Let us now see what he thinks of Paine, noting at the same time how Burke strikes him. We are first told, with emphasis, that Paine was a "rank failure" up to the age of thirty-seven. This is an unpleasant way of saying that Paine had not done anything of note up to that age. "Rank," like the more modern "rotten," is one of those meaningless adjectives by which a writer expresses his unintelligent contempt. With his natural advantages of social position, education, and money, Burke was quite as much, or even more, of a failure at the same age. He had done nothing more than amuse himself with parodying Bolingbroke's reasoning on religion, and making the subject of the "sublime and beautiful" even more attractive and difficult than it was. But Mr. Birrell does not mention failure in connection with Burke, and "rank" is an epithet you keep for plebeian democrats. However, he does admit that Paine was a success from the moment he landed in America. This is quite a generous admission for Mr. Birrell, who also credits Paine with being a born journalist, and tells us that, having found the right groove, he never left it, but went on "scribbling his advice, and obtruding his counsel on men and nations." Surely this is the height of Puritan insolence! But when he proceeds to tell us that Paine "hated British institutions with the hatred of a civil servant who has had the 'sack,'" he simply shows that malevolence will make a clever man talk foolishly. In no one more than in Paine was personal feeling so completely, so admirably, under control. The closely woven logical fabric of his thought is evidence of a fundamental sincerity, which is by no means the quality we found below the gorgeous eloquence and uncontrolled vehemence of Burke. Again, Mr. Birrell is pleased to tell us that Paine was "a bad gauger for King George, but an admirable scribe for a revolution conducted on constitutional principles." My answer is that if Paine did once neglect his duty as an exciseman, he admitted his fault and took his punishment in a manly way, while a politician like Dundas used public money for private purposes and played the injured innocent when he was impeached.

Another of Mr. Birrell's Puritan objections to Paine is that he was not a teetotaler, and that he was inclined to redness. I don't know if Paine's favourite stimulant was gin-and-water. If not, it was no doubt something equally vulgar, something far removed from the old and aristocratic port which seems to have been the tipple of Burke and his friends. As Mr. Birrell knows, it was an age of hard drinking. Many of the greatest statesmen of the time cultivated convivial habits, and some of them made a point of never going to bed sober. "The lampoons and cartoons of the day," says Mr. Lovatt-Fraser, "frequently dwell on the bibulous tendencies of Pitt and Lord Melville," who, it is said, were able to finish seven bottles of wine between them and yet take their seats next day in the House with steady nerves and clear brains. A hundred years ago men had stronger stomachs and harder heads. Drinking was one of the signs of a vigorous and expansive temperament. It set up no more deterioration in Thomas Paine or Charles Lamb or Pitt than did the deplorable opium-habit in Coleridge, for whose moral shortcomings Mr. Birrell would be the first to find excuses.

But what concerns us most as Freethinkers is Mr. Birrell's attitude to the Age of Reason. He knows—Mr. Conway's Life has made it quite clear—that Paine was a sincere Deist, and not an Atheist, as is ignorantly and commonly supposed. Yet on other points he shows lamentable ignorance. "Nobody now," he assures us, "is ever likely to read the Age of Reason for instruction or amusement." Now, I hardly think I am far wrong when I say that the R.P.A. sells a dozen copies of Paine's work for one of Arnold's Literature and Dogma. This surely proves that some people do not share Mr. Birrell's tastes; and I am able to assure him that I, for one, have found it both instructive, amusing, and attractive. If we read a little further on, we are able to see why Mr. Birrell has gone astray. He is content to repeat the stupidities of the average orthodox critic. "Paine," he tells us, "is a coarse writer, without refinement of nature, and he uses brutal expressions, and hurls his vulgar words about in a manner certain to displease." Certainly it must come as a crude shock to the Christian to find that there are undeveloped humorous possibilities in the Pentateuch, and many absurdities even in his cherished New Testament. It was Paine's business, as he conceived it, to put these absurdities and contradictions plainly, with the intention of forcing the believer to examine for himself. To have handled the subject more delicately would have been to miss his opportunity, as the orthodox are notoriously thick-skinned. But to say that Paine is naturally coarse is to show yourself both ignorant and foolish. When he attacked people whose principles he hated, he never let himself loose like the immaculate Burke, who was naturally coarse-grained. You need only scratch the aristocratic statesman to find the hackney cab-driver. There is nothing in Paine to put against the outrageous coarseness of Burke's abuse of Warren Hastings and of the principal actors in the French Revolution. Mr. Birrell, no doubt, could put his finger on the passages I am hinting at; but he prefers the more congenial task of discrediting Thomas Paine.

Speaking in the Upper House of Convocation on May 1, the Bishop of London said he was not happy at the little response made by the nation to the appeal for half a million men for the Army. "He was most anxious that the Church, which had been at the bottom of all the nation's struggles for freedom in all its history, should call the nation's attention to that appeal." Exactly, the Church has always been at the bottom in all the nation's struggles for liberty. At the bottom, or behind, anywhere but on top or in the front. If anyone doubts that the Church has been at the bottom, let him look up the votes of the Bishops in the House of Lords.

The Bishop added that "Many of the agents of the Devil are perfectly prepared to go and work in factories at 30s. a week side by side with the girls and use their influence to lead them astray." We have heard this kind of thing before—from the Bishop, and from agents of the Salvation Army—but we should like to see something like facts produced in support. Until they are forthcoming we are inclined to put them along with the romantic stories of the Bishop's encounters with Atheists in the East End. We do not say that men do not lead girls astray, and sometimes girls lead men astray. Both things are possible in this Christian country with its moral sense heightened and purified by this Christian War.

The death of Sir Francis Burnand, a famous editor of Punch, reminds us of his ready wit. At a Foreign Office reception, a guest in brilliant uniform came up to Burnand and shook hands with great cordiality. Burnand looked embarrassed, so the guest said, "I see you don't know me from Adam." "My dear sir," replied Sir Francis, "I didn't know Adam."

At the funeral of Sir Francis Burnand, Father Fox said that Sir Francis was "famous before God and the saints in heaven." We had no idea they took such an interest in Punch. But we daresay the poor things were glad of anything to enliven the deadly monotony of their existence. And one can imagine the angels crowding round Sir Francis, the moment he arrives, begging for the last good story.

The side-tracking of education by the clergy is continuing, and a large number of Welsh Nonconformist ministers have become elementary day-school teachers. This will mean a very big Bible in the schools.

A London magistrate says that beggars exhibit much better manners than formerly. Nowadays, when they were refused, they went off saying, "God bless you," or something of that sort. Perhaps the dear clergy will claim this as proof of the belated revival of religion.

The Archbishop of Canterbury issued a special prayer asking God to "protect our merchant ships and those of our Allies, and of the neutral nations against the attack of our enemies." Now the Government says that the submarine menace is growing, and the number of ships sunk increasing. What will the Archbishop do about it? Will he conclude that God doesn't want to help the Allies, that he can't help the Allies, or that he is helping the Germans? Or will he move a vote of censure on the Lord for his inactivity? Clearly something ought to be done.

Owing to the paper shortage, the Plymouth Education Committee has cancelled an order for the supply of 20,000 hymn-books. So war does bring some benefits in its train, after all!

The intrusion of the clergy into the teaching profession reminds us that over 10,000 members of the Church Lads' Brigade are with the Colours. The parsons evidently like their fighting done by proxy.

Vegetables are being grown in the old burial-ground of the Chapel of the Ascension, Marble Arch, London. As the ground has been consecrated, the vegetables ought to be "very fine and large."

A suggestion was made before the Cinema Commission that many empty churches might be filled if they were equipped with a cinema-screen to illustrate the sermons. If the sermons were on Jonah and the Whale or Noah's Ark, the pictures should be as funny as a Charlie Chaplin film.

Some German editors object to English parsons styling them Atheists, and one points out that Bismarck stated in the Reichstag that he was a Christian, and that the Hohenzollerns have been very pious

In an article on the late Dr. Zanenhof, the inventor of Esperanto, the Daily Telegraph says that the famous linguist tried "to undo the effects of the Tower of Babel." Babble on Babel is more suitable to the pages of a parish magazine than the columns of a newspaper.

Following upon an argument concerning the War, the Rev. Robert Barry, a Congregationalist minister at Bronville, U.S.A., murdered his wife and mother-in-law, and committed suicide. The restraining power of religion is not very evident in this.

Lord Devonport has issued an order that anyone found wasting food will be punished. But what will he do with one who prevents the growing of food? We ask this because the Secretary of the Lord's Day Observance Society writes in the Times that, as a punishment for our desecration of the Sabbath, "God, by his weather, prevented ploughing on several of the proposed seven Sundays." Now, that is clear and definite. God is aiding the enemy by preventing the growth of foodstuffs. And we seriously ask, What is Lord Devonport going to do about it?

Billy Sunday, the Yankee revivalist, it is said, is working under his own name, but his name has been too much for its owner. So long as he was a baseballer, he thought of the other six days; but when he took up preaching, the one day won. Before he got on the religious war-path he was William A. Sundy.

Scratch a Christian and you find a barbarian. Even the clergy find this out sometimes. At a Plymouth meeting, protesting against lenient treatment of conscientious objectors at Princetown Prison, a Nonconformist minister wished to move an amendment, but was howled down, and had to seek police protection.

The Revs. W. B. Selbie, F. B. Meyer, and J. Scott Lidgett have sent a letter of protest to Mr. Lloyd George concerning the policy of reprisals, in which they contend that by so doing we have become partners in the enemy's evil deeds. So far, about a dozen out of 50,000 clergymen have protested.

The Rev. George Davies, a Baptist minister, fell dead in the street whilst visiting London for the May Meetings. There is no moral.

The Rev. R. J. Campbell says that children must be taught the culture of the soul. In order, presumably, that the clergy may reap the harvest.

The clerical boast that the War is doing good to religion does not often square with the facts. Owing to paper shortage, Plymouth Education Committee has cancelled an order for the supply of 20,000 hymn books.

On Shakespeare's birthday the poet's monuments in Westminster Abbey, Southwark Cathedral, and other churches, were decorated. The author of Hamlet did not often trouble the pew-openers during his lifetime.

The Loretto Heights, near Arras, which has been the scene of a great battle, is a reminder of the Italian town Loretto, which Catholics believe contains a house in which the Virgin Mary formerly lodged. The story tells how, in the thirteenth century, it was brought from Galilee by angels. This story is as true as the Gospels.

The Daily Chronicle reminds its readers that George Jacob Holyoake invented the word "jingo" to describe fire-eating militarists. Our contemporary refers to Holyoake as "the Social reformer," but omits all reference to his Secularism.

There are 227 petitions for divorce to be tried during the coming law term. This discounts the clerical boast that those whom God has joined, no man shall put asunder.

One of the "Reporters" of the Imperial War Conference remarks: "A simple calculation shows that, had the annual wastage of infant life during the last fifty years been no greater than it is at present, at least 500,000 men would have been available for the defence of the country to-day." What a glorious thought! And what a commentary upon the benefits of Christian dominancy. The crowning argument for looking after our babies is that it will provide us with more men for "cannon fodder." Who says that Christianity does not protect the home?

Truly the clergy learn nothing and forget nothing. It is at a time like the present when thrones are toppling that the House of Convocation, at the instance of the Dean of Canterbury, pass a resolution in favour of the reinsertion of the name of Charles I. in the Calendar as a saint and martyr. To call him a martyr is absurd. We do not say it is absurd to call him a saint because most saints are absurd. But what a topic to engage the thoughts of men in the midst of a world War. And when all is said and done the only claim of Charles I. to distinction is that he was beheaded. That is a distinction other monarchs have earned, but have not always received it.

Rev. Dr. Eyre has complained to the East Sussex Education Committee that facilities for religious instruction have been infringed by the instruction given at cookery centres. Shocking! And yet we fancy that most sensible people would rather see girls grow up capable cooks than good theologians.

Sir Robert Borden told the British and Foreign Bible Society that democracy must be guided by the Bible. We suggest the following as the guides that would suit: "The powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation." That is the kind of text which we should imagine would commend itself to such leaders of the democracy as the late Czar, the Kaiser, or Lord Milner. And we are overwhelmed by the democratic enthusiasm burning in such a text as "Servants (slaves) be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart as unto Christ"! Could anything be more democratic?

A Sunday paper complains that we wear too many clothes, and calls for a sumptuary controller. We hope this does not mean a return to the very primitive fashions worn in the Garden of Eden.

In a religious periodical appeared the following piece of beautiful sententiousness: "To-day is the to-morrow you were worrying about yesterday." It sounds like an attempt to parody the Athanasian Creed.

Now we know why the clergy were exempted from the operations of the Military Service Act. Last week the Archbishop of Canterbury told the House of Convocation that the clergy had been exempted from military service by the nation's representatives in Parliament "without a dissentient voice," and this was because "to them had been assigned a great responsibility in the nation's life at all times." So we know all about it. But one still wonders what is the great responsibility assigned to the clergy. The Archbishop doesn't enlighten us. Perhaps he was initiating a guessing competition.

The death of Canon McFadden, parish priest of Glenties, County Donegal, recalls the time when the priest was arrested, in full vestments on a Sunday morning, for the part he took in the Irish Plan of Campaign. The police inspector who carried out the order was killed by the peasantry. Religion and politics make a highly explosive mixture.

A Salvation Army advertisement states that its workers "have been engaged in the collecting and sorting of waste-paper for over a quarter of a century." This is a frank admission of the business side of salvation.

The late Rev. W. F. Hale, of Reigate, left estate to the value of nearly £50,000. That should be quite sufficient to keep him out of heaven.

"Some" Ghost.

I BELIEVE in the Holy Ghost,
Believe that he is ever most,
That we can expect from the Host,—
That is Religion's chiefest boast;
Believe he's nothing but a Ghost;
He won't make material roast;
He's neither here nor at his post;
He's naught, in fact; so no fine toast
Can we propose to such a Ghost. C. B. W.

To Correspondents.

J. CRASSIE.—Your letter received. If it did you any good to write it, the benefit is all on one side.

R. C. YOUNG.—Now that Mr. Rosetti is in France, we will see that you get your Freethinker until he returns.

J. HARDING.—We quite appreciate your solicitude. But we do not think we are overworking, only working hard; and it is not hard work that hurts, but worry and anxiety. We could do with less of the latter, but must make the best of it.

ASHTON RIDLEY.—Have placed your name in newsagents' list. We are not surprised to learn that the War has scattered many of your old customers for the Freethinker. That has been one of the difficulties we have had to face during the course of the War.

MR. G. K. HARPER writes that La Revolution, by L. Madelin (Hubatte, Paris), is one of the best works on the French Revolution, and was awarded a prize by the Institut. The book is available in an English translation.

S. THOMPSON.—Pleased to know that you are now a regular reader of the Freethinker. We don't think "God" does occupy the whole of our space. On the contrary, the weekly fare provided is a very varied one. Our policy is to treat all things from a Freethought point of view, and for that purpose the paper exists. Other suggestion noted.

"FATHER" RUDDY.—Not at all offended—on the contrary, rather interested.

C. HARPUR.—Sorry we have not the space at our disposal to publish your letter. Communications must be brief, if they are to be inserted. But if you insist in preferring a personal conviction against all evidence, is controversy worth while?

W. RAWETT.—If you are convinced, as a Spiritualist, that Mr Mann's articles can only aid your cause, and as we have a quite opposite opinion, controversy seems quite needless. We are both in agreement as to the value of the articles.

W. KENSELT.—We were under the impression that the feeding of inmates of prisons had been improved of late years. If things are as you say, there is evidently room for improvement. As you say, prisoners are not sentenced to semi-starvation.

H. C. HEBBES.—You appear to have overlooked the sarcasm in the review of Mr. Angell's book by "Criticus."

L. JENNINGS (Bristol).—Thanks for new subscriber. We are quite certain that if our readers were to put their backs into it, a thousand new subscribers might be secured in the next three months.

Sugar Plums.

We are not at all surprised to hear that Mr. Lloyd's address on "Humanism versus Christianity" was greatly appreciated by the South Place audience on Sunday last. We should have been surprised had it been otherwise. "After the War," perhaps, something may be done. Meanwhile, we draw the special attention of Freethinkers to the fact that the lecturer to-day is Mr. Harry Snell. His subject is "The Imposture of Faith Healing." We trust that our friends will see to it that the hall is crowded—as it should be.

Every little helps. Added to the exceptional and excessive high cost of paper, a rise in the wages of compositors has just been arranged between the masters and men, which puts between £30 and £40 per year on our printing. We quite sympathise with the men in getting this advance, but that does not help us much. So, as we said, every little helps—to make the burden heavier.

Capt. W. H. Rushbrooke, of Cosford, Milford, Surrey, writes that someone sent a copy of our "garbage entitled the Freethinker" to his address, and that he put the paper in the fire, "the fittest place for it." We hope the gallant captain feels better after informing us that we are living under the frown of his displeasure. But we can assure Captain Rushbrooke that if he thinks of setting up a claim for originality on the score of what he has done, he is quite unwarranted in doing so. Bless the man's innocent Christian soul, the Freethinker has been put in the fire by just such cultured and courteous gentlemen many a time. It is an old practice. We are very downcast, but are bearing up, and in time hope to forget this blow to our feelings.

But although cast down by Captain Rushbrooke's displeasure, we are cheered by the following from a Manchester correspondent:—

> I hope your readers will ponder the advice given in your "About Ourselves." The marvel to me is that a paper of such sustained excellence as the Freethinker does not have a very large circulation.....(Compliments deleted by office censor.) But if Freethinkers put their backs into it, the circulation ought to be very soon doubled. I am doing my bit, inasmuch as I have gained one new reader this, and I hope to get another one within the next week. If 25 per cent. of your readers (your own figure, Mr. Editor) did the same, your anxiety would be lessened and the Freethinker's usefulness increased.

Our correspondent will be pleased to learn that other of our readers are working hard in the matter, and, we trust, will meet with the success they deserve.

Miss Vance reports that our outdoor propaganda commenced last Sunday under favourable conditions both as regards weather and audiences, although the latter were somewhat interfered with by the May Day Labour demonstrations. These also engaged the attention of many of those who would have offered to sell the Freethinker, but all who had sold last season repeated their evil doings aided by recruits, and are now cheerfully awaiting the Council's promised attentions. The paper was eagerly bought, showing that the ban placed upon it by the Council had, naturally, served to increase the demand. Curiously enough, the impression that the Council had caved in at the end of last season had to be corrected in several instances, and, when this was understood, a resolution condemning the action of this reactionary body was was put and carried unanimously. Miss Vance concludes with the request that additional volunteers to sell the paper may reach her in good time for Sunday next.

We have just published a new pamphlet, Freethought and Literature (price one penny, by post three halfpence), by "Mimnermus." Curiously, although "Mimnermus" has been writing in the Freethinker and elsewhere for many years, he has never yet put anything into permanent form. We feel sure that our readers will welcome his new departure with as much pleasure as they read his weekly contribution to our columns. His review of some of the world's great writers in their relation to Freethought will be helpful to Freethinkers and illuminating to Christians. We have no doubt but that the pamphlet will have the wide circulation it deserves.

A great many of our readers will be interested in the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, and these will be pleased to hear that a meeting demanding its withdrawal, "and the postponement of such legislation until women have political responsibility," is to be held at the British Schools, Kentish Town Road, on Friday, May 11, at 8 o'clock. As the present issue of the Freethinker is in the hands of most London readers before Friday, this notice may be of use. There will be various speakers, and admission is free.

Owing to pressure on our space, we are obliged to hold over the concluding portion of Miss Frances Ivor's "Woman and Christianity." For the same reason we are compelled to hold over the report of the N. S. S. monthly Executive meeting. Both will appear in our next issue.

Presidential Notes.

IN another part of this issue there will be found the Agenda of the National Secular Society's Annual Conference. The Conference will be held in the South Place Institute which is, perhaps, one of the most centrally situated halls in London. The Agenda, it will be noted, affords ground for profitable discussion, particularly those resolutions having a vital relation to the position of Freethinkers and Freethought in public life. It is just possible that events will occur between now and the Conference that may call for notice, but the Agenda has to be prepared some time beforehand, and it can only deal with affairs as they stand at the time of going to press.

Two things may offer serious developments at any moment. One is the trouble with the L.C.C., about which I wrote last week. The other is the Clydebank case in connection with the Oath's Amendment Act. It will be remembered that a witness was refused the right to affirm in defiance of a clear statutory right. On behalf of the executive, Miss Vance was instructed to write the Secretary for Scotland calling his attention to the matter. But these letters brought no more than an official acknowledgment of their receipt. A letter to the editor of the paper, in which the case was reported, did, however, bring the startling information that the witness had actually been threatened with contempt of court for refusing to take the oath. This made the case still more serious, and on mentioning the matter to Sir George Greenwood, M.P., he very kindly volunteered to place an interrogation on the question paper of the House of Commons if I desired it. I was, naturally, pleased that this should be done, and the question was accordingly asked the Secretary for Scotland. The following is his reply:—

> My attention has been drawn to this case, and I have caused enquiries to be made. The information before me is that the witness, although given the opportunity of doing so, did not avail himself of either of the statutory grounds provided by the Oaths Act, 1888, on which he might have been entitled to give his evidence on affirmation. These grounds are (1) that the witness has no religious belief, and (2) that to take the oath is contrary to his religious belief. The court accordingly refused to take his evidence, and at the close of the proceedings intimation was made to him that the incident would be reported to the Burgh Prosecutor, in terms of the section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1908.

All I have to say now upon this answer is that it is quite at variance with the published newspaper report of the case, and is little better than an evasion of the question at issue. It was clearly the magistrate's duty to explain to the witness the grounds upon which an affirmation might be made, and there is no indication that this was done. On the contrary, there is evidence that the witness was actually pressed to take the oath. He was asked such irrelevant questions as "Do you attend church?" In short, there is a very ugly look about the whole of the proceedings.

But the matter cannot be allowed to rest here. The important thing is to find out the address of the witness, Charles Stewart. The gentleman who first drew my attention to the case applied to the court for this, and was refused. I then wrote to my friend, Mr. T. Robertson, of Glasgow, asking him to instruct a solicitor on behalf of the N.S.S. to probe the matter to the bottom. Acting on instructions, the solicitor also applied to the police for the witnesses address. It was refused, but he was referred to the "Assessor." On applying to this official there was another refusal. It is, therefore, quite evident that the officials feel they have done wrong and are trying to hush the matter up. Further pressure will, however, be applied, and we must await the result. The important thing is to find the address of Mr. Charles Stewart, who was a witness at Clydebank Police Court on March 12. Surely some one must know him, and I beg Freethinkers on the spot to do what they can to find out where this gentleman resides. It will be a monstrous thing if officials, whose duty it is to see that the law is carried out, can act in the manner indicated without there being some means of calling them to account.

One way and another, the immediate future of Freethought in this country is not likely to lack interest, even if it fails to provide excitement. It is certain that the Churches will strive their hardest to repair their shattered prestige when the War is over, and we shall need to be well on our guard if we are to counteract their efforts. So far we have no cause for complaint, although one would like to have seen greater activity in some quarters. The past year has been one of exceptional difficulty; but, on the whole, the most has been made of opportunities that occurred for work. The lecture propaganda has been revived and carried into new fields with success. New Branches of the Society have been opened, and the ground prepared for others. There has been a larger number of members join the Society than has been the case for many years past, and I can at least close my first year of office with the feeling that I have not spared myself. Continuous lecturing up and down the country, attending to a hundred and one odd matters that crop up, in addition to running a weekly paper single-handed, and under more trying conditions than has ever before been experienced, quite ensures one against rusting out. I console myself with the reflection that I am fairly tough and not likely to wear out in a hurry. And I know that I have done what I promised to do—my best.

This year, the increased cost and difficulty of railway travelling may have the effect of diminishing the number of delegates who will attend the Annual Conference; but I hope that all Branches will make an effort to send a delegate, nevertheless. After all, the Conference only occurs once a year, and all should make a very special effort to rise to the occasion. It is in times of stress that co-operation is most needed and most appreciated. There is a great work to be done yet by the N.S.S. if it only rises to the occasion. That work may involve a good deal of reconstruction of the internal mechanism of the Society, the precise nature of which cannot at the moment be indicated. Much will depend upon events that are now in the shaping. Much will, of course, depend upon the whole-hearted energy which each one puts into the common cause. And that cause is great enough to act as an inspiration to all who value freedom, enlightenment, and progress.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

SOUTH PLACE INSTITUTE, SOUTH PLACE, MOORGATE STREET,

London, E.C.

WHIT-SUNDAY, MAY 27, 1917.

Agenda.

1. Minutes of last Conference.
2. Executive's Annual Report.
3. Reception of Report.
4. Financial Report.
5. Election of President.
   (a) Motion by West Ham, Bethnal Green, and Birmingham Branches:—
   "That Mr. Chapman Cohen be re-elected President."
6. Election of Vice-Presidents.
   (a) The following are nominated by the Executive for re-election: Bailey, W.; Baker, W. H.; Bartram, J. G.; Bowman, E.; Chapman, R.; Charbonnel, Victor; Collins, T.; Ross, Miss Mary; Samuels, S.; Shore, T.; Silverstein, H.; Stanley, Miss Alma; Terry, J.; Thurlow, T. J.; Turnbull, John H.; Vance, Miss E. M.; White, G.; Whitwell, C. J.; Williams, E. Clifford; Willis, F. E.; Wood, Frederick.

7. Election of Auditors.

8. Adoption of Revised Rules.

9. Motion by Mr. Cowell:—

"That in order to place the Society on a more democratic basis the office of President be abolished, and in place thereof a committee of three be appointed by the Executive to act in emergencies and report."

10. Motion by Birmingham Branch:—

"That in the opinion of this Conference the earliest opportunity should be taken of publishing the judgment of the House of Lords in respect to the Bowman case."

11. Motion by Mr. A. D. Howell Smith, B.A.:—

"That, having in view the elaborate preparations being made by all sections of the Christian Church to meet post-War conditions, and the possibility of reaction resulting from such activities, this Conference urges Freethinkers throughout the country to counteract the tactics of the Churches by effective organization on their part, and suggests the formation of Branches of the N. S. S. wherever possible."

12. Motion by North London Branch:—

(a) "That future Conferences of the Society be held twice yearly, at Whitsuntide and in the autumn; the annual election of officers to be made at Whitsuntide, and the balance-sheet to cover the same period as at present."

(b) "That this Conference, realizing the profound importance of the Freethinker to the Secular Movement, and being anxious to induce all Branches at their indoor and outdoor meetings to push the circulation of the paper, favours the weekly insertion of brief reports of meetings in that organ, feeling that these notices are calculated to promote and sustain a keener interest in the Freethought Movement."

13. Motion by Mr. Lloyd:—

"That this Conference regrets the absence of all mention of the religious question in State schools from the educational scheme outlined by the Minister for Education in his recent speech before the House of Commons, and is of opinion that no assured progress is possible so long as the schools are permitted to be the arena in which religious bodies fight for a sectarian advantage, and calls upon the Government to restrict the State schools to subjects defined as 'secular' in its own code, and thus end a state of affairs which hinders the progress of education and inflicts an injustice upon a large body of citizens."

14. Motion by Mr. Louis Brandes:—

"That the same person shall not hold the office of President for more than two consecutive years, and shall not be eligible for nomination for two years after the expiration of his last term of office."

15. Motion by Mr. A. B. Moss:—

"That this Conference protests in the strongest terms against the repeated flouting of the provisions of the Oaths Act of 1888 in the public courts; it draws special attention to the case in the Clydebank Police Court in March last, when a witness was not only refused the right to affirm, but was subsequently charged with contempt of court; and calls upon the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Scotland to see that the administration of the law is no longer obstructed by ignorant or bigoted officials."

16. Motion by Mr. C. Cohen:—

'This Conference, noting the fact that our great Ally, France, is, without injury to the conduct of the War, able to grant her soldiers and sailors complete freedom with regard to attendance at religious worship, regrets that such attendance should still be compulsory in both branches of the Service under the British Government, and regrets that in a War in which 'Freedom' and 'Justice' play so large a part, Freethinkers serving with the Forces should be compelled to participate in a religious service in which they have no faith, and should be denied that freedom of choice in matters of belief which is now generally regarded as the condition of a progressive social life."

17. Motion by Executive:—

"That, having in view the ambition of the Vatican to regain some portion of its lost temporal power, bearing in mind also the danger to European liberty of permitting the presence of representatives of the Papacy at the Peace Congress that will be called at some future date, this Conference welcomes the agitation now being carried on in continental Freethinking and Liberal circles against the international recognition at a Peace Conference of a Church which has always distinguished itself as an enemy of enlightenment and Freedom."

18. Motion by Executive:—

"That this Conference protests against the policy of allowing trained teachers in State schools to be replaced by ministers of religion, who are fitted neither by training nor tradition for so technical and responsible a task as the education of the nation's children."

This Conference will sit in the South Place Institute, South Place, Moorgate Street, E.C. Morning session, 10.30 to 12.30; afternoon session, 2.30 to 4.30. Both are purely business meetings. Only members of the N. S. S. can speak and vote. A public meeting will be held in the evening at 7 o'clock.

The Monarch of Cereals.

As an article of food, wheat has always been used in various ways. In remote ages, the unground cereal was soaked in water and then dried into cakes in the sun. Frumenty or furmity was for centuries a favourite dish in England. This food was prepared by soaking the grain, boiling it with milk, and then adding some sweetening substance. Macaroni and several other edible commodities are made from wheat, but bread is the oldest and most valuable of its products. Charred fragments of bread have been discovered in the Lake remains of the Neolithic Age. The loaves of these far-off days were prepared from crushed wheat. Many were the varieties of cakes and bread consumed by the classic Greeks. As many as eighty-one loaves of bread, quite modern in texture, were recovered from an ancient Roman oven in the overwhelmed city of Pompeii, while the old Egyptians were long acquainted with leavened bread.

The modern loaf is leavened by the action of yeast, and unless the dough rises, the bread is certain to be sad and heavy. After the dough has been kneaded and shaped into loaves, a temperature of from 70 to 75 degrees F. is regarded as best for obtaining light and palatable bread. Yeast, or "barm," is a fungous plant which, when introduced into the dough, nourishes itself chiefly on the sugar contained in it. As the yeast spreads, it exhales alcohol and carbon dioxide gas. This gas and "the generated steam expand with heat, force their way through the dough, and thus lighten it." The changes set up by the fermentation initiated by the yeast result in an average loss of 2 per cent. of the flour content. It is officially stated that "in exceptional cases, as in prolonged fermentation,.....the losses may amount to 8 per cent. or more."

This serious leakage led to the substitution of chemical preparations for ordinary yeast. But these substitutes have failed so far to secure the benefits required. The best bread baked from German yeast lacks taste, and has other blemishes. There is some talk now of the possibility of preparing yeastless bread, in which the waste due to fermentation will be avoided, but it remains to be seen whether this unfermented loaf has yet passed beyond the stage of experiment.

The "Ready-to-Eat Wheat" industry has developed considerably in America since 1895. Shredded wheat biscuit is said to contain every part of the grain. Wheat straw finds innumerable uses on all farms. In mediæval England this straw formed the house thatch, and in some Old World lands wheats of certain kinds are expressly cultivated for the straw used in making hats and baskets. Although bread is a staple in most countries, the use of rye and other cereals lessens the consumption of the wheaten loaf. The chief European consumers of wheat are France, England, Belgium, Spain, and Switzerland. Elsewhere wheaten bread is greatest in request in Canada, Australia, and the States.

In area the wheat fields of Russia are the largest in Europe, and the land of the recent revolution may yet become the granary of the Old World. The potentialities of the Russian soil are beyond all reasonable calculation once a rational system of government permits the progress of the agrarian population. The renowned black soil of European Russia consists of an arable plain situated in the south-east of the country. It is of vast extent, and the earth is remarkably fertile. Nor need this occasion surprise, for the dark soil results from many centuries' constant decomposition of the plant life of the region. The eighteen provinces of European Russia which mainly possess this rich soil raise two-thirds of the wheat of the country. Of Russia's 328,000,000 acres of plough land, nearly 60 per cent. is situated in the area of black soil. The remaining arable domain of Russia lies towards the north-west, and is greatly inferior to the sable soil. This poorer land is devoted chiefly to the raising of rye. Mainly owing to the shameful secular misgovernment of the country and the sinister influences of the Sacerdotalists the Russian peasant is still steeped in ignorance, superstition, poverty, and squalor. Despite the miserable standard of living and the wretchedly recompensed toil of the labourer, the effete methods of farming, and the antiquated system of land tenure, have made Russian wheat a high-priced grain, considering its inferior quality. During recent years, however, a spirit of progress has appeared. Machinery is being set to agricultural service, and the rotation of crops is being practised. In Western Russia, from 1870 to 1904, the production of wheat increased 122 per cent., and a far greater area was employed in its cultivation.

Asiatic Russia has also moved forward. The building of the Great Siberian Railway has necessitated many changes of a progressive character. Siberia, which remained until recently to the world in general as a synonym for all the horrors which attend autocracy, suddenly stood revealed as our planet's future granary. This magnificent vision has thus far failed to materialize, but the promised fruitfulness of this immense territory when controlled by capable and conscientious administrators is indeed vast. Siberia is twenty-four times the extent of Germany, and nearly double the area of the United States. Intensely cold is the climate, and much of the country is unfit for human habitation. Yet there remains a huge region for cultivation, and especially for the cultivation of wheat, which is already Siberia's leading crop. After recent happenings, we may safely regard Russia as a great permanent contributor to the world's wheat supply.

India became an important wheat exporting centre with the completion of the Suez Canal in 1869, and with the development of internal railways at a later date. India is a peninsula so large, and agricultural and climatal conditions are so various in the country, and as the weather fluctuates considerably from season to season, the annual output of wheat is subject to marked variations. In consequence of this, Indian wheat is always an extremely uncertain factor in the world's markets. Were it possible to predict the approximate yield of the export crop for a series of years, Indian grain would materially affect the world's wheat prices. In British India there are about 30,000,000 acres under wheat, and the cereal is harvested in the European spring.

Although the average agriculturist in Argentina is decidedly unenterprising, and despite the fact that cattle breeding has long eclipsed all other aspects of husbandry, the Republic has made remarkable progress recently in wheat production. Some thirty years since, not sufficient wheat was raised for domestic demands, but the cereal has now become the staple crop. The annual export exceeds 50,000,000 bushels, and it is thought that at least 60,000,000 acres will, at no distant time, be devoted to the growth of wheat.

It is, however, to Canada that we must look as the coming wheat-field of the world. Every facility is afforded in the great Dominion for immediate and unexampled development. Not alone are soil and climate almost ideal for wheat culture, but the Canadian farmer is usually industrious, intelligent, and up-to-date. Canada possesses an area in which wheat can be conveniently and profitably cultivated, which has about three times the acreage of the wheat region of the United States. Truly a tiny percentage of this immense territory is at present under cultivation, but this small area yielded more than 100,000,000 bushels of wheat ten years ago. An American authority admits that "the hard wheat of the Canadian North-West ranks with the world's best wheat, and the Toronto papers quote it at a price about 15 cents above that of Ontario wheat."

Intensive agriculture, combined with suitable soil, produce more bountiful returns in Canada than in the American wheat lands. As a permanent source of European supply, Australia is less reliable, as in that Southern land wheat proves unremunerative in comparison with other crops, and the cereal is severely handicapped by the recurrent droughts.

About 95 per cent. of the world's total wheat crop is produced in the Northern Hemisphere. And not only does this hemisphere consume all that it raises, but it absorbs a considerable percentage of that grown in the Southern Hemisphere as well. More than half the entire wheat crop is cultivated in Europe, but owing to the density of that continent's population, Europe absorbs the world's surplus in addition to her own yield. No marvel then that in our war-stained countries the cry increases that flesh and blood seem cheap, while the indispensable loaf becomes steadily scarce and dear.

Book Chat.

As an earnest of a serious attempt to rouse the British public to a due sense of the value of Pure Science, Science and the Nation (Cambridge University Press, 5s.) deserves a warm welcome. The volume is well planned, and the thirteen scientific authorities, who between them range over the larger part of the scientific world, deal with their subjects in a way which, while bringing out the importance of scientific research to the commercial and economic life of the nation, duly emphasizes the fact that genuine scientific progress is only possible to those who are animated with a love of knowledge for its own sake. And there is need for this lesson. As Lord Moulton, who contributes a preface to the work, points out, there is a real danger that the widespread determination to remedy our national neglect of industrial science may defeat itself by leading to as great a neglect of Pure Science after the War as existed before that catastrophe broke upon Europe. The volume before us is designed to avert that danger, and it deserves success. Each of the thirteen essays is fascinating in its account of the marvels already worked, and not less so in the worlds of speculative possibilities indicated. We cannot think of a better volume to place in the hands of those who think science a "dry" and uninteresting subject. The sciences of Chemistry, Physics, Metallurgy, Botany, Geology, Forestry, Medicine, Ethnology, etc., are passed in review, and fairyland is made contemptibly matter of fact and commonplace by the tale of wonder unfolded. Lord Moulton may well say that these essays "offer an unchallangeable argument in favour of Pure Science," or, as I should prefer to call it, Experimental Science motivated purely by the desire to increase knowledge.

And that is the only spirit in which really important scientific work is ever accomplished. You cannot set down a first-rate scientific worker to discover something useful or commercially profitable; you must leave him free to discover something that is true. Its commercial exploitation will be pretty sure to come later. It is to our national discredit that hitherto we have thought much of the latter and little of the former. This is due, says the Cambridge Professor of Chemistry, to the fact that "during the past fifty years hardly any English public man of affairs possessing any knowledge of scientific principles has arisen, and no Government department having the faintest interest in scientific industry has existed."

How much better we shall be after the War remains to be seen. But it is certain that we shall not be better off unless by some means a public interest in the right direction is created. It is as a step in that direction that Science and the Nation is to be welcomed. It is both informing and inspiring, and the man or woman who can read it through, from the opening essay to the fascinating ethnological chapter, by H. R. Rivers, without being fired by the spirit of adventure, must indeed be of "coarse clay and common mould."

The famous Swedish author, Helen Key, has a large and international, if somewhat peculiar public, and in War, Peace, and the Future (Putman's Sons, 6s. net) she deals with the question asked her at the opening of the War, "In what way can humanity prevent war?" Her answer to that query is, "by making humanity really human," and her work is an examination of the causes that produce war, with an indication of the means that may prevent its recurrence. The causes of war—the jealousies of nations, the persistence of false ideas of greatness, the piling up of armaments, the fact of the desire for peace not being so powerful as the desire on the part of each nation not to declare war, have been so frequently stated as not to need dwelling on at any length here. And the folly and inutility of the policies dominating the nations of Europe should by now be plain to all. If proof be needed, the War itself surely furnishes all that is required.

A sub-title to the volume is "A Consideration of Nationalism and Internationalism and of the Relation of Women to the War." But, on the author's own admission, women stand in no special relation to this War, if they ever do at any war. Women have supported war in general, quite as much as have men, and have as often as not urged men to war. One ought not to forget, in this connection, those impertinent and vulgarian fashionable women who, in the early months of the War, made it a rule to hand a white feather to any young man they saw in civilian dress. If it be said that in this respect women have accepted the ideals that men have placed before them, and they will know better as their social education becomes perfected, we agree; but man himself, we hope, will learn better with the growing of the years. We have, indeed, a strong dislike to all attempts to consider this or that social question from "the woman's point of view." It is a heritage, by reaction, from the practice of considering social questions from the man's point of view. Social questions are neither women's questions nor men's questions. They are just social questions, and concern men and women alike. And men and women need to be trained in the light of that conception. We agree, however, with Helen Key, that a general influence from the War will be an increase of woman's self-esteem. Her share in the activities of the War will have made her realize her place as a social unit, and it will lie ill on the lips of those who have utilized woman's labour for every purpose save that of actual fighting, and have only refrained from using it there because of lack of sheer brute strength, that she must not "interfere with things she does not understand."

We agree, also, with this:—

> The first condition of woman's peace movement is, that all talk of the necessity of war, the ennobling influence, the beauty, and the eternity of war, should be silenced on the lips of women; that their lips should never be opened except to proclaim that war belongs to those phases of life that must be conquered if humanity is to be humanized.

Only it seems to us that "men" would read as well as "women" in this paragraph, and "human beings" better than either.

PSYCHISM AND THE SUPERNATURAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—As a careful inquirer into the many forms of so-called spirit phenomena, I should like to thank you for the very able and careful articles on this subject which have appeared from the pen of Mr. Walter Mann. I have interviewed, personally, several "mediums," and have been present at the seances in which these folk have acted in the capacity of percipient. I myself have, at telepathic seances, acted both as percipient and as agent. Mr. Mann gives us many examples of fraud and deception, but omits from his essays any reference to cases which have been most carefully inquired into by the Society of Psychological Research, where there is no reason to suppose that any fraud existed. I am as firm a disbeliever in "spirits" as Mr. Mann, but in my own experience have met with certain cases where there can be no doubt that no form of fraud was employed. Mr. Mann may be doing the Rationalist cause a great deal of harm by implying that all forms of psychic phenomena are fraudulent. It is unquestionably established that certain persons are born with a highly developed "percipient" sense in being able to record thought transference. The pity is that such persons at once believe that their powers are supernatural instead of natural, and begin to demonstrate their faculty in public and for money. Directly they become servants of the public they are obliged to take precautions that they will not fail, and here is where fraud creeps in. Fraud is easy to expose where scientific tests are used, but the genuine cases are very difficult to account for unless we are fully prepared to accept the now proven theories of telepathy and thought-transference. The numerous cases of psychic phenomena which came under the observation of Mr. Podmore, Professor Richet, and others, and even under my own observation on a more limited scale, cannot be accounted for by fraud, and we are doing the scientific cause a great disservice if we claim that they are. Most public "mediums" have been exposed for the reason above mentioned, although this cannot, I think, be said of Mrs. Piper, with whose case Mr. Mann is no doubt familiar. The full account will be found in the Proceedings of the S.P.R. (vol. vi., pp. 436-660), and also in Mr. Podmore's Apparitions and Thought Transference (pp. 326-338). Surely it is better to look for scientific explanations than to attribute phenomena to fraud? I hope Mr. Mann will make his views on this most important scientific problem clear.

FREETHINKERS AND ADULT SCHOOLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—If you consider the subject a suitable one, I should like to raise the question as to the desirability or otherwise of Freethinkers attending such institutions as Adult Schools. My experience may be of interest to some of your readers.

I joined the local Adult School some five years ago, it being the only gathering in the village where full and free discussion are allowed. I have never disguised my views as an Agnostic, and have been instrumental in getting the following subjects discussed (amongst others of same type): "Christianity or Secularism: Which is the Better?" "Pagan and Christian Morality" (based on W. Mann's articles); "Civilization and War" (based on Chapman Cohen's pamphlet).

I have always expressed the Freethought point of view without restraint, and am accorded a respectful hearing; and it seems to me that it is better to do this than to hold aloof from such gatherings. What say you?

FRED HOBDAY.

ATHEISM IN THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—To deal fully with Mr. Farmer's last letter, it would be necessary to enter on an æsthetic discussion on the use of expletives in literature, legitimate and otherwise, which I have no intention of doing, especially as I no longer have Aulard before me, and cannot reproduce the quotations from Hebert which, in my opinion, justified my description of him and his journal as of the "gutter" variety. Even if I could, I should have to use dashes and asterisks to a degree sufficient to deprive the quotations of any value. I must simply, then, so far as the quality of Hebert's journalism is concerned, state my opinion that, while a writer may be "broad" and even "purple," and yet justify himself by his abundance of wit, humour, and sympathetic insight into life, there are limits to the permissible use of low expressions, which one need not be a Puritan to appreciate, especially when used simply to sell a paper.

But in answering my contentions, Mr. Farmer has inadvertently done me an injustice. In my eighth article, which appeared in your issue of April 1, I summed up my opinion of Hebert and his associates, and made it plain that my adverse judgment on this group, including their leader, was based much more on their inordinate bloodthirstiness than on the eccentricities of Pere Duchesne. When, therefore, in restating the case against Hebert in reply to Mr. Farmer, I gave proof of his sanguinary incitements by quotations from Kropotkin, I was not introducing a fresh charge, but sustaining my original indictment. Mr. Farmer declines a brief for Hebert on this count. I am disappointed; for I had hoped that this, my one and only encounter with a live Hebertist, might disclose a real case for the editor of Pere Duchesne, and add materially to my historical information. It has not done so.

May I add that, so far from being influenced by M. Aulard's "unscrupulous" translator, I entirely forget what that gentleman said on the subject, and should certainly not have treated him as an authority.

The War and a Future Life.

If it be true that the War has turned the thoughts of many men towards the question of a future life, it is certain that it has brought no new light, and generated no new conviction. How could it? Death, even in a violent form, is nothing new in the world. Death comes to all sooner or later. To many it comes in the form of loathsome or painful disease, and deaths by violence occur daily to hundreds, if not thousands. Death is of necessity as regular as birth, and the same questions about death front us in a time of peace as in a time of war. And size matters little. It is only the unimaginative and the unreflective who are impressed by the size of things. The wickedness of war on a large scale is really no greater than war on a small one; although many who are aghast at the former accept the latter without demur. Therefore, the War may have directed attention towards the question of a future life—although no very clear proof of that has been offered. And, on the whole, one is inclined to regard the alleged growth of interest as due to the activity of professional pleaders who see in the War an occasion suitable to the end of urging their views upon the public.

For and Against.

Since the War began there certainly appears to have been a larger proportion of books issued on this subject than is usual. Two of this class are before us as we write, and they may be taken together because they are so entirely different in tone, in method, in purpose, and in conclusion.[1] Of Mr. Waddington's work we can offer, so far as it goes, nothing but praise. The case against the belief in survival is well and temperately put, although more detail would prove its strength to be much greater than is here shown. But all the elements of the attack are here, and they are brought out in a survey of the opinions of leading minds from Buddha to Maeterlinck, with a running commentary by the author. Mr. Waddington's work is essentially an appeal to all that is highest and best in man against yielding to an illusion because of sustained appeals to emotion, and the authority of a traditional belief. Daintily printed and bound, we can think of no more suitable work that would serve as a gift-book from Freethinker to Freethinker, or better still, from a Freethinker to an enquiring Christian.

Question Begging by Definition.

Mr. Griffith-Jones's work is of a quite different character. We are told frankly that it is written "not for Agnostics or Materialists, but for perplexed believers." Its business is not to investigate origins, trace developments, and balance evidence, but to say what can be said in favour of the belief in survival in face of what, we believe, are the damning presumptions against it. So far as that be, Mr. Griffith-Jones makes out as good a case as is possible. If he leaves the matter where he found it, his excuse might be that he cannot make something out of nothing. But he does his best. Mr. Waddington cites Confucius as saying to an enquirer: "While you do not know what Life is, what can you know about Death?" That is the caution of a wise man. Mr. Jones defines death—like a theologian. Death is, he says, physiologically "the dissolution of the vital bond between the soul as the living principle, and the body which is its organism," and, psychologically, it is "the end of our conscious life on earth." Well, if that is correct, no more is to be said. We know all about it, and survival is demonstrated. Only we venture to suggest that so long as we keep within the bounds of knowledge, or of even legitimate assumption, death is not the separation of soul and body, it is the cessation of a phenomenon which we call life. That it is continued elsewhere is pure assumption. Dr. Jones begs the whole question in his definition.

Evading the Facts.

Dr. Jones cannot be said to deal with the case against survival as presented by modern science. He sketches some of the arguments but refutes none. Sometimes, as in his dealing with the anthropological argument—to our mind the most convincing of all, he reminds one of the preacher who exhorted his audience to look their difficulties in the face and pass on. And this shows wisdom. For there is no adequate reply to the scientific case. All analogy forbids our assuming human life to be more permanent than other forms of existence. The primitive illusion of a "double" or "ghost," in which the belief in survival undoubtedly took its origin, is conclusive in itself. All scientific knowledge is in the one direction. We know nothing of mind or "soul" apart from organization. We cannot even conceive it apart from organization, and it is only believed in because so few people ever try to visualize their beliefs or their thoughts. Mr. Waddington puts the matter plainly when he says: "We have no knowledge, nor are we able to imagine, any mind or thought apart from common matter—that is to say, apart from a material organism. History fails to record and imagination is unable to depict, the existence of a great mathematician without a brain, and until we meet a senior wrangler walking down Piccadilly without a head, we shall not believe in the possibility of thought without some corporeal accompaniment."

From Absurdity to Slander.

Many people are far more impressed by what they consider the moral value of the belief in a future life than by anything else, although this is an appeal to cupidity rather than to reason. Dr. Jones lays considerable stress upon this, and promises dreadful consequences to society if the belief dies out. But, of course, against this is the awkward fact that people without the belief in a future life are at least as worthy as those who believe in it, and not infrequently more so. To this Dr. Jones replies that the springs of conduct had been fixed "before they became Agnostic," and such a position "is not likely to be repeated in the second and third generations, as the history of families who have departed from the Faith abundantly proves." So slander is added to absurdity. Starting with the ridiculous statement that morality, which is a social product or nothing, is born of the Christian faith, Dr. Jones proceeds to the slander that those who have left Christianity show a moral deterioration in the third and fourth generation. One would like to get the names of these cases. Until they are forthcoming, we can only characterize such a statement as a cowardly falsehood. Dr. Jones is trading on the fears of the unthinking to bolster up a belief which he sees cannot depend upon reason for its justification.

The Slump in Belief.

The absurdity of it all is shown by Dr. Jones's own admission that "the belief in immortality has unquestionably been losing its hold on all classes of society during the past half-century"; that on speaking to soldiers from the Front, he discovers "the majority do not seem to think about it at all"; that "the trend of scientific thought on its broader and more philosophic side during the last half-century has been distinctly, and, till quite recently, increasingly hostile to faith in a future life." What, then, can be the moral value of a belief about which the majority do not trouble, which is losing its hold on all classes, and to which exact thought is increasingly hostile? The truth is, that next to the illusion of the belief itself, is the illusion that it is of some social or moral value. It has not, and never has had, any such value. Some of the greatest scoundrels in the world have been firm believers in a future life. Our prisons are filled with people who believe in it. And even in the pulpit it clearly cannot keep its professors faithful to the truth, nor save them from slandering those who disagree with them.

A Doomed Belief.

People who are not theologians are, however, not concerned with whether the belief in a future life is useful; they are more concerned with whether it is true. And that is far healthier. For, as one of Mr. Waddington's authors says, "A man can be good without being clever, but he cannot be good unless he desires the truth for its own sake, and uses his intellect to discover it." The truth about this belief in a future life is known, and is permeating the people, despite the efforts of the pulpit to prevent it. We know the belief began in an illusion, and we know you can no more reach truth by refining an illusion than thirst-stricken travellers in a desert can slake their parched throats by following a mirage. From the dreams and crude guesses of the primitive savage this belief came. It was developed into a philosophy before positive science came into its own, since when it has been steadily losing ground, in spite of the millions of pounds spent to secure its perpetuation. For every one to whom the belief has brought solace, it has made life for a hundred a veritable nightmare. Poets, philosophers, and theologians have done their best to give this belief an air of reality; still it remains true to itself—a legacy from the primitive savage, and with no greater warranty in our day than it had in his.

Christianity and the Churches.

THERE are Christian divines not a few who sorrowfully confess that the Churches are in a state of bankruptcy, and that, as at present constituted, they can have no brilliant future. No unbeliever ever judged them with greater severity than the Rev. Bernard Snell did in his pungent address from the chair of the Congregational Union a few days ago. Mr. Snell is described as "a powerful and original speaker, whose theological viewpoint is broad and advanced." Even in his Newcastle days, upwards of thirty years ago, he was distinguished for the courage with which he expressed his convictions, which, at that time, were anything but popular. He may not be quite so heterodox to-day as he was supposed to be then; but he still displays the same bravery in all his public utterances. The following extract from the Christian World's report of his Chairman's Address illustrates the accuracy of our estimate of him:—

> Principles were cheerfully accepted they had never dreamed of seeing in their time. The comradeship of officers and men was full of hope. The spirit of brotherhood was prevailing everywhere except in the Churches, which were created to promote it. That was the scandal. The Churches were the greatest laggards, the homes of hesitances—they were too largely an apparatus for keeping the people apart

According to the report in the British Weekly, Mr. Snell reminded the assembled delegates that "the Churches have become reduced to the necessity of defending the religion of Christ from the indictment that it has failed by saying that it has not been tried." "Then why not try it"? he exclaimed amid a wild outburst of approving applause. In that question lies the crux of the problem. Dr. Frank Ballard and others have repeatedly assured us that Christianity cannot honestly be said to have failed because it has never yet had its innings; but the question forces itself upon us, Why has she not had them? According to all accounts, the Church was divinely organized for the one purpose of putting the religion of Christ into practice, for the fulfilment of which she was promised the perpetual presence, guidance, and power of the Holy Ghost. That purpose she has flagrantly failed to execute, and this is a fact recognized by all alike.

Dr. Ballard raised a larger issue than he was prepared to face. It is easy enough to perceive that the Church has failed in her mission; but her admitted failure is quite as difficult to explain as the alleged failure of Christianity, and certainly no less serious. What is the Church? Christ's body, the Holy Spirit's temple, "the fulness of him that filleth all in all." Jesus is reported to have said, "Upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." To his Church, so built, he said: "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." Now, surely, such men as Dr. Ballard and Mr. Snell must regard the New Testament description of the Church as at once inspired and authoritative, in which case it is impossible to understand on what ground they acknowledge her impotence and deny that of the religion she embodies, or how they can say that the gates of hell have prevailed against the former and left the latter unharmed. As a matter of fact, if the teaching of Christ and his apostles, as recorded in the Gospels and Epistles, is to be accepted as divinely inspired and essentially true, there is positively no escape from the conclusion that the Church and Christianity are equally divine and infallible, and that it is equally impossible for either the one or the other to fail; but, on the other hand, if that teaching is not true, both are equally human and fallible, and their failure should occasion no surprise to anybody. Our contention is that the high claims set forth on behalf of both have been completely falsified by the events of the last nineteen centuries, and that the prospects of neither are calculated to hearten their professional champions. And incontrovertibly the failure of the Church is the failure of Christianity, because, apart from the Church, Christianity is non-existent. Those who distinguish between traditional and essential Christianity, alleging that the one is a waning belief and the other a waxing force, forget that the traditional species is the only one known to us, the brand called "essential" being, as yet, at any rate, entirely unhistorical. There are two types of the Christian religion in the world, namely, the natural and the supernatural. Those who affect the former call themselves Liberal Christians, while the representatives of the latter glory in the adjective "orthodox"; but both schools profess what they believe to be "essential" Christianity, the only difference between them being that they do not agree as to what the essence of Christianity is. According to the one school it is obedience or conformity to the teaching of Jesus, while, in the opinion of the other, it is the acceptance by faith of the finished work of Christ as the objective ground of salvation; but the one school is as certain as the other that it possesses and strives to exemplify the very essence of the Christian religion. Those two types we know as actually existent, but what "essential" Christianity, as distinguished from those traditional types, is we have not the remotest idea.

Orthodox Christianity is the Church's creation. It has gone through a long process of evolution, and there still await it, no doubt, many further modifications; but in essence it will always remain either a natural or a supernatural system of thought, accentuating either obedience or trust. The present point is, however, that Christianity, in any intelligible sense, is as colossal a failure as the Church. In point of fact, as a religion, it never was a success. Even when the Church dominated all departments of life, Christianity as a factor of social reform was a dead letter. When supernatural belief flourished throughout Christendom the morals of both clergy and laity were shockingly low. The Bishop of London asserted recently that London is to-day "less godly" than it was a hundred years ago, but he omitted to add that it is morally and socially considerably higher. In his excellent new book, The Bankruptcy of Religion (Messrs. Watts & Co.), Mr. Joseph McCabe says:—

> If the bishop had a spare hour in which to study the London of a century ago he would discover that its godliness was allied with a comprehensive corruption which might surprise him. Prostitutes were then, in proportion to population, and according to the statements of the police (given by a writer of the time, the magistrate Colquhoun), twenty times as numerous as they are to-day, and general looseness of conduct was much greater than now. Gambling was permitted on the streets and encouraged by the State-lotteries. Drunkenness was immeasurably worse than it now is. Pleasure was brutal and revolting. Wives were sold in public. Children were worked or beaten to death. Crime was so flagrant that one hardly ventured out after dark. Industrial oppression was absolutely unchecked. The political system was infamous. And the Bishop of London of that day and his colleagues did not know what social idealism meant (pp. 276-7).

We agree with Mr. Snell when he says that "for all who read the signs of the times a new spirit is moving such as men have never known"; but this new spirit was born and is being nurtured outside the Churches. While it was growing up the Churches were busily defending their doctrinal standards and their orthodoxies, their voice thus ringing false and their members largely ignoring its very existence. As soon as it had arrived at a certain stage of development and become influential, many of the Churches took it into their bosoms and called it their own fondly cherished child; but it was too late. As Mr. Snell himself declares, that spirit of brotherhood and progress is "prevailing everywhere except in the Churches." When Mr. Snell and others first realized what had happened, it was too late to remedy the evils that had persisted for many centuries. The outside world had found out how extremely false the voice of the Churches had rung throughout the ages, and under what absolutely false colours they had always sailed. Their Divine origin, the alleged presence and activities within them of an eternal, omnipotent, and all-loving Redeemer and Lord, the mighty miracles which they claimed to have been performed by the outpouring of the Spirit, all such pretensions are now seen to be but baseless myths, doomed to disappear wholly discredited. Natural knowledge is eliminating supernatural beliefs, the spread of Humanism is banishing all forms of religious magic, all theories of personal redemption by mystic union with a slain and resurrected Saviour-God, and the new spirit is enunciating ever more clearly the great principle that every vital problem "concerns us as human beings striving to comprehend a world of human experience by the resources of human minds" alone.

The Voltaire of America.

> We think our civilization near its meridian, but we are yet only at the cock-crowing and the morning star.—Emerson.
> The infidels of one age have been the aureole saints of the next.—Ingersoll.

AN advanced movement like our own can have no better champion than a humourist. No human emotion is so readily awakened as that of which laughter is the sign. And if the cause be a great one, and if the arguments, barbed by wit and winged by laughter, have any intrinsic worth, they strike the deeper and take the stouter hold because of the humorous nature of their presentation.

In a theological discussion a laugh is a blessing, and a laugh-maker like Colonel Robert Ingersoll was genuinely our benefactor. The artificial solemnity of the subject make a joke more jocund, as the arms of a dusky maid give a double beauty to her pearls. The defenders of that transcendent imposture known as Christianity have lost themselves in trackless deserts of so-called evidence, and almost drowned the subject in oceans of verbiage. But Colonel Bob, the Voltaire of our day, challenged the defenders of orthodoxy with smiles. There was no point of real importance upon which the Colonel did not touch wittily. There were few fallacies in that enormous tissue of falsehoods which he did not laughingly expose. Nowhere is he so happy as when he describes smilingly how religions grew out of the hot-beds of ignorance, fraud, and mystification. Although a master of the lash, he uses his whip caressingly. He does not cut his subject to ribbons like Jonathan Swift, nor, like Voltaire, sting like a thousand wasps. Rather is he a Voltaire into whom has passed the geniality and suavity of Renan. It is a mellowed and transformed Voltaire, looking upon a sadder and busier world with the laughing eyes we know so well. That was one of the many reasons why the Colonel had such bitter enemies among the long-necked geese of orthodoxy, who sought for many years to hiss him down. The defenders of the religion of the Man of Sorrows realized that it is ridicule that kills. Gravity was what they wanted, for they knew full well that opponents who treat religion too seriously play their game for them.

Robert Ingersoll occupied the position as a militant Freethought orator and writer which Charles Bradlaugh filled here. Both were big men physically and intellectually; both could sway popular audiences; but here the resemblance ends. Bradlaugh sought to beat down Christianity by sheer force of logic and law. His speeches read like judicial utterances by the side of the brilliant, sparkling orations of Colonel Ingersoll. America dearly loves rhetoric, and Pagan Bob as an orator had no equal in the States. He dealt rhetorically with elemental emotions, and he enjoyed the fame of being an apostle of liberty. Expressing the simple feelings of men, he made a universal appeal. "Give me liberty, or give me death!" That was the kind of thing; a sonorous and impassioned phrase flung out to thrill the hearts and flush the cheeks of thousands. Phrase after phrase has this special quality, and reads like prose-poetry, grandiose and sweeping:—

> Liberty, a word without which all other words are vain.

You can almost see the outstretched arm, hear the thrilling, resonant voice. There is music in it; the trumpets sing to battle.

Colonel Ingersoll wrote, too, quite as brilliant and delightful a style as his spoken words. He was "answered" over and over again by ministers of all denominations, and even drew Cardinal Newman and Gladstone into the controversial arena. Taunted by the English politician with riding a horse without a bridle, Ingersoll retorted crushingly that this was better than "riding a dead horse in a reverential calm." Professor Huxley, indeed, claimed the victory for Ingersoll. "Gladstone's attack on you," he wrote, "is one of the best things he has written. I don't think there is more than fifty per cent. more verbiage than is necessary, nor any sentence with more than two meanings."

Ingersoll's masterpiece, The Mistakes of Moses, is a Freethought "classic," and still commands a huge circulation wherever the English language is spoken. A generation after his death his lectures are as widely read and discussed as during his lifetime. Such literary vitality is the surest test of his power, for it is rare that controversial matter is endorsed so richly as to survive the purposes of the moment.

It is good to find that Ingersoll is still discussed so many years after his death, for there are few Freethinkers whom it is more necessary to remember. He was of the race of the Sun-Treader, whom Browning once worshipped this side of idolatry. He was the mouthpiece of liberty and fraternity, believing, as he did, that freedom was the very breath of brotherhood. He was the orator of Freethought, with that all-embracing appeal which the mere rhetorician never succeeds in attaining.

His was a genius in which intellectual liberty appeared as beautiful a thing as a flower, a bird, or a star. At heart a poet, he found the world a place of ethical ideals, and he was no less exalted when he spoke of the golden hopes of humanity than when he described the exquisite beauty of a little child's laugh:—

> Strike with hand of fire, O weird musician, thy harp strung with Apollo's golden hair, fill the vast cathedral aisles with symphonies sweet and dim, deft toucher of the organ-keys; blow, bugler, blow, till thy silver notes touch and kiss the moonlit waves, and charm the lovers wandering amid the vineclad hills. But know your sweetest strains are discords all, compared with childhood's happy laugh—the laugh that fills the eyes with light, and every heart with joy. O rippling river of laughter, thou art the blessed boundary-line between beasts and men; and every wayward wave of thine doth drown some fiend of care. O laughter! rose-lipped daughter of joy, there are dimples enough in thy cheeks to catch and hold and glorify all the tears of grief.

Imagination and humour were the qualities in which Ingersoll surpassed the orators of his time; but his humour was most unassailable work. A handful of his jests are, perhaps, the finest contribution to Freethought literature since Voltaire. How good is his jest that "with soap, baptism is a good thing." Being asked if it were true that he feared to meet certain of the clergy, he replied cheerfully that he was willing to meet them all together. While he had his law-office at Washington, lightning struck and burnt a church close to his office. Ingersoll said: "An offended deity may have intended that bolt for my office, but what marksmanship!" In response to an inquiry about Robert Collyer, he said: "Had such men as Collyer and John Stuart Mill been present at the burning of Servetus, they would have extinguished the flames with their tears. Had the Presbytery of Chicago been there, they would have quietly turned their backs, solemnly divided their coat-tails, and warmed themselves."

A thorough humanitarian, Ingersoll's work is full of a fine and noble indignation, directed against all that is cruel and despicable in religion. From thousands of minds he lifted the awful belief in eternal torment, and banished those degrading conceptions of deity which oppressed his countrymen.

Ingersoll's enormous influence and personal qualities are undisputed. The Rev. J. M. Savage, one of the most scholarly of Transatlantic ministers, said that Ingersoll was "the most remarkable orator and a master over a popular audience." Frederick Douglass, the ex-slave, himself a Christian, has borne testimony to the welcome he met on Ingersoll's threshold when no one else in Illinois would take the negro in. His old antagonist, Gladstone, admitted that the Colonel wrote with "a rare and enviable brilliancy." One may not unfairly sum up Ingersoll's life in the words of Marshall Wilder, who wrote: "People may say all they like of his infidelity, but I wish a good many people I know had some of his religion." One thing, at least, quotations like this prove, they help to refute the absurdities of those persons who pretend that Robert Ingersoll was a commonplace antagonist. The Ingersoll we treasure in our hearts was a keen-eyed warrior, as well as a very noble man, who fought in the Army of Human Liberation, and who never wavered in holding aloft the standard of Freethought against all the gods in the Pantheon.

Woman and Christianity.

II.

The ascetic doctrines of Christianity cannot be wholly attributed to Paul. Jesus was a celibate, and encouraged the leaving of home, wife, and children, "for my name's sake" (Matthew xix. 29). See also Matthew xix. 12. A perusal of the New Testament yields no ideal conception of woman to compare with the best women in Pagan antiquity. Most Christian women are densely ignorant of the history of their faith, and seldom read the Bible with critical eyes. Their conceptions of Jesus are usually taken from pious tracts and parson's sermons in which a Christ of purely imaginary qualities is portrayed, having no sort of resemblance to the Gospel model. The Christian Church was not long in bringing back the worship of the Mother Goddess, for a woman can only satisfy her highest feelings in ideal womanhood. "When Cyril (d. 444) announced to the Ephesian that the Council of that place had decreed that the Virgin should be called the 'Mother of God' with tears of joy they embraced the knees of their Bishop: it was the old instinct peeping out: their ancestors would have done the same for Diana." And no one who has had any experience of Roman Catholic women will deny that Mary is loved quite as much as Jesus, for there is an instinctive feeling that only a woman can really understand and sympathize with a woman.

Madonna worship is an evolution from Paganism, and has no connection whatever with the mythic Mary of the Gospels, about whose character no authentic historic details are known. Like Pallas, Athene, and Aphrodite, she is the invention of man's soul. For God and Goddesses are abstractions endowed with the qualities which man, in the course of evolution, has come to revere himself. The little child Jesus appears on the arm of his mother Mary, as Horus did upon the arm of Isis. In the course of human evolution, the more sensitive masculine souls conceive woman as holy, and set the vessel of human life up above themselves. But this is not the work of Jesus or Paul. It is a return to Nature, to mother earth, to the natural feelings and instincts, something in which woman has a share.

At the Reformation, image worship was abolished, the mother and her son disappeared from the altar. Luther stresses the old ideals of the New Testament for women: "We have by nature a tainted sinful conception and birth" (Thesis xvi.). The Renaissance, through poetry and art, continued to elevate woman, and every movement for her emancipation, since Luther's day, has been made in spite of the Christian Churches. The Christian religion is the work of man not of woman. Every system of metaphysics and religious belief yet developed has primarily received its elements and proportions from the reasoning intellect of man, rather than from an intuitive perception of what actually exists in the human spirit claiming recognition and development. As man gains in moral sentiment and conception, so he revises his ethics and theology. Each system is logical enough, but the premises are continually changing as he evolves.

The freethinking woman refuses to believe that love, purity, beauty, goodness, are the monopoly of the Christian creed. The priest persuades the ignorant and credulous women that holiest emotions were discovered and preserved by Christianity, whereas the divine feelings are in reality Nature's fundamental impulses towards motherhood in every unspoilt woman's heart, arrived at a certain stage of consciousness in human progress. They are the free gifts of Nature to every woman-soul who is conscious of the broad permanent elements of her being.

A free woman has no need of a father-confessor, knowing full well that even the best of men cannot hold a candle to a really good, natural woman. Her soul revolts from the preposterous notion that a man can absolve her from sin, which, in itself, is a theological invention. Some day it will be realized that woman produces and includes man, and, as his creator, sometimes knows him as he can never know himself. Nearly all the women pioneers are Freethinkers—Mary Wollstonecraft, Harriet Martineau, Eliza Farnham, Emily Bronte, Ellen Key, Clara Zetkin. Life for these women was not something devised to disappoint the human soul, but to afford it the fullest measure of satisfaction. It is impossible to see it otherwise, the moment we shake off the thraldom of systems and creeds, and find a living and sufficient faith in an ideal of Goodness and in human nature.

Herbert Spencer says:—

> In the history of humanity, the saddest part concerns the treatment of women. The amount of suffering which has been and is borne by women is utterly beyond imagination. We may safely assume that multitudes of tribes disappeared, because the women were so ill-treated as to render them incapable of rearing a due number of children.

At the beginning of the historical period, woman was under complete subjection to man. Though women gained a certain amount of freedom in Egypt, Greece, and Rome, they fell victims to the social and political decadence in the Mediterranean world, of which the advent of Christianity was one of the chief expressions. Christianity lowered the position of woman. Modern humanism attempts to free the wife and mother and destroy the slavery to creeds. It has been said by a woman genius that "Woman does not dispute about the soul and its destiny because her inner consciousness testifies without dispute much that the masculine intellect attempts to prove or disprove."

The woman-soul breathes freely in love, purity, beauty, and goodness. All the priesthoods have taken advantage of this fact, and instilled the poison into woman's brain that they are the only custodians of these flowers of human sanctities. As the late Mr. Foote said, the balance between the intellect and the affections is not equal in the sexes. Most women have not the power to think into discipline the emotions of their hearts, and thus to work out their own salvation in this life. In their ignorance and credulity they lean upon the great ecclesiastical organization for emotional support, untroubled by the intellectual doubts which beset most thinking men. Freethought will make great headway only when more women have developed a love of truth. In the words of Lecky:—

> Women rarely love Truth, though they love passionately what they call "the truth" or opinions they have received from others, and hate vehemently those who differ from them. They value belief rather as a source of consolation than as a faithful expression of the reality of things.

Men must help to free woman from the shackles of superstition, so that their energies may be devoted to the service of humanity, thus helping to free the race from its slavedom under the self-constituted authority of the priest. "Can man be free, if woman be a slave?" asked Shelley.

Woman's real religion lies much nearer her heart than the Churches have yet discovered. In the course of human evolution there has developed, during the last century, in some women a clearsightedness into the essential nature of woman which is the charter of freedom for the mothers of the human race. Among these pioneer women are many who, like Eliza Farnham, "reject the dust of systems and creeds." Her philosophy centres round the idea that "a free, glad, spiritual (psychic) maternity is woman's highest religion, as a pure earnest searching love is that of man's." Woman is most divine in so far as her motherhood approaches the highest ideal she can conceive. In the lower civilizations woman's finer nature could not assert itself in the tough conflicts on the physical plane. Savages and barbarians are too low in the scale of consciousness to feel woman as a psychic power. The ideal begins to dawn on the mind in later civilizations. In more advanced civilizations woman is reverentially treated, love dominating the human relations. Honour to womanhood, reverence to maternity are dimly seen to be conditions of permanency in any people nation or race.

The humanistic mother finds in motherhood a higher ideal than obtains in any existing religion. She feels that all else in the world is for the best maternity, since where the most perfect humanity is produced, the highest end of human effort is attained. Woman is now beginning to conceive ideals for herself, out of her own nature, instead of meekly conforming to those of man. As it is, she has never burnt the martyrs or slain the prophets. It is the serio-comic man who thinks he has caught and exhausted truth in the institutions and organizations he has created, and is horrified at the thought of cutting through or breaking away from them. It is man who is capable of dying for the grossest error that age has made respectable. It is he and not the mother-soul who persuades himself that he is the heir to eternal misery, who believes in theories of total depravity, original sin, and eternal damnation. The mother-love in a woman's heart recognizes happiness as the consequence of existence, ultimate, if not immediate happiness. She is certain that no child of hers is pre-destined to eternal damnation. The more conscious woman feels that Nature demands perfection of woman as wife and mother. This love of perfection for herself, her children, and human society, has a natural basis and needs no supernatural sanctions. Many of the most vital moral truths essential to human welfare are self-evident to most women. No mother needs persuasion towards love, purity, and goodness on pain of punishment in the next world.

It is impossible that the world should remain for ever at the culture level and evolutionary stage of the early Christians. Freethinking women feel that Nature's wisdom is above that of the New Testament, whose doctrines have long ceased to be a spur and incentive to the times. These thinking women recognize the pious zeal of women working in the Christian cause; but they also recognize how the priests, all through the centuries, have exploited women in the interests of the Church, and they regret the ignorance and superstition which divert the holiest emotions in a woman's heart from the chief sphere in which they can be of lasting benefit to mankind, viz., a free and intelligent motherhood. In that office a fully conscious woman reaches her highest and purest self-hood. Nature, truth, and love are the grand Trinity. "Creeds may die, rites and ceremonies become matters of archæological interest," as Mr. Clodd says; but humanity, with its ideals, remains. Truth, beauty, and goodness still draws the human soul onwards. Nature is all that we know, for we can only know the universe to the measure of ourselves. There are souls whose larger consciousness and wealth of sentiment are the high blooming land of promise to mankind. Hitherto, the world has been led by the more gifted men; but side by side in the future will be ranked the women thinkers with feminine ideals to match the masculine ones. The woman of the future will be intelligent enough to love truth for its own sake as the only means to the end of human development.

Then there will be an end for ever to the venerable falsehoods which bar the progress of humanity towards its ultimate bounds, and love and reason will be the only dogmas upon which the foundation of human society will be based.

A QUESTION OF STYLE: HEBERT AND THE FREETHINKER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I hope Mr. Farmer will not think me discourteous if I venture to remind him of the old proverb: More haste, less speed. To those of us who happen to have a recent and vivid recollection of Hebert's notorious journal, it must seem that he has tumbled over himself in his haste to correct Mr. Arch, whose articles in the Freethinker we have all been reading with as much pleasure as profit.

To me both these gentlemen seem to be pretty much in the same position. Mr. Arch admits ingenuously that he has not seen a copy of Pere Duchesne, forgetting, I suppose, for the moment, that there is such a place as the Reading Room of the British Museum, and that an hour or two spent there would have put him in the way of reproving the temerity of his critic.

I cannot, of course, commend Mr. Arch for his absolute dependence upon authorities; but, in this case, I am afraid Mr. Farmer has nothing to boast of on the score of accuracy. He claims to have examined the journal carefully, but it must have been so long ago that he has either lost his notes or forgotten what he read. However, that may be, Mr. Arch is emphatically right—at least as regards the wanton obscenities with which the Atheist and Republican journalist besmirched his curious and usually intelligent articles—while Mr. Farmer is, I am sorry to say, as emphatically wrong. I am not in a position to contradict him as to the sort of language likely to shock a Methodist mothers' meeting. But to suggest even the faintest comparison between Hebert's style des mauvais lieux—to use the expression of one of his French admirers—and that of the Freethinker is to offer an insult to the editor of the paper for which I have the honour to write. It is to ask the reader to believe that the Freethinker habitually uses language, the grossness of which would bring a blush to the cheek of an inebriated racing-tout.

What I suggest to Mr. Farmer is, that he should make a faithful English version of, say No. 102 of Hebert's journal, or, indeed, of any one of the articles, and then ask the editor of this paper to print it. I have no doubt of what the answer would be.

TELEPATHY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—The following extracts are from Mr. Edwin Greenwood's letter, which appeared in your issue of May 13, on "Psychism and the Supernatural":—

> It is unquestionably established that certain persons are born with a highly developed "percipient" sense in being able to record thought-transference.....Fraud is easy to expose, where scientific tests are used, but the genuine cases are very difficult to account for, unless we are fully prepared to accept the now proven theories of telepathy and thought-transference.

I would therefore remind Mr. Greenwood that Mr. W. H. Massey, in March, 1911, advertised in the Literary Guide that £100 would be given to anyone who would produce evidence regarding the truth of telepathy that would stand cross-examination.

He wrote again in the Literary Guide for May, 1911, to say that the advertisement had "brought him nothing in the shape of evidence or proof," and he added "that the offers of £1,000 to three of the highest living authorities on telepathy have, so far, not led to the production of any evidence that will stand cross-examination, and I think we may conclude that none exists."

That was six years ago, and as Mr. Greenwood now asserts that "it is unquestionably established that percipient telepathists exist," we "ought to accept the now proven theories of telepathy and thought transference," I would suggest that Mr. W. H. Massey's sporting offer should be claimed, and won, by the specially gifted individuals.

To the best of my belief the offers are still open.

Acid Drops.

A correspondent asks us whether we really think that the desire of the clergy for exemption from military service is due to their being more cowardly than others. Well, we have never said so, and we do not believe it to be true. We quite believe that clergymen as a whole are as well endowed as others with physical courage. Had the clergy demanded exemption because they did not believe in warfare, one could at least have respected their attitude; but exemption was demanded in the interests of an order, and that is a quite different thing. At the bottom of the clerical attitude is the feeling that unless the "Black Army" is maintained at full war strength, the interests of the Church will suffer. To have enrolled the clergy with other citizens would have meant the closing of many churches, and that would have taught the people of what little consequence the clergy are. It would have been a great experiment, and one fatal to religious pretensions.

And, after all, most people are inclined—particularly in war-time—to overestimate the value and rarity of physical courage. The ease with which armies are raised, the readiness with which nations fight, proves that physical courage cannot be a rarity. All over the world we see that, with all sorts of races and peoples, a few months' training and discipline turns out an army of men prepared to face all sorts of discomforts and every kind of death. If physical courage were rare, wars would be rare also. The commonness of the one proves the commonness of the other. The rare thing in the world still is moral courage. More of that might make wars next to impossible. If the clergy had, then, resisted enrolment on any moral ground, we should have thought more of them, and so, we believe, would thousands of their one-time followers. But to stand out against war, when one's stand is based on conviction, requires the exercise of a higher courage than is needed to send one into the ranks at the urging of a "patriotic" impulse, which, however justifiable in operation, is quite unreasoning in origin. No difference of opinion as to the justifiability of this or that war, or of the soundness of the conviction on behalf of which a stand is made, ought to be able to obscure that truth.

At Sheffield the Chief Constable has issued an edict against Sunday opening of shops. Perhaps he thinks that, with so many edicts being issued, this one may escape criticism, and a little "authority" more or less won't matter. There is something to be said for that assumption. But the small traders are up in arms. They say it is a move on the part of Puritans and the large stores that want to crush the small traders altogether. And they are going to fight. As a start, numbers intend to board the City trams on Sunday, and decline to pay their fare, as it is Sunday trading. We hope the resolution will be carried out, and the officious Chief Constable taught a lesson he will not be likely to forget. It is high time that these Sunday laws were abolished altogether.

The clerical boast that Christianity and civilization are synonymous has little to do with facts. During the past month the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children dealt with nearly 4,000 cases of neglect and cruelty in England, Wales, and Ireland.

The President of the Baptist Union says that for the first time in the history of our land the Prime Minister was a Baptist. He might have added that he also has the power of selecting the bishops of the Established Church.

A correspondent informs us that at Fort Matilda Camp, Greenock, the Y.M.C.A. is selling cigarettes to the soldiers at a halfpenny per packet more than they can be purchased outside the camp. More appeals for sacrifice, we presume.

The Young Men's Christian Association is extending its commercialism still further, and has opened hostels for officers in Grosvenor Gardens, Belgrave Square, Eaton Square, and other similarly dangerous parts of the fighting lines. They contain lounges, dining-rooms, billiard-rooms, bedrooms, baths, and kitchens. The Church Army officials will be lost in admiration at the business activities of their Unsectarian rivals.

The Rev. T. A. Lacey, M.A., contributes to the Church Times for May 11 a most remarkable sermon, entitled "Peril of Idolatry," being "The University Sermon Preached at St. Mary's, Oxford." It is one of the ablest, most original, and ingenious discourses we have read for a long time. The text is, "Little children, keep yourselves from idols" (1 John v. 21). The preacher begins thus:—

> What is an idol? It is a fiction of the imagination substituted for the truth of God. If you would know God, you must keep yourselves from idols

St. John would probably be startled, if not shocked, could he but see that extremely clever definition. We confess that it has completely fascinated us, especially in its practical applications.

What strikes us most is Mr. Lacey's exceeding frankness. He says:—

> We try to make an image of God by art and man's device; whether we use gold and silver, or such stuff as dreams are made of, matters nothing; we can hardly help doing this, but we can hold ourselves from thinking that the Godhead is like the image that we have made.

Capital! If God does not resemble the images believers make of him, what in heaven or on earth is he like, then? If the images are but idols, or fictions of the imagination, how can anybody know anything at all about God? We believe that all worship is idolatry, and Mr. Lacey says nothing that even tends to prove the contrary.

The most remarkable portion of this extraordinary sermon is that which deals with doctrine of God. Mr. Lacey speaks of the physical or cosmic side of this dogma, portraying God "as framing the universe in such sort that all proceeds according to a fixed order, unswerving, determinate, or inexorable necessity; and as framing ourselves in such sort that we can more or less accurately ascertain the course that is prescribed," that, in fact, "we shall be a part of the fixed order." Such is the scheme, and it is delightfully simple. "It affords a fairly consistent account of most phenomena, and can be squared with most theories of the universe." There is here a slight suggestion of what some scientists call natural knowledge; and it is barely possible that the preacher may have heard that there is such a thing as science.

Yes, the scheme is delightfully simple and wonderfully flexible; but with all its simplicity and flexibility, "will it fit in with Christian doctrine? Is it permissible so to image God? Or is this an idol?" Alas, it is but an idol, it does not fit in with "the phenomenon of sin." The scientific conception of the universe must be abandoned, the so-called facts of revelation and experience being in direct conflict with it. Mr. Lacey's conclusion, however intellectually absurd, is at least courageous and consistent with his creed. It is as follows:—

> I am looking for the moment only at the fundamental doctrine of the Fatherhood of God and the free sonship of man. Accept this, and that beautiful cosmic scheme of indefensible law falls to pieces.

No one can be at one and the same time a thorough-going scientist and a whole-hearted Christian believer.

In a leading article on "A Shakespeare Day," the Daily Telegraph points out that Shakespeare "belongs to all schools, except that of the Puritans and Philistines. With these he has nothing in common, and as they were his enemies in his lifetime, so are they his enemies still." There is a refreshing frankness in these remarks, but, it must be remembered, Shakespeare has been dead three hundred years, and newspaper writers find everything out in time.

Llanfairfechan Council have decided to ask all vendors of comic postcards in the town to cover them over on Sundays. Evidently, smiles are sinful to the followers of the Man of Sorrows.

A daily paper points out that "John Brown's Body" is an example of a song tune fitted to a hymn, and that a few years ago the air of "Poor Mary Ann" was used similarly. Why does the paper omit reference to the Salvation Army, which has adopted music-hall tunes for hymns for the past forty years?

Here is an amusing experience from a correspondent, home on leave, concerning "War Shrines":—

> I arrived home late on a Saturday night, and on Sunday morning heard that a "War Shrine," given by a local lady to the village, was to be dedicated the same evening. I inspected same, to find my name thereon, and as it had plenty of religious references, I determined to be in at the kill. I arrived when the ceremony was in progress.
> Scene: The vicar, the donor, and her husband surrounded by the villagers. I approached the husband, who was nearest, and voiced my objections. Hurried consultation with his wife, which seemed to upset the good lady, and I was assured it was all right. However, as the parson was still "carrying on," I again waded in and gave them to understand that I would speak out unless something was done. Here the vicar was called in to the conference, and I was informed my name would be taken off.
> When the time came for the names to be read out I stepped in and told the parson I strongly objected to my name being connected with it.
> My name was not given out, and at the close of the meeting the vicar announced that my name would be erased from the memorial owing to my objections to have it associated with religion. Caused quite a buzz in the congregation. Had the usual discussion with the vicar, who assured me that I could not be an Atheist. There is no such thing, he said, but declined to argue.
> Where my name was is now a black mark. Quite an honour, eh!

We wonder how many Freethinkers have been pilloried as Christians on these War Shrines?

The Pope, who is making further efforts for peace, has given orders to all Catholic bishops to pray for peace, and has also written a new prayer to the Virgin, "Queen of Peace, pray for us." As the son has long been styled the Prince of Peace, there will soon be a Pacifist Royal Family in the Celestial regions.

The boycotting of Freethinkers is not often admitted by Christians, but Canon Maclean said at Church House, Westminster, that in a University calendar there was an entry, "Charles Bradlaugh died." When their attention was called to it, they substituted the name of King Charles the First.

The newspaper stories of the German body-boiling factories, which surely touches the high water-mark of war-time credulity, and the use of the products for—among other things—margarine, reminds us that in another "Holy War," the Crusades, human flesh was eaten when other food fell short. This is asserted by Christian, not Mohammedan, writers. Ansa Connena says that the Crusaders, who were led by Peter the Hermit, roasted young children and ate them; and, among others, the Abbot Guibert and Raoul de Cæn admit the practice. Von Sybel, in his history, cites an old French ballad which gives a circumstantial account of the practice. When the Crusaders were before Antioch, there was a popular leader nicknamed King Tafur, and:—

> In evil case the army stood, their stores of food were spent;
> Peter, the Holy Hermit, he sat before his tent.
> Then came to him the King Tafur, and with him fifty score
> Of men at arms, not one of them but hunger gnawed him sore.
> "Thou Holy Hermit, counsel us, and help us at our need; > Help, for God's grace, these starving men with wherewithal to feed."
> But Peter answered, "Out, ye drones; a helpless pack that cry,
> While all unburied round about the slaughtered Paynim lie;
> A dainty dish is Paynim flesh, with salt and roasting due."
> "Now by my fay," quoth King Tafur, "the Hermit sayeth true."
> Then fared he forth the Hermit's tent, and sent his menye out
> More than ten thousand, where in heaps the Paynim lay about.

And the ballad goes on to relate full details of this pious cannibalistic feast. Quite nice and elevating things are these "Holy Wars," from the Crusades down to the War of 1914 ——?

Owing to the paper shortage, the discontinuance of the weekly publication of a sermon by Charles Spurgeon is announced. There are some benefits from war, after all. These sermons have been appearing for sixty-two years, so the world will be none the worse for a rest.

The wife of "General" Booth expresses her alarm over "the inability of the masses to understand God." We do not know that this difficulty is confined to the "masses." It is pretty general. And how can one understand a God who manages the world in the way this one is managed? With millions of his children butchering one another in his name, and he all the time taking not the slightest notice, one does feel like asking what the devil God is after, anyway? Mrs. Booth doesn't know, evidently. All she does is to shake her head and say that God cannot be understood by the intellect, only the heart. Why not the liver? At any rate, we agree that the less one applies one's intellect to God, the better—for God.

The London County Council are making arrangements to employ "suitable clergymen" as teachers in their schools for the duration of the War. Eighteen have offered themselves, and fourteen have been accepted. Meanwhile, the London Teachers' Association have protested against the employment of ministers of religion as teachers in schools. It does, indeed, throw a strong light upon the value of the professed interest in education that, for the sake of the addition to the Army of a quite insignificant number of soldiers, the schools should be emptied of many of their trained men. We have no hesitation in saying that, of all our institutions, the schools should have been kept at their utmost level of efficiency. But we have had deliberate statements from Tribunals that education is not a work of national importance. And we are afraid that this is the attitude of large numbers of the public. The only profession wholly exempt remains that of the clergy. Were Carlyle still alive, he would have found no cause for modifying his famous description of the mental character of the British public.

Worth Consideration.

IT is a fact that well within the reach of every one of our readers there is another person—a man or a woman—who would gladly become a subscriber to the Freethinker if he, or she, only knew of its existence. There is only one way in which these people can know of its existence, and that is by you introducing it to them.

This is a plan by which much help can be given the cause at a minimum expenditure of trouble.

The Freethinker is not a commercial concern. It does not make money, it does not exist to make money. It exists to promote the interests of a great cause, and to that end editor, contributors, and readers, are members of a "Great Company." The above suggestion indicates a way in which everyone may lend a hand.

We want to secure that neglected neighbour. The sooner his name is on the subscriber's list—either at this office, or at some local newsagents—the better.

The Bowman Case—A Final Triumph.

At last we are able to say something definite about the Bowman Case, and it is worth the saying. On Monday, May 14—we are writing this on the 15th—the House of Lords followed the judgments of the Courts of Appeal, the Chancery Court, and the hearing in Chambers by deciding in favour of the Secular Society, Limited. There were five Law Lords, each delivering an independent, a lengthy, and an important judgment. Four of the judgments—those of Lords Buckmaster, Parker, Sumner, and Dunedin—were strongly in favour of the Society, that of the Lord Chancellor was against. Of the nature and quality of that judgment our readers are in a position to form an opinion as we reprint it in another part of this issue. The other judgments—the favourable ones—will be published next week. We have still to get judgment as to costs, but the great decision is given.

We have neither space nor time to deal at length with the subject this week. There are many important issues opened by this judgment, and we prefer to write upon it more deliberately later. The fight has been a long and costly one. Personally, we have never had much doubt as to the result of the fight, but the law is an uncertain quantity, and it would be idle to pretend that we did not breathe a sigh of relief when that part of the affair was ended. Probably our opponents thought that we could be worn out, or that the case would break down for want of funds. Well, we are not easy folk to wear out, and we found friends who were quite ready to provide the necessary sinews of war.

So we conclude for the moment by congratulating the Freethought movement on a splendid ending to a great fight, and with a word of regret that the one who planned and established the Secular Society, Limited, was not present to share in the crowning triumph.

Chapman Cohen.

To Correspondents.

F. Rose (Bloemfontein).—Your letter safely to hand with remittance, which has been attended to We are greatly pleased by your securing us the two new subscribers. That is a very practical form of assistance.

R. F. Mackenzie.—Instructions given to Shop Manager as requested. Thanks for compliments to the "Man at the Wheel." We do honestly think that ours is the "better job," but why call it thankless? We know that our work is appreciated by thousands, and if it were not, that would be an extra inducement until they appreciated the necessity of Freethought. And unless one works for that end in our movement, one soon ceases to work altogether.

Will the gentleman who left at this office a volume of the N. R. please send on his address?

G. W. Whitfield (Prescot).—We have sent on the papers, but please write more fully on what it is you desire our help.

J. W. Hugh.—The Two Worlds, a weekly paper, will give you full accounts of where such meetings are held. They are open to the public.

S. A.—Yes, we are pleased to say that many of our readers are joining heartily in the work of getting new subscribers. It is the kind of help we like most, if only because it is a permanent help.

Shaw Maxwell.—Received. Will appear as soon as possible, but we are much pressed for space for a few weeks.

F. H. Curtice.—Quite a good story.

F. Dorrington.—Letter received, and handed on.

G. Grove.—Pleased to have your appreciation of the "three glorious lectures" at South Place. It is good of you to undertake the responsibility for the extra copies of the paper.

Sugar Plums.

Owing to the sudden demands on our space due to the report of the Bowman Judgment, we are obliged to delete a deal of paragraphic matter this week, and to leave a number of letters unanswered. We beg the indulgence of our readers for the latter. We have received a number of letters and telegrams congratulating us on the result of the Bowman case, which we can only acknowledge this week in this way. Something of importance on the matter, and in connection with its effects on the future of our movement may be said at the Whit-Sunday Conference by Mr. Cohen.

In spite of the sudden burst of summer weather, there was a good audience at South Place on Sunday last to listen to Mr. Harry Snell. The lecturer was in first-class form, and his address received, as it deserved, the closest attention and the heartiest applause. Mr. Snell, we regret to say, is suffering from an accident experienced some time ago, and is arranging to leave London for awhile. Otherwise we had hoped to have him as one of the speakers at the Conference evening meeting.

On the Conference Agenda, published last week, there was a motion in favour of Secular Education in State Schools. That is of old standing, and generally may be taken as a reaffirmation of one of the Society's principles. But it is more than this. The new Minister of Education is a little different from those who have previously occupied that position, and there are special reasons why as many resolutions as are possible should reach him in favour of a policy of Secular Education. We cannot say more now, but we strongly urge upon Secular Societies all over the country, and all other Societies that believe in the policy of Secular Education, to send resolutions in its favour to Mr. Fisher as speedily as possible. Freethinkers who are on the councils of trade organizations might help considerably in this matter.

We warned Mr. Fisher, the Minister for Education, that the religious question in schools could not be overcome by saying nothing about it. It is there and must be faced. A sub-committee of the National Society is now about to issue a report demanding a more careful and more elaborate training of teachers in religious knowledge. The point of view taken up is, apparently, that "At present it is easy for young men and women to become certificated and trained teachers without any effective religious instruction as a part of their regular course, and we are thus in danger of finding our elementary education more or less secularized." This should be quite enough to show that our warning was justified, and against the constant interventions of sectarian interests in education there is only one defence. Leave religion to the Churches, and let the State keep to its own legitimate business.

The Conway Memorial Lecture for this year was delivered by Mr. Israel Zangwill, and the South Place Institute was crowded to its utmost capacity by people eager to hear it. It was an exceptionally brilliant performance, punctuated by frequent applause from an audience thrilled by its dazzling witticisms and sparkling epigrams. It is now published in a handsome little volume by Messrs. Watts & Co., and will amply repay careful perusal. It is entitled The Principle of Nationality. We can heartily recommend it, and promise a rare treat to those who read it.

The London County Council has not yet decided to withdraw its prohibition of the sale of literature in the public parks—but that sale still goes on. The Freethinker and various pamphlets were again sold on Sunday last—but nothing happened. No names and addresses were taken. We hope this is an indication that the Parks Committee is realizing the unreasonable and unwarrantable nature of its interference with a long-standing public right.

The Musical Scale in Primitive Culture.

There was no power more calculated to work in the region of divinity than the idealizing power which music must have possessed over rude minds.—J. Donovan, "Lyre to Muse."

MUSICAL scales, as we know, are purely factitious things, since there is, generally speaking, no reason, either musical or mathematical, why scales (per se) should contain just a certain number of notes. I do not intend to burden the reader with the various fanciful theses as to how our modern scale grew, from a one-note scale to a two-note scale, and so on, until it arrived at the pentatonic and the heptatonic. Indeed, what notes primitive man chose at the outset, as Sir Hubert Parry has said, were, probably, "very much a matter of accident," and, naturally, they were only approximate. It was only in the course of ages, when the social pact became more definite, that the consensus of opinion, possibly with the help of some primitive instrument, regulated the actual pitch of the notes. As to the actual number of the notes within the octave, which comprised the scale, it has often occurred to me, that primitive religious cults played no unimportant part in this, since in the early stages of culture the one factor which determined, or more properly we should say, consecrated everything, was the tribal or national cult.

Whether the pentatonic (or five-note scale) passed to the heptatonic (or seven-note scale), or whether they were of independent development, need not concern us. We know almost positively that the pentatonic scale belongs to the Eastern Asiatics, the Chinese, Japanese, Javese, Siamese, etc., whilst the heptatonic is to be found with the Western Asiatics, the Arameans, Egyptians, Arabs, etc. China was, probably, the cradle of the pentatonic scale, and I would like to point out that the number five was also the sacred or mystic number of the primitive cultus of the Chinese. They believed in five primordial elements, five antedeluvian emperors, five human relations, five virtues, five ranks of nobility, five points of the earth, five household gods, five colours, five viscera, etc. I think, therefore, that it would not be unreasonable to suppose that the pentatonic scale had its origin in, or was intimately connected with, this cult of a sacred five.

The music of modern Europe, however, is based upon the heptatonic or seven-note scale. This was borrowed from Greece, who received it, no doubt, from the Western Asiatics. With the latter, as I will endeavour to show, this heptatonic scale would appear to have had a similar origin, being bound up with the cultus idea of a "sacred seven." Gerald Massey tells us that seven was the primordial figure, the perfect number. J. M. Wheeler is of opinion that the idea of the "sacred seven" arose out of nature-worship. With three groups of the Western Asiatics, the Arameans, Hebrews, and Arabs, a decidedly common likeness is reflected in their religious beliefs. At certain stages, all the Semites adored various phases of nature, and sun-gods were common to the Arameans, Hebrews, and Arabs. Now, this nature-worship, which gave rise to the sacred periodic number seven, possibly played, as we have said, no unimportant part in the fixing of the heptatonic scale. With the Arameans this scale was closely related to the cultus. They associated the various intervals with the seasons, symbolizing the relation of spring to autumn by the fourth, and of spring to winter by a fifth and an octave. The Egyptians worshipped seven planets, and Herodotus tells us that they had seven castes, etc. They also associated their seven-note scale with the cultus, and the priests, says Plato, would not allow the slightest deviation from the system. With the Hebraic group the number seven was equally sacred. The Kabbalistic Sepher Yesirah says that there were seven planets, seven gates in man, seven double consonants, seven worlds, seven heavens, seven lands, seven seas, seven rivers, seven deserts, seven days in the week, seven weeks from Passover to Pentecost, etc., "hence God," we are told, "loves the number seven." The Bible is full of the powers and significance of the number seven, and J. M. Wheeler, who has a chapter on "sacred sevens" in his Bible Studies, says very aptly, that the Holy Writ begins in Genesis with a seven and ends in the Apocalypse with a series of sevens.[1] What the actual scale was of the Hebrews, we have no precise information, but it is generally accepted that it was identical with that of the Arameans and Egyptians, i.e., the seven-note scale.

With the Arabs of pre-Islamic and early Islamic days, the sacred and mystic seven was just as potent a factor as with the Arameans and Hebrews. They swore by seven bloody stones. When Umar went to Mecca to pay homage to Mahomet he was accompanied by seventy of the faithful. After the battle of Mount Uhud, which settled the fortunes of Islam, seven prayers were said over Hamza's body. Mahomet dreamt that he was conducted by the angel Gabriel to seven heavens. Here he saw the extraordinary angel with seventy thousand heads, each head having seventy thousand mouths, each mouth with seventy thousand tongues, and each tongue uttering seventy thousand different voices. When Mahomet approached the throne of grace, seventy thousand veils separated him from God. The prophet saw seventy thousand angels, with seventy thousand veils, and when the last veil was lifted seventy million more angels were revealed, besides seventy thousand others who looked after the veils. When Mahomet dreamt that he possessed the keys of the Kaaba, and set out for Mecca, he took with him seventy camels, which were attended by seven hundred servants. The Arabs, too, had a seven-note scale.

From this evidence of the prevalence of the extreme veneration for the number seven, it is not at all unlikely that the heptatonic scale arose out of nature-worship and the consecration of this periodic number. In primitive times, perhaps, none of the arts existed apart from the tribal or national cult, and music certainly did not. The latter formed the most essential part of ritual, and the slightest deviation from its rule and custom was sternly forbidden. The "hedging" of the notes of the scale with a certain "divinity," as we have mentioned with the ancients, has its survival in the Christian Church to-day. In the East they still consecrate certain notes of the scale to special church periods, and the Syrians devote a note of the scale to each day of the week. In the early days of Christianity the third note of the scale was looked upon with extreme veneration if not awe, as being symbolical of the Triune God, and its use as a consonance was tabooed. This opposition of the Church to the consonance of the third was, indeed, a stumbling-block to the development of harmony.

H. GEORGE FARMER.

[1] En passant, I would like to call the attention of those interested in the subject dealt with by Wheeler in the first chapter of his Bible Studies: Phallic Worship, etc., to a passage in the Bible which I have not seen alluded to by any other writers. It occurs in 1 Chron. xxv. 5 and 6, as follows: "And God gave to Heman fourteen sons and three daughters.....all these were under the hands of their father for song in the house of the Lord." I suggest, that since females were not allowed in sacred precincts for this purpose, as we know from the Talmud, that singer is merely a euphemism for kadeshah.

In an article on the food question, a daily paper remarks: "Of course, corn-grinding is as old as history itself." Just so! And so is "grinding the face of the poor."

Science and Spiritualism.

I say, advisedly, that scientists, however eminent, are emphatically not the people to investigate these matters. If Lombroso and Zollner could return again from the dead, and sit, with Sir William Crookes, as a committee to investigate, say the mysteries worked by Mr. Maskelyne, either on his own ground or on theirs, does anyone suppose that they would detect a single one of his secrets? Spiritualists may think so, but conjurers know better. The scientist who sits where he is told to sit and looks where he is told to look is the ideal subject for the wiles of the conjurer or the medium, and before him effects can be brought off that would be impossible before an audience of schoolboys.—William Marriott, "On the Edge of the Unknown," "Pearson's Magazine" (June, 1910), pp. 607-8.

All depends, not upon what is done, but upon the mental disposition of the spectator. Little by little, through neglect, through mal-observation and lapses of memory, through an unwillingness to mistrust the reports of an excited consciousness, caution is abandoned and credulity enters. Mediums are actually seen flying out of one window and in through another. The wildest and most far-fetched fantastic explanation is preferred above a simple one; the bounds of the normal are passed; real hallucinations set in; conduct becomes irrational, and a state hardly distinguishable from insanity ensues. .....Error, like truth, flourishes in crowds. At the hearth of sympathy each finds a home. The fanatical lead, the saner follow. When a person of nervous temperament, not strongly independent in thought and action, enters a spiritualistic circle, where he is constantly surrounded by confident believers, all eager to have him share their sacred visions and profound revelations, where the atmosphere is replete with miracles, and every chair and table may at any time be transformed into a proof of the supernatural, is it strange that he soon becomes affected by the contagion of belief that surrounds him?—Professor J. Jastrow, "Fact and Fable in Psychology," p. 132.

TABLE-RAPPING is one of the commonest phenomena of the Spiritualist seance. Once the knack of producing the raps has been acquired, it is the most mystifying, the easiest, and the safest of all the medium's bag of tricks. It requires no apparatus, and there is no danger of discovery; hence its popularity among mediums. Table-turning and table-rapping generally form the introduction to the greater marvels of Spiritualism. Once the beginner is firmly grounded in a belief in these phenomena as the work of spirits, the rest is easy; he abandons his critical attitude, and is ready to accept any tricks the medium cares to play.

Although the phenomena is known as table-rapping, the raps are in fact not produced on the table. The name itself is a fraud, for it leads the sitters to concentrate their attention upon the table and upon the medium's hands, neither of which are concerned with the production of the raps, which can be produced quite as well without a table. As a matter of fact, the inventors of this fraud —the Fox sisters, in America—first produced the mysterious raps while lying in bed. It is to these two sisters, aged respectively twelve and fifteen, that we may ascribe the birth of modern Spiritualism—not that they were the first to profess to communicate with spirits; but the interest created by the phenomena produced by these two children spread like a prairie fire. Professional mediums sprung up in all directions. It was, as we have seen, the performance of the Fox girls that first attracted Daniel Dunglas Home to Spiritualism. In fact, the movement started by these two skittish girls became world-wide.

It was in America, in a small farmhouse—about the size of an English labourer's cottage—in Hydesville, a little village in the township of Arcadia, in Wayne County of the State of New York, that the mysterious rappings were first heard in March, 1848. The house was then in the occupation of a farmer, one John D. Fox, a Methodist by religious conviction, who had entered upon the tenancy during the previous year. The household consisted of the farmer, his wife Margaret, and two unmarried daughters, Margaretta and Katie. There was also a married son, living about two miles away, who plays no part in this history, and a married daughter, Mrs. Fish, afterwards successively Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Underhill, living in Rochester, N.Y., who appear to have been the real author of all the mischief, although it was through the two girls that the public first became acquainted with the rappings. According to Podmore: "On the evening of the 31st of March, 1848, the Fox family, who, by their own account, had passed several disturbed nights previously by reason of the raps and other noises in the house, went to bed early, in order to make up their arrears of sleep. What follows is based upon the testimony of the Foxes. The girls were already in bed, and their parents—who occupied another bed in the same room—were about to follow, when the raps were again heard. On this occasion, in reply to a challenge given by one of the girls, the raps repeated, sound for sound, the noises which she made by snapping her fingers, and again and again gave the number of raps asked for. At this proof of an intelligent cause for the raps, Mrs. Fox, prescient that the matter was one of no ordinary moment, resolved to call in her friends and neighbours, that they also might bear witness."[1]

On the two following days hundreds of people came to witness the marvel, and in the course of the next two or three years the rappings spread throughout the greater part of the Eastern States. In 1851 it was estimated that there were a hundred mediums in New York City, and fifty or sixty private circles in Philadelphia. "The Fox family—the mother and the three daughters"—says Podmore, "practised no unwise parsimony of their spiritual gifts. In the course of the years 1849 and 1850 they appear to have given demonstrations of their power in several large towns before considerable audiences. Their claims to supernormal power did not, of course, escape challenge. Again and again committees were appointed to examine the subject and report. But for some time the source of the rappings remained inexplicable."[2]

Horace Greeley publicly testified to the genuineness of the Fox girls' performance. Commenting on a visit they paid to New York, in his paper, the New York Tribune, in August, 1850, he says that during a stay of several weeks in New York, they were subjected to every reasonable test; their rooms at the hotel had been repeatedly searched; "They have been all unconsciously placed on a glass surface concealed under the carpet, in order to interrupt electric vibrations; they have been disrobed by a committee of ladies appointed without notice, and insisting that neither of them should leave the room until the investigation had been made, etc.; yet we believe no one to this moment pretends that he has detected either of them in producing or causing the Rappings"; and concludes: "Whatever may be the origin or the cause of the 'Rappings,' the ladies in whose presence they occur do not make them. We tested this thoroughly, and to our entire satisfaction."[3]

But the day of detection was at hand. A fraud cannot be publicly exploited for ever. The very success which attends their career, which at the beginning carries everything before them, contains the seeds of their ultimate defeat; for a small circle who have been trained into implicit belief in the supernormal phenomena may be kept permanently at that stage of belief. But when the medium appears before the world and challenges public inquiry, the rational-minded begin to apply the scientific method to these marvels, and they melt like ice before the fire.

In December of the same year, the Fox girls came to Buffalo, N.Y., where they stayed for some weeks, giving public exhibitions of their marvellous powers. Among those who visited them were three doctors—Flint, Lee, and Coventry. These gentlemen wrote a joint letter to a local newspaper, pointing out that the rappings could be explained by movements of the knee-joints, and stating that a lady of their acquaintance had actually produced similar sounds by that means. Mrs. Fish, the married sister of the Fox girls, promptly challenged the doctors to prove the truth of their theory at a personal interview, confident that nothing could prevent the raps from being heard, and trusting in the well-known difficulty always experienced in locating a sound unless the object causing it can be seen in motion. In the matter of preventing the rapping, they utterly deceived themselves; the three doctors were skilled anatomists, and came prepared with a very definite and, as it proved, successful test. The two Fox girls were seated on a sofa, and immediately commenced business with a series of loud raps in rapid succession. The spirits were then asked whether they would respond to questions; to which they rapped out an assent. The report continues as follows: "The two females were then seated upon two chairs placed near together, their heels resting on cushions, their lower limbs extended, with the toes elevated, and the feet separated from each other. The object of this experiment was to secure a position in which the ligaments of the knee-joints should be made tense, and no opportunity offered to make pressure with the foot. We were pretty well satisfied that the displacement of the bones requisite for the sounds could not be effected unless a fulcrum were obtained by resting one foot upon the other, or on some resisting body. The company, seated in a semicircle, quietly waited for the 'manifestations' for more than half an hour, but the 'spirits,' generally so noisy, were now dumb.....On resuming the usual position on the sofa, the feet resting on the floor, knockings very soon began to be heard. It was then suggested that some other experiment be made. This was assented to, notwithstanding the first was, in our minds, amply conclusive. The experiment selected was, that the knees of the two females should be firmly grasped, with the hands so applied that any lateral movement of the bones was made perceptible to the touch. The pressure was made through the dress.....The hands were kept in apposition for several minutes at a time, and the experiment repeated frequently for the course of an hour or more with negative results; that is to say, there were plenty of raps when the knees were not held and none when the hands were applied save once. As the pressure was intentionally relaxed (Dr. Lee being the holder), two or three faint, single raps were heard, and Dr. Lee immediately averred that the motion of the bone was plainly perceptible to him. The experiment of seizing the knees as quickly as possible when the knockings first commenced was tried several times, but always with the effect of putting an immediate quietus upon the manifestations."[1] Thus, by a couple of simple scientific tests, the secret was revealed. "One Chauncey Burr," says Podmore, "earned some fame at this time by giving lectures on Spiritualism, in which he demonstrated that the raps could be produced by the toe-joints."

Conference Notes.

THE appearance of the Conference Agenda in last week's issue is the final signal to our Branches to call their meetings for the discussions of the resolution, and the giving of the necessary instructions to the delegates who are to represent them at the Business meetings on Whit Sunday.

Individual members are reminded that their subscriptions became due on January 1, 1917, and only cards of membership covering this year will entitle them to be present at the Conference proper, and to speak and vote. These are obtained from me direct. Branch cards through their secretaries. The Conference meetings will be held this year at South Place Institute. This well known and somewhat historic building is most accessible from all parts of London, being bounded by Moorgate Street Tube and Electric Railway on one side, and Liverpool and Broad Street stations on the other. Just the proverbial "stone's throw" from all of them. Apart from the business transactions, this gathering gives London, as well as Provincial members, an opportunity of meeting the officials and becoming acquainted with each other. Lady members are specially welcomed.

Once upon a time, before the War, these reunions were most pleasurable and well attended, and the Conference luncheon and Monday excursion were functions eagerly looked forward to. But, alas! the difficulties of transit and the chameleon-like antics of the Food Controller have placed an embargo on the two latter, but such arrangements as are possible will be made. Still, we shall take our pleasures and food, like our medicine, in tabloid form, and cheered by the splendid victory achieved by the Secular Society, Limited, in the Bowman Case, confirming the legality of bequests to Secular Societies for all time, make no wry faces.

Attendance from the Provinces may not be great in the circumstances, but the quantity will be counterbalanced by the quality, and the success of our evening meeting is assured by reference to the list of speakers. In the matter of platform the N. S. S. has always maintained its traditions.

Friends who have not yet made their hotel arrangements can rely upon the best efforts of the office if they will state the length of their stay and the class of accommodation required, but this notice should be given immediately.

REPORT OF EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON MAY 3.

The President, Mr. C. Cohen, in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Brandes, Gorniot, Leat, Neate, Nearey, Roger, Thurlow, Wood, Miss Kough, Miss Pankhurst, Miss Stanley, and the Secretary.

Minutes of last meeting read and confirmed.

New members were admitted for Falkirk, Newcastle, Manchester, South London, Swansea, and the Parent Society.

Permission was granted for the formation of "The Swansea and District" Branch of the Society.

Final arrangements for outdoor propaganda were reported.

The President reported the decision arrived at by the last meeting of the L.C.C. Protest Committee, and the Executive reaffirmed their decision to continue the sale of the Freethinker at all outdoor meetings on May 6.

The President and Secretary reported upon the case at Clydebank in which Police Court officials had deprived a witness of his legal right to affirm on March 12 last. Letters written to the Secretary for Scotland had received formal acknowledgment only. Failing some definite reply, arrangements were being made to publicly ventilate the matter.

Various notices of motion for the Conference Agenda were discussed, and remitted to the Agenda Committee.

Arrangements were also made for the Conference evening meeting.

HOUSE OF LORDS, MONDAY, MAY 14, 1917.

Lords Present:

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, LORD DUNEDIN, LORD SUMNER, LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON, LORD BUCKMASTER.

JUDGMENT.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, the question in this case is as to the validity of a bequest of residue to the Respondents, The Secular Society, Limited. The right of the Respondents to payment was attacked by the present Appellants, the next of kin of the Testator, upon the ground that the objects of the Respondent Society were such that the bequest was not enforceable. The Respondents took out an Originating Summons, dated November 25, 1914, for the payment over of the residue to them. Mr. Justice Joyce decided in their favour, and his decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal. The decision of the case must turn upon the proper construction of the Memorandum of Association of the Respondent Society, and the view to be taken of the law of England with regard to bequests for such purposes as are therein enumerated.

> (3) The objects for which the Company is formed are—(a) To promote, in such ways as may from time to time be determined, the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief; and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. (b) To promote the utmost freedom of inquiry and the publication of its discoveries. (c) To promote the secularization of the State, so that religious tests and observances may be banished from the Legislature, the Executive, and the Judiciary. (d) To promote the abolition of all support, patronage, or favour by the State of any particular form or forms of religion. (e) To promote universal Secular Education, without any religious teaching in public schools maintained in any way by Municipal rates or Imperial taxation. (f) To promote an alteration in the laws concerning religion, so that all forms of opinion may have the same legal rights of propaganda and endowment. (g) To promote the recognition by the State of marriage as a purely civil contract, leaving its religious sanctions to the judgment and determination of individual citizens. (h) To promote the recognition of Sunday by the State as a purely civil institution for the benefit of the people and the repeal of all Sabbatarian laws devised and operating in the interests of religious sects, religious observances, or religious ideas.

In my opinion the governing object of the Society is that which is stated in paragraph 3 (a) of the Memorandum of Association, and the other objects stated in the Memorandum under heads (b) to (c) of the third paragraph are subsidiary. I agree with what is said by the Founder of the Respondent Society in an article from the Freethinker, June 19, 1898, which is in evidence, "Clause A is of the highest importance and governs everything else." It was argued on behalf of the Respondents that some, at all events, of the objects of the Society are not affected by any taint of illegality, e.g., 3 (d) and (e), which state Disestablishment and Universal Secular Education as objects to be promoted, are in themselves harmless. It is, of course, the fact that either of these two objects may be advocated from motives which are entirely friendly to religion. But if (a) is the governing object, then these and all the other clauses in the Memorandum must be read by its light; in other words, all the other clauses in the third paragraph are so many ways of carrying into practical application the principle enunciated in the first paragraph of Clause 3. That clause, in my opinion, lays down quite clearly that human conduct should not be based upon supernatural belief. This amounts to a negation of all religion, including of course the Christian religion, as governing human conduct. If the influence of supernatural motives is to be eliminated, the Christian religion is discarded in common with all forms of religion in the ordinary sense of the term. I think, therefore, that the Memorandum shows that the object of the Society was to promote in various ways the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge only, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. Is a legacy in favour of a Society which exists for such a purpose enforceable by English law?

Two preliminary points were taken on behalf of the Respondents. They contended, firstly, that the Certificate of Incorporation is conclusive to show that the objects of the Society are not unlawful, and, secondly, that some of the objects were not unlawful, and that it cannot be presumed that the legacy in question would be applied to any but lawful objects. We were informed that these points were argued on behalf of the Respondents in the Court of Appeal. No notice is taken of either of them in any of the Judgments, and the Court must have considered that they had been disposed of in the course of the argument. In my opinion neither is tenable. The Society was registered on May 27, 1898, as a Company limited by guarantee under the Companies Acts. The Statute then in force was the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Victoria, chapter 89). The 18th section deals with the effect of registration, and enacts that the Certificate of Incorporation shall be conclusive evidence that all the requisitions of the Act in respect of registration have been complied with, and Section 192 repeats this provision and adds that the certificate is to be conclusive evidence that the Company is authorized to be registered under the Acts. The amending Act of 1900 (63 and 64 Victoria, chapter 148) enacts by its first section that the certificate shall be conclusive evidence that all the requisitions of the Companies Acts in respect of registration and in matters precedent and incidental thereto have been complied with, and that the association is a company authorized to be registered and duly registered under the Companies Act. This provision appears to have been introduced into the Act of 1900 to get rid of some doubts which had been raised by what was said in the case of The National Debenture Corporation (1891) 2 Chancery, 505, to the effect that if, in fact, only six persons had subscribed the memorandum, incorporation would not have been validly effected, and it is repeated in the 17th Section of the Companies Consolidation Act, 1908 (8 Edward VII, chapter 69). It was argued before us that the Society could not have been properly incorporated if its objects were illegal, and that as the certificate is conclusive to show that the Company is one authorized to be registered and duly registered, it follows that it cannot for any purpose be contended that the objects are illegal. In my opinion this argument is an attempt to extend the effect of these enactments beyond their fair meaning and manifest object. What the Legislature was dealing with was the validity of the incorporation, and it is for the purpose of incorporation, and for this purpose only, that the certificate is made conclusive. This first preliminary point, in my opinion, fails. The second point also fails on the true construction of the memorandum with which I have dealt above. Taken in themselves, some of the objects, as stated in the memorandum, may be harmless, but they cannot be taken by themselves. They are mere applications of the governing principle stated in 3 (a), and we are driven back upon the question whether that object is legal.

Mr. Talbot, on behalf of the Appellants, contended that it was illegal on two grounds: First, that it is criminal to attack the Christian religion, however decent and temperate may be the form of attack. Second, that a Court of law will not assist in the promotion of such objects as that for which this Society is formed, whether they are criminal or not.

In support of the first of these propositions, it was contended that to attack the Christian religion is blasphemy by the Common Law of England, and that the view put forward upon this subject by the late Lord Chief Justice Coleridge is erroneous. Lord Coleridge laid it down in the case of Rex v. Ramsey and Foote (15 Cox C. C. 231) that "if the decencies of controversy are observed, even the fundamentals of religion may be attacked without the writer being guilty of blasphemy." This view was controverted by Sir James Fitzjames Stephens, who, in his History of the Criminal Law, vol. ii., pp. 449-476, on a review of the authorities, maintained that blasphemy consisted in the character of the matter published and not in the manner in which it is stated, and that any attack on the Christian religion, in whatever language expressed, constituted the offence of blasphemy at Common Law. A reply to the arguments of Sir James Fitzjames Stephen was made by Mr. Aspland, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law, in a pamphlet, entitled The Law of Blasphemy, published in 1884, in which the authorities up to date are collected and examined. If Sir James Fitzjames Stephen's view be right any pamphlet or speech in promotion of the governing object of the Respondent Society would be criminal and in every sense illegal. In my opinion the Appellants have failed to establish that all attacks upon religion are at Common Law punishable as blasphemous. There are, no doubt, to be found in the cases many expresions to the effect that Christianity is part of the law of England, but no decision has been brought to our notice in which a conviction took place for the advocacy of principles at variance with Christianity, apart from circumstances of scurrility or intemperance of language.

The earliest prosecution for blasphemy in the Common Law Courts was in the reign of Charles II.; in earlier times probably such cases were dealt with by the Ecclesiastical Courts. The main cases on this subject prior to Rex v. Ramsey and Foote are (1) R. v. Taylor (1676) (1 Ventris 293); (2) R. v. Woolston (1729) (Fitzgibbon 64, 2 Strange, 834) (1 Barnardiston 162); (3) R. v. Paine (1812) 26 Howell's State Trials 654 (in connection with which R. v. Carlile 3 Barnwell and Alderson 167 and R. v. Eaton, 31 State Trials 927, should be referred to); (4) R. v. Waddington (1822) 1 B and C, 26; (5) R. v. Hetherington (1841) 5 Jur. 529, and 4 State Trials, New Series, 563). In the cases numbered 1, 3, 4 and 5, it is apparent on the face of the Reports that the language used was scurrilous and offensive. This is less apparent in the Reports of No. 2 (R. v. Woolston). But examination of the libels in respect of which Informations in that case were filed, viz., Mr. Woolston's first, second, third, and fourth discourses of the miracles of our Saviour shows that the sacred subjects treated by him were handled with a great deal of irreverence, and in many passages language was used by him that was blasphemous in every sense of the term. It is apparently with reference to this element that in a passage in the Report in 1 Barnardiston, page 143, the Court, in dealing with the second point made on behalf of Mr. Woolston, observed "That as the Christian religion was part of the law of the land, whatever derided that derided the law." The true view of the law of Blasphemy appears to me to be that expressed by Lord Denman in Regina v. Hetherington (4 State Trials, New Series, 563), which is substantially in accordance with that taken by Lord Coleridge in Regina v. Ramsey and Foote (15 Cox C.C., 231), and followed by Lord (then Mr.) Justice Phillimore in Rex v. Boulter (1908) 72 J.P. 188.

We have been referred by Lord Dunedin to the law of Scotland on this subject, as stated in Hume's Criminal Law (volume i., page 568), and it appears to be the case that in Scotland scurrility or indecency is an essential element of the crime of Blasphemy at Common Law. Certain Scotch Statutes which made it a crime to contravene certain doctrines have been repealed. The consequences of the view put forward on behalf of the Appellants would be somewhat startling, and in the absence of any actual decision to the contrary I think we must hold that the law of England on this point is the same as that of Scotland, and that the crime of Blasphemy is not constituted by a temperate attack on religion in which the decencies of controversy are maintained.

The Appellants, however, contended that whether criminal or not, the objects for which the Society was formed were such that the law would give no help for the recovery of funds to be applied in their promotion. The principle on which this part of the Appellant's case rested was very clearly stated by Baron Bramwell in Cowan v. Milbourn (1867), Law Reports 2 Exchequer 230. In the course of the argument Baron Bramwell said, at page 233, "An act may be illegal in the sense that it will not be recognized by the law as capable of being the foundation of any legal right, or that it may even deprive what it accompanies of that capacity, although it is followed by no penalty," and in the course of his Judgment (page 236) he expressed himself to the same effect. The principle is very familiar, and has been applied in innumerable cases. The question whether the present case falls within it demands a careful examination of the authorities.

VOL. XXXVII.—No. 21 SUNDAY MAY 27, 1917 PRICE TWOPENCE

A SECULAR CHARTER.

HISTORY was made in the House of Lords on Monday, May 14. For more than two years the Secular Society, Limited, has been fighting in one court after another, ostensibly to secure a legacy properly bequeathed it, really to establish a principle that will carry us another step along the road of mental emancipation. And the result has been a victory as complete as the limits of the case permitted. In all, nine judges of the highest eminence have dealt with the case. Of this number, eight were emphatically—some of them almost defiantly—in favour of the Society. Better still, the verdict is final. Quite safely it may be said that the position of the Secular Society, Limited, is for the future unchallengable.

Only one thing was wanting, and that has been voiced in most of the very many letters of congratulation we have received. The creator of the Secular Society, the man who planned it and established it, G. W. Foote, is no longer with us. It was one of the ironies of life that the judgment delivered at his own trial for blasphemy should have shown him a way of securing to Freethought the means for conducting a more strenuous warfare against superstition. By the law, Freethought has been hampered in its progress. By the law, not by an evasion of the law, be it noted, but in strict conformity with its provisions—he showed how the aims of bigotry might be defeated. It was a splendid revenge, and in the hour of victory it is well to remember the one who made this victory possible. If we, who have seen the end of the fight, claim the right to wear the laurel, it is fitting to place therewith a sprig of rosemary.

Of the importance of the case there can be no doubt. The judgment is not quite so revolutionary as a well-written and sympathetic article in the Star of May 17 asserts; but it is of far-reaching significance. We are publishing in these columns what is practically a verbatim report of all the judgments, and although these will cover a great deal of space, readers will, we are sure, feel that it is well utilized. We are certain that no more exhaustive survey of the subject has ever been made. The judgments are all clear, wide embracing, and decisive. These were good to hear, and they are good to read. Lord Sumner's speech, is particular, contained passages that were delightful in their phrasing.

Before coming to the question of what it is precisely that this (to be) famous judgment does or leaves undone, there are one or two matters on which we may say a word. The first point is the security from attack which it gives the Society. Mr. Foote had always maintained two things. One was that the Secular Society, Limited, could not be successfully attacked on a bequest. There might be other ways in which it could be attacked, but not in that way. The other was that so long as the Secular Society retained its charter no court could, or would, deny it its legal rights. We had often discussed these points with him, and quite agreed with his view of the case. This view of the position was borne out absolutely by the House of Lords. The Society, said Lord Dunedin, is only asking the courts "to compel the executor to do his duty, so that it may receive what is legally due to it." "I think," said Lord Buckmaster, "that the respondents are well founded in arguing that since the Company is a legal entity, there is no ground upon which it is possible to prevent them receiving the money which has been the subject of a bequest in their favour." And, still more emphatically, "even if all the objects of the Company were illegal it would not follow that while the certificate of incorporation remained unrevoked the Company would be unable to receive the money." Lords Parker and Sumner were in substantial agreement. And all that it really comes to is the commonsense-view that as a man cannot be dead and alive at the same time, so a society cannot be legal and illegal at the same moment.

"While the certificate of incorporation remains unrevoked," said Lord Buckmaster. That is a possibility which fronts every registered company or society without exception. But I think any lawyer will agree that there is little or no likelihood of the Secular Society, Limited, providing ground for such action. What court is going to issue such an order? And on what ground? It is absolutely certain that no court would now hold that hostile criticism of Christianity, or of religion in general, could provide such ground. So long as the Society fulfils its statutory obligations, it may rest in perfect security. It cannot forfeit its certificate because of any illegal action that the Board of Directors is likely to perform. That may involve their personal liability; it cannot affect the status of the Society. On this point the judges were most emphatic. In the lower courts, Sir George Cave was told more than once, if the Company does anything illegal, summon it; but the possibility of it doing an illegal action is no ground for setting aside the bequest. So in the House of Lords. Lord Dunedin said the courts were in nowise concerned with the use to which the Society might put the money. Lord Parker said it mattered not whether an absolute gift was given to a man doing legitimate business or to one who acted as a receiver of stolen goods. The courts could not interfere. It was true the Directors might do illegal actions, but that would only mean that they would have to replace the monies spent, and be personally liable in other directions. Lord Sumner was emphatic in the same sense.

The matter seems clear, and it is important. No illegal action committed by the Directors would be enough to wreck the Society. It would only make them personally liable. If they published an "obscene" or "blasphemous" book, or if they subsidized a lecturer who delivers a "blasphemous" address, they could be made to pay the cost of such lecture or book, and might be charged with aiding and abetting; but their conduct would not affect the legal status of the Society. There is no possibility of the Society being attacked on the ground of its incorporation being wrong. There is no possibility of its charter being revoked on the ground of ill-advised or illegal action on the part of the Directors. On these points we may rest secure, and we have dealt with them because of the many inquiries as to whether the House of Lord's decision is final, not only as regards this case, but as against future action.

There is one other matter to which we wish to direct attention. In the course of his judgment, Lord Parker remarked that a gift to an unincorporated association "may be upheld as an absolute gift to its members." We were pleased to hear this, because it was the only point in connection with bequests to secular societies on which we differed from Mr. Foote. Members of the N. S. S. Executive are aware that for years we have dissented from the doctrine that the National Secular Society could not claim a legacy because it was not a legal body. Our contention was exactly that expressed by Lord Parker, that a bequest to an unincorporated society was really a bequest to the individuals composing that society, and could be claimed on their behalf. The name of the society was merely a convenient way of distinguishing those to whom the bequest was made. But so long as the gift was an absolute one, the money could be claimed. In this respect the National Secular Society could claim a bequest with perfect safety, and we have no doubt would receive it, so long as it did not come under the head of a trust. What an unincorporated body lacks is security of expenditure, and that is provided by the Memorandum and Articles of the Secular Society, Limited. But it was cheering to find our opinion thus endorsed, and to know that even the N. S. S. is not quite the outlaw that many of its friends have imagined.

When Mr. Foote founded the Secular Society, Limited, he called it the "Financial Charter of Freethought." That expression defined with crystaline clearness the purpose and the scope of the Society. Very many thousands of pounds had been at one time and another lost to the movement, with the consequence that the progress of the work had been hindered to a considerable extent. And as most people have a curious dislike to parting with their possessions before death, the uncertainty of the law hindered them benefiting the movement afterwards. The Secular Society, Limited, was founded to overcome this difficulty. It was founded, first, to test the question whether in the present state of the law a society having for its purpose the promotion of Secularism might be treated by the courts as a legal corporation, capable of exercising all the privileges of a legal entity; and, secondly, to provide funds for the purpose of carrying on a systematic Secular propaganda. Of course, the National Secular Society itself might have been registered right away, but it was thought advisable to test the question by the creation of a distinct Society. The Secular Society, Limited, was thus created as a test. And the only way in which this could be decided was in the courts. Most of us, we think, expected that so soon as a bequest large enough to tempt action matured, action would be taken. There are always people so much under the glamour of the old as to be unable to appreciate the new. The day came, and with it the expected consequences. The Secular Society, Limited, has emerged triumphant from the ordeal. It has achieved the purpose it was created to achieve. It has made a breach in the walls of bigotry and of religious-vested interests, and has thus laid the foundations for what may resolve itself into a complete reconstruction of the Freethought movement.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Signs of the Times.

ALL the friends of Freethought, on learning of the dismissal of the Appeal to the House of Lords in the Bowman Will Case, must have felt what Sir Walter Scott calls "the elation of triumph." Not so very long ago the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council came to the decision that the denial of the truth of the doctrine of eternal punishment did not amount to heresy, which decision a waggish wit of the time characterized thus: "They have dismissed Hell with costs." The House of Lords has gone a step further and determined that Christianity is not part of the law of the land, as several distinguished lawyers of the past had erroneously declared. "By a majority of four to one it has laid down that an anti-Christian association is as much entitled to take a bequest as any other person or corporation." This is a noteworthy sign of the times. A legal correspondent, commenting on the judgment in the Daily Telegraph for May 16, says:—

> The opinions of Lords Parker, Sumner, and Buckmaster will be cited hereafter as containing the last word on a subject of great interest to lawyers. That of Lord Sumner combined both wit and wisdom. His lordship characterized Lord Mansfield's statement that Christianity is part of the law of England as rhetoric. Spring-guns, he pointed out, were got rid of, not by Christianity, but by Act of Parliament, Christianity had tolerated slavery, but the law disapproved of it, and the injunction, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," was not a legal maxim.....The public will probably agree with the legal profession that the law, in this instance, has proved itself the perfection of common-sense.

A more significant and hopeful augury of the future success of our cause than is contained in those authoritative statements cannot be found in the whole realm of political thought and action.

But there are other signs of a similar character, though less striking, showing clearly that the modern trend of things is away from the intolerant bigotry of former days. It is quite possible that after the War there may sweep over Christendom a wave of religious reaction. At least the Churches are laying plans and making preparations with such a consummation in view; and yet there is a rapidly growing feeling among Christian teachers generally that religion after the War will be a radically different thing from what it has hitherto been. The Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon, of Stamford Hill, says that it will be democratic, intensely mystical, and an intense worship of pure goodness. In bitter denunciation of religion as at present exemplified, and as a condemnation of its influence throughout the centuries, he adds: "We stand where the Pharisees stood in the time of Christ; where the Romans stood in the time of the Apostle; where the priests stood when Wyclif arose; where the moderates stood when the evangelicals came." Indeed, so utterly uncomplimentary to the past the reverend gentleman is that he thinks the new tide of religion, when it comes, will be a menace to every man who now occupies the pulpit. Dr. Brown, of Ferme

Park Baptist Church, London, tearfully admits that there has been "a measure of failure"; but for himself he feels, "in his heart of hearts, that so far from the Church being at the point of death or exhaustion, it is just beginning to wake up." After nineteen centuries of uninterruptedly sound slumber, it is, even now, only "just beginning to wake up." And yet this is the Church which Christ is reported to have promised never to leave or forsake, but to dwell within to the end of time as the principle of endless, irresistible life and power; and it never occurs to its professional champions that in admitting its comparative failure as a world-redeeming factor, they are presenting their opponents with the most cogent of all arguments against its supernatural origin and nature.

Our present point, however, is that the official defenders of the Christian faith know only too well that in its present form it cannot possibly survive. The spirit of the age is against it, and it is only by attempting to adapt it to that spirit that any hope of its perpetuation can be cherished even by its most devout professors. As it has been from the beginning a pre-eminently syncretistic cult, so now it seeks to secure its future by befriending and borrowing from science, and by thus making itself as acceptable as possible to the modern mind. For example, the Christian World for May 17, while endorsing the decision of the House of Lords in the Bowman case, says that "Christianity has nothing to fear but everything to gain from allowing the utmost freedom of thought within the limits laid down by Lord Coleridge"; but our contemporary forgets that practically all the great thinkers of the Church have held the opposite opinion. The Church can boast of no greater theologian than St. Augustine, whose saintliness was of as high an order as his learning; but he was a zealous advocate of persecution. Believing that he possessed the truth about God and man his intolerance towards heretics knew no bounds. What was heresy? It was a species of adultery, blasphemy, and soul-murder, and to punish those guilty of it, even by death, was to exercise mercy towards them. Blasphemy was justly punished by death; and we maintain that St. Augustine's teaching on this subject was more distinctively Christian than that affected by the Christian World. The same remarks apply with equal relevancy to the writings of "Ignotus" in the Manchester City News for April 28 and May 5. "Ignotus" truly says:—

> The mild twentieth century knows nothing of the auto-da-fe and the Smithfield stake, but it can still brand an avowed sceptic with its scorn, pillory him with shame, rack him with neglect. History books vie with the Newgate Calendar in describing non-religious persons as execrable, though they may have been justice-loving philanthropists like Voltaire, or humanitarians like Godwin and Paine, or sages like Huxley, Tyndall, and Spencer. Truly the way of the heretic is hard.

The praiseworthy "mildness" of the twentieth century is due, however, not to Christian influence, but to the fact that Christianity has lost its control over public opinion, and that the State is no longer its vassal. There are still theologians not a few who would gladly have recourse to the auto-da-fe if the spirit of the age would only allow them; and, as the Lord Chancellor pointed out, it is the spirit of the age, not Christianity, that tolerates the Atheistic Secular Society, Limited. Christian orthodoxy, to be consistent, must of necessity persecute heterodoxy; and, if it can, destroy it off the face of the earth. There is much truth in what "Ignotus" says about the unreality of orthodoxy, its variability in different ages and countries, and its ever-growing adaptableness to modern ideas; but this only shows that Christianity is not now what it was in the great days of Augustine, Ambrose, Aquinas, Luther, and Calvin. The Anglican bishops are doing their utmost to stem the tide of rational thinking so prevalent in their dioceses; but the spirit of the age smiles indulgently in their faces, ignoring their retrograde speeches and reactionary resolutions, and going on from strength to strength in the happy consciousness that the day of its triumph is drawing nigh. "Ignotus" informs us that this spirit exercises considerable sway in many of our present-day congregations. "The venerated and erudite Colenso was openly denounced as a heretic," but he "revolutionized our ideas of the Pentateuch"; and since his time the Higher Critics have revolutionized our ideas of the rest of the Bible, including even the Four Gospels, the Acts, and the Epistles. With all this in mind, "Ignotus" adds:—

> But all this leads to a crucial question—If these concessions are made time after time, where shall we stop? If one miracle is explained away, why not all? If Orthodoxy changes why say that Heterodoxy is a crime? The student of history constantly discovers that the heretic of one age is accepted as the man of truth by another age. Galileo was as correct four centuries ago, when he was condemned, as he is acknowledged to be to-day; for in spite of all that Cardinals can say the planets really do revolve as he maintained. Thus Orthodoxy is put in the wrong, and Orthodoxy of a later time has frankly acknowledged it. In this and a thousand other cases it is Orthodoxy that recants, not the heretic.

"Ignotus" travels far in the direction of Freethought, and from his articles it seems reasonable to infer that, in his opinion, Freethought is the goal towards which all modern criticism is tending. Science has neither room nor need for supernaturalism in any shape or form. The signs of the times are most encouraging to lovers and advocates of the purely secular philosophy. "Where shall we stop?" asks "Ignotus," and the answer is, Nowhere until we have arrived at what we know to be true. It is the truth alone that shall make us free—free to live by the dictates of Reason, ever warming ourselves at the fires of Love.

J. T. Lloyd.

The Pope's Plaint.

> If we live thus tamely,
> To be thus jaded by a piece of scarlet,
> Farewell nobility. —Shakespeare.
> Clericalism, it is the enemy. —Gambetta.

To Freethinkers the Pope must ever be an object of extreme interest, for he is the ecclesiastic who addresses the largest congregation in the world. Using the language of his office, a pope utters words which are heard throughout the universe, and all other apostolates seem parochial by comparison. The rhetoric may be enfeebled and the platitudes exhausted, but the patriarch possesses something of the tragic character of Tithonus, "immortal age beside immortal youth." Nevertheless, his unique position with regard to the huge numbers of men and women who hold their rule of faith from the Church, of which he is the chief bishop, is striking, and nothing is more remarkable than his attitude on the present World-War. Unlike other ecclesiastics of other churches, he has not included national flags among the sacred articles of religion, and he has again and again deplored the awful sight of millions of men in arms against one another. That his warning has been treated with contempt by Christians is not his fault, and the Pope has been spared nothing that the energy of the militarist parties, and the indifference of the religious world, could make him suffer. Publicly he stands, the Lear of thankless children, a little shrill in his menaces, but keeping unimpaired the dignity of a paternity rejected.

It is the death-knell of the political power of the Papacy, and the bitterest commentary on the daring diplomacy, which, under Cardinal Rampolla, the Papal Secretary of State, who, during two decades, sought restlessly for the means of restoring the Pope's temporal power. It was Rampolla who suggested the Catholic Church's remarkable overtures to Republicanism and Socialism. When Leo XIII. died, Cardinal Rampolla would have been elected to succeed him but for the veto of the Emperor of Austria, which was communicated to the conclave by a Polish cardinal. While the cardinals hesitated to accept this veto, Rampolla himself accepted it, the present pope was elected, and Rampolla's dream of the restoration of the Papal temporal power came to an end. He lived thenceforward in retirement, his diplomatic combinations crumbled into nothingness, and with the outbreak of the present War went the last hopes of the greatest and most powerful of Christian Churches.

The paralysis of the great Catholic Church has been a slow process. There was a time when she was as broad-minded as her younger Anglican sister. She once had her broad wing, her scholars, statesmen, and thinkers, who found her borrowed mummeries and stolen creeds susceptible of mystical interpretation. The ignorant, bigoted, evangelical party gradually prevailed over these, and exterminated them by fire and sword, rack and gibbet, leaving themselves more ignorant and bigoted than before. Gradually the whole Catholic Church was made over to their "leprous likeness."

It required centuries to produce this result. The very triumphs of Freethought throughout Europe indirectly contributed to this end. Every Catholic who became an "Intellectual" assisted this process. The more brains that were drawn out of the Church, the more did the huge mass part with its intellectual leaven, and tend to flatten down to a mere mass of ignorance and intolerance. What constitutes the obstructive character of the Catholic Church is the abyss which now separates it from the highest intelligence around it; the live, alert intellect of science, and the leaden, moveless, stereotype of dogma. And to day the voice of the Pope, at which monarchs once trembled, attracts no more attention than "the horns of Elfland faintly blowing."

As belief has waned in England, the English Church has sought to imitate the religious practices of Rome. The Ritualists have taken part possession of the Church of England. Maybe they have not yet done all that was dreaded by Nonconformists, but they rule the ecclesiastical roost, and the archbishops and bishops are powerless. At this hour there are covered by the English Church's banner men who hold the extremest doctrine of the freedom of the individual, and men who are willing to submit to the utmost doctrine of priestly control. How long will this divided house stand? That a large and increasing number of the Anglican clergy were coquetting with Rome caused, some years ago, attention in the Catholic Church, and the Pope once had hopes of reconverting England, and of reimposing the yoke which our ancestors threw off. But much water has flowed to the sea since the English people acknowledged Papal supremacy, and were contented to bear with the tyranny of priestcraft.

In darkened and superstitious times the power of the Catholic Church was great, but it finished with the glare of the fires at Smithfield. It was never so unquestioned and unresisted as in Italy, Spain, and France. There is a wholesome tendency to resistance in British blood, which is cooler than that of the Latin races. It shows itself whenever any specially arrogant claims on obedience are heard, as Charles I. and James II. knew to their cost, and as the long contest for the freedom of the press also proves. Priestcraft may do its worst. We shall never, as a people, permit the cesspool of the confessional. We shall never submit to the poisoned weapons of priestcraft, its hypocritical affectations of celibacy, its tyranny in the home, its officiousness in public affairs, its menace and robbery at the death-bed. Ecclesiasticism had not a safe seat on British shoulders in the ages of faith, even before the days of the Reformation. It is an impossible dream now that there is an organized national Freethought Party, which has inscribed on its banners that significant Voltairean phrase, "Crush the Infamous."

Where Rampolla failed, his Church will fail too. Science expands in search of light and truth. The Christian Church is still entombed within the covers of an Oriental fetish-book. Men ask for the bread of knowledge; the Church offers but the stone of superstition. The priestly teaching is no longer of any practical use, and represents but a sluggish backwater in the river of human knowledge. The great river of thought rolls on, and bears us further and further away from the ignorance and superstition of the past, further and further from the shadow of the Cross.

Science and Spiritualism.

> The savage, like the child, constantly meets with the unexpected; every experience lying outside his narrow, beaten track stirs him with a shock and often fills him with fear—the handmaid of ignorance. He is apt to picture nature as a fearful monster, and to people the world with tyrannical beings. Step by step the legion of the known expands, and suggests the nature of the unknown; men expect, they foresee, they predict. The apparent chaos of mutually inimical forces gives way to the profound harmony of unifying law. And yet the unknown and the borderland that separates it from the known are always near by, to tempt curiosity and the spirit of adventure.—Professor J. Jastrow, "Fact and Fable in Psychology," p. 49.

> Professor James tells us that often "our faith is faith in someone else's faith, and in the greatest matters this is most the case."..... When we look upon the popular delusions of the past through the achromatic glasses which historical remoteness from present conditions enables us to adjust to our eyes, we marvel that good and great men could have been so grossly misled, that obvious relations and fallacies could have been so stupidly overlooked, that worthless and prejudiced evidence could have been accepted as sound and significant. But the opinions to which we incline are all coloured o'er with the deep tinge of emotional reality, which is the living expression of our interest in them. What they require is a more vigorous infusion of the pale cast of thought; for the problem of the occult and the temptations to belief which it holds out are such as can be met only by a sturdy application of a critical logic.—Professor J. Jastrow, "Fact and Fable in Psychology," p. 39.

THREE doctors—Flint, Lee, and Coventry—were, as we have seen, associated in the public exposure of the Fox girls; but, according to Dr. Carpenter, it was Dr. Austin Flint who first sought for a physiological explanation of the raps, and he seems to have owed his discovery to the fact that "a patient of his own being able thus to produce an exact imitation of the Rochester rappings. Dr. Austin Flint's explanation subsequently received full confirmation from Professor Schiff, since of Florence, who not only himself acquired the power of producing the raps, by the repeated displacement of a tendon which slides through a sheath behind the external protuberance of the ankle, but exhibited this acquirement to the French Academy of Medicine in April, 1859, baring his legs, and producing the raps without any apparent movement."[1]

A few weeks after the public detection of the Fox girls, further proof of the fraud became public. Mrs. Norman Culver, a connection by marriage of the Fox family, stated that one of the girls had confessed to her how the raps were produced. Mrs. Culver's statement, written out on April 17, 1851, and attested by two witnesses (a doctor and a clergyman), was published in the New York Herald. The raps were produced by the knees and toes.

Mrs. Culver says that she had for two years believed in the raps as genuine, but recently, noting some suspicious circumstances, she had offered Catherine to assist her. Catherine—her sister being absent—had gladly accepted the offer, and Mrs. Culver, under Catherine's instruction, became fairly adept in producing the raps. The statement continues:—

> Catherine told me how to manage to answer the questions. She said the reason why they asked people to write down several names on paper, and then point to them till the spirit rapped at the right one, was to give them a chance to watch the countenance and motions of the person, and in that way they could nearly always guess right. She also explained how they held down and moved tables. (Mrs. Culver gave us some illustrations of the tricks.) She told me that all I should have to do to make the raps heard on the table would be to put my foot on the bottom of the table when I rapped, and that when I wished to make the raps sound distant on the wall, I must make them louder, and direct my own eyes earnestly to the spot where I wished them to be heard. She said that if I could put my foot against the bottom of the door the raps would be heard at the top of the door.[2]

Mrs. Culver learnt from Catherine that Mrs. Fish's little daughter Elizabeth had actually discovered how to make the raps by playing with her toes against the footboard of the bed. Now, Mrs. Fish was a married sister of the Fox girls, and as she accompanied her sisters on their public performances, it is most probable that she was the moving spirit at the bottom of the whole fraud.

In the autumn of 1888, says Podmore, "Mrs. Kane (Margaretta Fox) and Mrs. Jencken (Catherine Fox) made public, and apparently spontaneous, confession that the raps had been produced by fraudulent means. Mrs. Kane even gave demonstrations before large audiences of the actual manner in which the toe-joints had been used at the early seances. Mrs. Jencken, at any rate, if not also Mrs. Kane, afterwards recanted her confession."[3] Whether they recanted or not, they were thoroughly unreliable characters, and nothing they afterwards said or did could alter the damning proof, publicly exhibited by Catherine Fox, of the manner in which the raps were produced.

In their confession, they declared that they were led into the fraud by their elder married sister, Leah Fox Underhill (formerly Mrs. Fish), whose little girl, as we have seen, first discovered how to produce the raps. On October 15, 1888, they authorized Mr. R. B. Davenport to write their confession, and it was published as A Death-blow to Spiritualism. The Fox girls, like Slade, were confirmed inebriates—Slade had been confined in an asylum for inebriates—fell into great poverty, and eventually they returned to Spiritism, their old followers being the only persons that would assist them, and after an interview with Mr. Newton, the millionaire spiritist, they recanted their confession. But they never achieved their old success, or gave up the drink, and ultimately died in great want.

So the plain fact emerges that the trickery of a little girl—through the "providence of God," as the pious would say—was in the beginning the means of launching this gigantic fraud which overran America, and ultimately the world, and reached its culminating point in the rank jungle-growths of superstition, as illustrated by the physical phenomena of the dark seance!

We will now consider the career of that remarkable adventuress, Madame Blavatsky, the famous founder of the Theosophical Society—the only one, by the way, who founded a new cult which still flourishes to this day. Madame Blavatsky was born in Russia in 1831 as Helen Petrovna, daughter of Colonel Hahn, of the Russian Army. At the age of seventeen she was married to an elderly gentleman, M. Blavatsky. After a few months of married life, she ran away from her husband, and entered upon her adventurous life of travel and adventure. The leading motive of her life appears to have been the search for "psychic" experiences and unusual and strange cults. She is said to have travelled to India, to absorb Hindu wisdom; to Egypt, "the motherland of superstition"; to Canada, to learn of the Red Indians; to New Orleans, to study Voodoo among the negroes; to Assyria, Siam, Cambodia, Mexico. "It is difficult to know what to believe," says Jastrow, "in the accounts prepared by her enthusiastic followers."[1] But, as Mr. Podmore observes, "For information regarding her past we had to rely mainly on her own account of herself; and research tended to show that this guarantee was insufficient."[2] Her life for the next thirty years is involved, says the same writer, "in an obscurity not wholly fortuitous." However, in 1874, and for two or three years previous, Madame passed in Egypt and the United States as a spirit medium, in which profession she was associated—at any rate, during her residence at Cairo—with M. and Madame Coulomb. In 1875, with the aid of Colonel Olcott, Madame Blavatsky founded the Theosophical Society. It was about this time that the star of Spiritualism began to wane; exposure followed fast on exposure. It was revealed that the manifestations at the dark seance were not the work of spirits, but of the mediums themselves, with the help of rag hands, dirty muslin, phosphorized oil, false beards, and other material paraphernalia. Madame Blavatsky grasped the situation, and dropped Spiritualism for ever; or, rather, to be quite accurate, she metamorphized it out of all recognition—she orientalized it. As Podmore observes: "We are enabled to trace how, by stern necessity, under pressure of the environment, Spiritualism was gradually metamorphosed into Theosophy, ghosts into astral bodies, spiritual phenomena into manifestations of the occult power of the human mind; how finally Madame from a medium evolved into a Chela; John King with his saucer-shaped cap became the Mahatma Morya with his turban; and the centre of the spiritual universe shifted from the seance room to the Thibetan Himalayas."[3] "And when," says the same writer, "a few years later it was found that the busy life of New York vexed that serene atmosphere which was essential to the due absorption of theosophic truth, she found in India a ready welcome and a more congenial environment for herself and her Society."[4] The Society's headquarters were established at Adyah, in the more congenial atmosphere of the mysterious East.

Now, whether Madame Blavatsky found that the mere teaching of the dry bones of Theosophy—as revealed in Isis Unveiled—brought no converts, and therefore no grist to the mill, or from vanity, or from pure love of mystification, or because she thought it safe to do in India things that would be risky in New York or London, we do not know; probably her motives were a mixture of all. However that may be, reports began to arrive of new marvels, quite different to those of the old spiritualistic seance; nor were they the work of spirits of the common or garden kind. They were due to the operations of the Mahatmas, wise men reputed to be several hundreds of years old, and yet only in their prime. These Mahatmas were far ahead of us in science, and held control of forces quite unknown to our greatest scientists, who by comparison could only be regarded as blind moles. "Sitting in their studies," says Mr. Edward Garrett, "2,000 miles away in Tibet, they could, by a mere effort of will, project an astral epistle, or an astral body, or an astral cup and saucer, into the middle of an applauding circle at afternoon tea or picnic in Madras or Bombay. Showers of roses fluttered down from the ceiling. Invisible bells tinkled from none knew where. All kinds of tricks were played with Madame's interminable cigarettes. Sketches and treatises were physically 'precipitated' on to blank paper, nay, sometimes the very stationery was created out of nothing to receive them. Such inferior sketches, too, and such twaddling, such very twaddling, treatises."[1] In 1884 Madame Blavatsky came to England, and "starred" London; but, says the same author, "In spite of the disappointing fact that the London air proved unfavourable to miracles, the tale of the Indian ones was greedily drunk in, and Theosophy became the fashionable fad" (p. 16).

Madame's star was in the ascendant; this was the heyday of her popularity.

FREETHINKERS are particularly well supplied with amusement. The beliefs they study, and against which they fight, seem, sometimes, to contain the very acme of humour. From the vantage ground reason affords they can observe the innumerable, straggling rabbles of absurdities, all perpetrated by the devotees of the insane creeds. The fight is full of funny, even quaint, little incidents; and if the redeeming feature of humour preserves, develops, and strengthens a man's humanity, then Freethinkers have a nearly unlimited ration of that valuable purifier.

Most comical are the endeavours of religionists to steer safely around the rocks of disruption. Their attempts to be sanctimonious when faced by the antagonism of events are veritable studies in the ludicrous; and when, as engaged in that most hopeless of hopeless battles, their tongue betrayeth their intelligence, their service to the King of Liars is most sublime.

The other night one of these happy little incidents, that continually crop up when religionists are around, came my way. Everything about loved me not, to put the matter mildly. Beneath the surface of the environment lay realities that prompted the mind more to sobriety than merriment.

In a Y.M.C.A. hut fifty of us assembled to hear a lecture. We were all soldiers. Chairman and lecturer were dressed in refined khaki, made distinctive by the sign of the inverted red triangle, the technical name of which I have forgotten. We had signed a pledge, giving ourselves, body, soul, and spirit, to the social forces represented by the Union Jack. As individuals, possessing an ego, a personality, an entity, enjoying the only qualification, as it were, that makes manifest the actuality of that ego, we had ceased to exist. To this absolute annihilation of self we had consented. Our destinies were not in our own hands. Obedience was our first and most important duty. Independent thought and its corresponding action were nasty incumbrances. At the last gasp, they were forlorn hopes, out of which time made lucky bags to contain V.C.'s or courts-martial. And in the resignation of the mind from its supreme seat in the chamber of life, we had deliberately scrapped all the higher orders of mental things.

When the Chairman announced that Professor de Selincourt's subject was not merely "Walt Whitman," but "Walt Whitman and His Democratic Mission," it was time to smile. To listen to such a lecture amidst such surroundings must have tempted the gods to laughter. In fact, I could nearly hear their ironic merriment.

The Professor surmounted the initial difficulty by referring to post-War social problems in Blighty. Whitman hated classification. Against the ugliness of much of our commercialized life Whitman turned the power of his genius. What we wanted, said the eminent Professor of English Literature, was the life crystallization of Whitman's wonderful comrade-spirit. If employers and employees would only extend the hand of fellowship to each other, the world would rejoice.

It was an inane wish, a desire, that the Professor himself does not believe possible of fulfilment. He must realize that the perfect city of Whitman's dreams will never be founded by the voluntary renunciation by capitalists of their power. In fact, the Professor twisted from an unhealthy dugout, and fled along a comparatively safe communication trench, just as he did when he was up against Whitman's heterodoxy.

De Selincourt, very gracefully, remarked that the poet was no sympathizer with established creeds. But what did that matter? Whitman's ideas were similar to those of the best Christians. The ideals of the true follower of Jesus Christ were the ideals expressed in Walt Whitman's poems. The Professor hinted that the Lord Jesus Christ was the great human exampler of the comrade-spirit that rings through the poet's verses, the comrade-spirit that will purge society.

The lecturer, very carefully, as befitted so well-known an exponent of genius, avoided emphasizing the fact that if Whitman could live without comradeship, help from established beliefs and age-encrusted creeds, then, obviously, there was little need of these props to a weak-kneed morality. Comradeship would do all that was necessary in the gigantic tasks undertaken by the pioneers.

De Selincourt quoted a poem in which the great Democrat tells us he sees God in the cobbles of the streets, and, Whitmanesque, in the reflection of his own face in the mirror. We know the modern Christian can say the same thing. So, also, can the savage. The difference between Whitman's meaning and their meaning of the same statement of belief the lecturer, in truly ingenuous and faithfully Christianlike way, failed to note. He did not tell us that when the poet used the word "God" he was speaking about Walt Whitman; which is a very easy, quiet, pleasant method of asseverating the non-existence of a Deity; and amounted to a frank confession of Freethought.

If an author should be treated fairly and squarely, without the interference of personal prejudice and the weight of preconcepted enmity of thought, then the Professor discredited himself as an authority. Deliberately to misinterpret a writer's expressed principles because we do not happen to agree with him, to falsify his beliefs because of intellectual animosity, is the very limit of literary profligacy.

I am not going to say the Professor knew his audience. The platform support, an artist and a musician, apparently both holy men, confessed to an ignorance of the subject, and promised faithfully to look Whitman up. One or two of the men were acquainted with the poet. A tent "chum" thought he was a Scotsman because I was going to the lecture. Altogether, I fancy, there were three of us, including the lecturer, who knew Walt Whitman. But with an unlearned audience the literary and critical crimes of the Professor were all the more heinous.

Although I enjoyed the funny experience for the amusement I derived from it, and although de Selincourt told me nothing new about the well-beloved poet, the quotations came into the hidden soul of me like sparkling drops of water to the parched throat of a prisoner. Wonderful rays of light they were, shining from the promised land. I nearly prayed that the Professor would forget the book when he left. I would have pinched it. Silently I devoutly joined my wishes to his, when he hoped that upon the ruins of the present one might build the perfect cities of the future.

Acid Drops.

In the name of Christianity the Archbishop denounces reprisals. In the name of Christianity, Mr. Hall Caine approves them. And in the name of Christianity they are both right, for in that adaptable creed one can find anything one likes. But on one point Mr. Hall Caine has the Archbishop on the hip. He says it is ridiculous to praise and support war on the one hand, and to denounce reprisals on the other. And in that we agree. "Civilized warfare" is an anachronism. There is no such thing. As Mr. Caine says, "to justify war and to condemn its natural if tragic developments, is to strain at the gnat and swallow the camel." From all of which we see what a rare guide Christianity is when it comes to a matter of practical concern. You may succour your enemy or kill him; and whichever you do, you may rest assured of Christian sanction.

But Mr. Caine is himself in confusion when he justifies reprisals on the ground that in War it is our first duty to restrain the enemy. For the objections to reprisals is that while it involves one in a competition of brutality—for reprisals always means action against defenceless people—it is doubtful whether they do more than incite those against whom they are directed to still further brutalities. And the argument may be reduced to an absurdity. For if to attack undefended towns, or to kill non-combatants, in Germany, will drive the Germans to do what we wish, why not threaten this on a larger scale, unless the German Government concludes a peace on terms suitable to the Allies? If that could be done, we think most people would favour the policy. But it seems to us that it was exactly by depending upon that policy that Germany made its greatest mistake. "Frightfulness" is more than a crime, it is a blunder.

Mr. George R. Sims is on stronger ground when he advocates reprisals: "Because the Bible told me so." There is, he says, "every authority for reprisals in the Bible." With that we quite agree, and Mr. Sims may be pleased to learn that the Germans are in hearty agreement with them. Indeed, the Kaiser has proclaimed that the Bible is his great guide. What could any advocate of "frightfulness" desire more than this:—

> And when the Lord thy God hath delivered it (i.e., the city) into thine hands, thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword. But the women, and the little ones, and the cattle, and all that is in the city, even all the spoil thereof, thou shalt take unto thyself . . . Of the cities of these people which the Lord thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth.

It is true that even the German Army has fallen short of the "divine injunction," but it has done its best. And, perhaps, its shortcomings in this direction are due to the fact that it has to deal with a world conscience that does not look to the Bible for guidance.

Sir Robert Lockhart, replying to Sabbatarian objections by ministers concerning Sunday sittings of Military Tribunals, says "the ministers of Kircaldy have not taken their fair share of the burdens of War Service." The remark applies to the clergy all over the United Kingdom.

A silk-dresser, who was exempted for four months by a Shoreditch Tribunal, was said to have dressed the silk "which caused the rustle in church aisles and the frou-frou." Perhaps the tribunal thought that ladies would not attend church without the frou-frou.

An absent-minded Christian took an eight-day clock from the vestry of a Mitcham church, and the vicar is advertising for its return. Meanwhile, the minister will watch and pray.

Owing to the scarcity of applicants for ordination in the Church, the Archbishop of York has licensed Mr. E. R. Turton, M.P., of Upsale Castle, to conduct services. Has the Archbishop overlooked the claims of that distinguished Christian, Mr. Horatio Bottomley?

The Rev. J. N. Newton, pastor-elect of the London City Temple, in the course of his farewell address in America, accepted the presentation of a United States flag, which he promised to drape over his London pulpit intertwined with the Union Jack. The religion of the Prince of Peace is, indeed, flagging.

Mr. Fisher, Minister for Education, visited Plymouth on a recent date, and Mr. A. G. Hann, Headmaster of Braidwood School, takes him sharply to task for remaining silent on the question of religious instruction in State Schools. Mr. Hann writes a good and timely letter to the Western Daily Mercury on the subject, and we hope it will have some effect in getting Mr. Fisher to see that this question cannot be evaded. It must be faced. Mr. Hann fittingly reminds Mr. Fisher, apropos of a complimentary allusion to France, that he will do well if he "equally appreciates the lead that France gave us when, by the adoption of a purely Secular code, she precluded for ever the possibility of religious controversy in the schools of the State." It will certainly be impossible for English people to hold up France, in the future, as a sample of the deterioration that sets in when religion is banished from the schools. That game came to a stop with the outbreak of war.

King George has contributed £100 to the Bible Society, which is stated to be faced with "grave difficulties." There is humour in the idea of George patronising the King of Kings.

At a sale of jewels at Christie's over £37,900 was realized in an hour, three necklaces fetching £13,300. Is this the country of the Carpenter-God?

The clergy are as fond of King Charles's head as the famous character portrayed by Dickens. At the Lower House of Convocation a resolution that the name of King Charles should be re-inserted in the Church calendar as a black-letter day was carried. A "saint" without a head is appropriate for parsons who are losing their own.

Six million Bibles, in fifty languages, have been sent to the soldiers on the Continent. This claim is made by the Bible Societies. If correct, it is a gross waste of paper and ship tonnage.

Modern Christianity is a very comprehensive religion, and includes almost everything, from saloon-smashing to soul-saving. The Bishop of London, who is very emphatic in his likes and dislikes, says, "We cannot have the old public-houses again." "The Angel," at all events, ought to be popular, for it should remind people of the Mons bogeys.

Helen Mathers, the novelist, in an interview in a weekly paper, says: "In the beginning God gave man two friends, the horse to bear him away from wild beasts and enemies, and the dog to guard his hearth and home." Why stop there? Were not bugs, fleas, and lice given to keep man company?

Mr. Lloyd George is a busy man, but he has found time to write a testimonial for the Church Army's recreation huts. It would be more to the purpose if he devoted his attention to the matter of parsons of military age being incorporated in the real Army for other purposes than serving Communion port.

At Portsmouth the Vicar of St. James's, Milton, arranged for a series of services on the "principal allotment grounds" to "Ask for God's blessing on the land." Why only the principal one? Surely God is not above blessing the little plot of potatoes in the back garden? Quite appropriately the last of the services was announced to take place at Milton Cemetery. It would have been still more appropriate at the Asylum. Then the circle would have been complete.

The Rev. E. F. Russell, of St. Alban's Church, Holborn, has been presented with a testimonial of 1,200 guineas by his admirers, and the presentation was made by the Bishop of London, a bachelor-ecclesiastic who gets £10,000 yearly. Christianity is a more profitable profession to-day than it was in the time of the twelve disciples.

Sunday-school treats are forbidden, and now tea-meetings are to be banned. The Mayor of St. Albans has approached the Food Controller as to whether tea-fights and similar gatherings are permissible in war-time, and has received a reply in the negative. The dear clergy who attend these festive gatherings will have less reason than ever to evade their national obligations.

The inclusion of King Charles the Martyr among the English saints reminds us of Samuel Taylor Coleridge's sarcastic comment on the King's title of "martyr." "Yes,' said Coleridge, "a martyr to lies and equivocation."

Mr. H. G. Wells has been girding at the "kingly caste of Germans," and writes of "a constellation of quasi-divine Teutonic monarchs." "Quasi-divine" is good; but most monarchs receive consecration at the hands of their priests.

Mr. Horatio Bottomley seems to believe in a limited-liability God, for he says: "Never again, until German devilry is finally crushed, can golden argosies of God's generous grain ride the waves in safety." This appeared in a Sunday paper, but it might have been written by Billy Sunday.

Many of our comments on the clergy are, quite naturally, taken by Christians as owing their origin to anti-Christian prejudice. But here is Dr. Hastings Rashdall, Canon of Hereford, saying in the course of a recent sermon much of what we have often said in these columns. Thus:—

> It remains true that great theological ignorance, or most inadequate and dangerously superficial knowledge, is often found among men whose high ability raises them to positions of great influence in the Church. That is of course still more so among men of fair ability, not intellectual enough to face such questions for themselves, but quite capable of being interested and instructed in them if they were properly set before them in the course of their professional education. And is not the result disastrous? Is it too much to say that a well-educated layman usually shrinks from entering upon any really serious intellectual question with a clergyman whom he casually meets, very much as he would shrink from discussing such subjects with a child? He assumes that either he does not know, or that his mind is closed—perhaps that it would not be fair to disturb his contented ignorance.

It is really an open question as to whether the pulpit is fooling the pew to a greater degree than the pew is fooling the pulpit.

Canon Rashdall goes on to point out that when the clergy have "matured," so to speak, they become almost useless as teachers. Their training does not fit them for the work, and their habit of judging by cut-and-dried theological formulæ is fatal to fruitful thinking. No one who has studied the clergy will think this indictment overdrawn. The noteworthy thing is that it is this class of men that local authorities propose replacing trained teachers in public schools. A more foolish or suicidal policy could hardly be conceived.

The playfulness of Providence has not been altogether damped by the World-War. A telegram from Rome states that earthquake shocks have been felt in Italy, about fifty persons being killed and injured.

On the authority of the Committee on Religion, Morals, and Temperance of the Scottish Free Church, we learn that the Kaiser is quite correct in claiming companionship with God. According to a report just issued, and summarized in a Glasgow paper, "the right view undoubtedly is that the Kaiser is an instrument in the Divine hand to chastise us for our personal and national sins." So God is behind the Kaiser after all. He has been appointed to chastise us, and when we have been chastised enough we presume peace will come. But it is rough on the Kaiser to talk of punishing him for doing God's work.

Decree, with expenses, was granted in absence in Edinburgh Small Debt Court recently in a case in which Jane Smith Robertson, Tulloch Terrace, Perth, sued the Rev. Robert Stephen Barclay, of St. Mark's Chapel of Ease, Perth, for payment of aliment for her illegitimate child, of which she alleges the defender is the father. Defender is understood to hold a commission in the Army, and a short time ago pursuer's agent informed the Sheriff that the agents for the defender had retired from the case.

A West of England correspondent sends us an amusing story concerning the slimness of the Salvation Army in a well-known town. A schoolmaster built a large schoolroom close to a fashionable church, and maintained it as an educational establishment for about three years. After passing through several hands the hall was finally sold to the Salvation Army. This annoyed the fashionable and fashionably religious folk, who put their heads together and finally purchased the place at a price which gave the Army a handsome profit. So the Army gave up the hall, and with the £1,000 of profit made bought a large house quite close to the church, and continues to hold its meetings there. The "Army" is slim, very slim!

Quite a Simple Thing to Do.

SOME time back we induced a friend in South Wales to see what he could do to increase the sale of the Freethinker in his district. He was an energetic man, and threw himself into the work with a will. Within three or four months he had secured over one hundred new readers, and has kept them supplied ever since.

Now, what was done in South Wales could be done, in larger or smaller measure, all over the country. There are thousands of people who would become regular subscribers to this journal if only they knew of its existence. There are thousands of men and women who date their mental emancipation from the day a copy first came into their hands. It is the easiest thing in the world to pass a copy on to a likely reader. It takes up no time, and costs little, even though it be bought for that special purpose. It is an easy and effective way of helping a great cause, of not merely securing a new reader, but of adding a new recruit to the Army of Freethought.

To Correspondents.

E. B. writes on the result of the Bowman Case: "This victory for liberty is as great as any recently won in the field," which, we think, will express the opinion of most of our readers. Mr. Harry Snell also sends "sincere congratulations to the Freethought Party on its great victory," and says: "the bigots have been driven to the pit at last. Henceforth men will be able to leave money to a cause they believe in without fear that it will be diverted to other purposes."

A. Jones.—Thanks for suggestions.

Several inquiries reach us as to the publishers of Madelin's The Revolution, recently mentioned in these columns. Perhaps one of our readers can tell us. We only know the French edition.

A. W. Davis.—Sorry that want of space prevents publication of your interesting letter on Hebert.

J. C.—Shall appear after the N. S. S. Conference Business and the Bowman Report have liberated some of our space. Thanks.

H. C. Hebbes.—Sorry we cannot spare space in which to pursue further the subject of Adult Schools. We note your opinion that Freethinkers attending them may exert a good influence on the religious-minded.

R. G. Catling.—We agree with you that to say God is nothing and to say God is everything are really identical statements—certainly so far as any theology is concerned. Pleased to know you enjoyed our review of Norman Pearson's The Soul. If we can find time we may deal with Professor Pringle-Pattison's Idea of God, but we are overloaded with work at the moment.

Major Warren.—Much obliged for your reminiscence of Ingersoll, which sh all appear. We quite agree with your estimate of Mr. G. H. Wells' new book. We intend writing on it as soon as other matters are off our hands.

E. P.—Letter redirected, as requested.

H. G. Farmer.—Please let us know how things progress.

S. Leech.—Sorry we missed you in the House of Lords. Should have liked a word with you.

J. B. Middleton.—Thanks for cutting, also for congratulations.

G. C. Webb.—The gentleman you name expressed the same sentiments to us. Nor are we surprised that intelligent men and women should realize the iniquity of laws which are framed for the purpose of hindering the expression of reasoned conviction on matters of religion. We hope to see the whole of the Blasphemy Laws cleared away before many years have passed.

J. G. Finlay.—We take it that the House of Lords decision applies to Scotland equally with England. Thanks for good wishes.

T. Pourdall.—We do not know anything of the Hon. A. S. Canning beyond the fact of his being the author of a number of historical works. A large size portrait of G. W. Foote can be obtained at the Freethinker office, price 1s., postage 3d.

G. Tacchi.—Shall be pleased to see you when you return to London.

E. Greenwood.—Sorry that want of space prevents our pursuing the correspondence. We agree with you that there is nothing necessarily antagonistic between scientific materialism and telepathy.

Mr. Sibley.—Thanks for all you have done to secure new subscribers.

T. Lea.—We might revive the Freethinker League on a wider and more effective basis.

J. Allen.—Verses received. The antithetical idea is a good one, but we regret that for the present we are unable to publish.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day takes place the fifty-first Annual Conference of the National Secular Society. The business meetings (morning and afternoon) and the evening demonstration will all be held in the South Place Institute, Moorgate Street, E.C. The morning and afternoon meetings are open to members and delegates only, and we hope to see a good muster. Naturally, the number of provincial delegates will be restricted this year, although we hope the triumph in the House of Lords will have the effect of deciding some hesitant ones to attend, after all. The evening meeting is open to the general public, and all London Freethinkers can do their share towards seeing that the hall is crowded. The "platform" is, as usual, a good one, and Freethinkers may invite their more orthodox friends with the security that they will feel their evening has been well spent. Admission to the evening meeting is quite free, although there will be the inevitable collection towards expenses.

It is not possible to make very elaborate arrangements for a Conference Luncheon, owing to war conditions, but such as are possible will be announced at the morning business meeting.

It is impossible for us to acknowledge in any other way than this the shower of congratulatory telegrams and letters that have fallen on us over the Bowman Case. At first we purposed filling a column or so with some of the more striking ones, but as these grew we gave it up as hopeless. Most of our correspondents have said exactly the right thing in the right way. As was said on another famous occasion, "It was a glorious victory," and everybody worth bothering about has recognized it as such.

But some of the letters received show that the writers were labouring under certain misapprehensions. One of them is that the Secular Society, Limited, receives a bequest of £10,000. That figure represents the gross value of the estate. But from that has to be deducted payment of certain legacies, estate duty, and the expenses incurred during two years of litigation—and the latter is not a form of amusement that can be indulged in cheaply. What will be the net amount no one is able to say, and we had better not guess.

A second misapprehension is that the Freethinker benefits from the legacy. That is not the case. The bequest is to the Secular Society, Limited, and the Freethinker has no claim whatever upon any portion of it. The deficiency on the year's working of the Freethinker will have to be met as last year's deficit was met, and I have no doubt it will be faced as cheerfully and as generously. And we may say at once that bearing in mind the still further increased cost of paper and the new rise in the wages of compositors, that loss, while it may be absolutely larger than last year, will not represent all the increased cost of production.

We see by a return in one of the trade organs that nearly five hundred papers in this country have raised their price, a very much larger number have cut down the number of pages. Very many have both raised the price and reduced the size. Propagandist organs have also been compelled to appeal for large sustentation funds, from a thousand pounds and upwards. We say these things, not to gloat over other people's troubles, or magnify our own achievements, but merely to give readers some notion of the anxieties and difficulties attendant on keeping the Freethinker unchanged in size and price during a time like the present.

We are pleased to welcome a new edition of Richard Jefferies and Civilization, by one of our contributors, Mr. A. F. Thorne. Our readers may remember that the book was noticed in these pages some months ago. It is published by Stockwell, 29 Ludgate Hill, E.C., price 6d. net, and those who know Mr. Thorne's writings will hardly need persuasion to secure a copy. We have several things in hand of Mr. Thorne's, including a lengthy article on "Freethought," which we hope soon to publish.

The Rationalist Press Association has done a useful work in circularizing Freethinking Associations among the Allied nations with a view to preventing the Papacy taking an official part in any forthcoming Peace Congress. Amongst other reasons given for this protest are the following:—

1. The Pope is not a temporal sovereign, and has no more title to be represented than the Dalai Lama of Tibet, the Archbishop of Canterbury, or the head of any other sect.

2. The admission of the Pope would be a rebuff to our Ally Italy, which for forty-six years has been combating intrigues aiming at the re-establishment of the Temporal Power.

3. None of the Allied Governments but that of Belgium is Catholic. In France, Portugal, and Japan the Church and State are separated. In Great Britain the State religion is Protestant; in Russia, Rumania, Serbia, and Montenegro it is the Eastern Church. [Since this was issued the United States, in which Church and State are separated, has become one of the Allies.]

4. Belgium, which might have hoped for the support of the Papacy, has been consistently ignored, and no condemnation of the invasion and rapine of the country by Germany in 1914 has yet come from the Vatican.

It may be taken for certain that the only aim of the Papacy at such a Conference would be the strengthening the hands of the Catholic Church. And it would be simply disastrous to permit at a Congress, which many hope will mark the opening of a new era, one of the most sinister influences of the past. Judging from the replies received to the R.P.A.'s manifesto, every effort will be made by Continental Freethinkers to make this impossible.

Literature was sold in the London Parks on Sunday last at all the N. S. S. meetings, and the names of the sellers duly taken. Nothing has been heard from the Council up to the time of writing, but the following appeared on the L.C.C. Agenda for May 22:—

Sale of Literature.

1.—We have had before us the reference from the Council of 1st May, 1917 (p. 445), under standing order No. 62 to consider and report whether the arrangements which obtained for more than 25 years for the sale of literature at meetings at the Council's parks and open spaces should be restored. Apart from the merits of the question, we understand that, owing to the depletion of staff, it would be impracticable, during the period of the war, to modify the resolution of the Council of 30th May, 1916 (p. 566), to issue no further permits for the sale of literature and we have therefore decided to postpone the further consideration of the matter until after the declaration of peace.

By the Rev. Stewart Headlam:—

That it be referred to the Parks and Small Holdings and Allotments Committee to consider and report in connection with the order prohibiting permits for the sale of literature at parks and open spaces, as to relaxing the order in favour of holders of permits issued before the date of such order.

"The Slave's Dream."

Of these am I, Coila my name.
—Burns, "The Vision."

The prisons are full; and yet the doors and windows are wide open, where the sunshine and the azure pours, and clouds of beauty pass on winds of liberty. The waving forests shout of liberty, and the fields and streams; all the earth and air with thy voice is loud.

And the blast of the desert cries aloud
With a voice so wild and free;
The pris'ners half-awake and smile
At their tempestuous glee.[1]

[1] Longfellow, The Slave's Dream, adapted.

And sleep again; but not so soundly. Or here and there one rises, and groping, instinctive, finds his way, and feels the fresh air on his brow; is dizzy and dazzled for a space; timid, bewildered, distressed, conscience-smitten in the midst of his Pagan joy.

Bring back the chain! But, no; the Liberator can never be the enslaver. The John Howards have been, and are still, abroad in the land. They have lingered near those mural shades of willing captivity—are lingering still—and longing and thinking, writing, speaking, daring, devising, enduring for those in durance. For their own sakes, too; for the fuller life of the free when all are freed.

What vast prison is this? What paradox is this? What task for the Howards to improve and empty it!—the more it is improved, the more it is emptied. To make those prisons habitable is to make them uninhabitable—to substitute a habitable globe! This is the task of the reformer; this is the faith of the free; this is the "holiest religion." These prison walls are compounded of all the creeds; their cement is superstition; their caretakers the priests of every supernatural system, and convicts all—or moral cowards.

What can ennoble sots, or slaves, or cowards?
Alas, not all the blood of all the Howards.

But blood will tell—and brains; the blood of the pioneers. They have made a beginning.

We must liberate our intelligence. The real gaols are not Duke Streets and Old Baileys and Wormwood Scrubbs, but churches and cathedrals, with their ancient encrustation of tradition, custom, canon, convention, and all the shallow moralism and solemn pietism of the pulpit's narrow curve.

Methinks, my friends, the philosophy of Spinoza, in its essential significance and ultimate implication, is never likely to be wholly, or even partly, set aside. He uses a magnificent metaphysic to kill metaphysics. Whether he "rules in" or "rules out" God in his finite and infinite universe, in his negation and affirmation he rules "Him" with a rod of iron—the iron of "His" own necessity. God is the absolute, the all, or the nothing. Spinoza's is a clear conception and expression of the impersonal God—or, we are inclined to think, the God that does not exist. Like the astronomy of Laplace, the philosophy of Spinoza has no need of that hypothesis. The great thinker sets forth in volumes what Shakespeare has suggested in the sentence, "A touch of nature makes the whole world kin." He teaches, for instance, that not an atom of matter could be other than it is without supposing the whole material world to be other than it is; also, the life of absolute truth or reason is not a life that is foreign to us, but one in which we come to our own. As a reader of the Freethinker, one need not have made an exhaustive study of the sages; but merely to "dip into" such volumes is to be at once electrified by the profound significance of such simple phrases. In the same simple and unassuming way, the poetaster of science and philosophy may quite confidently and correctly suggest that if the mantle of Spinoza has fallen on the shoulders of anyone now living, it is surely resting easily and gracefully, and quite naturally, on the shoulders of the present able but unpretentious Editor of the Freethinker.

the best of the former are but translations and interpretations of the great original volume. We must often return to the great original, and read it in the original "Hebrew," which all can understand. Or, in the lines recently quoted by our ever-happy "Mimnermus":—

Sick am I of idle words,
Past all reconciling:
Words that weary and perplex
And pander and conceal;
Wake the sounds that cannot die,
For all their sweet beguiling:
The language we need fathom not,
But only hear and feel.

PSYCHISM AND THE SUPERNATURAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I wish to thank Mr. Edwin Greenwood for his courteous letter, and as there are no doubt many others of Mr. Greenwood's opinion, I take this opportunity of putting myself right with them. There is only one passage that I object to in Mr. Greenwood's letter, it is the following: "Mr. Mann may be doing the Rationalist cause a great deal of harm by implying that all forms of psychic phenomena are fraudulent." This may be the impression honestly made on Mr. Greenwood's mind by my articles, but it has not the slightest foundation in fact. I have been dealing solely with the physical phenomena up to now, and when I have finished with that I will deal with the psychical phenomena.

As to telepathy I have no prejudice against it, if one living person can communicate with another at a distance by means of the mind; it would merely constitute an interesting scientific fact, it would not affect my philosophy in the least. I should still remain a Materialist and an Atheist. In their proper sequence I shall give the reasons why the evidence for telepathy does not convince me.

If I had commenced my articles by dealing with the psychical phenomena, no doubt people would have written to know why I had not dealt with the physical phenomena.

As for fraud, I should not think of charging Sir Oliver Lodge, or the late Mr. Stead, with fraud; nevertheless, I do not believe for a moment that they have communicated with people who are dead. They are under a delusion. There is a tale of the Frenchman who assured his friend that the earth did move round the sun, and offered his word of honour as a guarantee. But words of honour and respectability do not carry much weight in science, for history attests that the most outrageous and ridiculous superstitions have been believed in, and vouched for by men of the utmost integrity and honour.

"A PURITAN ON PAINE."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In his interesting article, "A Puritan on Paine," Mr. Underwood, referring to Mr. Birrell's objection that Paine was not a teetotaler, points out that Paine's was an age of hard drinking. He also states that "Drinking was one of the signs of a vigorous and expansive temperament. It set up no more deterioration in Thomas Paine, or Charles Lamb, or Pitt, than did the deplorable opium habit in Coleridge, for whose moral shortcomings Mr. Birrell would be the first to find excuses."

Mr. Birrell does this, or something very much like it, in the case of Charles Lamb. In his introduction to The Essays of Elia (Everyman's Library, he writes:—

> He used to get drunk somewhat too frequently. Let the fact be stated in all its deformity—he was too fond of gin-and-water. He once gave a lady the welcome assurance that he never got drunk twice in the same house.....It is a mitigating circumstance.....Lamb was also a too inveterate punster..... When we have said these things against Lamb we have said all. Pale Malice, speckled Jealousy, may now be invited to search the records of his life, to probe his motives, to read his private letters, to pry into his desk, to dissect his character. Baffled, beaten, and disappointed, they fall back. An occasional intoxication which hurt no one but himself, which blinded him to no duty, which led him into no extravagance, which in no way interfered with the soundness of his judgment, the charity of his heart, or the independence of his life, and a shower of bad puns—behold the faults of Elia! His virtues—noble, manly, gentle—are strewn over every page of his life, and may be read in every letter he ever wrote.

This is, no doubt, a very temperate and just estimate of Lamb, and it causes one to regret, and wonder, that Mr. Birrell did not show a similar spirit in dealing with Paine.

Another example of the many misrepresentations of Paine's character occurred in Leslie Stephen's History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century, which is referred to by Dr. Moncure D. Conway in the preface to The Life of Thomas Paine. Dr. Conway states that on its appearance, he recognized "the old effigy of Paine elaborately constructed by Oldys and Cheetham," and that, in 1879, he discovered that these libels were the only "biographies" of Paine in the London Library which, he knew, was used by Stephen. In his second edition, Mr. Stephen stated that the portrait of Paine presented was "drawn by an enemy," on which Mr. J. M. Robertson asked why it was allowed to stand. In September, 1892, Mr. Stephen wrote in the National Reformer: "The account I gave of Paine.....was, I have no doubt, erroneous. My only excuse, if it be an excuse, was the old one, 'pure ignorance.'" He added that he intended to go into the question again, and that if he found, as he expected to find, that Paine was greatly maligned, he would make some redress for his previous misguided remarks. He stated also that he would be "especially sorry to do anything short of justice to a man of Paine's real importance."

In August, 1893, he duly made amends in an article on "Thomas Paine" in the Fortnightly Review. He wrote:—

> For some three generations the name of Paine has been regarded by the respectable classes as synonymous with vulgar brutality. Mr. Moncure Conway has recently published a biography.....He states in his preface that a book of mine published some years ago accepted certain scandals about Paine; and as I misled at least one of my readers, I think it a duty to confess my error frankly. My description of Paine's last years was taken from a statement by a witness whom Mr. Conway has proved to be utterly unworthy of credit.....I am the more sorry.....because in any case the charges were but slightly relevant—Paine's brandy is less to the purpose than Pitt's port, and much less to the purpose than Coleridge's opium. Patriots may love Pitt, and poets may love Coleridge, in spite of weaknesses which really affected their careers. But Paine's lapse into drink, such as it was, did not take place till his work was substantially done; and his writings were the product of brains certainly not sodden by brandy, but clear, vigorous, and in some ways curiously free from passion.

Thus Mr., aftrewards Sir, Leslie Stephen, having investigated the matter, honourably and generously confessed his error, and his example may be commended to the many who have similarly erred in "pure ignorance" with the advice, "Go, and do thou likewise."

V.
Secular Society, Limited.

IN arriving at the conclusion that the object of the Respondent Society was not unlawful in the sense that the Court will not aid the Plaintiffs to get the legacy, the Court of Appeal found it necessary to overrule two cases. The first of these cases is Briggs v. Hartley (1850) 19 L.J. Ch. 416. In this case a legacy had been left for the best original essay on "The Subject of Natural Theology, treating it as a science and demonstrating the truth, harmony, and infallibility of the evidence on which it is founded, and the perfect accordance of such evidence with reason, also demonstrating the adequacy and sufficiency of natural theology when so treated and taught as a science to constitute a true, perfect, and philosophical system of universal religion (analogous to other universal systems of science such as astronomy, etc.) founded on immutable facts and the works of creation, and beautifully adapted to man's reason and nature, and tending, as other sciences do, but in a higher degree, to remove and elevate his nature and to render him a wise, happy, and exalted being." Vice-Chancellor Shadwell gave judgment in these terms: "I cannot conceive that the bequest in the Testator's will is at all consistent with Christianity, and therefore it must fail."

This is a direct decision by a Judge of great eminence upon the point, and, in my opinion, the Court of Appeal had no sufficient ground for overruling it. The second of these cases is Cowan v. Milbourn (1867) L.R. 2 Ex. 230. In that case the Plaintiff had hired of the Defendant some rooms at Liverpool for the purpose of having lectures delivered there. Placards were issued giving as some of the subjects of the lectures "The Character and Teachings of Christ: the Former Defective, the Latter Misleading," and "The Bible shown to be no more Inspired than any other Book with a Refutation of Modern Theories Thereon." The use of the rooms was refused by the Defendant, and he justified his refusal by the character of the lectures proposed to be delivered. In an action in the Court of Passage, Liverpool, for breach of contract to let, the learned Judge ruled that the lectures announced were blasphemous and illegal, and a verdict was entered for the Defendants, with leave to the Plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for him on each of these counts. Motion was made accordingly in the Court of Exchequer before Chief Baron Kelly, Baron Martin, and Baron Bramwell. The Court refused to grant a Rule, the Chief Baron expressing himself as follows: "It would be a violation of duty to allow the question raised to remain in any doubt. That question is, whether one who has contracted to let rooms for a purpose stated in general terms, and who afterwards discovers that they are to be used for the delivery of lectures in support of a proposition which states, with respect to our Saviour and His teaching, that the first is defective and the second misleading, is, nevertheless, bound to permit his rooms to be used for that purpose in pursuance of that general contract. There is abundant authority for saying that Christianity is part and parcel of the law of the land; and that, therefore, to support and maintain publicly the proposition I have above mentioned is a violation of the first principles of the law, and cannot be done without blasphemy. I, therefore, do not hesitate to say that the Defendant was not only entitled, but was called on and bound by the law, to refuse his sanction to this use of his rooms."

Baron Martin concurred. Baron Bramwell said: "I am of the same opinion, and I will state my grounds. I think that the Plaintiff was about to use the rooms for an unlawful purpose, because he was about to use them for the purpose of 'by teaching or advised speaking, denying the Christian religion to be true, or the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be of Divine authority.' That he intended to use the rooms for the purposes declared by the Statute to be unlawful is perfectly clear, for he proposed to show that the character of Christ was defective, and His teaching misleading, and that the Bible was no more inspired than any other book. That being so, his purpose was unlawful; and if the Defendant had known his purpose at the time of the refusal, he clearly would not have been bound to let the Plaintiff occupy them, for, if he would, he would then have been compelled to do a thing in pursuance of an illegal purpose." Then a little further on: "Now it appears that the Plaintiff here was going to use the rooms for an unlawful purpose; he, therefore, could not enforce the contract for that purpose, and, therefore, the Defendant was not bound, though he did not know the fact. It is strange there should be so much difficulty in making it understood that a thing may be unlawful in the sense that the law will not aid it, and yet that the law will not immediately punish it. If that only were unlawful to which a penalty is attached, the consequence would be that, inasmuch as no penalty is provided by the law for prostitution, a contract having prostitution for its object would be valid in a Court of law. The rule must be refused, and I do not regret the result, and on this ground, that this placard must have given great pain to many of those who read it."

The authority of these two decisions has never, so far as I am aware, been questioned in any later case, and no satisfactory reason is given in the Court of Appeal for disregarding them. The Master of the Rolls says: "It seems to me that the undoubted relaxation of the views as to common law blasphemy must extend to matters outside the Criminal Law." He goes on to say that in his view the decision in Briggs v. Hartley ought not to be followed, and, with regard to Cowan v. Milbourn, he says: "So far as I am aware, this case, which was decided in 1867, has never been followed, and notwithstanding my profound respect for the learned Judges who decided it, I am bound to say that it ought not to be followed. If Cowan v. Milbourn is still good law, the Plaintiffs cannot claim the legacy, but as I do not consider it is good law I think Mr. Justice Joyce was right in the view which he took."

Lord Justice Pickford says: "A much more difficult question is whether this object, though not illegal in the sense of being punishable, is illegal in the sense that the law will not recognize it as being the foundation of legal right, and will do nothing to aid it. The denial of religion is not in terms the object of the Company as set out in (a), but I think that it is involved in it, and that it is not possible to promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and that human welfare is the proper end of all thought and action, without, at any rate inferentially, denying the Divine government of the world, and the principles of religion. I think there is no doubt that in former times such an object would have been held to have been contrary to public policy, but the question is whether it is right to hold so now. I think that the doctrine of public policy cannot be considered as being always the same, and that many things would be and have been, held contrary to public policy which are not so held now." The learned Lord Justice goes on to refer to the cases of Briggs v. Hartley and Cowan v. Milbourn, and says: "Whatever may have been the doctrine as to public policy prevailing in 1850, when the former case was decided, I do not think that it ought now to be followed. If the latter decision means that no consideration will support a contract which involves any questioning of the truth of religion, I also think that should not be followed, but the Court may have inferred from the title to which I referred that the lectures attacked religion in a reviling and contumelious manner, and if that were the case the decision was, I think, right."

Lord Justice Warrington does not specifically refer to the case of Briggs v. Hartley, but with regard to the judgments of Chief Baron Kelly and Baron Bramwell in Cowan v. Milbourn, he says: "Neither of the Judges really dealt with the question whether the lectures, if not infringing a positive ordinance of law, would have rendered the contract incapable of being enforced. It is quite true that Baron Bramwell laid it down that a thing may be unlawful in the sense that the law will not aid it; but accepting this as correct, as I think it clearly is, it still remains to consider whether the particular thing in question is unlawful in the wider sense or not. In my opinion there is no authority binding us to hold that the promotion in a proper manner of the objects of the Company is contrary to public policy, and we ought not to hold it to be so."

It may be that there has been a considerable change of public opinion with regard to the discussion of religion, but the question is whether anything has taken place to justify any Court in holding that the principle of law on this matter may be treated as obsolete. From time to time the standard as to what is decent discussion of religious subjects may vary, and in one age a jury would find that a particular publication was blasphemous in the strict sense of the term which would not be so considered in another. With regard to questions of public policy such as those arising in connection with restraint of trade, circumstances with regard to facility of communication and of travel may so alter, that the principle invalidating such contracts would apply to a particular state of circumstances in one age but not in another. But it is difficult to see how a change in the spirit of the time could justify a change in a principle of law by judicial decision. Such changes in public opinion may lead to legislative interference and substantive alteration of the law, but cannot justify a departure by any Court from legal principle, however they may affect its application in particular cases.

The decisions in Briggs v. Hartley and Cowan v. Milbourn are in conformity with a considerable body of authority on this subject. It has been repeatedly laid down by the Courts that Christianity is part of the law of the land, and it is the fact that our civil policy is to a large extent based upon the Christian religion. This is notably so with regard to the law of marriage and the law affecting the family. The statement that Christianity is part of the law of the land has been often given as a reason for punishing criminally contumelious attacks upon Christianity. It is true that expressions have in some cases been used that would seem to imply that any attack upon Christianity, however decently conducted, would be criminal. For the reasons I have already given, I do not think that this view can be accepted as having represented the common law of England at any time. But the fact that Christianity is recognized by the law as the basis to a great extent of our civil policy is quite sufficient reason for holding that the law will not help endeavours to undermine it.

Authorities, beginning with De Costa v. De Paz in 1744 and ending with Pare v. Clegg in 1860, appear to me to establish that the Courts will not help in the promotion of objects contrary to the Christian religion, apart altogether from any criminal liability, and to show that Briggs v. Hartley and Cowan v. Milbourn were well decided, and that, if the law of England is to be altered upon the point, the change must be effected not by judicial decision but by the act of the Legislature.

It is foreign to the subject of the present inquiry to consider whether the welfare of the individual and the greatness of the nation would be best promoted by proceeding on the lines of the Secular Society, involving the ignoring of the supernatural as influencing human conduct, and holding out the promotion of happiness in this world as the chief end of man, or upon the lines indicated in the striking passage with which Lord Bacon concludes his Essay on Atheism, and the still more striking quotation from Cicero which he there makes. Such considerations bear upon public policy, and may have had some influence in moulding the English law upon the subject. But we have to deal not with a rule of public policy which might fluctuate with the opinions of the age, but with a definite rule of law to the effect that any purpose hostile to Christianity is illegal. The opinion of the age may influence the application of this rule, but cannot affect the rule itself. It can never be the duty of a Court of Law to begin by inquiring what is the spirit of the age, and in supposed conformity with it to decide what the law is. Very nice and difficult questions may arise as to whether in any particular case the purpose is hostile to the Christian religion. No such difficulty arises in the present case, as by the Memorandum of Association the axe is laid to the root of the tree of all religion.

The legacy was given and would be taken for the purposes of the Society, as stated in the Memorandum, and if these purposes are illegal their illegality is not mended by the Certificate of Incorporation. In my opinion they are illegal in the sense that the law will not aid in their promotion, and this Appeal ought to be allowed.

LORD DUNEDIN.

My Lords, before I had committed my views in this case to writing, I had the advantage of seeing not only the judgment just delivered by the Lord Chancellor, but also those about to be delivered by my noble and learned friends, Lord Parker and Lord Buckmaster. In these there is contained so much that not only has my adhesion, but is expressed better that I could hope to do, that I shall refer to them for several of the propositions on which my judgment rests, and shall only state succinctly the reasons which have led me, though not without hesitation, to the conclusion that this Appeal should be dismissed.

My Lords, I have said that I have formed my opinion not without hesitation; but that hesitation is due to one fact only. Had there been no authorities to deal with, and I were to approach the matter from the point of view of legal principle alone, I do not think I should have felt much difficulty. What has troubled me is that I think it is impossible to decide the case as I think it should be decided without going counter to what has been said by Judges of great authority in past generations. It is always, I feel, no light matter to overrule such pronouncements.

I shall first deal with two points which must be resolved before the case can be further considered, but on which, for the reason already mentioned, I shall adopt the opinion of others as my own. I agree with what I understand is the unanimous opinion of your Lordships, that as to what is necessary to constitute the crime of blasphemy at common law, the dicta of Mr. Justice Erskine, Lord Chief Justice Denman, and Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, in the cases of Shore v. Wilson, R v. Hetherington, and R. v. Ramsey respectively are correct; and I adopt the reasoning of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Buckmaster. Further, I agree with the Lord Chancellor that on a fair construction, paragraph 3*a* of the Memorandum of Association of the Respondent Company expresses the dominating purpose of the Company; and that the other matters are mentioned not as independent, but only as subsidiary aims. I agree with him in thinking that teaching in accordance with (3*a*) is inconsistent with and to that extent subversive of the Christian religion—by which expression, without attempting definition, I mean all such forms of religion as have for a common basis belief in the Godhead of the Lord Jesus Christ.

It is said for the Appellants that the Court will not lend its assistance for the furtherance of an illegal object, and that money given to the Society must needs be illegally applied, because it certainly can only be used for objects in terms of the Memorandum, and such objects are illegal, because the Christian religion is part of the law of the land. Now, if money was laid out in either procuring publications or lectures in terms of the objects of the Memorandum, such publications or lectures need not be couched in scurrilous language, and so need not be such as would constitute the crime of blasphemy at common law. Now, need they be criminal under the Blasphemy Act? for here I agree with Lord Buckmaster that the Act is so framed as to make its penalties only apply when there has been what may be termed apostasy. It would not, I think, be safe to found any argument on the fact—but it is a fact sufficiently curious to be mentioned—that the Scottish Parliament two years before the Blasphemy Act passed an Act in similar terms, but omitting the words "having been educated in or at any time having made profession of the Christian religion, etc." In the Repealing Act, 50 Geo. 3, c. 160, this and another older Scottish Act are repealed in toto, while the Blasphemy Act was allowed to stand. How innocuous it was on a true construction may be surmized from the fact that there seem to have been no prosecutions under it.

Criminal liability being negatived, no one has suggested any statute in terms of which it—by which I mean the supposed use of the money—is directly prohibited. There is no question of offence against what may be termed the natural moral sense. Neither has it been held, I think, as being against public policy, as that phrase is applied in the cases that have been decided on that head. Now, if this is so, I confess I cannot bring myself to believe that there is still a terra media of things illegal, which are not criminal, not directly prohibited, not contra bonos mores, and not against public policy. Yet that, I think, is the result of holding that anything inconsistent with Christianity as part of the law of England cannot in any way be assisted by the action of the Courts.

So far, I have dealt with the matter as if the question were one of contract or of trust. Now that there is no trust here is, I think, clear beyond doubt. The trust to be constituted must either be found in some expression of the donor—here the testator—relative to the gift; or in the fact that the donee—here the Society—is a trustee, and that the gift is only given to him in that capacity. But the testator has clogged his gift with no conditions. He has made an absolute gift to a legal entity which is entitled to receive money. The Certificate of Incorporation, in terms of the section quoted of the Companies Act, 1906, prevents anyone alleging that the Company does not exist. Then the law of Ashbury v. Riche is based upon the consideration of what is not intra vires of a statutory corporation, but I have never heard it suggested that it made a Company a trustee for the purposes of its Memorandum. I do not say more, for here I wish respectfully to concur with what is said on this subject by Lord Parker. Trust being out of the reckoning, there can be no doubt that there is here no question of contract. What remains? Nothing but an ordinary action for a legacy at the instance of a legal person that has a right to sue. It is here that I feel disposed to quarrel with the phrase "the assistance of the Courts." I do not see that the Company is seeking the assistance of the Courts to carry out the objects of the Memorandum. It is seeking their assistance only to compel the executor to do his duty, so that it may receive what is legally due to it. If the legacy were due to an individual, the executor would not be heard to discuss the probable uses to which the legatee would put the money. I do not think he can do so in the case of the Society. For after all—and treating the Memorandum, in spite of the opinion I have expressed already, as indicating purposes entirely illegal such as in contract would not serve as foundation for an action—there is no reason why the Society should not employ the money in paying its office rent. For these reasons, and those to be more fully stated by my noble and learned friends who are to follow me, I am of opinion that this Appeal should be dismissed.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.

(READ BY LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.)

My Lords: In considering the questions which arise for decision on this appeal, it is, I think, well to bear in mind certain general and perhaps somewhat elementary principles. At common law the conditions essential to the validity of a gift are reasonably clear. The subject-matter must be certain; the donor must have the necessary disposing power over, and must employ the means recognized by common law as sufficient for the transfer of the subject-matter; and, finally, the donee must be capable of acquiring the subject-matter. If these conditions be fulfilled, the property in the subject-matter of the gift passes to the donee, and he becomes the absolute owner thereof, and can deal with the same as he thinks fit. The common law takes no notice whatever of the donor's motive in making the gift or of the purposes for which he intends the property to be applied by the donee, or of any condition or direction purporting to affect its free distribution in the hands of the donee. It is immaterial that the gift is intended to be applied for a purpose actually illegal, as for example, in trade with the King's enemies—or in a manner contrary to the policy of the law—as, for example, in paying the fines of persons convicted of poaching. In either case, the essential conditions being fulfilled, the gift is complete, the property has passed, and there is an end of the matter. A gift at common law is never executory in the sense that it requires the intervention of the Courts to enforce it.

It may be well to illustrate what I have said by one or two examples. Thus if a testator gives £500 to A, saying that he knows A will expend it in procuring masses to be said for testator's soul, the question arises whether A is a trustee for the purpose indicated. If he be not a trustee, he will in equity take the legacy beneficially; the fact that the trust, if there be a trust, would be unlawful, being quite immaterial. If, however, it be held that A is a trustee, then, as the trust is unlawful, equity will not allow the trustee to retain the legacy. Again, in the case of a simple legacy of £500 to A, where conversations had taken place between A and the testator as to the purposes for which the legacy should be applied, the question would arise whether these conversations rendered it unconscionable for A to take the legacy for his own use. If so, equity would treat him as a trustee. If not, it would allow him to retain the legacy, although the purpose for which the legacy was intended by the testator was unlawful, or otherwise unenforceable. Again, it is well settled that a gift to A to help him in his business is an absolute gift to A, and it is therefore immaterial whether A's business is that of a corn merchant or a receiver of stolen goods. If, however, A were a trustee, the character of the business would be material in considering whether the trust was one which equity would carry into execution.

My Lords, in the present case you will find that the testator has given his residuary estate through the medium of trustees for sale and conversion to the Secular Society, Limited, and the question is as to the validity of this gift. There is no doubt as to the certainty of the subject-matter or as to the testator's disposing power, or as to the validity of his will. So far as the conditions essential to the validity of the gift are concerned, the only doubt is as to the capacity of the donee.

A Secular Charter.

II.

It may be taken as indicative of the growth of public opinion in relation to Freethought that none of the newspapers, religious or secular, that dealt with the case—at least, none that we have seen—found fault with the judgment. It might almost be called a popular verdict, judging from the way it was received. The Christian World, which may be said to be as representative as any paper of English Christianity, said that in its opinion the verdict was "just and right." The Church Times, in a rather more sorrowful vein admitted that the judges could come to no other conclusion, and rubbed home the moral that by the verdict "England is no longer in law, as it has ceased to be in fact, a Christian country." The Guardian makes the best of the situation in the remark that "the religion of the Church can assuredly stand by itself." The Westminster Gazette "welcomes" the decision. The Telegraph, the Manchester Guardian, the Star, and numerous other papers published paragraphs or articles pointing out that the verdict was inevitable, and in accord with enlightened opinions. Even the New Statesman chaffingly remarked that "the Lord Chancellor has yet to discover that it is not illegal in this country to seek to disprove the tenets of Christian dogma."

This chorus of approval is highly significant. A generation ago one may safely say that the virtual disestablishment of religion in our supreme court of law would have given rise to much controversy, and would have aroused much dissent. That its reception has been otherwise is circumstantial proof that the work of Freethought propaganda has not been in vain. For only in a community saturated with heresy would the daily and weekly press have greeted such a verdict in such a manner.

The judgment, indeed, goes further than many people may, at first glance, perceive. The Secular Society, Limited, is a duly incorporated body, and, as a legal entity, it claimed its legal rights. But a reading of the judgments will show that much more than this was involved, and more than this was decided. What the House of Lords verdict settled, once for all, was that bequests to a society formed for the purpose of criticising Christianity are perfectly legal whether the society is incorporated or not. Let me make this point quite clear. Admittedly, bequests made to an unincorporated body are perfectly legal, and may be claimed on establishing evidence of identity. Bequests to secular societies have been contested, not really on the ground of the societies being unincorporated, but on the ground that the purposes for which the societies were formed—i.e., an attack on Christian doctrines—were, in themselves, illegal. (We believe, as we said last week that, provided the gift be absolute, a bequest could have been made good, even under the old reading of the law, but for the moment we may let that pass). But now we have one judge after another, in a Criminal Court, in the Court of Chancery, in the Court of Appeal, and in the House of Lords, all agreeing that there is nothing whatever illegal in such a purpose. It is illegal to attack Christianity, only when the attacks are couched in abusive language, or in language likely to lead to a breach of the peace. That much is clear, and it is final.

Clearly, then, it would be impossible to withold a bequest to, say an unregistered body such as the National Secular Society, on the ground of its being unregistered body. We do not think that position was ever taken up, and we are quite certain it would not now hold if it were. And it is quite impossible to argue that the principles of any secular society are, in themselves, an abusive attack on Christianity. A secular lecturer may use abusive language, but each case would have to be dealt with as it arises. It cannot affect the society, or the combination of individuals who choose to call themselves the society.

An immediate effect of the decision in the Bowman Case is, then, of much wider scope than that of the establishment of the legality of the Secular Society, Limited. It establishes the legality of a bequest to any secular society whether that society be registered or not. That is a consideration of vast importance, and worth bearing in mind. It means, to use the language of the Church Times, "the legal establishment of Secularism." A bequest to a Freethought association is now as good at law as a bequest to a tin tabernacle or to an individual. The purpose of a bequest—if the purpose be a legal one, cannot be affected by the consideration that there is a possibility of its being carried into effect in an objectionable manner.

There remains the question of the Blasphemy Laws. And here we need be on our guard against overestimating the extent of our victory. These still remain, and while they cannot well be used against a society, registered or unregistered, they may still be used against individuals. There was unanimity on the part of the judges that a mere attack on Christianity was not illegal. There was also unanimity that if the attack was not expressed in "decent" or "temperate " language it was illegal. It was also said that under Common Law no prosecution for blasphemy had ever taken place without the accompanying feature of ribaldry or scoffing. That is true, and yet we say, without the least hesitation, that no prosecution for blasphemy ever did take place because of the language used, and no jury ever convicted on that account. The language furnished the excuse for the prosecution, the real thing attacked was the opinion expressed. Canon Law, upon which this particular aspect of the Civil Law is based, quite honestly and properly treated blasphemy as a matter of opinion, no matter how expressed. Historical causes led to its being impossible to take over this principle without some modification in form, but the facts of the situation are plain to all who carefully examine them.

What are the "decencies of controversy," to use Lord Coleridge's famous phrase, that we are asked to respect? No one worth bothering about objects to controversy being conducted in a "decent" manner, or wishes to see controversy carried on in any other way. But what are these "decencies"? There seems to be only one sound test, and that is such rules, written or unwritten, as obtain amongst people in connection with non-religious subjects. If a person uses "indecent" language, prosecute him. If he incites to a breach of the peace, prosecute him. But to both these ends the ordinary law amply suffices. The mere fact of Freethinkers being charged with one or the other offence under a special law is proof positive that the blasphemy laws are maintained, not for the prevention of a breach of the peace, or for securing decency in controversy, but entirely for the purpose of inflicting a penalty upon opinion. It is the protection of religion that is aimed at, the punishment of freethinking that is intended. And the existence of such laws places the safety of Freethinkers at the mercy of a Christian judge and a Christian jury, who have to decide whether the Freethinker has attacked their religion in a manner agreeable to them. And, of course, the answer always has been, and always will be, that it is not. That is why blasphemy prosecutions never fail.

The Blasphemy Laws were ridiculous before the House of Lords decision. They are still more ridiculous now. Christianity, said Lord Sumner, is no part of the laws of England. The statement is rhetoric, not law. That being granted, one may well ask on what reasonable ground the existence of the Blasphemy Laws, or even the establishment of religion can be any longer maintained? On the one side, the State establishes a form of Christianity as the true religion. On the other side, it declares perfectly legal a society which declares such religion to be false and mischievous. Absurdity could hardly go further than that. In the courts the religious oaths may be dispensed with, thus reducing that formula to the level of a purely personal idiosyncracy. Jews, Positivists, Atheists, Agnostics, may enter Parliament, occupy all offices in the State, even administer the law itself. The pretence that freethinking opinion endangers the welfare of the State is, in the face of such facts, so ridiculous that no one outside a pulpit or a lunatic asylum would maintain it. And no one ever pretends that religious subjects cannot be discussed without endangering the peace or threatening good manners.

Had the House of Lords decided against the Secular Society, Limited, its decision would have been a threat against every non-Christian body in England. It would, as Lord Buckmaster pointed out, have prevented the enforcement of a contract by way of payment to author, publisher, or bookseller, where any anti-Christian publication was concerned. As it decided in favour of the Society, it has gone a long way towards justifying the demand for the complete disestablishment of religion in this country. If the Blasphemy Laws are not to be used to protect religion against an attack from opinion, it is ridiculous to preserve them on the pretence that they will protect religion against bad language. Religion has never suffered from the latter, its deepest wounds have been inflicted by the former, and against that there is not, and never has been, a defence strong enough to ultimately defeat attack.

The outcome of the House of Lords' judgment should be, then, the creation of a more insistent attempt to disestablish religion and to wipe out the Blasphemy Laws altogether. So long as these latter remain on the statute books they are a constant menace to real freedom. No one can be sure when they will be put into operation, nor against whom. So soon as religion is recognized as a form of opinion, there is every reason for placing it upon precisely the same level as all other opinions, with no greater safeguards and with no greater disabilities. If the Secular Society, Limited, had lost its case, we should have used our defeat as a reason for renewed endeavours to establish mental freedom. And the Freethought Party will fall short of its duty if it does not utilize this magnificent victory as a stepping-stone to still greater triumphs.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Heretics.

HERESY was for centuries a crime in most Christian countries, punishable by law, and, naturally, heretics were denounced as most disreputable characters, imprisoned, tortured, and often put to death. In 2 Peter ii. 1, we read of "false teachers, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction." In Titus iii. 10, the readers are advised to shun an obstinate heretic, on the ground that he is a pervert and a sinner, being self-condemned. Paul could not endure such a character, but without a moment's compunction said of him: "Let him be anathema." The sin of sins was to contradict the Pauline Gospel. Even if an angel from heaven dared to do that he would be accursed. In Acts xiii. 9, 10, a heretic is thus addressed: "O full of all guile and all villainy, thou son of the Devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?" As is well known, the Pauline Gospel substantially became the Gospel of the Orthodox Church, carrying with it all the rigors of the bigoted Pauline spirit. The faith of the majority was invariably declared to be the true faith, departures from which were called destructive heresies. Harnack says:—

> The sad passion for heresy-hunting, which obtained among Christians as early as the second century, was not only a result of their fanatical devotion to true doctrine, but quite as much an outcome of their rigid organization, and of the exalted predicates of honour which they applied to themselves as "the Church of God." Here the reverse of the medal is to be seen. The community's valuation of itself, its claim to represent the ecclesia tou theou ("the Church of God," or "the Catholic Church," in Corinth, Ephesus, etc.) made it evidently unable to recognize or tolerate any Christianity whatsoever outside its own boundaries (Expansion of Christianity, vol. ii., p. 62-3).

Celsus, one of the earliest and ablest opponents of Christianity, whose arguments Origin tried to refute, gave the following account of that heresy-hunting mania:—

> These people utter all sorts of blasphemy, mentionable and unmentionable, against one another, nor will they give way in the smallest point for the sake of concord, hating each other with a perfect hatred (v. lxiii).

Generally speaking, orthodoxy is the faith of the ruling majority in the Church, and heterodoxy that of a larger or smaller minority. "Ignotus" tells us, in the Manchester City News for May 5, that by a heretic he means, "not a scoffer, not a denier, not a foolish man who boasts of ignorance." Of course, no serious-minded person can honestly be dubbed a "scoffer," nor is any genuine Agnostic foolish enough to "boast of ignorance"; but it is equally certain that every heretic is a "denier." It is his denial of some or all of the dogmas held by the orthodox that constitutes him a heretic. Unquestionably Celsus denied the truth of the Christian religion as a new form of supernaturalism. Unitarians deny the doctrine of the Trinity, the proper Deity of Jesus Christ, and the Atonement. Atheists deny and reject all forms of Theism. They deny the existence of every God that has ever been defined; and in their denial many of them employ ridicule as their most effective weapon. And with all due deference, we venture to characterize "Ignotus" himself as a vigorous denier of at least one fundamental tenet of Christianity, namely, that salvation is impossible without faith in the atoning death of Christ. He maintains that unbelievers not only can but do live righteously, and that the lack of trust in God is no hindrance whatever to the growth and development of the noblest character. The truth of this statement is absolutely incontrovertible; but its truth proves conclusively that the claim so frequently made that a Christless person is hopelessly lost, utterly incapable of devoting himself or herself to the highest human interests, is wholly false and most mischievous in its influence. "Ignotus" lays great stress on this point, and he exhibits exceptional courage in the following passage:—

> Before the Christian era the two supreme men, Pagans both, were Plato and Socrates, and it might be doubted whether any form of Divine faith has produced characters more sublime. But I will pass them by, as they cannot possibly enter into the argument. I will not insist either on the example of Marcus Aurelius, of whose fine moral doctrines and elevated conception of life and duty no praise can be too high. But if I were seeking an Ideal Man—a man who wrought great deeds, who was inspired by the loftiest motions, and whose career was marked by singular purity, courage, unselfishness, and integrity—I should in justice have to recognize a man who deliberately abjured Christianity after it had been offered him—Julian the Apostate, the noblest Emperor who sat upon the Roman throne. Are we to assume that because after long meditation he could not accept a creed unconvincing to his reason, his resplendent life of virtue availed nothing? By the same logic we should make an outcast of John Kyrle, the Man of Ross, and forget his philanthropy while scrutinizing his evangelicalism.

There is nothing in his article to indicate whether "Ignotus" is a supernatural believer or not, though one might not unreasonably infer from certain expressions used that he is not; but the main merit of the letter lies in its eloquent insistence upon the principle that supernaturalism plays no indispensable part in the cultivation of moral excellence, and that some of the greatest benefactors of the human race have been unbelievers. Special attention is called to the fact that "the world is vided up among a multitude of rivals and antagonists, each possessed of the 'one True Faith,'" and then comes the exclamation, "What an amazing spectacle it is!" Indeed, the spectacle is at once amazing, amusing, and saddening; but it is a hopeful and cheering sign of the times that the secular press opens its columns to so sane a writer as "Ignotus." Though we cannot agree with all he says, the spirit that pervades his contributions is uniformly admirable. We may not share his reverence when he asks in regard to theological dogmas, "Cui bono? what does it matter?" but we do fully appreciate his sincerity when he adds:—

> Am I a better man for belief in baptism or transubstantiation? Am I a worse citizen, husband, and father because I doubt or disbelieve them? Why should I perish as a Socinian or be saved as a Trinitarian? And who is to decide my fate in advance, and why? If we had toleration there would be mutual helpfulness, but arrogance is the most besetting sin in Religion and inimical to a true understanding.

The only fault we have to find with "Ignotus" is his use or misuse of the term "religion." He says: "Shall I give any one a painful shock by saying that 'theology' and 'religion' may be quite distinct, may even be opposed? Shall I dare to add that theology—found in creeds and forms and dogmas and decrees—cannot be essential to salvation, cannot even be a direct help to good life, and that it is theology, not religion, that creates the heretic?" "Ignotus" does not define the word "religion," but when he tells us that he "should call Abou Ben Adhem a religious man because he loved his fellow-men," he gives us the right to conclude that he does not attach to it the conventional and historical signification. Leigh Hunt's exquisitely lovely poem shows at once the absurdity and the real significance of such ambiguous use of terms:—

> Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
> Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
> And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
> Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
> An angel writing in a book of gold:—
> Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
> And to the presence in the room he said,
> "What writest thou?"—The vision raised its head,
> And with a look made of all sweet accord,
> Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord."
> "And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
> Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
> But cheery still; and said, "I pray thee then,
> Write me as one that loves his fellow-men."
> The angel wrote, and vanished. The next night
> It came again with a great wakening light,
> And showed the names whom love of God had bless'd,
> And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

There are myriads of people in the world to-day who deeply love and faithfully serve their fellow-beings without believing in God at all. They are not Christians, even without knowing it, and in the traditional and only recognized sense of the word, they are utterly without religion. To them, as to Plato's Socrates in Protagoras, virtue means knowledge, and vice ignorance, and love is the fulfilment of the law of life. They are heretics in the old Athenian sense of having freely chosen their opinions for themselves, and these opinions they find to be helpful to them in the art of living. So far are they from boasting of ignorance that their one aim is to acquire knowledge which they believe is power, and to banish ignorance which they know to be fatal weakness.

Watson's Wonderland.

> For in life's midmost chamber there still burns
> Upon the ancient hearth the ancient fire,
> Whence are all flamelike things, the unquenchable muse
> Among them, who, though meanly lodged to-day,
> In dreariest outlands of the world's regard
> Foresees the hour when man shall once more feel
> His need of her and call the exile home.
> —William Watson.

MR. WILLIAM WATSON is the most austere of contemporary poets. We think of him not as we think of many minstrels, as men singing passionately in the guest-hall, but as a white-robed ministrant at the altar of Liberty, burning, with a severe grace, the incense and the precious gums.

On matters of high moment, indeed, Mr. Watson always sings with dignity. It is not too much to say that Wordsworth's Grave, The Tomb of Burns, In Lalehan Churchyard, and Shelley's Centenary, will be linked indissolubly with the memory of those great writers they celebrate, so penetrating is the insight into the genius of each poet. Maybe, Mr. Watson's finest effort in this direction was his Lachrymæ Musarum, which made so notable a stir when Tennyson died. It must rank as one of the noblest poems we have had for many years, for Mr. Watson handled that great theme of august death right worthily.

Collected works make or mar men's reputations, for so often they are warehouses rather than treasuries. Beside the masterpiece comes the half success; beside the permanent, the temporary, and sometimes the frankly fugitive. But nothing is more gratifying in these days of exaggerated and bubble reputations than to note the steady path along which the fame of Mr. Watson has advanced. He owes his good fortune solely to the sterling merit of his work, for no one has done less to advertise it. Those who look back to the best reviews of the past few years will be surprised to perceive how noiselessly Mr. Watson crept into the hearts of lovers of literature.

No one can read these poems from The Prince's Quest, published nearly forty years ago, to the very latest volume, The Man Who Saw, issued this week, without being struck with the amount of work of the classical quality, of which there can be no question. To begin with, they are a golden treasury of jewelled aphorisms. Take, for instance, the following felicities of expression:—

> The mystery we make darker with a name.
> Not in vague dreams of man forgetting men,
> Nor in vast morrows losing the to-day.
> Now touching goal, now backward hurled,
> Toils the indomitable world.
> Song is not Truth, not Wisdom, but the rose
> Upon Truth's lips, the light in Wisdom's eyes.
> And set his heart upon the goal,
> Not on the prize.

In nothing, perhaps, is Mr. Watson's genius so bright as in his treatment of Nature. When we remember what Catullus, what Lucretius, what Wordsworth, what Tennyson, what innumerable poets have sung in praise of Nature, we might well despair of hearing a new note. But Mr. Watson has a charm and power of his own. Listen! Here is a couplet in The First Skylark of Spring:—

> O high above this home of tears
> Eternal joy sing on!

He can make a picture of a commonplace scene:—

> Where, on the tattered fringes of the land,
> The uncounted flowers of the penurious sand
> Are pale against the pale lips of the sea.

How unforgettable in its way is the following:—

> I beheld the waters in their might > Writhe as a dragon by some great spell curbed
> And foiled; and one lone sail; and over me
> The everlasting taciturnity;
> The august, inhospitable, inhuman night,
> Glittering magnificently unperturbed.

Mr. Watson's humanity is beyond question. In The Purple East and A Year of Shame he impeached Abdul, the Damned. Was ever monarch attacked in such grand and sonorous lines, with such sinewy rhetoric, sounding declamation, pictorial richness, sonnets, written for the purposes of the moment, echoing in the heart, and present in the memory of the men who read them? For Mr. Watson has never lacked courage, witness his Freethought "four square to all the winds that blow." It is playful in The Eloping Angels, a satire in the Byronic vein, and it is serious in The Unknown God:—

> A god whose ghost in arch and aisle
> Yet haunts his temple—and his tomb;
> But follows in a little while
> Odin and Zeus to equal doom;
> A god of kindred seed and line;
> Man's giant shadow, hailed divine.

In a fine sonnet, addressed to Aubrey de Vere, the poet, he expressly voices negation:—

> Not mine your mystic creed; not mine in prayer
> And worship, at the ensanguined Cross to kneel;
> But when I mark your path how pure and fair,
> How based on love, on passion for man's weal,
> My mind, half envying what it cannot share,
> Reveres the reverence which it cannot feel.

In his latest volume, The Man Who Saw, and Other Poems Arising Out of the War, Mr. Watson writes on the subject of the world-upheaval. He has chosen Mr. Lloyd George as the theme of his principal poem, and cramped his poetic genius within the narrow limits of the conventional. It is a real tribute to Mr. Watson's powers to say he is neither rhetorical nor dull. Compared to the official Laureate's later crudities, Mr. Rudyard Kipling's hysterics, and the tiny outbursts of minor poetasters, the dignified lines of Mr. Watson's are, at least, readable. Few real poets could write about contemporary politicians, and remain poets. Even Swinburne and Tennyson, living in an era of far greater men, did not do this thing with impunity, and their political poems represent but the excrement of their genius.

The trouble is that it is well-nigh impossible at present for a man to write exactly what he thinks, as a man, about men in authority, and yet print what he writes. This makes political poetry possible, but improbable, and gives point to the gibe that there is less freedom in Britain under the Guelphs than in ancient Rome under the Cæsars.

Mr. Watson's portrait of Mr. Lloyd George is painted well, and has some of Dryden's vigour:—

> No fabled Merlin, son of mist,
> And brother to the twilight, but a man
> Who in a time terrifically real
> Is real as the time; formed for the time;
> Not much beholden to the munificent Past,
> In mind or spirit, but frankly of this hour;
> No faggot of perfections, angel or saint,
> Created faultless and intolerable;
> No meeting-place of all the heavenlinesses;
> But eminently a man to stir and spur
> Men, to afflict them with benign alarm,
> Harass their sluggish and uneager blood,
> Till, like himself, they are hungry for the goal:
> A man with something of the cragginess
> Of his own mountains, something of the force
> That goads to their loud leap the mountain streams.

This is fine writing, but poets are not always prophets, and it is too soon to say whether Mr. Watson's eulogy is deserved. The verdict of history has yet to be pronounced. The poet is on surer ground in the sonnet in which he salutes America on her entry into the War:—

> Thy place is with the great who know not how > To falter, though their night be without star,
> And their vast agony without anodyne.

Mr. Watson's poems on Germany are white-hot with a scornful fury, intensified by the skill with which the poet makes every word add its share to the full effect. Yet he can get away from these war-like moods, and return to Nature; as in the beautiful lyric, The Yellow Pansy:—

> Winter has swooped, a lean and hungry hawk;
> It seemed an age since summer was entombed,
> Yet in our garden, on its frozen stalk,
> A yellow pansy bloomed.

'Twas Nature, saying by trope and metaphor:
"Behold, when empire against empire strives,
Though all else perish; ground 'neath iron war,
The golden thought survives."

It will be seen that the awful turmoil of the world-war disconcerts Mr. Watson. In all these poems we see the artist struggling with intractable material, and the agony of his mind is reflected in his verse. We feel convinced that this is but a passing mood. We remember gratefully that Mr. Watson has, in his time, given us of his best, and that is the highest kind of poetry. He is one of the singers of the English race who has held his ear close to the movements of the modern world, and brought away with him some sounding echoes of its music. We expect him to leave fulsome adulation of politicians to other writers. Young University men and the editor of Punch can do these little things admirably. We should prefer that a real and unmistakable poet was silent than that he should stammer in such a chorus. We hope that in Mr. Watson's next volume we shall hear again, at its best and freest, that golden voice which has within it the deepest message known to the sons of men. For, in the last analysis, noble thinking means noble writing. All else is as ephemeral as ocean foam.

PEN PICTURES OF MADAME BLAVATSKY.

Mabel Collins, who for over a year co-edited Lucifer with her, said: "She taught me one great lesson: I learned from her how foolish, how 'gullible,' how easily flattered human beings are, taken en masse. Her contempt for her kind was on the same gigantic scale as everything else about her, except her marvellously delicate taper fingers. In all else she was a big woman; she had a greater power over the weak and credulous, a greater capacity for making black appear white, a larger waist, a more voracious appetite, a more confirmed passion for tobacco, a more ceaseless and insatiable hatred for those whom she thought to be her enemies, a greater disrespect for les convenances, a worse temper, a greater command of bad language, and a greater contempt for the intelligence of her fellow-beings than I had ever supposed possible to be contained in one person.—Cited by J. M. Wheeler, the "Freethinker" (Feb. 18, 1912), p. 107.

Her chief strength and the secret of her successes lay in her extraordinary cynicism and contempt for mankind; a cynicism which she used to conceal as a rule with great skill, but which still broke out irresistibly at times. "The simpler and the coarser the phenomena," she subsequently admitted to me, "the more likely it is to succeed. The vast majority of people who are reckoned clever by themselves and others, are hopeless fools.....—V. S. Solovyoff, "A Modern Priestess of Isis," pp. 71-72.

MADAME BLAVATSKY, seeking for a habitation for the marvellous Mahatmas she had evolved from her inner consciousness to replace the now discredited mediums, an abode where they would be secure from the madding crowd of unbelievers and sceptics who detected and exposed the best laid plans for exploiting the multitude, Madame decided that no place could answer better than Thibet. A few travellers had entered the country in disguise, at the risk of their lives, and had brought back accounts of the Grand Lama and the immense monasteries, which had aroused the highest curiosity. Other travellers had been turned back, or, if they had persisted, had been barbarously treated, and barely escaped with their lives. No European had ever, in modern times, penetrated to Lhasa, the capital, which was therefore wrapped in a veil of impenetrable mystery and romance—quite a Rider Haggard flavour about it, in fact. Certainly there must be some very mysterious secret to be guarded so strictly. There was no fear of the Seybert Commission or the Psychical Research Society sending committees to seek out and interview the new wonder-workers whose agent-general in Europe was Madame Blavatsky.

Thibet is very difficult of access, owing to its situation on a plateau 16,000 feet above the sea level; the highest country in the world, cut off from India by the Himalayas. Our troops encountered the greatest difficulties in reaching the country in 1904—three years after Madame Blavatsky's death—and suffered great hardships for want of roads, the severe climate, and the bleak and desolate country. No European had succeeded in penetrating to Lhasa, the capital, until the military expedition under Colonel Younghusband reached there in 1904.

The two Mahatmas more especially at Madame's disposal were Mahatma Morya and Mahatma Koot Hoomi. At the headquarters at Adyah, says Edmund Garrett,— in the "Occult Room" adjoining Madame's bedchamber, hung the famous "Shrine," a sort of cupboard containing a fancy portrait in oils of the condescending Koot. This became associated with as many marvels as the image of a mediæval saint. Suppose you are an intending Theosophist—a hesitating convert, especially a moneyed one, like Mr. Jacob Sassoon. You call at headquarters. You are shown round by Damodar, or by M. or Madame Coulomb, librarian and secretary. With natural curiosity you ask to gaze upon the Master's features. You are told of his indulgent concessions to deserving neophytes seeking for a sign. When the cupboard has been shut again, you are asked if there is anything you particularly desire from the Master. You indicate, not unnaturally, a message. It is about even chances whether the said message—reading generally not unlike Mr. Martin Tupper in his more oracular vein—is discovered in the cupboard immediately on opening the door, or descends from the ceiling on to the top of your head.[1]

General Morgan, a member of the Theosophical Society, records a miracle he saw performed at the shrine. He visited the headquarters to see the wonderful picture of Koot Hoomi. Madame Coulomb, who was in charge of the shrine, threw the doors open, and a china tray that was leaning against one of the doors fell and was smashed to pieces on the hard chunan floor. While Madame was bewailing this unfortunate accident to a valuable article of Madame Blavatsky's, her husband was collecting the fragments. The General suggested some china cement to repair the damage. M. Coulomb was despatched for some. The broken pieces were collected, tied in a cloth, placed within the shrine, and the door locked. Mr. Damodar K. Mavalankar, Secretary of the Society, was present, and the General remarked that, if the Mahatmas considered it of sufficient importance, they would easily restore the broken article. About five minutes after this remark Mr. Damodar, who during this time seemed wrapped in a reverie, exclaimed, "I think there is an answer." The doors were opened, and sure enough the china tray was found to be whole and perfect; not a trace of the breakage was to be found on it. The tray was accompanied by a note, which ran: "To the small audience present. Madame Coulomb has occasion to assure herself that the devil is neither so black nor so wicked as he is generally represented; the mischief is easily repaired."[2] This was a jocular reproof to Madame Coulomb for suggesting that many of the marvels might be due to the Devil.

The General, who came prepared to see marvels, was quite satisfied, and says: "I at once wrote across the note, stating that I was present when the tray was broken and immediately restored, dated and signed it, so that there should be no mistake in the matter." What could be more satisfactory proof for a miracle than this? Witnessed, attested, and signed, all within ten minutes, by a gentleman of the highest integrity and honour!

The report of these marvels soon reached England, and created the widest curiosity. The Psychical Research Society formed a committee to investigate the matter, who, after receiving the oral and written statements of several important witnesses of these modern miracles, decided to send one of their members, Mr. R. Hodgson, to investigate on the spot. Briefly, this is what he discovered. The shrine was fastened against the party wall between the "occult" room and Madame Blavatsky's bedroom. At the back of the shrine there was a sliding panel hidden by a mirror; behind this was a hole in the wall, communicating with Madame Blavatsky's bedroom; this hole being hidden on the other side by a sideboard, which also possessed a sliding panel at the back. So that when M. Coulomb was despatched for the china cement to repair the tray, all he had to do was to slip into the adjoining room, remove the broken fragments from the shrine through the hole in the back, substitute the whole one in its place, accompanied by the note, and the trick was done. "It may be added," says Mr. Podmore, "that Mr. Hodgson was permitted to examine the tray in question; that he ascertained that Madame Coulomb had made purchases at a store in Madras on July 3, 1883, and that two articles of the kind had actually been sold on that day at the cost of 2 rupees and 8 annas the pair—a quite inconsiderable outlay, it will be admitted, for a miracle of this magnitude."[1]

N. S. S. Conference.

Executive's Annual Report.

BY THE PRESIDENT.

FOR the third consecutive year the Executive issues its annual report under the shadow of a great European War. In such a period merely to live is an achievement, and it would not be cause for surprise had that been the sum of our accomplishments. But even in the midst of war a Society, such as the N.S.S., cannot stand still; it must either advance or recede, and the Executive felt that the wiser plan was to press forward in spite of many discouraging circumstances.

Events have quite justified that policy. In spite of difficulties in the way of propaganda, such as increased cost of railway travelling, very limited financial resources, the taking away of many of the younger and more energetic of our workers for service in the Army or Navy, and the commandeering of public halls by the military, a deal has been done towards reviving the propagandist energy of Freethinkers all over the country. In addition to the old centres of propaganda, such as Liverpool, Birmingham, Glasgow, etc., new ones have been visited, and the ground for future work prepared. Nottingham, where there has been no active work for many years, was visited by both the President and Mr. Lloyd, large and enthusiastic meetings were addressed, and there are hopes that next autumn may see a Branch of the N.S.S. formally established. Swansea, another place unvisited by the Society's lecturers for many years, has also received attention, and a Branch established with a fairly large and, certainly, energetic membership. Walsall is also new ground that was broken by Mr. Lloyd, and by Mr. Willis, of Birmingham. Freethought meetings have also been held at Gainsborough and Barrow-in-Furness—the first for very many years. Northward a new Branch has been opened at Falkirk, which, it is hoped, will be the first of a number of new Branches north of the Tweed. It is also pleasing to record that a much larger addition to the membership of the Society has been made during the past twelve months than has been the case for some years past.

At Manchester the work had been in abeyance since the opening of the War. Circumstances here made it advisable for the Executive to take the matter in hand, and after some correspondence the Executive requested the President to see what could be done by personal action. After twice meeting Manchester friends in consultation, it was decided that the best plan would be to formally dissolve the old Society and start a new one. This was done, and the new Branch inaugurated its career with two public meetings addressed by the President, which were in every respect satisfactory. A goodly number of members have been enrolled, and it is hoped that the coming autumn will see the work in this important centre in full swing.

Courses of lectures have also been arranged in London at the Queen's Hall, Langham Place, South Place Institute, and Avondale Hall, Clapham. Other courses would have been arranged in the metropolis but for the difficulty in securing suitable halls. After the War this difficulty will not exist—at least in so great a measure.

It should be added that these courses of lectures, as well as the operations in new centres, and the special meetings in the large Birmingham Town Hall, have all been financed from the Special Propaganda Fund raised by the President last year. Direct grants of money from the same quarter to the Executive and to Branches of the N.S.S. have also to be acknowledged.

In London the general propaganda has been well maintained, and during the winter a continuous series of meetings have been held by both the North London and South London Branches. A very promising start has also been made with a discussion class, conducted by Mr. A. D. Howell Smith, B.A., and held weekly at the Society's office. This is an experiment that might be repeated all over the country; its advantages are manifold, and it may well be the means of developing new speakers, in addition to providing opportunities of education in Freethought for new-comers.

Turning to more general affairs, the Executive has first to congratulate the whole of the Freethought Party on the recent victory achieved in the Law Courts in connection with the Bowman litigation. For more than two years the Secular Society, Limited, has been engaged in litigation which would never have existed but for being anti-Christian in its aims. As it happens, however, the litigation has not been without its good purposes. It has established once for all, and beyond the possibility of further question, that henceforward no bequest can be set aside in English Courts because it will be applied to anti-Christian ends. To have established that principle was well worth all the trouble and expense involved. It marks a very real advance in the history of our movement, and lays down a principle in English law that the courts must in future follow. That this decision will provide the condition for furnishing the Freethought movement with the necessary funds to carry on its campaign is clear, but the moral effects of the case will be even more important than the financial ones. The admitted injustice under which Freethinkers have been placed cannot but have the effect of directing attention to the Freethought position in general, and this must result in both a material and moral gain.

It would be improper for the Executive to dismiss this subject without once more placing on record its sense of the great service done the Cause of Freethought by its late President, G. W. Foote. The Secular Society, Limited, was wholly his creation. He had often characterized it as his legacy to Freethought, and, unlike many legacies, it has turned out more valuable on realization than many had dared to hope would be the case. Its conception was marked by daring and simplicity—two characteristics of real genius; and its final establishment by the judgment of the House of Lords may exert no small influence in clearing away that iniquity of the centuries, the Blasphemy Laws. Finally, the Executive cannot resist pointing out that once more the path has been blazed and the victory achieved by the fighting wing of the Freethought Movement.

It is curious to have to point out that, while the supreme court in this country has been placing liberty of thought upon a firmer foundation, very much smaller courts have been ignoring or setting at defiance laws already in existence which affect Freethinkers. Several cases have occurred during the past two or three years of magistrates and officials insulting or declining to hear witnesses and others who wished to affirm in place of taking the oath, and a particularly flagrant instance occurred in the Clydebank Police Court on March 12 last. A witness—a Mr. Charles Stewart—was not only refused the affirmation, but, after being subjected to quite irrelevant "heckling," was informed that his conduct in refusing to take the oath would be reported to the Procurator Fiscal, with a view to proceedings being taken against him, and, the Executive is informed, was actually charged at the conclusion of the case with contempt of court. The Executive felt that this was a matter requiring prompt attention, and an attempt was made to get the witness's address. The officials, however, refused to give this, not only to private individuals, but to a solicitor who was instructed to inquire into the matter. An interrogation was placed on the question paper of the House of Commons through the friendly offices of Sir George Greenwood, M.P., but was met by the Secretary for Scotland with the reply that the witness had not stated the ground on which he wished to affirm This was nothing better than an evasion. It was the duty of the magistrate dealing with a witness who may have been aware only of the bare fact that the law gave him the right to affirm, to explain on what ground the affirmation might be made. This was not done, and the threat to report the matter to the Procurator Fiscal must be taken as an act of sheer intimidation. Still, the matter cannot be allowed to rest here if it can by any possibility be carried further. On this point the Executive may be trusted to do all that can be done.

One moral emerges clearly from this incident. Freethinkers should, under all conditions, and at all times, insist absolutely upon making affirmation. Such cases of injustice as the one just mentioned are only possible because in certain courts the request to affirm is not an everyday affair. This may, of course, be taken as an indication of the peaceful proclivities of Freethinkers, and it may be freely granted that Christians will always be in an overwhelming majority in police and other courts. Still, by those Freethinkers who do appear in courts insisting upon their rights, they will render the frustration of the Oaths Act of 1888 more infrequent, if not impossible.

It will be remembered that the last Conference passed a special resolution condemning the action of the London County Council in prohibiting the sale of literature in the public parks, and authorized the Executive to resist such an interference with the right of propaganda to the utmost of its power. The Executive lost no time in putting that resolution into effect. With the co-operation of other London organizations, very soon between thirty and forty different societies were affiliated, including the London Trades Council, with its membership of some 60,000. Of this Protest Committee Mr. Verinder, a gentleman who bears an honoured record as a champion of freedom of thought, is chairman, Miss Vance acts as Secretary, and your President is a member as representing the N.S.S. Perfect unanimity has characterized its proceedings, and we venture to prophesy that this unanimity will continue.

The contest from the date of the last Conference until now may be briefly described. The resolution of the L.C.C. was to take effect from September 30. Despite that prohibition literature was sold in the parks right through October and part of November, until the bitter winter weather forced a desistence, if, for no other reason, because there were no people to whom literature could be sold. Literature has again been sold right through the present month, and although the names and addresses of the sellers have been taken, nothing has been heard from the Council save a letter received some months back by the N.S.S. Secretary from the Council's solicitor pointing out that literature had been sold in November last, and that unless an undertakirg was given not to repeat the offence proceedings would be taken. The undertaking was not given, the "offence" has been repeated, and no proceedings have been taken.

The Council was warned from the outset that this resolution

Mrs. Humphrey Ward protests against the extension of the suffrage to women on the ground that the real ground of the vote is physical force. But this is sheer nonsense. Physical force never was, and is not now, the ground of the vote. We even venture to say that it has never been secured on that basis. The ground of the vote is the moral—or social—right of people to have a deciding voice in their own destiny. That physical force is more or less present in all human affairs goes without saying, but it is not decisive and ultimate. But one wonders why, if Mrs. Ward believes that the question of the vote for women should be decided on the ground of mere physical strength, why she objects to the doctrine of physical force as applied to the world by certain German writers? If physical force is to settle matters within the State, why may it not be permitted to settle matters between States? Mrs. Ward's sociology appears to be as unsatisfactory as her theology.

Billy Sunday, the American evangelist, who is out to convert New York, appears to be a great favourite with heaven. The other day he asked the Lord for thirty converts, and at once the Lord gave him forty-eight. Surely, Billy Sunday woefully neglects his duty. While at it, why did he not ask for the whole population of the United States? He would have got Canada and the South American Republics into the bargain. If Sunday and the other revivalists did their work properly, there would not be a Freethinker on the earth.

The Daily Chronicle's piety is notorious, but it sometimes takes quaint shapes. Writing of St. Mark's Church, Venice, it adds "which Ruskin's ghost has doubtless protected from destruction from Austrian bombs." Doubtless, Ruskin's "ghost" is as potent as any other Christian bogey.

Many things appear in the press which might have been expressed differently. A Sunday paper, under the headline "Lunatics on the Land," says that patients from the London County Council Asylum at Brunswick House are working on agriculture under the supervision of the chaplain.

The Rev. C. R. Purser, a Rangoon missionary, says Bibles are sold for reasons which were not Christian. A New Testament was sold for a rupee with promises that the possessor would obtain houses, fields, and cattle.

A daily paper remarks on the changed appearance of the frequenters of the May meetings. Instead of the "well-nourished vicar" and "the coloured evangelist," oddly reminiscent of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," we see instead "the Church militant in the person of the khaki-clad Army Chaplain, hardly distinguishable except by his clerical collar." Yet these khaki-clad clergymen do not fight, and they draw pay in pounds instead of shillings.

The newspapers are publishing paragraphs concerning an English lady of title who is working as a saleswoman in a New York millinery shop. There is nothing startling in this, for Christians profess to believe that the "King of Kings" worked at a carpenter's bench.

Dean Inge has the reputation of telling his hearers unpleasant truths. This was his offence at St. Paul's when, preaching on Ascension Day, he said that "all must agree there had been something wrong with the Christianity of Europe, otherwise the present hideous calamity, the War, would not have happened." Unfortunately, all Christians do not agree with him; but he is perfectly right. We are at one with the Dean; but we go further and assert that Christianity in Europe has been not only a gigantic failure but a fundamentally fraudulent system, resulting in scarcely anything but harm to the countries wherein it has borne sway.

Principal Sir George Adam Smith, preaching before the General Assembly of the United Free Church of Scotland, on retiring from the Moderatorship, declared that "the more patiently we regarded the War the more it not only proved to embrrass faith, but to correct the faults of faith, and to supply a fuller and more thorough theology." Then he added: "Never in history had God's way been clearer to the people." The puzzling fact, however, is that never in history has God's way been clearer to the German people. So their professors and pastors have persisted in affirming ever since the War began. Are they, as well as we, not fighting in the name of the Lord, and is not their Emperor constantly thanking Heaven for successes achieved, and passionately praying for the final victory? Of course, clergymen cannot afford to admit that the War is fatal or confusing to faith; but the fact remains that, in spite of all their specious arguments, multitudes of their hearers are losing their faith because of the War.

A touching example of war-time economy is recorded by an evening paper, which mentions that an earl and his countess travelled third-class on the railway recently, and asks indignantly where this sort of thing is to end? We may soon expect to hear that the bishops are discarding their carriages and motors, and are journeying on the lowly animal on which their Master entered Jerusalem.

At the Church of England Zenana Meeting, at Queen's Hall, it was stated that many missionaries were prevented from going out because the Government will not, at present, grant passports. It appears as if religious folk have lost the art of walking on the water, as practised in Biblical days.

Mrs. Flora Anna Steel writes that "we are up against the bread habit of the poor," Unfortunately, the poor cannot emulate King Nebuchadnezzar, the Biblical hero, who ate grass.

In the announcement of a meeting at the Albert Hall to protest against the manufacture of alcohol during the War, the name of Harry Lauder, who was among the speakers, was printed three times as large as the names of the Bishop of London and Dr. Clifford. Doubtless, the organizers of the meeting knew which was the star-turn.

"Pain plus God," says the Rev. Thomas Phillips, of Bloomsbury, "may be be understandable because, if we bring in God and the cross of Calvary, pain may be seen to be the cost of progress." But pain is the cost of progress whether we believe in God or not. Dragging God in does not help to an understanding; it only makes the fact morally revolting instead of its being an unpleasant and natural one. If our belief is minus God, pain is just one of the facts we have to face as we face other natural facts, and see how we can wrest it to our advantage. If our belief is plus God, we have to overcome the healthy repugnance to a Deity who deliberately arranged matters so that the progress of one generation should be purchased at the expense of the suffering of another. Pain without God is a natural fact; pain with God is a moral nightmare. And it is to the credit of human nature that it has been so largely felt to be such.

> Bread and wine being unavailable for a communion service at the Front, Chaplain Major Miles, D.S.O., tells of substitutes in the form of chips of Army biscuits, and some watered apple jam strained off with a little rum added.

We wonder which ingredient was the most attractive in this war-time communion mixture? May we suggest to Chaplain Miles that if he can see his way to add a bottle of Bass's beer to each administration of the sacrament, his congregation is likely to be the largest ever held.

The Methodist Times is not pleased with the description of the soldiers' attitude towards religion as described by the Rev. N. S. Talbot. Mr. Talbot says that although the men "do not formulate it to themselves, the glories of human nature go beyond anything they know of the Divine. For them God is less wonderful than man." Naturally so. And how could it be otherwise? God is always less wonderful than man if for no other reason than because man makes God, and is always capable of more than he puts into that work. And as all the gods of a civilized people are inherited, it follows that they are usually a long way behind their worshippers. Hence the number of people who are always engaged in god-repairing, which is about as wasteful as repairing a worn-out machine. The scrap-heap is the proper place for both.

A Sunday paper has been calling attention to the drones in the West-end of London, and suggests that such people are useless to the nation in the present strenuous time. But what about the 50,000 clergy who are exempted from military service, many of whom only work about one day weekly?

A lady has written a book with the quaint title, The Swine Gods. One cannot imagine a rasher inscription.

Canon Carnegie, preaching at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, called attention to the need of stricter economy in the consumption of bread. He might have suggested the abandonment of the use of bread in Communion services.

Where is the religious revival to be found of which we read and hear so much? It is not in the Wesleyan Methodist Church, for in that communion, according to statistics for the past year, there were notable decreases in both Church membership and Sunday-school scholars. "The principal net decreases are: Membership, 3,870; members 'on trial,' 187; junior members, 4,516; Sunday-school teachers, 730; Sunday-school scholars, 20,396; Wesley Guild, 13,154." Similar losses have taken place in other Free Churches during last year. It is estimated that the Free Church Sunday-schools lost about a hundred thousand scholars. To a writer in the Christian World: "The facts are distinctly disturbing," while to us they are not disturbing but distinctly illuminating.

Preaching at St. Peter's Church, Vere Street, London, Dean Inge said "real Christians would always be in a small minority." No wonder pious folk call him "the gloomy dean."

A fortune of £156,354 was left by the late Prebendary Moss, of Shrewsbury. The deceased had small opportunity of estimating the blessings of poverty mentioned in the Gospels.

Speaking at the Albert Hall on the drink question, the Bishop of London said it was solemn hypocrisy to read the King's Proclamation in church if people were not going to live up to it. The Bishop ought to be a good judge of "solemn hypocrisy."

The Turner drawings at the Victoria and Albert Museums are not on view on Sundays, and Mr. Mark H. Judge explains that the donors made it a condition of their gift that they should not be shown on that day. Mr. Judge remarks on this that "so long as we accept gifts thus restricted in their promises, Sunday opening can never point to the complete triumph that it otherwise has won, and the Sabbatarian can boast their victory over the spirit of the times." We would add to this that, in our opinion, it is quite unworthy a modern State to accept gifts bequeathed in so narrow and so mean a spirit. A gift to the State should be a gift to the State. For a Government to connive—even unknowingly—at the perpetuation of individual narrowness because it takes the form of a gift is dishonourable to all concerned. It is a striking example of the power of the dead over the living.

Father Bernard Vaughan has fallen foul of Mr. H. G. Wells's theology, and describes the novelist's deity as a "brand-new god." In plain English, the faithful are asked to patronize the old firm.

QUERIST (Morton).—Certainly the Church dominates in such matters as Births, Christenings, Marriages, and Deaths, but there is no reason whatever why this should continue so. If we take "passing" as the equivalent of christening, all these functions are essentially of a civic nature, and are, in many cases, celebrated as such. Children may be publicly named, there is the civic ceremony of marriage, and there is the civic, or secular, ceremony over the grave.

L. R.—Pleased to have your appreciation of our notices of new books. We hope to make this a more regular feature, and we have not forgotten our intention to issue a monthly literary supplement—one day.

C. JORTAN.—Order handed to Shop Manager. Thanks for congratulations on our conduct of the Freethinker.

STUDENT.—Two very noteworthy recent works on the subject are Durckheim's Elementary Forms of the Religious Life, and Wundt's Elements of Folk Psychology, but both are expensive works—15s. each.

A. C. WELLS.—Thanks for English Mechanic reference to the Bowman Case. The Editor thinks the Lords "took the right view." So does everyone else.

MISS VANCE, General Secretary of the National Secular Society and Secretary of the Secular Society, Ltd., writes: "Could you find space in your columns to allow me to thank the many friends who continue to send congratulations to both Societies, through me, on the glorious victory achieved in the Bowman case? not the least important of these being a resolution from the Annual Congress of the Union of Ethical Societies and a congratulatory letter from the Directors of the Rationalist Press Association. It is in no small degree a compensation for the long and weary years of waiting to know that our welfare lay so near to the hearts of our friends."

J. ROBINSON.—Thanks for copy of the letter you have written to your representative on the Council concerning the sale of literature in the parks. The letter is an excellent one, and to the point; and we should like to see thousands of our readers equally energetic along the same lines.

R. MCLAUGHLIN.—Glad to learn that you secured two new readers this last week. We hope all the rest of our readers will go one better.

G. RULE.—We should have been pleased to have published your notes on the N. S. S. Conference but for the scant space at our disposal this week. We note, however, your appreciation of the Society's work and vitality, also the complimentary references to its officials. As you say, there is plenty of enthusiasm in the Party, and, we believe, plenty of good material, if it can only be developed and utilized.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

This week's Freethinker is largely a society issue. The report of the Bowman Case, the N.S.S. Annual Report, and the report of the demonstration on Sunday last, fill a great deal of our space, and some articles and other matters have had to be set aside. But we think our readers will quite agree that few numbers have been issued of greater general interest than this one. Next week we publish the report of the morning and afternoon sittings of the Conference.

Readers will be able to judge the quality of the speeches at the evening meeting by the summary given elsewhere in this issue. All we feel impelled to say is that from the beginning to the end the meeting never flagged. All the speakers were in fine form, and the audience cheeringly responsive. A very cordial welcome was given to Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, and Mr. A. Howell Smith's maiden conference speech brought to an end a successful, even a remarkable meeting.

We referred last week to the general impression that, as a result of the victory in the Bowman Case, the Secular Society, Limited, would receive a bequest of £10,000. We should have been pleased to say that this was so; but, unfortunately, it is far from the truth. As we said, the gross value of the estate was represented by that figure, but there are considerable deductions to be made, both in the way of charges on the estate and expenses of litigation, in addition to clearing off certain debts incurred by the Society. What remains will represent the sum available for the Society's work. What that will be exactly, it is impossible to say. It is only safe to say that it will be a long way off the original sum.

In the circumstances, the Board of Directors is of opinion, and in this we quite concur, that the clearest and best plan is to outline the general situation. So far as the Board is concerned, what it had to do was to watch the case, and find the necessary funds to carry on the fight. The lines of defence were marked out by Mr. Foote, in consultation with the solicitors, before the first hearing, and these lines have been adhered to throughout. The difficulty was to find the funds. This was done in various ways. In the first place, all the members of the Board did what lay in their power in the shape of advancing loans to the Society. But much more was needed. At the request of the Board, Mr. Cohen undertook to raise £250 by private loans to meet pressing legal charges in connection with the hearing of the case before the Court of Appeal. In response came offers, not of £250, but of nearly £700, while two gentlemen separately offered to find the whole of the £250 if needed. The Society was thus assured that the fight would not languish for want of money. In addition to this, an offer of help came from another quarter. The Rationalist Press Association, recognizing that the case was one which struck at its charter no less than that of the Secular Society, and that our cause was theirs, very kindly offered to assist the Secular Society with a loan to the extent of at least £500. Very properly the Board accepted this offer, and £350 was borrowed to meet legal expenses. We wish to specially acknowledge this loan, as there was a tacit understanding that had the verdict gone against the Society, the money advanced by the Rationalist Press Association would have been as good as lost.

Thus, in addition to the two sums of £250 and £350 respectively, there are legacy duties on the estate, certain other legacies to be paid, two years' very heavy legal expenses to be met (the Society's costs were given in the House of Lords, although how much will be received remains to be seen), and the repayment of loans advanced by the members of the Board. Further, there is a sum of nearly £300 to be paid that was owing to Mr. Foote at the date of his death, which will be paid to Mrs. Foote, and about three years' salary owing to the Secretary, Miss Vance. (It would, perhaps, be more accurate to say that this is owing to those friends from whom Miss Vance has been compelled to borrow the amount due, but that will not affect the Society's indebtedness.) When all these charges are met, what is left will represent the net residue. How much that will be no one can yet say. On a rough guess, we should be inclined to put it at somewhere about a third of the gross value of the estate. We hope we under-estimate the value of the residue.

There is one other matter that should be mentioned. Ostensibly the fight was for a bequest; actually we were fighting for a principle. But it is difficult, apparently, to persuade Christians that there is nothing higher to fight about than money; and on four occasions—once verbally and thrice by letter—the Board was approached with an offer of compromise. The last offer came only a few hours before the case came on for hearing in the House of Lords. But on each occasion the reply was the same. A compromise would not be accepted on any condition whatever. We would either establish our right to the bequest or lose it altogether. To have acted otherwise would have been to commit a fatal blunder. It would have exposed the Society to blackmail every time a legacy matured, and it would have left the question of our legal position still undecided. Besides, Secularists are not built of the stuff that compromises easily. We are a fighting Party, and when we cease to fight we may as well cease to exist. So the case was fought, and won. If it had taken every penny of the legacy, and more beside, to win that fight, it would have been worth it. It means the opening of a new chapter in the history of Freethought.

Mr. Eden Phillpotts writes:—

> Let me be among those who join the chorus of satisfaction at the issue of the Secular Society's two years' struggle. The verdict can never again be challenged and a grievance of long standing is righted. One could almost wish there was another world that G. W. Foote's ghost might learn this great victory!

Newcastle friends are requested to note that the time of meetings have been changed to 6.30. On Sunday, June 3, Mr. J. W. Mee gives his first Freethought address in Newcastle at the Collingwood Hall on "Why I left the Christian Religion."

of theirs would meet with the most determined opposition. A deputation from the Protest Committee placed the position before the Parks Committee, but without effect. Thanks to the activity of Councillor Jesson—to whom we are all indebted for the gallant fight he has made, also to the Rev. Stewart Headlam—the matter has been twice referred back by the General Council to the Parks Committee for reconsideration, but without result. There is, therefore, nothing left but for the Committee to proceed with its resistance, and, if necessary, to carry the matter into the High Courts, where it is to be hoped a keener sense of the sanctity of public right will be shown than has been exhibited by a body of men whom the accident of an election has placed in a position of temporary power.

Of one thing we may all rest assured. It is not merely the sale of literature the Council is aiming at—although that would be serious enough. It is the right of public meeting that is being attacked, and that this move should have been made during the progress of an European War only serves to make the attack more dastardly. Fortunately, public attention was called early to the matter. The article in the Freethinker for June 11, 1916, was the first call to the advanced movements of London to defend their threatened right, and there is some reason for believing that had the Council realized how strong the resistance would be, the resolution would not have been passed. Having passed it, the Parks Committee mistaking obstinacy for strength, sees fit to adhere to its resolution. It cannot plead in extenuation public demand, since, on its own admission, no complaints have been made. It cannot urge trouble to park officials, it is confessed that there has not been the least annoyance or friction over the sales. It is nothing but sheer reaction, and to that there can be but one answer—determined resistance against the abrogation of a public privilege that was enjoyed in many places long before the London County Council came into existence.

The Executive regret that during the year it has not found it possible to put into operation the resolution passed at the last Conference concerning the organization of a systematic press propaganda. To be well done, it would require a person specially selected for the work, and during the past year the opportunity of arranging this has not offered itself. Perhaps something in this direction may be attempted in the near future.

The Executive has to report with regret the death of one of its Vice-Presidents, Mrs. M. E. Pegg, of Manchester. Mrs. Pegg had been for over thirty years a devoted worker in the cause of Freethought; although illness during the last three or four years had prevented her being as active in its service as of old, her devotion to the Cause never faltered, and, till the end, her concern for the future of the work in Manchester was as keen as ever. Her death removes a very familiar and respected personality from both the city in which she resided and from these Annual Conferences.

Two other familiar names in the world of Freethought removed by death are those of William Platt Ball and W. J. Ramsey. Both names are well-known to the older generation of Freethinkers. Mr. Ball was always of a quiet and retiring disposition, but his scientific frame of mind and scholarly character made him a valuable asset to the Party in its earlier and more strenuous times. His one ideal was truth, his one aim the benefiting of his fellows. Unselfish in his death as in his life, no cause ever claimed a more worthy or more devoted follower.

Mr. W. J. Ramsey had dropped out of the public view of late years, owing to ill-health having robbed him of his activity. But he was a well-known figure over thirty years ago, both as a worker and a lecturer. He was associated with G. W. Foote in the foundation of the Freethinker in 1881, and was one of the indicted persons in the Freethinker prosecution in 1883. His sentence was nine months' imprisonment, and he served that term without fear. In his death we salute the passing of one of the many who have suffered through Christian bigotry and malevolence.

Sir Hiram Maxim was a name better known as the inventor of the Maxim gun than that of a Freethinker—Christians being far more appreciative of a weapon that would blast bodies than of a thought that would elevate minds. But his death deserves recording as that of a well-known public man who never hid his heresy, and refused to do even the homage of silence to conventional religion. His funeral, which was a Secular one, attracted wide public attention, although the newspapers, in their biographies, strangely overlooked the existence of his heretical opinions.

Apart from the specific work of the National Secular Society during the year, the Executive feels it advisable to say a word on the general position of Freethought in this country, and also on the immediate outlook. It is now admitted by the Churches that the expected revival of religious belief, consequent on the War, has not transpired. On the contrary, the position of organized religion was never so low and so desperate as it is at the moment. Whether the Churches, by means of combination with other reactionary forces, will retrieve themselves remains to be seen. But, for the moment, the fact is undeniable that the War, by destroying the traditional authority of the Churches, has led thousands of men and women to consider the validity of those beliefs upon which they were based—with consequences disastrous to them.

It would be idle to assume that so soon as the War is concluded, if not before, strenuous efforts will not be made by the Churches to regain their lost prestige. They are, indeed, hard at that work already, and we must never lose sight of the fact of their enormous latent power and of the prestige bestowed upon them by their position and financial resources as well as by the influence of the interests these institutions subserve. Religion, we must remember, is still established in the schools, in the Senate, and in most of our public institutions. It is still to the fore in all Civic and State ceremonials. The Blasphemy Laws, with their potentialities for evil, remain, despite the recent decision in the House of Lords, which may even be used by our enemies as an argument against their abolition. And there is always the vast mass of superstition latent with the general public ready to be quickened into activity when a favourable opportunity offers itself.

Your Executive feels that the present moment is one pregnant with the possibilities of reaction, but it is not less full of the possibilities of advancement. If the Churches are nerving themselves to recover ground lost during the War, it should be our task to see that that effort meets with the failure it deserves. The call of the moment is for concerted effort and effective organization. A serious attempt should be made to organize the very many thousands of Freethinkers in this country whose opinions are ineffective only through lack of co-operation. There ought not to be a single large centre of population but that should have its Secular Society carrying on a regular and an effective propaganda. In this direction the industrial North, and the large towns and cities of the West of England, offer promising ground. South Wales is also a field ripe for work, and one that would well repay exploitation. Those who share our opinions were never so numerous. The weapons placed in our hands by science, by philosophy, by literature, were never so keen, so finely tempered, as they are to-day. The present is admittedly a time of unsettlement—a moment when old institutions are being subjected to a keen, almost a fierce, scrutiny. And it will be largely the fault of Freethinkers themselves if they allow so favourable a moment to pass without a serious and united endeavour to divert human aspiration and energy into those channels which alone can make for Enlightenment, Freedom, and Progress.

Demonstration at South Place.

NOTABLE SPEECHES BY FREETHOUGHT LEADERS.

DESPITE the shadow of the European War there was a note of quiet jubilation at the public meeting in connection with the Annual Conference of the National Secular Society, held on Whit-Sunday evening at South Place Institute; the President, Mr. Chapman Cohen, being in the Chair. The reason was not far to seek, for the long-contested action concerning the validity of the Bowman legacy to the Secular Society, Limited, had resulted in a splendid and decisive victory for the Freethinkers, and henceforth the worst shackles which have hampered intellectual liberty in this country will be things of the past. Freethought has had very severe trials during the past three years, and has suffered more directly, perhaps, from the consequences of the War than any other advanced organization; but the winning of the Bowman Case will open for it a new epoch of greatness as one of the principal torch-bearers of civilization.

The platform was a representative one, and beside the President, included Messrs. J. T. Lloyd, A. B. Moss, W. Heaford, F. Willis (of Birmingham), A. D. Howell Smith, and Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner.

MR. CHAPMAN COHEN had a most enthusiastic welcome, and his speech was punctuated throughout with applause. He opened by remarking that the fifty-first annual demonstration of the National Secular Society put that organization in some little danger of being counted respectable. In all the previous half century there was never a more important and critical moment than the present. For three years the Christians of Europe have shown the value of Christian love and sentiment. Freethinkers have always had two main charges against the Christian religion; first that it was not true, and second that it was not useful, and we have to thank Christians themselves for showing that the charges were correct by three years' war. Christianity was not even a good policeman. When men's passions rose, religion fanned them; when atrocities were committed, religion sanctioned them. The War had driven home the vital truth that there was not a villainy of which the human mind was capable which religion would not endorse if it suited its purpose. Religion has lost the chance of being regarded as the champion of right, truth, and justice. The War has unsettled men's minds, and thousands were examining the foundations of religion, and turning their backs on it.

For over two years the Secular Society, Limited, had been engaged in litigation, which had resulted in an epoch-making judicial decision. The Churches had, through the law, robbed Freethought of thousands of pounds, and then calmly asked the Freethinkers where was the money stolen from them. Now, however, money left for Freethought was as safe as money left to a tin tabernacle or for the purpose of providing South Sea Islanders with socks. It was a belated recognition that Freethinkers were human beings. The judges were unanimous that religion could be criticized provided that it was done decently. Blasphemy is talking about a man's religion in a way he doesn't like. If Freethinkers were tried by Mohammedans or Jews, they might get a fair trial, but they were dragged before a Christian jury. The Blasphemy Laws only punish honest people, who tell what they think. Liars and knaves were never in any danger. This explains why outspoken heresy was scarce, for such laws put a tax on honesty and a premium on humbug and hypocrisy. Freethinkers must use victory as a stepping stone to greater things.

Religion was enthroned in our civic life, in Parliament, in law courts, civic ceremonials, and in schools, where minds of little children were poisoned. Fortunately, Freethinkers were in never so fine a position to attack religion. The weapons to-day are so much more powerful and effective. We can deal a thousand blows where our predecessors could only deal one; we can give a deadly wound where our ancestors could only scratch. The present War was really a small matter compared with the battle between Reason and Unreason, which had been going on for three hundred years, and even longer. For the greatest explosive forces in the world are ideas. It was the force of an idea that in 1789 made the downtrodden peasants of France propagandists of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity throughout the world. It was the force of an idea that sent tens of thousands in Russia to dungeons and to exile. It was the force of an idea that shattered the great Catholic Church of the Middle Ages, and made despots and tyrants tremble. Victory was certain. Freethinkers had only to carry on until they planted the flag of freedom on the dismantled fortress of superstition.

The veteran, MR. A. B. MOSS, followed, and said that the National Secular Society had passed through a half century of hard work, and commenced the second half century by a great achievement. The law now recognized the Freethinker as a citizen. This was a great advance on the position years ago when a Freethinker could not even sue for debt. Let us never forget the work of the pioneers. It was the splendid courage of the great Charles Bradlaugh that led to Freethinkers being able to give evidence by affirmation instead of using the barbaric Christian oath, and it was G. W. Foote who devised the instrument which made the Bowman victory possible. Christians are now giving up the fundamentals of their religion. They do not preach of the Fall and of the Atonement, and the parsons only concern now is their deity. They begin to realize that if they no longer foster a belief in a Heavenly Father religion goes. Mr. Wells has found a new god—an invisible king. If invisible how does he know that he is a king? Even, then, kings are at a discount, and gods will soon be so. A deity who meant well and cannot accomplish his purpose is useless to mankind. Hence Christians find it so difficult to explain what God is doing in the present War. What they want is a wonder-worker. Not all the troublous tribe of priests can perform one little miracle to mitigate the horrors of this War. What treasures in blood and money had been squandered on War. What could not have been accomplished if the money and energy had been devoted to the welfare of the rising generation.

MR. J. T. LLOYD was eloquent and forceful. He said he was proud of the title of Freethinker, a name at which our opponents made merry. They taunted us with the name of loose thinkers, whereas the fact remained that we were the most careful, precise, and logical thinkers in the world. We were free in the sense that we were unbound, untied, unshackeled, loosened from the bonds of superstition and the terrors of tyrannical authority. We think for ourselves, and our thoughts were unrestricted by dogmas. In the service of Freethought such men as Bruno and Servetus were burnt alive. Richard Carlile spent over nine years in gaols. He was proud to be a humble servant in so great a cause. Our crime was attacking religion, a crime of which the early Christians were themselves guilty. Why do we assail it? We do not force ourselves into private houses, or buttonhole strangers in the street. We address ourselves to those who choose to come and hear us. Our open-air speakers are often targets for insults. We attack Christianity because it is false and a source of harm to mankind. Its miracles are untrue; its foundations are false, yet multitudes have been put to death for denying their truth. No religion has had such a triumphant career, because she ruthlessly suppressed her opponents. In the fourth century Christians destroyed the magnificent library of Alexandria. In a nutshell that is the historical attitude of the Christian Church towards heresy. It was simply a triumph of brute force. She won Europe, not by loving her enemies, but by crushing them. In the awful massacres of the Albigenses and Huguenots over a million persons were murdered. The Protestant reformers were also persecutors; and the Christian superstition has ever relied on coercion. Religion still stands in the way of progress, but doomsday is coming. The Bowman case judgment has proved it, and a leading church paper sorrowfully admits that the result of the litigation is that "England is no longer in law, as it has long ceased to be in fact, a Christian country." Freethinkers appeal to humanity, and, in the end, will come out more than conquerors.

MRS. BRADLAUGH BONNER made a telling speech, and said that our opponents, in the conduct of the Bowman case, hoped to injure us and to enrich themselves. Fortunately, the law acted like a boomerang, and the action resulted in their being impoverished. The result was that in these black days of national suffering new gleams of hope had appeared for Freethought. It was remarkable that in days when national liberties were being sacrificed, that Freethinkers should secure liberty denied to them for five centuries. During the whole of its history Christianity had never replied to argument by argument, but always relied on the stake and the prison. But things are changing. A great judge has declared that the boast that Christianity is part and parcel of the law of England is "mere rhetoric." The result is due to the growth of Humanism. The Blasphemy Laws still disgrace the Statute Book, and there is always a danger that they may be used. We have to set to work to get these laws repealed, and strike off the last of the fetters on intellectual liberty. The Churches have captured the schools, and Freethinkers must see that they fight for the children no less than for adults. Fifty years ago the National Secular Society held its first Conference, and the pioneers who bore the heat and burden of the day handed to us a precious inheritance. Let us see that we, in our turn, hand it on unimpaired to our children.

Another veteran, MR. W. HEAFORD, followed with a lively speech. He expressed the hope that he would be preserved to attend the next fifty one Conferences, to give full expression to his irrepressible juvenility. His youthfulness was due to the fact that he had ever sought inspiration from Freethought. Over forty years ago he frequented the London Hall of Science, and listened to the great men of the past. It was good to know that that their devoted labours had not been in vain. If Bradlaugh and Holyoake were alive to-day, they would rejoice at our great victory, which promises a richer legacy of liberty to our children. It was significant that the republics were all fighting on one side in the present War, and that the reactionary nations were all on the other side. A new era in European politics had been opened by the revolution in Russia, and he saluted the new era of Liberty which sheds its rays of hope on 170,000,000 people, and that so great a nation had been gained for the cause of Freedom. We are the heirs of Liberty, and we must see to it that priests no longer trample on the happiness and liberties of mankind.

MR. F. WILLIS, of Birmingham, had a most cordial reception. He said that at the recent Holyoake Centenary celebrations the press had slurred over or ignored the great reformer's association with Freethought. This was part of a press campaign against liberty. Secularism had been declared to be dead again and again, but he had never seen such a lively corpse. Freethought leaders were always credited with absurd and ridiculous actions, and all of them had been declared to have taken out a watch and asked an offended deity to strike them dead. It was the clerical method of avoiding dangerous argument. The clergy, however, were compelled to change their position. The hell of Spurgeon was now handed over to the care of the Salvation Army orators. Priests were now getting ashamed of their deity, who was resolved into a Divine Immanence. If Freethinkers were bolder Freethought would grow ten times more rapidly. The clergy were the veriest weathercocks. In times of quiet the Prince of Peace was pushed into the foreground, but in War time he was superseded by the God of Battles. If men would see what religion does for civilization they had only to look at the Catholic countries of Europe. The Freethinker had no hell to be afraid of, and no heaven to be bribed with. He warmed both hands before the fire of life, and when it sank was ready to depart.

MR. HOWELL SMITH made an excellent impression in a maiden speech. He said he was proud to stand in a building around which clustered so many memories of great men as South Place Institute. When Bradlaugh died he was himself a boy of eleven, and had been brought up in a very religious household. He was told a great infidel had passed away, and heard the hope expressed that God had spoken to his soul. Now Christians express the hope that Bradlaugh had gone to heaven—not that the great Freethinker would be happy in such a place. Few people take their religion seriously to-day. Like Mrs. Gamp with her gin, they say "Put it on the mantelpiece until I am so disposed." The clergy welcome any help, and annex extraordinary allies. They claim Eucken, Bergson, and others as Christians when they know these men have little regard for God and immortality. The clergy will stick to Christianity so long as there is money and power left in it, and to-day it was simply an organized hypocrisy. Let the Churches keep their God they took from a printed book while they can. Their doom was nearer than they thought, for Freethinkers could say with the old Protestant martyr: "Play the man, Master Ridley, and we shall light such a candle in England as shall never be put out."

Bowman and Others
V.

THE Secular Society, Limited, was incorporated as a company limited by guarantee under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1893, and a company so incorporated is by Section 17 of the Act of 1862 capable of exercising all the functions of an incorporated company. Prima facie, therefore, the Society is a corporate body created by virtue of a Statute of the Realm, with statutory power to acquire property by gift, whether inter vivos or by will. The Appellants endeavour to displace this prima facie effect of the Companies Acts in the following manner. If, they say, you look at the objects for which the Society was incorporated, as expressed in its Memorandum of Association, you will find that they are either actually illegal or, at any rate, in conflict with the policy of the law This being so, the Society was not an association capable of incorporation under the Acts. It was and is an illegal association, and as such incapable of acquiring property by gift. I do not think this argument is open to the Appellants even if their major premise be correct. By the 1st Section of the Companies Act 1900, the Society's certificate of registration is made conclusive evidence that the Society was an association authorized to be registered—that is, an association of not less than seven persons associated together for a lawful purpose. The section does not mean that all or any of the objects specified in the Memorandum, if otherwise illegal, would be rendered legal by the certificate. On the contrary, if the Directors of the Society applied its funds for an illegal object, they would be guilty of misfeasance and liable to replace the money, even if the object for which the money had been applied were expressly authorized by the Memorandum. In like manner a contract entered into by the Company for an unlawful object, whether authorized by the Memorandum or otherwise, could not be enforced either in law or in equity. The section does, however, preclude all His Majesty's lieges from going behind the certificate or from alleging that the Society is not a corporate body with the status and capacity conferred by the Acts. Even if all the objects specified in the Memorandum were illegal, it does not follow that the Company cannot on that account apply its funds or enter into a contract for a lawful purpose. Every company has power to wind up voluntarily, and moneys paid or contracts entered into with that object are in every respect lawfully paid or entered into. Further, the disposition provided by the Company's Memorandum for its surplus assets in case of a winding up may be lawful, though all the objects as a going concern are unlawful. If there be no lawful manner of applying such surplus assets, they would on the dissolution of the company belong to the Crown bona vacantia (Cunnack v. Edwards, 1896, 2h ch. 679).

My Lords, it follows from what I have already said that the capacity of the Secular Society, Limited, to acquire property by gift must be taken as established, and all the conditions essential to the validity of the gift being thus fulfilled, the donee is entitled to receive and dispose of the subject-matter thereof, unless either (1) the gift was obtained by duress or undue influence, or (2) there is something which in a Court of Equity imposes on the donee the character of a trustee. Admittedly there is no question of duress or undue influence, and in my opinion it is impossible to hold that the donee was intended to take or, in fact, takes the subject-matter as trustee, or in any other character than that of absolute owner. It should be observed that the testator says nothing as to how he desires his residuary estate to be applied in the hands of the Society, nor is there any evidence that he made any communication to anyone on behalf of the Society with regard to such application. The only possible argument in favour of the testator's intention to create a trust rests upon this: The Society is a body corporate to which the principle of your Lordships' decision in Rich v. Ashbury, etc. Company, Limited (7 H.L. 653), is applicable. Its funds can only be applied for purposes contemplated by the Memorandum and Articles, as originally framed or altered under its statutory powers. A gift to it must, it may be said, be considered as a gift for those purposes of the subject-matter of the gift. This argument is, in my opinion, quite fallacious. The fact that a donor has certain objects in view in making a gift does not, whether he gives them expression or otherwise, make the donee a trustee for those objects.

My Lords, I will next proceed to consider whether a trust for the first object specified in the Memorandum would be a valid trust. The Society's first object is "to promote the principle that human conduct shall be based upon natural knowledge and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action." A trust to promote or advocate this principle would certainly not be a trust for the benefit of individuals. But could it be established as a charitable trust? It is certainly not within the preamble of the Statute 43 Eliz. c. 5. This is not conclusive, though the Courts have taken such preamble as their guide in determining what is or is not charitable. It is not a religious trust, for it relegates religion to a region in which it is to have no influence on human conduct. The principle may have its attractions for certain types of mind, but on analysis it appears to be extremely vague and ambiguous. The first branch does not prescribe the end to which human conduct is to be directed. It merely says that whatever aim a man has in view, he is to base his conduct on natural knowledge rather than on supernatural belief. This may merely mean that if, for example, we desire to defeat our enemies, we should avail ourselves of all known scientific means, and not rest idle in the belief that there is a special providence looking after our interests. The meaning intended must necessarily be obscure until the terms "natural knowledge" and "supernatural belief" are more narrowly defined. Passing to the second branch of the principle, it is, I think, equally obscure. It lays down dogmatically what ought to be the end of all human thought and action, "so think and act as to secure human welfare in this world." No hint is given as to what constitutes human welfare—a point on which there is the widest difference of opinion, or as to why anyone should act on the precept unless it be assumed that altruism is merely enlightened egoism. It would in my opinion be quite impossible to hold that a trust to promote a principle so vague and indefinite was a good charitable trust. Even if the principle to be promoted were as definite as Kant's Categoric imperative, I doubt whether a trust for its promotion would be charitable.

My Lords, it remains to consider the question (which formed the chief topic of argument at your Lordships' Bar), whether the promotion of the principle specified as the Society's first object is either illegal or against the policy of the law. A trust for the promotion of the principle being unenforceable on other grounds, this question could only arise on a criminal prosecution for blasphemy, or in an action to enforce a contract entered into for the purpose of promoting the principle. In discussing it I shall assume that the principle involves a denial of, or an attack upon, some of the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion.

My Lords, on the subject of blasphemy, I have had the advantage of reading, and I entirely agree with the conclusions arrived at by my noble and learned friends, the Lord Chancellor and Lord Buckmaster. In my opinion to constitute blasphemy at common law there must be such an element of vilification, ridicule, or irreverence, as would be likely to exasperate the feelings of others, and so lead to a breach of the peace. I cannot find that the common law has ever concerned itself with the opinion as such, or with expression of opinion, so far as such expression is compatible with the maintenance of public order. Indeed, there is express authority that heresy as such is outside the cognizance of a criminal court, unless the heretic by setting up conventicles or otherwise endangers the peace (see Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, vol. i., p. 354). The contrary view appears to be based on various dicta (I do not think they are more than dicta), to the effect that Christianity is part of the law of the land, the suggested inference being that to attack or deny any of its fundamental doctrines must, therefore, be unlawful. The inference, of course, depends on some implied major premise. If the implied major premise be that it is an offence to speak with contumely, or even to express disapproval of existing law, it is clearly erroneous. If, on the other hand, the implied major premise is that it is an offence to induce people to disobey the law, the premise may be accepted, but to avoid a non-sequitur it would be necessary to modify the minor premise by asserting that it is part of the law of the land that all must believe in the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and this, again, is inadmissible. Christianity is clearly not part of the law of the land in the sense that every offence against Christianity is cognizable in the courts.

A good deal of stress was laid in this connection upon the Blasphemy Act (9 and 10 Will. III. c. 32), and its provisions, undoubtedly, give rise to certain difficulties. I think, however, for reasons which will appear later, that this Act should be construed as imposing in the case of persons educated in or who have at any time professed the Christian religion, certain additional penalties for the common law offence rather than as creating a new statutory offence. The fact that there has, so far as can be discovered never been a prosecution for an offence under the Act points to this view having been generally accepted.

My Lords, on the question whether the promotion of the principle in question is against public policy as opposed to being illegal in the criminal sense the Appellants relied principally on two authorities, namely, Cowan v. Milbourn (L. R. 2 Exch. 230) and Briggs v. Hartley (L. J. N. S. Chanc. 416). In the former case the Court consisting of Chief Baron Kelly, Baron Martin, and Baron Bramwell, refused to enforce a contract for the hire of rooms, the purpose of the hirer being to use the rooms for certain lectures, one of which, as advertised, was to be on "The Character and Teaching of Christ; the Former Defective, the Latter Misleading," and another on "The Bible Shown to be no More Inspired than any other Book." Chief Baron Kelly was of opinion that the first of these lectures could not be delivered without blasphemy. He referred especially to the fact that Christianity was part of the law of the land. Baron Martin agreed. Baron Bramwell quoted the Blasphemy Act, and said that the rooms were clearly intended to be used for a purpose declared by the Statute to be unlawful. It appears, therefore, that all three Judges considered that the purpose was unlawful in the strict sense, though Baron Bramwell referred to the distinction between things actually unlawful in the sense of being punishable and things unlawful in the sense of being contrary to the policy of the law. This, however, appears to have been unnecessary for the decision. The Court refused to enforce the contract. In the case of Briggs v. Hartley, the testator had created a trust to provide a prize for the best essay on natural theology, treated as a science, and sufficient when so treated to constitute a true, perfect, and philosophical system of universal religion. Vice-

Chancellor Shadwell held the trust void as inconsistent with Christianity. In my opinion the first of these cases might possibly be supported on the footing that the lectures intended to be given would involve vilification, ridicule, or irreverence, likely to lead to a breach of the peace. In so far as it decided that any denial of or attack upon the fundamental doctrines of Christianity was in itself blasphemous either at common law or under the Statute, I thing it was wrong. The second case, however, appears to be a direct authority on the point at issue, for the trust was clearly a good charity unless it could be held contrary to the policy of the law.

The Revolution of 1688 was followed by the Toleration Act of that year, which exempted Protestant Dissenters from the penalties imposed by the earlier Acts, but provided that nothing therein contained should afford any protection to Roman Catholics or persons denying the Trinity. From the date of this Act all trusts for the religious purposes of any Nonconformist body entitled to the benefit of its provisions have been held good charitable trusts, and inasmuch as the provisions of the Act do not deal with the validity of trusts, but merely give exemptions from penalties, I think we are safe in assuming that in the equitable rule as to trusts for the purposes of religion being charitable, religion includes all forms of religion which accept, as the exempted Nonconformists may be said to have done, the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith.

But subsequent decisions enable us to go a step further. The Unitarian Relief Act, 1812, repeals so much of the Toleration Act, 1688, as enacts that nothing therein contained should extend to give any ease or benefit to persons denying the Trinity and also so much of the Blasphemy Act as relates to persons denying the Trinity. As from the passing of this Act trusts for the religious purposes of Unitarians have always been held good charitable trusts. The repeal of the Blasphemy Act, which did not itself affect the common law, could not alter the common law. These decisions proceed therefore on the footing that a mere denial of the Trinity is not criminal. The Unitarian Relief Act containing no provisions as to trusts, they also proceed on the footing that but for the statutory penalties to which, prior to the Act, persons who denied the Trinity had been subject to a trust for a religion which rejects the doctrine of the Trinity would have been a good charitable trust. A denial of or attack on the doctrine of the Trinity can never therefore have been either actually illegal or contrary to the policy of the law.

Further, whatever may have been the case with the Unitarians of 1812, it is quite certain that in more recent years many Unitarians have not only denied the Trinity, but have disputed the "Divine authority" of the Old and New Testament in the sense in which that expression is ordinarily used by persons professing the Christian Faith. If there is any doctrine vital to Protestant Christianity, it would appear to be that of the divine authority of the Scriptures, and yet in the case of trusts for the religion of Unitarians no distinction has been drawn between those who do and who do not hold this doctrine. It would seem to follow that a trust for the purpose of any kind of Monotheistic Theism would be a good charitable trust, and that it is not illegal or contrary to public policy to deny the authority of the Old or New Testament.

AN OLD ACQUAINTANCE.

While visiting the Zoo in Washington, a little girl saw a great white bird in a cage standing on one leg. She threw in a piece of candy; the bird gobbled it up eagerly, and thrust its head through the wire for more.

Presently the child's mother came along.

"Mother," cried the youngster; "see here! What kind of a bird is this?"

The mother pointed to the sign on the cage, which read, "The Stork."

"The Stork!" cried the child enthusiastically. "Oh! mother, do you know, he actually recognized me?"—Harper's Magazine, February, 1917.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
> Address.....
> Occupation .....
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Views and Opinions.

The Writing of Books.

In the days when life was less hurried and thought more leisurely than now, writing a book was an important matter. It was, usually, undertaken only after careful preparation and mature reflection. The writer might just as easily have been wrong then as now, but his opinions, whatever they were, were clear —to him. Nowadays, when books are born in a week and die in a month things proceed differently. Writers with a public turn out three or four books a year, and their readers admire the output, much as they would admire a new machine manufacturing sausages or printing copies of a daily paper. In these circumstances many books appear to be written not so much to express their author's ideas as to help him to find out what his ideas are. They seem to be written on the principle of "I fancy I have several good ideas on this subject and will write a book and see how they work out." And there is always the chance that some discerning critic will explain to the author what his ideas really are.

God and Mr. Wells.

What has been said above represents our first impression on reading Mr. H. G. Wells' God the Invisible King. In that work Mr. Wells has, in truth, seized a useful and, within limits, a true idea. It is not at all a new one, it constitutes the essence of Positivism, and it has been both implicit and explicit in all Freethought propaganda for a century or more. What Comte called the "Religion of Humanity," or, Cotter, Morrison the "Service of Man," or others "Social Service" is what Mr. Wells really has in view when he talks about the worship of God. He personifies the life of the race and calls it God. Certainly this collective life is real enough. It requires little reflection to show that the life of the tribe, the nation, the race, is more comprehensive and more enduring than the life of the individual. It antedates and postdates individual life. It takes hold of the individual at birth and continues to fashion his life until it ushers him into the grave. It provides the texture of his thinking as well as the fashion of his clothes. It furnishes him with ideals, beliefs, purposes. It is more than an aggregate, it is, as Mr. Wells says of his God, a synthesis. It may be as impalpable as gravity, but it is, none-the-less, real. Only—it is not God, and it is no use calling it God. That word has a fairly definite historic connotation, and it is quite beyond the power of Mr. Wells to successfully give it an entirely new one.

Sociology and Religion.

Now, if Mr. Wells had tried to show—what he might easily have done—that all the good with which religion has been, at any rate, associated, really sprang from this collective racial life, that the source of the best ideals of the more humanistic of religionists was social, that improvements in religion had been consequent on a developing social sense, in short, that religion owed its strength to an exploitation of man's social nature, he would have been doing a much needed and a valuable work. He might have gone further and shown clearly that social life, as it is the root of what are called religious virtues, provides the only theatre for their profitable exercise, and their only intelligible end. But to call this "God," and to break into peans of exultation about this worship of God, is to leave his readers as confused as he finds them. The service of man we can all understand, even though we may not be always certain that we are so acting as to benefit humanity. The worship of God we can also understand, even though people quarrel over forms of worship. We may even say that one involves the other, and some do say so, just as others say and believe that the service of man will one day replace the worship of God. But you cannot identify the two. In other words, you may have God or humanity, or God and humanity, but you cannot have God as humanity. Mr. Wells' excursion will leave the really religious untouched; it will only cause a smile with informed Freethinkers.

An Evil Word.

Granted that the world needs some formulæ which will organize and synthesize its energies and aspirations, it is certain that the word God will never perform that function. The word has too old and too bad a history for that. The belief in God does not unite, it divides. The widest religion rests on a basis of exclusion, it binds some together only to shut others out. Throw the word God into any community and it has the disruptive consequences of a high explosive shell. On the other hand, the word humanity everywhere unites in proportion as the appeal is made intelligible. It was not the belief in a God—whether of the new or of the old kind—that brought about the revolution in Russia. It was the appeal to the common instincts and feelings of a common humanity. And it will be neither God nor religion, when this War is at an end, will help to smooth over the ill feeling and level the mountain of hatred they have evoked. Wherever and whenever that is done it will be by an appeal to a humanity in which all share, and to which all are in some degree able to respond.

A Shock for the Faithful.

We have treated Mr. Wells' new religion as being the equivalent of the old "Service of Man." And it seems to us it is either that or nothing. For Mr. Wells distinctly disowns anything and everything that is properly understood as religion, and explicitly repudiates Christianity. His belief, he says, "is not Christianity at all." Christian beliefs, in fact, "merit only disrespectful attention"; the orthodox Christian Deity is described as "that stuffed scarecrow of divinity"; and in a letter to the Times he distinctly rejects all belief in personal immortality. There is, of course, nothing new in all this. It is only what Freethinkers have said over and over again. But it is good to see how these very advanced writers have to follow in our steps sooner or later, almost whether they will or no. Christians will not be pleased with Mr. Wells' statement of religion. Many of them may have been expecting something different—something more in line with their own creed. Let us hope that the discovery of another public man openly disavowing Christianity will put some courage into their own timid souls.

God or Humanity?

Mr. Wells' weakness as a writer is a want of psychological insight and a lack of historical perspective. These shortcomings are evident in most of his writings, and we venture to say they are responsible for what we consider the cardinal fault of his latest work. For you simply cannot take old words like "God" and "religion" and divest them of their historic and legitimate connotations. To the overwhelming majority of people they will mean what they have always meant. And, fundamentally, God, as we have said, is a symbol of division, not of union; and it is union that Mr. Wells requires. On the other hand, humanity never has had, and never can have, this divisive connotation. The realization of all that the word means may be presented by the narrower and separatist ideals of religion or nationality, but it remains as an indestructible ideal. It is the only power against which any or all of the Churches are ultimately powerless. It is an ideal that over a hundred years ago sent the manhood of France over Europe as the evangelists of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, as it is now firing the minds of the masses of the Russian people. It is true the ideals of the revolutionaries of 1789 suffered an eclipse, as may those of the Russian people of to-day, if the reactionaries of Europe have their way. But it is only an eclipse. The idea, the ideal, remains. It is nascent in the nature of each; it is implicit in the common life of all. And one great step toward its realization is to clear from the mind of man those verbal shibboleths which prevent their consciously realizing the real tendency of social evolution.

Said H. G. Wells, I think you'll find
My God has fresh and charming features.
At any rate He knows my mind,

Though not, of course, quite on the plane
Of one and only H. G. Wells.

The Eternal Christ.

ONE of the chief characteristics of present-day theology is its vagueness. Terms are used the meanings of which constantly vary and often contradict one another. The two words which seem to have suffered most in this respect are "Jesus" and "Christ." Time was when both were but two names by which the hero of the Four Gospels was generally known. In the Fourth Gospel and the Epistles he is usually called Jesus Christ, or Christ Jesus, and all these documents treat him as a super-human being. Latterly, however, the tendency has been to regard the Gospel Jesus as an entirely different being from the Christ of the Orthodox Churches, the former being an historical character, and the latter a creation of the theological imagination. As a matter of fact, the distinction between the two is more fanciful than real. The Gospel Jesus is not an historical personage. The Virgin Birth and the Resurrection, if there were nothing more, exclude him from the list of human beings, and his life is replete with unnatural, impossible, events. Even those who believe that he was only a man, admit that the Gospel narrative is largely legendary, and their critical work consists almost wholly in endeavouring to rescue the purely historical elements from the mass of baseless fables. To us, therefore, the Gospel Jesus is fully as unhistorical as the theological Christ. Principal Griffith Jones discerns no line of demarcation between Jesus and Christ; Jesus himself being the Christ: "the Desire of all Nations, the Crown and Essence of Humanity, the Saviour of the World, who by the loftiness of his teaching, the beauty of his character, the sufficiency of his atoning sacrifice, is able to save to the uttermost all who will come to him and trust in him." No being has ever lived who answered to that extravagant description, and no one is more fully aware of the fact than the Principal himself. The new minister of the City Temple assures his congregation that his creed, his only confession of faith, and the keynote of his ministry, as summing up the Christian Gospel, are to be found in Paul's famous declaration: "Christ is all, and in all."

Dr. Newton is a born orator, an emotional rhetorician, and there lies before him, as a preacher, no doubt, an exceedingly prosperous and happy career. We do not know where he stands theologically, although there are indications in his inaugural discourse that he is in no narrow sense orthodox. In his estimation Jesus is Christ, but what Christ is he tells us only in painfully loose, indefinite, hazy terms. To call him "the image of the invisible God, by whom all things were created, and in whom all things hold together," is not to convey any definite and intelligible information concerning him, for God is unknown as well as invisible. No one possesses a single grain of knowledge of anything beyond and above Nature. The supernatural is a visionary realm touching which knowledge is absolutely unobtainable. Multitudes of people believe in its existence, and describe it with the utmost cocksureness. The Gospel Jesus claims it as his own peculiar sphere, from which he has descended to earth, and to which he will soon return. He prides himself upon being God's only begotten Son, and takes full credit for having made the Father known to mankind. Dr. Newton asserts that "the spirit of God, his purpose, his pity, and most of all his character, are unveiled in the life of Jesus Christ," and that this "is all that we really know of God, as he is all that we need to know for nobility of life and hope in death." Hence Christ is "the crown, the climax, the consummation of all things, the whole finding focus in a Single Luminous Life."

Such, then, is Christ in himself, and such is what he may become for humanity. Now, in Dr. Newton's first sermon, as reported in the Christian Commonwealth for May 30, occurs the following eye-opening passage:—

> What kind of a nation would the American Republic be if every man in it were such a man as Lincoln, to whom the Prime Minister has referred so often and with such complete understanding—Lincoln, so true of heart, so clear of mind, who lived with malice toward none and charity for all, seeking the safety and sanctity of his nation? First of all, social slavery and industrial brutality would cease to exist. No woman would be made desolate, no little child forlorn, by grasping greed or grinding cruelty. Laws would be wise and just and merciful, in fact as well as in ideal, leaving every one free to stretch his arms and his soul and look up at the stars. It would be the nation it was meant to be, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the service of humanity. Because this mighty and tender spirit took form in Lincoln, his life was a revelation of the genius and purpose of the Republic, its reason for being, and its prophecy of times to come.

We agree with every word in that extract, but are utterly unable to perceive what object Dr. Newton intended it to serve, for the one thing it does not illustrate is that "Christ is all and in all." The passage might have been written by the great Atheist, Colonel Ingersoll. Undoubtedly Lincoln was one of the greatest philanthropists that ever lived, whose one purpose in life was to secure the welfare of his fellow-beings, especially those who were down-trodden and oppressed. But Abraham Lincoln was not a Christian. It is well known that the French philosopher, Volney, published a famous book, entitled Les Ruines, in which he manifested strong antipathy to religion in general, and to Christianity in particular. Everybody knows Paine's Age of Reason, which is a vigorous attack on the Bible and the Christian religion. Lincoln read those books with the greatest care, and then composed a long and critical essay, in which he expressed identical convictions. It should be borne in mind that Lincoln never disavowed those sceptical conclusions; and we have the assurance of Mrs. Lincoln that "Mr. Lincoln had no hope and no faith in the usual acceptance of those words." It is admitted by all that he never identified himself with any denomination. And yet, as John Nicolay puts it:—

> Benevolence and forgiveness were the very basis of his character; his world-wide humanity is aptly embodied in a phrase of his second inaugural: "With malice towards none, with charity for all." History must accord him a rare sagacity in guiding a great people through the perils of a mighty revolution, an admirable singleness of aim, a skilful discernment and courageous seizure of the golden moment to free his nation from the incubus of slavery, faithful adherence to law, and conscientious moderation in the use of power, a shining personal example of honesty and purity, and finally the possession of that subtle and indefinable magnetism by which he subordinated and directed dangerously disturbed and perverted moral and political forces to the restoration of peace and constitutional authority to his country, and the gift of liberty to four millions of human beings.

Dr. Newton's eloquent eulogy of Christ as the supreme revelation of God and the only hope of humanity, his passionate outbursts of emotional loyalty to God made manifest in the flesh, his expressions of confidence in "a democracy founded upon the spiritual unity and essential divinity of humanity as revealed in Christ," and his perfervid declaration that "the profoundest fact about humanity is not that it is Jew or Gentile, English or American, bond or free, male or female"—all such pronouncements become practically valueless beside the cordial asseveration that if every man in the United States were such a man as Lincoln the mighty Republic of the West would be ideally perfect in every respect. And yet Lincoln made no religious profession, had neither hope nor faith in the popular acceptation of those words, but was a Humanist, pure and simple, whose social sense proved his guiding-star.

Does Dr. Newton verily believe that Christ is a revelation of a God of justice and love? Does he really think that the world is hopelessly dead in trespasses and sins, doomed to suffer for ever in hell, unless it accepts and puts its trust in Heaven's mercy as disclosed in the Cross? If he does, how does he account for several facts which cannot be gainsaid? Does he regard the conditions of life in Christendom as a compliment to the Eternal Christ? If he honestly compare Christian America with Heathen China, can he truthfully affirm that the former is socially and morally superior to the latter? If not, why should we move heaven and earth in an endeavour to convert China to Christianity? If it be argued that Christendom is in such a corrupt state because Christianity has not been tried, the question forces itself upon us, Why has not Christianity been put to the test of experiment? The truth is that the religion of the Cross has totally failed to transform the moral character of the nations which profess it, and that this world-war is a practical result and demonstration of that failure. The Eternal Christ is absolutely impotent simply because he has never existed except in the imagination of ardent believers. The belief in him yields unspeakable joy to those in whom it has acquired a high degree of development, and this sense of enjoyment is not always accompanied by moral elevation and social service. What the world needs is, not Christ, but man, not saints, but reformers, not sentimental evangelists, but men like Lincoln, inspired by love for their fellow-beings, and a passionate desire to serve them.

A Captious Colporteur.

> The kind wise words that fall from years that fall—
> Hope thou not much, and fear thou not at all.

> I claim no place in the world of letters; I am, and will be, alone, as long as I live and after. —Landor.

IT was one of fate's little ironies which imposed on the Pagan, George Borrow, the function of colporteur of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The story of Borrow's introduction to the suave officials of the Society is very characteristic of this remarkable man. Hearing of the possibility of work for the Society, the young man tramped from Norwich to London, walking one hundred and twelve miles in twenty-seven hours, and spending less than sixpence on the journey. On arrival he told the surprised secretary that he could translate Manchu, and this was his first work for the Society.

Borrow went to Russia, and facing great difficulties, translated the New Testament into the Manchu-Tartar dialect. Ever a man of resource, there was nothing he was not ready to do, even to setting up type, teaching wooden-headed compositors, buying paper, and hustling leisurely Muscovite officials. Later he went to Spain on behalf of the Society, and the adventurous career he led in the Peninsula while hawking Bibles in this most bigoted of Roman Catholic countries forms the groundwork of The Bible in Spain, one of the most vivacious travel-books ever written. "Gil Blas, with a touch of John Bunyan," the volume has been called, wittily. For the author pays small attention to the purely evangelical business of the organization that dispatched him, and he writes of thieves, murderers, gipsies, bandits, prisons, wars, and other wordly subjects, with all the gusto of a Le Sage, or Burton. Addressed to the straight-laced and narrow-minded Victorian religious public, it was a wonderfully stimulating drink to unaccustomed palates. It was the time when strict evangelical parents forbade secular books on Sundays, and Mr. Augustine Birrell has told us how, as an eager boy, he rejoiced in the old Pagan's writings, the innocent title of which had passed the unsuspecting critics on the hearth.

As may be imagined, readily, the correspondence between the Bible Society authorities and George Borrow is delicious reading. For the colporteur worshipped at many shrines from that of the pacifist Jesus Christ to that of the pugilist Tom Sayers. We see the old Adam peeping out in the evangelist, as Dr. Jekyll changed into Mr. Hyde, and the growing impatience and distrust of the pious officials who saw their employee boxing the compass, and forgetting the exceedingly narrow channel they wished him to pursue. At times, indeed, Borrow quite forgot the theological jargon and business patter of Earl Street, and it all ended in his being recalled and being given no further employment.

This strange agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society commenced his literary career in London by writing the Newgate Calendar, which bears so marked a resemblance to the earlier part of the Holy Scriptures sold by the Society. Borrow was ever a fighter, even when his Flaming Tinman days were over, and his animosities extended from Popes to parsons. When a highly respected canon of St. Paul's Cathedral ventured to criticize adversely The Bible in Spain, Borrow sent a saucy note to his publishers, calmly stating that the ecclesiastic was a jackass, and that he would be doing better by minding his own petty business in his ugly cathedral.

Borrow had a real passion for adventure, and a sincere love of language. Whilst an articled clerk to an obscure solicitor at Norwich, he translated a volume of ballads from the Danish. Later, at Petrograd, he published his Targum: Translations from Thirty Languages and Dialects. Nor was this all, for in the course of his travels in France, Germany, Russia, and Eastern Europe, he learned languages and dialects as he went. With the exceptions of Sir Richard Burton and Prince Lucien Bonaparte, he was, probably, the most enthusiastic linguist who ever lived. During a few years of travelling activity he made translations in a score of languages, and he produced a Turkish version of Bluebeard, and rendered a number of Danish, Russian, and Welsh tales into English.

For the last fifty years of his life he lived on "emotions remembered in tranquillity," passing his existence between Oulton Broad, Norfolk, and London. His famous books, Lavengro, The Romany Rye, and Wild Wales, were all written amid the peaceful surroundings of the Broads, and his tranquillity was only broken by fierce paper warfare with publishers, critics, and other folk who aroused the old lion's wrath. Borrow was always furious at the want of public appreciation; but his fame has grown since he died at Oulton, and the town of Norwich did well in purchasing Borrow's house as a memento of a remarkable man and notable citizen.

Nature mixed George Borrow in a moment of magnificence. Only those who have realized for themselves the inadequancy of a pen when brought in contact with the rich and tumultuous glow of life can appreciate to the full the wonder of his achievement; the potent imagination, the keen insight, which are required to bring before us those unforgettable incidents of human life. Besides these great gifts, he possessed in an extraordinary degree the sense of the significance of life apart from any personal liking or disliking, of the beauty and continuity of the great stream of human existence. A little aloof, a little inscrutable, he will ever remain, but magnificent because of his greatness as a literary artist. Borrow's life was an example of the square peg in the round hole. A son of Nature, he was impatient of the petty and narrow standards of civilization and society, and loved the men and women of the wayside. He recognized in these vagrants the true sons and daughters of "the great mother who mixes all our bloods." Listen to his exquisitely phrased Pagan glorification of existence: "Life is sweet, brother. There's night and day, brother, both sweet things; sun, moon, stars, brother, all sweet things; there's likewise the wind on the heath. Life is very sweet, brother, who would wish to die?"

"Excuse me," I said more than once to Helena Petrovna (Madame Blavatsky), "you are thoroughly compromising your master. This mighty sage, having drunk his cup of milk—his daily portion of nutriment—lies down in the depth of Thibet, so to speak on the very threshold of Nirvana. His marvellous intellect is directing the fate of the world. Suddenly you call to him from here, 'Ting-ting.' He immediately effects an 'expenditure of vital force,' slips out of his coarsely material body, leaves that body in Thibet to digest its cup of milk, dons his astral form, and in the twinkling of an eye he is suddenly before you. 'Ting-ting.' 'What are your commands, upagika (mother)?' 'Oh, look here, my good man, write a letter to Miss A; and drop it on her head in an hour.' 'All right.' 'And look here, my good man, write, "Certainly I was there; but who can open the eyes of those who will not see?" And slip this note into Olcott's pocket.' 'All right.' 'And look here, my good man, appear to Mary F.' 'All right.' Is all this possible? Why, it turns out that he is not your 'master' after all, but a footman who used to run your errands." Oh, how angry she used to get with me for such speeches! How she used to glare, her great eyes the colour of pale turquoise! And all the time not one, positively not one, even the apparently most sensible Theosophists, was disturbed by this pitiful part played by the great mysterious teacher, the "master" who availed to snatch Helena Petrovna from death.—V. S. Solovyoff, "A Modern Priestess of Isis" (1895), pp. 217-218.

IT should be stated that while Madame Blavatsky was being lionized in Europe in 1884, a quarrel broke out at Adyah, and M. and Madame Coulomb were dismissed, partly for having hinted to outsiders secrets connected with the shrine. An agitated telegram from Madame Blavatsky at Paris failed to heal the rupture, and in revenge Madame Coulomb gave to the press "a long series of letters in Madame's hand teeming with veiled instructions to the Coulombs, which fitted in at every point with their accounts of jugglery at Adyah."[1]

Dr. Hodgson also inquired into the precipitated Mahatma letters. Says Mr. Edmund Garrett:—

> These precious documents, which had been rained among the faithful with a copiousness almost amounting to garrulity, had been discredited already. The prosy and sometimes illiterate verbiage of the Tibetan sages was a severe trial to the enthusiasm of the more critical Theosophists even where it was apparently original. But it was too much of a good thing when a long doctrinal treatise, which Koot Hoomi had addressed to Mr. Sinnett, was found to be a gross plagiarism from a lecture by an American gentleman which had been reported in a Spiritualist paper a few months before. Nor did it mend matters when, after considerable delay, the illustrious Koot condescended to the newspaper arena, and > wrote—we mean precipitated—an explanation which for evasiveness and general "thinness," is probably unique even in the records of convicted plagiarists.[1]

And worse was to follow, for the same criticism which identified Madame Blavatsky as the writer of the unblushing letters to Madame Coulomb, found exactly the same characteristics in the compositions of the Mahatmas. "In a word," says Mr. Edmund Garrett, "it was declared that Koot Hoomi Lal Sing and Mahatma Morya were the same person, and that person Madame Blavatsky. When a missive from the Himalayas floated down into the neophyte's lap, it was Madame's own hand which had prepared it, though it was the no less useful if humbler function of M. Coulomb to jerk it from the ceiling at the critical moment with a string, or deftly pass it through the sliding panel into the closed Shrine."[2]

It only needs to be added that in the opinion of the two experts on handwriting, Messrs. Netherclift and Sims, both the Coulomb and Mahatma letters were "indisputably the authentic production of Madame Blavatsky."[3]

As Madame Blavatsky, when she was a Spiritualist, had protested that the Katie King exposure was "neither more nor less than a plot (now almost proved) of the Protestant Jesuitical Society called the Young Men's Christian Association," so now she declared the publication of the incriminating Coulomb letters "was due to a conspiracy on the part of certain Christian missionaries, who had (as again was "almost proved") paid 40,000 rupees to suborn false witnesses."[4]

Madame Blavatsky certainly must have had but little acquaintance with either the Y.M.C.A. or Christian missionaries; for the Y.M.C.A. never plotted anything more serious than how to provide amusements to divert its members from thinking, and keeping them in the fold. And as for missionaries parting with 40,000 rupees for any purpose whatever, the idea is too wildly improbable to be entertained.

"Whatever Theosophists may say now," says Mr. Edmund Garrett, "the Society for Psychical Research was certainly not a hostile tribunal." Dr. Hodgson, who conducted the inquiry, "declared that whatever prepossessions he may have had 'were distinctly in favour of occultism and Madame Blavatsky.'"[5] Mr. Podmore, who was also a member of the Society, in explaining the Society's attitude towards the Theosophic miracles, says: "When we found that some of these occurrences were vouched for by witnesses of good repute and good intelligence in other matters, we held that we should not be justified in summarily dismissing their evidence.....It seemed also not impossible that the accounts which had reached us of the astral journeys might prove to be slightly distorted versions of actual occurrences, analogous to those cases of thought transference with which we were already familiar. Moreover, to reject the evidences for these occurrences was, as it then seemed to us, to impute fraud to Colonel Olcott as well as to Mr. Damodar. Colonel Olcott we believed to be an honourable man, and Mr. Damodar was credibly alleged to be a Hindu of high caste, who had voluntarily sacrificed his patrimony on account of his connection with the Theosophical Society."[6] In the event, it was found that there was collusion in the fraud on the part of Damodar, and that: "If Colonel Olcott's honesty has not been impugned, the limits of his credulity have proved elastic beyond our anticipation. In fact, many of the leading members of the Theosophic cult present, in the light of this inquiry, have a pleasantly ambiguous blend of charlatanry and simplicity."[1]

Since the publication of Dr. Hodgson's report, M. Solovyoff, a Russian of good social position and an author of some repute, has published, under the title of A Modern Priestess of Isis, an account of his connection with Madame Blavatsky, which emphatically confirms Dr. Hodgson's exposure.

While in Paris, engaged in a study of the occult, in which he was inclined to believe, he came across a book by Madame Blavatsky, and, seeing a notice in the Matin of the arrival in Paris of Madame herself, he obtained an introduction to her from a friend, and called a few days later. He received a frank and kindly greeting. "At the end of a quarter of an hour," says M. Solovyoff, "I was talking to Helena Petrovna as though she were an old friend, and all her homely, coarse appearance actually began to please me. And her eyes gazed at me so graciously, and at the same time pierced me so attentively."[2]

"She looked me straight in the eyes, and caressed me with her glance and her kindly smile." Says M. Solovyoff: "I involuntarily liked her more and more. I was attracted to her by a feeling of instantaneous sympathy." That, as in the case of Home, was the secret of her success. Further on, the same writer records: "In her quiet and good moments she was eminently sympathetic. There was within her a certain fascination, a kind of magnetism, which attracted to her with an irresistible force. Sympathy! it is a quality which you cannot translate into words; yet all men and women, old and young, on whom those great strange eyes had looked graciously, experienced the same thing."[3]

During his first visit, M. Solovyoff was favoured with the sound of the "astral bells." This was upon the return of Madame Blavatsky to the room after a few minutes' absence upon domestic duties, as she explained. During a later visit, Madame dropped the little silver instrument responsible for these sounds. M. Solovyoff picked it up, but Madame snatched it out of his hand.

Finally, in the autumn of the following year (1885), at her invitation, he visited her at Wurzburg. He found her in ill-health, and depressed by the publication of the Hodgson report. She was alone, and seemed in need of sympathy. An accident precipitated the crisis. Going to a drawer, by Madame's direction, to get a photograph, M. Solovyoff discovered a packet of Chinese envelopes, already familiar to him as those in which the "astral" messages were conveyed from Thibet! Then Madame Blavatsky broke down and confessed all. "What is one to do," she said, "when in order to rule men it is necessary to deceive them?" We have quoted the rest of this confession previously, so will not repeat it. Finally, she produced the "astral bell," and invited M. Solovyoff to co-operate with her in the manufacture of "astral" messages. "When she had found a man whom she wished to win over and turn into her obedient tool, she worked on him by cordiality and sincerity. She tried to convince him of her devotion, her warm affection and friendliness; and then by virtue of these feelings, she got him to do this or that for her. Everything was founded on personal relations and on feelings. With women these tactics worked wonders" (p. 73).

Her moral ideas were most primitive. Says the same writer:—

> I am convinced that she honestly did not understand why I had parted with her and appeared among the number of her accusers. Her moral notions were so radically perverted that she had lost all grasp of certain ideas. She imagined that everything in the world was founded on personal relations, and that to this there was no exception. "What have I done to you—you?" "Others," that is to say, "I may cheat and ruin; I may abandon myself to every sacrilege, and huckster the greatest truths, but if I like you personally, and cannot take you in because you have seen through me, if it may yet be in my power to serve you in one way or another, then why do you betray me, and that to foreigners?" That is what she insinuated.[1]

Even her writings were a fraud. Her Isis Unveiled appears to be a work of amazing erudition and research. It is crammed with quotations from the ancient classics of Greece and Rome, from the early Church Fathers, from the old mystics and Cabbalistic writings. But a competent scholar, Mr. Emmette Coleman, in an analysis of the work, says:—

> In Isis Unveiled, published in 1877, I discovered some 2,000 passages copied from other books without proper credit. By careful analysis I found that in compiling Isis about 100 books were used. About 1,400 books are quoted from and referred to in this work; but from the 100 books which its author possessed, she copied everything in Isis taken from and relating to the other 1,300. There are in Isis about 2,100 quotations from and references to books that were copied, at second-hand, from books other than the originals; and of this number only about 140 are credited to the books from which Madame Blavatsky copied them at second-hand,—the truth being that these originals had evidently never been read by Madame Blavatsky. By this means many readers of Isis, and subsequently those of her Secret Doctrine and Theosophical Glossary, have been misled into thinking Madame Blavatsky an enormous reader, possessed of vast erudition; while the fact is her reading was very limited, and her ignorance was profound in all branches of knowledge. The books utilized in compiling Isis were nearly all current nineteenth-century literature.....Our author made great pretensions to Cabbalistic learning; but every quotation from and every allusion to the Cabbala, in Isis and all her later works, were copied at second-hand from certain books containing scattered quotations from Cabbalistic writings.
> The Secret Doctrine is ostensibly based upon certain stanzas, claimed to have been translated by Madame Blavatsky from the Book of Dzyan,—the oldest book in the world, written in a language unknown to philology. The Book of Dzyan was the work of Madame Blavatsky,—a compilation, in her own language, from a variety of sources, embracing the general principles of the doctrines and dogmas taught in the Secret Doctrine. I find in this "oldest book in the world" statements copied from nineteenth-century books, and in the usual blundering manner of Madame Blavatsky.[2]

So Madame Blavatsky first had the audacity to forge a whole book and claim it to be the most ancient book in the world, and then found another book upon the teaching contained in this literary forgery! I do not know of any more impudent imposture in the whole of literature.

"COMMON TATERS."

A clergyman was much surprised one day at receiving a basket of potatoes from an old woman in his parish, with a message saying that as he had remarked in his sermon on the previous Sunday that some "common taters" (commentators) did not agree with him, she had sent him some real good ones.

Ruth.

SEATED at the fireside one very stormy night recently, a conundrum was launched at my unsuspecting head by my little daughter. Daughters have a tendency to regard their fathers as being general storehouses of knowledge, a kind of walking encyclopædia, a very present help in time of trouble. And no self-respecting parent cares to dispel the illusion if it can be kept up with any show of decency. He may try to fob them off with some kind of an evasion, but it is not usual to adopt the downright Agnostic position so long as a metaphysical dug-out is available. The poser for me that stormy night was: "Who was the father of Ruth?"

Now, although I had read my Holy Bible with some care in my callous youth, yet I was scarcely prepared to give the gentleman's name offhand to an inquisitive minx, so I parried the question by asking her to reach the Bible and I would soon enlighten her. Alas! the trouble was to find the short history of the lady, for her record is only a little one, and she is sandwiched with Judges and Samuel. I became interested in her story, and was entranced with her four chapters. The snowflakes were whirling fast outside, but I was helping her to glean in the open fields of Boaz, way back in the long ago. I searched carefully for her father's name, but had to admit ruefully that I couldn't find it, though if the patriarchal title of her father-in-law would do the same, I could furnish it at once. That was the best I could do to save my reputation, and I am not sure that I succeeded.

But I want to speak a good word for Ruth in these bloodthirsty times. Perhaps it would do no harm if Christians were persuaded to read their Bibles with more diligence. We scarcely ever hear Ruth mentioned. Moses and David, Solomon and Isaiah, are continually to the fore. Even Ezekiel, with his peculiar rations, is occasionally mentioned, while Paul, with his lugubrious letters, holds far too high a position in the religious world. I never could stand Paul with his interminable epistles. He wrote more notes than President Wilson. But Ruth, with her romantic love-affair, is lost sight of. We can see her busy in the sun-lit fields gathering the corn that was purposely left for her, and returning at night with a good armful, "while the Syrian stars looked down." Says Shakespeare:—

> Oh, who can hold a fire in his hand
> By thinking on the frosty Caucasus?
> Or wallow naked in December snow
> By thinking on fastastic summer's heat?

But the picture of Ruth at the time of barley-harvest can do something to mitigate the severity of an Arctic winter. I am glad I looked for the name of Ruth's pater.

We must admit that her mother-in-law, Naomi, knew most of the points in the game of matchmaking. She was a practised hand at the business. And, of course, the touching fidelity of the young widow to the older one deserved the fullest recognition. Boaz was evidently the catch of the season. Most of the young ladies around Bethlehem had given him the "glad eye" to no purpose. He had withstood all the wiles and the snares that Eve's daughters had planted for him, until the young Moabitish widow appeared, backed by her mother-in-law. Then he fell, like many a good man since, to womanish strategy. It was a case of love at first sight. Whether it was the colour of her hair, or the tilt of her nose, or the archness of her eyebrows, history does not say, but she must have been a winsome lass for to "find favour in his sight" so readily. I do not defend all the machinations of the mother-in-law. We know this much abused class have a grievous lot of inuendoes to answer for, but when a rich young farmer was in the net, it was only right that he should be hooked. He had to be secured either by hook or by crook. In the matter of landing a shy Lothario, I think Naomi could give points to George Bernard Shaw. Naomi was, undoubtedly, a super-woman.

Ruth was somewhat in the position of the young woman of the story who brought a slightly "elevated" young man to be married. The parson declined to go on with the ceremony owing to the state of the bride-"Take him away," said he, "and bring him back when he's sober." But the reply of the bridegroom elect threw a search-light on the many devious devices which the feminine mind can resort to in tracking the marked man. Her reply was: "But he won't come when he's sober." I do not say that Ruth was quite so determined as that, but in any case she managed him. The joy-bells rang, and they had a happy wedding. The other girls might call her a Moabitish minx, and question her bona-fides, but there is every reason to think they lived happily after. For unto them a son was born, and old Naomi became the nurse and dandled the rising hope on her knee. They Christened the boy Obed, and he, in later years, became the proud father of Jesse, who, as everyone knows, followed in his dad's footsteps, and who was the means, under grace, of starting on his great career the gentle David, whose heart was fashioned on the pattern of his Maker's, who could throw a pebble with the best of them, and who upheld with such strict impartiality the rights and the liberties of small nations.

Acid Drops.

It is astonishing how easily and how glibly the clergy arrive at the true moral of the European War! Thus Canon Scott Holland, preaching at the meeting of the Universities Missions to Central Africa, pointed out that we had trusted to education, commerce, and science to provide the means for better relations between peoples; and the best educated, the most scientific, and the most commercial nation in the world had disturbed its peace. Everything had failed—except religion—and we must get back to that. But Dr. Scott Holland forgets that over and above all being scientific, educated, and commercial, these nations were religious. They had almost as many parsons as commercial travellers, there were far more churches than schools, and certainly parsons are better paid than scientists, and monopolize a larger share of public attention. And religion has claimed to direct the moral energies of men in a supreme degree. Dr. Scott Holland's plea strikes one as lacking in "reality," to use a cant phrase.

The cant of Dr. Scott Holland's pronouncement is the more marked because of its silence with regard to religion. In not a single country engaged in the War has the clergy acted as a restraining or moralizing force. Whatever incentive was needed to go to war, whatever justification was required to go to war, whatever incentive was required to continue the War, was supplied by the clergy in Germany, in Britain, and elsewhere. Of course, they were championing a righteous War; but was there ever in the world's history a war that was not righteous to those engaged in it, and while they were engaged in it? If the clergy were ever in earnest about their preaching, it was their duty to stand aloof from the War, and to hold those ideals of justice and humanity which are always endangered during a war. It is neither science, nor education, nor commerce that are condemned by the War. Its real moral is the utter and complete breakdown of religion. Thousands have realized this already, and many more thousands will realize it before we reach the end of the conflict.

The Rev. A. M. Snadden, a Presbyterian minister, of Johannesburg, South Africa, has been telling his flock some plain truths. He pointed out that the emptiness of some places of worship in that city showed that rot had set in in the Church. The "rot" in the Churches is nothing to the "rot" uttered in the pulpits.

Christians are not all satisfied that the War is helping their faith. The Church Times is not altogether pleased that so many men in the Army are "nominally Church folk," and says bluntly that "only a small percentage of this vast multitude has anything but a faint glimmer of what the Church stands for." If the soldiers did know what the Church really stands for, there would be fewer Christians than ever.

A belated poster in the City announced that the 263rd festival of the sons of the clergy would be held at St. Paul's Cathedral. A waggish onlooker pointed out that the "sons of the clergy" seem to be as long-lived as the Old Testament patriarchs.

General Smuts says, in dealing with the coloured races there must be the maintenance of the Christian moral code. Coloured Christians, who have been insulted for generations by their white brethren, will best appreciate the unconscious irony of this remark.

We are indebted to a Church Times review of McFarlane's Reminiscences of a Literary Life for the information that Shelley would have "ended by becoming a Christian if his life had been prolonged," and that Godwin, after all his "changes in matters of faith or unbelief, must at last have died a Christian." We see no reason why Mr. McFarlane should have stopped with Shelley and Godwin. Such a charmingly simple method is applicable to every Freethinker that ever lived. It is none the less applicable to every Christian who might also die a Freethinker—if he lives long enough. Christians may not be always humorous in themselves, but the most solemn of them are often the cause of humour in others.

Lord Bryce estimates that 69,000,000 soldiers and civilians have been killed and wounded in the present world-war. What a commentary on the civilizing effects of two thousand years of Christianity.

The Rev. W. T. Fullerton, the new President of the Baptist Union, suggests that parish churches should be used for all creeds. This would mean continuous performances, with day and night shifts.

A chapel dedicated to Our Lady and St. Dunstan has been opened at St. Dunstan's Hostel for blind soldiers. We could understand this better if those exalted personages had restored sight to any of the unhappy patients.

"All mankind is seeking God," says Mr. H. G. Wells. There is a mistake here, for the Bishop of London and his friends have found three deities already.

The Vicar of Ramsgate told his flock that reliance on God is better than reliance on the "season." The clergy generally find trust in God a very good thing, for they are almost the only professional men whose incomes do not depend on the "season."

Schoolboy humour is often refreshing. A very handy, if unorthodox, explanation of the three Christian Creeds was given by a young student. "First of all there was the Apostles' Creed. But some people didn't believe it. So then they made the Nicene Creed, but still men wouldn't believe that. So at last they made the Athanasian Creed, which was so complicated that nobody could understand it."

In the issue of the Truthseeker, from which the above is taken, we see that Billy Sunday is credited with having taken,

The above sums represent what are called "Free Will Offerings," given for the personal benefit of the evangelist. And America is also a civilized country. With this kind of thing, and the War, one is inclined to look with a certain sympathy on the flood story.

That the Christian superstition has little to do with civilization is shown by the Annual Report of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which during last year dealt with 129,089 cases of neglect and starvation. British Christians ought to send missionaries abroad, with such things taking place at home.

A witness in a recent law case swore a novel oath on "her mother's grave." In another case a Chinaman took an oath by breaking a saucer. There are tribes in India that swear by the head of a tiger, while others chop a dog in two as emblematic of the fate of the perjurer. The countrymen of the Bishop of London swear on a greasy Testament. And the simplest method is that of the Freethinker, who swears not at all, but just tells what he knows.

A curious religious manifestation is reported from Los Angeles, where a saint and prophetess (coloured) named Ella is sued for the return of property conveyed to her by followers. Saint Ella, posing as a virgin, announces that she is to bear a son to be called "the White King Emanuel." In the trial the plaintiff's attorney offered to prove that the prophetess had been to Nevada and consorted with or married a white man. Saint Ella has had a large following, organized as the Church of the Invisible God, and is said to exercise a remarkable influence over members. Such scepticism as is now shown about her divine motherhood would have robbed the world of some "saviours" in the past.—Truthseeker (New York).

The Bishop of Chichester says that "in every sense of the word we are slackers in religion." The Bishop had better make the best of the situation. We can assure him there are much worse times ahead.

At Stratford Police Court, on May 30, James Orpen, clerk in holy orders, was charged with attempting to procure two boys to commit an act of gross indecency. When arrested, the accused asked if the matter could be settled if he paid for it.

It is characteristic of our Government's interest in education that, so soon as offices are needed for other purposes, a descent is made on the Ministry for Education. Perhaps the bitterest satire of all is the banishment of Mr. Fisher and his staff to a museum!

In crowded Fleet Street all sorts of newspaper offices get jumbled up together. On one window the announcements run: "The Independent Methodist" and "Our Cats."

The Salvation Army announces a flag-day in order to raise money. Certainly it is a more efficacious manner of "raising the wind" than the Christian method of relying on prayer.

Mr. H. G. Wells's "conversion" is extending. He has written an introduction to a translation of M. Loyson's reactionary book, The Gods in Battle, which is chiefly remarkable for its denunciation of present-day Socialists. Mr. Wells has "found God" with a vengeance.

Some of the newspaper comments on Mr. Wells' theology are ironic. The Daily Mirror remarks that the author of God the Invisible King "politely introduces mankind to a new deity." Just so! And popular prejudice runs in favour of three Gods.

Dr. Newton, the new minister of the City Temple, told his congregation that America must do the work that Emerson assigned to her. He forgot to mention that Emerson was a Freethinker.

The Bishop of Oxford thinks "there is no department of educational history which is more lamentable than the almost complete collapse of religious education in the secondary schools." It may never have occurred to his lordship that one reason for this collapse is that secondary school teachers generally regard the subject as of little or no importance, and for that reason reduce it to a minimum. This is the case even where the teachers are themselves formally religious. Naturally, the Bishop of Oxford would like to see this altered, and one way of effecting an alteration would be to more carefully train the teachers themselves in religious subjects. We are afraid that to carefully train means here carefully select, with a boycott of those who show disinclination to being made a catspaw of the parsons.

The war on German trade after peace is concluded is to have its counterpart in the war on German missionaries. The Rev. Dr. Ogilvie told the Church of Scotland Assembly that "no German missionary would be allowed for a long, long period of years to work in any British possession." One may always trust the parsons to look after their own trade interests. Competition is always keen between missionary societies, and one could hardly expect this favourable opportunity to be overlooked. But what a lesson in Christian charity and brotherhood!

Our sympathy is extended to the ghost of the late V. F. Wilson, Organizing Secretary of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, who died leaving behind him £229,880. We do not assume that Mr. Wilson intended leaving so much behind him. He would probably have preferred taking it with him.

We see that the death is reported of Chief Constable Mackay, one of the officials concerned in the Clydebank case, where a witness was refused affirmation, and threatened with contempt of court for refusing to take the oath. It appears that Chief Constable Mackay was really unaware of the terms of the Oaths Act, which is evidence of the careless preparation of officials for the discharge of functions attaching to their office.

The Vicar of Ramsgate says that for two years that town has been "miraculously protected" from air raids. What a pity God did not extend his protection to Folkestone? And we wonder what the relatives of the people recently killed at Folkestone think of God's partiality?

"General Booth," of the Salvation Army, is making a modest appeal for a paltry £200,000 for the central funds alone. Some other generals are not so easily satisfied.

To Correspondents.

W. REPTON.—It appeared in these columns some time ago. Your desire to get back to a more civilized life is, we think, shared by all. The sooner we see you again, the better.

J. S. CAPEWELL.—We cannot tell you where a copy of Howard Evan's Price of Priestcraft may be obtained. Perhaps one of our readers may oblige with the information.

A. M. NEILSON.—Thanks for the information, which we have already received from other quarters. Your inference is doubtless the correct one.

R. OGILVIE.—Perhaps one effect of the War may be to compell friends of the Labour Movement to see the folly of pandering to religious leaders. Labour will never capture the Churches; it is more likely to be the other way about. We intend republishing Mr. Mann's articles, also other pamphlets. But at present the paper question is in the way.

QUERIST (Moston).—The only legal way in which the name of a Freethinker's child can be given is when it is registered. The ceremony of publicly naming it is often performed at a Freethought meetings. The Secular ceremony over a grave may be performed by anyone, and consists of a suitable reading or speech. Any help that is possible and is required may be obtained by writing to the N. S. S. Secretary. We do not think the matter can be made plainer.

T. C.—Your second guess is, we think, the correct one. We cannot say more publicly.

H. LEESON.—You may rely absolutely on what we have said on the subject.

Y. O. C.—We have no doubt that money could be raised in the way you suggest to make good the loss on the Freethinker during the War, but it is a method we do not care to adopt.

MAJOR GEO. WARREN.—We cordially endorse your opinion of the Cambridge Magazine. Thanks for cutting.

W. G. PUGH —It is not too political, but we are so badly pressed for space, and shall be for some weeks to come.

W. GREEN.—We do not think that the late Mr. J. Chamberlain or Mr. A. J. Balfour ever called themselves Agnostics, although it is a fair assumption from the writings of the latter that he has no genuine claim to the name of "Christian."

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss Vance acknowledges:—E. T. Brewster, 5s.

We are glad to find that our readers are so interested in the report of the Bowman Judgment. Its far-reaching importance is generally recognized, and, even as articles, the judgments are well worth reading. We hope to complete publication in another two issues, and that will give us space for articles that we have been compelled to hold over meanwhile. Mr. Palmer's pen, for one, has been absent from these columns solely from this cause.

To-day (June 10) Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures at the Fife Hall, Fife Road, Kingston-on-Thames, at 7 o'clock. The lecture is to be delivered before the Kingston Humanitarian Society, and we trust to hear that Freethinkers in the western suburbs will take full advantage of the opportunity offered.

We are asked to announce that a meeting will be held to-day (June 10) at the Emerson Club, 19 Buckingham Street, Strand, at 4 o'clock, to consider the formation of a Society for a discussion of the Principles of Morality as set forth in M. Deshunbert's Morale Fondee sur les Lois de la Nature. We understand that this is part of an international movement, and M. Deshunbert, who is resident in London, will be present. Mr. Heaford will also be among the speakers. We wish the attempt all success.

Presidential Notes.

ON Whit-Sunday the Annual Conference of the National Secular Society did me the honour of again unanimously electing me as President for the ensuing twelve months. Pressure of work and want of space combined to prevent my writing anything on the subject last week, and to say that, little as I care for honours of any kind, how much I appreciate the confidence shown in the vote itself, and in the letters received from Branches and individual members before the Conference took place. I forbore printing these before the Conference, lest it should appear that I was seeking to influence votes, and I only mention them now as an acknowledgment to the writers. Twelve months ago, when I was first elected, I made but one promise and expressed but one hope. I promised to do my best, and hoped that no one would regret voting for my election. I am quite certain that the promise has been kept, and have no reason for assuming that the hope has not been realized.

Years ago, when supporting the re-election of Mr. Foote, I said that the Presidency of the N. S. S. was a post that no one who loved an easy life and possessed judgment would strive after, but it was one that no man with courage and a sense of duty would refuse. It is an unpaid post and, I think, should remain so. It is well that the leadership of the Militant Freethought Party should be free from fiduciary considerations. In this respect I cordially agree with the policy of my predecessors in giving their services free, and in making no claim upon the Society even to the extent of certain inevitable out-of-pocket expenses. The one advantage of the post is the opportunity for work, and although I am no lover of work for work's sake, I hope that I shall never be found wanting in effort where the interests of Freethought are concerned. To labour for a cause one loves is something, to feel that one has behind him the confidence and respect of thousands of earnest men and women turns that labour into a pleasant occupation and provides a payment that no monetary consideration could equal.

The National Secular Society has now been in existence for over fifty years, and there was never greater need for a strong and efficient organization than now. In many respects I think the time is ripe for a complete overhauling of the machinery of the Society, and a readjustment suitable to altered conditions. To that aspect of the Society's work I may return on some future occasion. At present I desire to say that whatever line this readjustment takes—and I have several plans more or less definitely in mind—it will be the easier for a larger membership and a greater number of Branches than the Society possesses at present. Two new Branches were formed last year and, I believe, the ground prepared for others, besides a large increase in membership; but this only whets one's appetite for more. The North of England has been deplorably quiescent of late years, and I am quite sure that if Freethinkers will bestir themselves the general public will respond. It is no use waiting for the public to make the first move, that must be made by those interested in the work. Any half-dozen people in one of the large towns in the country who will arrange a meeting can hardly fail to secure enough of an audience to encourage them to go on with the work. I earnestly beg Freethinkers everywhere to at least make the experiment.

I have said it often before, but at the risk of wearying will say it again, the present is a golden opportunity for the Freethought Movement. The War has everywhere lowered the clergy and the Churches and the creeds in the estimation of the general public. The public mind is breaking away from its old moorings, the shock of the European upheaval has shattered the formal assent which people gave to conventional religious shibboleths. Everywhere audiences have been more sympathetic, more responsive to the Freethought message. As editor of the Freethinker I have the best of reasons for knowing into how many fresh hands the paper has found its way, and how appreciatively it has been received. If we are wise we shall take full advantage of this season of unsettlement and create a new orientation of the public mind. If we are unwise, or slothful, we shall allow the present opportunity to pass, to find when the War is over that the Churches have to a considerable degree re-established themselves in virtue of a few new shibboleths which only thinly disguise the old evils.

I told the Conference on Whit-Sunday, and was pleased to find the remark generally endorsed, that in my opinion the N.S.S. had not and never had possessed an office organization suited to a propagandist Society. The office itself ought to be an active centre and source of propaganda, with a properly equipped secretariat. Effective organization along these lines would take time; but I made one suggestion which I hope to see the Executive deal with as early as circumstances will allow. Very little use is made by the N.S.S., as an organization, of the press. There are scores of papers in the country continually publishing articles or letters bearing upon our propaganda, which would insert brief communications either by way of comment or reply. The cases continually cropping up about the Oath is one instance; the widely reported Bowman judgment is another. Yet, so far as the N.S.S. is officially concerned, not a line appeared in the press by way of correction or supplementation. The office is dumb, and the public unaware of our existence or of our interest in these matters. I am quite certain that were someone appointed whose business it should be to look after this side of the work—call him Corresponding Secretary, or Press Secretary—the result would be very beneficial to the Society. The only difficulty is to hit on a suitable person for the work; but if one can be found, I am convinced that the appointment will soon justify itself.

There are other suggestions I have in mind as opportunities offer for their realization. But it is useless offering them without prospect of materialization. Before I close these notes, however, this seems a fitting occasion to mention another matter. It will be remembered that in April, 1916, a Special Propaganda Fund was raised, to be spent as my judgment directed. At my own initiative I asked Mr. Lloyd and two members of the Executive to act as a committee to watch the expenditure of the money, and at my own initiative I am offering a general statement of the expenditure so far. Up to date about £175 has been expended. Of this sum, about £80 has been given, in the shape of grants, to the N.S.S. Executive and to Branches of the N.S.S. The balance of the £175 has been spent in organizing lectures in London and the provinces. Perhaps I ought to say that of this expenditure a little over £30 has been credited to myself in connection with my own lecture work. As this £30 includes railway expenses—with a fifty per cent. increase—and hotel bills, I do not think it can be said that I have used that Fund to add materially to my own income. It is possible that I have received some seven or eight pounds above my out-of-pocket expenses during the past fourteen months. It is not, perhaps, necessary that I should make this statement, but there is no reason that I can see why I should not. And seeing that the Fund has kept the propaganda active during a time when it would otherwise have languished, I think it will be admitted that it has quite justified its existence.

CHAPMAN COHEN,

v.

THE Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1832, and the Jewish Relief Act, 1846, expressly validate trusts for the purposes of the Roman Catholic and Jewish religions. No inference can, therefore, be drawn from any decision since they were placed on the Statute Book. But the case of De Costa v. De Paz, to which I have already referred, is important in this connection. It was decided before the Jewish Relief Act, and Lord Hardwicke held that a trust for the purpose of the Jewish religion was bad on the ground that it was against Christianity, and Christianity was the law of the land. It would have been enough to say it could not be enforced on the ground that the practice of the Jewish religion was subject to statutory penalties. On further consideration, however, Lord Hardwicke upheld the gift on the ground that it was for a charitable purpose, and that the testator's general charitable intention ought not to be defeated because the fund could not be applied in the way the testator desired. He left it to the Crown to direct a cy pres application. As I have already said, the Crown applied it for the purposes of the Christian religion. This case seems to show that the Jewish religion is within the equitable rule and that, apart from the statutory penalties, there was never anything inconsistent with public policy in enforcing a trust for the benefit of the Jewish religion. De Costa v. De Paz was followed in Isaac v. Gompertz (7 Ves., 61). Lord Thurlow there held that a trust for the maintenance of a Jewish synagogue was charitable, and directed an application to the Crown with a view to its cy pres application.

My Lords, apart from the question of religious trusts, there is one authority directly in point. In Pare v. Clegg (29 B. 589) the plaintiff sued the trustees of a friendly society known as the Rational Society for moneys lent to the Society. The trustees objected that the Society had illegal objects, and that the money could not be recovered on that account. The object of the Society included the promotion of the following propositions: "(1) That all facts yet known to man indicate that there is an external or internal cause of all existences by the fact of their existence; that this all-pervading cause of motion or change in the universe is the power which the nations of the world have called God, Jehovah, Lord, etc., but that the facts are yet unknown to man which define what that power is; (2) That all ceremonial worship by man of this cause whose qualities are yet so little known proceeds from ignorance of his own nature, and can be of no real utility in practice; and that it is impossible to train men to become rational in their feelings, thoughts, or actions, until all such forms shall cease." These propositions are clearly anti-Christian. If they point to religion at all, it is a kind of negative Deism, if I may use that expression, and not a theistic religion. Nevertheless, it was held by the Master of the Rolls, Lord Romilly, that they contained nothing "irreligious or immoral," and that, therefore, the defence failed. It follows that he cannot have thought that there was anything against public policy in advocating Deism or (a fortiori) any form of Monotheism.

My Lords, in my opinion, the authorities I have mentioned are sufficient to establish that the first object of the Society's Memorandum is not open to objection as contrary to the policy of the law. It is not illegal, for it does not involve blasphemy. It is not irreligious, for it is, any rate, consistent with that negative Deism which was held not to be irreligious in Pare v. Clegg. It is not immoral or seditious. It is, no doubt, anti-Christian; but, to adopt the words of Mr. Justice Coleridge in Shore v. Wilson (9 C. and F at p. 536): "There is nothing unlawful at common law in reverently doubting or denying doctrines parcel of Christianity, however fundamental. It would be difficult to draw a line in such matters according to perfect orthodoxy, or to define how far one might depart from it in believing or teaching without offending the law. The only safe and, as it seems to me, practical rule is that which I have pointed out, and which depends on the sobriety, and reverence, and seriousness, with which the teaching or believing, however erroneous are maintained."

My Lords, I am glad to be able to come to this conclusion. It would be a serious matter for your Lordships' House, unless clearly compelled by authority to lay down a principle which would not only lead to the anomalies pointed out by Lord Buckmaster, but would preclude the courts of this country from giving effect to trusts for the purposes of religions which, however sacred they may be to millions of His Majesty's subjects, either deny the truth of Christianity or, at any rate, do not accept some of its fundamental doctrines.

On all these grounds I think the Appeal fails.

LORD SUMNER.

(READ BY LORD DUNEDIN.)

My Lords, the question is whether an anti-Christian Society is incapable of claiming a legacy duly bequeathed to it merely because it is anti-Christian?

If the Respondents are an anti-Christian Society is the maxim that Christianity is part of the law of England true, and, if so, in what sense? If Christianity is of the substance of our law, and if a court of law must, nevertheless, adjudge possession of its property to a company whose every action seeks to subvert Christianity and bring that law to naught, then by such judgment it stultifies the law. So it was argued, and if the premise is right, I think the conclusion follows. It is not enough to say with Lord Chief Justice Lord Coleridge in Ramsey's case (48 Law Times, 735) that this maxim has long been abolished, or with my noble and learned friend, the Master of the Rolls, in the court below that "the older view" based on this maxim "must now be regarded as obsolete." If that maxim expresses a positive rule of law once established, though long ago, time cannot abolish it nor disfavour make it obsolete. The decisions which refer to such a maxim are numerous and old, and although none of them is a decision of this House, if they are in agreement, and if such is their effect, I apprehend they would not now be over-ruled, however little reason might incline your Lordships to concur in them. In what sense, then, was it ever a rule of law that Christianity is part of the law? The legal material is fourfold: (1) statute law; (2) the criminal law of blasphemy; (3) general civil cases; (4) cases relating to charitable trusts. From statute law little is to be gleaned. During the sixteenth century many Acts were passed to repress objectionable doctrines, but plainly statutes were not needed if the common law possessed an armoury for the defence of Christianity as part and parcel of itself. Indeed, who but the King in Parliament could then say whether the Christianity, which, for the time being, formed part of the common law, was the Christianity of Rome, or of Geneva, or of Wittenberg? Certainly the courts could not.

After the Revolution of 1688 there were passed the Toleration Act "to give some ease to scrupulous consciences in exercise of religion," which, upon conditions, relieved certain Dissenters (Papists and those who denied the Trinity excepted) from the operation of various existing statutes, and the Blasphemy Act, which recites that "many persons have avowed Blasphemous doctrines contrary to the doctrines and principles of the Christian religion, and may prove destructive to the peace and welfare of this kingdom." That the Blasphemy Act simply added new penalties for the common law offence of blasphemy, when committed under certain conditions, was held by Lord Hardwicke in Da Costa v. De Paz (2 Swanston, 487 n), and by the Court of King's Bench in Richard Carlile's case (3 B. and Ald., 161), and Lord Eldon in A.-G. v. Pearson (3 Merevale, 393) said that the Toleration Act left the common law as it was, and only exempted certain persons from the operation of certain statutes. Such, indeed, is the clear language of the statutes, nor can the fact that persons are singled out for special punishments, who deny the Godhead of the Three Persons of the Trinity, the truth of the Christian religion, and the Divine Authority of the Holy Scriptures, or who maintain that there be more gods than one, be accepted as showing that the common law offence of blasphemy consists in such denials and assertions and in nothing else. Later Acts have relieved various religious confessions from the burthen of the Blasphemy Act and other statutes; but, except in so far as they deal with charitable trusts for the purposes of such confessions, on which I do not now dwell, they seem to carry the present matter no further. The common law as to blasphemous libels was first laid down after the Restoration, and here the statement that Christianity is part of the law is first found as one of the grounds of judgment. Earlier opinions of the same kind are curiously general in character.

At the beginning of the seventeenth century a considerable change of procedure took place in reference to religion. Legate was burnt at Smithfield in 1612 upon a writ de haeretico comburendo, and another heretic named Wightman, at Lichfield, about the same time; but they were the last persons to go to the stake in this country pro salute animae. No doubt this process was moribund. Before the Restoration the Court of Star Chamber and the Court of High Commission had been suppressed, and at length, by the Statute 29 Charles II., c. 9, the writ de haeretico comburendo itself was abolished, with all process and proceedings thereupon and all punishment of death in pursuance of any ecclesiastical censures. It is to be noted that the Act, in saving the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical Courts over "atheism, blasphemy, heresy, and schism," distinguishes blasphemy from the profession of false doctrines, whether atheistical or heretical. The time of Charles II. was one of notorious laxity both in faith and morals, and for a time it seemed as if the old safeguards were in abeyance or had been swept away. Immorality and irreligion were cognizable in the the ecclesiastical Courts, but spiritual censures had lost their sting, and the civil Courts were extinct, which had specially dealt with such matters viewed as offences against civil order.

The Court of King's Bench stepped in to fill the gap. In 1664 Sir Charles Sedley was indicted for indecency and blasphemy (1 Siderfin, 168; 17 Howell's State Trials, 155). The indecency was so gross that little stress was laid on the blasphemy, which was probably both tipsy and incoherent. The Court told the prisoner that they would have him know that, although there was no longer any Star Chamber, they acted as custos morum for all the King's subjects, and it was high time to punish such profane actions, contrary alike to modesty and to Christianity. Then follows Taylor's case in 1676, when the indictment was for words only, though ribald and profane enough. This is the earliest trial for blasphemy. Attwood's case in 1617 is not an instance (Rolle's Abr., 78).

Now, Taylor's case is the foundation-stone of this branch of the law, and for a century or so there is no sign of carrying the law beyond it. The case repays scrutiny. The objection that the offence was an ecclesiastical one lay on the very face of the words charged, and in directing the Jury, Lord Chief Justice Hale found it necessary to show why it was also a civil offence. He said that such kind of wicked blasphemous words, though of ecclesiastical cognizance, were not only an offence to God and religion, but a crime against the laws, State, and Government, and "therefore punishable in this Court, for to say religion is a cheat is to dissolve all those obligations whereby the civil societies are preserved" (1 Ventris, 293; 3 Keble, 607, 621). It is true he added that Christianity was parcel of the laws of England, "and therefore to reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law," but this does not really enlarge the previous statement. Speaking in subversion of the law, without more, in the sense of saying that particular laws are bad and should be mended, has never been a criminal offence, and agitating against them has often led on to fortune. Woolston's case, in 1728, supplies the completion of the doctrine. Upon a motion in arrest of judgment (2 Str., 834; Fitz., 64), the Court followed Taylor's case as settled law. The argument was that Woolston's crime, if any, was of ecclesiastical cognizance (he was a clergyman who joked about the miracles), and that "mere difference of opinion is tolerated by law." Lord Raymond's answer was, "I would have it taken notice of that we do not meddle with any difference in opinion, and that we interpose only where the very root of Christianity is spoken of.....To say that an attempt to subvert the established religion is not punishable by those laws upon which it is established is an absurdity." True it is that the last words somewhat invert Lord Hale's reasoning, for they seem to treat an attempt to subvert the established form of Christianity (not any other) as an offence, because it attacks the creature of the law, not because that form is the basis of the law itself and the bond of civilized society. At any rate, the case leaves untouched mere difference of opinion, not tending to subvert the laws and organization of the realm.

Curl's case, heard about the same time (2 Str., 788; 1 Barnardiston, 29), was a case for publishing an obscene libel, but it is of some incidental importance. The Courts were chary of enlarging their jurisdiction in this regard, and in Queen Anne's time judgment had been arrested in such a case for supposed want of precedent, and the offence was treated as one for ecclesiastical cognizance only. On a motion for arrest of the judgment on Curl it was argued that the libel being only contra bonos mores, was for the spiritual Courts. The motion was refused, the Chief Justice saying: "If it reflects on religion, virtue or morality, if it tends to disturb the civil order of society, I think it is a temporal offence." He said, too, "religion is part of the common law"; but Mr. Justice Probyn clears this up, adding, "It is punishable at common law as an offence against the peace in tending to weaken the bonds of civil society."

At the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth centuries various publishers of Paine's Age of Reason were prosecuted. The words indicted were chosen for their scoffing character, and indeed are often really blasphemous, but the idea throughout is that the book was the badge of revolution and tended to jeopardize the State. Thus during the trial of Williams (26 State Trials, 654), Mr. Justice Ashurst said of it that "it was an offence against law and government from its direct tendency to dissolve all bonds and obligations of civil society," and again in passing sentence on him in the Court of King's Bench, he states the ground of this offence thus: "All offences of this kind are not only offences to God, but crimes against the law of the land, and are punishable as such, inasmuch as they tend to destroy those obligations whereby civil society is bound together, and it is upon this ground that the Christian religion constitutes part of the law of England."

N.S.S. Annual Conference.

Report of Business Meeting.

THE Annual Conference was held at South Place on Whit-Sunday.

Delegates present were as follows: T. H. How (Bethnal Green), F. G. Willis (Birmingham), J. T. Lloyd (Glasgow), E. Neary (Kingsland), J. T. Lloyd (Liverpool), Mrs. Rosetti (Manchester), R. Chapman (Newcastle), T. F. Palmer and W. J. Downing (North London), L. Brandes and P. S. Wilde (South London), R. Chapman (South Shields), H. Spence and T. Thurlow (West Ham).

Vice-Presidents attending as such were: Messrs. Baker, Bowman, Dobson, Gorniot, Heaford, Leat, Moss, Neate, Nichols, Pitt, Quinton, Roger, Samuels, Shore, Silverstein, and Wood, and Mesdames Kough, Stanley, and Rolfe.

Amongst other familiar figures were noticed Messrs. Brewster, Bury, Clifton, Harrison, Hollamby, Henley, Judge, Lazarnick, Miller, Hanmer Owen, Howell Smith, Schindel, Shaller, Storey, and Mesdames Lane, Owen, and Brandes.

The President (Mr. C. Cohen) in opening the proceedings said he hoped the discussion would be carried on with good temper and with profit to the Cause. Many provincial delegates had been prevented attending by the difficulties of travelling, and by the fact that very many members were engaged on War work; but it was satisfactory in the circumstances to see so many present.

The Minutes of the previous Conference, as reported in the Freethinker last year, were passed on the motion of Mr. Willis (Birmingham), seconded by Mr. Thurlow (West Ham).

The President then read the Annual Report.

The Report was adopted on the motion of Mr. Roger seconded by Mr. Miller.

Mr. Willis (Birmingham) in supporting it said it was a record of good work for the Freethought Party. He was pleased that mention was made of the debt of gratitude they owed to G. W. Foote in connection with the Secular Society; at the same time it was a matter of deep regret that he did not live to witness the successful fruition of his efforts. The Executive were to be congratulated on their action against the London County Council who had attempted to rob the citizens of their rights. Had the Council succeeded in stopping the sale of literature, it would only have been the first step to further action.

Mr. Heaford said he missed from the Report some reference to the progress of Freethought throughout the world. He thought the revolution in Russia opened out a wide field for the activities of Freethought—it inaugurated a new era of civil and religious liberty. He would like to suggest that a resolution be passed congratulating the Russian Government and the Russian people on the great step which they had taken for themselves and for us along the path of liberty and progress. (Agreed).

Mr. Brandes said he did not notice any item in the financial report for the lectures run by the N.S.S. at South Place and Queen's Hall.

The President said that these expenses were met in another direction.

The financial report was then taken as read, and passed.

The next item on the Agenda being the election of President, Mr. Cohen vacated the chair, and Mr. Spence was elected to occupy it. He said there was a motion on behalf of the West Ham, Bethnal Green, and Birmingham Branches for the re-election of Mr. Chapman Cohen as President. Mr. Cohen's apprenticeship under Mr. Foote for so many years especially fitted him for the position of President in these trying times.

Mr. Neary (Bethnal Green) formally moved the election of Mr. Chapman Cohen as President.

Mr. Thurlow, in seconding the motion, said he was heartily glad that the Society possessed such a successor to the two distinguished men who had preceded him. He (the speaker) had watched Mr. Cohen's career from the start, and he did not know anyone in the movement who would make a better standard-bearer.

Mr. Willis (Birmingham), in seconding the motion, said Mr. Cohen showed marked ability, intellectuality, courage, and tact, and was a worthy successor of the great men who had preceded him in the presidential chair. They required such a man in these troublous times of reaction, and they would also need him at the outbreak of peace.

The motion was then put to the meeting and carried with acclamation.

Mr. Cohen thanked the meeting for the honour they had conferred upon him, and said he only valued the position of the Presidency of the N.S.S. for one reason, namely, the opportunity it gave for doing work for the cause. If the holding of that position meant merely an honour, he assured them he would not take the trouble to stand as candidate. He reminded the Conference that he had said last year he hoped when twelve months had elapsed no one who voted for him would feel sorry that they had cast their vote. He had not given cause for regret by any slackening of energy. In all the years of Freethought advocacy he thought there had never been a more trying and troublesome period.

On the motion of Mr. Cohen, seconded by Mr. Willis, the Vice-Presidents were re-elected. Mr. H. B. Savill and Mr. Harry Jones were re-elected Auditors.

After some discussion the revised Rules of the Society were adopted on the motion of Mr. Roger seconded by Mr. Shore.

With respect to motion No. 9 standing in the name of Mr. Cowell re the abolition of the Presidency, Mr. Cowell wrote regretting that severe illness kept him away from the Conference, and asked leave to withdraw his motion. This was done, and the Conference passed by a unanimous vote to "next business."

Mr. Willis, in proposing resolution No. 10 on the Agenda, said the Birmingham Branch had instructed him to bring forward at the Conference the question of the disposal of any monies bequeathed to the Secular Society, Limited. They thought that some of these funds should be given to the Provincial Branches.

Mr. Shore pointed out that this was no part of the business of the N. S. S.

After considerable discussion the Resolution No. 10: "That in the opinion of this Conference the earliest opportunity should be taken of publishing the judgment of the House of Lords in respect to the Bowman case," seconded by Mrs. Rosetti, on behalf of the Manchester Branch, was put to the meeting and carried unanimously.

Mr. Howell Smith in proposing Resolution No. 11: "That, having in view the elaborate preparations being made by all sections of the Christian Church to meet post-War conditions, and the possibility of reaction resulting from such activities, this Conference urges Freethinkers throughout the country to counteract the tactics of the Churches by effective organization on their part, and suggests the formation of Branches of the N. S. S. wherever possible," said that in view of the strenuous efforts being put forward by all the Churches, both in this country and on the Continent, he would like to see as many centres of ferment as possible (to use a phrase from chemistry) set up in the movement. The problems for Freethinkers to tackle were greater than in the past. Their path became harder, and demanded greater intellectualism and greater self-discipline. They had now to deal with all sorts of mysticisms, and it was very necessary that Freethinkers should not only understand all the theological issues, but also the great moral issues which cropped up in our national and international relations, and he wished to see these questions taken up by N. S. S. Branches throughout the country.

Mr. Heaford thought Mr. Smith's resolution an epoch-marking one. The post-War conditions would, in his opinion, be the most remarkable that the world had ever seen. New forces would be brought into play, and it would be the duty of Freethinkers to meet those forces, adapt itself to them, and endeavour to control them for the progress and well-being of mankind.

Mr. Palmer (North London Branch) also strongly supported Mr. Smith's resolution. He thought Freethinkers should make a greater study of science, so as to combat the arguments put forward by the ever-increasing sects.

Resolution No. 12, proposing (a) that an extra Conference should be held during the autumn, and (b) requesting the Editor of the Freethinker to insert brief weekly reports of meetings in that journal, was then put with a slight amendment, and carried.

Mr. Lloyd, on Motion No. 13, said that the interest in religion was lessening materially, and the Churches, knowing this, were drawing together to secure certain things after the War; and one of their aims was to enforce religious education in the State schools. Freethinkers must do their utmost to resist these attempts, and to abolish religion from the nation's schools.

On Motion No. 14, that the same person shall not hold the office of President for more than two consecutive years, Mr. Brandes said he only proposed to read it, and would reserve his speech until the end of the discussion.

Mr. Wylde seconded the motion, and said that in his opinion it was of a democratic nature. It was necessary to keep the Society in a state of flux, and the constant changing of President was best calculated to produce a healthy and vigorous condition.

The President said that if Mr. Brandes would not state his reasons for bringing the motion forward he, as President, should rule that he could not be heard at the end, when no reply to his reasons for bringing forward the motion could be made.

Mr. Willis said he did not think the mover of a resolution was bound to give his reasons for bringing it forward; but if he did not do so, he had no right later on to bring in new matter.

The President (adhering to his ruling) put the resolution to the meeting, and on a show of hands declared it lost. Only two voted in its favour.

The remaining resolutions on the Agenda being of a non-controversial character, and the time for the closing of the Conference having arrived, were moved and carried with only brief comments.

In bringing the Conference to a close, the President said that he was quite in accord with those who desired to build up a strong organization upon a thoroughly representative and democratic basis. The stronger, the more democratic, the better, and nothing would please him more than to find next year three or four suitable candidates for the presidency. He was doing his best to attract young and capable men to the Movement; he had already secured the support of many, and he hoped to get more.

The proceedings then terminated.

Correspondence.

"THE VOLTAIRE OF AMERICA."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—When travelling in the West Indies in 1887 I met a Colonel Smith of the United States Army. As I was a great admirer of Colonel Ingersoll, then in his prime, I asked Colonel Smith if he knew of him. "Know of him?" he replied, "Why there is not a man or woman in the U.S. who does not know of Robert Ingersoll. I not only know of him, but have the honour of being a close personal friend of his. Let me tell you something that will give you a better knowledge of him than most people have. Of course you know that Ingersoll is a most successful barrister, and therefore a very busy man. One day a young lady called at his office to see him, and, on being admitted, he asked her to say what she wanted as shortly as possible. She told him that she was the daughter of a doctor who had recently died unexpectedly and left her mother and sister and herself very badly off. They had been regular attendants at one of New York's most fashionable churches, but on her father's death were obliged to move to a much more poorer neighbourhood and go to a more modest place of worship. Now they were trying hard to make a living by needlework and painting Christmas cards, but the mother had broken down, and they were almost starving. She had applied for help to the rector of the fashionable church they attended and helped to support in the days of their prosperity, but he said that as they had ceased to be members of his church he could do nothing for them as he had so many other calls on his purse. She had heard of Colonel Ingersoll, and in her dire need she had reluctantly come to ask for his help." Ingersoll at once said: "I knew something of your father, and I believe what you have told me. There is $50 to help you over this difficulty, and should you want more do not hesitate to ask me.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I was unable to get into the breach a fortnight ago to defend Hebert against Messrs. Arch and Underwood, and their "authorities"—"the police" and "inebriated racing touts"—for the simple reason that I have been too busy defending myself against the Military Service Act of 1917. But—revenons a nos moutons! I do not pretend to have an infallible memory, and it appears to have between 1909 and 1911 when I last saw the Pere Duchene. I make this statement, however, as the "law" says, "without prejudice." However, as I am many miles from London, I cannot do as Mr. Underwood suggests, and make a "faithful English version" of No. 102 of the Pere Duchene, which, I take it, is the very worst of Hebert's "wanton obscenities." But I ask if Mr. Underwood will transcribe in the Freethinker the worst of this number for us, in the original French, and then I will do what he requires of me. I am sure the readers of the Freethinker will survive the shock! As to the susceptibilities of Mr. Arch's "police," or the blushes of Mr. Underwood's "inebriated racing touts," we need not trouble. Will you oblige us, Mr. Underwood? The Pere Duchene is history! and we ought to know it fully.

H. GEORGE FARMER.

A Thirsty Soldier's Lament.

WHEN you come to the end of a putrid day,
Handling your last—last "brown"!
You take a stroll in the Y.M.C.A.,
And you feel like a ship—going down!
No drink can be had elsewhere for a "D,"
So you crush to the counter and wait,
A penny well spent is spent on hot tea;
Yet you know that its only a bait;
Yes, you know it is only a bait!
For while you are drinking your penny in tea,
A puffy-face comes to your side, [prayer,
And whispers: "Dear comrade, a moment for A moment with Jesus to hide!"
And your tea turns to tannin—
It burns in your throat;
You gulp, and can't finish it quite,
For you realize now—to the harmonium's burst—
How the puffy-faced parson will gloat
On the fact that the men, forced in by their thirst,
The wreck of "Religion" will float.

ARTHUR F. THORN.

Death of Lorenzo Portet.

WE regret to learn from a correspondent of the death of Lorenzo Portet, an old revolutionary and Freethought fighter. Portet, who will be remembered by Liverpool Freethinkers, in which city he lived for some time, was a rebel from his youth upward. Intended for the Church, he entered commerce, and spent some time in South America. Returning to Spain, he joined Francisco Ferrer in his work of emancipation, and was compelled to flee to France. Expelled in turn from France, he came to England, where all his children were born, and where he gained a livelihood by the teaching of Spanish, continuing meanwhile his work as propagandist.

After Ferrer's death, Portet continued the former's work in the publication of numerous educational and freethinking works. He was arrested in Barcelona, and finally returned to Paris, where he died, and was buried in the Pavtin Parisien Cemetery. Addresses were delivered at the graveside by his old friend Malato, by Dr. Clauzel, and others.

Like many ardent reformers, Portet died penniless, leaving behind him a widow and four children, who for some time will be dependent upon the good will of those who sympathized with Portet's work.

THE PIONEER PRESS, 61 FARRINGDON STREET, E.C. 4.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
> Name.....
> Address.....
> Occupation .....
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

The Christian Revival.

If a revival of religion could be brought about by prophecy the Christian Churches in this country might look forward to a great increase in power after the War. For despite the now generally admitted neglect of religion during the War, and the many confessions that among the soldiers themselves for one that has had his religious beliefs strengthened a dozen have had theirs shattered, there is still plenty of talk about the revival of religion that is ahead. True, most of these prophets are careful to inform us that this revival is contingent upon certain happenings. If the Churches drop their sermonizing upon subjects that are without interest to the mass of the people, if class distinctions are ignored in church, if more attention is paid to sociology and less to theology, if the Churches interest themselves in the state of the cities and cease troubling about the new Jerusalem, if, in short, the Churches cease to be Churches and throw their Christianity overboard, there will be a great revival of religion. Only in that case it doesn't seem that there will be much—from the point of view of the Churches—left to revive. Attempting to revive a corpse is never a profitable operation.

The Churches and the Social Sense.

The immediate duty of the Christian Church, we are told, is to create and develop a social consciousness. The statement is quite in line with clerical arrogance and duplicity. The Churches cannot divest themselves of the idea that the direction and the control of society rests with them, and that if they fail, all fail. And, at the same time, their traditional fatuity prevents their realizing that the statement of the need carries with it a condemnation of Christianity. When Ruskin was told that the only friends of the poor were the clergy, he replied that that was the hardest thing he had ever heard said against them. For if they had done their duty there would be a sufficient sense of responsibility with all to make particular championship needless. We have had the Christian Churches in power for centuries. They have enjoyed great power and controlled enormous wealth. What education existed was largely under their direction, and they have made a profession of religion the condition of an easy life or of promotion to office. If they could not command belief they have been able to enforce silence, and have manufactured hypocrites in their dread of intellectual honesty. If, then, our social sense is in so rudimentary, so unsatisfactory a state, what amount of confidence in the Christian Churches does that fact inspire? What have they been doing during the past? And are they likely to reverse their history in the future?

The Policy of the Churches.

Fortunately for everybody, the creation of a social sense is not dependent upon the Churches. Neither is its development. A social conscience is one of the cardinal facts of human history. Man, as we know him, is its embodiment. What is needed to day is its development with a greater consciousness of its nature. At present its manifestation is—on any general scale—on the lower and less profitable level. In war, because that is quite impossible without co-operation and an appeal to "the consciousness of kind," we have driven home the lesson that every member of a human society is irrevocably committed to a share in its good or evil fortunes. In other matters it is conspicuously absent. And, in this respect, the evil influence of the Church is plain. From the moment War broke out it has preached vociferously in favour of co-operation in pursuit of the War, but it has remained significantly silent concerning other matters on which it might well have been vocal. Eloquent on the necessity for sacrificing human life, it has been dumb on the shameless plunder that has been going on in the supply of the people's food. It has preached the planting of our back gardens with potatoes, it has said nothing on the larger questions of the English land system—one of the worst in the whole of Europe. In the matter of education it has seen only the opportunity to more firmly establish sectarianism in the schools. And its leading representatives have openly welcomed the transference of human energy and ideas from the fruitful sphere of politics and sociology to the inconclusive theatre of war as offering an unprecedented chance of advantage to religion. We are not disputing the soundness of its instinct in all this, in a sense we admire it. For if there is one thing certain it is that the development of social life involves the decline of religion. Retard man's intellectual development and you maintain the strength of the religious idea. Prevent social development and you sustain the authority of religious institutions. These are generalizations which defy disproof.

Narrowing the Social Outlook.

Two things may be here said with perfect safety. The first is that the whole influence of Christianity has been in the direction of narrowing the scope of the social consciousness, and so hindering its development. In early societies where a religion includes the whole of the tribe there is less harm than when it includes no more than a section of the people. In these circumstances—which become more important with the intellectual development of life—the welfare of society tends to become synonymous in the minds of religious believers with the acceptance of particular doctrines, and the orderly growth of the social sense is checked and diverted into positively injurious channels. We see this in the many generations during which heretics have been excluded from political office, and openly disfranchised as enemies of the State. Naturally, then, the social consciousness, instead of operating over the whole of society, is circumscribed in its application. The welfare of society becomes identified with the interests of a church, and a narrow, exclusive type of mind perpetuated. Nor is it without significance that side by side with the breaking down of religious barriers there has gone on a marked development in the sense of a community of interest as a prime condition of social well-being.

Parasitic Religion.

The second important fact is that religion has all along maintained a parasitic existence. Feelings are claimed as religious that have no more vital connection with religious belief than has the multiplication table. The sense of right and wrong, care for others, the whole cluster of ethical sentiments and feelings are really social in origin, although ignorance often expresses them in terms of supernaturalism. How religion plays the parasite in social life is seen in the familiar phenomenon of "conversion." For this emphatically belongs to the period of adolescence. And the whole significance of adolescence is the development of a larger social self, the bringing of the young man or woman into a deeper and closer communion with the life of the race. Then we see enacted on a smaller scale what has taken place historically. The awakening social consciousness is interpreted as the "voice of God in the soul," a formative period that under wise guidance would be utilized in training serviceable citizens for the State, is seized upon by this or that church, with the result that the best years of youth are wasted, the community robbed of an intelligent self-reliant unit, and a mere sectarian created in place of a fully developed individual. The exploitation of the social sense in the interests of theology does not furnish so spectacular a page in the world's history as deaths at the stake, but it has had a more disastrous effect on the welfare of the race.

The Beginning of the End.

Those who study the matter closely are at no loss to account for this emphasis on social duty by present-day religionists. It represents the final stage of a lengthy process. Preachers are to-day forced to profess an interest in social topics, because whole masses of the population have lost interest in religious ones. Some may take up such topics willingly because of their strong human sympathies. Others do so because they are cute enough to observe that unless they modify their creed in accordance with the spirit of the age they and their religion will soon be left far in the rear. It is the last stand of a form of belief that once dominated life from the cradle to the grave. With many these tactics are obviously successful. But the number of those who see through the policy grows steadily. If religion means social service, the sooner it is called by its right name the better. Society gains nothing by squandering its energies in upholding, even indirectly, a system of beliefs which owe their origin to the ignorance of primitive savagery, and which were brought to maturity during the darkest and most deplorable period of European history.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Glory of God.

THE Shorter Catechism declares that "man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him for ever," the natural inference being that God's supreme ambition is to be the recipient of the never-ending praise and adoration of mankind. He hungers and thirsts after the magnification of his name, and those who gratify his selfish desire are promised ample reward. Joshua glorified the Lord by all his military conquests; and we read that, in return, "the Lord magnified Joshua in the sight of all Israel" (Josh. iv. 14). The curious thing is that, although Jehovah is called the God of glory, whose glory is in himself, we are exhorted to make him glorious by bestowing glory upon him, with the assurance that if we regard his glorification as our chief end we shall enjoy him for ever. Such, briefly stated, is the teaching of the Bible concerning the glory of God, and the duty of glorifying him. In the Church Times for June 1 we find a remarkable sermon, entitled "The Glory of God," by the Ven. Cyril Hallett, M.A., Archdeacon of Rovuma, of which we can honestly say that it is thoroughly scriptural. The Archdeacon says:—

> First in order, supreme in position, unrivalled in importance, stands the Glory of God.....Nothing that we can offer or do can contribute to his glory, for it is complete; nothing that finite man can give or withhold may augment or diminish his glory, for it is perfect. And yet it is the will, the gracious purpose, the Divine yearning of the Creator that we, his creatures, should give him glory.

The sheer absurdity of such a statement is undiscerned by the preacher, who tells us that God wants us to glorify him, not in order to add to his glory, which is impossible, but that "we may increase in his glory, that we may be 'changed from glory to glory,' that the refulgence of the glory which is of him and through him, may, through us, illumine the hearts of men in our homes and in our cities, throughout our country and colonies, to the uttermost parts of the earth." That is to say, we are to become glorious as the result of telling God how wonderfully glorious he is. God's glory is both complete and perfect, so that nothing we can offer, give, or withhold may either augment or diminish it, and yet we must glorify him in order to secure our own highest good.

According to Archdeacon Hallett there are three ways by which we may glorify God, namely, "praiseful thanksgiving, penitential propitiation, and prayerful pleading." In order to fully appreciate those points, we may state that the Venerable gentleman belongs to the Universities' Mission to Central Africa, which has built a beautiful cathedral at Zanzibar, and possesses several stations of considerable importance on the mainland. In June, 1913, a Conference of Protestant Missions with the Church Missionary Society was held at Kikuyu, British East Africa, the object of which was to consider a scheme or schemes of federation "with a view to ultimate union of the Native Churches in that section of the Dark Continent." At the close of the Conference there was a celebration of the Lord's Supper. There being no Anglican Church building in the place, the observance took place in a Presbyterian church. Four Protestant Missionary Societies were represented, and two bishops and the Heads of the Missions pledged themselves to recognize common membership between Federated Churches; to establish a common form of Church organization; to admit to any pulpit a preacher recognized by his own Church; to admit to communion a recognized member of any other Church; and to draw up and follow common courses of instruction both for candidates for baptism and candidates for ordination.

To outsiders such pledges seem eminently reasonable, but to the Bishop of Zanzibar every one of them was like a red rag to a bull. He published a long document, addressed to the Bishop of St. Albans, in which he gave forcible expression to his vehement disapproval of the findings of the Conference, and submitted the thesis that the Anglican Church, "at the present time, having regard to her exceedingly chaotic system of Truth, is entirely unfit to send missionaries to Heathen or Mohammedan lands." The Bishops of Mombasa and Uganda, who were present at the Conference and gave their support to the proposed scheme of federation, were charged with "depreciating the Ministry of which they are consecrated Heads." He is convinced that Episcopacy is the only Divinely appointed form of Church polity. He said :—

> Episcopacy, and all that flows from it, is either God's Gift, or a terrible curse. If it be his Gift, dare we pretend that we have nothing to hand on to others? If it be not his Gift, had we not better renounce the Church that cherishes it as her life, and cast in our lot with those who long ago decided to go on without it? I can see no sin of the kind more terrible than that of preserving an outward form and organization of religion that offends many thousands of sincere believers in Christ, unless it happens that the outward is essentially filled with the Spirit of God. I have charged the Bishops of Mombasa and Uganda with heresy in their teaching of the meaning and value in Episcopacy.....On the day that a Bishop can communicate with a Protestant minister, deliberately and of set purpose, one of them is, it seems to me, bound in conscience to surrender the outward form which means so little to him, and yet so powerfully hinders the work of reunion.

Everybody remembers with what signal force and in what bitter spirit the ball of controversy was set rolling by the Bishop of Zanzibar's notorious pamphlet, a controversy which divided the Anglican Church into two stingingly hostile camps. Now, the sermon under review was delivered at the anniversary service of the Universities' Mission to Central Africa at St. John's, Red Lion Square, London, and the Archdeacon maintains that for the work done by this Mission we owe God praiseful thanksgiving. Evidently his Lordship of Zanzibar represents the Catholic party in the Anglican Church. Many years ago, two Catholic priests and the present writer were taken, through a mistake of their guide, to the Aglican cathedral instead of the Catholic at Zanzibar, and the former was outwardly so similar to what those priests had expected to see that they had expressed strong approval of it before the mistake was discovered. Then they very severely criticized the Catholic Party in the Anglican Church, making no effort to hide their contempt for it. The Anglican Bishop of Zanzibar denies the validity of the orders of non-episcopally ordained ministers, conveniently forgetting that the validity of his own orders is wholly repudiated by the Pope. The fact to be borne in mind is that each Mission believes that its own credentials are superior to those of all other Missions, while unprejudiced judges are doubtful whether much really useful work is done by any Mission whatever.

Speaking generally, we are profoundly convinced that no Church can sincerely call itself a displayer of God's glory; and there is no getting away from the fact that every Church spends much of its time in finding fault with and discrediting other Churches. Archdeacon Hallett fails utterly to show wherein or whereof God's glory consists, either in the Church or in the world. He tells us that the Deity is "Supreme in majesty, incomparable in power, unapproachable in perfection, infinite in knowledge, all-seeing and all-loving, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning"; but neither the Church nor the world has ever supplied the slightest evidence of the existence of such a Being. Mr. H. G. Wells's Invisible King is finite, of whom it may legitimately be said that he has doubtless done his best, but that his best falls far short of the ideal. The Christian God can do everything and actually does nothing. He is omnipotent, and yet man, the creature of his hand, defies and thwarts him at every turn. He sits as King for ever, and yet the world he is supposed to govern in righteousness and truth is a veritable shamble. By a strange slip of the tongue the Archdeacon speaks of "this man-made world," thus giving the lie direct to a fundamental article of his own creed. We frankly aver that the world is wholly man-made; but we do not believe in an omnipotent Being of infinite knowledge, wisdom, and love, whose glory would be in his shame. In the Old Testament, Jehovah often showed his glory by putting his enemies to death, and he was often glorified as Lord of Hosts or Man of War. In Ezekiel, chapters xxxiii.-xxxix., there is a wonderfully vivid portrayal of his relation to Israel and Israel's enemies. He is even represented as commanding Gog to muster against the chosen people in order that he might manifest his glory in his defeat, whose overthrow he thus predicts :—

> And I will call for a sword against him unto all my mountains, saith the Lord God; every man's sword shall be against his brother. And I will plead against him with pestilence and with blood; and I will rain upon him and upon his hordes, and upon the many people that are with him, an overflowing shower, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone. And I will magnify myself, and sanctify myself, and I will make myself known in the eyes of many nations; and they shall know that I am the Lord.

Comment would be superfluous. All we need to say is that, with all the vehemence at our command, we repudiate such a Deity and positively decline to glorify him, preferring a man-made and a man-governed world, however imperfect the making and unsatisfactory the governing.

J. T. Lloyd.

How to Break the Boycott.

> Rough work, Iconoclasm, but the only way to get at Truth.
> —Oliver Wendell Holmes.

It has been pointed out repeatedly in these columns that the Freethought Movement suffers from a boycott which is applied by Christians in the press, booksellers' and newsagents' shops, and at the municipal and private libraries. With rare exceptions, Freethought publications are ignored in the former, and kept out of the latter. Hence, it becomes increasingly necessary that every Freethinker should assist actively in the propagation of the literature of the Movement. Christian organizations spend annually tens of thousands of pounds in furtherance of their faith, and, incidentally, no small part of their propaganda is the vilification and misrepresentation of Freethought. A glance at the capacious catalogues of such organizations as the Religious Tract Society, the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, the Christian Evidence Society, and the many publishers who cater for the orthodox public, will be sufficient to show how complete are their methods, and how large is their success. These books, periodicals, and pamphlets, are distributed throughout the English-speaking world, and they penetrate into countless homes where Freethought works are never seen.

The clergy are past-masters at circumventing any movement likely to prove dangerous to their superstition, and they have rare noses for heresy. The original Sunday-schools were initiated by laymen with the sole and laudable idea of imparting education to poor children on the one day in the week on which, in the dark days prior to the passing of the Factory Acts, they were free to receive it. Nowadays the Sunday-schools are not concerned with other than theological instruction, and the average Sunday-school teacher cares as much for real education as a pigeon cares for hydrostatics. Similarly with the public library movement, which was started with the idea of bringing serious and informative literature within reach of the poorest citizens. The clergy, of whom there are 50,000 in this country, have great influence on the local committees of these libraries, and their one and constant aim is to render such institutions, from their narrow and sectarian point of view, entirely harmless and innocuous. So long as the shelves of these libraries are stocked with the harmless volumes of the brothers Hocking, Miss Marie Corelli, Charles Garvice, Mrs. Barclay, and other purveyors of "the smooth tale, generally of love," they are quite content. The instant any attempt is made to place before the public works which make for sanity or for ordered thought, they at once display their animosity. The boycott is introduced, and the modern Index Expurgatorius contains the names of practically every author who is worth reading, from Bernard Shaw to Algernon Swinburne. None of the "intellectuals" escape, and Robert Blatchford suffers in the company of Eugene Brieux.

With the idea of combating this state of affairs, Freethinkers should ask for Freethought publications at the libraries which they use, and see that they are supplied. An excellent beginning could be made with Mr. Cohen's Determinism or Free Will? and with Vivian's Churches and Modern Thought. In extreme cases, the books might be presented to the library; but care must be taken that the volumes are not placed on a top shelf and quietly forgotten. So far as pamphlets are concerned, it is, perhaps, better to hand or post them to likely readers. Orthodox persons are often interested in controversial literature, and such introductions often means that regular readers of Freethought publications are obtained. Remembering that, in spite of a most rigorous boycott, many thousands of pamphlets are already in circulation, it must be apparent that, with the additional publicity, these figures may be largely exceeded in the immediate future. Literature should also be sold at all indoor and open-air meetings, and the sale entrusted as much as possible to the ladies of the Movement, who will thus find an outlet for their energies.

With regard to the Freethinker, it is useful to order the paper with other publications, so that the tradesman is faced with the dilemma of accepting or refusing a good customer. Another timely suggestion is for Freethinkers to join in any likely discussion in local papers. These organs often give far more space to readers' opinions than the large London newspapers. Letters should be terse, strictly to the point, and courteous, and should be written on one side of the paper only, and authenticated with the name and address of the sender, not, necessarily, for publication. Back numbers of the Freethinker should never be wasted, but should be left in trams, trains, and 'buses, or otherwise distributed. In order to prevent an improper use being made of these copies, it is wise to clip a piece from one of the corners, so that they may not be used as returns by unscrupulous newsagents. If these few hints are acted upon by our readers, it should prove of permanent benefit to the Movement. We should be pleased to hear from any readers who have any useful suggestions to offer in this connection.

Freethinkers must see to it that Freethought publications are circulated. Humility is a rare and fragrant virtue, but Freethinkers cannot surrender their rights at the behests of the clergy, however saintly. Let Freethinkers everywhere insist on their rights, and not only show that they are grateful for the work of the pioneers who suffered so much in the past, but that they are determined to extend their principles far into the future. After the long darkness of oppression the dawn has come:—

> Not by eastern windows only,
> When daylight comes, comes in the light,
> In front the sun climbs slowly, how slowly!
> But westward, look, the land is bright.

MIMNERMUS.

Climate as a Factor in Organic Change.

AMONG the multitudinous forces of Nature which operate in the transmutations of living matter the conditions of soil and atmosphere play a prominent part. It is a firmly established fact that changed conditions of life, constantly co-operating with the responsive powers of plants and animals, soon produce marked modifications in organic Nature. These organic responses to modified stimuli evolve those pronounced variations which superficially appear to arise spontaneously.

That the influences of climate exercise a powerful and permanent sway over the specific characters of floral and faunal organisms is demonstrated by a considerable amount of evidence. In his celebrated volumes dealing with the Variation of Plants and Animals. Darwin brought forward numerous instances of changes wrought by the effects of climate on cereals and other plants. The rapid changes displayed by the maize plants, introduced into Europe from America, afford striking proof of this. As Darwin states:—

> During the first year the plants were twelve feet high, and a few seeds were perfected; the lower seeds in the ear kept true to their proper form, but the upper seeds became slightly changed. In the second generation the plants were from nine to ten feet high, and ripened their seed better; the depression on the outer side of the seed had almost disappeared, and the original beautiful white colour had become duskier. Some of the seeds had even become yellow, and in their now rounded form they approached the common European maize. In the third generation nearly all resemblance to the original and very distinct American parent was lost.

Nor are the marked influences of climatal conditions confined to grasses. The same phenomena are revealed by a study of forest trees. Twenty-nine different American trees when compared with their nearest European allies disclosed similar changes, although these trees were grown close together, and, so far as possible, under identical conditions. In the New World forms the leaves fell earlier, while their autumnal tints were brighter. The shapes of the leaves became different, and various other modifications occurred. All these variations Darwin attributed to the sustained action of another climate.

Botanists are agreed concerning the vast range of variation in the vegetable world, when floral forms are removed from their native surroundings to new conditions. Romanes doubted (Darwin and after Darwin, vol. ii., p. 206) whether a single plant species exists "whose distribution exposes it to any considerable differences in its external conditions of life, which does not present more or less considerable differences as to its characters in different parts of its range." The chemical nature of the soil, its organic constituents, the atmospheric conditions of the growing season of the year, the amount of moisture available to the vegetation, are a few only of the innumerable phenomena which are conveniently summed up in the term climatal causes.

Climatic variation is plainly not restricted in its local manifestations to any special group of plants, because all the various forms of floral life participate in large measure in the changes observed. Moreover, unrelated floral structures display in numerous instances degrees of modification which correspond to the length of time to which they have been exposed to the modified conditions.

Distinct species growing on similar soils, elevations, and latitudes, present similar variations. One has only to compare plants growing on chalky land with plants found on fatter soils to observe pronounced variations. Various plants, again, are so influenced by sea-salt that they develop red-tinted fleshy leaves. That these and many other changes are due to differences in soil content and other external factors has been demonstrated experimentally.

In a humid atmosphere, such as that of Western Ireland—the most emerald part of the Emerald Isle—the green colour of the vegetation is wonderful. The same plants growing in England, particularly in our Eastern Counties, seldom, except in an unusually warm and moist spring, display the freshness of colour so noticeable in the Irish vegetation. Plants cultivated in permanently damp surroundings develop smoother leaves and darker blossoms. Aridity of soil and atmosphere, on the other hand, conduce to the appearance of paler flowers, and rougher and yellower leaves. Journeying through our own small island in an average season, it is easy to infer from the general character of the landscape the nature of the soil, the humidity of the atmosphere, and the normal rainfall of each particular district.

An imposing array of evidence has been accumulated proving how the combined influences of external Nature affect the various aspects of life. And as it has never been proved that organic changes, once they have become firmly fixed in an animal or plant structure, are not transmitted through heredity to descendants, we opine that such transformations must play, and, presumably, have ever played, a primary part in the drama of evolution.

Taking the animal kingdom as a whole, it is, perhaps, less susceptible to climatic influences than the more pliable plants. Yet, even among animals, proofs of external agency in the modification of organisms are quite numerous. It certainly seems absurd to suppose that the hairy coverings acquired by animals to resist the cold conditions of the Glacial Period were not transmitted through heredity from parents to progeny. But be that as it may, we possess in living animals salient examples of groups of creatures representing distinct genera, families, orders; or, for that matter, classes, which show clear signs of their combined response to the influences exerted by their environment. And it is also true that the degrees of specific change are more or less proportional to the amount of climatic change experienced by the organisms in question. Evidences of progressive animal modification may be plainly seen in the gradual changes which creep over animal forms as we pass from one part of a large land surface to another.

Dr. J. A. Allen prosecuted most extensive researches in connection with climatal variation in America. The birds and mammals were found to vary in size and colour with the changing climates of the larger areas investigated. Dr. Allen was compelled to consider these phenomena as the consequence of the powers wielded by external conditions. Gould's studies in the distribution of bird life in Australia forced him to similar conclusions.

The seasonal variations shown in the summer and winter forms of certain butterflies lend themselves to the same solution as it has been shown that the action of cold or heat on the caterpillar or pupa influences the appearance of the perfect insect very materially. Weismann subjected the chrysalids of lowland butterflies to very cold conditions, and the mature butterflies were like those of alpine areas, thus proving that the northern "species" are really climatic or seasonal varieties. Edwards has obtained even more remarkable results.

Professor Packard, the eminent American naturalist, is of opinion that it is quite probable that nearly one-third, or, perhaps, one half, of the museum species, and species described in biological writings, are climatic or local varieties or species. And he points out that:—

> Introduced species tend to vary much more than in their native lands. Children born of British, German, or French parentage become in the United States slightly taller than their parents; the soldiers of the United States Army during the Civil War of 1861-65 were found, by measurements made on 1,110,000 individuals, to average taller than those of the British Army.

Cave-dwelling animals yield testimony of environmental influence in several ways, and the direct influence of climate is shown in many organisms, such as the dog, cat, horse, cattle, sheep, &c., when these are taken to a foreign land.

Pronounced modifications are soon set up, and the animals depart more or less widely from their ancestors. One of the finest illustrations of this phenomenon is afforded by the changes undergone by the descendants of a common rabbit in Porto Santo. A doe rabbit and her litter were set free on that island in the fifteenth century, and their descendants are now one-third smaller, have considerably changed in colour, and vary greatly in other respects. Yet, when some of these rodents were returned to England, they soon commenced to resume their original colour.

The changes wrought in a few centuries in a new environment were truly astounding. As Darwin wrote:—

> If the history of these Porto Santo rabbits had not been known, most naturalists on observing their much reduced size, their colour, reddish above and grey beneath, their tails and ears not tipped with black, would have ranked them as a distinct species. They would have been strongly confirmed in this view by seeing them alive in the Zoological Gardens, and hearing that they refused to couple with other rabbits. Yet this rabbit, which there can be little doubt would thus have been ranked as a distinct species, has certainly originated since the year 1420.

Christianity and the Way Out.

IN modern times Christianity is adjusted to many tests by being dressed up in many colours of varying hues. The man who has imbibed evolutionary ideas, but does not wish to give up Christian essentials, drops the story of the Fall, and the Old Testament legends generally, but clings to New Testament doctrines, subject to certain omissions, such as the Atonement or the Trinity. How the play of Reason can be allowed to operate within certain limits only is a question which is not seriously taken into account, but the advantage of these wriggling, elastic, views appears to be plain enough. Concessions can be allowed at will, so long as there are other essentials within easy mental reach. The rigid old Calvinists of earlier days would scarcely recognize Christianity in its modern garb, without the necessary label or labels to explain and differentiate. Biblical Inspiration is not acceptable to many within the fold of the Christian Church. Scientific explanations of the growth of the universe, the forces of nature and their varied manifestations, the evolution of animal and man, textual criticism, and the keen rapier thrusts of Rationalist critics, have destroyed the possibility of further belief in the Inspired Word. Many cling through ignorance still, or with lingering regrets stronger than the measure of their enlightenment.

To give up the idea of Biblical Inspiration equals throwing the whole array of Bible doctrines into the melting-pot of criticism and analysis. The glamour departs, giving Reason and sense a chance to become busy. Old Testament history, with its impossible stories, repetitions, glorifications of war, revenge, murder, and obscene passages in the record, are soon disposed of. Like other ancient writings, it is a reflection, more or less obscure, of the tone, temper, and events of those times, with all which that involves, but nothing more. Prophets spoke and wrote, but the fulfilment of their prophecies, vengeful or benignant, depended, as to-day on the growth of events and human intelligence. Those portions of the New Testament which are outgrowths of the Old, naturally go the way of their predecessor. But a formidable list of doctrines remains to be tackled by the newly fledged opponent of Biblical Inspiration.

The central figure in the New Testament narrative is Jesus, the miraculously born, miracle working idealist with his Sermon on the Mount teaching, claim to be the Son of God, and opposition to temporal powers, terminating in his death by crucifixion, followed by his mysterious resurrection. If one be not prejudiced and timid, it becomes impossible to accept the story of the miraculous birth, especially as similar stories form part of other religions, and if one account be true, then all are acceptable. The miracles, subjected to critical examination, become incredible, if mental reservations are rigidly excluded. The doctrine of the Trinity, with its implications, is no more reasonable than the Virgin birth for one who has cast off the bondage of mental fear and subservience to priestcraft—Roman or Ptotestant. Christ's substitutionary death is an untenable theory, since human bloodshed (martyr or propitiatory) has no relationship whatever to human error, slight or grave, points of contact being absent, as the independent thinker readily perceives. Prayer to a personal God, whose existence cannot be postulated, becomes an unnecessary performance, however sincere the suppliant may be, as it is perceived that natural laws are not subject to the desires or caprice of individuals. Human aspiration does not come within the category of Christian prayer. The doctrines of Christ's intercession, founded on the contradictory statements regarding his mysterious rising from the tomb, the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper—really Pauline—and the supremacy of the life of faith in God, vanish into very thin air when rational tests are applied. The whole ingenious structure rests on acceptance of the Personal prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God-idea, with his antagonist the Devil, and their abodes of bliss and torment.

If, for many reasons often recounted by Secularist writers, these latter beliefs vanish or assume vague, abstract, impersonal form, the superstructure falls to pieces. When a man says he is an Atheist or Agnostic, he expresses, by implication, complete opposition to Christian doctrine, and it is because many doubters of Biblical inspiration do not travel so far on their journey from orthodoxy that they remain doubters, adjusters, searchers who fail to really find. They renounce the more glaringly ludicrous doctrines—hell fire, the Trinity, or even the Virgin birth—but cling to others, altering the make-up to deceive the eye without satisfying the intelligence, and finding a comfortable half-way house—Unitarian or some other—ready to accommodate them. But the greater all-embracing detachment involves too much mental heroism and social ostracism. Readjustment of mental outlook, social relationship, walking in new paths, become necessary.

How can the way be cleared without being made too easy? The Bible in the schools and in the home requires to be secularized so as to form part of the whole secular teaching. This can be best accomplished by the exclusion of Bible teaching altogether from the school curriculum, to the joy of many a schoolboy, and its possible introduction later, in an amended form, with the supernatural elements eliminated or rendered harmless; for the Bible, as a record, has its place in history, and the means of studying both sides of a subject enable us to form judgments, besides supplying argumentative weapons. School Board candidates who do not favour Secular Education should be opposed or voted against. Social ostracism and its accompaniments must be met philosophically so long as there is no other way, but the possibilities of life in its richness and fulness open up new channels of endeavour and new fields of enquiry; for the world we live in, and the realms of wonder that surround us, the kingdoms of this world, our fellows and their ways, crooked and straight, possess meaning and interest hitherto unexplored. Restrictions are removed, a sense of freedom of action braces us up. All types, tastes, and inclinations can be accommodated within the confines of the non-supernatural. The greatest stumbling-block of all consists of Church vested interests. Church and commercialism, with incidental props, are linked together by congenial, strengthening, contacts, notwithstanding other worldliness. Churches and churchmen depend upon rich benefactors for patronage and support. War and the Sermon on the Mount can be squared by the followers of Christ. Disprove Christian doctrines, explain Secularism as an alternative, and you do much to clear away the fogs of superstition that have blinded the mental vision of thousands. Reason secures her rights, and much mental rubbish disappears. But the gateway to life's problems has been opened, and the problems await solution. Only by getting into close touch with these problems, studying them, and joining with the forces contributing to their solution, can Secularist effort reap its full reward.

ALFRED RUSSELL.

Let Us Prey!

LET us pray, aye! let us pray;
So chant the glib-tongued priests;
Now just what for, let us pray
To look upon the feasts
Which our masters make away.

Let us pray for their long living,
For their safety from all tolls,
That they may be spared for giving
A little to us poor souls,
And our many sins forgiving.

Let us prey, aye! let us prey;
'Tis time we now regained our own;
Arm thou for the righteous fray,
To fight for more than meatless bone,
No more of "let us pray"—nay, prey!

Acid Drops.

The Dean of Durham, Dr. Hensley Henson, says that "on many devout minds the dark shadow of doubt has fallen," and the Rev. J. H. Shakespeare agrees that the Dean has "correctly expressed the wide difficulties which are felt to-day by many earnest and troubled minds." So are leaders of opposing Churches drawn together in the face of a common danger. Of course, doubt of Christianity has to be represented as something "dark"—that is part of the game. These people hover between describing disbelievers in religion as foolishly hilarious or suffering miserably under the shadow of an eclipse of faith. But we wish they would decide what we are.

For our own part, we feel neither elated at finding out that Christianity is ridiculously untrue, nor grievously castdown over the discovery. It is so ridiculous that we feel grown-up people ought to be ashamed of being suspected believing in its truth. And it is so useless, that requiring a great European War to prove it, so demonstrates the great lack of serious thinking on the part of the general public.

Mr. Shakespeare says it is perplexing to religious people to find that Germany, so largely under the influence of Lutherism, should have acted as it has done. But is that really surprising? Some of the most brutal things in human history have been done in the name of religion, and under the influence of religion. The massacre of the Huguenots, the crusade against the Albigenses, the age-long torture of the Jews, were all motived by religion. One hardly knows whether this expressed surprise at religious people acting brutally is real or assumed.

Mr. Shakespeare says the great problem is "Why a God, and an omnipotent God, should permit such a world-horror as this War?" And he does "not think any adequate answer can be given at present." By adequate answer Mr. Shakespeare plainly means an answer favourable to his religion. He would not consider any other answer adequate. And, meanwhile, he will go on believing in the answer he dare not give. That is the art of being a Christian. Like a camel, he receives his burdens kneeling; and, as a proof of his faith, when an absurdity is offered him, he swallows it without effort.

Says the Bishop of London, in an interview published in the New Age, "Christianity abolished slavery by making master and man kneel together before the same Christian altar." On this one has visions of the abolition of slavery following the adoption of Christianity by master and man. And so it did—in a sense. After they had been kneeling together for some eighteen centuries chattel slavery was abolished, as we all know. Meanwhile, the slave had been taught, from the same altar, that to resist the commands of his master was contrary to the Christian. And before chattel slavery was abolished, the same good Christians in this country had instituted the Factory System, under which children of nine and ten years were flogged to work and kept at work twelve and fourteen hours a day. And, still kneeling before the same altar, women were sent to work in mines, stripped nearly naked, and harnessed like horses to coal trucks. A wonderfully effective thing is Christianity! And no slaveholder in the world has ever objected to it. Slaveholders always had a strong desire to see their slaves kneeling before the same altar as themselves. They then felt their position quite secure.

At the inquest on Sophia Gardener, of Farm Lane, Fulham, who committed suicide by drowning, it was stated the woman was a constant church-goer, and had been to services four times daily. The restraining power of religion is not very evident in this case.

The death of Mr. Leopold de Rothschild recalls the fact that he was the third son of Baron Lionel de Rothschild, who was the first Jew who, as a Jew, represented a British constituency in the House of Parliament. Christian charity is of such slow growth that it took nearly twenty centuries for Christians to remember that a Jew was a man and a brother.

A remarkable burst of Christian charity by Dr. Furse, Bishop of Pretoria, was recently exhibited at Johannesburg, when the bishop advocated the tarring and feathering of men opposed to military service. Evidently, Dr. Furse does not immediately expect the second coming of Christ.

Mr. Horatio Bottomley says that, in view of the very strict press censorship, editors should strike. The trouble is that they will not strike anything unless they are paid the usual advertisement rates.

The Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon, of Stamford Hill, is notoriously dogmatic and cocksure in all his pulpit and other utterances. Recently he devoted a whole sermon to a consideration of the religious signs of the times, according to his reading of which "religion is coming in upon us again." The majority of Christian leaders, among whom are the Dean of Durham and the Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, declare that the religious outlook is depressingly dark and discouraging; but Mr. Gibbon is in possession of much ampler knowledge and sounder judgment, and he assures us that "many who were indifferent are now eagerly pondering the answers of religion, while its great questions, Is there a God? Is the soul of man immortal? Is there an eternal difference between right and wrong? are the master-questions of the day for millions.'

Is not Mr. Gibbon aware that whether such questions are the master-questions of the day for millions or not, they are certainly the questions, not of religion, but of people who doubt the truth of religion. The mere asking of questions betokens imperfect belief, if not more or less positive unbelief. Before the War there were millions of men and women who had never asked, "Is there a God?" It is the War that has forced the question upon them, and thousands of them have been driven by the logic of events to a negative answer. As many military chaplains have reluctantly admitted, the War has been and is a breeder of Atheists; and it is well known that Atheists do not believe in immortality. Mr. Gibbon ought to know that the difference between right and wrong is not a religious question at all, but a purely social one.

The Rev. F. C. Spurr, of Regent's Park Baptist Chapel, who has so often, for many years, asserted that Freethought is a dead and buried enemy, charges Mr. G. H. Wells with making a most ferocious attack upon the Christian doctrine of the Trimity in his God the Invisible King. We hold no brief whatever for Mr. Wells, but we must remind Mr. Spurr that the occupants of glass houses should refrain from casting stones. It has been Mr. Spurr's habit in Melbourne, as well as in London, to attack Freethought "in what one can only call an almost vicious way."

Wesleyan Methodist Church statistics show notable decreases in both Church membership and Sunday-school scholars. There is a decrease of 3,870 members, and 20,396 scholars. This discounts the clerical boast that the War is favourable to religion

The clergy are not only exempted themselves from the operations of the Military Service Act, but at Camberley the magistrates decided that a lay-reader was exempt as a minister of religion. If this ruling holds good, it will add to the 50,000 parsons who are already exempted in this country.

The Ploughshare, a Quaker Organ of Social Reconstruction, for February, has the following paragraph:—

> We are glad to learn that there is now a Theosophist Chaplain visiting Wormwood Scrubs, as this means that yet another religion is represented by adherents who refuse to violate its tenets by slaughtering their fellows. The privilege of having Chaplains for the various religions is one for which we should be grateful. There are still two notable exceptions, however—Agnosticism and Atheism—which compare very favourably with the other religions regarding the number of their adherents who have a conscientious objection to murder.

Canon Newbolt says that God is totally unlike all other beings, and never was a truer statement made. Indeed, God is so absolutely dissimilar to all other beings that it is quite impossible for sane people to believe in his existence at all. Fancy thoughtful people getting the following twaddle inflicted upon them:—

> He is unlike any other king. Look back, dear brethren, on the reign of God. He sitteth in the heavens over all from the beginning. Who made this world? God. Who rules it? God. Who has watched over and woven into one great plan all the conflicting issues of life? God. Yes, on this Trinity Sunday, think of the reign of God.

And those who do really think of the reign of God are fully aware how infinitely absurd it is to believe in it.

The Vicar of Holy Trinity, Malvern, has just published a volume on The Church and Social Questions, and in it he says of his brother clergymen that, while many of them are repeating out-of-date truths,—

> Too many also are up-to-date at second hand, and quote Scotch translators of German rationalists to mystified congregations. Some repeat moral platitudes in an emotional manner, and some spend all their time in denouncing the dogmas they have not studied, or the pietism of those with whom they have no sympathy. They have failed and we shall not mend matters or win men back into our Churches by talking politics in an ill-informed way.

The chance of the clergy winning men back to the Church is very small in any case. When men have gained the recognition of the falsity of Christan beliefs, it is absurd to talk of winning them back by altering the tone of the preaching.

The Vicar has some "nasty things" to say of the way in which some clergymen seek advancement, and of the methods adopted. Many, he says,— > write shameless letters of self-commendation in an attempt to secure preferment. Only recently I was told of an officer at the front who kept a Mess merry for days with extracts from the letters of clerical aspirants to a living of which he was patron. Some sent their photographs, and one sent instead the portrait of his wife, which no doubt made a stronger appeal.

No doubt!

Newspaper editors like to be thought up-to-date, but what are we to think of the Daily Chronicle's suggestion that the Kaiser is Satanic. In another column of the same issue is quoted Wilhelm's latest outburst, "To God alone is it known how long the War will last." A dreary devil who drivels devotion is centuries behind the times.

"Thank God," said the Bishop of Chelmsford, speaking at Ilford on June 9, "the War is to go on until our purpose is accomplished." Beyond the bare purpose of beating Germany, we do not suppose the Bishop of Chelmsford is any more aware of what is "our purpose" than we are; but why thank God for it? Could God stop the War before we have accomplished "our purpose"? And if the duration of the War rests with this hypostatized ignorance, why does he not see that "our purpose" is achieved, and so bring the War to a speedy end? Perhaps the Bishop will explain.

The Rector of Potter Hanworth asks, in the Church Times, whether an agreement on the education question cannot be reached. His idea of an agreement is peculiar and eminently Christian. He suggests that four representatives of the Roman Catholic Church, the Church of England, and the Free Church Council meet, and adopt as a basis for discussion (1) Christian teaching subject to the conscience clause, (2) parents to decide as to the special religious teaching to be given, (3) all teachers appointed to declare that they can give Christian instruction in accordance with the Apostles' Creed, (4) the appointment of teachers. That is all! And that is the Rector's opinion of a "common understanding"!

As usual, it is a common understanding between Christians that is aimed at. No one else matters. The impertinent egotism of these Christians quite prevents their realizing that there are other people in the world beside themselves, and that the educational system must be finally settled, not upon the basis of what suits the sectarian interests of Christians, but upon the basis of what is just and equitable to all citizens. The suggestion of the Rector of Potter Hanworth deserves publicity only because it so well expresses the normal Christian attitude. One day these gentlemen will, perhaps, recognize that in the modern State, Christianity is no more than a religious sect, and that while it is justified in demanding the protection of the State in the pursuit of its legitimate interests, it has no right whatever to ask that the State shall aid it in forcing upon the public its ridiculous doctrines.

There is a discussion going on in the Glasgow Herald concerning the character of Socialist Sunday-schools. Enemies of the schools are keen to prove that the teaching therein is quite "materialistic" in tone. On the other hand, champions of the schools are pathetically, and foolishly, desirous of rebutting the charge, and urge that the "words and principles of Jesus are most earnestly studied and taught." We do not know if this is correct, but we feel that unless the teaching of these schools is "materialistic"—in the scientific and philosophic sense—they will be of little value so far as a sane and helpful Socialism is concerned.

General Sir William Robertson gave a company of cadets some good advice the other day, even though it was of a platitudinous character. "Be truthful and just," he said, and then proceeded to spoil his advice with "and let it be known on occasion that all you do is based on strong religious convictions." But Sir William Robertson must have known that amongst those whom he was addressing were some without strong religious convictions, and even with no religious convictions at all. What of these? Sir William surely does not mean that they are not, or cannot be, truthful and just. And if he does not mean that, his advice does not amount to much. Probably it was no more than a piece of customary cant, delivered without the slightest intellectual appreciation of all that it involved. All the same, it is a pity our public men do not cultivate a more respectable mental attitude in such matters.

Let's All Help.

Is there any reason why we should not gain a thousand new readers during the next two months? We can see nothing impossible about the achievement—if our present readers make up their minds it shall be done. If some millionaire would come along and finance the cost of advertising the Freethinker, we would undertake to do it ourselves. But as no complaisant millionaire has come along, and as we have no capital to meet the cost of that plan, we are compelled to fall back upon the goodwill of those who take an interest in this journal because of the great Cause it serves.

We are gaining new readers all the time, although, thanks to the War, we are losing readers all the time, and thus not reaping the profit we should have gained under normal conditions. Still, we are more than holding our own, and that is certainly gratifying during a period when so many papers have had to suspend publication.

Now, we want our readers to make a supreme effort. If a thousand of them will resolve to find a new subscriber for us during the next month, they will not alone be greatly extending the influence of the paper—they will be giving very material help towards meeting the very, very heavy expenses attendant upon the production of the Freethinker. Most of our readers must know a likely subscriber. Let those who do, make a "dead set" at him or her until success crowns their efforts. Don't be beaten at the task. Summer-time is a season when everyone is more or less on the move, and there are thus exceptional opportunities for carrying on the good work.

To Correspondents.

C. W. MARSHALL.—We long ago gave up wondering at the stupidities of educated men. Otherwise we should have spent our life in a constant state of wonderment. After all, there must be something to educe if education is effective; and in many cases this condition is lacking.

T. FOWLER.—To act with courage is invariably the wiser and more profitable policy.

WE are asked to say, in response to a recent inquiry, that the publisher of Madelin's The Revolution is Heinemann; price 7s. 6d. net.

MR. J. DRISCOLL would like Mr. Mann to inform him, if possible, where he could find Mr. Maskelyne's exposure of the Davenport Brothers.

R. EMINSON (Canada).—Subscription for Freethinker received. Your friendly criticism was justifiable and acceptable. We are pleased to have your appreciative sympathy with the worries and troubles of this War period.

E. CRAWFORD.—Thanks for reference.

H. AUSTIN.—Pleased to hear from a year-old reader who derives so much benefit from this paper. Your plan of showing that an Atheist is not ashamed of being known as one is the best way of encouraging those who do not believe in Christianity to speak out.

C MORGAN.—We do expect to get a number of new readers "when the boys come home." Your information as to the interest taken in the Freethinker by men in the Army confirms this view. So far as we can, we send out free copies to soldiers in various parts of the world, and we believe they are appreciated.

L. N.—If we stopped to think of all the worries and troubles we may have to face, we might get discouraged. We find the best plan is to just go ahead and deal with each difficulty as it arises.

T. P. WHITE.—Thanks for suggestion, which will be acted on.

J. W. LEIPER.—A "Flag Day" for Freethinkers is not a bad idea, and we believe that, if enough sellers could be obtained, plenty would buy them. Half the people who buy these things have only the vaguest notion of what they are purchasing. Thanks for papers and addresses, to which copies are being sent. We are not "overworking"—only working hard.

J. WELTON.—We do not see what more definite statement could be given.

A. ROBERTS.—Shall appear, but cannot promise an early date.

J. W. WHITE.—Pleased to hear you are back in England with all your old interest in the old cause. By all means do all you can and we will give all the assistance in our power. The Ingersoll cards are out of print. The address of the R.P.A. is 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

MR. F. H. HORN writes to correct an error in our Report of the N.S.S. Conference. It was he who moved the election of Mr. Cohen to the Presidency on behalf of the Bethnal Green Branch.

B. SIBLEY.—So far as we are aware, your letter did not reach us.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Colonel Ingersoll was a great Freethinker and an admirable man. His writings have been of incalculable benefit in the dissemination of Freethought, and we should be the last to find fault with anything said in his praise. All the same, it sounds strange in English ideas to find the Sun (New York), announcing the decision of the Bowman Case, to hear that the Secular Society, Limited, was founded forty years ago, that G. W. Foote was one of the founders with Mrs. Annie Besant and Charles Bradlaugh, and that the purpose of the Society was to "spread Ingersoll's ideas." Needless to say, the Society was founded nineteen years ago, not forty; G. W. Foote was the founder—not one of them; Bradlaugh was then dead, and Mrs. Besant had left the Freethought Party. That the Society was founded for the purpose of spreading Ingersoll's ideas in England is a statement due to the Sun's reporter never having heard of Freethought apart from Ingersoll.

We recently heard from Mr. R. H. Rosetti, and all his London friends will be pleased to hear that so far he has succeeded in dodging German shells and bullets. At the time of writing he was playing the part of cook. He says:—

> Yesterday morning an exploding shell sent a shower of dirt and debris into the cook-house just as I was making the breakfast tea; so you can see one cannot feel dull with so much liveliness going on. Last year, at the Annual Conference, I had the great pleasure—to me—of voting for you as President of the N. S. S. Now, after nearly a year in the President's chair, surely everybody in the Movement must admit that your triumph on that particular Whit-Sunday has carried the flag of the Party with vigour and dignity through a very trying year.
> Unfortunately, I cannot be at the Conference this year, but I have every confidence that it will re-elect you without a dissenting voice.
> From here, I can assure you, the much-talked-of revival of religion in our Army is most conspicuous by its absence. There has been no church parade in my company since I have been here, but I have not heard a single complaint on that score. Scepticism is truly the spirit of the great majority of fellows I have come in contact with out here. They do not volunteer their scepticism, but once mention the mildest Freethought ideas and there are many professions of personal religious decadence.
> Recently a N.C.O. of my company, in making out a report concerning me, looked up surprised when I said "None" in answer to his question, "What religion?" In quite a friendly manner he said he would come and have a talk with me, to which I responded with an invitation. A few nights later he duly arrived, and in a very short time my dugout was packed. The N.C.O. was, in argument, quite a gentleman, and it was a pleasure to discuss with him. If those who talk of a religious revival among the troops could have seen the apparently deeply interested audience in that dugout, it would not, of course, have altered their business cry of a demand for their wares, but would have shown what little hopes there were for actual realization. Amid much friendly laughter, the N.C.O. laughingly declared he was ————, and left the dugout to attend to some duties. (The line represents a word better left unwritten, although in common use among the troops.) Another N.C.O. continued to discuss—a gentleman also; but the evening finished with the verdict willingly given to the Freethought side of the discussion.

The Glasgow Branch has suspended its meetings during the summer, but a special meeting was held on Sunday last to consider and discuss the Report of the Conference sent by its representative, Mr. J. T. Lloyd. A vote of thanks has been sent that gentleman for acting as the Branch's representative. We would suggest that although indoor meetings are not now being carried on, the summer months should be utilized for thinking out a regular plan of campaign for the coming autumn and winter season.

A correspondent falls foul of a recent assertion of ours that physical force does not, and never did, constitute the real ground for the franchise. He professes surprise that the Freethinker should set up moral right as a public standard. For our part, we should be sorry to see the Freethinker stand for anything else. We cheerfully grant that physical force may be used to enforce a moral right, and the fear of physical force may have been the immediate cause of certain moral rights being admitted; but we quite fail to see how that affects our original contention. And even the use of physical force generally justifies itself by an appeal to public necessity, or to some other essentially moral consideration.

> Mr. Walker was a founder at Rotherham, in Yorkshire, at whose works Thomas Paine made his first experiments on a large scale in iron bridges, having in 1787 presented to the Academy of Sciences in Paris a model of such a bridge. The famous one-arch iron bridge at Sunderland was the first result of Paine's experiments. It was cast at Mr. Walker's works. It was entirely Paine's idea, but the prejudice against his name and writings enabled an impostor to claim, and retain, the merit of the invention. Paine sent a full explanation of his plans and experiments to the Society of Arts, which was about to be printed in their Transactions, when the appearance of the Rights of Man put a stop to the publication: bigotry always was a stumbling-block placed in the path of science.

Science and Spiritualism.

We are far from the time when Pascal could say "Miracles are as a flash of lightning that reveals." The lightning no longer flashes. Science stands ready to explain the first miracle that arises in support of a new religion.—Guyau, "The Non-Religion of the Future," p. 355.

Criticism is no respecter of things; it neither stops at mystery nor prestige, it breaks every charm, it pulls aside every veil. This power, utterly lacking in reverence, casting an unflinching and scrutinizing glance on everything alike, is from its very essence guilty of high treason against the divine and the human.....The cause of criticism is the cause of rationalism, and the cause of rationalism is the cause of the modern spirit itself. To curse rationalism is to curse the whole development of human intelligence from Petrarch and Bocaccio, that is, from the appearance of the critical spirit.

It is not from one argument only but from the whole of modern science that the tremendous result is derived. "There is no such thing as the supernatural."

Nature is simply human reason, it is the immutable, the exclusion of everything savouring of the whimsical; and our modern task will not be accomplished until we have destroyed the belief in the supernatural, no matter in what shape—the same that we have destroyed the belief in magic and witchcraft. All these belong to the same order of things.—Ernest Renan, "The Future of Science" (1891), pp. 37-38, 40-41.

THE most distinguished convert made by Madame Blavatsky was Mrs. Annie Besant, who is now President of the Theosophical Society. Mrs. Besant began life as a ritualistic High Churchwoman, the wife of a clergyman. She then went to the other extreme, becoming an Atheist and joining the National Secular Society. Then she became a Socialist, and ultimately a Theosophist. Her changes have been chameleon-like in their diversity, and there are not wanting those who prophesy that Mrs. Besant will ultimately find peace in the bosom of the Holy Roman Church.

In all her divigations Mrs. Besant has always been a follower of somebody else. It is the personal factor that has always swayed her in intellectual matters. The heroic figure of Charles Bradlaugh, defying gods and men in his titanic battle for liberty of speech and publication, captured her imagination and sympathy. She heard him lecture, and immediately gave in her allegiance, under the spell of Bradlaugh's glowing eloquence.

Mrs. Besant has been a voluminous writer during all phases of her diverse mental wanderings, but she has never contributed a single original idea to any of the causes to which she has at different times given her allegiance. She has adopted her opinions—and discarded them—like suits of clothes. Her intellect is at the mercy of her emotions. Such women are the natural prey of charlatans like Madame Blavatsky, who know full well how to bind them in the spell of their fascination.

Now, if the Mahatma missives were genuine, and were really, as Madame Blavatsky asserted, "precipitated" by "astral force" from the Himalayan Mountains by the mysterious Mahatmas, then they should continue to arrive after the death of Madame Blavatsky.

Madame Blavatsky died on May 8, 1891, and three months later (on August 30, 1891) Mrs. Besant made the sensational announcement to her old followers at the Hall of Science that she had received messages from the Mahatmas. Her words were: "You have known me for sixteen and a half years. You have never known me tell a lie. ('No, never,' and loud cheers.) I tell you that since Madame Blavatsky left I have had letters in the same handwriting as the letters which she received. (Sensation.) Unless you think dead persons can write, surely that is a remarkable fact." In an interview published in the Pall Mall Gazette, September 1, 1891, Mrs. Besant pledged herself definitely to "precipitation." In answer to a question as to whether the letters came through the post, she declared: "No, I did not receive the letters through the post; the letters I receive from the Mahatmas are 'precipitated.'" As Mr. Edmund Garrett observes:—

> Mrs. Besant did not overrate the extent of her public credit. She was implicitly believed by many who would not have troubled their heads at all over an assertion of Madame Blavatsky's. A "boom" was the immediate result—the second big boom in the society's history. Mrs. Besant had the satisfaction of seeing her statement honoured with a salvo of leading articles. "Can it be," the Daily Chronicle exclaimed, "that there are things in heaven and earth which philosophy and science have not yet dreamed of?"—(Daily Chronicle, August 31.) And it opened its columns to a flood of correspondence on Theosophy and things occult. Day after day a crop of letters attested the public appetite for the marvellous.[1]

Papers that had previously maintained a dead silence about Mrs. Besant's atheistic propaganda now filled columns about her adhesion to supernaturalism, because it countenanced the masses in their superstitions.

At the time of Madame Blavatsky's death, Colonel Olcott, the President of the Theosophical Society, was in India. Mr. William Q. Judge, the Vice-President, was in America, and Mrs. Besant was in London. With the death of Madame Blavatsky, the Society's one link with the Mahatmas seemed to have broken. The "Masters" allowed a whole "fortnight to elapse without giving any sign that they survived the decease of their high-priestess." The renewal of the "astral post" coincided, strange to say, with the arrival in this country of Mr. Judge, who, upon receiving the announcement of Madame Blavatsky's decease, telegraphed, "Do nothing till I come."

Of the machinations of Mr. Judge, of the manner in which he schemed and plotted to oust Colonel Olcott from the leadership of the Society and himself into it; of how Colonel Olcott, who swallowed all the Blavatsky miracles without winking, suddenly developed a previously unsuspected and very keen critical faculty when he found that Mr. Judge was designated by the Mahatmas as the successor of Madame Blavatsky in place of himself; of how Olcott was the means of exposing the new Mahatma missives as the fabrication of Mr. Judge—all these things are set forth in inimitable style, which the present writer could not hope to emulate, by Mr. Edmund Garrett in his Isis Very Much Unveiled.[2]

Enough to say that, at a Judicial Committee gathered from the ends of the earth to discuss the matter, Mrs. Besant recanted her sensational claim made at the Hall of Science as follows:—

> .....When I publicly said that I had received, after H. P. Blavatsky's death, letters in the writing that H. P. Blavatsky had been accused of forging, I referred to letters given to me by Mr. Judge, and as they were in the well-known script I never dreamed of challenging their source. I know now that they were not written or precipitated by the Master, and that they were done by Mr. Judge; but I also believe that the gist of these messages was psychically received, and that Mr. Judge's error lay in giving them to me in a script written by himself and not saying so.....Having been myself mistaken, I in turn misled the public.[3]

Apparently it never occurred to Mrs. Besant that it was her duty to return to the Hall of Science and acquaint the audience with the manner in which she had been deluded. At any rate, she never did so. The moral of this sordid story, and indeed of the whole history of Spiritualism, is that, however truthful, upright, and honest deponents may be, their testimony is worthless as a proof of the supernatural.

We shall conclude with a study of the methods of Eusapia Palladino, the last and, if we count the heads of the great scientists she deceived, greatest of all spirit mediums. For although she had been detected in fraud more than once, it must be remembered that she had not the advantage of Home, who was one of the first in the field, and operated before the many discreditable exposures had taken place and rendered the public rather more sceptical of these performances. Even with this disadvantage, Eusapia succeeded in deluding a greater number of scientists than all the other mediums put together. Among others who have testified to the genuineness of her phenomena are: Sir Oliver Lodge, Professor Richet, Professor Morselli, Camille Flammarion, Professor Lombroso, Professor Brofferio, Professor Schiaparelli, Dr. Ochorowicz, and Mr. Myers, besides many others who thought that her phenomena was partly genuine and partly trickery.

By the year 1890, through the frequent exposures of fraud, says Podmore, "the subject fell into increasing disrepute," and the Psychical Society "reached the broad conclusion that the phenomena degenerated precisely in ratio in which the precautions against trickery were rendered more effective, until sometimes a point was reached at which, the safeguards being absolute, the manifestations ceased altogether.....Then in 1892, Eusapia Palladino appeared on the scene. Eusapia—for by universal consent the gifted Neapolitan, she, too, an artist, has been assigned a place amongst her immortal countrymen who are known through the ages by their Christian names alone—Eusapia, then, is an Italian peasant women, who from early youth has been possessed of mediumistic powers."[1]

The Psychology of Insanity.

THERE is a well-known stock platitude that "everyone is mad on at least one subject," but that there is some excuse for the saying will be readily understood after a perusal of the interesting book bearing the somewhat forbidding title, The Psychology of Insanity, by Bernard Hart, M.D. (Cambridge University Press, 1s. 3d.). Any Freethinker will find it a most instructive introduction to psychology, a side of his or her subject well meriting careful study.

After giving a short history of insanity and the abominable treatment of the insane in the past, the writer, who believes in the psychological rather than the physiological treatment of mental trouble, proceeds to show that the modern psychologists have built their science on the same lines which led Dalton to conceive his atomic theory. Psychologic phenomena cannot be brought into the laboratory and dissected, but this does not prevent their laws being discovered by testing theory with facts.

Passing on from the weakness of mentality due to anatomic deficiency in the brain, a point easily comprehended, we are led into the more interesting discussion of hallucinations and delusions, with both of which subjects any one of us who have listened to speakers at meetings will be familiar. Hallucinations are termed visual, auditory, or tactile, according to the sense to which the false impression appears to belong. In the extreme case of the God-finder it is probably olfactory. On the other hand, delusions are not false sensations, but false beliefs, such as a man believing himself to be the Emperor of the Fijis. Chapter iv. deals with the dissociation of ideas in the field of consciousness, and concludes as follows:—

> Yet this dissociation of the mind into logic-tight compartments is by no means confined to the population of the asylum. Our political complexes are notoriously inaccessible to argument, and we preserve the traditional beliefs of our childhood, in spite of the contradictory facts constantly presented by our experience.

We then come to complexes, perhaps the most interesting chapters in the book. Again taking the "political" complex, we find that the victim's complex "causes him to take up an attitude towards the proposed measure which is quite independent of any absolute merits that the measure may possess." "The two mechanisms which manifest themselves in our example of the politician, the unconscious origin of beliefs and actions, and the subsequent process of rationalization to which they are subjected, are of fundamental importance in psychology. They may be observed every day in every individual. That a man generally knows why he thinks in a certain way, and why he does certain things, is a widespread and cherished belief of the human race. It is, unfortunately, for the most part an erroneous one. The prevalence of 'rationalization' is responsible for the erroneous belief that reason plays the dominating role in the formation of human thought and conduct. The 'reason' is usually evolved subsequently to satisfy our craving for rationality." Chapters vi. and vii. on Repression and Conflict approach more closely to the insanity part of the question, and show the danger to the mind of both, and is worthy of much attention to a nation whose religion is one of repression and morbidity. Take the following from chapter x.:—

> All non-rational opinions and beliefs appear to their possessor as propositions whose truth is immediately obvious, and whose validity it is silly to question. They are held, moreover, with a peculiar emotional warmth and instinctive certainty which is difficult to define, and whose character will be at once appreciated by anyone with a reasonable capacity for self-introspection. Genuine knowledge, the product of scientific deduction from observed facts, appears in quite another guise to this. It is relatively cold and devoid of the warmth which accompanies non-rational beliefs. If truth is called in question we are not annoyed, but merely stimulated to examine with renewed attention the foundations upon which it rests.....We shall easily recognize that non-rational beliefs and opinions are the product of complexes, and that the peculiar warmth we have described is the emotional tone which invariably accompanies the action of a complex.

After reading this book we begin to see the limitations of the human brain, the ease with which a "complex" may begin in the mind on a false foundation, and the way in which a "complex" becomes a "logic-proof compartment," the avoidance of which should be the object of all education and mental training, and that "the rational method adequately used would tell us that on the great majority of these questions there can be for us but one attitude—that of suspended judgment."

The average man who has not studied psychology at all, if asked whether he is always open to listen to any reasonable proposition which is put before him, will at once answer, certainly. Probably, however, not one in a thousand is really able to do any such thing.

Notes from Scotland.

SURELY the Rev. Ross, of Kilmarnock, will now be pleased when the Lord Advocate has been forced to intervene in the Glasgow Tramway Draw. In his latest letter to the papers, the reverend gentleman gives his whole case away when he inquires, Why does the Corporation of Glasgow openly and knowingly flout the law? And he answers: They know that such lotteries are illegal, for the Churches were forbidden by law to have raffles for charitable and religious purposes. Did the reverend gentleman raise the question of the morality of bazaars and raffles, which were held daily, and which certainly had become a great nuisance, previous to the time when the law intervened and pronounced them illegal? It is certain the Church will gain nothing by its action in this matter, as the indignation expressed at their interference is very bitter.

Speaking at a public function last week, Lord Provost Dunlop, referring to the Tramway Draw, said that Mr. Dalrymple had conceived a brilliant scheme, which, he was credibly informed, the whole nation wanted to copy. They had been assailed with suggestions that they were committing a terrible crime; they were teaching the nation to be gamblers. He looked at it in this way, and he said this in face of all the clergymen who liked to stand up against him, that we were a democratic nation, and he saw no evil in it. The funds were going to a great and good object. The nation or the man who had not got the sporting instinct were not worthy of being called either a nation or a man. For the benefit of those people of tender conscience who would not accept a prize, they had put on the little red boxes; but while in one week the boxes had realized the enormous sum of £37, the War tickets in the same week had brought in £1,700. We were a democratic nation—£1,700 against £37; and yet we were told the £37 people were to rule the nation. He left it at that.

The Rev. Dr. McLean, in preaching his farewell sermon in St. Columba Church, Glasgow, said that what made the work of the Church most difficult of all was that science and civilization had made the world without so beautiful and so attractive to us that we were devoting too much attention to it, to the ignoring of the spiritual and eternal world. Those who could go back half a century, who knew the differences between Glasgow then and now, knew what obstacles science and civilization had been to worship. Amusement had been carried to an art and science, and the pursuit of pleasure during the week had been accompanied by the emptying of the Churches on Sunday. Perhaps the Rev. Dr. McLean would like to get back to the times when the clergy had the power to compel people to attend church or suffer under the pains and penalties then in operation.

The Rev. Angus Mackay, of the Free Church, Kingussie, said the other day: "I regard the attitude of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Moderator of the Church of Scotland towards Sunday labour on allotments as a grievous and terrible mistake. There is no doubt that these breaches of the Sabbath Day have been followed by very unfavourable weather." It does seem peculiar that some of the potatoes planted on the Sunday were up and above ground quite as early, and in some cases before those planted on the week-days; and besides, is Sunday not the only day out of the seven on which the reverend gentleman does anything in the way of work or exercising the faculties of his stupid wee brain?

When the children's church service was over, an old lady asked one of the boys which one of the hymns he liked best. She was amazed when he replied that he liked "the one that spoke about the wee fellah that pinched the old man's watch. What he referred to was:—

> The old man meek and mild,
> The priest of Israel, slept,
> His watch the temple child,
> The little Levite, kept.

V.
Secular Society, Limited.

IF later cases seem to dwell more on religion and less on considerations of State, I think, when examined, they prove to be of small authority. In Waddington's case (1 B. and C. 26) there seems to have been little argument, and no decisions were cited. R. v. Davison (4 B. and Ald. 329) decides in effect that contempt of God in court may be also contempt of court. In 1838 Baron Alderson told a York jury (Reg v. Gathercole, 2 Lewin 254) that "a person may, without being liable to prosecution for it, attack Judaism and Mohammedanism, or even any sect of the Christian religion (save the established religion of the country), and the only reason why the latter is in a different situation from the others is because it is the form established by law, and is, therefore, part of the constitution of the country. In like manner, and for the same reason, any general attack on Christianity is the subject of criminal prosecution, because Christianity is the established religion of the country." The defendant, in fact, had not made any general attack on Christianity, but, being a Protestant clergyman, had foully aspersed a Roman Catholic nunnery. Whether this strange dictum was material or not, and whether it is right or not (and Baron Alderson's is a great name), it only shows that the gist of the offence of blasphemy is a supposed tendency in fact to shake the fabric of society generally, its tendency to provoke an immediate breach of the peace is not the essential, but only an occasional feature. After all, to insult a Jew's religion is not less likely to provoke a fight than to insult an Episcopalian's; and, on the other hand, the publication of a dull volume of blasphemies may well provoke nothing worse than throwing it into the fire.

Hetherington's case (5 Jurist, O. S., 529; 4 State Trials, N. S., 563) was a motion in arrest of judgment. Even here, along of the propositions that the old Testament contains the law of God, and that "it is certain that the Christian religion is part of the law of the land" (per Mr. Justice Patterson) we find Lord Chief Justice Denman saying: "As to the argument that the relaxation of oaths is a reason for departing from old law, we could not accede to it without saying that there is no mode by which religion holds society together but by the administration of oaths, but that is not so, for religion.....contains the most powerful sanction for good conduct." R v. Moxon (4 State Trials N. S., 721) is of small authority. Later prosecutions add nothing until Lord Coleridge's direction to the jury in Reg. v. Ramsey and Foote. For thirty years this direction has been followed, nor was it argued by the Appellants that the publication of anti-Christian opinions, without ribaldry or profanity, would now support a conviction for blasphemy. It is no part of your Lordships' task on the present occasion to decide whether Lord Coleridge's ruling was or was not the last word on the crime of blasphemy, but the history of the cases and the conclusion at present reached go to show that what the law censures or resists is not the mere expression of anti-Christian opinion, whatever be the doctrines assailed or the arguments employed.

It is common ground that there is no instance recorded of a conviction for a blasphemous libel, from which the fact, or, at any rate, the supposition of the fact, of contumely and ribaldry has been absent, but this was suggested to be of no real significance for these reasons. Such prosecutions, it was said, often seem to be persecutions, and are, therefore, unpopular, and so only the gross cases have been proceeded against. This explains the immunity of the numerous agnostic or atheistic writings so much relied upon by Secularists. All it really shows is that no one cares to prosecute such things till they become indecent, not that, decently put, they are not against the law. Personally, I doubt all this. Orthodox zeal has never been lacking in this country. The Society for Carrying into Effect His Majesty's Proclamations against Vice and Immorality, which prosecuted Williams in 1797, has had many counterparts both before and since, and as anti-Christian writings are all the more insidious and effective for being couched in decorous terms, I think the fact that their authors are not prosecuted, while ribald blasphemers are, really shows that lawyers in general hold such writings to be lawful because decent, not that they are tolerable for their decency though unlawful in themselves. In fact, most men have thought that such writings are better punished with indifference than with imprisonment.

My Lords, with all respect for the great names of the lawyers who have used it, the phrase, "Christianity is part of the Law of England," is really not law; it is rhetoric, as truly so as was Erskine's preroration when prosecuting Williams, "No man can be expected to be faithful to the authority of man who revolts against the Government of God." One asks what part of our law may Christianity be, and what part of Christianity may it be that is part of our law? Lord Chief Justice Best once said in Bird v. Holbrook (4 Bing. at p. 641, a case of injury by setting a spring gun); there is no act which Christianity forbids that the law will not reach; if it were otherwise Christianity would not be, as it always has been, held to be part of the law of England"; but this was rhetoric too. Spring guns, indeed, were got rid of, not by Christianity, but by Act of Parliament. "Thou shalt not steal" is part of our law. "Thou shalt not commit adultery" is part of our law, but another part, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," is not part of our law at all. Christianity has tolerated chattel slavery; not so the present law of England. Ours is, and always has been, a Christian State. The English family is built on Christian ideas, and if the national religion is not Christian there is none. English law may well be called a Christian law, but we apply many of its rules and most of its principles with equal justice and equally good government, in heathen communities, and its sanctions even in courts of conscience, are material and not spiritual.

Frequently as the proposition question appears in one form or another, it is always as something taken for granted and handed down from the past rather than as a deliberate and reasoned proposition. It constantly has been used in charging juries as to unmistakably scurrilous words, where there was neither opportunity nor occasion for defining the limits of legitimate religious and irreligious opinion. I question if the foundations of the criminal law of blasphemous libel were ever fully investigated in any court before Ramsey's case. Even then Lord Coleridge passed over numerous decisions. To be sure, his omissions were faithfully dealt with soon afterwards by Mr. Justice Stephen, one of his own puisnes, in a popular periodical, and this paper your Lordships allowed Mr. Talbot to read as part of his argument, to which, nevertheless, it added nothing either in learning or in cogency. Such observations, too, have often been employed by Judges of first instance in cases relating to charitable trusts, where there was equally little need for any analysis of the proposition or for discussion, either historical or juridical, of its implications. It is fairly clear, too, that men of the utmost eminence have thought and said advisedly, that mere denials of sundry essentials of the Christian faith are indictable as such. Hawkins, in his Pleas of the Crown (Bk. i. ch. 5, ss. 1 and 2), says that "all blasphemies against God in denying His Being .....as well as all profane scoffing at the Holy Scriptures" are punishable offences, and adds as the reason for punishing the latter that offences of this nature "tend to subvert all religion or morality, which are the foundation of government." Blackstone (Bk. iv., ch. 4) describes a class of crimes consisting in "offences more immediately against the Almighty, by denying His being or providence or by contumelious reproaches of our Saviour Christ" and "all profane scoffing at the Holy Scriptures." Probably few great judges have been willing to go further in questions of religious liberty than Lord Mansfield in his eloquent address to this House in Evans v. Chamberlain of London (2 Burns Eccl. Law, 218). Yet there he says: "The eternal principles of natural religion are part of the common law; the essential principles of revealed religion are part of the common law, so that any person reviling, subverting, or ridiculing them may be prosecuted at common law." Again, the very careful Commissioners on the Criminal Law, of whom Serjeant Starkie was one and Sir William Wightman another, observe in their Sixth Report: "Although the law forbids all denial of the being and providence of God or the Christian religion, it is only when irreligion assumes the form of an insult to God and men that the interference of the criminal law has taken place." Nevertheless, it seems too clear to need citation of authorities (the opinions of the majority of the Judges in your Lordships' House in Shore v. Wilson having been fully discussed) in order to show that a temperate and respectful denial, even of the existence of God, is not an offence against our law, however great an offence it may be against the Almighty himself, and, except for Cowan v. Milbourne, it has never been decided outside of the region of charitable trusts that such a denial affects civil rights. I cannot bring myself to think that it does so. What, after all is really the gist of the offence of blasphemy, or of its nature as a cause of civil disability? Ribaldry has been treated as the gist, which must be a temporal matter; as between creature and Creator, how can the bad taste or the provocative character of such a denial come into question? The denial itself, not the mode of it, must be what merits the Divine anger: but that is an offence against God. Our courts of law, in the exercise of their own jurisdiction, do not, and never did that I can find, punish irreligious words as offences against God. As to them they held that deorum injurias dis cure. They dealt with such words for their manner, their violence, or ribaldry, or more fully stated, for their tendency to endanger the peace then and there, to deprave public morality generally, to shake the fabric of society, and to be a cause of civil strife. The words, as well as the acts, which tend to endanger society differ from time to time in proportion as society is stable or insecure in fact, or is believed by its reasonable members to be open to assault. In the present day meetings or processions are held lawful, which, a hundred and fifty years ago would have been deemed seditious, and this is not because the law is weaker or has changed, but because, the times having changed, society is stronger than before. In the present day reasonable men do not apprehend the dissolution or the downfall of society because religion is publicly assailed by methods not scandalous. Whether it is possible that in the future irreligious attacks, designed to undermine fundamenta institutions of our society, may come to be criminal in themselves, as constituting a public danger, is a matter that does not arise. The fact that opinion grounded on experience has moved one way does not in law preclude the possibility of its moving on fresh experience in the other; nor does it bind succeeding generations, when conditions have again changed. After all, the question whether a given opinion is a danger to society is a question of the times, and is a question of fact. I desire to say nothing that would limit the right of society to protect itself by process of law from the dangers of the moment, whatever that right may be, but only to say that, experience having proved dangers once thought real to be now negligible, and dangers once very possibly imminent to have now passed away, there is nothing in the general rules as to blasphemy and irreligion, as known to the law, which prevents us from varying their application to the particular circumstances of our time in accordance with that experience. If these considerations are right, an the attitude of the law both civil and criminal towards all religions depends fundamentally on the safety of the State and not on the doctrines or metaphysics of those who profess them, it is not necessary to consider whether or why any given body was relieved by the law at one time or frowned on at another, or to analyse creeds and tenets, Christian and other, in which I can profess no competence. Accordingly I am of opinion that acts merely done in furtherance of paragraph 3 (a) and other paragraphs of the Respondents' Memorandum are not now contrary to the law, and that the Appeal should be dismissed.

LORD BUCKMASTER.

My Lords, the terms of the Will of the Testator and the circumstances leading up to this Appeal do not demand close attention, for according to the Appellants' arguments the whole question to be decided depends upon the meaning of the Third Article of the Memorandum of Association of the Respondent Company, and upon the determination of whether this article, properly construed, renders the real object of the Respondent Company either criminal or illegal as contrary to the common law. The point of construction must be decided by considering the fair meaning of the language used and without resort to external means. Neither the documents preliminary to the incorporation of a Company registered with a Memorandum of Association, nor the action of Directors after a Company has been formed, can properly be received in evidence for the purpose of determining what the objects of the Company may be.

Clause 3 sub-head (a) of the Memorandum defines the main object of the Company in these words: "To promote in such a way as may from time to time be determined, the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief; and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action." Upon this follow a series of objects which in themselves it is not suggested are obnoxious to the law, while the last sub-head of the Clause is in general terms, and gives power "to do all such other lawful things as are conducive or incidental to all or any of the above-named objects." Without this last provision the true construction of the Memorandum would involve the view that if the defined objects could be attained, either by lawful or unlawful means, it was only those that were lawful that were permitted. But the latter provision makes the meaning quite plain. This conclusion, however, does not affect the Appellants' case, which depends upon the assertion that there are no lawful ways by which the objects of the Society can be carried out. It is said that the true meaning of the Memorandum is to encourage the propagation of doctrines directly contrary to the Christian faith—doctrines that are inimical to the central principle of Christianity and incapable of reconciliation with any essential portion of its creeds. Lord Justice Warrington, indeed, thought that to promote such objects would be to promote Atheism, and as this may be a material matter it is necessary to state the reasons why I am unable to accept this view.

Natural law may, as it seems to me, be properly regarded as part of the Divine purpose revealed through the instrument of reason; and if natural knowledge be accepted, as on this assumption it must, as equivalent to the truth, then, to take that as the basis of human conduct, as the first part of the clause directs, does not, to my mind, necessarily mean that a belief in God is thereby excluded. The latter part of the clause, which says that human welfare in this world is "the proper end of all thought and action," is more difficult. That human welfare is a proper end of thought and action few would dispute—it is the end on which the noblest minds have concentrated their highest effort; even if it be regarded as the sole object, I can conceive it being stedfastly pursued by people who possessed a firm belief in a supreme invisible Power using the instrument of man's agency to accomplish the Divine will. That this clause of the Memorandum defines an object contrary to the generally accepted conception of the Christian faith is, I think, assented to by all who have heard this case, and from this view I am not prepared to dissent. It is not necessary, and if unnecessary it is certainly not desirable, to attempt a definition of what the law would regard as the essential features of that faith. It is sufficient to say that the Respondent Company has as its main object the propagation of doctrines hostile to the Christian religion, and the question to be determined is whether it is, in consequence of illegal association, incapable of receiving or holding property.

(To be concluded.)

Inquiry into the evidence of a doctrine is not to be made once for all, and then taken as finally settled. It is never lawful to stifle a doubt; for either it can be honestly answered by means of the inquiry already made, or else it proves that the inquiry was not complete. "But," says one, "I am a busy man; I have no time for the long course of study which would be necessary to make me in any degree a competent judge of certain questions, or even able to understand the nature of the arguments." Then he should have no time to believe.—W. K. Clifford.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
> Name.....
> Address.....
> Occupation .....
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Views and Opinions.

Education and the War.

No apology is needed for once more returning to the subject of religion in the schools. It is one of the vital questions which concern Freethinkers, and it involves not only educational issues, as such, but also very important questions of modern polity. Nor are there wanting signs that the Churches are resolved on making a strenuous, perhaps a final, effort to secure a firmer hold on the schools as their share of gain from the War. In this, their task is not nearly so hopeless as some people imagine. For our own part, we have never shared, and do not now share, the belief that the coming of peace will find us a nation comparatively united in the desire to achieve a social millennium. The mass of people will be concerned only with the relief following so long a period of great strain. The millions of war-weary soldiers will be too ready to enjoy a season of peace to engage in a new warfare at home. And, withal, we shall have the forces of reaction united in making good their position, taking whatever steps are needful to conserve their interests, and greatly assisted by the three or four years of sacrifice of popular liberties and social ideals which the War has entailed. No one would be more pleased than ourselves to find these prognostications falsified by events, but we greatly fear their realization. And it is idle to refuse to face facts because they are not of the kind we desire.

The Struggle for the Child.

The question of religious instruction in State schools has been raised several times of late. It was the subject the other day of a discussion in the House of Lords, initiated by Lord Parmoor; it forms the text of a Circular Letter recently sent by a Church Council to all the diocesan educational bodies in England, and in other ways one is able to arrive at the conclusion that "educational reconstruction after the War" means, for the Churches, a readiness to pay teachers better salaries provided more religion, and a more definite religion, is given to the children. The education given, to quote the Circular Letter, is to be "alive with religious force and spirit," and "the schools of Christian England" are to be "places of definite Christian instruction." From other sources it is plain that, in the face of the loss of prestige due to the War, the Nonconformist bodies may be ready to strike a bargain with the Establishment and sell the position, as they have sold it before. A grip on the children is vital to the Churches. It is more vital to them than it is to us, because we can trust our principles to the decision of a matured intelligence. It is vital to them, because if they lose the child they lose all. It is important to us, because if we can see that the child gets a fair start in life, we have made the first step towards the creation of an intelligent and useful citizen.

Coercing the Teachers.

The speeches of Lord Parmoor, the Bishop of Wakefield, and others (it is significant that the speech of Lord Sheffield in opposition was not reported in any of the papers) together with the circular letter, make it clear that what is now aimed at is not only the introduction of more denominational religion into the schools, but also the more effective religious instruction of the teachers. The Bishop of Wakefield complained that "a teacher was trained in the training colleges on the method of imparting instruction in every subject save the one which, in the opinion of the overwhelming body of the people, should be the predominant subject in the training of character." We leave for a time the question of the veracity of the concluding words of the Bishop, and, indeed, from one point of view, the opening words are unobjectionable. If religion is a subject that ought to be taught in the schools, if it is essential to the training of children, then it is only right to ask that teachers should be as carefully trained in this subject as in others. But it means a more definite religious test for teachers. And it means penalizing those teachers who are not religious even more than they are penalized to-day. If teachers are to be carefully trained in religion, if reports on their fitness in this direction are to be considered in the granting of certificates, and in the making of appointments, it requires no great sagacity to see where it will all end. The presence of religion in the schools at all makes it difficult for thousands of teachers to avoid playing the hypocrite. If the Bishop of Wakefield gets his way this hypocrisy will commence with their entering the training college. And a profession of religion will certainly become a condition—expressed or unexpressed—of their appointment.

Tradition versus Facts.

Lord Parmoor quoted with approval a Times writer who said: "It is essential at the present time to bring out in no uncertain fashion the predominantly religious nature of the whole tradition of English education..... Education without instruction in the Christian verities is far more dangerous to national life than any inefficiency of organization or inadequacy of curricula." And Lord Sydenham said that if we "neglected spiritual education the result upon the country would be disastrous. The most terrible calamity that the world had ever known could be plainly traced to misdirection." Neither of the speakers seemed to be aware of the fact that such education as the world has had, and for many generations past, has been predominantly religious. Germany is no exception to this rule, since its rulers have never failed to recognize the power of religion as an aid to their ambitions. Of all the countries now at war, France is the only one in which education has been definitely and avowedly separated from religion. Will either Lord Parmoor or Lord Sydenham say that education separated from religion has been disastrous there? And if they will not assert it of France, what reason is there for asserting that a similar policy would be disastrous in this country? That Germany has made a bad use of its educational system no one will deny. But are we doing much better when we utilize the schools to force upon the defenceless minds of children doctrines of which large numbers of educated people are ashamed, and which, as a much larger number will admit, are open to the most serious doubt? It is a prostitution of the schools to use them as a training ground for militarism, and to narrow that which should be devoted to the ideal of humanity to the promotion of imperialistic ambitions. And it is, none the less, a prostitution of the schools to use them for the perpetuation of theological doctrines which ought to have been discarded long ago.

What Freethinkers May Do.

It is to be observed that nearly all these speeches and circulars in favour of religious instruction in State schools proceed on the cool assumption that the question is one to be settled by a consultation between Christians. The great lesson that these people have to learn is that England is not a Christian country—save in the sense that the majority of its inhabitants profess some form of Christianity. And the majority is a majority in name only. On what they believe there is the widest possible divergence and the sharpest possible contradiction. But there are others beside Christians, and these form an integral part of the State. Unpleasant as the recognition of this fact is to Christians, they will have to face it. And it will be the fault of these non-Christians if they are not made to face it in the near future. Freethinkers are an active-minded body as a whole, and they take a part in all sorts of social and political movements. They can, then, if they will, make their influence felt. There is a great cry at present for reconstruction in education, and this offers a golden opportunity for action. In trade unions, in social or political or educational meetings, wherever the question of education is raised, let them bring this vital question of Secular Education to the fore. As we have seen, Christians are not slow to urge their claims, and Freethinkers should certainly not be less backward in insisting that the modern State, as it embraces all varieties of opinion, should maintain a strict neutrality between them. In insisting upon the application of this principle they are asking for nothing for themselves with which all others are not in perfect agreement. They are asking only for justice from the State between members of the State. Above all, they are claiming justice and freedom for the child—a justice that will protect it from the machinations of this or that Church, and a freedom that will permit its individuality to develop with the aid of an education based on verifiable knowledge and rational assumption.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Abraham Lincoln: Freethinker.

DR. FORT NEWTON, in his first sermon as pastor of the City Temple, stated that Lincoln was an ideal man, and that if every citizen of the United States of America resembled him there would certainly ensue an ideal state of things there. The laws would be just and humane, woman would be honoured as man's equal, "social slavery and industrial brutality would cease to exist," and the nation would be what "it was meant to be, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the service of humanity." Lincoln, so true of heart, so clear of mind, living with malice towards none, with charity for all, was a character worthy of universal imitation. Now, it is true that Dr. Newton did not formally claim him as a Christian; but it is equally true that he did not even remotely hint that he was an unbeliever. Inasmuch, however, as the direct object of his discourse was to show that "Christ is all in all," and in human life, those unacquainted with the illustrious Emancipator's story would naturally have inferred that he had been an enthusiastic follower of the Galilean. So far as the overwhelming majority of his congregation were concerned, the preacher's tactful, though not truthful, silence as to Lincoln's religious views was entirely misleading. In this respect, Dr. Newton loyally followed the example of the innumerable host of his ministerial brethren. It seems to be taken for granted in his profession that every man of genius, every heroic performer of mighty deeds, every practical lover and servant of his fellow-beings, must of necessity be a believer in Christ. When such a philanthropist dies it is customary either tacitly to assume, or openly to assert, that he was a devout believer in the Lord Jesus, though possibly without knowing it. As is well known, Abraham Lincoln was assassinated on April 14, 1865, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. During his public life he had been systematically reticent on the subject of religion. Neither in his speeches nor in his presidential messages had he been in the habit of making any reference to it. Even his Proclamation of Emancipation contained no allusion to a Supreme Being. When, on the 22nd of July, 1862, he read it to his Cabinet, Secretary Chase observed that there ought to be something about God at the close, the President replied: "Put it in; it won't hurt it," an answer which carried with it a suggestion that the desired addition would not help it either.

But no sooner was the great man dead and buried than fanatical Christians began to claim him as a great servant of the Lord. From pulpit and press the word went forth that the murdered President had lived an exemplary Christian life, General Collis going so far as to assert that "Lincoln invoked the power of Almighty God, not the Deist God, but the God whom he worshipped under the forms of the Christian Church of which he was a member." Certain letters he had written were supposed to explain his attitude to the Christian religion; but the daughter of the Rev. Mr. Gurley, who made such a statement about them, admitted her entire ignorance of their contents, and that they had been destroyed by fire.

An anonymous but eminent Christian lady told an equally anonymous friend that once upon a time the President spoke to her thus:—

> I think I can say with sincerity that I hope I am a Christian. I had lived until my Willie died without fully realizing these things. That blow overwhelmed me. It showed me my weakness as I had never felt it before, and I think I can safely say that I know something of a change of heart, and I will further add that it has been my intention for some time, at a suitable opportunity, to make a public religious profession.

The late Colonel Ingersoll characterized "this falsehood," which had been related by a Mr. Seip, as "an orphan, a lonely lie without father or mother." The same remark applies to the tale that, on being presented with a Bible by some coloured people of Baltimore, he warmly thanked them, and described the Bible as "God's best gift to man, without which we could not have known right from wrong." Those who knew Lincoln personally, and his estimate of the Scriptures, had no difficulty in showing how absolutely impossible it was for him to have so spoken.

It is a noteworthy fact that not one of the clergymen who claimed that Lincoln was a Christian was able to testify that Lincoln had ever so styled himself in his hearing. The Rev. Mr. Gurley, already mentioned, was quoted as one authority for the truth of the legend; but strangely enough, it was this same Mr. Gurley upon whom had been conferred the honour of preaching a funeral sermon over the body of the murdered President at the White House, and in that discourse he had not claimed that he was a Christian—had, indeed, not said anything about Christ at all. It should also be borne in mind that Bishop Simpson, in his funeral oration, "said nothing about Lincoln having been a Christian."

We are now in possession of the testimony borne by personal, some of them lifelong, friends of the world-famed President, to the effect that he was a convinced, thorough-going Freethinker. Mr. Herndon, for many years his partner, Justice David Davis, Colonel Ward Lamon, the Hon. Jesse W. Fell, William G. Green, the Hon. James Tuttle, Colonel John G. Nicolay, and Colonel Ingersoll, all of whom knew him well, and several of whom were on terms of close intimacy with him, unanimously declared that "he did not believe in the inspiration of the Bible, or the divinity of Christ, or the scheme of salvation, and that he utterly repudiated the dogma of eternal pain." Mr. Herndon added that he did not believe "in the existence of a personal God." In addition to all, we have the clear testimony of Mrs. Lincoln that "her husband was not a Christian." Surely, such evidence, derived from such sources, is perfectly conclusive in utterly discrediting the various legends set in circulation by those whose delusion is that nobility of character, blossoming into just and benevolent deeds, is possible only to genuine disciples of Christ. It is a fundamental article of their creed that Freethought is inevitably either the parent or the offspring of a depraved, wicked heart. But as the Freethought ascribed to Lincoln neither sprang from nor gave rise to vicious habits, there was no escape from the conclusion that, at bottom, he was all along a true Christian. That they were radically mistaken is now beyond all serious controversy. Like Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius, Lincoln's beauty of character and purity of motive owed nothing to Christian influence, but were the natural fruit of a clean, healthy nature. He was in every respect superior to the Christian professors in the midst of whom he lived. In the 'thirties and 'forties of last century the Presbyterian, Baptist, Episcopal, and Methodist Churches of the Southern States were passing resolutions in justification of slavery as a Divinely ordained institution, which resolutions are now embodied in The Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin, by Harriet Beecher Stowe. In 1831 "Lincoln went down the Mississippi in a flat boat at the extravagant salary of ten dollars a month."

> When he reached New Orleans, he and some of his companions went about the city. Among other places, they visited a slave market, where men and women were being sold at auction. A young coloured girl was on the block. Lincoln heard the brutal words of the auctioneer—the savage remarks of bidders. The scene filled his soul with indignation and horror. Turning to his companions, he said: "Boys, if ever I get a chance to hit slavery, by God I'll hit it hard" (The Works of Ingersoll, vol. iii., p. 143).

In the Northern as well as in the Southern States, the majority of the Churches vigorously supported the institution of slavery. As Lincoln himself once wittily put it, the advocates of abolition were "sinners calling the righteous to repentance." Wendell Phillips, William Lloyd Garrison, and Henry Ward Beecher were insurgent sons of the Church, upon whom her wrath was not seldom visited. A few men of lesser weight, but fully as zealous friends of the slaves, were brutally put to death, notably, Elijah Lovejoy, of Alton, Illinois, of whose courage Emerson speaks with glowing enthusiasm, and John Brown, of Harper's Ferry fame. The Harmony Presbytery of South Carolina solemnly resolved that, as the great head of the Church had recognized the relation of master and slave, it followed that "the existence of slavery itself was not opposed to the will of God," and that those who condemned it had "submitted their necks to the yoke of men, sacrificed their Christian liberty of conscience, and left the infallible word of God for the fancies and doctrines of men." As Ingersoll says, "it does not seem possible that only a few years ago our Constitution, our laws, our Courts, the Pulpit and the Press, defended and upheld the institution of slavery,—that it was a crime to feed the hungry—to give water to the lips of thirst—shelter to a woman flying from the whip and chain"; but it is incontrovertibly true. The Church not only defended and upheld slavery, but cruelly persecuted those of her members who had the courage to denounce it, and to advocate its abolition; and the fact remains that the man who actually emancipated the slaves in the States was outside all Churches, and did not even believe in Christ.

We thank Dr. Fort Newton for his fine eulogy of Lincoln, but beg to remind him that this man, whose "life was a revelation of the genius and purpose of the Republic, its reason for being, and its prophecy of times to come," made no secret of the fact that he was a Freethinker. To him Christ was not all, and in all. America's greatest and noblest statesman did not even pretend to love the Lord, and to "an angel writing in a book of gold" the names of Heaven's favourites he would have said,—

> Write me as one that loves his fellow men.

We cannot conclude better than in the closing words of Colonel Ingersoll's lecture on Abraham Lincoln delivered in 1894:—

> He knew no fear except the fear of doing wrong. Hating slavery, pitying the master—seeking to conquer, not persons, but prejudices—he was the embodiment of the self-denial, the courage, the hope, and the nobility of a Nation. He spoke not to inflame, not to upbraid, but to convince. He raised his hands, not to strike, but in benediction. He longed to pardon. He loved to see the pearls of joy on the cheeks of a wife whose husband he had rescued from death. Lincoln was the grandest figure of the fiercest civil war. He is the gentlest memory of our world (Works, vol. iii., p. 173).

Under a Fool's Cap.

Rabelais laughing in his easy chair. —Pope.

Le rire c'est le propre de l'homme. —Rabelais.

FRENCH literature is one blaze of splendid scepticism from Abelard to Anatole France, and the name of Francois Rabelais is one of the greatest in this splendid beadroll. The popular idea of Rabelais coincides with Pope's famous line, depicting the famous writer "laughing in his easy chair." He is pictured as one who laughs and mocks at all things; a hog for appetite; a monkey for tricks. His genius had many facets, and he has been described as a great ethical teacher, a grossly obscene writer, a reckless buffoon, a Catholic, a Protestant, and a Freethinker. To paint him as a moralist alone is to ignore the innate drollery of his character. To set him up as a mere mountebank is to forget the stern reality which underlies his writing.

To treat Rabelais as destitute of all serious purpose in art or life is a great error. Whatever Rabelais may have been, he was not a trifler. He had seen ecclesiastical life from the inside, and he hated priests with every drop of his blood. He studied Greek when it was a forbidden language, and was an enthusiastic disciple of learning when scholars carried their lives in their hands. His zeal for intellectual freedom, untrammelled by priestcraft, entitles him to rank with Erasmus and Von Hutten as an apostle of humanism.

Of middle-class parentage, Francois Rabelais was born in the fifteenth century near the lovely little city of Chinon, on the Vienne, where Henry II. cursed his sons and died. Always he regarded Touraine, its cities, rivers, and vineyards, with affectionate admiration. "Noble, ancient, the first in the world," so he called it in the fullness of his heart. His father, an innkeeper, wished to make him a priest. Accordingly, little Francois was sent at nine years of age to the Benedictine monks of Scully, so young that the white vestment was put over the child's frock. Later he was removed to the Franciscan Monastery of Fontenoy le Comte. The Franciscan vows included ignorance as well as celibacy and poverty. For fifteen years he remained there, taking priest's orders at the age of twenty-eight. Always inquisitive, he amassed that encyclopædic knowledge which he put to so good a use in his immortal book Gargantua and Pantagruel.

It is to this long period spent among the bigoted, narrow, intolerant sons of the great lying Catholic Church that we owe his undying hatred of priestcraft. It breaks out in nearly every page of his writings, here passionately, there sorrowfully, with a cry of rage, a sob of pain, or a mocking laugh of sanglante derision. He hated the "monk birds" more bitterly than even Erasmus, for his nature was stronger.

At the age of forty he came into the world a free man, at liberty to follow his studies, burning with a pathetic enthusiasm for the new learning. He threw aside the monastic habit, and became secretary to the Bishop of Maillezais. Afterwards he went to the University of Montpelier with the object of getting a medical degree. When he attended the lectures he was within sight of his fiftieth year, and he sat by the side of men young enough to be his sons. Two years later he went to Lyons, where he held an appointment as physician to the hospital. His friend, Etienne Dolet, the Freethinker, was already established as a printer in the place.

Rabelais' connection with the first reformers of France is certain; the extent difficult to determine. He had no desire for the martyr's crown, and he never contemplated following Calvin into exile, or Berguin to the stake. As he humorously explained, he was "too thirsty to like fire." His sympathies, too, were antagonistic to all dogmas. "Presbyter," to him, "was but priest writ large." Luther and Calvin were as abhorrent to him as the priests. The society of Des Perriers, Etienne Dolet, and the Lyonnais Freethinkers, was more congenial to his habits of thought. Moreover, he had an intimate knowledge of the power of the Church, and of the malignity of her hired assassins.

Heretics were then handed over to the secular arm to be burnt for the good of their souls, and the greater glory of God. Rabelais did not intend, if he could help it, to be butchered to make a Roman holiday. When he was denounced as a heretic, he challenged his enemies to produce an heretical proposition from his writings. They were unequal to the task, but, nevertheless, the heresy was there. Rabelais' caution was necessary if he wished to live. Some of his contemporaries suffered severely for heresy. Dolet was burnt to death, Des Perriers was driven to suicide, Marot was a half-starved wanderer in Piedmont. Giordano Bruno, whom he had met at Rome, was also done to death in the accepted Roman manner. Rabelais had every reason for not wishing to be "saved by fire."

His writings, Gargantua and Pantagruel, which have kept his memory green through the ages, are a series of satires in a vein of riotous and uproarious mirth on monks, priests, pedants, and all the solecisms of his time. With all their licentiousness and freedom of expression, they reveal a heart aflame with love of liberty, and a passionate desire for the triumph of truth and justice.

It has been said with truth that Rabelais despised women. He did not write till an age when the passion of youth had consumed itself to ashes. Love was killed in Rabelais by that hateful system of monkery which has filled Christendom with unspeakable horrors. Poor Rabelais! Half of humanity was absent from his mind. Love, the central fire of the universe, the source of all human joys and sympathies, the bond of society, appears in the accursed monastic system in which he was trained as corruption and depravity. The damnable discipline surrounded Rabelais from the time he wore a child's frock till he was a man of forty, and the best side of his nature was strangled. He never loved; never even thought of loving. He had no more respect for women than a eunuch in an Eastern seraglio. Nay, more, there had even been crushed out of him that love for his mother which characterizes every Frenchman worthy of the name. As the old galley-slave used to be known by the dragging foot, on which had been the heavy iron fetter, so when the unlovely years had eaten away manhood, imprisoned with its blind instincts and objectless passions, the monk is known by his sexless mind. Thrice poor Rabelais! The priests spoiled his life. The robe he wore was to him like a bodily deformity, narrowing his view, corrupting his mind. Originally, his nature must have been very different, witness those exquisite chapters in which he describes the monks of Thelema, who motto was "Liberty."

Tradition has it that he died saying: "I go to seek the great perhaps." We may picture the rage of his opponents when the old man slipped quietly out of their eager clutches. The Catholic Church never forgets, and it was well for the old scholar that his life was not prolonged.

Rabelais went further than contempt for the trappings of Christianity, and he rejected it altogether. He hoped to cure the evil of religion by spreading knowledge, by bringing priestcraft into contempt, by widening the boundaries of thought. It was his desire that his writings should be read. To read rationalistic thought is to think rationally, and is the first step towards Freethought. Rabelais knew as much as any man of his time, but he carried his weight of learning with a smile. He was acquainted with the book of the world, and not merely with the world of books. Liberty was Rabelais' sovereign specific for the ills of his time. Finding his contemporaries bound with chains of their own manufacture, it was his life-purpose to break the fetters and set them free.

Mankind when they grow enthusiastic mistake their hopes and imaginations for evidence of truth, and run like sheep after every new pretender who professes to hold the key of the mystery which they are so passionately anxious to penetrate.

People in search of the miraculous never like to be disappointed.

Belief in the marvellous does not rise from evidence and will not yield to it. There is the easy answer, that infidels are answered according to the impiety of their hearts, that the gods will not and perhaps cannot work miracles in the presence of sceptics.—J. A. Froude, "A Cagliostro of the Second Century," "Short Studies on Great Subjects" (1894), vol. iv., pp. 436-454-473.

Discussion and examination are fatal to miracles.....miracles only exist when people believe in them. The supernatural owes its existence only to faith.....miracles.....never occur where they would be most effective.....A miracle at Paris, for instance, before experienced savants, would put an end to all doubts! But, alas! such a thing never happens. A miracle never takes place before an incredulous and sceptical public, the most in need of such a convincing proof. Credulity on the part of the witness is the the essential condition of a miracle. There is not a solitary exception to the rule that miracles are never produced before those who are able or permitted to discuss and criticize them.—Ernest Renan, "The Apostles" (1895), p. 28.

EUSAPIA PALLADINO was born and bred in the slums of Naples, and married, early in life, a travelling conjurer, who no doubt taught her the tricks by means of which she afterwards became famous, or notorious. First investigated at Milan in 1892, she has practised as a spirit medium for the last twenty-five years; and although she has been several times exposed, she still retains the faith of several scientific men.

Among those who assisted at the investigation at Milan in 1892 were Professor Brofferio and M. Schiaperelli, Director of the Astronomical Observatory in Milan, who both signed a report expressing their conviction that some of the things witnessed could not be attributed to normal agency.[1] Professor Richet, who attended some of the sittings, though attaching great weight to the phenomena which he had observed, was not completely satisfied. Therefore, with a view to further investigation, Professor Richet, in the summer of 1894, invited Sir Oliver Lodge, Mr. W. H. Myers, and Dr. Ochorowicz, and one or two others, to his own house in the Ile Roubaud, in the Mediterranean, and later at Carqueiranne, to again meet Eusapia.

The sittings were held in "semi-darkness." The phenomena were of the usual type, and consisted mainly of the movement of furniture at a certain distance from the table, the sounding of musical instruments, grasps and touches felt by the sitters, while Eusapia's hands and feet were believed to be secured by those sitting on either side of her. Professor Richet, Sir Oliver Lodge, and Mr. Myers were convinced that some of the phenomena were due to supernormal agency. "Amongst the phenomena for which Sir Oliver Lodge specially vouched 'as being the most easily and securely observed, and as being amply sufficient in themselves to establish a scientifically unrecognized truth,' were the movements of a distant chair, visible in the moonlight, bulging of curtain, sounding of notes of untouched piano and accordion, movement and uplifting of a heavy table, and other purposive movements of apparently distant objects; graspings and pattings of hand, arm, and back, whilst the head, hands, and feet of the medium were under complete control and nowhere near the place touched. Further, the rude outline of a large face was seen against the background of the window; little lights like glow-worms were seen to flit about; some scent like verbena appeared on the medium's hands, and blue marks were made on the under surface of a table previously examined and found clean, and on part of Richet's shirtfront under his waistcoat."[1]

On another occasion, after the seance, Eusapia took Professor Richet's finger and drew it along a clean sheet of paper. The finger-nail was seen to leave a thick blue mark on the clean white paper, as if made with a blue pencil! The amazing thing is that intelligent and clever men could bring themselves to believe that spirits, who are supposed to consist of pure intellect released from all earthly matter, and far transcending us in knowledge and power, could perform such childish antics as making blue marks under tables, on shirtfronts, and paper. Did they believe that spirits carry blue pencils behind their ears, ready for such tricks as these?

It should be stated that all the investigators positively asserted that the hands and feet of the medium were under control during the phenomena. Nevertheless, when the report of the sittings reached Dr. Hodgson—the exposer of the Blavatsky fraud—he pointed out that the precautions described did not exclude trickery, and declared that all the phenomena "described could be accounted for on the assumption that Eusapia could get a hand or foot free." Mr. Myers, Sir O. Lodge, and Professor Richet each replied at length to Hodgson's criticisms, and all declared that they were fully aware of the dangers referred to. "And really," says Podmore, "to impute negligence on this point to Richet and his fellow-investigators would almost seem equivalent to imputing imbecility."[2]

Of course, neither Sir Oliver nor his colleagues were at all shaken in their convictions by Dr. Hodgson's arguments; and to prove their conviction, a further series of sittings were arranged for the following summer at Mr. Myers' house at Cambridge, to which Dr. Hodgson, then living at Boston, in America, was especially invited. The result was the discovery that the tricks were performed exactly as Dr. Hodgson had stated in his criticism. Myers, in communicating the results to the Society for Psychical Research, said: "I cannot doubt that we observed much conscious and deliberate fraud, of a kind which must have needed long practice to bring to its present level of skill. Nor can I find any excuse for her fraud (assuming that such excuse would be valid) in the attitude of mind of the persons, several of them distinguished in the world of science, who assisted in this inquiry. Their attitude was a fair and open one; in all cases they showed patience, and in several cases the impression first made on their minds was distinctly favourable.....I do not think there is adequate reason to suppose that any of the phenomena at Cambridge were genuine."[3]

However, Sir O. Lodge and Richet still maintained their belief in Eusapia, and "A few years later, after witnessing some more of Eusapia's performances in Paris, Myers returned to his original allegiance, and formally avowed his renewed belief in the supernormal character of Eusapia's mediumship."[1]

But after the exposure of systematic fraud at Cambridge, the Council of the Society for Psychical Research declined to proceed with any further investigation of Eusapia's powers, and her subsequent performances have been confined to foreign investigators. In 1907 she held sittings with Doctors Herlitzska, Charles Foa, and Aggazzotti, the phenomena at which included "the breaking up of a small table before their eyes, and the impression, by radio-activity, of four finger marks on a sensitized plate wrapped in black paper—which they regarded as unquestionably supernormal."

The most elaborate investigation was undertaken by the Institut General Psychologique of Paris, who between the years 1905 and 1907 held no fewer than forty-three sittings with Eusapia. "Of the investigators the best known are M. and Madame Curie. The circle seems to have included several other competent physicists, and the apparatus employed in the inquiry was as well devised as it was, unfortunately, for the most part unproductive."[2] Of course, when the tests were too rigid, when they could not be got round or got over, then the sitting was "unproductive"—that is, Eusapia did nothing. As Podmore observes: "Eusapia tolerates human 'control'—she understands men and women; but she has a rooted antipathy to scientific apparatus of any kind."

And again, says the same writer:—

> Her feet are generally controlled by being placed over or under the feet of the controller-observer on either side. Unfortunately, the Committee found that she suffered from a painful corn on the right foot, so that this foot had generally to be placed on the left foot of her neighbour instead of under it. As to her hands, she practically insists on the method of control already described; one hand may, as a rule, be clasped, but the other must be free, resting wholly or partly on the hand of her neighbour. This preference of hers is due, as would appear from her statement to the Committee of the Institut, to cutaneous hyperaesthenia, which makes it difficult for her to tolerate pressure on the hand for long together.[3]

We shall see the reason for this later. However, "The investigators loyally complied with the conditions imposed, but sought in various ways to devise tests which should still be valid. The really valuable part of their report is the successive rejections or evasions of their tests by Eusapia."[4] One of the phenomena witnessed was the levitation, or floating, a stool in the air. Photographs were taken of this, which Eusapia allowed on condition that she gave the signal for working the camera. "Three of the photographs," says Podmore, "taken from a position facing the medium, show the little stool against the background of the dark curtain, apparently suspended in the air over the medium. But a fourth photograph, taken simultaneously on the last occasion from the side, shows that the stool was actually supported in quite normal fashion, by Eusapia's head. Unfortunately, Eusapia saw this last photograph, and the cameras, which henceforth lay in wait to right and left, were baulked of their prey, for the little stool was levitated no more."

With the final and crushing exposure, in America, of this super-clever adventuress, we shall deal with in our concluding article.

In reply to Mr. G. Driscoll's inquiry, in last week's "Correspondence Column," as to where he can find Mr. Maskelyne's exposure of the Davenport Brothers; I am not aware that Mr. Maskelyne did expose them, that is a fable circulated by our great and glorious free press.

The facts are these. The Davenport Brothers—there were two—came to London from America in September, 1864. Their performance was to allow themselves to be bound with rope by members of the audience. They were then sealed on chairs in a cabinet, accompanied with various musical instruments. The doors were then closed, and immediately after the instruments were heard to play, and some of them were even thrown out of the cabinet through an oval hole near the top. When these phenomena had ceased, the doors were thrown open and the brothers found to be still sealed, securely bound.

After a triumphant season in London, where they were loudly boomed by our beautiful press, they toured the provinces, and in Liverpool met with disaster. Two gentlemen were in the audience who possessed the secret of a special knot, called the "Tom Fool's Knot," which they proceeded to apply to the wrists of the Davenport Brothers, who both protested against it, declining to proceed with the performance. The next night there was a riot, and the brothers had to fly the town. A like reception awaited them at Huddersfield and Hull.

It was some months later when Maskelyne and Cooke, in their Crystal Palace performances, imitated the Davenports' tricks so well that Spiritualists declared that Maskelyne and Cooke were themselves mediums. Podmore gives the facts in Modern Spiritualism, vol. ii., pp. 55-60.

"The mailed fist of Germany, with the additional aid of Almighty God." will replace King Tino on the throne. So says the Kaiser, and we are greatly taken with "the additional aid of God." He is evidently a mere auxiliary. And, after all, most people would be willing to wager that if the "mailed fist" doesn't replace Tino, the "additional aid" will not.

The Vicar of Wymondham, Norfolk, complains that it is impossible "reverently" to administer War-bread because it produces so many crumbs. We wonder what exactly is the nature of the "irreverence" produced? Does the worthy Vicar find himself swearing at the Food Controller because of the mixed flour? Or is it that the people who receive the sacrament do the "cussing"?

The Governor of Greenland says that the Greenlanders "are all Christians," and they have a Bible, but no bishops. Christian Evidence lecturers will be delighted to hear that there is one country which can fairly claim to be Christian.

The Shoe and Leather Record announces that a Bible 5 ft. 2 in. high and 3 ft. 6 in. wide has been "built" at the Oxford Press. When opened the book measures 7 ft. 10 in. across. The binding is of morocco, and used up twelve goat-skins. The book is to be used in a "Bible Crusade." We haven't the least doubt that the size of the book will impress the type of mind usually ensnared by a "Bible Crusade." Those responsible for such things are not exactly fools, and they make no mistake as to the character of the people for whom they cater.

In the Pall Mall Gazette of June 9, Father Vaughan denounces the "war-time growth of spiritism in our midst," and inveighs Spiritualism in the characteristic would-be-infallible style of the exponent of Roman Catholicism. He says that a stern stand should be made to check this folly, and goes on to insinuate that the Spiritualist is a necromancer. Oh, thunder and blue ruin, if the Spiritualist is a necromancer what, pray, is the priest? A little further on he avers that "the powers of evil" proffer false promises and empty consolation through spiritistic agents. And the "powers of evil" are, in the view of Father Vaughan, the devils who inhabit the Christian hell, that nightmare conception of panicky minds. These "powers of evil" build up "trick towers of hope that inevitably totter and tumble into the lowest depths of despair. In this the Spiritualists are but humble imitators of the Great Lying Church. These "powers of evil" and the Spiritualists differ only in degree of audacity from the Christian priest; and while Roman Catholicism has become almost endemic in some parts of the world, Spiritualism is only mildly sporadic. Spiritualists seem to hold the view that the spirits of the dead exist in close proximity to us but are separated from us by physical barriers, and only through physical media can they communicate with us. But the Roman Catholic Church "knows that any attempt on the part of her children to get into communication with the other side means the violation of the Commandments of God and of his Church." What a tremendous assumption is that of the "other side." To Father Vaughan it means the inane Christian heaven and its concomitant the fiendish Christian hell—and also limbo. What are heaven and hell but a continuance of the insolence, as Omar Khayyam terms it:—

> What, without asking, hither hurried Whence?
> And, without asking, Whither hurried hence!
> Oh, many a Cup of this forbidden Wine
> Must drown the memory of that insolence.

"Relationship with the Other World is contrary to the known will of God." With what colossal assurance does Father Vaughan make this statement? The Christian, or any other God, is merely a supposition; and the Christian God has no more reality than Odin or Zeus, or any other personification of the flood of foolishness that has ever poured over the minds of men. The "other world" is just a similar sort of guess; hence talk of relationship with the other world, and of the known will of God, is simply nothing more than babble. Further, "From what the Divine Master has told us of the Other Side, it seems clear that damned souls have no opportunity of making themselves heard or felt here." Damned souls! What foul ignorance and cruelty are behind these two words. How finely does Omar Khayyam answer:—

> Oh Thou, who didst with pitfall and with Gin
> Beset the road I was to wander in,
> Thou wilt not with Predestination round
> Enmesh me, and impute my fall to Sin?
> Oh, Thou, who Man of baser Earth didst make
> And who with Eden didst devise the Snake;
> For all the Sin wherewith the Face of Man
> Is blacken'd, Man's Forgiveness give—and take!

Finally—"Personally, I have no doubt whatever that, telepathy and trickery aside, the rest of this bad business is in reality a travesty and caricature of Satanic spirits, who, in more cases than I care to state, start their soul-snatching game with a promise of spiritual consolation, only to end it with ruin and despair." Satanic spirits! Devils! Father Vaughan still believes in hell and hell-fire, and he, presumably, is of opinion that all non-Catholics ought to be roasted in twentieth-century Smithfield fires for the benefit of their souls. Satanic soul-snatching! Puerility of puerilities! Is it not time that the world was purged of Hebrew absurdities and insanities, of Christian babblings and vain imaginings, of the carrion of the crucifix, of the inanities of present-day theological divisions, of the obstacle that all these make against the progress of mankind. What is behind Father Vaughan's utterance is trade rivalry. He sees dangerous competition in the spread of Spiritualism. Therefore, he loudly advertises the Old Firm, "Look here," he shouts, "we have the real goods." But neither has the real goods; both are charlatans.

In view of the electoral privileges shortly to be given to women, the Bishops are wondering how they can keep women in the Church, and they are considering a modest proposal for a larger share of Church government to be extended to the ladies. It must be hard for parsons to regard women as human beings.

The Daily Chronicle recalls Dr. Joseph Parker's Thursday services at the City Temple, and mentions a number of well-known people who were attracted by them, and concludes with the tantalizing remark, "one of London's Agnostic leaders" has been "seen listening intently." What a pity that the poor journalist's memory gave way when he got so far as the "Agnostic leader."

A merciful Providence is not disturbed by the European War, in which many millions of soldiers, sailors, and civilians have lost their lives. In a recent tornado which swept through the State of Illinois 300 men, women, and children were killed.

The Bishop of Birmingham has said the nastiest thing of Mr. Wells' God, the Invisible King, for he asserts, "I believe that the writer of the fourth gospel and Mr. Wells would have had a good deal in common." And Mr. Wells plumes himself on the idea that he is an up-to-date man.

Two local curates are acting as tram conductors on Chatham trams, and are already adepts at collecting fares. The remaining clergy are attending the fair at parochial functions.

Cardinal Bourne has sent a telegram to Cardinal Gibbons congratulating the Americans on joining the Allies, and the Yankee Cardinal replied that the fight is for "All that Christianity represents." Yet millions of Catholics are fighting in the ranks of the Central Powers.

"If we had sat still and dared nothing, the women and children of Britain would have been treated as those in Belgium," says the Bishop of London. Yet that is precisely what the clergy have done, for they are entirely exempted from military service.

The lunatics at Caterham Asylum have hitherto had the benefit of the spiritual ministrations of a chaplain, who was paid £300 a year. This sum has now been reduced to £200 yearly, in order to save money in war-time.

Our Christian editors are getting demoralized by a three years' War. Most of them allowed about twenty lines to the awful earthquake at San Salvador, in which 60,000 people perished. Yet the Salvation Army flag day received a full column of appreciation. Perhaps the last-named was paid for at the usual advertisement rates.

The Rev. Dr. C. H. Watkins told the Baptist Church at Myrtle Street, Liverpool, on retiring from the pastorate, that "if we were really prepared to stand by and live by Grace, it would revolutionize the world." So it would, most certainly; but the world wouldn't be worth living in then. To live by faith would be to trust God rather than self; to transfer our citizenship from earth to heaven; to depreciate and despise the present life except as merely a preparation for the life to come; to set our affection on the things that are above, not on the things that are upon the earth, and such a life would be an unspeakable absurdity.

No one has ever lived by grace, and there is nothing to indicate that any one will ever do so. Professing Christians live very much like other people, and differ from their neighbours only in cherishing certain unnatural beliefs, and in going in for frequent orgies of emotional intoxication. Christians after the New Testament pattern would be despicable parasites, and the world wouldn't tolerate them. Happily, all the clergymen on earth will never succeed in persuading their hearers even to attempt to live by grace.

Dr. Watkins is amazed that people "are afraid to trust God with hell," the reverend gentleman himself being quite willing "to trust him with a thousand hells." It would be fully as easy to trust him with ten million hells, for both God and his hells are nothing but theological myths which are ceasing to exert any influence over the modern mind.

The belief in hell is already practically dead, and that in God is dying fast.

The clergy are not so cocksure that the Germans are Atheists as they once were. The Rev. J. H. Shakespeare says: "It is perplexing that a country which has been so largely under the influence of Lutheranism should appear almost unanimously to approve of every possible violation of moral and humane considerations." It is only natural that a minister should find the failure of Christianity a "perplexing" matter.

The Bishop of London has been pouring ridicule on conscientious objectors, and he added that his own conscience was "absolutely at peace." The declaration is not surprising. Does not the bishop enjoy a salary of £200 weekly for preaching the gospel of poverty?

There is a suspicious Catholic flavour in the newspapers, which looks as if the journalists were inspired by propagandist motives. Great prominence is given to all the utterances of the Pope and the leading Cardinals, and even the War-news is tinged with Catholic sentiment. One Sunday newspaper printed a quarter-column account of the destruction of a stone angel outside Rheims Cathedral, and the statue was referred to as a "celestial messenger." And all this happens in a time when space is valuable owing to the paper famine.

The Bishop of Birmingham, who has had his portrait reproduced in the newspapers in full war-paint as an Army chaplain, says Christians go through life as learners, and at the close pass hence with Goethe's cry on their lips, "More light!" Yet, if Christianity be true, more people "pass hence" into the "light" of the everlasting bonfire.

Evangelists have many affinities to South Sea Islanders and other uncivilized people, but it is rare that they give themselves away so completely as Prebendary Carlile. Preaching at Holy Trinity Church, Kingsway, he said they had been very fortunate as regards the number of Church Army huts destroyed by the Germans. "When I say this, however, I should also say, 'Touch wood,'" he added. Yet clergymen are astonished that intelligent people no longer regard them as "pastors and masters."

We clip the following from a review in the Daily Mail of "Papers from Picardy," by two Army Chaplains. The authors are describing how and why some soldiers pray:—

> It is not perhaps a very high type of prayer, it is purely individual, self-centred, and inspired by fear. At one time, especially during the early stages of the war, we heard a great deal about religious revival and a new turning to prayer. There is a story that during a lull in a heavy bombardment a man emerged from a dug-out and shouted inquiries to a neighbouring shelter: "You all right in there, mate?" "Yes, so far, but some of them b—— shells come b—— close." "What have you been doing while it was going on?" "Well, as a matter of fact, we've all been saying our prayers." "So've we—we've been praying like hell."

The majority of soldiers, we imagine, don't even "pray like hell." They simply don't bother about it.

Rev. Andrew Ritchie, of Glasgow, advises that little attention be paid to the thrilling stories of the conversions of soldiers. They are due, he says, "to the inexcusable blindness of the people who told them, or they are pure bunkum." In other words, they are simply not true, and clergymen, such as the Bishop of London and others, when they told their tales were—well, call it romancing. We could use a stronger term, and in business, or politics, or science, or literature, if a man deliberately stated the thing that was not he would be called a liar. But in religion greater latitude is permitted.

English Nonconformity will soon be an American colony. Dr. Newton, of Grand Rapids, Michigan, U.S.A., is now the minister at the City Temple, and Spurgeon's pulpit is occupied by the Rev. Dr. Dixon, another Transatlantic theologian. If this goes on, English Dissenters will be talking the great American language.

The Record has published a first list of signatures it has invited in favour of a Day of National Prayer in connection with the War. Apart from several bishops and other professional defenders of religion, the names include a large number of mayors, who are mostly successful shopkeepers. As Christianity is now a business, the result of the canvass is not surprising.

The members of the Foodstuffs Committee at Ammanford, South Wales, have issued a decree that all persons found working on allotments on Sundays will be prosecuted. The decree is ridiculous and unenforcible, but it is an indication of the mental character of the Committee. We take the information from the South Wales Daily Post, but it sounds as though some one had been pulling the editor's leg.

Another paper, the South Wales Daily Echo, has the following:—

> The Sunday diggers have won a notable victory at the Heath Allotment, Cardiff, where a notice was put up strictly forbidding work on the Sabbath. A Government inspector, so the story goes, visited the scene and gave the authorities twenty-four hours' notice to delete from the board the prohibition command. And they did so quickly.

It is certain that none of these strict Sabbatarians would protest against a battle being fought on a Sunday, or a raid repelled on the Sabbath. Where their own skins, pockets, or stomachs are concerned they are rational enough. It is only when they can do so with immediate safety that their bigotry becomes active.

The head of the American Young Men's Christian Association detachment that has visited England is Dr. Eddy. We wonder if he is related to Mrs. Eddy, the founder of the Christian Science Movement.

The piety of the average pressman is peculiar. The Daily Express says it is "almost incredible that any man can doubt" the story of Adam and Eve. The Express is very slow in matters intellectual.

Mr. Arthur Henderson dubs the Russian Revolution "the greatest miracle since the beginning of the War." The poor angels of Mons have soon been forgotten.

"The War seems to have made everyone braver," says Dr. Wynn Westcott. Always excepting the dear clergy, who prefer to console the girls the soldiers have left behind.

Over 123,000 children were displaced by the military occupation of elementary schools last year, and members of teachers who have joined the Army have been replaced by parsons. No wonder the Bishop of Chelmsford thanks God that the War is going on.

To Correspondents.

W. BROWNLEE (N.Z.).—Thanks. Shall appear.

J. BREESE.—We should be very pleased to publish brief notes from Freethinker readers as to how they first became acquainted with this paper, and its influence upon them. We agree with you they would prove interesting reading. The idea is a capital one. It remains for our readers to carry it out, if they care to.

G. F. DIXON.—Thanks for copy of service. You will see it has been used. We have no doubt that when the time comes for making good the deficit, our friends will rise to the occasion.

G. L.—We quite agree that the pamphlet is a more effective form of propaganda than a book. But pamphlet publishing is not remunerative to either writer or publisher; which, perhaps, explains why it is not more used. But the fact remains, that in all critical struggles the pamphlet has played a great part. And one may add, it does so still.

S. L. INES.—We do not hesitate to say that the really important obstacle to Freethought propaganda in many places is the inactivity of Freethinkers. There must be at least three million Freethinkers in this country. Just imagine what might be done if only fifty per cent. made up their mind to do something. Instead of a constant anxiety, the work would then be child's play.

G. H. GRAINGER.—We should have no great objection to anyone using the word "God" to cover admiration of an ideal, so long as conditions did not ensure its being utilized for very different purposes. But it is quite plain to us that with all its historic associations, and its significance to the general mind, "God" is bound to be taken in a theological, and not a social, sense. We are glad to have from a new reader an impression of the "sincerity, courage, and ability" displayed in the Freethinker.

A. MCCLEAN.—Pleased to hear from an old attendant at Freethought meetings. We should be pleased to have a chat one day with the gentleman you name.

J. H. WATERS.—Thanks. See "Acid Drops."

H. TAYLOR.—We have heard before of W. R. Bradlaugh's tale of the recantation of Charles Bradlaugh on his death-bed. We should say that anyone who pays attention to what he says is almost past redemption. Some people are content to lie about the living. Others, of less courage, prefer to select dead men as the subjects of their mendacity.

M. DESHUMBERT.—We are pleased to render assistance to any movement which promises benefit towards the rationalizing of life and the benefit of mankind.

H. O. ROGER.—It may be that what you call "real Christianity" we should not call Christianity at all. At any rate, we are only concerned with the Christianity with which the world is troubled. And that this has been an evil there is no doubt whatever.

R. C.—Pleased to see letter in reply to Mr. Runciman. This is exactly the kind of thing that we want to see done generally, and done systematically.

J. A. REID.—See "Views and Opinions." Thanks.

J. HUDSON.—We don't know of the firm referred to as having been bombed. The Freethinker office escaped, perhaps "Providence" intervened.

E. W. DATEN (Warrall).—We are quite willing to insert a brief and pertinent reply to Mr. Mann's articles. Of course, "brief" is used with due regard to the length of Mr. Mann's criticism of Spiritualism.

H. J. BAYLIS (Twickenham).—Shall appear as early as possible.

J. SMITHIE.—The Army Council Instruction No. 179, January, 1916, makes it quite clear that a soldier's statement as to his religion must be taken down without comment, or any attempt to influence him. If a soldier insists upon being entered as a Monist, Athcist, Agnostic, or Freethinker, he must be entered as such. If the order is quoted, the officer will doubtless give way.

F. HAVES-JAMES.—You are probably correct in assuming that the prohibition of discussions on religion in the barrack-room where your son is stationed is due to parsonic uneasiness. We suppose the responsible people are within their rights in making the order, but it is indicative of many things.

J. BURRELL.—We have no fund to defray the cost of sending the Freethinker weekly to the old Secularists you name, and who are unable to purchase it. But we should regret their going without it, and if you will send us on their names and addresses we will see they are sent. The Bowman Report will be republished, as will also Mr. Mann's articles. Thanks for other items of information.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Those who have taken to heart the advice offered for several weeks past at the foot of the "Acid Drops" column will be pleased to learn that their efforts have already borne fruit. There is again a distinctly upward move in our circulation, and although it is not much at the moment, we believe it will grow. We are sure it will, if the advice we have given is followed. Unfortunately, every gain is soon swallowed up by increased cost of production; but one day we ought to reap the reward of all our struggles. Meanwhile, we thank most heartily those who have been working to secure new readers.

At last the London County Council has made a move in connection with its unwarranted prohibition of the sale of literature in the parks. Mr. J. Neate, Secretary of the Bethnal Green Branch of the N.S.S., has been served with three summonses for having sold the Freethinker on three particular dates. The summonses are returnable on Wednesday, June 20, and as we are writing on Tuesday, the 19th, we are unable to say more than that Mr. Neate will be legally represented at the court. We shall have more to say next week. There is also another matter connected with the law with which we may have something to say at the same time.

The new Swansea and District Branch of the N.S.S., started by Mr. Cohen last winter, has mapped out a very ambitious programme for the forthcoming season, and the "saints" evidently mean to spare no effort in making the Branch a success. We have great hopes ourselves of the Movement in South Wales, and should like to see Cardiff and other neighbouring places showing greater activity. Other places in the country also ought to be soon considering what are the possibilities for the winter of 1917-18.

Enquiries have been received at the N.S.S. office from individuals in the neighbourhoods of Clapham and Battersea, Wood Green, Hammersmith, Shepherd's Bush, and Marylebone, as to the prospects of forming Branches of the N.S.S. at these places. If all those interested in the matter will write Miss Vance, the General Secretary, she will place them in communication, and a start may be made. Those willing to assist may give either moral or financial support, or both—the latter is, of course, preferable.

Mr. L. E. Tate, of 13 Brookhill Road, Plumstead, is anxious to form a Branch of the N.S.S. in Woolwich and district. Will all Freethinkers who are willing to co-operate please communicate with Mr. Tate. A preliminary meeting could then be arranged.

We bring to a close in this issue our report of the judgment in the Bowman case. This has been a full but not a verbatim report. The verbatim report will be issued by the Secular Society, Limited, at as early a date as is possible, and we anticipate a brisk demand for copies. It is a most important deliverance, and marks the opening of a new chapter in the long story of the fight for freedom of thought. In order to make the publication complete, the Board of Directors has asked Mr. Cohen, and he has agreed, to write an introduction giving a history of the case, with a survey of the general question of "blasphemy" and the position of Freethought as affected by the House of Lords' judgment. The whole will form a work which no Freethinker ought to be without.

We are glad to see that the Sheffield and District Small Traders are defying the attempt of local Sabbatarians to enforce Sunday closing. They have ordered all their members to open their shops as usual, and are calling a mass meeting to protest against this exhibition of "religious hypocrisy."

The Twilight of the Gods.

THAT man makes his gods is by this time a truth resting on a solid pedestal of scientific induction. But he who makes can also unmake. And if the story of god-making is interesting, that of god-unmaking, in past and present history, is equally so.

It is an incomplete view which ascribes the unmaking of gods solely to the progress of reason. Human nature in the mass is less influenced by reason than by instinct. If reason were the only factor, gods would have been abolished altogether, whereas we see that in history the gods of old have vanished, only to give place to the Trinity, the saints, or Mahomet—each of these being scarcely more or less rational than the others.

The supersession of one god by another is due to changes in human society itself. Primitive man, as Sir J. G. Frazer has shown, deifies such forces of nature as affect him most and seem most to need propitiation. In the climate of Europe, the supreme god was the personification of the sky and weather, Zeus or Jupiter or Woden. Other gods, again, were personifications or alleged ancestors of the tribe or people that worshipped them. Worship was everywhere a State function, designed to propitiate and enlist the support of the gods for the particular city or kingdom. Their existence was self-evident; anyone who denied, to an old Greek, that Zeus existed, would be met with the query: "Who rains, then?" Nevertheless, from the sixth century B.C. onward, the Greek gods were subject among the educated classes to a constant flow of criticism. From Xenophanes to Lucian, over 700 years, various schools of philosophy held up to contempt the myths which, originally descriptive of operations of nature, looked grotesque or indecent when narrated of quasi-human personalities. This rationalist spirit had its root in social development. The spread of trade and colonization, the opening of the Egyptian markets to Greeks in the seventh century B.C., and the increase of travel and intercourse which followed the Persian Wars, enabled wealthy and educated Greeks to compare their religion with others, and in many cases to see the absurdity of them all. This enlightenment was confined to a section of the well-to-do, and did not affect the masses of the population.

Economic development had another result, in breaking up the old political and moral basis of society. The old city-state was formed by the aggregation of a few tribes for mutual protection, the tribes being primitive social groups based on assumed kinship between the members of each. The real and supposed interests of the tribe or city were the mainspring of ancient ethics. But trade, by increasing the wealth of individuals, and war, by subjecting one city to another and by multiplying slave-labour, drove a fatal wedge into this solidarity of interest, so that the fifth century B.C. found prevailing a wide opposition of interest between rich and poor, landed and industrial classes, and individuals in the same class. The conquests of Alexander the Great, and later of Rome, completed the moral disintegration of the ancient world, by destroying the political independence of the cities, and finally substituting a cosmopolitan society based on slave-industry for the old, narrow, social groups based on free agriculture.

In the absence of any visible bond of interest between different classes and individuals, philosophers sought a theoretical basis of conduct in two directions. Some, like the Epicureans and the early Stoics, attempted to show that right conduct was actually the way in which the individual could get the best out of life. Others, e.g., the Platonists, identified the moral sense of man with reason, and reason with the divine nature, and sought the right aim of life in the triumph of this over the natural man, believing that after the death of the natural man the rational part of him would enjoy eternal life in company with the Deity. This belief was linked up with the teaching of the "mysteries," originally ceremonies connected with the old nature-worships, but now, owing to the rise of the new ideas, professing to sanctify the individual and fit him for eternal life. Various primitive and local cults, such as those of Demeter and Dionysus in Greece, Isis and Osiris in Egypt, and Mithras in Persia, were diffused through the Mediterranean world in the final melting down of ancient society, and made alike to serve these philosophical doctrines.

Christian historians, on account of the affinity between these doctrines and their own, have taken for granted that the mystical and Platonic theories were morally superior, and more calculated to serve the best interests of man, than the Epicurean philosophy; and the latter has, by a sort of pious conspiracy, been represented as selfish, sensual, and shallow. The name of Lucretius alone ought to be taken as a refutation of this. The Epicureans were as much in earnest, and did as good service, in attacking the absurdities and immoralities of ancient religion as the Stoics or Platonists, and they were far more uncompromising in their hostility to it. Their atomistic metaphysics were inadequate as a reading of the riddle of the universe, though even in this they anticipated modern science in some respects. The morality of the Epicureans, in any case, was not sensual, was no more selfish or shallow than that of their detractors, and was much more rational and practical. It is impossible to read the good sense of Lucretius or Lucian without feeling the tragedy that such sound, humane doctrines should have been supplanted in the minds of men by the theosophical slush of Neo-Platonism and the lurid fanaticism of Christianity.

While these developments occurred in the ideas of the unofficial world, the official religion had become crystallized in the forms handed down from the old city-state regime. Down to the first century B.C., indeed, the decline of civic solidarity, and the rationalistic movement, had tended to bring the old forms of worship into disuse, at least so far as the educated were concerned. The attacks of Lucretius excited no resentment among the governing classes at Rome. In the last resort, however, every established government tends to be conservative in religion. Even cults which are not seriously believed in are upheld as useful instruments of government. In the reign of Augustus, the Roman ruling classes began to be appalled at the prevailing tendency to commercialism, cosmopolitanism, and utilitarianism. A serious effort was made to re-establish order, regenerate the Roman aristocracy, enforce marriage on the well-to-do, and revive the old forms of religion. From henceforth the policy of the Government was one of religious conservation. (History repeats itself; in the same way modern governments, consisting largely of individuals who are indifferent or irreligious, none the less support the Established Church, maintain religious education, and enforce the Blasphemy Laws!)

Nothing, however, can, in the long run, protect a religion which has become meaningless to the majority, against movements which, in one way or another, express their aspirations. In country districts where the old agricultural society still persisted against the competition of the great slave-worked estates, the old worships might still have life in them. But among the masses of the urban commercial centres, such as Alexandria, Antioch, Corinth, and Rome itself, among the small artizans, freedmen, slaves, and indigent paupers, who formed the bulk of the population, the new "mystery" religions flourished. These were classes without social and political interests, to whom religions that promised eternal rewards for good conduct and compensations for suffering endured in this life, would naturally appeal. Some were attracted by the mysteries of Isis, others by those of Mithras, others became proselytes to Judaism. When Christianity appeared, an amalgam of elements derived from all these, it was bound to prove a formidable competitor. The exclusiveness and intolerance which it borrowed from Judaism, while in some respects a handicap, in the end helped to secure its triumph.

ROBERT ARCH.

Disillusioned.

HE was a young man who took a very keen interest in the work of the Church. His parents before him had both been connected with the same church, and as soon as he was able he attended the Sunday-school. When he grew older he joined the Bible class. He noticed quite a number of the lads put nothing into the plate at the door on entering. The subscriptions were very small indeed.

It occurred to this young man one day to make a suggestion regarding the collections. He suggested that instead of leaving the subscriptions to the tender mercies of the plate, a ladle or offertory bag should be passed around the Bible class. This suggestion met with the approval of the minister and was adopted forthwith.

Instead of five shillings, which was usually the average previously, thirty, thirty-five, and forty shillings was now obtained.

At the end of the year, after paying all expenses, a considerable surplus existed. Our young man, who was responsible for the surplus, was endowed with a good supply of the milk of human kindness. The funds of one of the local infirmaries had been depleted very much of late, so our young man thought the surplus of the Bible class should be handed over to the treasurer of the local infirmary, and at the meeting of the Bible class committee he moved accordingly. The minister was otherwise minded. He thought the surplus should be handed over to the "Aged and Infirm Ministers' Scheme." Our young man tried to point out to the minister that they, as a committee, had the right to disburse the money they had raised in any way they thought proper. The minister was adamant and wouldn't yield on the point. The "Aged and Infirm Ministers' Scheme" was the most laudable object that any church money could be given to. Our young man was beaten on the point. He began to consider why should he and his like, who were making very small wages, have to give money to the ministers, who, while they were young men, were making eight or ten times more money than he ever did.

Having made a start with his enquiries, he continued enquiring ever since. The result was the usual kind of ending to the enquiring mind. He does not now go to church, Sunday-school, or Bible class. He attends all the Freethought meetings within his reach. He reads the Freethinker every week, likewise the many other Freethought publications. In fact he is one of the most ardent Freethinkers in his district.

YELSIAP.

My memories of the ring go back to the great day when Sayers fought Heenan, and the man who beat the Benicia Boy was the idol of England. I was a small boy at the Preparatory School for Young Gentlemen at Eastbourne at the time, but another boy—a good little boy—told me all about it. He had asked permission to go upstairs to his bedroom half an hour earlier than usual, in order that he might devote himself to pious meditation. That night, as we lay in our little beds in the dormitory, the good little boy told me all about the great fight. He had in some way got hold of a copy of Bell's Life with a full report in it, and it was in order to read Bell's Life in the privacy of the unoccupied dormitory that he had sought the opportunity of an extra half-hour for pious meditation.—George R. Sims, "My Life."

Death of Mr. Julian Gould.

THE sympathy of all our readers will be extended to Mr and Mrs. F. J. Gould on the death of their only son, Julian, who was killed in action in France on May 31. Julian Gould was twenty-five years of age, a young man of great promise, and an artist from whom much was hoped. He joined the Army in May, 1915, and went out to France in November of the same year. The loss of so gifted a young man brings out once more the fearful drain made by the War upon the best life of the world. So much evil done in the death, so much good lost to the race in the dying. We are quite sure that whatever comfort Mr. and Mrs. Gould may derive from the knowledge that very many others count themselves as fellow-mourners, will be theirs in full and generous measure.

v.
Secular Society, Limited.

(LORD BUCKMASTER—concluded from p. 382.)

THIS objection is stated by Mr. Talbot (to whom I am much indebted for his research and the matter and manner of his argument) by saying that such doctrine offends, in the first case, against the common law, which prohibits blasphemy. He regards the essence of legal blasphemy as the publication of matter denying or hostile to the Christian faith, and he rejects the interpretation put upon it by Mr. Justice Erskine, by Lord Chief Justice Denman, and by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, each of whom state the law so as to limit the offence to the act of denial associated with ribald, contumelious, or scurrilous language or conduct. I am unable to accept the Appellants' contention as correct. To do so would involve the conclusion that all adverse critical examination of the doctrines of Christianity—even though it was conducted with the utmost reverence—was a blasphemous publication which rendered the writer liable to criminal proceedings. It would, indeed, be hard to find a worse service that could be done to the Christian faith than to prevent people from explaining and inviting an answer to the reasoned convictions that led them to question its truth.

The common law which forbids blasphemy is to be gathered from usage and custom, and it is a striking fact that, with one possible exception—the case of R. v. Woolston—every reported case upon the matter, beginning with R. v. Taylor, and continuing down to R. v. Ramsey and R. v. Boulter, is a case where the offence alleged was associated with, and I think constituted by, violent offensive, or indecent words. That it was considered necessary to report the earlier cases as precedents affords, to my mind, a strong presumption that it was the character of the attack which constituted the crime, for if the law was well recognized as forbidding any adverse criticism, the cases where such criticism was coarse and disgraceful would be too plain to merit preservation. In my opinion, therefore, the Common Law of England does not render criminal the mere propagation of doctrines hostile to the Christian faith. The crime consists in the manner in which the doctrines are advocated, and whether in each case this is a crime is a question for the jury, who should be directed, in the words of Mr. Justice Erskine in Shore v. Wilson, quoted by the Master of the Rolls in his judgment on the present case.

It is then said that, even if this be conceded, the object of the Society is illegal, not in the sense that acts done to further its objects would be criminal, but that they are of such a nature as to be incapable of establishing a legal right to receive money for their furtherance. I find it difficult to appreciate this distinction, but I understand the contention to be that Christianity is part of the Common Law of England, and it must, therefore, be illegal, even if it were not criminal, for any body of people to promote doctrines that are hostile to its creed. If this argument be carried to its full extent, it will really show that Unitarians, Positivists, Comtists, and other similar religious and ethical bodies, unless relieved by statute, are illegal associations for the Christianity known to the Common Law is certainly not Unitarian Christianity, nor is it reconcilable with the doctrines of Comte or Hegel. Again, it would result that editors and publishers would be able to deny payment to contributors and authors whom they had expressly employed to write philosophical and scientific articles or books if it could be decided that the work was anti-Christian, while no one could be compelled to pay for any such books when purchased. Indeed, the doctrine, as it seems to me, would apply to a great deal of classical and scientific literature, and the conditions which would condemn these works might vary from year to year as different views from time to time prevailed. It is quite right to point out that, if the law be as the Appellants contend, these considerations afford an argument for its alteration, but do not prove that it does not exist. If, on the other hand, the law is not clear, it is certainly in accordance with the best precedents so to express it that it may stand in agreement with the judgment of reasonable men.

Apart from the criminal cases already mentioned, certain authorities are referred to which, if correctly decided, do appear to afford support for the Appellants' argument. The case of De Costa v. De Paz, a decision of Lord Hardwicke's —is one of these authorities; and the Master of Bedford's Charity, is a decision of Lord Eldon's, containing statements to the same effect, and so also is the case of Briggs v. Hartley. The first of these was a gift for the purpose of providing a fund to be applied for ever for the reading of the Jewish law, and for advancing and propagating the Jewish faith. It was certainly open to argument that this was not a charitable bequest, and was consequently void as a perpetuity. But it was not upon this ground that the decision was based; it was held that it was a charity (see the report in Ambler, p. 228), but that the mode of disposition was such that it could not take effect. It is true that in the Report in 2 Swans the reason why the gift to the specific object of the charity was held imperative was because it was contrary to the Christian religion, but in Ambler it is stated that the objects were contrary to the "established" religion, and as at that date the statutory disabilities under which the adherents of the Jewish faith suffered had not been removed, this might have been sufficient for the purpose of the case; indeed, on any other view, it is hard to understand why it was supported as a charity at all. I do not, however, propose further to pursue this question, as I have had the advantage of reading Lord Parker's opinion, and with it I am in entire agreement. The second case was merely a question as to whether Jews might enjoy the benefits of a particular charity, and it was held they might not. The last was a legacy for the best essay on Natural Theology treated as a science, and sufficient when so treated and taught to constitute a true perfect and philosophical system of universal religion; and it was held bad for no further reason than that it was not consistent with Christianity, but the law was in no way examined or criticized.

In the two earlier cases it was stated that Christianity is part of the law of the land, and the authorities quoted in support of the proposition are the cases of R. v. Taylor and R. v. Woolston; but the pronouncements of Lord Hale and Lord Raymond in these cases must be taken in reference to the subject-matter of the case which, in one instance, certainly, and in the other, possibly, was a prosecution for scurrilous blasphemy.

If the reasons for the decision in De Costa v. De Paz were those urged by the Appellants, I should not regard them as correct. If a gift to endow any body that propagates doctrines hostile to the generally accepted view of the Christian religion was at any time contrary to the Common Law, it is, in my opinion, contrary at the present time, and gifts to Unitarians and similar religious bodies for the support and endowment of their religious faith are now void. It is urged in answer to this that the position with regard to Unitarians, as also with regard to Jews, is altered by two Statutes—the one 53 Geo. III. cap., 160, and the other 9 and 10 Vic. cap. 59. I am unable to accept this view. The statutory position appears to me to be plain. By the Act of 1 William and Mary cap. 18 (generally known as the Toleration Act) it is provided that no penalties shall apply to any person dissenting from the Church of England that shall take the oaths that are specified in 1 William and Mary cap. 1, and in 30 Car. II. st. 2, and accept the Articles of Religion, excepting Articles 34, 35, and 36, and certain words of the 20th Article. But Papists and those denying the doctrines of the Blessed Trinity, as declared in the said Articles of Religion, are omitted from the protection of this Statute. The penalties from which this Statute grants relief are statutory penalties and disabilities, and it left the Common Law exactly what it was.

The Act known as the Blasphemy Act—9 and 10 William III., Cap. 32, is really an Act directed against apostates from the Christian faith, and that Act again provides certain penalties, cumulative and severe on second conviction, for any person who, having been educated in, or, at any time, having made profession of the Christian religion within this Realm shall by writing or advised speaking deny any one of the Persons of the Holy Trinity to be God, or who shall assert that there are more Gods than one, or shall deny the Christian religion to be true. This is a disabling Statute still unrepealed, imposing penalties so severe that it is said no prosecution has ever been instituted under its provisions. Its terms, therefore, demand the narrowest and most jealous scrutiny. The fact that it has only incidentally been brought under judicial notice may explain the loose and, as I think, erroneous references made to its effect, as, for example, by Lord Lyndhurst, in Shore v. Wilson (9 Cl. and Fin., p. 355, at p. 397), where he says that "those persons who by preaching denied the doctrine of the Trinity are subject to the penalties of the Act," and, again, by Lord Bramwell, in Cowan v. Milburn. This is not accurate; only those persons who have been educated in, or had at any time made profession of the Christian religion within the Realm could incur the statutory penalties.

The Act 53 Geo. III. cap. 160 repeals so much of the Toleration Act as provides that the exemption of the Statute shall not extend so as to give its advantage or benefit to persons denying the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity, and for the purpose of making this exemption effectual it repeals as far as was necessary 9 and 10 William III. cap. 32. The Statute of 9 and 10 Vic. ca. 59 (the Religious Disabilities Act, 1846), provided that persons professing the Jewish religion shall, in respect of their schools, places of religious worship, educational and charitable purposes, and property held by them, be subject to the same laws as His Majesty's Protestant subjects who dissent from the Church of England. This means that they are freed from all disabilities imposed by Statute and open to all existing at Common Law. This is the view expressly stated by Lord Eldon in Attorney General v. Pearson, and is in agreement with the decisions in Rex. v. Carlile and Rex. v. Waddington.

So far as holding property is concerned, Jews are to be regarded as being in the same position as His Majesty's Protestant subjects who dissent from the Church of England. This must be taken to mean that they can hold property; for the Common Law—whatever its scope—did not specially safeguard what we now know as the Established Church, but the Christian faith. And there was never anything, apart from statutory disabilities to prevent Protestant Dissenters from holding property. Of course while any particular belief was made the subject of penalty by Statute, a gift to further the purpose of that belief would be contrary to the Statute Law; but when once the Statutory disability was removed, unless some disability could be found outside, there could be nothing to hinder the gift of money for the purpose of any such association.

It is this that explains the decision in the case of West v. Shuttleworth, which was a decision on the Statute in relief of Roman Catholics similar to that in relief of Jews (2 and 3 William IV. c. 115). "Now the Roman Catholic religion—whatever views may be taken of the Reformation—was certainly never contrary to the Common Law; and, therefore, when once the Statutory Prohibitions were taken away, the receipt of money for the general purpose of their faith was not forbidden. In the case of Shrewsbury v. Hornby, a gift in support of Unitarian doctrine was held good, and it is suggested that this was because 53 Geo. III. c. 160 repealed the Common Law so far as it affected Protestant ministers.

I am unable to find that the Statute effects this purpose. If by implication any part of the Common Law is repealed, there would appear to be no particular reason why it should be repealed so as to allow a special class of Protestant Dissenters—but not other people—to deny the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. It would, indeed, be strange if the publication of a book, or the delivery of a lecture would be legal or illegal according to the religious opinion of the person who wrote it, and not according to its contents. If any repeal at all had been effected by these Acts, it would, in my opinion, have been the repeal of the whole doctrine had it ever existed; but the true view in my judgment is that it did not exist. The Common Law throughout remains unaffected, and I cannot find any case where, as a necessary step in the decision, it is enunciated in terms as wide as are necessary to support the appellant's case. For example, in Thompson v. Thompson, it was held that a gift will be supported for the encouragement of the general doctrines advocated in a testator's writings if neither atheism, sedition, nor any crime or immorality is to be inculcated. Again, in Harrison v. Evans, Lord Mansfield defined the Common Law in these terms: "There was never a single instance from Saxon times down to our own in which a man was ever punished for erroneous opinions concerning rites and modes of worship but upon some positive law. The Common Law of England, which is only common reason or usage, knows of no prosecution for mere opinions. For atheism, blasphemy, and reviling the Christian religion there have been persons prosecuted and punished upon the Common Law." It is unnecessary to determine whether and under what circumstances the promulgation of atheism is illegal, for by atheism in this connection I understand a disbelief in one eternal and invisible God, and I have already stated my views that the Respondents' objects do not properly include the advocacy of such a doctrine. Blasphemy is constituted by violent and gross language and the phrase "reviling the Christian religion" shows that without vilification there is no offence.

I am glad to think that this opinion is supported by the carefully considered and weighty utterances of many learned judges. The case of Shore and Wilson in its actual result depended upon a question of construction of deeds of trust and upon special facts, and so regarded the decision could have but little application to other disputes; but when the case was before this House the opinions of the Judges were taken on certain questions, and the sixth question was this: "Whether such (i.e., Unitarian) Ministers, preachers widows, and persons are in the present state of the law incapable of partaking of such charities or any and which of them." Mr. Justice Erskine (p. 525), Mr. Justice Coleridge (p. 539), Mr. Justice Maule (p. 509), Mr. Justice Williams (p. 545), Baron Gurney (p. 554), Baron Parke (p. 565), Lord Chief Justice Tindal (p. 578), all agreed in thinking that they were not. It is true that Mr. Justice Coleridge based his opinion upon the ground that Unitarians were Christians, but Mr. Justice Maule stated that there was no authority to show that teaching Unitartan doctrine was contrary to the Common Law, and Mr. Justice Erskine stated that it was open to any man "without subjecting himself to any penal consequences soberly and reverently to examine and question the truth of those doctrines which have been assumed as essential to the Christian faith." There is, indeed, to be found in certain of these opinions indications of the view expressed in R. v. Woolston, that it is not illegal to deny any doctrine of the Christian faith, but that it is to deny them all collectively. I cannot accept this view of the law. The Christianity, offences against which are illegal at Common Law, is the Christianity known to the Common Law, and Unitarian Christianity is opposed to the central doctrine of this faith.

I have only to add that, apart altogether from these considerations, I think that the Respondents are well founded in arguing that since the Company is a legal entity, and as some at least of its objects are on the face of them lawful, there is no ground upon which it is possible to prevent them from receiving money which has been the subject of a bequest in their favour. I cannot accede to the argument that the later purposes in the Memorandum, which taken alone must be regarded as proper and lawful objects, become unlawful because they are associated with the first purpose of the Memorandum. If an unequivocal Act be lawful in itself, the motive with which it is performed is immaterial; and if it be said that all the later purposes are the instruments by which the first purpose may be effected, this, as it seems to me, may be an argument for showing that the first purpose is lawful, but it cannot establish that the later purposes are not. Even if all the objects of the Company were illegal, it would not follow that while the certificate of incorporation remained unrevoked, the Company would be unable to receive money. It is a mistake to treat the Company as a trustee, for it has no beneficiaries, and there is no difference between the capacity in which it receives a gift and that in which it obtains payment of a debt. In either case the money can only be used for the purposes of the Company, and in neither case is the money held on trust. If, by oversight or mistake, a Company were incorporated for wholly illegal objects, the right course to follow, where its capacity to receive money were questioned in legal proceedings, would be to direct an adjournment till proper steps had been taken to revoke the incorporation. This matter has been so fully dealt with by Lord Parker, with whose views I entirely agree, that I do not desire to elaborate it further. For these reasons I am of opinion that this Appeal should be dismissed.

A QUESTION OF STYLE; HEBERT AND THE FREETHINKER.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I can see no reason why I should be asked to dispute, at any rate, in this place, the historical value of Pere Duchesne, which, I admit, has the authority of intelligent observation of contemporary events. I fancy that Mr. Farmer has forgotten that this was not the subject of my letter. I must here remind him that an ipse dixit even from him is not above suspicion; and here, too, the question is not one of opinion, but of fact. I say, again, with all the emphasis warranted by a recent study of Pere Duchesne, that even the mere suggestion of a comparison between Hebert's style and that of the Freethinker is as ignorant as it is foolish.

The right thing for Mr. Farmer to do would be to confess that he has made a bad blunder, and to leave it at that. However, instead of doing the right thing, he asks me to waste my time in transcribing a dozen or so pages in French for you to print, thus wasting your space, and asking you to run the risk of a prosecution for obscenity. Now, if he is anxious to get at the truth, he can easily have a copy made for a few shillings by a professional transcriber. But this is no concern of mine. It is surely his business to support his statement when it is challenged, and not to run away from it.

GEO. UNDERWOOD.

SOCIALIST SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In your Freethinker of this week you mention a discussion going on in the Glasgow Herald concerning the character of Socialist Sunday-schools. I can quite understand the enemies of the schools keen to prove that teaching is quite materialistic in tone. It sounds bad to the ordinary person, and that is what the enemies of Socialist Sunday-schools want. The words of the champions of the Sunday-schools are absolutely incorrect. I, myself, a Freethinker of twenty-five years' standing, happen to be Secretary of The Hampstead Garden Suburb Socialist Sunday-school, and the name Jesus has never been mentioned. I will write you out the Declaration which the children repeat every Sunday, so that you can judge for yourself the character of the teaching:—

DECLARATION.

We desire to be just and loving to all our fellow-men and women.

To work together as Brothers and Sisters.

Digitized by Google

To be kind to every living creature.

And so help to form a new Society with Justice as its foundation.

And love its law.

Perhaps you will be interested to learn that amongst our S.S.S. children are Joseph McCabe's three little ones.

The superintendent is a Freethinker. So are pretty nearly all the parents of the children. I myself have had my six children exempt all along from religious teaching in the day schools, and my son, who is a C.O., was refused exemption at the local and appeal tribunals on the grounds that as he belonged to no religious organization he could not possibly possess a conscience. We have taken in the Freethinker for over twenty-five years, and often came in contact with Mr. Foote and yourself, although you would not remember us. The last time I saw you was at Mr. Foote's Memorial Service. We all wish you the best of success with the Freethinker, and I will end by saying that to have a good, sound, moral conviction of what is right and what is wrong is far higher and better than all the drivelling rubbish the parsons would try to cram down one's throat.

(MRS.) E. SMITH.

Another New Battle Song.

(With Apologies to "John Brown's Body.")

IN the brains of cleric humbugs, who should go across the sea,
There's a stunt about the "Saviour" that quite staggers you and me,
As they lie to make men truthful! Let us cry to make men free,
That Cant goes marching on!

There's much talk about war's horror, and the "Saviour," you'll agree,
And we, who know old Humbug well, are smelling knavery,
As the bishops' lisp of battle—let us tell humanity—
That Cant goes marching on!

The Churches all will tell you how our "Saviour" gave the key,
How he "died to save all sinners"—Kaiser Bill, and you, and me;
But now this "Saviour" saves us with the Field Artillery!
And Cant goes marching on!

In the blood-mire of the trenches Christ was gassed across the sea,
With a grenade in his bosom that "transfigures" Fritz and me!
As Christ "died to make men holy"—let us state to make men free,
That Cant goes marching on!

The "Church's one foundation" is a maze of roguery,
They twist about like slimy eels with great agility;
So, after all, Freethinkers, its for folk like us to see—
That Truth goes marching on!

ARTHUR F. THORN.

So far as science or a rational conception of things is concerned, the fathers of the Church and the framers of our popular theology were mere children. Considerations were all-powerful with them, which to-day would not have a feather's weight with a man of ordinary intelligence. Children readily, even eagerly, believe almost any impossible thing you may tell them about nature. As yet, they have no insight into the course of nature or the law of cause and effect, no fund of experience to serve as a touchstone to the false or impossible. The same was true of the fathers and of the races that witnessed the advent of Christianity.....mere children so far as the development of their scientific faculties were concerned.—John Burroughs.

The village had organized an entertainment for the delectation of the local asylum. The inmates listened stolidly, and when the programme was ended, the vicar asked one of the unfortunates how he had enjoyed it. "Ah, weel, sir," said the looney, with a beautiful smile, "it's a good thing that we're daft here!"

Views and Opinions.

The Massacre of the Innocents.

On June 20 eighteen little children, their ages ranging from four to eleven years, were buried in a cemetery in the East of London. They were the victims, from one school, of the recent air-raid, killed—murdered is, perhaps, the better term—in the course of a War in which the name of God has been freely used by the chief nations engaged therein. It was certainly one of the saddest, if not one of the most impressive incidents of the War. They had done nothing, they could do nothing to gain the ill-will of anyone. It was not even true, as was said by the Mayor of Poplar, that "they died for England." That was pure cant. How could they be said to die for anyone or anything? They were the innocent unresisting victims of man's lust for slaughter, of a militarism which so many, to their shame, have done so much by pen and voice to cover with a fictitious greatness and glory, and so hide its inherent and inescapable brutality from the gaze of men. Of all the cowardly—we use the word advisedly—games in which man engages, war, modern war, is the worst. The deaths of these eighteen little children prove it as such.

Real Blasphemy.

Naturally a religious service was held over the dead children. That, in itself, would not call for notice. The parents, doubtless, desired it, and no Freethinker would deny it them much as he might disapprove. But common sense, even common decency, certainly ordinary intelligence, might have selected a little different service to the one arranged. I do not know how many hymns were sung, but the Times report mentions some that are startling in their allusiveness. Here are three of them:—

> "There's a Friend for Little Children."
> "Loving Shepherd of thy Sheep."
> "O God, Our Help in Ages Past."

Is it possible to conceive titles better calculated to make the scornful smile, the flippant jeer, or to even make stricken parents curse at the mockery of a child's friend, or a loving shepherd, who could stand idly by while this massacre of the innocents was proceeding? If there is such an offence as blasphemy then this is a genuine case. If the feelings of believers are not outraged at the terrible irony of hymns such as those sung over the graves of those dead children, they ought for ever to give up the pretence that they are hurt by anything that could be said by a Freethinker.

Sheep or Jackass?

The two first-named hymns are, we are told, favourites with children. I do not know whether this is the case or not, but if it is so, it does not lessen the irony of the situation. Think of hundreds of children singing of their "Friend" above, of the "Loving Shepherd" who guards them, and in a moment a number of them lying mangled corpses because of the ineffectiveness or carelessness of their friend and shepherd! A friend who cannot befriend, a shepherd who cannot guard his sheep, a God who does nothing, or who can do nothing, a Deity as ineffective as the paint-besmeared wooden idol of a South Sea savage, and his worshippers without the justification of the savage for believing in him. No wonder the clergy struggle to keep religion in the schools; no wonder they realize that if religion is not forced upon the mind in its immaturity it is hopeless to make the attempt later. One marvels at the insensitiveness of the clergy in selecting these hymns for such an occasion. One wonders at the type of mind that could listen to them without open resentment. Only one expression is at all appropriate to the situation. The believers in the heavenly friend are likened to sheep. That is apt, although even here an animal with longer ears and a louder voice spontaneously offers itself to the mind.

An Idle God.

Directly after the air-raid, thousands of people were asking, "What were the authorities doing not to have prevented such a disaster?" If that question is pertinent, asked of men who suffer under all the limitations of human nature, is it not infinitely more pertinent to ask, "What was God doing that he did not prevent it?" There are few men or women who would not cheerfully have given their lives to have saved those children. And the man who could have saved them and did not would certainly have been lynched. What, then, was God doing? We have had many stories of God's activities since the War commenced. He has "miraculously" preserved wooden wayside crosses in France and Belgium. He has "providentially" protected certain churches in England from air-raids. He has been asked publicly to promote the growth of potatoes on allotments. Why did he not exert the same protective influence over schools? It would have been so easy to Omnipotence, so congenial to genuine fatherly love for children. Perhaps the explanation lies in the third hymn—"O God, Our Help in Ages Past." His help was in the past; it is idle to expect it in the present. He helped in the past; and the God who could work miracles for half-mad prophets and unwashed saints can do nothing to protect the lives of little children to-day. Very well, then; God's activity belongs to the past; he is a relic of the past, and it is often the wisest policy to bury the past and have done with it. It is certainly so in this case.

An Impeachment of Deity.

Those eighteen dead bodies form an unanswerable indictment of German ruthlessness. But they are equally an indictment of the indifference, or the callousness, or the impotence of Deity. And why should anyone be surprised at that? Is it not of a piece with what we see elsewhere? In this country, with its churches and chapels, and thousands of parsons and millions of Bibles, there are many thousands of cases of ill-treatment of children every year. God does nothing to stop that. It is a human organization which does all the work. And if man be blamed for these cases, well, there are hundreds of thousands of children born into the world cursed with the legacy of physical and mental disease, and God does nothing to remedy that. The "Friend for Little Children" is as impotent here as elsewhere. The "Loving Shepherd" does as little for his sheep here as elsewhere. The disaster at that East End school does not, after all, stand apart from the rest of life; it is in harmony with it. God does nothing. That is the lesson of the disaster. God is as invisible to sense as he is to sight. These eighteen dead bodies are a proof. These are the irrefutable evidence of the almost criminal stupidity of a religion which can set children singing of the loving care and protection of a Heavenly Father, and in the presence of their dead bodies has the supreme audacity to sing hymns which are an outrage on human decency and intelligence.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Reformation in England.

IT is universally admitted that "under the name of Christianity and the Christian Church, human weakness and perversity have created repulsive systems of self-torture, of tyranny, and injurious repression," and that "every kind of insanity and imposture, the most sordid ambition and the vilest cruelty and lust, have made use of this as of many other religions." Some apologists, however, are convinced that "it is a mistake to regard the offences of those who have thus abused the power of a religious organization as an index to the character of the essential teaching upon which the organization was founded." That is an eminently specious argument, and many are misled by it; but it is vitiated by an underlying fallacy. Christianity, as many divines declare, is neither cultus, creed, nor conduct, but fellowship with God in Christ; not a system of morality, but a scheme for establishing and maintaining right relations with the Unseen. In other words, Christianity is Christ, and Christ is the Saviour of the world. To become a Christian is to accept Christ as Redeemer and Lord, or to allow one's self to be delivered from the bondage and power of sin by an act of complete self-surrender resulting in a God-given and God-directed life. Paul calls the Gospel the power of God unto the salvation of all who believe it; and after he became a Christian the great Apostle was able to testify thus: "I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh I live in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself up for me." A Christian is a person who has been born again from above, and in whom the Holy Spirit dwells as infallible guide even unto death, concerning whom all the redeemed joyfully sing—

> And every virtue we possess,
> And every conquest won,
> And every thought of holiness,
> Are his alone.

Christians, then, are not merely people who hold a certain creed and observe certain rites, but rather people who, being in Christ, are led by his Spirit in all they think and do.

In theory, that is what Christ does for all who accept him by faith. They are new creatures in him and walk in newness of life. Renewed in the spirit of their mind they have "put on the new man, which after God hath been created in righteousness and holiness of truth." In practice, however, the new birth, the indwelling Spirit, the gracious, willing Guest, checking each fault, calming each fear, and speaking of heaven, and the all-conquering Christ, do not count at all, professing Christians being not one whit better than their neighbours, and in many instances a great deal worse. This has been true of them in all ages and countries. Proudly claiming to be the light of the world and the salt of the earth, they have, on the average, always opposed intellectual progress and social reform, and indulged in gloomy, pessimistic views of life on earth. There have been good and noble characters among them, of course; but everybody knows that goodness and nobility have nothing distinctively Christian about them. Paul told the Corinthian converts that they would judge the world and the angels; but he also charged them with drunkenness, licentiousness, litigiousness, and other faults. He assured the Philippians that, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, they were "seen as luminaries in the world, holding forth the word of life"; but there is nothing in his Epistle to them to indicate that they were morally superior to the Pagans around them. Indeed, what they seem to have excelled in most was generous remembrance of the Apostle's want. But even in the New Testament, as well as in the history of the Church, we find that Christianity's first, if not chief, tendency is to divide its professors into hostile parties. In the little Corinthian Church there were four irreconcilable factions, which spent most of their time in noisy quarrels and bitter wrangles on subjects about which they had no knowledge. It may be exceedingly pleasant for emotional Bethelites to sing—

> Blest be the tie that binds
> Our hearts in Christian love;
> The fellowship of kindred minds
> Is like to that above;

but it is common knowledge that our religious conventicles are practically innumerable, and that they usually hate and denounce one another in great bitterness of heart and extravagance of language.

Let us take the so-called Reformation in England in the sixteenth century as a notable illustration of the truth of that statement. Leo X. conferred on Henry VIII. the title of Defender of the Faith; and it is undeniable that the king was a profoundly pious man. That the English Church stood sadly in need of a radical reformation is utterly beyond dispute. In the year 1512 Dean Colet preached a remarkable sermon before Convocation in which he called special attention to its corruptions, saying:—

> We are troubled in these days by heretics—men mad with strange folly, but no heresy of theirs is so fatal to us and to the people at large as the vicious and depraved lives of the clergy. That is the worst heresy of all..... Would that for once you would remember your name and profession and take thought for the reformation of the Church. Never was it more necessary, and never did the state of the Church need more vigorous endeavours (Green's Short History of the English People, p. 310).

Sir Thomas More was more violent still in his vituperation of the men of God of his day. He ridiculed the bishops as a class; and his famous Latin Epigrams in denunciation of priestly vices and ascetic observances are distinguished for their "foul-mouthed polemics." Then came Henry VIII. to sweep away all corruptions with the besom of his piety. Wolsey, his Chancellor, loved England dearly, but he loved Rome better, as Froude puts it; and Henry ordered him to be charged with treason. We must bear in mind that the king was of a deeply religious nature. He loved God with all his mind, and the Church occupied a warm place in his heart. His one fear was to do anything in opposition to the will of God. On ascending the throne in 1509, he married his brother Arthur's widow, Catherine of Arragon, with whom he lived in tolerable happiness for nearly twenty years. But her children did not live, and he lacked an heir to his throne. Then he began to wonder whether a marriage with a brother's widow was in harmony with the will of God. The Pope refused to pronounce it a sin. Wolsey did his utmost to procure a divorce between him and Catherine, but all his endeavours were without avail. In dismissing and degrading him, Henry ignored this fact altogether. He appealed to the Universities of Europe, and to insure a favourable response the learned professors were either bribed or bullied, which proves that the appeal was a sham. The Pope delayed his final decision until Henry's patience had been exhausted. He now resolved to break with Rome, unless it fell in with his wishes, and constitute himself the head of the English Church. He demanded that the title of the Supreme Headship be conceded by the clergy, which was done in 1531. Even after the submission of the clergy he still hoped Clement VII. would grant the divorce, and in order to induce his holiness to come to his side, he obtained from Parliament the first Act of Annates, according to which the first year's income of bishops and their clergy should in future be paid to him and not to the Vatican. In the hope that his holiness would yield rather than sacrifice so large a portion of his revenue, he refused to ratify the Act for some time. Realizing that there was absolutely no chance of winning Clement's favour, he and Anne Boleyn were secretly married in January, 1533. In his Student's History of England Gardiner says:—

> Now that he had reluctantly given up hope of obtaining a favourable decision from the Pope, he resolved to put an end to the Papal Jurisdiction in England. Otherwise if he obtained a sentence in an English ecclesiastical court declaring his marriage with Catherine to be null from the beginning, his injured wife might appeal to the superior court of the Pope. He accordingly obtained from Parliament the Act of Appeals, declaring that the king held the supreme authority in England, and that as under him all temporal matters were to be decided by temporal judges, and all spiritual matters by spiritual judges, no appeals should hereafter be suffered to any authority outside the realm. Henry was capable of any meanness to serve his ends, but he also knew how to gain more than his immediate ends by connecting them with a large national policy. He almost made men forget the low design which prompted the Act of Appeals by fixing their eyes on the great object of national independence (p. 389).

It was thus that the English Church ceased to belong to Rome and became Protestant; or, in other words, such was the Protestant Reformation in England. In belief Henry remained a Catholic as long as he lived, the only difference being that now he assumed the office and functions of Pope for England. How did he manage to do it? By the exercise of sheer tyranny in the guise of piety. He was a shrewd, clever, far-seeing, strong man, whose will was law to all alike. Those who opposed him were burned alive, hanged, or beheaded without a moment's hesitation. Even gentle and tender-spirited More was thrown into the Tower and executed. Any disagreement, however slight, with the king deserved capital punishment, and there was positively no escape. "The cause of his Majesty," the Lords were made to say, "is the cause of each of ourselves." Former monarchs had called Parliament together as seldom as possible, but Henry caused it to meet as frequently as he could, because, under him, "Parliament assembled only to sanction acts of unscrupulous tyranny, or to build up by its own statutes the great fabric of absolute rule. All the constitutional safeguards of English freedom were swept away. Arbitrary taxation, arbitrary legislation, arbitrary imprisonment were powers claimed without dispute and unsparingly exercised by the Crown" (Green's Short History, p. 332).

Yet, Henry VIII., according to the testimony of the Venetian ambassador, Giustiniani, "is very religious, hears three masses daily when he hunts, and sometimes five on other days." When his death drew near, he talked incessantly of the love of God and of our only Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Christian duty of loving all men everywhere for Christ's sake. The English people were also extremely religious; and yet they had no convictions to which to adhere at any cost, but were all, clergy and laity alike, sufficiently craven-hearted to submit without an audible murmur to the orders of the Crown, no matter how unjust, tyrannical, and wicked they were. Is the conclusion not absolutely inevitable, therefore, that Christianity was a colossal failure in England? The God in whom the nation believed and the Saviour whom it professed to love and obey, were but empty names, productive of no good effect whatever upon the national character.

Cockney Christianity.

> Of all the dull, stagnant, unedifying entourages, that of middle-class Dissent seems to me the stupidest.
> —Matthew Arnold.

> The only true conquests—those which awaken no regret—are those obtained over ignorance. The most honourable, as the most useful pursuit of nations, is that which contributes to the extension of intellect. —Napoleon.

To the superficial observer, not skilled to penetrate beneath the surface of things, there is probably but one thing in the world more solemn than a funeral; and that is the Christian religion. Short of death itself, nothing seems more awful than the Christian scheme of salvation. Only think of it! To Mr. John Smith, Nonconformist and tradesman, simply the most stupendous thought that can engage the attention of the watery custard which he is pleased to consider as representing the human mind. For it is not alone the weal or woe of all living human beings, including Mrs. Smith and the children, but also of generations of Smiths unborn, that will be involved in the awful and tremendous issue.

The very perpetuity of the scheme, in a vanishing world, where all things are passing away even as a dream, seems to impart a quality of awe to the dwarfed perception of the average believer. To a mere outsider all this must seem most solemn and impressive. But appearances are deceptive, and it is foolish to look at any question with only one eye, as is said to be the habit of birds. The unfeathered biped, man, should know better. A more philosophic view of the matter would lead to another conclusion. So far from religion being a serious affair, it is simply a human comedy. An expensive and elaborate jest it may be, but none the less a joke. You cannot tell what the religious circus is like by looking at the highly coloured posters on the walls. For in all nations it has been customary from time immemorial to invest religion with an air of gloom. So it was in the twilight of history, is now, and must be, even in the byways and burrows of the great metropolis.

The mere circumstance of that respectable ratepayer and tradesman, Mr. John Smith, "finding Jesus" in his fiftieth year is enough to set his numerous friends and acquaintances on the alert. They know that when his conversion becomes a certainty his countenance will exhibit the expression of a tired funeral horse, and that his every word, look, and action will eclipse the gaiety of the spectators.

Mr. John Smith, junior, is compelled to check the tide of his youthful laughter with a sigh. Miss Henrietta Smith, his sister, finds her father's condition clouds the delight of sweethearting, and overshadows the glories of her summer dress. Like Banquo's ghost at the feast, the pious picture of melancholy inbecility overawes the flow of domestic happiness. But if "finding Jesus" is a serious matter, how dire are the after effects of the conversion. Resplendant in his best suit of funereal black, Mr. Smith conveys his family to the nearest jerry-built chapel or tin tabernacle. If he has the disease badly this will become the rule every Sunday. He is under the spell of religiosity, and as proud of it as a corpse with two tombstones. Master Johnny can hardly contain himself for speechless transport as he finds that his Sunday fishing excursions are no longer to be tolerated. He turns green with envy as he passes the splendid pageant of the greengrocer's boy and the postman's son with rods and bait-cans on their way to the still waters of the nearest river. Miss Henrietta, who is neither so blind as a bat, nor so deaf as an adder, may easily envy 'Arry and 'Arriet treading the primrose path of dalliance. What would she not give for the chance of starting the stitching in 'Arry's heart herself? As for Mrs. Smith, she is firmly and secretly convinced that all this piety springs from the idea of her lord and master to be considered "respectable," and, incidentally, to extend his business. In one of her confidential chats over the tea-table with her bosom-friend, Mrs. Jones, she expresses her private opinion with a powerful metaphor: "Find Jesus, my dear. I had as soon go to sea in a ship on fire."

What does Mr. John Smith himself gain by his conversion? The Bible? He reads it daily, and his verbal knowledge is nearly perfect; but what he apprehends is limited by an imperfect education. The literature of Israel is intensely local. There are passages where the perfumes of Sharon and Lebanon, the atmosphere of the hills about Jerusalem, the beauty of the fair daughters of Judæa, are so caught and rendered that in a distant age, an alien speech, a remote land, they affect the reader. But Mr. Smith is hampered by his limited vocabulary and dwarfed perceptions. To him the word "publican" invariably suggests a licensed victualler; and the expression "divers diseases" conjures up ideas of water on the brain. Thus he is forced to rely on a purblind parson's conception of what is written. Mr. Smith cannot usefully adopt New Testament ethics with his ordinary business avocation, and keep out of the workhouse. He cannot, with any success, apply Christian principles to his everyday life, if he is to escape Earlswood or Colney Hatch. Hence his admiration for the sleek parson who shepherds the flock at his chapel, and shears them well into the bargain.

The minister instructs poor Mr. Smith as if the Bible were written yesterday, and the legends but the facts of fifth-edition journalism. The minister tells him that the Bible is true from cover to cover. That the Almighty maker of all things put the first man and woman in a garden, and for a crime of petty larceny punished them with death, and visited their small crime on all mankind, whose everlasting fate will be determined at the Judgment Day. Mr. Smith is further instructed that mankind became so wicked that the Almighty drowned them all, except eight persons, like kittens in a pail. Afterwards the Almighty became the War Lord of the Jews, who were his chosen people, although he could not always help them to victory. And so on, through the Newgate Calendar record of the Bible, until the climax when the Almighty is put to death to appease himself. At no stage of the instruction does the minister point out what a level of barbarism must the people have who could thus conceive of their Deity. Hence the delight of the minister and the limitations of poor Mr. Smith, who rapidly becomes the perfect expression of the self-opiniated Christian, a figure at which educated people raise their eyebrows, politely smile, and pass on.

Science and Spiritualism.

XVI.

There can be no doubt, then, that the history of spiritualism is saturated with fraud, and that the vast majority of the phenomena obtained through mediums are fraudulent in character.....The net result of the investigations conducted by the English Society for Psychical Research was to produce the conviction that no results obtained through professional mediums were to be trusted, so long as the conditions rendered fraud possible; and, further, that practically all professional mediums are frauds! "There does not exist, and there never has existed, a professional medium of any note who has not been convicted of trickery or fraud," says J. N. Maskelyne (The Supernatural, p. 183). And, in case Mr. Maskelyne may be considered a prejudiced witness in such matters, it may be stated that the American Society for Psychical Research was unable to find any medium who could produce satisfactory phenomena under test conditions, and stated that "it is, in their opinion, inadvisable to undertake further investigation in regard to professional mediums, inasmuch as all the materializing seances yet attended by them have been held under conditions which rendered any scientific investigation impossible."".....It may almost be said that the S.P.R. has never succeeded in obtaining evidence for a single genuine physical phenomenon in its whole career, while the number of fraudulent mediums it has unearthed is amazing! They have been no more successful in their day than the Seybert Commission was in its—and it is certainly a suspicious fact that, so soon as strict and reliable "tests" are insisted upon, and no opportunity given the medium to produce the phenomena by fraudulent means, the phenomena altogether cease.—Hereward Carrington, "The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism," pp. 9-10.

THE Committee of the Institut General Psychologique of Paris also tested Eusapia's alleged power of moving a balance without touching it. A small machine like a letter-weigher was employed, says Podmore. "It was surrounded with a wooden frame, so as to prevent the use of a hair or other fraudulent device. Eusapia tried it with the wooden covering and failed; tried it with the linen covering and failed. All the protecting apparatus was then removed. Eusapia put her hands on either side of the scale and it went down, and the onlookers could not find out how it was done."[1]

Ultimately it was discovered that the trick was done by means of a hair attached to Eusapia's little fingers, so that when she placed her hands on each side of the scale, she only had to depress her two little fingers to bring the hair down on the scale. The experiments were conducted in such a dim light that the hair was invisible.

The conclusion arrived at by the Institut Committee was that Eusapia undoubtedly resorted to fraud when it was possible to do so, but that some of the phenomena—the movement of the table and stool, for instance—they could not explain. They do not attribute these phenomena to any spiritual force, but to some physical force of the nature of electricity, emanating from the body of Eusapia. As Mr. Podmore remarks: "The great defect of their report is that whilst they cannot explain some of the things seen and done, they have not given us a chance of explaining them. They do not publish the shorthand notes of the seances.....We see that on this particular occasion the Committee believe that the control was adequate; but then we know that it is Eusapia's to induce this belief, and we know or suspect that in many previous cases the belief has been ill-founded. On the positive side this report does not advance the matter at all. Such a condensed description is of just so much value as the ordinary observer's account of a conjurer's trick. It tells us only that the witnesses didn't see through the trick; but it doesn't tell us how it was done."[1]

Notwithstanding the fact that the Society for Psychical Research had declined to undertake any further investigation of Eusapia's powers after the Cambridge exposure, yet so successfully did she impose on numerous foreign investigators—many of them eminent men of science—during the next twelve years, that in the autumn of 1908 they appointed a committee of three to again test her claims to supernatural powers. Of their qualifications, Mr. Podmore remarks: "Mr. Hereward Carrington is an amateur conjurer, who has for several years made a special study of the tricks of American mediums. His book, The Psychical Phenomena of Spiritualism, is the standard authority on these fraudulent performances. The Hon. Everard Fielding and Mr. Baggally have also to their credit years of practical experience in the same field. Mr. Baggally, again, is a practical conjurer, and Mr. Fielding's humorous exposures of the tricks of British and foreign mediums are familiar to all members of the Society for Psychical Research. On the ground of personal qualifications and practical experience a more competent Committee could, since the death of Dr. Hodgson, scarcely have been selected."[2]

The sittings, eleven in all, were held in Naples during November and December, 1908; and it is no small tribute to the genius of Eusapia that she succeeded in duping all three of these well-qualified and able gentlemen, and obtaining their testimony to her supernormal powers. Mr. Carrington, in particular, was so impressed by Eusapia's performance that he actually acted as her manager when she left Italy for America. But a year later (December, 1909) she was to experience utter and irretrievable defeat at the hands of Professor Munsterberg, in New York.

To properly understand what happened, it should be explained that, before giving a seance, a corner of the room was partitioned off by a pair of black curtains, so as to form a sort of triangular cabinet. Inside this cabinet was placed a stool, one or two musical instruments, and any other articles the spirits required to announce their presence and perform their antics. In front of this alcove was placed a table, thirty-three inches long by twenty inches wide, endways to the curtains. At this end Eusapia sat, with her back to the curtains, the investigators sitting round the table, linking hands, those on either side of the medium undertaking the control of her hands and feet. These were invariably the arrangements made by Eusapia before giving a seance.

[2] Podmore, The Newer Spiritualism, p. 114.

Upon this occasion Professor Munsterberg sat at her left side and Mr. Carrington at her right. The "John" referred to in the following description is the name of the spirit supposed to have been invoked by Eusapia, "her wonders to perform." Probably he is the "John King," the spirit of a deceased pirate, who has laboured so assiduously for the mediums for the last fifty years. Professor Munsterberg describes what happened as follows:—

> And finally, John was to lift the table in the cabinet. We held both her hands, we felt both her feet, and yet the table three feet behind her began to scratch the floor and we expected it to be lifted. But instead there suddenly came a wild yelling scream. It was such a scream as I have never heard before in my life, not even in Sarah Bernhardt's most thrilling scenes.
> What had happened? Neither the medium nor Mr. Carrington had the slightest idea that a man was lying flat on the floor and had succeeded in slipping noiselessly like a snail below the curtain into the cabinet. I had told him that I expected wires stretched out from her body, and he looked out for them. What a surprise when he saw that she had simply freed her foot from her shoe and with an athletic backward movement of the leg was reaching out and fishing with her toes for the guitar and the table in the cabinet! And then, lying on the floor, he grasped her foot and caught her heel with a firm hand, and she responded with that wild scream which indicated that she knew that at last she was trapped and her glory shattered. Her achievement had been splendid; she had lifted her unshod foot to the height of my arm when she touched me under cover of the curtain, without changing in the least the position of her body. When her foot played thumb and finger, the game was also neat throughout. To be sure, I remember, before she was to reach out for the table behind her, she suddenly felt the need of touching my left hand too, and for that purpose she leaned heavily over the table at which we were sitting. She said that she must do it because her spiritual fluid had become too strong and the touch would relieve her. As a matter of course, in leaning forward with the upper half of her body she was able to push her foot further backward and thus to reach the light table, which probably stood a few inches too far away.
> After this scream, at least let us not repeat the ridiculous excuse that she sometimes uses tricks when by chance genuine phenomena do not arise, but that she can perform the same acts at other times by mere spiritual powers. No. We had here the perfectly typical performance. Everything occurred in exactly the same style as in previous seances, and the conditions of supervision were the best which she allows at all. To put your foot on hers is never allowed, as the poor woman has a nervous "weakness" in her instep. Thus the only allowed supervision of her feet is in being sure all the time that her foot is on yours. I did indeed feel her shoe all the time. When the scream occurred and her foot was caught, I distinctly felt that her shoe was pressing my foot. A hook on the right shoe probably pressed down the empty left shoe. If her foot had not been caught that performance would have been the best in the whole seance, and the cabinet mysteries worked in our presence would never have been under stricter conditions. Moreover, this foot performance without any motion of the upper half of the body evidently presupposes a continued and perfect training. Here she was trapped for the first time in an act which cannot possibly be explained as an accidental occurrence; such marvellous athletics must be explained as a regular life-work. Her greatest wonders are absolutely nothing but fraud and humbug; this is no longer a theory but a proven fact.[1]

If the man had not been concealed in the cabinet, Professor Munsterberg would never have been able to detect, nor even suspect, the manner in which the tricks were performed. He himself frankly admits: "I do not refer to any philosophical or theoretical conviction, but to a practical one, that I myself am entirely unfit for such an investigation. There the public is usually under the influence of a curious illusion. Most people think that a scientist is especially adapted to carrying on such an inquiry, and if a great scholar becomes convinced of the genuineness of the performance, the public looks on that as a strong argument. I am inclined to think that scholars are especially poor witnesses in such a case." And, as he further points out, the scientist in his laboratory has not the slightest fear that Nature will play tricks or resort to fraud, and places the same trust in the honesty of his students. "If he weighs his chemical substances, he is not accustomed to watch whether one of the boys has a scheme to pull down the lever of the scale.....And now he, with his bland naivete and his training in blind confidence, is again and again called to make inquiries which would demand a detective and a prestidigitator. Moreover, the best scientific work in one field is not the slightest guarantee for good observation in another field. It is often remarkable to what a degree a man who is a great scholar in one division may be not only ignorant, but uneducated in his attitude, silly in his judgment and foolish in his conclusions in fields which lie outside of his interests"[2]—a fact we have amply demonstrated in the course of these articles. The greatest of all philosophers, Herbert Spencer, "thought he would be an easy dupe at a spiritualist seance."[3] Probably he would have been; but it is another proof of his clear good sense and honesty in admitting it.

I am convinced that if something entirely new and mysterious in phenomena were to-day launched in London, the public would flop down and the great and glorious newspapers would again rave about there being more in heaven and earth than we dream of in our philosophy. And this will continue all the while the child is inoculated with the virus of religion, which predisposes it to give easy credence to such tales of miracle and superstition in after-life. We shall deal next with the psychical phenomena.

Correspondence.

HEBERT AND MR. UNDERWOOD.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I had no idea when I parried the first thrust made by Mr. Underwood, as he placed his foil between Mr. Arch's and my own, that I had a swashbuckler to deal with, who not only attempts the usual braggart's dodge in trying to frighten his adversary by noise, but even scorns the honourable rules of the sword. Yet, since he considers my criticisms "as ignorant as they are foolish"; since he doubts whether I wish to get at the truth or not; since he sneers that an ipse dixit even from me "is not above suspicion"; and finally, since he begs the question by wanting me to confess that I have made a "bad blunder" (as though I could possibly make a "good blunder"), we can truly see Mr. Underwood in his true colours.

My first letter anent Hebert and the Pere Duchene was, to my mind, tempered criticism. My second was, perhaps, a little playful, yet directly critical withal. Mr. Arch's replies were equally tempered and critical. A review of this correspondence will show that there has not been the slightest hint (as Mr. Underwood suggests) of an ipse dixit from myself. The only person who has adopted this attitude is Mr. Underwood.

I politely asked him, in my last letter, if he would give the readers of the Freethinker (not myself) some of the worst of one number of the Pere Duchene in French. His reply is, that he "cannot waste his time in transcribing a dozen or so pages"! I ask him if he thought it "waste of time" when he took the trouble to specially look up the Pere Duchene so as to reply to my first criticism? But he accuses his adversary of cowardice, when it is he himself who "runs away" at my parer seconde et porter en meme temps!

And then, he is so solicitous lest the Editor of the Freethinker should be prosecuted for obscenity! One feels inclined to emulate Hebert, and say, "Damn his impertinence!" It is the readers of the Freethinker who would be the best judges of that, and not the police. And I have no doubt that the Editor knows, or ought to know, the mental gauge of his readers without any reference to Mr. Underwood. Mr. Underwood may be an excellent authority upon "inebriated racing touts," and as to what would make them blush. I beg to say that I am not, and I have no desire to be. But I do know, or at least I hope so, something of the mental equipment of the readers of the Freethinker, a journal which I have read every week, and occasionally contributed to, for seventeen years.

H. GEORGE FARMER.

[We do not think that this controversy can be carried further with profit to readers; none of whom, we think, will be greatly interested in the opinions of Mr. Underwood and Mr. Farmer of each other.—ED.]

MIMNERMUS AND RABELAIS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—You may, or what is more likely, you may not remember, that some time ago I tried to express my admiration for the fervid rhetoric of your contributor "Mimnermus," whose delightful articles give an air of literary ripeness to a paper the dominant note of which, if I may say so, is too often one of dry and angular disputatiousness.

You will think, perhaps, that I am inclined to attach too much importance to the way in which facts are presented, to the mere outward garb, and too little to the facts themselves. Now, that is exactly the point to which I am coming in my feminine and roundabout way.

You were once courteous enough to give me the opportunity of pointing out that I had found a noticeable resemblance between the style of "Mimnermus" and that of my erstwhile master in literature the great "Claudius Clear." They both have an unlimited affection for the completely rounded sentence, the glowing and coloured phrase. I now find that "Mimnermus" has something else in common with the editor of the British Weekly—a truly high-handed way with mere fact. Let me ask you to look for a moment at his article on Rabelais which he calls with his characteristic felicity of expression "Under a Fool's Cap." In the first place he accepts the impossible traditional date of Rabelais' birth, 1483—instead of 1495, the date fixed by Rathery, Lacroix, and Mr. J. M. Wheeler. The earlier date is chosen because it gives point to an eloquent passage about Rabelais not writing "until an age when the passion of youth had consumed itself to ashes," and also to the assertion that his cynicism with regard to women was the result of his long monastic training. But a cynical attitude to women was not peculiar to the Middle Ages; it is everywhere in the Greek and Latin poets; it was handed down from antiquity to the early Christian fathers; and so became a tradition. It seems to me questionable if the position of women was any worse in mediæval France than in sentimentalizing Germany or platonizing

Italy. If "Mimnermus" has ever visited a music-hall he will remember the old and ever popular joke about the lodger. Yet I fancy he would not be so foolish as to make this poor joke the basis of a generalization on the sexual ethics of the lower Middle Class.

In another passage he says that Rabelais' love for his mother was killed. How does he know this? So far as I am aware there is no mention anywhere of Rabelais' mother. May not the simple explanation be that she died before the filial sentiment was developed in him?

Now, any one of us may go astray, but we cannot hope to do it so boldly as "Mimnermus." Had the Hebrew wise man been privileged to contemplate the way of "Mimnermus" with facts he would have added a fifth to the four things which were too wonderful for him. Rabelais, he tells us impressively, did not relish the idea of martyrdom for had he not seen his contemporaries burnt at the stake? Was not "Giordano Bruno whom he had met at Rome done to death in the usual Roman (Catholic) fashion?" It is quite possible that "Mimnermus" may have access to facts unknown to me, yet in the absence of proof upsetting the accepted dates, I am still inclined to think that Rabelais (1495-1553) was not a contemporary of Bruno (1548-1600).

Acid Drops.

Poor Paul! By 385 votes to 55 the House of Commons accepted the principle of "Votes for Women"—provided they are not under thirty years of age. What would Paul have said? He suffered not a woman to teach; he ordered them to remain in silence, and subjection, and obey their husbands. And now a House of Commons, the majority being Christians—of a sort—endow her with the vote! The world moves, although Christian bigotry has prevented it moving in that direction for many centuries.

The proprietors of "White Horse" whisky have just received intimation from a soldier on service that one of their pocket diaries had been the means of saving his life. A piece of shrapnel passed through the diary and just reached his flesh immediately in front of his heart. What would our religious friends have said if only this had been a Bible instead of an advertisement for Scotch whisky.

The Bishop of London says "no self-respecting citizen would demand an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." This suggests that "self-respecting" citizens had better ignore Old Testament teaching.

Another gem of the Bishop's is that he has studied the Bible far more than have the conscientious objectors. Just so! And his studies have been more profitable.

In an article on the loss of children's lives in the recent air-raid, the Star says, "Herod must surely be jealous of the Kaiser." This is unjust to Herod, for the story of the massacre of the innocents, narrated in the New Testament, is pure fiction.

What excellent conceit pious folk possess. The Rev. J. Tolefree Parr, the President of the Primitive Methodist Conference, says "Take out of the national life the moral and spiritual influence of the Church, and nothing can save it from sinking back into barbarism." This is delightful nonsense. If every Primitive Methodist Chapel closed its doors, there would scarcely be a ripple upon the surface of contemporary society.

The Rev. J. Tolefree Parr also speaks of the "withering blight of vices" which the War revealed, and said that drink had almost "throttled the Commonwealth." If this be so, it is a reflection on the clergy, who are absolved from military service and are at full liberty to attend to their own duties.

Providence has small respect for churches. The bell-turret at Christ Church, Harrow Road, Paddington, was struck by lightning, and a large piece of masonry, weighing seven hundredweights, fell to the pavement. A Methodist place of worship at Roegreen, Worsley, near Manchester, was also struck during a service.

We can't be expected to often find ourselves in agreement with the Archbishop of Canterbury, but we quite agree with him in his protest against the policy of "reprisals." Nothing could be more terrible than the slaughter of little children by airmen such as took place in the recent raid on London, and one can quite understand the lust of passion which calls for similar action against Germany. But between that understanding and a deliberate justification of the cry there is a world of difference. In times of stress the benefit of leadership and of the press would be that they served to keep the public mind steady and sane. But when we have a section of the press and a number of public men—either from lack of level-headedness or from a desire to exploit a natural and even justifiable outburst of feeling—deliberately asking that our own airmen shall slaughter German women and children, as German airmen have slaughtered ours, there is an indication of a deplorably low level of public life.

Reprisals mean, as we have already said, nothing less than a competition in brutality, and we do not think that any English man or woman will, on reflection, be anxious to demonstrate to the world that, however brutal Germans may be, we can be still more brutal. Nor is it complimentary to our own airmen to assume that they would undertake the work of slaughtering women and children without a feeling of repugnance and degradation. Nor do we follow those who argue that while the bombing of schools and civilians generally stiffens our backs and makes us determined to get on with the War, similar treatment of Germans will compel them to adopt other methods. It will rather play into the hands of the German military authorities, and help to strengthen the war-spirit there as their conduct strengthens the war-spirit here. And it is surely the height of absurdity to argue that while the German Governments are ready to sacrifice millions of their people in the pursuit of the War, and while the German people support the Governments in their doing so, both will be brought to their knees by outrages on mere handfuls of civilians. Similar outrages made Belgium, Britain, France, Italy, etc., more determined than ever to carry on the War. It is only the cheap psychology of an uninstructed mind that can look for any different effect of the same policy on Germany.

It is said that we adopted the policy of reprisals when we used gas and boiling oil in reply to the German gas and liquid flame. That is so; but the distinction is that in this case it was a necessity of war pure and simple. Soldiers were implicated, not civilians, or women and children. If we went one better than Germany, as we were entitled to do, that fact is a melancholy illustration of the truth that war is a progressively brutalizing occupation, and an apt comment upon the utter drivel talked about the ennobling influence of war upon a people. And note that the next war will certainly commence at the point of brutality where this one left off, and will go on developing along the same lines. Boiling oil, and gas, and liquid flame, and the rest will be part of the regular outfit of the armies of the future. Even air raids will have their recognized place. And they are best serving the cause of universal peace who recognize the truth, drive the lesson home to the minds of their fellows, and so make the recurrence of war more and more improbable.

Mr. Fisher, President of the Board of Education, says he has met Oxford men who were ignorant of the elements of spelling, who had never heard of the principal characters of history, and who could not trace the European capitals on the map. We are not surprised, for Oxford University expelled the poet Shelley, and conferred an honorary degree on the first "General" Booth.

paper, in a leading article states: "Nature knows nothing of sin; cause and effect are her only concern." Freethinkers have said the same thing for generations.

A schoolmaster, who possesses a London University degree, writes to the Daily News to complain that he was offered a teacher's post at twenty-five shillings weekly. This shows the value put upon education in a Christian country, which permits the bachelor Bishop of London to enjoy a salary of £200 weekly.

The Bishop of Chelmsford predicts a lengthy War. Let us hope that he is as mistaken as the Bible prophets.

Unconscious humour is not the worst. Under a paragraph headed "Showing Off," an evening paper printed a paragraph stating that organ recitals are to be given at the City Temple, London, weekly, until the end of July.

The late organist at Hereford Cathedral left estate to the value of £6,618. There are not many church organists who get the chance, for ecclesiastics are not innocent of sweating their employees.

At a City bookshop where "remainders" are sold, a notice was displayed, "Theodore Roosevelt reduced to twopence." This is twopence too much for the man who libelled Thomas Paine.

From the Daily Telegraph we take the following:—

> Under the Defence of India Act the Government of Madras has prohibited Mrs. Annie Besant, Mr. George S. Aeundale, and Mr. B. B. Wadia, who are both also connected with the paper New India and the Indian Home Rule propaganda, from attending or taking part in any meeting, from lecturing or making speeches, and from publishing or writing any speech composed by them. The Governor has also placed their correspondence under censorship, and has directed that after expiry of a brief period they shall cease to reside in Madras city and shall reside in any one of six specified areas.

In a War for the freedom of the world liberty appears to be faring rather badly.

Lady Courtney says, "Centuries ago the wisdom of the sages and statesmen of Rome may have been written on tablets of gold or silver, and honoured by all men, while the message of a few Galilean fishermen was only spoken to the hearts of a few simple men and women like themselves." Her ladyship forgets that the beautiful message "spoken to the hearts" of simple men and women was "Believe, or be damned!"

A large display advertisement of the Young Men's Christian Association states that the organization has given away, among other things, "many thousands of cigarettes." As Christ was crucified to prevent people smoking in the next world, we presume the Y.M.C.A. is giving them a chance of smoking in this one.

The scandal of the ever-increasing prices of bread and the ordinary necessities of life is an ironical comment on the prayer of millions, "Give us this day our daily bread." The food profiteers do not care how people pray so long as they themselves are free to prey.

As we have not enough pantomime Orders in the country, the King has been graciously pleased to create two new ones—an Order of Knighthood to be styled the Order of the British Empire, and the Order of the Companions of Honour, with all the paraphernalia of decorations, an Usher of the Purple Rod, etc., etc. The badge of the Order is to be a silver gilt cross with the motto "For God and the Empire." We marvel the King was not advised that there are millions of people in the Empire who do not believe in God at all. And if some of these are offered the decoration, we wonder what they will do with it? Will they go round wearing an Order given for service to God and the Empire? Really, it is time this sort of thing was dropped altogether. But we have no doubt that the King is wise in his generation. Every new title is a help to existing institutions. It creates a new vested interest, and that is something.

The clergy are not only claiming exemption from military service for themselves, but some of them seem determined to claim it for those who minister to their comforts. Thus, exemption was asked for the gardener of the Vicar of Walford, Ross. Before the tribunal it was stated that the vicar had three other men-servants beside this one. And, presumably, there would be maid-servants as well. Things have improved since the Son of Man had not where to lay his head.

The Rev. James Orpen, 32, was charged yesterday at Stratford Police Court with attempting to procure two boys to commit an act of gross indecency, and, further, with committing an act of indecency with a boy. Mr. Freke Palmer, for the accused, pleaded guilty. The prisoner was bound over to be of good behaviour for twelve months.—Times, June 21.

The Rev. J. H. Locke, a Congregational minister of Epping, is assisting in a grocer's shop, and a newspaper states that "he astonishes the customers with his skill in cutting cheese and bacon." The question is whether the gentleman is running a grocer's or a gospel shop, for grocers are not exempted from National Service.

In a column notice in a daily paper of the Salvation Army flag day, the headline bore the words, "Home Fires." The word "fire" embroidered on the jerseys of the Salvationists refers to an eternal fire in an everlasting home.

Punch makes excellent play with what it calls "the financial success of Mr. H. G. Wells' punctuality and enterprize in looking into the vexed question of the Deity," in a series of burlesque interviews. Mr. Arnold Bennett is made to say that he quite agrees the book of the other Essex fictionist is a meritorious and ingenious work, but the idea of God still needs handling in a capable and meritorious way. Mr. R. J. Campbell refused to be interviewed, but locked himself in his church, and looked through the keyhole "with his beautiful, troubled, wistful orbs." Mr. G. K. Chesterton quotes: "An honest god is the noblest work of man," and Sir Robertson Nicoll said that "for many years his paper had supported Providence to their mutual advantage." Meanwhile, sums up Punch, things go on as usual. That, we believe, hits the mark. By the time people have finished replying to Mr. Wells, his new God will have been quite forgotten. Even Mr. Wells may have some difficulty in remembering what he was like.

War Bread.

The Rev. Martin Jones, Vicar of Wymondham, Norfolk, says that War Bread is unsuitable for the Communion. It produces too many crumbs.—Daily Mail.

"THIS War Bread," says a Vicar bland,
"Makes too much crumb for Holy Rite;
It falls to pieces in my hand,
Before I take a tiny bite."

He cannot have good bread and strife;
He cannot praise the "God" who rides
Triumphant o'er "His" product—Life,
And in each gaping gun abides.

He cannot have both Bread and Stones;
The "Bread of Life" and War's abuse;
He cannot raise to life the bones
Of Creeds outworn in futile use.

But he will plead with reverence,
Providing topics for the Press;
And moan with pious innocence,
That War Bread makes an awful mess!

To Correspondents.

H. A.—It would be foolish to prophesy, as the result will be public property before the issue of the Freethinker is published.

E. B.—Many thanks for useful batch of cuttings.

WE have so many calls upon our space this week that we are compelled to hold over a number of replies until our next issue.

F. RUDDY (Liverpool).—You are confusing Rabelais with Boccaccio.

J. FITZPATRICK.—We are unable to deal with it this week. Absence from London and other calls have left us with little time on hand.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The summonses issued by the L.C.C. against Mr. Neate for selling the Freethinker in Victoria Park came on for hearing before Mr. Clarke Hall at the Old Street Police Court on Wednesday last, June 20. Mr. Haedicke represented the Council, and Mr. W. H. Eldridge, appeared on behalf of Mr. Neate, at the instance of the Protest Committee. Owing to the quite amazing incompleteness of the case as presented by the Council's solicitor, the proceedings looked as though they would collapse entirely, but an adjournment was asked for by Mr. Haedicke, which Mr. Clarke Hall was compelled to grant. By the time this is in the hands of our readers the affair will be over, but as we are writing a day before the hearing, we will only say that we feel quite easy as to the outcome of this case. The important thing is that we are evidently in the initial stages of a fight which promises some interesting developments, and which is of first-rate public importance.

In summing up the consequences of the judgment in the Bowman case, we pointed out that it went much further than the case itself. It not only legalized a bequest to an incorporated secular society, it legalized bequests to all secular societies, whether incorporated or not. And we expressed the belief that a bequest left to a society such as the N.S.S. was perfectly valid. Recent events have quite justified that view. An old friend of the movement, Capt. E. Raggett, left the National Secular Society a bequest of £10. A solicitor wrote to the Secretary, Miss Vance, asking for a copy of the principles and objects of the N.S.S. in order that he might advise his client as to the advisability of payment. These were duly supplied, and the legacy has been paid over without comment or delay. Of course, the bequest was not due to the Bowman case, but we are fairly certain the prompt payment marks a great advance.

We are doubtful whether Mr. Wells' God the Invisible King is worth a whole book by way of reply to its nebulous theology and equally vague sociology; but if it is, God and Mr. Wells, by Mr. William Archer (Watts & Co.; 1s. 9d. net) will give those interested what they require. The book is lively reading, and Mr. Wells gets the good-humoured castigation he asked for when he came forward as the prophet of a new religion. We should like to see Mr. Archer himself a little more definite in his attitude towards "God" than he is (there really is justification for a definite attitude if one can divest one's self of the tyranny of tradition), but we must take each man as we find him, and make the best of him. We like best in the book the chapter on "Personification," and we fully endorse what Mr. Archer has to say about the use of the word "God." He asks:—

> Is it possible to deodorize a word which comes to us redolent of "good, thick, stupefying incense smoke" mingled with the reek of the auto-da-fe? Can we beat into a ploughshare the sword of St. Bartholomew, and a thousand other deeds of horror? God has been by far the most tragic word in the whole vocabulary of the race—a spell to conjure up all the worst fiends of human nature; arrogance, abjectness, fanaticism, hatred, and ferocity.....If a word is at best a confusion and at worst a war-whoop, should we not try to dispense with it, to avoid it, to find a substitute which should more accurately, if less truculently, express our idea?

That is good counsel. You can no more relieve such words as "God" and "religion" from their confusing and sinister associations than you can relieve the typhoid germ of its poisonous quality. And there is no sound reason why anyone should try.

Another handy little volume published by Messrs Watts and Co. is Old Testament Legends for Young Readers, by Mr. F. J. Gould (1s. 6d. net). These "legends" appeared originally in the columns of the Freethinker, and very many of our readers will no doubt welcome them in their more permanent form. They form a striking lesson in the art of making use of even the Bible in a way that will preserve all that is worth having for youthful readers, while divesting it of its character as an aid to superstition. The volume should be specially helpful to teachers and to all engaged in the training of children. It really teaches without preaching, whereas so many miscalled educational works preach without teaching. We are pleased to add that we have another series in hand by Mr. Gould, on New Testament Legends, which we hope to commence in a week or two.

We think the following letter will be of interest to others beside ourselves. It is one of many we receive, and our regret is that we can so seldom spare space for publication. But they are appreciated none the less on that account:—

> DEAR MR. COHEN,—I sincerely hope that your many duties will not prevent you from perusing these few lines of heartfelt thanks which I tender to you and your co-workers on the Freethinker staff. During the past few years I have been a frequent reader of your "Super Periodical," and I assure you the benefits I have derived from its perusal are manifold. You and your colleagues are responsible for the development of my critical faculties, for which I specially thank you. For they enable me to-day, amidst all our political, industrial, and religious convolutions, to look along the line of demarcation more clearly.
> Through your splendid Freethinker I came to know Darwin, and if I could only express my thoughts to you, you would then, perhaps, be able to gauge the extent of my delight, when after leaving behind me for a few hours the baneful and stultifying machine-labour, I forget the anomolies of our transient social order in the company of the great naturalist. You introduced me to the treasure-house of "Ingersoll," which I assert must be visited many times when you have once entered the domains thereof. You have greatly assisted me in developing the "cosmic sense," and from the development of that sense I have come to know my position in relation to the "universe."
> We have a free library in Stafford, and I often go to peruse the Literary Guide and the Positivist Review. And, of course, being a reader of your splendid paper, and knowing its intrinsic worth, I approached the librarian with a view to placing the Freethinker on the table each week. He informed me that I could do so with pleasure. So I shall order a Freethinker from my newsagent each week, and thereby enable the citizens of Stafford to have an opportunity of reading the most interesting and intellectual periodical in the country at the present time.—H W. C.

A correspondent suggests that in view of the activity of the Churches with regard to religion in the schools, a copy of Mr. Cohen's pamphlet on Religion and the Child should be sent "broadcast" to teachers and public men. We should be glad to fall in with the suggestion, but if done on a proper scale it would involve a considerable outlay, and we have no means available for such a purpose. We do send out a fair amount of free literature now, but as we are at our wits end almost to "carry on," we cannot add to expenses. But we suggest that what cannot be done by one, could be done by all. We are prepared to quote special terms to such as wish to purchase large or small quantities for the purpose of free distribution.

As an illustration of what we have said above, we may mention that last week we bought a small quantity of Freethinker paper at a considerable advance on even last year's price. This week we decided to purchase a little more. On sending in the order we were informed that the price of the paper had advanced two pence per pound. So we decided to wait. But if things proceed at their present rate we can picture the Freethinker being sent from house to house on a gramophone record.

Special.

LAST week I mentioned that in addition to the fight with the L.C.C. there was another matter in connection with the law on which something might have to be said. That something is connected with a charge of blasphemy brought against Mr. J. W. Gott.

On June 13 Mr. Gott wrote me that he had been arrested on a charge of blasphemy and asking whether the N.S.S. would undertake his defence. Naturally, I could not undertake to pledge the Society to any such course before consulting the Executive, nor had I any information as to the charge. But I told Mr. Gott that in order to see that he got fair play in the police court, he might engage the services of a solicitor, for the expense of which I would make myself responsible.

This was done, and at a special meeting of the Executive, my action in the matter was fully endorsed. I was also requested to go to Birmingham, if necessary, and watch the case in the interests of the N.S.S. Accordingly I went to Birmingham on Sunday evening last in order to be at the court on the Monday. All that could be said on behalf of Mr. Gott was then said by the solicitor engaged, but it was clear that the stipendiary had no alternative but to send the case for trial at the Assizes, which opens, I believe, on July 10.

Another Executive meeting has been called for this week, and it would not be right to foreshadow or forestall its decision by expressing an opinion now as to the course to be followed. The case is a difficult one, as many will guess.

One thing I am very sorry for. Mr. Gott sent out an appeal for funds, for what he calls his propaganda, in connection with which he announced that I had made myself responsible for the costs of the police court proceedings. I regret that this was done. I had no knowledge of the circular until a copy of it came accidentally into my hands, and the use of my name was quite unauthorized. To most readers it would identify me either with the appeal for money or with Mr. Gott's propaganda, or with both. And neither view expresses the truth.

I refrain from saying more now for many reasons. It may even be advisable not to say more until the case is concluded.

CHAPMAN COHEN, President N.S.S.

The Sense Organs of Man.

CERTAIN mystical theologians and strictly introspective metaphysicians delight in dwelling on the presumably solemn circumstance that mental processes cannot be translated into terms of matter. Even by some semi-Rationalists psychical phenomena are vaguely regarded as modes of existence which elude the methods of the purely scientific investigator. Needless to state, the highest, and consequently most involved manifestations of mental phenomena are invariably chosen to prove the impassable barrier which is alleged to sunder physical from psychical things. No attention is paid to the self-evident verity that to grasp the various problems concerning the senses and the intellect, the emotions and the will, requires a fair amount of patient scientific labour, and that it is imperative to carefully study, and strive to understand, a few of the simpler processes of sensation in order to obtain anything remotely resembling a clear appreciation of the real difficulties to be overcome.

The famous Dr. Henry Maudsley has always insisted that some acquaintance with the brain and nervous system is indispensable to the true student of psychology. But this plain fact is persistently ignored by the "paper" psychologists who find metaphysical speculation much more easy than the solid work essential to those who grapple with the problems involved. Metaphysical discussions in large measure owe their popularity to the pleasant circumstance that no real information is necessary to enable one to express an opinion. Other things equal, one metaphysical assertion is as good as another, for nothing can be stated as a mere matter of fact by either disputant. Moreover, the debaters are privileged to run before they have learnt to walk; and, in that respect, possess a decided advantage over those who approach unsettled problems by that stonier path in which they are compelled to compare their theories with ascertained facts. It is true that scientific theories display one element of superiority, inasmuch as they have been derived, and, in many cases, demanded by the observed sequences of organic Nature.

When assertions are made in the name of science, they are verified or invalidated by an appeal to the demonstrated discoveries in the department of knowledge involved. But in barren speculation each assertor is a law unto himself. In these hazy realms they meander along "a limitless, lampless labyrinth," and many a man who might have helped in the world's advance has unwisely devoted his days to speculating about the unspeakable, and has even bequeathed to an ungrateful posterity various volumes still spoken of, although seldom or never perused.

The aim of the present series of articles is to state to the best of the writer's ability a few of the reasons which induce philosophical scientists to regard mind as the product of experience. Brain is the organ of mind, and it is significant that all our higher sense structures are confined to the cranium. But the general tactile sense from which the superior senses of taste, smell, sight, and hearing, have been derived, is not restricted to any special area of the body. Almost any part of the skin will respond to the impact of outside influences. Different sensations are produced on the body surfaces by heat or cold, or through contact with solid or liquid substances. But only a few specialized areas of the animal framework are capable of being affected in such a way as to give rise to the complex sensations of the higher senses of vision, hearing, smell, and taste. And these sensory organs are so constructed that they are appropriately stimulated by a few special vibrations or particular substances only.

Changes known as reflex actions are constantly occurring in the body without occasioning consciousness. But we soon become conscious when the sensory or afferent nerves are stimulated by some external influence. Such states of consciousness are classed as feelings or sensations, volitions, thoughts, and emotions. These various forms of consciousness are all the outcome, directly or indirectly, of the stimulation or irritation of nervous tissue.

Sensations vary within wide limits. Some internal sensations, notably the fancies of ill-health, arise uncalled for and depart unbidden. These subjective feelings assume many forms, and frequently arise from such derangements as indigestion and other ailments of the vegetative system. But however much such morbid sensations may detract from the pleasures of life, they convey no knowledge of the external world.

The senses which enable us to hold converse with surrounding things are so constructed that each sensation to which they give rise is generated by stimuli applied to them, and of which they are the special mechanism. Taste and smell are confined to certain regions of the mouth and nasal cavities. Eye and ear are the respective organs of sight and sound, while the more generalized sense of touch, although spread much more extensively than the other senses, is, however, restricted to the skin, and to parts of the membranes coating the internal cavities of our bodies.

The sensation of touch is a simple feeling of contact that is associated with information concerning the particular region affected. If the tip of the finger touches a hot metal or a cold, rough surface there emerges a double consciousness. We are not only aware of the existence of these external substances, but we are conscious that they are in contact with the finger tip. The sensation seems to be located in the finger, and we attribute this to the material causing it. But it is different with the higher senses, for when we perceive the perfume of a rose we instinctively look for the flower. Unpleasant smells occasioned by bad drains and other causes outside ourselves are similarly regarded, and even those evil odours which accompany certain diseases of the nose itself—we refer to external agencies. In reality we see and hear in the brain, but we are constrained to attribute these sensations to the objects causing them. And with taste likewise, for as Huxley said:—

> When a lump of sugar is taken into the mouth, we are simply aware of a sensation of sweetness and do not associate that sensation of sweetness with any particular part of the mouth, though, by the sense of touch, which the inside of the mouth also possesses, we can tell pretty exactly whereabouts in the mouth the melting lump is lying.

In the course of evolution the special sense areas have been differentiated through the physiological division of labour to minister to peculiar modes of motion. From a primitive lens in the integument of simple organisms the complex organs of vision as they exist in birds, mammals, and others have been progressively developed. The vibrations of the luminiferous ether act on the eye in such a manner that the light rays generate the sensation of sight. The waves which produce such marvellous results when falling upon their appropriate organ evolve no appreciable effect when they come into contact with other areas of the body. In all instances where sensations of a higher order arise each results from the application of a special form of stimulus to its appropriate sense organ, and the arrangement of each organ is so contrived as to render that organ acutely sensitive to its appropriate stimulus.

The sensation of pressure generated when the body is brought into contact with solid substances varies greatly. This pressure sense reaches its maximum on the back of the hand and the skin of the forehead. The finger tip, so sensitive in other respects, is much less responsive to pressure than these bodily areas. And just as there exist "pressure spots," so there are skin regions highly sensitive to heat and cold. Even in one small section of the thigh, as Goldscheider has proved, there lie many localized areas some of which respond to heat only, while the remainder manifest marked responsiveness to cold. Our cheeks are far more sensitive to warmth than our lips, while the palms of the hands possess a greater sensitiveness to heat than their backs.

Tactile sensibility varies very considerably. Weber's experiments with the tactual sense demonstrate wide differences of discrimination and sensibility. The two points of a pair of compasses, if placed only one-tenth or one-twelfth of an inch apart, will be plainly felt as two when they touch the finger tips. If the same experiment is made with the back of the hand one impression only will be felt. The points may be parted for a quarter of an inch on the arm and still only one impression is felt. But the tongue proves extremely sensitive, for that organ will distinctly distinguish the two points when separated by a mere twenty-fourth of an inch. The cheeks and forehead, however, prove dull percipients when tested in this way, while the compass ends may be placed as far apart as three inches on the back and a single sensation is all we obtain.

Then there is the muscular sense which shows itself amenable to education and improvement. For instance, travellers who carry bags, in course of time more or less unconsciously, learn to carry them with the least possible effort. Many traders know without lifting the approximate weight of the goods before them. As a matter of fact the muscles possess nerve fibres which carry messages to the seat of sensation. As Dr. Barcroft states: "And there is but little doubt that we must look to the impulses generated in these nerves, more especially in the nerves of the tendons, as providing the sensations which form the basis of the muscular sense."

(To be continued.) T. F. PALMER.

The Twilight of the Gods.

II.

WE must dismiss the idea that Christianity triumphed over an enlightened and freethinking world. Ancient Freethought, as a matter of fact, flickered out with Lucian in the second century A.D. The weakness of Epicureanism was that it remained a philosophy for the easy and comfortable. Modern Freethought has the advantage of finding a natural, even if unconscious, ally in the democratic movement, which equally has to face the opposition of privileged ecclesiasticism. In the Roman Empire there was no democratic movement, because the basis of industry was slavery, and the slaves were a miscellaneous class drawn from all quarters of the Roman world, without education or the possibility of organization. Epicureanism, therefore, remained the property of those who had hope in this life. After Lucian, the last representative of a dwindling and unpopular school, we meet it no more.

The reason is to be found in the disappearance or enfeeblement of the social class that cherished this philosophy; and this, again, was due to the material decline of ancient civilization. A society whose economic foundation was slave-production, required for its maintenance a continual supply of fresh human chattels, and also an inexhaustible fund of surplus wealth in order to maintain in idleness the destitute freemen for whom there was no work. So long as Rome continued to conquer fresh provinces, both slaves and surplus wealth were virtually inexhaustible. This process, however, reached its inevitable limit in the second century A.D. The time came when the inflow of slaves began to dwindle, slave-labour became more expensive, and its inefficiency exhausted the soil. At the same time, the cost of defending the Empire increased. The old Roman armies, drawn from the Italian peasantry, and imbued with a genuine public spirit, ceased to exist when that peasantry itself ceased to exist. The legions, from the first century A.D., were drawn more and more from the provincial populations of Gaul, Pannonia, Syria, etc., who naturally felt no loyalty to Rome, and fought only for plunder and rewards. Discipline slackened, efficiency decreased, and the legions had to be continually placated by largesses of money. After the extinction of the Antonine dynasty, the Empire fell into an ever-increasing welter of mili tary anarchy, in which popular generals, usually not even of Roman blood, were proclaimed emperors by their troops, and rode roughshod over the Senate at Rome. Under this system taxation increased, while wealth diminished, and the old land-owning and slave-owning class were steadily impoverished.

It is an empirical law, which we may legitimately infer from a study of history, that classes and communities which live in prosperity and security, or in a lively hope of reaching it, tend to Freethought and Materialism in their beliefs; while those whose security is seriously threatened, or who in any case have no prospect of it, tend to superstition and supernaturalism. Ancient Freethought, accordingly, died out when ancient society began to be faced with impoverishment and ruin. The contrast between the dominant spirit towards the middle of the second century, when Roman prosperity was at its height, and that towards the middle of the third, when the decline was well under way, is very striking. The former age is still, on the whole, one of education and enlightenment. The Emperor Hadrian, in a letter written from Egypt, ridicules the agglomeration of Oriental superstitions which he finds there, the worship of Serapis, Judaism, Christianity, etc., as on one and the same level of absurdity. A century later, we find the Emperor Alexander Severus, himself not a Roman but a Syrian, placing the images of Abraham and Christ in his private chapel, and the Neo-Platonism of Plotinus on the way.

In the third century, therefore, Christianity had not to contend with a dominant Rationalism, but with mystical and theosophical systems on the same plane as itself. Platonism had ceased to be the more or less logical system that Plato had left it, and had become a super-natural religion, appealing to intuition and "ecstasy" instead of to reason. The Greek myths were interpreted as religious allegories, very much as modern Christians try to get over Old Testament absurdities in the same way. The association with an admittedly immoral mythology was, doubtless, an element of weakness to the Pagan religions in their struggle against Christianity. The latter had the advantage of having taken over its own mythology from the Jews, who had already subjected it to a refining process, in the interests of Monotheism, such as the Pagans had not applied to theirs. The Christians were able to use some of the old Epicurean arguments against the Pagan religions, without the Pagans being able to retort with the same amount of effect. The immoralities of the Greek myths were notorious to all; the Hebrew myths, on the other hand, were little studied by the Pagans, and were, in any case, less outrageous to the prevalent Monotheist feeling than the Greek myths were.

However, as we know, it was not the efficacy of propaganda, but the political sequence of events, which eventually turned the scale in favour of Christianity. Once in the ascendant after the "conversion" of Constantine, the Christians were able to turn against their rivals every weapon of official repression and mob-passion which they had once had to face themselves, with the added incentives of loot—for the Pagan temples were very wealthy—and economy—for animal sacrifices were expensive in an age of increasing penury. The triumph of Christianity was in a sense, as Nietzsche held, the victory of slave morality, inasmuch as a society which had sought to found civilization on slavery was reduced, by its own consequent enfeeblement, economic, political, and intellectual, to adopt the superstitions and standard of culture of its own slaves. It was very far, however, from being the advent of freedom.

Such was the "twilight of the gods" of the ancient world. In the present age, with important differences, we are passing through a similar transition. Once again the established religion has become for the majority an empty form, to which they adhere out of habit alone. Once again Governments continue to support that religion, merely because the "lower classes" must be kept in order by teaching them myths which the educated discard. Once again the genteel, who in the nineteenth century smiled at scepticism, rally to the support of religion when they feel their security threatened by the workers thinking and acting for themselves. But religion is now challenged, not by a newer religion founded on despair of the world, but by a secular movement based on the possibility of making the world better. We indict no longer this or that myth as immoral, but the whole alleged "plan of salvation." We seek to save, not the individual "soul," but the world's future, not by denying the natural man, but by creating an environment which will unite his interests with those of his fellows and his higher self. As with the old gods, so with the new one:—

> Thought made him and breaks him,
> Truth slays and forgives;
> But to you, as time takes him,
> This new thing it gives,
> Even love, the beloved Republic, that feeds upon freedom and lives.....
> One birth of my bosom;
> One beam of mine eye;
> One topmost blossom
> That scales the sky;
> Man, equal and one with me, man that is made of me, man that is I.

Robert Arch.

Notes from Scotland.

The Scottish Reformation Society has sent a petition to the Home Secretary and the Secretary for Scotland protesting against the Roman Catholics in Scotland holding processions in connection with the "Feast of the Sacred Heart." The Society protests against all such public processions as not only contrary to the laws of this Protestant realm, but most repugnant to the feelings of her Protestant population. This is only another sample of the narrow-minded bigotry of religious bodies towards each other. For my part, either the Roman Catholics or the Protestants can "process" till they are black in the face. I hope the Catholics will now object to the open-air meetings held annually at Queen's Park and Bothwell Brig to commemorate the doings of the pig-headed Covenanters and, likewise, to the uproarious processions of the Salvation Army, who certainly do a great deal to disturb the peace of any community they frequent.

Why all this fuss over "Highland Mary's" grave? I am sure Burns would have been the last man, were he alive to-day, to protest against the removal of an old graveyard, to be superseded by a large addition to works where thousands of workmen will earn their daily bread. Surely, our duty now is to look after the living and allow the dead to look after themselves.

Rothesay is distressed over the allegation that Sunday boating and fishing are carried on on Loch Fad.

Hamilton Town Council has decided to have Band Performances in the Public Park on Sundays, the music to be provided by the Military Bands in the district. When will the Glasgow Corporation follow suit?

Some amusing subjects are now announced to draw people into church. Last Sunday noticed one in the Gallowgate, Glasgow, which I thought was rather fetching: "Come in, ye thirsty." No doubt quite a number of the thirsty did not go in.

The Glasgow ministers have not yet devised a scheme to take the place of the Tramway Prize Draw. Last week only £50 was drawn instead of the usual £500. However, the ministers now have the satisfaction of knowing what the public think of their interference.

Has the Lord Advocate got his attention drawn to the prize drawing in aid of the Scottish Churches Huts in France, to take place at the end of the month? If not, why not?

Life in Glasgow this week is just similar to what it was before last Tuesday, although the whole of that day was devoted to prayer by a representative from each of the Christian organizations in the city, including the Salvation Army.

A combatant cleric, writing home from the Front, says the fact that at the present moment in Scotland there are more ministers than are necessary for the spiritual needs of the people was in the days of peace a scandal, but in these bloody days of war it is a crime. Is it absolutely necessary that we should have any, either in peace or war? Any way, why don't the young ones go and fight? It is quite evident they can be done without at home.

Now that the country requires all the taxes she can get, how is it that she does not insist on the Churches paying their fair share? Surely it is an absurdity that Churches get off scot free while hospitals, infirmaries, and all charitable institutions are taxed. Only a few weeks ago the Glasgow W. F. Presbytery were discussing the question of taxation on their manses, which they considered was inequitable while the manses of the Established Churches were entirely free. Churches, as well as manses, of all denominations should be taxed, as they get all the protection and privileges given to other buildings which are taxed. The less the Christians pay, the more Freethinkers have to pay.

In handing over a young man to the Military Authorities at Edinburgh, who claimed to be a regular minister of a religious denomination as he was discharging the duties of an evangelist preacher under the Faith Mission, Sheriff Orr said the position of the missionaries was simply that of itinerant preachers who went from place to place, but left no definite organization behind them. What will our religious cranks not do to evade their clear duties as citizens of the State? It is all very well when they can get other people to fight for them and leave them in safety at home, even though they proclaim that this is a righteous war.

CALEDON.

L.C.C. Prosecution.

THE SALE OF LITERATURE IN PARKS.

AT Old Street Police Court yesterday, before Mr. Clarke Hall, there were three summonses issued at the instance of the London County Council against James Neate, of Bethnal Green Road, for unlawfully selling the Freethinker without having first obtained in writing the consent of the clerk to the authority.

The defendant was defended by Mr. W. H. Eldridge (instructed by Mr. Charlton Hubbard).

Mr. Haedicke, solicitor, acting for the London County Council, said they did not press for a heavy fine, although the defendant was liable to a penalty of £5 for each offence proved. The proceedings were brought under No. 27 of the Council's by-laws, which provided that no person should sell articles or distribute handbills in the public parks without having consent in writing.

James Joseph Bradley, park-keeper, stated there was a meeting in Victoria Park on May 13, and he saw the defendant selling copies of the Freethinker. He told defendant he would be reported, and the reply was, "Very well." Witness bought a copy, and also copies on the other two dates. Defendant had no permit to sell on those dates.

Cross-examined.—There had been no complaint as to the conduct of the persons selling the paper. About twelve months ago witness received notification from the L.C.C. offices that permits to sell any literature had been withdrawn.

Mr. Eldridge.—And it was in consequence of that notification that these summonses have been issued?

Witness.—Yes. That is all I know about it. The defendant had been selling for years, and had permits for the Freethinker, among other things.

Mr. Eldridge submitted there was no case. It was admitted, he said, that the defendant had permits to sell literature in the parks, including the Freethinker, but now it was said that the park-keeper received notification that the permit had been withdrawn. The point he (counsel) made was that the alleged withdrawal by notice to the officer was not sufficient withdrawal to create an offence unless the defendant also received notice from the L.C.C. He held in his hand letters from that body that the permit was all right, and that he could continue to get a renewal.

A copy of the permit was handed to the magistrate, who remarked, "There is nothing in this permit to limit the time."

The L.C.C. Solicitor.—The park-keeper told him that the permit was revoked, and defendant said, "I know."

Mr. Clarke Hall.—This document is issued, but without any limit as to time.

The Solicitor.—I am afraid I cannot prove that at the moment.

The magistrate said they would go on with the broader issue.

Mr. Eldridge said there was a by-law on the Council's book regulating the question of the sale of literature, and permits were granted, but according to the park-keeper the Council had since thought fit to pass a resolution. He did not know what form it took, but it was sought to show that it had the effect of preventing the sale of literature.

The magistrate asked for a copy of this resolution.

Mr. Haedicke said he had not got it with him.

Mr. Eldridge went on to say that the defendant had had no notice of that resolution having been passed. His other point was that the Council had no right to make such a resolution, as there was a by-law which provided that the Council must deal with applications for permits that came before them. What the Council now said was that, though they had given a permit, they would, by resolution, prevent the sale of literature. It was not suggested there was anything against the character of the literature sold, because it all came before the proper officer, who then decided whether a permit should be granted. So far as he (the learned counsel) knew, there had been no objection to the defendant, who had sold the paper for years. The by-law had been made in pursuance of the London General Powers Acts, and, therefore, the Council must act upon it judicially.

The magistrate pointed out that the by-law was not designed specially against the sale of improper literature. It had to do, among other things, with selling or hiring any article, and was a question as to the parks. Could it not be said that to suit the convenience of the public the Council were entitled to resolve that any article could not be sold there?

Mr. Eldridge replied that what the Council had done was to say this was not proper literature to be sold.

The Magistrate.—I have not seen the resolution. If it was considered undesirable that certain literature shall not be sold they might have the right to say so for all I know.

Mr. Haedicke.—I say that under the by-law the Council have a right to say it shall not be sold.

Digitized by Google

The Magistrate.—That is true, but it must be done judicially. I think that at the proper time the Council's resolution should be produced. So far, I have no evidence of it.

Mr. Eldridge.—In fact, there is on the Council's agenda a resolution waiting to be considered in order to deal with the whole matter.

The Magistrate.—Why is this particular Society singled out for prosecution?

No answer was given.

Mr. Haedicke said he had not with him the Council's resolution withdrawing permission to sell literature in the parks. He, therefore, asked that the summonses should be adjourned.

After further discussion, it was arranged that the summonses should be adjourned for a week.—Morning Advertiser, June 21, 1917.

National Secular Society.

REPORT OF EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON JUNE 21.

The President, Mr. Chapman Cohen, occupied the chair. Also present: Messrs. Baker, Bowman, Brandes, Gorniot, Leate, Palmer, Roger, Samuels, Shore, Thurlow, and Wood; Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, Mrs. Rolf, and the Secretary.

Minutes read and confirmed.

The following officers for the ensuing year were elected: General Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance; Monthly Auditors, Messrs. Leat and Samuels; Benevolent Fund Committee, Messrs. Leat, Samuels, Roger, Wood, and Miss Kough.

New members were elected for the Sheffield and Swansea Branches and the Parent Society.

The Secretary reported that a cheque for £10, bequeathed to the Society by the late Captain Elvenstone Raggett, had been received.

It was also reported that the London County Council had issued summonses against Mr. Jas. Neate, Secretary of the Bethnal Green Branch, for selling literature in Victoria Park without a permit.

The Protest Committee had engaged a solicitor and counsel for his defence, and the case had been adjourned until June 27 for the L.C.C. to produce further evidence. An appeal for funds from this Committee was discussed, and it was resolved that the N.S.S. contribute £5.

Mr. Cohen reported correspondence between himself and Mr. J. W. Gott, in which the latter informed him of his arrest at Birmingham on a probable charge of blasphemy. The offence was contained in printed matter sold by Mr. Gott. The exact charge was not yet to hand. Mr. Cohen had made himself personally responsible for the engagement of a solicitor to attend the hearing of the case in the police court, and a resolution was carried unanimously endorsing this action. A long discussion followed in which it was pointed out that Mr. Gott was not a member of the N.S.S. and that the Society had no responsibility for the class of literature sold by him, which, apparently, constituted the offence. Mr. Cohen was asked to be present at the hearing of the case, and to report to the Executive, but no unanimous opinion was expressed as to future action.

A somewhat surprising circular on this matter, issued by Mr. Gott, which had not reached the Society officially, was reported, and general disapproval was expressed.

Some matters on the Conference Agenda remitted to the Executive were dealt with, and the remainder adjourned till next meeting.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Views and Opinions.

Baby Week.

Last Sunday numerous sermons were preached in connection with "Baby Week." Attention has been directed to preventible infant mortality, and it is one of the ironies of life that the War, with its wholesale destruction of life, should be the occasion for the campaign. It is pointed out that if France had had a larger birth-rate, it would have had a larger army against Germany. If our birth-rate can be increased, we also shall be in a better position for future conflicts. The ideal is not a lofty one, nor is the inference unquestionable. To breed children for the purpose of supplying armies may cause some to reflect whether it is worth while breeding children at all. And some may hold the opinion that it is quality of population, not numbers, that is of importance. Mere numbers may create problems, but numbers will never solve them. It is, said Ruskin, of no vital consequence whatever whether a man has two children or four children, but it is of great consequence whether the children he does have deserve to be hanged or not. And in that saying we cordially concur.

Reprisals.

Quite in accordance with their usual policy, the Churches have tried to convert this question into a Christian one. Father Vaughan and the Bishop of London have, as usual, been very busy, and have dwelt at length on the getting of babies, the rearing of babies, and the care of children generally. And their activity invites reprisals. For there is a sense in which the question of the care of children, particularly the prevention of their neglect and ill-treatment, is a peculiarly Christian one. That is, it reaches its most acute phase in Christian countries. Neglect or ill-treatment of children is seldom heard of amongst Jews; it is practically unknown amongst uncivilized peoples. We do not recall having read of it as existing in any great degree amongst Mohammedans. Japan is said to be a paradise for children. Among the Esquimaux, Nansen said that he never saw or heard of a case of child-neglect or ill-usage, and they seemed unable to appreciate why a child should ever be beaten. If a campaign for the protection of child-life is in any sense a Christian one, it can only be on the principle that a movement for cheap baths is one that peculiarly concerns dirty people.

Justice for God.

One expression used in connection with children suffering from neglect was striking and suggestive. They were said to be "God's children." Now, on that point we should like to keep a perfectly open mind. We do not say they are not God's children; but if they are not, then it strikes us as a gross libel on Deity. If they are his children, then their state is a grave impeachment of his fatherhood. We are certain that no man would like it said of him that his children were running about the streets in a sadly neglected condition. He would not like it made public were it true; he would be indignant were it false. And we do not observe that evidence is offered that these neglected one's are God's children. All these people do is to collect a number of half-starved and neglected children, and say they are God's. Why? do they insist that they bear in their neglect the hall-mark of God's paternity? It seems hardly fair to God. Mark Twain said that in all the attacks on the Devil we never get his side of the case, and he would much like to hear Satan in his own defence. One feels like that with regard to God. We hear nothing from him; and one would like to hear what he has to say of these people who, whenever there is an earthquake, or a war, or an epidemic, put it down to God. As an Atheist, we ask for justice—even for God.

God and Man.

Now, we do not say that these neglected ones are God's children. We are trying to be impartial. All the parents we know are men and women. When they look after their children we say they are good parents. When they neglect them we say they are bad ones. And if the parents abscond, and the care of the children is left to others, we do not find the runaways praised or worshipped. What we find is a small handbill stuck up outside the police station asking for information as to where they have gone, so that they may be pursued and punished. And we really do not see how we are justified in judging God's treatment of his children by any different standard. It is not fair, it is grossly partial to punish a man for neglecting his children, and to praise God when he neglects his. Let us be fair to God, but let us also be fair to man. Or, if we haven't the courage to condemn, do not let us be cowardly enough to praise. Of course, it is not we who say we are God's children. It is Christians who say so. All we contend is that if it be so, it is the primary duty of a parent to stick to his family. And that is in accord with both law and common sense.

God's Work!

Father Vaughan will tell us that as God's children we are called upon to help him in his work of setting the world right. But what is God's work? And why should we do it for him, or even help him to do it? It seems to us that, on the whole, God does his work in such a way that it takes man no small part of his time to undo it, or to correct it. On any theological reading of the universe it is God who sends diseases, and man who discovers remedies for them. And how many generations are scourged with these diseases before a remedy is found for them? And, note, that man does not have to discover the diseases; they discover him. They are there ready to operate, part and parcel of God's scheme of creation. Nor are the remedies thus ready to hand. These have to be sought out by laborious, painful, sometimes dangerous methods. It took less than forty years for that hideous complaint, syphilis, to spread from one end of Christendom to the other. It has taken four centuries for man to discover a more or less uncertain remedy.

Digitized by Google

Man versus God.

God's work! The best phases of life is not God's work, but man's. God did not leave the world habitable by a civilized being; it was man who made it so. God spreads a river over a countryside and leaves a morass. Man deepens the channel, raises an embankment, drains the land, and so creates the possibilites of development. God leaves man ignorant, and human inquisitiveness gives him knowledge. God leaves man a savage, and human association civilizes. God leaves man the prey of brutal passions; men teach each other how to restrain them, and how to transmute them to worthy ends. And all the time, God—if there be one—is dogging his footsteps, providing a new disease for every change in life, punishing every false step with unfaltering cruelty, afflicting old and young, strong and weak, good and bad with impartial malignancy. Man's only protection against Deity is knowledge; and of all the trees in the Garden of Eden, the tree of knowledge was the one of which he was sternly forbidden to eat.

Helping God.

God's children! God's work! Helping God! How many and how varied are the brain-benumbing phrases with which religion perpetuates its rule! But the last one contains a helpful and suggestive truth. For man is always helping God, not in his work, but to exist. We see God's blunders, correct them, and then praise his wisdom for making them. Anthropologists enlighten us as to his origin and ancestry, and man straightway invents something of a more reputable character. When the doings of God are made plain, a whole army of apologists help to whitewash him. Of course, it is the duty of children to help their aged parents, and one wonders if that is what Christians have in view when they talk about helping God? We should not be surprised. For God does grow hopeless as mankind reaches maturity. The measure of God's strength is the measure of human weakness. God and man cannot both grow at the same time. As one rises the other falls; and a little less readiness to help God might easily result in there soon being nothing to assist.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Reformation in England.

II.

THE most damning of all evidences against the truth of the Christian religion is the evidence so abundantly furnished by its own history in all its periods. Gibbon mentions as one of five causes of its growth "the pure and austere morals" of its early professors; but it can be conclusively proved from ancient Christian documents that those morals were much more austere than pure. Not even during the first three centuries did the Christians display qualities, or perform deeds, which justified the deduction that they were living under supernatural direction and control. We know from Eusebius and other primitive writers that it was customary to magnify their virtues and minimize, or utterly ignore, their defects. Their own claim has always been and is, not only that they possess the only true religion, not merely that the Christian code of morality is infinitely superior to all other codes, but that they are God's own people, the redeemed of the Lord, whom he fills and leads with his own Spirit; and our contention is that at no period has that claim been verified, but that in all ages and countries alike it has been completely falsified in their actual life and character. Besides, it is historically indisputable, not simply that Christians are not socially and morally superior to their non-Christian neighbours, but that their very religion, or their professed zeal for the Lord's cause, has often given rise to, or served as a cloak for, the most selfish, unjust, and tyrannical conduct on record. History makes it perfectly clear that this was peculiarly the case in connection with the Reformation in England during the whole of the sixteenth century. Of the piety of Henry VIII. and Bloody Mary no reasonable doubt can be entertained. Both verily believed that God had called them to be England's rulers. The following was Henry's Confession of Faith as a monarch:—

> By Scripture it appeareth that it appertaineth unto the office of princes to see that right religion and true doctrine be maintained and taught, and that their subjects may be well ruled and governed by good and just laws; and to provide and care for them that all things necessary for them may be plenteous; and that the people and commonweal may increase; and to defend them from oppression and invasion, as well within the realm as without; and to see that justice be administered unto them indifferently; and to hear benignly all their complaints; and to show towards them, although they offend, fatherly pity. And, finally, so to correct them that be evil, that they had yet rather save them than lose them if it were not for respect of justice, and maintenance of peace and good order in the commonweal (Froude's Henry the Eighth, vol. i., pp. 109, 110).

That Confession of Royal Faith was set forth by Royal authority in 1536, when Henry had occupied the throne for seven and twenty years. At first he was immensely popular, and for some years he was almost an ideal king, as well as a model husband and friend. The masses idolized him, foreign ambassadors were never weary of singing his praises, and everybody was convinced that he possessed exceptional physical and mental qualifications for the efficient discharge of his kingly office. Froude says that for nearly twenty years, "as a ruler, he had been eminently popular. All his wars had been successful. He had the splendid tastes in which the English people most delighted, and he had substantially acted out his own theory" (Ibid., vol. i., p. 109).

Let us now attend to a few tragically illuminating dates and doings. Henry succeeded his father in his eighteenth year, and in the same year, in conformity to his father's will and the wish of his ministers, he married Catherine of Arragon, his senior by six years. For fifteen years, to a certainty, this union was apparently a happy one, and the king took an active part in all the affairs of the nation. He was an all-round man of the world; a profound theologian, by no means a commonplace statesman, an eager sportsman, a devotee of the New Learning, always affable and free, especially with strangers. If his marriage had continued a success, it is possible that he would have been less of a despot than he actually became. He grew tired of Catherine, however, as the years rolled by. Whether he ever really loved her or not, her failure to bear him an heir, her natural unattractiveness, and her seniority, alienated him from her. Besides, even if she had given birth to thoroughly healthy children, their legitimacy would have been open to grave doubts, because of the strong suspicion that marriage with a sister-in law was not lawful. On these accounts, it seems that in 1524 he ceased to share his wife's bed, and in 1527 his demand for a divorce was formally laid before the Pope. It should be borne in mind that Catherine was the aunt of the Emperor Charles V., who naturally opposed such a request, and that in consequence his Holiness dilly-dallied with the subject, seeking safety in delay. Clement's dilatoriness irritated Henry so much that in 1529 he called a Parliament which he knew would support his policy to the utmost, the members being nearly all his own nominees, prepared to sink their own judgment in deference to his. As Gardiner says, "when Parliament met in 1529 it contained a packed House of Commons ready to do the king's bidding." By this time the king fancied he was passionately in love with Anne Boleyn; and Cardinal Pole, in a treatise published at Rome in the winter of 1538-9, accuses him, "among other enormities, of having lived in criminal intercourse with" Anne's younger sister. Whether this charge was true or not we have no means of ascertaining, the only thing we are absolutely sure of being that, for various reasons, he was determined to get rid of his wife, and that, in order to achieve that end, this Parliament was entrusted with the task of freeing the English Church from the Pope's jurisdiction. Henry displayed consummate shrewdness and sagacity in the conduct of this affair. He saw to it that the nation was at his back, and with wonderful ingenuity he obtained the nation's approval of point after point until, by the year 1535, the authority of Rome in England was a thing of the past, and Henry had become the sole Head of the English Church.

Such was the first stage in the English Reformation, and the only purpose it was intended to serve was the securing of the king's much-coveted divorce. Convocation was forced to sign a document which bound it neither to meet nor transact any business without the king's authority. Thus the whole clergy became the mere tools of the Crown. Refusal to accept the Supremacy Act was punishable by death. For this crime Sir Thomas More and Bishop Fisher, two of the best and noblest men who ever lived, were beheaded. More retained his sense of humour to the end, for when the fatal blow was about to descend, he carefully removed his beard from the block, saying ironically, "Pity that should be cut, that has never committed treason." Christian apologists often refer to the Reign of Terror under Robespierre during the French Revolution, ignorantly exclaiming, "Behold a sample of the state of things which would prevail if Infidels and Atheists had the power." But during the last seventeen years of the believing Henry's reign there was an unbroken Reign of Terror in England. The least suspicion of disloyalty to the Acts of Supremacy and Succession, the remotest sign of theological heresy, or departure from orthodoxy, even though not a word was spoken, served as an excuse for the worst form of execution. At first it was the Protestants who were persecuted and slaughtered. If a man doubted or denied the doctrine of Transubstantiation, he was sent to the flames. Whoever spoke against the sufficiency of communion in one kind, clerical celibacy, the perpetual obligation of vows of chastity, private masses, and auricular confession was sentenced to imprisonment and confiscation of his goods for the first offence, and to the gallows for the second. The statute of the Six Articles was the quintessence of injustice and cruelty. Later on it was the Protestants who persecuted, and they soon became past masters in the art. They broke into churches, and tore down wonder-working crucifixes and burned them in the fields. Green says:—

> The miraculous rood at Boxley, which bowed its head and stirred its eyes, was paraded from market to market and exhibited as a juggle before the Court. Images of the Virgin were stripped of their costly vestments and sent to be publicly burnt at London. Latimer forwarded to the capital the figure of our Lady which he had thrust out of his cathedral church at Worcester, with rough words of scorn: She with her old sister of Walsingham, her younger sister of Ipswich, and her two other sisters of Doncaster and Penrice, would make a jolly muster at Smithfield. Fresh orders were given to fling all relics from their reliquaries, and to level every shrine with the ground (Short History, pp. 354-5).

Ere long a reaction set in, and once more the persecutors became the persecuted. "Anne Ascue was tortured and burnt with three companions for the denial of Transubstantiation," and the Protestants generally were very cruelly treated. In 1547 Henry VIII. died, and was succeeded by his son, Edward VI., whose reign lasted only six years, during which revolutionary period the Protestants were in power. The whole country rang with vehement invectives against all Catholic doctrines, and rivers of Catholic blood were flowing in all directions. The Statute of Heresy was repealed, and left to the mercy of the Common Law the adherents of the Catholic Faith were sent to the stake without a moment's hesitation. In 1553 Mary became Queen, and during her reign of five years the Catholics were supreme, while the Protestants were committed in batches to the flames. Five bishops were burnt. In less than four years some three hundred persons perished at the stake. In 1558 Elizabeth came to the throne, and during her reign of forty-four years England became, "as a nation, as a power, essentially Protestant," which it has continued to be to this day. Under Elizabeth persecution descended to the lowest depth of brutality. Bishop Bilson, in his Christian Subjection, defended the coercive enactments on the plea that toleration was absolutely sinful. Catholics were sinners doomed to die, and a Christian queen might neither pardon nor wink at their falsehood. As Lecky well says, "there is much truth as well as bitter eloquence in the taunt of an old persecuted Puritan, when he denounced Anglicanism as 'the Church that is planted in the blood of her mother.'"

Are we not fully justified, then, in our contention that Christianity dehumanizes its professors in proportion to the intensity of their belief in it? Both Catholicism and Protestantism, throughout their history, have been equally anti-social and anti human, and they provide the most cogent and conclusive argument conceivable for Atheism. With the history of the Church in mind, it is absolutely impossible for thoughtful people to believe in the existence of a God of justice and love. It is simply because Christianity is gradually passing away that toleration is at last gaining ground. It is an incontrovertible fact that Supernaturalism and Humanism cannot exist and prosper together, the one being of necessity bound to crush the other.

J. T. Lloyd.

Two Antwerp priests have been condemned to five years' hard labour. This is a severe sentence for men accustomed to work one day weekly.

The endowment of superstition is by no means a thing of the past. The late Mr. W. C. Buckley, of Longsight, Manchester, has left the bulk of his estate of £178,000 to the Church of England. The poor bishops will soon be dreaming of a war bonus.

A Doubting Dean.

This mystery of vending spiritual gifts is nothing but a trade.—Swift.

Is not religion a cloak?—Swift.

Not a fantastical fool of them all shall flout me out of my calling.—Shakespeare.

Swift is Rabelais in his good sense.—Voltaire.

THE Christian Church has contained in its fold many great men. Some of them were sincere believers in the doctrines they preached. Others were Christians from force of circumstances, or held to the doctrines for the material gain which has ever been no inconsiderable bait with which to catch men. To which class did Jonathan Swift belong? Was this great genius a sincere Christian, or was he merely a professing believer for the sake of the position he hoped to gain? Would he have remained a Christian had actual deaneries and possible bishoprics with their emoluments had no existence? Should we have found him among the Scotch Covenanters on the field of battle, or in the arena with the lions at Rome, had his birth placed him in different circumstances?

His biographers, Scott, Johnson, and Thackeray, all describe Swift as religious, and the general opinion agrees with them. One hesitates to enter the lists against such eminent writers, but a candid opinion compels us to say that we believe that Swift was a Christian only in name; that he remained in the Church for the same reason that prompted Judas, in the legendary story, to sell his Master. In fact, Swift was not merely a Christian; he was devoid of religious feeling, and he was one of the most irreligious of men. Compared to him, Paine and Voltaire were saints, for these great Freethinkers had at heart that enthusiasm for humanity, that love of their kind, which was entirely absent in Swift. The author of Gulliver's Travels and The Tale of a Tub was intellectually incapable of being a Christian, and emotionally incapable of loving his fellow-men. The Tale of a Tub is one of the most tremendous indictments of Christianity, from the purely intellectual side, that has ever been given to the world. Gulliver's Travels expresses such a scorn of the human race, with its Lilliputian bitterness and its Brobdignagian coarseness, that its writer was physically and constitutionally incapable of sympathizing with a religion which claims to be a gospel of love.

Voltaire, a most excellent judge, regarded The Tale of a Tub as casting ridicule on all forms of the Christian faith. The man who wrote that book was perfectly aware of the logical inferences of his propositions. The bishops who advised Queen Anne, when they counselled her not to appoint Dean Swift to a bishopric, were not without sagacity. There can be no doubt that Queen Anne and Voltaire were both right when, from their very different points of view, they regarded Swift's literary work as anti-Christian.

Swift was irreligious, and a life-long dissembler. He could be coarser than Rabelais, and profaner than Voltaire. Men have been convicted and sentenced to death for treating sacred subjects less offensively than Swift treats the Holy Communion. Consider the facts of his life. He was brought up in the household of the epicurean Sir William Temple, and educated in the library of an avowed Freethinker. Why Swift took holy orders, except for the loaves and fishes, it is difficult to say. He put the cassock on for a living, but he was choked by its bands. Swift was the boon companion of Pope, and a friend of the freethinking Bolingbroke. He deliberately chose these sceptics as the closest friends of his life, and the recipients of his confidence and affection. It is not difficult to imagine him joining in many a profane argument and blasphemous joke over Pope's port, or Bolingbroke's burgundy. It is significant, nay, almost conclusive, as to the insincerity of Swift's religion, that he advised John Gay, the wildest of the wits about town, to turn parson and look out for a seat on the bench.

The paper Swift left behind him, Thoughts on Religion, is merely a set of excuses for not professing disbelief. He says of his sermons, quite truthfully, that he preached pamphlets. They have no special Christian characteristics, and might have been preached from the steps of a Mohammedan mosque as well as from the pulpit of a Christian church. There is no cant, for Swift was too great and proud for that cowardly and sorry device. Tried even by the low standard of the eighteenth century, his sermons are singularly secular. The following amusing passage from Swift's sermon on the fate of Eutychus, who fell out of a window whilst listening to St. Paul preaching, will illustrate our meaning:—

> The accident which happened to this young man in the text hath not been sufficient to discourage his successors; but because the preachers now in the world, however they may exceed St. Paul in the art of setting men to sleep, do extremely fall short of him in the working of miracles; therefore men are become so cautious as to choose more safe and convenient stations and postures for taking their repose without hazard of their persons, and, upon the whole matter, choose rather to entrust their destruction to a miracle than their safety.

But, perhaps, the surest indication of Swift's real irreligion is given in the striking verses on the Day of Judgment, which were not published till after his death. They were sent by Lord Chesterfield in a letter to Voltaire; but everybody now knows the biting lines:—

> Ye who in divers sects were shammed,
> And came to see each other damned
> (For so folk told you; but they knew
> No more of Jove's designs than you),
> The world's mad business now is o'er,
> And Jove resents such pranks no more.
> I to such blockheads set my wit!
> I damn such fools! Go, go; you're bit.

The eye which can perceive sincere religion in these caustic and vigorous lines would regard old Montaigne as a Methodist, and Rabelais as a Roman Catholic.

It is, of course, true that in ecclesiastical and theological controversy Swift always took the orthodox side, for outwardly he was loyal enough to his employers. For the Deists of his time, such as Toland, Asgill, and Collins, he expressed contempt. He refers to "that quality of their voluminous writings which the poverty of the English language compels me to call their style." In his famous and sinister argument upon the inconveniences which would result from the total abolition of the Christian religion, he drenches his opponents with vitriol. But it is all purely dialectic fencing. Swift's polemic was aimed at guarding the material prosperity of the Church, of which he was a paid official; just as a counsel will argue for whichever side pays him his retaining fee. If Swift's sword was sharp, it was a double-edged weapon, as may be seen by the sardonic climax:—

> To conclude: whatever some may think of the great advantage to trade by this favourite scheme, I do very much apprehend that in six months after the Act is passed for the extirpation of the Gospel, the Bank and East India stock may fall at least one per cent. And since that is fifty times more than ever the wisdom of our age thought fit to venture for the preservation of Christianity, there is no reason why we should be at so great a loss for the sake of destroying it.

When face to face with death, Swift let the mask slip from his features, and we see for a brief moment the real man. When he wrote his own epitaph, he disdained any religious allusion. A pillar of the Church, he refused to permit any pietistic platitudes upon his tombstone. A dignified worldliness, an appeal to the memory of his fellow-men, but not a syllable of God or Christ:—

> Here lies the body of Jonathan Swift, Doctor of Divinity, Dean of this Cathedral Church, where fierce rage can tear the heart no more. Go, traveller, and imitate, if you can, an earnest, manly champion of freedom.

The original is in Latin, and the dates were the only additions. His allusion to his fight for freedom is genuine, for he fought for the liberty of Ireland.

Rabelais and Renan, both great sceptics, left the Church, and chose the road to mental freedom. Swift stayed in the Church, and failed in his ambition. In spite of a life-long servitude, Swift was a disappointed man. He had to be content with a petty deanery, when his ambition was at least a bishopric. The fierce rage, of which he wrote as lacerating his heart, was intensified by loss of preferment. He had prostituted his great and splendid genius. After all his dissembling he died, to quote his own painful words, "like a poisoned rat in a hole."

The Sense Organs of Man.

The sense of taste is situated in the mucous membrane which mantles the tongue and the back part of the palate. This is a curiously deceptive sense, for many of the supposed tastes are in reality complex sensations into which touch, smell, and the temperature sense are apt to enter. Salt, sugar, quinine, and various acid substances possess no appreciable smell, and these materials—the salt, sweet, bitter, and acid substances—we, unquestionably, taste. But, as Professor Haycraft reminds us, "Meat, wines, and fruit are smelt not tasted, and a bad cold dulls our appreciation of these articles of diet." If the nasal apertures are carefully closed, or if the sense of smell is defective, many substances ordinarily palatable become "tasteless." A mild onion tasted with closed eyes may be mistaken for an apple. This also explains the reason why invalids very frequently screw up their noses when swallowing a nauseous draught. It is urged that such "tastes" as depend upon smell should be referred to as "flavours" as they are entirely due to the odoriferous particles discharged by the substances in question. The true sense of taste varies in sensibility on different parts of the tongue's surface. The tip of the tongue is most sensitive to sugary substances, the sides are most affected by acids, while the back of the tongue best responds to bitter tastes.

A higher sense is that of smell, and its mechanism is the delicate mucous membrane which lines the upper portion of the nasal chambers. In this area the mucous membrane differs from the ordinary mucous membrane of the nasal cavities through the nature of its constituent cells, and in the circumstance that it is the recipient of a generous nervous supply from the olfactory nerves, as also by its possession of a number of nerve filaments.

Each nostril leads into a spacious nasal cavity, and the two nostrils are separated one from the other by a partition. This partition is termed the septum, and is formed both by cartilage and bone. In the upper section of the nose resides the olfactory apparatus. This region is the seat of the sense of smell, and is provided with a thick mucous membrane of a dark brown colour. The nerve of smell—the olfactory nerve—ends in the olfactory mucous membrane. From the brain it enters into the nasal chamber in the form of several small branches, and these spread out in the delicate mucous membrane and terminate in tiny fibres which are prolonged into epithelial cells projecting into the surface of the nose. These cells are the olfactory cells, and they are exceedingly sensitive to the impact of odorous particles, and the stimulus thus generated travels to the brain along the ramifications of the olfactory nerve.

So wonderful is the sense of smell that perfumed particles of inconceivable minuteness are able to produce most powerful sensations. A grain of musk will scent a room for many months, and as there can be no perfume apart from a constant discharge of odorous particles these particles must be almost infinitely small. Where the particles are few they may fail to reach the olfactory membrane, but when the perfume is delicate we may displace the odourless air which circulates round it by snuffing up the air, and then we are able to perceive distinctly the perfume of what seemed a scentless flower. In the event of a severe cold the loss of smell which arises is, probably, occasioned by the swollen condition of the mucous membrane which then obstructs the passage of scent-laden air into the olfactory cavity.

The sense of hearing must now be considered, and a much more elaborate mechanism ministers to acoustic impressions than those previously outlined. We have seen that in cutaneous sensation the skin functions in different ways. The auditory organ also performs distinct functions. In addition to its hearing powers, the ear serves to acquaint the brain with the head's position, or alteration of position in relation to surrounding things. These separate functions reside in two different regions of the inner ear. This inner ear lies well within the skull, and between this internal organ and the external ear is found the middle ear. The external and middle ear may be regarded as accessory—the internal ear is the essential hearing apparatus. We hear through the medium of impressions arising from the vibrations of elastic bodies which, as sound waves, are mainly conveyed by the atmosphere. These vibrations are communicated through the complex hearing apparatus to the auditory nerves, and are transmitted from them to the sensorium. All the essential parts of the organ of sound must function properly if we are to hear distinctly. The sense is dulled when injuries or inflammation of the delicate and elaborate mechanism occur.

Remarkable variations in the range of hearing power exist. Many people are wholly insensible to sounds which are distinctly heard by others. Wollaston considers that the normal range of human hearing embraces nine octaves. That is to say, the average ear perceives vibrations of musical notes ranging from sixteen vibrations per second up to about 32,500.

As we have noted, the nerves of smell cannot transmit the tremors of light, nor can the nerves of taste convey to the brain the sensation of smell. So in the case of sonorous vibrations a special nerve is requisite which emerges from the brain into one of the ear cavities, and there ramifies into a number of filaments. This nerve is the auditory nerve, and the sonorous vibrations which reach this from outside are translated by the brain into the sensation of sound. Sound is a mode of motion of the atmosphere, and when the sound waves impart their motion to the tympanic membrane, which is stretched across the ear passage leading to the brain, this membrane which closes the ear drum is made to vibrate. The motion passes to the terminals of the auditory nerve, travels along the nerve to the brain, and there awakens the consciousness of sound.

The drum or tympanum, together with the long canal (meatus) which opens into the external visible ear, constitute the middle ear. The external meatus and the eardrum would form a single cavity were they not separated by a membrane, the delicate tympanic membrane, which is firmly spread in a slanting direction over the passage, and thus divides the relatively small cavity of the drum from the meatus.

The tympanic membrane in this manner prevents any communication through the meatus between the external air and the drum. Means for this conveyance, however, are available in a roundabout way by the Eustachian tube which proceeds directly from the fore part of the drum inwards to the pharynx—a muscular sac near the upper part of the gullet—at the roof of which it opens. There are many other structures of the middle ear, but the function of each and all is to secure by means of modified touch the translation of atmospheric vibrations into the various sensations of sound.

The inner ear has been compared to "a very peculiarly formed membranous bag." In early stages of the ear's development this "bag" is a simple circular sac, but as it grows it assumes a very complicated form, and separates into several parts. The inner ear is lodged in an intricate cavity, imbedded in a hard mass of bone, and is situated at the base of the skull. The auditory sac, however, does not quite fill the cavity, thus permitting a space between the osseous walls and the ear sac. This space is interrupted at certain spots where the sac is in contact with its bony receptacle, and at these points of junction a fluid termed perilymph is found. The essential organ of hearing is enclosed within this sac, and consists of a single canal which is coiled in the form of a spiral shell. This wonderful mechanism is the canalis cochlearis, which, with the bony cavity which surrounds it, constitutes the cochlea, the chief organ of hearing. The structure of this organ is too elaborate for brief description. Full details of this and the other organs which build up our knowledge of the external world, and of which they are, indeed, the sole vehicles of communication, may be studied in any standard physiological text-book, while a brilliant exposition of the subject is contained in Huxley's Physiology, the sixth edition, 1915, enlarged and revised by that eminent authority, Dr. Barcroft, F.R.S.

All bodies that evolve sound are in motion, and they transfer their vibrations to the air which is thus thrown into waves. These aerial pulses pass into the external auditory passage and influence the outer ear and the surface of the skull. Some of these waves may reach the organs of hearing through the solid cranium, but such waves are too slight to be appreciable in normal conditions. We are mainly indebted for our powers of hearing to the pulses propagated along the meatus, across the channel of which lies spread the tympanic membrane or drumhead. A chain of small bones stretches from the drumhead to the internal ear, and these bones form the instruments of transmission for the movements of the membrane to the cochlea—the spiral organ previously mentioned. Thus we realize that the harmonies and melodies of musical genius, the beauties of human and avian song, the splendours of oratory, and all the countless advantages we derive from aural intercourse, arise from our ability to translate aerial pulses into sensations of sound by means of the bodily instruments now briefly described.

The Cairn.

SCOTLAND, at least half of it, and comparatively speaking, is a land of mountains. Pimples, Ingersoll has called them, also speaking comparatively. Every cock crows best on its ain midden. There is a mental exaltation and a physical elasticity to be found on the hill-tops. The wind blows free, and cool, and pure. The bleached grasses and brown heath make shaggy but delightful footing for the occasional mountaineer. Narrow sheep tracks lead him anywhere and everywhere; but the cairn is his objective, and the far surrounding view. Some thoughtful soul has placed in a cleft of the cairn—not a Bible, not a bottle of whisky—but a book and pencil in a Kodak tin. We note the names in this "Visitors' Book," and, well pleased, inscribe our own, and again and again, as we revisit the delectable wilderness. The poet has been here, the humanist, Atheist, nature-lover, philosopher—many in one—the pietist, too, perhaps, but so far unconfessed. Not so the others. We read:

> Age with approval sees, and youth should learn
> To venerate and guard the mountain cairn;
> A lonely throne—the dignities of kings
> Compared with this are feeble paltry things.
> Respect the cairn, roll not a fragment down,
> But add your tribute to the mountain's crown;
> 'Tis Nature's shrine, the human family
> Of many faiths here all in one agree.

Another describes the objective scene:—

> Clear as a bell, and crisp and cold with snow
> On Arran's length, the solemn sea below,
> And, round, the sober landscape spreading wide,
> While snowy clouds on far horizons rise;
> 'Tis coldly bright, but snugly in the lee
> I smiling sit to pen these lines to thee,
> Excelsior! unknown, unknowing friend,
> Hail, and farewell! again I must descend.

And one remembers absent friends and writes:—

> Also with me in spirit (though I am no Spiritualist) are, and, and, and, and, and—; all great men, if you only knew them; and four little men—
> > Sandy, and Andy, and Hughie, and Will,
> > All of them here on the top of the hill;
> > Not spirits, or ghosts, or shadows of fear,
> > But living, and loving, and ever most dear.

And one in those "regions, consecrate to oldest time," celebrates in verse the birthday of his old friend and fellow-"sinner":—

> Up here once more with Wisdom by my side—
> My ancient, trusty comrade John Macbride;
> Still hale and hearty, very much alive,
> Although to-day he reaches sixty-five.

And John himself, with laborious pencil, leaves this thought in the cairn:—

> Who said "do good to them that hate you?"
> Who but the God that did create you;
> But surely His is cur'ous teaching
> Who damns in practice His own preaching.

After reading—and writing—my share of the above, like a certain "sacred" person, I "went apart" for a space, and in a moment of rare and happy inspiration came upon a broken, half-sunken boulder that almost spoke to me. This hill-top, it is said, had once been flattened for a Roman fort. Talk of moving the stones of Rome! This stone moved me with its ancient, inarticulate tale. Older than the Elgin marbles, in their sculptured shape at least; and chiselled, too, with the quaint, weird artistry of Nature—the pitted eyes; the broken nose, on which a rock-crystal, like a drop of petrified mucous, lay; the imaginary context of mouth and chin; the flat and hoary-lichened scalp; semblance sufficient for the mind touched to sympathy and awe; epitome of all the years, all the dead of time and eternity; pensive, patient; conscious, unconscious; supplicating, resigned—but who will fathom, much less describe, the ancient mysteries of inanimate things? Ah! I have been away down there. For the moment I am fay, I am seer, I am interpreter. It is revelation, but to myself alone. It is the exquisite psychological moment. I am loth to, but I must, return. Shelley's living lark is soaring in the azure. The wind is hissing in the heath. For me, now, the mountain is a Mecca. It has a monument. There is grander music in the cairn. I return to my old friend, who pockets his spectacles and his Freethinker to come and see my prodigy.

Acid Drops.

Want of space last week prevented our noting the attempt of the Bognor Council to enforce the Sunday closing of cinema shows. The attempt was made on an application for a renewal of the licence, and the opposition was led off by the Vicar. He confessed that he had no fault to find with the performances, but he thought it was a wrong time for us to go in for a "continental Sunday," especially as "our Allies are trying to get rid of it." We are afraid the Vicar of Bognor is not over scrupulous about the truth. The notion that the French have any intention of copying our English Sunday, in the maintenance of which a visit to a picture palace is treated as a giddy dissipation, is the reverse of the truth. Our Sunday is peculiarly English, and it will remain so—until the British people are sufficiently civilized to kill it.

The professional nature of the opposition was frankly avowed by several clergymen, and was also brought out by a question addressed to the Vicar. "Does it interfere with your Sunday-schools?" the Vicar was asked. "Yes," he admitted; "it did make a considerable difference." Rev. D. G. Evans, Congregationalist, found the "great difficulty, particularly among the elder boys of the school, was the fact that they preferred to go to the cinema rather than to the Sunday-school." Rev. T. Ross, Wesleyan, objected because "the Sunday-schools of England had been depleted by millions" on account of the cinemas. Quite frankly the man of God said that the children "had better die than grow up godless and without such training as we can give them in the Sunday-schools." That is candid. Better have corpses than Freethinkers; and we have no doubt that in other days Mr. Ross would have been ready to enforce the alternative. However, the police raised no objection; they said that the cinemas had taken "rowdyism off the streets"—a thing the Churches had been unable to do; and the Bench renewed the licence. So the thinning of the Bognor Sunday-schools will go on, and the Rev. T. Ross will find neither the death-roll increased nor the people made more unhappy in the interests of his miserable creed.

The Woman Suffrage victory in the House of Commons is a tribute to Freethought, for Freethinkers have advocated the equality of the sexes for generations. It is significant that Mary Wollstonecraft pleaded for the rights of woman over a century ago, and that to-day the Bishops of the Established Church are trying to make up their minds whether women are human beings.

The Bishop of London is in favour of the abolition of deans. Hear, hear! Now, we wonder if the deans are in favour of the abolition of bishops? If they are, we would support both sides. The Bishop says he is of opinion the £70,000 paid to the deans is a waste of money. With that, too, we agree. But he goes on to say that "this money is more needed for the bishops," and with that we do not agree. If it is merely a scramble as to whether the bishops or the deans are to have the money, our interest in the matter ceases.

One of the chief papers concerned in the German plotting in Rome is Il Bastone, says the Daily Chronicle. This paper, it should be noted, was founded for the express purpose of fighting the famous Freethought periodical, L'Asino. The Chronicle thinks it deserved a better fate. Other people will have their doubts on that point.

The clergy, who have been exempted from military service, are making full use of their opportunities whilst the nation is engaged in the tremendous world-war, and there are grave suspicions that the Defence of the Realm Act, and other legislative measures, are being worked in the interests of the Churches. Sunday recreations, cinemas, racing, the drink trade, have all been attacked. The fact remains that these things continue to be permitted in France and Germany, and both these countries have been harder hit by the War than we are ourselves.

A newspaper paragraph states that two Church Army huts have been erected in the Holy Land. Many people would wish that the entire organization would go to Jehrico.

Mr. Horatio Bottomley's conversion is not so complete as some of his Christian friends could wish. Speaking at Queen's Hall, London, he said: "There were people who thought the best way to welcome home the soldiers was to give a tea-party, a pleasant Sunday afternoon, and a Brotherhood meeting, but the boys at the Front wanted to come back to the England they had left." A palpable hit.

"A truth that is uttered once is apt to be prevailed over by a lie that is well advertized," said Sir Herbert Tree. Luke-warm Freethinkers should remember that the Christian superstition has 50,000 professional advertising agents in this country alone.

The Prime Minister is in a most perilous position. Sir William Robertson Nicoll tells us, in the leading article of the British Weekly for June 28, that "he possesses almost unlimited power," that "he has for the first time had his own way," and that "he ranks with President Wilson as one of the two outstanding figures among the Allies." After this fulsome praise, however, the reverend knight warns him against grave dangers which threaten him. He is on the point, possibly he is actually in the process, of going astray on several vital questions, chief among which is that of the drink traffic; but his downfall may yet be averted if, before it is too late, he will but follow Sir William's advice.

The editor of the British Weekly has prohibition on the brain. For months it has been the main subject dealt with in his weekly "War Notes." If prohibition is not adopted the War will be indefinitely prolonged, and the British Empire may utterly collapse, while its adoption would result in speedy victory for the Allies. It never seems to occur to Sir William and his friends that they are guilty of a flagrant and wicked exploitation of the War to promote the interests of a highly debatable, partizan cause. The mischief lies in the fact that these faddists pretend to represent the nation, for they ominously remind the Prime Minister "that it is of capital importance that the dictator of the nation in war time should have the general support and good will of the people." "We use no threats," they say, "and we make no prophecies; but we believe that this hateful measure (State Purchase), if passed, will long postpone any end of the War."

It is worth noting that the Swedish statesman, M. Brantling, about whom so much has lately appeared in the press, has had the experience of being sent to prison for three months for blasphemy. Like so many continental leaders of opinion, he is a Freethinker. Public men develop more courage abroad than they do in this country.

The Freemasons' gathering at the Albert Hall, to mark the bi-centenary of the English Grand Lodge, was followed by a special religious service at which the Bishop of Birmingham preached. The presence of the bishop shows the peculiar position of English Masonry, for Continental Freemasons are Freethinkers, and anathema to the Catholic Church. Moreover, Masonic ritual is not Christian at all, and should a Continental Mason meet an English brother they are as likely to be as fraternal as Kilkenny cats.

At the Albert Hall meeting, amongst the prayers offered was the following from an unnamed speaker:—

> For those also, O Lord, the humble beasts, who with us bear the heat and burden of the day and offer their guileless lives for the well-being of their countries, we ask Thy pity; for Thou hast promised to save both man and beast, and great is Thy lovingkindness, O God, Creator of the World.

Digitized by Google

We are quite in sympathy with the feeling that prompted the prayer, although we do not think there is any doctrinal authority for it. Animals have no "souls," according to the Christian theology, and, therefore, nothing to save. We rather fancy the gentleman who offered the prayer confused some lines from Coleridge's Ancient Mariner with Christian teaching. He might have recalled, as a corrective, St. Paul's contemptuous "Doth God care for oxen!"

The Rev. Dr. Hutton, of Glasgow, cherishes an amazingly highflown, bombastic, notion of the greatness and dignity of the Christian Church. In an article in the Christian World for June 28, he describes it as "that body to which our Lord committed the immense responsibility of creating the moral conscience of the human race." As a matter of simple fact, the Church has had no share whatever in creating "the moral conscience" of the race. In the course of its history it has created many false values for not recognizing which it has sent millions of men and women to the stake, the gallows, and the block. If the Church boasts that the present conscience of Christendom is of its moulding, then we pride ourselves upon our disbelief in both.

Even Dr. Hutton himself admits that the Church has lamentably failed to fulfil its Divinely appointed mission. Ideally, the Church "must be free to summon the entire secular society of the world to its bar." It did once, alas, both possess and practise that awful power; but the base use it made of it will redound to its everlasting disgrace. Morally rotten at its own core, it summoned men and women to its bar, not to be judged on ethical issues, but to be brutally tortured and put to death for daring to think for themselves, or for deviating in the slightest degree from the belief that happened to be dominant at the time.

Presbyterianism anywhere seems a lovely creed, and breeds a lovely character. But the Irish variety seems specially attractive. At Castlecaulfield, Co. Tyrone, the Session decided on introducing a little instrumental music into the service. This was done, but the opposition became so pronounced that it was decided to screen the organ down to the floor. The reply to this took the form of a number of the congregation wresting the organ away from its fastenings and putting it outside the church. It was restored to its place; and then one Sunday morning, prior to the service, it was again seized, taken outside, and smashed to pieces. It seems that no legal offence has been committed, as no disturbance of the service took place; so the Castlecaulfield Presbyterians may go on smashing up organs just so long as they please. But what a delightfully happy place the world would be if Christians could only remould it to their heart's desire! It would make even hell attractive by contrast.

In the Saltcoats Herald, "Dumb Man," while thanking Socialists for "varying the sameness of the Sabbath Day," strikes a sound note in the following:—

> One thing the Socialist is mortally afraid of—the Church. Mum's the word there, and the "hush" is passed along, and the fiercest speaker falters on that ancient threshold. Kings and Prime Ministers come in for scathing rebuke, but the Church remains sacrosanct, and "the Nazarene" is spoken of with severest breath. It is not so much the Church objective and material the Socialist fears, but the Church subjective and psychological; the Church in the human breast; the shadow of the ancient caves of dread.

That is well said. And it is certain that if Socialists are sanely serious in their endeavour to reorganize society, they will have to deal with the question of religion in a different way from what they have done hitherto. Vague platitudes about Jesus, or about "genuine Christianity," with endeavours to capture the Churches, are all futile. The Churches may capture Socialism. Socialism will never capture the Churches.

Mr. Lloyd George, speaking at Castle Street Welsh Baptist Chapel, London, said the War was the greatest catastrophe since the Deluge. It would be unkind to suggest that the speaker had water on the brain.

Slang has invaded the ecclesiastical vocabulary. At a meeting of the Actors' Church Union, at Wyndham's Theatre, the Bishop of Willesden, finding the footlights embarrassing, asked the stage-hands to "douse the glim." That sort of talk is better left to the comedians of the Salvation Army.

The Times Literary Supplement, in a note on Mr. Archer's God and Mr. Wells, complains that his treatment of the subject is "by no means devoid of an inopportune flippancy," which is one of those curious expressions that writers permit themselves. Why should a writer not be "flippant," if he pleases, when dealing with "God"? It is sheer presumption to demand that because one man chooses to talk about "God" with bated breath, that everyone else shall deal with it as though the subject was too great for ordinary human speech to handle. People write flippantly of marriage, mother-in-laws—even of the Food Controller, the Press Censor, and Mr. Lloyd George. And any of these are of vastly more importance than "God." One can get along very well, and ignore "God" altogether. But your attitude towards any of the parties named is of considerable importance. When Christians can be brought to realize that to a Freethinker "God" means nothing, he will cease to make the foolish demand that it shall be treated with all the deference and solemnity properly accorded to the most important of subjects.

Mr. Noah Bailey, a Christian Evidence lecturer, was summoned at Marlborough Street Police Court on Monday last, charged with using language at a meeting in Hyde Park calculated to provoke a breach of the peace. Mr. Freke Palmer defended, and the Rev. M. Drawbridge, with others of the C.E.S., appeared as witnesses on behalf of Mr. Bailey. In the end the Christian Evidence speaker was fined £10, and bound over to be of good behaviour for six months. We congratulate the police on having at last taken notice of the scurrilous and offensive speech of these witnesses for Christ, and we hope their attention will not stop at Mr. Bailey.

The Right Rev. Herbert Bury, Bishop for North and Central Europe, has been unpacking his heart with words concerning the erection of a solitary church at the Belgian headquarters. Had the bishop not better devote his energies to bettering the condition of his diocese, which is as much concerned with homicide as holiness?

Our Great Push.

FOR several weeks we have been inviting the co-operation of our friends in securing new readers for the Freethinker. We are pleased to report that this effort is bearing fruit. For two weeks we ran right out of print, and last week we were forced to increase our printing order. We shall not complain if we have to increase it every week.

One reader has managed to secure ten new subscribers. He has, further, undertaken their distribution, having his copies sent direct from this office. That is really splendid help, and we hope others will emulate this achievement. What one can do, others can do. It is a matter of taking a hand in our great push. There are thousands of potential Freethinker readers in the country. Let us have as many of them as possible, and as speedily as possible.

There has never been a better time than the present in which to make potential readers into actual ones. Thousands of people have had their minds unsettled in relation to religion. It should be for all of us to see that their minds are settled in the direction of Freethought.

We thank heartily all those who have helped. And we hope they and others will continue the good work.

To Correspondents.

H. T. Burgess.—We should like to see other Freethinkers in Johannesburg joining with you in conducting a regular movement. Perhaps this note may cause some of them to think seriously on the matter. Thanks for compliments. We shall "pull through." We have no doubt of that, hard though the struggle may be.

A. M.—Always pleased to hear from you. We regret that your pen has been absent from our pages of late, but the fault has not been yours, and in the future we hope to see you better represented in our columns.

P. A.—A grasp of real principles will give strength to even a weak character. And where one is not weak it becomes a pleasure to carry them into practice.

F. Colls.—Very pleased to hear from a three years' reader who has now induced four others to become regular subscribers. Your letter cheers one on one's way. We are obliged for the names and addresses sent.

D. Dentith, 27828, C/79 Brigade, R.F.A., B.E.F., will be obliged if some reader will send him his back numbers of the Freethinker for use among his comrades.

J. Burrell (Lanark).—Your capture of ten new readers for the Freethinker is splendid. It is still more commendable for you to undertake the distribution of these copies among them. That is a plan that might be adopted by others with profit to the Cause. If in each town one or two Freethinkers would take the matter up in this spirit, we should soon find things moving.

T. Fowler writes, as a note to Mr. Mann's articles, that there is a very misleading citation of a passage, Draper's "Conflict," in a work on The Rise and Progress of Modern Spiritualism in England, by J. Robertson. Readers who possess the work would do well, therefore, to check the reference.

S. Robinson.—We presume you refer to the persecutions that took place under the early Protestant leader, or with their sanction? The handiest work for you to consult will be Lecky's Rise of Rationalism. There is a cheap edition published at 2s. 6d. Shall be pleased to help the work in Belfast in any way we can.

R. F. Tervir.—There is a "Comic Bible" published by the American Truthseeker Company, and also a French one (La Bible Amusante). Both are profusely illustrated.

F. F.—We agree that the statements published in Dr. Crauford's Reality of Psychic Phenomena are "amazing," but the allegation concerning table-tilting is of the customary kind, and is fairly well known. We regret that want of space prevents our publishing the whole of your letter.

C. W. W.—Naturally, the editor of the Daily Express would not insert your letter. Unconsciously, he paid it a compliment by refusing insertion. If you had written praising the clergy, the result might have been different. Will bear suggestion in mind, but you know our difficulty in that direction.

Those interested in the National Secular Society, and desirous of helping to revive the propaganda in Belfast, are requested to communicate with Mr. Richard Stubbs, 6 Artana Street, Ormean Road, Belfast.

H. Denis (Stewartstown).—Affirmation in a court of law follows the form of the oath with the excision of the religious words. It is only necessary to ask to affirm, and if the question is put "On what ground?" the reply should be "On the ground of having no religious belief." No further question ought to be asked or need be answered.

J. Martinson.—Next week.

J. A. Reid.—Yes, quite possible, but not very likely.

W. Bromley.—We can hardly deal with your question in this column. It requires an article.

J. Brister (Bloemfontein).—Received and instructions carried out. Story will prove useful.

E. B.—We should have been pleased to reprint portions of Lord Harcourt's speech, could we have spared the space. It is good to find some of our public men alive to the dangers of the present position.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

At the request of the N. S. S. Executive and a number of our readers, Mr. Cohen's article on "The Massacre of the Innocents," in last week's Freethinker, is being reprinted as a propagandist leaflet. We hope to have it ready in time for an announcement as to terms of distribution to be made in our next issue.

We were over sanguine in our anticipation of the result of the L.C.C. summonses against Mr. Neate for selling the Freethinker without a permit. But when the case was adjourned, its collapse seemed almost a certainty. Several strange things happened at the second hearing. The L.C.C. solicitor who appeared at the first hearing was, fortunately, too ill to attend the second time. The Council, fortunately, was able to say that it had sent Mr. Neate notice of the revocation of the permit, although Mr. Neate had never received it. And the postal clerk was away in the Army—an absence which excuses a mountain of faults. So the magistrate found for the Council, refused costs, which were asked for, and fined Mr. Neate the almost nominal sum of 20s. on each summons.

At the outset the Committee never expected to win in the Police Court, so there is nothing to be alarmed at in the result. It was entirely owing to the way the case for the Council was presented at the first hearing that it looked like breaking down. And now that the originally expected has happened, the Protest Committee will proceed with its work. As we said last week, we are at the opening of a campaign. It is a fight against the "Prussianism" of Spring Gardens, and this initial skirmish is no more an indication of the final result than the German overrunning of Belgium was an indication of the ultimate defeat of the Allies.

In order to celebrate the centenary of the birth of Henry D. Thoreau, it has been arranged to hold a meeting at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, on the evening of July 12. The Chair will be taken at 8 p.m. by Sir John L. Otter, J.P., and short addresses will be given by various speakers. Admirers of Thoreau's writings are invited to be present.

Referring to some recent notes on the effect of war on morals, a correspondent writes:—

> Kant, in his Perpetual Peace, appx. 1, mentions the "wise saying of the ancient Greek, 'War is an evil, inasmuch as it makes more wicked men than it removes out of the way.'"
> As a modern commentary on that, the Albany Law Journal quoted a New York State judge in 1870 as saying from the bench: "This court will have to be in almost continuous session until such times as this generation shall have passed away, so that the vast majority of men now engaged in the commission of crime shall either be incarcerated, run away, or dead. I use the word generation, because history tells us that after every great war it requires a generation to clear out the bad men that have grown bad as camp followers, swindlers, and robbers."

Whether the after consequences of the present War reverse the experience of other times remains to be seen.

Dean Inge, preaching at All Saints' Church, Ennismore Gardens, referred to the wonderful triumphs of medical science, which he said had raised the duration of life, and exterpated a whole company of diseases. The dean did not mention that "Christian" science is altogether opposed to doctors.

Religion and the French Revolution.

THE authority of the family, the authority of the State, long synonymous with the will of the autocrat, and all authorities whatsoever, gradually assert themselves, one and all, upon a still higher authority, the authority of religion. In it the principle of authority reaches the absolute stage. The will of God is the supreme authority, to which all must submit. Therefore the principle of authority in general stood or fell with the authority of the Church.

Consequently, when any authority was questioned or attacked, the authority of the Church was attacked, and this is what happened during the French Revolution.

As soon as the Estates assemble the clergy unanimously demand that the Catholic religion should be recognized as the State religion, with an exclusive monopoly of public worship. The revolutionary Abbe Fauchet, who blessed the uniforms of the citizen soldiers after the fall of the Bastille, maintained that those persons who belonged to no church ought not to be able to marry, since no one could consider those persons bound by their word.

When the Estates met as the National Assembly, the clergy were soon compelled to make concessions. For example, in 1790, a number of priests moved that the Catholic religion should be proclaimed as the national religion. This motion was timidly rejected, for men did not dare to say what they thought; thus an Assembly, the majority of which were Freethinkers, took part in Church processions and public worship.

One of the first acts of the Assembly was the "Declaration of the Rights of Man," Article 10, of which was as follows: "No one may be harassed on account of his opinions, not even of his religious opinions, provided that his expression of the same be not subversive of lawful order."

In 1791 all church property was declared to be State property. Voltaire had impressed upon his disciples, who were the Girondists, of the necessity of "ecraser l'infame," that is, of "annihilating the infamous thing."

These times were the great days of the Girondists who followed the ideas of Voltaire, and, as such, were bitterly opposed to the Church.

Roland, as Minister of the Interior, stated: "Mutinous and hypocritical priests, in the sacred name of religion, are exciting fanaticism and arming their misguided fellow-citizens with the sword of intolerance." When the proposal for banishing the priests was under discussion, Verginand spoke of the evil that France might do by sending into another country the criminals of whom she desired to be rid. But he is comforted by the reflection that in Italy they will be received as saints, and that in this gift of living saints, the Pope will recognize a humble attempt to express gratitude for all the arms, legs, and other relics of dead saints, which he had sent into France during centuries past.

Things reached such a pitch that speakers on church matters began to excuse themselves. Francois de Nantes, as spokesman for a committee, began thus: "Our one consolation in having to take up your time on church matters, is the hope that the measures you will take will prevent the necessity of your ever hearing of them again."

The two great clubs of this period, the Cordeliers' and the Jacobins', perhaps the two most famous clubs in history, both met in chapels. Among the speakers at the former were Marat, Danton, and Camille Desmoulins. Desmoulins, in 1790, when he wished to marry Lucille, one of the finest of the female revolutionary characters, found that no priest would marry him, because, in a newspaper article, he had written that the religion of Mahomet was as intelligible as the religion of Christ. He was obliged to recant and go to confession before he could be married. He now made some return for this treatment. In his famous newspaper, Le Vieux Cordelier, he wrote:—

> The whole subject of priests and religion is disposed of when it is stated that they resemble each other in being absurd, and when it is known that the Tartars eat the excrement of the Grand Lama as the greatest delicacy. There is no fool too mad to be honoured as Jupiter's equal. The Mongolians worship a cow, which receives as much adoration as Apis, or any other god. We have no reason to be annoyed by such follies, we who, in our simplicity, have believed that it is possible to swallow a god as one swallows an oyster."

In the newspaper, Les Revolution des Paris, a number issued in Lent, 1792, contains the following concerning the shows and fairs of the day:—

> At the time when we had a ruling religion, the tonsured jugglers allowed no competition in Holy Week. When the ordinary conjurer comes upon the stage he wears a cloak, but as soon as the performance is over, he takes off his costume. The priest wears his all day long, and performs off, as well as on, the stage. When will they blush to play the role of the conjurers of humanity?

In April the same paper proposes that priests should be shut up in a house like prostitutes, where they can pray and preach as much as they want, to those that wish, but should be prevented from going out, so that they may not infect the population.

In 1792 the edict was passed which condemned to banishment all those priests that would not take the oath of allegiance to the Constitution. In September of the same year was the slaughter of the prisoners, among whom the priests were the first to fall. About 1,500 human beings were killed. The number is great, but it is noteworthy that this number is not one-twentieth part of the number of men killed in one day during a battle at the present time; and the French people had far, far more to avenge than many of those fighting at the present time.

Lequino, a member of the Convention, writes as follows in a book entitled Les Prejuge's Detruits (The Prejudices Destroyed): "Religion is a political chain invented for the purpose of fettering men; its only use has been to ensure the pleasures of a few individuals by holding all the others in check." Concerning the priests, he says: "When they are honest they are stupid or mad; as a rule they are audacious impostors, veritable assassins of the human race." Lequino is not at all an exception, although he carried his war against all in authority by inviting the public executioner to dine with him and his family for the purpose of destroying the prejudice against an official who was to an extent a public benefactor. In Les Revolutions des Paris, a number which appeared in December, 1792, concerning the celebration of midnight Mass in Paris, it says:—

> There is no particular harm in holding exhibitions of dancing marionettes or conjurers' tricks in the public streets in the daytime, as it is quite permissible that children and nurses should be amused. But to meet in dark assembly halls at midnight for the purpose of singing hymns, lighting tapers, and burning incense in honour of an illegitimate child and an unfaithful wife is a scandal, an offence against public morality, which demands the attention of the police and strict repressive measures.

About this time the ravaging of the churches took place, and the reports are very interesting and instruc tive to those who hope that an English Revolution may take place. One report is as follows: "We have permitted 'brown Mary' (a miracle-working image) to retire, after all the hard work she has had in fooling the world for 1800 years." Another: "There are no longer any priests in the Nieone Dept. The altars have been despoiled of the piles of gold which ministered to priestly vanity." Another is in the sarcastic vein:—

> I have been unjustly accused of an onslaught upon religion. The fact is that I asked most politely before I acted, and three or four hundred saints begged for permission to go to the Mint. I said to them, "Ye who have been the tools of fanaticism, ye saints and holy ones of all kinds, show now that ye are patriots, and help your country by marching to the Mint."

When a few churches were re-opened, the fact was announced in one paper under the heading of "Theatres and Amusements," as follows:—

> On the 18th and 25th of this month a comedy was played in several parts of Paris. The chief character, in an absurd costume, performed a variety of foolish antics, at which the spectators did not laugh. As we are not in the habit of criticizing revived plays when they are neither useful nor instructive, we shall take no further notice of this one.

Such events as these show plainly how the Revolution was attacking the principle of authority. It is noteworthy that patents of nobility were burned in the same bonfire with the images of saints. From the moment when the authority of religion was overthrown, authority in other directions was threatened.

Chaumette, who secured many praiseworthy measures, persuaded the Convention to consecrate the cathedral of Notre Dame to the worship of Reason, and in this cathedral many performances were held. One church was turned into a public-house. Relics, Bibles, images, and other priestly paraphernalia were burnt in huge bonfires everywhere.

All this ended in the Festival of the Supreme Being and the bloody wars in La Vendee, and finally, under Napoleon, the restoration of the Catholic religion, to be finally abolished from the State in France a hundred years later.

The men of the Revolution had failed to comprehend that the great mass of the people were profoundly ignorant and superstitious, and were terrified by the acts of violence, the closing of the Churches, the abolition of the Sabbath, the banishment of the priests. They had been taught for centuries and generations that these things were invented by God himself, and they were prepared to give themselves over to the priests once more, as soon as opportunity presented itself. As was stated at the time, there are only two things that can, and ultimately will, kill the tyranny and vile superstition of religion: complete liberty of the press and complete, good, free, and entirely secular education—for both of which fine ideals the Freethinker and its readers stand.

Harold W. Edwards.

[The books used for the above are, L'histoire des Girondists, by Lamartine, in three vols., and Histoire de la revolution francaise, by Louis Blanc, in sixteen vols.—H. W. E.]

An old Scotch minister, who had been imbibing too freely, fell fast asleep on his way home one night. On of his parishioners, on his way to work next morning, wakened the minister out of a sound sleep. He said he was vexed to see his minister in such a state, especially after the fine sermon he preached the previous Sunday. The minister replied: "Haud on tae licht, Haud on tae licht, never mind the lantern."

Anthropomorphism and Science.

The problem of philosophy hardly exists to what is called the plain man. He sees the world, and the world as he sees it is the world as it is. But to the philosopher the matter is not so simple nor so easy. The world we know is a world conditioned by both perception and conception. When we see a table we get the impression of something of a particular shape and colour, and we believe that if we touch it it will be hard. And yet science will demonstrate this shape and colour and hardness is not really in the table, it is in us. They are affections of our organs. Further, it can be shown that we do not really see all we think we see. To what we actually see at the moment we add our past experiences of exact measurements, etc., of tables and other things. And from the thing seen, perceptions, plus the recollections of things previously experienced, conceptions, we construct what we call the actual table. But what is the table apart from our perceptions and conceptions? What is the thing in itself like, apart from the effects it produces on us through our sense organs? ——?

It is quite clear that the world as we know it is made up of (1) an assumed reality; (2) the contributions made by our sensations, present and past. Professor Kingdon Clifford was the first to propose the term "Eject," to denote the contribution made by our subjective experiences to the totality of our conception of the world or any part of it, and it stands opposed to "Object" as the external thing which affects consciousness. Exactly how much of an "object" is an "eject," or whether there is any "object" at all, is a question over which philosophers have wrangled, and will continue to wrangle. That there is an ejective element in all our thinking of the external world seems clear. This, at all events, is the subject-matter of an extremely able and interesting work, by Miss Oliver A. Wheeler, on Anthropomorphism and Science; A Study of the Development of Ejective Cognition in the Individual and the Race (Allen & Unwin; 5s. net). Miss Wheeler says that her main object is to determine the relation between the theological and the scientific interpretation of the world, and we may grant her that both science and theology are incurably anthropomorphic in the sense that neither can escape interpreting the universe in terms of human consciousness. So far, one has little fault to find with her examination and determination of the ejective element in physics, biology, and other sciences. Particularly well done are the chapters on "The Indiscriminate Ejection of the Savage," and "The Passage from Primitive to Discriminate Ejection," as marking the rise of science. But we quite dissent from her classification of science as "the direct descendant of the positive knowledge of the savage" with a function entirely utilitarian, and religion as "the descendant of anthropomorphic speculation" with a function wholly interpretive. Science is as interpretive as religion, and religion aims at being as utilitarian as science. Indeed, if the religious interpretation is accepted as true, its utilitarian character is at once admitted.

So, when Miss Wheeler sums up her suggestive work by saying that if science admits the use of ejection for obtaining a synthetic view of a group of data, it cannot consistently deny the use of religious ejection as a device for obtaining a synthetical view of the whole universe; the reply is that the two cases are not on all fours. The scientist may use his ejective symbols—Force, Atom, etc., realizing all the time that they are symbols, the value of which lies wholly in their making certain groups of data intelligible. The theologian having used his symbol, God, forthwith disowns its symbolic character, and insists on it as a positive objective existence. Moreover, the religious method is gratuitous. All that can be done by religion may be, and is, done by science, or by that larger science, philosophy. Miss Wheeler's own chapters show that religion takes its rise in the "indiscriminate ejection"—in plain language, the unbounded tendency to personification—of the savage. Religion in civilized times represents what remains of this primitive tendency after science has occupied stretch after stretch of its territory. And it is too much to expect that when the victory is nearly complete, science will agree to an equal division of all that it has conquered.

RELIGION IN THE ARMY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—You have already had several letters from Freethinkers at the Front giving their impressions as to the state of religion in the Army. If I mistake not they have all been in agreement on one point—that religion has not gained anything of value as a result of the War. This is my own impression, and if Church parades are anything to go by, there is little room for doubt on the subject. Orders for Church parade bring forth a volume of oaths and foul language from our Christian soldiers, who go to Church by the hundreds when they are forced, but stay away by the hundreds if allowed to please themselves. On the other hand, I have known men to sit in their tents for an hour or so on a Sunday evening singing hymns on their own accord. But not infrequently the men who indulge themselves in this way have very little respect for women, and possess a large capacity for bad language and indecent yarns.

The truth of the matter seems to be, that the average soldier, like the average civilian, thinks very little about religious questions when he does attend a service, or sing hymns on his own, he is giving way to emotion that is neither guided nor checked by reason, and thus indulging in a social habit in a most unintelligent manner. There are, of course, exceptions. One man, in particular, I found to be well read and prepared to discuss religious subjects without bigotry. He has now left the company, so I am deprived of his intellectual companionship. I had two or three interesting talks with him. He called himself an English Catholic, and claimed for every man the right to think for himself on matters of doctrine and worship according to his own desires regarding ritual. He accepted a great deal of modern Biblical criticism, and believed in the theory of evolution, but with certain limitations. He thought good living more important than belief in a particular set of doctrines. I mention this as he claimed that while the number of Freethought followers will increase in future, the majority of thoughtful people will tend to accept a broadminded religious position. On the other hand, he pointed out, in a friendly way, a danger that he believed would beset the Freethought movement. It is one that I myself have thought of before, viz.: as it becomes more and more easy to openly profess Atheism, a large number of people will attach themselves to Freethought societies without understanding Atheism, and thus become a drag on the movement. I had to admit that this danger does present itself, especially as there are many Freethinkers to-day who have done little more than throw off Christianity and accept a few elements of Atheism. They do not seem to realize the necessity of trying to educate themselves by reading the best of Freethought literature and attending lectures as often as possible. I suggest, therefore, that all who take part in propagating Freethought should insist, as often as possible, on the importance of continual self-education. This may not do all, but it will do something in the way of saving the movement from the above-mentioned danger. I am afraid that a good many Freethinkers are under the impression that the future of our great cause is going to be an easy one. This is a very mistaken estimate. We need all the knowledge and all the energy that we can muster for the future. I have been pleased to find men out here who say readily: "every man to his own ideas in matters of religion," but against this freedom from bigotry on the part of some, we have to place the ignorance and indifference of others. And these latter are the perpetual foes of Freethought.

PROSPECTS OF REVOLUTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—There are two articles in a recent issue of the Sunday Times which have a bearing on what is said in the Freethinker of June 24 on the probable inertness of the soldiers and their desire to avoid agitation and commotion when they return from the War. The first is by Lord Sydenham, and is entitled "Revolution or Reconstruction?" He points out that revolutions are made by determined minorities. He looks to the British Workers League to do work preventative of revolution. The other article, by H. Dennis Bradley, is entitled "The Sinister Unrest." One extract is as follows:—

> What are we fighting for? The cause is the utter lack of psychology on the part of the few who are attempting to govern. Why is it, when Prussianism stinks in the nostrils of the world, the nation asks, What are we fighting for? That question, as the men who govern fail to understand, is ironical. In reality, it means we are in the third year of the War, and we have lost Freedom of Speech, Freedom of Press, Liberty of the Subject, Rights to Property, A Representative Government. What have we gained? Broken Pledges, Bureaucracy, Profiteering, Corruption.

In reading, I thought of the reactionaries attempt to prevent the sale of Freethought literature, amongst the other results of the War.

SPIRITUALISM AND SCIENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I have thoroughly appreciated Mr. Mann's articles on "Spiritism," but I am rather surprised to find no reference to a splendid book published some years ago in America by a committee in connection with the Pennsylvania College, entitled The Preliminary Report of the Sybright Commission. I read it many years ago, and often wondered if there was ever another report issued by the Commission. I got the book through a London agency, and it cost 3s. 6d. Mr. J. N. Maskelyne put me on to it first. Perhaps some of your readers could tell us if there was ever a subsequent report. It is a most scathing and flaying account of interviews with all the great frauds of the spiritology cult.

ARTHUR SPENCER.

REPRISALS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Your concurrence with the Archbishop as to Reprisals—expressed in "Acid Drops," July 1—seems open to criticism. You distinguish between air raids and poison gas, etc. Now, if a distinction exists, it tells rather in favour of raids, the laws of war having ruled out poisonings, etc., and having not ruled out raids, as these had not come up for ruling.

On the other hand, there is precedent for inflicting suffering on populations: our blockade is primarily an attack on civilians, and incidentally on the fighting ranks.

You note the next war will commence at the point of brutality where this one leaves off. Just so; and most satisfactory too. Germany bombs, say, Colchester: down comes Cologne. Germany bombs London again: bang goes Berlin. Germany ceases bomb-dropping: England drops no more. That is where the next war would do well to start.

You contend reprisals would be ineffective: "the cheap psychology of an uninstructed mind" would alone look for effect. Now, is it cheap psychology that looks for the coward in the bully? Are these tales fictions—of the average

German soldier being infinitely more frightened of the Tanks than the average English civilian of the Zeppelin? of German officers foaming with rage because, when we out-Krupper Krupp, we are not fighting fair?

Is it a fact that, as you allege, the Germans support their Government in being ready to sacrifice millions of people? If it is, then the sooner the realities of modern war, as exemplified in air-raids, can incidentally happen (as in reprisals) and be brought home to them the better, for many think the German people will be the deciding factor.

Randall Hendon.

Obituary.

It is with the very deepest regret that we have to record the death, on active service, of yet another promising young Freethinker. Mr. J. G. Bartram is fairly well known, by name at least, among North Country Freethinkers, and every sympathy will be felt with Mr. Bartram and his wife on the death of their eldest son, Frank. At first reported, on April 16, "wounded and missing," hope struggled with fear against more serious news. This came to hand recently. He had been killed in action on the date named above. Frank Bartram was a lad of whom any parents might well feel proud. He had passed through his school career with considerable credit, and his bright disposition, associated as it was with an alertness of mind and body, held out the strongest hopes for his future. He took a keen interest in Freethought, and in France was active in discussion with his comrades and in the distribution of literature. His death, at the age of twenty, will be felt as a loss by all who knew him. Freethinkers everywhere will sympathize with the family on their loss.

L.C.C. Prosecution.

SALE OF LITERATURE IN PARKS.

At Old Street Police Court yesterday Mr. Clarke Hall resumed the hearing of three summonses issued at the instance of the London County Council against James Neate, of Bethnal Green Road, for unlawfully selling copies of the Freethinker without having first obtained in writing the consent of the clerk to the authority.

Last week, when the case was first before the Court, the defence was set up that the fact that a park-keeper had received notice of the withdrawal of permits was not sufficient withdrawal to create an offence unless it could be proved that defendant had also received such notice from the London County Council.

Mr. Greenwood, who now appeared to support the prosecution, explained that a colleague who conducted the case last week was unable to attend owing to indisposition.

Mr. Eldridge (for the defendant) said there was no denial of selling.

James Joseph Bradley, park-keeper at Victoria Park, was recalled, and said the evidence he gave last week referred to offences against the parks by-laws on May 13 and 20 and June 3.

Mr. Greenwood.—Were you in the park every day, and did you see Neate there on October 3, 1916?—Yes.

Was he selling the Freethinker then?—Yes.

What did you say to him?—I said, "You know the permit to sell literature is withdrawn," and he replied, "Yes. I can't help the regulations; I must go on selling." On October 29 I again saw him selling, and said to him, "You know the Council has withdrawn your permit to sell literature in the parks." He replied that he did, but that he insisted on selling.

Mr. Eldridge.—What authority had you for saying the Council had withdrawn the defendant's permit?—I had a notification from the Council to say it had been withdrawn.

Mr. Greenwood.—He (defendant) knew the notice had been withdrawn.

L.C.C. Resolution Ambiguous.

Mr. Eldridge.—What all the people in the parks knew—that there was some regulation before the Council, which I am going to draw your attention to if it is put in.

Mr. Clarke Hall.—If the Council as a body granted these permits, surely as a body they can revoke them.

Mr. Eldridge.—All I say is, he knew, as other people knew, as a matter of public knowledge, that there was something before the Council on the matter.

John William Ellis, Clerk to the L.C.C. Parks Committee, produced an official copy of the minutes of the Council for May 30, 1916.

Mr. Eldridge said it was here sought to make defendant guilty of a penal offence, and liable to all sorts of pains and penalties. If the prosecution proposed to do that they must proceed strictly in a clear and unambiguous manner. He contended that the resolution passed voided permission only in part. It said, "To sell literature in certain parks and open spaces." If the Council had intended that to apply to all parks and open spaces under their control it would have been a very simple matter for them to say so. They did not say that; they said "certain parts," thereby, counsel submitted, meaning "some" parts. There was nothing in the resolution to show that Victoria Park was one of the parks referred to. The resolution, he contended, was void by reason of its uncertainty.

Mr. Clarke Hall.—Some notice was necessary. Had defendant said, "I did know the permit had been withdrawn," that would be sufficient. Suppose no notice was sent, and his attention was called to the fact, he would be entitled to say to the park-keeper, "I have had no notice. I do not take it from you." Suppose he had said that, there would be something in the contention which has been raised.

Park-keeper Bradley, in answer to Mr. Eldridge, said he did not tell defendant the notice withdrawing the permits had been sent to all holders. He said, "You know the permit to sell has been withdrawn," and defendant answered "Yes." He did not tell him about the withdrawal of the permit in the terms of the resolution. He said that there was a permit to Miss Vance to sell literature, and that it had been withdrawn. He did not know that a permit had been granted to the defendant. He thought the permit was a general permit to the National Secular Society. He regarded Neate, when he went to him, as the agent of Miss Vance. Witness went to each person selling literature, and said if they had not permits he would have to summon them. He did not then know that defendant had a permit. The order he received said "all permits have been withdrawn," and that persons with permits had been notified.

Permit to Sell Held Since 1905.

Mr. Eldridge.—Do you know defendant had held a permit since 1905?—No.

You asked him if he knew the permits had been withdrawn, what did he say?—He said "Yes."

You did not refer to his permit?—I referred to permits in general, and to the one granted to the Secretary of the National Secular Society.

Witness produced a copy of the letter of instructions sent to him. It read: "Please note that the Council has decided that all permits shall be cancelled as from December 30. In the event of any person stating that he has not received any such communication his name and address should be taken and sent to the clerk of the Council.

Mr. Clarke Hall.—Why don't you, Mr. Greenwood, prove that these notices were sent?

Mr. Greenwood.—As a matter of fact, the officer who sent them is away on active service.

Mr. Ellis (recalled) read the notice, which ran: "I beg to inform you that the Council has decided that permits granted for the sale of literature in the parks and open spaces shall be determined as from December 30."

Mr. Eldridge.—Have you Neate's name anywhere as being one of the persons to whom that was sent?—I have the counterfoil here.

The magistrate, examining a book handed to him, said the name of Neate did appear, and then something appeared to have been torn out.

Digitized by Google

The Witness.—That is the permit.

Mr. Clarke Hall.—That only shows the issue of the permit.

Mr. Greenwood (to witness).—Did you yourself check the circular letter sent out with with the Council's authority?—Yes, I checked the letter, which had been previously marked by my assistant.

Mr. Clarke Hall.—I think that is sufficient.

Mr. Greenwood.—For what it is worth, so you produce a letter dated October 30, 1916, enclosing a resolution of protest against the Council's withdrawal of the permits?

Witness.—Yes, and the signature of Neate is attached to it.

INSUFFICIENT AUTHORIZATION.

Mr. Eldridge submitted that the resolution of the Council did not authorize with sufficient certainty the clerk to send out the notices withdrawing the permits.

Mr. Clarke Hall.—Oh, yes, I think so.

Mr. Eldridge.—Then I don't think I can discuss the matter further here, although it may be necessary to discuss it in some other form in the name of some other person. I submit that the case is not one for anything like a severe penalty.

Mr. Clarke Hall.—Oh, no.

Mr. Greenwood mentioned that in spite of those proceedings the defendant was still, or was on June 24, selling papers in the park. If that sort of thing was to be tolerated he did not know how many park constables it might become necessary to employ. Originally the Council had only intended to ask for a nominal penalty had the defendant admitted at the first hearing that he knew of the withdrawal of the permits and expressed regret for having made a mistake.

Mr. Clarke Hall.—But he is entitled to take advantage of any legal point.

The magistrate imposed a fine of 20s. on each of the three summonses, but refused costs.—Morning Advertiser (June 28).

Scenes and Portraits.

THE FRIEND OF PAUL.

OUR master, Epicurus, was a lover of children; he knew, no one better, their delicate and insinuating ways, the strange unreal world in which they play, their unconsciousness of time; and he seems to have taken them as patterns and examplers of the life of pleasure, unsuspicious of the future, and forgetful of the past, but living always with a vivid intensity, in that little, shut-in pleasure-house of the senses, the moment. As I thought of my child, I remembered all his caresses, the soft touch of his flower-like hands upon my face, and the grave eyes that seemed to keep a wisdom older than the world; and beside that image in my dreams stooped another, Drusilla, her hands guiding him to me, she whose whole life was like some attenuated fragrance, difficult of apprehension, but inexpressibly sweet; her quiet brows with real bands of hair smoothed against the cool flesh; and the love that grew between us, first for what she revealed to me, and then for what she hid. When I thought of these two brief, beautiful creatures, I seemed to see in them the true fragility of life, as if it were no more than wind in the stops of a flute or sweet vibration from the strings of a lyre, aerial, elusive, never to be wholly imprisoned in any one form, but wandering, vocal, through the whole of creation, illuminating it to one exquisite moment, like light upon hill and sea, and then vanishing, fleeing away into darkness, never to be exactly repeated.

There are in reality only two religions on this little planet, and they perhaps begin and end with man. They are: the religion of the humble folk, whose life is a daily communion with natural forces, and a binding to them; and the religion of men like Protagoras, Lucretius, and Montaigne—a religion of doubt, of tolerance, of agnosticism. Between these two poles is nothing but a dreary waste of formalism, Pharasaism, "perplexed subtleties about Instants, Formalities, Quiddities, and Relations," all that bewildering of brain which comes from being shut up in a narrow system, like an invalid in a poisoned and stifling room.

Views and Opinions.

On Authority.

We confess to being but little affected by the argument from authority. This is not because we are constitutionally a "rebel," but really because it is so seldom concerned with authority in any genuine sense of the term. Real authority is worthy of all deference; a false authority is wholly mischievous. And the truth is that most of us are an authority in some direction. We defer cheerfully to the authority of a gardener on the burning question of planting potatoes, but should expect him to respect ours on writing a Freethinker article. To be eminent in one department does not of necessity imply eminence in others; and to have great names with us, while it may flatter our vanity, adds nothing to the strength of our position. Authority is only genuine when it is speaking on its own field; in other departments it may be of no greater value than that of the man in the street. It is only in the political world that being Minister of Agriculture prepares one for the work of First Lord of the Admiralty; or an apprenticeship as Under Secretary to the Board of Trade fits one to become Minister of War. Everywhere else a knowledge of the subject is counted essential to the expression of an authoritative opinion.

An Important Book.

What has been said must be taken "without prejudice," as the lawyers say, to an inquiry undertaken by Professor Leuba, of Bryn Mawr College, U.S.A., as to the belief of certain classes of people concerning God and a future life.[1] Professor Leuba has already written several interesting works on religion, which have been favourably noticed in these columns, and The Belief in God and Immortality may be taken as a continuation of these. And if we confine our attention chiefly to the statistical part of Professor Leuba's work, this must not be taken as a depreciation of the other portions. On the contrary, the author's examination of the origin of the belief in a future life and its subsequent developments is of great value. It well prepares the reader for a due appreciation of the statistical inquiry, although one is left with the old problem of explaining the persistence of a belief on behalf of which no valid evidence has ever been forthcoming, and which we know to have had its origin in pure delusion. That belief ought to have disappeared with the conditions that brought it into existence. It is in process of disappearance; but the process is, admittedly, a slow one.

Religion and Authority.

The pretence that the belief in God and a future life is so general that affirmations to the contrary may be treated as a mental aberration, is sedulously maintained in the religious world, and it must be admitted that the moral cowardice of public men in this country lends support to the pretence. Every now and again we are treated to inquiries amongst more or less eminent men of science to prove that all "authority" is against the Freethinker. Of course, the questions are framed with deliberate vagueness, and the inquiries are made in safe quarters; but they serve their purpose, and the unthinking Christian is lulled to rest with the comforting reflection that nearly all "authority" is on his side. Now, it must be admitted that if numbers are not decisive against Freethought, neither can they be decisive for it. But they are symptomatic; and when, in spite of the inducements to conformity, the rejection of religious beliefs proceeds to an increasing extent, one is warranted in taking that as a quite significant phenomenon. They are symptomatic of a movement of opinion under the pressure of social and intellectual forces, and it is this that makes Professor Leuba's work of first-rate importance.

The Test of Facts.

Professor Leuba sent out two sets of inquiries; in each case the inquiries being carefully framed so as to avoid ambiguity. One set of questions dealt with the belief in God, including an inquiry as to the difference the belief or non-belief in God made in life to the person addressed. The other set dealt with the belief in immortality, addressed in the first case to the students of a number of colleges. To avoid long tables of figures, it will be enough to quote here the salient facts. One striking result was that the percentage of disbelievers increased as the students pass from juniors to seniors, and as their intellectual powers developed. Thirty-three per cent. of the whole were "unable to profess a belief in immortality, and a considerable additional number (are) evidently indifferent to it." There were, roughly, twice as many women as there were men who professed belief in a personal God, and a large number considered that the disappearance of the belief would make no difference to their lives. Professor Leuba sums up his own impression from the reports as follows:—

> The deepest impression left by these records is that, so far as religion is concerned, our students are grovel> ling in darkness. Christianity, as a system of belief, has utterly broken down.....Their beliefs, when they have any, are superficial and amateurish in the extreme. There is no generally acknowledged authority, each one believes as he can, and few seem disturbed at being unable to hold the tenets of the Churches.

Professor Leuba does not lament this. On the contrary, he shows quite conclusively, in the concluding chapters of his book, that there is neither intellectual warranty nor utilitarian justification for the belief in God and a future life.

Scientists and Religious Belief.

The more interesting and conclusive sets of figures are, however, concerned with the groups of scientists amongst whom Professor Leuba made his enquiries. Again, groups of 1,000 names were selected in various branches of science which were subdivided into greater and lesser men of 500 each. The questions asked were in no sense leading questions, but so framed as to permit a clear answer either in the positive or negative, or to indicate a state indecision. The result of this inquisition was very striking, and far more favourable to the Freethinking position than many would have anticipated. Thus, taking the lesser and greater scientists together, the believers amounted to no more than 41·8 per cent. The number of avowed disbelievers 41·5 per cent. If, however, we add those who returned themselves as Agnostics, we get no less than 58·2 per cent. of non-believers. The result, we repeat, is striking. Christians are fond of quoting the number of believers on their side; it is something to be able to remind them that amongst the most educated class in the United States more than half have thrown over altogether the belief in God and immortality.

How the Sciences Affect Religion.

An interesting feature of this investigation is the classification of men according to their special science: Physics, Biology, Sociology, History, and Psychology. Of these the physicists provide a greater number of believers than the biologists, the figures being: physicists, 43, biologists 30 per cent. Historians are on about the same level as the physicists, while sociologists and psychologists approximate to the biologists. These results certainly indicate some connection between one's studies and one's religious beliefs, and Professor Leuba is on right lines in saying that:—

> When the student of physical laws has often come to accept determinism in the physical world, he may often and does keep for the less generally understood biological and sociological phenomena, the traditional belief in divine intervention. The biologist and sociologist, however, better acquainted with the natural causes of these phenomena than their brothers of the physical sciences, find it just as impossible to admit God's action in the biological and sociological domains as in the physical.

This is an inference we have often dwelt on in relation to Spiritualism, where the favourable scientific testimony is usually that of physicists, and very rarely that of trained psychologists or even biologists.

Religion and Ability.

There is one other feature of Professor Leuba's important and interesting investigations. The amount of religious belief not only bears a relation to the subject of study, it also bears a relation to the degree of intellectual attainments. Whether physicists or biologists, there is less belief among the greater men. The smallest percentage of believers is found amongst the greater biologists; they count only 16 per cent. of believers in God and 25 per cent. of believers in immortality. Professor Leuba's enquiry shows beyond the possibility of successful questioning that—> in every class of persons investigated, the number of believers in God is less, and in most cases very much less than the number of non-believers.....that among the more distinguished, unbelief is very much more frequent than among the less distinguished, and, finally, that not only the degree of ability, but also the kind of knowledge possessed, is significantly related to the rejection of these beliefs.

Hitherto inquiries of the kind with which we are dealing have usually been conducted in the interests of Christianity. The inquirers set out to establish a result and, naturally, achieved their end. Professor Leuba's investigation is about the first one really designed to get at the truth. And the truth is startling—to the Christian. Freethinkers know how much Christianity has lost ground. The chief trouble is to get people to speak out, and thus place Freethought in the commanding position it deserves. We are certain that The Belief in God and Immortality will encourage the avowed Freethinker to press on with his work. We hope it will encourage the more timid to lend a ready hand to that great task.

We may return to other aspects of Professor Leuba's work next week.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Reformation in England.

III.

NOTHING is more indisputable than the fact that the English Reformation did not even aim at purifying the Church. As on the Continent, so in England, it was a movement calculated eventually to lessen considerably the oppressive power of ecclesiasticism. In some countries, such as France and Spain, the authority of the Church was so generally recognized and submitted to by the generality of the people that such a rebellious movement could not possibly be initiated and conducted on any comprehensive scale. In England, at the commencement of the reign of Henry VIII., ecclesiasticism was a form of hateful foreign tyranny, against which the masses were in a chronic state of silent revolt. It was this unfriendly, if not openly hostile, attitude of the English race towards the jurisdiction of Rome that made it possible for Henry to get his revolutionary measures passed by Parliament. Had the clergy and their flocks been strongly in favour of the Roman domination, the king could never have won his way to the Supreme Headship of the English Church. It was the weakness of ecclesiasticism in England that rendered practicable the divorce of Catherine of Arragon. So far, then, as Henry VIII. had to do with it, the English Reformation was the most discreditably selfish movement in all history. The king did everything for the sole purpose of furthering his own personal ends. And yet it must be admitted that, in spite of the high-handed and despotic character of the ecclesiastical changes introduced by him, their ultimate effect upon the nation was decidedly beneficial. Let it be specially emphasized, however, that even he, cruel tyrant though he was, could not have brought them about had not the people been more or less prepared for them. Had the clergy's loyalty to the Pope been a burning passion, and had they been heartily supported by their parishioners, Henry would have been powerless, for he had not a standing army at his back to enable him to force his will upon his subjects. To the poor within his realm he was uniformly kind, and he did much to protect the workers against the greed and oppression of the rich. On this point both Buckle and Froude are in complete agreement. Alluding to Henry VII. and Henry VIII. in their relation to private wars, Buckle says:—

> Those princes, despots as they were, mainly oppressed the highest classes; and even Henry VIII., notwithstanding his barbarous cruelties, was loved by the people, to whom his reign was, on the whole, decidedly beneficial (History of Civilization in England, vol. ii., p. 108).

Speaking of the working classes, Froude observes:—

> They enjoyed an abundance far beyond what in general falls to the lot of that order in long-settled countries; incomparably beyond what the same class were enjoying at that time in Germany or France. The laws secured them; and that the laws were put in force we have the direct evidence of successive acts of the legislature justifying the general policy by its success; and we have also the indirect evidence of the contented loyalty of the great body of the people at a time when, if they had been discontented, they held in their own hands the means of asserting what the law acknowledged to be their right. The government had no power to compel submission to injustice, as was proved by the fate of an attempt to levy a "benevolence" by force in 1525. The people resisted with a determination against which the crown commissioners were unable to contend, and the scheme ended with an acknowledgment of fault by Henry, who retired with a good grace from an impossible position (Henry the Eighth, vol. i., p. 23).

Thus is explained the comparative ease with which Henry VIII. completely changed the character of the English Church, severing all outward connection between it and the Papacy, and placing it under secular control. It was the deadliest blow ecclesiasticism had ever received, and it is becoming more evident every year that it was the beginning of the end of Christianity in Britain. It was, verily, the laying of the axe to the root of the tree which rendered its eventual fall an absolute certainty. Ever since the Church of England has been a schismatic body, a mere sect, a breach in the unity of Christendom. Indeed, that may serve as a fairly accurate definition of the Protestant Reformation in its entirety. It was a movement which, from its very nature, could make for nothing but the ultimate disintegration of Christianity. It is known as the Protestant Reformation, and its promoters are honoured as the Reformers; but, in reality, to re-form the Christian Church is to demonstrate its fallibility, and this can only be done when the people's faith in it is weak. Luther's mission would have been a total failure had not the popular temper been favourable to it. "In Spain," Buckle says, "the Reformation, after a short struggle, died completely away, and in about ten years the last vestige of it had disappeared," simply because the masses loved the Church, and successfully resisted all attacks upon it. So complete was the dominion of the priests, that it was possible for Philip II. to act upon his famous maxim, "That it is better not to reign at all than to reign over heretics." But in Germany the soil was ready for the revolutionary seed, which was no sooner dropped in than it began to germinate; and in a wonderfully short time the Reformation harvest was gathered in.

The same thing occurred in England, and for the same reason. The Church had sunk into such a depth of all sorts of corruption, the lives of the clergy were so notoriously scandalous, that there was a general, though not openly expressed, discontent throughout the country. While the people remained excessively superstitious, their belief in the Church and her ministers had been on the wane for generations. By Henry's time the measure of the Church's offences was full, which enabled him to put his policy in operation without any opposition from the populace. The Reformation initiated by him was almost exclusively of an ecclesiastical and political character, and did not affect moral and social life in the least. A new Church was created with a secular head, which in course of time formulated for itself a new creed. In these changes the people peacefully acquiesced, and for a considerable period, apparently, it mattered little to them which religion was supreme. There were always a few fanatics who revolted and lost their lives. Even during Henry's own reign and for twenty years afterwards there was no religious stability, Catholic and Protestant doctrines triumphing alternately; and without exception the religion that was up persecuted that which was down. As Freeman succinctly puts it:—

> It was a time of constant change, of change backwards and forwards; the result was that, by the middle of the reign of Elizabeth, there was an established state of things wholly different from the established state of things which had been in the middle of the reign of Henry VIII. (Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. viii., p. 333).

Three facts of vast importance stand out in great prominence. The first is that the Reformation of the English Church involved a complete break with the past in creed as well as in polity. The Rev. R. J. Campbell is radically mistaken when he says: "The Church of Augustine and Colman is the same Church in which I minister to-day" (A Spiritual Pilgrimage, p. 274). He forgets that Augustine was a Benedictine monk sent from Rome to convert the Anglo-Saxons, and according to tradition their labours were crowned with abundant success. This happened in the year 689; but in the wars that followed the young Church was practically annihilated. Then came another monk from Rome to do the work over again, and in 669 he was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury by Pope Vitalian, whilst Colman, after being defeated in a violent controversy about the correct date of Easter at a conference in 664, had already forsaken his see and settled at Iona. Surely at the Reformation the English Church ceased to be a Branch of the Roman Church, and became a separate, independent organization. The second fact is that in the Anglican Church there are two contending schools, the one cursing the Reformation as the greatest ecclesiastical calamity on record, and the other perpetually returning thanks to God for it. Mr. Campbell now belongs to the former school, and, like all the other members of the Catholic party, has his face towards Rome. Many members of the latter school are gradually drifting in the direction of Free Thought. Between these two great parties there are multitudes of little factions among which no love is lost. This state of things is one of the fruits of the Reformation.

The third and most momentous fact is that the Reformation not only dealt ecclesiasticism a stunning blow, but set in motion a process which can only end in the total disappearance of the Christian religion. It was the revival of classical learning that made the Reformation possible, and it is to the Reformation that we are indebted for the triumph of modern science. Once admit the rights of private judgment, once recognize the claims of reason as the supreme arbiter in all human affairs, and you thereby sound the death-knell of all external authority. Under Elizabeth Protestantism had free scope, and as a result Puritanism arose. Puritanism was ruthlessly persecuted, and the various Nonconformist sects gradually appeared. These all hated the Church from which they went out, and most of them cordially hated one another, in the name of the Lord whom they all alike professed to love and follow. The outcome of it all is, that now at last an overwhelming majority of the population never darken church or chapel doors. Thousands of them are avowed unbelievers, thousands more are wholly indifferent, neither actively believing nor disbelieving, while the number of genuine believers is growing smaller every year. The clergy assert that Christianity is on the verge of its final conquest; but the facts show that it is being increasingly abandoned, and that its ministers have ceased to count in the national life.

Digitized by Google

J. T. LLOYD.

The Iron Hand Under the Velvet Glove.

If Christians would teach infidels to be just to Christianity, they should themselves be just to infidelity.—John Stuart Mill.

I have searched over the grounds of my belief, and if wife and child and name and fame were to be lost to me one after the other as the penalty, still I will not lie.—Professor Huxley

The State has tried to take man's religion under its control.—G. W. Foote.

CHRISTIAN apologists never tire of boasting of the tolerance of the religion they profess. Yet the Bible reeks with bigotry and persecution, and the Old Testament Hebrews were expressly ordered to kill heretics. The earliest apostles of Christianity were also imbued with the spirit of persecution. Paul smote Elymas with blindness for opposing him, and John, the "beloved disciple," said, "If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed." Paul, in his letter to the Galatians, says: "If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed." Even in the infant Christian Church the unbeliever is to be shunned like poison, and the history of Christianity after its accession to power justifies the Freethinker in regarding bigotry and persecution as of the essence of that religion. While Christianity survives, the recrudescence of religious persecution is always possible. To say that a superstition which threatened eternal hell-fire for unbelief is opposed to persecution on earth is but to gloss plain facts. The Blasphemy Laws are still on the Statute Book, and are at any moment liable to enforcement. They are the standing menace of a dying creed to those who smile at its childish fables too ostentatiously.

If we turn to the pages of modern history we see at a glance the fruits of superstition and tyranny. Freethinkers suffered terribly for publishing Paine's Age of Reason. Richard Carlile, a paladin of progress, endured over nine years' imprisonment in this terrible struggle. The clergy hesitated at nothing. They even attacked women, and Carlile's brave wife and sister were dragged to gaol for two years each. His shopmen stepped into the breach, and one after the other went to prison, and eventually divided among them forty years' imprisonment. Think of it! One small circle of Freethinkers served between them over fifty years for the rights of free speech in a country pretending to be in the van of civilization. Prosecutions marked the whole of the nineteenth century, and in the famous Freethinker trials the intellectuals were roused to action. Petitions for release were signed by almost everyone of real eminence in England, and the world-honoured name of Herbert Spencer headed this memorable protest. An agitation was commenced against the Blasphemy Laws, which Judge Stephen well described as "ferocious," but which still disgrace the Statute Book of an Empire which to-day numbers far more non-Christian subjects than Christian. The prosecutions, indeed, elicited such widespread and universal condemnation that for some years the law fell into abeyance; but during the past few years there has been a revival of persecution, directed mainly against isolated and unimportant Freethinkers. But the retention of the Blasphemy Laws for such purposes is none the less a danger to liberty. As Professor Bury has pointed out in his History of Freedom of Thought, a great poet like Swinburne was allowed to publish with impunity blasphemies which, put into prose and uttered by an uneducated Freethinker, would certainly have entailed persecution. It is not merely the Swinburnes who ran a risk. The distance is not immeasurable between Matthew Arnold's description of the Christian Deity as "three Lord Shaftesburys" and the efforts of less educated delinquents. It is on any view a most unworthy course to punish the uneducated man for his lack of culture, whilst the utmost license of expression is allowed on Christian platforms and pulpits in attacking Freethinkers.

Imprisonment was by no means the only indignity imposed. Daniel Isaac Eaton, the Freethinker who was championed by the poet Shelley, was not only prosecuted seven times, but had the pillory inflicted and £2,500 worth of books destroyed. Shelley and his friend Thomas Jefferson Hogg were expelled from Oxford University for publishing a Freethought pamphlet. Years afterwards Shelley was declared judicially to be unfit to be the guardian of his own children on account of his opinions. Many years later a similar dishonour was inflicted on Mrs. Annie Besant, who was at that time a prominent Freethought leader. A large number of the prosecutions of the unstamped press were simply disguised blasphemy trials. The authorities covered the odiousness of their acts under cover of proceeding against unstamped papers and pamphlets. Charles Bradlaugh had to fight for thirteen long years for his right to represent Northampton in the House of Commons, and the persecution shortened his life. Only his alertness and extraordinary legal knowledge prevented his imprisonment for blasphemy. A former Marquis of Queensbury was deprived of his seat in the House of Lords on account of his known infidelity. Last, but certainly not least, thousands of pounds bequeathed for Freethought were diverted to other channels; but, happily, the genius of George Foote stopped this highway robbery. In addition, Freethought leaders have been involved in constant and costly lawsuits, deluged with personal abuse, and have also been the victims of a concerted press boycott.

The plain fact is that superstition is scotched, not slain. Fortunately, the clergy no longer have poor and isolated Freethinkers to deal with, but are now confronted with a compact army, upon whose banners is inscribed the significant and stirring phrase of the great Voltaire, "Crush the Infamous." Such an army is not easily to be quelled by a small minority of shouting fanatics.

MIMNERMUS.

A Degrading Religion.

"MY dear Stanley," said Charles Penfold to an intimate friend of his, "I have often wanted to have a chat with you on religion, and I should be glad if you would state what are your chief objections to the Christian religion."

"Well, Charles, I have so many objections that it would take me some time to state them all. But take a few. Of course, my chief objection to Christianity is that it is not true. If that objection holds good, it would not be necessary to state any other, because I do not suppose you would be prepared to argue that a religion that was not true could be so useful to mankind that it would be worthy of being upheld even when it was known to be false?"

"No," said Penfold, "I should not take that ground.

Digitized by Google

But it is merely an assertion on your part to say that Christianity is not true—you could not prove it, or at all events you could not prove it to my satisfaction."

"Another objection I have to Christianity is that it is a degrading religion?"

"A degrading religion! What do you mean by such a statement?"

"Sit still for awhile, and I will tell you. Christianity is a degrading religion because only mental slaves or moral cowards can accept it. A believer must begin by abandoning his reason and end by shifting the burden of moral responsibility from his own to other shoulders. Gautama, the founder of Buddhism, in stating his noble eightfold path to happiness, put first the acceptance of 'right views.' But in order that a man should know what views are right, he must have freedom to think. Gautama saw this, and therefore urged his followers to inquire diligently after truth."

"But surely Jesus did the same?" said Penfold in earnest tones.

"Wait a minute," replied George Stanley, the Rationalist advocate in this little controversy. "I want you to hear me for awhile, and then you may reply. In my judgment, the founder of Christianity was not so wise as Gautama in his desire that men should learn the truth. In fact, he cared not how stupid or thoughtless men were so long as they believed in him. He declared that he was 'the way, the truth, and the life,' and that no man could be saved from the wrath of a merciful God but by accepting him. 'Believe and be saved; disbelieve and be damned' was the foundation-stone of all his teachings."

"But does that not show, my dear Stanley, that Jesus thought he was the Christ?"

"No doubt; but you, as a Unitarian Christian, could not possibly accept such a claim on the part of any man, however great or good."

"No; I admit that."

"Well, Jesus, as a peregrinating preacher, became so arrogant and dogmatic that he led many to suppose he was God Almighty, and Christians to-day are driven into the position of regarding Jesus as the very God or of repudiating him altogether as an impostor."

"Not quite that," retorted Penfold, with some warmth. "I remember Dr. Sexton used to talk like that in his debates with the Secularist, Charles Watts; but I do not think either Secularists or Unitarians take that ground to-day. Unitarians believe Jesus was the Son of God in the sense that all good men are the sons of God."

"But most Christians," responded Stanley, "even to-day say that Jesus must have been a supernatural being or he would not have made such bold pretensions. There was no hesitancy about Jesus. He spoke as though he knew everything. But nearly all religious enthusiasts do that."

"Yes; I quite admit that," said the other.

"Dr. Parker and the great Charles Haddon Spurgeon were little God Almighties to their respective followers. Sidney Smith once satirically remarked: 'I wish I could be as cocksure of anything as Tom Macaulay is of everything.' And Christians to-day take the strong declarations of Jesus as being sufficient guarantee of their truth because they are foolish enough to imagine that his boldness would have been tempered with a little discretion if he had not been certain of their truth. But when Jesus said, 'He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned,' he laid the foundation stone of a religion that is degrading to humanity."

"Although I admit that there is some truth in your declaration," said Penfold, "I cannot go all the way with you when you affirm that Christianity is a degrading religion. You do not take into account the value of the moral teachings of Jesus."

"I am prepared to consider them on another occasion; but for the present I will continue my argument," said the other.

"Well and good."

"It is the first duty of every man to think for himself, and examine the credentials of whatever system he is asked to accept. Is that not so?"

"Agreed."

"Well, then, every man must do his own thinking and express his own views."

"Agreed again."

"Why should Jesus state the whole truth, which persons must not disbelieve on penalty of damnation, in an obscure corner of the earth, to a number of ignorant and fanatical followers, and leave mankind without a written statement of them, except that which was supplied by persons who never saw nor heard him, nor even lived until years after he was dead?"

"Why ask me these conundrums, my dear Stanley, when you know, or ought to know, that I do not believe in the divine inspiration of the Gospels any more than you do?"

"Then why call yourself a 'Christian Unitarian' when you really do not believe in the divinity of Christ at all?"

"I think that Jesus was divine only in the sense that all good and noble men are divine. And all men are inspired who speak imperishable truths in noble language, like Shakespeare, Milton, or even Shelley."

"And do you not think it is a degrading feature of the Christian faith that it asks the believer to accept the death of the innocent as the only medium by which we can have our sins blotted out? I cannot help thinking that the doctrine of the Atonement is very immoral."

"I cannot agree with you, Stanley, on that. Does not every great moral reformer suffer, and in some cases die, for his fellows? In other words, he offers himself up as a sacrifice for the sins of his fellows. Look at Bruno, Vanini, and other great heroes. Did they not offer themselves up for their fellows on the altar of truth and honour and justice? And all the reformers really do the same, do they not?"

"But do they by their death blot out the sins of the guilty? You cannot answer in the affirmative. You are using the word 'Atonement' in a new sense, and the story of the death of Jesus on Calvary and his alleged atonement for the sins of mankind will not bear such interpretation. Anyhow, I thank you for hearing my statement of the case against the ordinary orthodox Christian. Though we disagree on many points, there is one thing I like about you: we can agree to differ, and part good friends. Au revoir!"

Arthur B. Moss.

Superstition.

The Bible versus Little Children.

When reading Addison's Essays on Popular Superstitions, it occurred to me that superstition begins its work early; it has done, and is still doing, great harm to the young. The case that I am going to quote from among the many that he mentions is, apparently, very simple, yet, nevertheless, very mischievous, for it fills the child's mind with ideas of wonder, awe, and mystery.

Mentioning how rife superstition was in his days (1672-1719), Addison states that on one occasion when visiting a friend, a little boy at the lower end of the table told his mother that he was to go into "join-hands" (writing in which the letters are joined, running hand) on Thursday. "Thursday," says she. "No, child, if it please God, you shall not begin on Childermas Day. Tell your writing master that Friday will be soon enough."

He went on to say he wondered that any one could establish it, as a rule, to lose a day in each week. Upon his return home he fell into a profound contemplation on the evils that attend these superstitious follies of mankind: additional sorrows that do not properly come within our lot and how they subject us to imaginary afflictions.

Let us see what is the meaning of Childermas Day. It means Holy Innocents' Day, to commemorate the massacre of 14,000 children two years' old and under (Matt. ii. 16). Three days after the advent of Christ, Church Anniversary put and held as December 28, it was, probably, first celebrated at the fifth or early part of the sixth century.[1] The word comes from Child, Mass, and Day.

So far as the advent of Christ is concerned, there is not a particle of evidence, either Biblical or traditional, for the claim or December 25 to be the birthday of Christ. Archæologists and professors of the Church own this (see Vivian's Church and Modern Thought).

Again, a little child when put to bed, was told, like many others, that God would protect her. Suddenly a large black cat sprang on to her bed, awakening and frightening her more than I can adequately describe. That terror gave her her first doubts as to the all-protecting God, consequently she asked many questions, all unanswerable.

In another case a mother, obsessed with superstition, was putting her child to bed, and with the usual platitudes, after bidding her good-night, turned to take the light away. "Jesus is with you, dear," she said. "Mother, take Jesus away, and leave me the light," said the little one. That was what superstition had done for her.

We read in history of a terrible calamity caused by superstition—that tragic crusade of the children to the Holy Land. The imaginative nature of a French boy wrought upon by preaching was the starting force. He had a revelation from heaven, he said—this highly strung imaginative child—and possibly he had just as much revelation as a good many grown-up mystics of his day. This little Stephen, just twelve years of age, was obsessed with the idea that Jesus wished him to save he Holy Sepulchre or tomb of Christ from the Mohammedans. His alleged revelations caused great excitement; men and women believed that he might be right, for was it not stated in the Bible that "a little child shall lead them." So 20,000 dear little French children gathered at Marseilles, and were allowed to start on their crusade. Many of them sailed for Palestine, but were sold as slaves by those who were taking them. Many thousands sailed from the eastern coast of Italy, and were never heard of again. Christ did not protect these children who went in absolute faith to save his tomb.

Turning to the Scriptures, I cannot see tangible teachings of love and care for little children. Certainly Christ said: "Suffer the little children to come unto me," for even his followers and imitators rebuked them. Suffer means to allow or permit. In Proverbs we find: "He that spareth the rod, hateth his child." All true Humanists are against the beating of children, for it mostly leaves hardness of heart and a bitter outraged feeling. Ingersoll says: "I would have the photograph taken of the angry parent when beating the child."

[1] This day of the week throughout the year corresponding to that on which Holy Innocents' Day fell; considered unlucky by superstitious persons.

A leading newspaper recently stated: "It is urged that experience has shown the futility of flogging for juveniles as for adults."

In the Psalms we find: "Let his children be vagabonds and beg.....Let his children be fatherless..... Neither let there be any to have pity on his fatherless children.....Happy shall he be that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against stones."

In 2 Kings ii. 23, 24, Elijah the prophet was annoyed at little children calling him bald head, and he cursed them in the name of the Lord; and, apparently, in answer to that curse two she bears came forth out of the wood, and did tear forty and two children of them.

Esther is known as the poetry of hatred, and so on. Yet Christians call this book "the Holy Bible," and it is put into the hands of a child of tender years to read as he or she may choose.

Children should have every care and protection. Superstition is a danger to their highly strung nerves. Mystery brings terror into their lives at what should be their happiest time. We should be honest with them.

How many of us are so contented and happy in this world that we are anxious to bring others into it to share our sorrows and joys! Since, through no will of their own, children are brought into this world, we should at least live for their happiness, as something that we owe to them. Bright, healthy, happy children are an asset to a country.

Happiness is conducive to health. When I look at a little child, and see all its innocence and sweet ways, I often wonder how anyone can do anything to crush that happiness, or bring a shadow of fear across the sunshine of that young joyous life.

I have noticed that a child brought up with simply a religion of love, and kindness, and rational teaching, free from fear, from ghosts, goblins, bogies, darkness, and every form of superstition, will be twice as happy as those brought up in a religion of fear, with all its attendant ignorant and irrational omens. Moreover, the nerves of that child will be twice as strong.

When the latter is finally a thing of the past, when truth prevails in its stead, all these things will be. May the great work of Rationalism continue, and speedily attain its noble ends.

I have given just a few cases of the mischief of superstition which is directly or indirectly caused through Holy Writ. Parents would do well to adopt the advice of Professor Bury, M.A., F.B.A., in his work A History of Freedom of Thought. "Nothing should be left undone to impress upon the young that freedom of thought is an axiom of human progress." He also says: "It should be a part of education to explain to children so soon as they can understand, when it is reasonable and when it is not, to accept what they are told on authority."

We might at all times apply the following lines to this great cause of Rationalism:—

> Plough deep and straight with all your powers,
> Spare not, nor look behind.
> Your labour is for future hours.

H. J. BAYLIS.

While, however, there is an enormous improvement, if we compare the administration of human affairs by Jehovah (i.e., the Old Testament God) and by God (i.e., the God of the New Testament), there is, nevertheless, a blot upon the character of God (i.e., the God of the New Testament) which suffices, if rigorously balanced against the failings of Jehovah, to outweigh them all. It is the eternity of the punishment which he inflicts in a future life. No amount of sophistry can ever justify the creation of beings whose lives are to terminate in endless suffering.—Viscount Amberley. "Analysis of Religious Belief," vol. ii., p. 371.

The attempt to re-establish a monarchy in China was crowned with success—for less than a week. Then the Republic reasserted itself, and the boy emperor retired once more into obscurity. A people who have once experienced republican institutions do not easily return to a monarchical regime. It is true that the English people did re-establish monarchy in the seventeenth century, but it is questionable whether that would have occurred had not religious bigotry under the Commonwealth paved the way. But in China the re-establishment—for a week—of the monarchy was entirely a military manœuvre. And it is curious how militarism, monarchism, and religion hang together. They hang together for fear of hanging separately.

The latest appearance of the Rev. A. J. Waldron is on the film. He figures in a new comic picture entitled "Men Were Deceivers Ever," and some who know the late Vicar of Brixton may find something suggestive in the title. Mr. Waldron's posturings have always been amusing, and never more so than when he aimed at being serious. We should not be at all surprised if his acting in a comic picture play moves the audience to tears.

The Congregationalists claim that last year showed an increase in the number of their adherents everywhere, except in Great Britain. In Great Britain the decrease of Sunday-school scholars alone totals nearly 60,000 in four years. The important thing about these figures is, that even where an increase is shown, they never mean more than a shuffling of the cards. An increase to one Church is at the expense of other Churches. Meanwhile, in relation to the non-Christian world, there is a decrease all round. The number of non-Christians steadily increases, and it is that which is, after all, of vital importance.

The exemption of the clergy from military service is not unnoticed among Christians. A letter was printed recently in the Spectator from a correspondent who admitted his orthodoxy, and who wrote: "I am hot with shame whenever I see a lusty and hearty curate, with white hands and sleeky parted hair, selling woolwork at bazaars." And there are thousands of "lusty and hearty" parsons of military age.

In an interesting note on modern slang expressions, particularly the word "blooming," the Daily News refers to an intelligent anticipation of the expression in one of Charles Wesley's hymns, in which Satan is said to essay his "thousand arts" to "blast the blooming work of grace." This is almost as amusing as the line in another hymn, which introduces a more popular expletive, "All hail the bleeding lamb."

An advertisement in a daily paper invites subscriptions for the "War Work" of the Salvation Army. Surely, the Salvation Army is engaged in a spiritual fight with Satan; whilst England and the Allies are fighting the godly Kaiser and his satellites.

Speaking at the Annual Meeting of the Scottish Women's Protestant Union, Miss Augusta Cook said that Germany was no longer a Protestant nation. The Protestantism of Luther had gone. What does she mean by such a statement? Is this only another way of saying that Germany is not a Christian country while Britain is?

A correspondent to a Glasgow daily newspaper, signing himself "Country Minister," says the prestige of the Church has diminished enormously, and is steadily diminishing. Forty years ago nearly half the membership was composed of men; now there is scarcely one man to three women. He says the Church, instead of re-charting the kingdom of heaven, which is righteousness, keeps on prattling of the lost continent far above the bright blue sky. Now, what would happen to a Freethinker if he were to make such a declaration? He would run the risk of being prosecuted for blasphemy. Yet this "Country Minister" openly states that the kingdom of heaven is "righteousness," and is not a place beyond the sky.

The Church of England has much resemblance to Mr. Facing-both-ways, of the Pilgrim's Progress. The Archbishop of Canterbury and some other bishops have condemned reprisals in war; but the Bishop of Birmingham considers that they are justifiable "in self-defence." Probably, the Fathers-in-God find their justification in the Old or New Testament, just as it suits their purpose. For, as a famous old Protestant once pointed out, the Bible is a nose of wax, which is moulded at pleasure.

Special appeals have been made in countless churches and chapels on behalf of "Baby Week"; but this newly found zeal requires much explanation. If the Churches really cared for children, there would be little need for a National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which for a generation has shown how thin is the veneer of civilization in a Christian country.

"Poplar is the apple of my eye," said the Bishop of Stepney. Did his lordship wink with the other eye?

Canon Gamble points out that "the abolition of the Crown would mean the dissolution of the British Empire." He probably means that the Crown and the Church support one another, and in the event of the abolition of the Crown, the Church would share the fate of Humpty Dumpty.

In view of the Irish situation, the Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland have issued an "Instruction" to priests, warning them against movements opposed to the "Church or lawfully constituted authority." Priests are forbidden attending meetings outside their parishes, and are reminded that "the authority by which temporal rulers govern their subjects comes from the same divine source as that by which God's kingdom on earth is maintained." One wonders whether one is living in the twentieth century or the twelfth on reading this; but then one remembers it is the Roman Catholic Church that is speaking, and that explains things.

We can quite appreciate the dilemma of the priest in Ireland. No one knows better than the higher priesthood that self-government in Ireland means their downfall. English mis-government identified the religious with the national cause, and with the national aspirations satisfied there will come the inevitable separation of the secular aspect of life from the religious. This means a weakening of priestly power, and the priests know it as well as we do. But to oppose the national aspirations is to lose the support of the people. To help its realization is to pave the way for their own dowfall. Thus the priest stands between the devil and the deep sea, and a realization of this position helps to explain much that is otherwise confusing in the Irish situation.

The City Tribunal gave exemption to a man who acts as representative for a firm which collects beeswax for the Russian Orthodox Church, the wax being used for making candles. The vagaries of these Tribunals are almost past understanding.

Convocation has decided to eliminate from the Church Service the whole of the fifty-eighth Psalm, and a number of verses of a similar character from other psalms. As a sample of religious "cussing," the fifty-eighth Psalm holds an easy first place, and it is illustrative of the mental digestion of the average Christian that he could sing of the blessings of love and brotherhood, and the virtues of meekness and at the same time exhort the Lord to "Break their teeth in them, O God, in their mouth," "Let them melt away as waters which run continually," "The righteous shall rejoice, when he seeth the vengeance; he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked," etc., etc. The Daily Telegraph remarks that such language "may be apt to the services in honour of the tribal divinity of the House of Hohenzollern, but they ill become the offices of the Christian Church." We would remind the D. T. that the Bible is not a German production; it is the Christian Scriptures. The House of Hohenzollern has nothing to do with it. If the D. T. means that parts of the Bible are fit only for savages, we agree. And we would add that it is this book which the D. T. thinks ought to be kept in schools for the benefit of children.

An article in a labour paper suggests that the workers should have £7 weekly. This should make the Bishop of London smile, for this bachelor-parson enjoys a salary of £200 weekly, which is sufficient to keep fifty working-class families in comfort.

A parallel between the German folk-tales of the Twilight of the Gods and the threatened disaster to the house of Hohenzollern is drawn in a recent publication. The parallel is not so complete as one could wish, for the Kaiser is not a God, but only the friend of one.

Although there are prayers for rain and fine weather in the Government Prayer-book, Christians never seem to get satisfactory results from their earnest supplications. In the recent rain-storm, affecting the Southern and Western counties, enormous damage was done to kitchen-gardens and allotments, growing crops being washed out of the ground.

The War, says Life, a Melbourne monthly magazine, is creating in the keenest minds of to-day a sense of the necessity of Christianity. That is quite an easy thing to say, but we should much like to know where these keen minds are to be found that are clamouring for Christianity? The keenest minds have been giving up Christianity for several generations, and it would be passing strange if this War, with its unanswerable indictment of Christianity, had sent them back again. We take it that what Life really means is, that the War has made Christian leaders realize that it is best to pretend the world is clamouring for Christianity. That may impose upon fools, and it is numbers always that the Churches are after.

Bishop Frodsham was one of the speakers at the Trades Union Conference held last week at Gloucester. Opposing the introduction of coloured labour, he said, in justification of certain labour restrictions, "It was no insult to the Chinese and the Japanese, and even to the less developed races of the world, to say that they were lower organisms than the English and Americans and the white races." So much for the Bishop's professional belief in the brotherhood of man. He evidently believes in the right of every Englishman to kick his own "nigger"; and "nigger" includes everyone who has not a white skin.

The impertinence of Bishop Frodsham speaking of Japanese, Chinese, and Hindoos as "lower organisms" would make one gasp if it did not express a common and a familiar mental attitude. And the conceit of the assertion is only equalled by the stupidity of believing that these hundreds of millions of non-white races will submit to be kept in a state of perpetual servitude or labelled inferiority. To Germany, the rest of Europe is filled with "lower organisms" that need be kept under control. To the European and American, Africa and Asia are filled with "lower organisms" that must be kept well in hand. The mental attitude in both cases is identical. And it is the root cause of our present trouble. A straightforward course of robbery or piracy is comparatively harmless. It is the piratical exploitation of these "lower organisms" by the white man in the name of religion and morality that is the difficulty. For it helps to disguise the real character of the operation, and so makes the cure the more difficult. The great evil of "Prussianism" is, after all, that it does not belong to Prussia. It flourishes to some degree all over the world.

Dr. Henry Van Dyke, late U.S. Minister to Holland, says that he hates Germany with a "holy hate" on scriptural grounds. Well, we are quite certain that if a man wants to do any "hating," he can always find scriptural justification for it. The Bible has been responsible for more hatred than any other book in the world.

Lately, no less than 5,000 mentally and physically defective children belonging to Glasgow were entertained by the Corporation to a day's outing in Ronken Glen Park. And yet Christians affirm that man was made in the image of God. What an image! and what a God!

Speaking at the 238th Anniversary of the Battle of Bothwell Brig, the Rev. Mr. Black said the Covenanters did not fight for Scotland's rights so much as to make Scotland right, and to make the Scottish people a people of God. I am afraid the Covenanters would get a great surprise if they were to return to-day if they only knew how little their efforts have succeeded in making the Scottish people a people of God, and to know how many people in Scotland were doubting even the existence of such a being. And while on this subject we should like to know how many of the vast crowd turned out to hear the preachers, and how many turned out to hear the band?

Father Bernard Vaughan has been advocating four children to each family. Yet his Church has consistently upheld sexless ideals, and filled Europe with monasteries and nunneries.

We are rather pleased to find the Bishop of Southwell declaring that "it is now or never for a united effort on the question of religious education." It bears out what we have said many times as to the importance of the friends of Secular Education being alert. For, if it is now or never for the Churches, it is certainly a question of now for us. When the Churches are active, we should be active also. And it is absolutely certain that the Churches are hoping to make capital out of the present situation.

We do not, and never have, shared the anticipations of an outbreak of beneficial social enthusiasm after the War. We shall have all we can do to recover our lost liberties, and fortunate if we recover the whole. And the ease with which the suggested educational reform is put off time after time is itself significant. But there will be a very determined attempt to re-establish a more definite form of religion in the schools, and it is against that we shall have to be on our guard.

July 17 is "Mascot Day." Captain Berley, who owns a mascot in the form of a small pre-Inca idol, is having a number of replicas made to be sold at one guinea each, which will entitle the holder to a "draw" for the idol itself. The proceeds are to go to private hospitals for officers. It seems that the mascot is supposed to exercise a wonderful influence over the health of the patients in certain hospitals. The whole thing is another illustration of the strong hold superstition has upon masses of the people; and also that its hold on the "upper" is as great as on the "lower" classes.

Mrs. Besant has been forbidden by the Madras Government to speak in public, and ordered to reside in certain specified areas, and angry letters of protest have appeared in the press. The protestors appear to overlook the fact that the power of the Mahatmas is limited by a few Madras policemen.

Dr. Lang, Archbishop of York, addressing the Leeds Chamber of Commerce, prophesied a bright future for labour after the War. This will raise hopes in the breasts of Church organists, choristers, and bellringers.

"General" Booth has appointed an official to extend the work of the Salvation Army in Russia after the War. By that time the Russians ought to have had enough of "Blood and Fire."

Providence doeth all things well. A plague of caterpillers has appeared in Derbyshire, and has done much damage to vegetation.

To Correspondents.

W. O. Jones.—Thanks for verses, which we much regret we are unable to use.

C. Underwood.—We can only say once more that we care very little about the character of the clergy, so far as our rejection of Christianity is concerned. If they were all good men, it would not prove Christianity either truthful or useful. It would only prove that good men may be mistaken. And few sensible persons will question that.

S. Hammond.—The worst that was ever said of us was that we had once been in the Salvation Army. After that, anything else would be, by contrast, a compliment.

J. Burrell (Lanark).—Adding four more new subscribers to your previous ten is great work. A hundred like yourself, in different parts of the country, would, indeed, ease our "worries." We are inclined to agree with you so far as what you say of the "Covenanters" is concerned.

T. Morley.—We had planned a whole series of new pamphlets, but the paper shortage stopped our going on with the work. Still, the plan is only suspended, not abandoned.

E. Smith.—Thanks for copy of your friend's letter. We quite appreciate its tone and contents.

J. G. Bartram.—Pleased to have portrait. It is an anxious time, and you have both our sympathy and good wishes.

S. R. (Belfast).—We gave you one reference to the opinions of Luther and other early Protestants on persecution. Chandler's History of Persecution and Bohn's edition of the Table Talk of Martin Luther will give you further information. The latter will also give Luther's attitude towards the peasants when they rose against their feudal lords.

J. Murphy.—It was good of you to so promptly send copies of the paper in response to our appeal last week.

Vera.—We are doing both, we hope. And surely conducting a direct defence of a threatened public privilege in no way conflicts with the aim of educating the public intelligence.

F. De Lisle (Auckland).—We are obliged for copy of magazine. The religious policy of misrepresentation and exaggeration seems much the same all over the world.

J. Effel.—Next week.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

In the course of a few days the reprint of Mr. Cohen's "Massacre of the Innocents," from the Freethinker of July 1 will be ready for circulation. The leaflet is issued by the National Secular Society, and the price will be 9d. per hundred (postage 3d.), or 6s. per thousand (postage 7d.). The leaflet is timely in its message, and, now while the massacre of the London children is fresh in everyone's mind is the time to give it the widest possible circulation.

Sheffield Freethinkers will please note that Mr. Percy Wild, of London, will lecture in Poole Square, Sheffield, to-day (July 15), at 7 o'clock. His subject will be: "A Criticism of Christianity." Mr. Wild is lecturing under the auspices of the N.S.S., and it is hoped to follow up this meeting with others.

We are asked to announce that on June 4 the Societe Londonienne de Morale Fondee sur les Lois de la Nature was constituted at an enthusiastic meeting held at the Emerson Club, W.C. An energetic programme of lectures (in French) is being arranged to start at the Club in October. Dr. Lionel Giles was appointed President; the Secretary is M. Deshumbert, of 4, Dunheved Road, West, Thornton Heath, to whom communications and adhesions may be made. On Sunday, July 15, the Society starts a series of social functions by a visit, organized under its auspices, to Kew Gardens. Members and friends will meet at the principal entrance at 3.30 p.m., and will be conducted by a guide. Mr. Heaford will be glad to meet there English sympathisers with this French and Belgian effort to keep aflame the principles of naturalism in ethics.

We learn from Mr. Heaford that the Secretary of the Portuguese Federation of Freethought at Lisbon, Senhor A. J. Vieira, has just reported to him that, in spite of the War, the Freethought movement in Portugal is in a flourishing condition. The Federation has now 248 Branches in Portugal and its Colonies, and a membership of 39,842. The Federation, whose President is Dr. Magalhaes Lima, the founder of the Portuguese Republic, sends its greetings to English Freethinkers.

Birds of a Feather.

A field of ripened corn—tawny, yellow, creamy, golden, rich, quiet, satisfying in the autumn haze, not in marked contrast either, but comingling with hedgerow, woods, and green fields, and solemn skies, hushed in the calm of matured content.

An easy chair in the evening and the Freethinker: exquisite hedonism! and the day dying out of the sky, and the gaslight yellow on the gray page: another harvest. The reaper and the sower in serious mood sadly seeking truth, wistful for wisdom. Waving corn—waves on the sea of thought—nor wanting music and sparkle and foam where falls

.....that faint thin line upon the shore.

Suddenly the seeker laughed, and at nothing, to wit: "where ignorance is bliss. A stitch in time gathers no moss." In the next paragraph he was grave again, moved, suffused, inspired, to whoo! "En passent it may be said that ignorance leads us blindfold through the beauties of youth, and age rudely snatches the bandage from our eyes to show us the glories we've left behind." That is worth being said again. It is deeply and profoundly true. Heaven is behind us, not before. We cannot return. We cannot "become as little children." But Tristram and Joan may collaborate in the creation of a quite delectable paradise—a delightful Ingersollian world, congenial to "The Owl" and his confrere.

The Crow.

The Hymn of Love.

(Sung by the Bishop of L——n.)

Safe at home in my Holy See,
Full of wisdom and sanctity,
This is the message revealed unto me,
This is the anthem the angels sing:
"Nature is red in tooth and claw,"
And man was born that he might kill;
This is the Ever-lasting's law,
Thus we fulfil the eternal will.
The Lord of Love is Lord of Hell,
'Tis he who sends the submarine;
He watches o'er the bursting shell,
Incarnadines with blood the green.
For some are good, and some are bad,
And all have sinned at birth;
So let them rot, it is their lot
To stain with blood the earth.

The Sense Organs of Man.

III.

As we have seen, the senses of taste, smell, and hearing are all modifications of the primordial sense of touch. The auditory sensation is initiated by the touches of the moving air particles, while taste and smell arise from the touches of sapid or odorous substances. And in vision, the eye is affected by a highly attenuated material whose vibrations transmit movements which affect the organs of sight, evolve the sensations of light, the perception of objects around us, and even enable us to view celestial orbs untold millions of miles in space. The medium for the transmission of light is the luminiferous ether, whose vibrations generate changes in the optic nerve and in the brain, when we become conscious of the existence of external entities.

Extremely sensitive, the eye is well shielded from harmful influences. Seated in soft fat, the eyeball is fixed in a socket of strong bone. The lachrymal gland secretes a watery fluid which keeps the eye moist, while the eyelids and eyelashes protect the delicate organ from dust and other detrimental substances. The ball, or globe, of the eye is a circular body, which moves easily in its receptacle, the orbit, an opening in the skull. The optic nerve, which is rooted in the brain, enters the back of the eye-globe, and, having penetrated the globe's integument,— > it spreads out into a very delicate membrane, varying in thickness from 1-80th of an inch to less than half that amount, which lines the hinder two-thirds of the globe and is termed the retina. This retina is the only organ connected with sensory nervous fibres which can be affected by any agent in such a manner as to give rise to the sensation of light (Barcroft).

The light which enters the eye is regulated in amount by variations in the diameter of the pupil. The iris is provided with contractile fibres, and when these contract the pupil expands; but if the light penetrating the pupil prove too strong, a round band of muscle fibre placed close to the pupil's margin contracts and the pupil—an aperture in the iris—decreases in size. In producing the sensation of sight, the most important function of the retina consists in its ability to convert the ethereal vibrations which form the physical basis of light into a stimulus of the fibres of the optic nerve. Nerve fibres converge from all regions of the retina, and become massed together to form the optic nerve. The phenomena of visual sensation are lucidly summarized by Professor McKendrick and Dr. Snodgrass, in their Physiology of the Senses, as follows:—

> The optic nerve from each eye passes backwards, and entering the hollow of the cranium by a passage at the back of the orbit, joins with its fellow in a union called the optic commissure. At the commissure some of the fibres pass directly upwards into the brain, but in the human eye the most of the fibres from the inner or nasal half of each retina decussate, or in other words cross over, and pass backwards to the half of the brain opposite to the eye from which they have come, while fibres from the outer or temporal (next to the temples) side of each retina pass back to the brain on the same side of the eye from which they have sprung. Hence it will be seen that almost all the fibres affected by rays of light which come from objects on the left side of the body will transmit impressions to the right side of the brain, while luminous impressions from the right side of the eyes will be transmitted to the left half of the brain. The bundles of nerve fibres continued behind the optic commissure are known as the optic tracts, and they pass to certain ganglia at the base of the brain, from which again fibres pass to the occipital or posterior part of the cerebral hemispheres, the stimulation of which gives rise to the sensation of light.

The brain centre for vision is termed the visual sensorium, while another area which forms the seat of the sensation of hearing is known as the auditory sensorium. It must, however, be clearly understood that the sensation of light is brought about in the visual sensorium, and does not arise in the retina. The retina is, of course, an essential instrument in evolving visual impressions, but it has been demonstrated that if certain brain centres are destroyed, or even diseased, no visual sensation arises even if the retina and the entire optic nerve remain intact. In these circumstances blindness results because the visual sensorium is unable to function.

Waves of light, again, when falling on the optic nerve, fail to excite it. The fibres of this nerve in themselves are as insensible to light as any other region of the body. But in the course of evolution the highly complex structures of the retina have been adapted so completely that they are capable of transforming the almost unthinkably delicate throbbings of the luminiferous ether into light-creating stimuli of the optic nerve fibres.

Thus we, in company with our fellow-animals, derive the totality of experiences which builds up our mental existence from the external world. Moreover, those latent powers which are ours at birth, and are therefore not the outcome of our individual experiences, must have descended to us through inheritance from our ancestors, who bore in their germ-plasm the accumulated mass of registered impressions gathered by the race during its development. The mental powers potential in the infant's brain represent the evolutionary outcome of the countless centuries' experiences which have been slowly stored, to be subsequently bequeathed, principal and interest, in terms of heredity, to succeeding generations. For it is essential to understand that in sober truth heredity is really the transmission of the experiences, bodily and mental, which our ancestors, immediate and remote, have amassed through their contact with the environing conditions which have constituted their lives.

External energies generate all the multitudinous phenomena to which the several senses of man respond. Light, sound, and other agents act on special organs, and along these, nervous impulses are transmitted by the sensory nerves to the central nervous structures. Within these central nervous structures molecular activities arise which, on their subjective side, constitute our states of sensation; and ancestral experience, combined with individual experience, has constrained us to instinctively regard certain phenomena in the outside world as the immediate causes of consciousness. The feelings which arise within ourselves as the result of the impact of external forces on our sensitive structures may manifest themselves either as voluntary or involuntary actions.

Many are the body organs that are subject to impressions from without. All our higher mental activities are directly or indirectly determined by our converse with surrounding Nature. The same principle applies to physical activities. These are largely voluntary, into which the group of feelings termed the "will" enters. But there are also the involuntary movements which are all practically automatic. The increased throbbing of the heart, the quickening or arrest of breathing, the irrepressible smile, the pale face of anger or fear, and the rosy hue of nervousness or shame, are all the outcome of reflex action. But the functions of the central nervous structures and those of the sensory organs are so nearly related that it is hard to say where involuntary or reflex actions end and those of volition begin. It is important to realize that the entire nervous system operates as a whole, and although certain organs are more complex, both in structure and function, than others, all branches of the nervous mechanism perform their part in rendering us aware of the happenings around us.

Presumably, no one can think without having something to think about; and all the problems presented to the mind are the resultant of the impressions received from without, either in the present or the past. For we are conscious not only of immediate events, but of those that happened at a recent or remote time. Generally speaking, we cannot really think of coming things; we can only speculate concerning them. In dealing with past events we revive old impressions, while in our anticipations concerning approaching occurrences we are unable to range, except in imagination, beyond that circumscribed region of legitimate expectation which is invariably based upon our experiences of the apparently eternal processes of natural causation.

New Testament Legends for Young Readers.

I.—BABY HEAVEN'S-GIFT.

THE Greek people told the tale of the maid Danae, who was shut up in a tower of brass, so that she might never be free to be a wife and mother; for her father had heard the wise voice of an Oracle say that his daughter's son would slay him. One day, a shower of gold fell in glittering rain from the sky; and the gold was the gold of Zeus, the Heavenly Father. Danae's child was born in the tower of brass, and her father, not daring to kill the wee Son of Heaven, put mother and babe in a wooden box, which drifted and drifted near to an island-shore, where it was entangled in a fisherman's net, and drawn to land. The boy became the hero Perseus, who, with wings on his feet, and a magic bag slung over his shoulder, and a sickle-shaped sword in hand, and a helmet that made him invisible, flew to the place of the horrid Gorgon Medusa. This creature was like an octopus, and Perseus cut off its head. It was Perseus, too, who saw the girl Andromeda chained to a seaside rock, and about to be devoured by a dragon. So the hero slew the dragon and married Andromeda. He killed his grandfather, but not meaning to, for in the games of the Greeks, he flung a flat stone discus, and it slipped aside and killed the old king who looked on. Such is the tale of the Son of Heaven, who made war on dragons, and delivered the Dawn-maiden from the Monster of Darkness; or we may say he delivered the earth, chained by winter, from the Monster of Cold.

And now we will hear of other babes and other wonders.

* * * *

An old priest, bearded, white-capped, and robed, held a handful of powder before the altar. On the altar top were spread red-hot bits of charcoal.

"Incense!" cried a voice.

At this command, the priest dropped the powder on the altar fire, and smoke rose up to the roof of the Temple of Jerusalem; and a murmur of prayer rose from the crowd of Jews in the hall near by, as, with uplifted arms, they watched the smoke, and thought of heaven.

Then the old priest saw, as it were, a shining man on the right side of the altar, and at the sight of this angel his knees shook and hands trembled.

"Fear not," said the bright one; "your wife Elizabeth will have a son, whom you must call Heaven's-gift, or John. A great man shall he be, strong, though never drinking wine; and, as a messenger, he shall teach the people to be good and wise."

"But,—but," stammered old Incense-burner, "but—but".....

"Ah, you don't take my word," said the angel; "then I tell you I am Gabriel, courtier in the halls of God in heaven. You shall be dumb, and not a word will your lips speak till baby Heaven's-gift be born."

So, of course, the priest could not walk out and say to the crowd, "Go, and peace be unto you." He moved his silent lips, and waved his wrinkled hands, and the folk went home, wondering much and chattering much. They had not seen the angel.

About six months after that, the bright one entered a small cottage in the town of Nazareth, in Galilee; and there was a maid there named Mary, or Maria.

"Hail, Mary, favourite of God," he said, "Blessed among women are you."

Like Incense-burner, she trembled.

"Fear not, Mary. I come from heaven to tell you that you will be mother of Jesus the Saviour of Men. Great shall he be, and God, his father, will give him the throne of David, and King Jesus will rule his kingdom for ever."

Mary bent low in a salaam before Gabriel, the courtier of heaven, and she answered meekly,—

"I am the maidservant of God."

Gabriel flew back to cloud-land.

Mary packed a little bundle for a journey, and set out, at a quick pace, across the hills, to visit her elder kinswoman, Elizabeth; for the cloud-land messenger had told her Elizabeth's secret.

The two women smiled and chatted together; and if the fig-trees, and the olive-trees, and the grape-vines in Elizabeth's garden could have heard, they would have heard the maid Mary sing,—

"My soul praises the Lord, for all people in days to come shall call me the Blessed Lady, humble though I am. The Lord pulls down the mighty folk, and lifts the lowly ones; and he richly feeds the hungry, and sends the rich empty away; and he forgets not his people the Jews; he forgets not the children of Abraham."

Of this praise-song, the old priest heard every word; but he could speak no word to this happy girl of Nazareth.

About three months later, Elizabeth's neighbours, with laughter and chatter, and joyous greetings, swarmed into her house, telling how glad they were to hear she was mother of a babe; and it was a pleasure, indeed, to be present at his naming, when he was eight days old.

"Blessings on the little Zacharias!" cried the friends.

"No, no, no, kinsfolk," said Elizabeth. "His name is John,—Heaven's-gift."

"Nonsense! it is not a family name."

"Yes," she insisted, "John, John, John."

They turned to the old man, whose name was Zacharias.

He moved his hands as if holding a pencil, or pointed stylus.

They understood, and hastened to lay before him a tablet of wood, over which was smeared a smooth varnish of wax. Every eye followed the motion of his stylus, and in the silence, all could hear the scratching, as he wrote,—

"The child's name is John."

They stared; and yet more did they marvel when the old priest flung up his arms, and shouted,—

"Praise Heaven for Heaven's-gift!"

Crowds gathered in the village street to talk of the wonder; and every shepherd, and ploughman, and vine-dresser in the hill-country gossiped for days about the dumb man's speech, and the naming of John.

Digitized by Google

"It will be a wonder-child," said everybody.

The old priest also had his song to sing,—

"Blessed be the Lord God of Israel. Our horn is lifted up in triumph; our foes will be laid low; and my little Heaven's-gift will be the great Runner-before, and he will go before the king, and give news to the people of the coming Dawn. Light, light, light to the folk in the shadow! Light to lead our feet in the way of peace!"

In after-years, a young man dwelt in the wild region of the hills; his food was plant-food, his drink was water from the rippling burn; his coat was rough; he climbed rocks with the sure foot of a goat; his thoughts were of the Dawn, and of the Light, and of the King who would come to burn the Wrong in the fire of the Right.

The young man was Elizabeth's son, John the Fore-runner, John the Pioneer. Strong man of the wilderness was he; and when he shouted, the echoes of his voice rang from cliff to cliff.

* * * *

Such is the legend given in the gospel known as the gospel of Saint Luke.

The Fore-runner who lived in the wilderness was a sort of monk, or Essene. These Essenes were Jews who dwelt apart, in lonely places, in a society of their own. They all sat at one table to eat their simple meals. All wore garments of like pattern. All laboured, either in tilling the soil, or at some craft for the making of things. They placed all their goods in one store, and the overseers bought for all whatever was needed. If any man was sick, the Brethren nursed him. No slaves were kept; no monk sold any wares that he made; and none ever handled a deadly weapon. Often and often they washed, and such was their zeal to wash at day-break that they were sometimes called Morning Baptists. They sent gifts of incense to the Temple at Jerusalem, but never went there themselves. They never slew animals for sacrifice. If sickness fell on any, they deemed it the work of demons, or devils, and sought to cast out devils by whispered magic words, or the use of magic roots and herbs. Listening, they thought they could hear voices from heaven; and in cloud-land they believed there was a happy realm, where winds blew soft, and souls might live in peace.

Some people think that John the Baptist (Heaven's gift), and Jesus, son of Mary, were Essenes.

And some people think.....

Oh, there is no end to what some people think, and other people think; and, after all, I am only telling legends.[1]

F. J. GOULD.

Going! Going! Gone!

THE Fra readers will permit me to apologize to them for an erroneous article published some months ago, entitled "Blatherskite Billy." Therein I called Billy Sunday a grafter, a rogue, a charlatan, a soul-snatcher, a money-changer in the temple, a master of chicanery, a braying ass, a crooked seeker for effects, a mountebank, a clown, a tawdry egotist in grease-paint, a trafficker in the trite, a shrewd seducer of the people, a contemptible, low fellow, a vile-tongued betrayer of "the Word," a spiritual harlot. Twenty of his sermons I had read thoroughly for their mob psychology. Ten men, whose judgment I respected, had attended his tabernacle-feast, given me their minute and unprejudiced impressions in writing. The Baltimore newspaper accounts I had devoured with the zeal of a convert. I thought I knew ball-player Billy, the hell-devil Evangelist. I had never heard Sunday—never seen him, but I thought I knew his mind, his kind. God help me—I erred. I must apologize.

Billy Sunday is now in Buffalo. Last night I saw him—heard him—sat at his feet. East Aurora sent in a special train. Four hundred and fifty of us made the trip. We bought Peter's chocolate and salted pea-nuts in lieu of supper. Streaked it for the revival shed.

Fifteen rows from the rostrum we found seats directly in front—an ideal situation. Five people constituted the immediate party: a Protestant Christian, a Roman Catholic, a Swedenborgian, a neutral and me, Myself! Probably we formed a complete unit in that vast concourse of human varieties, Philistines and Publicans, Greeks and Romans. We expected all there was to expect—yielded he who could draw together such multitudes must offer something.

'Twas yet early. Then the tabernacle contained not more than two hundred people. Soon the mass flocked in—thousands—14,000 I believe is the capacity. 'Twas filled when Mr. Rodeheaver appeared with his trombone to lead a picked choir of 1,200 voices. First surprise! Rodeheaver is, unquestionably, able. How he ever became ambitious to blow strange and fear-some noises through the twin pipes of a trombone I cannot say. God moves in mysterious ways his blunders to perform. Rodeheaver has brains.

He welcomed the invited groups, including the "East Aurora Bunch," with aplomb and well-measured patron-age. Asked each to name a favourite hymn. Requested some safe and sane groups to sing their selection. Passed out a few Class B jokes and complimentary personalities. Excellently well opened up the meeting. Turned over to Sunday an assembly warmed up, cheered, jollied a bit, pleased with its part in the show, in an altogether complacent, non-resisting frame of mind. A thankless task, sympathetically and artfully carried through. "Rhody," by the cut of his clothes, his selection of vests and neck-wear is not a "gentleman"; by his paucity of words, and slurrings, and repetitions, he's not educated. Yet for a' that he's a considerable man. There lurks animal power behind the easy exterior!

Hear me say it—I apologize. Sunday is sincere—he believes every word he preaches. He's not a grafter, a rogue, a charlatan—he's not in it for the money. I doubt whether he gets much more than his board and clothes for his share. Driven into a corner, a personal decision demanded, I am sure he would offer to preach Christ free.

I doubt he knows the feel of the thousands that have poured into his consecrated tin pans! Poor Billy Sunday is a blithering, babbling, grimacing paranoic. Once before I used this word to describe Sunday. But then lightly, contemptuously, as one who designates a crafty crank. Now I weigh my word, seriously, as one who wishes to earnestly convey to you that Billy Sunday is a crazy man · a loon, beset by hallucinations, seeing visions, hearing voices, talking direct to heaven and hell! Please do not mistake my intent, I do not desire to disparage his theology. For the sake of this article I will accept the Sunday religion, in its entirety, without equivocation. I want to hold your attention to the most ghastly joke, the most tragic fraud ever foisted on the American people.

What I saw made me sick in the pit of the stomach, weak! (We were all expectant—we especially wanted to hear his "Oratory"!) He came on the high platform, and sat down on the lone kitchen-chair. His mind seemed far off. He put his hand up to stroke his face, and when he touched his face, it twitched horribly. When he removed his hand, the face and neck continued to twitch strangely; now here, now there! Now the chin and behind the ear at the same time! If I exaggerate a word of this I hope Billy Sunday's God will paralyze me where I sit!

Soon his time came to speak. Rodeheaver motioned him, signalled him. He stood, tottered, and then ran the fourteen feet that separated the chair and the pulpit, on his toes, tilted forward. Oft I have seen men drunk and men heavy in drugs make progress like this. I could not believe my eyes. I dare not look at my companions—what were they seeing?

Rodeheaver knows. He stands by Sunday every minute. He permits Sunday no duties but the sermon. He sustains him; holds him together.

Sunday announced the text: "God commanded all men to repent!" "Get that!" he squealed. "Not me! God! God commanded—not Billy Sunday—God!"

Some one to my left murmured: "Egomaniac!" But 'twas more than ego! His poor emaciated body served simply to hang clothes on. His long, thin shanks failed him as he walked. His physical deterioration is marked. His nerves are gone. His brain cannot remember more than one paragraph. He may never get more than three feet from his notes. Yes—he talked with note!

For one hour and ten minutes he excited himself, raved, stood on one leg, shook his fist, made faces at the Devil, talked to God, exhausted his voice, shrieked with diabolical laughter that sent shivers along the spine. "Oh, Felix," whispered the young woman next to me, "he's crazy!" "Aye, poor man, he is!"

Unbalanced! Deranged! Obsessed! Gone—his mind gone! No wonder he attracts crowds! And not by what he says—I assure you that. He said not a single memorable word—not one. Not a thought. Not a joke. Not a vulgarity. Not a story. Not an apt illustration. Not a word-picture; nothing!

He ranted and he tore his body for physical reinforcement! His body lacks virility to help him. He was flat! and dull! He is flamboyant without force. Erratic without originality. Jocular without humour. He talked from his vocal cords. He never went below them for power. Imagine the condition of his voice—hoarse, wheezy, disagreeable. Imagine the agony of his facial expression as he tried to reach 14,000 with a worn-out voice, a sick mind, a wandering will, and a body that stumbles.

Applause seems to surprise and delight him. In mid-air he stops his harangue, retires behind the pulpit, walks up and down, rubs his hands together, smirks and gibbers to himself, apparently oblivious of his audience.

Twelve words he mispronounced—either through mental lapses or ignorance. Five times he started sentences, and when half through lost his thought, and never recovered it.

Lincoln and Douglas in the historic debate averaged 100 spoken words a minute. Practically no variation in the vocal speed of the two. Sunday would seem to average 200; when frantic he goes up to 300! When he finished, just seventeen people of the 14,000 voluntarily "hit the trail." Then the man-to-man solicitation began. "Secretaries" struggled behind every row of seats to reach the individual. Three times in twenty minutes I suffered while some person to me unknown wrapped his arm around my shoulders, breathed dewy breaths in my face, asked me: "Are you ready to take Christ?" "Take him where?" I answered the last salesman. He tartly responded: "The Devil has got you all right!"

Compared with the impertinence, the embarrassment, of the solicitation, any ordinary person will find the sawdust trail and Sunday's aspen a haven of refuge! His originally small undisciplined mind stressed emotionally, driven by a tremendous physical energy, has become addled, muddled, witless! No wonder in his religious frenzy he sounds the call of Brotherhood to other undersized, unused, undeveloped, withered minds, balancing on the brink, amazed at the immensity of life's proportions, the human odds and ends that clutter his sawdust trail. For years overworked! Night and day with one subject, and that one subject the contribnting cause of more than two-thirds of all insanity, Billy Sunday has reached journey's end. 'Tis a crime against civilization to let him go on. The night he falls frothing on his platform will drop the curtain on Protestant Christianity in America. Not that that would be fatal in itself, but think of the reaction on his thousands of dupes!

Billy Sunday's "light that shines" is the phosphorescent glow which hovers over the dead.

Readers of the Fra are urged to go and hear Billy Sunday. Do not take my word. Invite a friendly doctor to go along professionally. What he notes, what you see with your own eyes, will largely explain the "eccentricities" of this pathetic figure, like John Brown, another crazy man who came down and took the town.—FELIX SHAY in the Fra.

CIRCUMSCRIBED JUDAISM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—There is one consideration which, to my mind, presents an insuperable difficulty against the Divine authority of the Jewish religion—inasmuch as it shows an absurdity—which I have never seen put forward except, indeed, as a hint coming from Julian, surnamed the Apostate, given in Schaff-Herzog's Encyc (third ed., art. "Infidelity"). The difficulty is that of believing that an ubiquitous God of infinite power should have allowed his religion to have remained shut up within the narrow limits of Palestine during so many centuries. From Moses to Christ was fifteen centuries, or thereabouts.

JAMES MASTERSON.

THE DAVENPORT BROTHERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In his article of June 24, Mr. Mann tells us that the report of the exposure of the Davenport Brothers "is a fable circulated by our great and glorious free press." Let me assure you that Mr. Maskelyne did expose them, and that most effectually. A full account is to be found in a work written by Mr. Maskelyne, Modern Spiritualism, published by Warne & Co. It bears no date, but was apparently issued in the late seventies. Chapter vi. is devoted to "The Juggling Gemim!" which was Maskelyne's playful way of designating the Davenport Brothers. He tells us how he discovered their tricks:—

> Being present at a morning cabinet seance given by the Davenports at the Town Hall, Cheltenham, I was elected a representative of the audience, and by the accidental fall of a curtain, hung over a window to exclude the light, I got a key to the knotty problem, which I have ever since used with such effect to reproduce all the tricks of the Brothers, that Spiritualists are in the singular dilemma of either branding them as impostors, or of claiming Mr. Cooke and myself as mediums. The latter is the course usually adopted.

The Brothers failed to release themselves on many occasions. The "Tom Fool's Knot" that Mr. Mann mentions, was cut by a coadjutor, and the performance abruptly terminated. Mr. Maskelyne informs us:—

> In Ireland, at a private seance, Ira Davenport and William Fay were baffled by a gentleman whom they thought to be a Spiritualist; and after sitting an hour without manifestations, they were untied at their own request.

A search through the files of the Freethought journals of the period, the National Reformer and the Secular Chronicle, would probably discover many references to the Davenport Brothers.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Mann's articles will be produced in book form. That his previous series of articles on Nietzsche were not reprinted is regretted by many.

SOCIALISM AND RELIGION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Your comment on an article taken from the Saltcoats Herald is obviously due to the fact that you have in mind only those professed Socialists who claim that religion and Socialism are in harmony. We Socialists claim that Socialism is a science based on the materialistic conception of history, and, as such, quite impossible to reconcile with any religious beliefs. The Socialists' case against religion differs widely from the usual Freethought position.

There are Rationalist superstitions as well as Christian. Religion was not the wicked invention of charlatans, nor is the passing of superstition simply to be explained by the triumph of reason." The progress of science, and, therefore, the decay of religion, is ultimately explicable only from the evolution of economic conditions. Ideas play a secondary part in social development. They are the effects of the material environment upon human beings. Therefore, in his worship of the "idea," the bourgeois Freethinker is like the Christian, attributing miraculous powers to the figments of mens' brains. We Socialists are under no illusion as to the value of religion as a means of keeping the working-classes in subjection. Meekness, mildness, and contentment are the essence of religion. Many Christians have never been under any illusion as to Socialism being opposed to religion. Dr. Shadwell, at the 1909 Church Congress, held at Swansea, said "The purely materialistic view on which Socialism is based is absolutely opposed to the Christian teaching." And I could quote many others who speak in a similar strain. In conclusion, may I suggest that you have been led astray by the remarks of pseudo-Socialists?

M. STREIMER.

[It would help considerably to an understanding of the dictum that "the decay of religion is ultimately explicable only from the evolution of economic conditions," if we were informed on what the evolution of economic conditions depend. Until that is done the phrase reads like one of those "blessed words" which satisfy without enlightening. Further, the Freethinker does not attribute miraculous powers to ideas; what he does see is that man is always under the dominion of his ideas, and it is these that are the chief determinants of social conditions. And, presumably, the idea of Socialism plays some part in the making of Socialists. Finally, no human society exists, or ever has existed on an economic basis. The social bond is essentially a psychologic one. —EDITOR.]

The Decay of Faith.

In dealing with Professor Leuba's The Belief in God and Immortality, we were concerned last week with the statistical aspect of the work only. The statistics were, it is true, striking enough. So far as America is concerned—and in this respect there is no reason whatever for assuming that America is different from other countries—the figures showed that Christianity is following the course of other religions. It is dying from the top. The brain is leaving the creed. When half the most educated portion of a community deliberately reject the belief in God and personal immortality it shows, as Professor Leuba says, "the futility of the efforts of those who would meet the present religious crisis by devising a more efficient organization and co-operation of the Churches or by more attractive social features." When the educated intelligence of a country reject such fundamental religious ideas as the belief in a God and a soul, it is idle to think that the situation can be retrieved by mere organization or by disquisitions on social subjects. Save for the degree to which they may arrest the rate of rejection by distracting attention from the main issues, such efforts are, in themselves, evidence of the extent to which first rate mental ability has already departed from the old faith. The rejection of religious belief is, in short, an inevitable accompaniment of civilization. It is "a rejection apparently destined to extend parallel with the diffusion of knowledge and the moral qualities that make for eminence in scholarly pursuits."

The Utility of Religion.

The eventual disappearance of supernaturalism from civilized society may be taken as a fact. There is no other intelligible explanation to be given of the advance of naturalism on the one hand, and of the modification of supernaturalism on the other. It is not here a question of what is desirable or undesirable, but simply one of observation and inference. True, the process of disappearance bids fair to be a lengthy one, and yet if we contrast the advance made by rationalistic thought during the very brief period which it can claim to have been an ordered force, with the many centuries during which supernaturalism held control, the advance has been astonishingly rapid. The question, therefore, remaining is the supposed utility of the belief in God and a future life, and to this question Professor Leuba devotes the concluding portion of his book. "Is humanity better off with than without this belief?" he asks, and his answer is that to-day the belief costs more than it is worth. Even in earlier days the same answer might have been given. In nearly every age the indifference of the majority of people to religious influences has been a commonplace of preachers. In moments of stress or of passion earlier generations may have turned to religion, but the occasion over, the non-religious forces of life began to re-exert their influence. To-day the spontaneous resort to religion is no longer observable. In that fateful August of 1914, a people to whom religion was something vital would have flocked to the Churches. What we did see was a complete ignoring of religious forms and formulæ. A nation that had never heard of a God or a future life could hardly have ignored both more completely. Only the professional fussiness of the clergy managed to keep religion in the field of vision.

Some Home Truths.

On the lack of value of religious beliefs, and also on the social origin of moral ideas and feelings, Professor Leuba is commendably clear and outspoken. The following, for example, is well said:—

> Our alleged essential dependence upon transcendental beliefs is belied by the most common experiences of daily life. Who does not feel the absurdity of the opinion that the lavish care for a sick child by a mother is given because of a belief in God and immortality? Are love of father and mother on the part of children, affection and serviceableness between brothers and sisters, straightforwardness and truthfulness between business men, essentially dependent upon these beliefs? What sort of person would be the father who would announce divine punishment or reward in order to obtain the love and respect of his children? And if there are business men preserved from unrighteousness by the fear of future punishment, they are far more numerous who are deterred by the threat of human law. Most of them would take their chances with heaven a hundred times before they would once with society, or perchance with the imperative voice of humanity heard in the conscience.

And here is another deliverance worth citing:—

> The heroism of religious martyrs is often flaunted as marvellous instances of the unique sustaining strength derived from the belief in a personal God and the anticipation of heaven. And yet, for every martyr of this sort, there has been one or more heroes who has risked his life for a noble cause, without the comfort which transcendental beliefs may bring. The very present offers almost countless instances of martyrs to the cause of humanity, who are strangers to the idea of God and immortality. How many men and women have in the > past decade gladly offered and not infrequently lost their lives in the cause of freedom, or justice, or science? In the monstrous war we are now witnessing, is there a less heroic defence of home and nation, and less conscious self-renunciation for the sake of others among the non-believers than among the professed Christians? Have modern Christian nations shown a more intense or a purer patriotism than ancient Greece or Rome, where men did not pretend to derive inspiration for their deeds of devotion in the thought of their gods..... The fruitful deeds of heroism are at bottom inspired not by the thought of God or a future life, but by innate tendencies or promptings that have reference to humanity. Self-sacrifice, generosity, is rooted in nothing less superficial and accidental than social instincts older than the human race, for they are already present in a rudimentary form in the higher animals.

These are familiar truths to Freethinkers. To thoughtful Christians they may come with all the force of a new revelation.

Two Things Needful.

Neither the belief in God nor the belief in immortality are necessary to the wellbeing of mankind. Both these beliefs are rejected by a very large number of educated people, and are with other classes losing their influence. These are the two conclusions driven home by Professor Leuba; and, one may add, the need for his work is a reflection upon the character of our civilization. The battlefields of Europe are showing to day how easily man relapses into the life of the savage on the material plane, and the Churches of Europe demonstrate with equal clarity that we have not proceeded far above the savage in the world of intellect. Nor are the two things so unconnected as a superficial survey might lead one to suppose. In justification of the savage, it might be urged that he knew no better, and could know no better. His gods were the expression of his undeveloped intellect. The retention of "gods" by civilized man admits of no justification. The possibilities of knowing better are here. Two things only are required to realize this possibility and to express its result in life: the desire to know and the courage to speak. And of these, the courage to speak is most needed. For it is idle to pretend that nowadays the profession of religious belief is with a very large number other than pure hypocrisy. And many assist by their silence, even when they do not aid in other directions. Professor Leuba's Questionnaire elicited the fact that amongst the scientists of America, fifty-eight out of every hundred have given up all religious belief. If that fifty-eight per cent. could be induced to make their opinions well known, and if their example were to be followed by the scientists of this country, we should find the social status of religion reduced to its legitimate proportions, and, with the destruction of its social status, the final disappearance of supernaturalism would not be very long delayed.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Sanctified Piffle.

EVER since the War broke out the divines have been talking and writing nonsense on a scale to which even they had previously been unaccustomed. To a Freethinker supernaturalism is a subject upon which it is utterly impossible to make any sensible statement because no knowledge about it is obtainable on any terms whatever. When told that a most powerful discourse on the love of God in Christ was delivered the other day by a certain popular preacher, we simply laugh in our sleeve, being well aware that nothing is easier than to wax movingly eloquent on a theme concerning which one is totally ignorant. But the present War has enormously accentuated the nonsensical character of most theological utterances, particularly of those which bear upon the supposed relation of God to the brutal carnage. Generally, we neither use nor admire slang, but "piffle" expresses in so apt and piquant a fashion the true quality of much of what we hear and read about God and the War that we make no excuse for employing it. "The Correspondence of Rev. Prof. David Smith, D.D.," in the British Weekly for July 5, is devoted to a discussion of the following series of questions asked by "Rifleman":—

> Did God ordain that Abraham Lincoln should die when assassinated by Booth? Is it within our Father's power to frustrate a murderer? Can we trust our lives to him in all dangers? What is the meaning of this sentence (Matt. x. 29): "Even a sparrow does not fall without the Father"? Would it be correct if I added "leave" or "permission" — "without the Father's leave"?

"Rifleman" has been severely wounded in Flanders, and he has formed a resolution to lead henceforth a good life, and try to be a faithful and useful member of the Congregational Church to which he belongs. Dr. Smith congratulates him on the good resolution which he has taken, and hopes he may have courage to carry it out. Then he begins to piffle in the usual pulpit style of the day. He tells this wounded soldier that if he has courage to carry out his resolution he will make the following strange discovery:—

> You will then see ever more clearly that your cruel experience has been a gracious visitation of God, and discover that, though it was the wickedness of man that wounded you, the Father's purpose was behind it. It is thus—not by blind argumentation, but by hard experience sanctified by patient faith—that the problems of life are solved; and you will be wise if you concentrate on the indubitable certainties, and meanwhile refuse to be bewildered by riddles which experience alone can answer, and which will never receive their final elucidation in this dimly lighted world, but only in the Eternal Glory.

It is perfectly true that experience is the greatest of all teachers, and that there are problems which experience alone can solve. Man is a being who learns the art of living only by actually living. But the idea that a God of justice and love sends a young man to Flanders and allows him to be severely wounded in "this game of beasts" in order to induce him to form good resolutions is monstrous to the last degree. Do all wounded soldiers make up their minds to turn over a new leaf for the future? If not, what becomes of the Father's purpose behind the grievous event? And what about the millions who have been killed—blown to unrecognizable atoms many of them? Does Dr. Smith believe that their cruel murder is "a gracious visitation of God"? The reverend gentleman admits the existence of riddles which cannot be fully elucidated in this world; but as we have absolutely no knowledge of any other world, it is sheer mockery to predict a final solution in a wholly imaginary "Eternal Glory." The story which Dr. Smith tells of the Freethinking and free-living Major who took to posing the regimental Chaplain with sceptical conundrums at an officers' mess in India is ridiculously irrelevant. The major said: "That old yarn now, about Jonah and the whale— what do you make of that?" The chaplain replied: "Well, no doubt there are puzzling things in the Bible; but then there are other things which are quite plain. For instance, there is the Seventh Commandment, what do you make of that?" Granting that the incident occurred as related, and that the chaplain scored over his opponent, it has no bearing whatsoever upon any of the problems raised by "Rifleman." And yet on the basis of that irrelevant tale Dr. Smith says to his correspondent: "So, if you are wise, you will not fret over the ancient antimony of Divine Foreknowledge and Human Freedom." One would like to know what on earth or in heaven Jonah's whale or the Seventh Commandment has to do with God's foreknowledge in its relation to man's freedom? But the article throws no manner of light upon the point.

Now, on the assumption that the Christian God exists and that he made man in his own image, how are we to account for the so-called fact of sin? Dr. Smith sneers at the contention that the Creator "should have so ordered it that man would never have encountered temptation," or that he should have hedged up his path and made it impossible for him to err, and declares that "man was originally created in God's image, his Son, intelligent and free," and that "that necessarily involved the power of self-determination and the possibility of sinning." Then comes the following extraordinary passage:—

> No doubt God could have interposed to stay the assassin's hand, but that would have been to make the assassin an automaton, and not a man. So long as man is man, his will is free; and the possibility of sin could have been precluded only by the elimination of man and the reduction of the world to a pile of stocks and stones. Here the question arises whether it would not be better so—whether, in view of all the anguish and woe of sin, the creation of man was not a ghastly blunder.

Ignoring for the moment the testimony of science as to the evolutionary origin of the human race, let us critically examine Professor Smith's theory, which, by the way, is the accepted theological theory of the day. What the Professor maintains is that had Adam been incapable of sinning, "he would not have been man at all, but a machine." Is God, then, a machine? Theologians are all agreed that infallibility and impeccability are two of the attributes of the Supreme Being, in which case, according to Dr. Smith, he is not a moral agent at all, but a machine. Now, the Bible affirms that man was created in God's image and after his likeness; and yet Dr. Smith agrees with Milton in holding that had he been so created, "he would have been 'a mere artificial Adam,' like a figure in the motions (that is, a puppy show), moved not by his own volition, but by an unseen hand pulling the wires." That is to say, had man, like his Maker, been incapable of thinking and doing wrong, he would have been, not a thinking creature, but a machine. Does the reverend gentleman not realize how infinitely absurd such a theory is? Is he not aware that the existence of power and inclination to love and do evil would have been a flaw or defect in man's constitution, or that the slightest impulse to deviate from the path of right and duty would have been a sign of serious imperfection, for which the Creator alone would have been responsible? But the most curious thing of all is that the theory of human freedom has been resorted to by modern theologians in the attempt to relieve the Creator of that moral responsibility. Knowing full well what man is and what his life has always been, they argue that God must have had a high and noble purpose to serve by making him capable of such a life, and knowing also that such an explanation gives rise to problems which they are powerless to solve, they fall back upon another stupid theory, namely, that we must wait for the final elucidation until we reach "the Eternal Glory."

Of course, Professor Smith does not even attempt to answer the wounded soldier's puzzling questions, but says to him, "Refuse to be bewildered by riddles which experience alone can answer." But experience cannot answer the riddles which disturb "Rifleman's" peace of mind, and the Professor himself admits it. The reverend gentleman admits further that God could have prevented the assassination of President Lincoln had he not set a much higher value upon the freedom of action of John Wilkes Booth, the wicked conspirator, than upon the preservation of the greatest and best man America has ever seen. Would it not have been immeasurably better for the United States and for the world had Booth been an automaton rather than a madman and murderer? Moreover, according to Dr. Smith's teaching, he was God's creature, and he became what he was and performed his dark deed under God's omnipotent and all-wise government of the world. More amazing still, "God created the world with clear foreknowledge of the ensuing tragedy"; indeed, the tragedy was even foreordained, because without it the ultimate issue of richer life and fuller glory in a future life would have been impossible.

The only sensible answers to "Rifleman's" questions are of necessity in the negative. God and his Providence are theological inventions with nothing to support them beyond the bare assertion of the inventors. No Heavenly Father has ever frustrated a single murderer, and experience affords abundant evidence that if we neglect to order our own lives along right lines we shall certainly be overtaken by disaster and ruin. The creation story is a myth. Man has slowly risen in the scale of existence, and moods of tiger and of ape are still strong within him, and are alone responsible for the present deplorable situation in Christendom. What man stands in superlative need of just now is not trust in God and his Providence, but in himself and the glorious potentialities lying latent within him.

J. T. Lloyd.

A Kid-Glove Secularist.

> The most efficient, the surest-footed poet of our time.
> —Swinburne on Matthew Arnold.
> The times are ripening for his poetry, which is full of foretastes for the morrow.
> —Augustine Birrell on Matthew Arnold.
> The common anthropomorphic ideas of God and the reliance on miracles must, and will, inevitably pass away.
> —Matthew Arnold.

When Matthew Arnold returned from a visit to the United States full of delight at the unbounded hospitality with which he had been received, he told with glee a story of Barnum. The great showman, he said, had invited him to his house in the following terms: "You, sir, are a celebrity. I am a notoriety. We ought to be acquainted." Matthew Arnold was, indeed, a celebrity. From the outset of his literary career he managed to get talked of. Report spoke highly of his Newdigate prize poem on Cromwell, whose memory was then execrated at Oxford. The lines formed a very striking contrast to the Oxford prize poems of his time, which were almost invariably feeble imitations of Pope and Heber, beginning with a sunset or an invocation, and ending with an imaginary millennium and the conversion of the Jews.

Although Arnold's work always attracted the attention of cultured people, he never was a popular poet. With the exception of The Forsaken Merman and Desire, which are met with frequently in anthologies, he cannot be said to have gained really extensive notice. The bulk of his verse, outside intellectual articles, is little known; but his work stands, in a remarkable way, the wear and tear of the years, gaining rather than losing as time passes. Its admirers, while they avoided invidious comparisons with Browning and Tennyson, whose work appealed more powerfully to the average reader, yet thought that in Arnold's intellectuality they found something which attracted them.

Arnold possessed an exquisite tact, a self-restraint in details, which is only paralleled by the great writers. He is so free from the straining after perpetual metaphor. This perfection of style is a very much higher merit than is usually acknowledged. So many poets not only show the lily trembling like a bridal veil, and the wild flower shaking to the music of the waterfall; but they tumble the roses upon the unfortunate readers until, like the guests of Heliogabalus, they are in danger of being smothered. Arnold's use of epithets is masterly:—

> His eyes be like the starry lights—
> His voice like sounds of summer nights—
> In all his lovely mien let pierce
> The magic of the universe.

Once more:—

> So have I heard the cuckoo's parting cry,
> From the wet field, through the vext garden trees,
> Come with the volleying rain and tossing breeze;
> The bloom is gone, and with the bloom go I.

In Arnold's verse there is an ever-present sense of the largeness and of the austerity of Nature:—

> The solemn peaks but to the stars are known,
> But to the stars and the cold lunar beams,
> Alone the sun arises, and alone
> Spring the great streams.

It is said to be a wise child which knows its own father, and so it was with Matthew Arnold. Brought up in a strictly evangelical family, he broke completely and finally with his father's orthodoxy, but retained his admiration for his parent's character. Matthew Arnold had too great a love for the great classical writers to have been long enamoured of the Christian religion. The world in which his favourite classical writers lived, their views of life and death and necessity, met his instincts better than the popular superstition. It must always be borne in mind that he belonged to a very orthodox family, and in religious matters his foes were those of his own household. Yet he held his own way manfully. Writing to his mother in 1863, he said:—

> One cannot change English ideas so much as, if I live, I hope to change them, without saying imperturbably what one thinks and making a good many people uncomfortable. The great thing is to speak without a particle of vice, malice, or rancour.

In a letter to his sister in 1874, he said:

> The common anthropomorphic ideas of God and the reliance on miracles must, and will, inevitably pass away. This I say not to pain you, but to make my position clear to you.

Nobody can doubt that the writer meant every word that he wrote, and the irresistible inference is that in all his theological works – if, indeed, such playful works can be so called—he intended to work to that end.

In the highest and noblest sense of the word, Matthew Arnold was a Secularist. How essentially his imagination had become secularized is seen in his language about death. Thus, in his monody on his friend, Arthur Hugh Clough, he sings:—

> Bear it from thy loved, sweet Arno vale
> (For there thine earth-forgetting eyelids keep > Their morningless and unawakening sleep
> Under the flowery oleanders pale).

In Geist's Grave, his fine poem on the death of a favourite dog, he strikes the same iconoclastic note:—

> Stern law of every mortal lot,
> Which man, proud man, finds hard to bear,
> And builds himself I know not what
> Of second life I know not where.
> But thou, when struck thine hour to go,
> On us, who stood, despondent by,
> A meek last glance of love did throw,
> And humbly lay thee down to die.
> Thy memory lasts by here and there,
> And thou shalt love as long as we.
> And after that thou dost not care!
> In us was all the world to thee.

In his magnificent lines on Dover Beach he is explicit enough:—

> The sea of faith
> Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore
> Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furl'd;
> But now I only hear
> Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,
> Retreating, to the breath
> Of the night wind, down the vast edges drear,
> And naked shingles of the world.

His language concerning man's relations to Nature is equally striking:—

> Streams will not curb their pride,
> The just man not to entomb,
> Nor lightnings go aside
> To give his virtues room;
> Nor is that wind less rough which blows a good man's barge.
> Nature, with equal mind,
> Sees all her sons at play;
> Sees man control the wind,
> The wind sweeps man away;
> Allows the proudly riding and the foundering bark.

His poetry is not wanting in moral profundity:—

> Tears are in his eyes, and in his ears
> The murmur of a thousand years.

This is an example of his didactic verse:—

> The sophist sneers: Fool, take > Thy pleasure, right or wrong.
> The pious wail: Forsake
> A world these sophists throng.
> Be neither saint nor sophist led, but be a man!

The Oxford manner has been described wittily as that of a deity addressing a bug. Arnold added the blessed gift of urbanity. Although no one understood better the value of reticence in literature, he knew the worth of ridicule as a weapon. He realized, as well as Voltaire, that there are delusions for which laughter is the proper cure. Arnold poked fun at the Trinity, and he never showed weariness of the pleasant pastime of bishop baiting. Even the divinity which hedges an archbishop had no terrors for him. He was all his life girding at the Nonconformists, and used to quote his own front name with humorous resignation as an instance of the sort of thing one had to put up with.

Beside his poetry, Arnold wrote much on literature and religion. His theological opinions were not original, for they were adapted from the works of other Rationalists. He also wrote on education, embodying much practical knowledge. In his literary work he admired rather than imitated Sainte-Beuve, the prince of critics. In his prose, no less than in his verse, he cuts out his thought as if in marble. With a strong, haughty, careless grace, he has expressed himself freely. He tells us that Addison's attic elegance "gilds commonplace." Jeremy Taylor is "a provincial Bossuet." Burke is "Asiatic," and Macaulay "a rhetorician." John Stuart Mill is logical, but knows nothing of style; and the Christian Trinity resembles three Lord Shaftesburys.

Arnold was inimitable. He combined, with great poetic gifts, the mental and imaginative resources of a scholar, a philosopher, and a man of the world. His literary work was done in the scant leisure of a busy life, for he was an inspector under the Education Department; but he found time to write prose and verse of enduring value. The muddy streets of men's traffickings chafed him. "O, back to the fields with the dew on them, back to the birds with their singing," his heart cried. And he voiced his regrets in verse of calm pathos and wave-like melody. There are pages redolent of the breath of sweet English meadows, or the scent from the pines of Switzerland. And rarely has Liberty found a tenderer interpreter or a sweeter singer.

He has the style of the great masters. In the still cool atmosphere of the future, his voice will be clearer, stronger, than it sounds to us amid the alarms of war. We who read him will pass away, but his message of Secularism will remain, a source of strength and joy.

> The majestic river floated on,
> Out of the mist and hum of that low land,
> Into the frosty starlight, and there moved,
> Rejoicing.

MIMNERMUS.

Science, Telepathy, and Communion with the Dead.

> Where the miraculous is concerned neither considerable intellectual ability, nor undoubted honesty, nor knowledge of the world, nor proved faithfulness as civil historians, nor profound piety, on the part of eye-witnesses and contemporaries, affords any guarantee of the objective truth of their statements, when we know that a firm belief in the miraculous was ingrained in their minds, and was the pre-supposition of their observations and reasonings.—Professor Huxley, "Science and Christian Tradition," p. 329.

> You urge, in vain, that science has given us all the knowledge of the universe which we now possess, while spiritualism has added nothing to that knowledge. The drugged soul is beyond the reach of reason. It is in vain that impostors are exposed, and the special demon cast out. He has but slightly to change his shape, return to his house, and find it "empty, swept, and garnished.—Professor Tyndall, "Fragments of Science," p. 322.

THE contest between science and the mediums—resembling that between the art expert and the faker of antiquities, or the safe-maker and the burglar—has been decided in favour of science; that is, for all reasonable people with an adequate knowledge of the facts. With the fall of Eusapia, the last of the great wonder-workers disappears from public view; even her one-time faithful defender, Sir Oliver Lodge, has not a word to say for her, does not even mention her name, in the whole 400 pages of his latest spiritualistic book, Raymond.

The defenders of Spiritualism have, for the most part, retreated from their old positions, leaving the false beards, dirty muslin, rag dolls, phosphorized oil, etc., in the hands of the enemy. They have retreated to what they consider stronger and more easily defended positions. It will be our task to show that the new defences are no more impregnable than the old.

The latest form of Spiritualism relies on Telepathy, or the power claimed for certain people of being able to communicate with other people at a distance by means of the mind. Starting with this belief, they go a step further. They say: "If mind can communicate with mind, irrespective of distance, why should not the mind survive the death of the body, and continue to communicate with the living?" And they further claim, not only that it may be possible, but that it is so; that they do receive messages, and know that they come from spirits of the dead.

Sir Oliver himself came to believe in Spiritualism by way of Telepathy. In an article contributed to last month's Strand Magazine, entitled "How I Became Convinced of the Survival of the Dead," Sir Oliver says: "I gradually became convinced of the reality of experimental telepathy between persons in each other's proximity, though not necessarily in contact with each other.....Concerning the immortality of the soul, I was at that time agnostic, and probably quite sceptical. Nor did the question arouse any emotional feeling in my mind. I did not think that we could know, and I felt satisfied with the fact, whatever it was."[1] After becoming convinced "of the reality of thought-transference," he proceeds, Sir Oliver joined the Society for Psychical Research, where he became the close friend of F. W. H. Myers, the author of Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death, that enormous compilation of superstition dealing with hypnotism, mediumship, trances, death-warnings, hallucinations, telepathy, etc. "Under Myers' guidance," says Sir Oliver, "I perceived that telepathy itself, in so far as it demonstrated mental action outside the ordinary channels and organs of sense, implied some promise and constituted some indication of the persistent existence of mind and memory after the bodily vehicle or instrument had been sloughed off." Although not absolutely convinced, says Sir Oliver, "my mind became open to the evidence if it should be forthcoming." The evidence, in Sir Oliver's opinion, was provided by the famous American medium, Mrs. Piper, who crossed the Atlantic on a visit to this country in 1889, at the invitation of Mr. Myers, and with whom Sir Oliver held several sittings. "It now began to appear to me," he proceeds, "that although a brain and nerve mechanism and a muscular organism were as needful as ever for effective and demonstrable communication between mind and mind, yet that it was possible to use such an organism vicariously, and that identity of instrument was not absolutely essential so long as some physiological instrument was available. In other words, that the brain and organism of a living person might be utilized by deceased personalities whose own body had ceased to work. Mrs. Piper went into a trance, and seemed, as it were, to vacate her body for a time. In this condition it appeared temporarily revivified, not by her own personality but by another; and this secondary personality, or whatever it ought to be called, was able to manage what they call 'the machine,' so that through her bodily mechanism communications were received from persons deceased but still apparently mentally active and retaining their personal memory and affection, though now able to display them only in a fragmentary and imperfect manner" (pp. 565-6).

It is quite intelligible, in theory at least, that the brain might be capable of sending out waves of energy comparable with those used in wireless telegraphy, although there is no evidence that will stand scientific examination that one brain has ever communicated with another at a distance by this means. But how on earth is one brain going to communicate with another, when one of them is dead and turned to ashes? One could as easily believe that two wireless stations could continue to communicate after their destruction. And as for the medium "vacating her body for a time" and allowing it to be possessed by spirits of the dead, why, this is going back to the Middle Ages, when the Church exorcized evil spirits from the possessed; or the first century, when devils were cast out of men into pigs!

We have, then, to consider the evidence for Telepathy, and then the evidence for communication with the dead. It will be admitted that Telepathy is not a fact of everyday experience. The diplomatist has not the slightest fear that anyone will read his secret thoughts, and the criminal makes his plans in similar security. Millions are invested in telegraph cables and wireless telegraphy, which would be rendered useless if mind could communicate with mind regardless of distance. Many have claimed to possess the power, but there is not a single living person to day claiming this power who will consent to be tested by a competent scientific committee.

The last public exponents of thought-reading were the Zancigs, who excited a great deal of interest with their performance in London, at the Alhambra Music Hall, in December, 1906. Mr. and Mrs. Zancig came over from America, like the Davenport Brothers, Slade, Home, Mrs. Piper, and many others. The English climate does not appear suitable for rearing really great mediums; we import them. Eusapia Palladino was an Italian, and Madame Blavatsky a Russian; and if we are to have Tariff Reform, the Government might do worse than put a heavy tax on these imports.

The Zancigs claimed to be able to read each other's thoughts. Mr. Zancig claimed that what he saw, Mrs. Zancig saw; that, in fact, they were two minds with one single thought. They had previously toured the United States with their performance without exciting more than ordinary attention, but in London they caught on. This was due to the late Mr. Stead, who wrote in his Review of Reviews (December, 1906): "I can say without hesitation that the Zancigs at the Alhambra Music Hall gave a more conclusive demonstration of the power of telepathy than is to be found in all the literature of the subject. On each of the two occasions on which I experimented with them in private, the results were the same as those witnessed by anybody at the Alhambra. The only difference was that at the experiments in private I had ample opportunity to impose conditions which rendered fraud or trickery impossible."

Mr. Sinnett also testified to their powers, and Mr. Harold Begbie recorded his conviction that the Zancigs obtained their results by the aid of hypnotism; but it is doubtful if he knew what he was talking about, for how being hypnotised would enable one to read another's thoughts is past all understanding. But the usual nemesis waited upon the Zancigs' initial success. Mr. Stuart Cumberland, the cleverest exponent of thought-reading, wrote to the Daily Chronicle (December 31, 1906), declaring that the Zancigs used a code of words and signs, and that if they wished to demonstrate their power of thought-transmission, they must submit to test conditions under which they would be unable to use a code either verbal or by sign. Upon this the Chronicle sent to arrange for a test meeting with Mr. Zancig. They were met with an absolute refusal; no test meeting could be arranged for love or money. When Mr. Stead wished to test their powers, they received him with open arms; but then Mr. Stead did not require any proof of Telepathy—he was a firm believer already. But when Mr. Stuart Cumberland, who disbelieves in Telepathy—and, what is more, knows all the tricks of the so-called thought-readers—asked for a test, he was indignantly refused.

The Altar Boy Alters.

ABOUT eighty years ago, my maternal grandmother, then a young Scottish woman of the Protestant faith, had a Catholic girl companion. Through attending Catholic services, reading Catholic literature, and talking with her companion, my grandmother changed her religion. She married a Protestant who "turned" with her, and they had a large family, each one of whom married in the Church, so from that first "conversion" a full hundred Catholics have been reared.

I, however, am the one black sheep who has dared—as did my grannie of sainted memory—to question and reject inherited opinions. When I was sixteen, some quarter of a century ago, I first saw the Freethinker. It was on one of the tables of our local reading-room (doubtless it took a struggle to get it placed there). I picked it up just out of curiosity, for I did not then know what a Freethinker was. I opened it at a "Comic Bible" type of article, and was horrified to see in cold print allusions to J. Christ, Esq., Mr. H. Ghost, and "blasphemies" of a like nature. Being a Catholic lad, an altar boy, and thoroughly well "pithed" from birth, I was profoundly shocked. Yet I went back again to read the "Freethinker," and soon became a convinced Atheist.

I have taken care to mention exactly what fascinated me, for I have frequently heard good Freethinkers disapproving of ridicule as a propagandist weapon. It is no use registering our impressions unless we do so without the faintest deviation from verity. At first I thought of the infidel scribes as low, immoral scoundrels who ought to be boiled in oil; and yet, had the number of the paper which I first saw contained nothing but scientific and philosophical essays, I would have disregarded it. Nowadays, I am not much tickled by jokes about Jonah and the whale, Joshua and the sun, etc.; yet, I think, I have demonstrated of what value that type of criticism is with young minds. Once knock on the head the "reverence" for the ridiculous, and you have gone a long way towards sanity.

The Freethinker became a great educational influence to me. Practically everything I have read in the Rationalist way, I owe to the brave little paper. Although never a public man, I have had many a great fight for my principles, but I have never capitulated; "my head has been bloody but unbowed."

After twenty years' fairly strenuous fighting for "advanced" ideas, I have been driven to the conclusion that it is no earthly good trying to do anything with those who, while hankering after freedom, wish to retain the shackles of superstition. My political creed is that all authority has to be questioned, and God is the first dogmatist from whom all authority comes; therefore, let us begin with clearing men's minds of childish opinions and speculations. We can have no real progress without a rational people.

I have a pretty good list of "converts" (I always insist on them becoming subscribers), and I have a small Secular Society at home, where I have four "howling Atheists" who have had a great deal of instruction in religion—from their mother and myself. Reversing the Jesuit principle that if a child is trained under them until it is seven years old, it is safe against irreligion, we have never allowed our children to go to school. My oldest is nine, and his views on God and Creation are extremely diverting. There are many Freethinkers to whom I should say, Start your propaganda first at home. See what my grandmother did for the Church. Think what I may have done for Freethought.

MATTER AND THOUGHT.

That "blind, unconscious matter could not think" was held as a victorious argument, in spite of the assumption implied in the epithets (for the aphorism amounts to this—blind matter cannot see, unconscious matter cannot be conscious). To anyone who looks steadily at the question, however, it may be shown that, as a matter of fact, the nervous tissue, and that only, being sensitive, the biological proposition simply is: "Sensitive matter can be sensitive." To claim for this nervous tissue any superadded entity called Thought is to desert the plain path of observation for capricious conjecture. As well call Strength an immaterial principle superadded to muscular tissue. The muscular action and the nervous action are two special phenomena belonging to special tissues. Science can tell you no more. If your mind is dissatisfied therewith, and demands more recondite explanation, invent one to please yourself, and then invent one for heat, for attraction, for every phenomenon you conceive; the field is open; imagination has wide-sweeping wings; but do not palm off your imagination as science!—George Henry Lewes, "Comtes Philosophy," p. 201.

Acid Drops.

We heartily congratulate the Sheffield shopkeepers on their victory over the bigotry of the Watch Committee. A little while back an attempt was made under the Lord's Day Observance Act to prohibit Sunday trading. An association was formed for the purpose of fighting the authorities, and, for the time being at least, the Watch Committee has surrendered. Ninety-two shopkeepers were summoned for trading on Sunday. On behalf of the shopkeepers, Mr. Clement Edwards started by applying for summonses against the following people for following their usual vocation on Sunday, or for "aiding and abetting":—

The publishers of the two local papers for printing them on Sunday last for sale on Monday.

The Lord Mayor and leading members of the Watch Committee for aiding and abetting by purchasing the paper on Monday.

The lodge-keeper at the Botanical Gardens for following his usual occupation on Sunday.

The town trustees, including Sir Samuel Roberts, M.P., Sir William Clegg, J.P., Sir Joseph Jonas, Sir William Mappin, for aiding and abetting by providing the lodge-keeper with his wages.

The Rev. E. R. Everson, as editor of a local church magazine, for offering the magazine for sale on Sunday.

His warden, Mr. C. Birks, for selling a copy on Sunday for 1d.

A city park keeper for following his usual vocation on Sunday, and the Lord Mayor for aiding and abetting by providing funds for his wages.

As a result of this move, the Watch Committee withdrew all the summonses against the shopkeepers, and there for the moment the matter rests. We hope that other towns will follow the example set by Sheffield.

We understand that the Watch Committee propose approaching Parliament for further legislation on the matter. We hope this is so, as an expression of opinion, pro or con., would be helpful. We expect that it would mean the clearing away of a piece of legislation that ought to have been abolished long since. There is no genuine public demand for these restrictions. They are purely police prosecutions, engineered by some local bigots and busybodies who have influence with the leading officials. The maintenance of these Sunday laws, and the vexatious prosecutions to which they lead, is an example of the evil done by maintaining on the Statute Books laws which belong to another age altogether. They serve no purpose save that of giving bigotry and malevolence an opportunity to express themselves.

Even newspaper editors sometimes let the cat out of the bag. The Evening Standard says: "We could never get a decent education system because of the fight of bigoted Churchmen and Dissenters, representing a mere fraction of the general population and but a small part of their own body." We have said the same thing for many years; but it will bear repetition.

Miss Rebecca West, whose delightful articles illuminate the sober pages of the Daily News, has some very pertinent remarks on the clerical statement that the ordeal of war is for the moral uplifting of the nation. Miss West retorts crushingly that this "suggests the appalling conception of a Providence who is capable of deluging Europe with the blood of the innocent and the gifted in order to bring a man home from a night-club."

That some of the clergy are not overworked is shown by a newspaper paragraph which states that two parishes in the Oxford diocese contain four houses and thirteen houses respectively. The two parishes are combined in one living.

In some interesting reminiscences of the late Sir Herbert Tree, Mr. Harold Begbie states that the great actor remarked, "All the harm in the world has come from taking God too seriously." There is much truth in the statement.

Logic is not usually a strong point with pious folk, but one seldom finds so flagrant a contradiction as appeared in the Daily Chronicle. Mr. Harold Begbie, writing of the London air-raid, said: "The Englishman does not rave, and does not call upon Jehovah." In another column of the same issue, Mr. Hall Caine, describing the raid, said: "It was an awful spectacle of unbridled wrath. The women shrieked at the police and almost spat in their faces. 'Christ, let us pay those German devils for killing our children. If the Government won't do it, by God, we will."

Two churches were damaged in the London air-raid. As one was Catholic, and the other Church of England, it shows the impartiality and indifference of Providence.

A writer in the Paris Revue Bleue pens an appreciation of the English Universities, and remarks on the "atmosphere of leisure and slow development" of Oxford and Cambridge. The writer has hit the nail on the head, for Paley's Evidences of Christianity was a text-book in those seats of learning for nearly a century; several generations after the work was hopelessly out of date.

The Government has agreed to a watering down of the beer. Not to be behindhand, the House of Convocation has agreed to a wholesale watering down of the Church Service, deleting a number of Biblical references that are offensive to modern ears and modern intelligence. Light beer and easy doctrine seems now the order of the day.

Mr. Sidney Low writes in the Contemporary Review on the probable revival of Arabian culture. He only does them justice in pointing out the high civilization the Mohammedan Arabs developed in both Europe and Asia in the Middle Ages. Here is a passage that Christian readers would do well to ponder:—

> Where they conquered they knew how to establish a settled administration which did not rest entirely upon military power; they fostered agriculture, trade, manufactures, irrigation; they had good laws and good judges; they showed a high respect for art, learning, literature, science, and philosophy. They were the inheritors of that ancient Semitic civilization, older than Christianity or Mohammedanism, older even than Rome and Greece, which, with its Hellenic and Iranian tincture, seemed at one time destined to prevail all round the Mediterranean lands and far beyond them.

To complete the picture, it only needs to point out the period above named coincided with the most uncivilized period of European history. But the uncivilized portion of Europe was Christian. That's all.

The exemption from military service of the clergy and their satellites is still going on. At Lambeth Police Court a Church of England lay-assistant was exempted, and a similar course was taken with regard to his brother. Yet conscientious objectors are penalized, and even threatened with loss of the vote in Parliamentary elections.

Thirty-five religious societies, including representatives of the Church of England, Free Churches, the Salvation Army, the Roman Catholics, and others, waited on the Home Secretary in order to press forward the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, which deals with the social evil. What a commentary on the pathological religious mind! At a time when the nation is struggling for its very existence these pious folk are interesting themselves in the question of prostitution. "An ounce of civet, good apothecary."

The Rev. Dr. Charles Brown, minister of Ferme Park Baptist Church, London, devoted his morning sermon on Sunday, the 8th inst., to a discussion of the air raid of the previous day, in the course of which he delivered himself of the following "wonderfully uplifting" message: "You may be quite sure that it is not God's will that bombs should fall on innocent people. I think there is a call in it to us to provide such means that the invader shall be driven back into the sea, and not to whine about God permitting it." From such a statement the inevitable inference is that there is nothing so "wonderfully uplifting" to a Christian congregation as a public insult offered by its minister to the God they both pretend to believe in and worship as the Supreme Ruler of the world. The sermon was clearly a tacit denial of the absolute and invincible Divine Sovereignty in which preachers used to glory so loudly not so long ago. Dr. Brown's one lesson from the recent disastrous raid is, not that we should trust in God's care and protection, but, rather, that we ourselves should devise the means as shall render such raids impossible in the future. We fully agree with him; but where does God come in at all?

One part of the Christian teaching is that God can change the hearts of men, and that being so, it is possible for him to affect the hearts of the Germans so as to cause them to abandon the practice. Apparently, all he does is to move the Allies to drop bombs on German women and children, so that when enough have been killed, both sides will agree to "drop it" in another and healthier sense.

Having explained why God does nothing, Dr. Brown next declares that God has done something. He has prevented the realization of the German plans. But how has he prevented that? And if he could prevent that, why not have prevented the other? Dr. Brown should make up his mind which position he is upholding, and what kind of a God it is that he believes in. All that we gather is that his God can interfere when he has a large army to help him, but he cannot interfere when it is a matter of looking after women and children with no army to help. Blasphemy is, legally, holding up the Christian God to ridicule or contempt. All we can say is, that Dr. Brown's God is ridiculous, and if he escapes contempt, it can only be because he fails to rise to its level. That may be blasphemy, but it is also commonsense.

The War, with all its attending horrors, is either an expression of God's will or a wicked violation of it. If the former, who can believe in such an Almighty Fiend? If the latter, then God is discredited for ever as the embodiment of the most contemptible impotence. In either case, the Christian God is an utterly impossible being, and believers in him can be but the most pitiable gulls of superstition. When Dr. Brown practically ignores his superstitious creed, he is eminently sensible; but he is not sensible enough to wholly disavow such a creed.

The Daily Sketch states that in the porch of a Young Men's Christian Association hut a poster of a theatrical garden party was displayed. Why not? The Y.M.C.A. huts are places of entertainment.

The Bishop of Hereford, who is eighty-three years of age, has announced his intention of resigning next year. The position is worth £4,200 yearly, which is more than Judas obtained for the Founder of the Christian religion.

"Many war memorials are in questionable taste," says the Dean of Worcester. Was he thinking of the twopenny warshrines?

The Bishop of Southwark wants the paltry sum of £3,000 "at once" for spiritual work in munition areas in his diocese. The revival of religion appears to be a costly matter.

In the ages of faith the laying-on of hands was supposed to confer spiritual benefit; but the process is now more simple. In Billy Sunday's New York crusade, he persuaded 60,000 people to shake hands with him. After pump-handling such a vast number, Billy must have been tempted to tell the rest of the crowd to go to the place he preaches of.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Junior, offered a prayer at one of Billy Sunday's meetings, and thanked the Almighty that so many people were not interested in "money-making." It is only natural that he should feel grateful, for it gives himself and his father so much more chance of securing the dollars.

Everybody agrees that it is a good thing to diminish the present rate of infant mortality. Having brought babies into the world, it seems a sheer waste of human endeavour to hurry so large a number out again. All the same, the sooner the movement is relieved of cranks, faddists, pious old ladies, district visitors, and professional philanthropists, the better. These people threaten to worry the life out of the poor, and it is only the poor on whom they bestow their attentions. Suburbia is safe, and the upper world is safe. No one would have the impertinence to offer advice there. It is the poor who are badgered, and we can picture some exasperated mothers battering the heads of some of the visitors with the very babies on whose welfare they are being advised.

After all, poor mothers are not less affectionate towards their children than wealthy ones. And if the difference in the death-rate of the two classes is largely due to a change in home and income, the line of improvement is at once given. To perpetuate miserable homes and handle out tracts or establish nursing societies to counteract the ills the miserable homes produce, is obviously futile. It is the policy of a society not sufficiently strong in its brutality to ignore an evil, not wise enough to see the way out, and not unselfish enough to act on it even if it did. Charitable effort is a poor apology for perpetuated evil, although it is often the principal condition of its continuance.

The objection of the Convocation of Canterbury to the "cursing" psalm is that it is unchristian; but is there anything worse in the Old Testament than the Gospel text: "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the Devil and his angels"?

The Church Army is asking for "several hundred new clergy and laity as volunteers for hut work." It would be better if the Church Army advertised for waiters, and paid them proper wages.

A Y.M.C.A. official, responsible for book distribution among the troops, is making a special appeal for the works of modern essayists. Apparently the Bibles which are so plentifully supplied to the soldiers are not much to their taste.

A memorial service to the memory of Sir Herbert Tree was held at the Church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields on July 11. The Bishop of Birmingham delivered an address, and remarked that he would not enter into the eminent actor's religious opinions, which we must take as a tactful admission that Sir Herbert's belief in Christianity was a minus quantity. We may rest assured that had it been otherwise, the fact would have been dwelt on. Sir Herbert Tree's last words were, according to the Bishop, "Will you open the window?" We do not think very much religion can be extracted from that.

At Rossyth some pious folk desired a new church. But permission to employ the necessary labour had to be obtained from the Ministry of Munitions, and a letter was received in reply stating that the Admiralty had been communicated with to obtain their opinion as to whether the increased output expected at Rossyth as a result of the extra spiritual facilities provided would compensate for the demand on labour to erect the church. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, who narrated the incident in the House of Lords, said he could not make out whether the letter was sarcastic or silly. But as permission was given, we assume the letter was simply silly.

The Times laments the position of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. Its Dublin correspondent writes that Unionists are "alarmed," and that "The authority of the Churches, hitherto accepted as a sure bulwark of conservatism, seems to be crumbling in many parts of the country." And, of course, if the Churches cannot keep the people "in order," those who find the money for their support may wonder what they are paying for.

To Correspondents.

A. L. M.—We really do not know what was the bishop's line of argument, hence our reply to your question. Thanks for congratulations concerning the Freethinker.

D. NICHOLLS.—(1) The Secretary of the N. S. S. will send anyone a badge who writes for it. It is intended primarily for members of the N. S. S., but there is no objection to unattached Freethinkers wearing it. (2) We are pleased to think that we have many friends like yourself who would not forgo the Freethinker even if it were a shilling a copy. Sorry to hear of your loss.

We regret that owing to a printer's error, the signature to the letter on "Socialism and Religion," in our last issue, should have been N. Streimer, not "M. Streimer" as printed.

G. GROVE.—Pleased to know that your newsagent sold all his copies of the Freethinker. We hope all newsagents will have a similar experience.

W. PANCOTT.—We are always ready to publish a criticism of any article which appears in this journal, but a letter which merely expresses dissent does not carry the matter any further.

BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges: H. Spence, 5s.; H. Reeve, 2s. 6d.

W. MATHER.—Thanks. We hope one day to avail ourselves of your kindness.

E. E. STAFFORD.—We hope to publish in the course of two or three weeks. Pamphlet sent.

W. C DODD.—We cannot say if we have subscribers in Rhyl. May probably order through newsagents. All that can be said of the Duke of Argyll is that he is a good Christian. Many will think that enough.

W. DENTITH thanks those friends who have been good to send him parcels of the Freethinker for distribution among the troops.

A. T. (Birmingham).—Have sent on your letter to Mr. Mann. We intend reprinting as soon as possible.

J. T. W. (Forest Gate).—Next week. Crowded out of this issue.

W. DODD.—Address 107, Morley Street, Heaton, Newcastle-on-Tyne. There will be an opportunity to help the Freethinker presently.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The Pioneer Press is now offering for sale two books of great interest to Freethinkers. The first of these works, Darwinism To-day, by Prof. V. L. Kellogg, is a careful discussion of the present position of Darwinism in relation to recent theories of the formation of species. The book contains exactly what those interested on the subject require, and presents the present day position of Darwinism in a clear light. Originally published at 7s. 6d. net, the book is a handsome volume of 400 pages, and is offered at 3s., postage 5d. Only a limited number of copies are available.

Dr. E. G. Hardy's Studies in Roman History is a work in 2 vols., and while appealing to a more limited circle than Professor Kellogg's book, is of considerable importance. The first volume is confined almost wholly to a study of the position of Christianity in the Roman Empire, with special reference to the persecutions. The second volume is concerned with a study of Roman military affairs and kindred topics. Studies in Roman History is a careful and scholarly work, and was published in 1910 at 12s. net. The two volumes are for sale at 3s. 9d., postage 6d.

We learn from a South Wales correspondent that great interest is being shown in the Freethinker and its message by the men employed on the railway at Swansea. Some of the officials are doing what they can to arrest the loss of faith which is apparently imminent by circulating some startling literature in the shape of tracts bristling with threats of hell, and if these efforts were intended to cause merriment, one would have to compliment these zealous Christians on their success. Meanwhile, we suggest to all interested that they should get into touch with the Local Branch of the N. S. S. with as little delay as possible.

Mr. Noah Bailey writes that our paragraph in the Freethinker for July 8, respecting his appearance before the magistrate at Marlborough Street Police Court, does him an injustice. He says he was not fined £10, but only bound over to be of good behaviour for six months. Mr. Bailey also says that he was not charged with using "scurrilous language," and that the paragraph, therefore, misrepresents him. We have not the slightest desire to misrepresent Mr. Bailey or anyone else, and we regret our error in saying he was fined £10. We presume the fact is that he was bound over in his own recognisance to that amount. And if Mr. Bailey will re-read the paragraph he will see, perhaps, that "scurrilous and offensive speech" is applied to Christian Evidence speakers as a whole. Moreover, as Mr. Bailey points out that he was bound over to keep the peace for six months, we must assume that our description of his language as being calculated to promote a breach of the peace is an accurate one.

"One who does not know" writes in the Daily Mail of July 11 protesting against men entering the Army having to write themselves down as professing some sort of religion. He says:—

> We are supposed to be a "free" people, fighting the greatest fight ever known for the purpose of freedom, and yet we (alone, I believe, of all the nations engaged in this tremendous conflict) are ourselves in fetters in the matter of "religion."

We quite sympathize with the spirit of the letter, but "One who knows" is not quite correct in thinking that a soldier must write himself as a member of some religious sect. He can insist upon being entered as Freethinker, Agnostic, or Atheist, if he prefers one of these terms. Unfortunately, all men, and all officers, are not aware of this. But it is certainly time that Britain followed the example of France and left religion out altogether. There is nothing the matter with the French Army without God, and it will hardly be maintained that the British Army needs this extra stimulus.

The Musical Standard for July 8 reprints from these columns Mr. Farmer's article on "The Musical Scale in Primitive Culture." The source of the article is duly acknowledged.

At the last meeting of the Camberwell Borough Council a proposal to accept the offer of the Carnegie Trust to clear off a debt of about £5,000, providing the Council appointed a chief librarian, and brought the library up to date by the purchase of a number of new books, was passed unanimously. Councillor A. B. Moss pointed out the danger of accepting such a proposal until they knew something of the person who was likely to be appointed as chief librarian, and whether he was likely to be a person who was up to date in his knowledge of books, and of an independant type of mind, who would not fear to purchase books of an advanced character, no matter how much they might offend certain members of the libraries' committee. He could not forget the fact that certain professional and amateur theologians—members of the committee—removed the Freethinker from the tables of our libraries, notwithstanding the fact that that paper was the best informed journal before the public dealing with the latest deductions of modern science on philosophy and religion. He also remembered the hostility of many members of the committee towards some of the publications of "The Rationalist Press Association." He reminded them that a man who was not up to date in his knowledge of the evolution of religious beliefs must also be out of date on sociology and other subjects, because there was a unity of evolution relating to all forms of belief.

Special.

THERE were two trials for "Blasphemy" at Birmingham last week. J. W. Gott was sentenced to six weeks' imprisonment for publishing a pamphlet called Rib-Ticklers, and J. Riley was sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment for using "blasphemous" language in the Bull Ring. In Mr. Gott's case there were two trials. The first, on July 11, resulted in the jury disagreeing, and a new trial was ordered. This took place on the 14th, and a verdict of guilty was secured.

Now that these cases are disposed of, it is possible for me to write more fully on the matter than when I referred to it in the Freethinker for July 1. What I have to say now cannot prejudice Mr. Gott in the eyes of anyone who cared to help, and if I could not advise that the Freethought Party should support, I was desirous of doing nothing that should injure him.

When Mr. Gott first wrote me, on June 13, I had not seen the pamphlet which was the subject of the prosecution, but I undertook the responsibility for the expenses of the Police Court proceedings, so that he might, as I said, have fair play. I also went down to Birmingham for the hearing, had a lengthy consultation with the solicitor, and discussed the question of what could be said in defence. But it should be understood that what was done was in response to an appeal for advice and help, and did not in any way commit the N.S.S. That opens up a very different situation.

Let me say at once, and I desire to say it as lightly as possible, but quite plainly, that in my judgment Mr Gott's pamphlet was indefensible from any point of view. It was coarse and offensive; it was devoid of argument; and I cannot conceive any cause being advanced by its publication. As I said this quite plainly to Mr. Gott himself, I have not waited for his imprisonment to express this opinion.

But it seemed to me that the time had arrived when a clear policy should be adopted by the N. S. S. in this class of case. They nearly always—if not always—crop up in connection with unauthorized speakers and propagandists; and either the Society must commit itself to defending an indefinite number of people charged with "blasphemy," and, so to speak, follow them about the country with an open cheque-book, or we must make up our minds what we will defend and what we will leave alone. It is a decision the responsibility of which I fully appreciate, and I should have been glad had it fallen upon other shoulders. But one cannot be President of the N. S. S. without shouldering responsibilities; and while I can do without them, I hope I shall never run away from them.

So after carefully thinking the matter over, I decided that I could not advise the Society to undertake the defence of this case, or these cases. And I suggested to the Executive two principles that should govern its decisions, and which met with its approval.

First, where the language complained of by the prosecution as offensive would not be considered offensive if applied to a subject other than Christianity, the prosecution should be resisted as a discrimination in favour of religion and against Freethought. We neither desire nor do we encourage offensive speech. It is discrimination in favour of religion to which we object.

Second, where the language complained of forms part of a reasoned attack on Christianity we may resist a prosecution on the ground that it is aimed at the opinion which is the subject of the argument rather than the particular words singled out for complaint. This need not involve a justification of the particular words on which the indictment is based, but it does enable us to say clearly that the offensive language is only an excuse for attacking Freethought opinions.

Unfortunately, the Birmingham case admitted of no such defence. Had the language of Mr. Gott's publication been connected with any other subject than that of Christianity it would have been highly reprehensible. Being what it was, I could advise no other course than the one pursued. The Executive of the N.S.S. fully endorsed this view, so have all who have written me on the subject, and I think I may say that every responsible person would who was cognizant of the language used in the publication.

It is a pity that it should be necessary to make this statement, but it is better to say a thing publicly when it must be said. There can then be no misunderstanding. Mr. Gott, too, would be well advised to modify the nature of his propaganda in the future. He is not wanting in courage, and I believe he is earnest enough in the cause. But both qualities need to be yoked with judgment and tact if they are to be productive of good.

Finally, it must not be taken that what has been said—and I am saying this as much on behalf of the N.S.S. Executive as on my own—is in any sense an endorsement of the maintenance of the Blasphemy Law. This is an iniquity and a disgrace to a country that calls itself civilized. While it exists it is a menace to freedom of thought, and it ought to be swept out of existence. What has been said only amounts to saying that the cases which are taken up by the N.S.S. must be such as can be defended with credit to itself and the Freethought cause. But we cannot and will not place ourselves at the mercy of any person whose temper, or lack of taste, leads them to use language in attacking religion that would not be tolerated by people in connection with other subjects. And I, for one, hope that this plain indication of the Society's position will have a restraining influence where it is most needed.

The Sense Organs of Man.

IV.

(Concluded from p. 443).

As already intimated, all the senses contribute in the building up of mind; but, perhaps, the sense most essential to the complete acquirement of mental power is the sense of sight. Physically considered, a disturbance is set up in the brain when we become conscious of the presence of surrounding objects. In a condition of coma or deep sleep, in which dreams are wholly absent, the brain enjoys perfect repose. And after the restoration of consciousness we possess not the slightest remembrance of anything having occurred during the interval embraced by the period of profound slumber. All the knowledge, then, that mortals possess has been obtained during their waking hours.

All modes of sentiency, save in their dimmest states, consist in perceptions of differences and agreements. The active human brain, however busy, is the constant recipient of new messages from the outer world which require and normally receive attention. The areas of the brain, which respond to visual impressions when they receive a stimulus from the eye that denotes the presence of danger, proceed to send a message to the muscles which directs them to move into a position of safety.

A large amount of mystery is still in many minds associated with the circumstance that after a limb has been amputated, a pain may be seemingly felt in hands or feet that have been severed from the body. But during our own individual existence, and throughout the lives of our countless ancestors, whenever the nerves of the upper or lower extremities have been irritated a sensation has been sent to the brain. Now, even when a limb has been separated from the body the nerves above the amputated part remain, and, as a result, whenever these are subjected to a stimulus a message is despatched to the sensorium along the nerves which reproduces the impression that originally arose when sensitive toes and fingers formed part of the body. Both individually and ancestrally the brain has been trained to associate certain sensations set up along given channels with pains in fingers and toes, so that one may still seem to suffer pain in organs no longer present.

The stimulus and the ensuing sensation are linked together as cause and consequence. As a matter of fact it is utterly unthinkable that any state of consciousness, whether in the form of thought, emotion, or any other sensation, can arise apart from some external influence. When a hungry boy sees an appetizing apple a desire to devour it appears immediately in his mind. He secures the apple and greedily eats it, and the entire performance seems quite simple while it is really very complicated. First, there exists the condition of consciousness termed hunger, then arises the added sensation supplied by the sight of the apple, and later, when the pippin reaches the mouth, a highly involved message is sent from the tongue and mouth muscles to the brain which then directs the movements of the tongue and teeth in masticating and swallowing the fruit. But these instinctive movements do not occur when no craving for food exists. The brain must inform us of our hunger before these instinctive processes can be carried out.

Many parts of the body participate in informing the brain that the stomach needs replenishing. So that in addition to the messages sent to the sensorium by the superior sensory organs there are the messages forwarded from the internal body—the stomachic sensations, as G. H. Lewes called them.

With reference to impressions derived from the external world, some initiate instinctive actions, while others occasion thought. When impressions from outside travel to the lower part of the brain instinctive acts result; but when they reach the higher brain centres a consciousness of choice arises, and we deliberately perform a given act. A message is communicated to one part of the brain—the optic thalamus for instance—which conveys it along nerves to the upper region of the cerebral hemisphere which returns it to another section of the brain's gray substance—the streaked body (Corpus striatum) which transfers the message to the muscles that are to be moved. In this case an appreciable interval has been occupied in the process, and we feel that we have deliberated before the performance of the act and then performed it. Thus arises the subjective illusion of the freedom of the will simply because we are unaware of the complex causes which have constrained us to choose in a certain manner.

In our illustration we considered the sense of hunger in the sight of food. The stomach sends information to the brain of its anxiety for food, and we are made conscious of the feeling of hunger. The brain forwards its received intelligence to the muscles which, in the absence of food, cannot function, although they are rendered more completely conscious of a state of hunger. Hence animals are driven to search for food in order to satisfy the demands of the stomach. The feeling of hunger being a very disagreeable one, its sensations are so irritating that creatures craving sustenance are not only anxious to secure it but are prepared, if necessary, to fight for it. Here other phenomena come into play, and the unpleasant emotions generated by hunger transform themselves into action.

All our rational activities are based directly or indirectly upon our experiences of the external world. Memory, as Bain said, is the sole basis of intellect, and, doubtless, Loeb is correct in his contention that "the most important problem in the physiology of the central nervous system is the analysis of the mechanisms which give rise to the so called psychic phenomena." Mental states always arise in close association with memories of past experiences. These mental phenomena form conditions of consciousness known by the term associative memory. In the central nervous system past sensations so impress themselves that they become capable of reproduction even when the circumstances under which they originally arose are quite different. A further important feature is that two processes which occur simultaneously, or in rapid succession, produce impressions which fuse into one another so that when subsequently one of the processes is repeated the other is also reproduced.

In remembering one event we are apt to recall other happenings associated with it. To annex Professor Loeb's illustration: "The odour of the rose will at the same time reproduce its visual image in our memory, or, even more than that, it will reproduce the recollection of scenes or persons who were present when the same odour made its first strong impression on us."

Now, memories of past sensations lead to the formation of mental propositions. That is to say, experiences of the external environment are registered in the brain through the medium of our sense organs and the general sense of touch. Word images probably play a larger part than picture images in the mental activities of the more cultured races of mankind. Out of simple signs complicated concepts have gradually been evolved. When a thing is given a name that name denotes not only the individual thing, but all the various sensations associated with that thing, as well as all other things or bodies resembling it. All sensations bound up with any particular object appear as part of it. There is, therefore, the object itself, combined with all the sensations linked with it, and these become grouped into a general concept. As Professor Clifford put it:—

> The whole process of the evolution of reason is an attempt to pack into an exceedingly small box, the human brain, a picture of the enormous universe that is outside of it. Every step which was made in packing things closer together was a step in making a correspondence between our actions and the knowledge we get from outside.

The possession of language has proved of priceless value in enabling man to employ signs to signify a great host of separate facts. The word tree embraces all the trees on our planet. But just endeavour to imagine the state of a man who requires a separate sign for all the world's trees, or even for each of the arboreal growths in the New Forest. Language signs would, then, be too numerous for serviceable use. But the general term "tree" not only represents all the tree's attributes, numerous as these are, but it calls up a host of other images associated with the tree. The earth in which it is rooted, the air around it, the sky above it; the tree's stationary state in calm weather, its swaying in the wind, its leafless winter sleep, the sweet beauty of its spring, summer, and autumn foliage, its blossoms, fruits, and seeds, or even its ever green appearance, all these, with countless other concepts, arise in the human mind when we think about a tree.

Our intellectual lives, then, are composed of a simultaneous and successive procession of compound sensations to which all our senses have contributed. And man's acquisition of these complex impressions is immensely facilitated by the fact that he is a social creature. All the knowledge he possesses he may be permitted to impart through his language faculty to all who understand his speech. Through the use of tongue or pen, by example or precept, he may convey to others his personal or social impressions, and thus influence their actions for weal or woe. Born into an environment he did not create, and which the mightiest of the race can little more than shape in some small measure only, man not merely partakes of his social heritage, but inherits multitudinous impressions treasured from the past. But whatever the form of his mental capital, whether he possess an aptitude for the successful pursuit of astronomy, for a distinguished career in medicine or surgery, for eminence as a poet, artist, philosopher, or social and religious reformer, all his qualities and desires are built up out of ancestral and individual converse with surrounding nature.

We have every reason for our belief that mental phenomena must be regarded as a subtle mode of energy contrived and conditioned by the properties of protoplasm, the physical basis both of life and mind. Psychical manifestations, particularly in their higher aspects, are exceedingly complicated, and many remain very obscure. But no single fact has emerged during the advancing course of modern scientific investigation which countenances the curious theory that mind as its exists in the animal kingdom is the outcome of supernormal mind. Rather we should contend that, built up as it is, and has been through the ages, through the action and reaction of organism and environment, it must be regarded as the resultant of living matter's capacity to store up impressions received from the external world, combined with its ability to transmit in terms of heredity an increased aptitude to cultivate and harvest the ripened products of experience.

The Lord's Advertisement.

THE following are extracts from an advertisement that appeared in the Times on June 30:—

THE LORD'S MESSAGE TO THE NATION.

VICTORY AWAITS PRAYER.

Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee and thou shalt glorify me.—Psalm 107.

Remember God's deliverances in the days of old.

How He brought up the Israelites from Egypt with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm.—Psalm 78.

The great deliverance He wrought by Gideon.—Judges 7.

How He delivered King Hezekiah when he prayed from the boastful Sennacherib.—2 Chronicles 32.

How when the Spanish Armada threatened our country "He sent out His arrows, and scattered them: and He shot out His lightnings, and discomfited them."

LET THE LEADERS OF THE NATION CALL THE PEOPLE TO PRAYER.

The Author of this advertisement may be addressed—"Messenger," c/o Mr. ———, Advertisement Agent, — Paternoster Row, E.C.

It is rather a shock to find the Lord so up-to-date as to make use of the services of an advertising agent, and I have been wondering what that excellent man of business would say if his letter-box became loaded with communications for "the Lord"?

I have thought it worth while to look up the passages of Scripture to which attention is called, with a view to discovering whether they have any, and if so what, bearing upon the War.

(a) The deliverance of the Israelites was managed by dividing the waters so that they might march through them, and flooding the division again when the Egyptians (who had learned nothing for all their experiences of the tricky ways of the God of Israel) essayed to follow them. This is a simple device, and the suggestion apparently is that the Lord is quite prepared to take sides in some such treacherous manner on behalf of the Allies if they do but put their trust in him. The Lord knocks the Germans into a cocked hat when it comes to a disregard of the laws of war.

(b) The deliverance wrought by Gideon is an even less complicated method of getting victory. For Gideon, who was out against the Midianites, was told that he had too many soldiers. Conscription would never have been necessary if only England had thought of the Lord. Gideon had thirty and ten thousand men, and of these twenty and two thousand were discharged. The Lord wanted to show what he could do without their aid; but, with that curious inconsistency which characterized him, he didn't manage without some of them. Of the ten thousand that remained, he selected three hundred men. And this was the method of selection:—

> The Lord said unto Gideon: The people are yet too many; bring them down unto the water, and I will try them for thee there.....So he brought down the people unto the water. And the Lord said unto Gideon: Every one that lappeth of the water with his tongue as a dog lappeth, him shalt thou set by himself; likewise every one that boweth down upon his knees to drink.

There turned out to be three hundred lappers; and the Lord said:—

> By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thine hand.

The Midianites, it may be mentioned, "lay along the valley like grasshoppers for multitude." It must not be supposed that the three hundred lappers licked the Midianites. No. "The Lord set every man's sword against his fellow, even throughout all the host." Only the Lord knows what he wanted with the three hundred lappers at all; for, you see, he did the job himself in the end. Here the suggestion seems to be that the Lord is not unwilling to repeat his performance in our interest. But as we have asserted that we are not fighting the German people, we might have some scruples in availing ourselves of his aid in order that the German Army might turn their swords every man upon his neighbour.

(c) The third example of the War Lord's work is the case of the deliverance of King Hezekiah. In this case three things happened, and as they are intimately connected, I will set them out thus:—

1. Hezekiah "prayed and cried to heaven."
2. The Lord sent an angel who "cut off all the mighty men of valour and the leaders and captains" on the other side.
3. The enemy "returned with shame of face to his own land," and "thus the Lord saved Hezekiah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem."

Presumably the angel may be forthcoming against Hindenberg, even as he was against Sennacherib, king of Assyria, if only the Allies will call upon the Lord for assistance!

This is the twentieth century. And these are the stories to which Englishmen are directed by an advertisement in the Times as to how to overcome the enemy. It is possible that if only some readers of that erstwhile solemn journal will look up the passages referred to, they will see the joke—and the pity of it all.

Alan Handsacre.

The Relations of the Sexes.

There is no question that has been more stupidly treated by the Churches than the question of sex. Public opinion about it has for too long been formed by neurotic novelists, howling Christian dervishes, and prurient prudes in broadcloth and bombazine. The War has again brought matters of sex very prominently before us; and it is to be hoped that such matters in the immediate future will be wrested from the hands of inefficient theorisers and sentimentalists, and be dealt with by rational, dispassionate, and competent minds—by the psychologist, the economist, the sociologist, and the medical specialist.

It is true the statement that man is a polygamous animal is too sweeping, just as the statement that woman is a polyandrous animal would be too sweeping. But that there are some men who are polygamous animals and some women who are polyandrous animals are facts well known to observant sociologists. There are people in whom appetite is stronger than in others of their kind. Undue pandering to appetite is bad; but unnatural suppression is worse. The excitation produced by artificial stimuli in normal persons will usually pass quickly, and, except in the case of very gross and bestial natures, its effects—unless it is repeated frequently—will not remain long. But the denial of appetite, and the suppression of nature and natural functions, is a constant torment, producing physical disorders, and very often mental perversion. Human appetites must have gratification—if not natural, then unnatural. If natural gratification be impossible, then the tormented being will find outlets for his passions that utterly revolt all sane and thinking people. And the longer the suppression, the further back will be the swing of the pendulum. The long fast will be succeeded by the riot of an intemperate and devitalizing orgy.

We rejoice to think that there are many happy unions under a monogamous system. But we cannot ignore the evidence of the Divorce Courts, and we are entitled to examine closely the causes which usually produce what is conveniently described as "incompatibility of temper." But no matter how repugnant the spouses may have become to one another after two or three years of wedded life (or even less), Mother Church condemns them to the misery of a future unrelieved by hope till death takes one or the other. Can we be surprised that the spouse with the stronger appetite should surreptitiously seek pastures new?

We must get the Bible out of the marriage ceremony, just as we must get it out of the national schools. The latter operation will doubtless have to precede the former. We must have all marriages placed on the basis of social and civil contract. And it must be a contract that is not necessarily interminable except by death. A proviso or provisoes for making the contract terminable in the lifetime of the parties can have no applicability to or effect upon unions in which there is a continuance of mutual affections. But desire, if strong enough, snaps its fingers at all legal restrictions. And this is true of every being, male and female, of every vocation and of every nationality under the sun. When one gets down to the primordial, all distinctions are swept away.

Probably one of the most irritatingly ludicrous spectacles of the present day is to see a Bachelor Bishop with £10,000 a year exhorting working couples with 25s. a week to increase and multiply! The natural rejoinder of the latter is: Who will maintain our offspring if we do? So far as can be seen, the wealthy classes in this country do not increase and multiply so fast as the poor. Could there be a stronger argument for the conscription of wealth? If an increased birth-rate is a national necessity (as so many of the clergy say it is), the nation is justified in finding money to subsidize the biggest families. We know that when marriages take place between members of the aristocratic and wealthy classes, marriage settlements are the rule, under which capital sums are settled on trustees by the parents of the respective spouses, the income being applied for the support of the contracting parties and the children of the marriage. It seems equally appropriate that in the case of the poor the Government should appoint trustees in all marriages, and make suitable provision for the maintenance of the families. There would then be some real incentive to increase and multiply. But how, in the name of all that is sacred and secular, parsons expect people to maintain a family of a dozen on 25s. a week at current prices, is beyond the average mind. It is typical of the processes of the clerical mind. Of course, we have frequently heard clergymen modestly professing that they had no "head for figures." Some of them undoubtedly have an eye for them, however.

There is scarcely a saint or patriarch of the Old Testament who was not a polygamist. And some of them were even that and more; that is to say, if they took a fancy to a particular handmaiden of one of their wives, they did not hesitate to make her a concubine; and even if the concubine had a brat, and they tired of her, they turned her and her brat out of doors without so much as a basket of food, and without incurring any public reprobation. The Jewish sultans of "Holy Writ" had but to point the finger, and any man's daughter they chose became a member of the harem. When King David, the sweet singer of Israel, "annexed" the wife of Uriah the Hittite, we suspect (and his subsequent conduct justifies the suspicion) that he was more afraid of the sword of Uriah than he was of God; and it is interesting to observe that when he was reproached by the messenger of God, it was not for his greedy lasciviousness, but for stealing the poor man's one ewe lamb. No word here in condemnation of degrading and licentious commerce in women.

No wonder that the Churches are of no help in dealing with questions of sex and its cognate problems. Pauline authority (which for long was reverentially observed and respected) having fallen into disrepute with the advance of women, there is no authority to which the Churches can appeal. We must therefore, as we suggested at the outset, pin our faith to the rational, the dispassionate, and the competent—the psychologist, the economist, the sociologist, and the medical specialist. In these are our hope.

SOCIALIST SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I am instructed by the E. C. of Glasgow and District Union of Socialist Sunday-schools to comment, through your columns, upon your editorial remarks regarding the Glasgow Herald article on our Movement, and the discussion in the Scottish Assembly, and later in the Correspondence Column of the said newspaper. I am requested to say that we frankly accept the statement in the Herald, that while the Movement "is not anti-Christian, the Christian faith is frankly ignored."

We believe you have been misinformed to the effect that any of our schools or adult members have taken part in the correspondence. To our knowledge, the only parties who have taken part are the Churchman who commented on the Herald article at the Assembly, and a brother co-religionist who wrote chiding him for forming an opinion upon a newspaper article, and not upon personal experience.

The latter is a clergyman, and quite unknown to our Movement.

ANDREW FLEMING.

THE DAVENPORT BROTHERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In reply to the friendly criticism of "A. G. B.," I cannot admit that he has proved his point, viz., that Mr. Maskelyne was the exposer of the Davenport Brothers. He quotes Mr. Maskelyne as saying that, at a performance at Cheltenham, "I got a key to the knotty problem, which I have ever since used with such effect to reproduce all the tricks of the Brothers....."

But this public reproduction only took place several months later, when the Brothers were already discredited. The first public exposure took place at Liverpool, and Mr. Maskelyne had nothing to do with it.

"A. G. B." does not give the date of the Cheltenham performance—whether it was before or after the Liverpool exposure. But, in any case, Mr. Maskelyne did not expose the trick then, although he may have detected it; and it is the people who make the first exposure who should have the credit, for after that it is everyone's property.

However, I wish to thank "A. G. B." for his letter. If I have made any errors, I would like to have them pointed out before the articles go into pamphlet form.

W. MANN.

Johnnie (confidently): "He had to marry Eve."

The park orator raised a menacing arm and screeched out his warnings—"The road to hell," he cried, "is paved with motor cars, with chorus girls, and with drink."

He paused to let the words sink in; but the effect was rather spoilt by a voice from the fringe of the crowd observing audibly: "Oh, death, where is thy sting?"—Pearson's Magazine.

Views and Opinions.

The Bishop Explains.

We print in another part of this issue a letter from Bishop Frodsham in reply to a couple of paragraphs written in the Freethinker of July 15 on his reported speech before a Trades Union Conference. The Bishop now explains that his real purpose was to prevent the coloured man being exploited, and the white man depressed and oppressed as a consequence of that exploitation. That statement of his position we cheerfully accept, and, indeed, wish him every success in his endeavours. But the ground of our comment was concerned with a different issue from this, and it remains after Bishop Frodsham's explanation has been offered and accepted. The point to which we took exception was the off-hand classification of Chinese and Japanese as representing lower social organisms, and of all white people as belonging to a higher social category. We ventured to describe that classification as an impertinent one, and we believe it to be a dangerous one also, since it provides a moral and religious sanction for much that would not otherwise escape condemnation. The exploitation of the coloured man by the white in England or Australia we agree is bad, but we are not greatly gainers if, in protesting against that, we pave the way for the exploitation of the coloured people as a whole by the white races.

The Power of Difference.

Many years ago we remember how shocked we were on first seeing, in a certain city, the number of people who were minus shoes and stockings. The weather happened to be "dirty," and so by consequence were the human extremities. But a native of the city who was showing me round suggested that these people washed their feet more frequently than did a similar class in London. They got so dirty that they had to wash before going to bed. In London, where boots and stockings of a kind were worn, they might remain unwashed for weeks at a time. I saw the force of the remark. It was not more dirt I was observing, but a different kind of uncleanness. It was more objectionable because of its strangeness. And it has crossed my mind since, that I was illustrating in myself a fairly common feature of the British outlook. To the average Briton abroad native food is so much "muck," native manners distasteful, native morals—so far as they are different from ours—lower than our morals. Our standard of excellence is fixed and unalterable, and it is British. We see degrees of moral value where we ought only to detect differences. Because the world takes its time from Greenwich, we assume that it should take its morals from Clapham? The average Briton is assured that British institutions are not only the best in the world for him but for others likewise. And this is not a pose, it is the expression of a sincere conviction. That is why we are convinced we are all over the world for the world's benefit. That is what lies at the back of the doctrine that it is our duty to carry our civilization and our religion to the ends of the earth.

Contact or Conquest?

The point of what has been said is in nowise affected by substituting the white races for the British people. It is an extension of the same mental attitude, not a justification. Because Chinese, or Japanese, or Hindoo customs and institutions are different from ours we assume that, therefore, they are lower than ours, and from that follows the inference that we are advancing "civilization" by forcing our institutions upon them. And, in doing this, we ignore all the factors, sociological and psychological, that go to make up the life of a people. We fail to realize that the question of the inferiority or superiority of Japanese and Chinese cultures to the culture of Western peoples does not properly arise. Many Japanese and Chinese institutions would not suit us, it is certain that many of our institutions would not suit them. In some things we might fairly count ourselves as beyond them, in other things they might as fairly count themselves beyond us. The contact of different cultures is healthy and helpful. The claim of superiority based upon difference only is essentially unhealthy. It gives a moral justification for the exploitation of these "lower" races, where, as in the case of Japan, they are not strong enough to resist by force. It forces a peaceful people like the Chinese along lines of militaristic development for the purpose of self protection—which can hardly be regarded as a proof that we are a higher social organism. And it is significant that this vicious theory of superiority receives at every turn the sanction, explicit or implicit, of Christianity.

Religion and Politics.

We here touch one of the roots of a vexed and complicated question. The nearest approach to modern Imperialism was that of the old Roman Empire. But Rome proceeded more by a policy of assimilation; between modern Imperialistic nations and their yellow, black, or brown dependents or subjects there is no assimilation, only the relation of superior and inferior, or, thinly disguised, that of conquered and conqueror. One great cause of this distinction is Christianity. The religion of Rome was polytheistic and tolerant. The religion of the modern world is monotheistic and intolerant. With Rome, religion scarcely entered into its politics, and not at all into its dealings with subject peoples. "It was Christianity," says Lord Cromer in his Ancient and Modern Imperialism, "and its offshoot, Islam, that created nations and introduced the religious element into politics," and while the first part of the sentence may be open to question the last is beyond doubt. It is significant in this connection that the Jews were the only people the Romans failed to assimilate, and that here the cause was the intolerant nature of their religion. The Romans would not, of course, have hesitated in saying that some communities were of a lower order than others, but they would never have drawn a line of demarcation based upon colour and have claimed the control of the world for the white races. Christianity, by becoming the adopted and official religion of the Western world, paved the way for this. Its native intolerance as a religion paved the way for intolerance in politics and sociology. It provided the religious sanction which intolerance and exploitation required for its perpetuation and ethical justification. And it is hardly surprising to find a Christian bishop calmly dividing the world into lower and higher social organisms, and placing in the first-named category peoples who were civilized when his ancestors were running round dressed in nothing but a costume of paint.

Digitized by Google

Brotherhood and Bunkum.

No religion has dwelt with greater strength, in theory, on human brotherhood; none has more thoroughly ignored it in practice. The development of the colour bar is a proof of this. All men are brothers, says the Christian. That is the theory. In practice it is the white man who is the divinely ordained master, the coloured man—yellow, black, or brown—the divinely ordained servant. And, as we have suggested, this intolerance in the sociological field is an extension of the intolerance native in Christianity itself. Says Lord Cromer, in the work already cited: "The dominant Roman and the intellectual Greek thought themselves, without doubt, very superior to the savage Gaul or Briton, and to the more civilized Egyptian or Asiatic; but in estimating his sense of superiority, neither appears, so far as I can judge, to have taken much account of whether the skins of the subject or less intellectually advanced races were white, black, or brown." This conviction can be seen developing in European policy as a direct offshoot of Christianity. The Christians were the superior peoples, the non-Christians the inferior ones. And as the Europeans became Christianized, and the overwhelming bulk of the coloured peoples remained outside the pale of Christianity, the road to a division based on colour became easy. There were, says no less a person than Lord Acton, writing of the fifteenth century,— > eminent divines who thought that the people of hot countries might be enslaved. Henry the Navigator applied to Rome, and Nicholas V. issued Bulls authorizing him and his Portuguese to make war on Moors and Pagans and seize their possessions and reduce them to perpetual slavery, and prohibiting all Christian nations, under eternal penalties, from trespassing on the privilege. He applauded the trade in negroes, and hoped it would end in their conversion.

"End in their conversion"! That has been the great sanction for Christian plundering in all parts of the globe.

Christianity the Enemy.

The intrusion of religion, and particularly the Christian religion, into politics always carries the same evils. It distorts activities, it narrows the outlook, and it covers with a halo of sanctity secular evils that would otherwise stand a better chance of exposure and remedy. The revival of slavery, it has already been noted, was "sanctified" by the desire to bring the "heathen" into the Christian fold. The activities of a class bent on the exploitation of "lower social organisms" are disguised by appeals to national sentiment and religious zeal. Persecution, again, which so long as it is unallied with religion tends to correct itself by the obvious injury it inflicts on a community, is made respectable by its alliance with religion, and raised from the level of a vice to the rank of a duty. In these, as in other directions, religion aggravates, justifies, and perpetuates by disguising the real nature of the process. A lie that is seen to be a lie stands self-condemned; it is the "lie within the soul," the lie which regards itself as the truth, which is the great danger. And of all the throned lies known to the world, none is so great as Christianity. For centuries it has been like a canker in the brain and a cramp in the heart of the Western world. Its domination of the world of political life has been one of the greatest curses of modern Europe. And its removal is an essential condition of a lasting and healthful reformation.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

A Child's Thoughts on Religion.

SOME children take to religion much more readily and much more intensely than others. This is to be accounted for partly by inherited temperament, and partly by the kind and quantity of education brought into play, while others are prevented by the great law of heredity from taking to it at all. It is often asserted by the divines that man is a being of whom religion is a fundamental characteristic, which proves that it cannot die. Just as hunger is a permanent factor in the upward movement of mankind, so is religion, we are assured, an ineradicable instinct of the human mind. Such is the theological theory; but in practice it entirely breaks down, and is abandoned even by its most resolute champions. That theory is tacitly denied by all the advocates of religious instruction in day-schools, their chief argument being that if children are not religiously trained they will certainly become Atheists. Nevertheless, there are children who almost seem to have an instinct for religion, which is the outcome of many generations of favourable heredity and environment. Even in their case, however, a godly upbringing is an indispensable condition of their adoption of a religious life. We have known exceptionally pious parents who sorrowfully complained of the distinctly anti-religious disposition manifested by their offspring. But in the present article our concern is with a boy between eight and fourteen years of age who was brought up in a characteristically Christian home, and who, being passionately in love with his parents, developed an early passion for their religion. He was spoken of in the community as the youthful divine. The brand of theology which he affected was ultra Calvanism, which he delighted to defend against all and sundry attacks. He could discuss God and his decrees with much greater familiarity than he could his own father and his affairs. The Incarnation, the Atonement, the Resurrection, and Justification by Faith, were the grandest of all realities to him. In his imagination there lay vivid pictures of the triune God seated on three great thrones, with God the Father in the centre, and Gods the Son and Holy Ghost on either side. Christ had offered himself up as a propitiation to Eternal Justice for the elect only, of whose number he verily believed himself to be one. Occasionally, the doctrine of predestination disturbed and puzzled and confounded him not a little, but he invariably found ample satisfaction in the thought that the Sovereign of the Universe had a right to do as he pleased with his own wayward children, the exercise of mercy being purely optional with him.

This was, in truth, a vital point. The Arminians argued that it would have been essentially unjust of God to foreordain eternal life for some and eternal damnation for others; but this boyish theologian averred that predestination was justified on two grounds: God, being supreme, had a perfect right to do what he liked with his own property, and besides, all mankind, in consequence of the Fall, fully deserved eternal perdition. Calvin emphasized "not only the freedom, the unmerited character, of grace, but equally the sovereignty of God in the bestowal of it," the idea being "that apart from this sovereignty in the selection of the subjects of it, grace would not be grace." Such was the boy's creed, which in his early teens he treated as absolute truth revealed by God to his chosen vessels.

All the children of men were doomed to eternal death, but God, in his infinite mercy, had elected a certain number to eternal life. For these Christ had died on the Cross, thereby paying in full all their debts to Divine justice; and by accepting Christ as their surety these would certainly be saved. The bulk of the people among whom the boy's lot was cast were orthodox Calvinists; and their constant anxiety was whether they were among the elect or not. This was the point that troubled them by day and by night, and it drove one or two of them to stark madness. The boy himself had hours and days of doubts now and then; but he held on to his creed with all his might and main, his city of refuge being the conviction that whatever God did was right, simply because he did it. It was a laughably absurd position for a sane person, young or old, to occupy; and there are many present-day Christians who vainly imagine that now it only marks a stage in theological evolution; but, as a matter of fact, Calvinism is by no means dead, and is still professed by thousands in the very form in which it flourished among Presbyterians and others sixty and seventy years ago. Moreover, we are firmly of opinion that Calvinism is not one whit less believable than Arminianism, or any other form of supernaturalism. The belief in the invincible sovereignty of God logically lands its possessor in Calvinism. The fact that the whole system is nothing but a horrid dream by no means destroys its logicality.

We have stated that the boy under consideration was sometimes painfully haunted by doubts and fears; but neither the doubts nor the fears cast the slightest suspicion upon the truth of the Christian religion, but rather upon the reality of the popular belief in it. To him, through all his teens, and for a few years beyond them, Christianity appealed as tremendously, even terrifically, true. What he doubted very often was whether professing Christians really believed its cardinal doctrines. According to the doctrine of election, God had determined, from all eternity, "whom he would admit to salvation and whom he would condemn to destruction." Consequently, in every age and country the non-elect have been a host whom none could number, with the inevitable result that hell was inhabited by countless millions of doomed souls in torment. The mere thought of such a fact was unspeakably appalling, and to the boy it was a source of indescribable grief and pain. He knew that from every family in the neighbourhood some were already in "the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone." Of this heartbreaking fact ministers of the Gospel were specially aware; and yet he found that in practice they totally ignored it. They seemed to enjoy life as if there were no such place or state as hell. He could never forget once listening to an unusually terrifying discourse by a popular preacher on the text, "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell"? and immediately after delivering it the man of God partook of a luxurious meal, and spent the whole evening telling tales, cracking jokes, and laughing merrily with a company of friends. Such behaviour convinced the lad, who was only twelve at the time, that the sermon just delivered had not been taken seriously by the minister and his jovial friends, though it had filled his own heart with blood-curdling terror. From that time onwards there gradually grew within him the feeling that, by the majority of its professors, religion was treated with criminal lightheartedness. Neither heaven nor hell had any significance to them except for an hour or two at church or chapel once or twice a week. During that brief period they verily believed and felt that the Gospel message was solemnly true, and should be heeded for the soul's eternal safety; but in their ordinary intercourse with the world they did not appear to retain any recollection whatever of it.

When he was about half way through his teens, our young friend made a startling discovery. He had been brought up to believe that sermons, like marriages, were made in heaven. Preachers were the successors of the Old Testament prophets, and in the pulpit acted simply as God's spokesmen. In the prayer immediately before the sermon he had frequently noticed that they made this petition: "O Lord, speak thyself to these people to-day; use us as thine ambassadors." But in his fourteenth year he had the privilege of a long conversation with a young minister who had just taken over the pastorate of the church of which he was a member, in the course of which the admission was made that a discourse cost a certain number of days' hard work. Then it occurred to him that to pray for a sermon already written out and committed to memory was an act of disgraceful hypocrisy, a gross insult to the Almighty, and a species of fraud played upon the congregation. Subsequently, he had no difficulty in accounting for the fact that some sermons were so much better or so much worse than others. Everything depended upon the preacher's general gifts and special qualifications for his office, but chiefly upon industry or indolence.

Up to his twenty-sixth year our hero continued to be a valiant champion of orthodox Calvinism; but disturbing questions kept forcing themselves upon his mind, such as, Does God really hear and answer prayer? Did he send his only begotten Son to die for the elect in a lost and ruined world? Does the Holy Ghost dwell in the hearts of the redeemed, and lead them along the devious paths of life? At first the mere presence of such queries in his mind frightened him; but by degrees he developed the courage to face them, and the mere act of facing them made him strong. Finally, all questions were reduced to one, namely, Does God exist, and what evidence is there that he does, or does not? For many years this question remained without a definite answer. The head said, "There is no God"; but the heart stubbornly went on giving the head the lie direct. In the end, head and heart came to terms and kissed each other, with the result that storm was followed by a great and songful calm, and that even doubts and fear vanished, and serene confidence began to reign supreme.

Many children have had to pass through similar experiences. Very pleasant are the dreams which the fancy weaves while Monarch Reason sleeps, and some go through life cherishing them as blissful realities; but happy are they at whose doors hard problems knock so loudly that the Monarch awakes and drives the dreams away as so many illusions and hallucinations. Whenever that awakening occurs, whether early or late in life, Theism makes room for Atheism, dream-life ends and real-life begins. Usually, persons who pass through such experiences make excellent Freethinkers; and for them there is absolutely no possibility of a return to the old life and its exploded beliefs.

J. T. LLOYD.

Throwing Out the Sandbags.

> The entire early training and life of England's higher ecclesiastics seem to render the majority of them incapable of taking in facts patent to everyone else.
> —The Duke of Argyll.
> The divine stands wrapt up in his cloud of mysteries, and the amused laity must pay tithes and venerations to be kept in obscurity, grounding their hope of future knowledge on a competent stock of present ignorance.—George Farquhar.

THE attacks of the Freethinkers on the church balloon are beginning to tell heavily, and the ecclesiastics are getting nervous and are throwing out the sandbags in a frantic endeavour to escape. Recently the House of Convocation of Canterbury decided to abandon Psalm lviii., and to eliminate the worst features of some of the other sacred lyrics attributed to King David. The clerical manœuvre will not save Christianity, but it is hoped that, for a time, the Freethought sharpshooters will be evaded.

The ruse is a smart one, but it will not serve for long. The Psalms are an integral part of the Bible, and David, "the man after God's own heart," is too closely allied with the legendary figure of Christ to be thrown thus rudely to the rubbish-heap without disastrous results to orthodoxy. It is not only a desperate policy in the particular instance, but a precedent which will exert, in the long run, anything but a happy effect on the Christian position.

The Psalms were written many centuries ago, and have been regarded by many as the inspired utterances of God ever since. For the future Psalm lviii. will not be printed in the Psalter "as appointed to be read." The Convocation of Canterbury has so decreed, by forty-three votes against thirteen, and the ecclesiastics have dismissed King David as though he were so much war-time beer or racing. Now what is wrong with the 58th Psalm? It is a comparatively short one, but Convocation says it is "un-Christian-like in character," which is a polite way of expressing that it is entirely out of harmony with modern humanistic ideas. This is how Psalm lviii. runs:—

> The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance; he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked. So that a man shall say, verily there is a reward for the righteous: verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth.

It will be seen that the ecclesiastics have not selected the worst utterances in the Bible. Other Psalms are open to the same grave objections, as, for instance, the inspired cursings in Psalm cix.:—

> When he shall be judged, let him be condemned; and let his prayer become sin. Let his days be few; and let another take his office. Let his children be fatherless, and his wife a widow. Let his children be continually vagabonds, and beg: let them seek their bread also out of their desolate places.

And, again, in Psalm cxxxvii.:—

> Happy shall he be, that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones.

Observe the ecclesiastics have themselves started to pull the Bible to pieces, and have begun with the Psalms. King David thus comes in for tardy, but none the less deserved, rebuke. For David is now seen to be a barbarian, and the champions of the Bible are obliged to throw the Oriental savage overboard in order to absolve their Deity from the vices and crimes of his favourite. Let there be no mistake about this. The remarks of that accomplished scholar, Ernest Renan, are so apt that they deserve to be quoted:—

> We shall see the brigand of Adullam and Ziklag assume gradually the airs of a saint. He will be the author of the Psalms; the sacred chorægus, the type of the future saviour. Jesus must be the son of David! The evangelical biography will be falsified in a multitude of points by the idea that the life of the Messiah should reproduce the traits of David's. Pious souls, while enjoying the sentiments, full of resignation and tender melancholy, of the finest of liturgical books, will fancy themselves in communion with this bandit. Humanity will believe in a final justice on the testimony of David, who never thought of it, and of the Sibyl, who never existed. O the divine comedy.

It would be a thankless task to enumerate the false, foolish, and wicked features of the Holy Scriptures, but the sacred volume is full of barbarism from cover to cover. From the first error in Genesis to the final absurdity in Revelation, much of the writing is of pathological interest, although presented in exotic forms of verse. In many places in the Old Testament the writing is filled with the turmoil of battle, the champing of horses, the flashing and bickering of spears. Only on rare occasions does the still, sad voice of humanity make itself heard. As for the New Testament, the highly evolved moral perceptions of to-day are shocked beyond expression at the awful doctrine that countless millions of mankind will suffer eternal punishment. It will be seen that it is not theology which purifies humanity, but humanity which purifies theology. Man civilizes himself first, and then civilizes his gods, and the clergy walks at the tail of the procession and takes the credit and the cash.

This decision to excise a portion of "God's Word" from the Psalter is not a paltry matter. For the Bible is not an ordinary book. It is stamped as God's Word by Act of Parliament; it is forced (including Psalm lviii. and other unseemly passages) into the hands of children at schools; it is used as a fetish for swearing upon in Courts of Law and Houses of Legislation. Men and women have been robbed of their children in its name, and excluded from public positions. And people are still liable, at law, to penalties for bringing it into "disbelief and contempt."

Yet it is as plain as a pikestaff that Freethought is slowly forcing the Church into a dangerous position, and the clergy are in a desperate plight. They are throwing the sandbags away. At present, it is true, the process is confined to the Old Testament; but, before long, the process will have to be extended to the New Testament. When it is completed, the Christian Religion will be a thing of shreds and patches. Then the Bible will take its proper place beside the other Sacred Books of the East, and the clergy will have to look for honest employment. The eviction of David is the beginning of the end.

MIMNERMUS.

A claim has been paid by an insurance company to a church damaged in a recent air-raid. This is an ironic comment on the clerical trust in Providence.

The exploitation of the docile public in the name of the War goes on apace. At a popular seaside resort a flag-day has been announced for the Young Women's Christian Association.

Socialists, Freethought, and Religion.

THE question whether a Christian can accept the conclusions of modern Socialism and still retain his religious beliefs has been the cause of countless arguments and disputes since ever I became acquainted with the opinions of Socialists and Freethinkers.

Looking back over the controversies which have been waged round this supposed problem, I find that the disputants may roughly be divided into two camps—on one side Freethinkers (many of whom are Socialists), who believe that the idea of the intervention of God in the affairs of this life is the greatest delusion of the human mind, and who contend that men must first think rationally about the problems of existence before an economic revolution of any value can be accomplished. On the other side we have the militant Socialists (many of whom are avowed Freethinkers), who believe that wage-slavery is the root of all our social troubles, and that most progress will be made by concentrating the attack on the economic basis of capitalism, the religious difficulty being left to right itself when men are "economically free."

As one who is both an Atheist and a Socialist, and has devoted some twenty years to the diffusion of Socialistic ideas, and comparatively little time to the furtherance of Freethought, I cannot be called a "bourgeois Freethinker" who has been "led astray by the remarks of pseudo-Socialists"; yet if there are "Rationalist superstitions as well as Christian" (Where are they?) there is profound intellectual dishonesty manifested by most Socialists towards religion, which attitude is frequently associated with the repudiation of militant Freethought.

Now, it is conceivable that in the time of Jesus, some Jewish tribes, and later the early Christians, lived a sort of Socialistic-Communistic existence, which was not incompatible with their religious professions. But the simple-minded Essenes had not the advantages of German kultur; so, not having read Karl Marx, the structure of their society was not on a "sound economic basis." To be serious, no parallel whatever can be drawn between the social relations of small groups in primitive times and the complex social system of our day, which is practically universal. "Scientific" Socialism is comparatively modern, and dates from the time of Proudhon, Lassale, and Marx. The works of the last-named form the basis of the leading Socialist parties in the world. In fact, the theories of Marx are generally accepted by Socialists with as little question as Catholics would give to a papal pronouncement; indeed, it would seem that there are Socialist as well as Rationalist superstitions!

My purpose is not to discuss Marxian theories, but to show clearly, however much we may juggle with terms, that to believe in "the materialistic conception of history" is to disbelieve in every conception of God and other-worldliness. Now, there are men of scientific training who profess to accept Darwinism, and yet remain Christians, but we cannot have it both ways; evolution and special creation are diametrically opposed. Similarly, men may believe in a sentimental brotherly love sort of emotional Communism and the world beyond the skies as well; as a matter of fact, God and mawkishness go very well together. But Marx teaches that whatever form of supernatural belief is in existence is simply a reflex of the prevailing material conditions of the epoch; or, in other words, that all religion is made by man, and varies with the changes in the economic basis of society. I have never met a Marxian Socialist who was a professing Christian, yet I have known scores who "hedged" beautifully when reasoning with religious persons, and who have manifested a respect for religion and the "ethical teaching of Jesus" which they certainly did not feel, under the impression that such form of Jesuistry was "good propaganda."

Even the leading exponents of Socialism have been guilty of this form of kow-towing to the Church, and if I had a narrow Protestant outlook I would be suspicious of them as "emissaries of Rome." Take the following, for example, from a pamphlet by the late James Connolly:—

> .....So far from it being true that Socialism and Atheism are synonymous terms, it is a curious and instructive fact that almost all the prominent propagandists of Freethought in our generation have been, and are, most determined enemies of Socialism. The late Charles Bradlaugh, in his time the most aggressive Freethinker in England, was to the last resolute and uncompromising in his hatred of Socialism; G. W. Foote, the present editor of the Freethinker, the national organ of English Secularism, is a bitter enemy of Socialism; and the late Colonel Bob Ingersoll, the chief apostle of Freethought doctrine in the United States, was well known as an apologist of capitalism.

Now for an example of evading the point at issue, of mental twisting, and the wilful creation of a prejudice against Freethinkers, this excerpt from the work of a Marxian Socialist would be hard to beat.

"Are Socialism and Atheism synonymous?" As well ask, as Connolly knew, if capitalism and theology are the same thing! The question at issue is, "Does a belief in Socialism imply a disbelief in religion?" and he answers by telling us that most prominent Freethinkers are anti-Socialists! There's a Catholic answer for you. But, for very obvious reasons, Connolly does not tell us, what would be of some consequence, how many leading Socialists are Christians; and we are led to infer from the fact that prominent Freethinkers have been opposed to Socialism—that, indeed, Atheism and anti-Socialism were synonymous.

It must here be noted, that while insisting on the importance of presenting their doctrines in their own way, many Socialists are perpetually having a tilt at Freethinkers and their methods, while very few are to be found who dare openly to attack Christianity as a buttress of Capitalism.

This "respect" attitude is nauseating in the extreme, especially as the Socialists invariably get nothing but abuse and misrepresentation from Christians for their pains. To my mind it is unthinkable that an educated Socialist can seriously listen to twaddling lectures and "ethicking" from clergymen, and treat these utterances with more deference than he can accord to the reasoned works of Freethinkers.

In another portion of the same pamphlet which I have been quoting (The New Evangel), in dealing with a Father Finlay's views of Socialism as expounded before the students of Maynooth Union, Connolly says:—

> We heartily allow that no man in Ireland outside the ranks of the adherents of Scientific Socialism, can bring to bear upon questions of political economy, and the effect which theories of political economy have had upon the industrial life of the people, such a wealth of knowledge as the reverend gentlemen whose paper we are now discussing.

This would lead us to expect some high-brow goods from the first economist in Ireland (barring the "adherents of Scientific Socialism"), instead of which we get the old drivel about a man's right to do what he likes with his own, Socialism having broken down wherever it has been tried, etc.; which creates in my mind the suspicion that the savants of Liberty Hall may, after all, be small potatoes intellectually.

The historic Encyclical of Leo XIII. on the Labour problem was a very feeble contribution to the literature of political economy; but we are assured that Father Finlay, on another occasion, laid before the Dublin Statistical Society "an exposition of the evolutionary nature of the Socialist doctrine, its historical derivation and material basis, which is not at all compatible with the crudely false conception of Socialism....." served up to the young priests at Maynooth. Now, Leo, being the head of the Church, was worth answering, however silly his economics—besides, he may have meant well; Father Finlay certainly didn't mean well, and why an insignificant clergyman convicted of wilful misrepresentation should be treated seriously and politely is beyond me.

I might understand the deferential attitude towards the platitudinous vapourings of professional dealers in superstition if a good percentage of Socialists were believing Christians, but there are scarcely any Christians in "the movement"; or, if the "social teachings" of Jesus had any value to day, but very little study is necessary to discover that the Saviour as a social reformer is decidedly unconvincing. There was an excellent pamphlet on Jesus as Social Reformer by Charles Watts—which I hope is still obtainable—dealing with "Christian" Socialism in a masterly manner.

What, then, are the reasons why Socialists, who are nearly all sceptics, are generally so afraid of hurting the feelings of Christians?

Making all due allowances, the chief reason is moral cowardice. To be an Atheist is still in many quarters "synonymous with" being a villain, and will be so, so long as we are afraid to admit our opinions. Then there is the mistaken idea of tactics. It may be easier to get a man to change his politics than to discard his religion; but rest assured, comrades, that "converts" from the Christian fold will require a sound "atheistic basis" before the cause can profit. Yes, I agree that before Socialists capture the Church, the Church will capture Socialism.

So long, then, as bodies of organized Socialists protest that the teaching in their Sunday-schools is not anti-Christian (we shall be delighted to prove that if Christian, it must be anti-social), so long as it is a commonplace that "A true Christian must be a Socialist," and that "The Socialist Party of Ireland prohibits the discussion of theological or anti-theological questions at its meetings, public or private. This is in conformity with the practice of the chief Socialist parties of the world....." Well, well so long as Socialists adopt that attitude towards any question, they well deserve to be regarded with suspicion by all lovers of freedom of thought.

REPRISALS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I hope I am not more bloodthirsty than the average Freethinker, it distresses me to see any kind of pain or suffering, and I cannot take the life of an animal, however necessary, without feeling pity. Yet I am strongly of opinion that we ought to retaliate on German towns, preferably such as Essen, as a reprisal for their attacks on London and other British towns. This would make it clear to the High Command that such warfare was not a paying proposition, and, moreover, was one in which two could take a part. If this plan was adopted, a large number of German guns and aeroplanes would be kept at home for their own protection, and to this extent be prevented from doing harm to us. Directly they ceased to attack open towns we should let them understand we were willing to do the same. War is a brutal business, but self-preservation is the first law of nature.

NEW MANCHESTER BRANCH: AN APPEAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—We must have a considerable increase if the new Branch is to be the success we anticipated when we commenced organizing work last March. We have an active committee, but if serious work is to be inaugurated in the coming winter, it is imperative that we should have more members.

Freethinkers do not need telling of the difficulties confronting new organizations like ours, and I am sure it is only through pen laziness that I have not received more applications. The purport of this letter, therefore, is to appeal to the large audiences at Mr. Cohen's last lecture in Manchester to send me their names without delay, when membership forms will at once be sent them for completion. I am making this appeal through your columns in the confident anticipation that the Freethinkers of Manchester and district will rally round us with the object of founding our new Branch upon a firm and enduring basis.

COLOURED LABOUR.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—The severe strictures you made upon me in your last issue appear to have been based upon a very contracted account of my speech to the Council meeting of the General Federation of Trade Unions in Gloucester upon the advisability of watching carefully the movement towards coloured labour in this country. The most misleading contraction was the omission of the word "social" before the word "organisms." Possibly the illustration from biology may not commend itself to you, but I think you will allow that it is not insulting to the other races who are likely to be exploited for industrial purposes to say that their social conditions are such as to make it possible for them to sell their labour at a figure which would be disastrous to the social aspirations of the industrial classes in this country. This was the essence of my warning, which was based upon intimate knowledge of the effect of coloured labour upon white labour in several parts of the world.

I am sufficiently a believer in free thinking and free speaking that I never resent others differing acutely from me, and saying so without ambiguity or conventionality, but I dislike being condemned for something which I have not said, and never dreamed of saying. Moreover, I consider my warning to be of much importance to the welfare, not only of this country, but of the world; and not only of white men, but of all men. I hope, therefore, that you will publish the accompanying report of that part of my speech which deals with the subject under consideration. The report was made by the representative of the Gloucester Chronicle, and I did not see it until it appeared in print.

GEORGE H. FRODSHAM, Bishop.

[The following is the pertinent passage in the report enclosed by Bishop Frodsham:—"It was a biological fact that a lower organism could crush out a higher one; and it was no insult to the Chinese and the Japanese, our Allies, and the less developed races of the world to say that they were lower in organization than the English, the Americans, and other white races were." We regret we have not space for the whole of the report, but we cannot see that it materially effects what we said in "Acid Drops" for July 15. The Chinese and Japanese are different from us, but to take difference as an equivalent of inferiority is an example of that religious egotism against which we protested. The egotism may be unconscious, but it is there.—ED.]

The Duke of Argyll has been engaged in the pleasant pastime of bishop baiting. "It has been widely remarked," says the Duke, that since the War began the bishops have hardly made one sensible remark about it." The indignant bishops will wish that they had not discarded the "cursing" Psalm.

"Lord Northcliffe is a creator of modern England," says the Rev. W. E. Bentley. Most parsons profess to believe that the creator of modern England also made old Judee.

Acid Drops.

Rev. Dr. Fitchett is a Wesleyan clergyman who has made something of a reputation, and we assume, of an income by the writing of frothy religio-patriotic books. From a short article in the Age (Melbourne) we see that he has been addressing himself to the question of why God does not put an end to the War. He agrees that God could stop the War by killing the Kaiser, but he asks plaintively, "If God started along those lines where would he stop?" But the question was, Why does he not commence? Perhaps Dr. Fitchett is afraid that if God started clearing out undesirables he might not draw the line at Germany.

Dr. Fitchett says: "The fact was that every alternative to Christianity had broken down, and if anything was calculated to reinforce our faith it was the picture of the downfall of Germany, whose wicked theory of a non-moral State had produced the War. In the face of these facts some of the most eminent freethinkers had declared their conviction that on the logic of this war Christianity alone could save the world." Dr. Fitchett knows that he is on safe ground when telling this sort of story about "eminent freethinkers." For our part, we say deliberately that they do not exist outside Dr. Fitchett's imagination. Lying for the greater glory of God is an old Christian practice, and Dr. Fitchett is in this respect at least quite orthodox.

The Evening News has grave doubts "of the great change and regeneration of England that the War was to bring," and adds that "we poison babies with impure milk, London bread makes people ill, and beer is often an affair of noisome chemicals." All of which proves that the only truthful thing about Christianity is that its professors are "miserable sinners."

Newspaper piety is a fearful and a wonderful thing. The Daily Sketch says that the British "are shy of invoking the Deity" and "refrain from vociferous insistence" that God is with them. This is a half-truth, for tens of thousands of British parsons and amateur preachers are perpetually invoking the Deity, and their congregations pay them handsomely for so doing.

At the Wesleyan Methodist Conference on July 19, the new President said the Christianity suitable to the soldiers when they return must be "a religion of valour with iron in its blood." This sounds like a paraphrase of Bismarck's "blood and iron," and, in any case, it seems a trifle removed from the Christianity of meekness and love that we used to hear of. But we have no doubt that the old-fashioned variety will be on hand when it is needed—particularly when something is needed to keep the people "in order," should they ask for more than it is thought advisable to give them.

The National Council of the Free Churches of Wales appeals to all the Churches to set apart August 4 and 5 as days of supplication. The Welsh weekly journal, Y Cymro, hopes that the message of this appeal will be universally heeded, and that "we shall see an entire nation bent in submission before God." Do the Welsh people imagine that the War is really God's operation, or that the Father in Heaven is responsible for the horrible slaughter of so many millions of his own children? As they sing, "The God of love my Shepherd is," do they verily believe that he is deliberately butchering such countless multitudes of "the sheep of his pasture"? If not, why should they humble themselves under his mighty hand? If they do, why supplicate, why burden his throne with fictions? Either God is the author of the War, or he is not; if he is, is he not much rather a contemptible monster than God of love? If he is not, what is the use of having anything whatever to do with him? In either case, to supplicate him is an act of sheer mockery, while the humbling of ourselves before him would be unforgivable hypocrisy.

It has gone the round of the papers that the following letters have passed between Sir William Robertson Nicoll and Lord Rhondda: Sir William wrote, "Talk less, and work more." Lord Rhondda retorted, "Write less, and work more." We were not aware that the Food Controller was much given to talking, but we do know that the Editor of the British Weekly is guilty of writing an infinite amount of trash about God and the War, and of exploiting the War to further the interests of its own fads.

The Sunday Times has some very pertinent and outspoken remarks on the Sunday Observance prosecutions at Sheffield. "Time and money, both public and private, were wasted at Sheffield, and, quite possibly, may be again wasted elsewhere, until this archaic law is relegated to the limbo of other worn-out relics of the past."

The Americans are pushful and resourceful people, and the Detroit Times has been protesting vigorously against "the old vogue of free notices or advertisements of Sunday services in the newspapers." It adds, "the only perplexity now is to get the church officers to be willing to pay the bills." "Aye, there's the rub." As in effete old Europe, the dear clergy do not give money away.

A house-agent's advertisement in a provincial paper, depicting the glories of a growing neighbourhood, adds the note, "Come out Sundays." If he is not more careful, that house-agent will get a free mention in ministerial prayers, and consigned to a place not on any map.

According to an American newspaper, the Bethlehem Steel Company manufactures armour plant. The title seems singularly appropriate.

A church notice recently announced that a parson would speak on the subject, "Godliness is Profitable." Even the bench of bishops would not dispute this.

That the position, so far as Christianity is concerned, is beginning to be realized, even at Woolwich, is evidenced by the cessation of the "Special Services for Munition Workers," lasting ten minutes, held until recently every Sunday at 1.10 p.m., by the Rector of Holy Trinity, Woolwich, which church is situate just outside the Royal Arsenal gates. These services have, during the past twelve months, been attended by as many as eight and as few as two persons at a time on the three occasions the writer visited them out of curiosity. "Spiritual things" do not appeal to the workers on munitions. They are engaged on material things, both in their own affairs and their occupations, and experience has taught them that success is best achieved by leaving spiritual things to those possessing such an enormous stock of faith and credulity as will enable them to continue praying even when the sugar and bread, presumably prayed for, do not arrive.

The centenary of Henry Thoreau recalls that he was a "conscientious objector," and that he went to prison for his resistence to the authorities. Whilst Thoreau was in prison he was visited by Emerson. "Why are you in there, Henry?" asked Emerson. "Ralph, why are you not in?" was the significant answer.

Christians are beginning to find out that all Germans are not Atheists. Lord Hugh Cecil, speaking at the House of Laymen, said Churchmen "were bound as Christians to love the Germans, and they had no more right to hate German Christians than they had to hate any other Christians." Christian love is as much open to suspicion as Christian truth.

At the Wesleyan Conference one of the speakers, Rev. F. H. Benson, said that many men at the Front had written home to say it was a hell. The Daily Telegraph report says that this was greeted with "cries of dissent." If the War on the Western Front doesn't approach near enough to hell to satisfy these parsons, they must be very hard to please. And yet we suppose the clergy really did ask for exemption in order to keep out of heaven.

At the present time, says Miss Violet Scott James in the Evening Standard, "we are allowed for the good of the nation to plough on a Sunday; we are compelled for the safety of the nation to fight on a Sunday; the only thing, then, that is denied us is that we should enjoy ourselves on a Sunday." But enjoyments are of the conditions of mental health, and mental health was never Christianity's concern. And, probably, if we indulged in more rational enjoyment we should both work better and fight less.

The Salvation Army is now quite respectable. In a newspaper paragraph it is stated that Queen Wilhelmina, of Holland, takes a keen interest in the Army's work. The Army might get another testimonial from the King of the Cannibal Islands, stating that he likes the taste of the "Blood and Fire" missionaries.

The Bishop of Chelmsford contends that reprisals would "disgrace he whom we serve." The grammar is as weak as the sentiment.

A writer in the Star says "behind the bayonet of to-day stands the Christian of to-morrow." What happens if the man behind the gun gets shot?

A speaker at the House of Laymen said churches to-day often reminded him of the theatre bills, "Early doors threepence extra." This recalls the jest that the difference between a theatre and a place of worship is that you pay to go in one, and pay to get out of the other.

The clergy are beginning to be uneasy concerning the public's attitude towards the exemption of the black army from military service. In order to confuse the issue, some of the religious papers are publishing lists of parsons' relatives who have been killed or wounded at the Front. In one case the record is entitled, "The Toll of the Parsonage."

"Vanoc," of the Referee, is wroth with the Bishops for deleting David's (or whoever wrote the fifty-eighth Psalm) Hymn of Hate from the Church Service. He calls the Bishops "piratical blue-pencillers of the Word of God." But the Church Service is not claimed to be the "Word of God," and the Bishops do not propose to eliminate the fifty-eighth Psalm from the Bible. "Vanoc" may rest his soul in peace. With or without the fifty-eighth Psalm, Christians are not likely to be found wanting in the power of hatred. Of that the pious readers of the Referee may rest assured.

"Vanoc" says: "I would prefer concurrent endowment of all sects to the impoverishment and destruction of the Church of England." Generous man! Rather than the one should suffer, he would take from the public and give to all the Churches. Such whole-hearted philanthropy is staggering. For our part, we prefer the other course—that of the State leaving all the sects severely alone. They will then have to rely upon themselves alone—themselves and their God.

The number of candidates for ordination last year was 381, as against 670 in 1913. Still, we have heard no complaint from the general public about the shortage of the clergy. Perhaps this was overshadowed by the shortage of potatoes and other things.

Part of a wrecked Zeppelin has been given by the War Office to the Rector of South Hackney, who has placed it in his church. We do not know what prompted the War Office to make the gift, but we presume that the rector wishes to remind worshippers that God protects them during air-raids.

In an inspired puff in the press it is stated that Mr. J. J. Virgo, national field secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, has just returned from a trip to "nearly all the British fronts," and he had collected over £120,000 on his tour. Complimentary allusions to Mr. Virgo's tact followed, together with the naive admission that he was "not engaged on a money-raising campaign." Presumably, a virgo intacta.

At Worthing the Provost Marshall of a military camp asked the magistrates to allow cinema shows to be open on Sunday in the interests of soldiers. The request was refused—in the interests of Sabbatarianism. We do not know on what ground magistrates take to themselves the power to grant or deny these Sunday performances. We believe it to be quite outside their power to do either. Sunday entertainments, to which admission is paid by money, are illegal by statute, and it is ridiculous to assume that a magistrate can give permission to a breach of the law. If cinema proprietors care to run the risk of opening, they can do so without the magistrate's permission; and if the magistrate does permit it, they may still be prosecuted if anyone cares to do so.

The Bishop of London says that he places his hope for the future of the world in the progress of the democratic spirit and in substituting democracies for dynasties. The sentiment is all right, but we remember that not long since the Bishop was joining with Mr. Stephen Graham in ignorant eulogies of the late Czar, the then Russian Government, and the Russian Church. All it means is that what the Bishop is pleased to call his mind is at the service of anything that strikes him at the moment.

Rev. F. Lewis Donaldson, who was one of the speakers at the same meeting, said, "We ministers and Churches were held in indifference by the working people before the War; now we are held in contempt." That put the situation in a nutshell. And we doubt if the clergy will reinstate themselves by pointing out to the public how richly the vast majority deserve the treatment they receive.

The Christian World raises the question as to what steps a clergyman should take if an air-raid occurs during divine service. One would have thought that the proper course would be to offer up a prayer, and leave the rest with the Lord. Instead of that, it suggests that the centre of a church is not good cover, and advises taking cover by the main walls. That advice would suit a billiard saloon as well as a church. But if people are no better off in church than elsewhere, why not stay at home?

Who will say now that Christianity does not make for brotherhood and good fellowship? The Bishop of London and the Bishop of Chelmsford actually paid a friendly visit to the Methodist Conference to express feelings of friendship and cordial recognition of the Christian character of the Methodist Church. It is very touching, even though to some it may seem a very wee mouse for the mountain of Christian preaching to have produced. The Bishop of London hopes to see the Methodists reconciled to the Church of England. Some of the Methodist leaders hope to see a greater measure of co-operation between the two bodies. Perhaps, after all, it is only the presence of a common danger that is drawing them closer together.

TOLERATION.

Why should anyone wish that others should think exactly as he does? It is like compelling them to wear the same kind of clothes, or to use the same kind of spectacles, and losing our temper if they object to do so. In reference therefore to those convictions which we may think most of all important for the human race, and the significance of which we may perhaps ourselves be long in seeing, it is best "to possess one's soul in patience." Why should we wish to hear an echo of our own beliefs around us, if it be unbecoming to "compass sea and land to make proselytes" to them? It may also be noted that a society of men and women in which belief is uniform is always a dull society. It stagnates from the want of the elements of difference. In all progressive communities, however much the individual may succeed in coming to definite conclusions on great subjects, what is growing up around him in society, as the result of the contemporary forces that sway it, is necessarily different from that which he has himself reached, or from which he originally started. This consideration alone should be sufficient to make men tolerant and sympathetic as to the evolution of belief.—Prof. W. Knight.

To Correspondents.

WILL Advertiser please call or send for replies to the advertisement of "Young Married Couple"?

S. SODDY.—Pleased to receive the congratulations of so old a supporter of the N. S. S. as yourself. Shall be very glad to see you once more a member of the old Society.

G. AYRES.—We should also like to see an index prepared for each volume of the Freethinker, but that would mean a deal of work if done properly, and at present we have as much as we can handle.

H. L.—Ask your local newsagent to display a copy. That is an excellent form of advertising.

L. CHEETHAM.—Your letters, with others received, proves that we were not in error in thinking that Freethinkers generally would endorse our action. We felt that a plain statement was all required.

WE have to thank some anonymous friend for a present of twenty-five cigars. We know they came from a friend because we have smoked a couple of them.

C. F. BENNETT.—We do not know of any current book dealing particularly with the subject. You will have to dig out the information from such writers as Lecky, Gibbon, Draper, and others. Mr. Cohen wrote at some length in these columns on the question of Christianity and the Slave Trade about 1900, but the articles have never been reprinted. We are acquainted with Locker-Lampson's book on Ireland, and show our appreciation of it. Will attend to your suggestion when possible. Thanks for second letter, just to hand.

G. O. WARREN.—Thanks. We hope to publish soon.

ALAN HANDSACRE.—MSS. to hand. Thanks.

C. W. PEACHEY.—We are obliged for suggestion and offer, but the present is not a good time for innovations of the kind suggested. And the want of capital is a very serious obstacle.

J. EFFEL.—We wrote several articles on the subject some years ago, under the title of "Freethought and Social Reform," but may return to it and elaborate on some future occasion. Thanks for MSS.

C. HARPUR.—We are obliged for quotations, which may prove useful.

E. B.—We greatly value your warm appreciation of our "Special" in last week's issue. We quite believe it will have the effect you indicate.

J. J. O.—Next week.

T. WILMOT.—There is only one form of disestablishment that will be really effective, that is to disestablish religion in the minds of the people.

R. STUBBS.—We quite appreciate your position. Still, a line has to be drawn somewhere, and there are considerations which made it imperative to draw the line as suggested.

E. M.—We are proud of the support on this question of so old a Freethinker as yourself. The decision was not reached without much consideration, and we are gratified to find it so generally endorsed.

A. JOHNSON.—Leaflets and paper sent. Hope you will be able to induce the Nuneaton Freethinkers to organize and set to work. The time is ripe for the effort.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The fight with the L.C.C. has advanced a further stage, as will be seen from the following report from the Star of July 23:—

> In the King's Bench Divisional Court, before the Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Ridley, and Mr. Justice Atkin, Mr. Macmorran, K.C., was granted, on behalf of Mrs. Linda Corrie, a rule nisi for a mandamus to be directed to the L.C.C., calling upon them to hear and determine an application for consent to sell a pamphlet in their parks on behalf of the National League of the Blind.
> Counsel said that Mrs. Corrie (who was London Secretary for the West London Branch of the League) had applied for permission to sell the pamphlet, but she had been informed that no more permits for the sale of literature would be granted.
> He was not raising any question as to the validity of the by-law, but he contended that the Council, having discretion to grant the consent, must exercise it in particular cases, and not fetter it by general rules.
> The Lord Chief Justice said as it was a matter of public interest the rule would be granted, in order that the question might be argued.

We do not think the L.C.C. will find the destruction of a public privilege quite so easy a thing as it anticipated.

There is a fairly brisk demand for the new propagandist leaflet by Mr. Cohen on The Massacre of the Innocents, and we have no doubt it is doing all the good anticipated. While the air-raids are in all minds the leaflet is certain to arouse interest, and it is by such means that the attention of many may be directed to the whole question of Freethought. Six Shillings, with sixpence to cover cost of carriage, will bring a thousand copies to anyone's door, and a deal of effective propaganda may thus be done in a quiet way at small cost.

The letter from the Secretary of the Manchester Branch, which appears in another column, reminds us it is time that all N. S. S. Branches were considering their programme for the coming autumn and winter. It is no use leaving arrangements until the autumn is here, and within the next month matters should be well advanced. We may repeat what we have said many times before, namely, that the present is the best time for our work that has presented itself for many years. The War has given the Churches a severe shaking, and it will be our own fault if we fail to take advantage of our opportunities. We offer the above advice specifically to Branches of the N. S. S., but there are many towns in which no Branch exists, where a few Freethinkers could set the work going. And in all cases whatever assistance is possible will be given from headquarters.

We are pleased to learn that Mr. Percy Wild's lectures at Sheffield on July 15 and 22 met with a gratifying success. The audiences were attentive, and there was a good demand for N. S. S. membership forms, which will, we hope, result in a strengthening of the local Branch. The secretary is Mr. T. Dennis, 38 Gifford Road, Heeley, and he will be pleased to answer all inquiries that may be addressed to him. The lecturer to-day is Mr. J. Grimes, and next week Mr. Wallis, of Birmingham, will speak. All these meetings are being held under the auspices of the N. S. S.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd is spending a brief holiday in North Wales, not very far from the place of his birth, and all our readers will be glad to learn that he is reaping much benefit from the rest and change. He will return quite prepared to plunge into the autumn lecturing with all his old vigour, and we hope that Freethinkers all over the country will see that his energies are fully employed. To leave any of his dates unfilled is as wasteful as a manufacturer keeping a valuable plant idle.

Is Religion Growing or Decaying? is the question asked by Mr. F. J. Gould in a just published pamphlet (Watts & Co., price 2d.). By making "the idea of society the soul of religion," and the service of humanity its end, Mr. Gould is able to answer the question in the affirmative. And in that sense, much as we dislike the use of the word, we agree with him. The sense of human kinship expands and strengthens in spite of the War, and as Mr. Gould points out, the efforts being made to forsee our social requirements and provide for a better social condition when the War is over are hopeful signs. Mr. Gould's pamphlet is, in the main, an appeal to all who can to help in the great work of organizing society on a basis of fellowship and service. And in that we wish him every success.

Science, Telepathy, and Communion with the Dead.

II.

As to the natural tendency to believe in telepathy, it may be regarded as part of the anthropocentric and egocentric view of the universe and its happenings, and as an exemplification of the mystical view of mundane events, both of which are dominant in primitive philosophy, remain conspicuous wherever superstition still has a hold, flourish in pseudo-science and in esoteric cults, and will probably never become wholly obsolete.—Professor J. Jastrow, "Fact and Fable in Psychology," p. 104.

The whole of what is called "modern occultism," including (so-called telepathy), crystal gazing, astrology, and such mysteries, can only be treated reasonably in the way I have mentioned. We ask for a demonstration of the occurrence of the mysterious communications or prophecies, or "raps" or "levitations" or whatever it may be. Lovers of science have never been unwilling to investigate such marvels fairly and squarely brought before them. In the very few cases which have been submitted in this way to scientific examination, the marvel has been shown to be either childish fraud or a mere conjurer's trick, or else the facts adduced in evidence have proved to be entirely insufficient to support the conclusion that there is anything unusual at work, or beyond the experience of scientific investigators.—Sir Ray Lankester, "Diversions of a Naturalist," p. 363.

MR. MASKELYNE wrote to the Daily Chronicle suggesting that, if there was anything in the nature of thought-transference in the Zancigs' performance, "the whole matter can be settled in five minutes." But this opportunity of establishing their claims was ignored. They would allow Mr. Stead to test their claims anywhere and at any time, but by Mr. Maskelyne or Mr. Stuart Cumberland, never. When the Chronicle published part of their code, and members of the audience began to give correct answers before Madame Zancig could reply, Mr. Zancig publicly admitted from the stage of the Alhambra that "If it were our misfortune to lose our sight and hearing, we should not be able to work,"[1] the bubble of their reputation was pricked. Even Mr. Stead began to hedge, and explained that the Zancigs used Telepathy and a code; the code only being used to relieve the strain on their minds! Which reminds us of Voltaire's observation that incantations and arsenic had been known to destroy flocks of sheep; the arsenic and the code being the only efficacious agents in the respective cases. One of their most mystifying tricks was the ability of Mrs. Zancig to read any passage from any book of which Mr. Zancig had been provided with a similar copy, and upon which passage he had concentrated his mind. At Cambridge they utterly failed at repeating this trick because they were provided with two books which, unlike ordinary books, had unnumbered pages; therefore Mr. Zancig could not convey by code of word or sign the number of the page and passage which he wished Mrs. Zancig to read. The Zancigs were the last public exponents of Telepathy, or thought-transference, pretending to possess supernatural powers.

In 1882 the Society for Psychical Research was founded, with the object of investigating the phenomena of Spiritualism, Hypnotism, and the occult in general. Mr. Frederick Myers, in founding the Society, says that "its primary aim" was "the establishment of thought-transference."[2] The Society has been in existence for thirty-five years, and has conducted an enormous amount of investigation into occult phenomena, the record of which is contained in the twenty-eight yearly volumes published by the Society, each containing, on an average, between 500 and 600 pages—two of them contain 700 pages—to say nothing of a monthly journal published for private circulation among members only. It is to this enormous record that Sir Oliver Lodge is always referring the public for proofs of Telepathy! as if the public possesses access to these volumes; or, if they had, as if they were able to read, analyse, and give a verdict upon such a mass of printed matter! for it is to the average man that Sir Oliver appeals in his lectures, books, and magazine articles. He admits, and deplores, the scepticism and indifference of the scientific world to the reality of Telepathy.

Moreover, if the evidence obtained is so convincing, why is it that the mass of the scientific intellect is not convinced of the possibility of thought-transference? Sir Oliver Lodge attributes this attitude of the scientific world to pure prejudice, and regards himself as a modern Galileo, fighting for the truth against a scientific world blinded by prejudice and dogma.

As we have remarked, there are very few who possess the leisure, capacity, or inclination to sift this mass of material, to say nothing of other records. The late Mr. Frank Podmore, a member of the Society—whose honesty and capacity is recognized by both sides in the dispute—who published many works dealing with the subject, and may be said to have spent his life in seeking for evidence of a continued existence after death, in the end could not decide for or against, and gave a Scotch verdict of "not proven." He committed suicide, but whether through disappointment or for other reasons, is not publicly known. Dr. Ivor Tuckett, another member of the Society, categorically denies the existence of Telepathy, or communication with the dead; as do Sir Ray Lankester and Sir Bryan Donkin, who have not only studied the records, but have taken part in the actual investigations. Either of these gentlemen are the equal of Sir Oliver Lodge in honesty, sincerity, intellectual power, and knowledge of the subject. What is the use, then, of Sir Oliver pretending that the opposition to Telepathy and Survival proceeds from irrational and blind prejudice? As Dr. Ivor Tuckett observes in reply to Professor Barrett: "The fact remains that several of the more critical researchers who have thoroughly examined the evidence have ultimately come to the conclusion that the case for telepathy is completely unproven. Thus Professor Simon Newcombe, first president of the American S.P.R.—Society for Psychical Research—(founded in 1884) expressed his mature opinion twenty-five years later (1909), just before his death, that there was no convincing evidence for Telepathy, and that 'Nothing has been brought out by the researches of the Psychical Society and its able collaborators except what we should expect to find in the ordinary course of nature.'"[3]

Let us examine, in company with Dr. Ivor Tuckett, some of the evidence for Telepathy. The first report on thought-reading submitted to the Society appeared in the first volume of the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research. They deal almost entirely with the thought-reading power of the children of the Rev. A. M. Creery. An account by Messrs. Barrett, Gurney, and Myers also appeared in the Nineteenth Century for June, 1882, and was severely criticized in the July number by Sir Bryan Donkin, "who pointed out that no real precautions against collusion were taken, that the experiments were of the sloppiest description, and that it was a most suspicious circumstance that the Rev. A. M. Creery's servant girl possessed the same power of thought-reading as the Creery children. Instances of the probable use of a code were also given."[2] Professor Sidgwick, the first President of the S.P.R., was so impressed by the record of these experiments that he considered them conclusive; but after two or three more reports on the Creery children had been published, the children were actually detected using a code, and further experiments abandoned. The next case of thought-reading investigated also occurred in 1882. This was the case of Mr. Blackburh, of Brighton, who claimed to have obtained some remarkable results in Telepathy with a Mr. G. A. Smith, a young mesmerist living at Brighton. The experiments were first carried out at Brighton, and then at a house in Dean's Yard, London. But thirty years later Mr. Blackburn, writing to the Daily News (September 1 and 5, 1911), stated most explicitly that all their successes in thought-transference were worked by means of a code. He was equally candid in stating "that Messrs. Gurney and Myers were too anxious to get corroboration of their theories to hold the balance impartially. Again and again they gave the benefit of the doubt to experiments that were failures. They allowed us to impose our own conditions, accepted without demur our explanations of failure, and, in short, exhibited a complaisance which, however complimentary to us, was scarcely consonant with a strict investigation on behalf of the public." Mr. Blackburn gave as a reason for his "confession" the belated desire to promote the cause of truth, believing himself to be "the sole survivor of that group of experimentalists." But as a matter of fact, Mr. Smith was not dead, and he replied with a categorical denial in the Daily News for September 4, 1911. As Dr. Ivor Tuckett remarks: "It is not possible to decide which of these two statements is the less trustworthy. But Mr. Smith acted as secretary to Messrs. Gurney and Myers for some years subsequent to the Brighton experiments, and took part in several other series of experiments, so that he had a powerful motive against admitting dishonesty in these experiments."[1] On the other hand, what possible motive could induce Mr. Blackburn to declare their success was due to trickery and fraud if the performance was really genuine? He had nothing to gain by such a confession, with the additional ignominy of branding himself as a common impostor.

Some Definitions.

To lay down an exact logical definition is generally admitted to be by no means easy, especially in the case of abstract terms. And this difficulty is not diminished, but rather increased, in the case of those familiar ones in every day use—such as Religion, Morality, Justice, and the like—the meanings of which are supposed to be so well understood.

Yet, even though in such cases, strict logical accuracy may be difficult or impossible of attainment, an attempt at definition may sometimes be of use in helping towards a fuller comprehension of the thing defined; just as, even in the usually exact relations of mathematics, a method of "approximation" is sometimes of the greatest value. Hence I venture to put forward the following definitions:—

(1). Superstition is a belief in supernatural agency operating in the physical world.

(2). Religion is a belief in supernatural agency operating in the moral world.

Here the elements common to the two things defined, and the elements in which they stand in contrast are clearly distinguishable. What Superstition and Religion possess in common is a belief in supernatural agency, while the contrast between them relates to the scope and nature of the function assigned to that agency. And this relationship between Superstition and Religion is quite in accord with the results of actual investigation into their origin and growth.

The earliest forms of Superstition, viz., Nature-Worship, Animism, and Magic, contained no moral elements. They were and are merely the beliefs of primitive and savage man in supernatural agencies—usually malevolent agencies—exercised in the physical world around him. Indeed, the terms Nature-"Worship," Fetish-"Worship" are not quite correct as applied to these forms of superstitious belief, for it is strongly presumable that no feeling really akin to what we understand as "worship" ever existed among primitive men in connection with the mysterious forces or powers in which they believed. Primitive man probably did—as contemporary savages now do—fear these mysterious powers with a very real dread. They probably propitiated them with gifts, cajoled them with promises, and even threatened them with forfeiture of their allegiance as present day savages do: but there is no evidence of those feelings of veneration, worship, or devotion which form the moral element in religion. These powers and forces are merely regarded as more or less potent, more or less amenable to control, more or less fearsome, malignant, or favourable; but they are not regarded as "good" or "bad," or credited with any propensity towards approving or disapproving of human actions according as such actions are "right" or "wrong." And this is only natural, for at this early stage of human culture definite notions of right and wrong are themselves non-existent.

But while these moral ideas are being evolved, as man gradually becomes a consciously moral being, his supernatural beliefs take on a moral quality, and superstition passes into religion. This change is broadly contemporaneous with the transition from Animism to Ghost-Worship, and it is easy to see why this should be so. The spirits of the dead are human spirits, and as such they naturally share in the moral sentiments of the human community to which they belonged in life, and their morality develops with the development of the social sentiments of the community. The spirit of a father or mother would be treated with the same degree of deference or affection that was accorded to the living parent. The deified ghost of the great chief who had, during his lifetime, done much for the welfare of the tribe—had rewarded the deserving and punished the evil-doer, would still be credited with these moral qualities together with that superior power of reward and punishment which ghosts always possess over that of living men.

Thus, while Nature Worship and Animism may be regarded as the basis of superstition, Ancestor-Worship or Ghost-Worship may be regarded as the basis of religion. Of course, it is not claimed that there is a sharp line of demarcation between the two, or that superstition and religion have developed in strictly serial order, for they are often found existing side by side in the same system of supernatural beliefs. There have been many contemporary developments, many intermixtures between the two, many overlaps of one by the other. It is only in the latest developments of belief that religion becomes differentiated from superstition as above defined, and concerns itself essentially with the moral aspect of the supernatural; though even here we see relics of ancient superstitious notions akin to primitive magic in those prayers for rain, fine weather, or good harvests which survive in the liturgies of modern churches. These do not differ essentially from the incantations of the medicine man of a primitive tribe directed against the terrors of a solar eclipse or the baleful influences of a comet.

To complete and further illustrate the line of thought here indicated the two following propositions, which are in close logical relationship with the foregoing definitions, may be laid down :—

(3). Modern Physical Science is based on a recognition of natural causation as operating in the material world.

(4). Modern Ethics is based on a recognition of natural causation as operating in the moral world.

Here, as in the case of the former definitions, the elements common to the subjects of the two propositions are at once distinguishable. Modern science and modern rational ethics both take cognizance of natural causation, and admit no supernatural explanations in the one case or supernatural sanctions in the other. That is why we call our rational ethics scientific. And the points of contrast are equally clear, for while physical science concerns itself soley with material phenomena, ethics concerns itself solely with moral phenomena. The business of science is to distinguish between the true and the false. The business of ethics is to distinguish between the right and the wrong.

Comparisons between the propositions last stated and those previously stated reveal some interesting relationships. For instance, comparing Proposition (3) with Proposition (1), we find that even superstition and science have some common ground, for they both deal with phenomena of the physical world, the difference being that superstition attributes these phenomena to myterious supernatural agencies, while science attributes them to that natural agency—equally mysterious in an ultimate analysis—which we call causation. It may seem a startling assertion that science and superstition can have anything in common, but that this notion is not a merely fanciful one is clearly shown by the investigations of sociologists. The savage's belief in magic is really very much akin to, and quite as strong as, our belief in physical science. Magical rites have to be performed with scrupulous exactness if the desired result is to be achieved. The incantations must be correctly pronounced, the mystic formulæ carefully adhered to. The potent herbs must be gathered at the exact specified phase of the moon, and they must be compounded in the exact specified proportions in a vessel of a particular kind, and so on. If the expected result does not follow, the failure throws no doubt whatever on the reality of the mysterious powers invoked, but is attributed to some error or disability on the part of the magician; as with us, a failure to obtain the expected result in a chemical experiment is put down to some vitiating error in its performance, and not to a failure of the law of causation. In short, magic is the "science" of the savage, albeit a pseudo-science based on false and futile premises.

Again, comparing (2) with (4), we come upon the fundamental distinction between religion and ethics, which is that the first depends on a supernatural and the second on a natural basis for morality—a distinction which can never be got rid of, however "refined" or "spiritual" religion may become. And this consideration naturally brings us to the "Christian morality" fallacy. Christianity can surely claim little credit for having incorporated into its own supernatural system of doctrine certain moral precepts which formed part of the common heritage of civilized humanity before Christianity existed, and for having given them the crudest and most primitive sort of supernatural authority. In the estimation of modern scientific ethics, moral precepts, when based on supernatural sanctions, forfeit their moral value. A true ethic must take account not only of moral precepts but of the grounds on which they are based, and tried by this test "Christian morality" can claim no superiority over that of any other supernatural belief. Rationalists have long been listening to the arrogant assertion that there can be no morality apart from religious belief. They might more justly retort that there can be no true morality with it.

New Testament Legends for Young Readers.

II.—THE SALVATION CHILD.

KETTLE-DRUMS rattled in heaven, and flowers fell from the sky to the earth, and divine spirits sang hymns, and earth was gay with blossoms, and the hills sparkled with gems, and the rivers ran sweet nectar, on the day when the Indian queen Kausalya, bore a son. The day of his birth was so glorious that it was as long as a month; the sun went not down for four weeks. As the child grew its mother saw wonders. One day she saw her son become great and giant-like, and his body was made up of worlds, mountains, rivers, oceans, forests, and she knew he was a God. Then he became a boy again, and ate sweetmeats, and played. The name of the boy was Rama, and all Hindu children love the Gospel (God's spell; God's story) of Rama.[1]

Another Indian queen in those olden days—those olden dreamland days—was Maia. When her time arrived to be a mother, she went into a forest with her ladies, and a curtain was drawn around her, and in this pavilion her child was born. The angels, or "Nats," flew from a thousand worlds to salute the child with flowers and perfumes. Thirty-two wonders happened; and some of the thirty-two were these: a light lit up ten thousand worlds at once; blind people saw; deaf folk heard; lame men walked; prisoners leaped from prison; men and animals felt peace and joy; heavenly music sounded; rain fell on deserts; salt water turned fresh; flowers suddenly bloomed. An old hermit told Maia that in thirty-five years' time her son would become a Teacher of the Law and the Noble Path; and the hermit rejoiced to think of it.

The child was Buddha.

* * * *

A woman walked slowly, leaning on her husband's arm, for she was tired. Evening had fallen, and stars began to gleam.

The wayfarers looked anxiously into a shelter by the roadside. It was more like a cave than an inn, and they could see a crowd of travellers, standing or sitting, eating, drinking, chatting.

There was no room for them in the inn. They turned into the rude and evil-smelling chamber where cattle and asses fed and slept; and Joseph led Mary into the stable, and she lay upon a bench which was littered with hay and other cattle food.

It was now night. The crowd in the inn had become silent in sleep; but Joseph and Mary were awake.

Out in the valley a group of men, rough-clad in skins, watched over flocks of sheep. At times, when the sheep were quietly feeding, the shepherds could draw near together, for a neighbourly gossip.

[1] It is told in F. J. Gould's Divine Archer (published by Dent & Sons).

A blaze of light shone round about them, and a shining man stood before them; and the country fellows were in terror.

"Fear not," said the shining angel, "I bring good news for you and all folk. This very night, in Bethlehem yonder, is born a Saviour—a Christ—the Lord. Run and find him. He lies in a manger."

A great army of shining men suddenly appeared, and they shouted:

"Glory to God in high heaven! Peace to earth! Love to men!"

Then all vanished, and there was naught to be seen in the dim starlight but the dark vale, and the hundreds of sheep.

"Let's go to Bethlehem, mates," the shepherds said.

In mighty haste, they left the meadow. While hurrying past the stable, they saw the glow of a lamp, stopped, entered; and they saw Mary lying on the bench and her babe, wrapped in swaddling clothes, nestled in a hay-box; and Joseph wondered at the coming of the shepherds. Soon they told their tale, and a little mob—some were men from the inn, some were passers-by—gathered in the stable, or at the door, and asked questions, and were much amazed, and looked towards the valley, as if hoping to see the angels. At length the shepherds went back to their flocks thanking God that to them, poor and plain men as they were, the marvellous thing had been told.

Some time later Joseph and Mary took the baby (who was named "Saviour," that is, Jesus), to the city of Jerusalem. They bought a pair of doves from a hawker near the Temple, and took the birds into the sacred House, where they presented the child before the priest, and offered the doves as a fee, or gift. It was the Jewish way of enrolling the little citizen as a member of the Chosen Nation of God.

Joseph and Mary were about to leave the Temple, when a voice exclaimed:

"Master, now your slave may die! I have seen the Salvation! I have seen!"

A very old Jew tottered in, and in his trembling arms lifted the babe and caressed it. So aged was he that the day of death seemed as if it ought to have come long ago. But no! the Master in heaven had held the old man back from the grave until he should see the Salvation Child.

"Master," he cried, "now let your slave die in peace![1] Mine eyes have seen your Salvation. A light for all folk! A light for the Jews! A light to lighten the Gentiles"!

While the old man, whose name was Simeon, was blessing Joseph and Mary, to whom he had handed back the child, a white-haired dame, very, very old—a widow—entered the holy Place, and called aloud her thanks to God, for she also knew this to be the Salvation Child. Her name was Anna.

Twelve quiet years passed after that. Joseph and Mary lived in a small country town, called Nazareth, among the limestone hills of Galilee county or province. Often they talked of the strange scenes of the past—of the shepherds, and old Simeon, and the aged widow Anna. They had other children besides the Salvation Child; and on the seventh day, or Sabbath, of each week the family would go to pray in the wayside chapel, or synagogue, and listen to the stories and hymns which the reader recited from the Hebrew parchment-roll, or Scripture.

At spring-time every year the country-folk tramped, or rode on asses, from their hamlets and villages to Jerusalem city. The town was crowded with the pilgrims. Thousands of bleating lambs were slaughtered, and their blood poured over the Temple altar as a gift to God. The carcases were carried away and cooked, and laid on tables for the Passover Feast. The meat was eaten along with bread and bitter herbs, and cups of red wine were drunk, and old Hebrew songs were sung, such as:

"Oh, give thanks unto Yahweh, for he is good, and his mercy endures for ever."

The Nazareth family paid their usual visit to the Holy City when Jesus was twelve years old, and, after the feast, they trudged with the noisy crowd along the valley road towards home, not noticing that the Salvation Child was not in the company. At evening, when a halt was called for the night, he was missed, and the troubled parents hurried back to the City. All next day they searched for him in vain—from street to street. On the third day they went to the Temple and were much astonished to hear the boy's voice in the midst of a group of elderly men.

A conversation was going on between the grey-bearded Rabbis, or Teachers, and the country boy from Galilee county. He asked questions—the Rabbis answered, lifting their hands, shrugging their shoulders. They asked him questions, and he, bright faced and quick of tongue, answered. And the folk that stood around said in wonder: "What an intelligent lad!"—"Marvellous!"—"Extraordinary!"

Mary rushed forward and clasped the boy and cried:

"My son! Why have you done this? Your father and I have been looking everywhere for you in sorrow and fear."

"You should not have worried," said the strange boy, "for didn't you know I had to do business for my father?"

Business . . . .

The business of some men is carpentering; of others, sea faring; of others, ploughing; of some, dying for a Cause . . . .

Four small books, or Gospels, at the beginning of the New Testament are known as Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. The legends I have told you of Jesus come from Luke. But in Matthew you can read of the "Three Wise Men from the East," whom we may see painted in many famous pictures. They offer gold and sweet spices to the Holy Child as they kneel before him, and they tell his parents how they have followed a Star all the way from their Eastern home till it paused over the house where "he that is born King of the Jews" is cradled. Such a scene is called by the painters "The Adoration of the Magi," that is, "The Worship of the Wise Men." The Matthew Gospel goes on to say that Herod, King of the Jews, who had heard from the Magi about the wonderful Star and the Royal Child, killed all the babes in Bethlehem so as to be sure of killing the little King. The little King, however, had been carried off by Mary and Joseph into the land of Egypt. The slaying of the babes is known as "The Massacre of the Innocents."

The Romans told a tale that the Council or Senate of the Republic heard say that, in the next year, a child should be born King of the Romans. The Senators were so anxious not to have a King that they resolved to cause the death of all boys born in that year. Nevertheless, one boy was preserved, and he was afterwards Augustus, Emperor of Rome.[1]

National Secular Society.

REPORT OF EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON JUNE 29.

The President, Mr. Chapman Cohen, in the Chair. Also present: Messrs. Brandes, Leat, Palmer, Roger, Samuels, Silverstein, Thurlow, Wood, Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, Mrs. Rolf, and the Secretary.

Minutes read and confirmed.

The chief business before the meeting was the further discussion of the prosecution of J. W. Gott at Birmingham.

Mr. Cohen gave a detailed account of his visit to that town, where he had interviewed Mr. Gott and the solicitor who had been engaged to appear for him at the Police Court hearing, and whose suggested line of defence Mr. Gott had accepted. The result of the hearing was that the case had been committed for trial at the Assizes opening on July 10, the charge being one of blasphemy.

A long and exhaustive discussion took place on blasphemy prosecutions, and in what circumstances a defence could be made.

The points both for and against a defence in the present instance were carefully weighed, and the following resolution was moved and carried unanimously:—

> That this Executive having carefully considered the question of the Birmingham Blasphemy Prosecution, regrets that it cannot see its way to further action without prejudice to the cause of Freethought and to the ultimate repeal of the Blasphemy Laws.

It was further resolved that Mr. Cohen, as President of the N. S. S., be asked to draw up a statement for insertion in the Freethinker as to the Executive's attitude on this matter at a later date.

The Secretary reported the result of the adjourned summons against Mr. Jas. Neate at the instance of the London County Council. This case had been defended by the Protest Committee, who paid the fine, amounting to £3 without costs, and were now taking legal advice as to future action.

Mr. Cohen, at the Executive's request, gave permission for the reprinting of his article on "The Massacre of the Innocents" as a propagandist tract, and it was resolved that this be issued as soon as possible.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

The Psalm of Life.

(New Version.)

TELL me not in mournful numbers,
Hell is but an empty dream;
Though the congregation slumbers,
Things are better than they seem.

Hell is real, hell is earnest,
Hell is never short of coals,
Hell's delights are of the sternest,
Cursing God and frying souls.

In the world's great field of prattle
Bogey tales are always rife,
Sounding like a baby's rattle
From the nursery of life.

Tales mayhap some pious mother
Heard from granny, who again,
Heard them from her dotty brother
(Shall these tales be told in vain)?

Pious sinners all remind us
We may yet be doing time,
With the wrath of God behind us,
Nosing out our secret crime.

Let us then be up and doing,
E'en to-night may fix our fate,
And to-morrow find us stewing
Over hell's infernal grate.

Three Years of War.

The War that was to end all wars, but which shows a tragic incapacity to end even itself, the War which the Bishop of London hailed as inaugurating a "Day of God," and others as initiating a great moral regeneration, reaches this week its third anniversary. The occasion is to be commemorated—one paper said "celebrated"—by special services in the Churches, and a form of prayer has been "issued by authority" for use. The order sets forth that every minister "shall speak to his people in these or like words," so that there will be at least unity in the message. The document is exactly what one would expect, and I have no doubt that German Christians will "celebrate" the anniversary in much the same way by saying the same things. The form of prayer recounts that we are fighting in defence of our country, for self-preservation, and against aggression. We are fighting for truth, for justice, for decency. We thank God for the unity that prevails, we dedicate ourselves anew to the task, we salute the dead, and we resolve "in his Name" their sacrifice shall not be in vain. In Germany, Christians will be saying the same thing to the same God, and if he does not keep their prayers labelled and separate, there will be some danger of getting his response, if he gives one, wrongly directed. The Christian Churches could do nothing to mitigate its barbarities once war had commenced, they can do nothing to bring it to a close. All they can do in all countries is to encourage the War in its continuance, and to provide a religious sanction for all that occurs. These are things worth bearing in mind while we are "celebrating" this third anniversary.

The Record of the Churches.

Nothing has been more remarkable than the conduct of the Churches during these three years of War. And what they have done has been hardly less remarkable than the things they have left undone. During the War bread has doubled in price, and human life has grown cheaper and cheaper. The Churches have been silent about the cost of bread, and vocal in reconciling the nation to the loss of life. Profiteers have made their millions, wrung out of the necessities of the nation, and the Churches have talked about the spirit of sacrifice and the nobility of our ideals, but have said never a word against this systematic exploitation. The Government has closed our mouths and opened our letters. The Churches have said nothing. We have had a muzzled press and a strangulated platform. The Churches have been eloquent on our fight for liberty abroad, but have said nothing about our loss of liberty at home. When the War opened and they might have stood as the representatives of those ideals of justice and brotherhood which are so easily obscured when men's passions are roused, the clergy became so many recruiting officers. When the Conscription Bill was before the country the clergy were its ardent advocates, while claiming exemption for their own order. In justice to them it should be said that their objection to military service did not mean a refusal to serve as chaplains, with a military rank, a military uniform, and a good salary. And now, after four years of War, they are commemorating, or "celebrating" the anniversary which, in itself, constitutes an unanswerable indictment of the value of the whole Christian Church. For the clergy to say now that they kneel before God with a clear conscience would be amusing if the comedy was not overshadowed by the tragedy. It was reported in the papers some months ago that a letter found on the dead body of a German soldier suggested the closing of all the Churches until after the War. That letter showed a greater sense of decency than has been displayed by any of the clergy in this country.

Dispelling Illusions.

Three years of war may be said to have at least dispelled some of the illusions bred by it and by previous wars. We hear little now of the claim that this is a War to end war. War settles nothing—not even itself. The Briton who sprays the advancing Germans with a stream of boiling oil is not of necessity a better man than those he destroys; the German who lets free a cloud of poison-gas is not of necessity a better man than the British soldier who suffers from its effects. The consequence of war, we said three years ago, is progressive brutalization; and every month since has enforced the truth of that statement. Jets of flame, boiling oil, gas clouds, poisonous shells, air-raids on women and children, stories on the German side that the English kill all prisoners, stories on the English side that the Germans boil down their dead and use the product for making margarine, this War between Christian nations has equalled in ferocity anything the world has ever seen, and on all sides it has received whatever sanctification the Churches could bestow. So, also, one hears less of the talk that Germany must be "crushed" and kept in perpetual subjection afterwards. A nation of seventy millions cannot be kept in subjection, even supposing that there was anything to guarantee perpetual agreement amongst the Allies themselves. If the peace of the world is to be attained, and preserved, it can only be done by an agreement between the peoples of the world. Not an agreement, be it noted, between one group of nations to keep another group of nations down, but an agreement to which all nations shall be consenting parties, with a further relinquishing of those conditions that make friction almost a certainty.

War and the Prize Ring.

It was Mr. Lloyd George—who, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, said the War would be won by the "silver bullet"; an opinion changed to that of the War being won by mnnitions when he was Minister of Munitions; to be further changed to that of the War being won by men when he was Minister for War—who said that the War must be fought to a "knock-out." No one quite knew what he meant, but some complained that he was degrading war to the level of the prize ring. It seems to us that he was degrading the prize ring to the level of war. For the prize ring does aim at a fight under equal conditions. The men are matched with a view to something like equality in weight and knowledge. They do not lie about each other before the fight, or during the fight, or after the fight. You do not, in the prize ring, set two men to fight one, or a man with one arm to meet a man with two. You do not get a man down and jump on him till he cries "Enough." In war you do all these things—if you can. If you can bring ten guns to one you do it. If you can bring a hundred men to one you do it. If you can surprise your enemy and kill him before he is aware of your presence, you do it. The prize-fighter is not in the ring to prove that he is the better man—only that he is the better fighter. Victory in war does not even prove that. It may only prove that you have more money, or more men, or more machines, or more deadly chemicals. In Westminster Abbey the Archbishop of Canterbury is to preach before the King, to bring home more fully to the people that we are at war. We wish the people of the world realized more fully that we were at war, and all that war means. If, instead of the spectacular side which is so carefully kept before the people, we could bring home to them the dirt, the disease, the men driven insane or made nervous wrecks by the conditions of modern war, then, indeed, we should have taken a long step towards ending war. For war is always a question of psychology; other things are subordinate. It lives on illusion, and the quickest way to end it is to kill the illusion from which it draws its being.

An Evil Record.

Three years of slaughter, and all that the Churches have to contribute towards its cessation is a commemoration, which will give the platitudes and ambiguities of politicians the covering of sonorous religious verbiage. Or, as an addendum, the Churches ask for a "A Day of Humiliation." Day of humiliation, forsooth! And for the nation! Truly if anyone should adopt an attitude of humiliation it is the Churches themselves. It is they who have been in a position, had they possessed the wisdom or the inclination, to have made this War an impossibility. No other single organization has been in so commanding a position during the centuries to have achieved this. And the measure of their sin is the measure of their opportunity. In not a single country now at War can Christianity be said to have acted as a restraining force in preserving peace. In not a single country are the Churches acting as a force that makes for the recovery of peace. They can do nothing, they will do nothing, but play to the passions of the moment, careless what may be their nature, so long as it promises an immediate gain.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Christianity and the Miraculous.

CHRISTIANITY is pre-eminently a religion founded upon miracles; and in the Christian sense miracles signify supernatural interventions in the order of nature. The Gospel Jesus is himself a unique being brought into existence by a stupendous miracle. Some divines who reject the miracles which Jesus is reported to have performed during his earthly life still retain the belief in his own miraculous personality, ignoring the absurdity of the notion that a supernatural being could go through life without giving any exhibition of his supernatural qualities. Even "Ignotus," in his interesting article on miracles in the Manchester City News for July 14, says that "a man who disbelieved in the miracles ascribed to Jesus Christ, and called them by another name, would not thereby in the slightest degree impugne his Divine character"; but that liberal-minded writer, surely, forgets that to believe in the "Divine character" necessitates belief in the greatest of all miracles, namely, the Incarnation. It is wholly inconceivable to us how a man of the superior intelligence undoubtedly displayed by "Ignotus," could bring himself to write the following passage:—

> He would not be Divine simply because he did supernatural deeds, nor does he forfeit his Divinity if he did not perform them. Divinity was manifested in perfection of life, good works, holy teaching, supreme example. If not a single miracle had been recorded these proofs would remain. As it is, the miracles are only attributed to him during the last three years of his life (between the ages of thirty and thirty-three); yet he was Divine from the first—it was not the miracles at the end of his career that made him so.

Here "Ignotus" goes astray on a plain matter-of-fact. It is perfectly true that the miracles recorded in the Four Canonical Gospels are only attributed to Jesus during the last three years of his life, but he must know, as well as we do, that there were numerous Gospels written which did not find their way into the Canon, and that in these he is said to have done supernatural deeds even from earliest childhood. Now, the performance of such deeds would prove that the doer possessed supernatural gifts, if not that he is a supernatural being. Ordinary human beings cannot accomplish miraculous work; and if Jesus did accomplish such work, it shows either that he was a super-human being, or had been entrusted with super-human endowments. We completely fail to see, therefore, what "Ignotus" gains by giving up the miraculous deeds while holding on to the miraculous person. There is certainly the closest connection possible between the miracles and the Divinity of Jesus Christ; and it is difficult to realize what advantage there is in dismissing the former while retaining the latter.

Matthew Arnold was much more consistent than "Ignotus" appears to be. The former, while entirely discarding the proof from miracles, was logical and honest enough to include the Incarnation among such miracles. "The Guardian," he says, in the preface to the popular edition of Literature and Dogma, "proclaims 'the miracle of the Incarnation' to be 'the fundamental truth' for Christians," but, "insisting on 'the miracle of the Incarnation,' the Guardian insists on just that side of Christianity which is perishing." But "Ignotus" denies the miracles which Jesus did, and reaffirms his faith in the miracle which Jesus is. If we could believe the latter we would experience no difficulty whatever in accepting the former. "Ignotus" states that, so far as he can judge, "the whole case for or against miracles must be decided on one consummate act—the raising of Lazarus from the dead."

> If this deed were done it was incontestably a miracle, and the case is proved.

Digitized by Google

For various reasons our critic does not believe that Lazarus was raised from the dead. Now, on the assumption that Jesus was Divine, we can discover no valid justification for rejecting this consummate miracle. To a Divine Being nothing could be easier than to abolish death and bring life and immortality to light. And yet "Ignotus" is convinced that this deed of restoration to life is a legend, because it is recorded only in the Fourth Gospel, while the others contain no allusion to it at all; because Jesus asserted that Lazarus was not dead but simply asleep; and because such a deed would not have been "quite fair to the rest of the world, who also mourned for their departed," but had no hope of their being "restored to them no matter how deep their love or how fervent their prayer." Then he exclaims:—

> No—our sick and suffering can be saved, but the dead never come back. It would be unjust that favour should be shown to one, and that the millions and millions should be deprived of hope.

We heartily congratulate the Manchester City News on its courage in opening its columns to a free discussion of debatable questions, and "Ignotus" upon his highly rational treatment of many theological dogmas. We are in full agreement with him in his bold rejection of miracles, though regretting his retention of the miraculous. It affords us keen pleasure to make the following quotation:—

> If every event recorded as a miracle were really a miracle in the fullest sense of the word, how much the better should we be for it? In what way would the welfare of the world be aided or the progress of men be ensured by the fact that Aaron's rod budded, or that five thousand persons were fed with two loaves and five small fishes? Are we guided in our conduct, is our moral outlook illumined, are our aspirations strengthened by any such circumstances? Is it not better for us to behold universal law everywhere—order, goodness, beneficence, beauty—than to base our faith on temporary and dubious wonders performed in opposition to those recognized laws which govern the created world and all that therein is?

"Ignotus" assures us that he is "as much obliged to those who oppose and criticize as to those who concur." We have the honour to belong to both classes at one and the same time. Completely endorsing his rejection of the doctrine of supernatural infractions of the natural order, we venture to criticize his defence of the reality of a supernatural world, or of the government of the world by a Supernatural Being. If we are living under inexorable laws which apply everywhere, what room or need is there for an Omniscient Ruler? Nay, more, what evidence can be adduced that the Almighty described in the Bible exists at all? Is there at the present moment any sign of the activity of an infinitely just and holy One who "doeth according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth"? We are at one with Archbishop Trench's saying that it "would be better to abandon the Christian religion altogether than not to believe in the miracle as a supernatural event." We have acted on that principle; we have abandoned Christianity because its claim to possess and exercise supernatural power has been totally falsified by the events of history. "Ignotus" pertinently asks how much better would the world be if all recorded miracles actually happened; and we beg to suggest that had the world been under the superintendence of supernatural wisdom and goodness, it ought to have been immeasurably juster, holier, and happier than it is to-day. As a matter of fact, Christendom is in no essential sense superior to Heathendom; and there are those among us who sorrowfully admit that the best Mohammedans or Buddhists compare most favourably with the very best Christians. This is a terribly humiliating fact for those who proudly declare that the world's only hope of redemption lies in the triumph of the Christian religion. Do they forget that Christianity once held the Western world in the hollow of its hand, and that those Ages of Faith are known in history as Dark Ages? What, then, has the belief in the Divinity of Jesus Christ done for the uplifting and ennoblement of mankind? What has it done for the peace of the world? What has it done for the enfranchisement of woman? What has it done for the abolition of false divisions and classification, for the establishment of just and fair relations between employers and employees, and for the development of brotherhood and fellowship among all alike?

Supernaturalism, in all its forms, has proved a tragic failure. There are those who pretend to find the cause of the War in the fact that Germany has repudiated Christianity and adopted Paganism. On October 10, 1914, the editor of the Daily News published an article, entitled "The Return of Odin and the Religion of Valour," in which he falsely proclaimed the triumph of Nietzsche and the re-birth of Paganism in Germany; and now Chancellor P. V. Smith "points to the example of Germany as a warning of the danger of not putting religious instruction in a prominent place in any national system of education." Both Mr. Gardiner and Chancellor Smith entirely misrepresent the attitude of Germany to Christianity. Nothing can be more thoroughly attested than the facts that Germany is a distinctively Christian country, and that "religious instruction is a compulsory subject in all German schools," the object being "to bring up young people in the knowledge of God's Word, to instruct them in Holy Scripture, and to train them so that they may set a good example,' may share in the religious work of the community to which they belong, and in general may fulfil every pious duty which falls to their lot in life." The Church of England is dishonest if it points to the example of Germany as a warning against the perils of secular education. The truth is that in Germany, as well as in Great Britain, supernatural religion is a source of weakness, and not of strength, and has been absolutely powerless either to prevent or to put an end to the War.

J. T. Lloyd.

The Clerical Caste.

> The services of the clergy are imaginary, and their payment should be of the same description.—G. W. Foote.
> Stuffing the ears of men with false reports.—Shakespeare.

There are about fifty thousand men, each bearing the title of "reverend," who are exempted from military service, and who form a caste apart from their fellows. Who are they? What do they do to entitle them to be revered? In what way are they superior to other men who are simple "misters"? These are questions which, in this crisis in the world's affairs, are worth the consideration of democratic minds.

It may be contended that this reverence is paid to these men because they have chosen as their business the supervision and direction of the religious habits of the English people. In reality they are medicine-men engaged in similar work to their coloured prototypes in savage nations. They tell us of gods who get angry with us; of a Devil who must be guarded against; of angels who fly from heaven to earth; of saints who can assist if supplicated. Nearly fifty thousand gentlemen are engaged in this business, to say nothing of their assistants and satellites. And this in England alone. If we include Continental countries and America, there are hundreds of thousands of them, maintained at the cost of hundreds of millions a year. And their profession is as honest as fortune-telling. Many a poor old woman has been sent to prison for taking money from a servant-girl, after promising her a handsome husband and six fine children; but these ministers are allowed to take large sums of money for promises of good fortune in the "beautiful land above."

Everyone knows that the average "reverend" enjoys a comfortable livelihood, and lives in a nice house. He has just as much, or as little, work as he likes to do, and if he likes to spend three-fourths of each day reading or visiting, there is no one to say him nay. He can count on invitations to dinner and other hospitality all the year round, which is no small saving in the household expenses. And the higher ecclesiastics do better still. Thirty-nine archbishops and bishops share £180,700 yearly, and the bachelor Bishop of London enjoys a salary of £300 weekly, a sum sufficient to keep fifty ordinary families in comfort.

Seeing that little merit attaches to the clerical profession, are we to assume that reverence is due to the exemplary lives led by those belonging to this favoured class of the community? Divorce Court proceedings and Police Court records show that the clerical character in no wise differs from any other class. They may retort that there are black sheep in every fold. True, but people who are not professional religionists do not pretend to being a class apart. They do not ask to be known as "reverend," or by any other title implying special respect. It is because the ministers of Church and Dissent expect us to look up to them that we are compelled to compare their behaviour with their boastings. When they decide to come down from their sacred pedestals we will make the same allowance for them that we make for tinkers and tailors.

It appears, also, that these clergy, who are too proud to fight for their country, are many of them perjurers. They subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion. These articles include the belief that Christ went down bodily to "hell"; that a spirit can be at the same time a father and a son, and also proceed from itself as a ghost; that Adam was the father of the human race, and that he ate forbidden fruit, in consequence of which countless generations are condemned to eternal punishment; that Roman Catholic doctrine is a vain invention; that the Bible is the Word of God; and that the monarch is the head of the Church. To these Articles of Faith, among others, every Church of England minister subscribes. And we know that numbers of them do not believe in them, or observe them; and that their main reasons for remaining in the Church are "purple, palaces, patronage, profit, and power," as a former canon of St. Paul's Cathedral expresses it. And the right to appoint clergymen to benefices is sold for money in the open market, as if it were so much coal or a quack remedy.

We are told from countless pulpits that, when the world-war is over, the national religion is to be different from what we have known before. There is room for more drastic alteration than the discarding of barbaric Biblical passages from the Prayer Book. The votes of the bishops in the House of Lords is sufficient to rouse the lasting hostility of all right-thinking persons, and their shameful opposition to all progress shows how hopelessly the Church of Christ is out of touch with democratic aspirations. The bishops voted against admitting Nonconformists to University degrees, and against removing the civil disabilities of Roman Catholics, Jews, and Rationalists. They opposed the introduction of free education, and voted against admitting women as members of London Borough Councils. None voted for the abolition of flogging women in public, beating women in prison, and the use of the lash in the Army and Navy. Scores of measures for the bettering of the conditions of the working classes have been opposed by these ecclesiastics, and their record carries its own condemnation.

Few worse misfortunes can befall a people than this of possessing a powerful caste in its midst that saps the very springs of morality, that permits mental confusion, and that hinders the wheels of progress. The word "reverend" is pure humbug. To apply it to the common parson, or to the purse-proud prelate, is as absurd as to apply the terms "All Highest" or "Imperial Majesty" to the pious decadent who controls the destinies of the German people.

The Rise and Progress of Mental Power.

In ancient, mediæval, and modern times the more reflective members of the several civilized communities have manifested considerable interest in the subtle problem of human psychology. But it is only in quite recent generations that this subject has been approached from the comparative point of view. With the advances of biological investigation, and, above all, in those departments of physiology which study the functions of the brain and nervous system, distinct progress has been made. The bright light thrown on mental processes as displayed alike by man and the lower animals through the revolutionary researches of Darwin and Spencer, has transformed the concepts of modern naturalists.

The doctrine of evolution not merely embraces the bodily development but also the mental progress of all animal existence. It is now recognized that in order to comprehend the complex workings of human mentality it is essential to study the simpler psychical processes of the lowlier modes of life. It is likewise realized that as man has inherited his anatomical and physiological characteristics from inferior forms of life, so has he derived the foundations of his highest mental capacities from less evolved ancestors.

To-day, in strictly scientific circles, the comparative method reigns supreme in all inquiry pursued for the purpose of elucidating the difficulties which surround the psychological domain. And logically so. For if we were to imagine some intelligent creature steeped in complete ignorance of all the complex causes which condition the motion of a modern Atlantic liner, and were this creature divorced from all knowledge of the multitudinous phenomena which have contributed to the evolution of this huge vessel, and then witnessed the passage of the steamer over the sea, an element in which, during all his previous experience, heavy bodies speedily sank; when we picture this creature's utter inability to proffer any rational explanation of the liner, we may form some conception of the impenetrable mystery which the intellect of a Shakespeare presented to the metaphysicians and pre-evolutionary philosophers, who were denied all understanding of the principles of mental development.

We may fairly claim that the emergence of mind may be traced, step by step, from the simplest beginnings. Herbert Spencer laid the firm foundations of a scientific psychology in a monumental work, his world-celebrated Principles. Taine, Ribot, Maudsley, Romanes, and other thinkers erected on these foundations a structure which has been materially strengthened by subsequent study, and which all later criticism has failed to shake.

At the outset of our inquiry we must guard ourselves against the danger of projecting our own involved subjective states into our reading of the simpler nerve processes of lowly creatures. Buechner and sundry other students and observers of animal psychology were, without question, much too anthropomorphic in their outlook. Other investigators, biased by the earlier tradition of animal automatism have rushed to the opposite extreme. Our knowledge of surrounding bodies may be regarded as objective, and this knowledge can be subjected to the most rigid tests. But in the case of mental phenomena as displayed by inferior or even superior creatures we are compelled to project our own psychical states upon the nervous activities of organisms placed under observation. Professor Clifford coined the useful term "eject" to designate this circumstance. The observer, therefore, becomes the subject, the animal observed the object, while the mental manifestations of the organism observed become the eject.

Outside the realm of living things there exists not the faintest evidence of the presence of mind. That a dim form of feeling occurs in the plant kingdom appears probable, but the clearest and most unmistakable evidences of sensation are encountered in the animal domain. And in tracing the advance of intelligence from its rudest beginnings no other method, save the comparative, is available. As Romanes contends in his Mental Evolution in Animals:—

> Common sense.....universally feels that analogy is here a safer guide to truth than the sceptical demand for impossible evidence; so that if the objective existence of other organisms and their activities is granted —without which postulate comparative psychology, like all the other sciences, would be an unsubstantial dream —common sense will always and without question conclude that the activities of organisms other than our own, when analogous to those activities of our own which we know to be accompanied by certain mental states, are in them accompanied by analogous mental states.

Possibly the protoplasm of plants forms the seat of a faint perception of differences in light, shade, and temperature. And in the animal world nerve tissue—a substance that chiefly consists of a variety of protoplasm—is invariably associated with mental processes. This wonderful nerve substance serves as a channel of communication between the organism endowed with it and the external world. From the jelly fish up to man this nerve material is found, and whether it occur in man or dog, medusa or snail, bird or bee, its fundamental structure is the same. When examined under high microscopical powers it is seen to be constituted of fibres and vesicles.

From the nerve vesicles or cells nerve fibres proceed, and these fibres link up the cells with one another, and this arrangement extends to the furthest limits of the animal body. The fibres possess the property of conveying stimuli to and from the nerve cells, while the cells themselves are instrumental in generating those impressions which are transmitted along the fibres outwards. Those stimuli that are conducted by the fibres inwards to the cells are set in motion by impressions influencing the nerve fibre at any part of its length, whether these take the form of mechanical pressure, thermal stimuli, impressions produced by irritants, electrical stimuli, or the passing of molecular disturbances from one nerve-fibre to another along their lines of communication.

Nerve cells are commonly arranged in bundles which are termed ganglia, to and from which numerous nerve-fibres arrive and depart. These cord-like clusters of nerve strings are the white filaments known as nerves in the dissecting room. Reflex acts depend upon this relation of the groups of fibres to the bunches of cells or ganglia. These automatic movements have been studied with great care in jelly fish, probably the lowest animals endowed with a nervous system. In these organisms the neural system is, as we should expect, extremely rudimentary, and when the nerves are stimulated the animal automatically responds to the stimulus. For we learn from an original investigator that with these creatures—

> "the simple ganglia are distributed all round the margin of the animal, and respond by reflex action to the stimuli which are applied at any other part of the surface. This has the effect of increasing the rate and the strength of the swimming movements, and so of enabling the animal to escape from the source of danger.

In this phenomenon there appears no element of choice, for the arrangement of a jelly fish's ganglia and nerves is such that when irritated by any outside influence the animal has no alternative but to move away.

> For the anatomical plan of a jelly fish is so simple, that all the muscular tissue in the body is spread out in the form of one continuous sheet; so that the only function which the marginal ganglia have to perform when they are stimulated into reflex action, is that of throwing into contraction one continuous sheet of muscular tissue.

We are thus entitled to assume that the genesis of mind arises from an automatic discharge of nervous energy from nerve-cells when these are disturbed by a stimulus conveyed to them through their nerve fibres. As organisms ascend to a higher stage of organization, separate muscles are gradually evolved for the performance of different actions, and nerve-centres likewise become more and more specialized to govern these different activities. Hence such specialized nervous centres are capable of responding only to those stimuli that are carried along their own peculiar communicating structures or nerves. In animals, like the star fish, organisms slightly above the jelly fish in structure and function, there appears a more elaborately evolved system of muscles and nerves. And as we climb the zoological ladder, we discover that the principle of the division of neuro-muscular labour slowly increases in structural and functional complexity.

Herbert Spencer's theory of the genesis of nerves still remains the best. The physical basis of life is protoplasm, and when this substance first assumed the living state, some parts of its single-celled forms became more exposed to external impressions than others. Some surface areas were liable to be habitually stimulated by different forces to those experienced by others. Now, those surface areas most frequently influenced by given impacts tended to respond more and more readily to the influences thus conditioned. In this way were initiated and developed those channels of communication in the unstable and sensitive protoplasm which offered the smallest resistance to the influences of external forces. Spencer vividly illustrates his doctrine somewhat as follows:—

> Much as a river constantly broadens and deepens its channel, so molecular waves always flowing in the same tissue tracts are perpetually engaged in excavating more and more definite paths for their passage. When completed, such a line of communication becomes a nerve-fibre, a structure that has been evolved out of a "line of discharge."

And it is certainly noteworthy in this connection that embryological research has established the fact that the sense organs of the higher animals all arise from the skin.

The Way of Peace.

THIS is the name of a most remarkable book by the late Mr. H. Fielding-Hall, the author of that famous book, The Soul of a People, published some years ago, and in this new work he diagnoses with unerring instinct the present deplorable condition of English society, and points out the true remedies for its restoration to health and happiness.

In chapter ii., aptly entitled "Mother Earth," he describes in plain and simple language the natural connection between the soil and its inhabitants, any disturbance of which must destroy the community, as thus :—

> Not only is a community an outcome of the land, but its health, its efficiency, its freedom, its laws and conventions, its whole organism, in fact, is based on the land.

He shows how our present disastrous system of land tenure originated with Magna Charta which, he says, "was not the beginning of the liberties of the English people, but the end of them."

In chapter iii. the condition of society, in the spacious days of good Queen Bess, is vividly depicted; then we come to the sad story of the decadence consequent on the fencing in of the communal land, and the fastening of the grip of the lord of the soil which has destroyed all the natural sense of community among the people.

The numbing effect of religious superstition does not escape the scathing criticism of this keen student of human nature, as thus :—

> The base idea of every religion, Christian or other, is that nature and humanity are evil and that life is not worth living. Religions differ only in method, and never in their fundamental conceptions. However they may try to hide it by professing that God made the world, their real certainty is that "the world, the flesh and the devil" are one; however they may profess to be animated by hope, their attitude to life here and now is one of despair. Nothing can be made of life on earth because its very essence is evil and "everyone is conceived and born in sin."
> Consequently, no religion has any ethics founded on a knowledge of life, its realities and needs, and designed to secure further and freer and happier life here. We hear a good deal about Christian ethics, but in fact they have never existed in theory.....
> Is the New Testament any better? There are a great many delicate and beautiful sayings; are they a true guide to life? They touch the emotions; do they touch the intelligence? Is it good to forgive your enemies as long as they are your enemies and try to hurt you? Is it good to give a robber your cloak as well as the coat he stole, and so encourage crime?
> Every virtue is only a virtue in the right place, and in the wrong place it is a vice. The Christian virtues are no exception. To be loyal and obedient to bad rulers and teachers, to be meek instead of redressing wrongs, to love where you ought to hate, to believe what is not true, are not virtues.
> Is not the whole spirit of the New Testament one of despair towards this life and a hope to escape from it? You cannot make a true morality and devise true institutions to benefit life if you despair of it. And none such have ever been made by religions.
> If you turn from theory to practice, things are no better. Have priests been good guides? They finished the destruction of Roman society which the Empire had begun. They nearly depopulated Europe in the eleventh century. They again ruined the free cities that sprung up later. They nearly strangled England till Thomas Cromwell did away with them for awhile. They talk of love, but their history is one of persecution and massacre, of servility to the rich and those in power, and of hatred to the poor, thinly disguised beneath fine phrases and a demoralizing "charity."

To ensure the full cultivation of the soil, and to revive the sense of community among the people, Mr. Fielding-Hall proposes that every village should have full control, through the village council, of all the land in its near neigbourhood, each villager being allotted as much land as he can productively use, without any fear of disturbance or rent to pay.

Each village, too, must have its own bank, to be managed by the villagers themselves, and thus ensure a cheap and plentiful supply of money to be loaned at a very low rate of interest.

Other chapters are devoted to a discussion of marriage, and a scathing criticism of our judicial system as being better calculated to foster crime than to cure it.

The book fittingly concludes with a chapter entitled "When War will End," which is the best dissection of the real causes of the present world catastrophe that I have yet seen. The sound lesson it conveys is that if the people were freed from the grip of the landlord and the usurer they would enjoy such prosperity in their own country that they would have no desire for annexation of territory; and, therefore, no cause for aggression on other nations.

In chapter xiii., entitled "A Vernal Wood," a delightful picture is given of the village of Sleepy Hollow, in which the author conveys to us his own idea of religion :—

> And so these children, grown into men and women, will make for themselves a new religion, founded not on the nightmares of fanatics or the inventions of priests, but on what they read out of the Book of Life. Their God will be a real God, known as only we can know anyone, by His acts, and no one will need any interpreter for Him.
> One impulse from a vernal wood
> May teach you more of man,
> Of moral evil and of good
> Than all the sages can.

Nothing could be more true than that.

Altogether a splendid book inspired by a keen insight into human nature and its springs of action, which ought to be translated into every language and sent broadcast throughout the world as a wholesome antidote to economic and religious superstitions that now render general prosperity and happiness impossible.

G. O. WARREN.

The Shrine.

WHAT shall we give to the gallant dead
Who have stemmed the crimson tide?
We'll build a shrine in a dreary slum,
And our hearts shall burn with pride.

What shall we give to those who return
From hell—to their native shore?
We'll bid them sail for a foreign clime—
The workhouse will hold no more.

What shall we give to those who have fought
From Ypres to Sulva Bay?
We'll give them a nation's grateful thanks,
For that is the Christian way.

What shall we give to those who are left
To struggle for bread in vain?
We'll give them a shrine that they may pray,
For God can console their pain.

And God, perchance, in heaven will hear,
If a God, indeed, there be;
And feed the starving with heavenly bread,
In this land of liberty.

Acid Drops.

It is a condition of entrance to the Commercial Traveller's Schools that all children shall be taught the Church Catechism, and shall attend the service of the Church of England. The condition is, of course, an indefensible one, but it is strange to find the Christian World claiming that other forms of worship shall be permitted, and asserting that "much harm may be done if the mind of the child is perverted from the faith of its parents." We fail to see where the harm will occur. The child of Nonconformist parents is not likely to receive more injury from being taught Church of England doctrines than it will by being taught any other form of religion. In our opinion every child is harmed who is taught a speculative religious doctrine as demonstrated truth. That point of view does not, of course, appeal to the Christian World. If it did it would claim the freedom of the child from all religious doctrines, its own included. A religion that cannot wait for acceptance is not worth the having.

Some things seem almost too good to be true. For instance, the Kidderminster Shuttle of July 21 has the following, under the heading of "Chaddesley Notes," in the course of a description of proceedings in the Parish Church:—

> The church dedication services were continued on Sunday. Special sermons were preached by the Rev. D'Arcy. He is a very impressive preacher, with a considerable amount of action and a most pleasing intonation of voice. From the many gems in the sermon I heard, I cull the following: "Education, unless subservient to and subjugated to religion, is disastrous to a nation; a curse rather than a blessing. It can be proved up to the hilt by statistics that the only nations that are really religious are those nations that are absolutely ignorant."

The italics are ours.

The Liverpool Echo reports that St. Bede's Church, Sefton Park, was struck by lightning, but, "thanks to the conductor," only some electric globes were damaged. Thanks to the conductor! And that might have been put up by an Atheist!

A man named Saint, an absentee charged at Bradford, said: "I defy the world." Other saints have said the same thing with unhappy results.

After three years of canteen-running and providing entertainments for the troops, the Y.M.C.A. intends to try some evangelical work, and has engaged Billy Sunday for the purpose. According to a daily paper, Billy "is under orders for France, not to battle with Fritz, but to keep his old enemy with the horns and tail" out of the soldiers' way.

Mr. Ethan Dodds, of Pittsburgh, U.S.A., has invented a process for bottling light, which, according to Mr. Marconi, the wireless expert, will revolutionize the lighting systems of the world. Can he come over to England and show us how to bottle our Bishop of London and other pious lights?

Prince Henry is a private in the Eton College Training Corps. He will be fortified in his lowly position by remembering that the "King of Kings" was a carpenter—and a poor one.

Christ and his religion have been at work in the world for nine long centuries, and they have conspicuously failed to teach mankind the fundamental principle of individual, national, and international life. So we are informed by the Rev. Dr. Velimirovic, of Belgrade, in a sermon recently delivered at St. Paul's Cathedral. According to this reverend gentlemen, the fundamental principle of life is sacrifice, but throughout the Christian centuries it has never been carried into practice. Now, however, "is not sacrifice the most obvious thing in this War? Moreover, has not this War even come to make sacrifice the obvious principle of a new society, a new Europe, a new World?"

Let us pause for a moment over that curious statement so naively made by the distinguished Serbian divine. Three ideas are involved in it, namely, that Christianity has failed to translate sacrifice into a ruling principle in human conduct; that this War has already accomplished the task which Christianity has left undone; and that, consequently, God is the author of the War. One would naturally infer that this War is God's last and only successful method for setting the world right. Dr. Velimirovic forgets one most essential fact, however, which is that this same method has been tried innumerable times before, with the very opposite result to success each time. Those who are unselfish now were unselfish before the struggle began, while those who were selfish before are more selfish still. Is it not true that thousands of people are amassing colossal fortunes by means of the War? Is not "profiteering" the curse of the British nation at this very hour?

In spite of the tacit admission and positive assertion to which we have just alluded, Dr. Velimirovic still remains a Christian preacher, declaring that "through all the roaring voices and crying agonies of the present War, Christ is claiming his rights," a thing, it would seem, he never did before. Hitherto, he has had no rights, but only duties; but the War has taught him that he has his rights, upon which he is resolved to insist when peace is re-established.

> Now he claims to come into the Government and Parliament of every nation, to sit upon every kingly throne, and to preside in every Foreign Office, in order to rule the nations and to lead the world in his own spirit.

Does his reverence of Belgrade not know, has he not learned from many sources easily at his disposal, that during the famous Ages of Faith, Christ did exercise all those rights, through his chosen ambassadors, and that through the whole of that time Europe lay "in gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity," wallowing in filthiest vices and the darkest crimes? Very gradually has the State succeeded in stripping him of those awful rights; and the world would vigorously protest if any attempt were made to restore him to the thrones with which it has with such difficulty evicted him. Of course, in reality, Christ only means the Church and its ministers, the Christ being merely an ideal or imaginative projection of dominant ecclesiastical personalities, whose day of dominance is happily gone for ever.

Speaking at a Wesleyan Conference at London, the Bishop of Chelmsford said, "I believe that the Bishop of London and myself are the two biggest Methodists in London. Exactly! "Everything by turns, and nothing long."

Dr. Horton has expressed his gratitude to Lord Hugh Cecil in his "brave crusade" of loving the German Christians. All we hope is that, after the War, they will also love one another. When the Lord Bishops have forgiven the Kaiser, they may even pardon the Nonconformists. That will indeed be the millennium.

It is curious to read that someone has presented to the United Free Church of Scotland the house in which Sir J. Y. Simpson made his earliest experiments in the use of chloroform. When Simpson first introduced the anæsthetic many clergymen contended that its use was impious because God intended human beings to bear pain.

The daughter of a New York clergyman was sentenced at the Old Bailey to three months' hard labour for throwing vitriol on a married man. Another testimonial to the value of religious education.

"Viator," of the Church Times, is perplexed because "our synodical leaders tell us that some of them (the Psalms) are not suitable for use in Christian worship, and it seems probable that we shall be forbidden to recite them." He is startled by the thought that it has taken the men of God nigh two thousand years to make such a discovery. Speaking for himself, he can see no objection to the use of the Imprecatory Psalms in public worship, his fear being, not that it is wrong to express such sentiments, but that, from a peculiarity of temperament, he may not share them with adequate intensity. He is convinced that they are not at all inconsistent with the Christian Gospel.

"Viator" is entirely right. To imprecate the vengeance of Heaven on the enemies of God and his kingdom is not at all incompatible with the teaching of the New Testament, or with the temper of the Christian Church in any age. The real meaning of the proposed omission of the Imprecatory Psalms from use in public worship is, that it is symptomatic of the fact that the Church is, perhaps unconsciously, outgrowing itself, under the pressure of that noble spirit of Humanism, which, for several generations, has been manifesting itself in the world outside. In other words, it is a sign of the inevitable disintegration of the Christian religion which is already taking place within the Church itself. As we have more than once observed, it is the beginning of the end of the Great Superstition which has darkened and poisoned human life for so long.

The Dean of Gurnsey is resigning at the age of ninety-six. That the duties of a dean do not make great demands on the holder is shown by the fact that so many of them live to great ages. Here are the ages of some living deans: Exeter, 90; Canterbury, 80; Chester, 85; Gloucester, 81; Salisbury, 82; Hereford, 79.

The figures of Wesleyan Methodism, as given at the Conference, are enough to make John Wesley turn in his grave. Since 1906 there has been a decline of 140,717 scholars in the Sunday-schools. And these figures relate to the most flourishing of the Free Churches.

"A book, by the nephew of Ernest Renan," in support of the Christian superstition is advertised in the publishers' summer lists. Christians have to be thankful for small mercies in these strenuous times.

When Joanna Southcote died, she left a sealed box containing "revelations regarding the second coming of Christ." The box was only to be opened by the bishops at a time of national danger. Now, Mr. J. W. Sharpe, of Bournemouth, claims to have had a vision and a communication from the spirit of W. T. Stead ordering the box to be opened. Several bishops have been asked to open the box, but they have not yet consented to do so. We can't say that the War has led to softening of the brain with some, because there was never a lack of that with many. But it is quite clear that the War has not given to these persons a mental stability of which they appear to be sadly in need.

Rev. F. C. Young, Vicar of Sherburn-in-Elmet, near Leeds, announces in the Parish Magazine that he is leaving the Church because he feels that "the views he now holds are not those which are required of a minister of the Church of England." He says: "There is nothing the matter with Christianity, but there is a great deal the matter with the Church." We cannot say what this means exactly, but, all the same, we congratulate Mr. Young on his straightforwardness. If all the clergymen who do not believe in the teachings of the Church left, what an exodus there would be!

The bubble of German "Atheism" has burst, although the dear clergy found it very useful for a time. The Sunday Herald states that the Junker party is Lutheran, and "has always been detested by the German Catholic peoples." The latter statement has the ring of truth in it.

A Westminster magistrate says that a lady who sings, even in the early morning, does not come within the category of "a noisy animal." What would he say to a street evangelist with a harmonium and a dozen lady friends?

A sidelight on the former power of the Church is shown in The Town Labourer, a book on English industrial life. It is a letter written to the Home Office after the Peterloo massacre to explain that a woman who had been killed "was a dangerous character, for she had been heard to curse the curate."

A correspondent points out that the recent orders by which hard-working police officers are made to carry air-raid warnings might be varied, and suggests that this work should be undertaken by the clergy, who only work one day a week, and who are accustomed to tell people to flee from the wrath to come.

We referred last week to the fanatical story of the Rev. Dr. Fitchett concerning some "eminent Freethinkers" who had inferred that the War had shown the world that Christianity was the one thing to save it. In Life, a Melbourne magazine, the same gentleman grows tearfully sentimental over the presence in Jerusalem of "the unspeakable Turk." He says:—

> A Turkish soldier is on guard night and day in the crypt of the great Church of the Nativity at Bethlehem.....A squad of Turkish soldiers, with sullen faces and loaded rifles, stand on guard all Easter Sunday in front of the Church of the Resurrection. It will surely be a relief to the Christian imagination when the cruel and bloody feet of the Turk no longer trample on spots sacred to the Christian faith.

An important fact Dr. Fitchett conveniently overlooks. The Turkish Government provided soldiers (naturally with "sullen faces," for are they not Mohammedans?) in order to keep the representatives of the various Christian sects from fighting over the birth-place of their Saviour.

Dr. Fitchett cites from a correspondent who appears to be as heartbroken as himself over the base uses to which the "Holy City" is being put. Thus:—

> Jerusalem is at present simply overrun by Turks and arrogant German officers. The heights of Calvary have been transformed into a battery. The marble and jade columns and statuary, which have for centuries ornamented the place where our Saviour suffered, have been removed to give way to two Krupp cannons, which are being used for target practice, the targets having been mounted on the slopes of Mount Olivet. The place where Christ taught His disciples the Lord's Prayer has been fenced in with a wattle and barbed-wire fence. Mount Olivet, whence our Lord ascended, is the favourite centre of manœuvres. Shouts, shots, bugle-calls, abuse, hatred, and blood—that is the atmosphere now surrounding the locality which for two thousand years has been the greatest sanctuary of the world.

All needed to complete the picture is to bear in mind the fact that it is not now, primarily, a war between Mohammedans and Christians, but a war initiated and carried on by Christians, which for sheer barbarity carries us back to some of the most frightful of the religious wars of the past.

America, says one of the daily papers, will cheerfully bear a part of the burden of Great Britain. We suggest sending along the Bench of Bishops.

CIVILIZATION AND THE ESKIMOS,

Professor Sollas, speaking of the Eskimo, observes: "The intrusion of the white man has brought with it its usual blight—poverty, sickness, selfishness, and loss of self-respect. It would be beyond our province to give instances, but one case where a different result might have been expected may be cited from Rink. He writes: 'On approaching these places (Ny-Herrnhut and Lichtenfels) the visitor, on being told that each of them contains 100 natives and two or three missionary families, will be at a loss to make out where the former have their abodes. The mission lodges are pretty, spacious, and, for Greenland, even stately in appearance. The stranger will probably be surprised on being informed that these buildings are only inhabited by missionaries because he discovers nothing like human dwellings anywhere else. Then his attention will be drawn to something resembling dunghills scattered over low rocks, and partly overgrown with grass, and he will be surprised to learn that the native population live in these dens.'"—H. Rink "Danish Greenland."

To Correspondents.

"A CHRISTIAN STILL" writes that he has read the Freethinker for some weeks without learning anything from it. We hope "A Christian Still" will not be discouraged. Some people learn slowly and others quickly, but understanding will come to the dullest if one persists. Perhaps if "A Christian Still" will get the local clergyman to read it aloud to him he might grasp its meaning better.

F. DE LISLE.—Thanks for magazine. Dr. Fitchett is quite up to his usual level. Presumably he knows his audience.

A. J. MARRIOTT.—Afraid it would initiate a too lengthy discussion, and we have to keep a wary eye on the space at our disposal.

S. ELMES cannot understand why the Freethinker has not a very much larger circulation than at present. Suppose we say inability of the public to appreciate a good thing, or ignorance of the fact of its existence? If the explanation is accepted, the remedy is obvious.

MR. A. RENTON suggests, in reply to Mr. Soddy's letter in our last issue, that the discussion of reprisals is futile, since all war is in the nature of a reprisal. Britain's declaration of war was thus a reprisal for the invasion of Belgium, German attack on our commerce a reprisal for our blockade of Germany, etc.

B. SUNDER (Woolwich).—Should be pleased to do something at Woolwich, but it is for the local Freethinkers to move first. We shall then be pleased to assist. We have no leaflet on "Money," and do not know the other to which you refer. We agree that the pious tracts you enclose are an insult to Woolwich folk, but religious tracts are usually of that kind.

E. PURCHAS.—It is indefensible, as you say. We do not see, though, why the question named does not admit of an answer.

M. NEWMAN.—We do not see anything in the cutting you send which specially calls for a reply. Thanks, all the same, for note.

DR. B. DUNLOP writes:—"I agree with your championship of coloured people, but are we prepared to marry them? If not, this difficulty must be added to the cheap labour one referred to by Bishop Frodsham. Perhaps the white peoples should unite in refusing coloured immigrants, and also directly encourage the two-child system."

R. MILES.—We regret to hear of the death of your uncle, Mr. J. C. Goodfellow. We have some recollection of him as a correspondent, and can quite believe all you say of his worthiness as a man, and the sturdiness of his Freethinking opinions. Please convey our sympathy to the members of his family.

We feel that the nation is to be congratulated on the proposal—provided it properly materializes—to place the whole of the recruiting system under civil control. It is a vindication of the power of public opinion, muzzled as that opinion has been and is. But nothing can be worse than to place the civil population at the mercy of a military class which, as all experience proves, is totally unfitted for the exercise of such authority. Germany was damned and doomed when it allowed the military caste to gain ascendancy, and the same fate awaits any other nation that follows in its footsteps. A War Office should attend to war, and even in that it is usually the better for civilian surveillance.

Quite an illuminating article—illuminating in a way unseen by the writer—appeared in the Daily Telegraph the other day. The writer, who veils himself under the pen-name of "Index," charges the Catholic Church in Ireland with having "temporized with forces that are frankly anti-religious." He suggests as a means of relieving the pressure of the moment, that Conscription should be at once applied to Ireland, and that the Church should advocate its being done. In the writer's opinion, this would get rid of the young men who are at the root of the present unrest. We have seldom come across a plainer statement of the more sinister aspect of militarism, and of the way in which the Church is expected to play the game of reaction.

We are glad to learn that the course of open-air lectures arranged at Sheffield pursues a successful course. Mr. Grimes had a good meeting last Sunday, and this week the speaker will be Mr. F. E. Willis, of Birmingham. We feel quite safe in promising a good lecture for all who attend.

We are asked to call the special attention of South London Freethinkers to the Brockwell Park meetings. We hope our doing so will have all the consequences desired.

Mr. H. J. Stenning writes that he finds Mr. Effel's article in last week's issue very "unsatisfactory." He says that the number of Socialists who accept the theory of Marx is very small, the number who reject it is much larger, and the number indifferent to theories of any sort largest of all. Mr. Stenning says that Socialism is not concerned with "the objective validity of any religion." Mr. Effel is, therefore, wrong in attributing "moral cowardice" to those Socialists who wish to steer clear of all discussions on religion. This, however, was not the point of Mr. Effel's article. His article was a protest against the "deferential attitude" of so many Socialist writers and speakers towards the clergy and the Churches with the nauseating attempt of some to prove that Socialism is "true Christianity." And we believe there is need for the protest. To keep Socialism and religion distinct is a policy we appreciate. But in practice this usually means boycotting all criticisms unfavourable to Christianity, and permitting all attempts to prove that "true Christianity" and Socialism are identical. It was against this attitude our contributor wrote.

It has been for some years the custom of all Branches of the N.S.S., where lectures are given, to devote the nearest Sunday to the birthday of Charles Bradlaugh to a lecture on his life and work. Charles Bradlaugh was born on September 26, 1833, therefore the last Sunday in September is usually chosen, which will, this year, fall on the 30th. Will speakers and Branch secretaries please note?

The younger generation of speakers would be well-advised to furnish themselves with a copy of Charles Bradlaugh: a Record of His Life and Work, by his daughter, Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, which can be obtained through the Pioneer Press, price 2s. 6d.

Sovereigns, it is true, call themselves the representatives of God, his vicegerents upon earth. But does the fear of a master more powerful than they incline them seriously to study the welfare of the nations whom Providence has entrusted to their care? Does the pretended terror which ought to be inspired in them by the idea of an invisible judge, to whom alone they acknowledge themselves accountable for their actions, render them more equitable, more compassionate, more sparing of the blood and treasure of their subjects, more temperate in their pleasures, more attentive to their duties? In fine, does this God, by whose authority kings reign, deter them from inflicting a thousand evils upon the people to whom they ought to act as guides, protectors, and fathers? Alas! If we survey the whole earth, we shall see men almost everywhere governed by tyrants, who use religion merely as an instrument to render more stupid the slaves whom they overwhelm under the weight of their vices, or whom they sacrifice without mercy to their extravagances.—D'Holbach.

The Apologist in Blinkers.

IN the Nineteenth Century and After for July, 1917, the Very Rev. Canon William Barry, D.D., writes on the much-boomed, if rather unsubstantial, subject of "The Return of Religion." His article serves to show that, while possessed of a good deal more learning and ability than many lights of the Church (the Bishop of London, for example!) he shares with others the common ecclesiastical defect of being totally ignorant of the real foes which religion has to face to-day.

It is, of course, to be expected that an orthodox divine, writing apropos of the War, should make full use of the silly claptrap about "German Atheism." This is as much an article of faith with the clergy as is the equally illusory "revival of Christianity" here and in France. Canon Barry is sure that the God of the Bible is not the same as Odin the War-God, whom some cracked professor in Germany referred to as "the ancient, mighty deity of all the Teutonic kindred." We may concede to the Canon that they are not the same. Nevertheless, they are much of a muchness. We have on authority that Canon Barry will not repudiate, that God, "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," authorized the Israelites of old to smite their enemies, "man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass," and was very angry when such orders were not carried out to the letter. It is doubtful if poor, much-maligned Father Odin ever beat that record. The Canon is entitled to plead, if he will, that Yahweh, God of Hosts, has grown milder with advancing years, and is by now quite a reformed character. For all we know to the contrary, so may Odin have done. Anyhow, if the choice is between Yahweh and Odin, it is between one hoary assassin and another, and there is no visible reason why Canon Barry, the Bishop of London, Mr. R. J. Campbell, Mr. G. K. Chesterton, and the other partizans of Yahweh should expect us to get so very excited about the difference between them.

However, it appears that Odin or Yahweh, or whoever is responsible for this War, has done us a very good turn, and that by his good offices we have "escaped" —Canon Barry uses the word advisedly—from the veritable "Valley of the Shadow of Death," as he calls the period of scientific criticism beginning with the discoveries of Darwin. Darwin, we are told, appeared to have "banished mind from the world's development," with the result that science showed us that "its Everlasting Father was nescience," Theism was "reckoned among the mythologies," and Tyndall, in the Belfast Address, "read decorously the Burial Service over it, where no hope of resurrection was held out to God or man." "Materialism was the ready money or the cash kept for its customers' use at the Bank of Nescience. Among its chief cashiers, T. H. Huxley played a famous part." In such phrases as this Canon Barry not unwittily conveys the impression made on the pious mind by the Agnostic writings of the latter half of the nineteenth century.

We must, however, demur to the idea that the writings of Darwin, Huxley, and Tyndall, great as they were, contained a final and sufficient statement of the case against religion, or that you can dispose of that case by exposing superficial weaknesses in their exposition of it. The case against Theism was conclusively stated by Epicurus 2,200 years before Huxley, and rests on the eternal problem of evil. "Either God is willing, but unable, to abolish evil; or able, but unwilling; or neither able nor willing; or both able and willing. If he is willing, but unable, he is not almighty. If he is able, but unwilling, he is not good. If he is neither able nor willing, he is neither good nor almighty. If he is able and willing, why is evil not abolished?" That argument has never been bettered. Canon Barry would have done well to have turned his attention to it.

Instead of that, he fastens on what we may call the "trimmings" of the nineteenth-century Agnostic case, and becomingly cuts them into ribbons. "It needs no ghost, come from the dead," to tell us that Huxley, Spencer, Romanes, and their contemporaries, great men as they were, were but men; that Huxley laboured under the disadvantage of having adopted Hume's essentially vulnerable system of philosophy; that Spencer wrote a good deal of plain nonsense about "the unknowable"; and that other Agnostics failed even to face the questions which these two so unsatisfactorily answered. Clearly, if you deny that you can have knowledge of anything but successive impressions and ideas in your own mind, it follows that everything beyond them is hypothesis; that necessity, causation, and law cease to be legitimate matter for inquiry; and that the ground of all action and the validity of all reasoning rests as much on "faith" as Christianity itself. Huxley did great harm to his case by adopting this position. It compelled him, for instance, to admit that miracles were a question of evidence, and to imply that he would readily have accepted the "Gadarene affair" itself if only the Synoptic Gospels had been demonstrably written by eye-witnesses of the events they described!

It is, again, undeniable that the Agnostics of the nineteenth century suffered from a sentimental weakness for the very superstitions which reason forced them to attack, which often gives their criticisms an appearance of half-heartedness. Renan's Vie de Jesus is full of instances of this sort of mawkishness, which his orthodox opponents call his "reverent spirit," and applaud accordingly. A passage from Romanes, quoted by Canon Barry, is another example, though this does not justify the Canon in repeating once again the orthodox falsehood that Romanes was "rescued in time out of the dungeon of Giant Despair, and found the Divine Master who had never been far from him," or that he "lived to understand that his reasoning to the perfect Unreason of all things was a pure sophism." Again, Canon Barry is entitled to criticize Huxley's Oxford speech about "the ethical process" being opposed to "the cosmic process," which is obviously impossible if, as we hold, the ethical process is itself part and parcel of the cosmic process.

But when all that is vulnerable in the nineteenth-century Agnostics—their Humean philosophy, their sentimental respect for Christianity, their failure to hold fast to monistic fundamentals—is thrown aside, we are very far indeed from returning to the "other-worldliness" which Canon Barry avowedly wishes to see emerge from the experience of the War. He himself puts the real issue very plainly:—

> The question cannot be stated simply as if it concerned our mortal span, whether we shall seek to light it up with an ideal, or to shape its course on the principle of Aristippus and get as much variety or pleasure into it as we find possible. It is a different problem from either of these. We must try to ascertain if our individual life, as we know it, under the conditions of time and space is or is not the prelude to another stage of existence when those conditions have fallen away from us. If it is, then our aspirations and duties ought to conform to "other-worldliness."

Just so; and we may add that to state the question in this form is to answer it. How can there be a "stage of existence" when time and space "have fallen away from us"? The very word "stage" implies time. Take away time and space, and you take away change, action, personality, existence itself. Canon Barry's question is more specious, but not more possessed of meaning, than the time-honoured problem of how many angels can dance on the point of a needle?

To make a case for religion—which means, as Canon Barry admits, a case for "other-worldliness"—you must prove the existence of your "other world"; a world, that is, independent of the world of time and space, cause and effect, number and form, with which common sense and reason acquaint us. That is just exactly what no alleged "revelation," Jewish, Christian, Mohammedan, or "Spiritualist," has ever done. These precious religions, whether they tell us of three Gods or one, ascended Christs or levitated mediums, celestial harps or ethereal cigars, do not reveal "another" world; they allege certain unexplored facts in this world, which must stand for examination at the bar of common sense and reason, like any facts of science or mathematics.

Let our divines, then, be content to plead at this bar; or, if they will not, let them boom sonorously about the virtue of faith and the perils of doubt, thereby frightening or hypnotizing weak minds to whom that sort of thing appeals. But do not let them think that, by gibes at "the mud-god matter," witticisms about the "ready money at the Bank of Nescience," and rhetoric about "soul and flesh," they can prove their thesis. Above all, let them abstain from the crowning dishonesty, by which Canon Barry's article is disfigured, of misusing the fact of human heroism as shown in the War for the purposes of their dogmatic creed. Canon Barry admits that soldiers do their duty independently of "conscious philosophy." Very well, then; do not let him pretend that his philosophy is a necessary consequence when it is not.

Finally, let us have a truce to the fiction that the War has revealed religion to people who, being "born in the Darwinian Era," knew little or nothing about it. I was born in what Canon Barry calls "the Darwinian Era." So far from knowing nothing about religion, I was educated in the strictest beliefs of the Church of England. The Bible and the Liturgy were, and are, as familiar to me as the Daily Mail. I thought my way out of all that, not because of living in the "Darwinian Era," but because religion appeared to me part and parcel of a social and political system, supported by Darwinians and non-Darwinians alike, which chloroformed every human impulse towards greater and more equal freedom. The so-called Darwinian Era saw the disgraceful attempt to keep Bradlaugh out of the House of Commons, the persecution of Foote and Ramsey under the Blasphemy Acts, the renewed establishment of clericalism by the Education Act of 1902, and the recrudescence of blasphemy prosecutions in recent years. It is ridiculous for Canon Barry, therefore, to pretend that his Church has been the "under dog," and Secularism insolently triumphant, all this time. I hope and believe that after the War men and women will be more, and not less, impatient of the established system and all that pertains to it. The "Darwinian Era" will then seem an era of compromise and stagnation compared with the period of iconoclasm and upheaval in front of us. Our revival mongers are destined to a rude awakening.

The Crowd.

Mute in the throng, I saw a stranger stand,
Alone was he, and bitterly he smiled
At those who passed, nor held a friendly hand,
But flowed, unconscious, selfishly beguiled,
Scanning each face this stranger silent stood,
Musing how well Almighty God had foiled
Man's dreams of love, and hopes of brotherhood.

III.

It is unfortunately true that most persons are quite unprepared to admit the deficiencies of their own powers of observation and of memory, and are also unaware of their own ignorance of perfectly natural occurrences, which continually lead to self-deception and illusion. Moreover, the capacity for logical inference and argument is not common. The whole past and present history of what is called "the occult" is enveloped in an atmosphere of self-deception and of readiness to be deceived by others, to which misplaced confidence in their own cleverness and power of detecting trickery renders many—one may almost say most—people victims. The physician who has given his life to the study of mental aberration and diseases of the mind is the only really qualified investigator of these "marvels," and no one who has closely studied what is known in the domain of mental physiology and pathology has any difficulty in understanding, and bringing into relation with large classes of established facts as to illusions and mental aberration, the "beliefs" in magic and second-sight which are here and there found flourishing at the present day, as well as the, at first sight startling, evidence of highly accomplished men who have suffered from such delusions.—Sir Ray Lankester, "Diversions of a Naturalist" (1915), pp. 363-4.

That the thought-reading performance of Blackburn and Smith was the result of trickery is confirmed by an article contributed by Sir James Crichton-Browne to the Westminster Gazette for January, 29, 1901, in which he describes some experiments undertaken with Blackburn and Smith at Dean's Yard, London, in the presence of himself, Dr. Francis Galton, Professor Romanes, and Mr. Myers. In this experiment Smith was blindfolded, and succeeded in reproducing a few regular or simple figures upon which Blackburn had concentrated his mind, but completely failed in reproducing an irregular figure which Professor Romanes and Sir James Crichton-Browne subsequently insisted on as a test when they began to suspect the use of a code. The next diagram was the shield on Dr. Galton's signet ring. This had an oval shape, but the reproduction was of a triangular shield. Sir James Crichton-Browne continues:—

> By this time I was quite satisfied that Mr. S. was not effectually blindfolded, and that it was practicable for Mr. B. to communicate with him both by sight and hearing; so Romanes and I asked permission, which was granted, to blindfold him anew. We proceeded to do so secundem artem. Cotton-wool was procured, the sockets were packed, the ears were plugged, and a large handkerchief made all secure. After that several experiments were tried as before, but there never was the smallest response on the part of Mr. S. to Mr. B.'s volitional endeavours. There was no more flashing of images into his mind. His pencil was idle. Thought-transference was somehow interrupted.

Sir James Crichton-Browne concludes the account as follows: "I was invited to be critical and sceptical, and I was so. I daresay more credulously inclined people will think that my suspicions were unjust and that no trick was practised—that was clearly the feeling of some of the psychical researchers present. The last scene of all, or passage of arms, I vividly recollect. Mr. Myers, standing in front of the fireplace, said, 'It must be allowed that this demonstration has been a total failure, and I attribute that to the offensive incredulity of Dr. Crichton-Browne.' To which I rejoined, 'I hope I always will show offensive incredulity when I find myself in the presence of patent imposture.'"[1]

As Professor Tyndall long ago remarked, the believers in Spiritualism "like to believe, and they do not like to be undeceived. Science is perfectly powerless in the presence of this frame of mind. It is, moreover, a state perfectly compatible with extreme intellectual subtlety and a capacity for devising hypothesis which only require the hardihood engendered by strong conviction, or by callous mendacity, to render them impregnable."[1]

A correspondent writes, asking for an explanation of the thought-reading performance of "Zomah" at the London Coliseum lately. This lady, sitting on the stage with her eyes bandaged, describes any article given to her manager by any member of the audience, and yet her manager addresses no question to her. My correspondent wishes to know whether he is right in believing there is some hypnotic understanding between Madame Zomah and her manager, by means of which she is able to define objects known and seen by him?

I do not know how the trick is worked, but my correspondent may rest absolutely assured that hypnotism has nothing to do with it. When I come to deal with hypnotism, he will see that quite plainly for himself. Madame Zomah's performance is not new, as my correspondent seems to think. At the very time the Zancigs were giving their performance in London (in 1906-7), Dr. Andrew Wilson pointed out, in a letter to the Daily Chronicle, that a much more wonderful entertainment was being given at the St. George's Hall by Mr. Devant and his sister. Miss Devant was blindfolded with a thick piece of cloth, previously handed round the audience for examination. Mr. Devant then, says Dr. Wilson, "comes among the audience, receives instructions regarding what his sister is expected to do, and she in turn carries out the instructions to the letter. This is really wonderful, because there is an utter absence—apparent absence, at least—of all communication between the two. There is nothing of the 'This please' or 'Now please' about the entertainment; all is accomplished in silence." Dr. Wilson further remarked: "Comparing the Alhambra and St. George's Hall performances, I wonder to find that people are puzzled over the former feats."[2]

Why, then, did not Mr. Devant and his sister create a sensation and get boomed by the London press like the Zancigs? Because they did not pretend to the possession of mystical powers, or to be more highly gifted than ordinary people. They honestly declared that all their wonderful performance was accomplished without the aid of spirits, Telepathy, Hypnotism, or any supernormal means. Therefore they did not appeal to the bump of wonder of the gaping multitude.

Sir Oliver Lodge has for years past, by means of lectures, articles in magazines, and books, been conducting a propaganda in favour of Telepathy and Spiritualism, lamenting all the while the scepticism and indifference of the scientific world to the fads he adduces in support of his opinions. Dr. Ivor Tuckett, Sir Ray Lankester, and Sir Bryan Donkin, among others, have criticized Sir Oliver's theories, and shown that his so-called facts will not bear critical investigation;[3] and now another scientist takes up Sir Oliver's challenge, namely, Dr. Charles Mercier, the well-known author of several standard works—among others A New Logic; Psychology: Normal and Morbid; a Text-Book of Insanity; Criminal Responsibility; Crime and Insanity, etc. Dr. Mercier has also been Examiner in Psychology to the University of London, and Lecturer on Insanity at the Medical Schools of the Westminster, Charing Cross, and Royal Free Hospitals.

As has been pointed out, the only really qualified investigators of Spiritualism are the psychologist, the conjurer, and the detective. Dr. Mercier is an eminent psychologist, and therefore well qualified to point out the weak spots in Sir Oliver Lodge's spiritual armour, which he has done in his book, Spiritualism and Sir Oliver Lodge. In the preface, Dr. Mercier tells us that a copy of Sir Oliver Lodge's book, Raymond, was sent to him, with a request that he would examine and review it. He proceeds:—

> I found it impossible to do so. The sorrow of a bereaved mother is no fit matter for discussion by strangers in the public press. But the book revealed to me such an astounding mental attitude on the part of its author, that I sent for a previous work of his, The Survival of Man, to discover on what ground he, a professor of a certain branch of physical science, and the Principal of a University, speaking with the authority conferred by his occupancy of these positions, could make the assumptions that he does, and promulgate urbi et orbi such extraordinary doctrines. I have been engaged for some forty years in the study of the vagaries of the human mind in health and in disease, and am not easily surprised by witnessing new vagaries; but I must confess that The Survival of Man did surprise me. Upon inquiry I found that the doctrines and practices therein advocated have attained a very wide vogue. It may also be said that they are become the rage.....The subject has never engaged my attention before. I came to it as a new-comer, and with an open mind. When I saw the consequences to which the doctrines and practices lead; when I read of a table laughing and executing caressing movements; when I read the drivel that is put into the mouths of dead men who when alive were of normal intelligence; I began to suspect that the foundation on which this structure was built was insecure.....For a considerable time my mind misgave me. Again and again I put the task aside as not worthy to engage the time that might be occupied in serious studies, and it seemed that such a structure raised on such foundations might well be left to fall to pieces of its own inherent rottenness; but on consideration of the following arguments advanced by my friends I determined to undertake the task.[1]

The main reason that impelled Dr. Mercier to this task was, to use his own words: "I know from my own medical experience, that the pursuit of the occult, and especially of that form of it that used to go by the name of Spiritualism, but is now called telepathy, telergy, and other high-sounding names, leads to a morbid frame of mind, and tends to render those who are at all predisposed to insanity an easy prey to the disease. I am not alone in that opinion." In proof of which Dr. Mercier quotes from the Annual Report, lately issued, by Dr. G. M. Robertson, Superintendent of the Royal Asylum of Morningside, Edinburgh, the premier institution for the insane in Scotland, who issues a grave warning to those who inherit a latent tendency to nervous disorders: "to have nothing to do with practical inquiries of a spiritualistic nature, lest they should awaken this dormant proclivity to hallucinations within their brains. I have known such a person who had lost her son following the procedure in vogue at present, under advice, first hearing of him through mediums, then getting into touch with him herself, and receiving messages from him, some as impressions and others as audible words, then increasing her circle of spiritual acquaintances, and living more for her spiritual world than for this, to the neglect of her husband and household, till finally God conversed with her in a low musical voice at all times, and confided His plans for the future to her. I would ask spiritualists where, in this case, does spiritualism end and mental disorder begin?"[2] That is the testimony of Dr. Robert-

TELEPATHY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—From Mr. Mann's article I gather that he denies the existence of controlled telepathy, but I myself can testify to the existence of involuntary telepathy outside my control. I have frequently, while asleep, received messages from relatives, colleagues, friends, and even from my employers. I have made use of the knowledge thus gained.

The Friday night before the recent raid both my wife and I went through, in dreams, almost precisely our experiences of the following Saturday morning. The night that my remaining son at the Front was badly hurt, I dreamt that he told me of his wound and showed me the place.

Having been in a church choir most of my life, I have a wholesome contempt for the supernatural and its paid professors, and would rather be amused by your journal than be bored by the sermon.

I therefore simply record the above experiences as proof that there are more things in the universe than we have yet got the measure of. I discarded the Church Times for the Freethinker many years ago, but my attitude on supernatural matters, based upon personal experiences in connection with my son who has gone under in this accursed War, leads me now towards Light, whilst remaining, anchored, like a captive balloon, to the firm ground of the Freethinker.

J. J. O.

SOCIALISTS, FREETHOUGHT, AND RELIGION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

Sir,—I beg leave to protest against J. Effel on two grounds (1) He does nothing to advance the discussion from the point at which it is left by your brief rejoinder to N. Streimer—but runs in with a "red herring." (2) He gives a totally false impression of the attitude and character of James Connolly.

As one who has seen "active service" both as Militant Atheist and Marxian Socialist, I wish to urge: (1) Streimer claims that "ideas play a secondary part in social development." Our Editor replies: "Man is always under the dominion of his ideas, and it is these which are the chief determinants of social conditions," and "no human society exists or ever has existed on an economic basis. The social bond is essentially a psychologic one." The importance of this clear antagonism of opinion is too great to be over-stated. Nothing could be more advantageous than its discussion. Freethought is nothing if it has not a social application. Socialism is either in line with scientifically verified facts or it is worthless, and surely at a time when Marxian ideas have in Russia drawn the attention of the world, there is every practical advantage in an elucidation of the root principles of sociology.

Personally, I am sorry to see this promising controversy side-tracked by a criticism of the detail policy of the Socialist societies. (2) J. Effel sets out to prove the Socialist parties guilty of "Jesuitry" and "kow-towing" to the Church. It is a pity, with so many glaring instances alive and to hand, that he should disturb the dead and quote not matters of general knowledge but a twenty-year old pamphlet written by a self-taught working man struggling almost single-handed to recruit a Socialist Party in the teeth of the best organized Church in the world—the Catholic Church in Ireland.

Such a man in such a place can be forgiven a little "hedging." But did Connolly "hedge"? His essay, "Socialism and Religion," included in the "New Evangel" (originally published in the Workers' Republic in 1898 reprinted 1917 by the Socialist Party of Ireland) dealt with the question as one of party policy. He first points out the many leading Freethinkers were and are non-Socialists, and goes on to add so also is the Pope, whose "ill-reasoned and inconclusive encyclicals lately issued against Socialism make of the hierarchy of the Catholic Church belated camp-followers in the armies marching under the banner raised by the Agnostic exponents of the individualist philosophy."

As to whether the philosophy of Socialism can be reconciled with theology, Connolly says (same essay):—

> They (the leading exponents of modern Socialism), as a party, do not base their Socialism upon any interpretation of the language or meaning of Scripture, nor upon the real or supposed intentions of a beneficent Diety. They, as a party, neither affirm nor deny these things.....they wisely prefer to take their stand upon the actual phenomena of social life as they can be observed in operation amongst us to-day, or as they can be traced in the recorded facts of history. If any special interpretation of the meanings of Scripture tends to influence human thought in the direction of Socialism or is found to be on a plane with Socialist doctrine. Then he considers that the said interpretation is stronger because of its identity with the teachings of Socialism, but he does not necessarily believe that Socialism is stronger or its position more impregnable because of its theological ally" (italics mine).....
> We feel that Socialism is based upon a series of facts requiring only unassisted human reason to grasp and master all their details, whereas Religion of every kind is admittedly based upon "faith" in the occurrence in past ages of a series of phenomena inexplicable by any process of mere human reasoning.

I admit that to "be suspicious" of the author of these words as an "emissary of Rome" would be reckless bigotry in any case. In the case of James Connolly, and him dead—words fail me!

Report of Executive Meeting held on July 26.

The President, Mr. Chapman Cohen, in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Baker, Bowman, Brandes, Leat, Palmer, Quinton, Roger, Samuels, Wood, Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, and the Secretary.

Minutes of previous meeting read and confirmed. Monthly cash statement presented and adopted.

New members were received for the Manchester Branch and the Parent Society.

An application to form a Regent's Park Branch was received and, the conditions being complied with, granted.

The following reports were received and adopted:—

1. Report from Sheffield of Mr. Wilde's successful meetings and of forthcoming arrangements in that town.
2. Report of result of recent Blasphemy case in Birmingham.
3. Report on action to date of the Protest Committee against the prohibition of sale of literature by the L.C.C.

It being found that the holiday season had interfered with full attendances, some minor matters of business were dealt with, and others adjourned until the next meeting.

E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

The New "War" God.

It would have been absurd to think that the most colossal war in the history of the universe should have brought about so many changes without bringing about one in God. The intellectual world was, therefore, more or less prepared when Mr. Wells' book, God the Invisible King, appeared. It had long been felt that the old ramshackle God, with which we were all so familiar in the past, was played out, and from a revolutionary writer like Mr. Wells it was cheerfully anticipated that something good would be put up. It is unpleasant, however, to find from the newspaper criticisms that the general effect of the book is unsatisfactory, and that the intelligent citizens of Britain have not yet got the thing they wanted.

There is no need, however, to despair, as doubtless many other leading novelists will make a point of "having a shot at the God question"; for the sooner we settle the great puzzle, Who is the King of Glory, who? the better for the British Empire and, at the same time, the world and the universe. God must be properly located, and his intentions, hopes, fears, loves, hates, completely understood, before we can make any real progress. This glorious uncertainty is becoming intolerable. Under the cold, merciless logic of modern religious thought, God has assumed a somewhat bewildering number of forms. Sometimes "within" us, sometimes "without" us, sometimes we without him; capable of being found without being lost; or of "coming into our hearts" without our knowing it; a Being, a Power, a Manifestation, a One-ness, a Two-ness, a Three-ness; these are a few of his forms, but the average man of to-day is no longer content with a God who cannot work his own universe the way he likes, but who finds his best hopes thwarted by man's obstinacy and brutality, and that is why Mr. Wells' great effort is not likely to last so long as usual. It should never be doubted that God is working for the general good of the human race, but it must be remembered that he does not want the world to be happy too soon. The Invisible King of Mr. Wells seems to possess this latter faculty, and would, perhaps, have become more popular in time of peace. Any other writers who are entering the competition should, so far as possible, go for a "visible" King, that will be at once an effective war-stopping and stomach-filling God, as these are the only lines upon which the up-to-date, God-finding writers are likely to succeed.

The National Church.

How It Opposes Progress.

A few examples of the votes of the Bishops in the House of Lords which show Christian ethics in practice:—

Women and Borough Councils—
Eight voted against admitting women as members of London Borough Councils.

Deserted Wives—
Seventeen voted against allowing deserted wives to marry again without penalty if deserted five years.

Free Education—
Thirteen voted against free education of the people.

Flogging of Women—
None voted for the abolition of flogging women in public, flogging women in prison, or flogging in the Army and Navy.

Capital Punishment—
Five voted for still inflicting the death penalty for thefts over £10.

Child Labour—
One only supported the first Bill for limiting the hours of child labour.

Vivisection Bill—
One voted for, two against, the cruelty to animals in Vivisection Bill.

Slave Trade—
Two only voted for the suppression of the slave trade.

Reform Bills—
Twenty-one voted against the Reform Bill of 1831, and fifteen voted against the Reform Bill of 1832.

Burial of Nonconformists—
Sixteen first, and then ten, voted against permitting burial without Church of England rites.

Jewish Disabilities—
Seventeen voted against removing civil disabilities of the Jews.

Nonconformists and Universities—
Twenty-two voted against admitting Nonconformists to University degrees.

Catholic Emancipation—
Nineteen voted against Catholic emancipation.

Dr. Fort Newton, minister of the City Temple, is going to the Front as the guest of the British Government. We wonder if he will wear khaki, like so many of the clergy.

Views and Opinions.

Religion and Psychology.

We have always been greatly interested in the psychology of the religious mind. It has had a special attraction for us, because we were never, so to speak, inside it. Never having possessed any religious beliefs worth bothering about, it has been no easy task to get at the religious persons point of view, and to look at the world as he sees it. And although this may have had its drawbacks, it has had the compensating advantage of making it more of an objective study, giving one the same detachment of mind that one brings to bear in studying the psychology of a different species—although this, again, opened one to a danger from the other side. Some aspects of the religious mind are easy enough to appreciate. It is easy to understand the stories of visions and paroxyms of ecstatic emotion. A little knowledge of the physiology of the nervous system, under both normal and abnormal conditions, puts one on safe ground. It is easy enough to deal with the expression of social and domestic feelings in terms of religion. That is a mere environmental accident. But there are other aspects of religious psychology of a more puzzling character.

Pious Lies.

There is, for example, the religious liar. Pulpit talks, and religious papers, particularly those of the poorer kind—for where all are poor there are still degrees of poverty—swarm with stories of a kind that are certainly not true. There is not a street corner preacher, no matter how youthful, and no matter how scanty be his mental equipment, who is not ready with a number of stories, obviously false, concerning the Lord's dealings with him, or his dealings with the Lord. These people will tell you of the cases they have met of people, drunken, miserable, poverty-stricken, etc., who have become shining lights through their interposition. Instead of the Catholic doctrine of the intercession of the saints, we have the Protestant doctrine of the intercession of the street corner preacher, or of the Evangelistic Bible-banger. Now it is easy to dismiss all these stories as lies; and they are lies, inasmuch as they are not true. But they are not lies in the sense that they have been consciously invented by people who appreciate the fact that they are lies. Were this the case, there would be nothing to explain. These stories are usually told as though the speaker believes them to be true. I have, myself, been faced in a public meeting by a man who told the audience of a conversation he had with me while I was in the Salvation Army. And I believe the man actually was convinced he was speaking the truth. And, after all, the average mind is not built for elaborate, constructive lying. It would be a stronger, even a better mind, if it were. It is more a carelessness of the truth that is in evidence, added to an intense power of self-deception, which, in turn, rests upon the foundation of an ill-trained intellect and a badly balanced emotional nature.

A Catalogue of Mendacity.

It would fill a very large volume were one to give a detailed description of all the lies that have been perpetuated in the name of religion. There is the lie historical, which is illustrated in the gross distortion of historic truth in the interest of Christianity. There is the lie documentary, illustrated in the deliberate fabrication of documents to support one branch or another of the Christian Church, or of Christianity in general. There is the lie sectarian, which consists in the lies manufactured and circulated by one Christian sect of other Christian sects, or the lies told by Christians as a whole of non-Christians. There is the ethical lie of the moral benefits flowing from Christianity, or of the moral evil resulting from its absence. All these, and others, are plain to the most casual investigation, and they may perhaps be summed up in the cultural lie, the lie that the world's progress and welfare have ever been to any extent dependent on belief in the Christian religion. Taken altogether, one might challenge the world to show another religion that has been so buttressed by lies as Christianity has been.

The Lie of Death.

But the two most persistent and most popular of all pious lies are what one may call the lie of death and the lie of conversion. The lie of death has two phases. It used to be mainly concerned with the deaths of unbelievers, who passed away shrieking in an agony of remorse for God to forgive them. Nearly every great Freethinker, and thousands of small ones, have died in this way. But of late years, as Freethinkers have become more numerous and better known, this lie has lost its force, and it has been largely replaced by the death of the Christian who sent for a particular parson and died "a beautiful death." This, for some time, was a favourite with the Bishop of London. Over and over again he explained how he had been sent for and had just left the death-bed of "one of my dear boys"; and this happened so frequently that it looked as though Providence had deliberately killed some poor devil in order to provide the Bishop with a pathetic passage for his sermon. But the curious part of the whole matter is this: Death-beds are not uncommon; most people have stood by them; and everyone knows that people do not die in this way. In nearly every case, when death comes, brain and body are so worn that death is quite peaceful. It comes as a sleep, bringing relief, not terror. Yet this death-bed lie is a fairly constant one. Why do people believe it? Those who hear it know that their own experience gives it the lie. And yet the testimony of daily life does not seem proof against this pulpit legend, nor do clergymen seem to feel that they are acting wrongly in manufacturing these death-bed scenes.

The Lie of Conversion.

The stories of Christian conversion are equally mendacious. When we read of how the character of A or B was miraculously changed by this tract or that prayer, we do not need detailed examination to pronounce the story false, we know it is a lie. Character is not changed in this way. Miracles are as foreign to the moral world as to the world of physical being. And, as with death-beds, so with conversions. What strikes the critical observer is their monotony. The convert at a revival meeting nearly always tells the same tale. He has always led a desperately wicked life, and he usually seems sorry it was not worse. And the younger ones, waiting their turn for conversion, watch the convert with admiration, wondering how they can pile up a similar record of repudiated rascality. But age matters little in these matters. Quite young people can be found accusing themselves of desperate villainy, and exulting in their depravity—before they accepted Jesus. The similarity of these stories is proof of their falsity, and one hardly knows at which to marvel most—the untruthfulness of the speakers or the credulity of the listeners.

An Evil Environment.

The psychology of religious lying remains an unsolved problem unless we bear in mind the important consideration that in a religious atmosphere ethical values change their nature. A parson will say in the pulpit things he would not say elsewhere, because the pulpit has its own ethic, and its own canons of intellectual righteousness. These stories of conversion, of death-beds, and the like, are part and parcel of the furniture of the pulpit; they are repeated generation after generation, and every young preacher who comes along annexes them as his own. One may get them all in volumes specially prepared for the use of preachers. The whole atmosphere of the pulpit is so unreal that the preacher may with impunity indulge in behaviour that in the social or business world would cause him to be marked as a man whose word was not to be trusted. Every preacher is following a profession in which the great question is not What is true? but What is useful? The end justifies the means, and here the sole end is the advancement of religious belief. Neither carefulness of thought nor accuracy of speech are looked for or desired. Preacher and hearer move for the time being in an environment thick with mental falsities and insincerities, and not the least of the evils of religion are illustrated in the lives of those who—

> Keep on till their own lies deceive 'em,
> And oft repeating, at length believe 'em.

The Pulpit Discrediting Itself.

AT this year's meeting of the Wesleyan Conference, recently held in London, special attention was directed to the mournful fact that for a considerable period Methodism has been steadily losing ground in this country. The Rev. Samuel Chadwick said "there was reason for distress in Methodism, for they could not lose twenty to thirty thousand people in a decade, and still be complacent." The ex-President, Dr. Tasker, however, while admitting the numerical decrease, declined to regard it as being in the highest sense a real loss, for he had found that, "judging from personal observation made during his year of office, the spiritual advance in Methodism was intensive rather than extensive." What exactly Dr. Tasker meant by that statement does not appear, for although there is everywhere a deepening concern for the spiritual welfare of the young, the fact remains, and must be faced, "that in the Church, as in the nation, they lost a potential army every year." To be of any real value, the advance must be extensive as well as intensive. What is true of Methodism is equally, if not more, true of almost every other denomination. For at least two decades the influence of the Churches has been perceptibly on the wane. Despite the numerous conferences for the strengthening of the spiritual life that take place in different parts of the land, despite all the committees and schemes and programmes for the revival of religion, the Churches are becoming more and more ethically impotent. This is an incontrovertible fact; and yet Christian workers must act as if they were ignorant of it. Dr. Tasker quoted the following rule in the Royal Navy: "No officer shall speak discouragingly to his mate either on the watch or at the mess concerning the business in which he is or may be engaged," and then he added that "they must not go up and down the Church manifesting the spirit of discouragement and uttering words of pessimism." With all due deference to the ex-President, we are bound to pronounce his policy essentially misleading and disastrous. It is the policy resorted to by the ostrich when danger threatens, and it has been pursued by the Church in all perlods of its history. It is the policy of crying, "Peace, peace," when even the possibility of peace is absent.

Is it any wonder that people of intelligence are renouncing the Churches? Can anything be more damaging to the cause of religion than the report of the discussion on the state of the Church at the Wesleyan Conference, which is contained in the Christian World for August 2? Dr. Watkinson, for example, deprecated pessimism, saying that a red flag was better than a wet blanket. A great writer had said: "When any system becomes inoperative, manure it with pessimism"; but he warned the brethren against adopting a needlessly pessimistic attitude towards religion. Nevertheless, there is no possible escape from the fact that the culture of the age is alienating itself from the Christian faith, and that the emptying of churches and chapels is a natural result. Natural knowledge is gradually undermining supernatural belief. Reason is slowly exposing the irrational character of most pulpit utterances. A few Sunday evenings ago we attended a well-known church in the West of London, whose first minister recently retired after a long pastorate of exceptional brilliance. The present occupier of the pulpit is a fair specimen of the Nonconformist teacher of the day, tolerably liberal in theology, but clearly dominated by what is usually called the Nonconformist conscience. He has an excellent command of language, and his sermons are evidently prepared with consummate care and committed to memory. Like his predecessor, he has the courage of his convictions, though the convictions themselves are not intellectually courageous. In his prayer, for example, he dwelt upon our limitations as human beings, but thanked God that by grace we are enabled to transcend them. Of course, if the Christian religion were true, our limitations could easily be transcended. Our supernatural second birth would endow us with supernatural gifts which would naturally give rise to supernatural deeds. As a matter of fact, however, no human being has ever risen above his limitations. Christians are in no respects whatever superior to non-Christians. The very claim that they can do all things through Christ who strengthens them, is laughed to scorn by the facts of their lives. To thoughtful people such a prayer, as the one to which we allude, is a proof that the man who makes it either does not think at all, but is lost in a sea of superstition, or else is intellectually dishonest, for he cannot be ignorant of the fact that both he and his congregation are utterly incapable of demonstrating its truth in daily life.

The sermon was based upon Isaiah xxii. 1: "The burden of the valley of vision." The theme of the discourse was the burdensomeness of clear vision. They who see clearly and feel keenly the evils by which they are surrounded are necessarily burden bearers, and happiness is impossible to them unless they are doing their utmost to remove those evils. That is an entirely reasonable sentiment, with which no sane person can disagree; and for a time the preacher's treatment of it was perfectly justifiable. It is a natural truth, which is the common property of mankind, and the preacher had the hearty support of all his hearers as long as he so treated it. Unfortunately, he soon drifted into theological quagmires, in which he hopelessly floundered for the rest of the time. Behind all movements was God, and woe was to all who failed to recognize his presence. The War was his "visitation," and in it there was a special message to us Britishers. Well, now, those who saw clearly and felt deeply the evil of our conduct during this War, bore a burden which crushed them to the ground. The newspapers stated that, in spite of many hostile air-raids, Londoners were calm; but it was an appalling lie. Londoners were not, and had no right to be, calm. And yet, after all, Londoners were calm—indecently, wickedly calm. Even the Government did not realize the seriousness of the situation, but acted as if God did not exist at all. Instead of rending their clothes and covering themselves with sackcloth, and ordering the people to do the same, they forgot God, made pleasure and luxury cheap, and provided more beer. The preacher was now in a sarcastic mood, and, from his own idealistic heights, looked down upon the Government and the majority of the British people with withering contempt. They laughed when they ought to weep; they drank beer when they should be filled to overflowing with the Holy Spirit; they flocked to places of amusement when even their half-suppressed sense of duty called upon them to be on their knees, in penitential tears, before God in his temple.

Of course, to the preacher it could not but be galling to be aware that, whilst his chapel was far from being half full, a picture palace not many yards off was crowded to the doors for five hours. Of course, too, the people who frequented the latter place were culpably frivolous, whose love of pleasure proved their ruin. On a Sunday evening all serious-minded and honest-hearted folk were to be found in the house of God. We repeat that to the preacher such estimates of character were professionally natural, and had he but spoken in his own name we could not have found any grievous fault with them, but would have attributed them to his professional vanity and jealousy. But he spoke in the name of God, whom he held responsible for his own ignorant prejudice and bigotry. All the way through, he acted as Heaven's spokesman.

Now, is it surprising that men and women, who think for themselves, refuse to take the preacher at his own valuation, and, therefore, pay no heed whatever to his various utterances? Were he to speak in his own name, even those who now believe in him would turn away from him in disgust, and very soon nearly all our pulpits would be unoccupied.

J. T. Lloyd.

Edward Fitzgerald.

That same gentle spirit from whose pen
Large streams of honey and sweet nectar flow.
—Spenser.

The appearance in a threepenny edition of Edward Fitzgerald's Omar Khayyam makes one regret the days when mischievous books were publicly burned by the common hangman.—Daily Mail.

Edward Fitzgerald, a great English writer, died in 1883, almost unknown. Only a few people had even heard his name. The public had very little chance of hearing it, for he was so shy and retiring that he took more pains to avoid fame than others do to seek it. He wrote about remote subjects, which appealed only to extremely cultured people. When his friend, Alfred Tennyson, dedicated Tiresias to Fitzgerald, the tribute seemed merely the outcome of friendship. The ordinary reader discounted the praise of that—

Golden Eastern lay,
Than which I know no version done
In English more divinely well.

To-day Fitzgerald's version of Omar Khayyam is probably read as much as any verse except that of Shakespeare. It is quoted in leading articles, and few modern novels are complete without one or more quotations from its quatrains; and its haunting verses have been set to music.

If a man is known by his friends, the world has small need of a formal introduction to Edward Fitzgerald. He was a man of many and notable friendships. At school he made acquaintance with James Spedding, the Baconian critic, and at Cambridge University with Thackeray. The years which followed united him to the brothers Alfred and Frederick Tennyson, Thomas Carlyle, Bernard Barton, the quaker poet, Lawrence, the painter, and others.

Fitzgerald's biographer, like the immortal knife-grinder, has no story to tell. He was born at Bredfield, near Woodbridge, in 1809; the same year as Tennyson and Darwin. He was educated at Bury St. Edmunds, and afterwards at Cambridge. He followed no profession after taking his degree. Till 1853, though he often shifted his quarters, he lived mainly in a thatched cottage at Boulge, near Woodbridge, close to his brother's residence, Boulge Hall. He was in lodgings in Woodbridge from 1860 to 1874, when he settled in a small house of his own outside the town, named, at the wish of a lady friend, "Little Grange." And "Laird of Little Grange," as he humorously signed himself, he remained till he died, aged seventy-four, in June, 1883. He is buried in Boulge Churchyard, and a rose, transplanted from the tomb of old Omar Khayyam, has been planted over his grave.

Fitzgerald lived the life of a recluse in Suffolk on the North Sea coast. His friend Carlyle saw in it all "a peaceable, affectionate, ultra-modest man," and an innocent, far niente life. Like Shelley, he had a great fondness for the sea, and a deep affection for fishermen and sailors. One old Viking, the hero-fisherman of Lowestoft, whom we know as "Posh," he numbered among his personal friends. Fitzgerald characteristically considered "Posh" a greater man than either Tennyson or Thackeray, because he was not self-conscious. The Viking succumbed to an undue devotion to Bacchus, but that did not trouble Fitzgerald, for he was no harsh judge of human frailties. Curiously, the man who gave us Omar's Rubaiyat, that immortal rhapsody of wine, woman, and song, was very abstemious. He was a vegetarian, and he nearly killed his friend Tennyson by persuading him, too, to turn vegetarian for six weeks.

Fitzgerald's books were all published without his name on the title-page, except his version of Calderon's dramas. He wrote a memoir to an edition of the poems of his friend, Bernard Barton. Later he printed his remarkable dialogue, Euphranor. Polonius, and a rendering of the Agamemnon, and four editions of his masterpiece, the Omar Khayyam, came out before his death; the first appearing in the year of Darwin's Origin of Species, without gaining any immediate recognition.

Owing to his living in the country, Fitzgerald devoted much time to his correspondence, and he was a most delightful letter-writer. His friends, be it remembered, were men of outstanding ability, and the companion of such giants must have been no ordinary character. When a man is loved by other men of his own intellectual stature, and of a wholly different type, we may be certain there is something genuine about him. Men do not like another man simply because he is a genius, least of all when they happen to be geniuses themselves. It would not have been possible for Fitzgerald to keep on writing uninteresting letters to such men for nearly half a century. Indeed, Fitzgerald's letters are among the best in the language. There is hardly a dull line in them, and they are most charming and piquant reading on account of their literary heresies and heterodoxy. His taste was all for ancient books, old friends, familiar jests, and well-known places. His special literary favourites were really great writers, and he loved Cervantes and Scott, Montaigne and Madame de Sevigne, she herself a lover of Montaigne, and with a spice of his Freethought and speech in her. Of course, he loved that old Persian infidel, Omar Khayyam, with whom his own fame is so intimately associated; and that other old-world Freethinker, Lucretius. London had no attractions for him, chiefly because it hid Nature. Like Thoreau, Fitzgerald knew by instinct the life that suited him, and had the wisdom to refuse to be turned aside from it.

If any justification were needed, his version of Omar's wonderful "Rose of the hundred-and-one petals" would be enough. The perennial charm of that immortal poem is that it voices with no uncertain sound the scepticism at the back of all thoughtful men's minds, and makes magnificent music of it. What a translation of Omar was Fitzgerald's! "A plant larger than the sun which cast it," said his friend Tennyson. In truth, the translation is finer than the original, and in this resembles the Authorized Version of the New Testament, which, as Swinburne reminds us, is translated from "canine Greek" to "divine English."

In his version of the Rubaiyat, Fitzgerald showed himself a consummate artist. The magnificent opening is pure, unadulterated Fitzgerald; and again and again throughout the poem the master hand is revealed. In one of the later verses, by the addition of two words, Fitzgerald has turned a commonplace into the most fearful indictment ever uttered by man against Deity:—

> O Thou, who man of baser earth didst make,
> And even with paradise devise the Snake,
> For all the sin wherewith the face of man
> Is blackened, man's forgiveness give—and take.

In particular, Fitzgerald voices Materialism:—

> Oh threats of Hell and hopes of Paradise!
> One thing, at least, is certain—This life flies.
> One thing is certain, and the rest is lies;
> The flower that once has blown for ever dies.

Lamentation, just as in Æschylus, or Marcus Aurelius, or even the Book of Job, is apparent in the poem, and it is allied to "linked sweetness, long drawn out":—

> Yet ah! that spring should vanish with the rose,
> That youth's sweet-scented manuscript should close;
> The nightingale that in the branches sang,
> Ah, whence and whither flown again—who knows?

Fitzgerald derides prayer in verse of passionate bitterness:—

> And that inverted bowl they call the sky,
> Whereunder crawling, cooped, we live and die,
> Lift not your hands to It for help, for it
> As impotently rolls as you and I.

Like Lucretius, the old-world Freethinker, Fitzgerald introduces argument into his poetry, and with the same deadly effect. Noting how self-contradictory is theology, he says:—

> What! out of senseless Nothing to provoke
> A conscious Something to resent the yoke
> Of unpermitted pleasure, under pain
> Of everlasting penalties if broke!
> What! from his helpless creature be repaid
> Pure gold for what he lent him, dross alloyed—
> Sue for a debt he never did contract,
> And cannot answer—oh, the sorry trade!

"A sense of tears in human things" breaks out in the following:—

> Ah, Love, could you and I with Him conspire
> To grasp this sorry scheme of things entire;
> Would we not shatter it to bits, and then
> Remould it nearer to the heart's desire?

In his adaptation of Omar, Edward Fitzgerald, the shy English poet, dreamed one dream more lasting than we ourselves, or he, or the very Suffolk coast he lived on. He gives all who care to read the freedom of that ancient Eastern city of dreams, while far transcends in mystery and splendour the Orient men go out in the ships to see.

Oh! immortals of literature! The old Persian poet sees his vision and writes it; and eight centuries after, the tired merchant, forgetting for a space his counting-house and ledgers, lives a freer life in the wonderland of the poet's genius. Here are nymphs and roses, grotesque imaginings, and human memories. This is immortality indeed! Under the spell of the poet's genius he dreams the self-same dream for one little hour, and is refreshed.

Science, Telepathy, and Communion with the Dead.

IV.

It is with the psychical phenomena that Spiritualists are now mainly concerned, and when we examine the materials for belief in, and knowledge of the conditions under which the departed exist in, another life, which these supply, one is staggered that minds of lofty conceptions and ideals can build on them the superstructure of personal immortality. From the enormous mass of communications purporting to come from discarnate spirits, not an ennobling nor high-toned message can be extracted; all, all is nauseating, frivolous, mischievous, spurious drivel. Through his control (the spirit of) a little Indian girl Feda (The spirit of) Raymond Lodge tells his father that the houses in the Beyond are made "from sort of emanations from the earth"; that his white robe is "made from decayed worsted on your side"; that he has his "little doggie" with him; that cigars made "out of essences and ethers and gases" are provided for smokers, and "whisky-sodas" for drinkers! Faugh!—Edward Clodd, "Strand Magazine" (July, 1917), p. 54.

It is extremely unsafe to assume that because Sir Oliver Lodge is a high authority upon electricity, therefore his conclusions about ghosts must be well founded and worthy of adoption. Probably few people would maintain that they adopt his conclusions about ghosts on the ground that he > is an authority upon electricity, but there is no doubt whatever that this is in fact the ground on which a very great many people do adopt his conclusions.—Dr. Charles A. Mercier, "Spiritualism and Sir Oliver Lodge" (1917), p. 68.

Sir Oliver Lodge approaches Spiritualism in the same spirit in which he approaches religion, and between the scientific spirit and the religious spirit there is open war, which will only come to an end by the utter defeat of one side or the other. Sir Oliver himself has pointed out this opposition. In his Man and the Universe (1908; p. 11), he observes:—

> In disposition, also, Religion and Science are opposite. Science cultivates a vigorous, adult, intelligent, serpent-like wisdom, and active interference with the course of nature; religion fosters a meek, receptive, child-hearted attitude of dove-like resignation to the Divine will.

And it is the child-hearted attitude he adopts in spiritualistic investigations. Mr. Edward Clodd says that an intimate friend of Sir Oliver described him as "longing to believe something." And Mr. Clodd further quotes him as arguing that "in dealing with psychical phenomena, a hazy, muzzy state of mind is better than a mind 'keenly awake' and 'on the spot.'"[1] Probably Dr. Mercier was not aware of these facts, or he would not have expressed such amazement at the simplicity and credulity exhibited by Sir Oliver Lodge in the presence of fraud and humbug.

For instance, Sir Oliver devotes nearly the whole of chapter iv. of his Survival of Man to recording his experiments with the two daughters of Herr von Lyro during the summer of 1892, while staying for a fortnight at their house at Portschach am See, Carinthia. In this case, one of the young ladies, while holding the hand of the other, was able to name the number of pips on the cards that were invisible to the speaker, but visible to the sister who held her hand; but when their hands were parted they could do nothing. Sir Oliver tells us "very slight contact was sufficient, for instance, through the backs of the knuckles; but directly the hands were separated, even though but a quarter of an inch, the phenomena ceased—reappearing again directly contact was established."[2]

As Dr. Mercier points out, in an analysis of Sir Oliver's account of this experiment, everything points to the use of the Morse code, and remarks:—

> Out of sixteen attempts, ten were successful. Really, the ladies must have been very clumsy if they could produce no better result than this, after years of practice. I have had no practice at all, but I would undertake to get fifteen out of sixteen right at the first attempt, and to name the suit after five minutes' trial with a confederate. But note what follows: Sir Oliver Lodge enters into an elaborate mathematical calculation to show that this amazing result could not possibly be the result of chance guessing. He shows that the probabilities are 8008 to 1310 that it is not the result of chance. Less than one in a million, that is![3]

But, as Dr. Mercier observes, "Who on earth supposes that it was the result of chance?" And he compares Sir Oliver's mathematical calculation to the patter of the conjurer who wishes to distract the attention from what he does not wish to be seen. "What should be proved is that it could not have been due to collusion, and no mathematical calculation can prove this. The mathematics are a red herring—a red herring? They are 8008 red herrings, they are 1310 red herrings drawn across the scent."[4]

Sir Oliver Lodge admits that this case is not strong enough to convince sceptics, although he has no doubt of its genuineness himself. As Dr. Mercier remarks, seeing that these experiments are, "on Sir Oliver Lodge's own showing, utterly worthless, it is a pity that for the sake of his own reputation he did not suppress them." As to Sir Oliver's testimony as to the "absolutely genuine and artless manner" in which the young ladies operated, and the "transparent honesty of purpose of all concerned," Dr. Mercier caustically remarks: "What did he expect? Is it the custom for tricksters to behave so as to put their dupes on their guard? Did he watch to see whether Miss R. and Miss E. winked at one another? And as he did not detect them in winking, did he conclude that they must be genuine? Is not every dupe of the confidence trick, or the gold brick swindle, or the Spanish prisoner swindle, perfectly convinced of the transparent honesty of purpose of all concerned? Did he expect that if they were not genuine they would come in masks and cloaks, and whisper together in corners? Apparently he did, and since they behaved in the genuine and artless manner in which ordinary conjurers always do behave, he was convinced that they could not be conjurers Of what value is his assurance that he believes these performances were genuine?"[5]

It is all of a piece with Sir Oliver's belief in Eusapia Paladino, even after her exposure at Cambridge, when he declared that some of her phenomena might be due to trickery, but not all!

Again, Dr. Mercier joins issue with Sir Oliver upon a plain matter of fact. The Doctor quotes Sir Oliver Lodge as stating, with regard to the famous medium Mrs. Piper, that when she wakes from the trance, during which she communicates with the spirits of the dean, "The look of ecstasy on Mrs. Piper's face at a certain stage in the working process is manifestly similar to that seen in the faces of some dying people; and both describe the subjective visions as of something more beautiful and attractive than those of earth."

This belief in the ecstatic look on the faces of the dying, and their description of beautiful visions seen during their last moments, has been made familiar by means of countless Christian tracts. In fact, nearly all Christian heroes are made to die uttering beautiful sentiments and seeing glorious visions; while unbelievers and sceptics are made to see horrid sights and die in hopeless despair, to the sound of mocking laughter.

The falsity of these fancy pictures has been exposed many times in these columns; but we are glad to give the additional testimony of so eminent a practitioner as Dr. Mercier, who declares:—

> As a medical man of many years' residence in medical institutions, I am sure I have seen very many more dying people than Sir Oliver Lodge has, and I have never yet witnessed a look of ecstasy on the face of the dying person. I have asked old and experienced nurses who have seen many more people die than I have, and none of them will say that she has seen a look of ecstasy on the face of a dying person. Dying people often murmur unintelligibly, but neither I nor any I have been able to consult has ever heard a dying person describe subjective visions of something more beautiful and attractive than those of earth. People who die slowly of disease almost always lose much of their consciousness a considerable time before death, and when they are so near death that they can be said to be certainly dying, they have, so far as appearance goes, either no consciousness at all, or so little that it compares with full consciousness as the light of the moon in its last quarter to the glare of the sun at noon. People in such a condition are speechless, and unable to describe any visions, even if they experienced any visions, which is in the last degree unlikely. This is not > a criticism on a trivial point of detail. Mrs. Piper's look of ecstasy is adduced by Sir Oliver Lodge to assimilate her trance condition to the condition of the dying, and so to render more likely her communications with the dead. This is one of rare instances in which we are able to test the accuracy of Sir Oliver Lodge's testimony, and it does not encourage us to place reliance on his testimony when we cannot test it.[1]

But to return to Telepathy, as Dr. Ivor Tuckett has remarked, "the curious fact about the evidence for psychic force, psychometry, spirit-control and telepathy is that conclusive test cases are always attended by failure, and that in other cases the supposed successful observations can seldom or never be repeated."[2] In this matter they resemble miracles, people believe that the dead came to life again two thousand years ago, they also believe that at some distant day everybody will come to life again, but they cannot produce a case to-day.

Sir Ray Lankester tells us that when Sir Oliver Lodge, some years ago, declared that telepathy had been proved:—

> At the time, I challenged (in a letter to the press) Sir Oliver Lodge's statement that telepathy had been "discovered." I asked for the demonstration necessary to justify the assertion that telepathy had been "discovered." I professed my willingness to investigate this phenomenon stated to occur in our midst and its asserted discovery. No opportunity of investigating it has ever been offered to me by those who declare that it exists. I was definitely refused the opportunity of examining the asserted phenomenon for which I applied to the Society for Psychical Research.[3]

Time and again, money has been offered for a single test proof of telepathy, without result. A gentleman writes to the Literary Guide (August, 1910), saying "my offer of paying £50 for a single case of telepathy has been made so often during the last four or five years that I begin to doubt it if there is any evidence-worthy of the name—though I have read all the ex parte statements published to date."

A friend of Dr. Ivor Tuckett offered £1,000 to three of the leading English authorities on telepathy for satisfactory proof of one single case with the following result:—

> The first replied at once, expressing surprise at my imagining "that incontrovertible evidence could be obtained at all in an inductive problem"! The second at first very kindly expressed his willingness to help, and appeared very keen to meet me and talk the matter over; but, after seeing No. 1, he wrote, "Whilst anxious to help you, I could not undertake to prove the results of a long and difficult investigation to order or for a pecuniary offer," and the third replied, "You may offer £1,000,000 with perfect safety. No sane person will back any mortal to do telepathy to order."[4]

This offer of a thousand pounds has been publicly advertised in the Times without result. The only reply Sir Oliver Lodge makes to the offer is an outrageous insult. He says: "The business man takes another line and offers a thousand pounds for proofs which will convince him. He has, of course, no intention of parting with the money, and is quite satisfied that he can resist any temptation to be convinced.....To all wagers of this kind I trust that those connected with the S.P.R. will always turn a deaf and contemptuous ear."[5]

The telepathists offer you tons of evidence on paper, but when you ask for a morsel of evidence now, as a test, they turn "a deaf and contemptuous ear." To say the least of it, it looks suspicious.

Perhaps the writer of the letter signed "J. J. O.", in last week's Freethinker, will accept the above as an answer. What is wanted is not testimony—certainly not the testimony of dreams which "J. J. O." offers—but a scientific test. If we went on testimony alone, we should have to believe in miracles, witchcraft, sorcery, and a host of other ridiculous and impossible things.

"J. J. O." says that having been in a church choir most of his life, he has "a wholesome contempt for the supernatural." I cannot see the connection. Choristers are not usually regarded as being more rational, or sceptical, than other people.

A Jesuit Question-Box.

THE correspondence columns of newspapers are an interesting and amusing study, especially those appearing in religious newspapers. There is the clerical enquire-within-upon-everything type of person who makes much literary to do about nothing, and generally leaves his correspondent to take religion as he likes it. This type may be met with in the Christian Commonwealth and other "advanced" religious journals. At present, however, I have before me a pious journal of a very different order—the Sodality Magazine—issued in connection with the Jesuit sodality of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

In this issue (July, 1917) there are three pages of what is called Sodality Correspondence, albeit it is quite clear that some of it does not come from members of the sodality, but is supposed to originate from what Catholics sympathetically call (in England) "our separated brethren." Elsewhere they are damned heretics. But that's another story. These answers to correspondents are written (presumably) by a Jesuit priest, and probably he is also the inventor of the questions he answers. His reverence is by way of being a wit of sorts, and his advice and directions are eloquent of the mentality of his readers for whom, of course, they are provided.

A good Catholic boy wants to know if there is anything wrong in boxing? and is told to "go in for these things." Another youth who signs himself (quite unnecessarily) "Scrupulous," wants to know "at what age should a fellow give up kissing girl friends?" He is told that "this is a puzzle," but "we asked a lady friend, and she said: 'Silly boy, tell him not to give it up at all.'" The scrupulous one is told not to "make any drastic change."

These answers are comprehensible. The Church wants fighters, and she doesn't want "mixed" marriages!

The writer seems to try to compensate his clients for his theological intolerance by his practical liberality. He has a kindly eye for all the weaknesses of men and women—except when they are theological weaknesses. Some one wants to know: "Is it wrong for a devout lady to smoke a cigarette?" Answer: "We prefer it to a pipe, which is not elegant. It all depends upon custom." And so on.

Another set of these questions purport to come from non-Catholics, and these enquiries are answered so as to make those who are supposed to have asked them appear ridiculous in the eyes of the pious readers of the Sodality Magazine. Thus some one ("M.S.J.")—I cannot help wondering if this is a cryptic joke, and these initials mean member of the Society of Jesus—is supposed to have written saying: "I don't believe in the Devil." Answer:—

> Dear Sir, glad to hear it. That was Eve's little mistake.....Fact is, dear Sir, you do believe in the Devil when he says he doesn't exist. Some day you will find he does. He's got his tail coiled right round what you gracefully call your intellect.

Similar is the reply to "H.W.," who asks: "Have any Popes gone to Hell?" Answer:—

> In a few years you may be able to find out. Its pretty certain an Apostle did. Yes, about three Popes were nothing to boast of, but they were better than the "spiritual head" of the Anglican Church, the Tudor Blue Beard.

Again, "Mrs. H.W." writes to say: "My dear husband, dead now five years, speaks to me every night. How can you say Spiritualism isn't true?" Answer:—

> Poor man, we expect its the first opportunity he's had of getting a word in. We don't say Spiritualism isn't true, but its dangerous playing with the Devil (we are not referring to the dear departed). You may ring his majesty up but you may not be able to ring him off.

If the readers of this stuff think these are replies to genuine correspondents, one wonders what sort of taste and intelligence they have if they can chuckle, as doubtless they are intended to, over them.

Finally, there are here some few serious answers to what look more like serious questions from Catholics. Thus, "J.N.A." enquires why the Church forbids marriages of cousins. Answer:—

> The reason why the Church forbids marriages between very near relatives is because experience proves that the children of such marriages are frequently weak, unhealthy and queer, and we have quite enough of these. Still it is possible to obtain a dispensation (italics mine).

The health and sanity of the next generation is not a doctrine of the Church, and so, even when she knows you are going to put these in jeopardy, you may have a dispensation to do so—for a consideration, of course.

My only reason for making this trash the subject of an article is to point out that in these little pious magazines, in their sodalities, confraternities, and Sunday-schools, the Churches are as crude as ever. In this particular case those who know Catholicism from the inside will recognize the spirit and method of this writer as characteristic. The Church's aim is to prevent people thinking, and among her flock she does it very often by setting up the pleasing delusion that they are thinking and debating, and getting the best of it. As so often happens, the outsider sees most of the game.

The writer of these highly courteous replies invites his "non-Catholic (small n and cap C, Mr. Printer, please) brethren" to inquire of him privately as to their religious difficulties. It is to be hoped his private correspondence is as revelatory of Catholicism as are his public answers.

Alan Handsacre.

Acid Drops.

The Chaplain-General to the Forces writes to the papers asking for mid-day prayers on behalf of soldiers. He says he knows "how much it is valued and counted upon by them." We are surprised the soldiers do not make their needs in this direction better known through their private correspondence instead of leaving it to Bishop Taylor Smith. If anyone should ask, "Have we not prayed for three years?" Bishop Taylor Smith replies that the "Lord of Hosts" has been with us. All we can say to that is, we wish his help had been more obviously effective.

The clergy sometimes let the cat out of the bag. The Rev. Dr. Selbie, President of the National Free Church Council, says, "if soldiers do not hate the Church, it is mainly because they despise it."

Canon Green, speaking at a meeting at Manchester, took up the attitude that God called the people to war in 1914, and now calls on them to stop fighting. The way these parsons receive trunk calls from the Almighty must excite the wonder of the ordinary man.

A sensational story of an airman singing to a leopard to scare it away was told in a daily paper. The story goes that the airman climbed a tree and the leopard moved around for forty-five minutes. The airman, a full-throated bass, burst out with "The Admiral's Broom," "Two Eyes of Grey," "O God, our Help in Ages Past," and concluded with a sonorous "Amen." The latter did the trick. Perhaps the leopard bolted to avoid a collection.

The Bishop of Winchester says "it is not true that the clergy have a soft job. Their lives are hard, especially in war-time." We do not know what his lordship's idea of a "soft job" may be; but most of the clergy are well paid for their work. Moreover, they are altogether exempted from military service. His lordship's own modest stipend is a paltry £130 a week.

The Salvation Army is advertising its "hostels," and the Girls' Friendly Society is asking for canteens for City girls. Surely this is taking the "bread of life" a little too literally.

As Mr. H. G. Wells becomes more pious, he is losing his sense of humour. Referring to a book published in 1908, he says it was the "wet clay" of God the Invisible King. This suggests that an invisible spirit is made of clay, which is almost as funny as the definition of Deity, "A sort of a something, somewhere."

The Bishop of London, in asking for prayers for victory throughout his diocese, says, "My own belief is that God alone saved us at that critical moment in the history of the world"—presumably at the Marne. We cannot say God was not with us, only we marvel that he was not with us earlier, or more effectively when he did arrive. That is the worst of gods. Either they do what we could do just as well without them, or they do nothing at all. And we prefer the god who does nothing.

"Confirmation, as a habit, is not confined to the Eversley jockeys. In his book on the Cotswolds, Mr. Francis Duckworth recalls the case of a servant girl in the Manor House at Stanton, in Gloucestershire. She had been confirmed three times. When interrogated on the subject she replied that she had found confirmation a good cure for rheumatism!"—Daily Chronicle.

"General" Booth suggests that "some of the depressed and hungry millions of the East could be fed and civilized and blessed there. They might even be loved and gospelled and saved." The non-military "general" might ask their permission before starting the offensive.

The Evening News says: "In every sense of the words the Pacifists of this country are a contemptible minority." Yet Christians profess to worship the Prince of Peace.

Of thirty-one Wesleyan ministers who are retiring, most of them have completed over forty years in the ministry. Evidently the profession is not a dangerous one.

The dear Daily News says "a certain type of modern journalism" works usually by noise, but "does not ignore the possibilities of silence." In plain English, the newspaper editors realize that prejudice may be created by saying too little as well as by saying too much. It does not say much for the glorious free press of a civilized country.

The late Rev. Henry Buckston, of Sutton-on-the-Hill, Derby, left estate of the value of £45,547. This sum seems sufficient to keep Brother Buckston from entering Paradise.

A newspaper paragraph states that Bishop Boyd Carpenter "has a country seat in Devonshire." The carpenter who founded the Christian religion had not where to lay his head.

The Daily Telegraph, explaining why the British Advance in the recent "push" was not greater, blames the weather, and remarks on the frequency with which it has been on the side of the enemy during the War. Now here, clearly, is a chance for the clergy. Providence has not had left it much of its ancient state, but God is still allowed some influence here. So let the clergy set to work and call the attention of Providence to the matter. Or, perhaps, some member of the House of Commons might put a question enquiring whether attention had been called to this unneutral behaviour of Providence.

What the newspapers call a "scene" occurred in the House of Commons during the debate on Mr. Henderson's visit to Paris. General Croft charged Mr. Ramsey Macdonald with being "on the side of the Germans." Mr. Macdonald asked him to withdraw the statement. The General offered justification. "The Hon. Member," he said, "believes in the brotherhood of man." The evidence not being considered decisive, the General withdrew the implication, but the frame of mind indicated by the remark is interesting. In the mind of General Croft it would seem that belief in the brotherhood of man and support of Germany is synonymous. We sincerely hope this is not the case, although it may well be that our own militarists see in the belief in the brotherhood of man an enemy to be dreaded.

In Ireland an order has been issued prohibiting the wearing of uniforms by other than members of the Forces. We wonder if this will affect the flat-chested warriors of the Salvation Army.

A headline in a daily paper reads, "Women Saviours." Why not? They can hardly be less successful at this business than men.

The rector who told his parishioners that the War stimulated church-going, will read with pleasure that some thousands of Londoners went to a church at Southgate recently and that the building will cost several hundred pounds to be restored.

Alluding to the mistaken views regarding education, Miss M. J. Tuke, M.A., Principal of Bedford College, London, said at a meeting at Hitchen, that up to the outbreak of war it was firmly thought that silly women made the best wives. Maybe this is one of the reasons why the Christian superstition still flourishes in our midst.

Dr. Charles Mercier, a specialist on mental diseases, has attacked Sir Oliver Lodge in a book, entitled Spiritualism and Sir Oliver Lodge. He says roundly that Sir Oliver and other professors "have shut their eyes and opened their mouths and swallowed any trash the mediums liked to present them with."

"The quality of priest and prophet is one which develops under encouragement and cultivation" says a writer in a daily paper. How true the remark is concerning the higher clergy, who point the thorny road to heaven whilst they tread the primrose path of dalliance on the salaries of cabinet ministers.

Says the Church Times: "It is not militarism that the world is suffering from, but bellicosity, and, if peace were absolutely and permanently assured, it might still be worth while to pay for a big army as a training-ground for a nation under arms." We gave one instance a week or so back (the Daily Telegraph appeal to the Catholic Church to assist in the application of conscription to Ireland), and here is another, of the sinister alliance between militarism and religion. We may take it for granted that when this War is over, and the attempt is made to foist permanent conscription on this country, we shall find the Church using its best efforts in its behalf. Religion and militarism have always run well together, and will continue in double harness to the end of the chapter.

Our very pious contemporary quite reverses the truth in the above statement. Bellicosity is not at all a bad thing; militarism, which may be taken as a special manifestation of bellicosity, is detestable. The fighting impulse in man leads to discovery, to invention, to improvement; and the man who is fighting against war may be a more pugnacious individual than the one engaged in warfare. The usual error made by the militarist is to assume that because one protests against the value of armed warfare, one is blind to the importance of struggle and effort in human affairs. And if peace were permanently assured, what value is it to have a nation under arms? Is it to keep the home population in order?

The Irvine Valley News, a Scottish local weekly for July 20, contains a lively and thoughtful article from one of the Conscientious Objectors imprisoned at Dartmoor. The following passage is both amusing and interesting:—

> Dartmoor to-day has another side—bright to dazzling point, and the man who does not find humour here would not find salt water at "Trin." Now this that I'm gaun tae tell is as true as there is spite in a cat. On oor stairheid there are 23 different religious and political parties. We have Quakers, P.B.'s, Seventh Day Adventists, Pentecostalists, Salvationists, I.B.S.'ers, Christian Scientists, I.L.P.'ers, B.S P.'ers, Anarchists, Atheists, Deists, and heaven only knows what. From one cell door you will see a banner flying, "Jesus Saves"; another, "Socialism the World Hope"; another, "There is joy in heaveh"; while opposite an Atheist will fly his banner asking, "And where the Hell's Heaven?"

We should not be at all surprised if some leave Dartmoor with very different ideas from those with which they entered its precincts.

Dr. Selbie, President of the Free Church Council, and Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford, says it is fatal for the Church to go to people with a list of "dont's." In this case the Church is doomed, for the Ten Commandments all commence "Thou shalt not."

At the Grocers' Conference at Plymouth a speaker called for the prohibition of trading after ten o'clock on Sundays. The time selected would enable the Sabbath breakers to count their ill-gotten gains, and afterwards attend a place of worship and confess they were miserable sinners.

Charged as an absentee at Gateshead, Ernest Bell, a fruiterer, said he was a member of the Church of Christ, and conducted services. The magistrates held that he was entitled to exemption. Even half-time holiness has its advantages.

Some excitement was caused at a Christian Convention at Brighton through the Rev. Charles Inwood asking a blessing for an unnamed "military hospital where God's name is never mentioned except in ridicule." We have no doubt but that Mr. Inwood exaggerates, but we suppose his lament may be taken as an admission that the War is knocking the fear of religion out of the minds of many. Mr. Inwood also prayed for mercy on "doctors and nurses who scorn to think of Thy Holy Name." So that some Brighton hospitals are quite in a bad way—from the Christian point of view.

An Essex clergyman says that the world needs "the Peace of God." This is a peace that passeth all understanding.

To Correspondents.

E. L.—We do not care to discuss the question of German versus British missionaries. You may be quite sure the trader is not far behind either or both. All we feel warranted in saying of both is that they are always a nuisance, and often a dangerous nuisance.

E. B.—Thanks for quotations and cuttings. It is good of you to take so much trouble.

J. Niel.—Quite a good heading, as you say. Thanks.

G. E. Quirk.—You are doing good work in getting letters, such as the one contributed by you to Common Sense, into the public press. We wish more of our readers would follow your example.

C. W. B.—Received. Shall be pleased to use some of the verses.

A. V. Harris.—Very pleased to hear from you. Am sending some literature for use among the men, which we hope will prove useful.

Lance-Corpl. Royston.—Pamphlets being sent as requested. Will do what we can to make the agents more attentive, but please continue to apply pressure at your end.

A. A. Partem.—We do not think you have taken the real point of last week's "Views." We should not have blamed the clergy, as citizens, for their support of the War. Our criticism was concerned with their attitude as clergymen, and to have claimed exemption afterwards was surely the height of folly—or knavery. You are correct that there are no creeds in this War, and that in Germany Freethinkers will be saying the same things as Freethinkers here. But surely there is a distinction between this and people in both countries praying to the same Deity, and thanking him for his assistance? Finally, we cheerfully concede that there are rules governing war as there are rules governing the prize ring, and that those are to blame who break these rules. But that hardly touches the point that the rules of war are, considered as a fight between men, on a lower level than the rules of the "ring."

T. C.—Glad to know you were pleased with article. The praise of one who possesses discrimination is always appreciated.

A. L. Morris.—A chapter on "Cain's Wife" was included in G. W. Foote's Bible Romances. There is no elaborate treatise on the subject that we can call to mind, the subject being hardly of sufficient importance.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Too late for notice last week, we received a copy of the Hawick Express containing a notice of the interment of Mr. J. C. Goodfellow, an old correspondent of the Freethinker. The funeral presented the interesting feature of being a Secular one conducted by a clergyman. Rev. David Muir delivered an address at the graveside, and, after paying a tribute to Mr. Goodfellow's intellectual attainment, said:—

> But to-day we think not merely, and perhaps not chiefly, of the intellectual attainments which made him a conspicuous figure in this town. We remember his wide and genial sympathies, the inborn courtesy that gave distinction to his personality, the qualities of heart and character which won for him a large circle of friends, and in the intimate relationships of home-life united him with lasting bonds of affection to the members of his family. But we remember most of all that during the long years of his life, he stood before his fellow-townsmen as an example of scrupulous honour and irreproachable integrity. All who knew Mr. Goodfellow are aware that in the early years of his life he arrived at convictions which placed him out of sympathy with the creeds of the Christian religion, and outside the fellowship of the Christian Church. These convictions were reached not through any light or ill-considered impulse, but as the result of the severest mental conflict. Therefore, deeply conscious as we are of the mysteries of the unseen world in whose presence we stand, it is due to the sincerity with which he held his opinions that we should refrain from associating his grave with a religious ritual, against which the whole trend of his mind was in resolute revolt. But, far apart as our cherished beliefs are from those which he maintained, we cannot but honour in him the unflinching intellectual honesty which could brook no compromise, and which refused to rest in any conventional pretence of faith. And we must admire the fearless courage which in scorn of consequences shrank from no conclusion to which he was led according to his light, however painful the sacrifices and alienations it might involve.

We congratulate Mr. Muir on his liberality of mind and geniality of temper.

Another letter from France which, we are sure, will be read with interest;—

> Let me assure you that far from a religious revival taking place, there is a widespread wane of Freethought abroad among our men out here. Unmistakable signs are everywhere in evidence. Debates and discussions are taking place in many camps, notably in this one. Let me name a few of the subjects raised: "Christianity, is it a Failure"? "Religion after the War"; "Wake up, Church of England." "What is Wrong with the State Church?" "Brotherhood of Man"; "Abolish the State Church."
> The writer who is a keen supporter of Freethought (and has been for a number of years in South Africa), has had many opportunities of forming opinions, both in the line and at the base, of the trend of thought in this direction. The Churches have failed miserably. I have heard the parsons say so from the platforms of our meetings. And no doubt they are making frantic efforts to retrieve their mistakes, etc.; but their days are numbered, their game is fast being played out, and no one knows it better than they. As regards the majority out here, I might quote Scripture: "Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." Living on the fat of the land and drinking of the best, clothed in khaki and Sam Browne belt, which ill befits them, they are an example of hypocrisy and sham. Shepherds! more like wolves. We men see a lot of their carrying on. A few chaplains, but they are men, play the game. A religious revival (what a damnable lie) trumpeted through the land to hoodwink the religious and credulous fools that these gentry fatten upon.
> One could write pages on the subject. Certainly the public money is squandered shamefully in the upkeep of these clerical shams. But, never mind, their day is nearly over. The War (in a way the parsons know little of) is indeed a blessing in disguise.

We should hardly have thought it worth while anyone devoting a special reply to the sonorous banalities and platitudinous word-spinning of Mr. Ralph Waldo Trine. Those who are captivated by such writings as In Tune With the Infinite, will be proof against criticism, however keen. Still, if it were worth doing, this author is very well dissected by Mr. George Bedborough in Harmony or Humbug? (Garden City Press; 6d.). So far as a remedy may be applied to such as suffer from the defect of taking more or less attractively constructed sentences which serve only to disguise an author's lack of clear thinking, Mr. Bedborough's pamphlet is useful, but we have our doubts as to the extent of its application. There are a great many useful pieces of criticism set forth by Mr. Bedborough, and these will prove serviceable to the reader in dealing with others than the much boomed Mr. Trine.

An important business meeting of the newly-formed Regent's Park Branch will be held this Saturday evening, August 11, at the Shamrock Coffee House, North Street, Edgware Road, at 8.30. All members are urgently requested to attend.

Friends and members in the vicinity of Battersea Park are requested to give their support to Messrs. G. Rule and W. H. Braddock, who are holding a meeting at the gates of the Park, by request, on Sunday morning next at 11 o'clock. The intention is to re-start a Battersea Branch.

The Rise and Progress of Mental Power.

II.

THE faculty of memory forms the basis of all mental operations. On its physiological side memory power must be viewed as the result of a nervous discharge which, having travelled along a certain channel, generates molecular changes that remain partly permanent, so that when subsequent discharges pass along the same path they revive the modifications set up by their predecessor. Impressions made upon any of the nerve ganglia serve to sustain this truth. For instance, the numerous muscles of an athlete's body will, after long training, automatically respond to the demands made upon them. In the superior nervous centres the like verity holds good. The more frequently a lesson is intelligently repeated the more letter-perfect the learner becomes. On the other hand, after a long interval of inactivity, a proficient performer on a musical instrument will enfeeble his playing power for want of practice, while an expert juggler will become less dexterous in manipulating his balls. A small amount of practice, however, completely restores the original aptitude. A man who has learnt to skate in England may, after a lengthy residence in India, even if he has not skated since boyhood, recover with comparative ease his youthful acquirement. This power of reviving old impressions proves that the nervous ganglia involved possess the capacity of remembering their earlier sensations when the appropriate stimulus is applied.

Memory alone would render small service in mental processes of an involved character were it not the foundation of animal ability to associate sensations as well as to revive them. The single discharges along nerve fibres become compounded when several nerve discharges are generated through the connection of one nervous ganglion with others. The principle which operates when one nerve cell, as the result of repeated stimulation, tends to establish more and more permeable paths of nervous transmission, is equally applicable to several groups of cells linked up by various nerve fibres. We may picture a series of discharges conducted through the same aggregate of nervous arcs as always awakening the same, or a similar series of impressions, and we are entitled to assume that this antecedent series of discharges will facilitate later discharges, because the channels of communication have been rendered more permeable. Not merely do the successive discharges from a common starting-point pursue the same paths, but they revive the same sensations. This explains "the tendency of ideas to recur in the same order as that in which they have previously occurred." This also may be regarded as "a psychological expression of the physiological fact that lines of discharge become more and more permeable by use."

Whether of high or inferior quality, all mental phenomena present a physical substratum. Every mental change is invariably associated with a physical change. These changes represent the two faces of one phenomenon. Moreover, processes ranked as mental have been derived from earlier purely physiological processes. The faculty of discrimination manifested in lowly modes of life is one of the most primitive presentations of psychical phenomena. Darwin's researches into the discriminative capacities resident in the plant domain disclosed remarkable facts. The sensitiveness of plant life in general to the minutest differences in light and darkness are astonishing enough. But this sensibility is feeble when compared with the extreme susceptivity displayed by the insect-eating and climbing plants. In plants, streams of protoplasm replace the nerve tissue of animals, but the responsive powers of the former unquestionably rival those of the latter. The tentacles of the sundew (Drosera) close round their insect victims just as the tentacles of the animal sea-anemone embrace that creature's prey. Yet the rain pattering on the sundew's sensitive surfaces fails to awaken response, while the pressure of substances weighing only 1-78740ths of a grain excite the movements of the plant's tentacles, and several other insectivorous plants are known to display powers of discrimination equally remarkable.

The experimental labours of Hertwig, Loeb, and other biologists have revealed many curious properties of a similar character to the foregoing in single-celled organisms. Microscopic specks of plant and animal protoplasm display a preference for light or shade, heat or cold, or manifest marked differences of responsiveness to chemical stimuli. These simple reactions —tropisms as they are called—doubtless form the foundations of all higher modes of discrimination. If we assume a chemical and physical basis for all the most involved mental processes, we may quite legitimately regard even microscopic jelly specks as responding to appropriate impressions; or, in other words, to stimuli which prove beneficial to them. For we must remember that the most primitive unicellular organisms are themselves the products of evolution, and those so chemically constituted that they responded to stimuli which were fatal to them necessarily disappeared from the roll of life, while those only whose reactions were either appropriate or adaptive survived in the struggle with environing conditions.

That very lowly protoplasmic creature, the amœba, displays its capacity to distinguish between particles of a nutritious or non-nutritious kind. This apparently discriminative power is, probably, purely physical and chemical in character. Organisms higher in the scale of life possess more complex qualities both of adjustment and discrimination. And these superior attributes arise pari passu with a more advanced mechanism. Distinct progress is shown in the medusæ, for these jelly fish are provided with a simple nervous system which enables them to distinguish between light and darkness, and they appear to possess a rudimentary sense of hearing. They also discriminate between stationary and moving objects, and quickly detect the difference between edible and non-edible substances. They are endowed in addition with the capacity to move rapidly, and various other adaptive features indicate their increased powers. In better organized animals, such as the star-fish and worms, their nerve and muscle structures bring these organisms into completer correspondence with their surroundings. A still further advance appears among the mollusca. These creatures are furnished with very sensitive feelers, they select their varied food materials, possess a locality sense, and choose members of the opposite sex as mates. Crabs and lobsters, whose sensory organs are still higher, and whose range of experience is, therefore, larger, manifest activities more numerous and involved, while the delicate antennæ of the spiders, with other elaborated organs of special sense, combined with their advanced type of muscular co-ordination, permit them to attain a higher level of mental development than organisms less evolved.

The principles controlling the preceding phenomena prove equally valid when applied to the superior vertebrates, including man. All the more intelligent animals possess appendages which enable them to increase their powers to perform varied activities. As Spencer noted, the parrot, which is the cleverest of birds, utilizes beak, tongue, and claw in its examination of objects. The elephant's remarkable mental powers are largely the result of that animal's capacity to extend its experiences with the aid of its marvellously adaptable trunk. And when we rise to apes, monkeys, and men,— > we find repeated under other forms, this same relation between evolution of intellect and evolution of tactual appendages. Not more in the contrasts between them and inferior mammals is this seen than in the contrasts between the genera of the Primates themselves. The prehensile and manipulatory powers of the lower kinds are as inferior as their mental powers. On ascending to the very intelligent anthropoid apes, we find the hands so modified as to admit of more complete opposition of the thumb and fingers; the bones of the forearms so articulated as to give the hands greater powers of rotation; the arms attached to the body in such a manner as allows them increased range of lateral movement. In all the more developed of the order, the forelimbs are so constructed that an object can be grasped in one hand while it is being manipulated by the other, or by the lips and teeth—can be held at the most convenient distance from the eyes—can be applied to any part of the body, or any neighbouring objects (Principles of Psychology, vol. i., pp. 361, 362).

And with the human race itself the possession of highly specialized organs subserving manipulation, has conferred upon the paragon of animals powers which have played an enormous part in the progress of civilization.

This correspondence between muscular and nervous development; or, stated in other terms, the correlation between the growth of the power of discrimination and a more extensive range of adaptive actions, is precisely what the evolutionist anticipates. For it is plain that the extension of one function would be perfectly useless without the progress of the other. The ability to discern between a beneficial and detrimental stimulus would prove utterly valueless were the organism unprovided with that capacity of co ordinated movement essential to its profiting through its discriminating faculty. Also, it is clearly evident that an organism possessing powers of co-ordinated adaptation could derive no advantage in life's combat if it lacked that discerning capacity which is imperatively necessary if co-ordinated action is to be other than useless. Science has shown that "all the mechanisms of muscular co-ordination are correlated with mechanisms of nervous co-ordination," and it is now demonstrable that the one system of mechanisms in the absence of the other would prove utterly unserviceable.

In the highest animals the number and complexity of the nerve-fibres and cells form an array so formidable that several generations of workers will be required to determine their various functions. But from the simplest to the most complex creatures the same principles operate, and the discoveries of neurologists in the superior realms of life increasingly testify to this truth. Moreover, as we have seen, there exist numerous forms of life in ascending stages of evolution whose less involved neuro-muscular systems most admirably lend themselves to an understanding of their structure and function. These inferior organisms plainly indicate the paths leading to a far fuller knowledge of the physiology of nerves and muscles than we at present possess.

For freemen mightier grow,
And slaves more feeble, gazing on their foe.—Shelley.

Shameless Inconsistency!

In his article, "The Relation of the Sexes" (July 27), "Ignotus" truly says that "there is no question that has been more stupidly treated by the Churches than the question of sex." Neurotic novelists, howling dervishes, and prurient prudes have done their very worst to confuse all the true issues and avoid all real solutions.

Macaulay, in his review of Hallam's Constitutional History, passes some scathing comments on the place of the Churches in our history; but in relation to sex matters there is one sentence which stands out as specially applicable, for "Never were principles so loudly professed and so shamelessly abandoned."

Every day for the last two years, in relation to sex, population, marriage, and children, the papers have provided some fresh proof of Macaulay's statement.

In the Freethinker of November 12 last, I brought before its readers a sample of what I have for years regarded as one of the most glaring and evil proofs of our national insistency in relation to the State religion and public morals, a sham celibate army, with its inevitable universal flood of prostitution and the futile purity campaigns by which the initial evil is tinkered with.

Just then one of our overworked goody-goody generals, Sir Horace Smith-Dorrien, aided and abetted by that modern wonder of the Church of England and the Colleges of Unreason system, the logical bachelor bishop preacher of Big Families for Poor Curates, Foley Winnington-Ingram, started on a new campaign against the music-halls.

"Furious" and "futile" are the only terms by which to deal with these recurrent explosions of sham morality. The great General seemed to start with the idea that he was the "It" specially suited to, and provided to make a job of, cleaning the so-called Augean stables of "immoral" London; but when he was challenged to define some of the terms he was making such free use of, he had no sort of reply; and when Mr. Oswald Stoll put up a fight and forced him into court, he had to partake of that most nauseous dish a public man can be made to eat, some of his own words.

The mouthy Bishop of London, at the close of an interview reported in Reynolds', September 24, 1916, talked big, as he always does. "We mean to have, when the War is over, a cleaner London. What I want to see is a cleaner London for the boys to come home to."

Mr. Oswald Stoll, in a letter to the Daily News, September 17, 1916, recited one of the Bishop's wild statements, "That it was a disgrace there should be 150 bad women in every music-hall every night," and closed his letter by a sentence which seems more and more justified day by day, "That the Bishop had been working too hard, and was beginning to lose the thread of Christianity which should connect his utterances."

Many people have had this idea for a long time.

General Sir Horace Smith-Dorrien and his Bishop, having had their little flutter, retired—after, we hope, having a decent lawyer's bill to pay—and after awhile another great reformer appears on the scene. We are treated to a fresh exhibition of military purity mongering futility, in the person of General Sir Francis Lloyd, who, doing the star turn at a performance given by one of the organized purity-mongering associations, gave clear evidence that, however good he might be in defending London against air-raids, knew almost nothing about true morality and sociology.

Another great man on the platform was Sir Edward Henry—also an expert on morals, and much engaged with London's morals—who, according to the Daily Mail,

Digitized by Google

June 28, 1917, made the following statement:—

> Conditions in London streets were much better than a few years back (which is in direct contradiction to many of the statements made by the clerics).
> In the last three years 19,000 women had been arrested. In the parks things were different. In Hyde Park every day five or six couples were brought into the police-station. The evil was really very serious, and no leniency should be shown.

They who like to believe this are free to do so. It does not really matter whether it be true or not, for whichever way the statement be taken, the final issue is all to the disgrace of those at the top. The statement was followed by the General's "official" word, as the officer commanding the London district, he had no control over the women, but he was taking steps to have more control over the soldiers, especially in Hyde Park, in relation to which he had given the most stringent orders.

A letter was addressed to the General, enclosing a copy of the one sent to General Smith-Dorrien on the occasion of his venture in 1916, drawing special attention to the Army Red Book on Allowances (quoted in Freethinker, November 12, 1916).

Sir Francis, by an A.D.C., made answer that his business was not to criticize the "Regulations," but to carry them out, quite failing to see that by his action in taking part in the futile "Purity" Movement he is criticizing a system which is primarily responsible for an immense mass of the prostitution, venereal disease, and sex crime about which he, Sir Edward Henry, and the mass of thinking people are so much moved at the moment—some special phases of which in Hyde Park and Bayswater no discussion is permitted in these days of rigid censorship. (See H. Ellis, Sexual Inversion, in Hyde Park.)

This is one view of the Sex plus Cant position at which we have arrived: official prohibition of State Church Commanded Marriage, an utterly impossible standard of celibacy and sham morality, and a deluge of indecent behaviour, 19,000 women arrested—are women the only sinners?—and five or six couples per day seized in one public park.

Then, by way of proving the full truth of Macaulay's statement of the scandalous contradictions which obtain, we turn to the public utterances of another Church sociological economist and financial expert.

The Daily Chronicle, July 9, 1917, reported that the Rev. R. Meddings, Rector of St. Margaret's, Lee, Kent, preached a sermon on some of the aspects of "Baby-Week." It was no doubt a moving and quite fitting sermon. He dwelt on the facilities and advantages of raising children "for the Empire."

"Parliament should debate the proportional endowment of families; the Government had already accepted the principle in its consideration of remission of the income-tax"; "every childless home 'must be made' to minister to the homes that were not childless"; and then the capstone of his futility, "Bachelors must be taxed." He noted that some of his hearers smiled, but he was confident it would come. "Our greatest national asset and glory was the traditional home."

Having noted which, turn to the back page of the same Daily Chronicle, or almost any newspaper, and count day by day the number of advertisements issued by State, municipal, and other public bodies, and private employers, inviting employees, and specifying, "Must be unmarried," or with the yet fouller, "Man and Wife, healthy and of good character, and without encumbrances."

What in the name of common sense and hygiene are these people trying to do by their idiotic "tax the unmarried" nostrum—one of the meanest taxation dodges ever put before worried taxpayers and sweated workers. Do these Janus-faced teachers, pastors and masters, really believe that any educated, self-respecting democracy can be forced to procreate ad lib., even though they be forced to marry by a tax-collector; do they seriously think that the appeal for big armies to build big empires will ever be of value in face of the memory of the waste in life and treasure of the last two years?

In all the long record of taxation futilities and illogical injustice there has never been anything so idle as the much-canvassed taxation of bachelors, a suggestion forced to the front by the age-long attempts of the Churches in encouraging celibacy, as to which I have gathered some strange material of the part played by the body of which the Rev. R. Meddings forms a unit.

New Testament Legends for Young Readers.

III.—POWER OVER DEMONS.

A PERSIAN went to a wild and lonely spot, taking some food with him; and he drew a line round himself on the ground, and began muttering sacred words, or magic charms. Each day, he muttered. Very little food did he eat, and each day he tried to eat less than the day before. If he kept this up for forty days (so he had been told), and had no fear of lions, tigers, dragons, and the like, which sprang into his magic circle, he would become, on the 41st day, a Master of the Jinn; that is, a Master of Demons. If a lion appeared, it would come on the 21st day. The Persian of whom I speak told an Englishman (Professor E. G. Browne, about the year 1893) that he had tried the plan, and fancied he beheld a lion on the 21st day, but afterwards he doubted! But, in far-back times, many a Persian had spent his forty days in the Wilderness in this way; and he would afterwards present himself to the people as a Master of the Jinn; and they believed him.

The disciples of the Indian teacher, Buddha, say that he lived under a Bo-tree (or peepal tree) for seven weeks, trying his strength against the demon Mara. The demon promised, that if Buddha would be his ally, he would in seven days give Buddha the wheel of empire, so that he might roll as king over the earth. But the wise Indian said No. Then Mara sent three evil spirits in the shape of very lovely girls, and they thought to win Buddha to the way of sin. This plan also failed. On the 49th day, the king of the gods brought cool water for Buddha to bathe his face, and four angels presented gifts of flowers and perfumes. And now, as the Persians would say, Buddha was Master of the Jinn, and he was ready to go forth as a teacher of the people.

Another such story we shall find in the gospel of Luke.

* * * *

Crowds of people followed a long-haired, and shaggy man, who kept shouting,—

"Turn away from wrong! Wash away your sins! Come and wash in the water of baptism!"

From towns and villages, folk swarmed to hear the preacher, and they shook at his rough words,—

"Poisonous snakes, are you afraid of the fire of God? Bad trees, can you not bear good fruit? If you do not bear good fruit, I tell you in truth, God's axe will hew you down, and in God's fire you will burn!"

"John," said the people, "what shall we do?"

"Give clothes to the poor," replied John the Baptist, "give meat. Do something instead of mere talk! You that are tax-collectors, mind you don't squeeze more money than is fair from the taxpayers. You soldiers, behave peaceably, and don't brawl and act brutally among the people in whose towns you are billeted. God wants wheat, not chaff. The good honest wheat goes into the store; the chaff goes into the fire. Fire, fire!"

Hundreds of folk stood in the stream, while John poured water on their heads, or dipped them under.

This John was "Heaven's Gift," whom we have met before.

A man, thirty years old, came from Nazareth down to the river, and was baptized. As he stood in the Jordan, a white dove fluttered down upon his head, and a voice from heaven was heard, saying,—"My son, my beloved; I am well pleased with you."

Then the dove flew towards the rocky wilderness, leading the way, and Jesus of Nazareth followed after, till he came to a wild and lonely spot, where he was to try his strength against the demons. Forty days he dwelt in the place of cliffs and mountain torrents, and the king of the demons,—Satan,—tempted him. His answer was always No.

At the end of forty days, he was very hungry; and when the demon said the Son of God ought to be able to turn the stones into bread, and would he not do so? Jesus answered No.

When, from the top of a high mount, the demon showed him a vast scene of many castles, and cities, and armies, and kingdoms, and said all should be his, if he would bow to Satan as his over-lord, Jesus answered No.

Would he throw himself off one of the spires of the Temple roof at Jerusalem, and float down softly into the street, to the wonder of the crowd? Jesus answered No.

Satan retreated, baffled and beaten: and Jesus, Master of the Jinn, prepared to go out as a preacher, all over Galilee county; and in many a synagogue he spoke to the people about the Coming Kingdom; the devils should be cast out, and God's Kingdom be set up in joy and peace, and every man who put away wrong, and did the right, should enter in, no matter how poor and hungry he was. News of the preacher spread from village to village. Then he came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up. He went into the synagogue on a Sabbath day, mounted the pulpit, opened a Scripture roll, and read some lines of Isaiah's poem about prisoners let out of jail, and slaves set free from slavery. He rolled up the book, sat down, and looked keenly at the people.

"This is coming true, my friends, now—and here!"

"Fine words from Joseph's son," whispered some of the townsfolk.

"But," he said, "the preacher may not be listened to in his own Nazareth, and the new prophet may not be accepted in his own country. In olden days, God's prophets were sometimes sent, not to the Jews, but to Gentiles."……

A roar of rage came from the throats of the people in the synagogue. They felt it was an insult to talk as if Gentiles were worth preaching to more than God's own Jews. They rushed to the pulpit, dragged Jesus down, bundled him out, and shoved him towards the edge of a cliff, meaning to fling him headlong.

But he escaped. Whether some of his friends formed a body-guard around him, and bore him away to a place of safety, or whether his own persuasion softened the angry hearts, I know not. Anyhow, the next we hear of Jesus is that he visited a city that lay on the shore of the Lake of Galilee—a sheet of water, pale blue, and bordered by a beach of white pebbles.

There was hardly room for the people who pressed into the synagogue when the preacher from Nazareth spoke about the kingdom. They were listening most eagerly to his speech when a scream was heard. A wild-eyed man shrieked out:

"Go away. Jesus of Nazareth! Away! You are our enemy!"

"Be quiet, demon," said Jesus. "Be quiet! Come out of the man."

The man fell as if in a fit, and lay still awhile, and then rose up, smiling and content.

"Here is a Master of Jinn, indeed!" said the people one to another. "He bids demons come out of men's bodies and hearts, and they obey him. What a word is this! What power!"

Wherever he went, mobs ran after him, anxious to see more marvels. His deeds were the talk of every market-place in Galilee.

"Have you heard?" people would say, "have you heard how Simon's mother-in-law has been healed of her terrible attack of fever? Have you heard of neighbour A., and neighbour B., and neighbour C., getting rid of the demons that were worrying them into their graves? The demons know a Master of Jinn when they see him; yes, indeed! They howl, and rave, and call him Christ, the Son of God; and then they fly out of their victims, and the poor souls have rest."

Such was the gossip of peasants in the fields, customers in the bazaars, and fishermen on the lake.

Early one morning Jesus rose, left the humble cottage where he lodged, and climbed the hills, and went to a silent corner where he might be alone with his thoughts. But the trampling of feet was soon heard. A multitude of country folk had tracked him, and were come to beg him to stay, and show them more wonders.

"No," he replied, "I must preach the kingdom of God to other cities also."

* * * *

The legend of the Temptation is told again in John Milton's poem of Paradise Regained, which was first published in 1670.

In this poem Satan first appears as an old rustic gathering sticks on the hill-side; and he gets into conversation with the Son of God, and offers him a richly spread table, whereon are set dishes of fish, flesh, fowl, pastry, with wine, and with fruit and flowers heaped up, and music playing all the while. When this lure fails, Satan spreads out a grand view of cities, and armed hosts, and troops of chivalry; and also shows—

> Great and glorious Rome, Queen of the Earth,
> So far renowned, and with the spoils enriched
> Of nations. There the Capitol thou seest,
> Above the rest lifting his stately head……

And in the streets are swarms of Roman soldiers, and Hindoos with white silken turbans, and barbaric Britons and Germans. Of all this grandeur Jesus may be emperor, if (says the Demon-King)—

> ……if thou wilt fall down
> And worship me as thy superior lord,
> (Easily done), and hold them all of me.

Of course, the man of Nazareth says No.

Then the night falls, and the Demons try to terrify Jesus by raising an awful tempest, and sending infernal ghosts and hellish furies to yell about his resting-place in the woods. But the Son of God remains calm. After the last scene on the roof of the Temple Satan vanishes, and angels carry Jesus to a flowery valley, set him on a green bank, and spread a banquet of fruit.

Milton was a poet; and the man who wrote the Gospel of Luke was a poet. Each poet told the tale in his own way, and as his fancy listed.

SOCIALISTS, FREETHOUGHT, AND RELIGION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I generally avoid the semblance of ambiguity, but probably, like the Scotsman, I "joke wi' difficulty"; hence any misinterpretation of my meaning in the phrase "emissaries of Rome." I wrote in Dublin, but for the moment forgot that I was not in Belfast! Let Mr. Jackson disabuse his mind of the idea that I could ever have thought that James Connolly was other than a "brave man who did his duty according to his lights," and I, living in the slums of Dublin, know of his Herculean work and his heroism. But, surely, I cannot be blamed for referring to a "twenty-year-old pamphlet" which the Social Party of Ireland thought fit to reprint in 1917!

Mr. Jackson protests against my not doing what I had no intention of doing, advancing the discussion on the basis of human society, much as I may agree that that would be advantageous. As a matter of fact I asked Mr. Cohen to elaborate his "psychologic bond" idea.

I do not deal in red herrings, and although my article was prompted somewhat by the recent correspondence in the Freethinker, I did not enter the lists as a controversialist. I propounded my own propositions, and kindly note the title of my article. I believe as much as any one in keeping Atheism and Socialist propaganda separate, but as clearly stated in this week's "Sugar Plums," my article was a protest against the "deferential attitude" adopted by many Socialists towards the Church and the clergy. Whether Socialism is concerned with "the objective validity of any religion" is another question altogether.

I clearly pointed out that Connolly's inference was that many Socialists were Christians; I stated without dubiety that I had never met a Marxian who was a professing Christian. Mr. Jackson is a Marxian and an Atheist, but can he tell us of any who were Marxians and militant Christians? That might give some reason for respecting a creed which I think stands in the way of progress. J. EFFEL.

I.—INTOLERANCE AND THE NATIONAL ANTHEM.

O HISTORY take thy stern and truthful pen,
A sister muse in bitterness desires,
And write these words until their meaning fires
To life and thought the dullest citizen;
That yesterday a mob of Englishmen
In London, which a Freedom's war inspires,
Roused the worst passions of their basest sires,
Crushed a minority as one to ten.
They burned with ghostly rage intolerant
Of other men's opinions, drove them forth
As animals, and then began to sing.
They sang the tyrant song, the sickly chant
Of slaves who live yet in this hardy North,
They sang, O History, "God Save the King."

II.—THE SEVEN SEAS.

These men who think they serve the modern State
By fierce intolerance in time of war,
Driving the imperial city to uproar,
Against that little school by yon Peace-gate;
Are they not worthy children, much too late,
Of all the tyrants, from that one who swore
The primal curse, to them who still deep-score
A tortured world with black sulphuric hate?
Sweet Liberty, "return to us again
And give us manners"; these low tyrannies
Remove to chaos, giving us release.
Then shall our country, taking this new plane
Of virtue, thus command the Seven Seas:
Truth, Right, Law, Justice, Progress, Hope, and Peace.

Views and Opinions.

The Origin of Parsons.

In an age saturated with the philosophy of evolution, we are all more or less interested in the question of origins. And rightly so. Our best teachers have taught us that, as all history is evolution, so all evolution is history. It is in studying how things came to be what they are that we understand why they are what they are. This being so, and it being the holiday season, when busy people make a little leisure, we venture to propound a problem that has given us much thought. What is the Origin of Parsons? Are they born, or are they made? We use the term "parson" in its generic sense as embracing all varieties, Catholic and Protestant, High and Low Church, Established or Dissenting, and would even extend the term so as to embrace local preachers, who are, so to speak, parsons in embryo, and may thus form a kind of missing link that will help to bridge the gulf between a parson proper and a normal human being.

Congenital or Acquired?

We propound this question with all seriousness. Are parsons like poets? Are they born, or made? Are the parsonic qualities congenital or are they acquired? Books on natural history give us little help. The study of a whole species appears to have been overlooked. Not wholly so, perhaps, because anyone with a taste for symbolism who has watched a crowd of penguins must have noticed how suggestive they are of a conclave of parsons. Their colouring, so suggestive of a parson in full war-paint; the gravity with which they sit contemplating nothing in particular; their activity at feeding-time, and their fight for the poor eel, so reminiscent of the struggle between Church and Chapel for the control of the child. There is, also, a curious suggestiveness about the description of a penguin—"body eliptical, head small, bill moderately long, tail short." True, only modesty would describe their bill as moderately long. Their tale is certainly shorter than it used to be, intelligence is demonstrably small, and if we take "body" as the equivalent of parsonic reasoning, there is no denying its eliptical character. Apart from this, natural history helps but little. Literature is equally indecisive. Montaigne does discourse about religion in a chapter "On Cripples," but Oliver Wendell Holmes suggests there is a religious microbe, which would point to parsons being made, not born. Anthropologists derive all existing varieties of parsons from a species that made its appearance about the time of palæolithic man, and explain their present existence as an example of the "persistence of type"; but, against this, parsons protest that they are really without ancestry. They simply began to be—were called into existence by a power of which we know nothing. Pro and con. seems about equally balanced here.

The Case for Congenitalism.

Let us try and sum up the reasons on the one side and on the other. We will take first the thesis that parsonic qualities are congenital. And it must be noted that the function of the clergy is, in its way, unique. Every other organism known to science is related to a known environment. But the parson is not related to anything we know. He is not here to give reliable information, to inform people about things that can be otherwise discovered. His function is a heavenly one. It has no earthly use. The sole reason for his being is the existence of another world—a world of which nothing is known, of which in all probability nothing can be known, and of which he certainly knows no more than anyone else. We have an organism minus an environment. Then consider the qualities manifested by a parson—so peculiar that one of their own order placed the clergy in a separate sex. A parson knows that his career has been selected, just as the career of a boot-maker or a miner is chosen. Yet he believes that he has been specially called to it by God. He believes that prayer will save the sick, although he knows that in the absence of medical attention or native vigour, recovery is impossible. He believes a number of stories which for sheer improbability outrival Munchausen, although he knows they are not true. And it is argued that this capacity for knowing one thing to be true and believing the opposite proves the existence of an innate quality not possessed by ordinary human beings.

Per Contra.

Those who believe to the contrary admit all the facts above stated, but place on them a quite different construction. They rest their case on the cumulative effects of habit and education. Sydney Smith's classification of "men, women, and clergymen," they put on one side as a piece of mere pleasantry. They admit that parsons are now different from ordinary human beings in their view of truth and of other matters, but they claim that this difference may be explained as the result of the two factors just named. They argue that if we take two children, as equal as we can get them, and subject them to a widely different training, the results will be widely different also. If we train the one to take nothing for granted, to suspend judgment where the evidence is inconclusive, to observe, to analyze, to classify, and to compare, we shall evolve a scientific type of individual. He may not be a Newton, or a Darwin, but he will have a scientific cast of mind. But if we take the other, cram him with doctrines and dogmas that have no conceivable relation to present day knowledge, teach him that rational enquiry is the greatest of crimes and blind credulity the noblest of virtues, teach him to regard those who differ from him as either criminals or lunatics, train him on history specially written to conceal the truth, and on science with special interpretations to conceal its meaning, and then keep him for years repeating formulæ devoid of meaning to himself or to his hearers; do all these things, they say, and you will have created all the qualities that go to make the typical parson.

The Power of Self-deception.

There are also additional arguments worthy of note. There is the influence of self-interest and the power of self-deception. So long as men of mediocre intellect find a living waiting for them in the Churches, so long there will be no lack of applicants. Five hundred a year for preaching a doctrine is, to many, five hundred reasons in favour of its truth. It is an illustration of the pious rule: "Prove all things and hold fast to that which pays." It is not alone in the law courts that a counsel argues his brief. And self-interest is first cousin to self-deception. With many people, wishing a thing were true is a long step towards finding it true. And with a much larger number still, if the same thing is repeated often enough, a kind of belief is inevitable. Many parsons are, unquestionably, in this state. They are not exactly hypocrites, they believe their own stories as the outcome of sheer repetition. And many who commence by deluding others end by deluding themselves. Thus, while we have one party explaining the existence of parsons as due to some inherited quality slowly evolved during generations of growth, we have others who point to self-interest, to habit, to education, to unconscious self-deception as completely covering the ground.

A Rudimentary Structure.

There are strong arguments on both sides, and it is to be hoped that the question will receive greater attention in the near future. For there is no denying its importance. It is no small matter to have in the community a body of people, many thousands strong, with their origin unknown, their function unsettled, their utility doubtful. Probably a careful enquiry would disclose the fact that the parson stands in the same relation to the community that the rudimentary tail does to the human organism. In the latter case we have a structure which points to an earlier type of life from which the present man has evolved. So in the case of the parson, it may be found that he also is a rudimentary structure in the body politic. He may be reminiscent of the time when man crawled on the earth fearful of those imaginary powers he believed determined his destiny. The parson, in the form of the magician or witch doctor, may then have performed what people believed to have been a useful function. To-day he is a mere survival, a rudimentary organ of the body politic. As a piece of natural history he is interesting, as a part of civilized society he is an anachronism.

Chapman Cohen.

Is Life Worth Living?

The love of life is an instinct common to all living things. Consciously or unconsciously the state or condition known as life shrinks from the state or condition known as death. What it is to be alive is, as yet, an unsolved mystery, though not necessarily insoluble, all we know being that the very idea of being dead is instinctively disagreeable. Of course, it does not follow that this instinctive clinging to life is any indication that life possesses intrinsic value of any sort. The question so frequently asked, Is life worth living? is really meaningless, because we have not an authoritative definition either of life or of worth. It is utterly impossible to determine life's worth when we do not know what life is. To the theologian alone is the mystery of existence easily soluble; but it so happens that his solution only intensifies the mystery. The Shorter Catechism assures us that "man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him for ever"; but everybody who thinks at all is aware that, even according to the Church's own teaching, God is an unknown being; or, in the words of the Athanasian Creeds, "the Father incomprehensible, the Son incomprehensible, and the Holy Ghost incomprehensible." Now, can anybody inform us how we can glorify and enjoy an incomprehensible Deity? The Catechism's definition of the chief end of man is thus seen to be but a darkening of counsel "by words without knowledge." You cannot solve one mystery by the introduction of another and greater mystery, as the theologian endeavours to do.

One who signs himself "Lay Preacher" asks Professor David Smith, in the British Weekly for August 9, to expound the text, "The candle of the wicked shall be put out" (Prov. xxiv. 20). "Lay Preacher" has a Bible class of young men, to whom he attempts to interpret the Scriptures; but that passage baffles him completely, and the commentaries render him no aid whatever. The statement is most emphatic, and the natural inference from it is that death ends all for the wicked. Dr. Smith treats it thus:—

> The best commentary on Scripture is the Scripture itself. It frequently illuminates a passage when another passage is laid beside it, and the passage which connects itself in my mind with this of yours is Prov. iv. 18: "The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

He then calls attention to the fact that our English Bible is "merely a translation," and that "the shining light" would be more accurately rendered "the light of dawn." The following passage explains itself:—

> The idea is that the life of the righteous is like the day; the light breaks dimly, but it deepens and broadens until it attains the full radiance of the glorious noontide. This is his comfort. He may be compassed with shadows, but he knows that they will disperse; the clouds will lift, and by and by he will see the blue sky and the light of God's face. The perfect day is the glory of Heaven, "the Shadowless Land behind the light of the setting sun."

The righteous is thus immortal, and it is immortality alone that makes his life worth living. Now comes the contrast:—

> "There will be no future to the evil man; the lamp of the wicked shall be put out," in contrast to the experience of the righteous man, whose path is as "the light of dawn, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

We are now in possession of Dr. Smith's philosophy of life, which is that life is worth living only to those whose interests are in eternity. What eternity means we are not told, but love and purity are represented as

"eternal possessions." Does Dr. Smith verily believe that a man of the world is destitute of love and purity, that he cannot rise to the highest forms of goodness and nobility? He admits that "the light of a man's life is what he sets his heart on and finds his gladness in." It inevitably follows that "a worldly man is one who sets his heart on worldly things and finds in these his gladness." The Professor goes a step further and allows that worldly things are "not necessarily evil things," and that, consequently, a worldly man is not necessarily wicked. Strangely enough, "this is God's world, and all its things are good and beautiful." Yes, a worldly man may be exceptionally refined and philanthropic, who lives to serve his fellow beings. And yet the Professor looks down upon him with pity, and says that death will be the putting out of his light. Of worldly things he declares that "their defect is that they are all transitory. When we pass from the world we must leave them behind us; and if they have been our only gladness then death is indeed 'a putting out of our light.'" But this passing from the world is a theological invention, completely outside the sphere of verification. So far as we can see, death is the end of individuals. We are children of the earth, and to the earth we return. There is absolutely no evidence that we shall pass from the world and leave its things behind us. Death is simply a return to the inorganic state. As Meredith puts it, "we go that others may come—and better if we rear them in the right way." Death is dissolution, disintegration, disorganization, and beyond it we cannot go.

Is life worth living? In certain moods we confidently exclaim, "Yes, abundantly"; but in certain other moods our answer is emphatically in the negative. Much depends upon the state of our health, and upon the circumstances in which we find ourselves. But we totally disagree with the following statement by Dr. Smith:—

> It seems to me, more and more, that the supreme good is the prospect of reunion in the Hereafter. The dearest and sweetest thing in life is human affection, and it would be, to my mind, an unspeakably awful calamity if death were the end of it, if we parted to meet no more. I simply could not endure to live, if I had not the assurance more clear and strong with every passing year, that death is, in St. Bernard's phrase, the door of life, the entrance into a larger and nobler world, where all the broken threads will be knit again, and we shall find all that we have lost, and resume the old familiar relationships with a closer and more tender intimacy.

That is a fine picture of life after death, and the only fault we can find with it is that it has been painted by the imagination alone; or, rather, is but an interlude of the fancy. Dr. Smith regards it as literally true, and is of opinion that he could not endure to live if he did not so take it; but myriads of people look upon it as a dream, and are not distressed by the thought that death ends all. As birth marks the beginning of individual existence, so does death indicate its close. The worth of life is not dependent upon its duration, but upon its quality. What supremely matters is not how long we live, but the use we make of life, be it long or short.

Because he cherishes, with such glowing fervour, the hope of immortality, Dr. Smith imagines that if he were to lose it, life would be an intolerable burden to him; but he has no moral right to affirm what he would feel were he to get into a frame of mind as yet unexperienced by him. Sir George Adam Smith admits (Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament, pp. 209, 213) that "in the thinking of civilized men there has been for years a steady ebb from the shores of another life," and that "it is well for us all sometimes to pitch our religious life in terms which do not include the hope of a future." It is certain that, for those in whom that hope has been extinguished, the present life is not less, but more interesting and joyous, than it was before, and that to them, as to Dr. Smith, "the dearest and sweetest thing in life is human affection," which is all the dearer and sweeter because it so soon comes to an end. Life is pre-eminently worth living, if lived wisely and well, even if its day be but of twenty-four hours.

The Charm of Marcus Aurelius.

> To bear all naked truths,
> And to envisage circumstance, all calm;
> That is the top of sovereignty.—Keats.

Times of war and stress are usually supposed to be fatal to philosophic calm, and it is curious that the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, the immortal book animated by high purpose and fortitude, should have been largely written at odd moments in a tent on the battlefield. Indeed, many of the famous maxims in the Meditations were jotted down in the actual theatre of the present war—as, for instance, at Carnuntum, on the Danube, a few miles from Vienna.

Monarchs have rarely been philosophers. Frederick the Great delighted in the society of Freethinkers, and attracted the best brains of Europe to his court. The Empress Catharine, of Russia, befriended Denis Diderot and other French Freethinkers; and Marguerite, of Valois, to her eternal credit, held out her fair hands to the "intellectuals" of her day, at a time when to avow heretical opinions was a matter of life or death. Once only, however, has a philosopher sat on the world's throne and realized the dream of wise Plato, who sighed for the fulfilment of his ideal of a philosopher-king.

Marcus Aurelius, one of the greatest of the Roman Emperors, was no feather-bed soldier, nor did he review his troops solely within the safe purlieus of the parade ground. His philosophy was thought out amid the storm and stress of actual battle, the elation of real victory, and the sorrow of defeat. What others learnt in calm, he learnt in tempest. The most perfect expression of "the gospel of those who do not believe in the supernatural" was produced to the dread monotone of war. Far away on the wide Roman marshes might be heard the endless, ceaseless sound of beating horses' hoofs and the marching feet of men. The barbarians were gathering their legions, and no man could say what the morrow would bring forth.

The Emperor died in the camp, surrounded by the soldiers he led. "Why weep for me," were his last brave words, characteristic of the noblest Roman of them all. His legacy to posterity was his book of Meditations, which was never intended for publication, and in which he recorded his inmost convictions on life and death. Burdened with the weight of empire and of Rome, he penned such words as these—not to be read at the distance of twenty centuries without an accession of pride and strength: "Every moment think steadily as a Roman and a man to do what thou hast in hand with perfect and simple dignity." And, again, "Do every action of thy life as if it were thy last."

This life, he tells us, is all that concerns us:—

> Though you were destined to live three thousand, or, if you please, thirty thousand years, yet remember that no man can lose any other life than that which he lives now, and neither is he possessed of any other than that which he loses.

Epicurus bade his followers depart from life as a satisfied guest from a banquet. Marcus Aurelius, in sterner language, bids us leave life's stage as an actor who has played his part. It is this perfectly sane view of things which has caused the golden book of the Meditations to become one of the most prized of volumes. It is this wise Secularism which takes tired people back to Marcus Aurelius when all other religions and philosophies have failed them. What a book might be written of the great men who came to the Meditations in the bad moments, when fame and fortune, and honour itself, seemed as unreal as the fabric of dreams. For, by the irony of fate, this austere wearer of the imperial purple has become one of the great consolers of men. His treasure of the Meditations is one of the most precious heritages handed down the centuries by the masters of the world.

Oh! the charm of Marcus Aurelius. He was so much more than a mere writer, for he bound men by something stronger than a chain of roses, the thrill of the dance, or the sparkle of Falernian wine. It is not his grace of language that causes men to read his book to-day. It is not merely his philosophy that causes men to turn to him from all other wisdom. It was not to Lucretius, with his world-grip of human destiny; or Virgil, with his tears of mortal fortune; or Horace, who sings so well and sweetly of banquets, the laughter of women, the joy of summer days; but to the austere soldier-leader, that men turned in the last resort to which they are pushed so often "with close-lipped patience for their only friend."

The waters of thought slip slowly away, and it is not a little amazing to realize that the ideas of the Roman Emperor should still have sufficient vitality to fire the hearts and brains of men and women of our generation. It is a splendid achievement—power over millions of all ages, races, and sympathies. Small wonder that Ernest Renan, a writer of nice distinction, and a rare critic, has spoken of the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius in terms of more unmixed eulogy than he has ever bestowed elsewhere.

The Meditations, be it remembered, were never intended for publication, and were written for their author's own eyes alone. They are simply the Emperor's commonplace book, where he entered his reflections, often quite unconnected, on life and death; and the questions that knock at every thoughtful man's heart. The little volume was considered for long a literary curiosity. It fitly headed the very brief list of the writings of kings, a class not in any way remarkable for literary genius. Critics talk of the Greeks as being the teachers of Marcus Aurelius. It is true; but the golden book of the Meditations could only have been written by a Roman. The strength, the tenderness, the humanity, the resignation, these are the gifts of the lords of human things, the masters of the world.

Matthew Arnold has pointed out that the Meditations are counsels of perfection. They do not claim to be other than self-communings. The maxims should be read, as they were written, one at a time. Marcus Aurelius addressed them, not to any reader, but to himself, as the sentinals and supports of a conduct of life. The present moment is one in which such high-minded advice is priceless, for in all the world's literature there is no other book so full of perfect sanity and Secularism. It is because the Meditations are a bracing tonic in a time of moral slackness that the book ranks among the assets of the day. The pomp and majesty of ancient Rome has long faded, "like snow upon the desert's face"; but the great Emperor's words of wisdom remain a most precious legacy, because he saw life steadily and saw it whole.

> Not Cæsar dying amid Roman sighs,
> By Pompey's statue, seems more great than thee.

The Rise and Progress of Mental Power.

III.

Out of automatic actions states of consciousness slowly emerge. In those animals in which faint remembrances of past sensations are combined with a capacity to associate simple impressions, a dim form of awareness arises. Organisms, such as the Coelenterata (jelly fishes, etc.), manifest a rudimentary mode of consciousness, while the Echinodermata (star fishes, sea urchins, etc.), judging from the complexity of their nervous adjustments, are possessed of a fuller power of perception. Many competent observers place the Annelida above the Echinodermata, and various of their activities indicate a fair amount of intelligent adaptation. The Mollusca display even clearer signs of intelligence, and conscious adjustments become increasingly involved as we ascend the ladder of life. Insects and spiders are certainly remarkably adaptive in their responses to stimuli. Wasps, ants, and bees manifest associative capacities of a degree most highly developed. The Batrachia—frogs, toads, etc., and the fish family, reveal more intelligence than any of the invertebrates, save only the ants, wasps, and bees, and, perhaps, the spiders and crabs.

Slightly more advanced in mental development are some of the reptiles when compared with frogs and fish. But the social insects appear to possess the power of communicating information, for the evidence of this, both in ants and bees, is very considerable. The birds show a wide range of mental ability, thus rising immensely above their reptilian ancestors. Some of the rodents, notably the beavers, reveal marked intelligence. Many, if not most of the herbivorous quadrupeds, unquestionably reason, while carnivorous creatures, such as the lion, tiger, wolf, and bear, display mental powers of a complicated character. Even one of the lowlier rodents—the rat—is notoriously cunning in his conduct. With the monkeys and the elephant mental capacity of a high order is found, while, in the man-like apes, psychical powers approaching those of man himself, stand clearly revealed.

As already intimated, the semi-erect attitude of the anthropoid apes enables them to utilize their upper limbs as organs of manipulation. The complete mastery of the power to stand erect that was gained by man's semi-simian ancestor provided him with still greater opportunities for amassing knowledge of surrounding nature. In the mammalian world, as a whole, as among the less evolved reptilia, all four limbs remained for untold ages mainly occupied in locomotive duties. Among the bats and birds the fore limb became modified into an organ of flight. Representatives of the family, of which man is the first member, evolved the beginnings of the later marvellously pliable hand of apes and men, and with the advent of a mammalian biped a revolution in the world of life began.

While many of the lower animals are endowed with more than a mere modicum of mental faculty, the apes rise above them all in capacity for thought. The superior mental qualities of the apes have profoundly impressed all those who have studied them, and even prejudiced observers have admitted their astonishment. A qualified judge, Professor Hartmann, declares that "their intelligence sets them high above other mammals." Professor Romanes, who enjoyed exceptional opportunities for study both in the Zoological Gardens and his own residence, came to the conclusion that they, undoubtedly, "surpass all other animals in the scope of their rational faculty."

Digitized by Google

While many animals are easily taught, and unquestionably reason for themselves, it is noteworthy that the apes seldom need teaching, and display every evidence of independent thought. And this, despite the fact that our intelligent domesticated animals have derived great advantages from their contact with man through countless generations, and have inherited increased mental aptitudes, while the monkey tribe has almost invariably been confined to its native forests. Among the numerous psychical qualities manifested by a cebus monkey closely observed by Romanes, was his untaught custom of cracking his nuts with a hammer. The animal showed a quite human dislike for ridicule, and would hurl any available missile at his tormentor in a manner most dexterous. He would secure any object out of the reach of his hands with the aid of a stick, and when the stick proved unavailing the monkey utilized a shawl in the most ingenious fashion to gain possession of coveted articles. Perhaps the most striking instance of this creature's cleverness was shown in his dealings with a hearth brush, which he had managed to purloin. He was anxious to remove the handle, and he soon discovered how to unscrew it, and then he was determined to screw it in again. On this problem he promptly set his wits at work, and as Charles Morris, in his excellent Man and his Ancestor continues the story :—

> At first he put the wrong end of the handle into the hole, and turned it round and round in the right direction for screwing. Finding this would not work he took it out and tried the other end, always turning in the right direction. It was a difficult feat to perform, as he had to turn the screw with both hands, while the flexible bristles of the brush prevented it from remaining steady. To aid his operations he now held the brush with one foot, while turning it with both hands. It was still difficult to make the first turn of the screw, but he worked on with untiring perseverance until he got the thread to catch, and then screwed it in to the end. The remarkable thing was that he never tried to turn the handle in the wrong direction, but always screwed it from left to right, as if he knew that he must reverse the original motion. The feat accomplished, he repeated it, and continued to do so until he could perform it easily. Then he threw the brush aside, apparently taking no more interest in that over which he had worked so persistently. No man could have devoted himself more earnestly to learn some new art, and become more indifferent to it when once learned.

Innumerable examples of a kindred character could be cited among the higher apes and monkeys in which the feeling of curiosity has revealed itself spontaneously. This spirit of inquisitiveness, so very widespread throughout the monkey group, forms one of the most important foundations of all mental advance.

Social creatures are the monkeys, and, like social animals in general, they manifest superior intelligence when compared with their solitary kindred. The social beavers, and, perhaps, the noxious sewer rat, stand immeasurably above the entire rodent order in the realm of mentality. Yet there are more than 900 known species of rodents. The ants, bees, termites, and a few others, amid all the immense array of insect life, are profoundly distinguished by their psychical activities from the remaining insect fauna. The intelligent forms are all extremely social. Various other gregarious animals illustrate the same truth.

But the part played by the social instincts in the evolution of mind is, probably, most pronounced in the case of the communal ants and bees. Hundreds of species of social ants are distributed through the world. Varying materially alike in habits, and range of intelligence, all display high powers of mentality. Yet the various solitary ants scarcely rise above the ordinary insect mental standard. Of the bees the same holds true. The most elaborately organized community, that of the hive-bees, is composed of the most intelligent representatives of these insects. Bees with less perfected social arrangements are on a lower mental level, while the solitary bees rarely ascend above the average insect plane. Among the carnivores, with the gregarious dogs, wolves, and others, the same fact is seen, while herbivorous animals, which dwell in troops and herds, are usually more intelligent than their solitary cousins. Jackdaws, gulls, rooks, the house sparrow, and starling, birds both impudent and clever, are all fond of the company of their fellows. There is this, however, to be remembered that strictly communal creatures tend to evolve psychical specialization. The mental powers, which have been developed in the course of their social evolution, tend in these animals to relapse into instincts when their objective has been completely gained. There, then, remains little scope for further variation.

Albeit social in its habits, the monkey family retains ample scope for the play of individual initiative, and with this group continued progress remained possible. No monkey is specialized for, or restricted to, a particular function. In this sense the ape is an individualist, and any variation of value tends to be preserved through imitation. Mental communication among the lower animals is, probably, more extensive than is commonly supposed. Remembering how rare are original ideas among mankind, we cannot escape the conclusion that useful discoveries have, in most cases, been treasured through a recognition of their value by the general community. The few discover and invent, while the many ultimately benefit. Apart from the social bond, which binds organisms together in groups, this would be impossible, and it is also to be noted that new notions are extremely unlikely to arise among solitary creatures.

Modern civilization and culture are chiefly due to the intellectual achievements of the superior few which have ultimately become the property of the general population. As a recent writer says :—

> The intellectual standing of any civilized nation depends upon two things: the preservation in books, in memory, and in works of art and industry, of the ideas of ancient workers and thinkers; and the mental activity of living thinkers and inventors, whose work takes its start from this standpoint of stored-up thought. Rob any community of all its basic ideas, and it would quickly retrograde to a primitive condition of thought and organization, from which it might need many centuries to emerge."

The lemurs are related to the monkeys, but they are quite destitute of social life, and they are decidedly unintelligent. Dwelling in similar surroundings, the apes derive enormous advantages from their social habits, and when placed in an environment entirely unlike that to which they are accustomed they constantly exhibit keen powers of observation, and a remarkable fondness for experiment. Probably, if primitive man had made his cousin a domesticated friend; had the monkey enjoyed the same advantages as dogs and other tamed animals, simian mental powers would have been developed quite equalling those of many dull-witted men still to be met with in the most civilized communities. Absence of opportunity rather than lack of native ability has tended more and more to widen the gulf which exists between the mental capacities of apes and monkeys and modern man.

A London newspaper, in reviewing the life of Herbert Spencer, refers to it as "a drab existence." Christian editors prefer highly coloured lives, such as the career of Dr. Crippen.

Palmistry and Priestcraft.

IN the minds of all right-thinking persons, there can be nothing but contempt for those sleek, designing rascals who, under the pretence of scientific knowledge and the possession of wonderful powers, exact money from the ignorant and credulous for "information" concerning individuals and events, which could not possibly be known in the ordinary way.

As a means of looking into the future, of finding happiness for oneself or of preventing misfortune, palmistry, clairvoyancy, psychometry, or whatever fancy name the nimble professors and madames may give the art they practise, is valueless, and the high priests of occultism are either scoundrels or fools.

I cannot say I enthusiastically agree with that highly virtuous section of the community which would seek to stamp out fortune-telling by heavy fines and terms of imprisonment, conviction invariably being procured by an agent provocateur. After all, there are degrees of villainy, and P.-C. XYZ—even in plain clothes—has not great powers of discrimination, whatever may be said for his veracity. In my experiences in show-land, I met on every fair ground some lady who could "tell the tale" according to a stereotyped formula; she was generally the wife of a showman, and, if sufficiently weather-beaten, posed as a gipsy. "The fair young man, not the tall dark one, my dear; a long journey, short illness, plenty of money showing in your hand," etc.—that was the stock-in-trade. I don't for a moment justify fortune-telling when it is only on a small scale, and done stupidly, but most of this sort of thing is indulged in for a lark by those who are "doing the shows" in proper fashion; and I have found the caravan-living itinerants, as a body, decent folk of a simple live-and-let-live philosophy.

When, however, we consider the machinations of educated men and women, who, taking advantage of the widespread anxiety caused by the War, are working on the overstrung nerves of wives and lovers of our fighting men, and extracting money from these victims under the pretence of affording them comfort or by predicting the safe return of the loved ones, it is small wonder if our atavistic instincts for revenge are aroused. But, of course, punishment is the wrong end of the stick. I don't think the members of the N.S.S. will part with much money for crystal-gazing to find the issue of fighting in Flanders. Conversely, it seems strange that Christians, whose religion teaches them to believe in all manner of weird prophecies and predictions quite at variance with our knowledge of daily happenings, should disapprove of modern prophets; or, rather, one section of the mystical fraternity only. If it be granted that those who delude the weak-minded ought to be punished, then the whole army of professional ministers, priests, spiritualists, and salvation sellers ought to be arraigned along with the palmists, seers, faith-healers, and kindred rogues. But the punishment ought to be graduated to fit the enormity of the offence. As sixpenny hand reading, dealing with the trifling detail of the colouring of a suitor's hair, and the number of children likely to accrue from a happy marriage, is venial beside the traffickers in the emotions of tortured wives and mothers, so even those latter fall short of the preachers of "the Word," with their stupendous falsehoods, their feeble philosophy, and, above all, their hypocritical pretence that, whatever happens, all is for the best, and that sufferers in this world can extract comfort from their speculations of the compensating rewards in a hereafter of which nothing has ever been known.

I have before me as I write a little magazine called the Messenger of the Sacred Heart, an Irish Catholic publication, the organ of "The Apostleship of Prayer." Part of this issue is devoted to letters of thanksgiving from "grateful patrons" of the Sacred Heart for favours received; and it is, in truth, gloomy reading for Rationalists. We have undoubtedly a long way to go in Ireland. Let me give readers of the Freethinker one or two samples of the thanksgivings.

> Two parties (25 and 10 respectively) of Catholic soldiers wish to thank the Sacred Heart for signal protection. Both parties were engaged in dangerous patrol work behind the German first line. They all received Holy Communion that morning, and carried badges of the Sacred Heart. Both parties returned without a scratch, and now wish to fulfil their promise of publicly thanking the Sacred Heart of Jesus.

Now, the worst of this is, that all of them took communion and wore badges, and that there doesn't seem to have been a solitary shot fired. Had one of the number been a wicked Protestant; or, better still, a dirty Atheist, and had a stray bullet ricocheted merrily from each of the thirty-five bits of red flannel worn by the the devout Irishmen, ultimately finding its billet in the unguarded body of the unbeliever, that would have been "some" evidence of discrimination.

"Through the Sacred Heart shield and Invocation" we hear of wonderful doings in County Cork. "Things were looking very dark with us twelve months ago." Then, after purchasing a shield (which is a painted bit of tin), and placing over the door, "Thank God, from that day on, things began to improve rapidly."

Readers of Zola's Lourdes will remember his description of the excellent business done in holy water bottles, candles, etc., at the grotto. The same thing obtains with the Church everywhere. Sacred Heart badges, scapulars, shields, and the latest innovation, rosary beads in Sinn Fein colours, meet with a good sale, and are generously advertised by patrons who have derived benefit from them.

"Things looking dark," and then, "Thank God, improving rapidly," doesn't seem a very serious state of affairs; but I cannot complain that all the grateful ones are indefinite. Expressions of gratitude, which are pretty well stereotyped, are grouped under different headings. Like the Astral Planers, the Sacred Hearters find "The War" productive of most trade, but "Means of Livelihood," "Temperance," and "Conversions" appeal to many.

"Thanksgiving for not being on duty when one of our guns exploded, and we had a lot of casualties." My criticism in the other case of superstitious soldiers applies here; and were there no devotees of the Sacred Heart on duty? The Sacred Heart is thanked for protecting some; those who pray and yet fall, succumb to the Divine Will, which we must not question. We treat God with infinitely more charity than we show towards our fellow-men. Why is it always all praise and no blame for God; who, after all, is responsible for everything?

"Employment found," "Good position secured," are typical; but "Husband kept on when he feared dismissal" is a departure. Probably, if he ceased praying, or wore his scapulars at an irreverent angle, the Sacred Heart might get him the sack, to provide employment for a client more assiduous in praying, or who spent more in gee-gaws.

"For forty years my father has lived, nominally a Protestant, but in reality a Pagan. He has now entered the true fold." Poor old dad! Fancy, after forty years lying a-bed on Sundays, smoking and reading his sporting paper, to be "converted," and have to rise for early Mass! Not if my wife and children put shields all over our doors, sew Sacred Hearts inside my waistcoats, gird themselves with scapulars, and, prostrate before burning candles and highly coloured Virgin, offer incessant supplication in Gaelic, will I give up my long-lie and Sunday paper. My heart is sore for the nominal Protestant.

Unfortunately, there are millions who think that the "Sacred Heart" means more than "The Shielding Shadow" or "The Laughing Mask." That half-witted illiterates should be fooled in this manner is bad enough, but that men of education, and good sense in all mundane affairs, should allow themselves to be chloroformed into tacit acceptance of idolatrous superstition, shows what a price is paid for the abnegation of private judgment in matters of Faith and Morals.

As I said earlier, there are degrees of rascality, and the priest who condemns a Hindu for telling fortunes to the wife of a policeman, while himself perpetuating mendacities concerning the great problems of life, is a hypocrite as well as a charlatan.

Acid Drops.

The Lutheran Synod issued a pastoral which was read in all the churches in Berlin on the anniversary of the outbreak of War. In this document it is declared:—

> We will comport ourselves as Christians towards our enemies, and conduct the War in the future, as in the past, with humanity and chivalry.

We should be the last to deny that in sinking hospital ships, torpedoing passenger vessels, etc., that the Germans have not comported themselves as Christians, because there is no barbarity that Christians have not manifested towards their enemies. But humanity and chivalry! That is quite another matter. We advise the German pastors to stick to the claim that they have behaved as Christians towards their enemies. That is at least a defensible proposition.

In our own Christian country we observe that Major Carter, the man who was responsible for exposing the scandal of the treatment of the wounded in Mesopotamia, and for the improvement effected, has been rewarded by being transferred to another post where he is receiving £300 per year less in the shape of salary. So said the Secretary for India in the House of Commons on August 7.

The Dean of St. Paul's has been dubbed "gloomy," or "dismal," because he is too conscientious to indulge in optimism at the expense of well attested facts. His brethren confidently assert that Christianity is a grand success; Dr. Inge knows and frankly admits that hitherto it has been a gigantic failure. The fact is that it doesn't pay to speak the truth, the truth being the commodity least required at any Christian market, specially the truth about religion.

At a Conference of Modern Churchmen, organized by the Churchmen's Union, held at Girton College, Cambridge, on August 9, the Dean read a paper, entitled "Did Christ Found the Church?" in which he maintained that the "Church was the result of historical conditions," and in no sense whatever founded by Jesus Christ. This is heterodoxy with a vengeance, but all scholars know that it is the truth. Speaking of Catholicism, the Dean said:—

> It owed more to Greece and Rome than to Galilee. It was an adaptation of the old religion of the Mediterranean races, and derived much of its strength from its non-Christian elements.

For teaching this heresy, M. Alfred Loisy, of Paris, was deposed from the priesthood of the Catholic Church, and Dr. Inge would undergo a similar penalty were the orthodox party in the Anglican Church to have their way. The Church has flourished on fiction in all ages; and even now she stands in mortal terror of the truth.

The piety of the Sunday papers is a fearful and a wonderful thing. The Sunday Herald had an article on "Sickly Illusions of Doddering Pacifists." Would the editor of the Sunday Herald describe the author of the phrase, "Blessed are the peacemakers," as a "Doddering Pacifist"?

Politics and religion usually make a delightful blend, but it is seldom that English editors have the courage to express themselves as freely as the Christian conductor of the Louisville Courier Journal, who bade farewell to Herr Dernburg in the following words: "Let him go and be damned to him, and now, as ever, to Hell with the Hohenzol'ern and the Hapsburg."

The text, "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof," used to be parodied by the old Radicals as "The earth is the House of Lords" etc. The recollection is prompted by the number of estates which are changing hands. Recently, the Duke of Sutherland sold the Lilleshall estate of 6,818 acres in Shropshire, while Earl Normanton disposed of the Rushall estate of 4,647 acres in Wiltshire. Lord Alington is selling his famous Hoxton estate with its 2,500 houses, and Lord de Saumarez is offering the Lawshall Hall estate of 1,000 acres in Suffolk. The Earl of Shrewsbury is also selling his Cheshire possessions, totalling over 4,000 acres.

Principal P. T. Forsyth is in a painfully depressed, pessimistic mood, as, in a short article in the Christian World for August 9, he contemplates the prospects of the Church of Christ. She has lost her "great note," and he can see but few signs of its coming again. Of the future of Congregationalism even he entertains no strong hope:—

> First, it may break. Second, it may die of futility and sink away into sand—not for lack of natural energy, but for lack of energetic power in its belief. Its spiritual imagination is ill-nourished.....Third, it may be swamped, for lack of belief in the Church and its ministry, by the undenominational religion of the Y.M.C.A. or the Student Christian type.

The Principal is perfectly right. The "great note" has departed never to return. Spiritual imagination is ill-nourished, because it has been touched by the light of reality through the intellect, and the food on which it used to subsist no longer agrees with it. It is lack of confidence in the supernatural that accounts for the steady decay of religion, and not all the theologians and preachers in the world can bring back that confidence. At last knowledge has come to stay, and in its radiance faith is doomed to vanish away.

Everything does not go well with the Brixton Parish Church, of which Rev. A. J. Waldron was Vicar, before forsaking it for the music-hall. The present Vicar writes in the Parish Magazine under "Answers to Correspondents":

> Aggrieved Parishioners.—We refuse to see people at the vicarage except by special appointment or in case of serious illness (1) because our parlourmaid has nineteen steps to climb before she arrives at the front door, if she is in the basement when the bell is rung, and anything up to three flights of stairs to descend if she is upstairs, at the time; (2) because we must have some leisure in which to read and write. If you were to subscribe to the Freewill Offering Fund, we might be able to...

The Government must be careful! There are some things that liberty-loving Britons will not stand. They have stood well the taking away of liberty during the War—indeed, vast numbers of them do not appear conscious that they have lost anything worth bothering about. But there are limits, and the proposal that the ages of people shall be given on the new sugar cards, which are to be handed in to the local grocer, has called forth indignant protests in the Daily Telegraph. "To what purpose," writes one indignant correspondent, "is this affront to our womankind?" The Government control of the press was nothing, conscription was a bagatelle, the suspension of Habeas Corpus a trifle, but to expose the age of our women folk to the rude gaze of the local grocer—that is really serious and leads for revolt.

The leader-writers became lyrical on the occasion of the third anniversary of the War. That distinguished Christian, Mr. Horatio Bottomley, wrote that on the fourth of August "each of us became a soldier in the army of God." In his excitement, Mr. Bottomley forgot that 50,000 clergymen were "too proud to fight."

According to the Daily News there have been worse Augusts than the present. In August, 1577, a thunderbolt struck Blythburgh Church and killed twenty people; passed on to Bungay, six miles distant, and fell on another church, killing two people whilst kneeling. Providence was as much given to practical jokes in the sixteenth century as in the twentieth.

The sedate Saturday Review is calling for a film controller, and remarks: "Passing through the remotest country villages of Englrnd one finds that the primeval disfigurement of the local Græco-Baptist chapel has everywhere been supplemented by the white and gold of the local picture-palace." Another testimony to the revival of religion.

At last we have the explanation of the heavy August rain. Rev. J. Thomas, Precentor of Chelmsford, attributes the rain to "Divine displeasure at the amount of Sunday labour performed on allotments." Good Lord!

"The Universe has been in labour for a hundred million years," says Sir Oliver Lodge, "and has produced—us. We are a remarkable product, and we are behaving at the present moment in a remarkable manner." Noting how we are behaving, it hardly looks as though the product were worth the hundred million years of labour. Certainly, if the universe were conscious of what it has produced, it might with justification decide to bury its past, blot the whole lot out again, and start afresh.

But, naturally, Sir Oliver thinks the labour justified because it has produced "us." Human egotism is a monstrous thing, and it assumes that, because we have been produced, it is "us" that the universe was striving after. But man has been produced in no other sense than has anything else that lives. It took as long to produce the germ that destroys human life as it did to produce the human life that is destroyed. There is as much, or as little, intention in the one case as in the other. Nay, it takes as long to produce an earthquake that wipes out a city and all its inhabitants, If we are to read purpose into the process, we must say that Nature laboured for millions of years to get a crowd of people into a given area, and then let loose an earthquake which it had been carefully producing for their destruction. The truth is, of course, that there are no purposes and ends in Nature; there are only processes and results. As a scientist, Sir Oliver knows this perfectly well. As a religionist, he forgets all about it.

Sir Oliver Lodge gives it as his "firm belief" that "science will shortly prove the definite survival of human life after death." We are under the impression that many of Sir Oliver's followers are inclined to believe that science has proved the fact of survival. They will please note that he only expresses the pious belief that one day science will prove it. And, of course, it is very hard to disprove a statement of that kind.

Another of Sir Oliver's opinions is that after the War "great and powerful assistance will be given us by 'spirit helpers.'" There is really no limit to this kind of thing. Anyone can go on supposing things of this kind without end. But why on earth should these great and powerful spirits wait till after the War? There was room for them to operate long before the War, and even during the War. Next to the absurdity of the spirits the most striking thing about them is their uselessness.

"If the shade of Jeremy Bentham still hovers around the philosopher's old home at Queen Anne's Gate, it will be interested in the location there of the new Ministry of Reconstruction. And the Ministry might do worse than emulate Bentham's attitude towards social problems. Whatever may be thought of his principles of 'Utility,' and 'The greatest good of the greatest number,' his passion for civic liberty, his terseness and simplicity, and his contempt for time-worn formulæ, made him one of the most influential reconstructors of his generation."—Daily Chronicle.

The Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, of Brighton, contributes a weekly article to the Christian Commonwealth, entitled "From my Point of View." In the issue for August 8, he criticizes most sarcastically the form of prayer which has been prepared for use in the Free Churches at the commencement of the fourth year of the War. The principal petition is this: "Send out thy light and thy truth, let them lead us and bring us to a speedy and successful conclusion of our great endeavour." Mr. Williams mordantly observes:—

> What sincerity can there be in asking that God's light and truth should lead us to victory in war when we know perfectly well that for such victory what we have to use is, not light and truth, but as much deception and trickery as possible? Was it by the use of God's light and truth that we took the Ypres salient? Or was it by secret tunnelling and stealthy placing of explosives for many months before action?

The whole article is in the same sarcastic but truthful strain, and our only wonder is that so sane a thinker believes in God at all. We fail to see where God comes in in this brutal conflict. The divines all assert that he does come in somehow and somewhere, but no two of them agree as to the how and the where.

Hushing up the Mesopotanian Report is "a crime against God and Man," says Mr. Bottomley. It may be a crime against man, but as God allowed so many of our men to suffer through official neglect, it is not clear why it is a crime against him. If Mr. Bottomley carried any intelligence with his piety, he would see that the Report is naturally an indictment of God, as well as certain officials. Particularly as Mr. Bottomley believes that we are on God's side and he is on ours. But piety—particularly new-found piety—and intelligence seldom run together.

Lord Burnham, of the Daily Telegraph, presided over the Hampstead Summer Garden Meeting the other day, and took occasion to make a few remarks on the present position of the press. "The Press," he said, "was now part of the machinery of the State, but he hoped that this arrangement would not survive after the War." The tone of this is sufficiently serious to make all lovers of real freedom anxious. That the press is now largely under Government control, both in the kind of news it gives, and in the news it suppresses, we are all aware. Practically we know all that a handful of men thinks it good for us to know, and this is tolerated because we are at War. But we believe, as we have said more than once, that this control of the press by the Government will not be readily given up even when the War is over. Every governing class, once it has seized power, struggles to keep it, and, unfortunately, the general public cares very little for liberty of any kind that does not interfere with the pleasures or requirements of the moment. Witness the fact there was greater public concern over the shortage of beer or the stopping of racing than over the establishment of a press censorship. Anyway, we are glad to see Lord Burnham alive to the danger, and we hope that his warning will awaken others.

The clergy appear to be singularly narrow-minded. The vicar of a parish, near the district devastated by the Silvertown explosion, is advertising plaintively for help because the girls' club and mothers' meetings have to be held in the vicarage drawing-room. Dreadful, isn't it?

The London daily papers wasted columns in describing the War Service at Westminster Abbey, and some of them even printed verses from the hymns used on that occasion. The editors of parish magazines could not have done more.

The pious Daily News refers to Bank Holiday as the feast of Saint Lubbock. The founder of Bank Holidays did more for the working people than all the calendar of the saints.

To Correspondents.

T. M. Mosley.—Your letter appears to have been delayed in transmission—judging from the date it bears and that of its receipt. However, we are pleased to hear from you, and also to get your account of the discussion on "The Case for Atheism." Is it not time there was some definite organization in your district?

C. Emery.—Don't trouble about whether science can explain everything, the real points are (1) that science does explain things, and (2) where science fails, nothing else succeeds.

Thanet.—We do not know a better pamphlet for your purpose than Bible and Beer, by G. W. Foote. It can be sent, post free, from this office for three halfpence, or on special terms if a quantity is needed for distribution.

Y. C.—Received. Hope to publish shortly.

J. O. Harding.—(1) An Atheist is one who is without belief in a God. No other meaning has ever been given to it by those who were in a position to speak. (2) Freethinkers are not, as Freethinkers, hostile to Socialism. Some believe in it, and some do not. (3) The origin of protoplasm is a question that belongs to the region of bio-chemistry. Almost any up-to-date text-book will give you information on that point. At any rate, we could not, without misunderstanding, reply in this column.

C. Martin.—We are not sure we have your name correctly, but, as is not unusual, the signature is the least legible part of your letter. We do not write that everyone will agree with us. If we did, we should confine ourselves to platitudes. We write only that people may read us and consider what we write. That is all any decent person asks or expects.

T. Richards.—It is curious why a writer, generally so clear as Fielding Hall, should revert to the Designer of Nature. Probably, however, he means less by it than a literal acceptance of his language would imply. We do not know whether you have read the same author's delightful Soul of a People. If not, we strongly advise you to do so. It is a charming work. We are pleased to have your appreciation of "the excellence of the Freethinker."

J. A. Reid.—Thanks for cuttings. We could print some copies of the verses if desired.

F. Betts.—Received. Hope to use shortly.

Remlap.—Quite all right. Paper will be sent as usual.

T. Jones.—Our manager is writing the newsagent on the subject. Thanks for your trouble in the matter. We quite believe there is good scope for the getting of new readers in your locality.

C. W. Marshall.—Pleased to note that your newsagent has secured new subscribers through the slips advertising the Freethinker. Our shop manager is sending more as requested. Thanks for help.

S. Lidgett.—See "Sugar Plums."

B. Dupree.—Next week.

N. Douglas.—Thanks for the lines from Juvenal.

D. Houplain.—We can quite appreciate a Frenchman's astonishment at the English people tolerating a priesthood which urges all civilians to join the Army and then demands exemption from military service for itself. But what do you suggest we can do more than we are doing? We are trying to make Freethinkers, and that seems to us the best way of working. If we kill the religious cant, other forms of cant will weaken considerably.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

It is really time the Home Secretary undertook to give instructions to some of the Jacks-in-office who sit on the judicial bench. At Eastbourne, on August 10, a taxi-cab driver was summoned for driving his vehicle to the danger of the public. Offering evidence on his own behalf, he declined to take the oath. On this the magistrate's clerk asked: "You have no religious convictions at all?" "No," replied the defendant, "I am an Atheist." The clerk then retorted: "You had better go back if you cannot take the oath." Subsequently, the man's evidence appears to have been taken, but this does not excuse the impertinence of the clerk. As he does not appear to have been ignorant of the terms of the Oaths Act, there is no word other than impertinence that fitly describes his remark.

Our attention has been called to a misprint in the letter from France in last week's "Sugar Plums." Our correspondent wrote, "There is a widespread wave of Freethought abroad." By printing "wane" for "wave," the meaning of the sentence was reversed.

The Two Worlds is on our list of exchanges, but we overlooked a letter in its issue for July 27 reflecting on the editorial conduct of this journal. Mr. E. W. Oaten writes to the Two Worlds complaining that he had asked if the Freethinker columns were open to a reply to Mr. Mann's articles on Spiritualism, but that he had "not even had the courtesy of an acknowledgment of my letter." We recollect receiving Mr. Oaten's letter, and we replied saying that these columns would be open to a brief reply, "brief" being interpreted with a view to the length of the articles criticized. Apparently Mr. Oaten did not receive our letter. We regret this; but we cannot make ourselves responsible for delivery. We need only add that our reply still holds good.

The Humanitarian reprints the following effective lines from Mr. Ralph Hodgson's Poems:—

The Bells of Heaven.

I would ring the bells of Heaven,
The wildest peal for years,
If Parson lost his senses
And people came to theirs,
And he and they together
Knelt down with angry prayers
For tamed and shaggy tigers,
And dancing dogs and bears,
And wretched, blind pit ponies,
And little hunted hares.

Want of space prevented our noting last week the very successful close of the month's mission at Sheffield, conducted under the auspices of the N.S.S. The speaker on the concluding Sunday was Mr. Willis, of Birmingham, who reports that the meeting was well attended, orderly, and enthusiastic. We feel sure that his address must have left an excellent impression, and it remains now for local friends to see what can be done to improve the occasion. There are a large number of Freethinkers in and about Sheffield, and we feel sure that, provided it is taken in hand by the right people, a good local society could be built up. Headquarters will give every possible help, but it must be on the basis of local effort.

We do not know whether the Sydney Bulletin is prevented circulating here, but several times this year we have received notes from Australian readers saying they were sending a copy with marked passages for notice, but none have come to hand. We are writing this so that they may understand the absence of any kind of acknowledgment of their kindly offices.

Science, Telepathy, and Communion with the Dead.

V.

> By their own showing, the mediums cannot command their manifestations. These appear and disappear, come and go, in the most capricious manner. A spirit will be voluble and communicative and expansive at one hour, and in the presence of one set of people, and the entrance of a single sceptic like Sir James Crichton-Browne will so offend him that he goes off in a huff, and the failure of the rest of the sitting is due "to the offensive incredulity" of the stranger. Queer people, these spirits! One would have expected the presence of a known sceptic to put them on their mettle, and rouse them to give some manifestation that should compel conviction even in the most doubting Thomas; but not a bit of it. They are so tetchy and so easily offended that when doubt is thrown upon their existence, instead of taking steps to remove the doubt, they run away.—Dr. Charles A. Mercier, "Spiritualism and Sir Oliver Lodge," p. 57.

TELEPATHY, or Thought-transference, can never be proved until it can stand a scientific test; for Sir Oliver Lodge and his followers absolutely decline to furnish test cases to men like Dr. Ivor Tuckett and Sir Ray Lankester. They want us to believe these things on their word, without proof. Why should we? Sir Oliver Lodge, with other distinguished men, publicly declared that some of the phenomena produced by Eusapia Palladino could not have been produced by the known forces of Nature. He believes so still—at any rate, he has never publicly retracted his statement. We know now that all Eusapia's phenomena were nothing more nor less than common conjuring tricks. What reason is there to suppose that Sir Oliver Lodge is any more correct regarding Telepathy and spirit communications than he was concerning Eusapia Palladino?

Many scientific tests have been made to prove communication with the spirits of the dead. The best known was that devised by Mr. F. W. H. Myers. Mr. Myers' book, Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death, may be described as the New Testament of modern Spiritualism. It is an immense compilation, in two volumes, of the phenomena of mediumship, hypnotism, telepathy, death-warnings, hallucinations, trances, etc.—a veritable encyclopædia of superstition. There is no doubt that the influence of this book has been very great, and has had a great deal to do with the present revival of Spiritualism among the upper classes.

Mr. Myers was an educated gentleman—he had been appointed classical lecturer at Cambridge—and there is no doubt that he honestly believed in the marvels he wrote about. Not only did be devote his life to the attempt to find a firm foundation for Spiritualism, but he devised a test which, if it had proved successful, as he anticipated, would have convinced the world that the spirits of the dead continue to exist, and that they can communicate with the living. The test consisted of a message in a sealed letter, which Mr. Myers entrusted to Sir Oliver Lodge on the understanding that after his (Myers') death he would communicate the message through some medium. Ten years later, on January 17, 1901, Mr. Myers died. On February 19, 1901, about a month after Myers' death, Sir Oliver Lodge had his first communication from Mr. Myers, through the mediumship of Mrs. Thompson. The spirit of Myers says:—

> Lodge, it is not as easy as I thought in my impatience. Gurney (a deceased friend) says I am getting on first rate. But I am short of breath.
> Sir Oliver: Do you want to say anything about the Society?
>
> Myers: What Society?
> Sir Oliver: You remember the S.P.R.
> Myers: Do not think I have forgotten. But I have; I have forgotten just now. Let me think.

After some more of this sort of thing, Myers tells Sir Oliver that he will see him in April; whereupon Sir Oliver asks: "And will you then read what you wrote in the envelope?" To which Myers replies: "What envelope?—I shall be told."

This is Sir Oliver Lodge's own account, as given in his The Survival of Man (1909), pp. 287-288. Is it conceivable that the spirit of Myers, who spent his life in searching for evidence of the survival of the spirit after death, and left a message behind which, if repeated, would bring conviction to the most stubborn sceptic, would answer in this fashion? Is it conceivable that a spirit would talk about being "short of breath?" Do spirits have lungs, then? And if so, how do they travel through the ether of space, where there is no air to breathe? Is it conceivable that Myers would ask "What envelope?" when asked about the all-important message, and then reply? "I shall be told." How could he be told? No one knew what message the sealed envelope contained but himself. Is it not as evident as the sun in the heavens that the communications are the communications of Mrs. Thompson, the medium, and not those of the discarnate spirit of Mr. Myers?

After this, the spirit of Myers was in great demand; so much so that he complains through one medium that he can get no rest. Everybody is calling him, and he talks about everything and anything but the mysterious sealed envelope. However, nearly four years later, the well-known medium, Mrs. Verrall, reported that the message had been communicated to her. Sir Oliver Lodge immediately convened a meeting of the Council of the Society for Psychical Research, to be held at the Society's Rooms, 20 Hanover Square, London; and on December 13, 1904, Sir Oliver Lodge obtained the envelope from the bank where it had been deposited, and produced it at the meeting. The highest expectations were aroused.

Here, in the fateful envelope, lay the crucial test—the answer to the question which so many agonizing souls had addressed to the cold and indifferent stars, without success. If Mrs. Verrall had really received the test message from the spirit of Mr. Myers, the question would be settled once for all. The Materialist would be confounded; science itself would reel under the shock. To-morrow the news would flash over the world that the future life had been proved beyond the shadow of a doubt. The papers would be teeming with the news—the greatest revelation, thanks to Myers' foresight, the world had ever known.

We give the result in Sir Oliver Lodge's own words:—

> On the envelope being opened, however, it was found that there was no resemblance between its actual contents and what was alleged by the script (of Mrs. Verrall) to be contained in it. It has, then, to be reported that this one experiment failed, and it cannot be denied that the failure is disappointing.[1]

Sir Oliver Lodge says "this one experiment failed"; but it is not the only failure. Dr. Hodgson, another member of the S.P.R., the exposer of Madame Blavatsky, also left a test letter behind, with the same result. Besides this, he "left behind him many private papers written in cipher. The key to the cipher is unknown to anyone now living." He has promised to reveal it, but has not done so yet. He was unable to give the solution to two charades of his own composition. Podmore, who gives the above particulars, adds:—

> He made many statements about his childhood, some true, some false, many unverified. His sister, to whom all the messages were sent, wrote: "To my mind there is nothing striking in any of the statements." She pro> pounded in turn three test questions, to which the trance intelligence gave no reply. Moreover, the Piper-Hodgson (that is, the spirit of Hodgson, communicating through the mediumship of Mrs. Piper), when questioned by a sister, could not remember the name of his schoolmaster in Melbourne. We have seen already that the Piper-Hodgson failed in England to recognize some of his intimate friends.[1]

That there are many people who honestly believe they receive messages from the dead I have no difficulty in believing. Those who have studied the history of witchcraft know that many witches were condemned to death on their own confession for having intercourse with the Devil, perhaps relying upon the power of the Devil to rescue them at the last moment. Flammarion, the French astronomer, has related the trust he once reposed in the spirits, and how he was disillusionized. He tells us:—

> As is well known, I have been one of the stoutest apostles of Spiritualism. I always believed I was having regular intercourse with the other world. Galileo's spirit never failed to come to me when summoned. His revelations about the appearance and manners of the inhabitants of other planets were incorporated in my writings always with the utmost confidence till modern instruments discovered five satellites of Jupiter and nine of Saturn, whereas what I believed was the spirit of Galileo always affirmed to me that Jupiter had four moons and Saturn eight. At first I felt sure the astronomers must be mistaken, but now I have seen with my own eyes. Therefore, as it is inadmissible that real spirits could err or jest, evidently my intercourse with Galileo was a long delusion. I acknowledge it frankly and without shame, because I have acted in good faith in this matter and refuse to lend support to error.[2]

In last week's article, the figures "1310," in the quotation from Dr. Mercier, should have been "13^{10}."

Shameless Inconsistency!

II.

(Concluded from p. 508).

Believing always in the efficacy of the "concrete" rather than disquisitions on the "abstract," it has been rather a habit to collect from the land of "Who's Who?" some of the examples of how they engineer their lives with their double standard of morality and ethics.

Of late, it has been unpopular, almost dangerous, to ventilate any views against birth-limitation. Bigger and yet bigger populations, so as to secure bigger and yet bigger armies, has been the cry in every land. The clerical purists and prudes have been extra busy in airing their half-baked ideas on sociology and economics, and the consequence is, that the papers provide the drollest commentary of the "mixed grill" which some call popular "thought," but which is so often the emptiest of rhetoric and foul gas; the empty stuff so contemptuously treated by a great judge in the House of Lords, when he stigmatized some much-quoted words of Lord Mansfield as mere rhetoric, and as of no value as law—rhetorical flatulence, which has been treated as law for years; and it is interesting to note similar happenings in connection with the teachings of the Church in regard to marriage and family, and mark the attitude of the clerics when it comes to a question of putting the teachings into practice.

Keeping in mind the axiom so stressed by King George V. that the State is built upon the family, and keeping in mind the claim by the Church that "only" by a marriage "sanctified by the Church formula" can a family be soundly built, it is interesting to take note of the attitude of Church personages when acting in any official or quasi-official position which calls into play some expression of authority.

By the unfair local power which the clergy have in the course of years been able to get, they now command an altogether too big and important share of almost every form of Local Government Board work, such as on Boards of Guardians, infirmaries, almost all forms of schools, and a detailed study of all such will prove to anyone the all-round evil of the sacerdotal slime.

A few samples from a collection of some hundreds will prove the truth of this contention.

The Farnham Herald, of July 27, 1907, in reporting the proceedings of the Alton Board of Guardians, mentioned the application of the "porter labour master" and the "assistant matron" for permission to get married.

The Chairman of the Board was, of course, a cleric, a canon of the Church of England, by name Theobald, and he was supported at this meeting by three other clerics of sorts, the Rev. A. C. Machlachlan, the Rev. H. Wheat, the Rev. C. Hopkins, this last being, I think, a Roman Catholic, and, therefore, to be excused if holding anti-marriage views; there were also one or two women Guardians—but you never know what to expect of them.

Leaving out of consideration the impertinence, the indignity of one public servant having to beg of some other public servant permission to get married, permission to be adult, permission to be a citizen; keeping in mind that there were several ministers of religion pledged to support the holy rite of marriage—leaving out of consideration the "Right"—we have in the reply of the Board, as voiced by the Rev. Canon Theobald, the clearest proof of the "shameless" disregard of loudly professed principles: "They can get married if they like, but they cannot retain their posts if they do."

It may seem a far cry to go back to the Alton Board but quite recently, at another Board in the same district, a new proof of the continuity of spirit and method of which so much is made when it serves some fresh tyranny, presented an opportunity to raise a fresh protest.

The Farnham Herald, of November 18, 1916, reporting a Guardian meeting, gives an account dealing with the penalization of a nurse for the crime of getting married without first having secured permission of the Board. At the Board table there were one or two military men, one or two lawyers, one or two women, at least one parson; all, one would think, persons concerned in upholding the dignity of marriage, the cause of morality, and, not least, the increase of the birth-rate. But the committee, the shylocks of bumbledom, cried for their bond, and felt that they must enforce the penalty in order that it might be seen that the Board meant what they said. The £10 bond must be enforced; morality, religion, law, and justice is of small account when there is a bond.

This case, like the Alton one, being in the diocese of Winchester, and in the town which has the honour of containing the official residence of the Bishop, seemed to warrant—and demand—a direct approach to the Bishop.

But in the opinion of the reverend big-wig the matter was not of sufficient importance, or the latter was not in sufficiently humble terms to suit the official supervisor of morality of the Union, or else contained too much truth to please, so the shepherd, called officially "Edward Winton," took occasion by raising a false issue to ride off—outside a pulpit they are shy of fight.

It is, perhaps, no part of a bishop's job to support a mere "labour-master porter" in his desire to be a citizen, or to help a nurse to comfort a soldier, broken in our wars when he returns to his native land and lover, in the hope of making a new start in life by taking a wife, and founding a home and a family; that's no part of Winton's job, whatever it may have been, if he had remained in a more democratic station, and with the name of Rev. Edward Stuart Talbot, D.D. It suited the mood of the bishop to make a charge of blustering discursiveness against the writer, winding up with a reference to the Alton case as being years old, which of almost all pleas is the poorest sort, in the case of an officer who makes use of a signature which claims its most important sanction from a far-reaching antiquity, that a bishop continues all the time.

This is the sort of conduct which justifies a statement made by the Rev. H. S. Woolcombe, Vicar of Armley, when he says that the Church, founded on democratic principles and the mother of all democracies, is, of itself, the most undemocratic of the institutions of the kingdom" (Daily Telegraph, January 18, 1917).

It is interesting to note that this same H. S. Woolcombe, when on the Bethnal Green Board of Guardians, took part with the Rev. J. E. Watts-Ditchfield, now Bishop of Chelmsford, in a fight in favour of morality and marriage, and against the official celibacy craze so cordially supported by the Local Government Board.

St. Gile's, Bloomsbury, is on record for having discharged an officer for getting married sans permission.

During the last few weeks the Chiswick District Council advertised for a man and wife without encumbrance, and when the attention of the President of the Local Government Board was drawn to the fact, he wrote that the discretion of the local authorities might be trusted to regard the claims of family life. This in spite of public advertisements to the contrary.

Some while back the Daventry Board of Guardians advertised for "Young Married Couple, without encumbrances"; and here, again, it was left to two ministers to put up a protest, one of them putting his finger right on the spot by charging the Guardians on the score of an attack on Christian morality, saying that "the Guardians were not merely encouraging race-suicide, but attempting to enforce it."

From the reports of almost every public and quasi-public body in the kingdom, in almost every department of employment, this same shameless contradiction: pulpit and public encouragement of marriage on the grounds of religion and morality, and the same persistent "They can get married if they like, but they must leave their job if they do." The Rev. Canon Theobald plus the Rev. R. Meddings crystallize what is one of the most emphatic denials of our much-vaunted theory of religion ever put on record, for it is the formation of a complete indictment of every detail of our social, ethical, and political system, the so-called religious claims first and foremost.

Glen Beauty.

Terrible and more terrible, with the passage of time, becomes the human carnage, heavier and heavier become the burdens on the shoulders of humanity, darker and darker loom the clouds that cover the fair face of the sun. Thundering reverberations of devilishly ingenious guns still deafen our ears. Ghastly shades, in ever increasing numbers, still tread the lonely road to crowded graves. Farther and farther into soul of society penetrates the subtle poison of reaction. The future fight becomes daily a struggle whose intensity develops in perspective with its postponement. It will try the bravest of hearts. It will test the strongest of spirits. Idle prophecy, perhaps, it may be to forecast the severity of this intellectual warfare; but the protection and strengthening influence militarism affords all the reactionary aspects of society can scarcely be overestimated.

So it is that peace seems to have become possessed of a new and more joyful meaning than before; and when we pass through the old beech and ivy robed archway, and walk up the avenue towards the house that has been to us a place of materialized peace, the real value of quietude floods our beings, and we wish never to leave it.

Tranquility of a degree unknown to the world resides here. Restfulness that men deem folly has nestled down within the walls of our home. Happiness is imprisoned between the beech hedges, and lingers within the glens, and uses the hills as its recreation-ground. Peace abides here in all its fulness, even in all its majesty. The ordinary everyday occurrences share not a little of its regal raiment; and difficult as it is to forget the bloodstained mad world, with its tragic infinitely sad conflictions, we can, for a little, let it slip our memories.

Peace is always more powerfully active than war; it is more valuable; it is more fruitful. Peace even produces war, and ultimately conquers it; and, however absurd it may seem, in the end war must come pleadingly to peace, asking that it may lay its weary head on her restful bosom. We discover the truth of this when the shrieking incoherencies grow dim in our ears, when the lurid streaks of conflict fade from our vision, and then we forgive the sentimentalist for speaking truthfully at the right time.

We climbed the hill in the forenoon, and risked our necks on a sledge that enjoyed burying its nose in the tufted grass. We explored the woods and glens in the afternoon. We dozed before a huge log fire in the evening until Nature awakened a vibrant chord in the complicated being of Mainie drawing her to the window. She unbarred the shutters and peeped out.

"Mack!" she whispered. "Come and see this!"

I said farewell to the man who wrote the Hymn to Proserpine. I knew what would happen.

"Look! See there!" she said. After a minute or two of mental concentration I could see them. On my life, I swear, I saw them, and Mainie can back me up. Hundreds of winter sprites of the fairy family were dancing around the rhoddy bushes on the lawn. They were clad in bright green garments. Their pink feet shone as they flitted above the snow. Curly hair streamed out from the little heads into the moonrays like silken threads of gold alive with light. These tiny strangers were radiantly happy, and as they danced on the snow-carpet they sang the quaintest of delightful melodies that ever one could hear.

Mainie spoiled the picture, for we went out to come into closer acquaintance with them, and to discover they had disappeared. But they had not taken the beauty with them into their old-fashioned home amongst the tree roots, as Mainie says.

Nature had robed herself in snow. Lawns, and paths, and terraces were covered with a glittering mantle of the purest white. Through the silvery filagree of tree branches streamed the moonrays. Bushes and hedges sparkled with millions of miniature lights. And down the slope to the road stood the pine strip, darker because of the snow light, impenetrable to the moonbeams, guarding the house like a sentinel who disregarded not one word of his duties, black-browed, immobile, statuesque.

After walking round the lawns we took the garden path to Glen Beauty, and in a few minutes we entered the woods. Overhead hung heavy pine foliage that transformed the trees into a huge natural cathedral along whose aisle we walked. Here and there the pathway twined into the light: but, with a few steps, we were again the quiet-footed, soft-tongued visitants of Nature's Holy of Holies. Through the restless windows, for the pines kept company with oaks and elders, sycamores, elms, and ashs, filtered queer gleams of light. On strange places they fell. Within a cleft of an old oak we saw a chaffinch's nest. Despite the frost and snow it was as cosily dry as if it had been finished but yesterday. In the hollowed bough of an elm one shaft of moonrays found the dainty little home of a wren; and another of the moon's searchlights played upon two black rabbits that were nibbling the juicy bark of a fallen sapling beside an entanglement of snow-tufted wild rose and bramble bushes.

Down and up glens we followed the aisle pathway, over fir-built bridges, along the shelving sides of fern-clad rocks, under archways of intertwined trees and bushes, until we reached Glen Beauty. In our ears rang the music of its creamy waters as they merrily flashed their way to the meadow burn. The moon was high in the heavens above the hill. Deep upon the bracken on the other side lay the snow. Each little bush that clung, beside the trees, on the precipitous declivity beneath our feet, bore its soft burden of white light rivalling the trees in its loveliness.

Mainie went into silent raptures: we had never seen Glen Beauty so entrancingly beautiful. The spirit of the place we loved deepened within us. Missionless it was, yet its knowledge, as it were, of our needs seemed as deep as that of genius. It brought us a message of peace. Reasonless it was, but its tranquility was profound like that of wisdom. Voiceless it was, yet the mellow music of the waters sang of joy to our hearts. In the quietude were no echoes of disaster, no reflections of folly, none of the brutalities that make men mad, none of the crimes that open the lives of women and children to endless sorrow and suffering. From the outside world peace had come here to rest awhile.

As we leaned over the fir railing and let the loveliness purify our hearts, we thought of the contrast the scene afforded to the lives of men and women. We could not help it. Here were light and purity; there darkness and mystery. Here was peace; there war. Here were the things that gave mankind the happiness for which we long; there nothing but striving and its hopelessness.

Life might be sweeter and cleaner did we love beauty more. We would not be content with the dirt, the squalor, the ugliness, and bitterness of the ingredients of our daily tasks if we knew what beauty was, and how easily it could become part of us and part of our everyday environment. We would not suffer the horrors to exist, nor would we tolerate the man who solemnly told us they were the fires through which we travelled to God.

There was no deity in the moonrays that turned the glen into a wonderland of joy and loveliness; there was no deity in its influence upon us; there was no deity in the happiness that stole through us. God remained as far from us as he does from his own children. Here was the peace God could not give to peace-craving nations—the peace that strengthens those engaged in a more fateful conflict than that which gives nothing and takes all.

To us the peace of Glen Beauty was the peace that shone in the eyes of the pioneers of all times. It was the peace the downtrodden and oppressed dreamed of and never experienced. It was the peace that glimmered far on the road of progress, and is reflected in the hearts of all revolutionaries—from the man Jesus Christ, if he lived, to the man who, to day, is spending his weary hours in prison that his conscience may still be free. It was the peace that every sensitive soul sees shining in the future; and Mainie and I discovered some of that peace in moonlit loveliness of snow-clad Glen Beauty.

SOCIALISTS, FREETHOUGHT, AND RELIGION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—There is virtually nothing left at issue between Mr. Effel and myself. Mr. Effel thinks that Christianity is an obstacle to progress—so do I. Mr. Effel thinks that Marxism and Christianity are mutually exclusive—so do I. Mr. Effel asks me if I "have ever met a Marxist who was a Christian?" I have met quite a lot of people who thought they were Marxist and said they were Christian, and weird "wild fowl" they were, too! The trouble is, they were perfectly sincere. "This kind is not cast out save by prayer and fasting." As for the "psychologic bond"—we shall see!

Thos. A. Jackson.

CHRISTIANITY AND COLOUR CONCEIT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—I do not often defend Christianity; it is seldom accused of anything of which it is not guilty. But I think your article of July 29, in which you say colour conceit is "an offshoot of Christianity," is not true to history. Colour conceit is an independent growth, which the Christian Church has absorbed because she could not remove it. She absorbed the Christmas and Easter festivals for the same reason; she is absorbing the nebular theory and Darwinism for the same reason now.

Originally Christians classified men thus—(1) true believers, (2) heretics, (3) heathen. And they disliked all cross-classification as tending to distract attention from the main one. National patriotism was never regarded with much approval by the Church in its first fifteen centuries; still less would the colour line have been approved—if it had existed. But it did not exist. In the ages when Christianity was strongest, the Western Christians no more thought of despising Arabs or Indians than we would think of despising Germans. There was hatred, and curiosity, but no scorn. It is true our forefathers thought themselves more civilized than the African negroes, but the explanation is simple; they were! It was not till the seventeenth century that the West began to draw ahead of the East. The main reason of the gain is clear enough; Christianity was less powerful than Islam or Hinduism, and therefore did not succeed so well in suppressing thought. A secondary reason may be found in the alphabet we inherit from the Phœnicians. Imperfect as it is, it gave the printing-press and education a far better chance than the Arab alphabet or the 214 signs of Chinese ever could give them. A third reason is perhaps the accident that one man of genius, Francis Bacon, was born in the west. Whatever the reasons, the advance was real. And during the eighteenth century we find a subtle conceit creeping into the literature of the Western Aryans—especially that written by men who had not helped the advance or had hindered it, and who individually were not superior to the members of the races which had fallen behind. But this tendency has grown stronger as Christianity has grown weaker. The more pious Christians have always opposed it, and still oppose it, not on the true individualist grounds, but on the same ground as of old—it is a cross-classification to the classification they want to emphasize.

On Seeing Princetown Church.

Princetown is proud of the fact that its Parish Church was built by the forced labour of American and French prisoners of war.

By sweating slaves were temples built,
And captives churches raise,
Wherein the saved may thankful lilt
Their grateful hymns of praise.

But still our God is Lord of Love;
He sets the prisoner free;
And any pious priest can prove
The Church's sanctity. PERCY RIPLEY.

"To any Clergyman in England."

THERE is no God—You need not pray:
Save your full words for such as they
Who took in youth the battle trail.
Some will live and some will fail,
But only their red blood can pay.

You need not kiss your "man of clay,"
Or crucifix, or Book and say—
"O God Forgive." 'Twill not avail.
There is no God.

There is no God—Yet these men lay
Their bodies down on War's red way
For love of man. And your sweet tale
Is foolish now. Behind the veil,
They too have seen—for France to-day.
There is no God.

HEAVEN.

Fish (fly-replete in depth of June,
Dawdling away their wat'ry noon)
Ponder deep wisdom, dark or clear,
Each secret fishy hope or fear.
Fish say, they have their Stream and Pond,
But is there anything Beyond?
This life cannot be all, they swear,
For how unpleasant, if it were!
One may not doubt that, somehow, Good
Shall come of Water and of Mud;
And, sure, the reverent eye must see
A Purpose in Liquidity.
We darkly know, by Faith we cry,
The future is not Wholly Dry,
Mud unto mud!—Death eddies near—
Not here the appointed End, not here!
But somewhere, beyond Space and Time;
In wetter water, slimier slime!
And there (they trust) there swimmeth One
Who swam ere rivers were begun,
Immense, of fishy form and mind,
Squamous, omnipotent, and kind;
And under that Almighty Fin,
The littlest fish may enter in.
Oh! never fly conceals a hook,
Fish say, in the Eternal Brook,
But more than mundane weeds are there,
And mud, celestially fair;
Fat caterpillars drift around,
And paradisal grubs are found;
Unfading moths, immortal flies,
And the worm that never dies.
And in that Heaven of all their wish,
There shall be no more land, say fish.

—Rupert Brooke, "1914 and Other Poems."

Lord Haldane says "an educated man does not take starvation wages or live in a slum." Was he thinking of the dear clergy when he made the remark?

Christian Arrogance.

Next to the profound egotism embodied in Christianity is the arrogance and impertinence of its professors. Its egotism is shrouded in a profession of humility; its arrogance is the product of pride of place sustained through many centuries, during which its power was practically unquestioned. The old anti-evolutionary cry that human dignity was destroyed by an affiliation of man to the animal world; the demand that this, that, or the other Christian craving must be satisfied or the universe stand a confessed failure, are examples of what we mean by Christian egotism. Its arrogance and impertinence are not less striking than its egotism. Christians have ruled the roost so long, they have been so used to ignoring or trampling on other people, that the vast majority of them do not seem to realize there are other people in the world, with at least equal claims to consideration. In the case of education the subject is discussed as though it were merely a question of settling what Christians want. With the Sunday question it is, again, a question of whether Christians want music, or museums, or picture-palaces on the day of rest. No one else matters. Non-Christians must be content if they are permitted to exist. So, again, with moral qualities. Truth, honour, honesty, etc., are discussed as Christian virtues. Preachers are found declaring that they owe their prevalence, if not their existence, to Christianity. One would think that Christianity invented these qualities, and that other people were only entitled to them on payment of a royalty. One might as reasonably talk of the Presbyterian law of gravitation or Roman Catholic chemical affinity. Moral qualities are not the property of a sect, they belong to the race. What they owe to Christianity is distortion and degradation, not even development.

Pious Bunkum.

We were led to the writing of the above by an article from the pen of the Rev. Percy Dearmer, contributed to the columns of the Daily News. Mr. Dearmer is spending a holiday in Kashmir (it is remarkable how these poor, poverty-stricken parsons manage to get all these expensive outings), and his reflections have led him to comment on the development of political and social justice among the Western peoples, as compared with Eastern races. It would take us too far afield to discuss this question now, except to say that Mr. Dearmer suffers from the common fault of measuring the world by the standards of suburban London. And we cheerfully admit that a sound public life is dependent upon the development of a high standard of public service, a high standard of justice, and a sense of truth, as conditions of mutual trust and well-being. These all exist in the West, says Mr. Dearmer, with the stupid implication that they do not exist in the East—and he sees in the present War a proof.

> It is a struggle against the attempt to overthrow the decencies of Christendom by the brute force of a naturalist reaction—at the hands of men who have given up Christianity and have taken natural science in its place. But more than this, it is a struggle against the despotisms in Turkey, Austria, Germany, and also in Russia, which had survived in Europe as relics of the pre-Christian stages of society.

There is the parson through and through! The War is the product of men who have given up Christianity! Where? Has Germany given up Christianity? Has Austria? Has Bulgaria? Has any of the belligerent nations? Is there not an overwhelming majority of Christians in every one of the nations at war? Could there have been war had Christians been in any degree opposed to it? Where are the men prominent in this War who have given up Christianity and taken natural science in its place? And, after all, what has been the ideals of all the Christian nations now at war? Has it not been for nearly three centuries a policy of spreading over the earth, seizing territory East and West, counting national greatness in terms of money, and territory, of armies and navies? The responsibility of Germany for the present War is one thing. The responsibility for the conditions that have led up to the present catastrophe is another thing. And Christian nations were at the game of plundering, threatening, and the piling up of preparations for war long before Germany offered even a probable threat to the security of the world. This War, no matter where the responsibility lies, is a Christian war. Its outbreak was a proof that in the moralization of the world, Christianity has been, and is, a wholly negligible factor.

Christianity and Justice.

But Mr. Dearmer's most remarkable discovery is that the ideals of social justice and public service, in which he believes the West to be superior to the East,— > can be traced directly to the belief in a good God which Christianity has implanted, not merely to the belief in some sort of Divinity, or in various kinds of gods, but to the belief in a personal God whose character is love.

That is a typically Christian statement—typically Christian, and wholly false. Observe that Mr. Dearmer does not say that social justice is due to the belief in God; that would give all religionists some of the credit. It is due solely to the Christian God. His is all the glory. But Mr. Dearmer should have been more precise. He should have told us where we are to look for evidence that the sense of social justice is due to Christianity. Is it in the New Testament? Surely not. As Mill said, it is the Koran, not the New Testament, which lays it down that a ruler must be appointed because of his justice and honesty. The New Testament is content with counselling the governed to obey their governors under penalty of damnation. Political justice is absent altogether from the New Testament. It does not come within its scope. Plato in the Republic, Plutarch in his Morals, Seneca and Aristotle in their various writings, did lay down some conception of the State, and insisted upon justice as the condition of a stable government. But such a conception is quite absent from the New Testament. And one consequence of this was the centuries of struggle to regain something of the conception of social life and social justice which was lost to the world through the triumph of Christianity.

Christian or Pagan?

Instead of the notion of social and political justice being an offshoot of Christianity, it is strictly correct to say that while, on the one hand, Christianity troubled little or nothing about either, both Greek and Roman thought was permeated therewith. A large part of the Platonic dialogues, such as The Laws, The Statesmen, the Republic, are mainly a discussion of social justice. Roman thought was chiefly concerned with it, and Lecky expresses the bare truth when he points out that it was during the reign of the Pagan Emperors—particularly under Hadrian and Alexander Severus—that a great advance was made in redressing injustices and "making the natural equality and fraternity of mankind the basis of legislative enactments." It was not a Christian, but the Pagan Epictetus, who wrote: "The duty of a citizen is in nothing to consider his own interest distinct from that of others." And it was the Pagan Marcus Aurelius who said: "There is but one thing of real value—to cultivate truth and justice, and live without anger in the midst of lying and unjust men." What has Christianity better than that? And what had these men to learn from a creed such as Christianity?

The Lie Historical.

A fortnight ago we were writing on the various kinds of lies that buttress Christianity. Among them we mentioned the lie historical, and we ought to thank Mr. Dearmer for so promptly providing us with an illustration of the truth of what was then said. For it lies upon the face of history that Christianity did nothing to develop the sense or practice of social justice, and much to hinder its development. Under its rule the Pagan legislation in favour of the emancipation of slaves ceased, the growing movement in favour of the equality of the sexes was crushed, the municipal life of the Roman Empire disappeared, and its legal system was overlaid with a mass of pious puerilities. And it is surely not without significance that in all the historic disputes between authority and liberty, at the Renaissance or the French Revolution, it was to the Pagan world that men turned for their ideals and their inspiration, not to the New Testament with its other worldliness, and its doctrine of passive submission to constituted authority. The late Professor Seeley says that the "whole modern struggle for liberty has been conducted not indeed without help from Christianity, but without help from the authoritative documents of Christianity." That seems to us only another way of saying that even Christians are not always true to the spirit of their creed. And their disloyalty in this instance is evidence of the coercive influence of social life.

Is there Anything in Religion?

Such was the question asked by a popular preacher in London the other Sunday evening, and, of course, he answered it in the affirmative. He was forbidden by his profession to give it any other answer, as everybody knew beforehand. The preacher was the Rev. Arthur Dakin, B.D., D.Th., of Coventry, who occupied the pulpit of Ferme Park Baptist Church during a portion of the pastor's holiday. Dr. Dakin had the courage to admit that "what strikes us most when we try to visualize London at this hour is not the number of worshippers, but the number of other people in the streets and elsewhere who are far away from the spirit and atmosphere of such a service as this"; but that admission was accompanied by the rider that "thousands of these people would probably say they believe in God, but that they are content to leave God alone—which is the greatest tragedy in human life." As a matter of fact, such people do not really believe in God, because, if they did, they could not possibly leave him alone. Does it not strike the reverend gentleman, however, as a curious and suggestive coincidence that when people do leave God alone he also leaves them alone? In other words, it is not a startling but undoubted fact that God exists only to those who believe in him, and that even they live exactly as if he did not? Wherein, then, does the tragedy of leaving him alone consist? Very probably the worshippers at Ferme Park Church regard themselves as occupying a much higher ground, in the sight of Heaven, than "the other people in the streets and elsewhere," who enter neither church nor chapel; but Dr. Dakin cannot but be aware that "the sight of Heaven" is merely a creation of the theological fancy, the real standard of comparative judgment being "the sight of earth." Thus judged, it will be found that, as a class, the non-worshippers, who leave God alone, are not inferior, to say the least, to the fervent believers who frequent church or chapel.

Our inference is that as a character-building agency religion is a tragic failure. Religion, in the accepted sense of the term, is a thing people profess, and religious people are generally known as professors of religion. The saved make a public profession of Christ as Saviour and Lord; and the first thing they are called upon to do as his disciples is to crucify themselves. Young people attend revival meetings on purpose to get converted, or to get religion, as it is often put, and conversion means the denying of self, and the acceptance of Christ to fill the void. Now, we are often told from the pulpit that the essence of the Christian life is self-denial, the surrender of self that God may become all in all. Take any list of Christian virtues supplied in the Bible, or elsewhere, and you will find that the majority of them are passive; or consult any schedule of rules for Christian conduct, and you will perceive that it consists largely of prohibitions. Out of the Ten Commandments eight are "Thou shalt nots." Self, we are warned, is notoriously untrustworthy; therefore, "it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man." In Proverbs (iii. 5, 6) we are instructed thus: "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not upon thine own understanding: in all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths." The New Testament equivalent to the Old Testament "trust" is "believe." To believe in Christ is to rely on his finished work, and let him do everything for us. The central idea is that self is evil, and, if followed, will lead us to everlasting destruction, or that of ourselves we can do no good whatever. But, we maintain, that to depreciate and distrust our own nature is the most dastardly crime we are capable of committing, and that not to lean upon our own understanding is to cover it with the lowest insult conceivable, as well as to jeopardise our own future. When, therefore, a religion teaches salvation by faith in the merits of another, it condemns itself as an instrument calculated to do unspeakably more harm than good to those who sincerely and consistently profess it. Such a religion preeminently is Christianity, and all sane people are bound to repudiate it.

We can never repeat too often or emphasize too strongly Emerson's famous saying: "Trust thyself; every heart vibrates to that iron string." In reality, there is nothing else to trust. God is nothing but the name given to a cluster of ideas, and as such alone exists. To trust him for salvation would be the silliest and most disastrous conduct possible. For the life that now is, nobody ever did trust him without coming to open grief. People pray, "Give us this day our daily bread"; but we know that bread is Nature's response to man's work, without which work it never comes at all. As Anthony Redvers, in Eden Phillpott's Secret Woman, declares: "Hard work's the only prayer as gets answered 'pon Dartmoor; a man must trust in his own right arm." Or as Emerson so well puts it:—

> In what prayers men allow themselves! That which they call a holy office is not so much as brave and manly. Prayer looks abroad and asks for some foreign addition to come through some foreign virtue, and loses itself in endless mazes of natural and supernatural, and mediatorial and miraculous.

Salvation by faith alone is admittedly a mystery. Even Mr. Westaway, in the Secret Woman, seems to understand that God's ways are past finding out simply because otherwise there would be no work for the clergy. He says:—

> "Why, if his will was as easy to understand as big print, an' a clear thing for every humble heart to follow, there'd be no need of learned men, nor your bishops, nor prebendaries, nor rural deans. 'Twould be taking the bread out of parson's mouth if we could understand the ways of God."
> "Do you reckon that clergymen do all the good they claim to do?" asked Jesse.
> "More," declared Mr. Westaway. "Much more. They are the backbone of the nation. Without them all the mystery would be knocked out of religion, an' 'twould sink to be a matter of common sense. Dally-buttons! What a downfall 'twould be if us was allowed to run our lives by naked common sense. Away would go tithes an' all the other hidden things; an' not a man to marry us, nor christen our children, nor bury anybody."

There are strong reasons for fearing that Mr. Westaway did not discern the full significance of his illuminating words; but there can be no more completely attested fact than that supernatural religion and common sense are not on speaking terms. The divines acknowledge the truth of this statement; for in their estimation common sense, because it engenders unbelief, should be entirely avoided, and this is their advice:—

> Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
> But trust him for his grace.

We hold that we have no other standard of judgment than "naked common sense," and that, if we were to run our own lives by it, the only possible downfall would be that of the clerical profession, which exists alone for, and derives its only support from, the advocacy of the inherent depravity and consequent impotence of human nature, rendering its salvation impossible except by whole-hearted trust in the mercy of God in Christ. We contend, on the contrary, that human nature is neither impotent nor yet depraved, but possesses resources which entitle and empower it to manage its own affairs and work out its own salvation, without any interference whatever from the supernatural. "Is there anything in religion?" No; nothing but illusion and hindrance, nothing but an insult to the reason and an outrage upon the emotions. What we need, above all else, is confidence in ourselves and thorough training in the high art of self-reliance. Had the nations of Europe paid supreme heed to the development of the social sense, had they studied individual, national, and international problems on humanistic lines, and had they realized that it is the present life alone that matters, this disgracefully inhuman War could never have broken out. And yet, although the Church alleged to have been established by the Prince of Peace had been the dominant institution for nineteen centuries, she was powerless, possibly disinclined to attempt, to prevent such a calamitous carnage, and is equally unable, perhaps also disinclined, to bring it to an end.

Renan the Rebel.

> So far as a man thinks, he is free.—Emerson.
> Instead of being made—make yourself.—Herbert Spencer.
> John P. Robinson, he
> Sez they didn't know everything down in Judee.—Lowell.

At that magnificent collection of French art which was shown some years ago at the Franco-British Exhibition, there was one portrait which left an ineffaceable impression upon the memories of the onlookers. It was Bonnat's portrait of Ernest Renan, a masterpiece which presented the man with absolute sincerity and fidelity. The picture was a triumph of genius, for the great French Freethinker lived once more upon the artist's canvas. Renan was seated, clad in the black broadcloth of the scholar, unrelieved save for the red button of distinction, and the long, unkempt, grey hair. The heavy face, the pendulous cheeks, the glassy eyes of the dreamer of dreams, the long finger-nails, all formed a perfect portrait of the solitary scholar who shook the world.

Ernest Renan never cared for the applause of the world; but he would have smiled his kindly smile if he had known that he was the subject of a great artist's finest masterpiece. And it is pleasant to think that we have a perfect presentation of the most accomplished author and scholar of his generation.

Renan's influence was continuous from the publication of his famous Vie de Jesus, in which he attempted to write the life of the young Jewish fanatic whom he had served in his youth. What a tempest the book provoked! For years it rained pamphlets. Fifteen hundred replies were published within a few months of its appearance. Whether men applauded or criticized, none could deny its power. Priests might rail and the pious might sigh, but they both have had to reckon with it. Not even the most reactionary of the commentators on the Gospel legends have written as they would have written had Renan's book never been published. It was a famous victory for Freethought, for Renan's kid-glove method is as fatal to religion as Strauss' analytical and critical thoroughness. Airily and daintily the scholarly Frenchman explained away the wonder and glamour of the Christian fables. The result was as deadly as the direct attack of the German scholar, although Renan does with a kindly smile what Strauss does grimly. Always under the velvet glove was the gauntlet of steel. The result was decisive, for it sapped the faith of tens of thousands:—

While we believed on earth he went,
And open stood his grave,
Men called from chamber, church, and tent,
And Christ was by to save.
Now he is dead. Far hence he lies
In the lorn Syrian town,
And on his grave, with shining eyes,
The Syrian stars look down.

The man who could alter the faith of thousands was well equipped for his task, for he was a great writer as well as a complete scholar. In many hundreds of pages Renan showed the sarcastic power of the French language in hands that can evoke its subtleties and wield its trenchant blade. In his hands it was as effective and deadly a weapon as that handled by Edward Gibbon, although many tracts in the thousand years of history of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire seem as if they had been made to suit the greatest of all historians who wrote amid the quiet acacias of Lausanne. With his scientific bent on the one side, and his clerical training on the other, Renan was still at heart a Voltairean. He even suggested that Jesus in Gethsemane may have looked back with a sigh to the young maidens of Galilee, who, under happier circumstances, might have made his bliss. The sentiment was popular, for many sympathetic lady-readers of the Gospels have lamented that he was not a marrying man.

Renan's own pilgrimage from Rome to Reason is told in his own incomparable language in Fragments, Intimes et Romanesques. In it he tells the story of the sufferings he endured as he shook off his beliefs; and the series of letters addressed to his friend, the Abbe Liart, show, step by step, how he lost hold of his faith. In the final struggle he is driven to the Bible and to Pascal. In Pascal he finds that "the greatest brain that ever existed hardly dared to affirm anything." Then there were the domestic troubles, for there were foes in his own household. How Renan's heartstrings were tugged, for his loved mother was looking forward to his ordination in happy security. As he tells us in the Souvenirs, this was the most difficult knot to unravel. "I exerted all my ingenuity," he says pathetically, "in inventing ways of proving to her that I was still the good boy as in the past. Little by little the wound healed. When she saw me still good and kind to her, as I had always been, she owned that there were several ways of being a priest, and that nothing was altered in me but my dress, which was indeed the truth."

The way was smoothed by Renan's brave sister, Henriette, and the touching dedication of the Vie de Jesus expresses in a few sentences what he owed to her. The story of his mental development he afterwards retold in Souvenirs, but that is the memory of a man looking back upon the past, with the sadness and fragrance of the days that are no more. One thing emerges from all his writings, and that is his complete honesty. Truthful in his own despite, it was this uncommon quality that laid the foundation of his maturer influence and universal understanding. The real importance of such a man as Renan will be found as much in the processes of his quest as in what he discovered.

In all the little ironies of literature there are few things more interesting than that Renan's favourite subjects are chosen from a race of men, as he himself remarks, as different as possible from himself. But where his theme is one of the heroes of philosophy, Marcus Aurelius or Spinoza, his eyes kindle, and his smile is graver. For Renan was imperturbable. Through all the charlatanisms and devilries of superstition he went his quiet way, humming softly to himself. Far off, the murmur of the busy and noisy world sounded but dimly; but the scholar wrote his books and brought his dreams of the redemption of humanity within the realm of reality. He was well content, for he knew that he worked at the looms of the future.

Science, Telepathy, and Communion with the Dead.

VI.

One day, alone and immersed in business in his "Cabinet," Oliver found himself confronted by a stranger who had somehow gained entry. The stranger stated that the Lord Jesus had appeared to him and announced that he, the stranger, would receive some great consideration at his, the Lord Protector's, hands; failing which, the consequences would, or might, be unpleasant for him, Oliver.

Cromwell, who, at this period at any rate, did not suffer from "nerves," explained to the stranger that it "was not the Lord Jesus, but a lying devil," who had appeared to him; that therefore he, Oliver, was under no moral obligation to comply with his requirements, still less was he, the stranger, obliged to take any further steps in the matter.

This view of the case so "flabbergasted" the stranger that he was left without an answer, and at once withdrew—and, no doubt, was suitably cared for outside. Oliver went on with his work.

It occurred to the writer that had Sir Oliver been able (as regards "Myers") to emulate the scepticism of his great namesake, some trouble—and much mischief—would have been obviated.—W. Cook, "Reflections on Raymond," p. 51.

Several attempts have been made to gain new astronomical knowledge from the spirits. We append a sample given by the spirit of Sir Walter Scott, at the request of Professor W. Romaine Newbold, at a sitting with the medium, Mrs. Piper, June 27, 1895. Professor Newbold asks: "Sir Walter, is the sun all fire, or has it a solid mass?" To which the spirit replies that the sun is a solid body with a fiery envelope. But we had better give the exact words:—

> Well, now we move on towards this fire, now reach its borders, and notwithstanding the extreme heat we pass through it, and we find ourselves upon a solid bed of hot clay or mud. This is caused by gravity. Understand where we are; we have now reached the limit; we find it very warm and deserted, like a deserted island. We wish to find its inhabitants if there are any, i.e., if it has any. Now we see what we term monkeys, dreadful looking creatures, black, extremely black, very wild. We find they live in caves which are made in the sand or mud, clay, etc. Now, sir, for that I will be obliged to discontinue our journey until some future time.
> Prof. Newbold: Will you come again?
> Sir Walter Scott: Yes, I will look down upon your planet and find you out. Good morrow, my friend. Leave the sun, or in other words we will remain on it. Adieu.
> W. Scott.

The sitting continued next day; but in the meanwhile the spirit discovers that he has been making an ass of himself, with his black monkeys in the sun, and tries to put himself right by explaining that, finding the sun very hot, he followed the light to the earth, where he "saw the monkeys flying in and out of sand caves." This explanation does not meet the case, for we left the spirit in the sun at the end of the sitting.

Immediately after this lame and halting explanation, the spirit makes another blunder just as bad. Professor Newbold asks: "What are the sun spots?"

> Sir Walter Scott: This is the shadow of the earth, sir.
> Prof. Newbold: You are thinking of eclipses. I understand this; but I mean the black spots sometimes seen on the sun?

Digitized by Google

Sir Walter Scott: Oh, I beg your pardon, sir; I did not understand your question, thoughts.

Prof. Newbold: I beg your pardon.

Sir Walter Scott: No, sir; I understand now the spots on the sun are.....yes, sir.....are the so-called satellites which surround it; this produces a dark mass of spots.[1]

An intelligent schoolboy would know better than that. When the Professor asks about the climate of Mars, he is told it is "Very fair; it is in the torrid zone." As if the torrid zone existed somewhere in space, instead of being a zone on the earth!

When Professor Newbold and Hodgson were reading the record containing the description of monkeys being in the sun, they burst out laughing, and at the next sitting the spirit asks them what they were laughing at. Mrs. Henry Sidgwick describes this as a case of telepathy.[2] It seems to me that nothing more than common sense was required to tell Mrs. Piper that her error had caused laughter. These are just the little points of acuteness where Mrs. Piper scores, and endeavours to turn defeats into victories.

At another sitting held by Dr. Hodgson with Mrs. Piper, Hodgson asked the spirit of Sir Walter Scott to take him beyond Saturn; to which Scott replied: "I cannot catch your meaning, sir. I cannot take you to planets that do not exist." Hodgson: "Haven't you seen a planet further away than Saturn?" Scott: "Mercury."

"In the interval between this sitting and the next," says Mrs. Henry Sidgwick, "Scott has apparently made inquiries, or consulted Mrs. Piper's half-lost memories .....an expedition to Uranus is spontaneously offered, and on July 5 to Neptune. The previous ignorance or forgetfulness is the more curious as Neptune and its inhabitants turn out to be specially interesting, and are described at great length."[3]

All of which proves two things. Firstly, that the spirits only know what Mrs. Piper knows, and where she is ignorant, they are ignorant. Secondly, that Mrs. Piper uses the intervals between sittings to acquire knowledge ready for the next sitting.

Any account of the evidence for communion with the spirits of the dead would be incomplete without an examination of the claims of the celebrated medium, Mrs. Piper, who has practised as a medium for the past thirty years. One whole volume, of 649 pages, of the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. xvi.) is devoted to sittings of Mrs. Piper. Another volume of 652 pages (vol. xxviii.), by Mrs. Henry Sidgwick, is devoted to the study of the psychology of Mrs. Piper's trance phenomena. Many other volumes of the Society contain records of her sittings; many others have been published by the American S.P.R.; and many have been published independently of either Society, as in Sir Oliver Lodge's Raymond. "Certainly," says Podmore, "here, if in any case in the whole history of Spiritualism, is such evidence to be found."[4] If it cannot be found here, it is useless to look elsewhere for it.

Mrs. Piper, then, is a trance medium, who has spent most of her life in Boston, U.S.A. "In 1884," says Podmore, "as a young woman, she consulted for some ailment a professional clairvoyant named Dr. Cocke. At her second visit to Dr. Cocke, Mrs. Piper herself became entranced, and was thereafter controlled by a large number of 'spirits.'"[5]

Before going further, it will be as well to explain, for the benefit of those who are not acquainted with the jargon of Spiritualism, the meaning of some of the terms used. At a sitting, or seance, there are at least four characters: (1) The Inquirer, or person who wishes to get into communication with the spirits. (2) The Medium, who claims to be endowed with an organization very sensitive to spiritual influences, and receives messages from the spirits. (3) The Control, or Familiar Spirit of the Medium, who seeks out and transmits messages to the medium from the spirit you wish to consult, or from the spirit who wishes to deliver a message to you.

Why Controls should be employed instead of direct communication with the spirit required is not very clear, unless we are to understand that all spirits cannot communicate with the living, but only a few who are especially sensitive to human influences. For our part, we heartily endorse the belief of Mr. Edward Clodd, that the Medium, the Control, and the Spirit, these "three are one."[1]

However, the theory works out mighty convenient for the medium, for if the information obtained is found to be untrue, which is often the case, in spite of the ambiguity and general vagueness of the messages, then the blame is thrown on the spirits—a false or tricky spirit (a "lying devil," as Oliver Cromwell would have called it) is personating the real spirit required.

When Mrs. Piper gives a sitting, she goes off into a trance, her head resting on a cushion or pillow. During this trance it is claimed that her spirit leaves her body, and the spirit of her Control enters in and takes possession, using Mrs. Piper's organs of speech, or Mrs. Piper's hand for writing. Latterly the communications have been in writing.

Mrs. Piper asserts that she has no knowledge of what takes place during the trance; has no idea of what she has been saying or writing, as the case may be. It is impossible to prove or disprove this statement, as the truth of the matter is only known to Mrs. Piper herself. Of course, if Mrs. Piper vacates her body and another spirit enters in, like the evil spirits used to enter the possessed, then it would be unreasonable to expect Mrs. Piper to remember what she spoke or wrote. But the Spiritualists, in their clever theories, have overlooked one thing: What becomes of the spirit of Mrs. Piper? Does it remain close at hand, ready to return to Mrs. Piper's body directly the Control vacates it? If so, how is it that Mrs. Piper knows nothing of what transpires? If, on the other hand, it goes wandering about, how is it she knows nothing about that? Spirits do not go into trances or become unconscious. We are assured that pure spirit, freed from the earthly shell or body, is pure intellect. No one ever heard of a sleeping spirit or an unconscious spirit. How is it that Mrs. Piper gives no account of what happened to her own spirit during the sitting? The most reasonable explanation is that spirits have nothing to do with the matter at all, and that the real author of the message is Mrs. Piper, and no one else.

The Spiritualists, however, call heaven and earth to witness to the honesty and veracity of Mrs. Piper. But as Podmore points out:—

> Now the fact that nearly all those who have had sittings with Mrs. Piper have been impressed by her transparent honesty is, in strictness, irrelevant. We have seen that many of Foster and Home's sitters were equally confident of the medium's honesty, and that, generally, the ability to impress his clients with confidence in his integrity is an essential part of a medium's equipment.[2]

removed by education and social position from the ordinary temptations to fraud, who are engaged in the production of physical manifestations involving elaborate and systematic deception." [1] Of Madame Blavatsky he remarks: "It is impossible to doubt that for her, at any rate, there was an intellectual satisfaction to be derived from fooling the world, or that not inconsiderable part of the world which came under her influence. She was an artist in chicanery, a trickster not for gain only, but for glory. And researches in the squalid annals of Spiritualism have brought to light other cases where fraud was practised without the attraction of pecuniary or any social advantage." [2]

OF THE CHARACTER OF COIGNARD.

His free intelligence trampled under foot vulgar beliefs and never accepted without examination the common opinion, except in what had to do with the Catholic faith, in which he was immovable.

The sagest of moralists, a kind of miraculous blend of Epicurus and Saint Francis of Assisi. He preserved, in his boldest explorations, the attitude of a peaceful promenader. He sauntered through the world with the audacious naivete which is the essential trait of his character and the elemental principle of his teaching.

He despised men with tenderness. He tried to teach them that, since they have nothing anywhere near to greatness in themselves except their capacity for suffering, they can cultivate nothing useful or beautiful but compassion.

He had to show them that their imbecile natures have neither imagined nor constructed anything worthy of attack or defence, and that, if they only knew the fragile crudity of the works of which they are most proud, such as laws, religions, and empires, they would fight about them in play only, as children that build castles of sand on the rim of the sea.

The majesty of the laws did not impose on his clairvoyant soul; and he deplored the fact that the unhappy ones are burdened with so many obligations, of which, generally, it is impossible to find the origin or sense.—Anatole France, "The Sayings of Jerome Coignard."

Acid Drops.

There is, perhaps, more in the Pope's latest appeal for peace than meets the eye. The Vatican never loses sight of a possible restoration of some measure of temporal power, and if a peace conference could be brought about through its mediation, it would have a strong claim for representation, and ultimately for consideration thereat. In the next place, the Roman Church is not blind to the extent to which Christianity has suffered through the War. It has given a serious, if not a mortal, blow to the idea that Christianity counts as a moral force in the world's affairs; and if a peace conference resulted from its efforts, it would enable the Church to plead that but for Christian influence, the War might drag on indefinitely. Finally, the Roman Catholic Church is the one Christian Church with anything like a claim to be called Universal. It has followers all over Europe and America, and is specially strong in Austria and South Germany. All of these naturally look to the Church to exert something like a helpful influence, however much they may be disappointed. Other Churches are at most national Churches, and are compelled to play the game of nationalism to the end. But whether we are dealing with the Roman, the Greek, or the Protestant Church, there is no need to look beyond the play of sectarian motive to account for their conduct.

Apart from this, the reception of the Pope's note proves that the only power exerted by Christianity to-day is a power for evil. The Allies are unanimous in declaring that the Pope is playing the German game, and is manœuvring for a "German peace." On the other side the Pope is quite unable to persuade either Germany or Austria to offer conditions that would provide a basis for negotiations. Thus, while the appeal to Christian belief and Christian feeling is everywhere powerful to rouse people to war and to keep them at war, nowhere does it exert any influence in the direction of bringing the War to an end. As a force for destruction it is still powerful. As a power for peace it is impotent and contemptible. Peace, when it does come, will not owe its coming to Christianity. And we are sure that large numbers will be alive to the significance of the situation.

A pastoral from the Lutheran Synod was read recently in all the churches of Berlin. The congregations were enjoined therein to recognize the hand of God in the fact of the soil of the German Fatherland having been protected from invasion. The Kaiser and the German Empress attended service in the Cathedral. Yet the truthful British clergy will have it that the Germans are "Atheists."

The Bishop of London said that he prized a photograph of himself taken aboard a vessel of the British Fleet. This industrious quick-change artiste is doing his best to advertise himself as a national hero.

A paragraph in the Star says that "St. Mark's parish, Camberwell, has sent over 2,500 men to the Colours, and all its assistant clergy are also serving at the Front." The casual reader would hardly realize that the parsons were engaged in serving communion port at the back of the Front.

A returned Army chaplain, the Rev. C. B. Mortlock, preaching at St. Margaret's, Oxford, on August 12, said:—

> A vast amount of harm has been done, he said, by the utterly unreal and extravagant nonsense that has been talked and written about soldiers. War is a foul mixture of brutality and ugliness and bad smells and a hundred horrors that cannot be named or described. To pretend, if not to believe, that soldiers exult in it is to go a long way towards brutalizing the national character by investing the horrors of warfare with a romantic glamour. To read as I did the other day—the writer was probably a woman—of the soldier hero waiting "with eager heart and starry eyes" to go over the top is as sickening as it is silly. Soldiers hate it. They recognize it for the hysterical tosh it is, and if some of our "popular" preachers and speakers had heard, as I have, the soldiers' comments on this sort of gush they would be astounded. It > is stupid, false, dishonouring, and wicked, and I know that many soldiers stay away from church because they are afraid of hearing more of it.

As our readers are aware, we have been saying much the same as this ever since the War began—and for years before it began. Soldiers know what a hateful, filthy, demoralizing business war is. It is the man at home, the newspaper scribbler, the empty-headed, Jingoistic, war-at-any-price man, the man who boasts of "doing his bit," getting well paid for it, who glorifies war. As Mr. Mortlock says, the real credit due to our soldiers is for what they have endured, and the manner in which they have borne themselves during the past three years. But nothing is more false, and ultimately more evil, than the talk of the benefits, moral or mental, derived from War. If these benefits do follow from war, then Prussianism in its most complete form is fully justified. If Prussianism is a thing to be hated and suppressed, those who dwell upon the way in which our soldiers are made better men, and we at home better citizens by war, stand self-condemned as fools or rogues.

"General" Booth is a good Christian, and a better man of business. A display advertisement in the daily press reads: "The War Work of the Salvation Army claims your interest and sympathy. Send a cheque to-day to General Booth." Unhappily, the Salvation Army is engaged in fighting the Nether Powers, whilst the Allies are in conflict with the Central Powers.

Speaking at Hampstead, Sir Oliver Lodge admitted that he had not had a scientific education. The confession was really unnecessary, for most people recognize that much of his parade of knowledge is all bogey.

The Rev. H. G. Veazey has been appointed honorary canon of Southwark Cathedral, and a press notice says that he has "done good, social work, particularly in connection with the United Girls' Schools Mission." Envious colleagues will now sing "Place Me Among the Girls."

The winter coal supply is causing anxiety. We wonder if there is a shortage in the place so often mentioned in sermons.

The clergy are like the Bourbons. They learn nothing and forget nothing. The Rev. Percy Dearmer has been repeating the ridiculous falsehood that the Germans are Freethinkers, and the editor of the Daily News permits the remark to pass unchallenged. The reverend gentleman's words are: "The present War—is a struggle against the attempt to overthrow the decencies of Christendom by the brute force of a naturalist reaction—at the hands of men who had given up Christianity and had taken natural science in its place." Yet the Kaiser's piety is notorious, and German soldiers have the words, "God with us" inscribed on their uniforms.

The Rev. John Neville Figgis, D.D., Litt.D., an Anglican clergyman, has published a notably sane book about Nietzsche and his teaching, of which the Church Times for August 17 furnished an equally sane review. We disagree with much in both book and review, but heartily welcome both as eminently hopeful signs of the times. After Drs. Clifford's and Campbell Morgan's ignorant and unscrupulous attack upon the Nietzschean philosophy, it is profoundly gratifying to find a Christian minister who can be perfectly just and fair to the greatest anti-Christ of the nineteenth century. The reviewer says of many references to Nietzsche in pulpits and newspapers:—

> It is assumed that the outrageousness of German behaviour is due to his teaching, or, conversely, that he is the one true exponent of the German spirit, the prophet of the "good old German God." Those who know disdain this facile ignorance, among whom is Dr. Figgis.

While ardently admiring and even loving him, Dr. Figgis is by no means blind to the fact that Nietzsche is "a real enemy" of Christianity. His recognition of this fact constitutes one of the chief beauties of The Will to Freedom: or the Gospel of Nietzsche and the Gospel of Christ (Longman's; 6s. net). Dr. Figgis never forgets that to the famous Basle Professor Christianity was "the one great curse, the one great intrinsic depravity, the one great instinct of revenge." And is not that indictment truer to-day even than when Nietzsche framed it?

Clergymen are wholly mistaken when they affirm, as they all do, that the world "not only needs but feels the need of redemption." The world does nothing of the kind, and this is the reason why it so persistently rejects the Christian religion. What the world really needs and feels the need of is freedom, justice, fairplay, a development of natural affection as the medium of universal brotherhood; and this it has never enjoyed under any form of supernatural religion.

"Viator," of the Church Times, met a red-hot Atheist from London, who said that he hated the Christian God with perfect hatred. Addressing himself to "Viator" and his friends, he exclaimed: "Your God! Your maker of the world.....He made this mess of a world, and leaves us the heart-breaking job of setting it to rights. If I believed in a God like yours, I should hate him, I would spurn him, I would defy him." Neither "Viator" nor his friends disliked the fellow from London, and on parting they all shook hands with great cordiality. One of them observed:—

> What a friar preacher that man would make; can't you see how love burns in him?

We congratulate "Viator" upon his sensible attitude to the Atheist.

Christ said "Woe unto ye rich," but numbers of Christians appear to be quite willing to bear all the risk of a decent balance at the bank. Even the dear clergy are no exception. The Rev. J. E. C. Colquhoun, of Killermont, Scotland, left personal estate of the value of £41,956. Another parson, the Rev. R. Evans, of Leominster, left £41,574. And the Rev. C. White, formerly curate of St. Mary, Plaistow, left £18,124.

The Emperor Charles is as pious as the Kaiser, and in a recent message to the German Emperor he congratulates him on the brilliant successes of his troops "with the aid of the Almighty." The message goes on, "May the Lord continue to aid our faithful co-operation in the future with the fullness of his blessing."

A press paragraph states that the paper used by the British and Foreign Bible Society has increased from twopence to sixpence a pound. Cannot these pious folk rely on prayer without resorting to the very mundane method of advertisement?

The Dean of Worcester says there has been a reaction in favour of religious education as a result of the War. We are not aware of any reaction, but we do know there are hopes amongst religionists of turning the war-spirit to the benefit of the Churches. It is against this attempt that Freethinkers will have to be on their guard. How much Christians hope to gain from the War is seen in the remark that what is taught to the children must be believed by the teachers. If that means anything at all, it means tests of the most rigorous kind for them. We are quite sure that so long as religion is in the schools, Churchmen will always be working in favour of tests for teachers; and we hope the prospect will arouse in them the perception of the necessity for clearing religion out of the schools altogether.

At Willesden Police Court a boy of 16 was charged with committing a number of burglaries, and stealing from automatic gas-meters. It is said he had been inspired to commit the burglaries by reading a life of Charles Peace. His religion was that of a Salvationist. It was not pictures this time; and in following Charles Peace the boy might have claimed a religious model. Peace's attachment to Christianity, particularly of the Evangelical or Salvation order, was well marked and sincere. He enjoyed the services thoroughly, deriving spiritual profit from them, and material profit from his burglaries.

The New York Truthseeker publishes some interesting figures concerning the alleged number of converts made by Billy Sunday in his Boston campaign. Sunday declared that 1,381 Catholics had signed cards accepting his doctrine, and that this number of cards, signed, were delivered to the Catholic Churches. Whereupon inquiry was instituted, and eliminating eighty children, the following analysis was published in the Boston Pilot :—

Signers for curiosity and fun	372
Unable to verify because of change of address, etc.	298
Insufficient address on cards	205
No such person at address given	195
Not practical Catholics	66
Non-Catholics	46
Deny being present and signing cards	36
No such address...	35
Request of employer	23
Converts	6
Not responsible for actions	6
Perverts	4
Unable to give any explanation of their actions ...	4
Went with Protestant friends	3
Went to hear sermon on Temperance	2

The eighty children are thus accounted for :—

Curiosity and fun	57
Unable to verify because of change of address, etc.	16
Taken by Protestant friends	4
Not practical Catholics...	2
Never attended	1

These figures are quite in line with other statistics of the same kind. When Torrey and Alexander were in this country, an inquiry on somewhat similar lines produced the same result. Whatever else the professional evangelist may do or leave undone, his campaign never suffers for want of embellishment.

The Bishop of Norwich is blessing the War, and says it is "worth while to support right, truth, freedom and honour; to fight for peace and goodwill, and the things Christ himself taught us to hold dear." Does this mean that Christian soldiers are enforcing the Beatitudes with bombs and bayonets?

"It is the duty of the English people," said Dr. Page, at Plymouth, "to learn all they can. That day he had seen a statuette of Benjamin Franklin labelled George Washington." If Dr. Page pursues his studies, he will find thousands of statuettes of a Jewish peasant labelled "God."

A new reflector for the Mount Wilson Observatory, California, has been installed, but during its passage up the mountain, so says the Illustrated London News, "It was carefully guarded, as threats to destroy it had been made by cranky opponents of science." Evidently there are still good Christian representatives of those who opposed the use of chloroform as being against the Lord's wishes. The Lord left man ignorant, and he should remain so. That seems the theology of these people.

Owing to the scarcity of starch, it is rumoured that the clergy may have to wear soft collars. It seems appropriate that soft collars should be worn by men with soft heads.

The question of whether the War is helping or injuring religion still provides room for newspaper writing. In the Weekly Dispatch Mr. Edward Synton cites an English chaplain as saying of his experience at the Front with the Australians :—

> I was a great deal with the Australians, and they taught me a lot, these men from "down under." At first I thought them a hard-fighting, hard-swearing, hard-hearted lot of sinners. Then I got to understand their point of view and loved them. Religion? They mostly had none, at least no orthodox faith, and yet they were better men than I, braver, more unselfish, and broaderminded.

The curious thing about such confessions is the insight they give into the clerical mind. That a man should be surprised to find men without religion brave, unselfish, and broad-minded, illustrates the cramping influence of Christianity. Otherwise it would surely be recognized that such qualities are in no sense the property of a sect, but that they are to be found with men of all creeds and of no creeds at all. We are not at all afraid of chaplains in the Army converting Freethinkers, but we should not be at all surprised to find many conversions in the other direction.

Of course, Mr. Synton has the usual remarks about the War breaking down the barriers of sect and creed. And this may well be the case. The lesson that many draw from this is that while all religions divides men, social service of any kind, even of warfare, unites them. They will live together, eat together, fight together, and die together. The one thing we will not do is to pray together. The War has certainly brought out the essentially anti-social character of modern religious belief, and thousands are becoming alive to its significance.

The Rev. J. Thomas, who achieved notoriety by having imputed to him the remark that God sent the heavy rain because he was displeased with Sunday labour on allotments, has now explained that he did not say exactly that. What he said was that there had been a lot of work put into the garden. "This appeared in the sight of Almighty God, and the heavy rain did seem to be God's answer." His view was that the people should "bring their tools and seeds to church, and offer them and the work that was going to be done to God." We cannot see that this mends the matter much. If God has anything to do with the weather, the rain was his work, and if he has not, we don't see much use in men offering their work to God—unless by some kind of hocus-pocus Mr. Thomas sees some benefit to his Church.

The Bishop of Birmingham has written to the Times, protesting against Mr. Thomas's view of the operations of Deity. That is a domestic quarrel, and we will leave the two to fight it out. But we would like to ask the Bishop where his God does appear in the business? If the weather happens without his help or interference, why not other things? And if all things happen without him, what is the use of bothering about him, anyway? The stock apology for a king in this country is that he doesn't interfere with things; he does nothing. Is the Bishop adopting the same policy with regard to God?

The Christian World protests against the attempt of Roman Catholics to discredit Protestantism by pointing to Germany. But is there not more excuse for this than for Protestants of this country trying to saddle the responsibility for the War on the Materialism and anti-Christianity of Germany? Germany is quite as Christian as is this country, and before the War, English Protestants were loud in their endeavour to prove that Freethought had little influence in Germany, and that the ruling minds there, as here, were Christian. The truth is that Germany is a Christian country, in the sense that the majority are Christian. And the Russia of the late Czar—the Russia of the Siberian prisons, pogroms, Black hundreds, and other villainies; the Russia that the Bishop of London extolled so highly—was also Christian. That Freethought and national villainy go together is a pure inference; there are no facts to support the charge. That Christianity and national villainy often run well in harness all history proves abundantly.

The Cape, a South African journal, publishes in its June issue a note on the Governor-General's (War) Fund raised at Malmesbury. The sum realized was £628 8s. 2d., out of which £517 5s. 6d. was received from a "Rev. Mr. Grove." On the expenditure side of the account, however, it appears that Mr. Grove received five per cent. commission, or £25 17s. Mr. Grove is the local clergyman of the Dutch Mission Church, and the Cape expresses surprise at the commission being paid, when in Capetown account collectors never ask more than two-and-a-half per cent. We are surprised also, not at the facts, but at the admission. We think the usual way is to put in such payments as "expenses." That covers much. But we fancy the eyes of many would be opened if the expenditure in connection with the various War funds in this country were carefully scrutinized. Scotland Yard could tell a tale were it so inclined.

To Correspondents.

O[illegible]E of our readers, who some years ago translated into French a pamphlet by Mr. Foote on The Virgin Mother, wishes to know if any reader of the Freethinker possesses a copy. In that case, will they be good enough to write to this office.

W[illegible]LL FRASER (Cape Town).—We are obliged for cuttings and MSS. Pleased to have your appreciation of the Freethinker. We have many readers in South Africa, and have often wondered why something definite in the shape of propaganda is not attempted there.

L. NEWLYN.—So long as we can scrape along we are quite content. There is a pleasure in the struggle, otherwise we should neither have commenced nor continued it. And the only place in the Freethought ranks for the man who is not content to struggle and enjoy it, is outside. Please overlook the bull, it is excusable.

L. ANSELL.—The Freethinker is not registered as a newspaper, but it can be sent abroad on a postage of one halfpenny. There is nothing against it being sold in the way you name.

A. WAYMARK.—Thanks. Criticism, particularly when it is well meant, is always acceptable.

T. HARDING.—It was quite usual to issue the Apocrypha along with the Authorized Version of the Bible until early in the nineteenth century. The Apocryphal New Testament books were only issued as a separate volume. An edition was published by William Hone, and can still be obtained in second-hand condition.

L. N.—Thanks for offer of articles, but they do not fall quite within the scope of this paper.

MATERIALIST.—The question of the nature of the atom is not really vital to the position of a scientific Materialism. The Materialist takes his conception of the atom from contemporary science, and he is at liberty to revise that conception as fuller knowledge requires, without prejudice to his philosophy.

A. R. RICHARDS.—P.O. received. Pamphlets are being sent as directed.

C. W. BAKER.—Many thanks for copy of article, which we greatly appreciate.

J. ROBERTS.—Pleased to hear from you. We can quite believe that our soldiers appreciate the Y.M.C.A. activities in the shape of picture shows. The good souls who picture the soldiers crowding to the religious services are to be pitied. Pleased also to learn of the readiness with which the Freethinker is read amongst the men. The War has brought us many new readers, and we shall be surprised if it does not bring many more.

W. J. HEPWORTH (Johannesburg).—Your P. O. was received quite safely, and the pamphlets and book ordered duly sent. There was some delay in sending as we were waiting delivery of the book ordered from the binders. The parcel was sent on June 14, leaving a balance of 6s. to your credit. Barring submarines, you ought to have received it before this. If not, let us know, and duplicates will be sent.

T. L. K. MUDALIAR (Bangalore).—We are writing the parties named in your letter.

W. THOMAS.—Articles on Omar have appeared in the Freethinker from time to time, but we cannot put our hands on one at the moment. We must have that index one day. Will have another look, for next issue.

E. PURCHAS.—We cannot say from which translation of Omar our contributor was citing. There were several versions of Fitzgerald's issued, and numerous other translations have appeared.

F. C. HOLDEN (Utah).—We are afraid we have been remiss in not acknowledging before now your goodness in sending cuttings. They are appreciated none the less.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Eternal vigilance may be the price of liberty, but that is because its opposite is unsleeping and unweaned. A friend, whose daughter is about to enter a Teacher's Training College, sends us a letter, received before the girl arrived at the College, asking her to join an Archbishop's Certificate Examination. The letter, it should be said, does not come from the College, which makes it the more curious. The prospective pupil is reminded that if she teaches in a Church school, the Archbishop's Certificate will be a valuable addition to other qualifications. Secularist parents would do well to be on their guard in these matters, for it is evident that where religion is considered "all things are lawful." Nothing short of clearing all religion out of the schools will ever stop these gentry at their old-time tricks.

The new Swansea Branch of the N.S.S. has drawn up a good programme of lectures up to the end of November, and the Secretary, Mr. B. Dupree, 12 Short Street, Swansea, is anxious to secure the co-operation of friends in the district. These may assist either by donations, by becoming members of the new Branch, or in both directions. There is plenty of energy in Swansea, and we hope that this will not be discouraged through lack of support. Mr. Cohen has promised to open the course on September 30, and he will be followed on October 14 by Mr. Lloyd.

The re-formed Manchester Branch is also making preparations for a good winter's work. The Secretary, Mr. H. Black, of 446, Great Cheetham Street, E., Higher Broughton, writes that our last note on the subject brought several new members, but he is anxious for more. We hope he will get them. May we also again urge Freethinkers in other parts not to let the coming autumn and winter months pass without a really serious attempt at organization. We are specially anxious to see greater activity in South Wales and the West and North of England.

We are pleased to note that the Christian Registrar (U.S.A.) for July, in giving a notice of the result of the Bowman case, remarks: "The House of Lords in England has given a judgment of importance, and with no little credit to itself." We are glad to see the justice of the verdict recognized by a journal so wholly opposed to the views it is the business of the Secular Society to promote.

The printing of the full report of the House of Lords judgment is now in hand, and it will be published as early as possible. Printing is, however, nowadays a matter of some uncertainty, owing to the shortage of labour and the delays occasioned thereby. The settlement of affairs in connection with the Bowman estate is also going on, but that is also a matter which takes some time.

A curate had asked an East End godmother the usual question: "Do you, in the name of this child, renounce the devil and all his works, the pomps and vanities of this wicked world?" and she gaily replied: "Oh yes, I recommend them all!"—Raymond Blathwayt, "Through Life and Round the World."

"Now, boys," said the vicar one day to a class of bright little fellows, "I have to divide four potatoes fairly and equally between five boys. How shall I do it?" Dead silence until one little fellow held up his hand: "Mash 'em, sir!"—Raymond Blathwayt, "Through Life and Round the World."

The Rise and Progress of Mental Power.

IV.

The differences which separate the psychical powers of man from those of the lower animals are, undoubtedly, material in degree. But when we survey the wide interval which yawns between the feeble mental capacities of the lowest savages and the intellectual achievements of a Newton, Darwin, Spencer, Goethe, or Shakespeare, it becomes obvious that the range of human mentality itself is, indeed, vast. And, as we have already seen, just as mind in its highest manifestations in the brute may be traced step by step upwards from the simplest modes of sensation, so do we discover that from ape, through savage, to cultured man, there extends a chain which binds all these creatures in one close embrace.

The transcendent importance of any satisfactory solution of the problem of human psychogenesis is acknowledged by all. When modern man meditates over the mocking resemblance to himself, which all the monkey tribe display, above all, when he still cherishes the fond delusion that mankind alone are endowed with a mental, moral, and spiritual pre-eminence which establishes their right to regard themselves as specially favoured forms of life, designed to reign supreme over all other modes of being, and destined to enjoy an immortal bliss denied to their meaner living contemporaries; when confronted with a caricature of man's peerless self, the lord of creation cannot avoid the problem of the meaning, not merely of simian organisms, but of the savages who scornfully suggest to him the inferior state from which he has slowly arisen. As Huxley so admirably put it:—

> Brought face to face with these blurred copies of himself, the least thoughtful of men is conscious of a certain shock due perhaps not so much to disgust at the aspect of what looks like an insulting caricature, as the waking of a sudden and profound mistrust of time honoured theories, and strongly rooted prejudices regarding his own position in nature, and his relations to the wider world of life; while that which remains a dim suspicion for the unthinking becomes a vast argument, fraught with the deepest consequences, for all who are acquainted with the recent progress of anatomical and physiological sciences.—(Man's Place in Nature, p. 59).

The three leading opponents of the doctrine of the derivation of human mental faculty from lower animal intelligence never composed their own differences. For, although Quatrefages, Mivart, and Wallace were all convinced evolutionists, they inconsistently endeavoured to break the continuity of Nature in order to establish their contention that the intellect of man had a separate origin from that of animal mentality in general. Their objections were based on three antagonistic postulates. And, although with his declining Catholicism, Mivart's opposition steadily weakened, he long insisted that human reason could not be of kindred genesis with that of brute intelligence, because the mental capacity of the lowest savages rises immeasurably superior to that of the highest apes. On the other hand, Wallace claimed that the psychical powers of primitive men are so similar to those of anthropoid apes, that their relatively massive brains proved that their possessors were ordained to act as the forerunners of future intellectual races to which a powerful mental organ is essential to enable them to fulfil the functions of civilized existence.

In supporting his theory of the mental independence of man, Professor Quatrefages confined his dissent from the more logical conclusions of naturalists in general to the realms of conscience and religion. For he frankly confesses that "the animal is intelligent; and, although an (intellectually) rudimentary being, that its intelligence is nevertheless of the same nature as that of man." The argument of Quatrefages counts for little when we remember that ethical feeling is very feebly represented in the lower races of mankind. Yet, there are marked evidences of rudimentary moral feeling in dogs, horses, and other mammals, while the maternal instinct is strongly developed both in quadrupeds and birds. Indeed, apart from at least a faint feeling of reciprocity, it is impossible to account for various actions which the numerous social animals so constantly display.

The theology of a Newman, Martineau, or Pascal, quite obviously, could not exist among aboriginal savages any more than among cats or monkeys. But the sensations of fear and curiosity so largely responsible for the genesis of religions, and of which they were the natural outcome, found their first supernatural expression among animals gifted with conceptual powers. Apart from terror, theologies have been mainly generated through malobservation and misconception of Nature's phenomena, with the consequence, that in their crudest and most bloodthirsty, as in their most refined and attenuated forms, they reflect more or less the mental and moral outlook of the communities that cling to them.

Metaphysicians obstinately allege that thought is impossible in the absence of language, a fallacy to which even the poet Shelley fell a victim. For he declares in his Prometheus Unbound that the Titan—

> ...gave man speech, and speech created thought;
> Which is the measure of the universe.

But "speechless" creatures indubitably possess general ideas. One has merely to observe cattle, horses, or sheep, grazing, to realize that these animals know what to eat and what to avoid. Or, as Romanes urged in his Mental Evolution in Man:—

> If I see a fox prowling about a farmyard I infer that he has been led by hunger to go where he has a general idea that there are a good many eatable things to be fallen in with—just as I myself am led by a similar impulse to visit a restaurant.

A terrier has a distinct idea of a rat, and the dullest cat never fails to recognize a canine creature. Infants, again, long before they speak, easily form ideas of a simple character. Moreover, animals dream, which indicates that they are not entirely dependent upon the impressions of the moment, but retain sufficient of the sensuous experiences gathered in their waking hours to enable them to restore them in the imagery of a dream.

Romanes introduced the useful term "recept" to denote that condition of consciousness which unites things perceived with things conceived. This psychologist thus phrases his case:—

> A recept differs from a concept in that it is received not conceived. The percepts (things perceived) out of which a recept is composed are of so comparatively simple a character, are so frequently repeated in observation, and present among themselves resemblances or analogies so obvious, that the mental images of them run together, as it were, spontaneously, or in accordance with the primary laws of merely sensuous association, without requiring any conscious act of comparison.

Taine felicitously pictures recepts as the unelaborated ore from which the metal of a concept is subsequently smelted. As Mill remarked in his Examination of Hamilton's Philosophy, the higher animals possess as distinct consciousness of the nutritive qualities of food as if they had a word for edible substances. Apparently, all visual perceptions, wherever present in the animal series, arise from automatic inferences necessitated by correspondences between what is supplied by the sense of sight, with the more primitive perceptions furnished by the sense of touch.

This far-reaching principle is justly extended to recepts. Things perceived are automatically registered in consciousness, for racial experience has compelled sentient creatures to detect the differences which obtain between unlike objects. Whether a lamb wishes to see a wolf or not, when its enemy comes within visual range the lamb is obliged to realize its unwelcome presence. Out of percepts, recepts are generated through comparisons and combinations of an automatic character. The conscious organism receives impressions composed of the memories of percepts, sometimes blended into simple recepts which spontaneously fuse when brought together. The elementary constituents of recepts, as a result of their frequent repetition, or of their pronounced resemblances, so cling together in consciousness that the elements immediately interlock to form compounds so soon as they are placed in apposition.

Among the lower animals thousands of instances might be cited proving receptual intelligence; or, in other words, practical inference. Ants, birds, mammals, and other intelligent animals, provide positive evidence of this.

All the higher animals profit by experience. Adult dogs, horses, etc., display more astuteness than younger members of their kind. Old wolves easily surmount obstacles devised by the cunning of man when in search of sheep or other prey, which baffle their less sophisticated fellows. Foxes learn to avoid dangerous districts, and when driven by grim hunger to brave the perils of death, they manifest the most astonishing dexterity in accomplishing their purposes of plunder. As Leroy, who spent his life as the Ranger of Versailles, attests, even where snares abound, the sagacious fox, after a careful examination of the trap, would sometimes succeed "without hurt to himself" in drawing the bait skilfully from the snare. All the available evidence conspires to prove that percepts form the raw materials of recepts, while from these are developed those supreme conceptual states which include the highest human powers of reason and judgment.

The Invisible Moral Governor.

Joe Robinson was an old-fashioned Tory and Churchman. He had prospered in business, and took a good deal of interest in local affairs. He had also interested himself in church affairs, and had become churchwarden in the parish in which he resided. When the great War broke out, he had four sons of military age, and although they were engaged in important businesses in the City, they were not long before deciding, like the patriotic Christian gentlemen they were, to join the Colours. The two eldest joined the Royal Field Artillery, one of the young ones the Royal Flying Corps, and the youngest—"Young Joe," as he was called—an infantry regiment. After a few months' training, the two eldest were sent out to France, and took part in several important engagements, and received promotion and honours for their distinguished services. In the early part of the second year of the War, Alfred, the eldest, was severely wounded, and had to have one of his legs amputated. A few months later, the second son, George, was killed in action.

These terrible calamities greatly disturbed the mind of "good old Joe Robinson," as he was affectionately called. Everybody in the parish sympathized with the bereaved parents, and some of the members of his Church told him that in the end he would come to see that the loss of one of his sons and the dreadful sufferings of the other were all for a good purpose. Joe Robinson bowed his head submissively to the will of the God he had been taught to believe in, but he nevertheless thought, in moments of solitude, that God had not been particularly kind to him in visiting upon his unfortunate head these great calamities. A few months later, the third son—James, the flying man—was "missing." He had taken part in an air-raid in Belgium, and had either been shot down or had fallen into the enemies' lines and been taken prisoner. Before he had time to get over this loss, poor Joe Robinson received a telegram to say that his youngest son—young Joe—had been wounded, and was on his way to a hospital in London that dealt especially with the wounds from which he was suffering. The parents were naturally overwhelmed with grief at this latest trouble, and Joe Robinson resolved to go and see his wounded son at the earliest possible opportunity.

When he arrived at the hospital, he was greatly shocked to see his youngest son, whom he dearly loved, with his head and face swathed in bandages. He had been hit by a piece of a shell that had exploded very close to him, and had killed and maimed several of his comrades. For some days young Joe was too ill to enter into any conversation with his beloved parent; but after some weeks of careful nursing and loving attention from friends and wounded comrades, young Joe was able to sit up in bed and converse most freely with friends who came to see him.

One day his mother came, and Joe was quite cheerful, and spoke most hopefully as to his speedy recovery; he also told his mother not to weep for the loss of George, who was out of his misery, sleeping, perchance, "the dreamless sleep of death." He spoke also most affectionately of his elder brother, who had lost a leg in the service of his country, and his brother who was "missing."

But he uttered no word about religion. Upon that subject he was resolutely silent. When, however, his father came to see him, young Joe thought he would speak frankly with him on that subject. Young Joe had never been a very zealous Christian. He had gone to church regularly, and had joined heartily in the service; but he listened with critical mind to the sermons, and he never professed to believe much in them. Indeed, on week evenings, before the War, he had often gone into the London parks and heard the various lecturers on religion, including the Freethinkers, and he could not hide from himself the fact that in argument the latter always seemed to get the best of it.

One evening, when his father came to see him, young Joe shocked him very much by telling him quite bluntly that he could no longer believe that there was a good, Heavenly Father watching over his children.

"I am astonished, my dear boy, to hear you talk like that. You have had many providential escapes from death, as you have told us; and now, although you have been wounded, you are still alive, my dear boy, and I hope you will live for many a long day to cheer your parents in their time of depression and trouble."

"Ah, my dear father, if you had only endured the torture I have undergone during these last two years in the trenches in France, you would understand and appreciate my meaning. For months I have been in the trenches up to my waist in water. I have heard the shells whistling through the air at dead of night, and some of them falling perilously near to me and my comrades; and while I have been talking to my chums the rats have been wading through the mud close to my feet; and then we could hear the thunder of the guns, and expect every moment that our 'number was up,' and grieve that we should never see home or parents again. In such times, if you have a moment to think about religion at all, you naturally ask yourself, What is God doing that he does not stop this dreadful War?

"I know," responded his father. "I know your feelings very well, but then we have been taught that God is all-wise and knows what is best for us—better than we do ourselves. He is the great invisible ruler and governor of the universe, and he regulates things according to his infinite wisdom and power."

"Well, dad, man has begun to doubt the wisdom of this God of the Christians, and to call in question the goodness and justice of many of his actions."

"Yes, but this is most impious on the part of man. Who is man that he should judge?" said the father in solemn tones.

"But, father, you doubted, I know, whether it was a kind act on the part of God when poor George was killed in action; and you did not think it was particularly good of God to allow Alfred to be so seriously wounded as to lose his leg. And what about poor James?"

"My dear boy, these are only personal matters; other families have, probably, suffered more than we have. In his great wisdom God has to take the larger view and consider not the interest of one family, one regiment, or one army, or even one nation, but the whole of mankind."

"Understood," said young Joe. "But see what has been going on in the world during the past two years and a half, or more, and ask yourself what God has been doing that he has not put a stop to all the foul crimes, the lying, the spying, the wholesale murder, the outrages against women and children, and all the other untold infamies perpetrated during this dreadful War."

"Yes, I know, but we have been told to believe that God knows best."

"By whom? By the priests and the parsons. Yes, they have misled and deceived us for their own purpose, but the people are beginning to reason for themselves, and to demand a rational answer to their questions."

"But, my son, the Bishop of London recently said that in all these things—even when young and unoffending children had been cruelly murdered by enemy aircraft—God was not to blame."

"Ah, if I wanted to be cruel, and to hurt the poor Bishop's feelings, I should say in the language of Macduff: 'He has no children.' If he had he would never talk in that way."

"Besides, if you glance over the whole of Europe, you will find the world aflame with this dreadful War. You will see that the earth is being drenched with human blood. Each man is fighting for his country, so we are told, and each is killing another man against whom he has no personal grudge. The Bishop says quite truly that God is not to blame, simply because no such being, as the Bishop talks about so glibly, exists. If he did, he would be the most miserable and contemptible creature in this great universe."

"Stop! don't talk like that, my son, your feelings at the present moment are overwrought. Pause awhile and reflect. I remember when I was a young man, in times of great catastrophe and trouble, I was very prone to think as you think now, but I got over that. I was told that the God of the Bible was cruel and revengeful, and I am bound to admit that some parts of Holy Scripture give some ground for such a conclusion; but, then, I remember Butler's Analogy points out that if God was cruel, nature was no better; that, in point of fact, nature was doing every day on a large scale, by earthquake, famine, pestilence, and disease—what you are now blaming God for doing in this world-wide War of death and destruction."

"Yes, dad, you are right. Nature is very cruel; but nature is not intelligent; in fact, nature is blind and deaf and dumb. She neither sees the tragedies she commits, nor hears the cries of her suffering children, and she is deaf to all appeals for help. No, dad, it is of no use blaming nature. Man causes all the wars, and war brings out all the worst features in human character. Under the stress and strain of war man becomes a wild beast, and he does deeds that he would be heartily ashamed of in moments of calm reason. I could tell you some of the things that have been done in this War that would make you shudder with horror."

"Don't do that, my dear boy. I have heard and read stories that have made me regret that my boys have had to take part in such indescribable scenes of horrible barbarity."

"Yes, dad, but nothing that you could have heard or read could give you the faintest idea of the hellish wickedness and crime that take place in the heat of passion on the battlefield; in fact, on such occasions men are transformed into wild beasts, as I have said, and if God made us with these characteristics he must have known what would have happened, and if he was all-powerful he could have stopped it, and if he was all good, his goodness would have prompted him to do so."

"There you are again, my son, why do you persist in bringing God into the matter when you have confessed that man alone makes wars, and, therefore, man alone is responsible for them."

"Yes, dad, but it brings me to another point, and that is, man alone brings about peace when it comes, and man alone gives succour to the wounded, and help to those in distress—men and women, they are the true saviours of mankind in the end. Religion does not do it, believe me—but humanity does."

"Well, well, my lad, I don't feel disposed to argue the matter with you any further at present. And let me beg of you, my dear boy, not to mention your change of opinion on religion—your unbelief—to your mother. It would break her heart."

"Very well, dad, I will not do anything to wound her feelings—dear old soul; but I daresay she will learn in time. But for the present (putting his four finger to his lips: 'Mum's the word'). Going now, dad? Well, come and see me again soon. Good-bye."

Prayers For Our Men!

May I plead once again, through your valuable medium, for the midday prayer on behalf of our soldiers? I know how much it is valued and counted upon by them.

—J. Taylor Smith, Bishop-Chaplain General.

WE do not ask for shells to strafe the German folk,
Nor bother Sister Susies to send us shirts or socks;
Your big guns and your maxims, your cylinders of gas;
Your vast accoutrements of war are wasted here, alas!
The tuck boxes that you kindly sent, the fags that you enclosed,
We do no longer need them, as our good chaplain knows;
The only thing we count on—perhaps its all we get.
Are the prayers we're told the good folk are offering for us yet.

A Welcome Reminder.

The Nineteenth Century and After is a sadly different periodical from the days when Huxley triumphed in its pages over the armies of the orthodox, as represented by Gladstone and Dr. Wace. It can no longer claim to be the battle-ground on which great victories of Freethought are won. It has become predominantly orthodox, authoritarian, and "churchy." Opening the August number, I found three salient features to be an article by a Brigadier-General, declaring the German people, from the highest to the lowest, to be eternally hateful, and never, never, never to be forgiven, be they ever so much "democratized," and whatever statesmen may say; a hysterical wail from another gentleman because the "cursing" psalms are being dropped from the Anglican Liturgy; and a criticism by Mr. W. S. Lilly, in dialogue form, of Professor Bury's History of the Freedom of Thought.

It is this last article which I propose to commend to the notice of Freethinkers. Mr. Lilly, as is well known, is a capable and zealous Catholic, and unlike some of his modern co-religionists in England, there is no nonsense about him. He does not pretend to be democratic, still less revolutionary; he stands for Toryism as well as Popery, every time and all the time. This is all to the good. I appreciate a whole-hogger. I would much rather read (it is much better fun) something by Mr. Lilly that my teeth can meet in, than some sloppy, viscous concoction of a Campbell or a Horton.

The article, entitled "Christianity and History," takes the form of a dialogue between three Cambridge men about Professor Bury's book; but, unlike other dialogues, it does not seem to aim at setting forth more than one side to the question. The three interlocutors all agree in disparaging Professor Bury as inexact, no philosopher, chimerical in his views, virulent as a controversialist, devoid of the historic sense, and guilty of unfair conduct in "turning his Professorial Chair into an antichristian pulpit." Considering how many professors turn their chairs into Christian pulpits, the unfairness is hard to see. Professor Bury, no doubt, can take care of himself. He has braved the pinpricks of Mr. Hilaire Belloc, and it is unlikely that he will quail before those of Mr. W. S. Lilly.

The attack is entertaining, however, for its frank defence of Catholicism in history, persecutions and all. Mr. Lilly does not believe in freedom of thought. He characterizes Professor Bury's claim for "liberty to publish one's opinions on any subject without regard to authority or the prejudices of one's neighbours," as "monstrous" and "subversive of civil society," fit for "murderous Thugs or bomb-throwing Anarchists," on the ground that no one possesses absolute and unbounded liberty in any sphere of activity, but only subject to certain limits. No Freethinker, certainly not, I imagine, Professor Bury, would deny that there are such limits, as exemplified, for instance, by the law of libel. The root question is, however, what the limits are. All of us would concede that the freedom of each is limited by the rights of others. The law of libel and slander, the law against indecent publications, and the censorship in time of war, are instances of the limitations of free speech which are unavoidable. But Professor Bury did not write his book to attack these, and Mr. Lilly, I imagine, did not write his article to defend them alone. The point at issue is whether freedom of speech and publication ought to be limited otherwise than to protect the rights of others or the safety of the State (which arises from the rights of others). Mr. Lilly thinks that the established religion is entitled to the same protection: that is where he differs from us. He goes so far as to justify the punishment of heresy as a crime, and to claim credit for the Inquisition for having averted the triumph of the "licentious" principles of the Albigenses!

It cannot be said that Mr. Lilly makes his position as clear as we could wish. He evidently finds some little difficulty in reconciling his approval of the persecution of heretics by Catholics with his disapproval of the persecution of Christians by Pagans, or of Catholics by Protestants. He says rightly that the early Christians "did not rest their refusal to infringe the precepts of their own religion on Professor Bury's doctrine of freedom of thought. They no more dreamt of it than did their persecutors." But he wrongly goes on to say that "they founded themselves on a principle.....which they were to make triumph—the principle of the supremacy of conscience." The Christians did nothing of the sort. They were all for the supremacy of their conscience, no doubt, but they were equally for the suppression of the conscience of anybody who disagreed with them. Their principle, and that of their spiritual descendants to this day, is the principle of the special constable in the old Punch cartoon of Chartist days: "If I kill you, mind you, it's nothing; but if you kill me, by George it's murder." Besides, how does Mr. Lilly profess to distinguish between "the principle of the supremacy of conscience" and "freedom of thought"? The first involves the second. The belief in the necessity of a common religion, which Mr. Lilly properly attributes to the Middle Ages, clearly precludes "the supremacy of conscience" in the case of those who reject that religion.

Mr. Lilly proceeds to object to the mediæval period being judged by the standard of the twentieth century, and to pronounce Professor Bury "devoid of the historic sense." Of all the "blessed words" and cant phrases with which the modern world is cursed, this expression, "the historic sense," is about the most misused. What exactly do its users mean? We know what historical knowledge is; and Professor Bury has probably quite as much of that as Mr. Lilly. There is also an historical perspective, which may be called vaguely an "historic sense," by which we appreciate the greater or less influence that events have had on succeeding times, and therefore their greater or less importance in history; it is this which distinguishes scientific historians like John Richard Green from chroniclers like Froissart. But what is this "historic sense," the lack of which is invariably imputed to anyone who ventures to call past folly and cruelty by their proper names, or to attack any institution over fifty years old? Historic snobbery! As to judging one period by the standard of another, the ideal part for an historian is, perhaps, not to judge at all, but to content himself with a dispassionate recital of events and estimate of tendencies. But as this is difficult, seeing that the historian is but flesh and blood, and has his feelings like the rest of us, the next best thing is, surely, to judge men and periods by their contribution to the sum of human happiness or misery. That being so, if we find in history that men were burnt alive for innocent differences of opinion, it is mere cant to plead that such enormities should be condoned and made light of in the name of "the historic sense."

The real point is one which Mr. Lilly's article, whether advisedly or not, somewhat obscures. The answer to the question, whether the freedom of anyone ought to be limited otherwise than so far as is necessary to protect others in the exercise of their corresponding liberties, depends on the more fundamental issue of Secularism versus "other-worldliness." If you believe in a future state, and in a God who will, in that future state, punish not only wrong-doing, but wrong-thinking, with everlasting torment, you will logically proclaim it not only the right, but the duty, of the State, to penalize the propagation of what you judge to be damnable error. The Catholic Church is a persecuting Church, because it teaches belief in a persecuting God. Those forms of Protestantism, such as Calvinism and Evangelicalism, which have retained this conception of a persecuting God, are logically committed to persecute like Catholics, and have shown the same spirit when they had the power (as Calvin when he burnt Servetus, as the Scottish Presbyterians when they burnt "witches," and as Wesley when he openly defended such practices). If, on the other hand, you lose the lively faith in a persecuting God, you necessarily, if you have normally decent feelings, come to look on persecution as wanton cruelty. As Mr. Lilly very frankly admits, "modern toleration is the outcome of modern scepticism." The hazy Protestants of to-day, who so oddly describe persecution as "un-Christian," and make haste to drop the "cursing" Psalms out of their services, thereby betray the fact that they no longer really and earnestly believe in historic Christianity, and that religion is for them little more than a sentimental survival, a social convenience, or a concession to others' ignorance and prejudice. The chief difference between them and us is that they are willing to say things they do not really mean, while we are not.

At this time we are grateful to men like Mr. Lilly, who step in to remind the world what Christianity really is. The world is forgetting it; and if that is allowed to happen, the infamous superstition may cheat the gallows after all.

Scotch Intolerance.

Two true incidents occurring a quarter of a century ago in Scotland—one of a woman and the other of a man:—

The first: A friend was engaged for a time at work near a small town, and lodged with a widow during the period of his stay. Being a Freethinker he occupied his Sundays in walks through the adjacent country. This greatly incensed his landlady who took occasion to remonstrate and warn him of the wickedness of not "ganging to kirk." Whereupon he pointed out that he was following Jesus. "Don't you remember that your Saviour walked with his disciples through the corn-fields on the Sabbath day?" said he. "Ay," she replied, "an' I never thocht any the better of him for thart."

The other: During a holiday with some acquaintances I was held up by a storm and took shelter in a small public-house near the sea coast. In the tap-room were several fishermen and a better-dressed individual who were all waiting for a change in the weather, and incidentally enjoying a noggin of whisky. Having passed the time of day, the conversation turned upon the heat. This reminded me of a tale I had heard running something like this:

A clergyman, with a small party, paid a visit to an iron-foundry, and were invited to see a batch of castings run off. When the furnace was opened and the stream of molten metal poured forth, a workman thought to have a joke at the parson's expense. "'Scuse me, sir," said he, "but do you know 'ow 'ot 'ell is?" "No, my man," replied the parson, "do you?" "Well," answered the man, "all I know is that if you were in 'ell, you'd think that metal was ice cream."

When I had finished the tale the laughter I expected did not come. Instead of that, there was an ominous silence, and all the company looked down their noses. At last the individual I have referred to leaned toward me with hate and anger in his face and exploded: "Luk he-ere! I don' kno' wha ye a-are, or whar ye cum fra, but we don' want a-any o' yr agnosteek upe-enyons he-ere!"

I was told afterwards that he was a local week-end preacher.

Views and Opinions.

About God.

A gentleman belonging to what W. S. Gilbert called "the dignified clergy" has been getting into trouble for saying that God had sent the heavy rains as a mark of his displeasure at Sunday labour on allotments. Subsequently he explained that all he meant was that people did not pay enough attention to God—did not give him enough of their time, or confidence, or trust. This, we may suppose, is really a serious offence—from the point of view of a clergyman. For in practice trust in God means trust in the clergy. It means giving them a portion of your time—and cash. It means subscribing to Church funds, and, if your belief is not lively enough to make you a pillar of the Church, imitating a famous Lord Chancellor and becoming a buttress. From A to Z of the religious order, from medicine-man to modern priest, "trust in God" means that. The parson speaks to you in the name of God. He collects your offerings in the name of God—even though he spends them in his own. The clergy are God's representatives on earth. And when we look at them we can only hope, for God's sake, that the representation is not a faithful likeness.

A Question.

But let us get back to God, and the allotments, and the weather. It is settled, apparently, that God was not responsible for the rain and the damage done. He did not cause the rain, neither did he prevent it. It happened without his connivance, perhaps without his knowledge. Very good. That relieves him of responsibility; but it also rules him out of the department of meteorology. We know he has nothing to do with physics, or astronomy, or geology, or chemistry, and various other sciences; but hitherto he has been left with a little influence on the weather. True, after creating and controlling whole planetary systems, this is not a very dignified post. It is like offering the job of local tax-collector to a man who has been Chancellor of the Exchequer. Still, even managing the weather is something. But if this is not to be left him, then one feels impelled to ask, "What the Devil does he do?" or "What the deuce does he exist for?" A God who does nothing might just as well not exist. There is no benefit to anyone in mere existence. Things, or persons, are to be reckoned with on account of their activities, good or bad. And if God exists, will someone be good enough to explain what it is that he does now?" So far as one can see, he does nothing—and he has a large army of clergy to help him get through the business.

The Unimportance of Deity.

Pseudo-philosophic defenders of Deity solemnly assure us that we must believe in God, because unless we assume his existence an understanding of Nature is impossible. By this they mean no more than that we cannot in the present state of our knowledge explain everything to our satisfaction, and that our widest scientific generalizations leave us with an unexplained residuum. We all admit this; but ignorance is no ground on which to base a positive statement. If we cannot explain a thing, we have a good reason for further search, a justification of silence, but no argument whatever in favour of belief. Besides, the difficulty is an imaginary one. In practical life, people see that scientific generalizations work in a quite dependable manner. They see that the belief in God is of no practical value whatever. Belief in God without a knowledge of science is of no use to anyone. Given a knowledge of science, the belief in God adds nothing of value. There is not a position of importance in the world to which a knowledge of theology is counted as essential. Natural forces affect all alike, and, observing this, the Freethinker concludes that our practical interest stops this side of Deity. God may have an interest in finding out man. For the life of us, we cannot see that man has any interest in finding out about a God who does nothing.

The Logic of Life.

And is there not something that calls for explanation in the fact of man ignoring God? Man has been in the world for a very long time, and he did not commence his thinking career by ignoring the gods. Quite the contrary, he spent a large part of his time in attending to their supposed desires. It was only as he grew older, mentally and socially, that he turned his back on them. And is not that suggestive? Facts are not things that men discover and then put on one side. Beliefs that are vital to welfare are not lightly cast away. A fact is a stubborn and undeniable thing; a useful fact a prized possession. How comes it, then, that we have learned to neglect God? And not only neglect him, but are quite unconscious that we lose anything by our neglect. Does not that argue that we are neglecting nothing of importance? It is quite useless the believer telling the unbeliever how much he has lost. We know all about his position; we have been there. He does not know our position; he has yet to arrive. A believer lecturing an Atheist on how much he has lost is like a confirmed drunkard instructing a teetotaler on what he has missed by not getting drunk. Health with whisky-drinking cannot prove whisky essential to prevent disease. Health without whisky does prove that it is quite unnecessary. The testimony of one man without religion must always be better evidence than that of a thousand with it. The pressure of fact is behind the Atheist. The logic of life is on his side. The world grows to ignore God, because the slowly maturing wisdom of the world proves that the belief in God is of no value. It is the logic of life versus the logic of mere theory. And the logic of life wins.

Digitized by Google

Practice versus Theory.

Of course, the world is growing to ignore God. How could it be otherwise? Experience may not be always expressed in words, or formulated in theory, but it is there. We may profess to believe that God cures disease, but we place more reliance on the doctor. We may pray for a safe voyage over the seas, but we rely upon a stout ship and a good navigator. We religiously profess to believe that God is on the side of right in the present War, but we rely upon men and armaments. We go on professing God in theory and ignoring him in practice until the incompatibility of the alliance becomes pronounced and a separation results. And this is only what one might expect. Practice is always before theory; it summarizes life rather than dissects it. And this separation of theory from practice, this trusting God in words and ignoring him in acts really means that the forces of life are too insistent for religious doctrines. Our beliefs are like forms of life, ultimately amenable to the law of the survival of the fittest. If they are useful they flourish and increase. If they are harmful they languish and decay. If they are merely harmless they may persist for an indefinite time. Practice tells, and man's lost confidence in God is an evidence that the confidence is unwarranted. It is to the misfortune of the clergy that men can neither be fooled nor go on fooling themselves for ever.

Creatures of Belief.

Emerson said that theological doctrines were the "soul's" mumps and measles and whooping-cough. He added that a simple mind, one that had not been distorted by training, would know nothing of these enemies. Unfortunately, few of us are permitted to grow up the possessors of a "simple mind." Our training from infancy to maturity, and social forces from maturity to the grave, lead us to place things last that should be first, and emphasize as of the greatest consequence things that are of no importance whatever. Apart from these inculcated notions, we are convinced that none would to-day bother at all about the question of "God." Atheists get on well enough without God, and it is hard to see where the Theist benefits with him. And yet the Atheist could not ignore God with impunity if he really mattered. If you ignore bad drains, or breathe bad air, you pay the price sooner or later. But no one suffers from not believing in God; no one but God. And that is what the lament of the clergy comes to. God suffers because gods, like kings, only exist so long as men believe in them. The gods are born of human credence; disbelief in them signs their death warrant.

The Newer Dogmatism.

THE City Temple, London, opened forty-three years ago, has had a remarkable history. For the first twenty-eight years its pulpit was occupied by Dr. Joseph Parker, one of the most famous pulpit orators of the nineteenth century. Though essentially orthodox, he was often suspected of heterodoxy; while his enemies, who were many, charged him with insincerity arising from his ruling passion, love of popularity. This charge, however, was generally made by men much less popular than himself, a fact which almost proved that it sprang from jealousy. The truth seems to be that Dr. Parker was naturally eccentric, impulsive, pugnacious, fundamentally honest, open-hearted, and endowed with a highly original and imaginative mind. He was followed by Mr. R. J. Campbell, who, finding the City Temple famous, made it notorious. For a time he was intensely evangelical, appealing directly and with considerable force to the emotions. Then a strong wave of Rationalism set in; orthodoxy was violently attacked, and its exponents addressed as "Liars"; supernaturalism lost its charms, and was to be resorted to as seldom as possible. This was the era of the New Theology which, while it lasted, was characterized by enormous enthusiasm and exasperating dogmatism. During this period, Humanism, pure and simple, or Secularism, was knocking more or less loudly at the door, but never succeeded in getting fairly in, supernaturalism being still in too strong evidence. To be a spectator of the New Theology movement was by no means an edifying experience, for it was chiefly a movement of bitter denunciation and arraignment of the Old Theology, the orthodox God himself coming in for his full share of abuse. We now learn (A Spiritual Pilgriwage, pp. 167-266) that during this time of acrid controversy, Mr. Campbell was under the spell of one or other of the representatives of progressive European thought, such as Professors Eucken and Bergson. Later on other influences, of a reactionary character, laid hold of him; the emphasis of his teaching, as he called it, changed, and gradually he returned to the orthodoxy he had so vehemently sneered at and condemned; and now, at last, having renounced Nonconformity and all its errors, he styles himself "Priest of St. Philip's Cathedral Church, Birmingham."

From a homiletic point of view, from Dr. Parker to Mr. Campbell was a step downwards, but from Mr. Campbell to Dr. Fort Newton, the third minister of the City Temple, may reasonably be described as a step upwards. Dr. Newton, too, is a New Theologian, but of a much quieter, milder type than his predecessor. He cannot rise to the torrential eloquence of Dr. Parker, nor play on the magnetic note peculiar to Mr. Campbell; but he possesses qualities which both his predecessors lacked, chief among which are judgment and weightiness. He has one thing, however, in common with all occupants of "the sacred box," namely, dogmatism. Curiously enough, he is a dogmatic despiser and contemner of dogmatism. The historic creeds are all wrong, but he and those who agree with him are all right. A sermon published in the Christian Commonwealth for August 22 may be selected as furnishing a fine illustration of his general theological attitude. The text is Hebrews xii. 27: "And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that have been made, that those things which are not shaken, may remain." If you consider those words in the light thrown upon them by the context, you will find that what they predict is the passing away of all created things, which are destructible, in order that the indestructible, or unshakable, things may remain.

Digitized by Google

Now, after all so-called created things have been removed, what can there be left? When heaven and earth are no more, is it not sheer folly to talk of anything as still remaining? More strangely still, the text assures us that all created objects are to vanish that certain other uncreated substances may flourish abundantly.

Let us now turn to Dr. Newton's discourse founded upon that astonishing passage. The first thing we observe is that the reverend gentleman tears his text clean away from its context in the Epistle. He may justify himself on the plea that he does that in order to bring it to bear upon a new context found in the world-conditions obtaining at this moment. Well, then, let us take the War with all its unspeakable atrocities, and see how the teaching of this Epistle applies to it. Dr. Newton says:—

> God is in it all, behind it, above it, working out his awful will. If the old order is breaking up, passing away in catastrophe, and leaving only a wreck behind, it is God who is doing it.

Who can really believe in and bow down in adoration before such a Deity? Then the preacher has the audacity to assert that all this frightful, brutal carnage, which never ceases day or night, is no wanton, haphazard destruction, but "a shaking down of old outworn encumbrances, and a making ready for a new and better building." Are we to believe, can we, dare we, believe that those brave, fine young fellows on every battlefield who are being mown down by the million, are to be described as "old outworn encumbrances?" This preacher goes further still and dogmatically declares that "this shaking is not meant simply to remove what is no longer useful, but to reveal the eternal things that cannot be shaken." Can you conceive of a Being of boundless wisdom and love deliberately slaughtering countless myriads of young men in order to "reveal the eternal things that cannot be shaken"? For veritable believers in God no greater blasphemy is possible than to talk as Dr. Newton does here. Is it only in that fiendish manner that it is possible for mankind to "receive a kingdom that cannot be moved?" For our part we would infinitely rather go without the kingdom than obtain it at such terrific and senseless sacrifices.

Now, what are the things that abide upon which we are exhorted to lay hold in these troubled times, and not to give way to panic in the midst of the upheaval? We agree that such things do exist, but positively decline to believe that a God worthy of our faith and worship could only reveal and establish them by such a devastating conflict such as is now making the Western world a veritable hell. It is quite possible that the War may result in some permanent benefit to mankind, though we may regard it as being in itself the greatest of evils; but what we point blank refuse to admit is that a Deity of infinite justice and tenderness is in it, behind it, and above it, and using it as an instrument to accomplish his own beneficent designs. And yet, incredible as it may seem, this is how Dr. Newton proceeds:—

> First of all, whatever befall, God remains our refuge and our redemption, yea, "though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea." As for man, he is of the present only, and a brief to-morrow; but God abides. Not the God of our clumsy creeds, not the God of our hair-splitting subtleties, but the real God of things as they are, whose designs are vaster than we can dream, and whose love is deeper than we can fathom. He it is who is shaking down our little systems as of old he shook down the empires of Egypt, Assyria, Rome, and the rest.

That is how the newer dogmatism glorifies itself and denounces the older. One would imagine that Dr. Newton is prepared to endorse the Bishop of London's foolish saying that this War is a "glorious day of the Lord," or as Dr. Orchard used to call it, "God's operation"; but is he? Listen:—

> Deny it who may or will, the Eternal Christ is still with us here, a living Presence even in these days when Mars seems supreme. At once our Captain and Comrade, he is fighting us while fighting with us—the keen edge of his sword felt in our innermost hearts—the Enemy of all that is evil within us and the Ally of all that is good.

If Dr. Newton's teaching is true, the greatest of all bunglers is God, and the most notoriously inefficient of all Saviours is the Eternal Christ, however emotionally real their presence may be to City Temple worshippers.

Apart from God and Christ, the things that cannot be shaken, as enumerated in this sermon, are typically human, and as old as the hills, such as "the splendour of courage," and the wonderful resources of the soul. We flatly deny that these things were unknown as grand realities in human life before the War broke out. We maintain that courage and endurance have been practised on a larger or smaller scale from prehistoric times down to this; but, in any case, to think of the King of kings and Lord of lords as sending this horrible conflict on purpose to bring them into play, is an inexcusable libel upon God, and an unforgivable insult to man. Good people act in accordance with their principles even in time of war; but Dr. Newton forgets that to thousands of other people the War is simply an opportunity of indulging in the lowest forms of selfishness and greed, such as even they never dared to exhibit in peace times. Did God send the War for their benefit also? The preacher dwells proudly upon one side of the picture, and prudently ignores the other, as the preachers of all ages have been in the habit of doing.

The Shadow of the Sword.

War Poems from the West Country.

Plain Song 1914 1916. By Eden Phillpotts. Heinemann. 1917.

IN the intervals of such leisure as can come to an author who has won great and deserved success in the two arts of novel-writing and drama, Mr. Eden Phillpotts has sought relief by trying his hand at verse. To him, as to other authors, there have come moods which did not seem to lend themselves to the medium of the story or the play; lyrical moods that called aloud for the gracious help of rhyme and rhythm. These have accumulated till there were sufficient to fill a small volume, and he has issued them under the modest title, Plain Song 1914-1916.

The poems are mainly concerned with the present world-war, and Mr. Phillpotts sings of the conflict from the point of view of an Englishman. That is, he believes in war only as a last resort; but having accepted the challenge of the aggressors, he will fight with the passion of a righteous cause. His poems are eloquent and beautiful expressions of the moods of the fighting Englishman, who is a civilian rather than a soldier. To his credit, he has not ignored the sordid and terrible side of warfare, and there are passages that bleach the colour from the romance of war, and others that cause the optimistic faith that is in one to go out in darkness like a blown candle-flame. Let me quote in illustration the piece he calls "War":—

> They know war who freeze and drown and moil
> And breathe the air of corpses and breed lice;
> Foul to the aching eyes with filth they toil—
> Brothers, perchance, who made the sacrifice.

Digitized by Google

Thigh-deep in slough they stand, where, like a den,
Opens the trench of torment; for a space
They fire and load and fire and load; and then
One brother's mangled heart splashes the other's face.

And they know war who, shattered, rent in twain,
Their living fragments still with power to think,
Half men, drag carnal rags to yonder drain
Raging for water, ravening for drink
Though it be blood. Their last expiring lust
Denied them, there a little while they roll,
Unseen, unheard, upon the reeking dust
In final agony of flesh and mind and soul.

To this the pomp and splendour of it come
Behind the burden of their country's yoke,
Behind the bravery, behind the drum,
Behind the Fetich that they all invoke:
Life, sacred life, without one pang of ruth,
In mad contempt of human sanctity,
Squandered for doubtful honour, doubtful truth—
All doubtful, save the scorn at frantic reason's plea.

Mr. Eden Phillpotts' poetry is a scholar's verse. The widest knowledge inspires his happiest phrases, and there is no narrowness in his terrible impeachment of Militarism. Listen to his lines on "Germania":—

We do not smite a nation, but a pest;
Humanity makes reasonable quest
To free a noble slave.
Full deep she groans and faints, and fainting feels Archaic torture of a tyrant's heels
Grinding her to her grave.

Possessed of devils now, mad with her woes,
She wounds the world and turns her friends to foes;
But cast her devils down
And broken, humbled, contrite, healed and sane;
Oh may she shine her glorious self again—
Pearl in Europa's crown.

And they accurst, who bred this in her heart,
Shall from the councils of mankind depart,
While over sea and shore
The silver trumpets of the sunrise cry
That each pursue her solemn destiny
By blood and iron no more.

Enmity has seldom been expressed more chivalrously. Add to these verses his fine lines on "France":—

For all the wit of age and might of youth
Wed at her sweet, deep heart—therein we sound
A well of reason, where doth harbour truth,
And faith and an endurance without bound.
Most sane, most spiritual, because most sane,
Upon her bitter road she steadfast shows
The sacrifice majestic, while again
Freedom's own everlasting altar flows
With France's blood; in that most sacred stain
Once more her own immortal genius shows.

But you have not Eden Phillpotts complete unless you add to the scholar the humanist and the lover of Nature. He loves, as few scholars really love, the sea and the sky; he can picture the death of Rupert Brooke, the young soldier-poet, in a lyric purely Pagan in its atmosphere. But he reaches a higher note in his poem on the young soldiers who fell in the War, which has the dirge-like note of a funeral march:—

Now is death only plucking flowers, he leaves
The garnered grain and sunset-coloured fruit,
Neither to bending bough, nor mellow root,
Nor threshing of the amber harvest sheaves
He comes; but where in joyous youth serene
The sunny blossoms laugh and fear no sickle keen.

Gone; all their promise gone, for nevermore
Shall sun and rain rejoice to do them good,
Or glad earth labour to create their food.
Naked their places, and where, heretofore,
The shining blossoms sprang that now are sped,
Only remain the stocks who built and nourished.

No reader can take up this book of verse without gaining a further knowledge of one of the most thoughtful and keenest analysts of contemporary life, or one of our most distinguished literary craftsmen. For the thoughts set down are not only striking, but they are impressed with notable imagination, and their form is that of beauty. Although Mr. Phillpotts emphasizes again and again the horrors and beastliness of war, he sings of it with passion and intellectual conviction. To him one figure rises from the shambles of the battlefields, and blazes with the beauty and strength of courage, and that is the radiant form of Liberty. For Mr. Phillpotts realizes that if the Moloch of Militarism is allowed to work its will, the earth would be a shambles inhabited by slaves.

Again the world is meeting might with might,
And when the battle's fought and lost and won,
Pray victory decree, as primal right,
That reason also wins a kingdom in the sun.

Then shall she swiftly for our world-wide-shame,
Bend to the Mother from her starry place
And, in humanity's almighty name,
For ever dry the tears upon that sacred face.

It is significant that only your freethinking poets write with real conviction and intensity about the claims of humanity. But then their faith is set upon the rock of reason, their vision undimmed by dogma. But enough has been said about a little book of verse which, no doubt, its author regards chiefly as an interlude between strenuous bouts of drama and fiction. After all, Mr. Phillpotts may truly be credited with a passion for liberty, he is a humanitarian in a genuine sense, and he is always preoccupied with noble and lofty thoughts. We hope he is the harbinger of a great brood of poets, the herald of a New World.

MIMNERMUS.

The Rise and Progress of Mental Power.

V.

ALTHOUGH language is not absolutely essential to inferential reasoning, it enormously increases the scope of psychical processes. Perceptual consciousness of coloured objects is confined, for instance, to the recognition of red as the distinguishing colour of blood, or of blue as the constant attribute of a sunlit sky. But when we possess the words for green, blue, red, etc., it becomes possible to extend our perceptions of these colours to any object displaying them. The terms "redness" or "blueness" serve as a sign of colour appearances, and denote more abstract awarenesses arising out of our percepts and recepts of objects presented to our visual organs as red or blue. From our receptual impressions of this or that entity as red, blue, green, or yellow, will emerge a further abstraction—an idea of colour pure and simple—through a process of combining our percepts and recepts of coloured substances into an amalgamated concept of colour.

The name "man," again, embraces all our innumerable percepts and recepts of individual men. Such being the case, the term covers all the phenomena common to the various human stocks. Comprising, as it does, all the members of the animal kingdom, man among them, the term animal has an even wider significance. In truth, in all departments of objective study, the greater the necessity for generalizing the phenomena, the more comprehensive our word symbols become, and the further are their meanings removed from the relatively simple perceptions upon which they ultimately rest. With our verbal symbols > we climb into higher and higher regions of abstraction: by thinking in verbal signs we think, as it were, with the semblance of ideas: we dispense altogether with the necessity of actual images, whether of percepts or recepts:

Digitized by Google

we quit the sphere of sense, and rise to that of thought.

Darwin once half-humorously referred to mathematicians as beings gifted with a sixth sense. Yet the stupendous abstractions to which a Kingdon Clifford, Cayley, Sylvester, or Gauss, were able to rise, are all demonstrably based on animal capacity to count, and Sally, the ape, was ultimately taught to count up to nine. Upon our percepts of spatial relations, and an understanding of the simple arithmetical laws of addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division, are reared all the ideal achievements of the mathematician and astronomer. Savage man began by counting his digits, and his later symbols were the outcome of evolution. As Lewes said :—

> Man begins by counting things, grouping them visibly (i.e., receptually). He then learns to count simply the numbers, using his fingers and toes for symbols. He then substitutes abstract signs, and arithmetic begins. From this he passes to algebra, the signs of which are not merely abstract but general; and now he counts numerical relations, not numbers. From this he passes to the higher calculus of relations.

It is much the same in commercial transactions. By a system of direct exchange commodities passed from one to another. Then certain tokens were employed as money, leading up to the use of the precious metals. Now all important business dealings are settled in terms of the more abstract notes, bills, and cheques, which have supplanted the more concrete commodities or coin as symbols of exchange value. Several thousands of millions sterling are now annually settled between debtor and creditor by the bank clearing houses in London without the interchange of a single coin. The condensation of complicated industrial and commercial phenomena into a few words and figures in a ledger would be impossible apart from the symbols which bankers and traders employ.

Gradually developed out of percepts, the recepts of animals enable them to distinguish between the various aspects of their environment. Birds, sheep, and other organisms seek shelter in a storm. Their ancestral and individual percepts have elaborated instinctive recepts which mould their conduct. Aquatic-fowl alight upon land and ice in a way quite different to their descent into water. The recepts of man and other animals cause them to act differently, when moving over solid ground, than when travelling in a liquid medium. But when the recepts of solid and liquid substances reach the realm of cognition, the names "solid" and "fluid" become possible, and general concepts of these two dissimilar states of matter are at our service. The named recepts, solid and fluid, form the foundation of ascending orders of abstraction, and some of the most subtle refinements of modern physical science are based on our simplest concepts of hard and soft bodies. Language does not usher reasoning into a world in which it was previously unknown. What it really does is to combine rudimentary notions into ideas of increasing complexity. The power of the word is immense, but > it does not come upon the scene of its creative power to find only that which is without form and void; rather does it find a fair structure of no mean order of system, shaped by prior influences, and, so far as thus shaped, a veritable cosmos.

Wherever the etymology of any abstract word can be traced it is found to rest finally upon a simple recept. In the course of involved linguistic evolution, the original words have frequently been lost. But the historical development of many terms is known. The highly abstract word "virtue" can be traced back to the Sanscrit, vira, "a man." The complex term government, again, is derived from the Latin, guberno, to steer a ship, yet when we survey the mass of men, virtue is seldom suggested, while, unless we remember the Navy, the word Government is rarely associated in normal times with the great shipping industry in any of its innumerable departments.

The term language, as ordinarily understood, is restricted to written and spoken words. But any system of signs which serves to convey ideas is really a language. "Thus," states Professor Broca, "speech, gesture, dactyology, writing both hieroglyphic and phonetic are all so many kinds of language."

The germs of the sign-making faculty are present in ants, bees, and wasps. The Ecitons, which form powerfully organized ant communities, in which division of labour is maintained on a military scale, when on their plundering expeditions, show by their complex actions their faculty of inter-communication. Belt and Bates, both reliable observers, testify to this. Ingenious experiments, prosecuted by the late Lord Avebury, proved incontestably that ants are able to communicate, and that they possess a receptual capacity to realize number. Other competent observers have proved that the sign-making powers in ants and bees mainly consist in gestures produced by the insects' antennæ, although other bodily movements are also employed.

Among mammals and birds capacity for communication is common. There exists a wide difference between the hen's cluck of contentment and her alarm note, and Houzeau concluded that the fowl utters at least a dozen significant sounds. Blackbirds, thrushes, and other feathered bipeds, reveal to the interested inquirer various mental and emotional states in their calls and cries. All our domesticated animals present in their actions, attitudes, and vocal displays their ability to convey their feelings to others. The famous naturalist, Forbes, furnishes a striking instance of a male monkey's use of gesture language when begging for the body of a female just shot dead. "The animal," he states, > came to the door of the tent, and finding threats of no avail, began a lamentable moaning, and by the most expressive gestures seemed to beg for the dead body. It was given him; he took it sorrowfully in his arms and bore it away to his expecting companions. They who were witnesses of this extraordinary scene resolved never again to fire on one of the monkey race.

Other and even more remarkable cases are recorded by trustworthy witnesses concerning monkeys, while Lord Avebury taught an intelligent dog the correct use of written signs. This animal would carry a card with such words as "water," "bone," "pet me," etc., written upon it, when he wished to inform his master of his wants. Thus was established an association of ideas in the dog's mind between "the appearance of a certain number and form of written signs, and the meaning which they severally betokened."

Noises of numerous kinds are employed by animals to express their feelings, and these sounds are frequently accompanied by gestures. Even the human infant shows marked progress in tone and gesture prior to its acquisition of the faculty of speech. Among imbecile children, whose powers of articulation are permanently limited, experience proves that a fair amount of information may be acquired through the use of signs. These signs they utilize as a means of expression. Savages also employ gestures, grimaces, and intonation in conversation to a much greater degree than civilized races. So poorly developed are primitive powers of speech that tone and gesture seem necessary to supplement them. Tylor, the great anthropologist, in his Early History of Mankind, declares that "the array of evidence in favour of the existence of tribes whose language is incomplete, even for things of ordinary import, is very remarkable." And this, he claims, lends strong support to the view that gesture language formed the original utterance of man, from which the later speech faculty has been imperfectly evolved among savage peoples. Burton, the linguist and traveller, states that savages, such as the Arapahos, so imperfectly pronounce the very few words of their language, that they fail to understand each other in the dark.

Children of the most advanced races, long after they are able to speak, continue to watch the gestures and facial expressions of their elders when they are anxious to fully understand their meaning. And Colonel Mallery, in his valuable Sign Language among the North American Indians, shows that the use of signs enables Indians of different tribes to carry on a long and detailed conversation by gesture alone. In this system of signs a cup was formed by the right hand, which, when carried to the mouth, indicated drinking. Eye-glasses were simulated by forming rings before the eyes with the thumb and index finger, while, when both palms were pressed to the temple, and the head swung from side to side, a drunken head-ache was represented. And so on through an animated conversation which covers sixteen paragraphs.

It is to be observed that primitive gesture language, in common with that of deaf mutes everywhere, is restricted to the conveyance of concrete ideas. More conventional and abstract concepts require a more developed system of articulate expression. All these facts point to the derivation of the most evolved tongues from rudimentary forms of tone and gesture. As Mallery notes:—

> The insane understand and obey gestures when they have no knowledge whatever of words.....Sufferers from aphasia continue to use appropriate gestures. A stammerer, too, works his arms and features as if determined to get his thoughts out, in a manner not only suggestive of the physical struggle, but of the use of gestures as an hereditary expedient.

ADULT SCHOOLS AND FREETHINKERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Under the above heading, a few months ago, a letter appeared in your columns, signed "Fred Hobday." Mr. Hobday strongly advocated that we, as Freethinkers, should make use of the Adult Schools, owing to the freedom in the Adult School Movement for expression of opinion. I was interested in the letter at the time because it was the Adult School Movement that brought a new line of thought into my life. I had been brought up in the narrow school of Nonconformity and belief in all the old orthodox ideas, when the Adult School started me to unthink all I thought.

The question has appealed to me with considerable force of late. Being in the Army, I miss the local Free Library and my little stock of books at home; so I troubled to take a stroll a few days ago to the nearest newsagent. I said "newsagent." When I arrived at the shop, I looked at the something about five feet ten inches behind the counter, and said, "I want something to read"; to which he invited me round his varied stock of books. I asked for William Morris, Thomas Paine, G. J. Holyoake, Shelley, Spencer, amongst others; and the reply in every case was "No." And when I ventured to ask for Omar Khayyam, he asked if I was trying to pull his leg? I smiled, and assured him I really was in earnest about my business. At last I said: "Have you a book of poems?" He said: "Sorry to disappoint you, but I have not a book of poems in the place, and you are the very first to ask for such a thing."

Now, Sir, down here there are some thousands—nay, thousands of thousands—passed through this camp since the War commenced, and to think that I am the first to inquire at the local bookstall for a book of poems is to my mind remarkable. And to think that the best of the world's writers are never asked for! I sympathize with the crowd; and had it not been for the Adult School Movement, I might have been travelling in that narrow school of sophistry to-day instead of the Freethought Movement. I hope this humble epistle will be of some mild interest to at least one Freethinker, and that they will make use of the Adult School for the expansion of Freethought.

Bovingdon Camp, Dorset. ERNEST POYRDON.

Acid Drops.

After the angels of Mons we have now angels at Grays. Angels have been seen in the sky carrying banners on which were inscribed "Peace," and scores of people have travelled from London to see them. We see that a local clergyman has written that there are no angels at Grays—none of the heavenly kind, and few of the earthly variety. Certainly, he ought to know. But what a revelation of the state of intelligence amongst large numbers of the people! And they possess a vote with all the other privileges of a civilized human being. No wonder Bottomley came to believe in God.

Rev. Joseph Hocking writes in the Sunday Companion that we are not yet fit for peace because we are not spiritualized enough. One fault appears to be that of placing faith in men and guns instead of in God. We do not know whether Mr. Hocking means that we ought not to trust to men and guns and leave it to God alone. That would suit the German Army quite well. Or does he mean that God is keeping the War going until we are "spiritualized"? But as we shall only keep the War going with men and guns, and as we cannot get spiritualized until we cease depending upon them, and as the War will not stop until we are fit for peace—that is, spiritualized—it looks as though we are in a pretty bad kind of a tangle. Unless it is Mr. Hocking that is in a muddle. And, as he is writing for the Sunday Companion, perhaps the latter is the correct solution.

Writing on the third anniversary of the War, Mr. Horatio Bottomley says we have "tasted hellish horrors." Was he thinking of War bread?

Dr. T. R. Glover is a Baptist divine who has published several books on theology, and who occasionally preaches. A few Sundays ago he occupied a London pulpit, and, as reported in the Christian World for August 23, stated that "the Christian religion is not good conduct, nor escape from hell, but Jesus Christ." Dr. Glover was perfectly justified in supplying his hearers with that definition of Christianity. It is historically incontrovertible that Christians have never been noted for good conduct as members of society, while amongst them have been found the most notorious scoundrels that ever lived. Not a few of the Popes, God's highest representatives on earth, have led shockingly bad lives, and we shudder with shame as we read their history.

Emphatically, then, the Christian religion neither is, nor produces, good conduct. A truer statement was never made. But when Dr. Glover declares that it is not "escape from hell," he flatly contradicts the Gospel Jesus, and particularly his apostles John and Paul. John says many times over that faith in Christ delivers from perdition, and Paul regards it as escape from the wrath of God. We agree with Dr. Glover that Jesus and his apostles were vain dreamers, and that Christianity means Jesus Christ—something vague, mystical, which no one can explain, but which produces pleasant sensations in those who believe it, a sort of spiritual intoxication called religious experience. For this species of inebriation genuine believers develop an irresistible craving, a form of disease from which they seldom recover.

Christ is a purely mystical being, of whom there are as many different descriptions as describers. To many he is the Christ that was, to others, the Christ that is, and to others still, the Christ that is to be, of whom Tennyson so sweetly sings. To some he is a Divine, to others, human, and to others, both in one. In reality, nobody knows who or what he is. Everything about supernatural religion is mystical, remote, obscure, inexplicable, and that is why the ignorant and superstitious revel in it. Theologians are all mystics, dreamers, despisers of reason, scorners of common sense; and there is no escape from the conclusion that they are more or less mad, and do many mad things. In Southern India a young man felt a great call to some mystic mission, and he prayed: "Lord, here am I; send me, but for goodness sake don't." That prayer Dr. Glover calls "the honestest prayer I have ever heard." The man was mad; but into the midst of his madness there penetrated one pale gleam of sanity.

The Daily Mirror published the other day a picture of the Bishop of London seated on an old brass cannon. That is quite a safe position, although we suppose the position is meant to convey the idea that the Bishop is doing his bit towards winning the War. And one may trust Winnington Ingram for getting all the advertisement possible.

The Globe has been advocating the utilization of cathedrals as places for storing the reserves of wheat. This would certainly be the best function they have ever discharged, although some correspondents of the paper fear that in the case of air-raids there would be more chance of these storehouses being destroyed. That, decidedly, says little for the belief of people in the efficacy of prayer.

A Scotch clergyman, the Rev. James Wishart, just home from France, has some wonderful stories to tell about the men. For instance, when the weather interfered with the operations of the British forces, some of the men would ask him "if God was not, after all, a German God?" We should imagine the soldiers were pulling Mr. Wishart's leg. It is hard to imagine soldiers as stupid as Mr. Wishart paints them. But some of our warlike parsons seem to think they are at liberty to picture the men as quite foolish, provided they talk of their being good fighters.

We would like to know how the Salvation Army manages its communications with Germany. According to the War Cry of May 12, 1917:—

> Our leader, Lieut.-Colonel Treite, has been able to complete his journey through Saxony, which embraced meetings in four different towns and the inspection of a corresponding number of social institutions.
> In Leipzig, the first of the towns to be visited, the meeting was held on the Saturday night, and finished up with six souls at the penitent form. On Sunday the Colonel led the Holiness Meeting at Plauen, the afternoon meeting at Zurckan, and the night meeting at Chemitz. In the last-named town, where God has blessed our work in quite a special manner, twelve soldiers and recruits were publicly received.

The italics are ours, and are intended for those stalwart Christians in Britain who are always saying that Germany is wholly given over to Atheism. But the whole paragraph has a bad odour in the nostrils of any decent Britisher. Who is this Treite, "our leader," if you please? The Salvation Army is first of all a business organization. The word "International" is printed on the front page of the War Cry, and we suggest that the Salvation Army is a trading organization—trading in Germany—and trading with enemy aliens. How the devil the "news" above quoted can be got through here with such apparently smooth facility, we confess, amazes us! We do not like the flavour of it, and we think the matter might well be considered—and pondered—by the British authorities.

Under the heading "Atheists in the Camps," this War Cry says: "Twelve men knelt at the penitent form, among them being two drink slaves and a professed atheist." And this is what the "atheist" was reported to have said after his conversion: "Well, in all my twenty years of atheism, I never came across anything with half the happiness in it that you show to be in salvation. You people always seem to be happy." It is also stated that he asked the officer to write to his wife, who was converted, and had been praying for his conversion for many years. Of course, we have heard again and again of these "professed atheists" who suddenly find salvation in the manner described in this story. But when the cases are probed, the Atheism of the Atheists disappears like thin smoke. And names and addresses are never given.

A writer in the Daily Express points out that navy chaplains are known as "Sky-pilots," "Devil-dodgers," "Mouldy Men," and other "ungodly names." Surely, men who invite such derision are like "Chaplins" of the Forces.

The calm assumption by nearly all the War Offices that God is on their side, is rivalled by the dutiful newspaper editors. Perhaps one of the most amusing is that of the Sunday Herald, which states in leaded type, "Germany began the war of hell against heaven." This means that Messrs. Lloyd George, Winston Churchill & Co. are archangels, which, as old Euclid would say, is absurd.

The Age (Melbourne) in its issue for May 23, reports a rather interesting discussion before the Methodist Conference on education in Fiji. The Government had offered a monetary grant on the usual condition that there should be a conscience clause for native and Indian scholars. This was opposed by a Rev. Dr. Gault, who said that the Methodists ought not to co-operate with the Government of Fiji in any educational scheme in which religion was not compulsory. He was supported by the Rev. J. W. Burton, who said that the "religious atmosphere" in a school with a conscience clause was all "moonshine." For nine years he had not made a single convert attending his Indian day-school, and his predecessor had for five years a similar experience. Eventually the Goverutment offer was accepted, but it is quite true that where religious instruction is not compulsory few people want it.

All the same, we confess that our sympathy lies with Dr. Gault and Mr. Burton, and not with his opportunist brother clergymen. If religious instruction is really essential to individual and national welfare—and all the clergy profess to believe this is so—then every reason that holds good for compulsory education in secular subjects holds good for compulsion in religious subjects also. And, in that case, these parsons are simply selling a principle purely for a cash consideration. If, on the other hand, it is admitted that religious instruction is no more than the gratification of a desire having no more than a personal application, the case for religious instruction is gone. You can have religion if you please, you can do without it if you please It is of no consequence to anyone but yourself. A religious instruction from which children are permitted to withdraw kills the case for it, and provides a complete justification for the State limiting its educational curriculum to secular subjects alone.

A young Zulu chief, who served as a private in a labour battalion, and who died of wounds, left three wives and eighteen children. His ideas of the sacredness of marriage are paralleled in the earlier pages of the Bible.

The Bishop of Liverpool is undergoing a surgical operation at his house, says a newspaper paragraph. In an age of faith, prayer alone would have been sufficient to cure "all the ills that flesh is heir to."

According to the Daily Chronicle, "the first woman cathedral organist has been appointed at Rochester Cathedral." The Christian Church of England is in no violent hurry to recognize women as human beings.

The grille in the ladies' gallery of the House of Commons, a barbaric relic of sex distinction, has been removed after an agitation extending over half-a-century. The grille should be relegated as a curiosity to St. Paul's Cathedral, for the Christian Church has ever been a most determined opponent of sex-equality.

"Ours is the heroic age," says the Mayor of Maidstone. Yet tens of thousands of parsons are "too proud to fight," although they do not object to "christening" battleships and consecrating regimental colours.

Some time since a London newspaper editor wrote "King George reigns over an educated people." What this education consists of may be estimated by reading the reports of the Public Libraries. At Westminster Free Library, for instance, of the 348,960 volumes issued, 116,550 were novels, and 1,611 were classed as "philosophical."

The Daily Chronicle comments on the youthfulness of church organists, and mentions several instances of boys from twelve to fifteen years of age who are filling the position. It seems appropriate to employ boys as organists in the second childhood of religion.

In view of the Papal claim to infallibility, it is interesting to note that most critics agree as to the "Austrian inspiration" of the Peace note. The note itself, however, is couched in the usual pious form calculated to deceive the ignorant and credulous.

From a handbill sent us by a correspondent, we see that the "Yorkshire Wonder" is, at present, visiting the Congregational chapel and Salvation Army barracks at Goldthorpe. The "Yorkshire Wonder" is an ex-burglar who—so runs the handbill—was an associate of Charles Peace, spent twenty-eight years in prison, and three-and-a-half years in chains and dark cells. The "Wonder" will appear in convict uniform and chains, and we can faintly picture the admiring glance of many of the younger ones who will attend his meetings. If they will not long to emulate him—prison, chains, and cell—we shall be greatly surprised. For the "Wonder's" claims is not what he is but what he was. And, really, we prefer him as he was. Then he was at least an honest burglar. The chances are that he is now a sanctimonious scarecrow—more pious, but, probably, less straightforward. And the people who advertise him talk about the demoralizing tendency of picture shows!

The Daily Chronicle points out that Westminster Abbey possesses ancient rights, being a "Royal Peculiar," and enjoys complete independence of episcopal control. This partially explains why eminent deceased "intellectuals" are refused burial in this English pantheon, and room is always found for the friends of the Church.

Old newspapers make very interesting reading, and sometimes there is a topical touch about these remote paragraphs. A copy of the Sunday Times, issued ninety years ago, contains a caustic allusion concerning a lady and an officer, and concludes: "Oh, these red coats! We are half convinced that the Old Serpent seduced Eve in a suit of regimentals."

General Smuts is a smart general, but his theology is not above criticism. He says that "the world is out of joint, and only a kindly Providence can set it right again." It looks as if Providence is killing us with "kindness," for thirty million Christians are doing their best to murder each other.

That genial humourist, Mr. Jerome K. Jerome, admits that he is "fed-up with copy-book sentiment of irreproachable character, concerning the eternal principles of right and justice," and adds: "I want to know what it all means, translated into terms of practical politics." "Aye, there's the rub!"

In these days when obscure individuals are prosecuted for profanity, it is interesting to find that a Biblical parody is published amid a chorus of acclamation from the press. The work is entitled, The Book of Artemas, and contains some pointed political skits, couched in a smart imitation of ecclesiastical English.

Leopards do not readily shed their spots, and it is not surprising that the Canadian clergy have secured exemption from military service. The Senate, however, is not so complacent as the British Houses of Parliament, and divinity students were excluded.

A new publication bears the arresting title, Madame Adam. It does not refer to Mother Eve, but to a famous French woman.

A Conference is to be held on the Reform of the House of Lords, under the chairmanship of Viscount Bryce. We hope that due attention will be paid to the position of the Bishops of the Established Church in the Second Chamber. If they cannot be eliminated, their number should be greatly reduced.

The Daily News complains that "a human, not to say slangy, touch" seems to be creeping into Mr. Lloyd George's speeches. The criticism is well founded. Not only is the Prime Minister's vocabulary vulgar, but his ideas are commonplace. In a recent speech he referred, with unction, to the "Great Artist" who had made Serbia and Wales. It was as touching as the memorable invocation of "Great Architect of the Universe" made by the lamented Dr. Crippen.

Profanity is becoming popular. The Inns of Court Officers' Training Corps, better known as the "Devil's Own," has published a periodical with the alluring title, the Gehenna Gazette. It is said that a soldier, seeing a copy on the bookstall, said, "Where the h—ll is Gehenna?"

The Paper Shortage.

THERE are many aspects of the paper shortage, but we are specially concerned with the fact of the large number of cases in which people are going short of this paper. Worse still, they do not even know of what it is they are short. There are many thousands of people to whom a knowledge of this journal is the only thing needed to make them regular subscribers. How to bring these potential readers and the Freethinker into actual contact is the problem always before us.

The majority of our readers have always been gained through the method of personal introduction. That is a method of doing service to the Freethinker and to the Freethought Cause which comes well within the range of everybody's power. Once the introduction is effected we will attend to the rest. You find, we keep. That is an assured programme. During the three years of war, we are glad to say that the enthusiasm of our readers has enabled us to enrol a large number of strangers as regular subscribers. But the more we get, the more we want. There is only one Freethinker. Its place can be supplied by no other paper. Whether a man reads the Daily Tweedledum or the Daily Tweedledee is a matter of indifference. But there is a vital difference between taking and not taking the Freethinker regularly.

That is why we are asking readers to do all they can to see that their friends know all about the Freethinker and its purpose. If they had not helped so effectively during the past three years we should not be asking for more help now. But we believe they have as much pleasure in increasing the demand for this paper as we have in supplying it. Editor, contributors, readers, are all fellow-workers in a common cause. And every new reader represents a potential soldier in the great and even conquering army of Freethought.

To Correspondents.

P. V. MORRIS (France).—Pleased to receive your letter and to know that your experience bears out that of our other correspondents as to the amount of freethinking among the men at the Front. It is good to know that the War has determined you to take a more active and more militant part in the fight against superstition. That is a greater war than even the present one, and the need for good fighters in that war will continue when the present one is ended.

W. THOMAS.—An article on "Omar Khayyam," by "Mimnermus," appeared in the Freethinker for December 12, 1915, and one on Edward Fitzgerald, the translator of Omar, in our issue of August 12 last. An article on the same topic also appeared on January 9, 1916.

R. CRAUS.—The real test of liberality of thought is claiming liberty of expression for opinions with which we disagree. There is no sure liberality in claiming freedom for one's self. Our opinion may be wrong, but suppression does not prove it so. It proves only that our enemies are afraid to let it have a hearing.

C. R.—We do not consider it our business to expose every blackguard Christians feel inclined to encourage on their platform. Circumstances sometimes render exposure necessary, and in that case we should not hesitate.

A. E. MANDER.—Your congratulations are somewhat cryptic, but if you are proud of Mr. Mann's articles, we should be the last to dissent.

H. T. HUMPIDGE.—Paper is being sent. The War has delayed publication of that book, and of others. Thanks for good wishes, which we warmly reciprocate.

G. E. QUIRK.—Thanks for list of addresses. We are sending specimen copies, which is an excellent method of introducing the Freethinker. Pleased to know you think the paper gets better each week.

H. HIND.—Glad to hear from still another Freethinker reader at the Front. We should say it would not be a matter of very great difficulty to start a Branch of the N. S. S. there. We hope to see you and all other Freethinkers safely back whenever the War comes to an end.

H. ROBSON.—We do not think that the alteration of title would be any real gain. It is the purpose of a journal that arouses hostility or receives support, and we must be prepared for the one and welcome the other. Thanks for excerpts, which will prove useful.

T. C.—We have not yet had an opportunity of reading Dr. Figgins' book on Nietzsche, but judging from the reviews, it appears to be a more honest and able work than many that have appeared. Of course, the ordinary newspaper writer on Nietzsche neither reads nor understands him.

J. BREESE.—We are sending a small parcel of Freethinkers for distribution to the address given, also the paper for six months.

H. A.—See "Acid Drops."

T. RAWLINSON.—There have been many essays on Bruno in English. The two most complete works are Giordano Bruno, by McIntyre, published in 1903; and a Life, by Frith, in 1887. A complete edition of Bruno's works was published, in Italian, in 1891 (3 vols.). A translation of one of his works, under the title of The Heroic Enthusiasts, was published about thirty years ago.

S. W. WHITFIELD.—We cannot say whether there are other Freethinkers in your battalion. From all we hear, it will be strange if you do not come across some intellectual chums sooner or later.

A. MILLAR.—Don't forget to call when you are in London. We shall be pleased to have a chat with you. If you drop a card advising us, it will be the better.

M. B. R.—We have no other knowledge on the matter than that contained in the article you enclose. We are inclined to think the visit and the conversation are both imaginary.

J. FLAHERTY.—We have no hesitation in saying that no such person as the Jesus portrayed in the New Testament ever existed. Your other question is more difficult to answer—say, about fifty years later.

J. EFFEL.—Papers received. Will attend to other matter next week. Thanks.

"KERIDON."—We do intend republishing Mr. Mann's articles, but we must wait until he concludes, and even then publishing may be delayed awhile for obvious reasons. Still, we shall not wait longer than is inevitable. We are obliged for your efforts. Will attend to the matter as you suggest.

J. A. REID.—We hope your activity will bear good results, although editors have usually pretty thick hides.

A. H. WORTMAN.—MSS. received. Thanks.

DORRINGTON (Wigan).—No objection whatever to doing what you ask. But what are the "old, old stories" to which you refer?

WARWICKSHIRE MINER.—We should say that a parson who can quote "The Lord is mindful of his own" after a bomb has been dropped on a school deserves a good sized one all to himself.

H. ROBSON.—To "hope" is to have a desire with an expectation that the desire will be gratified. There is, therefore, justification for the language used. The hope will be stronger as the expectation of realization is greater.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums

We were sorry to hear from Mr. E. Egerton Stafford, an occasional contributor to these columns, that he has been the recipient of a German decoration in the shape of a wound from a bursting shell. Fortunately, the wound was a slight one, and Mr. Stafford is getting all right again. We have in hand a lengthy article by Mr. Stafford, which we hope to soon publish.

Mr. H. B. Price writes:—

> I was pleased to see Mr. T. Shore's article, entitled "Shameless Inconsistency!" in your issue of August 19: but the old idea of advertising joint appointments for "married couples without encumbrances" is fast disappearing.
> I remember on one occasion the Chairman of a Board of Guardians asking a married couple if they had any encumbrances, and the husband replied, "No, sir; no encumbrances, but two children."
>
> On another occasion an officer applying for a position was a "Freethinker," and the Chairman asked him his "religion." He said, "I am a retired Christian, sir."
> We want more Freethinkers on public bodies, especially on Boards of Guardians, for vast sums of money are wasted at present in paying chaplains of all sects, which could very well go in extending the material comfort of the inmates.

There are evidently a large number of Freethinkers in Cape Town, and other parts of South Africa, who only need a little pushing to form themselves into an organization. We have had several letters of late from Africa on this topic, and here is one just to hand from Mr. L. Smith, of Glengariff Road, 3 Anchor Bay, Cape Town. Mr. Smith says:—

> To quote your words: "The present is a golden opportunity for the Freethought movement."
> I am unaware of any Secular Society existing in this country, and, as I am sure there must be many Freethinkers who would welcome such a society being formed, would you be kind enough to insert a par. in your paper suggesting a meeting of all interested here in Cape Town.
> Although I am not clever enough to organize this movement, my name and address may be given as above to which names may be sent just to start the ball rolling.
>
> Of course I am willing to help in any way, but it will need men and women of ability to make it a success.
> Perhaps Freethinkers in Johannesburg and other towns would also like to send in their names.

Digitized by Google

> I may mention that your paper is only obtainable at one bookstall (to my knowledge) here in Cape Town, and whether it is due to the large number of readers or the few copies imported, they are very quickly sold out. The Freethinker is never by any chance placed on the stalls to the public view, but kept under the counter.

We insert Mr. Smith's letter in the hope that it will lead to the desired end. If a meeting can be arranged between a few enthusiastic spirits, we feel sure good results will follow.

From another South African reader comes the following, which has some bearing on the foregoing :—

> I am a native of South Africa, and Dutch on my mother s side, and, naturally, have fuller acquaintance with the psychology of the Boer than a home-born colonial, and am convinced that a fuller knowledge of the trend of modern thought on the part of my more ignorant countrymen, would foster that spirit of "sweet reasonableness" so necessary to the peace and development of this country. We need here a courageous Dutchman to tell his illiterate fellows the truth about things, and lift from their shoulders the burdens of superstition and ignorance which has made them the hinds that they are for so many decades; but in place of that our public men mouth pious phrases with hypocritical dissimilation for the sake of pelf and power! In our towns and cities we are more enlightened, but they count as nothing beside the menace of the Calvinistic backvelders! I wish my health and resources permitted of my doing more for the "Cause." I sometimes feel, as one of the obscure and hidden, how feeble and ineffective my little attempts must be, and yet my zeal and desire to do things amounts almost to a nervous passion.

It will be noted that both correspondents are as one as to the need for Freethought work in South Africa. And the tone of both letters shows them to be written by men far above the average in intelligence.

Science, Telepathy, and Communion with the Dead.

> One of Sir William Jenner's favourite maxims was "Never believe what your patient tells you his doctor said."....And if it is unsafe to depend on second-hand testimony for what Dr. Brown said to his patient, what reliance can we place on what Sir Oliver Lodge says Mrs. Piper says the ghost of Rector says the ghost of Dr. Hodgson says? We have Sir Oliver Lodge's word for it that Mrs. Piper does not always speak distinctly; we have Mrs. Piper's word that (the spirit of) Rector does not always speak distinctly; we have Rector's word that (the spirit of) Dr. Hodgson does not always speak distinctly. What their several powers of hearing may be, we do not know. We know that Dr. Phinuit at any rate is not always an honest witness. What guarantee have we for Rector's and Dr. Hodgson's honesty? What guarantee have we of Mrs. Piper's honesty? Would any man of ordinary prudence buy a box of matches, or believe that it is raining, on the strength of such evidence? Sir Oliver Lodge founds a religion upon it, and believes in miracles on the strength of it; and he asks the world to adopt his religion and to believe in his miracles. The English language is a language of extraordinary force and vigour, but it does not contain words strong enough to express my opinion of Sir Oliver Lodge's attempt, or of his powers of estimating the worth of testimony and of interpreting evidence.—Dr. Charles Mercier, "Spiritualism and Sir Oliver Lodge, p. 130.

In the year following her visit to Dr. Cocke, Mrs. Piper first came under the observation of the Society for Psychical Research. She was then under the supposed control of a French physician named Dr. Phinuit. Now, Dr. Cocke's spirit control was claimed to be the spirit of a French physician named Finne or Finnett. Podmore remarks of this control :—

> Phinuit appears to be a creation of the same order as Simandini and Leopold—Balsamo—Cagliostro. He was transferred, as we have seen, from a professional medium to Mrs Piper. We first make his acquaintance in the questionable company of Chlorine and Mrs. Siddons. He claims to have been a doctor, but does not know the names of the Latin or French drugs which he prescribes, and cannot recognize common medicinal herbs when shown to him. He claims to have been a Frenchman, though his knowledge of French is apparently limited to a few common phrases and a slight accent, which frequently proved serviceable in the old days in disguising a bad shot at a proper name. His ignorance of French he has explained as being due to his having passed the later years of his life at Metz, where there were many English residents. He has given his full name, with particulars of his life at Paris, but no trace of any person of his name can be found. On being more closely questioned he betrayed some uncertainty whether he had been born at Metz or Marseilles, and finally came to the conclusion that his name was not Phinuit at all, but Jean Alaen Scliville, and that he had never had any connection with Dr. Cocke.[1]

This popular spirit exercised almost exclusive control of Mrs. Piper for eleven years, until 1896, when he retired in favour of a band of superior spirits under the guidance of Imperator. The plain English of which appears to be, that when the character of Phinuit began to grow thin under the ordeal of persistent questioning, he was, to use a vulgar term, "outed," and his job given to Imperator—a more nebulous character, if possible, whose previous earth-life is altogether unknown, and of which we may be sure Mrs. Piper, taught by experience, will make no disclosures. This Imperator was one of the controls of the late Stainton Moses, who died in 1892, and, being thus left unemployed, was no doubt glad to take service under Mrs. Piper.

"Now," as Podmore points out, "Stainton Moses, as we have already seen, was a physical medium, and as Imperator and his company can hardly be acquitted of connivance with their medium's doings, the admission of their claims to substantiality would still further complicate Mrs. Piper's case by involving it with the whole question of these presumably deceptive phenomena."[2] Professor W. James, himself a believer in these occult phenomena, is of opinion that these controls "are all probably dream creations of Mrs. Piper."[3] Sir Oliver Lodge says: "Whether such a man as Dr. Phinuit ever existed I do not know, nor from the evidential point of view do I greatly care."[4] Well, he is easily satisfied. As to Phinuit's often-remarked tendency to fish for information, Sir Oliver admits: "At times Dr. Phinuit does fish; occasionally he guesses; and sometimes he ekes out the scantiness of his information from the resources of a lively imagination."[5]

What is Mrs. Piper's own explanation of these things? According to Sir Oliver Lodge: "Mrs. Piper pretends to no knowledge as to her own powers, and I believe her assertion that she is absolutely ignorant of what she has said in the trance state. She appears to be anxious to get the phenomena elucidated, and hopes by sitting to scientific investigators to have light thrown on her abnormal condition, about which she expresses herself as not quite comfortable."[6] On the other hand, says Sir Oliver, "She herself when in the trance state asserts that she gets it by conversing with the deceased friends and relatives of people present."[7]

Mr. Edward Clodd says: "Mrs. Piper, in October, 1901, made a confession denying that she had had any communications from the departed when she was in the trance-state. She afterwards recanted, and a defender of the faith explained that her 'statement represented simply a transient mood.' But the fact of the confession remains, and the transient, probably, was the true. Let Sir Oliver and the rest of the credulous explain it as they may or can; ingenuity will never fail them."[1] The quality of Dr. Phinuit's communications through Mrs. Piper may be judged by the verdict of Professor James, who declared, "I was too disgusted with Phinuit's tiresome twaddle to even note it down," and of Professor Shaler, who, after a seance in 1894, calls him a "preposterous scoundrel."[2] And yet Sir Oliver Lodge declares, with regard to Mrs. Piper, that the time for "suspicion" and "detective work" is over.[3] No doubt it is with Sir Oliver Lodge, but not with us.

The spirits communicating through Mrs. Piper are no more successful at prophecy than they are at giving correct astronomical knowledge. For instance, the spirit named Rector informs Dr. Hodgson—through the medium of Mrs. Piper—that Mrs. Piper will pass over to the spirit-world (the cant phrase for dying) before him, and also tells Hodgson, "Thy life is only in its beginning."[4] Seven years later—in 1905—Hodgson died. Mrs. Piper has not "passed over" yet.

Again, in the year 1899, the spirit of Moses—the mythical hero of the Old Testament—also through the medium of Mrs. Piper, prophesied the great world-war that was about to take place—a thing, by the way, which most people were prepared to witness, and which was being prophesied nearly every day by journalists, novelists, and political writers. Dr. Hodgson inquired whether he would live to see it, and the spirit of Moses replied, "Thou shalt live in flesh to know all."[5] Dr. Hodgson died nine years before the great War broke out. In the only details the old prophet gives of the coming conflict, he is hopelessly wide of the mark. He declares that Germany will take no serious part in the War, which will be carried on by Russia in league with France on the one side, against England in league with America on the other!

We have given some instances of the spirits' ignorance of astronomy, and, as Mrs. Henry Sidgwick remarks, we should hardly expect the exalted spirits to use "scientific terms" in a way that shows total want of understanding of what they are talking about." She continues:—

> And the ignorance is not confined to science. Mrs. Piper might easily have given little attention to Old Testament history or the history of Christianity, but that Imperator, if the great spirit he professes to be, should undertake to instruct Hodgson in the true inwardness of these things, and contrive even while confining himself to vague generalities to talk so much nonsense about them, is difficult to conceive. Again, Mrs. Piper might well have erroneous notions concerning Adam Bede and imagine him to be a real person whom she might meet in the other world, but it is hardly possible that (the spirit of) George Eliot should make a similar mistake and report having met him without expressing any surprise.[6]

Of course, as everyone knows, Adam Bede is an imaginary character—the title-character of George Eliot's well-known novel.

But it was Dr. Stanley Hall who applied the decisive test to Mrs. Piper's spirits. In 1909 he had a sitting with Mrs. Piper, who was supposed to be under the control of the spirit of Dr. Hodgson, who had then been dead four years. We quote from Mrs. Henry Sidgwick's account:—

> Dr. Stanley Hall in 1909 took a short cut to positive evidence by deceiving the control Hodgson, and asking for a niece, Bessie Beals, who had never existed, but who was nevertheless produced at several sittings, and connected specific memories with the sitter—mainly, though not entirely, such as might be suggested by his statements and questions. When in the end Dr. Hall told Hodgson that he (Hall) had been deceiving him, and that there was no such person as Bessie Beals, Hodgson maintained her reality. The following is the report of the conversation (Miss Annie Tanner, Studies in Spiritism, p. 254):—
> "Dr. Hall: Well, what do you say to this, Hodgson? I asked you to call Bessie Beals, and there is no such person. How do you explain that?
>
> "Hodgson: Bessie Beale is here, and not the ——"
> (Note by Miss Tanner.)
> [At this point we laughed and I made some remark to the effect that that was just what we had said Hodgson would do, and the hand continued (writing) thus.]
> "Hodgson: I know a Bessie Beals. Her mother asked about her before. Mother asked about her before.
>
> "Dr. Hall: I don't know about that, Hodgson. Bessie Beals is a pure fiction.
> "Hodgson: I refer to a lady who asked me the same thing and the same name.
>
> "Dr. Hall: Guess you are wrong about that, Hodgson.
> "Hodgson: Yes, I am mistaken in her. I am mistaken. Her name was not Bessie, but Jessie Beale."

Mrs. Sidgwick remarks on this: "We can only say about this explanation that it is not plausible.....Dr. Hall might accidentally have hit on the name of a previous communicator, but it is very unlikely that this communicator would have had memories appropriate to Dr. Hall's fictions and have admitted him as her uncle."[1] For our part, we believe that Mrs. Piper would put you into communication with the spirit of anyone asked for, whether they ever existed or not. This exposure so upset Mrs. Piper that she gave up her trance-sittings for a time.

Socialism and Freethought.

The name "Socialism" appears in the most bewildering connections. Its Red Flag flies over the palace of the Tsar; its apostles occupy in various parts of the world, with seeming impartiality, the Ministry of State and the prison cell—they endure with equal fortitude the rank of a colonel and the firing platoon (after court-martial). Rumour has it that the German Socialist may appear at any moment at the barricades to secure liberty by force and arms; in the British House of Commons, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, in the name of Socialism, calls upon the Churches to "follow Christ" and lead the way to peace.

The Freethinker may well be puzzled, and even a little alarmed.

The question for the Freethinker is this: What will Socialism do in the day of its triumph for (a) the right of Freethought, speech, and discussion; and (b) with the established Churches? Otherwise stated: What is Socialism doing, and what will it do, to disestablish religion, dissipate superstition, and make universal the recognition of Science as the only Providence of mankind?

At first glance it would seem that the aim of Socialism is wholly secular, its method rational and critical, and its theory based upon the material facts of human society as a developing organism.

So much is this the case that orthodox opponents of Socialism have always treated it as hostile to religion and the Churches. More than this: the supposed identity of Atheism and Socialism has led to the supposition that all leading Atheists—Charles Bradlaugh, for instance—were necessarily Socialists.

By contrast we have the "Socialist leader" (dozens of him) on the P.S.A. platform claiming Christ as a "comrade" and the Gospels as his inspiration, the Christian Socialist parson, and ("et tu Brute") the Marxist who hurls at Freethought the desolating epithet of "bourgeois"! It would appear that even if organized Socialism is Atheist, it is not friendly to Freethought.

* * * * *

The writer wishes to clear the issue of misconceptions, so that the problem may be accurately understood.

Modern Socialism begins with Karl Marx (1818-1883). His writings are translated into every civilized tongue. His grave is a point of pilgrimage, his portrait hangs in a million homes scattered all round the globe, and his disciples pay to his name a reverence which is not much caricatured when classed as "divine." The sentimental devotion with which he is regarded by his disciples—the present writer among them—has provoked the scoffs of the un-sentimental. Marxism has been likened to Christism. In an early essay on the "Illusions of Socialism," Bernard Shaw jeered at the Socialist "Bible of the Working Classes" (Marx's Capital), and likened the hoped-for "Revolution" to the "Second Advent." But when all allowance is made for the excesses of the enthusiasts, Marx remains vast and titanic, and his work and that of his "apostolic succession" the foundation and inspiration of the Socialist International. In the National Reformer for March 25, 1883, "D" says:—

> The death of Karl Marx—which will be regretted by economists of all shades of opinion—removes from the world's stage the ablest of the Socialist writers; but the theme on which he wrote will long disturb the thoughts of men and the slumber of statesmen.

The special feature of the Marxian system is its concept of social development, usually styled by Marxists "The Materialist Conception of History." If it deserve the name, it must be thoroughly Atheist; and whether sound or not, at any rate, it deserves its name. It is, in fact, a magnificent attempt (the first attempt, except that of Buckle) to reduce the phenomena of history from a Vitalistic chaos to a Mechanist intelligibility.

It is best to give Marx's own words:—

> The general result at which I arrived and which once obtained served as a guide for my subsequent studies can be briefly formulated as follows:—In making their livelihood together men enter into certain necessary involuntary relations with each other, industrial relations which correspond to whatever stage society has reached in the development of its material productive forces. The totality of these industrial relations constitutes the economic structure of society, the real basis upon which the legal and political superstructure is built and to which definite forms of social consciousness correspond. The method of producing the material livelihood determines the social, political, and intellectual life-process in general. It is not men's [individual] consciousness which determines their life; on the contrary, it is their social life which determines their consciousness (Critique of Political Economy; 1857).

Marx, be it remembered, was a Communist, who had reached Communism via the Atheist-Humanism of the Hegelian Left—the school which produced Schleiermacher, F. C. Baur, D. F. Strauss (author of the Life of Jesus), and Feuerbach (author of The Essence of Christianity). He came to the study of sociology, therefore, an Atheist, a Materialist, and an Evolutionist. His practical preoccupation was the "Revolution" for which, in 1848, all Free-spirits hoped, and of which the faith and hope has lasted with varying fortunes to this day. His aim was to find a rational explanation of past revolutions and a positive base for belief in a future Communist Revolution. As a Materialist, it was necessary to interpret social development by material facts. That the God of all religions was man-made, and that the Christ of Christianity was a projection of human consciousness, was a foregone conclusion. Feuerbach had demonstrated so much. There remained only to show why beliefs changed and why political society was periodically revolutionized. The current Communist speculations (Robert Owen, St. Simon, Fourier) had shown how potent were the reactions upon social conduct and social experience of the institutions of "property" and "the family." It was but a step to rise to the generalization that the play of ideas culminating in revolution was the "ideologic" aspect of man's desires, which, in turn, begotten by their needs, were determined by their "property relations." "All (written) history is the history of class-struggles." But on what depend property relations? As a Materialist, Marx could give only one answer. The idea of property must originate somewhere in human experience; it must be begotten of some need; and of all possible needs of mankind, the greatest need is to keep alive. Feuerbach had already said "Man is what he eats"; and as for the individual man, so for society: its basic need is to feed and reproduce. Man must battle against Nature—his victory depends upon his weapons and his strategy. Throughout history "ownership" follows upon use.

A brief summary will make the idea clear. Primitive man is found living in groups. Drawn into association by his needs (of sex and defence), he remains grouped because the group has a greater survival value than isolation. Natural Selection eliminates the isolated.

The primitive group, when it has invented the weapons, is able to live by the collective hunt. In the hunt, those who "beat up" the game are as necessary as those who slay; hence the product of the tribal hunt is communally consumed. When animals have been domesticated, the need of pasture and sustained attention compelled the break-up of the tribe into the pastoral household—family property has appeared.

When men have learned to till the land they, in the long run, settle down to a territory. As inventions multiply, trades are specialized. This "division of labour" makes man more than ever interdependent. The history of man becomes more and more the history of "the Tool; its origin and outcome."

When, as in the "Middle Ages," the tool is such that one man alone can use it, one man owns the tool, uses it, and enjoys the product. At this stage arises the philosophy of the individual and his rights.

By the progress of invention—the introduction of steam, electrical and other mechanical power—the tool becomes such that only an army can set it in motion. Labour is subdivided more, and with specialization grows greater interdependence. Nations grow interdependent. Britain depends upon America for corn, cattle, and cotton; America upon Britain for cloth and textiles. The tool of production requires for its full and free exercise the consent and co-operation of society as a whole. Here arises a demand for the Social Ownership of the Tool, i.e., Socialism. This demand is resisted by the private proprietor class now politically dominant. Hence the struggle for the idea of Social Ownership becomes the practical struggle of the propertyless or wage-receiving class for political mastery. If analogy can be drawn from history, the victory of the propertyless and the triumph of Socialism are inevitable.

Such being the Materialist concept, we are in a position to answer the question with which we commenced.

Marxism, so far as it develops the thought of its founder, must more and more become identical with scientific sociology. As evidence of the Socialist recognition of this, we need but cite the fact that the list of books published by the various Socialist Parties all give prominence to the works of Darwin, Haeckel, and Buchner. From the prominence given in these same lists (see, for example, that of the Socialist Labour Press, 50 Renfrew Street, Glasgow) to Lecky, Draper, Buckle, etc., it is clear that Marxism for its adherents presupposes the triumph of Freethought. It is as complete a negation of Christian theology and ethics as can be conceived. And it is not without significance that the country wherein Marx is repudiated by the majority is also the land wherein "Socialism" is theoretically inchoate and morally flabbiest—the happy land of "Jesus the Socialist"—Britain.

Why, then, is "Freethought" scorned by some Marxists? On the Continent and in America the Socialist parties have put forth a whole library of works dealing with Socialism and its implications. The works of Marx, Engels, Bebel, Kautsky, Lafargue, Dietzgen, Untermann, Boudin, and De Leon constitute a library of large and closely reasoned volumes to which justice could only be done by the omnivorous diligence and inspired shears of our own W. Mann. It stands to reason that of the thousands of working men attracted to Socialism, only a minority have the money to buy or the leisure to master the science in all its details. When added to that is the fact these works can, in this country, only be obtained in imported American editions—supplies dependent upon the War and the Censor—a tendency to "narrowness" and "dogmatism" is inevitable. Then, too, the exigencies of political polemics lead to over-statement, and polemic literature exiled from its land of origin becomes liable to grave misconception.

It will be common knowledge to readers of the Freethinker that, in France, Freethought is a much more "fashionable" thing than here. Many, if not most, of the French bourgeois are Freethinkers (more or less Voltairean).

Paul Lafargue (son-in-law of Marx), a brilliant satirist and the leading litterateur among French Socialists, was never so happy as when taunting the Voltairean bourgeois with their political alliances with "l'infame." His words, taken literally in the English translation, have led some Marxists to suppose that the "correct position" is to treat Freethought always and everywhere with contempt. This is the reverse of the truth.

Lafargue's view is developed at length in his essay, Causes of Belief in God, and his argument—developed in terms of the "class struggle"—may thus be summarized: "God is an illusion invented by savages because of their ignorance. It is indispensable to the bourgeois as a ruling class. If it did not exist, 'it would be necessary for them to invent it.' The only class whose position and experience enables it to free itself from the 'God illusion' is the proletariat. They alone are, and can be, the real Freethinkers, and they alone, by their triumph, can win the battle of Freethought." That is to say, Lafargue's complaint is not that the bourgeois are Freethinkers, but that they are not. Which means, not that Socialism is indifferent or hostile to Freethought, but that the fight for Freethought is an integral part of the battle for Socialism.

This opinion the present writer shares. No Freethinker can afford to be ignorant of Socialism. Every genuine Socialist must be a Freethinker.

Babies, Bunkum, and Biology.

> Psychology is inseparably linked with physiology, and the phases of social life exhibited by animals other than man, which sometimes curiously foreshadowed human policy, fall strictly within the province of the biologist.
> —Huxley, Encl. Britt.

BABY week and baby talk have recently had a good airing, and the papers and magazines have been well flooded with articles thereon, revealing another important national oversight, i.e., that babies are the greatest asset of the nation—a statement which runs some risk of being mistaken for a stupid truism. The distinguishing feature, however, in nearly all that has been written, is the poor knowledge displayed of vital statistics and of biology. Early man was not much concerned about the infantile mortality rate. Endowed by natural selection with a full measure of the reproductive power, he could not be blamed if he followed blindly this instinct, while his members were kept down by the constant struggle against nature. Later on, with dawning civilization, and, finally, when he "conceived God," the brutish instinct of "blind reproduction" held its ground, and even received divine support under the spiritual injunction to be "fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth"—the one injunction to which man has responded more nobly than any other in the Bible. On the other hand, it is not quite so clear that the high infantile mortality rate—at present existing, and which has existed much too long—was originally one of the Almighty's intentions, although it is clear that Nature is not at all particular about a high infantile, or any other kind of mortality, for we find her producing in all forms of life enormous numbers of progeny, of which a very small percentage survive. It is estimated that of British infants which die prematurely 100,000 could easily be saved, and their loss is considered a national disgrace. How big a disgrace will be better understood from the following statistics covering so short a period as only five years, 1901-1905. In that time the chief European nations lost by infantile mortality alone the following:—

Russia	3,900,000
Bulgaria	114,800
Roumania	257,400
Serbia	16,500
Belgium	137,200
Hungary	738,150
Austria	955,500
Spain	504,000
Germany	2,040,000
Italy...	950,000
Sweden	65,000
United Kingdom	746,000
France	573,000
Netherlands, Denmark, Norway, Switzerland	227,000
	11,225,650

So much for Europe; now for Asia's contribution:—

Ceylon	129,200
Japan	1,177,600
India	15,750,000
China	20,000,000
	37,056,800

The actual statistics of China are not available, but they may safely be taken as the same as India, viz., a birth-rate of forty per thousand, and an infantile death-rate of twenty-five per cent. Our grand total of the chief countries of Europe and the most heavily populated of Asia, for five years, reaches the interesting figures of 48,282,450! We can, therefore, safely say that the disgrace is "international" rather than "national"; a rank Materialist might even call it a "Universe-al" disgrace. Such unpleasant figures and fact belong to the category which afforded Huxley the excuse for saying: "Of moral purpose I see no trace in nature"; and moved Tennyson to write:—

> Are God and Nature then at strife,
> That Nature lends such evil dreams?
> So careful of the type she seems—
> So careless of the single life.

In conceiving God, and losing sight of nature, man has been, and still is, under the delusion that he can produce and raise an unlimited quantity of beings of high quality—high physically, mentally, morally. He has not been very successful yet, and even the super-scientific German materialists, to whom an unlimited supply of cheap labour and cannon fodder is the greatest asset, have failed to get their infantile mortality rate much below twenty per cent., losing two million odd in the years 1901-5. In short, a little study of the Diagrams of Vital Statistics, by Dr. C. V. Drysdale, the greatest living authority on population questions, shows that, at any rate during part of the nineteenth century for which the figures are available, no country with a high unrestricted birth-rate has been able to avoid a high general and infantile death-rate. This is not a matter of opinion, but one of verifiable statistics—one of nature's unpleasant truths, and, in the meantime, there is only one humane way of dealing with it, that is, to leave these millions of superfluous infants in the great never-never land until such time as we are more certain than we are now of being able to rear them. Already all the better-informed people in Europe and America have found that by limiting their families to numbers, which they can adequately provide for, they greatly benefit themselves and their children; but, on the other hand, the poor and more ignorant, who nearly always have larger families than they can bring up, and amongst whom the high infantile mortality is most marked, are now being helped by the State to bring into being as many children as they can—a policy of deliberate dysgenics as opposed to the eugenic one of encouraging them to have the smaller families, and encouraging the better-off people to have the larger. The excuse offered being that the nation must "make up for the losses of ths War," and that we are committing "race suicide." We can, however, easily reassure ourselves on this score by the perusal of an article in the Malthusian for February, 1916, which shows that if every married couple capable of bearing children averaged a family of no more than three, not only would infantile mortality be enormously reduced, but the nation would easily maintain its pre-War rate of increase of from three to four hundred thousand a year. Nor need we despair, if we really do need more in order to fill up the colonies. Hitherto the "policy" has been to let as many young men who wish to, emigrate to various ends of the earth, leaving their sisters behind to become old maids, whereas a little common sense and organization, together with any needful alteration of the marriage laws, might easily result in another half million marriages in the colonies where babies have a far better chance of surviving than in the slums of our great cities, as is seen by the low infantile mortality of Australia and New Zealand, which is only about eight or ten per cent. The question is a vital one, and needs to be looked at from the biological standpoint rather than from the sentimental and religious.

Views and Opinions.

Mr. Clodd and Atheists.

Some Christian apologists have a convenient way of dealing with Atheists. First of all they prove they are a bad lot, and then, if that fails in its purpose, they declare that Atheism is a myth, and Atheists are non-existent. One is used to this mixture of stupidity and impertinence from Christians—the poor devils must do the best they can with a bad case—but one hardly expects Freethinkers to condescend to the use of weapons borrowed from the Christian armoury. We are consequently surprised to find Mr. Edward Clodd informing readers of the Literary Guide that, while he does know Agnostics, "I don't know any Atheists; I thought that that type was extinct." Of course, if Mr. Clodd says he doesn't know any Atheists, one must take his word for it; but one cannot help wondering what kind of world it is in which he has been dwelling. For even as Chairman of the Rationalist Press Association, he must have come into contact with some of the leading associates of that body who are Atheists. If he did not meet them, it is surprising to find that he does not know what their opinions are. And, if I may be pardoned mentioning it, there is the Freethinker. Its late editor was an Atheist, as was Charles Bradlaugh, as is the present writer. And really we could, were it necessary, fill a large hall with metropolitan Atheists who would be very much alive. All of which goes to prove that a man may be very much at home when writing about primitive folk, and very much at sea when he is dealing with the living people around him.

Are Atheists Extinct?

Now, it would be absurd on our part to object to Mr. Clodd calling himself an Agnostic if he prefers that nebulous term. All we object to is his declaring extinct those who disagree with him. No one likes to be killed in this summary fashion, banished existence without rhyme or reason; and, worst of all, remaining conscious of one's non-existence. To be dead on the word of Mr. Clodd, and yet feel alive on the irrefutable testimony of one's own consciousness! That is the consideration that gives us pause, and makes us wonder whether it is we who are dreaming or Mr. Clodd who is wholly at sea about what he writes? And we are really curious to know in what way Mr. Clodd differentiates the Agnostics he knows—and is even proud of knowing—from the Atheists he does not know, and declares to be extinct. We are, of course, paying no regard here to labels, but attending only to opinions. What is it that differentiates a logical Agnosticism from Atheism as stated by all who may profess to some authority in stating it? We will not quote here Holyoake, or Bradlaugh, or Foote; they are dead, but we hope not, in the higher sense, extinct. We will not cite many who are living, because Mr. Clodd may reply he knows them not. We simply take the following:—

> The best argument for the use of the name Agnostic is simply that the word Atheist has been so long covered with all manner of ignorant calumny that it is expedient to use a new term which, though in some respects faulty, has a fair start, and will in time have a recognized meaning. The case, so stated, is reasonable; but there is the per contra that, whatever the motive with which the name is used, it is now tacked to half a dozen conflicting forms of doctrine, varying loosely between Theism and Pantheism. The name of Atheist escapes that drawback. Its unpopularity has saved it from half-hearted and half-minded patronage.

We select that expression of opinion because it belongs to Mr. J. M. Robertson, an associate of the body of which Mr. Clodd was the chairman. And no one will be more surprised than Mr. Robertson to learn that he is extinct.

The Use of Compromise.

For our part we have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Robertson is absolutely in the right. There may be many excuses for using "Agnostic" rather than "Atheist"; but there is only one argument, and that is a poor one. This is, that "Atheist" is misunderstood; to which the Atheist might retort that, by itself, "Agnostic" cannot be understood at all. It may mean philosophic Agnosticism, i.e., a statement of ignorance concerning what lies beyond our cognizance; and that does not really concern "God" at all. Or it may mean want of belief in God; and in that case it is Atheism under another name, and Mr. Clodd is himself a living specimen of what he declares to be an extinct type. You have, thus, to add an explanation of a term which is selected as in itself explanatory, while rejecting one which is clean cut and self-explanatory—save to such as are interested in misrepresenting it. For as a Theist is one with a "Theos," or a belief in God, so an Atheist is one without a "Theos" or a belief in God. And when one looks at the matter historically, one realizes that the very currency of the word Agnostic is itself proof of the prevalence of Atheism. Atheism has an historical connotation of evil due to the prevalence and the intolerance of religious belief. And quite naturally in this country, where moral courage in connection with intellectual affairs is so often lacking, it followed that as Atheism became the dominant characteristic of a growing number of minds, there should be an attempt to find a name of a more "respectable" kind. This relieves people from the pains of a strict conformity without exposing them to the penalties of an uncompromising nonconformity. But this is, after all, a blessing in disguise. It has, in Mr. Robertson's words, saved it "from half-hearted and half-minded patronage." And we may direct Mr. Clodd's attention to the fact that, on the Continent, there is not the same hesitation amongst public men in avowing themselves Atheists. One can imagine the amusement at an International Freethought Conference if one of the speakers described Atheists as extinct.

Can We Suspend Judgment?

An attempt is often made to justify the use of "Agnostic" by representing it as connoting a suspension of judgment as against the decisive rejection of Atheism. But a suspension about what? We properly suspend judgment when we understand the proposition before us, and where the evidence on either side is indecisive. But is that the case here? Is Mr. Clodd in a state of mental suspense concerning the "gods" of anthropology, that series of magnified non-natural men about which he has himself written? Does he not know as well as anyone that the god of modern religion is no more than a refinement of these savage gods, of whose non-existence he has no doubt whatever? And if we leave out that class of gods, what other god have we? "God," by itself, means nothing; and we cannot suspend judgment on a proposition that is not understood. Or if "God" is used in the sense of "supreme mind," it is surely the height of folly to call a thing mind while denying it all the qualities by which mind is known. "Mind," that does not possess the peculiar qualities of the only mind with which we are acquainted, is not mind at all, but something quite different. Really, between the statement that A does not exist, and the statement that A does exist, but differs in every particular from all the other A's, there is no difference whatever. Statements of this kind do not demand a suspensory state of mind, they deserve and should receive a decisive negative.

Atheism the Logical Issue.

The only genuine plea for Agnosticism is the one indicated above. It has protected some from the bitterness of the attack on Atheism, and, so far, it may be said, for those who needed it, to have justified its existence. In any other direction it is a decided failure. On the other hand, it has given birth to a "religious Agnosticism" and a "reverent Agnosticism," both of which work hard to prove that they are "truly religious," if only we properly understand that very ambiguous word; and on the other hand, it has provided splendid material for demolition by keen philosophic minds of a religious type, to which attack the only reply of the Agnostic is to use the arguments of a just discarded Atheism. It is not, therefore, the case that the Atheist is extinct. The number of avowed Atheists has always been comparatively small, as was only natural with a word which had to bear the full weight of religious intolerance. But to-day they are more numerous than ever before—more numerous in the sense of those who openly avow their Atheism, and more numerous still in the case of those who prefer to use another, if more misleading, term to describe their position. If these will have it so, they must; but it is strange for a parent to be told that his family is extinct when he sees around him so numerous a progeny.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Bible and Foreign Missions.

RELIGION, in its more primitive form, may be defined as a belief in a supernatural being or beings, on whom man regarded himself as dependent for all he was and had, and to whom he deemed himself responsible for all he did, together with the feelings and practices to which such a belief inevitably gave rise. Originally, no doubt, deities were simply superhuman powers, invisible and impersonal, but conceived of as resembling man's second-self or spirit. Such powers, or beings, personal or impersonal, it must be borne in mind, were never objects of knowledge, the belief in them being the outcome of ignorance and fear. As Professor Gilbert Murray well says, religion owes its origin to a primitive "Age of Ignorance," and one is tempted to regard "Primal Stupidity as the normal beginning of all religion, or almost as the normal raw material out of which religion is made (Four Stages of Greek Religion, p. 16). With this "normal beginning" in mind, we are enabled to appreciate the history of religion, its evolution from stage to stage until it attains to its highest forms in Buddhism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism—from Polydæmonism to Christian Theism. Of the three universalistic religions, Buddhism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism, not one of them really answers to the name. Buddhism has about five hundred millions of adherents; Christianity, some three hundred and a half millions; and Mohammedanism, nearly two hundred and thirty millions. Buddhists, Christians, and Mohammedans number approximately 1,048,000,000, whilst the population of the world is estimated at 1,623,000,000.

It is but fair to mention that Bishop Boyd Carpenter, in an article entitled "The Christian Church," in the tenth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, supplies a table according to which the number of Christians in the year 1896 was 500,000,000, while in statistics found in Whitaker's Almanac for 1916, Buddhists number only 138,031,000. In reality, it is wholly immaterial whether Christians or Buddhists are the more numerous, the most important point being that Christianity triumphed over Paganism in the West by forcibly crushing it, while Buddhism won India by means of moral suasion. The disciples of the Prince of Peace went everywhere with the Bible in one hand and the sword in the other, while the followers of the Buddha made converts by the simple preaching of the Gospel of Truth and Love. And this brings us to the most vital of all religious facts, namely, that the value of a religion is determined not by the number of its adherents, but by its effect upon character. Both Christians and Mohammedans have always been lovers of war; they have both gained converts at the point of the sword; whereas Buddhism denounces war in all its forms, forbids blood-sacrifice, abolishes slavery, and founds hospitals for man and beast. And yet Christianity pronounces Buddhism a false and dangerous religion, and does its utmost to supplant it, regarding itself as the only true and Divinely revealed way of salvation for a lost and ruined world. It claims to be the only universal or world-religion, and seeks to destroy all other cults in the name of God. The Bible is the inspired and infallible Word of the Lord, in which alone is the Divine Will concerning man fully and finally revealed. It was in this belief that the British and Foreign Bible Society was founded upwards of a hundred years ago; and all the great Missionary Societies came into existence because of the conviction firmly held that all non-Christians are under God's wrath and go to hell when they die. The Bible is God's love-gift to a perishing race, the sole true Gospel which is the power of God unto salvation to all who hear and believe it.

Such was the creed of our forefathers a hundred years ago, who did all within their power to make it known to the Heathen World. To-day, however, that theology is held by comparatively very few, with the result that Foreign Missions are no longer looked upon in the light in which they were initiated. To the Christian Commonwealth for August 29, the Rev. W. Garrett Horder, of Ealing, contributes a leading article, entitled "The One Standard for Missions," in which he declares that the whole Bible should not be given to the Heathen. The Old Testament, for example, should "be treated as only the early morning, and not the noonday, of the Divine revealings to men." Missionaries ought to realize that the Old Testament is so defective a book that it is not "their duty to translate and present it alongside of the New Testament to those they seek to convert to the Christian faith."

> It is therefore to the last degree important that Christianity should be presented to Heathendom only through its own distinctive message without the shadow cast over its Gospel of grace by some parts of the former Scriptures. Is it not time, therefore, boldly to face the situation and resolve to send to non-Christian peoples the New Testament, or that Testament with only those parts of the Old Testament which are fully in accord with it, such as selected parts of the Psalter from which all imprecatory notes have been excluded, and those passages of the Prophets which run along the line of and are filled with the Gospel spirit?.....For example, it cannot be good for the adherents of other faiths to have presented to them the war-like stories contained in the Books of Kings and Chronicles, which even in Christendom have done much to justify and excite warlike doings. Such stories cannot be brought into harmony with the essential teaching of Jesus Christ.

Mr. Horder is perfectly right and fully justified in calling attention to the impropriety of treating the whole Bible as Divinely inspired and infallible. He assures us that there is no "need to present as infallibly true and therefore to be accepted the Cosmogony presented in the Book of Genesis." As a matter of fact the Mosaic Cosmogony has been scientifically proved to be utterly false; and Canon Driver did not hesitate to admit that the first ten chapters in the Book of Genesis are unhistorical. Mr. Horder proceeds thus:—

> Beyond this there is surely much in the account of the sacrificial worship, described in the Old Testament, which must be repellent, say, to the Buddhist, who recoils from the slaughter of any form of animal life. To him the sacrifice of bulls and goats must seem quite shocking. And since such sacrifice of animal life forms no part of the Christian faith, it is quite needless to bring it before him in a book which is not one of the Christian Scriptures.

Mr. Horder forgets, however, that the sacrificial worship described in the Old Testament is represented as being, not only in complete harmony with the Divine Will, but ordained and enjoined by Jehovah. The reverend gentleman does not condemn the Jewish sacrificial system as absolutely futile as well as horribly cruel, but merely points out that to a Buddhist it would seem quite shocking. But is it not, and should it not seem quite so to all alike? Mr. Horder says that "such sacrifice of animal life forms no part of the Christian faith"; but is he not aware that the Christian faith is utterly discredited in the eyes of thoughtful people by its account of the more than shocking sacrifice of the innocent Son of God? The Jews offered not only peace-offerings, but holocausts, unto God to get rid of their sins, and that practice was discontinued only because the sinless God-man was immolated on Heaven's altar in order that he might become the propitiation for the sins of the whole world, without which reconciliation with the angry Sovereign of the Universe would have been eternally impossible. In this sacrifice Mr. Horder sees nothing shocking or immoral. The Gospel message which he wants Heathendom to hear and believe is that God accepted the sacrificial offering on Calvary as the external ground on which he could receive into his favour and fully pardon the rebels of the fall. Why, the New Testament is an infinitely more dangerous document than the Old, and should never be sent to Heathen lands. Dr. T. R. Glover recently said with pride that Christianity is not good conduct, nor escape from hell, but "Jesus Christ, and Jesus Christ nailed to the cross." "The cross of Christ," he added, "is the great central fact of our religion. To Paul it was the centre of all his preaching, as well as of his philosophy and theology, and personal religion." That is entirely true. In Christianity there are but two plain facts, namely, the historical Jesus, and the historical Cross; and without the latter the former is of no significance. Christians are dependent upon no vague, nebulous, ethical principle, but upon a slain, buried, and risen Saviour-God. Our loving Heavenly Father could not have accepted and forgiven one of us had not his only begotten and beloved Son offered himself a ransom for us all. Such is Christianity, and to ask an honest Buddhist to substitute it for his own religion is to inflict upon him the worst possible insult.

There are true and beautiful passages in the Old Testament in both poetry and prose; but its central conception of Jehovah is cruel, and wicked, and degrading. In the New Testament there are extremely few paragraphs which charm us, while the central story in both Gospels and Epistles is fundamentally incredible, being an outrage upon reason, an insufferable affront to the moral sense, and an unpardonable offence against God, if he exists.

The Bible, the whole Bible, must be put in the same category as all other Sacred Books, and Christianity must be looked upon as one of many similar religions, as mythical in its nature, and as destined to pass away, discredited, as the others.

J. T. Lloyd.

The Ineffable Mr. Wells.

> It is not only our enemies, those desperate characters, it is we ourselves who know not what we do; thence springs the glimmering hope that perhaps we do better than we think.
> —Robert Louis Stevenson.

> Thou art a worthy man, notwithstanding that there be some do call thee the Ratter.—The Chronicles of Artemas.

Clothed in motley, and banging a bladder, Mr. H. G Wells has for years frequented the camp of the Army of Human Liberation. A licensed jester, his quips and cranks often amused the soldiers of progress. Latterly, however, his jibes have taken a bitter tone, especially since he has "found God"; or, perhaps, "God" has found him. Maybe, they have found each other. And the mutual recognition of two such distinguished personalities has been an event of newspaper importance. For, like so many worthy folk in similar condition, Mr. Wells has proceeded to make himself a public nuisance. One of his pastimes, since his conversion, has been the hurling of insults at his former associates; and, curiously, his jibes have taken the familiar form of the stock arguments of those polite patterers, the Christian Evidence Society lecturers. Presumably, Mr. Wells' conversion has depressed his levity, for the process reminds us of how Edward Gibbon, the historian, learnt Greek "at the cost of many tears and not a little blood."

As a popular novelist, Mr. Wells has a numerous following, not so large as that of Miss Ethel Dell or Mr. Charles Garvice, but still respectable in point of numbers. Therefore it would be unwise to ignore him altogether. What needs comment is his rehashing of the stale objections which have done so much service on so many Christian pulpits and platforms, particularly when he says, in God the Invisible King, that "without God the service of man is no better than a hobby or a sentimentalism or an hypocrisy in the undisciplined prison of the mortal life." Since this fatuous utterance, Mr. Wells has gone out of his way to taunt Freethinkers with their lack of philanthropic work, and with having no charitable and educational institutions in connection with their movement. He adds, further, that the "professed Atheists and Agnostics" he has known "have been careful and comfortable people—and just a little self-righteous."

Such remarks show that Mr. Wells knows very little of the movement with which he was for a few months associated. Freethought is a poor, struggling cause, its members are comparatively few and scattered; and it has no wealthy endowments to lessen the current cost of a national propaganda. Still, the Freethought Party does manage to relieve its necessitous members; and the Freethinkers' Benevolent Fund is well supported, and is probably the only fund which is administered without a single farthing of expense. Until a short time ago it was not possible to bequeath money for Freethought purposes with any real prospect of the trust being carried into effect, as it was in the power of the next-of-kin to invalidate the legacy on the ground that it was illegal. The recent Bowman Case has altered this; but Freethought was robbed of thousands of pounds before this memorable legal victory.

Let Mr. Wells ponder the case of Stephen Girard, the famous American Freethinker. At his death, this large-hearted man left large bequests to charities, the principal being a munificent endowment of an orphanage. By express provision in his will, no ecclesiastic, or minister of religion, was to hold any connection with the college, or even to be admitted as a visitor: but the staff of the institution were required to instruct the pupils in secular morality and leave them to adopt their own religious opinions. This will has been most shamefully perverted, for the officials are all Christians, and, in order to keep within the letter of the law, only laymen are so employed.

Does Mr. Wells know that Florence Nightingale, "the lady with the lamp," who ministered to the poor soldiers in the Crimea, was a heretic? Has this one-time Fabian and former Rationalist never heard of Walt Whitman, who spent four years of his life in attending the war-hospitals during the American Civil War, and who wrecked his superb constitution by his untiring devotion to his suffering fellows? And what of Robert Owen, who not only built the first infant schools, and improved the dwellings of his workpeople, but sought to construct the ideal society of the future? Mr. Wells ought to have heard of University College School, which was founded by Freethinkers to further the principles of Secular Education. Even the activities of the Humanitarian League, which has done such magnificent work in so many humanistic directions for a quarter of a century, should be sufficient to silence Mr. Wells in his campaign of insult and calumny.

Other names leap to the memory. Thomas Paine pleaded for the abolition of slavery; advocated the freedom of the press, the extension of the suffrage to the people, the provision of old-age pensions for the poor. He besought the French Republic not to imitate the bad example of Monarchy, and not to stain itself with blood. Was it "sentimentalism" or "hypocrisy" that caused Paine to nearly lose his own life by pleading for humanity? Shelley, the Atheist poet, was a thorough humanitarian. To help the needy and to relieve the sick seemed to him a simple duty, which he carried out cheerfully. He inquired personally into the circumstances of his charities, visited the sick in their homes, and kept a list of poor persons whom he assisted. At Marlow he suffered from acute ophthalmia, contracted whilst visiting the afflicted lace-makers in their cottages. So practical was Shelley that he even went to the length of attending a London hospital in order to acquire medical knowledge that should prove of service to the sick he visited. Is this a further example of Freethought "hypocrisy?"

Mr. Wells is guilty of the worst form of cant. As a Socialist, he ought to know that charity is very good in its way, but what the world wants is justice. If the world were run on fair and reasonable lines there would be no occasion for philanthropy to exist. If, however, belief in God is necessary to make a man a humanitarian, how comes it that the votes of the bishops in the House of Lords is a shameful record? Scores of measures for the bettering of the conditions of the working-classes have been opposed by these God-believing ecclesiastics. Nothing but self-interest excites their action. None even voted for the abolition of the flogging of women in prison, or for the abolition of the whip in the Army and Navy. Since Mr. Wells himself has "found God" his manners have worsened. Perhaps he remembers the legal advice, "no case, abuse the plaintiff's attorney." By attempting to discredit Freethought, he shields, in a measure, his newly-found "god" from the searchlights of rational criticism.

Like Mr. Facing-both-ways, Mr. Wells has a taste for taking things easily. He likes to patronize new ideas without losing the advantages arising from friendliness towards the old ones. He prefers to enter the arena when the fighting is nearly over, and to share in the victories that were won by better men than himself. Kid-glove reformers, like Mr. Wells, have never been wanting when all danger is over. Their function is to rebuke and insult the pioneers, and to enjoy the social, political, and financial profits of this ingenious policy. It is said that Mr. Wells receives handsome cheques from his publishers for his writings. We do not grudge him his thirty pieces of silver, which should be the rate for his attacks on his Freethought friends, many of whom have grown grey in the service of humanity.

MIMNERMUS.

In the Clouds.

THE dreamer, the idealist, poet, reformer, etc., is often accused of having his mental habitation in the clouds, and the accusation is often quite justified. Such is one extreme. There is the other, as Burns expressed it in "The Bard's Epitaph":—

> Reader attend, whether thy soul
> Soars fancy's flights beyond the pole,
> Or, darkling, grubs this earthly hole
> In low pursuit;
> Know, prudent cautious self-control
> Is wisdom's root.

Ruskin was an intensely practical man, but the artist in him was for ever finding fresh beauties in the skies, and he spoke reprovingly of the many who were so dull and indifferent to the mutable majesty of that inverted dome. Shade and shape and hue, the gleams of morning and the glow of eve, the noon's triumphal splendours, were to him a perpetual delight; he speculated on the "Beyond," but did not let it disturb the philosophical tranquillity of his mind; sufficient for him was the order and artistry of Nature's magnificent and spacial interior. Shelley did justice to the cloud, Byron to the moon, Shakespeare to the stars. But what poet of any eminence has not soared mentally in all the regions of space, and returned to earth bringing with him the music of the spheres. Lesser writers have smaller horizons, but such, in their degree, at times, may rest and luxuriate, and survey with quiet pride their house beautiful. Others, again, are more hard to please, and seek out inventions such as those of whom a mordant rhymer said:—

> We must please the pious crowd
> With mansions in a cloud
> And a kingdom in the far-off Milky Way.

The present writer awoke the other moment from a deep dream of peace—a noonday snooze, in fact—and behold! the beauty of the clouds and azure made him sigh with delight.

> Wonderful, wonderful, and more wonderful!

There was a prowling wind, and the sound of an intermittent pressure on the window-sash. It was what in summer is called "broken weather"—local showers, sunshine, and a soft, far-seen purity of atmosphere. Great white cumulous clouds moved slowly apart on a serene expanse of deepest blue, or came together, diffused, and were leaden grey again even as one looked. Elsewhere were lesser strips of azure and seeming plateaus, sunlit, in the celestial Alps, and innumerable azure lakes with light brown and golden shores, or darkening and lightening in varied shades; and now and then the white sunlight flashed, fanlike, as the great panorama moved and changed. What regions consecrate, what undiscovered country, shadowland, fairyland, never-never land, illusion land, and dreamland; yet land of rest and true and natural delight! One looks, and looks again; fresh and sweet and eternally young, the largesse of that gracious dome refreshes eye and heart and mind; one feels young, refreshed, renewed; one is happy; even external lines of care are smoothed away; one thinks of Wordsworth's line:—

> And beauty born of murmuring sound
> Shall pass into her face.

Some sea-washed rampart hills bound the western view, a mere mass of granite and heather, with tall central peaks piercing the cloud and perusing the azure skies, a rough and rocky isle, yet clad in soft aerial-tinted robe, reclining in slumberous adolescence, or chaste and wistful like awakening womanhood in a maiden's eyes. In the moist, clear twilight, also, new and nameless investitures are seen. In their dim chamber of the West the hills seem sinking into rest, and white "blanket" clouds, with kindly stealth, have stolen from behind to wrap them for repose; or, pausing midway, permit the view of royalty while the light remains. Light detached vapours here and there float and cling around the sleeping hills. But it requires an Anatole France to do justice to such a scene. For instance, in a Neapolitan passage in Sylvestre Bonnard, he says: "A single lamp burned in the niche of a Madonna. The purity and transparency of the air gave a celestial softness and clearness to the very darkness itself, and one could find one's way without difficulty under such a limpid night." Such I had been trying—vainly—to say; but there it is in the easy touch of "the master's hand."

There are "white-caps" on the waves suggesting Tennyson's Greek fire in his cosmic lines:—

> The moanings of the homeless sea,
> The sound of streams that swift or slow,
> Draw down the hard Aonian hills,
> And sow the dust of continents to be.

One by one the lights are extinguished round the couch of beauty in the West; shapes dissolve and colours fade; but we can still, with Keats,—

> .....Behold, upon the night's starr'd face,
> Huge cloudy symbols of a high romance.

Anon to sleep till wakes the smiling morn of a world diurnally renewed.

Science, Telepathy, and Communion with the Dead.

VIII.

In 1837 the French Academy appointed a commission to examine the marvels presented by blindfold subjects who had been submitted to what was called animal magnetism. All their pretensions were dissipated; there was neither magnetism nor any power of second sight. This report was disputed. Dr. Buden then offered a prize of 3,000 francs to any person, somnambulist or otherwise, who could read without the use of his eyes. Six candidates from different parts of France presented themselves, for animal magnetism and somnambulism were then epidemic. A new commission was appointed; new failures occurred. Trials went on until October, 1840, when at the close of a series of ignominious failures, in which the tricks of each pretender in succession were unmasked, the Academy decided that it would no longer take notice of any communication relative to the imposture and folly, miscalled animal magnetism and clairvoyance. The same thing occurred with Sir James Simpson, who twenty years afterwards, when similar pretences were rife in the United Kingdom, and somnambulists and clairvoyants and thought-readers were again taking the field, offered to present a £50 note, which he had locked in a box and placed in a bank, to anyone who could read the number as the note lay in the box. It was never claimed. Mr. Labouchere's similar experiment with the so-called thought-reader Bishop is of quite recent date, but was performed under much less rigid conditions, and by a person whose pretensions, although they excited a great deal of attention, were more than usually absurd.—Dr. Ernest Hart, "The New Witchcraft," pp. 23-24.

Mrs. Henry Sidgwick, who has made a careful analysis of Mrs. Piper's trance phenomena, running to a volume of 650 pages, comes to the conclusion that "however true it may be that there is really communication between the living and the dead, the intelligence communicating directly through Mrs. Piper's organism is Mrs. Piper."[1] And she cites the testimony of Professor William James, who favoured the idea of the spirits communicating through Mrs. Piper—"all being dream creations of Mrs. Piper, probably having no existence except when she is in a trance, but consolidated by repetition into personalities consistent enough to play their several roles'."[2]

How, then, can we account for Mrs. Piper's success as a medium for so many years, and for the unbounded confidence reposed in her by men like Sir Oliver Lodge? Upon what facts is this confidence based?

As we have seen, Mrs. Piper has made no revelations in science; her efforts in astronomy were utterly childish and puerile. Her attempts at prophecy have turned out to be ridiculously wide of the mark. She has never revealed a scrap of useful knowledge in all the years of her mediumship.

Mr. Podmore, who made a long and exhaustive examination of Mrs. Piper's trance utterances, observes that "her real strength lies in describing the diseases, personal idiosyncrasies, thoughts, feelings, and character of the sitter and his friends; their loves, hates, quarrels, sympathies, and mutual relationships in general; trivial but insignificant incidents in their past histories, and the like. Not only is information on such points as these more difficult to acquire by normal means, but it is much more difficult to retain in the memory."[1] Well, if we grant that though difficult, it was not impossible, to acquire the information sought in a natural way, and credit Mrs. Piper with a very capable memory, there is no need for any supernormal explanation, especially if we consider her method of imparting her trance revelations. For, as Podmore further points out:—

> Her trance personality does not commonly deal in precise and categorical statements of fact; names are frequently uttered or written piecemeal and in tentative form; diseases are diagnosed by symptons often by no means distinctive; persons are indicated by descriptions of a dubious kind; incidents and relationships are shadowed forth by obscure and inadequate hints. In a word, the information given is very generally incomplete or of uncertain meaning, and needs expert interpretation.[2]

Yes, and it is "expert interpretation" that can always be relied upon from the believers in Mrs. Piper.

Podmore, in stating his difference of opinion with Professor Hyslop in regard to Mrs. Piper, concludes: "I cannot point to a single instance in which a precise and unambiguous piece of information has been furnished of a kind which could not have proceeded from the medium's own mind, working upon the materials provided and the hints let drop by the sitter. I agree with Professor Hyslop in rejecting telepathy as the explanation of these latest revelations, not, however, as being inadequate, but as being superfluous. I do not ask the reader to accept my judgment on the case. The point of the illustration is that a subject in which it is possible for two honest and fairly competent investigators from the same set of facts to deduce such divergent conclusions is clearly not yet sufficiently advanced to serve as a basis for any but the most modest generalizations."[3]

We have given instances of the uniform failure of mediums to answer test questions, notably in the case of Mrs. Verrall's and Myers' test letter; and, as Podmore observes:—

> A weighty objection to accepting Mrs. Piper's trance personalities at their own valuation is that they have again and again failed to answer the test questions put to them, and that the manner of their failure has often proved more fatal to their claim than the failure itself. Thus, the soi-disant (spirit of) Hannah Wild on several occasions dictated (through Mrs. Piper) what professed to be a copy of the contents of a sealed letter written by the real Hannah Wild before her death, for the express purpose of the test; and all these versions were entirely wide of the mark.[4]

In conclusion, Podmore declares: "It is impossible to believe that in these trance utterances (of Mrs. Piper) we are listening to authentic and unembarrassed messages from the dead." But Sir Oliver Lodge finds no difficulty in believing it and in trying to foist his belief on everybody else.

Sir Oliver Lodge tells us that Mrs. Piper has revealed things while in a state of trance that she had no knowledge of during her ordinary state. For instance, he claims that the spirit of Dr. Phinuit—through the mediumship of Mrs. Piper—recognized a ring worn by Lady Lodge as having been given to Sir Oliver Lodge for her by an aunt shortly before her death. He also called for a locket that Lady Lodge sometimes wears, but was not wearing at the time, which had belonged to her father forty years ago, and many similar insignificant and useless facts. Sir Oliver Lodge declares that Mrs. Piper did not know, and could not have known, the facts concerning these articles. "But," as Dr. Mercier very pertinently points out, "what opportunity had Dr. Phinuit of knowing these things? We have no evidence except Mrs. Piper's assertion that Dr. Phinuit ever existed even in the spirit; and we have no evidence at all that he ever existed in the flesh.....Now it is significant that though we do not know what opportunities Dr. Phinuit had of studying the Lodge family, we do know something of the opportunities that Mrs. Piper had of studying it. Mrs. Piper seems to have been a frequent visitor of the Lodges. She stayed in their house, on one visit for nine days, and on another for five days, at a time; and neither Mrs. Piper nor Sir Oliver Lodge has ever been cross-examined with respect to these visits."[1]

As Dr. Mercier further remarks, when ladies stay in the same house on intimate terms they sometimes visit one another in their respective bedrooms, and then it is usual for the visitor to admire her hostess's possessions, and to go into little raptures over them; and upon this encouragement the hostess may relate how the trinket that is so sweet came into her possession, or what its history is. Or Mrs. Piper may have gained the knowledge from the daughter of the house, who may have been wearing the trinkets for the time being. Or she may have picked up the information during the course of ordinary conversation. All sorts of topics turn up in conversation when a guest is staying in the house, and it would be quite possible for Mrs. Piper to turn the conversation on to the subject of trinkets such as these, for the express purpose of using the information during her trance sittings.

This is borne out by the fact, noticed by Dr. Mercier, that: "As Phinuit, or Mrs. Piper, I think we may as well give him his proper name, becomes more and more intimate with the Lodge family, the skilful guesses and well-directed shots either become fewer, or they become better directed, for mistakes are better avoided, and 'fishing' becomes less conspicuous."

Dr. Mercier asks Sir Oliver to point out "where the necessity is for the performance of a miracle?" and proceeds:—

> For let there be no mistake, no misunderstanding. What you assert is the occurrence of the miraculous. You may call Dr. Phinuit a "discarnate intelligence" and his knowledge supernormal, but I submit to you that a discarnate intelligence is another name for a ghost or spook; and supernormal is another name for supernatural or miraculous. Can you deny it? Do you deny it? If so, please point out the difference between a discarnate intelligence and a spook, between what is merely supernormal and what is supernatural and miraculous. I suggest that you avoid the old and well-known and well-established words because they are discredited, and you as "a scientific" man are ashamed to use them; and I suggest that you use the terms discarnate intelligence and supernormal to soften down the shock that your readers would receive from the use of ghost or spook, or supernatural or miraculous, and to make them suppose that what you ask them to believe is something less than a ghost, and something less than a miracle.[2]

In his latest book, Raymond (named after Sir Oliver Lodge's youngest son, who was killed at the Front in 1915), Sir Oliver Lodge claims that he was forewarned by the spirits of the impending death of his son, the spirits also informing him of the existence of a photograph of Raymond, in a group, taken while serving in France, and of which the family were previously quite unaware.

Acid Drops.

We seriously call the attention of the House of Convocation, Upper and Lower, the Free Church Council, and the clergy generally, to the spell of wet weather we have experienced. It is a matter that calls for explanation. The effect on the home-grown food supply is disastrous, and to produce food is now an urgent necessity of the nation. We are fighting "God's fight," says the Bishop of London, and it is only fair that he should do his share. But to attack our food supply is to help Germany—there is no doubt about that. And whether our food is diminished by Germans in submarines, or by Providence through incessant rain, the result is the same. Providence, in blasting the English harvest, is helping Germany. That is the plain logic of the situation. We know what would be thought of Haig if he destroyed the ammunition needed for the Army. What will the clergy say of God, who is destroying the food of the British people?

We cannot, of course, acquit God of responsibility for the weather. That would be quite atheistic. And as not a sparrow falls to the ground without God's cognizance, there must be some "providential message" in so many hundred tons of water being sent at the wrong time. So we can quite sympathize with a writer in the Church Times for August 31: "When military operations of the first order are frustrated by rain in July, and a harvest of phenomenal promise and importance is threatened with ruin by rain in August, we must ask what gentler warning God could give us of the helplessness of independent human effort?" God is anxious to show us that we must not do without him—not because we cannot, for obviously, if he had left the weather alone, we might have gone on all right, but because we must not. And if we won't take notice of him, then he sends us a gentle warning, with, presumably, worse things to follow.

And that is just the trouble with gods. They demand so much attention, and if they don't get it immediately start upsetting things. One must be always telling them they are great, and good, and holy, and wise, not because one knows they are anything of the kind, but just because we think it pleases them, and they will get "riled" if we act otherwise. And there is one thing about gods, you can't pile the flattery on too thickly. Lord Beaconsfield said that all people were open to flattery, and when you got to the throne you could put it on with a trowel. When you get above the throne you can discard even the trowel, and when flattering the gods can pile on by the hogshead. What the world needs is a God who will attend to his own business, and not need eternally reminding of little things here and there, or getting into a temper and upsetting the weather because we haven't paid sufficient attention to him.

Another letter on the same subject appears, also in the Church Times, above the signature, "Francis M. Downton, Temple Balsall." We are convinced that Mr. Downton is a clergyman, or holds a brief for the clergy. The gist of his communication may be expressed in the following terms: God has made us for himself, and yet our practical contempt of him is notorious; his worship is the purpose of our existence, but we deliberately neglect his worship and live exclusively for ourselves. Indeed, our defiance of God and the ordinances of his house is our greatest sin. We spend his holy day for our own pleasure, abandoning the Church which he himself has founded, and in which his glory dwells. Well, the truth is that nothing we do can prosper without God's blessing, and that blessing will be withheld until we repent. The harvest is now seriously menaced by wind and rain because of our national apostacy from Divine worship. Therefore, if he wish to save the harvest, let us forthwith return to our God, realizing "that there can be no work of national importance to compare with the offering of the Holy Eucharist on Sunday and obedience to the laws which are bound up with it." And this is the twentieth century!

The Bishop of Peterborough has been holding services in Leicestershire, and has been walking from village to village. This form of locomotion is so unusual for a bishop that the press has been publishing paragraphs concerning the right reverend Father-in-God's heroism.

The week ended with a burst of fierce fighting in Flanders. At home the clergy are still busy at their old pastime of fierce talking.

Mr. Horatio Bottomley says that Demos is a "new god." Has Mr. Wells' deity been put on the shelf already?

The story of the three angels who were seen in the sky with the word "Peace" written across them appears to have impressed many pious people. It seems a pity that the celestial advertisement did not add the date on which peace will be ushered in.

The Bishop of London has been visiting some of the naval bases. We thought he was paid to attend to the foundations of belief.

A contemporary asks why Freethought is banned by the press. The answer is that newspapers are money-making enterprises, and have no concern with truth. As Lowell says, the pious editor does not believe in principle, but has great concern in interest.

A contemporary points out a schoolboy's howler from a scholar's story: "The parson sat writing his sermon in his sanctumonium." When that boy grows up he will learn that the dear clergy often buy their sermons ready for use.

Following the lead of the Bishop of St. Asaph, some of the more influential Church members of North Wales are still resisting as far as possible the movement to erect new science buildings at Bangor College as a memorial to the soldiers of North Wales. The Hon. Alice Pennant, whilst admitting in a press letter that this object is an "excellent" one, prefers "a military school for sons and brothers of men killed in the war, with facilities for religious education." She does not support Mr. R. J. Thomas's scheme, because "Whereas it has been proved by military statistics that between 60 and 70 per cent. of Welshmen in the Army are Churchmen, it is therefore impossible to feel it can be a suitable memorial to them to send a subscription to that institution in North Wales, which hopes and intends (at the end of the war) to profit by a share in the plunder of the Church to which they belonged." And so an "excellent" object fails to enlist her sympathy because it will inadvertently receive from the State a small portion of what the Church previously considered it consistent with its dignity to accept. The lady's action is easy to understand, but difficult to appreciate.

Even if the military statistics are accepted, the hon. lady is forgetting the 30 per cent. who, it is more than possible, would have some very pointed comments to make on the scheme launched by the 70 per cent. loyal Churchmen. Now, Mr. Thomas's scheme is not only admittedly "excellent"—it is unsectarian. We submit that this is its very fault. But to return to the figures. In pre-War days it is well known that the Established Church recruits always bulked in statistics handsomely by means of methods known to anyone who took the trouble to inquire. Now that we have a conscript Army, such statistics must bear a reasonable relation to the actual figures of membership of the various religious bodies. Now, does anyone believe that the Established Church members number from 60 to 70 per cent. of the population of Wales? The Army statisticians have, in fact, got themselves into a very laughable quandary—so laughable, indeed, that we think there is very little likelihood of the religious returns of the Army ever being made public.

It is astonishing what a difference, in the estimation of Christian writers, it makes when a nation goes to war—on the right side. A writer in the Christian World dealing with China's declaration of war against Germany, says that China "with her wide tolerance, her intellect, her industry, her democratic tendencies, her sweet reasonableness and love of peace," etc. We are not disputing the possession of these qualities by the Chinese; on the contrary, it is only what we ourselves have said years ago. Only the statement reads curiously in view of our missionary activity in China, and the way in which the Western Powers have treated her. Does it look as though the people possessing the national characteristics indicated above have anything to learn worth learning, in morals or sociology, from that Western world which is offering us the present spectacle?

A writer in the Sunday Herald says "the approbation of celibacy as the highest spiritual condition still lingers among the clergy." This reminds us of Horace Smith's caustic definition of celibacy as "a vow a man takes that he will enjoy none but other men's wives."

A firm of London laundrymen advertise that they are "launderers to the House of Lords." Does this firm wash the fine lawn sleeves of the lordly followers of the poor Carpenter of Nazareth?

The Newspaper World reports that 563 papers have increased their price owing to war conditions. Many of these periodicals are seen in the service of religion, which is supposed to be "without money and without price."

Professional defenders of the Christian superstition are endeavouring to impress people that the War is helping, and not retarding, religion. Referring to the religious opinions of soldiers, Mr. A. K. Yapp, the National Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, made the following remark: "You can't always judge Tommy by his language, and I believe there is more religion in his blasphemy than in the Kaiser's pious utterances." If profanity be a proof of piety, the Young Men's Christian Association had better help in repealing the Blasphemy Laws.

The United States has put an embargo on the export of sulphur. So far, it has not reduced the amount of brimstone in sermons and Sunday-school addresses.

We are not opposed to the celebration of the 400th anniversary of Luther's defiance of the Pope, because we regard the Protestant Reformation as marking one of the earliest stages in the disintegration of the Christian religion, which has been going on more or less steadily ever since. "A Scottish Churchman," however, objects to the proposed celebration on the ground that "Luther's German God is our Devil." But "A Scottish Churchman" forgets, surely, that prior to the outbreak of the War the German God was our British God as well. Was not Luther's martial hymn often sung in our places of worship? Writing as recently as 1908, did not the late Right Rev. Dr. Wilkinson, Bishop of North and Central Europe, hold up the Germans as a people whose Christian piety was of a superior order to our own? Did he not also find the source of Germany's greatness as a world-power in the fact that she had adopted "religious education in all her primary and secondary schools"? "A Scottish Churchman's" judgment is evidently blinded by prejudice and bigotry, as is admitted even by the Christian World, though our contemporary itself suffers more or less from the same affliction.

The Rev. Rhondda Williams relates how a bankrupt fishmonger, whose deficiency was £1,000, excused himself on the plea "that he had been unable to give proper attention to business because of his devotion to theological studies." Such a scoundrel deserves severest castigation; but Mr. Williams is radically wrong when he says that if Paul had been the official receiver he would have condemned his conduct in the most scathing terms. Probably; but then the man could have sheltered behind the apostle's exhortation in Colossians iii. 1-4, and thus break the force of his rule in Romans xii. 11. If a man's mind is fixed upon the things that are above, he is bound to be slothful in relation to the things which are on the earth. A wonderful storehouse of practical contradictions is the Bible, and it would be passing strange if among them all any man failed to find "a present help" in trouble.

The Rev. R. C. Gillie, M.A., of Marylebone Presbyterian Church, London, claimed, in a recent interview, which appears in the Christian World for August 30, that "the general outlook for the Churches is not so discouraging"; that "the Churches show a steadfastness which is surprising," though it is true that "some people have left us since the War, men and women of vague beliefs and sentimental attachments," whom the Church can perhaps "afford to lose." Bear in mind that those are the words of a man of God who is love, of a minister of Christ who died for the ungodly in order to save them. Evidently, Mr. Gillie's heart is empty of that saving love of which his Master's heart is said to be full to overflowing.

How shallow and illusory is Mr. Gillie's optimism. This is what he said:—

> Of course, I do not forget the discouraging fact that Anglican Free Churches alike appeal to only a limited minority of the general population.

If that sentence is not a virtual confession that the Church, in the character of a God-filled institution, is the most dismal failure in history, what on earth is it? Christianity has been at work in this land for fifteen or sixteen hundred years, and yet in this twentieth century it "appeals to only a limited minority of the general population." The wonder of wonders is that, with that undoubted fact staring them in the face, men like Mr. Gillie, have the timerity to affirm that "the general outlook for the Churches is not so discouraging."

Criticizing the Archbishop of Canterbury's attitude on the question of reprisals in war, the Globe indulges in some hard hitting, and concludes: "Stand out of our way and leave us to protect the children your prayers are powerless to save."

For sixty-three years vicar of the City Church of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, the Rev. C. C. Collins has resigned at the age of ninety-one. Interviewed by a London journalist, Mr. Collins said that the resident population of his parish was about 97, and the congregation "pitiably small—mostly caretakers." Such is religion in the heart of the capital of the Empire.

The Daily Telegraph has unearthed some pre-war sermons (June, 1914), of the German Chancellor, Dr. Michaelis, which prove that there is no doubt of his Christianity. In one of these sermons he is reported as saying, in view of the great struggle that lay before the German people:—

> If we go into this fight by ourselves, with our selfish nature, relying on our own strength, we shall suffer shipwreck. There is only possibility, but that is a perfect one. There was One who renounced everything. Who from self-less love gave up His life for others, and Who has told us, "I have given you an example that you should do as I have done to you." That is a mighty struggle which goes on within us. Let it be laid to all who have not fought it out to the end. It needs more courage than all the things of which people think that they demand bravery from us. It needs more courage to place oneself decisively on the side of Jesus, and to vow and render Him unconditional obedience, come what may, than it does to fight one's first Mensur (students' duel), or to confront an excited Parliament, or to approach a refined and noble woman, and ask her to be one's own, or to do any of the other things which are regarded in our life as signs of pluck. All that is nothing in comparison with the decision in our life for Christ with all its consequences. But this course we must attain, and only those who have this courage, and then obediently tread the path which God shows them, are the men of whom God can make use.

Presumably, the Daily Telegraph has some hazy notion that these utterances prove the hypocrisy of Dr. Michaelis. We see in them nothing of the kind. All we see is that Christianity will lend itself to the dominant passion, whether of a man or of a nation. That is one of its greatest evils. Whether one desires to murder a fellow human being or help him, either can be done in the name of Christianity. And this is not hypocrisy. It is evidence only that in matters of conduct there is no more misleading guide possible than Christianity.

A "Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

AT the opening of the fourth year of war circumstances again compel me to invite contributions towards a Freethinker Sustentation Fund.

It has fallen to my lot to control this paper during three of the most difficult years it has ever experienced. During the first year, my chief concern was to guard it against adverse circumstances, such as caused many papers to disappear altogether. The second year brought with it a great and rapid increase in the cost of production. As was stated last year, this extra cost amounted to about £6 per week, but in spite of that, the deficit on the year was only £175. This was quickly made good through the generosity of the paper's readers, and a balance left in hand. As for some years the Freethinker had barely met, by sales, the cost of production, the amount of the deficit indicated a distinct advance.

I was then hoping that affairs had reached their worst, even if no improvement occurred. During the past year, however, there has been a still further all-round rise in cost, the most serious item being that of paper, which now stands at about four times the pre-war figure. The result is that, instead of the deficit being lower than last year, it has been increased to just over £250, which I am seeking to make good by means of a Special Fund.

Two things should be borne in mind in connection with this deficit. First, the increase represents only a portion of the added cost of production during the past year. Part of it has been met by a rising circulation. We are thus advancing in spite of all obstacles. Second, the old Honorarium Fund (which was really a Sustentation Fund) and realized £300 per year, has been dropped since I assumed the Editorship. Thus the call upon the friends of the paper is still less than was necessary in the pre-war period.

I believe that all who appreciate the difficulties of the situation will agree that the deficit is smaller than might have been anticipated. Even to exist in these times is an achievement, and I feel proud of the fact that during the three years of war the Freethinker has maintained both its size and price unchanged. What that means in the shape of worry and watchfulness will be recognized by all who have observed the plans adopted by the whole of the newspaper press. Scores of papers have gone under in the struggle, and there is scarcely a propagandist organ that has not either raised its price or appealed for financial help—some have done both. Thus, so well established a paper as the Clarion has found it necessary to raise a fund of between £2,000 and £3,000, and the Christian Commonwealth has raised nearly £2,000 in addition to doubling the price of the journal. It is possible that the paper shortage may necessitate some economy in the size of the Freethinker in the future, but any alteration will be delayed until the last moment.

With regard to the deficit, it should be stated that the whole of the sum is represented by a debt owing to me. The Freethinker has no reserve capital—nor, for that matter, have I. The modest amount I agreed to take as Editor and contributor has remained unpaid since October last, and this, together with money borrowed on my personal security for the use of the paper, represents the whole of the deficit. Otherwise the Freethinker is free of debt. All demands, including payments to contributors, have been met as they became due. This, I think, is the better way of conducting business.

Of course, the loss on the paper might have been met by a rise in price, say from twopence to threepence. This, had I consulted my personal convenience only, would have saved me a lot of anxiety, and also spared me the unwelcome task of making this appeal. But I thought, and still think, that the interests of the Cause which the Freethinker represents are best served by keeping the price unchanged. So far, this policy has been quite justified by results. The circulation of the Freethinker is to-day larger than it has been for some years, and, I think, it is exerting a wider and deeper influence. Its contents, week after week, show what a large and able staff of writers the paper has at its service; in this direction the Freethinker still maintains its reputation for what its late editor called "fundamental brain work." Newsagents show a greater readiness to display the paper for sale, and the wholesale agents handle it with greater freedom. But for the tremendous increase in the cost of production, the Freethinker would now be paying its way, and a Special Fund unnecessary. When normal conditions return I have hopes of placing the paper on a self-supporting basis. That is the end I set myself when I assumed editorial and financial responsibility, and that ambition will not be lightly surrendered. At any rate, to find the Freethinker in its present position after three years of war is an achievement that carries great promise for the future.

It is only proper to say that the present position of the paper is largely due to the number of its readers who have done gallant service in securing new subscribers. Many have worked with a will in this direction, and I take this opportunity of once more thanking them most heartily for all they have done.

Hard as the fight has been, and is, I am not at all discouraged; quite the contrary. The difficulties have been greater than were anticipated, but they have been met with a success that is striking in view of the prevailing circumstances. It is, therefore, with the utmost confidence in the paper and in the loyalty of its readers, that I am asking the help of all who appreciate the value of the Freethinker to the "best of causes." It has kept the flag flying during these three disastrous years, and has served as a rallying point for Freethinkers at home, and with the Army and Navy in every part of the war area. It has made new friends and many converts; and what it has done in the face of conditions that made many of its friends dubious of its power to survive, is a promise of better things under more favourable circumstances. But the Freethinker has not only survived, it is stronger than ever; and I feel, therefore, it may be safely said that it has a legitimate claim upon all who believe in and appreciate the work it is doing.

Cheques and Postal Orders should be made payable to me, and addressed Editor, Freethinker, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4. Full acknowledgment of all subscriptions received will be made in the Freethinker, the accounts of which are under the supervision of an official accountant.

The first list of subscriptions to date will appear next week, and I have every confidence that it will be one that will give increased confidence to all who have at heart the welfare of the great Cause which this paper represents.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The vicar was away, and the locum tenens, on his arrival in the vestry on the first Sunday, found the organ blower—a regular character—awaiting him.

"Well, what is your exact position here, my man?" asked the clergyman.

"Well, sir," was the reply, "some folk calls me a sextant, some says as I'm a beetle, but the vicar 'e always calls me a virgin."—Raymond Blathwayt, "Through Life and Round the World."

To Correspondents.

J. BURRELL.—Thanks for your nine new readers. These added to your previous recruits makes your record a good one. So far as a difficult task can be made easier by cheerful help, it is being done by friends like yourself. Will attend to the other matter.

G. BEDBOROUGH.—Many thanks for the charmingly bound copies of your booklets. If we say they are a pleasure to the eye, we hope it will not be taken as an implied depreciation of the works themselves. As usual, these are stimulative, and no reader should ask for more.

A. H. FISHER.—The group to which you refer is now quite extinct. Want of funds had something, but not all, to do with it.

VERRES.—The idea is a pretty one, but verse not quite up to standard. Thanks for sending.

H. HIND.—The exhumed prophecy is most probably "fake." Thanks for your trouble in copying and sending.

R. M.—You may be right, but we would stake our head on it that you are absolutely wrong.

H. IRVING.—Have noted your reminder and acted on it.

R. COMPTON.—Thanks for birthday greetings, but how did you know the date? You are wrong, however, in one thing. We have not completed our first half century—not until next year.

J. MCGHEE.—Sorry to have to hold over your reply to "Y. C." until next week.

A. BRENTON.—Many thanks for picture. We quite agree with your estimate of the subject. Curiously, the only unrational figure is the one devoted to religion.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss Vance acknowledges:—Louis Brandes, £2 2s.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Socicty's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4 by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The Pioneer Press is now offering for sale copies of Guyau's Non-Religion of the Future at just under one-fourth of the published price. Marie Jean Guyau was one of the most brilliant of French Freethinkers, and his death, at the early age of 34, robbed the world of a striking personality. He was the author of a number of philanthropic works; his two direct contributions to Freethought being Morality Independent of Obligation or Sanction, translated in 1898, and Non-Religion of the Future in 1897. Both are important works, although the high price of the latter, 17s. net, kept it from a good many who would have liked to possess a copy. It is now being offered at 4s., postage 6d. Those who wish for a copy should write at once.

The Report of the House of Lords Judgment in the Bowman Case is now in the hands of the printers, and will be issued as early as possible. It is a verbatim report of the judgments, and will have as preface a brief history of the case written by Mr. Cohen. The price is not yet fixed, but it will, probably, be one shilling. The price will be kept low in order to ensure as wide a circulation as possible.

The following is part of a letter written "somewhere" in the theatre of war:—

> It is rather refreshing to observe the rebellious spirit prevalent in the bosoms of the youthful officers, and also surprising to see what unanimity there is among people from far removed domiciles.
> Last night in the smoke-room there were two canny Scots in the —— (a Highland regiment); a Rhodesian farmer in the —— Artillery; a three-parts Dutch fellow in the ——; a Portuguese —— going to Central Africa; and myself. The opinion was found to be unanimous that the writing on the wall must have appeared some years ago now, and that the end of the War will find the Churches nearly defunct.
> You would have screamed to hear the Portuguese tackling a padre on board; his main argument appeared to be that seeing the Roman Catholics and Protestants are large enough bodies to include at least a percentage of clever men, the mere fact of them differing so vitally in a religion based on the same book is proof that neither can be correct; and that as the said religion is admittedly based on mysteries, it cannot be logically accepted as a standard of truth. So what was a poor fellow to do but go his own way.
> The old padre nearly burst, and seemed to regret having graciously given the Portuguese (a Roman Catholic) permission to discuss the matter with him. It is funny!

The writer of the above has two brothers officers abroad, and his father has completed a year's service with the Forces. All are readers of the Freethinker.

Members of Newcastle Branch are requested to note a meeting will be held on Sunday at 6.30 in the Collingwood Hall, Clayton Street, to elect officers, etc.

We have received letters replying to articles in our last issue by Mr. T. A. Jackson and "Y. C.," which we are obliged to hold over until next week. Kant said space and time were categories of the understanding. When it comes to finding space for articles and time to deal with all that comes along, we are tempted to use much stronger language.

A correspondence upon "Sabbatarianism" is running in the National Weekly, in which the Freethought position is well sustained by "Pagan" and "Wide-awake," and the other side by "Christian." "Wide-awake" writes on the position of the Bishop of London, and says: "The time has gone by when any sane man can consider any 'message' from so inconsistent a prelate." We wonder if "Christian" will continue the discussion.

This is not an esperantist journal, but we cheerfully pass on the information that one of our readers, Mr. W. Banner, of 16 Spring Street, Paddington, W., is trying to form an esperantist class for the winter. Those of our readers who are interested will take the hint.

A Soliloquy.

WINDS sigh and blow, tides ebb and flow,
Leaves fall and wither;
Life comes and goes, who is there knows
Its whence, or whither?

Yet parsons tell us there's a hell
That endeth never;
Where those who sin, when once they are in,
Will roast for ever.

While they at rest among the blest,
Their bliss eternal;
Ne'er think, nor heed all those who feed
The fire infernal.

And thus they prove that God is love,
A defamation;
'Tis time that they had in their day
A reformation.

Life's problem still remains, and will,
A mystery;
When all is well, and parson's hell
But history.

New Testament Legends for Young Readers.

IV.—DEMONS CONQUERED AND DISCIPLES WON.

THOUSANDS of people stood on the beach of white pebbles, and all were very still and silent as they fixed their eyes upon a fisherman's boat that lay moored on the lake. The voice of Jesus, the preacher, rang out across the water. He sat in the boat and talked of the kingdom. It seemed so different from the solemn Rabbis who sat in pulpits in synagogues.

When the last word was spoken, the peasants, camel-drivers, muleteers, masons, fish-picklers, and the rest, scattered homewards, talking of the new teacher as they went. Then Jesus turned to the man who had politely lent him the seat in the boat.

"Push your boat out, Simon Peter, and drop your nets," he said.

"No good will that be, sir," replied the fisherman. "We set the net all last night and got nothing. But I will do it to oblige you."

Huge was his surprise when the net was so heavy with fresh-water fish—carp, barbel, bolty, etc.—that the net started to burst, and he shouted to his mates in a neighbouring boat to come to his aid. Presently the whole boat was full of fish, and Simon Peter fell on his knees and stammered—

"Oh, my lord, you are too great a man to be in such a humble ship as mine, and I am but a common fellow and a sinner."

"Have no fear," said the preacher, "leave your fish-catching business and follow me. I will teach you to catch men."

Simon Peter, James, and John—three fishers of the Galilean lake—were the preacher's first comrades, and learners, or disciples. They were to learn how to throw demons out of sick and unhappy people, and to teach men the way of the kingdom.

The lessons began at once. A leper, with horrible and discoloured skin, bent in lowly salaam before Jesus, and asked to be cured.

"Be healed," said Jesus; and straightway the leper rose up, fresh, clean, and wholesome; and the Wonder-worker told him to go with a gift of thankfulness to the priests at the Temple. Two birds—sparrows would do—might be the gifts.

Another lesson. Jesus sat in the centre court of a house with a big mob of hearers all about him. All of a sudden a cracking was heard above; the roof seemed to open; hands were seen tearing a hole in the plaster and woodwork; and, amid falling dust, down came a mattress hung by ropes, and on this lay a poor creature with palsied and helpless limbs. His friends had got to the roof by the stairway which rose by one of the walls. Not being able to push through the crowd, this was their singular plan.

"Man," said Jesus, "the sins you have done are pardoned."

"Strange talk!" murmured a group of Pharisees.

The Pharisees were men well-off, well-learned in reading and writing, and mighty and noisy in their prayers to heaven.

"Well," said Jesus, "if you doubt my power to pardon sins, what think you of this?"

He uttered a short, quick command, and the man, a miserable invalid the moment before, leaped up, shouldered his mattress, ropes and all, and strode out with joyful cries; and the place echoed with the people's shouts: "Wondrous! Strange! We never saw the like!"

A new disciple was Levi—a tax-collector; one of those officers who went to houses, and farms, and bazaars, demanding money dues for the Roman Government. Such men met sour and disagreeable looks wherever they went, though, after all, somebody must needs collect the rates and taxes, and these collectors, or "publicans," were often honest fellows, and they never put on airs with noisy praying and pious upturning of the eyes.

Levi made a great feast, and had open house, and scores of people, peasants, camel-drivers, fish-picklers, sweepers, and the rest, swarmed to his tables, and sat in company with Jesus and the three fishers.

"Scandalous!" sneered the Pharisees and gentle-folk. "Fancy this man calling himself a teacher, and he eats and drinks with the riff-raff of the towns and villages."

"Yes, I do," said Jesus. "My business is to lead the riff-raff and sinners to repentance, and to the Kingdom. You good folk—you righteous souls—don't need a healer. Only the sick need a physician."

The gentle-folk somehow felt there was a sting in his quiet words. He was sarcastic.

He appeared quite too free and easy for these smug persons, the Pharisees. It annoyed them very much one Saturday, that is, one Sabbath, when they saw him and his followers crossing a field of corn and gathering wheat-ears, and briskly rubbing them till they worked the grains out, blew the chaff away, and chewed the raw wheat.

Shocking! To go to all this labour on the sacred day, the seventh day, the Lord's day, the day on which respectable Jews would not plough, would not sow, would not reap, would not weave, would not tie knots, would not light fires, would not carry parcels, would not ride horses, would not clap hands, would not bind up a sprained wrist. And now these vulgar cads were eating raw wheat!

On another Sabbath day, when Jesus met a man whose withered hand hung useless at his side, the Pharisees grimly watched.

"Come this way," bade the Wonder-worker, and the man approached, and hundreds of eyes gazed eagerly.

"Now, I put it to you men," said Jesus, "is it right to do a kind act on the Seventh Day? Is it right to save life on the Sabbath?"

Nobody replied.

"Stretch out your hand," commanded the Master of Demons.

The man did so, and a roar of delight rose from the crowd, while the Pharisees hurried away, expressing their disgust at such horrid things being done on the holy day of God.

One night the preacher spent the hours of darkness on a mountain alone in the wilderness of rocks. He was a pioneer, a path-finder, a leader in a new road; and he was lonely, but he was brave. The night was passed in prayer to heaven.

Next day, he invited twelve men to form his band of Apostles, or Missionaries; or, as some would say, Delegates. We have already heard of the three fishers, and the tax-gatherer; others were Andrew, Philip, Bartholomew, Thomas, James (not the fisherman), Simon the Zealot, Judas, and another Judas called Iscariot. This committee of Twelve he chose on the mountain; and then, followed by his Delegates, he walked down the rugged path to the plain. A large company of people had assembled, and many were lame, sick, and feeble-minded.

The Twelve Apostles carefully noted all he did. They hoped soon to throw out the demons of disease and madness as easily as the Master of the Jinn did.

The Master healed every invalid, every cripple, every lunatic, every idiot.

When most of the crowd had gone homeward, his Apostles and many who were glad to hear his teachings formed a circle of listeners, and waited for his words. He looked round upon the audience,—no rich folk were they; they knew what it was to have scant meals; they often suffered bitter sorrows, and wept bitter tears; and they had been scorned and cursed. So he said:—

"Blessings on you poor people; yours is the kingdom. Blessings on you hungry people; you shall have your fill of food. Blessings on you who shed tears; you shall laugh for joy. Blessings on you who are hated for being my comrades. Leap for gladness; you will have reward in heaven. The rich men shall have woe; the bloated men shall be hungry; the laughing men shall cry. But you, my friends, I ask you to love your enemies. If a man strikes one side of your face, turn to him the other. Lend your money, and claim it not back. Heaven will pay you. You shall be children of the Highest One in heaven. Be not hard in judging others. Why make a fuss about a speck in your brother's eye, while your own has a great beam in it? You hypocrites! get rid of your beam before you worry about his mote! Every tree is known by its fruit, good or bad. You are trees. Bear honest and wholesome fruit. Don't gabble 'Lord, Lord' to me. Act right. If a man does true and good deeds, his house stands firm on a rock, and no storm will shake it. But if a man talks, and does not act, his wretched hut is thrown down when the storm comes to test it, and the ruin of it is great."

From such stories it is plain to see that the people of the Gospel age were sufferers from many diseases and troubles, and that they were very ready to believe in men with magical power to conquer the disease demons, worry demons, and weakness demons. Such a man Jesus was supposed to be. Not very much then was known about the human body, the way its organs worked, and how sickness was caused. To-day, we have a science, or exact knowledge, of the human body, and the doctor, the surgeon, and the sanitarian (or health-teacher) are our helpers and healers; and neither they nor we think that demons cause illness or accident. To-day, the Masters of the Jinn are men like Ronald Ross, who found that malaria is caused by mosquitoes, and so helped to trace yellow fever to mosquitoes. Other Masters have found ways to kill off the tse-tse fly which causes the terrible sleeping-sickness of Africa. We get rid of flies and other such troubles, instead of trying to cast out demons.

As to the Pharisees. The Gospel makes very ugly pictures of them, and they remind us of the unpleasant persons in Charles Dickens's novels, whom he calls Chadband and Stiggins. But we learn from the history of the Jews, that some Pharisees were men of noble life and high thought. Such a man was the scribe, or teacher, Hillel, who, on being asked for the meaning of true religion, answered, "Do not do to others that which you would not like done to yourself; this is the whole extent of the Law."

One of the Twelve Apostles, as you saw, was Simon Peter. Some people think his story is a kind of shadow of the story of the Roman God Janus. This God had two faces, one looking east, the other west, as if at the sunrise and sunset, the opening day and the closing day. He had a key in his hand for opening and shutting great doors. In his honour the Romans offered gifts on twelve altars; and they called him the leader, or First God, of the twelve months; hence the first month was named Janus-month, January. He was God of all that travel to and fro on land and sea; and one of his symbols, or signs, was a ship, meaning the passage over waters. Now, in the Gospels, Peter is a ship-master; he is the first of the Twelve Apostles; and Jesus gives him the keys of heaven and earth.[1] Later on, we shall hear of his escape through the open door of a prison.

Our poet Milton, in his beautiful lines to his friend Edward King (Lycidas), pictures Peter, the "Pilot of the Galilean Lake," holding two keys, a golden one to open gates, and an iron one to shut.

F. J. GOULD.

The Rise and Progress of Mental Power.

VI.

DEAF-MUTES who, in the nature of the case, have never heard a word spoken, are yet capable of uttering vocal sounds which, to them, possess a definite meaning. In idiots, also, rudimentary articulation appears to serve their feeble requirements. From normal infants, mammals, and talking birds, various sounds proceed to which they attach a meaning. Harsh tones and menacing gestures are understood by all the higher animals, and when we discover that mammals appreciate the sinister significance of the word "stick," it is apparent that a marked mental advance has been made. In company with the mentally deranged and infants, certain of the birds and mammals grasp the import of words which they are themselves unable to articulate. Doubtless, the appreciation of tones enters into the understanding of words to some extent, but careful tests disclose the fact that words alone convey a distinct meaning to some superior animals. Babes, a few weeks from birth, distinguish the difference between tones and gestures, but the comprehension of words alone does not dawn until the second year.

> A terrier, possessed by Prof. Gerald Yeo, was trained to keep a morsel of food on its snout till it received the verbal signal "Paid for"; and it was of no consequence in what tones these words were uttered. For even if they were introduced in an ordinary stream of conversation, the dog distinguished them, and immediately tossed the food into his mouth. Seeing this, I thought it worth while to try whether the animal would be able to distinguish the words "Paid for" from others presenting a close similarity of sound; and, therefore, while he was expecting the signal, I said, "Pinafore"; the dog gave a start, and very nearly threw the food off his nose; but immediately arrested the movement, evidently perceiving his mistake (Romanes, Mental Evolution in Man, p. 125).

This trial was repeated on various later occasions, and invariably with the same result. A second dog was then taught to perform in a similar way and responded just like the first. Numerous shepherds, sportsmen, gamekeepers, poachers, and others have already furnished, and could further supply most incontestable evidences of the association in the mind of the dog of certain words with certain objects or acts. Sally, the chimpanzee in Regent's Park, learnt from her keeper not merely the meaning of words and phrases but of short sentences as well.

Were the lower creatures capable of speech, it is a fair inference that they would employ simple words to signify simple ideas. Clearly, there is no greater mental capacity requisite to utter the word "open" than is necessary to cause a cat to bump a window, scratch at a door, or rattle a handle when desiring admission. Two of these animals constantly under the writer's observation perform all these acts without receiving any instruction whatever.

The power of articulation exists in several birds, but clever as these animals are, their mental capacities are poor when compared with those of the higher mammalia. Were these animals also in possession of the anatomical structures essential to articulation, they would completely eclipse the birds. Yet, although on a lower mental level than monkeys, dogs, elephants, etc., birds, unquestionably, do associate certain words with certain persons or things. It is utterly futile to allege the contrary. The late Sir Samuel Wilks, F.R.S., when referring to a parrot of his own, stated :—

> If the servants enter the room Poll will be ready with one of their expressions, and in their own tone of voice. It is clear that there is a close association in the bird's mind between certain phrases and certain persons or objects, for their presence or voice at once suggests some special word. For instance, my coachman, when coming for orders, has so often been told half-past two, that no sooner does he come to the door than Poll exclaims "Half-past two."……Some noises that she utters have been obtained from the objects themselves, as that of a cork screw at the sight of a bottle of wine……The passage of a servant down the hall to open the front door suggests a noise of moving hinges, followed by a loud whistle for a cab.

To what degree the language of signs would have developed is an open question had not superior means of communication been available. But the sense of hearing, even more advantageous in some respects than the sense of sight, admirably responded to vocal display. Simple gestures are so realistic that they are everywhere understood, but as ideas grow more abstract, the signs essential to their expression tend to assume an arbitrary and conventionalized form. It is true that elaborated signs may convey with even greater rapidity than spoken language our ideas on familiar topics, but only with the sacrifice of the simple signs universally understood.

Gesture language likewise labours under the grave disadvantage of being cumbersome, as well as possessing little utility in aiding us in the conception and expression of abstract ideas. Uttered words are not necessarily restricted to concrete things; they also serve to signalize our concepts of abstractions of whatever order that have been evolved from our percepts and recepts of concrete bodies. Therefore, while they render excellent service in conveying information of our ordinary experiences, gestures are entirely eclipsed by the power of the word in the realms of abstract thought. It would, for example, prove practically impossible to translate into sign language a paragraph of Mansel or Spinoza.

For these and other important reasons the voice has emerged the victor in the evolution of language. As Prof. Whitney, the eminent philologist points out, this triumph of speech is a case of the survival of the fittest :—

> The advantages of the voice are numerous and obvious. There is first its economy, as employing a mechanism that is available for little else, and leaving free for other purposes those indispensable instruments, the hands.

Again, the various tones of the voice can be easily heard at a distance at which gestures become indistinct. Vocal utterance is not hindered by intervening objects, while it permits the eyes as well as the hands of the speaker full liberty to occupy themselves in other ways. It is as useful in the dark as in the day, and a call or shout will command attention where all other devices prove unsuccessful.

Curiously enough, inquiry revealed the circumstance that uneducated deaf-mutes think in pictures only. Abstract ideas seem to them impossible, and Romanes was unable to discover a single deaf-mute who possessed any notions of the supernatural before such conceptions were conveyed to him by means of signs. Persistently proclaimed as intuitive by theologians, it seems singular that the religious sense should be entirely absent in deaf-mutes born in civilized society, and that, prior to education, it is difficult to make them realize the religious fancies their friends and relatives endeavour to impart. "For instance," writes Romanes, > the Rev. S. Smith tells me that one of his pupils, previous to education, supposed the Bible to have been printed by a printing press in the sky, which was worked by printers of enormous strength—this being the only interpretation the deaf-mute could assign to the gestures whereby his parents had sought to make him understand that they believed the Bible to contain a revelation from a God of power who lives in heaven. Similarly, Mr. Graham Bell informs me of another, though similar case, in which the deaf-mute supposed the object of going to church to be that of doing obeisance to the clergy.

Much as an excited man betrays by his brogue or foreign accent his alien origin, so do the more impulsive races retain various of those primitive gestures no longer requisite for the expression of their thoughts. For although grimaces, shrugs, and gestures are now unnecessary to the possessors of a well-developed language, they continue to employ the signs so essential to our children, and to the uncivilized in making known their desires. These and other facts plainly indicate the truth that all tongues, even the most elaborated, have arisen from primitive languages of tone and gesture.

A long and largely barren controversy has raged over the problem of self-consciousness. It is conceded that the human infant and the lower animals not only realize the objective existence of bodies around them, but also realize their relations one to another. But it is sometimes objected that, although brutes are fully conscious of the objects which comprise surrounding nature, they entirely lack that individual or self-consciousness ever present in the human race. If this point be granted, it is essential to the evolutionist to show that man's peculiar self-awareness is derived from the less-developed consciousness of animals.

Considerable insight concerning this problem may be obtained through a discriminating study of the more intelligent animals, while, in the human child, we possess cogent evidence of the transition from the one stage of mental progress to the other. In early infancy the child is much less developed mentally than numerous adult animal forms.

The self-conscious condition has its basis in animals so organized that they are compelled to realize that all the various organs which constitute their bodies form a common whole. All such a creature's sensations of pleasure and pain, it perceptually and receptually relates to its own structure. The animal easily distinguishes its own body and the parts that compose it from foreign objects. It learns to seek satisfactory conditions, and to shun unsatisfactory conditions of life. These and various other causes serve to provide the firm basis of a unified feeling of individual existence. Moreover, higher animals are conscious of the mental states of other organisms, as they conclusively prove by their complex conduct when at play, in difficulty and danger, or when by means of wiles and stratagems they circumvent or overthrow their foes or competitors in the conflict of existence.

National Secular Society.

REPORT OF EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON AUGUST 30.

The President, Mr. C. Cohen, in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Baker, Brandes, Eager, Leat, Neate, Neary, Palmer, Quinton, Roger, Samuels, Thurlow, and Wood; Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, Mrs. Rolfe, and the Secretary.

Minutes of the last meeting read and confirmed. Monthly cash statement presented and adopted.

New members were received for Battersea, Manchester, Regent's Park, and Swansea Branches, and the Parent Society.

An application for the formation of a new Branch at Battersea was received, and, the Executive's requirements having been fulfilled, permission was granted.

The Secretary reported that the Protest Committee against the Prohibition of Sales of Literature in L.C.C. Parks had now to meet five summonses issued against sellers of literature, three of these being against members of the N.S.S. Two summonses had been adjourned pending the hearing of the mandamus in the High Court, and the remainder were yet to be heard. In the meantime, the Committee were appealing urgently for funds to carry on the defence.

The difficulty of securing halls for winter meetings in London and the suburbs was discussed, and as all arrangements for a winter campaign were at a deadlock until this could be somewhat overcome, the members present undertook to make local inquiries.

Resolution XII. re an interim conference, passed at the Annual Conference on Whit-Sunday, was then dealt with, and it was finally agreed that as the present unprecedented circumstances made it imperative that it should be held in London, it should take place on October 28, to be followed by a public meeting in the evening.

The Secretary reported receipt of a grant of £10 from Mr. Cohen's Propaganda Fund.

Various items of routine business were disposed of and the meeting closed.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Obituary.

Mr. Robert and Mrs. Mary Lewins, who have for many years been earnest members of the Newcastle Branch of the N.S.S., will have in readers of the Freethinker many sympathetic friends in their great sorrow, owing to the sad loss of their dear son, Lance-Corporal George S. Lewins, aged nineteen years, who died in France from wounds received in action on August 25. A quiet, unassuming youth with a wide knowledge of books, and one of whom much was hoped. One more innocent victim robbed of the happiness of a useful life.

J. G. B.

It is with regret I have to record the death, on August 30 of Thomas Cooke, of Hyde. He had reached his seventy-third year. Mr. Cooke was an old Freethinker of thirty-five years standing. His politics were advanced. He was an anti-vaccinationist of a most pronounced type. His household goods had often been taken by the authorities to pay fines. He was also a strong temperance advocate, being a life teetotaler, and his father and grandfather were also temperance men—the three between them accounting for considerably more than one hundred years of advocacy. A Secular Service was held at the Manchester Crematorium on Monday last, whither his remains were conveyed, at which a number of friends attended, the organ being brought into use in the course of the ceremony.

T. SANDERS.

The poor are at times curiously callous. I well remember once saying good-bye to a dying man. He was as conscious as I am now at the present moment. As I let go of his hand, his old wife said quite casually: "What day'll suit you for the funeral, sir?"

"Ain't she in a 'urry, sir?" whispered the poor fellow, with a smile.—Raymond Blathwayt, "Through Life and Round the World."

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.
> Name.....
> Address.....
> Occupation .....
> Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Views and Opinions.

Crusading at Woolwich.

From a newspaper paragraph we learn that Woolwich is to be made the theatre of a special spiritual crusade. War work has brought a large number of people—male and female—into the Woolwich area, and the crusade is being organized under the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury and a number of bishops, together with the help of visitors, "Pilgrims of Prayer," etc. Subscriptions are, of course, invited, the purpose of the crusade being "to raise the whole moral tone of the social and industrial life as a first step in the reconstruction of modern conditions, in the belief that such reconstruction can only be effectively achieved on a Christian foundation." What exactly is meant by a Christian foundation is not stated, but judging from experience it will resolve itself into the acceptance of certain doctrines which will have about as much influence in improving social conditions as a knowledge of astronomy has in altering the price of margarine. And if the clergymen engaged in this crusade really believe that it will lead to a reconstruction of social conditions, one can only admire their simplicity. If they believe it! One suspects the expression is a mere formula, and that the real purpose of the crusade is, as usual, to "keep the people in order."

A One-sided Conversion.

Now we do not deny that if the "whole moral tone" of the people of Woolwich could be raised it would be a good thing. Let us raise the moral tone of everybody, everywhere, and as soon as possible. What puzzles us is why the efforts of the clergy are restricted to Woolwich or Whitechapel. Why not give Park Lane or Mayfair a chance of salvation? Why not raise the whole moral tone of people in these districts? Why not initiate a crusade to raise the moral tone of those who, even during a time of war, cannot resist the opportunity of plundering the community in all directions? Why is it assumed that these missions are only necessary to the working-class? Or, if the assumption is justifiable, and the absence of a settled income and a good house really make a difference of "moral tone," would it not seem that the right way to go to work to remedy the matter is not to organize a "spiritual crusade," but to see that settled incomes and good homes are commoner? Could any body of clergymen be found who would storm Mayfair with the avowed object of raising the "moral tone" of its inhabitants? We doubt it. And imagine the indignation that would be evoked if it were attempted, or even suggested! Think of what would happen if the homes of the "upper classes" were entered, in the way that the homes of the "lower classes" are invaded, by district visitors and the like, with the avowed purpose of improving their moral tone? No, it is the working-class that are subject to this kind of thing. And while we do not marvel at the policy, we do marvel that the working-class (we stick to the conventional phraseology) do not more generally resent the impertinence of the pose and the insult of the inquisition. And if the insult is not more generally recognized by both the working-class and the clergy, we can only attribute this to the inherited servility of the one and to the ingrained arrogance of the other. At any rate, we suggest to the working-people in the Woolwich area that as an indication that they are not lacking in self-respect, they give these crusaders their marching orders in plain set terms. The man who submits to this kind of impertinent patronage may indicate his need for improvement, but he quite demonstrates the impossibility of his achieving it.

Conversion with a Purpose.

But it would be a mistake to imagine that these "spiritual crusades" were without some definite purpose, even though many engaged in it are blind to its real object. These missions to the "masses" serve a dual purpose. They salve the conscience of the "upper class"; they hold the lower class in check, and keep them properly thankful for the inestimable blessings of a "Christian society." The past two centuries have seen a gradual shifting of the obligation of the landed classes on to the back of the nation at large. There has been during the last hundred and fifty years the development of a commercial system that has gone far towards destroying all human connection between employer and employed, and of a financial system that recognizes no obligation save keeping within the letter of a law largely made in its own interests. Innumerable social and economic evils have developed, and in not a single instance has Christianity offered any opposition to their growth. Neither landowner, nor manufacturer, nor financier has ever found a fervent profession of Christianity inconsistent with an exaction of all that commercial and financial rules permitted. The rich have spent freely on "the Lord," as our churches and missions show, but they have wrung all they could from the labourer. One hundred years ago, the factory-owner who was keeping children of six years of age at work in his mills, was most anxious they should be taught the Catechism and the truths of Christianity. To-day our governing classes are equally zealous in the same direction. An anodyne for the conscience of one class, a narcotic for the potential activities of another class. In neither direction can Christianity be excelled. A slave code is naturally beloved by the slaveowner; and if the slave comes to hug his chains, that, too, is no new phenomenon in the history of the world.

The First Step.

Think of it! The Bishops of Southwark, London, Oxford, Rochester, Lichfield, Edinburgh, Woolwich, Kingston, Kensington, and Dover, headed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and followed by a number of the minor clergy, all organized to raise the moral tone of Woolwich! What a desperate place Woolwich must be! And how much better will it be when the crusade is all over? Will they say anything about the real problems that affect Woolwich? We are afraid not. They will talk of the beauty of the religious life, and the greatness of Christianity in keeping so many men and women engaged in making guns and shells; but will they say anything of the real questions that lie at the root of social reorganization? We know they will not do so, because they are not there to do so. They are there to keep the people in order. Their work is to perpetuate the Christian ideal of a society formed of a multitude dependent for existence upon the charity or interested philanthropy of a few. We are not, we repeat, surprised at these missions to the working classes; we are only saddened that so many thousands lack the courage and foresight to resent the insult, and send these missioning busybodies packing. And we are quite certain that until the working classes develop enough self-respect to do this, they will not have taken the first solid step towards genuine social reform.

The Slave Creed.

In sober truth, Christianity has always lived by mental, moral, and political pauperization. Independence of mind and character it neither desired nor permitted—save under protest. It preached submission and humility to the poor, it encouraged an interested almsgiving with the rich, and so bred servility on the one side and supercilious self-righteousness on the other. To suffer in silence was a virtue, to revolt against established authority a sin. The late Czar in Russia, the Kaiser in Germany, the tyrant everywhere, has found it one of his most useful allies. Under its shadow the civic independence of the Roman world withered and died. It did teach the spiritual equality of men before God, but it emphasized the social inequality of men on earth as the condition of its realization. Habits engendered by so many generations of growth, and customs sanctified by centuries of rule, are not discarded or destroyed in a day. It is never the moral condition of such large numbers of our population that surprise us so much as their patience and their submission. It is really wonderful that so many should be content under prevailing conditions, but it would be more wonderful still if, with a religion such as Christianity enthroned for so many centuries, social conditions were better than they are.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

MISSIONARIES.

Again, I have to put on record that I have absolutely no sympathy with missionaries. I cannot see the necessity for missions to the heathen; as yet, there should be no crumbs to fall from the children's table, while the children of Europe are in such a shameful state, as many of them are, far worse than any heathen I have ever seen in Africa.—Mary Gaunt, "Alone in West Africa."

Humanism Caricatured.

THE Rev. Father Figgis is a distinguished member of the Catholic party in the Church of England, and he exhibits outstanding peculiarities. He is at once broad and narrow, liberal and conservative, a man of the world, and an ardent ecclesiastic. As preacher he is plain-spoken, powerful, and popular, and in almost every discourse his characteristics are in full evidence. During the month of August he delivered four sermons, under the general title of "Hopes for English Religion," at Grosvenor Chapel, Mayfair, which were published weekly in the Church Times. In the issue for August 31 the last appeared, in which Father Figgis's peculiarities are all seen in the highest degree of manifestation. The subject is Humanism, the treatment of which is both inaccurate and absurd. Basing his address upon words attributed to the Gospel Jesus, namely, "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly" (John x. 10), Father Figgis opens thus:—

> The most dangerous notion that modern Christianity has to combat is that it means a shrinking from life, that by its moral system it closes the avenues of human experience, and that in that it is wedded to the tradition which starves the mind.

As a matter of fact, Christianity itself is rooted and grounded in that "most dangerous notion," and has, of course, never even attempted to combat it. On the contrary, it has always done its utmost to encourage and promote it. The Gospel Jesus lays it down as a fundamental principle that no man can be his disciple without hating "his own father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also" (Luke xiv. 26). St. Paul expresses the same sentiment thus: "Set your mind on the things that are above, not on the things that are upon the earth" (Col. iii. 2). St. John, also, commits himself to the same ascetic rule: "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him" (1 John ii. 15). Now that New Testament disparagement of the world and its life has been strictly insisted upon by the Church in all periods of its history. The assertion that "the Church is the true home of the soul and the body" is utterly false. Lecky informs us that for many centuries the orthodox saints "all regarded the body as an unmingled evil, its passions and its beauty as the most deadly of temptations" (The Rise and Influence of Rationalism in Europe, vol. i., p. 230).

Father Figgis claims that "in the Christian Church each man in the degree and measure of his capacity can have not less but more of the love of beauty as shown in art, letters, and music"; but is he not aware that from the sixth century to the twelfth, "the ascetic ideal of ugliness was most supreme in art?" Has he forgotten how terribly hideous Roman mosaics were during that long period, and that the love of beauty was practically asleep in Christendom until it was gradually reawakened and enthroned by the revival of learning? Christianity, as such, has never been the friend of art for its own sake. Indeed, those who were children fifty and sixty years ago remember well how sharply they were rebuked whenever they displayed in looks and speech any keen enjoyment of beautiful things. The conclusion from which there is no honourable escape is that it was as the result of the secularization of art that beauty began to regain the position it had occupied in Greek and Roman art. More than that, as Lecky well points out, "the sense of beauty gradually encroached upon and absorbed the feeling of reverence," which was "a form of religious decay very far from being confined to the history of art" (Ibid., vol. i., p. 260).

The same thing is true of the love of beauty as shown in letters. The Church has always frowned upon what it called profane literature. Mommsen assures us that "it is a mistaken opinion that antiquity was materially inferior to our own times in the general diffusion of elementary attainments. Even among the lower classes and slaves there was considerable knowledge of reading, writing, and counting; in the case of a slave steward, for instance, Cato, following the example of Mago, takes for granted the ability to read and write" (The History of Rome, vol. ii., p. 391). But so soon as Christianity became the official religion of the Roman Empire, a blow was dealt to education from which it has not yet fully recovered. Within a century all the Pagan schools were closed, and both clergy and laity sank into a state of almost total illiteracy. It is well known how Theodosius II. put a stop to all public lecturing by men of learning, and with what ferocity Justinian burned Pagan books, imprisoned and tortured Pagan professors, and plundered and suppressed the schools of Athens which had been in existence for nine hundred years. Even in the fifteenth century enthusiasts for classical studies were denounced as Pagans. Is it not on record that Pope Gregory the Great showed his hatred of everything that bore the stamp of Paganism by attacking the temples and mutilating the statues of Rome, by anathematizing classical poets and philosophers, by reducing to ashes the Palatine library. Throughout the Middle Ages science was under ecclesiastical ban, and scientists were imprisoned, tortured, and, in cases, put to death. Father Figgis is, doubtless, a lover of beauty, as shown in letters, but he is radically mistaken when he declares that Christianity either produces or sanctions the purest literary culture. He cannot be ignorant of the fact that the chief fault of Leo X. was, not that he disregarded the moral law, or indulged in vulgar vices, but that he was a man of the world devoted to the pleasures of the chase, with a passion for amusements, and a lively interest in classical art and literature, and that St. Bernard is held in highest esteem because he despised the world and lived alone for heaven. Yes, it is true that there is a gulf between the Church and culture even to-day, and there is no way of getting rid of this gulf except at the expense of completely changing the character of the Church.

Curiously enough, Father Figgis has the hardihood to affirm that religion and culture ministered to the whole life of the people "in the great age of the thirteenth century." He says:—

> Bishop Creighton was right in saying that the greatest age yet known was the thirteenth century. There we find the high water-mark of achievement in the greatest Gothic, like the Sainte Chapelle and all the subsidiaries. Poetry never surpassed the Divine Comedy of Dante; and the intellectual activity of the universities of those days put ours to shame, and it was not the possession merely of a class. Every part of life was claimed for God.

It must be admitted that in some respects the thirteenth century was a truly great age. Father Figgis mentions three aspects of its greatness, namely, architecture, poetry, and scholarship. It is easy, he says, to sneer at its barbarism; but we must not forget that it was then the beautiful church in Paris known as Sainte Chapelle was built, and Dante's famous poem composed. It is to this age, too, that we owe the magnificent cathedrals of Amiens and Chartres, and it was during this century that the wonderful preachers, St. Francis, St. Antony, and St. Dominic arose. It was in truth an age of many saints; but it was not an age of moral elevation and social purity. Cotter Morison describes it as "an age of violence, fraud, and impurity, such as can hardly be conceived now" (The Service of Man, p. 64). Has Father Figgis never read Archbishop Rigaud's Regestrum Visitationum, which covers the years 1248 to 1269, Cardinal Peter Damiani's Liber Gomorheanus, or even Dean Milman's History of Latin Christianity? If he has not, he is guilty of trifling with his subject and of grossly insulting his congregation; but if he has, it is difficult to believe in his honesty. Morally and socially, the thirteenth century was one of the lowest and worst ages known to us. Rigaud and Amiani portray it in the darkest colours. We learn from Pope Honorius III. that the Scotch clergy were addicted to "shameless licentiousness"; and we also read that a ship sailed from pious France carrying three hundred prostitutes for the French soldiers who were fighting for the restoration of the Holy Sepulchre from the Saracens.

With such facts before us, it is nothing but sheer mockery to assert that Christianity is "the sanction of Humanism in its best sense." It is well known that modern Humanism is a system of thinking in which, as J. A. Symonds observes, the study of man, in the totality of his being, is made central and dominant, and that it began to manifest itself as a determined revolt against the scholasticism, or metaphysical theology, of the Middle Ages. In Italy, it very nearly supplanted Christianity altogether. For upwards of seventy years the Christian religion was of very little account, some eminent ecclesiastics going the length of mocking at it, and treating Christ as a profitable myth, as Leo X. is said to have done. In Italy, however, Humanism, as a movement, had exhausted itself before the end of the first half of the sixteenth century. The truth is that Christianity and Humanism cannot exist and prosper together, and that in proportion as the one flourishes the other of necessity languishes. Father Figgis, for all his profession to the contrary, is not a Humanist. He holds the view that it is not worth while to live, to seek after truth, or to go on "with laborious toil unless we believe ourselves to have permanent value," or unless "we think we are immortal beings." We maintain, on the contrary, that virtue, morality, or social service is not dependent for its value upon the duration of individual existence. Though the individual's span of life may be but short, the race endures. Personally we are mortal, but whatever service we render our fellow-beings is immortal; and surely it is worth while to do our utmost to improve the race of which we are members, though the night may soon close in upon us and put an end to our existence. Humanism does not include the hope of immortality, which is nothing but a perversion of the natural love of life.

A Living Master of Literature.

> In our fat England the gardener, Time, is playing all sorts of delicate freaks in the hues and traceries of the flower of life, and shall we not note them.—George Meredith.

Among modern English writers whose fame would seem to be assured, Mr. Thomas Hardy occupies the foremost place, and it is pleasant to reflect that he is an "intellectual." In his works there is the welcome brilliancy and spirit of the modern school united with lasting elements of excellence. The precise place Mr. Hardy will ultimately occupy among the Olympians we cannot venture to anticipate the judgment of Time by deciding. But that he has gained a true and lasting success, the magnificent works he has given us bear very sufficient testimony. Mr. Hardy has won his present enviable position after years of labour. His first published novel, Desperate Remedies, bears date as far back as the "seventies" of the last century. Since that time, his reputation has been steadily on the increase, until at the present he is paying the penalty of popularity in the attacks of a herd of imitators.

From Far from the Madding Crowd to Jude the Obscure—what a splendid range of novels. The characters, too, from Bathsheba to Sue Bridehead, seem taken from real life. The heroine, as in Two on a Tower, who wooes a lover younger than herself, is frequent in these novels and in real experience. She is almost ignored by the circulating library writers, whose many books proclaim their industry rather than their ability. The women in Mr. Hardy's pages are not invariably charming, but they are entirely feminine, and their moods and whims are depicted by a master-hand. In his knowledge of "the concrete Unknowable," he is as wide and as true as Shakespeare; as modern as Meredith. He is no less successful with his male characters; witness Gabriel Oak in Far from the Madding Crowd, Dr. Fitzpiers in The Woodlanders, Michael Henchard in The Mayor of Casterbridge, Angel Clare in Tess, or the unfortunate hero in Jude the Obscure.

When, like many others, one knew Mr. Hardy's novels without knowing the Wessex peasantry, the type seemed exaggerated; but a sojourn in the West Country redeems them from the reproach of caricature. Closer knowledge reveals his photographic power of reproducing life, for Mr. Hardy writes of these sons and daughters of the soil without sentiment, and, rarer still, without patronage; with the manlier tone of kinship with the least of these that, whined as it may be by specious hypocrites, is yet the noblest truth of our common life.

More than that, Mr. Hardy has sown broadcast over his work the most delightful, ironical humour. Not one of his rustics, of his working-class folk, but has a special originality, a native pleasantry—jovial or sly—and a cast of drollery. Few novelists have strewed over their work such abundant irony. He is, indeed, a master of the lash—as fertile as Heine, as pitiless as Gibbon, as acidulated as Renan.

Mr. Hardy has been called pessimist, but there is no lack of comedy in his novels. The Hand of Ethelberta, that most whimsical story, is as full of wondrous comedy as an egg is full of meat. The Laodicean is somewhat more eccentric. In each a far-fetched idea is worked out with earnestness, and in the true spirit of the highest comedy. Far from the Madding Crowd, written in his sunniest mood, is still his most popular work. From the opening description of Gabriel Oak's smile to the ringing down of the curtain, it is a joy to anyone who possesses taste and perception enough to discriminate between a Molieresque humour and a riotous Charlie Chaplin farce.

One can hardly recall a modern writer who cares less for poetic justice and virtue rewarded. Nemesis, indeed, dogs the guilty in his novels, as in the immortal Greek tragedies. As his characters fulfil their doom, they drag the innocent to misery with them, as though they were actual people in real life. In The Woodlanders, Tess, and Jude the Obscure tragedies "too deep for tears" grow out of trivial courses, true to the course of mundane things. Life's Little Ironies, a volume of short stories, as perfect as anything of Daudet or Maupassant, revealing some of the most delicate and faultless work of this great artist, is full of the same lesson.

Ordinary life attracts him. His favourite heroes are farmers, artisans, labourers, and middle-class characters. From these externally prosaic existences, this great magician makes us behold the eternal comedy and tragedy of the human heart. We meet in his pages once more the failure of will, the calculations of egoism, pride, coquetry, passion, hatred, love, all our foibles, all our littleness, and all our errors. Small wonder that the smile on his face is often near tears.

The constant value in fiction is the manifestation of human nature. Viewed from this point of view, Mr. Hardy's work stands fair and full above that of all contemporary literature. What shapes arise as you recall it! Not sawdust dolls, not shadows, but full-blooded creations, moving in a living world, instinct with the fire of life. Where in all contemporary fiction is there nobler work than the more poignant scenes in Tess, or that other showing the dying Jude and the choristers, or the quiet figure of the bereaved girl in the closing scene of The Woodlanders, as wonderful in its way as Millet's picture of "The Angelus." In these is struck the consummate tragic note, as in the pages of Æschylus and our own Shakespeare. They wring the heart as keenly as actual, individual experience. For they are life sublimed by passing through an imagination of singular capacity and a nature of uncommon force.

The attentive reader cannot fail to notice the essential Secularism embedded in these admirable novels and stories. Even in the earlier books, amid their picturesque colour, their delightful atmosphere, their delicious pastoral scents and sounds, we find a frank Paganism. As the author advances in reputation and grows in intellectual power, the note deepens, until, in Tess, it grows into a cry of defiance, and, finally, in Jude the Obscure, a great sob of pain. Jude is a masterpiece among masterpieces. It is a noble and significant work, worthy in every way of the greatest living English novelist. It is an arraignment of Providence, and as we read we recall the biting words of the blinded Gloster in the greatest of all tragedies:—

> As flies to wanton boys are we to the gods:
> They kill us for their sport.

It is a further proof of Mr. Hardy's genius that he has achieved success in poetry no less than in prose, and as he gets older he turns more and more readily to the Muses, and writes with all the zest and enthusiasm of a young poet beginning his career instead of a veteran who has enriched the literature of Europe with masterpieces for two generations. To open The Dynasts is to be confronted with a book of singular dramatic power, and one full of the pure stuff of poetry. Another volume of verse, Satires of Circumstances, Lyrics and Reveries, shows his keen vision and understanding. Take, for example, that fine and imaginative poem, "God's Funeral." The author pictures a slow procession moving across a plain at twilight, and bearing a strange form. He listens to the lament of the mourners for the being they have themselves created, and whom they cannot any longer keep alive:—

> Framing him jealous, fierce, at first,
> We gave him justice as the ages rolled.
> Will to bless those by circumstance accurst,
> And long suffering and mercies manifold.

"Sadlier than those who wept in Babylon" follow the mourners, and some of them refuse to believe that all is over; and "dazed and puzzled 'twixt the gleam and gloom," the scene closes. It is a daring piece of work, comparable to Heine's vision of a dying God having the last sacraments of the Church administered to him, albeit there is none of the terrible irony of the Continental poet.

Contemporary literature is so sugary, so full of romantic imaginings, that such writing brings a sense of largeness; a reminder of the great winds and waters and wide horizons of the West Country, where men and women know how to live and how to die, not submissively but fiercely. Modern drawing-room renders are ill-prepared for Mr. Hardy's virile verse, and primly straighten themselves as his muse passes. But others there are who perceive the distinction conferred on literature by the writings of a bright and particular genius. Mr. Hardy's advice to us is to face the facts of life and to trust humanity:—

> The fact of life with dependence placed
> On the human heart's resource alone,
> In brotherhood bonded close, and graced
> With loving-kindness fully blown,
> And visioned help unsought, unknown.

Not to know and to exult in Mr. Hardy's finest work is to be dead to literature, or ignorant of the great effects of modern English speech. It is impossible to read his pages without feeling ourselves won by his intense sympathy, which covers everything as the arch of heaven. He has enlarged our ideas of life and the world. We feel, as we put his books back in their places, that we are more at peace with ourselves, calmer in face of the problems of destiny. And not for an instant does he cease to be an artist. By his genius he had added a wondrous chamber to the house beautiful of art.

When we are banished from the earthly body, are we to join the wordy rabble which speaks by the mouth or the pen of the mediums? These wild utterances do not seem as a rule like revelations of the secrets of the prison-house, but rather like gibberings from a lunatic asylum, peopled by inmates of vulgar behaviour and the lowest morals; creatures that lie and cheat, give false names and unverifiable addresses. But the fact that things are unpleasant is no evidence that they are untrue; besides in some cases the "personalities" talk very good sense, quote Plotinus, and write really charming poetry. So much depends on whose ghost it is; but still more, on whose lips or hands it is by which it communicates. That is the main difficulty about the spirit hypothesis; the unmistakable colour which the communications get through the medium. The late Mr. Frederick Myers cites Homer and Plato in the original through Mrs. Verrall, who is a lecturer at Cambridge; through Mrs. Holland, whose culture is not classical, he quotes nothing more abstruse than Tennyson and Rossetti; whereas, through Mrs. Piper, the postmaster's wife, he can only ejaculate bluntly, "Browning."—The "Times" Literary Supplement, July 9, 1908.

It should be stated that Sir Oliver Lodge's son Raymond was killed in the trenches at the Front on September 14, 1915, a circumstance that I am quite sure every Freethinker wholeheartedly deplores. Everyone who came in contact with Raymond testifies to his sterling qualities. His letters home reveal a lovable and charming personality, which is reflected in the portrait given in the book. The heart aches to realize that this fine young fellow, carefully educated, trained, and cultured to perfection, in the morning of life, should be thus, in a moment, shattered and broken, cast as rubbish to the void, in this savage and brutish War.

On August 8, 1915, a few weeks before Raymond's death, a Miss Robbins was having a sitting with Mrs. Piper, then in America, when a message was received from the spirit of Myers, communicated to Mrs. Piper by the spirit of Richard Hodgson. Miss Alta Piper (Mrs. Piper's daughter) sent the message on to Sir Oliver Lodge. It runs as follows:—

> Hodgson: "Now, Lodge, while we are not here as of old, i.e., not quite, we are here enough to take and give messages. Myers says you take the part of the poet, and he will act as Faunus. Faunus!"
> Miss Robbins: "Faunus?"
> Hodgson: "Yes, Myers. Protect. He (Lodge) will understand.
> "What have you to say, Lodge? Good work. Ask Verrall, she will also understand. Arthur says so." [This "Arthur" means Dr. Arthur Verrall, the deceased husband of Mrs. Verrall.]
> Miss Robbins: "Do you mean Arthur Tennyson?"
> Hodgson: "No. Myers knows. So does ——. You got mixed (to Miss R.). But Myers is straight about poet and Faunus."[1]

Sir Oliver Lodge promptly communicated the message to Mrs. Verrall, as the spirits advised. Mrs. Verrall referred him to Horace's Ode (Carm., ii., xvii., 27-30), where Horace describes himself as nearly killed by a falling tree, the impending blow being lightened by Faunus, the guardian of the poets. "Sir Oliver, naturally enough, could not make head or tail of the message, but was inclined to think that it referred to some possibly approaching financial loss to himself which Myers might propose to avert—an instance of, at any rate, the 'futility' of spiritualistic messages or warnings."[2]

Sir Oliver did not connect the message with Raymond until after his death in action on September 14, 1915. He then wrote to the Rev. M. A. Bayfield about the matter, complaining that Myers "had not been able to ward off the blow." This clerical gentleman rose to the occasion, and interpreted the oracle as follows (it is astonishing how many different interpretations these spirit messages may be made to assume; the spirits seem to make a point of being as vague and ambiguous as possible). The Rev. Bayfield explains that the "lightening of the blow" referred, not to Raymond, but to Sir Oliver himself, and that the "warning" was intended to "protect" Sir Oliver from being overwhelmed by the news of the death of his son. Major Cook observes:—

> This somewhat far-fetched interpretation Sir Oliver accepts as final and convincing. It probably explains in great measure Sir Oliver's acceptance, on equally slight grounds, of all the other "evidences" regarding Raymond's "communications" to him and to his family which followed.
> To the writer, at any rate, the following explanation of the "message" appears at least equally probable and, indeed, in all the circumstances of the case, at any rate less far-fetched, than that of the Rev. Bayfield:
> Mrs. Piper being, through her daughter, Miss Alta, in frequent correspondence with Sir Oliver, may well have been, and in all probability (as indicated above) was, aware that he had a son at the front, like many other people, with several sons, at the time in England. The "message," if it means anything at all, much more closely resembles an intimation of (and a counting by Mrs. Piper on) the extreme probability that this son of Sir Oliver's at the front would be wounded, but, through the spirit-intervention of Myers, like Horace the Poet, not killed.[3]

Major Cook further points out that Raymond Lodge was born in the year of Mrs. Piper's first visit to England, in 1889; and being a boy of seventeen, and possibly away at school at the time of Mrs. Piper's second visit in 1906, may not have been known to her at all. "It is much more probable that Mrs. Piper had Raymond's eldest brother Oliver in her mind as, probably, the son of Sir Oliver at the front. Moreover, Oliver is the 'poet' of the family, and has written and published a volume of his poems. The allusion to the 'poet,' therefore, in the message, and the implied happening to him of some physical injury ('Myers is straight about poet and Faunus'), are natural enough in Mrs. Piper's own mouth, writing, or normal consciousness, and do not appear to call for any 'supernormal' or other explanation than a desire on Mrs. Piper's part to supply material, through Sir Oliver Lodge, for the investigations of the Society for Psychical Research, which she habitually does."[1]

On the other hand, as the same writer points out, if the message really came from the spirit calling itself "Myers," then, "on the plain interpretation of the message, 'Myers' is not a spirit of Truth, but—as Oliver Cromwell described a similarly reported 'communicator'—a 'lying devil'; for 'Myers' predicted what did not happen, and undertook what he did not perform."

To sum up the matter, the message, as a prophecy, was false; for Raymond was not "protected" by Myers, but was killed. As a warning it was a dead failure, for Sir Oliver Lodge did not connect the message with Raymond at all until after his death, but inclined to think that it referred to some financial loss to himself which Myers might avert.

If Myers could see what was coming, and wished to warn Sir Oliver, surely he would have sent a plain and straightforward message which anyone could understand, and not this vague and ambiguous rigmarole, capable of several meanings and of application to several different persons.

The plain fact is, that Mrs. Piper made a shot at a venture. She knew that one of Sir Oliver's sons was at the Front, and speculated on the chance of his being wounded, but purposely made the message so vague that, in the event of nothing happening, it could not be cited as a false prophecy, and, in fact, could be applied to any misfortune that might happen to any of Sir Oliver's family, or to Sir Oliver himself.

We now come to the photograph incident, which Sir Oliver Lodge describes as "a peculiarly good piece of evidence," "a first-class case," and as "one of the best pieces of evidence." Major Cook has analyzed this first-class piece of evidence in his little book, Reflections on "Raymond." Let us, in his company, see what Sir Oliver considers good evidence.

On August 24, 1915, a "group photograph" of twenty-one officers, with Second-Lieutenant Raymond Lodge among them, was taken in France. Three negatives were made, and these, with proofs only, were submitted by the photographer to Captain Boast, a brother officer of Raymond's. As the photographer had not enough printing-paper to supply all the officers with copies, Captain Boast purchased the negatives and sent them for printing to Messrs. Gale and Polden, in England, who received them on October 15, 1915. A large number of photographs appear to have been printed from these negatives, for Mrs. B. P. Cheves—the mother of the Medical Officer attached to Raymond's regiment—alone had, on November 28, 1915, half a dozen copies in her possession (with a key to the names). On this date Mrs. Cheves wrote to Lady Lodge, offering her one of the photographs; to which, naturally, Lady Lodge promptly replied, asking it to be sent. There was some unexplained delay in forwarding the photograph, and, in reply to a letter of inquiry by Lady Lodge regarding this, another note was received from Mrs. Cheves on December 7, stating that the photograph was being sent off. So there was at least a nine days' interval between the reception of the news of the existence of the photograph in Sir Oliver's household and the reception of the photograph itself. It is important to bear this in mind, as we shall see.

It is not known positively whether Raymond ever saw the photograph. He never saw the negatives; and Captain Boast, writing in reply to Sir Oliver's query on this point nearly eleven months after the photograph was taken, thinks that Raymond did see the proofs, but "cannot say positively," although he regards it as "highly probable." On September 12 Raymond went into the trenches, and on September 14 was killed in action.

Sir Oliver Lodge claims that the first intimation of the existence of this photograph was from the spirit of Raymond himself. On September 27, Mr. Vout Peters, a medium, at a sitting with Lady Lodge, professed to receive a message from the spirit of Raymond through the agency of his "familiar spirit," or control, "Moonstone." He refers to the existence of this particular group photograph (so Sir Oliver asserts), saying, "He is particular that I should tell you of this."

On December 3, 1915, two months and six days afterwards, Mrs. Leonard (another medium), speaking for the spirit of Raymond through her "familiar spirit," "Feda," describes this photograph with remarkable accuracy.

Sir Oliver Lodge claims that we have here genuine supernormal evidence of Raymond's "surviving personality" in giving this information, because on September 27 the negatives were not yet in England, and on December 3 neither he (Sir Oliver Lodge) nor any member of his family had as yet seen a print or copy of it.

Let us consider the communication of the medium, Mr. Vout Peters, through the agency of "Moonstone" (this "Moonstone" is supposed to be the spirit of a patriarch who lived to a hundred years, and was a "yogi" in his earth-life), who is in communication with Raymond. This is the communication:—

> "You have several portraits of this boy. Before he went away you had a good portrait of him—two—no, three. [Note by Sir Oliver: "Fully as many as that."] Two where he is alone, and one where he is in a group of other men. He is particular that I should tell you this. In one you see his walking-stick." [Note by Miss Kennedy: "'Moonstone' (i.e., Peters) here put an imaginary stick under his arm."] [Note by Sir Oliver: "Not known yet."].

This is the only reference to any group photo given by Peters. In his later sitting with Sir Oliver, on October 29, 1915—a month before news of the photo arrived—he makes no mention of it.

Acid Drops.

By the courtesy of the editor of the Literary Guide, we have been supplied with an advance copy of a letter by Mr. Edward Clodd in reply to our "Views and Opinions" of last week, and also in answer to a letter written by Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner. Mr. Clodd admits that our comments on his "few words" were fair, and he desires "with apologies" to cancel them. As Mr. Clodd thus retires with credit from a quite indefensible position which ought never to have been taken up, there is no more to be said on that point.

A word or two, however, is called for in connection with certain sentences from the late Sir Leslie Stephen and Professor Huxley which Mr. Clodd says he had in mind. "The Agnostic," says Sir Leslie Stephen, "is one who asserts that there are limits to the sphere of human intelligence." And Professor Huxley says: "In matters of the intellect do not pretend that conclusions are certain which are not demonstrated or demonstrable. That I take to be the Agnostic faith." But with all due respect to both these gentlemen, and as it is best to use perfectly plain language, we desire to say that so far as the relation of Agnosticism to belief in a God or in religion is concerned, they were talking undiluted nonsense. The counsel is excellent, but it would be ridiculous to count the voicing of these ancient platitudes as the real reason for coining such a word as Agnostic. It was the question of belief in a God which both these writers had in mind, and their great concern seems to have been to discover a word that should escape the odium attached to Atheism by the religious world. That they misled others only serves to make their action the more regrettable. And in relation to the existence of God there are only two positions—either one believes, and is a Theist, or one does not believe in a God and is an Atheist. And, in the name of all that is sensible, if a man or woman is an Atheist, why not say so?

The converted Atheist has again made his appearance; this time in the pages of the Royal Magazine. His sponsor is the Rev. F. H. Gillingham, the cricketer-parson, who says that this particular Atheist joined a college mission and became a Church stalwart. No name is mentioned, and the mission is also nameless. Perhaps the Rev. F. H. Gillingham will oblige with further details?

The Rev. A. C. Dixon, Spurgeon's successor at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London, says, "Faith in Jesus as one would have faith in Gladstone or Lloyd George saves nobody." Is this a compliment to the distinguished Welsh Baptist?

The clerical mind is a fearful and a wonderful thing. This is how the Rev. F. H. Gillingham, of Bermondsey, refers to the birth of his infant son: "The spell which some evil magician cast over the rectory has now been broken; our little son is the first child born in the rectory for many years." The owner of this massive intellect defends the Christian religion in the pages of a popular monthly magazine.

The Church Times expresses its disapproval of the desire of a party in the Anglican Church to revise the Bible by deleting the imprecatory Psalms. In its issue for September 7 it says:—

> We grieve to find that there lived in the early nineteenth century rectors capable of sharing the strange fancies of the Lectionary Revision Committee of to-day. It appears that in a certain village, when the clerk gave out the 94th Psalm:—
> O God, to whom revenge belongs,
> Thy vengeance now disclose, the young rector tapped the partition, and said out, for all the church to hear: "Handy, I don't worship such a Being; sing the evening hymn." But such is the Deity revealed in all parts of the Bible, even in the New Testament, where he is represented as tormenting unbelievers in hell-fire for ever and ever. The only possible refuge for tender-hearted people is to be found in Atheism.

The clerical contention that war has an uplifting tendency is not borne out by facts. There are 90 cases, comprising 140 prisoners, down for trial at the Old Bailey. This is a much heavier list than usual.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton considers that the War against the Central Powers and their Allies is "a peculiarly Christian and peculiarly humanitarian duty." Why does he drag in humanitarian?

Mr. Horatio Bottomley is proving a very awkward convert to Christianity. Writing in the Sunday Pictorial, he bursts out, "Cursed be the peacemongers. Clap the lot of them in gaol." Where does Mr. Bottomley expect to spend eternity?

Mr. Austin Harrison has been girding at the English Sunday. "Most places closed," he says, "hardly anywhere to go. Little to do. Few public places of amusement open." That is one of the many blessings springing from the Christian superstition.

The new political movement is described as an effort to form a "stable party." The description would apply to the Christian religion.

Referring to the appalling condition of children during the first half of the nineteenth century, the Daily News says "Religion offered them no protection." Yet religion had been in existence for thousands of years.

Principal Selbie, of Mansfield College, Oxford, contributed a highly amusing article to the Christian World for September 6, in which he displays a most intimate knowledge of God and his relations with men. He deplores the fact that "many of our intercessions are based on a radically false conception" of the Divine Being, with the result that "men speak to him as though he required to be told of the horror and wickedness abroad in the world, and as though he would not do the right and kind thing until he was asked." But, surely, all prayer is based on that assumption, for otherwise it would have no meaning at all. Three years ago this month churches and chapels held crowded prayer-meetings, at all of which God was passionately asked, pleaded with, to give us a speedy victory. The belief was, as the Bishop of London and Sir William Robertson Nicoll assured us, that if we asked for it earnestly and often enough, God would grant our petition. The futility of that prayer is now known to us all; and no such crowded meetings for intercession are any longer held.

Dr. Selbie admits the decay of the prayer-meeting because the people have lost their faith in the efficacy of prayer. And the people are right. Like the belief in God, prayer is the offspring of ignorance and fear. The Principal knows this as well as we do, and yet as a minister of the Gospel he must urge his fellow-beings to cultivate the habit of prayer, though fully aware that no prayer has ever been answered by a supernatural being. Why culpably waste time and energy, then, on so profitless a performance!

The Christian World points out that Church Parade attendance is voluntary in the American Army, and about one in thirteen attend the services. Uncle Sam's soldiers will not fight the worse on that account.

The power of the Church is fast waning, and notably so in social life. Seventy-six decrees nisi were made absolute in the Vacation Court recently. Evidently, more people than ever refuse to believe that those whom "God" hath joined, may not be put asunder.

Providence still has its playful moods. Lightning struck a provincial munitions works recently, and an explosion followed, causing great excitement. A number of women workers fainted.

Chief Constable Stevenson, of Glasgow, is much concerned with the growth of "criminality" amongst boys. Addressing the Scottish Sabbath School Union, he said that the "only real deterrent," apart from committal to an industrial school, was whipping. We should have thought that the fallacy of flogging as a moral agent was clear to all intelligent people by now; but it is suggestive that its advocacy should come from a speaker before a Sabbath School Union. How is whipping boys going to counteract the War atmosphere, the absence from home of the father, and the fact of the mother being often away also, engaged on munition-making? In this direction we are paying the price of War. We have all been more or less brutalized this past three years, and it is absurd to expect children to escape. To indulge in a new brutality will only make things worse.

The Lord's Prayer contains a supplication for daily bread, but Providence does not pay much attention to it. In the recent gale at Yaverland, near Newport, Isle of Wight, sheaves of wheat were blown over the cliffs into the sea.

A writer in a daily paper deals with the question of amusement in mathematics, but adds, "I still cannot see myself laughing over the Rule of Three—though I have a dim recollection of weeping over it." Let him dry his tears, and try to solve the tangle of the Trinity.

In a leading article, the Daily Chronicle refers to the Vatican as "the ancient repository of Christian virtues." Yet Catholics have covered Europe with fraudulent religious relics.

The Nonconformist Daily News expresses astonishment that the great Duke of Marlborough was dubbed "Corporal John," and Napoleon "the little Corporal." Yet Christians profess to believe that the King of Kings was a carpenter.

The Daily Chronicle retails a good story of one of Huxley's scientific meetings which was interrupted by a simple-minded parson. It was wrong, he asserted, to disturb the fossil fragments of the Silurian period, for they might be the bones of fallen angels precipitated into the slime after the Deluge. What a comment on the clerical opposition to science.

"Presbyter is but priest writ large," says old John Milton. And Nonconformity apes the arrogance of the older forms of the Christian superstition. At a big Wesleyan meeting recently, Sir Robert Perks referred to reconstruction after the War, and added, "We should feel far more satisfied with these committees if there were among the members fewer Agnostics, fewer Jews, and fewer members of the Fabian Society." Mark the Christian humility! Although Agnostics, Jews, and Socialists are citizens quite as much as Nonconformists, yet this Wesleyan would have them excluded from public life. This is the spirit that once lighted the fires of Smithfield.

A waistcoat worn by King Edward VII., when Prince of Wales, at the marriage of his sister, the Princess Royal, was sold recently for six shillings. How the clergy will smile! They know how to make thousands of pounds from exhibiting the clothing of a man who never lived.

About thirty convalescent soldiers at St. Anne's Convalescent home have protested against a rule of the establishment which beats anything we have read of for bigotry and tyranny. The rule is that the men must attend religious service twice a day or go to bed. We cannot conceive a greater indignity than this being sent to bed like a naughty child for not attending church. Men who submit to it are hardly worth keeping alive. And those who enforce it never ought to have been born.

A Kentish organist estimates that, during nine years, he has smoked a hundredweight of tobacco. As a rule, "sulphurous and tormenting flames" are confined to the pulpit.

Among the schoolboy "howlers," told by the late Headmaster of Eton, is the following:—

> A long time ago they wrote the Apostles' Creed. Nobody believed it. So they waited a bit and wrote the Nicene Creed. Still nobody believed it. So they waited a bit and wrote the Athanasian Creed, and they had to believe that.

Luckily they only had to believe it. If they had been forced to understand it, the prospect would have been too horrible for contemplation.

An application came recently before the magistrates of the Worthing Petty Sessions for permission to open the Dome and Theatre for cinema performances. The application was opposed by that relic of the Stone Age, the Lord's Day Observance Society, on the ground that to grant it would mean a desecration of the Sabbath. The military representative and the police both supported the application on the ground that the cinema provided a harmless entertainment for soldiers, and that it meant less drunkenness and less harm in other directions. Ultimately the Bench granted the application, and the supporters of the Lord's Day Observance Society went their way sorrowing.

"To-day devout worshippers at the cathedrals and churches of Russia are fewer in number than they were," says Mr. A. H. Fletcher, in Cassell's Magazine. We are pleased to hear it. The Church in Russia has played an evil part in the life of the nation, and it was only to be expected it would suffer when the awakening came. But what of our own press, which gave such wide publicity to two such windbags as the Bishop of London and Mr. Stephen Graham in their praise of the religious life of Russia?

Amazing beyond comment is the credulity of Professor David Smith, who figures so prominently in the British Weekly, to which he contributes two articles every week. In the issue for September 6, dealing with to-day's International Lesson for Sunday-schools, he surpasses even himself in treating pure legend as literal fact. The subject is the story of the miraculous escape of the three young Jews when thrown into the over-heated furnace, as related in Daniel, which story Dr. Smith instructs Sunday-school teachers to accept as veritable history, well knowing that Biblical critics regard the Book of Daniel as wholly unhistorical. We sincerely pity the tens of thousands of young people who will be victimized to-day by this mediæval and utterly discredited method of expounding Scripture.

The Book of Daniel was written, as internal evidence clearly shows, between the years 169 and 165 B.C., and has for its object the glorification of Jehovah as infinitely superior to all other gods. Now, the miraculous incidents recorded belong to a period not later than 600-560 B.C., and no reference whatever to them is to be found anywhere else. Probably, the author believed that they had actually happened; but, in any case, he knew that the recital of them would comfort the superstitious and much-tried Hebrews during the horrors of the Maccabæan age. The Book abounds with historical inaccuracies and discrepancies; but Dr. Smith is blind to them all, and contents himself with pietistic platitudes and anti-scientific statements which are completely out of date in the present state of Biblical criticism.

A correspondent sends us the following: An unoffending person in Peckham named Davies last week unwittingly shocked Christendom by changing his name by deed-poll to W. J. Christ. A correspondent of the Weekly Dispatch is much disturbed, and feels that the Chancery Court has committed a grave blunder in permitting such a name substitute, and thus "doing violence to religious sentiment." The Weekly Dispatch, in giving publicity to this "horror," apparently forgets that in Spain and South America the "Christian" name of "Jesus" is a common one, and it is no unusual thing to ask Jesus, one's odd man, to get in the coal, or tell Jesus, one's stable boy, to take a day off at the races! Surely it is high time that we, in this England, were sufficiently broad minded to permit an honest tradesman to change his name without holding up our hands in hypocritical horror, and casting Christian cobblestones at him in the press. Perhaps you, Sir, in the Freethinker, will uphold for once the cause of Mr. Christ, who, in this case, is apparently genuine.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

It is never a pleasant task to appeal for money, but so far as it can be robbed of its unpleasantness, this has been done by the prompt and hearty support given to the Freethinker Sustentation Fund. And gratified as I naturally am to see so prompt a response, I confess to being still more pleased with the generous tone of the letters that accompanied many of the subscriptions. These have given me renewed encouragement in a situation that is peculiarly trying. Some letters received are of so personal a tone that I cannot do more than acknowledge them in this way. I can only hope I have earned a part of the compliments they offer. Readers will, however, be interested in excerpts from some of the letters received.

From Mr. F. W. Hall we get the following cheery letter:—

> In answer to your appeal in this week's Freethinker, I have pleasure in enclosing cheque for £50, and trust the deficit will be quickly made up. It affords me the utmost pleasure to thus have the opportunity of showing my intense appreciation of the excellent way in which the journal is conducted in the interests of what I firmly believe to be the very best of causes.

Mr. H. Jessop, in sending his cheque for £25, writes:—

> I congratulate you on your successful year. It's wonderful! I don't know how you do it, but I hope all Freethinkers will support you by seeing you are not short of cash.

Lady Maxim forwards a cheque for £6 "to a cause that Sir Hiram had very much at heart."

Mr. J. Sumner writes:—

> To have kept the flag up during the past three years of the War is in itself an achievement, but to have increased the circulation and to have improved the paper too, in face of all adverse circumstances, must, I think, induce a glow of appreciation in the circle of its readers which will speedily result in the liquidation of the debt.

Mr. R. Wood writes:—

> You may well feel proud of your wonderful achievement under most trying circumstances. You put the matter very modestly.....but I trust and expect that this modest appeal will be promptly and satisfactorily responded to.

Dr. McDermott, in forwarding cheque, hopes that "in the future history of the Freethinker it may not be necessary to encroach upon the private exchequer of its editor and moving spirit." In self-defence I must say that it is not an encroachment upon my private exchequer, which, alas! is non-existent. Credit should be given to those friends who have obliged me with loans sufficient to meet the calls upon the paper. My share was to undertake personal responsibility for repayment.

Mr. E. D. Side writes on behalf of a family of sturdy Freethinkers:—

> It is indeed a pleasure to feel we are helping you in your successful effort to keep the Freethinker not only going, but of such high quality during the War. It is decidedly the best twopennyworth of brains in the market, supplied by real men; and each twopennyworth contains enough to invigorate and strengthen one, however strong in the Cause.

Another old friend of the Freethinker, E. B., writes:—

> Will you please accept the enclosed as a humble offering from E. B. You have managed wonderfully, and your self-sacrifice in going without salary, and, moreover, making yourself responsible for borrowed money on behalf of the Freethinker, is above all praise.

Mr. W. Mumby wishes all success to the Fund, and thinks the Freethinker is more needed now than ever.

"If I were a praying man," writes Mr. J. McGlashan, "you should have my prayers morning, noon, and night for your health and success. Please accept my thanks for your very able conduct of the only paper of its kind." We cheerfully dispense with the prayers of such men as Mr. McGlashan, so long as we have their appreciation and good wishes.

Mr. and Mrs. Harden send cheque with hopes that the Freethinker will long keep going, and in memory of their only son, Capt. Allen Harden, D.C.M., mentioned in dispatches, after two and a half years' service, who died of wounds at Dir-es-Salaam, August 3, 1917, aged 24 years. "A born Freethinker." We beg to offer Mr. and Mrs. Harden our sincere sympathy in their bereavement.

C. W. B., in enclosing cheque for £5, hopes that this time the Fund will be kept open for six months. One may assume that the idea behind the suggestion is expressed in set terms by several other subscribers, who hope that enough will be raised to see the Freethinker through the War. Of course, if this were done, it would lessen the worry; and one must, apparently, count on at least another year of war. And, naturally, the conditions become more difficult the longer the War continues.

We have many other letters from which we should like to quote, but must defer doing so until next week.

The following represents the subscriptions received up to the time of our going to press:—

To Correspondents.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

September 23, Birmingham Town Hall; September 30, Swansea; October 7, Failsworth; October 14, Leicester; October 21, Manchester; October 28, London; November 4, Abertillery.

R. WILSON.—We are flattered by your opinion that, in our hands, the Freethinker "will have a long life and an honourable one." We think we can promise it shall have an honourable life, and if it does not have a long one, it will not be for want of hard work on our part.

H. AUSTIN writes that finding an index to this paper would be useful, he compiled one by taking a copy-book, writing down a table of contents each week, and adding author, title, date, and any explanatory note needed. Undoubtedly this plan saves time in the end, and most probably many of our readers adopt a similar plan.

G. ALWARD.—We are much obliged for your subscription to Sustentation Fund, and also for promise to contribute further if necessary. That, we hope, will not be, but we shall see. Anyway, your cheerful help is encouraging.

T. A. WILLIAMS.—The fact of your not going "all the way" with us is a tribute to your own liberality of mind, and cheering to ourselves. Many thanks.

CORPL. A. V. HARRIS.—Glad you found the literature sent useful for distribution. We are sending you on some pamphlets that may prove useful. Shall always be pleased to hear from you and of your experience.

W. PLOTTS (U.S.A.).—Subscription for Freethinker received. Pleased to know you think this paper deserves a wide circulation outside of England. Will you be good enough to let us know particulars of the letter sent to this office and to which you received no response. The address of this paper is always at the foot of Correspondence Column and on last page.

Y. O. C.—We have several times thought of starting a Children's Column. When we can get a little more assistance on the paper we may do so.

G. GROVE.—A very ancient fable now; but, as you say, it is hard to overtake a lie.

J. R.—Your subscription indicates the right kind of spirit, and so long as that is general among our readers we can face the future with confidence.

G. J. BARTRAM.—Very sorry to hear of the death of yet another young Tyneside Freethinker. Please convey our sympathy to the right quarter.

A. M.—It does one good to see you have your heart so much in the cause.

MR. MOUNTAIN.—There are some things that one could not easily pass over. This was one of them. Please to know that your "fondness for the Freethinker grows weekly."

MR. AND MRS. BOWMAN.—Thanks for remittance and appreciation of paper.

C. S. MAYER.—Sorry we are unable to give you the exact address, but a letter c/o the University, California, would be almost certain to reach its destination.

T. A. MCKEE.—We hope the future will be brighter for you than you seem to anticipate; but whatever it is, your letter shows you will face it with courage.

F. DORRINGTON.—We agree with you that it would be well to reprint many of the late G. W. Foote's articles. We are always on the point of doing so, but the pressure of matter awaiting publication prevents realization. However, we will try and reprint some occasionally.

P. RIPLEY.—Shall appear.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.
