air is fragrant with an incense that belongs to the immortals. All the characteristics that make the real avenues delightful are here intensified. The remoteness from this queer old world is increased. Its absurd folly and insane incongruity are further away than ever. Its hopeless incompetence, its inability, its grotesque inaptitudes are lost in the dimness.

Strange that one should draw nearer to life the farther one departs from it. When time is taken to think, which is seldom in these days of the dominion of dark death, the strangeness becomes appallingly weird; and as you wander down these old, time-shadowed avenues the nearness of the friendly, quiet old trees is a joy in itself; the peacefulness always associated with wisdom enters into the soul of you; and the outside commotion becomes something too full of the obnoxious to be understood.

Hidden away from the turmoil are these avenues where the spirit of life dwells in immortality. The soft, restful voices that flood the air with divine melodies are unheard in the world's uproar. The serene familiar faces that shine in the semi-gloom are untroubled still. The eyes that smile upon us are as fearless and placid as of old. The hands that are stretched forth to bless and comfort us are as tenderly firm as ever; and we know that the hearts from which spring the flowers of deathless thought and counsel, and contain the elixir of truth, are as impregnable as of old, despite the countless specious fallacies men use to garment their solemn folly.

It is quiet down here where the great men of all the ages live, and speak; and, speaking, rebuke the present and the foolish children of to-day. It is quiet down here where wisdom dwells, and the fraternity of genius gathers together to show men their desperate stupidity. Quiet it is down here where the only war that is ever broached is that in which Reason assumes her rightful place—Reason robed in charity, in love, in pity, and in fellowship.

In the quietude of the avenues of time there are no crimes, no barbarities, no blood-red revelries with death, no blaring mockeries of justice, no blasphemous adulteries with truth, no hypocritical sanctimoniousness of honour, God, or other superstitions. All is peaceful and restful. A barrier of distance lies between the voiceful solitudes and the shrieking insanity of a world that has gone mad with a wolf-like blood-lust.

Here the violets might grow, and the larks might sing, and children might be merry, without fear of the cruelties of the brute man. Horror is unknown here, beneath the foliage of love. Passions, revenge, spite, remorselessness, reprisal, every emotion from which the soul flees in despair, are strangers here. Animalism that sinks its teeth ferociously into flesh comes not into the dim shadows of the avenues of time. Degradation of life and thought, slavery of mind and body, starvation of the soul, gluttony of the ignoble survivals of decay, poverty of principle, feasts of diseased faith; these are only to be found ravishing the teachings of wisdom in our world, with its clamour, its depravity, its rank, raw, ugly Materialism.

The master minds whose spirits move gently amongst the foliage and shades of the avenues of time are unanimous in their denunciation of brutality. Their hatred of unreason and its children of vice was no passing spasm of indignation. Their love of peace was no questionable opinion founded upon shoddy principles, easily ruined by the gusts of expediency: it was based upon the knowledge that all quarrelling was unwise and unprofitable. In the restful quietness not one voice, I think, can be heard advocating the resuscitation of the savage nature of humanity in our endeavours to rid the world of evil, even of deliberately defiant and offensive evil. Not yet have I listened to one of these melodious voices attuning itself to discord and dis-peace. Out from their wisdom steal suggestions of Reason, the great arbiter that weighs the differences of men's opinions, and in its conclusions mingles justice with consideration. Through the harmonies that flood the avenues with music runs a golden thread of melody embroidered with Reason's incomparable majesty.

Is it not true that the world has carelessly neglected the wisdom of the master minds? Is it not true that it has contemptuously ignored the teaching of its counsellors? Is it not true that, by its ignorance and its prejudice, it has brought to the doors of its people such a mass of misery, and sorrow, and suffering, that centuries may be needed to purge Humanity of the evil influences of its own crimes?

Throughout the avenues of time a deeper sadness seems to have fallen. A more sombre remoteness from the world seems to exist. Loneliness has become more consciously palpable. Humanity has departed from the saving companionship of the master minds. The shadows are heavier down here; the voices are quieter; the gleam on the faces have diminished somewhat; a gloaming has been wafted from the fields of folly, from the lines and pits of insensate stupidity, and has settled down upon the neglected pearl-strewn, star-studded avenues of time, the dwelling-places of minds that have given their all that Humanity might live lives happy, bright and free; and given that all in vain.

ROBERT MORELAND.

Chorus of Life.

EVER be daring,
Never despairing,
Storm beacons flaring
Still lead you on;
Life's battle sharing
And vict'ries won.

Spite of all badness,
Folly and madness,
Even in sadness,
Patient and brave;
Tasting its gladness,
Breasting the wave.

Up from the valley,
Urging the rally,
Leading the sally,
Onward you go;
Never a dally,
Fearing no foe.

Then when the day is done,
All the long journey won,
Turn like the setting sun
Toward thy West;
Work that is well begun
Earn thee thy rest.

ANDREW MILLAR.

Digitized by Google

Acid Drops.

Dr. Campbell Morgan complains of the "brutalities of our English translation of the Bible." As a sample he gives the "Damsel, I say unto you, arise," of Jesus, and thinks that a phrase such as "Wee bit lassie," would be nearer to the sense of the original. So it might be, but Dr. Morgan should be careful. If that part of the New Testament is rendered into the homely language of everyday life there is no reason why all should not be so rendered. And if that were done, while it would certainly induce a clearer comprehension of the Bible, the consequences might be very unfortunate for the Rev. Campbell Morgan and his class.

There is no reason save one why each new age should not have the Bible re-translated into the vernacular, as are other classics. But that one reason is very important, and it is vital to the interests of the Christian Churches. It would destroy the pseudo-sanctity and expose the solemn hocus-pocus on which religion lives. Certainly, a "wee bit lassie," or "bonnie girlie," is more homely and more human in its appeal to-day than than the austere "damsel" of the New Testament. But the latter does the work it aims at doing, and either of the former expressions would fail. Remember, it is a dead girl that Jesus is bringing back to life—an incredible, an absurd thing, on the face of it. And if he were represented as saying, "My poor little girl, get up and run away home to your father and mother," readers would see no more in the story than the action of a good-natured lunatic who expected to bring the dead back to life, or a shrewd observer who knew the girl was shamming and brought her to her senses. In either case the supernatural aura would be destroyed. But try, "Damsel, I say unto thee, arise!" and the archaic language removes the whole incident from the impact of critical thought, the unthinking man remains undisturbed, and the supernatural is preserved. Of course, gods and prophets must talk a human language if they are to be understood at all, but make them talk like the people around us talk, and their pretensions to superiority become subject to the same tests as do the claims of ordinary human beings.

That is the reason why in connection with religion there must be a special lingo, a special dress, a special frame of mind, everything so calculated as to lift the individual out of the corrective, and, comparatively, rationalistic environment of to-day, and to place him in the comparatively irrational environment of some centuries ago. The more archaic the language is the more it impresses the unthinking. Mystification is the mother of mysticism, as certainly as understanding is the beginning of wisdom and the end of religion.

The Governor of Greenland, who is over in London on legal business, admitted in Court that he had never heard of the hymn, "From Greenland's Icy Mountains." The Eskimos are far from being uncivilized, although they have no army, no navy, no police force, and no taxes to pay. The Governor said that the chief impression the European War makes upon them is the wickedness of such a waste of human life. Happy Eskimos!

"Commissioner Adelaide Cox will represent the Salvation Army on the Cinema Commission," says the Daily News. Does this mean that Bible stories are to be filmed?

Advertisements of Sunday services at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London, S.E., show that the great American preacher is assisted by a lady vocalist. When Spurgeon preached on hell-fire and its torments, he did not even have the assistance of a church organ.

"The way in which lamp-posts say 'Good evening' to you at night is very often more forcible than polite" says the Vicar of Addelstone, Surrey. It looks as if the mothers' meeting had been unusually festive.

We expect there has been a mistake made, but we have received an invitation to attend a meeting to be held in the Church House, Westminster, to listen to some addresses on "The Position of the Lord's Supper in Divine Worship." As we don't care to the value of a politician's word of honour what position the Lord's Supper takes in divine worship, we shall not attend. It is of much greater moment just now to consider the position of an ordinary supper in an ordinary household. That seems to be the pressing question of the hour. But imagine the state of things when such things can be gravely discussed by men and women who will persist in calling themselves civilized?

The Kaiser is not the only intimate of the Deity. Said the Rev. Billy Sunday in a sermon at Boston, U.S.A., "God might have sent angels down here to preach, but he didn't. He said, 'Bill, go to Boston.'" The cultured Bostonians must feel honoured.

An advertisement for a pious publication is headed, "Man doth not live on Plum Pudding only." The allusion is, of course, to the well-known words, "Man doth not live by bread alone," but Christians believe the Bible so often without ever reading it.

A gospel-temperance speaker at Southend-on-Sea hanged himself in a shed near his house. As he was not a Secularist lecturer, there is no moral.

The dear Daily News states that pulpit supplies have become a serious problem in the country owing to the large number of the clergy who have gone on "war service." The expression "war service" is good, for the few score clergymen who are with the troops are usually in safe billets at the back of the Front. The great number of the clergy prefer to console the girls that the soldiers have left behind.

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have invested £3,500,000 in the new War Loan. In all probability it never dawned upon these pious patriots that a genuine help to the country would be given if the money had been lent free of interest, or if it had been invested in Government stock at a normal rate of interest. Patriotism at 5 per cent. on a gilt-edged security is open to a little suspicion. The transaction reminds us of Harry Lauder's comment on his investment of £50,000. After consideration he decided that it was the soundest investment in the country. Mr. Bonar Law hit the nail right on the head when he said it required little patriotism to invest spare money at 5 per cent., with the security of the British Government behind it. The three P's—Piety, Patriotism, and Profit run well together. In common decency the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the pious Mr. Lauder, should have declined more than 2½ per cent. interest on a loan for such a purpose. In a world of cant none is more detestable than that of patriotic sacrifice at 5 per cent.

Speaking at Boston, U.S.A., the Rev. Billy Sunday described man as a "dirty, stinking, rotten old adulterer." Billy forgot that man was made in the image of God.

A new book bears the title, Bible Stories for Children, and the author is a maiden lady. We wonder if she blushed when she transcribed and shortened the purple Old Testament stories.

"Lying in the East is an art more than a vice," says Sir W. B. Richmond. The Bible yarns prove the truth of this remark.

Lord Sandhurst, the Lord Chamberlain, has sanctioned the opening of a London theatre for soldiers and sailors on Sundays for free entertainments. The dear clergy will be in hysterics.

Digitized by Google

Another, of what the Daily Telegraph calls Germany's "blasphemous outbursts." The President of the Schleswig-Holstein Union of Agriculturists is reported as saying, "God has so ordered the world-harvest that it should be bad in order that England may be unable to feed herself." It would, of course, be inexcusably anti-British for God to do anything of the sort; and yet if there has been a bad harvest someone or something has been responsible for it. And if there is a divine ruler of the universe it is difficult to see what there is blasphemous as crediting him with a bad harvest. Man has done what he could to make it a good one, and we have no doubt that prayers have been offered to that end. If anybody puts forward a god for general acceptance, he ought to be shown to be doing something. And if he has nothing to do with such an important matter as the world's harvest, what is it that he does take an interest in? If the Daily Telegraph wishes to emphasize the fact that Herr Roesckl is talking nonsense, we quite agree with it. Only we observe it is religious nonsense; and so surely as a man begins to mix religion with his thinking he is certain to talk nonsense sooner or later.

"The mass of British workers find their thinking in the ordinary halfpenny papers," says Mr. H. G. Wells. In this connection it is amusing to recall Lord Salisbury's description of the "halfpenny press" as "edited by office boys for errand boys."

The New York Tribune, a staid and sober newspaper, had some startling headlines recently, which ran: "Chauncey M. Depew, 82, takes issue with David of Bible fame. Life's allotment of Three-Score Years and Ten all wrong," he says. In the following interview, Mr. Depew describes David's remarks on "the days of our years" as "distressingly poor so far as facts were concerned." David's dictum is funny when one remembers that the Bible says that Adam, Methuselah, and Noah each lived nine centuries, and Lamech was cut off at 700.

At Waterbury Conn., U.S.A., the Rev. Michael Mockus, a Unitarian minister, has been prosecuted for blasphemy. His offence is denying the truth of the statements that Adam and the whale eat, respectively, an apple and Jonah. The New York Sun pours ridicule on the prosecution, and asks why "musty statutes originating in the days of the witch-baiters" should be revived.

"Peace hath her victories no less than war," says Milton. Last year the boats of the National Lifeboat Institution saved no less than 1,185 lives; and 2,800 persons have been rescued since August, 1914. In affecting these rescues 21 lifeboatmen lost their lives.

That the bitterness engendered by a difference in religious opinion is often more superficial than real, is well illustrated by the latest story about the new Premier. Discussing the subject of religious dogma with a friend one day, Mr. Lloyd George said, "For some time a fierce controversy has raged in the Church to which I belong. It is on the question as to whether Baptism is celebrated 'in the name' or 'through the name.' I feel very strongly on the matter," continued Mr. George, "and I would willingly lay down my life for the side to which I belong, but—I forget which it is!" A fairly accurate summary of much present-day religious "thought."

The publication of the Allies' reply to the note of President Wilson has enabled a lot of Christians, who are at present more than usually filled with Christian love and charity, to denounce the Turk with all their might, Turkey is unprogressive, barbarous, cruel, etc., etc. We have no wish to stand between the Mohammedan and any legitimate condemnation of his rule in Europe or elsewhere, but it is as well to remember that this War, with all its horrors and brutalization, was not brought on Europe by a Mohammedan power, but by Christians. It is Christians who commenced it, it is Christians who continue it, and if Christians could make up their minds to peace the War would cease at once. And the Turk has so far proved himself one of the cleanest fighters of the War. All accounts agree upon that.

And when we are told of the unprogressive nature of Turkey, accompanied as it is by Christian digs at Mohammedanism as a rival religion, we beg to observe that the most unprogressive period in the history of Western Europe was experienced under Christian domination. It was Christianity, not Mohammedanism, which gave us the Dark and Middle Ages. And it was Mohammedan countries which kept the torch of learning aflame while Christian Europe was plunged in barbarism, and also provided the starting point for the re-birth of human learning. Civilization has to thank Mohammedanism for more than it has to thank Christianity. And when it comes to massacre and persecution, we venture to say that Christianity can take lessons in these things from no other religion in the world, At the game of persecution Christianity is supreme.

The Rev. Canon Winter, of Elland, Yorkshire, died suddenly whilst preaching at the local parish church. Had he been a Secularist lecturer, it would have been described as a judgment of Providence.

"We have thousands of our heroes wounded beyond repair, sent back to a hard, hard world, fed and fatted up with cigarettes, sentimental novels, and stupid songs. What equipment for real life!" Thus writes "A Sad Chaplain to the Forces" to the Church Times. The clergy see to it that they are "fed and fatted up" with something more substantial than "cigarettes, novels, and songs." Thirty-nine bishops share £180,700 annually.

A speaker at a Pleasant Sunday Afternoon exhorted his hearers to remember Emerson's words and "hitch their wagons to a star." The speaker omitted to add that Christianity was a falling star.

"Prayers that cure Pneumonia," is a Daily Sketch heading to the report of a Christian Science case in which the victim died from double bronchial pneumonia. We beg to warn our contemporary that this is rank blasphemy. If prayer can cure anything it can cure pneumonia. And we believe the evidence for prayer having cured pneumonia is as good as prayer having cured other complaints, or having effected anything in any direction. It is nonsense to say at a time when prayer is asserted to overcome the power of high explosive shells, that it cannot handle such a little thing as pneumonia. The Daily Sketch should cultivate a more robust faith Then anything would be possible.

The Vicar of St. John's, Stourbridge, writes in the parish magazine that he is quite sure good has resulted from the National Mission, "although the results are not very apparent." A good that is not very apparent is rather an indefinite thing to be thankful for, but if the vicar is content we won't complain.

FREE THE WOMAN.

Can man be free if woman be a slave?
Chain one who lives, and breathes this boundless air,
To the corruption of a closed grave!
Can they whose mates are beasts, condemned to bear
Scorn heavier far than toil or anguish, dare
To trample their oppressors? In their home
Among their babes, thou knowest a curse would wear
The shape of woman—hoary crime would come
Behind, and fraud rebuild religion's tottering dome.

—Shelley, "Revolt of Islam."

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

January 28, Swansea; February 4, Abertillery; February 11, Liverpool; February 25, Clapham; March 11 Birmingham; March 18, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—February 11, Walsall; March 25, Avondale Hall, Clapham.

FREETHINKER SUSTENTATION FUND.—C. S. Knight (Rhodesia), £2; Louis Levine, 5s. 6d.; J. Higgins, £1 10s. Per N. Courlander (East London, S.A.): A. Phillips, £1 1s.; T. A. Batten, £1 1s.; R. Alexander, £1 1s.; N. Courlander, £1 1s.; total, £4 4s.—The 10s. acknowledged as from F. W. S. (Portsmouth) should have read "F. W. L."

F. W. L.—Write Miss Vance, N. S. S. Office, who will send you the required information.

T. O'NEILL.—Thanks for citation from letter, which we shall be pleased to use next week.

H. IRVING.—Peccavi! We were quoting from memory only, and are glad to find that we did no wrong to the meaning of the message. Please send along the suggested article if it ever materializes.

W. SKEATS.—We quite willingly grant to the Bishop of London pre-eminence in the direction you indicate.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings.

W. WILMER.—Received, and will appear next week. Thanks.

J. DAVIES.—Mr. Lloyd has promised to call and see your friend.

C. S. KNIGHT (Livingstone).—We note your correction of our paragraph on labour in the Transvaal. We published a letter, on the lines of your communication, from Mr. T. W. Key, of Eastern Pondoland. We appreciate your good wishes.

J. HEWETT.—Pleased to hear from so old a Freethinker as yourself. If you have any difficulty in getting your paper, please let us have a postcard, and we will see that it is sent on from here.

T. MAY.—If you can see God's place in the War, you have a much keener vision than we possess. His place is certainly not at the Front. Your appeal for "a larger view of deity" strikes us as enlarged nonsense.

E. N.—Your parson friend deserved all he got. Whether he will appreciate it is quite another question.

H. LOMAX.—We are obliged for all you are doing to push the Freethinker in your locality.

CLIFFORD WESTON.—We quite appreciate your disgust after listening to the Bishop of Peterborough's sermon. If the War has been sent to bring us back to the Lord, the clergy should be the last ones to blame Germany. They ought, on the contrary, to thank the Kaiser as God's instrument and their best friend. As to the unity of Christendom, we expect to see that when Christians cease from troubling and the pious sink to rest. Ever since the Apostolic Age the Christians have provided the material for a fight, and we do not expect any change in this direction.

H. G. FARMER.—Pleased to hear from you. We are keeping quite well—perhaps, because we have so much to do we have no time to be otherwise. The pamphlet on Children and Cinemas is effective. Picture shows have, in our opinion, as much to do with an increase in juvenile depravity as have the rings round Saturn. Most people will not want to go further than the War atmosphere, and the absence of parental control due to fathers being in the Army and mothers out at work, for an explanation. But there is no accounting for cranks.

J. L.—We never set out to "please" readers. All we aimed at doing is to give a good Freethought journal week by week. And we hope that will please all worth bothering about.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen lectures to-day (January 28) at Swansea. The meeting will be held in the Dockers' Hall, Elysium, High Street, at 6.30. Admission is by collection, but there are some reserved seats. Mr. B. Dupree, Siddall Buildings, 60 Alexandra Road, has the arrangements in hand, and he would be glad to hear from anyone who can lend him assistance in the conduct of the meeting.

Next Sunday (Feb. 4) Mr. Cohen lectures at Abertillery, afternoon and evening. Fuller information will be given next week.

Rev. P. Moss Weston, Naval Chaplain, Swansea Base, writes us from Swansea that he is opening a Reading and Rest Room for naval and military men, and wishes to provide the men with reading from all points of view. To that end he asks if we can supply him with a copy of the Freethinker weekly. Certainly we can, and we are pleased to meet with a clergyman who is desirous of placing all points of view before those for whom he is catering. We wish there were more of the same turn of mind.

Prose always tends to travel farther and farther away from poetry; but while it remains a living art, there is always an effort made by sincere and thoughtful writers to bring it nearer to divine poesy again. They are sick of the insipidity, the too easy music and emotion of sugary verse; just as real orators break away from the commonplaces of politicians and preachers. Mr. Eden Phillpotts, one of the select few of modern writers who commands attention by his work, is a prose writer who has always imparted the virtues of poetic imagery to his writing. It is, indeed, highly interesting to find how, after long mastery over his art, he turns more and more to the higher forms of literary expression, and writes with all the energy and force as if he were a young genius with worlds yet to conquer.

In his latest book, The Girl and the Faun, Illustrated by Frank Brangwyn (Palmer & Hayward, 1916, 6s.) Mr. Phillpotts has written an allegory which deserves a wide recognition, not only for the beauty of its language but for the charm of its appearance. Printed on fine paper with broad margins, with handsome designs on each page, and enriched with full-page coloured plates by Mr. Frank Brangwyn, the allegory satisfies completely the æsthetic senses of the reader. The story of the everlasting lover is exquisitely told. It might have been told under the blue Ionian skies in the days of old Romance, except that the author cannot forget all the hopes and fears of humanity. He keeps that sense of keen sympathy, and his intense love for his kind has imparted a lyrical tone to his story, and the reader has every reason to be grateful to him for so doing. There is a faith in humanity embedded in the book, and an implied rebuke to the faithless, though Mr. Phillpotts does not put it into so many words.

The suggestions of scenery, when the seasons sit on their throne regally, slightly touched as they are, have the true vision. They are part of the genius of the great writer, of the many-sided character whose self-revelation gives such extreme value to the book. With them we put the watchful eye for colour, the delight in music, the intense occupation with the play of life, the delicacy of artistry, and, above all, the love of mankind which we are made to feel through the story that is its channel. The volume is full of rich suggestive thought, and will be accepted with grateful admiration. Its publication proves that, even in these dark days literature is a great living possession. It will arouse a living interest, not a dumb and dull assent.

Mr. T. F. Palmer lectures this evening (Jan. 28), on "Man's Place in Nature" at the St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, Kentish Town Road. The lecture commences at 7.30, and will be followed by a discussion. Many of our readers who only know Mr. Palmer as a contributor to the Freethinker, will doubtless be anxious to make his acquaintance as a lecturer. They will find the acquaintance worth cultivating.

Digitized by Google

The French Revolution.

I.—PRELIMINARY.

IF one asked what event, more than any other, marked the division between the old and the modern world, the truest reply, in the opinion of the present writer, would be, "The discovery of America and of the sea route to India." The second place—some would say the first—must undoubtedly be assigned to the French Revolution. The former event transferred the centre of commerce and civilization from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic sea-board, and the preponderance of wealth and social importance from the feudal baron to the capitalist adventurer. The latter event marks the emergence of democracy as a living force in society, and the transference of the "rights of man" from the study to the market-place. The main thing to remember about it is that it is an event, not in French history only, but in world history, and that it is not yet finished.

The characteristic doctrine of the French Revolution, that of "liberty and equality," has been endlessly travestied and misrepresented by hostile writers, especially in England. These criticize it as though it meant that all men are equal in character or ability, and as though liberty meant nothing but "doing as you like with your own." The fact is that both terms, "liberty" and "equality," are useful chiefly in a negative way, as canons of criticism rather than as canons of construction. That "liberty" is to be used in this sense appears quite plainly from the opening of chapter I. of Rousseau's Social Contract. These words, as relevant to-day as in the eighteenth century, may serve as a suitable prologue to the present study:—

> Man is born free, and everywhere he is in chains. Many a one believes himself the master of others, and yet he is a greater slave than they. How has this change come about? I do not know. What can render it legitimate? I believe I can settle this question.

What Rousseau (who, remember, was the intellectual father of the Revolution) here undertakes is nothing less than a criticism of all authority. It is evident (though not so evident to Rousseau, perhaps, as to us to-day) that every kind of subjection of one human being to the will of another is here summoned to the bar of reason, to give an account of itself. Instead of, as previously, the assumption being made that "whatever is, is right," and that the innovator and the rebel are, prima facie, wrong, we are told that it is for those in authority, those who claim to impose their will on others, to show reason why. Unless they can show that their exercise of authority creates more liberty than it takes away, their authority stands condemned.

Take, again, the much-abused concept of equality. Everybody understands what is meant when we are told that, in England, we are "all equal before the law." (In point of fact, we are not, but for the present that may be passed over.) This means that, although men may differ in worth and in wit, one man is just as much bound as another to obey the law, and just as much entitled as another to the benefits it secures. What is even more important, however, than that men should be equal before the law is that they should be equal before the legislator. Once an unjust law is on the statute book, the most impartial and even-handed administration of it will, and must, lead to injustice. What Rousseau and the Revolutionists, therefore, meant by "equality" was equality, not only before the law, but before the legislator—the absence of legal privileges in taxation, in the administration of justice, in commerce, in the suffrage, or in religion. Rousseau thus expresses what he conceives to be the "social contract" implicit in a just society:—

> Each of us puts in common his person and his whole possessions under the supreme direction of the general will; and in return we receive every member as an indivisible part of the whole.

That is, as all have to obey the law, all should, as far as possible, have an equal voice in its making.

It is easy to show that, when Rousseau ceases to be critical and becomes constructive, he frequently falls into sophistry and error, and indeed re-admits through the back door a great deal of the tyranny he has expelled through the front. He leaves, apparently, endless loopholes for the tyranny of majorities. This arises from the fundamental mistake he made, which was to use a critical weapon as an instrument of construction. Plainly, to us, man is equally "in chains," under despotic or under democratic government. The "social contract," considered as a fact justifying the powers that be in the exercise of authority, is an obvious illusion. We are not parties to any such contract. None of us chose to be born, or to be born in the particular national unit that claims our allegiance. We are compulsory, not voluntary, members of it. Clearly, the Parliament of the United Kingdom, nay, the Congress of the United States and the Swiss Confederation, must stand at Rousseau's bar to give an account of themselves as much as any autocratic court of the eighteenth century. And the final justification of any government at the bar of humanity must be, not the sophistical "social contract" of Rousseau, but a proof that every one subject to it gains, by its maintenance, more liberty, more happiness, a greater range of opportunity, than he would gain by its subversion. It follows that it is the duty of every government to secure those conditions for its people, and that only so can it have a reasonable claim on their support.

In the eighteenth century this duty was only beginning to be realized. The human mind is so constituted that the most obvious truths are consciously grasped by it only under the pressure of material facts. To force the "rights of man" into the common consciousness, it was necessary that arbitrary government armed with the doctrine of the "divine right of kings," should run riot until it became positively unbearable. That is what happened under the Bourbon monarchy in France, under the Stuart monarchy in England. The kings of these dynasties, supported by the self-interest of ministers and courtiers and the slavish teaching of Catholic and Anglican ecclesiastics, claimed to govern by divine right, to owe no account of their actions to any earthly authority, to tax their subjects without the consent of their representatives, to prescribe to them their religion, and to punish resistance by the block, the gallows, the quartering knife, and the wheel. In England these pretensions led the philosopher, John Locke, to formulate the theory that kings reigned, not by divine right, but by contract, which really meant that the king was the servant of the nation, and could be deposed if he did not give satisfaction. This theory found expression, to some extent, in the Whig Revolution of 1688, when James II. was replaced by William of Orange. It must be remembered, however, that hardly anyone at that date had any notion of democracy, and that the Parliament which deposed James II. represented only the landowners and the merchant class, who were actuated by their own interests.

Locke's political philosophy was developed by the French philosophers of the eighteenth century, and especially by Rousseau. It found its second, and more pronounced, practical expression in the American Declaration of Independence, when the colonists, in revolt against being taxed by the British Parliament, declarep "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" to be the equal and inalienable rights of all men. The American Revolutionists, however, were more democratic in words than in deeds. Negro slaves were not included in the application of these "inalienable rights;" and to this day, despite Abraham Lincoln, the Declaration of Independence is a "scrap of paper" as far as the American negro is concerned.

Digitized by Google

This is merely one more illustration of the fact that men's consciousness of principles has generally been limited by their material interests. The English Revolutionists appealed to the "original contract between king and people" but took for granted that a Parliament elected by landowners and merchants represented the "people." The American Revolutionists affirmed that men were born "free and equal," and endowed with "inalienable rights" of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," but took care to apply these principles just as far as it suited them, and no further.

The French Revolution, in its inception, was hardly a more democratic movement than these. The members of the States-General, who were convoked by Louis XVI. in 1789 to get him out of his financial difficulties, had no intention (the overwhelming majority of them) of conferring political power upon the French people. As substantial middle-class men, they were annoyed at the exemption from taxation of the nobles and clergy, at their own exclusion from political power, and at the internal restrictions on trade and industry which survived as part of the dying feudal system. All that they wanted was to take over the reins of power into their own hands, make France a limited monarchy like England, and inaugurate the reign of laissez faire, according to then prevalent notions of political economy.

Accordingly, the first weeks of the French Revolution read like an ordinary bicker between an obstinate king and an obstinate Parliament. Even the "oath of the tennis court," by which the deputies, locked out of their hall by the king's orders, swore not to separate till they had given France a constitution; even Mirabeau's defiant challenge to the king to turn them out at the point of the bayonet, read more like a revised version of the dispute between Charles I. and the Long Parliament than like the birth of modern democracy. We feel that we are in the presence of a further stage in the old process, not the first stage in the new one. Had the Revolution taken place a century earlier, as the English Revolution did, there might have been little more in it than this.

But during the intervening century, the economic conditions of Western Europe had ripened. The Industrial Revolution was in full swing in England, and its results were beginning to be felt in France. In Paris, Lyons, and a few large towns, the old system of handicraft was giving place to wage-labour; to the old antagonism between the aristocracy and the middle class was added the new antagonism, as yet only fitfully felt, between employer and workman; and a large paper manufacturer, who had made some cynical remarks about the starvation of the poor, had had his works sacked by the crowd. The working-class looked to the newly convoked assembly to do something for them. And when the king and court summoned troops to the neighbourhood of Versailles to coerce the Assembly, and dismissed the popular minister, Necker, from office, the populace of Paris came to the rescue, ransacked the shops and the military depot of the Invalides for weapons, and, joined by some of the soldiers in the city, stormed the fortress of the Bastille (July 14, 1789). The king at once capitulated. From this moment absolutism was a lost cause; and many courtiers and nobles betook themselves in haste across the frontiers, to await the time when, as they hoped, the king should join them, and they should march on Paris at the head of an army to put down the Assembly and restore the old regime.

ROBERT ARCH.

(To be continued.)

Paulatim Retrorsum.

A Rejoinder.

WE have not had the fortune to meet with any formal reply to the indictment of the Council of University College School formulated in the Freethinker of Sept. 10 last; but in the Christmas issue of the Gower—the school magazine—there occurs, incidentally, in an article on the late Head-Master, a veiled pro-reply of a very feeble character. There is no reference to the Freethinker, and no pretence of any attempt to meet the counts in the indictment seriatim; but, since the article concludes with the words—"Is it to be Paulatim Retrorsum? Never! Paulatim onward and forward, ever in the vanguard of the advance? Aye"—there can be no doubt whatever as to what is intended. The writer of this article says that—> realizing that true religion, and that alone, can supply the boy with a motive for being and doing right continuously, for working and living as a good citizen, they have adapted a tradition of U. C. S. to meet the changed conditions of time whilst maintaining our great principles. The peril here and now would appear to be not religious intolerance but irreligious apathy; not fanatical conviction but laxity of conviction. Hence the classes held on Saturday mornings; hence the prayers before morning-school.[1]

Now, of course, the writer is entitled to hold, as a personal opinion, that true religion alone can supply motives for doing right and acting as a good citizen. Certainly, facts may be hopelessly against him. The English leaders of Freethought have been men of singularly noble lives, shaming hundreds and thousands of their Christian fellows: nearly all the crimes committed during fifteen ghastly centuries of blood and cruelty and oppression of every kind have admittedly been committed by Christians—and by very sincere and earnest Christians, too, in countless cases: and Germany, which has brought the present catastrophe on civilization, is a country wherein so much stress is laid upon religion that moral instruction, divorced from religion, may not be given in its State-schools. Still, our quarrel with the writer is not that he, in common with the vulgar herd, holds a doctrine to which history on every page, and every man's daily experience, gives the lie—our rule of Freethought concedes him the fullest liberty to hold and promulgate any views, however erroneous we may deem them—but that he defends the imposition of this sectarian doctrine upon the one public school in which there was formerly perfect fair play and impartiality between the sons of men of all creeds and of none. Perhaps it is because he feels the hopeless weakness of his case that he makes no attempt to rebut our charges. He does not deny the departure from the glorious old tradition of University College School; he uses the euphemism of "adapting" the tradition, when he should have spoken of subverting it; and he appears to consider that utter surrender is synonymous with "maintenance" of "our great principles." Our charges and objections were set forth very clearly and very distinctly; but, instead of attempting to convict us of any error or [1] Italics ours.

Digitized by Google

misstatement, or any flaw in reasoning, he says, in effect, that, since boys cannot be good unless religious, the essential principles of a school, founded expressly to put Freethinkers and heretics and orthodox on a level, have been "maintained" by surrendering the chief distinctive trait of the school—which craven surrender he describes as an "adaptation" to "changed conditions." If a nunnery were turned into a brothel, or a temperance hotel into a gin-palace, the culprits responsible might assert with just equal accuracy and credit that they had "maintained the great principles" of their trust whilst "adapting its tradition" to "changed conditions." Moreover, in an avowed editorial on the first page of this Gower, smug satisfaction is expressed at the fact that the Bishop of Oxford visited the O.T.C. summer-camp to conduct a service; from which (and other indications) we must understand that, under the "changed conditions" and "adapted traditions," not only does true morality connote religion, but religion connotes the Established Church. Nonconformity and Unitarianism and Jewry contribute, we believe, a very large proportion of its alumni to University College School. We wish all these boys a series of very happy new years; and we congratulate their parents on the immense moral improvement that will doubtless be effected in their sons' characters and conduct as they are more and more put under the thumb of lord bishops, and more and more degraded to the position of boys in the old-fashioned unregenerate public schools.

To use the old figure of speech—it is all enough to make the great founders of University College School turn in their graves; but we fancy that they would writhe less uneasily if their treacherous successors had said boldly and honestly—"We have thrown the ancient principles and traditions overboard; and, having migrated from neutral and central Gower Street to a fashionable suburb, intend to propitiate Mammon by toadying to the Churches, and primarily to the most fashionable of them"—instead of proclaiming that, in permitting all this apostasy, they are "maintaining the principles" and "adapting the traditions"!

However, we attacked the Council of Governors, and the Council alone, for this great betrayal. The Council has, we believe, nothing to do with the Gower, which is managed by the boys, with some assistance from one or two masters; and our real quarrel is with the Council. Is there not in that Council even one man with enough courage to come out into the open, to answer our arguments and objections—if they can be answered—and to enter a really official apology and defence for perverting Paulatim into Paulatim Retrorsum? We feel sure that the Freethinker would hospitably open its columns to him, so that, where the Council was attacked, there too it might be defended. If such champion take his courage in both hands, and essay to defend himself and his colleagues, will he also explain why the Gower, in describing the Speech-day of last July, imitated the local paper quoted in our former article by omitting to record the striking fact that the proceedings ended with a hymn to "God, the strength of those that war"? The absolute silence maintained in print about this striking feature in the "adaptation of the tradition" to "changed conditions" seems too significant to be accidental. Frankly, we believe that a carefully engineered scheme for betraying and subverting the principles and traditions of University College School was worked out by someone years ago that it is being put into practice little by little; but that the conspirators are in wholesome dread of going too quickly and of angering part of the clientele of the school by too great a retrogression at one time; and we suspect that, having once got a hymn sung, and so set up a precedent, they wish nothing more to be said about it until the next Speech-day. We fear, however, that the backsliding has by no means carried the school to the destined bottom of the descensus Averni; and we have a shrewd suspicion that, within a very few years, a Lord Bishop may be trotted out to give away the prizes and to bestow an episcopal benediction upon whatever may then remain of the mixed throng of sons of Catholics, Anglicans, Nonconformists, Unitarians, Jews, and Freethinkers, whom it has hitherto been the peculiar glory of University College School to gather together on neutral ground under its all-comprehensive roof. We have the assurance beforehand, however, that then we shall see the triumph, not of Paulatim Retrorsum, but of "Paulatim onward and forward, ever in the vanguard of the advance." Veris dis aliter visum!

MATHEMATICUS.

Christian Susceptibilities.

IF every heterodox writer and speaker were to accede to the demands of Christian believers, the final result would be that neither would again wield his pen nor open his mouth. The Christian critic cannot afford to ignore the works of such eminent figures in the literary world as Thomas Hardy and George Moore. But with a fanatical gracelessness, so to speak, he in the end finds the former to be merely a "sort of village Atheist brooding over the village idiot"; and the latter, in his most recent book, The Brook Kerith, has, according to a Christian reviewer, put upon the believer in Christianity "an affront past excuse and forgiveness." Mr. Moore's "peculiar vandalism" is "bitterly resented." The forgiving spirit of the "Liberal" modern Christian does not attain to the standard set up in the teaching of Jesus. This by the way.

What would be the logical result of considering every Christian's susceptibilities before any secular reform was embarked upon? We have only to look at history to find the answer. The reform would never be started at all. "Mimnermus" recently gave us an instructive indictment of the English Bishops, containing a list of reforms which the majority of them opposed. Let us particularize a little. If we gave way to the demands of one large section of Christians, we should totally suppress public-houses. If we gave way to the demands of another, we should repeal the Married Women's Property Acts, re-establish marriage wholly as a sacrament of the Established Church, and deprive it wholly of the character of a social or civil contract. If we obeyed the dictates of another section of believers, we should reimpose the taxes upon knowledge and close the doors of the seats of learning against all who could not comply with religious tests. Pandering to the susceptibilities of Christians means retrogression, not progress. It is the clear teaching of history that the vast majority of social reformers and social regenerators in all ages have been infidels.

The claim of the Christian believer to be protected against "affronts" is based upon the narrowest and most insolent form of bigotry. The Freethinker definitely declines to limit the operations of his mental faculties. He is not to be turned back by the warning-post inscribed, "Thus far, and no farther." He denies no man the right to believe what he likes, and to propagate his belief, whatever susceptibilities may be offended; but he demands, and insists on having, no less right for himself. Where the Christian believer profoundly errs is in associating Truth with Custom, Tradition, Authority, and Dogma. The Freethinker's position is that Truth's only suitable concomitant and best ally is Freedom of Thought and Speech, and of action which is not anti-social in character. "The Truth shall make you free!" And Truth to him is far greater and more precious than any creed. The search for and the pursuit after Truth demands all the diligence of man; but it also demands that, in that search and pursuit, man shall not be trammelled or shackled by any preconceptions, however sanctified, however antiquated, however revered by majorities. Majorities may not always bewrong; they are not always right.

Digitized by Google

But, again, the Christian believer is not obliged to read the naughty pages of the books written by unbelieving authors. Why should he risk disturbing the placid equanimity of his faith or arousing his temper? Publicans do not compel men by physical force to enter their premises, and consume ardent liquors. But the Christian seems to long for a chance to throw mud at big Atheists whom he cannot boycott. He looks for "trouble," and is a "bhoy" for cutting up rough when he finds it. He "asks for it," and when he gets the worst of it, like a petted, spoiled child, he passionately kicks out at the unbeliever. Does Mr. Moore realize what pain he has caused by his wicked "affront" and by his "peculiar vandalism"?

Christian believers conveniently ignore the sufferings, physical and mental, inflicted by outstanding figures in the Church upon heretics in all ages, far outweighing in cruelty the effect of criticisms upon the puling, whining, childish type of mind evolved by Christian teaching. The Christian believer can as easily stay the present revolution of thought which is in progress as Mrs. Partington could keep back the Atlantic with her mop.

IGNOTUS.

The Right to Affirm.

By the Oaths Amendment Act of 1888 affirmation may take the place of an oath in courts of law and in all other places where the taking of an oath is necessary.

Affirmation may be claimed on one of two grounds, (1) On the ground of having no religious belief, (2) on the ground of an oath being contrary to one's religious belief.

A judge or other official may ask on what ground affirmation is claimed, but no further question is warranted, and all such additional questions should be respectfully and firmly declined.

In all cases where any trouble or difficulty occurs it would be well to inform us of the circumstances at once.

Correspondence.

THE COMPETITION OF THE FUTURE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In your interesting reference to the book Eclipse or Empire, in the Freethinker for December 17, you suggest that its authors do not realize that an empire may flourish economically as against other empires, and yet have a large population living in anything but prosperous conditions; and, secondly, that the attempt to develop our industries to the fullest extent must eventually lead to war with rival nations.

The first of these propositions is, I think, a misunderstanding of our meaning; the second, I hope and believe, is altogether ill-founded.

It is, of course, true that empires have existed in the past which have combined great commercial and industrial prosperity with slavery, with serfdom, with all the miseries of the cheap labour system. Personally, I doubt whether this form of State can survive in the future. But, in any case, it is not the ideal suggested in Eclipse or Empire,

We have urged our countrymen to brace themselves to recover their position as the first industrial nation of the world by the adoption of high production. The benefits claimed for the high production system, to summarize them very shortly, are (1) for the employer, high profits; (2) for the employee, high wages and shorter hours; (3) for the community generally, the incalculable advantages of efficient industries. This system has been tried in America, and the results are on record. "The American working man," says Mr. E. W. Scripps, an American business man who knows this country well, "is not only far better nurtured and nourished, but he is better housed and clothed, and his children are far more generally, and perhaps far better, educated than those of the English working class." But it is not necessary to go so far afield. High production is on trial in England at this moment. Germany is forcing us to move industrially along the path urged in Eclipse or Empire. With every allowance for the exceptional factors in the situation, can it be said honestly that the effort to increase our production has increased our poor? Is not the reverse, or the contrary, obviously and even startlingly true?

But, you say, our too great prosperity will excite the jealousy and hatred of foreign nations. Why should it do this? Why should it do anything but stimulate to a generous and wholly beneficial emulation? We are not asking our people to steal their neighbours' trade; we are asking them merely to develop their own resources, convinced, as you justly say, that "in our Empire there are almost unlimited sources of materials for development." Of course, so long as there are States like Germany, clinging to the old militarist ideas of the past, the sight of commercial prosperity will no doubt continue to excite their cupidity.

But is it certain that these States and these ideas will continue? Is it not fairly certain, on the other hand, that this War marks the beginning of the end of them, and that the competition of the future will be commercial, and not military? Competition, of course, there must be. It is an absolute condition of evolutionary life as we know it; but I think myself that the mass of evidence, broadly regarded, points to the gradual elimination of the more brutal and savage features of the struggle. There may be occasional "throw-backs," but they do not defeat the ultimate tendency. Not to believe this is, it seems to me, to despair of humanity; and it is because I do believe it, and because I think that high production, intelligently directed, will be a very important factor in the process, that I am concerned for its recognition and adoption in this country.

S. TURNER, Jun.

WAS NAPOLEON A FREETHINKER?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I hope you will not think I flatter you if I say that there is not one of your writers whom I read with more profit and pleasure than "Mimnermus." In my pious, or semi-pious, girlhood I used to admire, from afar off, the literary splendour of "Claudius Clear." Now, although I disagree with that writer in religious matters, I am still inclined to agree with one of his admirers, who tells us that in literary criticism "Claudius" is the compeer of Hazlitt and Lamb. It is therefore a compliment to "Mimnermus" when I say that he reminds me of "Claudius Clear." They have both the same gifts of splendid rhetoric and emotional unction; their tastes in literature are much the same, "Mimnermus" admiring, let me say, the unsophisticated and tuneful muse of George Bedborough, and "Claudius" the divine lyrics of the American laureate Ella Whilcox. If I had the space I could work out this parallel more closely.

My point, however, in writing you is not to indicate the good qualities of "Mimnermus," which are obvious enough, but to put my finger on the weak spot. The foible of my Christian master in letters was an amusing one of claiming an intimate acquaintance with great men. He is probably the Scots journalist of whom an eminent literary man wrote: "I did not know him half so well as he knew me." The foible of my Freethought master is a more violent one; he acts on the Christian injunction, "Compel them to come in." Every man of eminence is pitched neck and crop into the fold of Freethought. In his pleasant article on Mr. J. M. Wheeler's Dictionary of Freethinkers he tells us that Napoleon ("The Little Corsican," of course) has his place in Mr.

Digitized by Google

Wheeler's book. If he has—and I don't doubt for a moment that "Mimnermus" is right—he must be in the wrong place, for I cannot find his name where it ought to be.

Now, if Mr. Wheeler has left him to the Christians, he probably did it for a good reason. Napoleon was always pious—conventionally pious, I mean. We are told that he despised Atheists and women who did not pray. M. Anatole France says somewhere that when Napoleon talks of God and the soul, he seems like a good little schoolboy of fourteen. He tells us that Napoleon never grew; that he had no inner life; that concerning life in society he held about the same opinions as one of his Grenadiers; that in his writings and speeches there is not a single trace of any speculative genius. In fine, that it was not a Freethinker who kicked Volney in the stomach.

MINNIE SPENCER.

IN CASE OF NEED.

The man who had his coffin painted a fiery red, and kept it for two whole years at his front door, had evidently a very clear idea of where he was going when he had departed from this world. He is not the only man, however, who kept Hades in view so continually. It is related of the late Marquess of Anglesey that when he married and settled down in life, the many sins of his past youth troubled him not a little. There was a slight fire at the castle one night, and orders were afterwards given that hand grenades should be placed in every room, which were faithfully carried out. Some dozens of these fire-extinguishers were left over, however, there being no place for them, and the butler approached his master as to their destination. "You'd better put them in my coffin," replied his lordship gravely.

THE CLERGY AND LITERATURE.

Shortly before the final dissolution of the Roman Empire, the literature of Europe fell into the hands of the clergy, who, taken as a body, have always looked on it as their duty to enforce belief, rather than encourage inquiry.—Buckle, "History of Civilization in England."

RELIGION AND ART.

For eighteen hundred years religion, when it has been strong enough, has persecuted or starved the arts. At times, when it has grown shallow, it has allowed a thin, subservient art to flourish beneath it; an art that, ostensibly educating men to be in some way useful for this life or the next, couldn't help treating them, for a stolen moment, as ends.....But, in general, the arts have been kept pretty well under, especially the arts of the theatre creeping slowly out when religion has slept, as in the eighteenth century, or sometimes liberated by such splendid bursts of irreligion as produced the Elizabethan drama in England.—Rupert Brooke, "John Webster and the Elizabethan Drama."

ITALY AND THE PAPACY.

It was not the Papacy which made Italy great; the Papacy has always stood for division; it has consistently been Italy's internal foe. Those who caused Italy to flourish, to be respected, admired, loved; who enabled Italian civilization to exercise its genial influence in all parts of the world were her artists, who also were thinkers, and may well rank as heroes—heroes who embodied her true ideals; artists, thinkers, heroes, all of whom had this in common, that they elected to gather the forbidden fruit of knowledge. These it is who made Italy great.—Jacob Molescott.

THE POWER OF THOUGHT.

Men fear thought as they fear nothing else on earth—more than ruin, more even than death. Thought is subversive and revolutionary, destructive and terrible; thought is merciless to privilege, established institutions, and comfortable habits; thought is anarchic and lawless, indifferent to authority..... Thought looks into the pit of hell and is not afraid. It sees man, a feeble speck, surrounded by unfathomable depths of silence; yet it bears itself proudly, as unmoved as if it were lord of the universe. Thought is great, and swift, and free, the light of the world, and the chief glory of man.—Bertrand Russell, "Principles of Social Reconstruction."

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, off Kentish Town Road, N.W.): 7.30, Debate, "Man's Place in Nature." Introduced by T. F. Palmer.

SOUTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Avondale Hall, Landor Road, Clapham, S.W.): 7, F. A. Davies, "The Religion of Shakespeare."

MR. HOWELL SMITH'S DISCUSSION CLASS (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Thursday, Feb. 1, at 7.30.

OUTDOOR.

HYDE PARK: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Kells; 3.15, Messrs. Dales and Beale, "Omnipresence"; 6.30, Messrs. Saphin and Dales.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

LEICESTER (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate); 6.30, Concert.

SWANSEA (Dockers' Hall, "Elysium," High Street): 6.30, C. Cohen, "Can We Have Morality Without Religion?"

BOOKS.—Robertson's Short History of Freethought (2 vols., 10s. 6d.), 4s.; Gibbon's History of Rome (7 vols.), 3s. 6d.; Joly's Birthtime of the World (10s. 6d.), 3s. 6d.—CANNON, c/o Freethinker.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

POST FREE THREE HALFPENCE.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
QUEEN ANNE'S CHAMBERS, WESTMINSTER, S.W.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

A

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY
OF FREETHINKERS
OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY

J. M. WHEELER.

Price THREE SHILLINGS Net.
(Postage 6d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp. ...	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE PASSING OF JESUS. 24 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 58 pp.	,, 1d.	0	3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	3
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
COMING CIVILIZATION. 30 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp....	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp., ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Mangasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 82 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 82 pp. ... ... Nett.	,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY, by Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pp.	,, ½d.		1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. LEA.
In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
By E. A. ASHCROFT.
440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By CARVETH READ.
8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.
By D. B. HART, M.D.
Crown 8vo. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

THE THEORIES OF EVOLUTION.
By YVES DELAGE.
1912. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.
For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. MILL.
Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

HISTORY OF THE TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.
By C. D. COLLET.
Two vols., published at 7s. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By CHAPMAN COHEN.
Price 1s. net, postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By G. W. FOOTE.
First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. WHEELER.
Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all aws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 1,855

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 5 SUNDAY FEBRUARY 4, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
Mr. Bottomley and Immortality.—The Editor	65
The Christ-Myth.—J. T. Lloyd	66
The Poet of Humanity.—Mimnermus	67
The Suicide of Mr. Hilaire Belloc.—Geo. Underwood	68
An Old "Christian" Friend.—Ignotus	70
Acid Drops	71
To Correspondents	73
Sugar Plums	73
A Sceptical Scientist and Saint.—T. F. Palmer	74
The French Revolution.—Robert Arch	75
Skeleton Sermons	77
Letter to the Editor—Competition and Progress	77
The Right to Affirm	78
N. S. S. Executive Report	78
Obituary	78
Notice of Meetings	78

Views and Opinions.

Mr. Bottomley and Immortality.

Soon after the opening of the War, Mr. Bottomley discovered God. How he did it, no one knows; so it is impossible for anyone to reach the same goal by the same path. But he did it. With the utmost solemnity —real or assumed—he announced his belief in Deity; and while the Freethinking world, instead of being riven to its foundations by so notable a conversion, went on its way with a smile, the religious world treated it with the most supreme indifference. Perhaps it was modesty which prevented it blazoning so noteworthy an addition to its ranks. And now, probably as a slight relaxation from his labours of advising—or is it commanding?—the Government, directing the public, and promulgating a new prophecy every month about the War, Mr. Bottomley turns to enlighten the readers of the Royal Magazine on the question of a future life. And on that topic we should be the last to deny that Mr. Bottomley is as well informed as any person on the planet. It is a subject on which the fool apes the air of the philosopher, and on which the philosopher only too often plays the part of a fool.

* * *

The Two Bottomleys.

It is, we confess, difficult to take Mr. Bottomley seriously in his ante-War guise as a philosopher; but we will do our best. This difficulty is increased by the fact that there appears to be two Mr. Bottomleys in this article of three pages. The old Mr. Bottomley is there at the beginning and the end. But in between, his body appears to have been taken possession of by someone else, who writes in a quite different style, and with a quite different tone. Spiritualists would explain it as a case of mediumistic "control." Psychologists might say it was a case of disassociation. But whatever it is, everyone with an eye for different styles of writing will see it is there. Mr. Bottomley—the old one—is quite there with a display of questions that are more or less artificial, and of answers that are more or less untrue. The other Mr. Bottomley is chiefly remarkable for an attempted philosophic or scientific theory of survival that strongly reminds one of the more ignorant type of spiritualistic quack. There is much talk of "Life Force" and "Vital Force" (Oh, ye gods!) and, of course, Karma and "Divine Purpose"; and it all might as fitly serve as a literary advertisement for somebody's pills as for a theory of immortality. The single-personality Mr. Bottomley is amusing enough; he of the dual personality is a constant scream.

* * *

Do People Trouble About Immortality?

But we promised to be serious; and to this end we will deal with Mr. Bottomley as a constant, not as a variable. "The perennial cry of a tortured humanity," says Mr. Bottomley, is, "If a man die, shall he live again?" Now, if Mr. Bottomley means that this has been asked in all ages, he is quite right; so right, if we may use the expression, that it was hardly worth the saying. But if he means that humanity is continuously worrying its head about the question, and bombarding the high heavens with its cries for an answer, then we say quite flatly, it is not true. The vast majority of mankind, even though they profess a formal belief in immortality, never trouble their heads about it. It is a constant complaint of the clergy of all denominations that people will not concern themselves about it; that they live as though there were no after-life, no Judgment Day, no great beyond. And the experience of everyone will bear this out. In ordinary conversation it is a subject seldom mooted. Death is as common as the weather—some sort of weather; and yet, while the one is a regular topic of conversation, the question of whether man survives death is generally ignored. The picture of a world worrying its head about immortality will not do. It is a pulpit-engineered superstition. It is about as near the facts of the case as is the advertising picture of thousands of people struggling to get into a chemist's shop to buy Blank's pills.

* * *

Life as Adjustment.

Life would be intolerable were it otherwise. Conceive a world of human beings obsessed with this question of immortality; you will have a world so weakened, so enervated that it would be useless for lofty deeds or useful purposes. An individual may be obsessed with this belief, a nation may be, but not for long. And in either case utility is weakened and sanity threatened. For a time Europe was smitten with this disease, and the consequence was the Monasticism of the Thebaid. Men and women forsook healthy human responsibilities; they strove to be like the angels, and became worse than the beasts. And the recovery of Europe began when it shook off that nightmare, and allowed the world of light and beauty, of sorrow and wrong, of loving and hating, fighting and striving, flesh-and-blood men and women, to occupy their attention. Mr. Bottomley has much to say of our gallant soldiers who are laying down their lives, etc. Well, look at them. Are they troubling about a future life? Not a bit of it. It is the strong man in the full flush of his manhood who throws away his life without a thought.

Digitized by Google

It is the weak and helpless old one who is more apt to place an exaggerated value upon his existence. Again the same lesson. Obsession with a future life as the equivalent of enervation. And that is what every evolutionist would expect. Life is developed in relation to the needs of life here, not with regard to some hereafter. Man's real and permanent hopes and fears and aspirations are bounded by the grave, and it is only a false and artificial philosophy that sees their application or realization in a world beyond the tomb.

* * *

Sentimentalism or Sentiment?

Mr. Bottomley does not, of course, forget the emotional string. His question, "Are our dear war heroes really dead?" is not, he assures us, the barren speculation of theology; it springs from widows in their loneliness, lovers robbed of joy and promise, etc. Really, we have heard all this before, and from the professors of this same "barren theology." And we are not more impressed by it in the pages of the Royal than in the thousands of sermons we have glanced through in the course of our life. Again, let us appeal to experience. In how many cases do people who have lost one dear to them—for death, one must remind Mr. Bottomley, is not peculiar to the War—in how many cases do these turn to the belief in immortality for comfort? In how many cases does it give comfort? We do not deny the use of formal phrases, phrases that mean no more than the "Yours obediently" of an angry letter, on such occasions. But look at the cases around us. When the news comes alike to believer and non-believer of a death on the battlefield, can we detect less grief in the one case than in the other? How many people really find consolation in this direction? Do let us quit phrases and come to facts. Sorrow for our dead, its depth and duration, is a question of character, of temperament; it has very little to do with theological speculations.

* * *

An Absurd Theory.

We have but little space in which to deal with Mr. Bottomley's (the other Mr. Bottomley's) amusingly inconsequential theory of immortality. He has long been convinced that the universe is permeated by "an ocean of vital force," ever "flying in and out (at birth or death) of every living being." When a negro child is born, it attracts a little of this vital force, but the negro is "coarse material," and so, when the negro dies, the "vital force" flies back unaltered. But when a white child is born, it takes "a larger quantity of the Vital Fluid," and it is either refined or degraded in consequence. Then when it is elevated enough, "it is of too high a quality to blend with the common ocean, and roams about in search of an Affinity—which it finds in those who were dearest to it in life," and thus, concludes the first Mr. Bottomley, coming into his own at the end of the article, with a deadly raid on capital letters, we shall have, "After Armageddon—Peace. After Sacrifice and Suffering—Exaltation. After Death—for the Ordinary—Oblivion; for the Wicked—Unrest; for the Noble and the Worthy—Life, Glory, and Re-Union everlasting"—and a largely increased weekly sale of John Bull. That is Mr. Bottomley's contribution to the theory of immortality. Some of Mr. Bottomley's friends would, he says, like to see him in the Church. Well, we have been fighting the Churches all our life, so we are quite careless what happens to them.

* * *

The Exploitation of Grief.

Although we find it difficult to take Mr. Bottomley seriously, there is a serious side to this exploitation of a widespread sorrow in favour of this or that superstition. Over and over again the press has dwelt upon the way in which fortunetellers, crystal gazers, and the like are earning money out of the anxieties of credulous men and women anxious for news of those that belong to them. The exploitation of human sorrow in the interests of unfounded belief is, to us, equally detestable. We believe that real sorrow in the presence of death is of too sacred a character to be thus idly played with. Whatever help or sympathy it is within our power to offer—whether of hand or heart, should be given freely and without stint. But to play upon the grief-stricken mind in the way it is played upon is one of the most detestable consequences of the prevalence of superstition. Mr. Bottomley is not alone in this. All the Churches are with him. Nay, without them he would not be possible. It is they who prepared the ground, and sowed the seed, he is only reaping a little of the harvest. And one of the penalties the race must pay for its long servitude to superstition is that of falling an easy prey to such as care to play upon their unthinking susceptibilities.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Christ-Myth.

THE minister-elect of the City Temple, Dr. J. Fort Newton, whose sermons are published weekly in the Christian Commonwealth, repeats the old lie that when Christ came "the world was rushing into a dark night," that "humanity was almost hopeless," and that "weariness and lust made life a hell in that hard old Roman world." Dr. Newton cannot be ignorant of the fact that the Augustan Age was one of the purest, healthiest, and happiest ages in the world's history. On the whole, no Christian age is worthy of comparison with it. It is true that "Rome herself was doomed"; but when Christianity arrived it did not avert that doom, but, rather, accelerated its fulfilment. For a thousand years, each Christian century was worse than its predecessor, the tenth being the darkest and most degraded mankind had ever seen. Dr. Newton is discreetly silent on the subject of Christian history, though he has the temerity to assert that we ourselves are the proof of the truth of the Christian faith. He tells us that Paul, "the intrepid old prisoner, looked beyond the valley of the shadow and saw the sunlight shining on the hills," and that "in the swift and gentle years of the life of Jesus he discovered a redeeming force destined to reshape the crumbling world and slowly lift mankind from the animal to the angel shape." That Paul was mistaken was demonstrated by the character of his own converts, of multitudes of whom he was heartily ashamed. The Ages of Faith are known as Dark Ages, and Dr. Newton admits that after nineteen Christian centuries "a new Dark Age seems to be settling down upon us." Yet he assures us that the Christian faith is "equal to a world-tragedy," despite the fact that its history proves the opposite. He thanks God that this mighty faith still lives, "in these strange and troubled times." Does he not realize that his statements are essentially self-contradictory? With the same breath he praises the faith and denounces the times, which the faith has signally failed to redeem. He does, indeed, declare that there are many mysteries still unsolved. "Why all the woes of the world, its filthy lust, its brutal tyranny, its turbid ebb and flow of misery? If God is good, why is man so often vile?" To these and other similar questions he furnishes no answer, but claims that "Love lies at the heart of things, a Love profounder than sin, deeper than death."

Now, what is the use of believing in the existence of a love that is profounder than sin and deeper than death when both sin and death are still triumphant? How can Christianity be equal to a world-tragedy when that tragedy is still unrelieved? Emotional comfort may be derived from the lines:—

Digitized by Google

> Ah, never sank a sinner so low
> But God's paternal hand could deeper go
> His perishing child to save;

but anyone who looks the world in the face knows how utterly false they are. Dr. Matheson sang:—

> O love that wilt not let me go, but, as a matter of fact, there is no such love at the heart of things. If there is a God, his love lets millions of people go. It is a notorious fact that unbelievers are never touched by it at all. Neither God's love nor God's wrath troubles them in the least. Though he is their loving Heavenly Father, he leaves them severely alone. Dr. Newton says:—

> At least God is no far-off Looker-on, judging men harshly, condemning them arbitrarily, but a mighty presence yearning over them, within them, wounded by their transgressions, bearing their woe.

The reverend gentleman offers no proof of the truth of these words except that which he finds in the life and character of Jesus Christ, or in his spirit, which fills the world.

> Deny how you will, doubt this item and that of his story, his spirit is here, and here to stay. He is inevitably present and inevitably influential. "I am the light of the world," he said—and the sun is up. It shines on farm and factory, on palace and hut, on peace and war, slowly changing winter into summer. None can stay it. His spirit is with us, whether we obey it or not.....His life, his character, his vision of God—these are the ultimate, ineffable, unspeakable beauties and the sublimest possessions of humanity.

Of that extract all we can say is that it is not true. There is no such spirit inevitably present and inevitably influential in the world. The only Christian spirit known to us is the spirit that dominates those who profess Christ's name; and it is very seldom that we can accurately define it as pure and beautiful. Indeed, it is often spiteful, jealous, malicious, bitter, and cruel. The Christ of the Churches is a figment of the imagination, and of necessity he can accomplish nothing. Like God, he has no dealings with unbelievers. He is called the Saviour of the world, whose heart is a shoreless ocean of love; but he never even attempts to save unbelievers. They never hear his voice, saying, "Come unto me and rest." He treats them as if he did not exist at all; and they are fully justified in positively denying his existence. His disciples are continually singing:—

> Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
> Doth his successive journeys run, but very few of them verily believe that he shall. Nothing is easier than to say: "He will yet have his way with this hard world to the confounding of all injustice, all unkindness," but the pulpit has been repeating that promise for two thousand years, and it is no nearer fulfilment now than it was at the beginning.

The powerlessness of Christ is demonstrated every day, and were it not for the ministrations of the pulpit his very name would quickly vanish. The supreme business of the clergy is to create faith in him, and, having produced it, to keep it alive. Belief in him does not spring up instinctively, and its constant tendency is to die out, as the preachers very well know. If the Church were annihilated, Christ would inevitably cease to be. The clergy themselves admit that except through his human instruments he can do nothing. "For some mysterious reason," they proudly aver, "he has ordained to do his work only through us. He could easily do without us altogether; but in perfect wisdom he has graciously chosen us as channels through which his redeeming love performs its saving miracles." The truth is that Christ is a creation of the Church, and that apart from the Church he does not exist. The Church is founded upon a lie, and it is by means of that lie that it thrives. Its proud association with the supernatural is the biggest humbug in the Universe. Falsehood may be written in fiery letters across all its claims. All its so-called treasures are myths, of which the world is at last getting tired. The Christ-myth is losing ground, and, as a result, Man is slowly coming into his kingdom. At last "the lovesong of earth" is already resounding "through the wind of her wings"—

> Glory to Man in the highest! for Man is the master of things.

J. T. LLOYD

The Poet of Humanity.

> Sun-treader, life and light be thine for ever!
> —Robert Browning.

> The drowning of Shelley on that fatal July day in 1822 was, in all probability, the heaviest loss that English literature has ever sustained.—G. W. Foote.

THOUGH the newspapers be full of tumult, there is always a paragraph or so into which the meditative reader may turn aside, as into a quieter place. In one of these paragraphs there is a somewhat lengthy notice given to a great English poet, who, when alive, would have been astonished at so remarkable a display of publicity. "Hushed is the harp, the minstrel gone," but the spell holds. The name of Percy Bysshe Shelley still carries far. Those Continental critics who keep their fathers' excellent tastes in poetry know it well enough. In the New World it is known as a most famous name. As for English folk, it dwarfs for us most of the nineteenth century writers, although they are some of the most considerable in our literature.

The paragraph states that nineteen Shelley letters, and one hundred and thirty of the poet's cheques have been discovered. The original owner was manager for Brooks' Bank, in Chancery Lane, London, before that bank was taken over by another firm. The letters are business communications to the bank, and, whilst they contain no remarks on life, art, or literature, have an extreme value, for they reveal Shelley's boundless generosity. In one he sends a cheque for £150 to his friend, Leigh Hunt; and among other persons to whom he gave or lent, money were Thomas Love Peacock, Horace Smith, Claire Clairmont, and William Godwin. Indeed, Shelley was always giving, or lending, money, and it is very doubtful if he ever got repaid.

The great poet died so long ago that one would have thought that the facts concerning his life were well known to every lover of literature. Yet Christian writers have ever been loth to admit Shelley's Freethought, and his very virtues have been treated with the scantest courtesy, and his action presented in the worst possible light. Great, noble, and beautiful qualities met in this poet of poets. Splendid as his life-work was, he, the man, was greater and rarer. To the world he presented the spectacle of a man passionate for truth, and unreservedly obedient to the right as he saw it. He might have lived a life of ease and indulgence. The narrow, aristocratic circle into which he was born would have honoured him for it, but he thought continually of other and higher matters. His antagonisms to tyranny, religion, and custom seemed the merest midsummer madness in the son of a wealthy nobleman of many acres. Society denounced him, for it had long agreed that all reform was criminal. In such cases, indeed.—

> Were it not better done as others use,
> To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
> Or with the tangles of Neæra's hair.

Digitized by Google

Yet, simply because Shelley was an Atheist, Christians insinuate that the great poet was a bad and vicious man. Thus they cast libellous dust in the eyes of the unthinking public, and incapacitate them from seeing the real facts of the case. Incidentally, they discredit the cause to which Shelley dedicated his life.

That Shelley was a humanitarian is amply proved. To help the needy and to relieve the sick seemed to him a simple duty, which he carried out cheerfully. He inquired personally into the circumstances of his charities, visited the sick in their homes, and kept a list of poor persons whom he assisted. At Marlow he suffered from an acute ophthalmia, contracted whilst visiting the poor, afflicted lace-makers in their cottages. Leigh Hunt has told us that Shelley, finding a woman ill on Hampstead Heath, carried her from door to door in the vain hopes of meeting with a person as charitable as himself, until he had to lodge the poor creature with some personal friends. Shelley's purse was always open to his friends. Peacock received from him an annual allowance of £100, and he discharged debts of Godwin amounting to thousands of pounds. So practical was Shelley in his philanthropy that he even went to the length of attending a London hospital, in order to acquire medical knowledge that should prove of service to the poor he visited. When his friend, Captain Medwin, was ill for six weeks, Shelley was by his bedside the whole time, applying leeches, administering medicines, and tending him like a brother. Without a murmur, without ostentation, this heir to one of the richest noblemen of England illustrated by his own conduct those principles of Freethought and Democracy which formed his ethical and political creed. Byron, who held Charles the Second's cynical view of mankind, acknowledged Shelley to be the best and purest-minded man he had ever met. Captain Trelawny, who knew Shelley very intimately in his later life, admitted that the Atheist poet "loved everything better than himself."

Christians have read the basest and meanest motives into Shelley's relations with his first wife. It does not matter to them that Shelley's relations with Harriet are still a most perplexing problem, or that when they parted she and the children were well provided for. Indeed, Harriet's death, over two years afterwards, had nothing to do with Shelley's so-called "desertion." Shelley was but a boy when he married, and it was the very chivalry of Shelley's nature that led him into so imprudent a step.

Dead at twenty-nine, posterity has but the outcome of Shelley's cruder years; and the assurance of something nobler and wiser was stopped by the tragedy of his untimely end. It is precisely because his heart was aflame with human sympathy that his poems have vital and permanent effect on succeeding generations. Shelley devoted himself to the idea of the perfectibility of human nature, and it is the mainspring of his inspiration and his poetry. In his finest verse its expression glows with the solemn and majestic inspiration of prophecy. He dazzles us with glories beyond our reach, making us yearn for that which seems unattainable, and we are entranced with his dream-pictures of an emancipated humanity. What Shelley might have been we cannot conceive; but, in his short life, he made good the splendid boast of a later poet concerning Liberty:—

> I am the trumpet at thy lips, thy clarion,
> Full of thy cry, sonorous with thy breath;
> The graves of souls born worms and creeds grown carrion,
> Thy blast of judgment fills with fires of death.
>
> Thou art the player whose organ-keys are thunders,
> And I beneath thy foot the pedal prest;
> Thou art the ray whereat the rent night sunders,
> And I the cloudlet borne upon thy breast.
>
> I shall burn up before thee, pass and perish,
> As haze in sunrise on the red sea-line;
> But thou from dawn to sunsetting shall cherish
> The thoughts that led and souls that lighted mine.

MIMNERMUS.

The Suicide of Mr. Hilaire Belloc.

LET me at once say that I would not have the reader imagine that Mr. Belloc has committed suicide in the more obvious sense of the word. Even his enemies—and, like every man who is worth his salt, he has many, and some of them very bitter ones—would be sorry to see him come to any bodily harm, and so deprive them of the malign pleasure of assisting at his intellectual downfall. What I would call attention to by my screaming scare-heading is that he has made another attempt, and this time a more successful one, to commit mental suicide. To be quite frank, I cannot say that I am sorry to see him come to intellectual grief. There is always, as Rochefoucauld says, a bitter-sweet touch of malign pleasure in seeing others suffer; although many of us are inclined to ignore this unpalatable truth, and pride ourselves on the humanity with which we regret the errors of our opponents. Yet I must confess to having much the same kind of mixed admiration for Mr. Belloc as I have for Mr. Chesterton. I am not certain that I should think more of them if they happened to be on my side of the theological fence. A larger dose of Rationalism would, perhaps, make them more intellectually serious; but it is not unlikely that they would show signs of the ponderous dullness, the mental inelasticity, which some of us find inseparable from ethical Rationalism.

Membership of the Catholic Church has, I think, some indubitable advantages. When you can have all your philosophical and moral problems solved for you by the august authority of secular wisdom, you have naturally more time to cultivate the senses and the emotions. I say quite seriously that if the Freethinker had some infallible, or semi-infallible, authority to which he could appeal to settle his metaphysical and ethical difficulties, there might be vital improvement in his literary style, in his artistic sense in general.

However that may be, one of the things I admire most in Mr. Belloc is his courage. Like many men of ability, he thought it would be a fine thing to help in making the country's laws. When he did get into the House, he found that he was expected to form a part of the voting machine. If he had had a larger measure of intellectual docility, or even of political cynicism, he might have been at least a Parliamentary Secretary to one of the big departments; but he chose to throw over politics, and to turn once more to authorship and journalism. He exposed the Party System in terms so round and plain that even the devout believer in political purity became something of a sceptic. He also supported the bid for an absolutely free press made by the New Age, by founding the Eye-Witness and editing it for a year. Under the title of the New Witness, it is now edited by Mr. G. K. Chesterton, and both these papers have this in common with the Freethinker—their writers say what they think, not what a proprietor pays them to say.

But if Mr. Belloc is courageous, it has to be admitted that his courage not infrequently shades off into rashness. He is often in so great a hurry to secure a victory that he does not stay to measure his own strength, or to reckon the cost of a possible defeat. It may be remembered how he assailed Professor Bury's excellent and fearless History of Freedom of Thought, a little book which every Freethinker should treasure. He had the good fortune to be able to correct a few dates and statements, which corrections were gratefully accepted by Professor Bury; but as no argument was based on these minor mistakes, there was no warrant for Mr. Belloc's assumption that they pointed to a "fundamental lack of scholarship," and that the historian had written without sufficient preparation or knowledge. The mistakes made by Mr. Belloc in his criticism, I suppose, did not imply anything more serious than ordinary want of care. For the reader of "Catholic Truth Tracts," in which series Mr. Belloc made his indictment, such a stupid controversial method is no doubt quite good enough. But the more intellectual Catholic does not take him so seriously, and does not confine his reading to books that bear the imprimatur of the Church. It is fitting that Mr. Belloc should be put in his place by a Catholic scholar, writing in the leading Catholic weekly, the Tablet, and it is amusing to see how neatly he is let down.

Digitized by Google

It will be remembered that Professor Bury, over whose book Mr. Belloc so nearly came to an untimely intellectual end, is the learned and capable editor of Gibbon. Following upon his unwise attempt to discredit the reputation of a great historian, he has made another exhibition of his foolishness by attacking Gibbon himself. In the October number of the Dublin Review he seeks to convict Gibbon of incompetence as an historian on the strength of one insignificant incident. With characteristic modesty, he takes a page of Gibbon, and endeavours to translate it into what he calls history. But, curiously enough, he depreciates his own efforts by telling us that the re-writing of the great work is a mere schoolboy's task. "I have often thought," he says,— > that one of the most fruitful labours to which a young man might set himself after a course of historical study would be the publication of an edition of Gibbon corrected with the knowledge of Europe which Catholicism adds to historical scholarship. It would be a lengthy and an arduous task, but it would be final; for the whole great work is vitiated from beginning to end by the faults of which I have spoken; and upon its authority even Catholic writers (when they are of English-speaking culture) still misapprehend their past.

The Tablet's comment on this utterance is delightfully sarcastic:—

> It may seem an anticipation more sanguine than intelligent to take it for granted that the work of any given young man will necessarily have this "final" character, even though he be aided by "the knowledge of Europe which Catholicism adds to historical scholarship"—a benefit which is apparently denied to Catholics of English-speaking culture. When Mr. Podsnap is telling a Frenchman about the peculiar privileges which Providence has bestowed on the great British people, the Frenchman ventures to make a mild remonstrance. "It was," he urges, "a little particular of Providence." And now, when this new Anglo-French Podsnap comes to us with his dogmatic, a priori theories on the making of history, we are tempted to suggest that it was a little particular of Catholicism. Be this as it may, the limitation only makes us more sceptical about the imaginary young man with his definite edition of Gibbon. For as the book itself is written, in spite of Porson, in the English language, it might seem that it would need a Catholic of English-speaking culture to give it this final correction. But perhaps we must look for a young man of French culture who is also a master of the English language. And as another Dickens character was accustomed to speak of "a man," meaning himself, it is possible that Mr. Belloc's frequent thoughts of the young man setting himself to this lengthy historical labour crowned with fruitfulness and finality, may be susceptible of a like subjective interpretation.
>
> At first sight, this suggestion may seem to make the matter more hopeful. For some of us would find it hard to believe that any young man who set himself to the task would be capable of refuting or correcting Gibbon's great work. And when we are told of "the knowledge of Europe which Catholicism adds to historical scholarship," we can only marvel at this curious specimen of loose thinking and looser language. Catholicism, as such, cannot possibly impart this knowledge. Among the poor and simple in many parts of the world there are thousands whose Catholicism is all that could be desired, though they know nothing whatever about European history. But it is another matter if we are merely told that it would be an advantage to have this task of revising and editing Gibbon's history undertaken by some zealous Christian of brilliant natural gifts, such as Mr. Belloc certainly possesses, and an extensive knowledge of European history, both secular and religious. Even with this modification, we should hesitate to anticipate finality. For, even in the hands of the most competent critic, it would be a task of peculiar difficulty and delicacy. There are, happily, several Catholic historical writers who might be expected to do good service in this way. And we daresay that a good many readers, if asked to select a competent Catholic editor and corrector of Gibbon, would have given their votes for Mr. Belloc. But some of them, after reading his treatment of one of the historian's pages in the Dublin Review, may be reminded of the words of another great historian—"Omnium consensu capax imperii, nisi imperasset."

Mr. Belloc makes some sweeping assertions with regard to the character of the history. "The great work," he says, without hesitation, "is profoundly unhistorical. It presents a thoroughly warped view of the whole vast revolution which turned Pagan into Christian Europe. That Revolution is Gibbon's very subject; and yet his work on it is open, upon almost every page, to strict historical criticism which wrecks its historical authority.....Gibbon's motive was an attack on the Catholic Church," his bias presumably "distorting the values of his narrative." "He thought the Church a moribund vanity." I will let his Catholic critic deal with him; his treatment could not be bettered:—

> As it often happens that famous books are known only by name to many readers, and as literary biography, with all its fascinations, is still a special subject of study, it is likely enough that Mr. Belloc's article will be read by a good many who are by no means familiar with the contents of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, or with the life story of its author. And to such readers it may be safely said that the Dublin article will give a wholly false idea both of the man and of the book. They will be left with the impression that Gibbon was an Englishman brought up in the narrow Protestant tradition, so that the grand vision of Catholic truth was wholly hidden from his eyes. And they will suppose that the book, like so much Protestant literature, is generally unfair to orthodox Catholics, and glorifies heretics and persecutors at their expense. Such readers will be considerably startled when they learn that Gibbon became a Catholic in his boyhood; that he was forced back to Protestantism by a year's tyrannical persecution and a system of education which, not unnaturally, had a fatal effect on his religious belief. Frankly, we cannot understand how a Catholic critic can write of Gibbon as Mr. Belloc has done, and pass over his conversion and re-conversion in absolute silence.
>
> The irreligion unhappily displayed in many parts of the history is only what might have been expected as a result of the author's treatment in boyhood. But to say that the main object of the great work was an attack on the Catholic Church betrays a complete misconception, both of the book and of its author. The bitterness and hostility was not, like that of Protestants, directed against Rome or orthodoxy. The satire in the account of the Arian controversy affects the disputants on all sides. And the severest censure on religious persecution in the whole course of the history is found in Gibbon's condemnation of Calvin's cruelty to Servetus. Nay, as the best judges have recognized, the historian, in some important pages, has been more favourable to the orthodox than to their enemies. Thus Moehler, in the preface to his great work on Athanasius, quotes the following words of Gibbon, with well-warranted approval: "The persecution of Athanasius, and of so many respectable bishops, who suffered for the truth of their opinions, or at least for the integrity of their conscience, was a just subject of indignation and discontent of all Christians, except those who were blindly devoted to the Arian faction." And has not Newman remarked that "Athanasius stands out more grandly in Gibbon than in the pages of the orthodox ecclesiastical historians"?

Digitized by Google

Mr. Belloc's indictment of one of the greatest of our historians is based on one page—that which deals with the death of Priscillian, the Bishop of Avila, in Spain, and the first heretic to suffer capital punishment at the hands of a Christian prince. Now we are told that Gibbon wilfully confused heresy with magic, for which crime we are assured by Mr. Belloc, and not heresy, Priscillian was tortured and executed. The same mistake, Mr. Belloc notes, is made by a writer in the Catholic Encyclopædia; but he does not stop to draw the obvious conclusion from this fact. When both the Catholic and the Infidel agree, it is not unlikely they are both correct. Both of them knew that magic was said to be one of the items in the indictment against the Spanish heretic, but neither of them is less convinced that he died, not for the crime of maleficium or sorcery, but for his religious belief. It is sometimes claimed by Protestants that Catholic martyrs under Henry and Elizabeth really suffered for the crime of treason. Certainly that was the distinct charge; and yet an historian is not misinterpreting the temper of an epoch when he refuses to believe that they were not really put to death for their religion. And, after all, Mr. Belloc cannot ignore one fact that upsets his whole case; he cannot disprove that St. Ambrose not only believed, but acted on his belief, that Priscillian died for his opinions; he cannot, moreover, explain away the passage in Sulpicius which tells us how Maximus was preparing to send tribunes into Spain to seek out heretics and to kill them, the soldiers having instructions to discriminate between heretics and Catholics by their complexion.

I suppose Mr. Belloc honestly thinks that he has done something to damage the great reputation of Gibbon; but what he has really done is to discredit himself as a critic of historical fact and method. I will leave the judicious and luminous critic I have quoted above to put the finishing touch on this bulwark of the newer Catholicism:—

> What Mr. Belloc says of Gibbon really recoils on his own head. He has completely failed to grasp the mind of the early saints about whom he dogmatizes. And he reads back into the past the narrow, intolerant ideas of a later age. When we recall the fact that he is asking us to judge of Gibbon's great work as a whole from this one page, we are irresistibly reminded of the famous encounter between John Wesley and Beau Nash. The autocrat of fashion began to attack the great Methodist, and Wesley asked if Nash had ever heard him preach, or read his writings. When he was answered in the negative, Wesley said: "How, then, are you able to judge me?" Nash answered: "From what I have heard men say of you." "Oh, sir," said Wesley, "I dare not judge you by what I hear men say of you." And in like manner we should be exceedingly sorry to judge of Mr. Belloc's historical work as a whole by his suicidal attack on a page of Gibbon.

Geo. Underwood.

An Old "Christian" Friend.

It is more years ago than I like to think of when I first got to know this particular friend—a Scotsman, like myself by nationality; a budding solicitor, then, by profession; genial, hospitable, entertaining; as straight as a die in all business dealings, an all-round sportsman. When I first knew him he had just embarked upon a professional career for himself, and was on the eve of being married. He was a regular attender at kirk, taught in the Sabbath-school, sang in the choir, and eventually was elected an office-bearer. I, too, followed a similar course as an ardent Presbyterian, and it was in this way we were thrown into contact. As our intimacy ripened, we began to have confidential talks over a pipe.

I shall never forget the shock he gave me one evening when speaking of his business prospects. We were alone. He was remarking upon the social influences that help to bring business to young professional men, which, he indicated, he intended to use to the utmost. "And," he added, eyeing me significantly, "I suppose you realize the meaning of all this bally kirk racket?"

I sat up; I gasped; I was horrified! Did I hear aright? What did my friend mean? Mark you, I was a believer—then. "Of course," he proceeded thoughtfully, "a kirk connection is worth a lot if it is properly worked. A nice, diplomatic way with the old wives (male and female) of the congregation, and, by Jove, sir, it may be worth anything from £300 to £500 a year to a tactful young fellow."

I was speechless.

"I am only one of hundreds," he went on. "You must know that the kirk is in very many cases a young solicitor's most promising source of business. Pat the old wives on the back, harangue the kids at the soirees, gas at the P.S.A.'s (a wooden, anæmic lot you get there), an occasional bit of prayer at the Office-bearers' meeting, and you have the ball rolling fine. "Ay" (with a chuckle), "and the joke is that they believe I believe all their dam nonsense. Religion? Bah! Religion has no meaning to me save as a producer of business, my boy,—business with money in it!'

* * * * *

I have again, after a long, long interval, foregathered with my old friend. He is greyer, fatter, wealthier; otherwise unchanged in mind and body. He has, indeed, prospered. He has a comfortable home. He is an elder of the kirk. The religious activities of his younger days are not so active as they were; but the offices he holds in connection with the kirk have quadrupled in number. We met at an hotel in the grey metropolis of the north, and he gave me a most cordial greeting. Two interesting hours we spent in his private sitting-room and compared notes, after fighting some of our battles over again.

"It is funny," I said, "looking back, when I remember how you shocked me by the announcement that you didn't believe what you professed, and only had a kirk connection for business reasons. Dear me; if I recollect aright, I nearly collapsed! And now to reflect that I am a Freethinker avowedly—and you are too, you know, with your intimates in the smoke-room."

"Ay," he said, with a chuckle, contemplating his fat cigar, "religion's been worth more to me than five hundred a year. I've never regretted it, though I never believed it, and got many a laugh out of it. You ken what I mean, yon oppressive solemnity"—he had dropped into the vernacular—"aye made me put my hand owre ma mouth tae keep me frae lauchin!"

"Well, well," I rejoined; "maybe that sort of thing has been some sort of compensation for the ordeal you went through. But, in spite of everything, man, I couldn't have done it—I could not have done it. You're a lot better off as regards money than I am; but no, man, I could not positively—I could not have done it!"

Digitized by Google

"That," said he, jocosely, with a kindly grin and a dig in the ribs, as he handed me his cigar-case, "that is because you are a dam fool!"

IGNOTUS.

Acid Drops.

On February 7 the King and Queen will open Parliament in State. "In State" means, for one thing, that there will be a lavish display of the Army and Navy, and on this occasion there will be a good representation of officers from the Overseas and Indian forces. This is quite in line with previous State functions, and that is all there is to be said in its favour—except that as the Monarchy itself is a mediæval institution, in this country modified in the direction of constitutionalism, one must expect a dose of mediæval accessories. Nevertheless, it is surely time that some drastic modification was made in the "get up" of these State functions. We should, for instance, like to see less of the Army and Navy, and more of the arts, sciences, and industries of the nation. A State function should be a reflection in miniature of the life of the State, and at present whatever else it may be, it is certainly not that.

Parliament is a civil institution. We use the word civil without reference to its behaviour, but solely with regard to the fact that it does not come under the category of "the armed forces of the Crown." Fundamentally, it represents the civil and peaceful life of the community, while its control of the Army and Navy is an indication that this civil life is supreme, and that the armed forces of the country only justify their being so far as they contribute to that end. This proportion should be observed in all pageants intended to impress, and in that sense educate, the public mind. If we are really in earnest when we rail against "Prussianism," the clank of the sabre, and the menace of the "mailed fist," let us make a start here. First place should be given to the peaceful and permanent phases of national life, and secondary place to what we hope are its more transient features. We should then be giving the public a lesson that in the opinion of our rulers it is in virtue of the peaceful arts of life that a nation progresses, and may lay solid claim to be called great. Our present plan is apt to impress the opposite of this, namely, that civilization rests upon brute force, that the uniformed soldier is of greater importance than the thinker or the peaceful artisan.

A pious Streatham lady has made the astounding discovery that the Kaiser William is the "Beast" mentioned in "Revelation." This mythical marvel has already been identified with an enormous number of persons from Nero to Napoleon the Little.

A daily paper has had some outspoken articles on the proceedings of a fashionable London quack who had a business in which he offered to pray for friends in the fighting lines and elsewhere at a sliding scale of fees. One journalist paid nine guineas for the "Absent Treatment" for two fictitious relatives. The dear clergy will smile, for they know that, whilst they are in the same line of business as the quack, few editors have enough courage to expose them.

The newspaper press of London has a peculiar flavour of Catholicism, due, perhaps, to the number of Catholic journalists who write the articles. In a recent review of a book on Giordano Bruno it was stated that Bruno "was especially eager to be restored to the Catholic communion." This might easily mislead an ordinary reader, who might be unaware that Bruno was tried by the Holy Inquisition and afterwards burnt alive.

The Rev. Murdo Smith Maclean, of Malling, Inverness, has been ordered to pay £200 for breach of promise of marriage. It was stated that he married a rich woman in preference to the plaintiff in the action. Evidently, the reverend gentleman was in no haste to appreciate the blessings of poverty.

In a dramatic notice of a recent play in a Sunday paper, it was stated: "The only impression left is that if America is God's own country it must be hell to live there." A fine example of Sunday reading for Christians.

The two strongholds of unreasoning conservatism are the Church and the Law. A good illustration of the latter was given in the discussion in the Inner Temple Hall that took place on Mr. Holford Knight's proposal that the time had arrived when women should be admitted to the Bar. The Attorney-General, Mr. F. E. Smith, occupied the chair, and the result of the discussion was the defeat of the proposal by between 200 and 300 to 22. A more stupid or indefensible vote could hardly have been given. The law is quite a "lady-like" profession, so far as we have been able to observe. It calls for no very unusual qualities of mind, and with the example of France, Italy, Russia, and other countries before us, one would have imagined that we might have followed their example in this respect. The incident is a fine commentary upon the genuineness of the "gush" poured out as to woman's work during the war.

The truth is that the legal craft represents a very close and a very narrow trade unionism. And, as with all trades unions, there is a dread of any innovation that threatens to restrict privileges or to diminish gains. And, in the last respect, England is a lawyer's paradise. We doubt if there is any other country in the world in which the gains are as large or in which the layman is so completely at the mercy of the legal practitioner. Some years ago a business friend of ours was involved in a law case in both London and Berlin. It was the same case tried in both capitals. In Berlin the expenses came to just about £40. In London the expenses ran to £200. No wonder the Bar opposes any reform that would tend to disturb its traditions and interfere with its emoluments.

General Sir R. Baden-Powell says that religion in the trenches is comprised in the words "God is love." The believer who realizes that thirty millions of Christians are waiting to murder each other must needs have a very robust faith.

Poor old Providence seems to be more easy-going than the people who believe in him. During the past twenty-nine months 2,821 persons have lost their lives by fire in the United Kingdom. During the same period the loss of lives on the Continent from the same cause has been almost incalculable.

The estate of the late Sir Joseph Beecham, the famous pill manufacturer, amounted to £1,000,000. Mr. Eno, another patent medicine proprietor, left £1,611,000. Evidently Christians put their faith in pills and potions more than in prayer.

In a special article on "Woman's Place in the Church," in the Daily News, it is said that Saint Paul's views "cannot be taken as a principle for all time." This is smart—for our Nonconformist contemporary; but it plays ducks and drakes with Biblical authority.

The clergy are quaint folk. They will not fight, and their ideas of work of national importance are as ridiculous as the religion they profess. Here is the Bishop of Norwich, whose income is only £90 a week, stating that he has been growing beetroots and carrots in his palace gardens, and geese were strutting about his lawns. Does his lordship not realize that his income would suffice for nearly fifty families of ordinary people?

Digitized by Google

We are pleased to see Truth calling attention to the character of the "Commission" appointed by the self-styled "Council of Public Morals" to inquire into the effects on morals of the cinematograph business. This "Commission" was appointed, it is true, at the request of the people representing the film trade; but it is certain that this was done only because people with an exaggerated capacity for seeing something "nasty" in the most harmless of things were circulating stories as to the immoral consequences of picture shows. As to the character of the "Commission" and the person who appears to be the prime mover in the "National Council of Public Morals"—the very title is offensively redolent of cant and humbug—Truth says:—

> Why the cinema trade should have thought it desirable to petition the "National Council of Public Morals" for an inquiry, instead of the Home Office or the Education Department, I am quite unable to understand. I am in the same position as to why so many gentlemen of light and leading should have accepted appointments on the "Commission" from the "National Council," for the "Council," in spite of its pretentious title, is a very one-horse, or rather one-man, affair. It owes its existence to a reverend gentleman named James Marchant, whose apostolic career has been exceedingly varied. He appears to have commenced life as a Rationalist, and shortly afterwards to have blossomed out as a lecturer for the Christian Evidence Society. He next joined the Anglo-Benedictine Order, where he was known as Brother James. He was excommunicated by Father Ignatius, whom he thereafter virulently attacked. Later he seems to have been a sort of lay-reader in Presbyterian churches, and, after a brief connection with the Barnardo Homes, he was employed for a while by the National Vigilance Association. He left the association in 1908 to start a similar movement on his own account, called "The National Purity Crusade." A couple of years later the "Crusade" became the National Council of Public Morals.
>
> Where Mr. Marchant got his Holy Orders from is not quite clear. In Who's Who for 1913 he described himself as having been "consecrated for the work of public morals" in the Dean's Chapel, Westminster, by the Lord Bishop of Durham and the Rev. F. B. Meyer, but this consecration in later editions is altered to "dedicated to the work of the National Council of Public Morals in the private chapel of the Dean of Westminster Abbey." Whatever this mysterious ceremony was, it does not seem to give him any right to dub himself "Reverend." I have sought in vain also in the literature of the "Council" for particulars of its personnel. It has a distinguished president and a remarkable array of equally distinguished vice-presidents, but of the council itself there is no list. There may be a score of modest gentlemen who prefer to hide their lights under Mr. Marchant's bushel, but this is unfair to the public when they take upon themselves the appointment of public commissions to take evidence on matters of public importance. I suggest, therefore, to the commission that before proceeding further with their investigations they should make some inquiry as to the constitution of the "National Council."

It is the first time we have heard of Mr. Marchant as a "Rationalist." He was, many years ago, a member of the N. S. S. for a few months, and left because he found the Christian Evidence Society more attractive. The reasons for the change are best known to himself. Other people have, of course, their own theories on the matter.

Military officials usually allow the clergy a free hand in proselyting among the troops, but there are exceptions. In the United States, General Funston refused to allow revival meetings in the southern camps on the ground that "whether a man is religious or irreligious no other person has a right to rub his beliefs into his face." Three cheers for the General!

A Sunday paper has the following quaint note on a former "infidel slayer": "The Rev. A. J. Waldron, who, while vicar of Brixton, wrote a very bad play called 'Should a Woman Tell?' in which a parson actually tells his nephew what a woman parishioner has just told him in his capacity as a priest, appears this week as an actor! He is showing at the Victoria Palace in 'Nature's Call,' which is said to discuss 'the problems of the unmarried woman.'" We await the press notices with much interest.

The Kentucky Avenue Presbyterian Church, Kentucky, has decided to purchase a cinematograph machine for use at the Sunday evening services. The pastor of the church says he believes it will fill the place. We have no doubt it will—properly worked. And there are many incidents in both the Old and New Testaments in which Charlie Chaplin would cut a striking figure.

Patrick Kane, Catholic priest, was fined at Sheffield for stealing three bottles of whisky and one bottle of brandy from the railway hotel, Coalville. The defence was that there was no felonous intent, and that Kane was not responsible for his actions. The Catholic Bishop said he would pay the hotel bill if the magistrates would merely bind Kane over. This was refused, and a fine of one guinea and costs were inflicted.

A number of clergymen, claiming to represent the "Christian Community of Swansea," have written the Swansea Allotments Committee, protesting against ploughing on Sunday. Even for the purpose of feeding the people, or of winning the War, these good folk cannot agree to tilling the soil on Sunday. What they ought to protest against is things growing on Sunday. That would be logical, and quite as sensible as the other protest.

As we announced a week or so ago, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have invested three-and-a-half millions in War Loan. Not to be behind, the Episcopal Church of Ireland has invested £1,400,000. Both bodies will draw their five per cent. with smug satisfaction, and will not feel at all disturbed at making profit from the War. It never struck these pious patriots that the loan might have been made free of interest—or made earlier at a lower rate. As with other "investors," the country's extremity is their opportunity.

CRIMINAL HAPPINESS.

Only the Scot can really observe the Scottish Sunday in all its severity. But occasionally a visitor is taken to task by some more than ordinarily strict Sabbatarian. There was the tourist who was leaving his hotel in Glasgow one fine Sunday morning, and encountered the reproving glare of a police-constable.

"Hey," said the officer, with a warning shake of the head, "ye had better hae a care what ye're daeing."

"Me!" said the astonished tourist. "Why, I didn't know I was doing anything. What's the matter?"

"Ye're maybe no' doin' anything," observed the constable solemnly, "but ye're looking as happy as though it were no' the Sawbath!"

THE GREAT LYING CHURCH.

You have been told by Macaulay and others that the Church in the Dark Ages was the preserver of learning, the patron of science, and the friend of freedom. The preserver of learning in the Dark Ages! It was the Church that made those ages dark. The preserver of learning! Yes; as the worm-eaten oak-chest preserves a manuscript. No more thanks to them than to the rats for not devouring its pages. It was the Republics of Italy and the Saracens of Spain that preserved learning, and it was the Church that trod out the lights of those Italian Republics. The patron of science! What? When they burned Savonarola and Giordano Bruno, imprisoned Galileo, persecuted Columbus, and mutilated Abelard. The friend of freedom! What? When they crushed the Republics of the South, pressed the Netherlands like the vintage in a wine-kelter, girdled Switzerland with a belt of fire and steel, banded the crowned tyrants of Europe against the Reformers of Germany, and launched Claverhouse against the Covenant of Scotland. The friend of freedom! When they hedged kings with a divinity! Their superstitions alone upheld the rotten fabric of oppression. Their superstitions alone turned the indignant freeman into a willing slave, and made men bow to the hell they created here, by a hope of the heaven they could not insure hereafter.—Ernest Jones.

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

February 4, Abertillery; February 11, Liverpool; February 25, Clapham; March 11 Birmingham; March 18, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—February 11, Walsall; March 25, Avondale Hall, Clapham.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges:—Newcastle Branch, 3s.

A. F. (Govan).—Thanks for the newspaper reports of Professor Alexander's lectures. Such things are nearly always useful to us, even when no immediate use is made of them in the Freethinker.

MR. A. G. LEWIN writes:—"This is the first time you have heard from me, so perhaps you will be interested to know that up to twelve months ago, I was a communicant of the Church of England, but, owing to the Church's uncertain voice and bellicose attitude, I have been bound to acknowledge its utter helplessness and failure. For the past six months I have been a regular reader of the Freethinker, and I must take this opportunity of expressing my appreciation of its high intellectual standard."—We thank this correspondent for the pamphlet he has been good enough to send, which will be of service.

PERPLEXED.—Sorry we cannot offer advice on different lines. We have explained the various courses open to you, with their consequences, so far as we can judge. But we cannot advise anyone what risks they shall take. That each person must decide for himself.

B. F. B.—Received. Will appear next week. Sorry to hear of illness.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—W. L. Rowe (S.A.), 9s. 6d. Per Miss Vance:—Sapper B. G. Brown, 2s.

A. HEWIT.—We are afraid that publication would be so far misused as to furnish a weapon against the whole class. We have been, personally, much interested in your communication, and shall be pleased to hear from you at any time.

W. L. ROWE.—Pleased to receive your good wishes.

L. FRANCIS.—Sorry we have not the space at our disposal to permit a general discussion of the subject. The original point raised was little more than an illustration of the central topic; and as both writers have had their say, we fear we must let the matter rest there.

H. B.—We hope you will recognize the initials. Thanks for reference to article. Your letter has interested us greatly, and one day we may have the good fortune to meet you. At least, we hope so.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We are writing this on Tuesday (Jan. 30), and we can only say that the Bowman case has just commenced in the House of Lords. We cannot say how long the hearing will take, but it should not last more than a couple of days, and we shall thus be able to give full particulars next week.

Despite the prevailing Arctic conditions, we are pleased to record that Mr. Cohen's visit to Swansea was a complete success. The hall was quite filled, and both the lecture and the discussion—a lengthy one—went with a swing. Many expressed a desire to see a Branch of the N. S. S. started at Swansea, and we have every hope that this will be done. To-day (Feb. 4) Mr. Cohen again visits South Wales, lecturing at Abertillery in the New Era Institute at 3 and 6.

Next Sunday (Feb. 11) Mr. Cohen visits Liverpool. The lectures will be delivered in the Alexandra Hall, Islington, and tickets may be obtained in advance of the Secretary, Mr. W. McKelvie, 21 Globe Street, Kirkdale, Liverpool.

A new Branch of the N. S. S. has been started at Falkirk. We hope all Freethinkers in Falkirk and neighbourhood will give their hearty support to the new Branch, and that other parts of Scotland—and England—will follow suit.

We are printing, and hope to have ready soon, a new pamphlet by Mr. Mann on Christian and Pagan Morality. This is a subject of considerable interest to both Freethinkers and Christians, and we feel sure it will be found useful. We have also in hand a revised edition of Mr. Foote's Christianity and Progress, enlarged by a chapter on Mohammedanism. We also have in course of publication a pamphlet by "Mimnermus," on Freethought and Literature. Others will follow so soon as circumstances permit.

Last week we published a letter from the Rev. P. M. Weston, asking for a copy of the Freethinker to be sent weekly to a reading-room for soldiers and sailors at Swansea. This was done—in fact, two copies were sent. We have now received the following from the same gentleman:—

> Dear Sir,—It is most kind of you to send two copies of the Freethinker to me, and to promise to send them. Those connected with the venture (Reading Room) do not think it desirable to continue to take same. I enclose herewith four penny stamps for the two copies sent, and one penny stamp for postage of same. My object was to let everyone see all points, so as to strengthen their Christianity.—Yours, etc.,
>
> P. MOSS WESTON.

We compliment Mr. Weston on his very laudable desire to place all points of view before his readers, but he evidently reckoned without the bigotry of others. Their idea is, clearly, to suppress every point of view but their own. There is no room for men like Mr. Weston in the Christian Church. His proper place is outside.

A correspondent sends us the following:—

> I am doubtful about your having space for this short letter; if not, scrap it. A son of mine, returned from France wounded, and now convalescent, tells me how he was converted from Agnostic to Church of England. When he joined up he gave in that he was an Agnostic. First Sunday he was taken and put to about two hours' scrubbing and other dirty work. The Sunday following the same. This against about three-quarters of an hour in church. This, he says, converted him, and he is now Church of England, and goes to church and listens to the rot.

Perhaps when the War is over, and we have finished talking about freedom, some people will set about trying to achieve it. It is little short of a national scandal that men should be ordered to church at any time; but to punish men for not going—and fatigue duty is nothing else—makes the scandal greater.

VIRTUE AND HELL.

It is the blackest sign of putrescence in a nationa religion, when men speak as if it were the only safeguard of conduct; and assume that, but for the fear of being burned, or for the hope of being rewarded, everybody would pass their lives in lying, stealing, and murdering. I think quite one of the notablest historical events of this century (perhaps the very notablest) was the council of clergymen, horror-struck at the idea of any diminution in our dread of hell, at which the last of English clergymen whom one would have expected to see in such a function, rose as the devil's advocate; to tell us how impossible it was we could get on without him.—John Ruskin, "Ethics of the Dust."

Digitized by Google

A Sceptical Scientist and Saint.

IV.

(Concluded from p. 53.)

How little publishers, or for that matter theatrical experts, are capable of estimating the merits or probable success of a book or play, is well known to the initiated. It is notorious that no actor-manager would look at "Charley's Aunt," which has proved one of the very greatest monetary successes of the modern stage. In a loftier sphere, both Herbert Spencer and Buckle failed to find publishers, while R. L. Stevenson made no impression when he submitted his now famous writings to those whose favour is essential to the unknown man of letters, who aspires to present his compositions to the notice of the world. And, although already a "selling" author, Lubbock found his publishers somewhat frigid when he suggested a new venture. This volume was to be entitled The Pleasures of Life, and the projected work was to consist of various essays. The publishers coldly answered that—> we are inclined to think that such a book, if it does not bear the appearance of a mere reissue of papers which have appeared elsewhere, but is substantially a new book, forming an organic whole, would have a very fair chance of success. Whether it would have a permanent sale, as your scientific books have had, we hardly feel prepared to say.

Not very encouraging, surely. Yet this work proved a tremendous success, and has probably been translated into more languages than any other book of recent times. Walter Pater, Sir George Trevelyan, and Hartpole Lecky all admired it, and the reading community displayed its appreciation by purchasing over half a million copies of its two parts. The volumes were popular in style and treatment, and deliberately so. And the author received letters thanking him for his gift from all quarters of the world. One communication came from a shopman whose leisure hours had been extended by Lubbock's legislation. This correspondent writes:—

> I feel under a debt of gratitude to you for having induced me by your Pleasures of Life to read your Beauties of Nature. This work led me to read Geikie's Geology, and a number of the Best Hundred Books, with the result that I now seem to live in a new world, and subjects which before seemed dry, are now intensely interesting.

At the beginning of 1887 Lubbock succeeded in placing two Acts on the Statute Book. One of these related to Public Libraries, and the other widened the facilities for the creation of open spaces in urban areas. Owing to the Home Rule controversy, then in full blast, he greatly concerned himself at this time with the problem of the so-called races of the British Isles. The Home Rulers contended that there already existed four distinct nationalities in the United Kingdom. But Lubbock had no difficulty in proving that although special types are more pronounced in certain areas, the racial stocks of Britain and Ireland are decidedly composite in character. Apart from the very cogent evidence which he himself advances, Lubbock cited that weighty authority, Dr. Beddoe, as saying that:—

> With respect to the distribution and commixture of race elements in the British Isles, we may safely assert that not one of them, whether Iberian, Gaelic, Cymric, Saxon, or Scandinavian, is peculiar to, or absent from, or anywhere predominant in any one of the three kingdoms.

At the first London County Council election Lubbock was returned at the top of the poll as a Progressive for the City. Lord Rosebery was first Chairman of the newly created Council, and Lubbock succeeded him in that office. He also paid considerable attention to the law relating to property at sea in periods of warfare. Lubbock formed the view that the "Declaration of Paris" was unsatisfactory, and he wished to render ships immune to capture or seizure. This opinion he laid before the London Chamber of Commerce, and that body's Council gave him unanimous support. He also approached Lord Salisbury, then Premier, who agreed that his contentions were conclusive, and recommended him to sound Lord Lytton on the subject. Lytton, in a long letter, submitted his reasons for supposing that another Power would not agree. And an epistle from Salisbury provides instructive reading to-day. Writing to Sir John, in 1889, that statesman said:—

> I am afraid that in proportion as wars tend, as they are doing now, to be wars for existence, the laws of war will be liable to change in a retrogressive sense. The very acuteness with which each belligerent feels the enormity of the stake he laid down, will dissuade him from sacrificing any sensible advantage in deference to any considerations of a less pressing character.

In an interesting and amusing address dealing with his Personal and Political Reminiscences, delivered at the Working Men's College, Lubbock related the following story:—

> Many correspondents send letters of reproof and remonstrance, rather in sorrow than in anger; and sometimes under an entire misapprehension. For instance, in my book on Ants, Bees, and Wasps, I differ from the well known German naturalist Christ as to the roadways of ants. On this I received a letter from a worthy Scotsman, expressing his surprise and regret that I should venture to differ from the blessed founder of our religion, but saying that he had looked in vain through the New Testament for any description of ant roads, and asked me for chapter and verse.

And this, somewhat suggestive of the phantom Russians and the mythical angels of Mons:—

> On one occasion a gentleman in Lincolnshire wrote to say that all the beans in that country were growing that year with the seeds the wrong way up in the pods.....I asked him for some specimens, but heard nothing more for some months, when he wrote again to say that the beans had given him an immense amount of trouble. He had heard the story from a friend, and when he went to him and asked for some of the curious beans, he was referred to someone else, and so on. In fact he had been riding about all over the country from one person to another for weeks, and at last came to the conclusion that it was all a mistake!

Lubbock relished a good story, and records one told him by that genial parson (A. K. H. B.). This anecdote related to—

> Dr. Muir, about 1834, praying for the Provost and Bailies of Glasgow, "such as they are, that they may have more wisdom and grace," and when the Provost sent the Marshal to complain, returning his compliments to the Provost with regrets that "his prayer had not been heard."

Always a sincere Pacifist, Lubbock many years ago seconded the late Mr. Cremer's motion in Parliament in favour of arbitration. As usual, Gladstone was supremely eloquent, but nothing came of the resolution, although it was carried unanimously in the Commons. Armaments continued to increase in number and in deadliness in this country, as in others. At a later date, when our relations with our friends, the French, were somewhat strained, Lubbock was asked by M. Michels, London correspondent of the Gaulois, to send a message for publication in that journal which would help to remove the suspicions of English antagonism then widely entertained in France. Lubbock, or Lord Avebury, as he had just become, was disagreeably surprised at the information furnished by his French correspondent. He wrote to say that he regarded even the possibility of conflict with our Gallic neighbours with horror, and proceeded to declare that :—

Digitized by Google

> I am sure that I express the general feeling of my countrymen when I express the hope that the peace which has happily subsisted between us for so many years may long continue, and our friendly feeling grow stronger and stronger.

The Associated Chambers were invited by the Paris Chamber of Commerce to meet in the French capital, but so many misgivings prevailed as to the advisability of acceptance, that Avebury submitted the proposal to Lord Salisbury, who intimated his doubts as to the wisdom of holding the meeting in Paris, while declining to oppose any decision the Chambers might make. As a result, the Chambers gathered in Paris, and many absurd misconceptions were removed. Lord Avebury took a prominent part in the proceedings, which proved a magnificent success. The Minister of Commerce, M. Millerand, heartily welcomed the English visitors to the Exhibition. M. Loubet, the French President, entertained them right royally, and the many other amenities of this historic occasion in reality formed the initial step towards the warm feelings which now obtain between our brave and brilliant allies and ourselves. Prior to the visit of the Chambers, very few Englishmen had attended the Paris Exhibition; but once the ice was broken, "a constant stream of English visitors followed."

Nor was Avebury indifferent to good relations between England and Germany. He presided over the first meeting of an Association, formed in 1905, to promote a closer friendship between the two countries. This body was the Anglo-German Friendship Society. Through its influence, ill-feeling was for a time considerably lessened, but much patient labour, spread over many years, was essential to any permanent success. As Mr. Hutchinson reflects :—

> The terrible tragedies enacted on the European stage since Lord Avebury's death afford a curiously sardonic comment on all these and the like well-meant efforts to promote a better understanding and a rational friendship between the two great branches of the Teutonic race.

In 1907, when the Kaiser came to England, the Committee of the Friendship Association appointed Avebury to present him with an olive branch. Avebury was bent upon adding a clause to this friendly address, pointing to the desirability of diminishing, or at least retarding, the perilous expansion of armaments. When approached, however, on this suggested addendum, Count Metternich coldly requested its omission. In reply to this request, Lubbock wrote expressing his colleagues' deep regret that the suggested clause must be left out, and he continued, "They consider that the gigantic armaments of European Countries constitute a great danger to the peace of Europe." But the Count would not budge, and in the course of his rejoinder he said :—

> The limitation of armaments being a question of controversy, and in no way connected with the Emperor's visit to England, I could not help saying, on my opinion being asked, that it had better be left out of your address.

Avebury was sufficiently sanguine to suppose "that, at any rate, Germany, France, and England might have come to some understanding as to armaments." How humiliating to realize that he was so sadly doomed to disappointment!

Although not great in the sense in which Herbert Spencer and Charles Darwin were great, Lubbock was still a very big man. A noble humanist, as his beneficent activities abundantly prove; favoured by fortune, he was outside the necessity for striving eagerly for bread, and might have chosen an easier life. But being of splendid nature, he sought and secured happiness in dedicating the larger part of his working hours to the service of the race. And of him more truly than of most men who loom largely on the world's stage it may be written that he strove, and in rich measure succeeded, in conferring benefits on human kind.

T. F. PALMER.

The French Revolution.

II.

(Continued from p. 59.)

THE LIMITED MONARCHY.

JULY 14 is the birthday of modern democracy. For the first time the penniless masses had intervened in a political quarrel with decisive effect. The genteel politicians of the Assembly owed their victory to the people, and could not now ignore them. How did they show their gratitude? They overflowed with congratulatory rhetoric, told the people that they had saved the country, and took care that it should not happen again. They abolished indeed, on the night of August 4, all feudal rights and privileges, and they issued a "Declaration of the Rights of Man," modelled on Rousseau, in which they laid down the principle of political equality as their guide in the framing of the constitution. But they proceeded to elaborate a constitution founded on a strictly limited suffrage, from which the propertiless were excluded, which provided that Parliament should be elected indirectly (the propertied electors choosing an intermediate electoral body, and they in turn choosing the deputies), and which left the king a suspensory veto on all measures passed by the legislature. Even the abolition of feudalism was largely a recognition of the accomplished fact; for indeed, since the fall of the Bastille, and even before it, the peasants in the provinces had taken the law into their own hands, burning the manor-houses of the nobility, and destroying the legal documents which attested their feudal rights. To cope with any further disturbance in Paris, the Assembly authorized the formation of a "National Guard," or citizen force, to which only the well-to-do were admitted, and which was under the control of the municipality.

Nothing, it will be seen, was done for the working-class; and, although it was a period of great economic distress and high prices (cultivation having been nearly ruined by the iniquities and stupidities of the old regime), the Assembly strictly forbade all combinations of workmen, and left the economic problem simply to drift.

Yet the people continued to hope for Parliamentary redress, and to see their enemies only in the refractory nobles, the courtiers, and the Queen, Marie Antoinette. This woman, the daughter of Maria Theresa of Austria, was about the most worthless creature who ever sat on a throne. She was totally indifferent to the sufferings of the people, whether from callousness or from sheer lack of brains we cannot say; and she was the evil genius of her husband, Louis XVI., who, though very stupid, was a good-natured man, and, left to himself, might have made a fair constitutional king, as kings go. The Queen and Court, however, continually egged him on to thwart reforms, plot a counter-Revolution, and seek aid from foreign Powers. In October, 1789, this disastrous couple were planning another coup d'etat, involving the removal of the court to Metz, the proclamation of the Assembly as rebels, and the suppression of the Revolution by mercenary troops. Once again, they were foiled by the people of Paris, who got wind of dinner-parties at Versailles at which white cockades (the emblem of absolutism) were handed to the officers of the body-guard and the national colours (the tri-colour) trodden under foot. A mob of women, followed soon after by the National Guard under Lafayette, proceeded to Versailles, and the king was forced to come to Paris and take up his abode there. It was thought that, once at Paris, under the eye of the people, the king would throw off reactionary influences and be reconciled to the Revolution. No one, at this stage, had any intention of deposing Louis or setting up a Republic. On the contrary, he was still a popular monarch; all evil designs were put down to the Queen and Court, and he was regarded as the liberator of France.

Digitized by Google

With the establishment of the Court and the Assembly at Paris in October, 1789, the first chapter of the Revolution comes to an end. France was now a limited monarchy, and the Assembly was devoting itself to working out a detailed constitution which should put the new regime on a permanent basis, concentrate political power in the hands of the well-to-do classes, and, generally, avoid further trouble. The friends of the new regime formed themselves into a club, which took the name of the "Society of the Friends of the Constitution," but which was commonly called the Jacobins' Club, since it met at the old convent of that name. The leading lights of the constitutionalist party —Mirabeau, Lafayette, Barnave, etc.—belonged to it. Only a tiny minority, taking Rousseau more seriously, advocated universal suffrage, the chief of these being Robespierre, a young barrister from Arras, with sentimental Radical opinions and a total lack of humour, whom his Parliamentary colleagues regarded as a "crank," but who by his sincerity and ready eloquence was gradually winning the admiration of advanced circles in Paris. He belonged to the Jacobins' Club; but other democrats, discontented with its oligarchic atmosphere, founded another society, the "Friends of the Rights of Man," commonly known as the Cordeliers' Club, who represented the advanced Radical position. Their two chief members were Danton, a lawyer of great eloquence and political genius, and Marat, a medical man of poor health and irritable disposition, who edited a very advanced journal, L'Ami du Peuple, in which he denounced the constitution-mongers as enemies of the people, and demanded social as well as political reforms. But in 1789 little note was taken either of Danton or Marat. Neither of them had seats in the Assembly, and their public influence was as yet small.

The Revolution might have stopped in 1789, and French democracy have had to wait for generations for a trial, if the country had been solvent financially. To meet the burden of debt left to it from the old regime, the Assembly decided on a measure which eventually was to give a new turn to the Revolution. It decided to seize the lands of the Catholic Church in France and to sell them for the public benefit, substituting a "civil constitution" which would provide for the public payment of a fixed salary to the clergy. It must be understood that there was no intention in all this of attacking religion. Most of the Assembly had, indeed, imbibed the half-baked Deism popularized by Voltaire and Rousseau in the eighteenth century; but they were not hostile to Christianity, and regarded Catholicism as a very suitable religion for the "lower classes." There were a few Atheists, but Atheism was unpopular and viewed with suspicion by the majority. The confiscation of Church property was actually proposed by Talleyrand, the Catholic bishop of Autun, and afterwards the famous minister of Napoleon. Talleyrand was assuredly not a religious man, but he belonged to the "black" fraternity, and would hardly have suggested to his colleagues that they should "fork out," except under the pressure of the direst necessity. Church property was taken over, and the Church reorganized on a basis of popluar election made, in fact, into a department of government.

Here lay the blunder. If the Assembly had restricted itself to taking the property of the Church, the hierarchy might have fumed and fussed, and yet made the best of it in the end. But to alter the constitution of the Church; to make the bishops elective functionaries like members of Parliament; this was reformation with a vengeance, and brought the Revolution at once under the ban of the Pope. It would have been better to have disestablished the Church altogether, as the third French Republic has eventually had to do. But this, probably, would not have been tolerated by French public opinion in 1790. The Pope declared all who accepted the "civil constitution of the clergy" to be schismatics. A great number of priests refused to swear obedience to it, and were deprived of their benefices. Louis XVI. sanctioned the "civil constitution," but, being a pious man, felt immediately very uneasy about his immortal soul, and became, thenceforth, the secret and irreconcilable enemy of the Revolution. From this moment, he lived and hoped for the day when his brother-monarchs of Austria and Prussia should invade France and restore him to full power by force of arms. But he was still unsuspected by the multitude.

In April, 1791, Mirabeau, the one man of genius in the Assembly, died. He had led the opposition to the Court at the outset of the Revolution, and was extremely popular in consequence; but he was fundamentally a Conservative and an opportunist, and would never trifle with democracy. In the later months of his life, desiring to see a strong monarchical government established, he gave secret advice to the king in return for money payment—a proceeding which no amount of special pleading can distinguish from corruption. This was unsuspected by the people, and he died in the full enjoyment of popular esteem and veneration.

Before his death, Mirabeau had advised the king to leave Paris and place himself at the head of an army, to dictate his will to the Revolutionists. In June, 1791, Louis determined to carry out this project. The Royalist general, Bouille, was awaiting him on the Lorraine frontier. Secretly the king, queen, and royal family left Paris to join him. When driving through the small town of St. Menehould, Louis was recognized by the postmaster, Drouet; and at Varennes, a little further on, his carriage was stopped, and the party were arrested. The veil was torn asunder; Louis, after swearing to support the Constitution, was caught red-handed in an attempt to overthrow it by stratagem. He was brought back to Paris. For the first time in the history of the Revolution the cry was raised for a Republic. The Cordeliers' Club, the centre of advanced Radicalism, voiced the demand. But the Jacobins' Club, the official Liberal "caucus" (to use a modern expression), took fright at the spectre of real democracy. Even Robespierre opposed a Republic. The Assembly passed a resolution exonerating the king, and threatening the agitators with repression. The bulk of the well-to-do classes concurred. The Republicans then drew up a monster petition in favour of the deposition of the king, which was laid for signature on the public platform in the Champ de Mars, known as the "altar of the country." As the crowds came to sign it, two men were discovered hiding under the platform. It was thought that they were attempting to blow it up; and, in a sudden panic, the men were lynched by the bystanders. This gave the Government the excuse for strong measures. The National Guard, under Lafayette, accompanied by Bailly, Mayor of Paris, arrived on the scene. The Mayor called on the crowd to disperse; and when they did not, the Guard opened fire, hundreds of the petitioners were killed or wounded, and the first Republican movement was crushed in blood (July 17, 1791). Danton, the leader of the Cordeliers' Club, fled to England; Marat went into hiding; the Conservatives were triumphant. A split took place in the Jacobins' Club; and the monarchical and conservative section, seceding, formed a new society, the "Friends of the Monarchical Constitution," popularly known as the Feuillants'. Robespierre and the advocates of universal suffrage alone remained in the Jacobins'. Even they, as we have seen, did not raise the issue of a Republic.

Digitized by Google

(To be continued.) ROBERT ARCH.

Skeleton Sermons.

Snags of Eden.

"IT is not good that man should be alone," and the writer of that statement apparently knew what he was talking about. Undoubtedly, he had lived long enough in the world to find out all its advantages and wealth of meaning in the long run. And it is significant of much that the first thing the first man did after meeting the first woman was to marry her. Possibly he thought that was exactly what the woman was made for. Certainly it was the wisest thing for him to do; for we are all more or less mutually dependent upon each other. Night and day, summer and winter, heat and cold, man and woman represent each the complement of the other, and, had the first couple not married, the time would soon have come when scandal would have been talked by the neighbours. Mr. Adam would have had to call on Miss Eve some day to ask if she'd mind sewing a button on his fig-leaf; and some dark, weird night Miss Eve would have been compelled to call on Mr. Adam and ask him if he would please come over to her place and see what was making those strange noises in the cellar, as she feared some ghosts or burglars had got in. Then she would have to hold the candle while Adam poked round with a loaded axe or a waddy; and if the pair had been seen then, the neighbours would have had enough scandal to discuss for a year after. Ergo, it was a happy thought for Adam to marry Eve; and the pity is that all the Adams born ever since have not followed the good example set by the first man who faced the nuptial altar.

Again, women play a large part in the affairs of life. Our civilization to-day is in some respects lopsided because women's mentality has not had fair expression. From the time the first woman stole the first winter fruit to make an apple pie for the old man, right down to the days of Mrs. Pankhurst, she has been making history at the rate of knots. In upbraiding and denouncing Mrs. Adam for the little trouble about the apple, it is only just and courteous to a lady to say a few words in defence.

In the first place, she was only a young married woman, and she had no mother to advise her. If Adam's mother-in-law had been round keeping house and receiving visitors when the Devil called, he would have been glad to leave again and abdicate. But young Mrs. Adam's ma was not at home, or probably Adam himself would not have been out at the club that evening, and the misfortune might never have happened.

Then, again, poor Mrs. A. was just learning to make crust—another probable reason why Adam was away—and the temptation to have a real home-made apple pie on the table against his return was more than any young married woman could be expected to cope with. Perhaps only that day Adam, manlike, had growled about the prevalence of peach pie on the family dining-table, and poor Eve thought it would be a pleasant surprise to fix up a nice change.

There are scores of other excuses for the woman. It is all very well for the men to say that Adam had just gone round to look after the menagerie. Why didn't he attend to the animals in the morning, instead of spending all his time sitting on the fence smoking his pipe, while his wife, without a rag to her back, had to do all the work of the establishment? She hadn't even a girl to help her with the washing.

No wonder, poor thing, when the other gentleman made himself so agreeable that she listened to him.

THE OWL.

Correspondence.

COMPETITION AND PROGRESS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Kindly grant me space in which to briefly reply to Mr. S. Turner, jun., who is one of the authors of Eclipse or Empire. His letter in the Freethinker for January 28 suggests that I have possibly misunderstood the meaning of the above work. This may be so. Still, on looking over the book, I cannot get away from the impression it gives, that the authors look upon commercial and industrial empire as the means of the future social salvation of Great Britain and her colonies. In Eclipse or Empire we are called upon to work, not for all-round comfort, happiness, and culture, but for Imperialism. "Men and women must put their backs, and not their little fingers, into the development of Great Britain Unlimited" (p. 117). And while they do this, those in high places will strive to keep the toiling masses in subjection. I do not suggest that the authors of Eclipse or Empire wish this latter state of things to come about. My desire is to point out that it will come about if the ideal of industrial and commercial activity, for the sake of empire, becomes the order of the day. For the simple reason that those who have control of all this activity, and are bent on fighting for supremacy in the trade world, will forget nearly everything else. High profits, high wages, and shorter hours will not solve the difficulty, because this will mean high prices, and, as a rule, overwork during the short hours. In other words the capitalist will have his high profits at all costs, especially if he has to pay high wages for shorter hours. That means exploitation of the workers somehow; either by overwork or high prices, or both—as I above suggest. This, again, is no doubt not the conscious ideals of the authors; but I want them to realize that the exploitation of the majority of workers is involved in their ideal of all-round high profits, even with high wages and shorter hours. What is wanted is the abolition of high profit-making, or the legal taking of the surplus products of other men's labours. As the authors say in Eclipse or Empire (p. 117), "The mincing affectations of white-handedness, whether bred in Homes, or Schools, or Universities, or Society, must be seen no more." All who can must work for a living, but not merely for power and empire. We must have time and strength left to wash our hands now and then—that is, if a high state of social development is to be reached. If we are forced to fight for industrial supremacy, then let us not delude ourselves into believing it is the greatest thing in the world.

That strife for industrial and commercial supremacy is almost bound to lead to war, among empires engaged in the strife, seems to me almost an unavoidable conclusion. Why bother about supremacy, provided the people of an empire are all well provided for, as they would be only for our false commercial aims?

E. EGERTON STAFFORD.

Ignorance and arrogance are twin sisters with but one soul and one body.—Giordano Bruno.

Digitized by Google

The Right to Affirm.

By the Oaths Amendment Act of 1888 affirmation may take the place of an oath in courts of law and in all other places where the taking of an oath is necessary.

Affirmation may be claimed on one of two grounds. (1) On the ground of having no religious belief, (2) on the ground of an oath being contrary to one's religious belief.

A judge or other official may ask on what ground affirmation is claimed, but no further question is warranted, and all such additional questions should be respectfully and firmly declined.

In all cases where any trouble or difficulty occurs it would be well to inform us of the circumstances at once.

National Secular Society.

Report of Executive Meeting held on January 25.

The President, Mr. C. Cohen, in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Brandes, Leat, Neary, Neate, Quinton, Roger, Silverstein, Wood, Miss Kough, Mrs. Rolf, Miss Stanley, and the Secretary.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed.

The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were admitted for the South London Branch and the Parent Society.

Permission was given for the formation of a new Branch at Falkirk.

The President reported that at the last meeting of the Joint Protest Committee, L.C.C., it was apparent that the only Society threatened with prosecution was the N.S.S. The situation was generally discussed, and the meeting adhered firmly to its former resolution.

Suggestions were made as to increased propaganda and the successful activities of the North and South London Branches reported.

The Secretary received instructions to make a similar effort in West London. Mr. Brandes offered his assistance to this end.

The death of Mr. W. P. Ball was reported by the President, who paid a high tribute to his sterling character as a Freethinker, and to his fine literary attainments which he had so generously employed in the cause of Freethought. A vote of condolence with Mr. Ball's relatives was passed unanimously.

Matters of routine business were dealt with.

E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

N.B.—I have to thank those members of the Parent Society who responded to the intimation that all subscriptions became due on January 1st, but there are still some outstanding subscriptions I should be glad to receive in the course of the next few days.

E. M. V.

We are not allowed to grow up before choosing our religion. We as little choose our religion as we choose to be born. It is done for us wirhout our having part in it.—Cardinal Newman.

Obituary.

The death of Mr. Thos. Coles removes from the membership of the New Era Union (Abertillery), one of the oldest Freethinkers in South Wales. Quiet and unostentatious in his manner, deceased met his death as only a convinced Freethinker can. The Secular Service was conducted by Mr. J. H. Edwards, of Cardiff, who delivered a most impressive address at the graveside.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

Indoor.

North London Branch N. S. S. (St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, off Kentish Town Road, N.W.): 7.30, Debate, "Is Mind Evolved from Matter?" Introduced by J. Van Biene.

South London Branch N. S. S. (Avondale Hall, Landor Road, Clapham, S.W.): 7, C. E. Ratcliffe, "Man's Responsibility to Man."

Mr. Howell Smith's Discussion Class (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Thursday, Feb. 8, at 7.30.

Outdoor.

Hyde Park: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Kells and Dales, "Omnipresence"; 6.30, Messrs. Beale and Saphin.

COUNTRY.

Indoor.

Abertillery (Tillery Institute): Chapman Cohen, 3, "A World Without God"; 6, "Can Christianity Survive the War?"

Leicester (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate); 6.30, W. H. Scott, "Reformers' Knots."

Liverpool Branch N. S. S. (Clarion Cafe, 25 Cable Street): 7, E. Egerton Stafford, "Dreams, in Relation to Religion."

Population Question and Birth-Control.

Post Free Three Halfpence.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,

Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster, S.W.

RATIONALIST PEACE SOCIETY

38 CURSITOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

President: The Rt. Hon. J. M. Robertson, M.P.
Chairman: Mrs. H. Bradlaugh Bonner.

The Rationalist Peace Society was formed in 1910 to carry on a propaganda in the interest of International Peace on essentially and avowedly Rationalist lines, without reference to religious sanctions of any kind. The annual subscription is fixed at a minimum of one shilling.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

A

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

OF FREETHINKERS
OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY

J. M. WHEELER.

Price THREE SHILLINGS Net.

(Postage 5d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.
(POSTAGE ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.
(POSTAGE ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.
(POSTAGE ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE PASSING OF JESUS. 24 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 58 pp. ...	,, 1d.	0	3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp. ...	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	3
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
COMING CIVILIZATION. 30 pp....	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp....	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp. ...	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Mangasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 82 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 82 pp.	Nett. ,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY, by Percy Bysshe Shelley. 16 pp.	,, ½d.		1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About Id. in the Is. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. LEA.
In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
By E. A. ASHCROFT.
440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By CARVETH READ.
8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.
By D. B. HART, M.D.
Crown 8vo. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

THE THEORIES OF EVOLUTION.
By YVES DELAGE.
1912. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.
For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. MILL.
Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

HISTORY OF THE TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.
By C. D. COLLET.
Two vols., published at 7s. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By CHAPMAN COHEN.
Price 1s. net, postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By G. W. FOOTE.
First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. WHEELER.
Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all aws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 1,856

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ·· EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 6 SUNDAY FEBRUARY 11, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
The Wastage of War.—The Editor	81
"The Heathen."—J. T. Lloyd	82
Was Napoleon a Freethinker?—Mimnermus	84
Religion and Brutality.—Keridon	85
Religion in Russia.—E. Egerton Stafford	86
Acid Drops	87
To Correspondents	89
Sugar Plums	89
A Turning Point.—The Modern Pilgrim	90
The French Revolution.—Robert Arch	91
Letters to the Editor—"The Creed of Napoleon," 93; "An End to Lying," 93; Chastising the Deity	93
A Modern War Chant.—Arthur F. Thorn	94
Notice of Meetings	94
Books and Pamphlets	95

Views and Opinions.

The Wastage of War.

Somewhere about fifteen months ago we wrote an article with the title that stands at the head of this paragraph. It was there pointed out that the supreme wastage of this War is not the destruction of economic wealth, great as that has been; nor is it the loss of life—counting those who have fallen as so many biological units. Our supreme loss is neither economic nor biologic. It is, in a word, psychologic, and one which threatens to have a very serious effect on the general social environment. To realize this, one must bear in mind how radically our present Army differs from previous armies that have fought our battles. Then the Army was small; it was largely composed of what one may term the naturally militaristic, and it was voluntary in the full sense of the term. To-day our Army is large, colossal even; it is largely raised by compulsion—either compulsion by law or by social pressure—and it comprises the pick of the nation's manhood, physically, mentally, and morally. All the qualities that made thousands of men powerful influences for good in the life of the nation—love of right, a keen sense of duty, hatred of injustice, and a desire to have done for ever with the menace of war—have led to their risking, and often losing, their lives in this War. It is this psychologic wastage that is of supreme importance to the world, because it spells a poorer social environment for the rising generation.

* * *

War and the Elimination of the Fittest.

We were reminded of this old article of ours because we noticed that Mr. W. D. Whetham, the well-known writer on Eugenics, has been dealing with the same subject, but in a manner that invites criticism. Mr. Whetham is rather more concerned with the loss of young officers than his subject warrants, since it is by no means clear that the officers represent units of greater racial value than do the privates, and of necessity the death-roll in the latter direction has been the heavier. But in the main his contention on this head is a sound one. The deaths in this War represent a greater racial loss than has been the case in previous wars, and for the very reason that the appeal for service has led of necessity to a sacrifice of those who possessed qualities of the greatest social value. In the case of the Universities, Mr. Whetham points out, "in eighteen months some 3,000 applications were dealt with. In the rush of the first few weeks came the brightest and best of the young men; in the 'First Hundred Thousand' they went to the Front, and many of them have already fallen."

* * *

Quantity or Quality?

But having gone thus far, Mr. Whetham quite misses the significance of the phenomenon from the point of view of a scientific sociology. His remedy consists in the advocacy of an enlarged birth-rate to make good the wastage of war—ignoring the fact that it is at least an arguable proposition that increasing population is one of the factors that make for war. The State must, he says, pay an adequate price for larger families, in order to make good the wastage of war. Income tax must be so adjusted that it falls heaviest on the single man, less heavy on the man with a small family, while the man with a large family will escape altogether. But how will that solve the problem? Mere increase of population is not in itself a good. Large families are not in themselves better than small ones. Ruskin was absolutely right when he said that it was of no vital consequence whether a man had two children or four children, but it is a matter of very real consequence whether the children he does have deserve to be hanged or not. The great disaster of the War is not in the number, but in the quality, of those killed. Assuming that men and women have larger families than they would otherwise, because they may escape some measure of taxation, or earn a Government grant (which in itself would argue parentage of a not very high order), how would this make good the deterioration in the social environment consequent on the War? To ask the question is really to answer it. It would provide more people, but it is certain that there is no guarantee here that it would provide those of the quality desired.

* * *

The Social Mind.

Let us look at the problem really before us. Human conduct is in the nature of a reaction to environment. There is the character of the stimuli which invites response, and there is the nature of the organism which determines the character of the reaction. That both the influence of environment and the character of the reaction to identical stimuli vary from age to age is so plain as not to require proof. A word or an action which would in the mediæval period have led to a duel, is to-day passed by with contempt, or dealt with by an appeal to the law. And yet, if one were to transport the infant son of a modern Englishman to a society in which the practice of the duel still existed, he would resort to that method of vindicating his "honour" quite as readily as did his forefathers. The difference is one that is entirely due to a modification of the social structure. But the structure of society—certainly so far as we are concerned with it here—is entirely a question of psychology or of psychological inheritance. Each new individual is born into a network of ideas, ideals, or beliefs, which fashion conduct and determine our notions of right and wrong. All literature, all inventions, all the accumulated knowledge and experience of the race, operates to determine the conduct of the individual. Social or psychological heredity plus the capacity for acquisition, that is the whole problem of conduct reduced to a formula. * * *

Digitized by Google

The Price of War.

Now the peculiar and deadly wastage of this War is that it threatens a poorer and lower environmental influence for the next generation. We agree with Mr. Whetham when he says that while the death of an old general may be a disaster from a military point of view, the death of a young subaltern may be a greater disaster from a racial point of view. A large number of those engaged in war, and paying the price of war with their lives—the artists, the scientists, the men of letters, the educated young men filled with modern ideas and inspired by progressive ideals—all these represent an environmental influence of the greatest possible value. In a few years they would stand for the better and higher environment to which our young manhood would adapt itself. All wars kill off the physically fit, it is a peculiarity of this War in which nations and not merely armies are engaged, that it kills off the mentally fit likewise. When the War is over, it may well be that stupidity and reaction will have fewer enemies to fight because of the many alert minds and brave hearts that are no longer with us. And how will an increased birth-rate help us then? To encourage larger families will mean a larger population—although there may arise circumstances that will negative this—but will it secure a better and higher social environment? There is certainly no biological connection between fecundity and high organization, the connection is rather between that and low organization; and there is as little reason for assuming that by encouraging large families we shall make good the most important loss brought about by the War. * * *

The Condition of Progress.

We quite agree with Mr. Whetham that the production, maintenance, and education of children ought to be regarded as a contribution to the capital wealth of the community. But the value of these children, how far they are contributions to the process of civilization will be determined by the kind of education given, which will, in turn, be largely determined by the social environment in which they live. It is for this reason that we have protested so often against the introduction of military (not physical) training into the nation's schools. We can, if we like, turn out a generation of soldiers—Germany has shown what can be done by using the schools—in Liebknecht's phrase—as training stables for the Army. But I am quite certain that if we do so, and so far as we do, we shall secure a reaction on a lower plane to environmental stimuli. On the other hand, if we are in earnest in our desire to see the world at peace, and permanently at peace, we must see to it that thoughts of peace and ideals of peace shall predominate over thoughts and ideals of war. We must work to create an environment that shall be fatal to the very idea of war, and which shall render armed conflicts between nations as ridiculous as armed conflicts between individuals. This war, as Mr. Whetham points out, must leave us racially poorer; and, it seems to me, that the right way to regain that lost wealth is, not by way of calling out for a larger birth-rate, but by seeing that those born enter into an environment in which desirable ideas and ideals exert a commanding influence.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

"The Heathen."

ACCORDING to the latest and best etymological authorities, including Murray's New English Dictionary, the term "heathen" comes from heath, and in primitive times, no doubt, the heathen were people who lived in the country, or on the heaths and in the woods, just as Pagans were originally villagers, peasants, rustics. To-day, however, both terms carry an unpleasant, religious significance, being applied in Christendom to the non-Christian population of the world. In Biblical times, by heathen we are to understand the nations whose religion was neither Jewish, Jewish-Christian, nor Christian. In the Old Testament the heathen are tribes or nations inferior to, and looked down upon, by the Israelites, with whom the chosen people were forbidden to have any intercourse except as hewers of wood and drawers of water. Jehovah regarded them as only fit for perpetual slavery. Here lies the root out of which has grown the present-day estimate of, and attitude to, the Heathen or Pagan world:—

> Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the Heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids..... and ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen for ever (Leviticus xxv. 44, 46).

We read again and again of "the abominations of the Heathen whom the Lord had cast out before the children of Israel," and "concerning whom the Lord had charged them, that they should not do like them."

Coming over to the New Testament, we find a considerable intensification of the same estimate and attitude. Even in the Sermon on the Mount, the disciples are solemnly warned against imitating the Heathen. The Gospel Jesus expresses his contempt for the Heathen when he says, concerning an offending brother who cannot be brought into a realization of his fault, "Let him be unto thee as an Heathen man and a publican." Everybody is familiar with Paul's dark picture of the Pagan world in the first chapter of Romans, in which God himself appears as a monster of callousness and cruelty. Here we see the Deity giving the poor Heathen over "to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient, being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant-breakers, unmerciful."

Now, the effect of such teaching upon the Christian mind was to embitter it, which embitterment expressed itself in angry denunciation, and later in persecution and extermination. As soon as the Church became strong enough, it suppressed the Pagan worship by brute force, and by the same means came to dominate every department of life. After the conversion of the Western world to Christianity, the Eastern world still lay in the embrace of Heathenism, and to the converted West ultimately became an object of commiseration, which feeling embodied itself in what we know as Foreign Missions. Many millions of pounds have already been spent in the attempt to Christianize the Heathen. Missioners have gone forth in their hundreds, ostensibly constrained by the love of Christ, and their descriptions of the degraded and hopeless condition of the Christless East are all based upon Paul's portraiture of the once Pagan West. Thus it has always been the unanimous teaching of the Christian Church that the Heathen are unspeakably corrupt in mind and manners, deplorably lost to all sense of morality and decency, and indescribably miserable.

Digitized by Google

Such is the Christian conception of the state of things in Heathendom, and such is the motive behind all Foreign Missions; and our only charge against it is that it totally disregards the actual facts. In the late Professor Robertson Smith's Religion of the Semites we learn that the religious beliefs and practices of all the Semitic tribes were exceedingly similar, and that in no respect was any one tribe much superior to the rest. Indeed, this is rendered practically certain from many admissions contained in the Old Testament itself. The Israelites were continually accused of following in the footsteps of their Heathen neighbours by their own prophets. A tolerable acquaintance with the history of pre-Christian Rome suffices to convince any fair-minded person that Paul's account of it is as much a caricature as are Juvenal's Satires. All the vices of Pagan Rome are to be found in Christendom to-day by those who have eyes to see them. On the other hand, it is an irrefutable fact that, taking it all in all, the ethical standard of Paganism was, and is, superior to that of Christianity, not to mention that of Judaism. Cicero was by no means a superior type of a Pagan; and yet even he cherished and expressed the following noble sentiment:—

> They who say that we should love our fellow-citizens, but not foreigners, destroy the universal brotherhood of mankind, with which benevolence and justice would perish for ever.

In all its stages, Stoic philosophy abounds in sentiments of that order, and in personalities in whom they were beautifully exemplified. But we hasten to call special attention to a modern instance of Heathen "saintliness." Most of us know the story of Foreign Missions amongst the South Sea Islands. In many respects it is a terribly sad and humiliating story, with disastrous consequences, in several cases, to the natives. In Jack London's South Sea Tales is a story entitled "The Heathen." It introduces us to a white man, called Charley, who tells the tale, and a native of one of the islands, named Otoo (pronounced O-to-to). Charley was a pearl-buyer, and he and Otoo were together without meeting on the schooner Petite Jeanne, the former as cabin passenger and the latter as one of the crew, during a voyage between Rangiroa and Papeete. The Petite Jeanne never reached Papeete, for it encountered a terrific hurricane and literally went to pieces, and out of its ninety-one passengers and eight or ten Kanaka seamen, only two, Charley and Otoo, were saved. Now, mark, Otoo was dubbed a Heathen by all who knew him, and by most he was so-called in derision. To him the supernatural did not exist.

> He knew nothing of common Christian morality. All the people on Bora Bora were Christians; but he was a Heathen, the only unbeliever on the island, a gross Materialist, who believed that when he died he was dead (pp. 137-8).

Now observe how this born Atheist conducted himself in most trying circumstances. Charley picked up with one of the wrecked vessels' hatch-covers, on which he managed to keep afloat in spite of serious difficulties. Bear in mind that Oudouse, captain of the lost schooner, was a Christian. Otoo had succeeded in getting hold of a hatch-cover, and the moment he saw Captain Oudouse swimming, but almost at his last breath, he invited him to share his cover. This is the sequel as related by Charley:—

> Not twenty feet away from me, on another hatch-cover, were Captain Oudouse and the Heathen. They were fighting for the possession of the cover—at least the Frenchman was. Paien noir (Black Pagan), I heard him scream, and, at the same time, I saw him kick the Kanaka.
>
> Now, Captain Oudouse had lost all his clothes, except his shoes, and they were heavy brogans. It was a cruel blow, for it caught the Heathen on the mouth and the point of the chin, half stunning him. I looked for him to retaliate, but he contented himself with swimming about forlornly, a safe ten feet away. Whenever a fling of the sea threw him closer, the Frenchman, hanging on with his hands, kicked out at him with both feet. Also, at the moment of delivering each kick he called the Kanaka a black Heathen.
>
> "For ten centimes I'd come over there and drown you, you white beast!" I yelled.
>
> The only reason I did not go was that I felt too tired. The very thought of the effort to swim over was nauseating. So I called to the Kanaka to come to me, and proceeded to share the hatch-cover with him (pp. 129-30).

That was how the two first came together. They shared the hatch-cover between them, taking "turn and turn about, one lying flat on the cover and resting, while the other, submerged to the neck, merely held on with his hands." This went on for several days and nights until towards the last Charley was delirious most of the time.

> In the end, Otoo saved my life; for I came to lying, on the beach twenty feet from the water, sheltered from the sun by a couple of cocoanut leaves. No one but Otoo could have dragged me there and stuck up the leaves for shade. He was lying beside me. I went off again; and the next time I came round, it was a cool and starry night, and Otoo was pressing a drinking cocoanut to my lips (pp. 132-3).

For seventeen years they were together, ranging the Pacific from Hawaii to Sydney Head, and from Torres Straits to the Galapagos, and blackbirding from the New Hebrides and the Line Islands over to the westward clear through the Louisiades, New Britain, New Ireland, and New Hanover. Three times they were wrecked; and they traded and salved wherever a dollar could be made. Otoo was always at Charley's shoulder, watching while he slept, nursing him through fever and wounds—ay, and receiving wounds in fighting for him. Twice the "gross Materialist" saved his friend's life and the second time at the sacrifice of his own.

> Seventeen years we were together. He made me. I should to-day be a supercargo, a recruiter, or a memory, if it had not been for him (p. 143).
>
> He was no fighter. He was all sweetness and gentleness, a love-creature, though he stood nearly six feet tall and was muscled like a gladiator. He was no fighter, but he was also no coward. He had the heart of a lion, and I have seen him run risks I would never dream of taking (p. 131).

There are savages, some of whom are still cannibals; but even among the lowest savages there are multitudes who need no lessons from the so-called civilized nations in the simple art of living and serving their fellow-beings. But all the Heathens are not savages, millions of them standing high up in the scale of human worth, and capable of giving valuable lessons to many of those who consider themselves infinitely their superior. And yet the Christian pulpit has the temerity to assure us that without Christ mankind is lost, and to send missionaries to convert Heathens who need no converting.

J. T. LLOYD.

Theology is a child of philosophy which is always striving to assassinate its own mother.—O. B. Niccolini.

Digitized by Google

Was Napoleon a Freethinker?

Whose game was empires, and whose stake was thrones,
Whose table earth. —Byron.

Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them.—Shakespeare.

INTEREST in Napoleon Bonaparte has been heightened by the great European War. He appears to have been the last of the great soldiers who have impressed mankind, and modern warfare has not, since his time, produced a personality who sets the world alight before he is thirty years of age. Hence the War epoch through which we are passing tempts many to hark back to the remarkable being who was a great general from early manhood.

The trait that first and last most impresses us is the amazing personality of Napoleon. Even after his death this characteristic told in some inexplicable way upon those who came in contact with him. Ensign Duncan, a young English officer, who was on duty at Longwood at the time of Napoleon's death, and on two succeeding days visited the chamber of death, has recorded this impression in memorable words. Writing home to his mother, he said :—

> To see a man who had caused Europe and the world at large so much trouble lying in a small room, in his military cloak and camp bed, dressed in his full uniform, was an awful sight. It struck me so I could have gazed on him for hours, have taken his hand and kissed it, but I could scarce breathe. What would not thousands of people have given to see what I have seen?

Since that day much ink has been spilt on Napoleonic history. Opportunely comes the new and cheap edition of Lord Rosebery's Napoleon, The Last Phase (Nelson), which is no mere recital of the last days in the life of one of the greatest of mankind, but contains a wealth of wit and wisdom that will cause readers to turn again and again to the book, which throws a flood of light upon the unique personality who changed the map of Europe. The new edition is very welcome, for it contains a new introductory chapter in Lord Rosebery's best vein, which has an added value because the author is a man of action as well as a man of letters.

The real treasures of Lord Rosebery's book are the chapters devoted to Napoleon's personal traits. Emerson regarded Napoleon as the supreme type of the man of the world, and the critical Thomas Carlyle admitted that the one article of Bonaparte's faith was "the tools to him that can handle them." Lord Rosebery's painstaking researches certainly add additional weight to this view, although Napoleon's character baffled so many men. Even his own brother was mesmerized, for, after the Emperor's death, he marvelled at the impression his dead brother had produced on men. "He was not so much a great, as a good man," he said, simply. And he was not the only man deceived by this Colussus, who bestrode Europe for a generation, and whose greatness endures beyond death.

Critics say that some of Napoleon's conquests were splendid rather than useful; but they cannot deny that the ardour of his magnetic personality set France on fire. It inflamed every soldier who dragged the cannon over the sands of Egypt, and every warrior who carried his musket among the snows of Russia. Napoleon also imparted to his marshals something of his own impetuous and adventurous career. And when victory begot victory, nothing seemed impossible, for none then foresaw the melancholy and inglorious close of the Emperor's career, so feelingly described in Lord Rosebery's book, or that still later period when a charlatan Napoleon humiliated France to the very dust.

To Freethinkers the most interesting pages will be those that deal with Napoleon's views on religion. Lord Rosebery has some very pertinent remarks on this matter :—

> We have, of course, often read anecdotes in which the Emperor is represented as pointing to the firmament and declaiming a vague theism. Newman, too, in a noble passage, has given from tradition the final judgment passed on Christianity by Napoleon at St. Helena, wherein he is reported to have compared the shadowy fame of Cæsar and Alexander with the living force of Christ, and to have summed up with, "Can he be less than divine?" But the real Napoleon talked in a very different fashion.

This is put excellently. As a fact, Napoleon preferred Mohammedanism to Christianity. He objected to the Christian religion because it would damn Plato and Socrates, and he questioned the justice of eternal punishment for finite offences. He also agreed with the Mohammedans that Christians who worshipped three deities must, necessarily, be Polytheists and Pagans. "As for me," Napoleon breaks out on one occasion, "my opinion is formed that Christ never existed." As to man, he proclaimed himself a Materialist. In all this he was a true son of the great Revolution, which has changed, and is changing, the face of the civilized world.

Like so many monarchs, Napoleon was cynical in using religion to further his schemes; but he frankly admitted the soft impeachment: –

> It was by becoming a Catholic that I pacified the Vendee, and a Mussulman that I established myself in Egypt; it was by becoming Ultramontane that I won over public opinion in Italy. If I ruled a people of Jews, I would rebuild the temple of Solomon.

This patronage of religion in a ruler of a nation is understandable, for the Roman emperors did it systematically. Did not Henry of Navarre retract his Protestant views, saying that "Paris was well worth a mass"? And in quite recent days the "Holy Carpet" of the Mohammedans was saluted by British warships, and everywhere, during its journey, received with military honours at the hands of Christian soldiers. Napoleon's Catholicism was assumed to please his subjects, the majority of whom were Catholics. Yet his treatment of the Pope was brutal. In forcing the Pontiff to attend his coronation, he had no other object except that of impressing the crowd. His tolerance of the Catholic Church was not for any higher motive than that of consolidating his rule, for he was sufficiently sagacious to know that the priests would be better in harness than as open enemies. Napoleon always used religion to further his own ends, although he was himself as irreligious as Voltaire, though he had none of that passion for humanity which distinguished the great writer.

Yet Napoleon could be very human at times. Whilst walking at St. Helena with a lady, a heavily burdened peasant approached on the narrow road. "Respect the burden, madam," said the Emperor, as he stood back to let the man pass. Indeed, a mere catalogue of Napoleon's actions is more profitable than a string of epithets.

One could devote columns to so fascinating a subject, but our readers will do well to turn to Lord Rosebery's book for themselves. It is written by a master of style, who, had not his life been largely devoted to public affairs, might have made a great name in literature. Every page is worth reading and re-reading, which marks it out very definitely from the ephemeral publications of the day. And Lord Rosebery's final verdict on the last phase of Napoleon's life is well worth quoting and remembering :—

> It would be well if the sombre episode of St. Helena could be blotted out of history in the interests of Great Britain and Napoleon; it is not a bright page for either it consorts with the dignity of neither.

MIMNERMUS.

Digitized by Google

Religion and Brutality.

THE Christian apologist has been put to sore straits ever since the beginning of the War by the cold-blooded brutalities of the Huns in their conduct of the War. Such an exhibition of inhuman barbarities was considered to be impossible in the case of people who professed the Christian religion. And it must be admitted that their incredulity is fully justified if they look upon the precept which enjoins them to turn the other cheek to the smiter as an altruistic maxim to be strictly observed by all Christians. To such people the spectacle of a famous Christian nation indulging in all sorts of unprovoked atrocities, and apparently revelling in their infamous work, naturally suggested the very negation of Christianity. Hence, as a way of escape out of their unpleasant dilemma, they were driven to deny the Germans any sincerity of religious conviction. The Christian devotion and zeal of the German nation is simply an undeniable fact; it must, therefore, be a form of organized hypocrisy. It is "Materialism" in the guise of Christianity; a correct statement, in the sense that it is true of every Christian country. No organization in the world is more materialistic in arms and ambitions than the Christian Church.

It never occurs to these apologists to turn their attention the other way, and see if they can find a single instance of even an attempt at putting that famous injunction into practice by any section of the Church; or, again, to inquire if the maxim itself was ever intended as a precept of altruistic morality. They simply assume that it was enjoined to be observed for the sake of others, and that true Christians have always done so!

A little reflection upon the annals of history, especially ecclesiastical history, would have taught them that religion and brutality are "familiar friends"; indeed, they are so correlated that the degree of inhumanity displayed has often been regarded as a measure of religious zeal.

It may be easily shown either psychologically or from history that a Monotheistic religion tends to make morality egoistic and clannish within the religious fold, and prohibited or inverted to those outside its pale. I need hardly say that I do not refer to the Monotheism of philosophers like Plato and Aristotle, with which, unfortunately, it is persistently confounded, but to the Monotheism of a Deity with an individual or "proper" name; that is, to the Monotheism created by priests, who, not lacking in self-confidence, and seeking self-aggrandizement, promoted or elevated their tribal deity to the place of highest honour by declaring him to be the supreme God. This "priestly made" or "promoted" mono-god retains all the traits of its former self, even to its name; his care is still the tribe or its equivalent, the Church. His attributes are simply extended and magnified.

The basic presumption of this sacerdotal Monotheism, viz., that of being the one true religion, inevitably engenders in its followers a spirit of supercilious hauteur, and makes tolerance of other religions an inconsistency. Perforce it becomes aggressive and despotic; and when two religions of this order meet in arms, there ensues such a spectacle of woe as would make the gods weep were they touched with human pity. Let the reader revert in thought to the Crusades of history.

But it is not only in the case of a collision of "likes" that such a religion tends to make the exercise of ordinary morality impossible beyond its own pale. The fact is sufficiently exemplified in the history of Judaism and of Christianity.

Jahveh showed neither mercy nor justice towards people who were not Israelites. His savage commands to "put everything that breatheth to the edge of the sword," "destroy them utterly," and the like, simply indicate the moral attitude and spirits of the Jews towards the Gentile world. The same lesson is taught by the egregious treachery of St. Bartholomew's Massacre, the wholesale murder of the Albigenses, and by the long list of villainies perpetrated by the Holy Inquisition. It reveals beyond possible cavil or doubt the fact that the moral code which "holy" Christian zeal provided for the conscience of Catholics, in the case of heretics and Protestants, was "treachery," "robbery," and "murder." These enormities were even regarded as virtues! And the same limitations of moral obligations characterized the inter-relations of all the Monotheistic fragments of the great historic Church; the same "gentle" spirit permeated all the strictly orthodox sections till modern Humanism assuaged their mutual bitterness.

The lesson, therefore, from these few historical references (which, by-the-bye, could be multiplied a thousandfold) is that barbarous atrocities were never considered by the Church, either Jewish or Christian, to be in any way inconsistent with a zealous profession of the Faith. Indeed, as I have already said, they were often taken as a test of divine loyalty and religious zeal.

But it may be retorted that Germany is not now engaged in a religious war, and that her enemies worship the very same God. Very true. But history likewise tells us that, in order to replace the moral law by a code of rapine and murder, it is not necessary to have a religious quarrel as a pretext to awaken the religious conscience of people. A Monotheistic cult always strives to become supreme in its own state—socially as well as religiously. The one aim of its priesthood is to hold the reins of both secular and religious authorities, and to unite king and priest in one person. And the reason is obvious: it is the one condition essential to enable it to impose its "one true creed and ritual" upon all.

When, however, it cannot capture the throne, it seeks to direct and control it from behind. This alliance, whether it be explicit or implicit, has received the name of "theocracy," or god-rule. Strictly speaking, it should be called "hierocracy," or priest-rule; for it is a government by the priesthood in the name of its deity. Religious and secular interests are thus unified, though the former takes precedence in all things. A theocracy may, therefore, be compared to a bipolar ganglion; for it is stimulated to action equally by either branch, the religious or secular. Interference with the secular interests of this ecclesiastical State is as furiously resented as if you touched its creed or ritual.

Now, Germany is virtually a theocracy. That is the meaning of the divine right of kings claimed by the Kaiser. He regards himself as Jahveh's viceroy—Germany's tutular divinity. Hence, religion and politics, or Church and State, are in the Fatherland united in one compound system, having one authoritative head in the Kaiser, who is both king and high priest. The interests of religion and of the State are there one. Whatever, therefore, promotes the general welfare of this great Christian fold is good, and whatever tends to injure it is evil. The enemies of the Fatherland are foes of Jahveh, and are therefore outlaws, to be tortured and slain by anyone who may or can. By so doing, he does a service to Germany and Germany's God; and so they pray, "Gott strafe England." Moral obligations are due to no one that fights against the Fatherland; indeed, to no one who does not fight with her. To assume that brutality and a sincere profession of a Monotheistic religion cannot reside within the same person is to shut one's eyes wilfully to one of the most palpable lessons of Christian history.

KERIDON.

Digitized by Google

Religion in Russia.

I.—PAGANISM.

IN ancient times His Worship the Mayor of Heaven was as condescending towards the Russians in matters of religion as "He" has always been in the case of every other nation in the early days of history. Doubtless "He" deemed it wise to reserve the true revelation of "His" divine will until a later period, thinking it consistent with divine intellectual honesty to allow the Russians to live for centuries in the darkness of their pagan superstition.

No trace of Christianity, the so-called authoritative revelation of the way of salvation according to the "Will of God," is discernible in Russia for nearly nine centuries of the Christian era at least.

As the majority of Russians belong to the Slavonic family of the Aryan race, we must turn to the mythology of the Slavs for an idea of the evolution of religion, beliefs, and ceremonies in Russia. In doing so we shall meet with confirmation of the fact that the general evolution of religion has been the same throughout the world. From pre-human animal life there has been passed on to man the tendency to animize the inanimate objects of his environment, a tendency that has been prolific in the production of religious beliefs, especially when under cultivation by the ingenious members of the priestcraft.

Unable to realize the meaning of the various phenomena, with which they were surrounded, the early Slavs performed superstitious rites and magic charms in order to gain favour with objects from which they feared harm might come. In time, feelings of gratitude and joy towards certain external phenomena developed, and produced a belief in kindly disposed silvan spirits who populated the woods and forests, and gave joy to all human beings who sought to please them. But the feeling of fear has been such an essential element in religious emotion that it has persisted even into the most fanciful beliefs concerning nymphs and genii. There have been good and bad among these beings of the grottos, the mountains, the trees, the rivers, and the flowers. As S. Reinach says:—

> The nymphs mentioned by Procopious were the Vilas, common to all save the Baltic Slavs. The Vilas, who inhabited the clouds, the earth, and the waters, were pretty girls who passed their time dancing and hunting. Though sometimes benevolent and healers of sickness, they were often maleficent, raising tempests, killing or blinding those who surprised them bathing, and inflicting fits of delirium, like the Greek nymph (Orpheus, pp. 145-6).

Sacrifices of oxen, and even human beings, were frequently offered, by the ancient Slavs to their river-gods, and Volusu the god of flocks. The arts of divination were also performed in the hope that some knowledge of the future prosperity, or otherwise, of the fisherman or herdsmen might be obtained.

Among the principal deities of the Slavs in Poland and Russia were Lada the goddess of love and pleasure; Kupala god of the fruits of the earth; Kolida god of festivals; and, Forlong tells us, that three great rivers, the Dnieper, the Don, and the Bug, were represented by images and adored. (Art. 'Slavs' in Faiths of Man, vol. i., p. 318).

The chief deity of the Slavs, however, was Perun or Perkunas the god of thunder or of the sky and fire. He was "lord of the universe," to whom cattle and other victims were sacrificed. His wife was the earth, but he seems to have had an interest in Stri-bog the sun-goddess. The ancient Russians kept a perpetual fire burning in connection with his worship, but fire was also a symbol of the sun. Not only so, according to one writer, Perkunas or Perun is represented, in Lithuanian songs, as a champion of the sun-goddess.

> According to one of these songs Perkunas cleft the moon—which, we must remember, is masculine among the Slavs—for his infidelity to the sun, which is feminine. He had deserted her and fallen into love with Jutrzenka, or the morning-star (Religious Systems of the World, p. 262; Slavonic Religion, by W. R. Morfill).

The Slavonic conception of the god Perun was in keeping with one aspect of the popular idea of God, which implies wealth and power. Perun manifests his power in the making and weilding of thunder-bolts. So persistent has the worship of Perun been that he is in reality worshipped under the guise of the prophet Elias by many modern Russians. The powers of Perun, as god of thunder, have been transferred to Elias. When it thunders it is Elias driving in his chariot on the clouds, while the flashes of lightning are the arrows, which in anger, he throws to the earth. It is for him to send or withhold the rain or hail, and to him the people pray that the harvest may be abundant. (See Stepniak, Russian Peasantry, p. 359, vol. i., ed. 1905). Such is the power of Christianity to purify the world from pagan beliefs!

With the Baltic Slavs, one of the most important deities was Sviantovit, to whom there was erected at Arkona, the capital of Rugen, a fine temple constructed of wood. He was a god of war, who seems to have been closely associated with the agricultural and pastoral pursuits of his people. Year by year, when the harvesting was over, a great ceremony was held in his honour. Much feasting took place, and sobriety on the occasion was looked upon as sinful. During the ceremony it was the duty of the priest to take from the hand of the idol, of Sviantovit, a horn which had been filled with liquor at the previous harvest-time. From this he predicted whether there would be plenty at the next harvest.

In the worship of the river-gods, the god of flocks, the god of fruits, and in the worship of Sviantovit and Perun we note the influence of the economic factor. Here is man expressing gratitude for a full stomach, and hoping that a plentiful supply of food will be forthcoming in the near future.

Some idea as to the power of the soul to exist apart from the body seems to have developed among the early Russians. They were in the habit of placing various things around their graves in the hope that the one who had departed this life would make use of the gifts in the other world. To quote S. Reinach:—

> The word raj, common to all the Slavs, must have meant the other world before it was used to designate the Christian Paradise. The rites of burial and cremation were both practised; Slav widows, like those of the Hindus, were sometimes burnt on their husbands' funeral pyres. Banquets were given in honour of the dead, who were supposed to eat the remains. There is still a survival from this custom" (Orpheus, p. 147).

With the development of the patriarchal state of society from the Matriarchate, there seems to have developed a belief in ancestor-worship, and in the existence of house-spirits. The chief house-spirit, called the grandfather of the house, was believed to remain in hiding during the day, and to come out during the night. Then he would eat whatever food was left for him. His blessings and help were invoked, and sacrifices were offered to him. When the peasant and his family changed their abode, they invited all the house-spirits of their own household to go with them. Even now, at the celebration of a country wedding, in many parts of Russia, the bride goes through a ceremony of farewell to the house-spirits of her parent's household. After this she must perform the rites of introduction to the spirits of her husband's household. In the case of a bride who has misconducted herself before marriage, she must undergo a process of purification. This she does by sitting in a carriage by the side of her future husband, and thus crossing a huge fire which is ablaze in the yard of the bridegroom's house. A pagan method of purification nearly as cheap as the Christian washing in the "blood of the Lamb." (See Maxime Kovalevsky's Modern Customs and Ancient Laws of Russia, pp. 23-36; W. R. Morfill's Slavonic Religion in Religious Systems of the World, p. 266; and S. Reinach's Orpheus, p. 146).

Digitized by Google

For a long time the Russian peasants were "pagan" enough to believe that, provided they had their parent's approval, young people could be truly married without the consecrating hands of the priest being waived over them. This, however, did not mean good business to the Church. So the usual scheming for power and pelf was entered upon until marriage was turned into a Christian sacrament in Russia as in other Christianized countries. To quote Kovalevsky (as above, p. 37):—

> For many centuries the Russian clergy had to fight against the inveterate custom of our lower classes to contract unions without the sanction of the Church. The young couple saved the expense of a religious ceremony and thought their union legally established as soon as they were publicly joined to each other in the presence of the community.

"Saved the expense of a religious ceremony." Oh, the poor clergy!

As the worship of the Phallus, or male reproductive organ, has been one of the most widespread of religious acts, it is not surprising that it is to be found in Russia.

In the sixteenth century a Russian monk, named Pamphil, complains of the yearly phallic festivals, in which a good deal of sexual promiscuity took place. In the State of Novgorod the worshippers went to the banks of the rivers to hold their meetings, and to perform the rites which had been indulged in by their ancestors in pre-Christian days. Speaking of this M. Kovalevsky says:—

> The meetings took place, as a rule, the day before the festival of St. John the Baptist, which, in pagan times, was that of a divinity known by the name of Jarilo, corresponding to the Priapus of the Greeks (as above p. 11).

It is known that phallic festivals in honour of pagan deities have persisted into modern times in many parts of Russia. Here we have but another instance of the fact that widespread conversion to Christianity often, if not always, means nothing more than the adoption of Christian names, to take the place of the old, for various beliefs, rites, and ceremonies. Some modifications take place as time goes on, but, fundamentally, the pagan ways and pagan thoughts are there.

E. EGERTON STAFFORD.

(To be concluded.)

It is, of course, not the Germans, but our noble Allies, the French, who have completely secularized national education. Has the result been disastrous to the moral of the French nation? Is true religion weaker or stronger in France than it was when the educational system was effectively controlled by the clergy? Religion will not perish if it ceases to be indifferently taught ex officio to herds of inattentive babies in the elementary schools, and religious influence will remain in the only force that tells—the personal characters of the masters and mistresses.—Professor Alison Phillips.

Acid Drops.

Freethinker readers will probably remember the story circulated concerning the late Queen Victoria and the African chief. It ran that the Queen handed a Bible to the chief, remarking that that was the source of England's greatness. When some inquisitive person ran the story to earth, it was confessed that it was "founded on a misapprehension." A similar fate has now overtaken another and similar legend in which the late Lord Roberts figured. That impossible and constitutionally unveracious person, the Bishop of London, stated in a National Mission leaflet that Lord Roberts, shortly before his death, said, "We have got the men, we have got the guns, we have got the money; what we now want is a nation on its knees." For our own part, we considered it the kind of thing that Lord Roberts might have said, since he had said things equally silly; and a nation on its knees is what many would desire for various reasons. A great many things would be possible were that end achieved. As Ambrose Bierce remarked, camels and men take their burdens kneeling.

But it turns out that this story is one more to be added to the list of pious lies. John Bull wrote to the Bishop, asking for his authority for the statement. He was referred to a little booklet by the Rev. E. A. Burroughes. On the latter being written, he replied that the story was given him by a friend, who had seen it in a letter written by Lord Roberts, but he had not seen the letter itself. The name of this friend was given as Dr. Richardson, of the Church Army. On being written to, Dr. Richardson replied that he had not seen the letter; the sentence had been repeated to him by a friend. Dr. Richardson suggested that a certain member of Lord Roberts' family would be the best person of whom inquire. To an inquiry, this relative of Lord Robert replied:—

> I am quite certain Lord Roberts never made the statement you quote in your letter.....You are at liberty to say that Lord Roberts never made the statement.

Finally, on being confronted with this disclaimer, the Bishop of London replied, through his secretary: "If you can prove to the Bishop that this story about Lord Roberts is untrue, it is needless to say that, should a new edition of Cleansing London be issued, the Bishop would withdraw the quotation from it."

Observe the attitude of this man whose professed desire is to moralize London. He cites a story on behalf of which not a shred of evidence is offered. He is confronted with the statement that a member of Lord Roberts's family flatly denies that it was made, and his reply is that he will keep on telling the lie until you prove that Lord Roberts never said it! How on earth can one prove that a dead man never said it? Not being a bishop we were under the impression that right-minded people required some evidence for a statement before making it. Bishop Ingram's rule is the other way about. And we have no hesitation in saying that the rule indicates the man. Anything is lawful so long as it serves his purpose. Any statement is permissible so long as it serves the purpose of the Church. We suggest to the bishop—no, not to the Bishop, he is hopeless, but to the public—that one way of improving the morals of the Christian world would be to cultivate a sense of intellectual rectitude.

Writing on "Religion and the War" in a Sunday paper, Rita, the well-known novelist, says, "Every commandment, every tenet of faith and justice, every doctrine as Christ preached it and the Church canonized it, stand broken and aghast." Just so! But the dear clergy, who are "too proud to fight," still draw their salaries.

Why is it that so many newspapers advertise the doings of the clergy so industriously? Recently, the Daily Chronicle, in an article on "Prayer in the War Zone," said, "Of all the actors in the great tragedy of the War, none stand out more heroically than the chaplains." Is that the sober truth? We do not think that the Allies' cause would triumph if it had to rely solely on the aid of the clergy. Their chief duty is to administer communion to the soldiers, and they are paid handsomely for the service—far better than the soldiers themselves. The editor of a great daily newspaper ought to be aware of such things.

Digitized by Google

The new Headmaster of Eton is evidently bent on making a record—for stupidity. In his first sermon, after taking up his new post, he said the German peace proposals were not Christian either in theory or practice. We should not care to discuss this point, but the reverend gentleman goes on to say that these proposals were based solely on reason; from which we draw the conclusion that things based on reason are opposed to Christianity. A correspondent, in sending us the cutting, wonders whether anyone outside a lunatic asylum—except a clergyman—could be guilty of such an absurdity. We confess to having doubts. Walter Bagehot said once, "There are lies, damned lies—and statistics." We often feel inclined to paraphrase this by saying, "There are fools, damned fools—and clergymen."

The Headmaster of Eton was addressing the boys committed to his care, and, after saying what has been quoted, he declared that "reason by itself was not able to keep a boy straight for one half-year." There are, of course, other things than reason that go to the determination of conduct. But it is hardly a healthy symptom when the headmaster of a school commences by sowing in the minds of his boys a profound distrust of reason. After all, reason is the best guide we have, and it is the duty of a good teacher to train those committed to his care to use it well and wisely. Reason guided by sentiment is almost bound to lead one astray. Sentiment guided by reason is the only sane and useful rule. Such teaching as that of the Headmaster of Eton sets one wondering why a clergyman is appointed to the headmastership of a great school. It does explain why English education is in so unsatisfactory a condition.

Although thirty-nine bishops share £180,700 annually, their names have not yet figured among the subscribers to the War Loan. As they will not permit their clergy to fight, and will not assist the country financially in its hour of need, one might ask what they are doing that is at all useful.

The Rev. James Boyle, on taking the vicarage of Wembden, in the diocese of Wells, writes in the Mitcheddean Parish Magazine:—

> Very shortly the parish will see its tenth rector in less than 40 years. Few places can boast so melancholy a record. Of the nine who have vacated the benefice only three have done so on account of preferment.
>
> When I came to you in 1910 I said I should stay just as long as it suited my convenience—not an hour longer, not an hour shorter. I have kept my word.
>
> It is a real wrench to leave our magnificent church and the reredos. I wish I could say the same about the people as a whole. We part with much regret from a few staunch friends, but the bulk of the people do not seem to have the faculty of arousing a rector's interest or of responding to his attempts to win theirs. If this were an unusual thing the blame would appear personal, but the parochial history seems to point elsewhere.
>
> I am sure Mr. Colchester Wemyss (the patron of the living) will get you the best man he can, but his work will depend upon you. There are some, however, who belong to the synagogue of Satan, who try to undermine the rector's work with consistent impartiality. How long will you be beguiled by them?
>
> First impressions are lasting. When your new rector comes see that you give him the impression that it is what you can do for him, and not what you can get out of him.

We venture the opinion that this clergyman's pastorate has no been quite a success.

The tender affection of the clergy for education has been shown over and over again during the course of the War. They dare not openly oppose it, the time has gone by for that, but no opportunity is lost of using Germany as the "orrible example" of the results of education, and of impressing upon the people of this country, that in any case education, to be of service, must be under religious control. Thus, the Rev. A. C. Hill, of Elgin Place, Glasgow, said the other day: "We must not follow the German lead in education too closely, but must educate the conscience and train the ethical faculties." Greater nonsense was never uttered. What else has Germany been doing but training the conscience of its people? It may be said, and with justice, that it has trained the national conscience in the direction of giving a servile support to militarism; but that is all. The War would have been impossible had Germany not trained the people in this way. The real charge against Germany is that of the misdirection of education. To use Germany as a warning against devoting our energies to education is, to put it mildly, absurd.

"Give us this day our daily bread" was emphasized in a special service held in Berlin on the Kaiser's birthday. It strikes us that the prayer would be better addressed to the British Navy, which has far more to do with it than the Deity. And whether addressed to Admiral Beatty or God Almighty the answer to the prayer is likely to be the same.

Sir Robert Newman, speaking at a Church Union meeting in Exeter, said he believed that "the majority of men and women in this country did not believe in Christianity at all." We wish we could endorse Sir Robert's opinion on the matter, but we take it as a pleasing admission of the fact that a very considerable portion of the population are as described. All we wish is that this proportion would say so, and say it in a way that could be heard by all. Sir Robert Newman also confessed to a fear that when the War is over there would be a school advocating brotherly love in such a way that one would not know whether a man was Roman Catholic, Anglican, or Plymouth Brother. Sir Robert need be under no apprehension on this score. Christian brotherly love is never likely to be so aggressive as to prevent Christians showing by their conduct that they belong to different sects. Religious zeal will always be strong enough to keep Christians fighting.

War is a great national cleanser, say the clergy, although they like to see other men doing the fighting. At Barking recently it was stated that all the reformatories were full, and three boys were ordered to be birched.

In view of the call for men for national service some of the bishops are of opinion that the clergy ought to volunteer their help, so long as it was some sort of non-combatant service. Evidently they are discovering the blunder of their attitude towards the Military Service Act. But this move will hardly improve their position in the eyes of intelligent persons. We could appreciate the last move if the clergy had stood apart from the War and confined their energies to those of a peaceful and humanitarian character. But they did not. They have been energetic recruiting agents. And we have nothing but contempt for people who urge others to go to war while declining military service for themselves. And, we fancy, many others—not of necessity Freethinkers—will share our feeling. The only man who is justified in urging others to fight is the man who is willing and ready to fight himself.

The great European War is to benefit religion the clergy tell us, but there are few signs that point that way. A writer in a Sunday paper, speaking of the question of immortality, says "Religion, as taught and accepted, does not answer the question except by a demand for belief in miracles and a faith opposed to all reason. If the Great War has done nothing else, it has brought that fact home to thousands of suffering, questioning, breaking hearts."

In Paris a hospital patient has been asleep for twenty-nine months. The Christian Church has been asleep for centuries.

The War has not absorbed the energies of a kindly Providence. Landslides have occurred on Bali Island, causing over six hundred deaths, and a fishing village has been wiped out on the Devon coast by a furious gale.

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

February 11, Liverpool; February 25, Clapham; March 11 Birmingham; March 18, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—February 11, Walsall; March 25, Avondale Hall, Clapham.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—T. Raff (Western Australia), £2 2s.; A. Pringle, 5s.; Old Sailor, 9s. 6d.; S. E., 2s. 6d.

T. V. WILLIAMS.—Pleased to hear from one of a family of ten—all Atheists. You ought to be a fearfully depraved lot; but somehow we feel you are all "all right," in spite of so demoralizing an environment.

H. M.—Domestic differences arise on many other questions besides religion. And we certainly see no reason, in the general run of cases, why one should wait for the rest of the family to avow heresy before doing so oneself. Someone must make a start every time.

T. MATHEWS.—Let it stand that Christianity did not cause the War. Is it not enough that it did not prevent it? On that there can be no dispute.

H. LEWIN.—Glad to have your appreciation of "Acid Drops." We note that you would like more each week. We should also like an extra pair of hands and a few more hours per day. We are doing our best with one pair of hands and a day strictly limited to twenty-four hours.

W. P. (Ashton-under-Lyme).—Li Hung Chang's Scrap-Book is published by Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's Court, E.C. Price 6s.

W. LAURENCE.—As you take the trouble to write a long letter, we must believe that you find the Freethinker "painful reading." Still, keep on, and we have no doubt you will come to like it, and thank us for having brought you to that state.

T. RAFF.—Literature is being sent as requested. Thanks for appreciation of the Freethinker under our editorship. We hope that the Freethinker will become "a greater power in the land in the near future." We are doing our best to make it so, and it does exert far more influence than many people imagine.

J. C. ROBERTSON.—Certainly there is a difference between "not very apparent" and "not yet very apparent," but the criticism is not seriously affected thereby. We, of course, depended upon the report before us.

G. E. WEBB.—"Balderdash" is the right word. We agree with your wife as to the folly of placing such men in such a position. Still, it is part of the historic policy of all the Churches to keep a hold on the machinery of social life, and they will continue to do so while the folly of people permits them.

MR. T. MAY, of Mexboro, asks us to call attention to the fact that he is not the T. May whom we accused of talking nonsense in the Freethinker for January 28. We have much pleasure in doing so. The correspondent to whom we replied wrote us from the West of England.

J. B. (Newcastle).—We very much regret to hear of the death of Mr. McIntee. We have a very lively recollection of him, and believe that he deserved all the good things said of him—and more. We note that the obituary notice you send is very reticent as to his freethinking opinions. Candour and courage are rare qualities.

H. A.—We can't promise, but we will do our best.

T. W. GAISS (S.A.).—The writer in South Africa who has noticed the uneasiness of Atheists—on account of their Atheism—must have keener powers of observation than we possess. But, there! religious folk have a whole menagerie of Atheists that no one ever meets in the flesh.

C. W. MARSHALL.—Will be useful for our next issue. Thanks.

KAL ELTHON.—We do not quite catch the drift of what it is about which you wish to write us. Personally, we have no objection to "cranks." We rather like them, and agree with you as to their utility. Please note that all communications must be accompanied with name and address, but not for publication unless desired.

H. SILVERSTEIN.—Too late for this week, but will serve for next issue.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The Bowman case is still pursuing its course in the House of Lords. The hearing commenced on Tuesday, Jan. 30, and was continued on the Thursday, Friday, and Monday following. It now stands adjourned until Thursday, Feb. 16 (We are writing this on Tuesday), and all that one can say with certainty is that it is four days nearer the end. As the case is undecided, we are precluded from saying much that we might say otherwise, so prefer to mention nothing more than that we await the result with confidence. We are arranging to publish next week a summary of the argument, to be followed by a full report of the judgment. In any event that will be a document of, one may say, historic importance.

Mr. Cohen lectures to-day (Feb. 11) at Liverpool. The meetings will be held in the Alexandra Hall, Islington. In the afternoon the subject will be: "The Place of Mind in Social Evolution." This is a topic which we fancy will yield a lively discussion. In the evening the subject will be "Can We Have Morality Without Religion?" We hope Liverpool "saints" will do their best to bring some Christian friends along to both meetings. Tickets for the meetings, 6d. each, may be obtained of Mr. W. McKelvie, 21 Globe Street, Kirkdale, Liverpool.

For some time past the propaganda at Manchester, owing to various causes, has been in abeyance. It is very regrettable that this should be so, and, as Mr. Cohen is lecturing at Liverpool on Feb. 11, he has, in his capacity as President, and at the request of the N. S. S. Executive, invited all members and friends of the movement to meet him at the Merchants' Hotel, Oldham Road, at 7 o'clock on Saturday, Feb. 10. Mr. Cohen will leave London early on Saturday to permit his meeting the friends, and will travel to Liverpool by a late train. We hope there will be a good muster, so that a thorough review of the situation may be made. Manchester is a very important centre, and there are quite enough Freethinkers in the city to maintain a very strong movement.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd is lecturing to-day, Feb. 11, at the Co-operative Hall, Bridge Street, Walsall, at 6.30, on "Self-Reliance v. Trust in God." As this is a new effort, and intended to be the forerunner of regular work in Walsall, we hope that friends from Wolverhampton, Wednesbury, Dudley and neighbouring towns will be present.

We see that one firm of paper manufacturers made over £10,000 profit in 1916 as against £80 in 1914. And, on the whole we believe, paper merchants have been doing well. It is the poor paper users who have sweated. Our opinion that the threefold cost of paper, as against pre-war prices is quite unjustifiable, and we are threatened with yet another rise in price. It is a fine commentary upon the patriotic "gush" that is being poured out to observe the way in which all who can squeeze the last half-penny out of the public—whether in increased prices, or out of the Government in the shape of interest on war loans, do so We should like to see it made absolutely impossible for anyone to make a penny profit out of so ghastly a thing as a war Suffer we must in time of war; suffer we should, and no genuine patriot would complain at the suffering even though he may regret the occasion.

Digitized by Google

Members of the N. S. S. should be particularly interested in the debate to be opened at the St. Pancras Reform Club to-night (Feb. 11) by C. E. Ratcliffe on "Secular Organization: its Strength and Weakness." Last Sunday evening a most interesting and useful discussion followed Mr. Van Biene's enlightening address on mind and matter. It is most desirable that these meetings should be made more widely known, and we hope to see them extended to every quarter of London. The General Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, is inviting co-operation towards the opening up of a similar series of meetings in West London, and we hope to hear shortly that, with the promised assistance of the Executive, this has been accomplished.

Under even normal conditions works written from a standpoint of rational humanitarianism meet with scant recognition, and at a time of war they are nearly completely ignored. It is not surprising, therefore, The Flogging Craze, by Mr. H. S. Salt (Allen & Unwin, 2s. 6d.), has received small notice at the hands of the ordinary newspaper reviewer. And yet it is, in the best sense of the expression, an important book. Mr. Salt has devoted his life to humanitarian work, and has been chiefly responsible for the carrying on of the Humanitarian League under discouraging conditions. For his long and unselfish devotion in this direction he deserves the thanks of all interested in genuine social reform.

In The Flogging Craze, Mr. Salt deals with the question of corporal punishment from every possible point of view, and his case against it is stated with an impressive calmness that should affect all impartial readers. Its failure as a deterrent, as an aid in the training of juveniles, and as a normal part of prison discipline, is well dealt with, and the advocate of the last is left with little logical ground from which to defend his favourite instrument. As Mr. Salt remarks, the only real argument in favour of the lash is that it saves time. But only at the moment. Its general consequences, not only on the one who is flogged, but also on the one who flogs, far outweighs its value in even this direction. The tendency in all civilized countries to diminish brutal punishments is, in itself, a condemnation of the practice. The whole question does, in fact, resolve itself into the old antithesis of the scientific prevention of crime through the reformation of the criminal, the betterment of the social state which fashions him, and the infliction of brutal punishments which satisfy only the unthinking and the semi-civilized.

There is another, and a very unsavoury aspect of the subject, with which we are pleased to see Mr. Salt deals. The physiological connection between flaggelation and morbid manifestations of sexual emotion is well known to all scientific students of the subject. The annals of the monastic life, the biographies of certain individuals, and other materials available to the student, supply ample evidence on this point—which is, indeed, well known to all medical writers of authority. And that is, perhaps, as Mr. Salt points out, the final argument against such as would reserve the use of the whip for a certain class of offences. In such cases we bestialize still more thoroughly the already sufficiently bestial. There are other aspects of Mr. Salt's book with which we should like to deal, but space forbids. We will only say that it is a volume which should find a place on every reformer's bookshelves.

In view of what we have said concerning the patriotism of the pious—at five per cent., we have pleasure in noting that the wife of Lieut.-General Maxwell has offered to the Government as a war loan a third of his capital, amounting to £35,000, free of all interest. We commend this example to other "Patriots," particularly to the Church of England with its loan of three and a half millions, in which it will claim the last farthing of interest. Lady Maxwell has set a good example, and deserves all honour for doing so.

The Church of Ireland has contributed the tidy sum of £1,400,000 to the War Loan. The original Christian Church, proprietor and founder included, was sold up for thirty shillings.

A Turning Point.

IN the city whither I was going were many brave, bright, hospitable spirits, each one of whom would have shared with his fellow-mortal the last shilling and the last crust. But it is so easy to abuse hospitality, to impose on good nature. And even among "kindred spirits" a mischievous mistakenness persists. One cannot always—at least, not everyone can—afford an Inn, where one can be so free and independent, so monarch of all he surveys. And, as Shenstone truly sang:—

Whoe'er has travelled life's dull round,
Whate'er his fortune may have been,
May sigh to think he still has found
The warmest welcome at an Inn.

And, as an Ayrshire poet, Ebenezer Smith, has well, if somewhat bitterly, expressed the sentiment in the lines:—

Compared wi' me, the poorest cock
Is blest that rests on Ailsa's Rock;
The home to which it now has flown,
However humble, is its own.
I, drawing in a stranger's chair,
A stranger's parlour here maun share,
And, from strange clatter all but dead,
Seek refuge in a stranger's bed.

How savoureth of salt the bread of others! But the strangeness may be merely subjective, psychological, metaphysical, or Scotch, in keeping with Ingersoll's and Barrie's "metaphysical peasantry," or at worst misunderstanding; so to our tale.

It was a dreary, dripping, clammy, kindless Sunday in December when the daughter of a late leader, and one whom we all revere, Charles Bradlaugh, lectured in the city; and I, with twenty miles to walk, took a notion to be there, and duly set out under the umbrella of respectability. On the way a wooded ravine, with a gleaming, surging torrent sounding and winding its way amid huge boulders and masses of splintered rock, invited me to Nature-worship, to magnificent sermons in stones and books in the rushing stream.

But, no; onward, onward, onward. But how to get back? that was the thought that paled the native hue of resolution. I was half-way now, and getting into swing, when suddenly I stopped—moved on, stopped again—like poor Le Fevre's pulse in Tristram Shandy. Shall I go on? No! It was the turning point. It was sadly, but I felt wisely, resolved upon. Had they known, perhaps the friends I faltered from had been disappointed too.....Babies are noticing folk. I had passed a group of children, and, as I repassed them on my way back, a little chap in arms, and just beginning to lisp, said, "The man's turned!" It is true, precocious darling; but only bodily; otherwise I am on the straight path, the path of reason and experience; the plain and safe direction, even if the road be rough. But what a crooked world, and world of crooks and fools, you have just entered! And all so brave and confident, you and your baby contemporaries, "puir wee souls"! How many turnings you may take, and reach how many turning points. But you are sharp, and may win your way; but the charlatan and his imposing but shoddy magic awaits you. You will be solemnly, officially, and pompously misdirected by godly men in black, themselves misled, and nescient as thee, but suffered and presuming to teach the unintelligible, the unknown, and the unnecessary to an ignorant and credulous generation.

The great objective given up, the traveller had leisure to turn aside and rest by the ruined mill, the cascading rapids, and the roaring waterfall. He wanted to shout louder than the linn itself, to worship in some Pagan way, but feared the alien unsympathetic, because misunderstanding, eye and ear. And all too soon, reluctantly, he left the frowning rock, the red of heaped-up leaves and soil; and the grey leap of waters showing and thundering through the trees, and the white "quilt" of foam on the shelving pool between the criss-cross rapids and the brink, keeps circling ever round as the last footstep departs and the shadows deepen in the glen. He had been to church, and had come away serious but satisfied, his peace of mind, like the fading twilight skies, softly reflected in the quiet hedgerow pools. One other thought he had among a thousand unexpressed was, that it might please the Lady of the Lamp to know that her and her father's memory were honoured in those rustic shades, and that the mind of the dutiful daughter—tired at times, no doubt, might unconsciously and vicariously lave itself in that living stream and be refreshed.

Digitized by Google

And he thought of all the "saints" of Freethought, far and near, illustrious and obscure; all on whom this twin light of reason and humanity had fallen. Even if the light failed to illumine immediately, in the inner light of his mind was a grand reunion of all the choicest spirits of the earth as the outer shadows deepened on the lonely homeward way.

THE MODERN PILGRIM.

The French Revolution.

III.

THE MARSEILLAISE.

(Continued from p. 77.)

THE Assembly, after a little further thimble-rigging of the electoral laws in favour of the wealthy, offered the Constitution to the King for his final acceptance, which he signified. This proceeding was the hollowest farce; for the King was by now in regular communication with Austria and Prussia, who were leagued together by the Treaty of Pilnitz to intervene in France in the event of further developments unfavourable to monarchy. On Sept. 30, 1791, the Assembly dissolved, after declaring its work complete. Hoots and hisses from the populace greeted the constitution-mongers as they left the hall. They were regarded as accomplices of the King. But when Robespierre and Petion, the spokesmen of the Radical section, appeared, they were carried shoulder-high by the crowd. They alone, and the few with them, were regarded by the people of Paris as true Revolutionists.

The new Parliament, the Legislative Assembly, met next day. No member of the old Assembly could, by law, be elected to it. As was natural in a Parliament chosen on a limited franchise, and by indirect election at that, the Conservative element predominated. The out-and-out Radicals were very poorly represented, comprising a dozen or so unknown men of very moderate abilities, who, from their seats being on the high benches on the extreme left of the hall, were nicknamed "the Mountain." None of the well-known Radicals were members. There was, however, what we should call a strong "official Liberal" party consisting of a number of talented lawyers, theoretically Republican, but prepared to accept the existing Constitution, and insisting only on the greater responsibility of Ministers to the Assembly. The leader of this group was Brissot, a Paris journalist with a gift for wire-pulling, who had been concerned in the Republican agitation, but was prepared to support the Constitution if only his party could control policy. The chief speakers of Brissot's party, however, were a knot of able men representing the department of the Gironde, and from them the whole party came to be known as the "Girondists."

The chief question to be faced by the Legislative Assembly was the threatening attitude of Austria and Prussia, together with the measures to be taken regarding the emigrant nobles and the priests who had refused the oath of fidelity to the Constitution. The Assembly decreed that the emigrants should be called upon to return on pain of death and confiscation of their property; and that the non-juring priests should be liable to arrest in the event of religious disturbances in their parishes. The King, who retained the right of veto under the Constitution, vetoed both these measures. This served to increase public discontent.

In March, 1792, the Royalist Ministry fell owing to internal dissension, and Louis was forced to call Brissot's party into office. Ministers could not be selected from among members of the Assembly; and the head of the administration was Roland, who was dominated by his more famous wife. Dumouriez, a military officer of no very steady principles, was Foreign Minister. The first act of the new Government was to declare war on Austria.

The declaration of war was welcomed by everyone except a few of the popular party. The Court hoped that the French armies would be defeated and the Revolution undone. The Constitutional Royalists hoped that war would strengthen the authority of the King by necessitating a strong Government. The Girondists hoped that it would throw power into their hands, and, if the worst came to the worst, force the King to declare himself openly for or against the Revolution. Only three men attacked the war policy. Robespierre, Danton, and Marat had the sense to see that the war could only prejudice the cause of democratic progress; and each of them, from slightly different points of view, attacked the Girondists for precipitating it. Their fears were borne out when disasters began, and the French troops were beaten. However, the Revolution was now on the defensive against an absolutist coalition, and there was nothing for it but to win through. The situation was, indeed, gloomy. Against the imminent invasion what had France by way of defence? The King and Queen were in collusion with the enemy. The officers of the army, led by Lafayette, were not, indeed, traitors to this extent, but they were, for the most part, much more afraid of democracy than of reaction; and if forced to choose between a monarchy supported by foreign arms and a democratic Republic, they would be certain to prefer the former. The majority of the wealthy classes, at this time, probably inclined to the same view. Only the peasantry and working-class, with a resolute minority of the well-to-do, were still heart and soul for the Revolution, and determined to save it at all costs. Marat, who saw all this clearly, wrote with fury in "L'Ami du Peuple" of the treason of the Court and the governing class, especially Lafayette. Venting without restraint the anger and despair with which the situation filled him, he declared that the only hope of France lay in the instalment of a popular dictator, with a free hand to slay all, generals, ministers, or politicians, who were guilty of treachery to the nation. These articles of Marat excited the indignation of the well-to-do classes, and led the Girondist Government to proceed against him; yet what he had stated was no more than the truth. As yet, however, he stood alone.

The Government, though hating Marat and the advanced Radicals, yet had to do something to defend the country against the enemy without and within. They proposed to establish a camp of 20,000 men near Paris, for use as might be required, and to disband the King's bodyguard. Louis opposed his veto. The Government remonstrated; whereupon he dismissed them from office, and recalled his Conservative advisers. Lafayette, from the head of his army, wrote to the Assembly demanding the forcible suppression of the Jacobins, or opposition, party. Feeling ran higher than it had done for many months. On June 20, 1792, a patriotic demonstration was got up in Paris by the opposition rank and file. A deputation waited on the Assembly, and, of course, was put off with phrases. After demonstrating in the Assembly hall, the multitude proceeded to the royal palace of the Tuileries, broke in the doors, and surged into the King's presence, demanding sanction for the law authorizing the camp of 20,000 men, and the recall of the "patriot ministry." No harm was offered to the King—a proof that, even at this eleventh hour, the democratic party had no thought of regicide, and that Louis might even now have saved his throne if he had consented to lead his people instead of betraying them. To humour the crowd, he put on his head the red woollen "cap of liberty," which was now becoming popular as a badge of democratic sentiments, and drank a glass to the health of the nation. But he would not grant their demands. At last certain Girondist deputies from the Assembly, and Petion, mayor of Paris (Robespierre's old colleague in the former Assembly) persuaded the crowd to disperse.

Digitized by Google

The only immediate result of the demonstration was to frighten the well-to-do classes into a fever of Royalism. Lafayette left his army and appeared at the bar of the Assembly to demand once again the adoption of vigorous measures to suppress the agitation. The authorities of the department of Paris suspended Petion from the mayoralty for not having prevented the demonstration; and many men concerned in the movement were prosecuted and imprisoned. The Assembly—the Girondists equally with the Royalists party—continued to shut its eyes to danger. All that the Girondist leaders ventured to do was to address a private memorandum to the King, and remonstrate with him once more.

The friends of the Revolution outside the Assembly had, therefore, to save themselves in spite of their official representatives. Steps were taken to carry out the proposal for an armed camp in spite of the King, by inviting the municipalities of provincial cities to levy men locally on their own authority. Barbaroux, a young man from Marseilles, and a friend of the Girondist leaders, wrote to the mayor of that city for "500 men who knew how to die." The municipality forthwith raised 500 volunteers, who marched to Paris, singing as they went the world-famous hymn:—

Allons, enfants de la patrie!
Le jour de gloire est arrive;
Contre nous de la tyrannie
L'etendard sanglant est leve.

Brest and some other towns also sent volunteers.

And, indeed, it was time. Prussia was now arrayed with Austria against the Revolution; aud the combined armies, massed on the French frontier, and opposed only by the treason-ridden army of Lafayette, were commanded by the Duke of Brunswick. This German potentate had a reputation, it seems, for Liberalism; and, in July, 1792, some of the Girondists were even talking of offering the throne of France to him instead of Louis, and so solving two problems at one time. Great was their consternation when, on July 25, Brunswick issued a manifesto in the name of the allied sovereigns, threatening to destroy every French town which resisted the invaders, shoot all "National Guards" who might be taken in arms, and, finally, if any violence were done to the King, to deliver Paris up to "military execution"—in other words, to treat Paris as Brunswick's modern successors have treated Louvain.

This manifesto—inspired by the rancorous emigrant French nobles—put an instant stop to the Royalist reaction in France. Even the wealthy were not disposed, after this, to stand between the King and his fate. Already the Assembly had declared "the country in danger," called for volunteers, and mobilised the National Guard. Petion had been restored to the mayoralty of Paris. On July 26, the 500 men from Marseilles marched into the city, and the famous hymn was heard in the streets for the first time. The common people began to demand the dethronement of the King; and continued petitions to this effect were made to the Assembly by the various "sections," or wards, into which Paris was divided. Still the Assembly did nothing. The advanced Radicals, led by Danton, determined to organize a popular rising, like that which had stormed the Bastille three years before. The volunteers from Marseilles and Brest would lend a hand. In all the "sections," except one or two in the fashionable quarter of Paris, delegates were chosen to see the business through. On August 8 the Assembly added the last straw, by voting by a large majority against the proposal to impeach Lafayette. Next day, a deputation informed them that, unless the dethronement of the King were voted that day, the people would rise. At midnight, between the 9th and 10th, the alarm bell was rung, the drums were beaten, and the delegates of the "sections" proceeded to the Hotel de Ville, where they installed themselved in place of the municipal council. The Royalists, on their part, marched as many of the National Guard as they could muster to the palace, and posted the mercenary Swiss Guard to assist in the defence. The insurgent leaders then sent for Mandat, the commandant of the National Guard, to the Hotel de Ville, and ordered him to prison. He was murdered by the mob as he left the building. As day broke on August 10, the insurgents marched on the Tuileries, led by the Marseilles volunteers. The National Guard declined to face the people, and dispersed. The Swiss mercenaries, however, who had no ties with the French, fired on the insurgents killing hundreds. But the whole populace had now risen, and the Swiss, overwhelmed by superior force, were cut to pieces or made prisoners.

It is lamentable that democratic Switzerland should have seen fit to erect a monument at Lucerne to these mercenary soldiers. Certainly they fought with courage that day, as became their profession; but they fought neither for Switzerland nor for France, for no country and no cause, but simply because they were hired to do so by a King who was a traitor to his people. They no more deserve a monument than Turkish Bashi-Bazouks.

The King and his family had taken refuge in the Assembly early in the day. After waiting to see how the cat would jump, the Girondist leaders proposed and carried a resolution suspending Louis from his functions, and ordering that a National Convention, elected by universal manhood suffrage, should meet to decide on the future Government of France. The oligarchic Constitution, in the phrase of Carlyle, was "burst in pieces." Lafayette, on hearing the news, deserted his army, and rode over the frontier with his staff, hoping to reach Holland. He was captured, however, by the Austrians, who, unable to forgive even so constitutional a reformer as Lafayette, threw him into prison, where he remained for some years.

ROBERT ARCH.

(To be continued.)

I deny altogether that idleness is an evil, or that it produces evil, and I am well aware why the interested are so bitter against idleness—namely, because it gives time for thought; and if men had time to think, their reign would come to an end. Idleness, that is, the absence of the necessity to work for subsistence—is a great good.—Richard Jefferies.

Digitized by Google

Correspondence.

"THE CREED OF NAPOLEON."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I read with interest the letter from Minnie Spencer in the Freethinker for January 28, regarding the creed of Napoleon. Like her, I looked in vain for his name in Wheeler's Dictionary of Freethinkers. As the point is of some interest, you will perhaps grant me space to quote the verdict of Mr. J. M. Robertson, in his unrivalled History of Freethought, vol, ii., 2nd ed., pp. 292-3:—

> As he grew up he read, like his contemporaries, the French Deists of his time, and became a Deist like his fellows, recognizing that religions were human productions.....His language on the subject is irreconcilable with any real belief in the Christian Religion; he was "a Deist a la Voltaire," who recalled with tenderness his Catholic childhood, and who at death reverted to his first beliefs.

After discussing Napoleon's purely political motives in his actions regarding religion and the papacy, Mr. Robertson concludes that "he had, in fact, no disinterested love of truth," and that "Freethought can have no warm claim to such a ruler."

If, however, Bonaparte be really included in the current or some previous edition of Wheeler's Dictionary, it will be seen from the foregoing that the inclusion would not be without some justification. For Deism is a form of belief sufficiently attenuated, and sufficiently philosophical, as compared with the average religious creed, to merit the application to it of the term "Freethought"—at least, in the time of Napoleon, if not to-day. For Freethought is a relative term. Even the most anthropomorphic of Theists, if he developed his system independently in a tribe of totem-worshippers, would surely merit the name of Freethinker as truly as does the Atheist or Monist in the midst of a cultured society.

H. TRUCKELL.

"AN END TO LYING."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In a recent issue of the Freethinker it was suggested by Romain Rolland that the above heading should be adopted as a motto for all writers during the coming year. If it was to be universally adopted, what would be the consequence? Such a revolution even the present War would be unable to compete with.

It reminds me of a play I saw many years ago, entitled "The Palace of Truth," wherein everybody was overpowered by some strange influence which compelled them to speak their minds freely and truthfully. The result can better be imagined than described.

If, in the first instance, this test or motto was to be adopted by the clergy of all denominations, would they be tolerated, or any longer allowed to draw their salaries of £15,000 a year downwards for propagating lies? And if the present European conflict is the direct outcome of two thousand years of Christianity, is it not time to put "an end to lying"? Or, are these miserable superstitions so ingrained in human nature that it is absolutely hopeless to try and eradicate them?

The latter question is suggested in consequence of the writer's experience in nearly all parts of the globe during the last twenty years. Most of the stay-at-home people of these islands appear to have some vague idea that all other races outside Europe are simply heathens, to whom they are in duty bound to send their missionaries to convert them.

If they could only see for themselves, as I have done, the effect of these missions, they would soon cease to squander their money and their time on such foolish and misguided efforts. How can they ever hope to eradicate the inborn superstitious beliefs of millions and millions of Asiatic coolies who never heard of Christianity or any other form of belief, and do not wish to? If ever there is to be "an end to lying," it must begin at home, and their own house must be first put in order.

Take as an instance that great country, China, where I have spent the greater part of the last twenty years. It is almost a sealed book to the great majority of the Western people; but, believe me, it does contain some few intelligent people amongst its four hundred millions.

As an example of this, I was much impressed with what one of them wrote some twelve years ago as a criticism of our Western civilization, and which has turned out to be a wonderful prophecy in view of the present conflict in Europe. These are his words:—

> Commercial intercourse between nations, it was supposed some fifty years ago, would inaugurate an era of peace; and there appear to be many among you who still cling to this belief. But never was belief more plainly contradicted by the facts The competition for markets bids fair to be a more fruitful cause of war than was ever in the past the ambition of princes or the bigotry of priests. The peoples of Europe fling themselves, like hungry beasts of prey, on every yet unexploited quarter of the globe. Hitherto, they have confined their acts of spoliation to those whom they regard as outside their own pale. But always, while they divide the spoil, they watch one another with a jealous eye; and, sooner or later, when there is nothing left to divide, they will fall on one another. That is the real meaning of your armaments; you must devour or be devoured. And it is precisely these trade relations, which it was thought would knit you in the bonds of peace, which, by making every one of you cut-throat rivals of the others, have brought you within reasonable distance of a general war of extermination.

If, after this sample, your readers would care to have some more criticisms of their vaunted civilization from a Chinaman's point of view, I should be happy to oblige them.

W. WILMER.

CHASTISING THE DEITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Confined to bed with influenza, I made the hours of illness and convalescence pass more agreeably by reperusing the back numbers of your highly esteemed Freethinker. I thus came again across your excellent article, "Another Day of Intercession," in the last year's last issue. In that article, the passage referring to Central African savages thrashing their god for suffering them to be defeated, arrested my attention on this occasion. The passage ended with: "But this occurs only with savages." It is my impression that the European Christian savages are as prone to chastise their Deity for not granting them their prayers as are the Central African negroes. Instances of such proneness are by no means rare, and perhaps I may be allowed to mention a few of them that may interest your many readers.

The first that comes to my mind occurred in Italy before the Italians became a united nation; and, if my memory serves me right, I read a report of it in a foreign journal many years ago. A Neapolitan brigand-chief had decided upon an expedition involving robbery, violence, and probable murder. Whilst passing along a country road, he stopped before a wayside shrine containing a wooden image of Christ crucified, and kneeling before it fervently prayed for divine blessing upon his criminal scheme. He arose confident of success, but as the immortal poet has it: "The best laid schemes of mice and men gang aft agley"—and so it happened on that occasion. The local carabinieri had got wind of the brigand-chief's intentions, and frustrated them. They killed some of his men and caught others alive, but the chief escaped unhurt into the mountains. A short time after, a bullet was found embedded in the wooden image of Christ the escaped brigand had prayed to. Eventually he was caught, tried, convicted, and sentenced to the "pena capitale." Before dying, he confessed that it was he who had fired a bullet into the image of Christ out of revenge.

Another instance of a Christian's revenge upon his Deity occurred in that very Christian and religious country that calls itself Holy Russia, and was vouched to me by trustworthy Russians as genuine and true. It happened during the first half of the nineteenth century, when railways in the dominions of the Tsar were either few or non-existent, roads bad, postal arrangements primitive, and private letters opened and read by official censors. A landed proprietor wrote a confidential letter to a friend residing at a considerable distance beyond the intervening steppe-region, and wishing his letter to escape the lynx-eyes of the local censor, he entrusted the delivery of it to one of his own serfs. This moujik, after walking some days, at last tired and footsore, reached the steppe-region. Here an idea suddenly occurred to him, and he forthwith brought out from his bosom a scapulary with a diminutive picture of St. Nicholas, the patron saint of Russia, better known and more prayed to by the lower classes than either the Almighty himself, Jesus Christ, or the Virgin Mary. He prayed to his portable icon for a friendly lift in a casual kibitka or any other conveyance. Not long after, it happened that a stud of horses was being driven across his path not a mile in front of him. One of the horses lagged some distance behind the main group, and thus came almost in touch with our tired pedestrian. The moujik at once saw in the equine apparition St. Nick's answer to his prayer, jumped on its bare back and galloped away as fast as his stick could persuade the horse to do. The steppe, however, was as flat as the proverbial pancake, so the men in charge of the stud were soon able to see the galloping thief. They pursued him, overtook him, bound his legs and arms, and, stretching him on the ground, delivered thirty energetic strokes with their nagaykas upon the back parts of his anatomy. Smarting with pain, the moujik brought St. Nick out again and, with rage in his eyes, shouted at him in his forcible vernacular, which can mildly be translated thus: "You abominable rascal! You unmitigated scoundrel! You contemptible cheat! You have played me a dirty trick, but I'll pay you back for it. If I am to continue my journey on foot, you will have to do so likewise." Saying this, he tied the tapes of the scapulary to his ankle and dragged St. Nick on the ground until he came in sight of his destination.

Digitized by Google

Another Christian savage did not scruple to cheat the same Deity, for, according to a Ukranian tradition, Ivan Ivanovitch, a poor Cossack, drowning in a rapid river, vowed to burn a dozen extra candles before the icon of St. Nick, hanging in the isba of his humble home, if the saint would only save him from a watery grave. He sank, but timely human help was at hand and the Cossack was rescued, brought to terra firma and restored to consciousness. Walking home, he said to himself: "St. Nick was a good fellow, and deserves the tallow dips; but as no one heard my vow, I'll not burn the candles, and will never bathe again."

B. F. B.

A Modern War Chant.

RALLY round the counters of the Y.M.C.A.
Gather round the counter, boys; quick, without delay.
Rally to the tea-urn, and to the buns and cake,
Remembering 'tis for God on High and his Son Jesus' sake.

See, the door is open wide; Ragtime calls you in.
Do not hesitate to buy; we know you've got the tin.
Tea and coffee, chocs and fags, also buns and blacking;
Free salvation for you all—nothing here is lacking.

You're going out to murder men, your brothers, over yonder.
We cheer you up with a penny cup, and trust you will not wander.
Our aim is Christianity; we know you never doubt it.
Because we realize that you know nothing much about it.

So give three cheers for the great Y.M.C.A.
Rally round the counter, boys; quick, without delay.
Rally to the "Woodbines," and to the tea and cake,
Remembering 'tis for God on high and his Son Jesus' sake.

ARTHUR F. THORN.

In the recent explosion a mission church was destroyed, and another church had its windows blown out. Providence seems as careless of his churches as his children.

The dear Daily News, gushing on the Kaiser's birthday, says that "Wilhelm" in his own person represents the thing that is wrong with the world." And the Kaiser is a Christian and a monarch.

The Bishop of Willesden's appeal for drink prohibition was published in a number of papers. This publicity looks as if the Church is learning that sweet are the uses of advertisement.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, off Kentish Town Road, N.W.): 7.30, Debate, "Secular Organization: Its Strength and Weakness." Introduced by C. E. Ratcliffe.

SOUTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Avondale Hall, Landor Road, Clapham, S.W.): 7, Open Debate, "The Humanizing of the Schools—How to Attain It." Introduced by G. F. Holland.

MR. HOWELL SMITH'S DISCUSSION CLASS (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Thursday, Feb. 15, at 7.30.

CANTON HALL (Westminster): February 14, at 8, "Determinism," Mr. Shaller.

HYDE PARK: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Kells and Dales, "Miracles"; 6.30, Messrs. Beale, Saphin, and Kells.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

ABERTILLERY (Tillery Institute): 6, Debate, "Has the Church Always Hindered Progress?" Negative, Miss Minnie Palmer; affirmative, Syd Jones.

LEICESTER (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate): 6.30, A. C. Brant, "Lafcadio Hern, the Japanese-Englishman Author."

LIVERPOOL BRANCH N. S. S. (Clarion Cafe, 25 Cable Street); Chapman Cohen, 3, "The Place of Mind in Social Evolution"; 3, "Can We Have Morality Without Religion?"

WALSALL (Co-operative Hall, Bridge Street): 6.30, J. T. Lloyd, "Self-Reliance v. Trust in God."

Population Question and Birth-Control.

POST FREE THREE HALFPENCE.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
QUEEN ANNE'S CHAMBERS, WESTMINSTER, S.W.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

TEH PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

A

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

OF FREETHINKERS
OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY

J. M. WHEELER.

Price THREE SHILLINGS Net.
(Postage 6d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp. ...	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 58 pp.	,, 1d.	0	3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	3
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
COMING CIVILIZATION. 30 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp....	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Maugasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, .	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 82 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 82 pp. ... ... Nett.	,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. LEA.
In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
By E. A. ASHCROFT.
440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By CARVETH READ.
8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.
By D. B. HART, M.D.
Crown 8vo. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

THE THEORIES OF EVOLUTION.
By YVES DELAGE.
1912. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.
For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. MILL.
Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

HISTORY OF THE TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.
By C. D. COLLET.
Two vols., published at 7s. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By CHAPMAN COHEN.
Price 1s. net, postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By G. W. FOOTE.
First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. WHEELER.
Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 1,857

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ·· EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—NO. 7 SUNDAY FEBRUARY 18, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
Juvenile "Crime" and Religious Education.—The Editor	97
The Light of Life.—J. T. Lloyd	98
The Freethinkers' Burden.—Mimnermus	99
The Emergence of Man.—T. F. Palmer	100
A Play by a Peripatetic Patriotic Parson.—S. V. K.	102
Acid Drops	103
To Correspondents	105
Sugar Plums	105
The Bowman Case.—H. V. S.	105
Religion in Russia.—E. Egerton Stafford	107
Compulsory Religion.—Ignotus	109
Obituary	110
Notice of Meetings	110
Books and Pamphlets	111

Views and Opinions.

Juvenile "Crime" and Religious Education.

We have had occasion recently to wonder at the sharply circumscribed knowledge of legal specialists. At the same time, it is only fair to add, we have been further impressed by the acuteness of mind displayed in their own department. But outside that, their excursions into the fields of philosophy or sociology have impressed us with their elementary character. That is, perhaps, the price we have to pay for specialists; but at the same time it does indicate a very real danger of departmental knowledge. For however much we may separate life into compartments, yet it functions as a whole, and the labours of specialists only become of their utmost value when the results are properly co-ordinated. And an added danger to specialization is that the specialist, because of his acknowledged authority in his own department, contracts the habit of expressing opinions ex cathedra in other directions, which opinions are often received with a deference to which they are not at all entitled.

* * *

A Magistrate's Indictment.

We have been led to the above observations because of a short article contributed to Reynolds' newspaper by Mr. Cecil Chapman, one of our Metropolitan magistrates. The subject of Mr. Chapman's article is juvenile criminality—a phrase which in itself requires to be used with extreme care. For "juvenile crime" often means little more than juvenile mischief, although the police authorities call anything a crime which offends some article of the police code. Mr. Chapman divides the causes of "juvenile crime" into two parts—direct and indirect. And it seems to us that, whatever increase there may be, the direct causes enumerated by Mr. Chapman are enough. These are: the excitement induced by the War; the absence of the father and elder brothers from home; the absence of mothers from home, due to their being engaged in War work; the closing of some schools, and the depletion of the school staffs generally. Mr. Chapman also adds a rather doubtful word on the influence of cinemas which show how children can elude policemen, and would picture the villain as the hero of the piece. But even without the last, the other causes seem quite enough to account for any increase of lawlessness that may have occurred amongst juveniles.

* * *

Religion and the Child.

Mr. Chapman's observations as to the direct causes of lawlessness—we much prefer that word to "crime"—are such as would occur to any thoughtful person. It is when he comes to deal with the indirect causes that he illustrates the danger of some men stepping outside their proper sphere. Of the indirect causes he says:—

> I do not think that education in our schools makes for a well-established or well-grounded sense of morality. In the first place, so far as I can judge, religion is only taught at stated periods, and it is taught, not compulsorily, but as something of a by-product, and in the same way as mathematics and chemistry are often taught, only to be forgotten as soon as possible. Religion, if it is to be worth anything at all, must be the basis of all conduct. Religion ought to be the atmosphere of the schools, not a separate lesson at the beginning of the school which children need not attend unless they like. Moral teaching is of little use if it is negative in character. The fact of being told not to do a thing is the very thing which makes you want to do it. Negative teaching of morality is a definite incentive to immorality; at any rate, it does not produce the best conduct. All moral teaching should be on the positive side—loving our neighbours as ourselves, and doing something for our neighbours as we would do for ourselves.

We have no wish to be offensive, but the tenour of this paragraph strikes us as the utterance of a man who considers the subject from the point of view of a preconceived prejudice rather than from that of an impartial study of the facts. For the main theme here is a plea for religion as the basis of morality, with the assumption that no satisfactory teaching of morality can be adequate that is separated from its influence. And that contention is justified neither by theory nor fact.

* * *

Morality and Religion.

Let it be granted, at least for the moment, that our schools do not provide an education that makes for "a well-grounded sense of morality." We think there is a deal to be said in favour of that, but the fault does not lie wholly with the teachers, nor even with the higher authorities responsible for the schools. But we can say with certainty that in the training of the young the schools partly secularized have been more successful than were the schools wholly under the influence of religion, and in which there existed that atmosphere for which Mr. Chapman sighs. Let him take the pre-1870 period, when education was dominated by religion. Was there a higher standard of moral character developed then than now? I do not think Mr. Chapman will answer in the affirmative. Or let him take the Church schools and the Roman Catholic schools, where a very definite form of religion is taught, and where one may assume there is more of a religious atmosphere than in Council schools. Is there a higher type of character developed there? We are quite sure that no one conversant with the facts will say there is. If there is one thing plain, it is that neither with the child nor with the adult does religion guarantee any certain development of character. Mr. Chapman, as a police-court magistrate, must have before him, in the course of the year, hundreds of people who have received a careful religious education. What refining influence do these cases show? Would he use a knowledge of the religious convictions of the people charged before him as any guide to arriving at a decision as to their guilt? We venture to say he would not. Or in so simple a case as choosing between affirmation and the oath: Does he find the one who takes the oath more truthful than the one who affirms? Again, we do not think he does. In actual life, whether on the Bench or off it, no one ever takes the presence of religious belief as a sure indication of high moral character. The religious man may be an upright person, or he may be a rogue. And we cheerfully admit that the same is true of the non-religious person. The lack of organic connection between strong religious belief and a highly developed character is one of the plainest facts of universal experience. * * *

Digitized by Google

Negative Moral Teaching.

We quite agree that moral teaching is of little use if it is negative in character. We have also little faith in moral teaching that is positive in character, as moral teaching is usually conceived. In aiming at a paragon, it most often produces a prig. If one will pay attention to a development of sympathy and imagination with children, this, along with a decent social environment, will dispense with any pressing need for stereotyped moral instruction. But, unfortunately, for Mr. Chapman, a moral instruction based on religion does nearly always take a negative form. "Thou shalt not" is the main form of religious moral teaching, as it is the main form of every police code. And, again, we agree that a parade of prohibitions is an invitation to infringement. The suggestion of the opposite is a commonplace of psychology. It is not only the cinema that makes the villain the most interesting person in the piece. That is also a peculiarity of religious morality. There is so much talk of "sacrifice" and of "restraint"—two words that should never, on any account, be heard in connection with moral teaching—it is the villain who is impressed upon the Christian's mind as the only one who has a really good time. The good man has all the suffering and experiences all the sacrifice, and the bad one leads a life of enjoyment—at least in this world. And, quite naturally, many are inclined to risk the next. A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush—particularly when the existence of the bush is a matter of uncertainty. * * *

Morality a Weird Fact.

Morality can never be safely taught save as a social fact. Base your morality upon God, you do but impose an heavenly policeman on a terrestrial one. Permeate it with religion and you breed difference, discord, hatred, and uncharitableness where there should be nothing but a broad harmony and an enlightened humanitarianism. Morality is a social fact or nothing. It arises out of the natural, the organic relationships of members of the same species. Moral laws are laws of social health, they describe and prescribe the conditions under which human beings may dwell together with both pleasure and profit. And if our moral teaching has not been as effective hitherto as it might have been, secular teachers may well plead that it has never had a fair chance. Vested interests have seen to it that it is more or less allied with religion. Inside the school the teacher may be doing his or her best to turn out a finished character. Outside there is the home, too often sadly defective, and the social environment too often more defective still. The important truth lost sight of by Mr. Chapman is that as the impulse to morality comes from life, not from theory, so it is life which will determine its form and measure the degree of perfection attained. A community less saturated than ours with religious cant would see to it that the work of the teacher was enforced by the pressure of social life, instead of using the imperfections of the social environment—particularly during so decivilizing a period as the present—to belittle the work of education.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Light of Life.

ACCORDING to some thinkers, there are at least two fundamental entities in the Universe, namely, matter and life; life being, possibly, "a real and basal form of existence." The present advocates of this theory are not themselves biologists, and they deliberately ignore the fact that biologists have completely abandoned it. Its chief champion is Sir Oliver Lodge, a distinguished physicist, who goes to the extreme length of declaring that there exists a "central store" of life, out of which all living things have received their respective vital sparks. In a tree or an insect, the vital spark fails to develop into personality, and at death "returns undifferentiated and unidentified to its central store." That is to say, a tree or an insect is not immortal. In man, however, life becomes sufficiently individual, characteristic, or real, to retain its identity, or its individual character, after it returns to "its central store." That is to say, man is worthy of survival. The distinguishing characteristic of this hypothesis is its utterly unscientific nature. Professor Lionel Beale published several eloquent volumes in its defence, but towards the end of his life he was obliged to admit that "the idea that life is a power, force, or property of a special and peculiar kind, temporarily influencing matter, separating and combining, directing, controlling and regulating, but entirely different from, and in no way correlated, or by necessity connected, with ordinary matter or force, has been often ridiculed, and is now frequently rejected as being too absurd to require refutation" (Protoplasm, p. 1). Professor Benjamin Moore, of Liverpool, exclaimed, at a recent meeting of the British Association: "Vitalism is dead; but I should like to worship at the shrine of the dead love." Professor Schafer, also, in his famous Dundee Address, affirmed that "Vitalism as a working hypothesis has not only had its foundations undermined, but most of the superstructure has toppled over." "At the best," he added, "vitalism explains nothing, and the term 'vital force' is an expression of ignorance which can bring us no further along the path of knowledge."

What, then, is life? It is a product of evolution; not an entity that enters into matter at a given moment and leaves it at another, but a condition, or process, that always occurs when matter is in the colloidal state. Let it be clearly understood that animate matter is subject to precisely the same laws as inanimate, and that in no essential sense does living matter differ from the not-living. Take any living substance you please, and you will find that it does not contain a single new element. Oxygen, hydrogen, carbon, and phosphorus are found in all living substances, accompanied in many forms of life by certain inorganic salts, such as chloride of sodium, salts of calcium, magnesium, potassium, and iron. Now, all these elements, without exception, abound, in various forms, in lifeless Nature. It is safe to affirm that there is no absolute difference of constitution between animate and inanimate matter. The apparent difference lies in the fact that in living matter those elements are so combined as to form what the biologists call a colloidal—gelatinous or glue-like—compound, and the result of the formation of this compound is the state or condition known as animate. For the introduction of life there was no need to create any new principle or entity. Until quite lately it was generally taken for granted that between the living and the not-living there yawned an impassable gulf; but recent discoveries have done something infinitely better than to bridge this gulf; they have even proved that no gulf existed at all except in the imagination of the ignorant.

Digitized by Google

This theory of the origin and nature of life seems to fit all the facts concerning it which are at present known to us. If life is a product of evolution, and is governed in all its stages by the same physical and chemical forces as inanimate matter, it inevitably follows that to step outside Nature for the interpretation thereof is a radical mistake. To explain Nature in terms of a purely imaginary Supernature is not only an inexcusable blunder, but an act of high treason against Nature herself, a violation at once of the laws of logic and ethics. In what terms, then, are we to interpret life? In terms of the very Nature that has produced it. The first thing to be borne in mind is that life and death are equally inevitable, that organization is invariably followed by disorganization, and that neither life nor death fulfils any ultimate purpose or design. In other words, Nature is neither moral nor immoral, but merely non-moral. The only virtue is conformity to her laws, which she unconsciously rewards, and the only vice consists in vainly trying to break her laws, an action she as unconsciously punishes. The second great truth to remember is that intelligence is an attribute of life in its more refined and complicated forms, which has been won through countless æons of evolution. It is with Nature alone that all living beings have to settle their accounts. The joy of life is the reward of obedience, and misery the inevitable penalty of disobedience.

From those two principles we arrive at two definite and practical conclusions. The first is that life possesses no intrinsic value. To Nature the life of a Plato or a Shakespeare means neither more nor less than that of a fly. All valuations are artificial, and of artificial applications. One may ask, What is the object of existence? To which question a hundred different and more or less conflicting answers may be returned, not one of which could legitimately claim the merit of being true. The riddle of the Universe flatly declines to be read, though millions of attempts to decipher it have been made in all ages and countries. The men of the pulpit give a reading of it which they have the audacity to pronounce infallible, the responsibility for which, however, they throw on the shoulders of a being who has never once spoken for himself. The truth is that existence has no intelligible object, nor serves any known purpose. And this suggests the other conclusion, namely, that its evolved intelligence enables mankind to interpret life in terms of society. The laws of social life are these two, that of self-preservation and that of the preservation of others. Each of these laws is as essential to the welfare of the community as the other. He who does not serve himself possesses no real qualification for serving others. A selfless life would be fully as senseless. Self-service is the best possible preparation for vicarious service. If a father loses his way, how can he act as a guide to his children? In an article in the Christian World for February 8, Dr. J. A. Hutton, of Glasgow, says:—

> One fails us and another; but there is One left who will not fail us. We have Christ. Alas, it would seem that we cannot give ourselves to Christ with all the tenderness of the deepest love, until we see his beauty, his deep understanding of us, by contrast with some love of the world which has proved unstable, or mean, or false.

Then he gives the following advice to young people:—

> Permit nothing to become a light within your life, if it in any way obscures within you the light of Jesus Christ. Give to no mere human prospect, however dear, the power to lift you to the heavens, or the power to cast you into the dust. Give no hope or prospect any intimate place amongst your motives, if, when it is strongly in your mind, at the same moment Christ and the faith of your people must be far away.....In all your loves, love Christ.

Now, in direct opposition to that teaching of the pulpit, we venture to set Nature and her laws, than which we know of absolutely nothing higher and worthier of trust. To keep in touch with God and Christ, one must walk by faith all the time: the moment faith goes, they vanish. We prefer to walk by knowledge, by our ever-growing knowledge of our Mother-Nature, for knowledge is the only light of life that never fails. To walk by faith is to be a somnambulist, who sooner or later is bound to be overcome by disaster. To walk by knowledge is to face life intelligently, with indomitable courage and well-grounded confidence.

J. T. Lloyd.

The Freethinkers' Burden.

> Rough work, iconoclasm, but the only way to get at truth.
> —Oliver Wendell Holmes.
>
> If Christians would teach infidels to be just to Christianity, they should themselves be just to infidelity.
> —John Stuart Mill.

Poets and apostles are ever prophets. Swinburne saw and sang "A Vision of Spring in Midwinter," and long before Shelley asked the question: "If winter comes can spring be far behind?" Happy are the pioneers who can ignore the mistakes of the past and fix their gaze on the promise of the future. For them the darkest night is jewelled with the brightest of stars. For them there is a budding to-morrow in every midnight, and for them there is nothing irrevocable, for their eyes are ever looking forward.

Some time since, Mr. Lloyd George, turning aside from the pettiness of party politics, related to an astonished audience the drawbacks of a political career. He spoke of the calumnies to which a politician was exposed, and, in characteristic fashion, explained the seamy side of politics. After describing the burdens of a politician's lot, he went on:—

> Tradesmen have their worries and anxieties; but suppose that in addition to their ordinary troubles they found a constant mob of detractors standing outside their doors, some doing it for hate and others for hire, yelling into every customer's ears as he entered their shop: "Don't go there, whatever you do. You will be robbed and cheated at every turn if you do business with those fellows. They are all thieves, rogues, and liars." The whole time you are attending to your customers you have to dodge bricks, clods, and worse hurled at your head. Most men would rather give up business than endure this, if they had to break stones for a living.

There is much sad truth in this frank avowal; but if there is sacrifice in the case of a prominent politician,

5784704
Digitized by Google

what is to be said in the case of the leaders of a really unpopular movement, to whom sacrifice is a science and denial an art? Freethought is a far wider and nobler evangel than a merely political one. It has its roots in intellectual necessity, and, deeper still, in ethical right. It is based on the psychological law of human development, only appended by a few choice spirits for ages, but latterly taking on a new significance and a fresh urgency. Perpetually reaffirmed from generation to generation by unnumbered examples of unselfish martyrdom, from the days of Hypatia to those of Ferrer, it is to-day changing the direction and character of the ideas of the civilized world.

The Freethought leaders are the most potent forces of progress. No other men are discussed so widely as these apostles of freedom, but magnificent as is their life-work, the men are greater. Hissed at by the superior people, stoned and cursed by the vulgar, they have many trials to submit to. Perhaps the hardest which can be mentioned is that of seeing charlatans ride by in their motors; or, in other words, to mark the success of humbug, whilst they find that intellectual honesty is not a paying career.

Yet good and true men and women have had to submit to this treatment. Richard Carlile endured over nine years' imprisonment for championing free speech. Charles Southwell was aged prematurely by his fight for liberty. Charles Bradlaugh suffered defeat after defeat for sixteen years in a battle which was Homeric in its intensity, and his dying ear never caught the echo of his triumphs, a tragic boon which was not denied to Wolfe at Quebec, or to Nelson on the shot-riven Victory. Francisco Ferrer, fronting the rifles of his enemies, had to find his triumph in his own heart. George Foote had to listen to the mocking voice of the Christian judge telling him he had devoted his great talents to the service of the Devil. Yet, in their hours of apparent failure, these men had triumphed. They were martyrs who missed the palm, but not the pains of martyrdom, heroes without the laurels, and conquerors without the jubilation of victory, labouring not for themselves, but for the universe and for the coming generations, for them was influence as far-reaching as the utmost reach of the great wave whose crest they sometimes were.

When a politician carries on a campaign against the landed privileges of the nobility, he encounters, necessarily, the resistance of only a portion of the community, whereas a Freethought leader, directing his force against 50,000 priests and clergymen, and their hundreds of thousands of satellites, has to bear the brunt of an enormously greater opposition. No enmity is more relentless, or more venomous, than religious hatred. The abuse directed against the leading politicians is politeness itself compared with the assault and battery made upon the reputation of a Freethought leader. The politician has, at least, the support of half the newspapers of the country, but a leading Freethinker is certain to be grossly insulted by Liberal, Tory, and Socialist papers alike. Accused of almost every crime in the calendar, their actions constantly misrepresented, this well-nigh intolerable animosity, is, in reality, a tribute. Yet the men against whom a hundred thousand pulpits and platforms fulminate abuse will have their reward in the coming time. Thanks to their courage and devotion, heterodoxy is no longer the danger it once was to the citizen. They have forced attention to Freethought advocacy, placed its exponents on a strong platform, organized its forces, and justified its rights to equal citizenship. Through the religious prejudices of our time they have knocked an opening large enough for heretics to pass through in future, and, in very many directions, our lives are easier because of their life-work.

The rights of open-air advocacy in London have been attacked, and there are signs of a recrudescence of bigotry. There was never a time when it was more clearly the duty and the interest of the party to resist the "mailed fist" of the Churches. It is for Freethinkers to stop this plunge into mediævalism. Persecution will offer no insuperable obstacle if we front the enemy with a full war-chest and up-to-date equipment. Forgetting trivial distinctions in the face of our opponents, let us secure the movement from attack. To-day the situation is ominous. Let to-morrow and all to-morrows find it becoming less so, and those who have done their duty be judged worthy successors of those past leaders, who, in the days of peril, thrilled mankind, and raised with swords the form of trampled Liberty.

MIMNERMUS.

The Emergence of Man.

AN immense interval separates a Shakespeare or a Goethe from a savage, yet all the supreme intellects of the ancient and modern world are by universal assent regarded as distant relations of the most lowly of mankind. Still, many who accept this truth without question continue to view our unmistakable kinship with apes and monkeys with feelings of repugnance. Not that the upholders of the Jewish creation fable possess any logical objection to the doctrine of descent, for the obvious reason that they must necessarily suppose that all the innumerable human stocks have evolved from a single divinely fashioned pair. From the first man and woman—presumably Jewish—have, in terms of this theory, arisen, in a few thousand years, the Bushmen, Chinese, North American Indians, and all the various European and other races. So that logically the supporters of the creation theory can urge no objection to the principle of modified descent.

Civilized and uncivilized peoples alike have always detected a caricature of themselves in the monkey tribe. Their hands and faces, their movements and expressions, present ludicrous likenesses to man's. And there exists one small group which more closely resembles man than any other of all the monkey genera, and we distinguish its members by the term "anthropoid," or man-like apes. These animals are tailless, semi-erect, and long-armed, and their nasal organs more nearly approach man's than those of the flat-nosed monkeys of America. The man-like apes dwell in the tropical regions of the Old World, where the forests are densest and a constant supply of vegetable food is assured. These creatures are now well known to naturalists, and comprise the gibbons, small long-armed apes of South-Eastern Asia; the larger orang-utan of Sumatra and Borneo; and the gorilla and chimpanzee of equatorial West Africa.

One has only to compare the skeletons of these apes (and they stand side by side in the Natural History Museum) to realize their striking anatomical resemblance to the human framework. Shortly before the Darwinian doctrine gave offence to the orthodox, Professor Owen candidly confessed his inability to separate man as a thing apart from the animal domain. In 1857, in his Essay on the Mammalia, while comparing the chimpanzee with man, the great anatomist declared that the differences between them were simply those of degree, and he continued: "I cannot shut my eyes to the significance of that all-pervading similitude of structure—every tooth, every bone, strictly homologous—which makes the determination of the difference between Homo and Pithecus the anatomist's difficulty." Yet, after the theory of evolution had aroused an array of furious antagonists, as it did a couple of years later, Owen practically suppressed the above admission, and alleged an unbridgable chasm between man and ape. As Huxley scornfully comments: "Surely it is a little singular that the anatomist who finds it 'difficult' to determine 'the difference' between Homo and Pithecus, should yet range them, on anatomical grounds, in distinct sub-classes."

Digitized by Google

The principle of evolution is now granted by all instructed minds. Since Darwin's, or for that matter Huxley's, day, eloquent evidences of its truth have been furnished by all departments of Nature. The birthplace of the human family was probably Asia, and the ancestors of extant apes appear to have originated in the same continent. Millions of years ago, early in Oligocene times, the Propliopithecus left its remains in the Northern Egyptian desert. In succeeding Miocene times, true tree-dwelling gibbons lived in Europe, and continued their residence through the whole of the later Pliocene Period. One of these apes, the Pliohylobates, ranged as far north as the forest regions of Germany. In Miocene days, the Dryopithecus dwelt in France, and the dentition of this ape is similar to that of the orang, while its jaw suggests that of the lowly savage whose remains were discovered at Piltdown, in Sussex, a few years ago. Other fossils are known, but perhaps the most interesting of these is that of Palæopithecus from the Siwalik Hills, an ape that represented a more generalized type, from which the later specialized chimpanzee, gorilla, and gibbon are descended. And it is also suggestive that the upper pre-molars of Palæopithecus approach the human form.

These several extinct man-like apes are, perhaps, not to be regarded as forerunners of man, although Neopithecus and Dryopithecus have been claimed by such eminent experts as Gaudry and Branco either as ancestors or as nearly related kinsmen of humankind. Fuller researches, however, appear to prove that Dryopithecus was an ancestor of the larger contemporary tailless apes, and was not in the direct line of human descent. But if there is little to indicate direct kinship with man, there appears overwhelming evidence that fossil and living anthropoid apes have, in company with ourselves, arisen from common ancestors in highly remote times. Such marks of common origin have been observed in surviving savage stocks, and are still more pronounced in the bony structures of extinct human races. As Professor H. F. Osborn states, in his Men of the Old Stone Age (Bell & Sons, 1916), the anatomy of the ancient Palæolithic peoples cannot be interpreted "without a survey of the principal characters of the existing anthropoid apes."

Although all the higher and more specialized regions of the human brain are present in the cranial contents of our anthropomorphous cousins, the brain of modern man manifests a marked advance. Professor Elliot Smith and other competent judges contend that the arboreal environment of the primitive ancestors of man led to the development of—> quick, alert, and agile movements, which stimulated the progressive advance of the posterior and lateral portions of the brain. The sense of smell had been well developed in a previous terrestrial life; but once these creatures left the earth and took to the trees, guidance by the olfactory sense was less essential, for life amidst the branches of the trees is most favourable to the high development of the senses of vision, touch, and hearing. Moreover, it demands an agility and quickness of movement that necessitates efficient motor centres in the brain to co-ordinate and control such action as tree life calls for. The specialization of sight awakens curiosity to examine objects with greater minuteness, and guides the hands to more precise and skilled movements.

One has only to consider the general build of the human body to realize how admirably adapted it is for life in the virgin forest, and a survey of man's cerebral structures recalls various pictures of his early arboreal life. Those sections of the brain in which the senses of sight, hearing, and touch are seated display a fuller development than our present conditions of life require. If we study a good collection of brains in a museum, or examine a diagram illustrating the evolution of the organ of mind beginning with the chimpanzee and ending with living man (Homo sapiens), this early advance of the posterior regions of the brain stands clearly revealed; while, on the other hand, the relative and absolute increase of the frontal or anterior portions of the organ displays itself more and more as we ascend from the higher apes to Pithecanthropus erectus (the ape-man), and then step by step advance through the Piltdown, Neanderthal, and other primitive types, up to contemporary European races. In other words, the brain centres first evolved are those that minister to the senses of sight, hearing, and touch; while those which furnish us with our higher mental powers are the last to appear.

The ascent of man was largely conditioned by four important factors. The gorilla and other apes are semi-erect, but the rude forefathers of man at last attained the erect posture. A second advantage was the development of the opposable or pliable thumb, which conferred on its possessor enormous possibilities. A third improvement was the expansion of the brain, which, in co-operation with the newly acquired capacity to walk upright, enabled man to cope more successfully with his adverse surroundings. Then, to crown all, his gestures and animal cries were supplemented by the advent of speech, which, however primitive, must have constituted a marked advance over all previous modes of communication. The bipedal attitude enabled man to cultivate the use of his hands, and the rich experiences gained by manual dexterity provided food for reflection, thus giving his mental organ full occasion to exercise its powers. These four progressive modifications acted and reacted on each other, and the advance of one coincided with the development of the rest. Where the hand is partly employed as a foot, as in all animals that move on all-fours, its liberty as a grasping organ is curtailed. In consequence, the freedom conferred on the hands by the attainment of the upright position is enormous. Our antique ancestors were now able to descend from their leafy retreats and explore the adjacent earth, to wander down the streams, and somewhere reach the sea. Such was man as we find him, probably, in late Pliocene times; rude and rugged, but capable, as his after-history proves, of surmounting the risks and dangers that environed him.

Our acquaintance with primitive man is fullest in Europe, and his ancient records are largely associated with the great Ice Age. And science to-day is in possession of sufficient facts to enable us to present a more or less accurate outline of the changing terrestrial and meteorological conditions which heralded the arrival of the strange vicissitudes of that polar period. Authorities of weight differ concerning the duration and extent of this frigid visitation, but the testimony afforded by animal and plant life, in addition to that furnished by various geological phenomena, has convinced all unbiased investigators as to the far-reaching nature of the glacial catastrophe.

During the Pliocene Period, the woodlands of Central France and Northern Italy were composed of trees similar to those that flourish in the forests of the middle United States to-day. The present flora of the Carolinas was well represented in Upper Italy in earlier Pliocene times; while further south, on the margin of the Mediterranean, the vegetation was more tropical in form. In the words of Osborn, while we have—> the bamboo, the sabal palm, and the dwarf fan palm; most interesting is the presence of the sabal, which now flourishes in the sub-tropical rain forests of Central Florida. The sequoia also was abundant. Towards the close of the Pliocene, the first indications of the coming Glacial Epoch were a lowering of the temperature, and in the higher mountainous areas, perhaps, a beginning of the glacial stages.

Digitized by Google

T. F. PALMER.

(To be continued.)

A Playlet by a Peripatetic Patriotic Parson.

"MAN in his time plays many parts," and the Rev. A. J. Waldron has already made his bow as a Naval Architect, a Nonconformist preacher, a peripatetic dealer in mongrel politics, a special lecturer to the Christian Evidence Society, a writer of music-hall sketches, a public instructor on questions of morality, Vicar of Brixton, and hooligan opponent of the N. S. S. platform, whose favourite amusement it was to ostentatiously put pebbles into the collecting-bags at the meetings of the Society—therefore, the recent announcement that he was to appear at the Victoria Palace in a sketch perpetrated by himself and a collaborator, entitled "Nature's Call," excited the curiosity of a possessor of an intimate knowledge of stage technique, who desired to see him still further distinguish himself. Desire was gratified. The purpose of the playlet is well and briefly summarized in the following quotation from the Referee:—

> It suggested that the Empire's need for a rise in the birth-rate should be met by the abolition of clerical celibacy and the satisfaction of the spinster's maternal instinct without regard to existing conventions.

A youthful spinster, recognizing that there are not enough men to go round, discusses her thwarted natural instincts with a young married man of her acquaintance, who, in turn, submits the problem to the "Padre" (the Rev. A. J. Waldron), who evidently fearing that he should be commandeered to furnish a practical solution, waxes indignant, and declares in a frenzied speech, in which he most effectively "tears a passion to tatters," that he is wedded to the Church and he will not so dishonour his mother (whether he refers to his maternal progenitor or Mother Church is rather uncertain), not even for England! and after this unpatriotic announcement from so patriotic a parson, dashes off, and the curtain descends to a mixed accompaniment of ribald laughter, hisses, and the timid attempts at applause of a few elderly spinsters, who had done violence to their feelings by attending a music-hall performance to support "the late, great Vicar."

Fearing he may have disappointed the ladies by this exhibition of virtue (there could be no other reason for his appearance), Mr. Waldron comes before the curtain and proceeds to unsay all he has said in the play by declaring in a long and rambling speech (in which he ranged from his own activities at the Fronts of Belgium, France, and Serbia with a motor ambulance, and without the consent of his Bishop, to the virtuous lives of members of the theatrical profession, of which his knowledge seems to be extensive and peculiar): "I protest against the clergy and bishops who speak about the necessity of filling the empty cradle but do not fill it themselves—no parson should speak about such things who takes the vow of celibacy. Let them show by practice what they mean." (Applause from the lady members of the audience, who appeared to take heart again.) After much more in this strain, the reverend gentleman retired, amid expressions from the audience of a mixed nature, which finally necessitated the compulsory retirement of some of its members also, at the invitation of the attendants.

As to the acting, in fairness to Mr. Waldron, it was announced that he appeared for the first time on any stage, though rumour hath it that in former days he had distinguished himself in that line of business known to the theatrical profession as the portrayal of "dead bodies on battle-fields," and, lest it be thought that this criticism is prejudicial, the following is an extract from the Weekly Dispatch:—

> "There be players that I have seen play," says Hamlet despairingly. And yet he can never have seen the late Vicar of Brixton.....At its best, the pulpit style is not for the fashion of the stage, at its worst—as Mr. Waldron does his best to show—it suggests a new terror to the playgoer. The "argument" of the ridiculous piece itself is in keeping with what the poverty of the language compels one to call the acting. No wonder that there was a marked display of disapproval by so many in the audience.

Mr. Waldron had, however, nobly sacrificed his appearance in his make-up for the part. His good looks and graceful carriage, so familiar to Freethinkers, were entirely obliterated; and the Padre appeared as a slovenly, shabby, aged, bald-headed, toothless, somewhat inarticulate dodderer, decidedly shaky in the text. His very hands were made up to represent dirty, raw beefsteaks, over which he cleverly managed to convey that he had lost control, as he wore them alternately crossed upon his breast, or flapping like the ears of an infuriated elephant. But the greatest loss to his acquaintances in his new role was his wonderful personality.

Where was that magnificently pugilistic and defiant attitude with which, in his zeal for his Church, he confronted a London police-court magistrate when charged with assaulting an aged Freethinker harmlessly selling this paper for a livelihood, and trampling on and destroying his stock? Where was the arrogant bearing, the withering sarcasm, the insolent manner, with which he had been wont to overawe his Freethinking opponents? and the effrontery with which he used to repeat his libellous and scandalous misrepresentations of their meetings and their principles? Gone! absolutely gone! and in their stead, there stood before the curtain, a garrulous, shapeless, extraordinarily ordinary piece of humanity, overweighted, overrated, subjected to the ridicule of the audience, whom he referred to as "the most thinking audience in the world."

But let Mr. Waldron be of good cheer. There is always an opening for an original pantomimist, or a seaside nigger minstrel, and a cinematograph performance would cause less pain to an audience who would lose nothing by the omission of the words. But for the legitimate stage—he really ought not to do it again!

Oh, Mr. Waldron! Oh, those hands!

S. V. K.

An old Scotch woman was dying. The storm was raging without, the wind was howling, and the rain dashing against the window panes. Her people and the doctor were gathered round her bed. "I maun dee, doctor; I maun dee," said the sick woman. "Ay, Ay, I'm mickle feart ye are gaun," the doctor replied. "Weel, weel, the Lord's will be done," his patient responded, "but it's an awfu' night to be gaun skirlin' through the clouds."

A minister, some few Sundays ago, astonished his hearers by addressing the Deity, not as "Thou who holdest in thy hands the heart of kings," but as "Thou, in whose hands is he king of hearts."

Digitized by Google

Acid Drops.

Apropos of the Church of England's investment of three and a half millions in the war loan, there is one point that appears to have escaped observation. We speak under correction, but we believe that money left to the Church of England is, legally, money left to the State. If this be so, in using this money for the purposes of conducting the War, the State would only be using its own. The capital could, of course, be re-directed at any time to the original purpose for which it was set aside. But to pay interest on what is really its own money, and as the Church of England is part of the State, it is clear that, to pay interest on it, seems much like the State paying the parsons for permission to use its own funds.

We have another suggestion to make with regard to the clergy. While the State hires clergymen, it is justified in paying them. The absurdity lies not in their payment but in their employment. Still, when a call for service is made upon all, and all are asked to place their labour at the disposal of the State and be content with what is at most a living wage, why not put the same principle into operation with regard to the clergy. Settle what is a living wage, and then let the State see that none of its servants—particularly the clergy—receive more than that. The clergy, we feel sure, would not complain. They believe that the essence of Christianity is sacrifice, and would, doubtless, welcome the regulation as a genuine sign of the Christianization of the State.

Defending himself in a recent breach of promise action, a Highland minister, the Rev. M. S. Maclean, pleaded that no importance should be placed on his having kissed the lady in question. Kissing was a Highland habit, he said, and the Macleans were a very affectionate people. The judge, Lord Anderson, said it was a great privilege, and it was a pity it didn't come farther south. But as privileges must be paid for, Mr. Maclean was ordered to pay £200 damages. Perhaps the kissing habit will be less pronounced in the future.

The Rev. A. J. Waldron does not appear to be setting the Thames afire now that he has left the Church. The following remarks were printed in a Sunday paper concerning Waldron's latest music-hall sketch, entitled "Nature's Call," which the paper referred to, unkindly, as "Nature's Bawl": —"I am surprised that the severity of the criticism of 'Nature's Call,' the Rev. A. J. Waldron's very silly 'play,' did not kill it. Last week the Rev. gentleman acted in it at the Boscombe Hippodrome, so I presume it is still on tour. I suggest that while England is so short of war workers parsons do not seem quite in their element on the stage, even if they are bad actors."

A number of sixpenny weekly publications have been raised to sevenpence owing to the increased price of paper and labour. All these periodicals are well supported by advertisers, so it is a feather in our cap that the Freethinker remains at the same price and size as before the War.

Although the bishops and clergy do not fight—and do not intend to—they like to strut about in khaki uniforms. A newspaper paragraph states that the Bishop of Birmingham sat in the stalls of a London theatre, dressed in khaki. That is about as near to the War as most of these clerical heroes desire to get, but a few are courageous enough to conduct services at a safe distance from the Front.

Sir James Yoxall says 13,000 schoolmasters are serving with the Colours, and 1,000 have fallen fighting for England. What a contrast this affords to the conduct of the clergy, who are exempted from military service.

Mr. W. A. Appleton, Secretary of the General Federation of Trades Unions, said he did not remember many instances during thirty years in which the Church had sought to find which side was right in disputes between Capital and Labour. Just so! And he might have added that the Church is notorious for its generous treatment of its own curates, organists, and church helpers.

"Women of Britain, save your country from possible starvation by the utmost economy." Such, in short, is the appeal of Lord Devenport to the women of a Christian country. Where, however, is the person mentioned in the Gospels, who fed 5,000 persons with a few fishes and loaves?

The story of a singular conscience was told at Sheffield, when an Army absentee, who objected on conscientious grounds, was stated to have been living with a soldier's wife, the husband being on active service. Another example of the elasticity of the Christian conscience is seen in the case of the clergy, who tell people that one of God's commandments is "Thou shalt not kill," and who christen battleships and consecrate regimental flags.

Officiating at Westminster Chapel, the Rev. T. C. Williams, of Menai Bridge, perpetrated the following prayer:—

> Famine will not come to this land unless it is sent by Thee. There is no power on earth that can bring famine to a country unless thou dost send it.

Starvation in this connection is a relative thing, and we have it on the highest authority that there is a food shortage in this country as well as in Germany. And if Mr. Williams is correct the food shortage here, and the semi-starvation in Germany is "sent" by God. This, we admit, is "sound doctrine," but, if it be true, it does away with the submarine menace to England, and the peril of the blockade to Germany. It is the Lord who is responsible in both cases.

Here is another sample of Mr. Williams—we cite him because he is really a preacher of standing. He told his congregation that he knew a man who was at the head of a flourishing business when the War broke out. "First his business disappeared, and he was plunged into poverty. Then his two sons enlisted. One was killed early in the War, the other about a month ago. 'And now,' he said, 'I have just taken my wife to the asylum.'" "But," said Mr. Williams, "Christian optimism will ultimately be vindicated. God will never betray the trust of my poor soul." A more fatuous deliverance is hardly conceivable. How on earth can "Christian optimism"—whatever that may be, make up the loss of the man's two sons, and the insanity of the wife? And if God arranges famines, we presume he arranged this kind of thing also? Mr. Williams's God is a cheerful kind of deity. We congratulate ourselves on not believing in him.

"We know that without morality religion is nothing," says the Rev. Dr. Hastings, editor of the well-known Bible Dictionary. We are quite pleased to see the matter put in this way. And the reversal of the order is significant. For it doesn't matter a hang what kind of a religion a man has, there are so many of them, that the choice of one is of not much greater consequence than the pattern selected for a new suit. But it is of the utmost importance the kind of morality a man practices. That is everything.

The Mythology of All Races, in thirteen volumes, at 30s. per vol., hails from America, and the size and price sounds as though it were an important work. We have not seen the work, and, as it costs £19 10s., are not likely to. But from a review of the work we gather that the editor states, "It will perhaps be well to stress the fact that there will be nothing in our series that can be, in Roman Catholic phrase, 'offensive to pious ears'"; and, further, everything is omitted which by modern writers is usually "veiled in the obscurity of a learned language." A Mythology of All Races, written with one eye on "pious ears" and the other on Sunday-school teachers, is not likely to be worth anyone's study. The strange thing is that a number of writers should not be ashamed to make such a confession. If pious ears cannot stand the truth, they should be stopped. Any of the Churches will gladly supply the stopping.

Digitized by Google

There are few places where religion is unaffected by the War. The Henley-on-Thames Workhouse chaplain's report states: "The religious state of the inmates seems below what it has been. Most take part in the hymn-singing, but the responses and psalms lack fervour, which may be due to inability to read."

The Gospel Temperance Crusade has been at work for generations, with little result; but since the Government took the matter of drink restriction in hand, convictions for drunkenness have been reduced by half. Yet it used to be a favourite boast with pious folk that a nation could not be made sober by Act of Parliament.

Why is it that Christian utterances are usually of the "Bath-bun and glass of milk" description? Lord Selborne has been condemning British foreign policy as anti-Christian. England, he suggests, relies on ships, not on God. Well, that's true. But suppose England relied on God, and other nations on ships; where would England be, with her population depending on foreign food supplies? "Aye, there's the rub!"

The Rev. D. Ewart James, a Congregationalist minister of Southend-on-Sea, has been objecting to Sunday concerts in aid of wounded soldiers. It seems as if the men of God want a monopoly of money-taking.

The Catholic Federation of the Archdiocese of Westminster have been urging their views on education, and have made recommendations for increased science training for children. "Increased" is good, for Catholics, who believe in "transubstantiation" and other marvels, have a long road to travel towards scientific knowledge.

The Weekly Dispatch has been discussing the duties of a film censor, and suggests, among other matters, that the cinema be forbidden to show pictures that burlesque the clergy, or that are offensive to religious orders, or present sacred figures. This is very comprehensive, and forbids the screening of "The Private Secretary" and "The Life of Christ." It even excludes Dickens's characters, "Stiggins" and "Chadband," to mention no others. That editor had better try again.

Roderic K. Clark, a well-known Quaker, and director of a Croydon firm, has been sentenced to 112 days' imprisonment with hard labour for refusing to obey military orders. Brother Clark, doubtless, appreciates the benefits of being a Christian in a Christian country.

What Secularists Christians are! The Bishop of Chelmsford, writing to the Daily News on a recent explosion in a munition works, asks whether it is necessary for such work to be carried on in crowded districts. Cannot "God" protect people in a large town; and, if not, why not?

"The man who insists on more than two lumps of sugar in his tea deserves the fate of Lot's wife," writes a society journalist. Unhappily, Mrs. Lot was as salt as a herring, so the Bible suggests.

The dear clergy are too proud to fight, and it appears that some of them even object to taxation. A newspaper paragraph states that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is considering applications from churches for an exemption from the entertainments tax. What are these men of God doing in this great War?

The Bishop of Salisbury, whose salary is £5,000 a year, advises the clergy of his diocese to do work on farms, or as postmen, in their spare time. We shall be agreeably surprised at a hearty response from the sky-pilots.

In a recent publication, the Devonshire House Circle, there is a good story of the nobleman who took his child to the Bishop of Durham's confirmation: "My lord, this young lady is my daughter. Pray give her a double portion." This recalls the declaration of a French aristocrat of the old school, "God will never damn a man of my quality."

"Germany has dethroned Christ," says the Earl of Selborne, echoing the pulpit nonsense, "and set up a plague-spot of devilry." The Teutons must be "up the pole" to worship a "plague-spot."

The Earl of Selborne says "we must in future take the law of Christ as our law in politics, in international relations, in all the work of life." His lordship must mean a dim and distant future, for Christ enjoined his disciples to love their enemies, and the Beatitudes have little affinity with bayonets.

Mr. Ian Malcolm, M.P., complains that scandalously little religious teaching is given to the children of a nation calling itself Christian. Well, there is no law preventing parents giving all the religious teaching they care to give, nor parsons giving them all the parents will permit. But Mr. Malcolm, like other Churchmen, is aiming at getting the State to force religion on the children, whether the parents desire it or not. Mr. Malcolm says that the faith should be taught from "school pulpits" by men "passionately believing in what they taught." So that not alone is the State to enforce religion, but is also to see that the teachers are of the proper religious type. If these religious cranks had their way, the country would be in a pretty state.

A ticket meeting has been called for the 26th Feb., chair to be taken by "The Right Hon. and Right Rev. Lord Bishop of London," to urge the release of all civilian prisoners of war between this country and Germany. Like the rest of the activities of this bishop, the idea is preposterous. Neither the British or the German military authorities are likely to release men of military age during the war. Moreover, an appeal is made for donations before sending tickets, we are not "struck" with the suggestion, and advise friends of prisoners in Germany to give the meeting a wide berth.

"If I were a journalist," said Mr. Justice Darling, "and I wrote one thing and the newspapers published another, then I think I should give up being a journalist." His lordship might have heard of pen-pushers turning Christian for half-an-hour to write their articles.

Two-and-a-half years after the declaration of War the Pope has delivered an "allocution" condemning all persons who make aerial attacks on unfortified cities. The distinguished theologian was in no hurry to let the world know his disapproval of the murder of defenceless women and children

The dear Nonconformist Daily News recently published some headlines, "A Waste of Time. Forty Persons to Try a Man for Stealing Honey." That's a mere trifle in a Christian country, where 50,000 clergymen are explaining the consequences of the theft of an "apple" in Eden thousands of years ago.

The Congregational Churches show another decline during 1916, part of which will, doubtless, be attributed to the War. But the Sunday-schools also show a decline of 633,656, which can hardly be attributed to that cause. And if the Sunday-schools break down, where else may the Churches look for recruits? It is quite useless looking to the world of adults.

The Convocation of Canterbury at its next sitting will consider the question of the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor during the War and for six months after. We wonder if they will include "communion port" in the prohibition?

In his will, a Mr. William Andrews, of Watford, expresses a strongly adverse opinion of "the new theology," and complains that "worldliness" is increasing in the Churches. However, he leaves money to the churches he fancies, but it is refreshing to find that criticism has found a voice in the pews.

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

February 25, Clapham; March 11, Birmingham; March 18, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—February 25, Nottingham. March 25, Avondale Hall, Clapham.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—D. Seddon, 10s.

A. MILLAR.—Cheer up! Things are a bit black, but the recuperative powers of Nature are great. You are pretty correct in your estimate of popular journalism. If one is built that way, it pays; but it is a poor way of getting a living.

R. MORELAND.—Received with thanks.

E. GREENWOOD.—Received, and shall appear so soon as space permits. Thanks.

MR. W. FITZPATRICK informs us that the Glasgow Branch of the N. S. S. has decided, for the present, to hold meetings on the second Sunday of each month in the Good Templars' Hall, Ingram Street. Glasgow friends will please note.

T. B. HOPE.—Obliged for cutting. Certainly the "blasphemy" of a thing is often determined by who says it, and where it appears. We frequently see in even religious papers things that the writers would stare at even in the Freethinker.

B. DUPREE.—Mr. Cohen had already written you. Thanks for lines, which will no doubt prove useful.

J. PARTRIDGE.—Pleased to learn that your Annual Dinner, with Mr. Lloyd as the guest of the evening, passed off so pleasantly.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We regret there was a slight error in our note on the Bowman case last week. The case was adjourned until Thursday, February 8, not the 16th, as there stated. On Thursday (Feb. 8) the counsel concluded their arguments, and all that remains is the judgment. That is, as we expected it would be, reserved. It is far too important a case for judgment to be delivered offhand, and we must now wait for the final word—final, that is, so far as this case is concerned. For whichever way the judgment goes, it is only a stage in the history of Freethought.

We are pleased to have a good report of the new ground broken at Walsall on Sunday last by Mr. Lloyd. There was a good audience, lively questioning, and intelligent opposition. No speaker could desire better. These new places are being attached with the aid of the Special Propagandist Fund, which is doing exactly the work we said it would do. So far as the organizing of the meeting was concerned, that was done by the Birmingham Branch, and the Secretary, Mr. Partridge, writes that Walsall "evidently offers good ground for work." We thank the Branch for its assistance, and we are quite sure its officials feel they were rewarded by the success of the meeting.

With regard to Manchester, Mr. Cohen broke his journey to Liverpool on Saturday, Feb. 10, in order to consult with the members, and, after some discussion, it was decided to take immediate steps to secure a hall for a Sunday's meetings, when another meeting of members could be called to settle the question of reorganization. The old Secular Hall is in need of repair, and for that reason is not, at present, available for meetings. But that difficulty may be overcome once the Branch again settles down to work.

We were sorry to find that the old and present secretary of the Branch, Mrs. C. Pegg, is extremely ill, and has been more or less unwell for some time. Mr. and Mrs. Pegg have a record of thirty-five years of work for Secularism, and the Freethought party is their debtor for all they have done. We hope to hear soon that Mrs. Pegg's health has undergone an improvement, and, though Mr. and Mrs. Pegg may be unable to take part in the more exacting demands of society work, they will have the consolation of knowing that whatever success may attend the work of others, their own thirty-five years has had a share in producing it.

There are not many debates now-a-days, but there will be one this evening at the St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, Kentish Town Road, on the "Sinister Influence of the Catholic Church in Politics." Mr. Friedberg, who has had some experience of the Catholic Church in Spain, attacks, and Mr. Baker, a Roman Catholic, defends. North London Freethinkers will please note.

The South London Branch is continuing its propaganda at Avondale Hall, Clapham, although the severe weather has been something of a hardship to it. To-day (Feb. 18) the lecturer is Miss K. B. Kough; subject, "The God Idea." The lecture commences at 7 o'clock, and we hope there will be a good audience.

Will members of Mr. Howell Smith's Discussion Class please note that this week the meeting will be held on Wednesday, February 21, instead of on the regular meeting night, which is Thursday?

We see that the Sunlight Soap man, Mr. S. H. Lever, has been made a Knight Commander of the Bath. This is quite a case of making the punishment fit the crime.

A correspondent writes:—

> I have again to thank you for my weekly "cold bath." By which I mean the strong and bracing tonic of the Freethinker. What you say about war is too true; but there are other forces arising which will make it unpopular. The nations cannot afford it as carried on under modern conditions. The glorious "free" press loses money by it; and the Philistine gets hit in his "little Mary," and never in the heel, as depicted in erroneous mythology.
>
> Meanwhile Europe has, as it were, placed a sieve in the hands of Death, through which pass the young and the sound. Fancy, if any breeder of animals raised stock in that manner! And the "Imperialists," or pirates, of the world scream out for more babies, much as a miller would ask for flour, that he might grind it. Truly, all wise men contend against the same enemies. And they have no worse foe than Christianity, which corrupts the minds of the living through the fears of the dead.

The Bowman Case.

House of Lords Appeal.

THE historic Bowman Case reached its final stage in the House of Lords last week, on Appeal from the Court of Appeal. The day fixed by their Lordships was January 30, the anniversary of the death of Charles I.; this report is written when still no one knows which party shall be beheaded.

Members of the court are the Lord Chancellor, Lords Buckmaster, Dunedin, Parker, and Sumner. The court is sitting in the House of Lords, amid the famous red benches.

For the Appellants there appeared Mr. G. J. Talbot, K.C., and Mr. Price; for the Secular Society, Ltd., Mr. M. Tomlin, K.C., and the Hon. M. M. McNaughten.

The Appeal was opened by Mr. G. J. Talbot, K.C., for the Appellants, who reviewed the Case as carried through the courts below. He quoted from the Memorandum of Association of the Secular Society, Ltd. to show that its object is the overthrow of Christianity. He asked the court to go beyond the Memorandum and to examine all the activites of the Society and to declare that its work is dangerous to public policy. If the Society is illegal it cannot receive a monetary legacy in aid of its propaganda. He submitted that the court could not allow such a Society to exist. That was the main burden of the proceedings when they were adjourned for two days.

Digitized by Google

On Thursday the Appeal was renewed by Mr. Talbot. He claimed that Christianity is part of the common law of England. He quoted the Toleration Act and other Acts in support. He went back to the Stuarts, and earlier times to find evidence for his contention, and outlined the treatment of Jews, Unitarians, and others. He explained the meaning of the word Heresy, Apostasy, Arianism, etc. Church and State never tolerated small cliques, but only large bodies of regular dissenters, and even they were not allowed to meet behind locked doors.

Counsel examined closely the doctrines and principles of the Secular Society and their relation to the law of Blasphemy, and claimed that all Englishmen were still under ecclesiastical law, and declared in answer to a question that even Huxley's essays against Christianity were sold to-day illegally. Atheism was an offence against morality. He quoted judgments to prove it. Not only an offence, but as much subject to ecclesiastical law, the preserver of public morality. All Englishmen are subject to ecclesiastical law doubly, because they are subjects of a king who is the legal head of the Church. The Church can excommunicate still, and offenders against ecclesiastical law could receive six months' imprisonment.

At the third day of hearing Mr. Talbot was continuing his argument when the Lord Chancellor suggested that he might give way to Counsel for the Respondent Company, which he did at 11.45.

Mr. Tomlin then rose and proposed to put his case under four heads.

I.—That the question of the illegality of the Company is not open.

II.—Even if one of the Articles of the Company is illegal that does not make a gift to the Company illegal.

III.—A true construction of section 3 (a) of the Memorandum of Association does not involve an attack on Christianity necessarily.

IV.—A temperate discussion of the doctrines of Christianity involves no illegality.

He quoted from the Companies Act of 1862 to show that the Certificate of Registration was a guarantee that the Company was a fully legal entity, and had complied with all the conditions precedent to the formation of a company. The question before the House was not whether the Company was going to use its money illegally, but whether the gift was good or bad in law. He gave a history of the Case in the courts below to show that the legal standing of the Company had stood all tests. If the Company did make illegal use of money left to it then the Company could be restrained by proceedings in Chancery, but not by such an action as this.

Members of the Company claimed the right not to force others to embrace what they did not believe but merely to hold and teach their own beliefs. They wished to apply natural principles to human conduct as we do in such problems as sanitation and the use of chloroform to alleviate pain in surgery, both of which were opposed for supernatural reasons.

Under the fourth head he gave a history of persecution for opinions, dividing the history into four periods as (1) Tribal persecution; (2) Theological; (3) Legal and Political; (4) Social, and was in the middle of his account of Theological persecution when the House adjourned until Monday.

On Monday, Mr. Tomlin faced the assertion that Christianity is part of the law of the land. It is not a scientific phrase, he said, unless it means simply that we have in this country a Christian Church established by law.

In answer to a question Counsel said that he would not ask the House to countenance any doctrine that is immoral, but would ask them to assent to the proposition that while the principles of law remain, results may change. He asserted that prosecutions for blasphemy were modern, and began in the reign of Charles II., and that not one conviction for blasphemy had been obtained without scurrility being part of the offence.

Lord Buckmaster excepted the case of the King versus Woolston, with which Mr. Tomlin agreed. The Lord Chancellor decided that the court ought to see the book for which Mr. Woolston was indicted, and asked whether stress was laid on scurrility in that case. Counsel replied that Woolston was charged with deriding the law.

Mr. Tomlin read from the Blasphemy Act to show that the prosecution must be for words spoken, and that the offence must be specific. He thought that the Company must either be charged with criminal illegality or that at the worst, on the other hand, it is merely a Company whose rights the law will not go out of its way to enforce.

At the afternoon sitting Counsel considered the bearing of the word Secular in the Company's title. He gave the history of the word and its connection with Holyoake who declared that Secularism was not necessarily an attack on Christianity.

Lord Buckmaster raised the problem of the Toleration Act and the opposing Counsel's assertion that it removed certain disabilities from two or three classes, but left all the others at the mercy of the common law.

Counsel asked for the authority for this contention while admitting that all who denied the Trinity were exempted from toleration. My opponents say, he said, that the common law is against me. I ask, where and how? They say, Oh, Christianity is part of the law of the land, therefore attacks on Christianity must be illegal. I say that no such doctrine exists, but if it does it can be only as part of the rule of public policy. The question turns on the moral interests of the State. But the rule of public policy varies from age to age. Witchcraft was punished by common law, but could not be even proved to-day.

Three hundred years ago, if the court considered certain opinions it would have given a judgment totally different from one of to-day on the same point. He hoped that when their lordships came to decide, it would be in the spirit of the age in which we live. In former days theological discussions would provoke to riot, but not now.

At the end of Mr. Tomlin's argument his Junior Counsel, Hon. M. M. McNaughten, rose and continued the plea, contending chiefly for the absolute legality of the Company and its ability in law to receive and administer a legacy such as this. He contended that the phrase: "for the subversion of Christianity," is merely rhetorical, and has no real meaning before the law.

The court then adjourned at 4 o'clock till Thursday on account of the opening of Parliament.

The Thursday's sitting began in presence of a body of Australian and New Zealand officers and men who were visiting the House of Lords. The Hon. M. M. McNaughten continued his argument for the strict legality of the Company. He submitted that only the Crown could dissolve the Company apart from a voluntary decision of the members. Lord Dunedin thought that the inviolability of a Company was a serious position in law and put a great burden on the Companies Acts.

At about 11 o'clock Mr. Talbot rose to give his final reply to the points raised by the two Counsel for the Respondent Company. He denied that the position of the Company could not be questioned simply because it had been registered. Lord Parker thought that unless he could show that all the objects of the Company were illegal he would not succeed, and in connection with a further contention Lord Parker said that he thought Mr. Talbot was meeting an argument that had never been advanced by the other side.

This Company, Counsel said, declares that the legacy does not constitute a charitable trust, that they are a legal entity, that the Corporation has been properly formed, and they declare that their objects are legal, though I am assuming the illegality of one point in their programme for the sake of argument. The Master of the Rolls has settled the point that one illegal object of a Company will invalidate a legacy. He quoted two cases in support of this contention. In effect the Master of the Rolls says that if one object is illegal the Company is in a dangerous position and must not be helped to carry out any of its objects. If a Company puts into its

Digitized by Google

Memorandum one point plainly illegal it cannot complain if that point is held to invalidate a gift. If the opposing contention is true, a Company need but put into its Memorandum only one innocent object and all the others might be illegal.

He contended that the analogy of Restraint of Trade was not sound, because in the case of this Company the one object has not become illegal by acts over which it has no control, but was illegal from the start. He quoted the case of a Company formed to promote a certain commercial process along with certain other objects, but when its main object was found to be impossible and the members petitioned for dissolution the court was obliged to sanction the petition.

He quoted the Oxford Dictionary's definition of the word Secular to show that it is held to involve an attack on Christianity, and from the Principles and Objects of the National Secular Society to confirm his contention that the Company existed to overthrow the Christian religion. He declared that, in law, irreligion is like immorality.

The Lord Chancellor pointed to the difference between two propositions, that the law will not enforce certain rights, and that the law will not declare certain objects illegal; and suggested that the point had never been met in the courts. In reply to this Mr. Talbot agreed that it might be a new point in equity.

Lord Dunedin said that he could not accept Counsel's dictum of irreligion being immoral in law, not in the sense meant by Counsel. He thought that Counsel's argument required him to find a middle course between the two.

Lord Parker instanced Shelley's Queen Mab's case as the nearest approach to Counsel's position, and the summing up in this case was read to the House.

Counsel admitted that no conviction had ever been obtained without the presence of scurrility but he asserted that the more we look into the distinction between scurrility and temperate discussion the more we see that the distinction is untenable.

The Lord Chancellor could not understand how Mr. Talbot could say that there was no distinction, and Lord Dunedin thought that Counsel was bound to admit a difference. Lord Buckmaster said that it is possible to use language in two ways, one good and one bad, both expressing the same thing.

Later, Lord Buckmaster raised the problem of the Jews, and the Lord Chancellor inquired whether a Jewish sermon, in a synagogue, against Christianity, would be illegal. Counsel thought it would be so, strictly considered. The Lord Chancellor asked a similar question as regards Mohammedans, and Counsel gave the same reply.

Counsel then read a long essay by Sir James Stephen criticizing Lord Coleridge's judgment in the Foote and Ramsey case to the effect that Christianity is the basis of English law and that temperate criticism is more dangerous to Christianity than scurrilous attacks; he also read the same writer's criticism of other judgments, especially in the Queen versus Hetherington, which reaffirms the principle set forth in the King versus Woolston.

After the interval for lunch, Counsel contended that it is unjust to draw a distinction between temperate discussion and scurrility because the scurrilous opponent of Christianity is often quite honest and sincere, and is merely speaking the language that most of his hearers understand. Why should he suffer more than the other?

Lord Buckmaster showed, against this, that, for instance, physiological facts might be put scurrilously or modestly: are both methods therefore equal?

Finally, Counsel held that the legacy must be declared illegal because its reception could not be enforced. Not one case can be quoted to prove that it could be enforced in law. What justification exists, therefore, for the making of a new law? Why change the old principles of public policy? Only an insignificant minority will regard the operations of this Company with approval. These people attack Christianity at the root, and the smallness of their support demands that no alteration in the rule of public policy shall be made in their favour.

The learned judges in the courts below have done that; but, I ask, said Counsel, how far is this to go? Are all the foundations of public policy to be changed simply because we live in changed times? The courts below have torn up the old rules, and if that is allowed, why not tear up the Common Law so far as it rests on public policy?

The Lord Chancellor inquired here whether restraint would not do more harm than good, and a little later said that he would be sorry if the judges had to decide matters of personal opinion.

After some further discussion Counsel brought his case to a close with a request that if the House decided against his clients they should be allowed their costs out of the estate in dispute.

The Lord Chancellor announced that the House would take time to consider its judgment and then rose at 3 o'clock.

H. V. S.

Religion in Russia.

II.

CHRISTIANITY.

(Concluded from p. 87.)

As Christianity, in one form or another, has for several centuries been the dominant religion in Russia, I shall only mention the Mohammedans, Buddhists, and other non-Christians, except that something must be said concerning the Jews.

The exact date of the introduction of Christianity into Russia is doubtful. Some writers place it in the ninth century, about 868, when the Patriarch of Constantinople, it is supposed, had permission to found a church in Kieff, one of the oldest towns on the Dnieper. Others, while implying or admitting the possibility of an earlier introduction, are inclined to take the tenth century, about 988, as giving a more satisfactory date for the definite founding of Christianity in Russia. There seems little doubt that the first Russian duke, or king, to make Christianity his State religion was Vladimir (988). His wife, sister to the emperor of Byzantium, gave her patronage to Greek missionaries, who were allowed to found schools and churches in the dominions of Kieff, (See S. Reinach's Orpheus, p. 270; J. M. Robertson's S. Hist. Christianity, p. 213; N. Orlaff, M.A., The Russian Church in Rel. Syst. of the World pp. 418-422; Moshiem's Ecclesiastical History, Reid's ed. (1848), p. 289, sec. 4; Wallace's Russia, p. 364, vol. i.).

To this day the majority of Russian Christians belong to the Russian section of the Orthodox-Catholic Eastern Church, and the Church of Rome has no State influence in Russia.

Ever since its early days the Russian Church has been a centre of ignorance and superstition. Perhaps no body of clergy has remained as ignorant as the Orthodox Russian. The influence of the Church in Russia has been anything but uplifting both in the lives of the peasants and of the aristocracy.

This is not to be wondered at, when so much faith is placed in the miraculous power of Icons, or pictures of Jesus, the Madonna, and many of the saints. Nor, in view of their ignorance, is it surprising that the peasants are to-day not by any means rid of belief in the old pagan deities and spirits, many of which have simply been transformed from friendly into harmful beings. Both in private and in public Icon-worship holds sway to such an extent that important Icons are often lent out, to people in great trouble, by many of the churches. In this way a good deal of revenue is secured. Stepniak, when writing of the popular worship of Ikons, says: the people "believe that the icon feels pain and pleasure, resents insults, and is gratified by kind treatment, just as a human being would be." (The Russian Peasantry, 1 Vol. ed. (1905) p. 361). Forlong mentions that an Icon of the Iberian Chapel at Moscow earns as much as £10 per day, by being sent out to the sick. (Faiths of Man vol. iii.; p. 209, art. "Russia.") Stepniak says (as above, p. 375) "our churches are not houses of prayer, but houses of plunder," and states that many a churlish orthodox priest will refuse to bury the dead, if a poor peasant is unable to pay the exorbitant price he asks. It is of this church that the "Holy Tsar" is the head—and right well does he use it to keep his subjects in subjection. He is "known as Jembla Bogh—"The God on Earth," etc. (Carl Joubert's Russia as it Really Is, p. 1 and p. 296). But we must now take a glance at the Rascolniks or Dissenters. Schism appeared in the Russian Church, probably, two centuries prior to the appearance of the Rascolniks in the time of Patriarch Nicon, about 1659, but the earlier dissent does not seem to have been very numerous.

Digitized by Google

Nicon, along with Tsar Alexis, determined to alter the ritual and improve the text of the mass-book. To this a large number of the people objected, believing that any alteration in mass-book, or ritual, would be detrimental to salvation. Consequently, the substitution of the use of three fingers, instead of two, when making the sign of the cross; the alteration of the spelling of Jesus from "Jsus" (an abbreviation long in use) back to "Jesus"; and instructions that the Hallelujahs should be sung three times instead of twice, led to rupture in the Holy Russian Church. Matters of doctrine as distinct from ritual were left untouched, and yet thousands of people seceded from the orthodox pale of the Church. Because they objected to changes in ritual, and corrections in the spelling of words, many thousands became fanatical and met death at their own hands or those of others. The revolt against the innovations was gradual, but as time went on it brought out a great deal of bitterness on both sides. The dissenters not only frequently gloried in destroying themselves, but persecuted with as good a heart as did the orthodox.

Whatever explanation of the Rascolnik movement we may adopt, it is clear that Christianity had failed to improve Russian life, whether social or religious, in such a way as to make progress possible on the lines of peaceful co-operation by those who had accepted the "Divine Revelation."

As a result of this great movement of dissent a large number of sects ultimately came into being, but here we have not room to mention many. (For details on "The Rascol," see Wallace's Russia, vol. i., p. 337, etc.; Stepniak, as above, p. 385-490; Ency. Brit., art. "Russia" —Sept. ed., 1914, p. 20). Belonging to the general movement of dissent, but probably preceding the date on which the appearance of the Rascolnik is usually fixed, are the sects known as the Chlists.

About 1645, a peasant named Danilo Filipovitch, claimed that God the Father had become incarnate in him. In time he established a number of sects in the province of Kostroma. These sects spread to various parts of the empire in the form of secret societies. They called themselves "Christs," but owing to their habit of self-flagellation becoming known the orthodox gave them the name of "Chlists," that is "whips." Some of the Chlistic sects were also in the habit of exciting sexual feeling at their meetings, and when the lights were extinguished a promiscuous orgy was indulged in. Doubtless the sanctity of human nakedness was deemed to be gracious in the sight of the "Lord," to whom there is no darkness. Even now a good deal of excitement is indulged in, although some of the Chlistic sects have sobered down a little. "At their prayer-meetings the Khlysti dance to the accompaniment of hymns, the dance gradually developing into a wild dervish-like spinning which is kept up till they drop, foaming at the mouth and prophesying" (Ency. Brit., art. "Russia," Sept. ed. 1914, p. 21).

Among the Skoptsi a reaction against the Chlistic indulgence in sexual promiscuity set in. On the other hand, they formed the habit of castrating themselves after having one child. The male and female were mutilated usually at midnight. (See Forlong's Faiths of Man, vol. ii., p. 317).

A division took place in the sects of the Rascolnik proper at an early stage of their history. Two sections were found: the one consisting of the Popovzy, or those having priests, the other consisting of the Bezpopovzy, or those without priests.

In turn each of these main divisions became subdivided into sects having slightly different forms of ritual. It is interesting to note that many sects of the Popovzy were content to accept, as their priest, one who had been turned out of the Orthodox Church for drunkenness or wrong-doing. A washing in the baptismal water made him fit to act as priest again. To many of the Popovzy the being able to perform certain rites was more important than moral living.

A sect of the Bezpopovzy, which needs to be mentioned, is the Ikonobertsi. This sect refuses to have anything to do with images and pictures in connection with religion. A feature that is not outstanding either in the official Russian Church or the Rascolnik.

A few words must now be said concerning the Dukhoborzy and Molokane. According to Stepniak: "the Molokane seceded from the Dukhoborzy during the last quarter of the eighteenth century, and the Dukhoborzy is much the elder." (Russian Peasantry, 1 Vol. ed., p. 505.) There seems to be no knowledge as to the origin of the latter sect, but it has been suggested that they were in some way connected with the Ikonobertis, as they reject Icons. The doctrine of the Dukhoborzy is of a theosophical turn. The Deity is the soul of the world, a kind of reasoning principle which is superior to the world, but dwells in and is inseparable from the souls of men. In fact, it is through man alone that the Deity is able to reveal himself. He is incarnate in the faithful, each one of which is a "Son of God," inasmuch as he possesses the indwelling spirit. The "Fall" is repeated every day in the wrong-doings of men. Man's soul is immortal, according to the Dukhoborzy, but only in the sense that it is inseparable from the indwelling "soul of God." There is neither hell nor paradise, the soul is able to transmigrate at the death of the body. Christ was only a good man, and all Scriptures should be interpreted by the "inner light."

The Molokane are mentioned as far back as 1765. This sect is Christian and not theosophical like the Dukhoborzy. The Bible is accepted as the rule of faith and conduct, and is to be understood according to the spirit and not the letter. A great deal of indifference is shown towards outward forms of worship, and the sacraments. Most of the Christian doctrines are believed by the Molokane, but a fair amount of latitude is allowed for individual interpretation. As a rule, the members of this sect live good and quiet lives of mutual help.

No small measure of persecution has been the lot of both the Dukhoborzy and the Molokane. Stepniak says: "the penalties inflicted on the political offenders of the educated classes – from the Decembrists to the Nihilists—reflect but a faint image of what the guileless Dukhoborzy and their younger brothers have had to undergo almost uninterruptedly for the space of about sixty years." (Russian Peasantry, 1 Vol. ed., p. 520.)

In relation to the Jews in Russia, there has been, for a long time, a frequent and energetic application of the higher ethic of Christian brotherhood (Matt x. 34-36). No ferocity, no humiliation, has been deemed too Christian to apply to the Jews. For details concerning the sufferings of the Jews in Russia, I must refer the reader to the section on the subject in C. Joubert's Russia as it Really Is; to Israel Cohen's Jewish Life in Modern Times, per Index of Subjects, p. 366; and to the section on "The Jewish Pale," in Victor Berard's The Russian Empire and Czarism, pp. 125-177.

Digitized by Google

It is the lot of the Jew in Russia to be restricted to his "Pale," that is, "the ten provinces of the kingdom of Poland, and the fifteen frontier governments of Lithuania, White Russia, and Little Russia, where he had formerly been planted by the Lithuanian-Polish conquest (Berard, as above, p. 127). But this is not all. Within their "Pale" the Jews must be content to exist, huddled together chiefly in hovels, in the towns and small market-towns. They are usually very poor, the men and women being glad to work for very small wages, a fact that should explode the theory that the Jew can always "get on" and make money.

In the universities and regular schools the Jew suffers from many restrictions, if he has the good fortune to be allowed to enter. But, in spite of this, the majority of Jewish children receive better instruction than is received by the average Russian peasant's children. The Jewish schools do much to make up for the loss in education, caused to their people by the Russian official restrictions.

This systematic persecution of the Jew is also carried out in the Army, which he must join if fit. Although usually a good and loyal soldier, he is dealt with in a humiliating manner, and can never become an officer or even a bandmaster. But, to crown all, the Russian Jews have frequently been butchered to death by thousands, the Christian populace having, in many cases, been set on them at the instigation of the priests.

For some time past there have been rationalizing forces at work in Russia, but the day when the cloud of Russian religion shall have vanished seems to be a long way off.

E. EGERTON STAFFORD.

Compulsory Religion.

WHAT must we do to be saved from bigotry? Who shall cast out for us the devil of fanaticism? Charlotte Bronte described bigotry as "that parent of crimes." Injustice is ever heedless of its effects. See how petty rulers and magistrates, "clad with a little brief authority," abuse their positions. It matters not to them that in their community there may be Rationalists, Jews, and Mohammedans; they persist in using their official names and official positions to fortify the Government religion. A clergyman is installed in a new cure, and the least that can be done to mark his arrival are civic welcomes, civic addresses, and civic soap. An overseas Premier gets the freedom of a town, or has a University degree conferred upon him; the proceedings in each case must be opened with prayer. A statue is unveiled to a statesman, an explorer, a scientist, or a man of letters; here again the man of God must take precedence of all others and invoke the Divine blessing on the ceremony. Sessions of Parliament and Town Councils cannot begin without pious orisons. The clergy regard themselves as State officials who are indispensable to the nation's welfare. This they certainly are not. On the contrary. But they must be recognized as astute advertisers, and keenly alert in looking after their own interests. And so long as they can secure belief in their pretensions to the possession of supernatural commissions, they will continue to exploit the common people. A "Divine call" gives them a confidence and an assertiveness which human credulity regards as well founded and well justified. They are a peculiar people, set apart by an all-powerful God to execute his purposes—separate from "sinners"—made of a different clay from Tom, Dick, or Harry. And in the human poultry-yard they go about rooketty-cooing and swelling their chests like the vainest and most arrogant of pigeons! How these two-forked radishes waddle and wallow in their dignity behind dog-collars, cassocks, aprons, and surplices! How sweetly benign is their condescending smile; how Turveydropian their gentle, cat-like deportment! How the pearls of wisdom gleam as they drop from their holy lips! Could any outlawed infidel imagine that these portals of grace would ever frame a big, big D, ever curl with the sneer of pride, or ever pout in baffled petulance? Nay, the priest, like Agag, walks softly. As he surveys the crowd of gaping, unthinking believers, he assures himself that the bitterness of death for his profession is past.

Yet time and again it has been demonstrated to unprejudiced minds that his profession does not fit in with his practice. It is proverbial: "Don't do what I do; but do what I tell you." People are beginning to realize that all his work is talk. The house of priestcraft is founded upon sand. The priest may not perceive that the numbers of those who do their daily work and enjoy their daily recreations without reference in any sense to God or religion are increasing year by year. The clergy may still be "first oars" at the crowning of kings, the christening of battleships, or the dedication of colours; but the spade-work of life is done to-day better, more strenuously, with more effective and more beneficent results without any tinge of religion or religious association. For years we have been told that everything that was not mixed with religion was accursed. Gradually the people are beginning to see that everything that is not "mixed with brains" and commonsense is destined to failure. The priests warned us that all our human talents must be employed in the service either of God or of the Devil. There could be no middle course. What advancement humanity was to make, and the way in which, and the means by which it was to be made, were to be determined by the clergy.

Is it so now? May Freethinkers not congratulate themselves that it is only the ignorant, unthinking, and uninformed who concede such claims? Over the Christian Churches of Britain may be inscribed in gigantic characters the word "Failure." All the galvanizing methods in the world cannot bring back life to moribund sects. Men are thinking more profoundly; aspiring far higher; looking far further—both backwards and forwards—than ever they did before. Religion tries to keep the scales on the eyes of Humanity; Reason pierces them with a light that heralds the coming of Freedom. Religion has never succeeded yet where it was not imposed by compulsion of some sort. The mediæval weapons were physical and mental torture—the Inquisition, the dungeon, the rack, the stake, and the thumbscrew. The modern weapons are social ostracism, business boycotting, and the sedulous sowing of the idea that unbelievers are filthy-minded, dirty-living pariahs, home-wreckers, and social subverters, with no sense of personal honour. However the suggestions may be gilded, that is the meaning of the attitude of the Christian to the Atheist.

Religion depends upon compulsion; if not the compulsion of terror, then of some other sort. But physical force and money cannot for ever stand against the assaults of knowledge. What mockery to bleat in the parent's ear as he watches his beloved child in the grip of consumption, that "God's in his Heaven; all's right with the world"! What lunacy to preach the doctrine of non-resistance to the man who sees a tiger springing upon his own mother!

Digitized by Google

Ecclesiastical corporations can survive only so long as they can make religion compulsory. This cannot be too much emphasized. From the pages of a weekly paper, friendly to the Faith, we cull the following paragraph, which is an interesting commentary upon the compulsory system of religion which prevails in our Army:—

> A young B.Sc., who has served as a private in Gallipoli, and latterly in France, sends us an interesting story of the way in which religious matters are treated by the ordinary soldier. He remembers incidents happening at the usual Church parades as follows: The Church of England men were marched off to service. Then the Wesleyans and the Presbyterians. When the turn of the United Board came there were only three, and they were dismissed. On the following Sunday the three had grown to a dozen, and again they were dismissed. The third Sunday there were thirty, and they were then marched off to the Y.M.C.A. tent, where a chaplain of the United Board gave them a two-hour service. On the fourth Sunday the numbers declined to the original three. There the story ends.

It is wise not to underrate the forces opposed to Freethought. Religion is buttressed by powerful and wealthy interests. Willy-nilly we must pay for the maintenance of the Government religion. Clerics of the Church of England still sit upon the Benches of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Willy-nilly we must consent to be called Christian when we are nothing of the kind. But one is entitled to expect that State servants and State officers shall study to cultivate and preserve, in so far as their official capacity is concerned, the grace of a correct and strict neutrality. Unfortunately, too many of these gentlemen go out of their way—though they must be well aware of the many divergent faiths and philosophies represented in the British — Empire to advertise the inestimable benefits of the Christian religion. Why should Viscount French, for example, have, at the opening of a Salvation Army Club, descanted upon the high and ennobling ideas which young soldiers had been taught by the Salvation Army? There are thousands of people in the real Army, and out of it, who entirely deny that Christianity is in any respect a sine qua non to a high and noble life. Lord French, like some other State officials who are given to masquerading on religious platforms, would be well advised to "stick to his last" and leave the professional religionist to his.

IGNOTUS.

Obituary.

A staunch old Freethinker, in the person of Mr. George Kemp, passed away on Friday, February 9, in his eighty-sixth year. He was the father of H. A. Kemp, who, with the historic prisoners, G. W. Foote and W. J. Ramsey, was prosecuted for blasphemy in 1883, and received a sentence of three months' imprisonment as publisher of the Freethinker. The veteran Mr. Kemp, who preserved his mental activities to the last, was a well-known propagandist in North-East London, and never tired of relating how he had met Mr. Bradlaugh, as a boy, at Bonner's Fields; had seen all three Presidents of the N. S. S. come into the Movement; and how, in one of the Hyde Park riots of 1878, his shoulders served Mr. Bradlaugh as a platform from which "the Chief" put and carried a resolution in favour of peace. A constant reader of the Freethinker, his enthusiasm and loyalty for the Cause never wavered. The funeral takes place at Chingford Mount Cemetery, at 4 o'clock, on Saturday, February 17, when a Secular Burial Service will be read.

E. M. V.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, off Kentish Town Road, N.W.): 7.30, Debate, "The Sinister Influence of the Catholic Church in Politics." Affirmative, P. Friedberg; negative, R. O. Baker.

SOUTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Avondale Hall, Landor Road, Clapham, S.W.): 7, Miss Kough, "The God Idea."

MR. HOWELL SMITH'S DISCUSSION CLASS (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Wednesday, Feb. 21, at 7.30.

HYDE PARK: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Kells and Dales, "Christian Hypocrisy"; 6.30, Messrs. Beale and Saphin.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

LEICESTER (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate); 6.30, A. J. Essex, "The Starry Universe." Lantern illustrations.

WILL Freethinking Family in Northampton Billet Pte. Arthur F. Thorn, for Accommodation under Military System? Must be billeted somewhere in town, and prefers the atmosphere of a Freethinking home.—Write, 12 The Arcade, Northampton.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

POST FREE THREE HALFPENCE.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
QUEEN ANNE'S CHAMBERS, WESTMINSTER, S.W.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

TEH PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

A

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY
OF FREETHINKERS
OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY

J. M. WHEELER.

Price THREE SHILLINGS Net.
(Postage 6d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.
G. E. MACDONALD - - - - EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN - - EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

Subscription Rates:

Single subscription in advance - - -	$3.00
Two new subscribers - - - - -	5.00
One subscription two years in advance -	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp. ...	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 58 pp.	,, 1d.	0	3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	3
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
COMING CIVILIZATION. 30 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp....	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Mangasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, .	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 82 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 82 pp ... ... Nett.	,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. LEA.
In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
By E. A. ASHCROFT.
440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By CARVETH READ.
8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.
By D. B. HART, M.D.
Crown 8vo. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

THE THEORIES OF EVOLUTION.
By YVES DELAGE.
1912. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.
For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. MILL.
Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

HISTORY OF THE TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.
By C. D. COLLET.
Two vols., published at 7s. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By CHAPMAN COHEN.
Price 1s. net, postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By G. W. FOOTE.
First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. WHEELER.
Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:
CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:
MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 1,858

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 8 SUNDAY FEBRUARY 25, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
Education After the War.—The Editor	113
Religion After the War.—J. T. Lloyd	114
The Smile of Voltaire.—Mimnermus	115
The Emergence of Man.—T. F. Palmer	117
China and the War	118
Acid Drops	118
To Correspondents	121
Sugar Plums	121
The Moral Philosophy of Freethought	122
Critical Chat.—Geo. Underwood	122
The French Revolution.—Robert Arch	124
Letter to the Editor—Prosecution of Spiritualists	126
Oh, for Ten Thousand Tongues to Sing! —Arthur F. Thorn	126
Notice of Meetings	126
Books and Pamphlets	127

Views and Opinions.

After the War.

"After the War"—that is the magic formula with which some enthusiasts for reform console themselves for the mental, moral, and social sacrifices that are being made during the War. "When the boys come home" is another variant of the same theme; and, when honestly used, indicates a quite pathetic faith in the reconstruction that is to come when the work of destruction is concluded. First, the War was to end war. For nearly a year that phrase did duty. We pointed out the absurdity of the phrase when it was first used, and now it is universally rejected. Everybody now realizes that the cessation of this War will mean an increase in the size of the Armies and Navies of the world, and the world will be fortunate if it remains in a state of armed peace until such time as it has become sufficiently civilized to store its weapons of destruction in a museum. But after the War—then the squire and the farmer will take to their hearts the agricultural labourer and make him a co-partner in the land he laboriously tills; the capitalist will treat the workman as a brother beloved; the peer will hob-nob with the plebian; the men who have fought together in the trenches will return home determined on building a better England; labour will give of its best to capital, and capital will share its all with labour. All this will occur—after the War. Pity it is that shipowners, coal owners, trading corporations, and financial magnates have not shown some clear indication of the coming change while the War is in progress.

* * *

The Education Question.

Among other things that are to be revolutionized after the War is education. And that is a matter which seriously concerns the clergy of this country. It concerns them, not because they are interested in education, as such, but because their concern lies with controlling education so far as is possible. An education in which the clergy had no hand would, indeed, be a very good thing for the country, but it would be a very bad thing for the Churches. So the Bishop of Oxford, addressing a meeting of the Education Committee of the House of Laymen of the Province of Canterbury and the Mothers' Union, said (we quote from a summary given in the Schoolmaster):—

> He dreaded Churchmen appearing before the country as the opponents of the new democratic programme of educational reform. He desired that no such disaster should happen as that Churchmen should associate their claim and appeals for the proper place of religion in education with opposition to the educational programme of the democracy. He thought the democracy was going to be fairly in earnest in the demand for educational reconstruction of the most expensive kind. He believed it was absolutely just, necessary, and good, and he desired that every Churchman should be an enthusiastic advocate of this educational reconstruction. He had never seen working people so determined about anything as they were about not letting the parsons in on this subject. They were determined that the religious question should not be allowed to trouble the mind. Churchmen should associate what they had to say about religious education with an unmistakable enthusiasm for educational reconstruction, and not with a merely niggardly attitude of opposition or criticism towards it.

The Bishop's purpose is quite clear. He, of course, wishes religion to be at least kept where it is in the schools, and, if possible, he wants its position strengthened. But he warns his followers that working-people are determined about this question of education. And as it would be dangerous to oppose them, Churchmen are advised to go with the tide and display "an unmistakable enthusiasm for educational reconstruction." They are to "enthuse" by command. Of course, an enthusiasm that is produced by the order of the Mothers' Union, because it would be dangerous to show lukewarmness may impose on some; but, one hopes, not many. If the clergy were really enthusiastic about education, it would scarcely need the advice of the Bishop of Oxford to make that much plain to the general public.

* * *

The Clergy and Education.

Now the clergy have not, and never have had, as a body, any genuine enthusiasm for education. That lies on the face of the history of elementary education in this and every other country. Spain and Russia, the two countries in which the clergy have most power, are also the two most illiterate countries in Europe. In this country the measures taken by the Churches—established and dissenting—in founding schools during the early part of the nineteenth century, were so many instruments for gaining converts or for keeping a hold on such as they had. Look at the full title of the National Society, and this is as plain as daylight. It was "The National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Church of England." That was the Alpha and Omega of Episcopalian interest in education. And the dissenters used their schools as so many inducements to get children away from the Church. Not till 1833 did the English government grant a miserable £20,000 to help education. Had the education given in such schools as then existed, entirely under religious influence, been of a passably satisfactory character, no government measure for the education of the nation's children would ever have been introduced. But on the evidence of a Royal Commission it was found that the education given by churches and chapels did not warrant an annual expenditure by the State of even £20,000. For centuries the education of the people had been in the hands of the Christian Church, and the result was a population ignorant and brutalized. For seventy years churches and chapels between them controlled elementary education, and could see no more in it than an instrument for sectarian aggrandisement. The Churches had had the whole position in their grasp, and their complete failure as educationalists, their unscrupulous exploitation of the schools as so many instruments of sectarian advantage, became so notorious that the secular government was compelled to take the matter in hand. And now to avoid losing all hold over the schools the clergy are advised to "enthuse" at once. What supreme faith these clerics have in the stupidity of the British public!

Digitized by Google

* * *

The Prostitution of Education.

The Bishop of Oxford thinks the democracy will be in earnest in its demand for educational reconstruction of the most expensive kind. That may mean little or much. Education may be reconstructed without its being of the right kind. It may be expensive without being profitable. The vital question is, whether the people of this country are really alive to the value of education as a humanizing, a civilizing, a progressive force? Can we answer that question in the affirmative with any real assurance? True, we have heard a deal lately about the importance of education. But what end, what ideals, are involved? Our statesmen (one is bound to call them that, if only by courtesy), until the other day, were blind to the value of education even as a commercial asset. Since the opening of the War, these same leaders have told us our people must be better educated. To what end? To capture German trade; to beat the German competition in the world's markets; to increase our manufacturing output; to pay a larger return on invested capital, etc. They have awakened to the lofty conception that an educated workman (by which they really mean a trained workman) is a more profitable piece of machinery than an uneducated or untrained one. We are to be better educated, but in the interests of trade. Education is to be made subordinate to the needs of the workshop and the counting-house, and to the demands of the dividend hunter. We have seen how the commercializing and militarization of German education has resulted in a world-wide catastrophe. And we are invited to embark on the same voyage, as though it could possibly lead to any other destination, however long the journey may be.

* * *

Education—The Right Line.

I have no hesitation in saying that an educational reconstruction born in that spirit is damned before its birth. All real education will have a utilitarian value, but to frame an educational system with a view to that end is to fail even in that object. The only worthy purpose of education is to teach how to live. And you cannot find out how to live by discovering how to earn a living. You will better find out how to earn a living by discovering how to live. The eagerness of a carpenter to get a living will never teach him the best use of hammer, saw, and plane. But the delight of a man in the skilled use of these tools will enable him to earn a living with ease and pleasure. And what is true here is true in all directions. Education divorced from its higher ends becomes a social danger instead of a public benefit. Just as in science the finer results, the greater discoveries, have been reached from a pure love of knowledge, so in education the best results are attained by the cultivation of a sheer delight in the skilled use of human faculties as an end in itself. The best teachers have already discovered the pernicious influence of prizes, and have demonstrated that better results can be obtained by creating a healthy interest in school work. It is once more a question of ideals, and we, for one, should feel much more certain about the benefit of this educational reconstruction if we heard a little less of "increased outputs," "capturing trade," "new markets," in connection therewith, and a little more of education as a purely humanizing force.

* * *

Clear Out the Clergy.

But in one thing we hope the Bishop of Oxford is correct. That is in the determination of working-people not to let in the parsons on this subject. That is an essential condition of educational progress. For the parson is not there as an educationalist. He is there as the representative of a sect, to guard the interests of his order, to prepare the children for exploitation in after life. And let us make no mistake on this point. Every Church in existence fights to the utmost extent of its power against a perfectly free and open education. With each it must be an education which permits its sectarian interpretation to be placed upon life. That is the only possible meaning of their fight for a voice in educational administration. And the remedy for this lies in the hands of the people themselves. Let them look at the record of the Churches and learn its significance. Let them realize also that for the past fifty years the greatest obstacle to the betterment of education has been the sectarian influence of church and chapel. Let them realize their own needs, that the modern State is a Secular State, based upon secular needs, and dependent upon secular knowledge. The power lies in their hands. All they need is knowledge and how to use it. And if the Bishop of Oxford is right, that knowledge is becoming theirs in a rapidly increasing measure.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Religion After the War.

THE clergy confidently predict the triumph of Christianity after the War. Two years ago they were equally confident that the War had already brought the people back to God. Churches and chapels were crowded, and the men of God proudly declared that the day of Atheism was gone for ever. As a matter of fact, the people did not return to God, and the places of worship soon emptied again. At present religion is at a very low ebb indeed, but we are assured that once the War is over it will be all-victorious. When the young men return from the Front, there will occur the greatest religious revival the world has ever seen. Mr. Arnold Bennett is bitterly denounced for his unpardonable audacity in expressing "the conviction that the War has finally demonstrated the authenticity of an event which in importance far transcends the War itself—namely, the fall of the Christian religion." One says that, by Christianity, Mr. Bennett seems to mean that form of it which he knew in the Five Towns many years ago, whereof we read in his stories; but that is a mistake. Methodism, which the great novelist is supposed to hate, is, perhaps, the most prosperous form of Protestant Christianity in existence; and yet even Methodism is considerably less Christian to-day than it was half a century ago. We agree with Mr. Bennett, and boldly affirm, without fear of intelligent contradiction, that the War is a convincing proof that Christianity is a dead religion, that the God of love is as great a myth as Zeus or Dionysus, and that the people generally have abandoned the faith of their ancestors. Consequently, we hold that after the War there will be less religion than there is now, and that the time is coming when there will be none at all. It is true that many people have been forced by the War to grapple seriously with dark and difficult problems, but it is also true that in some cases, at least, the only possible refuge has been found in unbelief. An intelligent young man confessed the other day that until this bloody conflict began he had never faced the facts of life, and had, in consequence, shared the popular faith, but that now, after much deep reflection, belief in God has become absolutely impossible to him.

Digitized by Google

We are told that "the War has brought a new sense of the reality and splendour of spiritual values, which means the bankruptcy of the old materialism and the old dogmatism." What "spiritual values" stand for we do not know; but the phrase is generally used by those whose theological views are somewhat hazy. If by "spiritual values" we are to understand "the things that are above, not the things that are upon the earth," we must regard them as figments, real only to those who believe in them. The sense of their reality is not in us by nature, and it puzzles us to know how the War can bring it to anybody. They who assert that the War "has brought a new sense of the reality and splendour of spiritual values" frankly admit that there has been no revival of the older forms of faith and ritual. "Up to the battle of the Marne," they say, "the churches were filled with eager multitudes, but the tide receded and has not returned." They also admit that "still less has the War brought a triumph of liberal faith, as that word is usually employed." That is to say, neither the Old Theology nor the New Theology has been benefited by the War. "Nor has the expected recrudescence of superstition arrived as so many feared." Now, such admissions surely signify that Christianity has gained nothing by the savage slaughter of millions of young men which has been going on on land and sea for two years and a half, and we are convinced that had it not been for Christianity it would not have taken place. And yet, despite such admissions, this is what we read:—

> The unseen world to-day seems very near, its gates thronged by a host no man can number of the bravest and the best who offered their lives for the things that make life dear. Death, so multitudinous and overwhelming, has brought immortality to light. For many, as for Sir Oliver Lodge, its silence is broken by the soft accents of familiar voices, and for all the assurance is doubly sure that "life is ever lord of death and Love can never lose its own."

That extract is extremely illogical and misleading. The unseen world, if it exists at all, is no nearer in wartime than during the reign of peace. Besides, all living things die. Death is the end of individual existence; and in all cases death is either natural, pathological, or accidental. Life is never lord of death, and love does lose its own. Death is always "so multitudinous and overwhelming"; but to declare that it brings immortality to light is to lay a false claim to knowledge. It is absolutely incontrovertible that death does not and cannot bring immortality to light. In the New Testament, Jesus is represented as having performed that feat; but he did it, not by dying, but by rising from the dead; that is, by abolishing death for himself. Very few now believe even that statement; but the idea that death brings immortality to light is infinitely absurd, all that we know about it being that it brings life to an end. In that same extract the truth of Spiritualism is taken for granted. It is positively stated, indeed, that, for many, the silence of death is "broken by the soft accents of familiar voices."

The fact that all the belligerents believe in and fight under the banner of the same God, and pray to him for victory, betrays the utter stupidity of religion. The Kaiser ascribes every boasted success of German arms to the gracious intervention of the Almighty on their behalf. The British clergy are equally certain that the loving Heavenly Father befriends our Army and Navy, and will ultimately crown them with glorious triumph. If God existed, he would certainly make himself known, and no men would have the requisite courage to speak in his name. Since he is simply an imaginary being, whose silence has never been broken, speaking in his name has become an exceedingly well-paying profession. No matter what the subject may be, if you mention it to one of these professionals, he will undertake to inform you what God's thoughts are upon it. It is the easiest and safest of all the professions, for God never interferes, never finds fault, never contradicts. In this country alone, his ambassadors have supplied us with all sorts of contradictory accounts of his relation to the War. The majority, perhaps, agree that he brought it about to serve his own purposes. The Catholics maintain that he sent it in order to punish France for her opposition to the Holy Catholic Faith. Some Anglicans regard it as a penalty for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church in Wales. Others assure us that it is an expression of the Divine anger against worldliness, pleasure-loving, Sabbath desecration, neglect of public worship, and so forth, endlessly. Each has his or her say, and God takes absolutely no notice. Is it any wonder that people are turning their backs upon the pulpit in ever-growing numbers? Is it surprising that the Christian religion is dying out? For two hundred years it has been gradually losing its hold upon the minds of men and women, and for about twenty years most of the Churches have had to record annual decreases of worshippers. We are convinced that already the War has done irreparable damage to religious belief and practice, and that it will be followed, not by the destruction of Christianity, but by a very general feeling of distrust in it, and by a rapidly developing attitude of indifference to all its claims.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Smile of Voltaire.

> Voltaire was a stupendous power.—Lord Morley.
>
> Of all the intellectual weapons which have ever been wielded by man, the most terrible was the mockery of Voltaire.
> —Lord Macaulay.

FRENCH literature has been one blaze of splendid scepticism from the days of Abelard to those of Anatole France, but no name has inspired such terror in the breasts of the orthodox as that of Voltaire. Indeed, Victor Hugo regarded Voltaire as the protagonist of Freethought, and, in his epigrammatic way, said "Voltaire smiled, Christ wept." And that smile of Voltaire's cost him dear, for none had been more hated, none more reviled by pious folk. The reason is simple. He attacked bigotry and superstition, not in the dull and heavy fashion of professors writing for the few, but with wit and pleasantry which survive the winnowing of generations. He made priests appear ridiculous as well as odious, and those who felt the sting of his lash denounced him as a literary Mephistopheles, whose writings all should avoid as they would a plague. All whose interests were bound up with orthodoxy stigmatized Voltaire as a shallow scoffer, railing at all things holy and of good repute.

Digitized by Google

In his own time this jaundiced view of Voltaire was very prevalent. Dr. Johnson, not at all a bad-hearted man, has voiced this prejudice. In a conversation with Boswell he said, "Rousseau, sir, is a very bad man. I would sooner sign a sentence for his transportation than that of any felon who has gone from the Old Bailey these many years. Yes, I should like to have him work in the plantations." "Sir, do you think him as bad a man as Voltaire?" inquired Boswell. "Why, sir," returned the Doctor, "it is difficult to settle the proportion of iniquity between them." In artistic circles one meets the same abuse. Sir Joshua Reynolds, in one of his most popular pictures, introduced Voltaire as the personification of sophistry. The clergy, of course, made him the target of innumerable insults. He was the helot of countless homilies, and served to point multitudinous morals. The parsons lied to such purpose that whole generations of innocent Christians firmly believed that Voltaire was responsible for the French Revolution.

In England there is still great prejudice against Voltaire, which, said Buckle, only ignorance can excuse. The shouts of friends and foes still fill the troubled air, and the dust of controversy is blinding. One turns with a sigh of relief from books about Voltaire by enemies and partisans alike to his own letters and books. Here one finds the man himself, no mere jester, but a sensitive nature, bent on the destruction of cruelty and intolerance, and striking at the superstition of which these vices are the outcome. His keen eyes saw the atrocities and absurdities bound up with Christianity. He saw it was essential that the religion in which intolerance had its root should be proved detestable and ridiculous. Men, he said, will not cease to be persecutors until they have ceased to be absurd; and, more than any other man, he caused the European world to smile at its own absurdities.

> Aye, sharpest, shrewdest steel that ever stabbed
> Imposture, thro' the armour-joints to death.

Voltaire's motto was, "Straight to the Fact." He brought, smilingly, all creeds to the test of truth and common-sense. Was it true or not that Omnipotence had chosen Oriental barbarians as his peculiar people? Was "God" born of a virgin? Did he, indeed, ascend from the earth "like a balloon?" To ask these questions, and to cross-examine priests, was to provoke inextinguishable laughter. And, mind you, Voltaire was not a mere mocker, but a man of serious aims. He had profound convictions, and employed his exquisite wit as a weapon. There is no case of Voltaire mocking at any men who lived good lives. He did not gibe at the English Quakers; but he was merciless when he attacked the murderous priests of France, who invoked the laws to destroy their opponents. A Protestant pastor, Rochette, was hanged for merely exercising his functions in Languedoc. The Protestant Calas was broken on the wheel, because his son was found dead, and someone chose to say that the father had killed him, to prevent him from turning Catholic. Even Calas's widow and children were put to the torture. La Barre, a lad of eighteen, was condemned at Amiens, for multilating a crucifix, to have his tongue and right hand cut off, and then be burnt alive, a sentence which was commuted to decapitation. It was Voltaire who exposed these judicial murders, and, to quote Carlyle's memorable words, "The whole man kindled into one divine blaze of righteous indignation, and resolution to bring help against the world." His services in undoing such foul wrongs will never fade from the memory of men.

Voltaire was thoroughly equipped for his work. A perfect master of the French language, he wrote with that ease with which a bird trills out his song. His versatility, too, was marvellous. "Monsieur Multiform" was his witty name for D'Alembert, and he himself had an equal right to it. In the eighty volumes of his collected works, he has proved his mastery as historian, poet, essayist, thinker, humorist, tale-teller, letter-writer, and critic. So strong is his appeal to literary men that Macaulay, one of the most omnivorous of readers, selected Voltaire's works for his reading on his lengthy sea-voyage to India.

Among Voltaire's works Candide is, perhaps, the most characteristic. Nowhere has he displayed to such advantage the happiest features of his extraordinary genius. The news of the awful horrors of the dreadful earthquake at Lisbon, in which 40,000 people lost their lives, roused Voltaire like a blow in the face. Moved, as he always was, to reproduce his strongest feelings in his writings, he cast his protest against Optimism into the two very different shapes of a poem and the novel of Candide. Both amply prove that beneath the caustic cynicism of the author beat a heart aflame with sympathy for his fellows.

Frankly, the English translations cannot be said to add to Voltaire's charm, for any one who reads French. There is lost so much of Voltaire's sprightliness and piquancy. In the original, Candide is the wittiest book in the world. In this gay little masterpiece he brought out all his batteries at once, and he faced the foe with that terrible mockery, that bantering jest, and that deadly levity which few could meet and live. Voltaire's laugh withered the cheap, current, convenient optimism. In that searching fire the comfortable dogmas blackened and died, and the optimists were shown forth as laughing-stocks, The master's wit is as facetious to-day as when it was written, and it still trips and dances on untiring feet. It all reads like the fresh and unflagging work of superabundant youth. Yet Voltaire was actually sixty-four years of age when he wrote it —a time when most men are dreaming of slippered ease. The story is, briefly, that of a young man brought up in the belief that this is the best of all possible worlds. He meets with a hundred adventures which give it the lie. Life is a doubtful bargain, but one can make the best of it. That is the moral of Candide. "What I know," says Candide, "is that we must cultivate our garden." In the last resort, "with close-lipped Patience for our only friend," be it remembered, Voltaire's philosophy was Secularistic.

Voltaire was ever an apostle of common sense. One is as much struck with the soundness of his judgment as by his felicity of expression. A book might be written on his anticipation of modern thought. In a pre-scientific age he accepted the view of man's savage origin. He derived the belief in ghosts from dreams, and discerned the magical nature of early religions. He anticipated most of the social and political problems of our time. Before Malthus, he stated the population question, and helped to clear the way for modern science. He saw through the central myths of the Bible a century before the clergy were forced to recognize them.

For sixty years Voltaire waged unending war against the Great Lying Church, and when he died the priests refused him burial, hoping that he would be thrown into the gutter like the famous actress, Adrienne Lecouvreur. But he had carved his name too deeply on his country's roll of honour, and his remains now rest beneath the dome of the Pantheon, with its front glowing with the splendid words, "Aux grand hommes la patrie reconnaisante." Here he sleeps undisturbed, and by his side rest the ashes of Rousseau. Shoulder to shoulder, these great soldiers of the Army of Human Emancipation rest under their magnificent tombs:—

Digitized by Google

> With the sound of those they wrought for,
> And the feet of those they fought for,
> Echoing round their tombs for evermore.

MIMNERMUS.

The Emergence of Man.

II.

(Continued from p. 102.)

As the Ice Age approached, the ancestors of our modern forest flora were in the ascendant in Central France. The oak, poplar, larch, beech, and willow were well represented. These floral organisms successfully surmounted the ordeal imposed by the Glacial Epoch, but all the distinctly American plants succumbed to the cold, and are now restricted to the temperate areas of the United States.

The anthropomorphous apes that lived in the forests of Europe in Pliocene times either disappeared altogether or became very scarce. But the lower monkeys related to the baboons, langurs, and other surviving species still remained, as their relics testify. So far as the palæontological record informs us, Asia must be regarded as the site of man's origin. But this reservation is requisite, that if the still hotly contested eoliths ultimately prove to be genuine products of human or pre-human manipulation, then it is quite possible that man developed from a simian or semi-simian form in or near Europe itself.

The fossil remains of Europe, both animal and vegetable, have furnished so many surprises that it is reasonably conceivable that man's association with our continent may extend to periods far more ancient than any formerly suspected. The old Stone Age weapons and implements are demonstrably of human manufacture, and are more rudely fashioned than those of the later New Stone or Neolithic Period. We are therefore entitled to anticipate the discovery of flint instruments even more primitive than those of the Palæolithic or Old Stone Age. Now, the disputed eoliths are unearthed from deposits slightly older than those of the Palæolithic, and extend from Oligocene to Pleistocene times. Obviously, then, if the rugged eoliths are authentic memorials of intelligent design, they point to the presence in Europe many hundreds of thousands of years ago of the human or semi-human creatures who shaped them.

Animal life in Europe in Pliocene days displays signs of derivation from very distant migrations of mammals from Northern America, as well as more recent invasions from Southern Asia. Oriental organisms settled in Europe embraced rhinoceroses now peculiar to Sumatra and adjacent areas; various mastodons related to those then dwelling in the Far East; primitive tapirs, horses, gazelles, antelopes, and other mammals. Flesh-devouring beasts of Asiatic type abounded in Europe, and included hyænas, pandas, sabre-toothed tigers, and other fierce cats. Monkeys, both of Africa and Asia, were well in evidence among the trees. During this genial period the hippopotamus found a home in the rivers, and, having wandered northwards in early Pliocene summers, it gradually established itself in various parts of Europe. The Italian deposits of this period are rich in mammalian remains, and the woodlands and river margins of the Arno valley have yielded the fossils of all the just-mentioned forms, as well as those of quite modern types of cattle, elephants, horses, and at least one monkey. All these animals appear to have come to Europe either from Africa or Asia. These migrants mingled with the quadrupeds already in possession of the soil. Among these last were the lynxes, wild boars, and savage cats and foxes. Beavers and otters related to living forms dwelt in the streams, while moles, hamsters, shrews, and hares favoured the mountain rocks.

As the Pliocene Period reached its close, many of the animals more suitably adapted to the uplands of Africa retreated to that continent. These included gazelles, antelopes, and hipparion horses. At least in Western Europe, the climate, while remaining warm, had become moist, and the spacious woodlands and wide watercourses environing rich pastures formed an ideal habitat for great herds of deer, cattle, elephants, and horses. From the nature of the flora of this period, Western Europe enjoyed a mean annual temperature of 62 deg. or 63 deg. F., some twenty degrees above that now experienced in Europe as a whole.

There is clear evidence of a fall in temperature as the Pliocene approached its end in the departure southwards of our monkey relatives. In the earlier Miocene rocks, the remains of apes are found as far north as Eppelsheim, in Germany; in later times they appear to have retreated to Southern France; while in times still later they seem to have wandered to Italy. They lingered in Southern Europe until the increasing coldness compelled them to seek shelter in more tropical climes. The land bridge which then connected Sicily with Africa doubtless facilitated their departure, while the land route of the period between Turkey and Asia in its turn permitted the migration of numerous types of Indian animals into Europe, and provided a passage for the most primitive human stocks.

Currents of very cold water from the chilly north now commenced to flow along the shores of our south-eastern counties. Molluscs of arctic character left their shells on the Norfolk coast, proving the transformed state of the dwellers of the sea.

This frigid visitation was apparently less severe than those that were to follow in Europe. But west of Hudson Bay, in North America, a giant ice-cap was formed, whose ice sheets extended as far south as Nebraska and Iowa. In the forests of Nebraska, the presence of various cone-bearing trees points to the appearance of a temperate flora which preceded the actual glaciation. "In the Swiss Alps," states Professor Osborn,— > the snow descended 1,200 metres below the present snow line, and in Scandinavia and northern Germany the first great ice-sheets were formed, from which flowed the glaciers and rivers conveying the "Old Diluvium," or the "oldest drift." Accompanying the cold wave along the eastern coast of England we note, in the famous fossil deposits known as the "Forest Bed of Cromer," which overlie the Weybourn crags, the arrival from the north of the fir tree. This is most significant, because it had hitherto been known only in the arctic region of Grinnell Land, and this was its first appearance in Central Europe. Another herald of northern conditions was the first occurrence of the musk-ox in England, which is attributed to the "Forest Bed" deposits.

Thus, while the British Isles were but mildly affected by this early glacial visitation, the cold wave came on an imposing scale in Canada, the Alpine area, and in the Scandinavian peninsula. In Switzerland the glaciers swept the valleys probably 4,000 feet below the present snow-line, and the immense ice-sheet of Norway and Sweden mantled the Baltic and grasped the sites of modern Hamburg and Berlin in its boreal embrace.

That a prolonged period of low temperature was experienced in our Isles is proved by the transformed state of the flora and fauna of both France and Britain. Vegetable life donned a more modern dress, while numerous animal organisms that were plentiful in the preceding Pliocene Period either departed or became extinct. Still, the majority of mammalian animals accommodated themselves to the modified climate. This seems to indicate that, although special areas were glaciated, there remained sufficient open spaces to afford sustenance and shelter to the faunal life of Western Europe.

Digitized by Google

This sullen period was succeeded by an interglacial stage termed the "Norfolkian," during which the atmospheric conditions were warmer than those we now normally experience in these latitudes. The name "Norfolkian" arises from the circumstance that this interglacial interval was originally detected in Europe in the rich deposits of the Cromer Forest Bed, which have yielded a very precious record not merely of the floral life of this period, but have revealed a splendid array of the mammalian fauna indigenous to our Isles and to France in Norfolkian times. Although our outstanding contemporary forest trees were the predominating forms of this period, the fossil beds disclose the presence of several exotic species. That these last were able to thrive in England has led to the conclusion that the climate was slightly warmer than at present. But the secrets betrayed by these deposits show that the earlier arctic visitation had eliminated many botanical forms which flourished in the genial Pliocene climate of Britain.

France furnishes evidence of the Interglacial Stage, where it is known by the name of the "St. Prestien." Not that independent testimony is confined to France, as it comes from Italy and elsewhere. But at St. Prest, in the Paris basin, the memorials of departed floral and faunal life have been most completely preserved. This deposit was once regarded as of Pliocene age, but recent studies indicate that it is really an ancient Pleistocene record. A few French authorities considered St. Prest as dating from the closing stages of the Pliocene because among several surviving representatives of that period discovered there were those of the sabre-toothed tiger, Etruscan rhinoceros, and a primitive horse. But it is now ascertained that these and other Pliocene forms unquestionably lingered in Europe until long after the first interglacial stage, and some of them probably persisted down to the dawn of traditional times.

Early Pleistocene days are distinguished from the latest years of the Pliocene by the absence of organisms previously abundant. All the higher apes had vanished, and very few of the monkeys remained. The tapir departed, in company with the mastodon, from Europe, with the increasing cold. The haunts of these and other southern animals were now occupied by new arrivals from the frozen north. The stag, the giant deer (Megaceros), and many other members of the deer family migrated into Western Europe. The grazing animals encountered powerful enemies in the carnivorous quadrupeds that dwelt in their vicinity. The wolf, wolverine, bears, foxes, martens, and the fish-loving otters abounded. And at this period primitive wild cattle and the bison put in their first appearance. In the running waters, which were of ampler proportions than the rivers of our day, resided enormous numbers of hippopotami, and their banks were the favourite resorts of the Etruscan rhinoceros. Then there was that colossal creature, the mammoth, which attained a height of more than twelve feet, about a foot above that of the largest living African elephants; while that sanguinary beast of prey, the machærodont, or sabre-toothed tiger, was distributed over Europe into Africa and Asia. The animal geography, apart from independent geological evidence, indicates an intercommunication of faunal forms from the valley of the Thames to India, a distance of 6,000 miles. And 2,500 miles south-east from the Himalayas, similar animal genera to those that roamed from Europe to India, although they were in an earlier stage of development, populated the island of Java, which was then united to the continent of Asia.

The early Pleistocene era, particularly during the First Interglacial Stage, found the European land-mass at its maximum elevation above the level of the sea. No ocean or river barriers existed to hinder or prevent the free migration of animal organisms to or from Europe, Asia, or Africa. The coasts of the Mediterranean were 300 feet above their present level. Africa was joined to Europe at Gibraltar and across the island of Sicily. The Black Sea and Mediterranean were then vast lakes, and the waters which now wash the Isles of Greece were solid land. The United Kingdom formed a continuous land surface, and was connected with the European continent to the south and east, while it was united to Iceland to the north. It now remains to consider how these phenomena relate to the advent of man.

T. F. PALMER.

(To be continued.)

Acid Drops.

"Will China Come In?" is asked in an article in last Saturday's Observer. China has, it is said, broken off diplomatic relations with Germany, and now, it is hoped, that there will be a formal declaration of war. What on earth China can do to aid the Allies—in a military sense—it is difficult to see. But if China does "come in" it will be another step in the militarization of China, another indication of the evil influence of Christian nations on the Chinese people. For China is the one nation in the world with peaceful traditions. Its governing philosophy—Confucianism—is a philosophy of peace. The Chinese have always asked but one thing of the foreigner—to live at peace. And the one thing the Christian foreigner would not grant China was peace, save at the price of spoliation and insult.

All the Christian nations, Britain, France, Germany, and others have, at some time or other—often collectively—robbed and insulted China. They have demanded that their own people should be superior to the civil laws of China, and have extended this exemption to natives who sought this protection under the guise of religious concession. Great Britain herself declared war on China for the purpose of forcing upon her the sale of opium. Hong Kong was taken from China as an indemnity for that war, and remains an infamous monument to the influence of the West upon the East. And from time to time other nations have played the same game. China was a peaceful nation, and the Christian nations have not yet outgrown the ideal of force as the arbiter of national destinies, or of mere size as a proof of national greatness.

Europe has preached peace and brotherhood, has practised war, and roved the whole globe on missions of plunder. China preached peace—based on human considerations—and has remained the one nation free from militarism. But we are afraid it is coming. The Christian nations will not be content until they have dragged non-Christian nations along the path they are now treading. If they will not tread it from love of imitation, they will be forced to do so from motives of self-defence. Where Christian nations can plunder they will. That is the other one lesson of history. Appeals to justice are powerless. It is force alone that will avail. China, we fear, will be compelled to learn that lesson in the end, if it has not already learned it. And if one can imagine the shade of Confucius looking down on China we can well fancy it saying: "Well would it have been for China had the foot of a white Christian never been permitted to desecrate its shores."

A Christian apologist informed a Secularist lecturer, the other day, that the Genesis story of the Fall is clearly an allegory; but he forgot to state that the orthodox Church interpreted it in terms of history until science triumphantly proved it to be utterly unhistorical. He also ignored the fact that the late Canon Driver laid it down as a principle that it is a story which the Christian teacher should "understand in the sense which science will permit." The Church has never abandoned a supernatural position anywhere except when forced to do so by the irresistible pressure of natural knowledge.

Digitized by Google

The Lower House of Convocation has passed a resolution in favour of drink prohibition, except in the case of wine used "for religious purposes." Are the dear clergy always to be exempted from everything?

Mr. George Lansbury has published a book on the occasion of the "National Mission," in order to propagate the idea that equality is an essential part of Christianity. We shall believe this when Cardinals receive the same pay as curates, and when woman is no longer regarded by the orthodox as "the weaker vessel."

The amount of brotherhood developed by Christianity has been exhibited in the selection of a Unionist candidate for West Perthshire. Colonel Stirling was the gentleman; but considerable opposition has been developed on the ground of his being a Roman Catholic. We have no knowledge as to Colonel Stirling's qualifications, nor do we care. They must, however, be very small indeed if they do not entitle him to sit in the House of Commons—which appears to be running the Church hard as a refuge for mediocrity. But it is a public scandal that religious belief should be made a test question. We wonder what chance an avowed Atheist would stand in Perthshire. The "unco' guid" argue they cannot trust Colonel Stirling because he is a Roman Catholic. The Colonel retorts that they are acting unjustly because they are Protestants. They may both be right. But right or wrong, it is an example of the distorting influence of religious belief on moral judgment.

Colonel Stirling said in his defence that there were two things which every decent man wished to keep out of politics —Religion and the Throne. But the latter is almost certain to play a larger part in politics than it has done of recent years. This War has served to make thousands of people disgusted with kings and kinglets, and republican feeling has greatly increased during the past two years. And if a man really believes in his religion, how can he keep it out of politics? To do so is to assume that it is of no consequence. We believe that religion should be kept out of politics because it is a distorting and profoundly evil force. But we desire to sweep religious considerations on one side altogether. Will Colonel Stirling advocate the same thing?

The Edinburgh Town Council has granted the use of the Synod Hall, with financial aid, for the holding of Sunday concerts for overseas soldiers. Oh, Edinburgh!

We congratulate Mr. W. Hall Caine—we think he is a son of the novelist—on giving the members of the Douglas (I.O.M.) Debating Society some home truths on the influence of Christianity on woman. Mr. Caine pointed out that prior to the introduction of Christianity woman's position under the old Celtic law was higher than it afterwards became, and added (we quote the report in the Isle of Man Weekly Times):—

> Yet a preacher without apparently the very least knowledge of Celtic lore and a surprising forgetfulness of Bible truths, had in a recent Mayoral Sunday sermon declared that "non-Christian religions had never regarded woman as fit for independence—she had been treated as a minor, and was never free. But as soon as Christianity took a dominant place in the life of nations, woman began her ascent and is still ascending." That such discourse should be bestowed on a congregation, drawn together solely as a witness to civic unity, was, in the lecturer's judgment, a grievous offence to good manners. The Christian attitude towards woman was a natural inheritance from Judaism. Did the reverent Mayor's chaplain know that the modern Jew's daily prayer was "Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God! King of the Universe! who hast not made me a woman"? Most Christian writers attribute the depreciation of the character of women by Christian ecclesiastics to the influence of Judaism. Nowhere in the Bible is polygamy prohibited, and Christianity still recognizes an office of "purification" for a woman after the birth of every child, the significance of which is none the less when we realize that it was twice as long in the case of a female as of a male child.....In the New Testament the ideal of marriage is debased to the level of those only who "burn" and "cannot contain"; while at the Council of Macon a bishop raised the question as to whether woman really was a human being capable of being possessed of a soul, questions which the learned prelate promptly answered in the negative! The whole foundation of Christianity rested upon a degraded idea of woman. It was woman who produced "the fall" for which only the blood of the sacrifice of the Cross could atone. So that not only did woman begin sin, but she was directly responsible for the crucifixion of Jesus.

Some of the members present must have opened their eyes on having what was virtually a Freethinker article thrown at them in this manner. But we congratulate Mr. Caine on his candour.

Mr. Caine asked, in concluding his address, suppose some catastrophe were to destroy all the books in the world save one, and we had the choice of one, Which should it be?—

> Some would instantly reply, "The Bible of course." But reflect. We have no grudge against those who are to come after us. Rather, we wish them well. Brave men are laying down their lives for that world that is to come after us—men of Protestant England, Agnostic France, Catholic Russia. The religion that binds the Allies is the religion of humanity. The Bible has been a printed volume for some five hundred years, but what a tale of suffering it has laid to its charge Think of the Inquisition in Italy and in Spain. Think of the 300,000 women and children who suffered martyrdom under the bull of Innocent VIII. against witchcraft. Think of Wesley's shameless defence of all this cruelty largely by reason of these words of Exodus xxi. 18. No, you dare not pass on to another age a book that has been the cause of such appalling bloodshed. The two commandments of Jesus which should unite man to man and man to God are all in the work of a great Englishman—the greatest of all Englishmen, that "Pagan Poet," as Wesley called him—Shakespeare. Enshrined in the pages of Shakespeare are the commands of Jesus, the commands of Moses, and others of immense far-reaching importance—fidelity to truth, and temperance to the limit of abstinence.

A fine conclusion to a fine address. Other public men, please copy. If only twenty-five per cent. had the same courage of speech the world would soon be transformed.

A soldier was sentenced to six months' imprisonment for breaking into the Church of Scotland Guild Institute, and stealing therefrom 1,050 cigarettes, thirteen pictorial post-cards, and three New Testaments. We should have thought stealing the New Testaments would have quite justified him in setting up a plea of kleptomania, or, say, temporary insanity.

A number of the Free Church clergy are interesting themselves in the pleasing subject of prostitution, and the dear Daily News announces a "Save Our Soldiers Campaign." The Rev. F. B. Meyer suggests that prostitutes should be arrested, and that they should be forced to work in munition factories "under the wise and kind surveillance of the Church or Salvation Army." Does it not all seem like an attempt to foist cranky Christian ideas on the public under the cover of the War?

The impertinence of the clergy knows no bounds. While everyone is called upon, and if under military age may be forced, to sacrifice all he possesses to the prosecution of the War, the clergy are firm that nothing must be allowed to interfere with the interests of the Church. That insufferable person, the Bishop of London, has kindly consented to the clergy under his control volunteering for some form of National Service, providing it does not interfere with carrying on the work of the Church. Even doctors are being commandeered for the Army; but the clergyman must be left alone. The old complaint against the Church of Rome was that it set up an independent power within the State. The War has shown that we have another Church which substantially claims the same right.

Digitized by Google

Dr. W. R. Sorly tells us that "the Agnostic is always in difficulty when he attempts to draw the line between the knowable and the unknowable." Spencer tried to trace that line, and lived long enough to know that he had miserably failed. No great Agnostic since has been foolish enough to make the attempt. The reason is that no such line exists. The only existing line lies between the known and the unknown, and this is being pushed further back every day. There is no region which we can legitimately call unknowable. Science works on the assumption that Nature is knowable, with the result that what is unknown to-day becomes known to-morrow.

The Christian World is astonished at Bishop Gore saying that "the working classes are determined not to have Christianity at any price," and replies that "Democracy, as we know it, is the child of Christianity, especially of Protestant Christianity." We beg to observe that Bishop Gore was far nearer the truth than the C. W., whose statement is just nonsense. Modern Democracy is the child of those secular changes set going by the Renaissance, and immediately by the French Revolution, also what has become known as the Industrial Revolution. There have been Christian Democrats, as there have been Christian astronomers; and the organic connection is about equal in both cases.

The Archbishops have appointed a Committee of bishops and others to report upon the sanctions and restrictions concerning the ministration of women in the Churches. You can always trust dear Old Mother Church to be several centuries behind public opinion.

Two little children were starved to death in a flat at Westminster beside their mother, who had died of heart failure. The eagle-eye of Providence can only detect the fall of the sparrows.

What receptacles of clerical wisdom the parish magazines are, to be sure. In the Southend Church Chronicle a notice of a mothers' meeting concludes with the touching words: "There will also be songs and light refreshments—and a moon."

"The sorrows of this sad time have been borne with wonderful dignity and courage by the clergy," says a writer in a Parish Magazine. This is so, but one must remember that the clergy's heroism consists in seeing the soldiers off at the railway station.

Christianity, says the writer of the weekly religious article in the Times (it is remarkable that in proportion as it has fallen lower as a newspaper the Times has taken a more direct interest in religion) "says all men are the children of God." Well, and having said it, what is its practical value? It does not prevent his children slaughtering each other all over Europe. It does not prevent his children murdering each other all through the ages. It has never made people treat each other more decently than they would have done otherwise, and it never will. It is one of the many cant phrases by which men forge for themselves excuses for not exercising their faculties on the world around them.

The 105th anniversary of the birth of Charles Dickens brought a number of wreaths to Westminster Abbey, many with pious inscriptions. Few of the donors appear to have been aware that Dickens was a Unitarian, and, therefore, was as much outside the Christian Church as Thomas Paine or Voltaire.

From the Observer of February 9, 1817:—

> Heury Topping, found guilty at the last Session of stealing greens, was on Friday whipped a distance of 100 yards, near to Mr. Alport's nursery, on the Hackney-road. He is an aged man, and seemed deeply affected by his ignominious punishment.

Some of the London churches assisted at a war loan demonstration by sending surpliced choirs. It would have been better had they sent their surplus cash.

The promised revival of religion does not appear to have raised the price of gods. A statue of Buddha figured in the King's Bench Court recently, and was the subject of a claim for £300. The unkindest cut, however, is that Buddha figures on the lids of cigar-boxes, in company with lithographs of gaudily dressed females. Christians would be excited if the Second Person of the Trinity figured on a cigar-box lid, or in a tobacco advertisement.

Rev. J. H. Dickie writes to the Glasgow Herald, saying that it is "men's men" who are needed at the Front as chaplains. The women's men can apparently stay at home. Of course, it may be that the soldiers would rather the women's men left with them.

Dr. Brest, American Bishop of the Philippine Islands, says he is quite certain that our cause in the War is "the cause of God." It is a pity God is not able to look after his own cause, and so do away with the necessity for so much human bloodshed.

Part of the cemetery at Carisbrooke (I.O.W.) is to be used for the growing of potatoes. As this is consecrated ground it will be a matter of some interest to note the influence on the crop of episcopal blessing.

We have recently read some half-dozen new essays on the international situation by men who would profess some sort of a religion, and a curious feature of them all is that nothing at all is said about religion and its influence. Why is this? One of two things must be true. Either they conceive religion to be of no force whatever in the determining of international relations, or they think it too dangerous a subject on which to say anything. For our part, we do not believe that the first is true. In spite of all that has been done, religion, both organized and unorganized, still exerts a real power, and it is stupid to ignore the fact. It is nearer the truth to attribute this silence to a fear that religion is best left alone—for the writer's sake. It is this feeling that makes our home politicians—even when Freethinkers themselves—forbear mentioning religion in connection with politics. And while this is the case we need not marvel that progress is so slow and so uncertain. Life, as we have often pointed out, functions as a whole, and the writer who thinks he can safely ignore the power of the Churches, and the influence of religious belief, should devote his abilities to the writing of nursery rhymes.

A newspaper paragraph announces the forthcoming appearance of a new book on theology, entitled God the Invisible King. Deity seems to be falling in the social scale. Formerly he was visible, and, at the cheapest, "the King of kings."

Writing on the question of Sabbath Observance, the Rev. Thomas Elliott, of Southend-on-Sea, asks: "Who says that this 3,500 years-old law is binding on us in England to-day? It is said to have been given to a wandering tribe of escaped slaves in the wilderness of Sinai." Perhaps Mr. Elliot's ministerial colleagues will oblige with an answer.

"When the war is over the Church will find itself 'up against' millions of men—yes, and of women too—who have slid farther than ever away from it—people who have looked death in the face many times. These people will have been hardened, made sceptical by their experiences. The war—it is no good trying to disguise the hard fact—is making Atheists by the thousand. How does the Church propose to set about reclaiming these people? What is its policy, its plan of campaign for the fight it will have to make after the war? Has it any plan of campaign at all?"—Richard George, in the "Daily Mirror."

The clergy don't fight themselves, but they know how to exploit the brave fellows who do. The erection of "war-shrines" throughout the country is part of the method, and another way is to display in the churches lists of men who have given their lives "so gallantly and Christianly" for their country.

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

February 25, Clapham; March 11, Birmingham; March 18, Leicester; April 1, Portsmouth: April 8, Swansea.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—February 25, Nottingham. March 25, Avondale Hall, Clapham.

WILL Mr. J. Callaghan, who sent stamps to cover cost of copy of the Freethinker please send full address. The name of the town has been omitted.

J. A. DAWSON writes that his experience in the Army has been the reverse of that described by many Freethinkers. He was first put down as a Wesleyan because his friend belonged to that body. After attending Church for some weeks he decided that even fatigue duty was preferable to sitting in chapel, and when he was removed to another part of the country, had himself entered as an Atheist. For nearly twelve weeks he has now had his Sundays quite free. We are pleased to hear this, but, as Mr. Dawson says, it all depends upon the officers that are over one. Gentlemen make allowances, bigots won't.

ANNO DOMINI.—Pleased to see that Ogilvie's Encyclopædia, under Masterpieces of Eloquence, gives Ingersoll's address "At a Brother's Grave" and "At the Grave of a Child." The editor evidently knew a good thing when he saw one.

A. R. W.—Capital! Will prove very useful.

J. LOMAS.—We think you greatly exaggerate man's fear of death. Men will risk death for all sorts of objects. As Bacon says: "Revenge triumphs over death; love slights it; honour aspireth to it; grief dieth to it; fear pre-occupieth it." The fear of death, so far as it is real, is largely an artificial product. In this respect nothing has done so much to make man a coward in the face of death as Christianity. Its want of success need not blind us to the fact of its influence.

G. DIXON (Accra).—Thanks for papers. We note the endeavour of the Salvation Army to open operations at Accra. If, as you say, the Accra natives have too much self-respect to patronize "such a tin-can religion," that is something to their credit. And of one thing we may be sure. If the Salvation Army doesn't find Accra financially profitable, it will soon be given up.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to say we are in error in identifying the S. H. Lever, recently decorated with an Order of the Bath, with the Sunlight Soap Works. We were evidently misled by the name, for which error we beg to express our regret.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings.

J. G. FINLAY.—We hope to use later. It deserves more than a passing paragraph. We agree with you as to the hypocrisy of the whole thing. And for hypocrisy British Christianity still holds with ease a premier position.

J. BREESE.—We have handed the article to Mr. Lloyd, and noted the rest of your letter. We shall hope to see you soon.

R. OGDEN.—Cuttings very useful.

Mr. J. T. WATKINS writes:—"Words cannot express the pleasure I derive from the Freethinker every week." We are pleased to hear it, and take for granted what is unspoken.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—F. Marschel, 10s. 6d.

T. H. ELSTOB.—Pleased to hear from you, and to know that you are well and safe. MSS. will be useful. We await the result of the Bowman case with confidence, but, as you say, win or lose, the fight will go on.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (Feb. 25) Mr. Cohen lectures in the Avondale Hall, Landor-road, Clapham. His subject is "Christianity and the Logic of Life." Avondale Hall may be easily reached by 'bus and tram routes, or by the Tube (Clapham Road Station). We hope Freethinkers will induce their Christian friends to attend. The meeting commences at 7 o'clock.

Mr. Lloyd visits Nottingham to-day (Feb. 25) for the first time—as a Secularist speaker. We cannot say with certainty in what hall the meeting will be held, as the local friends have omitted to send particulars; but we expect it will be in the Mechanics' Institute, and at 7 o'clock. We believe that the local friends have been working hard to make the meeting a success, and we trust not without avail.

The Secretary of the West Ham Branch, N.S.S., sends us the following:—

> At the Annual Meeting of the West Ham Branch, N.S.S. held on Thursday, February 8th, it was unanimously agreed to send you the heartiest congratulations of the members on your able editorship of the Freethinker during the past year of exceptional difficulty. We, as workers in the same "good cause," sincerely appreciate your work, and feel every confidence in the continued success of the paper. We feel, also, you and your staff deserve our gratitude for the high tone maintained throughout the articles.

Everybody connected with the Freethinker has done his best to keep the flag flying—so far with success. But we are not out of the wood yet, although if industry and devotion—both on the part of the Freethinker staff and a large body of its readers—will achieve success, the end of the War will see us in an even better position than did its commencement. We greatly appreciate the good wishes of the members of the West Ham Branch.

We have received the following from Mr. R. H. Rosetti, and we feel that many of his London friends will be pleased to read it:—

> DEAR MR. COHEN,—I have been on the Continent a fortnight now enjoying the arctic conditions prevailing here.
>
> We, that is my draft, have been under canvas the whole time, but as there are fourteen in a tent we keep warm at nights despite their severity.
>
> We wash and shave when we can, but ten washing and four shaving in one pint of water has so far been the limit.
>
> Nobody doubts, of course, that Providence has wisely ordained the War, but why it—Providence—should freeze water and allow its soldiers to go unwashed is a part of the divine plan which we poor mortals cannot hope to solve.
>
> I am quite cheerful and happy, getting much amusement from the crowded condition, which brings out many funny incidents.
>
> Religion is well catered for, but voluntary customers are few.
>
> Take the hut I am writing in, for instance, there is a small room called a "Quiet room" for devotional purposes only, but every evening at 7 o'clock a preacher comes into the main structure filled with men, many writing, some playing draughts, dominoes, or reading and talking, and announces a service, starting with a hymn. In that way religion is thrown at those present.
>
> Still, I am doing my bit for the Cause in my tent and out of it. I leave the Freethinker, which I receive every week, in different places. Your article in January 28 was read by many who seemed very much interested in it. It was quite a red-hot article for this place, and I watched the paper as it travelled round.
>
> The favourite topic here for the preachers who conduct the services is a reminder to all present that they may shortly be in eternity. It amuses me to hear them whine such things.
>
> I fully realize the dangers and horrors I must face in the very near future, but I am in no way depressed or dismayed. I shall face them; it shall not be said an Atheist flinched from the horrors of this world, after Christians had had its chief administration for nearly two thousand years.
>
> Remember me to Mrs. Cohen and the family, also to any friends in the Cause interested in my whereabouts, and permit me to remain—Yours very sincerely, R. H. ROSETTI.

Amongst the papers which we are pleased to see are weathering their stormy period, is the journal of the Humanitarian League, the Humanitarian. It has now resumed its regular monthly appearance, and we hope it will continue. In the February issue there is an article on the "Simple Life," which properly castigates those who mistake a phrase for a fact. Another article dealing with conscientious objectors, under the title of "The Penalizing of Conscience," is well worthy of attention. The price of the publication is one penny.

Digitized by Google

The Secular Education League holds its Annual Meeting on Friday, March 2, at 19 Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C., at 5 p.m. We hope that as many members as can make it convenient will do their best to be present. Although the War has prevented the League being as active as it might otherwise have been, the Society has neglected no opportunity of placing its objects before the public, and its membership has been well maintained. But there is no reason why this membership should not be strengthened considerably, and we trust it will be in the very near future. A larger membership means larger influence, and, what is important at the moment, increased income. We trust Freethinkers will take the hint in both directions. The Secretary of the League is Mr. Harry Snell, 19 Buckingham Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Some years ago we expressed a hope that someone would see fit to republish Sketches of the Philosophy of Morals by Sir T. C. Morgan. Whether that suggestion fell on fruitful soil or not, we are unable to say; but our desire has now been realized by a republication of the volume under the title of The Moral Philosophy of Freethought (C. W. Daniel, Ltd.; 5s.). The chief criticism—the only one the book calls for, in fact—is that the publishers would have done well had they given some slight sketch of the author, and had seen to it that, in addition to the author's notes, others by a present-day editor had been introduced. For every reader will not always bear in mind the fact that the book is now nearly a century old, and through not doing that is likely to fall short of doing the author the justice and giving him the credit he deserves.

Sir T. C. Morgan was a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and husband of the well-known Lady Morgan, authoress of one or two volumes of travel of considerable ability. Sir T. C. Morgan was also a friend of the famous Sir William Lawrence, Professor of Anatomy and Surgery at the Royal College of Surgeons. In 1819, Lawrence published his famous Lectures on Man, a volume of outstanding merit, expressed in terms of a thoroughgoing scientific Materialism and an evolutionary suggestiveness quite noteworthy when one bears in mind the date of the publication. Lawrence's Lectures were delivered as part of a reply by him to attacks on previous lectures because of their anti-Christian or anti-religious tendency, his chief opponent being the famous Dr. Abernethy. It is interesting to note that Lawrence was refused copyright in his Lectures because of their anti-religious tone, which, by a strange nemesis, led to their greater reproduction in a cheap form.

Sir T. C. Morgan's Philosophy of Morals appeared in 1822, and there are echoes of the Lawrence controversy throughout the work—that and attacks on a preceding work, entitled Sketches of the Philosophy of Life. It is to its freethinking character that one must attribute the fact that the Philosophy of Morals dropped out of the public mind. It became a tabooed work, although far inferior ones have been frequently reprinted, and in the history of moral philosophy it certainly deserves a honoured place.

"The Philosophy of Morals," or, under its new title, "The Moral Philosophy of Freethought," is what one may justly call a wise book. Its comments and observations are shrewd and to the point—particularly so in the chapters on "Right and Obligation," and "On the Influence of Institutions on Morality," and it is quite free from that ethical rhapsodizing which strikes one as so much cant. Much that Sir T. C. Morgan has to say on the nature of morality, and of the motives of conduct, would, of course, be expressed differently to-day, and the influence of the social factor would receive greater emphasis. But, in the main, the author's contentions are sound and well based. Conduct is a function of organization, and a moral code "well constituted, would be a deduction from physiology, political economy, statistics, and experience of the operations of conduct on society." And, however differently expressed, these things serve as the foundation of a rational moral code for all scientific thinkers. With the immense power of the sub-conscious on human conduct, Sir T. C. Morgan could hardly be expected to deal, but such modifications of his teaching which have been rendered necessary by time, will not affect one's estimate of the intrinsic merits of the work.

The publishers state that the book is an exact reprint of the edition of 1822, except a few unimportant notes have been deleted. So far as we have compared the two editions, there is no fault to be found with the statement. We are glad that the notes have been retained, because some of the author's best pieces of writing are contained therein. A sentence such as: "When an individual imagines that he has conquered a passion, it is usually found that he has only been deserted by it," is one to be remembered. We are also glad to find that the lengthy note on the deaths of Voltaire and D'Alembert has been retained. The Christian Advocate had published one of the usual Christian legends concerning the death-beds of these famous "infidels," and Sir T. C. Morgan promptly wrote to the doctor who attended Voltaire, and to a friend of D'Alembert who was with him at his death, and received prompt and decisive proofs of the Christian Advocate's falsehood. These communications are reprinted, together with the author's scathing rebuke, which is well worth reproducing:—

> The origin of such stories as those here refuted, is easy to comprehend. If true, they prove only that a man, worn out by disease, has not the same force of character as when in the plenitude of health. But true or false, they are perfectly suited to the mental calibre of gossiping bigots, who measure humanity in all its aspects by the standard of their own impertinent imbecility; and who arrive at the pleasure of a strong sensation, though a strain upon their limited imagination, to which they could never attain through their still more limited understanding.

That fits the by no means few representatives of the Christian Advocate as well as ever.

Critical Chat.

A Dutch Voltaire.

ANYONE who has contracted the excellent habit of turning up biographical information in that "Acta Sanctorum" of Rationalism, Mr. J. M. Wheeler's Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers, must have noticed that the names of Dutch Freethinkers of the nineteenth century occur not infrequently. Unfortunately, Mr. Wheeler seems not to have been in the way of getting many interesting details of the life and works of these evangelists of Freethought. My intention here is to supplement his always valuable, if slender, array of facts by calling attention to the work of the greatest of Dutch Freethinkers. Eduard Douwes Dekker, whom M. Anatole France calls the Voltaire of the Netherlands, "is one of those exceptional writers that say what they think. Of this sort there are few in Holland, as elsewhere. In every country, and at every period," says M. France, "the number of thinking men is small; the number of those who say what they think is still smaller. Nowhere are they encouraged, for candour is the least sociable of virtues." Dekker, who wrote his books under the pseudonym of "Multatuli," is, of course, hardly known at all in England, except, perhaps, to those of us who find pleasure and instruction in noting the less obvious currents in the stream of European literature. In this there is, no doubt, nothing to wonder at, for in intellectual matters we English have so good a conceit of ourselves that we are apt to regard with contempt ideas which may be offered to us from the outside. Even when Nietzsche had been reacting powerfully for years on Freethinkers, he was here either unknown or despised. For a long time we had only a meagre and deprecatory account of his philosophy in the Britannica to set over against the authoritative exposition—an exposition long enough to make a decent sized volume—in the Grande Encyclopedie. It is much the same, or even more so, with Dekker. The fullest account we have of him and his work is a half a column signed "E. G." in the Britannica; but Mr. Edmuud Gosse, who suffered much in his youth from Calvinistic repression, seems not to appreciate the virulent irony and sarcasm with which Dekker scourged the official Protestant hypocrisy of his time. In the cheaper encyclopædias, Harmsworth and Everyman, Mr. Gosse's article is presented stripped of any individuality it may contain. At the present moment I know of no trustworthy criticism of Dekker's work, and, what is even worse, no translations, with the exception of an inaccessible version of Max Havelaar published in 1868, and a few translations of shorter pieces made by that indefatigable scholar, Mr. Paul Selver, whom we have to thank for introductions to many an out-of-the-way writer. In France they manage things better; there is an excellent volume of selections made by the Dutch writer, M. Alexandre Cohen, who is, or was, on the staff of the Mercure de France, and who writes French with ease and distinction. As I have no Dutch, it is to his version, with its introductory essay on Dekker, that I am indebted for most of the material in this article.

Digitized by Google

Dekker was born at Amsterdam on March 2, 1820. His father, who was a sea-captain, appears to have meant his son to have a business career. But young Dekker had a generous, high-spirited youth's contempt for commerce, with its ethic of low cunning and calculating mendacity. Instead of being a huckster in sugar or coffee, he found a post in the Dutch Colonial Civil Service, and went out to Batavia in 1838. He went rapidly through the different departments, and in 1851 was appointed Assistant-Resident of Amboina, in the Moluccas. In 1856, he was given the same post at Lebak, in the Presidency of Bantam, Java. It is here that he had the experience which was to give a new direction to his life. He had many opportunities of seeing the seamy side of the Dutch system of Colonial Government. He had discovered that the miserable condition of the population of his district was due to the exactions of the native Governor. He felt it his duty to show that these malpractices had been noticed. He could get no satisfaction from the native Governor, the Resident, or the Governor-General. After receiving a notice that he had been transferred to another district, and that his continuance in the Colonial service would depend upon his future conduct, he sent in his resignation, and left for Holland, after being refused an audience by the Viceroy. Here his political friends were unable or unwilling to help him.

In 1860, four years after he had resigned, he published his Max Havelaar, a violent indictment of Dutch Colonial Government, in form of a novel. By the politicians and pastors its appearance was saluted with factitious indignation and very real anger. What irritated them most was its ironical exposure of the Protestant and pious hypocrisy of the average Dutch citizen. The book is a description of what the author saw in the eighteen years of his life in the Dutch Indies. It was translated into English, as I have mentioned above, in 1868, and into French in 1876. In Holland its effect was counteracted by a conspiracy of silence. Those who were concerned did not mention it. But, unluckily for these pious hypocrites, it was only the introduction. His next book contained an open letter to the Governor-General, in which he gave proof that the barbarities of the native Regent were winked at by his superiors, to one of whom he was in the habit of supplying women.

In 1861, he brought out his Love-Letters, an imaginary correspondence between the author and Fancy; that is to say, his imagination, or fantasy. Here, we are told by an orthodox journal of the day, he attacks everything that humanity holds sacred, parades the most perverse of moral doctrines, tramples under foot all that the nation had learned to love and venerate, denies God, the Bible, the Gospel, and every doctrine of religion, and has respect for nothing save his own precious personality. It is the sort of criticism one would expect from the sworn enemy of truth, the pious Protestant burgess who had just witnessed a violent attack on his "sacrosanct Trinity—Religion, Property, and the Family." And it was this sort of moral hypocrite who could raise the cry of immorality against an independent thinker for venturing to suggest that the exporting of obscene watches (lascivious pictures were painted on the inside of the inner case) to Japan was not in accordance with Atheistic principles of ethics. If the Christian could square it with his notions of morality, the unbeliever's objections were but proof of his perversity, his want of respect for long-established institutions; for the one supreme virtue, wealth.

For the effectiveness of his attack on popular superstitions, Dekker could not have chosen a better form than the parable or story. "He lived among and wrote for a nation of Protestants brought up on Biblical and evangelical texts. No other form would have been a more appropriate setting for the propagation of his ideas than the allegorical." His long residence in the East had developed in him a love of metaphor, of what I may call the picture-story in prose. One example will show what I mean better than a ream of description. This is the "Second Story of Authority" from Love-Letters:—

> Voltaire said: "If God did not exist, he would have to be invented!" That is so. All power comes from God. All power implies God. Whoever finds it necessary to exercise power or authority creates for himself a God. This was the way of Moses, Confucius, Zoroaster, Numa, Columbus, and Cortez. This is also the way of all demagogues, augurs, magicians, priests. Even today this is the way of anyone who wishes to dominate others. The number of gods is as great as the number of appetites. For every new appetite, a new god.
>
> Holloway deifies unknown doctors who order you to buy his pills. "Thus says the Lord," said Moses, and "thus Dr. So-and-so," says Holloway. Obey and buy. And both of them add: "so that your souls may be saved."
>
> A nursemaid was taking out her master's children for a walk. She was told to look well after them. But the children were disobedient, and ran so far away from her that she had no control over them.
>
> Then she created out of nothing a black dog which bit all the children that ran away. And the children were afraid of the black dog, and became very obedient, and stayed near their nurse. Communing within herself, she looked upon the god she had created, and found that he was useful.
>
> But because of the black dog the children became stupid with terror.
>
> And they have remained stupid to this day.

Another "story of authority" reveals to us the origin of religious faith, which is pictured as a slip-knot recommended by a pious hermit as an infallible remedy for intractable wills. In these little witty and ironic parables he decomposes every belief, every doctrine, every principle which the good Protestant of that age, and indeed of every age, has looked upon as fundamental. The seven volumes of Ideas (1862-1874) are a collection of his miscellaneous essays and parables, in which we get the same virulent irony of the Love-Letters, the same ardent love of truth, the same conviction that moral and intellectual life is a struggle against all error, not merely one or two forms of it, the same disassociation of accepted ideas, of those commonplaces of religion, ethics, and politics which the interest or sentiment of mankind has raised to the dignity of logical truth.

Digitized by Google

It is not strange that he should have found Holland an uncomfortable dwelling-place, or that he should have spent most of his life in Germany, where he died in September, 1887. From this vantage-ground he scourged the pastors, alike orthodox and "modernist." For both of these he was the enemy of God, and the corrupter of youth. It was not only religion that his mordant irony dissolved. He ridiculed the idea of a monarchy in his play, A School for Princes. He decomposed everything upon which the public prided itself—national representation, liberalism, patriotism, virtue, chastity, and respect. He found, or thought he found, that the commonly accepted virtues had an eesentially economic character. And it may be that he was not far out.

M. Anatole France tells us that Dekker reminds him of the French philosophers of the period just before the Revolution, and this in virtue of his intellectual freedom, vivacity of expression, and vein of irony. But for some of us he has a still greater affinity with the late Remy de Gourmont, who has attacked with smiling and contemptuous irony every smug commonplace of religion, ethics, and politics.

GEORGE UNDERWOOD.

The French Revolution.

IV.

THE REPUBLIC.

(Continued from p. 92.)

THUS, in August, 1792, for the second time in the Revolution, the middle classes had been forced to depend on the physical force of the Parisian proletariat to protect their conquests; and this time the democracy, exasperated with three years of hopes deferred, refused to be thrust back into insignificance. If the nation was to be consolidated in face of the foreign danger, it was necessary to organize it democratically. The history of the next two years is the history of attempts by successive leaders to do this.

The Legislative Assembly, taking the executive power into its hands, recalled Roland and the Girondist Ministry to office. Danton was given the Ministry of Justice, as a concession to the Radical insurgents. The royal family were confined in the Temple. It was now necessary to take instant measures, not only to cope with the enemy on the frontier, but to deal with Royalist conspiracies at home. Vacillating as ever, the Assembly would take hardly any precaution until threatened or bullied into it by the new rulers of Paris—the delegates of the "sections," who now formed the municipality. Under pressure from them, an elected tribunal was established to try Royalist traitors. In the Tuileries, after the insurrection, had been found a number of most incriminating papers, proving the collusion of Louis and Marie-Antoinette with the enemy and their ferocious designs against the democrats, and implicating the Royalist party in the Assembly. The latter had now to make themselves scarce, or prepare to face the new tribunal and the guillotine. (This instrument of punishment had lately been introduced, for humanitarian reasons, to replace the old-fashioned gallows. When we are told of the vindictive proceedings of the French Revolutionists in this connection, we must not forget to compare them with the English laws of that date, which hanged men, women, and children by hundreds every year for petty offences, such as sheep-stealing.)

The war went from bad to worse. After Lafayette's flight, the Prussians and Austrians advanced through Lorraine and Champagne without a check. Longwy fell, probably by the treachery of the governor, on August 24, and Verdun was besieged. Brunswick seemed in a position soon to make good his threat. The new municipality of Paris took the lead of the wavering Assembly in matters of defence, as well as in those of police. It set to work appealing for men, finding arms for them by searching from house to house, and melting church plate into cannon. Danton superintended these measures, becoming the true leader of France in this awful crisis. The nerveless Roland ("a nice old gentleman for a quiet tea-party," as Parnell said of Justin MacCarthy) was pushed into the background. The Girondist leaders actually urged privately that the Government should leave Paris to the enemy, and withdraw to the south of France; and only the opposition of Danton prevented this base act of betrayal.

The new criminal tribunal did not give satisfaction. After condemning two or three Royalists to the guillotine it showed a disposition to leniency, which reached the limit when it acquitted Montmorin—an ex-minister of the king, who had actually had charge of the papers which had subsequently been found in the Tuileries. This was on August 31. On September 2, a premature report of the fall of Verdun (it actually fell that day) roused the population to uncontrollable fury. The alarm bell was ringing; the drums beating; volunteers were enlisting and setting out for the front; Danton was at the bar of the Assembly, explaining the measures taken, and uttering his historic sentence: "Il nous faut de l'audace, et encore de l'audace, et toujours de l'audace." That afternoon a party of non-juring priests were being driven in closed carriages to the prison of the Abbaye as "suspects." A raging multitude, including some of the Marseilles volunteers, on some slight provocation, dragged the priests out and killed them, with the exception of one—the head of the Deaf and Dumb Institution, for whom one of the crowd intervened. They then broke into the Abbaye and began killing the other Royalists detained there. The municipality—which had not, as is constantly alleged, planned the massacres, though it had foreseen them and warned the Government that they would come, as a result of the misplaced lenity of the tribunal—at once notified the Assembly, and, after vainly trying to calm the people, did what it could to mitigate the bloodshed by improvising a court to try the victims. On the proposal of Marat and Panis (secretary to Danton), the Watch Committee ordered the different gaolers to separate petty offenders from the prisoners accused of conspiracy, and sent nominees of its own to try the latter. These judges were able to save a large number from death. But the fury of the crowd rendered it hopeless to intervene on behalf of certain classes of prisoners, e.g., members of the Swiss Guard, non-juring priests, notorious accomplices of the Court, and forgers of paper money. Over a thousand persons were abandoned to the vengeance of the people, including the Princess de Lamballe, confidant of Marie-Antoinette. The state of public feeling may be judged from the fact that neither the respectable citizens of Paris, the National Guard, nor the volunteers cared to interfere. Men said: "What would the Prussians and Austrians do to us if they came to Paris? Why should we march to the frontier and leave a swarm of traitors snugly lodged here in Paris, at the public expense, ready to break out and murder our wives and children?" There is, of course, no ethical defence for the September massacres; but it is necessary to understand their psychological motive if we are to appreciate history justly.

The horrid work lasted three or four days. The Government, which could not have stopped it if it had wished, excused the people to the Assembly as well as it could. The Watch Committee, Marat and his colleagues, satisfied in their own consciences, issued a circular to the local authorities throughout France, stating what had happened, and recommending them to take similar measures. Happily, except on a small scale in one or two places, their advice was not taken.

Digitized by Google

Meanwhile, in the midst of such excitement, and under the shadow of invasion, the elections took place to the National Convention, which was to replace the discredited Assembly. Universal manhood suffrage was now in force, but the indirect method of election already mentioned still obtained, and gave the polls a Conservative bias. Those departments which were threatened by the enemy, i.e., in the north-east and east of France, returned deputies in favour of a strong democratic government, organized with a view to defeating the enemies of the Revolution. In the south and west, however, the war does not seem to have been really felt as yet, and members were returned in favour of constitutional methods and "business as usual." All, however, recognized that to restore the king was now impossible, and accepted the necessity of a Republic.

In the army, Lafayette had been followed by Dumouriez, who succeeded in arresting the invasion. Heavy rains in September hampered the Prussian movements, and on September 20 an attack made by the enemy on Dumouriez's army at Valmy was unsuccessful. This was the turning point of the campaign. Brunswick had to retreat, and soon the soil of France was, for the moment, free.

The day after the battle of Valmy the National Convention met. The Girondists, who were now the Government party, sat on the right. Their chief object, now that the monarchy was gone, was to stop the Revolution from going further, and return to constitutional government. They had to accept universal suffrage, but they were nearly all obstinate laissez-faire theorists, and would not admit the necessity of exceptional war measures to cope with high prices, unemployment, and the like. They feared and hated the working-class of Paris and the large towns, and wished to see them kept in their "proper place," and the well-to-do supreme and secure. Of this party, Brissot was still the Parliamentary wire-puller; but the inspiring influence was Madame Roland, wife of the Minister of the Interior. Under her influence, the Girondists were joined by some former Radicals, such as Barbaroux, who had brought the Marseilles volunteers to Paris; Petion, the Mayor of Paris; and Buzot, another former associate of Robespierre's, who had fallen in love with Madame Roland, and could be twisted round her little finger.

At the other extreme were the Radical party, the "Mountain." This section, confined to a few members in the Legislative Assembly, had grown considerably, thanks to universal suffrage. Paris had returned an almost solid block of "Montagnards." With Robespierre and Danton at their head, they were for cementing the alliance between the middle-class Revolution and the working-class, and demanded accordingly the regulation of prices, the relief of distress, and the dictatorship of the democracy, at least for the period of the war. Marat had been elected for Paris. He, and a few other extremists perhaps, wished actually to extend the Revolution into the economic sphere, and to work towards social equality. Others, again, were militant Freethinkers, and advocated the disestablishment of the Church and "dechristianization." These tendencies, however, were not favoured by Danton, Robespierre, or the majority of the "Mountain." Robespierre, in fact, was fanatically religious in a Deistic sense, and loathed Atheists with a deadly loathing. He was a sort of "Nonconformist Conscience" to the Revolution. For the present, however, these divergent tendencies within the "Mountain" were latent only, and all were united in demanding a strong provisional Government, democratic in sympathy, and charged with the exclusive duty of defending the Revolution against enemies without and within.

The great majority of the Convention never belonged to any party, but, seated in the lower part of the hall, between the Girondists and the "Mountain," received the nickname of the "Plain" or the "Frogs of the Marsh." This doubtful majority represented average middle-class French opinion, which, though ready to support any measures that seemed necessary to win the war, remained fundamentally Conservative, and was resolved to take the first opportunity that offered itself of escaping from its uncongenial adventure in democracy. Many members of the former Assemblies, reactionaries at heart, sat silent in the "Marsh," waiting for the day when, national independence once assured, they could once more trample on the democracy, and secure the reign of the well-fed and the prosperous.

Just before the Legislative Assembly dissolved, it had granted French naturalization by way of compliment to several distinguished foreign friends of freedom. Two of these were elected to the National Convention—Anacharsis Clootz, a German baron by birth, but an enthusiastic Republican, Internationalist, and Freethinker; and our own countryman, Tom Paine. Clootz sat with the "Mountain"; Paine is generally reckoned with the Girondists, but was assuredly a more advanced politician than most of that party were.

As soon as it met, the Convention abolished royalty, and declared that official documents should henceforth be dated Year I. of the Republic. There unanimity ended. The Girondists, or Ministerial party, instead of calling a party truce and getting on with measures necessary to the national defence, wasted time in a number of frontal and flank attacks on the Radicals. The September massacres offered the chief means of attack. Though the Girondists had not condemned the massacres at the time, and some of their newspapers had even approved of them, they now, after three weeks, appeared suddenly to awake to their iniquity, and accused not only Marat (who really was compromised) but Danton and Robespierre, who had had just as much, and just as little, responsibility for the massacres as the Girondists themselves.

While these bickerings went on in the Convention, the French armies, after freeing France of the invaders, carried the war into the enemy's country. General Custine invaded Germany, and occupied Speyer, Worms, Mainz, and Frankfort in the name of the Republic. Dumouriez entered Belgium, which was then Austrian territory, and won the battle of Jemmapes (November 6, 1792), after which the French entered Brussels. The Republican parties in Belgium and the German cities (for, since 1789, all countries bordering on France had been simmering with democratic movements) welcomed the French with open arms. The Girondists, being the party in power, gained strength from these successes. They proposed and carried a resolution which declared that all peoples were the friends of France, and offered French help to any nation that wished to rise against its rulers. This resolution looked all very well on paper, but would obviously, if adhered to, have involved France in everlasting wars. It was the initial step on that dangerous road of militarism which ultimately led to the despotism of Napoleon. It also frightened England, and had much to do with this country's entry into the war against France.

ROBERT ARCH.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

Correspondence.

PROSECUTION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—A few weeks ago a spiritualistic medium was prosecuted and fined £50 and costs of £30 on the ground that her practices were fraudulent. I carefully read the evidence given in the daily newspapers, and there certainly seemed to be nothing more inane or silly in her communications with the spirits than in those quoted by Dr. Oliver Lodge in his notorious book Raymond.

If any harm to the public, justifying legal restraint, is done by an obscure medium, surely this harm is greatly enhanced by the support and sanction of an eminent scientist.

It seems to me that the silly victims of spiritualistic fraud have only themselves to thank for being so easily gulled; they attend the seances of their own freewill, and, doubtless, the majorty of them consider that they get good value for their money in the solace they derive from communication with their dear departed ones.

All the religious periodicals are urging the prosecution of these mediums, and the editor of the Month justifies this on the ground that they can furnish no guarantee of the truth of their communications. But what guarantee can the minister of any supernatural religion furnish of the truth of his statements about the unseen world? In the region of the supernatural everything is wrapped in an impenetrable mystery, so that no guarantees are possible. It would seem, indeed, that this combination of the warring sects against Spiritualism is inspired by a common jealousy and fear of competition in the domain of the supernatural, which has hitherto been the special preserve of the various Churches. We Freethinkers, who stand outside all the Churches, should, I think, protest against the prosecution of Spiritualists as being an invasion of that liberty of thought and action which we have attained so dearly and should value so highly.

When such highly trained scientists as the late Alfred Russel Wallace and Dr. Oliver Lodge are among the advocates of, and believers in, Spiritualism, and against whom any charge of wilful fraud is plainly absurd, surely legal restraint of their investigations is to be deprecated?

G. O. WARREN, Major (retired).

Oh, for Ten Thousand Tongues to Sing!

WHEN I survey the fearful dross
Laid thick upon the altar piece,
I fain would make the clergy cross
And write a hymnal masterpiece!
A hymn that every babe could sing,
A song for man to harmonize
With verse and tune of wondrous swing
To knock dead gods from out the skies.

To knock dead gods from out the skies!
Strange that the task remains undone,
Strange that mankind defends the lies
Which rob its heart and tie its tongue.
Oh, for a song to clear the skies!
To tear each falsehood cleanly out,
To breed a courage which denies
The drivel man could do without.

ARTHUR F. THORN.

An Edinburgh man brings this tale from the West Highlands.

In the village church one Sunday there was an unlettered, uncouth fellow, full of good intentions and odd piety, who persisted in bawling the Psalm tunes at the top of a very raucous voice.

After toleration bordering on the suicidal a gentleman visitor ventured to intervene, approaching the offender with a courteous request to sing quietly and in moderation.

"You go to blazes," was the almost savage retort, "I'm here to praise the Lord!"—Edinburgh Evening Dispatch.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, off Kentish Town Road, N.W.): 7.30, Debate, "The Origin of the Human Race." Introduced by J. K. Harris.

SOUTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Avondale Hall, Landor Road, Clapham, S.W.): 7, Chapman Cohen, "Christianity and the Logic of Life."

MR. HOWELL SMITH'S DISCUSSION CLASS (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Thursday, March 1, at 7.30.

HYDE PARK: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Kells and Dales, "Christian Hypocrisy"; 6.30, Messrs. Beale and Yates.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

LEICESTER (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate): 6.30, Percival Westell, F.L.S., "The Natural History of the Garden." Lantern illustrations.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

POST FREE THREE HALFPENCE.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
QUEEN ANNE'S CHAMBERS, WESTMINSTER, S.W.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

TEH PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

A

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY
OF FREETHINKERS
OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY

J. M. WHEELER.

Price THREE SHILLINGS Net.
(Postage 6d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.
G. E. MACDONALD - - - - EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN - - EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

Subscription Rates:

Single subscription in advance - - - $3.00
Two new subscribers - - - - - 5.00
One subscription two years in advance - 5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp. ...	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 68 pp.	,, 1d.	0	3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	3
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
COMING CIVILIZATION. 30 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp....	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Mangasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 32 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 32 pp. ... ... Nett.	,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. LEA.
In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
By E. A. ASHCROFT.
440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By CARVETH READ.
8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.
By D. B. HART, M.D.
Crown 8vo. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

THE THEORIES OF EVOLUTION.
By YVES DELAGE.
1912. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.
For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. MILL.
Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

HISTORY OF THE TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.
By C. D. COLLET.
Two vols., published at 7s. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By CHAPMAN COHEN.
Price 1s. net, postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By G. W. FOOTE.
First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. WHEELER.
Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:
CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:
MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all aws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 1,859

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 9 SUNDAY MARCH 4, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
The Supremacy of Truth.—The Editor	129
The Futility of Theodicies.—J. T. Lloyd	130
Seers at Sea.—Mimnermus	131
The Emergence of Man.—T. F. Palmer	132
Death of a South African Freethinker	134
Acid Drops	134
To Correspondents	137
Sugar Plums	137
"Forerunners and Rivals of Christianity."—A. D. Howell Smith	138
The French Revolution.—Robert Arch	139
Thought for the Morrow	141
N. S. S. Executive Report	142
Obituary	142
Notice of Meetings	142
Books and Pamphlets	143

Views and Opinions.

The Supremacy of Truth.

Truth, like murder, will out. It may be suppressed for a time, but it turns up in the most unexpected manner. It is difficult for even the most confirmed liar to avoid spoiling his record by sometimes lapsing into truth. Perhaps it is because perpetual lying is a greater strain upon one's memory and upon one's powers of invention than is merely speaking the truth. If eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, eternal carefulness is the condition of unblemished lying. Moreover, truth will out, because facts cannot be eternally suppressed. We may ignore them, but they remain; demanding, and eventually receiving, recognition. Sooner or later, the man who has been loudly asserting that two and two equal five is compelled to admit that he cannot make the sum more than four. Even a goat engaged in butting a brick wall will presently see the immovability of the object. Truth may not be all-powerful, but it is eternally insistent.

* * *

Outgrowing Religion.

One of the truths that will out is that human development is away from all forms of religion, orthodox or heterodox. Thousands of clergymen are for ever protesting that religion is an indispensable and indestructible element in human nature. Hundreds of writers with an over-developed sense of the marketable value of the unthinking and the credulous, emphasize the same proverb in articles and novels. And yet the fact of the world growing less religious is always before us, the fact of man having got rid of an "indestructible" element is continually demanding recognition. And every now and again this recognition is forthcoming. The other day, the writer who supplies the Times with a weekly essay on religion remarked, at the opening of an article on "The Modern Distrust of Religion," that "Many people of all classes have now a deep distrust of religion, as if it must imply some kind of dishonesty, moral or intellectual." This frank admission is worthy of note, not merely because it is true, but because its truth is becoming so obvious that even religionists cannot ignore it without making themselves ridiculous.

* * *

A Significant Phenomenon.

It is certain that a "deep distrust" of religion has not developed without some very powerful cause. To realize this, one need only recall how powerful are the inducements for people to at least profess a faith in religion. By prescriptive right, religion enjoys a position such as is possessed by no other social force. Its reign has been long and, until yesterday, unquestioned. The ignorant still accept it as a matter of course, and another class protects it from motives of self-interest. The avenues of promotion are still largely controlled by religion, and an army of professional defenders are always busy in its defence. Many thousands who do not really believe in religion hesitate to openly express dissent, and others pathetically cling to the name long after all it properly stands for is surrendered. Like Madame de Stael and ghosts, they do not believe in religion, but they are afraid of it. The social dice are heavily loaded in favour of religion. There are few inducements to break with it; there are many favourable to the maintenance of friendly relations. Consequently, for us to have reached a position when even defenders of religion are compelled to acknowledge that a deep distrust exists "in all classes of society," is a striking illustration of the way in which the logic of facts overcome the logic of theory.

* * *

An Impossible Creed.

So far as Christianity is concerned, that is becoming an impossible creed for multitudes, and a difficult one for all who think. Its doctrinal scheme, its "plan of salvation," its whole theory of man and the world, is simply ridiculous in the light of modern knowledge and modern needs. What has the world of to-day to do with its special creations, its miracles, its blood atonement, its virgin-born and resurrected saviours? These things do not belong to our world at all. And how can any civilized and educated man or woman fail to see the savage behind it all; to realize that these things belong to the age of a flat earth, a solid sky, and a world of supernatural beings actually concerned in the doings of mankind? But the world of to-day no longer questions whether these things are true. It knows they are false. Not alone do laymen know they are false, best part of the clergy also know it. Try how they will, they cannot square their teachings with modern knowledge. They may explain, and trim, and modify; but the salient features of their creed is too plain. And can it be wondered that when men see this horrible divorce between knowledge and faith, they have a "deep distrust" of religion, and feel that its profession implies "some kind of dishonesty, moral or intellectual"? Stupidity or dishonesty; the choice of the professing Christian is rapidly becoming a choice of one of these two. He may escape the one charge, but only by pleading guilty to the other.

Digitized by Google

The Disease that Kills Religion.

Of all the diseases to which religion is subject, there is but one that is fatal—that of being found out. And, quite beyond question, the world is finding out religion. It has seen all its claims to world supremacy shattered one after the other. Its claim to act as a law-giver in the world of the physical has been broken beyond possibility of repair. Science to-day treats religion with complete indifference—sometimes with absolute contempt. This world, say the clergy, is God's world, but by a strange irony no one goes to God's agents on earth to find out anything about it. How could it be otherwise? The teachings of Copernicus shattered its claims in the world of astronomy. The physics of Galileo and Newton killed its pretensions in another direction. Lyell in geology, and Darwin in biology met it with shattering results in other departments. The heavens no longer declare the glory of God, the earth no longer shows his manipulative skill, they bear witness only to the all-conquering intelligence of man. "God" is to-day a discarded hypothesis, an atrophied organ of the body social. Gods are useless in a world where human intelligence has reached maturity.

* * *

Outgrowing Religion.

The world is outgrowing religion. That is the plain, unvarnished truth. Let us emphasize this fact of growth, because it is that which makes the future of religion hopeless. People do not, in the overwhelming majority of cases, discard religious belief as the result of a reasoned process. In the main, they outgrow it. The pressure of life is perpetual and insistent. It is neither a party nor an organization that religion has to fight to-day. It is the pressure of a whole civilization that is the real enemy of religion. And how can any Church, or combination of Churches, fight that? Once before in the history of the world Christianity was able to overthrow a civilization, but that can never happen again. The fault of the old civilization was that culture was confined to a few. Books were few, and the means of transmitting knowledge limited. To-day knowledge has been democratized. Books exist in their myriads, and something of a sane knowledge of the world is the property of all. Civilization may experience reverses, but a complete overthrow is beyond the bounds of reasonable probability; and nothing short of that catastrophe can give religion a new lease of life.

Chapman Cohen.

The Futility of Theodicies.

Christians generally assume the existence of God and the absolute perfection of his character, while professional theologians have always made vigorous attempts to prove the former and to vindicate the latter. Apologetics is the most fundamental and important department of dogmatic theology; and it is profoundly significant that every age, as it comes, must formulate its own apologetic system. The famous Theodicy elaborated with such rare distinction by Leibnitz, is practically valueless to-day. We still read it with unstinted admiration for the genius of its author; but no one believes that it possesses much, if any, practical value for us of to-day. And yet the facts of life are the same now as they were then, and have been since human history began. To doubt is natural, while vitally to believe is the most tremendous of tasks, and while the facts remain essentially unchanged, fresh aids to belief are required almost every year. The significance of this phenomenon is usually overlooked, even by the divines. The belief is that the human race is the offspring of a Supernatural Being who loves and cares for it, but to keep that belief alive tens of thousands are set apart to interpret, justify, and defend it, otherwise it would soon die out completely. These officials put forth their utmost efforts to perpetuate it, but in spite of their most faithful ministrations, its constant tendency is to fade away. This is a fact which no one can gainsay.

Let us face the problem anew in company with a twentieth century apologist in the person of the Rev. Francis E. Powell, M.A., Vicar of Bromyard Parish Church. Judging by one of his published sermons, entitled "The Father-Heart of God and the World Agony of War," which has fallen into our hands through the kindness of a friend, we infer that Mr. Powell is a broad-minded and fine-spirited gentleman, who has the courage to think for himself, and who enjoys the privilege of being under a bishop who has often been branded as a dangerous heresiarch. In the sermon just mentioned the reverend gentleman ridicules the idea that the War "is sent as a punishment," saying:—

> What folly, then, to throw blame upon Germany. For the Kaiser and his myrmidons have been but the puppets of the Divine Will. According to this view, the real author of all this misery and woe is God, who has sent it to punish the world.....And upon whom has the punishment fallen? Are Belgium and Serbia so very much worse than Holland and Denmark? Does the Continent of Europe need chastisement more than that of North and South America?

Mr. Powell has no faith in prayer as a means to bring the War to an end. He alludes to the audacity of a bishop who was not ashamed to state in St. Paul's Cathedral "that God was, as it were, sitting on the fence to see which side would importune him most." Then he adds:—

> A father sitting on a fence watching his children rob and rape, and maim and slay in fraticidal warfare! No wonder people find religion—or that which passes under its name—to be so unsatisfactory, and that, in consequence, so much indifference abounds.

In equally scathing terms the preacher dismisses the angels of Mons as utterly unworthy of credence, saying, "If angels at Mons during the War, why not angels at Berlin and Vienna to prevent the War?"

So far as the negative position of this discourse is concerned, we are in hearty agreement with it; but when Mr. Powell undertakes to discern the traces of a Divine Father's heart in the existing European situation, we find ourselves in uncompromising opposition to him. He affirms that "there are two ideas in Fatherhood which we do well to keep apart." Why must we keep them apart? Simply because the one gives the lie direct to the other. The two ideas are "the communication of life and the outpouring of love." As the communicator of life, God "stands for the great world-process which seems to us so ruthless, unfeeling, and harsh; for those tremendous elemental forces which are stern as fate, absolute as tyranny, and merciless as death; which are too vast to praise, too inexorable to propitiate; which have no ear for prayer, no heart for sympathy, no arm to save." By "God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth," we are to understand Nature and her various processes. Mr. Powell says:—

> This is the scientific conception of God, true in all its awful force and grim rigidity. The name stands for that stream of tendency by which all things seek to fulfil the law of their being. For, as Herbert Spencer once most truly said: "Amid the mysteries which are becoming more mysterious the more they are thought about, there will remain the absolute certainty that we are ever in the presence of an Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed." Of such a Father, who is only stern Nature personified, whose will are the universal uniform-

Digitized by Google

ities we call Nature's laws "which shall not be broken," we may well exclaim :—

> Who dares to name his Name,
> Or belief in him proclaim,
> Veiled in mystery as he is,
> The All-Enfolder!

What we maintain is that this is not the scientific conception of God but an unscientific conception of Nature. To call Nature God is a most deplorable instance of misnaming. Science, as such, neither affirms nor denies the existence of God, but simply ignores it, treating it as if it were not. Science confines itself exclusively to Nature and her laws, knowing of nothing above or beyond her. The poet may, and does, personify her, as students of Shelley, Keats, and Meredith are well aware. Meredith, indeed, now and then uses the theological name "God," but he takes care to explain that by it he only means Nature's "firm laws" of heredity and environment. But Mr. Powell believes in and preaches a God above and beyond the God of Nature. He takes special pains to impress upon our minds that there are two Fathers, namely, "the Father of Revelation and experience and the Father of science and philosophy," though he naively confesses that he does not know how to reconcile the two. The truth is that they cannot be reconciled, being in their very natures opposed to each other. We have no means of ascertaining to what extent the reverend gentleman is loyal to the Thirty-nine Articles; but if he is at all orthodox he bows down to two different and antagonistic Deities. The Father of revelation is tender-hearted and compassionate, while the Father of science is stern and unbending; the one forgives, the other does not; the one visits the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto many generations, the other drowns the law of causation in the river of redeeming grace. Now, evidently, and of necessity these two hostile Fathers cannot possibly co-exist; and since Nature and her laws do exist, and we are inextricably under their sway, it inevitably follows that the other Father, the Father of revelation, must totally depart, as there is neither room nor need for him.

Mr. Powell is convinced that it is in the spiritual and not in the physical world that we find this higher relation of Father and Child. That is to say, the reverend gentleman must have a Gospel of salvation by faith to preach to a fallen and sinful world, and because there is no such Gospel to be got out of Nature, he adopts an imaginary supernature wherein dwells and reigns the God of love, who sweeps Nature aside, transcending her and crying: "I am all in all." Whence issues this supernatural Gospel? Confessedly from the Gospel Jesus, who is said to be God manifested in the flesh; an impracticable teacher of ethics whom his own professed followers have never taken quite seriously; a visionary who was never in living touch with time and earth, but who spoke continually of the Father's house beyond the stars into which he would enter at death, and from which he would return erelong for the express purpose of taking his own back with him there to live for ever above the world and its woes. That is the admitted source of the Christian Gospel which has been in the world, like a beautiful but ineffectual dream, for nigh two thousand years. Has it redeemed the world from its evils and wrongs? No. Has it justified its existence by the moral miracles it has performed? No. The world is still the battle-field of opposing forces.

Towards the end of his discourse Mr. Powell substantially admits this himself. After all his glowing descriptions of the teaching, life, and, above all, the personality of Jesus, which leads him to claim that "whatever else God may be he is, at any rate, all that I can see is good in the personality of Christ"; after his glorification of the spiritual world as the sphere of superhuman forces which sweep down into the interior of humanity with the object of transforming it, this is the key in which the oration closes :—

> It may be that this Universe is that in which the Father-heart is seeking, amid difficulties of which we can have no conception, ever more and more to realize itself, much as the sculptor is doing with the marble upon which (all unconscious, too, as it is of his difficulties) he is expressing his craft. The process is slow and painful; but, comparing the capacity of the human spirit for love and wisdom now with what it was, say some thousands of years ago, it is most emphatically sure. For Creation is yet in process, and the process is one of struggle towards the sure and certain triumph of the far-off Divine event towards which the whole is moving even while it groans and travails together until now.

This is virtually a falling back upon evolution as the only ground of hope for the future of humanity. It is by human struggle alone that progress is being achieved, and apart from struggle no improvement has ever taken place. The cant about the Father-heart of God as having been at work from the beginning until now betrays its hollowness the moment we glance at history, and particularly at "the world-agony of war now upon us in all its frightfulness and heart-breaking horrors." Man's only hope lies in himself, and a general realization of this truth would result in an all-round advance. Far too long has been the period of our nerveless passivity, and the time has fully come for the commencement of a new period of energetic, whole-hearted activity, of the manifestation of the will to growth and development of that brother-heart which will make the whole world kin, abolishing nationalities and establishing that universalism under which alone the enjoyment of perpetual peace and prosperity will be possible.

J. T. Lloyd.

Seers at Sea.

> The vain crowds wandering blindly, led by lies.—Lucretius.
>
> The carpenter said nothing but
> The butter's spread too thick. —Lewis Carroll.

Agreeably to the law of supply and demand, prophets have in all times arisen to foretell events, smooth and otherwise, at prices absurdly cheap considering the value of their services. From the days of the Roman augurs, who, it is said, could not look one another in the face without laughing, down to those of the present-day fortune-teller, who giggles in her dainty sleeve until an infidel magistrate usurps her calling, and prophesies that she will spend some months in prison, an unbroken line of more or less inspired personages has existed.

The universe has been ransacked for information on coming events. The stars that glitter millions of miles in the empyrean have been thought of as deeply interested in the careers of the inhabitants of Dunghill-on-the-Snazle, and the sediment at the bottom of a paltry tea-cup, has been held to be fraught with profound meaning to blushing maidens and proud suitors. Comets have been imported into the solar system for the purpose of warning people of approaching disaster, and insects commissioned to prepare persons for approaching dissolution by "tapping" in the woodwork of old houses. Even dogs consent courteously to hold weird conversations with their distant friends in the "wee sma' hours" for the same dread purpose.

The apparently inconsequent nature of the events that befall mankind engendered the idea of a supernatural control which, of course, according to the prophets, was to be bribed. The rain-doctors and prophets of uncivilized peoples, however, are kept to their contracts. They are expected to bring rain when it is required, and if they do not the consequences are summary and unpleasant. But the prophets in civilized countries retain all the advantages of their savage prototypes without any of the risks and dangers. The civilized dupes allow the prophet to play his little game on the principle "Heads I win, tails you lose." If the prophet is unsuccessful, they ignore the mistake; if he is correct, they put it to his credit, or he puts it to his credit—which is much the same thing.

Digitized by Google

The phenomenon is not unknown in this country, and we can estimate the cases of some notorious folk more correctly than those of the lesser luminaries. In the early years of the nineteenth century, Joanna Southcott was a well-known prophetess in the time when the great Napoleon was identified as the "beast" in "Revelation." Joanna was a bold lady, and she predicted that she would be mother of the Messiah—a prophecy that proved to be due to the mundane disease of dropsy. Before she died she left plenteous examples of her artful prophecies, of her long-winded wranglings with Old Nick, and of the intolerable verse that flowed from her saintly pen, that not even divine inspiration could make tuneful or grammatical.

Another nineteenth-century Messiah was Lieutenant Richard Brothers, a half-pay naval officer, whose portrait was engraved with rays of light descending on his crazed head. The word came to Dick that he would be revealed to all men as the King of Jerusalem and Ruler of the World. But the message fell on stony ground, and the world proved obdurate. After Richard had invited King George the Fourth to deliver up his crown, and had ordered the Houses of Parliament to meet for receiving his message, the Messiah was led away into that house of bondage where so many sons and daughters of high Heaven have suffered restraint at the hands of unbelieving keepers and sceptical doctors.

Innocent folk of a later generation reverenced the utterances of that portentous prophet, the Rev. Dr. Cumming, who demonstrated that the Biblical prophecy of the locusts, whose sting is in their tail, was fulfilled by a Turkish general having used a horse's tail as a standard. Dr. Cumming also contended that the Pope was "Anti-Christ," and that the French people were the persons aimed at in "Revelation." This modern Jeremiah preached before Queen Victoria, and the avenues of his church were as crowded as the approaches to a theatre. But nemesis came at last, and he fell from his pinnacle of popularity. In a moment of religious recklessness he named the year 1861 as that in which most awful events were to take place. The year was not uneventful, but it failed to fill the prophet's programme, and from that time his fame declined. His dupes subscribed handsomely to place him above difficulty and want, and he passed his last years in peace and comfort, "basking in the sunshine of the countenance of God."

There was still money in the prophetic business, and Cumming's mantle was soon on the shoulders of another man. For many years the Rev. W. Baxter's name was a household word in religious circles. To multitudes he was a heaven-sent seer, commissioned by a benevolent deity to receive the light of prophecy and throw it over a naughty world. Good people reserved a warm corner in their hearts, over and above their loyal obligation to the House of Hanover, for a spiritual guide who taught them precisely to whom they might point as "the whore of Babylon," and the "beast" of "Revelation." That quintessence of nonsense, Forty Coming Wonders, was purchased with unabated credulity, although the error of Baxter's pretensions to be regarded as a prophet were proved again and again by the logic of facts to the satisfaction of reasonable persons.

Few prophets would find it easy to go on year after year delivering a succession of silly prophecies destined to utter failure. But Baxter's dupes were the most greedily credulous of their kind. The prophet gravely announced the ascension of 144,000 Christians, without dying, in 1896, and the great Persecution from 1896 to 1901. The Second Advent of Christ was fixed for the same year. The prophet once had an amusing adventure with the City Corporation. He applied for the lease of a site for a newspaper office, and it was pointed out to him that he had asked for a lease extending a quarter of a century beyond that he had fixed in his prophecies for the end of the world. But nothing daunted the prophet, who was familiar with thrones, principalities, and powers.

These are notorious cases. Cumming and Baxter found fortune-telling a pleasant and profitable hobby. They did not advise ladies how to find husbands, or furnish any of their congregations with the names of "winners." They made bolder dashes into futurity, and their courage met with its golden rewards. But they were as much imposters as race-course fortune-tellers. They pretended to possess which neither they nor other people possess. So are thought-readers, clairvoyants, mediums, and the whole troublous tribe of dabblers in the alleged "super"-natural. But whereas an ordinary person who tells fortunes is fined or sent to prison, the same fraud may be practised with impunity if one uses the jargon of the Christian religion. The Vagrancy Act provides that all persons professing to tell fortunes shall be liable to a fine or to imprisonment. Such is the modern and merciful form of the Divine commandment; "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." Selden, in his Table Talk, says that the old laws against witchcraft do not prove witchcraft to have existed. That is so, for it never did exist. As a fact, tens of thousands of women, perfectly harmless and innocent, were legally murdered on fantastic evidence, which ought to have been incredible, for doing what was physically impossible, in supposed obedience to a legendary command of a doubtful deity.

Fortune-telling to-day means fines and imprisonment for poor vagrants, but the careers of these clergymen show how it may be turned to the best account by Christian gentlemen who remember the soothing fact that a large number of their co-religionists are uneducated and foolish.

Mimnermus.

The Emergence of Man.

III.

(Continued from p. 118.)

The clear thoroughfare afforded by the uninterrupted pathway into Europe from Asia and Africa, which permitted a wealth of floral and faunal life so vast to enter our continent is not devoid of interest with respect to the advent of man. The discovery of the fossil remains of a representative of the Trinal race in Java, which dwelt among animals nearly akin to those of the lower Himalayas, and more distantly related to the faunal organisms of Southern Europe, has an important bearing on the problem of the origin of the human family.

The Dutch surgeon, Dubois, in 1891, discovered, near the Bengawan River in Java, a tooth which he thought to be that of an ancient type of ape. A further examination of the deposit disclosed the presence of part of a skull, another tooth, and a left thighbone. These were the long-buried relics of the now world-renowned Pithecanthropus erectus—the erect ape-man. Dubois declared that this creature represented "the transition form between man and the anthropoids which the laws of evolution teach us must have existed. He is the ancestor of man."

Digitized by Google

Whether Pithecanthropus is an ancestor or not, he is certainly a near relative. The geological stratum in which these fragments were found was considered by Dubois to be of Pliocene age. In this conclusion he was supported by other scientists, while some regard it as a little more recent. In summing up all the now available evidence, Professor Osborn states that:—

> Subsequent researches by expert geologists have tended to refer the age to the early Pleistocene. According to Elbert, the Kendeng strata overlying the Pithecanthropus layer corresponds to an early pluvial period of low temperature and, in point of time, to the Ice Age of Europe. For even in Java one can distinguish three divisions of the Pleistocene period, including the first period of low temperature to which the Pithecanthropus layer is referred.

A careful comparison of the fossil mammals preserved in the deposit which yielded the remains of Pithecanthropus nevertheless seem to sustain the soundness of Dubois' original judgment. The many animals disinterred from this deposit are distinctly Pliocene in character. The various data as a whole seem to warrant the conclusion that the geological antiquity of the Trinil ape-men is either extremely late Pliocene or of very early Pleistocene date.

The discovery of Pithecanthropus, the at present only known representative of what was presumably a widespread stock, proved the occasion of an animated controversy. Some hailed the Java ape-man as the confidently awaited missing link; others asserted it to be the cranium of a long extinct giant gibbon, and denied that it was in any sense human. Then dispassionate science stepped in to pronounce an opinion, and it was pointed out that the top of the skull carries an unmistakable resemblance, both when surveyed sideways or when viewed from above, to the long-departed Stone Age men of the Neanderthal race. That very competent anatomist, Professor Schwalbe, contends that the cranium of Pithecanthropus much more closely approaches the skulls of this ancient stock than those of the superior apes. Schwalbe likewise insists that all the primitive human peoples were dolichocephalic, or long-headed; while all contemporary apes are broad-headed. Whether an ancient progenitor of modern man or not, the ape-man was a member of the human group, however humble, and was far nearer the apes than any other known variety of extant or extinct mankind.

Efforts have been, and are still being made, to augment the fragmentary discovery of Dubois, but so far with scanty success. "The Selenka expedition of 1907-8," we are informed,— > brought back a human left lower molar as the only result of an express search for more Pithecanthropus remains. Dubois is also said to possess the fragment of a primitive-looking lower jaw from the range known as the Kendeng Hills, at the southern base of which lies the village of Trinil.

The cranial capacity of the Javan ape-man was smaller than that of any savage race recently or long since extinct, while it was distinctly superior to that of any of the apes. But the animal had evidently gained the erect posture, thus emancipating its arms and hands for nobler purposes than those of mere progression. The extended demands put upon the lower limbs as organs of support and locomotion led to their strengthening. Their powers of movement being thus amplified, we may accept the conclusion of Professor Elliot Smith that—> these upright simians emerged from their ancestral forests in societies, armed with sticks and stones, and with the rudiments of all the powers that eventually enabled them to conquer the world. The greater exposure to danger which these more adventurous spirits encountered once they emerged in the open, and the constant struggles these first semi-human creatures must have had in encounters with definite enemies, no less than with the forces of Nature, provided the factors which rapidly weeded out those unfitted for the new conditions and by natural selection made real men of the survivors.

The Interglacial Stage in Europe already mentioned was succeeded by a second glacial invasion. Various land areas began to sink, and cold currents from the arctic regions swept over the seas. Professor Geikie estimated the decline of temperature in Western Europe during this time at about 20 deg. F. This second Ice Age was far more severe than any of the others experienced either in the Old or the New World. In the Pyrenees, glaciers of colossal dimensions were formed. Ice rivers flowed from the Pyrenees southwards into Spain for nearly forty miles from their original home, while to the north they occupied the Garonne valley in France for a distance of forty-five miles. It is considered that, even where it had spread out at its lower levels, the Garonne glacier retained a thickness of half-a-mile.

But the greatest European ice-sheet came from the bitter north. The tremendous Scandinavian glacial wave swept over our Island, filled the valleys of the Vistula, Rhine, and Elbe, and closely approached the Carpathians. So intense was this frigid invasion that insignificant hills were crowned with an icy covering, and even the Atlas range in Africa was glaciated. In North America, the vast ice-sheet descended much further south than in the antecedent or in any subsequent glacial time. Centuries came and went, during which the Northern Hemisphere was held in bondage by ice and snow. Then the harsh grip was relaxed, and milder conditions returned. A prolonged period of genial aspect followed, and this era is distinguished by the first unequivocal evidence of man's residence in Western Europe. This is the epoch of the Heidelberg race, as yet identified by one jawbone given up by the Mauer deposits near Heidelberg in 1907.

That the second Interglacial period was of immense duration is manifested by the extent of the channeling and denudation of the "drifts" transported southwards both in Europe and America during the preceding Ice Age. In the opening stages of the decline of the intense cold, the climate of the Northern Hemisphere was raw and damp. But as the ice retreated, the atmospheric conditions became warm and dry; so much so that the glaciers of the Alpine regions terminated at points much higher than their present levels. Flowers bloomed in the highlands of Central Europe which require a temperature equal to that enjoyed on the sunny slopes of the mountains of Northern Italy to-day. In Southern France, plants such as the warmth-loving laurel and sweet bay were flourishing, while the fig survived the winters then prevailing. Yet, despite the persistence of these southern forms of vegetation, the animal life discovered south of the mouth of the Neckar in the strata disclosing the remains of Heidelberg man indicate that the general conditions were of a temperate character. In proximity to the human relics, the fossils include those of elephants, rhinoceroses, horses, wild pigs, many members of the deer group, oxen, bears, lions, wolves, and beavers. Schoetensack, who found the jaw of Heidelberg man, referred these numerous mammals to the First Interglacial Stage, and this conclusion was supported by Geikie. Osborn, however, dissents from this view, and contends that:—

Digitized by Google

> The presence of the Etruscan rhinoceros would appear to point to such great antiquity, but the evidence afforded by this primitive animal is overborne by that of three mammals which are highly characteristic of Second Interglacial times; these are the straight-tusked or ancient elephant (E. antiquus), the lion, and the Mosbach horse. Excepting only the Etruscan rhinoceros, all these species frequenting the ancient stream Elsenz, and deposited with the "sands of Mauer," occurred also in the forests and meadows of the region now known as Baden, where the fossil mammal deposits of Mosbach, near the Neckar, are found.

Although a debatable point, it appears probable that the earliest human race so far recorded in Central Europe resided in Germany at the commencement of the Second Interglacial Stage. The animal fossils indicate the presence of wide woodlands as well as spacious pastures. The Heidelberg savages must have been of a very low type, judging from the jaw discovered. The teeth are distinctly human, but the protrusion of modern man's under-jaw, which makes possible the chin, is entirely absent. Apart from the very regular teeth, so extremely dissimilar to those of any living or extinct ape, the jaw would have been regarded as unquestionably simian. The dental organs are so small in comparison with the brutal jaw, that they could scarcely have been used for fighting purposes. And as regards the remarkably retreating chin, the crania of the ancient Neanderthal and other prehistoric peoples "rank exactly half-way between the most inferior races of recent man and the anthropoid apes."

The more an organ is exercised, the more fully developed it is likely to become; and judging from the circumstance that the contemporary Eskimos, and the surviving or recently obliterated native races of Australia and elsewhere, were known to employ the jaws as tools, it is a fair inference that the Heidelberg folk utilized their mandibles for a like purpose. This in some measure explains the abnormal development of the Heidelberg jaw. Doubtless, as further relics of this savage stock are made known, the upper part of the cranium will denote an intellectual advance beyond that of the ape-man of Java.

The arrival of man in Europe, then, was apparently during the mild interval which separated the second Great Ice Age from the third Glacial visitation. The mammalian fossils of later deposits indicate the return of colder conditions. The northern reindeer gradually spread over continental Europe, and it may have migrated as far south as the borders of Spain. American testimony is of a kindred character, and all the available data conspire to prove that after the advance of the glaciers of the Second Ice Period had been stayed, and their recession had begun, the climate remained moist and chilly until a more genial stage supervened. Throughout this very temperate time forests flourished, but the warm interval was succeeded by a period of cold and dry conditions, which in its turn gave way both in Northern Europe and America to the raw, perhaps foggy, and most certainly frigid, epoch known as the Third Glaciation, which, according to Penck's extremely conservative calculation, commenced about 120,000 years since, and lasted from its opening to its close for at least 20,000 years. This would consequently carry us down to Europe and America as they existed only 100,000 years ago.

T. F. Palmer.

(To be concluded.)

Death of a South African Freethinker.

There died a little while ago in Cape Town, Mr. G. W. Martin, who for many years kept the Freethought Flag flying here. Mr. Martin used to speak every evening under the statue of Van Richuh, near the water's edge, and as near the spot where the first Governor of the Cape landed as could be ascertained. Among his audience were many who were very regular in their attendances, while the casual passer-by was frequently attracted by the truths that fell from the speaker's tongue. They were the wiser men who took heed; not like Goldsmith's fool, who came to scoff and remained to pray. Without being an eloquent speaker, Mr. Martin made up for that lack by efficiency and earnestness. He was a great admirer of the Freethinker, and frequently read from it at his meetings. On one occasion he attended the funeral of a lady friend of his, the obsequies, or whatever the clerical term is, being conducted by the Rev. William Balmforth, a Free Unitarian, who is a Socialist and a man who does not revile another because the one's doing is not his. Mr. Martin remarked to Mr. Balmforth: "I would like you to be at my funeral. If you pray over my coffin and I don't get out of the shell, you will know I am dead." Well, Mr. Balmforth was at the funeral. If he prayed, Mr. Martin stayed in the shell.

This much must be said of Mr. Martin, he lived a clean and honest life. On week-days he was a good worker. He was free in dipping his hand into the pocket where his money might be. On Sunday evening he spoke in the great effort to remove superstition from the minds of the people. Africa has been called the Dark Continent. It is in more ways than one, and in no other more so than in the darkness of religious superstition. The predicants have for years been whispered of as the curse of the country. But few dare to speak aloud. Mr. Martin was one of those who dared.

W. Baxter (Cape Town).

Acid Drops.

We cited at length, last week, from Mr. Ralph Hall Caine's lecture before the Douglas Debating Society. (Mr. Caine is, by the way, a brother of the novelist, not a son, as was then stated.) The Publishers' Circular also gives a summary of the address, and to Mr. Caine's statement that, if only one book could be saved out of an assumed catastrophe, he would vote for Shakespeare, and not the Bible, the editor of the Publishers' Circular adds the note: "Mr. Ralph Hall Caine appears to forget that but for the Bible there would have been no Shakespeare."

Now, we don't know who the editor of the Publishers' Circular is; but whoever he is, we raise our hat to him. For that comment is a gem of the first water. Of its kind it is unsurpassable. Even Prophet Baxter Bottomley could not beat it. Its downright drivelling idiocy, unredeemed by even a reflection of common sense, makes it a thing of joy—something that one preserves in a treasured notebook, only to be glanced at when one doubts whether life is worth living. Many people have written volumes of diluted rubbish claiming how much Shakespeare was indebted to the Bible for ideas, inspiration, imagery, and so forth. But their work has been depressing rather than entertaining, since it was not all nonsense, and the presence of some sense made one resent the nonsense. But the editor of the Publishers' Circular beats the band. He will have no compromise. There would have been no Shakespeare at all but for the Bible. Neither would there have been any Chaucer, or Spenser, or Marlowe, or Drayton, or Bacon, or Montaigne, or Newton, or Lyell, or Darwin. We shall certainly keep an eye on the Publishers' Circular—if the editor provides us with many feasts of this description.

Now that the world-war is nearing its climax the British clergy, who are exempted from fighting, are anxious to get credit for doing something in order to save their faces. The Bishop of Norwich is advocating clerical help in the cultivation of small plots of ground. If a score or two of parsons grow spring onions or cultivate a few potatoes, it will not save the clergy from the reproach that they did nothing valuable in this awful time.

Digitized by Google

The Bishop of London has been in Scotland, and the account of his visit in the Church Times for February 23 is headed: "Revival in Scotland." The advent of his lordship anywhere spells Revival. Simply because the largest church meeting ever held in Dundee took place when Dr. Ingram was there, it is taken for granted that Caledonia is ablaze with new-kindled religious zeal. But the inference is radically false, as the Scottish people well know. The fact that folk rush to see and hear so notorious a man as the Bishop of London is no proof that they are religiously awakened. As a matter of fact, a most remarkable awakening is going on north of the Tweed, but it is of an entirely intellectual character, and it results, to the gratification of many, to the chagrin of more, in the gradual decay of religion in all parts of that interesting land.

The Bishop assured his Dundee audience that the hope of the world is the Church, only it must be a brand new church. How such a church is to be obtained he did not, because he could not, say. He forgets that the Church is old and full of disease, and that it has never been a success, except as a purely business concern, though, it must be admitted that, in this respect, its success has been quite phenomenal. Instead of setting himself up as a purifier of public morals, his lordship would evince much greater wisdom were he to confine himself to the stupendous task of reforming the Church, whose morals need looking after much more than those of the world. It would do the Bishop of London incalculable good if he could realize the truth of the old adage: "Physician, heal thyself."

All the Bishop does is to show that he can be as silly in the far north as in the far south. He is hoping for a new world after the War, but he asks:—

> Have you ever thought what is going to stop wars in the future? Beating Germany? A good preliminary. But what is going to stop the dangers of another war? What if the unconverted Chinese arise in their millions? There is only one way to stop wars. You will find it in the prophecy of Isaiah: "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, saith the Lord." This can only be arrived at when a successful Church brings the Gospel of Jesus Christ in its hand.

This fear of "unconverted Chinese" is delicious. Who is it but the Christian nations that have made nearly all the wars of the past five centuries? And who but the Christians are trying to drag China into the present War? China unconverted is a danger to none. China converted may become a danger to the world.

At the Leeds Wesleyan Mission Anniversary, Sir William Middlebrook, M.P., said: "No one could realize the amount of good the War had brought about; to-day thousands of men in the Army were leading useful and good lives. The teaching of Christianity throughout this country had laid the foundation of goodness in the hearts and lives of these men." After that one need feel small surprise at the ineffectiveness of Parliament. One can understand people who talk of the necessity for the War, however regrettable it may be. But to talk of the amount of good done by it is either sheer imbecility or deliberate knavery. And at the very moment that we are being told of the good done by the War, and its beneficial effects on the lives of men, the papers are full of accounts of a growing immorality, and committees and judges are warning us of the outbreak of immorality that may be expected when the troops come home. A determination to go through with the War is understandable, so is the conviction that we were bound to enter the War, and that we are fighting for laudable objects. All these things are, we repeat, understandable. But to speak of the present wholesale slaughter of human beings, the ruin of thousands of homes, the sacrifice of one civil liberty after another, and the orgy of hatred, lying, and misrepresentation that the whole of Europe has witnessed for over two years and a half as doing good is, in itself, a decisive disproof of the War's moralizing influence.

The vicar of Burton Wood is annoyed that women talk in church instead of paying attention to his sermons. He advises them that it "is better to knit for Jacks and Tommies in sermon time than to talk, whisper, laugh, and giggle, flirt, and misbehave, to judge our neighbours, to criticize hats, gowns, and fur coats." Perhaps a change of parsons in favour of one who could preach sermons sufficiently sensible to command attention might serve the purpose for which knitting is recommended. But why can't the women do their knitting at home?

The Master of the Temple, preaching in the Temple Church, said he was quite convinced of the existence of an evil spirit, active in the world; but to go beyond that and to particularize on the form of that activity was to enter the realm of superstition. That is, we ought to believe in an evil spirit, so long as we refrain from saying what it is like, where it is, or what the Devil it is doing. That, we admit, is religion. Be hazy in your thinking, and indefinite in your speech, and you will continue religious. And the Master of the Temple is an educated man talking to an educated audience!

"Clergymen will be accepted for agriculture and other forms of national service," says the editor of an evening paper. The trouble is that these Christian gentlemen are so coy in making advances.

A deputation from the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress recently waited upon Lord Derby at the War Office and urged the removal of the exemption from military service granted to the clergy, of whom there are 50,000 in this country. Lord Derby replied that this was a matter for the House of Commons. The men of God will breathe more freely on hearing this.

That the Government religion is hedged around with Acts of Parliament, and is a slave of Parliament, is seen in the Bill now under consideration by the Upper House authorizing the omission of certain services on account of war conditions. And Parliament, be it noted, is composed of representatives of many religions, and no religion.

The Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, Cardinal Bourne, has advised the faithful to continue to abstain from flesh-meat on Fridays. Presumably, those who fail to observe the restriction will have a prolonged fry-day when they die.

The clergy, who are pretending that London's morals are those of Sodom and Gomorrah, have upset some of their own supporters by their hysterical nonsense. Mr. A. C. Cotton, speaking at Southwark Diocesan Conference, said: "I have known London for over seventy years, and I say clearly that, compared with fifty years ago, London is an open-air Cathedral." The clergy will wish Mr. Cotton in the place they so often mention in sermons.

On the one side the clergy have been busily engaged, in their capacity as recruiting agents, in dwelling upon the access of moral strength the nation has derived from the War. On the other side we have been warned—often by the same parties when they have had other ends in view—of the increase of immorality produced by the War. The public may, therefore, take its choice of either view, or adopt both. But on this latter view the eminent surgeon, Sir Malcolm Morris, remarks in connection with the spread of venereal disease: "It is greatly to be feared that these figures, appalling as they are, have been seriously augmented since the War, owing to what can only be described as the wave of immorality which has swept over the country. Excitement, hysterical sentiment, intemperance, unbridled control, as well as lust, have helped to break down the ordinary barriers and safeguards. Opportunities and temptations to indulge promiscuous passion have been multiplied, with most disastrous consequences to the youth of both sexes, but especially to the young, vigorous, and often inexperienced manhood of our country and Empire who have joined the colours." Thus do the moralist and the pathologist administer quite unconsciously, a "knock-out" blow to the parson, and at the same time help to kill a piece of cant that must be killed if armed conflicts between nations are to be replaced by civilized intercourse.

Digitized by Google

The police have been very active of late in dropping down on fortune-tellers, crystal-gazers, and a number of spiritualistic mediums. For our part we do not see that much good at any time can come from such prosecutions. Folly will out, and the real cure for such things is to lift the public above them. And we quite agree with the letter from Major Warren, in last week's Freethinker, that, in many respects, the hostility shown towards spiritualistic mediums by preachers and religious newspapers is motived by professional jealousy. Why one person should be prosecuted for claiming to provide messages from the dead, and another person should be allowed to receive money for saying prayers for the benefit of the dead, and others get large salaries for performing, among other things, magical hocus-pocus with a little bread and wine, is puzzling until one remembers what an amount of stupidity is always current.

What essential difference is there between the thaumaturgist in Bond Street and the thaumaturgist in the pulpit? None we can see, save that in the one case the income is precarious and in the other assured. But both trade upon human ignorance and fear, both pretend to a knowledge of the unknown which we are quite certain neither possess. And can it be wondered that while the Churches have done, and are doing, so much to encourage superstition in general, that it should manifest itself in directions not contemplated by those teachers of superstition as established by law. After all, the only true distinction between religion and superstition is that pointed out by Hobbes. Religion is superstition allowed—superstition is religion disallowed.

It is well known that different and more or less conflicting schools of religious thought and practice exist and assert themselves in the Anglican Church. For some months the question of the reservation of the Sacrament has been diligently discussed in the columns of the Church Times; and in its issue for February 16, there is a lengthy report of a debate on the subject which took place in the Upper House of Convocation. To outsiders, whose acquaintance with the theme is purely academic, the controversy seems unspeakably silly. The reservation is primarily intended for the sick, and the idea is to set apart at the open Communion in the Church "so much of the Consecrated Bread and Wine as shall serve the sick person (or persons), and as many as shall communicate with him (if there be any). And, the open Communion ended, he (the priest) shall on the same day and with as little delay as may be, go and minister the same." It appears from this that the consecration holds good only for a very short period. The sick must receive the Sacrament on the very day of consecration, or all its virtue will have gone out of it. One night's exposure might destroy it altogether.

The point on which the Church seems hopelessly divided is whether the Reservation of the Holy Sacrament is to be allowed "under such conditions as suggest that the faithful should habitually 'visit' it as an object of devotion and worship." Here the Bishop of Oxford parts company with the Catholic party, which until recently he was supposed to represent. He would prohibit Reservation for any purpose whatsoever other than that of communicating the sick. The Bishop of London favours the idea of reserving the Sacrament in tabernacles or monstrances, to which the devout should enjoy free access. And thus the disputation proceeds, and is entirely concerned with mere shadows, with matters that lie completely outside the sphere of knowledge, with gorgeous illusions which obscure the genuine realities of life, and whose only contribution to human welfare consists of empty ghostliness, as to the real nature of which no two persons agree.

It has often been pointed out in these columns what a large proportion of present-day novelists are Freethinkers, or show a freethinking tendency. In itself it is an illustration of the truth that a virile art is always more or less allied with scepticism. Now, in the Church Times, we have the admission, by way of hostile criticism, that a large number of contemporary novelists are hostile to Christianity. We are not concerned, for the moment, to discuss whether the Church Times' view of the character of modern novelists is correct or not. It is the admission as to their heresy which is interesting:—

> They have acquired a smattering of psychology, of sociology, of medical science, and believe themselves omniscient. In particular, they display an ignorance of the spiritual factor in mankind that would be ludicrous if it were not tragic. The blunt truth is that a morbid dwelling upon animalism has atrophied their own powers of spiritual perception. They take every opportunity of deriding the Church. They assume that every person of intellect regards it as based upon effete superstitions. They view its clergy with supreme contempt—a contempt which, did those of real life resemble the clergy figuring in these novels, would be amply deserved. They take for granted—as certain society journals take for granted—that churchgoing is a practice utterly outside the normal life of to-day of all people of intelligence.

It no doubt sounds serious to be told that one's spiritual nature is blunted; but, as the C. T. understands "spiritual," we hardly suppose it will disturb those against whom the charge is made.

Middlesex Hospital has decided to abolish a bye-law which stipulates that the superintendent and officials shall be members of the Church of England. We hope this means that in future no religious test of any kind shall be imposed upon officials. To merely extend the regulation so as to admit all Christian sects and exclude others is not much of an advance, although it is what many Christians court as progress.

In an appeal for funds the Salvation Army states that they are "helping young people to be straight and true." They do not appear to be very successful, for magistrates are overburdened with juvenile delinquents.

Mr. J. H. Shakespeare, President of the Free Church Council, advises ministers to ask their congregations to stay behind after the Sunday morning services in order to discuss the question of food production. Mr. Shakespeare, with a view to the implied desecration of the "Sawbath," says: "They will have no scruples about doing this if they remember that Christ fed the multitude, and that he asked the Pharisees whether it was lawful to do good or evil on the Sabbath Day." This is very ingenious; but we would remind Mr. Shakespeare that Christ did not call a committee to discuss how to grow food; he simply took a few loaves and fishes, and fed a multitude. The job was simple—to him. It is not quite so simple with us. And we do not see that his example helps us in any way. Now, if Jesus were alive to-day, and would repeat the trick as, say, Parliamentary Secretary to Lord Devonport, he would be extremely useful

---

In the Divorce Court recently a decree nisi was granted to Mrs. Opie on the ground of the cruelty and misconduct of her husband, the Rev. W. M. Opie. The misconduct took place in a disorderly house near Piccadilly. The clerical mission, which is looking after soldier's morals, had better keep its eyes on the parsons as well.

A sermon by the late Canon Fleming, published in 1892, has realized £1,821, over 70,000 copies having been sold. No wonder a distinguished Frenchman said English people take their pleasures sadly.

Some of the Y.M.C.A. huts have been taken over by the Military Authorities. The soldiers will appreciate the change, for they will not be annoyed continually with inquiries concerning their eternal welfare.

The Temperance Council of the Christian Churches, comprising thirteen organizations, has issued an appeal for total abstinence, based on "Christian Citizenship." When will these parsons remember that the population of the British Empire is over 400,000,000, the overwhelming majority of whom are not Christians at all?

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

March 11, Birmingham; March 18, Leicester; March 25, Manchester; April 1, Portsmouth: April 8, Swansea.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—March 25, Avondale Hall, Clapham.

A. R. W.—Thanks. As soon as possible.

S. Leng.—People in a state of great emotional tension are very much more liable to unreasoning conclusions than when in a normal state. That is all there is in the spiritualistic "boom"—assuming that it exists.

J. Brown.—We note the Vicar of Biddulph has been lecturing on "Why I am not an Atheist." We do not know the gentleman, but we could hazard a reason. But we cannot see why, if the Vicar is able to lecture on the subject in a church, he cannot permit questions there. To meet questioners "by appointment" looks a trifle suspicious.

D. Richards.—We have no knowledge of any preacher named D. Charles Davies ever having debated with Charles Bradlaugh. That Mr. Davies "wiped the floor" with Bradlaugh we can readily believe. It was such an easy thing to do, and so many did it—or said they did. Anyway, we compliment your friend on his imagination.

E. S.—Pleased to know that you think we "got right home" in our notes on the Bishop of Oxford in last week's issue.

E. Greenwood.—The subject is an important one, as you say. But we could form a better opinion if we saw a chapter or so of the proposed work.

Ivor.—We have no other information on the matter save such as we have already published. That seems to us quite enough for any unprejudiced person. We hope you will succeed in giving the pietists a lively time.

"Veritas."—We fail to see any connection between the teaching that "thinking good" helps and "thinking evil" injures—which are only valid as general truths—and the philosophy of "Christian Science." In your sense the teaching is wrenched to an illegitimate use. And in its legitimate sense it will not fit your teaching.

Miss Rhoda Lynd writes:—"I have read with pleasure the article in last issue by Mr. George Underwood. The example he quotes of Dekker's apologues is very interesting; but why did he not quote more of them? A page or so of the original would be more informative than ten times the amount of criticism. Not that I wish to undervalue Mr. Underwood's criticism which could not be bettered by any of the writers in the professedly literary weeklies. By the way, will you allow me to ask him if he will be so kind as to recommend me a few works of fiction in which freethought is given a prominent position; in which it is represented sympathetically or unsympathetically? I believe many of our novelists are, nowadays more or less freethinkers, but they do not seem to use their art to further the good cause. Is not that so?" We pass the suggestion on to Mr. Underwood.

Our last Australian post brought us two very flattering letters, one from an old subscriber, Mr. S. Brooking, who writes that "The dear old paper gets better than ever."—Another, a new subscriber, Mr. J. Jackson, writes: "I wish to add my appreciation of your paper, which is the best I read. I have been free from religion for two years, and the Freethinker is my principle food for thought. Its standard is a credit to you." We are very pleased to have such cordial support from old readers as well as new ones.

A. F.—Thanks for reports of Professor Alexander's lectures on Space and Time. We have read them with great interest, and we shall look forward to their publication in book form.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Next Sunday (March 11) Mr. Cohen lectures in Birmingham. The Town Hall has been engaged, and as this is a very large building, capable of seating several thousands, we hope that all local friends will do their best to make the meeting a success. The meeting will be, of course, well advertised, but personal effort is very effective on such occasions, and those who would care to help in any way should apply to the Secretary, Mr. J. Partridge, 245, Shenstone Road, Rotton Park, Birmingham.

The timidity of many English Socialists where religion is concerned is well known to most people in England, and it has earned the contempt of the majority of advanced thinkers—in the Socialist and other movements—abroad. And now we seriously ask our readers' opinion of the following incident reported to us by one whose word we have no reason whatever for doubting. On a recent Sunday some copies of the Freethinker were exposed for sale at two I.L.P. meetings in Liverpool. The sight was too much for many of the members. At one of the meeting-places some threatened to resign if the paper was permitted to appear there again. At the other place a heated discussion took place at such an outrage on the susceptibilities of members, and by an overwhelming majority vote it was decided to burn all unsold copies. Really, if burning copies of this paper gives the Liverpool members of the I.L.P. any pleasure, we shall be pleased to quote them special terms for large quantities.

But, again, we ask our readers, and especially those who are Socialists, what is their opinion of conduct that even a great many Christians would be ashamed of? The state of mind disclosed by such conduct is more than pitiable, it is contemptible. And if that is the temper developed by the I.L.P. teaching and associations, what is its value as an instrument of social reform? We could feel some little respect for these people if we believed they were really Christians. But we do not believe they are. Their conduct is dictated by mental cowardice, which lacks even the pitiful justification of convinced religious belief. If Freethinking Socialists have any real respect for either their freethought or their Socialism, they will realize it is high time that they let their opinions be heard, and made their presence felt. If the I.L.P. does not wish to have Freethinkers in its ranks, it should have the decency to say so. A Socialism that bows before a bigotry such as that displayed in the above incident, and hands the directions of its mental life over to Sunday-school teachers, local preachers, and opportunist parsons, is, so far as any valuable reform is concerned, damned beyond the possibility of redemption For the present we leave the subject, again asking the Freethinking members of these two bodies what they have to say on the matter.

We are pleased to learn that Mr. Lloyd had a very successful meeting at Nottingham on Sunday last. There was a well-filled hall, and, needless to say, the audience was delighted with the lecture. There was also a good discussion. We have good hopes of a very successful movement being founded at Nottingham. There are plenty of freethinkers there. All that is needed is their resolve to get on with the work.

The further restrictions on the importation of paper, with a still further rise in price, has initiated almost a revolution in the newspaper world. Some of the halfpenny papers are being raised to a penny, and penny ones to twopence. That is to be expected where the sole reason for maintaining a paper is a commercial one. But it is noteworthy of British public life that even this cannot be done without a display of cant. Some papers are frank enough to say that the price is raised because they can only be published at the old price at a loss. And that is a quite sufficient reason. But the Times discovers a moral reason for it. It is charging 2d. in order to reduce sales, and thus help the Government to save tonnage, is a spirit of pure patriotism. How much easier it would have been to save all the tonnage involved in producing the Times and suspend publication altogether.

Digitized by Google

For ourselves the outlook in the future is made the more serious by this new development, but we shall hope for the best. The Freethinker has no income from advertisements. (It is the falling off from this source that is chiefly responsible for the increased cost of newspapers, and not the rise in the price of paper). So we are free from anxiety on that head. But with paper three or four times the price the position is serious enough for a paper like the Freethinker, without capital and without reserves. Still we are determined to keep the Freethinker as it is, both as to size and price, so long as it can be done. And with the continued help of our readers we think it can be done. We shall shrink from neither hardship nor struggle. And every month we struggle through brings the War nearer to an end. And when the end does come the story of how we survived will make interesting reading.

We are asked to announce that on Wednesday, March 14, Mr. C. Saphin will lecture at Caxton Hall, Westminster, on "The Solar Origin of Christianity." The lecture will be illustrated by lantern slides, and admission will be free—with a collection. We do not know the time of the meeting, but we presume it will commence about 8 o'clock.

Mr. Israel Zangwill is to deliver the next Conway Memorial Lecture at South Place Chapel, Finsbury, on Thursday, March 8, at 6.30 p.m., the subject being "The Principles of Nationalities." Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., will preside, and admission will be free, except to a few reserved seats.

Mr. Edmond Selous writes to the Daily Telegraph of February 17 that his brother, the late Captain C. F. Selous, was a Darwinian evolutionist, and had no belief whatever in any creed, dogma, or revelation. Religion, as distinct from right conduct, did not enter into his thoughts, and he estimated men entirely by their characters.

"Forerunners and Rivals of Christianity."

A REVIEW OF DR. F. LEGGE'S BOOK.

BOOKS on Christian origins and on the Pagan and Jewish environment of Primitive Catholicism have been on the increase during recent years, though, of course, the War has lessened the amount of interest in the subject. The striking likenesses between Christianity and its religious rivals of the Roman Empire attracted the attention of independent thinkers so far back as the eighteenth century. Among the pioneer names of that date and of the earlier part of the last century those of Dupuis, Robert Taylor, and Godfrey Higgins are not the least noteworthy. At that time scattered notices in the writings of Christian Fathers and Pagan historians, poets, philosophers, and romancers comprised nearly all the data available for the student. The gaps in our knowledge of this particular past are still very great, and there is consequently a strong temptation to indulge in hasty generalizations and ill-grounded hypotheses. During the last half century thousands of inscriptions and bas-reliefs have been brought to light, which not only help us to fill in a considerable number of gaps, but have served to confirm the statements made by ancient writers.

In the light of these new discoveries, the problem of the rise of Christianity is being attacked with fresh vigour by many English and foreign scholars, who have made the cults of the Roman Empire their special study. Among the best recent works on the subject are Dill's Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, Cumont's Oriental Religions in Modern Paganism, The Mysteries of Mithra, and Legge's Forerunners and Rivals of Christianity.

It is with the last of these that this article is concerned. Dr. Legge's treatise, which is published by the Cambridge University Press, covers the period from 330 B.C. to A.D. 330. It is well worth a serious study, but the price (£1 5s.) puts it beyond the reach of most purses, especially in war-time.

The starting-point of Dr. Legge's investigations into ancient religious cults is Alexander the Great, and the profound changes, political and intellectual, brought about by his victories in the life of Egypt and Western Asia. The establishment of Greek as the lingua franca over so vast an area was not the least important. How greatly this assisted the progress of the Christian Church has been emphasized by historians and theologians time and again. Less attention has been drawn to the modifications of religious feeling and speculation resulting from the Alexandrian conquests. Among Polytheists the shifting fortunes of men are imagined to imply alternations of failure and success in the divine world. A conquering king is overshadowed by his conquering god, who reduces the divinities he has overthrown to the rank of servants or inferior allies. The rise of an empire is favourable to Monotheism, in the sense of a supernatural hierarchy culminating in a supreme providence, a king of kings and lord of lords. Of course, it does not follow that every god of the conquered will take a subordinate role in the pantheon of the conqueror. Another psychic tendency, which is probably quite as common as the first, is to identify deities whose attributes are similar. Among the philosophic few a lead is thus given to Monotheism, in the stricter sense, the doctrine that there is one God, whom men variously image and variously name, but who transcends every human conception. Some may even be induced to take the bolder step of Pantheism, which, indeed, is but an inconsistent form of Atheism, and the one God becomes resolved into the infinite substance of Nature, thinkable only under its myriad changing modes.

The fostering of a Monotheistic bias and the fusion of religious cults and creeds effected by the work of Alexander the Great are fully recognized by Dr. Legge. He further notes the growth of the spirit of proselytism, which necessarily flowed from the break-up of so many national and racial barriers, with the ideas that had depended on them. His own words are well worth quoting:—

> Before his coming we see the ancient world divided into separate communities, each with its own pantheon and forms of worship, and neither knowing nor caring greatly about those of its neighbours. But immediately after, all this is changed. The interchange of ideas between East and West has thrown the different religions of the world as it were into a melting-pot, in which the germs of a different grouping of the human race are dimly visible. The spirit of proselytism is abroad, and man now wants to impress his own ideas of the Divine upon his fellows.[1]

[1] Vol i., p. 26.

Dr. Legge may well declare, on the strength of these considerations, that "from the scientific point of view, there is none among the forerunners of Christianity who did more to prepare and make ready its way than Alexander."

A whole chapter, "The Alexandrian Divinities," is devoted to a delineation of the Egyptian cult of Osiris, or Serapis, and the goddess Isis, and to the modifications it underwent through the influence of Greek ideas. Our author deals, in a very lucid and interesting way, with its many resemblances to the less ancient Mysteries of Eleusis, which promoted the worship of Demeter, the goddess of the corn, her daughter Kore, and the babe Iacchos. Not less striking are the parallels between these cults and Christianity. The idea of a divine being slain by the powers of evil, or going down to the underworld and returning in triumph from the dead, is common to all three, and was, in fact, the central feature of those mystic religions of the Nearer East that were invading the Roman Empire at the time when the Christian Church was beginning to make headway. Dr. Legge, in drawing attention to the parallels between the Osirian cult and Christianity, discusses how far the latter may be held to have borrowed from the former. He denies the likelihood of any of the Christian doctrines having originated in this way, but admits the passage of numerous ritual elements from the worship of Osiris and Isis to that of Christ. He even goes so far as to surmize whether "the tenets of the Alexandrian religion may not have had some influence on the discussions which raged around the definition of the Divine nature and attributes at the earlier Ecumenical and other Councils of the Church. .....The conception of the Supreme Being as a triune god was a very old one in Egypt, and reappeared, as we have seen, unchanged in the worship of Serapis, Isis, and Horus."[1] But he holds that the "deepest influence that the Alexandrian religion exercised upon the Church was probably not direct, but through those scattered and heretical sects which, although finally condemned and anathemazed by her, yet ever acted as feelers by whom she obtained converts from among the heathen."[2]

Digitized by Google

To the extremely detailed study of these sects Dr. Legge now turns. They may be all summed up under the title of the "Gnostics," that is, the "Knowers," pretenders to a superhuman insight, not unlike the Theosophists of our own day. The Gnostics have been largely regarded hitherto as rebels against the Catholic Church; but, as a matter of fact, the first Gnostics were pre-Christian. They had much in common with Judaism, especially the less orthodox Judaism of the Dispersion, on the one hand, and with the Pagan Mystery Cults on the other. The New Testament contains many Gnostic ideas and terms, as well as protests, in the later books, against Gnosticism itself. The Gnostic doctrine of redemption, even the figure of the Gnostic Redeemer, may be traced to sources that lie quite outside historical Christianity. We may reasonably surmize, though Dr. Legge does not do so, that the identification of the Gnostic Redeemer with the Christ is due rather to Jewish than to Christian contacts. No one who has studied the phenomena of religious syncretism will deem it improbable that Christ, and even Jesus, were divine names, fraught with the conception of salvation, for some among the Pagans as well as the Jews before the advent of Jesus of Nazareth (assuming his historicity). As yet, however, we cannot demonstrate this.

Among the pre-Christian Gnostics, Dr. Legge ranks the followers of Simon Magus, the Essenes, and the Orphists. The last of these are traceable in ancient Greece at least as far back as the sixth century B.C. They based their teaching on forgeries attributed to the mythical Orpheus. Their system of moral culture was highly ascetic, purporting, by means of mystic sacraments and purificatory rites, to restore the human soul, after a long series of transmigrations, to the divine source from which it sprang. It had its dying and rising Saviour-God in Zagreus or Dionysus, with whom his worshippers sought to become one by eating the flesh and drinking the blood of a sacrificed goat or young bull.

In the chapters dealing with the post-Christian Gnostics, Dr. Legge considers the Ophites, the Valentinians, and the Marcionites, who clearly show the influence of the young Church. Many of the adherents of these sects did not entirely dissever their connection with Catholicism, for whose founders they generally expressed their veneration. The post-Christian movement, however, carries on the tradition of the pre-Christian, and is continuous with it in form as well as in spirit. Gnosticism, although a serious thorn in the Church's side, did her valuable service in acting as a medium with Paganism. The ceremonial of Gnosticism, such as the use of religious statuary, was, in large measure, only an anticipation of what Catholicism did in the heyday of its triumph.

I have no space here to do more than draw attention to the two excellent chapters in which Dr. Legge deals with "The Worship of Mithras" and "Manes and the Manichæans." The former religion, which came nearer to Christianity in its theology, its worship, and its ethic than did any of the other Mystery Cults, seemed at one time likely to become the established religion of the Roman Empire. Its decline was due, in no small measure, to the weakness of its organization.

The last great rival of Christianity was Manichæism, which, spreading rapidly from its birthplace in Persia, fought a persistent battle with the Church for a century or so; nor did it finally succumb until late in the Middle Ages. Manichæism was the only religion of the Roman Empire to possess a highly centralized organization like that of Catholicism, the Manichæan "president" of Babylon (later on, of Samarkand) corresponding to the Christian bishop of Rome. In this, no doubt, lies the explanation of its greater tenacity, as compared with other Pagan cults. The sociological lesson of the fortunes of the creeds shoud not be lost on Freethinkers. The form of a movement or a society is no less important than its objects and its spirit.

Dr. Legge avoids theological disputations, and leaves us somewhat in the dark as to his exact intellectual position. But the whole tone of his work is decidedly humanist, and his researches are conceived and carried out along thoroughly scientific lines. Dr. Legge significantly remarks that "if, per impossible, we could approach the origins of Christianity with the same mental detachment and freedom from prejudice with which we might examine" other religions, "we should probably find that the Primitive Church had no need of the miraculous powers which were once assigned as the reason for her gradual and steady advance to all but universal dominion."[1] This alleged impossible feat the Freethinker has actually accomplished. For him Christianity, like other religions, is a human product, and not a superhuman portent; and he is thus far more open to the arguments of men like Dr. Legge than any theologian can ever be.

A. D. Howell Smith.

[1] Vol. i., p. 88.
[2] Vol. i., p. 89.

[1] Vol. i., p. 361.

The French Revolution.

V.

Democracy Militant.

(Continued from p. 125.)

The Convention now addressed itself to another burning question, the fate of Louis XVI. The democratic party throughout France looked upon Louis as a traitor caught red-handed, and demanded his trial. A new batch of papers was found in a secret cupboard in the palace, and supplied the Government with fresh evidence of his treason, revealing the secret correspondence with Mirabeau etc., and corroborating the fact (if corroboration had been needed) of the King's collusion with the enemies of his country. After long discussion, it was decided to try Louis before the Convention itself. He appeared at the Bar on December 11. The preliminaries, with the prosecution and defence, dragged on over many days. The Girondists, though just as convinced of Louis' guilt as the "Montagnards," were snobbishly shy of regicide, and tried several shifts to get the King off. They proposed, among other things, to take a referendum of all France on the question of the penalty! Finally the Convention decided to take three votes: (1) On the King's guilt, (2) on the proposal for a referendum, and (3), if the referendum were rejected, on the penalty. Louis was pronounced guilty nem. con. The referendum was refused by a large majority. Finally, sentence of death was voted by a narrow majority of 387 to 334. The leading Girondists, who had striven hard to shirk the issue, voted for death when it came to the point. On January 21, 1793, Louis XVI. died by the guillotine. The Royalists continued to form projects of rescue up to the last moment. After the execution, one of the members who had voted for death, Lepelletier St. Fargeau, was shot by a Royalist in a cafe. He was given a great funeral, and reckoned as a martyr for the Revolution.

Digitized by Google

The execution of Louis XVI. destroyed the last possibility of reconciliation between the majority of the Convention and the Royalists, and, in this way, no doubt, it prolonged the life of the Republic. At the same time, it precipitated war with England: the English Government under Pitt was already alienated by the French annexation of Belgium, the opening of the river Scheldt contrary to treaty, and the "war on the world" resolution already mentioned. On learning of the King's execution, the French ambassador in London was given his passports. Holland and Spain also joined the coalition against France.

So long as the Republic appeared to be safe from invasion, the Girondist party continued in power, though damaged in prestige by the attitude it had cut at the King's trial. The "Mountain's" attacks on it were as yet only desultory, and mainly in retaliation for Girondist attacks on them. The serious opposition to the Government came from the democracy of Paris, by whom the Girondists were now thoroughly hated as social reactionaries and as political twisters. The working-class wanted to know when those measures of economic relief were coming, for which they had waited in vain for four years. The high price of living grew more and more intolerable, being aggravated now by war conditions. Agitators in the "sections," or ward-meetings, demanded the fixing of a maximum price for corn, demanded measures against profit-mongers and speculators, and abused the Government. These views, bordering on Socialism, were echoed by the municipality of Paris, which had been lately re-elected, and by Marat in his old L'Ami du Peuple, which had changed its title to that of Journal de la Republique. On February 25, after the Girondists had opposed a State grant to meet the distress in Paris, Marat wrote an article to the effect that, if the rights of the people were not an empty phrase, the forestallers of food-stuffs should be hanged at the doors of their shops for causing thousands to perish of want. A riot occurred, in which some shops were pillaged by the poor. The Girondist party attacked Marat in the Convention and called for his arrest, but dared not proceed further. Similar agitation occurred at Lyons, the second great manufacturing town of France.

Soon after this the war took again an unfavourable turn. General Dumouriez, who had never ceased to be a Monarchist at heart, was meditating treason against the Republic. At the beginning of March he allowed the Austrians to win a victory. Danton, who had been to Belgium to take stock of the situation, returned to Paris with an evil report. At the same time the peasants of La Vendee rose against the Revolution. The immediate cause of this was a new levy of 300,000 men for the Army. It has already been mentioned that the south and west of France did not yet feel the pressure of the war. This was particularly so in La Vendee and Brittany, where the peasants were fervent Catholics, with no love for the Revolution. When the levy was announced they rose, led by their priests, and began massacring all Republicans, constitutional clergy, and enemies of the Church that they could find. Thus the Republic was faced with civil war as well as foreign war.

Worse was to come. On April 3, Dumouriez replied to a commission sent to him by the Convention, by arresting the commissioners and handing them over to the Austrians. He then tried to induce his army to march on Paris and restore the monarchy, and failing in this, rode over to the Austrians with his staff. The Republic seemed, once again, to be beset with treason on every side.

The Convention was now forced to bestir itself. The men of the "Marsh," who were patriotic and not only Conservative, turned against the Girondists, who could do nothing but pursue their party feud while France was in danger. A new Revolutionary Tribunal was created, composed of judges and jurymen nominated by the Convention, to try traitors. To supervise the Ministry, and make the Government really responsible to the Convention, a Committee of Public Safety was elected, from which the Girondist party was excluded, and which became, for practical purposes, a Cabinet. Danton was the principal member. This step (April, 1793), marks the transference of political power to those who put the winning of the war first and foremost. It was also decreed that a maximum price should be fixed for corn, and that a compulsory loan and a highly graduated income tax should be imposed to raise money for the war. All these measures were carried in the teeth of Girondist opposition.

The party scored one last outward success. They demanded and carried, in April, an order of arrest against Marat for the article about forestallers already referred to. He was sent before the Revolutionary Tribunal; but, although that Tribunal as yet consisted of more or less moderate men, he was acquitted. The people carried him in triumph back to the Convention.

For some time democratic Paris had made up its mind that no trust was to be placed in the Convention so long as the Girondists had power to obstruct measures of public safety and essential reforms in the name of empty theories. The "sections" had begun to petition the Convention from time to time to decree the arrest and detention of twenty-two principal members of the party, including Brissot, the leader, Vergniaud, the ablest speaker, Petion, Buzot, Barbaroux, and others. The municipality of Paris and the Jacobins' Club (now entirely under the influence of Robespierre) associated themselves with these petitions. The Girondists induced the Convention to decree the formation of a Commission of Twelve, packed by their own party, to investigate the actions of the municipality. The Commission ordered the arrest of Hebert, a leading member and official of the municipality, and a working-class agitator named Varlet. This set the match to the straw. Varlet was a popular exponent of social reforms, such as the limitation of landlordism, and the confiscation of "unearned increment," which are now commonplaces of Radicalism, though, in those days, they inspired incredible terror and alarm. Hebert, a much less pleasant individual, edited a periodical called "Pere Duchesne." A sort of Bottomley of the Revolution, Hebert made it his business to "give the public what it wanted," and, like our modern commercial journalists, took the line of playing down to the lower tastes of his readers, interlarding his articles with the vilest slang of the gutter, and achieving circulation at the expense of dignity and decency. Though no Socialist, and, indeed, nothing but an easy-going fellow out for popularity, Hebert was feared by the Girondists, and arrested along with Varlet. Deputations from the "sections" forthwith demanded their release and the abolition of the Commission. The President of the Convention, Isnard, the most pig-headed and rancorous of the Girondist party, replied with a threat that if any violence were attempted against the representatives of the nation, "Paris would be destroyed, and the traveller would have to ask on which side of the Seine it had stood."

Digitized by Google

More than once in the Revolution it was proved that to threaten the people of Paris with awful penalties, if they did a certain thing, was the surest way to induce them to do it. The "sections" now openly prepared for a new insurrection. The release of Hebert, conceded under pressure, no longer satisfied them. Robespierre and the "Montagnard" deputies, who had hitherto stood aloof, now threw themselves into the movement. Robespierre detested Marat, Hebert, and the semi-Socialist agitation which they voiced, but was willing to support them against the Girondists for reasons of his own, which will appear later. On May 30, the delegates from the "sections" took their places in the municipal council, which became thus an insurrectionary body, and sounded the alarm bell. At this time-honoured signal for action the armed populace collected, and in the course of May 31 surrounded the Convention hall, and pointed cannon at the building. The Convention had to suppress the Commission of Twelve, and the Girondists escaped arrest for that day. But Marat and the "sections" were not content. They wanted to make sure of the business by breaking the Girondist party once and for all. Roland (who had resigned from the Ministry some time ago) and his wife were ordered to be arrested. Roland had fled, but Madame Roland was committed to prison. On June 2 the "sections" again surrounded the Convention, demanding the resignation or expulsion of the twenty-two chief Girondists. News had just come from Lyons that the wealthy classes in that city had seized the upper hand and crushed the workers, as the Girondists had wished to do in Paris; and the Parisians were taking no chances. Threatened by the "sections" and their cannon, the Convention decreed that the obnoxious members, and those who had formed part of the Commission of Twelve, thirty-one in all, should be excluded from its sittings, and put under guard in their own houses. Three were exempted at the last moment by the intercession of Marat—moderate in the hour of his victory. That there was no intention of taking the lives of the Girondists is proved by the fact that several "Montagnards" offered to give themselves up as hostages to the constituents of those members who were arrested. This offer was refused by the Girondists, who had no intention of allowing any compromise of the kind.

Those who regard a representative Assembly, however faultily elected, as the incarnation of democracy, will look upon the proceedings of May 31 to June 2, 1793, as an outrage on democracy. Yet let us submit these theories to the test of facts. The Convention was far from being a democratically elected Parliament. Theoretically there was manhood suffrage; practically, the system was that the people in each department of France elected an intermediate body, who, in turn, elected the deputies to the Convention. This obviously put a spoke in the wheel of popular representation, and was equivalent to "plural voting" and "co-option" at their very worst. Democracy, i.e., the accurate reflection of the general will in an elected body, can seldom or never be perfectly achieved; but to arrive at it even approximately, that body must be elected by the direct votes of all men and (as most modern democrats, at least, hold) of all women in the territory concerned, and preferably by proportional representation. From this point of view the events of May and June, 1793, are not a violation of democracy, but a rude, yet effective, example of direct democratic pressure brought to bear on an undemocratic Assembly.

Robert Arch.

(To be continued.)

Thought for the Morrow.

Our always lively contemporary, Business (a Monthly devoted to the Insurance Business), writes as follows on "Clericalism":—

> We have published in Business during the last few years a large number of paragraphs relating to the Wills of obscure clergymen, who have left huge sums of money. It is a popular belief that the clergy are poor, in view of their constant cadging—an art in which they excel. That belief is not based on fact. As a class, they are the richest professional men in England. It is the Curates who do the drudgery of the Parish Priest, and are unmercifully pinched by their bloated "nigger" drivers. These shorn lambs have no money for insurance, but their employers have, and plenty of it. Go for them, Mr. Agent. Dig a trench round them. They are always open to a good investment. Times are hard, but poverty does not afflict clergymen. The following advertisement indicates a curious appreciation of the realities of the present day in a country parsonage (says Truth):—
>
> > WANTED, December 15, Upper Housemaid and to Mend Lady's things; used to valuable china: two in family; five servants, including Under Housemaid; £30.—Mrs. de Kilpeck, Rectory, Corfe Castle, Dorset.
>
> A clergyman who can afford to keep six servants is obviously in a fit position to take out a policy to meet death dues, and there are thousands in the same position of affluence. And why not ask Bishops to increase their life assurance? They thoroughly believe in the system. The Bishop of London is a bachelor, but he may have poor relations, or may wish to provide a fund for the conversion of the Germans! Anyhow, they are all rolling in wealth. It is on record that 39 Archbishops and Bishops annually share £180,700 between them. They suggest that they spend their money in the upkeep of the dignity of their positions. That suggestion is not borne out by facts, as revealed in the Wills of departed Bishops. Twelve of these self-sacrificing heroes left a total of over half-a-million. Obviously, clericalism is a splendid field for the wide-awake agent, who can summon moral courage enough, and who understands ecclesiastical formulæ, to work this lucrative profession. Who will undertake it?

We are surprised that the editor of Business should look on the clergy as likely game for insurance agents. Their creed is to take no thought for the morrow, and to trust in a Providence which knows whenever a sparrow falls to the ground. Still, it is just possible that in these degenerate days some may indulge in an insurance policy—in case the attention of Providence happens to wander.

The brain of man is Jove's eagle and his lightning on earth—the title to majesty henceforth.—George Meredith.

Digitized by Google

National Secular Society.

Report of Executive Meeting held on February 22.

The President, Mr. C. Cohen, occupied the chair. Also present: Messrs. Baker, Brandes, Gorniot, Leat, Lazarnick, Neate, Neary, Quinton, Roger, Thurlow, Miss Kough, Miss Pankhurst, Mrs. Rolf, and the Secretary.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed. The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were admitted for the Kingsland, Liverpool, North London, and South London Branches, and for the Parent Society.

A further letter from the L.C.C., declining to accede to the Executive's request for a permit for the sale of literature during the coming season, was reported, and it was resolved to inquire on what grounds the Council now withdrew a permit held continuously by the Society from the first issue.

Arrangements were made for outdoor propaganda in London, and, in view of the heavy losses in speakers and workers occasioned by the War, it was resolved to recommend each Branch, whilst in no sense abating its efforts, to restrain itself to one meeting per day.

The usual circular notifying Branches of the Annual Conference on Whit-Sunday, May 27, was ordered to be sent out.

Mr. Cohen's recent visit to Manchester and other internal matters were discussed at some length.

The affiliation fee to the Secular Education League was ordered to be paid.

E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

LIKELY!

A recruit in one of the training camps vouches for the truth of the following:

One morning a squad of recruits were learning to ride on horseback. They were slow and awkward beyond the usual, and the Sergeant acting as Riding Instructor grew more and more irritable, rapidly exhausting the common stock of expressions and expletives used in the Army, as well as ordinary language.

Finally, he gave a stentorian "Halt!" and when the raw stuff had brought their horses to a standstill, he eyed them in silence, his eyes rolling and his moustache bristling. For a moment it seemed as if he would choke instead of speak, then he calmed himself and said: "My Gawd! If Christ rode into Jerusalem the way you have ridden this morning, I don't wonder at the Jews crucifying him!"

MODERN.

A Sunday-school teacher in the East End of London tells the following anecdote:

The school is run on modern lines, and one method adopted is to call upon a pupil to stand before the class and recapitulate the lesson, or tell a Bible story in his own words. A boy was engaged doing the latter, his subject being Abram offering up his son Isaac as a sacrifice. The scholar proceeded fluently, the attention of the class was kept, and though his language was idomatic and even racy, he went on so well that the teacher refrained from comment or interference.

The story drew near its end. Every eye in the class was rivetted on the reciter, every ear listened carefully. With a slight gesture the lad concluded: "And Abram heard a voice from heaven saying, 'Abram, Abram, lay not thy hand upon the lad. God was only swanking.'"

Obituary.

We regret to announce the death of Mr. E. Fulcher, an old member of the West Ham Branch N. S. S. He was at one time an alderman of the local Council, and did good work for Labour and Freethought. He was one of the most ardent supporters of the late Mr. Keir Hardie in politics, and Mr. G. W. Foote in Secularism. Many old residents of the neighbourhood will have pleasant recollections of Mr. Fulcher's universal goodwill and manner.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

Indoor.

North London Branch N. S. S. (St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, off Kentish Town Road, N.W.): 7.30, Debate, "The Teachings of Samuel Butler." Introduced by H. J. Stenning.

South London Branch N. S. S. (Avondale Hall, Landor Road, Clapham, S.W.): 7, Open Debate, "Is the Bible Worth Preserving?" Introduced by J. R. Duncanson, affirmative.

Mr. Howell Smith's Discussion Class (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Thursday, March 1, at 7.30.

Hyde Park: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Dales and Kells; 6.30, Messrs. Shaller and Yates.

COUNTRY.

Indoor.

Leicester (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate); 6.30, Thirty-sixth Anniversary of the Opening of the Hall.

Liverpool Branch N. S. S. (Clarion Cafe, 25 Cable Street): 7, J. Hammond, "Spiritist Absurdities."

MR. ISRAEL ZANGWILL will deliver the Eighth Conway Memorial Lecture at South Place Chapel, Finsbury, on Thursday, March 8, at 6.30 p.m., the subject being "The Principle of Nationalities." Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., will preside. Admission free; reserved seats 1s. each, to be obtained from the R. P. A., Ltd., Nos. 5 and 6 Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C. (by post 1s. 1d.).

FOREIGN AUTHORS' LITERARY AGENCY.

ENGLISH MANUSCRIPTS OF FOREIGN AUTHORS Revised for Publication by English Author and Journalist, contributor to leading periodicals. Expert Proof-reader, able to see through the Press any large or small book. MSS. of Articles, Stories, Plays, Poems, Translations, etc., put into final English for submission to Editors. Typing if required. Lessons given in English Reading, Writing, and Speaking.—Address, "Authority," c/o the Freethinker, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

Post Free Three Halfpence.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster, S.W.

RATIONALIST PEACE SOCIETY
38 CURSITOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

President: The Rt. Hon. J. M. Robertson, M.P.
Chairman: Mrs. H. Bradlaugh Bonner.

The Rationalist Peace Society was formed in 1910 to carry on a propaganda in the interest of International Peace on essentially and avowedly Rationalist lines, without reference to religious sanctions of any kind. The annual subscription is fixed at a minimum of one shilling.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

Teh Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(Postage ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp. ...	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 58 pp.	,, 1d.	0	3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	3
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 8. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp....	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Mangasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 82 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 82 pp.	Nett. ,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. LEA.
In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
By E. A. ASHCROFT.
440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By CARVETH READ.
8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.
By D. B. HART, M.D.
Crown 8vo. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

THE THEORIES OF EVOLUTION.
By YVES DELAGE.
1912. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.
For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. MILL.
Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

HISTORY OF THE TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.
By C. D. COLLET.
Two vols., published at 7s. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By CHAPMAN COHEN.
Price 1s. net, postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By G. W. FOOTE.
First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. WHEELER.
Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all aws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 1,860

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 10 SUNDAY MARCH 11, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
The Vitality of Lies.—The Editor	145
Faith.—J. T. Lloyd	146
Most Unnatural History.—Mimnermus	148
Science and Spiritualism.—W. Mann	148
Archer on Spooks.—Keridon	150
Acid Drops	150
To Correspondents	153
Sugar Plums	153
The Emergence of Man.—T. F. Palmer	154
Our Dreams.—William Repton	155
Critical Chat.—Lucian	156
Death of Mrs. Charles Pegg	157
Letters to the Editor—The Cry of Anguish of the Church, 157; Liverpool I.L.P. and the "Freethinker"	157
The Reflections of Riquet (A Dog).—Anatole France	158
Notice of Meetings	158

Views and Opinions.

The Vitality of Lies.

Last week we wrote on the impossibility of perpetually suppressing the truth. It will only serve to keep the balance true if we dwell this week upon the persistency of a legend and the vitality of a lie. In a sense they are two sides of the same thing. All history shows how difficult it is to kill a legend, and daily experience proves that if we once give a lie ten minutes start it will take truth ten years—or more—to overtake it. And if the lie chimes with a current prejudice or prevalent expectation the chase is likely to be a long one. It is thus that every legend brings its cloud of witnesses. In the days of belief in witchcraft one could find plenty of witnesses who had seen old women careering through the air on broomsticks. In the opening months of the War thousands of people saw a Russian army pass through Britain on its way to France. It is hard to kill a lie when it is of the ordinary kind; when it is a religious lie it as nearly achieves immortality as is possible to any human creation.

* * *

France and the Revival of Religion.

Want of space prevented our noticing last week an article in the Daily Chronicle, by Major Redmond, M.P., on "The Great Revival (of Religion) in France." After being a year with the Army in France, Major Redmond is convinced that there has been "at least one beneficial result from the War. It has led to the revival of religion in a most remarkable way." Concerning England, the Major is content to observe that "everyone is agreed on this," and that "it is apparent in a hundred directions." One wonders who "everyone is." Many of the clergy deny it flatly. They lament that the expected revival has not occurred. Church congregations have certainly not increased in numbers. Soldiers home from the Front do not appear more religious than when they went out. We have published testimonies from scores of people, chaplains, soldiers, and writers who have testified that religion is undergoing an eclipse at the Front. Who are the soldiers who are becoming religious? Where is the revival in civil life? Major Redmond says he has seen it. So did our forefathers see witches travelling through the air. So did our contemporaries see a Russian army travelling through Britain. It is not at all difficult to see things—if one makes up one's mind that they shall be seen.

* * *

Evidence that is not Proof.

It would be unfair to Major Redmond to say that he does not produce evidence. He does; and it is of the usual religious variety. He finds it in France. Some of the French clergy have found the revival in England. And there is the same suspicious circumstance in either case. The miracle occurs where the writer's audience is not. It is the homage paid by legend to reality. So Major Redmond goes to France to discover something which French writers have failed to observe. He says:—

> To those who have been brought to France by the War the manifestations of religion everywhere displayed have come more or less as a surprise, especially to those who had been led to believe from the action of many successive French Governments that the Church was more or less a thing of the past in France. It is hard, of course, to judge of the real depth or intensity of religious feeling, but all one can say is that if this can be done by noticing the attendance at church, then the religion of France is to-day very true and very sincere.

Major Redmond also speaks of the bravery shown by French priests (he says that over 2,000 have been killed), and of the devotion shown by people at church services, etc. It should be noted, however, that the French priests have been killed because the French Government will not permit the priestly garb to serve as a reason for exemption, and because in France all citizens, lay and cleric, have the same duties and responsibilities. The French State is a Secular State, as the French State schools are secular schools.

* * *

A Biased Witness.

If one wanted proof of Major Redmond's unfitness for judging the effect of the War on French religious, or anti-religious opinion, it is supplied in the passage cited. Everyone who knows France is aware that the majority of French people are still professedly Catholic—particularly in the villages and country districts. Probably about a fifth of the nation are Freethinkers, although in disestablishing the Church in France this minority would have had the support of many others who saw both the injustice of a State religion, and the actual danger to the State the Church had been. Naturally a visitor to France—and one whose service with the British Army would have, of necessity, kept him away from the large cities — would have found many evidences of the existence of religious belief. And with equal certainty he would have seen the religion of the more superstitious peasantry and provincials intensified by the disasters which have overtaken France. The same cause which stimulated the mental activities of the educated and intelligent would, at the same time, numb the minds of the less educated, the less intelligent, and the naturally superstitious. This is all that Major Redmond's evidence amounts to. If he saw more, it was because he went ready to see more. If he was surprised at seeing this much, it is evidence only of how little he understood either the French character or the position of affairs in France in relation to religion.

Digitized by Google

* * *

Anti-Clericalism and Freethought.

Now, it is very likely that, so far as mere anti-clerical feeling is concerned, some Frenchmen may have had their bitterness toward the clergy toned down by discovering worthy men under the priest's robe. And if that is the case, it is all so much to the good. But to talk of this, or to see in this a great revival of religion, is downright absurdity. And may not this discovery be, so far as Major Redmond is concerned, a mare's nest? If he has been under the delusion that every Freethinker must regard every priest as a scoundrel, he will naturally view the discovery that a Freethinker will treat a priest who proves himself a good man with consideration and respect as epoch-marking. Freethought does not depend for its existence upon there being bad priests, nor can it be killed by every priest becoming a paragon of goodness and courage. A Freethought which depended upon the character of the clergy for its being would not be worth having. Whether English or French, Freethought is quite independent of the character of those who profess a faith in religion. The character of believers, the peculiarity of their mental processes, may be used to point a moral, but it has nothing to do with the development of Freethought. People did not give up the belief in witchcraft because they believed that those who upheld it were cowards, or liars, or rogues; but because their own mental growth had carried them beyond the stage of a belief in broomstick-travelling old women. And that principle holds good of every phase of the relation between Freethought and religion.

* * *

French and English.

To imagine that French Freethought, with its army of brilliant intellects, from Voltaire to Anatole France, rested upon whether clergymen were good men or bad ones, is a notion that could only live for five minutes in the brains of a man who lacked all comprehension of the meaning of Freethought, or of the historic and mental processes by which religion is outgrown. And such a notion is supremely ridiculous when we are dealing with the French intellect. For it is one of the most logical and the most fearless in Europe. It is never afraid of its conclusions, never afraid of pushing ideas to their logical issues. It is these features which, in spite of lapses, has kept France Republican since 1789. They enabled it to deal with the Dreyfus case in a way which converted what threatened to be a national disaster into a cause of national strength. It is this directness of thought, this ability to look clearly at the logical issue of a controversy, that makes the French people the most practical in Europe. They are very practical because they do not neglect the things of the mind. They do not neglect the things of the mind because they are practical. This the average Englishman, with his rooted distrust of intellectual processes and his eternal fumbling after a compromise, cannot and will not understand. And the result is, that he prides himself on being less "flighty"—or, to use Major Redmond's phrase, "impressionable"—when in reality he is afflicted with mental timidity, and more practical, all the time that his dislike to logical issues leads for generations to the delay of much-needed reforms.

Our Freethinking Ally.

Perhaps a powerful factor in the situation is that while the nation with a Christianity nearest our own is our bitterest enemy in this War, and has distinguished itself by every possible brutality, the nation with which we are in closest alliance has for years been associated with the strongest manifestations of Freethought. France is a secular State. It has no religion in its Constitution; it has no religion in the schools. Its best brains in art, in science, in politics, are definitely freethinking. And what are British Christians to do? Before the War they were pointing out that the new generation of Frenchmen were degenerate because they had been brought up in "godless" schools. French politics was corrupt, because it had no State Church. The French were "decadent"; hence their rejection of religion. The War came, and showed France as healthy, as great, as ever. What were the pietists to do? They dared not say they were wrong; that they were merely lying for the greater glory of God. And yet some explanation must be found. At length it was discovered. There had been a great revival of religion in France. That accounted for everything. And the story does account for a deal. It shows that Christian tactics, whether a nation be at war or at peace, remains the same. It is no wonder that even believers talk of "Christian truth." There is certainly something about "truth" as told in the interest of Christianity which deserves to be distinguished from that which passes under that category.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Faith.

FAITH is a word to which are attached many different and divergent meanings, though, primarily, in most languages, it signifies honesty, veracity, reliableness, trustworthiness. In Biblical Hebrew, for example, the primary sense of the term is retained throughout. Even in the famous passage (Habakkuk ii. 4), "The just shall live by his faith," a more accurate rendering would be, "The righteous shall remain alive by his faithfulness." In short, faith in the sense of trust or belief in God as the sole condition of salvation, does not occur in the Old Testament at all. On entering the New Testament, however, we find that the signification of faith has undergone a decided change. The Gospel Jesus began his public ministry with this declaration: "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the Gospel" (Mark i. 15). Here the literal rendering would be, "Have faith in the Gospel." In the Epistles, also, faith is represented as an act of the mind, with God or Christ as its object. In several passages (Gal. iii. 26; 1 Tim. iii. 13) the expression is "Faith in Christ Jesus." In the Pauline Epistles faith is spoken of as the only condition of salvation. In the Pastoral Epistles we get nearer still to the conception of faith for which the orthodox Church has always contended. It denotes the assent and consent of the mind to the truth of the Christian Gospel, trust in, and reliance upon, the finished work of the Redeemer; or a whole-hearted acceptance of, and confidence in, the Christian creed. This is also the meaning of the term in the Epistle of Jude or Judas. The readers are solemnly enjoined "to contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered unto the saints," and to build themselves up on their most holy faith. Beyond a doubt, by faith here is to be understood the sum total of what early Christians verily believed. It was their bounden duty to defend what had been delivered to them once for all, to defend it in argument as well as in conduct, and to recommend it to their fellow-beings as worthy of all acceptation. Jude has in mind those who oppose the Gospel as unworthy of credence, "denying our only Master and Lord Jesus Christ." This is admitted by so advanced a thinker as Dr. Fort Newton, minister-elect of the City Temple, in a notable sermon which appeared in the Christian Commonwealth for February 28. Dr. Newton says:—

Digitized by Google

> Let us never forget that Christianity is first, last, and always a faith. It may be a philosophy, a philanthropy, a prophecy, but it rests on a great adventure of soul, a grand affirmation. So does science, as Huxley has told us. So does philosophy, as Spencer admits.

We have no quarrel with that definition of Christianity, faith in which is, indeed, a great adventure of the mind. Christianity stands before us as an object of belief or disbelief, and both belief and disbelief are equally intellectual attitudes. But Dr. Newton cannot refrain from calumniating unbelievers falsely on moral grounds. He observes:—

> Here, as always when the word faith is used in the Bible, the emphasis is moral, and in no sense ecclesiastical or dogmatic. Manifestly it is not a dogma but a devotion, the covenant with purity, the citadel of all the sanctities of the moral and spiritual life. The enemies named are not heretics who may use other words than our own, but "filthy dreamers," who defile all things holy, turning even the grace of God into lasciviousness; men professing the faith with unctuous words, but living like brute beasts. Always the real Atheists are not those who deny our idea of God as unworthy or unequal to the facts, but those practical Atheists who pollute the pieties of life to the service of their own greed or lust.

As a matter of fact, the opponents of the faith in Jude's day were heretics. In the estimation of believers the sin of sins has ever been unbelief or denial. Whether within or without the Church, unbelievers in the Lord Jesus must be denounced in the most scathing terms obtainable. Of course, it is taken for granted that they are dishonest and wicked, that the love of truth is not in them, that they have sold themselves to the Devil, that there is no depth of iniquity into which they cannot descend, and that nothing awaits them but everlasting confusion and shame; but the fountain out of which flows the river of their filth and foul iniquity is their denial of "our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ." Tennyson speaks of "honest doubt," in which "there lives more faith, believe me, than in half the creeds," but in Jude's opinion, doubters blossomed into deniers, who are "hidden rocks in your love-feasts when they feast with you, shepherds that without fear feed themselves; clouds without water, carried along by winds; autumn trees without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots; wild waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame; wandering stars, for whom the blackness of darkness is reserved for ever." Exceedingly eloquent is that delineation of the character and deeds of deniers of the Saviour God; but it is a purely fanciful picture of people whom the writer hated and despised simply because they did not share his faith.

Dr. Newton declares that not only is Christianity a faith, but also that it is a faith for which we must fight. The natural inference is that the faith is in danger; but why should it be in danger if it is in harmony with reason? The reverend gentleman avers that it is not opposed to reason, but is reason's basis and inspiration. And yet he admits that its final appeal is not to mortal reason, but to "a Reason greater and wiser than our own." In other words, the Christian religion is neither the basis nor the inspiration of reason, but its systematic ignorer. The claim made on its behalf is that it infinitely transcends the reason, and that, therefore, we have no right to sit in judgment upon it. Such a claim is the most ridiculous that can be advanced, because our reason is the only standard of judgment known to us, that "greater and wiser Reason than our own" being purely a theological invention. We maintain, then, that the great enemy of the faith is the human reason, of which Atheism is merely the offspring. Dr. Newton's conception of Atheism is utterly irrational, being false. Listen:—

> An Atheist, if such there be, is an orphan, a waif, wandering in the midnight streets of time, homeless, and alone. Atheism, indeed, is seldom more than a revulsion from superstition, a protest against an unworthy idea of God, the dark side of a great positive mind in the negative side of faith.

Concerning that statement the only inference we can draw is that its source was abysmal ignorance. Moderate acquaintance with Freethought literature would have rendered such an assertion absolutely impossible. It is true that Atheism is a revulsion from superstition, but it is also true that there are hundreds of thousands of people in whose sight Dr. Newton's New Theology is as fully superstitious as the Old Theology. What Atheists reject is, not this or that dogma, not this or that idea of God, whether noble or ignoble, but supernaturalism, as such, in whatever guise presented. It evidently pleases the reverend gentleman to call them orphans or waifs, "wandering in the midnight streets of time, homeless and alone"; but he forgets that it is Christians who are "strangers and pilgrims on the earth," while Atheists claim Earth as their mother, in whose presence they feel quite at home, studying her laws, learning her ways, and looking upon themselves as brothers and sisters, whose one duty it is to love and serve one another. They live in and for time, while Christians profess to be preparing to live in an unknown eternity, when time is no more. Yes, it is Christians who roam, far from home, along the midnight streets of time.

Dr. Newton draws an imaginary line of demarcation between Atheism and Materialism, defining the latter as "the dread denial which would eraze, as with a sponge, all the idealisms, optimisms, and aspirations of humanity," "this horror of great darkness," according to which "all mind, all will, all emotion, all character, all love, is incidental, transitory, vain." Here, again, the preacher makes a pitiable exhibition of his unfathomable ignorance of his subject. The Materialism he describes exists alone in his own brain, and against those who are supposed to affect it he is guilty of bearing glaringly false witness. All things earthly are transitory in their relation to individuals, and yet seemingly endless as related to the race. Dr. Newton conveniently ignores this distinction. Atheists have their idealisms, aspirations, and some of them even optimisms, as well as Christians, with this difference, that Atheist idealisms and aspirations are on behalf of the race as it exists on this earth, and not for individuals as they may exist in some other sphere. We, too, walk by faith, but it is faith in the uniformities of Nature, and in the glorious possibilities already latent in humanity; and, as we walk, our faith is being gradually transformed into knowledge. We admit, with pride, that Atheism does obscure, and would annihilate, the Cross in which Christendom has hitherto professionally gloried, but it tends to strengthen and deepen the love of man for man, and to kindle in every breast a passion for making some contribution, however slight, to the common weal.

We do not believe that Dr. Newton intentionally misrepresents his opponents, but we do hold that he has no right to condemn them on entirely erroneous information; and his guilt is not cancelled, nor in any degree even lessened, by his ignorance.

J. T. Lloyd.

Digitized by Google

Most Unnatural History.

In religion,
What damned error, but some sober brow
Will bless it and approve it with a text.—Shakespeare.
Learning is good, but common sense is better.—G. W. Foote.

THOMAS CARLYLE, probably prompted by an unusually severe attack of dyspepsia, once drew upon his recollection of Shakespeare, and described man as a "two-forked radish." The term was more critical than accurate, and it would not have won the approval of scholarly Charles Darwin, or even of doubting Thomas Huxley. Yet Carlyle erred in most distinguished company, for if the Deity, who, it is alleged, inspired or wrote the Bible, could not recollect accurately such an elementary fact as that the whale is not a fish, although he is supposed to have made millions of them, there is every excuse for the sage of Chelsea.

Curiously, the writers of the Bible were most inaccurate, and were as careless of facts as politicians and Christian Evidence lecturers. They frankly contradicted themselves, and, when bankrupt of ideas, simply copied a passage written elsewhere in the same book and filled the vacancy. They frequently said the thing which was not, but their crowning glory was their knowledge of natural history, which was peculiar and extensive. Their mathematics would disgrace fourth-form schoolboys, their history was almost entirely imaginary, but their excursions into zoology were nearly too funny for words.

Wordsworth has told us that "Nature never did betray the heart that loved her." And this reminds us that there is such an astonishing discrepancy between the zoological conclusions of earnest students of nature and the so-called science of the Oriental writers of the Bible. The consideration of this difference affords us material for a few genial comments, entirely free from that acrimony so often imported unnecessarily into the writings of theologians.

In natural history proper not the veriest tyro, the most myopic bungler, would confound the hare with the ruminants. Yet dear religious folk would have us believe that the creator of Linnæus blundered about the hare chewing the cud, and fondly imagine that the maker of Cuvier wrote delirious jargon about clean beasts and dirty beasts. As a fact, it was actually reserved for mere worms of the dust like Buffon, Lamarck, and Darwin, to clear out the Augean stable of the divine ignorance, and to create the science anew.

Æsop and Bidpai, Phædrus and La Fontaine have assured us that everything talks from a potato-bug to a hairdresser. Even the taciturn tape-worm unfolds itself when in liquor. From their animated descriptions there appears to be an international esperanto. Surely the writers of the Bible could have effected the capture of the various animals as simply as sparrows are captured by salting their tales. A few minutes private conversation would then have verified the accuracy, or otherwise, of their extremely entertaining unnatural history, and thus saved commentators much ink and more headaches.

"Wild beasts used once to roam at will through the whole of England, but now very wild beasts are only found in theological gardens," wrote a juvenile writer. And "very wild beasts" are to be found in the sacred volume. Where else can you find a talking snake, a lodging-house whale, or a pigeon co-respondent? Where else are the fiery serpents, the dragons, the cockatrice, and the worm that never dies? Where, other than in the sacred zoological collection, are the bedevilled pigs, the four-legged fowls, the unicorn, the cherubim, the ventriloquial donkey of Balaam, and the menagerie of the Apocalypse? Even the "human beings" in the Bible act most strangely. Adam and Eve start life at full age. The lives of the patriarchs ran into centuries, and some fortunate persons had two funerals apiece. Some were so magnificently developed that ordinary folk looked like grasshoppers beside them. Among such a collection of "freaks" it is remarkable that cats are nowhere mentioned. Maybe the third person of the Trinity, that sacred dove, had an objection to that animal. The Bible menagerie likewise boasts of horses of fire which carried Elijah to heaven. There is also Aaron's rod that turns into a serpent and swallows other snakes. The leviathan, mentioned in "Job," is a wonderful creature, with its "comely proportions," its firework "neesings," and organs of vision "like the eyelids of the morning." And what is to be said of the kind-hearted raven who brought refreshments to the prophet Elijah? The Biblical menagerie is unique, there is nothing like it on earth.

These nonsensical ideas emanate from the Bible, and of all the strange, frantic, and incomprehensible books which have issued from the brains of theologians, this volume is one of the most remarkable. And the work which Freethinkers have set themselves is that of freeing their fellows from the absurdities of pre-scientific times, which are perpetuated by this fetish book. To class the Bible as a book of ordered knowledge is the last word in absurdity. It is a Salmagundi of riotous, exuberent, Oriental imagination. If people would only read the volume instead of worshipping it, such absurd veneration would be impossible. The first stage in the religious road to ruin is to regard such a comedy of errors as the truth and nothing but the truth. If the Bible had not been associated with a heavily endowed system of superstition, it would, centuries ago, have been consumed to nothingness in the echoless temple of universal science.

MIMNERMUS.

Science and Spiritualism.

Whoever seriously thinks that superhuman beings have ever given our race information as to the aim of its existence and that of the world, is still in his childhood. There is no other revelation than the thoughts of the wise.—Schopenhauer, "Religion and Other Essays," p. 117.

When science appeals to uniform experience, the spiritualist will retort, "How do you know that a uniform experience will continue uniform? You tell me that the sun has risen for six thousand years: that is no proof that it will rise to-morrow; within the next twelve hours it may be puffed out by the Almighty." Taking this ground, a man may maintain the story of "Jack and the Beanstalk" in the face of all the science in the world. You urge, in vain, that science has given us all the knowledge of the universe which we now possess, while spiritualism has added nothing to that knowledge. The drugged soul is beyond the reach of reason. It is in vain that impostors are exposed, and the special demon cast out. He has but slightly to change his shape, return to his house, and find it "empty, swept, and garnished."—Professor Tyndall, "Fragments of Science" (1876), pp. 321-2.

Ye too, believers of incredible creeds,
Whose faith enshrines the monsters which it breeds;
Who, bolder even than Nemrod, think to rise;
By nonsense heap't on nonsense to the skies;
Ye shall have miracles, aye, sound ones too,
Seen, heard, attested, everything—but true.
—Moore, "The Veiled Prophet" ("Lalla Rookh").

I do not believe even eye-witnesses when they tell me things opposed to common sense.—Voltaire.

THE War, with its relapse into primitive savagery and barbarism, has naturally led to an increase of the superstitions with which savagery and barbarism are identified. Finding no help in the cold, unregarding heavens, many have turned for consolation to the spiritualists, the clairvoyants, the crystal-gazers, and their tribe, who have been reaping a golden harvest.

Digitized by Google

So great is the scandal that the police have been obliged to interfere, instituting several prosecutions and obtaining several convictions of these charlatans battening on the nation's misfortunes.

It is the old pathetic longing for communion with the dead which is responsible for this revival. As we have said before, it is the longing for the continuance of this earthly existence in another world, or another sphere, that provides the driving-power of religion. If men were certain that death ended existence for them, they would not care a toss whether there was a God or not. They do not care a lot about him now. In that case he might just as well not exist at all.

It is among the parents and lovers of the multitude of young lives sacrificed in the European battlefields, the wives mourning their dead and grasping at the straw of Spiritualism in the vain hope of communing once again with the beloved, that these charlatans have plied their lucrative trade.

This revival of superstition is not so apparent among the uneducated lower classes—whose beliefs vary but little from generation to generation—as among the upper and wealthy classes; and they are kept in countenance in their superstition by a few scientists like Sir William Crookes and Sir Oliver Lodge. The daily papers, as usual in these matters, adopt the "sitting on the fence" attitude, with a decided leaning among the majority towards the supernatural. It is therefore desirable to consider the subject, and see if we can arrive at the facts of the matter.

But before dealing with telepathy and communion with the spirits of the dead, a consideration of the "physical phenomena" of Spiritualism will throw some light upon the subject, or at least will reveal the state of mind which leads to the belief in the supernormal; and we must remember that the "physical phenomena" of Spiritualism—which cannot be produced now for love or money—created a greater sensation between 1870 and 1880 than the "psychical phenomena" is doing to-day. Zollner, the famous Professor of Astronomy, with Professors Fechner, Screibner, and Weber, were converted by the physical manifestations of Slade, the medium.

Professors Richet and Lombroso, Dr. Ochorowicz, Sir Oliver Lodge, and Mr. F. W. H. Myers declared for the genuineness of the physical phenomena produced by the medium, Eusapia Paladino. Sir William Crookes fell to the wiles of Florrie Cook, who actually materialized a female spirit who allowed Sir William to walk about the room with her arm-in-arm, and actually allowed the gallant scientist, after first obtaining permission, to embrace her. Wallace, the great naturalist, also gave his adhesion to the same superstition. It is an imposing array of names, and Spiritualists make the most of them, just as Christians exploit the names of Faraday and Newton in the interests of their creed. No one will deny that these were really great men—that is, in the department of science to which they had dedicated their lives. It must also be conceded that they were also upright and honourable men; but, as has been shown,[1] a man may reach the highest point as a scientific investigator and yet go deplorably astray in matters outside his special studies. As Professor Jastrow has well observed:—

> There is a very broadspread notion that anybody can go to a spiritualistic seance and give a reliable opinion as to whether what he or she may chance to see is explicable as conjuring or not. Especially where the right to one's opinion is regarded as a corollary to the right of liberty, does this notion prevail. It is probably not an exaggeration to maintain that most such claimants are about as competent to form a trustworthy opinion on such a subject as they are to pronounce upon the genuineness of a Syriac manuscript. The matter is in some aspects as much a technical acquisition as is the diagnosticating of a disease. It is not at all to the discredit of anyone's powers of observation or intellectual acumen to be deceived by the performances of a conjuror; and the same holds true of the professional part of mediumistic phenomena. Until this homely but salutary truth is impressed with all its importance upon all intending investigators, there is little hope of bringing about a proper attitude towards these and kindred phenomena.[1]

Dr. Ivor Tuckett, commenting on Sir William Crooke's adventure with the materialized spirit, remarks: "Could one want a better example of an unscientific attitude in a scientific investigator? The fact of the matter is that scientific men, who are accustomed to accurate laboratory conditions and instruments, which do not lie or give rise to error—at any rate consciously—are no match for the subtle degrees of deception practised by Home, Moses, and Eusapia. Because the latter appear in their daily intercourse to be reliable, honest persons, the former cannot admit of their being on other occasions the authors of fraud. The soul of truthfulness themselves, they are quite unaware how impossible it is to postulate that anything done by that complex living mechanism, man, is absurd or inconceivable. On the other hand, they are somewhat to blame when they publish observations, bearing the imprimatur of their great names, and so likely to bias the public, which do not conform to their own standards of scientific proof."[2] Mr. Frank Podmore also observes: "The untrained eye is no match for the trained hand of the conjuror. The kind of observation demanded of the investigators at a spiritualistic seance—an observation which is alive to the various artifices employed to distract it, and which, if not actually unremitting, is at least aware of its own lapses—is a quality not called for and not exercised in the investigations of the physical laboratory, and not to be acquired, even to a moderate extent, except by education of a very special kind."[3]

Helmholtz, one of the very greatest scientific minds of the nineteenth century, recognized this clearly when he was once on a visit to England. The Psychical Society sought to interest him in the case of two little girls, the daughters of a clergyman, one of whom held up any playing card behind a closed door, and her sister on the other side described it. When told of this performance by a college professor who had experimented with the children, Helmholtz could hardly take him seriously. The professor, somewhat nettled, named some of his eminent colleagues in the investigation, and said they should be credited with enough common sense to test a thing like that; but finding Helmholtz still incredulous, he asked, "Would you believe it if you saw it yourself?" "Certainly not," answered Helmholtz; "in my investigations, if anything peculiar appears, I do not accept it on the evidence of my eyes. Before any new thing can be even provisionally accepted, I must bring it to the test of many instruments, and if it survives all my tests, then I send it over here to Tyndall, and to investigators in other countries. No, I would not believe any abnormal phenomena on the mere testimony of my eyes."[4] M. D. Conway, who narrates this, adds: "The scepticism of Helmholtz was justified in the case of the clergyman's daughters, who were

[1] The Religion of Famous Men.

[1] Professor J. Jastrow, Fact and Fable in Psychology (1901), pp. 147-8.

[2] Dr. Ivor Tuckett, The Evidence for the Supernatural (1911), pp. 62-3.

[3] F. Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., p. 221.

[4] M. D. Conway, Autobiography, vol. ii., p. 310.

Digitized by Google

detected in their clever trick." And it should be remembered that Helmholtz knew more about the mechanism and limitations of the eyes than any living man of his time, for it was he who invented the ophthalmascope, by means of which the living retina was first enabled to be seen.

What is required to test a Spiritualist seance is not a scientist fresh from the laboratory, but an expert illusionist and conjuror, well versed in tricks of sleight-of-hand, like Mr. J. N. Maskelyne, who has assisted at the exposure of many mediums, and who emphatically declares in his book, The Supernatural, "there does not exist, and there never has existed, a professed medium of any note who has not been convicted of trickery and fraud" (p. 183).

It should be borne in mind that a great number of equally great men have given their verdict emphatically against Spiritualism. Among them we find Darwin, Faraday, Sir David Brewster, Professors Huxley, Tyndall, and Clifford, Herbert Spencer, Helmholtz, Sir Ray Lankester, Sir Bryan Donkin, and Lord Kelvin. Few people, we imagine—outside his circle of personal friends—would consider Sir Oliver Lodge, as a physicist, the equal of Lord Kelvin, nor Wallace of Darwin; for, although Wallace was the co-discoverer with Darwin of Natural Selection, yet he honourably admitted that he could not have written Darwin's great work, the Origin of Species. Few competent judges would consider Sir William Crookes the scientific equal of Helmholtz, to say nothing of Faraday and Tyndall.

W. MANN.

(To be continued.)

Archer on Spooks.

A VAST number of the reflecting public betray no little astonishment that some people can discuss with straight faces the existence of spooks.

This astonishment is mainly due to the fact that the so-called messages vouchsafed to us by the spirits are uniformly of a trumpery or fantastic character. To many people the intrinsic puerilities of the "communications" are evidence enough in themselves of the utter vacuity of these mediumistic pretensions. So, by way of reply to this sceptical attitude, Mr. William Archer, a few days ago in the columns of a contemporary, took up the gauntlet on behalf of the spooks. The discussion arose out of his review of Sir Oliver Lodge's last sensational ghost-book—Raymond.

He tacitly admits the charge of their "messages" being trumpery, but pleads that the dear spooks are not to blame. The extenuating plea is, that in the case of good spooks—that is, spooks which have taken no part in any secret crime or possess no knowledge of value to the police or at the law-courts—there would be nothing of interest to communicate.

Lest it should be imagined that I strain his words, let me quote him:—

> As for the triviality of the communications concerning sub-lunar matters, why should that surprise us? If I were to die to-morrow, I should have nothing of slightest interest to communicate to my executors or to the police. I have concealed no treasure; I have had no part, either as principal or accessory, in any undiscovered crime.

Hence, messages from good spooks must needs, on this theory, be "trivial"; and, inferentially, we have no grounds for expecting them to be otherwise. He makes no allusion to wicked spirits—a strange omission, by-the-bye; for, on his theory, they would have something interesting to tell us. Are wicked spooks too few to be of any account? or is it that mediums never bemean themselves by communicating with them?

But surely the spooks, if they know anything at all, would know something of the nature of their own disembodied existence that would be of entrancing interest to multitudes of people, if not to "executors" and "the police"; for instance, to know how they recognize and communicate with each other in a "world" where there are no sense-organs and how they know their whereabouts in an existence that is assumed to be spaceless. These are problems that puzzle thousands who would consider any information on the matter as a revelation of first importance. Nevertheless, there is among the spooks, both good and bad, a well-kept conspiracy not to divulge a single secret of that dimensionless world. And Mr. Archer apparently approves of their plot.

His comment upon their equally inane predictions is as follows: "Why should we suppose that 'spirits' have any special power of reading the Book of Destiny?"

That is Mr. Archer's way of admitting that their prophetic pretensions are a piece of charlatanic humbug and imposture; and, at the same time, his way of excusing it.

If Mr. Archer desires to rid his race of the spook-monster, as on the whole he appears to do, I have no hesitation in predicting that he will never succeed by playing the role of spook apologist. A far more successful, as well as a more heroic, method would be to point out how the famous author of the book he was reviewing was morally more culpable than either Ranson, the Divine Healer, or Mrs. Brockway.

Sir Oliver not only induces the public to part with their half-guineas for a volume of spook "rubbish," as the Daily Mail describes it: but, by the high and prominent patronage he gives the imposture, he is mainly responsible for the crowds of credulous and often woe-stricken people that frequent the haunts of fortune-tellers and mediums. "Since Sir Oliver Lodge believes in them, there must be some truth in it"—and away they go! more induced by his loudly advertised example than by any attractive inducements offered by the "professionals."

KERIDON.

Acid Drops.

It seems that women will soon be allowed to practice as solicitors. A Bill to permit this was introduced into the House of Lords (which has really proved itself much more favourable to progressive ideas the past two years than has the House of Commons) by Lord Buckmaster and ordered to be read a second time. Naturally, Lord Halsbury opposed the measure, so did the Lord Chancellor, who voiced the somewhat banalistic argument that "Woman's proper work was to be wife and mother." By "proper," we presume, he meant "best," and in that we agree with him. For a woman who is a good wife and a good mother is doing the best work she can do. But there is no need to artificially bar any woman—even when married—from a vocation which she feels called upon to follow, and still less need to bar those who, from inclination or circumstance, never do become wife and mother. If a woman cannot succeed as a solicitor, there is no need to prevent her by law from qualifying. The question will settle itself. And if she can succeed, it is sheer sex prejudice to say she shall not.

The bottom truth is, that this opposition to women is due partly to religious prejudice, partly to sex prejudice, and partly to trades' union interests. And lawyers of all grades belong to one of the closest trade unions in the country. The legal trade must be kept select that fees may be kept high. That is really the kernel of the matter. There is nothing whatever in a solicitor's business that an educated woman may not master. And if it comes to making out a bill of costs, we have every confidence that she will make that as lengthy as any male could desire. The chief difficulty before ladies practising as solicitors would be to induce men to come to them for advice. For nineteen men out of twenty would have a very strong prejudice against doing so. Of course, it is sheer prejudice, but it exists, and has to be reckoned with.

Digitized by Google

W. Mackenzie, one of the Salvation Army chaplains with the Australian forces is a favoured individual. In the Weekly Dispatch for Feb. 25, he tells how on many occasions —six within one week—he has been saved from death by shell-fire through a voice telling him to "run at once." It is a pity that common soldiers were not equally favoured, but perhaps there is something in the Army Regulations which prohibit a man running at the command of a ghostly voice. We are inclined to believe that Chaplain Mackenzie was conscious of a voice telling him to run, and that he obeyed the order. But the War has evidently developed his imaginative powers as well as his abilities as an athlete.

"At a supreme crisis such as this in our nation's life, what right have we to talk about comforts, luxuries, and indulgencies," says the Bishop of Kensington. Yet 39 ecclesiastics share annually £180,700 between them, sufficient to keep 1,800 ordinary families in comparative comfort.

A mission-worker at Southend stated that at a kit inspection one of the soldiers was found to have a Bible among his belongings. There was some chaff at this, but the tables were turned when the captain ordered the company to parade past the kit in question and take it as a pattern. It sounds as true as the Gospels.

What a pity the high qualities evoked by the War are not equally manifest in youngsters. The Edinburgh Evening News joins the ranks of those who are lamenting the increase of juvenile wrong-doing, says (italics ours):—

> The War, by reason of the calliug up of fathers, the depletion of police forces, dislocation of school hours, spread of unrest, and darkened streets, has set in motion a wave of juvenile depravity. Hooliganism, too, is rampant among youths between 15 and 18, as almost anyone who is about in the older parts of the city at nights is well aware. It surely seems as if a conference of all concerned in the problem is urgently necessary. What in particular is the Church doing to grapple with juvenile sinners? Surely this is a moral question, if ever there was one—Who is the "children's minister" in our midst?

The Church is, as usual, studying its own interests. We suggest to the Evening News that the less the Church interferes in the matter the better.

Here is another telling paragraph from the same issue of the Edinburgh Evening News:—

> Parish ministers in the country districts must view the enhanced cereal prices with infinite gratification. The higher the prices jnmp the more substantial does the parish stipend become.....As a result of this remarkable rise stipends have been more than doubled since pre-war years. The pity of it, too, is that the activities of the clergy in the main have proceeded in an inverse ratio. It is no uncommon thing to find a man drawing £600 or even £700 a year preaching to a mere handful of people, and that in a populous village. It seems unfortunate that the Excess War Profits Tax does not apply to ministers: but even as regards local rates parish ministers are tenderly treated. It is not generally known that they are exempted by an old statute from payment of poor rates. That a minister should show the opulence of a munition worker is one of war time's idiosyncrasies. The man of the cloth ought certainly to make his contribution towards the needs of the State—or give value to his parishioners for the money received.

Our "spiritual guides" have a knack of looking after their material interests at all times.

The way the higher clergy risk their precious skins for their country is passing wonderful. The Dean of Bristol announces that he is leaving Bristol for the duration of the War to take up the chaplaincy of Army cadets at Cambridge.

Mrs. Maria Sawkins, of Deal, at the age of 101, is cutting some new teeth. This will not lower the record of Methuselah.

The opening of the new School of Oriental Studies at Finsbury takes from England a grave reproach. Hitherto, in the capital of the Empire, which counts 350 millions of Oriental citizens, there has been no such institution for the prosecution of such study. Paris had a school of Oriental languages over a century ago. This has a real bearing on the fact that English people reverence an Oriental fetish-book, whilst Frenchmen are so largely Freethinkers.

Principal D. L. Ritchie is quite right when he says that "the place where hope is ever born anew for the Churches is childhood." If a child is let religiously alone till he is well on in his teens, the probability is that he will go through life without religion. The Church must catch the children before they acquire the art of thinking, or she will never get them at all. No child has ever taken to religion as a fish takes to the water. Religion is contrary to nature, and nature must be broken to it by a long and severe course of discipline during childhood. This is why such vital importance attaches to Sunday-schools, and to religious instruction in day-schools.

The study of religious revivals is both entertaining and instructive; entertaining, because they are usually conceived and conducted on thoroughly scientific lines; instructive, because it elicits the fact that they appeal to and succeed in converting, not Infidels and Atheists, but only backslidden believers, the majority of whom are nominally Church members. Unbelievers may attend such emotional gatherings out of curiosity; but they are in such a state of mental health that the religious virus has no chance of inoculating them. They are supplied with a sufficient number of the right kind of phagocytis to consume all hurtful microbes the moment they enter into them. Even religious germs have their use in that, every now and then they furnish a thoroughly good meal for the hungry microphags!

The Government has taken control of timber. This should affect the heads of the Church.

The clerical misstatement concerning the Atheism of the Germans is being disproved by facts constantly. One of the latest brought to light is a leaflet issued by the Salvation Army, dated February, 1917, in which it is clearly stated that, prior to the War, there were 156 corps of the Booth organization in Germany. This will not stop the dear clergy from telling lies of the countrymen of Martin Luther, but some of the people in the pews may be able to judge of the accuracy of their statements.

The United Free Church of Scotland Fire Insurance Trust shows a profit for 1916 of over a million and a quarter sterling. Of course, we quite understand that all the Churches are fundamentally fire insurance societies; but it is not many of them who frankly declare their purpose and avow a profit. And how can they be quite sure that their clients are protected against fire, anyway?

The Bishop of Oxford says, "Democracy is the enemy that the Church has to contend with." The other bishops are not so frank, but their votes in the House of Lords show conclusively that they have always regarded the working classes as opponents.

The Mrs. Partingtons of the Churches will soon realize that they cannot for ever sweep back the tide of knowledge with their brooms. In the new volume on Genesis in the Cambridge Bible for Schools it is stated that "The narratives of the Origin of the Universe and the beginnings of the human race from a modern point of view are unscientific." The same thing was said by Freethinkers a century ago, but it is very welcome in a school-book.

Mr. Lloyd George has addressed an appeal to Free Church pastors and teachers to assist in National Service. The men of God evaded the Military Service Act, and it remains to be seen if they will do anything in the nature of work during the final period of the War.

Digitized by Google

At a recent sale in London, a fourteenth century medical manuscript contained a prescription for a plaster of sandiago, flex, and the white of eggs to cure a wound in four days. It added that a long Latin prayer and passages from the Bible should be read over the patient. Even this is an advance on the New Testament idea of handkerchiefs healing the sick.

The Rev. J. T. Stafford, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, has expressed surprise that colliers earned £12 weekly. The princely salaries of bishops has evoked no astonishment.

Is the Christian religion ending in smoke? At a Church meeting at Leigh-on-Sea the question as to whether incense should be used at the communion services was put to the vote, and carried by a large majority. These devoted Churchmen seemed to be unaware that 30,000,000 of Christians were in arms, and that their own country was in dire distress.

What a good thing it is that the Allies did not defeat Germany in the autumn of 1914 and the spring of 1915. It was quite "providential." That, at least, is the opinion of Archdeacon Wakeford, of Lincoln, who, as reported in last Monday's Telegraph, said that "if the war had ended in the first six months of the war with sweeping victories on land and sea for ourselves, by this time we should have become the rottenest nation the world had ever known." So it was "providentially" kept going for our benefit. That is the Archdeacon's philosophy of the situation. We are a great people. We have said it in hundreds of newspapers over and over again since the War started. We must be a great people, for God does not hesitate to keep a war in being that means the deaths of many thousands of people of various nationalities in order to prevent our becoming "the rottenest nation the world had ever known." Good God!

The Rev. Professor J. M. Thomson, of Oxford, is exceedingly broad-minded—for a divine. Reviewing a book entitled The Future of Christianity, by Mr. Crompton, he says: "Mr. Crompton takes the Christ-myth theory a little too seriously; but it is a fault on the right side." Evidently, then, Professor Thomson does not believe in the historicity of the Gospel Jesus, which is rather an awkward position for a clergyman to hold, but one from which there is no honest escape for the unprejudiced critic.

Of course, if the Gospel Jesus is not an historical person, all the doctrines of Christianity, such as the incarnation, the atonement, the resurrection, and the ascension, fall to the ground; and there is nothing left but the Christ-myth, which cannot be taken too seriously, not even seriously enough, by those who still pose as his Divinely ordained ambassadors.

The Leicester Watch Committee seriously offended the local Free Church Committee. It gave permission for some cinema exhibitions on Sunday in connection with the Kitchener Memorial, and the Free Church Council entered its solemn protest against desecration of the "Sawbath" "for the second time." We wonder what will happen if the Watch Committee offends a third time in this manner?

A correspondence in the local paper followed this protest—in which the Watch Committee's action was defended by Mr. A. B. Talbot and Mrs. N. Tole, and attacked by Mr. H. B. Bruce. Mr. Bruce feels quite capable of warning his fellow-townsmen of what the introduction of the continental Sunday means, because he has been on the Continent, and so proceeds to tell the people of the horrible things he has witnessed. We do not question Mr. Bruce's veracity. Most people can find on the Continent—or at home—as much vice as they care to look for; and the amount of evil that some English visitors discover in a place like Paris is apt to surprise the ordinary Parisian. Perhaps the best way for English visitors to avoid being affronted by these scenes of continental vice would be to always take their womenfolk with them.

About a fortnight ago there was a bad accident at Three Counties Railway Station, Bedfordshire. A lady attempted to leave a train while in motion, slipped, rolled between the train and the platform, and was so badly injured that she died soon afterwards. At the Parish Church, the vicar, the Rev. G. J. Mayhew, felt called upon to say something about this "dreadful tragedy," and this is the way he did it:—

> I do not think that in such calamities we can do more than look up and in reverence say "Thy Will be done."……In the first short report of the calamity it appears that some of the poor girl's last words were, "I want to go home to my mother." How wonderful here the instinct, immediate and emphatic, which is, we see, not broken by death. The desire in her great distress to be again with one who had comforted her childhood of years gone by—"Home to my mother." Those words, full of assurance, which now have been graciously fulfilled.

So it was quite "providential." The girl wanted to go home to her mother—who was evidently dead—and God "graciously fulfilled" her desire. Why, then, call it "a dreadful calamity"? When people can sit and listen to such rubbish as that voiced by the vicar, we have less cause for wonder that they should act foolishly in other directions.

The "Holy Land" seems to be in a bad way, judging by the statements in the press concerning a meeting at the Mansion House, in which the Bishop of London's name figured prominently. The paragraph states that "thousands are starving in the Holy Land at this moment. In one district alone the deaths from starvation number 80,000. Children are being sold in the streets for a shilling or two." It is all very terrible, but why does not the dear Bishop get on the telephone to his Master, who is said to have fed thousands of people with a few loaves and fishes?

From the Cambridge Magazine we learn that the Cardiff City Council has asked every teacher in its employ, male and female, to sign a schedule headed "Have You Conscientious Objection to Military Service?" This is in furtherance of a resolution passed by the Council that "No person who is a Conscientious Objector to Military Service" shall continue in the employ of the Council. The striking thing about this inquisition is that it is addressed to teachers—and to women as well as men. And, unless there is a desire on the part of Cardiff, that teachers shall actually militarize the minds of the children, what justification is there for such an enquiry? Surely the Cardiff City Fathers do not think the War will continue long enough for the children under its care to take a part therein, and that they must therefore begin to train them at once. And unless they do desire this, what reason is there for discharging a probably competent teacher because he or she has a strong conviction against militarism in any form? One would have thought it sufficient if the teacher had gone about his duties in a satisfactory manner without any reference whatever to militarism. And if we are really in earnest about our professed hatred of militarism, one would have thought that the best way to smash it would be to avoid copying Germany in using schools—in Liebknicht's phrase—as training stables for the Army. If we really desire the world to have done with war, let us begin with the child. That is the logical beginning of all vital reform.

Four thousand pounds was the fine inflicted on a Swansea J.P. for fraud in connection with income-tax returns. His counsel made an "eloquent appeal" on his behalf, pointing out that he was a prominent figure in the religious life of the community. The judge also dwelt upon the regrettable fact that the offence was committed by a man "who was forward in religious matters, a member of a Dissenting Church, taking part in the activities of that church, and a communicating member." We take it the regret was more or less formal. The judge's experience must have provided him with many illustrations of the truth that there is no very close connection between religion and integrity.

Forty-four of the City churches are to be closed for the duration of the War. The Daily Chronicle remarks that it will not be a great deprivation to those who find beauty only in ancient buildings. We daresay others beside antiquarians will bear up under the infliction. But we suppose the salaries of the parsons will go on just the same.

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

March 11, Birmingham; March 18, Leicester; March 25, Manchester; April 1, Portsmouth: April 8, Swansea.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—March 25, Avondale Hall, Clapham.

Frances Ivor.—Thanks. We hope to publish in the course of two or three weeks.

P. Friedberg.—Will look the matter up, and if we discover them, will publish the particulars.

H. Young.—We quite appreciate your concern for the Freethinker; but we believe we have the situation well in hand for the present. We agree with you that the bulk of our readers would cheerfully pay more for their paper rather than jeopardize its existence; but, again, you may trust us not to run unnecessary risks. Prices will steady again after a bit; then we shall be able to see where we are. And it is never wise to act in a panic. The struggle is a keen one; but we shall, we hope, pull through this year with not worse results than last.

E. E. Stafford.—Pleased to hear from you, and to know that you are making the best of Army life. Coming across so many avowed Freethinkers in the new Army must be quite an education to those officers who have always been in the habit of grouping recruits under one or other of the Christian denominations.

D. G. T. (Inverness).—Inverness is, we fear, rather too long a journey, and at present too expensive, for us to undertake a day's lecturing there now. Later, perhaps. The lines are certainly very apt.

Kepler writes, in response to Miss Rhoda Lynd's request for Freethought fiction, that he can strongly recommend Those Lynnekers, by J. D. Beresford. Miss Lynd will also be pleased to learn that Mr. Underwood has taken her suggestion, and has supplied us with a translation of some of Dekker's work, which we hope to publish shortly.

E. B.—Thanks; will prove very useful. The excuse must be that the "Tom Paine" was used quite innocently, and escaped us in glancing through the article.

C. W. Marshall.—In a way we are pleased you are so anxious as to the safety of the Freethinker. It is an indication of your interest in the paper. We are very pleased to have read the letters of those to whom you send copies of the Freethinker. Its being passed round in hospital and in camp—and appreciatively read—is a promise of good both for ourselves and for the Cause. We have no intention of altering either the size or price of the Freethinker at present. We hope to avoid both plans.

D. Fisher.—The place of Mr. Cohen's meetings on April 1 at Portsmouth will be duly announced, and we shall be very pleased to meet you then. There is no Branch of the N. S. S. in Portsmouth at present. Glad you appreciate the attitude of the Freethinker in relation to the War. Buchner's Force and Matter could only now be obtained second-hand.

C. H. M. Gronn.—Received with thanks, and allocated as desired.

F. Sunderland.—Your friend has been influenced, we think, by what some religious folk find it to their interest to say. There has been no such recession so far as we are aware. You should ask for names.

Old Member sends us £1 towards advertising the Freethinker,

F. Hoey.—We quite appreciate your point of view, and do not think, for a moment, that all members of the I.L.P. are Christians. But it is the fact that Freethinkers in various movements are apt to submit to a boycott of their anti-religious opinions—a boycott which does not extend to opinions in favour of religion. How many of the parsons and Sunday School teachers in the I.L.P. would agree that it was a non-religious movement? Your own position is quite clear and quite logical. Aud if the same principle applied all round no objection could be raised. So far as we are concerned, we have no intention of dwelling upon the topic, in spite of the many letters received. It is for Freethinking Members of the I.L.P. and other bodies to see that their opinions on religion are treated with due courtesy.

J. W. White.—It is not surprising that the editor of the Cornish and Devon Post refused the insertion of your letter. We should have been pleased to have published it ourselves but space forbids.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

The National Secular Socicty's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communi cations should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (March 11) Mr. Cohen lectures in the Town Hall Birmingham. Owing to local conditions, it has been decided to concentrate on one meeting only—the evening at 7 o'clock. Mr. Cohen's subject is "Will Christianity Survive the War?" and he will deal specially with Mr. H. G. Wells's new book on War and the Future. Admission is free, but there will be a collection taken towards defraying the very heavy expenses a Town Hall meeting incurs. We hope our friends who attend will remember that, and will also do their best towards making the meeting as widely known as possible.

We believe our readers are always interested, as we are in letters from Freethinkers in the Army or Navy. One of the late members of the Edmonton Branch of the N. S. S., Mr. Britten, writes to the General Secretary, Miss Vance:—

> One of the first questions asked me when I came into barracks was: "What religion?" to which, I replied, "Freethinker." The Master-at-Arms seemed a bit doubtful, but beyond asking me to spell it, raised no query.....I expected trouble, but have been treated very well.
>
> The first Sunday morning on parade, after the usual inspection by the Commodore, I told the Petty Officer in charge of our party that I was a Freethinker, and asked to be allowed to fall out before we were marched into church. He seemed uncertain what to do, but finally said that if I had an objection to attending the service I could fall out.

A change of officers brought further experiences with a little different treatment, but, on the whole, Mr. Britten does not appear to have had an unpleasant time. Everything seems to depend on the officer—and on the man. Consideration on the side of the former, and firmness and civility on the part of the other is what is needed. But the lesson from all the letters we have received is the same—Freethinkers in the Army and Navy should avow their opinions and persistently claim legitimate consideration on their account.

Mr. Lloyd lectures to-day (March 11) in the Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate, Leicester. His subject will be "Humanism versus Christianity." Judging from the title, this will furnish an excellent opportunity for Leicester Freethinkers to bring a Christian friend along with them. We hope all will take the hint. Christians could not wish for a better introduction to Freethought than through the agency of Mr. Lloyd.

The Annual Meeting of the Secular Education League was held at the League's offices on Friday, March 2. The past year has not furnished the occasion for any striking manifestation of its activity, but the principle of Secular Education has been kept to the front, in the press and elsewhere, wherever possible. It is certain that before long the general question of education must come before the country, and this will give an opportunity for the League taking a more prominent position before the public. This can be done the more effectively by a largely increased membership, and we hope this will take place. The Secretary of the League is Mr. Harry Snell, 19 Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Our readers of both sexes should be particularly interested in the address to be given at the North London Branch Debating Society, St. Pancras Reform Club, on Sunday next. The subject is "The Church and Divorce," and the speaker Mrs. Seaton Tiedemann, the Secretary of the Divorce Law Reform Union, who is naturally an authority on all matters connected with the subject. This is one of the planks in the N. S. S. platform, and ample opportunity will be given for questions and discussion. The meeting will commence at 7.30.

Our readers—mothers in particular—will be interested to hear that Kathleen Alma Edith Walter, Mr. G. W. Foote's first and only granddaughter, is the winner of the first prize, offered by the Mothers' Magazine for the most beautiful baby. The portrait of the young lady, who is now five years old, appears in the March issue of the magazine. We echo the poet's wish: "Bonnie wee thing! May your face an index be of all your grace and mind."

A meeting of the Glasgow Branch N. S. S. will be held in the Good Templars' Hall, 122 Ingram Street, on Sunday, March 11, at 12 noon; subject, "Humanism," by Mr. Millar Saltcoats. Admission is free, but there will be a collection.

The Emergence of Man.

IV.

(Concluded from p. 134.)

THE date of the advent of the human artificers of the Pre-Chellean stone implements is important and interesting alike. Upon the solution of this problem depends any reliable estimate of the centuries covered by the Old Stone Age, as well as the antiquity of Neanderthal and Piltdown man. Osborn is convinced that:—

> After weighing all the evidence very carefully, the balance of opinion seems to sustain the view that this epoch should be placed after the close of the third glaciation and before the advent of the fourth, that is, during the Third Interglacial Stage.

It certainly seems significant that the six principal sites of Pre-Chellean culture lie close together. In Pre-Chellean times England formed part of the Continent, and a large river ran along the Channel which now divides us from France. In our island, pre-Chellean savages left their handiwork in Essex and Sussex; in France, on the north and south banks of the Somme, at Chelles, on the Marne; and at Helin, in Belgium.

The primitive men who fashioned the Pre-Chellean tools and weapons appear to have entered Europe from Africa by a northern coast route, and the distribution of their stations undoubtedly points to this. Central Europe has thus far failed to supply any positive evidence of Pre-Chellean or even later Chellean man. It is likewise suggestive that artifacts distinctly Chellean in mode of workmanship have been discovered throughout Africa, from Egypt to the Cape. An inventory has been made of these prehistoric industrial, aggressive, and domestic implements, which embraces planing flints, scrapers, borers, knives, hand-stones, and flint hammers.

Pre-Chellean flint implements were unearthed at St. Acheul in 1907, and it is very noticeable—> that at this dawning stage of human invention the flint workers were not deliberately designing the form of their implements, but were dealing rather with the chance shapes of shattered blocks of flints, seeking with a few well-directed blows to produce a sharp point or a good cutting edge. This was the beginning of the art of "retouch," which was done by means of light blows with a second stone instead of the hammer-stone with which the rough flakes were first knocked off. The retouch served a double purpose: Its first and most important object was further to sharpen the point or edge of the tool. This was done by chipping off small flakes from the upper side, so as to give the flint a saw-like edge. Its second object was to protect the hand of the user by blunting any sharp edges or points which might prevent a firm grip of the implement.

Similar rude flints have been met with in Sussex in association with the recently discovered Piltdown skull. This is the most ancient completely human skull yet known to science. This priceless relic was disinterred at Piltdown, about thirty-five miles from Gray's Thurrock, near the Thames, in Essex, where many memorials of prehistoric times have been unearthed. The county of Kent lies to the east of Piltdown, in Sussex, and the Kentish plateau has yielded numerous flint implements of eolithic character.

Dawson discovered the Sussex cranium in a gravel deposit some eighty feet above the level of the southern Ouse. The nature of the surroundings was eminently suitable to the industry of the Pre-Chellean and Chellean workers in stone, and an exceedingly rough chipped flint was found in the layer which contained the Piltdown fossil, in addition to several "eóliths." It seems certain that the Sussex skull dates from an era when the fashioning of stone tools was still in an infant stage even when compared with the rude primitive palæoliths of the Chellean Period. Clement Reid regards the Piltdown deposits as of Pre-Glacial or earlier Pleistocene age, while Dawson, the geologist, who was the finder of the keenly controverted cranium, after critically surveying all the data concerned, came to the conclusion "that the skull and mandible cannot safely be described as of earlier date than the first half of the Pleistocene Epoch. The individual probably lived during the warm cycle in that age."

The discovery of Piltdown man proved the occasion of a lively and protracted debate in the anatomical world. Professors Smith Woodward and Elliot Smith pointed out that the appearance of Piltdown man and the Heidelberg race in geological strata of practically the same antiquity, proves that at the close of the Pliocene Era the human group was already represented in Western Europe by two distinctly divergent stocks. This necessarily presupposes a prolonged anterior period of development of the two races if each arose from a common ancestor. There can be no question that both these rugged human beings—the Heidelberg and the Piltdown (Evanthropus, or "dawn man")—manifest marked kinship, not merely with modern races, but with the apes. The several experts assign slightly different positions to the "dawn man" of Piltdown in the pedigree of recent man, while Professor Osborn dismisses the theory that the Piltdown specimen was ancestral either to the Neanderthal or the Heidelberg savages. This scientist thinks that the dawn man's jaw is of a type so low that it represents "a fully adult chimpanzee of a new species." Although the Piltdown skull and jawbone were present in the same deposit, certain men of science were sceptical as to their original association. If the jaw belonged to a different organism to that of the skull-cap, which is unmistakably human, albeit of an extremely primitive type, then there is ample reason for concluding that anthropoid apes survived in Europe during the Ice Age. Moreover, a tooth, apparently human, from Taubach, in Germany, has been attributed to "Pan vetus" by Miller, and this is the species of extinct chimpanzee which that anatomist regards as the original possessor of the Piltdown jaw. Osborn now inclines to the view that:—

> If confirmed by future discovery, the presence of anthropoid apes related to the chimpanzee in the > deposits of Piltdown, Sussex, and of Taubach, Weimar, is in itself of very great interest, because Taubach is of Third Interglacial Age, and of the Chellean or early Acheulean industrial stage. Both facts, so far as they go, tend to confirm the opinion.....that the Piltdown race belongs to Third Interglacial times.

Digitized by Google

Evidence has now been accumulated, overwhelming and complete, that man ascended through a series of stages in which he slowly perfected his stone implements. All over the earth, outside Australia, aboriginal man progressed along industrial paths similar to those revealed by the Chellean records of Western Europe. And there remains no legitimate reason for postulating a single centre from which his flint industry radiated in every direction. It is far more likely that primitive man everywhere experienced the necessity for utilizing stone wherever it was available, to satisfy the imperious needs of his precarious life.

It was in Western Europe where man's early efforts were first detected, and in the same quarter of the globe have been discovered the completest evidences of his onward journey. Chelles, on the Marne, in France, has lent its name to the Chellean culture, which progressed on somewhat independent paths. The rude hunters of the Chellean period of the Old Stone Age were a courageous and hardy race, whose flint artifacts testify to their devotion to the chase. From a few rough instruments of the Pre-Chellean period the folk of the later Chellean days evolved seven or eight vastly improved artifacts. Commont has clearly demonstrated that at St. Acheul, on the Somme, there existed an important industrial station from the opening of the Palæolithic Age till its very end. This archæologist's investigations prove that, if we except Castillo, in Spain, St. Acheul was the prehistoric industrial centre whose career was most prolonged. From the dawn of the Old Stone to the Neolithic Age it appears to have been constantly occupied by the workers in flint.

While these ancient artizans were labouring in France, Belgium, and Spain, peoples of the same cultural character resided in Britain. At present, however, no typically Chellean site is known in Italy, or in any district of Central Europe. But at Grays Thurrock, in Essex, scarcely 120 miles from Abbeville, a celebrated Chellean locality, Chellean artificers were firmly established. England was then united with the European mainland, and the workers at the various centres probably passed to and fro. Flints of Chellean design have been discovered in every part of Britain south of the Yorkshire Ouse. All the evidence at our disposal combines to prove that the peoples who fashioned these implements entered Europe along the land bridges which connected the old Western Continent with Africa.

Our positive information concerning the genesis of the several primitive peoples who inhabited Europe in prehistoric centuries is scanty. After an exhaustive survey of all available data, Osborn reaches the conclusion—> that the family tree or lines of descent of the races of the Old Stone Age consist of a number of entirely separate branches, which had been completely formed in the great Eurasiatic continent, a land mass infinitely larger and more capable of producing a variety of races than the diminutive peninsula area of Western Europe.

If not from the Dark Continent's northern borders, the most rudimentary human races—the Piltdown, Heidelberg, and Neanderthal—migrated into Europe from the Mediterranean region. This, at least, is the most reasonable inference to be drawn from the extensive and peculiar distribution of Chellean and Acheulean remains. The superior savage stocks of the Old Stone time possessed abilities of a high order, and their art achievements alone conclusively prove this. All the evidence we have gathered concerning their mental powers compels the assumption of an immense period of pre-evolution. The foundations of all subsequent civilizations were laid by the more intellectual Old Stone Age stocks. These remote men displayed considerable inventive faculty, and they protected their bodies with raiment. And justly it is claimed that:—

> The same is true of the æsthetic powers, of close observation, of the sense of form, of proportion, of symmetry, the appreciation of beauty of animal form, and beauty of line, colouring, and form in modelling and sculpture.....Of the musical sense we have at present no evidence. The religious sense, the appreciation of some power or powers beyond the great phenomena of Nature, is evidenced by reverence for the dead, in burials apparently related to notions of a future existence of the dead, and especially the mysteries of the art of the caverns.

So, much as we note a tremendous interval between the rude and unlettered Teutons pictured by Tacitus, and a Lessing or a Goethe, or between the barbarous ancient Britons and a Shakespeare or a Spencer; likewise, there yawns an enormous chasm between the later men of the Palæolithic Age and the original possessors of the Piltdown and Heidelberg skulls.

T. F. Palmer.

Our Dreams.

It is a modern theory that we realize in dreams the desires we have during the time when we are awake. That theory, we venture to say, is an advance on the one held by primitive people. They, rightly or wrongly, believed that the spirit during sleep took leave of the body and wandered about as freely as imagination would allow it. Of course, all good European Freethinkers will incline towards scepticism at the mention of spirits. We must, therefore, say at once that we wish our readers to take the term in its universal sense and not at its narrow and theological valuation.

We know that life is a fact. We know that life is a journey and a battle from the cradle to the grave. Before and beyond that all our speculations are equally vain. We now speak of dreams while awake, and since neither stake nor faggot can prevent a Freethinker dreaming we will make known our dreams representing our unsatisfied desires. The worst we can say of them is that they do not lean towards oppression; the best, that they represent a contribution to the scheme of life. Man's life should not be as an uncracked nut; if he have ears, eyes, and a tongue, let him speak. Do what he will, he cannot escape the fact that he has a duty to mankind, and, in a like manner to Dante, his life is a sacrament. To a wooden post you ask? We answer, No. Has the time not come when we must throw overboard symbolism of no earthly use except to fetter the mind, to impress the ignorant, and to load the kneeling camel called man with a further burden of stupidity. A good conscience! If Freethinkers do not possess it, they are on the way towards the attainment of it. Let it be written in letters of gold that we have never traded on man's ignorance. Does it require any exceptional intelligence to achieve this end? Look at the mental outfit of priests; they do not experience much difficulty in that task. To mankind they say, this is the way. We know that on that way are to be found the fogs and darkness of superstition, phantoms of truth, and scarecrows of bewilderment, whilst in the distance is that will-o'-the-wisp called faith. We will have none of this.

Reality in our waking hours shall make us know that the Gods sell us all they give us, yet shall our waking dreams be sweeter. He who shall will his life to the service of the good (not beyond my impatient ones) shall have taken the first step towards a good conscience—and a good conscience has no bad dreams. At present, or any other time for that matter, we would not exchange shoes with any Christian; we prefer to stand upright in a world rapidly becoming a charnel house. With a song on our lips to that spirit of humanity which we know is not dead, we take our place, and let those who may get down on their knees. Where, now, is the bad conscience? The implication of original sin demands this attitude, and they who follow this practice dare to assert that they are the light of the world. Such an assertion is not worth refutation, and one begins to wonder if they would not really like, at present, to hide their light under a bushel. Time is flinging at them more problems than the combined totals of Darwin, Spencer, and Mill; the poets in their wild songs and prophecies are taking their places as the unacknowledged legislators of the world, and the Dionysian spirit of destruction is once again abroad. Woe to Appollo if he resists!

Digitized by Google

Life is a conflict. There is nothing fixed, be it law, custom, or constitution. Dionysus dislikes the smoothness of Apollo's limbs—in other words, conservation is subject to attack from without and sometimes from within. In this respect we now find Christian religion busily trying to prove that a circle is really square. A writer in the Times Educational Supplement says that: "The circumstances of the War make the odium theologicum odious indeed," and he urges the need for unity on the question of the Churches and education. Shall we not say that this is an attack from within? Have not Freethinkers said times without number, and without a war to inspire them, that Christianity is odious? All temperaments will not have imposed upon them this thing called Christianity; for the lame, halt, and blind intellectually, it may be good enough, but we question the wisdom of such an imposition even in that case.

Another instance of attack from within may be found in an article over the signature of "A. C. B." In the same paper he writes: "Very often, if a speaker begins to talk about God, his hearers lose interest, whether they are laymen listening to a clergyman or boys listening to a master." Have not Freethinkers said the same thing over and over again? Indeed, it would be hard to find ten believers in Christianity whose definition of God would agree, and, sleeping through a sermon was once considered to be joke. "A. C. B." only says the same thing in another form. We feel sure that Freethinkers will scoff at the idea of any value being attached to such admissions as the result of an impact with hideous reality. For Christians to take such unsteady childish steps, with the world of reality behind them, will prove to us how unwilling is religious conservation to advance in any direction leading to universal benefit. Nevertheless, these admissions tend to prove that internal adjustments are being made owing to pressure from without. In other words, orthodoxy is beginning to stammer a few elementary truths of Freethought.

We have travelled a long way to come to our dreams—the dreams of we dissatisfied ones. Awake, nature would seem to say to us, when we have kicked this decadent creed to Limbo: "Rejoice in all the four seasons of the year—in all the four seasons of your life, for I am Lord of all." Alas! for every one it cannot be so. Life demands courage and fortitude; from the stronger of us it demands sincerity. Curiosity, the inclination to climb dizzy mountains, the wish to probe deeper into mysteries than the men of old—life offers to Freethinkers all these avenues of choice, for have they not for ever cast away the cursed formula: "Thou shalt not"? The War has not forced Freethought to readjust itself, to dilute its thought, to change its attitude, nor compromise with the enemy. We have none of our own words to eat, for we have not allowed ourselves to be deceived, neither have we practised deception on others. We have commanded no one to believe, neither have we attempted to teach naked niggers to clothe themselves, neither have we asked any one to die for us. For these reasons, whilst awake we may come face to face with ourselves without being ashamed, and in our dreams we shall see nothing worse than life as a phenomenon, as something to be approached with gratitude, as something to be moulded by man's effort. On our lips shall be a terrible nay to Christian values, but our duties to life shall be somewhat in harmony with the sun, the moon, and the stars, the sea, and the fertile land, and we shall fill our cup from the fountain of Truth. To Christianity we shall say: Your intentions may be good, but we doubt the doctrine which demanded a human sacrifice to save immortal souls; that was ignoble. We discerning and dissatisfied thinkers "are unwilling to renounce or to share our responsibilities"; go your way, but beware of asking for obedience if you are unworthy of it.

WILLIAM REPTON.

Critical Chat.

SIR JOSEPH BAMPFYLDE FULLER is an old member of the Indian Civil Service, and has held several distinguished positions under the Government of India. In the intervals of a busy life he has produced several books of a philosophic cast, and in Man As He Is: Essays in a New Psychology (John Murray; 7s. 6d. net) has given the world a noteworthy study of human conduct. If the psychology is not quite so "new" as the sub-title would lead one to believe, it is not the less worthy of attention on that account. And it might be said in defence that it will be new to a very large number of readers; but inasmuch as it is frankly, although not aggressively, Materialistic in tone and teaching, it is not likely to be warmly welcomed by those who still prefer to discuss psychology in terms of a mediævalism which is little better than a refined and disguised Animism.

We say that Man As He Is is frankly Materialistic despite the author's brief criticism of Materialism, which is in effect only a criticism of a certain conception of Materialism. When, for instance, we are told that "Materialism can offer no solution of the problem of consciousness or feeling," and that the Materialistic theory "denies that life possesses any energies or impulses of its own," one need only reply that to the first count the reply is given by Sir Bampfylde Fuller himself in the course of his work. And to the second, feeling, or the response of living tissue to certain stimuli, is a fact that no Materialist denies, and no scientific Materialist claims can be adequately expressed in terms that are adequate for a purely physical phenomenon. Every group of phenomena—physical, chemical, biological, and psychological—must be expressed or described in terms framed to cover that group. There is no more need, therefore, for a special life force or a special mind force than there is for an independent chemical or physical force. The rise of a new group of phenomena from the interaction of pre-existing forces, the new group necessitating the framing of new "laws," is involved in the general evolution of the universe. Due consideration of this fact would prevent most of the adverse criticisms of Materialism being written.

Fundamentally, man is a creature of many impulses. That is the bedrock of the author's generalizations. Below consciousness there is going on an unceasing warfare between impulses, each striving for mastery—and to find expression in action. In taking his stand on impulse as the fundamental psychological fact, Sir Bampfylde Fuller is quite in line with recent psychology, and much of what he says could have been powerfully enforced by reference to the work of Freud and Jung, and their successors. This stock of impulses, possessed in varying degrees of power by all, form our inheritance from our human and pre-human ancestors. They are, to use the author's expression, the force that gives the train its motion. But human life requires not only motion, but direction. It is not enough to liken it to a train in motion; we need rails that will keep it along a given track. Sir Bampfylde Fuller finds this in memory —the recalling of past experiences. It is this "which gives dexterity to our limbs, ideas to our brains, language wherewith to express our ideas, and continuity to our purposes. It is an educative force, raising us from the helplessness of infancy to such skill as no other animal can attain, however richly endowed with the intuitive recollections which have come to the species in the course of evolutionary progress."

Digitized by Google

It is evident that the more numerous and the more varied our recollections the greater will be the part played by choice in the determination of conduct. But a life of choice is an exhausting life. To stop and weigh consideration for and against any and every possible course of conduct absorbs energy and exhausts vitality. The ideal action is direct action, just as the man who has no thought of wrong-doing is superior to the one who only overcomes the impulse to wrong-doing after lengthy deliberation. Presumably, Sir Bampfylde Fuller, from the large powers he ascribes to "suggestion," would look on this as providing the necessary counterbalance. And in this we should be inclined to agree with him. It is the social life which drills man, and which acts upon all with a power of suggestion not always adequately recognized.

And this brings us to the only real fault we have to find with Man As He Is. Although setting out a new psychology, Sir Bampfylde Fuller is sufficiently under the influence of the old to deal largely with the human mind as though it were an individual mind. And this is not really the case. The peculiarity of the human mind is that it is essentially a group mind. Its contents are given in the social life that lies behind it, and in the social life that surrounds it. All that fashions the human mind, language, institutions, traditions, beliefs, all are social products. It is the continuity of social life that provides the basis of human development and human civilization. I do not think for a moment that Sir Bampfylde Fuller would challenge this view. He suggests it in many places in his book, but, all the same, it does not receive the emphasis it deserves.

Apart from this, Man As He Is stands as a good and useful piece of work, plainly written on a subject in which it is not at all easy to express oneself plainly without running the risk of misunderstanding. And, so far as its influence extends, it will do something to counteract the flood of nonsense with which under the name of "mysticism" the public mind is deluged.

Lucian.

The British and Foreign Bible Society is paying £5,400 for paper for Bibles, which in the piping times of peace cost £2,600. The heathen Chinese, who used to pack their tea-chests with leaves from Bibles, will be sorry to hear this.

The new pound notes have a design of Saint George and the Dragon on the front. As the saintly George was an unscrupulous army contractor, the design is topical, if not complimentary.

Death of Mrs. Charles Pegg.

We have learned with the deepest regret of the death of Mrs. Charles Pegg, Secretary of the Manchester Branch of the N. S. S. Mrs. Pegg has been for over thirty-five years associated with Freethought work in Manchester, and during a large part of that period has officiated as Secretary. We think she scarcely ever missed attending a meeting, and, of late years, was often at her post when considerations of health might well have served as a valid reason for her staying at home. During the past few years her health failed, and for some months past she had scarcely left the house—part of the time being spent in bed. On Friday, March 2, the end came. Mrs. Pegg's associations with Freethought covered the whole of the Bradlaugh Parliamentary struggle, the Freethinker prosecution, and other striking and dramatic incidents. Hers was a record of long and honourable service in a cause that has little to offer save the consciousness of a duty done. We feel sure that both her husband and her daughter will have the sincere sympathy of many hundreds of Freethinkers throughout the country to whom she was known.—C. C.

Correspondence.

THE CRY OF ANGUISH OF THE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—A week or two ago an article appeared in the Sunday Times, entitled "What's Wrong with the Church?" This must be disconcerting to those ministers who have told us that the War was setting everything right. It was followed by a correspondence, in which the Rev. A. C. Headlam repeats the stale trash about true science agreeing with the Church and Christian doctrine.

But the crowning piece of terminological obfuscation is as follows:—

> But now let us turn to the particular question asked; and first of all it is suggested that Christianity is somehow responsible for the present war. "Why is all this?" Christianity has a very definite answer: It is because of men's sins. From whence comes wars and fighting among you? Come they not hence even of your lust? Ye lust and have not; ye kill and desire to have. Surely no better reason could be given of the reasons which led to the outbreak of this war. It has been a lust of power, a lust of dominion, a lust of commercial wealth, a lust of national greatness; and it has come from just that nation which has more than deliberately refused to listen to the teaching of Christianity.

Well, what is to be thought of the best answer Christianity can make to the charge, not as put by the Rev. Headlam, but as to the responsibility for not having prevented it? No doubt the answer is definite. But where is the defence of a God who, to punish Germany, inflicts punishments on the nations who are her intended victims equal to or even greater than Germany has yet suffered? And is there at the present moment any reasonable guarantee that the Lord intends that the War shall bring justice about as a result? But what can we say to the rev. gentleman's attacks on Germany as being anything like so anti-religious as France, or more indifferent to religion than the English? The evidence of the anti-religion—nay, absolute Atheism—of France is overwhelming, and I daresay, if the rev. gentleman's previous utterances were overhauled, attacks on Godless education in France could be found, as it was quite the fashion with our clergy before the War. And what about the last census in France? Seven million Atheists enumerated; a fact, and quite impossible in so-called Materialistic Germany. And is not the only country in which soldiers need not attend what is called divine worship, France? As to British indifference, the controversy in which the rev. gentleman joins is a proof of it. As Pilate asked, "What is truth?" Well—it is not the utterances that come from the clergy.

A. J. Marriott.

LIVERPOOL I.L.P. AND THE FREETHINKER.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

Sir,—My attention has been drawn to the alleged reports of two meetings of the I.L.P. held in Liverpool when your paper was abused, which appear in the recent issue of the Freethinker.

Digitized by Google

I would draw the attention of yourself and readers to the undermentioned facts which entirely repudiate the suggestions of mean and intolerant bias made in your remarks.

1. The statement that your paper was discussed at two meetings of the I.L.P. is incorrect.

At a branch business meeting which I attended, various members asked the Literature Secretary to place some orthodox Christian periodical on the stall seeing that a Freethought periodical was being sold. A very fair and courteous discussion ensued, and it was decided to take the Freethinker off the stall. Such an action can hardly be described as pitiable and contemptible.

2. No member threatened to resign, nor was there any suggestion of such an action by any speaker taking part in the discussion.

3. The unwarranted statement that by an overwhelming majority it was decided to burn all copies unsold is, absolutely without foundation.

4. Your statement re burning your paper giving Liverpool I.L.P. members pleasure is well answered by the above facts and, I am sure, you will withdraw it.

The points I have raised place an entirely contradictory version to that of your own, which, you said, you had no reason to doubt; this, however, is explained by the fact that Mr. J. W. Gott, who was responsible for the report, informs me that he was not present at any meeting of the I.L.P. when any such action took place, but only sent you the report on versions given him by friends.

I quite appreciate your own position, and can understand that the comments were written in ignorance of the true position on the statements of your correspondent.

I would suggest that such statements will not increase Freethought sympathy in Liverpool Socialist circles, nor are they likely to strengthen the sympathy which you already have.

Ernest W. Silverman.

[Our paragraphs were based on information supplied by Mr. Gott whose word we had no reason to question. His statements were clear and precise, and we have now written him on the subject. We now await his reply, and can only say that we have no desire whatever to do the Liverpool members of the I.L.P. an injustice. But we cannot close our minds to the fact of the hostility shown by a section of the I.L.P. in various parts of the country, and the comparatively free hand given to religious propagandists.—Editor, Freethinker.]

The Reflections of Riquet (A Dog).

All passes away, and is succeeded. I, alone, I remain.

Meditation. I love my master Bergeret, because he is powerful and terrible.

Always I am in the middle of all, and the men, the animals, and the things are ranged, hostile or favourable, around me.

At the fall of night, evil powers roam around the house. I bark in order that my master may be warned, and drive them away.

A dog that has not any feeling of piety towards men, and who dislikes the assembled fetishes in his master's house, leads a wicked and erring life.

Men have the divine power of opening all the doors. I am only able to open a very few. Doors are the great spirits that do not voluntarily obey dogs.

One never knows whether one has acted well towards men. It is necessary to adore them without trying to understand them. Their wisdom is mysterious.

Men, animals, stones, grow larger on approach, and when I am near to them, they become enormous. But I do not. Wherever I am, I remain the same size.

Anatole France (Translated by H. W. Edwards).

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

Indoor.

North London Branch N. S. S. (St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, off Kentish Town Road, N.W.): 7.30, Mrs. Seaton Tiedemann (Secretary Divorce Law Reform Union), "The Church and Divorce."

South London Branch N. S. S. (Avondale Hall, Landor Road, Clapham, S.W.): 6, Annual Meeting. 7, P. S. Wilde, "What is Materialism?"

Mr. Howell Smith's Discussion Class (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Thursday, March 15, at 7.30.

Caxton Hall (Westminster): March 14, at 8, E. C. Saphin, "The Solar Origin of Christianity." Lantern lecture.

Queen's Hall (Small) (Langham Place, W.): 6.30, Maurice Maubrey, "The World's New Evangel."

Hyde Park: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Kells and Dales; 6.15, Messrs. Shaller and Yates.

COUNTRY.

Indoor.

Birmingham Branch N. S. S. (Town Hall): 7, Chapman Cohen, "Will Christianity Survive the War?" With special reference to H. G. Wells' War and the Future.

Leicester (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate); 6.30, J. T. Lloyd, "Humanism versus Christianity."

FOREIGN AUTHORS' LITERARY AGENCY. ENGLISH MANUSCRIPTS OF FOREIGN AUTHORS Revised for Publication by English Author and Journalist, contributor to leading periodicals. Expert Proof-reader, able to see through the Press any large or small book. MSS. of Articles, Stories, Plays, Poems, Translations, etc., put into final English for submission to Editors. Typing if required. Lessons given in English Reading, Writing, and Speaking.—Address, "Authority," c/o the Freethinker, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

Post Free Three Halfpence.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster, S.W.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

Teh Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

A

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY
OF FREETHINKERS
OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY

J. M. WHEELER.

Price THREE SHILLINGS Net.
(Postage 6d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp. ...	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 56 pp.	,, 1d.	0	3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	3
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp....	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Mangasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 82 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 82 pp.	Nett. ,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. LEA.
In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
By E. A. ASHCROFT.
440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By CARVETH READ.
8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.
By D. B. HART, M.D.
Crown 8vo. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

THE THEORIES OF EVOLUTION.
By YVES DELAGE.
1912. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.
For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. MILL.
Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

HISTORY OF THE TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.
By C. D. COLLET.
Two vols., published at 7s. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By CHAPMAN COHEN.
Price 1s. net, postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By G. W. FOOTE.
First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. WHEELER.
Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:
CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:
MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all aws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 1,861

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

Vol. XXXVII.—No. 11 SUNDAY MARCH 18, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
Mr. H. G. Wells on "War and the Future."—The Editor	161
"Jesus Only."—J. T. Lloyd	162
Mark Twain's Dream.—Mimnermus	164
Science and Spiritualism.—W. Mann	164
Profiteering and the Pulpit.—Keridon	166
The "Freethinker" in Liverpool	167
Acid Drops	167
Special.—C. Cohen	169
To Correspondents	169
Sugar Plums	169
The Reflections of Riquet (A Dog).—Anatole France	169
The French Revolution.—Robert Arch	170
Christianity as the Symbolism of Factuality.—F. C. Powell	171
The Terrible Turk.—Edwin Greenwood	172
Funeral of Mrs. C. Pegg	157
Letter to the Editor—A Marriage "Controller"	174

Views and Opinions.

Mr. H. G. Wells on "War and the Future."

In the closing paragraph of his new book, War and the Future, Mr. H. G. Wells takes his readers into his confidence by telling them "I take myself to be very nearly an average man, abnormal only by reason of a certain mental rapidity." That, if true, certainly lifts Mr. Wells out of the ranks of the average man, for the ordinary man thinks very little, and certainly does not think rapidly. As Mr. Wells himself says in this rather ill-balanced book, while multitudes have their minds concentrated on the War, they are "neither doing nor trying to do anything that deserves to be called thinking about it." Mr. Wells, therefore, is certainly not an average man, whatever else he may be. That he possesses "mental rapidity" may be true, but that is not always an unmixed blessing. It may cause a man to rush into print, once the avenues of publicity are open to him, before he has thoroughly digested the facts of the situation; and that we believe is the case with one aspect of Mr. Well's book. It is not a very difficult matter to turn out a book of three hundred pages every six months or so, provided one can string sentences together in their proper order. A great public service would often be performed if writers would publish less and reflect more.

* * *

The Force of Ideas.

That Mr. Wells should, in the course of his work, say many interesting things, and occasionally pregnant things, is inevitable. Some of them are very pertinent, and nearly all of them are suggestive. Here, for example, is one of the latter order:—

> All human affairs are mental affairs; the bright (why "bright"?) ideas of to-day are the realities of to-morrow. The real history of mankind is the history of how ideas have arisen, how they have taken possession of men's minds, how they have struggled, altered, proliferated, decayed.

Now that is not only a truth, it is a very vital truth. And it is one that Freethought has always emphasized as against that superficial sociology which imagined that social conditions would be changed without first modifying the mental conditions of which they are the product. Every human institution rests fundamentally upon a mental condition. It expresses certain ideas and beliefs, and while there is a reaction of the institution on mental life, it is by way of the modification of the latter that social evolution has been achieved. There is, as Mr. Wells says, "Nothing in this War at all, but a conflict of ideas, traditions, and mental habits." We have competing ideas of Imperialism—British, Russian, German, and the rest. We have traditions of loyalty to a king, ideas of patriotism, of the supremacy of force—physical and moral. Analyse any phase of the War, nay, analyse any phase of social life, and we come ultimately to a conflict or a harmony of "ideas, traditions, and mental habits." That is one of the vital truths contained in Mr. Well's book. And it is a complete justification of the method of the Freethought attack.

* * *

The Progress of the Churches.

With Mr. Wells's views on the War we are not now concerned. Feeling is, however, so strong on the subject that the chief purpose of a lot of the writing about the War would seem to be either a commercial one, or to keep public feeling up to the required degree of tension. What we are concerned with is Mr. Wells's opinions as to the effect the War has had, and will have, on religion. And on this Mr. Wells says that the War "has produced a very great volume of religious thought and feeling.....People habitually religious have been stirred to new depths of reality and sincerity, and people are thinking of religion who never thought of religion before." The first sentence is open to very serious and very solid question, although Mr. Wells says it is "indisputable." The second might be true without it implying anything in the nature of a religious revival. It may mean that under the stress of emotion or disaster the habitually unreflective or superstitious become intensified in their superstition. And whatever strength that may bring to religion is certainly discounted by the people who have thought about religion only to recognize its radical ineffectiveness for good in human affairs. Mr. Wells himself points out that a great deal of this talk about religion is mere froth. The Anglican churches have used the occasion "mainly for pew-rent touting." The Bishop of London's utterances have a "regrettable superficiality." The National Mission was in the nature of "a magic incantation; a satisfactory end of the War to be brought about by convergent prayers and religious assiduities," "The Churches are merely wasting their energies in futile self-advertisement." The Churches "All pander to nationalism, and to powers and princes. They exist so to pander," etc., etc. With all of which we agree; only with so much of recognized religion dismissed as rubbish, and dangerous rubbish, one wonders where Mr. Wells discovers his revival of religion?

* * *

Is there a Revival of Religion?

So far as we can see, the only revival of religion indicated is in the case of Mr. Wells himself. And while that may be an interesting biographical fact, it can scarcely be taken as proof of a religious revival. This is particularly true when one discovers that Mr. Wells's religion, which he expresses under the formula "The Kingdom of God," is no religion at all. It is no more, as Mr. Wells explains, than an organized and educated "impulse to social service." "The service of men's collective needs," being "the true worship of God." And more curious still, even if one were to grant that this is really religion, the new lawgiver, prophet, and apostle of this religious revival confesses that he cannot find proof of its existence. He says:—

Digitized by Google

> Eagerly as I would grasp at any evidence that this idea is being developed and taken up by the general consciousness, I am quite unable to persuade myself that anything of the sort is going on. I do perceive a search for large forms into which the prevalent impulse to devotion can be thrown. But the organized religious bodies with their creeds and badges and their instinct for self-preservation at any cost, stand between men and their spiritual growth in just the same way as the forestallers stand between men and food.

But if there is no evidence that this idea of the "true worship of God" is being taken up and developed by the general consciousness; if, in addition, the organized Churches stand between men and its development; what in the name of all that is reasonable becomes of the religious revival? It remains a pious aspiration of Mr. Wells', and an indefensible one at that. It is true that Mr. Wells says that religion is stronger in France than it was; but that, we venture to say, may be attributed to the fact that Mr. Wells knows more of England than he does of France. As usual, the revival is occurring somewhere else.

* * *

Blowing Off the Froth.

"Nowhere," says Mr. Wells, "is there so much froth and waste as in religious excitements." Our great need, he adds, is to "blow off the froth." With this we quite agree; and there is a good opportunity here of blowing the froth off Mr. Wells' own "kingdom of God." For when all is said and done, what we have here is pure froth. And of all the frothy expressions that one might take as a badge for a new evangel, "The kingdom of God" is surely the frothiest. It means anything, everything, nothing. It is a formula that all religionists would agree with, and each would give it a different meaning and a different explanation. It provides verbal agreement, with universal discord in practice. With Mr. Wells, "the true worship of God" is organized social service; but how can anyone with the slightest grasp of the evolution and historic meaning of the worship of God call that a religion? Mr. Wells rightly says that "nothing is so misleading as a careless analogy." Well, here is a careless analogy with a vengeance. He takes a word such as religion, with centuries of evil associations, and with an unbroken connotation of supernaturalism—a word which, because the world is outgrowing supernaturalism, is inevitably and mischievously misleading—and because he desires a more intelligent social service, calls that a religion. But social organization is not religion; social service is not religion. A religion without supernaturalism is a vertebrate animal minus a spinal column. If Mr. Wells possessed more of what one may call the historic sense, he would realize how essentially vicious is his procedure. He is confusing the thought of men in the very attempt to clarify it; providing discord in the act of preaching unity. Mr. Wells' "kingdom of God" is almost without "the pride of ancestry." It will certainly be without "the honour of posterity."

CHAPMAN COHEN.

"Jesus Only."

THE direct object ever kept in view by the Four Gospels is the apotheosis of Jesus of Nazareth, and the critic can see only too clearly how clumsily the process of deification is related. The Evangelists were fiction writers who had but an imperfect understanding of their art. While honouring their hero with a departure from life that was attended by various supernatural incidents, they omitted to confer a like distinction upon his advent into the world. Beyond a doubt, in its original form, the story treated the birth as a purely natural event. Perceiving this defect later on, either the authors themselves, or some editors of the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, resolved to improve the narrative by lifting the birth out of the natural order into the supernatural. Unfortunately, the revision did not extend to the text between the birth and the death, so that in these very Gospels Jesus is more than once referred to as the Son of Joseph and Mary. Yet nothing can be more evident than the fact that what the writers always aim at is to present their hero with the halo of Divinity round his head. "And we beheld his glory," they said; "glory as of the only begotten from the Father." Of Jesus it is every now and then said, "And he manifested his glory." But here, again, the novelists are occasionally caught napping. Take the recorded incident of the Transfiguration as an apt illustration. Matthew's account is as follows:—

> And after six days Jesus taketh with him Peter, and James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart. And he was transfigured before them, and his face did shine as the sun, and his garments became white as the light: And behold, there appeared unto them Moses and Elijah, talking with him. And Peter answered, and said unto Jesus, Lord, it is good for us to be here; if thou wilt, I will make here three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elijah. While he was yet speaking, behold a bright cloud overshadowed them; and behold, a voice out of the cloud, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him. And when the disciples heard it, they fell on their face and were sore afraid. And Jesus came and touched them, and said, Arise and be not afraid. And lifting up their eyes, they saw no one, save Jesus only (Matt. xvii. 1-8).

Mark's report agrees with Matthew's, but in that furnished by Luke there are two significant additions, namely, that the metamorphosis occurred while Jesus was engaged in prayer, and that while he prayed the three disciples were fast asleep. The metamorphosis is said to have taken place during the disciples' slumber, and was noticed by them only after they had awakened. If the incident were historical that fact would account for much; but the historicity of the narrative is doubted even by many Christian scholars. Professor Max Muller, of America, in his article on "Simon Peter" in the Encyclopædia Biblica, is unable to pronounce the episode in any true sense historical. Professor Schmiedel suggests that the story "ought to be taken as reflecting the great crisis at which Jesus became convinced that he was the chosen hero of God," and Dr. Arno Neumann adds that "while explaining the matter in this way, we must not ignore the legendary Supra-terrestrial light in which the Master is brought into contact with Moses and Elijah, the representatives of the ancient religion" (Jesus, p. 128). We regard the Transfiguration as wholly a mythic episode. It is naively admitted by Matthew and Mark that at the specific request of the Master they never alluded to the alleged incident during his lifetime, while Luke simply says, "And they held their peace, and told no man in those days any of the things which they had seen."

Our present purpose, however, is to call attention to the use that is often made, especially by preachers, of the expression "Save Jesus only" at the close of the narrative. While Peter suggested the construction of three tabernacles, "there came a cloud, and overshadowed them." When the cloud was gone, they looked round about, but "saw no one any more, save Jesus only," the meaning being that in the presence of Jesus Judaism was bound to vanish. Jesus was the only one worth thinking about. In him was the Old Testament fulfilled, and apart from him it had no significance at all. The late Dr. Joseph Parker was in the habit of declaring that he saw Jesus on every page, and in every verse, of Holy Writ. The Rev. Archibald Duff, M.A., LL.D., D.D., Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Theology in the Congregational College, Bradford, though a Higher Critic of some note, endorses Dr. Parker's pronouncement. In an article in the Christian Commonwealth for March 7, entitled "A New Crusade for the Use of the Bible," he says:—

Digitized by Google

> Our Crusade is so sacred—it is none other than a campaign to bring all men to see Jesus—it is so sacred that it is imperative. The great watchword in it is the Word of God: that Word is Jesus, the God-man; and it is nothing else. The early Christians of, say, 100 years after the Crucifixion, were easily misled by the doctrine of the scribes and elders, who said, "The Word of God is our great Hebrew Scriptures; this Jesus who had to be put to death is not The Word." The unwitting Christians, in their enfeebled days, were persuaded by those scribes and elders; and so they said that they too would set up a Collection of Scriptures—a Christian one. Then, alas, came the twisted fancy that this new Collection was "The Word." How natural, and in some real sense, how true; but, natural and easy as it was, it was a fatal blow to the absolute supremacy of Jesus. He is first; he must be first; and there cannot be two "firsts."

We wish to congratulate Dr. Duff very heartily upon the courageous manner in which he dismisses the doctrine of the Divine inspiration of the New Testament. On this point he is as heterodox as any Higher Critic can be. He considers the setting up of the New Testament as the Word of God not only a mistake, but a misfortune, if not a calamity; an opinion in which we fully concur, although we fail to see how it could have been "a fatal blow to the absolute supremacy of Jesus." At any rate, the object of the writers was to exalt him, to establish his Deity, and to proclaim him the Saviour of the whole world. Of course, Dr. Duff is specially interested in the Old Testament, while with the New Testament he has professionally no concern. Evidently, to him, Old Testament theology is summed up in Jesus, and apart from Jesus, would be on a level with Pagan mythology. It is not as a calm, straight-eyed critic, but as an emotional, almost tearful believer in Jesus that he comes before us in the article under consideration. With all due respect to his undoubted scholarship, we are afraid that here he allows his emotionalism to run away with him. We have no hesitation in affirming that no honest exegete can find Jesus in a single Old Testament text. In point of fact, modern scientific commentators have been compelled by their love of truth to give up most of the passages which our forefathers used proudly to quote as being distinctly Messianic. Indeed, Professor Duff himself expresses the opinion that there is nothing in the Old Testament that makes the New a necessity.

Dr. Duff seems to be prevented by his piety from realizing that to disprove the historic reliability of the Old Testament is tantamount to demonstrating its entire unfitness to be accepted as being in any sense a revelation from above. He is exceedingly severe on a pastor who recently said to him: "I cannot use the Bible in the modern and scientific way, because the modern and scientific students of it are not all agreed about results." The pastor was quite wrong in supposing that there is no agreement as to results among Biblical critics. The conclusions arrived at by such students are substantially the same, just as scientific conclusions are essentially the same, whatever differences there may be being of minor importance. The pastor was further mistaken in thinking that it was merely the lack of unanimity as to results that made it difficult, if not impossible, for him to use the Bible in the modern scientific way. The real cause of his inability was the fact that if he accepted any results of scientific criticism of the Bible, it rendered belief in it as the infallible Word of God laughably ridiculous. And we beg to remind Dr. Duff that he is himself in the same boat as the pastor whom he derides. Nobody can say that he uses the Bible in the modern and scientific way in the first paragraph of his present article. Scientifically speaking, there is no trace of Jesus in the five Books of Moses, not even in the Book of the Prophet Isaiah, nor in any other Old Testament document. Surely, it is not as a scientific critic, but as a devout divine who believes without, or against, evidence, that the Professor speaks, when he asserts: "Always in his Divine ways, whether in Jesus or in the previous story, God has been utterly Love. What should hold us back from telling this to the people?" Nothing but the consciousness that it is but a horrible lie. Let anyone read the Book of Joshua from beginning to end, and say without a blush of shame, if he can, that in all his Divine ways disclosed in that document God was "utterly Love"? There were a few grains of honesty still left in that pastor's mind when he confessed he could not use the Bible in the modern and scientific way; but one is simply aghast as one thinks of the Professor's absolutely mediæval and unscientific method of using the Bible in the pulpit of to-day. It is essentially an unscrupulous, Jesuitical method, and the resort to it by so many preachers accounts for the growing unpopularity of the pulpit. Forsooth, Dr. Duff tells his readers that there are two stories of the Bible, and that they are both true, in spite of the fact that outwardly they contradict each other. To the preacher he says:—

> Just say you know two stories, and then tell far more about the grand facts of the developments that went on in man in Hebrew days and Jewish days.

If Professor Duff gives us an accurate description of the "New Crusade for the Use of the Bible," we can assure him that it will prove as gigantic a failure as did those awful crusades we read of Church history. Those disastrous campaigns had for their ultimate object, in the minds of the popes, the establishment of the papacy on a surer foundation in the confidence and affections of the people; but in the long run they were tragic fiascoes, and did not serve the desired end. Such will be the fate of the present campaign for the use of the Bible. It is now finally impossible to "bring all men to see Jesus," and Jesus only, in the so-called Book of Books, or anywhere else. The Gospel Jesus is an interesting creation of the theologian, and nothing more. The Christ-myth will still live on among a constantly diminishing minority; but it cannot any longer be as successfully exploited by the Church as it was in the Dark Ages. The doctrine of "Jesus only" has had its day, which will never return. After the God-man comes Man, with all the glorious possibilities which still lie latent within him.

J. T. Lloyd.

So far as I am concerned, I have made up my mind that no organization, secular or religious, shall be my master. I have made up my mind that no necessity of bread, or roof, or raiment shall ever put a padlock on my lips.—Ingersoll.

Digitized by Google

Mark Twain's Dream.

Speedy end to superstition, a gentle one if you can contrive it, but an end.—Carlyle.

The like will never come again; he is inimitable.—Goethe.

The art of the pen is to rouse the inward vision.—Meredith.

MARK TWAIN is largely regarded in England as the prince of jesters, and justly so. He was, however, so much more than that, for he was a great man, a great citizen, and a great writer. Mark Twain was the national author of the United States in a sense in which we, in England to-day, have no national writer. The feeling for him among his own people was like that of the Scotch for Sir Walter Scott ninety years ago, or like that of our fathers for Charles Dickens. There was admiration in it, gratitude, pride, and, above all, affection. This was shown at one of the last public dinners Mark Twain attended. When he came in he was escorted to the table, and the whole company, in which no man was undistinguished, rose to greet him, and remained standing till he had taken his seat.

This full flame of personal affection went out to Mark Twain for what he had written and what he had done. His brave and fiery dashes against tyranny, humbug, and corruption, attracted men no less than the irresistible laughter of his humour. The incident of his financial failure, which, like Sir Walter Scott's, was wholly the work of others, raised him to the rank of the heroes of literature. For he assumed a moral where there was no legal responsibility, and he set to work and paid off the debts. It takes a man to engage in and win such a fight with fate as that. Such a man's humour was bound to be interwoven with seriousness. "Papa," said his young daughter, "can make bright jokes, and he enjoys funny things, but still he is more interested in earnest books and earnest subjects."

Mark Twain was a thorough Freethinker, but he always wrote under the restraint of a family full of religious prejudice. His pious wife edited his jokes, and some of his serious attempts at philosophical writing, such as What is Man? were suppressed, or else withdrawn from circulation, by the unseen hand of piety. We shall never know what we lost by this procedure, or what we missed by this kindly philosopher being trammelled by the critic on the hearth.

For this reason all Freethinkers will be pleased at the posthumous publication of Mark Twain's Mysterious Stranger (Harpers), a volume discovered amongst his papers by his literary executor. The book is the strongest expression of Twain's views that has appeared, and will prove of unusual interest to all those who share the author's philosophical and sceptical views.

The book deals with the follies and crimes that men are led into by religion, and the mysterious stranger is Satan, who appears as a handsome youth named "Philip Traum." A fierce attack is made on the God idea, which is described as so monstrous that Satan wonders why man does not regard the universe as a nightmare. The profanity is not veiled, for "Philip" goes on:—

> Strange, because they are so frankly and hysterically insane—like all dreams: a God who could make good children as easily as bad, yet preferred to make bad ones; who could have made every one of them happy, yet never made a single happy one; who made them prize their bitter life, yet stingily cut it short; who gave his angels eternal happiness unearned, yet required his other children to earn it; who gave his angels painless lives, yet cursed his other children with biting miseries and maladies of mind and body; who mouths justice and invented hell—mouths mercy and invented hell—mouths Golden Rules, and forgiveness multiplied by seventy times seven, and invented hell; who mouths morals to other people and has none himself; who frowns upon crimes, yet commits them all; who created man without invitation, then tries to shuffle the responsibility for man's acts upon man, instead of honorably placing it where it belongs, upon Himself; and finally, with altogether Divine obtuseness, invites this poor, abused slave to worship him!

And the Satanic Philip sums up by saying: "You perceive now that these things are all impossible except in a dream. You perceive that they are pure and puerile insanities, the silly creations of an imagination that is not conscious of its freaks." So Mark Twain goes on holding the noses of his readers to the grindstone of thought, forcing them from complacency to discontent, stinging them into sensitiveness. Under the relentless rhetoric we are pierced through and through with a sense of the contrast between what life is and what it might be.

What are religious folk making of life? This is really Mark Twain's question, and the burden of his "dream." He is the corrosive acid that eats into the Christian complacency. He is the critic who does not give a moment's peace for cheap pious conclusions. Quieter in tone than most of his books, with no jesting at all, The Mysterious Stranger is a book that thrills with the life, the questioning, of to-day. Whatever the publishing season may produce, it is not likely to bring anything more vital, more significant, than this attack on Godism, written by one who was, in his generation, the most eminent man-of-letters in America, and whose books are still a large asset of national pride. The volume shows Ariel turned Prospero, and showing in the transformation how impressionable and extraordinary a spirit Ariel is. When Mark Twain passed away, the event eclipsed the gaiety of the English-speaking peoples. Despite his motley dress, he was ever a knight-errant charging down the wind at the hosts of superstition. Honour was his shield, and truth tipped his lance. Gentle in his dealings with gentle people, he was relentless in his contest with humbug. The lustre of his fame must deepen with the progress of the years:—

> What good is like to this
> To do worthy the writing, and to write
> Worthy the reading and the world's delight?

MIMNERMUS.

Science and Spiritualism.

II.

(Continued from p. 150.)

I confess that my admiration of Hamlet is somewhat dulled by reason of that ill-advised remark to Horatio about there being more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophies. The occultist always seizes upon that citation to refute the scientist. He prints it as his motto on his books and journals, and regards it as a slow poison that will in time effect the destruction of the rabble of scientists, and reveal the truth of his own Psycho-Harmonic Science or Heliocentric Astrology. It is one thing to be open-minded, and to realize the incompleteness of scientific knowledge, and to appreciate how often what was ignored by one generation has become the science of the next; and it is a very different thing to be impressed with coincidences and dreams and premonitions, and to regard them as giving the keynote to the conceptions of nature and reality, and to look upon science as a misdirected effort. Such differences of attitude depend frequently upon a difference of temperament as well as upon intellectual discernment. The man or woman who flies to the things not dreamt of in our philosophy quite commonly does not understand the things which our philosophy very creditably explains.—Professor Joseph Jastrow, "Fact and Fable in Psychology" (1901), p. 42.

With regard to the fact that various men, eminent in some sections of science, have expressed their belief in the reality of the existence of spirits apart from the human body, we may remark that the ability of man in one subject is but rarely > a proof of his ability in another; we know that although Ampere was an eminent mathematician, he was also a devout believer in transubstantiation; that Faraday was a great discoverer, and yet a believer in the doctrines of Sandeman; Volta, a Roman Catholic. Spiritualists appear to be in a somewhat similar position now, that believers in witchcraft' miracles, and other occult agencies, were in former times.—G. Gore, "The Scientific Basis of Morality" (1899), p. 307.

Digitized by Google

There are a multitude of books full of accounts of the physical phenomena of Spiritualism to which Spiritualists refer you if you wish for proofs of the phenomena. Like the age of miracles, the age of physical phenomena—table-rapping, levitation, spirit materialization, etc.—is past; or, if it is still indulged in, is confined to exceedingly private circles, far from the inquisitive eye of the investigator and the sceptic. We shall soon see why.

One of the most famous mediums was Slade. "Dr." Slade, as he called himself, was an American. In the middle of July, 1876, "Dr." Henry Slade came to London. His fame had preceded him, and he was warmly welcomed by leading Spiritualists. Slade made a great sensation. Several men of science who visited him were unable to explain the mysteries they had witnessed. It was even discussed by that august body, the British Association, at their meeting in that year, and "Lord Rayleigh mentioned that he had gone to Slade in company with a professional conjurer, who had admitted that he was completely puzzled."[1] This was because the tricks were new, and not the usual stock-in-trade of the professional conjurers. Slade professed to receive messages from the spirits, written on slates. Slade would hold a slate under the table for a time, and when reproduced it would be found to contain a message

Slade's triumphant career, however, did not last long. A few days after the British Association meeting, Professor Ray Lankester and Dr. Donkin visited Slade, and, having satisfied themselves at a previous visit of Slade's method, "Professor Lankester put his hypothesis to the test by snatching the slate out of Slade's hand before the ostensible sound of writing was heard, at a time when, presumably, therefore, the spirits had not begun to write. As he anticipated, he found the message already written."[2] Professor Ray Lankester prosecuted Slade for fraud. "The trial," says Mr. Maskelyne, "took place at Bow Street, and lasted several days. I was called as an expert, and performed the tricks in the witness-box. The result was that Slade was sentenced to three months' hard labour. An appeal was made against the magistrate's decision, and it was quashed, owing to a technical flaw in the indictment. New summonses were at once taken out, but Slade and his manager, Simmons—both Yankees—made tracks for the Continent before the summons could be served."[3]

The technical flaw in the indictment was merely the omission of the words "by palmistry or otherwise," which appeared in the Statute. A good instance of legal red-tape.

Slade was no fool. Maskelyne said, in the witness-box, that it took him several weeks' hard work to imitate Slade's tricks. He had, moreover, a front of brass; for notwithstanding his ignominious defeat and flight from England, we find him in the following year (1877) in Germany, where he made the biggest scoop of his life. At Leipsic, Professor Zollner, with the assistance of Professors Scheibner, Fechner, Weber, and Wundt, undertook an inquiry into the phenomena in the presence of Slade. So assured was Zollner that Slade's tricks were the works of spirits, that he made them the foundation of his book, Transcendental Physics.

[1] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., p. 89.
[2] Ibid, vol. ii., p. 89.
[3] Maskelyne, The Supernatural, p. 195.

One of Zollner's colleagues, a Professor of Surgery in the University of Leipsic, made a bet with Zollner that a slate carefully sealed and watched by himself could not be written upon by spirits. He had left the slate in Professor Zollner's hands, in the confidence that the latter would use all the necessary precautions, says Dr. Paul Carus; "Professor Zollner, however, not finding Mr. Slade at home, saw nothing wrong in leaving the sealed slate at the medium's residence, and thus allowing it to pass for an indefinite time out of his own control, thinking that the seals were a sufficient protection. It goes without saying that his colleague at once cancelled the bet, and took no more interest in the experiment."[1] Mr. Carl Willmann, of Hamburg, a manufacturer of magical apparatus, and the author of several books on modern magic, gives a circumstantial account of Zollner's double slates used in seances with Slade, now in the possession of Dr. Borcherdt, of Hamburg, who bought them after Zollner's decease. "To a superficial inspection they appear unbroken, but the sealing-wax shows vestiges of finger marks, and Mr. Willmann has not the slightest doubt that they were opened underneath the seal with a thin heated wire, and that the seal was afterwards again attached to its place."[2]

Slade also had the audacity to produce foot and hand-prints of the spirits. These were probably made from rubber or celluloid impressions carried in his pockets. "Mr. Willmann calls attention to the fact that the foot-prints as published by Professor Zollner were made from feet whose stockings had been removed but a few moments before, for they still show the meshes of the knitting, which quickly disappear as soon as the skin of the foot grows cold. Professor Zollner did not see such trifles, and yet they are important, even if it were for the mere purpose of determining whether the spirits wear stockings made in Germany or America."[3]

Zollner had two rings turned from the solid wood, and brought them to Slade to get them linked together by spiritual power. Of course, he did not do it. What happened was that, at the conclusion of a seance, "the two wooden rings, or two others like them, were found strung on the leg of a table, which it does not appear that Zollner—he was alone with the medium—had examined before the seance."[4] Other tests were evaded or refused altogether, such as reversing the spiral in a snail-shell and the introduction of a piece of paraffin wax into a hollow bulb of blown glass.

However, the report of Zollner, backed by his colleagues, carried so much weight that the Seybert Commission—so called after Mr. Henry Seybert, who left a sum of money to the University of Pennsylvania to investigate Spiritualism—sent Professor Fullerton, the secretary, over to investigate the subject, who, in a summary of his conclusions, says:—

> Thus it would appear that of the four eminent men whose names have made famous the investigation, there is reason to believe one, Zollner, was of unsound mind at the time, and anxious for experimental verification of an already accepted hypotheses; another, Fechner, was partly blind, and believed because of Zollner's observations; a third, Schiebner, was also afflicted with defective vision, and not entirely satisfied in his own mind as to the phenomena; and a fourth, Weber, was advanced in age, and did not even recognize the disabilities of his associates. No one of these men had ever before had experience of this sort, nor was any one of them acquainted with the ordinary possibilities of deception.

[1] Carus, "The Old and the New Magic," The Open Court (June, 1900), p. 344.
[2] Ibid, p. 344.
[3] Ibid, p. 345.
[4] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., p. 193.

Digitized by Google

the experience of our Commission with Dr. Slade would suggest that the lack of such knowledge on their part was unfortunate.[1]

(To be continued.) W. MANN.

Profiteering and the Pulpit.

DURING the spring and summer months of last year (and in all probability ever since), the City of Cardiff was visited by a tidal wave of phenomenal prosperity which made its commercial heart beat with the vigour of youth. This sudden accession of energy sent the currents of its new life throbbing through at least a tract of its business veins with a more bounding pulse than had previously marked it during our sojourn there. The boom manifested itself in a feverish eagerness for enjoyment and diversion; for displays of decorative vanity; and for ampler opportunities of self-indulgence.

The great retailing establishments of the city, especially those of the drapery and kindred trades, were, at the usual business hours, crowded with buyers; and the fashionable restaurants in the principal streets were simply thronged at certain times of the day with smart young men in khaki and with blithe young women, displaying with conscious pride the "latest" in hat or costume, whose apparent motive was not so much a desire to be artistically dressed as to create an impression on those around them, that what they wore was absolutely new and of the latest style. The more ungainly and freakish the articles were in design or colour, the more proudly they appeared to strut about, being under the impression, I fancy, that such a "get-up" was better calculated to attract the attention they desired to arrest. At all events, that seems the only plausible soluton of the riddle, why smart young girls should voluntarily make such guys of themselves.

One could not infer from the vivacity and merriment of this "Mayfair" that life could have a dismal side—that the same city embraced vast areas of slumdom, hidden away in the sombre shadows of that black mass of destitution and misery which hung over them permanently as a pall, and through whose streets and alleys flowed without ceasing the bitter "waters of Marah."

Nor was there anything in the scene to remind one of the fact that the city also includes multitudes of ruined homes and livelihoods, and of blasted careers that were, but yesterday, full of promise and expectation. Nor, again, that it harboured thousands of mothers, wives, and orphans grieving about the possible fate of sons and husbands, lamenting over the wounded, or mourning their dead. But the sighs and the sobs were effectively drowned by the sound of mirth and the voice of gaiety.

This financial sunimer-scene, however, was not confined to the effervescence of young life. It was an epidemic which had infected an entire section of its citizens, irrespective of age. Houses were eviscerated of their old contents, and then refilled with new furniture of a modern and costly design. People who never knew the luxury of having a motor-car of their own suddenly became proud owners; while those who already enjoyed the luxury, disposed of it for a song, to make room for another of a more luxurious type. Magnificent new buildings, some of them sumptuous enough to be called mansions, sprang up with mushroom suddenness and growth. Persons who used to live in humble streets migrated to more aristocratic quarters; and many who were comparatively poor grew rich at a rate reminiscent of Jonah's gourd.

Is war, then, a fruit-bearing tree laden with golden apples, to be had for the plucking? To a certain section of the inhabitants it proved to be such, despite the fact that to the mass of the nation it is a veritable upas tree, whose breath is the blast of death and desolation. What, then, is the secret of this anomaly? Where lies the fountain of this selective tide? Is it a manifestation of the working of special Providence? If so, how inscrutable is the moral mystery of the divine scheme! If, however, we seek a solution of the riddle in human nature, it presents no difficulty: it is contained in one magic word—Profiteering.

Cardiff is a port, and is dependent almost entirely upon the docks, i.e., upon the shipping industry. The War increased to an enormous extent the demand for tonnage, and at the same time equally reduced the available supply. And shipowners, seeing a rare chance of piling up wealth, took full advantage of the national predicament, and charged such exorbitant rates for freightage that fabulous profits were reaped from each cargo. Ships were sold and resold for many times their original values. And well they may; for in some instances, I am told, a single voyage realized in profits the cost of the vessel.

To enable the reader to realize these facts, I append a few figures of War and pre-War freights.

In 1913, the average rate of freight for coal per ton for the port of Gibraltar was 6s. 3½d. A week or so ago 77s. 6d. was paid for the same! An increase of £3 11s. on an original of 6s.! The same is true of corn. The freight for bringing a cargo of maize, costing £7,500, across from Argentina to Swansea was £33,000, or nearly five times the cost of the corn.

Now, however reprehensible this practice may be in the eyes of those whom Providence did not include among those privileged to share in the "swag," it should not be overlooked that the practice is not rare or unique in modern society. It is only a variety belonging to a wide, comprehensive class of similar exploits. It is merely an instance of the "short cuts" devised by self-conscious man for procuring the necessities and "extras" of life without toiling for them.

Profiteering is but a species of class-exploitation, as the "policy and practice" of preying upon the community by a section of it, is denominated. This parasitic habit or mode of life is effected by exploiting some human characteristic as "fulcrum and lever" to attain its end. For example: The priesthood has, from the dim dawn of human origins, exploited man's ignorance, credulity, and fear, in order to live in sloth and ease. Rulers, slave-lords, and capitalists have similarly exploited his hunger and his sentient skin, and through these his capacity for toil, to provide them with the means of sumptuous living. The "trade" exploits his craving for drink. The decorative industries exploit his vanity. The theatrical and kindred vocations do the same of his thirst for diversion and amusement; and so forth through the entire gamut of human wants, failings, or capacities. And since these practices get petrified as privileges, customs, laws, institutions, vocations, trades, and industries, modern society has become a conglomerate mass of mutually exploiting groups, each trying to "do" the rest, and each being on the alert against being done by other exploiters.

We are now able to define profiteering with greater precision. It is the policy of exploiting a nation's needs in a state of distress. For the sake of brevity, I left out from the definition two adjectives: the "needs" are imperative and the "distress" is abnormal. What makes its culpability still more detestable is the fact that it unavoidably tends to intensify the distress it exploits—an effect we now feel throughout the country in the fabulous prices paid for articles of food and other necessary commodities.

[1] Maskelyne, The Supernatural, p. 209.

Digitized by Google

If exploitation is thus so baneful, and differs from robbery only in its method of attaining its end, why is it comparatively respectable? Why is the profiteer so often envied instead of being execrated and hounded out of society, or lynched?

The reason is, that whatever society condones or sanctions is respectable, however morally base it may be. And, conversely, whatever it denounces or condemns is disreputable, whatever be its ethical justification or necessity. Constant evil produces moral blindness and insensibility, just as the hideous, in time, paralyses the eye and robs it of its sense of beauty.

Again, it is frequently asked, as a still greater wonder and mystery: Why does not the Christian pulpit denounce the evil; or, rather, preach a crusade against it? They ask in astonishment: "Why is the pulpit so dumb when so flagrant an evil stalks so unblushingly throughout the land, spreading privation as it goes?" Is not "morality" claimed by it to be an essential part of its function? This common surprise was vigorously voiced by "Rita" in recent numbers of the Sunday World, under the heading "What's Wrong with the Church?"

Now, to expect the Church to denounce exploitation is to forget, or shut one's eyes, to the history and fixed policy of that Institution. It is tantamount to expecting the Church to commit suicide; for religion is the mother of the evil—the priesthood being probably the most ancient of exploiting classes. The pulpit has at best preached only negative or prohibitive morality. It has never commended or advocated the positive conditions of social wellbeing. The orthodox pulpit has never lifted a voice against exploitation—against the practice of class or trade preying upon the community. On the contrary, it has invariably condoned, sanctioned, or blessed the practice. The normal function of the pulpit is other-worldly; its aim is not social wellbeing as such, but to fortify and keep strong the believer's faith—in other words, to gain converts and to maintain its hold upon those already in the fold.

That society is in a deplorable state of moral torpor is obvious from its attitude towards exploitation in general and profiteering in particular—that is, in the freedom and respectability enjoyed by the profiteers, and in the necessity of resorting to legislation to check him! What modern society needs is an institution corresponding to the pulpit, to awaken the secular conscience to social evils and create a moral atmosphere in which the exploiter could no more exist than could animal life do in one deprived of oxygen. If the pulpit was an organ of "morality," and not that for buttressing up a topling "faith," there would be no occasion for the appointment of a Food Controller.

KERIDON.

The "Freethinker" in Liverpool.

We printed last week a letter from Mr. Silverman, criticising our comments on the boycotting and burning of the Freethinker at Liverpool. We have received many letters commentiug on the proceedings, and also the following from Mr. J. W. Gott, who was our informant in the first instance:—

> Dear Mr. Cohen,—If you will refer again to my letter describing the treatment of the Freethinker at the hands of the Liverpool Socialists, you will find that, instead of being two I. L. P. meetings, it was the Liverpool Fabian Society where several members threatened to resign unless the Freethinker was removed from the literature stall. And it was at the Islington Branch of the I. L. P. where a very heated discussion took place, and where it was decided that the unsold copies should be burned.
>
> Your correspondent, Ernest W. Silverman, is correct in stating that I was not present at the meeting of the Islington Branch of the I. L. P., but I made the statement on the authority of a member who was there—Mr. Thomson, Secretary of the Fabian Society, 30 Lord Street, Liverpool. The statement was confirmed by several other Socialists whose names I did not know.
>
> Now that that part of my statement referring to the burning of the Freethinker has been challenged by Mr. Silverman, I have seen Mr. Thomson again, and he reaffirms most positively that it was decided that the unsold copies should be burned.
>
> Now for a later experience which came immediately under my own notice on Sunday, March 4, at a meeting of the Liverpool and District Independent Labour Party, which includes all the Brauches, held at the rooms of the Edge Hill Branch, 264 Upper Parliament Street, for the purpose of considering the resolutions and amendments for the coming National I. L. P. Conference, and also for the purpose of rejoicing at the selection of a parson—Rev. Herbert Dunnico—as Parliamentary I. L. P. candidate for the West Derby Division of Liverpool. Again the question of having the Freethinker on the bookstall was raised, and again it was decided that it should be removed. This was not done without several strong protests of disapproval from members of the Edge Hill Branch. I am proud of my comrades' decision later on: that so far as the Edge Hill meetings were concerned, I might sell it at all times.
>
> Nobody, of course, buys the Freethinker unless they want it. Then why should the Christian Socialist section try to prevent them from getting it? I never heard of a Freethinker objecting to the sale of the Christian Commonwealth, although it is on sale at many meetings. Let's have toleration all round.—Yours faithfully, J. W. Gott.

Mr. Gott, it will be seen, reaffirms his statements, and, it seems to us, on good authority. And there is the statement of a Socialist official concerning the order to burn unsold copies of this paper. As Mr. Gott says, Christian papers are sold at many I. L. P. meetings, and no objection is raised. Why, then, object to the Freethinker? We have no space in which to pursue the matter further this week; we must leave it for Freethinking members of the I. L. P. to see that their opinions are treated with decency and respect. If they are content to see the I. L. P. run as a semi-Christian movement, well and good. We have done our part when we have made the matter public and entered our protest.

Acid Drops.

The piety of the Daily Telegraph is of a peculiar and expansive kind, and it creeps out often in the leading articles. In a recent utterance on the shipping crisis, it burst out "The times call for such an awakening movement as the Salvation Army undertook years ago in connection with the submerged tenth." Unfortunately, all the drums and tambourines of the "Blood and Fire" Crusade did not raise the "submerged tenth"—but the Salvation Army got a cheap advertisement, the effect of which is seen in the Daily Telegraph's remarks.

Sir Arthur Lee, Director-General of Food Production, has asked the clergy to invite their congregations to work on the land on Sundays, and he quoted a saying of Zoroaster: "He who sows the ground with care and diligence acquires a greater stock of religious merit than he could gain by the repetition of 10,000 prayers." There is a deal of Secularism in the remark.

The self-sacrificing heroism of the clergy deserves a volume devoted to the fascinating subject. According to an Essex newspaper, six local ministers are to compete in an apple-pie making competition at Westcliff-on-Sea. The report adds, "the pies will be made by the ministers at their own homes, and it is provided that no help is to be given."

Mrs. Sarah Jones, who has died at Rochford, Worcestershire, aged 103, worked in her garden till a few days before her death. Poor old Adam was gardening till he was near a thousand years old.

A good story is told of an Essex conscientious objector who has been imprisoned for his principles. Whilst in goal, the chaplain came to see him, and asked him what he was there for, and he replied, "For carrying out the teaching of your Master." A palpable hit!

Digitized by Google

The Daily Mail says "it is understood that several bishops are working in connection with the problem of venereal disease." What noses the clergy have for such things!

An extraordinary speech was delivered by Archdeacon Wakeford at Llangollen, in which he said "a great war was needed to save us from damnation. As a people, luxury and materialism dominated us, and God in his mercy smote us." The Archdeacon did not explain why thirteen other nations were suffering from the War, and why his Deity punished them for our shortcomings.

A recent law case was headed "Adam's Appeal." It had no connection with that little affair in the Garden of Eden.

Ramsgate school-children have saved their pence and invested £300 in the War Loan. The missionary boxes will not be so heavy in that locality.

A London daily paper states that women are not good at arithmetic. If this be so, the ladies share this failing with the dear clergy, who always make a tangle of the Trinity.

A daily paper devoted a lengthy paragraph to the subject of the King's laugh, which was described as being "jolly." That's one of the penalties of worshipping the Man of Sorrows.

An Essex evangelist boasted recently that he had distributed Bibles to some soldiers, and added that the men invariably went into action with them. It's a good thing his gifts were not family Bibles.

Those confounded Germans won't play the game in any direction. Although we have been assured on the highest clerical authority that Germany is a nation of Atheists, we see from the Daily Express that Herr Vereyon, Professor of Philosophy at Bonn, has been sent to the Western Front for delivering a lecture against Christian dogmas. Shameful! They are behaving just as though they were Christians.

The Rev. E. N. Gowing, speaking at Southend-on-Sea on the National Mission, said one of the greatest needs of the present time among the younger clergy was the spirit of reading. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why the parsons are so shy of debates.

"There is indeed small justification for grumbling at the writing of the present time," says Mr. H. G. Wells. Evidently, Mr. Wells does not read the parish magazines and religious periodicals.

The announcement that Dean Henson, of Durham, will preach at the Nonconformist City Temple, London, has caused a flutter in the sectarian dovecotes. Strict Churchmen are expecting the Bishop of London to inhibit Dr. Henson, just as Bishop Gore did some years ago when he preached at Digbeth Institute, Birmingham. How these Christians do love one another.

The Rev. Kenneth Bond, of Chesterfield, has announced his intention of devoting seven Sundays to farm work. What courage! And where does Brother Bond expect to spend eternity?

Father Bernard Vaughan says: "The birth-rate was never so low. We should do something to promote a population worthy of the Empire." Excellent advice to come from a priest of a Church full of nuns and monks.

In an article on "Religion and the War" in the Daily Chronicle, the writer says that the ruins of the cathedrals and churches have stricken the population with remorse and sorrow. It is so like Christians to think more of damaged religious relics than of men's lives.

A London newspaper states that about two thousand French priests have been killed and wounded in the present War. In the same paper, one reads the thrilling announcement that the Rev. J. Haslam, an English Wesleyan minister, has started work at a Wigton jam factory. France uses her clergy, but we do not.

In a sermon on the wickedness of Sunday gardening, the Rev. J. R. Brown, Vicar of Canvey Island, Essex, said, "the Archbishop of Canterbury was as necessary as a Food Controller." As the shoemaker said, "There's nothing like leather."

The Jezreelites were once a fairly strong sect in England, but there are few left now. They were distinguished by a vow never to have their hair cut. One of them, named Richard Shilling, whose hair reached the ground, believed that the Archangel Michael had forbidden him to eat, and the coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Self-imposed starvation." They don't believe in angels in Kent.

A letter has been sent to the new "pastor" in the City Temple, who is in America, urging him not to run undue risk in coming to England in view of the submarine menace. He said he hoped to begin his ministry in April; but the people who have engaged him only believe in God's protection to a certain extent. "Trust in God." Yes, but not too much.

The clergy are, naturally, trying to turn the National Service movement to their own interests. The Moderators of the Church of Scotland and the U. F. General Assembly have issued a manifesto suggesting that teaching would be a work suitable to ministers, and it would release teachers for other service. We beg to assert that there is no work for which a minister of religion is less fitted than that of teaching. Many as are the disasters that have overtaken this country in consequence of the War, the heaviest of all would be to allow the clergy to enter the schools in the manner suggested.

How careful some people are to avoid offending Christian susceptibilities! Dr. Robertson, Superintendent of the Edinburgh Mental Hospital, says that Spiritualism is recorded amongst the causes of insanity. This may be true, but almost anything may serve as the occasion for an attack of insanity. And, after all, the part played by Spiritualism in producing insanity comes under the general head of "religion." There is no other form more hopeless than religious insanity.

The clergy are always asserting that this is a Christian country, but there are flies in the ointment. During January, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children dealt with 3,656 cases of neglect and cruelty. And the hymn tells us, "There's a friend for little children up above the bright blue sky."

Sir Charles Wakefield, ex-Lord Mayor of London, said in the present War the Eton boy and the slum boy were in the trenches together. He might have added that the clergy were safe at the back of the Front, or in the tea-shops at home.

One child was killed, and six other little ones seriously injured by the fall of a brick wall at the Catholic School of the Holy Name, Manchester. Yet, according to the papers, statues of the Virgin have been saved providentially on the Continent.

Many religious people are not above conceit when it is a question of paying out, and, where income-tax is concerned, they will take the meanest advantage of defrauding the revenue. An instance of that is the case of Mr. John Williams, J.P., managing director of the Clayton Tinplate Works, who is connected with the religious life of South Wales, is reported. He was severely lectured by Mr. Justice Bailbache, at the Glamorgan Assizes, and fined £4,000, with costs, for falsifying his income-tax returns. In 1916 defendant returned his income as £400, the true amount being a thousand pounds. What is that text about the eye of a needle?

Digitized by Google

Special.

The latest rise in the price of paper has brought me a number of inquiries from friends as to what I purpose doing in view of the new situation thus created. I am pleased to have had these letters, since they show how keen is the interest taken in the welfare of the Freethinker; and it would be useless pretending, with the price of newspapers—daily and weekly—being increased in all directions, and party organs frankly admitting that they are engaged in a veritable struggle for existence, that the outlook is not a serious one. Hard as the struggle has been since the War commenced, it threatens to become still harder in the near future. But I do not wish to decide in a hurry, or act in a panic. Much will depend upon whether the price now asked for paper—five times that of the pre-War cost—is a panic price or not. A week or two longer should settle that question, and I will defer saying anything definite as to what plans I have in my mind. But a fresh order for paper will have soon to be placed; or, it may be necessary to purchase future supplies at once – this will mean the getting of ready money for that purpose. Meanwhile, I can assure all and sundry that the Freethinker in its present form is quite safe for the time. I am taking no unnecessary risks, but I am loth to make any demands upon the friends of this paper that are not imperative. Their loyalty and the assurances of their continued support has been a source of strength and inspiration to me, and for that I thank them most heartily.

Chapman Cohen.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

March 18, Leicester; March 25, Manchester; April 1, Portsmouth: April 8, Swansea.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—March 25, Avondale Hall, Clapham.

Libra.—Quite so; the only difference between the various brands of clergymen is the label. Pleased you are "enjoying the Freethinker more than ever."

G. Edwards.—Your remittance will cover five, not four, week's issue of the Freethinker, which will be sent you.—You can only be released from Church Parade by the goodwill of your officer.—We cannot answer your last question, as we are unaware of the gentleman's whereabouts.

Mr. E Robertshaw, of 1, Peter Street, Boothtown, Rotherham, Halifax, writes that he can supply D. Fisher with a copy of Buchner's Force and Matter if he will write him.

W. Bell.—We are inclined to agree with you that the majority of I.L.P. members are not intolerant It is often an active and shortsighted minority that are responsible for such things as those of which complaint is made.

W. Wright.—Received with thanks. As soon as we can manage it shall appear, but we are overloaded for the moment.

J. A. Reid.—Many actors, like many other people, find it profitable to exploit the prevailing superstition. When superstition ceases to pay, we shall have less of it on the stage.

Major Warren.—Thanks for cuttings. Will be useful. We have not yet had time to notice the N. C. article, but hope to do so.

Owing to many calls on our time during the past week, we are obliged to hold over a number of letters until next week.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

There was a good meeting at the Birmingham Town Hall last Sunday for Mr. Cohen's lecture on "Christianity and the War." The address was listened to with close attention, and frequently applauded. Mr. Willis occupied the chair, and managed to elicit a few questions from the audience. To-day (March 18) Mr. Cohen lectures at the Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate, Leicester.

Will Manchester friends please note that Mr. Cohen lectures in Manchester on Sunday next (March 25). The meetings, afternoon and evening, will be in "The Cozy Corner Picture Hall," at the corner of Swan Street and Oak Street, Shudehill. On Saturday evening (March 24) there will be a meeting of the Manchester members at the Merchants' Hotel, Oldham Street, to meet Mr. Cohen, and discuss with him, as President of the N. S. S. the future work of the Branch.

A debate has been arranged between Mr. Clifford Williams, of Birmingham, and Mr. E. Phillips, on the subject "Is There a God?" Mr. Phillips takes the affirmative, and the vicar of Walsall is to take the chair. The date of the encounter is March 19, at 8 p.m. Place, The Corporation Hall, Bridge Street, Walsall. We hope that Freethinkers will make a special note of the occasion.

A discussion will be opened this evening (March 18) at the St. Pancras Reform Club, 15, Victoria Road, Kentish Town Road, by Mr. H. E. Hunt, of the London Spiritual Alliance, on "Spiritualism both Reasonable and True." The meeting is held under the auspices of the North London Branch N. S. S., and commences at 7.30. Mr. Hunt is, we believe, one of the regular speakers for the Alliance, and should, therefore, speak with authority.

Several weeks ago we announced as nearly ready the new pamphlets—a reprint of Mr. Foote's Christianity and Progress, and Christianity and Pagan Morality, by Mr. Mann. The delay in issuing is due to no fault of ours. The paper for them was duly bought, but it has not yet been delivered. The trouble appears to be due to want of labour to get the paper from the mills to our office. However, we expect to have it in a few days, and then we can go ahead.

The Reflections of Riquet (A Dog).

One day, a broken jug, filled with water, was being carried across the drawing-room, and moistened the wax floor. I think that that wicked jug was well whipped.

During the sleep of men, of dogs, of houses, of trees, one sees forms that are pleasant, and forms that are terrible. And when one awakes, those forms have disappeared.

When I wish, I speak. Out of the mouth of my master there come some sounds that form sense. But the sense is a great deal less plain than that which I make by the sounds of my voice. In my mouth all has a sense. In that of my master's there is much vain noise. It is difficult, but necessary, to guess the thoughts of my master.

Anatole France (Translated by H. W. Edwards).

Digitized by Google

The French Revolution.

VI.

PARIS AT BAY.

(Continued from p. 141).

BY the insurrection of May 31 to June 2, Marat and the "sections" of Paris hoped that they had cleared the way for drastic social reform, for the confiscation of excessive incomes for the benefit of the distressed, the disestablishment of the Church, the compulsory war-loan, and all the other measures whose enactment or execution had been held up by the reactionary influences in the Convention. The Girondists, however, had no intention of submitting quietly to what they regarded as a lawless outrage on constitutional authority. In the days following June 2, many of those deputies who had been expelled eluded their guards, repaired to the departments, and proceeded to raise civil war against Paris. The departmental authorities everywhere, like the Convention itself, were elected indirectly and undemocratically, and most of them, including the entire south and west of France, declared against Marat and the "Mountain." Lyons, as has been mentioned, was already in arms, and Marseilles, Toulon, Bordeaux, and Normandy followed the lead so given. Paris seemed isolated and doomed. To make matters worse, the war continued to go ill for France. The treachery of Dumouriez had left the French armies disorganized and helpless. The Austrians, supported now by an English army, drove the French out of Belgium, invaded France, and took Valenciennes and Conde. The towns in Germany occupied by the French were recaptured. At the same time, France was invaded by Spain in the south, while England blockaded the French ports, stopped all imports of provisions, and helped the other Allies with money. The peasant revolt in La Vendee, already mentioned, made formidable headway. At first merely a "pogrom" got up by the priests, the rising soon attracted the support of Royalist nobles like Lescure and La Rochejacquelein, under whom the insurgents took Saumur and Angers, attacked Nantes, and aspired to march on Paris. These Vendean insurgents have been represented by sentimental religious writers as poor innocent lambs, butchered without provocation by the wicked Republicans. As a matter of fact, terrible atrocities were perpetrated by the Vendeans before the Republic was in any position to meet them. Religious wars have always been most savage; and those Republicans might think themselves lucky who were killed outright, and were not reserved (as in many cases) to be tortured, crucified, or buried alive by the peasants, mad with the poisonous religious hatred fanned by their priests.

What with Prussians, Austrians, Spaniards, English, Vendean Royalists, and Girondists at Lyons and other towns, the plight of Parisian democracy looked perilous indeed. Paris was in no position to insist on a comprehensive social programme for the whole country. While, therefore, the municipality took on its own initiative, and for Paris alone, such measures as the enforcement of the maximum price for commodities, the levying of the compulsory loan, the organization of the armed populace into a "revolutionary army," etc., the Convention, beyond one important measure ordering the partition of confiscated land among the peasant population, and sweeping away the remnants of feudal rights, was chiefly concerned rather to conciliate than to defy the revolted departments. Six "Montagnard" deputies were nominated to frame, as quickly as possible, a democratic constitution, which, while instituting direct manhood suffrage, and maintaining municipal self-government, should assure the departments that there was no intention of imposing a Socialist regime on them against their will. This project, known as the Constitution of 1793, was mainly the work of Herault de Sechelles, an ex-noble of advanced opinions, and an intimate friend of Danton. While carrying political democracy further than it had ever been carried before, it left social reform an open question, to be settled as occasion arose. This scheme was adopted by the Convention, and submitted for acceptance to the people throughout France. It was immensely popular, and to a great extent cut away the ground from beneath the feet of the Girondist insurgents. However, it was clearly impossible to put the Constitution into force when part of the country was occupied by invaders or rebels; and the Constitution remained in abeyance.

One last severe blow the Girondists were able to strike before they went under. Inflamed by the talk of the Girondist deputies who, after escaping from Paris, had foregathered at Caen in Normandy, a young lady named Charlotte Corday went up from Caen to Paris with the intention of killing Marat. As leader and spokesman of the Parisian democracy, Marat was odious to the Girondists more than any other man. He was at this time broken down in health, and confined to his house. Charlotte Corday wrote to him, pretending that she had important information to give, and also that she was unhappy and persecuted for her Revolutionary opinions. Marat (a kindly man, in spite of his hot-headed and irritable disposition) received her. He was so ill that he had to sit in a covered bath, with a board and writing materials placed across it. While he was writing down her information, Charlotte Corday plunged a dagger into his heart. She was seized, tried, and guillotined. But L'Ami du Peuple was dead, and there was no one in the Democratic party who combined such an insight into social conditions with such self-effacing sincerity. Reactionary historians have represented him as a criminal lunatic thirsting for blood and rapine. His temperament led him often to express himself in lurid and violent language; and his circular commending the September massacres is really deplorable. But, on the whole, the Revolution produced no better and honester man, and few abler men, than Jean-Paul Marat.

Bitterly did the common people of Paris mourn their friend and hero. The body lay in state in the Cordeliers' Club, that centre of advanced ideas, where Marat had helped to organize the demand for Radical reform in days when it was dangerous to do so. His funeral was honoured, like that of Lapelletier St. Fargeau, his predecessor in martyrdom, by the attendance of the Convention in a body, followed by the municipality of Paris and a vast concourse of people.

The assassination of Marat took place on July 13, 1793. On July 16, at Lyons, the Girondists guillotined Chalier, his friend and disciple, who had preached the social revolution to the workers of that city, and had been arrested when the wealthy seized power there.

If Charlotte Corday really thought that by stabbing Marat she was serving humanity, she was terribly mistaken. The effect of the deed was to provoke the Democratic party to greater energy, and to measures of reprisal. The Convention declared outlaws those Girondist deputies who were fomenting civil war, and ordered the trial of those who had remained in Paris. On August 10, the anniversary of the downfall of the monarchy, a festival was held in Paris in honour of the Democratic constitution, which had been accepted by an overwhelming majority of the people. The delegates who had come to Paris for the occasion demanded, in view of the foreign and domestic crisis, the arrest of all suspected persons, and a new general levy for the Army. No one dreamt of returning to settled government until the soil of France should be free from invasion and rebellion. The Girondists in Normandy had been forced to disperse, but La Vendee was still ablaze, Lyons and Toulon defied the Government, and the Austrians were in the north with nothing between them and Paris. They might, in fact, have marched on the capital, but for their anxiety to reduce the towns on the Franco-Belgian frontier, which they hoped to retain if peace were made.

Digitized by Google

A change now took place in the Government. The disasters without and within had shaken confidence in the first Committee of Public Safety and in Danton, its chief member. On July 10, before the murder of Marat, a new committee had been elected; the number had been reduced to nine, and Danton had been left out. The nine members were all advanced Radical Republicans, except one, Barere, a man of the "Marsh," a fickle and impressionable man, ready to swim with the stream. Robespierre was elected in a vacancy later in July. In August, the body was strengthened by the addition of Carnot, an army officer of great ability, to whom was entrusted the organization of national defence. At the beginning of September two men were added, to whom was given the task of establishing the authority of the Government at home—Billaud-Varenne and Collot d'Herbois. These two men were the extremists of the committee. They followed Marat in his social policy, and believed that the object of the Republic should be the abolition of riches and poverty through heavy death duties, the limitation of private ownership of land, and (in short) steady development in a Socialist direction. Unfortunately, Billaud-Varenne and Collot d'Herbois had not the superb loyalty to an idea that had marked Marat, and they were vindictive to a degree which far surpassed his most violent moods. Both of them, in fact, were party pamphleteers, whose metier was to popularize the ideas of abler men than themselves, and who ought never to have been asked to govern men.

The new Radical Cabinet (for that is what the Committee of Public Safety really was) was speedily armed by the Convention with perilous and extraordinary powers, dictated solely by the war situation. Danton, an abler man than all of them put together, and whose dismissal from power was a public misfortune, loyally supported his successors in office. The Revolutionary Tribunal was strengthened in personnel to enable it to deal with more cases. The "law of suspects"—a measure analogous to our Defence of the Realm Act—was passed, providing for the arrest and detention of all dangerous and suspicious characters, i.e., all nobles, Royalists, Girondists, and enemies of the Government generally. The distress in Paris was met by the rough-and-ready method of paying every workman two francs a time for attending the meetings of his "section," which were held twice a week. At the same time, universal military service was introduced; everyone, from 18 to 40, was to be enrolled in the Army; France was to be an armed camp; and commissioners of the Convention were to accompany every army to see that the generals did their duty, and that mess, muddle, and make-believe were avoided. In this way fourteen armies were soon at the disposal of Carnot, the War Minister (in fact, though not in name). The Austrians and English were beaten back at Hondschoote and Wattignies, Carnot himself leading a charge at the latter engagement. The Vendean insurrection was gradually brought under. Lyons was besieged, bombarded, and fell early in October. Toulon, which had called in English assistance, still held out, and was not taken till December. It was at the siege of Toulon that Napoleon Bonaparte, then a young subordinate officer, first distinguished himself.

Before the fruits of the new organization were reaped, Danton's health broke down, and he had to retire to his country home to recuperate. The effect of this was to leave the Government without any effective criticism. The one man who, now that Marat was dead, might have given ballast to the ship of State, was out of the way. The lamentable consequences of this accident will now demand our attention.

Robert Arch.

(To be continued.)

Christianity as the Symbolism of Factuality.

A Reply by the Vicar of Bromyard.

In replying to Mr. J. T. Lloyd's criticism of my recent sermon on "The Father-heart of God and the World-agony of War," I should like first to acknowledge its kind and reasonable temper. The day, I hope, is fast passing when these great questions at issue could only be discussed in an atmosphere of anger and acrimony. In approaching these interesting problems it is only right that we should seek to discard the imputation of motives which has too often characterized their discussion, and to conduct it with calmness and such freedom from prejudice as we can attain.

As Mr. Lloyd says, that "so far as the negative position of this discourse is concerned we are in hearty agreement with it," there is little need for me further to labour it. But he is uncompromisingly opposed to my effort "to discern the traces of a Divine Father's heart in the existing European situation." He will, perhaps, remember that I said that "the Father-heart is not in man's follies and crimes but in his aspirations and true ideals, not in any war except in the sacrifice and devotion which attend it." The Father-heart is, therefore, in my view not to be found in the European situation as a whole, but only in the highest and best part of it—i.e., in human nature at its best. In my sermon I distinctly said that it was in "the ever-growing spirit of humanity alone where, it seems to me, we should seek the evidence of the great Father-heart."

But Mr. Lloyd demurs to my differentiating the idea of Fatherhood as the communication of life from the idea of Fatherhood as the outpouring of love. He says "the one gives the lie direct to the other." But does it? Will Mr. Lloyd deny that the two represent actual facts of human existence? The Fatherly communication of life is ever going on, and has been going on for many myriads of æons. It is involved in parentage, and in the most simple and elementary generation. Does Mr. Lloyd not share what Mr. Herbert Spencer called "the absolute certainty that we are ever in the presence of an Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed?" He says that "to call Nature God is a most deplorable instance of misnaming." And yet immediately afterwards he adds: "that the poet may and does personify" Nature, and that "Meredith now and then uses the theological name God." But is a preacher really to be denied that which a poet and a novelist may enjoy? May I not be allowed to substitute a little time-honoured word of three letters for Spencer's "Infinite and Eternal Energy?" Did I not admit that as the communication of life God stands for the great world process, for that stream of tendency by which all things seek to fulfil the law of their being? If Shelley, Keats, and Meredith are permitted by Mr. Lloyd to call this God, why may not I? And the more so since I acknowledged that "in the presence of a mystery apparently everlastingly impenetrable we are all Agnostics"—priests and philosophers, poets and novelists alike! This being so, my chief concern is not that the universe should be provided with "a great first cause," but that the universe should be ultimately of a kind to accord with my deepest rational and moral demands. For this reason I sought to dismiss in my sermon the first idea of Fatherhood as quickly as I could. It is with the other idea that I am more interested and concerned. And so, apparently, is Mr. Lloyd. For at the end of his article I find these words: "The time has fully come for the commencement of a new period of energetic, whole-hearted activity, of the manifestation of the will to growth and development of that brother-heart which will make the whole world kin," etc. Compare this sentence of Mr. Lloyd's with one from my sermon: "There are those who, by their devoted work for the welfare of a posterity they seldom or never seem to envisage, bear their splendid, if often unwitting, testimony to the ever-growing presence of the great Father-heart." The difference, therefore, between Mr. Lloyd and myself is merely one of terminology. There is not the slightest dispute between us as to the fact that in the vast world-process, of which humanity appears to be the highest result, there are traces of "the outpouring of love." The only difference between us is that while Mr. Lloyd call these traces "the brother-heart," I call them "the Father-heart." In what way, therefore, does the "outpouring of love" (Mr. Lloyd's "brother-heart") give the lie direct to "the communication of life"? I said in my sermon that I did not know how to reconcile the idea of the Father of experience (Mr. Lloyd's "brother-heart"), with the idea of the Father of Science and Philosophy (Mr. Spencer's Infinite and Eternal Energy). Because if there be a unity behind creation, then this unity causes or sanctions some very awful conditions. For the same mysterious Power (Spencer's Infinite and Eternal Energy, or my Fatherly communication of life) which has produced the tenderest sentiments of the most loving earthly parent (Mr. Lloyd's "brother-heart" or my Fatherly "outpouring of love") has also evolved those shocking cruelties which, by hurting or destroying the child, agonize that parent's heart." Although I am unable to reconcile them, I do not deny their co-existence. But Mr. Lloyd asserts that "these two hostile Fathers cannot possibly co-exist." Not two hostile Fathers, perhaps, but two hostile conceptions of the one Father. Does Mr. Lloyd believe what Spencer called "the absolute certainty that we are ever in the presence of an Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed?" If he does so believe, and if, at the same time, he also believes in "the growth and development of the brother-heart," then how is it possible for him to maintain that these "two hostile Fathers"—(1) the communication of life, and (2) the outpouring of love "cannot possibly co-exist?" The two conceptions do co-exist and stand for something very real whatever name, he, or I, and Spencer, or any other, man choose to give them.

Digitized by Google

Nay, more; "the outpouring of love" (my "Father-heart," Mr. Lloyd's "brother-heart") is part of the result of "the communication of life." Even the last R.P.A. Annual (1917) acknowledges that "there is no great practical harm in the belief that the world is directed by the will of God, so long as we clearly recognize that its good ends can be attained only through the active and enlightened co-operation of the will of man." (And yet, surely Mr. Archer will allow that there are some good ends in Nature—a lovely sunset, to wit—which are not attained through the co-operation of the will of man! But let me go on with my quotation.) "When we are asked, What actuates the will of man? Whence comes that slow-moving but irresistible bias towards the good (my 'Father-heart'; Mr. Lloyd's 'brother-heart' again!) to which we owe all the progress that has been achieved from the days of the cave-man onwards? Is it the work of God? It is certainly the most plausible evidence we possess of the existence of some well-meaning power at work behind the framework of things," even though Mr. Archer will "not allow that it points to the omnipotent personal God, the magnified and non-natural man of the theological creeds." But with this I am not now immediately concerned. I freely admit that Christians as a whole are apt to confuse religious "judgments of value" with so-called heaven-made quasi-scientific statements. But it is only fair for us all to remember that it is not only the pathway of religion which is strewn with errors more or less discarded. All that I am out now to maintain is that the Father-communication of life does co-exist with the Father-outpouring of love; that Spencer's Infinite and Eternal Energy and Mr. Lloyd's "brother-heart" are co-existent, and that the latter is part of the outcome of the former.

The God in whom I believe is "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," i.e., the "brother-heart" of Mr. Lloyd, immanent in human nature, working itself out with sure and certain progress as the ages roll on. He is also transcendent—the Ideal and Goal towards which all things, I believe, are tending. This twofold Divine revelation is "through the universal order rather than through the miracles of sacred story; through the present hunger for righteousness rather than in the ancient tables of commandments; through the beauty and joy of the present life rather than in the authoritative promises of heaven; through the loving, redeeming, forgiving, triumphant, spiritual energies of all sorts and conditions of men rather than by the accurate believings and corporate continuance of the ecclesiastical few."

The Christian Church is an instrument which has not been made to play nearly all the tunes of which it is capable. It has but to apply its really vital principles, and it will transform the world and lead it to perfection. It will some day expand sufficiently to unite all the supreme seers and revealers of the Divine. For the ultimate principles of the Christian religion, as Sir Ray Lankester has shown, are supreme and unassailable. So long as mankind has spiritual instincts and spiritual aspirations, they can never go out of date or lose their power. For there is a spiritual force which, when free to apply itself without the mythical accretions which have been allowed to develop, can bind man to man and nation to nation by an inner bond stronger than selfishness, ambition, or any material thing. But for my part, I value and welcome any and every criticism, from whatever quarter, which will make religion a worthier and more perfect attempt to realize the most noble and perfect ideal with which it is entrusted.

FRANCIS E. POWELL.

The Terrible Turk.

THE stranger was bewildered. He was carefully scrutinizing a row of recruiting posters which adorned the railings round St. Martin's Church. The man was obviously out of place. His clothes were quite ludicrous, and yet he bore himself as Mahomet might have done had he been compelled to select and don a wardrobe from a slop-shop. The man wore a faded frock-coat and corduroy trousers. A pot hat was tightly gripped in his hand, and had never been on his head. Perhaps he did not know it was meant to wear. He held it as a priest might hold a powerful amulet. A flaming red workman's handkerchief tied round his neck completed the get-up. The passers-by were justly amused, yet the more intelligent could not laugh, for there was no element of humour in the face and forehead of the man. They wondered where they had seen that beard and those eyes before, oddly familiar somehow.

Digitized by Google

* * * *

A recruiting sergeant stepped up to him. "What about enlisting, my lad?" The stranger was still engrossed in the posters, but now he slowly turned and spoke: "Those that take the sword shall perish with the sword," he said. The words were familiar enough, but were spoken as if for the first time. The sergeant, who was a Churchman, was annoyed. "Nonsense," he said, "you know what the Bishop of Lebanon has said about all that, if you don't—well you ought to. Come on, my lad." His voice got loud. "There's the King's uniform waiting for yer, better than what yer've got on." In another three minutes P. C. Scuffle and his colleagues at law were dispersing a crowd, and pushing their way through to stop the stranger speaking, for he had mounted the church steps and was quietly addressing the crowd which had collected, while he was talking with the sergeant. The servant of the State heard what he was saying and redoubled his efforts. "Blessed are the peacemakers....." P.C. Scuffle at last, over a massacre of footwear, reached the stranger. "Ere, you," he panted, "you 'old yer gas in, and bloomin' well come along o' me to the station. Quietly now!" There was no reason to add the warning, for the stranger offered no sign of resistance, only turning astonished eyes at the policeman, who had now turned his attention to the slowly evaporating crowd. "Op it, can't yer—git along 'ome—move along!" he shouted. The crowd finally faded away as the dreary little cortege set off for the police station, constable, prisoner, and the usual hangers-on. P.C. Scuffle was not unkindly, and seeing that his charge was a stranger to London, began to point out the various signs as they went along. "Darn there," said P.C. Scuffle, "is the Lor Corts and the Temple." The Stranger turned. "Yus, my boy, the Temple, where the loryers 'ang out." The Stranger spoke: "It is said my house shall be called a house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves." The constable pondered. Then realizing that the honour of the Force was implicated, and that dangerous doctrine was afoot, he gripped the stranger by the collar and hustled him all the way to Bow Street.

* * * *

Mr. Pilot was on the bench and Mr. Gimlet was prosecuting for the Crown. The usual procession of "drunk and disorderlies" was at end, and the fines collected. Mr. Gimlet, in the course of his address, said that the prisoner was charged with a very serious offence, namely, a flagrant violation of the Defence of the Realm Act. He had shamelessly and publicly made remarks which were highly prejudicial to recruiting. What was worse, he was an enemy alien who had neglected to register himself as such. In fact, no registration entry could be found at all. It appeared that prisoner had been born in a suburb of Jerusalem and consequently was a Turkish subject.

Mr. Pilot: Are you a Turkish subject?

Prisoner: My kingdom is not of this world.

Mr. Pilot: Charming! I might almost say quite Turkish delightful. (Laughter). But the answer is hardly a reply to my question.

Mr. Gimlet: Prisoner, your worship, admitted his nationality before the inspector. He is undoubtedly a Turk.

Mr. Pilot: Yes, indeed! A terrible Turk! (Laughter).

Mr. Gimlet: The Crown, however, are willing to take a lenient view of the case, as the demeanour of the prisoner suggests a weak mind.

Mr. Pilot: Is it known how the prisoner managed to effect a landing in this country.

Mr. Gimlet: Prisoner's answer to the inspector was evasive.

Mr. Pilot: How did you manage to land in this country?

Prisoner: An angel brought me hither to preach to you and to all men the glad tidings of peace and goodwill towards men.

Mr. Pilot: Eh, what! An angel! Really this Mons story seems to be working on people's minds. (Laughter). In fact I may say the story is nothing short of monstrous. (Renewed laughter). In any case, I can't understand any angels deliberately transplanting an alien enemy into this country to preach obnoxious peace doctrines. A very dangerous practice. In fact, to such an angel, I should quote the old song, "Go up! fly away."

Mr. Gimlet: Such a reply, your worship, supports the view the Crown takes of the case, that is, that prisoner is weak-minded.

Mr. Pilot: Most certainly, Mr. Gimlet. Perhaps he is infected with religious fanaticism. (To Prisoner): What is your religion?

Prisoner: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and thy neighbour as thyself.

Mr. Pilot: I do wish you would cease from quoting. It is a most objectionable habit. Answer briefly, and, of course, respectfully. This is a court of law, and you are charged with a serious offence; do, do not treat the matter with levity.

Prisoner: What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?

Mr. Pilot: Haven't I just told you not to quote. Do cease. There is no one who is a greater admirer of our national bard than I am, even though he is a naturalized Hun, but these everlasting quotations are annoying. How do you manage to live? What is your occupation?

Prisoner: Take no thought for the morrow saying: "What shall we eat or what ——"

Mr. Pilot: Silence!

Mr. Gimlet: With all due deference, your worship, I submit that the prisoner's quotations are not Shakespeare but appear (Mr. Gimlet lowered his voice reverently) in Holy Writ, in fact, with all due deference, your worship, they are in the Bible. The prisoner is evidently insane. One would think by his speech that he was Our Blessed Lord....."

Prisoner: I am. (Loud laughter).

Remanded for medical examination.

Edwin Greenwood.

Funeral of Mrs. C. Pegg.

The cremation of Mrs. C. Pegg took place on Thursday, March 8, at the Manchester Crematorium, in the presence of a number of friends of the late Secretary of the Manchester Branch of the N. S. S. Mr. C. Pegg, accompanied by his daughter and her husband, Dr. Paterson, were present, and many other friends of the Secular Movement in Manchester. The service was a musical one, and an address was delivered by Mr. Cohen, who travelled specially from London for that purpose. Mr. Cohen paid a warm tribute to the thirty-five years during which Mrs. Pegg had worked with loyalty and devotion to the cause of Freethought. Such a record was not only an honourable one in itself, it was part of that larger work which men and women all over the country were engaged with the single ideal of the uplifting of humanity. So long a service in such a cause argued a strength of character, a sincerity of purpose, and a sense of duty not common in either men or women. Our lives were passed amid circles of friends—whether those circles were great or small. It was their judgment on our actions that kept the memory of us green, and tried by that test Mrs. Pegg had no cause to fear.

Digitized by Google

The date of publication of the Freethinker prevented the news of Mrs. Pegg's death being known to most Manchester Freethinkers, but among those present were Mr. W. Bailey and Mr. and Mrs. Crompton, who represented the old guard of Manchester Freethought.—C. C.

Correspondence.

A MARRIAGE "CONTROLLER."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In the Sunday Pictorial for March 4 there appeared an article on "A Ministry of Matrimony," by Lawrence Clarke. It is both an indication of the propaganda for larger families, that is likely to go on as a result of the War, and an exhibition of the nonsense that can be written on the subject.

The writer informs us that we must find a woman who will be able to solve the population problem for us in a practical way. Evidently the writer fails to grasp the fact that the problem is one which cannot be solved by any one person. He suggests that there "must be a Dictator, drawn from the sex whose interests are more nearly affected by this problem." That woman should play a very large part in any attempt to solve the population problem will be admitted, I think, by all Freethinkers. To me, however, it is ridiculous to talk about a great social problem of this kind as being one that more nearly affects woman than man, and as a "problem that is particularly and essentially her own." The population problem will never be solved unless men and women work together for its solution. Mr. Clarke further suggests instructing every potential mother in maternal hygiene, which is an excellent suggestion; but I doubt if this kind of teaching would be fully successful in the hands of a Dictator of Matrimony and her workers up and down the country. The teaching of national hygiene must become an essential part of the whole of our educational system, as regards females, if a reasonable measure of success is to be attained. Not only so, the importance of sexual hygiene must be taught to both boys and girls when they reach a suitable age. The nebulous sociology and psychology of Mr. Clarke is revealed in the following: "How deftly our Woman Minister of Matrimony would fling a noose over the heads of a million young warriors returning from the Front, and lead them to the altar. How graciously she would fairy-godmother these same young millions." And, again, "Every unwed man in the land would fly to the Minister of Matrimony for surcease of his forlorn and unpatriotic condition." What bosh to imagine that it is possible for a Ministry of Matrimony to deal with all the varied temperaments of unwed people and bring about happy marriages.

The writer seems to be blinded by the idea that an increase in marriages and the number of babies is going to strengthen England's position after the War. He does not seem to realize that marriage and the bringing of children into the world should be determined by the physiological condition of the persons concerned, and by their economic condition. He makes no mention of the need of increased wages for a large section of the community, and neglects the fact that efficiency in citizenship is more important than mere numbers. He tells us to "set up a birth-rate barometer on every town hall portal." Babies wanted for future slaughter, I suppose!

E. EGERTON STAFFORD.

Mrs. Kelly: "So th' magistrate sint yure poor little Timmy t' th' refarmatory? Sich a good choild, too."

Mrs. Grady: "Shure, an' he wort hot, Mrs. Kelly. Iviry-thing thot darlint iver shtole he'd bring roight home t' his mother. He wor thot good Oi wor goin' t' make a priesht out av 'im."

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, off Kentish Town Road, N.W.): 7.30, Debate, "Spiritualism, both Reasonable and True." Opened by H. Ernest Hunt; opposed by T. F. Palmer.

SOUTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Avondale Hall, Landor Road, Clapham, S.W.): 7, F. A. Davies, "Christianity and the Joy of Life."

MR. HOWELL SMITH'S DISCUSSION CLASS (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Thursday, March 22, at 7.30.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

LEICESTER (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate): 6.30, Chapman Cohen, "Christianity and the Logic of Life."

SOUTH SHIELDS BRANCH N. S. S. (Victoria Buildings, second floor): 6.30, R. Chapman, "Epicureans."

FOREIGN AUTHORS' LITERARY AGENCY. ENGLISH MANUSCRIPTS OF FOREIGN AUTHORS Revised for Publication by English Author and Journalist, contributor to leading periodicals. Expert Proof-reader, able to see through the Press any large or small book. MSS. of Articles, Stories, Plays, Poems, Translations, etc., put into final English for submission to Editors. Typing if required. Lessons given in English Reading, Writing, and Speaking.—Address, "AUTHORITY," c/o the Freethinker, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C.

ENGLISH EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS, by Wilkins and Fallows; price 6d.—WORKERS' EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION, 14 Red Lion Square, London, W.C.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

POST FREE THREE HALFPENCE.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
QUEEN ANNE'S CHAMBERS, WESTMINSTER, S.W.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.
G. E. MACDONALD - - - - EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN - - EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

Subscription Rates:

Single subscription in advance - - - $3.00
Two new subscribers - - - - - 5.00
One subscription two years in advance - 5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

TEH PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(POSTAGE ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp. ...	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 58 pp.	,, 1d.	0	3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	3
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp....	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp..	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Mangasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY. Anthony Collins. 32 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 32 pp.	Nett. ,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. LEA.
In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
By E. A. ASHCROFT.
440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By CARVETH READ.
8vo 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.
By D. B. HART, M.D.
Crown 8vo. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.
By J. M. WHEELER.
Price 3s. net, postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. FOOTE and W. P. BALL.
For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. MILL.
Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

HISTORY OF THE TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.
By C. D. COLLET.
Two vols., published at 7s. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By CHAPMAN COHEN.
Price 1s. net, postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By G. W. FOOTE.
First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. WHEELER.
Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 1,862

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 12 SUNDAY MARCH 25, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
The Churches and the War.—The Editor	177
"Christianity as the Symbolism of Factuality."—J. T. Lloyd	178
Our Greatest Philosopher.—Mimnermus	179
Science and Spiritualism.—W. Mann	180
Letter to the Editor—Religion in Scotland	182
Shakespeare and the Bible	182
Acid Drops	182
Special.—Chapman Cohen	183
To Correspondents	185
Sugar Plums	185
Critical Chat.—Geo. Underwood	186
Unburying the Hatchet.—T. H. E.	187
The French Revolution.—Robert Arch	188
Obituary	190
Notice of Meetings	190

Views and Opinions.

Sunday Labour and the Clergy.

The War, which the clergy hoped to have turned to the advantage of the Churches, is serving to break down another hallowed tradition of British Christianity. The food shortage has brought to the front the question of Sunday labour. In munition works, Sunday labour has long been the rule, and battles are being fought as freely on Sundays as on other days. But the battles were being fought out of Britain, and munition workers were labouring under cover. To that extent the face of British Christianity was saved; and while this Sunday labour could proceed in comparative obscurity, our Churches, with their customary hypocrisy, remained silent. But agricultural labour is open to the light of day; and if labour is permissible on Sunday, it seems hard to discover why amusements and recreation should not be permitted also. So the clergy are on the horns of a dilemma. If they oppose Sunday labour, they lay themselves open to the accusation of placing a sectarian shibboleth before national welfare. If they countenance it, they are destroying the sanctity of the "Sawbath." So the compromising bless and the uncompromising curse. The Archbishop of Canterbury sanctions work for food production on Sunday, while the National Free Church Council passes a resolution against it with only two dissentients. Perhaps a via media might be found by allotting to those who object to Sunday labour their proportion of land, and let them try raising crops by prayer—and live on the harvest thus obtained.

* * *

The Collapse of a Bubble.

Never before, perhaps, has the inefficiency, the shallowness, and the radical dishonesty of the religious mind been so clearly indicated as it has been during the continuance of the War. Its dishonesty was demonstrated by the attempts to foist upon the public stories of a great religious revival, in the face of irrefutable evidence to the contrary. That seems now to have broken down hopelessly. The Church Times, as representing the Catholic section of the National Church, laments that:—

> The cause of religion is not flourishing either in England or in the world to-day. From all that we can see of things at home, and from all that we hear of the armies abroad, it seems that the majority of men are occupying themselves very little in thoughts of religion.

And, as representing another section, the Christian World cites a Southport vicar who declares that the much-boomed National Mission is a "ghastly failure," and that different sections have been simply trying to "bluff" each other into believing that it has been otherwise. So we have one falsehood after another, each worked for all it is worth while it shows the least evidence of vitality, to be replaced by another boom or another falsehood, to be worked at high pressure for so long as is possible. In this respect the pulpit runs the Yellow Press hard for first place in a thoroughly discreditable competition.

* * *

Pious Humbug.

The curious thing to note is the way in which politicians—of a kind—play to the clergy and lend them aid in their endeavour to gull the public. Thus, the Right Hon. John Hodge, whose fitness for office might be less a matter of opinion if he ceased talking, informed a Church of England Men's Society: "He looked to the men in the Church of England to act as the leaven in the lump. Every good Christian and citizen was required to do his best when peace was declared to assist in repairing the ravages of war." And if this is to be done, "two things were essential to the future; scientific organization by the employer, and increased productivity on the part of the worker." How this is to secure the establishment of more human relations between employer and employed, Mr. Hodge did not explain; probably he did not know; being quite content to throw out a number of the now stale platitudes about the spirit of self-sacrifice abroad, the breaking down of class feeling, etc., etc. The fact that all over the country, from the petty shopkeeper up to the merchant prince, from the carter with a one-horse van up to the owner of huge ships, there is going on a colossal game of grab, in which each considers himself justified in screwing the last halfpenny out of the nation's necessities, does not affect Mr. Hodge's trust in the men of the Church of England as those who will "leaven the lump." If Mr. Hodge had paused to consider the silence of the Church of England with regard to the plundering of the poor in the shape of excessive food prices, he might have felt less certain of getting assistance from the Church in bringing about desirable social conditions after the War. For our own part, we feel confident that when the War is over, as before the War commenced, religion will resume its historic function of inducing contentment in the interests of the governing classes.

* * *

Mass Morality.

One would have thought that by this time even the cant talk about the self-sacrificing spirit engendered by the War, the moralizing influence of this ghastly chemical and machine slaughter would have worn too thin for use by even that awesome product, the pious politician. For our own part we agree with the Bishop of Peterborough: "It is not safe to argue that because men have agreed to sink their differences in the face of a great peril that these differences will not spring into life and vigour when the peril is past." Or with Dean Inge:—

Digitized by Google

> A lower standard of morality is usually found when people are acting in a mass than when they act individually. The present war and similar horrors are only possible because of a prevalent system of co-operative guilt with limited liability.....It is poor consolation that heads are no longer broken at elections for hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness run riot on the platforms, in the newspapers, and even in some pulpits.

That, we think, expresses both a psychologic and a sociologic truth. It would require an inconceivable degree of callousness for each individual to remain sane and feel that he was partly responsible for such a conflict as is now proceeding. It is borne because each one shelves his or her responsibility on the community as a whole. War establishes a mass morality that is of necessity on a low level because it lacks the refining and restraining influence of individual responsibility. But that is not progression, it is retrogression. We habitually live and think on a lower scale during war than we do during a time of peace. Analyse a great deal of the current "Patriotism" and there will be found not the patriotism that is motived by a love of country or a love of one's fellows, but the lower tribal feeling of hatred of some other country or group of people. One tenth of the motive power expressed in hatred of Germany or Turkey, if existent before the War, and expressed in terms of a genuine love of one's country, would have made it quite unnecessary to look for a desirable social state after the War—it would already have existed.

* * *

The Impotency of the Churches.

When all the chatter of the Churches is done with, there is one final indisputable fact that stands out as a clear condemnation of Christian rule and Christian influence. For centuries the Christian Church has held a position of power and influence in the world of European civilization. More than thirty generations of people have grown up and passed away with the Christian religions exerting a profound influence on their lives. The Church could make and unmake kings, it could strike a whole people with terror by a threat of excommunication, and plunge nations into war in defence of an article of faith. And, withal, the Christian nations of Europe have found themselves powerless to combine for any single purpose under the sun save that of waging war. A few years back this country was squabbling over an Old Age Pensions measure, and protesting its inability to spend a few millions a year for that purpose. To-day it can pride itself on spending on war as much in a day or so as was needed for Old Age Pensions during a whole year. Sixteen centuries of Christian domination found Europe ready for war, for the simple reason that it was neither ready nor fit for peace. And to-day the Churches, which might have stood as the natural mediators between nations at war, and so have commanded the respect of men, even though it could not obtain their adherence, are in all countries energetic in fomenting hatred and division. It is certain that when a better understanding between men does come it will be due to no effort on the part of the Churches. To our mind it is quite as certain that that better understanding will arrive the sooner the already dwindling, hold of the Churches on men and women is altogether relinquished.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

"Christianity as the Symbolism of Factuality."

UNDER the above heading, the Rev. E. Powell, Vicar of Bromyard, does me the honour of replying in the Freethinker for March 18, to my article, entitled "The Futility of Theodicies," which appeared in this journal for the 4th inst. That article was a review of a sermon by Mr. Powell on "The Father-Heart of God and the World Agony of War." The tone of the reply is everything that could be desired, and I trust the same will be true of my rejoinder. Clearly what we both desire is a knowledge of the truth on the subject under discussion. My contention was, and is, that what Mr. Powell gives us in his interesting discourse is "not the scientific conception of God, but an unscientific conception of Nature." He now asks me whether or not I believe in what Herbert Spencer calls "the absolute certainty that we are ever in the presence of an Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed," and I answer that I have neither consciousness nor knowledge of the presence of any such Energy. I accept the scientific view that the Universe is infinite in extent and of eternal duration, but I am unable to believe in "an Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed." Besides, even Spencer himself did not believe in its existence as apart from and of prior existence to the Universe. To hold that the Universe is but the fleeting manifestation of some Reality, or that it is but a surface veil of phenomena, is to part company with known facts, and speculate upon unverifiable assumptions. To me the Universe itself, "as a vast and orderly mechanism," is the only Reality of which we have any knowledge. But let us think, for a moment, of this "Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed," in which Mr. Powell believes; and it is this Energy that he personifies and calls God. Then he adds: "The God in whom I believe is 'the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.'" Now, to a student of the Four Gospels nothing can be more certain than that Jesus regarded God as a person apart from and above the Universe, and whose will the Universe fulfilled. I repeat that nothing can be more undeniable than this, and it is equally incontrovertible that this faith of Jesus has been shared by the orthodox Church in all ages. What I maintain is that people who verily believe in the personality and fatherhood of God, in the sense that Jesus did, cannot personify Nature and call her God without being guilty of an act of gross misnaming. It is true that poets do sometimes so personify Nature; but when they do, nothing is further from their minds than that they should be taken literally. George Meredith takes the precaution of explaining his meaning in his fine ode, entitled France: December, 1870. In those sad days, what France needed was not comfort which the Church offered her.

> Could France accept the fables of her priests,
> Who blest her banners in this game of beasts,
> And now bid hope that heaven will intercede
> To violate its laws in her sore need;
> She would find comfort in their opiates.

But it was for Strength France yearned.

> For Strength, her idol once, too long her toy;

and,

> Lo, Strength is of the plain root-Virtues born:
> Strength shall ye gain by service, prove in scorn,
> Train by endurance, by devotion shape.
> Strength is not won by miracle or rape.
> It is the offspring of the modest years,
> The gift of sire to son, thro' those firm laws
> Which we name Gods; which are the righteous cause.
> The cause of man, and manhood's ministers.

Mr. Powell asks, "If Shelley, Keats, and Meredith are permitted by Mr. Lloyd to call this (Nature) God, why may not I?" The answer is that those three poets did not believe in the existence of a personal God at all, while Mr. Powell confesses that he does, which makes a big difference.

Digitized by Google

Furthermore, the reverend gentleman accepts the teaching of the Creed, which he can repeat thus: "I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth," well knowing, surely, that the framers of that Creed understood by "the Father Almighty" the God of love who sent Jesus Christ into the world to save his people from their sins. He has no right to twist that article out of its intended meaning, and say, "Of such a Father, who is only stern Nature personified, whose will are the universal uniformities we call Nature's laws 'which shall not be broken,' we may well say" so-and-so. On the assumption that an infinitely powerful, wise, and loving Deity exists, the existence of the Universe as we know it is absolutely inexplicable; and Mr. Powell is quite wrong in suggesting that it was of this Father, "stern Nature personified," Jesus was thinking when he said, "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and the unjust." To show the absurdity of that suggestion, we need only put those words in their proper context:—

> Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you, that ye may be sons of your Father which is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and the unjust. For if ye love them that love you, what reward have ye (Matt. v. 44-46)?

Clearly the teaching of that passage is that God's treatment of mankind is without respect of persons, and Jesus urges his disciples to imitate him in this respect. To infer from those words of Jesus that he regarded his Father as "stern Nature personified" in one aspect of his character, and as overflowing love in another, is to pursue a most abnormal method of exegesis.

Now, according to Mr. Powell, there are two Gods, two Fathers, the one made known by science and the other by Revelation, the one showing no pity, answering no prayer, forgiving no sin, and the other with a heart brimful of affection and yearning to befriend and pardon his sinful children. This is bad science and worse theology. I do most certainly deny that two such Fatherhoods "represent actual facts of human experience I am profoundly convinced that there is no evidence whatever of the existence of a Father of Revelation whose outpouring of love in Christ delivers believers from the cruel clutches of the Father of Science and Philosophy, "who is only stern Nature personified." If this is the theology of the twentieth century, I, for one, am not surprised that people resolve to have nothing to do with it.

In his reply Mr. Powell says:—

> The Father-heart is, in my view, not to be found in the European situation as a whole, but only in the highest and best part of it—i.e., in human nature at its best. In my sermon I distinctly said that it was in "the ever-growing spirit of humanity alone where, it seems to me, we should seek the evidence of the great Father-heart.

That is perfectly true, but the truth involves a most humiliating reflection on the Father of revelation and experience. The world is chock-full of evils and wrongs, of injustice and oppression, for which the Father Almighty is not to be held responsible, but we are told that the ever-growing spirit of humanity that is being displayed in this horrible War evidences the active presence of the Father-heart. And yet in the face of this strange assertion Mr. Powell calls my attention to the fact that he has acknowledged that "in the presence of a mystery apparently everlastingly impenetrable we are all Agnostics." The fault I have to find with him is that in the presence of an everlastingly impenetrable mystery he preaches in terms of the most thoroughgoing Gnosticism. The difference between the reverend gentleman and myself is by no means "merely one of terminology," but one that results from two absolutely different viewpoints. He acknowledges that "in the presence of an apparently everlastingly impenetrable mystery we are all Agnostics," and yet declares that there are two Fathers who are as unlike each other as day and night, while I can trace no sign whatever of the active presence of a God of truth and love in this dark world. What the preacher describes as the Father-heart at work in human nature at its best can be and is satisfactorily accounted for without any reference whatever to super-human agency. It is a purely natural process, painfully slow and intermittent. The social and moral progress of the race during the last six thousand years has been on such an infinitesimally small scale as to shame any Deity out of existence for ever. The curious thing is, that whilst affecting Agnosticism, Mr. Powell immediately blossoms out into a full-fledged Gnostic.

With what Mr. Powell says about the future power and triumph of the Church I have now no space to deal beyond to say that the same prophecy has been indulged in continuously since the days of the Apostles, but has never yet been fulfilled. Of the reverend gentleman's sincerity and love of truth I have not the slightest doubt, and with much of what he says I am in heartiest sympathy. It is to his supernaturalism and his Theistic theory alone that I am opposed, my conviction being that all the claims made by supernaturalists have been completely falsified in history.

J. T. Lloyd.

Our Greatest Philosopher.

> Who saw life steadily and saw it whole.—Matthew Arnold.
>
> This man decided not to live, but to know.
> —Robert Browning.
>
> Without fears, without desires, without ceremonies, he has used sheer reason, and played the philosopher.
> —Voltaire on Confucius.

In spite of a shortage of paper and a scarcity of labour, it is interesting to discover that in our present crisis, which is so clearly opposed to higher literature, there still exists a public which is curious about Herbert Spencer. Mr. Hugh Elliott has contributed to the makers of the Nineteenth Century Series (Constable) an attractive monograph on the great philosopher, whose reputation was world-wide, and who removed the stigma of insularity from his countrymen.

Herbert Spencer is our greatest philosopher. Long before his death men had come to think of him with Plato, with Bacon, with Kant, with Comte, and with Mill, as one of the men who mark an era. To the great mass of men, it is true, he was only a great name; but to the world of intellect he ranked with the highest minds, with those who open up new vistas to men's eyes and widen the horizon of knowledge.

He was not born, like Charles Darwin, to ease and affluence. He had his own way to make in the world; but for what is commonly meant by success he cared not a straw. To spurn delights and live laborious days for the sake of ambition and its rewards is comparatively easy. Spencer belonged to the few great men who have sunk their personality in their cause, and without thinking of fortune or fame. To his system of Synthetic Philosophy, which puts things together and does not pull to pieces, he devoted his genius, his energies, and patience. Struggling for years against poverty, against obscurity, against the indifference of the general public to philosophy, he persevered to the end. For forty long years he was perfecting the details of his philosophical scheme. There has been no grander intellectual achievement since Edward Gibbon took his memorable walk under the acacias at Lausanne. Spencer, unlike Gibbon, never startled the world, and his utter want of orthodoxy was not fully realized until his Data of Ethics appeared. Then Christians were annoyed to find that the man who had taken his place quietly as the leading English philosopher was as thorough a Freethinker as Charles Bradlaugh. Standing outside all churches and creeds, he built up his own philosophy by science alone.

Digitized by Google

Herbert Spencer, in his writings, sought to show that all phenomena, physical and psychical, are the natural products of elementary matter and its laws, these being modes of operation of the primal law of what he calls the "persistence of force." His scheme, probably the vastest ever conceived by the human mind, embraced the story of the evolution of the universe from formless stuff into solar systems, the process being the advance from the simple to the complex, from the indefinite to the coherent. This same process was shown to be in operation in the life-history of the earth. No break between things inanimate and animate being assumed, life, mind in the lower animals, and man, man's social and intellectual development are in unbroken sequence shown to be parts of the eternal order. The Synthetic Philosophy, as the author chose to call it, is nothing more nor less than the law of evolution, as exemplified in nature and in man, in the animal realm and the vegetable and human, the sphere of sense, and the sphere of conscious and moral aspiration.

Spencer's literary style was austere, and he stripped deliberately his writing of all embellishment. He never chose to ornament the expression of his thoughts by surface graces. If he did not display the element of fancy, he had the larger gift of imagination, for, in a sense, the Synthetic Philosophy, as a whole, is as truly imaginative as the tragedies of Shakespeare, or the pictures of Michael Angelo. To whom, Spencer asks in one of his essays, will a piece of Alpine scenery more powerfully appeal, "to an ignorant mind, or to the mind of a philosopher who knows that over that mountain a glacier slid a million years ago?"

The glory and triumph of Herbert Spencer is that his philosophy rests on ascertained knowledge. While other philosophers have evoked various extraneous agencies to account for the difference between man and the rest of the world, he preferred to trust to evolution, the law which connects the thoughts of a Socrates with the obscure movements of an ascidian on the rocks. Spencer had a harder task than any of his predecessors, because the product of science had become so much more extensive, and because he took all knowledge to be his province.

Living to a great age, Spencer long out-lived his associates in the early days of fame, Mill, "George Eliot," Lewes, Darwin, and Huxley. It is strange to think that Spencer's friends might well have reckoned him the least likely of their circle to survive to extreme age. For, like Voltaire, he had a frail constitution. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that he never knew what health was, so fragile was his body. For the greater part of his life he was an invalid, a victim of dyspepsia and insomnia. What courage he displayed through it all? The quantity and quality of his work would have put a strong man to shame. As the product of an invalid it is marvellous. He was a hero as well as a philosopher.

For half a century his authority was unquestioned, not merely in his own country, but in every part of the civilized world. His works were read not only throughout Europe, but in India, America, and Australasia. In the Far East the principles of the great philosopher of evolution are better known than those of any other English thinker. He belongs to that rare company to whom may be applied the supreme tribute: "Others abide our question; thou art free." Probably the pendulum is swinging away from the Spencerean teaching to-day, owing to the upheaval of a world-war. But that, after all, will only be in accordance with one of Spencer's own tenets—that there is a rhythmic movement in all thought, and that progress is in spiral curves, and never in a straight line.

Spencer was not merely an academic philosopher. His love for liberty was as worthy a feature of his life as his enthusiasm for knowledge. He was not loved by priests, ever the hindmost of the thinkers, and he suffered many of the whips and scorns of clerical animosity. But Freethinkers have to endure that sort of thing. Few men, indeed, were more sober or temperate in their expressions, or more just to opponents, than Herbert Spencer.

His was a life of sacrifice. The tremendous intellectual labours which Spencer carried on brought him neither wealth nor comfort. He was unable to find a publisher for his Social Statics, and he had to print and sell it on commission. A small edition took over fourteen years to sell, and the Principles of Psychology sold almost as slowly. Again and again he found he was losing money by his writings. Once he would have had to stop his great work but for a timely legacy. After a quarter of a century's work, the sales of his books just paid the publishing expenses. All his labour had gone for nothing, and his health had broken down from the constant strain of his studies. We can but admire the singular devotion, completeness, and dignity of his life. Seeking no honour nor applause, he made an imperishable name. No philosopher, ancient or modern, held up a higher standard of conduct, none illustrated it by a purer or more unselfish life. At a time when commercialism was rampant, the pursuit of study for its own sake, and not for any base or ulterior object, was an exception so rare as to be scarcely credible. In an age of compromise Herbert Spencer remained ever faithful to first principles; in an age of ostentation he cared only for truth.

MIMNERMUS.

Science and Spiritualism.

III.

(Continued from p. 166.)

What is one to do, when in order to rule men it is necessary to deceive them, when in order to persuade them to let themselves be driven where you will, you must promise them and show them playthings? Why, suppose my books and the Theosophist had been a thousand times more interesting and more serious, do you imagine I should have had any sort of success anywhere, if behind all that there had not been the "phenomena"? I should have done simply nothing. I should have long ago starved to death. They would have crushed me, and it would never have even occurred to anyone to think that I too was a living creature, that I too must eat and drink. But I have long, long since learnt to understand these dear people, and their stupidity sometimes affords me unbounded satisfaction. Why, you are not satisfied with my phenomena, but do you know that almost invariably the more simple, the more silly, and the more gross the "phenomenon," the more likely it is to succeed? I may tell you such stories about this some day as will split your sides with laughter, indeed they will. The vast majority of people who are reckoned clever by themselves and others are inconceivably silly. If you only knew how many lions and eagles in every quarter of the globe have turned into asses at my whistle, and obediently wagged their great ears in time, as I have piped the tune!—Madame Blavatsky, Founder of the Theosophical Society, to V. S. Solovyoff.—Solovyoff, "A Modern Priestess of Isis" (1893), pp. 155-156.

Digitized by Google

A few years later Slade met his Waterloo at the hands of Mr. Truesdell, in America, who, in a seance with Slade, detected him using his foot to simulate a spirit hand. He had also discovered, "before the seance began, a slate with a prepared message, to which he stealthily added a message of his own, as follows:—

> Henry, look out for this fellow; he is up to snuff.—Alcinda.

Alcinda was the name of Slade's wife, and Truesdell had the satisfaction of enjoying Slade's discomfiture when, at the appropriate moment of the seance, the unrehearsed message came to light."[1] The end of his career came in 1894, according to the English Illustrated Magazine (January, 1895), where we read: "The famous 'Dr. Slade,' who created such excitement in London in 1876, and made so much money with his slate writing, was recently taken to a workhouse in America, penniless, friendless, and a lunatic." One would have thought that the spirits who worked so industriously for him would have bestirred themselves to save him from this fate.

In the Open Court for June, 1900, there is a picture of Zollner and Slade seated at a small table; Zollner, bowed down, nearly bald and bespectacled. Slade is a fine, vigorous man in the prime of life, gazing intently at Zollner. It is a case of the spider and the fly. Zollner and his colleagues were as wax in the hands of this wily charlatan.

The late Captain Noble, who, under the initials "F.R.A.S.," used to conduct the correspondence columns of the English Mechanic, writing in 1903 on the case of the medium, Anna Rothe, who was convicted in Berlin of pretending to produce roses, lilies, and oranges from the air by "spiritual agency," and received eighteen months' imprisonment, remarks:—

> Your older readers will remember that this was the role of the notorious Mrs. Guppy, whose trickery was exposed in Belfast, 1874, on the occasion of the meeting of the British Association there, by the pretty expedient of dropping a few crystals of potassium ferrocyanide into the ewer and carafou in her bedroom, and other water to which she had access, and which salt was subsequently discovered on the calyx and corolla of the asters and hollyhocks, so supernaturally produced! In the woman Rothe's case, a much less refined method was adopted, and she was caught, flagrante delicto, by the police official, who seized her bodily, and found a huge supply of flowers up her petticoats! This rough-and-ready way of seizing the medium or "materialized spirit" was employed, as will be remembered, with signal success in the case of Miss Florence Cook, who so thoroughly took in poor Sir William Crookes, and who was exposed by Sir George Sitwell and Herr von Buch; that of the Holmes's; in that of Herne; in that of Miss Showers; in that of Bastian and Taylor (at Arnheim)—and so very many others. Possibly from a wholesome dread of the provisions of the Act 5 Geo. IV., c. 83, s. 4, those scandalous impostors the "Spiritual Media," have retired into the background in this country lately, and as medium after medium has been exposed, their dupes have decreased in number.[2]

The public has a short memory, and most people would be at a loss to give any particulars as to the frauds of mediums and their exposure if challenged by a Spiritualist, unless they happened to have made a study of the subject. The best encyclopædias fail one here. This being the case, and as there appears to be a strong attempt made to revive these frauds and follies, it will be as well to give a few of the more notable exposures.

[1] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., p. 216.
[2] English Mechanic, April 17, 1903, p. 211.

Bastian, the last-mentioned medium in the above quotation, was exposed in the winter of 1884. The Archdukes John and Rudolph of Austria, being desirous of investigating Spiritualism, invited Harry Bastian to Vienna, where he gave two seances on the 17th and 30th of January, 1884. The performance aroused the deepest suspicion. The princes therefore requested another seance, and the date was fixed for February 11 of the same year. Says Lanslots: "They were bent upon surprising the medium in the midst of his operations, and find out for sure whether there was any jugglery about them. They so arranged that the doors could be suddenly closed by means of a hidden mechanism, and prevent egress from the room in which Bastian was supposed to be lying in a trance, while the spirits made their apparitions. The evening of the experiment sounds were heard, sparks were seen, raps came next, followed finally by materializations. Suddenly a white and well-defined figure passed out of the room in which the Archdukes had seen Bastian lying on the sofa in a state of lethargy. Immediately they set the machinery to work; it slammed the door behind the white figure. The spirit frantically tried to open the door, but in vain. The Archdukes jumped at him, tore the clothes from his body; the spirit was no other but the same medium, Harry Bastian, in flesh and bone. Finding himself unmasked, he began to tremble like a leaf. The princes felt pity for him, and gently assured him that all was over, and that he had nothing to fear. A report of the discovery was duly made and signed by all those present. A detailed account of it was given to the press."[1]

Here is an account of the exposure of the mediums Williams and Rita, in Holland:—

> In September, 1878, a group of Dutch Spiritualists detected the mediums Williams and Rita in flagrant trickery at Amsterdam. The exposure was complete. At a dark seance, a figure purporting to be a materialized spirit-form named "Charlie" showed his face by the light of a spirit lamp. One of the circle, whose suspicions had been aroused at a previous sitting, grasped "Charlie" and found himself holding Rita by the coat collar. After a sharp struggle a light was obtained, the two mediums were baffled in an attempt to escape from the house, and their persons were searched. Upon Rita were found a false beard, several large handkerchiefs, and a small circular bottle of phosphorized oil,—the raw material of "Charlie" and his spirit lamp. On Williams were found also a beard, much used, several yards of dirty muslin, handkerchiefs, a bottle of phosphorized oil and a bottle of scent,—objects familiar in happier circumstances to the eye of faith as the bearded mariner "John King," with turban, lamp, and spirit perfume. In Williams' handbag were found a small tube filled with minute pieces of slate-pencil, and a piece of notched whalebone,—the instruments employed for writing on closed slates.[2]

Of course, the leading Spiritualists would not admit these frauds. Thus, when in January, 1880, Mrs. Corner (Miss Cook) was seized under similar circumstances by Sir G. Sitwell and Mr. Carl von Buch, the editor of the Spiritualist pointed out that "grasping one of the forms and finding it to be the medium proves nothing"; while the editor of Spiritualist "Notes" has "no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that on the occasion of the recent seizure Mrs. Corner was completely guiltless of deception." Moreover, as Mr. Podmore sarcastically remarks: "Mrs. Corner's character as a genuine medium was vindicated on this occasion with unexempled rapidity, by means of a successful seance held on the evening of the exposure at the house and in the presence of another professional medium."[3]

[1] Lanslot, Spiritism Unveiled (1913), pp. 109-10.
[2] Podmore, Studies in Psychical Research (1897), pp. 21-22.
[3] Ibid, p. 24.

Digitized by Google

To cite the same author again :—

> In October, 1894, Mrs. Mellon (nee Fairlamb) was seized in Sydney, N.S.W., when personating the spirit form of a little black girl, Cissie. Mrs. Mellon was discovered on her knees, with her feet bare, white muslin drapery round her shoulders, and a black mask on her face. In the cabinet were found a false beard and other properties. At about the same time Mrs. Williams was exposed in Paris, by the Duke de Medina Pomar and others. The medium in this latter case was found masquerading, in more or less appropriate dress, as the spirit of a man.[1]

Miss Annie Eva Fay was another medium who achieved fame by the ease with which she imposed upon Sir William Crookes, the famous chemist, who, says Mr. Maskelyne, "after repeated visits to Miss Fay's seances, was so convinced of the supernatural character of the performance that, in order to test his opinion, he invited the lady to his house, there to give a demonstration of her powers, under what Spiritualists term 'test conditions.' Result—he discovered no trickery whatever. And how should he? The man of great attainments is, generally speaking, the one most easily puzzled. There is a simplicity of high intelligence, just as there is a simplicity of ignorance. An ignorant person may not be able to see through the simplest trick; and a person of culture may be as readily deceived, for the simple reason that he cannot bring his mind down to the level of the deception practised."[2]

After this, Miss Fay betook herself to the provinces; but, owing to Mr. Maskelyne's public exposure of her tricks, the business fell off sadly, says Mr. Maskelyne, "and being in low water, she made me an offer, through her manager (the letters are still in my possession), to come to London and explain publicly, for a sum of money, how she performed her tricks, and how she humbugged the scientific gentleman aforesaid. I declined her offer, however, in the belief that my own exposure of the fraud was sufficient" (p. 194).

W. MANN.

(To be continued.)

Correspondence.

RELIGION IN SCOTLAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Might I draw the attention of your Scottish readers to the frantic efforts of our clergymen to regain the influence they once possessed over the people of Scotland.

At a meeting of the Commission of the Free Church of Scotland, held last week, a resolution was passed protesting against the continued desecration of the "Lord's Day," and especially against the suggestion that farmers should be persuaded to undertake ploughing and other forms of labour on the Lord's Day. In the next column of the same newspaper which reports the above, is a report of the Commission of Assembly of the Church of Scotland, in which the Rev. Mr. Dickie, New Kilpatrick, said he thought the Church should not be silent on the question of Sunday labour in raising food, but should give the people frank guidance on the necessities of the situation, and point out that it was a good thing that they should labour part of the Sunday this summer.

Do these ministers believe for one moment that the people of Scotland care one pin what they think? If I am not mistaken, more attention will be given to the appeal by the Director-General of Food Production than to all the pious resolutions passed at any Church meeting. The time has now passed when the opinion of a few ministers met together is taken seriously in Scotland.

Another question on which the Scottish clergy are hopelessly divided is National Service. It is pathetic to read in the columns of our daily newspapers the far-fetched claims the clergy are making that their calling is of national importance.

The Moderators of the three Scottish Churches suggest that the ministers might take up the work of teachers, and thus allow the teachers to go and fight. This suggestion is not allowed to go unchallenged, as the teachers rightly declare that ministers are not fit to teach, and that if the ministers wish to do their country a service their proper place is in the trenches.

A correspondent to the daily papers, signing himself "Church of Scotland minister," questions the importance of the work being done by ministers in the Y.M.C.A. huts. He says, it may be splendid work, but most of it can be as well or better done by waiters, clerks, or concert organizers; in fact, ladies could manage the whole thing—an admission in which I most heartily concur. Another trenchant question raised by the same correspondent is the question of salary. He inquires if ministers take up National Service at home, such as clerical, secretarial, or munition work, are they going to drop all or part of their stipends? To answer this question for him, I should say that would be the last thing they would think of doing. Do they not continue to draw their stipends, even though they have also been drawing the pay of Army Chaplains?

Freethinkers should view with suspicion the suggestion that ministers should supplant the teachers in our schools. It is the constant aim of our Church organizations to get more religion taught in the day school, and once the ministers get the chance of teaching, religion would form a large part of the curriculum. Whenever there is an outbreak of juvenile depravity, the ministers blame it on the lack of religious instruction in the day school.

The influence of the Church in Scotland is certainly on the wane, as witness the statement made at a meeting of the Paisley U. F. Presbytery last week, when the Rev. Mr. Simpson, of Johnstone, stated that with 55 Sabbath schools, 882 teachers, and 8,524 scholars, there had been a decrease during the past six years of 1,282, equal to 13 per cent.

Now is the time for Scottish Freethinkers to make their plans for after-war problems, as the clergy are certainly alive to the fact that their influence is on the decline, and they are on the watch to jump at anything which they think will put them on the popular side, and so regain their lost influence in the affairs of Scotland.

"SCOTTY."

Acid Drops.

In "Acid Drops" for March 4 we commented on the Publishers' Circular's remarkable saying that "but for the Bible there would have been no Shakespeare." Our remarks induced the editor of the Publisher's Circular to elaborate his meaning, thus :—

> What we had in mind was this :—If there had been no Bible there would have been no Christianity, no Christian Church, no conversion of Britain from Paganism, no schoolmen monks, no order of chivalry, no feudal system, no English literature based on monkish teaching, and no English language for Shakespeare to use so magnificently. (We do not hold all these things to have been unmixed blessings!—merely that they existed and influenced Shakespeare from his cradle to his grave—he signed a will declaring he was a Christian, which may mean much or little.) If you cut out of Shakespeare all that is directly or indirectly connected with Christianity, it would be as fatal as the carrying-out Shylock's demands for Antonio's heart would have been. We are not contending that Shakespeare was a converted Christian or a Christian Pagan—merely that he was a product of Christianity to a very great extent. So is the Editor of the Freethinker.

Now that statement is longer without being either clearer or more convincing. We may grant that if there had been no Bible there would have been no Christianity based on the Bible, and therefore no conversion of Britain from Paganism to Christianity. And there our concessions end. Schoolmen monks are, or were, not peculiar to Christianity. India, and Egypt had plenty. Feudalism is not an institution that springs from Christianity. Our Feudalism was merely coloured by it. And does the editor really believe that

[1] Podmore, Studies in Psychical Research (1897), p. 82.

[2] Maskelyne, The Supernatural, p. 192.

Digitized by Google

English literature based on Monkish legends was vital to the production of Hamlet, or Lear, or Othello? Suppose there had been no legends would there have been no literature? What of the literature of Greece and Rome—to which Shakespeare's indebtedness is beyond question? And how does the English language depend on the Bible? That is really a discovery. We have heard of the claim that the Bible owes much to the English language, but that the English language should owe its strength to a book written in an obsolete Eastern dialect is a discovery of the greatest magnitude.

We refrain from commenting on Shakespeare having signed his will as a Christian, as the editor rightly dismisses that as of no importance. The summary is, however, that if one takes out of Shakespeare all that is connected with Christianity, the deletion would be fatal. How so? If Euripides and Æschylus could write their plays without Christianity, why could not Shakespeare have written his without monkish legends and Bible? What is there vital in Shakespeare's plays that belongs to Christianity? It is not Christianity but humanity that is vital to Shakespeare, as it has been to all the world's great dramatists and poets. There is nothing Christian in the passion of Lear or the philosophy of Hamlet. Christian phrases and images appear in them because they happen to have been in an age when the Christian religion was dominant. But that is purely an accident of environment. Had Shakespeare possessed nothing but Greek, or Roman, or Scandinavian, or even Indian legends and histories, the result, other things equal, would not have been vastly different. We beg the editor of the Publisher's Circular to cease trying to make Shakespeare an appanage of the Church. It is like making sunlight an appanage of stained glass windows.

We congratulate the Russian Duma on having made so successful a stand against the pious and other rascalities of the Russian Court and governing gang. At a time when our own elected assembly is sinking more and more into impotency, it is well to see one of the youngest of the world's Parliamentary bodies vindicating its right to direct the affairs of the nation. Everyone who wishes well to Russia will have but one desire, and that is that the cleansing will be thorough. The programme of the new Government is certainly thorough enough. It includes freedom of religious worship, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of Labour organizations—with the right to strike—and universal suffrage. If these things are realized, the ex-Czar will feel far more at home in England than in his own country. We may return to this subject next week.

We are very pleased to see that the proposal for the clergy to offer National Service by taking the place of teachers in the schools is rousing opposition in the Scotch newspapers. Numerous correspondents point out that, if education is National Service, the wise policy is to leave the teachers where they are. And that answer is quite unassailable. To take a qualified teacher out of the school and put a parson in is so absurd a procedure that only a country distracted by war would tolerate it. And it is quite clear that the game of the clergy is to get their clutch more firmly on elementary education under the pretence of National Service. If these gentlemen are really desirous of doing the nation a service, their best plan would be to emigrate en masse to the Arctic regions.

The organ of the National Union of Teachers, the Schoolmaster did well in calling attention to the imputation cast by the judge in the Wheeldon case on teachers generally because the teachers implicated confessed to habitually using bad language. Such an attack was quite unjustifiable, and was only another feature in a case that has left a bad taste in the mouth of those who took pride in the quality of our English judicature. But we beg to point out that there is another matter on which the N.U.T. and its organ has remained curiously silent. We referred the other week to the inquisition by the Cardiff City Council as to whether the male and female teachers in its employ objected to military service or not, with a view to discharging such as had such an objection. Now, it was the plain duty of the N.U.T. to protect its members against both the inquiry and the threatened penalty, should their views on a subject quite outside their scholastic duties not harmonise with those of the Council. So far, it has not done so (we speak under correction), and its silence opens it to the imputation that it is much more concerned about the raising of teachers' salaries than about the cause of education or the status of the teacher.

Like many other people and organizations, the Salvation Army is eager to make as much as it can out of the War, and is advertising for funds to assist its "War Work"—whatever that may be. It declares that it receives "most enthusiastic praise" from the soldiers themselves, and prints the following as a specimen:—

> I am holding on, and God is helping me. Last night two of my mates got converted, and three hours after they were both killed without a second's warning.

The benefit of the conversion is a little difficult to discover.

Evidently Scotland will not submit to Sunday labour on the land without a struggle. The Renfrew Town Council has prohibited all plotholders working on their land between the times of 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. We wonder what would happen if the plotholders told the Council to go to the Devil? We doubt if a court would uphold that clause in the agreement under present conditions. Or, as the country is now being more or less governed by ukase, why does not someone issue an order declaring all such stipulations void?

All wars, said Sir Francis Champneys, M.D., addressing a Glasgow meeting on the question of "The Hidden Evil" "are accompanied by a intensification of venereal disease." Sir Francis Champneys is surely mistaken. We have it on high clerical authority that this War has been the occasion of a great "spiritual uplift," a source of "Moral regeneration," the cause of a "national rebirth," etc., etc. Sir Francis and the other doctors who were with him must be mistaken. Or, perhaps, they were referring to the effect of the War on Germany.

The Rev. E. Shillito, in a remarkable article in the Christian World for March 15, deals with "Theology and the War" in such a fashion as to make it perfectly clear that the case for theology is the flimsiest imaginable. Even his definition of theology is fundamentally false. He says that "one of its functions is the task of setting in order for the satisfaction of the intellect all that is involved in religious experience"; but he conveniently ignores the incontestable fact that theology is the fountain out of which all religious experience springs. Every believer in God is to that extent a theologian, and without belief in God there is not and there cannot be any religious experience whatever; Atheists have never a single touch of it. This is a point which the divines entirely overlook, or are afraid to face. If there is a God, why is he absolutely silent to unbelievers?

Mr. Shillito admits that the War has given rise to no new problem, which is perfectly true; and yet he expresses the opinion that all problems require to be discussed anew in the light thrown upon them by the War. Omnipotence, prayer, and the Atonement are singled out as subjects that must be studied in their relation to the immediate situation. He asserts, for example, that "the War has driven many to pray for the first time in an agony of desire." In what degree that statement is true we know not; but we do know absolutely that the War has driven multitudes who used to pray, to pray no more. The War has already demonstrated, not the omnipotence, but the utter impotence, of the Love said to lie at the heart of things.

The vicar of Redcliff, Bristol, "after a considerable amount of thought," has decided to offer himself as an assistant chaplain to the forces. Brave man! He adds he will serve Redcliffe better by going than by staying. Very probable. We commend this example to the rest of the clergy. They would all serve their country better by going than by staying. Of that we have no doubt whatever.

Digitized by Google

Rev. W. M. Smith-Dorrien, brother to General Smith-Dorrien, sends to the Times a letter—a petition for presentation to the Prime Minister, asking him to "call the nation to prayer" on a given day "to show that the nation puts its trust wholly in God." But does it? What of the call for men, and money, and munitions, and National Service for every one from eighteen to sixty-one? Besides there is Lord Northcliffe and Lloyd George, and Horatio Bottomley. Trust in God! The humbug of it all!

The War has given a splendid opportunity to religious cranks and self-elected moral reformers, so we are pleased to see the Chief Constable of Edinburgh taking a stand against the nonsense talked about the evil influence of the cinema on the young. With the older people, he said, the cinema had been a means of attracting the people from the public-house. He knew of no cases where boys had been incited to crime by the cinema, and was unaware of any evil resulting therefrom. The Chief Constables of Dundee and Aberdeen concurred with these views. The truth is, we believe, that these sensations are worked up by Societies for the Improvements of Public Morals and the like, which can only exist by manufacturing or exaggerating evils so as to make the flesh of the timid creep, and extract subscriptions from the unwary.

Rev. Bickersteth Ottley, Canon of Canterbury, writes to the Daily Mail that a good potato crop and a good corn harvest cannot be secured apart from "fair weather," and suggests that the present is the occasion for offering of prayers throughout the country. We note, however, that the Food Controller and the rest of our rulers have not appealed for more prayers but for more labour. And, so far as we observe, those Freethinkers who have taken up allotments appear to be doing just as well as their pious neighbours.

We take the following from the Glasgow Evening Times of March 12:—

> An unusual incident occurred during the hearing of a case of theft at Clydebank Police Court to-day. Charles Stewart, one of the witnesses for the prosecution, declined to take the oath, but said he would affirm. Replying to the Court Assessor, he said his reason for declining to be sworn was that he did not believe in it. In reply to a further question, he said he was not a member of any Church.
>
> Stewart was ordered to leave the witness-box, and at the close of the Court was put into the dock, when Superintendent Mackay said that he would report the case to the Burgh Officer.

Some parts of the above seem obscure. Why, for instance, was the witness, after being dismissed, placed in the dock? And what was meant by Superintendent Mackay saying he would report the case to the Burgh Officer? We are trying to get fuller information on the matter, but one thing seems clear. The Court had no right whatever to refuse the witness the right of affirmation. That was a purely arbitrary and indefensible act, and we purpose drawing the attention of the authorities, so soon as we have made the necessary inquiries, to this high-handed action of the police-court officials.

Twenty thousand State schoolmasters are serving at the Front, says Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, President of the Board of Education. Yet the clergy, who number 50,000, have been exempted from military service.

The new edition of the Catholic Year Book is edited by Sir F. C. Burnand, a former editor of Punch. We hope this does not indicate undue levity in its contents.

In her book, Non-Combatants, Rose Macaulay writing in antithetical style of persons who longed for the end of the War, writes: "the staffs of journals as widely sundered by temperament and habit as the Times and Manchester Guardian, the Morning Post, and the Daily News, the Spectator, and the English Review, the Vorwarts, and the Kreuz Zeitung, the Church Times, the Freethinker, and the Record." We should imagine that many others, beside those named, long for the end of the War. It has revealed so much of the savage, the brute, and the reactionist that, given a really long war, it looks as though one might almost say good bye to civilization.

The more irrational a creed is the greater are the vitality and power it seems to possess. All attempts to rationalize Christianity have invariably weakened its influence. Such is the effect of the Protestant Reformation even at this very day. As statistics continue to testify, nearly all the Non-conformist bodies are perceptibly losing ground year after year; and in the Anglican Church the only party that is making progress is the Catholic, and it prospers simply because it represents irrationality aflame with enthusiasm.

For several months the Catholic party in the Established Church has been enjoying a fine innings in its own ably conducted organ, the Church Times. In the issue for March 16 our contemporary devotes five columns and a half to correspondence on the subject of the Reservation of the Sacrament. To an unbelieving outsider nothing can be more irrational than the belief that so much bread and wine, over which a priest has pronounced certain words, can be the medium of supernatural grace and strength to those who reverently contemplate it; but the gullibility of the majority of mankind is quite a proverb. It follows, of necessity, that the heavier the demand made on this gullibility the greater and heartier is the response thereto. And it is against this direct foe of Reason that our hottest warfare must be directed in the immediate future. The Catholic religion is, undoubtedly, the only religion before which there opens out a future of any promise, and that, largely, because it sets Reason at defiance.

Sabbatarians in Wellington (N.Z.) have just experienced a nasty fall. The City Council, using its powers for regulating the Municipal Golf Links, decreed there should be no Sunday golf. Numerous golfers defied the regulation, with the result that the Council was compelled to prosecute. The judge who tried the case said that the sole reason, to his mind, for making the regulation was to impose a measure of Sabbath observance on unwilling people. Further, the bye-law was an unnecessary interference with the right of private judgment. The summonses were therefore dismissed, and Sunday golf will proceed as usual.

It is worth while noting that in our own London Parks the L.C.C. has forbidden all games on the "Sawbath," and Londoners have tamely submitted. But, then, English people appear willing to submit to any and every interference with individual freedom. Further, we have much the same kind of quarrel on with the L.C.C. with regard to the sale of literature in the Parks as the Wellington folk had with their Council. This is, not the right of the L.C.C. to make bye-laws, but whether in making those laws the Council is acting in the interests of common sense and public policy. It remains to be seen, in the tussle that may come, whether English judges will be less enlightened than New Zealand ones.

Mr. R. Tweedy-Smith, a prominent Y.M.C.A. worker, says he helped many soldiers "to pen letters to their wives and sweethearts" during his stay in France. "Wives and sweethearts" is distinctly good.

Pious folk are often deficient in a sense of humour. At a London tribunal a Christian conscientious objector told the officials he had flat foot and hammer toe, but "stood for Christ."

The Christian Science Sentinel has a leading article, entitled "Friends of Jesus." It is significant that no names are mentioned.

The Bishop of London says: "We ought to be looking for a new country, new church, and new world." Many people wish his lordship would look for a new country—and stay there.

Digitized by Google

Special.

When I wrote last week, I was in doubt as to whether the newly increased price of paper was due to panic or to the imminence of a genuine paper famine. It was very soon obvious that there would be a real shortage of paper, and it became imperative to take steps at once to guard the future of the Freethinker. I am happy to say that this has been done. My greatest difficulty was, as usual, want of capital. There was only one way in which this could be overcome at short notice, and that was by borrowing the necessary money on my own personal security. This has been done, and I have no doubt I shall be able to meet the repayments as they become due.

The immediate question remaining is how to make good this new increase in the cost of material. The possible ways are: (1) Increase the price of the paper from twopence to, say, twopence-halfpenny. (2) Issue a special number at threepence once each month. (3) Re-open the Sustentation Fund. (4) Just carry on as usual, and trust to surmounting difficulties as they arise. (5) Issue a smaller number of pages each week.

Number two would nearly meet this new increase in the cost of paper, and number one a little more than meet it. Number three would, I am sure, meet with a ready response; but I am very loth to adopt it. I feel strongly inclined to venture on number four, in spite of its meaning greater worry and trouble. Number five has technical difficulties in the way of its adoption, and I do not favour that plan unless the output of paper ceases and it becomes a question of ekeing out one's supply.

However, the matter can now rest for a week or two; the great thing was to guard against danger, and that has been done. I am only writing now because I know how keen is the interest readers take in the Freethinker, and some of them may have suggestions to make that would be helpful.

Chapman Cohen.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

March 25, Manchester; April 1, Portsmouth; April 8, Swansea.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—March 25, Avondale Hall, Clapham.

Henry.—We are obliged for copies of local papers sent. Correspondents do us a real service in forwarding newspaper cuttings. They considerably ease our labours, although space often prevents them being used.

F. Betts.—Received. Thanks.

A. F. Thorn.—Pleased to hear from you, and to note that you are retaining both your spirits and your activity—though one, we suppose, goes with the other.

"Scotty."—The oversight was quite unintentional. Will bear it in mind for the future. We are obliged for useful batch of cuttings.

Will Freethinkers in the neighbourhood of Cardiff who are willing to co-operate in the work of Freethought propaganda please communicate with Mr. J. H. Edwards, of 9 Sycamore Terrace, Taffs Well.

B. Russell.—We are not surprised at the return of your letter. When officials are open to such influence, a profession of religious zeal is quite a common method of gaining preferential treatment. It is very annoying, but a little reflection enables one to smile at the privileges thus gained.

W. E. Hopkins.—Thanks. Very interesting, but regret want of space will not permit reprinting.

H. Johnson.—If we may paraphrase Mark Antony "Intrigue should be made of keener stuff." When a writer addresses his letter to the Editor of "Freethought," it is a safe presumption that he knows very little of the Freethinker, and is interested in neither its policy nor its welfare.

C. Jortram.—Yes, it is a tyranny. Lately we almost think in reams, and dream of heaven as a place where the supply of paper is plentiful and cheap. Naturally our trouble is largely a financial one. With adequate capital we should only be bothered about the cost. As it is we are worried in two ways. Still, we shall survive.

E. B.—We are obliged for your weekly package.

C. Chambers.—We are very sorry to hear that your friend, lance-corporal Butcher, has been killed in action. From your account of him, we do not doubt that the Freethought cause has lost a brave and worthy servant. Your affection for him is complimentary to you both.

J. G. Bartram.—Glad to see you are endeavouring to reorganize at Newcastle, and hope all the local friends will heartily assist. Sorry to hear one of your sons is in hospital. Please give our regards to them both.

D. Adamson.—Thanks for cutting. Shall be obliged for any further information on the matter you can get for us.

R. G. Smith (B. E. F. France).—We shall be very pleased to see you when you obtain your long-promised leave. Please advise us beforehand if you can. Sorry to hear of the interrupted supply of Freethinker. Hope it is all right now. Am sending current issue.

Freethinker Sustentation Fund.—Tom Taylor, 9s. 6d.

Dr. B. Dunlop writes that he desires to make one comment on Keridon's "partizan article" "Profiteering and the Pulpit," which is that "all evolutionists should be able to see that excessive birth-rates inevitably cause poverty, superstition, war, and 'Profiteering.'"

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (March 25) Mr. Cohen will deliver two lectures in the Cosy Corner Picture House, Manchester. The place of meeting is at the corner of Swan Street and Oak Street, Shudehill, and is easily accessible from all parts of the city. The afternoon meeting will be at 3 o'clock, and the evening meeting at 6.30. We hope there will be a good muster of Manchester Freethinkers, and that they will bring their Christian friends along with them.

The attention of Manchester members of the N. S. S. is specially directed to the meeting at the Merchants' Hotel, Oldham Street, on March 24, at 7 o'clock. The President, Mr. C. Cohen, will leave London early in the day for the purpose of being present.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures to-day (March 25) in the Avondale Hall, Landor Road, Clapham. The lecture commences at 7 o'clock, and the hall is within three minutes' walk of Clapham Road Tube Station. We hope that Mr. Lloyd will have the audience he deserves. In that case the hall will be more than crowded.

In connection with the repeated boycotting and burning of the Freethinker at certain Labour meetings in Liverpool, Mr. F. Hoey (Labour Representation Committee) and Mr. C. Barker (Kensington I.L.P.) write protesting against Mr. Gott's account as originally published in the Freethinker. Mr. Barker denies that the paper was ordered to be burned, although the Secretary of the Fabian Society, from whom the information originally came, reaffirms the truth of his statement. Mr. Barker says that he bought the unsold copies of the Freethinker, and gave them away. Mr. Hoey supports the I.L.P. in keeping anti-theological literature off the bookstalls and protests energetically against an implied attack upon the Rev. Dunnico (selected as Parliamentary candidate) because he happens to be a parson. It should be added that both Mr. Hoey and Mr. Barker write as Freethinkers.

For our part we have already said all we had to say on the incident, and we only re-open the subject in order to place our readers in possession of the fact that contradiction to the original statement had been offered. But, we may add, that if the I.L.P. really keeps both religious and anti-religious literature off its bookstalls, no Freethinker can have any legitimate cause of complaint. But does it do this? So far our information is to the contrary. As to Mr. Dunnico's selection as Parliamentary candidate we are quite ready to accept Mr. Hoey's contention that being a parson had nothing to do with his selection. We are the more ready to accept this as we hear very favourable accounts of Mr. Dunnico from other quarters. Finally, our whole demand is that Freethinkers in the Labour Movement should receive fair treatment, and be on their guard against a too great readiness to sink their Freethought in such a manner and under such conditions as will enable the common enemy to gain an advantage.

Digitized by Google

Members and friends of Newcastle-on-Tyne Branch are requested to note that a meeting will be held on Sunday, March 25, in the Colingwood Hall, Clayton Street, opposite the end of Nelson Street, at 3 p.m., to consider reorganization, etc. Hoping all desirous of assisting will attend or communicate with J. G. Bartram, 107 Morley Street, Heaton.

A medical correspondent, now on active service, writes, offering us "warmest congratulations" on what he calls the "vigorous manner" in which the Freethinker is conducted, and adds:—

> Plain speaking is necessary now more than ever—for the present "World" War, having knocked away the few decaying props of superstition and orthodoxy which were still remaining, has engendered an entirely new spirit of inquiry and criticism in regard to long-cherished religious beliefs, this tendency being often most marked in those who previously were numbered amongst the most pious. This fact cannot have escaped anyone who is not totally blinded by ignorance and prejudice. It was after reading your leader on "Religion in the Army," every word of which I heartily endorse, that I determined to bring the following points from my own experience before you.
>
> It has been repeatedly stated that a great and sudden change has come over our fighting men; that they have become more fervently religious, after many years of spiritual indifference; and that their splendid courage and self-sacrifice are attributable to a newly found faith in the divine power and inspiration.
>
> It is my privilege to mix intimately with the men during the course of my duties. I also censor a great many of their letters. On many occasions, both by personal conversation and by facts related to me by others, I have endeavoured to form a rough estimate of the attitude of the average soldier towards religion.
>
> After a good deal of close observation, I have no hesitation in stating emphatically that, as far as my experience goes, in the vast majority of cases the religious sense is practically non-existent in our soldiers. They are animated by a sincere desire to do their best for their country in its time of peril, and so help to bring about an early and victorious peace and a return to less strenuous conditions of life. Fair play and sportsmanship appeal strongly to the Tommy—God and the supernatural are of very little account.
>
> In regard to the officers with whom I have come in contact, open unbelief is the rule in at least half the number; the remainder either believe in an indifferent and nebulous manner or do not trouble to venture an opinion one way or another. The corps to which I have the honour to belong is specially noted for its heterodox opinions on religious matters.
>
> On several occasions I have talked to "C. of E." men whose only acquaintance with church was on the day they were married. Religious services and celebrations are often attended in order to kill time or afford a bit of variety from the monotony of active service. I have been unable to discover any indications of increased piety from the speech or the manners of the men. Pious ejaculations are common, but are reserved solely for moments of irritation or anger; whilst ribald ditties in which Biblical characters often figure prominently are the rule in moments of leisure.
>
> The other night our church tent was blown over in a gale of wind. This caused considerable amusement amongst the men, and I heard from several the following morning that "God's House had been routed during the night," and that "Jesus could not have had many pals amongst the soldiers of this unit." On entering a hospital ward one morning, I was "terribly shocked" to hear the refrain, "Jesus washed my sins away, and I'm very much obliged to Jesus." I could recount many similar stories. I have no reason to suspect that the experience of others who take the trouble to investigate this subject from an unbiased standpoint will differ materially from mine.
>
> The statement that the average soldier has a "strong religious instinct" or "an extraordinary spiritual power" is directly contrary to the facts, and as yet there has been no proof that our men need a supernatural stimulus in order to enable them to carry out their hazardous exploits. To say that our troops suddenly become religious when the enemy is nigh is a gross and impertinent slander on an honourable body of men, and effectively demonstrates to what depths of calumny the pious, both clerical and lay, will descend on realizing the futility of their faith and seeing the edifice of superstition tumbling about their ears.
>
> Truly to the Freethinker this War has been a "godsend."

Quite a lengthy "Sugar Plum," but, we think our readers will agree, both an interesting and an important one.

The Birmingham Weekly Mercury publishes a three-column descriptive article by "Arley Lane" on Mr. Cohen's recent Town Hall meeting. It notes the large "congregation," with "a happy sprinkling of beautiful girls and magnificent matrons." The close interest of the audience in the lecture, with their frequent laughter and hearty applause, is pointed as, we suspect, a warning lesson to those who profess to treat Freethought meetings as a negligible quantity.

Critical Chat.

FREETHOUGHT AND THE NOVEL.

A CORRESPONDENT, who is far too complimentary to my well-meant if insignificant attempt at literary criticism, has done me the honour to ask me to draw up a list of works in which Freethinkers are handled more or less sympathetically. Miss Lynd is also kind enough to suggest that I may possibly know the answer to the following conundrum: Why has the modern novel not been more frequently used as a vehicle for rationalistic propaganda, in support, as she puts it, of the Good Cause? With her permission, I will begin by trying to answer this question.

It is a remark as obvious as it is general that at the present moment most of our novelists of the first and second rank are Rationalists, or Freethinkers of some shade or other. If Christianity be rightly defined as a belief in the intervention of the supernatural in Nature and history, it would be very difficult to discover an unmistakable trace of it in their work. Mr. George Moore, Mr. Conrad, Mr. Wells, Mr. Bennett, and Miss May Sinclair, to mention only a few, are more or less definitely non-Christian in their philosophic attitude to life. Their Freethought is not something extraneous, something that can be easily thrown on one side; it is rather a pervading intellectual energy, giving harmony, depth, and spaciousness to their creative work. It is as natural to them as gesture or tone of voice, and, it may be, just as little a matter for argument. Their stories, like those of Tourgenief and Meredith, are Freethought fiction in the only sense in which there is such a thing. That is, they are written by men for whom the beliefs and affirmations of Christianity have no validity. But the ingenuous reader may here be inclined to ask why what is popularly known as the Freethought novel, the propagandist novel, is invariably left to inferior writers? It is, I fancy, because the more capable novelist is aware that it is no part of his business to argue and discuss, but rather to observe, understand, and represent. His aim is to represent the whole of life as it really is, not a mere fragment, however interesting that fragment may be to him and to others. He is careful not to allow his philosophical and ethical bias to stand in the way of a rounded conception of human nature. He is ever ready to recognize loyally the fundamental complexity of man. For him, the world is peopled with men and women, creatures of flesh and blood, not mere types of good and evil. He knows that even the most anti-social of men —the burglar, for instance—has his hour of relaxation, when he has pretty much the same tastes and sympathies as the average law-abiding citizen. I once knew an intelligent burglar who, after he had "brought off" a particularly difficult job, would find relief for his overwrought nerves in Richard Jefferies' descriptions of country life. Now, I have no doubt that I shall be told by people who think a work of fiction is all the better for being not a novel, but a tract, that my friend was not sincere; that it is ridiculous to think that a burglar could appreciate the harmonies of an exquisite prose style; that what he really enjoyed was Smiles' Self-Help. But this is a fatuously simple view of the human mind. Let me remind them of a popular song by which W. S. Gilbert must have shocked the too serious minds of the mid-Victorian moralists. It celebrated the strenuous activities of a hooligan who, when he had finished jumping on his mother, would go and lie abasking in the sun. I am certain that his enjoyment of the warm sun was not more real than my burglar-friend's enjoyment of Richard Jefferies. This inability to see that human nature is infinitely complex will explain the woodenness of so much of our fiction, especially the novel "with a tendency."

Digitized by Google

However that may be, any writer of fiction who is worth his salt must know that it is impossible to prove anything in a novel. Morality without a sanction is possibly a higher form of ethics than morality with a sanction, but you cannot prove it by merely writing a story around a Freethinker and a Christian. Obviously, by reversing the process, you can get a completely different result. A second-rate novelist like M. Paul Bourget will prove to the satisfaction of the less intelligent of his Catholic readers that modern Materialism must lead to unscrupulous hedonism, and finally to spiritual bankruptcy and suicide; and that all virtue, if not all intelligence, is on the side of an unquestioning faith in traditional religion. What could be easier? All you have to do is to invent your facts, and then interpret them to suit your purpose. This sort of novel is merely a sophisticated and extended form of the religious tract, in which the vicious infidel got what the Christians thought he deserved. The success of Quo Vadis? shows that the reading public generally has not a very intelligent interest in fiction. Yet I doubt if a Freethought tract on similar lines would become popular. The Freethinker has more brains than the Christian. We know that the object of fiction is to give pleasure, not instruction.

Another equally strong objection to the use of the novel as a propagandist tract is that the animus necessarily set up by controversy must dissipate the atmosphere of Olympian calm in which the genuine creative artist works. How often do we not see the genius of a novelist go to pieces the moment he ignores his privilege of broad imaginative sympathy! Take the pretty obvious case of Mr. Hardy. It seems to me that his doctrinaire partizanship, the preoccupation with social and philosophic ideas of a man who did not happen to come into his intellectual heritage till late in life, is largely responsible for the semi-vitalized characters in Jude the Obscure; which, indeed, has some of the qualities of the tract, notably dullness and over-emphasis. Not a few of us are inclined to see the same falling-off in the novels of George Eliot. The early stories are shaped by that imaginative sympathy with the thoughts and emotions of her fellow-creatures which gives so complete a veri-similitude to her pictures of religious life. In later life, when her philosophic environment had killed the artist in her, we have, instead of the emotional realism of Silas Marner, the dull and dry analysis of Daniel Deronda, a very dustheap of Positivism. The artistic balance of the novelist, it seems to me, implies an extremely delicate equation of life and ideas. Life alone will give you the superficial, if not unpleasant, fiction of Dumas, and Hardy in his first period. Ideas alone will give you the tendency-novel, a story intended to prove or disprove a certain thesis; the Freethought, Christian, or social tract masquerading as fiction. When there is this perfect balance of life and ideas, you get Spring Floods, Madame Bovary, and Richard Feverel.

If any Freethinker, after what I have said, still wants a list of works "suitable for Rationalists' reading," he will find one drawn up by the earnest young gentleman who discourses for our edification on bookish matters in the pages of the Literary Guide. Two stories by Edna Lyall, whom I have always had the misfortune to confuse with Emma Jane Worboise; a wretched pot-boiler by Robert Buchanan, who contrasts a violently lecherous and mendacious High Church clergyman with a frigidly virtuous disciple of Herbert Spencer; an excursion in didacticism by Mrs. W. K. Clifford, who ought to have known better than to spoil the reputation she had gained by Aunt Anne; and Samuel Butler's The Way of All Flesh, which seems to have slipped in by mistake, as it has nothing in common with the rubbish our young gentleman is pleased to recommend. My advice is that we should avoid anything in the shape of a story with a purpose. Fortunately, Freethinkers have the whole body of English fiction, from Fielding to Henry James, to choose from. Its spirit is sanely secular, and its sympathy with all phases of life cannot but have a broadening effect upon the mind.

George Underwood.

Unburying the Hatchet.

There has been a meeting at Rhyl recently for the purpose of establishing a memorial to the men of North Wales who have fallen in the War, and it has been agreed that the memorial will take the shape of new science buildings for Bangor University College. Mr. R. J. Thomas, of Holyhead, who has inaugurated the scheme and given it his most generous support, considers, "that the object would be a truly undenominational and unsectarian one for the benefit of all classes alike," a proposition both self-evident and creditable, and from the point of view of translating love for the dead into work for the living can make a fair claim to rational support.

But "Unsectarian" is not always a word to conjure with. Moreover, anything "for the benefit of all classes alike" fails to raise the enthusiasm of those who have always been accustomed to the "long pull" and the turn of the scales. So it was strictly in accordance with tradition that the Bishop of St. Asaph appeared as spokesman for a minority of eight, amongst whom were at least two other reverend gentlemen.

Now, there had been called to this gathering the County Councils, Boroughs, Urban and Rural Councils of North Wales, the lords lieutenant, the high sheriffs, the Members of Parliament, the peers connected with North Wales, representatives of Bangor College, the Cymmrodorion Society, the Liverpool and Manchester Welsh National Societies, the quarrymen and miners of North Wales, the Old Students' Association, the Agricultural Committees, and the Welsh County Schools Association. As a matter of fact, according to the Manchester Guardian, the assembly was remarkably large and representative of the five counties of Anglesea, Carnarvon, Denbigh, Flint, and Merioneth. Yet the first criticism that the Bishop felt constrained to offer was that the meeting was "somewhat limited" in character. The only conclusion to be drawn from this curious remark is that to the ecclesiastically minded no gathering is truly representative unless it shows a preponderance of the official Welsh Church and Capel-Sion element.

Digitized by Google

For a moment the Bishop exposed his hand by having a rap at science, but one could hardly expect that temptation to be resisted. He hoped that science when developed "would not be concentrated upon the invention and perfecting of still more deadly instruments of war." Such a concentration is inconceivable. But what we are concerned in pointing out is that if this War is, as it is represented to be, a war in which civilization itself is at stake, and if science is winning it, then it is impossible to resist the conclusion that science is going to prove the saviour of civilization. This may be discomforting to a Bishop; but, then, even a Bishop cannot have it both ways, though, of course, there is nothing to prevent him from trying. Then there was an attempt to make the scientific purpose of the memorial appear sectional and partial, in precisely the same way in which the Secular solution of the education difficulties is made to appear so by the same parties. Finally, he "was sure it would not command the universal heartfelt support of those who had a right to be heard."

The Bishop's opposition alone amounts to demonstration of this last statement. But why was he so disappointing? Why did he not give us some hint of a scheme which would command this universal heartfelt support? We venture to suggest that the Bishop was conscious of a lack of that spiritual sympathy around him which is such a great help to the proper appraisement of episcopal emanations. In the right atmosphere an extension of the scheme of Public Shrines, for instance, might have been hailed as a perfectly fitting memorial, and might have received unanimous "heartfelt support." But "universal heartfelt support" is an impossible desideratum in this world of pro and con. Even the Daily Mail, in its scholarly and dignified attempt to make us ashamed of being English, cannot achieve that.

We are sorry for these omissions, for we have an idea, which we would have liked confirmed, that the Bishop doesn't like the projected memorial because it has no relish of salvation in it. It must appear to a prelate that when anything concerning the dead is concerned, there should be room for him. It is his metier. "The bourne from which no traveller returns" is the matter about which he possesses most information. What is this memorial, then, but an impudent trespass on theological preserves?

* * * *

Why is it that when other prelates are quite willing, even anxious, for peace at any price, the Bishop of St. Asaph shows signs of trying a tilt with science? For the sake of the good Bishop Colenso, we should be charitable, and seek for extenuating circumstances. We think they are there.

The Gods have not dealt gently with the Bishop of St. Asaph. In their wisdom, they have chosen for his sphere of usefulness a neighbourhood which has been singularly fruitful to men of science, and has germinated the seeds of theological unrest in thousands of the faithful. A couple of miles south-west of St. Asaph are rocks and caves which breed suggestions most destructive to simple faith. In Cefn caves geologists and palæontologists brought to light the bones of the Elephas Antiquus, Rhinoceros Tichorhinas, and Hippopotamus Major, every one of which propounded an unanswerable Biblical conundrum. Three miles east of St. Asaph is the Bone Earth at Cae Gwyn, overlaid by boulder clay, in which side by side with the bones of the mammoth and hyæna have been found the simple flint implements of primitive man. It is not credible that a person could be called to such a neighbourhood without being eternally reminded of the bands of fearless and truth-seeking investigators, who, from the bowels of the earth, drew the material for blasting into a thousand fragments the Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture. And the words of Huxley must ring in such a prelate's ears:—

> Extinguished theologians lie about the cradle of every science as the strangled snakes beside that of Hercules and History records that whenever science and orthodoxy have been fairly opposed, the latter has been forced to retire from the lists bleeding and crushed, if not annihilated; scotched, if not slain.

The Cathedral of St. Asaph is the smallest in the kingdom, but small as it is, the red sandstone of which it is built is conspicuous enough to force itself upon the attention. And if meditating on the Old Red Sandstone drove Hugh Miller to madness, the probability is that it would make a Bishop at least irritable. Environment, we are afraid, has been too strong for the Bishop of St. Asaph. Human Nature must not be imposed upon. It would be the height of folly, in these circumstances, to expect his enemy's dog—when it has bit him—to successfully seek for warmth at his reverence's fire.

T. H. E.

The French Revolution.

VII.

VENGEANCE.

(Continued from p. 171.)

THE Revolutionary Tribunal, it will be remembered, was established by the National Convention in March, 1793, to cope with the internal crisis in France which was revealed by the news of the rebellion in La Vendee. During the first six or seven months of its existence it was a useful and necessary institution. Every prisoner brought before it had the fullest opportunity of defending himself through counsel. The number of death-sentences, from March to September, averaged about ten a month—high no doubt, but not surprising when we remember that France, for most of the time, was in a state of civil war. The daily procession of tumbrils to the guillotine was as yet unknown and undreamt of.

In October, after the reorganization of the Government already described, the Committee of Public Safety decided on the trial of Marie-Antoinette. She had been moved on August 1 from the Temple to the prison of the Conciergerie, where prisoners awaiting trial were usually kept. Her trial had been postponed, however, owing to some negotiations which the Government was carrying on with the Allied Powers for the evacuation of French soil as a condition of the Queen's release. These broke down, and the trial was hastened. It would, indeed, have been anomalous to have punished Louis XVI., a weak and stupid, though criminal man, and to have let off Marie-Antoinette, his prompter in evil—this vile woman, who would have been willing to drown her adopted country in the blood of its inhabitants, if this could have saved her crown and her luxuries. "L'Autrichienne" was tried accordingly, and guillotined on October 16—the same day as the victory of Wattignies over the Austrians.

As for her son, the boy of eight whom the Royalists called "Louis XVII.," he was entrusted to the care of a working-class family called Simon, to be brought up as a good Republican and not as a princely popinjay. Great has been the indignation expended by historians, and many the apocryphal stories circulated, respecting his treatment. Assuredly, if we concede the Christian-Conservative theory as to the "rights of the parent," a conclusive case can be made out against the action taken by the municipality of Paris in this respect. But to those who regard the individual as the unit of society, and who consider that a child has a right to a decent education irrespective of its parents, it will seem that the kindest thing that could be done, in the circumstances, was to try and neutralize the pernicious early influences under which this unfortunate boy had lived, and to make a man and not a king of him. As it was, young Louis was of a feeble constitution, and died in the Temple in 1795.

Digitized by Google

The next action of the Government was of a much more questionable kind. Of the Girondist deputies arrested on June 2, most had escaped to the departments and stirred up civil war, and only twelve remained in Paris. After the murder of Marat, the Convention had decreed that these should be sent before the Revolutionary Tribunal. This step was not taken at once; but on October 3 the Committee of General Security, which had the police and prison administration in its hands, proposed to the Convention that these twelve and nine others should be tried without delay, and that seventy-five other Girondist deputies, who had drawn up a protest against the expulsion of their leaders, should be imprisoned. This was agreed to, and virtually extinguished, for the time being, all Parliamentary opposition to the Government. The twenty-one, including Brissot and Vergniaud, were brought before the Tribunal in a batch on October 22. The course of trying so many men together was open to much objection, and created an evil precedent. It was difficult to find a charge that could be proved against every one of them. Some of them, no doubt, were involved in the insurrections in Normandy, Lyons, etc., and therefore could expect no pity. But others were guiltless of this; and one of them (Ducos) had actually been exempted by Marat's intercession on June 2. The trial lasted a week, and the result seemed doubtful. Then the Government made their first outrageous breach with the common rules of justice, and passed a special law providing that the jury, when they felt "sufficiently enlightened," might terminate a trial and find a verdict at once. The twenty-one were sentenced to death. One (Valaze) stabbed himself in court; the others went to the guillotine on October 31, singing the "Marseillaise" till there was not one of them left. Thus the Government embarked on that policy of mere vengeance, which was to break up the democratic party and run the Revolution on the rocks. The Revolutionary Tribunal passed only too quickly from salutary severity to needless and vindictive savagery. The twenty-one were quickly followed to the scaffold by Madame Roland, Bailly (ex-mayor of Paris, who had been responsible for the shooting down of the Republicans on July 17, 1791), Barnave, the constitutional Royalist, and Rabaut St. Etienne, a very harmless member of the Girondist party, and an early exponent of Socialist theory.

This is the best point at which to refer to the movement of "dechristianization." It has been mentioned already that some of the most advanced democrats, notably Anacharsis Clootz, were in favour of disestablishing the Church and organizing the State on a Secularist basis. This section was very strong among the working-class of the towns, who were beginning to see in Christianity only a means of making them content with hardship in this life by promising them consolations in another. This view predominated in the municipal council of Paris, where its principal advocate was Chaumette, a pioneer of Socialism. Hebert, the editor of Pere Duchesne, lent the movement the support of his official position in the municipality, and of his popular and disreputable paper. He was never far behind the popular lead in such matters. The anti-religious policy took definite body and shape in September and October, 1793, when the Convention decided to adopt an entirely new calendar. This was worked out by two advanced members of the "Mountain," Romme, a mathematician, and Fabre d'Eglantine, a poet and a friend of Danton. The year was to start on September 22, the day when the Republic had been proclaimed, and by a coincidence, the autumnal equinox. There were twelve months of thirty days each, and five odd days at the end to make up 365. A sixth odd day was added in leap-year. The twelve months were named by Fabre d'Eglantine according to the fruits and the weather, etc., characteristic of each. Beginning at the autumnal equinox, we have Vendemiaire, Brumaire, and Frimaire till mid-winter; then Nivose, Pluviose, Ventose till the spring equinox; Germinal, Floreal, Prairial till mid-summer; Messidor, Thermidor, and Fructidor till September; and, finally, the odd days called Sans-culottides ("sans-culotte" being the cant name applied to the common people, originally in derision, and then taken up as a title of honour). This calendar was in force until Napoleon re-established Catholicism, when it was dropped, and was revived by the Commune in 1871. It is certainly a neater calendar than ours, which has the months all of varying lengths, and is without any astronomical basis. If the happy day comes when Christianity is dislodged from the conventionally privileged position it now occupies, civilized mankind might do worse than adopt the Revolutionary Calendar. The only flaw in it was the substitution of a ten-day week for one of seven. Ten is too long; but there is much to be said for a week of five days, and this might be agreed to.

The new calendar, by disestablishing Sunday, necessarily struck a blow at religion as by law established. The Secularist party grew bold, and, not altogether wisely or well, attempted to "rush" matters. Some commissioners of the Convention in different parts of France took the initiative by prohibiting, on their own authority, the exercise of Catholic worship in the streets, pulling down crucifixes, destroying "relics," and inscribing over cemeteries: "Death is an eternal sleep." As the clergy, whether non-juring or constitutional, had mostly opposed the latest Revolutionary developments, there was much popular support for these measures. Many priests came forward, voluntarily or under pressure, to renounce their orders and their religion. On November 10, the Paris municipality organized a festival of "Liberty and Reason" in Notre Dame, at which Revolutionary hymns were sung, while an actress impersonated the "Goddess of Reason." This new cult had a great vogue for a few weeks, and in many towns festivals of Reason were held, churches were shut up, and bells and plate melted down for cannon. Such ceremonies, however, will hardly appeal to modern Freethinkers, who tend to regard as unseasonable and superfluous any attempt to erect a new cult, "ethical" or other, on the ruins of Christianity. The Government never recognized the worship of Reason. Robespierre and Danton were both opposed to it, the former violently so, owing to his Deistic fanaticism. In many places, too, the peasantry showed a dangerous spirit of resentment at attempts to close the churches; and eventually the Committee of Public Safety had to circularize its commissioners, begging them to go slowly, and to leave the undermining of Catholicism to the gradual operation of human reason.

The Revolutionary Government had now the mastery of its enemies within the country; and the best friends of democracy must agree that, too often, that mastery was tyrannously and cruelly abused. Lyons, the chief city involved in the Girondist rebellion, fell into the hands of the Revolutionary forces on October 8. The Convention decreed, on the proposal of the Government, that the city should be totally destroyed. This decree was not carried out, and was probably meant for effect; but the Committee of Public Safety sent down Collot d'Herbois, one of its own members, to punish the rebels. Local feeling ran very high against the wealthy classes of Lyons, who had used their power to guillotine Chalier and to terrorize the common people. Collot d'Herbois, under the influence of his own passions and those of the local democrats, took a horrible revenge; the wealthy and reactionary citizens of Lyons were taken out and mowed down by musketry in batches. Toulon, which was taken in December, was similarly treated by the commissioners of the Convention there.

Digitized by Google

If such vengeance was taken on the Girondists and Royalists at Lyons and Toulon, it may be guessed that the Vendean insurgents, who had themselves been guilty of the most awful atrocities against the Republicans, met with no mercy when they were taken. The Democratic party at Nantes, who had nearly fallen victims to the Vendeans themselves, and who heard from all sides horrid tales of torture and crucifixion by the priest-ridden peasants, went mad with revenge. The commissioner of the Convention at Nantes, Carrier, a weak-headed man, easily susceptible to such gusts of feeling, had the captured priests drowned in the Loire by boat-loads. These "noyades," as they were called, and the shootings and guillotinings which went on at the same time, were the most awful feature of the Revolution, and soon caused even the Democratic commissioners to denounce Carrier and demand his recall. He was summoned back to Paris, but escaped punishment for the present.

It must not be concluded, however, that Carrier and Collot d'Herbois were typical of their party. When the Committee of Public Safety had organized the administration, and had sent out commissioners to the various departments to enforce the central authority, many of the commissioners proved capable and humane officials. They relieved distress, organized defence, taxed the rich, provided work, and enforced the law of "maximum" against traders who sought to raise prices at the expense of the people. It must be admitted that most of them were public-spirited men, whose one object was to protect the poor against exploitation, and to secure victory over the foreign enemy. But such proceedings as those at Lyons and Nantes, however grievously provoked, have left a blot on the fame of the Revolution, which its admirers can only sorrowfully acknowledge. They should serve as a tragic example of the mischief that may be done by those who, in times of stress and strain, whether of war or Revolution, invoke and act upon the theory of "reprisals."

(To be continued.) ROBERT ARCH.

Obituary.

We regret to announce the death of Mrs. Elizabeth Hall, who died March 7, aged eighty-seven years. The deceased was a constant attendant at the Hall of Science, London, during the Bradlaugh regime, after which she came to reside at Failsworth. She was, until sickness and advanced age rendered it impossible, a regular attendant at our meetings here, and was held in high respect by all who knew her. Steadfast and true to her principles she remained unto her death. She was interred at the Failsworth Cemetery on March 10, our President, Mr. James Pollitt, conducting the Secular Burial Service.—J. SMITH.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (St. Pancras Reform Club, 15 Victoria Road, off Kentish Town Road, N.W.): 7.30, Debate, "Freethinkers' Theories versus Freethought." Introduced by J. J. Murphy; opposer, T. F. Palmer.

SOUTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Avondale Hall, Landor Road, Clapham, S.W.): 7, J. T. Lloyd, "Religious Witchcraft."

MR. HOWELL SMITH'S DISCUSSION CLASS (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Wednesday, March 28 (instead of Thursday), at 7.30.

HYDE PARK: 11.30, Messrs. Shaller and Saphin; 3.15, Messrs. Dales and Hyatt; 6.15, Messrs. Kells and Yates.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

LEICESTER (Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate); 6.30, Operetta, performed by Sunday School Children.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE BRANCH N. S. S. (Collingwood Hall, Clayton Street, opposite end of Nelson Street): 3, Meeting to consider Reorganization, etc.

FOREIGN AUTHORS' LITERARY AGENCY.

ENGLISH MANUSCRIPTS OF FOREIGN AUTHORS Revised for Publication by English Author and Journalist, contributor to leading periodicals. Expert Proof-reader, able to see through the Press any large or small book. MSS. of Articles, Stories, Plays, Poems, Translations, etc., put into final English for submission to Editors. Typing if required. Lessons given in English Reading, Writing, and Speaking.—Address, "AUTHORITY," c/o the Freethinker, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C.

ENGLISH EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS, by Wilkins and Fallows; price 6d.—WORKERS' EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION, 14 Red Lion Square, London, W.C.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

POST FREE THREE HALFPENCE.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
QUEEN ANNE'S CHAMBERS, WESTMINSTER, S.W.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.
G. E. MACDONALD - - - - EDITOR.
L. K. WASHBURN - - EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTOR.

Subscription Rates:

Single subscription in advance - - -	$3.00
Two new subscribers - - - - -	5.00
One subscription two years in advance -	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. Lea.
In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
By E. A. Ashcroft.
440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By Carveth Read.
8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.
By D. B. Hart, M.D.
Crown 8vo. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.
By J. M. Wheeler.
Price 3s. net, postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. Foote and W. P. Ball.
For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. MILL.
Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

HISTORY OF THE TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.
By C. D. Collet.
Two vols., published at 7s. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By Chapman Cohen.
Price 1s. net, postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By G. W. Foote.
First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. Wheeler.
Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

Miss E. M. Vance, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
>
> Name.....
>
> Address.....
>
> Occupation .....
>
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Digitized by Google

THREE NEW BOOKS WORTH READING.

By the Hon. A. S. G. CANNING.

Intolerance Among Christians.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d.
(POSTAGE 4d.)

Religious Strife in British History.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d.
(POSTAGE 5d.)

The Political Progress of Christianity.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d
(POSTAGE 4d.)

The Three Volumes post free for 5s.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.
(POSTAGE ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.
(POSTAGE ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.
(POSTAGE ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

Vol. XXXVII.—No. 13 Sunday April 1, 1917 Price Twopence

CONTENTS.

	Page.
Science and the Soul.—The Editor	193
Christianity and the Four Gospels.—J. T. Lloyd	194
The Bobby Burns of Science.—Mimnermus	195
The French Revolution.—Robert Arch	196
Acid Drops	198
The Reflections of Riquet (A Dog).—Anatole France	200
Man and God.—Frank Betts	200
The "Freethinker" and the Paper Famine.—Chapman Cohen	201
To Correspondents	201
Sugar Plums	201
The Monarch of Cereals.—T. F. Palmer	202
Science and Spiritualism.—W. Mann	204
The Peace Council in Heaven.—B. B.	205
Obituary	206
Notice of Meetings	206

Views and Opinions.

Anthropology and the Soul.

To any one acquainted with all that the past fifty years of anthropological research has taught it will be clear that to discuss the question of a "soul" without taking these results into account is to conduct a discussion of very doubtful value. The anthropological data may be admitted or rejected, but it cannot profitably be ignored. But no one of authority does reject it in substance. The evidence is too conclusive for that. If it is admitted, then the conception of man as a duality, made up of the bodily organism we know, and of an independent, animating, and indestructible "soul," we infer, must be rejected as untenable. For the natural history of the "soul" is known. In its modern form it is a metaphysical survival of the bodily "double" which the savage assumed to exist owing to an admittedly erroneous interpretation of well known and otherwise explainable facts. And following the culture stage of primitive life, we see how the development of thought robs the "soul" of its definite character until it becomes the shadow of a shade, of importance only because it promises an intellectual justification of the primitive belief in survival. Thus the religious metaphysician and his theory of survival is found to rest on no other and no better foundation than the speculations of the savage. Here, as elsewhere, anthropology is the key to theology. Anthropology proves the unveracity of theology in the act of deciphering its history and showing its origin.

* * *

"The Soul and Its Story."

In The Soul and Its Story (Arnold, 10s. 6d. net), Mr. Norman Pearson brings to bear on the subject with which he deals a mind well stored with the results of modern science. He writes well and suggestively, does not rely upon theological doctrines, and provides discussions of many subjects that will interest readers who may not at all care about the purpose for which the book is written. But a fatal and fundamental flaw in his work is precisely the omission of that factor which, to our mind, is all important. And this makes Mr. Pearson's work, not a story of the 'Soul,' but a statement and a defence of a metaphysical theory which, while professedly based on scientific data, does not arise naturally from modern science. Mr. Pearson finds the theory of a soul in being, and his work may fairly be described as an attempt to frame a justification of that belief in a way which will not obviously conflict with scientific teaching. The result is an interesting work, probably as strong a case as can be made out for the belief in survival, but, nevertheless, an inconclusive case. It may satisfy the believer, it will leave the unbeliever where he was.

* * *

Metaphysics or Science?

Briefly and baldly put, Mr. Pearson's theory of the soul is this: There is an ultimate reality which we "may call" "Spirit." This ultimate reality gives rise (Spinoza would have said presents two "modes") to both matter and mind. Mind is nearer to matter (a statement which Spinoza, with a keener logical sense than Mr. Pearson possesses, would never have permitted himself to make), but with each atom of matter there is an atom of mind-stuff. At a certain point in evolution the development of mind has become stable enough to persist after the dissolution of the body. (Mr. Pearson conceives these mind-atoms as being built up into complex structures much as chemical compounds are elaborated). Finally, a species of reincarnation is assumed in order to permit continuous development, and a conservation of the experience required. This is, as we have said, only a bald outline of Mr. Pearson's thesis, which is complicated by a discussion of sex, the transmission of acquired qualities, and of modern scientific theories of life and matter. And the general effect on the mind of a philosophic reader will be that of a work which proves at once too much and too little.

* * *

Materialism, True and False.

One obvious criticism on Mr. Pearson's thesis is that it is mechanistic or nothing. The author would doubtless disclaim Materialism; and yet, if we pay attention to things instead of names, it is there. For one does not escape Materialism by writing "Ultimate Reality" in capital letters. To call it "spirit" tells us nothing, and adds nothing. In a chapter devoted to a criticism of Materialism, Mr. Pearson says that "matter" is no more than an inference from our sense of resisted motion. Well, granted; and what is "mind" but another inference from another group of phenomena? Of "matter" or "mind" we know nothing apart from phenomenal experience. Matter, per se, is an abstraction, and so is mind per se. But this is not antagonistic to Materialism; it is part of the case for Materialism. Matter, says Mr. Pearson, cannot be explained in terms of itself. Granted; but can anything be explained in terms of itself? We can describe matter in terms of matter, and we can describe mind in terms of mind; but we can explain neither in terms of itself. And we cannot do this because a scientific explanation consists in the establishment of equivalents. Thus, we explain the constitution of water by the formula of H_2O. If H_2O is not the equivalent of water, our explanation is faulty. If it is, the explanation is complete. On the other hand, we are bound to describe things in terms of its own class. Thus we frame chemical "laws" to describe the action of chemical elements, biological "laws" to describe the actions of living beings, and psychological "laws" to describe mental phenomena. Mr. Pearson, in his attack on Materialism, appears to have fallen into the common confusion of identifying a scientific description with a scientific explanation. And the two things are distinct. Thus, when Kepler propounded the laws of planetary motion, he described the path of the planets in the heavens. The explanation came when Newton showed that, on the principle of universal attraction, a moving body would of necessity describe an elipse. Consequently, the Materialist need not attempt to explain "matter" in terms of itself; it is enough that he can so describe it. And if Mr. Pearson were right in assuming that "mind" and "matter" (which are no more than names descriptive of groups of phenomena) are the expression of an "Ultimate Reality," that would in no sense be fatal to Materialism, particularly as Mr. Pearson asserts that as to what this "Reality" is, "Materialist and Idealist stand equally baffled before it." In that case it would seem wiser to cease talking about this "Ultimate Reality," which, in the circumstances, can hardly avoid becoming ultimate nonsense.

Digitized by Google

* * *

Mind and Body.

There is another assumption of Mr. Pearson's against which a protest must be made. This is that the problem before the Materialist is to explain how "mind" and "matter," or thought and organization, are connected. He is here in very numerous and distinguished company; but the assumption is quite unwarranted. "The interaction between mind and body," says Mr. Pearson, "is a highly mysterious matter, but its mysteries cannot be dispelled by attempting to suppress the distinction between the two." But who wishes to suppress the distinction between the two? Certainly not the Materialist. Would it be argued that because a musical note and a ray of light are both due to vibration, therefore the distinction between the two is annihilated? And if that is not argued on behalf of two such dissimilar things as these, why should it be the case with regard to mind and body? Identity of origin may well give rise to difference of result, as Mr. Pearson himself shows. Certainly "consciousness and thought belong to one order of phenomena; the chemico-physical changes of brain tissue to which they are correlated to another." But this furnishes no proof that in grouping these two sets of phenomena under different categories, we are proving independence of origin of one of them, any more than because we group music and light under different categories we are giving each of these an independent origin.

* * *

Turning the Tables.

And the really curious thing is the way in which the Spiritualist calls upon the Materialist to explain in what manner body and mind are connected. But, clearly, the first step is for the Spiritualist to show how they can be separated. The connection between body and mind is not a matter of theory; it is an observed fact. Here are two things always found together; the more we know of their workings, the more certain it is that changes in the one are paralleled by changes in the other. So far as the Materialist is concerned, he takes that connection as a settled fact in the discussion, and is warranted in so doing. But along comes the anti-Materialist. He takes two things never found in separation, and asserts that one is independent of the other. And having done this, he demands that the Materialist accepts that independence as a fact unless he can show the precise method of their connection. But the Materialist is bound to do nothing of the kind. It is not his place to show how mind and body are connected. It is the business of the Spiritualist to show how they can be separated. That is the real problem, and the Materialist should see that his critic does not escape that plain issue.

* * *

There are other aspects of Mr. Pearson's work with which we will deal next week.

Chapman Cohen.

Christianity and the Four Gospels.

I.

So far as the subject of the present article is concerned, it is wholly immaterial when or by whom the Four Gospels were written. They may have undergone many changes, numerous interpolations may have been introduced from time to time, before they assumed the form in which they are now found in the New Testament Canon. Whether they are to be regarded as products of the first or of the second century their relation to the Christian religion remains exactly the same. Taking them precisely as they stand the question to be considered is, Can their hero be legitimately claimed as the Founder of Christianity? Was it the intention or ambition of the Gospel Jesus to add another religion to the large number already in existence? That is to say, did the writers or final editors of the Gospels themselves foresee that ultimately their hero would occupy the proud position of the originator of a new cult? The answer to this question does not lie on the surface, for it is not at all clear to what extent those writers and editors were aware of, and understood, the various religious movements in the midst of which they wrote. No doubt there was an obscure sect in existence known contemptuously as Christians, who were supposed to worship Christ, believing him to be in some sense more than man and the Saviour of the world. We have no historical account of the rise of this sect. In both Jewish and Gentile worlds it was, at first, despised as a depraved form of superstition. The tradition was that Jesus had been supernaturally born, had lived a life crowded with all sorts of miracles, had died a violent death, had been supernaturally raised from the dead, faith in whom closed hell's gate, and opened heaven's for all who possessed it. According to Tacitus (Annal xv. 44), Christians were "a race of men detested for their evil practices," and on "account of their sullen hatred of the whole human race." But of Christianity, as we know it, there was, as yet, no trace in either the first or the second century. Now, looking carefully at the Four Gospels, we learn that they indirectly testify to the non-existence of what we understand by Christianity. There is considerable internal evidence to show that the Virgin Birth legend formed no part of the Gospels of Matthew and Luke in their original form. Mark calls Jesus the Son of God, and John refers to him as the Saviour of the World; but no attempt is made to explain in what sense he is either.

The Gospel Jesus never alludes to himself as the founder of a new religion. It is in the light of a reformer of Judaism that he is usually presented. He deliberately repudiates the role of an iconoclast:—

> Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets; I came not to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away from the law, till all things be accomplished (Matt. v. 17, 18).

Digitized by Google

His one purpose in life was to bring the hope of Israel to a happy fruition. The kingdom of God, as he viewed it, was for Israel exclusively. On one occasion a Canaanitish woman appealed to him on behalf of her daughter, who had a devil, but he sought to put her off on the following score: "I was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." She was a shrewd woman, for "she came and worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me."

> And he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to the dogs. But, she said, Yea, Lord; for even the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table (Matt. xvii. 21-28).

In Mark's Gospel he displays many purely human traits, in spite of the fact that he is often represented as walking on the sea, feeding thousands off nothing, raising the dead, and giving other signs of being endowed with superhuman powers. In Matthew and Luke the process of deification is much more marked, and the stories of the Virgin Birth and the Resurrection are quite new. In the Fourth Gospel the apotheosis of Jesus is complete. He is introduced as the Word of God, as being from all eternity on an equality with God, and as becoming, in the fulness of time, flesh, and dwelling among men full of grace and truth. But even here, again, Christianity is conspicuous only by its absence, though it is manifest that a movement is in progress the end of which is not yet. In John, salvation by belief in the Son of God is diligently proclaimed, and so thorough is the salvation that it is represented under the symbol of a second birth. We also observe in this Gospel a tendency to subordinate the life of Jesus to a theory of his person. He is constantly represented as having for his supreme object the manifestation of his glory. His miracles are regularly spoken of as "signs"; and this is a point on which John flatly contradicts the Synoptists, who declare on more than one occasion that Jesus flatly refused, on principle, to work "signs." But the Christianity of the Creeds is not here at all except potentially. What we can trace in the Four Gospels is the progressive activity of a movement, the consummation of which, no one could have predicted, not even those who played the part of leaders in it.

Is it not beyond all reasonable controversy absurd, therefore, on the part of Christian apologists, to claim the Gospel Jesus as the Founder of Christianity? There is an abundance of theology in the Gospels, but not the theology of the orthodox Church. Theology streamed incessantly out of the mouth of Jesus; but it was a theology in which there was neither the Fall nor Original Sin, neither a Deity at enmity with mankind because of something it had done at the commencement of its history, nor an Atonement in which to quench for ever the fires of Divine wrath. The sin of sins is declared to be unbelief in the Gospel Jesus. Most emphatic is the statement:—

> He that believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God (John iii. 18).

We may be told that this is Christianity in the making; but nobody could have foreseen what its appearance would be when the process of making it stood completed. This inability is accounted for by the simple fact that all the ingredients requisite to complete the making of it were not present in the process at the stage represented in the Four Gospels. As Alfred Loisy well says:—

> Less than thirty years after the death of Christ a religion had issued from the Gospel; and this religion was not a split (dedoublement) from Judaism, it was not a heresy or schism which would have broken Judaism up; it was an independent religion, and one which was even to detach itself entirely from Judaism before the first generation of believers had disappeared. This birth of a new cult, which came into being in the full daylight of history, continues to be for us a problem in many respects unsolved. It was not due to the will nor to the direct action of Christ. No more does it result from this—that Jesus, without having the express intention of so doing, virtually brought into the world a religion essentially new, the revelation of the good God, who pardons sin, and is honoured by trust in his mercy alone (The Hibbert Journal, October, 1911).

For that and much cognate teaching M. Loisy was deposed from an honoured position in the priesthood of the Catholic Church; but he finds himself in line with the leading scholars in Christendom to-day. The curious thing is, however, that several of these first-class scholars still call themselves Christians, although they have completely renounced historical Christianity, while M. Loisy himself continues to adhere to historical Christianity in a loose, vague, modernist sense, though repudiating its indebtedness to the Gospel Jesus. We, on the other hand, take our stand upon the utter unhistoricity of the Gospel narratives, maintaining that Christ is only one in a host of God-men and Saviour-Gods, but happens to be the one that has survived. Popularly speaking, this survival was a pure accident, though in the scientific sense it was the effect of exceedingly well-defined causes, the operation of which we shall find extremely instructive and interesting to trace. Meantime, let it be distinctly understood that the roots of the Christian tree are most numerous, and reach deep down into the soil of the past, much further back than the Four Gospels, as we hope abundantly to prove in future articles.

J. T. Lloyd.

The Bobby Burns of Science.

> Verse is the form most apt to preserve whatever the writer confides to it, and we can, I believe, confide to it, besides all sentiments, almost all ideas.
>
> —Sully Prudhomme.

Sully Prudhomme's name does not often meet the eye in these strenuous and exacting times, but a North Country newspaper report states that a lady has been granted a Fellowship at Durham University, and that her thesis was on the great French poet.

Prudhomme's significance lies in the fact that he caught a glimpse of the new poetry which science has revealed, and which is grander than that which it is destroying. People commonly assert that this is a scientific age, and that good poetry is impossible in such an atmosphere. The poets themselves help this delusion by seeking their subjects from the past. Instead of drawing inspiration from the world around them they find subjects in the Greek drama, the fables of King Arthur, or the legends of the Vikings, and other outworn subjects. Yet Sully Prudhomme was awarded the Nobel prize for the greatest work in pure literature. To those who admire the sham antique school of poetry it must be a shock that the prize for the ideal in literature was awarded to a man who, more than any other modern poet, has embodied in his verse the new material gathered by science, and has best expressed the sceptical spirit which characterizes the age.

Sully Prudhomme's imagination and his modes of thought are scientific. He foreshadows the "Bobby Burns to sing the song of steam" whom Kipling calls for. He is not a poet of the people like Beranger, or a writer of music-hall songs. But he differs from the majority of literary men in that he has caught a glimpse of the new poetry which science reveals. He does not hold to the theory that the vocabulary of three centuries ago is better fitted to express modern thought and feeling than the living language of to-day. A poet who sings of balloons and barometers, of submarine cables and photography, of evolution and specific gravity determinations, is a novelty to the critics. According to the vulgar standard the sword is more poetical than the revolver. Cavalry may be mentioned, but to introduce torpedo boats into poetry is to attempt too much. That Sully Prudhomme should utilize astronomy is taken for granted, but that he should sing of chemistry and biology is unpardonable. In English the difference between the literary and popular vocabularies is greater than in French, and there is all the more need of poets bold enough to bridge the gulf which separates literature from life. The success of Sully Prudhomme should stimulate our poets to develop the deeper meaning and hidden beauty of life.

Digitized by Google

This is not by any means an entirely new note in literature. Twenty centuries ago Lucretius made his readers thrill with his magnificent presentation of the atomic theory and other scientific ideas. His very method is but part of the modern method; it is the modern method in its infancy. We may gain some notion of the general effect of his masterpiece, On the Nature of Things, if we conceive Tennyson to have devoted his magnificent genius to versifying Spencer's Synthetic Philosophy, or Swinburne to have subordinated his splendid gifts to the poetic presentation of Darwin's Origin of Species. But Lucretius' presentation of the hidden truths of nature hardly found any further poetic expression until the advent of the nineteenth century.

Among the qualities which sciences imposes in poetry are clarity and sincerity, and both these are prominent in the poems of Sully Prudhomme. Indeed, Brunetiere, a reactionary, complained that he was "too conscientious," and was too much afraid of the Sorbonne and the Ecole Polytechnique, and did not care enough for the ordinary reader. Brunetiere missed the freedom of phrases when poets sought rather to be musical than truthful, and did not care what they said so long as they said it beautifully. Granting that over-nicety is a blemish, is it not possible that poetry can acquire the exactness demanded by science without losing its charm? Sully Prudhomme has proved that it can. Tennyson, too, in our own tongue, has shown the same thing. Passages from In Memoriam and The Two Voices, as well as from Le Bonheur and La Justice, express scientific theories or metaphysical arguments as accurately as any technical treatise, and prove that it is not necessary to be false in order to be poetical.

It was once thought that the advance of science would make poetry impossible. We now know that this is not the case. There is as much poetry to be seen through the microscope and the telescope as with the naked eye. Sully Prudhomme has a truer insight into the significance of the effect of science on poetry than Keats, consummate artist that he was. Like Walt Whitman, Prudhomme does not find it necessary to use the old figures in the literary property-room. What beauty and force the metaphors of science may give to literature has been shown abundantly by Ruskin and Tennyson in English prose and poetry. Maeterlinck's Life of the Bee, and many another work, are examples of what may be achieved by those who can handle the new symbolism. It requires a master-hand to use the crude material excavated by science, because it is lacking in poetical association in the public mind. There is always the danger of embodying unassimilable matter. The average poet masks his incapacity by using words and thoughts which he knows are poetical because poets have used them for centuries.

Prudhomme has extended the domain of poetry. Maybe he occasionally passes over the boundary of poetry into prose in his use of unconventional expression. The boundary line depends largely on the reader. Oliver Wendell Holmes succeeded in The Chambered Nautilus, and failed in The Living Temple, although it would be hard to say why the anatomy of a mollusc should be more susceptible of poetic employ than that of man.

What seems foreign in the poetry of Sully Prudhomme is his frequent note of sadness, "the sense of tears in mortal things," sinking at times, as in the Vœu, into a mild meliorism. Not but what he is cheerful compared with so many French writers, who, though often joyful in life, are not often cheerful in literature. Sully Prudhomme's sadness never takes the personal and theatrical form of Byron or Baudelaire, but is clear and cold. In the last resort, like Voltaire, he bids us "cultivate our garden."

Death is to him, as to Whitman, the liberator as well as the supreme consoler, and on this subject he has written with the force and originality of a master-musician. Here is an example which preserves something of the charm of the great original. It is entitled The Hour of Death:—

Kindly watcher by my bed, lift no voice in prayer,
Waste not any words on me when the hour is nigh;
Let a stream of melody but flow from some sweet player,
And meekly will I lay my head and fold my hands to die.
Sick am I of idle words, past all reconciling—
Words that weary and perplex, and pander and conceal;
Wake the sounds that cannot lie, for all their sweet beguiling,
The language one need fathom not, but only hear and feel;
Let them roll once more to me, and ripple in my hearing,
Like waves upon some lonely beach, where no craft anchoreth,
That I may steep myself therein, and craving nought, nor fearing,
Drift on through slumber to a dream, and through a dream to death.

Mimnermus.

The French Revolution.

VIII.

On the Rocks.

(Continued from p. 190.)

In November, 1793, the Revolution had reached its most critical point. Under pressure of military necessity, and that alone, democracy had made conquests unprecedented in the history of the world. France had adopted manhood suffrage; taxes had been imposed, and prices regulated, in the interests of the common people as against the rich; and the nation had ratified a Constitution which was intended to place the Government of France for all time on a basis of the fullest democracy. The bulk of the middle classes who had no liking for these principles, and at first had no intention of applying them, had been forced to acquiesce in them in order that the country might be, so far as possible, united against its external enemies. The war had now turned in favour of France; her soil was free, or all but free, from invaders; and the democrats could not expect, now that this pressure was relaxed, to exact any fresh concessions from the reluctant middle classes. It was time for them to think of consolidating their gains, relaxing the "Terror," negotiating for peace abroad, and putting into force their hardly-won Constitution.

This was at once perceived by Danton. It will be recalled that, after helping to confer the extraordinary powers, which the crisis demanded, on the new Government, Danton had retired in failing health to his native town of Arcis-sur-Aube. He returned to Paris in November to find the organization he had helped to create being fatally misused; the guillotine in daily use, not only against proved conspirators and traitors, as he had intended, but against men and women whose only offence had been active political opposition to, or even written or spoken criticism of, the democratic policy; the mania of mere vengeance rampant; and the rash enthusiasm of the "dechristianisers" threatening the country with a new religious feud. Danton was himself a Freethinker, but he recognized the hold which Catholicism had in the country districts, and did not wish to engage in a political crusade against it. He wanted France to be a democracy; but, if possible, a united democracy, and no ulterior programme, social or religious, seemed to him worth a civil war.

Digitized by Google

Three forces were pitted against him in his desire to lead France back to peace and constitutional government. The common people were too unnerved and too excited to listen calmly, as yet, to prudent counsels. The successive betrayals of their interests by the constitutional Royalists and the Girondists had made them suspicious of treason in every quarter; and the insurrections in La Vendee, in Normandy, at Lyons, and at Toulon, had given them the sensations of a small garrison beleaguered by enemies on every side. Danton himself had waned in popularity. The Girondists, before their fall, and irresponsible extremists since then, had imputed all manner of personal and corrupt motives to him; he passed over such accusations with silent contempt; and the mud stuck as mud will. He had been a lawyer in good practice before the Revolution, and was well-off, and it did not seem to the uneducated populace that a rich man could really be their friend. They contrasted him unfavourably with Marat, who had died worth only a few sous, and with Robespierre, whose studied simplicity and frugality impressed them to an extraordinary degree.

Yet Danton might have led the people successfully if he could have secured the goodwill of the Government. The majority of the Committee of Public Safety probably held the same political principles as he did—i.e., their supreme object was to unite the country against the enemies of democracy, and when they were beaten, to put in force the Constitution of 1793. But the two members of the Committee whose special work was the internal administration of France, Billaud-Varenne and Collot-d'Herbois, shared the popular suspicion of Danton, and had committed themselves too deeply to the policy of the "Terror" to be willing to draw back. Collot d'Herbois, in fact, had been guilty of the massacres at Lyons, and was, by now, past arguing with.

The leader of the Government, however, in the eyes of France and the world, was Robespierre. He was, at this moment, the most popular man in France. His political opinions were by no means more democratic than Danton's, and, in some ways, less so. When Danton had been focussing the demand for universal suffrage and the Republic in the Cordeliers' Club, Robespierre, in the Jacobins', had still been for constitutional monarchy and moderation. Not until after August 10, 1792, when the Republic was virtually an accomplished fact, was Robespierre known as a Republican at all. His popularity was due to the fact that he, more than anyone else, voiced the changing opinions of the more advanced section of French middle-class thought. The inspiration of this section came from Rousseau; and Robespierre had swallowed Rousseau absolutely whole. Without original ideas or strong feelings of his own, he was dominated by Jean-Jacques, just as the English Puritans of the seventeenth century were dominated by the Bible. The Jacobins' Club, the "caucus," so to speak, of the Democratic Party, was completely in his hands, voted resolutions and expelled refractory members at his bidding, and hung rapt on the inspired words that fell from his lips.

Robespierre was fully prepared to co-operate with Danton against the "dechristianisers." He loathed and hated Atheism, because it was contrary to Rousseau. That writer, while rejecting Christianity as generally accepted, had laid down that a "civil religion," a sort of Deistic undenominationalism, should be imposed on members of the community as necessary to morality, viz., belief in a deity, in immortality, and in future rewards and punishments. While condemning "intolerance," Rousseau inconsistently demanded the banishment from the State of any one who did not believe in this minimum of religion. Accordingly, Robespierre sought to impose this "civil religion" on France, and probably cared more for this than for any other part of his programme. His personal quarrel with the Girondists had been less with their social obscurantism than with their religious latitudinarianism. He now came forward, and at the Jacobins' Club delivered a violent speech against Atheism. Atheism, he said, was aristocratic; belief in God was democratic; and he denounced the "dechristianisers" as traitors in the pay of the foreign enemy. This was soon followed by a decree of the Convention in favour of the free practice of religion, and by the circular of the Government to their representatives in the departments, to which allusion has already been made.

At the same time Danton's friends began an attack on the "dechristianisers" in the press. The talented journalist, Camille Desmoulins, who had been prominent among Radical writers from the very beginning of the Revolution, started in December, 1793, a series of pamphlets, entitled the Vieux Cordelier, in which he attacked in unmeasured language the leaders of the anti-religious movement, Hebert and Chaumette. The most enthusiastic of them, Anacharsis Clootz, was expelled from the Jacobins' Club, after a vitriolic outburst against him by Robespierre, who reproached him with his German extraction and his large income. Danton's friends, who were now supported by all who, for one reason or another, from public-spirit or self-interest, desired a reaction, grew yet bolder. Desmoulins, in the third of his pamphlets, denounced the "Terror" itself, and demanded a "committee of clemency" to sort out the innocent from among the huge crowd of imprisoned "suspects."

For a moment the Government rocked. The fall of Toulon, about this time, brought home to men generally the fact that the country was again out of danger. The Committee of Public Safety, however, clutched tight at the reins of power. Robespierre ceased to encourage Desmoulins. He had conceived the idea, which was to be his ruin, of using the "Terrorist" machinery, now that the war crisis was passed, to enforce his Rousseauist views on religion and the State; and he was prepared to sacrifice everyone, Dantonist or Hebertist, Atheist or Latitudinarian, who stood in his way. Desmoulins, in his turn, found himself attacked and threatened. His friend and Danton's, Fabre d'Eglantine, who had helped to draw up the Revolutionary Calendar, was arrested on a trumped-up charge of forgery. At the same time Anacharsis Clootz and Thomas Paine were arrested as enemy aliens, although both were devoted to France and the Revolution. Thus, at the outset of the year 1794, the Revolutionary Government had become a grinding tyranny, as fatal to the democrats themselves as to their adversaries.

Why, then, did not Danton strike a blow? Why did he not come forward in the Convention, point out that the country had no further need of the "Terror," that the policy of the Government had degenerated into mere political persecution, and that the majority must pluck up courage and put an end to it? His inaction is most remarkable. His energy seems to have evaporated. Despondent remarks were attributed to him at this time, as "it is better to be guillotined than to guillotine," which suggest that the stress and strain of the preceding years had really broken him down.

Digitized by Google

It was the Hebertists, the "dechristianisers," whose strength lay in the Paris municipality and the Cordeliers' Club, who made the first move towards overthrowing the Government. It must not be supposed that they were turning against the "Terror"; on the contrary, they were as vindictive as the worst of the party in power, and even took to their arms Carrier, the commissioner who had been recalled on account of his atrocities at Nantes. They demanded the quickening of the guillotine, the extermination of the remnants of the Girondists, and the trial of Desmoulins, who had attacked them. On March 4 they appealed to the arbitrament of insurrection; but the common people did not respond. The Government struck; and Hebert and his principal associates were arrested.

Following the evil precedent set in the trial of the Girondists, the prisoners were judged in a batch; and to confuse the issue, a number of bankers and miscellaneous doubtful characters, as well as the unfortunate Clootz, were added to the batch. After a trial on more or less frivolous evidence, nineteen of them were guillotined on March 24.

Few historians have had a good word to say for these particular victims. Most of them had made themselves odious by their identification with the policy of blood; and Hebert, the gutter journalist, was not a character in any way worthy of respect. Yet the same cannot be said of all of them. Clootz, in particular, was a man of noble heart and intellect, a pioneer of the cause of international brotherhood, and a victim solely to the religious spite of Robespierre. Others of the Hebertist victims were zealous propagandists of land nationalization and early forms of Socialism, and were feared on that account by the Government. "Terrorists" as they were, they could not have shown themselves more ferocious, had they tried, than the Government which executed them soon became.

The Committee of Public Safety then struck at its other opponents. Danton, Desmoulins, and their chief adherents were arrested on March 31. The Convention servilely voted its concurrence. The new "batch" included Herault de Sechelles, author of the democratic Constitution, and a number of swindlers and forgers thrown in, as before, to prejudice the case. Danton defended himself eloquently; whereupon the Government obtained forthwith a new law, empowering the Tribunal to silence the defence of any prisoner who "insulted justice." Danton, Desmoulins, Herault de Sechelles, Fabre d'Eglantine, and eleven others were guillotined on April 5, 1794. Eight days later, the widows of Desmoulins and Hebert suffered, together with Chaumette, the popular and advanced official of the Paris municipality, condemned as an Atheist. Verily, the Revolutionary Government was emulating the worst of the kings and inquisitors of the old regime!

The execution of Danton was "worse than a crime, it was a blunder." Intended to preserve the Democratic Party by destroying those who threatened to split it, it took away the one statesman who could have consolidated the Revolution and headed off the now inevitable reaction. Henceforth, it was only a question how soon the "Marsh," the unorganized reactionary majority of the Convention, would have the courage to overthrow the Government and seize the reins of power. The real leader of the democracy had been sacrificed to save a Committee of incompetent second-raters.

(To be continued.) Robert Arch.

Acid Drops.

After all it seems that the clergy will be admitted into the schools as "emergency teachers" under the plea of National Service. It is all of a piece with the English view of education that it should regard a clergyman, without experience or training in teaching, to be fitted to fill the place of a man who has qualified for the work by years of preparation. The permission for the local bodies to employ clergymen as teachers comes direct from the Board of Education, and the permission indicates the view taken of the value of education in high quarters. Anybody or anything will do for a teacher. That is, apparently, the way in which education is regarded by the majority of people in this country. And it clearly presents but a poor outlook for the national regeneration that is so glibly promised us "after the War."

The full significance of the Board of Education's mistaken policy is seen when we bear in mind the fact that these clergymen who are to replace skilled teachers are, themselves, claiming and receiving exemption from military service. Physically they are as "fit" as the teachers whose places they are to take. But the physically fit teacher is to go, the physically fit parson is to remain, and to escape opprobium because of this specious pretext of National Service. National Service, forsooth! As though any National Service could really make good the neglect of education, and placing clergymen in the schools where their influence can be exercised for no real good, and may be productive of real harm.

Present-day religiosity is not so virile as that of preceding generations. Speaking at a meeting of the Southend Education Committee on the subject of juvenile crime, Alderman J. R. Brightwell said "it seemed a question as to whether the churches or the police would have the paramount influence. He did not know whether the love of religion or the dread of the 'bobby' would have the greater effect." Years ago the alternative would have been the fear of hell or the dread of the birch.

Rev. F. H. Gillingham, the well-known cricketing parson, complains that when the Zeppelins fell near London the people rushed about, singing "Tipperary" and "Rule, Britannia," "without a single thought of God." But what can Mr. Gillingham expect? "God" allowed the Zeppelins to come time after time, and did nothing to prevent their coming or returning. It was not God, but the aviators and the gunners, that did the trick. Without them, Zepps would be as busy as ever. When the people rushed into the streets and sang "Rule Britannia," it was evidence only that for once in a while sense had proved stronger than piety.

All but eight of the City of London churches are to be closed, and the Bishop of London says he cannot justify the retention of sixty clergy to minister to about 14,000 people. He did not add that the vast majority of the "14,000 people" were City policemen, caretakers, and charwomen.

A propos of religion at the Front, in his book, Bullets and Billets, Capt. Bruce Bairnsfather writes concerning a priest in a French village where he was billeted:—

> I am sorry to say I plead guilty to having cast a certain amount of ridicule at the Cure. He was so splendidly austere, and wore such funny clothes, that I couldn't help perpetrating several sketches of him. The disloyalty of his parishioners was very marked in the way they laughed at these drawings, which were pinned up the row of cottages.....He didn't like soldiers being billeted in his village, so Suzette told me. I think he got this outlook from his rather painful experiences when the Germans were in the same village.....He preached a sermon whilst we were there. I didn't hear it, but was told about it simultaneously by Suzette, Berthe, and Marthe, who informed me that it was directed against soldiery in general. His text had apparently been "Do not trust them gentle ladies." A gross libel! I retaliated immediately by drawing a picture of him with a girl sitting on each knee, singing, "The soldiers are going, hurrah, hurrah."

Digitized by Google

The egregious Bishop of London, referring to the needs of the East London Church Fund, said he had been trying to explode the superstition that "you put two pennies in a slot, and out comes a vicar, two handsome curates, and a peal of bells." The pious public may put pennies in the religious slot, but, assuredly, the bishops draw many thousands of pounds annually.

Herr Jacob Schaffner, the poet, characterizes non-German nations as being "godless and partially civilized." This is strange language from an "Atheist," as the clergy describe the Teutonic peoples.

The Bishop of Birmingham is pressing the claims of parenthood, and lamenting the declining birth-rate. Why does he not pen his appeals to the bachelor Bishop of London?

Some two thousand Church of England clergy hold commissions as Army chaplains. The pay is attractive, and they do not have to fight.

The Archbishop of Cologne has instructed the German clergy to pray for victory. Still another proof of the terrible "Atheism" of the Germans.

Among the new American religious notions is a "Christian Efficiency Congress," to be held next September. We welcome the admission of the present inefficiency of the Faith.

The St. Mary's Parish Magazine (R.C.) says that our soldiers, "keeping their night watches under starlit skies, feel the presence of a personal God.....Their hearts and their heads tell them with certainty that there is another world, and that there is a kindly Providence." In the next column it prints an account of a fire in a Catholic Home in Canada, in which 180 insane girls were kept, and which resulted in forty-five of the poor creatures being burned to death. Evidently the "kindly Providence" was too busy with the soldiers "keeping their night watches under starlit skies." Pity it could not have paid a little attention to that Catholic Home in Canada.

The "Blue Lion," a public-house without beer, has been opened under Church auspices in Bethnal Green, London. No wonder that lion was blue.

Newspaper editors are making paragraphs concerning the Rev. J. C. Sharp, of Wood Green, who is working six days a week in a factory. Is this so novel a thing for a parson to do?

Parish magazines often contain unconscious humour. One clerical editor writes: "Girls for confirmation at St. Peter's church are asked not to wear dresses." We wonder if there was a crowded congregation?

Providence does not respect vicarages any more than churches. At a fire at St. Stephen's vicarage, Canonbury, a woman of eighty was burned to death.

The Rev. R. J. Campbell says that prior to the War England was given over to Materialism. We know that "materialism," for it was adulterated with the new and old theology.

The Bishop of Lincoln, who has just taken his seat in the House of Lords, brings the number of "spiritual" peers up to the full complement of twenty-six. Of the thirty-eight bishops, only twenty-four are entitled to sit in the House, and the two archbishops always enjoy the privilege. This is one of the privileges of the Government religion, for the Non-conformists, who are almost as numerous as Church-people, have no representative whatever.

The Bishop of London rejoices that "agricultural labourers are at last to have a living wage." Quite touching; but the Bishop might have pointed out to the readers of Reynolds's, to whom the message was addressed, that his own Church has been a powerful factor in preventing the agricultural labourer getting this living wage. No single factor has been so powerful as the Church in keeping him the passive, overworked, underpaid animal he has been. The Church of England has done that work more effectively than any other Church in Europe. And the result is seen in the fact that the English agricultural labourer is without a single revolt to his credit. The parson and the squire have worked too-well together for that to have occurred.

Mr. W. C. Buckley, bachelor, aged eighty-five, has bequeathed over £200,000 for the benefit of the Church of England Diocese in Manchester. If any Christian retorts that we are jealous of the Church receiving this, we beg to plead guilty. When we think of the amount of good we could do with only a two-hundredth part of that sum, we confess we do feel jealous. We regret that the possession of so much money should have been accompanied by so little sense in its disposal.

The Rev. F. H. Gillingham, speaking at St. Michael's, Cornhill, said "the Church was full of decrepit deans, tottering canons, and infirm incumbents. We sing like a mighty army of God, but God help the army that moves like the Church at the present time." This is letting the cat out of the bag.

"The City Temple, living up to its reputation for modernity in religion, was crowded to hear Miss Royden, the first woman preacher to occupy the pulpit." Thus the Daily Chronicle. Christian ideas of "modernity" are curious, for after 2,000 years of the religion of Christ, the position of woman in the Churches is still subordinate to that of man.

The Chairman of the Lord's Day Observance Society has written the Archbishop of Canterbury expressing his deep regret that the Primate should have yielded to "the mere opinions of war as opposed to the definite commandment of God," on the question of Sunday labour. The impertinence of the extreme pietist knows no limit. We may remind such gentry of the verse in Galatians: "If a man think himself to be something when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself."

Cardinal Bourne has written that Catholics may "lawfully" engage in agricultural labour on Sundays, provided they do not neglect their religious duties. Quite so; Cardinal Bourne cannot overlook the interests of the Church even in the midst of the War. We wonder that the Church has not hit upon the plan of selling dispensations to labour on Sunday.

"A West Country Parson" writes to the Daily Mail complaining that at a time when the country is suffering from a shortage of labour, he was called to a meeting about ten miles away, where, with fifteen able-bodied men, a discussion was conducted on "Foreign Missions." He complains that these calls are continuous, and asks: "What are the bishops doing?" Evidently they are practising "Business as usual." But whether we are at War or not the questions discussed by these clerical gatherings are of no earthly benefit to anyone, and if the War brings that home to people it will have done that amount of good.

The superstition of the ordinary Christian is unfathomable. One such was told of a clergyman who had gone to work in his fields on a Sunday, and recommended his parishioners to do the same; and this was her answer: "The wonder is God did not strike him dead for his sinful presumption." She was not in the least impressed by the fact that he still lived on, the only fact that counted for her being that he didn't deserve to live.

Digitized by Google

A most astonishing commodity is the Nonconformist conscience. It must of necessity be up in revolt against the somewhat more elastic faculty of the Anglican Church. Since the Archbishop of Canterbury approved of Sunday labour under existing circumstances, the Free Church Council was morally obliged to express its disapproval. The Rev. F. B. Meyer and his associates could not possibly endorse his Grace of Canterbury's disloyalty to their Divine Lord. There is nothing that blinds people like religious prejudice.

The Bishop of Oxford condemns the present spiritualistic attempts to get into communication with the dead, forgetting that, according to Church teaching, the Christian life consists almost exclusively in imagined communication with a man who died two thousand years ago.

The Holy Ghost is always working amazingly great miracles through the notorious Gipsy Smith. Every revival conducted by him is the most marvellous on record, the number of conversions having exceeded any ever heard of before. The Gipsy has just spent six months at the Front, and most wonderful results have been reaped from his evangelistic labours there. It has become the talk of the Army, officers and men alike, this unexampled success of his mission. And yet, strange to relate, he needs to go back and stay there to the end!

The Rev. R. J. Campbell says, "Our civilization has got into a cul-de-sac." Yet so many of his colleagues try to assure us that civilization and Christianity are inseparable.

A large number of bakers will not make "hot cross buns" this Easter. Schoolboys will treat this holy time with high-sniffing contempt.

According to the clergy, sacred relics have been preserved miraculously in the War zone, and the faithful Christians believe them. Yet the British and Foreign Bible Society announce that 68,000 Bibles have been lost in four vessels sunk by submarines. Perhaps dear old Providence is a humourist.

According to the American papers, under the laws of some States, it is an offence to libel a dead man, and a citizen named Haffan has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment for remarking in public that George Washington was "intemperate, a hard swearer, and a slave-holder." Perhaps someone will prosecute Theodore Roosevelt for his libellous description of Thomas Paine as "a filthy little Atheist," a record of three lies in three words.

Actors take themselves very seriously nowadays. Mr. H. B. Irving says that modern Germany had been brought up in a school of scoundrelism based on Frederick the Great. Is that so? The pious Kaiser and the German clergy seem to derive their inspiration from the "scoundrelism" of the Old Testament.

Dom Lorenzo Perosi, musical director of the Papal choir, has written a grand symphony, inspired by the world-war. The music of the hemispheres, eh?

The valiant Young Men's Christian Association has opened a hut at Goose Green, Dulwich. The place has an appropriate name.

Speaking at Temple Church, the Bishop of London said something must come out of the War. Just so! The clergy will emerge from the War—with whole skins.

Quite a large number of the clergy are out for Prohibition. Yet when they are in their Sunday-schools they profess a liking for "tiny tots."

The late Rev. Lord Blythswood left estate of the value of £105,197. If the Bible be correct in its denunciation of wealth, he should have trouble in entering the pearly gates of heaven.

A Yorkshire curate is doing shepherd work six days in the week say the newspapers. This suggests that some curates used to work only one day a week.

Mr. A. G. Gardiner, the editor of the Daily News, published a leading article with the arresting title, "The Twilight of the Gods." As may be expected, none of the deities of the Christian mythology were so much as mentioned.

"'Business is business' is the key to the character of Judas," says Dr. Lyttelton. Yet priests have made millions out of the Christian religion where poor old Judas made only shillings.

"The country is turning to God, but it is not turning to the Churches," says Dean Inge. This is a cryptic utterance, for in most churches they worship three gods.

The Reflections of Riquet (A Dog).

When, under the table, my master holds out to me the food that he is about to place into his mouth, it is in order to tease me, and he punishes me if I succumb to the temptation. For I cannot believe that he deprives himself for me.

When I am asleep behind my master in his armchair, he keeps me warm. And that is when he seems to be a god. There is also in front of the fire-place a warm hearth. That hearth is divine.

Prayer. O! my master Bergeret, God of carnage, I adore thee. Almighty one, be praised. Be praised, great one. I grovel at thy feet; I lick thy hands. Thou art very great and very beautiful when thou devourest, before the table laden with abundant viands. Thou art very great and very beautiful when, with a slender piece of wood, bursting out in flame, thou changest night into day. Keep me in thy house to the exclusion of all other dogs.....And thou, Angelique, the cook, thou very great and good divinity, I fear thee, and I venerate thee, that thou mayest give to me plenty to eat.

Invocation. Oh, Fear, Fear august and yet tender, Fear saintly and yet healthy, fill me when I am in danger, in order that I may avoid that which might be able to harm me, for fear that, throwing myself on an enemy, I may suffer for my imprudence.

There are carriages that horses pull along the streets. They are terrible. There are also some carriages that go alone, puffing and blowing very strongly. They also are full of enmity. The men in rags and tatters are hateful, and those also who carry baskets on their heads, or who wheel barrows. I do not like the children who, rushing hither and thither, utter great cries in the streets. The world is full of things, hostile and fearful.

ANATOLE FRANCE (Translated by H. W. Edwards).

Man and God.

The Food Dictator asks the clergy to urge the men to work on Sundays to remedy the food scarcity.—Daily Press.

THE Lord spake unto Moses,
"Six days to work," said he,
"And one, the seventh only,
Thou shalt reserve for me."

There was a Food Dictator
In a land that worships God;
He overruled the Maker,
"On the seventh turn the sod."

The moral of my story
You all can plainly see;
Man is his own creator,
And evermore shall be. FRANK BETTS.

Digitized by Google

The "Freethinker" and the Paper Famine.

Following what was said last week, not very many readers will be surprised to learn that I have decided to keep the Freethinker, both as regards number of pages and price, unchanged for the present. After looking at the problem from all sides, and consulting with one or two friends, I think I see my way to doing this without having to face a much heavier loss than was the case last year. This deficit on the working of the paper—entirely due to the increased price of materials—was quickly made good by Freethinker readers, and I am confident they will respond as readily again when asked to do so. Some of my correspondents have urged me to raise the price of the paper to threepence, and so relieve myself of this source of anxiety, but that anxiety does not alarm me, so long as I see a way of pulling through. When I accepted the responsibility of maintaining the Freethinker, I did not expect an easy time. It was taken "for better or for worse," and if—during the War Period—it turns out worse than I took it for, one must just make the best of the situation. There is also the consolation that by this time I may reasonably hope the bulk of readers have enough confidence in my judgment to feel that the best is being done in the circumstances.

What I have kept before my mind all the time is the fact that the primary reason—if not the whole reason—for the existence of the Freethinker is that it is a propagandist organ. It exists to serve a great cause, and nothing must be done that will prejudice its utility in that direction. It is fairly certain that were the price of the Freethinker increased to threepence, it would lose few of its present readers. But there would be an added difficulty in getting new ones. And it is new readers I am after. They represent a clear gain, from both a party and commercial point of view.

The Freethinker will, therefore, continue unchanged in size and price—unless, of course, some wholly unexpected development takes place. The only difference will be that for about four weeks it will be printed on a thinner paper. At a time when it is a case of getting paper where and how one can, and at almost any price, this is unavoidable. But the change will be for a few weeks only.

Meanwhile, may I suggest to those who expected to pay more for their paper, that these unspent coppers could be usefully expended in taking an extra copy of the Freethinker and passing it on to a likely subscriber? This will be a real help and, perhaps, a permanent one.

All I have to add is that the position of the Freethinker continues to be quite satisfactory. The circulation is better to-day than when I assumed formal editorship, and the little advertising I have been able to afford has borne excellent results. But in the matter of circulation my appetite is insatiable. The Freethinker cannot be read by too many people. So we must hang on and fight on. And when the War does cease, we shall all reap the advantage of our tenacity.

Chapman Cohen.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

April 1, Portsmouth: April 8, Swansea.

To Correspondents.

Sapper J. Gorrock.—Very pleased to learn that so many of your comrades were sympathetic towards the Freethinker on seeing it for the first time. Your remark: "This War seems to have driven home to a large number the failure of Christianity," is the one truth which is being constantly endorsed by our correspondents in all parts of the War area.

C. Sibleigh writes: "I admire you for carrying on in these hard times, and sincerely hope you will continue to do so until peace brings back some thousands more Freethinkers than ever crossed the Channel before." We have no doubt whatever that when the "boys come home," many of them will read the Freethinker who have never read it regularly before.

T. C.—We quite agree with you that a good deal of the more extravagant and emotional outbursts of religion in young persons is little more than a perverted sexualism. We have a volume in the press dealing with the subject, which we hope soon to see published.

S. Lee.—We do not doubt that the bulk of our readers would cheerfully pay extra for their Freethinker during the continuance of the War. If we must do so, we shall; but it will be very unwillingly. Thanks for your own offer of help.

G. Daas (Lahore).—Will do our best to hunt up the articles named, but have been unsuccessful up to the present. Pleased to hear of the prospect of increased freethinking activity.

Warwickshire Miner.—We think the weekly quotations at the head of the Freethinker were greatly appreciated. We dropped them because to print them in addition to the weekly "Contents" gave the page a very "broken" appearance. Perhaps we may discover a method of reviving them.

Will the two gentlemen from Pendleton (initials "H. B." and "J. E. C.") who gave the chairman at Mr. Cohen's meetings on Sunday last their names at Manchester, please send same on to the Editor, as the slip containing particulars has been inadvertently destroyed?

H. Elliot.—Letter sent as requested.

J. De Lisle (N.Z.).—"Professor" Macintyre's address is, as you say, amusing—so far as absurdity can be described as such. And it is fortunate that absurd statements usually do have an amusing aspect. It helps to make us more tolerant of those who make them.

"Another Scotty."—Crowded out of this issue. Shall appear next week.

W. H. Harrap.—We have the fullest sympathy with the attempts to re-organize our land system. It is about the worst in Europe. But our hands are really too full of other matters to take it up as part of our work.

Freethinker Sustentation Fund.—Manchester Man, 3s.; F. C. Harding, 5s.

J. A. Leiper.—Will try, next week.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Will all those who have written concerning the Freethinker and the paper famine please take this note as an acknowledgment of their communications. The letters have been too numerous for us to thank each writer separately. All who have written are unanimous in the promise of their full support, whether we raise the price of the paper, or continue as it is, making good the deficit in some other manner. The assurance of their confidence is deeply appreciated, and it sends us forward with renewed courage.

Mr. Cohen's meetings at Manchester on Sunday last were splendidly successful, and augur well for the revival of work in that city. Both afternoon and evening the hall was filled, and the audience appeared to highly appreciate the lectures. There was also a good sale of literature, and at the conclusion of both meetings the names and addresses taken of intending members for the new Branch.

Digitized by Google

At the business meeting on the Saturday evening, at which Mr. Cohen presided, it was resolved that the Executive be asked to dissolve the old Manchester Branch of the N. S. S., and to sanction the formation of a new one. This was done with the full acquiescence of the old members; so there will be no real break, and their co-operation is assured. But this was felt to be the best method of insuring smoothness and efficiency in working. A provisional committee was appointed, and steps are to be taken to secure a permanent meeting-place. Whether arrangements can be made to secure the tenancy of the old hall, or whether it will be found advisable to secure a new headquarters, will be settled as soon as possible. Meanwhile, all who are willing to help in any way should communicate at once with Mr. S. Pulman, 68 Tib Street, Manchester.

To-day (April 1) Mr. Cohen delivers two lectures in the Trades' Hall, Fratton Road, Portsmouth. The afternoon meeting is at 3 and the evening at 7. We hope the local "saints" will make a special note of the time and place of the meetings. On Sunday next (April 8) Mr. Cohen lectures in the Elysium Hall, High Street, Swansea, at 2.30.

Last week we wrote a brief note regarding what can only be called the infamous treatment of a witness in the Clydebank Police Court. A Mr. Charles Stewart, whose address the court officials decline to give, and which we have been unable to obtain, was a witness in a case of theft. When he presented himself before the court he was invited to take the oath, but declined and desired to affirm. The following then transpired:—

> Mr. Hepburn: What is your reason for that?
> Witness: Because I don't believe its right.
> Mr. Hepburn: What Church do you belong to?
> Witness: I am not a member of any Church.
> Mr. Hepburn: Why not take the oath?
> Witness: I'll affirm, but I will not take the oath.

Mr. Stewart was then ordered to stand down, and at the close of the court, Superintendent and Deputy Chief Inspector Mackay had the accused brought to the bar of the court and informed the magistrate that he would have the case reported to the Burgh Fiscal. We have received information from a correspondent who tried to obtain the witness's address from the court, and who interviewed a reporter in the court, who affirms the accuracy of the above, and adds that the court officials did all they could to browbeat the man into taking the oath. The whole incident is disgraceful. We intend bringing the matter before the N. S. S. Executive, and it will be seen whether the authorities cannot be moved to take some action in the matter. It is monstrous that mere police court officials should be permitted to so openly set the law at defiance. Meanwhile we should be obliged if some of our Scotch readers could furnish us with Mr. Stewart's address?

The Pioneer Press has secured a limited supply of fine works all of which will prove more or less interesting to our readers. These will be found described in the advertising pages of this issue. The Hon. A. J. G. Canning's three works are sufficiently descriptive in their titles. The biography of William Hone, published in 1912, is a most interesting volume, and deals with one of the group of early nineteenth century reformers which played such a prominent part in the struggle for a free press and for free speech. His trials before Lord Ellenborough and Mr. Justice Abbott for publishing parodies of the Athanasian Creed and the Church Catechism are famous, and the account in Mr. Hackwood's work is well done. The English Woman, by David Staars, is an interesting and suggestive study of the woman question, published in 1909, on evolutionary and historical lines. That we commend to our readers with every confidence.

With the exception of a small number of copies—a little over 100—the edition of Mr. Cohen's Determinism or Free Will? is exhausted. The remaining copies have the covers soiled, so it has been decided to strip off the soiled paper wrappers and bind them in cloth. These will be sold at 1s. 9d. per copy, and we have no doubt that many will prefer the work in cloth to any other form. As the number in hand is very limited, those who require a copy should apply at once. It will not be advisable to reprint the book until the supply of paper becomes greater than is the case at present.

The Monarch of Cereals.

The problem of the human food supply is always with us. The increased population, more and more concentrated in urban areas, in every part of the civilized world, provides a constantly decreasing proportion of agricultural workers. For various reasons, the leading nations, strenuously devoted to industry and commerce, ran grave risks of forgetting the eternal verity that all forms of wealth are ultimately derived from the soil. Not merely do we depend upon Mother Earth for our animal and vegetable products and by-products, but we are equally her debtor for all the coal, iron, clay, oil, and other raw materials utilized in the maintenance of modern civilization. Even before the World-War overwhelmed us there was a decided rise in the price of food, and this upward movement has been steadily progressing throughout the period of bloodshed and sacrifice of the accumulated savings of centuries, which has now set its seal on human kind.

We must procure bread, and whether it contains rye, maize, rice, potatoes, or any other plant product, it is essential to our very being. Important as the many cereal and leguminous foods are, and some 800,000,000 of the earth's inhabitants rely upon rice as their main sustenance, the wheat grain must, nevertheless, be regarded as the leading cereal of human consumption. Surveying the globe as a whole, wheat forms the chief food of man. Both from the standpoint of monetary value and quantity grown, wheat is the king of cereals. Yet, even in the immense corn lands of America, maize, or as it is termed "corn," is the grain crop most extensively cultivated in the United States. In 1899, the estimated value of maize raised in the States was 828,000,000 dollars, while the wheat produced was valued at 370,000,000 dollars only. And in 1906 the respective figures for corn and wheat were 1,100 and 450 for American farms, while the entire earth's annual harvesting and consumption of wheat was in 1908 nearly 3·5 billion bushels.

But while in special areas rice and maize are grown in enormous quantities, the wheat plant is of world-wide cultivation. The amount of wheat milled for human needs is greater than that of all the other cereals put together. In his authoritative volume, The Book of Wheat, Professor Dondlinger states that—

> 62 per cent. of all cereal products milled in the United States during 1900 were from wheat. It is essentially a bread cereal. Bananas, rice, potatoes, and other soil products will sustain a greater population on a given unit of land than wheat will, but they are not so well adapted to a high standard of living. Herein lies the present and increasing importance of wheat, for it seems to be the tendency of the civilized world to raise its standard of living. As the standard of living rises, wheat becomes a relatively more important part of human food. Rye and oats furnished the bread of the great body of the people of Europe during the Middle Ages. Wheat was high-priced and not extensively grown. England early became a wheat-eating nation, France and the other Latin countries followed later. Rye is still extensively used in Germany, but is gradually being superseded by wheat. Even Russia is using more wheat flour than she did twenty years ago.

Wheat is the world's premier food-plant, and for several reasons. Its nutritive qualities, particularly when eaten in the form of whole-meal biscuits or bread, are very great. The plant varies considerably—over one thousand varieties are known to botanists—and it readily adapts itself to dissimilar climates and soils. It is easily grown, and lends itself to the most economic methods of preparation for use, while the farmer eyes it approvingly in the light of its rapid and bountiful return for the cost and labour bestowed on its cultivation. And in addition to the wheat-kernel baked into bread, the plant supplies several subsidiary products, which greatly amplify its economic and industrial importance.

Digitized by Google

The rich golden grain of the ripened wheat as we behold it in the harvest-time does not, and never did, exist in uncultivated Nature. This is the outcome of artificial selection, and it has been developed from a wild waving grass. Its genesis, as a cultivated plant, is shrouded in prehistoric darkness, and its geographical origin is still a matter of conjecture. Before the dawn of history, wheat was cultivated by the late Stone Age people, whose dwellings have been discovered in the Swiss lakes. These ancient lake-dwellers, even in their day, were acquainted with at least four varieties of wheat.

Thousands of years before our era the wheaten staff of life was known in China, and it was also a carefully tended crop in Palestine and Egypt in ancient times. Wheat is referred to in the records of all extinct Old World civilizations, and its cultivation antedates all known tongues. It is evidently derived from the early attempts of primitive man to rear and garner the grasses of the field. Many regard Mesopotamia as its birthplace, and there exists some evidence to show that wheat once flourished in a wild state along the valleys of the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, and it may have spread from that region in all directions. Homer declares that wheat grew wild in Sicily, and Siculus shared his belief. Manetho, the Egyptian annalist, attributed its creation to the goddess Isis. Even in his period the cultivation of corn seems to have extended back in the Nile country for many thousands of years. Its introduction into America dates from the discovery of that continent. Maize was previously the chief corn crop in the New World, and although it has been asserted that a wheat plant was native to Chili, this claim has been examined and rejected by no less an authority than Humboldt.

Scientifically, wheat ranks as a member of the grass group, and is in reality a vastly improved form of grass. Wild barley and wild rye are its near relatives. Other plants closely akin to it are various worthless weeds, while that abominable pest to the husbandman, quack-grass, is not a distant if disreputable relation. But, to its credit, several valuable forage plants are its cousins, rye grass among them. The wild cattle-feeding grasses, which grow so luxuriantly in Southern Europe, are probably the plants from which wheat has been developed. Various species of the genus Ægilops—the grasses in question—cross freely with the cultivated wheats. Recent attempts have been made to evolve wheat from these rude grasses, and it is highly probable that, given sufficient time, a very useful wheat could be evolved with heads bearing many grains, instead of the single miserable grain now borne on each stalk by these wild wheats of the South.

The arable areas devoted to wheat in all quarters of the world have been gradually increasing for many years. During the latter half of the nineteenth century it is estimated that the great centre of wheat production in the United States spread 680 miles in a westerly direction and nearly 100 towards the north. The growth of this grain has been steadily extending from the temperate regions, both towards the Tropics and the Poles. Agricultural authorities, like military experts, have been much mistaken. That wheat could be profitably raised in Siberia or Canada in latitudes north of the 55th parallel was dismissed as chimerical. But this contention had to be abandoned as the cultivation of wheat travelled further and further towards the Arctic circle. In 1900 and 1901, spring wheat, buckwheat, and other cereals were ripened at Sitka, Alaska, which lies 56 degrees north latitude. Various cereals, including wheat, have been most successfully harvested several degrees further north in Canada, while experiments prove that corn culture is practicable quite near the Poles in normal seasons. For example:—

> Spring wheat and winter rye have matured perfectly 65 degrees 50 minutes north latitude at Rampart, about 200 miles from the Arctic circle, and at Dawson, equally as far north, over 1,000 miles north of the United States.

Of course, the crop is more precarious in these high latitudes, and barley, oats, and rye will ripen in colder regions than wheat. Wheat will flourish in lands situated from 20 to 25 degrees south or north of the equator. It thrives in Cuba, South Africa, and Southern Brazil within these limits. It is also interesting to observe the heights at which the grain will mature. At the equator it flourishes in the mountain plains of Ecuador and Colombia at an elevation of 10,000 feet above sea-level. The United States census of 1880 shows that—> over 80 per cent. of the grain was grown at an elevation between 500 and 1,500 feet above sea-level. In 1890, the altitudes at which wheat was raised varied from 100 feet below sea-level to over 10,000 feet above sea-level, and about 70 per cent. was raised between 500 and and 1,500 feet elevation.

In England, wheat does not succeed in elevated areas, but in Southern Italy the plains and hill slopes favour its growth, and it will mature at a height approaching 2,500 feet. In a damp atmosphere, such as ours, the late spring frosts of the upland areas tell against the profitable growth of the grain. Wheat, however, has been husbanded in the Himalayas at an altitude of 11,000 feet, and it is quite likely that a hardy wheat will be evolved by Burbank, or another scientific plant breeder, which will prove immune to the most inclement conditions which are experienced outside the regions of perpetual snow.

There are innumerable varieties of wheat, and this need awaken no surprise. Man has carried the plant to every part of the habitable globe, and the various climates, soils, and other surroundings have caused the cereal to transform itself in the most remarkable manner. Like the cotton plant, wheat displays extensive capacity for variation, and this instability of type renders any exact classification of its most diverse forms a matter of difficulty. Not only do special regions prove themselves peculiarly adapted to the cultivation of given varieties, but there is the added fact that the plant easily accommodates itself to new conditions in the most striking manner. Then there are the wheats which yield most abundantly when sown in autumn, and those that thrive best when planted in the early spring. Carlton, the famous expert of America, tells us that—> about two-thirds of the wheat raised in the United States is winter wheat. Nearly 90 per cent. of the wheat grown in Russia is spring wheat. In Canada, Manitoba raises spring wheat exclusively, but Ontario and Alberta raise some of the winter variety. In Germany, over 90 per cent. of the wheat grown is of the winter variety, which is largely grown over Southern Europe and the British Isles.

A good illustration of the economic importance of certain varieties of wheat is furnished by the estimate of Professor Hays that the introduction of one variety into Minnesota, known as "Minnesota 169," "has increased the yield of that State from 5 to 10 per cent." Scientific agriculturists, in 1900, after careful experimentation with 1,000 varieties of wheat gathered from the various wheat countries of the world, arrived at the conclusion that, when tested by American standards, there exist 245 pronounced varieties of the cereal. No single kind can claim pre-eminence in all respects, and the value and importance of each must be determined by soil and climate, and the end for which any particular variety is designed.

Digitized by Google

(To be continued.) T. F. Palmer.

Science and Spiritualism.

IV.

(Continued from p. 182).

> There are, indeed, always to be found some who are fond of dwelling on instances of the marvellous, as if opening a door to the supernatural; and others, who perhaps confusedly and inadvertently use language to the effect that we are surrounded by wonders and miracles, inscrutable to our faculties. But, as before observed, there are no real mysteries in nature: what is to-day a miracle, may become a well-known phenomenon, subject to law, to-morrow; and assuredly will eventually be so, if inductive inquiry be steadily carried out. The supernatural continually recedes and disappears from our view, and the dominion of nature, order, intelligence, daily advances.—Professor Baden Powell, "The Order of Nature" (1859), p. 473.
>
> History teems with delusions, and neither talent nor integrity, piety nor singlemindedness, religion nor law, nor all of them combined, have proved a safeguard against them.—Brewer, "Dictionary of Miracles" (1884), p. xiv.
>
> A mystery and a trick are generally two sides of the same object, according as it is turned to the view of the beholder. —Robert Hall, "Miscellaneous Works," p. 383.

Even expert conjurers have themselves been deluded by spiritualistic physical phenomena. The great Robert Houdin himself testified to the clairvoyant powers of the Frenchman, Alexis Didier, after a visit he paid him in 1847. "Bellachini, Court conjurer at Berlin, in December, 1877, executed a solemn declaration before a notary to the effect that not only had he failed to discover any mechanical means by which the phenomena occurring in Slade's presence could have been produced, but that he regarded it as impossible to explain these occurrences by prestidigitation of any kind." Even the redoubtable Mr. Maskelyne, thirty years ago, put it on record that the movements of a table at a seance he had witnessed were not due to muscular force or trickery, but to some kind of "psychic or nerve force." It is needless to say that Mr. Maskelyne does not hold that opinion now. Harry Kellar, another famous conjurer, after his first seance with Eglinton, was of opinion that the slate-writing "was in no way the result of trickery or sleight-of-hand." Dr. George Herschell, a well-known amateur conjurer, after some months of practice and many sittings with Eglinton, failed to rival the latter's performances, and expressed his opinion that "they could not have been due to trickery or conjuring."[1]

This William Eglinton was a worthy successor to Slade. As we have said, the public has a short memory, and in 1886, ten years after the hurried flight of Slade, we find about a hundred persons, many of them men of distinction in various departments, writing to the Spiritualist newspaper, Light, testifying to the marvellous spirit-writing on slates produced in Eglinton's seances. Podmore says, "In the history of the movement no physical manifestation ever won such universal recognition," notwithstanding that he had been detected upon at least two occasions of fraud at materializing seances held in 1876, and of co-operation with Madame Blavatsky in manufacturing a Theosophic miracle.

Professor Carvill Lewis had two sittings with Eglinton in the winter of 1886, says Podmore, and, "by purposely turning his head away and pretending to divert his attention, Professor Lewis was able not only to hear Eglinton's doings as he wrote on the slates, unrolled a piece of paper on which a question was written, etc., but occasionally to see the movements of the tendons of the wrist in the act of writing, and other signs of muscular action on his part necessary for the performance of the trick."[1]

It was this Eglinton who converted the late Mr. Stead to Spiritualism. Mr. Stead was so impressed by Eglinton's performance that he suggested a seance should be arranged for the benefit of Mr. Maskelyne and a mutual friend. Mr. Maskelyne consented to attend; "but," says Mr. Maskelyne, "Eglinton flatly refused to meet me under any conditions whatever."[2] Thereupon, Mr. Maskelyne procured two slates, upon one of which he wrote a question. "The slates," says Mr. Maskelyne, "were then screwed together, with a morsel of slate pencil between them, and then put into this tin case, which I soldered up as roughly as possible, leaving marks from the soldering bolt which it would be impossible to reproduce, and which were photographed. I sent this case to Mr. Stead, desiring him not to let Eglinton know that it came from me, but to tell him that if he could get an answer written inside, it would be of the greatest possible advantage to Spiritualism, and would make a convert of a great antagonist who had promised to proclaim the result to the world. Eglinton was to be allowed to take the slates home with him and keep them as long as he pleased. He promised to do so, but he ultimately refused to have anything to do with the test."[3]

"Subsequently," says Mr. Maskelyne:—

> Mr. Stead arranged with my son to photograph a spirit under conditions which would preclude the possibility of trickery. To this end, Mr. Stead endeavoured to find a medium of unimpeachable character, but was informed by the spiritualists that they only knew of one —a lady who had left for Australia, and therefore was not available. Some months afterwards, I received a letter from Mr. Stead, saying that he had met with a wonderful materializing medium, and desired that we should attend to photograph a spirit at a seance to be held the next day; but as usual, the next post brought the information that the medium had been taken ill, and the seance was postponed. Since then the camera and accessories have been constantly in readiness, but we are still waiting.[4]

The wonderful lady medium was Mrs. Mellon, who, as we have seen, was exposed at Sydney.

In 1853, five years before his death, Robert Owen, the great reformer, was converted to Spiritualism by the tricks of Mrs. Hayden, an American medium on a visit to England, through whom, Owen declared: "I had then for some days various communications with the spirits of my deceased brothers and sisters, all of whom gave me true answers respecting the time and place of their death."[5] Communication with the "spirits" at Mrs. Hayden's seances was obtained by means of raps. The visitor was given a card with the alphabet printed on it, and told to ask a question of the spirits, and to run the pencil slowly down the alphabet until a rap was heard; the letter thus indicated would be written down, and the process repeated until the whole word or sentence had been given. "At about the same date," says Mr. Podmore, "as Owen's manifesto, G. H. Lewes, in the Leader, had explained to his readers how the trick was done, and related that by carefully emphasized hesitation

[1] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. i., p. 143; vol. ii., pp. 204-5.

[1] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., pp. 296-7.
[2] The English Illustrated Magazine, January, 1895, p. 79.
[3] Ibid, p. 80.
[4] The English Illustrated Magazine, January, 1895, pp. 80-81.
[5] Podmore, Life of Robert Owen, vol. ii., p. 606.

Digitized by Google

at the appropriate letters he had held a conversation with one of the Eumenides, receiving much information, not to be found in any classical dictionary, about his interlocutor's domestic relations; and had induced the table to confess, in reply to his mental questions, that Mrs. Hayden was an impostor, and that the ghost of Hamlet's father had seventeen noses."[1]

Mr. Moncure Conway relates how, at a seance held at his house, the famous medium, Williams, was exposed by himself and Professor Clifford, as follows:—

> The method of Williams was that we should surround the table, finger hooked in finger; then in the dark he would make some excuse for changing the finger, and contrive to get those on each side of him to hook the forefinger and little finger of the same hand, leaving one of his hands free to do the tricks. Clifford had heard of that device, and warned me. When we had been seated for some time, Williams said his finger held by Clifford was weary, and proposed to change it; but Clifford in a low voice declined on his side, as I did on mine. Whereupon Williams raised the light and rushed out of the house, leaving his accordion and banjo, which I sent to him next day. Several credulous ladies who had been victimized by Williams were present, and had the detection explained to them. Williams was broken up in London by this exposure, and the last I heard of him was at Rotterdam, where the Customs officers seized his paraphernalia of wigs, masks, rag hands, and phosphorus.[2]

Moncure Conway also relates how, being challenged to test the equally famous medium, Mrs. Guppy, he accepted the challenge, and took Professor Clifford along with him. A dozen sat round the table; raps were heard from the spirits, ordering the lights to be put out and each one of the company to choose something to be thrown on the table. The door was locked, and the key given to Conway to hold. Various things were called for—a rose, a slipper, violets, etc. Says Conway: "Clifford demanded a small plate of artificial teeth, which were in the pocket of his overcoat in the hall. I said it was necessary to call for something not easily concealed under a dress, and demanded a large bandbox. When the lights were turned on everything was on the table except what Clifford and I had demanded. Mrs. Guppy admitted the seance to be a failure, and did not venture on any further experiments."[3]

Dr. Carpenter, after much experience with spirit mediums, declared: "With every disposition to accept facts when I could once satisfy myself that they were facts, I have had to come to the conclusion that whenever I have been permitted to employ such tests as I should employ in any scientific investigation, there was either intentional deception on the part of interested persons, or else self-deception on the part of persons who were very sober-minded and rational upon all ordinary affairs of life."[4]

W. Mann.

(To be continued.)

The Peace Council in Heaven.

[The following appeared originally in Sondagsnisse, a well-known Swedish comic paper enjoying a very wide circulation. As our readers will be interested in knowing the state of Freethinking opinions in foreign countries, it is here reprinted for that purpose. We are indebted to a correspondent for the translation.]

After the Great War had been in progress for two and a half years and no sign of peace was to be discovered. The heavenly dignitaries were summoned to a peace council. In answer to the summons, the Son, the Holy Ghost, Moses, and Saint Peter gathered round the throne. Saint Peter was only admitted on his assurance that the heavenly gates could safely be left unguarded for a few hours. "There is no great demand on the gates nowadays," he said regretfully, "most people have to be sent downstairs." This statement of Saint Peter was confirmed by other members of the council, and the scarcity of new arrivals was greatly deplored by the assembly. A general opinion seemed to prevail that things were getting rather monotonous in the establishment.

After the angel Gabriel had been appointed to keep the minutes of the meeting, Javeh opened the proceedings by delivering the following discourse:

"Gentlemen,—It is time we put a stop to this sanguinary quarrel going on upon earth, otherwise we shall be made responsible to posterity for too much passivity. So far, I have been hoping that my servants on earth would do their duty and make for peace, but I find that, instead of so doing, the rascals have actually engaged themselves in the service of the belligerents. The only alternative, therefore, is for one of us to depart to earth on a peace mission, and the problem we have now to consider is the election of the one who is the most suitable for the task. Now, there can be no question of going myself, since it would evidently be useless. I have never been on earth before; I have no passport; nobody knows me; and I am therefore most likely to be interned at once as an undesirable. As for you, all of you have at one time or another been staying on earth, and know the conditions prevailing there. Who is willing to play the part of peace-maker? Hullo, where has Peter gone to?"

The latter just then returned from the gate, where he had been to dismiss a Swedish butter merchant who naively imagined he had merited eternal bliss.

"Can you undertake to bring about peace on earth, Peter?" asked the chairman.

Peter hesitated a moment. "No, Your Majesty, it's very awkward for me indeed. I have for centuries been the patron saint of the French fishing population, who during the War is making no end of money on its regular occupation, while the shores are every now and again blessed with sundry flotsam and jetsam which can easily be turned into cash. However much I should personally like to see an end to the misery, therefore, I really cannot betray the trust these people put in me. It would show a great lack of solidarity on my part to interfere. I beg to propose Moses."

"Moses has been proposed," said the chairman; "what has he got to say to it?"

The old patriarch twisted himself uneasily on his cloud cushion and replied after some reflection:

"No, Your Majesty; I am afraid it is impossible for me also. The race of people whose representative and protector I am, would consider an interference on my part highly improper. Most of my people are so heavily engaged in war-work that a sudden stoppage of hostilities would spell rack and ruin to them, and shatter many a prospect of domestic happiness. This is the actual state of affairs, and I regret my inability to act in the capacity of peace-maker. I beg to propose the Holy Ghost."

"Well, having previously accepted an apology from Peter," said the chairman, "I suppose I shall have to accept yours as well; but what about you?" he added, turning to the Holy Ghost, "I don't suppose you are governed by commercial considerations?"

The Holy Ghost shook his head and adopted a reserved attitude. "No thanks, the job is somewhat too risky for me. Look at the way I was slandered the last time I visited earth! I was then accused of being connected

[1] Leader, March 12, 1853. Cited in Podmore's Life of Robert Owen, vol. ii., p. 609.
[2] Conway, Autobiography, vol. ii., p. 352.
[3] Ibid, p. 352.
[4] Cited by E. Clodd, Pioneers of Evolution (1887), p. 138.

Digitized by Google

with a scandal with which I had nothing whatever to do. The same, or worse, may happen now, and I won't risk it."

"There is something in that," said the chairman. "Consequently, you are the only one left," he said, turning to the Son. "You will have to go. In fact, you are the most suitable, for, after all, it is your teaching that is being trampled upon. You go down and make them respect your teaching."

"Alas, Pa," said the Son wearily, "what you say is all very well, but you forget one or two very important facts. In the first place, it should be remembered that I was 33 years old when I left earth. I should therefore come under the military scheme, and I might even be punished as a deserter. In the second place, being really a Turkish subject, I should be drafted into the Turkish Army, and instead of devoting myself to the instilling into my adherents of a better understanding of my teaching, I should be compelled to fight them along with the infidels."

It was with a countenance of utter despair that Javeh listened to this last declaration of impotence. "It comes to this, then, that.....hullo, what is that?"

An angel came flying with a telegram which had just been transmitted by wireless.

"London, 22nd, President Wilson has sent the belligerents a note offering them his co-operation in the opening up of preliminary peace negotiations. Great slump on the New York Stock Exchange."

"Great Scott!" exclaimed the chairman, "while we are engaged in unfruitful parleying, an ordinary little mortal sets to act with speed and determination. Well, let us see what this Wilson can do in the matter. The meeting is adjourned."

Everyone retired.

As Peter left the room the angel Gabriel pulled him by the tail of his coat and said: "I say, you with your French fishermen whom you are so afraid of. What about Wilson? He is the patron saint of thousands of American millionaires who simply swim in war securities, and yet he is not afraid of tackling the peace problem."

Peter waited with his answer while he treated himself to a pinch of snuff and blew his nose with a violence that shook the cloud walls.

"Well! But then, you see, he has just been elected for four years, while my patronship is fixed for an indefinite period. Now, there is that Holy Benedict of Amiens who is constantly touting after my job, so you will understand the necessity of my being shrewd and diplomatic if I want to retain the only little earthly honour I have left. Damnation! There is that knocker going again."

The old saint betook himself to the gate and looked out through the gate window. A scared voice was heard outside.

"A coal dealer are you, desiring admission," repeated Peter, imitating the vernacular of the visitor. "Oh, no! It's rather too cold for you up here, my boy; you will find a much warmer place downstairs, second division, five flights to the left, ta-ta." B. B.

Obituary.

We regret to record the death of Renie Santos, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Raphael Santos, of 33, Lime Grove, Shepherd's Bush, W., who died suddenly when only two-and-a-half years old, and was buried at Fulham Cemetery on Tuesday, March 20, when a Secular Service was conducted at the graveside. The parents are staunch Freethinkers, and the grandfather, Mr. N. C. Himmel, took a prominent part in the Freethought movement under the leadership of the late Charles Bradlaugh. We tender the sorrowing family our sincere condolence.—J. T. L.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

South London Branch N. S. S. (Avondale Hall, Landor Road, Clapham, S.W.): 7, Open Debate, "Is it Reasonable to Believe in God?" Introduced by V. Roger, negative.

Mr. Howell Smith's Discussion Class (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Thursday, April 5, at 7.30.

Hyde Park: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Kells and Hyatt; 6.30, Messrs. Dales and Yates.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

Abertillery (New Era Union): Mrs. H. Bradlaugh Bonner, 3, "The Child and Christianity"; 6, "The Soul: An Inquiry."

Portsmouth (Trades Hall, Fratton Road): Chapman Cohen, 3, "Will Christianity Survive the War?" 7, "What is the Use of Christianity?"

FOREIGN AUTHORS' LITERARY AGENCY. ENGLISH MANUSCRIPTS OF FOREIGN AUTHORS Revised for Publication by English Author and Journalist, contributor to leading periodicals. Expert Proof-reader, able to see through the Press any large or small book. MSS. of Articles, Stories, Plays, Poems, Translations, etc., put into final English for submission to Editors. Typing if required. Lessons given in English Reading, Writing, and Speaking.—Address, "Authority," c/o the Freethinker, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C.

ENGLISH EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS, by Wilkins and Fallows; price 6d.—Workers' Educational Association, 14 Red Lion Square, London, W.C.

92 pp., cloth, 1s. net, by post 1s. 3d.; paper cover, 6d. net, by post 8d.

THE DARKNESS, THE DAWN, and THE DAY

By J. C. THOMAS, B.Sc. ("Keridon"),

Author of "Man: The Prodigy and Freak of Nature."

The late Mr. G. W. Foote wrote to the Author: "Your book requires no introduction; why did you get a Foreword written for it? Its excellence is the only reason why I have not yet reviewed it."

London: WATTS & CO., 17 Johnson's Court, Fleet St., E.C. 4.

RATIONALIST PEACE SOCIETY

38 CURSITOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

President: The Rt. Hon. J. M. Robertson, M.P.

Chairman: Mrs. H. Bradlaugh Bonner.

The Rationalist Peace Society was formed in 1910 to carry on a propaganda in the interest of International Peace on essentially and avowedly Rationalist lines, without reference to religious sanctions of any kind. The annual subscription is fixed at a minimum of one shilling.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(Postage ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 58 pp.	,, 1d.	0	3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	3
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Maugasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 82 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 82 pp.	Nett. ,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.

By H. C. Lea.

In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

This is the Third and Revised Edition, 1907, of the Standard and Authoritative Work on Sacerdotal Celibacy. Since its issue in 1867 it has held the first place in the literature of the subject, nor is it likely to lose that position.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.

An Elementary Treatise on a Realistic Religion and Philosophy of Human Life.

By E. A. Ashcroft.

440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

Mr. Ashcroft writes from the point of view of a convinced Freethinker, and deals with the question of Man and the Universe in a thoroughly suggestive manner.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.

By Carveth Read.

Professor of Philosophy in the University of London.

8vo 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

A Fine Exposition of Morals from the standpoint of a Rationalistic Naturalism.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.

By D. B. Hart, M.D.

Crown 8vo. 1910. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

An Examination of Evolution as affecting Heredity, Disease, Sex, Religion, etc. With Notes, Glossary, and Index.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.

By J. S. Mill.

Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

There is no need to praise Mill's Essays on Nature, The Utility of Religion, and Theism. The work has become a Classic in the History of Freethought. No greater attack on the morality of nature and the God of natural theology has ever been made than in this work.

Recent Acquisitions.

WILLIAM HONE: HIS LIFE AND TIMES.

By F. W. Hackwood.

Large 8vo. With numerous Plates. Published 10s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

William Hone was one of the group of Radical Reformers who played so conspicuous a part in the battle for free speech and a free press in the early part of the nineteenth century. The accounts of his trial before Mr. Justice Abbott and Lord Ellenborough for publishing parodies of the Athanasian Creed and the Lord's Prayer are of interest to all Freethinkers.

THE ENGLISH WOMAN: STUDIES IN HER PSYCHIC EVOLUTION.

By D. Staars.

Published 9s. net. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

An Evolutionary and Historic Essay on Woman. With Biographical Sketches of Harriet Martineau, George Eliot, and others.

By the Hon. A. S. G. Canning.

INTOLERANCE AMONG CHRISTIANS.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

RELIGIOUS STRIFE IN BRITISH HISTORY.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 5d.

THE POLITICAL PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

The Three Volumes post free for 5s.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?

By Chapman Cohen.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

Price 1s. net, postage 2d. Cloth, 1s. 9d.

By the same Author.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY.

Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS.

Price 1d., postage ½d.

A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS.

By J. M. Wheeler.

Price 3s. net, postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.

By G. W. Foote and W. P. Ball.

For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition. 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.

By G. W. Foote.

First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.

By J. M. Wheeler.

Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Printed and Published by The Pioneer Press (G. W. Foote and Co., Ltd.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 14 SUNDAY APRIL 8, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
More About the Soul.—The Editor	209
The Roots of the Christian Tree.—J. T. Lloyd	210
In the Name of the Prophet—Lies.—Mimnermus	211
Science and Spiritualism.—W. Mann	213
Letters to the Editor—The Clergy and the Schools	214
Acid Drops	214
To Correspondents	217
Sugar Plums	217
An Amazing Flight.—Arthur B. Moss	218
The Monarch of Cereals.—T. F. Palmer	218
Evil and God.—A. D. Howell Smith	220
Stories Concerning Authority.—Geo. Underwood	221
N. S. S. Executive Report	221
At a Graveside.—Nevil Bourn	222
Obituary	222
Notice of Meetings	222

Views and Opinions.

More About the Soul.

Last week we were concerned with Mr. Norman Pearson's attitude towards Materialism as expressed in his work The Soul and Its Story. We left untouched there the question of the nature of the "soul" as well as that of the nature of the sense of personal identity persisting amid continuous change, which forms so large a part of the religio-philosophical case for survival. And against that the argument may be reckoned as fairly decisive. Personal immortality must mean the survival of me. If I am to survive death then it must be the I which is known both to myself and others by certain bodily and mental peculiarities. To say that something survives which does not possess these peculiarities—which looks, feels, and thinks differently to what I do, is to say that it is not me that survives but someone or something else. Under such conditions I should be unrecognizable either by myself or others. It would be a change, not a perpetuation of personality. Everybody would survive as somebody else. And, thus, while on the one hand, the survival of a changed personality renders the whole case absurd, the survival of an unchanged me—unchanged in all those mental and physical peculiarities that make up my personality, is so ridiculous in the light of present knowledge that no educated person believes in it.

* * *

"Self" and "Soul."

What, then, is it that survives death? An easy and popular answer is—the soul. But this answer only serves to raise the further question of "What is the soul?" General thinking identifies the soul with the "self," or with a consciousness of personal identity. Neither of these are satisfactory. Mr. Pearson is careful to discriminate between the "soul" and the "self," treating the "self" as the medium through which the soul is revealed to us. He sees that a man's "self" is made up of more than his bodily organs, or of even these and his mental powers. It includes all that has any influence upon him. As Professor William James says:—

> In its widest possible sense, however, a man's self is the sum total of all that he can call his, not only his body and his psychic powers, but his clothes, and his house, his wife and children, his ancestors and friends, his reputation and works, his lands and houses, and yacht and banking account. If they wax and prosper he feels triumphant; if they dwindle and die away, he feels cast down.

Self—the ego—is not, in short, an indivisable, or insoluble, or indestructible fact, it is something that is gradually built up. It can be caught in the act of construction, and it can be observed undergoing destruction. A newborn child has no conception of "self." One can observe it being created, in the first place, probably by the sense of touch, later by intercourse with the family, the school, the outside world, and all that these things involve. And as we can watch the self being created, so we can watch it being disintegrated under the action of disease. Loss of memory, the psychic side of neural derangement, may create a complete gap between the "self" that is and the self that was. The phenomena of dissociation furnish us with an example of two "egos" accompanying the same organism. And these two sets of facts seem to be absolutely conclusive against any theory of a "self" as being either in itself, or in its manifestations, the expression of an independent entity. Under normal conditions we can watch the creation of the self, and under normal conditions we can observe its disorganization and disintegration.

* * *

Progress and the Individual.

In a rather oblique manner Mr. Pearson recognizes all that is here said. But, so far as we catch the drift of his argument, he assumes the necessity for a soul for two reasons, first because it is the essence of his metaphysic that there should be a continous development of the "soul," and, second, because social influences are quite inadequate to account for the fact of moral development. Now, we think the answer here is that continuous individual development is in no wise essential to human development as a whole. The last may be a fact, while the first remains an illusion. When we look at the problem carefully we see that the individual does not, and, indeed, cannot, progress indefinitely. Old age and death is an assurance of that. The growth of an individual may be great, his acquisitions rapid, but neither are without limits. Man, we say, has evolved from the lower animals, but man the individual has not. The evolution of man is true only of the species. And when we take statements that are only true of the species and apply them to the individual, we are necessarily led into error. This seems to us a root fallacy of Mr. Pearson's, as it is of the ordinary religious writer on the subject of a future life.

* * *

The Condition of Progress.

Why is progress not as true of the animal as of the human world? Animals are educable in a degree; they possess the capacity of acquisition; they learn, within their degree, from experience. Why, then, do animals not present the spectacle of continuous progress? The answer is that in the animal world there is lacking a true social medium—of which language is so great a part. But for this true social environment, the experience of the individual would count for no more in the case of man than it does in the case of animals. With it the experience of the individual is conserved, reduced to a formula, and handed on to the next generation as a part of its inheritance. What one generation thinks, the next re-thinks. These thoughts, experiences, inventions, discoveries, become stereotyped in laws, principles, and institutions. The racial inheritance becomes gradually greater, and man progresses because a new generation commences its career with a greater inherited capital. It is capable of more because it inherits more. Indefinite progress is, therefore, not really a fact of individual human nature; it is a quality of the species. It is expressed through the individual, who becomes greater because of that expression. And it is by a trick of the imagination that we transfer the capacity for unlimited progress, achievable only by the race, to the individual. The only conceivable—perhaps the only desirable—immortality is that of the race. And to the expression of Christian egotism which professes to find all vanity unless each individual has a guaranteed immortality, we may well prefer the old Greek idea of successive generations to a swift runner carrying a torch, whose duty it is to receive it from the one who preceded him, and hand it, still burning brightly, to the one who follows.

Digitized by Google

* * *

An Inherited Guess.

We are sorely tempted to follow Mr. Pearson in the discussion of the many interesting issues raised by his book; but space forbids. His work is an able presentation of what we cannot but regard as a bad case. And the theory of a "soul," however ably argued, is really unnecessary. As William James says, a "soul" is quite "needless for expressing the actual subjective phenomena of consciousness as they appear." It explains nothing that cannot be better explained without it, and it adds a number of new difficulties to those which already exist. James also agrees with Shadworth Hodgson that the soul is an outcome of that sort of philosophizing whose great maxim is, "Whatever you are totally ignorant of, assert to be the explanation of everything else." To explain a thing is to bring the unknown within the category of the known. The believers in a soul reverse the process. They attempt to explain the known by referring it to the unknown. And that way nothing but confusion lies. Moreover, when both the metaphysician and the theologian have had their say, the fact of our knowledge concerning the history of the "soul" remains. We know how the belief in a "soul" began; we understand the conditions that gave the belief birth; and that knowledge is conclusive. When Johnson was asked how he came to insert a certain definition in his dictionary, he replied, "Ignorance, sir, pure ignorance." That, in a word, is the history of the beginning of the belief in a soul. Ignorance, pure ignorance. And nothing that plausibility or special pleading may do and can make the belief in a soul more than a guess hazarded by the primitive savage, perpetuated by false sentiment and priestly self-interest.

Chapman Cohen.

Some people's minds are like a place of public meeting—all kinds of opinions appear there in turn, and leave it just as they found it, empty and open to every comer.

Arnold Toynbee.

The Roots of the Christian Tree.

II.

What is Christianity? Professor Fisher, of Yale University, in his History of Christian Doctrine, defines it thus: "Christianity is a revelation of God through Jesus Christ, whereby reconciliation and a new spiritual life in fellowship with himself are brought to mankind." That will serve as a fairly accurate description of orthodox Christianity throughout all the ages of its history. Of Christianity as thus defined there is, as already intimated, no trace whatever in the Synoptic Gospels, though they contain certain phrases which were evidently interpolated from time to time while the new cult was in the making. Among such passages are those referring to baptism as a condition of salvation, and the Lord's Supper as a symbol of mystical union and communion with the slain and resurrected Deity. The Fourth Gospel marks a farther stage in the evolution of the Christian myth, and is a metaphysical treatise rather than a biography. In the Pauline Epistles the process has reached a much more advanced stage, and may indeed be regarded as being, in all vital points, complete. That is to say, the Epistles represent the Christian religion as a distinct cult which claims, not only superiority over all other existing cults, but also to be the only absolutely true one, all the others being utterly false. The truth is, however, that Christianity cannot boast of even one original idea or tenet, but is an ingeniously constructed patchwork. Its conceptions of God, revelation, and tradition were taken over, with scarcely any alteration, from Judaism, while its doctrines of the God-man or Saviour-God and of redemption through mystic union with him as slain and risen from the dead, it borrowed, with but slight modifications, from the Oriental mystery-religions which inundated the Græco-Roman world during the first and second centuries of our era. Those religions had their origin in Egypt, Babylonia, Syria, Persia, and even India, and from each of them was taken what was considered most deserving of preservation, or at least what was believed would prove most useful to the new religion. Osiris, Adonis, Attis, Dionysus, and Mithra were all Saviour-gods in their respective cults, who died and rose again for the salvation of their votaries. The chief difference between Christianity and those religions lies in the personality of its Redeemer, whose life and work are delineated in the Gospels.

To some orthodox divines the foregoing statements may seem extravagant or far-fetched, but it must not be forgotten that they are largely endorsed by several first class Christian scholars. Professor Wernle, of Basel, says:—

> It is no doubt true that Christianity is a daughter of the Jewish faith; yet it strikes its roots deep down into a soil which we may call beliefs common to all the religions of antiquity. In that soil the characteristic features of the various religions of the ancient world are not as yet distinguishable. Among these common beliefs may be included the whole body of ideas concerning the earth, nature and man, the soul, and the world of spirits (The Beginnings of Christianity, vol. i., p. 1).

Dr. B. W. Bacon, Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in Yale University, whilst fully recognizing the indebtedness of Christianity to Judaism, is fully awake to the fact that even Judaism itself was more or less tinged with Pagan ideas, and more particularly to the ever-growing evidence that the Pauline Gospel owed its distinguishing characteristics to Heathen mythology. To him there is a fundamental contrast between the apostolic or Jerusalem Gospel and the Pauline, and he is convinced that the latter borrowed its central tenets from ideas current in the Gentile world. He says:—

Digitized by Google

> Hellenism contributed the individual ideal: personal redemption in mystic union with the life of God.....The influential religions of the time were those of personal redemption by mystic union with a dying and resurrected "Saviour-god," an Osiris, an Adonis, an Attis, a Mithra. Religions of this type were everywhere displacing the old national faiths.....The starting-point of Paul's own conceptions was not Israel's bondage in Egypt, but a conception already tinged, like the late book of Jewish philosophy called the Wisdom of Solomon, with the Stoic conception of "flesh" as prison-house of "Spirit," already inflamed, like the contemporary Jewish apocalypses of Esdras and Baruch with lurid visions of a Universe rescued by Super-human power from the thraldom of demonic rule (The Making of the New Testament, pp. 53, 50, 51).

In an important article, "The Mythical Collapse of Historical Christianity," in the Hibbert Journal for July, 1911, Dr. Bacon makes the following significant admission:—

> For Paul, with his Hellenistic culture and purely inward religious experience, it may have been inevitable that his interpretation of "the things concerning Jesus" should take the form of an incarnation doctrine. To admit this is to admit that mythology has entered into Gospel story.

There may be a certain amount of truth in Dr. Bacon's assertion that "legend is but history in the making, the embroidered robe of traditional fact"; but we have noticed that the great aim of Liberal Christian critics of the Gospels is to disentangle fact from legend, to discover the historical Jesus in a heterogeneous mass of legendary and semi-mythical elements. With another of Dr. Bacon's assertions we are in hearty agreement, namely, that "myth is but philosophy in the making." Philosophy, metaphysics, theology, these three, in the scholastic acceptation of the terms, are founded almost exclusively upon mythical assumptions. The Yale Professor says:—

> We cannot conceive any other vehicle of thought or speech through which the preachers of the new religion could give utterance to their undisciplined sense of the teleological significance of what they themselves had witnessed. To what else could they resort if not to the transcendentalized Messianism of Peter and the Hellenistic incarnation doctrine of Paul? Our difference from the monistic idealists lies not in any unwillingness to recognize the sources and character of these primitive speculations, or to reinterpret the data from the standpoint of modern psychology and philosophy of religion, but in the fact that we have some appreciation of the facts of history as well, and therefore recognize that neither in the Apostolic age nor to-day could Christianity be successful if speculation and fact were inverted in relative importance (The Hibbert Journal, July, 1911, p. 752-3).

Let us test Professor Bacon's "appreciation of the facts of history." On his own showing, it is one of the facts of history that the Gospel of Jesus differed in quality from the Gospel about Jesus. Of this difference the erudite Professor makes great capital. Now, in the former Gospel, as held by the pillar apostles at Jerusalem, and as advocated in the Epistle of James, there is no Atonement, no salvation by faith, no Saviour-god; the whole duty of man consisting of conformity to the teaching of the Lord Jesus. As James puts it: "Pure religion and undefiled before our God and Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." But the Gospel about Jesus practically ignores the life and teaching of the man Christ Jesus, and concentrates its attention upon the death on the Cross by which the eternal Christ became a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, and salvation is the outcome of a mystic union with him both in his death and resurrection. This conception of salvation is foreign to Judaism in all stages of its evolution, but in Heathen religions nothing was more common long before Christianity made its appearance. This is admitted by Dr. Bacon himself, when he says that modern criticism has come to see that the difference between the Gospel of Jesus and the Gospel about Jesus "was in higher degree a difference of quality. Paul's whole message of redemption through the Cross and Resurrection started from other premises than those of the Galilean apostles, and was conceived in other terms. For this reason it leads over to a new Christology." This admission is of first-class importance, because it shows that Christianity not only took over its leading ideas from other religions, but also omitted to acknowledge the fact. Paul went the length of boasting that they had been specially revealed to him from heaven. But, according to Professor Gilbert Murray, Gnostic sects were "scattered over the Hellenistic world before Christianity as well as after." Tarsus was probably one of their centres even prior to the reputed date of Paul's birth; and this is the Oxford Professor's testimony concerning them:—

> Their Saviour, like the Jewish Messiah, was established in men's minds before the Saviour of the Christians. "If we look close," says Professor Bousset, "the result emerges with great clearness, that the figure of the Redeemer as such did not wait for Christianity to force its way into the religion of Gnosis, but was already present there under various forms." He occurs notably in two pre-Christian documents discovered by the keen analysis and profound learning of Dr. Reitzenstein: the Poimandres revelation printed in the Corpus Hermeticum, and the sermon of the Naassenes in Hippolytus, Refutatio Omnium Haeresium, which is combined with Attis-worship (Four Stages of Greek Religion, p. 143).

Our only possible conclusion, face to face with the evidence, is that the author or authors of the Pauline Epistles appropriated, not only the Gentile moulds of thought wherein to formulate Christian theology, but even the substance of the Gospel that came to be known as Pauline. Had it not been for the few Oriental cults that were aiming to win and dominate the Western world, Christianity would never have been heard of. And yet, after enriching itself by pursuing a policy of wholesale robbing of its stronger rivals, Christianity, as soon as it gained political ascendancy, initiated a system of persecution, which eventuated in the forcible suppression of all the cults by the help of which it had obtained the supremacy.

J. T. Lloyd.

In the Name of the Prophet—Lies.

> John P.
> Robinson, he
> Sez they didn't know everythin' down in Judee.
> —Lowell, "Biglow Papers."
>
> The vain crowds wandering blindly, led by lies.
> —Lucretius.

None of the four Gospels profess to give an exhaustive account of the acts of Christ, and "John's Gospel" concludes by saying:—

> There are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written. Amen.

It must be confessed that tradition does make startling demands even on the childlike faith which is nurtured on the fairy-tales of the Gospels. No more instructive volume could be placed in the hands of anyone interested in the Christian religion than the tabooed Scriptures known as the Apocryphal Gospels, of which few Christians have much knowledge. Even the Old Testament Apocrypha has been pushed into the background by astute ecclesiastics, and when Queen Victoria placed a quotation from the volume upon the tomb of the Prince Consort, she fluttered the dovecotes of orthodoxy. Yet down to the first quarter of the nineteenth century, the Apocrypha was an integral portion of "God's Word." Since that date it has almost disappeared from the public eye, and is mainly read by students who are interested in the origin and history of Christianity. The far more interesting Apocryphal Gospels are not easy to obtain. An edition was issued by Hone and sold for many years, but it was a cumbersome volume; and a more scholarly version, edited by a Mr. Cowper, published later, was too expensive for ordinary readers. Some day, perhaps, an enterprising publisher will put a handy edition of these Gospels upon the market at a low rate, For in these accounts of Christ one finds the gospel legend in the making, the studies for the completed painting of the "Old, Old Story." And the fact of the volume being taboo to the religious world is all the more reason why it should once more appear in an easily accessible form.

Digitized by Google

Much of the matter in the Apocryphal Gospels covers unfamiliar ground. Listen to this passage from the Second Gospel of the Infancy, piously attributed to "Saint Thomas":—

> 1. When the child Jesus was five years of age, and there had been a shower of rain, which was now over, Jesus was playing with other Hebrew boys by a running stream; and the water running over the banks stood in little lakes.
>
> 2. But the water instantly became clear and useful again; He having smote them only by His Word, they readily obeyed him.
>
> 3. Then He took from the bank of the stream some soft clay, and formed out of it twelve sparrows; and there were other boys playing with Him.
>
> 4. But a certain Jew, seeing the things which he was doing, namely, His forming clay into the figures of sparrows on the Sabbath day, went presently away and told his father, Joseph, and said:
>
> 5. Behold thy boy is playing by the river-side, and has taken clay and formed it into twelve sparrows, and profaned the Sabbath.
>
> 6. Then Joseph came to the place where He was, and when he saw Him, and said, Why doest that which is not lawful to do on the Sabbath day?
>
> 7. Then Jesus, clapping together the palms of his hands, called to the sparrows, and said to them: Go, fly away, and while ye live remember me.
>
> 8. So the sparrows fled away, making a great noise.
>
> 9. The Jews, seeing this, were astonished, and went away, and told their chief persons what a strange miracle they had seen wrought by Jesus.

This story is elaborated in the First Gospel of the Infancy, where it is stated that the extraordinary boy performed a similar miracle in his seventh year, astonishing his playmates by making clay figures of asses, oxen, and birds, walk, fly, eat, and drink, as he commanded them; and the account concludes:—

> When at length the boys went away and related these things to their parents, their fathers said to them: "Take heed, children, for the future, of his company, for he is a sorcerer; shun and avoid him, and from henceforth never play with him."

A childlike credulity runs through the entire Ages of Faith, manifesting itself in a thousand ways. Tradition, that "lying jade," says that the ass has borne a cross on its back ever since Christ made his triumphant entry into Jerusalem, "sitting on an ass, and a colt, the foal of an ass." We strongly suspect that this great discovery was made by some forgotten genius like the man who first elaborated the dogma of the Holy Trinity, and who tried to make a religion out of the multiplication table.

According to Didron, the praises of the Cross were sung in the ninth century in like manner as people celebrate those "of a god or of a hero," and right reverent and most ignorant Fathers of the Great Lying Church did not fail to remark that its figure was "engraven in the productions of Nature, seen in the works of men, in the position of inanimate objects and the gestures of the living." Joyful indeed must have been the heart of the early Christian who, gazing on the coat of an ass, was first struck by the illusion that the markings were cruciform.

Attention being once called to the evidence of Christianity supplied by the ass, it is natural that it should be used in pious encounters with Freethinkers. It is to be hoped that it proved a more effective weapon in the hands of some than it did in those of the Abbe who endeavoured to subdue the Atheist Boindin. The pious Abbe had brought all his artillery to bear against the Atheist without avail, and, when almost in despair, broke in, "Well, Mr. Boindin, will you deny that since the day Our Blessed Saviour made his entry into Jerusalem on an ass, they bear a cross on their backs." "Very forcible," replied Boindin, "turn round, if you please."

This carefully cultivated credulity of pious folk blinds their eyes to facts. The Gospel legends are poured into their ears from earliest childhood, and the "Old, Old Story" has a familiar ring even when half believed. But the unblushing mendacity of the Apocryphal Gospels, being in an unfamiliar setting, should make the most bigoted believer rub his eyes. And one thing must be evident to every honest reader. The Christian religion is based upon similar nonsense, for Christianity is based upon miracles. It is on the truth or falsehood of miracles that the very personality of Christ must stand or fall. According to the Gospels, it was by miracles that he attested his divine mission. It was by miracles that he won his first following. It was by miracles that he proclaimed himself the "Son of God," and without credulous belief in miracles, Christianity would have long since died out. It is not a creed of "love" and "brotherhood" which has fascinated ignorant millions through so many centuries, and caused them to fill the priests' coffers with gold.

Christ claimed that he was "God," and his "proofs" were that he multiplied loaves and fishes, healed the sick, and restored the dead to life. The whole question is reduced to one of facts. If we can believe that Christ was really born of a virgin, that he performed prodigies, that he died and was buried, and afterwards left the earth by ascension, then we need not hesitate to accept the priestly pretensions for Christianity. If, on the other hand, we believe that the proofs for the miracles are inadequate, or that natural laws are never broken, no talk of "love" or "brotherhood" will make believable the nonsense upon which Christianity is based.

The most important Christian body—The Roman Catholic Church—recognizes this, and affirms that its own miracles are a continuation of those wrought by Christ, his disciples, and the saints. They tell us that the so-called "cures" at Lourdes, and elsewhere, and the questionable liquefaction of the blood of Saint Januarius, are precisely such as those mentioned in the Bible, and that the apparition of the Virgin to children at La Salette is as genuine as the miracles in Judæa. The priests of the Greek Church take the same attitude, and contend that the theatrical revelation of the Holy Fire at Jerusalem every year is simply the latest link in a great chain that extends back to Biblical times. The two greatest Churches of Christendom leave Humanity chained within the prison of Superstition. It is the life-purpose of Freethinkers to break those fetters and set Humanity free.

Mimnermus.

Digitized by Google

Science and Spiritualism.

V.

(Continued from p. 205.)

The present promoters of spiritual phenomena divide themselves into two classes, one of which needs no demonstration, while the other is beyond the reach of proof. The victims like to believe, and they do not like to be undeceived. Science is perfectly powerless in the presence of this frame of mind. It is, moreover, a state perfectly compatible with extreme intellectual subtlety and a capacity for devising hypotheses which only require the hardihood engendered by strong conviction, or by callous mendacity, to render them impregnable. The logical feebleness of science is not sufficiently borne in mind. It keeps down the weed of superstition, not by logic but by slowly rendering the mental soil unfit for its cultivation. —Professor Tyndall, "Fragments of Science" (1876), p. 321.

"The chronic belief of mankind," says Professor James, "that events may happen for the sake of their personal significance is an abomination." It is this chronic mental habit that broods upon the problem of subjective experiences, and is ready to recognize in signs and omens the guiding principle of rationality.....The victim of this unfortunate habit will remain logically unfit to survive the struggle against the occult.—Professor Jastrow, "Fact and Fable in Psychology," p. 41.

Spiritualists claim that mediums are, like poets, born, not made; that they are different to other men in that they are sensitive to spiritual influences unfelt by the average man, just as the dog can detect scents and sounds inappreciable by our senses.

It is true that to be a successful medium requires a combination of qualifications not often found in the same individual; but they are not by any means supernormal or supernatural. He must be of prepossessing appearance—an ugly medium might be suspected of dealings with the Evil One. His personality must also inspire confidence and trust, with an outward appearance of innocence and simplicity.

Do the mediums themselves believe in Spiritualism? It will be replied that they must know that Spiritualism is false because they manufacture the phenomena. It is true that they know that the physical phenomena is a fraud. But let us be perfectly fair. I see no more reason to doubt their belief in the spiritual world than I doubt the repeated statements of travellers and students of the mental habits of the lower races; that the witch doctors and medicine-men are themselves, in spite of their abominable frauds, strong believers in the spirits they pretend to commune with.

There is no more inconsistency in their conduct than there was in the late Mr. Jabez Balfour calling for his Bible after he was arrested. To say that Mr. Jabez Balfour did not believe in the Bible and religion because he was a swindler would be quite false.

I once knew a man of good natural ability, clever and clear-headed above the average, not at all religious. I had known him intimately for several years, conversing with him daily, when one day he confided to me a very singular belief he firmly held. We were talking of hypnotism, when he suddenly remarked: "Do you know that, if I am in an assembly, I can make anyone in the audience in front of me look round if I fix my eyes on them and exert my will?" It appeared from further remarks that if, as occasionally happened, the person stubbornly refused to turn round in response to this optic bombardment, that did not disprove his power; it only proved that the person he was practising upon possessed a stronger will than his. I knew it would be futile to argue with him; the effect would be only to close him up on the subject. It appeared from further conversation that he had some years previously been to a public exhibition of hypnotism and mesmerism, and had come away convinced of the power of mind of one person to work on the will of another, provided it was the stronger. This led him on to the purchase of several of the trashy (some of them expensive) works on Will-Power and How to Hypnotise, so widely advertised in the popular press. These had confirmed him in his belief. He was an unread man, quite unacquainted with the scientific explanation of these now well-understood phenomena. Here we have a medium in the making, and I should never be surprised to see my one-time friend on the platform as a professional mesmerist; and I know that he would not be above helping out his performance by trickery if the chance availed. Probably most mediums have commenced their career from similar beginnings.

Daniel Dunglas Home was the cleverest and most gifted of all the mediums. It is the standing boast of Spiritualists that Home was never caught practising trickery and fraud. Home was the very Napoleon of mediums. He hobnobbed with princes, kings, and emperors; he held several seances at the Tuilleries with the last Emperor and Empress of the French, also with the Czar at the Russian Court, and many other royal and noble families. He succeeded in marrying the young and charming daughter of a noble Russian family, possessed of a moderate fortune; and after she died he married another Russian lady, also possessed of a fortune. This made him independent of the spirits, and he rarely disturbed them to fetch and carry for him after this.

Home appears to be the only recorded case of a medium who rose from poverty to wealth, and maintained his prosperity to the end; most of the others ending miserably, like Slade, victims of drink. The only real spirits they were acquainted with were those in the bottle.

Home's only serious fall happened when he had to disgorge a sum of £24,000 bestowed upon him by Mrs. Lyons, a wealthy widow, who changed her mind a few months later, and brought an action for recovery. Even the late Mr. Andrew Lang, who was more than a half-believer in Home, admits: "The judge held, and I think rightly held, that the gift was prompted, at least to some extent, by what Home declared to be spiritual rappings. That quite destroys his moral character, as far as this case went."[1]

"It seems certain," says Mr. Podmore, "that Home began life in extreme poverty, and probably as an illegitimate child. From the age of seventeen onwards he lived by the exercise of his mediumship, none the less if he never actually received payment in cash down. Throughout his life, first in the Eastern States of America and later in every country of Europe, he found wealthy patrons to welcome him. Such formal education as he received in his youth was paid for by the New York committee to which I have alluded. When Home was not actually a guest in their houses, his patrons, in one way or other—by taking tickets for his lectures, by commissioning busts from him, by subscribing to pay his debts, by making him presents of costly jewellery—managed to provide for his wants."[2] Thus Home lived, not merely in comfort, "he lived in what is commonly called the 'best' society, the society of persons of rank, wealth, and fashion, and occasionally of intellectual distinction."

Home is described as having been "slight, fair, and, without being actually handsome, attractive and even distinguished-looking," and "produced on most persons the impression of a highly emotional, childlike nature, full of generous impulses, and lavish of affection to all comers.....he was a good performer on the piano; and his recitations, whether in the drawing-room or on the platform, are said by competent judges to have been

[1] Long, "Historical Mysteries," Cornhill Magazine, April, 1904.

[2] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., p. 226.

Digitized by Google

distinguished by brilliant dramatic faculty and emotional expression. Even on those who were brought only into momentary contact with him he produced commonly the impression of frankness and sincerity; in those who stood in more frequent and intimate relations with him the confidence which he inspired seems to have been unlimited. The belief in the honesty of the performer became for them hardly less instinctive than the belief in the trustworthiness of the senses which took note of the performance. The trust upon which other mediums relied was built up mainly by adventitious devices; with Home it was inspired and maintained by the charm of his personality. But there were two other causes which contributed in no small degree to the confidence felt in Home's integrity. Home himself professed a fervent belief in his own mission as a teacher of the truth of immortality; and in his trances habitually delivered discourses on religious themes."[1]

We have no doubt that Home had a genuine belief in Spiritualism. When nine years of age he was taken to America by an aunt; about five years later the spirit-rapping epidemic—started by the Fox sisters—broke out in America, and proved the starting point of modern Spiritualism. Home was infected with the belief, and two years later, at the age of seventeen, left his aunt's house, and went out into the world to live by his wits.

Home's success was due mainly to two causes: first, the manner in which he inspired people with a belief in his honesty and sincerity, and so putting their critical faculties to sleep; and second to the fact that he did not come in the guise of a common paid professional, but as an honoured guest, not to be spied upon and suspected.

(To be continued.) W. Mann.

Correspondence.

THE CLERGY AND THE SCHOOLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Following up your comments on the keenness of the Scottish ministers to get into our schools as teacher substitutes, may I state that some weeks ago a committee, composed of the two large Presbyterian bodies, circularized the School Boards over the country for information as to the time devoted to religious knowledge education in the schools under their management? This is undoubtedly the first move in an effort to get more in touch with the children in the day-schools. Some of us anticipated such a step would be taken; for in conferences and district meetings of the clergy it was urged that, owing to the alarming decline in Sunday-school attendance, and also at church services, means should be taken to get access to the day-schools. This is the official or trade reason, but no doubt not to the School Boards' further action will be founded on concern for the better moral upbringing of the young; just as, some four years ago, what is known as the "Rural Schools Question"—an agitation to bring free, higher education to the children in the remote village and lonely glen—was discussed in all the presbyteries, and the chief reason urged was the scarcity of students for the ministry, and the prospect of an increase if the country youth could be tutored without leaving his locality, as formerly, in Scotland, in Latin, Greek, and those subjects that would enable him to pass into the university. When the same clerics appeared at education conferences, there was nothing said about students, but great concern manifested for justice for the poor man's clever children—his "lad o' pairts"—that he might be enabled to pass right from the parish school into the university. Let Scottish readers watch particularly the development of the clerical raid on the day-schools. Observe that the clergy wield a double power, and more, in such matters; they largely predominate in School Boards and National Education Associations, influencing decisions; while, on the other hand, they memorialize Education Departments from their several presbyteries.

Another Scotty.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—The letter of "Scotty" in your issue of March 25 prompts me to pen a few remarks on the state of the Freethought movement in Scotland.

As one of the very few active Scots Freethinkers, I have been amused and somewhat amazed at the "sheepishness" of Freethinkers of all kinds in this land o' cakes. As a member of a very small, and very reactionary, School Board, it has been my privilege to strike one or two shrewd blows for freedom of thought, and I must say that the extreme modesty of the rest of the Freethinkers, both locally and nationally, in ignoring the issues raised, surprised even me. In fact, I may state here, that on any occasion when my name was mentioned in controversy it was Englishmen who wrote me in support and sympathy, while on one occasion a letter of mine on "Hell" brought one souvenir—from a Frenchman residing in Leith—of all places.

I share my diffident countryman's concern as to the fight the Church will make to get control of the schools, and as one behind the scenes, I may say that the meenisters will be very welcome to the average School Board—as teachers, if they act as unpaid, or very poorly paid, substitutes. Thus a very interesting situation will arise. The greed, however, of the "meenister" class will, I think, on the whole, equal the niggardliness of the School Board members; and as the War cannot last much longer, there may be no great invasion of the schoolrooms by the clergy. But let "Scotty" be under no illusion. It is only by chance, or the mutual distrust of parson and the average member as to the money, that has kept the meenister from indoctrinating the minds of our Scots youth with that aforetime abomination—the Shorter Catechism.

A word with "Scotty" privately. Dinna, ma freen', be ower crouse on the waning influence o' the Auld Kirk. If the meenister gets into the schoolroom, the Auld Kirk will renew its youth like the eagle's. Are ye, ma freen, if ye hae weans at schule, gettin them taught the beliefs and doctrines ye ken to be false? If so, why? Please reply—and dinna be blate—sign yer name—like

Jas. W. K. Leiper.

Acid Drops.

The question of the nation's food supply should bring into special prominence the ancient and pre-Christian festival of Easter. For the celebration of Easter is nothing more than a carrying over into civilized times of the primitive magical performance intended to assist vegetation in its recovery from the sleep of winter, and to secure food for mankind. In its primitive form this involved the sacrifice of a victim—literally the creation of a god or ghost—to watch over the crops. Hence the story of the sacrifice of a number of gods—Attis, Osiris, Jesus—at or near the spring equinox. Try as they may, Christians cannot successfully hide the nature of Easter. The fact of its being a movable festival is alone enough to prove its origin. It is a festival connected with the sun, and the sun is the parent of vegetation. In the less advanced Christian communities the connection is open and confessed. The peasantry of Russia and of various parts of Europe still perform the magical ceremonies of their far-off ancestors in the name of Christ. And amongst the peasantry of Greece we may meet with the expression, "If Christ does not rise to-morrow, we shall have no corn this year." A vegetation god evolved from the ignorance of primitive man—that is the origin of the Christian Saviour. To the informed student, "Christ" is no more than one of the groups of gods whose death and resurrection stood for the revivification of vegetation. The Christian of to-day remains on the stage of primitive savagery in religious practice, and often enough in his thought.

The end of March saw the end of the public sale of opium in China. For years China protested against its sale and though the old East India Company did not engage directly in the traffic, with characteristic Christian hypocrisy it supplied the opium to those engaged in smuggling the stuff through. By the Treaty of Teinstein the preaching of Christianity in a large part of the country was forced upon Chinese by the British, and also the legalization of the opium trade. China continued to protest both against the evils of the opium trade and the insolence and provocatory nature of Christian preaching. But Great Britain treated these protests with the contempt a Christian power usually displays towards a pacific people. Gradually, public opinion in this country was educated and excited against the traffic, and two years ago China was permitted to refuse the admission of, and prohibit the sale, after a given date. But it is well to observe that here was an evil forced upon a non-Christian country by a Christian one, and with no other possible justification than that of reaping a pecuniary benefit.

[1] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., pp. 228-9.

Digitized by Google

One must give the Church credit for the part it took in the anti-opium agitation. It said nothing when the trade was forced on China; it blessed our Government in the war that established the traffic on a legal basis; but, let the fact be stated to its credit, it did form an Anti-Opium Committee. It did this in 1906—when it was recognized that the trade would have to be abolished. In this it was true to its policy, its traditions, its own interests. Support anything so long as it pays—that is the one guiding principle of our glorious Church.

The town of Mexboro is a pious place with a pious council, but, alas! there is a fly in the ointment. Some shops are open on Sunday, and the Sunday Closing Association appealed to the Council for "Moral Support," and a Mr. Ward moved that this be given. Other members of the Council agreed that the opening of shops—other than Gospel shops—on Sunday was disgraceful, and Mr. Ward's motion was carried. The only dissentient was a Mr. Athion who said he did not see why the Council should take the bread and butter out of the mouths of people, many of whom were widows. Mr. Athion evidently knew his fellow councillors, as he said he did not expect to get support, nor was support given. Pious humbug had its way, and the sale of sweets, etc., is morally condemned by the Mexboro Council. Oh, the colossal impertinence of little people!

The following extract from the Daily Telegraph of March 27 is interesting:—

> Mr. J. W. Barnett, probationer officer at the Westminster Police Court, told the Cinema Commission that he had brought together as many as ninety married couples who otherwise would have separated. "I take them to a picture show," he said, "and they can squeeze together as closely as they can, and very often the picture and their appreciation of them bring a new understanding into their life.

Here is testimony to ninety cases of "conversion" brought about by purely rational and non-supernatural methods. No penitent form, no holy guest, no miraculous intervention, no, nothing but a simple picture telling a moral story which pulled these poor couples and set them on their feet again. Had ninety couples been so reunited in St. Paul's Cathedral, our imaginative friend, the Bishop of London, would have predicted the immediate coming of the King of Glory.

Replying to the reproach that 30,000,000 Christians are trying to murder one another, a pious journalist says that Indians and Turks are not Christians. Just so! But the Indians and Turks were forced to fight by Christian nations.

The House of Commons Tribunal says that a verger's work is not of national importance. Yet 50,000 parsons and theological students are exempted from military service.

The dear clergy have told us that war benefits religion; but the National Mission is a frost, and there is no prairie-fire of piety among the soldiers. The Rev. N. S. Talbot, Assistant Chaplain-General, says "on the whole there is not a great revival of the Christian religion at the Front."

The Rev. W. C. Piggott, a Nonconformist minister, declares that Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, and Arnold Bennett are "enemies of the Church." To-day the impeachment will invite a smile, but in the days of faith it would have meant death and dishonour.

We have been so accustomed to read in the religious and secular press, hypnotized by religious writers, of the hymns that are always sung by persons in circumstances of extreme danger, that it is instructive to find that in a well-authenticated recent instance hymn singing was not the case—as probably it was not in some other cases, had impartial witnesses been there to report. The Cape Times, describing the splendid behaviour of the troops on board the mined steamer Tyndareus, off Cape Agulhas, says:—

> As soon as the roll had been called and the order "Stand easy" had been given, someone started "The Long Trail," and in a few seconds the whole gathering from end to end of the ship had taken up the haunting refrain of the latest marching song. Then came the oldest favourite, "Tipperary," and for half an hour afterwards, while the ominous incline of the deck towards the bows became more and more noticeable, chorus after chorus swept along the lines and over the sea, where both the other steamers were racing to the rescue.

The heroism of these gallant fellows is by no means lessened, but rather heightened, by the fact that when they were apparently in extremis they did not give way to superstitious fears or invoke divine assistance—which had failed to protect them—but faced the situation like men.

Some of the clergy do not like Sunday labour, even when it is for the national welfare, and the Rev. A. D. Belden, of Westcliff-on-Sea, says it is "sheer humbug and wicked nonsense," and that "the suggestion to close local churches on Sundays had made Southend the laughing stock of the country." Brother Belden protests too much. Surely he will want bread for his Communion services, even if he sniffs at the meat that perisheth.

Appeals for additional literature for soldiers and sailors have been made by Sir Douglas Haig. Evidently the boys are not satisfied with the Bibles which are sent to them by the ton.

Clocks have been put forward an hour in order to effect daylight saving. Yet millions of Christians believe that the world's clock struck at Jerusalem two thousand years ago, and has never moved since.

The general discussion of what is euphemistically called "the hidden scourge" has naturally given rise to much wild talk, and has been a perfect boon to bachelor parsons, moral purity crusaders, and crowds of those who either love to indulge their taste for dabbling in unsavoury subjects with a "moral purpose" or furthering their interests in other directions. And as it is the fashion to idealize everything in khaki, it is the men—the poor, innocent, undesigning men—who must be protected against the wicked, designing woman. Withal, there is no clear evidence that the evil is to-day greater to any appreciable extent than it was before the War. But the War serves as an occasion, and the desire to protect our innocent, ladylike soldiers enables those to pose as social reformers who are eternally tinkering with effects, while lacking both the courage and the intelligence to grapple with causes.

For some reason or other, special attention has been directed to the Waterloo Bridge Road and Victoria Station, and Australian soldiers. We have all along regarded these stories with considerable suspicion, and we have now had in our hands evidence from a number of responsible persons, some of them connected with Church Army hostels and Y.M.C.A. huts, who flatly deny the stories that have been so freely circulated. The stories are said to be eighty per cent. exaggerated, and that in the majority of cases where Australian soldiers are seen in the company of women, the women are respectable and well-behaved, and there is little more than the attraction of the uniform for the girls and the pleasure of the soldier in getting feminine companionship. Naturally, there is vice; but those who remember the boom in "white slave" stories only a few years back will receive the stories current with considerable care.

Digitized by Google

All over the country thousands of "one-man businesses" are being broken up on the plea of national necessity. Many of these will never be revived, since their closing will mean the diverting of custom to the large stores, and these will certainly not allow their patriotic fervour to stand in the way of the capture of trade, even though the trade be that of their fellow-countrymen. But there is one "one-man business" that remains inviolate. The Government continues to allow thousands of able-bodied clergymen to remain at large. Their business interests are to remain untouched. Surely, if the Government can do nothing else, it might arrange a substitution scheme. It need not shut up the Churches; it could provide women substitutes for parsons. The change, we think, would be for the better.

Alone amongst our Allies freethinking France has set the example of treating its clergymen as ordinary citizens. And the irony of it is that our own clergymen, skulking behind their pulpits, are using the fact of the French clergy being in the Army (because there is no exemption in France) as evidence of their own greatness. Christian Germany, like Christian England, considers the clergy too important to put them in the Army. It remains to be seen what the new Russia will do when it has had time. The probability is that the mass of the Russian people are too illiterate to be ready for a secularization of the State, as in France. And although the majority of the leaders of the Russian Revolutionists are Freethinkers, it would perhaps be as well for them not to jeopardize the safety of the new regime by a too extreme policy in that direction.

Should Russia declare in favour of a Republic, we shall then have China, America, Russia, France, and Portugal all republics, and it will be a moot question as to how long the other monarchies of the world will survive. And once monarchy is rejected and militarism crushed, the two great props of religion will have disappeared.

The publication of a life of Spencer by Mr. Hugh Eliot has enabled a lot of newspaper men—some of whom are quite obviously unacquainted with his work—to express an opinion on the value of his philosophy. The writer, who is responsible for the weekly religious article in the Times, declares quite authoritatively of Spencer's teaching: "We do not attack it, we ignore it." "It does not answer, it does not even ask the questions we ask." The "we" is impressive to many, but it is much in the nature of a bogey to frighten those who are not accustomed to do their own thinking. Modifications of Spencer's teachings are naturally called for by the developments of thought, but a large part of Spencer's work remains quite unaffected by these. If it was once the fashion to praise Spencer, it is certainly becoming the fashion with a set to belittle him. We observed Mr. W. L. Courtney selecting for special depreciation The Study of Sociology—one of the wisest and most suggestive volumes Spencer gave to the world.

The motive actuating the Times writer is disclosed in his closing words. The intellect of the world he tells us is turning towards the belief in God. "And we reject the philosophy of Spencer because there is no hint or promise or hope of religion to be found in it." There, the murder is out! If Spencer had provided any room for religion "We" might still have found some good in him. As he did not, as he demonstrated that all religious belief rests upon the ignorance of the primitive savage, "we" have no use for him. And, perhaps, after all "we," if he were known, would turn out to be some mentally enæmic parson who, having failed to impress the limited circle that knows him, hopes to impress a larger circle in virtue of his anonymity.

Billy Sunday, the famous baseball player of U.S.A., has made the pilgrim's progress from notoriety to respectability, from "Billy" to "Mr.," and, later, "the Rev. Mr. Sunday." The process has left him with a high opinion of himself. He recently announced that he would turn his tabernacle into a recruiting office in case of war, and preach war as a religious act, and ask "the servants of the Lord" to fight. It sounds like a far-off echo of the utterances of another Bill, of Berlin.

The Free Church Presbytery of Inverary has put on record its "grief and apprehension of the introduction within its bounds of the timber felling on the Sabbath Day." It also declares its conviction that such a policy is directly responsible for the prolongation of the War. So there you are! Archdeacon Wakeford says God kept the War going to spiritually benefit us, and the Inverary Presbytery says God is prolonging it on account of our desecration of the Sabbath. And these gentry are all exempt on the ground of their being indispensable to the welfare of the nation.

"The revelation of the aloofness of the majority of young men from the Church, especially the soldiers in the cities," was driving the Church into conference, said the Rev. Dr. Ogilvie at a Church conference in Glasgow. We wonder what they expect as a result of their conference? They can't really throw the old religion overboard without throwing themselves with it. And it is quite certain that the younger generations are drawing away from the old creed. It would be quite fitting if this old man's War killed the old man's religion, and so left the world clearer and sweeter for the younger generation.

The Rev. Dr. J. M. Littlejohn, of Thundersley, Essex, says Christianity will no longer be the religion of material forms. Perhaps he will advise his congregations to abstain from singing "Oh! for the pearly gates of heaven, Oh! for the golden floor."

Transatlantic Spiritualists profess to have held a conversation with Mark Twain in "heaven," and the great humorist is stated to have said, "I hope they won't throw me out." It sounds too good to be true, unless the other "Mark," who wrote one of the Gospels, was jealous.

Twenty thousand State schoolmasters are serving in the Army and Navy, but the 50,000 clergymen are exempted from military service. And now some of the parsons are attempting to take the place of the school teachers. Thus the instruction of the rising generation is likely to be entrusted to men "too proud to fight."

From The Autobiography of an Irish Octogenarian, by J. F. Fuller, F.S.A. (1916), p. 121. "The Rev. Augustus Toplady, philosophical Calvinist, who went carefully into the matter, says that, because we always fall short of that perfection which God requires, we commit a sin every second, so that at ten years old a man might reckon on a debit account against him of 315,036,000, and an octogenarian, like myself, on 2,510,288,000."

"The religious instruction given in Elementary and Secondary Council Schools, in Roman Catholic and Anglican Schools, is still in the pre-Darwinian stage," says the Rev. R. Roberts. Pre-Darwinian! Such stories as those of "Adam and Eve," "Noah's Ark," "Jonah and the Whale," are nearer the Stone Age than the Victorian era.

"To-morrow the issue will be between Christ and utter Paganism," says the Rev. R. J. Campbell. Dear, Dear! And Christ has been dead two thousand years, and to-morrow never comes.

The Rev. Dr. Westwood, of Winnipeg, says that Colonel Ingersoll "was one of the greatest servants religion ever had." Indeed! The Colonel laughed at the mistakes of Moses, but Dr. Westwood and his colleagues get their living by retailing them.

A foreigner was charged at Bow Street with begging and failing to register as an alien. The defendant denied all knowledge of the War. He reminds us of those dear Christians who have never heard of evolution.

Cardinal Gibbons says Jesus was not a pacifist. Prodigious! Catholics are not encouraged to read the Bible, but a Cardinal might look at it now and then.

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

April 8, Swansea.

To Correspondents.

A. Millar.—We do not of necessity endorse the opinions of all our contributors, but so long as what they say is worth the saying, it is the wisest policy for an editor to "keep the ring" and give them all a free hand. Glad you find our "Views and Opinions" to your liking.

G. Lawrence writes that on Sunday afternoon, April 22, at 3.15, the Vicar of Willesden is opening a "Conference" on "Why I believe in God," and suggests that some Freethinkers might like to attend and "confer."

Mr. J. A. Cross writes: "I am pleased to say that although I have been in five different battalions since I joined the Army, I have always enjoyed religious liberty, and no responsible officer has wished to force me to attend church." We are very pleased to hear this, and regard it as complimentary to both Mr. Cross and to his officers.

C. E. Ratcliffe.—The whole of the Freethinker is a reply to your question of what are we doing to counteract the growth of Spiritualism. It is possible to spend too much time on side issues, or in pursuit of a passing hobby, and so overlook the main issue.

S. H. Haysman.—It is rather exasperating for an Atheist who has reached his position after serious thought to be looked down upon by a professed Christian who has never, perhaps, devoted five consecutive minutes to thinking about his religion. The only remedy is to treat such superior persons with the contempt they deserve.

National Secular Society (Manchester Branch).—All applicants for membership are requested to attend a meeting at 7.30 on Monday, April 16, at the Merchants' Hotel, Oldham Street, for the purpose of electing officers and discussing future work.

E. Robertshaw.—We read Bronterre O'Brien's book many years ago, and our present impression of it is that it was an able work, but hardly deserved the rank of a first-rate authority. Certainly Robespierre did not deserve the character of a "bloodthirsty barbarian" given him by orthodox historians. One must allow for the English prejudice against the French Revolution.

L.—We agree with you as to the evil of taking the early morning hour, when the children are freshest for imparting the religious lesson. One day, when people are tired of discussing the various "rights" connected with education, they may commence considering the rights of the child.

Eric A. MacDonld.—We deeply regret to hear of the loss of your brother in France. It is pitiful to see so many promising careers cut short in this barbaric contest. It is the death of such as your brother that constitutes the vital wastage of the war. Thanks for good wishes and congratulations on the upkeep of the Freethinker.

H. J. Baylis.—Mr. Arthur Machen writes very interesting newspaper articles, but we do not think any competent person is likely to take him as an authority on philosophical subjects. The man who thinks he has disproved Hume's wise counsel to treat with suspicion doctrines favoured by our passions, by taking it as analogous to the attraction offered by food to a hungry man, has nearly reached the limit of banality. And for Mr. Machen to say that Huxley believed in the "absolute justice of things" is to say that which is the reverse of the truth.

E. B.—We are very pleased to have your opinion. You will see from our last issue why we do not adopt the plan of raising the price of the paper, and we hope the reasons there given will appeal to you as adequate.

F. B. G.—Thanks. Will use as soon as we can make room. The amount of good "copy" we have in hand makes us long for a paper double the size of the present one.

Keridon.—Hope to publish next week.

W. C. Holt.—We quite fail to see anything more in a "sense of connection with the Divine" than a refinement of theology. The sense of a connection with something greater than one's own individual existence is no more than an expression of the social side of human nature.

S. Harding.—Thanks for congratulations, but we are not yet out of the wood, and so do not feel inclined to crow very loudly. But if we do get out unscathed, we really feel we shall be entitled to one good, loud "Cock-a-doodle-doo!" And we believe our readers will be pleased to hear it.

J. G. Bartram.—Pleased to hear there is a promise of renewed activity on Tyneside. Will consider your suggestion re pamphlet.

H. G. Farmer.—Your letter reached us too late for this week's issue.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (April 8) Mr. Cohen lectures in the Elysium Hall, High Street, Swansea, at 3 o'clock. His subject is "Will Christianity Survive the War?" and judging by his previous experience in Swansea there should be no fear as to the success of the meeting. There are reserved seats at 1s. and 6d., with a silver collection in other parts. Tickets may be obtained at 60 Alexandra Road, Swansea. Those willing to assist at the meeting should send their names to same address.

In the evening, at 6.30, Mr. Cohen will meet all the local friends interested in Freethought propaganda, with a view to founding a Branch of the N.S.S. in Swansea. It should be a good centre for such a movement.

To the books offered for sale by the Pioneer Press, there has just been added one of more than passing interest. The criminal prosecution of animals, with all the elaborate formulæ of an ordinary trial, and their subsequent execution with all the formalities accompanying the execution of human beings, offers one of the most curious of superstitions that flourished during the Mediæval period. Such studies as those presented by Mr. Evans in his Criminal Prosecution and Capital Punishment of Animals, sheds a strong light on the type of mind that for so long dominated Europe, and incidentally enlightens us concerning many surviving superstitions. The book was originally published by Messrs. Heinemann at 7s. 6d. net. It is now offered at 2s., postage extra.

We have received from the Vicar of Bromyard a rejoinder to Mr. Lloyd's article dealing with the former's criticism, which, we regret, did not reach us in time for insertion in this week's issue. It will appear in our next.

An unexpected result from one of our readers on the "Paper Famine":—

Dear Editor, the "Paper Famine" should make papers thinner.
The Freethinker, however, might be brought out on "Tissue."
No "Food Controller" interferes to stop my mental dinner,
Which satisfies and pleases more with every weekly issue.
You bravely fight that fear of death, from which most men are shrinkers,
And show how "Man for Man" is best to help us on through life;
You prove the utter fearlessness of genuine "Freethinkers."
So keep on thinner paper, as "Cartridges" mean Strife.

Digitized by Google

An Amazing Flight.

As Easter approaches the minds of Christians are, naturally, turned towards the incredible story of the crucifixion and the substantial symbol of hot cross buns; their thoughts are also centred on the equally incredible stories of the resurrection and ascension of their Lord and Master Jesus. Most of them seem never to have heard the theory of Jesus being nothing more than a sun myth, the whole story of his existence being related in the most remarkable manner to each phase assumed in the twelve signs of the zodiac.

But incredible and contradictory as the stories of the crucifixion and resurrection are, as narrated in the Gospels, the story of the alleged ascension of Jesus into heaven is no less difficult of belief to any person who relies upon reason and experience as his guide in such matters. According to the Bible story, Jesus, after having had a personal interview with his disciple Thomas, who would not believe in the resurrection unless he had ocular proof that the resurrected Jesus was the same person who was crucified, dead, and buried, and would not believe in the story unless he could feel the wound-prints—a few days afterwards, Jesus ascended bodily into heaven. But where is heaven? Nobody knows. If, however, you ask the first Christian you meet, he will, without hesitation, tell you that heaven is somewhere "up above." But if you tell him that there really is no up above, that the question of position is purely relative, that what is up above in England is down below in Australia, he will merely shake his head and say that "heaven is somewhere above the stars," but where precisely he cannot say. But if, when Jesus ascended, he was only going somewhere above the fixed stars, if he travelled at sixty miles an hour, he would not have reached his destination yet, and he would have had to stop several times on the way for refreshments. Is such a statement as that blasphemy? Surely a material body, whether on the earth at rest, or in rapid movement in the heavens, needs some kind of material food to replenish its lost energies? During the past two years and a half, I have seen scores of aeroplanes in flight. Some of them go at great speed, the latest going at something approaching one hundred miles an hour; but such a speed cannot be maintained without an adequate supply of petrol. During the past two years I have seen several Zeppelins in flight. They can attain a great altitude; but let them fly never so high they could not reach the nearest fixed star; in fact, if they only went up about thirty miles, the atmosphere would become so rarified that the occupants could not possibly breathe. But Jesus, the Christian will tell us, went up without the aid of a machine; he did not even require the aid of wings. He simply glided along, and ascended up and up, until he was lost to the wondering gaze of mankind. If Jesus thus ascended where was he going? Did he not know that the universe was practically without limit? If he did not know it, he was not God, and if he did, what was the object of his journey? Was it merely to mystify his followers?

When I was a boy I was a witness of a very extraordinary performance. I saw a "flying man." A gentleman, who evidently believed himself capable of doing something out of the ordinary—essayed to fly in the air. He manufactured a machine with wings, let himself up into the air by the aid of a balloon, and all of a sudden cut himself free, and flew for a minute or two in the air, when, one of the wings failing to act, he was precipitated headlong to the earth beneath, and was taken up a mangled and bloody corpse. Yes, I saw him fly, and thousands of other people in various parts of London witnessed the spectacle. Many of them, no doubt, are still alive, and would be willing, if necessary, to swear or affirm that they saw a man fly with the aid of some artificial wings.

Well, now, if Jesus ascended into heaven, his ascent must have been witnessed by thousands of spectators. Yet who saw him fly?

Profane historians are silent about an occurrence which, if it happened, was one of the most extraordinary in all history. Why do they not mention it? Because it never took place. The story is pure fiction. If we turn to the Gospels we shall discover that neither Matthew, Mark, Luke, nor John was an eye-witness of the ascension. Indeed, Matthew says nothing about it. John is equally silent, while Mark and Luke merely declare that when Jesus had finished talking to his disciples, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. All this is strange indeed, and, if we wished to be hypercritical, we might say that as God is now represented as a Spiritual Being, he had no hands, either right or left, to sit upon, or to sit by the side of. We may, however, reasonably ask whether Jesus in the flesh was able to defy the law of gravitation, and ascend as easily as ordinary mortals fall to the ground?

According to the Bible, Elijah did a similar flight to heaven hundreds of years before Jesus made his appearance on the earth. And his ascent was even more sensational than that of Jesus. For when Elijah was about to do "the vanishing trick," there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven. And, like Jesus, he never came down again; he went travelling on through space for ever and ever. Some theologians say that although Jesus showed himself to his disciples after the resurrection it was not in a material body; it was "in a glorified body," whatever that may mean, that he appeared, and then disappeared. But how are we to know "a glorified body" when we see one? The doubting disciple Thomas evidently thought that the body of Jesus was material enough, otherwise he would not have demanded to thrust his hand into the wounded side of his Master, or to have felt the wound-prints made by the nails that fixed him to the cross.

The rational explanation of these stories is less ingenious and more straightforward than that of the Christian. It is easy to understand how years after Jesus had mingled with the dust—assuming that he ever existed—his followers invented the story of his resurrection and ascension, how expecting and desiring a Messiah who should save them from the Roman yoke, the early Jewish Christians manufactured these legends of a risen and ascended Redeemer who was soon to return and restore the kingdom of Israel.

When it is further remembered that the world was already familiar with legends of the sun-gods, who rose again from the death of winter to midsummer glory, it will be seen how easily the ignorant masses could be persuaded to exchange Osiris or Adonis for Jesus of Nazareth.

Arthur B. Moss.

The Monarch of Cereals.

II.

(Continued from p. 204.)

At the season of sowing, soon after the seed is scattered over the soil, the wheat grass commences to sprout. The grain sends forth a root called the radicle, and the appearance of this is succeeded by two secondary roots, and the three together form the seminal or temporary attachments. This root group usually penetrates to an inch below the surface, and from these, in their turn, develop whorls of permanent roots. The roots at the base of the plant grow directly downwards, while lateral roots spread sideways through the surrounding soil for a short distance, and then dip down into the earth. The main roots will descend to a depth of from four to six feet in search of moisture, but beyond this distance there is no appreciable growth, although a depth of seven feet is on record. The root arrangements are elaborate, and it has been proved that if the appendages of a single plant were placed end to end they would measure a length of 1,704 feet. And while mean soil is very unfavourable to the well being of the roots, copious spring and summer showers promote shallow rooting, while dry conditions impel the plant to send its roots deep into the soil. From seed to harvest the life of the cereal is a constant series of chemical transformations. Its several food materials are mineral substances such as potash, phosphate, lime, and magnesia salts, and these, in company with nitrogenous compounds, and its indispensable water, are secured from the soil, while the whole of the carbon is obtained from the atmosphere. The complex workshop in which all the food stuffs of the wheat are fabricated is the leaf. The various substances prepared in the green leaf are ultimately stored in the grain as nutrient matter for the wheat of the ensuing year. Acted upon by light, the leaves absorb carbonic acid from the air. This they decompose, and while eliminating the contained oxygen, they construct from the residue of the acid sugar, cellulose, and all their other compounds composed of oxygen, hydrogen, and carbon. Every part of the plant is penetrated by a network of canals which contain water that is sucked up by the roots from the soil. The leaves themselves—the breathing organs of plants—absorb little moisture. And the water filling the canals, which circulates through the plant, much as the blood moves in the animal body, is in constant motion until it is exhaled by the leaves. And just as an animal is sustained by the blood stream, so, along these channels of flowing water are distributed the raw materials utilized in the plant's cell factories for its life and growth. In seasons of warm rain the cells toil ceaselessly, produce rapidly, and the plant grows fast.

Digitized by Google

A further resemblance to animal metabolism is furnished by the fact that wheat cultivated on suitable soils in the northern hemisphere where there is a brief but rapid period of growth, produces an abundance of glutinous substances and a smaller amount of starch than when raised on more parsimonious land, and in countries where the season of growth is longer. In young and growing creatures muscle and bone develop when the animals are properly fed. Surplus food supplied to developing organisms leads to the production of fat, and the super nourishment proves deleterious to the animals. And with our cereal the initial stages of growth are chiefly concerned with the elaboration of the chemical compounds corresponding to the bony and muscular framework of the animal organism, while the later stages are devoted largely to the evolution of starch, which is analogous to the fattening processes of the animal. Now, if the normal growth of wheat is in any way obstructed, its kernels appear prematurely, and form poor material for man's sustenance. Well grown and ripened wheat is highly nutritious, containing 67 per cent. of carbo-hydrates, 13 per cent. of albuminoids, in company with small quantities of such mineral substances as soda and potash, all immensely beneficial to body and brain, while its average water content is only 14 per cent. The quantity of moisture in wheat, however, varies very considerably. As a rule such fluctuations do not exceed 6 per cent., but, in special circumstances, they may reach 25 per cent. As Hunt has noted:—

> When wheat is shipped, especially if it is transported long distances, this may be a matter of great commercial importance. Wheat transported from the dry atmosphere of the inland of California to ordinary temperate regions will invariably gain from 5 to 15 per cent. in weight. In a voyage from San Francisco to Liverpool the increase in weight due to moisture absorbed en route may be sufficient to pay all expenses of transportation. Every portion of the wheat grain is so susceptible to influence from hydroscopic conditions that all the products of wheat exhibited similar oscillations in weight. Two days equalized the moisture content in samples of flour varying from less than 8 to over 13 per cent.

Gluten is one of the most valuable ingredients of wheat. This substance is composed of several nitrogenous elements, and the wheat loaf owes its supreme quality to the special properties of gluten which confer its digestible character as well as its lightness. In these respects wheaten bread ranks higher than loaves prepared from any other cereal. But in very white bread many of these invaluable nitrogenous ingredients have been discarded because they coarsen the appearance of the loaf. The almost universal fashion in pre-war days was to prize the tasteless and innutritious, starchy snowlike bread despite the plain truth that whole-meal or even standard bread is better for the brain, body, blood, and bowels. The genuine brown loaf was too unprepossessing in appearance, and much too rough in texture for the modern fastidious palate.

Contrary to common opinion wheat is a flowering plant. Some evolutionary botanists regard it as a degraded lily. The spike, which at maturity, bears the golden grain, may be observed in the opening stages of the plant's growth, and it develops within a hollow stem. As Edgar states in his Story of a Grain of Wheat:—

> As the plant grows and larger leaves are produced, the earlier leaves become less active and give up their substance to the plant, the heads are unwrapped from their leafy covering and the grain passes through the various ripening stages to maturity. The blossoming stage is one of the most interesting periods in the development of the plant. The floret is complete in itself having all the parts and organs of an ordinary flower, including ovule, stamens, pistils, filaments, anthers, and pollen.

Cross-fertilization occurs with comparative rareness in wheat, which is essentially a self-pollinating plant. At the flowering season, the male organs—the anthers—are thrust upwards and burst, when their contained pollen grains are showered upon the stigma. This represents the normal process of wheat reproduction; but occasionally a few pollen grains become scattered, and the inconspicuous flowers expand sufficiently to permit the male element of one plant to fertilize the female organs of another.

Among the civilized peoples of antiquity, the culture of wheat reached a moderate stage of efficiency; but with the decline and fall of Pagan power, agricultural darkness descended on the face of Europe. During the Christian Middle Ages, in the words of Professor Dondlinger, "agriculture ebbed to the lowest degree of respectability. It was revived by the Saracens of Spain, and by their successors, the Moors, and it was carried to a height perhaps not surpassed in Europe before the last quarter of the nineteenth century." This is one only of several instances of the reintroduction of civilizing agencies into a Church-cursed continent by a non-Christian race. Scientific husbandry is a quite recent institution, and the constitutionally conservative farmer is now being drawn into line with the advancing activities of the age. The progressive tiller of the earth no longer attaches any real importance to prayers for sunshine or for rain, or willingly pays the priest to bless his cattle or crops. To again quote Dondlinger, the modern agriculturist "no longer relies for information upon the elucidations of subtle shamans revealing the will of elusive, evasive, and ever-vanishing gods, creations of the fancy. In nearly every civilized country of the world he is supported by scientifically grounded institutions."

Digitized by Google

(To be continued.) T. F. Palmer.

Evil and God.

The existence of evil in a world said to be the work of a perfectly good being, unlimited in knowledge and power, who continues to sustain and direct what he has made, has always presented a serious problem to the theologian. It is, moreover, the crux of Theism for the man-in-the-street. Metaphysical arguments for and against the existence of God generally leave him puzzled, but "of the same opinion still," whatever that opinion may happen to be. A sense of unreality attaches, from his point of view, to idealistic and materialistic controversies alike. He is inclined to agree with Byron that "when Bishop Berkeley said there was no matter, it really didn't matter what he said." But confront him with the query, "If God can prevent suffering and sin, why does he not do so?" and at once the argumentation of Atheism against Theism assumes a human glow, and takes philosophy out of the region of academic studies.

It is best to put the issue in the simplest form by way of homely illustration. A group of pious enthusiasts are holding an evangelistic meeting at a street corner. By the aid of a melancholy harmonium and untuneful voices they are seeking to persuade the passer-by that God watches over and cares for every one. "Father-like, he tends and spares us, well our feeble frame he knows, in his hands he gently bears us, rescues us from all our foes"—that is what they are singing. How soothing and consoling for those who, unlike George Eliot, are only too willing to "take opium"! But presently a tiny girl breaks away from her fond mother and rushes into the middle of the crowded road. Before it is possible to attempt to save her a motor-car has knocked her down and crushed and mutilated her poor little body; and what had been so beautiful but a few moments before has become revolting ugliness. Can the stout withers of orthodoxy remain unwrung in the teeth of such a challenge to its affirmation that "God's in his heaven, all's right with the world"? Will the evangelists of the street corner venture to sing over the baby's corpse "Father-like, he tends and spares her"? Will they tell the weeping mother that the "Friend of little children" has graciously permitted a piece of soulless mechanism to run over one of them?

"Well our feeble frame he knows." The words have a devilish ring about them for one who candidly faces the world as it is, refusing to deceive himself with the coloured spectacles of theology. Yes, the omnipotent "Father" knows "our feeble frame" so well that he has furnished the world with an infinity of hideous contrivances for inflicting tortures surpassing those of the Spanish Inquisition. Kepler prayed that he might think God's thoughts after him. If Kepler's prayer had been granted and Kepler's thoughts had become deeds, what should we have said of Kepler as a man? If the lamb is an actualized thought of God, so must the tiger be. If God is smiling in the morning light, he must also be frowning in the storm-cast sky. If Florence Nightingale is the expression of God's love, must not Catherine de' Medici be the expression of God's hate? Did the "Friend of little children" design the fiendish brain of Gilles de Retz, the violator and torturer of little children? Or was it the Devil who did so? Who, then, designed the Devil? And why, as Man Friday asked Robinson Crusoe, does not God kill the Devil?

There is any amount of beating-about-the-bush in the various attempts to handle this question. Numbers of theological "red herrings" are made to do service in obscuring the real issue. Nor do the apologists of Freethought always go straight to the bed-rock of the matter.

A favourite "red herring" is to try to strike a balance in favour of Omnipotence, and to urge that the preponderance of good over evil is greatly to the Divine credit. As though it were a question of less or more! Omnipotent goodness is as much compromised by a single evil as by a billion evils. Other theologians argue that evil is a mere shadow, or only a lesser degree of good. But they do not act as if they felt so. Then we are told that evil is the necessary condition of good, that the one implies the other. This is quite true, but it proves too much—for the theologian. If evil is the necessary condition of good, it is as eternal as good, that is, on theological premises, as eternal as God. Ahriman must be inseparable from Ormuzd.

It may be said that a universe without evil, if, indeed, such is conceivable, would be insipid. I agree. Heaven is the quintessence of boredom. One would wish for a "lost soul" to come and introduce a spice of wickedness into the interminable angelic tea-party from time to time.

> You bid me lift my mean desires
> From faltering lips and throbbing veins
> To seraph souls, ideal choirs,
> Unwearied voices, wordless strains.
> My mind with fonder welcome owns
> One dear, dead friend's remembered tones.

Man does not want to get rid of evil; he wants to get rid of evils. Evil is a valuation. So, too, is good. Nor do we all value in the same way. The progress of civilization involves a continual "transvaluation of all values"—Nietzsche's pregnant phrase—and what is this but a continual creation, or rather re-creation of good and evil? The disappearance of evil from human society is quixotic nonsense, although some "advanced" persons, who think themselves emancipated from theology, profess to be working to bring this about. The raising of the conflict between good and evil to higher and higher planes, the increasing enrichment of life—an enrichment that involves immorality as well as morality (I speak as unto wise men)—that is a reasonable hope and a reasonable task.

The realization of the fact that good and evil are valuations, human points of view, and not qualities inherent in things or persons, proves the futility of arguing that one bulks larger than the other. There is just as much good and evil in the world as we feel there is. Weights and measures have no meaning in this connection. If good and evil are just valuing, what does this imply? Simply two different types of reaction to stimuli. If I feel aught to be good, my will goes out to it, accepts it, and seeks to assimilate it. If, on the other hand, I feel it to be evil, my will is by that very fact conscious of limitation, frustration, injury, and is impelled by its own nature to seek to subdue or destroy the hurtful person or thing. That we are not, in every case, aware of striving for a good or against an evil shows only the difference between what John Henry Newman termed notional assent and real assent, between an attitude determined by convention and an attitude determined by imagination and sympathy. The real scale of values for the individual is measured by the degree of volitional response that is evoked in each case as it arises.

To believe in good and evil is to take sides. Mr.

Digitized by Google

Balfour, in his Gifford Lectures on Theism, published a few years ago, asserted that he believed in a God who "takes sides." He was logical in doing so. A personal creator must "take sides." Creation means selection, and personality means preference. But how all this is consistent with the attribution of omnipotence and infinity to God has never been made clear. "Taking sides," valuing in terms of good and evil, selecting this and rejecting that, are ideas implying limitation, and the sense of obstacles to be overcome. We discover, then, that the God of the modern Theist has a limited infinity, and is conscious of hindrances to his omnipotence! To state the position frankly and clearly is to abandon it.

Is our evil God's good? If so, how can there be a moral tie between us and him? To say that evil might vanish for us, if only we could view everything sub specie æternitatis, is virtually to admit that evil is relative, and this implies that good is relative. The transcendental standpoint must needs reduce both to nullity. But, in sooth, to use such a phrase as "transcendental standpoint" is to indulge in a counter-sense. Unfortunately, that is what all theistic argumentation and definition finally reduce themselves to. The apologist for God seeks to conjoin infinity with personality, goodness with omnipotence, will and intelligence with freedom from limitations. He seems unable to see that he is piously engaged in destroying the very doctrine that he is out to defend against Atheism. The Atheist, as such, is not committed to any counter-construction. It is sufficient for him to point out that the modern theologian, no less than the Freethinker, rejects as absurd the more anthropomorphic ideas of deity that have flourished and continue to flourish among peoples of lower culture, while the theologian's own alternative to all this concrete mythology falls, not by the test of evidence, but by the test of analysis. To refute Theism one need only try to make it perfectly consistent.

A. D. Howell Smith.

Stories Concerning Authority.

By "Multatuli" (Eduard Douwes Dekker).

I.

Socrates.

Socrates was a presumptuous fool, and the Athenians did well to condemn him to death. But in my opinion, they let him off too lightly. Mere death is not in itself a severe punishment. Everyone must die, even those who have never done a good action in the whole course of their lives. It was flagrantly unjust that a man who had given the whole of his energy to the public good should have the same sentence as the the most insignificant of imbeciles. The Athenians were in too much of a hurry, just as the Jews were when.....

But now let us see what Plutarch says: "In Athens the accused, when he was brought before the judges, generally defended himself in beautifully rounded sentences, and tried to draw sympathy by tears and supplication. Socrates disdained to use such means....."

I have already remarked that Socrates was a fool.

"In his simple defence he called their attention to the facts of his life, which were well known to everyone....."

Surely but another piece of fatuous simplicity! Evidently he thought they would be interested in what he had done. That, without a doubt, was nothing to the point, O Socrates! You should have said: I am "liberal" or "conservative," according to the fashion of the day; you should have talked about your religion, "orthodox" or "modernist"; you should have proclaimed your adherence to such or such principles; you should have sustained some thesis or other, always following the fashion of the moment. It was there that you went astray. Plutarch was right when he said your defence was simple. It was even less than simple—it was silly.

Well! he continued his defence by talking about his life. But Plutarch tells us: "This form of pleading found no favour in the eyes of his judges who condemned him to death....."

You will notice here the foolish weakness of the Athenians, who, as wretched Pagans, were ignorant of the beneficent effects of Christian torture.

"In accordance with the Athenian custom, the accused was allowed to indicate the punishment which he considered he had merited. This question being put to Socrates, he declared that he had as much right to be kept at the expense of the State as any victor in the Olympian games....."

Now, are you inclined to quarrel with me for calling Socrates a fool? Why, he hadn't the faintest shadow of Christian humility! Is it any wonder that "by this reply he only irritated his judges"?

How amusing it must have been to hear a man claiming a reward when his judges had made up their minds to condemn him to death without any unnecessary formalities! Surely their irritation is pardonable enough. "Many of them who at first had spoken against the sentence of death, now voted for it. He was condemned....."

So much for Plutarch's narrative. It must be said that this dry-as-dust historian has not a single word of praise for these irritated and angry judges.

I fancy that he must have been "liberal" and the judges "conservative," or vice versa. For in Greece they never praised anyone who belonged to the opposite party.

—Ideas (1862-1874).

(Translated by) Geo. Underwood.

National Secular Society.

Report of Executive Meeting held on March 29.

The President, Mr. C. Cohen, in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Baker, Bowman, Brandes, Gorniot, Leat, Lazarnick, Neate, Neary, Quinton, Roger, Samuels, Thurlow, Wood, Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, and the Secretary.

Minutes of last meeting read and confirmed. Monthly cash statement presented and adopted.

New members were admitted for Birmingham, Liverpool, North London, South London, and the Parent Society.

The death of Mrs. M. E. Pegg, Vice-President of the N.S.S. and Secretary of the Manchester Branch, was formally reported, and a letter of condolence ordered to be written to the family.

The President reported the result of his attendance at a specially summoned meeting of the Manchester Branch. In view of the special circumstances, a fresh start was considered desirable. It was then formally resolved: "That the present Manchester Branch be, and hereby is, dissolved." The application for the formation of a new Branch at Manchester was granted.

A letter from the L.C.C. solicitor, declining further information as to the reasons for the withdrawal of permits, was read, and the proceedings of the last meeting of the Protest Committee reported.

Invitations and suggestions from Branches for the holding of the Annual Conference on Whit-Sunday were read, but no definite arrangement could be made at that stage in consequence of the difficulty in procuring a suitable hall. It was finally resolved: "That in the event of the present negotiations falling through, the matter be left in the hands of the President and Secretary."

Outdoor propaganda was discussed at some length.

Digitized by Google

The President called attention to the press reports of the illegal and insulting treatment of a citizen who desired to affirm, and from the chair moved the following resolution:—

> That this Executive, having had brought to its notice the case of a witness in the Clydebank Police Court on March 12, in which the witness was denied his legal right of affirmation, and treated as an offender by the officials present, resolves to call the attention of the Secretary for Scotland to the matter, with a view to eliciting an expression of opinion from him regarding the conduct of the officials, and to prevent the recurrence of such incidents in the future.

The Secretary was instructed to write, calling the attention of the Chief Secretary for Scotland and other responsible officials to the matter. E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

N.B.—In order that the strongest possible protest may be made against the action of the officials of the Clydebank Police Court on March 12, who debarred a witness from his right as a citizen to make an affirmation, friends in the neighbourhood who are in possession of further facts, or who are willing to take some little trouble to ascertain them, are earnestly invited to at once communicate with me. The strictest confidence will be preserved.—E. M. V.

At a Graveside.

(E., ob. Easter Eve, 1916.)

I.

Could wizard tune or sainted vehemence
Bid pitiful life its wonted days resume,
I, for thine own dear sake, would bid thee hence,
Yield not, O never more, the kinder tomb;
Yea, though the Trumpet bray to better birth,
Stay—the Best-possible bore tragic Earth.

II.

Son, thy grave-fellow, I shall perish here,
Fearless, familiar, native where thou art;
The coil of conscious change shall disappear,
And from the living whole no Self dispart:
Immortal Evil doles one grace supreme—
Last nothingness without perchance of dream.

Nevil Bourn.

Obituary.

We regret to announce the death, at the residence of his son, Mr. Victor Collins, 60, Queen's Road, Finsbury Park, on Friday morning, March 23rd, of Councillor John Collins, of Crispin Street, Spitalfields. The deceased gentleman, who was seventy-four years of age, was a very well known and respected public man in East London. He was an ardent Radical in politics, and a zealous advocate of freedom of thought and speech. He never concealed either his political or his religious opinions, and he openly avowed his Freethought. He was an enthusiastic follower of Charles Bradlaugh, of whom he always spoke in strong terms of admiration and affection. Universally respected, he was known as "Honest John." He was a member of the Stepney Borough Council from the time of its inauguration, and before that had been a member of the old Spitalfields Vestry. He was also recently elected to a vacancy on the Whitechapel Board of Guardians. The doctor who attended him in his last illness, himself a Freethinker, was specially struck by the strength of his views. Conscious and in full possession of his keen intellect to the last, he upheld his convictions to the end without wavering or faltering. The fear of death was not in him; and his last expressed wish was that a Secular Service should be read over him, a wish which was faithfully carried out. We offer the bereaved family our sincere condolence and sympathy.—J. T. L.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

Mr. Howell Smith's Discussion Class (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Thursday, April 12, at 7.30.

Hyde Park: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Kells and Dales; 6.15, Messrs. Hyatt and Yates.

Caxton Hall (Westminster): April 11, at 8, Social or Lecture.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

Swansea (Elysium Hall, High Street): 3, Chapman Cohen, "Will Christianity Survive the War?"

English Educational Endowments, by Wilkins and Fallows; price 6d.—Workers' Educational Association, 14 Red Lion Square, London, W.C.

92 pp., cloth, 1s. net, by post 1s. 3d.; paper cover, 6d. net, by post 8d.

THE DARKNESS, THE DAWN, and THE DAY

By J. C. THOMAS, B.Sc. ("Keridon"),

Author of "Man: The Prodigy and Freak of Nature."

The late Mr. G. W. Foote wrote to the Author: "Your book requires no introduction; why did you get a Foreword written for it? Its excellence is the only reason why I have not yet reviewed it."

London: WATTS & CO., 17 Johnson's Court, Fleet St., E.C. 4.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

Post Free Three Halfpence.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,

Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster, S.W.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Penny flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in colour; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 6d. Scarf-pin, 8d. Postage in Great Britain 1d. Small reduction on not less than one dozen. Exceptional value.—From Miss E. M. Vance, General Secretary, N. S. S., 62 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.
G. E. MACDONALD - - - - Editor.
L. K. WASHBURN - - Editorial Contributor.

Subscription Rates:

Single subscription in advance - - -	$3.00
Two new subscribers - - - - -	5.00
One subscription two years in advance -	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra. Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.

Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 Vesey Street, New York, U.S.A.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(Postage ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C. 4.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C. 4.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp ...	... post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 58 pp.	,, 1d.	0	3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	3
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Maugasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 82 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 82 pp.	Nett. ,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.

By H. C. Lea.

In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

This is the Third and Revised Edition, 1907, of the Standard and Authoritative Work on Sacerdotal Celibacy. Since its issue in 1867 it has held the first place in the literature of the subject, nor is it likely to lose that position.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.

An Elementary Treatise on a Realistic Religion and Philosophy of Human Life.

By E. A. Ashcroft.

440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

Mr. Ashcroft writes from the point of view of a convinced Freethinker, and deals with the question of Man and the Universe in a thoroughly suggestive manner.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.

By Carveth Read.

Professor of Philosophy in the University of London.

8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

A Fine Exposition of Morals from the standpoint of a Rationalistic Naturalism.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.

By D. B. Hart, M.D.

Crown 8vo. 1910. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

An Examination of Evolution as affecting Heredity, Disease, Sex, Religion, etc. With Notes, Glossary, and Index.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.

By J. S. Mill.

Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

There is no need to praise Mill's Essays on Nature, The Utility of Religion, and Theism. The work has become a Classic in the History of Freethought. No greater attack on the morality of nature and the God of natural theology has ever been made than in this work.

Recent Acquisitions.

WILLIAM HONE: HIS LIFE AND TIMES.

By F. W. Hackwood.

Large 8vo. With numerous Plates. Published 10s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

William Hone was one of the group of Radical Reformers who played so conspicuous a part in the battle for free speech and a free press in the early part of the nineteenth century. The accounts of his trial before Mr. Justice Abbott and Lord Ellenborough for publishing parodies of the Athanasian Creed and the Lord's Prayer are of interest to all Freethinkers.

THE ENGLISH WOMAN: STUDIES IN HER PSYCHIC EVOLUTION.

By D. Staars.

Published 9s. net. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

An Evolutionary and Historic Essay on Woman. With Biographical Sketches of Harriet Martineau, George Eliot, and others.

By the Hon. A. S. G. Canning.

INTOLERANCE AMONG CHRISTIANS.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

RELIGIOUS STRIFE IN BRITISH HISTORY.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 5d.

THE POLITICAL PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

The Three Volumes post free for 5s.

THE CRIMINAL PROSECUTION AND CAPITAL PUNISHMENT OF ANIMALS.

By E. P. Evans.

A Careful Study of one of the most curious of Mediæval Superstitious Practices. There is an Appendix of Documents which adds considerably to the value of the work. Published 1906. With Frontispiece.

384 pp. Published 7s. 6d. Price 2s., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?

By Chapman Cohen.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

Cloth, 1s. 9d. (now binding).

By the same Author.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY.

Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS.

Price 1d., postage ½d.

A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY. OF FREETHINKERS.

By J. M. Wheeler.

Price 3s. net, postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.

By G. W. Foote and W. P. Ball.

For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.

By G. W. Foote.

First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.

By J. M. Wheeler.

Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Printed and Published by The Pioneer Press (G. W. Foote and Co., Ltd.), 61, Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 15 SUNDAY APRIL 15, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
Christendom and the War.—The Editor	225
The Roots of the Christian Tree.—J. T. Lloyd	226
The Funniest Book in the World.—Mimnermus	227
The Monarch of Cereals.—T. F. Palmer	228
The Red House on the Hill.—Meander	229
Holy Wars.—G. W. Foote	230
Letter to the Editor—Atheism in the French Revolution	230
Acid Drops	231
Pernicious Parodies.—Arthur F. Thorn	232
To Correspondents	233
Sugar Plums	233
The Right to Affirm	233
The French Revolution.—Robert Arch	234
Stories Concerning Authority.—Geo. Underwood	235
Strong Meekness.—Robert Moreland	236
Christianity the Symbolism of Factuality.—F. E. Powell	236
Obituary	237

Views and Opinions.

Christendom and the War.

The existence of a state of war between Germany and the United States brings all the great Christian nations of the world into the conflict. It is difficult to see how America could have remained outside much longer, the submarine warfare making its decision no more than an act of self-defence. Its influence on the War is likely to be as much moral as material, although in a war such as this one the moral factor is of more than usual importance. Still the situation is ghastly. Over nineteen centuries after the alleged birth of Christ, creator of the Gospel of the doctrine of human peace and brotherhood —to follow the orthodox legend—and three-fourths of the human race at war. And a war forced upon the world by Christians. That is the outstanding fact. Against the will of Christians no such War would be possible. The non-Christian peoples—Turkey, Japan, China—have admittedly been dragged into it through the action of the Christian nations of the world. And people ask: "Is Christianity a failure?" as though the question admitted of discussion. The War itself is proof of failure—failure unmistakable and complete.

* * *

A Blow at Nationalism.

One thing America's appearance in the War area has certainly done. It has put yet another nail in the coffin of the doctrine of the narrower form of Nationalism. Situated 3,000 miles away, it might have been thought that America could have stood apart from the War until the end. But the logic of events has been too powerful for that. The course of affairs have shown that American interests—moral and material—are not distinct from, and independent of, European interests. America can no more live a full life shut off from its 3,000 miles away neighbours than can any one of the countries of Europe. Inter-communion of ideas, interchange of commodities have robbed nations of their old-time independence. Such independence as is left is political only, and even that has its limits. The fact of one nation after another being dragged into the War, the kindred fact that the intense nationalism of Germany is blamed for the outbreak of War, is proof that as an end nationalism belongs to an order of ideas that have largely outlived their useful application to life. Nationalism leads direct to that deification of the State as the supreme end which finds its expression in the worst aspects of German political life. As a means to an end the conception of the State is tolerable. As an end in itself it is with civilized peoples wholly vicious. Against the conception of the State we must learn to place that of the community. For the State is exclusive—a closed circle. The community is expansive and inclusive. It expands as life expands; it includes all that ministers to the fullest human life. More than ever we are driven to the conception of an internationalism based upon co-operation, goodwill, and the fullest and freest exchange of all that ministers to human welfare.

* * *

Opportunist Christianity.

Let it be noted, and remembered for use after the War, that in not one of the belligerent countries have the Churches stood as a force for peace, restraint, or security. Statesmen may have wished for peace so long as it was possible for them to do so. The Churches everywhere remained passive and ineffective. And yet the chance was before them to play such a part as might have served to win some measure of respect from even their intellectual opponents. In a world at war they might have stood as the visible symbols of a doctrine of human fellowship and goodwill. That the world is at war, and the passion of ill-will of necessity rampant, did not make the need for their restraining influence less, but more. We do not mean that the clergy should have opposed the War, only that the more determined the nation was for war, the more united it was in the pursuit of the War, the greater the need for holding aloft those ethical ideals which run the risk of being trampled under foot during war, and which must be maintained and enforced if the world is to resume the march of civilization. As it is, thousands of Christians have experienced an almost unconscious revulsion at the belicose attitude of the Churches. Large numbers have, we are convinced, broken their connection with the Churches on that account. The Church had its chance during the War—and lost it. We are convinced it will pay the full price of its blunder when the War is over. It would have been wiser to have left war to the layman.

* * *

Christianity in Russia.

And of all the countries engaged in the War, the influence of the Church has been nowhere so evil as in Russia. For centuries the Christian Church in Russia has acted as the great instrument of the Government in the enslavement of the people. To keep the mass of the people drunken and pious was the policy, and to that policy the Church lent its full assistance. With sixty to seventy per cent. of the population unable to read or write, the task was not hard. But all students of Russia are aware that the tyranny of the Government would have been impossible but for the mental dragooning by the Church. And to all the evils committed by the late Russian Government since the outbreak of war—the pogroms of Jews, the outraging of defenceless peoples, the imprisonment of reformers—the Church gave its blessing. And that Church, it should never be forgotten, received the blessing of sloppy pietists like Mr. Stephen Graham, and empty-headed prelates like the Bishop of London. The new Russia will have yet to deal with the Church. Policy will demand—in view of the superstition of the people—caution; but we venture to predict that any reaction that is attempted will again have the support of the Russian Church. There is too great an element of freethinking among the leaders of the Revolution to leave doubt on that head.

Digitized by Google

* * *

"God's Justice"!

Meanwhile, our own Churches can only meet the catastrophe of the War, and its impeachment of Christianity, by the repetition of formulæ that are an insult to human intelligence. How ridiculous the Christian talk of "God's justice" and "Divine retribution" looks in the face of facts. Put it that Germany is wholly responsible for this War—not a very sensible or scientific view when one takes the records of all nations for the past century and a half. Or take the more defensible view that Germany is immediately responsible for the War, and add that of all Germany, the Kaiser and a small group with him are the responsible persons. How will "God's justice" work itself out? Suppose the Kaiser were dethroned, and the governing group in Germany destroyed. That may be justified on the ground of expediency, of punishment for evil done, of the need for protecting the world against similar outbreaks in the future. But what has justice, ethical justice, to do with all this? Over a large part of Europe thousands of peaceful homes have been ruined, myriads of peaceful lives destroyed, and the living left with a memory of such horrors as all of us only three years ago thought impossible in a civilized country. How can any punishment that either God or man may invent and inflict wipe out all this suffering and terror? Suppose hell be a fact instead of a myth, and that God will deal with these men in the after life. Will that make the matter better? The lives remain lost; the homes remain ruined; the wrong done remains done.

> The Moving Finger writes; and having writ,
> Moves on; nor all thy Piety nor Wit
> Shall lure it back to cancel half a Line
> Nor all thy tears wash out a word of it.

* * *

An Impeachment of Deity.

I know all the talk of the benefits that will accrue to civilization from the War, of the idealism that has sent the world's youth into it, of the cheerful spirit of sacrifice evoked. All of this—grossly exaggerated as it is—might be true, and still the pious jargon about "God's justice" remain viciously untrue. It is not they who have sacrificed who will reap the reward. We who remain reap whatever good may come from their death. The old, the young, the unborn, all may have cause to bless those who have laid down their lives in defence of freedom. This is a statement of fact, but it is not a justification of the process. Advance in civilization may be possible by no other method, and recognizing this we bow to the inevitable. The Atheist may do this without shame, but not the Theist. For he believes that lack of this process is a personal, intelligent, powerful, and loving God. He designed it; he set the process going, and now calmly watches its course. And it is man who steps in and tries by every means in his power to correct the iniquity of God's plan. Surely it should have been his place to prevent as it is man's ambition to redress? The burning, shell-ruined towns and villages of France and Belgium, the shattered homes and outraged women, and hecatombs of corpses, all constitute an indictment of the Kaiser and the Junker class. But still more strongly is it being borne in upon the minds of thousands of men and women that, if there is a God, the War is, above all, an indictment of him. "God's in his heaven; all's right with the world" will satisfy only those minds narcotized by an irrational creed. Rather is the world a picture of men killed and women outraged in a world governed by a God too omnipotent to rule or careless to intervene. And both the intellect and the humanity of man must sooner or later revolt against a deity of that description.

Chapman Cohen.

The Roots of the Christian Tree.

III.

Christianity was by no means the only religion that borrowed ideas and customs while it was being made, the fact being that practically all religions did the same on a larger or a smaller scale. Harnack is of opinion that Christianity was an unconscious borrower; but he frankly admits that it did "learn and borrow from many quarters," and that "it would be impossible to imagine it existing amid all the wealth and vigour of these religions, had it not drawn pith and flavour even from them." Then he adds:—

> These religions fertilized the ground for it, and the new grain and seed which fell upon that soil sent down its roots and grew to be a mighty tree. Here is a religion which embraces everything, and yet it can always be expressed in perfectly simple terms.....The Syncretism of this religion is further shown by its faculty for incorporating the most diverse nationalities—Parthians, Medes and Elamites, Greeks and barbarians. It laughed at the barriers of nationality (Expansion of Christianity, vol. i., p. 392).

Harnack goes so far as to state definitely that in Asia Minor, "more than in any other country, did Christianity amalgamate with Hellenism, with the result that an actual transition and interfusion took place, which, contrary to the development at Alexandria, affected, not merely religious philosophy, but all departments of human existence." Then he significantly adds:—

> Here Paganism was absorbed. There were no fierce struggles. Paganism simply disappeared, to emerge again, in proportion to the measure of its disappearance, in the Christian Church. Nowhere else did the conquest and "extirpation" of Paganism occasion so little trouble. The fact is, it was not extirpation at all. It was transformation (Ibid, vol. ii., p. 328).

We shall now proceed to enumerate some of the doctrines for which Christianity was indebted to older religions. It is well known that in the Pauline conception of the Christian religion the Fall occupies a fundamental position. Two heads of humanity are recognized, two representative men, the one being Adam, in whom humanity fell from the state of perfection in which it had been created, and the other, Christ, in whom humanity may recover all that it lost in Eden. These two men are contrasted in Romans v. 12-21, and 1 Cor. xv. 20-22; and out of this contrast is formulated the Pauline Gospel. But whence came the doctrine of the Fall? The story is told in Genesis; but in the rest of Old Testament literature there is no reference whatever to it. Neither Psalmist nor Prophet seems to possess any knowledge of it; and the Gospel Jesus shares the ignorance. As a matter of fact, Paul is the only Biblical writer to make use of it; and in his scheme of redemption it is all important. Had it not been for Adam there would have been no Christ and no need of salvation; and in the absence of Eden there would have been no Calvary. Now, this doctrine of the Fall is to be found in a document known as Kore Kosmou, which was composed between five and four hundred years before Christ. This work treats of the origin of all things. It tells us of the creation of heavenly souls and of sacred animals. Unfortunately, the heavenly souls rebelled and lost their heavenliness, with the result that they were embodied as men. Salvation comes through the interposition of Osiris and Isis. The souls objected strongly to their enfleshment by God, and continually wailed at their sad fate.

Digitized by Google

> The wail of the imprisoned souls is answered by God, that if they are sinless they shall dwell in the fields of Heaven (fields of Aalu), if blameable, then on earth; if they improve, they shall regain Heaven; but if they sin worse, they shall become animals (Petrie, Personal Religion in Egypt Before Christianity, p. 43).

This closely resembles the view promulgated by Plato in several dialogues. Hesiod, too, describes the primitive state as free from toil, sickness, sorrow, and all kinds of evil; and with this description most Greek poets and philosophers agree. Now, the writer of the Pauline Epistles was evidently acquainted with Pagan mythology, and could adapt the various theories therein contained to the requirements of the new cult in process of formation.

Humanity fell, then, in Adam, its first head, and in its second head, Christ, it is raised to a higher elevation than it occupied before its fall. This is what Paul says about them:—

> The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is of heaven. As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly (1 Cor. xv. 48, 49).

M. Loisy characterizes the two men thus:—

> The Messiah whom they (the Jews) expected was not come for them, did not belong to them; the Heavenly Man belonged to humanity. Neither did the Gods of the mysteries belong to the country of their origin; they had ceased to be national Gods that they might become universal Saviours. And the Christian myth was no more a fact of history than were the Pagan myths; the Heavenly Man of Paul was no more a real person than Attis; the idea of universal salvation by the death of Christ was no more consistent in itself than that of salvation procured by the death of Osiris. These are analogous conceptions, dreams of one family, built on the same theme with similar imagery (The Hibbert Journal, October, 1911).

In the Oriental religions salvation was effected by a mystic union with a dying and resurrected Saviour-God, and on consulting the Pauline Epistles we find that Christianity advocates the same doctrine. There were two rites which symbolized that conception of salvation in its fulness, namely, Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Usually Baptism is thought of as simply the door of admission into the Christian Church; and in the apostolic age it signified little more. The ritual was exceedingly simple, and needed no special minister to perform it. Converts were baptized immediately upon their recognition of Jesus Christ as their Redeemer. But ere long the influence of the mystery-religions began to show itself. Dr. Hatch tells us that "so early as the time of Justin Martyr we find a name given to baptism which comes straight from the Greek mysteries—the name 'enlightenment.' It came to be the constant technical term." "Seal" was another name derived from the mysteries, and in course of time it became customary to seal the baptized upon the forehead as a sign of a new ownership. In the Epistle to the Romans the indebtedness to the mysteries is most perceptible. In chapter vi., verses 3-11, there is no trace of the simple apostolic rite:—

> Are ye ignorant that all we who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were buried therefore with him through baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in newness of life.

That whole passage could have been written only by one who was under the sway of a deeply realistic mysticism. The idea of dying in order to undergo a new birth came from the Pagan mysteries. As time went on the mysticism in baptism became more marked still. "The Marcosians and some Valentinian schools believed in a baptism that was an absolute sundering of the baptized from the corruptible world, and an emancipation into a perfect and eternal life." What was this?

> It was but the old belief in the effect of the mysteries thrown into a Christian form. So also another Gnostic school is said to have not only treated the truths of Christianity as sacred, but also to have felt about them what the initiated were supposed to feel about the mysteries—"I swear by him who is above all, by the Good One, to keep these mysteries and to reveal them to no one"; and after that oath each seemed to feel the power of God to be upon him, as it were the password of entrance into the highest mysteries. As soon as the oath had been taken, he sees what no eye has seen, and hears what no ear has heard, and drinks of the living water—which is their baptism, as they think, a spring of water springing up within them to everlasting life (Hatch, The Influence of Greek Ideas and Usages upon the Christian Church, pp. 306-7).

In the face of such incontrovertible facts what can be thought of the following claim so proudly advanced by Paul in Galatians i. 11-12?

> For I make known to you, brethren, as touching the Gospel which was preached by me, that it is not after man. For neither did I receive it from man, nor was I taught it, but it came to me through revelation of Jesus Christ.

Let us wait and see.

J. T. Lloyd.

The Funniest Book in the World.

> Do I view this world as a vale of tears?
> Ah, reverend sir, not I. —Browning.

It has ever been a source of wonder to Freethinkers how Christians have ever been able to maintain, after a perusal of the Bible, that their deity was entitled to the credit of benevolence. The pious opinion really seemed in the nature of an unmerited compliment, unsupported by any evidence. The grim exponents of the religion of the "Man of Sorrows" seldom smiled themselves, the study of "God's Word" having, apparently, a depressing effect upon them. So much was this the case that one could tell Christians by their facial expression. Nay, more, the tell-tale features advertised how far the victim was suffering from the disease of religiosity. From the slight droop of the mouth which distinguished the Catholic and the High Churchman to the resemblance to a tired funeral horse worn by the flat-chested warriors of the Church and Salvation Armies, one might classify them accurately.

Christians were cankered through with austerity. Generation after generation had been stifled under a religious system which was sunless, joyless, and graceless. The results were to be seen in the dull, dismal, dreary, rectangular frequenters of the churches, chapels, and tin tabernacles. The professional pulpit-punchers and Bible-bangers were, so far, incapable of honest laughter than any undertaker was a merry Andrew compared with them. In short, the Christian world was in the meshes of darkness and despair. This Gospel that life for the majority of the human race was but the ante-chamber to an eternal torture-chamber, which was in reality an arraignment not merely of the Christian deity but of human nature itself, finally transformed this fair world of ours, for all Christians, into a darker and more terrible hell than the genius of Dante or Milton conceived.

Digitized by Google

All this unmerited suffering might have been avoided if the earliest theologians had possessed the saving grace of humour, and been able to see a joke without a surgical operation. It is entirely owing to the mental shortcomings and density of these Oriental gentlemen that the Christian religion is a nightmare rather than a pleasant dream. These intellectual babes and sucklings misconceived the central idea of the Bible. Innocently and artlessly they took a work of humour and read it in all seriousness. We all know the fearful results, besides which a madman's dream appears as perfect sanity.

The Bible is, in reality, a work of humour. We must, however, "speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us." The Holy Ghost's humour is not as our humour, nor his jests as our jests. Transcribed by barbarians, the Bible is not so satirical as Heine, so ironical as Gibbon, nor so modern as Anatole France. Quip, repartee, and epigrams are strangers to the Biblical pages. Maybe, a ghostly humour is best suited to a book by a ghostly author. Although we cannot say that there is a laugh on every page, a smile in every chapter, the prehistoric fun of the Bible will suffice. There are sly stories, Rabelaisian anecdotes, and quaint burlesques, sufficient to have enlightened the theologians, had they possessed the capacity of being amused.

As a humourist, the Holy Ghost somewhat resembles Artemus Ward, although he is the famous American's superior as a writer of fiction. The Ghost is a showman, absolutely calm about his exhibits, as a showman should be. He says the most deliciously funny things without turning a hair. That astonishing story of Jonah and the lodging-house whale is the perfection of unemotional joking. Whilst reading, we fairly sympathize with the poor whale who had a bed-sitting-room in his interior. The humour, too, of the tale of the grand old gardener, Adam, is infectious. He is stated to have been the first man. If he had been a shoemaker, he would also have been the last man. He starts life at full age, and without the assistance of any parents. He is able to throw hundredweights about on his first day on the earth, and he lives to be near a thousand years old. The nautical yarn of Noah's Ark is a masterpiece, in its way, including, as it does, the suggestion that millions of creatures, from elephants to lice, were crammed into a seaworthy pantechnicon. The climax is reached in the further suggestion that only two fleas accompanied eight Orientals on the excursion. The stories of the talking snake in Eden, Daniel in the lion's den, the ten plagues, the tower of Babel, and Ezekiel's memorable banquet are also examples of Eastern humour. The life of the "Man of Sorrows" in the later pages is sufficient to make a bronze statue burst into smiles. When the hero walks the waves, argues with a fig-tree, turns water into wine, feeds thousands with some buns and a few sardines, and finally sails away in the ether like an aeroplane, we feel that the Arabian Nights and the Adventures of Mother Shipton are sober history in comparison.

We admit cheerfully that there is a falling off in the latter pages. There is, however, a sprinkling of fun, a day's march between each jest, but what of that? A pearl is none the less a pearl even if it is surrounded by an intolerable deal of oyster. Learned men, who find out everything in time, have discovered some additional jocosities. Mark Twain has pointed out that the phrase, "the street which is called straight," is ironic; for he adds, the thoroughfare in question is "straighter than a corkscrew, but not so straight as a rainbow." Lord Byron, a gallant admirer of female beauty, found a sarcastic reference to a lady's nose as resembling "the tower which looketh unto Damascus." Professor Huxley extracted much fun from the anecdote of the bedevilled pigs, but never met a rasher opponent than Gladstone, who was as innocent of humour as the "high-brows" who find Bacon in Shakespeare. Colonel Ingersoll, too, made tens of thousands laugh with his Mistakes of Moses, founded entirely on the sacred volume.

Fed on such food, Christians should have waxed fat and jolly. To class the Holy Scriptures as sober history, or earnest fiction, is absurd. It is a wonder-book of riotous, exuberant, Oriental imagination. If people would only read the volume instead of chattering about it, such innocent misconception would be impossible. The Ghost is a more subtle humourist than people give him credit for, and rightly read, would add to the gaiety of nations. The refusal of the stupid, good, pious folk to see his jokes must have astonished and perplexed the Ghost. He never expressed his own amusement, but "let concealment, like a worm in the bud, feed on his damask cheek." If he had let himself go, he must have held his two sides, which are six, until his three heads, which are one, fairly ached from the explosion.

Mimnermus.

The Monarch of Cereals.

III.

(Continued from p. 220).

Washington, its first President, in 1796, submitted to the United States its need of a national board of agriculture. But it was not until 1839 that Congress voted the magnificent sum of 1,000 dollars for the improvement of husbandry, and in 1862 Lincoln established a National Department, while in 1889 Cleveland developed it still further; and now the reigning Executive Body is one of the most efficient in the world. In Germany, the pioneer labours of Liebig, those of Gilbert and Laws in England, and of Boussingault in France, in the realms of experiment, were followed on a large scale in the States; so that over twenty years ago fifty-five stations were in active operation in the great Republic. These have more than fulfilled all reasonable expectations, and at several of these agricultural centres important new varieties of wheat and other cereals have been evolved, which amplify the return some bushels per acre without adding to the cost of production, thus increasing enormously the annual yield. And it may be stated that splendid agricultural colleges of the most progressive character now exist in most of the territories and States.

Virgil, the Roman poet, in his Georgics, mentions selection in a manner which indicates that in classic times its advantages were understood. Early in the nineteenth century, Shireff, the northern agriculturist, proved that, by selecting the best wheats, the stock could be advanced; and in 1857 Hallett, in England, conducted a series of experiments with excellent results.

Digitized by Google

For each successive sowing he invariably selected the choicest heads and kernels, and in five short seasons the length of the original ear of corn was doubled, "the number of grains per head was nearly trebled, and the tillering power (the number of ears springing from one root) was increased over fivefold." Such are the results that the experimental stations are designed to secure. And hybridization has also yielded most satisfactory returns. Not merely is the crop increased, but the quality of the kernel is improved and the value of the straw enhanced. Some of Biffen's Cambridge creations and Farrer's Australian products prove immune to disease, while hybrids evolved by Dr. Saunders and others display valuable economic characteristics.

Saunders desired to develop early maturing wheats, and this he has achieved by hybridizing Russian and American varieties. It has been asserted that the acquired characteristics of these artificially bred cereals fail to retain permanently their acquired features; but the hybrids originated by Hays and Saunders certainly appear to do so. The improvements already accomplished are remarkable, but the achievements of the future will doubtless eclipse all these. Luther Burbank declares that if "a new wheat were bred that would yield only one grain more to each head, Nature would produce annually, without effort or cost for man, 15,000,000 extra bushels in the United States alone."

There is every reason to assume that, once these improved varieties have been created, their general excellence may be maintained, if they are cultivated in an environment of similar character to that which witnessed their birth and upbringing. The vegetable kingdom as a whole responds readily to the application of the selective principle. To cite the sugar beets alone, the use of scientific selection has increased, in less than a century, their sugar contents more than 100 per cent.

With rude implements the primitive agriculturist first turned the soil to receive his poor but precious grain. And even now manual labour remains the leading factor in tillage in vast regions of the globe. Where man-power is plentiful, as in India, it is to-day possible to successfully compete in the corn-markets of the world with cereal-producing countries provided with all the advantages conferred by modern labour-saving machinery. Despite her backward agricultural condition, India ranks fourth among the wheat-raising centres of the earth. Muscular labour is almost universal among the corn-growers of China, Japan, and other States, while it is still very largely employed in Egypt, Southern Europe, and the less advanced Republics of Latin America.

In the grey mists of antiquity man subdued the horse and ox and bent them to his service. In order of development the ox appears to have been subjected to agricultural requirements before the horse, but customs varied in different lands. Still, generally speaking, the ox was yoked to the plough in periods of tillage more primitive than those that witness the use of the horse. The plough to which the tamed animals were attached was evolved from the early hoe. Very ancient ploughs were drawn by a couple of men, two others holding them to the ground. In ancient Egypt and China wooden ploughs, little better than bent boughs, were in use. In later times of antiquity improvements were made, and the rude ploughs were pointed with metal among various communities. During the long Dark Ages no material advance took place, and the Pilgrim Fathers, in the seventeenth century, carried to their new home in America the archaic ideas of their time. The earliest ploughs employed in Illinois were those of the French settlers. These—> were of wood with a small point of iron tied on with straps of raw hide. The oxen were yoked to them by their horns. This method of hitching was rivalled only in Saxony and Ireland, where the horses were fastened to the plow by their tails. An attempt was made to abolish this practice in Ireland by Act of Parliament in 1634. Arthur Young (1741-1820) mentioned it in his time however, and Gibbins maintained that it was still to be found in remote parts of Ireland as late as 1896 (Book of Wheat, pp. 61, 62).

So persistent are ancient agricultural types that a crooked branch was utilized as a plough in California in 1835, while ploughs practically the same as those employed in the period of Pericles (450 B.C.) are still in use in modern Greece. In the more secluded parts of Russia the implements are equally rude, and some of the more advanced nations of Europe have made little progress since Roman times.

It is a far cry from such antiquated implements to a steam-plough, or a plough drawn by five horses, which turns 250 acres of arable land in a few weeks. For over a thousand years progress was at a standstill, and even when economic and other necessities cried loudly for improvement, discovery and invention were impeded by popular prejudice and superstition. Even after British farmers had been persuaded to test the improved iron plough, they asserted that the iron caused the weeds to grow, and in the New World metal ploughs were accused of poisoning the land and preventing the progress of the crops. Seeders, drills, threshing machines, and other implements of modern invention have encountered stern opposition from the rural community. And the writer remembers ancient peasants, and even veteran farmers, who sulkily deplored the vanished glories of the old-fashioned scythe when this had receded before the mowing machine, an implement which they regarded as a noxious example of new-fangled notions.

T. F. Palmer.

(To be continued.)

The Red House on the Hill.

There is a spray of eglantine in a shady corner, the white buds expanding still; in a neighbouring pot are white marigolds, clover, grasses, and the wondrous hues of the wild vetch; in another corner a young sycamore adds storey to storey of gracious twin leafage, each new pair appearing at the top as the old divide. A miracle, a study in determinism, these shapes go back to carboniferous times, faithfully preserved in the mould of Nature, that never weighed a scruple wrong, and never can! Outside, the soft, cloudy dawn, where the sky looks through like the very eye of love, and grey mists crown the azure hills and tint with many-coloured light and shade the quiet seas.

What a sad and miserable world we inhabit; what wretched life the benighted Freethinker leads! Let the following letter prove the pious contention. God bless our holy men. Amen!

"It is a long time since we broke the silence of the void, and now perhaps the thunder of our diction will make the space between us a shaky expanse for the little midges. I liked your little pen-picture. It put me in mind of Beulah, Vashti, St. Elmo, those luminous pen-pictures of the American authoress, Wilson, but minus their 'ridiculous excess.' I see again the Red House on the Hill overlooking the Bay, that we passed so often on our cycles, and called it the Shell House. Everybody knows it. To them it is an oasis in the desert, an inn on the road; or, better still, like a kindred soul met at length by the languishing spirit of long isolation, and, in the words of Dickens, 'recalled to life.' Since last writing, I have been living in a condition of, say,

Digitized by Google

dolce far niente. I think our moods are like the weather: they are good and bad; and when the weather does not go with them, we rail at the gods, and think we could have managed better. However, I believe it is contrast makes life worth living, or at least interesting, and there is zest in the sport of circumstance. Perhaps there is more interest in life when you have money—principle and interest; both sweet things! You can invest it in some factory where women waste their being and children crook their bones. Money is power. Ah, it is great to have power—not the power that kings and statesmen wield, but the power of mind, of vision, that rises far above these, and sees all things in true perspective, point of view and proportion, with the natural order of human relationships and social duties that helps, and the disorder that hinders, progress. He is a true hero who can use this power wisely. What though the world rise against him; it will just have to sit down again, as it has had to do before.

No man can tether time nor tide.

And there is a tide in the affairs of men. The mind in question is the highest by-product of evolution. From thwarted light leaps colour's flame. It is loved by the wise, to whom its thought is known; it is loved by the simple because it is simple too. As the child looks with eyes of wonder at its parents as each new wonder is unfolded to the curious mind, so the simpletons look up to the great man when they see the thing is true the sage has told them; for they know, also, there is a 'greatness' which is not simple and beneficent, but that only confuses and ensnares. So he who runs may read. Even the simple know the Emancipator. The sages are not prophets, but they look from a higher elevation; they see life constantly, and see it whole. The average man is in the valley still, with all those glorious peaks to scale.

"I must tell you of my great find. My mother attended a sale where were put up eight volumes of poetry. The man next her said 'Sixpence,' and of course she said 'Sevenpence,' and the eight volumes were handed to her. She gave them me last time I was home. It was like getting a windfall. Eight volumes, still uncut, published at 5s. each, for 7d.—not a penny for each! Pope, two volumes; Dryden, two; Milton, two; Shenstone, one; Thomson, of The Seasons, one. So, you see, brains are very cheap at times. Have got through Shenstone, and find him a master of pathos and humour. You can see at once Burns's indebtedness to this poet, and whom he refers to in 'The Vision,' i.e.:—

Thou canst not learn, nor can I show,
To paint with Thomson's landscape glow;
Or wake the bosom-melting throe,
With Shenstone's art;
Or pour, with Gray, the moving flow
Warm on the heart.

"I am going to read Pope next; have read the Essay on Man, but none of his pastorals or tales.

"I think that Mr. Palmer has settled the foxglove controversy; but since writing, I was speaking to a botanist friend, and he says the name 'dead man's fingers' is applied to the foxglove in the rural districts all over Scotland; but he could not say how the name originated, unless it were that the bells represent fingers, and the foxglove is a member of the nightshade family, and rank poison."

So ends the epistle, with the customary etceteras. Such are some of the mental and physical hues and shapes that float and glow, adrift or still, this rich, sweet evening in July around the Red House on the Hill.

Menander.

Holy Wars.

When all is said and done the fact remains that all the great Holy Wars in history have been fought by Christians. It was a holy war when Charlemagne offered the Northern Pagans baptism or death. It was a holy war when Alva butchered and burnt in the Netherlands. It was a holy war when the Great Armada sailed for England. It was a holy war when the heretics were destroyed by myriads in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. It was a holy war when Louis XVI. dragonnaded the Huguenots and swept the survivors out of France. It was a holy war when Germany was devastated and depopulated for thirty long years. It was a holy war when the Moriscoes and the Jews were driven, in the midst of unspeakable barbarities, out of Spain. It was a holy war when the Spanish conquerors of America, with the Pope's blessing, carried fire and slaughter amongst the mild and hospitable Indians. It was a holy war when the Protestants and Catholics, from England to Poland, fought each other all over the continent of Europe. It was a holy war when the Catholics burnt the Protestants, and the Protestants burnt the Catholics, for a mere difference of opinion. And it has been a holy war every time the Christians have let themselves loose, with massacre and violation, upon the poor, inoffensive Jews.

But the greatest of all holy wars was the Holy War—the Crusades. It lasted a hundred and ninety-four years, and was, as Fuller said, "for continuance the longest, for bloodshed the cruellest, for pretences the most pious the world ever saw." Christianity hurled itself against Mohammedanism in nine successive crusades, with the professed object of wresting the Holy Land from the hands of the "infidels." It was captured and held for a while; and then lost again for ever. The bogus Sepulchre of Christ—for it is no more—was still left in the custody of unbelievers. And in less than two centuries afterwards the Turkish crescent floated over the first Christian cathedral in Europe, in the first Christian city ever built—the city of Constantine.

G. W. Foote.

Correspondence.

ATHEISM IN THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—As one who has been extremely interested in the articles on "The French Revolution," by Robert Arch, I am loth to offer any criticism other than apprizement. But there is one point that I must protest against, and that is, that Mr. Arch seems to have caught the general fever of bourgeois historians in selecting, in article after article, as many abusive terms as possible for Hebert, the editor of the Pere Duchene. Mr. Arch tells us that Hebert played to the "lower tastes of his readers," using the "vilest slang of the gutter," at the expense of "dignity and decency." Hebert, we are told, was a "gutter journalist" not "worthy of respect," and the Pere Duchene, Mr. Arch looks upon with the eyes of an utter Philistine, as a "disreputable paper."

Now, has Mr. Arch seen the Pere Duchene, or is he depending upon historians? If he has seen it, will he kindly tell us what difference he finds between the Pere Duchene and the Freethinker? Hebert is fond of ridicule. He finds it the best weapon in his cause, but so does the Freethinker sometimes. He is certainly fond of such phrases as (I speak from memory) Va au le diable! (Go to the Devil!) Que le diable! (What the Devil!) damnation, and occasionally a stronger malediction, but surely these do not make Hebert "indecent," "disreputable," etc.

Digitized by Google

If, however, Mr. Arch is depending on the historians, then I can understand his attitude. But, nevertheless, he has been misled. Hebert was an Atheist, and he made the "unkindest cuts" at religion that I know of during the period of the Revolution. We need not wonder therefore that the pious, respectable bourgeois historians should be shocked at Hebert.

H. George Farmer.

Acid Drops.

What wonderful fellows are our newspaper guides! They see the invisible, even while they overlook the obvious. Thus Mr. W. T. Massey, writing in the Daily Telegraph and other papers, says that the cheers with which our soldiers greeted the sight of Palestine, after their victory over the Turks, was due to their expression of delight "at reaching a country hallowed by the greatest events in the world's history, the birthplace of Christ, and the cradle of the rights of humanity." We pass over the historical accuracy of the description; we are too greatly impressed by the picture of the British Tommy "overcome" by these profound reflections. That is really touching, and so truthful. We do not doubt that Mr. Massey felt this way; it is his business so to do. He is writing for a Christian audience, and is paid to have the appropriate feelings on such occasions. But we must confess that we should never have thought it of the Army. That is why we are overcome—almost to the point of tears.

And we wonder what were the "rights of humanity" that were born in Palestine? It was not the ideal of democracy. That comes to us from Greece. It was not the ideal of a settled, recognized, jurisprudence. That is Roman. It was not the equality of the sexes. Palestine would certainly never have given the woman the vote. It was not free discussion, or freedom of thought. Nothing was farther from Palestine than that ideal. What on earth were the rights of humanity that were born in Palestine? What a good thing it is that these newspaper men do not have to explain what they mean—so long as they can gush and sentimentalize in accordance with the prevailing prejudice.

Mr. H. G. Wells has not only found one "God," but he is chaperoning other deities. He has written an introduction to M. Loyson's book, The Gods in Battle, which is a reply to Romaine Rolland's volume, Above the Battle. Perhaps Mr. Wells only did it to please the publishers.

The Church Army has invaded the Buckingham Palace Road, and is using part of the Royal Mews as a hostelry. The Christian religion originated in a stable, and it looks as if it would finish in another.

"What's in a name?" asked Shakespeare. Yet it causes surprise to find that the vicar of a Bryanston Square church is named Bernard Shaw, and that a Westcliff-on-Sea curate bears the name of Hebert Spencer.

In spite of the shortage of paper, editors find room for much nonsense in their columns. A London newspaper recently headed a report, "Boy Branded by a Fiend." The "fiend" proved to be a woman, who was sentenced to three months' hard labour for cruelty to her eight-year-old nephew. But why do editors play to the gallery in this manner?

A London picture-paper points out that the Archbishop of Canterbury formerly lived in a "modest dwelling house," whilst Bishop of Rochester. It did not add that the salary of the Bishop of Rochester is £4,000, and that of the Archbishop £15,000, yearly.

Pious folk are often wanting in a sense of humour. Referring to the crop of war rumours, Mr. Charles Hawtrey, the actor, wrote to a daily paper, saying that the Dutch had taken Holland. This brought a letter of remonstrance from a country parson, protesting that "the Dutch are the people—the native people—of Holland." Isn't it delicious?

The Rev. Bernard Snell says there is far more fellowships in a public-house than in the average Christian Church. After all, this is not so high a compliment to the public-house as it seems.

The Self-Denial campaign of the Salvation Army realized over £95,000. It is astonishing how easily money can be obtained when the appeal is associated with superstition. Perhaps the best punishment for many who gave would be to make them see exactly how the money is spent.

Judging from the Scotch—or is it Scottish?—newspapers the War seems to be giving religion in the north a bit of a shaking. The clergy are being criticized with a freedom that is quite unusual, and some pretty plain opinions are being expressed both on them and their religion. Of course, this dissent from orthodoxy is of more than ten years' growth, but, up to now, the mask of religious hypocrisy has been worn generally, and the newspapers have been careful of letters reflecting on Christianity. The War seems to have broken the ice, that is all. And one may safely assume that when the newspapers publish so much there is a great deal more behind. From which we draw the moral that the time for Scottish Freethinkers to strike is now. They can drive home the moral of the War. There is no moral for Christians to draw.

A story is going the rounds that a country clergyman tendered his services to the National Service Department, and described his capacity as that of "organizer." As his handwriting was bad, this was read as "organgrinder."

The Rev. A. O. Belden, of Westcliff-on-Sea, says only 10 per cent. of the population of that place attend places of worship. Just so! But then the gallant 10 per cent. want to rule the roost.

Sir Harry Johnston, at the end of the present War, would "restore the kingdom of Israel to the Jews." The Star says this "would be easier than restoring the Jews to the kingdom of Israel."

The Archbishop of Canterbury has been ill, and has been ordered away to recuperate by his medical advisers. Fresh air and doctors are a secularistic solution of the matter; but, surely, an archbishop ought to rely on prayer alone.

Dr. W. J. O'Sullivan, a sanitary expert, declares that germs taken from mummies four thousand years old, quickly become active again. An editor, commenting on this, asks if germs are immortal. Perhaps the clergy, who pose as authorities on immortality, will oblige with an answer.

"Christianity must copy the soldier, as it has always done," says Dr. W. E. Orchard. Was he thinking of the Church and Salvation Armies, or of the Christian ministers, who are "too proud to fight," but are brave enough to see the real soldiers go the Front?

French priests are urging the claims of a new Joan of Arc, who hears voices and sees visions. The report adds that many thousands of pilgrims have travelled to kneel at the same altar. Presumably, the good, kind priests look after the offertories.

We were pleased to see the following in the Christian World:—

> Rev. G. E. Darlaston, M.A., addressing the Women's League of the London Congregational Union on Tuesday, expressed his opinion that some professional evangelists at the Front did more harm than good. They pushed men off their balance, and then claimed them as converts. The emotional strain of some of the meetings held at the Front was very great. The mention made of father, mother, and wife was positively painful. He had often felt that in another minute the men would be sobbing. Men looked back on those moments as times when they had lost their balance, and looked upon the minister as one who had taken a mean advantage of them. It was bringing religion into disrepute, and was not, in his opinion, the religion of Christ. The men felt, too, that it provided a very unfortunate contrast to the soldierly ideal, the spirit of "Take your luck" or "Be a sport."

Digitized by Google

Decidedly the pretence of our Army being eaten up with religion is wearing thin.

Apropos of a clergyman's complaint that there was no sign of prayer during a Zeppelin raid, a writer in the London Mail remarks:—

> Perhaps I may be a trifle irreverent, but it struck me as being rather unbecoming for a lot of people to rush out of their houses when a Zeppelin was passing over and to beseech a nervous curate to pray for them. Feeling, however, that I had probably not absorbed the police instructions correctly, I re-read them, but could find no trace of advice advocating prayer as an efficient proof against Zepps. God is not only on the side of the big battalions. He is also on the side of the anti-aircraft gunners and aviators who shoot the straightest. Therefore, parson hunting during a raid may be a dangerous pastime. It is preferable to leave it to other sky pilots.

The clerical statement that the Germans are Atheists is constantly being exposed as a falsehood. The Evening News states that "Among Germany's 70,000,000 inhabitants are 25,000,000 Roman Catholics. For years the Catholic Centre has been called "trumps" in German politics. All Chancellors require to dicker for their support in Government measures.

The supply of coal in London and many large towns is very short. We wonder if there is a shortage in the place so often mentioned in sermons.

A Yorkshire Young Men's Christian Association Conference at Leeds has adopted a big scheme of after-war work, including guilds of handicrafts and training in village industries. This organization seems more concerned with commercialism than Christianity.

The Rev. A. Waller, of St. Paul's Church, Westcliff-on-Sea, has written A Revised Decalogue, in which some caustic criticism on present-day religion is embedded. Here are some examples: "Thou mayest by priestly permission have any graven image"; "Thou shalt do no murder, except by authority"; "Thou shalt not privately annex anything contrary to public morality rules." We fear Mr. Waller's "decalogue" will share the same fate as the one Christians pretend to obey.

Mr. Coulson Kernahan declares that Oscar Wilde's great ambition was to restore "pure Christianity to the world," and he told Mr. Kernahan that he hoped to write the epic of the Cross, the Iliad of Christianity, which shall live for all time." Truly "pure Christianity" and Oscar Wilde suggest a very curious combination.

"Jerusalem," says the Daily News, "has been modernized in many ways" by tourist traffic. Yet the Cooks' excursionists still pay money to see the sacred side-shows as their ignorant predecessors did in the old days.

Twenty-five years ago a man named William Parris was charged with murder in Mississippi (U.S.A.). Sentenced to be hanged, he was saved by the rope breaking, and was sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. Now there has just died in Columbia a man named Joseph Beard, who has confessed to being the real murderer. But Beard had become religious, otherwise he might never have confessed his crime. On his death-bed Beard, because, he said, "I want to purge my soul; I want to be certain of heaven," confessed to the murder—and died immediately after. Thus we see the wonderful power of religion. It did not prevent Beard committing the murder; it didn't make him confess to clear an innocent man; but it purged his soul, and made him certain of heaven. Glory, Glory, Hallelujah!

Providence appears to treat places of worship with high-sniffing contempt. Hundreds of churches have been destroyed on the Continent, and now we hear that there are "serious fissures" in St. Paul's Cathedral, London.

"An utter failure and colossal fraud" is a South Norwood curate's opinion of the recent National Mission of Repentance and Hope. It would be a pity to elaborate this gem of criticism.

Dr. Jowett, who has received an invitation to the pastorate of Westminster Chapel, London, is the minister of a New York church, and receives the modest salary of £2,400 yearly. This is quite a small sum compared with the Archbishop of Canterbury's £15,000, or the Bishop of London's £10,000.

Mr. Arthur Henderson says that "the alienation of the masses from organized Christianity is due to our divisions." Just as if the average man cares a straw for the tweedledums or tweedledees of theology.

Mr. Joseph Shaylor, who has been connected with bookselling for over half a century, in an interview in a London newspaper, says that the old evangelistic literature, such as that associated with Moody and Sankey, has fallen into disrepute, and there is to-day a sparser demand for "hot Gospelling" due to larger and more tolerant views.

"There was no diminution in the death-rate," says Dean Inge, "until men began to study drains." What Secularists these Christians are!

Pernicious Parodies.

AFTER THE WAR.

(With apologies to "After the Ball Was Over.")

After the War is over,
After the blood is dry,
After the Pope has blessed us,
After the Bishop's cry:
"See that our Church is busy,
Fleecing the lowly poor."
There'll be another War, boys,
After—the—War!

THE BETTER PART.

(With apologies to "Two Little Girls in Blue, Lads.")

Two sleek young men in black, lads,
Two sleek young men in black,
Shoving us into the trenches,
While they themselves hang back!
Two nice little commissions,
"Captains" in khaki suits;
Two nice, well-fed, little chaplains,
With a private to polish their boots.

Arthur F. Thorn.

Little Johnny, aged nine, asked his parents for a drum; who, in order to instil some religious instinct in the boy, told him he must pray to God for the drum. After the boy had prayed for four nights, the parents thought it time to let the drum appear; and on the fifth night the father quietly placed the drum on the bed whilst Johnny was praying: "God bless father and mother, make Johnny a good little boy, and send Johnny a drum." Johnny, having finished his prayer, looked up, saw the drum on the bed, and exclaimed: "Now, who the hell put that there?"

Digitized by Google

To Correspondents.

T. Hayes-James.—Delighted to learn that you have so far acted on our suggestion in a recent "Special" as to secure a new subscriber. We hope other readers will follow your excellent example.

G. Lewis.—Thanks. Cuttings are always useful.

G. Harding.—We do not know of any good history of the War, and do not expect that any has been written. No writer would be allowed to say all he knew, and an impartial and trustworthy narrative is simply impossible under present conditions.

T. A. W.—We are obliged for sight of the letter. It will be useful in connection with an article we are publishing in a week or two on the same topic. Pleased to know you admire the Freethinker so much.

C. W. Marshall.—Thanks for sight of the appreciative letters from the soldiers to whom you have been sending the Freethinker. We have every reason for believing that many have made their first acquaintance with the paper in this way.

E. H. Olds (N.Z.).—Remittance received, and handed to Shop Manager. Thanks for account of affairs in your part of the world.

G. Bedborough.—This is a rather tardy acknowledgment of the receipt of your dainty little booklet, but none the less hearty on that account. The "Sayings" are very much to the point. Pleased to have your congratulations on what you call our "energy and optimism."

R. G. Smith.—Thanks for promise of support. The paper and pamphlets are being sent as desired.

W. C. Dodd.—There should be no difficulty in getting the Freethinker at any newsagents. We are gratified to have your appreciation of the paper.

G. S.—Your ideas are good, but the verse is hardly up to our standard of publication.

W. Bynion.—We don't exactly see in what way we can help. If there is a particular point on which we could help, we should be pleased to do so; but one can hardly write a reply to so general a statement as the one you cite.

W. Rancott.—We have no recollection of having received the letter to which you refer. We are always willing to insert letters in reply to articles, provided they are courteous, to the point, and brief.

C. W. Marshall.—Pleased to have the picture of the house in which Shelley lived at Marlow. Such mementoes are always interesting.

Mr. Nevil Bourn writes to point out that "tune" should read rune in his verses on "At a Graveside" in last week's issue.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen had a very successful meeting at Swansea on Sunday last. A very much larger hall had been taken than on the occasion of his previous visit, and the gathering quite justified the venture. The lecture was followed with the closest attention, and at its conclusion there was a long run of questions, with a little opposition. There was also a good sale of literature, which is always a good sign. In the evening it was resolved to found a Branch of the N. S. S. at Swansea, and a number of members were enrolled. Mr. Dupree, of 60 Alexandra Road, has consented to act as Secretary, and in his energetic hands the new Branch has every prospect of a successful career.

Under the auspices of the National Secular Society a course of three lectures is being arranged at South Place Institute on the evenings of April 29, May 6, and 13. Mr. Cohen will open the course, and will be followed by Mr. J. T. Lloyd and Mr. Harry Snell. Full particulars as to subjects, etc., will follow in due course.

We are sorry that pressure on our space necessitates our holding over until next week a further instalment of Mr. Mann's excellent articles on "Spiritualism." They will be resumed next week. We have reason to know that these articles are being followed with considerable interest, and we are considering the question of their republication in pamphlet form.

It seems likely that a Board of Trade order will shortly be issued prohibiting the practice of "returns" in the newspaper trade. This will mean that copies of the Freethinker can only be secured by ordering them in advance, as newsagents will not risk ordering on the chance of selling them. Of course there is nothing to prevent readers who are interested getting their newsagent to take and display an extra copy or so, and taking the unsold copies themselves. That is often done now, and when it is done the copies displayed are most often sold and new subscribers gained.

In thanking us for sending Freethinkers, really supplied by some of our readers, Corporal J. Benton writes from Egypt:—

> Our meetings here in the C.E.M.S. Hut are few and far between now, as our parson here does not relish too much open discussion. His idea of that is to occupy the platform as he does his pulpit; and as he is generally backed up by one or two officers, the opposition is always at a disadvantage. However, only about two per cent. of the troops take him at all seriously. One discussion to take place shortly, by a Nonconformist parson, is "The Failure of the Church." This is only one way of bluffing the troops from the real issue, "The Failure of Christianity" in general. The section of Christian Arabs here, "the Copts," are generally known on account of their filthy habits, and everyone admits the Mohammedans are cleaner in every way. Our library here contains several of Mr. Eden Phillpott's novels, which seem to be especial favourites of the troops.

The Falkirk Branch of the N. S. S. has arranged for a lecture on "Robert Ingersoll," by the Rev. E. T. Russell, at the Co-Operative Hall, Falkirk, on Sunday, April 22, at 3 o'clock. A lecture on Ingersoll by a clergyman, followed by discussion, should be interesting.

The Right to Affirm.

By the Oaths Amendment Act of 1888 affirmation may take the place of an oath in courts of law and in all other places where the taking of an oath is necessary.

Affirmation may be claimed on one of two grounds. (1) On the ground of having no religious belief, (2) on the ground of an oath being contrary to one's religious belief.

A judge or other official may ask on what ground affirmation is claimed, but no further question is warranted, and all such additional questions should be respectfully and firmly declined.

In all cases where any trouble or difficulty occurs it would be well to inform us of the circumstances at once.

The newspaper is the plague, or black death, of the modern world. It is an open sewer, running down each side of the street, and displaying the foulness of every day, day by day, morning and evening. Everything that, having once happened, has ceased to exist; the newspaper sets before you, beating the bones of the buried without pity, without shame, and without understanding. Its pride is that it is the record of facts, but it tells you no fact twice in the same way; for it gorges its insatiable appetite upon rumour. All the hypocrisies of the State, of the Church, of the market-place, cling together for once in brotherly love, and speak with unanimous voice.—Arthur Symons, "Studies in Prose and Verse."

Digitized by Google

The French Revolution.

IX.

THE SMASH.

(Continued from p. 198.)

FRANCE was now (April, 1794) under a veritable tyranny, in which freedom of the press, freedom of speech, and freedom of thought were alike impossible. The Committee of Public Safety, which had come into power as the representative of the democratic movement against the privileges of wealth, kicked down the ladder it had climbed by. Municipal independence, the pillar of democracy, was suppressed, and France was administered by nominees of the Government, called "national agents," in every town and village. The municipality of Paris was filled up in a similar way.

It was now the object of Robespierre to carry out his cherished project of remodelling France after the pattern of Rousseau's State. To all appearance, he was supreme. In truth, however, he never commanded the allegiance of his colleagues in the Government, and was, to the last, pretty much at the mercy of the specialist members of it. Except two members of the Committee of Public Safety, Couthon and St. Just, and one member of the Committee of General Security, David the painter, none of them shared his aspiration for a Deistic "reign of the saints." They supported him simply because no one else possessed the authority with the Convention, the Jacobins' Club, and the country at large, without which they felt that their power would crumble into dust.

His first step was to obtain from the Convention a recognition of Rousseau's "civil religion." At his behest, it was decreed in May that "the French nation recognizes the existence of a Supreme Being and the immortality of the soul," and a system of national festivals was instituted in honour of the new bogey. Robespierre declared war on Freethought. He proclaimed that the truth of any doctrine was a matter of indifference, provided that it was useful to the State; and from the point of view of Robespierre, with his ideal of a disciplinarian and Puritanical Republic, religion was indisputably useful. On June 8, the inaugural festival was held in Paris. The Convention, headed by Robespierre as president, took part in it in a body; speeches were made, hymns were sung, and emblematic figures of Atheism and Anarchy were burnt.

This day, however, marked the beginning of the end. In spite of artistic design and efficient organization, the new religion did not catch on. The fact was, Robespierre's popularity was waning. For the democratic rank and file, he had ceased to be the people's man, the incorruptible tribune, and had become a tyrant, the incarnation of the reigning repression. He was audibly reviled at the festival of the Supreme Being. A strong man, like Danton, could have made short work of him that day.

Two days later, June 10, 1794 (22nd Prairial, year II., as the date is more generally remembered), Robespierre must needs add the last straw to the camel's burden by a new Terrorist law, which he proposed through his mouthpiece, Couthon. The Revolutionary Tribunal was divided into sections; prisoners were deprived of the right of defence; and capital punishment was extended to cover such vague offences as "undermining morality," "corrupting the public conscience," and the like. As the Tribunal was packed with Robespierre's creatures, he hoped by this law to clear out of his way all who, on whatever grounds, should object to fall in with his politico-religious projects.

The rate of executions now rose by leaps and bounds. Men and women went to the guillotine in batches of twenty, thirty, and even fifty a day. Men who had been saved in the September massacres, men for whom Marat had interceded, now fell victims to the calculating callousness of Robespierre and the brutality of the Committee of General Security. The populace, who had at first felt vindictively towards the victims of the "Terror," now turned against it, and looked with sullen, growing resentment at these daily hecatombs.

A breach between Robespierre and his colleagues hastened the end. He had intended to use the new law to decimate the party of the "Mountain" in the Convention, who were the chief obstruction to his new schemes. This the Committees would not allow. He withdrew from their sittings, and with St. Just and Couthon laid his plans anew.

Meanwhile the French victory of Fleurus, which restored Belgium to the Republic, ended the last pretence of "military necessity" which could be offered as an excuse for the "Terror."

The tension broke on July 26 (8 Thermidor), when Robespierre in the Convention attacked some of his "Montagnard" enemies by name, demanded a fresh election of the committees, and the punishment of certain deputies who, as commissioners in the departments, had been involved in ultra-Terrorist or "dechristianizing" measures. The same evening the Jacobins' Club applauded Robespierre's speech, and expelled Billaud-Varenne and Collot d'Herbois, his principal opponents in the Government. They hastily laid their plans for action. Robespierre must be destroyed, even at the risk of losing the reins of power themselves. They conferred with the threatened "Montagnards," Tallien, Barras, and others, who, in their turn, sounded the men of the "Marsh" and secured their support. On July 27 (9 Thermidor), St. Just, Robespierre's lieutenant, rose in the Convention, intending to make a conciliatory speech which might allay the storm and postpone the conflict. The "Montagnards," however, would not let him proceed. Their deadly fear was lest Robespierre and his friends should appeal to the "Marsh," pose as the champions of religion and order, and turn the tables on the conspirators. St. Just and Robespierre were shouted down. Robespierre struggled to speak, trying (as his enemies had anticipated) to whip up the Conservative majority against his opponents, but was not allowed to do so. His voice failed; he sat down; and a "Montagnard" deputy proposed and carried a motion for his arrest. The "Marsh," not knowing Robespierre's plans, but glad to take advantage of the split in the Government to assert themselves at last, voted it unanimously. His brother, St. Just, Couthon, and Lebas were arrested with him. The packed municipality, filled with Robespierre's supporters, came to the rescue of their leader, forbade the prisons to receive any prisoners that day, and attempted to raise the people against the Convention. The people, however, were in no humour to rise on behalf of Robespierre. The Hotel de Ville was stormed by the forces mustered by the Convention; Robespierre, his jaw broken by a pistol shot, and his friends were made prisoners again; and the next day they were all sent to the guillotine. The bulk of the municipality followed them a day later.

Nominally what had happened was that the Government, supported by the Convention, had defeated and destroyed three of its members who had sought to overthrow it. Actually the Democratic Party had been forced to call in the reactionaries to save them from decimation by their own leaders. The democratic machine had broken down with a smash, and the "Marsh," the Conservative majority in the Convention, found themselves in a position to dictate policy.

Digitized by Google

They did not at first realize their own power. For the first few weeks after the 9 Thermidor, though the "Terror" ceased at once, the spell of democratic ascendancy seemed unbroken. The Convention voted that the ashes of Marat, still a popular hero, should be transferred to the Pantheon: The religious question was temporarily settled by a measure of disestablishment, in which, for the first time, the principle was recognized that the State has no concern with religious opinions.

However, in the months of August and September, 1794, the "Marsh" awoke to their opportunity. They demanded, and obtained, representation on the Committees of Government. There was no longer the moral force in the Democratic Party to resist the reaction.

A formidable secession from the "Mountain" took place. Many of the erstwhile democrats, such as Tallien, Barras, and Merlin of Thionville, had lost their enthusiasm for the Revolution. This cannot be altogether accounted for by disgust with the "Terror." Many of these men had been Terrorists themselves, and Barras and Freron had been among the very worst. A more sinister reason for their recantation lay in the fact that they, in common with many other men of the middle classes, had made their fortunes in the Revolution. They had bought up property belonging to the Church and the aristocracy, and were now the owners of large estates. Tallien had married a rich Spanish widow, the notorious Senora Cabarrus, whom he had met at Bordeaux when he was commissioner there, and who now inspired from her salon the forces of reaction. Of such men was the new reactionary party, the "Thermidorian" Party, composed.

The "Mountain" was reduced to a small Radical rump, consisting of the ex-members of the Terrorist Government, such as Billaud-Varenne and Collot d'Herbois, and of a number of men like Romme, joint author of the Revolutionary Calendar, who preserved inflexibly the principles of the Democratic Republic, and fought a losing battle against the overwhelming forces of the "Marsh" and the "Thermidorians."

Such was the position when, in September and October, 1794, the last struggle of the Revolution began.

(To be continued.) Robert Arch.

Stories Concerning Authority.

By "Multatuli" (Eduard Douwes Dekker).

I.

There was once a traveller who set out upon a journey. In his charge he had a great store of gold and silver. Fearing that he might be waylaid and robbed, he had armed himself and his company. Apparently he had little to fear, because his company numbered more than all the robbers of that country put together. He was so well armed and so strong in numbers that a whole army could not have taken his wealth from him.

In an evil moment for them, certain robbers set upon him, and would have repented their rashness to the end of their days if most of them had not been killed on the spot.

One of these robbers, whom the fate of his brother-thieves had made wary, sought counsel of a holy hermit who was wise in all things, for he had lived for ages in the sole company of two bones of a dead man and a jar of water.

"What must I do, O man of holiness," he asked, "to get for myself the wealth of this traveller?"

"Nothing is easier," replied the pious hermit. "You must take the noose you see lying there, and throw it over his head; then you will have no more trouble with him. Moreover, he will command his servants to kneel before you and to deliver up to you all you desire."

And it happened as the holy man had said. But, alas! the traveller and his company found themselves in sore straits.

This noose is called "Faith," and it has preserved its virtue to this day.

II.

"Please tell me, father, why it is that the sun does not tumble down?" And the father, who felt foolish because he could not say why the sun did not tumble down, punished his child for asking an awkward question.

Fearing his father's anger, the child asked no more questions, neither why the sun did not tumble down nor many other things he would have liked so much to know.

The poor child never grew up to be a man, although he lived for six thousand years—and even longer. And he has remained stupid and ignorant to this day.

III.

"The first king," said Voltaire, "was a lucky soldier." Yet I don't know that this is the case. There are many, or even more, chances that the first king was someone who had dealings with certain holy hermits that used to furnish people with a peculiar slip knot, known as the noose of faith.

However that may be, I can vouch for the truth of the following story:—

Krates was very strong. With a mere jerk of the arm he could level the strongest oaken fence. He could kill thirteen enemies at a blow. When he coughed, the compression of the air caused fires to break out, and at the slightest of his movements the moon trembled.

Because of these great talents, Krates was made king, and he died after he had been king for some time.

But his son, Krates the Younger, was a rickety creature. Yet his ricketiness did not prevent him from wishing to be king in the place of his father, who had been so strong.

He was seated upon a wooden chair—he called it a throne—and he was saying to himself: "I am king."

"Why are you king?" asked the people, who were still simple, and knew nothing of the law of heredity.

"Because my mother cohabited in the same hut with Old Krates, who is dead."

He said "palace," but it was really a hut.

The people knew nothing of this sort of logic, and when Krates II. commanded: "Come here!" everyone went away. And when he said: "Go away!" they came to him. In short, authority went speedily to the Devil, and Krates II. had not wit enough to take advantage of his people's malice by commanding the opposite of what he wanted them to do.

In an opposition newspaper of the time we read: "Why, O Krates, art thou bandy-legged and imbecile? Why sittest thou in the seat of him who dwelt in the same hut with the woman who bore thee? Get thou up, and depart, and say no more to us: 'Get ye gone!' or 'Come ye here!' as if thou wast the old Krates. Where are the oak fences thrown down with the fillip of a mighty arm? The moon trembles not even if thou dreamest of splitting the universe. Thou couldest not kill a louse, and no fires break out when thou sneezest. .....Get thou up, and give place to another who can do these things that are useful!"

Thus spoke the opposition. Krates II. would no doubt have been obliged to give up his chair which he called a throne if an old nurse had not addressed the people in this wise:—

Digitized by Google

"Listen to me, my friends, for I was nurse to little Krates when he was smaller than he is to-day. Now, when he came into the world his father dropped oil upon his forehead, and a little of it fell upon the nipple of my breast. Therefore it is unnecessary for him to knock down oaken fences with a fillip of his hand, nor has he any need to make the moon tremble or to cause fires to break out when he coughs. I can assure you that ....."

But the eloquent nurse had no need to finish her sentence. The conclusion was so obvious that the whole people—the editorial staff of the opposition more noisily than the others—cried out with one voice:—

Behold the anointed of the Lord!

And Krates continued to sit in the chair which he called a throne.

And he still sits there to this day.

—From Love-Letters (1861).

(Translated by) Geo. Underwood.

Strong Meekness.

The pastor was speaking about the meekness of Jesus Christ. Like all the other highly entertaining virtues of the Lord, as rendered by the pulpit, this meekness was considerably different to the ordinary quality. Not that it was more complex or more illuminating. Not that it lacked human character or human simplicity. No; the meekness of Jesus Christ had been misinterpreted. It was not understood. We were too prone to vision our Lord as effeminate. For this the pulpit was responsible. Jesus Christ was no weakling. He was no emasculated example of masculinity. He was a man, with a man's strength. His meekness was strong meekness. Had not he used a whip to clear the temple of profanity and defilement? Was he a weak man who, amidst cowering followers, and beset by angry waves, stood up in a little cockle-shell of a boat, and bid the waves to cease their fret, and command the storm to stillness? Was he a weak, meek, man who endured the tortures of that eclipsing episode of Calvary? And so on. But the pastor did not tell us it was easy to be strongly meek when we knew, beforehand, that we were victorious.

The preacher proceeded to interpret strong meekness. Cowardliness it was to suffer others to bear adversity alone. When the weak are oppressed the Christlike man would rise in wrath against the tyranny that grinds them into the mire. The meek man will not stay his hand when evil flings its animosity against his friends; nor will he sit down and allow the Devil in human form to molest them. Against the robber, the murderer, the malefactor, will the meek man fight; and his antagonism will be all the more indomitable because of his meekness. But when he, himself, is personally opposed by these various devilish things, he will faithfully turn his eyes heavenward, looking to God, and, murmuring some verbal soft soap, will deliver himself into the tenderly solicitous hands of his divine Father. In the performance of this, perhaps, sorrow-stricken duty will lie the proof of the strength of his meekness. His own life is in God's keeping; the welfare of his fellows, to the best of his ability, in his.

Such was the pulp administered to us the other Sunday; and such was the minister's lying method of escaping from a nasty morass.

Confronted by the War, and its relationship to Christianity, the pastor, apparently, was mentally distressed; and in his illumination of the only true and real meaning of meekness he conveniently forgot Truth.

Behind his endeavour to elucidate the mysteries of meekness stood the moloch of War, its mouth wide open in one monstrous grin, its eyes full of scorn, its attitude one of contempt. Germany was the aggressive devil, the culprit, the modern national malefactor, against which even Christ, whose life-teaching was mildness and meekness, would have turned his ire, because he knew his friends were in peril. To have complacently accepted the dominion of Prussianism would have been sin. This War was righteous just in so far as it was the uprising of our national meekness against tyranny; and no one could deny that the Lord Jesus Christ gave Britain his sympathy. But if Christ had been Britain, what would he have done? Endured another Calvary with the same object?

Practically speaking, meekness became strong meekness when it was necessary to discover some way of escape from the mass of contradictions with which the European catastrophe deluged Christianity. It was essential to provide certain qualifications to the sermonic commandments of the Son of God. Disobedience to the dictates of Deity had to be made circumstantially righteous. Absolute denial of the laws of God, as explicitly published for humanity in the Sermon on the Mount, had to be made perfectly justifiable. And so it came about that we, as a nation, in our present war-paint, although we were breaking all the divine commandments, were but following the example of Jesus Christ, and being strongly meek. We were fighting against evil for others. We were doing just what the Lord would have done when human circumstances knocked holes in his high-falutin' philosophy.

The pastor forgot that his knowledge of the true causes of the War was as filmy as mine; and until we thoroughly understood the beginnings thereof we were being merely ignorantly dogmatic when we asserted that wrong was right because it appeared, under superficial circumstances, righteous. He forgot that the commandments of God were not formulated upon passing conflictions, but upon permanent truths; and that the former could not, therefore, be made to fit into the divine philosophy of life. Consequently, what directly and quite flagrantly denied the truth of the commandments of Jesus Christ was wrong all the time. Under no circumstances could it be right. If war did not harmonize faithfully with these simple precepts, then war was wrong, despite what sagacious people might say to the contrary; and it became the duty of the followers of the lowly Nazarene to say so, and to endure whatever penalties this Christian nation would surely impose upon them.

To introduce qualifications to a commandment is no more than hypocrisy. Conveniently to overlook the responsibilities attached to the word of command from the Heavenly Field Marshall is treachery. Disobedience is cowardice. Expediency is a broken crutch to principle. The serviceableness of the law of God is either a fact or a fable; it is a fact if, in emergency, it is useful; it is a fable if, in emergency, it has to be cast aside as useless. There is no Jesus Christ on a battle-field. Strong meekness is a lie manufactured in order to clothe the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, in khaki.

Robert Moreland.

Christianity the Symbolism of Factuality.

When Mr. Lloyd tells us that he "accepts the scientific view that the universe is infinite in extent and of eternal duration," although "unable to believe in an Infinite and

Digitized by Google

Eternal Energy from which all things proceed," he is making a most interesting confession of faith. For does he not here, to use his own words, "part company with known facts and speculate upon unverifiable assumptions?" It is philosophy with theology, and not science, which postulates such beliefs, although Spencer called his the "one absolute certainty." Science is concerned with phenomena only, and no phenomenon or sum total of phenomena can possibly be proved to be either infinite or eternal. The supreme question is, not how far Spencer believed in the Infinite or Eternal Energy as apart from and of prior existence to the universe, but whether such an energy exists at all. We can only know of it by its effects. What it is in itself, whether Personal (or as I would prefer to think of it as Super-Personal) or Impersonal, whether it transcends or is immanent, or is partly transcendental, partly immanent in the phenomenal universe (the only universe of which we have any direct knowledge) is a matter of speculation.

Mr. Lloyd and his friends may incline to one belief or view; I and my friends have as much right to incline to the other belief or view. For all ultimate beliefs are acts of faith, and cannot be conclusively proved by demonstration. It is, therefore, altogether gratuitous to regard those whose act of faith leads them to believe in God as on a lower intellectual level than that of those who disbelieve. It is to me surpassing strange that while Mr. Lloyd is prepared to dogmatize concerning the infinity in extent and the eternity in duration of the universe (or can he demonstrate this?), he should, at the same time, cavil at my belief (which was Spencer's) in an Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed. The one sort of belief is equivalent to the other, for both are beliefs.

Mr. Lloyd says that "to a student of the Four Gospels nothing can be more certain than that Jesus regarded God as a person apart from and above the Universe, and whose will the Universe fulfilled." I do not deny this, and yet I think it is very questionable indeed whether Jesus (as we know Him in the Gospels) thought of the Father as merely transcendent. Much of His recorded teaching (e.g., "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father") seems to suggest that He also believed in the immanence of God; nor did He confine that belief to His own person. I refuse to be tied down to a particular interpretation of the creed, however time-honoured this may be. For the underlying theory of the Christian Church is that we are dependent upon the Living Spirit for the interpretation of the facts of life, including past history, and not upon what various people, whether living or dead, may have thought the Christian Creed meant. To me Christianity is the symbolism of factuality, but the factuality is far more important than the symbolism.

Further, it seems to me that Mr. Lloyd is as unscientific in denying that there is evidence of loving purpose in the universe—so far as we know it—as we should be if we denied that there is much which conflicts or seems to conflict with love. To state that the world is "chock-full of evils and wrongs, of injustice and oppression, etc.," is to say an obvious and trite truism. It is true, that is, relatively to our standards of right and wrong, truth, and justice, etc. But if it be meant in any absolute or ultimate sense, how does he know? Surely this is a piece of rash dogmatism as gross as any which Mr. Lloyd would censure among religionists. For here, if I may return the retort courteous, in Mr. Lloyd's own words: "the curious thing is that whilst affecting Agnosticism" concerning the origin and destiny of the vast world process, Mr. Lloyd "immediately blossoms out into a full-fledged Gnostic" who knows what is and what is not consistent with the nature of the force underlying all phenomena!

For any view that the intelligent human mind can form of the ultimate significance of the Universe must be in the nature of a venture of faith, and the vast majority of the greatest minds have put the religious rather than the sceptical interpretation upon the data which are at our disposal. Even at the present time of world-tragedy, we find so vigorous and reflecting a mind as that of H. G. Wells becoming far more sure and definite in this faith.

Mr. Lloyd and those who think with him always appear to confuse two totally different things—Traditional and Essential Christianity. The former, I believe, is a waning belief; but there are many indications (as seen, for instance, in the R.P.A. Annual for 1917, in Colonel Younghusband's Mutual Influence, in Wells's most recent writings, etc.) that the latter is a waxing force. When Mr. Lloyd speaks of what I have called the Father-heart at work in human nature as "a purely natural process," this does not necessarily exclude the working of the superhuman. For Spencer's Eternal and Infinite Energy is admittedly superhuman. His complaint that the Christian Church has not yet seen its prophecy of ultimate triumph fulfilled is curious, to say the least, as coming from one whose whole intellectual attitude should make him conscious of the enormously slow and gradual evolution of Human Society. The Christian Church is not yet 2,000 years old, and yet here is a modern scientific spirit complaining because the highest ideal of human fellowship which it, amid terrible follies, weaknesses, and aberrations, has succeeded in holding up to the world, has not yet been realized. To me, the very fact that we are in a position to sit in judgment upon all such follies and crimes of which the Church in particular and humanity in general have been, and still are, guilty is satisfactory proof that the Christian Ideal and Hope will eventually be reached. There is far more evidence of the Father-heart, Brother-heart (call it what you will) in humanity to-day than there was, say, 10,000 years ago. It does not follow that because "the mills of God grind slowly" that they are not grinding at all, or that the finest wheat-flour will not be the ultimate deposit. Man having come so far on his journey is, I am convinced, destined to go the whole way. Rationalism, in helping to rid the jungle of much that hinders, will not succeed (to vary the metaphor) in torpedoing Humanity's Hope. And this Hope and Ideal is that with which we are concerned.

Francis E. Powell.

Obituary.

The brief announcement of the death of John Robertson, of 13 Dover Street, W., after an operation for appendicitis, aged 77, marks the passing away of yet another of my old friends and comrades in the Secularist Movement. For upwards of forty years I knew John Robertson (not to be confounded with John M. Robertson) as a silent but very valuable worker. His activity was practically confined to committee and administrative affairs, which did not bring him into public prominence. In the N. S. S., the Hall of Science, and later in the Bradlaugh Fellowship, he rendered service that was highly appreciated. He was always ready and generous in assisting the poorer brethren in time of need, and I never applied to him in vain on behalf of any case that I could recommend. His death is the cause of deep grief to the diminishing number of friends who knew him, and who always regarded him with affection.

Geo. Standring.

Digitized by Google

Where to Obtain the "Freethinker."

The following is not a complete list of newsagents who supply the "Freethinker," and we shall be obliged for other addresses for publication. The "Freethinker" may be obtained on order from any newsagent or railway bookstall.

London.

E.—E. T. Pendrill, 26 Bushfield Street, Bishopsgate, M. Papier, 86 Commercial Street. B. Ruderman. 71 Hanbury Street, Spitalfields J. Knight & Co., 3 Ripple Road, Barking. Messrs. Duncumb & Sons, 287 High Street, Stratford.

E.C.—W. S Dexter, 6, Byward Street. Rose & Co., 133 Clerkenwell Road. Mr. Siveridge, 88 Fenchurch Street. J. J. Joques, 191 Old Street. Mr. Henderson, 66 Charing Cross Road.

N.—C. Walker & Son, 84 Grove Rd., Holloway. Mr. Keogh, Seven Sisters Rd. (near Finsbury Park). Mr. West, New Rd., Lower Edmonton. T. Perry, 17 Fore St., Edmonton. H. Hampton, 80 Holloway Rd. E. S. Smith, 7 Turnpike Lane, Hornsey.

N.W.—W. I. Tarbart, 316 Kentish Town Road. W. Lloyd, 5 Falkland Road, Kentish Town.

S.E.—J. H. Killick, 1 Tyler Street, East Greenwich. Mr. Clayton, High Street, Woodside, South Norwood. W. T. Andrews, 35 Meetinghouse Lane, Peckham. B. Dean, Southwark Bridge.

S.W.—R. Offer. 58 Kenyon Street, Fulham. A. Toleman, 54 Battersea Rise. A. Green, 29 Felsham Road, Putney. F. Locke, 500 Fulham Road. F. Lucas, 683 Fulham Road.

W.—Mr. Fox, 154 King St., Hammersmith. Mr. Harvey, 1 Becklow Rd., Shepherds Bush. Mr. Baker, Northfield Avenue, West Ealing. Thomas Dunbar, 82, Seaford Rd., West Ealing.

W.C.—J. Bull, 24 Grays Inn Road.

Country.

Aberdeenshire.—J. Grieg, 16 Marischol Street, Peterhead.

Barrow-in-Furness,—J. Jowett, 56 Forshaw Street. E. L. Jowett, 84 Dalton Road.

Beccles.—C. Chase, Station Road.

Birkenhead.—Mr. Capper, Boundary Road, Port Sunlight.

Birmingham.—J. C. Aston, 39-40 Smallbrook Street. A. G. Beacon & Co., 67 & 68 Wocester Street. F. Holder, 42 Hurst Street. Mr. Benton, High Street, Erdington. Mr. Kimber, Ash Road Post Office, Saltley. W. H. Smith & Son, 34 Union Street. Messrs. Stanford & Mann, New Street.

Bolton.—E. Basnett, Church Street, Westhoughton. W. Atkinson, 364 Blackburn Road.

Brighton.—W. Hillman, 4 Little Western Street.

Bristol.—W. H. Smith a Son, Victoria Street.

Cardiff.—W. H. Smith & Son, Penarth Road.

Carshalton.—Mr. Simmons, 29 North Street.

Gateshead.—Henderson & Birkett, 4 & 5 Hills Street.

Cheltenham.—S. Norris, Ambrose Street.

Cullompton.—A. W. Clitsome, The Square.

Derbyshire.—Mr. Featherstone, Chapel-en-le-Firth.

Dublin.—Mr. Kearney, Upper Stephen Street.

Dundee.—Mr. Cunningham, St. Andrew's Street. "The Hub," High Street. Mr. Lamb, 121 Overgate.

Falkirk.—James Wilson, 76 Graham's Road.

Glasgow.—David Baxter, 32 Brunswick Street.

Gravesend.—Mrs. Troke, 10 Passock Street. Mr. Love, Gassick Street. Mr. Gould, Milton Road. Mr. Troke, Clarence Place.

Hastings.—King Bros., 2 Queen's Road.

pswich.—A. E. Hiskey, 1 Old Cattle Market. T. Shelbourne, St. Matthew Street. Mr. Fox, Fore Street. Mr. Fox, St. Helen's Street. Mr. Roberson, Back Hamlet. Mr. Joyce, Fore Street.

Jarrow.—L. Prescod, Railway Street.

Kent.—E. J. Voss, 148 Broadway, Bexley Heath.

Lancashire.—John Turner, Scourbottom, Waterford. W. Restall, Station Bridge, Urmston. J. T. Middlehurst, 43 Water Lane, Preston.

Leeds.—C. H. Pickles, Ltd., 117 Albion St. J. Bray, 95 Park Lane. J. Sutcliffe, West St. C. H. Johnson, Corn Exchange.

Liverpool.—S. Reeves, 316 Derby Road, Bootle. W. H. Smith and Son, 61 Dale Street.

Manchester.—Mrs. Tole, Whitelow Road, Chorlton-cum-Hardy. John Heywood, Ltd., Deansgate. Abel Heywood & Son, 47-61 Lever Street. W. H. Smith & Son, Blackfriars Street.

Monmouth.—Mr. Davies, Pontnewynidd. Wm. Morris, Windsor Road, Griffithatoon. Wyman & Son, Station Bookstall, Pontypool Road.

Neath.—W. G. Maybury, 57 Windsor Road.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—W. H. Smith & Son, 2 Forth Place. Messrs. Wilson, 6 Raby St., Boyker.

Northampton.—Mr. Bates, Bridge St. A. Bryan, Barracks Rd.

Notts.—Mr. C. Talland, Budlenutt Gate. Mr. Redfern, Ilkerton Rd., Radford.

Southend-on-Sea.—Harold Elliott, 1 Belle Vue Terrace.

Stockton-on-Tees.—Mr. Elgie, Bowesfield Lane.

Teddington.—H. H. Holwill, 105 High Street.

Torquay.—L. Priston, 103 Union Street. A. Priston, 47 Market Street. A. Peters, Old Mill Road, Chelston. Mr. Ronayne Walnut Road. H. Peters, 193 Union Street. W. J. Peters, 37 Union Street. Mr. Hunt, Lucius Street.

Yarmouth.—C. H. Knights, 87 & 88 Northgate Street. H. Bird, 19 Howard Street South. J. M. Headley, North Howard Street.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

Mr. Howell Smith's Discussion Class (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Thursday, April 19, at 7.30.

Hyde Park: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Hyatt and Dales; 6.30, Messrs. Kells and Yates.

COUNTRY.

INDOOR.

Newcastle-on-Tyne (Collingwood Hall, Clayton Street, opposite end of Nelson Street): 3, J. G. Bartram, "The Necessity and Advantage of Organization."

ENGLISH EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS, by Wilkins and Fallows; price 6d.—Workers' Educational Association, 14 Red Lion Square, London, W.C.

---

92 pp., cloth, 1s. net, by post 1s. 3d.; paper cover, 6d. net, by post 8d.

THE DARKNESS, THE DAWN, and THE DAY

By J. C. THOMAS, B.Sc. ("Keridon"),

Author of "Man: The Prodigy and Freak of Nature."

The late Mr. G. W. Foote wrote to the Author: "Your book requires no introduction; why did you get a Foreword written for it? Its excellence is the only reason why I have not yet reviewed it."

London: WATTS & CO., 17 Johnson's Court, Fleet St., E.C. 4.

The Religion of Famous Men.

BY

WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

Post Free Three Halfpence.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,

Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster, S.W.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in colour; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 9d. post free.—From Miss E. M. Vance, General Secretary, N. S. S., 62 Farringdon St., E.C. 4.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll; 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 9d. per hundred, post free 1s. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—N. S. S. Secretary, 62 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

A New Pamphlet that will prove Useful to Freethinkers and Enlightening to Christians.

PRAYER: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY, & FUTILITY

By J. T. LLOYD.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

(Postage ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C. 4.

Two New Pamphlets by Chapman Cohen.

WAR AND CIVILIZATION.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

RELIGION AND THE CHILD.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

Special Price for Free Distribution, Six Shillings per Hundred.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C. 4.

Pamphlets by G. W. FOOTE.

		s.	d.
BIBLE AND BEER. 40 pp. ...	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT IS AGNOSTICISM? 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR ATHEISM? 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MRS. BESANT'S THEOSOPHY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MY RESURRECTION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE NEW CAGLIOSTRO. 16 pp.... ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE ATHEIST SHOEMAKER. 32 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE. 58 pp.	,, 1d.	0	3
CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM? 120 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	4

Pamphlets by COL. INGERSOLL.

		s.	d.
A CHRISTIAN CATECHISM. 48 pp. ...	post 1d.	0	3
WOODEN GOD. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. 24 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
DO I BLASPHEME? 28 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
IS SUICIDE A SIN? AND LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 28 pp....	,, ½d.	0	1
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
THE GODS. An Oration. 47 pp.	,, 1d.	0	1
LIVE TOPICS. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. An Oration. 30 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
LIMITS OF TOLERATION. 29 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
ROME OR REASON. 48 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED? 39 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CREEDS AND SPIRITUALITY. 16 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1
SUPERSTITION. 48 pp.	,, 1d.	0	2
SOCIAL SALVATION. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
WHY I AM AN AGNOSTIC. 23 pp. ...	,, ½d.	0	1

Other Freethought Pamphlets.

		s.	d.
REFUTATION OF DEISM, by P. B. Shelley. 32 pp.	post ½d.	0	1
UTILITARIANISM, by J. Bentham. 32 pp...	,, ½d.	0	1
PAGAN MYTHOLOGY, by Lord Bacon. 60 pp.	,, 1½d.	0	3
ESSAY ON SUICIDE, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MORTALITY OF SOUL, by D. Hume. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
MARTYRDOM OF HYPATIA, by M. Mangasarian. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CODE OF NATURE, by Diderot and Holbach. 16 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
FREEWILL AND NECESSITY, Anthony Collins. 32 pp....	,, 1d.	0	3
ESSENCE OF RELIGION, by L. Feuerbach. 32 pp.	Nett. ,, 1d.	0	6
LIBERTY AND NECESSITY, by D. Hume. 32 pp.	,, ½d.	0	1
CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Chapman Cohen	,, ½d.	0	1

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on Foreign and Colonial orders.

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.

By H. C. Lea.

In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

This is the Third and Revised Edition, 1907, of the Standard and Authoritative Work on Sacerdotal Celibacy. Since its issue in 1867 it has held the first place in the literature of the subject, nor is it likely to lose that position.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.

An Elementary Treatise on a Realistic Religion and Philosophy of Human Life.

By E. A. Ashcroft.

440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

Mr. Ashcroft writes from the point of view of a convinced Freethinker, and deals with the question of Man and the Universe in a thoroughly suggestive manner.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.

By Carveth Read.

Professor of Philosophy in the University of London.

8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

A Fine Exposition of Morals from the standpoint of a Rationalistic Naturalism.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.

By D. B. Hart, M.D.

Crown 8vo. 1910. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

An Examination of Evolution as affecting Heredity, Disease, Sex, Religion, etc. With Notes, Glossary, and Index.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.

By J. S. Mill.

Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

There is no need to praise Mill's Essays on Nature, The Utility of Religion, and Theism. The work has become a Classic in the History of Freethought. No greater attack on the morality of nature and the God of natural theology has ever been made than in this work.

Recent Acquisitions.

WILLIAM HONE: HIS LIFE AND TIMES.

By F. W. Hackwood.

Large 8vo. With numerous Plates. Published 10s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

William Hone was one of the group of Radical Reformers who played so conspicuous a part in the battle for free speech and a free press in the early part of the nineteenth century. The accounts of his trial before Mr. Justice Abbott and Lord Ellenborough for publishing parodies of the Athanasian Creed and the Lord's Prayer are of interest to all Freethinkers.

THE ENGLISH WOMAN: STUDIES IN HER PSYCHIC EVOLUTION.

By D. Staars.

Published 9s. net. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

An Evolutionary and Historic Essay on Woman. With Biographical Sketches of Harriet Martineau, George Eliot, and others.

By the Hon. A. S. G. Canning.

INTOLERANCE AMONG CHRISTIANS.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

RELIGIOUS STRIFE IN BRITISH HISTORY.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 5d.

THE POLITICAL PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

The Three Volumes post free for 5s.

THE CRIMINAL PROSECUTION AND CAPITAL PUNISHMENT OF ANIMALS.

By E. P. Evans.

A Careful Study of one of the most curious of Mediæval Superstitious Practices. There is an Appendix of Documents which adds considerably to the value of the work. Published 1906. With Frontispiece.

384 pp. Published 7s. 6d. Price 2s., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?

By Chapman Cohen.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

Cloth, 1s. 9d. (now binding).

By the same Author.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY.

Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS.

Price 1d., postage ½d.

A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY. OF FREE-THINKERS.

By J. M. Wheeler.

Price 3s. net, postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.

By G. W. Foote and W. P. Ball.

For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.

By G. W. Foote.

First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.

By J. M. Wheeler.

Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Printed and Published by The Pioneer Press (G. W. Foote and Co., Ltd.), 61, Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ·· EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 16 SUNDAY APRIL 22, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
Providence and the War.—The Editor	241
The Roots of the Christian Tree.—J. T. Lloyd	242
Swinburne: Man and Poet.—Mimnermus	243
Science and Spiritualism.—W. Mann	244
The Two Mono-Gods.—Keridon	246
The Bishop and "Cain's Wife"	247
Acid Drops	247
To Correspondents	249
Sugar Plums	249
The French Revolution.—Robert Arch	250
The Monarch of Cereals.—T. F. Palmer	251
Letters to the Editor—Religion in the Army, 253; Atheism in the French Revolution	253
Notice of Meetings	254
Books and Pamphlets	255

Views and Opinions.

War As It Is.

The powers that be have issued innumerable warnings that we are on the verge of a food famine. The destruction of shipping, and the diversion of labour from the work of agriculture to that of manufacturing material for war has involved of necessity a shortage of food, and may end in acute want. And there are prophecies that the food supply may be the ultimate factor in the settlement of the War. If Germany can force starvation on the Allies before the Allies can force starvation on Germany, then terms acceptable to the Central Powers may be arranged. If the reverse, then the Allies may be able to force upon Germany and her Allies whatever terms are thought advisable. To such a pass has this business of "glorious war" come. The course of events have stripped war of its last semblance of greatness, and shown it to be the barbarous, brutal, even cowardly thing it really is. Victory may be determined by the starvation of old men and infants, women and children. For, make no mistake, if starvation be the decisive and deciding factor, it is these who will suffer first and most. So long as food can be obtained, it will be supplied to the fighting men first. The fitness of the fighting line must be maintained at all costs. And it requires little insight to perceive that in this attempted all-round food blockade it is by the starvation of the old and the young, the weak and the sick, that an issue is sought. So much for the chivalry of modern war, stripped of its false glamour and meretricious glitter.

* * *

"Our Father."

In the Christian armoury there is, however, one weapon that seems to fit the occasion. It is contained in the so-called Lord's Prayer—which is, by the way, no more Christian than are most other things in that mosaic of Pagan religious ideas and reversions to primitive animism which the world knows as Christianity. "Our Father, which art in heaven.....Give us this day our daily bread." That prayer seems to fit the situation. If we have a father in heaven, what more natural than that we should ask him for our daily bread? If, as the Bishop of Ripon has assured us, "Our cause is identical with God's cause," if the Bishop of London is right when he says that "this is the greatest fight ever made for the Christian religion," what more natural than to expect God to help? Man is "doing his bit." He is working away in the fields and in allotments. And just at the critical time "God" extends the duration of wintry weather so as to minimize the result of human efforts. Surely that is a poor way of helping his Allies? It is not the way one would expect a heavenly father to respond to "give us this day our daily bread." No earthly father would see his children starve if he could prevent it. Nay, it is his business to prevent it. The law says so, and punishes by fine and imprisonment all who neglect this duty. What are we going to do about God? Not being domiciled within the British Empire, we cannot cite him to answer in a court of law. We cannot fine him, but we could cease paying him tribute. If God won't trouble about us, why should we trouble about God? A neutral deity is of no use in this War. And a deity who ignores us during the War deserves to be ignored by us when peace arrives. And why should we not start now? If we can disband thousands of small businesses that at least produced some obvious result, why not turn our backs upon a deity who does not manage even the weather in a satisfatory manner?

* * *

The Difficulties of Deity.

Of course, one can appreciate the difficulties of deity. For it is not alone the Allies who are his children. Germans, Austrians, Bulgarians, and one must assume, the Turks are his children also. And they also pray "Give us this day our daily bread." Their prayer, one must believe, is as genuine and as heartfelt as ours, and it is answered in the same way. After all, they are his children. German and British, Austrian and Russian, created he them. And to take sides by giving bread to the Allies and refusing it to the Central Powers would be an act of gross partiality. Not only would it show partiality, but it would be risky. It might mean the loss of some seventy millions of worshippers at a time when they are dropping off with alarming rapidity. It is, perhaps, safer to imitate the Pope—unless it is the Pope who is imitating him—and refrain from interfering. Of course, a really intelligent parent would take his quarrelsome children by the scruff of their necks, or the seat of the their pants, and knock their heads together in the hope of teaching them better. But God's ways are not as our ways—for which we ought to be grateful. For did man act as God acts we should not now be celebrating America's entrance to the War. Still, this policy of somnolence has also its dangers. When piety cries for potatoes, and belief asks for bread, there is not much satisfaction in offering—Lord Devonport. And when the Government curtly declines to sanction a day of prayer for victory, but emphasizes the need for ships and shells, it may dawn upon even the intelligence of many pietists that this talk of "Our Father, which art in heaven" is part of the world's mental lumber which deserves to be swept away with the close of the War.

Digitized by Google

* * *

An Unworkable Theory.

Many Christians used to argue—many still so argue—that whether the Christian theory be true or not, at least it works. The War has for thousands exposed the absurdity of that plea. For the Christian theory simply does not square with the facts. Up to yesterday, people in this country were blaming President Wilson because he persisted in maintaining neutrality up to the last possible moment. They insisted that the inhumanity of Germany had been great enough to demand the active interference of all neutrals. At last President Wilson gave the expected word, and a special service is to be held at St. Paul's to thank God for America's intervention. But God still remains dumb. It was not God that brought America in, but German ruthlessness and American interests. The other day two hospital ships were sunk—one by torpedo attack, the other by running across a mine. These ships were not engaged in fighting. They were bringing home wounded men—men who had "done their bit" in "God's cause" And Providence, which could so easily have interfered, did nothing. They sank as certainly as though there were no God looking on. The world is clamouring for food, and the God who could once create a miraculous draught of fishes to satisfy a few fishermen can do nothing to help us. Providence could do nothing to prevent the outrages of the War; it can do nothing to stop their perpetuation. In an age of ignorance, God is active; in an age of science, he is impotent. The Ministry of War does not ask for prayers, but for men and munitions. The Minister of Agriculture asks for more labour; the Chancellor of the Exchequer for money. God is not wanted. He does nothing. The Atheist has always asserted this; and now few of his avowed followers expect him to do anything. The theory of God is unworkable and untrue.

* * *

The Burden of Belief.

But, after all, the War brings nothing to bear on this question that is essentially new. Carnage and folly and brutality are all as old as humanity. All exist in their degree in times of peace as well as in times of war. It is only that more suffer during war that makes duller minds aware of the facts. And whether they exist during war or during peace, they are equally an arraignment of the God-theory. If there is a God, he is quite careless of human well-being or human suffering. The deaths of a hundred thousand men mean no more to him than the deaths of a hundred thousand ants. A couple of million of men locked in a death struggle on the battle-field is only a replica of the struggle that has been going on in the animal world throughout all time. If there be a God, he made, he designed, all this. He fashioned the lust for slaughter, the teeth for tearing, the talons for destruction; and man, with his multiplied weapons of murder, has but imitated his example. The War has only brought the question to an issue for less imaginative folk. To the Christian plea the Atheist need only put the question, "With a God like that, how comes a world like this?" You simply cannot marry the facts to the theory. It is an outrage on decency to attempt it. Common sense forbids the banns. A world without God, and in which humanity is gradually learning the way to better things, is an inspiration to renewed effort after the right. A world such as this, with God, is enough to drive insane all with intelligence enough to appreciate the situation.

Chapman Cohen.

The Roots of the Christian Tree.

IV.

Whenever we say that Paul makes a certain statement, all we mean to convey is that it occurs in some document which bears Paul's name, whether actually written by him or not. The genuineness or spuriousness of the Pauline Epistles is a problem that does not at present concern us, our only point being that the claim found in Galatians i. 11, 12, whether made by an historical Paul, or by someone writing in his name for a school known as Pauline, is absolutely false. The Pauline Gospel, in all its essential features, had been in existence for centuries before the Christian era began. Those influential religions of personal redemption by mystic union with a dying and resurrected Saviour-God, of which Professor Bacon speaks in his Making of the New Testament, were Oriental cults, some of which had flourished in the East for countless ages before the marvellous conquests of Alexander rendered their diffusion in the Western world practicable. Osiris, Adonis, Attis, and Mithra were ancient Saviour-Gods, after the order of whom the Christian Saviour-God came to be fashioned. Baptism was a well-known rite of initiation into the Mysteries, even in the West, before Christianity appeared on the scene. It mystically brought the initiated into vital touch with the slain and risen Lord; and the Christian sacrament of baptism was instituted on the lines of its Pagan prototype. The same thing is even more prominently true of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the truth of which proposition we shall now proceed to establish.

The following is Harnack's account of what the Eucharist meant to the primitive Church:—

> It was a mysterious, divine gift of knowledge and of life; it was a thanksgiving, a sacrifice, a representation here and now of the death of Christ, a love-feast of the brotherhood, a support of the hungry and distressed. No single observance could well be more than that, and it preserved this character for long, even after it had passed wholly into the region of the mysterious (Expansion of Christianity, vol. ii., p. 53).

According to the teaching of the orthodox Church in all ages this sacrament was instituted by Christ himself on the eve of his crucifixion. So far as the Four Gospels are concerned, however, only the Synoptists record such an institutionary ceremony, and so meagre is this record, that one is naturally led to doubt the historicity of the alleged event. So vague is the language employed, that we cannot legitimately infer from it that the Gospel Jesus intended that that simple parting meal of bread and wine should become a permanency. The only hint that such a permanency was contemplated occurs in Luke xxii. 19 ("This do in remembrance of me"), a passage which Westcott and Hort regard as no part of the original text. The curious thing is that the Fourth Gospel contains no allusion whatever to the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, although it does represent the Master as teaching (vi. 53) that "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have not life in yourselves." This is fully developed mysticism, and it shows that the writer must have been familiar with Pagan mythology.

Another illuminating fact is that the author or redactor of 1 Cor. xi. 23-29 represents the institution of the Lord's Supper as having been specially revealed to the Apostle Paul by the Lord Jesus himself, as if the occurrence of such an institution had been wholly unknown until the apostolate was Divinely conferred upon him. It is a fair inference from this claim that the institution never took place at all, and that the Synoptic accounts of it were interpolated from that passage in Corinthians. The truth seems to be that the Christian Eucharist is the counterpart of several Jewish and Pagan sacred meals which had been in existence for a long time. Examining the Pauline statements concerning this sacrament, we discover two things, namely, that Christians of the latter half of the first century habitually observed it, and also that there was a Pagan sacrament practically identical with it, which the Corinthian converts were tempted to celebrate as well as their own. Of those Gentile feasts Paul could not speak with common politeness, though, on his own showing, the celebration of the Lord's Supper was frequently disgraced by disgusting scenes of intemperance in both food and drink. Yet this is how he addresses his readers on the subject:—

Digitized by Google

> Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table and of the table of devils. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? Are we stronger than he (1 Cor. x. 21)?

However, we must do the author of that passage the ustice of calling attention to the fact that "devils" is a deplorable mistranslation of the Greek word "daimoniown," which means not "devils," but "divinitis." Socrates boasted that he was under the sway of a "daimon," by which he understood God's spirit, or God's voice; and he assures us that whenever he listened to and obeyed his "daimon," "dæmon," or "demon," he felt very pleased with himself. It does one good to find that the New Standard Dictionary reminds us of the fact that "demon" in English denotes an evil spirit, devil, simply because "the wrong translation in the New Testament of daimon, as devil, has given currency to this meaning." And yet, after all, perhaps the translators are not so much to blame, because, in the estimation of the early Christians, the very Gods of the Heathen were but so many devils, who, stealing the secrets of the true God, were always more than delighted to forestall him in the execution of his holy purposes. As Mr. J. M. Robertson observes: "it is quite clear that the Supper was a Mithraic institution, and that Paul recognized its existence outside his sect"; but that recognition of its prior existence among the Pagans did not prevent him from ascribing its origin to the intervention of Gods which were but evil spirits. Of course, it was their dense ignorance of the history of religions, and their invincible prejudice, which induced the Church Fathers to accept the Pauline view as accurate and authoritative. To Justin Martyr, Mithraism was practically unknown, except on hearsay of people whose acquaintance with it was of the most superficial character, and it is no wonder that he accused the votaries of that religion of having borrowed its essential features from the Christians. Tertullian was vastly superior, in every respect, to Justin, but even he held the view that it was the Devil who had given the Eucharist to the Heathen in anticipation, and as a more or less exact copy of what God would later present to his own people in Christ.

Of the antiquity of sacramental meals there can be no doubt whatever. To the Jew, in ordinary circumstances, the drinking of blood was an intolerable abomination, but he was not at all averse to the mystical partaking of it. What was the blood of the covenant that became so common a phrase on the lips of Christians? The covenant was between God and his people who had been redeemed by the blood of Christ, and so it was looked upon as a blood-covenant, or a covenant sealed by blood. This imagery arose, doubtless, from the habit indulged in, under all the great religions of the East, of partaking of a sacrificial banquet at which the God was mystically eaten, or sat as being at once both host and guest at his own table. The sacrifice offered on the altar was a mystic representation of the slain Deity, who, by his death and resurrection, became the spiritual food and drink of his devotees. This custom obtained among primitive Jews and surrounding nations; and everywhere the conviction was that the blood symbolized the very life of the slain sacrifice, because the shedding of it invariably brought about death. Therefore blood was conceived to be the most nourishing food of gods and men. Even the shades of the departed were too feeble to enter into conversation with Ulysses until he gave them blood to drink. Now, in sacrificial meals wine generally stood for blood, and, consequently, we read in most Sacred Writings of the sacramental aspects of bread and wine, the bread representing the torn body, and the wine the shed blood of the Saviour-God. Such was the case in the cults of Osiris, Adonis, Attis, and Mithra, and such became the characteristic of the Christian Eucharist. The Gospel Jesus is made to say of the broken bread: "This is my body which is for you," and of the poured-out wine: "This cup is the new covenant in my blood"; and the partakers were instructed to cherish the fond belief that by thus mystically eating and drinking their Redeemer they would ultimately grow into his likeness.

Now, what ground is their for believing that the Christian Eucharist is of Divine origin, while similar institutions among the Heathen owed their appointment and continuance to the forces of evil ever at work in the universe? And yet Paul is represented as being responsible for the following amazing statement:—

> I speak as to wise men; judge ye what I say. The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ? Seeing that we who are many are one loaf, one body; for we all partake of the one loaf. Behold Israel after the flesh; have not they which eat the sacrifices communion with the altar? What say I then? That a thing sacrificed to idols is anything, or that an idol is anything? But I say that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God; and I would not that ye should have communion with devils (1 Cor. x. 15-20).

As a matter of fact, the Pagans had as solid a right to believe that their Gods were real beings as the Christians had to cherish the same faith in their own. To the former daimoniown were quite as really Divine Beings as God and Christ were and are to the latter, and the communion table was the Lord's table to both alike.

J. T. Lloyd.

Swinburne: Man and Poet.

The Boyhood of Algernon Charles Swinburne. By his cousin, Mrs. Disney Leith. Chatto & Windus, 1917.

Life of Algernon Charles Swinburne. By Edmund Gosse. Macmillan, 1917.

No two books of the season are likely to attract such attention as the above-mentioned volumes, for well-written biographies of Algernon Swinburne were much needed. Only the first few pages of Mrs. Disney Leith's book have to do with the actual boyhood of the great poet, but the rest of the pages are of outstanding importance. Mr. Gosse's monograph is a full-dress biography in the grand manner, which is refreshing in these days of book-making and reprinted journalism.

Swinburne's own impression of the sprightly Mrs. Procter who, when near ninety, "walked like her own granddaughter," is something like that left upon the reader by these accounts of the poet's life. For Swinburne attracts one as a child, and one likes him from the time he first goes to school hugging a volume of Shakespeare under his arm. Lord St. Aldwyn, who was at Eton College with him, remembered his big red head and pasty complexion, but other witnesses are kinder in their recollection.

Digitized by Google

From Eton College, Swinburne went to Balliol College, Oxford, where he drew the attention of Benjamin Jowett, who had a keen eye for intellect. Oxford, that "home of lost causes," had little attraction for the fiery young poet, who was already a red Republican. He tried his prentice hand at verse, but failed to win the Newdigate with a poem entitled "The Discovery of the North-West Passage." As an undergraduate he was a failure, and he left the University without a degree, but with an excellent knowledge of Latin, Greek, French, and Italian. So fervent was his Republicanism that he hung a portrait of Orsini, who attempted to assassinate Napoleon the Little, in his sitting-room. This alarmed Swinburne's parents, who would not allow the poet to go to Paris until he had promised to do nothing to undermine the authority of the French monarchy. Swinburne's political views were well-known, and he was invited to stand for Parliament by the Reform League, at that time a body of much influence, but, on the advice of Mazzini, he wisely declined to give up poetry for politics.

Of Swinburne's personality, Mr. Gosse writes admirably. He notes the "dead pallor" of the poet's face and his "balloon of red hair," which had a faded appearance, although Swinburne was but in his thirty-third year when his biographer met him. Mr. Gosse says that Swinburne had no ear for music, save those of words; but he emphasizes the poet's "rich and flute-like voice." There is much that is interesting in Swinburne's table-talk, but on this point Mr. Gosse exercises too much restraint, with the result that the poet appears too much of a bookworm, and his poems the only incidents of his life.

Few men loved little children and was loved by them so much as Algernon Swinburne. His poems on childhood are among the most exquisite in the language; but his actual experiences were as delightful. Mrs. Disney Leith tells us that few things pleased him more than his encounter with two ragged, highway urchins, each about the height of his knee, who demanded a ha'penny and received twopence, and trotted after him. "Well, what do you want now?" "Want to kiss you." And the poet adds, in the letter describing the incident, "I needn't say whether or not I squatted down and opened my arms, and first one and then the other put her bits of arms up to my neck and kissed me so affectionately that I felt once more how much too good little children are to us."

Swinburne fluttered the dovecotes of respectability with his first series of Poems and Ballads, although some of the poems had already appeared in the sober Spectator, and the austere John Ruskin had given the book his blessing. "In power and imagination and understanding," Ruskin said, "he simply sweeps me away before him, as a torrent does a pebble." Indeed, the volume aroused as much excitement as Byron's Don Juan had in a previous generation. Robert Buchanan voiced the respectable view in a pamphlet, entitled The Fleshly School of Literature, and complained that Poems and Ballads were unfit reading for young ladies. Swinburne retorted with crushing effect: "I do not write for schoolgirls, I leave that to the Buchanans." The accusation of fleshliness was ill-founded, but it served to advertise the book, which was a masterpiece among masterpieces. Swinburne's vogue became extraordinary. Some idea of the poet's influence may be gathered from Canon Scott Holland, who says young men shouted the poems, sang them, flung them about to the skies and winds. Then the Canon quotes:—

> Dream that the lips once breathless
> Can quicken if they would;
> Say that the soul is deathless;
> Dream that the gods are good.
>
> Say March may wed September,
> And time divorce regret;
> But not that you remember,
> And not that I forget.

Not only University men were affected by Swinburne's verse, for G. W. Foote has told us how the poet's lyrics roused him like a trumpet-blast. One memorable day the future Freethought leader, then a young man, recited Swinburne's Mater Triumphalis on the hills outside Edinburgh, while his life-long friend, Joseph Wheeler, lay on the grass at his feet and applauded. Nor is this to be wondered at, for Swinburne has surpassed all other poets in the ardour of his devotion to Liberty and Freethought.

The last thirty years of his life he lived at Putney with his "best friend," Watts-Dunton, and so quietly did the years run, that Mr. Gosse has crowded the history of that period into almost as few pages. Owing to this compression, there are few good stories of the poet's life. One of the best-known is an altercation with a greedy cabman, who had asked for an excessive fare in bad language. Swinburne told him to "come down from his perch and hear how a poet could swear."

Only one love-story is recorded in Mr. Gosse's pages. Swinburne at the age of twenty-five proposed to a girl who had given him roses. He declared his passion suddenly and too impetuously, and she laughed at him. Afterwards, Swinburne, always shy and reserved, seemed only to care for literary companionship. An interesting story deals with the first meeting between Swinburne and Guy de Maupassant, in which the distinguished French novelist was rowing in the brilliant sunshine of a bay in the Riviera, when suddenly there emerged from the water beside the boat the head of Swinburne, who, while he was one of the greatest of swimmers, was the greatest of living poets. It was astonishing to Maupassant to make the acquaintance of Swinburne thus—in the middle of a bay.

When Swinburne died in 1909, there was stilled for ever a voice that had sung vigorously, melodiously, and with wonderful freshness for half a century. His genius, indeed, dazzled us so much, that his own reputation has suffered to the extent of his being regarded rather as a singer than as a seer also. But for his outspoken views about priestcraft and monarchy, he must inevitably have succeeded Tennyson as Poet Laureate. He was the last of the great world-poets who dominated the imagination of all races.

Mimnermus.

Science and Spiritualism.

VI.

(Continued from p. 214.)

A deep longing for some direct proof of existence after death has made hundreds of people accept the grossest impostures of "Spiritualism," impostures which contradict the most massive experiences of the race, and which had nothing to support them save this emotional credulity acting where direct knowledge was wholly absent.—G. H. Lewes, "Problems of Life and Mind" (1879), p. 168.

As to the so-called psychic forces, materializations, etc., it will be useless to busy ourselves with them here. They have attracted the attention of eminent scholars, such as Crookes, Lodge, Richet, and others, but they have yet to be demonstrated, and until this is done, it is better to try to interpret the phenomena observed by known causes. I had occasion to examine without prejudice, and with the assistance of M. Dastre, a subject with a European reputation, but our investigations, continued throughout several seances, disclosed to us nothing demonstrative.—Gustave Le Bon, "The Evolution of Forces" (1908), p. 352.

It should be borne in mind, as Mr. Podmore points out: "It is important to note that none of Home's manifestations seem to have been peculiar to himself. At the outset of his career, indeed, he appears to have won no special distinction as a medium. Raps were heard at his seances; tables and chairs were moved about; the room was shaken; bells, accordions, and guitars were played under the table or even at a distance from the circle, with no hand near them; spirit voices would speak through the medium; spirit hands were felt under the tablecloth, and occasionally seen above it; spirit lights made themselves visible, and the medium himself would be levitated. But all these performances were the common property of the guild. The Fox girls, Gordon, Cooley, E. P. Fowler, Abbey Warner, and even Willis, the Harvard divinity student, were Home's rivals, and apparently, in the estimation of his contemporaries, at least his equals in all these feats. It is noteworthy that Home appears to have attracted comparatively little attention in the American Press before his journey to England." [1]

Digitized by Google

We have always been taught to believe that spiritual intelligence far transcends in knowledge and power the limited intelligence of poor, earthy, material man. All knowledge to them is an open book; nothing is hidden from them either in the illimitable ages of past time or in the equally illimitable ages of the distant future; for do they not, so Spiritualists claim, sometimes warn their earthly friends of coming danger? If the spirits are indeed so marvellously gifted, how can we explain their actions when they condescend to appear at a spiritualistic seance? With the shifting of tables and chairs like furniture removers, playing the accordion like an itinerant Italian or the guitar like a nigger minstrel, plucking dresses and coats with spiritual hands, raising the medium in the air like a professional strong man, and all the other stupid and senseless tricks performed at a Spiritualist seance, it is evident that these spirits, since leaving their human habitations, instead of gaining the enormous intellectual power claimed for them, have degenerated into childish imbecility.

However, there is no need for any intervention of spirits to account for these hooligan antics. We know perfectly well how they were manipulated; and although Home was never publicly exposed, we know, from the exposure of others, how the tricks were done.

Take, for instance, the playing of the accordion and the guitar, which was a common feature of Home's seances. Mr. Hereward Carrington, who has made a life study of the subject, and is a member of the Society for Psychical Research, and also of the American Society for Scientific Research, explains the trick as follows: The guitar is prepared beforehand with a hole in the neck for the insertion of the lazy-tongs, as they are called in America, a lattice-work contrivance of steel, which, when extended, reach out several feet, and will close up to a few inches. "Inside the guitar, which is specially constructed, is a small music-box, which may be wound up and set in motion by merely releasing a catch spring. When the seance is in full swing, the medium gains possession of the guitar, inserts the rod in the hole in the neck of the instrument, sets the machinery going, and waves the guitar over the sitters' heads, when they will have presented to them the strange phenomenon of a guitar floating in the air and performing a tune upon itself! It does not sound exactly as though the music were produced on the strings; but it is near enough for the illusion to pass, in the circumstances. At any rate, the music has never been challenged, to my knowledge." [2] The obvious reply of the medium to such a challenge would be that spirit music could not be expected to sound the same as an instrument played by human hands.

That this was the method of producing music practised by Home is confirmed by a perusal of his autobiographical work, Incidents of My Life, where we learn the titles of the pieces played, namely, "God Save the Queen," "Home, Sweet Home," and "The Last Rose of Summer" [1]—the very tunes found in small music-boxes.

The medium Monck also used a music-box at his seances. Says Mr. Carrington: "He would place a music-box on the table, and cover it with a cigar-box, or other box, and the sitters were at liberty to keep their hands upon this throughout the sitting. Nevertheless the music-box played at command, though the box and table could be examined, and the medium's hands were held. This effect was produced by the aid of a second music-box, playing the same airs as the first, and attached to the leg of the medium, just above the bend of the knee, within the trouser. When not in use the box rested beneath the knee, but when required for action it was brought around to the front of the leg, resting above the knee. The box was so arranged that pressure on a stud at the top caused it to play, the music immediately ceasing when such pressure was removed. Of course, the box on the top of the table is silent throughout, the music being under the perfect control of the medium." [2] Holding the medium's hands would make no difference, for he only had to press the stud on the top of the music-box against the under-side of the table to start the mechanism to play, and when the pressure was removed it would stop.

Sir William Crookes, the famous chemist, in his book, Researches in the Phenomena of Spiritualism, gives an account of how he, along with his brother, Dr. Huggins, and Sergeant Cox, tested Home's power of producing music from an accordion without touching the keys, and comes to the conclusion that Home succeeded under the test. But the man who suffered himself, as we have seen, to be hoodwinked and deluded by such common adventuresses as Annie Fay and Florrie Cook, was not likely to detect the imposture of the astute and tricky Home.

To make the test, Mr. Crookes, as he then was, made a round topless and bottomless cage with wooden hoops and insulated copper wire. "The height of this cage," says Mr. Crookes, "was such that it would just slip under my dining-table, but be too close to the top to allow of the hand being introduced into the interior, or to admit of a foot being pushed underneath it." Mr. Home was to get music from an accordion, newly purchased by Mr. Crookes, while holding it by one hand in this cage under the table.

Mr. J. M. Robertson, under the title "A Spiritualistic Farce," subjected this test to a drastic criticism. He says:—

> Observe, while Mr. Crookes carefully arranges a cage which shall just fit under his table and leave no room for a hand, Mr. Home is actually allowed to keep the edge of the cage a little beyond the side of the table and put his hand in freely, holding the accordion by the bottom, so that the key end hung downward. The illustrative woodcut given by Mr. Crookes shows this. The table, then, played no part whatever as a test, and the adjustment of the cage's height was a pure blind or a pure irrelevance. If Mr. Home was going to employ a new force under scientific conditions, there was no need for the table at all. He might much more convincingly have done it in the open. The investigators

[1] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., p. 231.

[2] Carrington, The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism, p. 197.

[1] Home, Incidents in My Life (1863), pp. 145-186. Also vol. ii. (Second Series; 1872), p. 121.

[2] Carrington, The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism, p. 199.

Digitized by Google

saw that he had placed his other hand on the table, and they held his feet. All these checks could have been better employed if they sat in a free space with the accordion in the middle.[1]

Of course, under these conditions, the accordion moved and played; but Mr. Crookes states that when, after a time, Home removed his hand from the cage, the accordion still continued to play. After a very careful analysis of Mr. Crookes' statement of the proceedings, which is too long to quote here, Mr. Robertson further points out: "In all this narrative there is not a grain of scientific proof that the sounds heard really came from the accordion under notice. It is a well-established scientific fact that it is often extremely difficult to fix with accuracy the locality of the source of sounds. This has been brought home by ocular demonstration to thousands of people at the entertainments of Mr. Stuart Cumberland, who got persons from his audience to submit to be blindfolded on his platform, while he clicked coins in various positions near them. When I saw the performance, none of the blindfolded persons ever came near guessing where the sounds had been made; and the miscalculations were generally astonishing. A sound visibly produced at a blindfolded man's knee would be supposed by him to come from behind his head, or from some way off. Now, in the case of Mr. Crookes' accordion experiment, the whole explanation may perfectly well turn upon this. There may be, for all I know, plenty of ways of playing tricks with accordions; but I have here simply to point out that Mr. Crookes, a so-called scientific man, did not take a single precaution against this notorious form of hallucination, or against the many possible tricks by which sounds like those of an accordion could be played near at hand while attention was concentrated on the one that was visible.....It is needless to ascertain what was the particular device by which Mr. Home got another accordion played near at hand, or produced notes like those of an accordion (the investigators were evidently not anxious to ascertain the quality or timbre of the particular notes heard) from some machine about his person. He may have done the whole thing by one of those little instruments which I believe are sometimes called 'mouth accordions.' The fact that his instrument was 'generally an accordion, for convenience of portability,' as if there was any want of portability about a violin or a cornet, need hardly be dwelt upon."

We are dealing at some length with Home because, as Mr. Podmore says: "In Home and in his doings all the problems of Spiritualism are posed in their acutest form; with the marvels wrought by or through him the main defences of Spiritualism must stand or fall."[2]

(To be continued.) W. Mann.

The Two Mono-Gods.

A regular reader of the Freethinker has written to ask if I would oblige him with a fuller description of the distinction between the two kinds of Mono-theisms to which I briefly alluded to in my article on "Religion and Brutality." As, however, other readers of this journal may be similarly interested in the subject, I take the liberty of replying to it through the medium of its columns.

Philosophic Mono-theism is the product of that irresistible impulse of the human intellect to speculate or guess about imagined existences behind the veil of phenomena. In other words, it is the product of metaphysical speculation in its vain search for ultimate realities. Priestly Mono-theism, on the other hand, is the off-spring of human superstition, sacerdotal ambition, and arrogant pride.

The distinction between them is very analogous to that existing between mind and body. The metaphysical variety is a kind of spiritual entity or "soul"—a disembodied abstraction without temple, church, altar, fane, or any kind of sacred abode; without priesthood, Bible, or any form of ritual worship. It has, likewise, no dogmatic creed. Its tenets are not dogmas but mere postulates to be knocked down and replaced by the next metaphysical conjurer. Its Deity is a nameless abstraction of man—without body, and more or less without feelings and emotions. Only intellect is left, but not the intellect which acquires knowledge through experience and reason. But a kind of divine receptacle of self-existing cognition. In short, it is an abstraction of knowledge, as "whiteness" is of the quality "white" which things possess in relation to the eye. There is no such a thing as whiteness apart from white things. But the mind can think of the quality as if it were self-existent; so it can do of cognition or knowledge and call it God. It is probably found embodied in a pure form only in Greek philosophy.

Now, contrast with this bodiless abstraction of the metaphysical mind the corporeal product of the priesthood. The Theism of the latter is fully embodied in a material cult with all the self-interest, appetite, and voracity which the possession of a body entails. This spectacular manifestation is not ghostly in "texture," but is a very tangible object with substantial limbs and organs—temples and churches, sacred shrines and books, priesthoods, dogmatic creeds, and expiatory rites. This bodily incarnation of the Deity in a sacerdotal cult has been guarded by its priesthood with all the jealous care of one fully realizing the fact that when this "body" is slain its good perforce dies with it. It is, therefore, perpetuated from age to age by a deeply rooted and widely spread organization of material self-interests.

How two conceptions so diametrically opposite should become included under the same term is an instance of the treacherous imperfection of speech. The two ideas became identified in exactly the same way as all Pagan practices, rites, and festivals became Christian—by adoption and absorption.

The early Christian apologists first denounced and reviled all Pagan speculation, but later espoused its tenets by identifying them with some of its own dogmas. In this manner the speculations of Platonism and of its derivatives were, one by one, incorporated and assimilated with Christian dogma. We have a noted example of this practice in the fourth Gospel, which is simply an ingenious adaptation of Logos speculation thrown into the form of a story of a concrete life. Just as the Roman Saturnalia became the Christian Christmas, so the Mono-theism of Greek philosophy became identified and fused with that of the Jewish and Christian priesthoods—that is, with promoted and exalted Jahveh. Ever since, this Deity has played a double role. He is a metaphysical Mono-God in "learned" theological treatises and metaphysical disquisitions, but simply a tribal-God, whose tribe is the Church, in the current religion of Christendom.

Keridon.

Man is by birth so poor a creature that he is good only when he dreams. He needs illusions to make him do what he ought to do for the love of good. This slave has need of fear and of lies to perform his duty. You get the mass of men to make sacrifices only by giving them assurances that they will be paid back. The self-denial of the Christian is only a shrewd calculation, an investment for the sake of the kingdom of God.—Renan.

[1] The National Reformer, September 20, 1891.

[2] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., p. 223.

Digitized by Google

Acid Drops.

"Speak, that I may know you," said a wise old philosopher, and no one better illustrates the wisdom of the saying than our Bishop of London. He was interviewed recently by Mr. Raymond Blaythwayt, and as that gentleman thinks there is "no finer representative of Anglicanism than Dr. Ingram," either the reflection hits the Anglican Church hard, or interviewer and interviewed were well matched. The mental calibre, and perhaps the truthfulness, of Bishop Ingram are well shown by his informing Mr. Blaythwayt that when he first addressed a crowd of East End men, he was asked by them to talk on "Cain's wife." But, said the Bishop, "I soon settled Cain's wife, and we buried the poor old lady in Bethnal Green that afternoon, and I do not believe they've dug her up since." And to this piece of history Mr. Blaythwayt adds that the Bishop's addresses to Atheists in Victoria Park "were for years the most popular and effective things in the whole religious life of that part of the world."

To begin with, the Bishop of London never gave any addresses to Atheists. His lectures were delivered, either from a Christian Evidence platform to a crowd of Christians, or to other Christians in the hall of Oxford House. And their effectiveness may be gauged by the fact that Freethought propaganda was never more flourishing in Victoria Park than during the period of Bishop Ingram's activity. The only time that the Bishop came to direct grips with Atheists was on the few occasions on which he summoned courage enough to offer opposition to Mr. Cohen at the conclusion of the latter's lectures. And on that we will only say that his appearance was much enjoyed—by Atheists. Finally, Bishop Ingram's capacity for meeting Atheists in discussion is sufficiently disclosed by his impression that the cardinal point in dispute is "Cain's wife"—a subject that we have never heard any Atheist waste five minutes' serious discussion over. The Bishop has built up a perfect legend concerning the fearful onslaughts he made on Atheism in East London, and he has told the story so often that he appears to have convinced himself of its truth. But he has always been careful enough never to tell the story to an audience conversant with the facts.

The religious mind moves very slowly. The Tablet describes Martin Luther as a "religious revolutionist." So he was, four hundred years ago!

The Christian Science Journal contains four pages of names of Christian Science practitioners in Great Britain, all of whom are described as "members of the Mother Church." The patients have our entire sympathy.

Commenting on an article on cemetery reform, the New Church Magazine says "the author has nothing to say about what takes place after the funeral. This is what really matters." Was the writer thinking of the insurance money?

Providence, who counts the hairs of our heads and takes special care of sparrows, appears somewhat indifferent to the fate of children, three of whom were burnt to death at Spennymoor, their mother being away only ten minutes.

A daily paper refers to the greater number of boys being born as a "timely intervention of Providence." Surely, "timely" is not the right word, and the intervention is tardy, unless the War is to rage for another twenty years.

The Tablet, one of the leading Catholic periodicals, has some interesting remarks on Mexico: "The new constitution of Mexico appears to be established on a frankly anti-Christian basis. No monk or nun or priest is allowed to teach in any primary school. The religious are disposed of in the following paragraph: 'The State cannot recognize any compact, agreement, or contract, which will tend to lower, lose, or sacrifice the liberty of man, either through work, education, or religious vow. Therefore, the law will not tolerate monastic orders, nor permit the establishment of such by any denomination, for any object whatever.'" All churches, colleges, and seminaries are to become the property of the State, as well as future churches. Marriage is treated as a civil compact, and the clergy are forbidden to join political associations. No wonder the Catholics do not approve of present-day Mexico.

Religious fanaticism is not dead, and recently a fine exhibition of it occurred at Beckenham. A War-shrine erected in All Saints' Church grounds was denounced by Protestant bigots, and as a result of the language used the War-shrine was totally destroyed at night-time. How these Christians do love one another!

Rev. G. C. Martin, speaking before the Glasgow Christian Endeavour Union said: "the Christian Endeavour Movement was the one thing that was linking all the nations together at the present moment." Hear, hear! Look how they are linked together! It is a Christian endeavour—to kill as many as possible in the shortest time.

Rev. Professor Morton, of Glasgow, says that those who advocate Sunday labour on the land forget how easy it would be for God to frustrate their efforts "By a single touch of His hand on the atmosphere all their labour would be in vain." Now we get the secret of the vile weather we have been having. God has put his hand on the atmosphere. And whenever God interferes there is invariably trouble.

We are very pleased to see that the National Union of Teachers is inclined to resist the introduction of clergymen into the schools as substitutes for teachers. At the Annual Conference, on April 12, a resolution was passed promising support to any teacher who refuses to work in a school in which a clergyman of military age and fitness is substituted for a teacher doing military duty. So far, good, although the resolution is not an heroic one. It throws the responsibility upon the individual teacher, although the very reason for the existence of a trades union is to ensure co-operative action. And we confess that we should have liked to have seen a very strong protest against the introduction of clergymen into the schools on any pretence. There are very few teachers who do not fully recognize the evil of such a procedure. The presence of the clergy in the schools is a menace to all who value effective education and place any importance upon the status of teachers.

In view of the fact that the whole trend of modern legislation for the last fifty years has been to get the clergy out of the schools, it is a little remarkable that one of the first efforts of the "Business Government" to improve our educational system is to get them back again. It is obvious that in the village schools especially, the arrival of the vicar as an "emergency teacher" will make the position of the head teacher very difficult. In the large towns we assume that Anglican clergy, Nonconformist ministers, Roman Catholic priests, Jewish rabbis, and Swedenborgian preachers will have equal rights of entry to the schools, and as none of them know anything of the requirements of the Code, the machinery of modern education, or the teaching methods of up-to-date schools, they are likely to be about as useful as the piano-tuners who have been sent to cultivate the land.—Star.

The British Army's exploits in Palestine have been made the occasion of an outpouring of sentiment by editors who cater for the religious public, and some lament the changes in the Holy Land made during recent years by the introduction of the railway. This reminds us of the story of the enthusiastic American lady-tourist who stood on the railway platform at Jerusalem and remarked, "To think that Jesus went on business from this very station."

Punch has the following ironic remarks: "I swear by Almighty God that I will speak the truth, no nonsense, and won't be foolish," was the form of oath taken by a witness at a recent case in the Bloomsbury County Court. It was explained to him that this was only suitable for persons taking office under the Crown.

Digitized by Google

It is evident from a statement made in the Daily Telegraph of April 11 that when the Rev. A. J. Waldron gave up his post as Vicar of Brixton he lost nothing of consequence in a monetary sense. His successor reports the year's income—we believe it is a little better than it was—as £117 18s., out of which he was compelled to spend £116 for repair of vicarage house. He hopes, he says, to recover some of this from Mr. Waldron.

An advertisement, running to about two columns, appeared in a recent issue of the Times, headed "Will He Really Respond?" The advertisement consists of a reprint of a tract intended for circulation in the Army, and consists of a string of pious anecdotes of almost unbelievable stupidity. But the gem consists of a testimonial from Field-Marshall Lord Grenfell to the effect that the tract is "fully adapted for the officers and men of the Army." No more comprehensive insult to the British Army was ever offered than this. And Lord Grenfell owes the Army an apology. A body of men to whom such tracts are acceptable would offer a marked case of cerebral degeneration. If one were upholding the thesis that belief in religion implies softening of the brain, the tract and its endorsement would go far towards proving it.

Dean Wace, of Canterbury, says: "A War like this is undoubtedly a judgment, it springs from the sins of men." And the Church Gazette describes Dean Wace as "the premier priest of the Church of England." It does not say much for the mentality of the rank and file.

Thomas Grubb was charged at Cheltenham with having broken into a house and stolen a stewing jar. After being some five weeks in prison, he informed the magistrate that he had found the need of a Saviour. We do not doubt that in the least. Many people in prison for five weeks would feel just that way. Continuing, Thomas Grubb said that, with God's help, he intended to lead a better life, and it was only by looking to God that he dared hope. Evidently a most pious gentleman, and one who had been, so said the vicar of St. Paul's, very helpful in the Church. As, however, the police proved that this robbery was only one of a series that had been going on for years, Thomas Grubb received a sentence of two months' hard labour. And the vicar is minus his helper.

In Finsbury and Islington more than thirty War shrines have been erected. We have nothing to say against a suitable memorial to men who have lost their lives in the War, and much to say for it, but these War shrines are just one more illustration of the way in which the clergy are seeking to exploit the War in the interests of sectarianism.

Rev. C. L. Drawbridge, Secretary of the Christian Evidence Society, writes to the Church Times that some of their lecturers are "converted Atheists." We have heard of these converted Atheists before, and we should be interested in knowing who they are. Usually they are only known as Atheists after their conversion. Christians might retort they had the grace to hide it before. All the same, it enhances their value, even though they lack a local habitation and a name.

The Rev. Dr. Murphy has been enlightening a Belfast audience on the question of "Has Christianity Failed?" His conclusion is that Christianity has failed in Germany, but nowhere else. It has not failed in Britain, or Italy, or France, or Belgium. Well, if it had only failed in Germany, that would have been a failure on a sufficiently large scale. But in what sense has it failed in Germany, and nowhere else? Is it because Germany has trusted to get its own way by force? And is that quite a new thing in the history of nations? Were armies and navies unknown outside Germany? or have not all nations reckoned their greatness in terms of their ability to exercise military pressure whenever the occasion should arise for its expression? Dr. Murphy says that Germany has repudiated the teaching, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth," and says, "Blessed are the valiant, for they shall make the earth their throne." Presumably, Britain, with six million soldiers under arms and the largest fleet in the world, is still trusting to meekness to inherit the earth! Of all cant, the cant of the pulpit is the worst. Honesty there seems a sheer impossiblity.

We wonder what Dr. Murphy would make of the Government's recent refusal to appoint a day of national prayer for a speedy victory? They are asking for more men, but decline to waste time praying for victory without the men. Of course, Christianity has not failed. It produces as many hypocrites now as it ever did.

Says Dean Inge: "As for the survival of the physical organism by which we are known to others as individuals, when we think of our bodily and mental make-up, with all its disharmonies, its inherited and acquired defects, which have fretted and tormented us all our days, do we want it resuscitated in another state of existence?" Apparently Dean Inge does not. But if this does not survive, what does? And without it how can it be me or you? All that is required to see the absurdity of the belief in survival is to reason out its corolleries and consequences.

Dean Inge thinks we have heard too much about praying for victory. He says: "It is more in accord with the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount to commend our cause to God's hands in a few earnest words and then attend to munitions and recruiting." We fancy that Dean Inge must have a different version of the Sermon on the Mount to the one we possess. We have not the opinion of the New Testament Jesus that Dean Inge has; but, for the life of us, we cannot picture him engaged in making munitions or serving behind a machine-gun.

There is no relief for the Bishop of London. The treasurer of the London Diocesan Financial Board has reported anent the Bishop's offer to surrender his income if certain conditions were fulfilled that the Board cannot accept the proposal without an Act of Parliament. So the poor Bishop must still struggle along under his burden of £10,000 a year. One would think there must be some way of getting rid of the money if one really wished to.

There were nearly 1,000 fewer confirmations in the Church of England last year, and about half a million less received in the shape of voluntary offerings. The last, we can well believe, was a cause of great regret.

Father Bernard Vaughan describes Protestantism as "dead as scrapped iron," but he adds, "the Catholic Church is as vigorous and as enterprising as ever." Yet nearly 50,000 parsons get a living out of the "dead" Protestantism in this country alone.

Germany celebrates the fourth centenary of the day when Martin Luther nailed his famous theses to the church door in Wittenberg. Surely an extraordinary proceeding on the part of a nation of "Atheists."

In a pastoral letter signed by three Essex Nonconformist ministers, readers are told that "men of all shades of opinion believe that God is allowing the War to continue until we beeome a God-fearing people." In that case, the War will never end; a prospect which ought to appeal to ministers of religion exempted from military service.

What a curious world the clergy do live in! All things are judged from the ecclesiastical standpoint. In the Church Gazette for March there is an article on the Kikuyu controversy, around which, the editor adds, "centre all the important issues of the future." And this after nearly three years of a world-war. When will the clergy realize that they are, as a class, out of harmony with modern life.

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

April 29, South Place Institute, South Place, Moorgate Street, E.C.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—May 6, South Place Institute, South Place, Moorgate Street, E.C.

W. Fitzpatrick.—Thanks for cuttings.

T. Wood.—It is depressing to reflect on the prevalence of the type of mind to which such pamphlets as those you enclose are acceptable. Thanks for cuttings.

H. T. D.—We certainly should contest the proposition that religion offers direct encouragement to dishonesty.

E. Stewart Ross.—We are pleased to have the memento of one of our lost soldiers of the Army of Freethought. Thanks also for cutting, but the subject was dealt with a week or so back. Your appreciation of the Freethinker is valued.

S. L.—Sorry we cannot use the MSS. We are constantly compelled to return articles because of their length. We prefer them not to exceed two or two and a half columns.

T. W. Haughton.—When possible, we act as you suggest with regard to persons criticized in these columns.

Frances Ivor.—We are not pleased to find that our estimate of the behaviour of the press was correct, neither are we surprised. We simply know British newspapers. And there is not a more complete imposture in the country than our "Free Press." It was not a free press in peace time; it is still worse under war conditions.

Gramatiko.—The correction was quite justified. Thanks.

E. Anderson.—Next week.

C. W. Marshall.—Thanks; but we almost blushed.

Pax.—Pleased you found last week's "Views and Opinions" so much to your taste. But you wield a pretty pen yourself, and your judgment is the more to be valued on that account.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The details of the course of lectures at South Place Institute have now been arranged, and will be found on the last page of this issue. The first lecture will be on April 29 by Mr. Cohen on "Religion Before and After the War." The other two evenings will be filled by Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Harry Snell. We hope that London Freethinkers will do their best to make these meetings as widely known as possible. We must largely rely upon their efforts—under present conditions—for the success of the meetings. Some conveniently sized advertisements of the three meetings have been printed, and those willing to assist in their distribution would oblige by writing to Miss Vance at the N.S.S. Offices, 62 Farringdon Street, E.C.

We publish this week two pamphlets which, we think, will be found very useful for propagandist purposes. The first is a new and revised edition of Mr. Foote's Christianity and Progress, to this has been added a chapter on "Mohammedanism and the Sword." Together the two make a most effective piece of writing, and those who wish to read our late leader at his best will be able to do so in this pamphlet. Many another writer, fonder of parading his reading than was G. W. Foote, would have made a couple of volumes out of Christianity and Progress. But it was not his custom to place all his wares in the front window, and only those conversant with the subject can properly appreciate all that is contained in a page or even a paragraph. There is, indeed, a philosophy of the rise of Christianity in the opening paragraphs, and a complete exposure of Christianity's claim to stand as a force for progress in all that follows. Mohammedanism and the Sword now appears in pamphlet form for the first time.

The second pamphlet is a reissue of Mr. Mann's excellent articles on Christianity and Morality. Those who read these articles as they appeared will, we are sure, be pleased to have them in a more handy form. The pamphlet will supply Freethinkers with exactly the kind of information needed in their talks with Christians, and few Christians will be able to read it without having their inherited notions on the subject seriously disturbed. Not the least valuable part of the pamphlet is the authorities cited for every statement made. As a guide to reading this will be found of value to many. Each pamphlet is in a neat cover, price twopence, or by post twopence halfpenny.

We hope that our readers will pay special attention to what was said last week on the subject of "returns." It appears to be certain that a decree—we think that is the correct word in these days of democratic dictatorship—will shortly be issued, forbidding the issue of papers on sale or return. This means a diminution of income at a time when every loss in that direction is a serious item. The only way, therefore, for those interested in the Freethinker to get it displayed will be for them to either get their newsagent to run the risk of ordering an extra copy or so for display, or themselves guaranteeing the newsagent against loss by taking the extra copy if unsold. And, in any case, we hope that all our readers will make it a point of ordering their copy weekly, and so make sure of getting it.

Birmingham did well in honouring, on Saturday, April 14 the centenary of the birth of George Jacob Holyoake. A very appreciative letter was read from Earl Grey, in which he described Holyoake as the "architect of a great voluntary co-operative commonwealth," and declared that he had "rendered a greater service to our country than all the legislators at Westminster." Doubtless Earl Grey meant well by this expression, but the compliment does not strike us as excessive. Unless Holyoake had done more than our Westminster legislators, his services to the country would not have been nearly so valuable as they were.

Naturally, our truth-speaking press carefully refrained from mentioning that this great worker in the Co-operative Movement was an Atheist. It would never have done to have told the truth in this matter. And it is highly significant that the two men who did so much for working-class education in this country—G. J. Holyoake and Robert Owen, from whom the former derived his inspiration—should both have been Atheists. And, curiously enough, it was religious antagonism that did its best to strangle the Owen Movement, as it has tried to strangle so many social movements since.

The conditions of railway travelling are such this year that it has been found advisable to once more hold the National Secular Society's Whit-Sunday Conference in London. A large Conference can hardly be expected in the circumstances, but we hope that such Branches of the N.S.S. as can send delegates will make a special effort to do so. Those that cannot may be represented through some London member who will be attending the Conference. It is important to note that all resolutions for the Conference Agenda should be sent to the N.S.S. Secretary as early as possible.

Digitized by Google

At the last meeting of the Executive it was resolved to make a suggestion to the Branches that no additions be made to the list of Vice-Presidents this year. If the present is a period of reconstruction for the Churches, it must be no less so for the N. S. S. And the settling of the Bowman case—we are still awaiting judgment from the House of Lords—can scarcely leave the N. S. S. unaffected, whichever way the judgment goes. A thorough overhauling of the Constitution and the Executive machinery of the N. S. S. may become necessary.

The freedom of the press is a subject that should concern everyone, and we are, therefore, not surprised to find that there is considerable indignation at the War Office prohibition on sending the Nation abroad. An embargo on the publication of news that could be of use to the enemy we can all understand and appreciate. An embargo upon a newspaper's opinion of the Government is quite another matter. And for this to be done by the War Office makes the suppression the more unpleasant. It really raises the question of whether the country is governed by the War Office, or the War Office controlled by the nation. And we are at War to prevent the dominance of a military class—in Germany. When Parliament reassembles we have no doubt the question will be raised. We have still the House of Lords. The House of Commons is almost past redemption.

Our Business Manager tells us he would be pleased if those whose subscriptions to the Freethinker are due, or overdue, would remit as early as possible. As the information is not of much use to us, personally, we hereby give it as much publicity as is possible.

The French Revolution.

X.

The Aftermath.

(Continued from p. 235.)

The fall of Robespierre had enabled the Conservative element in the National Convention to recover political power after fourteen months of eclipse and humiliation. Having tolerated the Reign of Terror, and semi-Socialist measures such as the law of "maximum," as long as military necessity left them no safe alternative, they were determined now to withdraw all their concessions, declare war on the Democratic Party, and establish the supremacy of wealth on a firm footing.

The working-class of Paris, who had rejoiced with everyone else over the fall of Robespierre, soon had reason to think the change of masters a questionable one. If Robespierre and the Committees under the "Terror" had been cruel, the Tallien gang now in power were cynically corrupt. The former had threatened a percentage of the people with the guillotine; the latter condemned the whole populace to slow starvation, for the new Government not wishing to continue the policy of taxing the rich, they had expedient to an unlimited issue of paper money, with the result that prices rose to famine pitch. The abolition of the law of "maximum" removed any check on this tendency.

Against the new tyranny the democrats had to contend with weakened and demoralized forces. The main seat of their power, the "sections" or ward-meetings of Paris, which had enabled them to overthrow the throne and later the Girondists, still existed in name, but their powers had been cut down by the short-sighted policy of the late Terrorist Government. The Cordeliers' Club had been suppressed when the Hebertists were guillotined. The municipality had first been reduced to a packed body of Robespierre's adherents, and now that these had been executed with their leader, had practically ceased to exist. There remained the Jacobins' Club. After the fall of Robespierre, this society became the headquarters of all who still clung to the cause of the Democratic Republic, and the centre of opposition to the "Thermidorian" reaction.

The wealthy, now in power, did not hesitate to organize physical force against the Jacobins. Freron, one of the leading lights of the "Thermidorians," took the lead in this. One of the most odious characters in the Revolution, this man had formerly been an ultra-Democrat and "Montagnard," and had distinguished himself, as a commissioner of the Convention at Toulon in company with Barras, by shooting the captured Royalists in batches, as Collot d'Herbois had done at Lyons. Now, having feathered his nest, Freron transferred his ruffianly activities to the other side, and began to organize the wealthy young men of Paris, armed with loaded sticks, to break up meetings of the Democrats. The "jeunesse doree," as they were called, were reinforced by numbers of Girondists and Royalists, who, released from the prisons, openly paraded their opinions and sought vengeance on the defeated party.

The Democrats now reaped the fruit of their past excesses and follies, particularly of their folly in destroying Danton, their great leader. Led by bankrupt politicians, like the Terrorists, Billaud-Varennes and Collot d'Herbois, they added one tactical blunder to another. The Convention had decreed the arrest and prosecution of Carrier, the perpetrator of the "noyades" at Nantes. The Jacobins must needs defend him and plan his rescue. After a disturbance in Paris, the Convention seized the occasion to suspend the sittings of the Club; and Freron's young men having smashed the premises and bludgeoned the members, the Jacobin organization ceased to exist. Carrier was tried and guillotined.

The Convention now recalled to their seats the seventy-five Girondists who, in October, 1793, had been imprisoned for protesting against the expulsion of their leaders. The reaction now redoubled, not merely against the Terrorists, but against the whole Democratic movement. The busts of Marat were destroyed, and his body turned out of the Pantheon (February, 1795). Soon afterwards the surviving leaders of the Girondists, including Isnard, who had uttered that threat about destroying Paris which had precipitated the fall of his party, were invited back to the Convention. This amounted to a definite repudiation of the policy of May 31, 1793. One or two of the Girondists had become open Royalists during their banishment from public life, and all of them took the lead in accelerating the anti democratic movement. It is to be noted that those who were recalled were the most rancorous and violent of the old Girondist party, who had in former days continually sought to destroy Danton, Marat, and the democratic leaders generally. The milder Girondists, by an irony of fate, had all perished in the Reign of Terror.

The reactionaries now (March, 1795), attacked the ex-members of the Terrorist Government, Billaud-Varenne and Collot d'Herbois, together with Barere and another, and they were called to account before the Convention. Their former colleagues, such as Carnot, defended them to no purpose. On April 1 the working-class of Paris, under the impulse of hunger, invaded the Convention, demanding "bread, the Constitution of 1793, and the liberation of the patriots." The putting in force of the Democratic Constitution was now, in fact, the daily demand of the party. They should, of course, have asked for it a year sooner, before the smash of "Thermidor" had given the reactionaries their chance. The middle classes and Freron's young men now came to the rescue of the Convention. Militarism, for the first but not the last time, was summoned to the help of wealth in the person of General Pichegru, who had conquered Holland the preceding autumn. The disturbance was put down, and the ex-Terrorists condemned to transportation to Guiana.

Digitized by Google

The workers rose again, for the last time in the Revolution, on May 20, 1795. Exasperated by the enormous rise in prices and the insolence of the jeunesse doree (who openly jeered at the starvation of the populace, holding up loaves of bread and saying: "This is the deputies' bread, not yours!") the common people marched once again on the Convention armed with pikes and fire-arms, and still demanding "bread and the Constitution of 1793." A deputy named Feraud was shot dead by mistake for the hateful Freron. This time the majority of the Convention fled in panic. The Radical rump, under Romme, remained in the hall, and proceeded to vote everything the people demanded, the armed insurgents beating their drums in elation at every fresh vote. Then, once more, Freron's bands entered and restored order; the mob were turned out at the point of the bayonet; the majority resumed their seats, and declared what had been done null and void. During the following days the Parisian populace remained under arms threatening the Convention; but their organization was broken; the armed middle-classes marched on the working-class quarters and disarmed them; and the revolt was at an end. Romme and five of his colleagues were condemned to the guillotine, Romme and another stabbing themselves dead in court. About sixty other members of the "Mountain" were imprisoned. The Democratic Party was crushed.

In the south of France, meanwhile, the Royalists and other reactionaries were taking the law into their own hands, and avenging wholesale all that they had suffered under the Reign of Terror. A new Reign of Terror, in fact, was instituted against the Republicans. Bands calling themselves "Companies of Jesus," and "Companies of the Sun," went about killing every Democrat they could hunt down. There were prison massacres as horrible as those of September, 1792, but committed by the Royalists this time, and with no pretence of trial or discrimination. Three hundred of the Democratic Party were burnt to death in a shed at Lyons. Commissioners of the Convention, notably Isnard, the returned Girondist, encouraged the well-to-do to hound down and exterminate the defeated Revolutionists. Needless to say, historians who dwell severely enough on the excesses of the "Red Terror" of 1793-4, gloze over and palliate the yet more frightful excesses of the "White Terror" of 1795.

The working-classes of France had given their support to the Revolution, and fought resolutely and desperately for "liberty and equality," under the impression that these words meant the abolition of privilege, and of the subjection of one man to another's will. They now found that the wealthy, for whom, in the first instance, they had risen, meant by "liberty and equality" no more than liberty for themselves to do as they liked with their property, and that elusive sham which we know as "equality before the law." After the crushing of the last Paris insurrection, the Convention dropped the last pretence of wishing to put in force the Democratic Constitution of 1793. A committee of Girondists and men of the "Marsh" was appointed to frame a new Constitution. On their recommendation, universal suffrage was abolished, and the legislative power vested in two Chambers or Councils, elected, by indirect voting, by those only who paid direct taxes. Hardly a voice, now that the "Mountain" was destroyed, was lifted against the abolition of universal suffrage. One of those who did protest was Thomas Paine. This famous man, imprisoned by the Commitiee of Public Safety during the "Terror," had recovered his liberty after the fall of Robespierre; but, unlike many victims of the "Terror," he did not allow his experiences to prejudice him against democracy. The most popular argument against continuing universal suffrage was, of course, that it had been responsible for the "Terror"—an argument that came very badly from those who, like the majority of the Convention, had supported the "Terror" in its worst forms, either from mere cowardice, or from a sincere belief in its necessity to the national defence. A more interesting argument, as it anticipates somewhat the economic reasoning of Mr. W. H. Mallock in modern times, was that put forward by one member of the Convention, who said that the manual workers were an idle and unthrifty class, dependent for their living on the men with money and brains, and that, therefore, the latter alone ought to have any voice in the control of the State!

(To be concluded.) Robert Arch.

The Monarch of Cereals.

IV.

(Continued from p. 229.)

In the cultivation of the cereal plants no return for toil and care of the crops is forthcoming until the year has rolled round. Among all agricultural peoples the harvest was a season of rejoicing, particularly when a bountiful crop rewarded the labours of the country side. In England and other lands the harvest home was a period of revelry, and many were the quaint customs that accompanied the festival right down to recent times. But with the coming of modern machinery and the opening up of new countries for corn culture, the picturesque observances of the past are everywhere disappearing. One ancient feature, however, has been retained. It has long been the habit of the Irish peasant to journey to Britain to work in the harvest fields, and the corn lands of France and Germany were annually visited before the War by thousands of Italians, and the various races of agrarian Austria. Italy also sends shiploads of her people to the grain fields of the Argentine at the time of harvest, and these wanderers return to their native land each season at the conclusion of their task. This migration of labour has grown from more to more in America. June is the maiden month for the wheat harvest in the States, and many of the workers move northwards when the southern crop is garnered and the cereal has ripened in the cooler latitudes. All sorts and conditions of men co-operate in the harvesting of the vast grain areas of the middle West. Dondlinger informs us that a large number of foreigners, notably Scandinavians, are to be numbered among these toilers and that—> he has found the city banker again seeking in the harvest fields during a brief vacation the health and pleasures experienced in younger years; the refined college youth earning the means with which to finish his course in the East; the Western pioneer making a desperate effort to keep the wolf from the door of the shanty that sheltered his family, and to save the homestead by paying the interest on the mortgage which drought and frontier misfortunes had placed upon it; the dreamy-faced wanderer who merely drifts with his environment; and the coarse, hard-featured criminal and ex-convict.

The leading factors in the increased yield per acre experienced in modern years are improved methods of drilling the seed, fertilization, drainage, irrigation, selection of seed, crop rotation, and superior ploughing and cultivation. From this it follows that extensive farming under which wheat is simply sown and harvested renders smaller returns per acre than intensive cultivation, where every known requirement of the developing cereal receives unremitting attention from seed time to maturity. This distinction is clearly displayed in Australian wheat statistics. Outside Tasmania, the area under wheat in the Australian colonies, increased in most instances considerably during the period 1873-1898. Yet the yield decreased, in some cases, more than one-third:—

Digitized by Google

> During the ninth decade in New South Wales the increase in acreage was slight and the decrease in yield insignificant; but in the next eight years the acreage increased nearly four-fold, while the yield fell off about one-third.

New countries, naturally, lend themselves to extensive agriculture, and France, a long cultivated State, presents the other side of the picture. Good farming in Gaul is providing a more generous return, despite the fact that poorer and poorer soil is being brought under the plough. The average yield on French farms in 1840 was 14·6. bushels per acre; in 1850 it had risen to 15·6. A steady increase in wheat yield is noted in France over a period of nearly seventy years. In Britain, from 1871 to 1898, the wheat area fell over one-third, while the yield increased one-sixth. During these years the wheat fields of France increased one-eleventh, but the crop increased less than one-ninth. The progress of scientific farming in France has been as great as in England, and the reason of the apparent anomaly is suggestive:—

> In increasing her acreage France had to utilize lands of lower yield, thus reducing the average yield of all, while the United Kingdom raised the average by just the opposite process, namely, by reducing her acreage in ceasing to sow to wheat those lands of such a low yield as to be unprofitable.

The decline of wheat culture in Britain was due to the fact that corn was imported from the virgin soils of America and elsewhere at a price so small that the home grower could not raise wheat at a profit although our yield is so high.

Considerable uncertainty seems to exist concerning the causes determining the yield of the American wheat crops. The yield varies greatly in the different States. From 1866 to 1886 the average crop was 12·2 bushels per acre, while in the succeeding twenty years it was 13·7 only. Taking the States as a whole the yield is poor compared with that of Britain. The average of England in 1914 reached 32·34 bushels, while that of Scotland in the same year was a splendid crop of 42·31 bushels. According to Columella, the ancient Romans reaped from 19 to 27 bushels of grain per acre, and a very serious decline is shown by the fact that in Christian England from 1200 to 1500 the crop raised averaged a wretched yield of from four to eight bushels only. In Philadelphia, as late as 1791, wheat appears to have averaged below eight bushels per acre. The yield in the same region has more than doubled since that date. The richest American crops are, probably, those of the Pacific north-west. Soil and climate are eminently favourable to the cereal in that area, and bumper crops of sixty or seventy bushels have been grown in exceptional seasons.

Fifty years ago Spain raised so much wheat that she was a large exporter of the cereal to England and elsewhere. She is now an importing country, many million bushels of foreign wheat are at present needed for her people. Most of the wheat-producing nations have, however, increased their crops, but, probably, not one of them, not even Russia, has maintained the ratio demanded by increase of population. In 1872 Russia was Britain's main source of supply, sending us more than four times as much wheat as she sent us in 1900. Germany and France now need, practically, all their native wheat for home consumption, although, in 1872, they respectively exported to England 910,000 and 660,000 quarters (reckoning a quarter as eight imperial bushels or 480 pounds). Canada, Argentina, and the States are now the chief countries upon which we depend for our grain. In 1872, Argentina exported no wheat to us, but, in 1900, she shipped to England 4,322,000 quarters, while the United States, which, in 1872, exported 2,030,000 quarters only to Britain, sent in 1900 13,561,000 quarters to our shores.

The cultivation of one kind of plant season after season on the same soil exhausts the earth, while weakening the crops and rendering them less resistent to disease. Rotation of crops is, therefore, adopted to overcome these disadvantages, and the modern farmer arranges his sowings in such a way that roots or leguminous plants succeed his corn crops. Various methods are followed in different countries, but they are nothing more than local modifications of the method of alternating roots, peas, beans, clovers, etc., with cereal crops as it is practised in the common four-course rotation—roots, barley, clover, wheat. Under this system the clover is ploughed up in the fall of the year, the nitrogen stored up in the clover roots being retained in the soil for the sustenance of the succeeding cereal crop. In ancient Egypt crops were rotated, and the Romans adopted this scheme. Fallowing the land was also a custom of the Roman agriculturist, a practice still extensively followed. When arable land ceases to yield a fair return it is ploughed and permitted to rest in order to recuperate. The three-field system, so general for centuries in England, was, probably, of Roman origin. This method consisted in raising wheat the first year, barley or oats in the second, while the land lay in fallow for the third. In the eighteenth century, with the introduction of clover and lucerne into England, this wasteful fallow system was avoided by growing these green crops in the season previously sacrificed to fallow.

Pioneer farming in America proved extremely indifferent to the inevitable exhaustion of the soil. The general method was to produce crop after crop until the virgin earth had yielded up its virginity and become incapable of raising fruitful harvests, and then to abandon this exploited soil in favour of pastures new. Vast areas were impoverished in consequence, and science has been compelled to intervene to teach the improvident agriculturist the true system of economy. It has been proved experimentally that plots of land on which wheat is rotated with maize or potatoes return twice the number of bushels as the "best continuous wheat crop," while > Land which produced three crops of wheat and one cultivated crop in a period of four years, gave almost as much wheat and more profitable returns than did the land which produced four crops of wheat in succession.

In the more advanced American States agriculture has now reached a high stage of efficiency, and the prodigal methods of the past are slowly disappearing in all parts of the Republic.

Irrigation is now playing a useful part in corn culture, and its future is brimful of promise. Before the dawn of history its importance was appreciated, and in the evolution of agriculture in the two hemispheres, the English-speaking peoples have utilized irrigation on a very extensive scale. For thousands of years artificial watering has been practised in Egypt, India, China, and Persia. The old Greeks and Romans employed it, and the latter introduced it into Gaul and Spain. In the Middle Ages the Moors irrigated the Iberian Peninsula and made it the garden of Europe, while in ancient America the Peruvians turned irrigation to useful account. In modern Italy wheat is extensively irrigated, and the system is now in operation in Australia, where immense areas originally covered with scrub are now luxuriant wheat fields, orchards, and orangeries. A fine example of British enterprize is the great Nile dam at Assuan, by means of which millions of acres of wheat are artificially watered. This magnificent dam, designed by Sir W. Willcocks, was completed in 1902:—

Digitized by Google

> It is the largest irrigation dam in existence, and the reservoir has a storage capacity of over thirty billion cubic feet. The largest increase in irrigated area in recent years has been made in British India, where about 30,000,000 acres have been reclaimed or made secure for cultivation.....It is estimated that 80,000,000 acres more can be reclaimed in India.....India has the largest reservoir in the world. It covers an area of 21 square miles, and it was constructed for irrigating in Rajputana. It is known as the great tank of Dhebar.

The importance of irrigation will be vividly realized when we remember that even in our temperate climate it was ascertained by Gilbert and Lawes at Rothamsted that an acre of wheat in five months and eighteen days evaporated through its leaves not less than 335¼ tons of moisture.

(To be continued.) T. F. Palmer.

Correspondence.

RELIGION IN THE ARMY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—My communications to the Editor of my favourite paper have been very few—for which, no doubt, he sincerely thanks me. However, as I have been overseas for some time now, serving my country so far as I was allowed, I thought a few words from an Army Freethinker might prove acceptable.

As to my reason for joining the Army, I reply that, although a lover of peace and a great opponent to war, I considered my country was fighting a just cause, and, to a certain extent, in defence of some of my ideals; and therefore I felt it my duty to assist my country. Even looking on the War as two evils, I feel sure I am assisting the lesser. Anyhow, my conscience told me I ought to do something to help, and I did.

It is chiefly my career as a Freethinker in the Army I wish to write about. So to start at the beginning. As a civilian, I was a law clerk, and at the call for men I volunteered, but for a long time was unsuccessful. I was told I was of no use to the military. As the call for men became more and more insistent, I tried again and again, and was eventually accepted as an Army clerk. I passed the test, signed all the papers, and everything went well until I came before the Recruiting Officer to be sworn in. He listened to my request for Affirmation without understanding. On my going into details and explaining the matter, and informing him I was entitled to affirm, and stating my ground, viz., "That I had no religious belief," the poor man seemed overcome. He expressed regret that one so young as I did not understand the Bible, which told how the world began, etc. To this I gently replied I had not come for a discussion on the merits or demerits of the Bible, but might mention for his information and enlightenment it was through understanding the Bible that I had become irreligious. Owing to his ignorance on the subject, I had to instruct him how an Affirmation should be taken; and ultimately, with sighs for the welfare of my soul, etc., he got the job over. I must say, to his credit, he afterwards shook hands, and admitted he did not think my lack of religion would interfere with my becoming an efficient soldier.

My next passage of arms occurred when I fell ill in a camp in England, and reported "Sick." The "sick sergeant" asked for particulars of service, etc., and everything went well until he asked, "Religion?" To this my answer was, "None." "What?" he said, "what do you mean?" I replied, "I mean what I say." "Ridiculous," he replied; "you must have a religion in the Army." "I am afraid I shall have to be discharged," I answered, "as I have no religion either in the Army or out of it." "Oh, all right," he replied; "I'll put you down C. of E." I immediately told him that he would do no such thing, and requested to be taken before my C.O.; whereupon he unwillingly did as I insisted.

I have had the same trouble several times both at home and abroad; but by remaining firm, I have always got my way. I have been surprised, when mixing with my comrades, to find a fair number of them little less than Atheists, although they hid their views officially. I spoke to some of these earnestly on the subject, with the result that several promised to bring their lack of religion up on the next opportunity. I showed them it was this "silent consent" among Atheists which makes it so hard for them to get their rights. Why they should be afraid I don't know, as they are amply covered both by Act of Parliament and by Army Council Instructions.

In my opinion, a soldier has more opportunity to parade his Freethought than a civilian. For instance, a civilian is liable to social ostracism, and even loss of livelihood. There is no chance of a soldier losing his job through lack of religion, else, I am thinking, the Army would soon be considerably reduced. Therefore, I have often argued with these silent Freethinkers, and have received promises of action. I, personally, know soldiers who receive their Freethinker regularly, and yet permit themselves to be religiously classified as "C. of E." This should stop, and I think a note from you in the paper, together with a few words of advice, would do a lot towards bringing them out.

As a soldier, I think I am entitled to express an opinion as to religion in the Army generally. On paper, the British Army is very religious (and this may excuse the singing of "Onward, Christian Soldiers," etc.), almost every man being classified under one denomination or other. But from my own observation and experience, religion, even among the Christians themselves, is a back number. The greater the number of Christians, the greater the hypocrisy. In my opinion, all except the most bigoted are doubting Thomases as to their Creator's love.

I sincerely hope that all freethinking bodies, both in England and abroad, will not lag in their efforts to keep Freethought well alive; then, when the "boys" come home, I shall be surprised if the Churches do not get a bigger rebuff than they have ever experienced.

I could go on folios and folios; but I am afraid you will be getting exhausted, so I will close.

Wishing the Freethinker and all concerned therewith every success, and hoping soon to be once more in a position to hear some of those lectures I so much miss.

Khartoum, Soudan. Arthur Chapman.

ATHEISM IN THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Mr. H. George Farmer criticizes my estimate of Hebert. I am grateful for his criticism, and may say at once that I shall be very glad if he can prove me wrong; for, being an Atheist myself, I do not like running down an Atheist, even when, as it seems to me, the facts compel me.

On one point, and one alone, Mr. Farmer "has" me. I have not seen an entire copy of the Pere Duchesne. It is not easy to see a copy of a periodical 123 years defunct, and I have had no time or opportunity to go to Paris and delve in the museums. If Mr. Farmer can put me in the way of inspecting a copy, either in the original or in the pages of an historian, I shall be obliged for his courtesy. As it is, I depend for my first-hand acquaintance with the Pere Duchesne on a few paragraphs culled from it by M. Aulard in his Political History of the Revolution. I must refer Mr. Farmer to this work, in the original French, and will only add that if the Freethinker habitually employed the English equivalents of some of the phrases customary with Hebert, it would be prosecuted by the police as an obscene publication.

Digitized by Google

Apart from these quotations, I am, of course, dependent on historians; but I claim at least to have been discriminating in using them. I have said nothing as to the story of Hebert's having been dismissed from a situation for dishonesty before the Revolution, since I have preferred to suspend judgment on it, though I have seen no refutation of it in Aulard, Kropotkin, or any other pro-Revolutionary historian whom I have read. I have also refrained from making the usual capital out of the charge brought by Hebert against Marie-Antoinette at her trial, since he seems to have had evidence to support it.

But the main count against Hebert is, in my opinion, that at the crisis of the Revolution, when the Democracy of France had to choose between the right and the wrong road, he threw his influence violently into the wrong scale. I have pointed out that in November, 1793, the Government of France was fast becoming a savage tyranny, which punished not only acts, but even opinions, with death. Every enlightened man ought to have sought, as Danton did, to arrest this tendency. Hebert, on the contrary, sought to quicken it. An "easy-going man.....too little in sympathy with the people to understand and to express the popular aspirations" (Kropotkin, The Great French Revolution, p. 501) Hebert went so far as to speak of an "itinerant guillotine" (p. 512); "to terrorise the enemies of the Revolution and to have the Government seized by his party seemed to him far more important than to solve the questions of food, the land, and organized labour" (p. 534); and his main anxiety seems to have been to get sixty-one Girondists guillotined whom the Government chose to spare (pp. 544-5). I am afraid that not even the most brilliant advocacy of Atheism would make such a man other than a "white elephant" to any cause he espoused.

That is the case against Hebert. I wait for Mr. H. George Farmer, counsel for the defence.

Robert Arch.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

Indoor.

Mr. A. D. Howell Smith's Discussion Class (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Wednesday April 25, instead of Thursday, at 7.30.

Outdoor.

West Ham Branch N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station): 7, Mr. Miller, a Lecture.

Hyde Park: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Dales and Kells; 6.30, Messrs. Hyatt and Yates.

ENGLISH EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS, by Wilkins and Fallows; price 6d.—Workers' Educational Association, 14 Red Lion Square, London, W.C.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll; 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 9d. per hundred, post free 1s. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—N. S. S. Secretary, 62 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in colour; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 9d. post free.—From Miss E. M. Vance, General Secretary, N. S. S., 62 Farringdon St., E.C. 4.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

Post Free Three Halfpence.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster, S.W.

The Religion of Famous Men,
BY
WALTER MANN.

A Storehouse of Facts for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Prayer: Its Origin, History, and Futility.
BY
J. T. LLOYD.

Price TWOPENCE.
(Postage ½d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

War and Civilization.
BY
CHAPMAN COHEN.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Religion and the Child.
BY
CHAPMAN COHEN.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.
FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909.
G. E. MACDONALD - - - - Editor.
L. K. WASHBURN - - Editorial Contributor.
Subscription Rates:

Single subscription in advance	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance	5.00

To all foreign countries, except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra.
Subscriptions for any length of time under a year, at the rate of 25 cents per month, may be begun at any time.
Freethinkers everywhere are invited to send for specimen copies, which are free.
THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
Publishers, Dealers in Freethought Books,
62 Vesey Street, New York, U.S.A.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.

By H. C. Lea.

In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

This is the Third and Revised Edition, 1907, of the Standard and Authoritative Work on Sacerdotal Celibacy. Since its issue in 1867 it has held the first place in the literature of the subject, nor is it likely to lose that position.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.

An Elementary Treatise on a Realistic Religion and Philosophy of Human Life.

By E. A. Ashcroft.

440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

Mr. Ashcroft writes from the point of view of a convinced Freethinker, and deals with the question of Man and the Universe in a thoroughly suggestive manner.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.

By Carveth Read.

Professor of Philosophy in the University of London.

8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

A Fine Exposition of Morals from the standpoint of a Rationalistic Naturalism.

PHASES OF EVOLUTION AND HEREDITY.

By D. B. Hart, M.D.

Crown 8vo. 1910. Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

An Examination of Evolution as affecting Heredity, Disease, Sex, Religion, etc. With Notes, Glossary, and Index.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.

By J. S. Mill.

Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

There is no need to praise Mill's Essays on Nature, The Utility of Religion, and Theism. The work has become a Classic in the History of Freethought. No greater attack on the morality of nature and the God of natural theology has ever been made than in this work.

Recent Acquisitions.

WILLIAM HONE: HIS LIFE AND TIMES.

By F. W. Hackwood.

Large 8vo. With numerous Plates. Published 10s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

William Hone was one of the group of Radical Reformers who played so conspicuous a part in the battle for free speech and a free press in the early part of the nineteenth century. The accounts of his trial before Mr. Justice Abbott and Lord Ellenborough for publishing parodies of the Athanasian Creed and the Lord's Prayer are of interest to all Freethinkers.

THE ENGLISH WOMAN: STUDIES IN HER PSYCHIC EVOLUTION.

By D. Staars.

Published 9s. net. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

An Evolutionary and Historic Essay on Woman. With Biographical Sketches of Harriet Martineau, George Eliot, and others.

By the Hon. A. S. G. Canning.

INTOLERANCE AMONG CHRISTIANS.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

RELIGIOUS STRIFE IN BRITISH HISTORY.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 5d.

THE POLITICAL PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

The Three Volumes post free for 5s.

THE CRIMINAL PROSECUTION AND CAPITAL PUNISHMENT OF ANIMALS.

By E. P. Evans.

A Careful Study of one of the most curious of Mediæval Superstitious Practices. There is an Appendix of Documents which adds considerably to the value of the work. Published 1906. With Frontispiece.

384 pp. Published 7s. 6d. Price 2s., postage 5d.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?

By Chapman Cohen.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

Cloth, 1s. 9d., postage 3d.

By the same Author.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY.

Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS.

Price 1d., postage ½d.

A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF FREETHINKERS.

By J. M. Wheeler.

Price 3s. net, postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.

By G. W. Foote and W. P. Ball.

For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition, 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.

By G. W. Foote.

First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

BIBLE STUDIES.

By J. M. Wheeler.

Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

Two New Pamphlets.

Christianity and Progress.

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

Revised Edition, with a New Chapter on "Mohammedanism and the Sword."

A complete and crushing reply to the claim that Christianity has aided the progress of civilization.

Price Twopence. Postage ½d.

Pagan and Christian Morality.

BY

WALTER MANN.

The truth about the alleged originality and value of Christian teaching on the subject of morals. With a useful list of authorities.

Price Twopence. Postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C. 4.

Special Sunday Evening Lectures

(Under the Auspices of the National Secular Society)

AT

SOUTH PLACE INSTITUTE,

SOUTH PLACE, MOORGATE STREET, E.C. (within five minutes' of Liverpool Street.)

April 29, MR. CHAPMAN COHEN.

"Religion Before and After the War."

May 6, MR. J. T. LLOYD.

"Humanism versus Christianity."

May 13, MR. HARRY SNELL.

"The Faith-Healing Imposture."

Admission Free. Collection. Doors open at 6.30 p.m.

Chair taken at 7 p.m.

Printed and Published by The Pioneer Press (G. W. Foote and Co., Ltd.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ·· EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 17 SUNDAY APRIL 29, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
The War and Freedom of the Press.—The Editor	257
The Roots of the Christian Tree.—J. T. Lloyd	258
Swinburne: Man and Poet.—Mimnermus	259
Science and Spiritualism.—W. Mann	260
Dry-Rot in the Churches.—E. Anderson	262
Acid Drops	262
To Correspondents	265
Sugar Plums	265
The French Revolution.—Robert Arch	266
The Monarch of Cereals.—T. F. Palmer	267
A Story Without a Title.—Geo. Underwood	268
Letter to the Editor—Christianity as Factuality	270
Notice of Meetings	270
Books and Pamphlets	271

Views and Opinions.

The War and Freedom of the Press.

Freethinkers have taken too great a part in the fight for freedom of publication in Great Britain not to feel keenly interested in the discussion over the War Office ban on the exportation of the Nation. The freedom of the press is a subject which concerns everyone, and we do not, therefore, lay ourselves open to the charge of interfering in political questions in recurring to the matter. As an exhibition of policy it was ridiculous, and as a sample of authority, autocratic in the last degree. It was too much for even the present House of Commons, although that body really forfeited its right to complain when it surrendered its powers in the beginning and during the early months of the War. If the sacrifice of all the liberties that have been sacrificed is necessary to the conduct of the War, there is in that fact one fresh proof that a nation at war descends in the scale of civilization, and all the talk of a nation finding itself through war is pure humbug. It is possible for a nation to enter a war from motives of the highest character, although the cases are rare; but once engaged in war, the descent is unpleasantly easy and fatally rapid.

* * *

Reaping the Harvest.

But a Freethinker may be excused a certain malicious satisfaction on reading the complaints made by some papers, and by some people, against this limitation of the press. Some of these lament that they are only allowed to publish such news as is agreeable to the authorities; that things are suppressed not because they are untrue, but because their publication would be inconvenient. And they further add that a press shackled in this way cannot but mislead the very people it is expected to enlighten. All this may be true enough; but is it anything new in the history of this country? Quite the contrary; it is the settled policy of the British press in relation to certain forms of opinion. It is particularly so in relation to Freethought. What certain papers are suffering from "for the duration of the War," Freethought has suffered from during the whole of its existence. To suit its own purposes, the British press has established a close boycott on all anti-Christian news. It has deliberately and systematically helped to build up an opinion which it—for the most part—knew to be false, by the policy of excluding all information that would tell against it. If it had worked to create a stronger and more informed public opinion, it would now have a better public opinion to which to appeal. It is reaping as it has sown. It has treated the public as something to be guarded against the truth, and it does not lie with the British press to protest too loudly when the Government treats it as it has treated others.

* * *

The Press and Religion.

We say that in the main the press of this country in relation to religion—we are not here concerned with any other issue—has deliberately fostered the growth of beliefs which it knows to be false, and it has done this by methods of suppression and falsification. For all the general public may gather from the public press, a deliberately organized attack on the Christian religion does not exist. So far as the press is concerned, the public would be unaware of the fact that a large proportion of our public men in literature, in art, in science, and in politics have ceased to be Christian in any genuine sense of the term. With rare exceptions, no reports of Freethought meetings are published, no reviews of avowedly Freethought works are permitted to appear, and when a Freethinker's work in social or political life compels an obituary notice, the fact that he was an anti-Christian is carefully suppressed. The consequence is, that, save for those who are brought into direct contact with Freethought propaganda, the public is either unaware of its existence, or is taught to regard it as the mistaken hobby of a harmless handful of cranks. They are kept in leading strings by the priests, largely by the interested connivance of the public press.

* * *

Fostering a Delusion.

This silence of the press on the one side is accentuated by its readiness to boom Christianity on all occasions. Let a clergyman announce his qualified disbelief in a literal hell or heaven, or in the virgin birth, or in the resurrection of Jesus, and he is written about, interviewed, and proclaimed as a "daring thinker"! Why, these are not things for disbelief in which a man should be acclaimed; they are things for believing in which a man ought to be heartily ashamed. That numbers can still solemnly discuss, week after week, such colossal absurdities as the reservation of the Sacrament, makes one wonder by what right these people call themselves civilized. Such doctrines do not belong to civilization at all. Their proper habitat is the wigwam of the primitive medicine man. And for the continuance of this frame of mind the press of the country is largely responsible. The public is kept in ignorance—deliberately kept in ignorance—of the facts. It is fed with false news, or with one-sided views. It sees, or fancies it sees, the old beliefs still endorsed by leading men and women; it is not aware that they have been seriously attacked, or are open to serious question. In the greatest reform of all, the creation of an informed public opinion, the British press plays but a sorry part.

Digitized by Google

* * *

A Conspiracy of Silence.

We say this, not because we have a disbelief in the power of the press, but because we have a profound belief in its power for good or evil. Our complaint is that the press lends itself to a conspiracy of silence, and to a policy of suppression such as it now complains at the Government exercising during the course of the War. One consequence of this policy is not far to seek. It not only encourages a condition of complacency on the part of ignorant believers, it induces silence and hypocrisy with thousands of non-believers. Unaware of the number of people who are of the same opinion as themselves, they are overawed by the apparent strength of the forces against them, and, as it is said, keep their opinions to themselves. As though an opinion which one keeps hidden is worth having. Opinions, like money, are made to spend. It is the only way in which they can be made to return a dividend. Even the press itself falls eventually a victim to its own policy. Editors and writers, not themselves Christians, refrain from attacking Christianity because they are afraid of the consequences. If an epidemic of mental honesty were to sweep over the country, these classes would be astonished at their own strength, and at the discovery that the strength of their opponent was largely derived from their own timidity.

* * *

The Way Out.

From this state of things there is only one way of escape, and it rests largely with Freethinkers to avail themselves of it. The public is always inclined to take a party at its own valuation, and Freethinkers have for too long, in deference to this or that reason, practised the policy of keeping their opinions, as Freethinkers, in the background. They have made many movements in the social world, only to find them in the long run captured and claimed by Christians. We suggest it is time that this policy should cease. There is no earthly reason why the possessor of a set of beliefs which represent a survival into civilized times of savage ideas should be treated with special deference. If Freethinkers make it a rule to express their opinions freely and without disguise, and quite as a matter of course, we have little doubt but that large numbers of Christians will take this difference of opinion for granted. Personally, we have always adopted that policy, and we have never experienced any unpleasantness worth bothering about as a consequence. And there was never a better time than the present for putting that simple policy into operation. The War has given organized Christianity a shaking greater than most of its followers realize, and it will be well for Freethinkers to take advantage of the upheaval. At any rate, we advise all to try the experiment, and observe the result. And the press—well, the press will behave with greater courage and honesty just so soon as it discovers there is a large public to appreciate those qualities.

Chapman Cohen.

The Roots of the Christian Tree.

V.

It is customary in many religious circles to characterize the period previous to the appearance of Christianity as pre-eminently dark. When Christ was born it was still night, with only a few stars shining dimly, but his advent was the breaking of the dawn. The late Dean Farrar wrote a long novel, entitled Darkness and Dawn, in which that view of history found eloquent expression; but it is a fundamentally erroneous and misleading conception. If there are theologians who verily believe that when Christ came the world was dark, they certainly can find no honest escape from the conclusion, arrived at by every ecclesiastical historian of ordinary fairness, that it grew steadily darker for eleven miserable centuries subsequent to his entrance upon the scene. As every enlightened and unprejudiced student of history is aware, however, the light of knowledge and virtue had been shining brightly for countless ages before our era commenced; and the younger and more advanced generation of divines is beginning to recognize this fact. The late Dr. George Matheson, the blind poet-preacher of Scotland, published a book in which, whilst claiming absolute supremacy for Christianity, he frankly confessed that he discovered elements of truth in most of the other religions of the world. Since his day it has come to pass that practically every scholarly theologian boldly speaks of Christianity as one of the great syncretic religions which for centuries systematically borrowed their ideas and customs from one another, and which were at the same time rivals for the suffrage of mankind. These scholars openly avow the indebtedness of their religion for literally all its dogmas and rites to older and rival cults. God, Saviour-God, sin, redemption, heaven, and hell, are all candidly acknowledged to be borrowed and adopted dogmas. That is to say, the supernatural in Christianity was taken over entirely from various older religions.

Now, the amazing fact is that some of those who thus unhesitatingly recognize the indebtedness of Christianity to other religions for its supernatural features, have yet the hardihood to maintain that it possesses a moral code unequalled in all history, and on that account perfectly unique. The so-called Liberal Christians are followers of Christ who regard the teaching attributed to him in the Gospels as constituting the sum and substance of the religion that bears his name. Even on the assumption that they are right, the question instantly arises, To what extent, or in what sense, can this teaching be accurately characterized as unique, or wherein does its originality consist? Whatever estimate may be formed of its quality, what sort of a title has it to the distinction which originality bestows? We venture to affirm that every saying ascribed to the Gospel Jesus can be paralleled several times over from either Jewish or Pagan literature, and the majority of them from both. Many of them are quoted almost verbatim from the Old Testament; others from the Talmud; and others from various works by famous Rabbis. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth," says the Gospel Jesus; but a Psalmist had expressed the same sentiment long before, saying, "The meek shall inherit the land, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace" (Ps. xxxvii. 11). Says the Gospel Jesus: "Swear not at all.....But let your speech be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay; and whatsoever is more than these is of the evil one" (Matt. v. 34-37). That saying has two distinct sources. In Ecclesiasticus xxiii. 9, we read: "Accustom not thy mouth to an oath, and be not accustomed to the naming of the Holy One," while in the Talmud we find these words: "Let your nay be nay. Let your yea be yea." We might go through the whole of the sayings, paralleling them in this manner, a task which M. Hippolyte Rodrigues exhaustively accomplished in his Les Origines du Sermon de la Montagne, thereby destroying for ever any claim to originality made for the teaching of the Gospel Jesus. Indeed, the impression created by a careful study of the alleged records of it is that it was never uttered as it stands by an historical teacher, but was, rather, patiently culled from all available sources, more or less altered in form, added to or subtracted from, according to requirement, and then ascribed to an imaginary Immanuel or God-Man, by a succession of the early framers of the Christian cult.

Digitized by Google

That is one cogent argument against the claim to any uniqueness or originality for the Christian moral code; but there is a much stronger argument still, which we wish now to elaborate. Let it be clearly understood that, strictly speaking, there is no such thing as a distinctively Christian moral code. What passes under that name does not contain a single ethical principle or precept which was not already ancient when Christ is supposed to have lived. With this fact as thoroughly established as it can be, it is most extraordinary to find that some people are still able to affirm that pre-Christian days were days without a sun. Had Christianity lived up to its exalted pretensions, that assertion ought to and would have been fully justified. In the circumstances that have hitherto prevailed, it is the very oppositive of true. Curiously enough, Professor Sayce, the distinguished Egyptologist, though an orthodox divine, frankly admits, in his Monumental Facts and Higher Critical Fancies, that the world was anything but dark four and five thousand years ago. Even so far back as that, he informs us, on the evidence of Egyptian hieroglyphics and Babylonian cuneform writings, discovered and almost wholly deciphered during the last fifty years, that already mighty civilizations of high literary and moral culture had come and gone. He says that "the Proverbs of Ptah-hotep, though written more than five thousand years ago, represent the close of a period in the history of Egyptian literature." Then he observes:—

> They had been preceded by earlier books, many of which survived to a later day. One of them has come down to ourselves in a mutilated form. It is a moral treatise, the work of a certain Qaqemna, who lived in the remote age of the Third Dynasty. But even then there were already schools and libraries in Egypt stored with papyrus books written in a running hand (pp. 30, 31).

He asserts that "the Babylonia of the (traditional) age of Abraham was a more highly educated country than the England of George III." With Dr. Sayce's silly prejudice against the Higher Criticism of the Old Testament we are completely out of sympathy, but we entirely agree with his remark that "as compared with the cultured inhabitants of the Babylonian Empire, the Israelitish tribes for whom Moses legislated were in a backward state." Such a testimony coming from an orthodox Anglican divine is all the more significant.

We now turn to a witness of an entirely different character, namely, the late Mr. Winwood Reade. In his celebrated work, The Martyrdom of Man, this man of genius, treating of the influence of the Church in ancient Egypt, by which he means the reign of the priests, he says:—

> Their power was immense; but it was exercised with justice and discretion; they issued admirable laws, and taught the people to obey them by the example of their own humble, self-denying lives. Under the tutilage of these pious and enlightened men, the Egyptians became a prosperous, and also a highly moral people. The monumental paintings reveal their whole life, but we read in them no brutal or licentious scenes.....The Egyptians granted honours to those who fought gallantly against them. The penalty for the murder of a slave was death; this law exists without parallel in the dark slavery annals both of ancient and of modern times.....It is a sure criterion of the civilization of ancient Egypt that the soldiers did not carry arms except on duty, and that the private citizens did not carry them at all. Women were treated with much regard. They were allowed to join their husbands in the sacrifices to the Gods; the bodies of man and wife were united in the tomb. When a party was given, the guests were received by the host and hostess seated side by side in a large arm-chair. In the paintings their mutual affection is portrayed. Their fond manners, their gestures of endearment, the caresses which they lavish on their children, form sweet and touching scenes of domestic life (pp. 16, 17).

Another witness to the same effect is Dr. Wallis Budge, an eminent Egyptologist, who assures us that, some two thousand years before Christ, Egypt had formulated a code of morals second to none of the numerous codes which have appeared since. The same is true of Buddhist India, the whole of which land was dotted with hospitals for the treatment of all human and animal diseases, and in which peace and good will reigned supreme fully two hundred years prior to the opening of our era. Dark periods were interspersed with the bright ones it is true; but never was there such dense intellectual and moral darkness in the ancient Pagan world as that which overshadowed Christendom in the centuries between the fourth and the twelfth; and was there ever a darker period than the one through which we are now passing, after nineteen centuries of the so-called Christian morality?

Our present point, however, is that Christian morality even in its very best features, possesses no uniqueness, no originality whatever, but is an eclectic product whether good, bad, or indifferent.

J. T. Lloyd.

Swinburne: Man and Poet.

II.

> Master who crowned our immelodious days
> With flowers of perfect speech.—William Watson.

> Swinburne was the greatest of our lyrical poets—of the world's, I should say, considering what a language he had to wield.—George Meredith.

From the first Swinburne's genius was unmistakable. In Atalanta in Calydon the strain of clear, soaring song proclaimed a real poet. Poems and Ballads was a masterpiece among masterpieces. There are pieces which, for distinction of melody, even their author has never surpassed. Itylus, Laus Veneris, A Match, the Hymn to Proserpine, and, above all, Hesperia, that lovely lyric where the gloriously moulded lines recall the magnificent rolling of the full-flushed waves.

Later came Songs Before Sunrise, which roused men like a trumpet-blast. Throughout this volume resounded the cry of liberty, the utter abhorrence of tyranny of every kind and in every shape. To compare Songs Before Sunrise with Poems and Ballads is to see how far the poet had advanced in the interval. In melody, it is true, progress was hardly possible, but, music apart, the change is indubitable.

The advance is from the pining of youth to the passion of man. The verse sings and glows with love of freedom. It echoes the thunder of the surges and the clarions of the storm. No poet since Shelley sings more loftily, or with more fiery passion, or with finer thought, than Swinburne when he is arraigning Priestcraft at the bar of Humanity. His most heretical poems will be found in Songs Before Sunrise. The Hymn to Man is frankly, even triumphantly, Atheistic. In the prelude he writes:—

> Because man's soul is man's god still,
> What wind soever waft his will
> Save his own soul's light overhead,
> None leads him, and none ever shall.

In another passage he treats the priests with fearful derision. He represents them calling on their Deity, and

Digitized by Google

he says, "Cry aloud, for the people blaspheme," and he concludes:—

> Thou art smitten, thou God; thou art smitten: thy death is upon thee, O Lord;
> And the love-song of Earth as thou diest resounds through the wind of her wings—
> Glory to man in the highest, for man is the master of things.

In his lines apostrophizing Christ on the Cross, he says with Voltairean bitterness:—

> Thy blood the priests make poison of,
> And in gold shekels coin thy love.

The poet's scorn draws no distinction between the priests and their Deity. The lines addressed to Jesus are the quintessence of satire:—

> Thou bad'st let children come to thee:
> What children now but curses come?
> What manhood in that god can be
> Who sees their worship and is dumb?
> No soul that lived, loved, wrought, and died,
> Is this their carrion crucified?

Swinburne regarded prayer as folly, and he vents his scorn in music:—

> Behold there is no grief like this;
> The barren blossom of thy prayer,
> Thou shalt find out how sweet it is
> O fools, and blind, what seek ye there,
> High up in the air?
>
> Ye must have gods, the frieuds of men,
> Merciful gods, compassionate,
> And these shall answer you again,
> Will ye beat always at the gate,
> Ye fools of fate?

In the Hymn to Proserpine, he sings:—

> O ghastly glories of saints, dead limbs of gibbeted gods!
> Though all men abase them before you in spirit, and all knees bend;
> I kneel not, neither adore you, but standing, look to the end.

In another poem, Song in Time of Order, he sings:—

> We have done with the kisses that sting,
> The thief's mouth red from the feast,
> The blood on the hands of the king,
> And the lie at the lips of the priest.

As a singer, Swinburne deserves the tribute of George Meredith, that he was the greatest of our lyrical poets. From the simplest measures, he ranges through the most elaborate. He can charm you with a lyric, such as The Ballad of Dreamland; and he can thrill and inspire with the great war-song in Erectheus, where the turmoil of battle is rendered in unforgettable language. Above all other English poets he is the singer of the sea. His love of ocean is not merely sensuous. That delight he has rendered wonderfully in his Tristram; but his finest sea-pieces are born of imaginative sympathy and insight. None has so vividly rendered the magic of the dawn breaking over the fields of the deep, or the terrors of the trumpets of the night, and the lightnings of the tempest. Among the cruellest abstractions of the cosmos he exults; he drinks the ether of space as men drink wine. He was also a rare critic, and an accomplished scholar. Observe his masterly essays on Shakespeare and the Elizabethans, and his beautiful renderings of Victor Hugo, Baudelaire, and Villon. Swinburne could write a lovely Northern song, with the perfume of the heather clinging to it; and he could lower his high cadences to the ear of little children without loss of the omnipresent beauty of his incomparable style.

One quality of Swinburne's writing leaps to the eye of the dullest reader. It is his enthusiasm for right causes. The warmth of his praise is an endless delight. Such tributes as he has paid to the great apostles and champions of Freedom have a generosity and enthusiasm unequalled even in poetry. How he has sung the praises of Cromwell and Milton, of Shelley and Landor, of Whitman and Victor Hugo, is well known. More enduring than the marble of the Genoese monument are those lovely lyrics of which Mazzini and the cause to which he dedicated his life were the inspiration. The love of Liberty has been a common possession of our greatest poets, and hardly one of them has failed to give splendid expression to the feeling. But Swinburne has surpassed them all in the ardour of his devotion, and in the rapture of his praise:—

> The very thought in us how much we love thee
> Makes the throat sob with love, and blinds the eyes.

It comes to this in the end. The greatest poet of our generation was an avowed Freethinker and unabashed Republican. It is not strange, for poets have long since ceased to gain inspiration from Christianity. Byron was a thorough sceptic; Shelley was a convinced Atheist; Keats was a perfect Pagan; and Edward Fitzgerald as epicurean as Omar. Tennyson was heterodox, and Matthew Arnold was Secularistic. James Thomson was a militant Freethinker, and George Meredith and William Morris were both sceptics. Thomas Hardy, the most distinguished of living writers, is a Freethinker. Christianity no longer attracts men of genius, and therein lies its doom. The genius of modern times is enkindled at the altar of Humanity, which was standing before any other was built, and will endure when every other has crumbled into dust.

Mimnermus.

Science and Spiritualism.

VII.

(Continued from p. 246).

> There seem to be a considerable class of persons who believe that natural laws are insufficient to account for their personal experiences and those of others, and who temporarily or permanently incline to a spiritualistic hypothesis in preference to any other.....It is a weak though comprehensible nature that becomes bewildered in the presence of a few experiences that seem homeless among the generous provisions of modern science, and runs off panic-stricken to find shelter in a system that satisfies a narrow personal craving at the sacrifice of broadly established principles, nurtured and grown strong in the hardy and beneficent atmosphere of science.—Professor Jastrow, "Fact and Fable in Psychology" (1901), pp. 16-17.
>
> To surround anything, however monstrous or ridiculous, with an air of mystery, is to invest it with a charm and power of attraction which to the crowd is irresistible. False priests, false prophets, false doctors, false patriots, false prodigies of every kind, veiling their proceedings in mystery, have always addressed themselves at an immense advantage to the popular credulity, and have been, perhaps, more indebted to that resource in gaining and keeping for a time the upper hand of truth and common sense, than to any half-dozen items in the whole catalogue of imposture.—Charles Dickens, "Barnaby Rudge," ch. xxvii.

In 1871 Mr. Crookes (later Sir William) announced that he had succeeded in demonstrating the existence of a hitherto unknown force, and had measured the effects produced. Again through the medium of Daniel Dunglas Home. An apparatus was constructed that would register alterations in the weight of a body, and is described as "a mahogany board 36 inches long by 9½ inches wide and 1 inch thick. At each end a strip of mahogany 1½ inches wide was screwed on, forming feet. One end of the board rested on a firm table, whilst the other end was supported by a spring balance hanging from a substantial tripod stand. The balance was fitted with a self-registering index, in such a manner that it would record the maximum weight indicated by the pointer. The apparatus was adjusted so that the mahogany board was horizontal, its foot resting flat on the support. In this position its weight was 3 lbs., as marked by the pointer of the balance.

"Before Mr. Home entered the room the apparatu

Digitized by Google

had been arranged in position, and he had not even the objects of some parts explained before sitting down."[1]

Besides Mr. Crookes, four other persons were present, including Dr. (later Sir William) Huggins and Serjeant Cox, who afterwards attested the accuracy of his report.

After some preliminary operations with an accordion, attention was turned to the apparatus, Mr. Home placing his fingers lightly upon the extreme end of the board furthest from the balance, Dr. Huggins and Mr. Crookes sitting on each side and watching. The index of the balance moved several times, the greatest downward pull registered being 6 lbs.; the index, of course, showing a total weight of 9 lbs., as 3 lbs., the weight of the board, was already registered. The investigators declare that at no time were Home's fingers advanced more than 1½ inches over the end of the board—that is, the width of the strip forming the feet, by which the end rested on the table.

The few scientific men who criticized the experiment contented themselves with pointing out possible defects in the apparatus employed. Professor Balfour Stewart and Mr. E. B. Tylor suggested that the investigators might be under the influence of mesmeric illusions produced by Home on the minds of sensitive spectators. This was explaining one marvel by another quite as marvellous. But, as Mr. Podmore points out, there was no need for such a drastic solution. To begin with, we are told that all present guarded Home's feet and hands; but, as he further observes:—

> It is pertinent to point out that a duty for which the whole company were collectively responsible may well at times have been intermitted. Moreover, Dr. Huggins and Mr. Crookes had to take notes. Again, the experiment described was not the first of the kind; it occurred in the middle of a long series. It is, indeed, stated that Home was not familiar with the apparatus employed. But as similar apparatus had been employed probably at previous trials by Mr. Crookes himself, certainly by earlier investigators—amongst them Dr. Hare, with whose published writings on Spiritualism we cannot assume that Home was unacquainted—the statement carries little weight. Further, a point of capital importance, there had apparently been many previous trials with various modifications of the apparatus and many failures; in Mr. Crookes' own words, "the experiments I have tried have been very numerous, but owing to our imperfect knowledge of the conditions which favour or oppose the manifestations of this force, to the apparently capricious manner in which it is exerted, and to the fact that Mr. Home himself is subject to unaccountable ebbs and flows of the force it has seldom happened that a result obtained on one occasion could be subsequently confirmed and tested with apparatus specially contrived for the purpose.
>
> The real significance of this statement is that Home—a practised conjurer, as we are entitled to assume—was in a position to dictate the conditions of the experiment. By the simple device of doing nothing when the conditions were unfavourable, he could ensure that the light (gas in the present instance) was such and so placed, the apparatus so contrived, and the sitters so disposed, as to suit his purpose, and that in the actual experiment the attention of the investigators would necessarily be concentrated on the wrong points. Under such conditions, as ordinary experience shows, and as experiments described in the last chapter have abundantly demonstrated, five untrained observers are no match for one clever conjurer.
>
> The word "untrained" in this connection may seem to require justification. Of Sir William Crookes' high distinction in many branches of physical science there is no need to speak here. But his previous training did not necessarily render him better qualified to deal with problems differing widely from those presented in the laboratory. To put it bluntly, if Home was a conjurer, Mr. Crookes was probably in no better position for detecting the sleight-of-hand than any other man his equal in intelligence and native acuteness of sense. Possibly in a worse position, for it may be argued that his previous training would prepare the way for Home's efforts to concentrate attention on the mechanical apparatus, and thus divert it from the seemingly irrelevant movements by which it may be conjectured the conjurer's end was attained.[1]

As to the actual means employed by Home to move the index of the balance down, Mr. Podmore has no doubt that Home accomplished the trick by passing the loop of a fine black thread over the hook of the balance, the other end being attached to his clothes—probably at the knee. Mr. Podmore points out that the amount of light in the room during the experiment is not stated, but that at a similar experiment given a few weeks later, "the light, by Home's order, was so diminished that at the first trial 'there was scarcely light enough to see the board and the index move.'"[2] Under these conditions a black thread would be quite invisible.

Mr. Podmore also thinks that Home used fine black thread to support the floating lath in the air, and to prevent small objects from sliding off a tilted table. Mr. Davey, who surpassed the mediums in their tricks, and beat them at their own game, employed a hair or thread to move bits of coloured chalk under a glass tumbler, when the eyes of all present were concentrated upon the spot; and would even by similar means cause a tumbler to glide across the table. As we shall see later on, it was with a black thread that the notorious Eusapia Paladino, the medium who tricked so many famous scientists, including Sir Oliver Lodge, operated on the letter balance.

In cases where exceedingly small particles have to be weighed, the balance is enclosed in a vacuum, this is to do away with the pressure of the air. The balance is placed in a glass vessel and the air pumped out by an air-pump. As a chemist, Sir William Crookes was well acquainted with this apparatus, and if he wanted a real test of this spiritual force, why did he not ask Home to move the balance when it was enclosed in a vacuum? Perhaps he did, and this was one of the many failures of which he says: "it has seldom happened that a result obtained on one occasion could be subsequently confirmed and tested with apparatus specially contrived for the purpose."

To deal with all the phenomena produced by Home at his seances would take too long, but the reader may be referred to Podmore's Modern Spiritualism for further details. The one that has, perhaps, made the greatest impression, owing to the high social position of the witnesses, is the account given by the Master of Lindsay (afterwards Earl of Crawford) of how Home, in the presence of himself, Viscount Adare, and Captain Wynne, floated out of the window of one room and in at the window of another room seven feet away, eighty-five feet from the ground.

Now, first of all, there was no light in the room; but the Master of Lindsay says that the moon was shining full into the room. The value of this statement may be gauged by the fact, pointed out by Mr. Podmore, that on the date given the moon was only two days old—so there was not much illumination from that, even on a cloudless night; and we have no information on that point. Further, the Master of Lindsay was seated with his back to the window; so he could not possibly see Home float in. And, lastly, no one saw Home float out of the window of the other room, as they were seated at a table, and could not possibly see what went on in the other room. What happened was this:

[1] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., p. 237.

[1] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., pp. 239-240.

[2] Ibid, vol. ii., p. 241.

Digitized by Google

According to Lord Lindsay, Home went into a trance, and walked out into the hall. The Master of Lindsay then heard a voice whisper, "He will go out of one window and in at another," which he communicated to his companions. They heard the window of the next room opened. Then the Master of Lindsay, sitting with his back to the window, saw the shadow of Home on the wall in front of him, and found Home was in the room.[1] Probably it was not Home at all who entered the next room and made the noise of opening the window. No doubt Home, under cover of darkness, had regained admission to the room, perhaps by another door, and was concealed by the window curtains, and at the appropriate moment made his appearance. This trick had been prepared and worked up beforehand. As Podmore points out: "A few days before, in the presence of two of the same witnesses, Home had opened the same window, stepped on the ledge outside, and remained standing there, to the great alarm of Lord Lindsay, looking down at the street some eighty feet below. The medium had thus, as it were, furnished a rough sketch of the picture which he aimed at producing."[2] Lord Lindsay himself was subject to hallucinations. At an earlier period of the same evening he had "seen an apparition of a man sitting in a chair"; and as for the titles and social distinctions of the witnesses, they carry no weight in investigations of this nature. One Maskelyne at a seance would penetrate more mysteries than the attendance of the whole House of Lords.

Then there was the feat of handling red-hot coals out of the fire. This, like the floating in the air and elongations of the body, says Podmore, "was only vouchsafed to a few privileged and, if the word may be allowed in this connection, 'trained' witnesses." It failed on two occasions at Glasgow because the conditions were "too positive," or the witnesses had too little faith.[3]

We are in a position to see now how it was that Home never suffered exposure like all the other mediums. He would never perform in the presence of sceptics, and when he could not get rid of them, he did nothing. Charles Bradlaugh was one of the committee appointed by the Dialectical Society to inquire into the phenomena attributed to Spiritualism in 1873. Bradlaugh records: "I am bound to say that Mr. Home met me in the frankest manner possible. He told me I was one of the few people he wanted very much to see.....I met him in the same frank spirit; and as he offered every opportunity for investigation, we took it"—with the expected result; "we had not the scintilla of anything. I sat with Mr. Home night after night till Mr. Home was tired."[4]

Charles Bradlaugh was a powerful and determined man, and Home dared not try any tricks on him. Moreover, Bradlaugh would not allow his critical faculties to be disarmed by Mr. Home's frank and open manner, which imposed on so many others.

W. Mann.

(To be continued.)

Dry-Rot in the Churches.

For many years past, even before the War, the congregations in the churches and chapels of England and Wales have been steadily declining in numbers. Ten years ago I pointed out in a contemporary that the vast majority of the people had ceased to support the parsons, and, as the years pass, the secessions have increased more and more rapidly. The War has been the last straw. Instead of adding to the adherents of the sects, as some expected, it has helped to destroy a creed which teaches the pernicious belief that the world is governed by an all-wise, loving God.

Here are some figures which both Christians and Atheists may read with interest. They are compiled from returns made by the various denominations:—

		Losses in 1916.
	Membership.	Members.	Scholars.
Church of England	2,359,599	85,515	58,903
Catholic	1,885,655	(?)	(?)
Wesleyan Methodist	464,055	5,040	29,246
Congregationalist	453,138	1,645	10,823
Baptist	388,252	1,931	13,253
Primitive Methodist	198,805	1,744	10,690
Calvinist Methodist	185,278	[1]	4,234
United Methodist	141,336	7,591	6,333
Presbyterian	87,424	742	3,691
Salvation Army	110,438	(?)	(?)
Other Denominations	67,029	977	(?)

The adult population of England and Wales was thirty-seven millions, so it will be seen that the number attending religious places was only 17·14 per cent. of the people, and the losses during the year amount to 1·61 per cent. of the membership a year ago. The Catholics claim to have increased, but they have no cause to rejoice over their accession of strength. The priests know perfectly well the reason, namely, that a large number of Catholics have come from France and Belgium owing to the War, and have, naturally, joined up with their fellow-"sheep." It is to be expected, of course, that the priests would misrepresent the facts.

Atheists have no misunderstanding about the decrease. The dying of Christianity will, doubtless, be long drawn out, like all religions in the past. The Egyptian cosmogony is believed to have lasted four thousand years. The Christian has only existed half that term, and it is now disintegrating. Lies have charmed lives when they are useful to a class, and priestcraft is a trade particularly difficult to scotch. All the same, we may be assured that the days of the faith are numbered, and, in its place, men will have healthy minds with which to rely upon themselves, instead of upon a figment of the imagination. Gods, Saints, Saviours, Devils, and such supernatural beings will, in due course, follow the wizards, witches, elves, gnomes, and other queer fancies, into the limbo of childish errors, and Science will be supreme in caring for the well-being of Humanity.

E. Anderson.

Acid Drops.

We are a Christian people, and the War is "God's cause." Both statements rest on excellent authority but doubtful evidence. Perhaps, of the two, the first is the more doubtful. We are a Christian people only in the sense that the majority profess the Christian faith, and, therefore, our being a Christian people must be taken with certain reservations. But all the belligerents—with the exception of France, who leaves God out of it altogether—say they are fighting God's cause; so that on this point there is a fairly general agreement. This being so, it is not surprising that America's joining with the Allies should have served as the occasion for a special service at St. Paul's Cathedral, with the King and Queen, the American Ambassador and his wife, and other notabilities in attendance. God was thanked for his share in the War, the Allies were praised for theirs, and both Britain and the United States praised to the skies—the former as being "well skilled in self-sacrifice," the latter as making "its act of self-dedication to God"; the whole, perhaps, to be taken as a commentary upon the Christian text, "If any smite thee on the one cheek, turn to him the other also."

[1] See the two accounts given in Podmore's Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., pp. 255-256.

[2] Ibid, p. 257. [3] Ibid, vol. ii., p. 263.

[4] Life of Bradlaugh, by his Daughter, vol. i., p. 344.

[1] Slight increase.

Digitized by Google

All the same, one wonders what God had to do with the business? Did he really move the heart of President Wilson, or was it the German campaign of submarine "frightfulness"? Would he have moved the President's heart if Germany had kept to the rules of the game? And if he really does move people's hearts, why did he not move the heart of the Kaiser in August, 1914, so as to secure peace? And what is the matter with the organs of the rulers of Bulgaria, and Greece, and Turkey? As we did not thank God for moving the hearts of Italy, and Roumania, and Japan, and China, etc., are we to conclude that he had nothing to do with their action? Anyway, America is in; so thank God for America—and the submarines.

Bishop Brent, who preached the sermon, referred to the "Altar upon which we lay our lives and fortunes" (italics ours). And all the worshippers who had invested in War Loan at five per cent., and who will take their share of the three hundred millions annually that will have to be paid after the War, and all those who had made huge profits on food, and on leather, and on coals, and on ships, and on munitions, responded with a very loud "Amen." They lay their fortunes on the altar, and if the Government would only issue a loan at ten per cent., they would deposit them with still greater thankfulness to God.

The way in which the lion and the lamb will lie together "after the War" is foreshadowed in an advertisement issued by National League for Opposing Women's Suffrage, calling upon every one to write to their member of Parliament opposing the giving of votes to women. It objects to the measure now before Parliament—among other grounds—because "the best of our manhood is abroad." All we can say is that if the "best of our manhood" declines to treat woman as an intelligent human being, we hope that it will elect to remain abroad. But the statement that the men abroad are all on the side of the National League of British Back Numbers is too ridiculous to need serious disproof.

A Scotch paper publishes the following revised version of one of the Beatitudes—"Blessed are the Peacemakers, for they shall be called up."

The translation of the Bible into Mandarin Chinese will be completed by June. Three hundred million of Chinese will thus be able to read the Christian Scriptures in the vernacular. They have already had Christian opium, guns, rum, cotton goods, etc. They will find that Christians do really believe "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." And they will note that all Christian Europe is practising it.

In an article on "Woman Worship," in the Daily News, Miss Rebecca West says, Women are merely expected "to sit still and be as female as they can, taking as their ideal, not the untiring Saint Teresa, but the Sacred Cow of the Universe." The latter is a brilliant addition to theological terminology.

Jack Cooke, the evangelistic boy-preacher, has died in a Chicago hospital, and the religious papers add, "he was to have joined the Royal Flying Corps." Some pious folk will believe that Jack has flown to heaven.

The tears of Beckenham church-folk are falling fast. The parish magazine, after appearing for forty years, has ceased publication owing to the paper shortage.

The few clergymen who are at the back of the fighting lines appear to retain their gospel-shop habits. A chaplain on the West Front has sent home £13 collected from the troops.

Glancing at an article by Canon C. H. Robinson, we noticed the expression "a happy Atheist," and we thought that at last the clergy were getting generous to their opponents. But it was only a phrase taken from Mr. Wells' novel, Mr. Britling. Meanwhile, the clergy prefer their Atheists to be gloomy and garrulous.

A Sunday paper has offered a prize for the oldest mother, and, so far, the oldest applicant has been one aged 51. The editor might have remembered the Biblical heroine, Sarah, who had a son at 90 years of age, her husband, Abraham, being then 99.

Mr. Fisher, President of the Board of Education, laid his proposals for educational reform before the House of Commons on April 20, and all that can be said for them is that they are "promising"—we hope they will not be merely so. But we shall see when the main proposals become embodied in an actual Bill. Meanwhile, it may be noted that nothing was said on the religious question, and to ignore it will not do. It may be politic to attempt it, but it is not heroic, and it is foredoomed to failure. Mr. Fisher would do well to follow the example of our French Ally, and secularize the schools. After all, Secular Education is all that the State is concerned with, and for an Education Minister to saddle himself with religious instruction is to pave the way for comparative failure.

As a commentary upon the cant about democracy that is so prominent with politicians just now, we may note that Mr. Fisher does not propose to abolish fees for secondary schools. This is because, he says, it would involve an expenditure of £1,000,000 a year. Frightful! We are spending seven millions a day on war, but cannot think of spending another million on secondary education, even when the War is over. So much for the genuineness of the interest in democracy, of waging a War for the freedom of democracy, etc. For what justification is there—save a caste repugnance to allow children of the "lower classes" free access to secondary education—for abolishing fees in elementary and retaining them in secondary schools? Mr. Fisher proposes increasing the number of scholarships. But scholarships will not do, for various reasons. Education, in both elementary and secondary schools, should be free if it is to be really democratic. Mr. Fisher would do well to defy class influence, and go the whole hog.

Superstition dies hard, and much of it is prevalent in Christian England to-day. At the Newington Public Library, London, S.E., there is an exhibition of soldiers' and sailors' mascots, and other strange survivals, among which may be mentioned crosses and religious medals worn by fighting men, infants' cauls carried by sailors as a protection from drowning, besides hag-stones to warn off witches. A notable exhibit is a sheep's heart pierced with pins and nails, and used by a woman who practised witchcraft as late as 1908. Small wonder that the Christian superstition still flourishes in such a soil.

Dr. Saleeby says: "I have heard more bad music at temperance meetings than I knew the world could contain." What would the doctor have said had he attended Salvation Army and revivalist meetings?

Dr. Jowett, we are told by the British Weekly, "has preached a great sermon in New York"; but its greatness seems to consist in its blind optimism. Optimism is a splendid thing when rationally cherished; but an optimism founded upon a pious sentiment only cannot conduce to human progress. It proves rather a clog upon the wheels of the progressive car. Dr. Jowett is reported to have said, for example, that "the men in the trenches were thinking more about God than ever before." According to the testimony of chaplains and others, repeated again and again, that statement is conspicuously false. We are assured by those who are on the spot that the men in the trenches are thinking most about the end of the War, and the return to their homes; that there are no signs whatever of a revival of interest in religion among them; and that their chief cheer comes, not from attendance at religious services, but from entertainments, and particularly the singing of comic songs.

Digitized by Google

Now, if Dr. Jowett's information upon matters so close at hand is so inaccurate, how can we trust him when he treats of events of long ago? He said that after the destruction of Jerusalem the light shone brighter than it had ever done through the darkness; but which light was it, and where did it so shine? Was not Titus, the destroyer of Jerusalem, succeeded by Domitian, who exiled Epictetus and other philosophers from Rome; who, as Gibbon says, "on a slight pretence," condemned and executed his nephew, Clemens, and banished Domitilla, his wife, to a desolate island on the coast of Campania; who passed sentence of death or of confiscation upon a great number of persons, the vague charge against whom was that of Atheism and Jewish manners; and whose memory was publicly execrated and condemned by the Senate? There was a decided improvement under Nerva, Tragan, Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, and Marcus Aurelius, it is true; but those were Pagan Emperors, and Dr. Jowett's true light could certainly not have shone brighter during their reigns.

Once more. Dr. Jowett told his congregation that the light shone brighter than ever after the mediæval reformation and the French Revolution; but if he means by the former the Protestant Reformation, we are bound to characterize the statement as flagrantly false. In reality, the Protestant Reformation was a movement away from the light of the Gospel and towards that of emancipated human reason, though not so intended by its promoters or their successors; and the same can be said of the French Revolution, out of which has issued the largely sceptical and atheistic France of to-day, which God is said to be now punishing for her disloyalty to himself by means of the present War. Undoubtedly, the trend of modern history has been increasingly away from the light of Jesus Christ, as Dr. Horton, in particular, was in the habit of sorrowfully pointing out before the War.

In an obituary notice of the late Lord Allerton, a Sunday paper called him "a self-made man." This reminds us of Voltaire's jest concerning a man not remarkable for his good qualities, and of whom the same remark was made: "This removes a reproach from the Almighty."

To minimize the consumption of food there will be fewer Sunday-school treats this year. This will cause a slump in religion among young people.

The Daily Telegraph states that the whole congregation at a service in the parish church at Beaconsfield consisted of four clergymen. At two other services the only person present was a clergyman's wife.

The non-military "General" Booth announces "Two Days with God" at the Congress Hall. The Kaiser will be green with jealousy.

A new book bears the strange title, Before Adam. Sounds as if there was "nothing doing."

Among the candidates for confirmation at a service at Tenterdon, Kent, were four women who were grandmothers. Maybe the other girls had the consolation of reflecting that the aged ones were in their second childhood.

The effect of Zeppelin raids, the bombarding of undefended towns, the sinking of unarmed passenger vessels, and, worst of all, of hospital ships, has been to rouse the indignation of decent-minded men and women everywhere against Germany. All these barbarous acts did Germany no good, and —In the wider sense—did the Allies no harm. But the Government has now seen fit to resort to a policy of reprisals, and the university town of Freiburg has been bombed, resulting in the deaths of women and children. Whether this will have the desired effect we greatly doubt. The people who suffer are not the authors of the outrages, and we are quite sure that it is not a job which our airmen will gladly undertake. It is far more likely to be used by the German Government to stiffen opposition to the Allies, and although Germany led the way in this, she will not fail to retort that we are no better than she is in the matter.

We protested against this policy of reprisals when it was first suggested, and we see no reason to alter our opinion now. To be logical, it means that we must out-brutalize the Germans. Our chastisement must be more effective than their outrage. If they kill one prisoner, we must ill-treat more. If they murder a dozen women and children, we must murder a score. So step by step the nations descend the scale of civilization in this War which so many tell us is animated by the loftiest of ideals. Already Germany has compelled us to follow her in the use of gas and other devices that have made War more than usually horrible, and now we are following her example in this last respect. For that is what reprisals mean. We set our standard by the lowest instead of by the highest. And the men of God with the talk of "God's cause" on their lips, and the cant of Christian love, are dumb.

The Bishop of Ely deserves a word of acknowledgement in having—one amongst so many thousand of priests—protested against the policy of reprisals.

At Hemsworth, the local branch of the Yorkshire Miner's Association, have raised objection to certain clergymen working in the mines, thus taking the place of men with families who have entered the Army. As a consequence, the parsons have returned to labour in the Lord's vineyard.

The Vicar of Northfield has recently refused to allow the following motto to be inscribed on a tombstone in "his" churchyard: "To live in the hearts of those we leave behind us is not to die."

A correspondent in a Catholic weekly points out that relics of the old faith in England may be found in public-house signs, such as "Angel" taverns, and "Salutation" inns, and one which is unique, "The Virgin," outside Worcester city. This association of things spirituous and spiritual is decidedly interesting.

"Lost to the sense of Christian morality, she (Germany) has plunged Europe into a maelstrom of suffering." Yet every German soldier has the motto "God with us" on his uniform.

Mr. Horatio Bottomley really deserves that more notice should be taken of him by the Churches. In John Bull he notes that "another chaplain has fallen on the field"—not a wonderful thing when one remembers how many others have also fallen. This time it is a Roman Catholic priest, and Mr. Bottomley cries "All honour to his memory, and to the great church of which he was a priest." Honour to his memory, if you please, but why to the Church? What has that to do with it? In the face of such bids for favour, it is pathetic to see how coolly the Churches have treated this illustrious consent. Mr. Bottomley's conversion may have been noted in heaven, but no one appears to know about it on earth. And yet one hesitates to say that it was of no earthly use.

Is the Christian God a German spy? He has struck the Royal Aircraft Factory at Aldershot with lightning, and injured four men. Perhaps the Almighty is contaminated with the blood of the "All-Highest," like the rest of the European Royal Families, and so family considerations influence his actions.

The humourist who called churches "gospel shops" was wiser than he knew, for places of worship do not appear to be more favoured by Providence than any other houses. For example, St. Andrew's Church, Bromley, Kent, is to be closed until after the War—just as if it were a stewed-eel bar.

Protests against wholesale sparrow slaughter have appeared in the papers, but no reference has been made to the special care of Providence for those birds.

Digitized by Google

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

April 29, South Place Institute, South Place, Moorgate Street, E.C.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—May 6, South Place Institute, South Place, Moorgate Street, E.C.

"Keridon" draws our attention to a misprint in his last week's article. The word "good" should have been "God." The sentence then reads: ".....its God perforce dies with it."

H. Bunting.—The address of the Rationalist Peace Association is 38 Cursitor Street, London, E.C.

E. B.—Arrived too late for use this week. We have printed the War Office notice enclosed on two previous occasions, but it will serve a useful purpose in printing it again.

A. Radley.—We have no idea who is behind "The National League for Opposing Woman Suffrage." Thanks for cutting.

S. Lenard.—We have never found bigotry give way to tolerance because it met with no opposition. The better plan is to face it. You may have trouble either way, but it is surely better to have the trouble through defending your own opinion than have it while professing the opinions of other people.

O. E. K.—The information required is being sent you. We should be pleased to arrange meetings in your locality if anyone could be found to look after local arrangements.

Ayrshire.—Please send on your proposals. If practicable, shall be pleased to do as you suggest.

J. Thackray.—Thanks for verses, which we much regret we are unable to use.

R. Ogden.—We have handed your remittance to Miss Vance, who will deal with it. We are not surprised you enjoyed reading about Voltaire. So soon as circumstances permit, we intend publishing a rather lengthy selection from his writings about religion. Our best wishes to your two boys in the Army. The parody you enclose has already appeared in the Freethinker.

A. G. Hann.—Next week.

G. N.—Certainly "some people" may have called George Jacob Holyoake an Agnostic. All we need say in reply is that, although charged with "Blasphemy," Holyoake himself described his trial as a trial for "Atheism."

H. W. Edwards.—Thanks. We hope to make use of your communication at an early date.

Robert Moreland.—Article safely to hand, all the way from the Front. You are not alone in thinking "it's a jolly good victory that the paper has survived during the War." But the War is not over yet, unfortunately.

J. A. Reid.—Should be very pleased to send a copy of the Freethinker to every newspaper editor, schoolmaster, etc.—if we could afford it.

H. G. Farmer.—We received article, for which, thanks. Also letter, which will appear next week. We agree with you that Mr. Arch's articles on the Revolution deserve republication in pamphlet form.

Owing to unexpected demands upon our time, we are obliged to hold over until next week a number of letters, as well as several paragraphs that would otherwise have appeared.

Sugar Plums.

The course of Sunday evening lectures at South Place Institute will be opened to-day, April 29, by Mr. Cohen. His subject is "Religion Before and After the War," and should provide ground for profitable discussion. Mr. Cohen will be followed by Mr. J. T. Lloyd and Mr. Harry Snell, the titles of whose lectures are announced on the last page of this issue. The chair will be taken each evening at 7 o'clock.

Admission to these lectures is free, but there will be a collection towards the expenses, and we hope our friends will bear in mind that these meetings are not arranged without incurring outlay. We trust also that London Freethinkers are doing their best towards making the meetings known among their friends. There are small slips announcing the lectures which may be had either at the Freethinker office, or of Miss Vance, the N.S.S. General Secretary. Next week we hope to be able to announce that the course has commenced well. In that case better will be bound to follow.

We bring to a close this week the excellent series of articles on the French Revolution, by Mr. Robert Arch. They have, we know, been followed with much interest by a large number of readers; and we are pleased, for many reasons, that this has been so. For, when all is said, the French Revolution of 1789 remains one of the greatest events of modern times. The recent Russian Revolution was of importance, and current events have induced many to recognize this. Still, in its world-wide influence it can hardly attain the importance that properly attaches to the upheaval of 1789. It provided the world with ideals that have never lost their potency. It gave modern Europe, for the first time in its history, the inspiration of a human society resting upon Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity. And the measure of its influence for good is the hatred with which vested interests everywhere regarded it.

Will all branches and members of the N.S.S. please note that all resolutions for the Conference agenda should be in the Secretary's hands with as little delay as possible? Reconstruction and reorganization is in the air in all directions, and some useful suggestions ought to come in if only to serve as a guide to the Executive.

Owing to the dropping of "Always" in our reply to H. T. D. in last week's issue, we were made to say not quite what we meant. Religion does not always offer direct encouragement to dishonesty, but it does usually encourage a frame of mind that eventuates in dishonesty. And this dishonesty is the more dangerous because it does not generally come within the cognizance of the law.

The Newcastle Branch of the N.S.S. has arranged a series of fortnightly meetings in the Collingwood Hall, Clayton Street, on Sunday afternoons at 3 o'clock. To-day (April 29) the speaker is Mr. Bryce, who will take for his subject "Individual Effort." Newcastle Freethinkers please note.

Mr. Lloyd has written a reply to the Vicar of Bromyard's article in our issue of April 15, which we should have published this week, but are obliged to hold it over owing to its not having reached us in time. Nowadays one posts letters when one can, and the post-office delivers when it will. And there is small comfort in swearing at an official who is not present to get the benefit of one's exertions.

Many of our readers will be pleased to learn that we received a brief note the other day from Mr. R. H. Rosetti. He writes that he is keeping well, and at the time of writing was engaged in pioneer navvying, and that he and his "pals" were being favoured with the attention of German snipers and occasional machine-gun fire. We hope that the snipers and others will continue to miss our friend "for the duration of the War."

We are pleased to see that the Rationalist Press Association has raised a warning voice against an anticipated attempt of the Papacy to be represented at any forthcoming Peace Congress to be, not alone represented there, but also to use its representation as a means to regaining some of its lost credit and power. The warning has been addressed to the Freethinkers of all the Allied nations, and is strongly supported by the Italian Associazione Nazionale del Libero Pensiero. It has already been anticipated by the organized Freethought parties in France and Switzerland, and by the authorized protests of the Spanish and Portuguese Freethinkers. We have no doubt the Freethinkers in the United States of America will endorse the attitude of their comrades and Allies in Europe against any proposal to rehabilitate the Pope in his old capacity as the wielder of temporal power.

The new Manchester Branch was definitely formed at a meeting held at the Manchester Hotel, Oldham Street, on Monday, April 16, when Mr. H. Black, 446 Great Cheetham Street, East, Higher Broughton, was appointed Honorary Secretary. Will all intending members who have not yet handed in their names please communicate with him at once? Mr. S. Pulman was elected President, Mr. J. H. Langford, Treasurer, and a working committee appointed for the next twelve months.

Digitized by Google

It is quite evident that educational reformers will need to be on the alert to prevent the movement for educational reform degenerating into a merely technical education designed to capture German trade "after the War." If for that reason alone, we cordially commend to the notice of our readers British Education After the War, by Mr. F. J. Gould (Watts & Co.; 1s. 6d. net). Mr. Gould speaks as a practical teacher and an enthusiast in the cause of education, a combination that makes for both balance and breadth. The six chapters into which Mr. Gould divides his book provide, apart from a general sketch of education, a scheme of instruction from the earliest years through the elementary schools, on to the secondary schools and universities. The aim of the book is education for service, and the chief point to which criticism may be directed is, we fancy, the keeping of the ideal of the British Empire too clearly before the mind of the developing boy or girl. It is true that Mr. Gould does not quite lose sight of what he calls "the march towards unity on the largest scale"; but for our own part, we are afraid that to emphasize this "nationalist reconstruction"—to use another of Mr. Gould's phrases—will tend to dwarf the larger aim. And, quite frankly, we have no greater love for the Imperialism of Great Britain than for that of Germany. Naturally, we prefer the former to the latter; but it is useless disguising or ignoring the fact that it is largely to their conflict that the world owes the present tragedy of war. Apart from this, Mr. Gould's contribution to the work of educational reconstruction deserves the highest praise and the most careful study. There is a lively preface to the book by Dr. Hayward, who gives Mr. Gould high praise as an educationalist, and properly emphasizes his services and sacrifices in that cause.

The French Revolution.

XI.

Conclusion.

(Concluded from p. 251.)

In the preceding articles I do not pretend to have given a full history of the French Revolution. Readers "in the know" will perceive that many interesting persons and things have been left without mention, or passed over with a scanty reference. I shall have achieved my object if I have induced some readers of the Freethinker, who may, perhaps, have taken previously little interest in the Revolution, to turn to the real historians and read this great story for themselves.

The English classic on the subject is, undoubtedly, Carlyle. Unfortunately, Carlyle was credulous and uncritical, and on political and religious issues was about as muddle-headed as any writer with a reputation can contrive to be. He had a bilious hatred of democracy, which he called "anarchy," and his religious views, in spite of his rejection of Christianity, retained such a thick coating of mystical Puritanism as to make him incapable of treating an Atheist with even common fairness. About the best English work on the Revolution is by an American, Mr. H. Morse Stephens, who, unhappily, only completed two volumes of his history, and left his readers stranded in the middle of the Reign of Terror. The works of Mr. Hilaire Belloc, especially his lives of Danton and Robespierre, are worth reading, as also is Mr. Belfort Bax's Marat: the People's Friend—a careful rehabilitation of the most maligned of all the Revolutionists, and a book to which I hereby record my deep indebtedness.

A work well worth perusal by those who do not mind long digressions on the economic side is Prince Kropotkin's The Great French Revolution. Kropotkin writes as an Anarchist, and, as such, has little good to say of any political leader in any party, and this bias must be allowed for.

Naturally, it is to French writers that one must look for the best work on the Revolution. Mignet's History is to be recommended to those who appreciate brevity and fairness. Lamartine's Histoire des Girondins is a sentimental romance more than a history. The most important modern work is the monumental Histoire Politique of M. Aulard, Professor at the Sorbonne, which is available in an English translation.

These are but a small fraction of the enormous literature on the French Revolution; but a study, even of this fraction, is especially desirable for English readers, in view of the systematic way in which English writers, especially novelists, have poisoned the atmosphere with prejudice in this connection. Nearly all English writers seem to start with furious Royalist prejudices, and to have only the most superficial acquaintance with the facts. The palm for sheer tosh must be awarded to the Baroness Orczy, whose Scarlet Pimpernel series of novels appears to enjoy a popularity which speaks badly for the intelligence of her readers. The only good novel on the subject I have ever read is Anatole France's Les Dieux ont Soif, which is almost beyond praise, and neither "extenuates" nor "sets down in malice" anything about the Revolution.

So much for the literary side. Let us now return to the point at which we began, viz., the permanent significance of this great upheaval.

The Revolution is significant, less for the results it achieved than for the principles it proclaimed and the movements it inaugurated. Those principles are conveniently summarized as "liberty, equality, and fraternity," which means, in explicit terms, the maximum possible freedom of every human being from domination by other human beings. In economics, this is expressed as the abolition of the exploitation of the worker; in politics, as the acceptance of consent rather than force as the basis of government—the corollary of this being universal adult suffrage; in religion, as the repudiation of all interference with liberty of thought and expression, the abolition of all sectarian privileges—such as "establishment"—and the right of every child to be brought up free from speculative bias, until he or she is of an age to judge rationally on such matters.

Needless to say, the Revolution, though all these principles were voiced in the course of its development, achieved little of them; indeed, as I pointed out at the beginning of these articles, the main thing to remember about it is that it is not finished. Economically, the solid result of the French Revolution was the abolition of feudal rights and restrictions, and the creation of a preponderant class of peasant proprietors in France. This achievement is much belauded by certain writers in this country, such as Mr. Belloc and Mr. Chesterton, who seem to think that the only thing necessary to establish economic beatitude is to make most people peasant proprietors. As to this, Prince Kropotkin points out, that the application of the principle in France was very partial; that in large districts, such as La Vendee, where the peasants were "loyal" (in the Royalist sense), the principle was not applied at all; that where it was applied, the better-off peasants got the lion's share; and that, in any case, the fact that a large number of peasants had managed to become freeholders could be no consolation whatever to the urban workman, who found himself at the end of the Revolution helpless in the hands of his new masters, the parvenu middle class. Politically, as we have seen, universal suffrage was swept away in the "Thermidorian" reaction, and was not recovered until 1848. Here, however, at any rate, the ground lost has been recovered, though slowly and with much vicissitude; and though the third French Republic does not enjoy so democratic a Constitution as that of 1793, the conquest of universal suffrage seems to be permanent. In the religious sphere, the principle of the separation of Church and State, first recognized after the fall of Robespierre, was overthrown by Napoleon, and has had to wait until the twentieth century for its reassertion. As it is the fashion in some quarters to regard Napoleon as the champion and continuer of the Revolution, it is as well to put it on record here that his re-establishment of Catholicism in the "Concordat" was undertaken avowedly with a Conservative object. Napoleon is recorded to have said: "You cannot have property without inequality, and you cannot have inequality without religion"; in other words, Catholicism must be used to bull-dose the working-classes into submission to their masters, the parvenu middle-class, who had called in Napoleon to protect their property. Napoleon also said, apropos of Atheism: 'Ne me parlez pas des hommes sans Dieu; j'ai connu les hommes sans Dieu en 1793; on ne gouverne pas ces hommes-la, on les fusille." He was referring to the democratic "dechristianizers," his old comrades in arms at Toulon, whom he had basely betrayed, and now wanted to put under the Pope and the priests again. When Napoleon was crowned Emperor in 1804, the Republican General Augereau said, alluding to the magnificence of the ceremony: "Nothing was wanting —nothing but the million or so of men who had died to put an end to all that."

Digitized by Google

But, as I have already said, the French Revolution is not an event only in French history, but in world-history. The Radical movement in England and Scotland took its rise, no doubt, from the conditions resulting from the Industrial Revolution, which created a cleavage between the interests of the artizan and labourer on the one hand, and those of the capitalist and landlord on the other; but it owed much intellectually to the wind that blew from the Channel. The ideas expressed academically by Godwin, popularly by Cobbett, or poetically by Shelley, were the ideas that had agitated the "sections" of Paris, and the people's clubs of France. From the early Radicals they passed into the Chartist Movement, from the Chartists into the Republicanism of the seventies, and so into modern Socialist and Labour politics.

The superficial reactionary is apt to hold up the French Revolution as an example of the inevitable failure of all attempts at the practical realization of ideal aims. How often, in one's youth, has one heard one's elders say: "Look at the French Revolutionists! They began all very finely, with 'liberty, equality, and fraternity,' but they ended by chopping off each other's heads!"

Now, it should be obvious that this kind of sneer (the kernel of which is the inevitable contrast between any ideal aim and its application in a conditioned world) can be levelled against any historical movement whatever. One can easily say of Christianity: "It began all very finely with 'the kingdom of God,' and it ended in their burning one another alive." Christianity has had just fifteen times as long to work itself out as the Revolution has had, and it has caused more suffering and unnecessary bitterness, and led to less amelioration in man's lot, than the Revolution. Christianity was able, after two or three centuries of propaganda, to impose its doctrines on the world. From that day, for more than twelve centuries, its principles were unchallenged in most of southern and western Europe. In those twelve centuries, commonly called the "Dark Ages" and the "Middle Ages," the aspiration of Lord John Manners was fulfilled in anticipation: "art and science, laws and learning," died, and Europe was left, not, indeed, with an "old nobility," but with a new caste of barbarian ruffians, balanced by a turbulent priesthood, for whose maintenance the tillers of the soil were compelled to set aside so many days' labour every week. And then the admirers of this state of things have the impudence to charge modern reformers with seeking to establish the "Servile State"!

Christianity, then, may fairly be judged and condemned by its results. The Revolution, however, has never had a chance to show what it can do, having been engaged for 127 years in an uphill struggle against the forces of monarchical absolutism, clerical dogmatism, wealthy class interest, and sheer human stupidity. People talk of the Reign of Terror as though that were the typical achievement of the Revolution; but they ignore the fact that, but for the infamous war waged by the backward monarchies of Europe, aided and abetted by William Pitt and the English landed and moneyed classes, against the French people "rightly struggling to be free," there would have been no Reign of Terror.

It is true, of course, that the Democratic Party in France went astray; they lacked, in the broadest sense of the word, experience; not only personal experience in political matters, but the necessary data of social science to cope with the causes of the servitude and injustice against which they fought. The sciences of political economy and sociology, in the course of the nineteenth century, have placed at the disposal of democracy a wealth of knowledge which was not available at the French Revolution; and the application of science to industry has rendered possible a vista of security and leisure for all, which was only dimly grasped by a few then. But whatever tools and weapons we use, it is still the old principle which we have to further by their means: the principle that no restriction of man's liberty of thought, word, and deed, is to be suffered, which does not justify itself by guaranteeing to him a greater measure of liberty than that which it takes away. "Ni Dieu ni maitre," no supernatural dogmas, no reverence for ancient institutions, no vested interests, no "sanctity of the family," must be allowed to stand in the way of the one end of society, the liberation of the individual human being to think his own thoughts and live his own life; and all machinery, political and economic, must be made a means to that end.

Robert Arch.

The Monarch of Cereals.

V.

(Continued from p. 253.)

If adequately watered, vast territories in the States may be placed under permanent tillage. When Dickens wrote Martin Chuzzlewit the great Mississippi valley was a wilderness. But as the population streamed westwards immense areas of this naturally fertile river region were brought under the plough. Man, then, passed beyond the well-watered Mississippi and lower Missouri lands towards the eastern slopes of the Rockies. This invasion of the normally arid West coincided with a succession of seasons in which the rainfall was more copious than usual. The accepted view was that with the advance of civilization the rainfall in these regions had permanently increased. This theory suffered a severe shock through the weather conditions of subsequent years when the average rainfall (10 to 20 inches) decreased nearly one half. Owing to the intense heat and drought, millions of acres of corn crops shrivelled into skeleton stalks. Scores of thousands of settlers were reduced from prosperity to abject poverty and misery. Prayers, and by no means perfunctory prayers, were offered for the sweet showers of heaven. Dynamite was exploded to bring down the supplicated moisture. But the gods proved deaf to man's entreaties. And, we are told :—

Digitized by Google

> The blunt fact remained, and still remains, that many millions of acres were dead, vacant, and profitless, simply because of their aridity. This land has little value now, for in many places a whole section does not yield enough to keep a fleet-footed sheep from starving.

All that is required for this and other areas is irrigation. Lands adjoining the Colorado, Columbia, and Missouri streams would support millions of people while adding considerably to the world's wheat crop were they watered. Several millions of acres are already irrigated, and ample water exists in the environing rivers to irrigate many millions more. Irrigation also fertilizes the soil. The sediment deposited by the Nile in its annual flood adequately maintains the richness of the Egyptian soil. The waters of this celebrated river deposit large amounts of nitrogen, while other famous streams, such as the Rio Grande and St. Lawrence, hold in solution invaluable substances extremely beneficial to vegetable life.

The plant which provides the staff of life is subject to innumerable adverse influences at the hands of cold and dispassionate Nature. In addition to the disasters which overtake the cereal in seasons of excessive rainfall, gales, drought, and cold, there exist various diseases and insect enemies which flourish at the plant's expense. Vegetable pathology is a recently developed department of science. In 1885 four institutions only were engaged in the study of plant maladies in the United States. In 1895 over one hundred expert investigators were actively occupied in this field of research, while fifty agricultural colleges were seeking to solve the economic and botanical problems involved. Weeds, again, choke the crops and impoverish the soil. The so-called Russian thistle, which is really a saltwort, has shown itself a hardy enemy to the husbandman. It was unknown in the United States until 1873 when it was unwittingly sown with flax seed imported from Russia. Dakota, where it was accidentally planted, is an ideal habitat for the weed, and it spread rapidly in succeeding years. Within a couple of decades "it infested a continuous area of about 35,000 miles, and caused at least 1,600,000 dollars damage to wheat every year." By 1895 this weed had invaded a vast territory, and its depredations assumed very serious proportions. As the average Russian thistle produces from 20,000 to 30,000 seeds, while some giant specimens have been estimated to carry as many as 200,000, its powers of reproduction are immense. In its native land this weed is a positive curse, which worsens as the years pass away. Indeed, in the Caspian region, large and important tracts of land formerly cultivated have become so overrun that they have been abandoned. Science, however, has arrested the thistle's advance in America, and, no doubt, it will soon be reduced to the level of an ordinary weed. Wild garlic, cockle, true thistles, darnel, and other forms of "plants in the wrong place" when present in the wheat fields, are a serious eyesore to the farmer, but good husbandry produces heavy crops, and heavy crops keep down the weeds.

Painstaking inquiries in America and elsewhere acquit the birds of the charges made against them by sundry writers. Among all the feathered creatures frequenting the grain lands not one species can be said to be entirely harmful. In sober truth it is ascertained that—> the good that many of them do by destroying injurious insects and seeds more than counterbalances the damage occasioned by the eating of grain. At least fifty different birds act as weed destroyers, and help to eradicate nearly 100 species of noxious plants. The number of weed seeds eaten is enormous, one bird eating a thousand seeds of some kinds for a single breakfast. The insects eaten by these birds are also generally noxious. There is usually an equilibrium of organisms in Nature, and birds become harmful only when they disturb this proper balance by increasing out of proportion to their environment.

Among the fungoid pests of wheat are "glume spot," wheat scab, smut, rust, blight, and mildew. Smut is a fungoid disease of a serious character, and two kinds of this ailment attack wheat. In Greece and Rome this malady was common, so that it is an ailment of long standing. The amount of damage due to "stinking smut" varies. As the parasite lives exclusively at its victim's expense the crop is injured in proportion to the number of infected wheat plants. The spores of the fungus discharge an offensive odour, hence the term "stinking smut." In bad cases from 50 to 75 per cent. of the heads of wheat are diseased while the remainder becomes so contaminated as to be worthless as flour, and positively dangerous as seed. This disease is widespread, and unless it is dealt with it increases in intensity. Loose smut is not so repellent, and leads to smaller loss, but it will injure the crop in normal instances as much as 10 per cent., while, at times, it will ruin half the harvest. Science has provided various remedies for these diseases which, when properly applied, have yielded satisfactory results. But many farmers refuse to adopt them, with the consequence that in the States, Canada, and in Europe, the ravages of the smut maladies are still very great.

Wheat rust is also due to the presence of parasitic plants on the cereal. In Northern America this disease inflicts heavier losses on the wheat raiser than any other fungoid or insect foe. It is estimated that the monetary value of the wheat ruined every season in the States alone totals twenty million dollars. Terrible is its toll in Russia and other lands, while in moist warm climates, such as prevail in parts of China and Japan, rust disease is one of the main obstacles to the growth of the grain. Even in an old agricultural country like England, rust in some seasons represents a very grave loss to the wheat producer. There seems no certain remedy for the pest save, perhaps, the evolution of rust proof varieties of the plant.

T. F. Palmer.

(To be continued.)

A Story Without a Title.

By Vladimir Korolenko.

In the fifth century, even as nowadays, the sun rose every morning and set every evening. In the dew-besprinkled morning his first beams saluted each other, the earth awakened, and the air was filled with gladness and hope and delight. In the evening the earth had had time to sober down again, and went to sleep in gloomy darkness. One day was made in the likeness of another day, and one night of another night. Sometimes the clouds gathered overhead, and the thunder rattled noisily and angrily. Sometimes a wandering star would drop from the sky, or a monk white with fear would rush in and tell his brothers how he had seen a tiger not many paces from the monastery. And then once again the days resembled other days, and the nights other nights.

Digitized by Google

The monks worked hard, and said their prayers. The old abbot played the organ, wrote Latin verses, and composed music; for the wonderful old man had marvellous gifts. Even the oldest monks, whose sensitiveness had become dulled by age, could not keep back their tears when the sounds of music-making came from his cell. When he spoke of the most ordinary things—the trees, the sea, or God's creatures, the animals—it was impossible for them to listen without smiles or tears. It was as though the chords of the organ were repeated within his soul. But when he was angry, when he gave himself up to excessive joy, or when he began to talk of things terrible or great, then he was overcome by a passionate inspiration, tears welled in his eyes, his face flushed, his voice thundered, and the monks felt that their souls were aflame with his inspired words. At such great and wonderful moments his power was limitless, and if he had ordered his brethren to throw themselves into the sea they would have hastened to carry out his commands.

His music, his voice, his verses in which he glorified God and heaven and earth, were a fountain of contentment and joy for the holy monks. It did happen at times that, with the monotony of their life, they grew weary of trees and flowers, of spring and autumn; the unceasing murmur of the sea and the singing of birds became a burden to them, but the precious gifts of their aged abbot was their bread of life.

Decades went by, and still one day resembled another day, and one night another night. Saving the wild birds and beasts, not a living thing was to be seen around the monastery. The nearest city was a long, long way off, and you had to journey across a hundred miles of desert to reach it. Only men who hated and had renounced life, and who entered the monastery as a living tomb, only these had the courage to cross the desert.

What was the astonishment of the monks when one night they heard a loud hammering at the monastery gates! It was a man, a dweller in the city, an ordinary sinning mortal who loved life. Before he asked the abbot's blessing, he called for food and wine. When he was asked how he came from the town to the desert, he answered by telling a long story. He had gone out hunting, had drunk too much, and had lost his way. When they wanted him to become a monk and save his soul, he said with a smile: "I am no fit companion for such as you."

His hunger and thirst being satisfied, he looked round at the monks who were waiting upon him, and shook his head reproachfully. "You monks," he said, "do nothing. You only know how to eat and drink—nothing else. Is this the way you save the soul? While you are sitting here in peace, eating and drinking, and dreaming of everlasting bliss, your fellow-beings are perishing and going post haste to hell. Look at what goes on in the cities! Some are dying of hunger; others, not knowing what to do with their money, wallow in debauchery, and perish like flies in honey. Men have no faith, no truth. Whose business is it, then, to save them? Must I do it? I, who am drunk from morning to night. Has God given you faith and loving hearts for you to stay here within four walls, and do nothing?"

The drunken words of the townsman were rude and distasteful. But in some strange way they affected the old abbot. He exchanged glances with the monks, turned very pale, and said:

"My brothers, this man speaks truth to us. The poor people, in their unwisdom and weakness, are perishing through wickedness and unbelief while we stir not from our seats. Why should I not go out and tell them of Christ, whom they have forgotten?"

The old man was carried away by the words of the townsman. The next day he said good-bye to his brethren, took his staff, and set out for the town. And the monks were left without his music, his eloquence, and his verses.

Wearily they lived through one month and then another, and still the old man did not return. At last, when the third month had gone by, they heard the well-known knocking of his staff on the monastery gate. The monks rushed to greet him, overwhelming him with questions. But instead of rejoicing with them, he wept bitterly, and refused to answer their many questions. The monks saw that he had aged very much, and had grown thinner. His face was weary and expressed deep sorrow, and when he wept he had the appearance of a man who had been insulted. The monks wept in sympathy with the old man. They asked him why his face had become lined with grief. But he made no answer to their questions, and locked himself in his cell. For full seven days he sat in his cell, eating and drinking nothing, and weeping unceasingly. When they knocked at his door and besought him to come to them and share his sorrow with them, his only answer was a profound silence.

At last he came out. Gathering the monks around him, his eyes red with weeping and his countenance full of sorrow and indignation, he told them of what had happened to him in those three months. His voice was calm and his eyes smiled when he described his way from the monastery to the town. On his way, he said, the birds sang to him, the brooks murmured, and young and sweet hopes stirred within his soul. He was a soldier marching to battle, confident of victory, and so light was his heart that the long journey seemed but a very short one.

But his voice shook, his eyes flashed, and he was full of wrath when he began to speak of the town and its people. Never in his life had he seen or dared to imagine what he saw when he went through the town. Now, for the first time in his life and in his old age, did he see and understand how powerful the Devil was, how beautiful evil was, and how weak, cowardly, and insignificant was our common human nature. By an unfortunate accident, the first house he visited was a house of ill-fame. He found men and women eating and drinking without measure. When they were drunk with wine they sang songs, and boldly uttered terrible and disgusting words which no God-fearing man would dare to say. Immeasurably bold and free and happy, they had no fear of God or the Devil or death, but spoke and did anything they wished, and went wherever their lusts led them. And the wine, clear like amber and flashing with golden sparks, must have been strangely sweet and aromatic, because everyone that drank of it smiled blissfully and craved for more.

And the old man, becoming more and more enraged, and weeping with anger, continued to describe what he had seen. On a table among the feasters was standing a half-naked harlot. It would be difficult to find in nature anything more beautiful, more ravishing. This serpent in a woman's form was young, with jet black hair, sparkling eyes, and full red lips. Shameless and naked, she smiled as though she would say: "Behold how immodest and how beautiful I am!" A silken gauze fell in lovely folds from her shoulders, but her beauty refused to be concealed by the drapery, and, like the young, green blades of grass, easily broke through its sheath. The shameless woman drank wine, sang lascivious songs, and gave herself to those who desired her.

Then the old man, stamping his foot with anger, described the chariot races, the bull fights, the stage plays, and the studios of the artists, where naked women were painted or modelled in clay. He spoke of these things eloquently, with inspiration, and the monks listened greedily to his words, breathless with a strange excitement!.....After describing all the charm of the Devil, the beauty of evil, and the ravishing loveliness of the loathsome body of woman, the old man cursed the Devil and all his works, and turned round and went back to his cell.

Digitized by Google

The next morning, when he came out of his cell, not one monk was to be seen in the monastery. They had all rushed off to the city.

(Translated from the Russian by)

George Underwood.

Correspondence.

CHRISTIANITY AS FACTUALITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—As one who has been deeply interested in this controversy, I should like to express my great approval of the admirable spirit manifested by both gentlemen concerned in it.

But Mr. Powell's last article seemed to contain one or two faulty points.

He objects to Mr. Lloyd's assertion that "the world is chock-full of evils and wrongs" if meant in any absolute or ultimate sense.

In what way are we to judge of right and wrong, truth and justice, except relatively to our standards?

Mr. Powell appears to suggest that God's standard of morality may in the ultimate not be ours at all, and if this is so, he cuts the ground from under his feet when he stands up in his own pulpit.

And, again, how can Mr. Lloyd be dogmatic in asserting what every one knows to be a truism, that the universe is "infinite in extent and eternal in duration"? This seems to savour of quibbling. The question of whether there is a God or not does not seem to me as important as the uses to which the belief in God is applied. If the God of Science (as in Mr. Powell's sermon) is deaf to prayer and praise, what is the use of worshipping a "Father-heart"?

Mr. Powell is one of the new school of theologians, and we, as Rationalists, are proud to think that his views are the result of the magnificent work of the grand pioneers of Freethought, but he has a little bit further to go before complete emancipation is attained from the shackles of past ages.

It will come in time; but, for the present, I am content to welcome with a good heart all work such as Mr. Powell's from within the Church.

John Breese.

P.S.—Your readers may be interested to know that Mr. Powell has a "Chart of the Ages" hung in his church from which he teaches the children the truth regarding Man and the Universe. Rationalists could not wish anything better than this. Gain the child, and we have gained the day.—J. B.

The preacher was having a sort of test meeting by asking the congregation questions on their conduct. "Now, brethren," he said, "all of you who pay your debts will please stand up." In response to this there was an apparently unanimous uprising. "Now," said the preacher, asking the others to sit down, "all those who do not pay will please stand up." One man alone rose. "Ah, brother," said the preacher, "why is it that you, of all this congregation of brethren, should be so different?" "I don't know, parson," he replied, slowly, as he looked around over his friends and acquaintances in the meeting, "unless it is that I'm not a liar, and 'cause I can't get what the people round me owe me."

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

Indoor.

South Place Institute (South Place, Moorgate Street, E.C.): 7, Chapman Cohen, "Religion Before and After the War."

Mr. A. D. Howell Smith's Discussion Class (N. S. S. Office, 62 Farringdon Street): Wednesday, May 2, instead of Thursday, at 7.30.

Outdoor.

West Ham Branch N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station): 7, E. Burke, a Lecture.

Hyde Park: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Dales and Hyatt; 6.30, Messrs. Kells and Yates.

COUNTRY.

Indoor.

Newcastle-on-Tyne (Collingwood Hall, Clayton Street, opposite end of Nelson Street): 3, Jos. Bryce, "Individual Effort."

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in colour; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 9d. post free.—From Miss E. M. Vance, General Secretary, N. S. S., 62 Farringdon St., E.C. 4.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

Post Free Three Halfpence.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster, S.W.

Prayer: Its Origin, History, and Futility.

BY

J. T. LLOYD.

Price TWOPENCE.
(Postage ½d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

War and Civilization.

BY

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Religion and the Child.

BY

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.

By H. C. Lea.

In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

This is the Third and Revised Edition, 1907, of the Standard and Authoritative Work on Sacerdotal Celibacy. Since its issue in 1867 it has held the first place in the literature of the subject, nor is it likely to lose that position.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.

An Elementary Treatise on a Realistic Religion and Philosophy of Human Life.

By E. A. Ashcroft.

440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

Mr. Ashcroft writes from the point of view of a convinced Freethinker, and deals with the question of Man and the Universe in a thoroughly suggestive manner.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.

By Carveth Read.

Professor of Philosophy in the University of London.

8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

A Fine Exposition of Morals from the standpoint of a Rationalistic Naturalism.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.

By J. S. Mill.

Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

There is no need to praise Mill's Essays on Nature, The Utility of Religion, and Theism. The work has become a Classic in the History of Freethought. No greater attack on the morality of nature and the God of natural theology has ever been made than in this work.

Recent Acquisitions.

WILLIAM HONE: HIS LIFE AND TIMES.

By F. W. Hackwood.

Large 8vo. With numerous Plates. Published 10s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

William Hone was one of the group of Radical Reformers who played so conspicuous a part in the battle for free speech and a free press in the early part of the nineteenth century. The accounts of his trial before Mr. Justice Abbott and Lord Ellenborough for publishing parodies of the Athanasian Creed and the Lord's Prayer are of interest to all Freethinkers.

THE ENGLISH WOMAN: STUDIES IN HER PSYCHIC EVOLUTION.

By D. Staars.

Published 9s. net. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

An Evolutionary and Historic Essay on Woman. With Biographical Sketches of Harriet Martineau, George Eliot, and others.

By the Hon. A. S. G. Canning.

INTOLERANCE AMONG CHRISTIANS.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

RELIGIOUS STRIFE IN BRITISH HISTORY.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 5d.

THE POLITICAL PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

The Three Volumes post free for 5s.

THE CRIMINAL PROSECUTION AND CAPITAL PUNISHMENT OF ANIMALS.

By E. P. Evans.

A Careful Study of one of the most curious of Mediæval Superstitious Practices. There is an Appendix of Documents which adds considerably to the value of the work. Published 1906. With Frontispiece.

384 pp. Published 7s. 6d. Price 2s., postage 5d.

Books.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?

By Chapman Cohen.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

Cloth, 1s. 9d., postage 3d.

A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY. OF FREE-THINKERS.

By J. M. Wheeler.

Price 3s. net, postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.

By G. W. Foote and W. P. Ball.

For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition, 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.

By G. W. Foote.

First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.

(Now Binding.)

BIBLE STUDIES.

By J. M. Wheeler.

Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

Pamphlets.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. By C. Cohen. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. By C. Cohen. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE RELIGION OF FAMOUS MEN. By Walter Mann. Price 1d., postage ½d.

BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM. By G. W. Foote. Price 4d., postage 1½d.

MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. By Colonel Ingersoll. Price 1d., postage ½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

Two New Pamphlets.

Christianity and Progress.

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

Revised Edition, with a New Chapter on "Mohammedanism and the Sword."

A complete and crushing reply to the claim that Christianity has aided the progress of civilization.

Price Twopence. Postage ½d.

Pagan and Christian Morality.

BY

WALTER MANN.

The truth about the alleged originality and value of Christian teaching on the subject of morals. With a useful list of authorities.

Price Twopence. Postage ½d.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, LONDON, E.C. 4.

Special Sunday Evening Lectures

(Under the Auspices of the National Secular Society)

AT

SOUTH PLACE INSTITUTE,

SOUTH PLACE, MOORGATE STREET, E.C. (within five minutes' of Liverpool Street.)

April 29, MR. CHAPMAN COHEN.

"Religion Before and After the War."

May 6, MR. J. T. LLOYD.

"Humanism versus Christianity."

May 13, MR. HARRY SNELL.

"The Faith-Healing Imposture."

Admission Free. Collection. Doors open at 6.30 p.m.

Chair taken at 7 p.m.

Printed and Published by The Pioneer Press (G. W. Foote and Co., Ltd.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

THE
FREETHINKER
FOUNDED · 1881
EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ·· EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 18 SUNDAY MAY 6, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
The L.C.C and Freedom of Propaganda.—The Editor	273
Christianity and the Symbolism of Factuality.—J. T. Lloyd	274
Mr. Kipling's New Book.—Mimnermus	276
Science and Spiritualism.—W. Mann	276
American Churches and the War	278
Letters to the Editor—Atheism in the French Revolution, 278; Religion in the Army	278
Acid Drops	279
About Ourselves	281
To Correspondents	281
Sugar Plums	281
Woman and Christianity.—Frances Ivor	282
The Monarch of Cereals.—T. F. Palmer	284
A Voice in the Wilderness.—Criticus	285
Notice of Meetings	286

Views and Opinions.

The L.C.C. and Freedom of Propaganda.

Nearly a year ago we called attention to the attempt of the London County Council to seriously curtail the rights of propaganda in the parks and open spaces under its control. On May 30, 1916, a resolution was passed deciding to prohibit the sale of literature after September 30. The fixing of the date was in itself suspicious. If the literature sold was such as ought not to be permitted, or if the selling of it was a nuisance to people using the parks, the proper course would have been to stop it at once. But, with the meetings in full swing, this would have ensured a public outcry, and publicity was the last thing the reactionists on the Council desired. By postponing the enforcement of the order until the lecture season was practically over, it was, undoubtedly, hoped that the thing would have been accomplished without more than an ineffective grumble, particularly as public attention was absorbed by the War. This, we think, would have happened but for the publicity given the matter in the Freethinker. That exposed the plot. On the initiative of the N.S.S., a meeting of London societies was called, and the Rev. Stewart Headlam opened the fight in the Council itself. A protest committee was formed, of which Mr. F. Verinder is chairman, Miss Vance, secretary, and on which I represent the N.S.S. That committee consists of between thirty and forty London societies, including the London Trades Council with its very large membership. It has been at work right through the winter, and, with the opening of the lecture season, it will assume a more public activity.

* * *

The Purpose Behind.

What was there behind the Council's attempt to prohibit the sale of literature in the parks? The avowed reason, the one given at the time the resolution was passed, was that there was no longer any necessity to permit it, as it could be bought elsewhere. There was no hint that those who had permission to sell abused that permission, or that there had been annoyance to anyone in the selling. A more miserable excuse for an attempt to rob the public of a long standing right was never made. It imposed on no one. Those who voted for the resolution knew better, and those who voted against laughed at it. There is no doubt whatever, there is no room for doubt, that this prohibition was intended as a first step towards abolishing the meetings altogether. They have always been regarded with disfavour by some members of the L.C.C., and these thought that distraction of mind by the War offered a favourable opportunity for action. The prohibition was a first step. It is the literature to-day, it will be the meetings to-morrow. It is wiser and easier to resist reaction at the outset than to fight it when it has gained confidence through success and grown insolent through achievement.

* * *

Forcing the Issue.

That is the view taken by the committee of protest, and it is one with which we heartily concur. Writing last year, we said that literature would be sold in the parks whether the Council agreed or not. In spite of a discussion on the Council, in spite of the arguments of a deputation it agreed to receive, the Council declined to budge. It would not even agree to postpone the whole matter until after the War. It probably felt it was a case of "now or never." Well, the result was that the sales went on as before. Literature was sold right through October and part of November. It was then dropped owing to the severe weather, which made outdoor meetings impossible. The names of a number of sellers were taken, and, in due course, Miss Vance was written by the Council's solicitor to the effect that literature had been sold at N.S.S. meetings in defiance of the Council's regulations, and that unless an "undertaking" was given not to repeat the offence proceedings would be instituted. Of course, the undertaking was not given, and no proceedings have been instituted. That is how the matter stands at the moment of writing. The Council has not withdrawn its prohibition, neither the N.S.S. nor the other societies associated have weakened in their determination to keep on selling. The commencement of the summer lecturing season once more brings the question to the front. If the Council, by its unjustifiable interference with a long standing public right, forces a public agitation, at a moment when such an agitation may be deprecated "in the interests of the War," it has only itself to blame.

* * *

Step by Step.

Let us once more emphasize the real nature of the Council's action. The right to sell literature in the Council's parks has never yet been interfered with, save to the extent of requiring that copies of the things to be sold should be submitted to the Council for approval. And this, it will be observed, gave the Council the power to prohibit any literature which it thought unsuitable for sale. The literature could only be sold at the meetings, so that the general public could not be subjected to annoyance. This arrangement has worked with the utmost smoothness for years. The Council's own officials report that there has been no complaint and no trouble. Why, then, interfere now? The only reason is the desire to ultimately prohibit meetings altogether. That, indeed, is the logical thing to do. To prohibit propaganda by literature and permit it by speech is ridiculous. What a man writes, he will usually exercise some care over; whereas a man may, on the spur of the moment, say things that are unwarranted, and even reprehensible. And we do not believe that the reactionists on the L.C.C. are so illogical as to willingly permit the one while they deny the other. The right of publication and the right of public meeting hang together. The Council is trying to prohibit one as a preliminary to forbidding the other.

Digitized by Google

* * *

A Call to Arms.

The issue, then, is once more before us. Had we not been at war, a County Council election might have convinced these reactionists that they had embarked on a dangerous course. But there are ways of influencing the members of the Council even between elections. And to this end we repeat our advice of last year. Let lovers of freedom write letters of protest to their L.C.C. members. Let societies everywhere follow the same plan. If these fail, well, the Council is a statutory body, and it may find that there are means of challenging the way in which it exercises its powers before another and a higher tribunal. Above all, we must show the Council that we are in earnest. Literature will continue to be sold in the parks, and if the Council is obdurate, people will be prosecuted, and we presume fined, for selling it. To that end we must organize our forces. It is useless having a score of sellers in one place and none in another. Let all who are willing to act as sellers of pamphlets while the struggle is on send their names in to the N.S.S. Secretary, who is also Secretary of the General Committee, saying when and where they are prepared to sell. The fight can then be conducted on effective lines, and we shall gain a maximum of result with a minimum of effort.

* * *

Worth Fighting For.

This is the second attempt made by the Council within five years to curtail freedom of propaganda. Knowing that many struggling societies depend upon collections to help meet expenses, it first issued a ukase that collections would no longer be permitted. This was resisted, and we won. The second attempt is now being made, and we think we shall win again if we only show ourselves determined enough. If we are told that this is not a time for internal public quarrels, the reply is that the quarrel has been forced upon us, and we cannot stand quietly by while our liberties are filched from us. Five millions of British soldiers are under arms for the purpose, we are told, of preserving our freedom. Well, let us remember that if they are fighting for our liberties abroad, it is our duty to defend their liberties at home. When they return, it should be to a homeland not less free than when they left. It would be the cruellest of satires to find that just when we are beating Prussianism in the field, we are quietly submitting to its establishment in the Council-chamber. There is nothing more difficult to gain than freedom; there is nothing easier to lose. In this case vigilance and courage will, we are sure, overcome the efforts of a handful of reactionaries clothed with temporary power. And we have no doubt we shall have a good public opinion behind us in the fight.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

A racehorse has been named Armageddon. Is this another proof of the promised revival of religion?

Christianity and the Symbolism of Factuality.

UNDER the above heading the Rev. F. E. Powell contributes a second article to this journal for March 15 in criticism of my friendly attack upon his theological views as originally expressed in a published sermon, entitled "The Father-Heart of God and the World-Agony of War"; but, with all due deference, I must say that instead of answering he ingeniously evades all the points raised in my article for March 25. In doing this he indulges in several curious charges against me. The first is that I "part company with known facts and speculate upon unverifiable assumptions" in expressing my acceptance of the scientific belief in the eternity and infinitude of the universe. I should like to have those known facts, from which I thus depart, enumerated and named, and I invite Mr. Powell to undertake the task. What facts are there, for example, against the eternity of Nature? Everybody admits that our solar system has had a beginning, and must of necessity come to an end; but we learn from astronomy that it was preceded and shall be succeeded by other solar systems; these come and go, but Nature stays on for ever. It is true that, in 1850, when Social Statics appeared, Spencer believed in creation, the argument from design, and the possibility of balking "the creative design" (pp. 81-88, 517); but, by 1862, when the first edition of First Principles came out, he had outgrown those views and come to teach the Indestructibility of Matter, which implies its eternity. Either a beginning or an end to matter was now philosophically inconceivable. As Mr. Powell persists in thrusting Spencer at me, I feel obliged metaphorically to pelt him with Spencer in return, for Spencer is decidedly on my side. He puts the case for the eternity of matter thus:—

> Thought consists in the establishment of relations. There can be no relation established, and therefore no thought framed, when one of the related terms is absent from consciousness. Hence it is impossible to think of something becoming nothing, for the same reason that it is impossible to think of nothing becoming something—the reason, namely, that nothing cannot become an object of consciousness. The annihilation of Matter is unthinkable for the same reason that the creation of Matter is unthinkable (First Principle, p. 158).

Sir Oliver Lodge, also, is substantially sound on this point. He says:—

> We may all fairly agree, I think, that whatever really and fundamentally exists must, so far as bare existence is concerned, be independent of time. It may go through many changes, and thus have a history; that is to say, must have definite time-relations, so far as its changes are concerned; but it can hardly be thought of as either going out of existence, or as coming into existence, at any given period, though it may completely change its form and accidents (Life and Matter, p. 101).

Spencer's very definition of Evolution involves the idea of the eternity of the universe in some form or other. The sum total of Matter never varies; but it is perpetually undergoing changes of form, and evolution, according to Spencer, is the name given to the whole series. What is evolution? Mr. Powell's Master answers: "Evolution under its most general aspect is the integration of matter and concomitant dissipation of motion." It may be simple or compound, but in essence it is always the process that creates history.

Again, are there any known facts which give the lie to the belief in the infiniteness of nature? The reader will notice that I did not say it can be proved that the universe is infinite in extent; but all the facts hitherto discovered by astronomers point in the direction of its limitlessness. This is a legitimate assumption, because it rests, not upon mere speculation, but upon well-attested astronomical facts. Neither did I speculate in any direction upon that assumption, whether verifiable or unverifiable; I merely stated that I accepted it, and could discern no trace of an infinite and eternal energy above or apart from the force and energy within the universe known as natural laws. Mr. Powell does me a direct injustice when he accuses me of "dogmatizing" concerning the infinitude and eternity of the universe. With the utmost respect, I challenge him to point to a single dogmatic statement either in my review of his sermon or in my rejoinder to his reply. I am not in the habit of dogmatizing on subjects concerning which I know nothing; and the only fault I found with the reverend gentleman was, not that he cherished beliefs which I could not share, but that he offered such beliefs to the public as well established facts. My contention was and is, not that a person has no right to believe in "the Father-heart of God," if he can, but that the Father-heart of God is not an established fact. But I do affirm most unhesitatingly that the reverend gentleman is radically mistaken when he says that his belief was Spencer's.

Digitized by Google

It is altogether too funny to say of me that "whilst affecting Agnosticism concerning the origin and destiny of the vast world-process, I immediately blossom out into a full-fledged Gnostic who knows what is and is not consistent with the nature of the force underlying all phenomena." I have not made the least pretension to such wonderful knowledge. What I have said and do say is, that I have neither consciousness nor knowledge derived from obesrvation of "the Infinite and Eternal Energy" which, to Mr. Powell, means the Father-heart of the God of Jesus Christ. I plead total ignorance of the two Gods, the one stern and the other loving, and of the two Fathers, the one of science and philosophy and the other of revelation and experience, whom the reverend gentleman believes in and preaches. The ultimate significance of the universe is beyond me altogether, and those who talk about it with such confidence do, in my judgment, but darken counsel "by words without knowledge."

Mr. Powell declares that "the supreme question is, not how far Spencer believed in the Infinite or Eternal Energy as apart from and of prior existence to the universe, but whether such an energy exists at all." To begin with, Spencer does not assert that such an energy does exist at all. Mr. Powell says that "we can only know of it by its effects"; but, I ask, are there any effects which directly or indirectly testify to the existence of an energy apart from and of prior existence to the universe? How can there be, when, to adopt Spencer's own words, "we can no longer contemplate the visible creation as having a definite beginning or end" (First Principles, p. 506)? "Science," says Mr. Powell, "is concerned with phenomena only." Spencer agrees with him, but significantly adds:—

> Intellect being framed simply by and for converse with phenomena, involves us in nonsense when we try to use it for anything beyond phenomena. This inability of the thinking faculty in presence of the Unconditioned is shown not only by the self-contradictory nature of its product, but also by the arrest of its process before completion. In attempting to pass the limit it breaks down before it has finished its first step.

That extract is from the Postscript to Part I. of First Principles, written in the year 1899, in which he says further, that "it cannot be denied that to affirm of the Ultimate Reality that it is unknowable is, in a remote way, to assert some knowledge of it, and therefore involves a contradiction." And yet he contends that, despite all contradictions and nonsensical attempts to think the unthinkable, there remains a consciousness of that Ultimate Reality, but, alas, "a consciousness which cannot be put into shape." Tens of thousands of people are without that shapeless consciousness, that illogical belief in the supernatural which cannot give an intelligible account of itself; and to them there is nothing outside, beyond, or above the universe. On this point Sir Ray Lankester writes as follows:—

> One may regard the utmost possibilities of the results of human knowledge as the contents of a bracket, and place outside that bracket the factor x to represent those unknown and unknowable possibilities which the imagination of man is never wearied of suggesting. The factor x is the plaything of the metaphysician.....The self-appointed task of the metaphysician was not long ago compared by a keen thinker and great lawyer to that of "a blind man in a dark room hunting for a black cat which—is not there." The black cat which is not there is the reality represented by x. The search for it is surely not a very healthy occupation either for the blind man or for those who solemnly give attention to his accounts of his subtle devices and evergreen self-assurance (Preface to Hugh Elliot's Modern Science and the Illusions of Professor Bergson).

Now, as regards Spencer, it should be borne in mind that when First Principles appeared in 1862, he was under the spell of the philosophy of Sir William Hamilton as interpreted by Dean Mansel in his Limits of Religious Thought, a work from which he liberally quotes in Part I. Mansel's position was that it is contrary to reason to believe in the Unconditioned, the Absolute, or God, and that the Christian's faith rests, not upon reason, but upon the authority of the Bible as God's infallible Word. In the light of the Higher Criticism that position is no longer possible, except to members of the Bible League. Spencer maintains that thinking signifies relationing; but there is a limit to the power of relationing; and writing of it in 1899 this is what the distinguished philosopher says:—

> The inevitable effect of our mental constitution is that on reaching the limit thought rushes out to form a new relation and cannot form it. A conflict hence arises between an effort to pass into the Unknowable and an inability to pass—a conflict which involves the inconsistency of feeling obliged to think something and being unable to think it (First Principles, p. 100).

One personal word may be allowed in conclusion. Towards Mr. Powell, though in sharp intellectual opposition to him, I entertain the friendliest possible feelings. I admire his great courage in so intrepidly championing views which are violently denounced by the overwhelming majority of theologians even in his own church. I wish to extend to him the right hand of cordial fellowship for venturing out in defence of those views into the columns of this journal. He occupies to-day the ground on which I stood, or tried hard to stand, for many years. I passed into it out of the narrowest and most bigoted Calvinistic orthodoxy; and, at last, after a long and painful struggle, I passed out of it into pure Humanism, in which I have found a home that satisfies at once my intellect and my heart. To me now the fatherly and brotherly heart is a product of social evolution; and, as Mr. Powell himself admits, evolution is an extremely slow process. Social welfare can be won only as the reward of persistent struggle, and there are times when the struggle seems futile; but our firm hope is that, in the long run, the fittest shall survive.

J. T. Lloyd.

Bishop Brent says there is Prussianism in the Churches to-day. This is very sad news, for the clergy maintain that Prussianism means Atheism.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Kipling's New Book.

A Diversity of Creatures. By Rudyard Kipling. (Macmillan; 1917.)

SINCE Byron awoke one morning to find himself famous, few writers ever took the field with so instant and signal a success as Mr. Rudyard Kipling. Emphatic, impetuous, and audacious, he voiced contemporary passion and sentiment with no uncertain sound. Its possibilities and dangers were both mirrored in his stirring talent. First came the rumour of a new genius from the Orient, after the manner of creeds from time immemorial. Then Plain Tales from the Hills put many in an uncritical stage of admiration. Soldiers Three and In Black and White completed the conquest; and subsequent works in prose and verse caused the reading public, like Oliver Twist, to ask for more.

There has been, perhaps, a slackening of public interest in Mr. Kipling's works during later years, but the production of an edition de luxe of his writings—a rare compliment to a living author—met with so ready an appreciation that it augured well for the continuance of his fame. And Mr. Kipling's latest book, A Diversity of Creatures, is typical of his talent; but the prevailing impression left upon the reader is surely one of instability. The range of his subjects has widened, it is true, and the variety of his experience has increased, but there is far less sympathy and artistry, and his humour lacks the old, rich relish of former days. In a sense he may be said never to have entirely grown up. His youthful ideals are his ideals still, and they are voiced with the implacable accents of middle age. The sure touch of the true artist is so often changed for the rougher methods of the politician and propagandist.

This is particularly noticeable in his studies of abnormal phenomena, in which the neurotic element frequently approaches the "tommyrotic," such as the story of "Mary Postgate." She is a middle-aged companion to an elderly lady. The old lady has a nephew, whom the companion loves secretly. When the War breaks out, the lad joins the Flying Corps, and is killed by an accident before he goes to the Front. Mary stands by his open grave, and all the tenderness of which her womanhood was ever capable leaves her. Grief turns her into a monster, and she takes an awful vengeance on a wounded German.

Another story, "As Easy as A.B.C.," deals with the world in the year 2065, when mankind has got rid of war and democracy, and suffers only from fear of crowds. This story is vitiated by Mr. Kipling's sniffing contempt for his fellow-men. It will be seen that the gods of Mr. Kipling's youth are still the gods of his maturity, but sadly battered by the process of the years.

But Mr. Kipling's passions were always elemental, and he has given crude expression to his hatreds in some of the verses interspersed among the stories. The following lines embody his creed:—

> Whatsoever, for any cause,
> Seeketh to take or give,
> Power above or beyond the Laws,
> Suffer it not to live!
> Holy State or Holy King—
> Or Holy People's Will—
> Have no truck with the senseless thing.
> Order the guns and kill.

Happily, the book does not deal only with the sinister side of life. For Mr. Kipling has other facets to his talent, among which is a real sense of humour. Indeed, his earlier stories, such as "The Taking of Lungtugpen" and "The Incarnation of Krishna Mulvaney," recall the open-air humour of Marryatt and the high spirits of Fielding and Smollett. The comic satire, "The Village that Voted the Earth Flat," is quite in the old irresponsible, boyish vein, and as funny as anything he has ever written. A country member of Parliament and magistrate sets traps for motorists, fines them heavily, and insults them from the Bench. Two of his victims happen to be a great music-hall proprietor and the owner of a hundred newspapers. They take their revenge, and lampoon him on the stage and in the press. They arrange for questions to be asked in Parliament, and invent a society advocating the Flat-Earth theory, and send it down to the village for its annual meeting. By bribery, the villagers are induced to vote that the earth is flat, and in the end the publicity given to the M.P. causes him to retire into private life amid a blaze of ridicule.

There is another comic story, "The Horse Marines," in which two opposing armies at manœuvres pelt each other with mangel-wurzels, and yet another of public-school life, introducing once again "Beetle," poking fun at masters and boys alike. The remainder of the stories give life and vigour to a lively collection, which, while it will not add much to Mr. Kipling's reputation, will yet give pleasure to his numerous readers.

Like Meissonier, Mr. Kipling always succeeds best on a small canvas. The Light that Failed, Stalky & Co., and Captains Courageous were magnificent failures; but his short stories, at their best, are admirable. Despite his limitations, he is one of the most popular writers of the day. With Bret Harte, he presents us with infinite riches in a little room. The best of his work would hardly bulk more largely than one of the interminable novels of old Samuel Richardson, which used to draw tears from the eyes of our great-grandmothers. For readers of to-day like their sensations brief and pungent Had Mr. Kipling's stories been told in the manner of the "penny dreadful," devoid alike of grace and grammar, we had yet read them with pleasure, so vital are they in essentials.

The most extraordinary thing about Mr. Kipling is his piety, which is constantly peeping out in his writing. The young men of the Tory press proudly acclaim him as the most religious writer since Dryden, and the Nonconformist journalists shake their heads and retort sorrowfully that he has no "soul." This, however, is the merest partizanship. Of all the gods created by men in their own likeness, the Anglo-Indian deity of Mr. Kipling is the most astonishing. For the piety is so often charged with politics, and the hymns are so often hymns of hate. But, fortunately, people read his books for his fun and fancy, and not for his theology. He helped to make India a reality to dwellers in the United Kingdom, which is no mean achievement. And he is a clever and entertaining artist.

MIMNERMUS.

Science and Spiritualism.

VIII.

(Continued from p. 262.)

We agree with Mr. Maskelyne that there is no use laying down a test for the spiritualists any more than for the clairvoyants. To begin with, they always object to it, and when the tests are rigidly enforced by men of a scientific cast of mind, the wonder-workers always fail. How often, for example, have the clairvoyants or ghost-seers been asked to read some document or tell the number of a bank-note carefully locked up, and always in vain? Sometimes they offer the excuse that spirits cannot, or will not, tell everything. Very likely, it is said, the shades do not care whether physiologists believe in them or not, and will not condescend to answer impertinent questions or to suffer cross-examination of a detective character. You must take what they tell you in the way they tell it to you. The spiritualists have never told us anything worth knowing, and, what is worse, they are in hopeless disagreement with one another. Will common sense not teach people that, if there really were a channel of intercourse between the living and the dead, many a message would come from friends gone before, of serious and weighty import instead of trifles and ineptitudes which have a suspicious resemblance to echoes of the thoughts of the living. —Dr. Ernest Hart, "The New Witchcraft," p. 164.

Digitized by Google

As for religion—why, I served it, sir!
I'll stick to that! With my phenomena
I laid the atheist sprawling on his back.
—Sludge, in Browning's "Sludge the Medium."

ALTHOUGH Home was never publicly exposed in the act of trickery, still there is no doubt that many must have seen through his tricks, or some of them; but, as we have pointed out, his peculiar position as an honoured guest placed him above the category of the ordinary professional medium. Mr. Podmore, in fact, mentions a letter written by a gentleman in 1889, "in which the writer relates that at a seance held in 1855 he saw plainly that the alleged 'spirit hands' were supported by and in obvious connection with Home's arms."[1] But as this was written thirty-four years after the event, it would not be fair to attach much weight to it.

It has also been stated that Browning, the poet, caught Home in the act of trickery. Browning denied this to Mr. Myers; but, nevertheless, he considered Home a trickster and a charlatan, disagreeing with his wife on this matter, who seems to have been converted by Home to a belief in Spiritualism, much to the Poet's distress. There is not the least doubt that Browning's scarifying Sludge the Medium was aimed at Home. Home himself, in a savage attack on Browning in Incidents of My Life,[2] declares, "Mr. Browning did intend his fancy portrait of Mr. Sludge to represent me," and tells of a violent scene that occurred between them a few days after Mr. and Mrs. Browning had attended one of Home's seances, Mrs. Browning, according to Home, taking sides with Home against her husband.

Another famous man who was very dissatisfied with Home and his phenomena was Dr. Barthez, Napoleon's physician, afterwards physician to the Prince Imperial.

In his recollections, entitled The Empress Eugenie and her Circle, there is a letter, written by himself from Biarritz, September 5, 1857, in which he describes a visit by Home to the Empress Eugenie, who had sent for him as soon as she knew Home was in the neighbourhood. Dr. Barthez observes: "The entire belief she has in him, the animation and violence with which she speaks of him, really distress me." Home's apparent ingenuousness did not impose on Dr. Barthez, who observes: "His simple, timid, half-awkward air seemed to me to conceal a very able savoire-faire."

The Doctor did not attend the first seance, but, being requested to remain to the second one, he joined the company round the table, upon which the company placed their hands. Immediately the table moved, raps were heard, there were scratching sounds right and left—whether the spirits were scratching themselves, and if so, why? is not stated—Her Majesty's dress was pulled; a handbell was taken from a gentleman's hand; an accordion, held by Home with one hand, played an air. All this took place under the table, and lasted a quarter of an hour. Then the spirit rapped out a message that there were too many present, and indicated those whose presence it did not desire. "I was among the number," says the Doctor; "the explanation of that being the incredulous smile which I felt was visible on my face."

Dr. Barthez declares to his friend that he is absolutely ignorant of the manner in which the phenomena were produced, but remarks that "inasmuch as everything has to take place under a table, out of sight, and as no one is allowed to look, feel, or examine; so long as I am not allowed to use such means as I have at my disposal to obtain information and avoid error; so long as I am told that my incredulity hinders these manifestations from the other world; I shall say that I have a perfect right to disbelieve in spirits and to suspect the existence of very ordinary means, although these may escape me. In short, Mr. Home seemed to me to be a very able man, not only as a performer of tricks, but especially as a man who can command intelligences; but the spirits he evokes are not those of the other world; they are living intelligences that do his bidding."[1]

However, Dr. Barthez did not remain long in ignorance as to Home's method of producing phenomena; for, in another letter to his friend, he throws light upon the subject. He says:—

It will amuse you to hear that one of the means by which Mr. Home evokes his spirits has at last been detected. The Empress is reduced to saying that the Home of to-day is not the Home of other days; that he has lost his power and is seeking to replace it by subterfuges. The matter is simple enough. Mr. Home has thin slippers, easily drawn on and off; he has also, I fancy, cuts in his socks, which leave his toes free. At the proper moment he throws off a slipper, and with his toes tugs at a dress here and there, rings a handbell, gives a rap on this side or that, and the thing once done, quickly slips his foot back into the slipper again. This was seen by M. Morio, who drew up a full signed and written statement, with all the details necessary to establish the genuineness of his discovery. Home saw that he was found out, and I can tell you he cut a very sorry figure. He went out, saying he was ill, and all night he had nervous attacks and visions, and has been surrounded by spirits. Finally, as he was judged to be on the point of death, a priest was sent for, and a doctor.

The next day, death seeming still to be imminent, Dr. Bartley was sent for, and continues:—

He pitched a long tale about his sufferings, the spirits that tormented him, and so forth. Unhappily he had the most natural pulse imaginable. Then he pretended to go into a trance; his eyes turned up and became fixed; evidently the spirits were returning, and about to torment him again. So I took him by the arm, shook it rather roughly, and said in his ear, "Come, Mr. Home, no nonsense; let all the spirits be; you know I don't believe in them." The trance ceased at that, and he looked me straight in the face, and saw plainly enough that I was laughing at him; and the spirits immediately flew away.....I even drew up a statement which I gave to M. Morio de l'Ile to add to his account. The evocation of spirits at the villa has suddenly ceased, and we will hope this unworthy charlatan is revealed in his true colours. But Her Majesty cannot admit that anyone could have the face to play tricks on herself and the Emperor for a whole year.[2]

The signed and attested statement of M. Morio ought to be published, if it has not been destroyed in deference to imperial wishes. It is certain that Home would have been exposed upon this occasion but for the fact that the presence of the Empress prevented the exposers from causing a scene. That is where Home had the advantage over the ordinary medium; his position as a member of society on an equal footing with his patrons protected him.

We can see by this account of Dr. Barthez how Home did some of his unaccountable tricks. He could use his feet as a substitute for his hands. We know that this is quite possible if the feet are trained fairly early in life; and, as we have seen, Home commenced mediumship in his teens. I can remember, when a lad, hearing

[1] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., p. 230.
[2] Second Series (1872), p. 98.

[1] Dr. E. Barthez, The Empress Eugenie and her Circle (1912), pp. 139-142.
[2] Barthez, The Empress Eugenie and her Circle (1912), pp. 164-5-6.

Digitized by Google

my father say that he saw an armless painter in Antwerp Cathedral painting pictures, holding the brush with his toes. The unshod peoples of warmer climates are much more proficient in using their toes than those whose feet have been cramped by boots. Eusapia Palladino, as we shall see, used her feet to produce "phenomena" in exactly the same way; and as her parents were Italian peasants, probably she went unshod in early life.

(To be continued.) W. MANN.

American Churches and the War.

IGNORING as of none effect the dictum of their Prince of Peace that they who take the sword shall perish by the same instrumentality, the New York Federation of Christian Churches has endorsed by a vote of 158 to 52 the universal military service which men of violence propose, and recommend the most extreme measures necessary. The vote by Churches stood:—

	FOR.	AGAINST.
Baptist	16	1
Congregational	10	0
Disciples of Christ	3	0
Seventh Day Adventists ...	1	1
Protestant Episcopal	27	3
Reformed Episcopal	0	1
Evangelical Association ...	1	2
Society of Friends	0	2
German Evangelical Synod ...	0	1
Lutheran...	14	7
Methodist Episcopal	23	4
Primitive Methodist	1	0
Moravian	4	1
Presbyterian	27	20
Reformed	19	3
Unitarian	1	0
Universalist	1	2
Union Protestant	10	4

It required the 20 negative votes of the Presbyterian communion to prevent the Churches from going 5 to 1 for the sword. The Public, which holds that Christianity has "received a blow in the house of its supposed friends," observes that sixty years ago the Federation of Churches would have voted thus affirmatively for black slavery. The record for belligerency that the Church is making now will not give it any hesitancy, after peace shall have been established permanently by Humanitarianism, in claiming that it abolished war.—Truthseeker (New York).

Correspondence.

ATHEISM IN THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I am obliged to Mr. Robert Arch for his reply to my defence of Hebert, which calls for further comment. May I say at the outset that the "case against Hebert," as originally drawn up by Robert Arch, K.C., on behalf, it would seem, of the Society of Bourgeois Respectability and the Guild of Serious Humour, contained nothing whatever about Hebert's "dishonesty," nor the question of his taking the wrong "political" road? Therefore, I respectfully submit to my learned brother for the prosecution that I am only concerned with the original indictment under which I accepted a brief for the defence. This latter charged the defendant Hebert, the editor of the Pere Duchene—a "disreputable paper," we are told—with being a "gutter journalist," "not worthy of respect," since he used the "vilest slang of the gutter" at the expense of "dignity and decency."

Now, I submit, my Lord (Mr. Editor), and I think that the gentlemen of the jury (the readers of the Freethinker) will agree, that the prosecuting counsel has not substantiated his case against Hebert. All we have been told is that he cannot produce the actual incriminating document against Hebert, but that the indictment was framed upon the testimony of a person named Aulard, who gave a few specimens of the language used by Hebert. But this, I insist, is not evidence; and, mark you, the prosecution does not even say what Aulard says that Hebert says! At the same time, I am willing to agree that this Aulard is certainly a most reliable witness; and as the prosecution begs the court to give particular attention to this witness, I will go so far as to admit him.

Yet, strange to say, this witness does not help the prosecution an iota. In no place does this Aulard condemn Hebert's journalism as "vile," "indecent," or "disreputable." On the contrary, we are told that Hebert is a "prudent" writer, though possibly for another reason. But I do know of another person further out of court from a point of view of "evidence" than Aulard, and I refer to his English translator, who has taken it upon himself to vilify Hebert, as he does Thomas Paine, in the most outrageous manner. I submit, though I hope I am mistaken, that Mr. Arch may have been influenced by this unscrupulous person.

However, it is upon the excerpts (a few seeds from a granary, though by no means a specimen of the harvest) from the Pere Duchene, as quoted by the original witness Aulard, that Mr. Arch bases his indictment. These excerpts I have since looked into, and I can assure every right-minded person that, even when translated into colloquial English, they would probably leave a Methodist mothers' meeting unmoved. Yet Mr. Arch insists that if the Freethinker were to "habitually" use "some" of the phrases "customary" with Hebert (Mr. Arch refers possibly to other than those given by Aulard), it would be prosecuted by the police as "obscene." Of course, if we must go to the police for an opinion upon "obscenity," nothing further need be said. The truth is, that the "customary" phrases with Hebert are such as those I have already quoted. I have a distinct recollection of their nature, as I once made a comparative study between Hebert and his imitator in the Paris Commune of 1871—Eugene Vermesch, who also edited a Pere Duchene. As to "some" phrases, but not "habitual" with Hebert, which Mr. Arch, or at least I might say the police, might call "obscene," we must bear in mind that the open and free mind of the Gallic race is totally at variance with the cramped and narrow notions of the Anglo-Saxon race to which Mr. Arch, the police, and myself belong. May I recall, in conclusion, the incident of H. M. Stanley and the Arab sheik? Stanley was abashed at the sheik's ideas on wives, and the Arab was equally scandalized at Stanley drinking coffee! Surely nothing further need be said.

H. GEORGE FARMER.

RELIGION IN THE ARMY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Referring to the interesting letter of Mr. Arthur Chapman, in your issue of April 22, and his experiences, I should like to point out that they were the result of ignorant junior officials in the Army. The War Office has explicitly laid down that a recruit, either at his attestation, or on any subsequent occasion, is not to be heckled in any manner whatever, but that his answers are to be entered accurately in the document that is being dealt with. Here is the official notification on the subject:—

ARMY COUNCIL INSTRUCTION.
No. 179 of January, 1916.

War Office, 21st January, 1916.

179. Religious denomination of a Recruit on attestation.

It has recently come to the knowledge of the Army Council that in certain cases Recruiting Officers and others when filling up the attestation papers of recruits enlisting in the Regular Army on a Duration of the War engagement, or in the Territorial Force, are in the habit of asking them to state their religious denominations. It is therefore necessary to point out that on the attestation papers referred to there is no printed question as to religion, and no question on the subject should be addressed to a recruit at the time of his attestation.

In this connection attention is drawn to W.O. letters 27/Gen. No./2514 (Chaplains), of 23rd Nov., 1914, and 27/Gen. No./4279 (Chaplains), of 30th June, 1915, and all

Digitized by Google

Officers and N.C.Os. are reminded that whenever it may be necessary to obtain information as to a soldier's religion, as for the completion of his identity disc, etc., his own statement on the point should be taken without any attempt to influence him, and should be acted on without question. 27/Gen. No/5063 (A.G. 28). By Command of the Army Council.

It would be well if any Freethinker, likely to be associated with the military, cut the above out, and produced it when necessary.

E. B.

Acid Drops.

Mr. H. G. Wells has created a very uneasy feeling, to quote our alleged democratic newspapers, by a letter to the Times advocating the formation of Republican societies in Great Britain. Mr. Wells explains that he intended the subject to be discussed quite apart from the question of our own monarchy—which reads as though he were writing with his tongue in his cheek. Republican societies in this country could hardly discuss the subject without reference to our own monarchy, although it might well be done without reflection upon the present occupant of the throne. Others denounce Mr. Wells, not because Republicanism is wrong in principle—that could hardly be done in the face of recent events—but because they say we are already a Republic—a Crowned Republic. Any phrase will do so long as it sounds well.

Of course, there is no need to attack the personal character of the present occupant of the British throne, or to attack the personal character of any monarch, in order to discuss the respective merits of Republicanism and Monarchy. A change in the form of Government may be advocated at any time without the least reference to the character of anybody. All the same, the discussion has hitherto shown the small amount of clear thinking people bring to bear upon political or social issues. For the essential issue is, not whether the monarchy in its present form is good or bad, but whether it is democratic. And the complaint of rational democracy is that it is hereditary. If the people elected the head of the country, it would not make the least difference whether he were called President, King, or Emperor, or by any other title. But an hereditary monarchy, carrying with it an hereditary aristocracy, is anti-democratic, whether it be a good or a bad thing. And it is a pity that this simple issue cannot be kept clearly before the public.

The Mohammedan priests are very like other ecclesiastics. In view of the adverse military position of the Turks, the priests have carried off the treasures of the famous temple at Medina, which are said to be worth millions. Apparently, Allah is as powerless as all other deities in face of military force.

A brass tablet is to be placed in St. Matthew's Church, Ealing, in memory of the late Rev. H. C. Douglass, who died while celebrating Holy Communion. Had he been a Secularist who had died whilst lecturing, there would have been an edifying moral.

St. George's Day was almost forgotten this year, owing to the strenuous times in which we live. Perhaps it is as well, for this Cappadocian bishop was originally a fraudulent contractor who made big war-profits by providing the Roman Army with bad bacon. This saintly sinner was made patron of England by Henry V., and "St. George for Merry England" was long a battle-cry. Now England is no longer merry, perhaps we can dispense with the saint?

The North Leith United Free Church is periodically treated to a lengthy letter from its pastor, the Rev. Hugh Alexander, who is with the Y.M.C.A. in France, and the letter is faithfully reproduced in extenso in a local paper appropriately named the Leith Burghs Pilot. In the course of a recent letter this sky pilot says:—

> The other day I took the Bible Class, and had for my subject, "Is Prayer Answered?" It was a most memorable meeting. Each man recounted his experience on the subject —how God has answered his prayer. One man told how he was sent from one line of trenches to another. He had seen comrade after comrade shot down by the enemy, and when his turn came round he engaged in silent prayer, asking God to spare him for the sake of his loved ones at home. Not a shot was fired at him, and when his comrades asked him why he had so miraculously escaped, he replied, "It is in answer to my prayer."

What a soldier! And what a God! Week by week, for years and years, the latter was prayed to in innumerable churches to "Send peace in our time, oh, Lord!" but it did not restrain him from permitting the horror of the present conflict, and the blasting in the flower of their manhood of thousands and thousands of fine young lives. What about their loved ones? Will all the members of Mr. Alexander's congregation swallow the ineffable rubbish he pens from France?

Clerical psychology is a fearful and wonderful thing. Mr. Alexander says that "What saves our faith from disaster is the assurance that in the world to-day God is suffering on that account most of all; and this War means for God Himself sorrow and anguish. Such is the very message of the Cross, a God who suffered for the sins of men, and a God who still suffers for the sins of men. It is worth while being a preacher in these days to proclaim such a Gospel." Echo answers: "Such a Gospel!" It is, therefore, only in sorrow, suffering, and gloom that God is a reality! Brightness, cheerfulness, and mirth are taken in the presence of this lachrymose old deity. But all his weeping is not going to save Him. According to Christian teaching, he could have prevented this War and did not raise his little finger to do so. By his silence and indifference he has consigned millions of human beings to untold miseries. It is the sins of God and not the sins of men that require expiation. If we weigh the "sins" of men against the sufferings, physical and mental, which are imposed upon them, we shall find that the latter far outweighs the former. And the only "sins" that men can be guilty of are offences against nature, and nature, by her inevitable law of cause and effect, alone imposes the punishment. We commend this view of life to the apparently guileless Mr. Alexander.

In the House of Lords, on April 24, the Marquis of Crewe, objecting to the War Office exercising authority over the press, said: "The habit of authority grew upon those who exercised it, and he easily foresaw that at the close of the War all manner of reasons might be advanced for continuing the powers conferred by the Defence of the Realm Acts." We commend this semi-prophecy to those who so lightly view the surrender of civil liberties because it is "for the period of the War only." It is always easier to lose liberties than to regain them.

At last we have a really genuine case of faith-healing. And it is given in the South Wales Echo. Selina Hicks, aged ten, of Cadoxton, was diagnosed to be suffering from tuberculosis of the knee. Her knee was placed in plaster of paris, and she was advised to be sent to a home in Hampshire. Some time after she said to her mother, "Take me out of the chair; I can walk. Jesus tells me in my heart I can do so." And when the mother took off the splints, the child could walk. And the child, who "had been fond of reading the Bible," said, "Jesus has cured me." That settles it.

Many people have complained of the nuisance of church bells, particularly since the War has brought home so many nerve-shattered men, to whom quiet is a vital consideration. Mr. Newman, a Manchester solicitor, has offered, through the columns of the Cambridge Magazine, to give £5 towards a fund to test the right to ring church bells in defiance of the wishes of near-by residents. It is really astonishing that whereas the calling of newsboys disturbs the day of rest, the ringing of church bells and the blaring of Salvation Army bands is held to conduce to its restfulness.

We see that the prohibition on Mr. Zangwill's play, "The Melting Pot," has been withdrawn. It was disallowed because it depicted the sufferings undergone by the Jewish people in Russia at the hands of the late Government—and the Church. Now that the play is permitted, we wonder whether Mr. Zangwill will be permitted by the Press Bureau to publish the suppressed chapter—"The Story of the Steam Roller"—which should have appeared in his book "The War for the World."

Digitized by Google

At Forest Hill a woman was sentenced to six weeks' imprisonment for telling fortunes. Yet 50,000 ministers, who tell people where they will spend eternity, are never molested.

The Rev. H. S. M'Clelland, of Glasgow, tells us that on his way to the south, recently, he found himself in a railway compartment with three fellow-travellers, "each of them typical, in his own way," of many of his Correspondents in the Christian Commonwealth. "One was an Atheist; that, at any rate, was what he called himself"; but before they reached the end of the journey Mr. M'Clelland had shown him that the creed he held deserved a better name than Atheism. This is a story with which we are perfectly familiar, and which we are bound to characterize as essentially false. That is to say, either the Atheist was in no sense "typical," or Mr. M'Clelland was entirely mistaken in thinking that he had won him over to any form of Theism.

Our contention is that in Mr. M'Clelland's article, entitled "Talking Theology," in the Christian Commonwealth for April 25, there is no argument for Theism which a fairly enlightened Atheist would have had the slightest difficulty in triumphantly rebutting. The reverend gentleman's argument was thus stated:—

> The love of the ideal, the very possession of an ideal, is only possible to personality. How comes it, then, that Humanity possesses that which you say cannot be found in the Supreme Power from whom Humanity came? The less cannot produce the greater.

No intelligent Atheist believes in the existence of "a Supreme Power from whom Humanity came," or that the possession of an ideal is any indication whatsoever that it has had a supernatural origin. To him all we are and have is the outcome of the evolutionary process. Ideals are social assets gradually acquired during countless æons of social experience. Mr. M'Clelland may be a very clever man; but he does not even understand the Atheistic position.

From a purely religious point of view, Dr. Horton is amply justified in opposing Sunday labour, even as a means of preventing future starvation, because the permission of Sunday labour for any purpose whatever would be the effectual beginning of the end of Puritanical Sabbatarianism. Dr. Horton, being fully aware of this, does his utmost to oppose the introduction of the thin end of a wedge which he knows would rob Nonconformist ministers, in particular, of the congregations upon which they depend for their livelihoods. This, too, explains the divergence of views between the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Hampstead Congregational divine.

The snobbish reverence for authority affected by many people is something that helps their self-interest. Dependence upon God and an everlasting dread of what people will think are the marks of the helpless parasite who has no imagination, and who so long as he can find something to feed on will conform to any system or state of society.

Religious folk have a perfect genius for misrepresentation. The Daily Telegraph says the War "is veritably a crusade undertaken on behalf of the fundamental claims of the Christian faith." We do not think that the soldiers of "Infidel France" would agree to this assertion.

An evening paper has made a sensation with stories of German corpse-burning, and prints a message stating that the Pope is terribly upset. Yet Catholics are taught to believe in the resurrection of the body, and in the dogma of hell-fire.

Many newspapers made eloquent references to the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers in America on the occasion of the service at St. Paul's Cathedral, held to commemorate the entry of the United States into the War. This recalls Ingersoll's jest that it was a pity that, instead of the pilgrims landing on Plymouth Rock, the Rock had not landed on the Pilgrim Fathers.

In his sermon at St. Paul's Cathedral, Bishop Brent emphasized the spirit of democratic liberty which has always inspired the American Commonwealth. He forgot to mention, however, that this "spirit of democratic liberty" stops at the colour line, and that white Christians are very prone to kick coloured brethren under the coat-tails.

The Rev. Thomas Phillips, of Bloomsbury Chapel, though a zealous advocate of the immoral doctrine of the Atonement, admits that it is supremely difficult to bring it home to the modern mind. The truth is that the modern mind, realizing its true character, rejects it as at once dishonouring to any respectable God, and humiliating to man. Mr. Phillips admits, further, that the Pulpit cannot win the modern mind until the Cross of Christ breaks its heart, which means that the Pulpit's day is practically gone—gone for ever.

Speaking at the recent Baptist Union meetings, Dr. Selbie, Principal of Mansfield College, declared that unless a revival came soon, the Church was doomed; "that they would either win great triumphs for the Gospel during the next twenty-five years, or, humanly speaking, they would go under." What stubborn things facts are; they force even clergymen to tell the truth about their own prospects—sometimes.

Mr. Hamilton Fyfe writes in the Daily Mail of April 25 that "chief among the agencies for the spread of sympathy with the German is the Church" in Spain. This is very magnanimous of the Spanish Church seeing that, as our own clerics inform us, Germany has renounced Christianity and become a nation of Atheists.

Mr. Fyfe also says that the parties which are for better education, for elections fairly managed, for honesty among officials, and for an enlightened national policy, oppose the Church as their obstinate foe. He adds that: "For the Atheism which prevails among so many of the educated and progressive in Spain the clergy are responsible." The essence of the statement is that Atheism in Spain stands for enlightenment and progress. But it would never have done to have told the readers of the Daily Mail the truth in that way.

God has always been useful, if not necessary and indispensable, to the powers that be in every land. The fear of God has been cunningly described as "the beginning of wisdom," whereas it is really something entirely different. It is a means by which the common people are kept in ignorance and in subjection to their "betters," and it is the chief pillar of autocracy and despotism. The names of wealthy people and high Government officials are always appearing as patrons of God and his ambassadors on earth.

We are reminded of this on observing the circulars of a touting agency called the Evangelization of India Society, or a similar name. Three British Lords have their names printed on these circulars as patrons of the Society. These three Lords are all servants of the British Empire holding high posts with large salaries! Must not our Mohammedan fellow-subjects marvel at our politeness? It is surprising that English noblemen should lend their authority to such impudent sectarianism as is manifested by this precious evangelization society. They might also reflect that total detachment from missionary schemes of the kind would better consort with the dignity of their positions, seeing that the British Empire contains only a small minority of Christians—a minority too uninfluential to stop the opium traffic in India.

Digitized by Google

About Ourselves.

We have received a number of complaints lately from readers who find it impossible to get their Freethinker regularly, or get it only after considerable trouble. We know of no justifiable reason why this should be the case. Some have solved the difficulty by subscribing for it by post, others have pressed their newsagents until they did get it. But this is very annoying, and naturally, has a tendency to do us injury. Will readers please, therefore, note that the Freethinker is supplied to all newspaper agents at the usual trade terms, and on sale or return. No order has been issued by the Board of Trade prohibiting the return of unsold copies, and we have not, therefore, departed from our usual system.

It is very difficult to counter the bigotry that seeks to injure us by reporting the paper "out of print," or by inventing some other excuse, and we earnestly beg the assistance of our friends in this matter.

Just now it is more important than ever that our sales should be, if possible, more than maintained. The cost of production is ever on the increase, and only those who are behind the scenes can appreciate the constant labour and anxiety of keeping a journal like the Freethinker alive in these times. We feel ourselves justified in asking Freethinkers to be on the alert to help their paper whenever opportunity offers. They can do this by inducing their newsagent to display an extra copy, by calling the attention of their non-subscribing friends to its existence, or by sending a copy wherever they think it is likely to be appreciated. We will send it ourselves if the addresses are forwarded.

If only a fourth of our present readers were to gain us one new subscriber each, our troubles, on the financial side, would be about at an end. That is not an impossible achievement, and we believe it could be realized if our readers worked with a will in the matter. We are doing our best, and working our hardest at this end, and that encourages us to ask for the assistance of those who are as interested as we are in seeing that neither the bigotry nor the indolence of newsagents stands in the way of the Freethinker reaching the largest possible public.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—May 6, South Place Institute, South Place, Moorgate Street, E.C.

I. Izekowitz.—We have read your letter with great interest. You have evidently passed through a rather trying experience, and we congratulate you on having achieved mental serenity at the end. The paper is being forwarded.

W. Roscher.—Your subscription has been handed to the N. S. S. Secretary. We wish all Freethinkers were of your opinion that it is almost a crime not to join the N. S. S. We have no knowledge of the "Ten Commandments for Freethinkers"; it never reached us. If you will write the N. S. S. Secretary, she will be able to suggest the best way for the disposal of your back numbers.

J. Benton writes to thank us for the copies of the Freethinker sent him to Egypt.

Humanitarian.—We quite appreciate the difficulties of your position. In such a situation, everyone must help the cause in the way that seems best, and we have no doubt that you are doing your part.

Norwich.—Will come in as a useful anecdote for some purposes.

H. T. Phillips.—Pleased to have the good wishes of a regular reader. We are not surprised to learn that you greatly value your acquaintanceship with our contributor, Mr. A. F. Thorn. If that, and the War, have converted you from a passive to an active advocate of Freethought, it has, at least, done that amount of good.

W. Gregory.—It is useless inserting notice of a meeting on May 3 in a paper dated May 6. Your card is evidently a week late.

H. Mains.—Our opinion of Haeckel's work as a Freethinker has not been changed in the least by his attitude towards the War. Why should it be? His intense patriotism cannot affect the quality of his pre-war work as a scientist, any more than, say, the quality of Darwin's work would have been affected had he attempted to assassinate Queen Victoria.

F. Downaton (Wigan).—We shall be pleased to hand Mr. Underwood any communication that reaches this office.

L. Cottam.—We do not think the Nation ever said that our soldiers were found wanting, whatever criticism may have been directed against their leaders and the Government. The corrective for ill-informed newspaper writing is a well-informed public. In any case, the suppression of papers by officials is a dangerous practice. By the way, you are mistaken in saying that Marshal Haig complained of the article. The Government has stated that this is not the case.

E. Greenwood.—Crowded out this week.

T. Patterson.—Your communication received and contents noted. We have for some years adopted the plan of sending specimen copies of the Freethinker to addresses furnished by our readers.

F. Horday.—P.O. received. Pamphlets are being sent.

E. J. Pearce.—Received. Many thanks.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen opened the course of lectures at South Place Sunday evening last, and the meeting was in every way a success. There was a fine attendance, the lecturer was in excellent form, and the meeting was alive from start to finish. Mr. Collette Jones presided, and discharged his duties as chairman with dignity and efficiency.

The lecturer to-day (May 6) is Mr. Lloyd. His subject is "Humanism Versus Christianity," and in his hands it is bound to be an interesting topic. We hope that London Freethinkers are doing their best to make these meetings known. Mr. Lloyd's meeting offers an excellent opportunity for inducing Christians to attend. We hope that many will avail themselves of it.

Whit-Sunday is approaching, and with it the National Secular Society's Annual Conference. The Conference Agenda will appear in our next issue, and there is just time for Branches to send any resolutions they have for discussion. The Conference this year will be held under difficult circumstances, but we hope that Branches will do their best to send delegates, and that individual members in goodly numbers will find it possible to attend. Those provincial friends who intend visiting London on Whit-Sunday, and would like accommodation found for them, should write Miss Vance without delay, stating requirements. She will do her best to see they are "fixed" up as comfortably as is possible.

Mr. E. A. Cave, B.A., Headmaster of the Boys' High School, Harrow, writes in the Daily News very appreciatively of the educational work of Mr. F. J. Gould. Such a helper, Mr. Cave says, "deserves a State pension of £200 a year for life." We quite agree; but we are certain that he won't get it.

Digitized by Google

One of our lady readers sends us the following concerning her brother—a member of the Canadian contingent now in France:—

> My brother and I are members of a family reared in the Protestant faith. I was the first to break away from the Church after my marriage, four and a half years ago. Once firmly convinced of the truth and justice of Freethought, I have never lost an opportunity of trying to impress others, with more or less success, as occasion offered. While my brother was on leave, prior to his departure for France, nearly twelve months ago, he stayed with us a couple of days. My husband and I talked to him on the subject of Freethought, and aroused his interest. I tried to keep it alive in my letters to him, and a few months ago I asked him if he would like me to send him the Freethinker. He replied, "Yes." I then wrote to you and asked you to send him a few copies. You did so, but when no more came he wrote and told me they all missed it very much, and would I send him some more. I immediately placed an order for an extra copy, and have sent it to him regularly ever since, and shall continue to do so. In his letters he has repeatedly told me that not only himself but others as well were coming round more and more to our way of thinking.
>
> I hope the following quotation will justify the foregoing remarks:
>
> "Just received your welcome letter, also Freethinker, which I welcome, as I am very interested in it now. I guess I am getting round a lot to your way of thinking; a fellow can't help it out here with the sights he sees, and I can assure you I am not the only one by a good many.
>
> "I had a good laugh the other night; we were talking about the War ending when one fellow said: 'I wish Jesus Christ would just drop down on to No Man's Land, and hold up his hands and say, 'Stop this!' Another chap made reply: 'If he did, he would damn soon get a blighty.' It raised a good laugh. Well, Flo, I can tell you the fellows don't place much faith in God when they are going in the trenches or over the top, it's always 'Well, we are off again, wonder what luck this time.' So I am afraid the Churches will have very few attendants out of the returned soldiers after the War."
>
> I am pleased to be able to tell you that he has come safely through the latest fighting.

A correspondent points out, apropos of our remarks in a recent issue concerning the way in which the notices of the Holyoake centenary ignored his being an Atheist, that Lloyd's Newspaper duly chronicled his "anti-religious" opinions, and also the fact of his imprisonment for blasphemy.

We have received the following resolution from the Newcastle Branch of the N.S.S. which was passed at a public meeting:—

> That this meeting of Newcastle Secularists and Ratepayers strongly protest against the Newcastle Education Committee's agreement to engage ministers of religion as teachers in State schools, believing that the interests of the country and education would be better served by withdrawing the teachers from the Army and reinstating them as required, and thus obviate giving a false air of importance to an unnecessarily privileged class. We, therefore, urge the Education Committee to use their best efforts to secure the return of the teachers.

The Humanitarian League holds its Annual Meeting at the Caxton Hall on Wednesday, May 9, at 7.30. Sir George Greenwood occupies the chair, and there will be several speakers. We feel sure that many of our readers will be interested in the work of a Society which deserves well of all who appreciate unselfish labour in a worthy cause.

REALIZING HIS OWN IMPORTANCE.

Louis is the only boy, not only in the immediate family, but also in the collateral branches. One night, at his nurse's knee, he said his prayers aloud:—

> Now I lay me down to sleep,
> I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
> If I should die——

Pausing, he reflected a moment, and then broke out: "Golly! Wouldn't there be a row in this family if that 'u'd happen." —Harper's Magazine, February, 1917.

Woman and Christianity.

IT would be difficult to point to a time when life in general was happier, and the character of men and women set in more noble forms, than as depicted in the pages of the Greek poet Homer, who lived 1000 B.C. Like all great poets, he does not hold woman's nature in light esteem. Penelope bears up for twenty long years of faithful life, awaiting the return from his travels of her husband, Ulysses. Nausicaa, the daughter of King Alcinous, is playing ball with other maidens, when the slimy and naked Ulysses is cast upon her father's coast. She is the perfect conception of female modesty, and meets the situation with an exquisite naturalness and courtesy which could only have been bred in a society of highly cultivated men and women. Andromache behaves with all the natural tenderness of a modern wife and mother. In Homer, we have the Caucasian woman advanced to a fairly high point in the path of her progress. Women are as capable of heroic virtue as men were, and the ideal of this heroism is one to which we have scarcely added. There is no trace of any mental seraglio system. The ladies appear in society naturally and gracefully.

It is true that an undercurrent of antipathy to woman is observable in the later Greek poets. But we get the heroic love of Alcestis, voluntarily dying that her husband might live; the filial piety of Antigone; the majestic grandeur of the death of Polyxena; the more subdued and saintly resignation of Iphigenia, excusing, with her last breath, the father who had condemned her.

As regards ancient Rome, the historian Lecky says:—

> Monogamy was, from the earliest times, strictly enjoined, and it was one of the greatest benefits that have resulted from the expansion of Roman power, that it made this type dominant in Europe. In the legends of early Rome we have ample evidence of the high moral estimate of women and of their prominence in Roman life. The tragedies of Lucretia and of Virginia display a delicacy of honour, a sense of the supreme excellence of unsullied purity, which no Christian nation could surpass (History of European Morals).

It is quite realized that, generally speaking, woman never reached her highest and purest selfhood in Greece and Rome; but the condition of the courtezan in the ancient world compares favourably with that of the armies of prostitutes in the Christian cities of Europe.

According to Christian apologists, woman owes her position in the modern world, such as it is, to Jesus of Nazareth. The Bishop of London describes Christianity as woman's best friend. Other bishops assure women that Jesus Christ was the first to respect them, and represent the Christian attitude towards women as an advance on all previous attitudes. But the truth is that all the progress women have made in the Western world has been in spite of the Church. Woman has only really come into her own in any sense during the last hundred years or so. Whilst she lay bound for nearly twenty centuries of Christendom under a few New Testament texts, two Freethinkers—Mary Woolstonecraft and J. S Mill—came to her rescue. Harriet Martineau, another pioneer of the Woman Movement, was outside the Church, and to day there are hundreds of freedom-loving women without religious beliefs.

Certain texts in the Old and New Testaments have been constantly employed to hedge women round. Women writers from time to time have written the story of the degradation of their sex in Christian Europe, and it is the object of this article to assist other women readers of the Freethinker in clearness of vision with regard to the arrogant assertion of the modern Churches on the subject of women.

Digitized by Google

There is nothing in the Gospel Jesus which can be construed as a factor for promoting the individuality or the social power of woman, making her a force in human progress. The nominal founder of the Church was neither a lover, a husband, nor a father. His kingdom was not of this world, and he utters nothing new upon the relations between the sexes. The oft-quoted Matthew v. 28 was already the ethic of the contemporary Jewish leaders like Rabbi Hillel. The Talmud says: "He who regards men and women with an impure intention has already, as it were, committed adultery." Again: "In every act, it is above all the thought, the intention, which he will judge." Romantic love appears in ancient Greece about 400 B.C., and, like science, art, and philosophy, is entirely absent from the New Testament. The first Christists were too intent upon getting to heaven to worry about any of the problems of earth. Of the few passages showing Jesus' attitude towards women, take Luke ii. 49. Here he appears to have anticipated G. B. Shaw's dictum that children are useful to shock their parents and keep them up-to-date. By playing truant at the age of twelve, he caused his parents much anxiety in searching for him, and coldly replies to his mother's agonized reproach, "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? Behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing," with "How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my father's business?" When a man claims to be God Almighty, one would expect him to behave with superhuman tenderness towards his earthly mother, setting an example of chivalrous devotion for all time to succeeding generations. According to the legend, he was pedantic enough to instruct the wise men of his age; but he makes no allowances for the solicitude of his loving, distracted mother, thereby falling below the level of normal humane feeling. His manners did not improve with age. At the marriage feast at Cana (John ii. 4), in response to his mother's statement that there is no wine, his churlish reply is, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" No man worthy of the name would have answered his mother in such a way. Yet, with the inconsistency to be expected of a legendary narrative, Jesus nevertheless performs the desired miracle, to prove his thaumaturgic power as a God. Later on (Matt. xii. 46), his mother, standing on the edge of the crowd to whom he is speaking, sends a message saying she wishes to speak to him, but receives the callous answer, "Who is my mother?" His example has given warrant for the behaviour of thousands of Christian saints through the centuries who have deserted their earthly duties as fathers, mothers, and citizens in order to devote themselves exclusively to the selfish salvation of their souls. Jesus did not disdain feminine society, but knew how to exploit women for his own ends, as his followers have done up to the present hour. In Luke viii. 2-3 we find him followed about the country by women, who ministered to him of their substance, and he resented any attempt to divert their activities into more useful channels (Luke x. 41; John xii. 6). But though Jesus graciously accepted the ministrations of the women, it is evident that he regarded them as inferior beings, whose touch was unclean. After his crucifixion, he says to Mary Magdalene, "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father" (John xx. 17), while it is recorded in the same chapter that he invited Thomas Didymus to "Reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side."

At the cross he apparently softens towards the mother who bore him, and graciously confides her to the care of John, who "took her unto his own home," and, we trust, treated her with more filial respect than her own son had given her.

For other references to Jesus' teaching regarding sexual relationships, see Matt. v. 27-32 and Matt. x. 34-38, which poison the sources from which all human life and happiness spring. In the private life of the family, the secret of public welfare is reposed. The foregoing extracts show that Jesus left no word of encouragement, enlightenment, or guidance for women; yet pious women through the ages have turned him into a fetish, and endowed him with qualities for which there is not the slightest evidence in the Gospel narratives.

When we come to study the character of Paul as revealed in the Epistles bearing his name, we get more clearly defined views of woman than the scanty sayings attributed to the mythical Carpenter of Nazareth. This peevish monogynistic gentleman has no insight into the essentially feminine soul. He appears to have no idea of the refined feelings which a true woman brings to love and marriage, or of the mental and moral stimulus which one sex can have upon the other in a decently civilized community. There is no charter for woman's freedom in the preposterous nonsense of the chapter 1 Cor. 7. Here, again, we see faith is a malignant principle, separating those whom reason and love would join together. This is inspired teaching—the fruits of the Holy Spirit. It is noteworthy that most religions are drawn up by men for men, and that women are expected to accept them with all the passivity of children, who cannot think or frame a trustworthy ideal of their own. Men, seeing the difference between their ideal and their actual, have created priesthoods to keep the ideal before their minds; but what woman has any need of Paul's teaching? In the mother nature there is no war between her flesh and her spirit, that obsession harped upon in the Epistle to the Romans. Only an ancient priesthood, fighting for its existence in a continually evolving society, could dare to claim, in the face of Paul's plain utterances, that Christianity has elevated woman and bestowed freedom and holiness on the begetting of human life. Seeing that, after twenty Christian centuries, women are beginning to think for themselves once more, the Christian Church must claim that the Woman Movement was contained in the teachings of the New Testament, only somehow it has not been detected heretofore. The truth is that the so-called inspired writers could not rise above the level of the communities in which they lived, and were not even cognizant of the high position which women had partially attained in Greece and Rome. They wrote for the lower classes among the socially and politically disinherited communities of the Eastern Mediterranean world in the period of the Roman decline, people credulous to the extreme, and without any pretence to scientific or philosophic culture.

As with Jesus, so with Paul, it is a hallucination for woman to think that the Epistles throw any light on the psychology of woman, or provide her with a spur or incentive for making the world a happier and better home for himself, or her husband, or her children. "I know that in me—that is, in my flesh—dwelleth no good thing," says Paul, in Romans vii. 18. All that is born into the world of man and woman is sinful, under God's anger and curse, condemned to death. All men born of a father and mother are children of wrath by nature, as Paul testifies in Epistles to the Ephesians ii. Theories of original sin and total depravity are foreign to the woman-nature. For the mother, her body is full of sweet and holy mysteries, and there is no war between the flesh and the spirit. According to Paul, marriage is only a reluctantly adopted safety valve for sensuality (1 Cor. vii.). The mystery of original sin is the mystery of sexual desire. Sex life was then condemned as unclean, and supreme virtue imputed to the celibate. The churching of women after childbirth is a survival of this superstition. However much Paul may appeal to men, a woman has no part or lot in his pathological condition, and can only see in his serio-comic views of womanhood the choicest specimen in all literature of masculine vanity, impudence, and profound conceit. "But she is happier, if she so abide, after my judgment: and I think also I have the spirit of God" (1 Cor. vii. 40). Paul does not agree with Thoreau that "for him to whom sex is impure, there are no flowers in Nature."

Digitized by Google

The Fathers of the Church were not slow to follow Paul's lead, and the priestly literature of the Dark Ages teems with abuse and condemnation of woman. A sentence taken from Chrysostom will suffice to illustrate this: "What is woman but an enemy of friendship, an unavoidable punishment, a necessary evil, a natural temptation, a desirable affliction, a constantly flowing source of tears, a wicked work of nature covered with a shining varnish?"

For the aberrations of the Christian clergy under the influence of the ascetic doctrines of the New Testament, see the work of a Christian writer, The History of Sacerdotal Celibacy, by H. C. Lea. It is a history of the sufferings and slavery of women as nuns and concubines, of confessional scandals and solicitations. For the brutal details of the questions which the confessor was required to ask of his penitents, female as well as male, see Burchard's Decretorum, lib. xix., c. v. I dare not give even a specimen.

FRANCES IVOR.

(To be continued.)

The Monarch of Cereals.

VI.

(Continued from p. 268.)

THE growing wheat plant is preyed upon by about one hundred species of insects, while fifty others infest the granary. In America the Hessian fly is an undesirable alien. It is an ancient pest in Europe, Asia, and Northern Africa, and the exasperating insect derives its name from the alleged fact that it was introduced into New England in straw conveyed to that region by the Hessian troops sent over by George III. to vanquish the insurgent Americans who shook off British supremacy. This destructive fly is now widely distributed in Canada, and, since 1888, it has invaded New Zealand. The female insect deposits from 100 to 300 eggs in the plant blades, and the reproductive season continues through the summer. The fly is a deadly foe to the developing cereal, and the average annual injury inflicted in America amounts to more than 50,000,000 bushels. In several seasons it has ruined half the crops, and, in some instances, it has occasioned utter failure. In 1900 the Hessian fly played havoc with the American wheat when the damage throughout the States totalled 100,000,000 dollars, while the loss inflicted in 1901 in Ontario was very serious. Systematic and concerted action among the wheat raisers is the only practical remedy for the depredations of the insect.

The chinch bug is another parasite which flourishes in various lands, and, owing to its immense rate of reproduction, appears to be increasing in destructiveness in some areas. Insect enemies of wheat are comparatively rare near the Pacific coast, and this is attributed to the custom of burning the straw over the grain fields every year. The hibernating insects are thus destroyed. Other checks to the chinch bug are the useful insectivorous birds, and several fungous diseases ravage the parasite.

The wheat midge, plant lice, and locusts are all troublesome pests, but the latter, which in the past, at times, swept entire territories bare of vegetation, are now usually kept under control. But in Canada, as late as 1901, a plague of locusts invaded the land, and, even now in parts of Montana, they frequently destroy every available form of plant life. Other pests penalise the wheat grower, and the combined ravages of all the various insects injurious to the cereal may be safely estimated at 20 per cent. of the crop. The total annual loss to the wheat raisers in the States alone has been put at 100 million dollars. Nor is the ordeal ended with the gathering of the grain, for weevils, worms, moths, and beetles infest the stored wheat, and a further 10 per cent. loss is occasioned to the grain and flour. This makes a total damage of 30 per cent. to the growing and garnered cereal.

Farmers can insure against given risks to their crops. Insurance societies cover the crops for a small premium against the risks of storms and conflagrations. Insurance against hailstorms was known in Scotland in 1780, while there existed twenty mutual and five stock hail insurance companies in Germany in 1888. Barrau made a fruitless attempt to establish a system of insurance against hail in France in 1801. Quite naturally he was accused of profanity in presuming to tamper with the designs of Providence. The Government officials obstructed him, and, in 1809, the Council of State decreed his society illegal, thus bringing the progressive Barrau to ruin. By 1823, however, public sentiment had become sufficiently enlightened to permit the founding of permanent hail insurance in France. Austria, England, and America followed the example thus set, and this useful system is steadily extending wherever the crops are liable to serious damage from wind or storm.

Wheat being essential to civilized humanity's sustenance, and its price, in company with that of other necessaries of life, being subject to supply and demand, a subtle and complex system has arisen which enables speculators of several grades to profit by the temporary fluctuations in the exchange value of the commodity. The operators who manipulate the great grain markets have at their disposal the latest resources of scientific communication. Unlike the local producer, whose decisions are determined by his ordinary information when he sells his grain or waits for an advance in price, the modern expert, who operates on a giant scale, receives prompt telegraphic intelligence regarding wheat from every quarter of the globe. He notes the overdue monsoon in India; he hears of the crop prospects in Minnesota and Dakota; of the early arrival of grain from the Southern Hemisphere in London; of the rise or fall of freights; of the risks which attend war, with the scores of other details which assist him in his capacity as dealer or speculator in the food supply of mankind.

The wheat speculator has attained his highest position in the States. The Chicago wheat-pit is probably the most celebrated institution in which men gamble with the world's bread-stuffs. And much as the betting system depends for its stability on the comparative honesty of the racing fraternity as a whole, so, among the wheat speculators, a high standard of integrity is maintained. This is not because the brokers and others are any better than people in general, but simply because it would spell disaster were the manipulators dishonest among themselves. As a shrewd writer has observed:—

> Any quantity of wheat can be bought on the floor of the Chicago Exchange by a sign, a nod, or a shout, or by a scrawl on a trading card. Either party to the deal could easily claim that the sign had not been noticed or understood, and the contention could not be disproven, nor could the contract be enforced before any court in the land. Considering the great confusion and excitement of the pit, the ease and rapidity with which fortunes are often made and lost, and the many opportunities and temptations for dishonest dealings, it is certainly an exceptional record that the Chicago Board of Trade finds it necessary to expel, on an average, only five members a year.

Digitized by Google

The evils of speculation may assume international proportions when manipulators secure sufficient of the year's wheat to dictate terms to the market. The "corner" is an ancient institution, and the legend of the prescient, if modest, Joseph may contain some basis of fact. Piles of money have been gained and lost by modern cornerers. Hutchinson operated successfully in the 'sixties: but Lyon, who copied his methods, was ruined in 1872. In 1887, a group of "bulls," who seemed anxious to screen their identity from the vulgar gaze, were eagerly engaged in cornering wheat. Rumour had it that this clique was composed of several smart millionaires and their special friends. The battle which raged between the clique and the wheat interests ended in the rout of the former. The immaculate E. L. Harper was found among the fallen. Harper was charged with robbing the bank of which he was vice-president, and "the last chapter of the corner was written in 1906, when the United States Circuit Court rendered a verdict against Harper for $5,280,333 in favour of the receiver of the Cincinnati Bank."

More nefarious in some respects was the notorious corner of 1897-98. The cornerer, Joseph Leiter, picked out a period when the world's wheat harvests were much below the average, and at a time when the United States held the bulk of the export crop. The plan of this American Joseph was to completely control this corn and compel the European consumer to purchase at his price. The campaign was conducted on a colossal scale, but the elevator or great granary companies fought him relentlessly, and their leader, the astute Philip Armour, by almost superhuman efforts, loaded Leiter with wheat as fast as he could pay for it. The cornerer amassed enormous stores of grain, and for a time monopolized the market. Prices rose, and the European loaf became dear, so dear that the costliness of bread led to riots and bloodshed in Italy, and much misery elsewhere. During his period of supremacy Leiter is said to have netted profits to the tune of $5,000,000, but he was unable to maintain his monopoly, and the corner smashed. All the millions he had wrung from the toil and sufferings of the poor he lost, with millions besides. Professor Emery contends that owing to the scarcity of wheat, prices would have soared in any case, and that it was to the world's advantage to realize the truth that at any time the general wheat supply might fall far short of the public needs. If this was the lesson to be learnt from Leiter's nearly successful manipulation, it was disregarded by the world. There are also solid reasons for the statement that in 1896 the then Russian Government submitted to the United States a scheme for promoting an international corner in wheat. The American authorities gave no countenance to the proposal, which was based upon the theory that the Russian Empire and the Western Republic would hold sufficient wheat for consumption within their own borders, while foreign States would be compelled to purchase grain at the price demanded by the surplus-holding countries.

The milling of wheat, like everything else, is a matter of evolution. Primitive man ground his grain with his teeth, but more satisfactory methods were slowly devised for milling. Hand stones for pounding acorns, nuts, and grain date back to the Old Stone Age. The stone mortar and pestle came later, and the crushing of corn was succeeded by grinding between two stones. From the ancient "saddle" stone device were evolved all subsequent forms of milling-stones. The extinct civilizations of Babylon, Assyria, and Egypt utilized these rugged mills, and the prehistoric Swiss pile-dwellers likewise employed them. Even in Imperial Rome corn was commonly ground by hand between stone slabs. In Homer's day the Greeks, like other early races, allowed the labour of corn-grinding to devolve upon the women, and a large proportion of the population devoted their labouring hours to preparing flour. With the growth of society milling became a distinct and highly respected occupation, and the merry miller, his mill, and his men, were commemorated in song and story among all the cereal-eating nations of the earth. Water-mills have existed in Western Europe from traditional times, but in some lands the windmill seems to have preceded the old stream machines. England treasured both, but the windmill was the greater favourite, and several existed in our island by the year 1200. The steam-mill was first used in England in 1784.

In contemporary milling three basic processes are indispensable. The grain must be spotlessly clean, and free from foreign seeds and other impurities. Then it must be tempered, and water or steam, or both combined, are applied for this purpose. Then comes the milling itself, and the wheat berry is ruptured so that the bran may be easily eliminated from the white interior which forms the flour of commerce. An immense mill is that of the Pillsbury Washburn Company of Minneapolis. This mill's average production is now about 17,000 barrels of flour per day. Ten years ago the mills of Minneapolis prepared a total of 90,000 barrels daily. The tremendous advance of the milling industry is vividly shown "when it is remembered that the first crude mill of the ancients could not produce over three bushels of partly ground meal in one day. Later, the Greeks ground from five to ten bushels of meal per day."

And there has also been a constant increase in the quantity of flour milled from each bushel of wheat. Prior to 1860 the annual output of flour in the Minneapolis mills was 60,000 barrels, but at the close of the nineteenth century their yearly milling yielded some 15,000,000 barrels. Budapest remained the premier milling centre until 1890, when the Hungarian capital was eclipsed by Minneapolis. The Hungarian flour is of very superior quality, and commands a better price than the finest American product. The English miller bears, and doubtless deserves, an excellent reputation, and Liverpool is one of the world's milling cities. The miller's trade has revived in Holland, and other countries are making progress in this important industry.

(To be concluded.) T. F. Palmer.

A Voice in the Wilderness.

The Dangers of Half-Preparedness. By Norman Angell. Putnam's Sons. 2s. 6d. net.

Either by implication or by direct avowal, Mr. Angell makes in this essay what we cannot but regard as a questionable, if not dangerous, assumption. He assumes that, because military preparedness in Germany has not led to peace there, therefore it will not lead to peace elsewhere, that because the dominance of a militant ideal has had evil effects in Germany, therefore it will have a like influence elsewhere; that because "My country, right or wrong," is bad in Germany, therefore it is bad elsewhere; that because the erection of the idea of the State as superior to all the dictates of the individual conscience is an evil in Germany, therefore it will be an evil elsewhere. In other words, Mr. Angell assumes that like causes produce like effects, and, although that is an axiom in science, it is an unsafe inference in sociology—in war time. It is a patriotic duty to assume that the German psychology is fundamentally different from the psychology of the Allies. Indeed, we think that a case might be made out—in the Daily Mail or in John Bull—to establish the proposition that even those biological laws which apply to the Allies do not apply to the Germanic peoples.

Digitized by Google

If we overlook this fundamental flaw in Mr. Angell's essay, the rest of it is perfectly clear, as are all this author's writings, and might even be called unanswerable—if we were not at War. The larger part of the world is at war, and the rest is thinking of joining in. Those that are not at war are preparing for war, and before even the present conflict began there was the mania for "preparedness" of the Great Powers. Now, Mr. Angell does not denounce "Preparedness," on the contrary, he professes a belief in it. What he does not believe in is "Half-Preparedness"—that is the notion that peace can be maintained by each nation becoming stronger than the other one—which, when one looks at it, does seem a little odd. So he argues that the real preparedness is to—over and above the massing of men, and munitions, and ships—include in our preparedness for war a clear statement intelligible to the whole world of what it is we want, what it is we are willing to grant other nations, and what it is we are prepared to back up with all the physical force at our disposal. If men will suffer for their country, and work for their country, and die for their country, Mr. Angell calls upon them to take final steps in the scale of hardships and think for their country. Prepare for war by knowing exactly what it is your country stands for, and when you know, see that the whole world knows it, and also let it know that you are prepared to fight for those things to the last gasp.

That is the central idea of Mr. Angell's essay. In ordinary times we should say that its logic was impeccable, and its reasoning unanswerable. And we might have added that Mr. Angell has provided as powerful an indictment of pure militarism as has been written. But, as it is, we can only say that he has written a dangerous work. He asks people to pause and think what they are fighting about, and to make clear to the other party what they are fighting for. Could anything be more absurd?

CRITICUS.

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, Etc.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday and be marked "Lecture Notice" if not sent on postcard.

LONDON.

INDOOR.

SOUTH PLACE INSTITUTE (South Place, Moorgate Street, E.C.): 7, J. T. Lloyd, "Humanism versus Christianity."

OUTDOOR.

BETHNAL GREEN BRANCH N. S. S. (Victoria Park, near the Fountain): 6.15, a Lecture.

FINSBURY PARK N. S. S.: 11.15, Miss K. B. Kough, "Liberty According to the L.C.C."

KINGSLAND BRANCH N. S. S. (corner of Ridley Road): 7, Mr. Burke, "In Search of the Kingdom of Heaven."

NORTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Parliament Hill): 3.15, Miss K. B. Kough, "Liberty According to the L.C.C."

REGENT'S PARK N. S. S.: 3.15, H. V. Storey, a Lecture.

SOUTH LONDON BRANCH N. S. S. (Brockwell Park): 3.15, G. Rule, a Lecture.

WEST HAM BRANCH N. S. S. (outside Maryland Point Station): 7, Howell Smith, a Lecture.

HYDE PARK: 11.30, Messrs. Saphin and Shaller; 3.15, Messrs. Dales and Kells; 6.30, Messrs. Yates and Hyatt.

Population Question and Birth-Control.

POST FREE THREE HALFPENCE.

MALTHUSIAN LEAGUE,
QUEEN ANNE'S CHAMBERS, WESTMINSTER, S.W.

PROPAGANDIST LEAFLETS. New Issue. 1. Christianity a Stupendous Failure, J. T. Lloyd; 2. Bible and Teetotalism, J. M. Wheeler; 3. Principles of Secularism, C. Watts; 4. Where Are Your Hospitals? R. Ingersoll; 5. Because the Bible Tells Me So, W. P. Ball; 6. Why Be Good? G. W. Foote. The Parson's Creed. Often the means of arresting attention and making new members. Price 9d. per hundred, post free 1s. Samples on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—N. S. S. SECRETARY, 62 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

LATEST N. S. S. BADGE.—A single Pansy flower, size as shown; artistic and neat design in enamel and silver; permanent in colour; has been the means of making many pleasant introductions. Brooch or Stud fastening, 9d. post free.—From Miss E. M. VANCE, General Secretary, N. S. S., 62 Farringdon St., E.C. 4.

Prayer: Its Origin, History, and Futility.

BY

J. T. LLOYD.

Price TWOPENCE.
(Postage ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

War and Civilization.

BY

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Religion and the Child.

BY

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Price ONE PENNY.
(Postage ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

RATIONALIST PEACE SOCIETY
38 CURSITOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

President: THE RT. HON. J. M. ROBERTSON, M.P.
Chairman: MRS. H. BRADLAUGH BONNER.

The Rationalist Peace Society was formed in 1910 to carry on a propaganda in the interest of International Peace on essentially and avowedly Rationalist lines, without reference to religious sanctions of any kind. The annual subscription is fixed at a minimum of one shilling.

Digitized by Google

Books Every Freethinker should Possess.

HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.
By H. C. Lea.

In two handsome volumes, large 8vo., published at 21s. net. Price 7s., postage 7d.

This is the Third and Revised Edition, 1907, of the Standard and Authoritative Work on Sacerdotal Celibacy. Since its issue in 1867 it has held the first place in the literature of the subject, nor is it likely to lose that position.

THE WORLD'S DESIRES; OR, THE RESULTS OF MONISM.
An Elementary Treatise on a Realistic Religion and Philosophy of Human Life.
By E. A. Ashcroft.

440 pp., published at 10s. 6d. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

Mr. Ashcroft writes from the point of view of a convinced Freethinker, and deals with the question of Man and the Universe in a thoroughly suggestive manner.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.
By Carveth Read.
Professor of Philosophy in the University of London.

8vo. 1909. Published at 7s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

A Fine Exposition of Morals from the standpoint of a Rationalistic Naturalism.

THREE ESSAYS ON RELIGION.
By J. S. Mill.

Published at 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

There is no need to praise Mill's Essays on Nature, The Utility of Religion, and Theism. The work has become a Classic in the History of Freethought. No greater attack on the morality of nature and the God of natural theology has ever been made than in this work.

Recent Acquisitions.

WILLIAM HONE: HIS LIFE AND TIMES.
By F. W. Hackwood.

Large 8vo. With numerous Plates. Published 10s. 6d. net. Price 3s., postage 5d.

William Hone was one of the group of Radical Reformers who played so conspicuous a part in the battle for free speech and a free press in the early part of the nineteenth century. The accounts of his trial before Mr. Justice Abbott and Lord Ellenborough for publishing parodies of the Athanasian Creed and the Lord's Prayer are of interest to all Freethinkers.

THE ENGLISH WOMAN: STUDIES IN HER PSYCHIC EVOLUTION.
By D. Staars.

Published 9s. net. Price 2s. 6d., postage 5d.

An Evolutionary and Historic Essay on Woman. With Biographical Sketches of Harriet Martineau, George Eliot, and others.

By the Hon. A. S. G. Canning.
INTOLERANCE AMONG CHRISTIANS.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

RELIGIOUS STRIFE IN BRITISH HISTORY.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 5d.

THE POLITICAL PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY.

Published 5s. Price 1s. 6d., postage 4d.

The Three Volumes post free for 5s.

THE CRIMINAL PROSECUTION AND CAPITAL PUNISHMENT OF ANIMALS.
By E. P. Evans.

A Careful Study of one of the most curious of Mediæval Superstitious Practices. There is an Appendix of Documents which adds considerably to the value of the work. Published 1906. With Frontispiece.

384 pp. Published 7s. 6d. Price 2s., postage 5d.

Books.

DETERMINISM OR FREE WILL?
By Chapman Cohen.

Issued by the Secular Society, Ltd.

CONTENTS.

I. The Question Stated.—II. "Freedom" and "Will."—III. Consciousness, Deliberation, and Choice.—IV. Some Alleged Consequences of Determinism.—V. Professor James on "The Dilemma of Determinism."—VI. The Nature and Implications of Responsibility.—VII. Determinism and Character.—VIII. A Problem in Determinism.—IX. Environment.

Cloth, 1s. 9d., postage 3d.

A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY. OF FREE-THINKERS.
By J. M. Wheeler.

Price 3s. net, postage 5d.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.
By G. W. Foote and W. P. Ball.

For Freethinkers and Enquiring Christians. New Edition, 162 pp. Cloth. Price 1s., postage 2d.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By G. W. Foote.

First Series, with Portrait, 216 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. Second Series, 302 pp. Cloth. Price 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d. The Two Volumes post free for 5s.
(Now Binding.)

BIBLE STUDIES.
By J. M. Wheeler.

Essays on Phallic Worship and other curious Rites and Customs. Price 1s. net, postage 2½d.

Pamphlets.

SOCIALISM, ATHEISM, AND CHRISTIANITY. By C. Cohen. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL ETHICS. By C. Cohen. Price 1d., postage ½d.

THE RELIGION OF FAMOUS MEN. By Walter Mann. Price 1d., postage ½d.

BIBLE AND BEER. By G. W. Foote. Price 1d., postage ½d.

CHRISTIANITY OR SECULARISM. By G. W. Foote. Price 4d., postage 1½d.

MISTAKES OF MOSES. Pioneer Pamphlet, No. 3. By Colonel Ingersoll. Price 1d., postage ½d.

About 1d. in the 1s. should be added on all Foreign and Colonial orders.

The Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

Special Sunday Evening Lectures

(Under the Auspices of the National Secular Society)

AT

SOUTH PLACE INSTITUTE,

SOUTH PLACE, MOORGATE STREET, E.C. (within five minutes' of Liverpool Street.)

May 6, MR. J. T. LLOYD.

"Humanism versus Christianity."

May 13, MR. HARRY SNELL.

"The Faith-Healing Imposture."

Admission Free. Collection. Doors open at 6.30 p.m.
Chair taken at 7 p.m.

Three New Pamphlets.

Christianity and Progress.

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

Revised Edition, with a New Chapter on "Mohammedanism and the Sword."

A complete and crushing reply to the claim that Christianity has aided the progress of civilization.

Price Twopence. Postage ½d.

Pagan and Christian Morality.

BY

WALTER MANN.

The truth about the alleged originality and value of Christian teaching on the subject of morals. With a useful list of authorities.

Price Twopence. Postage ½d.

Freethought and Literature.

By MIMNERMUS.

The Freethinking beliefs of the world's greatest writers demonstrated by their own works.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Postage ½d.)

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, E.C. 4.

Printed and Published by THE PIONEER PRESS (G. W. FOOTE AND CO., LTD.), 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Digitized by Google

THE FREETHINKER

FOUNDED · 1881

EDITED·BY·CHAPMAN·COHEN ▪▪ EDITOR·1881-1915·G·W·FOOTE

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 19 SUNDAY MAY 13, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

CONTENTS.

	Page.
Why were the Clergy Exempt?—The Editor	289
The Roots of the Christian Tree.—J. T. Lloyd	290
The Fear of Death.—Mimnermus	291
Science and Spiritualism.—W. Mann	294
A Puritan on Paine.—Geo. Underwood	294
Acid Drops	295
"Some" Ghost.—C. B. W.	296
To Correspondents	297
Sugar Plums	297
Presidential Notes.—Chapman Cohen	297
N. S. S. Annual Conference—Agenda	298
The Monarch of Cereals.—T. F. Palmer	299
Book Chat.—Criticus	300
Letters to the Editor—Psychism and the Supernatural, 301; Freethinkers and Adult Schools, 302; Atheism in the French Revolution	302
Notice of Meetings	302

Views and Opinions.

Why were the Clergy Exempt?

Many people have wondered why on earth the clergy were exempted from the operation of the Military Service Act. On every earthly ground they seemed the most suitable class to which it could be applied. They are, or ought to be, more certain about a future life than others; they are, or ought to be, ready to quit this life with less reluctance than others. No religious compunction should have stood in the way of their killing the Germans since Archdeacon Wilberforce said: "The killing of Germans is a divine service in the fullest sense of the word," the Bishop of Ripon that "Our cause is identical with God's cause," and the Bishop of London that "This is the greatest fight ever made for the Christian religion." In such a holy war the clergy ought to have been the first to rush to the Colours. Moreover, the clergy were unanimous in urging everybody to enlist. Why, then, did the clergy claim and receive exemption?

* * *

The Secret Out.

Some light was cast on the subject by a recent remark from the Archbishop of Canterbury before the House of Convocation. Addressing that august assembly he said, the clergy—> had been exempted from combatant service by the nation's representatives in Parliament without so far as he was aware, a dissentient voice, simply because to them had been assigned a great responsibility in the nation's life at all times, and never more so than at such a time as this.

Now we know all about it, or rather we are told all about it. Of course, the Archbishop is not accurate when he says there was not a single voice raised against clerical exemption, but one does not look for accuracy in a clergyman. Some voices were raised against it in Parliament and outside Parliament, the Trades' Union Congress voted against it. But the fact remains that Parliament did exempt the clergy. It put into actual practice Sydney Smith's famous division of the nation into men, women, and clergymen, by conscripting men, calling out the women, and placing the clergy in a category by themselves. And, presumably, on the principle that a live jackass is better than a dead lion the clergy are content—even jubilant.

* * *

More Light.

Still we are puzzled. What is the part played by the clergy that endows them with so "great a responsibility in the nation's life"? Parliament didn't say, the Archbishop is diplomatically vague, and so we are left to surmise. The production of good crops is a very old standing function of the priesthood, and a great many religious observances have clustered round that. But Parliament couldn't have exempted the clergy on that ground or it would have issued an appeal for their assistance. Nay, it very curtly declined to sanction a general day of prayer at which all the clergy would have paraded and gone through their magical hocus-pocus with all the solemnity of painted medicine men dancing round a wooden idol. Many thousands of allotments have been laid down, but I haven't heard of a single clergyman being called in to bless one of them. All the clergy appear to have done here is to start a row among themselves as to whether God will blast the ground because people have taken to digging on Sunday. They cannot have been exempted to look after the weather—until quite recently that was vile. They cannot have been preserved to arrest the submarine danger, that has grown. It was suggested that German prisoners should be placed on board hospital and passenger ships, but no one suggested parsons on board as a means of protection. They were not exempt in order to protect the people against "profiteering," that has gone on in all directions—and the clergy have maintained absolute silence. Nor could it have been to guard the morality of the nation. For that, if we are to judge by reports of alarmist committees, has deteriorated since the opening of the War. What was the "great responsibility" laid upon the clergy by Parliament?

* * *

The Spirit of Sacrifice.

An idea strikes us. Perhaps they were exempt in order to encourage the spirit of sacrifice. If so, one is compelled to admit that they have met with a measure of success. For people have been exhorted and encouraged to make sacrifices. The shopkeeper has called upon his customers to sacrifice. The mineowner has called on the consumer to sacrifice. The shipowner has asked the merchant to sacrifice. The merchant has passed on the inspiring message to the dealer. There never was such a demand for sacrifice; and the clergy have sacrificed their desire to bear their share of the fighting; they have sacrificed the honours and distinction they might have won at the "divine service" of killing Germans, by remaining at home and keeping their establishments open and ready for business "when the boys come home."

Digitized by Google

A Parasitic Order.

Seriously, what is one to make of a public that can be fooled by such empty talk as that of the Archbishop's? Can anyone seriously contend that there is a single function discharged by the clergy that cannot be, and is not discharged, by the layman? Have the clergy, as clergy, really contributed anything to the successful pursuit of the War? Have they done a single thing that has not been done by men and women who are not connected with the priesthood? The parson, as a man, may be a quite admirable person; as a priest, he is an anachronism in a civilized age. For all the real use that the Christian Church has been to the nation, it might as well have been closed in August, 1914. And yet the clergy are exempt from military service. That is the significant fact. Thousands of businesses have been closed in the interests of the War, but the business premises of the clergy are in full swing. Economy has been urged upon the people, but funds for foreign missions and similar fantastical absurdities are still forthcoming. It was not essential that the widow's son should remain at home, but the parson might. The head of a family, upon whose welfare depended the future of his children, must go; the person of the celibate priest remains inviolate. Take the citizen, but leave the priest. That is the attitude of an order which has been a burden upon the shoulders of mankind from the very dawn of history. It is the attitude of a priesthood careful only of its own interests and of the interests it finds to its own benefit to defend.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Roots of the Christian Tree.

VI.

CONCERNING Christianity two facts are now indisputably established and candidly recognized as such by all scholars, namely, the first, that it is an eclectic religion, containing not a single element of which it can honestly say: "This is my own, my very own," and the second, that it did not differ in any essential sense from any of the great religions from which it borrowed, and which were its rivals during the second, third, and fourth centuries. Particularly in the third century all the influential religions were, in essence, very much alike. Harnack calls our attention to "the rise of new ideas and emotions which meet us on the soil of Hellenism—that Hellenism which, with its philosophy and its development of the ancient mysteries, coalesced with Orientalism." What those new ideas and emotions were we learn from this learned critic:—

> The soul, God, knowledge, expiation, asceticism, redemption, eternal life, with individualism and with humanity substituted for nationality—these were the sublime thoughts which were living and operative, partly as the precipitate of deep inward and outward movements, partly as the outcome of great souls and their toil, partly as the result of the sublimation of all cults which took place during the imperial age. Wherever vital religion existed, it was in this circle of thought and experience that it drew breath.....Whenever Christianity came to formulate ideas of God, Jesus, sin, redemption, and life, it drew upon the materials acquired in the general process of religious evolution, availing itself of all the forms which these had taken (Expansion of Christianity, vol i., pp. 33-39).

We may not agree with every statement in that extract, but its author does not hesitate to recognize the principle that Christianity, in its completed form, "fails to be considered as syncretistic religion in the fullest sense"; that it "may be just as truly called a Hellenic religion as an Oriental, a native religion as well as a foreign"; and that though from the very outset it had been syncretistic upon Pagan soil, yet it was not till the middle of the third century that it was first seen "in full bloom as the syncretistic religion par excellence, and yet, for all that, as an exclusive religion." The following is Harnack's description of the syncretistic religions, each of which aimed at complete sovereignty:—

> Three great religious systems confronted each other in Western Asia and Southern Europe from the close of the third century: Neoplatonism, Catholicism, and Manichæism. All three may be characterized as the final results of a history which had lasted for over a thousand years, the history of the religious development of the civilized nations from Persia to Italy. In all three the old national and particular character of religion was laid aside; they were world-religions of the most universal tendency, with demands whose consequences transformed the whole life of man, both public and private.....Formally, therefore, all these religions were alike, and they were also similar in this respect, that each had appropriated the elements of different older religions. Further, they showed their similarity in bringing to the front the ideas of revelation, redemption, ascetic virtue, and immortality (Ibid, vol. i., p. 393).

Now, with those facts in mind, we are face to face with the problem of how to account for the triumphant survival of Christianity and the somewhat sudden and complete disappearance of its powerful rivals. Harnack declares that both Christianity and Manichæism were superior to Neoplatonism, for the very reason that the latter adh no founder; and yet on Harnack's own showing Christianity itself could boast of no founder except in name. He assures us that Jesus Christ did not belong to the circle of ideas which, by the end of the third century, constituted the Christian religion, but that it was his disciples who were responsible for its primitive shaping. It is doubtless true that the fact that Christianity had a nominal founder was a factor of considerable influence in its expansion; but in this respect it enjoyed no advantage over Manichæism which ceased to be in the Western world. The divines aver that Christianity conquered Europe because of its divine origin and nature, but a mere glance at the history of the fourth century shows the utter absurdity of such a claim. The conversion of Constantine is a question upon which there has never been unanimity of opinion. Some critics have always regarded it as having been occasioned by political rather than purely religious considerations. Many different accounts of it were written by Eusebius, the Christian Lactantius, the Pagan Nazarius, and the Arian Philostorgius; but whatever version of it may be accepted as being in the main accurate, the fact remains that Constantine was actuated in all he did subsequent to it by political motives, in which ethical principles had scarcely any place at all, as is abundantly proved by the many dark deeds for which he was directly responsible. What moved him to befriend the Christian Church, to adopt the Cross as the symbol of victory in war, and to exalt Christianity into the position of State religion? We will answer this question in the words of a Christian theologian, Adolf Harnack:—

> In the bishop or priest, or even in the ecclesiastical fabric and the cultus, the masses had a direct sense of something holy and authoritative to which they yielded submission, and this state of matters had prevailed for a couple of generations by the time that Constantine granted recognition and privileges to Christianity. This was the Church on which he conferred privileges, this Church with its enormous authority over the masses! These were the Christians whom he defined as the support of the throne, people who clung to the bishops with submissive faith and who would not resist their Divinely appointed authority! The Christianity that triumphed was the Christianity of blind faith, which Celsus has depicted. When would a State ever have shown any practical ineterest in any other kind of religion? (Ibid, vol. i., p. 280).

Digitized by Google

At the close of the third century both Armenia Major and Armenia Minor were converted to Christianity by Gregory the Illuminator, who had been persecuted and driven from his native land by the Persians. When the Armenians succeeded in releasing themselves from the Persian rule, Gregory gave his support to the Armenian monarch, who became a Christian, and adopted Christianity as the State religion in his country, because he believed that "as an exclusive religion it was far better adapted than the cults of Hellenism and the native Armenian faith to safeguard the Armenians against the Persians." Thus the Armenian king embraced Christianity for himself and his kingdom simply because he was convinced that the action would prove of the highest political advantage. Now, listen to Harnack:—

> When Constantine recognized and granted privileges to Christianity, he was only following in the footsteps of the Armenian king (Ibid, vol. ii., pp. 345-6).

This is a Christian theologian's explanation of the triumph of Christianity over all rival cults in the Roman Empire. Its survival was due, not to any supernatural intervention, not to the belief that it alone was true, but to the fact that the Emperor looked upon it as the only faith that engendered the spirit of unquestioning loyalty to authority in those who professed it. The bishop was supreme, because he claimed to be God's vicegerent, and surely a Christian emperor would occupy the same position in his administration of State affairs. The truth is that the rival faiths did not die a natural death, but were destroyed by force. As Mr. F. Legge well says:—

> Constantine's accession proved to be, like the coming of Alexander, a turning-point in the history of the world. His so-called conversion put into the hands of the Catholic Church a weapon for the suppression of all rivalry, of which she was not slow to make use. Already in his reign many of the Heathen temples were torn down, and under the rule of his morose and gloomy successor, Constantius, the work of demolition went on apace.....The end came under Gratian, when the temple estates were confiscated, the priests and vestals deprived of the stipends which they had hitherto received from the public treasury, and the Heathen confraternities or colleges were declared incapable of receiving legacies. Only a few rich men like the Vettius Agorius Prætextatus, whom we have seen among the worshippers of Mithras, or the Quintus Aurelius Symmachus, whose learned and patriotic life has been so well described by Sir Samuel Dill, could henceforth venture to practise, even with maimed rites, the faiths condemned by the Court and the Church (Forerunners and Rivals of Christianity, vol. ii., pp. 358-9).

Prior to the conversion of Constantine, Christianity had to struggle against all her rivals "in a contest where the victory was not always on her side"; but no sooner did she become the religion of the State than her supremacy was an absolute certainty. As Mr. Legge suggests, there was "no need of the miraculous powers which were once assigned as the reason for her gradual and steady advance to all but universal dominion." She was only one among many until Constantine discovered that she was the best adapted of them all to help him in securing the blind submission of the people to his imperial will. She became the whole-hearted servant of the State in order that by the co-operation of the State she might carry out her own ambitious and well-considered designs. Enough has been said to prove that neither her origin nor her triumphant advance to pomp and power indicated any supernatural interference.

J. T. Lloyd.

The Fear of Death.

> Death, and his brother Sleep. —Shelley.
> Death, not armed with any dart,
> But crowned with poppies. —Julian Fane.

Shakespeare, the supreme genius of literature, has told us that "our little life is rounded with a sleep." The materialistic similitude of death to sleep is a thought which has possessed a peculiar fascination for great writers, ancient and modern, but more particularly for Shakespeare, whom it always prompts to utterances of universal sublimity. With this lofty thought is mingled a touch of simple pathos that strikes home to every heart, as, for example, in the saying, "Tired we sleep, and life's poor play is o'er."

Sleep! All that the human fancy can conceive of refreshing and delightful things are compressed in that gentle word. Poets in all ages and in all countries have sung its praises; but of all tributes uttered on this subject, the most striking, probably, is that which Cervantes puts in the mouth of Sancho Panza: "Sleep! It covers a man all over, thoughts and all, like a cloak. It is meat for the hungry, drink for the thirsty, heat for the cold, and cold for the hot."

Priests, on the other hand, have ever sought advantage from the fact that man is mortal. They have taught men that death is the most dreadful evil. All the terrors that theology could gather from savage nations were added to increase the horrors, and they invariably tried to paralyse reason with the clutch of fear.

The advent of Christianity deepened this terror. Never has death been the cause of such craven timidity as in the Christian world. To visionaries like Catherine of Siena, or Emanuel Swedenborg, it may have been different, but to the uncultured masses death has been, and is, the King of Terrors, from whose approach they cower in an agony which Marcus Aurelius and Socrates would have scorned. These great Pagans invested death with dignity, but Christians fear death as children fear the dark. In Bacon's famous essay on death all the instances he gives of its being borne with equanimity are taken from Pagans. For Christianity added a new terror to death in the thought of being cut off in sin "unhouseled, unaleled." The Church of England has a prayer against sudden death, which Pagans regarded as best. This idea is strikingly illustrated in Hamlet, where the Prince refrains from killing the King whilst at prayer, because—

> To take him in the purging of his soul
> When he is fit and seasoned for his passage is to send his father's murderer to heaven.

Religion has found it advantageous to invest death with all that is hideous. "Prepare for death, flee from the wrath to come," have been its cries. "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God," shout the evangelists. By such appeals to fear and imagination it has made a terror of that which should be accepted with serenity. Charles Spurgeon, the most popular preacher of his generation, whose works are so admired by Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, preached and wrote that the majority of the human race was destined to everlasting torture in full view of the Deity:—

> In fire, exactly like that which we have on earth to-day, will lie, asbestos-like, for ever unconsumed—every nerve a string on which the Devil shall for ever play his diabolical tune of hell's unutterable lament.

Yet to the Materialist, who deems death "the poppied sleep, the end of all," dissolution can have no terror, whilst Christians might ponder the wise words of Marcus Aurelius:—

> What is it to die? If we view it by itself, and stripped of those imaginary terrors in which our fears have dressed it, we shall find it to be nothing more than the mere work of Nature; but it is a childish folly to be afraid of what is natural. Nay! It is not only the work of Nature, but is conducive to the good of the universe, which subsists by change.

Digitized by Google

Lucretius, the noblest of the Roman poets, writing, be it remembered, twenty centuries ago, tells us that death is dreamless rest:—

Thou not again shall see thy dear home's door,
Nor thy sweet wife and children come to throw
Their arms round thee, and ask for kisses more,
And through thy heart make quiet comfort go:
Out of thy hands hath slipped the precious store.
Thou hoardest for thine own, men say, and lo!
All thou desired is gone. But never say
All the desire as well hath passed away.

Omar Khayyam, the most splendid poet whose lyre sounded under the Mohammedan crescent, was as emphatic:—

Oh, threats of hell and hopes of paradise!
One thing at least is certain—this life flies;
One thing is certain, and the rest is lies,
The flower that once has blown for ever dies.

Many men dread dying rather than death, and here science comes to the rescue of mankind with its anodynes and anæsthetics. The clergy, who opposed the introduction of chloroform because they said it interfered with God's primal curse upon woman, are fond of pointing the feeble finger of scorn at scientists. Did the whole of the clergy of Europe ever do so much for humanity as Lister and Simpson? The doctors fought all their lives against the horrid shapes that follow the rider on the pale horse. The clergy made death more awful and gruesome, but Lister and Simpson and the rest of their glorious company robbed death of half its terrors. As a result of their discoveries, death comes as a tender nurse to patients who had otherwise died in cruel suffering. They saved more lives than the wars of the century had wasted, and they took away a black fear out of life.

Despite clerical nonsense, most people die as unconsciously as they are born. Physicians notice that fear of death departs with the dying. The nearer the end, the less the apprehension. Dr. William Hunter, the famous anatomist, when dying, said: "If I had strength enough to hold a pen, I would write how easy and delightful it is to die." That gay, old sinner, Louis XIV., of France, said: "I thought that dying had been more difficult." Wise old Michel de Montaigne, having met with an accident which was thought to be fatal, said on restoration: "I had sincere pleasure in the thought that I was passing away." Walter Savage Landor, in extreme age, wrote:—

Death stands above me whispering low,
I know not what into my ear:
Of his strange language all I know
Is, there is not a word of fear.

In the Highlands of Scotland people have a time-old proverb, "There is always peace before death." Christians claim that the King of Terrors can only be encountered by aid of their faith. Yet modern Japanese have as great a contempt of life as the old Greeks and Romans. In truth, Christianity has, for its own ends, harped on the terrors of death.

"Rounded with a sleep!" "These words created whole volumes in me," said Jean Paul Richter, acknowledging the power of the master-mind of Shakespeare. Is it not a superb tribute, remembering that so many of the highest minds have ever been fortified by the same thought? Freethought everywhere destroys the terrors of death. The Atheistic poet, Shelley, in the opening lines of his Queen Mab, sings of death and sleep being brothers. Walt Whitman, "the tan-faced poet of the West," chants a hymn of welcome to death. The dead are made one with Nature, and death is presented as a friend, is "lovely and soothing," is always "gliding near with soft feet," and the body, weary with life, turns, like a tired child, and nestles close in the bosom of the eternal mother. Our own George Meredith asks with a fine touch of stoicism:—

Into the breast that gives the rose
Shall I with shuddering fall?

For thousands of years priests have chanted the old, sad, disheartening refrain of death as an enemy, but the Freethinker listens to far other and better strains. The contemplation of death as a deliverer, dissevered from the terrors of the imagination, comforts him. Living without hypocrisy, he dies without fear.

Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

MIMNERMUS.

Science and Spiritualism.

IX.

(Continued from p. 278.)

Turning, now, for the moment, to the historical side of this question, we find that there is scarcely a medium producing physical phenomena who has not, at one time or another, been exposed in the grossest kind of fraud, and that the whole history of the subject—so far as the physical phenomena are concerned—is battered with evidences of fraud and the worst "moral mud" and intellectual mire imaginable! It presents an almost unbroken chain of evidence, showing that fraud and nothing but fraud has been practised throughout, by mediums; and presenting scarcely any evidence whatever that they are ever genuine, or did really happen as stated.—Hereward Carrington, "The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism," p. 6.

When engaged in the investigation of table-turning, I constructed a very simple apparatus, serving as an index to show the unconscious motions of the hands upon the table. The results were that the index moved before the table, or that neither index nor table moved; and in numerous cases all moving power was annihilated. A universal objection was made to it by the table-turners. It was said to paralyze the powers of the mind;—but the experimenters need not see the index; they may leave their friends to watch that, and their minds may revel in any power that their expectation or their imagination can confer. So restrained, a dislike to the trial arises; but what is that except a proof that whilst they trust themselves they doubt themselves, and are not willing to proceed to the decision, lest the trust which they like should fail them, and the doubt which they dislike rise to the authority of truth?—Faraday, "Observations on Mental Education." A Lecture, reprinted in "Science and Education," edited by Sir Ray Lankester (1917), p. 51.

IT may be as well to deal here with the phenomena of table-turning and rapping. No doubt most people have met with persons who have taken part in table-turning, and who assure you that the table really did move without any pressure being exerted through the hands resting on the table.

The phenomena of table-turning became quite an epidemic in England in 1853, being introduced from the Continent, where it had broken out in 1852. The usual method followed was for the party to seat themselves at a round table, upon the edge of which they rested their fingers, spread out, and the last finger touching the last finger of his, or her, neighbour. The table-turning mania reached such dimensions that several scientific men turned their attention to it. A committee of four medical men made an investigation, says Mr. Podmore. "Briefly they found, as the result of several trials, that when no expectations were formed of any probable result, and the attention of those sitting round the table was diverted by conversation or otherwise, the table did not move at all. Again, no results followed when half the sitters expected the rotation to take place in one direction and half in another. But when expectation was allowed free play, and especially if the direction of the probable movement was indicated beforehand, the table began to rotate after a few minutes, although no one of the sitters was conscious of exercising any effort at all. The conclusion formed was that the motion was due to muscular action, mostly exercised unconsciously."[1] Dr. Braid, who also investigated the subject, declared that at "all the experiments at which he had assisted someone had always announced beforehand the direction in which the table might be expected to move, and had thus helped to bring the unconscious expectations of the sitters into unison."

Digitized by Google

But this was too simple an explanation of the mystery to commend itself to the multitude, who revel in the mysterious and unexplainable. The spiritualistic interpretation found its strongest advocates among the clergy, who found that the tables were tilted by diabolical agency.

The Rev. N. S. Godfrey, a Church of England clergyman, of Leeds, with his wife and his curate, held a meeting for table turning in the presence of the National schoolmaster and others. After various unsuccessful attempts to induce the table to confess that it was moved by diabolic agency, Mr. Godfrey continues:—

> I was now prepared for a further experiment of a far more solemn character. I whispered to the Schoolmaster to bring a small Bible, and to lay it on the table when I should tell him. I then caused the table to revolve rapidly, and gave the signal. The Bible was laid on the table, and it instantly stopped! We were horror-struck.

"After supper, the experiment was resumed, and the following test was tried: 'If there be not a devil, knock twice; to our horror the leg slowly rose and knocked twice.' It need hardly be said that these appalling disclosures were made public without delay."[2]

Later, at another seance, the "table admitted, in answer to leading questions, that it was moved by the spirit of a dead man, a lost soul, sent from hell by the devil, for the express purpose of deceiving the circle there assembled, and doomed to return to hell when the nightly task was accomplished." Later still, the spirit of a deceased parishioner appeared on the scene. "This spirit confessed that he had only once before been in the schoolroom (where the seance was held), and then not to attend Sunday-school, but for the carnal delights of a tea-meeting. In earth life he had generally attended the Wesleyan chapel, but now deeply regretted he had not paid more heed to Mr. Godfrey's counsel."[3]

"The inconceivable Godfrey," as Mr. Podmore calls him, published alarming revelations under the titles Table-Moving Tested, and Proved to be the Result of Satanic Agency (1853), and Table-Turning the Devil's Masterpiece; also The Devil's Modern Masterpiece.

Later in the year, the Rev. E. Gillson, of Bath, after one sitting, published his experiences under the title of Table-Talking: Disclosures of Satanic Wonders and Prophetic Signs. Mr. Gillson, at this sitting, got into communication with a departed spirit "who expected in the course of ten years to be bound with Satan and all his crew, and cast into the abyss." Another clergyman, the Rev. R. W. Dibdin, in a lecture delivered in the same year (1853), and afterwards printed, contended that the spirits at work were not those of departed men and women, but those of devils. "But whether spirits of men or devils," says Podmore, "all these clergymen were agreed that the motive power and the aim were alike diabolic."[4]

[1] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., p. 8.
[2] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., p. 13.
[3] Ibid, vol. ii., p. 13.
[4] Podmore, Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., p. 14.

It was Faraday who gave the death-blow to this rank growth of superstition by the method of scientific experiment, and we cannot do better than give Mr. Podmore's account of it:—

> Faraday, like other thoughtful men, was aghast at the hold which the table-turning mania had gained on all classes of society, and at the loose thinking and presumptuous ignorance which the popular explanations revealed. Amongst the various theories commonly offered to account for the movements of the table he mentions spirits, electricity, magnetism, "attraction" of some kind, and the rotation of the earth! By the use of some apparatus Faraday showed conclusively that the movements were due to muscular action, and to that alone, exercised in most cases without the consciousness or volition of the sitters. Perhaps the most effective of his test apparatus was the following. He prepared two small flat boards a few inches square, placed several glass rollers about the thickness of an ordinary pencil between them, and fastened the whole together with a couple of indiarubber bands in such a manner that the upper board would slide under lateral pressure to a limited extent over the lower one. A light index, consisting of a haystalk or a piece of paper, was fastened to the apparatus so as to betray the least movement of the upper board to the lower one. It was found that, in all cases, the upper board moved before the lower board, which rested on the table, showing that the fingers of the operator moved the table, and not—as the sitters themselves supposed—the table the fingers. But the most striking proof that the movement was due to a muscular effort of which the performer was quite unconscious is that when the sitters learned the meaning of the index and kept their attention fixed upon it, no movement followed; "when the parties saw the index, it remained very steady; when it was hidden from them, or they looked away from it, it wavered about, though they believed that they always pressed directly downward."[1]

Thus did science give the death-blow to this peurile superstition. The public excitement on the subject quickly died down, and henceforth the practice was confined solely to spiritualistic circles, where it still continues a languid existence. It would be utterly incredible that a man of such scientific eminence as Sir Oliver Lodge is a believer in this superstition, and practises it to get into communication with the spirits of the dead, if we did not have his own word for it. In his lately published book, Raymond, Sir Oliver gives pages and pages of communications from spirits obtained by this means. Chapter viii. is entirely taken up with them; and there are many others!

Dr. Ivor Tuckett, who has himself experimented in the subject, says that the conditions for success in table-turning are chiefly three: (a) that there should be no one taking part who is profoundly sceptical; (b) that someone should be a convinced believer in the "spiritual explanation" of table-turning, usually of a neurotic temperament; (c) that the performance should be carried out in a dim light. These are just the conditions for inducing a state of auto-suggestion or hypnotism. Dr. Tuckett also gives the rational explanation of the phenomena, as follows: "After a few or many minutes of sitting with outstretched fingers, one or more of the sitters will become the subject of fatigue of the neuro-muscular system, encouraged by the expectancy of phenomena and by the concentration of attention not to miss the moment the table begins to move. This fatigue leads to a certain degree of tremor in the hands, and probably evinces itself first in those who are the most intense believers, especially if they are of a neurotic temperament—that is, have a nervous system easily excited and depressed. As the finger-tips are fixed by

[1] Ibid, vol. ii., p. 9.

Digitized by Google

contact with the table, the tremor gives the feeling that the table is vibrating, and in the belief that it is about to move, the enthusiasts quite subconsciously push the table. The moment the table moves ever so little, the whole company, including the least enthusiastic, become the subjects of a process of auto-suggestion, and aid the deception quite unconsciously by pushing. If, however, a profound sceptic is present, he will not be the victim of this auto-hypnotic process, and by not doing his share of the pushing, or by withstanding the tendency of the table to move, which is very slight at first, he will defeat the action of the others."[1]

It is easy from this to understand why mediums always object to sceptics joining their circles.

W. MANN.

(To be continued.)

A Puritan on Paine.

A FEW days ago I came across a new book of essays by Mr. Augustine Birrell. I must confess to no very violent interest in matters political, but I have a sort of vague recollection that Mr. Birrell was Irish Secretary under the late-lamented Liberal Government. It would seem that he is one of those much praised writers who have brought to perfection the art of saying nothing in particular in an airy and charming way. This is, no doubt, as good a reason as any other for co-opting him into a job which is handsomely paid by a long-suffering nation. An elegant taste in letters and a witty style are by no means the invariable intellectual characteristics of your professional politician, who, for the most part, is a dreadfully dull and heavy-handed man. It is, therefore, pleasing to know that Mr. Birrell succeeded in "pulling off" one of the big prizes. Be this as it may, what I am now concerned with is not Mr. Birrell as politician, but as critic. The book I mentioned above is called Self-Selected Essays (Nelson & Co.; 1s. 3d. net). The essays appear to have been selected by Mr. Birrell himself, and not, as was the case with a former book, by one of his admirers. They have, however, on the whole, so little coherence that they might very well have selected themselves. A few of them not even the most out-and-out admirers would ever have dreamed of admitting. In their place in the columns of literary and other journals they were, no doubt, promptly read and praised, and then as promptly forgotten. To give them a permanent form, especially at a time when paper is scarce, is simply to invite the jibes of the unfriendly critic. After all, we hardly expect a man who has been extolled for his exquisite humour and sense of proportion to exhibit a foolishly lavish affection for his literary offspring.

The essay that has a particular interest for the Freethinker is one on Thomas Paine, written in 1900, as a review of Mr. Moncure Conway's Life. It is a short article of nine pages or so; and, in order to bring out the contrast of method and temper, it should be closely compared with another essay, a long one on Burke, originally a lecture delivered at Edinburgh. It is difficult for Mr. Birrell to be reasonably fair to Paine; it is equally difficult for him to be anything but generous to Burke. Yet both the writers have equal strength and sincerity; one being plain, logical, and controlled; the other, rhetorical, emotional, and potent. What, then, is the reason for this uncritical preference? I cannot imagine that Paine's plebeian origin could have much influence, although it is noticeable that the average middle-class critic is often disposed to handle tenderly a commonplace book by an aristocrat. How often have we seen them tumble over themselves in their hurry to acclaim an insignificant piece of history or sociology by Lord Rosebery or Lord Cromer! It is impossible not to find a suspicion of snobbishness in Mr. Birrell's irritating prejudice against Paine, although it is the critic's narrow and orthodox Christianity that accounts for much of the animus.

