One of the greatest mistakes that is made when the mind, or consciousness, is spoken of, is that of assuming it to be a fixed quantity, as it were. Consciousness, as a matter of fact, is subject to a great deal of variation. A man's consciousness is not the same to-day as it was yesterday. This is quite natural, and only to be expected, because our environment is, to some degree, ever changing, even when we are not moving from one environment to another of totally different make-up. Consequently, the impressions transmitted by the nerves from the outer world to the brain are of untold variety, and, as a result of this, consciousness cannot be otherwise than subject to variations with regard to contents and intensity. In the course of years, a man's mental outlook may be so greatly changed that what were objects of delight and interest when he was twenty, have become distasteful to him at the age of thirty. He may have learned to prefer the opera to the music-hall, science rather than fiction; and paintings, which he once thought works of art, may now appeal to him as being mere attempts at the production of something artistic. Or the change may have been for the worse. In either case it goes to prove what the Materialist believes, that mind is a purely national product of evolution.

Here, we can only briefly discuss Materialism in relation to Morality and Humanism. Materialism is directly opposed to the belief that morality is of divine origin, and that this life should be a preparation for a new life, after death.

As there is no evidence that man has an immortal soul, it is a fundamental principle of Materialism that we should spend our strength in trying to make this life better and happier, without troubling about a future life.

Morality is a product of the evolution of human society. It is that relationship which exists between man and man, when their actions toward each other tend to bring about their well-being and happiness. By a very slow process of evolution, men have learned that if they are to live together in society, and enjoy each other's company, they must acknowledge and perform certain actions, which have come to be known as rights and duties. But man's conception of his rights and duties has always been relative to his own environment. There is no absolute standard of right and wrong. What one society of people considers to be right, another society will consider to be wrong; or, at least, look upon it as a matter to be treated with indifference. This, to some extent, accounts for the difficulty with which various classes, communities, and nations mingle together. But as men of different societies learn to agree more and more as to the principles of human actions, and as they learn to respect each other's differences of opinion concerning matters upon which they fail to agree, progress is made in the direction of widening the sphere within which men are able to intermingle with freedom and happiness.

There is nothing divine in this. Our moral feelings and ideas are dependent upon the quality of our brain and nervous system, and the way in which they are affected by our environment. It is by experience that we have all to learn what is best for us to do in order to contribute to the attainment of our own well-being and happiness, and that of our fellow-men. And, in order to do this, it is necessary that we should observe the effects which our speech and actions produce in the lives of those with whom we have to deal. Then, with care and thought, we shall learn how to correct our mistakes in conduct, and make some progress in living for truth, kindness, friendship, and purity. Materialism, rightly understood, does not provide any justification for laxity of living. It insists that matter in motion is essential to human feeling, thinking, and acting, but it also recognizes that matter in motion is capable of expressing itself in beautiful forms, and no less so in human character than in external nature.

The cultivation of art, science, literature, poetry, and the love of the beautiful in Nature, find their place in the philosophy of the Materialist; or, if they fail to do so in any particular case, it is because of some imperfection in the evolution of the grey matter of the brain. It is man's work, therefore, to do all he can to improve his environment so that it will react with favourable influence upon his brain, and thus make him more capable of performing the duties and enjoying the pleasures of life.

N. S. S. Conference.

Executive's Annual Report.

By The President.

It says much for the inherent strength of the Freethought Movement that, after nearly four years of war, your Executive is able to report continuous progress in all directions. In all parts the interest in our propaganda is increasing, meetings have been more numerous than has been the case for some years; the attendances have been large and enthusiastic, and the demand for our literature sustained. The threatened religious revival has not transpired, but there has been a decided awakening of Freethinking activity and interest.

The Executive takes pleasure in reporting that the accession of new members, noted in last year's report, continues, with gratifying results. During the year new Branches of the N. S. S. have been opened at Regent's Park (London), Goldthorpe, Southampton, Nuneaton, and Portsmouth. Branches in other parts of the country are also in process of formation, and it is hoped that in the near future a network of Branches may be established throughout the country.

It is also gratifying to record that the Branches formed during the past and previous years are settling down to work in a business-like spirit. The Swansea Branch, which works in one of the strongholds of Welsh Nonconformity, has had a most successful winter season. Meetings have been regularly held, and the audiences have been satisfactory from the point of view of numbers and enthusiasm. The New Manchester Branch can now boast of one of the strongest memberships in the country, and also reports a successful winter season. Birmingham friends were fortunate in securing the use of the new and handsome Repertory Theatre, and the fortnightly meetings have given great encouragement to all. Local friends would be well advised to see that this experiment does not break down for want of a little timely financial aid. Liverpool has been suffering from inability to secure a suitable hall, but it has held some meetings in the best available place, and the results have shown that the public is ready for the call when it is made. South Shields has had occasional special lectures, also with success. Glasgow, which, in a sense, is now farther than ever away from London, thanks to increased railway charges, has had its meeting-place commandeered by the Government; but up to that point the meetings addressed by the President and Mr. Lloyd were large and enthusiastic. Southampton, Goldthorpe, and Nuneaton have also settled down to work, and the results have been such as to encourage them to look forward to the autumn with increased hopes and pleasurable anticipations.

In London, a successful series of Sunday Afternoon Meetings were arranged by the Executive, and were only suspended when religious prejudice prevented our further use of the hall. More lectures would have been arranged but for the shortage of halls, a difficulty more or less general—owing to the War. For the rest of London, the open-air stations were well maintained during the summer; and during the winter, Sunday Evening Meetings were carried on by the South London Branch. In North London the local Branch inaugurated a series of Sunday Evening Open Discussions, which aroused considerable interest in those who made it their business to attend. This is a feature that might be followed with profit by Branches elsewhere.

The Executive deeply regrets to report the death of Mr. Samuel Morley Peacock, of South Shields. Mr. Peacock was one of the Society's oldest Vice-Presidents, and no Freethinker in South Shields was better known or more respected. His interest in educational matters was always keen, and for many years he sat on the local School Board as a staunch supporter of the policy of Secular Education. His death robs Tyneside of one of its familiar figures. It is gratifying to learn that the Secular Society, Limited, is one of the beneficiaries under his will.

During the year a scheme has been propounded to present a portrait of Charles Bradlaugh to the National Portrait Gallery. It is not yet quite certain whether the Trustees will accept the portrait; but failing their acceptance, it will be presented to some other public institution. The portrait is to be painted by the Hon. John Collier, and the sum required is about £200. Over £100 has been subscribed, and the remainder will no doubt be forthcoming when required. A Committee has been formed to carry the scheme through. Mr. Cohen is a member of the Committee, and a subscription towards the cost of the portrait was voted by the Executive.

When this Conference met last year, we were able to congratulate the Secular Society, Limited, on its magnificent victory in the Law Courts. It was quite plain that one consequence of this victory was to legalize a bequest to any Freethought Society, whether the Society was registered or not. The Conference had scarcely adjourned before proof of this was furnished. An old friend of the Movement, Captain Raggett, died, leaving a small bequest to this Society. The testator's solicitor wrote, asking for particulars of the Society, so that he might advise the executors of Captain Raggett's will. These were at once supplied, and the bequest was paid without demur.

The Executive has great pleasure in reporting that the dispute with the London County Council over the sale of literature in the parks and open spaces under its control has been brought to a satisfactory conclusion. It will be remembered that the L.C.C. decided to prohibit the sale of literature in such places, in connection with meetings, after September, 1916. Your Executive saw in this a quite unwarrantable attack on the right of public meetings, and felt that, if allowed to pass unchallenged, it would only be the beginning of still more drastic and retrogressive steps. On the initiative of the Executive, a Defence Committee was formed, on which your President represented the N. S. S., and Miss Vance acted as Hon. Secretary. Mr. F. Verinder, a Churchman, but a man who values public rights and justice above all, acted as Chairman, and deserves the highest praise for his untiring and able direction of affairs.

Acid Drops.

We ought to have noted last week a case in connection with the Central London School Assistants and Southwark Union. The Superintendent reported that a number of boys had been caned for absenting themselves from afternoon "Divine Service." The day was a fine one, and the boys had gone out instead of attending chapel—which shows good judgment on the part of the boys. The Rev. T. Green, one of the Managers, suggested that the Chaplain might arrange for an evening service. It is noticeable that no objection was taken to the caning. What we should like to have, is the name of this flogging bigot who is so fond of the cane as an adjunct and as an aid to religious instruction. The matter has been referred to the "House Committee," and we hope that body will express a pretty sharp opinion on the matter.

The Congregational Union of Scotland gravely suggests placing wealthy Germans in every hospital ship—removing them last if the ships are torpedoed. Certainly an original way of forgiving one's enemies.

Canon Hodgson has not the courtly manners of a Lord Chesterfield. Referring to the women munition-workers, he asked, "Are they a righteous lot?" and added, "One is a bit anxious about the future home life of England." The obvious reply is that everybody would be far more anxious about the homes of England if the defence of the country had been left to the skin-careful clergy.

Westminster had the unusual experience lately of a Roman Catholic procession to the Abbey. It was organized by Father Bernard Vaughan, and was a pilgrimage to the shrine of "Saint" Edward the Confessor. In the Abbey, Father Vaughan said they asked for the "saint's" intercession at the Throne of Grace for aid in fighting the Germans. The cream of the jest is that equally pious Catholics in Austria and Germany are pleading with other "saints" for the success of the Central Powers. And, as there are more Catholics on the Continent, their appeal is very likely to be more noisy and insistent.

Referring to the Germans' claim that they made the mist under cover of which they attacked the Fifth Army, the Daily News says "Joshua's performance in the valley of Ajalon is beginning to look very contemptible." Where does the editor of the Daily News expect to spend eternity?

At Riga, the Germans have converted the Greek Orthodox Cathedral into a Protestant place of worship. What terrible "Atheists" those Germans are!

Mr. John Kensit is beating the Protestant drum very loudly, and is lecturing on "Is Rome Behind the War?" Even he must admit that the influence of the Roman Catholic Church is not very pronounced in Bulgaria, Russia, Turkey, and Japan.

The Vicar of Feltham, at a meeting of parishioners, produced a balance-sheet, stating that, after necessary expenses were deducted, he "received minus £73—4s. 10d. a house." Has he taken lessons in book-keeping from the Bishop of London, who professes poverty on an income sufficient to keep fifty families?

The tenderness of the military authorities towards the clergy has now been extended to the religious camp-followers. According to a newspaper paragraph, it is not proposed to call up "full-time workers of the Young Men's Christian Association." "Praise God from whom all blessings flow!"

The clergy are very fond of exploiting the War for the benefit of religion. Billy Sunday, the American Evangelist, sent a telegram to Mr. Lloyd George: "We are with you to the trench." Billy ought to know that the clergy prefer their parsonages to the trenches; and that he has no mandate to speak for the American Armies.

General Maurice, whose name is on everybody's lips, is a grandson of the Rev. Frederick Denison Maurice, the famous Christian Socialist, and the friend of Tennyson and Kingsley. He is chiefly remembered as the first Church of England clergyman who protested publicly against the dogmas of eternal damnation and hell fire.

We are glad to see the Nation giving a rap over the knuckles to those fiery members of the Established Church who write as though the question of marriage concerned them alone. It is not for the Anglican Bishops, as the Nation well says, to decide what form of marriage is right and what is wrong. That is wholly for the Secular State. And the Anglican Church is a part of the State. It was created by the State, fed by the State, its ritual decreed by the State. If certain people want a religious performance at marriage, let them have it. That is their own concern. But we fancy the fussiness of the bishops will serve only to teach sensible people that the civil form of marriage is the only one that really matters.

The death of George, King of the Tonga Islands, reminds us that the deceased monarch's predecessor was known as "the only Wesleyan King." Lest Wesleyans should get "swelled heads," we add that the monarch was a coloured brother.

A Select Committee of the House of Lords has recommended that the St. Olave's Church, Southwark, Bill should proceed on the ground that the church is useless, and the churchyard derelict and disreputable. The Christian religion does not appear to be flourishing in the Capital of the Empire.

The May Meetings have one advantage, and that is they throw considerable light on the inside of the Churches. The clergy are adepts at window-dressing, but at these annual functions matters are discussed which are kept discreetly in the background at other times. Thus, at the Congregational Union meeting the question of overlapping churches was discussed, and a suggestion was made that in villages where more than one chapel was to be found, and where there were not enough people to fill more than one place, one building should be used as a village hall. This, as our French friends would say, is the beginning of the end.

The British and Foreign Bible Society's output since the commencement of the War has been forty millions. What a waste of paper!

The Bishop of Lichfield says "our soldiers are literally defending our hearths and homes." He did not add that the great majority of the dear clergy were safe in their vicarages.

Lord Leverhulme says that "the most valuable adjunct in life is leisure." The dear clergy found that out many centuries ago.

The British Weekly is sometimes very sententious. In a recent issue it pointed out that "it is, however, always most dangerous to put one's head between the jaws of a lion." Unless, of course, the lion is as polite as the animals who smiled at the prophet Daniel.

The Rev. J. Pughe-Jones, R.A.F., formerly curate of St. James's Church, Brookfield, Highgate Road, has been described as "the first flying preacher." Surely, there is a mistake in this description. The Gospels state that the Founder of Christianity did some flying in his time.

The Rev. Bernard T. Snell, ex-president of the Congregational Union, says that he has heard Churches spoken of as "permanent garrisons opposed to popular ideals." He will find it difficult to refute the soft impeachment.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—May 26, Maesteg.

D. N. (Edinburgh).—We have glanced through the Message from God, and if it is really authentic, its silliness will explain many things in his alleged government of the world.

D. Legar.—We have every sympathy with the mothers and wives who have lost sons or husbands in France. But their finding consolation in religion is evidence only that they believe in their religion. If they believed in another religion, they would find in it as much or as a little comfort; and if they were without religion altogether, it would make no difference in the way they face disaster—which is ultimately an expression of temperament and education.

Mrs. M. Lester.—We do not know any Nature songs that would suit you. We should think a number of ballads, such as any music dealer would recommend, would meet the case. But your husband's choice, we think, is good. It is well not to be too sensitive on such matters.

J. B.—Received, with thanks. We endorse your estimate of the gentlemen named. "Jolly good fellows" describes them well.

G. E. Francis.—Let us know your wishes, anyway. We will do all we can.

W. Repton.—Pleased to hear from you, and to know that you are well.

M. F. Bishara (Egypt).—We do not see any evidence whatever of a "soul" in hypnotism. The brain is not incapable of thinking in this state, since it acts on suggestions and carries them into operation.

Three Dundee Friends.—15s. for distribution of literature among the men at the Front.

J. E. Witheford.—Parcel of literature for distribution is being sent. Pleased to know that you have been relieved of Church attendance, and also that so much interest in the Freethinker is shown by your fellow-soldiers.

F. Betts.—Thanks. Shall be able to use later. Rather crowded at present. We do not anticipate much trouble so far as we are concerned, but time will show.

T. Jones.—We are sending the paper for thirteen weeks to the address given. We are also enclosing some other literature. This is in accord with our offer of last week, and the expense is covered—so far as the Freethinker is concerned.

W. Briden and Others.—Freethinker being sent for thirteen weeks, free, to addresses given.

D. Mason.—Mr. Cohen is not likely to be lecturing before September 24, when he commences his winter season in the Town Hall, Birmingham.

R. H. Rosetti.—Very glad to see from your letter that you are still exempt from the attentions of German shells and bullets. We welcome also your expressions of appreciation of our work. We are looking forward to the time when you will again resume your work for the Old Cause.

A. B. Moss.—We greatly appreciate the congratulations of so old a writer and speaker for Freethought as yourself. We intend keeping on with our work, and to follow your advice so far as is possible.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We must ask the indulgence of our correspondents this week for a number of letters remaining unanswered, and also for a paucity of paragraphic matter. But we have only one pair of hands, and as everything has to be done single-handed, and there has been unusual pressure of work in other directions, we sometimes need more than a twenty-four hours' day to do it all. We shall make good all lee-way by our next issue.

The following Resolution has been passed by the Liverpool Branch of the N. S. S., and copies sent to all Liverpool M.P.'s and to the Minister of Education:—

> That this meeting of the Members of the Liverpool Branch of the National Secular Society hails with pleasure the introduction of Mr. Fisher's New Education Bill in the present Session of Parliament, and desires to emphasize the need for purely Secular Education. We contend it is morally wrong to teach children in the Public Schools, at the public expense, particular views on the nature of religion, and we demand as a matter of elementary justice for the adult, and freedom for the child, that all forms of religious education be eliminated from the school curriculum.

We hope other Branches and Societies will follow suit.

Mr. W. Walden writes from France to tell us that, thanks to the Army Order which we published in this paper, he has had his own way in getting his position in relation to religion recorded, and is also "dismissed" from attendance at church. We are very pleased to hear this, and also that the free literature we have sent out "has fallen on fruitful soil."

Mr. F. Betts writes:—

> As you will see I am in the Army, my experiences may possibly interest you, as I joined up as an Atheist.
> My first skirmish was on attesting, when Captain Cyril Yard tried to saddle me with a religion. I objected. He objected to my objection. I persisted in what I termed my right, and he phoned to H. Q., Wolverhampton. They were quite at sea. Finally I produced a copy of the Oaths and Affirmation Acts, 1888, and pointed out the procedure of affirmation. He expressed his regret for his ignorance, and asked permission to retain copy of the Act.
> My second skirmish was at Fort Brockhurst, when the question of religion again rose over my identification disc. After some discussion, my "rosary" was stamped "F. Betts, Atheist." I had won again.
> Having entered the Army without a religion, one would have thought that I might rest in peace. It was not so. The question of Church Parade arose. Once more I stood out for my right as a Freethinker. I was offered "Police Duty" as an alternative. As an alternative parade I accepted it. During my stay there I always accepted that fatigue. In fact I came to enjoy the three hours, 9 p.m. till midnight, when I could commune with the night.
> Arriving here I again firmly insisted on my being exempted from Church Parade. It was granted—without any alternative.

We are evidently making headway in the Army, as elsewhere. We wish that all Freethinkers would follow the example set by Mr. Betts.

Several friends have written enclosing the names of soldiers to whom copies of the Freethinker are to be sent for three months. Twenty-one of these quarterly subscriptions have been paid for by a friend, and our list is not yet complete. And if it were, we should still send. As a matter of fact, we have been sending free literature ever since the War started. And it has done considerable good.

The Secretary of the new Maesteg Branch writes that Mr. Lloyd's meetings will be held in that town in the Gem Cinema Theatre at 2.30 and 7.30. A "light tea" will be provided for all visitors from a distance. We hope these will be numerous, and the hall crowded. There should be half-a-dozen new Branches in S. Wales before the year is over.

Sir Harry H. Johnston is to deliver the Ninth Conway Memorial Lecture at South Place Chapel, Finsbury, on Thursday, May 30, at 5, p.m., his subject being "The Urgent Need for a Reform in Education." Admission will be free, except to a few reserved seats.

These are the days when the price of everything goes up, and so it is cheerful to record a case where the price has gone down. The Pioneer Press has a few hundred copies of the late G. W. Foote's The Grand Old Book, a criticism of the Bible, which was originally published at a shilling. It is now being offered at twopence, postage 1½d. Only a small number is available.

We regret that owing to want of space we have been compelled to hold over the continuation of Mr. Palmer's informing series of articles until our next issue.

Presidential Notes.

ON Sunday last the Annual Conference of the N. S. S., in one of the most representative gatherings of recent years, did me the honour of re-electing me as its President. Every Branch of the Society—now numbering nineteen as against nine when I became President two years ago—was represented, save one, and that one was only unrepresented by accident. In the circumstances, I feel it a personal compliment that so many delegates should have travelled to London from distances represented by Glasgow at one extreme and Swansea at the other, in order to support my candidature. Except for a very small and well localized opposition, the support given was general throughout the country. I was again assured of the confidence of British Freethinkers, and I think I know myself well enough to be assured that this confidence will continue. Opposition to a new President seems hereditary in the N. S. S. Charles Bradlaugh had it when he commenced his Presidential career; G. W. Foote also experienced it; and the "law" is again fulfilling itself. I am encouraged, however, by the knowledge that neither of these great men had, at the outset of their Presidential career, so small a minority in opposition or so large a majority in support.

With regard to the general business of the Conference, discussion on my proposals for re-organization took up so much time that only the necessary formal business was attempted. Owing, also, to the determined opposition of a minority in the meeting, it became impossible adequately to discuss my proposals in the time at the disposal of the Conference. They might have been carried substantially as they stood, as the majority of delegates appear to have come with the authorization of their Branches to vote in their support, and had I forced the issue they would have been carried. But it is always possible to move amendment after amendment, and so spend time, and in the end, so that the complaint that they had not been adequately discussed could not be made, I agreed to the matter being referred to a committee made up of three delegates from London, four from Provincial Branches, which with the President and Secretary, should consider my scheme, and report, with such alterations and additions as are thought desirable to a Special Conference.

This delays a much-needed reform, but the delay is not my fault. I have done my duty in bringing the matter to a head. The question of re-organization cannot now be evaded or denied, and so good has been done. Perhaps it is all for the best. I am certain that those delegates who were present from all over the country will see the need for something to be accomplished in the shape of creating a really democratic society which shall actually represent the members composing it.

Personally, I shall continue as I have done hitherto. Two years of my Presidency has left the N.S.S. stronger, and more active in every way than when I assumed office. I am hopeful that the third year will show a still greater advance. I have no other interest in the matter than that of the dominating one of devotion to a great cause.

CHAPMAN COHEN, President N.S.S.

On earth discord! A gloomy Heaven above opening its jealous gates to the nineteen-thousandth part of the tithe of mankind! And below an inexorable Hell expanding its leviathan jaws for the vast residue of mortals! O doctrine comfortable and healing to the weary wounded soul of man.

courts, the Committee took a step which it had all along regarded as inevitable. A test case was raised on an application made for a permit to sell literature by a Branch of the National League of the Blind. This was refused, and application was made to the High Court asking for a rule calling upon the L.C.C. to show cause for its action. This was granted without hesitation, and came on for hearing before Justices Darling, Sankey, and Avory. The judges were unanimously in favour of the applicant, and gave judgment to that effect, with costs. The victory was complete, and the matter now stands substantially where it did before the Council took its ill-advised action. It is to be hoped that the regulations will now be carried out with justice to all concerned. The Executive has, however, justification in congratulating the Society on the outcome of its endeavours. The question was purely a matter of principle, and that principle has been vindicated. It should be added that the Executive contributed from its funds £10 towards the cost of the case, and a sum of over £40 was raised by the Editor of the Freethinker and handed over to the Committee.

The War has brought to the front a subject that is always of importance to Freethinkers. When the War began, there was considerable doubt in the minds of both officers and recruits on the question of affirmation. Thanks to the publicity given to the matter in the Freethinker, complaints on this head have greatly diminished in number. A soldier has exactly the same rights as a civilian, and with respect to a statement of religious opinion, officers are bound to take that as given, and anyone joining the Army or Navy may be entered as Freethinker, Atheist, or Agnostic, or by any other title. The large number who have insisted upon their right has had an educational effect on all concerned.

Attendance at Church Parade and at Church still remains, however, compulsory. Letters continually reach headquarters protesting against being compelled to take part in a service in which they do not believe, and to which they have the strongest possible objection. Under prevailing conditions not very much could be done; but full publicity has been given to the matter, the War Office has been made acquainted with the grievance, and, as a result of the publicity achieved, numbers of soldiers have asked to be relieved from Church Parade, the authorities showing a disposition to deal more adequately with the matter in the future. Your Executive must, however, again protest against the injustice of denying to a soldier a right conferred upon all civilians in all civilized countries. Men will not be worse, but better soldiers, when due regard is paid to some of the deepest of their intellectual convictions.

The question of religious instruction in the schools still remains where it was. No mention of religion is made in the Bill now before Parliament, and there are reasons for believing that this may be dealt with in a separate measure. If this is so, it is almost certain to be on the basis of an agreement between the Christian sects, in which the rights and claims of non-Christians will be substantially ignored. In these circumstances the Executive urges Freethinkers everywhere to be active and on the alert. Much may be done by seeing that a resolution is passed at all meetings where it is possible to bring one forward, calling for the application of the principle of the Secular solution in all State supported schools. No other policy is just, and no other policy will put an end to that which has for more than a generation obstructed educational progress. Freethought stands here for no sectarian advantage but for an all-round measure of justice.

The Executive feels that it is fully justified in closing this Report on a note of satisfaction with the year that has closed, and of the increased hope in the future. Everywhere the story is one of progress. The War, which has disproved many time-honoured fallacies, has, undoubtedly, given an impetus to various hitherto unfashionable opinions. The very general feeling of disgust at the attitude of the clergy in first playing the part of active recruiting agents, and then being exempted from the operations of the Military Service Acts, the shock given by the War to those who believed that in some way Christianity was an instrument of good in the world, have combined to drive thousands to a reconsideration of the whole question of religion, and this has reacted powerfully in favour of Freethought. Freethought to-day is more active and more actual than it has been for many years. All over the country men and women are beginning to realize that Freethought is no mere academic question with which to pass an idle hour. They are realizing that, on the contrary, it forms the condition of the solution of the gravest social problems. Now, as ever, the "Age of Reason" is the condition for the achievement of the "Rights of Man." It is for our Society to make the most of the opportunities that now present themselves, and organize for a more effective warfare against the enemies of truth, freedom, and justice.

Immortality.

I had climbed the steep of a Gloucestershire lane, and stood gazing upon a panorama of wonderful beauty. The "Surprise View," it is called, and nothing was ever more appropriately named; for on reaching the brow of the incline one beholds, stretching in one grand sweep, the magnificent Severn valley, rich in colour, and stately in its impressiveness. I was glad to rest, though I forgot tiredness in the entrancement. I tried to enjoy the full of every detail, but the grandeur was baffling.

In parts, the slopes leading down to the picturesque waterway were thickly wooded, whilst the rest was apportioned into wide stretches of meadows and fields with boundary hedges seeming like the grotesque pencilling of a cubist drawing. The thin, silvery wind of the river could be seen meandering a way between its verdant borders, occasionally receding from view behind the timbered protrusions of high banks. The further side of the valley was suffused by the purple tint of distant atmosphere, whilst the full glare of the early afternoon sun made the extensive pastureland a motley of varied greens. The sky appeared a blue wash, showing up with pleasing distinctness a solitary belt of snow-white clouds that seemed to be hung motionless by invisible strands. The whole was a scene of enchanting beauty, and, in spite of the overbearing sultriness, every breath inhaled imbued a bracing naturalness.

The autumn sun gave abundantly, and the heat was terrific; so terrific that one could almost see it like a curtain in the middle distance. Everything seemed resigned to mute acceptance of the relentless rays. There was a slothness in the gait of pedestrians, whose lethargic locomotion suggested a strong desire to withdraw to pleasant shades. The air held all in a stagnant grip. Overhead, the throb of an aeroplane reverberated in a drone that pressed. There was not the slightest wisp of a breeze to stir the full-foliaged trees, or to scatter the heat that glanced from the ground. Stillness—intense stillness that held the temples in a vice—lay heavy everywhere.

Yet deep down, chafing beneath that stillness, there was life. It was not aggressive. Nature was in a sluggish mood, but permeating all—every blade of grass—was coursing life. The very quietness and submission to the inevitable, denoted—impressed—that somewhere there was an indomitable force. The whole landscape was bulging with it, quietly waiting to give riotous expression.

The heat-laden ray beat me to cover. I looked round for a sheltered place, and at last located, just below, an erosion in the hillside. I made a circuitous descent, and entered the enclosure, settling myself in the shade at the foot of the earthern wall.

In comfort I enjoyed the glorious scene, noting the immediate surroundings. The road by which I had approached led through a low-lying village to my right, but I had branched off by a pathway which continued, close beside me, through the churchyard not more than a stone's throw away. The church itself stood on prominent guard over the cluster of cottages and farms of the village whose roads (as befitted the humble supplication of rural devotion) all led to the arrogant sentinel above. From some of the cottage chimneys smoke rose perpendicular, making thin milky tracings to the sky. The planning of those cottages was delightfully irregular, some seeming to crowd others out of existence, whilst odd ones were aristocratic with their spacious yards and gardens.

Then, as I gazed at that tranquil fluttering of civilization, a curious comparison commanded my thought. On the one hand was the Church, monumental and inanimate; on the other the wonderful unsullied craft of nature resplendent in glorious tranformation. The two became more incongruous as I meditated. The Church, what did it represent? Its complacent indifference challenged the glory of its setting. Yet it stood as a thanksgiving. The anomaly! One day in seven within its manufactured portals (sanctified by nominal travesty) praise of the beauty around was offered through liturgical burlesque and monotonous chanting. Superstition and pageant mummery are the height of artistic appreciation that civilization has bequeathed to the Church—or the Church to men. And men bow their heads.

But the valley. There my thoughts probed the lapse of ages. That interminable stretch of time seemed an impassable gulf, yet it was easily bridged. Slowly the ego faded until the "I" was no more, the while receding through the labyrinths of cause and effects. Back to the almost incredulous embryo; dissecting and analytical, wandering among the phantasmagoria of prehistoric forms—of cells and protoplasms. Then, again, returning slowly along the course of evolution. The scheme, dovetailed and interlocked in perfect order and symmetry, was perplexing—bewildering to a plebeian mind. But even my dulled senses grasped the great truth—the true fact of existence. Permeating, vibrating, through every atom was some supreme force of animation; the co-ordination of all matter that could not be separated, inter-existing so that the least could not be taken away. A gradual evolutionary force that neither lagged nor gathered impetus. It was inviolable for all time. For all time! In a flash my scattered senses were steadied—for all time—that was it—the real immortality.

Voices just above jerked me back to self-consciousness. A party had been viewing the scene, and, as they moved away, a voice was saying: "Yes, it is a pretty view—but the church, is it not superb?" I shuddered in spite of the heat. The graven image is ever worshipped.

W.

Demonstration at Queen's Hall.

Mr. Chapman Cohen presided at the evening public meeting, which was well attended, many provincial visitors being present. He was supported by Messrs. J. T. Lloyd, A. B. Moss, F. Willis, A. D. Howell Smith, W. Heaford, and Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner.

Mr. Cohen, who had a very cordial reception, said that the National Secular Society was one of the oldest societies in Great Britain. It had always been connected with fighting, ever since the days of Charles Bradlaugh, its first President. Its second President was G. W. Foote, who possessed one of the best brains and most cultured intellects that English Freethought ever had. He himself now stood in the position of these two illustrious men. The mere position of the presidency of any society did not appeal to him, as such, for he never cared for honours, and would no more think of running after a president's job than a knighthood—a title which was thrown about as recklessly as stale bloaters. But as head of the N. S. S. there was an opportunity of doing work on behalf of one of the noblest causes that ever occupied the minds of men. And from this point of view there was both a compliment and an opportunity in being selected the member of the National Secular Society to represent their cause to the world. There is great need for Freethought in the world. It is the only thing that could break down international suspicion and promote the genuine brotherhood of nations. A frame of mind lies behind every movement. Fools run after knaves more energetically than knaves pursue fools. Freethought makes men think.

The clerical prophecy of the revival of religion had not been realized. Angels appeared at Mons, but they had probably only enlisted for three years, and not the duration of the War, and the angels had vanished. All over the world men see the failure of Christianity; they look at the world and they realize that it could hardly be worse. The clergy have missed their chance. They might have stood as representatives of humanity and brotherhood in a world gone mad. But the priests were ever opportunists. They went to the Front—or near the Front—and came back with delicious yarns of soldiers begging for more chaplains. We all know how far these tales were true. Soldiers' letters proved the truth as to whether for one request for cigarettes there were a dozen for chaplains. And religion did not bubble from soldiers when they were on home-leave. The clergy clearly believe that truth is a valuable thing, not to be thrown away indiscriminately.

If there were not a revival of superstition, there was a revival of Freethought. He had received letters from all parts of the fighting area proving this. Common sense is catching, and thousands were thinking now who never thought before. The logic of events is teaching the supremacy of reason. Men are beginning to realize that there is sanity in Secularism. If there is another life, that is all the more reason for making the most of this. A man cannot be happy by himself; he must share his happiness with others. Unselfishness is the secret of keeping life sweet, clean, and healthy. The flowing tide is with Secularism. Education is on our side; knowledge is on our side; science is on our side. The world is getting tired of theology and of the clergy. What freedom we have obtained has been purchased at a price awful to contemplate. Pioneers have to endure, and those who follow reap the profit. We have inherited the fruits of their work and ill deserve the gift if we do not do something in return for the best of causes. The world is always being made better for the many through the sufferings of the few. In the great French Revolution, the last few survivors of the Girondists stood at the foot of the guillotine, waiting for death. As they stood they sang the Marseillaise, as only Frenchmen can sing that noble hymn. It was an act of faith by men, who, although dying, felt that Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity would one day be living realities. What the world needs to-day is the undying hope of that hardy band of heroes. For then, man, no longer the dupe of political and spiritual despots, will be conscious of his own power, rulers of the forces around him, and master of his own destiny.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd said that Secularism stood for freedom from the tyranny of the supernatural, and for freedom from false hopes. Christian critics allege that this liberty means licence, but Christians are themselves disbelievers in Freedom. Secularism enhances the reality and importance of this life. Freethinkers did not object to the idea of another life, but they knew nothing of it. Christianity laid too much emphasis on a world to come, and the present Bishop of London told the faithful to think nothing of this world, but to think of God and eternity. Christ himself insisted that his religion was not of this world. Life here was only preparatory to a life hereafter. But this attitude blocked progress. Why should Christians trouble about social reforms here if they were only strangers and pilgrims in the world. In the days of negro slavery Christians told the unfortunate slaves that they would be free in the hereafter; and poor Christians everywhere had always held before them the parable of Dives and Lazarus, where the rich man went to hell and the poor man to heaven. Christians cared more for liberty in other countries than their own. Even Wilberforce, who did so much for the black slave, did not do anything for the white slaves in this country in factories and mines. It remained for a later generation to point out the evils and horrors of child-labour. He heard a preacher recently, and the burden of his sermon was that people were ashamed of Christ and his Gospel. How true that was! Men and women are getting ashamed of the Christian religion, and listening more and more to the voice of Reason.

The veteran, Mr. William Heaford, said that, although an old worker in the best of causes, he felt perennial youth in regarding the vista of the future. Standing in a critical juncture in the world's history, men were perceiving that the Churches had failed. Instead of bringing the redemption of mankind into the region of fact, they had failed to restrain horrors at which mankind revolted. The God of the Churches had been proved to be a great neutral, a deity who did absolutely nothing, although the majority of the nations implored help from heaven. After 1,800 years of the Gospel of Christ Europe was deluged in blood, and it was noticeable that it was Freethinkers who voiced the feelings of humanity, and pointed out that international disputes should be settled by rational means rather than by the repulsive methods of brute force. A world controlled by Freethinkers could never have had such a history of eighteen centuries as Christianity had given, but would have realized the dreams of poets and philosophers, and made a beautiful world, which would ever be made still more beautiful to posterity.

Another veteran, Mr. A. B. Moss, pointed out that Christians complained that they had left undone those things they ought to have done, and done those things that they ought not to have done, and it was permissible to ask whether such reflections occurred to their deity? It was hard to conceive of a good and kind father in heaven witnessing such a great panorama of tragedy unmoved on the earth. A good deity might, conceivably, have stopped the murder of civilians of old men and women, of little children. He might have shorn the War of some of its worst horrors. The deity had done nothing. All the things of good repute done in this War had been done by human beings. If only the time, money, and energy expended on this dreadful War had been devoted to the spread of knowledge, and for the uplifting of humanity, our children's children would have had the greatest cause to bless their ancestors. The only right way of living was that which would gladden the hearts of succeeding generations.

Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner was in a reminiscent vein. Speaking as her father's daughter, she said that he valued the position of President of the N. S. S. because by virtue of that office he was the acknowledged champion of Freethought, and could voice the aspirations of thousands who otherwise had been voiceless. Those who worked with Charles Bradlaugh were getting fewer in number, but his influence was still real. She had a letter from Scotland in which the writer said what an inspiration Bradlaugh had been to him, and he added: "If we had a thousand Bradlaughs, England would be a Freethought country." Younger Freethinkers were inclined to underrate the works of the pioneers, forgetting that whatever liberty they possessed had been won for them by their heroic predecessors. At the last Conference Bradlaugh addressed he pointed out that the great fight between Freethought and Superstition had yet to come. In the old days Freethinkers had to fight for the right to think aloud. Bradlaugh could only do so because of the work of Richard Carlile and his colleagues. Huxley, Darwin, and Tyndall were only enabled to build where the pioneers had cleared the ground. Bradlaugh's message was: "Be on guard." The Catholic Church, the strongest Church in Christendom, was as much the enemy of progress and freedom as in the days of the Inquisition. Every Freethinker can help in his own way.

Mr. Howell Smith said the special need of the world was love and fine thinking. We have had enough of hatred and coarse thinking. The Church has professed to preach love, with what results we all know. The Church has taught freedom—in heaven. Freethinkers believe that without liberty on earth life is not worth living. Despite the hymn, "There's a friend for little children," the Church has never been the friend of the child. Nor has the Church done anything for woman. It is not even the friend of the worker, and economic slaves still remain unemancipated. Long before the days of Lord Shaftesbury, Robert Owen, the Freethinker cared for the white slaves of England. All that the Church had done was to claim victories won by other and better men.

Mr. F. Willis, of Birmingham, said he had visited the fighting Front and knew the truth about the boasted revival of religion among the soldiers. The only thing that soldiers wanted to know was concerning the welfare of their kith and kin. Soldiers pinned their faith to shells and not to Bibles. Christians boasted of the miracle of the Virgin's statue of Albert, which, it was alleged, was divinely spared from artillery fire; but what state of mind was it that could conceive of a deity who spared a paltry statue and allowed human beings to be murdered. This War had done harm to Christianity, and men remembered that the Christian God was not a naturalized British deity. It remains for us to dispel superstition from the minds of men, and to realize that the theological tyrants will not live for ever.

EPITAPHS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Let's talk of graves, of worms, of epitaphs.
—King Richard II., Act iii. 2.

SIR,—A tomb in the north cloister of Tetbury Parish Church, Gloucestershire, has the following inscription:—

"In a Vault underneath lie several of the Saunderses, late of this Parish:—particulars, the Last Day will disclose. Amen."

"This monument was erected to the memory of Sam Jones who was accidentally shot as a mark of respect by his brother."

"Here lies the body of Mary Anne,
Safe in the bosom of Abraham;
'Tis all very well for Mary Anne,
But it's simply hell for Abraham."

"Here lie the bones of William Jones,
Who all his life collected bones;
Till death, that grisly, bony, spectre,
That most amazing bone collector,
Hath boned poor Jones, all snug and tidy,
And here he lies in bona fide."

Added by a wag:—

"De mortuis nil nisi bonum."

The following caustic apothegm was scribbled on the gate of a cemetery by a cynic:—

"Here lie the dead, and here the living also lie."

Views and Opinions.

Neutrals and the War.

Before America's entry into the War millions of people were blaming her for her neutrality. And I for one sympathized with the complaint. Of course, if war is never more than a balancing of profit and loss, then a country is justified in standing out of a quarrel when it may lose much or gain little by taking sides. But if war is, or is to be, more than that—if to act as the cause of war is to commit the crime of crimes—then neutrality has no place with a people governed by moral considerations. The war-maker is a criminal, and decent people the world over have the same interest in his suppression that they have in that of the confirmed homicide. But American opinion needed education on the rights and wrongs of the War. When that process of education was sufficiently advanced America took the side of the Allies. No one can doubt that had the matter rested with President Wilson war would have been declared with Germany at a much earlier date.

Our Neutral God.

Now, take President Wilson out of the picture and substitute God. Does the moral issue stand differently? We think not; and for very good reasons. Several correspondents have favoured me with a copy of an article by Mr. B. Newman Flower, which appeared in a recent issue of the Weekly Dispatch, entitled "Why God is a Neutral Still." The question to which Mr. Newman Flower attempts an answer is not new. It has been asked by thousands—perhaps millions—of people, and replied to in a score of ways. And these people are still wondering why God is neutral. For the claim of religion has hitherto been that God was not neutral. He was on the side of righteousness. Tracts and books, written by the faithful for the foolish, have provided the world with hundreds of illustrations of God's active interference in the affairs of men. From the case of Sodom and Gommorah, blasted by God because of its sins, down to the cases of boys drowned for playing games on Sunday, and infidels stricken with blindness or death for "blaspheming" God, we have been fed with stories of how God does interfere. Have we not prayers to God on the War, which proves the possibility of action; and thanks to God for victories, which assumes that he has interfered? And if God is not neutral in the case of breaking the Sabbath, or similar instances, what can justify his neutrality in this world-war? Mr. Newman should reflect that a neutral God is a negligible God. A God who does nothing need expect nothing. If we can get through the War without God, we can certainly manage without him afterwards. And if we may be excused a religious figure—when the shades of our slain soldiers reach heaven and ask its ruler: "What did you do in the Great War?" he will have to reply: "Nothing. I remained neutral. It was my world, I made it, and when the crash came I sat aloft watching all that occurred, maintaining a strict neutrality." And if "Tommy" in heaven retains the capacity for picturesque language there will be some remarks percolating the celestial atmosphere.

An Apology for God.

Mr. Newman admits that in this War religion has been a ghastly failure. The Churches have done nothing, save to contribute exhortations "that might have fitted equally the opening of the Crystal Palace on the Death of Queen Victoria." "As a public factor to a public good, religion has failed to score a point." Still, Mr. Newman finds a reason for God's neutrality, and it is this. The Germans believe that God is with them. But if the Allies had been able to break down the German military power and secure a crushing victory, the German people would have believed that God was dead—"There was no God." "Central Europe to religion would be lost," or reverse the case. Suppose Germany had overrun France and Britain, "What should we say of God, or religion, or any form of belief? Again, no missionaries in a century would build up the wreckage of that belief into a stable thing." Also, "Suppose God threw in his weight with Germany. Imagine the rape of France complete, the rape of Britain complete, then religion is destroyed in both countries for a century at least." The position, so far, is clear. If God helps the Allies he loses Germany. If he helps Germany he loses the Allies. It is with God a case of "heads I lose, tails you win." So he decides to remain neutral. A more far-seeing Deity would have seen that by this plan he runs a risk of losing both sets of followers. A more intelligent apologist would surely hit upon a more plausible excuse.

Careless or Callous?

As Freethinkers, we do not expect God to interfere, for the sufficient reason that we see no evidence to justify the belief in the existence of Deity. But if Freethinkers were believers in God, we should certainly expect him to do something to justify his existence. And he has had so many opportunities. Churches have been destroyed with as much impunity as brothels. The pious have been killed as freely as the ungodly. A book of profane poetry has been as effective in stopping a bullet as a Bible. On Whit Sunday, which marked the inauguration of a week of prayer and supplication, one of the most dastardly outrages that even this War has produced, occurred. A large hospital in France, containing many hundreds of wounded men, was deliberately bombed and fired on with machine guns by German airmen. It needs no word-painting to bring home to all the horror of the situation. And throughout it all God remained strictly neutral. The men on the spot did all they could. The nurses, with a heroism that is beyond praise, stuck to their post, and paid the price in killed and wounded. God alone did nothing —because, says Mr. Newman, if he had interfered he would have lost followers in either Germany or elsewhere! What an apology! And what a condemnation! The Great Neutral! Call him the Great Opportunist, and we shall be nearer the mark. Call him the Great Accessory before and to the fact, and we shall be still nearer the mark. The paralysing horror of belief in a God who can allow such things is only equalled by the colossal stupidity of those who can continue to believe and to worship.

Digitized by Google

By the Grace of God.

The German motto is "God with us." This Mr. Newman calls a horrible blasphemy. Stupid it is; false we believe it to be; but why blasphemy? There is nothing new in the cry or the conviction. Some of the vilest crimes in the history of the world have been sanctioned in the same way. When the Bible said,—

> And when the Lord thy God hath delivered it into thine hands, thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword. But the women and the little ones, and the cattle, and all that is in the city.....thou shall take unto thyself.....Of the cities of these people which the Lord thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth, was that not setting an example to the German in his ugliest mood? And could not the Kaiser find perfect warranty for his own bombast from the same "sacred" volume?—

> I will make my arrows drunk with blood and my sword shall devour flesh.....And he shall deliver their kings into thine hand, and thou shalt destroy their name from under heaven; then shall no man be able to stand before thee, until thou have destroyed them.

"God with us" said the ancient Israelites, in their savage tribal warfare. "God with us" said the pious Crusaders, centuries later, when they robbed, and pillaged, and raped, and massacred in the name of Christ. "God with us" was said through all the torturings and murderings of innocents century after century. The Kaiser is in the true religious line. And the lesson is, surely, not that it is blasphemy, but that no such perverter of moral judgment exists in the world as intense religious feeling.

The Uselessness of God.

God, says Mr. Newman, is neutral. God, says the Freethinker, does nothing. The two statements are, as far as practical life is concerned, identical. The world grew uneasy at the neutrality of America. There was a healthy feeling that so great a nation was not discharging its duty to humanity while such vital issues were at stake. And the feeling was a good one. But, after all, had America continued neutral, President Wilson might have pleaded that America did not make the War, nor the European world in which it arose. But God, if the Christian theory is accepted, did make the world. He made us all. The responsibility for it and us rests with him. And when the world is stricken with this tragedy, he prefers to continue strictly neutral. If the world looks askance at the nation with power to intervene and remains neutral, how shall it regard a God who does nothing? Fools offer apologies, knaves invent excuses, slaves continue to praise where duty is neglected. But clear-minded men and women all over the world are drawing the true inference from the situation. "God" is an outworn hypothesis. God explains nothing; God does nothing. "God" is nothing about which men and women need seriously concern themselves.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Cross of Christ.

WHAT are we to understand by the Cross of Christ? What has it chiefly stood for in the Church from the beginning? What does it signify in the Pauline Epistles which the Church has always regarded as finally authoritative? To Principal Forsyth, one of the ablest and subtlest of living theologians, the Cross of Christ is the central, supreme, reality in the universe. In his amazingly ingenious and interesting book, The Justification of God, he makes the astounding admission that "no reason of man can justify God for his treatment of his Son," but claims that "whatever does justify it, justifies God's whole providence with the universe, and solves its problem." This is a stupendous claim, but the Principal hurls it at his bewildered reader with astonishing vigour and confidence. "The true theology of the Cross and its atonement," he repeats, "is the solution of the world. There is no other. It is that or none." Observe, it is a non-rational, if not irrational, solution that the Cross affords; and, consequently, it is a solution which cannot satisfy Freethinkers, being a solution solely intended for earnest believers. But what is the true theology of the Cross? The following is Dr. Forsyth's answer:—

> That theology is that the Cross is not simply the nadir of Incarnation, but that it is God's self-offering (under the worst conditions that love could feel for evil man) to his own holy name. The just God is the chief Sufferer and sole Doer. The holy love there is in action everywhere. The most universal thing in the universal Christ is his Cross. Everywhere, according to God's ubiquity, immanence, or what you will, his holy love is invincibly at issue with death, sin, and sorrow. Everywhere is redemption. And that is the only theodicy. The purpose of salvation is the principle of creation; and the ruling power of the world is the purpose of God (p. 125).

Christ crucified and risen "is the theodicy of God and the justifier both of God and the ungodly. The supreme theodicy is atonement." Such is "the eternal cruciality of the Cross for destiny." The all-devastating enemy of the universe is sin, "but the meaning of the Incarnation is that God was capable, in his self-emptying in Christ, of a self-limitation, i.e., a self-mastery of holy surrender, whose moral effect was more than equal to the foreign invasion by sin." The death on Calvary was God's own death in Christ. The sin that aimed at extinguishing God, God extinguished by dying for it himself. This is how the author puts it:—

> His holiness so dies as to inflict on sin a death which it has not power to repel. There is an experience of death that destroys its deadly power. God's moral (i.e., his holy) power converted death itself from the destructive service of sin to his own redeeming service. God in Christ so died that sin lost its chief servant, death, which became now the minister of life, so that its universal curse became universal blessing. Sin, therefore, cost Godhead not its existence but its bliss. It cost the Son of God not his soul but all that makes life a conscious fulness and joy. It cost him the Cross, and all that that meant for such a life as his, God in Christ so met the one enemy as to turn upon him his own weapon of death. God so died as to be the death of death.....He could so identify himself with sin and death, his absolute antitheses, that he conquered and abolished both, in an act which brings to a point the constant victory of his moral being. The destiny of the world is whatever does most justice to the nature of God, and most glorifies it. And that is, of all things in the world, the atoning Cross of Christ—where therefore the teleology and the theodicy of the world lies (pp. 152-3).

Such, according to Dr. Forsyth, is the true theology of the Cross, which is the solution of the world. We readily do the famous divine the justice of regarding his theory of the death of Christ as logically the most consistent and ideally the most beautiful of all the theories known to us. It is even in essential harmony with the teaching of the New Testament and the various Councils of the Church. It is Augustinianism and Calvinism combined, stated in the terse, angular, paradoxical style so characteristic of the Hackney College oracle. But it partakes of the radical defect which discredits and condemns all other theories of the Cross, namely, that it is nothing but a theory, and has no practical bearing whatever upon human life. It is non-rational simply because there is no truth in it; and it is irrational because, if true, it would be not the justification, but the positive condemnation of God. The death of God, if such a thing were possible, or the Father's treatment of his Son in sending him to crucifixion, would be the quintessence of immorality. It would be fundamentally wrong to punish the innocent for the guilty, the holy for the unholy, and absolutely impossible to abolish death by the immolation of the only begotten Son. Had it ever occurred as described by our author, the death of Christ would have been the most tragic and momentous event in history, nay, the most monstrous, the most criminal thing ever done in the career of Humanity, and no words could have been strong and scathing enough to denounce it. Yet, whilst frankly calling it the greatest, most loathsome crime ever committed, Dr. Forsyth has the audacity to assert that this indescribably horrible crime "became, by the moral, the holy victory of the Son of God, the source not only of endless blessing to man but of perfect satisfaction and delight to holy God," and that consequently, "there is no crime, not even this War, that is outside his control or impossible for his purpose." Surely, it is a new thing under the sun for a theologian to represent God as wickedly exploiting the frightfullest and bloodiest deed on record for the furtherance of his purpose of human salvation. Of course, it is perfectly safe to ascribe any purpose or conduct to an absentee Deity, who neither approves nor disapproves. Indeed, Principal Forsyth treats God with greater familiarity than he would dare to resort to when dealing with his next-door neighbour, and no Divine resentment is ever shown. God expresses no condemnation of the statement that the cruel murder of Jesus became the source of perfect satisfaction and delight to him, and the Principal evidently interprets the silence as a token of agreement; but when he affirms that the same dark deed resulted in endless blessing to man, we can bring him to the bar of history, and call for evidence for and against. What has the Cross of Christ done and failed to do for humanity? The evidence is now in our possession, and the verdict of the court, based upon it, so far from having proved an endless blessing, has been the source of incalculable misery to mankind. What that evidence is we shall endeavour to show in our next article.

FREETHINKERS are familiar with the methods of the Press Boycott by which all matters relating to Freethought are either excluded or grossly misrepresented by Christian editors in the interests of their religion. Indeed, in some quarters, the conspiracy of silence against Freethought is simply wonderful. The very name is like that of the God of the Ancient Hebrews, which was never to be spoken. Where the conspiracy of silence is broken, accidentally, the Christians display another aspect of their attitude towards Freethought, which is then misrepresented and slandered. Few, however, are fully aware that this peculiar Christian habit is extended to literature itself, and that the campaign of calumny is just as apparent in some books as in newspapers and periodicals. Look, for example, at the works of reference which are to be found in most libraries, and notice how Freethought and Freethinkers are treated in their pages. Sins of omission and commission constantly leap to the eye of the reader, who may be ill prepared for this exhibition of the fierce flash of the primitive spirit of Christianity. For, nowadays, Christians are no longer able to crush opposition, and they are obliged to answer its arguments or make a show of defending their own doctrines. Feeling that the tendency of Rationalism is against them, and afraid to resist it, they bend before it rather than break.

One of the most popular series of the day is the Home University Library, which includes, among many other volumes, a work on the Victorian Age of Literature. This particular work has been entrusted to the versatile Gilbert K. Chesterton, whose peculiar piety is so notorious that the editors apologize for his exuberance. They may well do this, for Mr. Chesterton uses his talents tyrannously in the service of the most reactionary of Churches. He has nothing but the crudest insults for the great "intellectuals." Ignoring the long series of masterpieces that have come from the greatest of living English novelists, Chesterton says of Thomas Hardy that he is "a sort of village Atheist brooding and blaspheming over the village idiot." Algernon Swinburne, a poet of the rarest and most brilliant genius, who has enlarged the boundaries of song, is accused of composing "a learned and sympathetic and indecent parody on the Litany of the Blessed Virgin"—surely an ironical suggestion in a Protestant country. In speaking of Songs Before Sunrise, Chesterton tries to belittle those superb lyrics by saying that they were songs before a sunrise that had never turned up. Even the great Victorian authors do not escape censure, and are dubbed, spitefully, "lame giants," and women writers who show independence of thought are derided. Emily Bronte, who gave us Wuthering Heights, is described as being as "unsociable as a storm at midnight." The only Freethinker to whom Chesterton is civil is James Thomson, the author of The City of Dreadful Night, who, he informs us, pontifically, "knew how to be democratic in the dark." As Chesterton spells the poet's name with a "p," the compliment is a very doubtful one, after all. And Gilbert Chesterton is the man, be it remembered, who challenges the dogmatism of the Agnostic; convicts science of irrationality; and who pretends to find liberty inside the least progressive of the Christian Churches. Chesterton, the jester, cuts a much braver figure in the imagination of the public than Chesterton, the Christian apologist.

Another work of reference, A Short Biographical Dictionary of English Literature, by J. W. Cousins, issued in Dent's Everyman Library, is open to somewhat similar objections. The following interesting passage relates to Shelley's opinions:—

> The charge of Atheism rests chiefly on Mab, the work of a boy, printed by him for private circulation, and to some extent repudiated as personal opinion.

James Thomson, the poet, is introduced as an awful warning, for we are told his "views resulted in depression which led to dipsomania." In the case of "George Eliot" the information is given that "her general view of life is pessimistic," despite the fact that this gifted woman expressly coined the word, "meliorism," in order to show her own attitude with regard to optimism and pessimism. Robert Buchanan's anti-Christian views are slurred over by the grudging admission that "his latest poems, The Outcast and The Wandering Jew, were directed against certain aspects of Christianity.

Still another reference-book, Chambers' Encyclopædia, in an edition issued a few years ago, is full of bias against men and women of sceptical opinions. A diatribe against Thomas Paine is quoted from the pen of Leslie Stephen, which the writer apologized for, but there is no mention of this latter fact. Colonel Ingersoll is said to have attracted more attention than he deserved, and readers are referred for information about Charles Bradlaugh to the libellous "Life" by Mackay, a work which Bradlaugh himself proceeded against and had destroyed. Even the then popular novelist, "Ouida," is accused of "muscular heathenry" and "encyclopædic ignorance."

This is the latest form of an infamous religious tradition, which may be traced back through the centuries to Lucretius, and even earlier. The fortunes of really great writers, like Shelley, Meredith, and Swinburne, have been very much influenced by this frigid and calculated misconception. Freethought invariably incurs the hatred of the orthodox, and no enmity is more unscrupulous, more relentless, or more venomous. This garbage is thrown at Freethinkers of set purpose. It is meant to discredit the characters and writings of men and women who look scornfully at the Christian superstition. Freethought has wrested so many positions from Christianity that in order to support the tottering edifice of superstition, believers will hesitate at nothing to buttress the wavering allegiance of their luke-warm fellow-Christians. The Church will never rebuke her faithful followers for "lying for the glory of God." Formerly, the Church used scaffolds, stakes, prisons, and torture-chambers; now she relies on lies, libels, and misrepresentations.

MIMNERMUS.

The Mechanism of Man.

THE alimentary canal is the name for all the complicated passages along which the food travels through the body. A study of the digestive system must begin with that orifice, the mouth, into which the aliment enters. Not only should the teeth be sound and serviceable, but they should be exercised in masticating the food before it is swallowed. Digestion consists in softening and pulping the food so as to enable it to diffuse through the walls of the alimentary canal and pass into the blood, and thus exude through the walls of the vascular vessels into the tissues.

These changes are accomplished mechanically by the action of the chewing muscles, the teeth, and the three muscle layers situated in the walls of the alimentary passages. Chemical changes result from the action of acids and alkalies on the nutrient substances. Then there are the activities of the ferments or enzymes. These remarkable organic secretions possess the property of producing chemical transformations in substances brought into touch with them, while they themselves continue unchanged. The mouth has one of these secretions, the stomach has two, and there are three in the small intestine.

Until the seventh year, the child's mouth contains twenty temporary or milk teeth. The first of these usually appears when the infant is about seven months old. This set of teeth is shed, and then the permanent teeth cut the gums. These number thirty-two; the earliest appear about the seventh year; and the complete set, unless spoilt by decay, remains throughout life.

People are plentiful who imagine that the main function of digestion is performed by the stomach. This belief is entirely unwarranted. For, in addition to the gastric glands; the salivary glands, the pancreas, and the liver, all powerfully co-operate in the processes of digestion. Those who bolt their food, and these form the vast majority, ignore the far-reaching fact that digestion commences in the mouth. Immediately the food enters the mouth, the saliva of that cavity's salivary glands begin to act upon it. This saliva moistens the food, and thus prepares it for the processes of mastication. It also assists the act of swallowing. When the mouth's interior is parched, swallowing becomes painful and difficult. Moreover, the saliva enables us to taste our food. The organic constituent of the secretion, ptyalin, is an important digestive ferment, which converts starch substances into sugar. Starch contained in food is consequently transformed into sugar while still in the mouth. But this reservation is essential. Ptyalin changes starch into sugar only when granted sufficient time. If the food is insufficiently chewed, it passes into the alimentary canal in an unconverted condition. Unless the aliment is properly masticated, complete insalivation is prevented. As a result, the stomach is overburdened with labour, and the horrors of indigestion begin.

When swallowed, the nutrient matters pass down into the gullet or esophagus, and the muscles of that organ urge them towards the stomach. The solid and liquid nutriment is prevented from passing down the wrong channel by the bending of the epiglottis over the larynx, which lies at the upper part of the windpipe. In this protective office the larynx is now known to co-operate with the epiglottis, which is a sort of lid composed of elastic cartilage which covers the glottis, as the upper aperture of the larynx or voice-box is called.

When the food has entered the stomach, gastric digestion begins. The mucous membrane of the stomach possesses two sets of glands. One glandular secretion is pepsin, which is a most efficient digestive ferment. Pepsin is prepared in the peptic cells, and forms the active constituent of gastric juice. This special fluid is secreted in the gastric glands. Placed between the stomach's peptic cells there are other cells which do not manufacture pepsin, but elaborate the acid of the gastric juice. While digestion is in active operation, the muscles of the stomach's walls contract. Thus the shape of that organ becomes changed. The stomach lengthens and broadens, and its contained food is subjected to a churning process, during which the food is blended with the gastric juice. This fluid is more active than the saliva. The presence of the food in the stomach stimulates the mucous membrane which lines it into action, and its numerous gastric glands busy themselves in the preparation of the gastric secretion.

This powerful digestive juice serves to convert animal and vegetable proteids—substances containing nitrogen, such as lean flesh, cheese, eggs, bread, peas, and beans, into peptones. Unchanged proteids will not diffuse through animal membranes, and are, as such, unavailable for purposes of nutrition. But pepsin so modifies them that they become diffusible, and then they readily pass through an animal membrane. The gastric secretions also arrest the development of injurious germs absorbed with the aliment. The gastric fluid contains a small percentage of hydrochloric acid, and this acid acts as a mild antiseptic. It also aids the pepsin in its activities, for pepsin alone, of all the digestive juices, proves incapable of influencing alkaline bodies. The hydrochloric acid converts substances made alkaline by the action of the saliva into an acid state, and then the pepsin acts with ease.

Proteids are the only alimentary materials reduced by the agency of the stomach and its secretions. The remaining food-stuffs—fats, carbohydrates, salts, and water are immune to the influences of gastric juice, and leave the stomach unchanged. While within that organ the food materials undergo the digestive process of chymification, with the sequel that these foods are converted into chyme. The distinguished Russian physiologist, Professor Pavlov, has recently proved that only when the stomach is stimulated by the presence of food do its glands become active. In the empty stomach no secretions are discharged, and the quantity of digestive juice in the stomach varies in proportion to the amount of food contained in that organ.

As we have stated, the food passes into the stomach at its esophageal opening, and when the nutrient matter has been transformed into chyme, the pylorus—the watcher at the gates—which consists of a tube-like valve situated at that termination of the stomach which passes into the intestines, opens to permit the passage of part of the stomach's contents into the duodenum. The pylorus forms the most narrow part of the small intestine, and its tube, which constitutes the exit of the stomach, is so small that a farthing could barely pass through it. The pylorus relaxes every minute or two, and thus regulates the quantity of chyme which issues from the stomach and enters the duodenum—the twelve-inch intestine. As Meachan says: "The pylorus is a capital gatekeeper, and it shuts up again directly the right amount of chyme has passed through it."

Immediately it leaves the stomach the chyme reaches the first part of the bowel which emerges directly from the stomach, the pylorus standing on guard at the gates. The small intestine extends from the pylorus to the ileo-cæcal valve where the lesser intestine joins the large gut. Its length is twenty-three feet, and its diameter about an inch. Proceeding from the narrow pylorus is the duodenum. This twelve-inch-long intestine forms an extremely important part of the intestinal system. Two invaluable secretions are discharged into the duodenum. This intestinal organ bends round to form a loop which environs the pancreas or "sweet-bread." The duodenum constitutes the thickest, widest, and least flexible channel of the small intestine, and it receives both the common bile-duct, and the duct of the pancreas. The bile is the secretion of the liver, but this intestine owes its priority as a digestive organ to the fact that the secretion of the pancreas, the most powerful of the digestive ferments, is poured into it. For while the saliva acts on some of the starch, and the stomach digests part of the proteid, the small intestine digests the bulk of the starch, the greater part of the proteid, and all the fats.

The food remains in the mouth for a few moments, and lingers in the stomach for two or three hours, but it spends from ten to twelve hours in the small intestine. And, in addition to the secretions of the liver and pancreas which enter the duodenum, there are multitudes of tiny intestinal glands that secrete juice which digests cane sugar. The little intestine also contains a ferment which increases the strength of the pancreatic juice.

Acid Drops.

Mr. Lloyd George gave a speech at Edinburgh on May 24, and reminded his hearers that quite near to where he was speaking John Knox gave a copy of the Bible to the Queen of Scotland. And, added the Prime Minister, "We are fighting for the principles of that book." Really, that is news. Among the principles of "that book" are witchcraft, slavery, the subordination of women, the doctrine of damnation for unbelief, demoniacal possession, miracles, and a number of other things all equally out of date. "The principles of that book" is a very elastic phrase, and it is probable that Mr. Lloyd George did not mean what he said. At least, we hope he did not.

Divine Psychology is the title of a new book by a lady. There is one thing quite clear: the writer is not likely to be hampered by anything in the nature of facts. And when one is dealing with the operations of a mind without knowing there is any mind to operate, the book may well be a big one, if not a useful one.

Religion is popularly supposed to change men's hearts An interchange of views between British and German Baptists, through the Swedish co-religionists, has resulted in a message, quoted in the Baptist Times, which shows that the Teutons are on the side of their own Government in the matter of the War. Is this another instance of the powerlessness of religion?

The endowment of superstition goes on apace. The late Mr. Arthur Bowdler, of Blackburn, left nearly £50,000, out of his fortue of £156,784, to the Congregational Union and the London Missionary Society.

The Salvation Army announce further War Fund Flag Days. We thought that this non-military organization was engaged in fighting "the Devil," and not the soldiers of the Central Powers.

A religious periodical contains an advertisement, "Why Blush?" offering a remedy at a low price. Perhaps Christians blush when they read the realistic earlier pages of the Holy Bible.

Some schoolboy "howlers" are unconsciously amusing, and the report of the Chief Examiner of London County Council schools contains some fine examples. In the recent examination for scholarships, one boy estimated the value of education by stating, "You may become a very great man, or else a clergyman." Another wrote, "If God spares our lives, when we grow up we need not become a teacher." Yet another young student ventured to say that "education saves you from going to the dogs."

How fond pious folk are of using the term "Atheistic" without realizing the real meaning of the word. The late Dr. Silvanus P. Thompson, in a posthumous work, entitled A Not Impossible Religion, refers to the dogma of the Virgin Birth as a materialistic, non-scientific, Atheistic idea. All that the learned professor meant was that the particular dogma was an odd conception.

Principal Griffith Jones declared, in his address from the chair of the Congregational Union, that "their Churches must be born again" before Christianity can become the controlling power in national and international affairs, which was equivalent to admitting that Christianity is doomed to complete extinction, the Churches being, in the nature of things, incapable of the requisite birth.

A good story is told of the German Kaiser in Mr. Edward Legge's new book, King George and the Royal Family. Once the Kaiser remarked complacently to King Edward: "My people look upon me as a god!" "Not when you're in mufti, William," remarked the King, glancing at his nephew's shooting-coat

The Pope has asked the Kaiser to spare the Church bells and organs. Papa might have thought of the women and children first.

Mrs. Bonwick, a lady preacher, speaking at the Memorial Hall, London, said that the women's ideal was that some day there might be an inter-denominational college where men and women should be trained together. "Oh, that will be joyful!"

The glamour of the "Holy Land" will soon be a thing of the past. The newspapers inform us that the firm of Lipton has opened a store at Jerusalem.

The Ven. E. E. Holmes, preaching recently at St. Paul's Cathedral, sadly admitted that he could not, in the utter impotence of his ignorance attempt to explain why an omnipotent God refuses to "stop the present-day slaughter." With Christopher Wordsworth, he has sung, "See the Conqueror mounts in triumph"; and yet he fails to "see the victory." If we judge by the facts, there is no possible escape from the conclusion that God "is a King who has ceased to rule." And yet the Archdeacon believes in God, though he is obscured by a cloud, and cannot be seen at all! "He has for a time been taken out of our sight, but our faith enables us to say he is still there."

The newspapers tell us that the German Kaiser has enjoined all Teutons to "cease to talk foreign languages, and to speak Low German." His own command of language is somewhat copious, but his theology is decidedly "low."

Over five hundred undefended divorce cases have been disposed of in London during the Easter term. Apparently, few people nowadays respect the priestly command, "Let no man put asunder those who God hath joined together."

The dear Daily News does not object to a joke at the expense of the Church, and it tells a story of a short-sighted bishop who went into a hatter's shop and approached, hat in hat, a customer whom he mistook for the shopman: "Have you a hat like this?" he asked, holding out his own corded beaver. "No!" said the other, "and if I had I'd take jolly good care not to wear it."

A proclamation in the United State announces a day for prayer and fasting. This gives point to the Gallic jest that America is "a barbarism lighted by electricity."

The "twisted mind" of the Germans has "annexed even God Himself" in this War, writes Mr. John Oxenham in a Sunday paper. Yet the dear clergy will persist in saying that the Germans are "Atheists."

The report of the Archbishop's committee to consider the reform of Church administration lays stress on "a living wage" for the parsons. In process of time, doubtless, it will be possible to consider the question of "a living wage" for organists, members of the choirs, and vergers.

Hustle has never been a marked characteristic of Government departments, but a newspaper paragraph states that at noon daily in the women's sections of the Post Office work is stopped for two minutes for prayer. As the men's departments are unaffected by this arrangement, any ill results from hustling the deity should not be felt by them.

The Church of St. Catherine Coleman, Fenchurch Street, London, which has no congregation, is to be sold to furnish funds for ecclesiastical purposes. This is an interesting side-light on the boasted revival of religion.

The Church Times does "not consider that, in modern circumstances, a Church is any the more a safeguard of public morality for being nominally 'established.'" That is perfectly true; but our contemporary does not seem to realize that a Church, whether established or not, has never been a safeguard of public morality. As a matter of fact, the Church, in all ages, has been guilty of the grossest breaches of public morality.

For tactlessness and blundering stupidity the parson, as an individual, is hard to beat, and we can imagine the depth of silliness sounded when they act or think collectively. Lately, we have had an amazing example in a circular letter addressed to heads of colleges, professors, and other responsible persons at Oxford, and signed by over a hundred clergymen, only three of whom are directly connected with the government of the University. It would appear that these gentlemen, who are pious water-drinking prigs, have no stomach for fighting the Germans. They prefer the easier task of stabbing the undergraduates in the back. This is what they call the Lord's business, for which they are exempted from military service. It usually means that a set of black-coated humbugs have a mind to poke its nose into other people's business. At an opportune moment, when the flower of Oxford's youth has offered itself a willing sacrifice for an ideal, when practically the whole of the University is on active service, a number of tactless hypocrites are urging the authorities to interfere with the liberty of the undergraduate to drink what suits him. We are pleased to see that Sir Walter Raleigh, the wittiest of professors, has made public, in the University journal, the letter, in which he administers a scornful rebuke to these preposterous clerical humbugs.

Christians have very quaint ideas of holiday-making. Christ Church, Westminster, was open for nine hours on Whit-Monday for "intercession" services. Every hour addresses were given by preachers, and an added inducement was that tea and coffee was provided, we hope by permission of the food-controller.

His lordship, the Bishop of Birmingham, states that "there is only one Christ for the healing of social diseases." Unhappily, there are so many "social diseases," and Christ is not in the directory.

Octagon Unitarian Chapel, Norwich, has appointed a woman preacher. We wonder what St. Paul and the great leaders of the Christian Church would think of it! But really the Unitarians have no clear claim to be called Christians.

THIS-WORLD-ISM.

Seeing that the Power, whatever it be, that created the world (which, I think, certainly cannot have created itself) has, for the present, while using us as its instruments, reserved to itself the privilege of knowing why it has made us and whither it is leading us—seeing that this Power (in spite of all intentions attributed to it, in spite of all the demands made upon it) appears even more and more determined to guard its own secret—I believe, if I may say all I think, that mankind is beginning to cease to try to penetrate that eternal mystery. Mankind went to religions, which proved nothing, for they differed among themselves; it went to philosophies, which revealed no more, for they contradicted one another; and it will now try to find its way out of the difficulty by itself, trusting to its own instinct and its own simple good sense; and since mankind finds itself here on earth without knowing why or how, it is going to try to be as happy as it can with just those means the earth supplies.

A. F. THORN.—We have not received copies of that particular publication for some time. Pleased to have your opinion that God and Man is "splendidly vital and lucid."

W. J.—Your letter has only initials, and no address. We must have these with all communications, if they are to receive attention.

D. M.—Yours is a substantial way of showing your appreciation, and we hope to avail ourselves of it in the course of two or three months.

J. FOTHERGILL.—Received. As early as possible, but crowded with articles at the moment.

A. S. PICKERING.—We agree with your comment on Sir A. Griffith Boscawen's statement that "We have all got to be Christians if we are going to win the War." One would be as great a disaster as the other.

A. RAWLINSON.—Thanks. The circulation of the Freethinker is still creeping upward, and in the course of a week or so we shall be suggesting a plan to our readers by which we think a very material advance may be made. What we have done already makes us certain that more can be done.

L. STANSFIELD.—We are sending the quarter's paper with pamphlets. Glad the last parcel was found useful.

J. HUME.—The lying story about Voltaire was completely exposed by Sir T. C. Morgan, in 1822, who secured signed statements from the doctors in attendance. The Paine story has been exposed scores of times. For that, see Moncure Conway's Life of Paine.

T. FOWLER (Coventry).—Have passed on your letter to the General Secretary. The new Branch will doubtless be glad of your assistance.

J. M.—We are repaid for our trouble by the knowledge that you found our advice so useful.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen has received a large number of letters during the past week congratulating him on his re-election as President of the N.S.S., many containing renewed promises of support, with appropriate words of encouragement. It would be impossible to reply to all these letters by post, and words are inadequate to express his appreciation. So will those who have written please take this paragraph as a grateful acknowledgment?

We know our readers will be interested in the following from a recipient of one of our parcels of literature :—

> Just home for a few hours, and I must write to thank you for the pamphlets you kindly sent; they followed and reached me quite safe.
> The Freethinker reaches me—I have it sent every week—and is eagerly looked forward to, and then read and re-read by my two chums and myself until the next Freethinker arrives.
> Then we hand the old Freethinker on, after making sure that it will be appreciated, because I think it too precious to be given into anybody's hands.
> I must say your pamphlets found me and my chums, and gave many of my "Christian" messmates an awakening. Further, it is interesting to write that, in a crew of roughly eighty men, there is not one ardent Christian; on the other hand, three ardent Freethinkers.
> On every possible occasion I propagate my ideas, and, on the whole, with satisfaction. Moreover, I am not jealous of the Church and her proteges in the Royal Navy.
> Might I ask a favour? Could you find me someone to correspond with? A letter from a Freethinker at home would be ever welcome.
> I am glad you are so optimistic that you will be able to carry on the Freethinker, and hope that indeed you will have "a circulation really worthy of it."

We shall be pleased to send the address to anyone who will act as correspondent to the writer of the above.

We are pleased to say that the two four-page tracts What is the Use of the Clergy? and What Will You Put in its Place? have caught on. They are being well distributed, and we should like to see 50,000 of them in circulation within a month or two. 1s. 6d. will buy a hundred copies, and 15s. 1,000, carriage paid. Their circulation is pure propaganda on the part of the Pioneer Press, as they are being sold at about cost price. More of these tracts will be issued shortly.

In a week or so we shall be publishing a reprint of Mr. G. W. Foote's Philosophy of Secularism. It is in the press, and, when issued, will supply a much-needed want. This will be followed by a pamphlet from the pen of Mr. H. G. Farmer, dealing with the religious opinions of great artists and musicians. Those who know how much of an authority Mr. Farmer is on such subjects will look forward to the appearance of this work. We also have in preparation a larger pamphlet by Mr. Cohen on Christianity and Slavery and Serfdom, which will be fully documented, and will be found useful for propaganda. This will in turn be followed by another from the pen of Mr. Cohen on Christianity and Woman, and later by a treatise on the Existence of God. The times are not favourable for publishing, but as the War seems unending, the only thing is to get on with our war. And that we intend doing in spite of all difficulties.

We are pleased to learn that Mr. Lloyd had two very successful meetings at Maesteg on Sunday last. There seems a good prospect of building a very strong Branch there, and we shall be greatly surprised if more Branches are not formed in the district between now and the end of the year.

The wife of a greatly esteemed member now serving with his Majesty's forces writes Miss Vance. The letter is dated May 20 :—

> I felt I must write and tell you of an incident that occurred last night. The Congregational Church is just opposite their house, and they have a service from 10 p.m. to 11 p.m. every Sunday evening to try and get God's ear and ask him to stop the War.

I was preparing for bed at 10.45 and listening to them singing "O God, our help in ages past," when the syren went, warning us of approaching aircraft. The singing came to an abrupt end, and the people scuttled down the street like rabbits. My daughter, aged thirteen, was in the room and said: "They haven't given God much time to help them, mother." Please excuse me for taking up your valuable time, but I thought it too good to keep to myself.

Large numbers of people to-day are keenly interested in the question of "Survivals," and, indeed, the sociological and humanistic interest of the subject fully justifies the interest shown. Mr. J. H. Moore has just issued, through the Rationalist Press Association, Savage Survivals (2s. 6d. net), which tells in plain but extremely interesting language the story of survivals as they exist in domesticated animals, human society, and social customs. Those who know Mr. Moore's Higher Kinship or Ethics and Education will hardly need advising to secure a copy of his latest work. Those who have not that good fortune will go far before they can find a volume which, while simple enough for an intelligent boy or girl of thirteen, is suggestive and profound enough for more mature persons. There is material here for a dozen volumes, and its reading is certain to send the beginner farther along the road.

Sex Antagonism, by Mr. Walter Heape, is the last addition made by the Pioneer Press to its remainder list. The work is a strikingly suggestive one, and discusses the subject from the evolutionary point of view, which is the only point of view likely to be of real help. Mr. Heape examines in detail the conditions of sex life in primitive communities, and the three chapters on "Totemism" and "Exogamy" are particularly suggestive. The whole work is worthy of the closest study. It was published at 7s. 6d. net, and is now being offered at 3s. 6d., postage 5d. Only a very limited number of copies are available.

From the Literary Guide for June:—

Mr. Chapman Cohen, who has the rare gift of writing both lucid and impressively, has published through the Pioneer Press a threepenny pamphlet, entitled God and Man, being an essay in common sense and natural morality. It is long since we read a more interesting and convincing ethical address, or one better suited for propagandist purposes. We warmly commend it to the notice of our readers.

The North London Branch held a very successful meeting on Sunday last. Mr. H. Johnson was the speaker, and a large audience remained interested to the end of his lecture, while the Christian Evidence lecturer, a little distance off, remained talking to "empty benches." One more evidence of the revived interest in religion—perhaps!

An effort is being made to form a Branch of the N.S.S. at Barnsley, Yorks. There are, we know, a large number of Freethinker readers in and around Barnsley, and if all these interested in organization will send their names to Mr. H. Irving, 48, Sheffield Road, Barnsley, the Branch will be formed at once. If this can be done it is intended to commence active propaganda work in the autumn.

Sanity and simplicity are the distinguishing marks of the loftiest genius, which may be described as inspired common sense. The great artist never loses touch of facts; he may let his imagination soar as high as the stars, but he keeps his feet firm-planted on the ground. All the world recognizes the sublimity of Greek sculpture and Shakespeare's plays, because they are both true to nature and fact and coincident with everlasting laws. The true sublime is not fantastic; it is solid and satisfying, like a mighty Alp, deep-rooted first of all in the steadfast earth, and then towering up with its vineyards, its pastures, its pine-forests, its glaciers, its precipices, and last of all the silence of infinitude brooding over its eternal snows.—G. W. Foote, "Flowers of Freethought."

The "Tricks of the Spirits."

A FEW weeks ago, as I felt rather depressed over the War news, I called upon Uncle Joe, at his nice little villa residence at Dulwich, to see if he could cheer me up a bit, and make me view the awful tragedies that are taking place in France and Flanders from a larger perspective, and try in imagination to realize how the great conflict must end in the final triumph of right over might.

Now, Uncle Joe is a born optimist. He never looks upon the dark side of any subject for long without finding a bright spot somewhere, and, by infusing a little of his own cheery nature into it, he gradually transforms the whole aspect of the subject. Aunt Jane, on the other hand, is liable to be a bit pessimistic on some subjects; and so many of her friends and relations have lost sons in the great War, or have had them "wounded" or "missing," that any mention of a British reverse sends a thrill of horror through her whole frame, she requires all the comfort Uncle Joe can give her to revive her drooping spirits.

On the evening in question, I opened my conversation with Uncle Joe by telling him that I did not like the idea of the British being pushed back in Flanders, and I feared every step we took in the retreat might spell disaster to us.

"Not at all, my boy," he said; "we are all right. The whole move is a bit of fine strategy on our part, and we are bound to come out on top in the end."

This declaration, made with a fine spirit of manly confidence, put me in a better mood at once, and made me feel that I need not discuss the War any further at present, and that the subject might safely be left in the capable hands of Uncle Joe and the military authorities.

Aunt Jane, however, ventured to make one remark. She did not doubt, she said, that we should win in the end; but, in the meantime, she could not help thinking of the brave young fellows who were sacrificing their lives in order that we should be relieved from the thraldom of German militarism.

When, however, we had talked about the War for a few moments, Aunt Jane changed the subject by informing me, with tears in her eyes, that poor young Walter Williams had died in action, and that his parents were overwhelmed with grief at his loss.

"I don't see why they should be so grieved as other people," said Uncle Joe. "Both of the parents are Spiritualists, and they profess to believe that the poor boy is not dead—that, as a matter of fact, he is as much alive now as he was before a shell burst over him and left his body a bleeding mass of earth on the battlefield."

"But in that they do not differ from the generality of Christians," I replied, "for they weep over the dead just like ordinary people who have no belief in a resurrection and a life of everlasting happiness in heaven hereafter."

"It is true we Christians do grieve over the loss of our dear ones; that is a weakness of human nature," said Uncle Joe; "but we still have the promise and 'a certain hope' of a life to come. But we differ from the Spiritualists. They believe that we never die, and therefore it is folly to weep and sorrow over lost ones, because they are not lost, but are in fact more alive than ever, being relieved of the flesh or raiment in which they have been clothed on earth."

"In my judgment, all Christians, to be logical, should be 'Spiritists.' They believe in a soul that has an existence separate and independent of the body."

"Perhaps so," said Uncle Joe, "but we do not believe in table-rapping and things of that sort. By the bye, Mr. and Mrs. Williams wanted your aunt and myself to attend some religious services at one of their halls a short time ago; and they also gave us an invitation to attend some private seances at which a celebrated medium was to be present; but we did not go."

"Why not?"

"Well, we thought we should like to ask your opinion before we ventured upon such a course. We know that you have studied the subject."

"Personally, I should never attend a spiritualistic seance unless I went in the company of an expert conjurer, because I know how easy it is to be deceived; but that is no reason why you should not go. I know enough about the history of the movement and the frauds of some of the leading mediums to convince me that such phenomena as they allege to be capable of producing can be just as well produced under similar conditions by men who confess that the whole thing is done by trickery."

"But they tell me that some of the leading men of science are staunch believers in Spiritualism—distinguished men like Professor Crookes, Sir Oliver Lodge, and Sir Conan Doyle; also that the late Professor Russel Wallace was a believer in it," said Uncle Joe.

"Yes, I know; but none of the evidence that these distinguished men advance in favour of 'Spiritism' seems to me to prove that they receive their messages from 'spirits,' and none of them can tell us what a 'spirit' is, or how a 'spirit,' which is something differing from matter, can act upon matter, or how you can have intelligence apart from an organism. Such questions as these do not trouble them much; at all events, they do not give us a rational answer to them."

"But they say they receive messages from the dead," went on Uncle Joe.

"Yes, I know; but I should like to ask how many of the dead ever learnt the spiritualistic language? How they come to know that three knocks on a table means 'yes' and two 'no'? And how does the medium manage to get into communication with the spirits until they have learnt the language of 'spiritism'? And if they can communicate without the aid of such language, how is it they cannot communicate direct with their parents and friends without the aid of the medium?"

"Well, but the 'mediums' say that they can call up spirits from the vasty deep, and they will come. They tell us of the spirit of John King and others who appeared before a large number of people."

"But have you not noticed that when these ghosts appear they come like the ghost of Hamlet's father—armed from head to foot—they don't leave their clothes behind them? Now, I am like Artemus Ward, I can understand the ghost of my great-grandfather; but, for the life of me, I cannot understand the ghost of my great-grandfather's overcoat."

Aunt Jane looked at me and smiled. Evidently she appreciated the joke, but she made no observation.

"But Spiritualists claim most extraordinary things as being done through the aid of these mediums," said Uncle Joe.

"Again, I say, I know. They tell us of a fat woman, named Mrs. Guppy, being transported through the air, and coming through the roof of a house and falling on to a table before the wondering gaze of a company of credulous believers. They tell us of flowers jumping out of a flower-bed, floating through the air, and landing in a vase on a table; but they don't tell us of any useful service these spirits ever perform."

"Is that so?"

"No spirit ever knows more than the medium through whom he is supposed to communicate his messages; and if the spirit of Shakespeare is ever called up, he talks no more wisely than a superannuated tub-thumper. He never, under any circumstances, says anything to remind us of the profound philosophy of Hamlet, or Prospero, or King Lear."

"But mediums tell us that the 'spirits' can communicate to us facts than nobody but we ourselves could possibly know."

"Indeed. Have you ever heard of a 'spirit' who could tell us what is going to happen to us an hour after he has communicated his message?"

"The wisest man on earth cannot do that."

"Well, then, you think that 'spiritism' is mainly composed of trickery and fraud," said Uncle Joe.

"Certainly, I do; there may be certain psychological phenomena that happen that we do not understand, but that is no reason why we should jump to the conclusion they are produced by spirits. Besides, have you ever thought of this? All the Spiritualist mediums that have been exposed have been in possession of 'the paraphernalia' of their trade, such as 'spirit hands' affixed to musical-boxes, spirit photographs, and other appliances of their profession. Let me quote from the late James Thomson (B.V.), the poet and philosopher, who said in his Satires and Profanities (p. 167):—

> Can anything be darker and more debasing in a so-called civilized home and country than this Spiritism has proved itself from the beginning until now? I have yet to learn that the whole of the world of spirits, now for many years at the beck and call of countless mediums, professional and private, has ever dictated or written a single great sentence, revealed a single great truth, discovered a single important fact. Nothing but the dreariest drivel, or delirium, the most wretched and imbecile juggling tricks, with all sorts of evasions, and deceptions, and lies."

"There, I think that is a very good summing up of the case as it presents itself to the mind of a Freethinker like myself. But you, as a Christian, are entitled to take your own view of the subject."

"Yes," said Uncle Joe, "and though I may not be logical, as you say, I've got brains enough to see through such 'trickery of the spirits' and their mediums as have been revealed in the exposures we have had from time to time in the police-courts and other less public places."

"Did you ever hear a lecture on the subject?"

"Yes. I heard the late Dr. George Sexton when he was a 'Spiritualist'; and I heard my old friend, the late George W. Foote, in debate with Dr. Sexton on the subject for two nights in 1874 at the old Hall of Science. Dr. Sexton was a very clever man, and if anything could have been said from a scientific point of view worth saying, Dr. Sexton was the man to have said it. But he relied almost exclusively on the point that man had 'an inherent desire to live again.' But that proves nothing. I may desire to have five thousand a year, but that doesn't prove that I shall get it. Does it?"

"Certainly not. No; I shall have to ask my friend Williams some questions about his Spiritualism when next I see him, and if he tells me anything worth remembering I will let you know."

One With Another.

THERE are those who believe in Christ, and even of their number some who endeavour truly to serve Him in accordance with his precepts. They find in the exaltation of their religious fervour a sufficient end in life to prepare for the life to come, and they live as it were removed from the world, although pertinent thereto. Indeed, the more sincere do many works of goodliness in following their Master, rendering aid to the helpless, making gifts to the poor, and showing gentleness and kindliness in their dealing with all men, whom they regard as their brothers. These, in spite of their too frequent resemblance to their Master's poverty in the paucity of their worldly goods, seem to reap a goodly harvest of happiness.

There are those who follow Mammon, and whose days are spent in the accumulation of golden wealth. In these times they differ from the God's follower's of ancient days who used to worship the true gold itself, and were never so happy as in the contemplation of a huge or small pile of coin which they possessed. And since many coins were of good workmanship, it is not to be understood that it was the power of coined metal alone which to them was blessed, but that they took pleasure also in the contemplation of the many forms which human ingenuity had given to the shining substance itself. The coin is but a symbol now. It is but a melancholy matter to possess, and its chief significance is the power over his fellows which is wielded by its fortunate owner. Ever in the pursuit of more power, ever in the seeking for greater possibility of possession, and not in its true sense exercise of that power, these spend their lives. Do they not reap a measure of happiness, proportionate though it may be, to the favour of their God?

Again, there are those who deify life itself, and by life they usually mean human life, although they delude themselves with the belief that they worship all organisms as an expression of the Godlike attribute. These spend their lives much in dreaming of schemes for the improvement of the conditions under, and in spite of which, man finds it possible for a short three score years and ten to fan the flickering divine spark. They do more; often by some slight scratchings, the work to which their short duration is devoted, they add their meagre share to the shaping of the monster—Life. The very hopelessness of their gigantic task, and the scant development which has taken place during these many centuries, should appal them, yet they seem to be satisfied—hardly happy.

There is also the great subordinate class who labour, and whose mere existence in the flesh is devoted to the constant striving after the continuance of their sordid living itself. These are by far the most numerous, although considered and treated as the class of least worth. However, individuals pass thence into the other classes occasionally, and breathe the new life of enthusiasm into the fallacious, exhaustive strivings of those other classes.

The artist lives for his art alone, and he is but a member of this class who struggle for continuance; but he is the more noble since he will not be denied the actual exercise of such ability as lies within him, and the glorious desire to attain some goal ever farther distant as he advances towards it. He it is who reaps the harvest of reward, holding credence in the true worth of his aim, the pure joy of his efforts, and the constant irritations of his failures.

All life strives constantly. It seems that fatigue must be the precursor of new force, and new force is that most generally desired.

The mere lust of pleasure cannot bring joyousness one cubit nearer; but the pursuit of an ideal, true or false though it may be, lends that illusion which is so necessary to make life bearable.

The sadness of civilization is not so much consequent upon the constant striving for the achievement of some perfectly hopeless ideal, inasmuch as it is a truism that struggle is the most sane form of pleasure. The misfortune of our human strivings is that so many of us are bound about with the cords of those old falsehoods which have been placed upon us in the time of our innocent, guileless, unsuspecting youth. From these it is so hard to escape that each and all strive rather one with another than one beside the other in a rank that marches to a common goal. The falsehood, nay, the very canker of death, which lurks in our system of morals, our system of commerce, our very ambition, so evilly directed from ages past, darkens with sorrow the name of civilization. And yet it seems impossible that there could ever be agreement amongst us with regard to the value of any ideal. Alas! Ever striving one with another; illusion based upon illusion in a never-ending scale leads us up and down, but does not direct us one and all along a certain path.

And, in consequence, we have in all these ages contrived that poor, dignified fallacy which we pleasantly term the civilized world.

N. S. S. Annual Conference.

Report of Business Meeting.

DESPITE the many and almost unprecedented difficulties now attending a Conference in London, the fact that seventeen out of twenty-one Branches should be represented points to a re-awakened interest in our Cause throughout the country.

The following London Vice-Presidents were present: Messrs. W. H. Baker, T. Gorniot, W. Heaford, J. T. Lloyd, W. Leat, A. B. Moss, Jas. Neate, C. G. Quinton, Victor Roger, T. Shore, H. Silverstein, S. Samuels, T. J. Thurlow, F. Wood; Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, and Mrs. Rolf.

Our Provincial Vice-Presidents representing their respective Branches were: R. Chapman, J. G. Dobson, J. Hammond, F. E. Willis, and E. Clifford Williams.

The Branches represented were: Bethnal Green, Birmingham, Battersea, Glasgow, Goldthorpe, Kingsland, Liverpool, Manchester, Newcastle, North London, Nuneaton, Portsmouth, South Shields, South London, Swansea, Southampton, and West Ham.

Our venerable friend, Mr. G. Alward, of Grimsby, was present.

Mr. J. Holmes, of Wantage, presented a beautiful offering of flowers and foliage, which decorated the platform at the evening meeting.

The roll having been called, the Agenda was proceeded with down to No. 4, the election of the President, followed by that of the Vice-Presidents. Freedom of thought usually necessitates a divergence of opinion, and as these motions, if carried straight through, would have been in opposition to No. 8, the scheme for re-organization standing in the President, Mr. Cohen's name, a quite unusually heated discussion arose, wasting a considerable amount of valuable time, and leading to an early adjournment.

At the afternoon session, "cool patience" having been sprinkled upon the atmosphere during the adjournment, it was agreed unanimously that certain important items should be put to the meeting again.

Re the minutes of the last Conference, on the motion of the Birmingham delegates, it was resolved that a full report of this and future Conference deliberations be supplied to all Branches.

Mr. F. A. Davies temporarily occupied the chair during the re-election of Mr. Cohen as President, and other official elections were also confirmed. Motion No. 7 re the revised rules of the Society was carried, and the next item being Mr. Cohen's scheme for re-organization, the services of Mr. Davies were requisitioned again to give the necessary opportunity for explanation and discussion.

Many complications and much discussion arose on Clause A. Suggestions that the matter be referred to the Executive, and many amendments threatened to occupy the already extended time.

Eventually Mr. Heaford rose to support Motion 9, Clause A, already moved as an amendment to the President's scheme, with an addendum that the matter be brought up before the Interim Conference. Here opinion was again divided and the amendment lost. Mr. Baker suggested that a special committee be formed, composed of delegates from as many Branches as could be brought together to discuss the whole matter and report. Mr. Cohen suggested that a committee of seven be nominated by this Conference.

Finally, the Chairman made a suggestion, with which Mr. Cohen concurred, that a committee be formed of representatives from each of the three oldest London and four oldest Provincial Branches, including the President and Secretary.

It was finally agreed that the report of the Committee should be printed and issued to all members of the Society, and a special Conference convened in a central position to discuss fully, and finally endorse or reject the scheme.

Motion No. 12 by Mr. Cohen was also remitted to this Committee.

The time for the evening meeting having arrived, the remaining motions on the Agenda were remitted to the Executive and the proceedings terminated.

FREETHOUGHT AND THE ARMY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—After being in the Army now for twelve months, it appears to me that a grand field for the propagation of our cause lies amongst the millions of men that now constitute our land forces. Before I was fined £2 and, after six days' imprisonment, "handed over," I was under the impression that it was a great rarity to find a soldier who did not state his belief in some religion or other, especially on the recruiting form. Really, such is not the case, however, and avowed sceptics are quite commonly found amongst all ranks, officers as well as n.c.o.'s and men.

Nearly all the soldiers whom I have shown this paper to were quite unaware of its existence, and it was quite a treat for them to read its contents. As a matter of fact religion has buttressed itself in the Services, like it has always done, when opportunity offers, by means of persecution and penalties. It is a truism to state that not one quarter of the men would attend "divine service" if they could go out or be sure of having the time off instead. So far as my experience goes, attendance at Church is considered duty, and those who are caught evading it are liable to punishment equally with those who commit "crimes." A few weeks ago, through some order made officially, every man in our company was deputed to attend the special place of worship that he had named himself as belonging to, but instead of this occasion being regarded with great solemnity and exactness, no greater mirth was ever caused on a parade by n.c.o.'s in charge making fun of the various religions. As I know you require brevity, I had better conclude with saying that no greater evidence of the progress Freethought has made in the last half century exists than the poor position religion has been relegated to by the rank and file of the Army.

A SONNET.

MUCH had I wondered how it might be shown
That those who told the story of our Lord,
And penned the Gospel record of his word,
Were moved by powers to other men unknown;
And many times when daylight long had flown,
Have pored o'er ancient volumes amply scored,
With proof on proof the doubting mind t' afford,
Yet still retained those doubtings of my own.
Then glad was I to learn, by Matthew faced,
That Mary knew not Joseph ere Christ's birth;
And then, in wonder, follow him, to find
Christ's line through Joseph back to David traced;
For sure such reas'ning cometh not from earth,
But speaks the fulness of the Godhead's mind!

Without philosophers, without some few virtuous men who seem to be of a different nature from the rest of mankind, the worship of a wicked divinity would surely be established over every part of the earth.—Goldsmith.

Freethought and Morals.

In dealing with the morality of Freethinkers, Christians have employed, and still employ, three arguments. First it was said the foundation of unbelief was ill-living. But it was always puzzling in what way unbelief made immorality easy. A man can be a scoundrel and pious with much greater ease than he can combine rascality with unbelief. A profession of piety is a valuable asset for anyone out to swindle the public, and a complete record of the world's scoundrels would show a quite overwhelming proportion of fervent believers. The second argument is that if unbelievers are not bad, at least they would be if they carried their beliefs to a logical conclusion in practice. This argument is advanced by a higher order of writers than the first one, although all that it really amounts to is "As without certain beliefs I should be a scoundrel, seeing that you repudiate those beliefs your blackguardism may be taken for granted." If the blackguardism is not apparent that is because the Freethinker does not see the logical implication of its principles. His morality is saved at the expense of his intelligence.

The Christian Tradition.

From these two arguments there develops a third. If unbelievers are in practice as good as believers, this must not be attributed to greater intelligence or better character, it is due solely to the fact that the Freethinker is born of a Christian ancestry, lives in a Christian society, and so becomes unconsciously influenced by Christian principles. This is substantially the position taken up by two such writers as Mr. A. J. Balfour and Mr. W. H. Mallock. We cannot tell what the ethical consequences of Atheism are because no country is free from the purifying influence of Christian teachings. We cannot separate ourselves from either the power of Christian influence or the "stream of Christian ideas." So runs the argument, and its suicidal nature is obvious. It proves too much, and so destroys itself. For if Freethinkers are the product of a Christian ancestry, Protestants are equally the product of a Catholic ancestry, and Christians generally the product of Pagan forbears. We could go further back still, and prove that the virtue of the whole race was resident in the primitive savage, and so show that all progress is pure myth. For unless one generation can lift itself above the moral and intellectual level of its predecessor there could be no such thing as either progress or development. Each generation builds on the experience of those that went before, and we are utilizing that experience in discarding the myths and puerilities of Christian theology.

Christian or Non-Christian?

It would be quite easy to say, and far from difficult to justify the statement, that instead of the goodness of Freethinkers being the result of a Christian training and a Christian environment, the comparative purity of modern Christian ideas, and the more liberal conduct of modern Christians, are due to the influence of the few that have shaken themselves free from the "stream of Christian ideas." During the whole history of modern Europe there is not a single progressive idea—not a single established truth in science and philosophy that has not had to fight for its life against Christian feeling and teaching. The stream of Christian ideas was on the side of Ptolemy and against Copernicus. It was for a flat earth and against a round one; for miracle and against causation. It was for whipping devils out of lunatics and against mania as a product of neural derangement, for creation and against evolution. The list might be extended indefinitely, and it can be exemplified even in the sphere of morals. It was not Christian influence that made Christians cease burning heretics or gloating over the torments of the damned. Developing knowledge on the one side forced Christians to surrender their absurd teachings in the region of science. A more humane social life on the other side forced them to drop their savage doctrine of eternal damnation. When men, like Morley and Mill, and women, like George Eliot, denounced the inhumanity of Christian teaching, it was not because of Christian influence, but because they had shaken their minds free from it. It is never religion that moralizes man, it is always man that moralizes religion.

The Power of the Past.

There is, of course, a sense in which the present can never wholly escape the influence of the past. The power of the dead hand is very real in all human society. But it is one of the damning features in the history of religion that it has used the past only as a means of enslaving the present. The great aim of religion, now and always, is to chain man to the past, and to prevent his experiencing the full influence of contemporary life and knowledge. That is the bottom reason why we employ in religious services an archaic form of speech use an archaic dress, perform an archaic ceremonial. In the civilized world the priest stands in a privileged position. Why? Only because he is the lineal descendant of the primitive magic-worker, who, by his magic, was believed to have power to coerce or persuade the tribal deities. Just as behind the god is the ghost, so behind the priest is the medicine-man, and so behind the elaborate ceremonial of the modern cathedral there are the magic-working ceremonies of the primitive savage. All religion strives to keep the past alive because its real life belongs to the past. There is no hope and no justification for it in the present.

Prospective and Retrospective.

But we are told that we cannot tell what would be the effect on society of the wholesale adoption of Atheism, because no society professing Atheism has ever existed. True, so far as the latter part of the statement is concerned; and yet, if Christianity has an advantage over Freethought in this respect, we imagine it is one that Christians would often like to be without. So far as social control is concerned, the Freethinker must look to the future. The Christian can only prophesy what Freethought will do. But with Christianity there is no need for prophecy. Its record is before us; its influence and the results of its control are matters of history. And we know that the period during which the influence of Christianity was strongest was the period of civilized history when intellectual life was lowest, morality weakest, and the general outlook most hopeless. Christian control gave us heresy-hunts and Jew-hunts. It gave us burnings for witchcraft, and magic in place of medicine. It gave us the Inquisition and the auto-da-fe, the fires of Smithfield and the Night of Bartholomew. It gave us life without happiness and death cloaked with nameless horrors. It gave us the war of sects, and it contributed largely to establish the sect of war. Certainly, the Christian record is before us, and it is such that every Christian Church blames all the others for its existence. Quite as certainly we cannot point to a society which has been dominated by freethinking ideas; but we can point to their existence in all stages of civilization, and can demonstrate that whatever improvement has been effected must be attributed to their presence. We can show that advanced ideas have always originated with the least, and have been resisted by the most, Christian section of society; that freedom of thought and speech, increased purity and truthfulness of spirit, have always been forced upon the Churches from without. What Christianity has been, we know. What Freethought will be, we can only guess; and we can speculate cheerfully in the conviction that honesty is possible without the lie of religion, and that duty may still be done with no other incentive than its visible consequences on the lives of those around us.

The Cross of Christ.

II.

IN estimating the evidences of either the triumph or of the defeat of Christ's Cross in history, it is essentially necessary to bear in mind the radical distinction between the primary and the secondary objects for the realization of which it is said to have come into existence. Both objects are distinctly stated in the New Testament, though in the great Creeds only the primary aim occupies the forefront of importance. In the Pauline Epistles the Cross is God's message of reconciliation to a world at enmity with him. Believers are represented as saying that when they were enemies they were reconciled to God by the death of his Son. The primary effect of the Cross, therefore, is reconciliation, not between man and man, but between man and God. As a secondary effect comes the brotherhood of believers, not of mankind. This brotherhood is described as a new creation in Christ Jesus. That is to say, those who become reconciled to God by the death of his Son enter into a bond of union and harmony among themselves. They alone are "the brethren" who are earnestly exhorted to love one another, while all the rest of mankind constitute what is called "the world," which is not an object of love. In John's Gospel, God is represented as loving "the world," so that those in it who believe may not perish but have everlasting life; but in John's First Epistle the brethren are forbidden to love the world on the assurance that "if any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him." According to Calvinism, which in the Catholic Church is known as Augustinianism, Christ died only for "the sheep," the elect, and it is they alone who can be saved. Be this as it may, the fact that stares us in the face is that the reconciliation effected by the Cross has never been realized except by a comparatively small percentage of the human race. Christendom itself, at its very largest, has formed but an insignificant fraction of the world. Surely, this fact is totally ignored by those who so confidently declare that the Cross has triumphed, or that Christianity has conquered the world.

What has the Cross accomplished in Christendom? Nominally, it has produced the Church, though in strictest truth the Church has produced the Cross. At first the Church was the smallest and feeblest of institutions, of which Paul, its chief founder, was often profoundly ashamed. For the first three centuries the brethren comprised not many wise men, not many mighty, not many noble, but were noted, as Paul tells the Corinthians, for their lack of wisdom, for their weakness, insignificance, and even baseness. The Corinthian converts, at any rate, did not even love one another, but were divided into several contentious parties or factions. It is true, however, that, as a rule, they did display, especially in times of persecution, considerable loyalty to one another, but for the Pagan world round about them they entertained bitter hatred and undiluted contempt. The Master's commandment: "Love your enemies," was systematically disregarded by them. Even the great Apostle of the Gentiles did not seem to be aware that such a commandment was in existence, for of Jesus he says that "he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet." When, under Constantine the Great, the Cross became a power in the Roman Empire, it was by no means the power of beneficent love, but of the material sword. Paganism was suppressed by force of arms. The Cross won its nominal victory in the West, not by fulfilling the royal laws of love, but by inducing the State to crush all rivalries beneath its iron heels. But what did this nominal victory of the Cross really signify? Not the advent of righteousness and truth as regnant factors in social life, not the overthrow of the powers of darkness by the omnipotence of holy love; but, rather, the establishment of the Church as the lowest and most cruel tyrant the world had ever seen. The history of the Middle Ages is practically the history of one form of oppression struggling with all its might for the subjugation of another form. Dean Milman's History of Latin Christianity, as well as Bryce's Holy Roman Empire, show with the utmost clearness that the most fondly cherished ambition of the Church was to gain absolute supremacy in Europe, to be the sole arbiter in politics as well as in religion, and to exploit the State to its own advantage. For a time that ideal was on the point of being realized, both in England and on the Continent. Emperors and kings there were who recognized the superiority of the Popes.

Now, the truth is that when the Church was at its highest and strongest, the Cross was at its lowest and weakest. The plan of the world's salvation through faith in the crucified and risen Christ has never been fulfilled, even on the smallest scale. This is virtually admitted by Christians themselves. "Of course," they say, "the Churches have failed. Had they succeeded, it would have been a bigger miracle than any recorded in the New Testament." In that strange admission it is forgotten that the world's redemption was to be the biggest miracle in history, God's own masterpiece. The Gospel Jesus predicted that his crucifixion would result in drawing the whole human family to himself as Saviour and Lord. The Church claims to be a supernatural institution, the very body of Christ on earth, or the temple of the Holy Ghost, and it naturally follows that its failure is nothing less than the failure of the Holy Trinity. Of course, the success of the Church would have been the most stupendous of all miracles; but was it not in order that such a miracle might be performed that Christ promised to indwell it to the end of time? Was it not for the purpose of achieving that end that he promised to send the Holy Ghost to be its life and power? If we accept the New Testament interpretation of the Church's mission, there is no possible escape from the conclusion that the collapse of the Church represents the downfall of the supernatural principle. It is immaterial whether we distinguish between the Church and Christianity or not, or between organized and unorganized Christianity; the vital point being that the Church is the Divinely appointed agent or instrument chosen by the Redeemer to do his redemptive work, and that its impotence undermines the whole supernatural system. Principal Forsyth, without intending it, confirms this view when he observes that the conditions of life in this world are so hopelessly bad that even theologians "are driven into a new belief in another world, in Immortality." He says:—

> We are driven to find more meaning, and perhaps spend more time, in God's realm of eternal lordship by love, his righteousness perfectly holy, and his universal grace. It would be impossible to believe in his love or his kingdom if we could not call in another world to redress the balance of this, or rather to answer its groaning prayer (The Justification of God, p. 157).

J. T. LLOYD.

The Clerical Offensive.

> If I had been a bishop, with an income of five to fifteen thousand pounds a year, I should have had an inexhaustible source of rejoicing and merriment in the generosity, if not in the credulity, of my countrymen.—John Bright.

WHEN the World-War started the clergy hailed the event as the happy harbinger of a spiritual awakening, but subsequent events have discounted the hope. The War, which has tested so many men and institutions, has not spared the Christian Churches. It has, indeed, brought out strongly the unselfish sacrifice of hundreds of thousands who were utterly indifferent to the Churches, but it has also revealed, on the part of the clergy, and their leaders, a spirit of cant, compromise, and cowardice, that must tend to lessen what influence the Black Army possessed with the mass of ordinary citizens.

Freethinkers do not need to be reminded that this clerical influence is diminishing, and has long been a slowly vanishing quantity. And the clergy themselves have not been slow to perceive the waning allegiance of their flocks, and the high sniffing contempt of people who do not often trouble the pew-openers. A speech just delivered by Canon Meyrick, of Norwich, shows which way the wind of opinion is blowing, and is likely to provoke discussion on a question which cannot be reckoned as of small importance. Realizing the growing disfavour of the clergy, and the anachronism of mediæval prelates in a democratic country, Canon Meyrick seeks to restore the Church's balance of power by the creation of "many more Bishops and no more prelates." The Canon, naturally, wishes to keep the present bench of bishops to safeguard the political position of the Government religion; but he would curry favour with the democracy by the creation of many more new bishops, presumably to act as assistants to the titled and begaitered prelates who have brought the Church to its present position of impotence. Canon Meyrick asserts that the present bishops are overworked, and that they are aloof from the rank and file of the clergy, and that they have no sort of understanding of the laity and the general public. The creation of an entirely new class of working bishops, leaving the existing bench of bishops in their places, would do much to increase the Church's hold on the masses.

Canon Meyrick's attitude shows how far removed the Church of England is from democratic hopes and ideals. In the piping times of peace the anachronism of a clerical caste in our midst passed almost unnoticed, but the War has brought out in strong relief the position of the selfish and skin-careful clergy. All can recall the fervent appeals made by these priests, coupled with the fact that they have been themselves exempted from military service, and are free to tread the primrose path of dalliance. Is it strange that there should rise a note, not so much of remonstrance as of revolt, which suggests that the nation is dissatisfied with the behaviour of the clergy, from the wealthy bachelor occupant of Fulham Palace to the rotund tenant of Little Pedlington vicarage, who have equally proved themselves out of touch with the general life and aspirations of the nation. At a time when the civilized world is in convulsion, the Bishops have found time to discuss the claims of Charles the First to the highest rank of saintship. They have busied themselves in the important matter of altering the "vile body" of the Burial Service to "this body of our low estate." And they have found time to gloss the barbarities and indecencies of the "Psalms" of the Holy Bible. But on the great issues of the present day, how incomparably great should be clear to the thickest heads, they have shown a complete and shameless indifference, except to their own interests.

Canon Meyrick lays stress on the proper functions of statesmanship of the Bishops, but he had better have left that matter severely alone. The votes of the Right Reverend Fathers in God in the House of Lords is sufficient to rouse the lasting hostility of all right-thinking citizens, and their shameful opposition to all progress shows how hopelessly the Church of Christ is out of touch with democratic issues.

The Bishops voted against admitting Nonconformists to University degrees, and against the removal of civil disabilities from Catholics, Jews, and Rationalists. They opposed the introduction of Free Education, and voted against the admission of women to London Borough Councils. None voted for the abolition of flogging women in public, flogging women in prison, or the use of the lash in the Army and Navy. Scores of measures for the bettering of the conditions of the working classes have been opposed by these mediæval and reactionary ecclesiastics, and their political record is sufficient to carry its own condemnation.

This new bid for popularity on the part of the Bishops is foredoomed to failure. Few worse misfortunes can befall any people than this of possessing a very powerful ecclesiastical institution in its midst that saps the very springs of morality and humanity, that permits mental and moral confusion, and that constantly hinders and hampers the wheels of progress in the way that the Church of England does. It is a survival from the past, and the enemy of democracy, and must be fought until it is no longer a power for evil. For the Church is opposed to the spirit of liberty, which animates the progressive peoples of the world.

The Mechanism of Man.

VIII.

DURING the progress of digestion in the small intestine the chyme becomes thoroughly mixed with both the bile and the pancreatic secretion. The chyme is thus reduced to a creamy condition. At this stage it is known as chyle. Having been subjected to the action of all the intestinal juices, the chyle journeys through the small intestine which contracts gently and rhythmically with a worm-like movement termed peristalsis. These digestive processes completed, the labour of absorption begins.

The duodenum is prolonged into the jejunum, which is eight feet in length. From the jejunum proceed the remaining twelve feet of the small intestine—the ileum. This part of the small bowel terminates at the ileo-cæcal valve which opens into the large intestine. The large bowel extends from the ileo-cæcal valve to the anus where the waste solid substances—the excrementary matters—are discharged.

The first part of the large intestine is called the ascending colon, and just below this lies the cæcum, from which the vermiform appendix proceeds. The cæcum is much larger in herbivorous mammals than in man. In fact, it forms the second stomach in ruminating animals—those that chew the cud. The ox, deer, and sheep are well-known instances of these. In man, the apes, and monkeys, and other mammals, this organ persists in a dwindled state. With them it is a vestigial organ, and points to their descent from herbivorous ancestors. The vermiform appendix is, in man, about four inches long. It is a small blind tube devoid of utility in the higher mammalia, but, unfortunately, its inflammation proves the occasion of the frequently fatal disease of appendicitis.

Immediately it issues from the lesser intestine the large intestine passes upwards on the right side of the abdomen. Hence its name of the ascending colon. As it approaches the gall bladder, the ascending colon pursues a horizontal course, and then becomes the transverse colon. Having travelled across the abdominal cavity from right to left, it commences to descend when it nears the spleen, and passes down on the left side of the abdomen. This section of the gut is termed the descending colon, and it curves at its lower end before passing into the rectum, which forms the last part of the large intestine. At the lower region of the rectum there is a strong muscular ring, the sphincter ani, which relaxes periodically while the function of defaecation is being performed.

Not merely must the food be digested, but it must also be assimilated if it is to furnish the requirements of the organism. Before absorption can take place two conditions are indispensable. Food substances must be rendered soluble in the blood plasma and its derivative, the lymph, and they must become capable of diffusion through an animal membrane.

The chief centre of absorption is the small intestine, while there are two ways in which nutrient matters may be assimilated. These are absorbed, both by the blood vessels, and the channels of the lymph. The portal vein is formed by the junction of the various veins proceeding from the digestive viscera. These veins arise from the blood capillaries in the bowel, stomach, and other visceral organs. These capillaries directly absorb sugar, salts, water, and the peptones. In this manner these materials immediately enter the general circulation. The portal vein thus carries to the liver several food-stuffs including sugar. This last is stored in the liver, while the other nutrient materials travel to the hepatic veins, and from them to the heart.

The membrane which lines the small intestine contains large numbers of tiny projections termed villi. Each villus possesses a lacteal, and as the chyle passes over these projections part of it exudes through the epithelial surfaces of the villi into the lymphoid tissue lying below, from which it passes into the lacteal, and then the nutriment enters the lymphatic circulation. A small quantity of peptone is absorbed through the villi, but their special foods are fats.

Water permeates any part of the lining of the intestinal canal. Soluble salts are absorbed by the vascular vessels of the stomach as well as some forms of sugar. It is concluded that 20 per cent. of the nitrogen present in food is actually absorbed in the large intestine. We may briefly state that "Proteids as peptones, sugar, salts, and water are absorbed by the blood vessels, and fats by the lacteals."

In the tissues the capillaries form a close meshwork, and part of their contained blood plasma passes through the delicate capillary walls, and thus conducts its nutritive materials to the cells of the tissues. This fluid which passes from the capillaries to the tissues is the lymph. Lymph is a pale liquid, and is chiefly water holding proteids and other substances in solution. Unlike blood, the lymph contains no red corpuscles, although it possesses colourless corpuscles in abundance.

The lymph occupies the spaces between the cells of the tissues. These spaces are drained by a network of minute lymphatic vessels, which gradually join up into larger channels, which convey the lymph from its tissue. The lymphatic vessels from the various organs of the body become linked up into increasingly larger vessels, which ultimately pour their contents into the thoracic duct. This main lymphatic organ is situated in the trunk, in front of the vertebral column. As stated in Foster and Shore's Physiology :—

> It lies in the thorax on the front of the dorsal vertebræ, passes through the diaphragm, and extends down the abdomen to the level of the lumbar vertebræ, where the lymphatics from the legs and lower part of the trunk open into it. The lymphatics from the intestine and the other abdominal organs also open into it, so that the lower end of the thoracic duct is larger than the rest of it, and is called the receptaculum chyli.

From this chyle receptacle the thoracic duct advances upwards through the abdomen and thorax to the left of the esophagus or gullet. Finally, the duct opens into and discharges its lymphatic fluid into the blood-stream at the root of the neck, where it enters the large jugular vein at that vein's junction with the left sub-clavian vessel, the leading vein of the left arm. Thus the lymph, after passing through the walls of the vascular capillaries into the lymphatic channels, becomes restored by the lymphatic vessels and the thoracic duct to the blood system.

Although the blood nourishes and sustains the organism as a whole, still, save in the spleen, the vascular fluid itself never directly enters into the vital cells of the various tissues of the body or brain. The lymph serves as the blood's instrument in fulfilling this function. The lymph vessels are amply provided with valves which assist the flow of the lymph towards the veins that receive it, but which would open to obstruct its passage in the opposite direction. The lymph courses through its channels as a result of pressure. This pressure is maintained by the lymph which is constantly forming in the vessels which spring from the capillaries, and this pressure, aided by the valves, easily overcomes any resistance presented by the blood vessels into which the lymph is discharged.

Solid, and usually bean-shaped, bodies, which vary considerably in volume, are seated in the lymphatic system. A lymphatic vessel is occasionally obstructed in its course by a lymphatic gland, and this impediment must be passed through before the lymph can continue its journey. A gland of this character acts as a filter, and prevents microbes from entering into the blood system, while it is also the birthplace of the white blood corpuscles. Each of these glands consists of a network of delicate connective tissue, in which immense numbers of lymph corpuscles lie crowded together. These leucocytes, or white corpuscles, are smaller than those found in the blood. In truth, they are baby corpuscles, that are continually dividing and re-dividing, and thus increasing in number. As the lymph pushes itself through the lymph-gland's network, and then flows onward, it carries with it a fair proportion of these infant corpuscles. In this manner is the blood supplied with its colourless corpuscles. As we have seen, these little bodies are largely essential to the well-being of the organism, as they prove formidable foes to the baleful microbes which invade the animal system. All these colourless corpuscles appear to be generated in lymphatic glands, or in tissue of a kindred character situated in other parts of the human body.

T. F. PALMER.

Acid Drops.

At the request of the Pope, the Allied Commanders agreed not to bomb Cologne on Corpus Christi Day. So the Colognese on that day were able to go about their religious performances with easy minds. But the big German gun continued bombarding Paris, and on Whit-Sunday London was raided by German aeroplanes. Such are the amenities of Christians at war. For nearly four years millions of Christians have been engaged in killing each other by some of the most brutal and most horrible methods conceivable. Christian belief could do nothing to bring war a day nearer the end, but it could hold up the bombardment of one city out of respect for a religious festival. This triumph of Christian belief is remarkable.

It is a strange thing, said Mr. Smallwood, M.P., that after nearly four years of war, the Churches are empty. We think the strange thing would be if they were full. Four years of this War are not likely to impress any sensible person with either the truth or utility of religious beliefs. The German attack on Belgium destroyed more than a "scrap of paper"; it was the beginning of an awakening for thousands who had hitherto troubled themselves but little about religion. The War has made them think, and that process is always more or less fatal to religious beliefs.

A panic was caused in a church near Subiaco, Italy, by a woman shouting, "Save yourselves! Help!" Nearly 200 people were killed or injured. The woman was found to be suffering from delusions. But if all those suffering from delusions stayed away from church, very few would attend.

Providence does not appear to have any great regard for religious buildings. A fire took place at the St. Joseph's Convent, Hackney, and one of the inmates was fatally burned. At St. Cuthbert's, Bowes Park, fire caused damage amounting to £600.

A profane story was printed recently in the Evening Standard (London). A Canadian soldier was so ill that visitors were denied. This restraint proving irksome, he induced another patient to get him some telegraph forms. Next day the nurse found on his bed the following official wire: "Your crown is not ready. No hurry. Gabriel, Heaven." The Archangel is still waiting, as the patient recovered.

"The strange thing about the Churches to-day is that after nearly four years of war they are empty," says Mr. E. Smallwood, M.P. It would be a stranger thing if the Churches were full.

The Roman Catholic procession of the Society of Our Lady of Lourdes, which took place at Westminster, is a further proof that the Catholic clergy are making a bid for popularity. The London press gave a lot of space to this revival of superstition, but their accounts differ considerably. One paper declared that 20,000 persons took part, and another 12,000; but all were exceedingly polite. What a lot of water has passed under London Bridge since the old anti-Popery days.

The Church Times says that during the past few days some Parisians have been wearing little green and yellow dolls as protectors against bombs and shells. It adds, sarcastically, that "while it is legitimate mascotry to wear these, it is drivelling superstition to set a little figure of St. Christopher on a motor car or to invoke St. Genevieve, patroness of Paris." We quite agree there is no distinction between the two, although our point of view is different from that of the Church Times. We believe the Church Times would agree with the invocation of saints, while we hold that the wearing of the yellow doll is quite as good as that of prayers to St. Genevieve. The real moral is that there is an immense amount of latent superstition among the people, and under emotional tension it will out. That, indeed, is an ever-present danger facing civilization.

About sixty parsons in London have "expressed their intention of joining the Army for combatant service." It is a dazzling record—after nearly four years of a world-war. "Onward, Christian soldiers!"

A correspondent of a London paper describes a sermon of Billy Sunday's as "the most athletic speech" he had seen. Surely this describes to a nicety the perambulations of this pious, perspiring, peripatetic, pulpit-puncher.

Dr. Jowett, speaking at Westminster Chapel, compared the Church of Christ to a "great shining light" throwing its beams over a very naughty world. Unfortunately, few consider the Church's wax candles as being a modern illuminant.

A correspondent wishes to know whether the Bishop of London ever issued a public statement of his income and expenditure? Such a statement was issued by the Bishop towards the end of 1904. Here it is:—

Fulham Palace and London house rates taxes	848	12	6
Queen Anne's Bounty	422	4	7
Income tax	500	0	0
Household expenses, including the keeping up of a house with 44 bed-rooms and the entertainment of candidates for ordination	1,678	9	5
Repair of houses	1,190	7	3
Coal, gas, and electric lighting	379	9	5
Stabling account	895	0	4
Garden and farm	723	9	6
Stationery, printing and postage	388	9	4

So that after deducting the cost of rent, rates, taxes, garden, food, postage, etc., all the poor Bishop has left is a paltry £2,973 17s. 8d.—presumably, for pocket-money.

The innocent manner in which the clergy often give their case away is highly amusing as well as deeply significant. Preaching in London recently, the Bishop of Oxford said that "power" is "the last word which we should naturally choose to describe the Christian Church in the whirl of our present civilization." What a terribly humiliating confession for an orthodox bishop to make! Did not his lordship realize that he was undermining the belief in the proper Deity of Jesus Christ as well as that in the Divine origin and authority of the Church?

Of course, Bishop Gore explains the present impotence of the Church; but his very explanation is even more damaging to the cause than the confession itself. His lordship's strange contention is that in apostolic times the Church possessed and exercised supernatural power, but that in these modern days she has lost it. What he does not see is that the Church's impotence disproves her Divinity as well as the truth of her Founder's brilliant prophecy concerning her victorious career in the world.

Mrs. Despard, President of the Women's Freedom League, placed a laurel-wreath on the statue of John Stuart Mill in Temple Gardens, to commemorate the fifty-first anniversary of his championship of the women's cause in the House of Commons. A tardy recognition of the work of the man whom Gladstone called "the saint of Rationalism."

A star-turn at the West London Mission recently was Mr. F. W. Murtfeldt, Secretary of the American Y.M.C.A.

The will of the Rev. H. A. Starkie, of Settle, Yorkshire, has been proved for £293,922, and the late Rev. J. Chapman, of Retford, Notts, left property to the value of £49,210, whilst the Rev. H. L. Fanshawe, of Chilworth, Oxfordshire, left £24,389. All should have a very warm reception in the next world.

We see from the Poor Law Officer's Journal that the Mayor of Bishop's Castle, at a recent meeting of the Board of Guardians, moved that, in view of the need for economy, a paid chaplain is no longer justified, and that any such services required be of a honorary character. But the chaplain declines to resign, and it seems that the guardians have not the power of dismissal. So there the matter stands, and one may trust parsons to hang on to jobs where any salary is attached. For our part we see no reason why, when religious services are needed in workhouses or other public institutions, these should not be undertaken by "nearby" clergymen as part of their ordinary duties. In the majority of cases, these religious services are not demanded by the inmates, they are forced on them. And the clergy are foremost in seeing that the pressure is maintained. They are equally insistent that the public shall pay for their services.

The promised revival of religion is long overdue, but there is a noticeable friendliness between the ministers of the Government religion and the Free Church clergy all over the country. So true is it that adversity makes strange bedfellows.

Parents no longer give their children Bible names as they used to, and people are unfamiliar with them. A witness in a law case at Willesden remarked that he was baptized Jehu, but folk made such a mess of it, so he called himself John.

Canon Meyrick, speaking at Norwich, pleaded for simpler bishops. Isn't the Bishop of London as simple as a South Sea Islander?

From the Greenock Telegraph of May 28, we learn that a speaker at the U.P. Assembly declared that "men in the dug-outs in France were living under happier conditions than some of the families in this land, and that a South African kraal was no worse than some of the houses in the Western Isles." We do not doubt the substantial accuracy of these statements, and as they stand they throw a strong light on the professed interest of the Churches in the welfare of the working classes. In any but a Christian country, such things would have been—to Christians—proofs of the need of Christian teaching. What is the moral in this country?

The Bishop of Durham, in inviting the younger clergymen to volunteer, declared that if he had been twenty-five years' younger he would have offered himself for service. The Church is generally too late.

The Irish Presbyterian Church has had a pleasant windfall of £6,000 from the estate of the late Mr. J. C. Fulton, of Armagh. The "Chinese Presbyterians" will be jealous.

Field-Marshal Hindenburg's daughter, Elsie, has written a hymn, beginning "Christ Jesus gave His life for me," and containing the line "He (Jesus) to the bayonet thrust gives vigour." Another striking example of German "Atheism."

Religion is not always a blessing and a comfort as the clergy pretend. In the case of Florence Hazell, a domestic servant, whose body was found in the Bell Weir, Egham, it was stated that she suffered from religious mania. The jury returned a verdict of "suicide whilst of unsound mind."

On the authority of Lady Hope, a religious publication recently asserted that Charles Darwin abandoned his Agnostic position. A copy of the publication was forwarded to Sir Francis Darwin, who replied in the following letter to M. A. Leivre, Secretary of the Protestant Press Bureau:—

> Lady Hope's account of my father's views on religion is quite untrue. I have publicly accused her of falsehood, but have not seen any reply. My father's Agnostic point of view is given in my Life and Letters of Charles Darwin. You are at liberty to publish the above statement. Indeed, I shall be glad if you will do so.

We are afraid that "lying for the greater glory of God" is still too vigorous a profession for us to hope that this particular falsehood will cease to be told. All experience proves that religious writers will go on lying just so long as it pays them to do so.

Ordinary Christians appear to strongly object to their co-religionists who possess consciences, and Conscientious Objectors at Wakefield have sent a letter of complaint to the Home Secretary and some Members of Parliament, setting out the difficulties they have to encounter. They object to being badgered to make a Wakefield holiday.

Sir William Robertson Nicoll is of opinion that "the best thing we can say about God is that he is like Christ." Unfortunately, nobody knows what Christ was like, for the pictures of him are innumerable, and they are all fundamentally different. To which of them is God like? The only rational inference is that both Christ and God are purely imaginary beings, of whom no knowledge is procurable on any terms.

Church Bells.

If Life were Joy: if Truth relieved the Earth,
And fat stupidity, deprived of breath,
Gave place to Mirth—
And Man had conquered Death.
The Church, with solemn majesty would tell,
How "God" had died, and ring its little bell.

If multitudes of Life-starved, simple folk,
Were blessed with Reason, and a sense of Right,
To cast the yoke—
Of "Sin" into the night.
The Church would hope that all might yet be well,
Would drape the Cross, and ring its little bell.

If War was vanquished, or the Sword laid down,
And dreams of human Liberty were born,
While every town—
Laughed servile fools to scorn,
The Church would pray "Deliverance from Hell,"
Would play a tune, and ring its little bell.

ARTHUR F. THORN.

The necessity for external government to man is in inverse ratio to the vigour of his self-government. Where the last is most complete, the first is least wanted. Hence, the more virtue the more liberty.—Coleridge.

Concerning the "Freethinker."

A NEW Paper Order prohibits the sending out of any paper or journal "on sale or return." This means that all who want a paper must order it beforehand, for newsagents will not stock papers if there is a chance of their being left with unsold copies.

This will not greatly affect the present circulation of the Freethinker (it is likely to suffer far more from the wholesale call up of men for military service), although it is pleasing to record that more and more newsagents are displaying this paper. But, then, we are not satisfied with the present circulation of the Freethinker, and should not be if it were five times as great. The new Order will prevent one method of securing new readers—and it is new readers that an Editor is after all the time. So we venture to suggest a plan whereby, at the cost of a couple of coppers per week—and probably without any cost at all—the Freethinker may continue to appear in the windows of as many agents as will display it.

We want in every town two or more readers of this paper to enrol themselves as members of a Freethinker League. We will then see that they are made acquainted with each other. That done, let them see which newsagents who already supply the paper on order will take extra copies and display them for sale, the members of the League buying back the unsold copies. By this plan the newsagents will be guaranteed against loss, and the guarantors will at most have to pay a copper or so per week, and most probably nothing at all. For where the Freethinker is displayed, it soon secures purchasers.

Another way would be for the members of the League to themselves act as agents or distributors of the paper among their friends. This is a most effective way of gaining new subscribers, and is already being done in many cases.

Yet a third plan. Members of the League should send us the names and addresses of all whom they consider likely to become subscribers. We will then send them specimen copies, free, for six weeks. If they do not subscribe by the end of that time, we give them up as hopeless.

Our readers have helped so well in the past that we count on their help here with confidence. Some time back we asked for 1,000 new readers, and we got them —we mean that the circulation actually increased by 1,000 per week. Then we asked for a second thousand, and we have made some progress in getting that number. Now we are guarding against losing, and are out for a still further increase.

There is only one Freethinker in the world for all who know it. We think we may all safely claim that it is doing a great work in the country, and that its influence bites as deeply as any journal published. We are working like the proverbial "nigger" at our end, and under conditions of unprecedented difficulty. We therefore feel warranted in asking all who value the paper to do what they can on the lines suggested.

So please send along your names and addresses as volunteers for the Freethinker League, and we shall then hope to soon announce that we have added a full second thousand to the circulation of a paper that plays to no party, and fans no passion save that of truth and justice.

When shall the saner, softer polities
Whereof we dream, have play in each proud land,
And patriotism, grown God-like, scorn to stand

To Correspondents.

T. FOWLER.—Thanks. We hope to see the Coventry Branch very active during the coming autumn. If we can help in any way, please let us know.

W. BARTON.—Paper being sent to the soldier's address supplied.

E. TAYLOR.—We are glad to learn that the Huddersfield paper reprinted our notes on "Man Power and the Clergy." We, of course, prefer that, in such cases, acknowledgment of origin should be made; but the chief thing is for the opinions to gain publicity. Your own letter, however, corrects the omission, and adds some shrewd and well said comments on your own account. We agree with what you say as to the influence of politics on intellectual candour. The one is usually fatal to the other. We also agree that the cause of Freethought can never be advanced by coarseness or vulgarity. Such things attract a class that any movement is better without.

J. H. LANGFORD.—Your good wishes and congratulations are greatly appreciated.

R. J. BENSON.—Sorry we do not know enough of the system about which you enquire to express an opinion.

PTE. J. MORGAN.—Sorry that want of space prevents printing your interesting letter. We have kept it, however, with a view to future use. You have made a brave stand for your opinions, and we feel sure must have gained the respect of the best of the men around you. You have our admiration at all events.

E. L. LINTHORNE.—We fail to catch the drift of your letter.

E. E. STAFFORD.—Thanks for portrait. Hope you will continue to keep "fit" to the end.

R. NEWTON.—Pleased you have found the tract What is the Use of the Clergy? so useful. We should like to see a hundred thousand in circulation within the next three months.

T. DENNIS.—Glad to know you had a good meeting last Sunday. Sheffield badly needs rousing.

G. E. RULE.—Pleased to learn that you had a good meeting at Victoria Park, and to know that you are keeping active in other directions.

G. T. WHITEHEAD AND W. BRIDEN.—Have sent on your names to the correspondent. Thanks.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Owing to the new postal rates, every copy of the Freethinker sent through the post must have stamped on it the name of the paper. If this is not done, the postage will be one penny. We shall continue sending out copies in the ordinary way, except in such cases where the extra postage is prepaid. This will mean 2s. 2d. per year, or total subscription 12s. 8d. Those who do not mind the name of the paper being displayed on the wrapper will receive it at the ordinary rates.

A curious blunder occurred in last week's "To Correspondents." Mr. A. S. Pickering wrote us, forwarding on Sir A. Griffith Boscawen's statement that "We have all got to be Christians if we are going to win the war." Mr. Pickering's comment was that for all to become Christians would be as great a calamity as Germany winning the War. We wrote that we agreed with the comment; but, by the omission of a few words, we were made to say that winning the War would be a great disaster. Which is quite the reverse of what we meant. Most of our readers will, we have no doubt, have detected the nature of the blunder.

We have received a number of soldiers' addresses for the thirteen weeks' free copies of the Freethinker that was recently offered by one of our readers. The number to be paid for was twenty-one, and we still have several vacancies. If more than that number is received, we will send them on our own account. So no one need hesitate to send the name and address of a soldier to whom a copy of the Freethinker would be acceptable. Our offer of sending a small parcel of literature, free, to the troops also holds good.

We are glad to learn that the new Portsmouth Branch is planning some serious and sustained work. An inaugural meeting is to be held to-day (June 9) in the Trades' Hall, Fratton Road, at 6.30. Mr. F. N. Crosby will address the meeting, and important business is to be transacted. May we ask all Portsmouth Freethinkers to make a point of being present. Mr. Crosby has hitherto acted as Secretary, but owing to his many engagements, Mr. F. C. Ryan, of 48, North End Avenue, has undertaken the post of Honorary Secretary for the time being.

The Swansea Branch of the N. S. S. is desirous of availing itself of the services of any Freethought speakers who may be near that district during the summer months. Their services are required for open-air work. Will any who are spending a holiday in the neighbourhood of Swansea be good enough to communicate with the Secretary of the Branch, Mr. B. Dupree, 12 Short Street, Swansea?

We publish this week The Philosophy of Secularism, by the late G. W. Foote. The pamphlet has been out of print for some years, and we feel sure that its reissue will be appreciated. It is among the finest and the most dignified writings of one whose power as a writer was admitted by his enemies and warmly admired by his friends. It is an altogether admirable exposition of the groundwork of Secularism, and should serve as a useful propagandist pamphlet. It is issued at twopence, postage one halfpenny. In these days of dear labour and costly paper, this is practically bidding farewell to anything in the shape of profit; but we never hesitate to sacrifice profit to propaganda. Every Freethinker reader should send at once for a copy of this pamphlet.

The West Ham Branch has arranged for an outing to Epping Forest to-day (June 9). Members and friends will meet at the "Bakers' Arms," Leyton, at 10.30, and will then proceed to Chingford Mount. It has not been found possible to arrange anything in the shape of refreshments except hot water and milk; so those who join in the outing must bring their own rations.

By the death of Mr. Thomas Christian Andersen, an Australian member of the National Secular Society, the Secular Society, Limited, and the Rationalist Press Association are made joint residuary legatees to the deceased's estate. The residue is expected to be nearly £4,000 which will be divided between the two societies.

Popular Tales for the Copts.

THE Copts represent the ancient Egyptians modified by intermarriages with neighbouring peoples. When the Christian legend first made its way into Egypt, it received a philosophic form among the learned circles of Alexandria, but the Coptic multitude had no brains for that type of religious speculation, and preferred stories that were vivid and picturesque. To meet this simple taste, the story-writers of the early Christian centuries —corresponding with our novelists and ballad-mongers —prepared such tales as we find in the Coptic manuscript, The Gospel of the Twelve Apostles. A complete copy has not yet come to light, but a considerable number of fragments have been translated and printed by various scholars since 1900. I give here a few notes on Dr. Revillont's edition.[1]

This Gospel gives details concerning Judas the Traitor which would naturally interest the Egyptian crowd. For example, when the people are about to be fed by Jesus in the wilderness, all the apostles receive bread for distribution, except Judas; and Jesus, in a sort of stage whisper, tells Andrew that the omission was intentional. Later in the story, we hear that Judas was led into sin by a wicked wife. It was she who gloated over the money which he stole from the common purse of the Twelve Apostles. When he came home without loot, she ridiculed him. It was she who put it into his head to betray his Master to the Jews for thirty pieces of silver. To her Judas took the money, and through her his soul dropped into Amenti,—that is, the Egyptian hell.

We have all heard of Doubting Thomas. In the Coptic legend, Thomas is curiously introduced into the account of the Raising of Lazarus from the dead. The Doubter was not satisfied with having seen the widow's son at Nain restored to life. He wanted a severer test of the Wonder-worker's capacity. He demanded that Jesus should raise up a man whose body had already (unlike the widow's son) begun to decay. So, at Bethany village, where Lazarus was entombed, a crowd assembled to see the experiment performed, and Thomas was himself appointed to remove the slab of stone which covered the entrance to the sepulchre. It is said that Thomas wept as he obeyed, for he now felt ashamed of his unbelief.[2] Of course, he is convinced (more or less!) when Lazarus issues from the tomb, and the people swarm round (as this popular Evangel expresses it) like bees round honey.

A somewhat mysterious anecdote is inserted about an Imperial officer, who had travelled from Rome to Judæa by order of the Emperor Tiberius, and who had been commissioned to choose a fresh king in place of the incompetent Philip. The officer, named Carios, heard of the miracles worked by Jesus, and rather hastily concluded that this Man of Prodigies would very well suit for the vacant throne. (The unlearned Copts would find no difficulty in such a legend, for it was exactly the way they would themselves have acted!) However, when Carios began to collect evidences, he found that Jewish priests told one tale, and Joseph and Nicodemus, personal friends of Jesus, told a contrary tale. On the whole, Carios was inclined to report to the Emperor in favour of Jesus; but a golden bribe from King Herod (Philip's brother) closed the project, and Cæsar never read the interesting report.

Much importance is attributed to the apostle Peter. To him are entrusted the Keys of Heaven; on him, as a rock, the Church will be built. When these privileges have been announced, Peter looks up, sees the seven heavens opened, and vast troops of angels flying down to salute him, and also sees Christ lifted to the sky by a sudden motion and sitting at the right hand of the "Good Father." Angels and æons (a Gnostic term) then cried,—

"Holy, holy, holy Peter, High-priest!"

Whereupon the face of Peter shone like the face of Moses.

[1] Issued in French (1904) by Dr. E. Revillont, Professor and Conservator at the Louvre; in vol. ii. of the series Patrologia Orientalis.

[2] The Gospel of John states that Jesus wept.

When the Twelve Apostles sat at the table for the Last Supper, Matthias placed a dish before Jesus. On the dish was a cock.

"Rabbi," said Matthias, "here is a cock which I killed. When the Jews saw me killing it, they taunted me, and threatened that my Master would be killed in the same manner."

"Yes," replied Jesus, smilingly, "it is true; and I shall rise again from the dead like this creature."

So saying, he touched the cock, and the bird flew from the chamber.

Owing to the fragmentary character of the remains of this Gospel, we have only a very disconnected narrative of the Crucifixion. The romantic portions that have survived make us wish (so Coptic are some of us!) to hear more. For instance, take the legend of Ananias of Bethlehem.

No sooner had Jesus died on the Cross than Ananias rushed forward from among the multitude and clasped the body of the martyr. He held the hands of the dead in his own, he pressed his living heart against the dead heart, and then he shouted to the hostile Jews:—

"Liars and lewd men! Kill me, for that would be better than to kill my Lord and God. He is the Christ!"

Then a voice came from the crucified body promising that the soul of Ananias should not go to Amenti but rise to Paradise.

The mob stoned Ananias but could not kill him. They kept him in a fire three days, but he was not burned. Finally cold steel dispatched him, and the Saviour carried the soul of Ananias to heaven.

The last fragments of the Gospel, now extant, relate the story of the Assumption of Mary, the mother of Jesus. In what is, apparently, an appendix, we have the report of supposed eye-witnesses who say: "We," "we saw," "we heard," and so on.

They affirm that a tremendous noise occurred at the Virgin Mary's tomb, and a sweet odour was exhaled. Fire flashed around, and the blare of trumpets sounded. A chariot of light and flame descended from the sky:—

> We looked. We saw the Lord Jesus stretching forth his right hand. He embraced us. He pronounced peace upon us. After that he called towards the tomb: "Mary, my mother, my place of repose in which I once existed, rise! Leave the grave-clothes and come! As my Father raised me so do I raise thee in order to lead thee forth with myself." We beheld, and lo! Mary carried the cerements in which she had been wrapped. And the Lord Jesus gave her his hand and drew her into the chariot of light; and choirs of angels went before them even into heaven.....We, the apostles, testify these things.

Certain traditions point to the existence of a Gospel of the Twelve Apostles at so early a time that the author of Luke may have had it in mind when he spoke of many persons undertaking the task of writing orderly histories of the life of Jesus. It would not follow that this Coptic form dates so far back; that is to say, so far back as Luke's time in the first half of the second century. But some of the legends contained in it may have been current as folk-tales then, or earlier. The story of the resurrected cock is a sort of fireside or evening entertainment legend; but one would suspect the stories of Peter's Transfiguration and of Mary's Assumption to be later additions. One singular anecdote of the Devil fishing in a dry desert, and carrying on a half-chaffing conversation with the apostles, is, unfortunately, broken off in the middle, and one hardly knows whether to class it as a folk-tale or an allegory invented for use in the pulpit.

I have always esteemed the author of Luke as one of the most judicious and tasteful writers in the Biblical library. Out of a mass of popular legends he selected those which appeared to him as most instructive and the most free from crudities. I believe he did this as spontaneously and consciously as Bunyan did when choosing illustrations and metaphors for his Pilgrim's Progress or Holy War. In other words, the author of Luke was an artist and a poet. So far as he and the authors of the three other now-accepted Gospels (Matthew, Mark, and John) displayed superior literary judgment, to that extent they justify their reception as "canonical." The Four Gospels of the New Testament stand on a higher level than the many pamphlets on the same subject which the Catholic Church finally declined to recommend, but which, nevertheless, often enshrine isolated passages of excellence. Except, however, for such considerations, I perceive no difference in historical value between the so-called Canonical Gospels and the so-called Apocryphal Gospels.

F. J. GOULD.

Writers and Readers.

As a relief from more necessary, if more tedious, literary tasks, I have been reading Mr. Asquith's Occasional Addresses (Macmillan), which represents a politician's intellectual interests during the last twenty years. Among other things, they have set me wondering why men of literary and philosophical tastes have, as a rule, given practical politics a wide berth, and contented themselves with leaving the good things they bring with them to dull lawyers and duller business men. There is surely no easier way of making a more or less honest living, if you are not anxious for great riches; and even if you are, the £400 a year provided by the grateful taxpayer is not only a good stand-by, but it is a sure stepping-stone to higher things. All you need do is to satisfy the party you elect to serve that you are quite safe; that you will give those important gentlemen, the Whips, no trouble; that you will never ask awkward or pertinent questions—in fact, that you are content to have no mind of your own. The promises you have made to your constituents need not trouble you, for no intelligent elector will expect you to do more than silently support your party. There is one drawback, however; you cannot get someone else to do the work for you. But although you have to be on the premises, there is no reason why you should not spend your time in the library, working out a new theory of "Natural Ethics" or the "Influence of Marlowe on the Early Plays of Shakespeare." As a relaxation from the mental strain of your studies, you have billiards and other harmless amusements. Indeed, for the average man of letters, membership of the House is just an ideal job; far preferable to the Education Office or the Board of Trade, where you are expected to do a little work. With a measure of healthy cynicism, the responsibility of making a country's laws will sit lightly on your shoulders, and you will see the foolishness of working hard for an easy-going master.

In the early eighteenth century the man of letters was alive to the advantages of political occupation. Dozens of minor poets, essayists, and dramatists had pleasant little sinecures under the Government. Addison, Gay, Congreve, Prior, Vanbrugh, secured the big prizes. Nowadays, the man of letters seems to be less ambitious or (shall I say?) more conscientious. Out of the six hundred and odd members of the House, there are, perhaps, a dozen men of letters of more or less distinction. Mr. Asquith, although by profession a lawyer and politician, is by nature a man of fairly broad humanistic culture. His addresses here reprinted are carefully written studies in criticism, admirably adapted to the different sorts of audiences before whom they were delivered. His style is natural and easy, at times a trifle rhetorical and full—super-fatted, I might even say; but if he does not always go to the bottom of a subject, he is never irritatingly superficial, like Mr. Birrell, who gives us the impression of being terribly at ease in the Zion of letters. The addresses cover a number of interesting subjects: Criticism, Biography, Culture and Character; the English Bible; Omar Khayyam, Benjamin Jowett, and others.

The address on "Criticism" was delivered to the students of the London Society for the Extension of University Teaching (1898), and is in itself an excellent example of what criticism ought to be. The criticism Mr. Asquith has in mind is not merely the criticism of literature, but that of philosophy, sociology, and religion; that is, criticism in the broadest sense of the word. He begins by telling us that it is not an attitude of disparagement, a science of finding fault. This is a common, but stupidly erroneous, notion. It is sometimes the duty of the critic—to some of us it is often a pleasure—to show a writer that he would be more profitably occupied in weighing up pounds of sugar; but this is far from being the whole of criticism, which should be interpretative rather than denigratory. Another delusion is that criticism is not constructive; that it is opposed to creative work. We ought, then, to have periods of criticism alternating with perionds of creation. But really they coincide. The great ages of English Literature—the Shakespearean, the Augustan, the Romantic Revival—were periods both of critical and creative expansion. This truth is so obvious to anyone who knows the history of our literature that it would be tedious to support it by examples.

> Criticism (Mr. Asquith says) in the true sense has a positive as well as a negative function.....It performs the double duty of solvent and stimulant. To take a single example, it was the essentially critical speculations of Hume which, as we know from their own avowal, awoke Kant from his "dogmatic slumbers" and first "caused the scales to fall from the eyes" of Bentham, and thereby became, at any rate, the indirect occasion of two rival schemes of constructive philosophy. There is no emptier fallacy than to suppose that criticism is merely a form of intellectual gymnastic—the appropriate pastime of epochs of temporary stagnation—the business of second-rate minds in the relatively barren intervals which separate the great vintage years in the history of human culture.

This is a fine tribute to the seminal influence of the critical method employed by one of our greatest philosophers, and most thorough-going of Freethinkers.

Mr. Asquith is pleased to fall foul of æsthetic criticism which is often enough mere vague and eloquent balderdash; but there is no reason why it should be condemned wholesale. In the hands of a Lessing (another robust Freethinker) it has helped many of us to clarify our notions on art and letters. Ruskin's impressionism, certainly, has done not a little harm; yet there is little of what is called the scientific method in the critics for whom Mr. Asquith has strong, if not unqualified commendation. De Quincey had too good a conceit of his own opinion to be an impartial judge; Hazlitt sacrificed truth to acrimony and epigrammatic points; Arnold's sympathies were too limited; and R. H. Hutton who is strangely singled out as the greatest of Victorian critics, never really came within sight of literature. It is characteristic of the narrow outlook of the academically trained mind that it can praise the dull editor of an influential paper at the expense of Pater and J. A. Symonds. There is nothing in Hutton, or even in the much greater critic Stevenson (another of Mr. Asquith's favourites) to compare for genuine insight with James Thomson's studies of Shelley and Blake.

In another of his addresses Mr. Asquith's affects not to understand the force of the word "academic" as applied to much modern criticism. It implies that a writer is both pontifical and not over-intelligent. His own judgment on Hutton is a good example. The curious in these matters can amuse themselves by looking out equally good examples from the Cambridge History of English Literature or the works of Mr. Saintsbury. Mr. Asquith gives instances in which good critics have gone wrong through a lapse of the sympathetic imagination, without which there can be no criticism worth having. Voltaire wondered how any man in his senses could prefer what he called the "bouffoneries" of Shakespeare to the plays of Corneille and Racine. Goethe found "the Inferno of Dante abominable, the Purgatorio dubious, the Paradiso tiresome." Lamb saw nothing in Faust but a vulgar melodrama of seduction. Dr. Johnson fell foul of Lycidas. Joanna Baillie was for Scott, in 1810, the highest genius of the century. We recall the vinegar, vitriolic, abuse of an infinitely greater poet—Whitman, by Swinburne, when his literary judgment was controlled by that complacent prig, Watts-Dunton. Admiration for Poe's stories was for Henry James clear evidence of literary incompetence. M. Anatole France assures us that we may take it from him that Flaubert had no intelligence. Perhaps the most wrongheaded judgment ever made was one by Robert Buchanan, an erratic Scotsman, who was half Freethinker and half mystic. He wanted to discredit Ingersoll's attitude to Religion and Science. Ingersoll was no poet, and to "understand Religion a man must have the heart of a poet," or a Buchanan; and science the benighted Atheist confused with mere invention, the hard-working handmaid of science. Then comes the conclusion which was to finish poor Ingersoll. "But Invention-worship is fetish-worship, and Colonel Ingersoll is a fetish worshipper—that is to say, an individual exactly at the savage state where neither religion over science begins."

. . . . .

The address on Biography is noticeable for the attention it draws to the autobiography of Haydon, a bad painter, but a particularly acute appraiser of human character. The other addresses to University students at Glasgow and Aberdeen are eloquent pleas for a humanistic culture, for disinterested study of literature and history. On such a subject Mr. Asquith writes with conviction, for on many occasions in his political career has he turned from the worries of office, the barrenness and unreality of political debate, to the quiet pleasures of the library. It is noticeable that it is literature that affords the solace when the waters of life are troubled—not religion. There is no doubt that this attitude is partly due to the influence of Jowett, the Master of Balliol, who could reject or explain away every dogma of Christianity and yet lay claim to a belief in what he called its fundamentals of the creed. I cannot understand the tribute Mr. Asquith and others pay to Jowett's wisdom. He had certainly a pragmatic wisdom, but that is not what is implied. It is hard to understand how Mr. Asquith, who is no bad judge of men, cannot see that Jowett was a "trimmer" in religion, and socially a plebeian with the plebeians irrational worship of a lord. You remember the answer of a Balliol man who had been asked by a friend if he had been intimate with Jowett's "Good God, sir!"? He said: "What do you take me for—a peer or a pauper?" There is the same non-committal attitude to religion in Mr. Asquith as in Jowett. It is hard to say what he is on the face of his writing. Anyhow, he is a man of culture and refined tastes, which is something to be thankful for.

Confidence.

THERE is no despot like want of confidence. How well the plunderers of the poor know it! Nothing more depressing was to be observed in the Victorian era than the abject and stupid reverence which parents in what are known among the elite as the lower-middle class and the working-class inculcated in their offspring for "constituted authority." This, combined with a poor education, rendered the average lad in the humbler walks of life a ready prey to petty tyrants, and often a life-long victim to a sordid and ill-paid vocation. Even if he had ambition, it seldom soared above being a petty tyrant himself. When he met his "betters," his right hand involuntarily sought his forelock, and he was ill at ease. He felt his want of confidence because he was in the presence of people who had more knowledge and power than he had.

The nobility and gentry are at pains to make their offspring feel that their rights and responsibilities carry with them as an essential to the proper exercise of power—confidence—confidence in the presence of all, with the addition of conscious superiority when they are exercising judicial power in determining as to the crave of the timorous bucolic suppliant that cap in hand awaits the decision of the greater than he who, by divine appointment (or the accident of birth), is invested with this potent superiority.

Free men's minds, and you open their eyes to the glory of an enlarged liberty, in which cringing and toadying find no place. Free men's minds, and you free all their faculties for natural use in an enlightened world. Free men's minds, and the bogeys of superstition and fear and submission and servility and charity vanish in the dawn of a new age.

Christianity has been guilty of many social crimes, but none so heinous as that of making impossible the possession by men of respect for their own manhood. With the decay of Christianity, we see a nobler idea of man's individuality taking root in many minds. Mutual aid and mutual service become imperative duties in the age of Humanism. But it is a condition precedent that man shall respect man—neither bully nor cringe to him. He cannot do the one or the other if he respects himself. In the Golden Age only justice will be recognized—charity will be unknown.

Religion has for countless ages been utilized by the "Upper Ten" to keep the mass of the people "in order." It has built fences to restrain them, and wrought cunning goads to drive them withal. But the fences are rotting—the hands that once grasped the supernatural goads are relaxing. People are no longer sheep to be shepherded. They are growing out of the puny conceptions they were taught in the Victorian era. And as they grow, their knowledge increases; their horizons enlarge and expand; their resolution to secure individual independence may not be gainsaid; and this because they have learned, or are learning, self-confidence.

GOD IN GERMANY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—A fellow-passenger in the train regaled me with the assertion that the Germans had forgotten God. When I reminded him of the Kaiser's constant efforts to keep the name before his people, he retorted that at least the Kaiser was not referring to the God we worshipped, for it would be noticed that the Kaiser never mentioned Jesus Christ.

But can the Kaiser help including Jesus Christ when he speaks of God? In the Creed which we thundered forth in unison in our best Gregorian last Sunday (Trinity Sunday), Saint Athanasius bade us say that "the Father is God, the Son God, and Holy Ghost God, and yet there are not three Gods but one God," "None is afore or after other," "In majesty co-equal," etc. If the Kaiser is not referring to the same God as ours (just as when he speaks of the sun he refers to the same sun as ours), surely we shall be forced to admit that he is more liberally endowed by Providence—that he has at least one God to the good. For there must be in Germany (1) the Catholic God, whose Corpus Christi procession through Cologne the Allied Governments agreed to respect, and (2) the Kaiser's God, to whom he has so generously given the credit (overlooking the poor deluded common Fritzes) for the recent "victories." We might, perhaps, add (3) Allah, the God of the Balkan peoples. Upon that showing, the Central Powers are watched over by three gods.

"And yet there are not three Gods but one God," thunders Saint Athanasius. It is all very puzzling to the simple Chorister whose only god is

A few weeks back we warned Freethinkers that movements were going on behind the scene concerning the maintenance of religion in State-supported schools. We have not had to wait long for confirmation of what was then said. The Bishop of Oxford, in a "Charge" to the clergy of his diocese, says much which bears out what we said, and hints at still more. The Bishop points out that the Education Bill now before Parliament does not directly affect religion, but "the Government are understood to be anxious for an agreement if possible between the different religious bodies as to the lines of re-settlement, so far as religious education goes." That is substantially what we have said was taking place. The Government has been "pulling the strings" in order to get the various denominations to establish some sort of a concordat; then, when the present Bill is out of the way, the Minister for Education will come forward with a measure which it will be pretended all the sects have agreed to suggest as a basis of settlement, and a new bar will be set up to the secularizing of the schools. France, after its defeat in 1870, paved the way for a re-birth by curtailing the power of the priest in the school, and by finally abolishing him altogether. English Conservatism—the craftiest in the whole civilized world—aims at turning the War to its own advantage by giving the priest a still firmer hold on the mind of the child.

The Bishop of Oxford's Scheme.

The Bishop of Oxford gives some indication of the form the agreement between the sects is likely to take. He suggests the establishment in each district of an "interdenominational Council," which is to be given statutory powers, and which is to have the controlling power over religious instruction in both schools and training colleges. It is to be made obligatory on every school, elementary and secondary, to assign "a reasonable time" every week to religious instruction, the religious instruction to be given by a teacher of "certified competence." (At present religious instruction is not obligatory. Any Council may, if it thinks fit, eliminate it altogether.) The obligation to confine religious instruction to the first or last hour of school time is to be abolished; it may be given at any time. This means in practice a policy of permeation, the creation of a religious atmosphere which would quite do away with the protection of the "Conscience Clause." If this plan is adopted, it will represent "a very great gain," and would give "a basis on which further teaching in church and Sunday-school could be built." So that while in Germany the schools were made "training stables for the Army," with liberal doses of Christian theology—the results of which are now before the world—in England, while our militarists are aiming at military drill in the schools, our parsons will do their best to see that every child leaving school offers suitable material for church or chapel. Nor would it be surprising to find that militarists and pietists are working together with all their old-time friendliness and co-operation.

A Parson's Question.

This is a parson's proposal. It is suggested by a parson; it is an appeal to parsons; none but parsons and the interests of parsons are considered. The Bishop says that "the number of parents who are prepared to demand any particular kind of religious instruction for their children is lamentably small." And although "the rights of the parents" has been one of the cries of the clergy, the Bishop of Oxford admits that "the claim for parents' rights has not been made good among the population generally." The overwhelming majority of parents do not care whether their children get religious education or not. They do not see the dangers of religious education, but they certainly cannot see any obvious benefits therefrom. They are content if their children get a decent education, and we venture to say that those who care most for genuine education bother least about religious instruction. It is a parson's question. They must get the children ready for the operations of church or chapel or they lose the adult. They are not really interested in the child, they are not really interested in education. They are interested in getting supporters for their Churches. The professional interest is open and avowed. As our militarists are interested in the child only as he promises material for the Army, so the clergy are interested in the child only so far as he may be turned into material for exploitation in church or chapel. It is a sordid struggle for power and pelf.

The State and the Child.

Naturally, the Bishop of Oxford quite fails to realize the higher and better aspects of the question. To him it is a sectarian question. It concerns the various sects only, and it may well be that if "Churchmen and Nonconformists had reached agreement, and their agreement had been ratified by the Government," many people would regard the question as closed. But the question is larger than the trickeries and back-stairs policies of the Government and the Churches. The demand for Secular Education in State schools is not based upon the necessities of sects but upon the rights of citizenship. It is a question of the modern versus the mediæval State, of a conception of the State based upon the equal rights of all citizens, versus that of privilege for this or that sect. And, as Freethinkers, we are far more concerned for the genuine rights of the child than we are for the assumed rights of the parent. The fundamental claim of the child is for protection—not merely protection for the body but also for the mind. The one should be encouraged to grow as healthily and as vigorously as the other. And an interdenominational council decreeing the imposition on children of doctrines which are at best unverified and unverifiable speculations, which are rejected as false by millions of educated men and women all over the world, represents as gross an outrage on the helplessness of childhood as anything that can be conceived.

A Time for Action.

The question is one immediately for Freethinkers, since they, of all classes in the community, are most alive to the nature and dangers of clerical aggression. But ultimately it is one that concerns all parents and all citizens. And the danger, we must again point out, is real and pressing. The Bishop of Oxford's address confirms what we said as to the arrangements that have been proceeding, unknown to the public, between the Government and the Churches. At the proper moment the final arrangement will be produced—and the Government will be greatly "surprised" at the agreement brought about between the sects by its own connivance. If Freethinkers and reformers are not to be caught napping they must bestir themselves. They must make the demand for Secular Education as forcible and as widespread as possible. Members of Parliament can be written to, and the Press can be utilized by letters urging the justice and benefits of ending this sectarian squabble once for all. We have been using this latter channel of publicity ourselves, but we have not the time to do all that might be and ought to be done. Freethinkers all over the country can do something to counteract the underhand activity of the Churches. We claim that our soldiers are fighting for the benefit of civilization abroad. We ought not to be found wanting in our efforts to guard the welfare of civilization at home.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Christian Otherworldliness.

CHRISTIANITY is pre-eminently an otherworldly religion. Even in the Sermon on the Mount the whole emphasis is laid upon the world to come. Virtue's reward is to be reaped, not on earth, but in heaven. The kingdom of heaven, so earnestly preached by the Gospel Jesus, was declared not to be of this world, and entrance into it was possible only at death (Matt. vii. 21-23). The sayings of Jesus were to be done simply in order to inherit endless bliss beyond the tomb. In a Manual of Membership, entitled The Religion of the Church, the Bishop of Oxford teaches that the Christian life "is to draw all its motives and power from that heavenly place where Christ is seated at the right hand of God," and this is in full agreement with St. Paul's teaching in Colossians iii. 1-4. On one point, however, the Bishop is at variance with the Apostle. His lordship maintains that all this otherworldliness, so far from making Christians "indifferent to this world, is only to make them feel the importance of everything that happens in this world, because of its divine origin and eternal issues"; but St. Paul holds that the affairs of this world are not worthy of the least attention, heavenly things alone being of real value. Surely, Dr. Gore cannot be ignorant of the fact that the Apostle is merely echoing his Master's saying in Matt. vi. 19-21. Ideally, the believer's only treasure is in heaven, where his heart also must be.

Chapter vi. in the Bishop's Manual is devoted to what he calls "Christian Morality." Curiously enough, his lordship admits that Jesus "never occupied himself with social legislation or reform," "said nothing to inspire patriotism or to justify war," but claims that "what he sets himself to do within the Jewish people is to restore and perfect the spirit which lies behind legislation—the spirit of humanity." In substantiation of this claim, however, the Bishop advances neither argument nor illustration. We contend that nowhere does the Gospel Jesus endeavour either to restore or to perfect the spirit of humanity, or even show that he possessed such a spirit. As a matter of fact, the Sermon on the Mount is full of legislation, not for human society as such, but for the subjects of the kingdom of God. Dr. Gore attributes to the Gospel Jesus ideas and ideals which he himself harbours in this twentieth century, his only argument being that there is no evidence that Jesus did not cherish them. The Bishop says, for example:—

> It seems to me to be idle to argue from what our Lord says about personal submission to injuries that he would have refused to allow a man to defend either his wife and children or his country.

To others, on the other hand, it seems equally idle even to imagine that resistance of any kind can be in harmony with the disposition which he both enjoined and exemplified. Now, while admitting that "so far as he contemplated the future, he (Jesus) seems deliberately to have abstained from making laws for his disciples in the main," Dr. Gore asserts, in the absence of all evidence, that "he intends his society to legislate in his own name and Spirit after he should have gone out of sight." Consequently, by Christian morality the Bishop clearly understands the moral code formulated, in the course of history, by the Christian Church. What Jesus presented to the world was not Christian morality, but the moral spirit. What the moral spirit, as distinguished from the moral act, is, we are not told. Of course, everybody knows that moral acts are but so many expressions of a moral disposition, in the absence of which we do not usually find them; but we are too apt to forget that the connection between them was clearly recognized thousands of years before Jesus was ever heard of, and is being emphasized to-day in many entirely non-Christian communities.

In point of fact, there is no such thing as Christian morality. Morals are not even exclusively human. They are common to all stages of social life, animal as well as human. Without morals, social life would be absolutely impossible. In Egypt, two thousand years before our era began, morals were very highly developed, and moral standards existed not one whit inferior to the most perfect to be found in Christendom at the present time. Both Confucianism and Buddhism, which are two thousand and five hundred years old, are moral systems of astounding perfection; and it is a well-authenticated fact that the followers respectively of Confucius and the Buddha have in all ages been noted for the exceptionally high tone of their moral character. To a certain extent the same thing is true of the Greeks and Romans prior to the appearance of Christianity. Impartial students of Greek and Roman history are profoundly convinced of the essential injustice of representing either nation as ethically inferior. We have the highest warrant for affirming that brotherhood and universalism were the two main planks in the Stoical platform, while slavery was denounced as a crime against Nature. And yet Dr. Gore has the audacity to assert that "it was the love of Christians for one another—the care of all for each—which was one chief cause of the rapid spread of the Church." He adds: "Men were drawn out of a loveless world into the warm and comfortable fellowship."

In the chapter on "Christian Morality," the Bishop makes many statements, which are either tragically or beautifully true; but his theory of morals is fundamentally false. It is simply not true to say that "all real morality lies in a right relation to God in the heart." All real morality lies in a right relation of man to man. It has nothing to do with God at all, either directly or indirectly. Jesus taught neither the universal Fatherhood of God nor the universal brotherhood of man. Most angrily did he decline to acknowledge any brotherly relationship between himself and the Pharisees. He could find no terms scathing enough to denounce them as the offspring of the Devil. The Bishop tells us that "he loved every man," but his lordship is as fully aware as we are not only that he did not love, but that he hated with perfect hatred, the Scribes and the Pharisees, and positively refused to gather them to his bosom as deeply loved brothers. Indeed, neither Jesus nor his apostles evinced anything like "a positive enthusiasm for humanity—for every man as such." Man as man is not a child of God, for "the gift of the Holy Spirit, which is the possession of each member of Christ, is the gift of liberty and Sonship." What is brotherhood?

> The principle of brotherhood means that there is to be asked of each the utmost service which each can render, and that there should be given to each according to his need, because if one member suffer, or is in want, the weakness or suffering of each is the weakening of the whole body. Suffering indeed will be the lot of the whole body and of every member of it, but not the misery of being forgotten or despised by the brotherhood (The Religion of the Church, pp. 111, 112).

To that definition of the nature and obligations of brotherhood we have no objection to offer, but the Bishop does not omit to assure us that "the Christian Church is 'the body,' or 'the brotherhood,' because here only, where the Spirit dwells, can men realize in sonship to God the brotherhood which is meant for all." The Bishop's view, we grant, is in strict accord with Scripture, according to which God is by nature only our Maker and Preserver, and becomes our Father only in Christ, and in him only when we accept him as Saviour and Lord. There is, therefore, no such thing as the natural brotherhood of man, but only the brotherhood of believers.

After all, otherworldism is the only thing that really matters in the Christian religion. We become brothers only when we realize our heavenly citizenship. This earthly life has significance only as an introduction to and preparation for the eternal life. Christianity is the direct negation of Naturalism, and, as such, it does the greatest injustice conceivable to our own nature. It teaches us to neglect and despise the only world of which we possess any knowledge, and to set our affection upon and live alone for things of which we know absolutely nothing. Those who profess to accept that teaching become, of necessity, despicable hypocrites, because they pretend to be what, in the nature of things, it is impossible for them ever to become, and almost wholly neglect the only duties for the discharge of which their very constitution qualifies them. Even this terrible War testifies to the absurdity as well as essential insincerity of religious professions. It was undertaken and is being consistently prosecuted in the name and for the glory of God, and it is largely the belief that God is in it, and will end it in his own good time that is responsible for its continuance.

Thomas Scott, of Ramsgate.

> Ireland is still Catholic: the Cevennes still Protestant. It is not a basketful of law papers nor the hoofs and pistol butts of a regiment of horse that can change one tittle of a ploughman's thoughts.—R. L. Stevenson.

At a time when the Secularists had started their modest task of converting the English-speaking world to Freethought, a kindly, handsome Englishman conceived the idea of devoting himself to Rationalistic propaganda among what has been called the "hupper suckles" of society. This man was Thomas Scott, of Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. He had charm, he had that chivalry for principle which represents the highest manhood, and he did his work joyously. His memory is kept green for what he was; his memory is treasured for what he did; and the record of his life's work lifts the mind like the sound of martial music.

Thomas Scott had an adventurous career. Born in 1808, he was, in his youth, a page to King Charles X., of France. A great traveller, he journeyed in all parts of the world. Well educated, he knew the world of books, and he also knew the book of the world. In the later years of his life he devoted his leisure, money, and abilities to the furtherance of Freethought, and proved himself a prince among propagandists. During the years 1862 to 1877 he issued from his pleasant seaside home a very large number of pamphlets, printed and distributed at his own expense, the total collection making twenty stout volumes. The writers he gathered about him were men of outstanding ability, and among them were Moncure Conway, John Addington Symonds, Sir R. D. Hanson, Judge Strange, Dr. Zerffi, Bishop Hinds, and Sir G. W. Cox. Mrs. Annie Besant contributed an Essay on the Deity of Jesus of Nazareth, "by the wife of a beneficed clergyman." This led to the Rev. Mr. Besant insisting on his wife taking the communion, or leaving, and, brave woman that she was, she chose the better course. Afterwards she wrote more tracts for Mr. Scott, since reprinted in My Path to Atheism.

It is difficult to imagine now the flutter caused in sheltered homes and country vicarages by Thomas Scott's persistent propaganda. In the "stormy seventies" of the last century, Freethought views had an air of novelty, and the clergy had not then realized that discretion was the better part of valour in their particular case. For Scott levelled his guns at the clergy, and bombarded them through the post with pamphlets and tracts. One of them was entitled 213 Questions, to which answers were respectfully asked, and each one was well calculated to turn a clergyman's hair white, and curl it afterwards. The most ambitious work Scott issued was the English Life of Jesus, which was designed to do for British readers what Renan had done for France and Strauss for Germany. It was a "thunderous weapon of revolt," and was written in conjunction with Sir George Cox, who, being a Bishop of the Established Church, was unwilling to put his name to the volume. In laying down his life work, Scott said: "The only true orthodoxy is loyalty to reason." He died at Norwood in 1878, and he deserves a niche in the Freethought pantheon because in his day he did valiant work for human emancipation. Animated throughout by high ideals, and supported by a strong character, he had the true courage which sweeps away selfishness, weakness, and fears in discharging what he felt were moral obligations.

The work done by Thomas Scott and his circle of friends is an important chapter in the history of the popularizing of Freethought principles. During the forty years which have elapsed since Scott's death, great and far-reaching changes have taken place. The most important are the safeguarding of bequests to Freethought; the right of Freethinkers to sit in Parliament without taking an oath; the right of affirmation, and the ever-increasing number of ladies associated with its propaganda. In the days of Holyoake, Southwell, and Bradlaugh the audiences at Freethought meetings were almost entirely composed of men, whereas to-day the position is very different. Under Mr. Cohen's administration, the Freethought Party is increasing in numbers and influence. Owing to his enterprise, too, in the most difficult period of its history, it is still in the vanguard of progress, sheltering behind it all the weaker heterodox people, who otherwise had been crushed by the weight of orthodoxy.

Secularists have a right to be proud of their history. As the little Revenge earned an undying name by hurling herself against the great battleships of the Spaniards, so the Freethinkers have displayed extraordinary courage in attacking the heart of the more formidable Armada of Superstition. The greater the perils, the greater the victory; and in the ripe years to come recognition must be given to the superb courage, which, disregarding any reward, was satisfied with the knowledge that their action would diffuse the blessings of Liberty. For in that happy time the stormy note of battle will be changed to the triumphant music of victory.

MIMNERMUS.

A Search for the Soul.

IN commencing this quest, the first point to be noticed is that Christian preachers and writers never define what they mean by the "soul" or "spirit," but take it for granted that their hearers or readers know what that supposed indwelling entity of the human organism really is. The same is the case with the New Testament statements; no definition or description of this alleged immortal portion of the body is anywhere given. Looking through a commentary of the Four Gospels, we find the same reticence; evidently the writer knew nothing definite about the matter. Turning next to a dictionary, I read: "Soul, the spiritual part of man, the seat of reason and conscience; the intellectual principle, or understanding, the vital principle; spirit," etc. Lastly, opening the last tract sent by an old friend for my conversion, I find the following:—

> What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?.....But the better to understand our Lord's words, it is necessary to ask, What is the soul? The soul is the spiritual and immortal part of man, capable of the most perfect happiness or intense misery, and exists eternally. Such a treasure every child of Adam possesses, but few are sensible of its worth, or the danger of its being lost.

In the foregoing quotation from the New Testament the word "soul" is psyche, and signifies "life"; it is so translated in the Revised Version. Thus, so far, we have no answer to the question, "What is it that believers in immortality think will survive death?" To say that it is "the spiritual and immortal part of man" displays no knowledge whatever, and merely begs the whole question. Science knows nothing of any such "spiritual and immortal part" of man. What is there, then, in the human organism which we are asked to believe will survive death? There exists, we are told, something called a "soul" or "spirit," apparently without any material substance; that is to say, a kind of phantom, which has a human form and personality, a memory of the past, consciousness, and the power to think. Though without any physical sense-organs, vocal organs, nerve substance, or brain, this apparition is assumed to be able to see, hear, feel, think, and perhaps even to speak, just the same as when it was in the body during life. Nothing, in fact, is too absurd to be imagined by the credulous people who believe in an "immortal soul." If they only took the trouble to think, they would soon perceive that no action of what is called "the mind" can be performed without material organs, and would then understand that a soul without a body, or a spirit without tangible substance, could no more exist without the cerebral organ than gravitation could continue to act without the existence of bodies which mutually attract each other.

Christian believers have very little to say about the soul or spirit save that it is something immortal within the human body which survives death; but those among the Spiritists who claim to have the "gift" of clairvoyance profess to be able both to see and receive messages from this discarnate "spirit-form," notwithstanding the fact that it is invisible to all other persons who do not possess that "gift." Thus, in a pamphlet by the Editor of the Two Worlds, the writer says:—

> Andrew Jackson Davis has described what he observed of the process of dying.....He tells us that the central pivot (really the point of consciousness) emerged from the superior brain, and attracted to it the ethereal elements constituting the supra body. That these enveloped the head of the dying form, and presently this sunlike halo assumed shape and form. In appearance this form, Davis tells us, was human.

Andrew Jackson Davis was a religious crank and Spiritist in America, who lived more than half a century ago. He claimed to have clairvoyant visions, and is said to have written twenty-seven volumes of spiritistic nonsense, an epitome of which has been recently published. In the Spiritist organ called Light (Feb. 24, 1917) there appeared a short article, entitled "Through Death to Life," by a lady (name not given) who is stated to be "one of a large number of persons in whom psychic powers have awakened spontaneously." From this article I make the following extract:—

> There is no death; what seems so is transition. This is a plain statement of fact. That transition I have often seen. For something like a score of years I was a professional nurse. Many deaths I witnessed. And many times I beheld the spirit-body rise from the discarded earthly body, in appearance an etherealised glorified replica of it. No trace of suffering or disease did I ever see on the radiant faces of those thus transformed.

This lady further said that she had also seen some of "those who have come from the realm of spirit-life" enter the chamber of the dying person just before a death. Of these ministering spirits she said:—

> Clearly visible they have been to me, though unseen by the other human occupants of the room or hospital ward, save by the dying persons, who have often recognized them as friends or relations who had preceded them to the other world, and have greeted them joyously.

The most charitable view to take of these statements is that the visions mentioned were purely subjective. But for the lady having taken up with Spiritism, she would probably never have imagined that she saw what she describes. Again, one may see at a modern spiritist meeting a lady or gentleman, professing to be a clairvoyant, who declares from the platform that he or she sees a discarnate "spirit" standing behind the chair of one of the persons present, and then, after naming the sex, goes on to describe the apparent age, height, dress, and general appearance of the alleged apparition. This performance is repeated in the cases of several other persons seated in the room; so that there would appear to be a number of "spirits" present who had come direct from "spirit-land"—wherever that may be—in order to be "seen" by the clairvoyant and their presence made known to the relatives behind whose chairs they stood. Needless to say, no one among the audience see any of the so-called "spirits." This is one of the many weak points in modern Spiritism; for no satisfactory or adequate reason can be shown why the "clairvoyant" is able to perceive what no other person in the room has the power to see. Neither physically nor psychically has the medium keener sense of vision, or higher mental faculties than many of the educated people present. I should not have referred to this matter but for the fact that no other believers in immortality have ever claimed to have actually seen the supposed disembodied soul or spirit.

Another point in this connection which should be noticed is, that not only is the discarnate spirit said to be an exact representation of the deceased body in form and feature, but, like the body, it wears clothes. In all the descriptions of the spirit-forms in the lecture-room the "spirits" are assumed to be dressed in similar clothing to that worn by the persons from whom they have emanated, and this outward dress is often described. On October 25, 1917, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle delivered an address on Spiritism, which was noticed in the Daily Express. Some days later, in reply to criticisms in that paper, Sir Arthur said: "The reason spirits wear clothes is because modesty does not cease with this life." This statement implies that the spirit-form is an exact counterpart of the body; if, however, we consider a moment, we shall see that this idea is simply ridiculous. What is called the "soul" or "spirit" is said to be an immaterial entity; that is to say, it is more attenuated and rarefied than the air we breathe. But the atmosphere, though rarefied, is a form of matter; the spirit-form must, therefore, be of a still more rarefied nature, and, to prevent being dispersed, it should have some kind of outer covering corresponding to the skin of the discarded body. When this integument is added—and the "spirit" could not hold together without something of that nature—the spirit-form would then become visible to every one in the meeting-room; and if to this the clothes be added, the phantom would be still more plainly perceived. Since, however, it is not visible, it is "something which is really nothing."

Again, when the spirit left the body it had no clothes: where did it get them? It could not make them itself for many reasons—one being that it had no muscles, and was unable to move any of its intangible limbs. Moreover, it did not need clothes, for having no organs of any kind, it would be a sexless phantom, powerless to do anything whatever. Hence, the "immortal soul" of the Christians, and the "discarnate spirit" of the Spiritists may be set down as pure nonentities; both are unthinkable as sentient beings.

ABRACADABRA.

"THE PARAGON OF ANIMALS."

Like the Roman emperors, who, intoxicated by their power, at length regarded themselves as demigods, so the ruler of the earth believes that the animals subjected to his will have nothing in common with his own nature. Man is not content to be the king of animals. He insists on having it that an impassable gulf separates him from his subjects. The affinity of the ape disturbs and humbles him. And, turning his back upon the earth, he flies, with his threatened majesty, into the cloudy sphere of a special "human kingdom." But Anatomy, like those slaves who followed the conqueror's car crying, "Thou art a man," disturbs him in his self-admiration, and reminds him of those plain and tangible realities which unite him with the animal world.

Acid Drops.

When the War is over, Mr. Lloyd George may, perhaps, find time to brush up his knowledge of history. In that case he may be prevented rushing into the absurdities he did in the course of a speech delivered on June 7. Then he informed his audience that the Christians once before saved civilization by stemming the tide of Saracenic invasion, which left behind it ruined cities and destroyed civilization, etc. Mr. Lloyd George has evidently got gloriously mixed up between the early Saracens and the later Turks, and, as they were both Mohammedans, lumps them into one whole. Which, as anyone who knows could have told him, is absurd.

That is why we say that when Mr. Lloyd George has the time to read a little on the subject, he will know better than to talk in that loose way. As a matter of fact, for several centuries the only civilization in Europe worth talking about was "Saracenic." The Saracens provided the rest of Europe with the starting-point for the Renaissance. They preserved and revived the science of antiquity, which the Church was trying to destroy. They were the teachers of Christendom in chemistry, in astronomy, in ship-building, and in various sciences. They practised religious toleration while Christendom practised persecution as a religious duty. They were civilized while the rest of Europe were next door to savages. If Mr. Lloyd George can find time to glance at the pages of Buckle or Draper, or look through Lea's Moriscoes in Spain, he will hardly venture to speak of mediæval Christians as the champions of civilization against a "Saracenic" invasion.

A soldier, who was tried at the Old Bailey for bigamy, was stated to have given his age at his first marriage as twenty-four. At the second marriage, which took place seventeen years later, he stated he was twenty-two. A man who grew younger in this fashion might have emulated the Bible Melchisadech, who had neither beginning nor end of days.

The Salvation Army has had its War flag days under royal and distinguished patronage, and it is now trying to raise the wind in other directions. Advertisements have appeared in the press headed "The End of the War," and informing the generous alms-giving public that the Salvation Army is still grappling with the "Old Social Evils"—presumably on the old familiar cash basis.

Providence, according to popular belief, has a peculiar fondness for stone statues and religious relics in the fighting lines, but this tenderness appears to be limited to inanimate objects. During the annual pilgrimage near Subiaco, Italy, the Church of the Trinity was the scene of a panic, in which seven persons were crushed to death and 120 injured. Afterwards it was found that the panic was caused by a mad woman suffering from delusions. "His tender mercy is over all his works."

The clerical attitude to the War has aroused much feeling, and even archbishops are not above criticism. Dr. Lang, Archbishop of York, is quite irate with his opponents, and points out that he resents being attacked for opinions he never held. It is a novel position for a parson of his rank, but many will see the humour of an engineer being hoist with his own petard.

"If the Church keeps aloof from questions of social reform," said Canon Adderley, "it won't be listened to any longer." Unfortunately, when the Church does interfere with social matters, she is always on the wrong side.

The clergy are always insisting that religion is a great consoler, but it is not all Christians who take this view. An advertisement, in a provincial paper, refers to a theological lecture, entitled "God to Destroy the European Nations." Lest any of the faithful should be unduly despondent, the notice adds: "All seats free. All cordially welcome."

Man's first disobedience was occasioned by an apple, but to-day there are so many stumbling blocks. The dear clergy, for example, constantly ignore the injunction concerning the laying up of treasure. One of the latest cases is that of the late Rev. W. Lenwood, a Congregationalist minister, of Sheffield, whose will was proved for £51,833.

A conscientious objector, just released from Wormwood Scrubbs, has been on hunger-strike since January, 1917. This seems to upset the record of the founder of Christianity.

Marvellous stories of the miraculous deliverance of religious statues on the Continent are printed in parish magazines, pious periodicals, and other repositories of wisdom. Sir R. M. Hyslop, however, states that many churches are in ruins in the War zone, and soldiers have used some of them as stables for their horses.

In an appeal for the support of the public, the Salvation Army claims to have ministered to thirty millions of soldiers. It reminds us of the modest claim of an obscure provincial paper, which used to state that it circulated among three millions of people.

According to ecclesiastical tradition, Saint Boniface was canonized for converting the Germans. It is a pity that the saint cannot meet those dear clergymen who maintain, with unblushing effrontery, that the Germans are Atheists.

A religious contemporary contains the information that the output of coal in the United Kingdom during 1917 was 248,499,240 tons. Considering the audience, information concerning the output of coal in Hades would have been more to the purpose.

Bold advertisements: "Christ is Coming," appeared in the newspapers recently. It was disappointing to find that they referred to a series of addresses at a London hotel.

What heroes the Bishops are! The Bishop of Peterborough announces that he contemplates another pilgrimage this month—in his own diocese.

A really good story of conversion was told at a recent Mansion House meeting by the Archbishop of Westminster. A soldier on the West Front told a chaplain he intended to marry a French girl. The padre remarked that she must be a Catholic. "Well, sir, she was," replied the soldier, "but I made that all right. I took her into a church and showed her the statues, and said, 'Napoo, pas bon!' And now she's a Protestant."

The Advisory Committee of the Military Tribunal of Penzance passed the following resolutions on May 25:—

> (1) That the Advisory Committee to the Military Tribunal for the borough of Penzance fully endorse the popular resentment against the action of H.M. Government in withdrawing from the Military Service Act of 1918 the clause, introduced by themselves, to secure the military services of the clergy and ministers of religion, thus granting complete and unqualified exemption to a whole class of the community; and they protest against a continuance of so undemocratic a policy as that of selective privilege, through the period of the acutest crisis humanity, with its civilization, has been called upon to face and to overcome.
> (2) That, consequent upon the inequality in the incidence of service protested against in the foregoing resolution, the Advisory Committee hereby place on record their sense of the increased difficulty attaching to the just discharge of the duties entrusted to them.

The resolutions were adopted unanimously. We should like to see other Committees and Tribunals follow this excellent example.

The Bishop of Oxford, in a University sermon, asked whether the attitude of Christ towards patriotism would escape the attention of D.O.R.A. (the Defence of the Realm Act). Frankly, we give it up. Christ and Dora is too much for us.

Sometimes pious penmen let the cat out of the bag without realizing it. Describing the Mohammedan pilgrimage to what is called, facetiously, "the tomb of Moses," a writer in the Daily News says: "In the past the time of the pilgrimage was one of danger, for there was a great influx of Christian pilgrims to Jerusalem, and there was apprehension among the Moslems lest the Christians should take advantage of their numerical superiority for acts of hostility."

Clerical humour is not so robustious as it once was, but a story told by the Rev. G. W. Leachman is good. A church had a splendid new banner, flashing with gilt and tinsel, and with the design of the Lion of Saint Mark, depicted as a ravenous-looking brute, upon it. Below the design was the text, "Suffer little children to come unto me."

An Italian editor informs his readers that Signor Bioti, the creator of "Mefistofeles," is dead. We may next hear that the Devil himself is dead.

Plain speaking is sometimes indulged in by parsons. Canon Adderley says that "Christian congregations are not remarkable for their charity and loving action." The Canon ought to know, for he has been in touch with Christians all his life.

A writer in a daily paper refers to militarism as "the medicine of God." Some critics prefer to regard it as a pill to purge pietism.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, who is a Spiritualist, considers that the next life is both shorter and happier than this, and is a step to still another future life. The distinguished novelist might send Sherlock Holmes to find out fuller particulars.

In view of a recent lawsuit, it is amusing to find a daily paper referring to a librarian who indexed Oscar Wilde's Importance of Being Earnest as theology.

Finance and faith often run in double harness. At the Liberation Society meeting it was pointed out that when the Royal Assent was given to the Welsh Disestablishment Act the value of each £100 of tithe rent charge was £74, and to-day the value was £109, and within two years would increase to £130. Thus, owing to War conditions, the money paid to the Church authorities would be half as much again as was intended. The dear clergy will forget these figures when they next parade their "poverty."

United intercession is extremely likely to end in something very like comedy. The latest victims of this pious craze are Irish women who are petitioning the Throne of Grace for deliverance from conscription.

The faith of some Christians is quite simple and childlike. Sir Donald Maclean says that "the only thing that can heal the woes of this world is the Gospel." The quaint thing is that the celestially minded Christians will enforce the Beatitudes at the point of the bayonet.

As an offset to the booming of the clergy who are entering the Army—mostly as non-combatants—the Rev. Thomson, of Glasgow, declared that the younger men "seemed to prefer working with a corkscrew and a lemonade bottle in Y.M.C.A. canteens." He would refuse, he said, to fill the pulpits with such men. Plain speaking of this kind from the pulpit is as welcome as it is uncommon.

From the Daily Chronicle:—

> The Bishop was addressing the Sunday school. In his most expressive tones he was saying: "And now, children, let me tell you a very sad fact. In Africa there are 10,000,000 square miles of territory without a single Sunday school where little boys and girls can spend their Sundays. Now, what should we all try and save up our money and do?" And the class, as one voice, replied in ecstatic union: "Go to Africa!"

To Correspondents.

C. F. BUDGE.—Readers who send us newspaper cuttings are always conferring a favour and helping us with our work.

H. HIGGINS (Motherwell).—Shall be pleased if you will act for your town as you suggest. We lectured in Motherwell some years ago, and hope to do so again. When we next come to Glasgow we will try and arrange for several week-nights in the district.

F. A. OVERIN, A. D. CORRICK, AND OTHERS.—Paper is being sent to the soldier's address as given.

V. H. SMITH.—Thanks for what you are doing on behalf of the Freethinker. For the moment the situation is a little more troublesome than usual, but we are not at all discouraged.

H. HIGGINS.—The authentic history of Babylonia goes back to about 1,200 B.C. Professor Petrie places the first Egyptian dynasty at about 4,777 B.C. Chinese and Indian history also takes us farther back than the date you name. A Short History of Ancient Peoples, by R. Souttar, will supply you with all the facts you need.

T. MORLEY (Wigan).—Your suggestion is a good one, and, as you will see, we have acted on it. Three new readers in a month is very good work. Hope you will soon better it, though.

J. S. N.—Thanks for cuttings. Very useful.

G. B. TAYLOR.—A capital plan. We know we can depend upon you doing your bit. And years are nothing so long as one feels young.

E. E. STAFFORD.—Sorry your paper has not reached you. It is sent regularly, so the fault is not ours. Will see what can be done.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss Vance acknowledges:—Mr. M. J. Charter, 10s.; Mrs. F. Whatcott, 5s.

N. S. S. GENERAL FUND.—Miss Vance acknowledges:—Mr. M. J. Charter, 10s.

H. DAWSON.—Quite acceptable. Many thanks.

W. E. BRUCE.—The Secretary of the Liverpool Branch is Mr. W. McKelvie, 21 Globe Street, Liverpool.

W. TAYLOR.—Sorry, but we know no more than the announcement disclosed.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We have had a gratifying number of replies to our article last week on the formation of a Freethinker League. Quite a number of towns are represented, and more will, we are sure, be coming along in the course of the next week. When we get a further instalment of names, we will commence classifying and arranging them, and the League can commence its work. And there is no reason why there should not be representatives of the Freethinker in fifty or sixty towns in Great Britain. Next week we will write more fully on the matter, and also on the way in which our readers may help towards guaranteeing a future supply of paper wherewith to print the Freethinker.

An Exeter reader sends us £1 10s. to be expended on the distribution of 2,000 copies of Mr. Cohen's Pioneer Tracts—What is the Use of the Clergy? and What Will You Put in Its Place? We propose sending them out in parcels of not more than 200—100 of each sort.—We shall be pleased to receive postcards from readers who will undertake their distribution.

The Pioneer Press has added to its list of books for Freethinkers three volumes of special interest. The Grammar of Life, by G. T. Wrench, aims—to use the author's words—at giving "a complete but short exposition of the principles of life in all its bewildering vicissitudes." And the programme is well realized. The work covers every aspect of life, and is uncompromisingly freethinking in both spirit and substance. The volume was published at 6s. net, and is being sold at 2s. 6d., postage 6d.

Those who are familiar with Mr. Carveth Read's Natural and Social Morals will not need much pressing to secure a copy of his Metaphysics of Nature. To those interested in the more fundamental questions of science and philosophy, we commend this volume as a thorough-going piece of work. It is uniform in appearance with Natural and Social Morals, was published at 10s. 6d. net, and is being sold at 3s. 6d., postage 6d. The third work is Mr. H. Croft Hiller's Against Dogma and Free Will, and For Weismannism. This is an ably written and suggestive work, and contains in an appendix the author's discussion with Mr. J. M. Robertson on Weismannism. Originally published at 7s. 6d. net, the price is now 2s. 6d., postage 6d. Only a very limited number of each of the above three works are available.

We have received a number of new addresses of soldiers who are to receive free copies of the Freethinker for thirteen weeks. One of our readers was good enough to pay for twenty-one copies to be sent in this way. That number is now completed, but we do not mind adding a few more on our own account. We are sure it is an excellent method of propaganda.

The New York Truthseeker reprints our "Views and Opinions" of March 31, on "Truth and the Press," with due acknowledgments. We are glad to see the Truthseeker is getting through the War period with little apparent discomfort, although we have no doubt that, behind the scenes, it has its share of anxiety. Only those "in the swim" can properly appreciate the worries involved in carrying on a weekly Freethought paper, even in peace times. Still, New York without its Truthseeker is as inconceivable as London without its Freethinker; and when the War is over, we have every confidence that each journal will be able to congratulate the other on having survived.

We are asked to call the attention of Freethinkers to the fact that the Kingsland Branch of the N.S.S. has changed the time of its Sunday meetings from evening to morning, and that many of the usual attendants do not appear to have accustomed themselves to the change. There was a good meeting on Sunday last for Mr. George Rule, and we hope that Freethinkers in the locality will support future meetings as well as they can. There ought to be a goodly number of Freethinkers in this district, and an hour devoted to propaganda once a week will be time well spent.

The friends of South Shields Branch have dismissed pro tem. all more important and weighty matters, and to-day (Sunday, June 16) have arranged to foregather at Dee Street Car Stage, Jarrow, for a short summer evening ramble by St. Bede's Well, Monkton Gardens, Hedworth Hall, and home, in place of the usual indoor meeting. Mr. J. L. Carr, 37 Britisher Street, Helbron, acts as leader, and the party will be whipped in by the Secretary and other local veterans. Visitors and old acquaintances are sure of a hearty welcome.

No answer has come through the ages
To the poets, the seers, and the sages
Who have sought in the secrets of science
The name and the nature of God. —John Hay.

Chance and the Cosmic Process.

THE universal operation of law in the natural world has become such a common conception in modern thought that few, even among theologians, now venture to question it. No advocate of the "Design" argument (except, perhaps, an occasional Christian Evidence lecturer) now imputes to the Rationalist the fallacy of holding that the cosmic order has been brought about by "chance," meaning by this a negation of law. All persons with any pretensions to philosophic thinking acknowledge that there is no such condition or agency—or rather, absence of agency—as chance in this sense. On the contrary, they are ready to agree that chance or probability, in the scientific sense of the term, so far from assuming a negation of law, is based on a recognition of it. For the chance or probability of an event is merely our ground of expectation of its occurrence under conditions in which the operation of a causal law or laws may, so far as we know, bring about several equally likely results. It is, therefore, not an expression of a belief in the absence of law, but an expression of a belief that the laws governing the results apply equally to all cases, and may, therefore, be expected to bring about results which are equally likely or probable.

Yet, though this conception of chance is so widely recognized, its recognition is frequently accompanied by a curious fallacy. This takes the form of an assumption that any result brought about under conditions of chance, even as thus scientifically understood, must always be of an irregular and capricious character—that merely because we happen to be ignorant of the exact conditions governing a set of causal operations, and have, therefore, no ground to expect one result more than another, such results can in no case be expected to exhibit the characteristics of law or order, but must always present an appearance of fortuity or accident. And, of course, the conclusion drawn from this assumption is that a result which does present this condition of order, harmony, and fitness for the development of moral and intelligent beings must have required for its production some further cause, different in kind from all the others, viz., an intelligent "design" or "purpose." Thus the theologian, while acknowledging, perhaps, the universal supremacy of law and causality, and while agreeing that among the uncountable millions of nebulæ and stellar systems scattered throughout space, evolutionary results of numberless kinds must be brought about, yet insists on the necessity of "intelligent design" to account for the one evolutionary result he happens to know, merely because it presents what he understands as a physical and moral "order." And he may, perhaps, attempt to clinch his argument by bringing forward that time-honoured illustration about letters of the alphabet being thrown down at random, and the absurdity of supposing that they would ever be found grouped in such an order as to form a "poem." This is a favourite illustration with the Christian Evidence lecturer, and is supposed to result in the immediate collapse of any Rationalist within hearing. Nevertheless, I cheerfully proceed to take up the challenge.

In the first place, it has to be observed that since, in the scientific view of probability, all the possible events or results contemplated are regarded as equally probable, it is obviously inadmissible to regard any one result as less probable than any other. In the second place, it must be observed that, whatever the value of the probability may be, this value approaches certainty as the number of instances under consideration increases, and would reach absolute certainty if the number of instances became infinite. The argument falls under these two heads, and it will be made clearer by a simple illustration.

Suppose someone shuffles a pack of playing-cards and lays the fifty-two cards out in a row. The order in which he shall lay them out is strictly determined by law. Given the weight, the thickness, the smoothness, etc., of each card, the sensitiveness of the dealer's fingers in touching them, the firmness of his muscular movements in shuffling them, and so on, some definite order of disposal in the pack will be the sure and inevitable result. Yet, to us, in our ignorance of these antecedents, any one order of arrangement out of all the possible orders is as likely to result as any other, for unknown and incalculable though the several sets of causal antecedents themselves are, we know that the conditions of their operation apply equally to any given instance. The case, therefore, comes under the theory of chance, for chance or probability may be described as an estimate based on an equality of conditions governing a known number of possible events, whence it is concluded that the occurrence of any one of these events is equally probable with that of any other. In the case of our illustration, the chance that any given order of sequence will occur among the fifty-two cards is expressed by a fraction of which the numerator is unity, and the denominator is the whole number of possible sequences of the fifty-two cards. This is a number of such enormous magnitude that no real conception can be formed of it, but some dim idea of its vastness may be derived from the statement that the number of seconds in a million years would form but a very small fraction of it. Yet of course it is a finite number, and moreover an easily calculable one, being merely the product of all the integral numbers from one to fifty two.

Now, supposing that the cards, on being laid out on the table, become ranged in a regular order of succession—say one suit following another in an unbroken group, and each of the four suits having its thirteen cards in serial order from ace to king. Very few people would fail to express utter incredulity as to this result having been due to chance, or would hesitate to attribute it to a deliberate "design" on the part of the person who shuffled the cards. And if he had had the temerity to lay bets on the occurrence of this particular result, the "purpose" attributed to him would certainly not be of "moral" character—indeed, it would take a deal of persuasion to convince the losers of the bet that he was not a cardsharper of the sharpest description.

And yet the arrangement of the cards in this orderly sequence would not have been a whit less probable than any other arrangement, and therefore should not have excited any unusual surprise at its occurrence. The "orderliness" of the arrangement would have nothing whatever to do with the probability of its actual occurrence, for this "orderliness" is merely something which is imputed to the arrangement by the spectators themselves. The particular order in which the cards have become grouped happens to correspond with an ideal order existing in the minds of the spectators, and thus gives rise to the notion of design.

We now come to the second consideration mentioned above, which deals with the number of instances involved in the occurrence of a chance event. The intrinsic probability of the occurrence of such an event on any one occasion has just been referred to, but a chance can also be expressed in terms of the probability of its occurrence once, twice, thrice, etc., in some given number of trials. It is obvious that a probability as thus expressed increases with the number of instances considered; and as this number approaches infinity, the corresponding probability approaches an actual certainty. Hence, to revert to our illustration, if the process of shuffling and laying out a pack of cards could be repeated "to infinity," the probability of their orderly arrangement in suits and sequences would be increased to an indefinite extent. Or if we wish to pay the theologian the compliment of using his own illustration, we may say that if an infinity of Christian Evidence lecturers, provided with bags containing all the letters of the alphabet in, say, Milton's "Paradise Lost," were to employ themselves for all eternity in scattering these letters out in rows, that celebrated, if somewhat tedious, poem would stand a good chance of being produced. For the number of ways in which the letters might happen to fall, however vast, is still a finite number; and every finite number shrinks into insignificance in comparison with infinity.

In the light of these considerations, the notion of design in Nature seems to lose even the fictitious plausibility which the theory of chance is mistakenly supposed to allow it. In the first place, the necessity of positing the existence of a controlling purpose, which is alleged to be imposed on us by the order prevailing in the minute portion of the universe within our ken—is seen to be due to a mere fallacy of thought. We ourselves being part and product of this order, it appears to us to occupy a unique position, and to stand on a different footing from any other set of causal sequences, while in truth it is no more exceptional and no more in need of special "explanation" than any other manifestation of the cosmic process. In the second place, the infinitely vast scale on which this process operates profoundly affects the question. When we realize that it is without beginning or end—is infinite in space and time—we see that the evolution of any possible order or mode of being passes from the region of probability to that of certainty. Whatever result the cosmic process can achieve, that result, somewhere and somewhen, it will achieve, for its field of operation is the infinity of existence.

But none the less do we recognize that this aspect of the question in no way precludes our belief in the existence of universal law—in now way negatives that grand conception of the fundamental unity of Nature which forms the basis of our Monistic philosophy. The sphere in which chance may be said to operate lies amid the infinite complexities and diversities, the numberless mutual actions and reactions of causal processes. But every deepening of our knowledge of Nature strengthens our conviction that underlying all these complexities and diversities there exists one supreme and eternal law —some one primordial Law of Energy.

A Little Homily.

I READ in an old book many years ago—an ancient primer whose secular page has become sacred in my eyes, and on which is founded as upon a rock all my wisdom, virtue, learning, and philosophy. My all of such things may be very little; that is not the point. The lessons found there, confirmed by experience, adapted and assimilated by the passing years, accompany me still on my journey, a very present help in time of trouble; and the more I ponder each wise remark, the more I am inclined to say, This is a faithful saying! I read this in the old book long ago. I quote from memory:

Form the most amiable opinions you can of nations, of communities, and of individuals; if they are good, you do them only justice; if they are not, you yourself are the more lovely for entertaining such sentiments.

There, you see, is the skilled appeal to self-approbation; but as the mind matures, it would extend the reasons for this gentle judgment. Men, in their moral and intellectual qualities, are not distinctively black and white, but rather of a mixed grey, shading off into what they are. So it is not only that we ourselves may be the "more lovely," though that vanity is a universal and wise provision of Nature, but that we ought to make the best of our fellow-beings as we find them, always remembering that we ourselves may not be quite perfect specimens of the genus homo. Burns was a great philosopher in little. For instance:

Then gently scan your brother man,
And gentler sister woman;
Tho' they may gang a kennan wrang,
To step aside is human.

Rash judgments are to be deprecated, as we will find they are nearly always to be deplored—even from our own selfish point of view. The old book says: "A word dropped by chance from your friend offends your delicacy. Beware of opening your discontent to the first person you meet. When you are cool it will vanish and leave no impression." But what hurts even more than that is our occasionally bitter and barbarian attitude towards certain quite amiable persons who happen to be diametrically opposed to us in matters of sentiment and opinion. As a writer quoted lately in the Freethinker from Voltaire: "It is the part of a wise man to have preferences but no exclusions." But not only in our anger or dislike are some of us prone to ill-considered (sometimes ill-conditioned) speech and action, but in our loves and confidences and conceits we often "give ourselves away."

And here, again, the philosopher in fustian comes to the rescue. Says Burns:—

Aye free offhand your story tell,
When wi' a bosom cronie;
But aye keep something to yoursel'
Ye wadna tell to ony.

The conclusion of the whole matter seems to be that, while the cold, calculating, crafty, cryptic, cunning mind is unpleasant at the one extreme, the rash, sweeping, dogmatic, condemning, or too-confiding, incontinent mind is foolish at the other. But, as Burns said to my unknown namesake long ago:—

Adieu dear amiable youth, (and age!)
. . . . .
Still daily to grow wiser;
And may you better reck the reed
Than ever did th' adviser.

To complete the thought, and round off the idea, it ought to be added that quickness and correctness of judgment, and even instant decision, are not incompatible with this cautious and kindly attitude of the really cultured man. The latter is born of knowledge, experience, and understanding, and grows with practice till it becomes a second nature, or new and higher kind of "instinct" itself.

A. MILLAR.

To the Owl.

DEAR MR. OWL,—I have long respected you. In my world of fancy you have always appeared to be the emblem of wisdom. My earliest recollection of you was when you calmly volunteered to dig the grave in the great tragedy of "Poor Cock Robin," and my respect for you was heightened. All my life I have wanted to commune with you; I felt as though you knew such a lot of things. I have seen you in various places, but you never anywhere seemed very different. You seemed to bear the change from the aviary to the museum as well, if not a good deal better, than your neighbours. In either place, I have always viewed you wistfully. But I have had a somewhat rude awakening. You spoke to us in the Freethinker on May 19, 1918. The Editor must have had similar impressions to mine, and so could not resist you. But I want to tell you candidly that I am entirely disillusioned; you are an old croaker. You ask us, "What is Nature?" and then you proceed to answer it very confusedly. Poor old bird! You say you don't want to "follow Nature." You are indeed in a quandary. Are we to suppose that you will look "beyond the clouds, beyond the tomb," as so many misguided beings have looked in vain through the ages.

Digitized by Google

I have heard that your favourite haunt is an old steeple; and perhaps you have lived too long with the people :—

Ah! the people,
They that dwell up in the steeple,
All alone,
And who, tolling, tolling, tolling,
In that muffled monotone,
Feel a glory in so rolling
On the human heart a stone.

I would like to hear you again after you have shaken yourself. I believe you are all right at bottom; something has gone temporarily wrong—"a rather tough worm," or something of that sort. You say that Nature is "the sum-total of things," "Nature is what brings the flowers in the springtime, and the rain, and the fruits, and all the sweet things of life." And yet you don't want to follow Nature. You are indeed a puzzle—a "Riddle of the Universe," in fact. You say that to an educated man, Nature means the observed order of things. But you again say "there is no law." What do you mean? I am inclined to think you are overfeathered. What harm is there in assuming our existence to be in accordance with law? Listen to what Ruskin says :—

Do we want to be strong ... We must work.
To be hungry ... ... We must starve.
To be happy ... ... We must be kind.
To be wise ... ... We must look and think.

Surely these are laws self-evident and imperative enough. Not human made, true; but unmistakable, not whimsical as based upon intelligence. Dear old biped, I would not flurry you, but I would earnestly rally you. You do not seem to have fully appreciated the work of Secularism; you rather petulently set yourself up to be the measure of things. Perhaps a few words of the dear old Pearsian may convey a few seeds of wisdom to you :—

And the inverted Bowl they call the sky,
Whereunder crawling coop'd we live and die,
Lift not your hands to it for help—for it
As impotently moves as you or I.

You personify Nature and label her as "horribly cruel." You rail at her because she is "red in tooth and claw," and you inconsistently refer to the "law"—"eat or be eaten." You say that that Nature has no blind asylums or benevolent institutions. "There is no Namby-Pambyism about Nature." "She's a real dandy." Wonderful bird! I think we shouldn't complain about her want of "Namby-Pambyism." I would suggest that when you resorted to the personification of Nature, you may as well have described her as "wondrous kind." Has she no blind asylums or benevolent institutions? If not, how do all the little blind things survive? Lots of things are born blind. How does that most helpless of beings—the human child—survive? Have you overlooked that great principle of motherhood, among the fishes, the birds, and, in fact, all over the world, as well as human life? A contemplation of which always sends a thrill through our frames. And while we are on that line, may we not as well remember the long story of humanity—all in Nature—not that childish story of tradition which, like you, as it were, has to have a super-Nature, but as told by the great benefactors of the race too numerous to mention, but should be tolerably well known to a Secularist, especially to a writer in the Freethinker, even though a bird. I hope you will "look and think," and write again for our future edification. Cynicism is a doubtful exchange for superstition; it may be a "getting rid" of some illusions, but we should be careful that other and even, perhaps, more dangerous illusions do not take their place. Secularism faces all the facts; it is a message of joy and hope to humanity, otherwise we may as well hold our peace, and let the race tread its more weary path with all its perplexities. It is useless to throw epithets at Nature, she is our only hope and guide, all else is illusion :—

—— Nature is made better by no mean,
But Nature makes that mean; over that art
Which you say adds to Nature, is an art
That Nature makes.

Secularism is the most ambitious movement in the history of the world; it asks humanity to shed its illusions. Secularism thus asks the best of its followers, each of which must look carefully to their equipment.

DIVORCE AND THE CHURCHES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Now that all the bishops and clergy have been heard on the grave and growing problems of the Divorce Laws, and have frankly stated the attitude of the Churches on this question, and towards "the few and exceptional" cases of extreme suffering, it is due to Divorce Law Reformers that their position should be presented to the large public which will ultimately have to decide what it requires of its representatives in Parliament, when the matter of the reform of the existing law is before the House of Commons, as it must be in the near future.

It should be perfectly clear to anyone who reads the daily papers that this question, so far from affecting a very small minority of the people of the country, is one that is ruining the lives of countless thousands, and it must be handled without prejudice, and with a view to sweeping away the mass of corruption and hidden vice which is the result of our rigid Divorce Law.

While I think it extremely unwise to augment the discussion of the operation of the Divorce Laws in America, I feel justified in quoting some remarks made to me a few days ago in a conversation with Judge Lindsey, the eminent authority and promoter of some of those laws, the founder of the Juvenile Courts of America, on which our own have been modelled, and the Courts of Domestic Relations, which we so sadly need to establish in our great towns.

Judge Lindsey emphatically declared that the extension of grounds for divorce in America had unquestionably established a cleaner and more wholesome national life, in that a vast amount of corruption and hypocrisy had been swept away, and he expressed himself as strongly opposed to the proposed unification of the laws governing the various States.

Judge Lindsey is a representative of the United States Government, and an honoured visitor to our shores. The attacks made on the Divorce Laws of America have induced him to promise to speak on this subject before his return.

The Divorce Law Reform Union, in proposing to break up the system of permanent separation without the power to remarry, has only taken action on one of the findings of the Majority Report of the Royal Commission, viz., that :—

> The conclusion of the Commissioners is that the remedy of judicial separation is an unnatural and unsatisfactory remedy, leading to evil consequences, and that it is inadequate in cases where married life has become practically impossible.

The importance of this finding was shown when, at the commencement of the War, Mr. Asquith found it necessary to ask Parliament to pass a measure to provide a separation allowance for the many thousands of unmarried wives of the men joining the Army.

It is inconceivable that an organization such as the Divorce Law Reform Union should be charged with a desire to promote periodic marriages of three years.

The demand that separation of three years and upwards should be a ground for divorce was based upon the most careful consideration of the facts of thousands of cases examined by them, in which there was ample proof that reconciliations were very rare after three years of complete separation, and that the dangers of prostitution, promiscuity, irregular unions, and illegitimate births often appeared at that period. Large numbers of deserted men, and still larger numbers of women of the working classes, with young families, have struggled under great difficulties to keep home and family together for two or three years, when failing health and desperation on the part of the women, and a desire to get their children cared for on the part of the men, has led to irregular unions and illegitimate births. These people, to-day, are praying that the Bill will pass which will allow them to marry; it is a cruel lie that they are satisfied with their condition.

The opponents of the measure know full well that the case is not overstated, and to say that these people are living in sin is to beg the question.

If a marriage "is really the Union of two souls in Love, sympathy, and agreement with one another," to quote the Bishop of Birmingham, then certainly no extension of the Divorce Laws can affect it one way or the other; but where a marriage is marriage in name only, where drunkenness, cruelty, vice, insanity, or hatred, have effectively destroyed the possibility of a common life, and where an atmosphere has been created in which children are permanently maimed physically, mentally, and morally, then, surely, in the interests of the highest morality the marriage should be dissolvable.

The Churches appear to have a very great fear that a measure which would give new life and hope to a large section of the community would open the door to abuse by the remainder.

The hold of the Churches on their members must be very slight indeed, if they truly believe that "any extension of the grounds for Divorce will be the end of Christian Marriage." No more ridiculous supposition could be put forward than that persons accidentally separated by reason of absence through "unavoidable causes" under the proposed measure will be certain of turning such a separation into a Divorce. In every case either party must present a petition to the court, and the presiding judge must be satisfied that there is justifiable reason for the application.

That the demand for greater facilities for Divorce has been established no one will deny in face of the number of cases disposed of by Mr. Justice Horridge during the past three weeks, and the number is small compared with the need. The majority of the cases have been undefended, brought by husbands, and this fact has been largely commented on in the Press. Women are said to have used the absence of the men at the Front to indulge in every form of license and vice, but it must be understood that there are thousands of women sufferers in the country who could bring actions if offence and relief were equal as between the sexes.

Let us rid our minds of all cant and hypocrisy on this question, and recognize that there are many causes which as effectively break the contract of marriage and make a common life impossible, as the one which is at present the only ground on which an action can be brought.

The Matrimonial Causes Act of 1884 abolished the power of enforcing a decree for Restitution of Conjugal Rights by attachment of the person. Men and women cannot be compelled to live with their spouses; when this is recognized it will be seen that the tendency is towards more and more separations.

During the War large numbers of young people have married who are already separated, and if permanent separation is to continue these people are a menace to society.

Every measure for the true welfare of the community has been opposed by the Churches. We are only asking for a remedy for a cancer that exists in our national life. We want cleaner marriages, fewer or no irregular unions, and a legitimate birth-rate, instead of opposing a reform of the present iniquitous divorce law, and advocating the perpetuation of a system which is responsible for a vast amount of avoidable misery and crime, the Churches would, indeed, do well if they would forthwith undertake to educate the young children and adolescents that come under their influence into the true meaning of marriage, in its physical, mental, and spiritual aspects, then we shall have reason to hope that the higher ideal of marriage, about which we are as keen as they, will be realized.

Ours is the remedy; their's the opportunity.

M. L. Seaton-Siedeman, Secretary.

Religion and the State.

In criticizing, last week, the Bishop of Oxford's proposals for maintaining religion in the schools, we dealt with the concrete proposals made, and ignored a vital principle that underlay the whole question. This is, the relation of religion to the modern State. And here there are only two logical positions. One is that religion is essential to right character; it is, therefore, a legitimate concern of the State, and cannot be neglected without risk of disaster. As the Bishop of Oxford puts it:—

> Education is the process of training the faculties, especially of the young, to enable them intelligently to live their lives and correspond with their opportunities. And plainly, if we believe in God, the most important function of education is to train the young to correspond with the purpose of God, so far as we can know that.

If we accept this, there is hardly less justification for the State teaching and enforcing religion than for teaching arithmetic. Opposed to this position is that which says the State has no business whatever with a person's religious opinions. Whether he has any or none is his own business. Each one, to quote Heine, has the right to go to hell in his own fashion—provided that in selecting the route he does not interfere with the freedom of locomotion of other people.

Theocracy or Atheocracy.

Religion exists in the State under two conditions. Either social affairs are judged from the point of view of religion, or religious beliefs are judged from the standpoint of social requirements. Either a Theocracy or an Atheocracy. The first is that for which genuine believers have always striven, and it is responsible for many of the evils associated with religion in general, and Christianity in particular. Jew hunts, heresy hunts, witch burnings, etc., have all resulted from the attempt to rule society in accordance with religious belief. And it is no more than just to point out that the evils of religion were consummated by men who were often actuated by a high sense of duty. To them the heretic was a plague spot, a centre of contamination, and the necessity for his elimination appeared the greater as religious belief was stronger. The consequences of attempting to regulate life by religious beliefs are written in some of the most deplorable chapters in the history of the world. Its condemnation is now so complete that one can scarce find a single responsible person who will stand as its champion. The other condition, that religious beliefs are to be judged from the point of view of social utility, is quite as fatal to religion. For there are none of the functions of life that cannot proceed as well without religion as with it. The proof of this is that it occurs. Believers are neither wiser nor better than unbelievers. The secularization of life is not a theory, but a fact, and a religion that cannot prove itself to be true has small chance of continuing its existence on the plea that it is useful.

A Vicious Unity.

It is worth noting that the separation of religion from the State, even in theory, is a modern doctrine. Although the Greek and Roman conception of social life was too sane to permit its being subordinated to so grossly and crudely conceived a supernaturalism as afterwards obtained under Christian rule, still the worship of the gods remained a part of the general functions of the State. Splendidly tolerant as Rome was of differing creeds and gods, the head of the State, as such, was the head of the national religion, and officiated as such on occasions of State. And certainly nothing would have been deemed more impious by the early Christians than any separation of the two functions. Their objection to obeying the State in matters of religion was not based upon the belief that it was overstepping the functions, but that it was teaching the wrong religion. The Catholic Church has never receded from the position that the State ought to enforce the true religion; nor has it taken much pains to hide its intention of enforcing it if ever it has the chance of carrying this into practice.

Nonconformist Cant.

Protestantism in its early stages showed no departure from this principle. None of the Protestant leaders believed that the State ought not to teach religion; all they said was that the State ought to teach only the true religion—theirs being, of course, of the correct brand. As a matter of fact, the establishment of a State Church is entirely owing to Protestantism. But the duty of the State to enforce the true and suppress the false was held by all the Protestant leaders, and all used the civil power as occasion offered. And in every instance where Protestantism succeeded Catholicism was forcibly suppressed, and the newer form of faith forcibly imposed upon the people. Nor could anything be more false, and (in the case of modern Nonconformists) more hypocritical, than the claim that the Puritans and the seventeenth-century dissenters generally fought either for real liberty of conscience or for the separation of Church and State. Nothing was farther from their thoughts. It was merely a repetition of the historic struggle—a desire to replace one form of religious belief by another, and to impose the same penalties upon dissentients. The reign of Puritanism in England and America, with its lengthy and savage list of imprisonments, nose, tongue, and ear-slittings, brandings and whippings—all for religious offences—is surely enough to give the lie to the modern Nonconformist claims. That those who make these claims know better there can be little doubt. That they do not speak more accurately betrays a lively faith in the ignorance of their congregations and in the power of impudent reiteration. In practice, Nonconformists are as anxious as Catholics or Episcopalians to secure State support, and quite as willing to take all that is offered. They support heartily all statutory measures for the prevention of anti-religious propaganda, they protest energetically against the abolition of religious services at all State and Parliamentary functions; they take readily all the solid cash the State cares to give them in the shape of a remission of taxes, and they advocate the teaching of religion in all State schools. In the face of these facts it requires impudence of no mean order to claim that Nonconformists do not believe in the alliance of religion and the State.

The Causes of State Neutrality.

Two causes are responsible for the modern doctrine that the State should not interfere in matters of religion. The first is the growth of sects. If the limits of Church and State were conterminous; if, that is, only one religion existed in society and all people belonged to it, there would be nothing politically unjust in all contributing to its maintenance. Injustice commences when from a multitude of religious sects the State selects one and uses the whole of the social forces for its maintenance. Dissatisfaction, springing in the first instance from religious rivalry, arises, and later an elaborated political expression of this discontent gives birth to the theory of State neutrality in religion. But State neutrality means, in practice, State indifference. It means the State saying publicly, "We do not care whether you believe in religion or not. So far as we are concerned, it does not matter. We are convinced that you can carry out all the functions of a good citizen without any belief in God or a future life. We are no more concerned with your going to church than with your attending a cinema show. Religion is a matter we decline to enforce, because it appears to us a matter of indifference whether you believe in it or not." And in this the State is a reflection of life. For it is life that gives the lie to religion. The Freethinker does no more than record the fact.

Religion and the Logic of Life.

The second cause is the growth of unbelief. In a State where all believe, it would be impossible for it to stand aloof. No one who really believes that Christianity is essential to right living could advocate the State leaving it alone, while enforcing other things. And, so far, men like the Bishop of Oxford, who believe in the State teaching religion to both children and adults, have all the logic on their side. It is true that this ideal is a more or less hopeless one, but it is quite logical from the believer's point of view. It is impracticable, because heresy and unbelief can no longer be suppressed or ignored. The State to-day comprises men and women of all kinds of religious belief and of no belief at all. The man with three gods rubs shoulders with the man with no god at all. They join each other in a hundred-and-one different social enterprises, and find a lack of religion no obstacle to efficiency as a citizen. Under such conditions the State patronage of religion becomes both absurd and unjust. The enforcement of religion is no longer possible, because the world no longer believes. And when a religion cannot be imposed upon an adult, it becomes a cowardly tyranny to force it upon the helplessness of a child.

"The Church and the League of Nations."

THE above is the title of a notable article in the June number of the Welsh Outlook, from the pen of Major David Davies, M.P. The writer is a member of a well-known Welsh family of colliery proprietors, and the Welsh Outlook is a youthful monthly magazine of exceptional merit, devoted chiefly to matters relating to Wales. It deserves a much wider circulation than it enjoys at present, but we are confident that the interesting variety and excellent quality of its contents will 'ere long secure for it a high position of directive influence in the intellectual, political, and social development of the Principality. Major Davies' article is marked by the serious, sane, view it takes of the peculiar situation created by this great World-War, and it affords us sincere pleasure to express our warm appreciation of the entirely fine spirit that animates it from beginning to end; but our object in reviewing it is to call attention to an obvious fallacy which underlies its whole argument. Major Davies writes from the standpoint of a deeply convinced Christian who is confronted by the undeniable fact of the total failure of the Christian Church. Than this no fact could be more perplexing and humiliating to a sincere believer in Christianity, not only because Christianity claims to be a supernatural and consequently infallible religion, but also and chiefly because the Church is represented to be its supernaturally appointed and endowed agent or instrument, so that there is no possible escape from the conclusion that the failure of the latter of necessity involves the failure of the former. In the New Testament both are described as being equally of Divine origin, and as equally possessing Divine power. It is true that the Church is composed of ordinarily weak and fallible men and women, but as a Church, indwelt by the crucified and ascended Christ, and omnipotently energized by the Holy Ghost, they are absolutely irresistible, all-conquering. Beyond a doubt such is the New Testament conception of the Christian Church, and this Major Davies, as an honest man, is bound to admit. And yet it is absolutely incontrovertible that the Church "has lost her hold upon humanity," with the inevitable result that Christianity, contained within her as a sacred deposit, has come infinitely short of fulfilling its promised mission.

At this point Major Davies introduces several irrelevancies, such as that "man must have a religion of some kind," that "the sense of worship is part of his being, and he cannot divest himself of it," and that even the keen scientist "in his innermost mind is a devotee of some creed or other," and our only purpose in alluding to them is to point out that, as put by him, they are as untrue as they are foreign to the subject under consideration. Equally irrelevant is the reference to the French play, known in English as False Gods. It is only in the fifth paragraph of his article that Major Davies comes into direct grips with the question at issue. In the past the Church has, admittedly, not been what she always prides herself upon being, she has not set a disjointed world right, she has not established the reign of universal brotherhood, she has not succeeded in even teaching professing Christians to love one another, and dwell together in beautiful unity. All this is not formally admitted by the writer, but it is surely implied in the following passage:—

> This is the Church's opportunity. Will she take it? Will she rise to the occasion? Will she point to the goal? Will she cast away all reservations and throw herself into the fray? Will she rest until the ideal is achieved, so that to future generations her teachers will be able to point the moral?.....Will it not be truthfully said that if the Church loses this opportunity, our profession of religion is a sham and an illusion? If she hesitates to put the Gospel first, last, and all the time in the forefront, if she seeks, for selfish purposes, to place the nation before the nations, if the Church is to be the tool of the State, then indeed will the people have finally lost all confidence in the message of the Church and we shall inevitably relapse into the barbarism of past ages. What then is the goal? What is the land of promise? What is the special mission? What is the Holy Crusade? What is the vindication of the faith in these days of fire and sword? (the Welsh Outlook, vol. v., p. 179).

Such is the fifth paragraph in Major Davies' article; and it is the only truly relevant portion. Futile and false is it to assert that the religion of Christ is "acknowledged by believer and unbeliever alike to be the purest and highest standard of conduct offered to mankind," the only true statement being that this religion "has suffered a set-back," and that "there has been a reaction to Materialism." The so-called "sublime principles of Christianity" have lain, quiescent, as a Divine deposit in the Church for nineteen long and dreary centuries, and Major Davies himself cannot be blind to the fact that the millionfold tragedies of the present War are utterly inconceivable "if there is really a Divine Providence guiding the destinies of mankind." Of course, there is another side, a more satisfactory one, to the picture; but both sides represent two sets of good and evil tendencies in human nature for which the appalling curse of war serves as an outlet, and it so serves in the evil instances quite as much as in the good.

But what about the League of Nations, the object of which is to prevent future wars? Let it be borne in mind that Major Davies is a wholehearted believer in Christianity and in the Divine mission of the Church. Let it also be remembered that between his song of praise of the Gospel and his advocacy of the League of Nations there is no logical connection whatever. All he says about Christ and the sublime principles of his religion is totally irrelevant to his argument for the League of Nations. As a matter of fact, were it not for his formal avowal of Christian belief, we could not find the remotest hint of it in his reasoning. On the contrary, his support of the idea of the League of Nations is such as to imply either the non-existence or the complete collapse of the Christian religion. With the argument itself, as well as with his rhetorical commendation of the League, we are in full accord. The following statement is a wholly rational one:—

> There can be no permanent peace unless all the nations of the world agree to general disarmament. This is the crux of the whole question.

Such is the next also, which we put in italics:—

> Complete disarmament involves the establishment of an international police force, which means that the nations have resolved to pool their resources in order to maintain law and order among themselves.

Judge Wadhams was perfectly justified in saying that "when you see a constable you behold the incarnation of the Magna Charta and the British Constitution"; but is it not equally evident that the existence of a police-force, national or international, is a perpetual reminder of the colossal failure of the Gospel either to set or to keep the world in peaceful order?

"The Great Achilles Whom We Knew."

> The man who feels that he has truth on his side must step firmly. Truth is not to be dallied with.—Goethe.
> In this world, if you do not say a thing in an irritating way, you may just as well not say it at all, since nobody will trouble themselves about anything which does not trouble them.
> —Bernard Shaw.

AN interesting feature at the public meeting at the last Congress of the National Secular Society was the reading by Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner of one of her father's speeches, originally delivered at a similar function many years before. As the stately and statesmanlike sentences fell from her lips, I recalled the striking and magnetic personality of Charles Bradlaugh, "the great Achilles whom we knew." Whatever may have been thought of Bradlaugh's significance as a politician and thinker, whatever may be the influence he wielded in public affairs, the memory of his personal career must live while anyone has an eye for the dramatic and romantic in English history. The story of his meteoric rise is like a leaf torn from the pages of Plutarch; the story of his untimely death is as moving and as poignant as a tragedy of Sophocles. He will live with Cromwell, Cobbett, and Gladstone as one whom a vivid and forceful personality must always make interesting. The years since he died have quieted the shoutings and tumult of his strenuous time, but they have left the heroic figure of Charles Bradlaugh clear-cut for our regard. Not only was he a great man; he was a man of real distinction in aspect and carriage. The fight he made in Parliament and outside against an overwhelming majority of opponents was one of the bravest ever fought, and his triumph in the hour of death was as complete as that of Nelson on the deck of the shot-riven Victory. Thanks to Bradlaugh's courage and devotion, heterodoxy is no longer a serious bar to the citizen, and ecclesiastical authority has been shorn of its dangers.

It is strange that people are only now beginning to see that Bradlaugh's attitude to religion was actually forced upon him. He had no wish to fight the clergy and their supporters; he did not want to waste his time arraigning the polygamy of the Patriarchs, the gallantries of David, and the absurdities of religion. But he saw clearly that priestcraft was the bulwark of tyranny. It was precisely because the Christian religion was the shield of injustice that he challenged it; and if he seemed to those outside of his influence a mere iconoclast, he has in this only shared the fate of the world's greatest reformers. He died early because of the ill-treatment he received. Dead, he remains a living force by the nobility of his life and the consistency of his example.

"Thorough" was his motto, and throughout life he acted up to it. He was no dreamer of dreams, leaving others to translate his ideas into deeds. First and last, he was a man of action. In his earlier days the Freethinkers were feebly led and fitfully inspired. Without his leadership their stay in the desert might have been prolonged many years. It was he, most ably seconded by men of real talent, doubtless; but, again, first and foremost, he who made the Freethought Party as we know it to-day.

What a price he paid for his leadership! The last time I heard him lecture at the old Hall of Science, I realized that he was a broken man. For a whole generation he had led the forces of Freethought, but the Philistines were too much for even his iron constitution. Brave to the last, he kept a bold front to the enemy, but he was bleeding to death beneath his armour.

Some of his cheering audience nearly broke down, thinking of the fierce old fighting days, when there was no thought of anything but the fight itself. Had his assailants known Bradlaugh as he really was, they could never have hated him as they did. Jealousies and unkindness and bitterness of spirit are in most human labours; but religion, with its insincerities and intellectual meannesses, seems to hold a poison of its own which narrows the vision and blunts the edge of principle.

Bradlaugh fought for liberty, and his life struggle was as heroic as that of the Spartan heroes who held the pass of Thermopylæ against the Persian hosts. He stood like a stone wall against the hordes of priestcraft. Bradlaugh grows larger to one's mental and moral vision the more distant he becomes. The best views of the Alps are to be gained from a distance, and we get the better view of Bradlaugh as we recede from him. A hero in action, he was chivalry incarnate. He was never the man to say to others: "Go on," but he always said: "Come on." Now he is no longer a presence, but a memory, we are free to look at him, free from controversy, and to estimate him at his true worth. Shall our lives not be nobler also because of his worthy example? He fell, prematurely, alas, worn out by hard work and harder usage in that great battle-field of humanity, whose soldiers fight not to shed blood, but to dry up tears; not to kill their fellow-men, but to raise them up. Labouring not for himself, but for others, he made an imperishable name, and gave the world "assurance of a man." Let us salute the memory of one of the truest that ever drew breath.

A Search for the Soul.

BEFORE proceeding with this subject farther, it may be well to glance for a moment at what is known to be the undoubted origin of the soul. In the later part of the Old Testament times, we find that many Jews had come to believe that man possessed within him a counterpart of himself which was able to leave the body during sleep and go roaming about the country at pleasure. This idea originated in dreams, in which the dreamer met and conversed with deceased friends, or fought with enemies no longer living. Upon awakening and being assured that he had never left his couch, he thought the matter over, and ultimately arrived at the conclusion that there must be a second indwelling self that had the power to quit the body for a time and afterwards return to it. The only point upon which he had any doubt was, as to whether this soul or spirit would die with the body. In course of time, however, it came to be the general opinion that all these "spirits of the dead" would go to a place prepared for them under the earth—that is to say, "Sheol," or the Underworld—and would there remain in an eternal sleep to the end of time. The latter place is referred to in the books of Isaiah, Job, Ezekiel, and some of the Psalms.

Upon this subject Tylor, in his Anthropology says:—

> What, then, is this soul or life which [the primitive man thought] goes and comes in sleep, trance, and death? To the rude philosopher, the question seems to be answered by the very evidence of his senses. When the sleeper awakens from a dream, he believed he had really somehow been away, or that other people had come to him. As it is well known by experience that men's bodies do not go on these excursions, the natural explanation is that every man's living self or soul is his phantom or image, which can go out of his body and see and be seen itself in dreams.....That men have such unsubstantial images belonging to them is familiar in other ways to the savage philosopher, who has watched their reflections in still water, or their shadows following them about, fading out of sight to reappear presently somewhere else.....Here, then, in a few words, is the savage and barbaric theory of souls, where life, mind, breath, shadow, reflection, dream, vision, come together and account for one another in some such vague confused way as satisfied the untaught reasoner.

That this was how the idea of man possessing a soul originated there cannot be the shadow of a doubt; for it arose in an age of ignorance and credulity, when nothing certain was known of the functions of the human organism, or of the causes of natural phenomena. A similar idea of invisible demons entering the body came later, and was suggested by the violent convulsions in cases of epilepsy (see Mark ix. 17-27).

Returning to history, we find that among the fourteen books called the Apocrypha, which were written during the interval between the Old and New Testaments, there are three which contain passages indicating a belief in a new kind of immortality. In two of these books the spirits of "the righteous" were supposed to be translated to an abode of bliss, and those of the non-righteous were to be left in Sheol for ever. In the third book (that of 2 Esdras) there was to be immortality for all mankind—to be passed either in a heaven of delights or a hell of torments. This last was the immortality adopted by the Essenes and Nazarenes and by the Christians in apostolic times—whence the doctrine of the soul and its imaginary "eternal life" was handed down the ages by the Christian Church to the present day.

Let us now look at the subject a little closer. We are told that man is of a tripartite nature, made up of body, soul, and spirit; but no one now believes that when the body has perished and undergone disintegration, it will ever be raised to life again, though such was the belief in apostolic times. The only hope for immortality, then, is the survival of what are called "soul" and "spirit"; and these are merely the names of two imaginary entities (or two aspects of the same entity) which are believed by Christians and Spiritists to dwell within all human organisms during life, and to survive them at death. Science, however, knows nothing of them; they have never been seen or met with in any of the thousands of surgical operations performed on the human body during life, nor have they ever been seen to leave the body by doctors or relatives at death. The reason of this, we are told, is because they are of so attenuated and intangible a nature as to be invisible—like the imaginary evil spirits in the New Testament. But it is quite evident that any so-called "entity" that could quit the body without being perceived by the relatives in attendance upon the dying person could not possibly represent the personality of that person when in life. Besides many other essentials, personality certainly includes life, consciousness, intelligence, and memory; but no one with a grain of sense could imagine an attenuated, invisible nonentity to possess any of the attributes named; these are the resultant of activities generated by the living organism, and are never found apart from that organism.

In Man and the Universe, Sir Oliver Lodge makes the following remarkable statement:—

> Though it by no means follows that Mind is itself dependent on matter as we know it, it will probably be still by means of something akin to matter that it will hereafter be manifested.....Christianity clearly supplements the mere survival of a discarnate spirit, a homeless wanderer or melancholy ghost, with the warm and comfortable clothing of something that may legitimately be spoken of as a "body".....an ethereal or other entity constituting the persistent "other aspect," and fulfilling some of the functions which atoms of terrestrial matter are employed to fulfil now.

Here Sir Oliver evidently sees that a "discarnate spirit" is really nothing in itself, and requires "something akin to matter," not only to hold it together, but to do the mental work previously performed by the material brain. He does not, however, gain much by appropriating the "resurrection body" described by Paul, which now forms part of the Christian Burial Service. The reasoning of that apostle is:—

So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption;.....It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body (1 Cor. xv. 35-44).

The foregoing prognostication, as everyone must perceive, is pure nonsense. The corrupt natural body will never be raised an incorrupt spiritual body; of this there is no doubt whatever. There can be no resurrection. When once committed to the earth, the corpse will never be raised to life in any form, as Sir Oliver Lodge well knows. Why, then, does he refer to this text as giving the discarnate spirit a "warm and comfortable body"? Sir Oliver is quite welcome to an "ethereal body"; but when we know that what is called "ether" is supposed to be many million times thinner than atmospheric air, it is really astonishing to hear it called "warm and comfortable." Compared with ether, the tepid air that leaves the lungs is thick and warm as a blanket.

In his notice of a recent work on "Immortality," by V. F. Storr, Canon of Winchester, the reviewer, T. G. Bonney, D.Sc., says: "Perhaps Canon Storr might have insisted more strongly on the difficulty of conceiving an individuality as wholly disembodied, even in the intermediate state. Consciousness of individuality can hardly exist without a consciousness of limitation, within the boundary." Just so; a soul or spirit which leaves the body must have some kind of outside covering to hold the spirit-form together and keep it separate from the space around it. Such a membrane the "spirit" could not take from the body. Where did it get this covering? Where, also, did it get the spirit-clothes which clairvoyants describe it as wearing? I will leave these questions for Spiritists to answer.

Eternal Beauty.

SPRING, with her love, hath decked the orchards gay;
The drowsy bee to apple blossom wings;
The orchards sing of Autumn gatherings,
And lovely night gives birth to lovelier day.

Of late I've seen a broken apple bough
With bloom all dead in dew-besprinkled green,
The flying steel had severed its gay sheen,
And it lay dead as fickle lover's vow.

Say, who shall weep, what tears shall we let fall
For Beauty sundered from its beauteous stem?
Shall we cry out like misers o'er lost gem
Who, for some paltry worth, had staked their all?

Nay, nay; the lamp of Beauty brightly burns
Forever god-like as the god-like sun;
So will it burn when rusty sword and gun
Shall be as dust in unremembered urns.

WILLIAM REPTON.

Acid Drops.

Ever since the War commenced, Christians of all kinds have been trying to explain why God permitted it. There is something significant even in the attempt, for war is not a new thing in the world. Putting aside war between the great Christian Powers—and if they were out of the way there would be fewer wars in the world—there is nearly always a war going on somewhere. True, these are generally "little" wars; but, although our Bishops don't grow rhapsodical about them, still one may assume that, when men are killed, the distinction between being killed in a "great" war or in a "little" one, is not important. And if all that a people possess are rude huts and primitive furniture, to them their destruction means much what the destruction of a home means in Belgium or France, or elsewhere. We know this is an unchristian way of looking at the matter, but we are built that way.

Now, Miss Esther Mayman comes along with another explanation. "War is God's surgery." "There is a point in man's transgression of spiritual law which we cannot pass and live, and to save the race God cuts men off in millions—not by a miracle, but by the operation of natural causes." All we can say on this is that God bungles as badly as a surgeon as he does in other directions. What would be said of a surgeon who, because one man broke his leg, cut off another man's arm? Yet this is what occurs. The millions who have died have certainly not all broken those "spiritual laws" which produced the War. German territory has suffered least of all; Belgian territory most of all—and the Belgians simply had nothing to do with it. Those who transgress most suffer least. God kills the more innocent to teach the more guilty a lesson. Good God!

The woes attendant upon the possession of riches do not seem to frighten the clergy. The late Rev. G. B. Morley, of Bournemouth, left £32,148.

Up to a month ago 22,000 out of 42,000 elementary schoolmasters have joined the Army, and 5,000 more have been called up, says Sir James Yoxall, M.P. What a contrast to that of the clerical profession, which has so far been exempted from military service.

The modesty of parsons is proverbial, but journalists sometimes lay the flattery on with a trowel. A London newspaper, referring to Dr. Jowett, the Nonconformist minister who has recently returned from America, says that he has "clearly come back" as an "interpreter of the two Anglo-Saxon peoples to one another." If Dr. Jowett wants an interpreter's job, he might translate the choice Americanese of Billy Sunday for English readers.

Although Freethought is treated very cavalierly in the press, Superstition is always sure of a welcome. In a column review of Sir A. Conan Doyle's spiritist book, The New Revelation, the writer refers to Sir Arthur's statement that spiritualistic manifestations are among the fundamental things in the Bible. It is not edifying to find the author of a "new revelation" searching in the dustbins of departed ignorance.

The Rev. John McNeill, who has always been a notorious egotist, whose self-imposed mission seems to be to safeguard God's reputation, is now surpassing himself in the art of saying silly things. Speaking at the Mansion House the other day, he undertook the task of putting the Lord "in the right place" in his relation to the War; and this is how he is reported to have done it:—

Think of him in the right place, and that is at the heart of it, all its issues held and securely held, and guided and unerringly guided, by his hands. He is awaiting the moment to arrive when in his wisdom and purpose he shall lift his hands and say, "Thus far and no farther." Then not another shot shall be fired and not another soldier fall.

Not even the Bishop of London can beat that!

"The Most Excellent Order of the British Empire" bids fair to embrace almost the whole population, excluding children. The latest list of awards includes about 6,000 names, and among those honoured are some Salvation Army officials, several railway station-masters, a police superintendent, typists, princesses, telegraphists, photographers, nurses, and munition girls.

The United States is generally considered to be the home of fancy religions, but consciences appear to have small market value in the land of tall buildings and tall ideals. Forty-five conscientious objectors to militarism were sentenced to imprisonment for life in Texas, but on a merciful reconsideration of their cases the sentence was reduced to a quarter of a century each.

At a meeting of the committee of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel it was stated that an offer was made to supply one of the bishops with an æroplane to enable him to visit his overseas diocese. The right reverend Father-in-God declined the offer. Maybe he was not anxious to meet his Saviour in the skies.

A Local Preacher asks Professor David Smith, in his Correspondence Column in the British Weekly for June 13, what "the functions of the Trinity" are, and, of course, the Professor has no difficulty in giving the desired information. The Head of the Trinity is the Father, whose supreme ambition is to be made known to mankind. For that purpose he sends his Son into the world, who there becomes man and acts the part of the Father's advocate with men. Then he returns to heaven to be men's advocate with the Father, and sends the Holy Ghost to continue his earthly ministry as the Father's advocate with men. Dr. Smith writes as one who knows all about the subject, and the Local Preacher will no longer have any doubt as to what "the functions of the Trinity" are.

The Daily Telegraph's brave boast that "King George reigns over an educated people" is sometimes contradicted by facts. At Nottingham Police Court a man complained that his wife had been to a sorceress to have a curse put upon him. The Bench stood the shock like the rock of Gibraltar.

A Daily Telegraph reviewer writes, in the course of a notice of a book on Spiritualism by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, that the War has deepened people's interest in the question of a future life. As a statement of fact, that may be true, although we are not aware of any decisive evidence on the point. It is just as likely that what is happening is that a number of people are taking advantage of the War to talk about a future life, in the hope of a more attentive audience. We do not believe that the War will have removed disbelief or created belief. Certainly the destruction of life now going on is not likely to increase the sense of its value.

But the important thing is whether the War has brought any new facts to light bearing on a future life. Quite clearly it has not done this. Death, even death of all sorts of horrible and painful means, did not begin with the War, and it will not end with it. There is no increase of anguish in connection with the War; there are only more people suffering in a given time. And those who suffer find no comfort in a future life—unless they believe in it beforehand. The comfort felt is little more than a conventional expression. As a matter of fact, there is plenty of evidence that the way people face the loss of their loved ones is quite independent of religious belief. It is a question of education, temperament, and native disposition.

The Archbishop of Canterbury asserts that forty-four years ago he and others were trying to get people to understand the same ideals for which we were now fighting. It would have been far better if His Grace had devoted himself to the better education of the clergy in the "same high ideals." The anxiety of the clergy that others should do the fighting is wonderful.

The Rev. Mr. Stockley, vicar of St. Paul's, Burton-on-Trent, is candid enough to confess that "terrible troubles surround the Church of God, and seem every moment about to submerge the Sacred Ship." Mr. Stockley's only hope is fixed on Christ, but he forgets that Christ promised to dwell in the midst of the Church to the end of time. If he spoke the truth, it follows that he, too, is now about to sink with his Church. Consequently, so far as the Divine Being is concerned, the Church is absolutely without hope.

Dr. Campbell Morgan is admittedly an exceedingly able man, and naturally his explanation of what is described as the signal failure of the Church is the very best that can be offered. Preaching at Newport, Mon., the other Sunday morning, he asserted that only those who do not know what the Church's mission in the world is declare that she has failed. He admitted, however, that during this War, in particular, Catholicism has exemplified its utter impotence—has, in fact, been guilty of plainly showing its sympathy with Austria, but claimed that the various Protestant communions, at least, the Nonconformist sections, have been and are fulfilling their mission right nobly. They have sent hundreds of thousands of their best young men to the Front, and they are administering tea and coffee and spiritual consolation to wounded soldiers, as well as reliable guidance to those who come home on leave. And, in addition, are they not kept busy comforting the bereaved parents, brothers and sisters, widows and children, and sweethearts, of those who fall in battle?

Such was the best apology which so eminent a preacher as Dr. Campbell Morgan could suggest for what is universally spoken of as the dismal failure of the Christian Church; and we do not hesitate to affirm that in offering it he but culpably trifled, or palpably juggled, with the subject. The Gospel Jesus likened his kingdom unto "leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened." We are assured that the Church is in charge of that Divine leaven, having been Divinely appointed and equipped to hide that leaven, which is righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, in the human meal till the whole is leavened. Has Dr. Morgan the hardihood to declare that the whole of humanity has been leavened with the kingdom of heaven? If not, is he not bound to admit that the Church has not fulfilled her mission?

Instead of facing that question Dr. Morgan slips off on a tangent and says: "See, the reality of Christ is being demonstrated during this War as it was never demonstrated before. Everywhere there is sorrow, and everywhere men and women are triumphing over their sorrow because Christ is with them." Does Dr. Morgan really imagine that only Christian believers keep their troubles under, and are able to sing in tribulation? If he does, then his taunted knowledge of human beings is an illusion. Myriads upon myriads of non-Christians are morally strong enough to gain the victory over their sorrows without supernatural aid. It is easy enough to say that to give a cup of coffee to a returned soldier is a Christly act; but we prefer to call it an eminently human act. The reverend gentleman says that the call to hope and heroism is always Christ's call; but, being himself a fair scholar, he knows that the saying is false. Purity, hope, and heroism are distinctively human virtues, which were in active existence thousands of years before Christ was heard of, and are being practised to-day in lands where his name is not known.

The Daily Sketch says that the pay of fourth-class Army chaplains is to be increased from 10s. 6d. to 13s. 6d. per day. "Tommy" gets along on considerably less. But we suppose the increased pay will further stimulate the "patriotic" ardour of the "Black Army."

Cardinal Bourne, speaking at Hampstead in defence of the Pope's attitude on the War, said that in the early days of the conflict the Pope had no first-hand information. Poor papa! His infallibility does not seem worth a straw.

Concerning the "Freethinker."

WE are pleased, but not surprised, to be able to report that our proposed League for guarding the interests of the Freethinker is making headway. We have now, excluding London, the names of representatives in eighteen towns who have promised to help, and we see no reason why we should not quadruple that number before long. We made our appeal feeling that it would be well received, and we are not disappointed.

What the members of the Freethinker League are asked to undertake is this. They order through their newsagent one or more extra copies of this paper, which are left for display. If they are sold, there is an end of the matter. If they are not sold, the member or members of the League pay for the copies ordered. In the latter case they lose two or three coppers per week. If they are sold, they lose nothing, and have probably gained one or more new subscribers. Some members of the League are undertaking to secure new readers among their friends and acquaintances. This is not by any means so difficult a task as may be imagined. There are thousands who are only waiting for an introduction to the Freethinker to become regular readers. We have secured a large number of readers by this method, and we are quite certain we shall get more by the same plan.

Where neither of these plans can be adopted, send us on the names and addresses of likely subscribers, and we will send free specimen copies direct for six weeks.

But we want a register of the names of this band of voluntary workers, and we want them as quickly as possible. We may then be able to suggest other ways in which help may be given with no other expenditure than a little trouble. We want a representative of this paper in every town and city in Britain. We are out for a big circulation, and we mean to get it.

One other matter. We have not only to sell the paper, we have to buy paper in order to sell. And that is growing more and more difficult. Paper, when it can be bought, is now nine or ten times the pre-War price. And it is getting scarcer and dearer week by week. The only way to make sure of paper now is to supply the mills with materials for making it. So, in addition to our ordinary work, we have now to act as a waste-paper merchant. And that is where we are quite dependent upon our readers.

We want all our readers to save all their papers and magazines. Save them until they can be dispatched in about 56 lb. parcels. We will send on labels on receipt of a card, and will pay full price for all sent. But we must have the waste paper, and we need as much as we can get to keep going. Paper we must have, and our only source of supply lies with our readers. We feel quite confident that we shall be able to secure an adequate supply of the raw material with their help. They have stood by us loyally and well during these four year's of War. We are confident we shall have their warm support to the end.

When peace does arrive we shall be able to smile at all the shifts we have made to keep the old ship afloat. At present the work is grim and earnest. But the reward is well worth the striving after.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Let us never forget that an act of goodness is of itself always an act of happiness. It is the flower of a long inner life of joy and contentment; it tells of peaceful hours and days on the sunniest heights of our soul. No reward coming after the event can compare with the sweet reward that went with it.—Maeterlinck.

To Correspondents.

L. ARMSTRONG.—Why not ask your friend to define what he means by a "Christian hospital"? We have never come across one. We know of hospitals to the maintenance of which Christians—and non-Christians—contribute, but the treatment is non-Christian, even non-theistic. And that is the decisive test.

W. J.—Too late for last week's issue. (1) Is there any reason why you should answer every impertinent question that a Christian cares to put to you? We are doing our own work in our own way. (2) Mr. Cohen does not issue challenges to anyone. He is not a prize-fighter. He has never had, and has not, an objection to meeting in debate any reputable Christian representative. But he does not issue "challenges."

A. PARTON.—Your help is of a very practical kind. It is good news that you made such a success of your canvass for new readers. We are sending on to all the addresses enclosed. Many thanks.

GREEVZ FYSHER.—Paper being sent.

D. D. B.—Your cheque for two guineas received. Thanks.

A. M.—Shall appear as early as possible. But we have a pile of unpublished articles that dumbly reproach us as we write.

J. CORNWALL.—We are glad to know that your newsagent has increased his sale from six to ten copies during the past month. Keep pegging away.

E. K.—Pamphlets sent, and name entered. See our "Special" in this issue. You can distribute where you please.

K. KNIGHTON.—Winwood Read's Veil of Isis is out of print, and can only be obtained as a second-hand copy.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges: R. B. Harrison, 5s.

N. S. S. GENERAL FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges: "G. W. R.," 2s.

C. MURRAY.—There is no doubt as to Shelley's rejection of all religion. Here are his own words: "My rejection of revealed (religion) proceeds from my perfect conviction of its insufficiency to the happiness of man—to this source I can trace murder, war, intolerance. My rejection of Natural (religion) arises wholly from reason. I once was an enthusiastic Deist, but never a Christian."

H. SPENCE.—Next week. Much obliged.

T. O'NEILL.—Will find room in our next issue. Our regards to your son in his affliction.

AJAX.—We are obliged for what you are doing to introduce the Freethinker to new readers.

JOHN'S GRANDPA (Bognor).—We are looking into the matter, and will write you further. Your newsagent should have little trouble in disposing of the extra copies.

T. DENNIS.—It is quite interesting for Mr. Cohen to learn, on the authority of a Christian Evidence lecturer, that he had not been in Sheffield five minutes before he wanted to go to a public-house. Those who know Mr. Cohen best will appreciate the story.

Sugar Plums.

After June 24, by the order of the Paper Controller, it is not allowable to send out papers on sale or return. We hope that all our readers will bear this in mind, and will see that an order for the Freethinker is placed with their local newsagents.

The Exeter reader who paid for the distribution of 2,000 copies of Mr. Cohen's "Pioneer Leaflets" will be pleased to learn that applications for considerably more than that number have been received. We have, however, supplied every applicant with a parcel. We hope their distribution will do good.

We were pleased to note a discussion in the columns of the Leeds Mercury on "Science and Christianity." In the issue before us there are two good letters from Mr. J. M. Blakey, and "Atheist Incognito." Such correspondence is certain to do good, and quite apart from its bringing new ideas before many Christians, it helps to break down the press boycott, which is still fairly well maintained.

Mr. D. Keir writes that he was successful in getting a resolution in favour of Secular Education—on the lines suggested by us—passed by the Paisley Trades and Labour Council. The resolution was sent to Mr. Fisher, the local M.P., and others. We again venture to suggest to advanced Societies of all kinds that they should lose no time in seeing that a similar resolution is passed.

One of our soldier readers, Mr. E. Starling, writes:—

> There is a big scope for work in the Army, and many have lost what little faith they had in the Christian religion and he power of prayer. A little timely talk, and the man goes away thinking; he gets interested with the views expressed regarding Freethought. A leaflet or two, and he comes back for more for his pals. They start discussing the question. My copy of the Freethinker is eagerly sought for, and some "book it" beforehand, so that their turn comes early to have it.

This is one of many letters of a similar kind received. We may pride ourselves on having taken long views in connection with the War and Freethought, and we are certain that our systematic distribution of literature among the soldiers will have a growing influence for good.

MIRACLES.

We do not say that a miracle is impossible, we say only that no miracle has ever yet been proved. Let a worker of miracles come forward to-morrow with pretensions serious enough to deserve examination. Let us suppose him to announce that he is able to raise a dead man to life. What would be done? A committee would be appointed, composed of physiologists, physicians, chemists, and persons accustomed to exact investigation; a body would then be selected which the committee would assure itself was really dead; and a place would be chosen where the experiment was to take place. Every precaution would be taken to leave no opening for uncertainty; and if, under these conditions, the restoration to life was effected, a probability would be arrived at which would be almost equal to certainty. An experiment, however, should always admit of being repeated. What a man has done once he should be able to do again, and in miracles there can be no question of ease or difficulty. The performer would be requested to repeat the operation under other circumstances upon other bodies; and if he succeeded on every occasion, two points would be established: first, that there may be in this world such things as supernatural operations; and, secondly, that the power to perform them is delegated to, or belongs to, particular persons.—But who does not perceive that no miracle was ever performed under such conditions as these?—Renan.

The Story of the Tea Plant.

THAT divine drink, our tea, is threatened by the rationer's vigorous hand. If the contemplated restrictions are imposed, each of us will have to be content with a niggardly two ounces per week of a commodity that was until recently within the reach of all. Our sufferings from the sugar shortage, the beer scarcity, the naked and unashamed appearance of Government ale, the deterioration of coffee, the inferior quality of the wine, the enormous increase in the price of cocoa, and the liberally watered condition of all distilled liquors, were largely alleviated by an unlimited supply of Indian tea, while, until recently, that delicate beverage, China tea, was still available for the more fastidious palate. Yet, amid all the vanished and departing glories of more opulent days, we may still dwell in memory on the good old times before the World-War, when we could select our favourite liquids from a fine array of excellent beverages, and placidly regard our planetary abode as a fair place of residence for reasonably thirsty men.

In the spacious period of artful Elizabeth, when the creator of that genial rascal, Falstaff, presumably himself partook of the sugar and the sack so pleasant to the taste of the portly preceptor of Prince Hal, then, the cups that cheer but not inebriate were rare, if not entirely unknown, in England.

Tea appears to have been introduced into our island in 1610, six years only before Shakespeare's death. Its price at that period was prohibitive to all but the very rich, who were prepared to pay ten guineas a pound for the luxury. According to one authority, the East India Company imported tea into England as early as 1571, but the first important consignment of that commodity arrived in London in 1657. A little later, during the Restoration, the consumption of tea was confined to a favoured few. At that time Thomas Garway opened premises in London City, near the Royal Exchange, for the sale of the prepared drink. Tea was an article of domestic consumption in the home of the delightful Pepys in 1667. "Home," writes that prince of diarists, "and there find my wife making of tea, a drink which Mr. Pelling, the potticary, tells her is good for her cold and defluxions."

Tea-drinking became fashionable in the reign of Charles II. Catherine, the Portuguese consort of the Merry Monarch, was accustomed to the beverage in her native land, and the Queen's example was eagerly followed by the leaders of fashion. The Court poet, Waller, celebrated the virtues of the heavenly herb, and his tribute to tea is one of the earliest in English literature.

In 1740, the choicest teas were sold at twenty-four shillings a pound, while the cheapest was Bohea at seven shillings. The tea-gardens in London and its suburbs were numerous, and both prosperous and popular. Next in importance to Garway's, or as it was called "Garraway's Coffee House," was Twining's, in the Strand. This renowned resort was situated between the Strand and Devereux Court. Twining's Bank was slowly evolved out of the old tea house after this had been carried on for over a century by succeeding generations of the Twining family. The tea house was opened in the reign of Anne, while the Bank which emerged from it is stated by Walford to date as a separate institution "from the commercial panic of 1825."

According to one Chinese tradition, the tea shrub was made known to the Celestial peoples by an Indian ascetic, but this story is doubtful. It is certain that tea was enjoyed as a beverage in the sixth century A.D., while it was in almost universal use in China by the eighth century of our era. To the Chinese the Japanese seem indebted for their acquaintance with tea. "It is somewhat curious," writes Mr. McEwan,— > that although many of the products of China were known and used in Europe at much earlier times, no reference to tea has yet been traced in European literature prior to 1588. No mention is made of it by Marco Polo, and no knowledge of the substance appears to have reached Europe till after the establishment of intercourse between China and Portugal in 1517. The Portuguese, however, did little towards the introduction of it into Europe, and it was not until the Dutch established themselves at Bantam early in the seventeenth century that these adventurers learnt from the Chinese the habit of tea drinking and brought it into Europe.

Only as a cultivated shrub is the tea plant found in China. In truth, the plant is nowhere known in a wild state save in the forests of Assam. This wild variety is a shrub of vigorous growth which rises to a height of about 40 feet. The cultivated variety of China is a smaller growth which rarely exceeds a height of 15 feet. It was long supposed that black and green tea were the products of distinct plants. Fortune, however, proved that both these teas are yielded by the same plant, their differences being obtained by different processes of production.

The constantly increasing demand for tea in the United Kingdom, coupled with the inferior quality of the commodity imported from China, upon which country we were entirely dependent for our supplies, induced the Bengal Government in 1834 to appoint a committee charged with the duty of elaborating a scheme for the introduction and cultivation of the tea plant in India. As a result of their inquiries, the authorities decided to plant tea estates in the Upper Assam region. "In 1840," Arthur Reade informs us in his Tea and Tea Drinking, "the 'Assam Company' was formed, and it is claimed for them that they possess the largest tea plantation in the world." Since that date the progress of tea culture in India has been great, and probably the Peninsular of the Orient will ultimately provide us with the vast bulk of our imports.

Indifferently made tea is a prolific source of dyspepsia. The dreadful decoction served up in metal tea-pots in most of our restaurants until recently was enough to make an alligator miserable. To-day, in London, and other leading centres, tea of fair quality is provided at a reasonable charge in innumerable tea-rooms. The metal tea-pot has been superseded by well-made stone tea-pots, and the horrible liquid carefully boiled with the tea leaves to provide a high colour and rank flavour, has almost disappeared.

To secure an ideal cup of refreshing tea the water should be boiled in a kettle kept scrupulously clean. The earthenware tea-pot should be warm and dry when the boiling water is poured into the vessel. Five minutes is ample for the infusion of the herb, and then the liquid should be poured into the cup. When the tea is permitted to stew the tannin is extracted, and then the beverage is little better than poison.

Dr. Edward Smith was an eminent authority on tea, and he assures us that—> the aim should be to extract all the aroma and dried juices containing theine, with only so much of the substance of the leaf as may give fulness, or, as it is called, body, to the infusion.

> The kind of water is believed to have great influence over the process; soft water is preferred. The Chinese direction is, 'Take it from a running stream; that from mill springs is the best, river water is the next, and well-water is the worst'; that is to say, take water well mixed with air. Hence avoid hard water, but prefer tap-water or running water to well water.

Many Western visitors while in Russia have learnt to appreciate the Russian fashion of preparing tea. The beverage is served up with a slice of lemon slightly sprinkled with sugar candy, to which no cream or milk are added. In England and elsewhere the use of tea is occasionally condemned. But as Florence Nightingale once wrote:—

> A great deal too much against tea is said by wise people, and a great deal too much of it is given to the sick by foolish people. When you see the natural and almost universal craving in English sick for their tea, you cannot but feel that Nature knows what she is about. But a little tea or coffee restores them quite as much as a great deal;.....yet a nurse, because she sees how one or two cups of tea or coffee restore her patient, thinks three or four cups will do twice as much. This is not the case at all: it is, however, certain that there is nothing yet discovered which is a substitute to the English patient for his cup of tea.

(To be continued.) T. F. PALMER.

"The World Needs Us!"

So says a clergyman in the Scotsman newspaper of May 22. A small "w" for "world," Master Printer, and a big "U" for "Us"—the great "We Are"—if you please!

The conceit of those who imagine that they are indispensable almost passes belief. Great vanity and little wit are always to be found in association. And the small mind seldom has the saving grace of a sense of humour. The heavy solemnity of the supernaturalists is enough to make the angels weep.

At the moment there are urgent calls for Church union. The Scotch Press assures us this is the only topic of supreme importance. But how to herd the voluntaries and the grandsons of voluntaries into the fold of the Establishment without losing some sheep—ah, there's the rub! Or one of the rubs. It is easy to get enthusiastic about union, particularly when the precarious conditions of the present make combination at all costs so eminently desirable—so highly expedient! But is it wise to ignore the formidable difficulties? Can the inheritor of Auld Kirk traditions get the combination of "Crown and Covenant" out of his blood and bones? Can the descendants of the men who came out of the Establishment, and who would not look the side of the road the Erastian was on, wholly forget the past? It is not in Nature to suppose it. We have not yet observed that the Auld Kirk has evinced any burning desire to sacrifice her State connection. She may be open to consider some modification of the form of the bond by which she is united to the secular government; she will, in our opinion, never agree to its complete severance. That must be done by secular reformers—Infidels and Atheists. For truth to tell, we begin to perceive that this War has made many Scottish Presbyterians who are outside the pale of the Establishment willing to consider proposals for coming within it. These have no ancestral memories to restrain them; no voice from the past to rebuke them. They have been picked up by the wayside from here, there, and everywhere; they have entered by all sorts of sideways—Salvation Army, Mission Hall, Y.M.C.A., Yankee revival meetings. Scotch Christians who are keen for union are confronted with a curious dilemma. They stand between two alternatives: on the one hand, the Devil of Rationalism; on the other, the Deep Sea of Disestablishment. And the Devil of Rationalism is, you know, a very real difficulty—a perfect deuce of a fellow; though—

> Of course we never mention him
> His name is never heard.

Notwithstanding, he bobs up at the most inconvenient times, and proves himself to be a veritable hair raiser in ecclesiastical circles.

As regards Disestablishment the mot d'ordere is—"Wheesht!" But there are, unhappily, some young Scots whose attitude to the Government religion is so hostile that they would even go the length of smashing their own sect to destroy the Establishment. And where are we all then, oh? These young fellows are bound to the verities of their fathers' faith by a mere thread. Some of them will, without much trouble, in the near future prefer a rationalistic humanism to State-endowed ecclesiasticism; just as there are others who so dread and detest the advance of Freethought that they would rather be Greek or Roman Catholics than Freethinkers.

It is incumbent upon all lovers of freedom to watch this situation with vigilance. But we also think they are justified in contemplating it with equanimity, courage, and hope. It portends the disappearance of the primitive mind.

ST. GEORGE OF ENGLAND.

SIR,—I feel that I owe some apology for the delay in availing myself of your courtesy to offer your readers a brief account of England's Soldier Saint, but ill-health and overwork are, I hope, valid excuses. I will not elaborate or say all that could, and perhaps should, be said concerning one who, apart from religion, compels admiration and respect for his manly courage and steadfast devotion to principles, even unto death. "Who was St. George?" has long been the theme of endless, not to say acrimonous, controversy and discussion.

Time, the great destroyer of truth as of fiction, has left us but little beyond the bare facts, and that little, unfortunately, has been overlaid and obscured by monkish and other fairy tales more easily rejected than accepted. But such stories surely were based upon facts, and had some figure around which to cling, just as the parasitic ivy attests the existence of the tower it conceals from view. Professor Owen, the eminent ornithologist, was able, from a single bone, to reconstruct the bird of which it originally formed a part; and from what is actually known of St. George, we are enabled to conjecture what manner of man he was, and how eventually he became the special Patron of Chivalry and the titulary Saint of England, whose exemplary life and virtues were worthy of all emulation and have exerted, and will continue to exert, a widespread and inspiring influence over our countrymen.

The identity of St. George, the special Patron of Chivalry, has been clearly established. Briefly, he was of Greek origin and Christian parentage, and born at Lydda in Palestine, in the beautiful vale of Sharon (famous for its roses), on April 23, A.D. 270. He held high military command under the Roman Emperor Diocletian, during whose reign he died a Christian martyr at Nicomedia, in Asia Minor, on the anniversary of his birth (Good Friday), A.D. 303, and was buried at the place of his birth. Although the memory of St. George was highly revered by the valorous King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table—in Saxon times—and our chivalrous crusading King Richard I., it was King Edward III., of glorious memory, who first proclaimed him "Patron of the right noble Roialme of England," founding in his honour, in 1347, the Noble Order of the Garter—the Blue Ribbon of Chivalry.

It is surmized that St. George was sent on a mission to Britain, where, at that time, Constantius, the joint Emperor, with Diocletian, held his Court at his capital city of York (Eboracum). Courtantius had married Helena, a British princess, born at Colchester, and the borough seal (over 500 years old) bears the inscription: "Colchester is the birthplace of Helena, whom the Cross makes glorious." Not without reason, it is surmised, that St. George converted to Christianity, Helena, who, in turn, caused her son Constantine—born at York—to embrace that faith. He, as Constantine the Great, founded Constantinople, and became the first Christian Emperor of Rome, an Englishman, or, shall we say a southern Briton?

As, already stated, St. George was martyred at Nicomedia, in Asia Minor, whence, after some years, his body was brought to Lydda, his place of birth, and interred with great pomp and ceremony. Now, if we look at the map of Asia Minor, so familiarized by this dreadful War, we can easily follow the course of the vessel bearing the remains of St. George.

Starting from Nicomedia, at the eastern extremity of what is now the Sea of Marmora, the vessel would sail through the Dardanelles, afterwards known as St. George's Arm, and calling at Thessalonica, where a church was dedicated to St. George, it would sail along the Ægean Sea, past the south-eastern point of Thessaly, know to this day as St. George's Cape, thence by the Isle of Scyros, where is situated the town of St. George, skirting the southern shore of St. George's Bay, to the beautiful city of Beirut, whose inhabitants were, and still are, mostly Christians, and where, and in the district, many churches were built in honour of our Saint. Arriving at Joppa, there are but nine miles inland to Lydda, in the vale of Sharon, where, in one of the most beautiful spots in all Palestine, repose the remains of the Patron Saint of England. Sharon, as recorded in Holy Writ, was celebrated for its roses, and may we not from this fact reasonably infer that the rose—the lovely Queen of Flowers—thus so happily associated with our Patron Saint—became, as it will ever remain, the national emblem of England!

This is the story of St. George. Should the evidence adduced be deemed inconclusive, it follows that much of ancient history must be regarded as unintelligible and fabulous. Gibbon, the great historian of the Roman Empire, unaccountably confused St. George with George, the fraudulent army contractor, who, by devious ways, ultimately became the Arian Archbishop of Alexandria, where his infamous conduct caused him to be slain by his own people, A.D. 362, nearly sixty years after the death of our patron.

Those who have adopted the careless and sneering assertions of Gibbon have, I fancy, done so because they found in him a writer whose position and general accuracy were unchallenged, and whose opinions upon so vexed a subject coincided with their own churlish desire to belittle, with apathetic indifference, or jealous and splenetic envy, the titulary soldier Saint of England.

RELIGION IN THE ARMY.

SIR,—Your correspondent of June 2 appears to have had very little experience during his service, and I would suggest, if I may, that, having spent three and a half years in the Army, in varied circumstances, that his statements are hardly correct descriptions of the thoughts of the majority of men in khaki. If they are not indifferent, they must either believe in Christianity or fail to do so. It would greatly help others, perhaps, if they decided to—in the event of their thinking in the latter way—refrain from classing themselves as Church of England men, stating that they were Atheists. Apparently, they have not the courage of their convictions. During the past three years I have had an opportunity of seeing for myself a few things, and I should like you to read them once again, for I am sure that I am not the only one who has written you in this strain. I was sent, while at a General Hospital in France, to receive treatment at a Convalescent Depot, where I found that a service was held each evening in three places—usually open for concerts at other places—where we had a very large congregation, always far exceeding the quarter spoken of. During my stay here, I have had the opportunity of going voluntarily to a service held in the town, roughly a mile from camp, on each Sunday evening, and this place has been full to overflowing. Does this prove the value that the men place on the Freethinker and its contemporaries?—for I might add that there are within easy reach a large number of places of entertainment. As for a number of N.C.O.'s making fun of a parade, I can attribute that alone to ignorance, and feel positive that you will agree with me in this. Although I have only looked at your paper, I found a reference in the last one re Mr. Smallwood's remark "that the churches after four years of war are empty." The last illustration I gave is quite a good enough example for most people that men in his position say a good many things they know nothing of.

E. COMLEY.

[Judging from our correspondence, we should say that Mr. Comley's experience is unique. Many clergymen have borne testimony in quite the opposite direction.—ED.]

WHY don't Gawd give the world a 'Oliday,
Wiv Swings, an' Roundabouts, an' 'Appenny Shies?
But 'ee don't seem ter mind some'ow ter day;
'Ee sits up lazy somewheres in the skies.

I see a picture larst week in a shop;
There wasn't arf a battle goin' on!
Big guns—an' gas, an' sojjers fit ter drop.
An' Jesus in the sky sed "Carry On."

A lidy ses ter me, "My little man—
Your Poppa's in a place like that you know;
And Jesus tries to help him all He can.
So if your Poppa dies to Heaven he 'll go."

An' then I see some 'osses lying dead,
Wiv legs up in the air orl stiff an' straight.
A sojjer sed they'd copped a dose of lead,
They won't pull no more bloomin' waggins, mate!

An' Jesus in the sky sed "Carry On,"
"I am the Way, the Truth, the Light," 'ee sed.
An' that ole lidy ses ter me, "My son:
As Gawd knows every drop of blood wots shed,

Gawd knows abaht each pore 'oss wots done in,
An' 'e remembers every sojjer's face.
An' Gawd," she ses, "fergives us every sin,
Because," she ses, "'ee made this bloomin' place."

THE CHRISTIAN BLIGHT.

The "mighty Julius," the first Cæsar, the greatest of earth's rulers, who swayed the destinies of the civilized world before Christ was born, was far above the superstitions of his age—above the superstiton of all ages. Could he "revisit the glimpses of the moon," and behold a great English statesman [Gladstone] gravely discussing a story of devils being turned out of men and sent into swine, he would wonder what blight had fallen upon the human intellect in two thousand years: And were he to learn that such stories are contained in a book which is regarded as divine, which is placed as such in the hands of our children, which is paraded in all our courts of justice, and is deemed the very basis and security of our civilization, he would be at no loss to understand why the greatest rulers and statesmen of modern Europe look small and effeminate beside the best emperors of pagan Rome.—G. W. Foote, "The Grand Old Book."

Science is the real redeemer. It will put honesty above hypocrisy; mental veracity above all belief. It will teach the religion of usefulness. It will destroy bigotry in all its forms. It will put thoughtful doubt above thoughtless faith. It will give us philosophers, thinkers, and savants, instead of priests, theologians, and saints. It will abolish poverty and crime, and greater, grander, nobler than all else, it will make the whole world free.—Ingersoll.

Obituary.

On June 8, after a long and painful illness, Robert Taylor, an old member of the Birmingham Branch, passed away. When in good health he worked energetically in the cause, and, at one time, was President of the Birmingham Branch. About two years ago his health broke through heart failure, and since then he was untiringly attended by his wife through a very trying period. Due respect was paid to his wishes, which were that he be cremated and a Secular Service be used on the occasion. Both were carried out at the crematorium, Perry Barr, on June 14.—J. P.

Religion and Cleanliness.

Arising out of a police court case in the North of England, the Vicar of Burton Wood, Lancashire, writes to the Yorkshire Evening Post that "religion and dirt are strange bedfellows," a statement somewhat discounted by the Vicar's admission that two of the most godly women among his own personal acquaintances were among the unwashed. These ladies, it appears, strictly confined their washing to hands and face; no other part of the body received attention. Probably the number of the unwashed is much greater than many people imagine—certainly so far as the unseen portion of the body is concerned. Anyway, the Vicar of Burton Wood is clearly wrong in declaring religion and dirt to be strange bedfellows. They are not. Historically, so far as Christianity is concerned, the relation is of the closest. To-day, cleanliness has become a religion—to use a cant expression. But time was when the lack of it was one of the accepted marks of godliness.

The Order of the Bath.

Everyone who knows anything of the life of the old Roman Empire knows what a prominent part baths held therein. They were numerous, they were for all classes, and all classes used them. Even in their ruins the baths of Rome appeal to the imagination, and enable one to form some idea of their extent. The baths of Caracalla are said to have contained over 1,600 seats, those of Diocletian over 3,000. Nor were these baths confined to a class. They were open to the whole of the population, and Gibbon tells us that the meanest Roman could purchase a bath at the cost of about half a farthing of our money. Wherever the Romans went, they took their baths; and their ruins meet us in various parts of this country. To-day we know the old Roman bath as the Turkish bath, and the changed name is illuminating. The use of the bath died out with the Christianizing of the Empire. It flourished elsewhere; it was unknown among Christians. For seven hundred years Christian Europe was without a public bath; the first public one in England was opened in Liverpool less than a century ago. The public bath reappeared in Europe when the Crusades and later Mohammedan influences brought the Christian world into touch with a saner and cleaner civilization. And Christendom, which had inherited the old Roman civilization, straightway convicted itself by calling it the Turkish bath. Christians had forsaken its use and forgotten its origin. Christianity and dirt are not strange bedfellows; historically, they are the closest of room-mates.

Piety and Dirt.

Two causes are responsible for this alliance of Christianity and dirt. The first was the intense hatred of everything Pagan—science, art, literature, sanitation. The second was the division of life into spiritual and material, helped by the conviction of the approaching end of the world. To shun the world and all it offered became the sign of spiritual rebirth. Pleasure and sin became synonymous terms. Asceticism, imported into Rome from the East, gained ground as the mass of superstitions grew that were afterwards consolidated as Christianity. The figure of the monk and the ascetic dominated the stage; and to approach as near the beast as possible became the pious method of showing oneself superior to ordinary human nature. We read of whole communities, 20,000 and 30,000 strong given up to ascetic practices. And the behaviour of these almost passes comprehension. St. Jerome says that he knew of one man who lived on a piece of bread and a drop of water per day, another who only cut his hair once a year, who never washed himself, and whose skin grew like pumice-stone. Some carried heavy weights or sat in constrained and unnatural positions after the manner of Indian Fakirs. Others threw off all clothing and ran about like wild beasts. In Syria one sect ate grass like cattle. St. Anthony, the founder of monasticism, never washed his feet. St. Abraham went one better and never washed at all. St. Euphraxia belonged to a convent of nuns who never washed. St. Simon Stylites lived in such a state of filth that even his adoring visitors often found the "odour of sanctity" too much for them. He is said to have lived for thirty years on the top of a column, his body covered with ulcers, and swarming with vermin. And on his death his funeral was attended by some of the greatest dignitaries in Christendom. Bathing among nearly all the monastic orders was forbidden, or only allowed under stringent regulations. Lecky sums up the period in the comment, "A hideous, sordid, and emaciated maniac, without knowledge, without natural affection, without patriotism, passing his life in a long routine of useless and atrocious self-torture, and quailing before the phantoms of his own delirious brain, had become the ideal of the nations which had known the writings of Plato and Cicero, and the lives of Socrates and Cato." It is said that Augustus found Rome brick and left it marble. Christians took all that Roman civilization had acquired, and buried it beneath superstition, filth, ignorance, and disease.

Christian Civilization.

Neglect of cleanliness was not confined to professed monks. It was common to all—more or less. Some of the highest dignitaries of the State were often found in a filthy condition. As an example, one may cite the case of Thomas Becket who, after his murder in Canterbury Cathedral, was found to be wearing a hair shirt that was swarming with vermin. The following is a picture of Christian cities at the close of the sixteenth century as drawn by Draper :—

> In Paris and London the houses were of wood daubed with clay, and thatched with straw. The luxury of a carpet was unknown; some straw, scattered in the room, supplied its place. There were no chimneys; the smoke from the ill-fed, cheerless fire escaped through a hole in the roof. No attempt was made at drainage, but the putrefying garbage and rubbish was simply thrown out of the door. Men, women, children, slept in the same apartment; not unfrequently domestic animals were their companions; in such a confusion of the family it was impossible that modesty and morality could be maintained.....Personal cleanliness was utterly unknown.....To conceal personal impurity, perfumes were necessarily and profusely used. The citizen clothed himself in leather, a garment which, with its ever-increasing impurity, might last for years.....The streets had no sewers; they were without pavements or lamps. After nightfall the chamber shutters were thrown open, and slops unceremoniously emptied down, to the discomfiture of the wayfarer, tracking his path through the narrow streets, with his dismal lantern in his hand.

It is not surprising that plagues and epidemic diseases were such regular and deadly visitors during the Christian ages of European history. And when disease came the Church found in its presence, not proof of the need for sanitation and greater cleanliness, but evidence of the anger of God upon an impious people.

God or Man?

The alliance between religion and dirt is not, therefore, a revelation to anyone who bears in mind the nature of the Christian record. It has been frequently manifested, and was a consequence of the ascetic preaching of Christianity combined with opposition to sanitary and medical science. The Christian Church inoculated mankind with a mental disease of unexampled virulence; and at the same time it robbed nations of their greatest protection against physical disease. Even the methods of protection adopted by the Church only served to intensify the evil. The massing of people in religious pilgrimages, with days of prayer for protection against an epidemic, served but to make contagion more certain. The medicine-chest of the Church held but one ingredient—faith; and that was powerless against disease. The true remedy came when man paid less attention to religious exhortations and more to the conditions that govern the causes and the cure of disease. For Nature yields nothing to prayer, and everything to knowledge. Man on his knees is symbolical of ignorance and helplessness. But man erect and open-eyed is typical of the spirit that writes "finis" to the reign of the gods, and ushers in the era of a liberated humanity.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

NATURAL SOCIETY.

Man in general has always been what he is now. This does not mean that he has always had fine cities, cannon with twenty-four pound balls, comic operas, and nunneries. But he has always had the same instinct of self-love in himself, in the companion of his pleasure, in his children, in his grandchildren, in the work of his hands. That is what never changes from one end of the world to the other. The foundation of society always existing, there has always been some form of society. For we were not made to live like bears.—Voltaire, "Essai sur les Mœurs."

"The Popes and Their Church."

A VOLUME of upwards of six hundred closely printed pages lies before us, bearing the alluring title of Christianity in History: A Study of Religious Development. It has two authors, J. Vernon Bartlet, M.A., D.D., and A. J. Carlyle, M.A., D.Litt., and is published by Macmillan & Co., at the price of 12s. 6d. The task attempted is a vast one, which is to supply a compendium of the history of the Church and of the development of doctrine. In the words of the authors, it is "an attempt to set forth the genesis and growth of certain of the more typical forms and phases which Christianity—whether as conduct, piety, thought, or organized Church life—has assumed under the conditioning influences first of the Roman Empire and then of the Western civilization that was its successor and heir." Naturally, the work is divided into five parts, entitled "The Beginnings," "Ancient Christianity," "The Middle Ages," "The Great Transition," and "The Modern Period." The impression which a careful perusal of it leaves upon the mind is twofold; first, that Christianity, though in its essence a Divinely revealed religion, "appears in history as the child of Judaism, claiming to be the perfected religion of Israel," and, second, that, starting as a child, its history has been one of growth and development. Besides, though "the essence of Christianity is Christ, and its method the influence of personality upon personality," yet it won its supremacy in the West through long-continued and more or less brutal conflict with three great rivals, all the most characteristic elements in which it unblushingly appropriated and assimilated to itself. This is candidly admitted by the authors, who treat it throughout as if it were merely a human system strenuously and not over-scrupulously struggling for sole dominion over the minds and consciences of men. In many respects, Christianity in History is a work which Freethinkers will appreciate and enjoy, because, while reverent, careful, and scholarly, it is also pre-eminently rationalistic. Indeed, it could not be more rationalistic without being positively sceptical, and even hostile to the Christian Faith.

Our object in calling attention to Christianity in History is to point out that, although presenting a generally accurate and rationalistic portrayal of the Christian religion's growth and development in the different periods of its history, it yet wholly misleads the reader as to its influence upon individual and social life. For example, the Christian Church is spoken of as zealously promoting the intellectual education of the Western world. We are assured that "Christian ecclesiastics and monks never wholly lost the tradition of the education of the ancient world"; and we would naturally infer that, on the whole, the Church was a centre in which righteousness and truth, purity and love, shone most brilliantly, irradiating the outside world with their healing and warmth-giving beams. But every honest student of ecclesiastical history is fully aware how absolutely false such an inference would be. We are, therefore, delighted to be able to refer our readers to another book recently published by Messrs. Watts & Co., namely, The Popes and their Church, by Mr. Joseph McCabe. This is, perhaps, the most effective work Mr. McCabe has yet given us. His knowledge of Roman history in general, and of the Catholic Church in particular, is of the most intimate character. Of the latter he writes from actual experience, as well as with accurate knowledge, and of necessity his testimony deserves the most serious consideration. Now, nothing can be more certain than the fact that the Church has always been the sworn enemy of education, in the ordinary sense of the word. Next to Leo I., the greatest of the ancient Popes was Gregory the Great, who occupied St. Peter's Chair from A.D. 590-604. Of him Mr. McCabe says :—

> His ignorance and credulity were unlimited. His largest works, The Magna Moralia and The Dialogues, are incredible hotch-potches of stories about devils and miracles. He sternly rebuked bishops who tried to educate their people; and he did not perceive that the appalling vices and crimes which he deplores almost in every letter—the general drunkenness and simony and immorality of the priests, and the horrible prevalence of violence—were mainly due to ignorance. He was one of the Makers of the Middle Ages (The Popes and their Church, pp. 27, 28).

Gregory hated culture with his whole heart, and in his zeal against it is reported to have destroyed libraries and monuments not a few. The authors of Christianity in History curiously admit that "an immense amount of the ancient learning and the ancient intellectual discipline was lost," and that "the intellectual methods and conceptions which the Christian Church handed on to the mediæval world, were in many important respects, far below the level of the higher intellectual civilization of the ancient world"; but, whilst making that damaging admission, they glory in the alleged fact that the Church "became the guide and educator of the civilization of the Western world." On their own showing, however, the guidance and education which she provided were of a woefully imperfect and lowering type.

Mr. McCabe traces the history of the Roman Church from the fourth century down to the present day, and the perusal of the horrible record brings the blush of shame and contempt to the reader's cheek. That there were a few comparatively good Popes is unquestionable; but, taking them all in all, the claim that they were the vicars of the loving Christ and filled with the Holy Ghost is too ludicrous for words. We are told in Christianity in History (p. 351) that "the Christian Church was born into a world which was very highly civilized—a world whose civilization is, indeed, comparable only with that of quite modern times," and that she handed that civilization down to the Middle Ages; but the truth is that she despised Pagan civilization and practically destroyed it; or, as Mr. McCabe puts it, that in proportion as the Popes thrived Europe decayed. What even the best Popes aimed at was the triumph of the Papacy, not the reformation of the world. Take Pope John XII. who ascended the Papal throne in 955, of whom Mr. McCabe says :—

> There was not a crime in the penitentials that John XII. did not introduce into the "sacred palace." The palace of Caligula or of Nero in ancient Rome had not witnessed more wanton scenes than the Lateran Palace now exhibited. Liutprand tells us (De Rebus Gestis Othonis, IV.) how John, pressed by a rival, appealed to the Emperor Otto, and when Otto came to Rome the Romans brought up against their spiritual father a list of crimes which would, they said, "make a comedian blush for shame"; and a comedian was the lowest thing they knew. The Romans were lenient, but they could not tolerate a Pope who committed murder, perjury, adultery, incest (with his two sisters), and sacrilege. Before the Synod convoked by Otto it was proved that John had "turned the Lateran Palace into a brothel," cut out the eyes of or castrated those who criticized him, raped girls and women who came to pray in St. Peter's, gambled, cursed, drunk to the Devil.....There was, in brief, nothing that he had not done (pp. 45, 46).

Unfortunately that is by no means the worst Papal record, that concerning Alexander VI. at the close of the fifteenth century and the beginning of the sixteenth being odious beyond compare, of whom we read that one evening he and his daughter, Lucrezia, dined with Cardinal Cesare "and fifty prostitutes in Cesare's rooms in the Vatican," and that after the banquet "the women danced unclothed." Alexander was also guilty of duplicity in war and diplomacy, and, according to some, of a murder for £150,000. Even prior to the thirteenth century, "the Holy See had rarely had an illustrious man in it during eleven centuries. It was stained black with blood, and vice, and corruption. Europe, at the mercy of the Popes, was sordid, filthy, fearfully cruel and violent, crassly ignorant, utterly primitive in the administration of justice, indescribably lax in sex matters."

Mr. McCabe's book is accurately described as "one of the most deadly indictments yet written of the Church of Rome"; and no reader of Christianity in History can over-estimate the need of such a merciless exposure. We can heartily recommend it to all who are eager to obtain facts wherewith to disprove the silly dogma of the divinity and infallibility of the Christian Church.

J. T. LLOYD.

Henry Stephens Salt.

> When the sword glitters o'er the judge's head,
> And fear has coward churchmen silenced,
> This is the poet's time; 'tis then he draws,
> And single fights forsaken virtue's cause.
> —Andrew Marvell.

A STORY is told of a modest Frenchman, that when the great Napoleon took him familiarly by the ear, and said, "I intend giving you the Legion of Honour, the man answered: "Thank you, sire, but could not your Majesty give it to my father?" In some such spirit we may picture Mr. H. S. Salt's acceptance of praise. His striking talents and his widespread philanthropy have always been united with a modesty which is, in these days of self-advertising, extremely rare.

The life-work of Mr. Henry Stephens Salt places him definitely among the potent forces of progress. A pioneer among pioneers, he is one of the foremost heralds of a new era. Thinking men and women treasure his volumes, and look with eager eyes for other works from the same wise pen. For he has devoted a long life to the service of his fellows, and his significance in modern literature and thought is very marked.

Born in India in 1851, the life of this great social reformer has its touch of romance. He was educated at Eton College—he became one of the house-masters—and also at Cambridge University, although he could never have completely acquiesced in the old order of things, such as was dominant at these seats of learning. For the young master was soon reading Shelley's lyrics of liberty, and was absorbing the intellectual audacities of Henry Thoreau and Walt Whitman. In such company young Mr. Salt was bound to look beyond Eton and her old-fashioned ideals, and to scan far horizons and the unalterable stars.

Such a fine spirit as that of Mr. H. S. Salt's was bound, sooner or later, to rebel at being "cribb'd, cabin'd, and confin'd" within the narrow limits of the educational system of Eton, that "nursery of Toryism," as he himself wittily described it. There was no bitterness, however, in his criticism. Though he ploughed a lonely furrow, he has never been morbid. Taking all things at their true worth, he has never been surprised by views he could not accept. He has merely acknowledged urbanely that they were so different from his own.

So acute a critic as G. W. Foote has said that Mr. Salt is "without the least fanaticism." This is the more remarkable as he challenges contemporary convention at so many points. He conceives human society as a great brotherhood; but the underlying unity is not merely economic, not merely the apotheosis of an enlightened selfishness, but an ethical fraternity, where love and mutual service are to be confidently expected :—

> Till each man find his own in all men's good,
> And all men work in noble brotherhood.

This optimistic faith is not to be limited to one race or species, but extended to the whole world of innocent beings. And herein lies the genesis of the Humanitarian League, with which Mr. Salt's name is inseparably associated. In a letter written in 1910 by G. W. Foote, on the occasion of the Society's twentieth anniversary, the great Freethought leader wrote :—

> I believe the Humanitarian League has been, is, and I trust will continue to be, one of the noblest and most useful organizations in England. No friend of humanity need despair if he will only look at what the League has done for the real higher life of England in the face of tremendous odds and with ridiculously small material resources. Yours is veritably the triumph of a great idea.

The scope of the League's activities may be estimated by recalling that it has dealt with such measures as Criminal Law and Prison Reform, Cruel Sports, Humane Diet and Dress, Education of Children, Flogging in the Services, the Humanizing of the Poor Law, and many other needful reforms. In brief, the distinctive purpose of the League is to consolidate the principle of humaneness, which it considers should be an essential part of any intelligible system of society.

Through all the vicissitudes of life Mr. Salt preserves a serene mind, an unconquerable optimism, and an inexhaustible interest in all things human. A great reformer, his life has been devoted to a ceaseless whirl of activities. Under less strenuous conditions he might have made a great name for himself in literature. His sympathetic studies of Shelley, Richard Jefferies, De Quincey, Thoreau, and James Thomson, prove his devotion to letters. His quiet humour is displayed in his delightful volume of verse, Consolations of a Faddist; whilst his scholarship is apparent in his spirited rendering of The Treasures of Lucretius. In another vein he has emulated George Borrow, and his On Cambrian and Cumbrian Hills is not without a touch of genius.

Meanwhile, society is not yet a brotherhood. It is divided into mutually antagonistic classes. Tyranny, crime, and war prevail, and how to remove them is the question of questions. Not by bloody revolution, thinks Mr. Salt, but rather by peaceful evolution. While it is true that there is no set programme warranted to cure all social ills, there are principles to be followed. Love is the principle that, by its superior, attractive power, will draw to itself the virtue and strength which selfishness has before absorbed. In this way, the greed which produces crime and misery and so many forms of social unrest, will be banished through the power of a new, stronger, and nobler spirit.

The phase of Mr. Salt's activities which will appeal most widely is his dauntless championship of the Humanitarian movement and of the rights of animals. He will always be remembered as the chivalrous knight-errant ever seeking out forlorn, oppressed, or distressed causes and objects, in whose behalf to break a lance, on whom to lavish his passion of pity, aad satisfy his yearning for service. Mr. Salt's career is a discourse on the indispensability of reformers, who, more even than the poets, are "the unacknowledged legislators of mankind."

A Search for the Soul.

III.

ONE of the few British scientists of the present day who are believers in the immortality of the soul is the great physicist, Sir Oliver Lodge. In his book, entitled Man and the Universe, that eminent member of the scientific profession tells us many things which are in complete harmony with science; but he also tells us things that are not admitted as facts by the great majority of scientists, as may be perceived by the following extracts :—

> What is it that combines and arranges the particles of matter so that if absorbed by root or leaves they correspond to and form the tissue of an oak, if picked by talons they help to feed the muscles of an eagle, if cooked for dinner, they enter into the nerves and brain of a man? What is the controlling entity in each case, which causes each to have its own form and not another, and preserves the form constant amid the wildest diversity of particles? We call it life, we call it soul, we call it by various names.....The soul is that controlling and guiding principle which is responsible for our personal expression and for the construction of the body, under the restrictions of physical condition and ancestry. In its higher development it includes also feeling and intelligence and will, and is the storehouse of mental experience.....Life is not matter, nor is it energy, it is a guiding and directing principle; and when considered as incorporated in a certain organism, it, and all that appertains to it, may well be called the soul or constructive and controlling element in that organism (pp. 78, 79).

Looking at the foregoing statements, we see that "soul" includes the "life" of the human organism, as well as "feeling and intelligence and will" and other mental attributes. And, what is even more surprising, all human beings, animals, and plants are each possessed of a soul, whose office it is to guide and control the formation of the body, to regulate its growth, and cause it to assume the height, girth, and form of its ancestral type.

But what is this "life" or "soul," which is said to guide and control the formation, growth, and development of the human organism? Sir Oliver says: "We call it life, we call it soul, we call it by various names." But the only thing which performs all he has described he never once names. This is "heredity." Yet it is the mysterious action and influence of this form of matter, protoplasm, that Sir Oliver calls "life" or "soul," and this "principle," he tells us, when united to the mental faculties, will survive the death of the body and live for ever.

Now, since it appears to be the action connected with heredity, which Sir Oliver Lodge calls the soul, we will look at the matter in the concrete. Commencing, then, by fecundation, in which the sexual cells of both parents meet and coalesce, we find in this union the formation of a new cell, the impregnated egg-cell or "stem-cell," from which each individal life begins. This stem-cell soon afterwards divides into two, and when each half-cell has developed, each of these again divides into two. By continuing this process the cells increase by geometrical progression into four—eight—sixteen—thirty-two—sixty-four, etc., and soon evolve into millions. When a sufficient number of these protoplasmic cells are formed, then the real work begins. The cells have to arrange themselves into the human form, not only as to the body, limbs, and external organs, but also into all the internal organs possessed by the parents. Such a task seems impossible; but it is performed unerringly by these cells of living protoplasm. Sir Oliver Lodge tells us that they are guided and directed in this work by an immaterial "principle" which he calls "life" or "soul." As a matter of fact, the stem-cell, and all the other cells produced by segmentation, are minute particles of matter derived from the parents. No real life is originated until the parent cells unite: neither the spermatozoon (male) nor the ovum (female) possesses sufficient vitality in itself to reproduce the species.

If we follow the cells of protoplasm through the period of gestation, we find that they travel over a very old and beaten path, which leads in a roundabout way through all the past ages before arriving at the human stage. The following short paragraph from The World's Advanced Thought, published many years ago, states the case in a few words:—

> The development of the embryo is a condensed and abbreviated repetition of the evolution of mankind. In the gestative period previous to birth the inchoate human being runs swiftly through the whole gamut of change that his ancestors slowly experienced in their movement of ages up the zoological ladder. He passes through the several stages of cell, leaf, egg, worm, reptile, serpent, fish (including gills), quadruped (including tail), till he reaches the human stage.

The foregoing statement is true only as regards the human race as a whole. In the majority of individual cases there are breaks in the chain; but notwithstanding some missing links, the long, devious path of evolution in the past can be clearly perceived. This aggregate of cells, then, which forms itself into a human body, would seem instinctively to know how organized bodies were formed in the past; hence, it travels, blindfold as it were, through the earlier stages of evolution, then through the later ones, until it ultimately reaches its goal. "There is a time," says Professor Huxley, "when the embryos of neither dog, nor horse, nor porpoise, nor ape, nor man, can be distinguished by any essential feature one from the other; there is a time when each and all of them resemble that of the dog. But as the development advances, all the parts acquire their speciality, till at length the embryo is converted into the form of the parent from which it started."

Now, assuming for a moment the existence of an immaterial director that guided the protoplasmic cells in their formation of the body, Why, it may be asked, did this director allow the cells to form themselves into the parts of an organism belonging to an early stage, then reform themselves and take the form of an organism belonging to a later stage; in one stage providing their body with gills, then reforming it and giving it a tail, and so going from one stage to another until they ultimately reached that of man? Why did not this controller show the cells a short and direct way of reaching the human stage without all this forming and reforming? Is it not clear that the cells have no immaterial director to guide them, but, in their own way, by some kind of instinct, they follow the path which protoplasmic cells had always taken in the past. Setting aside, then, this immaterial director that does not direct, is it not far more probable that the hereditary influence which resides in the cells—and is a property of living matter—is the agent that directs all the formative processes?

Sir Oliver Lodge appears to speak of "life" in an abstract sense, as he might of "goodness" or "wickedness." But such qualities are not entities which survive the death of the individuals in whom they are found; there is no "goodness" or "wickedness" apart from people who are classed as "good" or "wicked." The same is the case with the abstraction called "life." We know that one of the attributes common to members of the animal and vegetable kingdoms is vitality. This fact the mind takes cognizance of, and, dissociating it from the organism, calls the abstraction "life." But life in the concrete refers, not to an abstraction, but to the state or condition of the entire living body when all its internal organs are exercising their respective functions. There is no such thing as "life" apart from bodies or things which are living, and though all the organs and tissues of the body contain life, this so-called "vital principle" cannot be separated from them. The word "life," as employed by Sir Oliver Lodge, is thus merely a name used to distinguish animated from inanimate forms of existence. Hence, to imagine "life" in the abstract to be an entity which will survive the body after death is to throw reason and common sense to the winds.

A Bill is at present before Parliament that is of some interest to Freethinkers. In our fervour for liberty and democratic government, we have got rid of so many safeguards of freedom that losing one more or less makes little difference. The new proposal is that trial by jury shall be abolished for the duration of the War and for a certain time after, except in cases where personal character is involved. This means that in the event of a prosecution for blasphemy—for we hardly expect that would be considered a charge involving personal character—the defendant will be left without the protection of a jury. And before a judge of pronounced religious convictions, we can guess the result. We can see no reason for this Bill save as a preparation for other things. We daresay the Bill will pass. The present House of Parliament will pass anything. Charles the First would have considered it a dispensation of Providence had he had such a House.

In "dedicating" two ambulances at Trafalgar Square on Saturday, the Bishop of London said: "The difference between conveying wounded in ambulances like this and in a motor lorry is all the difference between heaven and hell." No doubt his lordship is an authority upon the conditions of these places, but we mustn't forget that his God made both.

After four years of war, Christians are beginning to have doubts as to the entire German nation being "atheistic," and they are actually saying things which would have been well-nigh impossible before the world-conflict. The Evening Standard (London) goes so far as to say that "the religious-minded German is on the whole a much worse man than the German Atheist."

The Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge has published a pamphlet, entitled The Problem of Man's Ancestry, by Professor F. Wood Jones. The most striking thing about the booklet is that the Biblical account of man's origin is completely ignored, and the writer admits the truth of evolution. Orthodoxy must be in a bad way when it has to borrow its arguments from Freethinkers.

The Vicar of Waltham Abbey invited all Nonconformist bodies in the town to join the Church in services of intercession. Providence was as deaf as usual.

The fawning newspapers editors have made much of the King's visit to a factory, when he helped to cut soldiers' shirts. There was nothing in the incident to waste good printer's ink on a lengthy report. If the Bible be true, God himself on one occasion turned tailor and made "coats of skin" and clothed Adam and Eve.

The Committee on Munition Workers' Health report that Sunday work does not pay. Yet the dear clergy have always found Sunday work pay very handsomely.

Although parsons run Gospel-shops, they are not usually popular with other tradesmen. A notable exception was the late Rev. Henry Long, of Higham Ferrers. At his funeral all the public-houses in the neighbourhood were closed. Perhaps the deceased gentleman purchased his "communion-port" from local dealers.

Clergymen as a rule are adepts at begging, and in securing the assistance of Mr. Lloyd George to take up the collection at the Welsh Service at Westminster Abbey they recognized that his abilities in this direction outdid their masterly efforts. Trust a parson for knowing the best way to collect the "dibs."

The Health Committee of the Carlisle Town Council granted permission for a concert in the Park on behalf of a Prisoners of War Fund. On this coming before the Council the Mayor said "there was something repugnant and distasteful in doing anything which in any might encourage the secularization of the Sabbath," and moved that the matter be referred back for consideration. We are glad to see that the Mayor failed to find a seconder, and that the concert was held. It is a curious thing that these Sabbatarians can see no wrong in War work being done on Sunday, but complain of harmless and healthy amusement. The Mayor is taken very sharply to task in the local paper, which reminds him that his argument no longer appeals to public sympathy—or, we hope, to public intelligence.

A London paper describes Mr. William Hughes, the Australian politician, as an "Imperial Christian." We have heard of "Chinese Presbyterians," but this union of "Punch and Pray" startles us.

Truth is stranger than fiction. At the Southwark Coroner's Court two boys told that official they had never heard of the Bible. The two boys were not related to one another, and attended different schools.

"It is no wonder that thousands are turning from the Churches in disgust." This is not a sentence from a Freethought paper, but is taken from the Daily News, and is from the pen of the Rev. Dr. Orchard. It does not augur well for the near future of religion.

One of our readers, acting on the advice we gave in these columns, wrote to the local M.P., Sir Herbert Neild, on the question of Secular Education. In the course of his reply, Sir Herbert says:—

> I am wholly opposed to a purely secular education, which in my judgment would be most disastrous to the country. I have never shrunk from expressing my view and sought to obtain support of advocating measures which are opposed to my strong personal conviction, and on this subject there can be no surrender if the best interests of the youth of the nation are to be safeguarded.

What we should like to know would be the facts upon which an estimate of the consequences of Secular Education, such as is expressed by Sir Herbert Neild, is based. We know of none. Will Sir Herbert say that Secular Education in France has been disastrous to the youth of France? And if not there, why here? Is English human nature so inferior to French that it needs a support which others can do without? We fail to see anything in Sir Herbert's reply save sheer religious prejudice.

It will be noted, too, that Sir Herbert Neild takes no notice whatever of the political aspect of the question. He is quite content that everybody should go on paying for the religion of everybody else, and that others should be forced to maintain a religious teaching to which they have a convinced opposition. This, of course, is because the religion taught is one with which Sir Herbert happens to agree. If he were a citizen of a Mohammedan country he would consider it an injustice to be compelled to maintain the teaching of that religion. It makes a world of difference whether one belongs to the dominant religion or not. And it is almost invariably fatal to one's sense of justice.

The German Kaiser claims that during his thirty years' reign he has been "A Prince of Peace." Like most Christians, he uses the word "Peace" in a Pickwickian sense.

A "Calvary" is to be erected outside a Kilburn church at a cost of £1,200. In these terrible times, it isn't the clergy who are being crucified.

The Duke of Connaught opened a "Y.M.C.A." hut subscribed for by East-End Jews, states an evening contemporary. This is proof positive of the complete secularization of the work at the "Y.M.C.A." huts. None are so devoted to their faith as members of the Jewish community.

Providence, we are told, watches the fall of the sparrows, but there seems some laxity with regard to the "paragon of animals." During last year over five thousand persons were killed and injured on British railways.

The Wirral Board of Guardians have decided to open their meetings with prayer. The only comment came from a Roman Catholic who said he would leave the room while the prayers were in progress, and would offer up prayers by himself. But what will happen if the Roman Catholic prays for something different from the rest of the Board? How will the recording angel be able to tell which is the official prayer? We suggest, as a way out of the trouble, that all the prayers should be signed by the chairman and clerk. That will prevent misunderstandings.

The Church Times warns clerical owners of glebe lands against being in a hurry to get rid of it. It is probable that a rise in value is anticipated. Anyway, our contemporary cites approvingly a caution of the Bishop of Winchester to the effect that the land is not his own but is the property of the Church. So far, we are bound to admit, the Bishop is on sound ecclesiastical ground. Students of history will remember that the Mediæval Church forbade the sale of slaves belonging to the Church for the same reason. The slaves were not their property, and no abbot or bishop was to sell the property of the Church—except at par or a little over.

The Australian Premier, Mr. Hughes, is running some risk of being accused of blasphemy. Speaking at the British Empire League on June 19, he said:—

> We should not befool ourselves or think that in some fashion the God of which we have no knowledge—Providence—will again lead us, who have blundered so often, into the promised land. We have to face facts. Nothing but our own valour and inflexible will can get us out of where we are.

That looks like a semi-official repudiation of "Providence." If we are not careful we shall have German writers citing Mr. Hughes as proof that we are a nation of Atheists. English journalists have asserted that of Germany on about as much evidence.

It was one of life's little ironies that in a City bookshop two volumes should be displayed, side by side, bearing the titles, Savage Survivals and The Popes and their Church.

A new book bears the delicious title, The Bells of Paradise. Pious folk are more used to the beautiful hymn, "The bells of Hell go ting-a-ling, aling."

The clergy occasionally do other War-work beside seeing the soldiers off at the railway stations. The Bishop of Llandaff recently consecrated a memorial chapel at Bassaleg.

The Bishop of Woolwich says that boys earn too much money, and one Woolwich lad earns twice as much as a curate. The simple remedy seems to be that the unhappy curates should be paid boys' wages.

If the clergy are unwilling to fight, they do their best to make their sojourn in this vale of tears tolerable. At a cricket-match at Lords, one of the teams was advertised as being composed of clergymen.

To Correspondents.

A. S. PICKERING.—From what you say, Coventry, evidently, needs attention, and we hope will receive it. Thanks for your inducing your newsagent to display an extra copy of the Freethinker. Your are quite safe in distributing our tracts when and where you please.

J. L. CARR.—Pleased to have your name as one of the Freethinker League. We are sending papers to all the addresses given.

MRS. K. MAXWELL.—Our Shop Manager is writing you re subscription. Pleased the Freethinker meets with your warm approval. That the two Presbyterian churches in your village have combined in order to secure a congregation is encouraging.

DECIT (Ayrshire).—The present editor of the Freethinker is an Atheist. So was the last editor, G. W. Foote.

H. S. W.—We were waiting only for available space, as you will see from this week's issue.

E. LECHMERE.—The result might have been better, but it is well to put one's point of view before these people. Otherwise they are apt to think their own view is more powerful than it really is.

H. A. HUTTON.—We are quite prepared to meet any god we may ever come across. At present we are left marvelling at the mentality of some of the followers of one god.

GREVZ FYSHER.—Your instructions have received attention.

A. RUSSELL.—Quite a well known work, and in great vogue among Freethinkers a generation or two back. It is still good reading, but not sufficiently up to date to warrant re-publication.

T. D.—You are quite misinformed. The Freethinker does not benefit in the slightest degree from the Bowman legacy. Neither does it receive financial aid in any form from either the National Secular Society or the Secular Society, Limited.

G. RILEY.—Hope you will be successful. Thanks for ordering extra copies for display in your newsagent's window.

V. LE ROY.—Next week. Many thanks.

A. WILDMAN.—Good news is always welcome.

T. DENNIS.—Pleased to know you had a good meeting in Sheffield on Sunday last in the open air. You do not give the time of next Sunday's meeting in the Forester's Hall, so have guessed—6.30.

A. B. MOSS.—We are doing as you request. Your suggestion that Freethinkers should carry a copy of this paper about with them for the purpose of introducing special portions to friends is a good one. Pleased you like the idea of a Freethinker League. It is catching on.

E. ANDERSON AND A CORP.—Next week. Crowded out of this issue.

G. RULE.—We are very appreciative of what the Battersea Branch is doing to encourage the sale of the Freethinker. We have no doubt it will be successful.

A. BRAMHILL.—You appear to be jumping at conclusions.

W. BARTON.—Pleased to have your name and help. Literature for distribution is being sent. Kindly send on the paper when the parcel is large enough, safely secured with string and labelled "Waste Paper."

LAWRENCE SMALL.—Compliments received with appreciation.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street. London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed and made payable to the "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We have already had several responses to what we wrote last week regarding a supply of waste paper in order to guard supplies of printing paper for the future. One London reader writes:—

> You want paper, we want the Freethinker. I, perhaps, cannot do much, but I am calling on my friends, making a list of those willing to give their waste paper. I propose collecting those—collecting from them every month, and sending same to you. It may only be a little, but you are perfectly welcome to what I can get.

That is the right kind of spirit. We want all the papers, magazines, old books and ledgers (without covers) we can get. Those who care to give will doubly help. But we will pay the scheduled prices for all paper sent. The paper can be tied in bundles of about 56 lbs. and over, and sent to us. We will remit on receipt.

Canon Peter Green, of Manchester, asks the Manchester Guardian to receive literature, and subscriptions for the purchase of literature, in order that some "serious" reading-matter may be sent out to the troops. The Guardian offers to comply with the request, and adds that large numbers are ready "to ponder and examine the basis and ultimate things of life." We believe this to be the case, but when the Guardian's literature gets there it will not have the field to itself. We have taken care of that, and many of our readers would be surprised if they knew how much we have sent out to the troops. And our reward has been scores of letters from men who have confessed that it was in this way they made their first acquaintance with Freethought.

Sir H. H. Johnston's recent Conway Memorial Lecture, "On the Urgent Need for Reform in Our National and Class Education," is now issued by Messrs. Watts & Co., at the price of 9d. net. The lecturer has no trouble in making out a strong case against the present methods of education, and of the complete unsuitability of much that is given. If Sir H. H. Johnston's lecture has the effect of leading some people to recognize the urgent need of reform in education, he will have done good work. But the English people take little interest in education, although one is pleased to record that at present a more hopeful spirit is abroad.

A lively little paper is Shaw's Journal, published at Wolverhampton, and devoted to the discussion of social questions. The editor has several competitions running, and we notice that one of them consists of "the best essay on Paine's Age of Reason." Decidedly, the world is moving.

The Humanitarian continues to make its regular monthly appearance, and its persistent advocacy of a broad humanitarianism is a welcome sign during a period of war. The last issue to hand contains a revew of Lord Morley's Recollections, and, among other interesting matter, a protest against the use of the word "meat" for flesh-food exclusively. "Meat," the writer holds, is a generic term, and is properly applicable to all food. But we are afraid that usage in this matter will be all-powerful.

The New York Truthseeker, in its issue for May 25, reprints as an article our Pioneer Tract, What Will You Put in its Place? We have been waiting for several weeks to retaliate by serving up one or two of the Truthseeker's excellent articles. Some of these are much too good to be spent on American readers alone. We are quite sure our readers will appreciate these reprisals.

We are at present sending out a large number of specimen copies of the Freethinker for several successive weeks, and as this involves some expense, we should be obliged if those who decide to become regular subscribers would drop us a post-card to that effect. At the same time, we are glad to report an increase in the number of subscribers due to this form of propaganda.

"Old Hand," writing in the Accrington Observer, recalls a lecture given by Charles Bradlaugh in the Accrington Town Hall in 1883. The meeting, says "Old Hand," was presided over by the Rev. J. Harrison, and was the finest political gathering ever held in the town. The meeting was held in connection with the Affirmation question, and, judging from the recollections of "Old Hand," the occasion must have been a memorable one. It is a pleasing reminder of the great days of Freethought.

Mr. James Anderson, of 95 Hanover Street, Edinburgh, will be glad to meet other Freethinkers in that city with a view to forward the interests of the Freethinker and organize propaganda work. There should be much greater activity in Edinburgh than there is, and we trust Mr. Anderson's invitation will meet with a prompt response.

The Story of the Tea Plant.

As Colonel Money intimated many years ago in his pioneer treatise, The Cultivation and Manufacture of Tea, the selection of site and soil for the plantations is of vital moment to the success of the industry. India bids fair to become the great tea garden of the globe, and in that luxuriant land the ideal conditions for growth are furnished by an alternation of sunshine and shower. In the Tropics evaporation proceeds at a rapid rate, and a copious supply of moisture is essential to the wellbeing of the plant. During a period of protracted rain the plant flourishes for a time, but its growth gradually lessens, and may ultimately cease. In very damp seasons the leaf yields inferior tea, for, as Bald states in his text-book, Indian Tea, the sap becomes watery, and "the plant has not been in sufficiently vigorous circulation to elaborate the substances necessary for the production of thick juice."

It has been scientifically demonstrated that all soils are rendered fruitful by the nitrifying activities of bacterial organisms. These micro-organisms form a multitude so immense in all good vegetable soils that the earth may almost be regarded as a living entity. The decomposition undergone by animal and plant substances so commonly attributed to water and air, is really produced by the labours of bacteria. Micro-organisms thus render available to the higher floral structures those nutrient materials so necessary to their life and growth.

Beneath the superficial soils, teeming with bacterial organisms, lies the deeper dead earth. This is seldom exposed to the influences of the atmosphere, and is therefore destitute of oxygen. It was well known in India that when the site of a deserted village was brought under cultivation, its crops, for several seasons, proved themselves miserably poor, no matter how rich it might be in all those constituents which usually promote fertility. Such soil as this has been trodden for generations by countless feet, and thus its population of nitrifying bacteria has been destroyed, and therefore the many attempts to rear the tea plant on it have ended in failure. Dr. Aikman has shown that oxygen is necessary to the life and labours of soil bacteria, and with the cessation of their nitrifying activities the earth becomes barren. When a tea estate is extended so as to embrace the site of an abandoned village, unless special measures are taken to introduce bacteria into the soil, the site will remain as a sterile patch for several years. To avoid this barren blemish in the landscape, the progressive planter provides each tea bush with a generous surrounding of virgin soil from the adjoining jungle. Thus is supplied the nourishment which enables the tea plant to thrive until the beneficent bacteria have restored the soil to a state of fertility.

The tea shrub languishes on water-logged soil. When cultivated on sloping land, drainage may be neglected; but on estates situated on level country, the soil must be drained. When the rain falls, it is most important that the moisture should be afforded the fullest facilities for saturating the ground. If the rain runs over the surface, it not only transports invaluable soil substances to the streams, but the priceless nitrogen and other precious chemicals suspended in it are likewise lost. Rain not merely confers moisture to the thirsty earth. Its chemical constituents form an ideal fertilizer. The better the drainage system, the larger the percentage of nutritious materials added to the soil when the rain water slowly filters through it. Again, even in seasons of abnormal rainfall, well-drained land is much more responsive to the cultivator's art than indifferently drained or water-logged soil.

When totalled, the yearly rainfall is surprisingly heavy even in Europe. We attach small importance to the fact that an inch of rain has fallen during a summer storm. Yet every recorded inch of rain represents a downpour of 101½ tons on every acre of land. Therefore, 100 acres of land receives 10,150 tons for each inch of rain that descends in the course of the year. Hence the great superiority of steady, penetrating rain to the violent downpour which usually accompanies a thunderstorm. In the one case, the fertilizing rain filters through the soil, while in the other an enormous proportion of the rain, with its contained chemicals, is swept along the river valleys towards the sea.

At one time it was usually held that tea would flourish in a poor soil. This erroneous idea arose from the circumstance that when the tea gardens of China were first described it was stated that the shrub was usually grown on inferior soil. But, as Money remarks, the tea plant is, as a rule, cultivated in China on land which is useless for other purposes. "If," says he, "a soil is light and friable enough, it cannot be too rich for tea."

Poor or even moderately good soil is of little worth to the tea planter. Hops require rich land in temperate Europe, and the more opulent the soil the more abundant the picking. This is equally true concerning tea. The planting of tea gardens is a costly undertaking, and the utmost circumspection is needed when selecting sites for new plantations. Unlike cereal crops, which succeed clovers or roots, and may be themselves succeeded in the ensuing season by leguminous plants, the tea plot is continuously cultivated for a century. The richest virgin soil is best suited to a garden which is to be cropped for a hundred years or more. Land liable to river flooding must be shunned, for the overflow of a river will, in a few hours, reduce to a state of ruin the most promising plantation. Early cultivators imagined that the rice fields of India could be utilized as tea farms, but hard experience has proved that clay lands suitable for rice culture are worthless for tea.

It is estimated that the amount of rainfall in existing tea areas is something between seventy and one hundred inches per annum. The finest teas are raised where the rain falls throughout the year, with the most copious downfall at the season of highest temperature. Although the tea shrub is an evergreen, the frost and snow of the Himalaya regions, unless severe, do not appear to seriously injure the plant. This is due to the circumstance that the shrub becomes almost as dormant as our own deciduous trees, such as the oak and elm during the reign of winter. In the sub-tropical uplands of India the colder conditions prove useful to the tea plant, for slight frosts serve to destroy the eggs and grubs of insect enemies. Various observers have noted that teas cultivated in the more temperate regions are less liable to the depredations of parasites than those grown elsewhere.

Local conditions, both of climate and soil, conspire to produce the choicest teas. The hot and humid plantations of the low-lying districts of Assam are celebrated for their abundant harvest of leaf, but the fine flavoured teas are rarely gathered in this region. In the less heated country of Upper Assam and the Darjeeling Hills splendidly flavoured teas are produced, but even in these areas the teas vary greatly in quality on different soils.

Before a garden is planted it is essential to ascertain whether an abundant supply of good water is easily available for the consumption of the coolies who work on the estate. Water must also be handy for machinery and factory use, as a constant supply is imperative in times of drought. A water famine has frequently brought a flourishing tea plantation to the brink of ruin in the arid period which precedes the arrival of the monsoon rains. The deepest wells have run dry with the sinister sequel of disease and death decimating the dwellers on the estate.

One signal advantage to those whose gardens occupy a hilly site is usually the proximity of mountain streams which may be utilized to provide water power for factory purposes. This secures a very substantial economy in the annual outlay, while the neighbouring forests furnish fuel for machinery, wood for the tea-chests, and timber for dwellings and factories. It is also important to secure ample facilities for transit by river or road to bring in supplies for the labourers, and to send the tea to market. A fairly open site is requisite to ensure the prosperity of the plantation. Narrow valleys are usually too near the jungle to repay the cost of cultivation, for the perpetual encroachment of the forest vegetation entails much extra labour, while in very narrow valleys the tea shrubs are apt to become half-buried by the earth swept down by water descending from the adjoining slopes.

Miracles and Omnipotence.

THERE is one phase of the recent reassertion of the miraculous by Catholic apologists that, as it seems to me, has escaped the attention of the militant sceptic, concerned, not so much with the excrescences, but the essentials, of the faith he is attacking. The most important of those essentials is, I need hardly say, first the existence, and then the qualities of God. Obviously, until both of these are made clear, then the sacrifice of Christ, assuming that he ever lived, cannot count for anything. Man cannot be reconciled to a God that is either non-existent or pitiless by any tragedy, however poignant, that may have been enacted; and the prime question that we are, therefore, driven to consider is—to quote the words of John Stuart Mill—how, if God is omnipotent, he can still remain benevolent and allow all the immedicable ills that flesh is heir to still to continue; allow, that is, the wicked still to flourish like a green bay tree, and the innocent, even the helpless and innocent child, to endure cruelties that wring the heart of the most callous of his own creatures. If we examine the answer tendered to us by Catholic and neo-Catholic apologists in the light of their own assertions regarding miracles, we shall realize, I think, more than ever, its complete inadequacy.

We are all familiar with the answer. God is omnipotent, we are told; he is all-powerful, but he has parted with his power; he has given man freewill, that blessed and divine attribute; he cannot, therefore, interfere without despoiling man of his destiny, and must perforce continue to take the rest cure through centuries of sorrow, tragedy, and sin. Omnipotence, in other words, does not mean all-powerful, but merely all the power left to God; and just as it is impossible for a man to have his cake and eat it too, so it is out of the question that he can have freewill and the intervention of the Almighty to free him from evils that individually, at all events, he is not responsible for.

I might pause for a moment to point out that, even assuming that this argument is well founded, it is no justification of the inertia, which endureth, like God's mercy, for ever. As between the child, innocent and blameless, born into the horror of a London slum or the miseries of an Indian famine, and God, it is no answer to say that it must starve, or be beaten to death, because its ancestors used their freewill improperly. The child remains an injured, a tragic, victim of "sin" not its own; freewill, or no freewill, it is a victim of injustice. But the point is that there is nothing to show that freewill could not be preserved and the child protected, at one and the same time, provided always that the word "omnipotence" is left with its true meaning; the meaning that there is no limit to the power of its possessor.

Let me take another word applied by Catholic apologists to the Godhead, for it will make my meaning perfectly clear. We are told that God has creative power. What does creative mean? It means the ability to launch, or, if you like, impose a condition of affairs upon man without any cause but the will of God—that and nothing else. If freewill, therefore, now spells non-intervention, God can, if he chooses, impose a condition of affairs reconciling those apparently irreconcilable things. And, in point of fact, if miracles do, as the Catholics assert, continue to happen, that is exactly what he does achieve.

What is a miracle? As described by Catholic writers, I suggest much like this. A child is dying of an incurable and dreadful disease, not amenable to treatment. But, in view, perhaps, of specially strong representations, God concerns himself specially with the case. The attitude of non-intervention is abandoned. Human agencies having failed, God gets to work. The child is cured by his direct action; the law of cause and effect is obviously suspended, at least a human effect is produced through causes other than human; the child is cured, and does not lose its freewill!

That, according to Catholic writers, is what takes place, and the question at once arises, why, if it be possible in one case, not in all? Why, if one child can be saved by a miracle, cannot thousands of others? Miracles are easy to God. Without omnipotence in the true sense he could not perform them. With omnipotence, he could save the whole of man by one grand miracle. He could end the injustice of children suffering till the third and fourth generation for faults not their own; could abolish a condition of society whereby the unscrupulous become rich, and the worthy remain poor, and could, inter alia, save blameless old ladies from dying of the agonies of cancer, because as we are asked to believe, their grandfathers led wild lives.

Why, if God is benevolent, does he not do so?

I may be told by my fellow sceptics that they do not believe in miracles; that it is preposterous to suppose you can produce a cause without an effect; that the misery of man is so clamant that no being, in the slightest degree worshipful, no being not incredibly base and hideously repellant, would suffer it to continue if he had the power to alter it. I incline to that view also. But what, then, becomes of God's omnipotence?

Digitized by Google

John Stuart Mill's question still stands unanswered, and, as I fear, unanswerable, and for Catholics to stress miracles is merely to emphasize their own inability to meet the crucial objection to their faith.

AGNOSTIC.

S. P. C. K.

THE Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has just issued a pamphlet by Frederic Wood-Jones, Professor of Anatomy to the University of London, entitled The Problem of Man's Ancestry The chief interest to Freethinkers is that its main object appears to be to belittle the work of Huxley and Haeckel, no doubt because they were violent antagonists of the Christian religion.

There lives in the dense forests of the East Indies an animal rather smaller than our English squirrel, which sleeps during the daytime, but jumps from tree to tree catching insects and lizards during the night. The natives call it the Malmag, but it is known to science as Tarsius Spectrum or the Tarsier. The generic name "Tarsius" is due to the animal possessing an astonishingly long tarsus or ankle, while the specific name "Spectrum" refers to its huge goggle-like eyes, resembling those of a motor-cyclist, which give the animal such a weird-like appearance, that it is held in superstitious awe by the natives. Until quite recently it was placed amongst the lemurs, but lately our greatest authority on the subject, Mr. R. J. Pocock, owing to its organization departing markedly from other lemurs, has put it in a phylum all to itself at the base of the primate stock.

Professor Wood-Jones brings forth several lines of evidence indicating the resemblances between Tarsius and man, and points out also that in these characters both differ from the monkeys and anthropoid apes.

The bones of the nose, the structure of the eye-socket, the form of the cheek-bones, the condition of the roof of the mouth, the teeth, and many other parts of the skeleton are alike in Tarsius and Homo, while differing from those of the monkeys and anthropoid apes.

The muscles also show more affinity between man and Tarsius than between man and apes. For example, the pectoralis minor which passes from the ribs towards the fore-limb, where it is attached to the shoulder-girdle in Tarsius and man, in the monkeys and apes ends on the upper bone of the arm. Primitive characters are shown in the tongue, the vermiform appendix, the kidneys, and other organs in man and Tarsius which differ from those of the monkeys and apes.

Turning to the fossil evidence, he quotes from Professor Boule's L'Homme fossile de la Chapelle-aux-Saints as follows: "Man has been derived neither from the Anthropoid stem nor from any other known group, but from a very ancient Primate stock, that separated from the main line even before the giving off of the Lemuroids." The conclusion arrived at is, that man and Tarsius linger to-day as specialized primitive Primates. A fossil form of Tarsius, called Anaptomorphus, dates right back to the base of the Eocene period, and is thus contemporary with the earliest tools of man, the well-known Eoliths.

Although the worthy Professor frequently sneers at Haeckel, nevertheless, he brings in his well-known law, that in the individual development of an animal, it climbs up its ancestral genealogical tree. The skull of man shows no suture between the premaxillar and the maxillary bones, although in apes and monkeys a well-marked gap is distinctly visible. This is a human specific character. If man acquired this character late in his history, we should expect the fusion of the two bones to be very late in its appearance in the human embryo. Professor Wood-Jones says:—

> As a matter of fact, this character is established as soon as ever the future bones of the human face are first represented as cartilaginous nuclei. It has become a character of the human embryo at a stage when development has proceeded so little way, that the future being is no longer than ten times the diameter of an ordinary pin's head. Such a finding, in the development of any animal, forces the conclusion that a distinctive feature, so early acquired in embryology, was early acquired in history, and that the species must be very old indeed.

The Professor concludes by mentioning that Dr. S. A. Smith, of Sydney University, has proved from mineralized fossils found on the Darling Downs at Talgai, in Queensland, that men, women, and dogs broke into the Pleistocene fauna of pouched Marsupials, and became the ancestors of the present aboriginal Australians and their native dogs. Dr. Smith believes they came in a boat, and were as highly civilized then as the Australian savage is to-day.

TURNING TO GOD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Some few weeks ago I read in your sensible paper of a clergyman who had lost a son in this horrible War. This clergyman was reported to have said, had he been an Atheist before this happened, it would certainly have converted him. I take it that he would have turned to God, as the saying goes. I would just like to put my case, and see how they look side by side. I had two sons fighting for a very long time. For about six weeks we received no letters from one son; then came the official news that he was missing. We then received a postcard from the boy himself, stating that he had been wounded and taken prisoner by the Germans, and would send us all the news when he got settled in hospital, as he had been sent to England as an exchange prisoner of war. The following day we received a letter from him, which ran like this:—

> Dear Mother and Dad,—I promised to let you know all the news. On March 22 I was wounded. The Germans came up so rapidly that they passed on, with the result that I lay out until the 26th before I was actually in the Germans' hands, having the days and nights out in the open. I know how sorry you will be when I tell you I was so seriously wounded that it was found necessary to amputate both legs.

Now, Sir, I could not read any more of that letter for some time, as you will well understand. What I want to say is this: Can any of your readers see anything in my case that I or anyone else should turn to God? I am glad to say that his mother and myself have been down to King George's Hospital, London, to see him, and he is in good health and cheerful. He says himself, had the doctors and nurses been as helpless as his so-called Heavenly Father seems to be, it would have been all up with him, but the doctors say he will be able to walk again with artificial legs. Note the good work of the doctors and nurses; then note the work of God. I am told I should thank God my son is alive. Others must thank God because theirs are dead. What a game! Will we ever get out of this horrible nightmare, and allow sense and reason to take their proper place, and get rid of this blind faith and superstition for ever?

THOS. O'NEILL.

RELIGION IN THE ARMY.

SIR,—after reading Mr. Comley's letter to-night on "Religion in the Army," I feel induced to send you my experience of both Services. I knew a good deal of the Army before the War—did the first two years of the War in the Army, and have now been nearly two years in the "Senior Service." My experience (and I am a pretty close observer) is exactly the opposite of Mr. Comley's. The overwhelming majority of N.C.O.'s and men regard Church Parade as a nuisance, and openly cuss it. Were it voluntary (and really voluntary), as it should be, the attendance would be very small.

I do not say the majority are Freethinkers on a basis of intellectual conviction (though a steadily growing number are), but the prevalent spirit is one of utter indifference, tinctured with doubt, suspicion, and a considerable amount of increasing hostility. The conversation proves it. My Freethinker was (and is) always eagerly read by many in the Army in France and in the Navy. And the "Man in the Street" (now the man in the Army) has a far more "open mind" than ever before of the great case against religion.

In all my experience I have only seen one man—he was a young man in barracks—saying his prayers before turning in. I might, if you can find space, relate this amusing (and true) story as to the effect of war experiences on some religious folk. In my boat we had a "sailor" who knew nothing of the sea before the War. He was, to use the common phrase, "a bit religious," and never used "strong" language. The class of boats we were in roll, and pitch, and jump about in anything of a sea to a very great degree. Our "religious" friend was a terrible victim to mal-de-mer, and five days at sea meant to him five days of practical starvation, and return to port in a very weak condition. One day, while making another offering to Father Neptune, he was covered in a sea and thrown up against a deck house. He struggled and staggered into the foc's'le and there fell under a table, which collapsed on top of him. He managed to rise and make his way out again, where, dropping into an arm chair in the little sick-bay, he said: "I don't believe there is a bloody God!" Though not arrived at in quite so strenuous a manner, that is the conclusion that enormous numbers have been forced to come to by the War.

The opinion held by the great bulk of the men (and expressed among themselves) about the chaplains is a very poor one indeed. Where they are thought well of, it is because of their qualities as men, not as parsons.

You, Sir, referred some time ago to the hymns sung by men in the Services. The greatest favourite I have come across is to the tune (I think) of the hymn "When we gather at the river, the beautiful, the beautiful the ri-eh-ver," and it runs thus:—

> Thank Christ we haven't joined for ever
> For ever, and for ever, and for eh-e ver:
> Thank Christ we haven't joined for ever,
> We'd all go bally batchy if we had.

So I must agree with the note you append to Mr. Comley's letter.

Religion and Medicine.

Amid the uncertain gains and assured losses of the War, the triumphs of sanitary and medical science stand unquestioned and unquestionable. The War has been fought under conditions which are so fatal to health that, left alone, disease would have long ago brought the War to an end by a wholesale slaughter of the participants. For the health of the Army we have to thank, not the much-advertised "Padre," but the unboomed doctor. The miracles of this War are those of healing, and of the means by which the health of the Armies have been maintained. The prayer of faith has not saved the sick, new limbs have not been made to grow on shattered stumps. What has been done in this direction has been done by Atheistic science. And yet we do not pay the head of the medical profession £15,000 a year; neither do we give him an army of well-paid assistants. We do not give mining Royalties of nearly £300,000 annually to the doctors as we do to the parsons; we have never voted them subsidies in Parliament, and we have never placed a tax upon every ton of coal entering London to build doctor's houses as we have done to build parson's churches. If our soldiers had trusted to God, it would, indeed, have been a case of "God help them!"

Faith and Physics.

Last week we were dealing with the close and historic connection between Christianity and dirt. And it is pertinent to now consider the influence of Christianity on medical science. That influence can be stated in a sentence—it was wholly and irredeemably bad. The medical science of antiquity was ignored and finally suppressed. The primitive belief that all disease was due to the action of evil spirits was revived and enforced. Right through the Old and New Testaments disease is treated as something that is supernaturally induced and must be supernaturally cured. In all essentials the Christian theory is that which flourishes among savages to-day. The boils of Job, the leprosy of Uzziah, the plagues of Egypt, are all due to God. Leprosy is to be cured by the High Priest taking a little blood and oil and placing it "upon the tip of the right ear of him that is to be cleansed, and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of the right foot." If the efficacy of the method only equalled its simplicity, it is a pity it was ever allowed to fall into disuse. Jesus healed the sick by a touch, cured blindness by spitting on the ground, and annointing the blind man's eyes with the spittle (John ix. 6). Peter's mother was cured by a touch. When a man's ear was cut off, Peter picked up the ear and stuck it on again. Paul cured fever by prayer, and restored Eutychus to life after his preaching had caused him to drop down dead. The New Testament is quite explicit on the point. "The prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up." In the Christian pharmacopœia there is but one ingredient—faith. In a Christian hospital a dispensary would be useless, and chemists downright blasphemy. The patients would supply their own physic, and the parsons collect subscriptions for having introduced the remedy.

Medicine and the Church.

The Christian Church had its own theory of disease, and its own remedies, and it dealt in its own way with all opposition. The great Origen was convinced that: "It is demons which produce famine, unfruitfulness, corruption of the air, pestilences." St. Augustine said that "All diseases of Christians are to be ascribed to these demons; chiefly do they torment freshly baptised Christians." Tertullian was convinced that an evil angel attended every person and caused disease. Other Saints and Fathers were of the same opinion. And the Church of England Prayer Book still has: "Whatsoever your sickness is know you certainly that it is God's visitation." What, then, was the use of doctors or of surgical science to Christians? None at all. So we find St. Ambrose declaring that the "precepts of medicine are contrary to celestial science," St. Augustine denouncing anatomists "who inhumanly pry into the secrets of the human body," and Tertullian denouncing the surgeon Herophilus for the blasphemy of dissection. The barbarians, in their repeated invasions of the Empire, had left intact the pagan medical schools at Treves, Arles, Bordeaux, Athens, and Alexandria. It was left for the Church to close them or sterilize their usefulness. A Church Council of 1248 and that of Rheims (1119) interdicted the study of medicine, while giving monks the control of the treatment of disease. The Council of Beziers (1246) prohibited Christians applying to Jewish doctors for treatment, and this at a time when the practice of scientific medicine was in their hands. The Dominicans, in 1243, prohibited all books on medicine from their monasteries. Pope Innocent III. forbade physicians practising save under the supervision of an ecclesiastic. Honorious (1222) forbade priests studying medicine, and, at the end of the century, Boniface XIII. interdicted surgery as being Atheistical.

A Christian Pharmacopœia.

The Christian world had its own pharmacopœia, which both piety and profit impelled them to preserve. In the matter of specialization, the religious theory of diseases lacked little. It was, indeed, a monument of ill-spent ingenuity. The human body was mapped out, and each part placed under a special director, beginning with God the Father and ending with now unknown saints. Diseases were shared out in a similar manner. St. Gall cured tumours, St. Valentine epilepsy, St. Polonia diseases of the teeth, St. Roque the plague, St. Hubert the bite of a mad dog, St. Clara sore eyes, St. Gervaise rheumatism, and so on through every complaint the flesh is heir to. In the case of any disease the plan was simple. One merely hunted up the celestial directory, and having paid the necessary fee—a by no means unimportant part of the procedure—one's concern was at an end. In addition there were innumerable relics which played an equally important part in the Christian science of medicine. The saliva of saints, along with water in which their hair had been dipped, were esteemed of great curative value. Parings of saintly nails, remnants of saintly clothing, and even saintly ordure, were all esteemed as remedies. At Cologne Cathedral was preserved—and is still, for aught we know to the contrary—the skulls of the Wise Men of the East. The relics of St. Rosalia at Palermo had thousands of cures attributed to their efficacy; and even after Professor Buckland discovered they were the bones of a goat, the cures went on just the same. Nor did the trifling fact of their belonging to men prevent the bones of St. Ursala and some of her eleven thousand virgins demonstrating their efficacy. Sacred pools, streams, and fountains abounded, each with its list of cures. The touch of an anointed person was also of great value, a superstition that lingered on into the eighteenth century, and was exemplified in the cures narrated of Queen Anne. Charles II. is said to have touched and cured over 100,000 people. William the Third's remark to one whom he "touched" for scrofula, "May it bring you better health and more sense," showed more intelligence than piety.

Divine Insanity.

Among savages there is but one cause of insanity. It is caused by an evil spirit taking possession of a person. This was precisely the theory taught by the Jesus of the New Testament, and exemplified by him in practice. In this matter, at least, he would have felt perfectly at one with an African witch-doctor exorcising evil spirits. And the teaching was fully endorsed and carried out by the Church for centuries. Officially, it is so still, for the 72nd Canon of the Church of England reserves the power of casting out devils to licensed persons, while the Catholic Church still teaches it. There was no power on which the early Christians prided themselves more than this of casting out devils. And with the organization of the Church came the organization of the power to cast out demons—to doubt which was Atheism. The power became so developed that in the fifteenth century a Bishop of Beauvais not only caused five devils to leave one sufferer, but actually compelled them to sign a document promising not to molest this person again—a method which reminds one of the bargain of Jesus with the devils who were allowed by him to enter a drove of swine. But all other exploits were eclipsed by the Jesuit Fathers of Vienna, who, in 1583, produced a record of 12,652 devils that had been cast out by them. The exactitude of the figures disarms all criticism and silences all doubt.

A Ghastly Chapter.

Dr. Henry Maudesly may well ask, "What place could a rational theory of insanity have in such an atmosphere of thought and feeling?" Insanity being, on the authority of Jesus, produced by devils, the rational cure was to get the devils out again. All over Europe people were whipped and chained and ill-treated, in the hope of making the dwelling-places of the devils so uncomfortable that they would come out. Lecky has collected a number of cases of people who were even burned for fancying themselves angels, Antichrist, or similar fabulous characters. Thousands of insane people—mostly women, for it was said the devils had more power with women than men—were burned for witchcraft. The state of public asylums even a hundred years ago were a disgrace to civilization. In Greece and Alexandria, centuries before, lunacy had been treated as a disease of the brain. It was left for Christianity to forsake this useful lead, and return to the practice of savages. Not till the scientific labours of men like Pinel in France, and Tuke in England, beat back religious ignorance, did the Church surrender its theories and put a close to one of the most discreditable chapters in the history of civilization.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Christianity and Natural Law.

Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap (Galatians vi. 7).

THAT verse is one of the many golden statements contained in the Bible. Dr. Jowett, of Westminster Chapel, London, finds in it what he properly calls "The Law of Harvest." In a characteristic article in the Christian World for June 20, this popular divine says that we are "surely justified in gazing upon the sunny aspect of the great truth," which is, according to him, that "if we want a fine harvest we can have one." We readily admit that a preacher may legitimately draw such an inference from the apostle's words; but we are deeply convinced, nevertheless, that the author of the Galatian Epistle intended them to serve as a warning more than as an inspiration. He evidently had in his mind people who secretly doubted and openly denied their truth. The very form of the exhortation—"Be not deceived; God is not mocked"—implies that some there were who unblushingly taught that there was no inexorable law of sowing and reaping; or, in other words, that it made very little, if any, practical difference how a man lived under the Christian dispensation. Both the doubt and the denial were by no means unreasonable deductions from the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith. Dr. Jowett ignores this dark aspect of his text altogether, basing his discourse, not on the verse he quotes, but on another, namely, "Let us not be weary in well-doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not." And yet the reverend gentleman, referring to his own youthful experience, makes the following significant admission:—

> My own early associations with the words are mostly connected with tragedy and disaster. They are usually quoted to emphasize the dire consequences of ill-living in early days. We think of the sowing of wild oats and the inevitable sequence which is found in moral ruin. And so the word has come to be a threat rather than an inspiration; it is more a warning than a promise. It is a trespass-board, and rarely a heartening counsel of friendly and comforting direction.

There is a broad hint, in that extract, that the natural treatment of the text is not good exegesis, as if the apostle had not meant it to be so taken; but we venture to dissent most emphatically from such a view. Nothing can be clearer than the fact that the apostle is here giving expression to a solemn warning, or setting up "a trespass-board" rather than "a heartening counsel of friendly and comforting direction." His central doctrine of justification by faith alone, which he had so zealously proclaimed during his visit to them, had led the Galatians to the natural inference that believers in Christ were freed from the natural law of cause and effect; and as a result some of them, no doubt, had gone morally astray, and were the cause of the moral downfall of others.

Now, Paul's contention is that they had made a false and disastrous inference from his teaching. As a religious teacher he was, in his own opinion, infallible. What he declared to his hearers and readers was the sure "word of the Lord." If his converts misconstrued his message, no blame attached to him; it was purely the outcome of their own blindness and stupidity. He assured the Thessalonians, "by the word of the Lord," that Christ's second coming would occur in their own lifetime. Pinning their faith in that ocular declaration, the poor people abandoned their daily avocations, and spent their whole time waiting and watching for that most happy event. The second coming was postponed year after year, and the apostle wrote to them again, not to confess that his doctrine was at fault, but to accuse them of having misunderstood and misapplied it. As a matter of fact, the mistake was entirely his own, though to his dying day he never owned up to it. The Lord's second coming is still an unverified dream, one of many falsified prophesies. Equally false is the doctrine of justification by faith, which for Protestants has been the "article of a standing or falling Church." It is but fair to state that the Council of Trent (1545-63) was unanimous in rejecting that dogma—that is, in anathematizing the view that "justifying faith is nothing but confiding trust in the Divine Mercy as remitting sins for Christ's sake, or that this trust alone is that whereby we are justified." And yet there is no doubt whatever but that Luther was perfectly right in his interpretation of the Pauline doctrine. In Paul's Epistles it is repeatedly asserted, with the utmost confidence, that justification is by faith alone.

> What saith the Scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness. Now, to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. Even as David describeth the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works.....Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law (Romans iv. 3-6; iii. 28).

Such is the evangelical doctrine of justification by faith alone, and it is being preached to-day from all orthodox pulpits. In hymn books, still used in Nonconformist chapels, we find such nauseating doggerels as the following:—

> Nothing either great or small—
> Nothing, sinner, no:
> Jesus did it, did it all
> Long, long ago.
> Cast thy deadly doing down,
> Down at Jesus' feet,
> Stand in him—in him alone,
> Gloriously complete.
> Free from the law; oh happy condition!
> Jesus hath bled, and there is remission!
> Cursed by the law, and bruised by the fall,
> Grace hath redeemed us once for all.

Protestant divines are in the habit of saying that it took the Church fifteen hundred years to discover this great truth so clearly taught in the Word of God. That is so; but once discovered, its value to the Reformed Communions proved incalculable, and with them to this day it is the "article of a standing or falling Church." That is true, and its truth is the supreme witness against the Christian religion. One Sunday, John Ruskin attended the Rev. Mr. Tipple's Church and heard a sermon in which it was proudly affirmed that faith in Christ in a moment converted the blackest sinner into a saint as bright and pure as any angel before the throne. To the brilliant author such a doctrine was the most pernicious and damnable conceivable, and he could find no terms sufficiently scathing in which to denounce it. Mr. Tipple positively declared that he never preached it, nor even believed it; but Ruskin heard it in Mr. Tipple's Church, whether by him or another, not only timidly hinted at, but unequivocally proclaimed as an incontestable Gospel truth. Ruskin's unmitigated condemnation of it showed how clearly he perceived the absolute inviolability of the law of causation. The astonishing fact is that Paul, too, discerned how utterly impossible it is to set aside the law of harvest, though he preached a Gospel which exulted over the possibility of totally severing the natural connection between sowing and reaping, or between past and present in a man's life. It never once occurred to him that he was guilty of giving his assent to two fundamentally and wholly irreconcilable doctrines, only one of which he knew both by experience and observation to be eternally true. He was fully aware that a man's past cannot be blotted out, that of necessity we reap what we have sown; but he did not, or would not, see that the Gospel he preached could not be true because it flatly contradicted that inflexible law. At last, however, it is being slowly brought home to the human mind that justification by faith is absolutely impossible, and would be essentially immoral if it were possible. To secure a fine harvest we must sow fine seed, to be happy to-morrow we must pursue truth and virtue to-day. If we cannot save ourselves we are lost indeed. We are Nature's children, and it is at once our duty and privilege to understand, obey, and make profitable use of our mother's laws. In any case, these cannot be broken; but if we disregard them they both can and will break us, no matter what Gospel may be preached to us.

EDWARD GIBBON, the greatest of our historians, is dethroned and done for. Sentence has been passed upon him by the Honorary Secretary of the Society of Saint George. All that remains between now and the morning of execution is mere detail. In pursuit of his mission as a Christian and a patriot, the Honorary Secretary has addressed a long letter to the Editor of this paper, and pointing out that Gibbon has unaccountably confused "Saint George" with another gentleman of the same name in a similar line of business. Those who have adopted the "careless and sneering assertions of Gibbon" have been misled grossly. This is partly owing to the fact that their own churlish desire to belittle the saint coincided with the opinions expressed by the wicked Gibbon, who deserves all the plagues of Egypt for upsetting the faith of simple folk.

It is all very sad, but "Saint George" himself is the trouble. Whether we identify the "saint" with the scoundrelly army contractor of Alexandria, or the other man with the same name, he is equally unsatisfactory. The chief exploit of the "other fellow" is the slaying of the dragon. Sane people regard this as a mere fabulous invention, such as the stories of Perseus and the sea-monster, Apollo and the python, Bellerophon and the chimera, and many another legend. This dissolves the saint as a solar myth. It also disposes of him as the Christian crusader, champion of chivalry, and "patron saint of England."

The other stories told of this "Saint George" serve to show to what depths human credulity can sink. This "saint" was, we are told, killed no less than three times, pleasantly reviving on two occasions. Among the trifling things that happened to him were that he was roasted, beaten with rods, crushed with rocks, beheaded, and thrown to wild animals. Coming to life again, he was sawn into pieces. These fragments were thrown into boiling pitch, but he again came to life, being finally and mercifully despatched by being broken to pieces on a wheel. What has all this beautiful nonsense to do with England, or even with common sense? Only in one fable is he described as having even visited this country. If the members of the Royal Society of St. George really believe that the decrees of Omnipotence are affected by saintly intervention, of what use is this particular "Saint George"? Is he not one of the patron saints of Germany and Austria as well as England?

Gibbon, be it remembered, identified "Saint George" with George, of Cappadocia. As he was writing history, and not collecting fairy tales, he was justified. And, if the "saint" moulted many a feather in the process, he emerges from the ordeal as a man and not as a monstrosity. Here is an account of the human "saint" as penned by Ralph Waldo Emerson, who should be beyond the reach of the shafts of the Royal Society of Saint George:—

> George, of Cappadocia, born at Epephania, in Cilicia, was a low parasite, who got a lucrative contract to supply the army with bacon. A rogue and informer, he got rich, and was forced to run from justice. He saved his money, embraced Arianism, collected a library, and got promoted by a faction to the episcopal throne of Alexandria. When Julian came, A.D. 361, George was dragged to prison. The prison was burst open by the mob, and George was lynched as he deserved. And this precious knave became in good time Saint George of England, patron of chivalry, emblem of victory and civility, and the pride of the best blood of the modern world.

There is no getting out of it! "Saint George," in either version, is one of the most complete shams from which ever soft-hearted and soft-headed folk sought to extract religious sentiment. His story may appear as true as the Gospels to the unlettered and unsoaped members of the Greek Church in the East of Europe, but what concern have decent folk in England with the infamous bacon-curer of Alexandria, or with the central figure in a solar myth? Every schoolboy should know that "St. George's" vogue came to England with the Crusades, though the legend was known long before. As a Protestant country, we do not need a patron-saint at all, and Catholic ecclesiastics must rub their hands with glee when they recall that a "saint" still figures on our gold coinage and banknotes.

Custom makes cowards of most folk, but it is no use pretending that the bulk of people in a civilized country can be made to care for a meaningless blend of classic myth and deceased Cappadocian. Why not throw over the whole farce? So far from recommending any citizen to wear an artificial rose in honour of a still more artificial saint, we suggest that it would be a kindness to strew the poppy of oblivion over the grave of the army-contractor of Alexandria. A cynic might liken the history of "England's soldier-saint" to a purple passage from the earlier books of the Bible, or a succulent page from the Newgate Calendar. The patron-saint of England, like so many Biblical heroes, is a sham, and there is an end of it.

MIMNERMUS.

His Real Followers.

ONE Sunday morning in June, I met Uncle Joe returning from church. He had been to a special service, to which he had been invited by the vicar, and at which the Mayor of the Borough, and the Aldermen (in their robes), and Councillors, and many of the Borough officials had promised to attend; and a further attraction was promised in the announcement that various Volunteer corps, and Boy Scouts with their bugle bands, would accompany the representatives of the municipal authorities. In the circumstances, I was not surprised to learn from Uncle Joe that a large congregation, composed largely of ladies and other sightseers, were present. I did not attend myself, as I found the attraction of a good band on Peckham Rye more to my taste.

"Well," I said to Uncle Joe, when we had exchanged the usual courtesies, "what sort of sermon did you have from the vicar?"

"Oh, very good," he replied; "commendably brief, but right to the point. The vicar said that this War in which we are now engaged must be a war to the finish. It will never do to let the enemy come up again and renew this terrible conflict. So, therefore, we must crush the enemy now, once and for ever."

"Yes," I responded, "I agree with that sentiment; but I do not quite understand how a reverend gentleman, a follower of 'the meek and lowly Jesus,' could talk in that way."

"Why not?"

"Because I do not consider the sentiments at all Christian-like; it does not seem to me to express the ideas embodied in the teachings of the 'meek and lowly Jesus.'"

"As I have told you before, that is where you are wrong," said Uncle Joe, with an air of authority. "You seem to think that Christianity consists in nothing more than the teachings of Jesus; but Christianity is a great deal more than that. We believe in the Old Testament as well as the New, and we go to war to-day in much the same spirit as the Children of Israel did thousands of years ago."

"Oh, but I thought that Jesus had come to alter that state of things—that he had come to bring a new dispensation—to establish a better and nobler kingdom on earth?"

"That is true," said Uncle Joe; "but you cannot establish such a kingdom on earth until the people are prepared for it."

"Quite so; and it seems to me that it will be a precious long time before this 'glorious kingdom' can be established, while human nature remains what it is."

"What do you mean?"

"Just this. Jesus, if he taught anything at all—that is, if the Jesus of the Gospels ever existed, which I very much doubt—his main teaching in regard to human conduct is what is called the doctrine of non-resistance. For example: 'If a man smite thee on the one cheek, turn unto him the other and let him smite that also; if a man takes your coat, give him your cloak,' and so on; and I mean to say that the only Christians who act up to that teaching are the despised and persecuted Conscientious Objectors, who not only refuse to fight for their country, but refuse to do any kind of labour that may be said to contribute towards the successful pursuit of the War."

"Ah, but I think that the Conscientious Objectors are wrong," exclaimed Uncle Joe, with some warmth, "and if all Christians acted up to that doctrine, the enemy would soon take possession of our land, and every one of us would speedily go under the iron heel of the worst tyranny that has afflicted human civilization for ages."

"Exactly. And so it comes to this: that the majority of Christians are courageously fighting against tyranny and oppression, not in obedience to the teachings of Jesus, but in direct opposition to them."

"No, not exactly that," said Uncle Joe. "As I told you before, Christianity is not such a narrow creed as you imagine. It takes the whole of the Bible as 'containing the word of God'; and if it finds anything in the Old Testament that favours warfare, and strenuous warfare at that, the Christian is as much at liberty to follow that teaching as he is any of the particular passages that you may find in any one of the Four Gospels."

"But is there not a passage in Luke that says: 'But those mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me'?" (Luke xix. 27).

"Yes. I think, however, if you will look closely into that passage, you will probably find that it is an interpolation. It is opposed to the whole tenor of the teachings of Jesus?"

"I suppose you admit that some of the passages in the New Testament are interpolations?"

"Oh, yes; I cheerfully admit that," said Uncle Joe. "Many of our most eminent scholars admit it also."

"Very well; what I maintain is that the main teaching of Jesus was that of 'turning the other cheek to the smiter.' But where is the Christian who does it? As I have said, only the poor 'conscientious objector,' who is often sent to goal by the Christian in authority for having the audacity to obey the behests of his master."

"And what of the passage: 'Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace but a sword'?"

"Yes; but finish the passage, please, and you will find that it had a purely domestic application. For the passage goes on: 'For I come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law, and a man's foes shall be they of his own household' (Matthew x. 34-36). In this case, I think, the sword was purely metaphorical."

"But you cannot deny," said Uncle Joe, "that the Christian soldier who fights not only for his own freedom but for that of small and oppressed nationalities is doing a noble work?"

"Oh, certainly; but he is fighting not as a Christian, and not in obedience to the teachings of Jesus, but as a human being who believes in liberty for his fellow-man and is prepared to sacrifice his life to attain it."

"Oh, I am glad you acknowledge that Christians do good sometimes."

"Neither I, nor any other Freethinker, would be stupid enough to deny that. But what I ask you is, What Christian, who is in the fighting line, acts up to the teaching of 'Resist not evil,' 'Love your enemies,' 'Bless them that curse you,' or 'Pray for them that despitefully use you?' I say, not one."

"But, my dear boy," said Uncle Joe, quite affectionately, "we cannot act up to all the teachings of Christianity at once. One at a time, I say, is enough for me, and the whole history of this country, and other Christian countries, is enough to show that Christians have never been deficient in fighting spirit, and have taken a leading part in some of the greatest wars in the history of the world."

"Which leads me to repeat that Christians have done so in direct opposition to the teachings of their Lord and Master. I am glad, however, they have done so, otherwise we, as a people, would have been wiped off the face of the earth. For the doctrine of non-resistance, carried to its logical conclusion, would mean not only the abolition of our Army and Navy, of our law courts, and police courts, our judges, and magistrates, but our police constables also, and this would inevitably lead to the villain riding rough shod over the virtuous, and to the masses being left a prey to revolution and anarchy."

By this time we had reached the door of Uncle Joe's house, and he had scarcely put the key into the keyhole, when Aunt Jane came forward to greet us.

"Good morning," she said to me; "hope you have had a good time?"

"Splendid," I replied. "The band was excellent—the harmony delightful."

"And the sermon—how was that?"

"Oh, quite to my taste," said Uncle Joe, cheerfully. "But it was open to criticism; and we have been discussing it all the way home."

"Come to any settled conclusion about it?"

"No," I replied. "We agree to differ—as usual."

"Oh, then, dinner is quite ready," said Aunt Jane.

"And, at all events, we shall have a better prospect of agreeing on the qualities of that," I said, "than on any sermon that was ever preached."

Acid Drops.

Earl Curzon's speech in the House of Lords the other day may be said to have advanced us a step nearer Thomas Paine's ideal of a League of Nations, although his lordship was not very enthusiastic about it. There are many difficulties in the way, but none that are insurmountable if only the nations concerned are in earnest, and mean to act honestly. But Freethinkers will not fail to note that the only thing for which Christian nations are able to effectively league together is war. When it comes to forming a League to prevent or abolish war that is a different thing. Was it Swift or Sydney Smith who said that most Christians had enough Christianity to enable them to hate each other heartily.

Another check has been given to Sabbatarian bigots. Some shopkeepers having been summoned for Sunday trading, Mr. Clem Edwards, M.P., made an application for a summons against James Bloer for aiding the printing of Sunday papers by purchasing on Monday a copy of South Wales Daily News, against Police Superintendent Williams for the same offence, and against the Chairman of the Bench for having milk delivered at his house during prohibited hours. The Magistrate said he had never known such an application in his experience, and adjourned it for consideration by a fuller bench. Nothing like giving these people a dose of their own medicine, besides making these Sunday laws stand out as the ridiculous things they are.

Every issue of the Dublin Gazette (bi-weekly, we think) contains at least three notices of charitable bequests, the major portion being for the purpose of bailing souls out of the purgatorial swamp. A late issue contains the following:—

> £1,000 to the R.C. Bishop of the diocese of Dromore, to apply the income for the support and maintenance of a resident Curate or Priest, with the obligation of having fifty masses said in Cabra Chapel each year for ten years after his decease, and twenty-five masses for each of the ten succeeding years for the intentions above mentioned.....Two fifth shares of his estate to the said Bishop, to be applied in having masses said at the above honorarium for the suffering souls in Purgatory.

Though this poor soul is being dragged with only 750 masses, it must be remembered that the cost to his relatives is £1 6s. 8d. per offering. Now, a somewhat similar article may be purchased at 2s. 6d.; so that, in the case in point, the chance of resuscitation may be magnified ten times. These bequests are common in Ireland; they excite no comment. When their absurdity is pointed out, a flush of rage suffuses the face; the features betray no gleam of wit.

The late Parish Priest of Ringsend, a very poor district outside Dublin, left about £22,000. He bequeathed it—no, no; not to his starving parishioners—to Saint Patrick's College, Maynooth. This seminary is one of the largest of its kind in existence, having at the present time about 750 crows. It is an exceedingly rich establishment, and, though it has a big Government grant, its regal splendour is firmly established in, and well maintained by, the piteous poverty of this poor little nation. It is the forge of the heaviest shackle in the world—the Roman dominion. Each stone in its walls, each acre within those walls, each fire in its grates, and each youth in its precincts, are shelter, land, warmth, and offspring grabbed from the growing structure of the nation, and set, a very mine, at its foundations. You people in England, do not sneer at your more unfortunate brethren in the sister isle; only remember. Remember! Remember that this little land is studded with spires, convents, monasteries, all in their thousands; with priests, nuns, brothers, monks, parsons, altar-boys, and the Devil knows what besides, in their tens and tens of thousands. Just remember—and consider.

Mr. Edward Clodd keeps a keen eye on the press nowadays, and frequently the columns of the daily papers are enlivened by bright letters from his pen. In a pointed attack on Spiritualism, he describes it as a "delusion" which is "as old as the hills." He adds: "Belief in the soul as a sort of etherealised matter, and in communion between the dead and the living, is wholly primitive, and what is pretentiously called 'new' is but the old animism 'writ large.'" Young Freethinkers might well emulate the example of this "unsubduable old Roman." Well-written letters to the press do much to dispel the darkness of superstition.

"The attitude of the Church has been the same in all wars," says Dr. Orchard. In other words, the Government religion has always dutifully echoed the views of the Government. And this is true whether the Church be Roman Catholic, Greek, Protestant, Lutheran, or any other of the many brands of Christianity.

The Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge is raising a fund for sending Prayer Books to soldiers. The prayers for fine weather might prove useful.

The indifference of Providence to sacred things is enough to make a saint swear. A churchyard in Aukendale, Upper Swaldale, has been washed away by the flooding of the river. And churchyards are "consecrated" ground.

Canon Lyttleton, preaching at St. Martin's Church, London, said he knew no one who believed in miracles who did not do so on the very soundest reason. On the Continent the clergy consider the gate-money a very sound reason.

Even theologians are moving, most of them in a circle, it is true, but one here and there dares to step out of the circle and go forward, bravely breaking lose from and leaving behind both Church and Bible. And yet, alas, that statement is only partially true, for no divine can advance entirely unencumbered, or wholly freed from the meshes of superstition. In reality, so-called progressive theology is the most irrational thing under the sun. The New Theologians proudly claim to follow the dictates of Reason; but at best they only form a limited liability company of Rationalists, while modern Rationalism knows them not.

The Rev. Arthur Pringle may be taken as a fair specimen of the members of that limited liability company. In an interesting article in the Christian World for June 27, he prides himself upon having outgrown and become independent of the letter of Scripture. He very truly points out "how constantly the tyranny of the text has degraded Scriptural exposition to verbal jugglery and special pleading." Then he quotes Newman's famous admission: "Every creed has texts in its favour, and again texts that run counter to it." Unfortunately for himself, Mr. Pringle ignores the fact that renouncing the letter of the Bible is to all intents and purposes tantamount to giving up the Bible itself, because when the letter has gone there is nothing left. But the most amusing and amazing thing of all is, that the reverend gentleman regards this deliverance from bondage to the Biblical letter as due to "the War and all that it has brought with it." Thus the War is at once of the Devil and God, the worst of curses and the greatest of blessings, the direst calamity and a transient boon!

What becomes of the Bible, then, when its letter has ceased to exercise its ancient dominion? At this point Mr. Pringle lets the cat out of the bag with a vengeance. On his own showing, the Bible is now just exactly what any man may choose to make of it—what in truth it has always been. The following is the way it is put by the writer of the article: "So passes the text—not from its stimulating and legitimate use by the wise preacher."

We are pleased to see that Coventry Freethinkers have been getting busy, and the Rev. J. R. Armitage, a "munitions area chaplain," has undertaken to set them right. His correction assumes the form of the reminder that everything that was "best in Europe and the world" had been "implanted or stimulated by Christianity." It taught the powerful to care for the oppressed; it gave woman her true place as the equal of man; it abolished slavery, and cared for the child and the prisoner, etc. We note that Mr. Armitage does not claim that Christianity invented the law of gravitation and created the solar system. From which we infer that Mr. Armitage is really a modest man.

The only drawback to the credibility of Mr. Armitage's statements are that the poor and the weak are still oppressed, and that this oppression is greater in Christian countries than elsewhere. Children are as badly treated in Christian countries as elsewhere, while Christian England only a century ago instituted the slaughter of little children in factories for pure gain; slavery was backed up by all the Churches just so long as it was possible for them to do; the position of woman was worse under Christian than under Pagan-Roman rule, and it was Freethinking men and women who led the way in the movement for the legal equality of the sexes. Finally, the movement for reform in the treatment of criminals was initiated by Beccava, an Atheist, and for years remained in the hands of Freethinkers. These are drawbacks to Mr. Armitage's assertions being accepted without examination, but we do not expect they will disturb his opinions.

There is a Pagan quality about a new book by Mr. A. Safroni-Middleton, entiled Wine-Dark Seas and Tropic Skies. Says the author: "I cannot help thinking that the world's religion should be inspired by the soul of laughter." This is a very far cry from the figure of the Man of Sorrows, surrounded by the horrors of calvary, and with the fires of hell in the background.

There is a "meenister" at Dumbarton who holds a medical degree, and who is away with the Army. Whether he is drawing pay as a doctor or as a chaplain we do not know; but, in either case, it is above starvation point. The Presbytery has now asked this gentleman to allow £200 per annum—presumably from his Church allowance—for payment of a "supply" at his church. The minister, Rev. Cameron Campbell, has declined, and the Presbytery now intends placing the facts of the case before the Procurator for guidance.

The Glasgow Presbytery is also in trouble. It seems that four ministers only had volunteered for service in the Army—we assume it means since their exemption under the new Act. One volunteered as Chaplain, and three for Y.M.C.A., on hut work. At Dumbarton there are eight ministers of military age, and all these have taken full advantage of their exemption. We do not see they are to blame. The Government decided the matter for them.

To Correspondents.

H. MAY.—A tax, ranging from one to three shillings per ton, was placed by Parliament upon all coal entering London for a period of forty-six years, to defray the cost of building St. Paul's and other City Churches. The present Bishop of London was made a Canon of St. Paul's in 1697 at a salary of £1,000 per year. The office was a sinecure. In the same year he became Suffragan Bishop of Stepney, and received another £1,000 per year. Soon after he referred to himself as "We working parsons."

T. S. (Salisbury).—You are not troubling us in sending the names of likely subscribers to this paper. On the contrary, you are doing us a favour. It is only by the co-operation of our readers that we are pulling through one of the worst periods in the history of the printing and newspaper world.

J. W. WHITE.—We have lively recollections of the old days at West Stanley, and if a hall can be secured shall be pleased to pay the district a visit during the autumn. There ought to be a strong Branch of the N.S.S. there. We may adopt your suggestion on the other matter later.

LIBRA (Glasgow).—Pleased to learn that your newsagent has increased the number of copies he takes—with your assistance. Mr. Walsh is right in saying the power to end war rests with mankind alone, only that leaves one wondering what use God is in the situation? Apparently God doesn't matter, which is exactly what we say.

H. J. (Manchester).—Sorry, want of space prevents the publication of your letter. We quite agree that Patho-psychical conditions underlies a great deal of religious phenomena, and have tried to prove that by a book now in the press.

R. H. ROSETTI.—Glad to hear you are still well. Isn't your leave nearly due?

A. HODGSON.—The Popes and their Church is issued by Messrs. Watts & Co., price 6s.

J. BURRELL.—Mr. Runciman is quite right in replying that an amendment dealing with religious education will not be moved during the passage of the Bill now before Parliament. The danger lies in a separate Bill that may be introduced when the present one is out of the way.

W. CUMMING (Glasgow).—Thanks for cuttings. Readers help us considerably in keeping us posted concerning local events. We are glad to have the appreciation of a fifteen years' reader of the Freethinker, and hope to meet you when we next visit Glasgow.

A. J. (Gateshead-on-Tyne).—We have no present intention of reprinting last week's "Views and Opinions" as a leaflet. But we intend adding to the "Pioneer Leaflets," which you say you have found "very effective" at an early date.

A. G. ROYSTON.—Pleased to hear you have induced the newsagent to display this paper at both Holyhead and Carnarvon. The result shows what determination will accomplish. We are obliged also for the pamphlet you enclose. It seems additional proof of chaos of uncertainty in which Christianity is at present.

E. COLLETT.—Please let us know so soon as anything definite is possible.

JACK BARTON.—Papers sent as requested. We are in hopes that the struggle will be less severe one day, meanwhile, we just "carry on." We note your suggestion of raising the price of the paper, but we are hoping to avoid that. After getting so far, it seems a pity not to go the whole distance.

J. HUDSON.—The opinion of a fellow-craftsman that our last issue was "a rattling good number" is welcome. Those behind the scenes can best appreciate all that is involved in producing a weekly paper single-handed.

T. DENNIS.—You are quite right in what you are doing. If anything is said by anyone who matters, let us know.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Save Your Papers.

WE hope our readers are bearing in mind the need we have for all their old papers, books, and magazines. We want as much as we can get, and as soon as we can get it. Send all you have in parcels of from fourteen pounds to one hundredweight to the Pioneer Press, 61, Farringdon Street, London, E.C. If the bundles are just tied round strongly with string it will be enough. They should be labelled "Scrap Paper," and can be sent carriage forward. We will send labels on request, or, if possible, sacks when they are preferred. But we must have all your old papers as soon as possible. If old ledgers—without covers, please—and other business documents are sent, we will see that they are properly destroyed. Remember that no parcel is too small to send. Full schedule prices will be paid.

Sugar Plums.

We publish this week a pamphlet, by Mr. H. G. Farmer, that will be of interest to most people, and will prove useful in controversy. The subject of Heresy in Art—the pamphlet in question—is the religious opinions of famous painters and musicians. Those who are familiar with Mr. Farmer's writings in these columns, will readily concede his right to speak on such a subject, and there are few who will fail to find Heresy in Art of interest. Of its use in controversy there can be no two opinions. The pamphlet is published at 3d., postage ½d. We venture to bespeak the widest circulation for a useful pamphlet.

Permission was given to form new Branches of the National Secular Society at Coventry and Maesteg at the Executive meeting on Thursday last, and forty-nine new members were admitted. More Branches are coming along, and we are expecting important developments in South Wales.

The Executive also settled the constitution of the Committee that is to consider the question of the Society's re-organization, and the Committee hopes to soon be at work. Meanwhile, individual members or Branches that have any suggestions to offer should forward them without delay to the General Secretary. These should be sent in not later than July 20.

We have in the press, and hope to publish shortly, a booklet by Mr. Cohen on Christianity and the Slave Trade. We think we can safely say this is the most thorough examination of the question that has yet been issued, and it contains a lengthy chapter on the relation of Christianity to labour in general. There will also be plates illustrating the famous old Liverpool slave-ship Brookes. The work will contain full references, and so will be useful for all purposes. We have other things in the press, which will be announced in due course.

One of the most outspoken of Freethinking poets during the latter part of the nineteenth century was Robert Buchanan. Many of our readers will remember the scathing indictment of Christianity contained in his two lengthy works—The Wandering Jew and The Devil's Case. The Pioneer Press has just secured a number of copies of Robert Buchanan, the Poet of Modern Revolt, by Mr. A. Stodart-Walker. The work does justice to Buchanan's heretical views, and is a handsome well-printed volume of over 300 pages. It was published at 6s. net, and is being offered at 2s. 6d., postage 6d. Those who wish to secure a copy should write at once.

From "Somewhere in France":—

> What do you say to a full discussion on "Ought We to Believe in Christianity?" within sound of the German guns? It all arose out of the parcels of pamphlets you have been sending out. The things were well distributed, and well read.

Many discussions followed, and at last a regular debate, arranged on the above-named subject. I took the negative, and I believe the majority agreed with me; I am sure a good number did. Don't forget it; Tommy is getting his eyes opened to more things than one in this War.....I am writing this because I think you will be pleased to know how much good your stuff is doing at the Front. Keep it up.

We mean to.

Here is a piece of advice, offered by the Church Times, which we heartily endorse:—

Do we not keep our opinions too much to ourselves? We need not preach, we need not drag them in, but ought we not to be much more ready to state our convictions clearly and on well-reasoned grounds, not aggressively, but without compromise? The need of clear thought is as great in England to-day as it was forty years ago when John Morley lamented our "inveterate national characteristic—a profound distrust, namely, of all general principles; a profound dislike both of much reference to them and of any disposition to invest them with practical authority; and a silent but most pertinacious measurement of all philosophic truth by political tests."

Every word here applies quite well to people of all shades of opinion. If we have an opinion, we should let the world know it—not offensively, or even aggressively, but let it be known. Opinions are robbed of their force by not finding expression. It is like keeping seeds in a cardboard box.

From France, Corporal Gatenhill writes:—

Many thanks for parcel of literature duly received. I am now assured of an amount of intellectual pleasure—so are my friends. The demand for literature of this description exceeds the supply out here. More men are interested in "the best of causes" than ever before.

Mr. R. Jenkins, newsagent, Nolton Street, Bridgend, Glam., will be pleased to attend to the literary wants of Freethinkers in his district.

A Search for the Soul.

IV.

ONE of the results which Sir Oliver Lodge's Man and the Universe appears to have upon the mind is a feeling akin to mystification, more especially with regard to the life, mind, and soul of man. Thus, Sir Oliver says:—

Life is not energy, but it is the director of energy and matter.....Mind determines. Life directs.....Mind and life dominate and transcend matter and energy (p. 60).

What about life? Can that be a nonentity which has built up particles of carbon and hydrogen and oxygen into the form of an oak, or an eagle, or a man? Is it something which is really nothing? Not so; nor is it so with intellect and consciousness and will, nor with memory and love and adoration, nor all the manifold activities which at present strangely interact with matter, and appeal to our bodily senses and terrestrial knowledge; they are not nothing, nor shall they ever vanish into nothingness or cease to be. They did not arise with us: they never did spring into being; they are as eternal as the Godhead itself, and in the eternal Being they shall endure for ever (p. 84).

In making the foregoing extracts I wished to see more clearly what Sir Oliver Lodge means by the "soul." On p. 73 that scientist says: "Life thus defined is a portion or partial aspect of what is often spoken of as soul." On p. 78, speaking of heredity, he says: "We call it life, we call it soul." On the same page he states that "the soul includes also feeling and intelligence and will, and is the storehouse of mental experience." According to these statements Life and Mind are immaterial entities, the two constituting the Soul, which lives and moves and has its being after the death of the body. Mind determines what shall be done; Life directs and sees it done. All this is pure mystification.

Let us now see whether these theories appear to be in harmony with facts. Life, as we know it in the human organism, is maintained chiefly by the activities of the organs connected with alimentation, the circulation of the blood, and respiration. The vitality manifested by the functioning of these organs is called "life." The continued existence of this vitality is dependent upon the organs exercising their respective functions effectively: we have no difficulty in thinking of it as something which animates the whole body; but the mental abstraction "life" is a mere name. Vitality can only be found in the concrete where it appears to be a property of living matter—of the cells of protoplasm.

When a child comes into the world it is born possessed of life, and this life is maintained up to an advanced age solely by means of food. After mastication and insalivation the food enters the stomach, where it is acted upon by the gastric juice; then it enters the small intestine where it comes under the action of the bile from the liver, the pancreatic juice from the pancreas, and the juice of the intestine itself, after which the nutritive part of the food is found to be a milk-like fluid called chyle, which, owing to the chemical action of the juices mentioned, can now be perceived by the microscope to contain the elements of blood. The chyle next enters the thoracic duct, where it mixes with a similar fluid called lymph, then it passes into the subclavian vein where it mingles with the blood. It is this blood circulating through every part of the body that forms the common source from which every organ or structure derives the new materials necessary for its growth, as well as for the repair of its waste products. We can thus understand how wounded men who had lost a large quantity of that vital fluid died simply from "loss of blood." We can also perceive the truth of the statement in Deuteronomy xii. 23—"For the blood is the life."

But where is the immaterial controller which guides and directs the formation and development of the body? No such controller appears to be in existence; the hereditary influence in the cells of the organs are able, apparently, to perform their respective functions unaided. The mind—which Sir Oliver says is a portion of the soul, and determines what is to be done—does not even know that there are such organs in the body, except through books on physiology. Prior to the year 1628, not a single mind or soul upon earth, including those of the medical profession, knew that the function of the heart was to propel the blood through the arteries and capillaries to every part of the body, whence it returned through capillaries and veins again to the heart, and so continued to circulate during the whole term of life. This fact—discovered by investigation and experiment—effected a complete revolution in medical science. The Mind or Soul has no innate knowledge of what takes place within the body; it has to ascertain from books what has been discovered in the past, and from this starting-point to work on towards fresh discoveries.

Again, we heard last summer that a whole family was taken ill through eating rhubarb leaves, and that the father, a clergyman, died. What was this man's soul doing that it allowed his body to be poisoned? The answer is that neither the Mind, which Sir Oliver says "determines," nor the Life, which he says "directs," nor the two combined—that is to say, the Soul—knows anything whatever about the kind of food best suited to the body. This knowledge had to be learnt by experience, and could only have been known, in the first instance, by tasting everything that appeared suitable and rejecting all that was found to be injurious. In the course of time the information thus gained became the common property of the race, and food-bearing plants were brought under cultivation, to which was added the flesh of domestic animals already known.

A London newspaper of August 16, 1917, quoted the Cologne Gazette as saying that one morning, a few days before, the portals of every restaurant in that city were found adorned with posters bearing the following culinary recipe:—

INSTRUCTIONS TO PUZZLED COOKS.

Take the butter card, stew it down with the meat card, and add the egg card. In a separate saucepan cook the potato and vegetable cards together, and, when done, add these to the stew. For desert, warm up the potato card, add the milk card, sweeten with the sugar card, and bake with it the bread and biscuit cards. Then wash your hands with the soap card, and wipe them dry with the table-linen voucher.

This paragraph, which I cut out as a sample of German humour, is a remarkable illustration of the way in which Sir Oliver speaks of certain abstractions of the mind as "entities" that will survive the body.

Next, Sir Oliver asks whether the abstraction which he calls "life" is "something which is really nothing." Yes, this is so. Apart from the ideas associated with it, Life, in the sense in which he employs it, is "really nothing." This he emphatically denies, and further declares that intellect, consciousness, will, memory, love, adoration, and other mental attributes "are not nothing, nor shall they ever vanish into nothingness or cease to be." And what is his reason for thinking that these manifestations of the activity of the brain will continue to exist after that organ has perished? The reason is that those activities "did not arise with us," but are "as eternal as the Godhead itself, and in the eternal Being they shall endure for ever."

A worse reason for believing in a manifest absurdity could scarcely be given. There was a long period in the history of this planet before animal life appeared, and another long period before the evolution of man was completed. We have not a scrap of evidence that would lead us to suppose that there are other beings in the universe possessed of similar mental faculties, or that, even if there were, such faculties could survive the destruction of the organism that produced them. Furthermore, the statement that these mental attributes are "as eternal as the Godhead itself" is pure nonsense. Sir Oliver surely ought to know that man created his gods in his own image, and, in doing so, ascribed to these deities all the qualities which he himself possessed, together with many more which his superstitious nature imagined. Among the latter are omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence, and other powers, which, from past ages down to the present day, have been attributed to a purely imaginary being, whose existence has never been proved nor even shown to be probable. Needless to say, this deity is unknown to science.

The Story of the Tea Plant.

III.

WHEN the Indian tea industry was in its infancy the official experts regarded the indigenous species of Assam as an inferior tea-producing plant. As a sequel, the Indian authorities imported tea-seed in enormous quantities from China, and distributed it throughout the Peninsula for the benefit of the planters. The Government proceeded on the erroneous assumption that the native Assam species was materially inferior to the Chinese varieties, with the result that the tea-gardens of India were planted with seed which yielded very poor quality tea. There seems to have been small excuse for this official misconception. It is now universally acknowledged that the Assam plant produces the finest flavoured teas, while Colonel Money, who enjoyed long experience as a planter, declares that even in the early days of Indian tea culture, many of the growers, brokers, and others were fully aware that the Assam species was the premier tea plant.

Save in very favoured sites, the Assam species does not flourish, as it is constitutionally a delicate plant. Hybrid bushes thrive best in hilly, or comparatively dry areas, owing to their greater hardiness. It is also true that many of the finest teas of the Indian hills have been grown from coarse China tea-seed. But in fairly favourable conditions of climate and soil, even in upland places, a good hybrid is to be preferred, as it produces generous flushings of high-grade tea.

The tea shrub is propagated from seed. This process necessitates a longer period of growth, but all attempts to plant gardens with cuttings have ended in dismal failure. This is chiefly attributable to the fact that the tea seed sends a long tap root into the soil to a considerable depth so as to supply the future plant with sufficient moisture in days of drought. The scientific selection of seed, generation after generation, from the most robust and blight-resisting bushes, has materially improved the plants. The tea blossom may be seen from July to October, and when the flower petals fall, and the seed is set, over a year elapses before the seed is ripe. The seed is enclosed in a thick capsule which may contain one seed only, or even three or four.

The young plants are reared in nurseries, and when ready for transplanting they are dug out, each seedling being removed with a ball of earth in which it was rooted in the nursery still clinging to it. It is essential to success that, when taken from the nursery to the garden, the seedling should be placed at the same depth in the earth which it occupied in the nursery soil. The tap root should run straight down into the ground, while the lateral roots should be spread out to secure free access to the soil. A fair percentage perish, but if, after a month or so, the shrub still betrays signs of life, it will probably recover. Even when the young plant sheds all its leaves and appears to be dead it is still alive. The plant is really preserving its existence by casting away its foliage. During this critical stage the plant discards its breathing organs—the leaves—while the whole of its energies are concentrated in developing its roots which penetrate the surrounding soil in every direction. This task done, tiny leaf buds appear and replace the fallen foliage. As Bald writes:—

> This is one of the remarkable illustrations of plant life, and of plant instinct for self-preservation. It is the more remarkable, because the tea plant is an evergreen, and this probably the only occasion in its life when it sheds its leaves all at once.

Seeds are very successfully grown in "pots" composed of clay, cow dung, and straw. When the seedlings are large enough for the garden, the "pot," with its contained plant, is buried on the spot where the new shrub is to grow. The "pot" is broken before it is placed in the earth where the rain soon destroys it. The seedling then continues its development without that delay of a month or more which invariably occurs when the plant is transplanted in the manner described in the preceding paragraph. Another advantage is that nearly all the seedlings develop into healthy shrubs.

In company with the fruit grower, the tea planter must patiently await the maturity of his garden before he gathers his harvest. Even in estates situated in the plains and in a climate conducive to speedy growth, the shrubs do not yield a full return until the sixth year. In the third year a half crop is harvested, and the yield increases annually until the maximum is reached. In upland regions the rate of growth is much slower, and planters may wait ten or twelve seasons before their bushes attain full yielding powers.

We can form no conception from farming experiences in Europe of the difficulties encountered in the Tropics in securing supplies of animal manure. Small quantities are usually available, but for the fertilization of a large tea estate these are hopelessly inadequate, while in most plantations even the refuse of the coolies' temporary abodes is rarely utilized, although it forms an excellent fertilizer. Where the temperature is high and the rainfall copious, the flora grows luxuriantly, and green plants are advantageously utilized as manure.

All plants of the leguminous order—those that bear their seeds in pods, such as our beans and peas—possess the property of promoting on their roots the growth of nitrogen-storing bacteria. The warts or nodules found on the living roots of leguminous plants are really colonies of bacteria which are ceaselessly engaged in extracting nitrogen from the air, which they transform into a substance essential to vegetable growth. In the course of a season these nodules decompose and give up their nitrates to the soil, from which it is eagerly absorbed by the neighbouring plants. Fresh nodules form on the young rootlets each year, but the older roots fail to produce them.

On progressive plantations leguminous trees are grown as fertilizers. One of these, the Siris tree, has proved itself the best fertilizer; and according to Bald and other authorities, the results obtained from the cultivation of this tree in a few years are positively astounding. When the Siris (Albizzia stipulata) grows near a tea estate, a large number of self-sown seedlings spring up in the gardens. The seed-pods of the Siris are wonderfully light, and strong winds will carry them for miles over the environing country before they fall to the earth. When the pods alight on moist soil they appear in profusion, but seldom seed themselves on stiff or arid earth. In these latter conditions, however, they may be cultivated, and the nitrogen with which their roots enrich the soil well rewards the planter for his trouble in planting the trees. This is certainly a most satisfactory method for maintaining the fertility of an estate, for its productive powers are secured at very small expense.

It has been urged that the Siris trees cast too much shade over the garden. But this is easily overcome by cutting away all branches that obstruct the light. These, again, when dug into the earth, or even if allowed to perish on the surface, will provide excellent manure.

The Siris is unnecessary on highly superior and well-watered soils, but on lands less opulent or liable to prolonged periods of drought the tree's importance as a fertilizer is immense. There are several other varieties of Siris available to the tea planter. Some serve to shield the gardens from gales. The dense evergreen leaves of the Dalbergia protect the tea bushes from furious hailstorms. A shrub which produces a profusion of flowers in the autumn—the magnificent Boga Medeloa—is another leguminous growth which thrives on inferior soil where the Siris languishes. The Medeloa grows rapidly, and the nodules formed on its roots furnish an early and sumptuous supply of nutriment to the tea plants. Annual crops are also extensively cultivated as green fertilizers. After a given period of growth, these green crops are dug into the soil, with signal success. Indeed, Dr. Mann estimates that in Assam, in normal seasons and with an average growth, that the digging in of green crops will produce an increase of three-quarters of a maund, about sixty pounds of high quality tea, per acre. The benefits thus obtained last through a couple of seasons, and then it becomes necessary to repeat the process.

RELIGION IN THE ARMY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Comley, is, I am afraid, a bit astray in his remarks regarding religion in the Army. I am stationed in a camp where there is every facility for the religiously inclined, and all I can say is that the great majority of the soldiers don't care two straws about religion. On all sides there is grumbling and resentment when Church Parade comes, and I reckon that if the Parade were voluntary, ten out of every hundred would only attend. If there be a concert, or any other form of amusement, every available man is there. Religious services have to be bolstered up with advertisements that such and such a chaplain from Egypt or Palestine is coming, who will have magic-lantern slides to show; and all this is done to try and persuade Tommy to come to hear the "Word of God." Tommy's no fool; all he does is to smile, and very often remarks, "they won't catch me." I am trying to find religion exemplified in the Army in some tangible shape, but its like sugar—very scarce. When I say religion, I mean the religion of Christians. There are numbers of Freethinkers; in my hut I have the company of two who are of the militant stamp, who read the Freethinker, the works of Ingersoll, Paine, Bradlaugh, and other champions of the great cause of Freethought. The religion of the open mind is being felt in the Army as elsewhere, and the "Grand Old Book" is having a peaceful slumber in realms of dust and neglect. Certainly the Lord is not looking very much after his own; if he did, one wouldn't meet so many "infidels" who are turning his elect from the worship of his crucified Son. However, the fact is, Christianity has been weighed in the balance and found wanting; and as Tommy is not entirely a fool, he treats it as an exploded fable that has lived too long and cannot die too soon.

A CORP.

SIR,—I cannot let pass the observations of "F. Comley" on the above subject (in your issue of June 23) without mentioning my own experience in this direction during an equal period of service. I have found that the majority of the men are indifferent. This mental attitude towards Christianity and supernatural religion in general appears to have its origin in the fact that they have a vague feeling there is a fundamental fallacy underlying these beliefs, which has been instilled into them from childhood; while, on the other hand, they have never been brought into intimate contact with Rationalistic views. So far as they have any opinions regarding the latter, they are under the impression that the Rationalists' teachings are merely destructive, and have nothing to offer in return as a basis of life but loose living and a contempt for all the higher ethical principles. During the latter half of 1916 and the following year, I was in British and German East Africa (whence I was invalided with malaria), and, as compulsory Church Parades were very rare, one had a better opportunity for seeing what hold religion had among men amid strange surroundings which offered little in the way of entertainment to divert men in their leisure moments.

At a service I attended in Nairobi, in June last year, at a temporary church which stood only fifty yards from a large general hospital, whose patients consisted largely of convalescent malaria and dysentery cases, and at an equal distance from a repair depot where a large staff was employed, the total congregation in the evening numbered twenty-eight—considerably less than one per cent. of men physically able to attend, and who were within a minute's walk of the place. At Mombasa, which at that time was the coastal base, I visited the cathedral one Sunday evening a few months previously, and found, interspersed with a sprinkling of white residents and natives, less than a score of men in khaki. I might multiply instances of this kind with reference to such places as Dar-es-Salaam and Kilwa, and later on Cape Town, and also depots in England, but I think I have written sufficient to show that we who differ from Mr. Comley often do know of what we are speaking in this respect.

GHOSTS' CLOTHES.

SIR,—"Abracadabra" "leaves the question for Spiritists to answer." I am a Spiritist, though not a Spiritualist, so I answer.

Where did the ghost get his clothes? Forty years ago my father used to ask that same question as a poser for ghost-believers; but even as a boy of ten I wondered where the difficulty was. If the ghost can once cross the barrier between what does not reflect light and what does, surely one impression on the retina is as easy as another—a waistcoat as easy as a face. Materialists mostly believe in æther; I do not know how they can, for none of the five senses can reach it; but still they do believe in it. How, then, do they see anything absurd in the hypothesis that both the ghost or spook, and his clothes, are of æther made visible by an act of will much as a muscle is contracted?

"Abracadabra" says æther is "many million times thinner than air." So far as I have studied the mathematical theorems, which form our only track to any mental picture of the æther, it is not comparable with air or any other gas, but is a very abnormal kind of liquid or solid, probably more solid than solids, because not atomic in structure. Prof. Larmer's article in the Encyc. Brit. is accessible and fairly intelligible.

REPORT OF EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON JUNE 27.

The President, Mr. C. Cohen, in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Braddock, Davidson, Eager, Gorniot, Heaford, Leat, Neate, Nearey, Palmer, Roger, Spence, Thurlow, Wood; Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, Miss Pitcher, Mrs. Rolf, and the Secretary.

Minutes of the previous meeting read.

The following officials were elected:—General Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance; Monthly Auditors: Messrs. Leat and Samuels; Benevolent Fund Committee; Messrs. Leat, Samuels, Roger, Wood, and Miss Kough.

The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were admitted for Battersea, Bethnal Green, Coventry, Goldthorpe, Maesteg, Manchester, Newcastle, Portsmouth, Sheffield, South London, Southampton, Swansea, West Ham, and the Parent Society—forty-nine in all.

Applications were received and granted for the re-formation of Branches at Coventry and Maesteg.

The resolution passed at the Conference concerning Mr. Cohen's Scheme for Reorganization, which was to the effect that a Committee should be formed consisting of members elected by the three oldest London and four oldest Provincial Branches, each of these Branches to nominate one member, who must have had at least three years' membership of the Society; the place of meeting to be subsequently decided upon; the results of the labours of this Committee to be printed and circulated; and a special Conference of all Branches to be convened in a central position to fully discuss and finally endorse or reject the scheme of reorganization recommended, was considered; and it having been decided that the oldest continuous London Branches were Bethnal Green, North London, and South London (formerly Camberwell), and in the provinces Birmingham, Glasgow, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and South Shields, it was resolved to invite these Branches to elect their representatives to attend a meeting to be held in London on suggested dates.

It was further agreed that in order to facilitate the business of this Special Committee, a Sub-Committee be appointed to arrange all resolutions and suggestions sent in for its consideration.

Other matters remitted from the Conference were adjourned till the next meeting. All members of the Society are invited to send in such suggestions as they may consider helpful towards the scheme for reorganization. These will have the careful consideration of the Committee, and should reach me not later than July 20.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

A Great Anniversary.

This week's issue of the Freethinker bears a date that is among the most important—if not the most important in history of modern Europe. It is the anniversary of the fall of the Bastille, a building which stood in Paris—but to the whole of France was a symbol of privilege, extortion, and wrong. The taking of the Bastille was not a great event in itself. It was defended by only a handful of old soldiers with but little in the shape of armament. But the dramatic sense of the French people saw it for what it was—the symbol of the death of autocracy in France, the birth of the people as a recognizable and recognized force in social and political life, and has ever since celebrated it as the National Fete Day of France. Other Governments dreaded its influence, as well they might. British Conservatism and British religion for long loved to depict the revolution as an orgy of bloodshed and a carnival of obscenity. Such it still remains to those who draw their philosophy from Christian tracts and their history from The Scarlet Pimpernel. To saner people the revolution of 1789 stands out as one of the most magnificent expressions of the human spirit in all history.

Pre-Revolutionary France.

What was France before the Revolution? It was a nation of serfs, of a people without power, governed by a class that ruled in the name of privilege. All political power was centralized in the King's Council at Versailles. The nobles were a distinct class in the State, and all born noble remained noble, each administering justice on his own estate. The nobles and bishops—for the bishops ranked as nobles—possessed the exclusive rights of fishing and hunting. They could order marriage between the children of their serfs, and they possessed the infamous right to demand the wife of the peasant for the first twenty-four hours after marriage. For ordinary criminal offences there was torture before trial, and mutilation afterwards, without the protection of any public statement of offences committed. For religious offences there was loss of eyes, tongue, or limbs, breaking on the wheel, or burning alive. Lettres de Cachet—a simple order signed by the king authorizing imprisonment—were numerous. They were frequently issued with the signature, and all else blank. In forty years 45,000 of these warrants were issued. Just before the Revolution the taxation of the country stood at sixty millions, not more than half of which was spent on the public service. And nearly all the taxes were paid by the non-privileged classes. The theory was that the nobles defended the State with their swords, the priests by their prayers. Therefore, they paid a "non-collectible" tax—in other words—what they pleased. The Church possessed a revenue of £8,750,000, which supported about 130,000 priests and their establishments. The Archbishop of Cambria was the lord of 75,000 people. The Archbishop of Toulouse, beside his ministerial salary, received £54,000, of Rouen £20,000. The Bishop of Troyes received penitents in confessionals lined with white satin. The Church owned nearly a fourth of the land. No wonder the Churches and the aristocracies of other countries were afraid of the influence of the Revolution! Revolutions are apt to become epidemic.

A People's Wrongs.

The people sweated, the Church preyed, the nobles pillaged. The tax-gatherer was everywhere. There were taxes on bridges, paths, fairs, markets, foods, clothing. After the King came the Lords, after the Lords the Church. Even Alison points out that if the produce of an acre of land equalled £3 2s. 7d., the King took £1 18s. 4d., the lord, or bishop, 18s., the peasant received 5s. And here are a few reports from various sources that will give some idea of the state of the people. In 1662, 300,000 people were reported starving in the Champagne; 1675, Colbert, the Minister of Finance, reports that in one province the people had been living on roots and grasses; 1694, "Your subjects, sire, are dying of hunger"; 1707, "Two millions of the people are starving." In two months, in 1753, 800 people died of want in Paris. Nothing can exceed the horror of the picture drawn by Arthur Young in his travels through France. "It reminds me," he said, "of the misery of Ireland." And this with a king drawing eight millions annually, a nobility thirty millions, and the Church another eight millions. If ever revolution was justified anywhere it was in France in 1789. And if ever the influence of a revolution brought benefit elsewhere it was that one. During this past four years thousands of Englishmen have learned to appreciate France, who never appreciated it before. It would be well if these would trace out the fructifying influences of the Revolution on the rest of Europe.

The Power of Ideas.

For that Revolution did really stand for an idea. The want and misery of the people only gave the idea visible form. Church and Government saw this well enough, and for nearly a hundred years before the Revolution actually broke out were engaged in trying to suppress the growth of ideas they saw were fatal to their rule. Men wrote, and the Government suppressed. Thus, several of Diderot's works were suppressed, and the author imprisoned. Voltaire suffered the same fate for writing history. Helvetius wrote on the mind; the book was burned. De Lolme wrote on the British Constitution; book burned. Buffon wrote on geology; his book was burned as heretical, and the author forced to recant. In 1775 the Government, by a sort of a Defence of the Realm Act, decreed that "All who wrote books that would disturb the peace of the realm would be punished with death." And only nine years before the Revolution broke out, the Government proposed abolishing all private presses and setting up a Government press, under the control of the magistrates. But ideas are not killed in this way. There is only one sure way of killing an idea, and that is to disprove it, and so provide room for a better one to develop. It was long the habit of English Christians to hold up the French Revolution as a bugbear to frighten people away from Freethought. It is one of the glories of Freethought that it was chiefly instrumental in lifting the French people out of the bog of misery in which they were plunged.

The Birth of a New Order.

Many eminent men—Kant in Germany, Wordsworth in England, and Paine—recognized at once in the Revolution more than the outbreak of a hungry and ill-used people. They saw it was the close of an old era, and the opening of a new one pregnant with great possibilities. Excesses there were—but these came later, and were as nothing compared to the centuries of wrong that had preceded them. The Revolution was more than French; it was European. Fight as some might against it, the ideas and principles of the Revolution gained ground everywhere. It entirely swept away the notion that government existed in virtue of privilege or by divine command, and made common the idea that government existed only by the will of the people and for the benefit of the people. It cleared France of its feudal land laws, and left the cultivator really master of his own land and of the products of his labour. It gave France a code of laws which, in spite of faults, remains the best model for a code in Europe. It taught that popular and complete education, the upkeep of hospitals, art galleries, asylums, museums, were all belonging to the essential duties of an enlightened Government. It preached Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, and it believed in them. Even to-day there is a greater moral equality in France than in any other country in Europe. And wherever the French Armies went, they carried these ideas among the nations. It is not, then, for nothing that France holds July 14, the anniversary of the fall of the Bastille, as its national day. When that fell, the old order fell in France, and its fall reverberated throughout the world. And if to-day privilege is less blatant in its claims, vested interests less arrogant in their pretensions, and the will of the people more potent in its expressions, we have largely to thank the men and women who gave to the world the soul-stirring Revolution of 1789.

Side-Lights.

THERE are many extremely familiar facts in human life which, for various reasons, are practically ignored, and whose real significance is, on that account, scarcely ever discerned. Their constant recurrence throughout the ages has blinded the mind to their momentous importance. This is specially true of a number of religious facts with which we come into well-nigh daily contact. It may not be that in this connection familiarity breeds contempt, but it is undoubtedly responsible for considerable neglect of much highly valuable evidence as to the nature and utility of religion. For example, nothing is more common, in Christian circles, than the insistence upon the need of systematic instruction in religious matters. In the Church Times for June 28 a paragraph in the Summary is devoted to this subject. It says:—

> About a year ago an experiment was tried in Southwark diocese with the object of instructing people in the faith. For this purpose a diocesan committee opened two Church Tutorial Classes, and the results of their first year's work are said to be most encouraging. So good a plan as this ought not to be confined to one diocese: it is worthy of adoption generally. We are glad to call attention to the representative meeting which was held last week at King's College, London, with the Bishop of Oxford in the chair, to discuss the question of establishing Church Tutorial Classes throughout the other dioceses.....His lordship advocated the method of the Workers' Educational Association, which brings people together to listen and discuss, with a view to studying the intellectual grounds of social organization. The same thing, he remarked, could be done in regard to the intellectual grounds of religion. In view of the pathetic ignorance of the ordinary layman and laywoman, coupled sometimes with a sincere desire to learn if only a teacher could be found, something ought to be done at once, and the proposed Tutorial Classes would seem to offer the very opportunity for instruction that is so desired.

Nothing could be more profoundly symptomatic than the curious information suggestively brought to our notice in that extract. The underlying fact is that Christianity has been in the world for nineteen centuries. Then comes a second fact, that the Church is in its very nature a teaching institution. The purpose of all its ministrations is to instruct its members in the doctrines of religion. Fact number three is that the Church, so soon as it came to power, abolished Secular Education. All schools became its handmaids, and all education was saturated with religion. All religious sects are agreed, at the present time, that religion must be taught in all day-schools, because otherwise it would certainly come to naught. We are now face to face with a fourth fact, which is that for nearly a hundred and fifty years there has been in existence an institution whose sole object is to impart religious instruction. It is eminently noteworthy that multitudes of parents who never darken church or chapel doors regularly send their children to Sunday-school. Thus in one way or another, directly or indirectly, Christianity makes its appeal to all alike within the bounds of Christendom, and so the facts just mentioned are of prime importance. And yet the Bishop of Oxford speaks of "the pathetic ignorance of the ordinary layman and laywoman." Of course, his lordship means ignorance of even the very rudiments of the Christian creed.

Dr. Gore is, theoretically, to the very core of his being a Supernaturalist. He has full confidence in the omnipotent and omnipresent love of God, in the all-conquering, sin-annihilating grace of Christ, and in the sanctifying power of the Holy Ghost. In his sermons he often dwells with moving, melting eloquence upon the transforming efficacy of the Gospel, as well as on the infinite nearness of the Divine Being to every human soul. Beautiful beyond compare is that theory, and the only fault one can find with it is that it completely breaks down in practice. Here, as in many other connections, theory and practice are not on speaking terms with each other. Practically, his lordship publicly pins his faith in machinery. He has no patience whatever with the policy of Secular Education, but advocates, in season and out of season, the preservation of all Government schools as mills to grind Christian doctrines for consumption by youthful minds. To his machinery there is no end. Of course, behind, in, and through all the machinery works God—Father, Son, and Spirit; but apart from the machinery, even the Holy Trinity can apparently do nothing. The deplorable inefficiency of the machinery hitherto is abundantly attested by "the pathetic ignorance of the ordinary layman and laywoman" in this nineteen hundred and eighteenth year of our Lord. Deeply sensible of this lamentable fact, his lordship of Oxford is all eagerness to set another machine in operation in all British dioceses. We can confidently assure him beforehand that Church Tutorial Classes will ere long be as conspicuous failures as all other ecclesiastical machines have been.

As the sweet hymnologist, Isaac Watts, puts it:—

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

That is to say, God has tied himself down absolutely to natural law on the one hand, and to the Church on the other. He cannot even interfere with the weather, except through Nature, nor save a soul, except through the Church. He is so limited as to the extent and degree of his action that there is not a single shred of evidence that he acts at all. Neither the physicist nor the biologist can hit the trail of his activity at any point; and psychology also is now developing fast into an exact science. The tendency of every science is to eliminate Divine agency from the conduct of the Universe, and of every theology to limit it in the sphere of the Church. In theory, God may have direct dealings with every human being, but in practice he works exclusively through the Church, which is a purely human machine. When asked why God does not exert himself more effectually to secure the welfare of the world, the answer the divines generally give is that he cannot transcend the capacities of his instrument, which is only a polite way of bowing him out of the very organization which is theoretically of his own founding.

Christianity has always been hopelessly handicapped ever since it entered upon the stage of human history, by the irrational claims made on its behalf on the one side, and by the nature of its achievements on the other. It has not done what it originally promised to do, and it has actually accomplished what its early founders would have looked upon with heart-breaking disappointment and burning shame. In the twentieth century Christianity is the worst of all anachronisms; and God is dishonoured most by those whose profession it is to defend him. During the last four years, in particular, the divines have made him look so ridiculous that thoughtful people can do no other than give formal expression to their long-cherished unbelief both in him and his Church. As a matter of fact, the War has so completely puzzled the theologians that in the attempt to explain it in the light of God, or God in its light, most of them have entirely lost their heads, and, as a consequence, the Church is visibly languishing.

J. T. Lloyd.

A Fragment.

I think I saw you at St. Paul's last night:
The Bishop really was quite at his best.
There is no doubt that what he says is right,
He puts his congregation to the test.
And didn't you enjoy the Anthem, dear?
Those Choir boys' voices always sound so clear.....
The War drags on—and Peace seems far away.
I had a Post Card last week from my son.
And Freddie went to Aldershot to-day,
To see if something really can't be done
To get commissioned in the R.F.A.
It's better food, you know, and higher pay.

Arthur F. Thorn.

Shelley's Masterpiece.

Sun-treader, life and light be thine for ever!
—Robert Browning.

O heart whose beating blood was running song,
O sole thing sweeter than thine own songs were,
Help us for thy free love's sake to be free,
True for thy truth's sake, for thy strength's sake strong,
Till very liberty makes clear and fair
The nursing earth as the sepulchral sea. —Swinburne.

It is related of Robert Browning that, as a young man, he one day passed a bookstall, and saw a volume advertised as "Mr. Shelley's Atheistical Poems, scarce." Badly printed, shamefully mutilated, these discarded blossoms touched young Browning to new emotions. This contact with the dead singer was the dawn of a new life to the clever lad. From that time Browning's poetic production began. This result was not surprising. Shelley is one of our greatest poets. To him song was natural speech. With a great outlay of labour, special education, and careful selection of circumstances, many have purchased their poetic rights as the chief captain bought the name of Roman, but Shelley was poet born. Many of his contemporaries who overshadowed him whilst he was living have almost faded into mere names, but Shelley has a message for generations unborn.

Shelley sang of a golden age. Long will it be ere the time when men "shall not learn war any more," or "live and move harmonious as the sacred stars above"; long ere the human countenance so radiates with intelligence and love that the air around it shall be "bright as the air around a star." Society was perfectly agreed that such ideas were but a mad illusion. And society denounced him accordingly, and fined and imprisoned the men and women who sold the poet's Queen Mab. Florence to the living Dante was not more cruelly unjust than England to the living Shelley. Not until thirty years after the English poet's death was his poetic glory widely acknowledged, and even at the Centenary Celebration at Horsham most of the speakers referred discreetly to Shelley's Freethought and Democratic opinions, and emphasized his claims on the Sussex county families.

Shelley's subjects were not Hours of Idleness nor the amours of Don Juan, but the perfectability of human nature. It is the alpha and omega of his poetry. In the splendid rhetoric of Queen Mab, in the nobler music of the Revolt of Islam, in his masterpiece, Prometheus Unbound, its expression glows with the solemn and majestic inspiration of prophecy. And Shelley meant every word that he wrote. Shortly before his own untimely end, he said to his friend Trelawny, "I am ninety," meaning he had lived and felt so intensely that he felt older than his years. Nor was it an idle boast, for he was himself the Julian of his poem:—

Me, who am as a nerve o'er which do creep
The else unfelt oppressions of this earth.

Shelley lived like a Spartan. A hunk of bread and a little fruit served him for a meal. "Mary, have I dined?" he once asked his wife. His income was spent on the poor, on struggling men of genius, and on necessitous friends. To help the needy and to relieve the sick seemed to him a simple duty, which he carried out cheerfully. He inquired personally into the circumstances of his charities, visited the sick in their homes, and kept a list of poor persons whom he assisted. At Marlow he suffered from acute ophthalmia, contracted whilst visiting the afflicted lace-makers in their cottages. So practical was he that he even went to the length of attending a London hospital in order to acquire medical knowledge that should prove of service to the sick he visited.

Because of Shelley's Atheism society gave the poet a bad name, and would gladly have imprisoned him, as it actually imprisoned the men and women who sold his Queen Mab, which was not the juvenile work that orthodox critics pretend. During the last years of his life, when his intellect was mature, Shelley told Trelawny that the matter of that poem was good; it was only the treatment that was immature. Shelley's masterpiece, Prometheus Unbound, written in the meridian of his splendid genius, deals with emancipate Humanity no less than the earlier work. The glorious speech which ends the third act describes "thrones, altars, judgment seats, and prisons," as parts of one gigantic system of misrule, and pictures man "sceptreless, free, uncircumscribed," and only hampered by "chance, and death, and mutability" from oversoaring.

> The loftiest star of unascended heaven,
> Pinnacled dim in the intense inane.

The poet springs from the earth like his own skylark. And the same magnificent idea finds expression at the close of the fifth act:—

> To suffer woes which Hope thinks infinite;
> To forgive wrongs darker than death or night;
> To defy Power, which seems omnipotent;
> To love, and bear; to hope till Hope creates
> From its own wreck the thing it contemplates;
> Neither to change, nor falter, nor repent;
> This, like thy glory, Titan! is to be > Good, great and joyous, beautiful and free;
> This is alone Life, Joy, Empire, and Victory!

This is the keynote of this masterpiece. "Prometheus," said Shelley himself, "is my favourite poem. It is, in my judgment, of a higher character than anything I have yet attempted. It is original, and cost me severe mental labor." He was right. His picture of emancipated humanity is noble and inspiring in its scope and significance, and grandly conceived. It is thronged with shapes of the utmost majesty and loveliness, and is full of swift and thrilling melody. It is the finest triumph of Shelley's lyrical genius, and one of the glories of a thousand years of English literature.

What Shelley might have been we cannot conceive. At the age of thirty he was drowned in the sea he so loved. His ashes rest beneath the walls of Rome, and "Cor Cordium" ("Heart of Hearts") chiselled on his tomb well says what all who love Liberty feel when they think of this Atheist-poet who gave his life to Humanity, and whose splendid genius was as free as an eagle above the clouds with outstretched wings.

MIMNERMUS.

Writers and Readers.

LIKE poverty, war makes us acquainted with strange bedfellows. Or, to vary the metaphor, it is a fire over which is brought to boiling point the mixture of virtue and vice, passion and prejudice, that makes up our average human nature, the impurities coming to the top in an unsightly and malodorous scum. It has forced up the execrable food-fakers and the shamelessly cynical unconscientious objectors. It has given us the water-cranks who shout "Traitor!" and "Pro-German!" at us because we refuse to clog our systems with cocoa, as if anything but dulness could be the result of such a muddy beverage. It has sanctified that erstwhile candid Pagan, Mr. Bottomley, who has now forsaken Newmarket for the New Jerusalem, and put most of his money on the Lamb of God. It has given us women-novelists in the last stages of erotomania, who debauch the young mind with fiction compared to which Balzac's Droll Stories are innocence itself. It has also given us prurient old maids and parsons, nosing about among the garbage of sexual diseases, and a stupid dramatic censor who removes the ban from Ibsen's Ghosts, and thoughtfully permits the adult-in-the-street to see Damaged Goods, a pamphlet in the Shaw manner, as dull as it is inconclusive. But, unfortunately, these are not the worst elements of civilization brought to the surface by the present War: the amazing Billing case has made it clear not only that one of the chosen representatives of the people may be a fool, but also that thousands of men in other respects intelligent enough are thrown off their balance by hysterical claptrap. What a spectacle of British ignorance and hypocrisy, naked and unashamed, to put before the unprejudiced and intelligent neutral!

I understand that Mr. Chesterton, from whom some of us expected better things, is vastly delighted with the amazing verdict, not because he thinks it the right one, but partly because it went against Mr. Grein, who had the bad taste to be born of Hebrew parents, and partly because it was a slap in the face for our naughty artistic aristocrats. It was the voice of that virtuous person, the average sensual man, reproving blackguardism in high places; in fine, the verdict was democratic. Certainly it was democratic; but in the worst sense of the word. The uneducated mob, in the person of twelve honest and patriotic burgesses, decide that the cultured aristocrats must be moral perverts, since they prefer Wilde to Sir Henry Arthur Jones; the wicked artist to the virtuous literary bagman. But what in the name of common sense and common honesty have Wilde's nasty propensities to do with his art? If I were setting up for a moral censor—a part I have always disliked because it implies a priggish superiority—I should not be slow to blame him for his evil deeds, and I should try to strike a balance between what I found good and bad in him. But for the life of me I cannot see how I am to set his shortcomings as a man—as a social unit—over against his virtues as an artist. Surely there is no common measure. I challenge anyone to point out the faintest trace of moral depravity in the radiantly witty farce, The Importance of Being Earnest, in the sane paradoxes of Intentions, or in the finest of modern ballads, The Ballad of Reading Gaol. Blinded with reactionary prejudice, you may have made up your mind to loathe Wilde and all the things he stood for. That is your loss; you wilfully deprive yourself of an exquisite æsthetic pleasure because you are so foolish as to confuse two things which have nothing in common. You depreciate an artist's work because you know him to have been a bad citizen, an unkind husband, or a neglectful parent. But are you justified? Do you really find less magic in the verse of Coleridge, or a poorer quality in the rhetoric of De Quincey, when you know that they were but poor creatures from a moral standpoint? If we reverse the proposition, we see the absurdity of moral criterion of art. The ethically estimable Southey was a greater poet than Byron, and his prose finer than Lamb's, who wanted the virtues of the orthodox Tory Christian. But what place has Southey now in English letters? None at all. His works died with him, or perhaps before him. It is the characteristic of great creative art that is immortal; it is what is good in man bursting into flower—the flower of the mind. Art is its own justification; it is beyond good and evil.

In the belief that we are thereby helping to crush Prussian militarism we have, without undue grumbling, done many things which, at other times, we should have thought foolish and servile. The assumption seems to be that we are not likely to resent any form of interference which is supposed to be good for us. And, now, at the bidding of Messrs. Billing & Bottomley, it would appear that the placemen who run the country will try to force us for the good of our moral health to buy nothing more dangerous than the fiction of Miss Corelli and the poetry of Sir Henry Newbolt. Very soon no patriotic and self-respecting bookseller will stock the works of Mr. Hardy, Mr. George Moore, Mr. Bennett, and the soul-corrupting Wilde. They have really been at a discount with freedom of thought and expression since the memorable summer of 1914. An instructive thing happened to a friend of mine a day or two ago. He happened to visit the Leicester Lounge when the "loungers" were discussing the Billing verdict, and was foolish enough to defend Salome. Thereupon an excited gentleman made an obscure reference to those who give their nights and days to wallowing in Kraft-Ebbing, and suggested that my friend's name would be found among the notorious 47,000. Another good citizen thought that my friend's defence of Wilde was a public insult to a young lady known as Dora, who, by the way, seems a very touchy flapper. However, the lesson is not lost on my friend. He now takes care to hide his admiration of a poet's work when the characters portrayed are not nice, for fear of upsetting the delicate moral balance of people who take their ethical principles from Mr. Bottomley and Lord Alfred Douglas.

Let us look for a moment at Salome. It was written at Torquay in the winter of 1891-2. It was composed in French prose, and was not intended for the stage. It was not written for Sarah Bernhardt. It was suggested, we are told, by a series of pictures by Gustave Moreau illustrating the subject. Wilde owed little or nothing to Flaubert's short story Herodias, although he got some of his material from that writer's Temptation of Saint Anthony. His debt, however, is greater to Holy Writ, which is common property; and, in spite of Mr. Justice Darling, Wilde is not a more bare-faced plagiarist than Shakespeare, who boldly transferred to his own account other people's ideas and phrases. The simple syntax of Salome is, of course, that of Maeterlinck, and the form of the dialogue is borrowed from a writer of European reputation—the great Ollendorf—to whom the Belgian dramatist is equally indebted. It is curious that the finest image in the play comes from a speech by John Bright.

Salome was shown to Madame Bernhardt in 1892 when she was running a London season at the Palace Theatre. Preparations were made to produce the play; it was even rehearsed; but the Censor refused a licence, not because it was immoral, but because it brought Scriptural characters on the stage. It was produced privately for subscribers, but with no great success. The critics fell foul of it, one of them describing it as "the debased language of decadence," a passage literally transferred from Holy Writ. The English version, published in 1894, was illustrated by Beardsley in a set of drawings that was a satirical comment on the play and the writer. They are frankly pornographic, and are sufficient to account for the perverse immorality generally, if stupidly, associated with the play. In 1901, Salome was played for the first time in Berlin, and ran for two hundred nights. It became a part of the repertory of the German stage. Strauss' operatic setting was produced at Dresden in 1905, and some German critics were no more intelligent than Mr. Billing. They openly insulted both the composer and the singer in the best Clement Scott manner. This should commend them to Mr. Bottomley, who seems to think that there are no German Philistines. I am told that, exclusive of the French texts, there are forty different translations and versions. These include German (ten), Czech, Dutch, Greek, Italian, Magyar, Polish, Russian, Spanish, Swedish, and Yiddish versions, in all of which languages it is performed.

Surely the wiser course for Mr. Billing and his friends to have taken would have been to laugh at the delicious absurdity of taking coals to Newcastle, of introducing English drama to neutrals by means of a play which they better than we know Charley's Aunt or The Private Secretary. Salome is not a great play; it is rather a frigid and brilliant tour de force—an effort of the literary imagination with little emotion and no atmosphere. But to say that it is corrupt, and to argue those who admire it are corrupt, is to write yourself down an ass. I could say more, but I leave it at that.

GEO. UNDERWOOD.

THE MASTER SPIRIT.

Give me a spirit that on life's rough sea
Loves to have his sails fill'd with a lusty wind,
E'en till his sail-yards tremble, his masts crack,
And his rapt ship run on her side so low,
That she drinks water, and her keel ploughs air.
There is no danger to a man that knows
What life and death is: there's not any law
Exceeds his knowledge; neither is it lawful
That he should stoop to any other law:
He goes before them, and commands them all
That to himself is a law rational.

—George Chapman, "Byron's Conspiracy."

Acid Drops.

The King has been pleased to order August 4, the anniversary of the outbreak of War, as a day of intercession and prayer. We have had quite a number of these days of intercession without anything happening. One would have thought the times serious enough to have done with this pious tomfoolery.

We hear much of this War being a war of ideas, and so it is, for the reason that all human conflicts are conflicts of ideas. But it may be questioned whether our Government has any real appreciation of the value of ideas in human affairs. It has, for instance, always been a reproach to the country that important works are published at a price that place them beyond the reach of men and women of modest incomes. We speak feelingly on this point, as we have been a constant sufferer. But now we see the Luxury Tax Committee intends placing a tax on books. They are to be treated as a luxury. Cheap novels will escape, but serious works on literature, science, and philosophy will have to suffer. Hall Caine and Marie Corelli and Charles Garvice will be left untouched. Those who do not cater for the crowd, and deal with life from the standpoint of science and philosophy, will suffer.

If that were the way to beat Germany, no one would complain. But is it? Every sensible person, we should imagine, knows that merely winning the War will not defeat Germany. If we wish to establish British supremacy, and maintain it, it can only be done by keeping the British public at a better educated and higher level than Germany. We have suffered in the past because we failed in this respect, and all the talk of German misuse of education is beside the point. It is in the world of ideas and of intellectual achievement that we must establish our superiority, if it is to be done at all. And to commence with a tax on books as a luxury is suicidal. Whatever else a good book may be, it is not a luxury. It is a necessity to every thoughtful man and woman, and it should be a necessity in every home. If the Government is really anxious to do the country a service, it might devise some plan by which good books could be placed within reach of young men and women. Most people will read good works if they commence at the right age. It is because rubbish is so cheap and so easily obtained, and good literature so dear and so apparently inaccessible, that the taste for it is never acquired.

John Frederick Hill was sentenced to twenty months' imprisonment for converting to his own use £50. He had collected the money for a naval officer's orphaned children. Hill was wearing an emblem of a Christian guild, and had said it was his duty as a Christian to help others. So it was, but a safer plan is to start a mission and put yourself down liberally as expenses. Hill will, doubtless, know better next time. We all have to pay for experience.

In order to cheer us all up in these dismal times, a kindly Providence has given us an epidemic of influenza which is very infectious.

The possession of a conscience in a Christian country is fraught with real danger. Mr. G. A. Sutherland, a former master at Harrow, who has already served three sentences of hard labour as a Conscientious Objector, has been sentenced to a further two years' hard labour.

How terribly handicapped the Almighty has been throughout the ages! However eager he may have been to come to men and do wonders in answer to their prayers, he could not have done so for lack of highways along which to travel. After a crowded intercessory service held at Queen's Hall, London, a week ago, however, he will have no excuse for his ominious inactivity. "We are here," said Dr. Jowett, who acted as chairman; "we are here to cut highways for the Lord; we are here to cut prayer tracks along which the forces of the Almighty may flow." What a miraculous meeting it must have been!

We are informed by the British Weekly that "Dr. Jowett's address from the chair inspired a marvellous confidence in the power of prayer." This is not at all surprising, for Dr. Jowett was there for that very purpose; but it would startle the world if "something tremendous" were to happen because of that intercession. It is so easy to say that "when we offer prayer we are handling forces that can change the face of the world"; but the fact that stares us in the face is that the world has never been transformed in answer to prayer. No one knows this better than Dr. Jowett himself.

It is simply astonishing how mawkishly sentimental the greatest of preachers may become at a crowded prayer-meeting in a time of national panic. On the occasion described in another paragraph, Dr. Jowett excitedly asked, "What would you like my Saviour to do through you for Ireland?" Is he not aware that there are two sets of Christians who would like their Saviour to do two entirely opposite things for Ireland, and that there is no likelihood of such a Saviour doing anything at all for that sadly troubled land?

We are informed by the Daily News that the Presbyterians are filling a large place in the direction of the War. "Sir Douglas Haig is a Presbyterian, of course, and Marshall Joffre is a member of the Reformed Church of France, which is nearest to the Presbyterian Church. General Pershing and his Chief of Staff, General Peyton C. Marsh, are Presbyterians, while both President Wilson and Mr. Lansing, the Secretary of State, are Presbyterian elders." Thus do they conscientiously justify the teachings of the Prince of Peace, which they profess to follow.

The Bishop of Sheffield complains that he has only 196 clergymen left for 171 parishes. He will, therefore, only recommend that eight of these be advised to go into the Army. But quite a number of businesses, on which the future of families depend, are being closed. Why not close a few of the churches? If God is on our side, he will not mind.

Darwen (Lancs) is holding a series of open-air prayer meetings to help win the War. At one of these gatherings the Rev. J. Hodges said that, on reflection, he was convinced that God had not yet forsaken us. What we are waiting for is some indication that God is going to help us. The Rev. J. Blackburn Brown, on the other hand, said he "was absolutely certain that God has kept the control of the War in his own hands." The "control of the War." Now we know who to blame for everything that has occurred.

A sage old proverb bids a cobbler to stick to his last. Its application is lost upon Mr. Harry Lauder, who is passing popular as a comedian on the music-hall stage. Speaking of the Pacifists, Mr. Lauder said: "these people ought to be run into the Thames. To cut their throats would be too quick for them." Surely, Mr. Lauder is straining his fine wit too far. Most people prefer him when he is funny without being vulgar.

While people are mourning over the comparatively early death of Lord Rhondda, who was a man of exceptionally brilliant gifts, and whose signal success as Food Controller everybody admires, it is an eminently noteworthy fact, though ignored by the press at large, that his lordship was a thorough-going Secularist. So far as we know, the Monmouthshire Evening Post is the only newspaper that has recorded this interesting information. In a lengthy obituary, which appeared in its issue for July 3, our contemporary says:—

> He summed up his philosophy in a speech at Cardiff some eighteen months ago: "I may tell you my religious principles in a nutshell. It is a good old world, and I shall be very sorry to go out of it, because I don't know what it is going to be in the next. Anyway, I believe in getting as much pleasure and happiness as possible out of this world while you are in it, so long as you do not interfere with the happiness and pleasure of other people. And as a corollary to that I believe in giving as much pleasure as possible to other people as long as it does not interfere too much with your own enjoyment." A writer in a fairly prominent review based a very critical article on this, denouncing the cynicism of it all. Well, the last sentence is cynicism naked and unashamed, but its very frankness was disarming, and taking the world as it is and men as they are, there are far worse philosophies of life. We believe it correctly summed up the man.

The Secularist philosophy, however mildly held, is fundamentally irreconcilable with belief in any fairly orthodox version of the Christian religion.

A fine example of the "Irish bull" is presented in the Freeman's Journal. Following Lord Curzon's statement that the Catholic clergy of Ireland had advised their flocks, under the penalty of damnation, to resist conscription, his lordship sends an explanatory letter containing quotations from sermons delivered in Ireland. One priest is reported as having said, "God would cry to Heaven for vengeance." This gem would be hard to beat.

In the fourth year of the War, the National Free Church Council is discussing the question of part-time War-work for the clergy. These gentry will be almost ready to start when the War is quite over.

Scotch folk shed their prejudices very slowly. Glasgow Corporation, after a lively debate, sanctioned a Sunday performance in Kelvingrove Park by the band of the Scots Guards. At this rapid rate of progress it should take Glasgow several centuries to reach Continental ideas of Sunday relaxation.

A correspondent of the British Weekly writes, that in view of the shortage of teachers, why could not ministers of religion be utilized in the schools? We have no doubt many of them would do this, but it would be a bad day for English education if this plan were adopted. We suggest sending parsons into the Army, and relieve the teachers this way. We are glad to see that the Schoolmaster, in noting the suggestion, reprints our remarks—from a recent issue—with acknowledgment of origin—by way of comment: "22,000 out of 42,000 elementary schoolmasters have joined the Army, and 5,000 more have been called up. What a contrast to that of the clerical profession, which has so far been exempted from military service."

Since his conversion to Spiritualism, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle has begun to use the old, old vocabulary so long used by the orthodox. For instance, he refers to the "cheerless beliefs" of materialists. It must, of course, lighten the burden of life to realize that spirits smoke cigars in another world.

The newspapers made a lot of fuss because a service at Westminster Abbey was held in the Welsh language. The dear editors have never noticed that Gibberish has been spoken there for many years.

Spiritual unrest has spread to the workhouses. The Brentford Board of Guardians has instructed the chaplains to give notice of any changes in religion on the part of the inmates. What a flutter would be caused by a widespread religious revival among the guests of the ratepayers.

"He doeth all things well" is a sentiment treasured by the pious, although facts are against the idea. Out of 228,000 children medically examined at the London County Council Schools, 89,000 required treatment. More than 10,000 little ones attended consumption dispensaries.

The clergy are almost as acute as pill advertisers in seeking public favour, and they have not hesitated to exploit the War. An advertisement in a provincial paper, issued on behalf of a church, contains the following: "Have you suffered bereavement by the war?" "Your loved ones are still living."

To Correspondents.

Will J. O. Connor please send the Editor his address. He wishes to write him on the subject of his enclosure of July 5.

H. Poole.—We have returned the print, which is curious, but we do not think it has any special meaning. It looks to us like a frontispiece to some old volume of astronomical divinity, somewhere about a century old, and its special meaning would depend upon the book itself.

A. H. Palmer (Madeira).—We will look out the missing numbers for you. Your newsagent was in error in reporting them all out of print. We will consider your suggestion of "linking up Freethinker readers."

E. Gascoyne (Chesterfield).—Canon Shaw is true to the traditions of his order. When public opinion changes you may rely upon his "Message" changing too.

H. Scudder (Alnwick).—We saw the reprint. We are glad to say it is becoming increasingly common for reprints from this paper to appear in newspapers, and—better still—usually with due acknowledgments.

Sergt. R. Lewis.—A Short History of Ancient Peoples is published by Hodder & Stoughton. We think the published price was 10s. 6d. It is probably more now, as most publishers have taken advantage of the War to do their bit, and have raised the price of all their old stock.

Pte. T. Bate.—We are sending free copies of paper to address given.

C. E. Johnson.—Mr. R. Chapman, 6 Wenlock St., Simonside, South Shields, will be pleased to give you all the information you require. Pamphlets have been sent. You are right in thinking our great need is more capital, but that will come one day, perhaps, and then we shall see things.

W. Smallridge.—The literature and circulars served out by missionary societies are so many insults to anyone outside an asylum—or a Church. They are indications of the mental level of the people who honestly support them. Pleased to hear that your son finds the Freethinker eagerly read among his fellow-soldiers.

A. J. Willetts.—Thanks. Shall appear. Thanks for what you are doing on behalf of paper.

A. Atherton.—Mr. Cohen has written you.

Pte. J. Morgan writes from Ireland quite endorsing the letters published in reply to Mr. Comley on "Religion in the Army." We have had many other letters of a similar kind for which we deeply regret our inability to find space. But we are pleased to find agreement that the circulation of our literature is doing great good to the cause.

J. Burrell.—We are greatly obliged for all you have done in the past, and feel certain that we can depend upon you for the future. New opportunities will present themselves to one who is so alert as yourself.

G. Grove.—Thanks, papers are being sent.

R. H. Nisbet.—Crowded out at present, will try and find room later.

H. C. Hebbes.—Sorry we have no space for your letter. We agree that the medical profession has been, and is, for that matter, "guilty of astounding blunders," and we are with you in opposing blind support of authority of any kind.

Pte. D. T. Evans.—Received, and will be acknowledged later.

Z.—MSS. received. Will publish as early as possible, but we are much in arrears with accepted articles just now.

R. Parker.—We are very pleased to have the Foulis Catalogue. They were great printers, and a credit to eighteenth century Glasgow.

H J. Carthy.—Our experience of doctors does not agree with yours. We should say the profession contains a large number of Freethinkers, and there is an old maxim: "Out of three doctors two Atheists."

W. J.—We have no objection, as you rightly assume. But you must first catch your capable Christian who is agreeable to a set discussion with a leading Freethinker.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We publish elsewhere in this issue a letter from the Rev. Dr. Lyttleton, late Headmaster of Eton, suggesting the discussion of various points that are at issue between Freethinkers and Christians. We cheerfully fall in with this suggestion; and we feel assured that such a discussion can produce nothing but good. Presumably Dr. Lyttleton himself will lead off in this general discussion, and we await his first communication with some interest.

South Wales Freethinkers are in earnest about "the Cause," and are setting to work in the right spirit. A Conference of Freethinkers is being called at the Wyndham Hotel, Bridgend, Glam, on Saturday, July 20, at 5 o'clock, to discuss the prospect of organization. This is an entirely independent effort on the part of our South Wales friends, but Mr. Cohen has been asked if he will be present and address the meeting. He has agreed to do so, and it is probable that he will also lecture on the Sunday at Maesteg. We shall be able to give more definite particulars next week.

We are receiving many promises of supplies of waste paper from readers in both London and the provinces. We are pleased to record this, as we need all the paper we can get. The paper supply gets shorter, and the price gets higher, and one is compelled to look some distance ahead. We are also glad to say that the Freethinker League is getting many new adherents. The practice of getting newsagents to display an extra copy of the paper, with a promise on the part of the member of the League to purchase it if unsold, is working well, and finding many new readers. We are fortunate in our friends, and we owe them much for their help during a trying time.

We are asked to announce that Mr. Bowman, newsagent, of 38 Leicester Road, Higher Broughton, Salford, Lancs, supplies all our publications, and has undertaken to exhibit the Freethinker for sale. Local residents will please note.

We were pleased to see a smartly written letter in the Chiswick Times by "E. L." on Secular Education. We hope our friends all over the country will keep the agitation going.

On Friday, July 19, our contributor, Mr. T. F. Palmer, opens a discussion at the offices of the Christian Evidence Society, 34 Craven Street, Strand, on the subject of "Does Scientific Materialism Best Account for the Universe?" The meeting is open to all, and the speaking commences at 8 o'clock. We daresay that many of our readers will make a point of being present. The discussion is certain to be interesting. Mr. Palmer is also opening a discussion on July 16, at 8 p.m., on "The Birth and Death of Worlds." Admission is free.

A correspondent writes:—

> In the course of my own work I came upon the following, which may be of use to the sane and admirable Freethinker: "he [Abelard] had dared to bring all things in heaven and earth to the test of Reason." "For his conservative opponents that was heresy" (I think the word is that, but I can't always read my own writing) "enough"; "to accept the doctrines of the Church because they were rational was hardly less offensive than to reject them as irrational."—(Dean) H. Rashall, Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages, vol. i., p. 55.

The Story of the Tea Plant.

THAT pitiless struggle for existence everywhere manifested in the organic realm is strongly in evidence in the case of the tea plant. In company with all the nobler forms of floral life this shrub is extensively devastated by parasitic organisms. In Assam, a root fungus which flourishes on the decaying stumps of trees extends its attacks to the young tea plant with fatal consequences. The damage caused by this fungus is, fortunately, restricted to the area occupied by the rotting roots, but a space of some score feet in diameter is rendered desolate, and barren patches may disfigure the plantations throughout their extent.

Only too true are the poet's words :—

> Nature is one with rapine, a harm no preacher can heal ;
> The mayfly is torn by the swallow, the sparrow spear'd by the shrike,
> And the whole little wood where I sit is a world of plunder and prey.

In their standard work, The Pests and Blights of the Tea Plant, Sir George Watt and Dr. Mann instance and describe a mighty host of insect and other enemies of the tea bush.

The injurious activities of vegetable pests are apt to be intensified when plants are placed under cultivation. In a state of Nature the indigenous tea plant is scattered here and there in the virgin forest, but, when grown in gardens, enormous numbers of bushes are planted together, and when predaceous organisms meet with a permanent supply of the nutriment to which they are best adapted they multiply at a prodigious rate. Unlike an annual plant, the tea shrub remains evergreen all the year round, and as the months roll by its assailants are afforded full facilities for depositing their eggs or spores on or near their victim. They thus ensure a constantly increasing multitude of descendants to renew their baneful activities in the coming season at the expense of the unfortunate tea plant.

Although this shrub has suffered less severely than many other cultivated crops, the perils to which it is exposed have necessitated the scientific study of tea pests so as to protect the planter from their ravages. One authority asserts that: "Were it not for the natural checks to which most blights are subject, the tea plant would soon be devoured off the face of the earth." In some seasons various most important plants are seriously damaged by blights, caterpillars, and other foes, while, in others, the weather conditions prove very unfavourable to some at least of these pests. Adverse seasons are reinforced through the presence of numerous carnivorous and parasitic enemies of floral pests, and their activities are such that in normal years they more or less succeed in keeping tea blights and other destructive organisms under control.

Red spider is a perpetual enemy of the tea bush. All sorts of desperate attempts have been made to overcome this pestilent insect, but hitherto with small success. In the spring the eggs are hatched out in countless numbers within the leaves, and so soon as they emerge, the tiny spiders everywhere infest the foliage. This parasite exhausts the sap of the leaves, causing them to shrivel and fall. Even heavy rainstorms render little help, for the minute spiders seek safety on the underside of the leaves ready to reappear when the weather improves. So serious are the ravages of red spider that the invaded shrubs steadily weaken with each attack, and subsequently become an easy prey to morbid fungoid growths.

Red spider is usually most baleful on China bushes, while the pink mite, another parasite, ravages the choicer tea shrubs, notably, the celebrated Assam species. It was formerly supposed that the superior varieties were deciduous, for, occasionally, large groups of plants appear almost destitute of leaves. It is now known, however, that this results from the activities of the pink mite which sucks all the juices from the leaves, which thus cease to function, and then wither and fall. Much to the planter's annoyance and loss, the foliage thus discarded forms the newly ripened leaves of the early flush which would have produced the finest tea. Bushes growing in shady situations seem less liable to attack than those planted on more open ground. As a remedial measure flower of sulphur is employed, and this is said to expel the parasite for the whole of the ensuing season.

The mosquito is another formidable foe which, at one period, menaced the Indian tea industry with ruin. Its depredations in the late 'eighties in the Darjeeling district were responsible for the bankruptcy of several fine estates. The life cycle of this exasperating insect is now nearly known, and its doom is merely a matter of time. The tender tea leaves are destroyed by the mosquito in July in some regions, at the very period when the plant should appear at its best. Usually, however, the most serious blight occurs in September and early October until the close of the season.

Although a noxious creature, the presence of the green fly promotes the production of choice flavoured teas. Fortunately for manufacturing purposes, this fly does not injure the foliage unless its visitations prove abnormally severe. Then its sinister activities retard all growth, with calamitous consequences to the cultivator. An expert informs us that :—

> The green fly feeds upon the watery fluid of the young leaves, and extracts it in such a way as not to injure in any degree the tissue itself, or the actual juice or sap of the plant; thus the juice, by losing nearly all its water, becomes greatly concentrated, and the whole leaf is proportionately contracted in size. Planters all know the peculiar stunted appearance of green-fly leaf, and if the bushes are of the small China variety, the leaves in these circumstances are so small as to be very expensive and difficult to gather; they have also the light yellowish colour indicative of fine quality, and the sap is thick and sticky, being really a concentrated essence of tea.

Many other insect enemies infest the tea plant. Then there are many parasitic plants that entwine themselves around the bark, branches, and leaves of the bush, thus excluding light and air, while depriving their host of access to soil and moisture. In these several ways climbing plants arrest the growth of, and sometimes even strangle, the tea shrub to which they have attached themselves. Moreover, numerous fungoid diseases afflict the plant. Sickly shrubs are subject to the growth of lichen, while healthy bushes, when invaded by this parasite, soon lose their vigour. Not only does this growth sadly handicap the tea shrub with its unwelcome embrace, but its scaly surface provides a habitat for several species of insects detrimental to the plant's prosperity.

So far, no satisfactory machine has been devised which plucks the leaves from the bush. Where coarse tea is produced, and the leaves are gathered at random, a plucking machine serves very well. But the desideratum is a contrivance that will select the leaves essential for the preparation of high grade teas, while leaving on the bushes the foliage not desired.

When the leaf-buds peer forth in spring, the tea plant is said to flush. It is stated that from ten to fifteen flushes during the season form a fair average from strong and healthy shrubs, although the pickings number as many as thirty, or even thirty-five. The separate shoots are in different stages of development at each gathering, and in successful tea-plucking each leaf must be encouraged to grow until it is at its prime, and then promptly picked. Hand picking is therefore necessary, and cheap and abundant labour is indispensable to the planter. On a thriving estate of 1,100 acres the various requirements involved compel the services of a staff of "at least 2,000 people of all grades, who must have the necessary fuel to cook their food and for domestic purposes generally."

Experimental tea-growing in America has been in operation for many years, but, except in South Carolina, with small success. Insufficient rainfall and the high cost of labour combine to prevent the warmer regions of the United States from entering into serious competition with India and Ceylon.

When the leaves have been gathered, the first stage of manufacture begins. This is the withering process, which precedes the rolling of the leaf. It is considered that, were rolling to take place prior to withering, the precious leaves would be torn to tatters, and the greater part of their juice lost. About seventy-five per cent. of the green leaf consists of water, even in dry weather, and nearly half of this moisture must be evaporated if the leaf is to be rolled without fracture. Also, during the withering stage a striking chemical change occurs. The natural enzyme or fermenting principle of the foliage is augmented, and this increases both the flavour and strength of the manufactured commodity.

(To be concluded.) T. F. PALMER.

The War and God.

A CONFESSION OF FAITH FROM THE NORTH SEA.

HUNTING about the North Sea in all weathers, and under present War conditions, in one of the Ocean Dragoons—a big T.B.D.—does not give much opportunity for the exercise of that weapon which is (sometimes) "mightier than the sword." But, even in that life, with little sleep, less comfort, and no warmth, there are some moments of leisure. Then one naturally reverts to the more peaceful past times—so far as these can be indulged in. Thus it was that this was originally written to an intimate, but still orthodox, friend. I have been induced to send this copy to the old Freethinker, thinking it might be of interest, and of some little value, to a wider circle than the individual friend to whom it was at first addressed.

In passing, I may say (as one who has been "serving" since almost the very outset of the War) that my Freethinker is much in demand among many shipmasters—as it was with many comrades on land. Not only that; it is read by "the man in the street" (now the man in the Service) with an interest greater than "before the War"—and with a "more open mind."

A word of explanation, before proceeding with the transcript of the letter, may help to a clearer understanding by the reader—be he "saint" or otherwise. I sent a card of greeting (and of mourning for a very bitter loss) to this friend, last Christmas. He twitted me, in a letter, with conforming to orthodox Christmas observances; and (with underlying seriousness) insinuated that I—even after my more than twenty-six years of philosophic Atheism—had been compelled by the War to reconsider my philosophic values!

That could not be allowed to go unchallenged. So I wrote again, pointing out that "Christmas" was a Pagan festival, pinched by the Christians, and was a widespread public festival to-day (though with but little chance of "festivities" for many of us). I referred to a few of the facts from comparative mythology; and I mentioned that these facts were admitted, even by many Christian scholars.

Following upon that, I received the letter to which this (exact) transcript is my reply. My friend's arguments may be enumerated thusly:—(1) He liked to hear from me, but preferred "ordinary" letters; (2) What I had said was "pure piffle"; (3) I shouldn't try to ridicule a religion which had "stood the test of centuries," in spite of all the many attacks upon it; (4) Abundant proof had been published that the War was bringing people back to religion, and compelling them to believe in God; (5) I had had more and better chances in life than he (referring to education, etc.), but I had done much "worse" in life (presumably owing to my Atheism); and (6) There was little prospect of happiness for me so long as I remained an Atheist.

Not a very formidable attack from a rationally argumentative point of view. But very typical of the usual Christian criticism.

What follows here is a literal copy of my reply. All quotations and references are from memory, as the only book I have with me is a well-conned copy of the Rubaiyat (apart from fiction and magazines).

DEAR FRIEND,.....

I cannot finish this letter without some reference to the more "serious" subject touched upon in some of your more recent letters. The "last word" is not only the woman's prerogative, but also the right of him who "replies" in a discussion. You opened it. So, 'tis only fair that I should close it. It is, of course, a matter of taste; but I feel a greater pleasure in writing about such "serious" subjects, than in merely chronicling the small beer (which we never see!) of our daily round. Still, after this, I shan't pursue the subject (or any other "serious" one)—if you don't start it!

You rightly say you were brought up a Christian. So was I. But I studied Christianism (and other religions) pretty thoroughly, and with great earnestness. You did not. Had you and I been born and brought us as Mussulmans, you'd probably be still a Mussulman, and probably I should not.

I never tried to ridicule your religious beliefs; though ridicule (within reasonable limits) is a perfectly justifiable weapon, and one which the professional "witch-doctors" use, or try to use, ad lib. I merely pointed out some incontrovertible facts about the Pagan origins of Christianism—many of which are admitted by Christian scholars.

The Christian religion (or religions) has, most emphatically, not "stood the test of centuries." In my own lifetime I have seen it (or them) forced to abandon doctrine after doctrine—position after position. It stands (if it stands) to-day vastly different to what it was thirty or more years ago—when I started to study it. These changes constitute in themselves a measure of the efficacy of the Freethought attack. (And proud am I of having done my little bit in compelling those stragetic movements to the rear on the part of Christianism.) I can remember when "Plenary Inspiration" was almost generally believed in. To-day it is not—not even in Scotland! I don't suppose even the "Wee Free" diviner believes the commas are verbally inspired—especially as there was no punctuation at all in the Hebrew!

I am old enough to remember Robertson Smith being excommunicated (by the Free Kirk, wasn't it?) for saying that "Isaiah" was not all written by one and the same said prophet. But I have lived to see scientific criticism (merely the development of the great Thomas Paine's Age of Reason) do the same deadly work on the "New" Testament that it had already done on the "Old." And much of that inside the Churches! The late Rev. Dr. Bruce practically abandoned the "Divinity" of Christ and was not excommunicated. Hensley Henson does not believe in the physical resurrection of Christ, etc.—and has just been made a Bishop. That's not standing the test of thirty years—let alone centuries. A few years ago, the Rev. Dr. Anderson, of Dundee, said "we" (Christians) had to abandon the "Historical Christ"; and we had to create an ideal ("Christ") out of the good, the true, and the beautiful. And he (Dr. Anderson) still draws his screw as a parson. That is "standing the test of" years in a kind of "Kamerad! Hands up here!" spirit indeed.

I can remember the stir caused by Tyndall, Huxley, Spencer, and others; and read all through the controversies in the Nineteenth Century and elsewhere. And I remember poor old W. E. G.'s frantic efforts to save his creed and his Gods. To-day, evolution is almost universally accepted (even by Christians), and the "impregnable rock" has gone the way of all sandstone under continued water-action. Nay, admission after admission has been made by representatives of all denominations (especially in recent years) that Christianism has not been holding its own. "Standing the test" in that way is a German victory indeed!

Correspondence.

A PROPOSAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I have a proposal to make to you in consequence of a request made by one of your readers, whose name, age, and sex are unknown to me. This gentleman or lady—to be referred to for the purposes of this letter as the former—kindly sent me the same numbers of your journal, with sundry passages marked in ink. On the margin he had written a strongly worded suggestion that I should take note of these passages. So much for the external advice received.

On looking at the passages marked, I at once resolved to act on this friendly but anonymous hint, so far, anyhow, as to feel your editorial pulse on the question of starting a discussion by correspondence in your columns. My reasons for mooting this project are as follows:—

(1) It is refreshing always to come into contact with a mental atmosphere very different from the one a clergyman ordinarily breathes.

(2) Especially when it means reading disquisitions on matters of vital importance written with conspicuous sincerity, clearness of thought, and desire to arrive at truth.

(3) I have formed a hope that if certain conditions are observed the result of such a discussion, as I anticipate, would be something like a cordial rapprochement between myself and sundry of my fellow-Britons from whom, largely through my own fault, I have become estranged.

Other reasons might be added; but I must pass on to speak of necessary conditions, and of what I am prepared to offer if those conditions be observed.

All I ask is that, if any of your readers honour my letters with their notice, they would join me in an honest and persevering effort to be perfectly courteous and perfectly candid. Nobody, of course, is perfectly either the one or the other; but that is no reason why we should not try.

I shall therefore begin to keep up my end, as we used to say in our cricket matches, by avoiding so far as I can every phrase which would be likely to give offence, and every form of words which would obscure my meaning or my genuine opinion. Courtesy, frankness, honesty; these ought to be within the reach of us all; and so far as a rapid glance at your columns allows me to judge, you are showing how they are, even in a "religious" discussion, to be maintained.

If, on the other hand, by blundering or bigotry, or any other tomfoolery, to which we parsons are occasionally prone, I gall any of your readers to exasperation and heat of language, I shall do all I can to make amends; but, thenceforward, shall leave unnoticed whatever the particular disputant may say. I have reached an age when personal abuse has not only lost its power to excite, but even to stir the faintest flicker of emotion. It strikes me as unutterably dull.

If, therefore, you give me the opportunity I will send you some observations on what you have written with the object of pointing out grounds of agreement between two points of view apparently irreconcilable.

THE SOUL.

SIR,—I always find "Abracadabra's" articles interesting and instructive, but his treatment of the expressions "soul" and "spirit" are not entirely satisfying to me. For many years I have been mentally teased by the use of these terms by Christians, as though they were synonymous, and this week "Abracadabra" writes: "these are merely names of two imaginary entities (or two aspects of the same entity)."

I suggest that at some early age there existed a cult of the threefold, but I have had no time nor opportunity of verifying the idea. But I think that, in a superficial view of Nature, it would be noticed that three is repeatedly exhibited. We have:—

Sun, moon, and stars;
Earth, air, and water;
Animal, bird, and fish;
Man, woman, and child, etc.

So in after-life belief there would arise:—

Father, Son, and Holy Ghost;
Heaven, hell, and purgatory;
Body, soul, and spirit, etc.

The last two appear to me to represent two distinct entities in the mind of early man; Soul (Sol—the sun) being the body-heat; and Spirit (Spiro—I breathe) the breath. If we could refer back far enough, perhaps we should find that originally there were reasons for these separate terms, which were sufficient for the people who held them. Can "Abracadabra" clear up my indecision?

E. ANDERSON.

CLEANLINESS AND GODLINESS.

SIR,—Apropos the reference in "Views and Opinions" of June 23 issue to Thomas Becket's hoary clothing, recalls the influence of the Church at that time, and the simplicity of kings. Becket, as keeper of Henry's privy seal, rose high in the King's favour, and is described as being a tall and handsome man; eloquent and witty, fond of all games of skill and sport. In short, his real "sportive" instinct appeared endearing to all the young nobility who "gathered round" his table. But so soon as the Church and the sanctity of office adorned his person, his palace was no longer the abode of the happy and the gay. Becket became a changed man. He was stern and quarrelsome, relentlessly haughty, and put forth his claims with such boldness of spirit as to leave most of his quarrels unsettled. Despite this fact, his journey to Canterbury appears to have been one triumphal procession. People shouted "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!" All this after six years of exile, coupled with the excommunication against the Bishops of York, London, and Salisbury because they had dared crown Prince Henry at the King's request during his exile, goaded the King into having Becket removed.

Certain laws in favour of the King and opposed to the Church, in that the Church tribunals dealt too lightly with the very serious crimes of the clergy, led Becket to agree, under threat of violence from some of the barons, but to eventually flee to France. The Pope released him of his promise, and refused to recognize the Constitution himself. However, Becket was soon to pay the penalty, and the poor King did penance on his tomb for the crime.

SUNDAY BANDS IN GLASGOW.

SIR,—It may interest your readers to learn that a military band performance was given on Sunday, June 30, in Kelvingrove Park, Glasgow. This is stated to have been the first band performance to take place on Sunday in a public park of Glasgow. The event drew a huge crowd to the park, and is worth putting on record as showing that even in Scotland we are gradually humanizing the Sunday.

GEORGE SCOTT.

GHOSTS' CLOTHES.

SIR,—In my paper of June 23 I left two questions for Spiritists to answer—first, where did the imaginary "spirit," which they say leaves the body at death, get its membrane or outer covering? and second, where did it get the "spirit-clothes," which their clairvoyants profess to see? Mr. Harper, in his reply, has answered neither.

To illustrate the first of these questions I may point to a balloon sailing through the air. Take away the outer covering which holds the large quantity of gas together, and every particle of the latter will be immediately dispersed. While the gas was confined within its envelope, it might be said to represent a personality; without its covering, it is at once scattered to the four winds, its particles never to be gathered together again. So must it be with a "disembodied spirit," assuming such an impossibility to exist. Mr. Harper has not mentally visualized this question.

Again, Mr. Harper quotes me as saying that "æther is many million times thinner than air." What I said was that "ether is supposed to be many million times thinner," etc. I used the words here italicized for the simple reason that, in my opinion, what certain scientists say about ether is pure theory; also, my reference was not to the ether obtained from alcohol and sulphuric acid, but to the extremely attenuated gaseous substance which is supposed to fill all space, as mentioned by Sir Oliver Lodge.

Society News.

A meeting of the South Shields Branch, N.S.S., to consider various urgent business matters took the place of a country ramble at short notice. A vote of condolence with the relatives of our oldest member, Mr. J. T. Horsman, was passed, and it was decided to start a Freethinker Fund to develop and maintain local sales, and, from a suggestion of the deceased member, to institute a waste paper department and a collector was duly appointed. One new member was made. Branches will do well to follow the example of our South Shields friends.—E. M. VANCE, Gen. Sec.

Better for us, perhaps, it might appear,
Were there all harmony, all virtue here;
That never air or ocean felt the wind,
That never passion discomposed the mind.
But all subsists by elemental strife;
And passions are the elements of life. —Pope.

Obituary.

Mr. John Thomas Horsman, the oldest member of the Branch, and once a familiar figure at the Annual Conferences, died suddenly, aged fifty-seven, on July 5, and was buried at Harton Cemetery on Monday last, Mr. J. Fothergill giving an impressive reading of the Secular Burial Service. Deceased followed his usual employment as a locomotive engine driver for the N.E.R. Co. on the day prior to his death. His conversion to Secularism was due solely to Bible reading, and during his long connection with the South Shields Branch he was a regular and persistent worker in a quiet way. Conferences, from Glasgow to London, and even to Brussels, were an annual pilgrimage for Mr. Horsman until recent years; until he died he was always highly respected by his colleagues, his fellow-workmen, and the railway officials.—R. C. (South Shields).

Christianity and Morals.

A Christian reader of this paper—there are quite a number of them—writes that, however much we may dissent from Christian doctrines, we cannot deny that Christianity brought a new moral force into the world, and that this showed itself clearly in the lives of its followers. Well, but this is what we do deny, and we believe we can make our denial good by an appeal to facts. We know that the opinion voiced by our correspondent is one that is fairly common, and exists with many who do not call themselves Christians. But this we regard as either pure cant or the hypnosis produced by mere assertion. And it will be noted that the claim is not made on behalf of contemporary Christianity. It never is. When Douglas Jerrold was told that the weather at Christmas was not what it used to be, he replied, "It never was." Christian writers always find the wonderful moral regeneration effected by Christianity in some period preceding their own. Or else it will produce a moral re-birth in some time that is yet to come. The dream of the visionary or the unverifiable guess of the prophet.

A Vain Search.

Now, religions never get truer to themselves as they grow older. They are at their truest when they are youngest, at their falsest in their old age. This is because as religions grow older, they become more subject to the play of social forces, which leads to a dropping of many things that are morally objectionable or useless. And the emphasis laid now upon morality by teachers of Christianity is no proof that it was their chief concern in the early centuries. Moral teaching is, in brief, the camouflage adopted by religions that have reached senility, in order to disguise their real nature from contemporary eyes. And there is really no proof that primitive Christianity aimed at the moral improvement of people in any other sense than that in which systems are compelled to inculcate certain moral duties. Salvation by belief, not regeneration through moral conduct, was the aim of Christianity. Pagan contemporary moralists and writers are never struck by the morality of Christians; what impresses them is their narrowness, their fanaticism, and their intense superstition. Against the assertions of Christians there is the broad fact that conduct did not improve with the growth of Christianity. On the contrary, it deteriorated. Charges of the most serious character were brought by Christians against Christians; not merely charges of doctrinal laxity, but also of moral turpitude. Even Dean Milman was forced to admit, on a survey of the facts, that Christianity gave to non-Christians no more than its own superstition and hatred of heretics and unbelievers. And Professor Dill, writing of the fifth century, says: "The picture which St. Jerome draws of female society is so repulsive that we would gladly believe it to be exaggerated. But if the priesthood, with its enormous influence, was so corrupt, it is only too probable that it debased the sex which is always most under clerical influence." And one may here recall the speech made by Cardinal Hugo on the departure of Pope Innocent IV., in 1251, from the city of Lyons: "Friends, since our arrival here, we have done much for your city. When we came, we found here three or four brothels. We leave behind us but one. We must own, however, that it extends without interruption from the eastern to the western gate."

An Orthodox Witness.

But instead of multiplying these testimonials, let us take the evidence of one witness. And let that be not a Freethinker, but a Christian—no less a person than the reverend and learned Dr. Mosheim. In his Ecclesiastical History he deals with Christian history century by century, and his summaries on the moral regeneration effected are instructive. Thus:—

> Second Century.—After pointing out that many "learned men" consider the Christian writers as "the very worst of moral instructors," he adds: "the cause of morality.....suffered deeply by a capital error (ascetic doctrines) which was revived in this century.
> Third Century.—Church rule "was soon followed by a train of vices which dishonoured the character and authority of those to whom the administration of the Church was committed."
> Fourth Century.—"When we cast an eye towards the lives and morals of Christians at this time, we find a mixture of good and evil, some eminent for their piety, others infamous for their crimes. The number, however, of immoral and unworthy Christians began so to increase that the examples of real piety and virtue became extremely rare."
> Fifth Century.—"The vices of the clergy were now carried to the most enormous lengths, and all the writers of the century, whose probity and virtue render them worthy of credit, are unanimous in their accounts of the luxury, avarice, arrogance, and voluptuousness of the sacerdotal orders."

Eighth Century.—"In the Western world, Christianity was disgraced by the lives and actions of those who pretended to be the luminaries of the Church. The clergy.....were distinguished by their luxury, their gluttony, and their lust."

Ninth Century.—"The licentiousness of the clergy arose, at this time, to an enormous height."

Tenth Century.—"Both in the eastern and western provinces, the clergy were, for the most part, composed of the most worthless set of men, shamefully illiterate and stupid.....equally enslaved to sensuality and superstition, and capable of the most abominable and flagitious deeds."

Eleventh Century.—"All the records of this century loudly complain of the vices that reigned among the rulers of the Church.....The inferior clergy were also licentious in their way; few among them possessed any remains of piety and virtue, we might add of decency and discretion."

Twelfth Century.—"Wherever we turn our eyes among the various ranks and orders of the clergy, we perceive the most flagrant marks of licentiousness and fraud, ignorance and luxury, and other vices, whose pernicious effects were felt both in Church and State."

Thirteenth Century.—"Both the Greek and Latin writers, provoked beyond measure by the flagitious lives of their spiritual pastors and instructors, complain loudly of their licentious manners; nor will their complaints appear excessive to such as are acquainted with the history of this corrupt and superstitious age."

We do not think it is necessary to continue the record up to date. It could be done, but we hope we have given enough evidence to justify our denial that Christianity ever brought moral regeneration to the world. That belief is sheer superstition. It rests on no better evidence than the word of Christian writers, and modern ones at that. It was not, indeed, within the power of Christianity to do anything of the kind. A religion which involved a reversion to the beliefs of savages could not make for moral progress. It could only make for degeneration. And the history of that degradation is there for anyone who runs and reads. Fortunate it is for the Church that the majority neither run nor read. Still less do they think. If they did the reign of Christianity would be short indeed.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Anglo-Catholicism.

THE religious press abounds with all sorts of illusions concerning the present conditions and prospects of the Christian religion. Prominent clergymen confidently affirm that, in its effect upon religion, the War has already proved the greatest possible blessing in disguise. It has deepened and intensified the spiritual life of the Churches, and enabled them to perceive, with greater clearness than ever before, the nature and scope of their mission in the world. Everywhere we discern unmistakable signs that the people generally are recovering their sense of dependence upon and responsibility to God, and showing an increased interest in and eagerness to hear and heed the Gospel message. Both in the Army and the Navy men are turning to God in ever-growing numbers, realizing that in him alone can they find the succour and inspiration of which they stand in such dire need in these distressing times. On the other hand, we are informed by the same press that churches and chapels are empty, that a lamentable religious indifference prevails, and that the Gospel of Christ no longer attracts the masses. The optimists are evidently buoyed up by illusions, by hopes kindled by beliefs which scorn facts, while the pessimists judge by what they see and know to be true. The optimists seem to be governed by the principle, avowed and gloried in by Eusebius, the father of ecclesiastical history, "that he would relate all that was to the credit, and pass lightly over all which was to the dishonour, of the Faith," forgetting that such a principle in action can only result in grevious injury to the cause it seeks to serve. Commenting on Eusebius and other primitive Christian writers, Dean Milman says:—

> Strict impartiality could not be expected from a Christian writer of that day; and probably Eusebius erred more often from credulity than from dishonesty. Yet the unbelief produced, in later times, by the fictitious character of early Christian History, may show how dangerous, how fatal, may be the least departure from truth. On pious fraud read Mosheim, Diss. i. 206, et seqq. (The History of Christianity, vol. iii., p. 361).

It may be conceded that present-day optimists "err more often from credulity than from dishonesty"; but it is incontrovertible that their conduct benefits the cause of Freethought much more than it does their own, because the facts are wholly against them. Whilst the Rev. Dinsdale T. Young, for example, has been going up and down the country, treating crowded and cheering audiences to eloquent accounts of the present power and brilliant prophesies of the coming triumph of the Cross, an influential committee of his Church has been conducting a careful inquiry into the present position of Wesleyan Methodism, and now presents what the Daily News describes as "a disturbing report," which that newspaper summarizes thus:—

> One hundred and fifty selected churches in a great industrial district show an average attendance at morning service equal to 17 per cent. of the sitting accommodation, and 29 per cent. at the evening service. Centra town churches are maintained by two or three devoted members and attended only by a few score people, while new and commodious churches in "villadom" have never attracted those for whom they are intended. In the last few years the membership has declined 28,571, and this decrease is most marked in districts where Methodism had been strongest, e.g., Leeds, Hull, York, Halifax, Cornwall, and Lincolnshire. Ten years ago there were over 1,000,000 Sunday scholars. This number has fallen by nearly 150,000, and there are about 100,000 fewer children between the ages of 7 and 15. The report also acknowledges a decline in evangelistic activity. "Evangelistic fervour now burns low. Here and there the flame burts out; but it is fitful, and hardly flares ere it begins to falter."

The preachers and the statisticians glaringly contradict one another, and this statement applies practically to all the Churches in Christendom. The clergy are notorious boasters, most of them, no doubt, as Milman says, "more often from credulity than from dishonesty," but all of them in shocking disregard of the facts.

But why is it that the Christian Church is so conspicuously on the decline? For several scores of years the majority of the sects have had to record serious decreases both in membership and attendance, and the Sunday-school has been visibly losing its hold upon the children. It is generally put down to a rapidly growing indifference to religion, which is certainly true; but the indifference is a symptom, not a cause. Loss of interest in religion indicates a corresponding lack of faith. No one can really believe in God, and Christ, and a future life who spends his life in complete forgetfulness of them. The truth is that the day of superstition is past beyond recall, and that it is with the utmost difficulty that any belief in it is kept alive. How many thoughtful people are there who verily believe in and rely upon the Supernatural? Is it not undeniable that the very multiplicity of different and mutually exclusive denominations constitutes a formidable argument against the truth of Christianity? Are not the doctrines of all the sects in their very nature absolutely unbelievable? The authors of Christianity in History are convinced that "the tide is setting towards Reunion"; but the following is their summing up of the situation:—

> One must sadly admit in the light of the recent past, as well as of the long persistence of exclusive, often mutually exclusive, attitude of the several forms of "Catholicism"—Roman, Orthodox, and also Anglican—that divergent conceptions of "Apostolic" orthodoxy and authority, of orders, and, above all, of valid Sacraments, are likely long to keep the bulk of Christians apart for conscientious reasons (p. 604).

Recently the Rev. N. P. Williams, R.N., delivered an exceptionally lucid sermon, entitled "Reunion with the North," at All Saint's, Margaret Street, London, in which he expressed a strong desire for the reconciliation of the East with the West, and of both with the North. Belonging to the Catholic Party in the Anglican Church, Mr. Williams lays down the conditions on which he thinks the Established Church of Scotland ought to be received into union with the Church of England. As is well known, the Established Church of Scotland is Presbyterian, while that of England is Episcopal. Mr. Williams regards the Anglican Church as a normal institution, taking no note of the fact that the Church of Rome looks upon it as heretical and schismatical. The Church, he tells us, includes both a "nucleus" and a "penumbra," or "fringe"—"the nucleus consisting of normal, or orthodox, baptized persons, and the fringe consisting of those who have indeed been baptized but are unorthodox and excommunicate." Mr. Williams graciously grants that the Scottish Church consists of persons who have been baptized, but reminds it that it is only a penumbra, or fringe, by no means a nucleus. Now, the following is the style in which they of the nucleus approach them of the fringe:—

> The contrast between you and ourselves is not a contrast between black and white; it is a contrast between grey and white. The difference between you and ourselves is one of degree, and not of kind.....We recognize that you believe such and such Articles of Faith; what we wish to point out to you is that there are certain other Articles of Faith which we should like you to believe; we also wish to point out that there is a Divinely appointed governing power in the Church with which we should like you to establish regular relations, so as to legitimate your position.

At present the only merit attaching to the Established Church of Scotland is that it consists of baptized persons; but it does not include a nucleus, but only a penumbra, or fringe. In order to be reunited with the true and orthodox Church, it must adopt Episcopacy and Catholic order, repudiate Calvinism, and "restore the Lord's Supper to its central position as the chief function of Sunday." There is a party in the Church of Scotland, no doubt, which, led by Dr. Cooper, would be willing to be united with the Anglican Church on such terms; but we do not believe there are many in that communion who are prepared to acquiesce in the classification of it as merely a penumbra, or fringe, or a heretical and schismatical organization.

Our present point, however, is that the claims which the Catholic Party makes for itself are so fantastical or whimsical that it is no wonder so many people are turning their backs upon all forms of supernatural religion, and insisting upon being treated as outsiders. Mr. Williams, by such sermons as the one under consideration, which extends to five columns of the Church Times for July 5, will make more Atheists than Christians. Evidently agreeing with St. Cyprian's famous saying: "He who has not the Church for his mother, cannot have God for his Father," he necessarily alienates intelligent, self-respecting people, and helps them to realize the true nature and purport of all supernatural pretensions. Mr. Williams ought to have lived five or six centuries ago, when he could have been of genuine service to a dominant Church. To-day he is an anachronism, and consequently promotes the interests of a cause he holds in derision.

Reminiscences and Reflexions of a Mid and a Late Victorian. By Ernest Belfort Bax. (George Allen and Unwin, Ltd.; 1918.) 7s. 6d. net.

The whirligig of time brings strange revenges. All that the Philistine disclaimed some years ago your middle-class gentleman adores to-day. Walter Crane's beautiful designs have long been accepted at their true value. In music, Wagner has arrived, and is, indeed, on the eve of his departure. But nowhere has the reversal of positions been so rapid or so absolute as in literature. The Socialist writers ran a great risk. They were odious, unpopular, and were supposed to exhibit all the worst features of narrow, political propagandists. William Morris is now a classic, Edward Carpenter has a large and ever-increasing audience, and Bernard Shaw is one of the foremost literary figures in the public mind. "It is roses, roses all the way."

It is men and women who make movements interesting, and Mr. E. Belfort Bax's Reminiscences and Reflexions of a Mid and Late Victorian is a very welcome addition to the literature concerned with Socialism. We hope that it will not be the last of its kind from Mr. Bax's pen, for it throws much light on the characters of the Socialist leaders, and it tells us much of the trials and struggles of the early days. Although primarily an autobiography, Mr. Bax's unique sketch of men, manners, and movements from the "sixties" of the last century to the present time, should prove of interest to all who care for the intellectual and political life of an important period of history.

To Freethinkers the most fascinating of Mr. Bax's pages will be those dealing with the religious views current in the later years of the Victorian era. Says Mr. Bax:—

> It was my lot to grow up under no very favourable conditions for intellectual development. The subjects talked of in the family circle were mainly connected with religious dogma, or the sectarian interests of the various religious bodies. Preachers of the pure quality of their orthodoxy, as opposed on the one side to "Romanism" and on the other to "Latitudinarianism," bulked largely among the topics of conversation with ours as with other middle-class families at the time. A severe censorship in the matter of literature that was allowed into the house was maintained. As usual with the bulk of early and mid-Victorian middle-class society, the theatre in all its forms was banned. In fact in many cases, ours among them, any form of amusement was supposed to savour more or less of godlessness.

This Puritan tradition of family life is nearly extinct, and few survive who think it wicked to be happy. Dreadful shadows indeed! And millions have been reared under them. They still hover over tin-tabernacles, Salvation Army barracks, and other places of worship of the intellectually lost.

Mr. Bax is himself a Freethinker, but he wears his "rue with a difference." He even suggests that the work of the earlier Secularists was "crude and coarse." As if any reform was ever instituted, or abuse swept away, without wounding the susceptibilities of some ignorant or bigoted persons. It is better to let every soldier of progress do what he can. It is idle to quarrel with another for being different. The bolder are apt to despise the less bold as wanting in courage, but that is usually a mistake. The less bold are still more apt to sneer at the bolder as vulgar and froward, which is usually a greater mistake.

Here is what Mr. Bax has to say of the later aspects of popular Freethought :—

> It was not till the early eighties and the prosecution of Foote for blasphemy that the better educated middle classes began to have sense and justice enough to see the movement from below for freedom of thought, commonly known as Secularism, for what it was, namely, the plucky effort of men of the small middle and working classes to emancipate themselves, up to their lights, from the thraldom of an encumbering and galling superstition, fatal to all advance in knowledge and to all independent intellectual effort.

This testimonial is very different from Mr. Bax's criticism of the older Secularists. It reminds us of the clergyman who, when invited to say grace before dinner, always began with "Bountiful Jehovah" if he saw champagne on the table, but moderated his transports in the presence of claret.

It is not as a Freethinker, however, but as an apostle of Socialism that Mr. Bax will be remembered. The story of the early struggles of that movement, as unfolded by him in these pages, reads like a romance—a romance of brave men and women fighting at fearful odds, and ultimately triumphing. His association with the Socialist movement brought with it introductions to men of genius, which, in many instances, ripened into friendship. One gets many pleasant glimpses of Bernard Shaw, William Morris, Friedrich Engels, Jean Jaures, August Bebel, Prince Kropotkin, and a whole host of famous men. These vignettes are etched with an engaging frankness, as when he tells the story of Bernard Shaw borrowing half-a-crown of him, and his returning the money next day. Bax rallied him on his promptness and scrupulosity. "Oh," said Shaw, "it is my habit to show punctilious accuracy in small money matters, so that when the time comes I may pull off my big coup with success."

The veteran Mr. H. M. Hyndman's fondness for "the frock coat, the pot-hat, and the linked shirt-cuff" is duly noted by Mr. Bax, who adds: "nothing would induce me to don this hideous and sordid uniform." Mr. Hyndman not only wore it bravely and constantly, but even sold Socialist papers in the Strand and Fleet Street whilst so garbed. Mr. Cunninghame Graham, on the other hand, is mentioned as having a "passion for fashionable dress," and as bearing a resemblance to Charles the First. Readers should turn to Mr. Bax's volume for themselves. It is a fascinating book, forcefully and modestly written, and ought to be read by all those who care about the betterment of the conditions of the majority of their fellow-men. It should also remind Socialists that Clericalism is the real enemy. Doubtless, in time, Socialists will yet discover, like Red Riding Hood, that the Church is not a grandmother but a wolf.

He says I'm no use! but I won't reply.
You're lucky not being of use to him!
On week-days he's playing at Spider and Fly,
And on Sundays he sings about Cherubim!
Nailing shillings to counters is his chief work;
He nods now and then at the name on his door:
But judge of us two at a bow and a smirk,
I think I'm his match: and I'm honest—that's more.

IN May, 1903, Lord Kelvin, a distinguished physicist, made some remarks at a meeting of the Christian Association at University College, which were reported in the Times. This was followed by a letter, in which, after speaking of "the coming into existence, or the growth, or the continuation of the molecular combinations presented in the bodies of living things," that scientist said: "Here scientific thought is compelled to accept the idea of Creative Power.....Modern biologists are coming once more to the acceptance of a Vital principle." This remarkable statement produced replies from several eminent biologists and scientists, including Sir E. Ray Lankester, Sir W. T. Thiselton-Dyer, Sir J. Burden-Sanderson, Professor Karl Pearson, and others—who all repudiated or condemned Lord Kelvin's unauthorized statement. The following are extracts from the reply of Professor Ray Lankester, which I take from the Appendix to his Kingdom of Man :—

> Lord Kelvin seems to have formed the conception of a creator who, first of all, without care or foresight, has produced what we call "matter," with its necessary properties.....and then, as a second effort, has brought some of these elements together with "creative and directive purpose," mixing them, as it were, with a "vital principle" so as to form living things.....I do not myself know of any one of admitted leadership among modern biologists who is showing signs of "coming to a belief in the existence of a Vital principle.".....Modern biologists do not accept the hypothesis of "telepathy" advocated by Sir Oliver Lodge, nor that of the intrusions of disembodied spirits pressed upon them by others of the same school.

No one of any note appears to have taken the side of Lord Kelvin in this controversy; but five years later Sir Oliver Lodge published his Man and the Universe, in which the repudiated "Vital principle" figures as an apparently scientific fact.

We will now look at what Professor Huxley has called "the physical basis of life." When a seed is placed in the ground and well watered, it soon begins to draw into itself nutriment obtained from the earth, the air, rain, and sunshine, which substances are all non-living and contain no vital properties whatever; then, by some chemical process, it combines them all into one substance, known as protein or protoplasm, which is capable of sustaining life. Upon this subject Professor Huxley says :—

> This "physical basis of life" depends upon the pre-existence of certain compounds; namely, carbonic acid, water, and ammonia. Withdraw any one of these three from the world, and all vital phenomena come to an end. Carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen are all lifeless bodies. Of these, carbon and oxygen unite in certain proportions, and under certain conditions, to give rise to carbonic acid; hydrogen and oxygen produce water; nitrogen and hydrogen give rise to ammonia. These new compounds, like the elementary bodies of which they are composed, are lifeless. But when they are brought together, under certain conditions, they give rise to the still more complex body, protoplasm, and this protoplasm exhibits the phenomena of life.

Here it should be noted that the difference between plants and animals, in the matter of food, is that plants are able to draw the protoplasm necessary for their growth and development out of inorganic substances, whereas animals (including man) are unable to do so, and are obliged to obtain the protoplasm they require ready made, either in the form of grass or other vegetable substance, or the flesh of other animals. Both Professor

Huxley and Tyndall reject the idea of a "vital principle," as do also the great majority of other scientists. In his essay on "Vitality" (1863) Professor Tyndall says:—

> To account for the origin, growth, and energies of living things it was usual to assume a special agent, free to a great extent from the limitations observed among the powers of inorganic nature. This agent was called "vital force"; and under its influence, plants and animals were supposed to collect their materials and to assume determinate forms.....In tracing these phenomena through all their modifications, the most advanced philosophers of the present day declare that they ultimately arrive at a single source of power, from which all vital energy is derived.....The source of power consists in the forcible separation of the atoms of compound substances by the Sun.....The building up of the vegetable, then, is effected by the sun, through the reduction of chemical compounds.....The primary action of the sun's rays is qualified by the atoms and molecules among which their energy is distributed. Molecular forces determine the form which the solar energy may assume. In the separation of the carbon and oxygen this energy may be so conditioned as to result in one case in the formation of a cabbage and in another case in the formation of an oak.

Here we see that so long ago as 1863 Sir Oliver Lodge's "vital principle" was rejected by the most advanced scientists of that day as purely imaginary. The real agent is the sun, which, by breaking up the atoms of compound substances, enables the plant to draw into itself the carbonic acid, water, and ammonia necessary for its life and development. There remain now in this connection but two points to be noticed. The first is that the matter constituting the organisms of both the animal and vegetable kingdoms is precisely the same as that which forms the inorganic world. There is no substance in the animal or vegetable tissues which was not, in the first instance, obtained from the earth, the water, and the air. The second point is that it is the compounding of forces belonging to the inorganic world which gives rise to the mystery called "vitality" in the organic. Before the compounding they are all lifeless (carbonic acid, water, ammonia, etc.); after the compounding the new compound is found to possess new properties, one of which, in the case of protoplasm, is the vitality which sustains life. We thus arrive at the fact that the so-called "vital principle" is simply a property of a certain complex form of inorganic matter; so that the agency of what believers in immortality call "Creative Power" is shown to be wholly unnecessary.

Before closing this paper, I must make one more extract from Man and the Universe, in order to indicate more clearly what is Sir Oliver Lodge's true position. That scientist says (p. 58):—

> My contention is that Life is, from the mechanical point of view, not a force nor an energy, but only a guiding and directing principle.....It directs terrestrial energy along a certain channel.....A railway guides a train to its destination, while the engine supplies the energy and propels it. Any force exerted by the rails is perpendicular to the motion and does no work.....Life and Mind have determined where the rails shall be laid down, and when and whence and whither the trains are to be run, but they exert no iota of force upon them..... A path can guide a traveller to his destination without exerting any force upon him at all.

In the foregoing paragraph we have a truly novel idea. We are told that in the human organism Life and Mind direct the cells of protoplasm in the formation and development of that organism. This is done by making grooves and channels and slits and slots and rails and paths along which the cells are to work. But in the case of a railway-train Sir Oliver ignores the fact that rails could not be laid down without "work," and that this had to be done before any trains could run. When Life and Mind had "determined" where the rails and grooves had to be placed for the building up of the organism, who did the work of laying them down? Sir Oliver does not say. Life, not being energy, could not do it. During the gestative period and that of early childhood, Mind was not in existence; and when, at a later period (after the brain had developed) it may be assumed to be in being, it had no definite knowledge of any of the internal organs of the body or of their functions. Who, then, made the slits and slots and rails which Life and the then non-existent Mind had "determined" should be laid down? Do the cells first prepare and arrange the preliminary framework of their future constructive work? If they do, how do Life and the unexistent Mind direct them? If they do not, how can Life and the unborn Mind guide them into the non-existent rails and slits and grooves along which they are to go? Is it not clear that Life and the not yet developed Mind should do something more than merely look on, if they are to guide and direct? And is it not equally clear that the idea of Life and Mind guiding and directing the building up of the human organism, or guiding anything whatever, is pure nonsense? As we have already seen, Life and Mind do no guiding or directing in the process of building up the physical body; Sir Oliver's theories, then, are not in harmony with facts.

We are inclined to think that the Freethinker was pretty well alone in having a leading article pointing out the real significance of the French National Day. All the newpapers wrote on it, but carefully steered clear of saying that it was the anniversary of one of the greatest and most beneficial revolutions in human history. Some of the papers left one wondering what the day really did celebrate. And the Daily Telegraph leading article took easily first place. For reading it one was almost bound to come to the conclusion that the French National Day was to "celebrate" France's entry into the War in 1914. The Revolution of 1789, with all that it meant for France and the world, didn't even get honourable mention.

Now, we do, of course, honour France for the stand she made in 1914, and for the stand she has made since. But those who remember the services of France to the world honour her the more because in this matter she has remained true to herself, to her fine instinct for right, to her readiness to sacrifice in the pursuit of an idea. All the more regrettable it is that English "society" has not yet found itself able to celebrate the French National Day on the proper date, July 14. In the first year of the War, 1915, some aristocratic ladies—duchesses and other society odds and ends—arranged for a flag day on July 7, in spite of there being one already arranged on the proper date. This year some one is responsible for having fixed it for the 12th. French people, who have a sense of humour, will note these things with a shrug and a smile. For ourselves, we are left wondering why if fighting to ward off tyranny in 1918 is a good thing, we cannot frankly acknowledge the benefits of a similar stand made in 1789? Is it because to be celebrating the anniversary of a Revolution is considered dangerous?

France, of course, kept its National Day on the proper date, July 14 And America, we see, celebrated it as "Bastille Day." That is a better acknowledgment of its origin than writing as though the main purpose was to keep the public in ignorance of the cause of the birth of Modern France.

The Archbishops' Second Committee of Inquiry on "The Worship of the Church" will arouse mixed feelings among the faithful. The astute ecclesiastics recommend ten-minute sermons, the greater use of the best classical music, the curbing of clerical authority, free and open places of worship, and other measures for the popularizing of the Church. In plain English, the secularization of religion is proceeding rapidly.

As in a lady's letter the postscript is often the most important item, so the appendix to the Archbishops' Report is very illuminative. Three Army Chaplains declare that the Prayer Book authorizes and perpetuates a view of the Bible which is "untrue and offensive to any lively conscience or intelligence." Those Army Chaplains are to be congratulated. Let us hope that they will convert their clerical brethren to the same healthy views. The Prayer Book does present the Bible in a sense that has died out of the minds of all decently educated Christians.

In a well-written article on "The Unmarried Mother," the Daily News quotes the terrible indictment: "There are few darker blots upon Christianity than the way in which illegitimate children have been sacrificed in the name of religion and morality." Remembering the origin of the Founder of Christianity, the admission is all the more remarkable.

The Rev. F. C. Unmack, Rector of Horsley, relates, as an instance of answer to prayer, the recovery of his bicycle, which was stolen last February. Police investigation failing, he prayed for months, and finally found the machine at Leatherhead Station. Brother Unmack is too late with his testimonial to the value of prayer. Is there one church that shows so much belief in prayer as to dispense with a lightning-conductor?

But while the Lord was hunting round after the missing "bike," seven of his Churches have been destroyed around Mackay, Queensland, by a cyclone. To save a bicycle and lose seven churches, doesn't seem very wise economy. The Church Times is opening a fund to make good the Lord's carelessness in Queensland.

Columns were printed in the Press concerning Independence Day. The pressmen had much to say concerning Washington and his colleagues; but they all forgot to mention Thomas Paine, the man who first wrote the words "The United States of America," and whose virile pen was as instrumental in forming the great Republic of the West as the swords of Lafayette and Washington.

During the last ten years the United Methodist Church has had a net decrease of 10,000 in its membership, the present total church roll being only 153,268. To that total we are informed that, during last year, twenty adult members were added. Thus we see that this sect, like the Wesleyan Methodist, fails to establish its divinity by any phenomenal success.

The Rev. Thomas Phillips, of Bloomsbury Chapel, London, pictures the Agnostic as "wistfully and blindly groping after the unknown God," thereby showing most clearly that about the genuine Agnostic he knows absolutely nothing. We know it to be an incontrovertible fact that the overwhelming majority of so-called Agnostics are perfectly contented without any God at all, and that they are not lower, to say the very least, in the scale of character than the most ardent believers. Mr. Phillips seems to be incapable of doing the simplest act of justice to those who do not share his fanatical beliefs.

Rev. C. A. Frith, former Curate of Stavely, was cast in £150 damages for having slandered the Headmaster of Stavely Church of England School during the course of a sermon. Mr. Justice Lush said it was a monstrous thing for a minister to use the pulpit to attack the character of people. In defence of Mr. Firth, we beg to point out that this has always been the practice of the pulpit, and it might well have been thought that this conferred immunity on a clergyman. Some of the worst of slanders have been voiced from the pulpit. And the fault is really due to the training Christian ministers receive. Still, we are pleased to see one parson brought to book. It may teach others to be more careful; although on that point we have our doubts.

Falstaff and his men in buckram were heroes compared with the clergy. At the City Temple (London), recently, an American parson appeared in the pulpit in full khaki uniform. Then the hero of a hundred tea-fights fought the Devil for an hour, and the victory was as shadowy as the spiritual opponent. Let us hope that the girls and grandfathers in the pews were duly impressed.

Miss Rebecca West, in a review of a book on Russia, declares that some writers, when dealing with that country, have the "remarkable conviction that any idiot using a religious vocabulary is the mouthpiece of divinity." This idea is by no means restricted to writers on Russian subjects. The phenomenon may be witnessed much nearer home.

Thirty Church of England training colleges are to be placed under the control of a Board of Supervisors, in order to modernize the buildings and to develop the religious instruction. It would be far more to the purpose if the instruction was modernized as well as the bricks and mortar.

The Bishop of Hereford hopes "The God of Love and Justice will be with us in our effort to answer His declared will by drawing His servants together." Meanwhile, his servants are having a row as to what is his declared will. What the Bishop should do is to ask "Him" to send someone along to give an authoritative statement as to what the dickens he really desires.

The Irish News of July 6 contains an account of another death of Atheism in France. But Atheism has died so often that one may regard this as quite a normal condition. This time the account is taken from Madame Suzanne Duprees, an actress. This lady writes that—"Atheism, which never gnawed more than skin-deep into the average Frenchman, has been swept clean away." The War has done it, apparently. The soldiers have seen the French priests in the ranks, etc., and the War has "swept France clean of Atheism." In that case, the duty of our own clergy is plain. Let them all join the Army, fight as common soldiers, and then England will be swept clean of Atheism. We present the tip to our bishops. But they may reflect that imagination is a good quality in an actress.

The worst of it is that it makes the French people such idiots—and we certainly never took the French people for fools. We never heard that millions of people called themselves Atheists in France because they were dissatisfied with the priests, but rather because they were dissatisfied with the priests' religion. And whether a particular priest turns out a blackguard or a hero can't make the slightest difference. A priest dying in the trenches—when all has been said—can't prove the truth of the Virgin Birth to a logical-minded Frenchman; nor will the administration of the Last Sacrament on a battlefield prove the resurrection of Jesus. The kind of thing retailed by Madame Duprees is good enough for an English audience—when told of France; but there is no need for her to paint her compatriots as fools. When a man becomes an Atheist by reasoning, he is not likely to recant from funk.

The new Bishop of Hereford says that he accepts the Creed ex animo. The Church Times wants to know what Dr. Henson really means by ex animo. English Church liberals complain that he has "said too little as to the sense in which he recites the Creed"; while Dr. Kirsopp Lake, an American, accuses him, in the current number of the Hibbert Journal, of having said too much. Dr. Lake, speaking for American Church liberals, declares that they do not accept the Creed ex animo, his contention being that they have entirely outgrown it. They recite without believing it, merely "as a matter of Church discipline and custom." Theological leaders being thus confessedly hypocrites, is it to be wondered at that the trend of the age is emphatically away from all religious rites and ceremonies, even from every form of supernatural religion itself?

To Correspondents.

E. STURGISS.—Your suggestion is a good one, but until the resources of the Freethinker enable us to get regular help, we don't know how we could find time to carry it out. We already work from breakfast till bed-time, and the only way we can see how to do more is to knock off the bed-time.

R. DAVISON.—See "Acid Drops."

A. P. BROOMFIELD.—It is absurd of the Daily Chronicle to say that they do not publish correspondence of a religious nature, particularly when your letter was a comment on a bishop's speech reported in that paper. What the editor probably means is that he does not care to publish anything that attacks Christianity. And that is the policy of most of the London newspapers.

W. BARTON (Ipswich).—(1) Both books are out of print. (2) Securing two new readers in a week is good work, and your newsagent displaying the paper and chalking the contents outside is capital. We also dream of a big circulation one day, and it will not be our fault if we do not get it. (3) Pleased you found the Pioneer Leaflets useful. We are sending on a further supply.

H. BULL.—Humbugs all—or nearly all.

R. ELIOT.—We have been considering reprinting, but cannot say when. It means a considerable expenditure, and that spells capital. Our great difficulty at present is just that, but we are doing our best. Perhaps one day we shall be better off, and can then do more.

MR. HOWARD RUFF, Secretary of the Royal Society of St. George, writes that the rejoinder of "Mimnermus" in our issue of July 7, in no wise refutes the statements made by himself. Mr. Ruff complains that "Mimnermus" merely repeats the statements made originally by himself, without dealing with the objections raised to them.

T. MAIR.—Pleased you found our notes on France "inspiring." But you are a little out in your chronology. In 1791 Burke wrote to the English Minister at Turin, suggesting the restoration of the Monarchy, and added that "nothing else but a foreign force can or will do. In this design, too, Great Britain and Prussia must at least acquiesce." Burke's reason was that "if they are suffered finally to triumph in France," they may "extend themselves to us, and blast all the health and vigour of that happy Constitution which we enjoy."

L. MYERS.—We have given the approximate numbers in our leaflet, What is the Use of the Clergy? a parcel of which has been sent you. We do not think exact figures are available.

B. F. B. writes, apropos of our notes on "Religion and Medicine," that the praiseworthy work of medical men among the troops is accompanied by payment of a fixed salary. In private practice a doctor depends upon fees, which discriminates in favour of the wealthy. He thinks doctors should be paid in peace as they are in war, from the State Fund raised by a "Health Tax."

MAJOR HUNTER.—Thanks for journal. We are glad to have your appreciation of our editorship.

T. A. MCKEE.—We quite appreciate your comment on articles, and are glad you find the paper so interesting. The initiative in the discussion rests, of course, with Dr. Lyttelton. We have no doubt but that it will prove instructive.

H. AUSTEN.—Pleased you found our notes on the French Revolution so useful.

A. STOCHARD.—Sorry we are unable to find space for your letter.

J. ROBINSON.—The Act you inquire about is the 29th of Charles II.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

A conference of South Wales Freethinkers will be held on Saturday, July 20, at the Wyndham Hotel, Bridgend, at 5 o'clock. The meeting will be addressed by Mr. Cohen and Mr. Lloyd. The immediate topic of the conference will be "Christianity and Freethought," and, it is hoped, the conference will lead to serviceable developments.

On Sunday Mr. Cohen will lecture twice in the Gem Cinema Palace, Maesteg, at 2.30 and 7.30. July is not the best of months for indoor lectures, but the friends thought it a pity not to have some lectures while Mr. Cohen was in the neighbourhood, and he agreed to deliver them. There will be nothing in the way—except faulty train service—of friends coming from a distance.

The Manchester Branch undertakes its next "Ramble" to-day (July 21). Members and friends will meet at the Mosley Street end of Piccadilly, or Altrincham car terminus. Tea will be provided at Ashley. Committee meeting after tea.

We have just received the Fortieth Annual Report of the Malthusian League, copies of which can be obtained at one penny from the Society's office, 48 Broadway, Westminster. The League faces the work of driving sane ideas into the head of the none too pervious British public with its usual courage, and is evidently making progress. The Report notes that the opposition of the Churches is weakening; which, of course, means that Malthusian opinion is gaining. For the Churches never retreat nor reconsider until forced.

A very large number of papers and magazines have ceased to exist in consequence of the War, and nearly all have had their appearance and price considerably altered. We have watched the disappearance of many without concern, but we do regret that Notes & Queries, a most valuable medium of information for all students, is now appearing only monthly instead of every week. Saturday's Daily Chronicle reported that several hundred newspapers had also ceased to exist in the United States. So the question of the price and supply of paper is making itself felt there as well as here.

MORALITY INDEPENDENT OF THEOLOGY.

To place anything in God, or to derive anything from God, is nothing more than to withdraw it from the test of reason, to institute it as indubitable, unassailable, sacred, without rendering an account why. Hence self-delusion, if not wicked, insidious design, is at the root of all efforts to establish morality, right, on theology. When we are in earnest about the right we need no incitement or support from above. We need no Christian rule of political right; we need only one which is rational, just, human. The right, the true, the good, has always its ground of sacredness in itself, in its quality. Where man is in earnest about ethics, they have in themselves the validity of a divine power.

Obituary.

We deeply regret to announce the death of a young and promising Secularist, Annie Hypatia Margaret Harwood, at the early age of eighteen. The deceased was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Harwood, of Tottenham, who for upwards of thirty years have been strenuous supporters of our Movement in Northern London. The immediate cause of her death was gastric trouble, accelerated by influenza. The funeral took place at Tottenham Cemetery on Thursday, July 11, when, by special request, a Secular Burial Service was read by Miss K. B. Kough. The profoundest sympathy of all who knew them is extended to her grief-stricken parents and family.—E. M. VANCE.

The War and God.

(Concluded from p. 382.)

IN the early days of the War many professional Christians claimed that it was bringing people back to God—and, of course, they always meant their particular Christian God. (The process was generally stated to be going on in some other part of the world than that in which the assertion was made.) More recently, parsons (and others) of all denominations have been forced to admit this is not so. And they have lamented it. I could quote you articles and books galore in which these admissions are made. Quite recently a book was published, written by an Army officer who is evidently an earnest Theist, if not a Christian. Going over his own experiences in the Army, he laments that, beyond a vague belief in some nebulous kind of a God (who doesn't appear to do much good), there is very little religious belief in the Army. A kind of Fatalism is the nearest approach to any widespread religious belief amongst men engaged in the War. That is quite an understandable phenomenon—quite common in similar circs.—and is not, perhaps, a bad belief for the ordinary fighting men, though a rotten kind of testimonial to the "benevolence" of the God who directs that fate. I, myself, have had fairly good opportunities of observation in the Army, in France, in the Navy, and amongst "civvies" (both in Britain and France), since the War began; and I am a keen observer. All my experience more than bears out the admissions made by these various "believers." From the beginning till now, I have seen only one man pray before turning in. He was a young sailor in barracks. You know the story of our half-hour on the deck of a sinking boat in a mid-winter storm—with no hope whatever—until the last few moments. I heard no prayers, and certainly "Nearer, my God, to Thee" was not sung. "What the Captain said" when the boat received its final "damage" was not a prayer! Nor were the utterances of the engineer below. I know how few would attend Church Parade were it voluntary, and really voluntary, as it ought to be. The Chaplains, who follow a God of Peace, Poverty, and Humility (but who do so in a Sam Browne belt and with a Captain's commission) like compulsory Church parades (naturally), because thus they have bigger audiences than they have ever been able to get in recent years.

Remember, I am not saying that the great mass of men, either in or outside "the Services," are definite Atheists from intellectual conviction (though the number of them is greater than you think). There are not so many who can say they have been Atheist, with a philosophy based on reason and knowledge, since 1891 (as I can). And that philosophy is stronger to-day than ever. Unfortunately, the sway of reason has not yet become anything like general; but the bulk of people, so far as my experience goes, realize in a dim kind of a way that this War, with all its attendant horrors, is only a complete debacle for Christianism, but is utterly irreconcilable with the idea of a Personal God, omnipotent, omniscient, and benevolent, creator, and director of the universe, and all that therein is. This dim conviction with the mass is emotional rather than intellectual or rational. But it is a great advance. After all, it is the only position.

To postulate such a personal God as the cause of all phenomena (and such a phenomena as the War) is to make a fiendish nightmare of life, and is the worst of blasphemies. It is a far more horrible belief even than that which Rabbie so finely satirized when he sang—

> O! Thou, wha' in the Heav'ns dos't dwell,
> Wha', as it pleases best Thysel',
> Sends yin ta Heav'n, an' ten tae Hell,
> A' for Thy Glory,
> An' no for ony guid or ill
> They've dune afore Thee.

In the last analysis the great majority of decent people, no matter what religious belief they profess, are Atheists in their daily life. Apart from such religious observances that may be still maintained in greater or less degree, they conduct their lives, they base their morality, on reason and knowledge. They are, in a practical sense, Rationalists. (And Rationalism is only the positive side of Atheism). It is like poor Sir Oliver Lodge, who believes so earnestly in spooks, that he is not ashamed publicly to assert that his son, Raymond, smokes spook cigars and drinks spook pegs in the "Summerland." Yet, when, as a physicist, he enters his laboratory or study, he carries on his work as the veriest Atheist, and quite ignores the puir spooks in experiment or calculation. Only on that basis of Atheism can a sane, quiet, practical, and rational Meliorism be built up; a philosophy that can give us some hope for men and women, and some satisfaction in life.

Tennyson was not an Atheist. He wanted to believe; but he had to admit that "nature, red in tooth and claw, with ravine shrieks against the Creed." The most he could do was: "Oh! yet we hope that somehow Good will be the final goal of ill." Old Omar's braver hope was—

> Ah Love! Could you and I with Him conspire
> To grasp this sorry scheme of Things entire,
> Would not we shatter it to bits—and then
> Remould it nearer to the Heart's Desire!

These hopes can only be realized in any measure by the steady and growing co-operation of men and women in rational and practical betterment of the here and now. Whether there be one God, many Gods, or no God; whether we be mortal or immortal, we can (and we will) make this world far better than it is for men and women, and happier. That is Atheism, Rationalism, Humanism, Secularism, Meliorism—call it what you will.

And in striving towards that, we must destroy alike the fanatic, brutal, military, megalomaniacal religion of the Germans, and the servile, Pacifist, Resist-not-evil, Impossibilist religion that is the predominant brand preached in Britain.

France has borne herself in this War with greater courage, calm, and determination, than ever before. France, from the outset, has been The nation that has been resolved this ghastly struggle must be the end of militarism. "Jamais encore" is the cry in France, as in no other country (except, perhaps, now the U.S.A.). That has been done under the ægis of Atheism. It was under the same auspices, led by Emile Zola (Atheist), that Dreyfus was vindicated, the Clericals routed, the Army purified and re-organized. And it is Anatole France (Atheist) to-day who, more than any other, voices the aspirations of France—nay, of Europe.

So, looking around, even during this tragic time, I can see the increasing bout of Christianism and Theism. I can mark, with satisfaction, the advance that has been made, and the steadily growing success of Freethought since I joined in that "best of causes" in 1891. Much remains to be done to complete the task, ecrasez l'infame, but I can see the sun of victory rising in gradual, growing, glow on the banner of Freethought.

Before I close this somewhat lengthy epistle, just one word on the personal factor in the equation. In your references thereto, you appear to mix up "success in life" (from the orthodox point of view) with "happiness in life." But, perhaps, that is the orthodox view, though strangely contrasted against the life, teaching, and example of the reputed Christ of the Canonical Gospels!

My life has not been an unhappy one. I have done many things I ought not to have done, and many of the things I ought to have done have been left undone. Just as the principles and ideals of Rationalism are so much grander than those of Christianism so are my shortcomings the greater. While regretting the "lapses" 'twere foolish, as futile, to be "unhappy" on that score. The rational thing to do is to try to use them as stepping-stones to higher things. Happiness is a personal matter. It is difficult (if not impossible) to measure or compare the quantity and quality of happiness in different individuals. So far as that can be done, my life has been in quality, certainly, and in quantity, probably, a happier one than yours. I have done much, seen much, and been through a lot. But my Humanism has enabled me to preserve a certain philosophic imperturbability and calm happiness that one could never hope to have, if one really believed in the Christian God. What sustained the noblest of the human race as Socrates, Lucretius, Omar, Bruno, Marcus Aurelius, Ferrer, or Tyndall when his wife accidentally poisoned "her poor John," has never failed me in my tinpot way. In the few instances of acute unhappiness in my life, religion has played not a little part. In any case—

> To-morrow and to-morrow and to-morrow
> Creeps in this petty pace, from day to day
> To the last syllable of recorded time.
> And all our yesterdays have lighted fools
> The way to dusty death.
> Out! Out! Brief candle!
> Life's but a walking shadow;
> A poor player who struts and frets his hour
> Upon the stage, and then is heard no more.
> It is as a tale told by an idiot—
> Full of sound and fury—signifying nothing.

Last point of all that ends this story—my "failure" to use the "chances" that I had, my lack of "success." But have I failed? A verdict of failure or success in life (or in any venture) must depend on what the objective was at the start. I don't suppose you have any idea of the utter contempt with which I regard conventional standards of success and "successful" men. In this (as in so many other things), the views I held in 1891, are sound to-day, and still hold good. Even from the conventional point of view, I cannot be convicted of failure in life when, at the outset of the War, I was fit to "do my bit," and ever since have done it both by land and sea.

But, apart from the War, the wealthiest merchant prince, or the biggest pedigreed ('tis a good word!) "nobleman" in Scotland (or elsewhere), or the greatest king that may be, or any such person, has nothing that I envy. I have much that they have not.

Or if I look at "successful" statesmen (Where?) or politicians (of any party) to-day, or even, parsons, what puir, puir, stuff! More than their feet are fit to "stop a hole te keep the wind away" before they're dead. What low ideals should I have to envy them. Their "success" would be rankest failure to me. Soldiers (from the private to the top), sailors (of all ranks and ratings), munition and other workers, have been "successful"; but, largely, just as conventional standards of success have been disregarded or scrapped. You may call this swank (probably will), but 'tis sober truth. At least, I have the success (or satisfaction) of saying "I told you so." For many of the thiugs I said, and many of the ideas I advocated many years ago, have been accepted since—some since the War began. "'Tis true, 'tis pity; and pity 'tis 'tis true," that such a ghastly tragedy as this War should be the means of confirming those philosophical and sociological ideas that I (one among a comparative few) held so many years ago.

And still, to-day (touched, perhaps, with a healthy cynicism), I have as much zest in life, as much joie de vivre (and savoir vivre!), as much interest in life, as ever I had, and I've had not a little.

I have lived with the real "immortals" all along. My greatest pride and satisfaction in life has been, and is, that I have fought as a soldier in the Grand Army of Freethought—have enjoyed the comradeship of the noblest of the human race. La verite oblige is the unequalled motto of that comradeship.

Worthily to bear my part in that grandest and "best of causes" (as George Meredith called it) is the greatest aspiration that I have ever had. To HAVE borne it is the greatest success that I could reach.

With best wishes to yourself and family, I remain, with imperturbability, that combination of beau sabreur and philosopher, your old friend,

ATHOS ZENO.

Playing at Sunday-School.

I HAVE always had a fondness for stories relating to Virginia. It may have been the romantic adventures of Captain John Smith and the wonderful story of the Pocohontas maiden that first aroused that interest. Or I may have inhaled it from the fragrant weed for which the State of Virginia is so justly famed. I cannot say. But Thackeray's Esmond and such tales as By Order of the Company have always specially interested me, and so, when I first came across The Valiants of Virginia, it was a foregone conclusion that I must sample its pages. And when I had read it I was ve-e-ry glad. It is not only an interesting and thrilling tale, but one of the chapters—the heading of which might justly be altered to "Playing at Sunday-School"—contains one of the funniest missionary stories that I have met with.

The reader may try and imagine an old Virginian garden which has been allowed to go to wreck and ruin through long years of neglect, and a group of children, under the leadership of Miss Rickey Snyder, gathered to amuse themselves according to whatever whim or fancy seized them.

"It was Sunday afternoon, and under the hemlocks Rickey had gathered her minions—a dozen children from near-by houses, with the usual sprinkling of little blacks from the kitchens." And after some little altercation between Rickey and Cozy Cabell and Greenie Simms, one of the number proposed to play something—King, King Katiko for preference. One little urchin objected to this on the ground that they were forbidden to play anything but Bible games on Sunday.

"Well," decreed Rickey, "we'll play Sunday-school then. It would take a saint to object to that. I'm superintendent, and this stump's my desk. All you children sit down under that tree."

They ranged themselves in two rows: the white children, in clean Sabbath pinafores and go-to-meeting knickerbockers, in front; and the coloured ones, in ginghams and cotton print, in the rear—the habitual expression of a differing social station.

After some little further parley as to classes and lessons, the self-constituted superintendent silenced the meeting in her peremptory way.

"The lesson is over," Rickey said, "and I've just rung the bell for silence. Children, this is Missionary Sunday, and I'm glad to see so many happy faces here to-day."

Getting her eye upon an indolent little darkie in the back row, she said, sharply:

"Sit up, Greenie. People don't lie on their backs in Sunday-school."

Greenie yawned dismally, and righted herself with injured slowness. "Ah diffuses ter 'cep' yo' insult, Rickey Snyder," she said. "Ah'd ruthah lose mah 'ligion dan mah laz'ness."

"Let us all rise," continued Rickey, unmoved, "and sing 'Kingdom Coming.'" And she struck up lustily, beating time on the stump with a stick:

"From all the dark places of earth's heathen races,
O, see how the thick shadows flee!"

And the rows of children joined in with unction, the coloured contingent coming out strong on the chorus:

"De yerf shall be full ob de wunduhful story
As watahs dat covah de sea!"

"We will now take up the collection," said Rickey. "Remember that what you give to-day is for the poor heathen in—in Alabama."

"That's no heathen place," objected Cozy, with spirit. "My cousin lives in Alabama."

"Well, then," acquiesced Rickey, "anywhere you like. For the poor heathen who have never heard of God or Virginia. Think of them, and give cheerfully."

After severely reprimanding one of the children who had put a toad on the piece of bark used as a plate, Rickey announced:

"The collection this afternoon has amounted to a hundred dollars and seven cents. And now, children, we will skip the Catechism, and I will tell you a story."

Her auditors hunched themselves nearer, a double row of attentive black and white faces, as Rickey, with a preliminary bass cough, and in a drawling tone, whose mimicry called forth giggles of ecstasy, began to spin the following yarn:—

"There were once two little sisters who went to Sunday-school and loved their teacher ve-e-ery much. They were always good and attentive—not like that little nigger over there! The one with his thumb in his mouth! One was little Mary and the other was little Susy. They had a mighty rich uncle who lived in Richmond, and once he came to see them, and gave them each a dollar. And they were ve-e-ery glad. It wasn't a mean old paper dollar, all dirt and creases; nor a battered silver dollar; but it was a bright, round, gold dollar, right out of the mint. Little Mary and little Susy could hardly sleep that night for thinking of what they could buy with these gold dollars.

"Early next morning they went down-town, hand in hand to the store, and little Susy bought a bag of goober-peas, and sticks and sticks of striped candy, and a limber Jack, and a gold ring, and a wax doll with a silk dress on that could open and shut its eyes.

"'Huh!' said the captious Cozy, 'you can't buy a wax doll for a dollar. My littlest, littlest one cost three, and she didn't have a stitch to her back!'

"'Shut up!' said Rickey, sharply. 'Dolls were cheaper then.' She looked at the row of little negroes, goggle-eyed at the vision of such largess.

"'What do you think little Mary did with her gold dollar? She loved dolls and candy, too, but she had heard about the poo-oo-r heathen. There was a tear in her eye, but she took the dollar home, and next day she went to Sunday-school and dropped it in the missionary-box.'

"'Little children, what do you reckon became of that dollar? It bought a big satchelful of tracts for a missionary. He had been a poor man with six children and a wife with a bone-felon on her right hand—not a child old enough to wash dishes, and all of them young enough to fall in the fire—so he had to go and be a missionary.

"He was going to Alabam—to a cannibal island, and he took the tracts and sailed away in a ship that landed him on the shore. And when the heathen cannibals saw him they were ve-e-ery glad, for there hadn't been any shipwrecked sailors for a long time, and they were ve-e-ery hungry. So they tied up the missionary and gathered a lot of wood to make a fire and cook him.

"But it had rained, and rained, and rained for so long that the wood was all wet, and it wouldn't burn, and they all cried because they were so hungry. And then they happened to find the satchelful of tracts, and the tracts were ve-e-ery dry. They took them and stuck them under the wet wood, and the tracts burned and the wood caught fire, and they cooked the missionary and ATE him.

"Now, little children, which do you think did the most good with her dollar—little Susy or little Mary?"

. . . . .

Whatever difference of opinion there may be as to the ethics of such a ticklish question, there is no doubt that the verdict of the heathen cannibals would be in favour of little Mary.

JOSEPH BRYCE.

Thoughts Awheel.

..... and dear the schoolboy spot
We ne'er forget, though there we are forgot.—Byron.

IT was Sunday, and early in the present summer—too early in fact; we had hoped, even planned, that the sun would be shining full in a valley far away, and it was so; though, at starting, the skies were overcast, and the north wind had a wintry sting, the sun shone warm in the sheltered vale. One could even bathe in the dappled amber stream, and afterwards recline in Pagan state upon a bank of flowers—and my lady would just be home from prayers!

They were Freethoughts and happy thoughts; the day was fine, and the wheel was free. You pick them up as you go these thoughts, or they awaken in the mind as you speed along, as scene after scene unfolds itself as the wheelman warms to his work, as freedom and action and fresh air chase the last phantom from his brain, and his whole being shouts hurrah! These are great moments. Life was made for joy after all. One feels one in ten thousand, and one is. The "Great War" seems so negligible, crude, and obscene, remote, absurd, impossible, so stupid, brutal, and ugly. Life was made for love, and joy, and happiness. And yet, just in front, at the foot of a short, sharp, sylvan declivity, are the cot, the mill, the sandstone cliffs, the trailing woods, and the solemn, slumbrous, Ayr, stealing slow along, sounding, one would think, in long drawn-out monotone, the everlasting music of its name, and there at the heart of the valley the little sylvan alluvial "holm," where, tradition says, Burns pondered and composed "Man was made to Mourn" after his meeting with the "reverend sage" on this same Barskimming Bridge. As the present writer has said in another place, this dirge-like poem is a sublime presentment of the dark half of life's medal, as true, nay, more significant than the brighter side. Our poet had known and felt both. The poem was the result of a peripatetic reverie: There was the hermit stream, the solemn waving pines, and central, in the mental and material scene, the old, old man, in whose person and condition, "Age and want, oh, ill-matched pair," stood forth revealed. The chords trembled, the harp awoke, and the poet bowed himself before this revelation:—

and broke forth
In the resistless eloquence of woe.

You can picture the scene as you pass: the lonely figure in "hodden grey"—the poet who should have been ploughing. What business had he to be bothering about social questions? He should have left these things to his betters. And yet the damned, idle peasant has become a king of men beside whom such betters are but dust and vermin. And yet he never fired a shot to kill a man, much less a million, in his life! What was Fame thinking about?

As the wheelman came through the famous village of Mauchline a passing lady suppressed the ghost of a sneer at the dusty pilgrim; and yet she was the "savage" going to her Joss House, and the wheelman the "civilized" person intent upon a wider, more exalted, worship.

But those thoughts, how they swarmed like chemist bees, finding arts nectar in the weeds of common things (Ingersoll). Minutest blooms were noted in the swarming herbage of the hedge roots, the wild strawberry and the violet blooms, small, but perfect things, insistent, redeeming the waste places, breathing life and beauty, romance, and dream, memory and forgetfulness! reminding one of the little Freethinker in its wilderness, perfect too in its way, and for which it is a pride and a pleasure to write.

We hurry on. The sun, as arranged, shone warm in our happy valley, where we bathed and basked on flowers, and our lady would just be home from prayers.

Returning via Ballochmyle, we traversed the road along which we used to creep miserably enough to school. The hive swarmed again, and, though mutely, the wheelman was mightily happy now. To sit on the dry grass—green still mixed with sere—to note the budding hedgerows and trees he used to know; to list the strident rustle of the lone brown beechen leaves astir, while the eye wandered over the landscape of old association and the mind dwelt in the charmed atmosphere of an old joy; there seemed to him in that hour no pleasure like to this.

At Sinclairston, the solemn loch is a deep, deep, beautiful blue as it reflects the skies in its quiet hollow of the grey-brown rather than green fields, and laps a copse of willows on its leeward shore. "The Island" is still there, the goal of schoolboy emulation for slide or swim, a mere bunch of willows, and its only treasure an occasional water-bird's nest. But the boyish mind can magnify and make miraculous the meanest object of existence. And the boy still left in the man makes him exult, but more, over similar common things—that it may be fulfilled, as they say in Scotland, that "there's nae fules like auld fules." Byron and Burns were both much prone to a majestic dirge-music. For instance, the former:—

No more—no more—oh! never more on me
The freshness of the heart can fall like dew,
Which out of all the lovely things we see
Extracts emotions beautiful and new,
Hived in our bosoms like the bag o' the bee:
Think'st thou the honey with those objects grew:
Alas! 'twas not in them, but in thy power
To double even the sweetness of a flower.

It was a psychological moment; and this passing glimpse, under rarest conditions, of the lonely, lovely tarn, though brief, is everlasting in its refreshment and inspiration; nor time, nor distance, nor cares, nor despairs, nor pleasures, nor any other creature or creation, can dim for a moment the impression of that tranquil lakelet, lying there so still, under the sunlit skies, in its hollow of the hills!

Small but majestic mountain ranges bound the horizon hereabouts, and on the clear skyline stand out serenely grand. There was the distant smoke of heather fires, a copse, some ruined gables in a wood on a hillside, a hundred varied objects of interest and beauty, all limned and softened in that crystalline atmosphere. Soft shadows fell among the thick-set woods of Ballochmyle, though the sun, white and dazzling, was still high, and wheeled, with ours, his chariot behind the trees. This, oh this, is a delectable denizen. But we had grown tired; sixty miles at "fifty" is no joke. We swore we would not do it again.

Repentance oft before I swore—
But was I sober when I swore?

Home, and full of tired bones and the memory of old joys. The latter are very precious things; but, considering the fatigues and pains and risks, the occasional deep sadnesses, solitudes, and desolations of these sentimental journeys, we said: No, we will not do it again; heaven itself is not worth it. But we will!

Views and Opinions.

God and Us.

Whatever we may neglect in this country we never overlook religion and our religious duties. Long before we provided the people with schools we plastered the country with churches. We praise God when we go to war, and when he has given us a victory we return thanks—with a hint that we hope to secure a continuance of his patronage in the future. We have daily prayers in the House of Commons, the efficacy of which is seen in the veracity and uprightness of its members. We have bishops in the House of Lords, and thus secure a disinterested spirit in public affairs. We thoughtfully provide the monarch with a religious creed, in order to avoid the danger of having one who should be non-religious. We may be careless of social conditions that lead men and women to prison, but we take care they shall have regular religious services once they are there. The making of the criminal may be our—that is, society's work, but we do see that he is not lacking in spiritual ministration, even to the very scaffold itself. And every good Briton knows that God looks with favour upon our activities. To conclude otherwise would be to charge the Deity with want of judgment.

The Solemnization of the Absurd.

So one need not be surprised that both Houses of Parliament have decided solemnly to attend church on August 4, which is the anniversary of the outbreak of this most Christian War. We haven't yet heard whether the German Parliament will, with equal solemnity, march to its church and lay before the Lord its reasons why God should help the Fatherland; but, we daresay, something of the kind will be tried. In our own Parliament Mr. Lloyd George moved: "That the House will attend at St. Margaret's, Westminster, on Sunday, August 4, being the fourth anniversary of the declaration of war, to invoke the divine blessing on our just cause." We are not sure for whom the reminder, "fourth anniversary" was intended. Members of Parliament could hardly have needed it (many would recall it by their increased dividends). Perhaps it was a diplomatic hint to Deity that, after four years, it was time he bestirred himself and did something to show his real interest in the Allies. For one notes that the Christian service to which the Jews, and Atheists, and Agnostics, and Nothingarians of the House are invited, is not, in the words of the motion, to thank God for already blessing our cause, it is to invoke his blessing. Perhaps it would be too much for even the British public for Mr. Lloyd George to say we have already had the "Divine Blessing." When we went to war with Germany we presented her with an ultimatum. Why not do the same here? Why not announce formally and publicly that, unless we have some clear indication of the Deity's good will within a given time, all the churches and chapels will be closed, the chaplain of the House dismissed, and the rest of the clergy put to some kind of useful service?

Proving Our Case.

Seriously, Christians have little for which to thank God in this War. For four years we have been witnessing a demonstration, on an enormous and costly scale, of the futility of the Christian religion. All the special qualities associated with religious wars—uncurbed ferocity, unlimited lying, and boundless credulity—have been manifested in full measure. And of the piety of the German people and leaders there can be no question. Yet it is these people of whom we read stories that show a complete unscrupulousness as to the means employed, so long as it is hoped they will achieve the end desired. What has been the value of centuries of Christianity in Germany? Has the Freethinker ever drawn a more damning indictment of the uselessness of Christianity than our own Christians unconsciously draw in their indictment of Germany? Would the Germans have been worse without Christianity? Are they the better for it? Some of our clerical leaders here are busy indicting "materialistic science" because, they say, it has placed all its resources at the service of war. But the ethical character of war is not altered thereby. To kill more quickly or more numerously does not alter the quality of war. And why blame science? Who is it that has utilized scientific discoveries to the end of slaughter? Christians. It is a Christian nation that, while comparatively indifferent to the claims of science during a time of peace, can pour out money like water to utilize scientific research for purposes of war.

God's Plan.

The Rev. Samuel Chadwick, addressing the Wesleyan Conference at Manchester on July 17, said he regarded—> the war as part of a great world movement rather than as a thing detached. A materialistic interpretation of the universe and a rationalistic interpretation of knowledge had been unfolded. In Germany this found its highest expression. Its professors taught that might and right were synonymous, though the spiritual hunger of the people insisted on asserting itself again and again When they were looking forward to a great revival, then came war. He believed, however, that the war was a part of this revival. It was in God's plan. Men could start war and devils keep them going, but God ruled them.

Mr. Chadwick is speaking—like a clergyman. A materialistic interpretation of the universe rules in Germany no more than in England. It may rule in German scientific circles, but so it does here. And in neither country has it any vital connection with the forces that make for war. It is ethical Materialism—the thirst for more trade and territory, the mania for expansion and empire—that leads to war. And who is fit to cast the first stone here? And on what ground is the Christian Bernhardi or the Bible-loving Kaiser accused of "Materialism"? And if the War is part of the revival of religion, why complain of Germany? It is, says Mr. Chadwick, "in God's plan"; although men start a war (as part of the plan), God rules throughout it all. Then it is all his business. We are only puppets in the game. All the filth, and disease, and slaughter of the War is in God's plan—part of the revival he has arranged! Blasphemy is defined as speaking disrespectfully of God! We earnestly invite the attention of God Almighty to the Rev. Samuel Chadwick.

Two Pictures.

Among the Bantu tribes of Northern Rhodesia, says Frazer, before an army marched to war the head chief prayed for days for victory, then he and his wives went to the shrines of the dead kings and prayed that the gods would keep the war-path clear from foes, and help them to defeat the enemy. Then the army was marshalled, and the chief performed a solemn war-dance; and the soldiers set forth in confidence of victory. In 1918, in this country, our war chief solemnly invites his subordinates to march with him to one of our shrines, also dedicated to a dead person, and join with him in prayers and songs and supplications to their God that he will clear our path of foes and lead us to victory over the enemy. Our war chief will not dance before the shrine; he will only kneel. His wife will not beat her breast; she will only sit demurely apart and pray. But except for these differences of detail, will anyone be good enough to point out what difference there may be between a Bantu chief going through his incantations to secure the blessings of his gods on the war the tribe has in hand, and our chief leading the Members of Parliament to one of our "joss-houses" on a similar errand? The prayers and songs are the same in spirit, the purpose is the same in kind, and the response will be the same in value. But which is the savage and which is the civilized person in these two performances? And so far as the ceremony is concerned, might not Bantu and Briton change places without any transfer of mental adjustment?

Playing at Savages.

Is it not time we stopped this apeing of savages in the name of civilization? A crowd of educated legislators solemnly marching to a temple to ask the help of their Mumbo-Jumbo to give them victory in war! How many of them really believe that their procession, and their prayers, and their hymn-singing will have the slightest influence on the course of the War? It is an insult to their intelligence even to assume they believe. They know that, whether they pray or don't pray, not a soldier less or more will be killed on our side or on that of the enemy. The "Divine blessing" will not make a soldier shoot straight, or give a foolish officer intelligence. Four years of war, four years of slaughter, of rapine, of incendiarism, of ruined homes and blasted lives, and the Parliament of a civilized people resolving on a church parade to secure victory! The Bantu chief calls his followers to pray to the tribal gods to keep the war-path clear of foes and to give them victory. Poor savages! The ignorance of such people is appalling.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

"Nearer, My God, To Thee."

THIS well-known hymn is generally supposed to be the great city of refuge provided for the spiritual safety and consolation of the people of God when hard pressed by his and their enemies. It was specially constructed for that purpose by some Divinely inspired poetic genius. There is no other hymn in the English language that appeals with such soothing, steadying, and comforting power to the children of affliction and sorrow. When the night is dark and the fires burn low and the storm is raging, how naturally, how irresistibly, the pious soul bursts into the wistful song—

Nearer, my God, to thee,
Nearer to thee!

We were told that, when the great Atlantic Liner, the Titanic, was sinking in 1912, the passengers kept cool and collected by singing this hymn. That may be more or less of a legend, but the fact remains that superstitious people, when calamity overtakes and threatens to overwhelm them, betake themselves to prayer, as so many Britons did lately when the God of Battles seemed to be favouring the Germans. It used to be a saying not long ago that even Atheists always call upon God when danger stares them in the face. According to this hymn, the goal of life is nearness to God, which we are to reach by prayer and supplication. Whatever happens, however heavy the cross or dense the darkness, whether angels beckon or devils pull back, our aim should ever be—

Nearer, my God, to thee,
Nearer to thee!

Is it not the proud boast of many of the clergy that this bloody War has been sent on purpose to drive the careless and indifferent back to God? The War, seemingly the direst curse, is thus in reality the greatest conceivable blessing. Stony griefs and clayey woes which look like formidable hindrances on the march of life, are but so many goads urging us upwards towards God. To free-thinking Ishmaelites all that may sound laughably absurd, and the absurdity seems to touch its climax in the last verse:—

Or, if on joyful wing
Cleaving the sky,
Sun, moon, and stars forgot,
Upward I fly,
Still all my song shall be—
Nearer, my God, to thee—
Nearer to thee!

Now, the very conception of nearness to God is in itself ridiculous. On theological grounds alone it represents an utter impossibility. Orthodoxy teaches not only that God is a being who fills and transcends the Universe, but that the whole of him is everywhere at one and the same time, and, naturally, to think of getting nearer to him is to touch the summit of irrationality. Coolly admitting this, the divines claim that they use the term "nearness" in a spiritual, not a geographical, sense. Very well; but what are we to understand by spiritual nearness to the Deity? By its very vagueness, "spiritual" is an adjective that covers a multitude of sins against Reason. Etymologically, spirit is nothing but breath or wind, and the adjective of necessity partakes of the quality of the noun. Judging by the recorded experience of the saints, nearness to God signifies an exceedingly pleasant sensation, and nothing more. It is simply an agreeable emotion which comes and goes. It may be induced by solitary meditation and prayer, by listening to impassioned religious discourses, by joining in the singing of wildly sensational hymns, or by being present and possibly taking part in noisy and excited Methodist prayer-meetings; but however brought on, it is really nothing but a dangerous species of neurosis, and sometimes ends in raving madness. During the notorious Evan Roberts' revival a friend of the present writer got so near to God that he had to be confined for six months in a lunatic asylum. Is it not a recognized fact that most of the great saints of history were more or less insane, and that the degree of the insanity corresponded to the height of the saintliness? We can see them at their nightly meetings singing twelve psalms pointed out by an angel, as was their invariable custom in the Cœnobitic establishments of Egypt. They lived apart from the world in arid and rocky deserts, completely isolated from the occupations, amusements, and enjoyments of their fellow-beings. Describing them, Milman says:—

> At the close of each Psalm, the whole assembly prostrated itself in mute adoration. In every part of Egypt, from the Cataracts to the Delta, the whole land was bordered by these communities; there were 500 Cœnobites in the desert of Nitria alone; the total number of male anchorites and monks was estimated at 76,000; the females at 27,700. Parts of Syria were, perhaps, scarcely less densely peopled with ascetics. Cappadocia and the provinces bordering on Persia boasted of numerous communities, as well as Asia Minor and the eastern parts of Europe (History of Christianity, vol. iii., p. 209).

In addition to these Cœnobitic communities, there were also thousands of hermits who lived in solitude, "some in clefts and caves; some in huts, into which the light of day could not penetrate; some of whom hung huge weights to their arms, necks, and loins; some confined themselves in cages; some on the tops of mountains, exposed to the sun and weather." Everybody is familiar with Tennyson's poem, St. Simeon Stylites; but few, perhaps, know the impression Simeon made on his own age, as described by Evagrius (H.E. i. 13):—

> Rivalling, while yet in the flesh, the conversation of angels, he withdrew himself from all earthly things, and doing violence to nature, which always has a downward tendency, he aspired after that which is on high; and standing midway between earth and heaven, he had communion with God, and glorified God with the angels; from the earth offering supplications as an ambassador to God; bringing down from heaven to men the Divine blessing.

All such men and women, whether living in monastic communities, or scattered abroad in all sorts of solitary places as hermits, were regarded as saints, who were in the happy state of exceptional nearness to God; but, judged by common sense, they were the victims of severe mental aberration. No man, in his senses, could address the Divine Being in the terms Tennyson ascribes to St. Simeon:—

> Let this avail, just, dreadful, mighty God,
> This not be all in vain, that thrice ten years,
> Thrice multiplied by superhuman pangs,
> In hungers and in thirsts, fevers and cold,
> In coughs, aches, stitches, ulcerous throes and cramps,
> A sign between the meadow and the cloud,
> Patient on this tall pillar I have borne
> Rain, wind, frost, heat, hail, damp, and sleet and snow.

Even in the modern hymn there are not wanting signs that the writer was under the spell of a wholly unsound view of human life. Both the words and the tune to which they are set are morbid in the extreme; and, as one listens, the impression is made that the singers are trying hard to make the most and best of a thoroughly bad situation, or desperately endeavouring to enjoy their "stony griefs and clayey woes." There is an unwholesome sense of weirdness about the whole thing—an unnaturalness which cramps the finer instincts and potencies of our nature.

J. T. LLOYD.

Circulating the Scriptures.

> Christianity has never lost the instinct of universal dominion. Bible Society Report.
> The only hope for the future of society lies in the absolute extermination of Christianity.—G. W. Foote.

AGREEABLY to the law of supply and demand, the annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society makes its appearance. The one before us bears the title, Deep Calleth Unto Deep, a pleasant nautical alternative to a preceding issue which was entitled The Book and the Sword. In the piping times of peace less attention is paid to naval and military nomenclature, and less insistence is laid upon the warlike character of the Bible, which is often referred to as the work of the "Prince of Peace." However, variety is the spice of life, and the report before us covers so wide a field that it should appeal to the taste of the jaded Freethinker, bored to distraction by the multifarious financial appeals from the innumerable churches, chapels, and tabernacles of Christendom.

The editor of the report is a brilliant journalist, and he relieves the monotony of his plaintive appeal for money from his readers by introducing quotations from all sorts and conditions of writers, some of whom one hardly expects to find in a pious work of this kind. Pronounced Freethinkers such as Montaigne, Balzac, and Heine are dragged in by the heels to bolster the cause of Superstition, and even Victor Hugo is laid under contribution. Apt quotations are made from many authors, from demure Jane Austen to "that little ape called Keble," as grim old Carlyle dubbed the author of The Christian Year. These elegant extracts are used with the unerring skill of the patent medicine advertisers, who attract readers to their pills and potions by all the resources of literary artifice.

As an example of the up-to-date method of conveying information, one may refer to the statement that in the year under consideration the British and Foreign Bible Society issued a total of 9,539,335 Bibles, New Testaments, and portions of Scriptures. The total issues by the Society since its foundation have exceeded 284,000,000 copies of the Scriptures, complete or in parts. Versions of the Bible, and parts, have been circulated in 504 different languages, and 104 new languages have been added in the last eleven years. By the most stringent War-time economy, the Society's expenditure was brought down to £257,262; during a year, in which the report informs us, "when God makes bare His arm" and when "it is surely a solemn and inspiring thing to be alive."

This, it will be seen, is a decided mixture of keen business and oleaginous piety; but the reader must remember that the report is intended to invite subscriptions, and instructions as to legacies and the payment of cheques and money orders are given in detail in the volume. In previous years the public used to be informed courteously that H.I.M. the German Emperor and the Viceroy of India and other notable Christians had contributed, but of late these important names have mysteriously disappeared.

One thing the report brings out quite clearly, and that is, the Germans are not all Atheists. The Rev. Otto Schultze, who is an Honorary Foreign Member, writes that "the German missionaries in China will never forget the great help to their work given by the British and Foreign Bible Society." More testimony is given by the Rev. C. Schmitt, an interned missionary; whilst in an earlier report issued by the Society it was stated:—

> During the first eight months of war, and mainly through the kindness of friendly Germans, 360,000

Digitized by Google

> Testaments and Gospels went out from our Berlin depot.

The words of the editor of the report for 1915 settles the matter, for he must know where the Society's work is done :—

> No feature of the War has been more grievous to English Christians than the hostility which it has created between the religious and theological life of England and Germany.

Despite the modern business methods, there is an old-fashioned theological flavour in the report which is reminiscent of the days of John Wesley, and the early corybantic days of Methodism. Listen to this account of a convert in the good old blood-and-thunder style so pleasing to our forefathers :—

> Shortly before Christmas, 1916, the Bishop in South Tokyo confirmed forty-five Japanese in the pro-cathedral at Tokyo. One of them had just undergone fifteen years' penal servitude for deliberate murder, committed when he was a youth of nineteen. He looks a pretty good ruffian, but he's a dead-keen Christian.

With what art does the editor describe the dangers and risks of a colporteur's life :—

> We hear of one man pelted in Egypt, another arrested in Italy, and another imprisoned at Athens. In Ceylon one colporteur had to hide from a wild elephant in the forest near Trincomalee. In Peru a colporteur was attacked and beaten by a fanatic. Several of our men were both robbed and beaten in China, and one was in danger of being shot as a spy.

The most heroic action was not performed by a man, but by an English married lady, who, in the touching words of the report, "is not afraid to sell farthing vernacular Gospels in the streets of Lahore."

The reports of the colporteurs are full of literary surprises. Here is one. In a restaurant at Rome an agent was offering Testaments for sale, when a man took up one and said : "I have never seen this book before. Do you know the best book I have ever read? It is The Imitation of Christ." After further conversation the matter ended in a purchase by the phoenix of culture who had read Thomas a Kempis but never seen a Bible.

Ingersoll once said that when a thing was too stupid for the pulpit it was passed on to the missionaries. The truth of this jest is seen in the account of the work in China, where copies of Genesis and the Book of Jonah were sold and expounded literally. This happens, be it noted, at the time when the preachers at home are assuring their credulous congregations that the Book of Genesis is an early edition of The Origin of Species, without Darwin's tiresome details.

These are but a few specimens of the gems to be found in this work. That such an appeal is worth issuing is evident, for the balance-sheet shows receipts for the year totalling £250,657, including legacies amounting to £29,535. The expenditure amounted to £257,262. The report itself costs ninepence, so that it is evident that the directors are as shrewd as they are pious.

Figures such as these should make any Freethinker pause and reflect that Rationalist propaganda has to make headway not only against gross ignorance, but against a most heavily endowed system of superstition. The British and Foreign Bible Society is but one of many similar institutions which have enormous incomes. Hardly a week passes but one or the other of these organizations receive legacies, and collections are made constantly in the various branches associated with them. Against all this Freethought propaganda is most severely handicapped. Its publications are boycotted in public and private libraries, and few booksellers have the courage to stock them. In spite of it all, the "intellectuals" are making headway. If Freethinkers would support systematically their own institutions there would soon be a great alteration, and the struggle would be carried on under far more favourable conditions. What is needed continuous support, for spasmodic supplies embarrass rather than help. If numbers of Freethinkers contributed small sums regularly for propagandist purposes, more literature could be issued and circulated. Every Freethought pamphlet, and every copy of the Freethinker, are ambassadors for reason against superstition. In fighting this stupendous battle, we are opposing a superstition entrenched behind mountains of money-bags. In money lies the power of the clergy and their Book, but, as Shakespeare reminds us, gold can "knit and break religions."

Christianity and Dirt.

SIR,—Taking advantage of your courteous permission I select some notes in your June 30 issue as material for discussion. It is, probably, not a matter of importance what the selected topic is. My object is to show that between you and orthodox Christians there is very much less disagreement than is commonly supposed.

Mr. Cohen produces a number of interesting facts which are certainly evidence that various people, some centuries ago, who professed to be Christians were disgustingly dirty. There is no dispute as to the facts, and Lecky's trenchant summary of them is not too strong. The question now is what is to be inferred ?

I think I am right in saying that Mr. Cohen infers from them a natural, perhaps, an inevitable alliance between Christianity and dirt. This would mean that professing Christians to-day wash less frequently than Agnostics—let us say British Agnostics so as to simplify the point as much as possible. I have an extensive acquaintance among Christians sincere and less sincere, and also among Agnostics. Judging from the evidence of the two principal senses concerned, I should say there was no difference whatever between the groups in their belief or disbelief in soap and the nail-brush, corresponding to their belief or disbelief in a Deity.

So that while I am heartily with him in your denunciation of dirt, I think Mr. Cohen has jumped too far in his inference from admitted facts. He writes: "This alliance between religion and dirt has been frequently manifested, and was in consequence of the ascetic preaching of Christianity combined with opposition to sanitary and medical science." Now, even if this be an accurate historical diagnosis, it leaves the reader still hungering for the only evidence that would be relevant to Mr. Cohen's view that there is a natural alliance between religion and dirt ; evidence, namely, that during the last 150 years in England there has been such an alliance.

My opinion is—but I should be glad to be corrected—that down to about 1800 personal cleanliness, as we understand the expression, had hardly begun to be thought of among ninety-five per cent. of the population ; that the chief religious revivalists in the nineteenth century welcomed the spread of cleanliness as cordially as any Atheists of the time. If that is so, the alliance between Christianity and dirt was only for a time, and was not Christian in its origin.

But I fancy Mr. Cohen would say that the admitted facts—about Stylites and the rest—are sufficient to prove his point. Let us examine them a little more closely. I know very little about these pious, dirty people, but would readily admit that they preached the duty of dirt as a way of pleasing God. But does that go to prove that there is no God to be pleased? Or let us take Christianity in particular. Let us agree that very many Christians were at one time, for religious reasons, very dirty; that is a different thing from saying that there is any necessary connection between the doctrines of Christianity and dirtiness of person or habit.

We have, in short, to ask ourselves if religion is to be condemned for the folly or blindness or barbarism of its votaries. Of course, it is difficult not to answer with an emphatic yes. But everything depends on whether the follies, etc., are the outcome of the teaching or example of the founder. People believe the purest time in the history of any religion is directly after the foundation. Well, how does Christianity stand this test? As an answer, I point to the example in the teaching of Christ, who was not in the least ascetic, and taught, indirectly, such reverence for the human body that, in time, one race after another learns to wash. No doubt after a long time—but he foretold that there would be a great amount of failure in his work; and I care not how wild or unseemly has been the conduct of his followers, so long as it cannot be traced to his teaching or example. We treat other creeds with this much of consideration. Why not Christianity? For instance, I have known some vociferous Radicals, on coming into a property, suddenly become staunch Tories; but that is a reflection on them, not on Radicalism.

One word more. The worse one finds the conduct of Christians has been, the greater wonder it is that the creed still survives in vigour. And never before have Christians striven so hard as now to recover the primitive purity of their faith, by studying the doings and sayings of the Christ of History; rather than the Christ of later fiction.

E. LYTTELTON.

Acid Drops.

The plot regarding religious instruction is unfolding. A report has now been issued as a result of the conferences between Churchmen and Nonconformists which says that the following has met with agreement:—

> In the first place, inasmuch as an education which excludes religion is incomplete, and, as incomplete injurious, it should be the concern of the State, which has assumed responsibility for education, to secure religious teaching during school hours for all children whose parents desire them to receive it, and also to provide adequate opportunity of study and training for teachers who desire to give it. We are of opinion that the nation generally would welcome legislation to this end if it could be attained without religious controversy. Secondly, it should be the concern of the Churches, in co-operation with the local educational authorities and the teachers, to determine what particular form the instruction so provided should take.

It is again observable that the whole question is considered, not as a citizen's question, but as one that concerns Christians alone. The different sects quietly and calmly arrogate to themselves the right to speak for the nation, and it is that assumption that should be challenged whenever possible. They represent Church and Chapel-goers only, and not all of them. And Church and Chapel attendants are not even a majority in the nation. Their claim to speak for the nation is sheer impudence.

The committee says it aims at securing religious instruction for all parents whose children desire it. That is not the case. It is to be given, as is the case now, to all children whose parents do not expressly forbid it. And the distinction is important. The parsons know better than to trust to parents clamouring for religious instruction. It is extremely probable that if parents had to ask for it to get it, the majority would not bother about religion at all. And nothing could be more dangerous than to permit the creation of a committee of clergymen to work in conjunction with local education committees. That would invite intrigue of all descriptions, and any amount of underhand pressure brought to bear upon teachers generally.

In the circumstances, we again beg Freethinkers all over the country to busy themselves in this matter. We are gratified to know that, owing to our insistence, very many resolutions in favour of Secular Education have already been sent to Mr. Fisher from trade and other organizations, but we should like to see many more forwarded. If Freethinkers don't put up a fight here, no one else will.

Emma Dixon, a dressmaker, of Blyth, was fined £5 at Morpeth for telling fortunes. No one fines the clergy for telling people what will happen to them in "another world."

Catholic journals on the Continent state that there is a rumour in Vatican circles that the Nobel Peace Prize will this year be awarded to the Pope. The "peace" alluded to in the paragraph must be the peace which passeth all understanding.

A Wesleyan minister, the Rev. Josiah Mee, of Doncaster, dropped dead in the street outside the Central Hall, Westminster, where he had been speaking. Had he been a speaker at a Freethought Congress, there would have been an impressive moral.

Mr. George Lane-Fox, the late Vice-Chancellor of the Primrose League, was a Roman Catholic. It is curious to recall that the League was founded to commemorate a Jewish statesman, and that one of its objects is to upbold the Protestant religion.

"Dear Father, I am one of God's sheep, led astray from the fold," was the pathetic note left by a servant-girl of Moulton, Cheshire, who was found drowned. One of God's sheep! And what of the shepherd's care for his flock?

Mr. Rudyard Kipling has not always been complimentary to coloured folk, whom an old divine described as "God's image carved in ebony." Hence there is real humour in the circumstance of Mr. Kipling's portrait appearing in silhouette on the cover of a recent pamphlet. Unwittingly, the popular writer looks like the corner-man in a minstrel troupe.

According to a newspaper paragraph, charwomen employed in schools have been granted a bonus up to nine shillings weekly, but the highest bonus granted to women teachers is eight shillings weekly. This shows the real appreciation of education in a Christian country.

The British and Foreign Bible Society's report is nothing if not topical, and it declares that the Scriptures whisper "the sure and certain prospect of immortality" across "the uncounted graves of our young soldiers." This is very significant. It shows that the Churches are getting ashamed of their theological hell, and are becoming more and more humanized.

The clerical statement that the Germans are Atheists is refuted by the latest report of the above Society. Here are the facts concerning the Society's work for the peoples of Central Europe: "It has already published twenty-six million volumes in German, three million in Hungarian, two million in Bohemian, besides nearly half a million for other polyglot races in the Austrian Empire, 800,000 in Bulgarian, and 300,000 in Turkish."

Speaking at York Convocation the Bishop of Hull said:—

> The bottom of Germany's idea in the present War was the need of expansion for her growing population; and if we were to have a League of Nations the Church must reconsider her attitude of blessing large families and saying "be fruitful and multiply." There must be moral restraint in the size of families.

The Bishop appears too sensible a man for his job. He ought to throw it up.

Our boasted civilization is largely veneer, and charity plays too important a part in the community. "In the hospitals of the London area alone, at this moment, between 11,000 and 12,000 beds are filled with sick, while every year 1,400,000 persons submit their sufferings to their ministry," says a writer in the Daily News. It is a bitter commentary that these hospitals have to depend upon the alms' dish; that the nurses are, as a class, overworked and sweated, and that the hospitals constantly tremble on the threshold of insolvency. Truly, Christian charity covers a multitude of shortcomings.

From the Anglican Daily Times of July 12 we see that Rev. N. H. Patrick is quite alive to the future. He says the Churches must show "more interest in the agricultural labourers, who have been neglected. Their wages would not be less than 25s., perhaps never lower than 30s. per week, and they would require all the care the Churches could give them." Now, does Mr. Patrick mean that when the agricultural labourer gets 25s. per week he will need careful guidance how to spend such an enormous amount of money on himself and family; or does he mean that if the Church attends to its business they may get more out of him; or does he mean that, with more wages, the labourer will be more independent, less subservient to "parson," and that the Churches may lose him altogether?

Journalists find out everything in time, and the London Evening Standard has found out why men are Atheists. The "intellectual," says our contemporary, does not believe in God, "because so many people believe in God." Our contemporary had better try again.

Rev. F. B. Meyer is disturbed on learning that the Anglo-American Baseball League have decided to hold Sunday matches. It fills him with "dismay"—which we can quite understand. For if people can get healthy outdoor—or indoor—entertainments on Sunday, the churchgoing population will be still further reduced. Mr. Meyer protests in the name of "religion, of the home, and of physical efficiency." Religion we can well understand. But what have the last two to do with it? Physical efficiency can hardly be encouraged by listening to Mr. Meyer, and we feel the home is quite safe without his watchfulness.

The Bishop of Chelmsford has been addressing an Intercession meeting at Buckhurst Hill, and asked how could we expect God to stop the War when out of London's six and a half millions you would not find a quarter of a million in churches, chapels, and mission halls? Evidently, keeping the War going is God's way of getting level with us. His lordship also asked, "Why was it we have not more men to send to the Front?" And replies, Because we had neglected the housing question, etc. A nice man is the Bishop of Chelmsford! This representative of God finds the chief reason for looking after the young is the need of men for the Army. We must breed quickly, and preserve what we breed, or we shall fall short of our supply of material for killing.

Sir Henry Lucy, writing in the Daily Chronicle, says that in the last year of the eighteenth century the then Archbishop of Canterbury kept house at Lambeth Palace on an income of £2,682. The Archbishop of York drew £1,610, and the Lord Bishop of London £1,000. These sums are far below the incomes of the present prelates, which are now £15,000 (Canterbury), and £10,000 each for the Archbishop of York and the Bishop of London.

The Bishop of Hull has been saying to his fellow-clergymen that if they were to advocate a League of Nations the Church must reconsider her attitude of blessing large families and saying: "Be fruitful and multiply." Fancy the Church ceasing to stimulate wars and turning pacifist.

The clerical conscience is just as elastic as that of a schoolboy who ties a tin-can to a poor dog's tail. The Rev. E. Millard, vicar of St. Anne's Church, Grantham, was fined £10 for wrongly using foodstuffs in feeding animals and birds. Perhaps Mr. Millard, being in an exempt profession, has not yet realized that there is a War going on.

At Southend-on-Sea an intercession service was held on the Cliffs, and music was provided by a military band. Perhaps the promoters imagined that the more noise they made the greater their chance of a gracious recognition from Providence.

Describing the Protestant celebration of the Battle of the Boyne, near Belfast, the Daily News says "A witch-doctor on the Gold Coast might have been proud of the show." The same remark might apply to a number of religious observances.

From the Star:—

> Speaking in Convocation the Bishop of Exeter said in some places in the country there was the church, a large parsonage, and nothing to do. "I know one man," he said, "who has not had a marriage in his church for twenty-eight years; there is one child in his parish; and now he is suffering from nervous breakdown."

William Taverner, who was sentenced at Chester Assizes to fifteen months' imprisonment for falsifying the books of the Middle Age Pension Friendly Society, and for obtaining money under false pretences, was a very religious individual, the Star notes that:—

> He always opened his meetings with prayer; there were always one or two local chapel lights on his platform; and his talk was larded with pious expressions. He cultivated the personal appearance of a Methodist preacher, soft black hat, white tie, and black tail coat complete.

Taverner evidently knew his business, but was probably in too much of a hurry. Hence his downfall.

In the recently published Life and Letters of Sir Joseph Hooker, the famous botanist is quoted as saying: "The most candid clerical disputant I met with would allow the freest and fullest discussion, but only in Latin." Perhaps that clergyman thought the best way of defending a dying religion was to use a dead language.

Speaking in Convocation on the extension of the franchise, the Bishop of Exeter regretted that political meetings were not opened with prayer. It would be almost as exciting as singing "God save Ireland" at a Primrose League meeting.

Fancy religionists are not welcomed in the Army. At the United Methodist Conference it was stated that the Methodist recruits were often registered as Church of England, and men who were registered as Methodists were kept in camp on Sundays doing work.

The Gospel-Temperance folk will be uneasy at Mr. Ben Tillett's statement that the majority of the Conscientious Objectors are teetotalers, whilst the majority of the fighting men are non-abstainers. Perhaps the Cocoa Press will have something to say on the matter.

Cardinal Bourse has designated Saint Michael as patron-saint of the Allied airmen. Unfortunately, the Greek Church authorities have already nominated Elijah to the same post. Of the two, the prophet seems the better choice. At least he drove his "bus" up to heaven.

The old Wesleyan Chapel at Kempstone, near Corfe Castle, Dorset, has been destroyed by fire. It appears a fitting ending for a building in which so many folk have been threatened with flames.

The promised revival of religion is long overdue, and one result of the prolongation of the War is the stoppage of church and chapel building. Perhaps the faithful will now turn their attention to paying their debts.

Save Your Papers.

WE hope our readers are bearing in mind the need we have for all their old papers, books, and magazines. We want as much as we can get, and as soon as we can get it. Send all you have in parcels of from fourteen pounds to one hundredweight to the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. If the bundles are just tied round strongly with string it will be enough. They should be labelled "Scrap Paper," and can be sent carriage forward. We will send labels on request, or, if possible, sacks when they are preferred. But we must have all your old papers as soon as possible. If old ledgers—without covers, please—and other business documents are sent, we will see that they are properly destroyed. Remember that no parcel is too small to send. Full schedule prices will be paid.

To Correspondents.

— MATHEWS.—Received, acknowledged later.

J. GREAVES.—Glad to hear from so warm an admirer of Mr. Foote. Many more widely known men have not left behind so many sincere friends.

L. H. W. MANN.—Letter to hand, and shall receive attention. Will write you later.

W. CUMMING.—Received with thanks, and will prove useful. You would further oblige by dating cuttings. It is sometimes necessary for reference.

D. DAWSON.—Thanks for parcel, also for securing new readers. We are greatly encouraged by the ready help of our readers in both these directions.

W. REPTON.—Will do as you desire. We have heard no news of Ambrose Bierce of late. He was a good writer, and some of his short stories in "The Midst of Life" were very powerful. He wrote his most "blasphemous" work under the name of "Dod Grile." His Fiend's Delight is a good specimen, but has been long out of print.

F. VENABLES.—Man very early discovered the use of fire, the usual way of getting it being by rubbing dry sticks together. We agree with you as to the pity of reformers who have no belief in a God worth bothering about continuing to use the word as though they were more or less in agreement with the current religion.

J. GAIR.—If you could secure a hall in Pontypridd in November or the latter part of October Mr. Cohen would arrange to visit the place. Sorry you were unable to come to Bridgend.

A. ALDWINKLE.—Charles Bradlaugh joined the Freemasons in 1859. He belonged to a French lodge, which did not invoke the use of the name of the Deity You will get particulars in the Life, by his daughter and J. M. Robertson. You are being written on the other matter.

E. P.—We have received copies of Upton Sinclair's Journal, and, but for pressure on our space, should have "lifted" some paragraphs therefrom. It is a noteworthy publication, and the chapters on "The Profits of Religion" are very striking. Those of our readers who would care to investigate may secure a year's issues—twelve—by sending one dollar to No. 1513 Sunset Avenue, Pasandena, California.

DOGO.—No single work would give you all you require. Mr. John M. Robertson's Short History of Christianity would probably be most suitable for your purpose.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We publish on p. 400 the first of Dr. Lyttleton's promised communications to the Freethinker. We feel sure that it will be read with considerable interest. Mr. Cohen will reply next week to the points raised. Meanwhile we suggest to our readers that the present would be a good occasion to introduce the Freethinker to Christian friends.

Mr. Cohen had two good meetings at Maesteg on Sunday last, the hall being quite full in the evening. Both lectures were followed with keen interest, and some lively discussion followed the afternoon meeting. This was Mr. Cohen's first visit to Maesteg, but he will be back again during the autumn.

The informal Conference of South Wales Freethinkers held at Bridgend on Saturday, July 20, holds out promises of important development in the near future. Both Mr. Cohen and Mr. Lloyd were present, and both were much impressed by the character of the gathering. A number of towns were represented, including representatives from the Swansea and Maesteg Branches of the N. S. S. The meeting elected a Committee for the purpose of carrying out the work of the Conference, and we feel sure the result will be the formation of a number of new Branches of the N. S. S. and a more sustained propagandist effort.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures this evening (July 28) at the Tillery Institute, Abertillery. We are not informed as to the time of the meeting, but assume it will be either 6 o'clock or 6.30. We hope there will be a good meeting.

Mr. Lloyd writes: "In the article entitled 'Side-Lights,' which appeared in the issue of July 14, through some inexplicable trick of memory, I attributed the hymn commencing, 'God moves in a mysterious way,' to Isaac Watts, instead of to William Cowper, immeasurably the greater poet of the two. It was an unpardonable mistake, committed against knowledge, which, unfortunately, was for the time buried in my sub-liminal consciousness. For its resurrection, my thanks are due to Mr. Murray, of Aberdeen. I also tender humble apologies to the shade of the genial Olney bard."

Messrs. Watts & Co. are offering Mr. J. M. Robertson's Short History of Freethought for sale on the instalment system. The work is in two handsome volumes, running to over 1,000 pages, and is offered at 12s. 6d. Payment may be made in five monthly instalments of 2s. 6d. each. This is an offer of which many Freethinkers will be glad to avail themselves. It is a work that should be in the possession of all Freethinkers and reformers.

We regret that, owing to a blunder in our issue of July 14, the announcement concerning Mr. Palmer's addresses before the Christian Evidence Society read as though both were to be delivered at Craven Street, Strand. The second should have been announced for Tavistock Place. The mistake was made in the rush of Tuesday's work, and we apologize for the annoyance of those who were directed to the wrong address.

There is a vacancy in our publishing office for a lad of fourteen or fifteen. The labour is not arduous, neither does it involve long hours, and it affords a good opportunity of becoming acquainted with the routine work in a publishing office before launching out on a wider career. Particulars may be obtained any day on application to the Manager. No previous experience is necessary.

The Story of the Tea Plant.

V.

AFTER the withering process has been completed, the tea leaf should be rolled in cool and clean surroundings provided with fresh air. The leaf is subjected to rolling for the purpose of rupturing the plant-cells which contain the juice of the tea. This stage of production must be most carefully conducted, for while the leaf requires bruising, it should not be torn. When the cells have been ruptured, their sap is set free to flow over the surface of the leaf, so that, when subsequently submitted to the drying stage, the water alone is allowed to escape into the atmosphere, while the substance extracted settles on the exterior, all prepared for easy dissolution when boiling water is poured over the tea in the home.

The rolling processes ended, that of fermentation begins. The elaborate researches of Kelway Bamber, the eminent chemist, prove that the "fermentation" of the tea leaf arises from the action of a plant ferment. This phenomenon is quite distinct from that form of fermentation due to the activities of micro-organisms, which promote putrefaction and decay. But if the "fermentation" generated by the vegetable ferment or enzyme is long continued, organic fermentation supervenes, and the leaf turns sour.

As a result of the rolling, the leaf curls up. This curl is more or less lost during fermentation, and most manufacturers afterwards re-roll their leaf to restore the curl. Some planters, however, refrain from this rolling, but others, more fastidious, roll as many as three times. This latter method is thus described by Wallis-Tayler: "The first time after the withering or limping operation has been effected; the second time when the process of fermentation has been about half carried out; and the third and last time after the completion of the process of fermentation."

For many centuries the Chinese have employed charcoal for drying their tea. And for a long time in India the fumes of open charcoal fires were deemed indispensable for the production of good flavour. This idea is now completely exploded. To-day, in India, the leaf is extensively dried by machinery, with highly satisfactory results.

The tea is first dried, in order to arrest fermentation, and then the leaf is slowly desiccated. All moisture is thus extracted, while the essential oil and other important tea properties are retained. It is imperative to guard against the loss of the essential oil, which is extremely volatile, and if the tea is wrongly treated, this oil will escape. The essential oil gives the leaf its flavour, and its loss is therefore serious. A temperature above that of boiling water is demanded for the initial drying of the tea. Tea is usually run through the drying machine twice, so as to secure its thorough desiccation. A temperature of from 230 deg. to 280 deg. F. is requisite for the first drying, while for the second, one of about 200 deg. will suffice.

After the drying operation is over, the leaf is sorted and sifted. Where choice teas are produced, as a rule, the following five classes are prepared. These are:—Broken Orange Pekoe, Orange Pekoe, Pekoe, Pekoe Souchong, and Pekoe Fannings. These products are of different qualities, and command different prices. Orange Pekoe is the best, while Pekoe Fannings—fine broken tea—proves least profitable to the producer.

After sifting, the separated teas are severally refired, and this operation completes the preparation of the commodity for the table. Moisture is highly injurious to tea, and even brief exposure to a damp atmosphere proves very detrimental. The final firing just mentioned is designed for the purpose of evaporating any moisture absorbed by the leaf during the process of sifting and sorting. It is therefore for a short time subjected to a high temperature. The finished commodity is now conveyed to the packing department, and placed, either by hand or with a packing machine, inside lead-lined chests, or, better still, in steel chests, and then the tea merely awaits transport to the neighbouring market. Many experienced planters favour the plan of storing their products in bins for a time, before packing in chests. Tea certainly mellows and evolves a finer perfume when stored, so long as it is protected from the action of the atmosphere. The maximum flavour of tea is not attained until it is three months old, and, when hermetically sealed, tea will retain its prime quality for several years. But it is an all-essential condition that it must be perfectly air-tight, otherwise deterioration is certain to supervene.

All ordinary black teas are produced by the processes now described. Green tea, however, merits brief notice. Now, the main difference between black and green tea consists in the absence in the latter of fermentation, while the withering or wilting treatment of the former is replaced in the production of green tea by a rapid system of steaming. In the manufacture of green tea, the natural fresh colour of the leaf must be preserved if the product is to present a verdant appearance. After this tea is steamed, rolled, and dried, it displays an unprepossessing dingy green colour. The more delicate leaves retain their freshness, but the larger and older leaves are transformed into a dirty gray. Hence the "green" tea's uninviting aspect. To restore to the herb its original colour the use of pigments was employed. The sage Chinese long proved themselves adepts in the art of removing this blemish by resorting to the tricks of the adulterator. Green tea of splendid colour adorned the markets which owed its fresh appearance to the presence of prussian blue, tumeric, indigo, and other alien ingredients in its composition. Planters in India are largely opposed to the addition of pigments in the production of green tea. But in the various markets where green tea is in keen demand "finished greens" are the only teas purchased by the dealers. Manufacturers of these products are, therefore, driven to adulteration.

The vast bulk of Indian teas are pure black. But in the Kangra Valley green teas are elaborated for the Persian and Afghan trade. And there is still an extensive market for green teas, notably, in North America, a continent which continues the importation of the major part of its supplies from China and Japan. In other tea-drinking lands where green tea was once popular, the black variety is now in practically universal use. When the taste for the rich black beverage has been acquired the preference for the comparatively insipid green tea rapidly declines. This change will, probably, occur in the United States, and the export of Indian tea to the Republic will then materially increase.

Brick tea is a Chinese product, and is the only tea consumed in Tibet. The best Chinese brick teas are ordinary leaves pressed into the shape of bricks. But the commodity which enjoys the widest sale in Tibet is prepared from coarse leaves and stalks which usually form the prunings in India where they are burnt or utilized as manure. Were these waste materials turned into tea they would furnish a handsome profit to the planter, and a brick tea similar to that in vogue in Tibet is now being produced in India. The brick tea in general use in Tibet is employed as currency for dealings of all kinds. Tablet tea is also in demand, but this commodity is mainly manufactured in China almost entirely for the Russian trade.

Tea is seldom associated with turbulence, although the destruction of the tea-chests by the Americans in Boston harbour precipitated the War of Independence and helped to establish the famous festival of the fourth of July.

The largest consumers of tea are, in the order specified, the United Kingdom, the United States, Russia, Australasia, and Canada, while on a far reduced scale the beverage is used in Holland, Germany, France, Austria, and Denmark.

In 1864 practically all the tea imported into Britain came from China. In 1902, with a vastly increased consumption, only seventeen million lb. arrived from China, while over 277 million lb. were imported from India and Ceylon.

The cultivation of tea in Ceylon has progressed at a prodigious rate. Until 1880 there was no material export, but since that year exports have so rapidly expanded that in 1903 nearly 150 million lb. were shipped for abroad from that island. On a similar scale, the cultivation of coffee, for which Ceylon was long so celebrated, has constantly declined.

T. F. PALMER.

Another Scientist's Profession of Faith.

From our earliest childhood we have been made familiar with the accounts of the sacrifice of bulls and goats, with the burnt-offerings and sin-offerings, with the ghastly details of the temple ritual, with the horrors of the professional shambles set up in Jerusalem. That the smoke of the fat of the victims ascended as a grateful savour to the Lord, seemed a perfectly natural statement; that the blood of the slain beasts, poured down from the altar over the temple floor, did not strike us as an abominable thing. It was all unreal to us, we had never seen it; it was, we were told, all typical of something in the New Testament.

When Saint Bonaventura dilating on the joys of the saints in the Day of Judgment, counts this among them that "He shall wash His hands in the blood of the sinner," he is using a metaphor which, however natural to one accustomed to the sights of the Hebrew sacrifice, is simply revolting to any right-minded modern. No less revolting is the degradation of language preserved for us in a hymn still sung in some Protestant Churches:—

There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Emmanuel's veins,
And sinners plunged beneath that flood
Lose all their guilty stains.

For that ghastly conception it is difficult to express adequate condemnation.—Professor Silvanus Thompson, "A Not Impossible Religion," pp. 150, 151, 155.

THE latest event in the theological world is the publication of the late Professor Silvanus Thompson's confession of faith, under the title of A Not Impossible Religion.

Professor Thompson was a great scientist; as a Professor of Physics his fame was international, he was an authority upon Electricity, Magnetism, and Light. The announcement that such a distinguished scientist had finished a work in favour of religion must have raised the highest hopes and expectations in the hearts of the beleagured garrisons of the Faith. These hopes and expectations are not fulfilled in the book. Indeed, far from finding in the Sciences, with which he is familiar, facts to buttress up the leaning walls of Religion, the Professor pours the vials of his contempt upon those who make the attempt. He speaks of the "crude divagations of the new school of sentimental philosophers who mix physics and psychics for us in facile and graceful oratory. Because radium emits mysterious corpuscles, or ether-waves are found to be generated by electric sparks, we are not bound to deduce therefrom the probability that our dead friends can speak to us through a planchette, or that the doctrine of the Trinity can be developed from the triple conservation of matter, of energy, and of ether. To the truly spiritual man who is groping after the eternal truth, these new fashions in philosophy are as unsatisfying as the old atheisms which they replaced."[1]

Later on he makes an attack upon those champions of religion, Sir Oliver Lodge, Professor William James, and the redoubtable Bergson, who are always relied upon by the apologist as representing the opinion of the scientific world upon religion. Professor Thompson says:—

> Almost alone Sir Oliver Lodge seems to attract the public ear on questions of religious controversy, though the interest which his writings have evoked seems to be due not to his competence in criticism or philosophy, nor to his scholarship, but to his cultivation of the quasi-science of psychical research. The newer psychologists, of whom the late Professor William James was the shining example, tickle our ears with the jargon in which they dress up the half ascertained, half-unknown facts on the borders of our consciousness, and attract us by their skill in essaying the manufacture of an exact science out of the very elements of inexactness. One wonders in what terms the men of the next century after ours will estimate their labours. We applaud Bergson as if he were a second Plato, but we forget to ask him to define what he means by his favourite term "becoming." In all this whirr and noise of to-day, what single contribution is there that has been, or ever will be, of the smallest avail or help to the soul in conflict with itself.[2]

Of all the multitudinous religions and sects which exist to-day, Professor Thompson could not find one that he could subscribe to. Of the orthodox faith he says: "No one can read Milman's History of Latin Christianity without an appalled sense of the utter paganism which ruled, as well as of the utter profligacy which accompanied the triumph of the faith called 'orthodox.'" Of the other sects he says: "If the spectacle presented to-day by the immense variety of sects with conflicting doctrines and practices, all claiming to be the true exponents of Christianity, does not sicken the earnest seeker after truth, assuredly it saddens him. He finds the exclusiveness of the Roman or Anglican priest to grant remission and absolution for sin. The doctrines of the Plymouth Brethren and the Salvation Army are as impossible for him as the dogmas of the Greek Church. The shining eloquence which draws to the City Temple tends as little to his edification as the ethical paradoxes of South Place Institute. He looks in vain to Saint Peter's or to Saint Paul's, for at Saint Peter's there is a shrivelled pallid old man playing at holding the keys of heaven, yet himself ruled by the Curia, and at Saint Paul's there is a gorgeous performance attended by comfortable Canons who are not exactly like the fishermen of Galilee" (p. 21).

After another denunciation of Catholicism, Professor Thompson goes on: "And Protestantism from its thousand chapels every Sunday sets forth another Gospel, a 'plan of salvation' an invention of the theologians, a web of celestial tactics to outwit the devil and to rescue the soul from eternal torment in hell, by the aid of a bloody sacrifice. How utterly foreign to the Gospel of Galilee!" (p. 103).

For the Sacraments of the Church he professes the utmost contempt. "The rite of water-baptism," he declares, "alike of infant or of adult, with its accompanying piece of materialistic jargon that thereby we have been made a member of Christ, a child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven, we may freely set aside as being of no importance and of much spiritual harm." Of the Eucharist, known among Protestants as the "Lord's Supper" and the "Holy Communion," and among Catholics as the "Mass," and regarded as the greatest of all the sacraments, he observes: "Modern chemistry has had this salutary effect, that it has rendered it for ever impossible for any educated person to believe in either transubstantiation or in consubstantiation as a fact. The bread remains bread; the wine remains the juice of the grape" (p. 126).

IN a recent article, I gave some account of a gospel in the Coptic language, and closed with the reflection that, to me, the so-called Apocryphal gospels, such as the Coptic Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, and the so-called Canonical Gospels (Matthew, Mark, Luke, John) were of equal historical value. That is to say, all alike were valuable as illustrations of the mind of the people who, in the early centuries, were slowly building-up the Catholic legends and doctrine. On the present occasion, I give a few notes on a gospel which French scholars have translated from an Ethiopic version,[1] but which is believed to derive from a Greek text, written in Egypt or Palestine. It is known as The Testament in Galilee of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

The book opens with an address by Jesus to his eleven disciples, in Galilee, after his resurrection. Speaking to them as to "the Sons of Light," he tells of the end of the world, and the Day of Judgment; he prophesies earthquakes, drying-up of rivers, withering of vegetation, flights of devouring locusts. In particular, he foretells disasters to Syria, Cilicia, Pontus, Armenia, Phœnicia, Judæa, and his discourse is charged with groans, blood, and affliction.

In such revelations of early Christian psychology, one observes the remarkable difference between the attitude of the second and third centuries, and the attitude of the twentieth. In the one case, there is a sense of oppression and horror, relief from which is sought in heavenly visions. In the other and modern case, however much we suffer in the present War, the general thought of humanity is turned towards a reconstruction of civilization on earth, by human means, and in a spirit of hope and confidence. Eighteen hundred years ago, the race was far less sure of itself and its capacities than it is to-day.

Jesus proceeds to describe the approach of the Evil One, or Antichrist,—head flaming, right eye bloodshot, left eye blind, the pupils white, the lower lips swollen, the feet over-large, the limbs twisted. From Antichrist, and from all dangers, the Elect People are carried in safety to Paradise, where they dwell among angels for countless thousands of years; while the Sinners, who hated the commandments of the Lord, are consigned to fire.

Warnings are uttered against "false apostles," especially Simon and Cerinthus. Of course, to us Twentieth Century people, one apostle was no more false than another; and Simon and Cerinthus, who were Gnostic propagandists, had as much right to preach their conception of God and Spiritual Powers as the other propagandists had to circulate the more dramatic and picturesque folk-tales of Jesus, Mary, Shepherds, Wise Men, Miracles, Crucifixion, etc. But the reference to Simon and Cerinthus is an interesting reminder of the way in which a variety of ideas had to struggle for existence and supremacy in what was to be Mediæval Europe.

The next section is practically a brief summary of the life of Jesus, his marvellous works of healing, and his rising from the dead. At this point, a curious passage occurs, in which Jesus portrays to the Apostles his position and rank in heaven:—

> When I pass into heaven, I am clothed with the Wisdom of the Father, and with his Strength, and Power; I am like to the celestial beings, to angels, to archangels. I move among the Functions, the Powers, the Dominations, for I possess the fullness of the Wisdom of the Father who sent me; and the archangels Michael, Gabriel, Uriel, and Raphael have followed me even to the Fifth Heaven.

And so on. The singular anecdote follows of the angel Gabriel appearing to the Virgin Mary to announce her coming motherhood. Jesus himself, who was to be her son, was the very Gabriel who figured as the messenger in the Annunciation.

The Apostles ask Jesus when the Day of Judgment will arrive. In the Canonical accounts, he replies that it is not for them to know the secret of the divine seasons. But in this Ethiopian gospel he openly informs them that the advent of the Father will date in the year 150. Since, however, we do not know the starting-point from which the Ethiopian evangelist reckons, we cannot make a definite calculation. But we can see how certain early Christians had become impatient of the use of vague terms, and demanded unmistakable figures.

Jesus relates to his friends how, after his crucifixion, he had gone down into hell and conversed with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and other Hebrew patriarchs and prophets. This hell would seem to have been merely a kind of Sheol, or cool and shady underworld—not a place of torment. Jesus baptized the ancient patriarchs, and thus enabled them to qualify for entrance into heavenly rest. In this legend we see an effort of early Christian logic to justify the translation of pre-Christian and orthodox Hebrews to Paradise, even though, through the accident of chronology, they had never been privileged to hear the preaching of Jesus in Galilee and Jerusalem.

Towards the close of these Galilean discourses to the faithful Eleven, Jesus recites a parable of the Wise Virgins. Here we have the tale of the ten women who slept while waiting for the Bridegroom's procession, five being wise because they had lamps filled with oil, and five foolish because they had no oil. But a new turn is given to the story. Jesus explains that the five Wise Virgins are Faith, Charity, Joy, Peace, Hope, and these sit down with the guests at the wedding-feast. The five Foolish Virgins, who are shut out from the banquet, are Intelligence, Knowledge, Obedience, Continence, and Mercy. This division is surprising, and no intepretation is offered. The doctrine lying behind the parable is, perhaps, that of the superiority of certain moral aspirations to the qualities of wit, keenness, good manners, and mere good nature. It is an amateur and clumsy psychology, but, possibly, there is an attempt to discriminate between a noble temper and disposition, and a shrewd compliance with a social code in order to secure comfort and a respectable situation. At any rate, that is all I can make of it.

After Jesus has finished these revelations a clap of thunder is heard, lightning blazes, the earth trembles, the sky opens, and a luminous cloud carries Jesus upwards, while a multitude of angels bless him and shout,—

"Gather us, O Priest, to thee in the light of thy glory."

Portions of this Gospel, maybe, were produced in the second century, others added in the third. Some parts are popular narrative, and some—such as the passage about Christ among the Functions—incline to the dreamy, metaphysical scheme of thought which the Gnostics loved. Perhaps a rather uncritical collector of legendary odds and ends pieced them together, and the result is a considerable medley. One item—the portraiture of Antichrist—is somewhat original. It looks like an endeavour to associate moral ugliness with physical ugliness, and to present the Enemy of God as a kind of Caliban.

ATHEISM, ANARCHISM, AND ACCURACY.

SIR,—In the course of a recent article in the Freethinker, Mr. A. B. Moss says:—

> ..... the doctrine of non-resistance carried to its logical conclusion would mean not only the abolition of our Army and Navy, of our law courts and police courts, our judges and our magistrates, but our police constables also, and this would inevitably lead to the villain riding rough-shod over the virtuous, and to the masses being left a prey to revolution and anarchy.

I must protest against this all too common misrepresentation of Anarchism, and against the inference conveyed by the portion which I have italicized in the above paragraph, that armies, judges, policemen, etc., exist to prevent rough-shod villainy.

Like Mr. Moss, I am rather fond of logical conclusions, and, just as the Atheist's view of life entirely without any conception of God is unthinkable to the Christian, so the no-government philosophy seems absurd to most intelligent persons, who have never given the subject a thought.

It is a commonplace with Freethinkers that organized religion is maintained largely to keep the people in subjection; exactly, but the reverence for government is inculcated for the same reason; indeed, investigation into the evolution of government shows that God and the State are twin oppressors. Mr. Moss, I feel sure, would think that we were more highly civilized, if we were completely without priests, churches, and all their socially wasteful and useless ceremonies, yet he has not outgrown reverence for the judge with his wig and his wisdom, and for the policeman (guardian of virtue and professional enemy of villainy) the "justice" of courts, and the belief that society could not exist without those repressive institutions.

If Uncle Joe were to say that the masses had become so degraded that they lapsed into immorality and Atheism, I am sure it would promptly be pointed out to him that disbelief in God had nothing in common with moral depravity. Yet Mr. Moss falls into the common error (there are many journalists who do it maliciously) of writing "anarchy" as a synonym for social confusion.

Standing on the battlefields of Europe to-day are millions of men whose sole immediate concern is slaughter. Armed with the deadliest of weapons human ingenuity has devised, supported by all the most scientific appliances for the destruction of life, these men, who are not Anarchists with bombs, but law-abiding citizens (with hand-grenades) of the best governed countries in the world, these men, having committed "man's first sin, obedience," are prepared at the word of command to shoot, bomb, asphyxiate, bludgeon and bayonet their fellow-creatures, to revolutionize even the physical character of the earth, and with great gallantry and courage to sacrifice their own lives.

While we contemplate this magnificent manifestation of the triumph of government, of discipline and order, let us recoil with horror from the awful prospect of "the masses being left a prey to revolution and anarchy."

A SHORT HISTORY OF FREETHOUGHT.

BY THE RIGHT HON. J. M. ROBERTSON, M.P.

2 vols.; xxiv+1019 pp.; cloth, 12s. 6d. net carriage paid.

THE mental attitude known as Freethought is a natural and necessary tendency of the human mind, and has become in modern times a world-wide Movement. You may sympathize with it or disagree with it, but it is something you have got to reckon with.

In the past Freethought in its numerous forms has been compelled to struggle against mighty forces that sought by every means to put it down. It has never been a creed, because it has never believed in creeds. It has been a frame of mind, a desire, an impulse, often misdirected, but ever persistent, towards liberty of thought; it holds that knowledge may lead us to truth, while ignorance and authority cannot.

There is no more fascinating theme than that of the struggle for intellectual freedom. There is no prize better worth striving for. No other cause has suffered so much unmerited reproach. The labourers in this vineyard have rendered priceless services to humanity, and their legacy is a message of enlightenment which the world cannot afford to be without.

The history of this great Movement should be known to every Freethinker, and Mr. Robertson's HISTORY is the best which the world has yet produced on the subject. The following chapter headings will indicate the scope of the work :—

Views and Opinions.

Dr. Lyttelton and the "Freethinker."

It was with much pleasure that we received Dr. Lyttelton's offer to open a discussion on the points at issue between himself and Freethinkers, and his first letter will have been read by all with considerable interest. As his object is to discuss broad and fundamental issues rather than superficial and unimportant differences, we shall endeavour to imitate his example, and hasten to deal with the more important points raised in the article. The facts cited in our notes on "Religion and Cleanliness" are, of course, admitted. Dr. Lyttelton rightly says the whole question is, What are the legitimate inferences from the facts produced? Our own inference was that religion and dirt were, historically, not unusual bedfellows; that lack of cleanliness was once upon a time accepted as an indication of saintliness, and that this was a consequence of a preaching of asceticism, combined with opposition to medical and sanitary science. Indeed, this was hardly an inference—it was little more than a statement of historic fact. The teaching of Christians and the practice of Christians are there for all who care to study the subject.

Modern Influences on Religion.

But we must demur from Dr. Lyttelton's inference that in saying an alliance between Christianity and dirt existed for several centuries, and that this alliance was inevitable, inasmuch as it followed from certain aspects of early Christian life and teaching, we implied that "professing Christians to-day wash less frequently than Agnostics," or that, in order to justify our position, we are bound to prove that there has been an alliance between Christianity and dirt "during the last 150 years." We should be much surprised to discover that Christians wash less frequently than Agnostics—other things equal—and we quite fail to see the relevancy of the "last 150 years." For it is just part of the Freethought case that for considerably more than 150 years freethinking and secularizing ideas have been rationalizing and humanizing Christians to such an extent that they have been compelled to drop some of the more objectionable doctrines, and mould their lives more in accord with the dictates of science and secular common sense. The last 150 years has seen a great change in Christian doctrine and teaching, and the contention of the Secularist is that this change is the result, not of a new revelation from heaven, not even of a more correct understanding of the old revelation, but is entirely due to the pressure of a more secularized social life on religious teachings. And the settlement of that issue is of vital importance in the controversy between Christians and Freethinkers.

The Implications of Christianity.

Dr. Lyttelton submits that the issues are whether there is a "necessary connection between the doctrines of Christianity and dirtiness of person," and whether "religion is to be condemned for the folly or blindness or barbarism of its votaries." It does not seem to us that issues raised in this way admit of a plain and simple Yes or No. Of course, there is no specific command in Christianity, "Thou shalt not wash," nor "Thou shalt kill the unbeliever," nor "Thou shalt obstruct or suppress science." But when we find in the Christian Church from the earliest times these things being done by people in the name of their religion, and done in virtue of their intense belief in the Christian religion, then we submit we are warranted in believing there was something in Christianity that encouraged such conduct. To say they misunderstood Christianity hardly meets the case. A religion that can be so early, so easily, and so universally misunderstood is clearly no safe guide for mankind. And in the terms of the Christian hypothesis, Christianity was given to man as a guide; it was not something he slowly elaborated by the method of trial and error, such as rules in secular affairs. And the case is still more startling when we discover that the correctives to these alleged misunderstandings of Christianity have been supplied by those who had least belief in it, and often by those who rejected it altogether. There is clearly much better ground here for attributing the modifications of Christianity to the rationalizing and secularizing spirit of the age than to any genuine discovery of the real message of Christianity.

Were Christians in Error?

But is Dr. Lyttelton quite justified in repudiating the Christian Church of the ages, and the vast majority of Christians—until, we presume, about 150 years ago—as so many perverters of Christian teaching? And, if true, is it not, to a Christian, as damning an indictment of Christianity as any Freethinker could frame? Dr. Lyttelton is endeavouring to save Christianity at the expense of Christians. It is left for the Freethinker to say a saving word on behalf of Christians. When Jesus came before the world as a celibate, when he indulged in lengthy fasts, and so entered into communication with the supernatural world, was he not illustrating in his own person the common practice of the Eastern ascetic religious teacher? When he cured epileptics and lunatics by a mere touch, and declared that such could be cured by prayers and fasts, when he declared that diseases could be cured "In my name," was not that giving an encouragement to the theory of demonism in disease, and discouraging scientific medicine? And when eternal salvation hereafter was made the end of human life here, and salvation made dependent upon right religious belief, was not that laying the seeds for persecution? And there is the final, and to our mind, damning fact, that in our earliest acquaintance with Christians we find them manifesting, in some degree, all the evils upon which we have dwelt. The Freethought case is that the evils manifested by the Christian had their germ in Christian teaching, and that given the teaching the evils were certain to develop. And one proof is that they have developed wherever Christianity has established itself.

The Survival of Christianity.

We are endeavouring to keep to broad issues rather than to run after mere expressions that are open to criticism. As Dr. Lyttelton says, it is not a matter of importance what the selected topic is, so long as it gives the chance of discussing something of importance. And in this spirit I take my critic's concluding words:—

> The worse one finds the conduct of Christians has been, the greater wonder it is that the creed still survives in vigour. And never before have Christians striven so hard as now to recover the primitive purity of their faith, by studying the doings and sayings of the Christ of History; rather than the Christ of later fiction.

We are afraid we cannot share Dr. Lyttelton's wonder at the survival of a Christian creed, when we consider the manner and conditions of its survival. For it has survived, not in virtue of intrinsic strength or merit, but on account of extraneous and adventitious agencies. It has used the power of the State to enforce its own teachings, and to suppress the teachings of others. It has corrupted history in its own interests, and has made the road to political preferment and social advancement dependent on the acceptance of its teachings. It has terrorized where it could, and bribed where it could not terrorize. For centuries it maintained a social environment in which criticism of the Creed was a crime, and in which credulity, and docility, and submission were extolled as the supreme virtues. Anything could have survived with equal success given the same means, and the same ruthlessness in their use. With equal success, we say, because one may well ask what creed has survived? Is not the modification of Christian teaching in the face of hostile criticism a commonplace of history? What has become of Biblical inspiration, of salvation by faith, of the doctrine of possession, of witchcraft, of eternal damnation, of miracles, and a dozen other things, on behalf of which the Churches fought and slaughtered? Christianity has survived in little else but name; and one may question whether Christians are now really trying "to recover the primitive purity of their faith." Are they not rather trying to see by what means they can read modern ideas into primitive beliefs, and convert a supernaturally conceived, miracle-working, legendary Christ into a figure-head for current social reforms and ethical aspirations?

"Nearer, My God, to Thee."

II.

IN the cinemas, at present, an interesting film, bearing the above title, is being exhibited, and every now and then the half-minor tune to which the popular hymn seems indissolubly married is slowly played. The story opens amid most beautiful rural scenery in the bewitching month of May. It is a love-story, teeming with blood-curdling episodes, but ending in apparent peace and happiness. What there is in it ever so remotely suggestive of the hymn, beyond the mere fact that at two or three religious services it is shown as being very indifferently sung, is not at all obvious. In the first scene we are brought delightfully near to Nature's heart. On the edge of a lovely forest we are introduced to a small village school-house, and roaming among the flowers are a dozen or so of little children, with the headmaster and pupil teacher. The first fact that impresses us is that the misshapen schoolmaster, with the fine face, is deeply in love with his lady assistant. But a man from London turns up, whose plausible, seductive ways win the young lady's heart. They get married, and settle down in the Metropolis. It was a most unfortunate union, of which a son was the only issue. John Boden became a drunken, good-for-nothing scoundrel, and ere long committed a crime for which he was sentenced to ten years' penal servitude. During his absence, the schoolmaster befriended his broken-hearted wife, and adopted their son. Boden hated his wife, and had been guilty of maltreating her; and no sooner was he out of prison than his savage behaviour was resumed. She left him and returned to her native village. Boden traced her there, and shot her benefactor, severely wounding him. Afraid of the law, he committed suicide. Now, the curious thing is that the religious people in this tragic story were despicable hypocrites, utterly incapable of appreciating any noble action, and who were even shocked at the spectacle of unselfish service and the sincere gratitude it elicited. John Drayton was doubtless a religious man, but his heroic conduct was the outcome of a noble nature which was his quite independently of his religion, which would have been his and found a similar outlet in like circumstances had he been a Pagan or an Atheist. The people who went to church and sang "Nearer, my God, to thee," were narrow-minded, bigoted, self-righteous, censorious, and hateful, however God-fearing and heavenly minded they may have been. Their very saintliness dehumanized them.

Now, nearness to God and saintliness being synonymous terms, we may lay it down as a principle that the possession of this Christian product, by whatever name it may be called, is in no sense a guarantee that its possessor is a noble-minded, brotherly hearted person. As the divines will surely challenge this proposition, it may be advisable to verify it from history. Few defenders of the sanity of the saints as a class are to be found to-day, the abnormality of such characters as Catherine of Sienna being indisputable. The sincerity of the majority of them may be taken for granted, but sincerity is a token neither of sanity nor of moral excellence. Some who had the reputation in their day of being saints, were but brilliant rogues in disguise, whether canonized or not. Our present point, however, is that saintliness is not necessarily accompanied by high ethical qualities. Of Dean Milman's belief in and advocacy of the perfection of the Christian religion in its original purity there can be no intelligent doubt. "Its essential doctrine," he tells us, "was, in its pure theory, inseparable from humane, virtuous, and charitable disposition"; but he is not blind to the fact that the balance between piety and beneficence was seriously disturbed at an early stage in its history, with the following disastrous result :—

> Thus, in a great degree, while the Roman world became Christian in outward worship and in faith, it remained Heathen, or even at some periods worse than Heathenism in its better times, as to beneficence, gentleness, purity, social virtue, humanity, and peace (History of Christianity, vol. iii., p. 409).

St. Bernard, of Clairvaux, who flourished at the commencement of the twelfth century, is universally acknowledged to have been one of the very greatest, if not the greatest and most illustrious, of all the saints Christianity has produced. He was, certainly, the most powerful personality of the twelfth century, or of almost any other century. Milman describes him as "at once the leading and the governing head of Christendom." He ruled supreme in the multitudinous convents that were rapidly springing up in all the lands, in the councils of State, and even in the intellectual world. His word was final on every subject. Of noble birth and brilliantly endowed, he might have won immortal fame as courtier and statesman, or in the Church as bishop, cardinal, or even pope; but he chose the severest monastic retirement from all worldly allurements or ecclesiastical honours, joining the new Cistercian Order at Citeaux, which was characterized by the most rigorous discipline and ascetic practices. Here he denied himself the simplest comforts of life; he punished his body in every conceivable way, eating only just enough to keep himself alive, and yet undertaking the hardest, most menial, and degrading offices, and devoting himself to solitude, prayer, and study. Soon the Citeaux monastery became so thronged with votaries that a new one had to be opened with Bernard as its first abbot. Clairvaux, situated in the valley of Wormwood, not far from the river Aube in France, shot into repute as the most hallowed spot in Christendom, and its abbot as the holiest and most saintly of men, whom the people more than half worshipped. His nearness to God overawed all who came in contact with him. His brothers followed his example, and were inmates of the same monastery. But did Bernard's sanctity incarnate itself in those shining virtues which ought to adorn social life? Did his nearness to God co-exist with sympathetic, compassionate, and helpful nearness to his brother men? One day his sister, who had married a nobleman, appeared, in great state, and with a magnificent retinue, at the gate of the monastery, desiring to see her brothers. But they were altogether too holy to have anything to do with so worldly a woman. Milman says that "she was spurned from the door as a sinner." Stung to the quick by their attitude towards her, she exclaimed: "If I am a sinner, I am one of those for whom Christ died, and have the greater need of my brother's kindly counsel." Bernard was sorry for her, and tried hard to separate her from her husband, but did not succeed, though eventually she did renounce all her worldly treasures and retire into a convent. Are brothers ever justified in treating their sisters with such disdain?

St. Bernard was a tremendously orthodox man who bitterly hated both heresies and heretics, and was resolved to do his best to crush both. Abelard and Arnold of Brescia, were the two chief objects of the saint's vehement detestation, the former being the most distinguished intellectualist of that century, who championed the cause of Reason in an age of Faith. Bernard denounced him in the most virulent and sarcastic language at his command. Abelard was undeserving of any sympathetic consideration. Writing to his friend, the Pope, Bernard said :—

> Which is most intolerable, the blasphemy or the arrogance of his language? Which is most damnable, the temerity or the impiety? Would it not be more just to stop his mouth with blows than confute him by argument?

Arnold of Brescia, like Abelard, declined to submit to the authority of the Church, and Bernard could not find terms harsh enough to express his abhorrence of him. He called him the enemy of the Cross of Christ, the fomenter of discord, the fabricator of schism, who ought to be seized and imprisoned. Milman cites another instance of Bernard's mean action :—

> The Abbot of Clairvaux was involved in a disputed election to the Archbishopric of York. The narrow corporate spirit of his order betrayed him into great and crying injustice to William, the elected prelate of that See. The rival of the Englishman, Henry Murdach, once a Cluniac, was a Cistercian; and Bernard scruples not to heap on one of the most pious of men accusasations of ambition, of worse than ambition: to condemn him to everlasting perdition (History of Latin Christianity, vol. iv., pp. 390-1).

Milman adds that whether Bernard was imposed upon, or was the author of these calumnies, his interference in the election forms "a dark page in his life."

The truth is that piety, nearness to God, or saintliness does not necessarily either arise from or lead to a loving, compassionate, and beneficent disposition. A man's religion may yield him the most exquisitely sweet and joyous experiences without producing in him any marked elevation and nobility of character, as was notably the case with Benvenuto Cellini and many others whose history is known to us.

The Pomp of Yesterday.

> Genius hovers with his sunshine and music close by the darkest and deafest eras.—Emerson.
> And yet what days were those, Parmenides!
> When we were young. —Matthew Arnold.

Time works wonders with reputations. Gladstone's statue "in London's central roar" exhibited but one solitary wreath on the anniversary of his birth a few years after he had passed away. A predominant figure in British political life for over half a century, Gladstone was scarcely cold in his grave before his life's record was being revised. Generations after Beaconsfield's death his statue is loaded with flowers, and his name acclaimed by the descendants of the people who regarded him as a pariah. Byron, who woke one morning to find himself famous, and whose poetry crossed all European frontiers, is now but little read. Shelley, who woke many mornings to find himself called infamous, is now recognized as one of the supreme glories of our literature. Wellington, dying at an extreme age, had long outlived his popularity; whilst his great rival, Napoleon, our lifelong enemy, upon whom had been exhausted the vocabulary of vituperation, is acclaimed as one of the world's greatest men.

A similar reversal of verdict has been applied to the Victorian era. Our parents and grand-parents were self-complacent folk, and deemed themselves the heirs of all the ages. And now their age is a common synonym for a narrow and conventional view of life, and every journalist has his fling at them. Truly, the whirligig of time brings in its revenges.

These ideas are prompted by Mr. Lytton Strachey's Eminent Victorians (Chatto & Windus), an acidulated and witty study of some of the best-known personalities of that period. His survey is comprehensive and entertaining, and includes, among others, Dr. Arnold, the famous headmaster of Rugby, Florence Nightingale, the heroine of the Crimean War, Cardinal Manning, the Catholic statesman, and General Gordon, of Khartoum fame, all of whom Mr. Strachey criticizes with a playful freedom and cool detachment which will irritate some readers and amuse others. Under Mr. Strachey's microscope the heroes and heroines of the Victorian era are dissected, and the result is more entertaining than the pages of most modern novels.

Mr. Strachey's manner is shown in his caustic account of Cardinal Newman's visit to Rome, where he says Italian ecclesiastics looked at the great English Cardinal "with their shrewd eyes and hard faces, while he poured into their ears—which, as he had already noted with distress, were large and none too clean—his careful disquisitions; but it was all in vain." Gladstone does not escape the knife, for Mr. Strachey points out that, "in spite of the involutions of his intellect and the contortions of his spirit, it is impossible not to perceive a strain of naivete in Mr. Gladstone." How biting, too, is the writer's denunciation of the Taeping leader in the Chinese rebellion, who is described as being "surrounded by thirty wives and one hundred concubines," and devoting himself to the "spiritual side of his mission." Perhaps the most amusing example of Mr. Strachey's quality will be found in the account of General Gordon's departure from Victoria Station on his last adventure into the Soudan:—

> Gordon tripped on to the platform. Lord Granville bought the necessary tickets; the Duke of Cambridge opened the railway-carriage door. The General jumped into the train; and then Lord Wolseley appeared, carrying a leather bag, in which were two hundred pounds in gold, collected from friends at the last moment, for the contingencies of the journey. The bag was handed through the window. The train started. As it did so, Gordon leant out, and addressed a last whispered question to Lord Wolseley. Yes, it had been done. Lord Wolseley had seen to it himself; next morning, every member of the Cabinet would receive a copy of Dr. Samuel Clarke's Scripture Promises. That was all. The train rolled out of the station.

Few things, it will be observed, escape Mr. Strachey's critical eye. Perhaps it is human to be pleased with this, but in some cases the pleasure is short-lived. Even the brilliant Mr. Strachey may not be infallible in his judgment of men and affairs. Apart from the foibles of individuals, there is something to be said on behalf of this maligned period. So far as literature is concerned, there must have been a high level of taste which made it possible for Robert Browning, Thomas Carlyle, George Meredith, and Alfred Tennyson to be acclaimed so loudly. These writers, of such varying degrees of genius, all required more constant and active intelligence on the part of their many readers than any authors who are popular to-day. Science, too, made its appeal, and never lacked enthusiastic support. So far-reaching, indeed, were the changes wrought by Darwin, Spencer, Huxley, and their brilliant colleagues, that at the present time we have eminent ecclesiastics adopting a breadth of interpretation which would have seemed the absolute limit of scepticism to an earlier generation. The intellectual energy of the great Victorians precipitated a silent revolution, and we owe our present wider outlook to these men. Mental energy must be inferred in the pioneers of the Victorian era; more than in the many ordinary intelligences who now profit by their achievements. When great questions have to be answered, may we deal with them with the same fervour as the despised Victorians:—

> Who knew the seasons when to take > Occasion by the hand, and make
> The bounds of freedom wider.

MIMNERMUS.

A Search for the Soul.

VI.

IN one of the volumes of "Science and Art" by the great Dionysius Lardner, published many years ago, that writer says in his article on "Man":—

> There is a principle called personal identity, which consists in the internal consciousness by which each individual knows his past experience, so as to be able, with the greatest certainty, to identify himself as existing at any given moment during his earthly life, or at any former time and place in it.

Then, after referring to the fact that in the course of life the entire mass of "matter" composing the body has many times undergone a complete change, he says:—

> Yet no one doubts that there was something there which did not undergo a change except in its relation to the mutable body, and which possessed the same thought, memory, and consciousness, and constituted the personal identity of the individual. This something must necessarily have been something not matter, but something spiritual.

This continuous consciousness of identity, he states, "is a proof of a spiritual essence connected with the human organism." At the same time, however, he admits that if there is nothing in the phenomenon of death "to demonstrate the simultaneous destruction of the spiritual principle, there is on the other hand nothing to prove its continued existence." This argument, drawn from what is sometimes called "the persistence of the self," has been constantly advanced in support of the existence of an immortal soul from the time of Lardner to the present day.

Upon looking at the question as stated, we find the position deduced to be (1) that there is something in the human organism which did not undergo a change, like the material portion of that organism, during the whole course of life; (2) that the something which remained unchanged must be spiritual, and may legitimately be called the Soul. This is the dualistic argument. But how do we know that such a "spiritual principle" really exists? The reason implied is that the Mind (which is said to be a part of the Soul) is not a material substance, and could not therefore have undergone any change in its composition like that of the body; and, such being the case, it felt no change in its own personal identity.

Now, as a matter of fact, all the mental functions which give rise to the phenomena we call "mind" have been generated by certain activities of the molecules of the brain, in conjunction with the cerebral energy residing in that organ. But since both the molecules and energy have been many times renewed during life—so that the mental manifestations have been produced by continually changing particles of matter—it necessarily follows that the mind has changed as well as the body. If we take into consideration that the functioning, and the thought which arises from it, are but two aspects of the same thing, we shall see that this change of the Mind is an undoubted fact. And this brings us back to the question, How do we know that an immaterial "spiritual principle" exists in the human organism? The answer is, We do not know. But we know that there was a time in the childhood of every human being when these phenomena were unknown. They could not, in fact, arise until after a host of impressions from the external world had been registered by the sense organs on the brain. In the case of an individual born deaf and blind these impressions from the outside world, which are mainly derived through the senses of sight and hearing, would be unknown, and could not therefore be registered; there would consequently, in such cases, be no phenomena of Mind whatever. The mental faculties, though latent in the brain, have to be developed by outside impressions before their existence can be manifested. The so-called "mental faculties" are thus purely materialistic. In his essay on Vitality, Professor Tyndall says:—

> After a certain number of years the whole body is entirely renewed. How is the sense of personal identity maintained across the flight of molecules? Like changing sentinels, the particles of oxygen, hydrogen, and carbon that depart seem to whisper their secret to their comrades that arrive, and thus, while the Non-ego shifts, the Ego remains the same. Constancy of form in the grouping of the molecules, and not constancy of the molecules themselves, is the correlative of this constancy of perception.

Upon the same subject the eminent physiologist, Dr. Maudsley, says in his Gulstonian lectures upon "Body and Mind" (p. 127):—

> Every part of the body is in a constant state of change, and within a certain period every particle of it is renewed, and yet amidst these changes a man feels that he remains essentially the same.....It is not absurd to suppose that in the brain the new series of particles take the pattern of those which they replace, as they do in other organs and tissues which are continually changing their substance, yet preserve their identity. Why, then, assume the necessity of an "immaterial principle" to prevent the impression of an idea from being lost"?

It appears, then, that in renewing the waste particles of the brain, as well as those of all the other organs and tissues of the body, the new molecules are careful to preserve, not only the outward form, but all the registered impressions, so that when renovated, every portion remains precisely the same in size, shape, and position as before. It seems quite clear, then, that it is the preservation of the exact forms of these registered impressions on the brain which gives the feeling of personal identity, as we see is the case in the minutely marked surface of a gramophone record. Suppose a hundred of these records to be cast from the same original mould, so that every one of them bears precisely the same marks and registered impressions throughout. The material particles of which each record is composed are entirely different in every case; but the form of the registered impressions upon the surface of each (made by the speaker or singer on the original blank record) is identical in all. Yet from each of the hundred records we shall hear the identical tones of the same well-known human voice, either in word or song—say, that of the late Dan Leno in his comic speeches about "buying a house." This result is in perfect agreement with Professor Tyndall's statement that the sense of personal identity is derived from identity in form and grouping of the molecules, and not identity of the molecules themselves.

But, after all, what is it which causes a man to feel that he is essentially the same, notwithstanding all the changes that have taken place during life in every portion of his organism? This is nothing more nor less than Memory—which recalls to him a multitude of his own sayings and doings in the past, as well as people he has known and places he has visited. Take away memory and his personal identity is gone; he knows not who he is, who are his friends, where he lives, or anything that has happened in the past. Many such cases have been recorded at different times, though the loss of memory was only temporary.

In his Riddle of the Universe Professor Haeckel says that "Ewald Hering, in a thoughtful work, showed memory to be a general property of organized matter," and he adduces reasons of his own in confirmation of the fact. Dr. Maudsley, in the work already quoted from, says (p. 19):—

> The acquired functions of the spinal cord, and of the sensory ganglia, obviously imply the existence of memory .....The impressions made upon them, and the answering movements, both leave their traces behind them, which are capable of being revived on the occasions of similar impressions.....Memory is the organic registration of the effects of impressions, the organization of experience, and to recollect is to revive the experience —to call the organized residua into functional activity.

Memory can only go back to the time of the dawn of thought, that is, to the time when impressions from the external world had been registered upon the brain. No trace of remembrance of the embryonic condition or of the first two or three years of childhood has ever been found in man's after life.

Scotsmen have a reputation—fairly well deserved, I believe—for being intelligent, level headed, and cautious; or, to use a word of their own which includes all these admirable qualities—canny. Yet, at times, they are apt to become sentimental and perfervid, and then there is no stopping them; they go the whole hog. Who of us would engage to measure the volume of tepid and turbid eloquence in which they have done their best to drown the memory of Burns? And R. L. Stevenson, whose talent was genuine enough if a little meagre, would have cut a handsomer figure to-day if he had not been mis-praised and over praised by those of his countrymen who find the pavement of Fleet Street more attractive than the bonnie heather of their dear "hielands."

A correspondent has been kind enough to draw our attention to a leader in a recent number of the Hawick News, from which we gather that the Bible runs the author Tam o' Shanter pretty hard, and puts poor R. L. S. in the shade altogether. The writer is moved almost to tears by the work of the Bible Society, a monument of British stupidity as solid as the building in which it is housed. "With sublime faith (we are told) it trusts the book to convey its own message; to give its own lights; and to hold its own place by its own intrinsic merit. And this faith justifies itself. It never did so more effectively than in this present moment." There certainly can be no doubt that only with a "sublime faith" are we able to find a message in the mixed collection of history, legend, and ethics, known as the "Bible"; without faith, sublime or otherwise, we find that it conveys not one but many messages reflecting very different stages of culture, from the barbarous militarism of nomadic robbers to the humanitarianism of the Gospels. But we are not the only people who have faith in the Bible fetish. The Hun, too, has been nourished on the Hebrew diet. While we were sentimentalizing over the New Testament, he was bracing his moral sinews and nerves with the real politik of the Old Testament. It is not for the British Bibliolater to object that we are not now under the Mosaic dispensation. That may be so, yet we as a religious nation and with our genius for compromise, have always tempered the softness of the New with the blood and iron of the Old dispensation.

We send New Testaments to a race of savages whose only weapon against the invader is indomitable courage. The virus of slave-morality, from which we have long ago obtained immunity, acts upon the savage mind as the diseases we introduce act upon his body. We are not, however, content to impose a culture unsuited to a lower race. We make its failure an excuse for destroying what a religious writer recently described as "blind alleys in the evolution of spiritual humanity." In our concern for the raising of the spiritual type we send out missionaries and Testaments, trade rum and gaudy cottons, followed by land prospectors and maxim guns. We present the heathen with hell in a moral sense, and if they don't take kindly to it we give it to them in another and more compelling form. Mr. Safroni-Middleton has pictured for us the devastating effect of Christianity in the Marquesas and other South Sea Islands.

Our Harwich apologist is impressed by the persistence of the Book. Yet there is little cause to wonder. Given a vast body of men whose living it is not to tell the truth about the Bible, with laymen stupid enough to accept what they are told, and the position of the idol is fairly secure. Yet there is less talk now than there used to be of the secret of England's greatness. The Bible is often left out altogether. According to the point of view, it lies in our sea-power, constitutional government, free trade, genius for colonization, or diet of beer and roast beef. The less we say of the Bible at the present moment, the better. If the Christian is consistent, he must cry back, not to Jesus, but to Moses, to Joshua, and to that arch-Machiavellian David, the man after God's own heart; and in that case, denunciation of the methods of the enemy is not unlike hypocrisy. The fact of the matter is that we neglected the Old Testament, with its vigorous if unscrupulous nationalism, for the brotherhood and sentimental humanitarianism of the Gospels, which we are now contented to leave to the Quakers and Mr. Snowden. Consistency was never one of our strong points.

Although the clergy are exempted from military service, they do not like admitting the soft impeachment. According to the Bishop of London, if many more parsons volunteer for the Army, sermons at morning and evening services will soon be the exception rather than the rule. Many people would like to know how many of the 50,000 clergy of this country are actually fighting, and not strutting around in khaki uniforms as Army Chaplains.

The Duke of Rutland is either very pious or something of a humourist. Recently he suggested that the bishops should instruct their clergy to read the prayer for rain. Even the mildest-mannered curate might resent undertaking the duties of a rain-doctor in a civilized community.

Four hundred additional names of clergymen have been submitted by the Archbishop of Canterbury as Army chaplains. Presumably, these men will receive officers' pay, and their chief duties will comprise religious services at the back of the Front.

At the coronation of Napoleon the First as Emperor of the French, one of his generals remarked that nothing was wanting to complete the ceremony but the million or so of men who had given their lives to put an end to that kind of thing. We were reminded of this on reading of the requiem service for the Ex-Czar of Russia, held in London, with the King and Queen in attendance. All that was wanting was another service in memory of the many, many, thousands of men and women who had suffered torture, imprisonment, and death, under the rule of the Russian autocracy.

The Rev. F. B. Meyer, writing with reference to Sunday baseball games, says the proposal "fills me with dismay." Just so! So many things produce that unhappy result in brother Meyer.

According to the report at the annual meeting of the London Mendicity Society, many thousands of pounds are given away yearly to beggars in the streets of the metropolis. No mention is made of the dear clergy who are the cleverest beggars on earth.

The Court of Appeal, on July 22, confirmed the judgment of the lower court, that various legacies for the saying of Masses for the dead were null and void. We do not see how, in the present state of the law, any other decision could have been reached. But, as we believe in liberty for others, as well as for ourselves, we hasten to add, that the sooner this kind of law is wiped out of existence the better. It is a stupid use for a man to put his money to, and the picture of a number of priests mumbling so many hundreds of pounds worth of Masses for the souls of the dead is an insult to civilized intelligence. But the cure for this is education—not legislation. Our interest in freedom of opinion is not for ourselves alone but for all.

Here is an excellent opportunity for the clergy to test the efficacy of prayers for the weather. Ocean Island, in the Pacific Gilbert and Ellice group, has suffered for two years from drought.

Bible and Beer! A Labour member stated at Edmonton Tribunal that a certain trade union opened meetings with prayer and ended by sending the hat round for "beer-money."

A Yorkshire parson, owing to labour shortage, has had to act as minister, sexton, bellringer, and gravedigger. Quite a quick-change turn!

Sandbagging the statue of Charles the First at Charing Cross has cost £450. Has this anything to do with the king's canonization by the bishops?

The hard work of the clergy does not tend to shorten their lives. The Bishop of Marlborough has resigned the Deanery of Exeter at the age of ninety-one, but he still retains the title of Bishop.

The Bishop of London told a story of the transformation of a Bethnal Green boy at the anniversary of the Sunshine Guild. He said he saw "a most gorgeous" footman at the Athenæum Club, and this impressive person had come from a tiny room in Bethnal Green. The point of the Bishop's story was that this "gorgeous" footman owed his progress from the slums to such Christian agencies as the Sunshine Guild, what the Bishop did not add was that the Christian religion was admirably adapted for training flunkeys.

An authentic case of conversion is associated with the late Father Clements, of St. Ethelberta, Slough. He went to Slough thirty-seven years ago, and converted a stable into a church.

A Daily Chronicle reviewer cites the following in a review of the Collected Poems of that brilliant writer, Rupert Brooke, who met his death in the War:—

> Did you hear of the British private who had been through the fighting from Mons to Ypres, and was asked what he thought of all his experiences? He said: "What I don't like about this 'ere b—— Europe is all these b—— pictures of Jesus Christ and His relations, behind b—— bits of glawss.

Brooke adds: "It seems to express perfectly that cheerful Atheism which are the chief characteristics of my race." None but a Freethinker at heart could have written that last sentence. But what will the clergy say?

The Wesleyan Committee on Spiritual Advance emphasizes "its conviction that the greatest need of the Church at this hour is the recovery of the vision of the Risen Lord and of the apostolic experience of the power of the Holy Ghost." The Committee has hit the nail right on the head. The vision has vanished, the power is no longer felt—why? Simply because the belief that made both possible has been lost. Neither the Risen Lord nor the Holy Ghost does anything at all; it is the faith in them that does everything. When that is gone, the situation is hopeless.

The most humiliating of all admissions on the part of a clergyman has been made by the President of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference. As reported in the British Weekly for July 25, the reverend gentleman said that "the Church had been weighed in the balance and found wanting." For repeatedly saying the same thing we have been set down as liars; but our judgment is now confirmed by the chief official of a great Church.

To Correspondents.

Robert Miles.—We have read both your letters with considerable pleasure. The one published was well expressed, and we are not surprised the editor felt called upon to reply. Perhaps that was to save himself reproach from pious quarters. Anyway, it is a good thing to ventilate our side of the case. We are dealing elsewhere with the article.

J. H. Round.—Sorry your letter is "crowded out." We agree that if the "Day of Prayer" has given the Lord as much amusement as it has given to some mortals, it will serve the purpose of a much-needed diversion.

A. Russell.—We should liked to have printed your communication, but, with our restricted space, we must forbear. We think you are right in saying that "religion" is not the right word. Our objection to the use of the word is that long usage has clearly fixed its meaning to the average man or woman, and its use nowadays in a new sense is bound to mislead. It puzzles us also why some people should be so anxious to prove they have a religion. If one rejects the thing, why not the name? It reminds us of the clinging of some people to an ideal "Christ" after criticism has demonstrated the mythical nature of the character.

R. Martin.—The Pioneer Press would gladly quote special terms for 500 or 1,000 copies of Mr. Cohen's Religion and the Child. Certainly, their circulation would do good, while the subject of education is so much to the fore. Now is certainly a good time for pleading the cause of Secular Education.

T. Fisher.—The question of reprinting is under consideration. Cost and scarcity of paper is the only real obstacle. We share your appreciation of "Abracadabra's" articles.

We have received a letter from Mr. W. Walters, of Derby, which we regret being unable to print in full, in which he argues that Humanism is essential to Atheism, and Vegetarianism essential to Humanism. Mr. Walters hopes that all Freethinkers will give the subject their earnest attention. We fancy we are right in saying that this subject has received more attention from Freethinkers than from any class in the community.

Another Corp.—Your advice was quite correct.

A. G. Early.—Your judgment of Butler is, we think, quite sound. His Analogy is now little more than an exercise in dialectics. It was a powerful piece of work, written for a special purpose—against Deism—and it was conclusive. Too conclusive; for it pointed to Atheism as the logical end of the journey. The work must always be read with an eye to the times and the purpose for which it was written. Butler's sermons on morals are, however, on a different level. In our judgment, they represent a valuable contribution to the literature of the subject. They will always repay reading.

J. Gair.—Shall be delighted to meet you again after all these years.

Glendalough.—Thanks. Will appear next week. MSS. will do. We hope you enjoyed your holiday, and are the better in health for the change.

E. Lechmere.—Thanks for paper. Will deal with it next week. The sender must have a very inadequate idea of the strength of your convictions.

G. Bosworth.—MSS. received. Thanks.

R. Dunlop.—We did not receive a review copy of the book named or would have found room for a brief notice of it. The daily illustrated papers are, we presume, largely written for those who do not read, and by those who are not over-careful in their thinking.

L. J. Roe.—Darwin's Life and Letters is published by John Murray. We believe there is a cheap edition. Mr. C. T. Gorham has published (Watts & Co.) an account of the Spanish Inquisition, which you will find useful. Darwinism To-Day is sold by the Pioneer Press, price 3s., postage 6d. "Atheist" should have been placed on your identification disc at the beginning. Why not apply to your C.O. for rectification?

Miss Vance asks us to announce that in the obituary of Miss Annie Harwood, in our issue of July 21, the name of her father was inadvertently written as "George Harwood" instead of "Charles."

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We printed an extra supply of the Freethinker last week, but in spite of this it ran out of print, and we were unable to supply all orders. This is gratifying, although we regret not being able to satisfy customers. We have, however, increased our printing order this week so that none will be again disappointed. We do not mind how often we are compelled to repeat the same policy.

We presume the letter comes from a new reader, but a correspondent writes asking whether we think it would be good work to send out Freethought literature to the troops in France and elsewhere. Certainly we do, and we have been doing this ever since the War commenced. A great deal of it has been sent at our own cost, although, as announced, we have had a little unsolicited help from readers from time to time. Still, the literature has been and is being sent. We do not think we have refused a single request for a free parcel of literature during the past four years. And we are quite sure much good has been done thereby.

While we are on this point, we may take the opportunity of acknowledging the letters of thanks sent us by soldiers who are receiving the thirteen weeks' free copies of this journal, and which have been chiefly paid for through the generosity of one of our readers. We feel sure some of these will continue regular subscribers. When a man reads the Freethinker for thirteen consecutive weeks it is not very likely that he will drop it altogether.

At the last meeting of the N.S.S. Executive permission was given for the formation of two new Branches, and twenty-nine new members were admitted. One of these Branches is located at Barnsley, and it hopes to get well to work by the autumn. We hope it will have a prosperous career. The other Branch—we hope missionaries will note—is at far-off Lagos. This Branch owes its existence, we believe, to a "Blasphemy" prosecution which occurred there last year, and on which we wrote an article in the Freethinker for November 4, 1917. That article has been reprinted as a leaflet and circulated in Lagos. We hope the missionaries are pleased with the outcome of their bigotry. We are.

Mr. Cohen has been asked to visit Pontypridd, South Wales, during the autumn, and he has agreed to do so if it can be arranged. Heresy has been more or less rife in Pontypridd for centuries, and there should be a good organization. Will those in the district who are willing to help communicate with Mr. J. Gair, 4 St. Catherine's Street, Pontypridd.

The following has been sent us for publication:—

> A line to let you know the funny little experience I had to-day at "Base." I had to get a new identity disc here; so in I went to the counter-cum-clerk at the Q.M.S.'s. Right. "No.," "Rk.," "Name," "Unit," "Religion." That did it. Of course, I used the Freethinker denomination. Up jumps the dear "Bath bun and glass of milk" gentleman, and, with a dramatic attitude worthy of Robey or Tree, the dear fellow cast aside the branding-irons that almost caused him to "fall" (and really he looked almost "without visible means of support" as it was, so underfed the poor fellow looked) and dramatically declared, "Never!" and said he would not soil his hands by so doing. I told him point blank he had a personal animosity, and that did it. He ordered me out. Of course, I went next to the Q.M., and, after an argument, I produced the W.O. letter you gave me. He said it referred only to various religious denominations, and not to "Atheism"; and there we left it. To-morrow I leave for the line, with no religious denomination on my identity disc. What am I to do? Can you give me further advice?

The proper course would be to apply to the superior officer to have the matter put right. A soldier is fully entitled to have "Atheist" or "Freethinker" on his disc if he desires it.

Too late for insertion this week, probably owing to postal delay, we have received a reply from Mr. Moss to Mr. Effel's letter on "Atheism, Anarchism, and Accuracy." It will appear in our next issue.

We see from the Times that Herr Conrad Belzuangen, editor of Der Atheist, organ of the Proletarian Freethinkers of Germany, has been sentenced to two years' imprisonment for high treason. We do not know what is the nature of the high treason. Perhaps he had been speaking disrespectfully of the Christian Kaiser and his Deity.

The Portsmouth Branch of the N.S.S. is, we are glad to hear, taking seriously the work of collecting waste paper on our behalf. Mr. N. Crosby, of 5 Fratton Road, Portsmouth, has undertaken to receive small or large parcels of papers from friends in the district, and will, when collected, forward them to us. This is an excellent plan, and we hope to hear that Mr. Crosby is being "snowed under" with old papers and magazines.

Paper is getting steadily dearer and dearer, but we have some for sale at this office. They are only very small slips, the size of a sheet of ordinary notepaper, and we are selling them at 5s. 3d. and 10s. 6d. each. The holder of one of these slips is entitled to receive by post a copy of the Freethinker every week for six or twelve months. We have also a supply of two-and-eightpenny slips, which will secure the same privilege for three months. It would not be at all a bad thing to send one of these slips to a friend. We feel certain he would appreciate it.

A New Lucian.

THE average man is an incorrigible sentimentalist in what concerns his own actions and ideas, and those of the social group to which he belongs. He regards all criticism which is not mere praise as irrelevant when it is serious, and scandalous when it is bantering or ironical. We may be certain that the windy demagogues and hustlers, the trimmers and placemen who did their best to ruin Greek Democracy, had a poor opinion of the humour and wit of Aristophanes. And we may be equally certain that Lucian was no favourite with a public that liked to be gulled, the late Greek counterpart of the unsophisticated folk who are nowadays cheerfully putting money into the pockets of the Pelmans and other memory-quacks. For the majority of people, irony is either foolishness or a stumbling-block; for the intelligent minority it is the subtlest, the most delightful form of literary pleasure; but it needs for its enjoyment a refinement of intellectual emancipation. It requires, if I may say it without self-conceit or flattery, the freethinking temperament, a rare mental detachment. It is not strange, therefore, that the National Reformer was the only paper that had any suspicion of the ironical nature of Samuel Butler's defence of orthodox Christianity in The New Haven. No! irony is not an intellectual form that commends itself to the average man.

I.

It was a Unitarian parson who once said that the best way to deal with Biblical difficulties was to look them boldly in the face and pass on. A better way, or at least a more general way, is to ignore what you cannot understand, or do not want to understand. This was the sort of treatment meted out to a little book published a month or so ago, entitled 1920; Dips Into the Near Future, by Lucian (Headley Bros.; 2s. net). If my memory serves me, only one paper gave anything like an adequate review of it; the rest were contented merely to record its publication among "Books Received," although the literary editors had no doubt enjoyed the ironical touches when it irradiated the rather dull pages of the Nation. It is an attempt to give an idea of what England may be like two years from now if the War should go on. It is not a cheering picture of our social future, but only the congenital optimist or the born fool would be rash enough to maintain that it is wildly impossible.

Charteris is an Oxford man, a parson, who for two years before 1920 has been opening new missions in the interior of China. He comes home for a needed rest, knowing little of recent happenings and still less of the social conditions of England, where he finds the War still going on. His first impression of the new England is disturbing. The morning after his arrival, as he stands on the steps of Morley's Hotel, he sees a long procession of aged men and women, led by a bishop, and seemingly heading for the Abbey. A friend whom he happens to come across is surprised to find that Charteris knows nothing of the Aged Service Act, which, he tells him, was ordered by the Morning Bull and passed by the new Government of young newspaper and business men. By this Act compulsion was applied to the aged, who had not responded willingly enough to the nation's call to them to save the food situation by voluntary sacrifice of their useless lives. It was now working fairly smoothly, and only those who had the biggest pull could dodge it. For some time Dedication Services had been held regularly at the Abbey, when the new Archbishop (the youngest to attain this high office) spoke in glowing language of the privilege of being allowed to make the supreme sacrifice. The music, the impressive address which aroused in them a sense of patriotism, and lifted up their hearts as the old people marched, a long and sombre procession, to the crematorium at Golder's Green.

Another new development in 1920 was an immense extension of the practice of Reprisals. The War had become a struggle for the mastery of the air; trench-fighting was a thing of the past. Official London (every man with any "pull" at all had a Government job) had dug itself in; it worked and enjoyed itself underground, where its innocent luxuries could not be seen by an envious lower class. There was a sort of competition between the combatants as to which of them would kill the greater number of children. The War being likely to go on indefinitely, this new policy was a far-sighted one. The old-fashioned sentimental humanitarian, of which a few still existed, was silenced by insisting on the "hard logic of frightfulness," and by proving that, as the enemy had forced us to imitate his barbarities, our vile deeds would be transferred to his account.

> The Churches (of course) rallied gallantly round the spiritual emergency. Indeed, the last scruples of anti-patriotic sentimentalism were stifled by the famous vote of Convocation in favour of a "diluted Christianity" operating through the instrument of a National Intelligence Department, to practise Mosaic morality for the duration of the war. This entailed some readjustment in the services. "Back to Moses" became the spiritual slogan, and a drastic reconstruction of the rubric removed from the Lessons of the Day the more pacific chapters of the Gospels, and gave due prominence to the bracing incidents in Joshua and Judges. A general assent was readily accorded to the charge which the good Bishop of Peterborough gave to his diocesan clergy: "Above all, remember that a genuinely Catholic Christianity must learn to adapt itself to the peculiar spiritual requirements of every great occasion in the national life. Thus, and only thus, can it maintain its full potency as a living, an organic creed."

II.

An amusing, and for some, perhaps, a provocative, chapter describes the intellectual outlook of England in 1920. The working of the department known as "The Laboratory of War-Truth" is explained to Charteris by Paston, an Oxford acquaintance of his, who had been a philosophical don, and a bright exponent of Bergson. He was now applying Pragmatism to the manufacture of War-truth. This up-to-date department was the outcome of a conviction that in a war of ideas the State must have full control of the intellectual and moral ideas of the nation. Censorship was seen to be the merest fumbling. It had made a distinction between the suppression of news and the suppression of opinions. It had set up a sham voluntarism. It was Pragmatism that supplied the fundamental conception of truth as being—> a raw material infinitely malleable and adaptable to the purposes of the State.....We begin (said Paston) by accepting the familiar distinction true for me, false for you. This idea of the relativity and adaptability of knowledge is then generalized and applied in the processes of our laboratory, for producing out of the same raw material the separate truths which war requires for the home consumer, the Ally, the neutral, and the enemy. The crude fact is the same for all; everything depends upon the treatment.....It is our duty to compose the sort of news which it is good for the respective parties to receive, and to mould the sentiments and opinions it is good for them to hold. And then, when the expert taster says that we have got it just right, it is pumped into the news-agencies and the other publicity machines.

The State, in 1920, was not satisfied with inventing the truth that would work. It drew up a formidable index of forbidden books, among which were "such well-known works as Milton's Areopagitica, Locke's essay on Toleration, and Mill's Liberty. But this did not exhaust the energies of the department. It soon got the Universities to shed their early scruples about "objective facts" and "absolute reality." The famous monograph "How Blucher lost us Waterloo" struck the shrewdest blow to Prussian military prestige, and equally valuable support to the Allies was given by the "Disparagers" whose business it was to discredit German literature and philosophy. Here they had more success than they had with the music of the enemy. First, they had tried to cure the musical amateur of his unpatriotic infatuation by changing the name Wagner into Scholes and Strauss into Boughton. Then some one suggested hiring third-rate orchestras to do their worst with Beethoven, Brahms, and Wagner:—

> The first performances were rehearsed with care and given with really murderous effect. At least, such was the intention. Unfortunately, the more cultured musical public took the perverse fancy to treat the most excruciating passages as a novel and fascinating phase of what they termed futurist transvaluation; and so the Hun names that had been advertised for execration came to acquire a fresh lease of undeserved glory.

III.

It would seem that by 1920 people had got quite used to D.O.R.A. The didn't object to her reading their private letters, licking up their envelopes, tapping the telephones, and generally interesting herself in other peoples' business. The people is now so tame, says Roxburgh, who is in the service of the incomparable young lady, "that it comes to feed out of Dora's hand. There isn't a week passes but some well-signed memorial or petition comes up, begging for another regulation, or reporting the discovery of some little surviving liberty that needs stamping out."

"But," broke in our old-fashioned Liberal, "what about liberty making the world safe for democracy? Is there no loss of liberty in the doings of Dora?"

"There is just as much liberty as ever," was the answer, "only it is concentrated at the top."

The Military Service (Females) Act, War bondage and War aims in 1920, are three chapters that will make the reader smile, look serious, complacent, or irritated, according to his philosophic standpoint and political bias.

The wittiest chapter is the last: "The New Jerusalem in 1920," with its amusing picture of the Temple used as the International Gold Reserve Bank surrounded by mansions in the Park Lane style, and Lyons' new caravanserai the "Cœur de Lion" fitted out with every convenience, swimming-baths, theatre a Boots' library, and a snappy little paper the Prophet. The guileless Hebrew financiers turn the commissioners of the Palestine Protectorate round their little fingers, getting from them a patent to run a joy-railway up the Mount of Olives with a casino at the top.

I trust I am right in thinking that there are still people in England who have enough mental detachment to enjoy a witty and ironical book.

Another Scientist's Profession of Faith.

> His religion is a poor affair if it has been accepted only as a matter of tradition and authority, as merely the correct thing for the society in which he moves. It is this unintelligent, unspiritual acceptance of beliefs that have come down to us enforced by the weight of the pious tradition of centuries that makes a large part of that which passes for religion so terribly insincere. And in a time of advancing thought there is ever a tendency on the part of the otoise or the preoccupied to let others do their thinking for them; to accept as of faith all that is presented with authority. For fear of believing too little, they are ready to believe too much. Having renounced the duty of private judgment, they swallow wholesale the dogmas of current theology. Unmindful of the warning that "credulity is a real, if not as great, a sin as unbelief," they fall a prey to the bigotry of the ecclesiastic, and their very faith, because it has in them no sure foundation, becomes an unfaith which shrinks from the investigation of religious problems as though all such investigations were profane. It was all very well for Newman to deny the right of private judgment, but anyone who reads the Apologia pro Vita Sua will discover what a vast amount of private judgment was necessary before he could convince himself of the authority of the Church of Rome. He walked into credulity with his eyes open, for fear of being damned for believing too little.—Silvanus Thompson, "A Not Impossible Religion."

The central doctrine of Christianity, the Atonement, by which it is taught that Jesus was offered up as a sacrifice for the sins of the world, Professor Thompson describes as:—

> A scheme of contracts and covenants, which presuppose a revengeful Deity who cannot be appeased except by blood, and who refuses even after supreme atonement to such of the human race as fail, by no fault of their own, to hear of the circumstance? Nay, I will go further, and maintain not only that this supposed contract or plan of salvation, in which the innocent is allowed to suffer for the guilty, is a piece of intellectual materialism, I will say it is a piece of revolting heathenism, which during the night of centuries has become engrafted into the creeds of Christendom in their transmission from their first source. The whole idea of > expiation by a sacrifice of blood is, as every student of the primitive religions of mankind knows, a survival from antiquity, which even the nobler Jews before the captivity had learned to discard.

> But if to consider the great All-Father as a monster only to be appeased by the shedding of innocent blood be an impiety, what are we to say of all that terrible, soul-searing, unedifying rhetoric which has been current, and is still current, about the blood of Christ? Let us endeavour as reverently as possible to divest ourselves of all materialism on this point. The mediæval scribe who emblazoned in his missal the miniature of the crucifixion, showing the priest collecting in a silver ewer the drops of Christ's blood, was he any more materialist in his ideas than he who wrote "There is a fountain filled with blood"? or than the street-preacher who exhorts his hearers to wash in the blood of Jesus? Jewish tradition again is responsible for these terrible and revolting ideas (pp. 129-132).

During the present War, and upon many other occasions, the Churches have set apart a special day for prayer, the idea being that by this concentrated attack they would make God sit up and take notice. This is how Professor Thompson regards the manœuvre: "Yet another of the idols of the temple which have been lifted up by pious hands is the quantitative prayer..... prayer manufactured, prearranged, concerted, to be uttered in a vast number of congregations at once, as if to impress the Almighty by the importance of mere numbers, is a piece of the veriest superstition. One of the least superstitious of Nonconformist bodies in England, in a recent annual bulletin, when recommending its congregations to prayer, added: 'such a volume of prayer cannot fail.' As though the efficacy of prayer were to be measured by the number of people praying or the quantity of their prayers! One's thoughts go back to Elijah's mocking words to the priests of Baal: 'Cry aloud for he is a god; peradventure he sleepeth and must be awakened.' What ideas those have of the Most High who think that He can be moved by a 'volume' of preconcerted prayers? In what respect are they any more enlightened than the devout Oriental who turns his praying wheel before the image of Buddha?" (pp. 155-156).

At this point we can imagine the faithful crying, with Falstaff: "Call you that backing up your friends? A plague upon such backing." But there is more to follow.

The right of private judgment, declares Professor Thompson, is not only a right but a duty, and adds: "No honest seeker after truth will renounce his right and duty of search simply because of a pious hope, or a friendly assertion, that in some book, or Church, or priest, he may find an infallible guide." He points out that the English noun "sceptic" means "one who considers or examines, or looks about carefully. Instead of being a term of discredit, it ought to be regarded as a term of honour.....Suspense of judgment on many controverted points is often a sacred duty: the only honest course when neither belief nor disbelief would be right."[1]

He denounces "The selfish sort of religion that dominates most of Protestantism, and writes up 'Save your soul' over the doors of its chapels" (p. 174), and declares: "The tribe of revivalist preachers has much to answer for in the unwisdom of their influence upon young people, whose mental and spiritual health is injured by the unwholesome pious orgies of artificially stimulated religiosity." Then there is the familiar phenomenon of the "spiritual valetudinarian, who is morbidly taken up with the question of his own spiritual health, and whether he is going to be 'saved' or damned.'" Never do we find him, says the Professor, "working for others" (p. 213).

Of the Church, he remarks: "it has stoned the prophets and excommunicated the reformers, until now the term 'orthodox' has become a byword denoting all that is unprogressive and reactionary" (p. 214). Of Christianity itself, he observes: "In thousands of ways the failure of our 'Christianity,' the incompleteness of the 'working out the beast,' makes itself evident..... Degeneracy and disease are writ large on vast herds of toilers who seek in sheer soulless excitement an escape from the drudgery of their lives. If we have abolished slavery in its grosser form, we have not yet found means to abolish slavery in the sweating shop. The man who grinds the faces of the poor, or who defrauds the community by swindling prospectuses of public companies, is still received and honoured, provided he will subscribe freely to party funds, or build chapels for the respectable, or preside at Bible Society meetings. Our newspapers live largely on lying advertisements of patent medicines and details of ghastly murders—yet every student of sociology knows that both these things are social concerns that corrupt the community. But the task of exposing from time to time the abuses of the Press has been largely left to men who made no profession of Christianity, while the watch-dogs of the Church have been dumb, though this is not a pestilence that walketh in darkness but a destruction that walketh by noonday. The watch-dogs of the Church are, for the present, much more concerned in the jejune discussion of what they call Reunion, or in prevention of a woman from marrying the widower of the deceased's husband's sister, or in the appointment of more bishops, than in the uplifting of the sons of men" (pp. 232-3).

This is refreshingly outspoken, especially the admission that the work of reform "has been largely left to men who made no profession of Christianity, while the watch-dogs of the Church have been dumb."

Notes from Ireland.

"An Unworthy Client of Mary" strongly recommends all true Irishmen three or more times daily to pray thusly: "Our Lady, our Queen, our Mother, in the name of Jesus Christ and for the love of Jesus, take our cause and the cause of Ireland's campaign against Conscription in hands and obtain for them good success." The Unworthy Client declares it to be "a little prayer he has never known to fail." The Unworthy Client is by no means the only person who puts deep credence in the efficacy of this delightful wireless message; a quasi-political journal, the Irishman, considers it worthy of a space on its front page. So powerful a bit of impotence is, alas, only too indicative of an untaught public, an untaught paper, and a very well-taught swarm of falcon-priests. But the worst of it is, the paper that publishes this lamentable twaddle is one of the most strenuous and widely read advocates of the stringing of the Celtic harp with the chords of autonomy. Prayer is ever a rummy weapon of defence—in its use the suppliant is especially exposed to the arrows of ridicule and the keener darts of laughter. Still, if Conscription be not applied we will cheerfully acknowledge the prophetic faculty of the Unworthy Client. But the efficacy of prayer! Only when the importuned is a poor, weak, miserable, vindictive human being does its efficacy come into the reckoning. "Though we wield an impious language, we are a prayerful nation," so say our bishops. "Man on his knees is symbolical of ignorance and helplessness," so says the holy editor of this journal. Alas! Cathleen ni Hoolihan, not yet have you the walk of a queen!

the holy wonders by an ancient woman of queer recollections who was good enough to inform us, in respect of our national grievances, that God is slow but he's very sure. We were joined by a stout son of rest whose face was somewhat less interesting and less animated than that of a cheap alarm clock; one of his pockets bulged with soda, another with brown-bread. His mode and manner of salutation were strange: "Oh, the struggle for life is terrible. Praises be to God!" This addition to our party added deep crimson to the already red political discussion; it now appeared that the mills of God grind slowly but they grind exceeding small. He was a strange person; he of the inanimate features ornamented with a moustache like a couple of goats' beards. When the good woman was exhibiting a piece of "dog-tooth" work his soul became deeply moved, and, finding expression in the bulging eyes and flabby cheeks, and articulation at length in the tongue, burst out in an ecstasy of the Holy Ghost: "Praises be to God! it was a saint that did that. He's in heaven now"; then, as an afterthought, "but they are all in heaven for the matter of that" This celestial being knew an awful lot about heaven, but we found, to our dismay, he knew precious little about earth; he couldn't even tell us the distance to Drogheda.

Quite recently a highly spiced melodrama was presented at the Queen's Theatre, Dublin. The following episode, in addition to a recital of the hymn "Gentle Jesus, meek and mild" occurred:—

Villain: I'll make you a little angelo with flapper wings. I'll kill you that's what I'll do. I'll make you appeal to me for mercy.

Five-Year Old Child: I will not appeal to you for mercy but to my Saviour.

Apropos Views and Opinions of July 7: "Parings of saintly nails, remnants of saintly clothing, and even saintly ordure were esteemed." The Cross, an Irish magazine, conducted by the Passionate Fathers, asks "How is it that there is but the one Church that preserves and prizes even the rags of the first Christians?" The answer is obvious—glaringly obvious. Some time ago a man, a fully grown man, who grew hair on his chin, bequeathed £50 for the purchase of a slice of Saint Anthony's toe-nail! But this deceased intellectual was not so great a fool as it would at first appear. A holy toe-nail is a family heirloom, and, in all Catholic countries, especially this little island, is always sure of a market. It is a possession well worth having. A man fortunate enough to own a full toe-nail, even one that appertained to the smallest digit, could borrow £10,000 with that as security, and start business in the money-lending line.

National Secular Society.

Report of Monthly Executive Meeting held on July 25.

The President, Mr. C. Cohen, in the chair. Also present: Messrs. Baker, Braddock, Brandes, Eager, Heaford, Kelf, Leate, Lazarnick, Neate, Palmer, Quinton, Roger, Samuels, Spence, Thurlow, Wood; Miss Kough, Miss Pitcher, Miss Stanley, and the Secretary.

The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were accepted for Barnsley, Birmingham, Coventry, Goldthorpe, Lagos, Portsmouth, South London, South Shields, and the Parent Society (twenty-nine in all).

An application was received, and permission granted, for a Branch to be again formed in Barnsley.

Considerable pleasure was expressed at the request for permission to form a Branch of the Society at Lagos, Nigeria. This was also granted.

The President reported the result of his recent visit to and lectures delivered at Bridgend, Maesteg, and the possibility of the formation of new Branches in the surrounding districts. This was received with much gratification, and it was resolved unanimously that the Executive lend all its support to the furtherance of the work in South Wales.

The names of the delegates elected to serve on the Special Committee for Reorganization were reported, and meetings were arranged to take place at 62 Farringdon Street on August 3 and 4.

Messrs. Davidson and Roger, and Miss Kough, were elected as a Committee for the arrangement of resolutions and suggestions.

E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

Secular Education Again.

For some months, as our readers are aware, we have been drawing the attention of all concerned to the necessity of "getting a move on" in relation to the question of Secular Education. In addition to the work carried on in the Freethinker, we have written a large number of letters to people likely to help, and we are glad to note that the articles and letters have borne fruit. It has meant a lot of extra work, but the cause was worth it. As a result of this campaign quite a number of resolutions affirming the policy of Secular Education have been passed by Trades Unions and other organizations, and have been duly sent on to the Minister of Education. Mr. Fisher, at least, cannot plead that he is ignorant of any feeling against religion in State schools. In addition, members of Parliament have also been written by their constituents, and the plea of ignorance is also removed so far as they are concerned. If those responsible will not act rightly, it is well that they should not be able to plead they did not know which was the right course to follow.

An Impudent Misrepresentation.

Following out the advice we gave, one of our readers sent Mr. Bartley Denniss, M.P., for Oldham, a copy of the Freethinker for May 5 containing an article on "The New Education Bill." Mr. Denniss replies as a firm believer in religious education in State schools, and after reading his letter one can well appreciate it. For a grosser travesty of the argument of an opponent, a more deliberate (we use this word advisedly) perversion of a writer's meaning it has seldom been our lot to read. A single instance will prove the moral quality of this champion of religious instruction. In a postscript to his letter Mr. Denniss says:—

> Another writer on p. 256 of the Freethinker you sent me says: "At that very moment Britain's 'drunken soldiers' were opposed to the full fury of the German war machine." Do you approve of a paper which inserts such a sentence?

Now, if anyone will turn to the page named, he will find the sentence occurs in an article by Mr. Andrew Millar. But the sentence pilloried is not Mr. Millar's. Mr. Millar is, in fact, pouring scorn upon some religious teetotalers who had been denouncing our soldiers for getting drunk. The words "drunken soldiers" were within quotation marks. Here is the whole passage:—

> The whole exhibition was futile, effete, pathetic..... For at that very moment Britain's "drunken soldiers" were opposed to the full fury of the German War machine. And these pitiful moralists would dictate to these men their parsonic idea of perfect conduct.

What is one to make of the moral calibre of a man who can take that passage, convert "drunken soldiers" into the writer's own expression, and then ask: "do you approve of a paper which inserts such a sentence?" And, be it noted, Mr. Denniss believes in religious education. He himself had it. The outcome is truly appalling.

Parents versus Children.

Mr. Denniss' letter covers three pages of quarto (House of Commons) paper, and excluding the fearful misrepresentation above cited, his comments on our article come under two heads. It accuses us of intolerance. It "appals" Mr. Denniss that we should be so intolerant as to deny the "right of anyone, even of the parent, to teach his child religion." But if anyone will do us the honour to glance again through our article, he will see that what we denied was the right of the modern State to force a particular religion upon all, or even to compel all to support the religion of a part of the community. It is a fact that a parent possesses the right to give to his children whatever religious teaching he pleases; but we suggested that this might be exercised injudiciously, even tyrannically, and it is hard to see on what moral ground a parent can be perfectly justified in giving a child, as absolute truth, teachings which, to adults, he admits are more or less speculations. What we are asking for is justice to the child—for the child of the Christian as well as for the child of the Atheist. If we may quote a sample of our own "intolerance": "We want the child to grow up mentally fitted to select any religion it pleases, or able to intelligently reject them all should it feel so inclined." And Mr. Denniss is horrified! As one of our intelligent legislators, he is vastly concerned with the right of the parent to coerce the child, he is benignly indifferent to the fact that the child has rights as against the parent.

Why Bother?

The rest of Mr. Denniss' remarks are made up of more or less irrelevant comments, which go to show a complete want of understanding of the points at issue. Thus Mr. Denniss is quite sure that the few pence a year which religious instruction takes out of his correspondent's pocket cannot be a matter of great concern. It is a pity that so strenuous a Christian cannot lift his mind above the cash issue. Injustice is not made justice because the monetary cost is slight. Doubtless Hampden would not have missed his share of ship-money, but it was enough to act as one of the causes of a revolution. And then comes this gem:—

> If Atheists truly think there is no such thing as God, why do they trouble themselves because other people believe in him? Why do they talk of it and try to get > disciples if they are not faint about it, and do not want the consent of others to keep them in countenance?

Then are we to assume that when Christians try to bring others to their point of view, it is because they are faint, and want others to keep them in countenance? If not, why not? Perhaps it may one day cross the mind of Mr. Denniss that when a man sees what he believes to be truth, there is a plain duty before him to see that others see it also. The Atheist is discharging a plain social obligation in putting his truth before the people. Doubtless, Mr. Denniss finds it difficult to understand this. Is he not in politics? And is it not natural that he should marvel at a man troubling himself to "disturb" others when the disturbance can bring the disturber nothing but trouble and misrepresentation? Nothing but that—and a sense of duty done. Oh, these politicians! Can we wonder the world is as it is when our legislators are made of such stuff?

An Appeal to Parents.

Mr. Denniss is "happily convinced" that no one will ever "see the people of Oldham converted to such views. They are the most sincerely religious community in the United Kingdom." It may be so, and it is only fitting that Mr. Denniss should be so appreciative of the people of Oldham. For have they not elected him! And what better proof of their religion and intelligence could they give—to Mr. Denniss? And yet one wonders whether there is any real warranty for thinking that the people of Oldham are less susceptible to a sense of justice and to the trend of civilization than are other people. For ourselves, we should require more than Mr. Denniss' word before we formed so poor an opinion of the Oldhamites. All over the civilized world the conviction is growing that the teaching of religion is the concern of the individual, not the proper business of the State; that to force religion on the child and leave the adult uncoerced is an act of cowardice. The child can't hit back; the adult can. That is the sole distinction. Mr. Denniss believes that nowhere in the country do parents love their children more than in Oldham. We are glad to hear it; and it was to this very parental love that we made our appeal. We do not want to see that parental love exploited by the priest and by the vote-catching politician. We want to see the parental love of the people not only strong, but expressed intelligently, in the best interests of the child, and ultimately of the State. Give the child all the protection we can, not from physical ills alone, but from mental ills also. Let us spend our time in teaching it how to think, and what it thinks will take care of itself. We detest Prussianism in the State; and we hate it not the less heartily in the school and in the home.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Mischievous Dogmatism.

OUR land is full of broken homes and mourning hearts. Tens of thousands of bright and brave young men have been slain on the fields of battle, whilst multitudes of others have been more or less frightfully maimed, and rendered incapable of earning a living. There is scarcely a family in the whole country into which suffering, and sorrow, and bereavement have not entered during these four years of disastrous War. It is impossible to contemplate so appalling a situation without desiring to do something to help and comfort the sorely stricken ones round about us. The British Weekly, being a religious newspaper conducted on strictly evangelical lines, has, of late, devoted many of its leading articles to the subject of Christian consolation in bereavement. Of course, in the estimation of the pious editor, life is not worth living if death ends it. During a world-war, therefore, the most precious of all doctrines is that of immortality, and the British Weekly has been proclaiming it with burning enthusiasm off and on for several months. Tennyson's In Memoriam was laid under tribute for two or three weeks. In its issue for July 18, the leading article is entitled "In Christ Redeemed, in Christ Restored," the opening sentences in which are these:—

> In this world of death a message of Reunion in Eternity is a first necessity. It is as music to all souls in pain.

We unhesitatingly give the lie to both statements. Though this is a world in which all things die, yet its great fact is not death, but life, and the first necessity is a message, not of reunion after death, but of wise counsel and inspiration for the best conduct of life. The message of reunion after death is not "as music to all souls in pain," but rather as the baseless fabric of a dream to a great many such. There are even Christians not a few to whom those sentences are anything but true. Sir William Robertson Nicoll admits that even the bereaved do not listen to the message of reunion "in the first force of their passionate misery, while they feel in their breasts the burning of the murderous steel," though that is the very time when the message, if true, would be of the most substantial service to them. But is the message true? Sir William concedes that it "concerns only those who are in Christ." What exactly that concession means is left to our imagination. Are we to infer from it that only Christians survive death, or that there is no reunion in hell? Christ's relation to immortality is thus expressed:—

> Apart from his doing, his dying, his rising again, his testimony, there is no doctrine of the future.....He has abolished death by his resurrection. He is the Conqueror of the last enemy. He has risen and ascended and he rules.

The editor of the British Weekly, being a scholar, cannot plead ignorance of the fact that belief in continuation after death antedates Christianity by countless thousands of years, and that the more modern doctrine of personal immortality cannot truthfully claim a Christian origin. Possibly the idea Sir William wishes to convey is that no doctrine of the future, other than the Christian, is worthy of credence, and that, consequently, the Christian doctrine is the only one that we need to consider. But we utterly fail to perceive on what grounds the Christian theory of immortality is regarded as in any sense or degree more credible than any other.

Sir William is an incorrigible dogmatist. What he gives us is a well-nigh interminable series of naked assertions. He never condescends to argue, or to supply evidences, but contents himself with stringing together a vast number of unverifiable assumptions. His orthodoxy is undeniable, and his loyalty to the New Testament is equally beyond doubt. He is a colossal believer, and takes for granted that belief and knowledge are synonymous terms. Apparently he subscribes to what was a popular heresy thirty and forty years ago, namely, conditional immortality. At any rate, it is faithful followers of Christ alone who are to enjoy the boon of reunion beyond the tomb. Death signifies the flight of the soul out of the body, and from the moment it is on the wing Christ takes charge of it, "and as a magnet draws it upward to himself." Redeemed souls in the next life, being gathered together "unto him, to know and be known of him," will, of necessity, know one another. Speaking in their name the reverend knight says:—

> He who inspired the human love that now seeks its own, he who was himself strengthened and solaced > thereby during the earthly years when he walked softly in the bitterness of his soul, will never deny us our heart's desire.

The writer may honestly believe all that; but he oversteps his right when he presents it to his readers as an item of knowledge. Any man who claims to know that he is immortal is a liar, and the truth is not in him, no matter how sincere he may be.

It is an incontestable fact that the number of believing Christians is startlingly small, and is steadily growing smaller year after year, from which fact the only rational inference is that Sir William's soothing "message of Reunion in Eternity" "excludes the vast majority." Although believing that salvation is possible only in this world, Sir William evades that inference in the following sophistical manner:—

> We do not know what may pass of a sudden, in the very moment of dying, between the soul and Christ. All the great Christian teachers have told us that the very slightest recognition on the part of men of the Divine Sacrifice is enough to secure salvation.

That reminds us of a story we once heard in early life. In our neighbourhood there lived a man who was universally looked upon as an incarnation of all wickedness. He cursed and swore, openly blasphemed, was a notorious liar, and a most disagreeable neighbour. While helplessly drunk one night, he mistook the parapet of the bridge for the wall in front of his cottage. Failing to find the gate, he climbed over what he supposed to be the wall, dropped into the river, and was drowned. All the people pitied him, saying sadly, "Poor chap, he is now burning in hell-fire." A benignly disposed old clergyman, on being told of the dreadful accident that had hurled the ungodly man to the flames, coolly observed: "Well, well; but we don't know what may have happened between the parapet and the water." Here again the reverend knight is beautifully true to the Word, for he quotes the case of the penitent thief on the cross, to whom the dying Saviour said, "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." Thus, in its very nature, salvation denotes the setting aside of the great laws of causation, which, of course, is an impossibility, and which, if possible, would involve the Divine Being in an essentially immoral conduct.

The British Weekly tries to comfort the bereaved by offering them a sheer illusion for an established truth. No one has a moral right to say of a purely imaginary future life that this, that, or the other is "blessedly true" or "certain" concerning it. Many scores of Atheists have lost loved ones in this ruthless War, and these, too, mourn, not in illusory hope, like the Christians, but in loving memory of lives well spent and of death bravely met. To mourn in hope is, at best, but to mourn sadly, unwholesomely, for faith often dies down and hope burns dimly and the future life itself becomes a continent of ever-shifting mist.

J. T. Lloyd.

The Tragedy of a Genius.

The Collected Poems of Rupert Brooke; with a Memoir. (Sidgwick & Jackson; 1918.)

There have been multitudes of names in the tale of the heroic dead of this great War which could be said in sober truth to be a loss to their country; but few are associated with greater pathos than the career of Lieutenant Rupert Brooke, the soldier-poet, who laid down his life for England at Lemnos. For many saw in this high-minded young man the hope of a continuance of a noble poetic tradition, and watched with fascination the opening of what promised to be a great and memorable career. It is very tragic irony which closed in the War the years of earnest study before the great task for which they were to fit him had been but well begun.

The feelings of Rupert Brooke's admirers must be like those of the survivors of a shipwreck when, the morning after the storm, they contemplate the relics that the capricious sea has spared from the rich contents of the sunken ship. Their joy at the sight of each relic is insufficient to compensate for the sad memories it awakens of equally precious treasures lost. Nor is this feeling attributable merely to the fact that an early death has snatched from us a poet of genius. Many such might pass without exciting these keen feelings of regret. The world would be grateful for what it had received, and would not concern itself with speculations as how much greater might have been their achievements had more time been allowed them. But no one in the case of young Brooke, can banish the thought of what might have been, of the future that was denied him.

"There are only three things in the world," said Rupert Brooke; "one is to read poetry, another is to write poetry, and the best of all is to live poetry." How he did all three things triumphantly is seen in the volume of his Collected Poems and a Memoir.

Rupert Brooke's short life was packed with experience. He assimilated culture at Rugby and Cambridge, and he travelled extensively. When the calling bugles of England sounded, he never hesitated. He took part in the expedition to Antwerp, and sailed for the Dardanelles. Now he lies in Lemnos, a fitting grave for a poet, the guerdon of a brief and happy life.

This heroic young poet, for whom the meteor flag of England had such a fascination, was at heart as Pagan as a Greek of the classic period. The man for whom the passing hours had such possibilities of joy or sorrow was conscious always that they could never return. Young as he was, he realized "the sense of tears in mortal things." In the most exultant moments of life he was conscious of the shadow of death:—

> And has the truth brought no new hope at all,
> Heart, that you're weeping yet for Paradise?
> Do they still whisper, the old weary cries?
> 'Mid youth and song, feasting and carnival,
> Through laughter, through the roses, as of old
> Comes Death, on shadowy and relentless feet,
> Death, unappeasable by prayer or gold;
> Death is the end, the end!
> Proud then, clear-eyed and laughing, go to greet
> Death as a friend.

Again and again the young poet reverts to the working of this Nemesis. In many a lovely line we catch hints at the secret fear which was at the core of the Greek conception of life, this Pagan antipathy to that physically repulsive for which there was no consolation. His sympathies were ever with the youth who feels in his blood the hunger of an unshaped desire and revolts against Fate which would tame it. Listen to this beautiful sonnet:—

> Breathless, we flung us on the windy hill,
> Laughed in the sun, and kissed the lovely grass.
> You said, "Through glory and ecstasy we pass;
> Wind, sun, and earth remain, the birds sing still,
> When we are old, are old.' 'And when we die
> All's over that is our's; and life burns on > Through other lovers, other lips,' said I,
> "Heart of my heart, our heaven is now, is won!"
> "We are Earth's best, that learnt her lesson here.
> Life is our cry. We have kept the faith! we said;
> We shall go down with unreluctant tread
> Rose-crowned into the darkness!" Proud we were,
> And laughed, that had such brave true things to say,
> — And then you suddenly cried, and turned away.

He was saturated with poetry, and translating the poetry into action. How fine was the inspiration that prompted him to request that any money that he left should be divided among three of his fellow-poets. "If I can set them free," he said nobly, "to write the poetry and plays and books they want to, my death will bring more gain than loss." It reminds us of Shelley shielding Byron's body from an armed Italian. "I cannot understand it," exclaimed Byron, afterwards referring to the act, "a man to run upon a naked sword for another."

Idealist though he was, Rupert Brooke had a keen zest for life. "Is there anything better," he asked, "than sitting at a table and eating good food and drinking great drink and discussing everything under the sun with wise and brilliant people." He was only too happy in his friends, and he has written some delightful things of friendship :—

> There is nothing in the world like friendship. There is no lust in it, and therefore no poison. It is cleaner than love and older; for children and very old people have friends, but they do not love. It gives more and takes less, it is fine in the enjoying and without pain when absent, and it leaves only good memories. In love all laughter ends with an ache, but laughter is the very garland on the head of friendship.

There are smiles as well as tears in the book. Brooke would write "limericks" for his friends, and was fond of a good story. He repeated one that Julian Grenfell told of a private soldier who had been fighting from Mons to Ypres, and was asked what he thought of his experiences. The private said: "What I don't like about this b— Europe is all these b— pictures of Jesus Christ and his relations, behind bits of b— glass." Brooke's commentary was characteristic, when he added: "It seems to express perfectly that insularity and cheerful Atheism which are the chief characteristics of my race."

Sometimes the smiles and tears are very near, as in the poem on a dog, who did what he wanted "for a day," which he made a red-letter one. "He fought with the he-dogs, and winked at the she-dogs," and raised Cain Then :—

> When the blood-red sun had gone burning down,
> And the lights were lit in the little town,
> Outside in the gloom of the twilight grey,
> The little dog died when he'd had his day.

Such brief quotations only partially illuminate the genius of the brilliant young scholar who contemplated twentieth-century England like a youthful visitor from another planet. The Great War wrought a change in Rupert Brooke, and afterwards he sang with richer inspiration. In his later poems he showed more passion. In his own noble way, and as though he knew his own fate, he wrote a beautiful sonnet, which must remain his own proper epitaph :—

> If I should die, think only this of me:
> That there's some corner of a foreign field
> That is for ever England. There shall be
> In that rich earth a richer dust concealed;
> A dust whom England bore, shaped, made aware,
> Gave, once, her flowers to love, her ways to roam,
> A body of England, breathing English air,
> Washed by the rivers, blest by suns of home.

MIMNERMUS.

If we lie down in the grave, the whole man a piece of broken machinery, to moulder with the clods of the valley, be it so; at least there is an end of pain, care, woes, and wants. If that part of us called mind does survive the apparent destruction of the man—away with old-wife prejudices and tales. Every age and every nation has had a different set of stories; and as the many are always weak, of consequence they have often, perhaps always, been deceived.—Robert Burns.

A Search for the Soul.

VII.

SOME months ago, in a review of a somewhat pretentious work on Immortality by Canon Streeter and other Churchmen, the reviewer, T. G. Bonney, Sc.D., LL.D., F.R.S., said :—

> To explain the relation of body to mind, three hypotheses have been advanced: (1) the materialistic, that the mind is only a function of the brain-cells; (2) the idealistic, that the brain is merely an instrument of the mind (both of which are shown to be insufficient); (3) the psychological—which is the more satisfactory—that the mind and brain interact, each having the power of initiation. That the body does have an influence on the mind is proved by mental disturbance from physical causes and the localization of mental functions in the brain, and it can be equally proved that the mind can influence the brain and nervous system. A man may so concentrate his attention on certain objects as to be blind, deaf, or insensible to others.

Looking at the three hypotheses here advanced to explain the relation of body to mind, the only one which may be called "scientific" is the first, the materialistic — to which hypothesis every known fact relating to body and mind points as the true one. Of the other two, the second—which the reviewer calls "idealistic"—is the modern Christian view, long held by dogmatic churchmen of the Bishop Butler type, and still stoutly maintained by the majority of orthodox believers at the present day. The third hypothesis, which is said to be "more satisfactory" than the other two, is a comparatively new idea—a kind of half and half measure—which admits part of the materialistic view in order to escape the whole.

In the last two hypotheses—that "the brain is merely an instrument of the mind," and that "the mind and the brain interact"—the mind is assumed to be an "entity" separate from the brain, the only difference being that in the latter case the mind is admitted to be not quite so independent of the brain as in the former case. Now, neither of these two hypotheses has a particle of evidence on which to rest; both are pure assumptions. Our reviewer says: "It can be proved that the mind can influence the brain and nervous system." But in this statement he is in error; for if the materialistic hypothesis be correct—as we shall find it is—then it cannot be proved that the mind can "influence" the brain. How can that which arises from the functioning of the brain exert an influence on the organ which has caused it to come into being?

The statement that "a man may so concentrate his attention on certain objects as to be blind, deaf, or insensible to other things" does not show that there is in the human organism a mind apart from the brain, but merely that the cerebral organ was considering some particular matter which it deemed of more importance than other questions that ordinarily occupied its attention. As already stated, it is only by assuming that the mind is an entity independent of the brain that the former can be said to influence the latter, and this dualistic assumption begs the whole question. Morever, Professor Bonney's admissions that mental disturbance can arise from physical causes, and that mental functions can be localized in the brain, not only prove that "the body does have an influence upon the mind," but they furnish independent proofs that the mental manifestations which are called Mind are produced by the brain. These phenomena will be noticed later on.

Now, there are scientists and medical men whose high regard for truth will not permit them to conceal from the public the many important facts which their investigations and experiments have proved to be correct. From the writings of some of these conscientious workers I quote the following brief statements :—

Professor Buchner (Force and Matter) : —

> The word "mind" is nothing more than a collective word and a comprehensive expression for the whole of the activities of the brain and its several parts or organs (p. 301). Thinking and Being are as inseparable as force and matter, or energy and body ; and the idea of thought without being, or the idea of an immaterial spirit, rests on a mere arbitrary theory which has not an inch of reality to stand on (p. 495).

Carl Vogt (quoted by Buchner) :—

> Physiology declares itself categorically against individual immortality, as against all theories in general which include the special existence of a soul. The (so-called) soul is produced by the development of the brain, just the same as muscular activity is produced by the development of the muscles, or secretion is produced by a development of the glands.

Professor Tyndall (Belfast address) :—

> Divorced from matter, where is life? Whatever our faith may say, our knowledge shows them to be indissolubly joined. Every meal we eat, every cup we drink, illustrates the mysterious control of mind by matter.

Professor Haeckel (Riddle of the Universe) :—

> The mind or the "soul" is that sum of cerebral functions which psychic dualism regards as a peculiar entity, independent of the other vital processes of the living body.....All the phenomena of the psychic life are, without exception, bound up with certain material changes in the living substance of the body, protoplasm. .....In other words, we do not attribute any peculiar "essence" to it, but we consider the (so-called) psyche to be merely a collective idea of all psychic functions of protoplasm. In this case the "soul" is merely a physiological abstraction like "assimilation" or "generation."

Dr. Bastian (Nature and Origin of Living Matter) :—

> The phenomena manifested by living things are dependent upon the properties and molecular activities of protoplasm, just as mental phenomena are dependent upon the properties and molecular activities of nerve-tissues, and just as magnetic phenomena are dependent upon the properties and molecular activities of certain kinds or states of iron (p. 18).

Dr. Hollander (Mental Symptoms of Brain Disease) :—

> Mind is still regarded by some as if it consisted of intellect alone, whereas we all feel, as well as think, with our brains (p. 1).

Dr. Maudsley (Body and Mind) :—

> The broad truth is that all mental manifestations take place through the brain (p. 37). Multitudes may logically believe that mind is inseparable from body in life or death—that it is born with it, grows, ripens, decays, and dies with it, without disbelieving in an intelligent Power who has called man into being. In the assertion that mind is altogether a function of matter there is no irreverence (p. 124).

This last statement was made by Dr. Maudsley as Professor of Jurisprudence in University College, London, in a course of lectures delivered before the Royal College of Physicians in 1870. Its apologetic character is due to the days in which he lived, and it plainly shows that he was fully aware of the nature of the opposition that might be expected from the dignitaries of the Church in those priest-ridden times. An example of this may be seen in the public denunciation of Professor Huxley by the bigoted Dr. Wace at a Church Congress some years later. There can be no doubt that the fear of the Church or of public opinion has been, in the past, the main cause of the silence of many scientists respecting the true nature of "the soul."

The relation of body and mind may be compared to a clock which strikes the hours and chimes the quarters, the striking and chiming apparatus representing the brain, and the sounds produced by it being considered ideas or thoughts ; while the sum of all the sounds for any given period being regarded as the mind. In this illustration, what we are asked to believe is, that all these sounds constitute an entity independent of the apparatus which produced them, and that not only have these sonorous vibrations of the atmosphere the power to "interact" with the apparatus, but that they will continue to be produced every quarter of an hour for many years after the mechanism which brought them into being has been destroyed. This is the hypothesis which Professor Bonney says is "more satisfactory" than the true one—that which is called the materialistic.

Go To!

THIS is a well-recognized Biblical expression, corresponding to our modern colloquialism, "Get a move on." A man sometimes, when in a difficulty, decides to "go to" his parson for counsel or guidance, and often discovers that he is by doing so a nice goat too, for he usually is kidded.

In "Acid Drops" of March 3, 1918, I read that Dr. Fort Newton had said, "When a man comes to me with intellectual difficulties, I want to say to him : 'What have you been up to?'" Why should he want to say that when the man's trouble is intellectual, and not moral? Arrah, good Newton, go on—go to!

Seriously, however, Dr. Newton's observation has another significance, going to show that every parson is a pope at heart. He is the infallible counsellor of weak or undeveloped intellectualities. Is he not the repository of omniscient wisdom? The Protestant parson has for ever been protesting that the chief superiority of Protestantism over Roman Catholicism lies in the fact that the former does away with any intermediary between the lay member of the Church and his God? But this is only theoretical. In practice, the Protestant parson as often acts as the intermediary as the Catholic priest. So again we say to Dr. Newton as Sairah Gamp said to Betsy Prig, "Go along with you." Go to.

To "go to" one's parson is a confession of ignorance—a weakness. It is like admitting a poor hand at nap when one can only "go two." But if I "go on" like this I shall soon be meriting the editorial blue pencil in decisive characters—Go to the W.P.B.!

Are we to conclude that, according to Protestant teaching, moral rectitude is only to be found in a person with a stagnant brain, or a brain that has stopped? Aperiently so. Arrah, Dr. Newton, go hon!—go to ——!

Christians are always "going to" and never arriving.

NEMO.

AMBITION AND GREAT MEN.

We exaggerate the ambition of Great Men; we mistake what the nature of it is. Great men are not ambitious in that sense ; he is a small poor man that is ambitious so. Examine the man who lives in misery because he does not shine above other men ; who goes about producing himself, pruriently anxious about his gifts and claims ; struggling to force everybody, as it were begging everybody for God's sake, to acknowledge him a great man, and set him over the heads of men! Such a creature is among the wretchedest sights seen under the sun. A great man? A poor, morbid, prurient, empty man ; fitter for the ward of a hospital than for a throne among men. I advise you to keep out of his way He cannot walk on quiet paths : unless you will look at him, wonder at him, write paragraphs about him, he cannot live. It is the emptiness of the man, not his greatness. Because there is nothing in himself, he hungers and thirsts that you would find something in him. In good truth, I believe no great man, not so much as a genuine man who had health and real substance in him of whatever magnitude, was ever much tormented in this way.—Thomas Carlyle.

Acid Drops.

We suggest the Lord has behaved rather shabbily to his followers. August 4 was the announced Day of Prayer, and it would have been good stage management to have held up the splendid counter-attack of the Allies until, say, the 5th or 6th. But the advance was made before the Day of Prayer, and that was not—from the Christian point of view—well done. Deity has messed another chance of a much needed advertisement.

Naturally, the clergy "did themselves well" on the Day of Prayer. They were everywhere, and a stranger from another planet might have got the impression that they believed their flummery would have some effect on the progress of the War. Everyone knows it will have no such result, and none know it better than the majority of the clergy. These are no more deceived by the performance than a professional conjurer is deceived by his own tricks. Perhaps the whole thing was a bit of camouflage, to lead people to believe that the clergy were exempted from national service because they were engaged in work of real national importance.

An association of "One Man Business Proprietors" has been formed. "General" Booth should be interested in this.

Miss Louisa Jenkins died in Cowbridge Baptist Church, South Wales, during a service. There is not even a small moral to be drawn from this event.

"Every great man has something of the Biblical seer and prophet in him," declares the oracular Daily Chronicle. Great Ezekiel!

If a parson looks over the rectory wall he is reckoned to have courage. "It is rather brave of Dr. Gore to be going to America again," says the Daily News.

A Bishop has been brave enough to occupy a Nonconformist pulpit, and the dutiful Daily News calls it "an event of far-reaching importance." Such language is more suited to a parish magazine than a daily paper.

According to the Bishop of Kensington, girls show an increasing disinclination to submit to authority, and he regards this as "a grave matter." We quite agree. In the long run it means the funeral of the Christian religion.

"There are too many trashy novels about." That's what the Bishop of London says. No doubt he finds them dangerous competitors to the Bible, which is the trashiest concoction of fiction in the world.

Owing to ill-health, Dr. Jayne, Bishop of Chester, is about to resign. This will flutter the ecclesiastical dovecotes, for the bishopric is worth £4,200 annually. Dr. Jayne has held the bishopric for thirty years. It was, therefore, unkind of a big London newspaper to refer to the retiring ecclesiastic as "Dr. Joynes."

Mr. H. G. Farmer, writing from Ayr, says:—

> According to the daily press, the Royal Air Force have adopted a patron saint in St. Michael, and the figure of this celestial commander of Jabveh's aerial forces actually appears as a crest on the notepaper of the R.A.F. Personally, I think this is a slight upon we terrestrials, when we can boast of such aerial heroes as Elisha and Jesus Christ, and I am sure that the former, in his fiery chariot, would make an excellent design for a crest. Of course, there may be some scoffing Freethinkers who may say that they do not believe in this "bunkum," and suggest that if the R.A F. really needed a patron, they might have adopted Montgolfier, the Atheist, who was the first real aviator. At any rate, Mr. Editor, you will surely allow that I have some claim to speak with authority, seeing the place I write from.

"Two hopeless and irremediable bachelors," said the Lord Mayor, introducing the Bishop of London and Father Vaughan to a Mansion House meeting. That is more polite than the continental jest that mankind is divided into men, women, and priests.

A lady writer in a London daily paper suggests that men are really the "weaker sex." Maybe the lady judges from seeing athletic young clergymen handing around tea and cakes at garden parties.

The late Mr. Percy Clarke, one of the proprietors of the Christian World, left estate of the value of £6,305. Let us hope that he experienced less trouble in entering heaven than the camel in passing through the eye of a needle.

The bitter gibe, "'How these Christians love one another' still retains its sting," says Sir Kingsley Wood.

Satan is supposed to be the patron saint of lawyers, but his name is not often heard in law courts now. An exception occurred the other day when Mr. Patrick Hastings, K.C., complained to Judge Dickens at the Old Bailey, "I am between the Devil and the deep sea, my lord." "In that case stick to the Devil," replied the Judge.

According to a daily paper, a number of policewomen, equipped with shields, revolvers, and handcuffs, are to be added to the New York police force. It looks as if the civilizing influence of Christianity requires the assistance of the mailed fist

The Bishop of Lichfield has been operated on for appendicitis. Not even bishops think of relying upon prayer nowadays.

It is suggested that Anglicans and the Fancy Religionists should combine in united services in parks and open places. Adversity makes strange companionship.

For having hoarded large quantities of sugar and cheese, the Rev. E. M. Madoc, vicar of Mattishall, Norfolk, has been fined £20 and costs. The civilizing effect of the Christian religion is not very apparent in this case of a man hoarding food when his fellow-citizens were threatened with famine.

A writer in the dear Daily News says: "the heart of the feminist does not leap when she imagines the old ladies in bombazine who would knit their socks beside Sir Frederick Banbury." It would not be a greater nightmare than the sight of the hard-faced bishops wearing expensive petticoats in the House of Lords

Mr. Rudyard Kipling declares that "the Devil is very much alive." The dear clergy will be duly grateful for this testimonial.

Dr. Fort Newton, of the City Temple, London, declares the "blessed English people are the poorest advertisers on earth." This should bring blushes to the faces of "God's own Englishmen."

Owing to the so-called "influenza" epidemic Sunday-schools have been closed in many districts. Another testimonial to the value of prayer.

The Bishop of Manchester declares that "the Church of England is half-Wesleyanized." Indeed! Is the other half Catholic?

The President of the National Free Church Council will spend a week in August with the Grand Fleet and conduct services. A very pleasant season for open-air evangelical work.

Dr. Truby King, of New Zealand, declares that only fifty per cent. of men are fit for parenthood, and only seventy-five per cent. of women were fit for motherhood. What a criticism of Christian civilization!

To Correspondents.

T. FOWLER.—Thanks. Shall hope to see you in Coventry during the autumn.

W. CUMMING.—We are obliged for cuttings. Our time has been so fully occupied this week that we are holding over several for use in next issue.

J. R.—Mr. Cohen's Christianity and the Slave Trade will be issued, we expect, about the end of August. It depends upon how soon it is delivered from the binders.

F. C. HOLDEN.—We should be quite willing to give a hand if asked to do so, busy as we are in other directions. We quite appreciate your feelings in the matter.

"M. A."—Shall be pleased to receive and consider article, but please note that it should not exceed two columns. Pressure on our restricted space causes us to reject many articles solely on account of length.

LAWRENCE WILLIAMS.—We have many new developments in contemplation, but it is useless describing them publicly until such time as circumstances make them practicable. These include your own suggestion, which we regard as an important one.

W. FITZPATRICK.—Too late this week, through holidays. Will be noted in our next.

FRANCES DUNNE.—Sorry we cannot send you copies of the Freethinker for July 28. That number is quite out of print.

"KERIDON."—Received. As early as possible.

R. B.—Bank Holiday prevented our getting your letter in time for this issue.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street. London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen has arranged to visit Aberdare, South Wales, on September 15, where it is hoped to form a new Branch of the N. S. S. Aberdare is quite close to Mountain Ash, Pontypridd, and Merthyr Tydfil. We have many readers in these places, and if halls could be obtained, Mr. Cohen would visit two of these towns on September 14 and 16. In that case, he would be obliged if friends would communicate with him as early as possible.

We should be greatly obliged if all those who have followed our advice as to writing their Parliamentary representative on the subject of Secular Education would let us know the nature of the replies received. We want a complete list, and we should like someone in every constituency to take the matter up. The political parties are all quietly getting ready for a general election, so are the churches and chapels. We see no reason why Freethinkers should not also be prepared to bring their case before the general public. At the proper moment we hope to make suggestions as to the methods we consider likely to be effective.

Will unattached Freethinkers in Glasgow and neighbourhood, who are willing to co-operate in any way in the promotion of Freethought, be good enough to communicate with the Secretary of the Glasgow Branch of the N. S. S., Mr. F. Lonsdale, 256 Calder Street, Govanhill, Glasgow. There must be hundreds of unattached Freethinkers in Glasgow, and we ask them to seriously consider whether it is not time to definitely associate themselves with a Society which represents the principles in which they believe.

We are asked to announce that a discussion will take place on Parliament Hill Fields to-day (August 11) at 3.15 between Mr. Muir, of the Christian Evidence Society, and Mr. T. F. Palmer. We cannot announce subject, as no title has been supplied.

One-third of this year's Civil List grants were devoted to the widows of scientists. No wonder Huxley said "Science does everything but—pay."

The Editor has been more than usually pressed for time this week, and a number of letters, paragraphs, etc., have to stand over until our next issue. This explanation will, no doubt, ensure forgiveness.

Christianity and Dirt.

DR. LYTTELTON'S REJOINDER.

SIR,—Allow me to thank you sincerely for the tone of your comments on my letter. In this chequered world—I take it we agree on that adjective—it is a real aid to living if one comes unexpectedly on a new fellow-seeker after the priceless treasure which we call Truth. Even if, when he announces a fresh find, or gives his opinion on one's own recent acquisition, some of his words startle, or disquiet, or even annoy, there is something bracing and wholesome in what he says; it encourages one to hope that some of one's own utterances may appeal to him in the same way. That is to say, that they may give him the impression that, if he listens, his mental horizon is not being narrowed, but enlarged; that being the impression I received on reading your notes in the August 4 issue.

The fact is, the joint pursuit of truth teaches many most cheering paradoxes: among them, that the more truth I find, the larger at once becomes your share; because dividing this treasure with a true partner means keeping more for oneself. For we are not poaching independently, but discovering as partners; so that my wish for your success, if genuine, is thoroughly selfish, at the same time as it is thoroughly unselfish.

Remembering, then, that I must try to be brief, yet that it is possible to be both brief and tedious, I must forgo the pleasure of dwelling upon more than one or two of your comments: our object being to get speedily down to the great subject which demands our attention.

Two points only, your view is (1) that the dirty habits in vogue in the early centuries were in consequence of a preaching of asceticism; (2) that it is irrelevant to bring in the last 150 years.

(1) I agree that dirt was preached and practised as asceticism; and by religious people. But what we want to get at is this: Was that preaching an essential part of the Christian religion? or, on the other hand, was it preached by those who were not Christians? To answer this we must notice, first, what asceticism is. The word is Greek, and the Greeks, especially the Spartans, practised it. It originally meant simply bodily training; then such bodily training as involves voluntary hardship; and for a time such hardship took the form of dirt. But neither the word nor the thing has any necessary connection with dirt. There is a great deal of asceticism which requires cleanliness; and we need not attach any more recondite meaning to the word than that of training (by exercise), in order to produce physical efficiency—widely interpreted. I believe it would be true to say that no one ever really thought that dirt conduced to physical efficiency, except some tramps and the like, who find blocking the pores of the skin keeps out cold. Dirt, as Mr. Gladstone used to say, is a form of self-indulgence, and it attached itself like a parasite to asceticism, which in turn, and for a much longer time, became part of Christianity, and has sometimes been thought to be of its essence.

I must not give evidence, but would refer your readers to the Encyclopædia Britannica and Hastings' Bible Dictionary, whence they will ascertain another interesting fact. Asceticism has been almost universal among every nation except the Jews. The Jews practised fasting, not as bodily training, but as a form of worship, connected with certain seasons. But into the young Christian Church Greek ideas quickly were infused, so that you find quite early the two ideas blended under the word "fasting." But that is a very different thing from dirt. I am not an historian, but I venture to assert that dirt has been held to be an essential part of asceticism only for limited periods, and adventitiously. It is no more an essence of asceticism than wearing long hair is of a poet; and notice that if all' poets for three centuries should wear long hair, that would not show that the practice is of the essence of poetry, though it may be universal among poets. The bearing of this will soon be evident.

(2) Therefore, we must, as Coleridge said, discriminate without dividing. Christianity, Asceticism, and Dirt are three things, and have never been one, or two, though they have been temporarily connected. It brought in the last 150 years as good evidence that between the first and the third there is no necessary connection; because you will probably allow that the two great movements during those years, described as the Evangelical and the Oxford movements respectively, were Christian movements, and, taken together, were very broadly and deeply Christian. My contention then is, that if there were any necessary connection between Christianity and Dirt we should have seen it exhibited in the light of day during the 150 years among the followers of Wesley, Simeon, Keble, and Newman. But we could not see this because it never happened; nor anything like it. Possibly you may remember that Newman wrote a lovely little poem in a young lady's album, in which he said it was her duty to look nice. There was no Dirt in that teaching, and only a very little of the loftiest Asceticism.

Now, this is all very interesting, but of no great importance till we come to weigh your remark that I am trying to save Christianity at the expense of Christians, that is, by defending the doctrines while admitting the badness of the practice. This is just one of those criticisms which are really valuable and clear the air. Is every creed, or any creed, justly, that is truly, condemned because an undefined number of its votaries have played the fool? I think the instance I gave a fortnight ago about Radicalism requires an answer. Here is another. I once met a young lout in Shoreditch who told me, with some appearance of conviction, that he had gone in for fornication because he knew if was the will of God that he should learn the difference between right and wrong. Now, that was a case of justifying self-indulgence under a plea of religion. I thought at the time, and have continued to think, that the plea was pure bosh. It reminded me of a close parallel. There were doctors forty years ago, and I am told there are still some to be found, who will tell a young man that fornication is necessary for his bodily health. That is the teaching given by men (whom I am inclined to call criminals) closely connecting moral dirt and medical science. But we don't believe any science is anything but hostile to any form of dirt; and if the whole medical profession were to unite in preaching the above lie, you know, sir, neither you nor I would lower our ideas of science because of all the sorry cant. No; no more than I lowered my idea of religion because of that poor sniveller in Shoreditch, or of any other snivellers, though clean in person, found further westward and elsewhere. A big ship is a glorious thing when launched, after some buffeting of the waves it is found to have a mass of incrustations round the keel; they take a long time to get off, and stick mighty close; but no one believes them to be part of the ship, or imputes them to the muddleheadedness of the builder, or even of the owner.

So what history teaches seems to me to be plainly this: Asceticism (a noble thing but easily spoilt) came into the Church from heathen sources—not through Christ's teaching or example, nor through Judaism. Before long it got mixed up with dirt, which, at different times, has had attractions for all kinds of people whether Christians or not. But whenever there has been a real revival of Christianity it has involved asceticism more or less severe, and dirt sometimes came in as the spirit languished; but during the last century and a half the vigorous revival of Christianity has been only slightly mixed with asceticism, and quite free from dirt; indeed, it has been contemporaneous with astonishing progress in cleanliness, sanitation, and the like. If this is nonsense, I should be really grateful to have it pointed out.

Next time shall we discuss why Christianity—according to its defenders—has been so often misunderstood and corrupted, and has done so little good?

Another Scientist's Profession of Faith.

III.

(Concluded from p. 418.)

The doctrine of the Virgin Birth of Christ he dismisses as "a myth," and declares it to be responsible for the teaching of the Church that motherhood is inferior to perpetual virginity; a dogma, he says, that "has wrought incalculable harm to the human race."

The doctrine of the Atonement—that Christ was offered as a sacrifice for the sins of mankind—also shares the fate of the Holy Communion and the rite of Baptism, Professor Thompson declaring that: "Those who—like the Salvation Army—represent that the salvation of mankind depended on the shedding of the blood of Jesus, are simply declaring that which is not true" (p. 159). "Why, then, did Jesus die?" he asks; and replies: "Not to convert God from a state of anger to a state of forgiveness; although that amazing doctrine is still the teaching of the Anglican Church," as laid down in Article 11 of the Articles of Religion. "Think of the astounding utterance of a Protestant divine," says the Professor, quoting from The Doctrines of Grace (p. 111), by Dr. Watson, "who declared that 'The sins of the human race gathered in one huge penalty and a cloud of guilt upon the head of Jesus Christ.' What a conception this implies of the character of the All-Father. A wrathful demon who hates His children, and will only be appeased by making the innocent suffer for the guilty—that is the being presented to us in place of a God of love and justice" (pp. 98-99).

Professor Thompson also makes a clean sweep of the miraculous, declaring that "It is impossible in the twentieth century to build a religion upon miracles."

In what, then, it may be asked, does Professor Thompson believe? What does his A Not Impossible Religion consist of?

It consists of belief in a God, of whom no definition or description is given. Of a future life also undefined. And veneration of Jesus, not as a God or a supernatural being, but a great religious and moral teacher.

And what proofs does Professor Thompson bring forward in support of his Not Impossible Religion? From science—none whatever. His proof was not drawn from the science of which he was a master, or from Nature. He well knew that such proof does not exist. His proof was the same as that offered by Methodist or Salvationist—neither more nor less. The proof is inward and spiritual. He says:—

> To him who possesses the spiritual perception the facts are as real as eyesight is to the man who can see. .....He possesses something that they have not, and which, possibly by analogy, they cannot understand.[1]

If that is the case, how is it that every person does not possess this inner conviction? Competent travellers and men who have lived among savages tell us of numerous tribes who have no idea of God whatever. Buddhism, which counts a larger number of adherents than Christianity, has no God. Confucianism teaches nothing about God, and many good authorities contend that Confucianism is not a religion but a philosophy. Even among the nations, nominally classed as Christian, there are many unbelievers. In France there are many millions, the State itself has severed all connection with religion, and England is following fast in her footsteps. Therefore, Professor Thompson's statement that: "The instinct of religion is then innate, as natural as the instinct of hunger, or of self-preservation, or of sex" (p. 15), is diametrically opposed to the facts. And if it were not for the fact that children have these religious ideas implanted in their minds, before their reasoning powers have been developed, there would be no instinct for religion. In another part of his book Professor Thompson admits as much. He says:—

> Most of us, without being conscious of it, grow up in a set of religious ideas and beliefs simply as the result of our environment from birth. We grow up in a certain spiritual atmosphere, and breathe it in as a part of our national and racial inheritance. The outward religion of men is at least largely determined by that of the nation into which they are born; and they adopt it more or less unconsciously without discussion or deliberation. Very few men, in all probability, set themselves in any calm philosophic mood to consider whether they shall choose for themselves a religion, or having so far decided that they will adopt a religion, proceed to investigate what sort of religion they will choose. To the great mass the choice of religion does not come about in that way: it is made not with scientific deliberation but under stress of emotion.[2]

That is what Freethinkers have always contended, a man's religion is merely a matter of geography. If he is a native of India, China, or Turkey, he will believe in one of the Asiatic religions—and according to many good Christians be consigned to Hell. If he is born among a tribe without religious ideas he will have no religion.

That Professor Thompson's religion was the result of his emotions, and had nothing to do with science we have his own admission. He says if we "admit that the intense convictions that drive men to decisions in matters of religion lie in the province of emotion rather than in that of thought, we are but accepting as axiomatic that which experience and history, at least, in a majority of cases, affirm" (p. 162). Really, the Professor has no ground for his contemptuous references to the Salvationist, for his religious belief has no firmer foundation. Both have their origin in emotion.

We do not think the Church will advertise this book, containing, as it does, a demand to abolish bishops, priests, and clergy, but Professor Thompson's name will come in handy when religious apologists are compiling those lists of religious scientists, which are so fashionable now, on the same principle worked by the great Barnum, who, when the newspapers attacked his show, had some advertisements printed giving a glowing account of "The Greatest Show on Earth," and finishing up in large type: "See Daily Press." They will use his name trusting to the publics' ignorance of his book.

Presbyterian Piffle.

A recent number of the Presbyterian Messenger, a monthly organ dealing with Presbyterian Church of England matters, contains a survey of the 1918 annual meeting of the Synod of that Church. The report itself is somewhat discursive, and from it one can hardly tell whether the church "elders" are satisfied with the little world they live in or not. Generally, the tone is strongly akin to that of a peevish, disappointed child whose past desires were nowhere near realized in the present, but who looks forward with the somewhat indefinite idea of "better luck next time."

It contains enough evidence, however, on which judgment can be passed regarding the level of mental development attained by the leading lights of this particular Christian sect. It is hardly surprising that this level is not of the highest, for one of the speakers declared that "the best brains were not now in the ministry." The remark was challenged, of course; but it is good to know that the truth will out in the most unexpected places.

It is not to be wondered at, then, that these Presbyterian beacons are at their wits' end what to do to stem the tide of spiritual apathy now permeating not only their own ranks, but those of all other religious bodies. They lament that "there was no clear sign of religious revival," and perhaps it is for this reason that they have at last overcome their religious fanaticism and confessed that they will "never make England Presbyterian." They consider, however, that they stand a fairly good chance with China; though the Almighty has done them a very "unkind cut" in that he has allowed one of his noble earthquakes in that region to smite them sorely in various unpleasant ways—but mostly diabolical. They will, or ought, to find comfort in the text that "God is no respecter of persons"; and, it may be added, of religious sects either. Anyhow they badly want £10,000 to rebuild his vineyard, which he himself has so wantonly destroyed. Yet, for some inscrutable reason (which, no doubt, deep students of psychology will be able to understand), after rehearsing the sickening facts of the catastrophe, they "appealed for a worthy response to the call, which by this 'Act of God' was addressed to us. A worthy response would be the prelude to fuller blessing."

> Then as God's presence shook the earth
> Then drops from heaven fell.

The italics are in the original. One would have imagined that the object of this earthquake address was plain enough; i.e., to clear out of China altogether. But "God moves in a mysterious way, His wonders to perform"; so perhaps the "fuller blessing" alluded to is the utter extermination of them all "by drops (brick-drops) from heaven falling."

Amen; and amen again.

Presbyterians have also their own interpretation of "spiritual" values. They do not agree that other Churches have exactly the right brand, for they contend that "man was naturally Presbyterian." To be sure! Moreover, "in the Presbyterian conception of worship the preaching of the word occupies a central place"; which, being translated, means their particular interpretation of the Grand Old Book of myths. Anyway, some few of them seem to consider that they might get along passably well with other sects. Others, on the other hand, don't think so. So the position is that "the house was somewhat sharply divided"; and whilst they may be more or less willing to federate, they strongly demand that no outsiders shall interfere wtih their particular methods of propagating the Gospel of Christian love and unity. For instance, they insisted that "the object in view was federation, not union," and that they do not intend to "give away the principle of ordination, or anything else that Presbyterians hold dear." Note the decisiveness of "or anything else": the contents of the collection plate—or bag—for instance. Anyway, the finale was that "All reference to 'the principle of Federation' was dropped." They are going to wait another year. In the meantime, Christ's vineyard may be growing thistles; simultaneously, the ravages of the wireworm will require the most earnest week-end attention of an ever-increasing number of Presbyterian allotment holders.

That their spiritual troubles are keen is evident, for they "could not allow the influence of these happy days to hide from us that all was not well with the Church in our land: statistics showed that Christianity in this country was not in possession." No wonder the Moderator "asked all the brethren for their forbearance, sympathy, and prayers during his year of office." He will need it all, every scrap; especially as, like everything else, the output will be somewhat restricted owing to exigencies of the War.

Correspondence.

RELIGION OF SOLDIERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—An incident that occurred at a large convalescent depot in France last August in reading the correspondence on "Religion of Soldiers" I thought may form a criticism of how the average soldier regards it all. At the Y.M.C.A. at this depot a debate was held on "Is Religion Essential to the Welfare of Nations?" The affirmative position was upheld by an ex-journalist, the negative by an ex-London postman, a clergyman being the chairman. What was said on both sides will not concern you, but this was the result of the voting taken from an audience of between two to three hundred soldiers of the British Empire. Only about twenty voted for it, and about half-a-dozen against it, the rest remaining indifferent. From my own experience out here the voting represented just about the average religion of Tommy. Other examples that I have first hand knowledge of is, at the Church of England compulsory parades, both in England and France, while these parades usually mean 50 per cent. of the unit, at voluntary Holy Communion immediately after not 1 per cent. is the usual attendance, and in the voluntary services held in the evening about five per cent. is the average. As for soldiers praying at bed-side and prayers in the trenches, under the most terrible of bombardment, well, it has never been my lot to see, so I am forced to come to this conclusion that religion in the army is what we call "A Wash Out."

GEORGE H. HOBBS (France).

SIR,—Re Mr. Comley's letter (Freethinker, June 23), I also feel constrained to give a direct denial to his claims. I've a fair experience of Army life, at home, in France, Belgium, Dardanelles, and Egypt; in the line hospital, back areas, and convalescent camps. Nowhere have I met any great desire for religion in any shape. To the contrary, these services are so popular that everywhere I have found efforts to avoid them.

On several occasions it has been my duty to warn men to attend voluntary service, to make up a number.

The Vicar of Ampthill refused to have compulsory Church Parade in his church (all honour to him). Volunteers were few. As a result, we had a compulsory parade, and attended at the church hut in an infantry camp near.

At Haynes Park Camp, the chaplain held voluntary services only. His were the strongest I've seen, although a count showed less than an eighth of the camp strength attending. And this was in January, 1916, when the huts were unwarmed, and there was nowhere to go. The Soldiers' Home in Alexandria was crowded any evening. The lady helper personally touted for her Bible class with little luck. A class of a dozen made her beam.

I left hospital a few weeks ago, and am now in a convalescent camp. While at hospital, the leader of the Y.M.C.A. hut publicly denounced the practice of men leaving the hut when he announced ten minutes' prayer. "I cannot understand how men who have just recovered by the help of God (no mention of the medical services) will not spare a few minutes to ask help for their less fortunate comrades still lying on a bed of pain and sickness. Perhaps this is only thoughtlessness," etc. It wasn't, as his words had no apparent effect.

At this camp we are well catered for by the Y.M.C.A., Church Army, Salvation Army, Scottish Churches, Catholic, and Christian Soldiers' Association huts. The bait (library, paper, games, and bar) is freely taken, but few appear to be trapped.

The Y.M.C.A. cinema has its crowd waiting every night; its prayer-room caters for an average congregation of twenty. The Christian Soldiers average forty an evening service; the Salvation Army about the same number. As several of these congregations go from one to another, the average is even lower. I have counted them myself, evening after evening. As these are in a camp of several thousand beds, even Mr. Comley can hardly claim them as a large average Sunday services are better attended—but then pay-day is Monday.

ANOTHER CORP. (B.E.F., France).

ATHEISM, ANARCHISM, AND ACCURACY.

SIR,—In his able letter to the Freethinker of July 28, Mr J. Effel takes me to task for making the statement in my conversations with "Uncle Joe" "that the doctrine of non-resistance, carried to its logical conclusion, would mean not only the abolition of our Army and Navy, of our law courts and police courts, our judges and our magistrates, but our police constables also, and this would inevitably lead to the villain riding roughshod over the virtuous, and to the masses being left a prey to revolution and anarchy."

Mr. Effel makes a protest against what he says is a "too common misrepresentation of Anarchism," and against the inference that armies, judges, policemen, etc., exist to prevent roughshod villainy. Well, with regard to the use of the word anarchy, it is quite possible I might have used a more appropriate expression if I had said that the people would have been left "a prey to lawlessness and disorder." But Mr. Effel should remember that I merely represent "Uncle Joe" as a conventional sort of Christian, who uses and understands only the ordinary language of everyday life. And a reference to a standard dictionary like Webster gives the definition of anarchy as "a want of government in society, lawlessness and confusion"; and that really conveys roughly what I had in my mind at the time of writing. I am well aware that a Philosophical Anarchist may be a highly cultivated person, with a scientific order of mind, as I know from having heard Prince Kropotkin lecture on the subject. But I was not dealing with Philosophical Anarchism, nor with the fine theory that a man can, by the proper cultivation of his intellectual and moral qualities, become "a law unto himself," and need neither government, nor law, nor judges, nor police, to guide or regulate him in his conduct in daily life. In fact, I was merely talking as a man who lives in the world as we know it to-day, with the masses of people still very badly educated, despite the operation of a compulsory Education Act for over forty years; with thousands of children ill-treated by their parents, as the appalling figures of the Annual Report of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Women and Children reveals; our county courts still glutted with business, in which defendants attempt to evade the payment of their legal debts; our police courts occupied with thousands of cases of drunkenness, larceny, and felony; our law courts still occupied with cases of divorce and cruelty; and our criminal courts engaged in the trial of cases of more serious offences, such as robbery with violence, fraud and forgery, manslaughter and murder. All this takes place in a country where tens of thousands of officials of various kinds are employed for the purpose of discovering the offenders and bringing them to justice. Was I not right, then, when I said that if Christians followed out the doctrine of non-resistance to its logical conclusion, it would lead to the villain having the upper hand; for all restraints upon villainy would be removed, and the masses, being without the protection of the police and the magistrate, the judge, and the Army and the Navy, would be left a prey to every form of lawlessness and disorder?

But I used the word "Anarchy," and that, in Mr. Effel's mind, is the "head and front of my offending." Mr. Effel will not deny that I was right in the use of the word according to the ordinary English dictionary meaning of the term, either Webster, Walker, Nuttall, or any other. But his contention, I take it, is that as the ordinary dictionary definition of "Atheist," as "one who denies the existence of God," is wrong, so also is the definition of "Anarchy," "as a want of government in society, or lawlessness and confusion." If that is so, we must have fresh definitions of important words as they undergo transitions in their meanings in the minds of thinkers; and the dictionaries of the future must be compiled by philosophers who understand all the varying phases of thought of every class of thinker. With regard to Mr. Effel's statement that—

> Mr. Moss, I feel sure, would think that we were more highly civilized, if we were completely without priests, Churches, and all their socially wasteful and useless ceremonies, ye he has not outgrown reverence for the judge with his wig and his wisdom, and for the policeman (guardian of virtue, and professional enemy of villainy), the justice of courts, and the belief that society could not exist without these repressive institutions.

At present I am only dealing with life as I know it, and I can say this confidently, that the masses of the people have more completely outgrown the superstition of the priests and the ceremonies of the Church than they have a belief in the wisdom of our judges in the interpretation of the law or the efficacy, of the police in safeguarding their liberties, the soldier and the sailor in upholding the stability of the State as an organized human institution.

Crabbe, descanting "on the so-called Christian Clerus," has this wild passage: "Legions of them, in their black or other gowns, I still meet in every country; masquerading in strange costume of body, and still stranger of soul; mumming, primming, grimacing—poor devils, shamming, and endeavouring not to sham: that is the sad fact. Brave men many of them, after their sort; and in a position which we may admit to be wonderful and dreadful! On the outside of their heads some singular headgear, tulip, mitre, felt coalscuttle, purple hat; and in the inside,—I must say, such a Theory of God Almighty's Universe as I, for my share, am right thankful to have no concern with at all! I think, on the whole, as broken-winged, self-strangled, monstrous a mass of incoherent incredibilities, as ever dwelt in the human brain before. O God, giver of Light, hater of darkness, of Hypocrisy and Cowardice, how long, how long!"—Carlyle, "Latter-Day Pamphlets."

Christianity and Cleanliness.

No one can be more averse than ourselves to the paying of mere compliments, but it would be ungracious not to acknowledge the altogether admirable tone and form of Dr. Lyttelton's Rejoinder in last week's Freethinker. We may from that take it for granted that neither of us are out to score mere debating points, but are both desirous of discussing broad issues that are merely illustrated by the particular points on which the discussion may turn. But it is necessary, we find, to add one more word concerning the topic of "Christianity and Dirt." Dr. Lyttelton is quite right in saying that, in our view, the neglect of cleanliness for some centuries among Christians was a direct consequence of Christian teaching; but we did not say, nor are we aware that we implied, that there was a "necessary connection between Christianity and Dirt." Had we contended for this, it would have been necessary for us to prove that this connection existed wherever Christianity did; and that is clearly not the case. Therefore, we questioned the relevancy of Dr. Lyttelton citing the conduct of the last 150 years, and suggested that the altered conduct of Christians within recent centuries might well be attributed to the influence of those forces that have brought a modification of Christian teaching in other directions. That does really bring us to a vital issue. And this issue is, if we may put it in a sentence: In a society in which Christianity is only one of many factors, what part has it played in social life and teaching?

Asceticism.

Dr. Lyttelton's contention that asceticism was not peculiar to Christianity may be admitted—we believe we said as much in our original article. We can also accept the statement that asceticism meant—under certain conditions—no more than voluntary hardship endured for the sake of securing efficiency. That meaning still remains embedded in the word. But, as Captain Cuttle remarked, the value of the word lies in the application thereof. The modern athlete endures voluntary hardship and abstains from certain pleasures in order to secure physical efficiency. Or we have the training of the student to secure mental efficiency. And, yet again, the rigorous self-denial of the Indian Fakir to secure what he conceives to be spiritual efficiency. Asceticism, in the sense in which Dr. Lyttelton and myself may agree to use the word, may not be a bad thing in itself; but it is clear that whether we pronounce it good or bad must be determined by the end sought and the relevancy of the means adopted. The contention of the Freethinker here is that Christian asceticism was bad because Christianity both misconceived the nature of the human problem and adopted means that were certain to lead to gross evils.

The Flesh and the Spirit.

What, now, was the directing motive of asceticism as understood by the very earliest body of Christians? It was clearly not physical efficiency; no one has ever proclaimed the Gospel Jesus, or any other Christian leader, as visibly concerned with that. It was certainly not mental efficiency; orthodox and historic Christianity have always been sadly deficient in lending encouragement to that. Nor was it social efficiency; for the corporate social life is substantially ignored in the New Testament, although at a later period the Church was driven to pay some attention to it. The Christian was striving after "spiritual" efficiency, and that meant an efficiency which would secure salvation in another life. But it was also held that there was an irreconcilable opposition between the world and the flesh on the one side, and the claims of the "spirit" on the other. To attend to the claims of the one meant to neglect those of the other; nay, the more one was starved the greater chance of the other flourishing. And it was simply in accordance with the working out of this belief that there existed a preaching of celibacy as superior to marriage, an endorsement of fasting, and of maceration of the body as favouring the development of the "spirit." We do not claim that any one of these forms is essential to Christianity, or even to asceticism. Our claim is not that any one is essential, but that all are the logical consequences of principles taught by the Christian Church in the very earliest ages, and never absent from its history down to our own time. The principle of the thing was in the Christian Church, whether it expressed itself, and how it expressed itself, could only be determined by existing circumstances. If we may say so, Dr. Lyttelton seems to have given too much attention to these defining circumstances, and not enough to the tendencies and potentialities of early Christianity.

Christianity and Happiness.

Rather too much has, we think, been made of the relation of Christianity to dirt, owing to our having used that apropos of a police court incident which led to the writing of the original article. But this was, again, only an illustration; other things would have served as well to illustrate the principle above indicated. We might have taken celibacy or fasting—both practised by the Gospel Jesus; or, we might have taken the more modern example of Puritanism. In Puritanism, with its dislike to Sunday games, its hatred of the theatre, its creation and perpetuation of a day of rest from which all healthy human enjoyment was banished, there was another illustration of the same principle that led Christians to preach the mortification of the flesh, which placed Stylites in his column, and led also to the practices, a description of which started the present discussion. Macaulay expressed the same thing in a witticism when he said that the Puritans hated bear-baiting, not because it hurt the bear, but because it pleased the spectators. And the cardinal principle running right through the Christian ages has been that mere human enjoyment is inimical to the life of the "spirit." This is not peculiar to Christianity, it is common to ascetic religious teachers all over the world. And that seems to us to make our case the more conclusive. For when we do find this conviction and these practices outside Christianity, is there any justifiable reason why we should interpret them differently when we find them within the Christian Church?

A Necessary Distinction.

Let us assure Dr. Lyttelton that we have no inclination, nor are we in the habit of condemning Christianity, "because an undefined number of its votaries have played the fool." The case for Freethought is too strong to need that kind of argument, although the number who do play the fool is certainly a reflection on the restraining influence of Christianity. But we hold Christianity responsible for the conduct of Christians precisely so far as it can be shown that there was a reasonable working out of the principles involved in Christian teaching. And that rule we apply in both directions. If it relieves Christianity of responsibility for all the harm done by its votaries, it divests it of praise for all the good they may have accomplished. If some of the folly and harm done by them may not be due to Christianity at all, it is at least equally probable that the good may be the product of non-Christian forces. This is a point that one can seldom get Christian controversialists to face, and it is a good omen that Dr. Lyttelton shows no inclination to evade this issue but every desire to come to close quarters with it. In this connection Dr. Lyttelton's illustration of a ship impeded by incrustations round the keel is a good one—from his point of view—but we should differ as to the nature of the incrustations. He believes the ship to be good, and its bad sailing due to the incrustations; we believe the vessel to be a bad one, and that these incrustations have somehow managed to plug the holes and so prevent its foundering. In other words, we believe the Christian ship to be socially unseaworthy, and if it is kept afloat it is only because of a number of additions that form no part of its orig1nal and essential structure. A discussion of that issue will, we think, cover the question with which Dr. Lyttelton concludes his article—"Why Christianity has been so often misunderstood and corrupted, and has done so little good."

Chapman Cohen.

"Our Holy Mother Church."

In the New Testament the Christian Church is invariably represented as an institution founded by Jesus himself, in which he promised to dwell to the end of time, and to which he undertook to send the Holy Ghost immediately after his death. There is here a curious inconsistency, not yet noticed by the divines. In St. John's Gospel, prior to the crucifixion, Jesus repeatedly refers to his approaching departure, saying: "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you." In St. Matthew's Gospel, however, after his alleged resurrection, he is made to say: "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." Was the dispensation of the Holy Ghost to endure only during the brief interval between the crucifixion and the resurrection, or are we to understand that we are living under a dual dispensation? At any rate, there is a grave discrepancy on this point between the Fourth Gospel and the First. In the Pauline Epistles the Church is described as "the body of Christ," which he loved, and for which he gave himself, "that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish." There are many other statements of the same import, and from all of them the only rational inference is that the Church is a supernatural organization, indwelt by one, if not by two, supernatural beings. Well, thus founded, guided, and governed, the Church ought to be, not only of the most perfect moral character, but also all-powerful, absolutely irresistible, with the result that even "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." It is as such that its ministers usually speak of it, especially in the Catholic Church and in the Catholic section of the Anglican Communion. They characterize it as our Holy Mother Church, to which we owe docile submission and glad obedience. Now, as a matter of fact, there never has been a period in its history when the Church was either holy, or acted the part of a tender-hearted mother. At the commencement of the eleventh century, when Leo IX. was pope, the morals of the clergy were at their lowest ebb. This was true of the monks and the secular clergy throughout Christendom. Their vices were of the most depraved and disgusting order. There were women whose calling it was to minister to the sexual lusts of the men of God. Milman says:—

> But these were not the worst of the vices of the clergy. The stern ascetic, Peter Damiani, who now comes forward the absolute unswerving model of monkhood, presented a book to the Pope, the title of which expressed in the coarsest form the unnatural vices widely prevalent among the monks as well as the secular clergy, a book which would shock a more sensitive age, but was received by the Pope as an honest and bold exposition of the morals of the times (History of Latin Christianity, vol. iii., p. 371).

Let us now concentrate our attention upon the state of the Church at the close of the fourteenth century. Pope Gregory XI. had just died. His pontificate had been replete with troubles and disasters. By no means a bad man by nature, his chief fault was weakness, which betrayed him into many pitfalls. Who succeeded him in Peter's chair? The conclave for the election was about to open in the palace close to St. Peter's. The hall was crowded to suffocation. The sixteen cardinals who formed the Conclave would not be allowed, it was evident, to permit the Holy Ghost to have any say in the election. The men who thronged the room looked fierce and dangerous, and were armed to the teeth, being determined to overawe the electors. "A Roman Pope! we will have a Roman Pope," they kept shouting. Both within the hall and outside the cry was to be heard, "A Roman Pope! if not a Roman, an Italian." The cardinals were threatened with assassination if they disregarded the demand of the Roman people. What were they to do? They made a show of heroic loyalty to the spiritual world, saying: "We are in your power; you may kill us, but we must act according to God's ordinance. To-morrow we celebrate the Mass for the descent of the Holy Ghost; as the Holy Ghost directs, so shall we do." The French wanted a French Pope, and were defiant; but the Roman populace were more defiant still and exclaimed:—

> If ye persist to do despite to Christ, we will hew these Cardinals and Frenchmen in pieces.

Eventually, the hall being cleared of all those unruly partizans, the Cardinals, instead of letting the Holy

Digitized by Google

Ghost have his way, began to wrangle and intrigue among themselves. The following is Dean Milman's description of the scene:—

> All the sleepless night the Cardinals might hear the din at the gate, the yells of the people, the tolling of the Bells. There was constant passing and repassing from eachother's chambers, intrigues, altercations, manœuvres, proposals advanced and rejected. Many names were put up (History of Latin Christianity, vol. viii., p. 37).

When they came to the nomination, they bickered and haggled over several names until, at last, by acclammation, Bartholomew Prignani, Archbishop of Bari, was elected. By now the rabble was furious, knocked madly at the gates, and vowed they would kill all the Cardinals unless a Roman Pontiff was at once elected. To save their lives, these men of God compelled the old Cardinal of St. Peter, to put on what seemed to be the papal stole and mitre, and present himself at the window; and the mob, beside itself with joy, thundered out: "We have a Roman Pope, the Cardinal of St. Peter's. Long live Rome! long live St. Peter!" It was some time before it leaked out that Bartholomew Prignani was the elected Pope. He assumed the name of Urban VI. He was of low origin, uncouth, coarse; and on his elevation, divested himself of his former humility, and became insulting in his manners and tyrannical in his rulings. In the end, the Cardinals who had elected him declared that it was a forced election, that they had acclaimed him Pope simply to save their lives, with the result that Robert of Geneva was elected Pope in the presence of all the Cardinals, with one exception, who had previously chosen Urban. This was the beginning of the notorious schism which cursed Western Christendom for thirty-eight years. For that length of time there were two rival Popes, who anathematized each other in the name of the Lord.

The effect of the schism was to discredit Christianity itself in the eyes of thoughtful people. Whilst the strife of Pope and Antipope went on with inconceivable violence, the New Learning was advancing with irresistible energy, and men everywhere were beginning to think for themselves, and the arguments and counter-arguments of the rival Popes fell on deaf ears. As Milman puts it:—

> Christendom heard these arguments and recriminations with mortifying indifference. That which some centuries ago would have arrayed kingdom against kingdom, and divided each kingdom within itself, the sovereigns against the hierarchy, or the hierarchy in civil feud, now hardly awoke curiosity. No omen so sure of the decline of the sacerdotal power; never again had it vital energy enough for a schism (Ibid., vol. viii., p. 411).

How utterly false, how wholly absurd, the Pauline conception of the Church has proved itself to be. How ludicrous, how entirely incredible, is the claim that it is the dwelling-place of the Prince of Peace, or the temple of the Holy Ghost. Even to-day the factions within it are a disgrace to humanity. Not only do the divines of one country disparage the Christianity of other countries, as those of Germany and Great Britain are doing just now, but we have the more amazing spectacle of religious leaders in our own land contradicting one another on almost every question, such as the Archbishop of Canterbury and Dr. Horton, Dr. F. B. Meyer and Fathers Vaughan and Adderley, on the rightness or wrongness of work and play on Sunday.

The Whitman Centenary.

> Have the elder races halted?
> Do they droop and end their lesson, wearied over there beyond the seas?
> We take up the task eternal, and the burden and the lesson, > Pioneers! O, Pioneers! —Walt Whitman.

Fifty years ago an obscure American writer was dismissed from a Government position because he had written a book of verse, entitled Leaves of Grass. What would Walt Whitman have said could he have foreseen that his little book would be treasured by posterity, and that, amid the distractions of a World-War, preparations would be made for the celebration of the centenary of his birth. For next year Whitman will be celebrated as the most notable among the men who laboured to lay the foundations of a national literature for America, and as the poet of Democracy.

Emerson's tribute to the value of Leaves of Grass is an historic utterance. "I find it," said the great Bostonian, "the most extraordinary piece of wit and wisdom that America has yet contributed. I greet you at the beginning of a great career." Three generations later all the auspices seem in favour of Whitman's permanence in literature. It is the old, old story of the fate of pioneers. First, the neglect of his own countrymen, tempered by abuse, then the recognition by a few of the keener minds and brighter intelligences, and then the slow emergence into appreciation as the singer of Democracy. For not only were Whitman's ideas unconventional, but his work is unlike anything else in poetry. It was not the freak of a writer trying to be eccentric at all costs, but a new and extended criticism of life. If Whitman had merely re-arranged the old poetic materials, such a departure would in no sense be remarkable. He set himself the Herculean task of dealing with the nineteenth-century world without any regard to convention. His cultured contemporaries were content to carve cherry-stones, but this self-educated man elected to hew granite.

Possessed of a remarkable personality, Whitman expressed himself freely in Leaves of Grass, and he insists on the supreme value of individuality. Shakespeare had asked: "Which can say more, than this rich praise, that you alone are you." Shakespeare was addressing a beloved friend, but Whitman says the same thing to the whole world. Of mankind the great American poet has nothing to say. In his universe there were only individuals. The man who held such ideas could not help being audacious, for this superb egoism is the centre from which Whitman's morality radiates. Morality to Whitman is simply the normal activity of a healthy nature, not the product of tradition and conventionality:—

> I give nothing as duties
> What others give as duties I give as living impulses, > Shall I give the heart's action as a duty?

It is this idea, that whatever tastes sweet to the most perfect person is finally right, that underlies the most-abused poems of Leaves of Grass. It is the antipodes of the Christian ideal, and is, in some measure, a return to Nature. Whitman speaks of man's life in terms of Nature's life, and mingles them together. All the functions of human life are dear to him, because they bear about them a savour of the things that are sweet to him in the world:—

> Of the smell of apples, of lemons, of the pairing of birds,
> Of the wet of woods, of the lapping of waves.

From this exalted vantage-ground Whitman always wrote. His was a manly attempt to raise noble functions, for twenty centuries tainted with obscenity, to their true dignity and natural relation to the universe.

Emerson's praise was not overcharged when he commended Whitman's courage and his free and brave thought. The poet was no scientist, yet it is impossible to question that he had divined scientific truths of the utmost importance. Take his attitude towards sex and the body. For the lover there is nothing in the beloved impure and unclean. This conception of purity is but a poetic rendering of the purity and beauty of organic life. It is a lesson most sorely needed in our over-strained civilization. "Dismiss whatever insults your own soul" is Whitman's insistant cry.

Whitman was a true singer of democracy. He had the keenest sympathy with life, and all activity interested him. This world-wide love is the key to those poems of his in which he seems to catalogue human occupations, merely naming the singing of the stevedores, the raftmen sounding their bugles, the Arab turning to the East. He gave other men credit for a sympathy as tireless as his own. This intense sympathy, which was his natural gift, was reinforced with emotion, sometimes very startling, as in his significant words, addressed to a prostitute, "Not till the sun excludes you do I exclude you." In all the poems on slavery and war he lost himself in the great moment, and the claims of humanity are eternal in his songs. There is no false rhetoric or brazen bravado in his beautiful lines, "Dirge for Two Veterans":—

> The moon gives you light,
> And the bugles and the drums give you music;
> And my heart, O my soldiers, my veterans,
> My heart gives you love.

"You who celebrate bygones," Whitman says defiantly to the historians, "I project the history of the future." And it will be long ere the Great Republic of the West will be able to realize his gorgeous dreams of an emancipated race.

For thousands of years countless numbers of poets have sung and wept and echoed the old, hopeless, immortal song of death as the last enemy; but Whitman's is a far other strain. The contemplation of death as a deliverer, dissevered from any thoughts of future rewards or punishments, exalts him to ecstasy. He enforces the idea of death as of a dark, warm tide, silently rising and sweeping away the agonies of sentient existence. No poet or philosopher peers with such longing and audacity into "the superb vistas of death." The awful dreams that may come in that sleep of death have no terror for him. The dead are made one with Nature. Death is "lovely and soothing," and the body, weary of life, turns like a tired child nestling close to the bosom of its mother:—

> Dark mother, always gliding near with soft feet;
> Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?
> Then I chant it for thee, I glorify thee above all.

Truly, this "tan-faced Poet of the West" was a pioneer, and he has left the priests and their superstitions far behind. Beyond the fabled hells, the tiresome purgatories, and the tawdry paradises, the resplendent vision of the great poet floods the sky and pours its serene splendour over the world.

Mimnermus.

I have all my life been on my guard against the information by the sense of hearing; it being one of my earliest observations, the universal inclination of human kind is to be led by the ears; and I am sometimes apt to imagine, that they are given to men, as they are to pitchers, purposely that they may be carried about by them. This consideration should abate my wonder to see the most astonishing legends embraced as the most sacred truths, by those who have always heard them asserted, and never contradicted; they even place a merit in complying in direct opposition to the evidence of all their other senses.—Lady Mary Wortley Montagu.

A Search for the Soul.

VIII.

It is time now that we looked at the materialistic hypothesis of the relation of body to mind. That is, that the mind is only a function of the brain-cells. In his Address on "Scientific Materialism," delivered before a section of the British Association in 1868, Professor Tyndall, speaking of the correlation of the action of the brain and thought, said:—

> The relation of physics to consciousness being thus invariable, it follows that, given the state of the brain, the corresponding thought or feeling might be inferred; or, given the thought or feeling, the corresponding state of the brain might be inferred.

From this statement it would seem perfectly clear that thought and feeling arise as the result of the activities of the brain-cells; but in the next sentence our very conscientious professor modifies the meaning to be attached to "inferred." He says: "But how inferred? It would be at bottom not a case of logical inference at all, but of empirical association." That is to say, this very obvious conclusion rests only upon observation and experiment, and these methods are apparently deemed to be insufficient. In explanation, our professor says:—

> The passage from the physics of the brain to the corresponding facts of consciousness is inconceivable as a result of mechanics. Granted that a definite thought and a definite molecular action in the brain occur simultaneously, we do not possess the intellectual organ, nor apparently any rudiment of the organ, which would enable us to pass, by a process of reasoning, from the one to the other. They appear together, but we do not know why. Were our mind and senses so expanded, strengthened, and illuminated, as to enable us to see and feel the very molecules of the brain; were we capable of following all their motions, all their groupings, all their electric discharges, if such there be; and were we intimately acquainted with the corresponding states of thought and feeling; we should be as far as ever from the solution of the problem "How are these physical processes connected with the facts of consciousness?" The chasm between the two classes of phenomena would still remain intellectually impassable. Let the consciousness of Love, for example, be associated with a right-handed spiral motion of the molecules of the brain, and the consciousness of Hate with a left-handed spiral motion. We should then know, when we love, that the motion is in one direction, and when we hate, that the motion is in another; but the "why?" would remain as unanswerable as before.

After reading these astonishing statements, it may perhaps appear that they voice unreasonable objections which tend to impede the progress of rational thinkers. But this, I think, is mainly due to the presentation of the problem in terms of dualism, which apparently assume or imply that the mind and the brain are related as objects in space. Our professor speaks of "the passage" from "the one to the other"; that there is a "chasm between the two classes of phenomena," and that the "physical processes" are "connected" with the "facts of consciousness." Two things appear to be spoken of as existing apart, yet also as "connected," though we know that there is really only one—which is looked at from two different points of view.

Assuming that thought is generated by the molecular action of the brain, in conjunction with the energy associated with that action, Professor Tyndall says that we do not possess an organ capable of understanding how such an action can produce the effect we experience; and then he speaks of passing by reasoning from one mode to the other. This is something like asking, How is gravitation "connected" with the earth? or, How are Love and Hate connected with the brain? Are we in reply to say that we do not possess the intellectual organ which would enable us to pass, by a process of reasoning, from "gravitation" to the "earth," or from "Love and Hate" to the "brain"? Would it not be more rational to ask, in each case, Has the earth power to attract external bodies towards it? Can the brain experience such sensations as Love and Hate? Setting aside the "why," the answer to each question is in the affirmative. Hence, the objection that we do not know why certain activities of the brain cells are "connected" with certain states of consciousness is futile. We do not know why oxygen unites with hydrogen to form water, or why the first-named gas unites with nitrogen to form the atmosphere; yet we know perfectly well that these are undoubted facts. What we want to know, in the first instance, is not why certain things are so, but simply is it a fact that they are so.

There are two bushes in my garden, one of which bears roses and the other black-berries; but the bush on which the roses bloom never bears black-berries, and that with the black-berries never bears roses. If I were to ask a gardener why this is so, he would tell me (after carefully looking at the leaves of each) that the reason is, because one is a rose bush and the other a black-berry bush: that is to say, he accepts the mysterious influence of heredity to be an undoubted fact, though he has not the smallest idea of the reason why. We thus get along very well without knowing the why or the wherefore.

In his address at Browning Hall, in 1914, Professor Bottomley said: "Science deals with the 'how,' and not the 'why' of things.....It does not tell us why the earth describes a certain course round the sun. The 'Why' is not the business of science." Just so; but the theory that the mind was a function of the brain was so generally denied in Tyndall's day that that Professor, though he firmly believed it to be true, could not bring himself to assert positively that such was the case until he was able also to give the why. The problem he set himself to solve was: "How are these physical processes connected with the facts of consciousness? The solution is that the "physical processes" referred to do actually give rise to consciousness, and that these processes are felt by us, not as molecular movements, but as consciousness and thought. In the few cases known, in which the brain has been closely observed while thought was taking place, nothing has been perceived apart from the molecular action of the cerebral organ itself. This action, then, or rather the energy associated with it acting upon the molecules, evidently was the thought; we know of nothing else.

Christians and Spiritists are, of course, at liberty to imagine an invisible, intangible nonentity, which they call the mind, soul, or spirit, and to fill it, like a bag, with all kinds of attributes which have no existence apart from matter, and even to declare these activities or qualities to collectively constitute an entity that will survive the destruction of the brain which temporarily created them. This, as a simple matter of fact, they have done in the past and still do, and they will, no doubt, continue to do so until all scientists worthy of the name unite and boldly tell the unthinking and credulous public the simple truth.

The molecular action of the brain when generating thought can, I think, be better understood if we look at the modern gramophone. In the latter we see a cylinder or disc in motion and a stationary needle which lightly touches the record. As a result we can hear a speech or a song by a well-known speaker or singer, loud and clear, exactly as delivered, even to the tones and inflections of the voice. And this is all produced by the needle passing smoothly over a multitude of microscopic inequalities on the surface of the record. The trumpet is of use only to magnify the sound, and the machine to keep the record in motion. We have thus only a needle gently touching matter in motion; or, what would amount to the same thing, the matter might be stationary, like the strings of an æolian harp, and some kind of energy might play upon it, as do the rising and falling currents of air upon the cords of the lyre. In the brain also, we have a multitude of microscopic molecules, which, in a certain sense, may be said to be in motion, and cerebral energy passing over them or working through them. In any case, the creation of thought is not so inconceivable as Professor Tyndall supposed. The gramophone certainly shows that there can be two aspects of the same thing.

The Church Times, while welcoming the new Education Act, "cannot accept as final a Bill of which the most that can be said is that it makes the religious situation no worse than it was already." The various denominations, we are told, "are united in their anxiety to stem the drift towards Secularism," and they are clear "that another Bill embodying a solution should quickly follow.....Given an agreed scheme capable of incorporation, Mr. Fisher will be ready enough to introduce it." This, it will be noticed, follows exactly the plot we said some months ago was in operation. First, an Education Bill leaving religion alone; then a series of semi-private conferences to draw up an "agreed" plan of religious instruction; finally, a short Bill brought before the House of Commons as embodying that in which all parties are agreed, to be passed by a House unequalled in English history for its docility and obedience to Government orders.

Once again we urge upon all interested in education to be active and alert. At the moment when Christianity is losing its hold on the adult life of the nation, we have this carefully engineered plan for entrenching it still more solidly in the schools. There is only one fly in the ointment, as it appears to the Church Times. The teachers are averse to giving the clergy control over the schools. They know full well what that means. But, says the C. T., "He needs to be sharply reminded that the teacher exists for the children and the schools, not the children and the schools for the teacher." To that we agree; and we are as firmly convinced that the schools and the children and the teachers do not exist for the Churches; and that is the end aimed at by the religious parties in the State.

The growth of the British Empire is sapping the insularity of Englishmen, and the dullest of orthodox folk must recognize the importance of other religions than the Christian. A sign of the times is the proposal to erect a mosque and a temple in France as memorials to the Indian soldiers who have fallen during the War. A good memorial would be one inscribed over the graves of the dead, "To the God who took no heed."

Mr. Silas K. Hocking, who was formerly a minister, says "the masses of the people do not look to the Christian Church for either light or leading. It has stood too often on the wrong side, or been silent when it should have spoken." What will Brother Hocking's former colleagues say to this?

A daily paper quotes a schoolboy's definition of "Piscatorial" as "The Established Church." Some grown-up folk regard the Church of England as a "fishy" institution.

The secularization of the Young Women's Christian Association has upset some of the women who worked for that organization before the War. In the old days the members were drawn almost exclusively from domestic servants and shopgirls: but that is all altered now, and the new members are carrying all before them. It looks as if, instead of the Christians converting the world, the world will convert the Christians.

Devotional services will soon be undistinguishable from Sunday League concerts, flavoured with a little piety. At the War Commemoration Services, held under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association, the attractions included the London Opera House Orchestras, the Kingsway Quartette Party, and a lady soloist. A millionaire and a Colonial Prime Minister acted as chairmen. All this array of talent was paraded to remind people that there was a War on, and, incidentally, to advertise the Y.M.C.A.

Christians will find themselves once more in the Middle Ages if they permit themselves to be led by the dear clergy. War shrines are erected everywhere, prayers are offered for fair or wet weather, and the Bishop of London blesses flowers in Hyde Park and music is provided by a Salvation Army band.

When Charles Manser, of Wood Green, found his wife one night with a Walter Hills, Mrs. Manser said she loved Hills "with a Christian love." Evidently that kind of love was open to suspicion, for Mr. Manser instituted proceedings, and the judge granted a divorce.

We are discovered! But a long way off—Wisconsin, U.S.A., to be exact. Someone has been sending the Rev. T. W. Gales copies of the Freethinker, and in the Appleton Crescent that gentleman decides that we ought to go to a farm to spend a vacation. Really we should not mind, if we had the chance; and, curiously enough, our own doctor gave us the same advice quite recently. He, however, thought that rest was necessary, and would make us more fit for work. Mr. Gales thinks it might stop our writing altogether. But even about that he is doubtful, because we might, owing to our vitiated taste, prefer to grovel "where all the refuse of the stable was cast." All of which means that the Freethinker is not to the taste of Mr. Gales. And after reading his article, we are glad of it.

Mr. James Fenwick Beveridge, retired wine and spirit merchant, Burleigh, Beveridge Park, Dunfermline, has left £44,230. Of this, Mr. Beveridge has left £250 to Victoria Road U.F. Church, Kirkcaldy, for investment for Congregational purposes. It will be interesting to know whether the church will accept this bequest, especially when one considers the source from which this money has been obtained.

According to the Evening News a soldier stopped a service at the Lee United Methodist Church, S.E., because he thought forgiveness for Germans was being urged. He threatened to bring enough soldiers to wreck the place. This is, indeed, a novel departure. All the threats, hitherto, have come from the pulpits, not the pews.

The clergy in America are as careful of their skins as their brethren in Britain. The Truthseeker (New York) points out that the clergy have demanded and accepted exemption from military duty for themselves and for students in their colleges. While they have not proffered to the Government the financial support that could be given by submitting Church property to taxation, they have raised enormous sums from the public for sectarian effort. In short, they have put the Cross above their Country's flag. It will be noticed that the leopard does not change his spots.

The Poor Clergy Relief Corporation is appealing for funds "to enable the poor clergy to obtain a few weeks' rest and change." As ministers are exempted from Military Service, they are already relieved from much of the stress and strain to which their fellow-citizens are subjected. Yet they wish to have prolonged holidays at other peoples' expense. It is appropriate that the President of this Society should be the bachelor Bishop of London, who "takes up his cross and follows his Saviour" on a salary sufficient to keep fifty families in comfort.

The Pope is sending parcels containing food and chocolate to Italian prisoners of war in Germany. If there is a spark of truth in Christianity "God's viceregent on earth" should be able to do more than this for suffering humanity.

A speaker at the Wesleyan Conference referred to President Wilson as a "saint of God." It is always safer to reserve such compliments until a man has finished his career.

The Rev. F. B. Meyer has been writing to the press denouncing recreation for soldiers on Sundays, which will mean, he adds "a very serious and permanent change in our national life." "Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" Does Mr. Meyer think the War is to last for ever?

Speaking in the House of Lords, the Archbishop of Canterbury declared that the Church had always been solicitous for the education of the poor. Indeed! In 1818 it was found that more than half of the children were growing up without education. A few years later it was noticed that of all the persons who came to be married, one-third of the men and one half of the men could not sign the register.

The Vicar of St. Mary Magdalene, Wandsworth, is another gentleman who thinks God has a mighty purpose to fulfil in the War. Writing in the Church Monthly, he says that before the War "God was being forgotten; God was being ignored; God was being openly defied." So, we presume, God arranged this little rumpus to call our attention to his existence. Quite a pretty little plan. On the same lines, if a man is ignored by his neighbour, it would be justifiable to drop a bomb on his roof. And the numbers who have been killed? How are they to amend their ways? It looks as though God kills the soldier in order to teach the man at home to correct his ways.

Providence was too busy watching the fall of the sparrows to notice a fire at the Methodist Chapel, Bellenden Road, Peckham.

The new President of the Wesleyan Conference, the Rev. Samuel Chadwick, urges "an old-fashioned revival!" in order to stir up the faithful. It cannot be done. All the clergy of Europe cannot keep hell alight.

"Jesus Christ," says the Rev. R. W. Seaver, of St. John's, Malone, Belfast, "was the Prince of Freethinkers." Now, that used to be the title pious people gave to the Devil. If things go on at this rate, we may find heaven and hell amalgamating, and the whole concern turned into a joint stock company. The War, adds Mr. Seaver, has made men think. That is true, and the course of their thinking is not very favourable to the Churches. Mr. Seaver says the War has greatly upset the religious belief of those who never thought for themselves. Again, we agree and add, that a large number of those who did think for themselves had done with Christianity before the War commenced.

The British and Foreign Bible Society and many Church of England institutions benefit to the extent of nearly £150,000 by the will of the late Lady Pearce, who left £335,409. Pearce and plenty!

At Christie's Sale Rooms a single-row pearl necklace was sold for £47,500. For the jewels sold on the same day over £90,000 was paid. This happens in a country which professes to worship a carpenter-god.

The Rev. J. McNeill, who has returned from Palestine, tells a story of a soldier who said to him: "Is this the Promised Land? I don't know who they promised it to, but I don't want it."

To Correspondents.

A. G. DALE.—We have sent on your letter to Mr. Farmer. Thanks for congratulations on the way the Freethinker has been kept going. It has not caused us sleepless nights—sleeplessness not being one of our complaints, but it has caused us many anxious days. The appreciation of our friend is stimulating.

WE have to acknowledge the sum of 4s. 6d, from Mr. R. Wilson, 10s. from Dr. R. T. Nichols, and 3s. 6d. from Mr. S. Pulman, received towards cost of literature sent to soldiers. We are constantly sending these parcels, and are always ready for the addresses of those to whom our literature is likely to prove useful.

J. A. REID.—We have no knowledge on the subject ourselves, but it is not difficult to get a thing boomed if there is money behind it.

S. ROBINSON.—Colonel Ingersoll wrote on and about Talmage several times. These writings are contained in the Dresden edition of Ingersoll's work, but have not been reprinted otherwise.

WRITING from a hospital ward, R. B. wonders what on earth the people who organized the Day of Prayer were praying for, and what they expected. He thinks that many on the "Day of Remembrance" will have remembered that this War has occurred in a world where Christianity is one of the dominating influences, and that kind reflection will not be very helpful to the Churches.

C. MARTIN.—The man who told you Mr. Cohen received ten guineas each time he lectures has a fine imagination. Mr. Cohen would not have any objection to its being true, but, as a matter of fact, he never stipulates for any lecturing fee whatever, and often enough none is forthcoming. The great thing is to get the work done. We should not refer to this subject here, but it is as well to kill these stories in public.

R. L.—Glad you found the form of letter we sent you so useful. Always bear in mind that all editors like brevity and point in letters that are sent for publication. Will write you on the other matter so soon as we can find time.

L. J. ROE.—The Darwin's Life and Letters is published by John Murray. The work can be ordered through any bookseller.

T. RAWLINSON.—Considering that Mr. Cohen has been writing regularly in the Freethinker for over twenty years, it is rather staggering to be asked whether we once made a certain statement therein. If you give us some idea of when the alleged article appeared. We will look the matter up.

H. E. (Exeter).—Certainly; as the documents are of importance, the safest plan will be to register the packet. The matter will be treated with the strictest confidence, and the papers returned so soon as read.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

There is neither virtue, utility, nor courage, in attacking prostrate opinions; nor generosity in disturbing the tranquil contented ignorance, which reposes in silence upon exploded dogmas. It is living, thriving, mischievous error which calls for refutation; it is corrupt, profitable, and intriguing misrepresentation which should be fearlessly attacked.

Letters reach us every week concerning the position of the Freethinker in the Army, and although we have published the information several times, the last reply to these communications is to again state:—

(1) Soldiers have the same right as civilians to affirm where an oath is required. This right is conferred on them by the Oaths Amendment Act of 1888.

(2) By a War Office Order, No. 179 of January, 1916, men on joining the Army must have their answers concerning religion taken as given without question. They must be entered as Atheist, Agnostic, or any other title by which they describe themselves.

(3) Where a wrong description is entered, owing to misapprehension, application should be made to the recording officer, and failing redress to his superior. But we do not know how far this would apply to a wrong description given by the recruit himself. A deal would depend here upon the good will and courtesy of the officer.

We take this opportunity of thanking those who have forwarded parcels of used magazines, newspapers, etc., and assure them we deeply appreciate the help thus given. It is very important that as much waste paper as possible should be sent to us. We will forward labels or sacks on application, and full prices will be paid.

Mr. G. Rule, of 96 Ingelow Road, Battersea, has kindly undertaken to act as collector on our behalf for South London. If friends and sympathisers in the district who have waste-paper for disposal will communicate with Mr. Rule he will see to its collection and delivery at this office.

Mr. Horace Dawson writes to a Wood Green paper pointing out that the editor had omitted to note in his account of Lord Rhondda that the late Food Controller had little or no belief in Christianity. Unable to deny the truth of the statement, the editor retorts that "private religious belief" had nothing to do with improvement of the food supply. Now, had Lord Rhondda followed the example of Lloyd George, and preached occasionally in chapels, we should have been told that he owed his success to his profound faith in Christianity, etc. Heads I win, tails you lose.

The Manchester Branch takes another of its "Rambles" to-day (August 18). The Marple district has been selected, and the members and friends will meet at the Picadilly Corner for Reddish Car at 10.30. It will be advisable for each member of the party to carry his or her own provisions.

We are asked to announce that the Freethinker and all Pioneer Press publications are displayed for sale at The Reform Bookshop, 103 Kirkgate, Bradford. The manager is Mr. E. H. Driffill. Restricted space has prevented our publishing a full list of newsagents who supply this paper, but we shall return to the practice as early as is possible.

Among the recent resolutions in favour of Secular Education sent to Mr. Fisher is one from the Newcastle Branch, N.S.S., and another from the recent meeting of South Wales Freethinkers. Both have been formally acknowledged with the intimation that they would receive attention. Many other resolutions have been sent to the Minister of Education, although we have not been informed concerning all of them.

In the long run, genius and wit side with the right cause. And the man fighting against wrong to-day is assisted, in a greater degree than perhaps he is himself aware, by the sarcasm of this writer, the metaphor of that, the song of the other, although the writers themselves professed indifference, or were even counted as belonging to the enemy.

A Strange Vision.

PERIODICALLY I pay a visit to the West End of London when bent on recreation. I like to watch the people in these stirring times as they go about in the performance of their daily work or pleasure, and, especially, to take notice of the vast number of men in khaki of various ranks and nationalities, representatives of our Allies from over the seas. These things interest me amazingly, and supply me with constant food for thought. Sometimes in these short excursions I go for a journey on the Tube, and come out of a station on the revolving staircase. To me it is a perfectly delightful experience, and, as such, I enjoy it, just as I used to enjoy a ride on the switch-back railway years ago at the Crystal Palace. A few evenings ago I had a journey on the Tube, and came out at Oxford Circus on the revolving staircase. A few nights later I had an attack of the new complaint—"the Spanish 'Flu"—and when I retired to bed I was very restless and feverish. My rest was disturbed by dreams—not always unpleasant—but in most of them I found myself on the revolving staircase, sometimes running up the stairs, sometimes standing still, and being carried to the top by the perpetual movement of the stairs.

And in one of these dreams I saw myself stepping off the stairs with the wrong foot. I don't know how I came to do it, but I did, and falling on the back of my head at the landing-stage. I saw numerous stars, and for a very few moments I seemed to lose consciousness, but after a while I beheld a vision. And in this vision I saw the strange figure of a man with a long-flowing beard. He was clothed in a white raiment, and wore a shining helmet upon his head. I have said that he had the figure of a man, and yet he was not a man, for he said, in answer to my questions, that he was "the ghost of an old Pagan god," and was doomed to pass his time upon the everlasting moving staircase that took him higher and higher into the heavens; but, apparently, supplied him with no landing-place upon which to plant his unsubstantial and shadowy feet. His figure was most majestic, and he carried a wand in his hand; and as I watched him I could not help thinking that he looked somewhat like my old friend, the late Tom Mead, the famous actor of the old Lyceum Theatre, in the good old days of Sir Henry Irving, in the part of the "Ghost of Hamlet's Father"; but he did not possess such a fine, deep, sonorous voice as the old tragedian. Sometimes, indeed, his voice was rather weak, and whistled and piped like that of one of the characters in The Seven Ages of Man, in As You Like It. There was a sadness in the expression of his face, "a pale cast of thought," as though he was conscious that there was something wrong in the affairs of the world that he would fain put right if he had his way. When I first began to interrogate him he was mute; he looked upon me with a piteous eye, but answered not a word. At length, however, he gave heed to my questions and answered most cheerfully. At first he appeared to be speaking in blank-verse, but after a while he dropped into ordinary prose and became much more at ease. When I wanted to take down what he said I could neither find my note-book nor my pencil, though I searched for them most diligently, and, therefore, I cannot pretend to furnish a full report of the conversation; but, so far as I remember, I will give the substance of his narration. He told me that he was a very old god, and that he had quite forgotten his name—a failing to which old persons are very subject, and from which old gods are, apparently, not exempt; but he remembered quite distinctly that he played a most important role among the gods of his day. And he wished it to be understood that though all the gods had their own separate department to attend, none of them tried to usurp the position of the other, and except that, at times, they had some little differences among themselves, there was a general agreement among them as a rule.

All of them had large powers; some could perform stupendous miracles, such as commanding the sun or moon to stand still, and they would obey. Others could only perform smaller wonders, such as healing the sick, making the deaf to hear and the dumb to speak. But most of them lost their powers so soon as they got out of the environment most suited for their existence. And after all, the priests and parsons were their greatest enemies. They declared that the gods had unlimited powers—that they were all-powerful as well as all-good. Well, as a matter of fact, they were neither; and when the people began to discover this fact, their belief in them began to weaken, and gradually to die out altogether. That was the way, in fact, that his godhead lost its power, and that he died the death of all the other Pagan gods. Since he had been merely the ghost of a god, he had wandered about over the earth, and had witnessed most of the sights in the world's happenings that were worth seeing; but now he had got right out of his environment, and things seemed to have lost most of their interest. Before he got on to this perpetually moving staircase, he had wandered about Regent Street and Oxford Street, but he could neither admire the costumes of the ladies nor the deportment of the gentlemen. He preferred the picturesque attire of the ladies of ancient Greece and Rome, and the fine manly bearing of the philosophers and citizens of those ancient cities. The theatres and music-halls, as a rule, were no attraction to him, though he confessed that he laughed heartily over the eccentricities of Little Tich, who was a very quaint and genuine comedian, and was the "star" turn at the Palladium on the occasion of his visit. In fact, he never saw a funnier little man. He did not, however, care to go to a theatre or music-hall. Everybody looked at him, and thought he was one of the characters from When Knights were Bold. But he was a great lover of opera, and he had witnessed some excellent performances of the Beecham Opera Company at Drury Lane. He had no prejudices against German music—he could enjoy Wagner as well as Verdi or Puccini, and Mozart as well as Bizet and Thomas. What interested him most, however, since he had been in London, was the large number of soldiers—many of them wounded—that were constantly walking about the streets; and he grieved to think of the poor fellows who had lost a limb. These were sights that were never to be seen in Greece and Rome two thousand years ago. Of course, he had heard of the great War; but as he had not paid a visit to France or Flanders, he had no personal knowledge of the great tragedies that were being enacted on the field of battle in those two countries.

Several people had asked him what the modern gods were doing, and why they had not interfered to stop the War. There was only one answer—they really had not the power. They might desire to put an end to the whole brutal and bloody business—he made no apology for the use of the sanguinary adjective, which, he understood, was not only a favourite expression of Shakespeare, but also of another distinguished dramatist named Bernard Shaw—but the gods of all nations were really powerless in the matter. Some of the gods were very good indeed—others were merely "goody-goody"; but as they were, for the most part, merely the creatures of the priestly imagination, it was left to the priests to explain and justify their actions according to their own sophistical methods. And it was really strange that these methods satisfied the masses of their credulous followers. Indeed, he was only reading in the Freethinker the other day ——

. . . . . .

At the mention of this journal I had a violent fit of sneezing, which broke the spell—and I awoke.

I looked about the bedroom. Although everything had a greenish appearance, the ghost of the strange vision had vanished, and on the drawers on my right stood the miniature statue of Charles Bradlaugh. And I found upon reflection that, in my delirium, I had been supplying arguments and narratives for an ancient god who had no existence apart from my poor troubled brain. And so the vision vanished, as all such visions do, when the reason resumed its normal condition ; and once more the ghost departed into oblivion.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The Dark Diamonds of the Earth.

To the Titan Prometheus, the classic Greeks attributed the theft from the sullen gods of their jealously guarded secret of kindling flame, in order that humanity might use it for their own benefit. Modern science, however, assures us that the discovery of the value of fire, and the acquisition of the power to generate light and heat, possess an entirely different history. Primitive man probably secured his first fire from volcanoes and flaming vegetation. Then he learnt the art of producing flame from the friction of sticks and stones. Dried leaves and dead branches were constantly at his service for use as fuel for his fires, and even in Europe, right down to recent centuries, wood and peat were the chief materials employed for purposes of combustion.

How, or when, coal first came to be utilized as fuel, no one can tell. In Britain, mining on a small scale appears to have been conducted during the Roman occupation of the island. As early as A.D. 852 the Anglo-Saxons fed their house-fires with coal, and there are sound reasons for thinking that England was the first European country to burn coal to any material extent. In the reign of Richard I., coal was raised in Durham. In the thirteenth century, in Scotland, charters were granted for the digging of coal. The fuel was well known in the periods of the Yorkist and Tudor monarchs, and, according to Anderson's History of Commerce, was sent by sea from the North to London at the opening of the fourteenth century. It was then known as sea-coal, and is mentioned as such by Shakespeare in his Merry Wives of Windsor over two centuries later.

When coal entered into common use in the Metropolis, it was adversely regarded by the more conservative. In the days of Edward I., the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled petitioned the King to prohibit the use of coal; but as wood was scarce and dear, the consumption of coal increased. Long after coal fires had become common in London, a Crown proclamation was published by Elizabeth, forbidding the burning of coal in London during the Parliamentary session, as its fumes were thought dangerous to the health of the members. Doubtless, the smoke and stench ascending from the rude hearths, and emerging from the sooty and draughty chimneys of that age, were markedly malodorous. Even at the date of Charles the First's execution, in 1649, Parliament was again petitioned by London citizens, both of credit and renown, to prohibit the use of coal on account of its abominable odour ; but in that and in succeeding centuries the consumption of coal assumed ever-increasing proportions.

The modern exploitation of our coal measures has resulted in a social, industrial, and commercial revolution probably without parallel in the world's history Steamships, railways, factories, and workshops ; all our immense electrical undertakings, are based on energy supplied by coal; while the vast cotton, woollen, and other textile industries repose on a basis furnished by the same fuel. Also, our gas and electric light, and cooking appliances, as well as all our heating arrangements, are derived from the combustion of coal.

In the grey dim past, in ages immeasurably remote, when the floral and faunal kingdoms were vastly different from those of to-day, our planet's coal deposits were formed. Immense stretches of our earth's surface were tropical bogs and swamps. In deltas and lagoons in the vicinity of river systems sluggishly wandering towards the sea, plants of a luxurious and rapidly growing character abounded, which season after season cast down their dead materials to constantly accumulate as a consolidated medley of vegetable remains. These floral forms were of primitive pattern, for the vast majority were members of the Cryptogamic order, and their leading representatives were club-mosses, horse-tails, sedges, noble ferns, and magnificent tree ferns of majestic proportions.

As time rolled on, these deposits of departed plant life were subjected to great compression. The lake, the stream, and the ocean covered them in turn, and mantled them with mud, sand, clay, and other sediment, until they became once more raised above water-level, when another mass of plants arose and flourished, but destined, as time sped on, to share the fate of their predecessors, and to lie long submerged by the encroaching waves. Many alternations of this character occurred until with the lapse of geological ages, changes in climate and modifications in the distribution of sea and land led to pronounced departures in the animal and vegetable realms.

Continent and ocean triumphed in succession in the regions where the coal forests had for protracted periods enjoyed their intermittent reign. Hundreds, or even thousands, of feet of sedimentary substances were subsequently deposited over the now deeply buried plant remains, and their intervening layers of sandstone, limestone, and clay.

The earth's leading coal measures were formed in the Carboniferous Age, and since that ancient period, the immense mechanical pressure of the superincumbent rocks, assisted by chemical decomposition, has served to transform these antique plant remains into that hard opaque substance which we classify as coal. It is frequently assumed that coal is no longer in process of formation, and that this fuel was first produced in carboniferous times. The Carboniferous epoch was, undoubtedly, distinguished beyond all others by a combination of events which culminated in the deposition of the most opulent and extensive coal-fields. But, as the late Professor Meldola reminds us :—

> In the very oldest rocks in Canada and the Northern States of America in strata which take us back to the dawn of geological history, there is found abundance of the mineral graphite, the substance from which black-lead pencils are made, which is almost pure carbon. Now, most geologists admit that graphite represents the carbon which formed part of the woody tissue of plants that lived during these remote times, so that this mineral represents coal in the ultimate stage of carbonization. In some few instances true coal has been found converted into graphite in situ by the intrusion of veins of volcanic rock (basalt), so that the connection between the two minerals is more than a mere matter of surmise.

In Scotland coal occurs in beds of old red sandstone which are of earlier date than the carboniferous deposits, while coal formed subsequently to the Carboniferous era exists in Bavaria, Yorkshire, and other districts. So geologically recent as the Eocene Age coal was formed in the Northern Tyrol, and still later brown coal was evolved in Belgium and Austria, while in quite modern geological times—in the Mid-Tertiary—the mineral was fashioned from vegetable remains in the now Arctic area of Greenland. Moreover, peat is being formed to-day in Ireland and elsewhere, and in various territories the first stages of coal production are in ceaseless operation where delta jungles and mangrove morasses abound.

Those British coal-fields that have proved a source of wealth so vast to our country are entirely of carboniferous origin. The coal reposes in the mines in layers separated by beds of shale, sandstone, and other sedimentary substances that were deposited over the plant materials at periods when neptune rolled or the rivers ran over the depressed forests. The seams of coal invariably rest on a couch of clay which is all that remains of the soil in which the prehistoric vegetation once rooted. In this layer of underclay the fossilized roots and lower trunks of ancient trees sometimes stand erect in the position where they once flourished.

In the course of millions of years most of the original features of the plants since transformed into coal have vanished. Yet, one has only to note the layers in a burning lump of coal to observe a striking resemblance to those of a heated wood-block. Fragments of desiccated foliage, ligneous fibre, and the outlines of fern fronds may occasionally be seen, while in some coal the spore cases of extinct club mosses are so numerous that the coal appears almost entirely composed of them.

Presbyterian Piffle.

(Concluded from p. 430).

AGAIN, "the fathers of the Church" are "still struggling with the spiritual difficulties that beset younger men." They fear that "the impression (is) widely spread of the Church's insincerity in proclaiming her message." That is natural; for a large body of young men would be a fine business asset to the Presbyterian concern. Still, business has its jealousies. God is a jealous God, and Presbyterians are, presumably, jealous also; at any rate, it would appear so, for they are striving "to supply the definite denominational teaching for lack of which our young people are largely going over to the Church of England." And, as usual, it all needs the backing of a Sustentation Fund—one, of course, that needs a substantial backing itself at a sound British bank. Credits drawn against the Bank of Heaven are useless. Hard, crisp "Bradbury's" is "the only way" of getting over the difficulty. They ought to try prayer, and remember that everything comes to those who wait. Some of them, though, seem to be very dubious about it, for when—

> A very tender and impressive Service of Intercession and Commemoration followed. It was a disappointment that so many left before this began. The hour was late. But the question could not help rising in some hearts: Do we really believe, do we all believe, that prayer is worth while?

Yes, that is the question; and there are thousands who have answered it "in the negative," not the least of these being "somewhere in France." Prayer is nothing more than the modern prototype of the medicine-man's weird incantations and mystic exorcisms. Still, some of the sharp words uttered regarding the collapse of the £300 in the collections ought to hurry along the laggards. It is not stated whether all and sundry were reminded that trouser buttons were of no use as a War bonus, though they may certainly be more useful than prayer—for breakdown jobs especially. Besides, even the mentioning of such a matter ought to perform wonders, for "a sense of humour is a great help to holiness." It is. "Praise God from whom all blessings flow: trousers buttons and hard-baked dough."

It is good to hear that "there was no clear sign of a religious revival." No doubt they would dearly like a business boom throughout the country. This would enable them to make quick profits. The Sunday school business is too slow and utterly disappointing, for—

> Twenty years ago a large percentage of non-church-going parents wanted their children to come to Sunday-school; ten years ago they were indifferent; to-day they are largely hostile, mainly for selfish reasons because the Sunday-school hours do not fit in with meal hours and household tasks.

It is to be presumed that this is not to be taken as an insult to the parents, nor yet to the intelligence of the "elder" that uttered it. Verb sap! These parents will surely be damned if they don't send their children to Sunday-school, though one can hear the parents retorting, with Ingersoll, that they'll be damned-if they will.

What can these Church dignitaries expect when they treat 50 per cent. of parents as having no rights of equality with the other 50 per cent.? Everywhere it is "Fathers and Brethren." Have they not yet learned that the fairer sex have now earned their right to equal liberty and freedom with their brothers, and that a long overdue reward has at last been partially granted them? Not a word about mothers and sisters! But what can be expected of them when they have only just decided to include women members in their Foreign Missions Committee? "Woman what have we to do with thee?" Very little. Still, they are concentrating their attention on the Report of the Divorce Commission. So one may look out for a "star" programme at the next annual chin-wag.

Another point which is troubling them is the Military Service Act. A report on this question "dealing with the relation of ministers to the man power of the nation received anxious and careful discussion at considerable length." One might have been quite sure of that, though they could find no time to deal with "such a 'live' subject as Education" which "had to be passed with little more than a glance." No wonder intelligent people are forsaking the pews! However, the topic of military service led to a discussion over the phrasing of the statement that "the Synod does not approve the exemption of ministers of religion from military service" (italics in the original). The resulting vote decided by a majority of one only, to delete the words italicized! Verily a concession to the public opinion of those parents whom they have taken to task for minding their own business in their own ways. But there is still a ray of hope for some of them, for "the Y.M.C.A. were anxious at present for twenty-five men who would sign for a year or till the duration of the War." It is to be hoped that there wasn't a crush, and that the queue didn't cause any public annoyance—or hilarity.

A correspondent in the same issue throws an interesting side-light on the peculiar patriotic conscience of some ministers and their employers. He says:—

> The Synod has adopted the policy of putting moral pressure upon the younger ministers of the Church in order that they may join the Army. At the same time, the Synod has adopted the policy of welcoming ministers of military age coming from other denominations, and placing them in positions left vacant by the absence of our own patriotic men on National Service.

What a fine example of contemptible Christian tactics? One might make allowances for a cute layman on the same dodge—but parsons! When will sensible people, with Shakespeare, insist and demand that these black-coated fraternity shall "Avaunt and quit our sights"?

Presbyterians have not yet risen above the level of savages in their conception of Deity. He is still the Big Man of the Universe—with back parts in proportion. He has a personality as distinctive as any Tom, Dick, or Harry. He must exist only some five miles off, for "clouds and darkness are round about Him." This, however, may only be figurative, though to suggest that that he, also, is imaginary would be profane. He revels in blood just like a tiger or a spider, so it is not likely that he is going to make any attempt to stop the slaughter here below. He is a spectator on high, and, doubtless, enjoys the carnage. Still, the boys, "Somewhere in France," may be comforted to know that theirs is a—

> Sacrifice fulfilling what God saith
> Of need of blood to cancel human guilt.

In case there may be another interpretation the poem is appended herewith:—

> The Red Thread of Worship.
> Abel received it in the hand of Faith,
> And Heaven's Fire confirmed his offering:
> And, through the four millenniums following,
> The Chosen Race held fast the Scarlet Thread,
> In Sacrifice fulfilling what God saith
> Of need of blood to cancel human guilt,
> So the red life of Offerings was spilt.
> Until God's Lamb hung on the Cross-tree dead,
> Still the Red Sign fills our Faith's hand to-day,
> Christ's precious Blood our plea whene'er we prey.

Just exactly what it all means God only knows. One may hazard a guess based on some not too pleasant reminiscences of childhood, but that is all, though one perceives a belief in the Adam and Eve myth together with the absurd Biblical chronology of a six-thousand year old earth. It is a typical specimen of prehistoric numbo-jumbo couched in a weird rigmarole of modern clerical jargon.

Enough. There is plenty of room for reconstruction now without waiting until the end of the War. When it does come these pious hussies will have to give a very convincing account of their stewardship, and answer for that of their Heavenly Father also.

"Z."

Wrapped up in gray cloud-garments,
The great Gods sleep together;
I hear their thunder-snoring,
And to-night we've dreadful weather.

Dreadful weather! what a tempest
Around the weak ship raves!
Ah, who will check the storm-wind,
Or curb the lordless wave?

Can't be helped though, if all nature
A mad holiday is keeping;
So I'll wrap me up and slumber
As the Gods above are sleeping.

Obituary.

On August 1 Mr. Henry Harrison, age sixty-six, gilder and bootmaker, for thirty years resident in Marylebone, passed away after a long and painful illness, which was softened by the constant and tender care of a loving wife and family—all Freethinkers. He was a zealous supporter of the late Messrs. Bradlaugh and Foote, and the present Editor of the Freethinker. Deceased was interred at Willesden Cemetery on August 6. A Secular Burial Service was read. He was respected and beloved by all who knew him.—E. D.

Atheism.

It is a safe game to misrepresent Atheism. Comparatively speaking, it has few friends, and it is blessed with a large number of active enemies. Hardly one in a hundred of its enemies are scrupulous in finding out what Atheism really is, and the remaining ninety-nine are only too anxious to discover occasions for misrepresentations. And these are not easily removed. There is seldom opportunity given to correct them in the places where they occur; a paper such as the Freethinker is the only channel of correction open, and this reaches but few of those who read the original misrepresentation. It is, thus, a safe game. It is also a cowardly game. To misstate an opinion that enjoys popular favour is wrong; but the wrong is soon righted, and one runs the risk of exposure. But there is no risk in misstating Atheism. You may deny it every decent quality, endow it with the capacity for producing every conceivable vice, and make it as mentally stupid as it is made morally obnoxious. The overwhelming majority of those who read will either agree with it as a statement of fact, or feel that Atheism deserves all that has been said. That is why it is a cowardly game. A sense of chivalry might lead one to refrain from throwing a brick at an unpopular opinion A nice sense of honour would insist upon careful examination before attack. But where religion is concerned honour and chivalry rarely count.

The Myth of a Religious "Faculty."

This is not an appeal ad misericordiam. We are not asking that people should not attack Atheism, or suggesting that it cannot survive misrepresentation. Atheism has always been subject to both, and has survived them. It has more than survived; it has grown. Its position to-day is not reminescent of past greatness; it is pregnant with the possibilities of assured growth. We are writing solely in view of the common religious plea that the Atheist is what he is, because he is lacking in some religious "faculty," or deficient in a religious "sentiment" possessed by the pious. And that is pure myth. There is no such thing as a religious "faculty." There is no such thing as a religious sentiment, or even religious feelings. Wonder and awe and veneration and faith and belief are not religious qualities, they never were religious qualities, and they can never become so. They may be exercised in connection with religion, but so may love and hatred and cruelty and kindness and cleverness and stupidity. Human qualities are human qualities, and their nature is quite unaffected by the object in connection with which they find expression. A sunrise on the Alps, or a storm at sea, may awaken all the veneration and awe that a mystically drunken godite feels in the contemplation of the character of his incomprehensible deity. Religion does not initiate a single feeling, it does not absolutely control a single feeling. It only utilizes feelings developed apart altogether from religion.

The Nature of Religion.

There is no religious sentiment, there is only a religious idea. And even that has not become an "element of our nature." There is a religious idea because, as one writer remarks, "Surrounded by the forces of nature which he could neither comprehend nor control," natural forces "became for uncritical man superior animate beings whom he endowed with qualities like his own, whose favour was to be courted and whose wrath appeased." It is this idea, born of primitive ignorance, that is perpetuated by primitive fear and subsequent cunning. It has persisted through the ages, but even as an idea it has not become an element of our nature—ideas never do become that. What has happened is that it has become a permanent factor—up to the present—in the social environment. It is there when each newcomer arrives, and each newcomer is taught to express his feelings in a form consonant with the religious idea. The perpetuation of religion is a phenomenon of social heredity. So is the phenomenon of loyalty to a king. And one might, with just as much scientific warranty, when he sees a crowd cheering the passage of the king, say that loyalty to the king has become an element of human nature, and that cosmic evolution had as one of its supreme objects the creation of a feeling of devotion to George the Fifth. It is the social environment that perpetuates the religious idea, and it is the gradual weakening of the religious idea that is steadily bringing about such a modification of the environment as makes Atheism practically inevitable.

"Hath Not a Jew Eyes?"

The difference between the Atheist and the Christian is, so to speak, not one of matter, but of form. They both get pleased or angry, they both laugh or cry, they both have faith—of a kind—belief, reverence for greatness in human nature, and a feeling of awe in face of natural phenomena. The Atheist differs from the Theist in no quality of mind or body; the difference lies in the way in which the nature of each is expressed. Belief is not a consequence of inability of the intellect to find natural causes; it is rather a degree of knowledge that falls short of absolute certitude. And it is common to both Theist and Atheist. The difference, again, lies in the object of belief. The Theist posits a God as the cause of natural happenings. The Atheist declines to use such a synonym for ignorance, and prefers to believe that, as natural causes have explained all the phenomena, the conditions of which we know, the same will be found true of phenomena whose conditions are unknown. Of course, it is flattering to the vanity of the believer in God to assume that the Atheist is one whose finer qualities and perceptions are either undeveloped or atrophied. It enables any Bible-banging, microcephalous local preacher to feel exalted without undergoing the toil and discipline of becoming genuinely so. In moments of compassion they will pity the poor Atheist, and, when specially sympathetic, will condole with him on his spiritual blindness. But there is really nothing in it. The Atheist laughs at both the pity and the condolence. It is not worth while being angry. He knows that the belief in God is not a frame of mind that people grow toward; it is a frame of mind they outgrow. The Atheist knows this, because he has been there. He sees in a believer a picture of himself in an earlier and less complete state of development. The sympathy of the believer with the Atheist is that of the blind man for the one who is put to the trouble of wearing spectacles. The Atheist has lost nothing of his human qualities in growing out of them. He has merely learned to look at things with a clearer and truer gaze, and face facts with a courage born of undimmed vision.

Who are the Materialists?

Of course, there is the cant about the Atheist's neglect of "spiritual" matters. But unless "spiritual" is used as a synonym for "supernatural," it is pure camouflage. If we may use the word without being misunderstood, the Atheist is more concerned with spiritual matters than is the Theist. His whole life is devoted to an idea. He cannot hope to gain the material for "animal pleasures" by professing Atheism. If he thought that, he would be too stupid to ever leave church or chapel. He is daily made aware of paying some price for the rejection of religion, and if Atheism were of no other value to the world than this, the possession of a body of men who place devotion to an idea first, without any possibility of material gain, is a social asset of the greatest possible value. And what the Christian means by "spiritual" matters—that is, supernatural matters—has always tended to the encouragement of a decided, ethical Materialism. It has taught men to estimate the value of truth in terms of material loss and gain. If the personal gain was not here, it was hereafter. And when, as was inevitable, faith in the hereafter began to waver, the same standard was applied to the present life. This is one reason why the most "materialistic" people in the civilized world are Christian. It is one reason why we in this country are so given to measure our greatness in terms of fighting strength or trading returns. A nation is great because it sells or slaughters, or sells and slaughters, not because it thinks and lives. And, as a consequence, we see the millionaire idealized and the thinker ignored; the dead plutocrat loaded with columns of an admiring obituary, and the dead philosopher dismissed with a contemptuous sneer. It is also why so many shallow-pated pietists are able to write disparagingly of a frame of mind of which Samuel Taylor Coleridge said not one man in ten thousand had either the strength of mind or goodness of character to possess.

"Our Holy Mother Church."

II.

CHRISTIAN apologists assure us that the fourteenth century was noted for its exceptional advance in learning, culture, and art. The Rev. J. K. Mozley, in his Achievements of Christianity (p. 48), asserts that "discoveries and advances in mathematics and mechanical science were made in it which were to be the forerunners of modern teaching." That is true; but Mr. Mozley does not inform us that those discoveries and advances were made in spite of the stubborn opposition of the Church. His statement that "very wide latitude was allowed to thinkers like Duns Scotus and William of Ockham" is utterly false concerning the latter, and not true of the former, who was profoundly orthodox in theology. William of Ockham was a Revolutionist, whose teaching was anathematized by the Pope. He was arraigned at Avignon, and in close custody, for his audacious opinions. He stood in imminent danger of being burned at the stake, a fate that had befallen so many of his brethren. He fled to the court of Louis of Bavaria. Is not Mr. Mozley aware that he was denounced as a heretic and schismatic, and sentenced to deprivation of all privileges and to perpetual imprisonment? But at the Bavarian Court, William could afford to laugh to scorn and defy such idle terrors. It is true, however, that during the fourteenth century, a strong wave of anti-clericalism was moving over Christendom, and that its last decade was darkened by the great Papal Schism. There was a well-nigh universal disposition to ridicule ecclesiastical claims. Even in England the clergy no longer enjoyed their ancient privileges. Their immunity from the civil courts was largely a thing of the past. Archbishop Langham "complained in Parliament that the civil authorities had not scrupled to arrest, indict, even to condemn to public execution clerics and regulars in holy orders." The immunity so ardently believed in and advocated at such terrible cost by Becket in the twelfth century, had thus been surrendered with reluctance, not because the Church's belief in it was weakened, but because it could no longer enforce it. This is how Wilkins puts it:—

> The king and the magistrates, on the other hand, complained that when such persons, so found guilty of the most flagitious crimes (such cases seem to have been very common), were given up on demand to their Bishops, they were negligently guarded, and so pampered in prison, that it was a place of comfort and enjoyment rather than of penance. Some were allowed to escape, some discharged on slight evidence. They returned to their old courses, and were of bad example to unoffending clergymen.

In Scotland the anti-papal feeling was stronger still. Pope John XXII. undertook the task of mediating between the two countries; but Robert Bruce would not even receive his letters except on condition that he was addressed by the title of king. It is even stated that Bruce simply laughed at the Pope's excommunication, and that his partisans waylaid and plundered the papal nuncios near Durham.

It is well known that Edward II. was morally worthless, and a deplorably feeble monarch. But he was a loyal son of the Church, and the Pope treated him as if he were a child. Being poor he could not afford to pay the tribute of 1,000 marks to the Vatican, but John told him that not to pay it was an offence against God, for which he would be cast into hell-fire when he died. Milman says that the Pope was on the king's side simply "in order to secure the tribute of the land, the Peter's Pence, and other convenient emoluments of the See of Rome." Under Edward III. and Richard II. there was a popular reaction against the Church. The Archbishop of Canterbury was charged with high treason. He fled from Lambeth to Canterbury, and at the latter place he had the courage to excommunicate his accusers with bell, book, and candle. On his return to London he sought refuge, cross in hand, in the House of Lords. Here was the Primate of England, the highest dignitary of the English Church, in the hands of the civil power; and when the quarrel was settled he had to accept pardon from, rather than condescendingly to grant it to, the King. Thus the tables were being slowly turned with a vengeance.

Of course, in spirit the Church was as tyrannical and intolerant as ever. John Wycliffe was born, of humble parents, in the year 1327. His ambition was to become a scholar, for which purpose he was admitted into Queen's College, and later removed to Merton. Merton was already famous as the scene of the marvellous logic-grinding displays of Duns Scotus, the celebrated Realist, and chief opponent of Thomas Aquinas, of the remarkable mathematical and scientific studies of Roger Bacon, known on the Continent as the "Wonderful Doctor," and also, probably, of William of Ockham, the great Rationalist of his century; and one is not surprised to find that, educated at an institution with such a history, Wycliffe, too, turned out to be a heretic of the first magnitude. On the retirement of Bradwardine, he was appointed Master of Balliol College. Ere long he published a tract, entitled The Last Age of the Church, in which he violently attacked the clergy, the simoniacs, and the holders of rich benefices. Then followed his merciless denunciation of the Mendicant Friars, who swarmed over the whole land. These attacks won popular favour, and even the lower clergy enthusiastically approved of them. But it was the treatise known as The Kingdom of God, in which he maintained that the King was as truly God's Vicar as the Pope, and that every man had the right of free and direct access to God, that kindled the Church's ire against Wycliffe. This became the most famous of all his works, because it contained his exposition of the nature and functions of society, his theory of Church and State as two distinct institutions, the one dealing exclusively with spiritualities, the other with temporalities, and his scathing exposure of a mediating priesthood which was the foundation upon which the mediæval Church rested. In fact, his conception of the Church was essentially heretical, and his passionate condemnation of the extortion and tyranny exercised by Rome galled the ecclesiastical authorities to the quick. As a matter of fact, the taxes levied by the Pope were five times higher than those levied by the King. Wycliffe's crime consisted in holding up to ridicule the wicked rapacity of the Church, and he was summoned to answer for it before Bishop Courtenay, of London. He appeared before the tribunal, and by his side stood John of Gaunt and the Earl Marshal. There was an enormous concourse of people, but the heretic's trial did not come off. The Bishop and the two noblemen had a quarrel, in which the crowd took part. A fierce riot ensued, in which a priest was killed. A papal bull was issued against Wycliffe, directing the University to condemn and arrest him. He vigorously defended himself, and succeeded in winning the support both of the people and of the Crown. A few months later he appeared at Lambeth Chapel, in answer to the Archbishop's summons; but here, again, no trial took place. An angry throng overawed the prelates in session, and a message from the Court put a stop to the proceedings. Walsingham, the historian, indignantly denounced the cowardice of the frightened judges, saying:—

> They were as reeds shaken by the wind, became soft as oil in their speech, to the discredit of their own dignity and the degradation of the Church. Panic-stricken they were, as men that hear not, as those in whose mouth is no reproof.

Yes, in spirit the Church of the fourteenth century was as intolerant and believed as firmly in persecution as ever; but in England it lacked the requisite courage to be true to itself because the trend of thought and feeling was antagonistic to it. As time went on, Wycliffe's heresies multiplied until they embraced most of the doctrines of the Church as well as its interference in Secular affairs. Strangely enough, even now the Church was afraid to bring him to trial. When Convocation met at Oxford, Wycliffe was called to answer on but one of all the dogmas he so uncompromisingly rejected, and though on the Eucharist his condemnation was a matter of course, yet no punishment was meted out to him. He was allowed to go quietly into retirement at Lutterworth, where he continued his onslaughts upon the Papacy and all its works. England was on his side because it had lost faith in Mother Church. Mother Church hated him with perfect hatred, but was too timid even to insist upon his imprisonment, well knowing that its supremacy in England was nearing its end.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Wittiest Book in the World.

> Of all the intellectual weapons which have ever been wielded by man, the most terrible was the mockery of Voltaire.
> —Macaulay.

THE name of Voltaire has ever been a terror to Christians, and, with the exception of Thomas Paine, none has been more hated, none more reviled. The reason is simple. A very great writer, a master of words, Voltaire attacked Christianity, not in the dry-as-dust fashion of professors writing for a dozen superior folk scattered throughout the world, but with wit and pleasantry which survive the winnowing-fan of time. He made bigots and tyrants appear ridiculous as well as odious, and those who felt the lash of his deadly satire denounced him as a literary Mephistopholes, whose writings all the faithful should avoid as they would a plague.

It is only dull people who associate brilliancy with superficiality, and imagine that, because a man is witty, he must therefore be shallow. "Without it is based on seriousness, said Henri Heine, wit is only a sneeze of the reason. The soundness of Voltaire's judgment was only equalled by his felicity of expression. A book might be written on his anticipation of modern thought. He accepted the view of man's savage origin. He derived the belief in ghosts from dreams, and discerned the magical nature of early religion. He anticipated many of the social and political problems of our time. A pioneer among pioneers, he stated the population question before Malthus, and he cleared the way for modern science.

Voltaire was thoroughly equipped for his work. A perfect artist in language, he wrote with that ease with which a bird trills out his song. His versatility, too, was marvellous. "Monsieur Multiform" was his witty name for D'Alembert, and he himself had an equal right to it. In the eighty volumes of his collected works, he has proved his genius as historian, poet, essayist, thinker, humourist, tale-teller, letter-writer, and critic. So strong is his appeal to literary men that Macaulay, one of the most Catholic of readers and a most acute critic, selected Voltaire's works for his reading on his lengthy sea-voyage to India. A glance at Voltaire's life work proves his unparalleled and untiring industry. Writing Œdipus at seventeen, Irene at eighty-three, he crowded between these two masterpieces the accomplishment of a Titan.

Among Voltaire's works, Candide is the most characteristic. Nowhere has he displayed to such advantage the happiest features of his extraordinary genius. It is not only his masterpiece, but the wittiest book in the world. Frankly, the English translations cannot be said to add to Voltaire's charm for anyone who reads French with ease. In the journey from one language to another, so much of the master's sprightliness and piquancy are lost. For, remember, such translations were often entrusted to publishers' hacks, although those astute tradesmen professed to employ "eminent hands."

In this little masterpiece Voltaire brought out all his batteries at once. He faced the foe with that terrible mockery, that bantering jest, and that deadly levity which few could meet and live. It was occasioned by the news of the awful horrors of the dreadful earthquake at Lisbon, in which the greater part of the city was destroyed, and 40,000 of the inhabitants killed. The news roused Voltaire like the blare of many trumpets. Moved as he always was to reproduce his strongest feelings in his writings he wrote Candide. This time Voltaire did not argue; he merely exposed. In the searching fire of his irony the comfortable dogmas of the optimists blackened and died, and the "Sunny Jims" were shown forth the laughing-stock of the nations.

Candide's wit is as facetious to-day as when it was written. It still trips and dances on untiring feet. It reads like the fresh and unflagging work of superabundant youth. Yet Voltaire was actually sixty-four when he wrote it—an age when most men are thinking of slippered ease. The story is, briefly, that of a young man brought up in the belief that this is the best of all possible worlds. He meets with a hundred adventures which give it the lie. Life is a bad bargain, but one can make the most of it. That is the moral of Candide. "What I know," says the hero, "is that we must cultivate our garden." In the last resort be it noted, Voltaire's philosophy was Secularistic. The book is a mass of seeming extravagance with a deep vein of gold beneath. All flows so smoothly, the reader fancies it was lightly written. Yet when he notices how every stroke of wit adds to the effect, how every light touch tells, he sees that only a most consummate genius could thus dissect a philosophy and amuse men in the process.

Of Voltaire's irony, here is a specimen. When Candide was to be punished as a deserter from the Army, we read:—

> He was asked which he would like the best, to be whipped six-and-thirty times through all the regiment, or to receive at once twelve bullets in the brain. He vainly said that human will is free, and that he chose neither the one nor the other. He was forced to make a choice; he determined, in virtue of that gift of God called liberty, to run the gauntlet six-and-thirty times.

Voltaire has been dead nearly a century and a half, and still his name is a symbol of liberty. Englishmen owe him more than compliments, for he built himself largely on British Freethought, and wrote good English to the last whenever he would. Protestants never forgive him for exposing the myth of the Pentateuch a century before Colenso forced them to recognize it; and Catholics never forgive him for branding their Church with the infamies recorded under the martyr-names of Calas and Sirven. Thomas Carlyle well says: "He gave the death-stab to modern superstition." That horrid incubus, which dwelt in darkness, shunning the light, is passing away, with all its racks and poison chalices, and foul sleeping-draughts, is passing away without return. It was a most weighty service.

Mimnermus.

Christianity and Cleanliness.

Sir,—Gratefully to acknowledge the benefit which, selfishly I fear, I sought for when I offered to start this discussion, it seemed plain that if we could concentrate on discovering points of agreement under apparent disagreement, we should clear away from the brain some of that fog which Lowell aptly described in speaking of the Germans long before the War. He said the Germans were people "who looked upon fog as an illuminating medium," indicating their habits of cloudy thinking. Your comments, I find, are a help in the arduous and lengthy task of "packing" the clouds away of which we all have a wisp or two in our craniums.

Before passing on from the subject with which we started, and which, of course, we must not try to exhaust, I will just note the points where I fancy some mistiness broods. You question the relevancy of my bringing in the last 150 years on the ground that you never implied there was a necessary connection between Christianity and dirt. Of course, I am very glad to be told this; but let us note carefully whither your admission leads us. Granting that a great revival of Christianity was coincident with a revival of cleanliness, you suggest that the change in the habits of Christians may "well be attributed to the influence of those forces that have brought a modification of Christian teaching in other directions," that is to say, external forces, so that no credit for the result is due to Christianity or to Christian teaching. (I should agree that the forces alluded to are generally thought of as external to Christianity, and, perhaps, antagonistic to it; but if they produced so fair a result as a revival of cleanliness, I should say they were the action or message of God himself, whether Christian or not. But this is neither here nor there for the present). Well, ought we not to apply the same principle to the introduction of dirt? Is it fair to attribute a great cleansing of Christian teaching to the power of external forces, so as to debar Christians from all credit or share in the same, and, in the same breath, to assume that the defilement of Christian teaching in earlier centuries was due, not to external forces, but to the perversity of Christians themselves. Is this not to fix a responsibility upon them for their wrongheadedness, but to deny it them in respect of their sound thinking? I think we should hold them equally responsible, or irresponsible, for the degraded asceticism of Stylites, or the lofty teaching about the human body given by Wesley, Pusey, Church, or a thousand others. Notice, too, it is especially difficult to acquiesce in your diagnosis when we reflect that if external forces were strong enough to do the healing they were surely strong enough to accomplish the degrading of the Christians. Or, conversely, if Christianity was so receptive to outside influences that it worked its own cleansing—a most difficult and painful process always—how can we suppose that the same receptivity did not account for the introduction of the poison? That, in other words, the poison was alien—not home-grown.

But, if we don't take care, we shall plunge our four feet into the noose which Clio loves to spread about her beguiling pastures. We could dispute eternally about what happened long ago. I come, then, to the question you put in these words: "In a society in which Christianity is only one of many factors, what part has it played in social life and teaching?" Because this question rests upon a certain assumption to the discussion of which we have been more than once drawing near. The assumption is that if you can prove that certain doctrines seem to have been so preached as to cause mischief you may safely conclude the doctrines are false. (I put in the word "seem" because we must be content with a balance of probabilities. The subject is too great to admit of mathematical evidence).

Perhaps you would demur to the words "safely conclude" and "false," and would prefer "there must be a strong presumption that there is a poisonous or erroneous mixture in those doctrines." That will do equally well. You mean, obviously, that Christianity is to be condemned, and that the above is a main and important reason.

I grant at once that it is exceedingly difficult for any one of us not to condemn a religion if its votaries preach in its name doctrines which subsequently seem to spread discomfort about the earth's surface. So difficult, indeed, that we all of us cease to struggle against the tendency. But if we are right in this, we shall be equally right in applying the same test to other great doctrines not specifically religious. I have already given Radicalism as an instance. Take Patriotism too. When purely taught and faithfully practised, what more beautiful? But lo! along with its loftiest manifestations there is the hideous counterfeit. I don't mean the rascally profiteer, but the man who goes about saying we are fighting for international honour and brotherhood and unselfishness, and so forth, and yet will not even discuss the project of a League of Nations for fear Great Britain will find herself called upon to renounce her exclusive hold on some choice piece of territory. That is his one article of political faith, and all his professions are rank humbug. But that makes no difference to our belief in true Patriotism. Why, then, do we apply a much severer test to religion?

I think I know the reason. It is contained in the old maxim, Corruptio optimi pessima. That is to say, as true religion is a higher thing than even pure Patriotism, or disinterested Radicalism, so its degraded counterfeit is the most baneful and abominable thing that can anywhere be hit upon by any pilgrim between the cradle and the grave; and when one of us does hit upon it, he naturally says, "Away with it! Away with everything that helped to give this monstrous thing birth!" That, I take it, is your attitude towards religion generally; and I feel a cordial sympathy with it because I have spent years of my life in acting upon this very principle: in believing in denunciation and abolition and purging, and the like. That belief it was that attracted me to your newspaper in the first instance.

But now I see reason to pause and reflect. Our attitude towards Patriotism and Radicalism is surely sound and sensible. If we justify ourselves for taking a wholly different attitude towards religion by saying—as I suppose we must say—that religion, however pure, is such a mean thing that it must be put out of court in comparison with the others, we are certainly begging the question. We are fairly embarked on a discussion which now comes to this: What is Religion; and, in particular, Christianity? Does it merit more halfpence than kicks, or vice versa?

Let me say in passing that technically I beg the question above; but I am sure that it does not vitiate the argument, being only on a side issue, and that we are fairly brought to the point indicated. But before going further I must wait to see if you agree with my statement of our inconsistency of mind, and whether you can produce any better defence of it than I have suggested.

E. Lyttelton.

On Cessnock Banks.

July, 1918.

The Cessnock is one of Ayrshires' classic streams, and characteristic of them all. It was the scene, as per above title, of one of the less known songs of Burns, and concerning, of course, a maid, and one who had

.....twa glancin' sparklin' e'en.

The spirit of Burns breathes in those sylvan river valleys, for is it not the spirit of Nature itself? This spirit is perhaps not so evident in the men of Ayrshire—least of all, perhaps in those pillars of its county State, Church, and Society; the backbone, indeed, but not the soul, of Ayr. Oh, no; not yet. Some extreme specimens of this ruling class are quite transcendently, pompously, and piously materialistic; full of satisfied superiority, invulnerable stupidity, and tranquil, imbecile egotism. The writer has sketched them from life, and on the spot and elsewhere, and knows the genus is not peculiar to the Land of Burns. Behold, is it not all written in the (still unread) chronicles of heredity and environment, and resulting psychology!

On that other 22nd of July (1796), when "the sufferings of this great but ill-fated genius were terminated, and a life was closed in which virtue and passion had been at perpetual variance," it would seem as though the departing poet had wrapped the mournful mantle of his muse about him, leaving no shred or tassel for succeeding shoulders, but giving his soul to Nature only, which, in the requiem of the wind in the woods and the lullaby of the streams, repeats the eternal music of his name.

Some such thought occurred to the writer as he rested lately on "Cessnock Banks," which he had made a turning-point in what was to have been a more extended pilgrimage. But it was enough. There was the usual overhanging sandstone cliff festooned with tree and tendril, grass and flower, and fern, and ivy, all creeping things, and cunningly ensconced and clinging there, little nameless tufts and weeds, the "hanging gardens" of Fairyland! The trees met overhead and canopied the dappled amber pool and whispering pebbled strand.

The roadway (Kilmarnock-Mauchline) intersects the glen, and crosses on one single lofty arch embowered in clustering sprays. From the vantage ground of the bridge a striking view is obtained of the nearer grove, where rising among some more plebeian timber there towers a noble sycamore, and, beyond that, as in some inner sacred precinct, are seen the columnar tops of two rival chestnuts, each stirring gently in a stately way, or grandly, solemnly, augustly, still—the very majesty of the woods, the aristocracy of the arboreal world, a rich and regal, soothing, satisfying scene.

Much water has flowed under the bridge in that hundred years or so. The "youthful ash" will be an "aged tree." It is a pleasing reverie and a worshipful Mecca. It empties the pew and fills the mind. Here one forgets heaven, and remembers only this dear, delightful, beautiful, old earth. One bestrides the wheel again, and moves reluctantly away, and casts a longing lingering look behind!

Some people are evidently under the impression that if a thing is said often enough it will come true. Or, perhaps, it is evidence of the conviction that repetition will lead many to believe it is true. At any rate, here is Dr. Clifford still talking about the "great religious revolution" that is taking place. We believe it to be true that little short of a revolution is taking place in connection with religion, but we are certain that there is a wide difference in what we and Dr. Clifford mean by the phrase. He means that people are getting more religious, and we are quite certain that they are markedly less so. During the past four years we have had hundreds of letters from men who have become definitely non-religious since the outbreak of War. How many could be shown to have changed the other way about since August, 1914?

Digitized by Google

Dr. Clifford says: "The conviction is deepening in mens' minds that the ultimate victory in this War will come to the nation or nations that have the highest and truest moral, and are lifted to a higher phase of being." But this is mere words. What connection has it with religion, as Dr. Clifford understands it? All he says is that character will tell in the long run. And that is the message of Secularism. What he implies is that the nation will win which believes most fervently in God and a future life, and the numerous fables that go to make up Christianity. And people have not lost sight of the fact that it is nations saturated with these beliefs which have created conditions that have brought about the present catastrophe.

Priests may coo like doves, but they often display the wisdom of serpents. Father Bernard Vaughan, in a recent sermon, declared that "the root-principle of Christianity is the worth and dignity of man." Indeed! Priests like nothing better than to see men on their knees, confessing themselves miserable sinners.

Oh, those journalists! Referring to "Remembrance Day," a London daily paper declared that "the whole British Army in France has to-day joined in prayer and thanksgiving..... these services were attended by enormous congregations." Hush! Not a word about compulsory Church Parades.

The pious Town Council of Southend-on-Sea has introduced hymns in the Sunday concerts given by the military bands. The public still have to pay the Amusement tax.

A verdict of "felo-de-se" was returned at Manchester on the Rev. Bramwell Brown, a Wesleyan minister, of Workington, who cut his throat. According to the clergy, only Athelsts take their own lives.

The President of the Wesleyan Conference declares that "Grip in the pulpit and glow in the Church were the best preparations for the future." In the past Wesleyans laid more stress on the "grip" of Satan and the "glow" of Hades.

The other Sunday evening a lecture was delivered on "The Angels: their Past, Present, and Future." Their mission in each of those three periods was also most minutely and graphically described. And, strange to say, the lecturer was not an angel, but a mere man who had never seen an angel.

The English Government's neglect of scientific education is notorious, and the Christian World puts its fingers on one of the causes of this when it says that our "sectarianized education" has been "a costly luxury." It is also the truth that "a large proportion of our rate-supported schools have been conducted in the interests of Churches rather than in the interests of national education." The Christian World might have added "chapels" to Churches, for when it comes to education they are all vitally concerned with the same thing. It was the Nonconformists who "sold the pass" in 1870, and they have shown small tendency since to better their record. The surprising thing is that the C. W. does not see that the only way to end this "costly luxury" is for the State to confine itself to the business of Secular Education and leave religion to those who want it.

A bold (and expensive) advertisement in a daily paper asks for 20,000 musical instruments which are needed by 2,000 Young Men's Christian Association huts as a means of entertainment. In earlier days Christians were concerned with the question of harps—in the next world.

The ancients had a wise saying that when two augurs met they could not avoid smiling. Present-day parsons do not often smile, but they understand one another. Speaking on the Sunday recreation question, Father Adderley said that many Christians objected to anything other than going to Church or Chapel. A palpable hit!

The much-trumpeted revival of religion is still conspicuous by its absence. Perhaps the following information may comfort the faithful in their distress. "For the first time," says the Daily Chronicle, "there was at noon a period of silent meditation and prayer for the victories of the Allies by members of the Stock Exchange."

Why cannot the divines leave the War alone? Preaching at St. Paul's recently, Canon Newbolt admitted that "if war is in itself immoral and wrong, God could never have ordered it, as he did in the Old Testament." Consequently, war is not in itself immoral and wrong, and it is certain that God has ordered the present War in order to punish the rapacity of Germany. It is a judicial catastrophy, "and God is obliged to allow it." Curiously enough, however, God is not directly in it, but stands on one side and lets his "outraged laws avenge themselves." What ineffable piffle!

If Canon Newbolt's teaching is true, the Germans were justified in entering upon this War, as fully justified as the Israelites were in their war of extermination against the Canaanites. Jehovah acted as Israel's avowed Ally in wars of sheer aggression, and the Kaiser claims him as his avowed Ally to-day. The German Emperor is as firm a believer in the inspiration of the Old Testament as the Canon; and judging by analogies, the Lord is even more likely to be on the German side than on ours. Thus, on the reverend gentleman's own showing, his teaching on God's relation to the War, lands him in an awkward quandary, from which there is absolutely no escape except by way of Atheism.

At the meeting of the Commission of the U.F. Church of Scotland in Edinburgh last week, exception was taken to the provision in the Education Bill whereby religious bodies were to have power to call upon the Education Authority to put down new schools when they had a certain number of children belonging to their Church. The Rev. Geo. Smart, Dundee, said they should move for the deletion of this obnoxious clause, which would put a most dangerous weapon into the hands of any religious denomination. The Rev. Dr. Jordan, Greenock, said the way out of all this was that the State should take charge of secular teaching, letting the Churches manage the religious teaching. The other members agreed that this was the proper solution. This has been the contention of Freethinkers for years and years. Only another instance of the old saying, "When rogues fall out, honest men get their due."

The Churchman's Union sends out a four-page leaflet, which contains a curious illustration of the mentality of the modern Christian. Defining the attitude of the Union in relation to Christian beliefs, it says: "We labour to secure such modifications as may save them from openly contradicting the knowledge of our time; and meanwhile we ask for such liberty of interpretation as may save a large part of the educated laity from being alienated from the Church." In plain English, the Churchman's Union is willing to surrender anything that cannot be retained, and to favour any kind of interpretation of Christianity that will keep people within the Church. The undisguised opportunism of the confession is delightful.

A new book bears the alluring title, God and Tommy Atkins. We wonder if the author blushed to make the association.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has been preaching on "Patience," basing his remarks on the text, "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us." Unfortunately, the clergy themselves are non-starters in this race.

Even the clergy are beginning to have doubts as to the robust "Atheism" of the Germans. The Rev. R. F. Horton, writing in the Daily News, declares: "We know that there are German Christians (the manfesto of the Lutheran pastors shows it) who long, as we do, to set the kingdom of God, with its mercy and love and righteousness, above merely national claims."

To Correspondents.

P. HOWELL.—Sorry we have not space to spare for what we are sure would prove a long discussion on the social and philosophical aspects of Anarchism.

DOZO.—Thanks for suggestion. We are already trying to organize something on the lines you suggest; so you will see we consider your plan a good one.

GLENDALOUGH.—We cannot say how many readers we have in Ireland. All do not order direct from the office. Have noted your suggestions. Thanks.

"SAPPER."—Pleased you found the parcel of literature so useful. If we could only establish a few literature depots in France, we should "see things."

T. MORLEY.—We are not surprised that the two new subscribers you gained recently feel you have done them a service. Most of our new readers feel that way.

J. E. WITHIFORD.—Sorry you did not receive the parcel of literature sent. It must have been lost—perhaps owing to enemy playfulness. We are sending on another parcel.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges: H. Reeve, 4s.

E. WYATT (Glasgow).—Being attached to other movements is no disqualification for joining the N. S. S. If too busy for active work, membership encourages those already engaged in propaganda. Glad to know that yourself and wife enjoy the Freethinker so much.

C. W. MARSHALL.—Pleased to know that your friend, to whom you are sending the Freethinker, finds it "so refreshing after the tosh of the newspapers," and that he has made quite a lot of converts "among his comrades." Thanks for your help.

L. ANSELL.—We think you will be quite safe in selling the literature in the way indicated.

A. WILDMAN.—Very pleased to learn of the largely-increased circulation of the Freethinker you have secured in Southampton.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We do not think that a paper ever had more loyal supporters than has the Freethinker. When the Government issued its "no return" order we wondered how it would affect our circulation. We are glad to say we are actually printing and selling more copies of the Freethinker without taking back unsold copies, than we printed while they were sent out on sale or return. For this result we have to thank our friends all over the country, and we do thank them most heartily. The fight to keep our head above water grows increasingly hard, but it is made the easier by such splendid support as we are getting. We are doing our best to deserve it, and when the War is over we hope the cause will benefit by the efforts that are now being made.

We have several times commented on the good results springing from our free parcels of literature sent out to the troops. Here is the latest to hand. A parcel was sent to a soldier in France who was evidently unacquainted with our publications. The next we heard of this parcel was a letter from the soldier's father ordering a selection of pamphlets which his son had read with so much interest, and had duly recommended for home consumption. A case of casting one's bread upon the waters.

Common Sense is one of the most useful of present-day weekly papers, but that does not protect it against the pressure of present-day price of paper. Hitherto it has received the blow by reducing its size to one-half, while retaining its original price of one penny. It now announces that from August 31 it is to be twopence. What things will be like if the War continues for another two or three years it is fearsome to contemplate. Perhaps we shall be last again at the stage of the four-page sixpenny paper.

The London County Council is not playing quite fair over the literature permits. The permit for selling the Freethinker was framed very ambiguously, and now Mr. F. Wood and Miss E. M. Vance have been summoned for selling the Freethinker contrary to the regulations. The matter is under discussion, and we trust that the action of the L. C. C. will be found to be based upon a misunderstanding that admits of being easily removed.

The Committee elected at the recent Bridgend meeting of Freethinkers to organize the work in South Wales has arranged for a meeting at the Wyndham Hotel, Bridgend, on Saturday, August 24, at 6 o'clock. We trust there will be a good attendance, and that the meeting will bear good results.

Pontypridd Freethinkers are trying to arrange a visit from Mr. Cohen at an early date, and a meeting of supporters is to be held at the Washington Hotel to-day (August 25), at 6 p.m. We hope that all interested will not fail to attend. The district is a promising one, and it is regrettable to see good soil lying waste for want of a little attention.

We are asked to announce that the Freethinker is regularly on sale, with our other publications, at the Herald League, 94 George Street, Glasgow. Local friends will please note.

Upton Sinclair's Magazine is a "live" production, and from the August issue we take the following description of the religious condition of America:—

> We have a continent, with a hundred million half-educated people, materially prosperous, but spiritually starving; so any man who possesses personality, who looks in any way strange and impressive, or has hunted up old books in a library, and can pronounce mysterious words in a thrilling voice—such a man can find followers. Anybody can do it with any doctrines from anywhere, Persia or Patagonia, Pekin or Pompei. I would be willing to wager that if I cared to come out and announce that I had had a visit from God last night, and to devote such literary and emotional power as I possess to communicating a new revelation, I could have a temple, a university, and a million dollars within five years at the outside. And if at the end of the five years I were to announce that I had played a joke on the world, some one of my followers would convince the faithful that I had been an agent of God without knowing it, and that the leadership had now been turned over to him.

Unfortunately, this description applies to places other than America—Great Britain, for instance.

The Secular Society, Limited, will be issuing shortly a pamphlet by Mr. T. F. Palmer on The Story of the Evolution of Life. Our readers will, we are sure, be glad to have something of Mr. Palmer's in a more permanent form than a Freethinker article.

An examination of the actual facts at once destroys in the most merciless manner all belief in a preordained harmony of the inner and external world.—Helmholtz.

A Search for the Soul.

IX.

IN his essay on Science and Man, Professor Tyndall presents us with a little problem having to do with what some people call the Soul. This reads as follows:—

> A merchant sits complacently in his easy chair, not knowing whether he is sleeping or waking.....A servant enters the room with a telegram, bearing the words, "Antwerp,—Jonas and Co. have failed." Up starts the merchant, wide awake. "Tell James to harness the horses." The servant flies. The merchant descends to the counting-house, dictates letters, and forwards dispatches. He jumps into his carriage, the horses snort, and the driver is soon at the Bank, on the Bourse, and among his commercial friends. Before an hour has elapsed he is again at home, where he throws himself once more into his easy chair with a deep-drawn sigh: "Thank God, I am protected against the worst!"
> This complex mass of action, emotional, intellectual, and mechanical, is evoked by the impact upon the retina of the waves of light coming from a few pencil marks on a bit of paper. We have terror, hope, sensation, calculation, possible ruin, and victory compressed into a moment. What caused the merchant to spring out of his chair? The contraction of his muscles. What made his muscles contract? An impulse of the nerves, which lifted the proper latch, and liberated the muscular power. Whence this impulse? From the centre of the nervous system. But how did it originate there? This is the critical question, to which some will reply that it had its origin in the human soul.....To this question some may ask: "Do not the phenomena point to the existence of a self within the self, which acts through the body as through a skilfully constructed instrument?"

To this last question the answer is, "No; the phenomena do not point to the existence of a self within the self as the originator of the action here described." When we come to consider that we see with the brain and hear with the brain, and that when we are hurt, it is the brain that feels it, there is no need to assume the existence of an immaterial soul to account for the phenomena, more especially as this supposed soul, having no organs or substance, could not see, hear, or feel anything. Hence, since only the cerebral organ sees, feels, and thinks, it is that organ, and no other, which produced all the phenomena. It was the merchant's brain itself (in the part called the "visual sensorium") that read the telegram, and caused (through the motor nerves) his muscles to contract as he sprang to his feet. It was his instantaneous reflection of his pecuniary position (in a higher brain centre) that caused him to give the order "harnass the horses"; and it was further reflection (in that centre) which caused him to rapidly take the necessary steps to render his position less disastrous. There was thus no need, nor even any place, for an immaterial soul.

Professor Tyndall's solution of this problem cannot be called wholly satisfactory. He admits, as we have already seen, that he does not know why the molecular activities of the brain should give rise to thought, and apparently for that reason he will not say that such is undoubtedly the case. In summing up, he says:—

> From the side of science all that we are warranted in stating is that the terror, hope, sensation, and calculation of the merchant are physical phenomena produced by, or associated with, the molecular processes set up by waves of light in a previously prepared brain.

As will be perceived, the words I have italicized considerably modify the statement. Again, in his Belfast Address that professor says:—

> We can trace the development of a nervous system, and correlate with it the parallel phenomena of sensation and thought. But we try to soar in a vacuum the moment we seek to comprehend the connection between them.

Thus, though he knew perfectly well that it is the brain (and the energy associated with it) which generate thought, he did not wish to admit the fact until he had discovered the "why." When, however, he comes to the suggestion that the thinker in this problem may be the soul, he says, further on: "Try to mentally visualize this soul as an entity distinct from the body, and the difficulty immediately appears." Just so; but he should have said "difficulties," for they are many. As a matter of fact, any one who tries to "mentally visualize" this supposed soul—that is, who endeavours to conceive it as an immaterial something in the human organism that exists apart from the brain, and possesses the power to think—will find all kinds of difficulties appear. But believers in immortality never do this; they accept the idea without thinking—like a number of baa-lambs. We thus arrive once more at the rational question: "What is the soul?" A dualistic answer to this query is the following which I take from Sir Oliver Lodge's Man and the Universe:—

> By the soul, then, we must mean that part of man which is dissociated from the body at death; that part which distinguishes a living man from a corpse (p. 72).

Whether this statement be correct or not, it is at least something definite. Five minutes before death the body possessed a soul; five minutes after that event the body was soul-less, though none of the relatives present at the death saw anything leave the body. Assuming, then, the existence of a "soul," that so-called "entity" must be invisible. Next, I have to ask: What is it which distinguishes a living man from a corpse? Well, there are many things. All the organs after death are still in the body, but they have ceased to function; the blood which maintained the body in life is still in the arteries, veins, and capillaries, but it has ceased to circulate, and is stagnant; the animal heat, produced by the combustion of food and exercise of the limbs, is now gone; all feeling is likewise gone; finally, all the energy that formerly animated the body and moved the muscles has departed, and has probably been transformed into some other force. In the first stem-cell, and all the other cells from which the body was formed, there was energy as well as matter; and it was this energy, associated with an hereditary influence, which put all the cells or particles of matter in their proper places in the body; it was this energy which caused the various organs of the body to carry on their respective functions, and it was the highest development of this energy, in association with the molecules of the brain, which produced thought. What, now, could a supposed "soul" take from the body? In the first place, it could take away nothing material; it can, therefore, possess no material organ of any kind. We have no evidence whatever of the existence of "spiritual bodies." Paul's idea was that the corpse would be raised from the dead and be given a new body; but this will never take place. There can be no such "spiritual body." It is quite certain that the supposed invisible and immaterial entity called the soul can take nothing from the body—not even energy—for the latter force works through matter and is found only in association with matter; it could not unite with a nonentity. A discarnate soul is a purely imaginary being, and, notwithstanding what Dualists say to the contrary, it can have neither form, substance, nor even existence.

Digitized by Google

The modern idea of a disembodied spirit would seem to have originated by comparing the living man with the corpse. Those acquainted with the former could remember his kindly disposition, his elevation of mind, his animated conversation, his intellect, good temper, ardour, enterprise, and high spirits. All these attributes are gone. Assuming that man is of a dual nature, as taught by the Church, then all those qualities are said to survive and be vested in, or exercised by, his soul or spirit to the end of time. But, as a simple matter of fact, all these activities or attributes were dependent solely upon his material body when all the organs were exercising their functions, more especially those of the brain and nerves. Without a human organism there could be none of the manifestations here named; hence, an immaterial and invisible soul could carry away from the organism, whether alive or dead, nothing whatever. Of this fact there cannot be the smallest shadow of a doubt.

Religious Instruction in Scotland.

The subject of Religious Instruction in the Public Schools of Scotland is again being forced on the people. Taking advantage of the preoccupation of the community in more serious matters, the two principal Churches have combined in getting the subject brought forward, and have been successful in getting the support of several of the Parliamentary representatives.

In the debate on the Scottish Education Bill in Grand Committee, an amendment was moved by Mr. Gulland, making it obligatory to provide religious instruction in all public schools, and to appoint committees to supervise the teaching of the same. The amendment was defeated by a large majority; but not content with this decision, it is now announced that on the Report Stage of the Bill, which is to be taken on October 16, Mr. Whyte and Mr. Gulland suggest the following new clause:—

> Subject to the provisions of Section 68 (Conscience Clause) of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, it shall be the duty of every Education Authority to provide religious instruction in all public schools, primary, intermediate, and secondary, and every Education Authority shall decide as to the time to be given either at the beginning or end of school hours.

When moving the amendment, Mr. Gulland said it was the desire of the Scottish people that religious instruction should be given in school, and, as proof of this contention, said that out of 100,000 parents in Glasgow, only about 100 took advantage of the Conscience Clause. Does Mr. Gulland think this is a fair conclusion? How many more would take advantage of the Clause were it not for the fact that the parents do not wish their children to be victimized? Would Mr. Gulland and his supporters accept the alternative method of learning the desire of the parents, whereby religious instruction would only be given to the children of those parents who expressly stated in writing that religious instruction should be given? This, I think, would be the sure way of knowing the wish of the parents.

Mr. McLeod, Glasgow Central, in supporting the amendment, said "It was absolutely true that there was now an intense religious feeling, he might say religious fervour, throughout Scotland." I wonder if Mr. McLeod could produce any evidence in proof of such a statement. Only the other day a correspondent to a large daily newspaper, signing himself "A Retired Minister," was lamenting the fact that the cleavage between the Church and the working-classes has greatly increased, though all have now got a much better education. He dates this cleavage back to 1872, when Scottish education was taken out of the hands of the Church and placed under the control of the publicly elected School Boards. His contention is that the Protestants made a great mistake in not following the example of the Roman Catholics, who have kept a firm hold of the children; and, as a result, have kept a hold on the parents. At nearly every Presbytery meeting comments are made on the decreased attendance at Sunday-school, and also on the decreased number of baptisms. It would be interesting if Mr. McLeod could let us have the statistics of divorce cases and bigamous marriages, say, for the last ten years, so that we could know whether there has been an increase or decline. Does the religious fervour only exist in the imagination of Mr. McLeod? If the Churches desire to impart religious instruction to their children, why cannot their ministers do so on Saturdays, or any other days, in their own churches, outside day-school hours? Are they afraid the attendances would not be up to the mark? Of late we have heard a great deal about the "hidden hand." This hand seems to have absolute control over the daily press. How many newspapers in the country will publish letters of an anti-religious nature? I know several have been sent by Freethinkers to the leading dailies in Scotland, giving their views on Secular Education in connection with the Scottish Education Bill, but none have appeared; and yet it is our boast that we have a free press.

Now is the time for Freethinkers to let their Parliamentary representatives know their desires regarding religious instruction, and it behoves all Secular Societies and others interested in the matter, to let their voices be heard between now and the middle of October, when no doubt the Churches will do their utmost to get the amendment in question added to the Bill. Freethinker.

The Dark Diamonds of the Earth.

The enormous quantity of energy potentially present in coal is chiefly derived from its carbon constituents. Carbon forms the most abundant element in plants, and this invaluable substance was supplied to the vegetation in Carboniferous Times by the carbon-dioxide contained in the atmosphere in that remote age. Carbon-dioxide, commonly called carbonic acid gas, is a combination of oxygen and carbon, and plants possess the power, by means of their chlorophyll, or green colouring matter, when acted upon by the sun's energy, of separating the oxygen from the carbon. The first of these elements they restore to the atmosphere, while they store the carbon in their tissues. All the light and heat we evolve from the combustion of coal is, in truth, transformed sunlight that has lain imprisoned in our planet's coal deposits for prolonged periods of time.

Naturally, the chemical constituents of coal and wood differ. Wood fibre consists of cellulose, a substance containing fifty per cent. carbon, while the bulk of the remaining half of the compound is composed of hydrogen and oxygen. In coal, the proportion of carbon is much greater, because in the progress of the fossilization of the vegetation, hydrogen and oxygen extensively escaped, thus leading to the increased percentage of carbon.

The evolutionary stages of coal were:—First, solid vegetable matter; then peat, then lignite or brown coal, onwards through the ascending varieties of black coal, until we reach the furthest development of carbonization in graphite. For, while woody fibre contains fifty per cent. of carbon and forty-four per cent. of oxygen, there is a gradual increase in the proportion of carbon and decrease in that of oxygen as we ascend the series from wood, through peat and lignite, upwards to Staffordshire, Newcastle, Wigan, and Welsh steam-coal (anthracite), which latter contains 90.1 per cent. of carbon and 2.5 only of oxygen, until we crown the series with graphite, which is practically pure carbon (94 to 99.5 per cent.). The residue is made up of ash, so that graphite is quite destitute of oxygen.

It is estimated that from one ton of Newcastle coal there is obtained—> about 10,000 cubic feet of gas, 110 to 120 lbs. of tar, 20 to 25 gallons of watery liquor, and about 1,500 lbs. of coke. It has been estimated also (1905) that we are now distilling coal at the rate of about 10 million tons per annum, so that there is annually produced 100,000 million cubic feet of gas, and about 500,000 tons of tar, besides proportionate quantities of the other products. The great metropolitan companies alone are consuming nearly 3 million tons annually for the production of gas, a consumption corresponding to about 6,000 cubic feet per head of population (Coal; and What We Get from It, pp. 45, 46).

In addition to this, vast quantities of coal are consumed for household and manufacturing purposes in the Metropolis. Yet a little more than a century ago the total annual consumption in London was well under one million tons.

An important bye-product of the gas industry is coal tar. This constitutes the raw material of colouring substances, various oils, perfumes, and other commodities. The history of the far-reaching coal tar colour industry, built up as it was out of the refuse of the gas-works, has been aptly described as "a romance of dirt." In Germany, the manufacture of aniline dyes had attained titanic proportions prior to the War. Although the able English chemist, Sir William Perkin, furnished the firm foundations of this thriving industry, it was contemptuously treated in the land of its birth, despite the significant circumstance that in England coal was first distilled on a commercial scale for gas-making, and that our country introduced the earliest coal tar colouring materials into the industrial world. England is still the premier coal tar centre, and appears to produce larger supplies than all other European States combined. Yet the leadership, nay, almost the monopoly, in colour manufacture has long since departed from us.

Immense supplies of coke are produced by the gas companies, and this residue is of vast industrial importance. Although the combustion of coke evolves powerful fumes, this carbonaceous substance has long been in request where an inexpensive smokeless fuel is required. It is largely employed in the furnaces of engines, and is extensively utilized in the smelting of iron.

When coal was converted into coke for industrial and domestic purposes, the tar and other derivatives produced were permitted in Britain, until quite recently, to run to waste. Some idea of this economic loss may be gathered from the fact that more than twelve million tons of coal are annually converted into this form of fuel.

The majority of people suppose that the several derivatives of coal are already present in the substance itself and merely await chemical separation. Certainly a small amount of moisture and a little gas reside in raw coal, but these constituents are practically inappreciable in comparison with the evolution of gas and water during the manufacture of gas. Again, a minute amount of tar is present in some few forms of coal; but, as a rule, tar is entirely absent in coal utilized at the gas works. Usually, tar is no more a constituent of coal than coke is. As a leading chemist states:—

> All these products are formed by the chemical decomposition of the coal under the influence of heat, and their nature and quantity can be made to vary within certain limits by modifying the temperature of distillation.

Among the numerous compounds distilled from coal some may be immediately applied to industrial use, but the majority of these isolated substances form merely the crude materials for the elaboration of various other utilities which include medicines and pigmentary preparations. Obviously these and other completed commodities cannot be regarded as tar constituents any more than tar can be considered as an ingredient of the coal. As a matter of fact these products are evolved from the tar constituents by chemical agency. Meldola justly contends that these finished products—> bear much about the same relationship to their parent substances that a steam engine bears to the iron ore out of which its metallic parts are primarily constructed. Just as the mechanical skill of the engineer enables him to construct an engine out of the raw material iron which is extracted from its ore and converted into steel by chemical processes, so the skill of the chemist enables him to build up complex colouring matters out of the raw materials furnished by tar, which is obtained from coal by chemical decomposition.

Coal is now known to exist in Kent, and the seams may prove far more valuable than is at present supposed. Probably other hitherto unsuspected coal deposits lie beneath our feet. The coal measures of the British Isles comprise about one-tenth of their land surfaces. The richest coal regions are those of South Wales, and our Northern and Midland counties. The available coal reserves reposing in deposits of Carboniferous Age and extending to a depth of 4,000 feet have been estimated to amount to ninety thousand million tons, while, in addition to these, we possess a considerable supply of coal at workable distances in the later Permian deposits of the northern and central districts of England. If these beds are added to those of Carboniferous date the entire available reserves of the United Kingdom have been figured at the prodigious total of about 146,454 million tons. We raise over two hundred million tons per year from the pits. Before the War about 15 per cent. was exported, while nearly one-third was used for iron smelting, and a mere modicum of the huge total for gas production. The remainder is utilized by the railways, shipping, our many manufactures, the domestic hearth, and our minor industries.

Notes From Ireland.

When the Reformers began their partial weeding of dogmatism they threw open the portals of existence and aggression to the most brainy, gifted, and marvellous men the world has ever seen—they opened the door to us. We immediately commenced to spray everything with Reason whose inquisitional eyes soon completed the work of the pruning knife. The majority of the countries, however, that then remained untouched by Reform still remain untouched by any kind of sanity or moderation. In such countries the religious authorities "go the whole hog"; they fully realize that a man without reason is no man at all—a nonentity. Accordingly, in order to make people believe what they say, they choke the discerning faculty. To secure this they give out as true the most absurd and useless happenings. And they succeed. The happenings are invariably believed provided they are quite incredible. The latest pamphlet of the Catholic Truth Society of Ireland is the Venerable Oliver Plunket. In contains twenty-four pages in a good cover, price one penny. Call that nothing for War time! Well, Plunket was a Primate of Ireland who died in the year 1681 as a result of an axe having fallen on his neck, and so having severed his body from his head. Now, mark you well, Plunket was a wonder when he was alive, but, now when he is dead, he is a living miracle. His martyrdom occurred well over two centuries ago, yet the hair has not yet disappeared from his pate, while his countenance is still illuminated with a look of extreme peace. But the most wonderful thing about the dead Primate's skull is, and we have a Cardinal's word for it, that, in September, 1893, it gave forth—no, no, not a stink—a fragrant odour.

Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ will soon cease to figure as an undivided third of the Holy Trinity; he is being fast ousted from the right-hand side of the heavenly bench, and being relegated to the golden dust of the celestial pavement, where he is already serving as a scarlet footrest to his holy mother, of immaculate virginity, whose five-toed feet are victoriously marking time upon the nape of his neck as the palpitating harmony, "Ave Maria," salutes her auricular sense. In fact, this woman seems in a good way to usurp the sceptre of Good God Almighty himself, and betrays an inclination to brandish that regal insignia with a grace and gentleness not even exceeded by her son's most illustrious vicar, Pope Innocent III. She is drawing the mantle of majesty about her frail shoulders, and stifles the expostulations of the deposed with the millions of prayers addressed to her, which prayers must e'er this have attained to the regularity of a trade wind and the ferocity of a cyclone in the vaults of heaven. The current issue of the Little Flower, for instance, contains the following from a man's pen:—

O Rose! O Lily! O Lady full of grace!
O Mary, Mother! O Mary, Maid! hear thou,
Glory of Angels! Pity and turn thy face,
Praying thy Son, even as we pray thee now,
For thy dear sake thine Ireland free:
Pray thou, thy little child!
Ah! who can help her but in mercy He?
Pray thou, pray thou, for Ireland, Mother mild!
O Heart of Mary! pray the Sacred Heart:
His at Whose word depart
Sorrows and Hates, home to Hell's waste and wild.

Talk about the unintelligibility and mysticism of Mallarme, Verlaine, Maeterlinck, and the rest of the French school! their most nonsensical utterance is wisdom in comparison with this sturdy piece of nothingness. Even the most unbridled poetic license, however, is subject to some kind of influential criticism—a scepticism that remembers the long hairs and limited mentality of genius; a poet's effusion is always without consequential tragedy. Can as much be said of this thousand-times-worse piffle? Alas, no! And here we have the horrible tragedy of authority. Many and many a poor aching soul will offer up this prayer poem; for is it not recommended by the One True Church? But no one will wonder at the signlessness of the Supreme. The Catholic Church can publish what it likes in this poor little isle; and it publishes what it likes with a vengeance. It is without critic, censor, judge—a law unto itself. All our literature is saturated with superstitious rot, yet no local voice is heard in protest. It is high time the standard of rebellion was raised against this galling yoke, and we Freethinkers are the only ones to do it. But—but how many are we? A thousand, outside Ulster? Fifty in Dublin? Alas, not more! We are voiceless. What can we do? What—oh, what?

The Catholic Church is still sweating drops of blood lest its young men be forced to join what Bernard Shaw calls "that vulgar pageant of incompetent schoolboy gladiators," the Army. The Irish Catholic, in particular, is very hot on the subject, and is inconsistently pessimistic in its exhortation to the Irish people to use a shield far more powerful than England's bombs or rifles—the Rosary. It appeals, therefore, for a million of Rosaries. "Wanted: A Million of Rosaries."

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:

MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

> I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects.

Name.....

Addres .....

Occupation .....

Dated this.....day of.....19.....

This declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or the Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organizations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable iberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalization of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labour.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement, by all just and wise means, of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labour to organize itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalization, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Views and Opinions.

Is Religion of Use?

We take it that at this point in the discussion between ourselves and Dr. Lyttelton we are agreed that we may profitably descend from the bath-room to the ground floor. In other words, the illustrative and historical association of Christian teaching with lack of cleanliness which led to this discussion has served its purpose in bringing us to a more fundamental issue. There are really more issues than one, but it will be well to take one at a time. And, in view of Dr. Lyttelton's article in last week's Freethinker, this issue may be set forth as follows. Looking at the whole subject of human development, it appears that Dr. Lyttelton regards religion as an essentially beneficent force, expressing itself as clearly as may be through the now helpful and now distorting media of social forces. We, on the other hand, look upon religion, as such, as an essentially irrational and progressively harmful thing, owing all its apparent goodness to an association with forces that are not religious at all, and only stayed from producing greater evil by the curbing influence of non-religious agencies and conditions. We think this places the issue fairly and squarely. It will, at all events, leave readers in no doubt as to the question in dispute.

Religion and Primitive Life.

To keep distinct things separate is for the ordinary person the most difficult of tasks; and this gives the religionist an initial advantage over the Freethinker. For hitherto religion has been more or less connected—more closely as we go backward—with all phases of social life. And because of this association, in spite of a separation that is actually taking place, there are still large numbers who cannot conceive social life, without deterioration, apart from religion. In primitive life this conviction is easily understandable. For there religion is everywhere. Religious beliefs dominate, so far as man consciously adjusts conduct to circumstances, the whole of life. Man's first interpretation of nature is a volitional one. The gods are responsible for everything; and all that man does, from the cradle to the grave, is done more or less under the impulse of the desire to gain their favour or to avert their anger. One consequence of this is the creation of an intense and unreasoning conservatism. Another—really the reverse of the first—is a fear of criticism of old methods and a hatred of new ones. The proof of this is that all over the world, as well in civilized as in savage society, religion is hostile to change. The conservatism it stands for is not of a reasoned kind; it stands for the established order merely because it is established. It conserves without regard to the social value of the conservation. Thus, in uncivilized and semi-civilized societies, we find the most barbarous practices resting upon a religious basis, and safeguarded by the religious sanction. Human sacrifice, Suttee, the killing of old people, the hundred and one barbarities of savage life are nearly all, if we search deeply enough, found to rest upon a religious basis, and their removal prevented because of religious fears and threatened religious penalties. Within modern times we have with ourselves such instances as punishment for witchcraft, Sabbatarian laws, and imprisonment for "blasphemy" and heresy. So far as we can trace the undiluted influence of the religious idea, we can see it acting as a retarding and retrogressive force in human society.

Social Selection and Religion.

We hope the qualifying expression that in early society "religious beliefs dominate, so far as man consciously adjusts conduct to circumstances" will be borne in mind, because much turns upon that. For behind the force, or forces, of which man is conscious, lies those of the operation of which he is conscious. And these include all, or nearly all, that enlightenment has classified as moral, social, physical, etc. The laws of life and of social health are substantially the same all along, what changes is man's knowledge concerning them. But they are always active, and they subject religious beliefs and practices to an inevitable form of selection. A religious belief that threatens the existence of a tribe or a people must be discarded or modified to a point of comparative harmlessness or the tribe itself will disappear. From our point of view, the analogy of a disease germ will serve. If a germ is so deadly as to kill all its hosts, it kills itself. What happens, one may suppose, is that while on the one hand an immune type of human being is preserved, on the other hand, the more virulent, really suicidal, type of germ is destroyed, leaving a less virulent form in possession of the field. So it is that social influences are all the time at work modifying and changing religious beliefs and practices to a point at which they do not too seriously imperil social efficiency. In a word, religion is to us a disease of the body politic. A society may exist, it may even develop, with this germ active in its midst, but it can no more act as a source of strength than the germ of influenza can serve as a source of increased health.

Separating Distinct Things.

Added to this, we must bear in mind that progress is largely a question of enlightenment. We learn more of the real nature of things; we learn to divorce essentials from non-essentials; we strive to keep distinct things separate. In the physical world we have most of us learned to discard the prayers and propitiations with which mankind once sought to get their ends served as so much waste of energy. And what has occurred there with so much completeness is surely a forerunner of what will one day occur elsewhere. In the case of disease, it is plain that the religious idea can give nothing of real value to those striving to reduce its ravages. It is entirely a question of knowledge of the conditions that favour disease, and of their removal. In morals, we can see the beginnings in the associative life of the animal world, and of the more highly elaborated and complex life of mankind. And when the conditions of these classes of phenomena are perceived, there inevitably takes place a separation of the non-essential (the religious idea) from the essential—the play of normal social forces. That the real things of life, including human ideals and aspirations, have been hitherto largely expressed through religion, is proof only that mankind had not yet learned to separate what was essential from what was non-essential. That we outgrow the savage but slowly is illustrated in many departments of life; religion offers but one of the clearest and strongest examples. * * *

Trading Under False Pretences.

What has been said will, we think, be enough to show why, while believing that favourable modifications in Christian teaching are due to the pressure of social forces, we do not admit that "the defilement of Christian teaching" and "the degrading of Christians" was also due to external forces. Let us note, in passing, that if this were admitted, it would rob Christianity of all real value. It would make it no more than a social barometer, reflecting here the good and there the bad of contemporary social life. But our reason for writing as we have is that, first, we do not admit the existence of a socially and ethically admirable Christianity which became corrupted through the wickedness of human nature. To us this is a dream of a much later and more humanized period, striving to find a basis for its greater humanitarianism in Christianity itself. And, secondly, we distinguish with Christianity—as all other religions—between what belongs to it as a religion and what became associated with it from its existence in a human society. No religion can ignore moral and social forces and ideals. If it did, it would soon cease to exist. It must reckon with them; it is even forced partly to endorse them. And all history is a witness to the fact that it is not religion that modifies the moral and social ideals, but the other way about. God does not civilize man; it is man that civilizes his gods. And the sum of the process is, that by the time we have separated the religious idea from the moral and social facts and forces with which it has been associated, some of us—we are pleased to say a growing number—realize that the religious idea is in the nature of a useless hypothesis. It no longer explains anything; it no longer serves a useful purpose; the functions once thought peculiar to it are plainly discharged by organs which have nothing religious about them. Human experience slowly but surely separates the essential from the non-essential.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

For He who has denied to the most devoted psalm-makers and moral poets all beautiful thoughts and all literary reputation, lest they should be praised too much by their earthly fellow-creatures, and thereby forget heaven, where the angels have already engaged board for them in advance;—He, I say, provides us other profane, sinful, heretical authors, for whom heaven is as good as nailed up, all the more with admirable ideas of earthly fame, and this indeed from divine grace and mercy, so that the poor souls, since they are really here, be not altogether wanting, and that they may at least enjoy upon earth some of that joy which is denied to them in heaven.—Heine.

"Our Holy Mother Church."

III.

THE more we study history the more undeniable it becomes that the Church has never deserved to be called either "mother" or "holy." In every age and country its rule has been arbitrary, cruel, and anti-social. The wantonness of its despotism has often known no bounds. And, generally speaking, its tyranny was only equalled by its corruption. During the Middle Ages the Church's power was supreme. Heresy was ruthlessly suppressed, and every act of disloyalty punished by imprisonment, torture, or death. And yet, in almost every age, a few brave men arose who dared to challenge ecclesiastical authority, to defy Papal bulls and excommunications, and to condemn in no measured terms the vices and frauds unblushingly practised by the hierarchy. With the revival of learning, which began almost imperceptibly, opposition to the Church grew in boldness and extent, resulting in the gradual secularization of the State and the consequent decline of priestly power. In the fourteenth century the Church itself, though as despotic as ever, showed unmistakable signs of spiritual apostacy and loss of dignity. With the spread of knowledge there sprang up among the people a bitter resentment against the selfish greed and plunder of which Rome was increasingly guilty. Consequently, when the illustrious schoolman, William of Ockham, ventured to deny Papal authority, and to denounce his own Franciscan Order, as well as the wealthy dignitaries of the Church, for their notorious avarice, he found that thousands of people loudly approved of his action. Ockham is a small village in Surrey, so that William, who is said to have shaken the pillars of the hierarchical polity, was a true Briton; and he was soon followed by another erudite Englishman, of whom we read that he was "the first teacher who shook with any lasting effect the dominion of the hierarchy." William was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, but he found protection in a Court where the Church was powerless to touch him; while Wycliffe was condemned, but not punished, though he lived in the heart of Catholic England. In the thirteenth century another celebrated Briton, Roger Bacon, though in no sense a heretic, yet because he preferred the study of mathematics and experimental science to that of theology, was doomed to fourteen years' imprisonment; but by the latter half of the fourteenth century the English detestation of Rome had become so strong that the Church lacked the courage to punish Wycliffe, who was a thoroughgoing uncompromising heretic. Wycliffe was merely condemned; and yet, as a result of its consent to such condemnation, Oxford University fell upon intellectual sleep, which lasted upwards of a hundred years, and out of which it has not wholly risen to this day. Green admits, in his Short History of the English People (p. 243), that the century which followed the triumphs of Archbishop Courtenay, in Wycliffe's case, "is the most barren in its annals."

Wycliffe died in 1384, six years after the election of two rival popes, Urban VI. and Clement VII., both of whom the great heretic nicknamed Anti-Christs. For thirty-eight years Europe witnessed the humiliating spectacle of "a war of pope against pope, the Pontiff of Rome promulgating a crusade against the Pontiff of Avignon." Now, whilst pope thus cursed pope in the name of the God of Love, whose sole vicegerent on earth each claimed to be, heresy flourished amazingly in the wake of the New Learning. In England, "they complained that the followers of Wycliffe abounded everywhere and in all classes; among the baronage, in the cities, among the peasantry of the country-side, even in the monastic cell itself." Writing at Leicester, Knighton bitterly deplored the fact that "every second man one meets is a Wycliffite." Indeed, by the name of Lollards Wycliffites were soon a powerful, as well as numerous, party, and the one object of their attack was the Church of the day. It is difficult to ascertain what their creed was; though we are in no doubt as to what it was not. They were but humble disciples of the great reformer, whose work was more destructive than constructive. This is how Milman describes Wycliffe's work:—

> He had swept away one by one almost all the peculiar tenets of the mediæval Latin Christianity, pardons, indulgences, excommunications, absolutions, pilgrimages; he had condemned images, at least of the Persons of the Trinity; he had rejected Transubstantiation (History of Latin Christianity, vol. viii., p. 202).

Mr. J. M. Robertson is fully justified in the statement that the heresy of the fourteenth century reached its high-water mark in English Lollardism (Short History of Christianity, p. 255). Peter Patishull was one of their most fiery preachers, whose favourite subject was the vices of the clergy. It is more than probable that he indulged in considerable exaggeration, as such men always do; but it is incontestable that priestly morals were notoriously bad. Peter had once occupied the lucrative and honourable position of one of the Pope's chaplains; but his conscience compelled him to relinquish it. While he was preaching on one occasion at St. Christopher's in London, the Augustinians forced their way into the building and managed to serve an interdict upon him as an unlicensed teacher. They were driven out by the Lollards. Then Patishull nailed a document on the doors of St. Paul's to the effect "that he had escaped from the companionship of the worst of men to the most perfect and holy life of the Lollards." It is doubtless true that, on the whole, Wycliffism was morally much superior to the Church it so violently assailed; but it is also indisputable that many Lollards lacked the courage of their convictions. For example, when Archbishop Courtenay went down to Leicester and took his seat, with great pomp, on the trials of certain heretics of note, whose prosecutors were the clergy of the town, we infer that when they were anathematized with solemn ceremony they read their recantation. William Sautree, the first Wycliffian martyr, was an extremely weak-kneed member of the party. He had been a priest of St. Margaret's in King's Lynn. He had also been tried and convicted before the Bishop of Norwich prior to the passing of the Statute for the burning of heretics. When arrested under this new Statute he was a preacher at St. Osyth in London. When his trial came on he played the coward, vehemently recanting, then withdrawing his recantation, and angrily denying that he had ever been tried before. In the writ for the execution of Sautree it was "distinctly stated that the burning of heretics is enjoined by the laws of God as well as of man, and by the Canons of the Church." It was certainly the combined act of the Crown and the Church, but grave doubts exist as to its having had the spontaneous support of the Lords and Commons. Be that as it may, certain it is that such were the corruptions of the Church that petitions were presented to the king for the expulsion from the country of all French-born monks, the seizure of all priories held by foreigners, the compulsory residence of vicars in their own parishes, and the exercise by them of hospitality, and the prohibition of entrance into any of the Mendicant Orders under the age of twenty-four.

The story of the persecution of the Lollards is too well known to be told here in any detail, but several points need to be emphasized. One is that Dean Milman is clearly mistaken when he asserts that the insurrection of the peasants under Wat Tyler and others, 1381, "had no connection with religion." The truth is that it was part and parcel of the general revolt against the tyranny and rapacity of both Church and State. As long as it aimed only at the abuses in the Church many noblemen were more or less enthusiastic supporters of it, hoping eventually to gain by it; but no sooner did it begin to embrace the abuses of a feudal government than they not only withdrew from it but became its active opponents, selfishness being their motive in each case. Through the direct and indirect influence of Queen Anne the movement spread into Bohemia, where, early in the fifteenth century, the trials of our Holy Mother Church were particularly severe. John Huss was the leader of the Bohemian Lollards as John Wycliffe had been of the English. Poor Huss had to appear at the Council of Constance, in 1416, which sentenced him to be burned. He did not recant, though repeatedly besought to do so, but died like a hero. He was subjected to every conceivable species of degradation. A dispute arose as to the mode of effacing the tonsure. In the end it was done with scissors, the hair being cut in the form of a cross. Then a paper crown, daubed all over with devils, was placed on his head, to the accompaniment of the eminently Christian commital: "We devote thy soul to the devils in hell."

The execution of Huss led to a Bohemian war which lasted a long time. Meanwhile, our Holy Mother Church was in extremely deep waters, in which neither its holiness nor its motherliness was destined to shine. But the strange scenes witnessed at the most extraordinary Council of Constance require another article.

J. T. LLOYD.

Forty Years for Freethought.

> You can do nothing much worth doing, in this world, without trouble; you can get nothing much worth having, without expense.—John Ruskin.
> Freedom is the one purport, wisely aimed at, or unwisely, of all man's struggles, toilings, and sufferings, in this earth.
> —Thomas Carlyle.

"HATS off to the veterans," said George William Foote on a memorable occasion, and few will fail to assent to the rare praise of the "Old Guard" as voiced by the famous leader of British Freethought. The veterans are the link between the present and the past; that past of storm and peril, when the soldiers of Liberty arose almost every day to meet a fresh difficulty or a new danger. To be one of the "Old Guard" is in itself an honour; for the "Old Guard" never knew defeat or surrender. A few of them still remain amongst us; to shame our weakness, and to stimulate our courage. Of these veterans, few names are better known than that of our old friend, Mr. Arthur B. Moss, whose entertaining pen has so often written for these columns, and whose voice has been so familiar on the lecture-platform for two generations.

Born in London sixty-three years ago, Mr. Moss joined the Freethought Movement in the "stormy 'seventies" of the last century. When quite a young man, he saw that in Freethought alone was there any hope for Democracy. No man in the Movement ever set to work more vigorously to qualify himself for acting as a teacher of his fellows, and few have waged the good fight with more ability and tenacity. Starting life as a clerk, he afterwards became a journalist, and educated himself not only in the world of books, but also in the book of the world. His knowledge of Freethought literature is as remarkable as his power of debate; while his keen sense of humour saves him from any tendency to dullness, and his plain common sense enables him to meet with ease the platitudes of clerical triflers who imagine a mere lecturer could be put aside without trouble. As a writer, his output of books and pamphlets is remarkable; "thick as leaves in Valambrossa." Nor has he stopped at purely propagandist effort, for in several plays he has displayed literary capacity, which, under happier conditions, would have secured for him general recognition from the theatrical world.

Mr. Moss's journalistic career has brought him into close contact with the life of a great city, and the mysteries of Modern Babylon are no more secrets to him than they were to Dickens. Years ago he accompanied George R. Sims and Fred Barnard, the artist, in their memorable travels through London's under-world, and helped to prepare the material out of which Mr. Sims wrote his famous work, How the Poor Live, a book which startled quiet folk in sheltered homes, and paved the way for legislative effort. Indeed, there are few phases of metropolitan life with which Mr. Moss is unacquainted, for his duties as an official under the old London School Board gave him unique opportunities for seeing the homes of the people.

The outstanding features of Mr. Moss's busy career are his tenacity and courage. A tireless worker, he has delivered thousands of lectures, and taken part in scores of debates. And these, be it remembered, have been undertaken in the scant leisure of a busy life. Nor has it been "roses all the way." More than once he has come into conflict with the authorities on account of his Freethought opinions. In exercise of his right as an elector, he asked a Member of Parliament to support Bradlaugh's Oaths Bill. The member, a Christian, promptly replied by requesting the School Board authorities to dismiss Mr. Moss, and the result was that he was prohibited from lecturing and advertising his books. Mr. Moss won that battle after delivering a powerful speech before the Board, which led to the rescinding of the resolution. Nor is this all, for the tireless Free thought advocate carried the war into the enemy's camp by entering municipal life, and as a Councillor defending the principles he loved, to which he had devoted his life.

It will be noted that Mr. Moss's courage is not noisy. There is nothing of Donnybrook Fair about it. Physical courage, especially in crowds, is cheap and common enough. Millions of men will fight and die for almost anything or nothing. But moral courage is rare. Few men are able to stand against a mob; fewer still are able to stand, animated solely by principles, against an enraged community. Mr. Arthur Moss is one of the few. When he stands for what he sees to be truth, he is as steadfast as a hill, and nearly as quiet in his resistance. He never asks what he will lose by so doing. The satisfaction of his conscience is his sole reward. For forty years of manhood he has never wavered in holding aloft the banner of Freethought. And for this, if for nothing else, let this brave veteran be honoured:—

Not for delectations sweet,
Not the cushion and the slipper, not the peaceful and the studious,
Not the riches safe and palling, not for us the tame enjoyment,
Pioneers! O Pioneers!

Till with sound of trumpet,
Far, far off the daybreak call—hark, how loud and clear I hear it wind,
Swift! to the head of the army! swift! spring to your places,
Pioneers! O Pioneers!

If Freethinkers need any example to stir them on to give themselves in their great cause they will find it here—in the harvest of a laborious life. There may be men and women among us to-day who are asking, perhaps with a note of complaint, whether they have not done their share, and whether the time has not come for others to take a turn. Such questions are never asked by the men and women who count in the history of the movement. They go on giving themselves because the spirit of duty and of loyalty is within them. The unnumbered laggards remain behind, dawdling through their lives, and passing unhonoured without monument of fame, or record of achievement. The real men, the men who help to make the movement a live one, work on and on, ever in harness to fulfil their lives. Preeminently, such is he whom we mention to-day—Mr. Arthur B. Moss, who has given forty years for Freethought. Although he has passed his sixtieth year, "age cannot wither nor custom stale his infinite variety." In age men's minds are apt to get indurated against new ideas. Not so with Mr. Moss. His gaze is ever towards the future. A Freethinker from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet, and a practical Humanitarian, he favours reforms in the social order, and his heart overflows with love for the poor and humble. In that respect he is a public benefactor. That is really the secret of his influence and of his popularity. "Hats off to the veteran!"

MIMNERMUS.

W. K. Clifford.

I WONDER how many readers of the Freethinker are acquainted with Mr. W. H. Mallock's New Republic? That book, Mr. Mallock's earliest and, in my opinion, his best, will probably be remembered as a brilliant satire on mid-Victorian literature and philosophy, long after his burlesque assaults on Socialism and Freethought have been decently forgotten. Readers of the New Republic will recall the life-like parodies of Jowett, Matthew Arnold, Ruskin, Pater, Huxley, and Tyndall which distinguish its pages, and may recall, along with these, the one really unfair and unkindly portrait of the lot—that of a militant young Atheist who appears under the name "Saunders," and who is made alternately to outrage and to amuse the company by his complete absence of courtesy and tact. It is generally understood that this caricature was intended for William Kingdon Clifford, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Professor of Applied Mathematics and Mechanics at London University. I cannot help feeling that Mr. Mallock's travesty of Clifford—who, on the testimony of his friends, Sir Leslie Stephen and Sir Frederick Pollock, in their introduction to his collected remains, was personally amiable and sympathetic, as well as a thinker of genius—sprang from a feeling that Clifford was, in truth, a more dangerous assailant of orthodoxy than either Huxley or Tyndall. Probably only his early death, before he was thirty-four, prevented the public from coming to the same conclusion.

Clifford, unlike Huxley or Tyndall, was not only a brilliant man of science, but an all-round subverter of established wrong—a Humanist in the best sense of the word. Tyndall, apart from science, had no particular interest except Alpine climbing; Huxley, when he ventured upon social or political controversy, was quite incapable of rising above the smuggest suburban conservatism of the period. Huxley, moreover, did a great disservice to Freethought by inventing the awful word "Agnostic"—a label designed expressly to be used by people who were really Atheists but did not like to say so, though they would have been called so without demur in any country not dominated by Anglo-Saxon respectability and moral cowardice. Very different from this was the attitude of Clifford. Politically, he was as advanced a Radical as practically any Englishman in those stodgy 'seventies. Intellectually, he would give no quarter to, and admit no compromise with superstition.

"It is not right to be proper," he declares in the last sentence of his Conditions of Mental Development, in face of the tyranny of convention in action and thought. In other lectures and essays, notably in The Unseen Universe (a review of a quasi-scientific apology for Christianity which appeared under that title in 1875), Body and Mind, Right and Wrong, The Ethics of Religion, and one or two besides, he again and again emphasizes the duty of preaching Freethought in the market-place, and not only in the study, and driving supernatural religion from its last ditch :—

> Only for another half-century let us keep our hells and heavens and gods. It is a piteous plea; and it has soiled the heart of these prophets, great ones and blessed, giving light to their generation, and dear in particular to our mind and heart. These sickly dreams of hysterical women and half-starved men, what have they to do with the sturdy strength of a wide-eyed hero who fears no foe with pen or club? This sleepless vengeance of fire upon them that have not seen and have not believed, what has it to do with the gentle patience of the investigator that shines through every page of this book [The Unseen Universe, which he is criticizing], that will ask only consideration and not belief for anything that has not with infinite pains been solidly established? That which you keep in your hearts, my brothers, is the slender remnant of a system which has made its red mark on history, and still lives to threaten mankind. The grotesque forms of its intellectual belief have survived the discredit of its moral teaching. Of this what the kings could bear with, the nations have cut down; and what the nations left, the right heart of man by man revolts against day by day. You have stretched out your hands to save the dregs of the sifted sediment of a residuum. Take heed lest you have given soil and shelter to the seed of that awful plague which has destroyed two civilizations, and but barely failed to slay such promise of good as is now struggling to live among men.

Severe as he was upon Protestant and Latitudinarian attempts at compromise, Clifford did not forget that the strongest and deadliest embodiment of Christianity in world-politics is, and has always been, the Catholic Church. The following extract from The Ethics of Religion is an apt reply in anticipation to sophists like Mr. G. K. Chesterton, who try to persuade us that Catholicism has stood for liberty and equality :—

> "In the Middle Ages the priests and monks were the sole depositories of learning." Quite so; a man burns your house to the ground, builds a wretched hovel on the ruins, and then takes credit for whatever shelter there is about the place. In the Middle Ages nearly all learned men were obliged to become priests and monks. "Then again, the bishops have sometimes acted as tribunes of the people, to protect them against the tyranny of kings." No doubt, when Pope and Cæsar fall out, honest men may come by their own. If two men rob you in a dark lane, and then quarrel over the plunder, so that you get a chance to escape with your life, you will of course be very grateful to each of them for having prevented the other from killing you; but you would be much more grateful to a policeman who locked them both up.

His favourite poet, to judge by his quotations, was Swinburne. Over and over again, in the middle of powerful and suggestive sociological or other arguments, we come upon a phrase of word-music from "Songs Before Sunrise" or "Poems and Ballads," reminding us that the great scientific movement of Darwinism and the poetic revolt of Swinburne were parts of one and the same war of human liberation.

Philosophically, Clifford was a stronger thinker than Huxley, or even Herbert Spencer, though the system which he developed was left by him in a condition of rather unstable equilibrium. He was a Pluralist, with noticeable leanings to what would now be called Pragmatism. An elementary feeling was, for him, a thing in itself, independent of any consciousness of which it might form part, and more real than matter, which was merely the mental picture we form of elementary feelings or "mind-stuff." This is very ingeniously worked out in his essays on "Body and Mind" and "The Nature of Things-in-Themselves." Its weakness is that it seems to do away with any unity in things, and, "feeling" being ultimate, to render impossible any such thing as real knowledge. Clifford would probably have revised it had he foreseen how, in the hands of William James and his disciples, this Pluralist philosophy would become a reactionary instrument of the "Will to Believe," and be used to shepherd the unwary back into the fold of supernaturalism. Only on the lines of Monism can Freethought render its results impregnable.

The best part, however, of Clifford's philosophy is its invigorating Humanism. He adopts, practically, the Positivism of Comte, without Comte's crotchety pseudo-Catholicism :—

> Conscience is the voice of man ingrained into our hearts, commanding us to work for man.
> When men respect human life for the sake of man, tranquillity, order, and progress go hand in hand; but those who only respected human life because God had forbidden murder have set their mark upon Europe in fifteen centuries of blood and fire.

And, addressing those who adduce the probably finite duration of life on the earth as a reason against Humanism, he tellingly says :—

> Our interest lies with so much of the past as may serve to guide our actions in the present, and to intensify our pious allegiance to the fathers who have gone before us and the brethren who are with us; and our interest lies with so much of the future as we may hope will be appreciably affected by our good actions now. Beyond that, as it seems to me, we do not know, and we ought not to care. Do I seem to say: "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die?" On the contrary I say: "Let us take hands and help, for this day we are alive together."

Acid Drops.

Mr. George Bernard Shaw writes to the Manchester Guardian commenting on the case of a conscientious objector who is being sentenced to recurring terms of imprisonment. One need not agree with the conscientious objector to assert that the treatment of these people is revengeful, panicky, and quite opposed to all legal and constitutional traditions. But Mr. Shaw falls into a curious error. He says that a soldier not belonging to any officially recognized denomination becomes, as such, a member of the Church of England. This is not so. A soldier is, religiously or non-religiously, exactly what he says he is. If he says nothing he may be put down as belonging to any recognized denomination. But that entirely depends upon the recording officer. The soldier can be entered as "no religion" if he so chooses.

Rev. A. J. Waldron is lecturing at the Palladium, Manchester, on "The Girl Who Doesn't Know." The lecture is in connection with a film of that title. Trust some of our parsons for getting on to a subject that is sexually suggestive.

Pity the sorrows of a poor old deity! A service of intercession was held recently in London for the "persecuted" Russian Church. This looks as if the Greek Church officials were desirous of "raising the wind."

The War-shrine mania is spreading, and it is proposed to erect a permanent shrine in Hyde Park, London. It is enough to make the bronze statue of Byron walk out of the park in disgust.

Religion is fast becoming an amusement. Prebendary Carlile advertises his place of worship as "the Cinema Monument Church." A further innovation at this pious place of entertainment is a ladies' orchestra.

The London Daily Chronicle recently stated that detective stories were prime favourites with the troops. Presumably, they are preferred to the copies of "God's Word" showered on them by the various Bible Societies.

Providence is said to count the hairs of our heads and to take particular interest in the gymnastics of sparrows, but it was too preoccupied to prevent the death of a two-year-old child at Rhyl, who played with a box of matches and set light to his clothing.

Dr. Clifford says "a great religious revolution is taking place," and "the revival is equally emphatic in France as in Britain." We fear the wish is father to the thought. Almost every denomination is bemoaning empty pews, decreasing congregations, and low incomes. As for France, the Roman Catholic Church, which is the only religious body worth troubling about in that country, is in an equally bad way. If Dr. Clifford means that there is a religious revival among the soldiers in France, he should listen to the troops, and not the chaplains.

The Christian religion, in the hands of the Young Men's Christian Association, promises to become a "Divine Comedy." This egregious organization has just started a Hut Theatrical Scheme, and the first Y.M.C.A. Theatrical Company has been enrolled. Presently it will be difficult to realize whether the Y.M.C.A. worships Charley's Aunt or Jesus Christ.

The Rev. J. A. Clark was found in a field near Liberton, Midlothian, with his throat cut and a razor by his side. He expired shortly after being found. Yet Revivalists tell us that only poor benighted Atheists ever commit suicide.

A City of London's "Men's Prayer Meeting" was announced to take place at the "Egyptian Hall." It seems appropriate, for the whole thing has a flavour of ancient Egypt.

President Wilson said he would not forget Russia, and the Churches are doing their best to help in their own peculiar way. The Missionary Review of the World says:—

> The revolution in Russia has resulted in throwing open to the Gospel the largest country, with its largest population of white people, in the world. There are 182,000,000 people in Russia, and yet there are not as many evangelical workers there as in the city of Chicago alone. Any adequate evangelization plan must embrace not only the hundred million native Russians, but also the seven million Jews, the twenty million Poles, the thirty million Ukrainians, millions of Mohammedans (Tartars, Kurds, Kirghiz, etc.), Armenians, Roumanians, and Greeks, and besides these the Bulgarians, Servians, Croatians, Montenegrins, and other related Slavonic peoples.
> The propaganda of atheism and materialism is already assuming awful proportions. There is no time to lose. The Greek Orthodox Church is rapidly losing its grip upon the hearts of the people, and before long large masses of simple religiously inclined Russians may be led astray into complete infidelity. Millions of the people are looking for something different.

It is suggested sending one million copies of the Russian Bible, and thirteen million copies of the New Testament. Some people may, however, remember that it was the very religious Russia—the Russia eulogized by the Bishop of London as being profoundly and inevitably "spiritual," which presented the picture of the worst Government in the whole of the civilized world. And these may conclude that Russia's chief need is education along rational lines rather than a return to the rule of the Church—and the other things that will come with it.

"Will the Coal Go Round?" was the headline in a religious contemporary. It referred to the new Rationing Order, but it might have had references to a place so often mentioned by preachers.

Dr. Clifford is an old hand at theology, but he sometimes forgets. Speaking on the coming "religious revolution," he says events are driving people to a recognition of "one God and one destiny." Dear, Dear! And Christians believe in a Triune God, and in Heaven and Hell.

At a Buckinghamshire Church laymen have been allowed to speak to the congregation, and the clergy sit in the body of the church. Those clergymen ought to learn a few necessary truths.

Wolverhampton is threatened by a great danger, but fortunately a Mr. Arthur Colbourn is on the alert. This gentleman writes to the Express and Star pointing out that ice-cream vendors parading the streets on Sunday are "a grave menace to children just leaving Sunday-school," and calls for their suppression. "A grave menace"! We are impressed. Perhaps it is an enemy move to demoralize the youth of the country, and the Italians are German agents in disguise. In that case D.O.R.A. should be invoked.

What pathos there is in the announcement that the Bishop of Wakefield, in consequence of heavy taxation and War-prices, has been compelled to leave his episcopal palace and take a smaller house. The faithful need not fear that his lordship will reach the workhouse, for the income of the bishopric is £60 weekly, which should ensure that his lordship's bread is well margarined.

Senator Meyers, of Montana, recently brought forward a resolution in Congress asking President Wilson to call on the nation to pray one minute each day for victory. One, two, or three, members supported the resolution. Most of the speakers were of opinion that it was work—not prayer that was needed.

The living of Liff in the Presbytery of Dundee is vacant. Thanks to the rise in price of corn the living is worth about £1,000 a year, and there is over seventy applicants for the vacancy. We have no doubt that every one of the seventy has been moved by the Lord to make application, and the selected one will duly regard his appointment as a "call to service."

In a contribution in the Times to one of the significantly frequent discussions on the need of closer union of the Churches, a clergyman writes: "It is really time that the organized religious forces of this country, as represented by its churches and chapels, got into line against the common enemy." But even if they do get into line against the Freethinkers, their numbers will continue to diminish rapidly under the steadily increasing fire of Atheist criticism. The idea, however, of the churches and chapels getting into line to oppose the spreading of facts is amusing, but not unusual.

Great Britain has contributed to the War a force of soldiers which represents in men alone nearly a quarter of the total population. The clergy, of whom there are 50,000, are exempted from military service.

The Emperor of Austria has just lately asked for an increased allowance because he cannot pay his way. Up to now he has been allowed £904,000 a year. He asks for £320,000 more as a War-bonus. The "King of Kings" was "sold up" for thirty shillings.

Politicians like to flavour their speeches with a little piety. Even Mr. Balfour is not exempt from this weakness. Speaking recently on the War, he said that the two groups of opponents were fighting for two deals, "one from heaven, the other from hell." As Mr. Balfour is seventy years of age, it is high time he disdained the language of a spring curate.

A "Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

IT is with a feeling akin to disappointment, and with much reluctance that I am compelled to re-open this Fund.

I had hoped that by this time peace would have been declared, and a Sustentation Fund unnecessary. But the War drags on, the cost of production increases month by month, and the burden, instead of becoming lighter, grows heavier. Paper, which could be bought a year ago at 30s. per ream—as against a pre-War cost of 10s.—is now in the neighbourhood of 50s. per ream; there has also been another rise in wages and in the cost of production generally. When it is pointed out that a sixteen-page Freethinker would now cost more for paper alone than was formerly paid for the whole cost of production (including wages, rent, contributors, etc.), some idea may be formed of the burden that has to be faced. And, in addition, there is every probability that there will be a still further rise in wages in the near future.

Since March, the Freethinker has been printed on twelve pages; but even with this economy, the cost of production is over £6 per week more than was the case last year. Despite this progressive increase in expenses, it is so far pleasant to be able to state that the deficit to date, thanks to the prompt and generous response to last year's appeal, is only just over £250. It is this deficit which I am seeking to make good by means of a special Fund, and I feel assured that this will be done as promptly as before.

As on previous occasions, the deficit represents a debt owing to me. There are no outstanding debts against the Freethinker; all claims, in every direction, have been promptly met. This, I judge, is the better course; although in turn I have had to borrow the necessary funds to keep things going. I have also had to borrow on my personal responsibility a considerable sum of money to purchase a stock of paper, and for use as capital for the publication of pamphlets, etc. This will, I believe, right itself in time. Since last November, the resources of the Pioneer Press have not permitted my drawing any payment as Editor, contributor, or Manager. I make these statements only to prove that if I am reluctantly compelled to appeal for help, I have not shrunk from facing hardship or incurring responsibility on my own account. The great thing is to keep the flag flying. Others may have been able to do better than I have done, but I am certain none could have worked harder. And these efforts have been loyally supported by all concerned in the Freethinker office, and by a large number of readers all over the country. They have made the work a pleasure, and encouraged a cheerful front when the outlook was blackest. More is owing to these cheerful helpers than can be easily put into words.

When all is said, the situation presents many encouraging features. When it is borne in mind that the Sustentation Fund required, after four years of War, is not so large as was needed to keep the Freethinker alive in peace times, there seems every reason for a feeling of satisfaction. That the deficit is not larger is due to the most careful economy, to a largely increased circulation of the paper, and to a larger business in books and pamphlets. Despite the loss of readers consequent on enlistment in the Army, the circulation of the Freethinker is now 1,300 copies per week more than when I assumed editorship. Therefore, were we living under normal conditions, it is fair to assume that the paper would now be self-supporting. Our Sustentation Fund is, strictly speaking, a War Fund. It owes its existence to the War, and, with the return of peace, it will, I hope, disappear.

Altogether, and thanks largely to the loyalty and devotion of Freethinker readers, the prospects of the paper are to-day brighter than ever. It possesses a larger number of readers than before the War, it retains the loyalty of its old friends, and is constantly making new ones; it is more readily taken up by the "trade," while newsagents show a greater readiness to exhibit it for sale. All these things are full of promise for the time when the War shall have run its course. And when peace does arrive, we hope to then put into operation other plans we have in mind for making the Freethinker a still greater power for good. The struggle is hard, but we are gaining ground all the time. And when so many papers have ceased to exist, this is something of which we may all feel proud.

Above all, the Freethinker has never lost sight of the fact that it exists as an agent for a great cause, and the business side has not been allowed to overcome the propagandist mission of the paper. It has served during the War as a rallying-point for Freethinkers, it has kept going a special agitation concerning the rights of Freethinkers in the Army and Navy, and it has sent a very large number of free parcels of literature for distribution amongst the troops. The War has been a disaster to mankind, but we have tried to pluck some good from even so great a catastrophe. And when the War is over, we shall expect to see a great strengthening of the ranks of Freethought, to which end we are vain enough to feel we have made our contribution.

Meanwhile, the War continues, and we are obliged to rely, however reluctantly, upon the Freethinker's friends. Experience has shown that this reliance is not misplaced, and that knowledge has eased a situation bristling with unprecedented difficulties.

Cheques and Postal Orders should be made payable to me, and addressed Editor, Freethinker, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4. Full acknowledgment will be made in the Freethinker, the accounts of which are under the supervision of a registered accountant. We feel confident that our first list of acknowledgments will be such as to give encouragement to all interested in the cause of Freethought.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Christians Awake!

FIGHT, for the Night is coming,
Fight through the bloody hours;
Fight, while the 'Planes are roaming,
Fight midst Shrapnel showers;
Fight when the Guns grow louder,
Fight in the stifling sun;
Fight for the Night is coming
When War Work is done.

Fight, for the Night is coming,
Fight through the thundering noon;
Fill Hellish hours with Bombing,
Death comes sures and soon;
Give every enemy Airman,
Something to keep in store;
Fight for the Night is coming,
When man flies no more.

Fight, for the Night is coming,
Under the dreadful skies;
While Poison-Gas is blowing,
Fight till the whole Race dies;
Fight till the last man falleth,
Falleth to rise no more;
Fight while the world is darkening,
When Man's fight is o'er.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

September 8, Aberdare; September 15, Maesteg; September 22, Birmingham; September 29, Southampton; October 6, Manchester; October 13, Swansea.

To Correspondents.

A. M.—Will include Tables of Stone as requested.

J. COOPER (France).—Very pleased to hear from you. If you are home at any time shall be pleased to see you in connection with the matter mentioned in your letter. There is a very modern note about Montaigne, as is the case with all the great essayists. William Smith will well repay reading. His Gravenhurst will also be to your taste.

A. P. BROOMFIELD.—Regret we have not room for all your questions, which are quite pertinent. With regard to the first on your list, we do not suppose that young children in school when repeating the Ten Commandments, are thinking of anything. It is a mere mechanical repetition of words.

F. C. HOLDEN (Utah).—Much obliged for papers.

T. C.—Are you not confusing a knowledge of scientific facts with an appreciation of scientific methods? The first may easily, and often does, exist without the second, and without the second is not of great value. Anyone with industry and memory may acquire a knowledge of a whole host of facts, but it is the scientific mind and temper that alone can make their acquisition of real importance.

A. STEGGALL.—We are sending one of our parcels of literature to your son. Glad to find he is so interested in the Freethinker.

E. A.—Thanks for "Traveller's Tale." Will use as soon as possible.

F. G. LAWES.—Hope to see you again one day. Literature is being sent to address given. Hope it will prove useful.

T. H. LANGRIDGE.—"Mutation" is the name given to the theory that a new species may arise by a sudden and marked change in the offspring of a normal parent. This theory gives natural selection the function of keeping a species true to type once it has been formed. As a descriptive term natural selection is wanting in accuracy. The active and valuable principle here is not selection but elimination. To lose sight of this is to pave the way for endless blundering in one's inferences.

J. BREESE.—Thanks. Shall look forward to reply if any is received.

J. M. FLANAGAN.—There is wisdom in the Scotch saying that it takes all sorts to make a world. Ridicule has its place, like most other things. Of course, ridicule alone would be useless, but that seldom is the case with men of sense.

J. TROTMAN.—You acted as we expected you would. One seldom loses by generosity; and if there is a loss, it is often of the kind that matters little.

JOHN HADDON.—We have read your letter with much interest. The views expressed are shared by a great number of Freethinkers. We do not think anyone feels the giving up of Christianity a loss, although the social and domestic ties may be sometimes strained; and that, of course, is painful. There is a very large amount of freethinking among Jews.

J. W. HULTON.—It is, of course, a general Christian assumption that the Bible is true. Hope you will be successful in your endeavours. The lines enclosed are clever, but hardly up to standard.

S. HOLMAN.—See "Sugar Plums."

A. RADLEY.—Quite a common form of religious insanity.

J. A. REID.—Thanks. We are sending on literature.

F. T.—Your Australian friend's opinion that with the majority of the Australian troops religion is "gone by the board, or entirely discredited," quite agrees with what we hear from other quarters. Pleased to learn that your newsagent sells the copies of the Freethinker left for display.

"SATAN."—Putting the kind of religious literature you enclose through the letter-box is, probably, the only way to secure a circulation for it.

A. G. ROYSTON.—There has been no delay in despatching the paper, and no complaint has been received here. Perhaps the complaint was from the local agent to his headquarters. Let us know the missing numbers and we will send. Parcel of literature is being sent to address given.

S. CLOWES.—Waste paper came safely to hand. Many thanks.

A. LANE.—The books are out of print, but if we can get copies will let you know. Thanks for sending waste paper. We can do with all we can get. The need is likely to become more urgent.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen commences his lecturing this season with two meetings at Aberdare on Sunday next. Next week we will publish full information as to time and place.

Another meeting of Freethinkers of the Pontypridd district is to be held on Saturday, August 31, at the Washington Hotel, Porth, at 6 o'clock. Owing to inadvertence "Porth" was omitted from the notice in our last issue. We hope that a good number of friends will be present, as their attendance will determine the work to be attempted.

A meeting of the Glasgow Branch N. S. S. was held in the Ingram Street Halls on Sunday. Secretary Lonsdale gave in his report on the revision of rules of the N. S. S. It was agreed to get into touch with the civic authorities in order to get the Freethinker placed in the Public Libraries. It was also agreed to petition the Secretary for Scotland regarding the new Education Bill. Quite a number of new members have joined the Branch since the appearance of the "Sugar Plum" giving Mr. Lonsdale's address. Mr. Lonsdale's address is 256 Calder Street, Govanhill. Unattached Freethinkers will please note that he is anxious to enrol them.

THE British Isles are richly dowered with fossil-fuel treasures, and the coal basin of South Wales is the most valuable, although not the largest we possess. This last is that of the Clyde basin, but the Welsh coal-field is one of the thickest in the world, for the vertical extension of the strata exceeds 10,000 feet. This important formation is divided by Carmarthen Bay into two equal areas. The major portion lies to the east of the Bay, and reaches to Pontypool, in Monmouth county, a journey of fifty-six miles. The minor division runs to St. Bride's Bay, seventeen miles distant, and is washed by the waters of the Atlantic. The superficial area of this great coal basin approaches 1,000 square miles.

Professor Hull, in his standard volume, The Coal Fields of Great Britain, sums up the conclusions of Sir W. T. Lewis, who, with the assistance of several qualified surveyors, prepared the official returns relating to the coal resources of the South Wales and Monmouthshire basin, 1903. From the preceding estimates, states Hull:—

> It will be seen that the available quantity of coal within a depth of 4,000 feet amounts to over

> 26,470 millions of tons, of which over 13,301 millions of tons belong to the valuable class of 'steam coal' suitable for naval purposes.

Oil is now extensively utilized in the Navy, but the demand for steam coal is constantly increasing. The output of coal from the South Wales seams was more than doubled between 1880 and 1903, a period of twenty-three years. "This coal," Hull tells us,— > is chiefly raised from collieries situated in the counties of Glamorgan and Monmouth, and is shipped from Cardiff, Llanelly, Barry, Newport, and Swansea, while large quantities are consumed for iron smelting, tin-plate manufacture, railway fuel, and household purposes.

Several of these collieries are worked at enormous depths. At Pontypridd the Albion mine is 545 yards (1,635 feet) deep, while the Lady Windsor, in the same district, descends to 593 yards. But the pride of place must be awarded to the Deep Navigation Colliery at Treharris which runs downwards for 718 yards. Deeper mining than this is already in operation, and some of the mines descend 100 yards below their stated depths where surface conditions prove favourable.

The Bristol, Somersetshire, and Forest of Dean coal measures are all of considerable importance. A larger formation, the South Staffordshire coalfield, has yielded immense supplies of mineral fuel and iron, and its proximity to the great industrial Midland towns, Birmingham, Dudley, and Wolverhampton, has given a powerful stimulus to these manufacturing centres. Indeed, it has been said that the entire region encircling these busy cities forms one titanic workshop, and that on a clear night—> the spectacle from the walls of Dudley Castle, which rises from the centre of the coal field is one which has scarcely a parallel. The whole country within a radius of five or six miles is seen to be overspread by collieries, iron foundries, blast furnaces, factories, and the dwellings of a dense population; and, from amidst the thick smoky atmosphere, the tongues of fire from the furnaces shoot up an intermittent light which illuminates the whole heavens.

But even this Vulcanian scene discloses part only of the vast sum of human activity engaged in the production of wealth. Each array of workers toiling in forge and factory is represented by another multitude of men only less numerous than itself, steadily hewing the coal in the mines to provide the motive power for the immense manufacturing operations of the surrounding districts.

The coal deposits of North Staffordshire comprise a smaller area than those of the South, but their seams are much richer. These strata possess four times the thickness, and the coal available in the northern formation is twice as great as that of the southern field; while excellent facilities are afforded for future exploitation. These beds have yielded many fossil remains, notably those of molluscs and fish. Again, few indeed are the British coalfields that, in proportion to their size, prove so opulently stored with minerals, or whose beds promise such prodigious productiveness in coming years. According to Elliot's estimate, the reserves of the North Staffordshire seams will provide 3,680 millions of tons for future consumption. Deep mining is now in progress in this region, and at the Florence Colliery at Mossfield, coal is drawn to the surface from a depth of nearly 3,000 feet.

The South Lancashire coalfield has played an important part in the industrial history of England. All the renowned manufacturing centres of Lancashire derive their fame from their foundation of coal, apart from which even the intelligent and enterprising spirit of the people, their mild and moist climate, and other eminent Lancastrian qualities, might have proved abortive. It is said that from "Chorley to Staleybridge, by Bolton, Bury, Rochdale, and Oldham," the elevated moorlands pass northwards. From this high region the land surface slowly declines in the direction of the Mersey Valley, and the coal reposes under strata of later origin which form the depressed country of Newton and Ashton in Makerfield, Leigh, Manchester, and Stockport, in the vicinity of which the coal measures traverse the Mersey and invade Cheshire. This invaluable coalfield, with that of Burnley, has an area of 217 square miles. The total thickness of the coal-bearing strata was estimated by the Commissioners in 1901 at 6,000 feet. The number of workable seams two or more feet thick was shown to be sixty-two, while the quantity of coal lying to a depth of 4,000 feet which would well repay the cost of working was ascertained to amount to 4,238,507,000 tons.

Lancashire contains the deepest mines in Britain. One is at Wigan, and another at Dukinfield, on the Cheshire border; but the palm is held by Pendleton, where the shaft descends 515 yards, while coal is worked at a depth of 1,161 yards (3,483 feet). This, according to Professor Hull, is the deepest mine in our Isles. Mining operations are conducted on a grand scale in the Lancashire coalfield, and the most modern mechanical devices are employed.

A smaller, but still highly important, coalfield is that of Warwickshire. This coal formation lies nearest to that huge coal-consuming city, mighty London itself. To the S.S.E., the coal layers extend beyond Tamworth, along Atherstone and Nuneaton, and near Wyken, a ramble of some fifteen miles. The measures are fractured in places, and the New Red Sandstone juts out. The seams repose under Permian deposits over a wide area, including Coventry and Warwick. Substantial advances have been made in coal mining in this district. In the Report of the Royal Commission (1904), two "new colliery shafts, namely, that of Newdigate Colliery and that of the Tunnel Colliery (near Stockingford)," are mentioned as having been sunk below the Permian rocks down to the coalbeds with satisfactory results. Hull's expert opinion concerning these coal measures is interesting. "I cannot," he declares, "but regard as of peculiar value this vast reservoir of fuel lying at the borders of the south-eastern counties, and actually closer than any other coal-bearing district to the metropolis of Britain." Another scientist, Professor Lapworth, estimated the area of the Warwickshire seams at thirty square miles, and the tonnage remaining unworked at nearly 920 million tons.

Among others, the Leicestershire coalfield contains vast reserves of fossil fuel. The great Yorkshire, Derbyshire, and Notts measures form physically one immense coal deposit. This is the largest coalfield in England itself, although it is 150 square miles smaller in area than the magnificent formation in South Wales. The noted Silkstone coal is mined in Yorkshire. This fine coal is really the same as that of the Arley mine in Lancashire. The remarkable seam that yields it rarely exceeds a thickness of five feet, and geologists assure us that it formerly spread over a region of not less than 10,000 square miles. Derby and Barnsley coals are celebrated for their quality, and are in keen demand.

Fossils are very numerous in these measures. Many species of fish and molluscs have been identified, and so abundant are fossil fish in the shale which roofs the coal seams at Middleton, that it is known locally as the "fish coal."

"Carillon."

POETS have often found a fruitful source of inspiration in the sound of a bell. And, undoubtedly, when heard under favourable conditions, the sound has a certain charm. I remember, many years ago, spending a quiet holiday at a pretty place in Westmoreland. One lovely summer evening, while strolling through the woods, I heard the sound of church bells carried softly by the breeze. Distance, in this case, lent enchantment to the sound; the music blended with my thoughts and made the wood seem Fairyland. But those were halcyon days, when Hope shed golden glory over youthful dreams. Now, all is changed, and the sound of a bell rouses very different feelings. I write these lines in a typical Lancashire manufacturing town. I arrived here some little while ago from a long and tiring journey, and, after some refreshment, settled down for "forty winks." I had hardly closed my eyes before I was rudely awakened by the chiming of a peal of bells, which was pouring forth a perfect Babel of sound from a neighbouring church steeple.

There are six bells in this particular peal, and a peal of six is my pet abomination. I would rather hear a single bell in spite of the deadly monotony. The pleasure caused by musical sounds of different pitch depends entirely upon the relation that the intervals between the notes bear to one another. With a peal of eight bells, this relation is fairly satisfactory. The presence of the eighth bell, or octave, defines the mode and key, and the other notes fall into their natural places in the scale. But a peal of six may be anything, and ends by being nothing. For instance, let us suppose that the six notes are C, D, E, F, G, and A. These may be the first six notes of the scale of C major (tonic to sub-mediant); the last four and two above the octave of the scale of F major (dominant to mediant); or the first six notes of the descending scale of A minor. To the ear of the musician other combinations will suggest themselves, only to cause a maddening indecision.

The idea of such a noise being a call to peaceful prayer reminds me of an incident I once witnessed at a country fair. On a platform outside a booth (one of the kind vulgarly called "a tupp'ny gaff") the "band" blared forth a clamorous invitation. In front, with an encouraging smile on his face, stood the spruce proprietor, who ever and anon took off his silk hat and made graceful sweeps with it towards the entrance, as if to charm the shy and gaping villagers in. On getting closer, however, I was greatly amused to find that he was quietly but fluently cursing the stolid rustics for (to use an Irishism) being so backward in coming forward.

In like manner, church bells have a sinister meaning behind their vociferous invitation. For when, exasperated by their maddening repetition of "Come to worship, come to worship," I mutter to myself "I'm d—d if I do," the bells, with ever-increasing intensity, return their exultant finale, "You'll be d—d if you don't!"

ATHEISM, ANARCHISM, AND ACCURACY.

SIR,—My only justification for encroaching further on your valuable space is that I have not succeeded in getting Mr. Moss to grasp my point of view. Before I endeavour to make myself clear I must clear myself. While quoting in full his paragraph, I only referred to an italicized portion and an innuendo contained in it. I neither implied acceptance of the doctrine of non-resistance, nor questioned his view that its universal practice would result in unbridled villainy. What I took exception to was (1) the tacit assumption that armies, navies, policemen, magistrates, courts, etc., exist for the best interests of the community, and (2) the commonplace, unthinking, and entirely misleading phrase about "the masses being left a prey to revolution and anarchy."

I do not make a fetish of words; it is only ideas that matter. The head and front of Mr. Moss's offending is not his use of the word "anarchy," but his complete misconception of the fraudulent bases of our force-propped society, and that being "a man who lives in the world as it is to-day," he boggles at the whole question of social welfare, and, fumbling with "restraints upon villainy" (why take away the fear of God, and the restraining influence of a belief in hell?) perturbed by the appalling record of the fact that "tens of thousands of officials are employed discovering offenders and bringing them to justice," he still wishes to perpetuate this regime, is a trifle puzzled over man's depravity (he hasn't outgrown "original" sin yet) but thinks what society really needs is a lot more policemen.

Now to recommence. Mr. Moss will be surprised when I say that I approve of the word lawlessness as a definition of anarchy; indeed, the whole point at issue is one of law and confusion versus lawlessness and harmony. Instinctively, because of the camouflage and conformity with which we were dosed in our youth, we confuge legal right with moral equity, but the fact that we are so used to error does not make a thing less wrong. Law and government connote tyranny and oppression, their absence, freedom and progress, and men are "criminal" to the degree that Mr. Moss deplores largely because of their inhuman social conditions. About 90 per cent. of "crime" is that against property, and of the remaining 10 per cent. much would disappear with economic re-adjustment.

What is wrong with society is that the real villains are not known as such, not even by Mr. Moss, whose apprehension lest a hypothetical set of circumstances "would lead to the villain having the upper hand" clearly shows his innocent mind. The ruffian who extorted rent from me for a vile cellar in which I was compelled to live with my family was decidedly an offender (against humanity) but the tens of thousands of officials did not discover him and bring him to justice, for were they not all on his side and ready at a moment's notice to do his bidding, to harass me, to evict me, and if I were disagreeable—as I have been—to put me in prison? Ah, alter the law you say, and Horatio would shriek: "Hang the profiteers from lamp-posts," but what madness it is to countenance and tolerate evil and villainy, and then to waste useful mens' time in imprisoning miscreants! Punishment never did any good. Bringing offenders to justice while the causes of offence are not investigated that repetition may be prevented is but an aggravation of the evil, and, as Oscar Wilde said, with pathetic prophecy (in his admirable anarchistic essay "The Soul of Man": "When we read expurgated history we are appalled, not by the crimes that the wicked have perpetrated, but by the awful punishments the good have inflicted." I have been in prison—not as an interesting political offender—but as a "criminal," and, while there is blood in my veins, I am the comrade and champion of all poor wretches who, in the name of justice, are tortured and brutalized for being poor or resenting poverty, by their strong and lusty brothers at the bidding of grotesque pantaloons in wigs and gowns, the paid bullies of soulless capitalism.

Think the matter out to its logical conclusion, Mr. Moss. Even assuming that the people may be disillusioned about the fatherhood of God before they see through the paternity of government swindle, it is all of a piece. One need not be a Shelley to be a Libertarian (the glorious poet of man's emancipation was greatly indebted to his Anarchist father-in-law) nor a Russian Prince to be an acceptable Revolutionist. I have no pretension to be "a cultivated person with a scientific form of mind" (Anarchism is the simplest philosophy in the world), but simply "one of the masses, still very badly educated." But I am as little likely to be intimidated by intellect any more than I am to be impressed by wealth. Few men have been poorer, none has ever been prouder, than I; and that is the glorious fruit of Anarchist teaching. Whatever my limitations, I am a man, and carry my head above my shoulders as nobly as any fellow who ever wrote rhymes. I claim the right to live my own life in my own way; always, however, on the qui vive that my actions do not tyranically obstruct the liberty of others (if I order a newspaper, the freedom of many individuals is necessarily restricted in consequence), and the general acceptance of this doctrine would make for the greatest possible harmony. Mr. Cohen has been telling us for twenty years that whatever men profess to believe, their lives are conducted on a purely atheistical basis, and if men have not called themselves Anarchists, it is none the less true that the finest actions of the greatest souls of all time have been full of the spirit of Anarchy. The freest expression of individualism is consonant with the highest good of the community. My personality and my wishes may be ever changing, and so I have no inflexible rules of conduct. "Whim" is eternally inscribed on my forehead. I carry my detestation of government to the extent that I would not even make "a law for myself," for the only image that phrase suggests to me is that of a sorely maltreated creature of muddled understanding suddenly finding his own strength, and, having vanquished all his persecutors, making up his mind to kick his own posterior.

I come to preach Life, not Death. I know the whole Art of Living, and I believe with Ingersoll that the way to be happy is to make others happy. Long live liberty! Let us always have Truth, nobility of purpose, and cleanness of heart. Away with gods, governments, and everything that obstructs free, spontaneous, and joyous existence. Vive L'Anarchie!

MR. MANN AND THE SOUL.

Sir,—Freethinker, August 11, p. 421. I agree that Denniss is an ass, his allusion to the "drunken soldiers" shows that he has hardly ever read what he wants to refute. But on p. 429 W. Mann shows nearly the same kind of stupidity. He quotes Sylvanus Thompson's remark about the spiritual perception, which is unintelligible to the man who has it not; and Mann thinks he answers Sylvanus Thompson by saying "competent travellers tell us of numerous tribes who have no idea of God whatever." Who said they had? Not Sylvanus Thompson, if Mann's quotations are representative. Sylvanus Thompson said, in effect: "Some men have a sense of the non-physical." Mann answers as if he had said "All men have a sense of God." The former is true, the latter is false.

I, for instance, know I am not a mere function of my body; I lived before it, and will live after it. "Abracadabra" says I am "a liar, however sincere." "Abracadabra" is, as Sylvanus Thompson says, like a blind man denying sight. But I don't claim any knowledge of an almighty and all-good being; indeed, I am pretty sure there is none, though there are some many trillion times wiser and better than I am, and some equally worse.

NIETZSCHE AND GERMANY.

Sir,—Your contributors have on more than one occasion vindicated the character of Nietzsche's philosophy in the face of clerical and lay prejudice, but I do not think sufficient stress has been laid upon his absolute horror of what is known as "Higher Politics," the power behind the "mailed fist" of nations to-day.

I was led to this reflection on looking through the correspondence columns of a back number of the Nation and seeing his name associated with "Prussianism" in a letter written by a few Russian bourgeoise resident in London.

This of a man who cynically referred to Italy's part in the Triple Alliance as a "mesalliance," with the "Empire" who suggested the word "German" as a symbol of depravity, who realized the hopelessness of addressing his message to a people infected by what he called "Rhinoscera, the worm of Empire," and whose ultimate mental breakdown is to be attributed in no small degree to the rude and vulgar treatment his refined and sensitive spirit experienced at the hands of the sons of "Europe's Flat land."

One stands abashed at the dishonesty of slandering what one has not even tried to understand. I know of a dear man—long since asleep in France—to whom the call to resist German aggression was strongest on account of his devotion to the principles as enunciated by the great Basle philosopher. Imprimatur.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President:
CHAPMAN COHEN.

Secretary:
MISS E. M. VANCE, 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

Materialism.

There has of late been much talk in some quarters as to the dangers of Materialism. The warning is an old one. The main purpose of these warnings is, of course, to warn the timid off something which is extremely dangerous to all forms of superstition. But the clergy in particular seek to attain their end by using the word Materialism in a double sense, and while offering one for criticism really working on the other. For Materialism may be used in both a moral sense or in a purely scientific one. Scientifically, Materialism may be taken as meaning that all natural phenomena are ultimately explainable by mechanical formulæ, and that life and mind are elaborate and complex results of purely natural forces. From this point of view the connection between Materialism and morality is about as close as that between geography and genesis, Manhattan and midwifery, or Homer and homœopathy. Apart from this is a secondary social or moral meaning—that of devotion to sensual gratification, with an ignoring of the higher aspects of life. If the protest were only against this last form, it would be endorsed by Freethinkers. But the policy of the clergy is to confuse the two senses of the word, and having proved that certain people are Materialists in the scientific sense of the word, convict them on the moral issue. The trick is characteristically Christian, for in the scale of intellectual virtues Christianity stands as near the bottom as may be.

Who Are the Materialists?

Now, surely, the last thing that can be brought against scientific and Freethought workers is that they are materialistic in a social or moral sense. On the contrary, their very idealism has often earned them the ridicule of their fellows. Scientific workers have not gone over the country parading their self-sacrifice with the unctuous selfishness of religious believers, but the last thing that could be said of them is that their lives were selfish or sensualistic. And the same is true of Freethought workers. All over the country hundreds of men and women are found publicly devoting themselves to a cause that can offer them no "worldly advancement, and can only promise slander and abuse." They go on bearing this petty persecution for a cause which the ordinary Christian repudiates because the solid and immediate personal gain is insufficient. And this very real idealism is the more admirable because it is so often consummated in solitude. It is comparatively easy to undergo martyrdom in a crowd, or to suffer persecution in a cluster. The test of character is to be alone—like Bruno at the stake—and then find in one's principles sufficient strength to stand against all that bigotry can achieve. The idealism of the Materialist is a standing rebuke to the Materialism of the Christian.

The Meaning of an Attack.

As a matter of fact, a great many of the arguments of Christians against Freethinkers turn on the Materialism of the former and the idealism of the latter. Everyone is familiar with the argument that in destroying the belief in future rewards and punishments the Freethinker is sowing the seeds of a widespread immorality. And what is this but saying that human nature in itself is neither hopeful enough nor helpful enough to find in conduct sufficient incentive or reward. Our offence here is that our ideals are too high; human nature will not respond to them; it needs palpable rewards or punishments. This may be true, but it is ridiculous calling those materialistic who champion Freethought. The ethical Materialism clearly belongs to the Christian. It is the same with the whole of Christian teaching. Charles Lamb said that he always felt like saying grace before reading Shakespeare; and in a Christian country this is regarded as a joke. But why not? If a man believes in God, why not thank him for Hamlet or Lear? The Christian who is so afraid of the effects of Materialism, reserves his grace for his dinner. His æsthetic feelings centre about the region of his stomach.

Christian Influence on Life.

Let us leave theory, and come to facts. Apart from all theory, could life be conducted on a more materialistic basis than it is in this Christian country after centuries of Christian nurture? Among select circles the artist, the man of letters, the scientist, the reformer, may each receive a measure of appreciation. But what of the mass of the people? It is a sober fact that with them the successful prize-fighter, the famous footballer, the victorious soldier, cuts a far greater figure. What is the ideal character placed before young men just entering life? Not the man who has devoted his life to high ideals, but the one who begins as a poor boy, and by the practice of a miserable thrift, and by qualities of a more or less "toadyish" description has amassed a fortune in solid cash. And once the fortune is made, the man with the money-bags is nowhere so sure of servile attention, flattery, and adulation, as in Church or Chapel. Not on the Stock Exchange is the man of money worshipped so much as in the religious meeting-house. We look down upon our hard-working but poor student, we praise and pension our successful fighting man or idolize our great merchant. Ruskin said that the motto of the Englishman was, wherever he was to get somewhere else, and whatever he had to get more, while the Christianity of England, in practice, was such, that if engineers could build a tunnel to hell, Christians would invest their money in it and close all the churches for fear of lowering the dividends. Is this more than a brutal summary of facts? We have of late been deluged with the speeches about the greatness and the might of England; our Christian humility being quite consonant with self-laudation of the most nauseous character. But if we take the overwhelming majority of people, can we say that their conception of England's greatness ever reaches higher than that of power and money, territory and trade? It is the heretic who is always insisting that character is of more importance than cash; that all the trade and all the territory in the world will not save a country from decadence when it forgets that its only real and permanent wealth is the kind of men and women it breeds. * * *

A Demoralizing Creed.

In the vicious and ethical sense of the word, Christianity is a materialistic religion; Christian peoples are materialized by the influence of their creed. A religion that had held up sane and lofty ideals during its history, which has based its teachings upon realities while holding up the ideal of a gradually perfected human society, would have made impossible the money mania of the past four or five generations, as well as have prevented the cataclysm it is now experiencing. But the real worth of Christianity is seen in the fact that it could offer nothing to oppose the more demoralizing tendencies of modern life. Far from opposing them, it sanctioned and defended them. And its opposition to intellectual development and independence involved the brutalization of life all round. The condemnation of theology, said one writer, is its history; and a complete condemnation of Christianity is seen in the present condition of a world in which the Church has stood as a great moulding influence for so many centuries.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

"Our Holy Mother Church."

IV.

IT is often truly said that one of the most effective methods of disproving the Divine origin and character of Christianity is to explain its teaching; but it is equally true that no complete exposition of its dogmas is possible without utilizing to the full the witness of history. It is a generally acknowledged fact that of the history of the Christian Church no one can honestly feel proud. On this point even Christian scholars are in perfect agreement. We would naturally have thought, for example, that the Church would have been seen at its highest and best in its General Councils, convoked as the courts of final appeal on all theological and ecclesiastical questions. They were composed of the wisest, holiest, and most learned men of whom the Church could boast, the sole purpose of whose meeting together was to deliberate with the utmost reverence, self-renunciation, patience, and good temper on the various subjects submitted to them. As a matter of fact, however, such Councils were notoriously turbulent, veritable fields of battle where bitterest animosities and hostilities ran riot, and the most venerated Fathers in God were literally at one another's throats. Nobody can read the account of the famous Council of Nicæa, as related by Dean Stanley in his Eastern Church, and believe that its decisions were arrived at through the guiding influence of the Holy Ghost. Surely the Holy Ghost was conspicuous only by his absence from that Council; and the same thing may be said of most other similar gatherings. Dean Milman says:—

> Nowhere is Christianity less attractive, and if we look to the ordinary tone and character of the proceedings, less authoritative, than in the Councils of the Church. It is in general a fierce collision of two rival factions, neither of which will yield, each of which is solemnly pledged against conviction. Intrigue, injustice, violence, decisions on authority alone, and that the authority of a turbulent majority, decisions by wild acclamation rather than after sober inquiry, detract from the reverence and impugn the judgments, at least of the later Councils. The close is almost invariably a terrible anathema, in which it is impossible not to discern the tones of human hatred, of arrogant triumph, of rejoicing at the damnation imprecated against the humiliated adversary (History of Latin Christianity, vol i., p. 202).

We now come to the Council of Constance (1414-18), convened after Christianity had been in power for upwards of a thousand years. At this time there were three Popes, each claiming the allegiance of Christendom. A few years previously (1409) a Council had been held at Pisa, which deposed Popes Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII.; and the following is the sentence pronounced upon them:—

> The Holy Universal Council, representing the Catholic Church of God, to whom belongs the judgment in this cause, assembled by the grace of the Holy Ghost in the Cathedral of Pisa, having duly heard the promoters of the cause for the extirpation of the detestable and inveterate Schism, and the union and re-establishment of our Holy Mother Church, against Peter di Luna and Angelo Corario, called by some Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII., declares the crimes and excesses, adduced before the Council, to be true, and of public fame. The two competitors, Peter di Luna and Angelo Corario, have been and are notorious schismatics, obstinate partisans, abettors, defenders, approvers of this long schism; notorious heretics as having departed from the faith; involved in the crimes of perjury and breach of their oaths; openly scandalizing the Church by their manifest obstinacy, and utterly incorrigible; by their enormous iniquities and excesses they have made themselves unworthy of all honour and dignity, especially of the Supreme Pontificate; and though by the canons they are actually rejected of God, deprived and cut off from the Church, nevertheless the Church, by this definitive sentence, deposes, rejects, and cuts them off, prohibiting both and each from assuming any longer the Sovereign Pontificate, declaring for further security the Papacy to be vacant.

A new Pope, Alexander V., was duly elected by the grace of the Holy Ghost; but, unfortunately, Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII. declined to be deposed, each, by the grace of the same Holy Ghost, calling himself Christ's sole Vicar on earth. Alexander V. died, and was succeeded by John XXIII. It was in order to put an end to this disgraceful schism that the Council of Constance was convoked conjointly by the Emperor Sigismund and John XXIII. Assuming the legality of the proceedings of the Council of Pisa, John was looked upon as the rightful Pope; and he presided at the early sessions of the Council of Constance. It was a huge assembly, consisting of four Patriarchs, twenty-nine Cardinals, thirty-three Archbishops, one hundred and fifty Bishops, one hundred and thirty-four Abbots, two hundred and fifty Doctors, one hundred and twenty-five Provosts. "With their whole attendance the clergy amounted to eighteen thousand." It was also a tumultuous assembly. The holy men quarrelled over almost every question brought before them. John curried favour on the right and on the left, and, for a time, seemed to be gaining in popularity. He was a man of the most scandalous character. There was scarcely a crime he was not charged with having committed. He tried bribery, heaping gifts and promises upon the cardinals. He admitted the truth of many of the charges against him, of which there were between fifty and sixty. The feeling against him grew stronger and stronger, until there was a well-nigh general demand for his cession of the Papacy. Like a coward, he took refuge in flight. Eventually he was deposed, and his two rivals as well. It took months of plotting and counter-plotting, and of endless intriguing, to bring the deposition about. So far the Council had assumed and acted on the assumption of its superiority to the Pope; but no sooner was the new Pope, Martin V., elected, who was a strong personality, than it was reduced to a position of slavish subordination. Even the Emperor prostrated himself before the Pontiff, thus recognizing his supremacy. To those who clamoured for reforms his Imperial Majesty bitterly said: "When we urged that reform should precede the election of a Pope, you scorned our judgment and insisted on first having a Pope. Lo, you have a Pope, implore him for reform. I had some power before a Pope was chosen, now I have none." As Milman remarks: "The Council saw its fatal error. In creating a Pope of high character, it had given itself a master." Martin was really opposed to reform, his one ambition being to regain the temporal power.

In the fifteenth century several Councils were held, but practically no reform of the Church resulted. In the words employed the Holy Ghost was much in evidence, but in the deeds of the Papacy there was no trace of his presence. The Pope was again the nominal head of Christendom, but his rule gave rise to a steadily growing amount of popular discontent. Everywhere there were loud complaints against his greed and avarice. Of holiness there was none, and true motherliness was wholly lacking. And from that day to this the Church has been on the downgrade. The learning which it suppressed on coming to power revived, and, for the last three or four centuries, has been slowly but surely exposing and supplanting its quondam suppressor.

The Triumph of Darwinism.

Souls tempered with fire,
Fervent, heroic, and good,
Helpers and friends of mankind.
—Matthew Arnold.

Sixty years ago Charles Darwin demonstrated that man has attained his present state through a gradual process of evolution from a lower and less perfect state. The general admission of this truth sweeps away at once the old Biblical legends which men have been accustomed to consider a sufficient explanation of all things. The legend of a fallen race at once disappears, and with it goes the myth of the Devil, and all other strange and monstrous explanations that were necessary to harmonize the theological theory put forth. With it also goes the Bibliolatry which—like so many other idolatries, has served to enchain and cramp the human intellect. The Bible of the ancient Hebrews must descend from its lofty pedestal and take its rank among the sacred books of other and older nations.

Nothing more momentous has taken place since the Renaissance. And, strangest of all, this intellectual lever, which will finally overthrow all existing creeds, has come among us so silently that many have scarcely noticed its approach. Opposition there has been, as there is to all new truths; but, compared with the momentous issues at stake, the opposition has been trifling. Silently and steadily, for sixty years, Darwinism has been resistlessly pushing its way till no educated man or woman now attempts to contravene it. There has been no "bridal birth of thunder peals" while this "great thought has wedded fact." To the clergy and their congregations, whose innocence will not permit them to follow intelligently the course of scientific thought, the new theory must appear like Banquo's awful ghost to the amazed Macbeth. They look up suddenly from their crosses, candles, and their prayers, and see the awful shape in front of them. Adam and Eve, the Lord God and the Devil, are driven out from the Garden of Eden, not by an angel with a flaming sword, but by Charles Darwin, with the more potent weapon—a steel pen.

Since Darwin's death, the clergy, who formerly denounced him with the whole vocabulary of theological abhorrence, have, hypocritically, claimed him as one of their flock. They buried this black sheep in Westminster Abbey, and calmly pretend that the teachings of Evolution is wholly in accord with that of the Church and the Bible. Only two religious bodies have been honest in this matter. Poles asunder in many respects, the Roman Catholic Church and the Salvation Army have remained faithful to ignorance. On no condition will they part with Eve and the apple and the talking snake. Catholics and Salvationists alike believe that Darwin and his colleagues are suffering the tortures of the damned. These uncultured folk no more believe in evolution than they understand the rudiments of science. But those who are trying to effect a compromise between the irreconcilables, religion and science, from the Archbishop of Canterbury to the glib speakers on Pleasant Sunday Afternoon platforms, are assuring us that the great truths of evolution are all in harmony with the Hebrew Bible, and that the discoveries of science are an assistance to religion.

All this Christian camouflage might succeed were it not for the fact that men have so many other sources of information than the pulpit utterances of their "pastors and masters." The publication of the Life and Letters of Sir Joseph Hooker should make many persons think furiously. For in these volumes Darwin, being dead, yet speaks on these tremendous matters. From the letters of this lifelong friend of Darwin we get a wonderful picture of the group of men who made the nineteenth century illustrious by throwing a new light into every corner of human thought. The very names are an inspiration: Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, Lyell, Hooker, to mention no others. In these pages we find recorded something of the beginnings of the great struggle for the theory of evolution, already so potent a force, yet only, in its modern form, sixty years old. Once more the salient facts are recounted, the facts which are ever in danger of being obscured, misrepresented, or forgotten.

Slowly, with lapses into its "loved Egyptian night," mankind is shaking itself free of the last desperate clutches of superstition. Bewildered by the new light, missing at first the guiding hand of the priests, it stands amazed on the threshold of the future. The fundamental question of man's place in nature has been solved, and the wide acceptance of evolution has already begun to bear fruit in all practical affairs of life. Sooner or later it will lead mankind to a happier, more consummate condition of life, and to loftier ideals:—

New occasions teach new duties, time makes ancient good uncouth,
They must upward still, and onward, who would keep abreast of truth.....
Nor attempt the future's portal with the Past's blood-rusted key.

Mimnermus.

The bliss of man (could pride that blessing find)
Is not to think or act beyond mankind. —Pope.

Is Religion of Use?

Dr. Lyttelton's Reply.

SIR,—The title at the head of this letter is the one you gave to your last article. I repeat it, though proposing to-day to move the discussion forwards and downwards to a new fundamental issue. Meantime, let me say, our readers—if we have any—ought to be grateful to you for lucid writing. It is a great thing to be dealing with an interlocutor on questions concerning religion who always makes his meaning clear; else, as was once remarked, you only have his own word for it whether he is in the clouds or in the mud.

Let us take your statement of the point now reached, which I will not traverse, because it lets down a shaft into a region whither I have all along been desirous of penetrating, viz., your own positive beliefs about progress; and, if I am not mistaken, they would be not incorrectly stated as follows: Certain non-religious social forces have in the past been associated with religion and have curbed the latter, preventing it from producing far more mischief than it actually has produced, being "an essentially irrational and progressively harmful thing." The rest of your article explains how in the infancy of societies man revealed his childish "volitional" view of nature, and you also give some hints as to these remedial progressive social forces to which mankind owes so much.

Now, I propose to shift the discussion away from the question as to the correctness of your view of man's history, because, as already urged, the discussion of anything historical nearly always leads on to a quagmire, which, owing to its trackless character, is noisy with dissentient voices. It has all the disadvantages of a wilderness combined with the tumult of Cheapside. But if we look at your assumption as to this remedial corrective power which has all along been, and still is, at work cleansing men's minds and sloughing off the outworn rags of religion from the limbs of the body politic, it is plain that we shall be considering something, not of antiquarian, but of present-day interest—to wit: a power for good which not only is operating to-day but is certain to be victorious.

What, then, of this power or these "forces" to which so much is attributed? If this were a vulgar newspaper controversy, which, I am thankful to say, it is not; you would expect me to argue that there is no such thing as this power, or that it is a woeful mistake to suppose that it has acted beneficially, and so on. I am going to do no such thing, simply because I heartily agree with you about the existence of this power and the effects of its operation; and, further, I see hope of a real clearing of the air if we examine into the nature of the thing, and see if we can discern any laws of its working. You imply there are laws, and, again, I agree.

We seem to be like two men engaged in digging for a treasure in the field. One of them (A) has for a long time been saying that he has found it. The other (B) shouts from the hole he has been excavating that A is wrong in supposing that what he has found is a treasure at all; it is really quite worthless, and essentially baneful. A then rejoins: "Never mind that; if it contents me, that is something; but what I wish to ask is, what is the nature of your find? Because I strongly suspect that you have come upon another portion of the same treasure, but for some reason, not very plain to me, you are eager to show that your find is wholly different from mine, in quality and in operation. You seem to think we should both be happier men if this fundamental difference could be established, whereas I feel certain we should not be the happier for that at all; quite the reverse; and that even if you were right in your surmise, it behoves us both to clear up the question, Is our treasure the same or different? because we both believe in the advisability of following after Truth."

In other words, what you, Sir, call social forces, I call God; and the question now looms in sight why you shrink from using the same title; my conviction is that the more your assumption is examined, the more Theistic it will be found to be.

For it has to be observed that these forces are credited with an amazing strength. Anything that raises public opinion on social habits must be uncommonly strong; the public being like a bulky and unskilled mountain climber, full of enthusiasm about getting to the top, but ponderous when it comes to hauling him up the face of a rock. But the forces in question, according to your estimate, have till quite lately been restricted to a tiny, almost invisibly small, section of mankind; I mean those who can fairly be called non-religious. I am here relying on the information of travellers and other learned people, who tell us that there is hardly such a thing as a tribe in the wildest regions of the earth's surface who have not shown that they believe in a God of sorts, and in their own strange way worshipped him. Now, whether we agree with this estimate or not, whether we deplore it or not, is not the question. I affirm that in any case we may only imagine the truly non-religious people to have been a very small minority of the whole number at any given moment. Thus these ameliorative forces, though working in a tiny number, have done a very wonderful thing, even if they should fail in fulfilling your forecast and finally purging mankind from error and unprogressive ways. They have been, and are, lifting the mass of their fellow-men—say some ninety-five per cent.—right up and above the slough of superstition.

We have, surely, gone far enough now to face the really interesting question: Can we define at all clearly what and whence these social forces are? May I invite you to do what our card-playing friends—before the War, of course—used sometimes to do—lay some of your cards on the table? or go back to my previous figure: will B, for a moment, leave off denouncing A's treasure, and tell us as plainly as he can how his own differs from A's? I am afraid A's notion that it is the same treasure all along may strike B as little better than blasphemous, but that is no reason why B should not comply.

E. LYTTELTON.

Before Worship.

"THE church bell's ringing; hurry up, my dear.
It's turned the quarter—so we must make haste.
The weather is all right—the sky quite clear.
I think this hat is in the best of taste.
It's hardly right, as I was saying to dad,
To dress for church in brightly coloured things.
A quiet blouse with georgette's not so bad.....
A simple hat.....I always hated wings!
Now, are you coming, dear? Please hurry, do.
We're never there in time—you're always late.
What's that? You've lost your hymn-book, and your Prayer-book too!
Oh! how much longer have I got to wait?
Perhaps you left them —— Now, just let me think.....
Behind the workbox on the mantleshelf?
Or on that desk where mother puts the ink?
Oh! let me come—I'll look for them myself.
Why, here they are, upon the new hall chair,
Just where you left them. What a head you've got!
Now, come along.....We are a lively pair!
The church bell's stopped, and we shall have to trot."

That Revival of Religion.

> The weakest thing about the Victorian age was not its admiration for its great men, in which it will presently be recognized to have been mainly right, nor its interest in ethics, which is in fact its closest link with all the greatest ages of the spirit of man, but a strange delusion into which many of its abler minds were led by its prodigious achievements in science, and the vulgar by its mechanical discoveries. Twenty years ago the writer of these words heard an ordinary fairly intelligent Victorian say that he had "outgrown poetry." The speaker was a man as innocent of the mysteries of machines as of those of the Spencerian philosophy, and he certainly did not know how typical of his age he was. Nor was either he or his age at all aware that the process he referred to is not in fact one with which any word having any connection with growth has anything at all to do. Man cannot live by material progress, mechanical inventions, physical science, and an intellectual system of beliefs or disbeliefs; and the completed bankruptcy of the notion that he can is the greatest achievement of the last thirty years. It has been more complete and conspicuous in France than in England perhaps, and perhaps it was more needed there than here. But it has been very visible in England too. The people who thought that religion and art and poetry belonged to the childhood out of which mankind was passing are dead; and art and poetry and religion are not dead.—"Times" Literary Supplement, July 4, 1918.

THIS solemn nonsense forms one of the latest examples of the constantly recurring assertion that the present age is predominantly religious, succeeding to one predominantly irreligious; and here it is amplified to include poetry and art as being then under eclipse. If we understand the writer, he would have us believe that—

(b) The Victorian age was an age of triumphant science and materialistic intellectualism, devoid of religion, science, and art.

(c) The present time is characterized by a repudiation of these tendencies, and has returned to religion, etc.

These statements we oppose (as Gladstone said) by a very simple method: "Everything the honourable gentleman has affirmed I shall deny; everything he has denied I shall affirm," as thus:—

(b) The Victorian age was when the great discoveries of science had to struggle for recognition, when Lyell and Darwin were reviled and ridiculed by nearly all popular leaders, such as Gladstone, Beaconsfield, Salisbury, when books on the "wonders of creation" were decorated with hymns and pious invocations, when the mild heresy of Essays and Reviews was stigmatized by the good Lord Shaftesbury as the "spawn of hell" (what would he have said to the deliverances of the present Bishop of Hereford?), when Sunday was still a day of penance. It was the era of great preachers and successful revivalists like Spurgeon, Liddon, and Moody, of the immense circulation of devotional books, such as Macduff's, Goulburn's, Oxenden's, of the High-Church Movement, of the "miracles" of Lourdes. Rationalism truly was dawning; its day was at hand. But unpoetical the Victorian age was not; we need but recall the names of Tennyson, Browning, Swinburne, Whitman, Hugo; in prose imaginative literature it saw Thackeray, Dickens, George Eliot, George Sand, Turgenev; in art, the maestri cited above, and others.

(c) That a secular and rationalistic spirit prevailed at last, and is now prevailing, is evidenced by the falling off in attendance at church and Sunday-school, and the popularity of Sunday cinemas, Sunday games, and Sunday excursions, unthinkable fifty years ago, by the tone of the popular press and of the leading novelists (mostly avowed Freethinkers), but the departure of religious allusions from manuals of natural history, even those issued by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, by bishops warning us not to teach the Bible uncorrected by Darwin, by the greater and greater dependence on materialistic rather than "spiritual" aid, e.g., at the War disease is combated, not by holy water from the fount of "Our Lady of Lourdes," but by ordinary, unsanctified HO^2 just run through sand or treated with bleaching powder.

It is a little amusing—we may add—that, according to Dr. Lyttelton, that urbane but earnest Christian advocate, the religious revival took place, not thirty or forty, but 150 years ago.

Moreover, according to Professor Bonney and other pietists, when animadverting on present-day phenomena of which they disapprove, society is now suffering from a "flood of materialism," made in Germany, needless to say. The old adage: "Set a thief to catch a thief" (mutatis mutantis, as the back of the dictionary has it, of course), seems appropriate here: set a Christian advocate to refute a Christian advocate.

J. F. RAYNER.

Acid Drops.

Scotland is moving. There are now Sunday bands in some of the parks, and the local Christian Endeavour Union and Free Presbytery have protested vigorously against this profanation of the "Sawbath." We think they are likely to protest in vain. Once the Scots get a good thing they will not easily let it go. We note that our old friend and contributor, Mr. H. G. Farmer, conducted the band of eighty performers at Kelvingrove. More power to him!

In view of the above we can understand why a discussion is going on in the Glasgow Record on "Has Religion Failed?" Some of the older folk will be thinking that religion is dead. Bands on Sunday! Newspapers discussing the failure of Christianity! There should be a great increase of Freethinkers in Glasgow in the near future.

There are good souls who do their little bit to alleviate the hardships of those ministers of the Gospel who have taken up their burden of poverty. Pastor Fort Newton, of the City Temple, who has to struggle along on a salary of getting on for a thousand a year, recently had 100 Treasury notes sent him, with the message, "For your holiday, from a big sinner." We wonder whether Dr. Newton wishes the message came from a bigger sinner?

Religion is admittedly at a low ebb just now, but the decrease in crime is extraordinary. The daily average population of convict establishments in this country before the War was 2,704, whereas to-day it is only 1,393. The county prisons' population has fallen from 14,352 to 7,335, and that of reformatories for inebriates from eighty-one to three.

The Young Men's Christian Association bids fair to become a firm of universal providers. It is now appealing for second-hand clothing and boots for discharged soldiers. Hence some of the young Christians will become "old clo'" men.

Cardinal Farley, Archbishop of New York, has been dangerously ill, and is now dangerously well again.

"There was a time when Martin Luther was popular in England," declares the Daily News. Things are come to a pretty pass when the grandmotherly Daily News lays this sort of Catholic nonsense on the decorous Nonconformist breakfast table. The reputation of "the solitary monk who shook the world" was not made by journalists; it cannot be upset by them.

The endowment of superstition goes on apace. An anonymous gift of £4,000 has been sent to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

On August 24, Rev. T. McDonna was charged at Edinburgh with "improper behaviour" towards two boys. In defence, it was said the accused was not conscious of having acted in a wicked way. The Sheriff said that, in view of the severe discipline of the Roman Catholich Church, he thought a fine of £20 would meet the case. Evidently the discipline of the Church had not been powerful enough to prevent the offence being committed.

Three clergymen—Rev. Sir P. Thompson, Rev. R. Sugden, and Canon Stephen Campbell—left between them estates valued at over £267,000. The mortification of spirit they must have undergone in bearing such a burden demands our deepest sympathy. Let us hope they will meet their reward.

Profanity is more popular than it used to be. The Daily Mirror recently published a paragraph concerning a woman-gardener with the headline, "Mrs. Adam." If this had appeared in the Freethinker, people would have called it vulgar and in bad taste.

Swearing in police courts is not usually a solemn process, but a young Russian girl nearly caused the policeman at the Thames Police Court to faint, when, taking the oath, she broke out with the words, "Everything I shall tell shall be the untruth." This was indeed a home thrust.

The mentality of the real religionist is always an interesting study to those who are interested in psychology. An interesting sample is supplied in a recent issue of the Express and Advertiser, Hawick. The anonymous writer describes how some allotment holders, in defiance of custom, religion, and the "unco guid," decided to cultivate their ground on Sunday. This dare-devil resolve took place in the spring. But the Lord was watching them. The Sunday workers planted their seeds a fortnight before those who attended church on the "Sawbath." With what result? A nipping frost came at a vital moment, blighted the seeds that had been sown on Sunday, and left untouched the seeds of the church-goers that had been planted a fortnight later! Thus, says the writer, "it pays to remember the Sabbath and the God who ordained it for the life and needs of man." Thus God punished the violators of the Sabbath—and helped Germany in its endeavours to starve England!

But that is not all. The same writer says that in the South of England there was a vegetable show, and the whole of the four prizes were won by men who, from religious scruples, would not work their land on Sunday. We should much like to know the name of the show and the names of the men. But we are left wondering about the munition-makers who work on Sunday. Does God do anything to them? Or does he only punish those who try to raise food, but blesses those who make shells? If God is half as curious as his advocate in the Express and Advertiser, we should not be surprised at anything.

Speaking on the Education Bill at the Glasgow Presbytery meeting last week, Dr. Brown Bellahouston said he did not grudge the Roman Catholics and Episcopalians their privileges, but surely it was reasonable to give the same privilege to the Presbyterian Churches which had 82 per cent. of the population of Scotland. We wonder how Dr. Brown arrives at his statistics? Does he include as Presbyterians all those who are not either Roman Catholics or Episcopalians, such as Freethinkers, Agnostics, Unitarians, Nothingarians, and others?

Holy Mother Church frowns at divorce, but many people laugh at the Church. Thirty-five decrees nisi were made absolute in one day recently in the Vacation Court.

Owing to the decrease of pauperism, a number of workhouses are being closed or amalgamated. Changed economic conditions have produced these alterations when centuries of praying have failed.

Newspaper proprietors all over the country are now charging the usual advertisement rates for notices of religious services instead of inserting them without charge as in pre-War days. If the promised revival of religion takes place, the dear clergy will find that publicity will be expensive.

An Anglican chaplain, who has served for nearly three years in France and Mesopotamia, testifies that the bulk of soldiers are utterly indifferent to religion, and that nothing like a revival has at any time taken place among them. He praises the men in everything except their attitude to religion. He cites the following incident as characteristic:—

> Here is a true instance of this kind of attitude in its application to prayer. The enemy is placing a heavy barrage on our lines. Here is a man on his knees, praying hard. A short distance away is another man, watching the "effect" of prayer. Questions of all kinds arise in his mind. Presently a shell kills the "praying man." See the attitude of the watcher: "To hell with prayer; I shall never pray again."

Sir William Tilden, speaking at King's College, said: "Our so-called educated classes were almost entirely ignorant of elementary science." This practically explains why so many people accept the fairy tales of the Bible without question.

A writer in the London Daily News declares that Billy Sunday's popularity is owing to his having been a baseball player, and his talk is reminiscent of his sporting days. The dear clergy insist that his popularity is due to religion, but they overlook the tens of thousands of preachers who are unpopular.

The American invasion of British pulpits is going on apace. In a short time the Gospel should "hustle" or "get a move on," and our home-grown sinners "hit the sawdust trail." Educated congregations may sing "The bells of hell go ting-a-ling, a ling."

The Rev. C. L. Drawbridge, Secretary of the Christian Evidence Society, has just published eight pamphlets against Materialism, Atheism, Secularism, and other kindred forms of unbelief, which even the Church Times damns with faint praise. Judged on their argumentative merits, "we should have been inclined to doubt if this very scrappy treatment of vast themes could really be convincing." We, on the other hand, are strongly inclined to pronounce the whole series, not merely unconvincing, but fundamentally fallacious.

To E. Romanes, writing in the Church Times for August 30: "it is incredible that people should think it worth while to spend money" on "efforts to undermine the faith of young soldiers." To us it is equally incredible that sane people can believe in a religion to the falseness of which all history bears irrefutable testimony, and which converts its genuine believers into despots who cannot tolerate the least opposition.

That there is some religion left in unexpected places is shown by the illuminated sky-sign above a Broadway (New York) cinema theatre, which reads, "To Hell with the Kaiser." This is the title of a picture-play being exhibited there. Let us hope that the management bring the audiences back again.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

IT is when need arises that one discovers one's friends, and the affection felt by readers for what so many of them call "Our Paper," is again shown by the appended first list of subscriptions to our "War Fund." Such a response is in the highest degree gratifying, although it would be mere affectation to say that we are surprised. We are not, but we are deeply impressed and appreciative. No editor ever had a more loyal body of readers, and the knowledge that they were there, ready to help when called, and often helping without the call, has been the one thing that has given us heart to press on in the face of all difficulties.

To adequately deal with all the letters received would require a special issue of the Freethinker, nor do I think it would make an uninteresting number. Many of the letters received are, however, of so generous, and even intimate, a character, that I can only thankfully acknowledge their receipt—and preserve them for re-reading on those occasions when one feels the need of a stimulant. I can only assure their writers that hard as the struggle has been, and is, these communications go a long way in the direction of repayment.

Amongst the first letters opened was one from a member of a whole family of sturdy Freethinkers—Mr. E. D. Side. He writes expressing his pleasure at being able to help, and hopes the response will be such as to at least put financial worries to flight. Mr. R. Wilson sends cheque in acknowledgment of our conduct of "the best paper he knows." Mr. W. D. Columbine writes:—

> All Freethinkers are indebted to you for the very able manner in which you are conducting the journal, and I am sure we ought to do all we can to relieve you of any financial burden in connection with the matter.

Mr. J. Pendlebury hopes for a long list of names and "a large total." The same desire is expressed by C. W. B. and many others.

Our old friend, Mr. T. Robertson (Glasgow), writes:—

> You have managed during the last year amazingly well. To require less in these times than was raised in pre-war days entitles you to the chairmanship of some of our government spending departments. It is a good thing there is no excess duty on minimized deficits. The £5 enclosed is a very small recompense for the pleasure derived from the pages of the Freethinker during the past twelve months, and for the feeling of pride I have in its conspicuous excellence.

Along with a personal compliment, Dr. P. M. McDermott says:—

> I have an especial affection for the journal, for it was through accidental contact with it that I was, from a staunch Goddite, converted, found salvation, and became saturated with the grace of reason.

If only half of those who have found "salvation" through this paper recognized it in the same way, what a host of readers and helpers we should have!

A cheery letter comes from Mrs. S. M. Peacock, of South Shields, whom we are glad to say continues her late husband's, and her own, interest in the Cause.

Mr. W. H. Blackmore proposes to send a monthly subscription until at least the end of the year. Finally, "Delta," in the course of a lengthy letter, says:—

> I am almost ashamed that I cannot send a cheque adequate to my desire. But such as it is, it comes from one who is in a position to appreciate the nature of the fight you are so successfully conducting. I have been connected with newspaper and publishing enterprises for over thirty years and, therefore, know something of the difficulties that must be met. Frankly, I was one who quite expected that, on the removal of so striking a personality as the late G. W. Foote, the Freethinker would have shared the fate of the National Reformer and the Agnostic Journal.....It would have been a triumph to have kept the Freethinker alive, but to have secured so large an increase in the circulation of the journal, and without asking from its readers more than in a time of peace, is indeed a triumph. As one writing, so to speak, from the inside, this is evidence of both business and organizing capacity that reflects credit on all concerned. After these four years, we Freethinkers can have the fullest confidence in the management of our paper, and the brightest hopes for its future.

As to the last sentence, we have in contemplation a development which will, we believe, be of considerable importance to the Freethinker, and to the Cause generally. On that matter we may write more fully a few weeks hence.

The following represents the subscriptions received up to the time of our going to press:—

First List of Subscriptions.

F. W. Hall, £50. C. W. B., £5. Mrs. F. Burns, £1 1s. Mrs. S. M. Peacock, £1 1s. H. Cairney, £1 1s. W. A., £2. Dr. P. M. McDermott, £10 10s. T. Robertson, £5. A. R. Wykes, 10s. J. B. Middleton, £5. CHAPMAN COHEN.

DAILY RULE.

Begin the morning by saying to thyself, I shall meet with the busybody, the ungrateful, the arrogant, deceitful, envious, unsocial. All these things happen to them by reason of their ignorance of what is good and evil. But I who have seen the nature of the good that it is beautiful, and of the bad that it is ugly, and the nature of him who does wrong, that it is akin to me, not (only) of the same blood or seed, but that it participates in (the same) intelligence and (the same) portion of the divinity, I can neither be injured by any of them, for no one can fix on me what is ugly, nor can I be angry with my kinsman, nor hate him. For we are made for co-operation, like feet, like hands, like eyelids, like the rows of the upper and the lower teeth. To act against one another then is contrary to nature; and it is acting against one another to be vexed and to turn away.—Marcus Aurelius.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

September 8, Maesteg; September 15, Aberdare; September 22, Birmingham; September 29, Southampton; October 6, Manchester; October 13, Swansea.

To Correspondents.

MRS. F. BURNS.—No one can value more than we do the appreciation felt by a good woman for the Freethinker. We should say that you are, by your life, reading your Christian friends a lesson it would be to their interest to master.

H. CAIRNEY.—We have no doubt we shall, as you say, "emerge successfully" from the fight against the present unparalleled difficulties. We are thankful for your help in pushing sales of the Freethinker. Shall look forward to seeing you soon.

D. D. B.—Thanks for subscription, also for sentiments expressed, which we greatly value. We are acting on the suggestion made.

J. S. BUCKLE.—Letters quite to the point. Impossible for us to fathom editor's reason for refusing to insert.

E. PARKER.—Have sent on label for waste paper. Will do as you suggest.

ONE of our readers would like to send a copy of the Freethinker to some soldier at the Front. We have no doubt this note will bring the required address.

LIBRA.—Thanks for new reader. We cannot have too many.

W. JANNAWAY.—The only guard against one person exercising undue influence over another is by education on the one side and a sense of moral restraint on the other. But the influence of one person on another is one of the inescapable facts of social life.

B. A. MILLICHAMP.—We are quite ready to send sacks for the transmission of waste paper. There is no need to wrap up parcels in sheets of brown paper. Tied securely with a label attached is quite enough.

C. M.—Thanks for birthday congratulations. You were in time. We achieved our half century on September 1.

T. C. LANGRIDGE.—Organic Evolution, by R. S. Lull, Macmillan, 1917, price 16s., is a work we can recommend for its comprehensiveness. As you say, the fact of evolution is questioned by none. It is the factors of evolution around which the discussion turns. The Romance of the Human Body will give you in a compact form an account of the human mechanism. Wells, Gardner & Co., 1917, price 5s.

V. H. SMITH.—We are obliged for the encouragement you are giving your newsagent to continue displaying the Freethinker.

ANNO DOMINI.—The suggestion you make is a flattering one, but hardly practicable now. Wait till we are out of the wood, then we shall be entitled to shout.

J. E. J. (Barrow).—The notes on Pastor Russell appeared in the issue for December 3, 1916. We hardly think the man's career is worthy of special attention in this paper.

W. SMALLRIDGE.—We are sending a parcel of literature for distribution. We hope it will be useful.

J. BREESE.—Your P.O. came to hand quite safely. We do intend to "keep the flag flying."

R. WILSON.—See "Acid Drops."

W. C. PUGH.—Sorry we cannot place the quotation, "There's none ever feared that the truth should be told, but he whom the truth would indict," for you. We are flattered by your kind words concerning the Freethinker. We may one day revive the special feature you name.

MR. J. BLACKHALL writes pointing out, in reference to Mr. Lloyd's article of August 25, that the place where the Papal Nuncio was waylaid and plundered was between Old Cumbris and Berwick, about seventeen miles north-west of the border city.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

There was a transposition of places in last week's announcement of Mr. Cohen's lectures. He lectures at Maesteg on September 8 and Aberdare on the 15, not vice versa as announced. The meeting at Maesteg to-day (September 8) will be held in the Gem Cinema, afternoon and evening, at 2.30 and 7 o'clock. We daresay there will be a good muster of Freethinkers if the weather is favourable, and, we hope, a good number of other folk.

It is some years since Mr. Cohen was in Aberdare, and his lectures there on Sunday next (September 15) will be held in the Grand Theatre, Aberaman; afternoon at 2.30, evening at 7. Admission is by silver collection.

Freethinker readers will be pleased to have something of Mr. T. F. Palmer's writings in a more permanent form than that of an article. The Story of the Evolution of Life has just been issued by the Secular Society, Limited, and it provides in a concise and comprehensive form an outline of the evidence upon which the theory of Evolution rests. The pamphlet is a purely propagandist effort, and is, therefore, issued at the low price (nowadays) of twopence, postage 1d. We hope to see the pamphlet secure the circulation it well deserves.

Mr. C. R. Richards writes:—

> The Freethinker seems more interesting than ever, judging by the correspondence I get from the fighting Fronts—France, Italy, and Mesopotamia. It is quite a bright streak in their lives, which they appreciate to the utmost. Never, they say, do you see a copy lying about idle, and at times it forms the basis of very interesting debates, in which the Atheist invariably comes out on top. It is good to know that you are able to carry on so successfully against such odds.

We are delighted to add this testimony to the others as to the part being played by the Freethinker in the theatres of war.

Our persistent "nagging" on the question of Secular Education has borne some fruit. We have received reports of forty-seven resolutions passed by Trade Union and other bodies, which have been duly forwarded to the Minister of Education. We should like to see this number greatly increased. Several friends have written suggesting that Mr. Cohen should issue a leaflet on the question. This may be done if he can find the time. Meanwhile there is already in print, in his Religion and the Child, an examination of the whole question.

The Swansea Branch opens its autumn meetings to-day (September 8) at 6.30, at the Elysium, with an address by "Casey," subject: "Music and the People." "Casey" is a skilled instrumentalist, and Dr. Vaughan Thomas will preside. Tickets for the lecture are 6d. each, and the proceedings commence at 6.30. We hope to hear of a good send off to the Branch's season.

A soldier writing from Palestine to the Bradford Pioneer says:—

> When I started this letter three days ago, I had made a resolution to quit fuming, and to try smiling instead. But to-day we had a compulsory church service, and once again I am raging. A church service is not a hardship, but to be compelled to attend is unbearable. To make things worse, the chaplain is a fool, and less than half the officers were present. Officers, apparently, do not need spiritual guidance. It was some consolation to see the whole service a fiasco, for the fellows wouldn't sing the hymns nor say the "Amens." The address was "The Beauty of Worship"—worship of a god who is all love and beauty. There was a prayer for "victory" and a "lasting peace," which was a pretty cool request, I thought.

May we again remind our readers that we are still collecting all the waste paper we can get in order to turn it into printing material? We are ready to pay the full schedule prices, and will send labels or sacks on request. This engaging in a kind of marine-store business is not a nice occupation, but we would go round ourselves and collect rags and bones rather than see the Freethinker "hung up," and we seem a long way from the end of the wood yet.

A Search for the Soul.

X.

HAVING fully noticed the materialistic theory of the relation of body to mind and the correlation of the brain and thought, we will now see what the great physicist, Sir Oliver Lodge, has to say upon the subject. In his Man and the Universe, that distinguished scientist says :—

> The brain is our present organ of thought. Granted; but it does not follow that the brain generates or secretes thought, or that every thinking creature in the universe must possess a brain. Really we know too little about the way the brain thinks, if it can properly be said to think at all, to be justified in making any such assertion as that.....The physiological mechanism called brain and nerve are our servants, not our masters: we have to train them to serve our purpose; and if one side of the brain is injured, the other side may be trained to act instead. Destroy certain parts of the brain completely, however, and connection between the psychic and the material regions is for us severed. True; but cutting off or damaging communication is not the same as destroying or damaging the communicator: nor is smashing an organ equivalent to killing the organist. When the Atlantic cable broke, in 1858, instant communication between England and America was destroyed; but that fact did not involve the destruction of either America or England (pp. 92, 93).

The foregoing statements, it is almost needless to say, are not in agreement with science; they are merely a sample of what Americans call "highfalutin." Sir Oliver Lodge commences by admitting that "the brain is our present organ of thought," and he immediately proceeds to modify that admission and to contend that it is not that organ at all, but merely an instrument that is controlled by the mind. It does not follow, he says, "that the brain generates thought, or that every thinking creature in the universe must possess a brain." The first of these statements evidently depends upon the second; for if there are "creatures" in the universe that have the power to think without possessing brains, then it might follow that the brain is not necessarily the only organ of thought. So far as we know, however, every thinking creature in the universe has some rudimentary kind of brain; but Sir Oliver, as a Spiritist, believes that the so-called "discarnate spirit" is a "thinking creature," and this accounts for the foregoing statements. The latter is, of course, a purely imaginary being.

Sir Oliver next says that the brain and nerves "are our servants, not our masters." This is pure nonsense; for if the brain by its action induces a state of consciousness called Will, its further action in another region to carry out the mandate of that Will is solely one of co-operation. There could be no Will, in the first instance, without the molecular action of the brain.

Sir Oliver says that "we have to train the brain and nerves to serve our purpose, and if one side of the brain is injured, the other side may be trained to act instead." These statements are questionable. We all know, for instance, that the motor nerves on the right side of the brain move the muscles of the left side of the body, and that those on the left side of the brain move the muscles of the right side of the body; consequently, an injury to the brain on either side might paralyse the voluntary motion of the muscles and limbs on the opposite side. Now, nearly three years ago a young man of my acquaintance received a wound on the left side of the brain, and, in consequence, all the muscles of the right side of his body were completely paralysed. How was the right side of his brain to be "trained" to do the work which the injured side was unable to perform? The young man did not know, neither did the doctors know. For two full years the latter were unable to effect any change; for the same period no power of will on the part of the wounded man produced any alteration. The young man remained with one side paralysed the whole time—and then died. Comment is superfluous.

"Destroy certain parts of the brain completely," says Sir Oliver, "and connection between the psychic and the material regions is for us severed." This is an apologetic method of saying that when the grey matter of the brain which generates thought is completely destroyed there can be more thought. To speak of a psychical and a material region as two separate entities which require a "connection" is simply misleading; there is no psychic region apart from the brain; the whole of that organ is material.

Next, after admitting that when the brain is destroyed the connection is "severed," Sir Oliver says: "True; but cutting off or damaging communication is not the same as destroying or damaging the communicator, nor is smashing an organ equivalent to killing the organist." Here we see that the resultant of the functioning of the brain (i.e., thought) is regarded as something quite apart from the cerebral organ, and, therefore, requiring "communication" between the two; also that smashing an organ is not killing the organist that plays upon it. This, again, is pure mystification. The brain is both organ and organist. In "smashing" the first, the second is annihilated. A more fitting parallel would be certain brain-cells of the organ and the music they give forth, the organist being the cerebral energy. Furthermore, we have the Atlantic cable analogue which indicates even more plainly how the brain and thought are regarded as separate entities. In this case, no one with a grain of sense could imagine that the breaking of the cable involved the destruction of England or America—a fact which the writer admits on the same page by saying that the argument is inconclusive. But why was such an inane argument ever employed?

Leaving Sir Oliver Lodge and his mystifications, we will now look at a few short extracts from Professor Huxley's lecture on a "Lobster." This physiologist in that lecture said :—

> Let us consider the tail of the lobster.....If I look at this physiologically, I see that it is a most beautifully constructed organ of locomotion, by means of which the animal can swiftly propel itself either backwards or forwards. .But how is this remarkable propulsive machine made to perform its functions? If I were to open one of these animals and take out the viscera only, leaving the white flesh, I should perceive that the lobster could bend and extend its tail as well as before.....Close observation of the newly opened lobster would soon show that all its movements are due to the same cause—the shortening and thickening of the fleshy fibres, which are technically called muscles.....The movements of the lobster are due to muscular contractility. But why does one group of muscles contract when the lobster wishes to extend his tail, and another group when he desires to bend it? What is it that originates, directs, and controls the motive power?.....In the head of the lobster there lies a small mass of that peculiar tissue which is known as nervous substance. Cords of similar matter connect this brain of the lobster, directly or indirectly, with the muscles. Now, if these communication cords are cut, the brain remaining entire, the power of exerting what we call voluntary motion in the parts below the section is destroyed; and, on the other hand, if, the cords remaining entire, the brain mass be destroyed, the same voluntary mobility is equally lost. Whence the inevitable conclusion is, that the power of originating these motions resides in the brain, and is propagated along the nervous cords.

In the foregoing extracts it is conclusively proved that what is called "an act of will" in the living organism can only be performed by means of the brain and nervous system. When the lobster experienced (in the brain) the desire to go backwards or forwards, its wish was telegraphed along the motor nerves to the muscles in the tail, whereupon the energy locked up in those tissues immediately caused the necessary contractions—the movements of the tail instantly following the desire. The case is precisely the same in man and the higher animals; we thus have a clear proof that what is ascribed to the agency of the soul by Dualists like Sir Oliver Lodge is really performed by the brain.

The Massacre of St. Bartholomew Day.

AUGUST 24 was the anniversary of the above-mentioned national crime, and it should be annually borne in mind by every Freethinker throughout the world as an instance of the effects of priestcraft and unchecked religious feelings. It also demonstrates the evil which follows the linking any religion with politics and State affairs.

Let us briefly review the tragical circumstances, and call to mind the doings upon that horrid and terrifying night.

The cause of all the trouble was the Queen-mother of Charles IX. who feared that the influence of the Huguenot faction would ruin her family. This Queen Catherine de Medici found herself supplanted in affairs of state by Admiral Coligni, the leader of the Huguenots, and it is certain that she, with the assistance of the Dukes de Guise, Anjou, Aumale, and others, arranged the massacre, and used the Catholic fanaticism among the people merely as a tool. On August 22 Admiral Coligni was shot at from a window by a follower of the Duke de Guise, and wounded in two places. This enraged his supporters who collected and demonstrated and threatened reprisals. The weak-minded king was easily persuaded that he was in danger, and gave the dreadful decree. It was arranged that the bell of St. Germain should toll out the signal to start the massacre in the dead of night. The guilty mother and horror-stricken son looked from the Louvre windows upon the proceedings. All Paris rang with the murderous cry "Down with the Huguenot! Kill, kill!" About thirty thousand men, women, and children were slaughtered, many in their sleep. All the next day it continued, until in the evening the King sent out his trumpeter to stop the slaughter. It is said that owing to the circumstances, every man could kill his private enemy without fear of any inquiry, and many Catholics suffered from this. Many of the large cities caught the infection, such as Rouen, Lyons, etc., and the Queen took no steps to prevent it.

The end of the story is one which every sensible person expects. The King died two years afterwards, a prey during all that time to bitter remorse and horror, and a broken spirit, filled with every mental and physical suffering.

An event of this nature could not have occurred without the connivance and assistance of the Catholic Bishops, and, as a matter of history, we know that it was blessed by the Pope. Owing to this, the whole responsibility has been debited against the Catholic religion by Protestants; but although we are assured of the universal mischievous effect of Catholic teachings, let us not put all the blame on that source of evil. Protestants and their ideas are also to blame, and until Freethought and Science disposes of all these notions of supernatural things, let us not rest in the idea that we are safe from such tragedies.

Freethought in Christian Circles.

ONE of the strange experiences of my life has been to observe how wide-spread is the principle of freedom of thought in Christian communities. I could write a volume of my experiences in connection with this permeation of freedom of thought right to the very citadel ef religious life. A few years ago I was approached by a most eloquent preacher—who, if I attempt to describe, would be instantly recognized, he is so strongly individualized—with the direct request, would I join his Church? Upon my expressing surprise, saying: "Oh, I know you cannot really know my opinions," he said: ", I know all about you, I know where you are, you are a good man, you want to live a good life, that is enough for us, I will ask you no questions at all. Give me your consent and you shall be made a member." I thanked him but declined. I know the case of a regular reader of your columns. I have seen his name among your subscribers, yet he has paid pew rent in a chapel for the past fifteen years for no other purpose than his interest in the ethical development of his family. He and his wife at times go to hear the minister. "Oh, he is a fine man; never mind what is his creed. He does you good at times to listen to him." This the justification for attendance upon things the mind has outgrown.

I knew the case of a lady of great culture and wide reading, who is an Agnostic. At her table are to be found at times officers of the Salvation Army. They know her mental attitude towards their beliefs. She subscribes generously towards their social work, saying, they have a mission for the slums which none other can do.

In Scotland there is a distinct phase of temperance—nay, prohibition—reform that is distinctly antagonistic to all religious teaching. The leader is just now in prison as a Conscientious Objector. His following have maintained a very high and earnest opposition to the drink traffic, but have been able to do this separate from religious association.

The other day I attended a Unitarian service. Beautiful hymns were sung; an invocation was read as prayer; the address was a very fine one upon the ancient sun-worshippers. To my own knowledge, every male attendant at that meeting was Agnostic—the preacher himself.

"Oh, I go to church for the choir and organ," said a blunt old shoemaker to me, recently; "I like to get my bass in the singing." This man is an Atheist, and has been one for thirty years of his life.

Go among the society of the Friends, the Theosophists the Free Christians—temperance and humane workers—and everywhere you find men and women who have outgrown creeds and beliefs, who find spiritual homes in churches which they know and realize are not really big enough for them; but they remain inside, but not really of it. Associations of friends, music, culture, reform, altruism in its widest aspiration, keep them there.

Some day a Church will arise big enough to embrace all the needs of mankind, all its moral and emotional aspirations. Was it not Mr. Bradlaugh who said, "No one ever sees a creed die"? It imperceptibly emerges to fit the new growth.

FREETHOUGHT AND THE PRESS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—The article by "Mimnermus" in your issue of March 31, 1918, emphasizes what has repeatedly been urged from our side, namely, that a very considerable proportion —perhaps the greater part—of our public does not care for the Christian religion, if not actually antagonistic to it.

Curiously, in the same issue, you lament, in your "Views and Opinions," that the "press" stands on the religious side. One may well ask, Why? You argue that journalists, knowing better, have to yield to the tastes and predilections of their readers.

Well, if "Mimnermus" is right, the journalists are wrong. That is all. I trust, and I have thought so for a considerable time, that such is really the case. The public would welcome a daily which is above bigotry and gives them trustworthy information. I do not mean that such a paper must be on the Freethought side, but it should give Rationalism and its activities the same representation as religion. It should be indifferent, as a journal.

I venture to suggest that some wealthy Rationalist, if such a person exists, might start a daily paper in competition with the existing leading papers. Of course, he must be a man of considerable means, because his paper would in the first period have to fight its way, not only against the real enmity of the Black Army and the papers under their thumb, but also against the commercial prudence of advertisers, who would not risk their money before the paper has sufficient readers. I have, however, not the slightest doubt but that it will, even from a purely financial standpoint, eventually be a huge success, and will eclipse the biggest present one-sided daily in popularity.

The proprietor must, of course, be a sound business man, and he will soon attract the best intellects of the journalistic world to his side, and the public will soon find out to which paper they have to look for real news and guidance, and for trustworthy information about politics, social matters, education, science, art, and literature.

Johannesburg, S.A. J. H. OERDER.

[We are afraid our correspondent underestimates the difficulty, apart from finance, of putting his idea into operation. We are working at breaking down the unofficial boycott, and the efforts made are meeting with some success. What a Freethought paper needs is persistent and adequate advertising. And that resolves itself into questions of finance and organization.—ED.]

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION IN SCOTTISH SCHOOLS.

SIR,—In yesterday's Herald you print the terms of an amendment to the Education Bill, drawn up by the Scottish Churches, etc. In it you refer to the "Conscience Clause" in 1872 Act, which gives relief to parents on behalf of their children. But what about a "Conscience Clause" for teachers who cannot conscientiously teach "religious" instruction? Is it fair that the exemption or relaxation which is granted to the child should be refused to the teacher? Certainly the number of teachers all over Scotland claiming this exemption might be small, but is that any reason why their case should not be considered? Teachers as a body are beginning to demand more control over the curriculum and over their conditions of employment, and are becoming more zealous of the rights of their members. This, then, I think, is a very proper question for the Government to tackle on behalf of a minority that is daily growing.

National Secular Society.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON AUG. 29.

The President, Mr. C. Cohen, occupied the chair. Also present: Messrs. Braddock, Brandes, Eager, Gorniot, Kelf, Leat, Neate, Neary, Palmer, Quinton, Roger, Samuels, Spence, Thurlow, Wood; Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, Miss Pitcher, and the Secretary.

Minutes of the previous meeting read and confirmed. Monthly cash statement presented and adopted.

New members were received for Bethnal Green, Goldthorpe, Maesteg, Sheffield, Swansea, West Ham, and the Parent Society (eighteen in all).

The President reported further activity in Wales, and it was also reported that summonses against Mr. F. Wood (South London) and the General Secretary (Miss Vance) had been issued at the instance of the L.C.C. for persisting in selling the Freethinker; the contention being that, although the permits issued to the N. S. S. were available to the end of September, they gave no authority for the sale of current numbers; therefore the matter would have to be dealt with again.

It was formally reported that the Special Committee elected by the Conference to formulate a scheme for reorganization had met on August 3 and 4, and their report would shortly be issued.

It was further resolved that the minutes of the Whit-Sunday Conference be sent to the Branches; and these comprise the report of the afternoon and a summary of the morning's proceedings.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Religion and Life.

Many of my readers will be acquainted with Herbert Spencer's method of reconciling religion and science. The contest between the two, he said, was due to a delusion. The business of science, he explained, was with the known and the knowable; the business of religion with the unknown and unknowable. All that we know, or will ever know, is outside religion, and belongs to science; but all that we either know now or can know at any future time, belongs to religion. And if each keeps to its own sphere, there can be no conflict. The humour of the reconciliation may have been unconscious, but it was superb. Under cover of a philosophic camouflage, religion was informed that it began where human knowledge, actual and possible, ended. Ignorance, complete and irremovable, was its empire. Religion could avoid slaughter by agreeing to commit suicide. The business of religion was to worship a vacuum, and the conflict between it and science had resulted from its attempting to deal with things about which something could be known. That, we admit, is a dangerous thing for any religion to do.

Keeping Things Distinct.

We were reminded of this famous "reconciliation" by a passage in Dr. Lyttelton's article in last week's Freethinker. Dr. Lyttelton also thinks that the quarrel between the Freethinker and the Christian is due to a confusion, not, it is true, that of either stepping outside his proper sphere, but that of failure to recognize that each is really concerned with the same thing under different aspects. What we call social forces, Dr. Lyttelton calls God. About that Dr. Lyttelton must be the supreme judge. If he chooses to deify, and, we presume to personify, social forces, we have no right to object, much as we may wonder what justification he has for so doing. For we are quite certain that religion has never meant by "God" a complex of abstract and impersonal forces. The God of religion has always been, to quote Mr. Balfour, "something other than an Identity wherein all differences vanish, or a Unity which includes but does not transcend the differences which it somehow holds in solution." These later forms we cannot but regard as being fundamentally semi-philosophic excuses for the retention of a belief which lacks either verification as truth or justification in utility. So that when Dr. Lyttelton wonders why we shrink from calling social forces God, our reply is, because they are not God. Our reason is exactly the reason we have for not calling a yard of calico a pound of treacle. Of course, we can do so if we please, and can, on the basis of our wayward nomenclature, defend the sweetening properties of calico. But we are quite certain that few will understand what we mean, and, even when they grasp our meaning, will continue to use the old word in the old sense. And, on the whole, it is really better to call things by the names that the rest of the world use when speaking of them.

The Force Behind Religion.

And here, we are afraid, we fail to deserve the compliment paid us by Dr. Lyttelton as to our "lucid writing." For as our friendly critic has failed to grasp the essential point of our article for September 1, we are bound to conclude that in that case, at least, we failed to make clear our meaning. After saying that we "credit social forces with an amazing strength," Dr. Lyttelton writes:—

> The forces in question, according to your estimate, have till lately been restricted to a tiny, almost invisibly small, section of mankind; I mean those who can fairly be called non-religious.....There is hardly such a thing as a tribe in the wildest region of the earth's surface who have not shown that they believe in a God of sorts. .....(therefore) we may only imagine the truly non-religious people to have been a very small minority of the whole number at any given moment.

Now, this certainly misses the whole point I had in my mind when writing—which may be due to my want of lucidity. For the whole point of my argument was that, instead of the operation of the social forces being confined to "an invisibly small section," their influence was felt by all. We said that "so far as man consciously adjusts conduct to circumstances" religion dominates; but that religious beliefs, under the pressure of the social forces, are being continually modified to meet social needs—the social forces thus acting as a selective factor. So that it is not the operation of the social forces that is confined to a tiny section; but the recognition of their real nature, the majority continuing—as a result of their want of enlightenment—to clothe the products of social life in a religious dress. To take an illustration, the agriculturalist who mutters a religious formulæ while planting his seeds, and who prays and performs religious rites during their fructification, will naturally regard the product as due to his religious devotion. The non-religious person, separating the essential from the non-essential, omits the religious business, and secures, other things equal, as good a result. It is not here a question of one obeying certain natural laws, and the other ignoring them. Both obey, the one blindly, the other consciously. The first stands for the religious phase of human history, in which natural conditions are observed, at least to some extent, in ignorance of their nature, but accompanied by religion. The second stands for the rationalistic phase in which man becomes conscious of the nature of the forces at work, and leaves religion on one side as unnecessary.

A Question of Interpretation.

I hope the above will make my position perfectly clear. Man discovers the nature of the forces at work, but he does not create them, nor do they commence to function only when he becomes conscious of them. Gravitation was a discovery, not an invention. Natural selection did not begin with Darwin, he merely became aware of its existenoe. The whole matter, the real point at issue in the long struggle between religion and science, or between religion and rationalism, is really one of interpretation. The world is the same for all. Natural forces and conditions are the same for all. Disease attacks Atheist and Christian alike, but whether it is called a "visitation from God" or an outcome of natural conditions is a question of enlightenment. The same constellations look down upon us that looked down upon primitive man. The difference of our attitude towards them is a question of knowledge. We have epileptics and lunatics with us, as Jesus is said to have had with him. We have the same cases of hallucination and delusion to-day that two centuries ago caused hundreds to be burned for witchcraft. The facts of life do not alter, it is our interpretation of them that changes. And that interpretation marks the dividing line between the one who believes in God and the one who does not. And so with all other facts. If we may say it without conceit or impertinence, there is logical room in my philosophy for Dr. Lyttelton, but there is no logical room in his for me. We can explaim him, can he explain us. The Atheistic view allows for the world starting religious and ending non-religious. Can the Theistic view allow for the reverse process?

The Value of History.

Finally, we really cannot appreciate Dr. Lytteleon's desire to avoid a discussion of man's history, because we feel that it is only in the light of human history that we can understand the question in dispute. Allowing that we are in danger of landing in a quagmire, surely this is not inevitable. And the question to-day is for millions of people—not whether the belief in prayer, or miracle, or God, or heaven is true, that question is quite settled for them. What remains is the question: "How did people come to believe in these things?" And when that question is settled the reason of their existence nowadays is easy to find. Moreover, if, as Dr. Lyttelton says, God is what we call social forces, the historical question still remains. As an Atheist I believe that what men have called God is really a personification of natural and social forces—including under the latter head human emotions and ideals. And we have suggested how it was that man came to fall into this blunder and so to misinterpret Nature. In a word, what we have to do is to separate the facts from certain mistaken interpretations of them. Or, if these interpretations are not mistakes, we think it is Dr. Lyttelton's task to explain what function of life cannot proceed as well without religion as with it.

The Authority of Jesus.

CHRISTIANITY, after a career of nineteen centuries, is still in the making, and its adherents are by no means agreed as to the best method of accelerating the process. This is true of it as represented under Catholicism. The development of doctrine in the Catholic Church is an intensely interesting and instructive study. No one can read the history of the General Councils without realizing that Christianity is an evolutionary product. We are reminded of Tennyson's well-known lines:—

> Man as yet is being made, and ere the crowning Age of ages,
> Shall not æon after æon pass and touch him into shape?

So it has been with Christianity in the Catholic Church. Many æons have passed and touched it into its present shape. This is truer still of it under Protestantism. Protestant theology being the most changeable thing under the sun; and it should not be forgotten that evolution implies dissolution. What we wish specially to emphasize just now, however, is that Christianity is in a vague, loose, fluid condition, liable to be affected by every wind that blows. Nothing is really and finally settled. Practically all questions relating to it are open, and are being freely debated. Dr. D. L. Ritchie, in a suggestive article in the Christian World for August 15, frankly admits that even the question of authority in religion is not closed, and that "there are trends of opinion and drifts to action among us that make it clear it must again be stirred." Then he ominously adds:—

> There is a sense in which it is always with us, and much confused thinking and vagrant policy would be escaped if only it were first frankly faced and settled. It is the sword that lies hidden in many of our controversies.

What a sad, humiliating confession for a minister to make in the twentieth century of his religion! It is a peculiarly Protestant confession, as Principal Ritchie himself acknowledges. He even speaks of "our present helplessness as Protestants and Free Churches" due to "our confusions here." Then he asks the old, familiar question:—

> Is the final seat of authority to be found in the Church, or in the Bible, or in the conscience, as God and his truth meet its needs? To that question there must be an unfaltering answer.

Unfortunately, however, to that question there are different and conflicting answers, each one of which is absolutely unfaltering. Has it never occurred to Dr. Ritchie that this fact alone proves conclusively that there cannot be any final seat of religious authority? He asserts that "Romanists do not hesitate in their reply, nor do Protestants who have thought through their position," which is doubtless true; but the determining factor is that Romanists and Protestants are at hopeless and fatal variance on the subject. Besides, Protestants are at loggerheads with one another on this fundamental point. The Principal is aware of this, as the following extract abundantly shows:—

> Certain it is that a clear decision must be made by many of our teachers, for the appeal in a circle, first to private judgment, then to the Bible, now to God known in the soul, then to the letter of Scripture, as either best suits, cannot longer be endured. It is the uncertain note that is so baffling and leads many to say that the dogmatism of Rome, with its Church authority, is to be preferred to the hesitation of not a little Protestantism. Does authority in religion rest on experience of God's grace, or on something external, be it an institution, or a person, or a book? If the latter, then to-day, with the results of scholarship in our hand, Rome, with its Church authority, is more strongly placed than a Protestantism with only a book authority, and how much more than the Church that trusts to neither and yet claims both! But all Protestantism that is not timid in its venture on God boldly affirms the former. It believes not only in a God who has spoken, but in a God who speaks, and that, too, as the Father, intimately and authoritatively, to all his children. And it claims the right to try the spirits whether or not they speak with the voice of the Father. The progressive religion of to-morrow will find its authority in God through experience.

We have now before us three different seats of authority, the Church, the Bible, and experience of God's grace; and Dr. Ritchie accepts the third. In reality, however, this is a trinity in unity, like the Godhead. The Church is a body whose head is Christ, and when it speaks it is Christ who speaks in or through it. The Church is the temple of the Holy Ghost, and it follows that its voice is divine and holy. The Bible, too, is the Word of God, and, no matter what scholarship may say, a clergyman is bound to treat it as such. Even Higher Critics, like Sir George Adam Smith, in so far as they are professional theologians, find in it the final revelation of God to the world. Both Church and Bible are fallible, in certain respects, but both are also, in certain other respects, God-given and God-filled. Is not the same thing true of individual believers? Do they not admit that they are at best but fallible, imperfect, and sinful, and yet is it not their proud boast that they are supernaturally born and supernaturally guided in all their ways? In what sense, then, can it be claimed that the seat of authority is in them rather than in the Church or the Bible? And what is the Church but a society or community of individual believers in whom God is supposed to speak? Dr. Ritchie laughs to scorn the notion that the Protestant Reformers rejected the Church and set up the Bible. "This is largely hearsay, not history," he rightly declares. "The Reformers claimed the right to try the Scriptures by the Gospel that made the Gospels." True; and yet it was in the Gospels and the Pauline Epistles that they found the Gospel; and having found it there they rejected any portion of the Bible which seemed to them to contradict it, as Luther condemned the Epistle of James. In any case, it was God's voice, whether in the Bible, in the Church, or in their own hearts, that appealed to them as finally authoritative.

Now, our contention is that God's voice, like God himself, is a figment of the imagination, possessing no objective reality whatever. Conscience is one of the noblest human faculties, but its decisions are determined alone by heredity and environment. A man's conscience is simply an expression of himself in his relation to his fellow-beings, or merely the voice of the social sense within him. In other words, it is the man himself as a member of society. A conscience cleansed by grace is, like sin, a theological invention. To be of any service conscience must be regnant, self-sufficient, and assertive, not submissive, humbled, and apologetic. To call it the voice of God is to woefully misunderstand and misrepresent it. Dr. Ritchie says that the seat of authority is found "in its obedience to the truth of Christ meeting its need and leading it forth bravely to witness"; but what is the truth of Christ other than theological fiction? Surely the Principal cannot mean by it the ethical teaching attributed to Jesus, for to that nobody ever dreams of rendering obedience, not even the most enthusiastic Christians. The Rev. Vivian T. Pomeroy, preaching at the City Temple, London, lately, asked: "What would ensue if the Sermon on the Mount were preached to-day?" He flatly denied that it is preached, and candidly confessed that he did not preach it. He was confident that no congregation would listen to him if he did, without protesting. Both Dr. Ritchie and Mr. Pomeroy are ordained ministers of the Gospel of Christ; but both are bound to recognize the fact that the Gospel they preach, in so far as it embodies the ethical teaching of the Gospel Jesus, is a dead letter, although they declare that "when war-madness has spent itself, when this interlude of measureless war is past, and the pride of man has utterly spent itself in wild rage, the authority of Jesus will be seen and felt like the peace of a storm-washed sky." That prediction has been indulged in millions of times before; but to-day the authority of Christ is as far from realization as it ever was, with the result that the utterances of the pulpit were never so unpopular, or received with such derision as they are at present.

The authority of Jesus has never been a reality in human history, and the authority of the Church is rapidly becoming a thing of the past. The priest of to-day is often laughed at as a nonentity even by multitudes who nominally believe in him. His day of power is gone for ever. He is already but a relic of the times of ignorance and superstition. The future shall know no other authority than that of enlightened and socialized reason. Under Christianity war has flourished, and myriads of its converts were won at the point of the sword. The present War is being waged in the name of God, and most of the belligerents profess that the establishment of the kingdom of Christ on earth is their sole aim. War shall cease only when the reins of national and international life are in the hands of Reason—scientifically trained and fully moralized.

J. T. LLOYD.

A Man Who Cheers Us All Up.

Do I view this world as a vale of tears?
Ah, reverend sir, not I. —Robert Browning.

THE function of the humourist is undervalued. In his little, unobtrusive way, the man who jests and sets you smiling back at him does a great service. The physiological value of laughter has never been appraised. Although doctors bestow a benevolent patronage on cheerfulness, and give it a minor place in the pharmacopœia, no one will dispute that the humourists are benefactors of society. And yet, with the exception of Rabelais, Cervantes, and Dickens—who is liked better for his pathos than his fun—humorous writers are held to be only second-rate literary artists. It is not that we do not laugh—though we do not laugh as much as we should—but we laugh apologetically, as if laughter were a weakness of humanity, a thing pertaining to the trivialities of life. So many people think that Vanity Fair, which is, on the whole, a serious book, is, therefore, greater than The Pickwick Papers, which is, on the whole, a comic book. Yet there is much to be said for the view that smiles are as important as tears. Falstaff is just as great a creation as Hamlet. It is allowed in all but the most pedantic circles that Shakespeare was a very great man, and his Falstaff is comedy in the highest.

The great Rabelais declared that laughter is the peculiar property of man; the outward sign which distinguishes the paragon of animals. The man that hath no music in him—we know for what he is fit; and just as certainly the man who has no laughter in him is fit for nothing that is of high service to man.

An advanced movement like our own can have no better champion than a humourist. And if the cause be a great one, and if the arguments, barbed by wit and winged by laughter, have any intrinsic worth, they strike the deeper and take the stouter hold because of the humorous nature of their presentation. In a theological discussion a laugh is a blessing, and a born humourist like Robert Ingersoll was genuinely our benefactor. Although a master of the lash, he used his whip caressingly. He does not cut his subject to ribbons like Jonathan Swift, nor, like Voltaire, sting like a thousand wasps. Rather is he like Voltaire, into whom has passed the geniality and suavity of Renan. It is a mellowed and a transformed Voltaire, looking upon a sadder and a busier world with the laughing eyes we know so well.

Ingersoll was a master of what Milton calls the "dazzling fence." His attacks on orthodoxy were answered over and over again by ministers of all denominations, and he drew Cardinal Manning and Gladstone into the controversial arena. In his discussion with Gladstone, the English politician taunted Ingersoll with riding a horse without a bridle; with letting his ideas run away with him. Ingersoll retorted crushingly that this was better than "riding a dead horse in a reverential calm." Huxley, indeed, claimed the victory for Ingersoll. "Gladstone's attack on you," he wrote, "is one of the best things he has written. I don't think there is more than fifty per cent. more verbiage than is necessary, nor any sentence with more than two meanings."

Men seldom talk as brilliantly as they write, but Ingersoll was an exception. A volume might be compiled of his clever sayings, not as invented or recorded in the author's study, but as expressed in society; not as it grew in secret like a flower the blooming of which all admire, but as it flashed forth like sparks from flint and steel in social interplay.

Ingersoll's conversation was full of epigrams and jests, the least of which must have been the envy and despair of politicians. When a friend, finding a set of Voltaire's works in his library, said: "Pray, sir, what did this cost you?" the Colonel answered: "I believe it cost me the governorship of Illinois." Speaking of a hot-headed and sanguine acquaintance, he said: "Show him an egg, and instantly the air is full of feathers."

One of his best stories was that of an excitable Fenian who was boasting of the condition of Ireland. The Irishman said: "We have got 30,000 armed men in Ireland. They are ready to march at a moment's notice." "But," replied the oher man, "why don't they march?" "Why?" retorted the Irishman, "the police won't let them." When Ingersoll first met G. W. Foote he was desirous of paying the English Freethought leader a compliment. At dinner Foote passed the oysters, and Ingersoll said, smiling: "Not like oysters, Foote! That's the only fault I can find in you." How good, too, was the Colonel's description of a banknote: "A greenback is no more money than a menu is a dinner."

When Ingersoll was on his first visit to the Pacific coast he was shown through the depth of the Comstock mines, and as he came out he remarked: "If there's a hotter place than this, I'll join some church." While he had his office at Washington, lightning struck and burned a church situated in the same terrace. Ingersoll said: "An offended deity may have intended that bolt for my office, but what marksmanship!" In response to an inquiry about Robert Collyer, he declared: "Had such men as Robert Collyer and John Stuart Mill been present at the burning of Servetus, they would have extinguished the flames with their tears. Had the Presbytery of Chicago been there, they would have quietly turned their back, solemnly divided their coat-tails, and warmed themselves." A woman preacher once called Ingersoll "an infidel dog," and he replied: "The lady would have felt annoyed had I referred to her as a Christian female of the same species."

Doubtless we can have, in Hamlet's phrase, "something too much of this." This is our own affair. The historian of wit does not invite us to a surfeit of it. He spreads the board; he can do no more, and should do no less. We may take it as they are said to take a play in China; or we may take a reasonable cut and come again. "Here is sixpence," said a father to his son, "Don't make a beast of yourself."

MIMNERMUS.

The Dark Diamonds of the Earth.

IV.

OUR Great Northern Coalfield extends for fifty miles, and the Tyne forms the main highway for the carriage of the fuel to the metropolitan consumer. The Wallsend coal so highly esteemed by the London public, arrives from the Newcastle region. Experts differ concerning the distance beneath the waves at which the mineral may be mined. Perhaps the estimate of Sir Lindsay Wood, that of three miles from the shore as a limit of working where the seams dip under the ocean is that most usually accepted. Elliot considered three-and-a-half miles a fair estimate south of the Tyne, while to the north of the river, Forster regarded two miles as the limit for undersea mining.

The coal measures of Scotland are valuable and important, and include the splendid coalfield of the Clyde Basin, the Midlothian and Haddington deposits, the Ayrshire, Fifeshire, and other formations. In 1904, Dixon placed the available resources of Scotland at 15,681,450 millions of tons. This total embraces a vast mass of fuel reposing beneath the bed of the Firth of Forth. Mining has been successfully conducted below the waters of the Firth at Bridgeness. A dense accumulation of clay rests on the bed of the estuary. This forms a wonderful waterproof barrier which permits the miners to labour in safety in the coal seams below. But were the pressure of the water to penetrate this barrier mining operations would be seriously handicapped. In a weighty address delivered in 1899, Dron forecasted the exhaustion of the proven coal deposits of Scotland by the close of the twentieth century. Let us trust that this gloomy prediction will remain unfulfilled.

Ireland also possesses coal, but most of her Carboniferous formations have long since vanished. A remnant, however, of Erin's original deposits has survived the tooth of time, and still remains for the service of man. Her southern beds embrace those of Clare, Cork, Carlow, Queen's County, Tipperary, Limerick, and Kilkenny. These seams contain anthracite, while the coal found in the counties situated to the north of a line drawn across the Island from Galway to Dublin Bay is bituminous. The Leinster coalfield (Queen's County, Tipperary, and Kilkenny), is the most valuable of the southern measures, and the Ulster beds in Tyrone are of considerable economic importance both from their richness and their easy accessibility to the industrial towns of North Ireland. Unfortunately, mining in this district remains in a very languid state. A geologist who studied the problem on the spot prayed that—> the day may come when the great manufacturing province of Ulster may awake to the discovery that while it is dependent on England and Scotland for its coal supply, there is a large undeveloped quantity of mineral fuel at its door.

As late as 1903 only about 100,000 tons were raised from Irish beds, while in the same year nearly thirty million tons were mined in the Midland seams of England alone.

The known coal measures of Britain, if exploited at the rate of about 240 million tons annually, will, probably, last for 600 years. It is highly likely, however, that two extensive and previously unsuspected coalfields traverse southern England. One formation appears to range from Dover towards Bristol, while the other reaches from Romney Marsh in the direction of Glastonbury in Somerset.

The coalfields of France and Belgium are physically one, although in places discontinuous. The total extent of these deposits approaches 1,200 miles. The Saarbruck beds of Prussia possess an area of 900 square miles. This is the deepest formation in Western Europe, and the lowest seams descend near Bettingen to a depth of 3·6 geographical miles below sea level. It has been noted that this represents a depth below the ocean surface "equal to the height of Chimborazo above it; and at this depth the temperature may be inferred to range as high as 467° Fahr." This coalfield is interesting to the evolutionist inasmuch as it has yielded the fossils of several reptiles which serve to connect the Batrachians with the Saurians. The intermediate character of these extinct creatures is strongly pronounced. The remains of lower types of animals are numerous, while the fossil plants of this coal formation are abundant.

The German measures of Westphalia produce coals of fine quality that enjoy excellent transport advantages. The Weald deposits of Hanover and N.W. Germany are extensive, while those of Silesia are richly stored with fuel. Austria, Hungary, and Spain are fairly well furnished with coalfields, but production in Spain is very meagre. There is scope in Russia for future progress, although much of the coal is of inferior quality. The coal measures situated between the Dnieper and the Don are the best in European Russia. Poland possesses a small but highly productive deposit. One of the coal seams attains the abnormal thickness of sixteen yards, and is regarded as the thickest layer of fossil fuel in Europe. Extensive coal strata exist in India and China, while Australasia is opulently provided with coal.

British North America has poor supplies of coal, but the United States contains huge formations. The immense basin of the mighty Missouri is stacked with sufficient fuel to satisfy the demands of the Northern continent for 1,000 years, even were it as densely populated and industrially developed as England is to-day. According to Professor Rogers, the Missouri basin covers 100,000 square miles. But this is one field only among many, for the total coal regions of the States form nearly 230,000 square miles.

Vast stores of coal have been discovered in Brazil, and the adjacent republic of Uruguay seems well supplied. Other formations doubtless await discovery. So that, despite our present meagre rations, the world is assured of ample coal supplies for many centuries to come. Various substitutes have been suggested to replace coal as our chief material for heating and power purposes. Water power could unquestionably be employed on a far larger scale than at present, but streams and waterfalls are not everywhere available. Professor Forbes, after a careful review of the question, concluded that heavy engineering and other expenses, combined with further obstacles, rendered any serious competition with coal as a generator of power as highly improbable, in our Islands at least. Scotland appears the only part of the United Kingdom which possesses the immediate possibility of the substitution of water power for coal as an instrument of production. The Falls of Niagara, with their constant flow of water, certainly promise enormous results. The Cauvery Falls of Mysore, and the Victoria Falls of the Zambesi, with their descent of 400 feet, vary greatly in volume with the seasons, although at periods of flood Professor Forbes states that the Victoria Falls are capable of evolving energy quite six times that of Niagara.

As a substitute for coal, peat is out of court. It contains too much moisture, and the cost of compression is considerable. Moreover, it contains an excessive proportion of refuse, and it has been proved that one ton of good coal produces at least fourfold the heat as the same weight of peat.

The claims of petroleum to rank as a competitor must be reviewed. This mineral oil is of ever-increasing importance for propelling machinery, gas production, and other purposes. Although Britain is so generously stored with superior coal, it is nearly destitute of petroleum. Oil may be distilled from the Kimmeridge clay, but our only important oil products are those of the oil shale deposits of Scotland. America and Russia are the premier petroleum States. The estimate of Redwood for petroleum production in 1901 totalled 5,746,000,000 imperial gallons. Upwards of 5,000 million gallons of this huge total were raised in Russia and the United States. But great as these figures appear, they are insignificant when compared with the world's annual output of coal. Sir Boverton Redwood informs us that "if you double the existing production of petroleum..... it would only be an equivalent of about 5 per cent. of the present coal consumption."

We may safely say that science has so far failed to find any real substitute for coal. But, as already intimated, our coal measures will endure at our present rate of consumption for another 600 years if mined to a depth of about 4,000 feet only. And this represents the extreme limit of contemporary mining possibilities.

(To be continued.) T. F. Palmer.

Acid Drops.

We shall hear much of the Continental Sunday when the War is over. The British troops, brought up to take their pleasures sadly, will never consent to return to the Puritan Sabbath after tasting the delights of a real weekly holiday. The correspondent of a London daily paper describes a French "Pleasant Sunday Afternoon." There were five bands, fencing matches, concert troupes, theatrical turns, dances, and all the fun of the fair. The account is sufficient to make Chadband and Stiggins drop down dead; but it should help to make "Merrie England" more than a phrase after the War.

Really we shall be getting quite popular soon. The Daily News notes it as remarkable that no one should have quoted "Tom Paine" in connection with the Luxury Tax. Paine, says the D. N., "hit this particular nail very forcibly on the head." Moncure Conway's great biography was a step towards giving Paine his proper place in history, but it will be a long while before he is placed before the public cleared from the slanders and misrepresentations of religious bigotry. When it is done, he will be seen to have been one of the greatest benefactors of the English-speaking race.

"We all in this life have our crown of thorns," declares a provincial parson. Hallelujah! It is, however, quite unnecessary to sit on it every Sunday.

Billy Sunday, the Yankee evangelist, understands the art of loving one's enemies. His latest sample of this beautiful trait of Christianity is a statement that the German Kaiser is so far down that he would need an aeroplane to get to hell.

The Rev. W. W. Trelcaven, a Wesleyan minister, of Kendal, Westmoreland, was found dead in his study chair. Had he been a Freethought lecturer, the editors would have found a lot to say on the subject.

Christ said: "Woe unto ye rich," but the dear clergy prefer to tread the primrose path of dalliance. The late Rev.

C. E. Hornby, vicar of Ebrington, left estate to the value of £69,822.

A woman fortune-teller was fined £20 at East Ham. The clergy have honours and money heaped upon them for telling people what will happen to them in the "next world."

Speaking of after-War problems, Lord Beauchamp observes: "After all, two and two will still make four after hostilities have ceased." Believers in the Trinity should kindly note.

At Matlock an old man, aged seventy-seven, was charged with sacrilege. He was caught inside the parish church, and money was missed from the contribution box. "Sacrilege" is a more serious offence, legally, than ordinary theft, and helps to show how the clerical caste has looked after itself.

Highly amusing is the ingenious but sophistical manner in which a clergyman gets over difficulties. Jesus says, "Love your enemies"; but does he want us to love the Germans, who are the only enemies we can think of to-day? Of course, he does; and yet how can we love such enemies? That is the problem over which Dr. J. D. Jones, of Bournemouth, as reported in the British Weekly for September 4, plays the sophist to perfection as follows:—

> Love was not the weak, sentimental, flabby thing usually meant. Love included righteous anger, with the will to punish. And love to the Germans must include the purpose of punishment for the crimes which could neither be glossed over nor condoned. We could love them without liking them, for liking was instinctive.

Quite an original method of loving, in which we have absolutely no faith.

Dr. John A. Hutton, of Glasgow, says that, as Jesus was dying, the world cried to him: "Come down from the Cross, and we will believe thee." "But," adds this popular divine, "Jesus remained upon the Cross." So he did, simply because he could do no other. Peter said he could not come down for two reasons, the wickedness of his enemies and the holy will of God. At any rate, upon the Cross he was bound to remain until he was dead.

In a laudatory account of a lady preacher, a London newspaper said: "Clad in spotless white, she looked a striking and picturesque figure in the pulpit." Very few male parsons wear their "petticoats" gracefully.

A bold advertisement in the Daily News asks "all godly men and women" to offer up prayers daily at 8 a.m. and 8 p.m. We suggest the use of praying barrels. They would waste less time and be less noisy.

The Christian religion is sadly in need of bolstering in these strenuous days. Perhaps this is the reason why the publishers of Harry Lauder's book, A Minstrel in France, announce that the comedian's "faith in a future life and reunion" is "simply but confidently stated" in its pages. Simplicity and confidence are not unexpected qualities in this particular association.

"Tax on Sunday" was a headline in a daily paper. It referred to the introduction of the new stamp duty on cheques; but the title suggests that Christians should be taxed for wasting a holiday in gloomy gospel-shops.

Owing to overcrowding, it has been found necessary to restrict the number of American soldiers, sailors, and nurses admitted to the Sunday concerts at the Palace Theatre, London. Only those in uniform, and bearing tickets, will be admitted. It has not been found necessary to issue a similar order with regard to churches and chapels.

The question of religion in the schools continues to occupy attention in the Scottish newspapers, and we hope that the controversy will be kept alive until a just conclusion is reached. A very good letter appears in the Scotsman of September 3, by Mr. Alex M'Nair, from which we take the following passage:—

> In moving his amendment to Clause 7 of the new Education Bill, Mr. Gulland stated with apparent jubilation that in almost every burgh and parish of Scotland the Bible and the Shorter Catechism were taught, and that in Edinburgh only 50 or 100 out of 30,000 children had been exempted, and in Glasgow to-day not more than 100 out of 100,000 were exempted. I read these figures with some degree of astonishment at the time, and I have my doubt still as to their accuracy. But, assuming they are correct, I venture to say that the non-exempted in the schools of Edinburgh and Glasgow are neither so willing nor so unanimous in their acceptance of the decretum horribile of the Shorter Catechism as the insignificant fraction of the exempted would lead one to think. The children certainly do not vote for the teaching of the Catechism, neither do they understand or believe it when it is imposed upon them. And as for the religious results of the teaching of the Catechism, they have not yet been ascertained; certainly they are not always such as would be of a gratifying character to the Churches. I am equally certain that the parents of the children do not approve of the Catechism to the extent that Mr. Gulland's appalling figures would suggest, and that a vast number of the children must therefore be receiving religious instruction of a kind which their parents do not approve, but are so indifferent as not, by any outward sign, to disapprove. All that Mr. Gulland's statistics prove is that an enterprising propagandist party may dominate the religious teaching of the schools of a great city to such an extent as to distort the numerical relations between those who think with them and those who do not.

There is much truth in the last sentence. The Churches are well organized. It should be for others to see that they meet organization with organization.

"Does Religion Count?" asks a Salvation Army advertisement. It does—in the balance-sheet.

Hythe Town Council has informed the local clergy that it cannot interfere with Sunday baseball. The Councillors will be remembered in the clergy's prayers.

It is very unkind of editors to print such lengthy examples of the great American "slanguage." A striking instance is this gem of purest ray serene: "We are prepared to fight till hell itself freezes over, and if Germany isn't beat then we'll buy skates and get after her on the ice." The author of this resplendent thought is Billy Sunday, who is a doctor of divinity in his own country.

A new book bears the title, Jewish Fairy Tales. We wonder if they are as humorous as the story of Noah's Ark, and other Biblical yarns.

Now, Dr. Hutton maintains that the Church is imitating Jesus by doing nothing in the present terrible crisis. The world cries to her, "Do something, take some decisive action, and we will believe in thee." Consequently, the Church is "in a real strait," being undecided as to what line of action she ought to take. "If she would only say a certain word," Dr. Hutton declares, "every church might be filled to overflowing." He thinks that if she is wise, she will remain "above the battle, unentangled, unperplexed, dealing with matters still deeper than those in dispute." As a matter of fact, the Church is not "above the battle," but, both in Germany and this country, is doing her utmost to back up and encourage the opposing armies, and she is doing this because she is powerless to do anything else.

The Cambridge Magazine cites the following from the Sphere: "The Kaverondos belong to a very peaceful tribe in British Africa. When trained they make fine soldiers." Who says that Christianity does not spread peace and brotherhood?

Providence is said to take a particular interest in the fall of sparrows; but nothing prevented Sissinghurst villagers from killing 1,621 of these birds, whom they regard as being as destructive as mice and rats.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

We should be rather less—or more—than human if we did not experience a feeling of elation at the response to our Sustentation Fund. It proves, as we said in our statement of September 1, that the Freethinker still retains the confidence and devotion of those who have stood by it in the past. We feel repaid for our struggles during the past four years, and face the future with renewed courage and confidence. Unhappily, the War has prevented our doing many things we had hoped to do, but these plans are deferred, not abandoned. We have every confidence of one day placing the Freethinker in a better position than it has yet occupied in the country, and that means benefiting the whole Freethought Movement. It is for that purpose the paper exists, and we have kept that ideal steadily before us all the time.

When we get back to normal times we hope to tell some part of the story of this War-period. We cannot tell it now for various reasons, some of which may be guessed. Many will doubtless share Mr. G. Brady's feelings who, enclosing a subscription, writes:—

> All along the wonder to me has been how you managed so much on so little. With the utmost admiration for the way in which you "carry on" the best of all causes.

All we can say now is that it has not been done without much care and anxiety, and we have not been among the smallest contributors, even from a monetary point of view.

A well-known writer, who veils his identity under the pen-name of "Alpha," writes:—

> In these days of ill-balanced and prejudiced journalism the excellence of the Freethinker stands out more conspicuously than ever. You are doing a great work, and I was heartily pleased to see by the list of acknowledgments that your labours are appreciated. My own contribution is—of necessity—a small one; please accept it as indicative of my appreciation of good work well done. Personally, I doubt if I should have had the courage to shoulder the burden, but that only increases my admiration for those who have done so.

Mr. G. L. Allward, one of the Old Guard writes:—

> Pleased to read your statement in the paper, and to learn that the circulation has grown. The Freethinker is splendid reading, and, as an old Freethinker, I am delighted to know that we have at the head of the Movement one who has determined to push forward at this critical time.

From Major Warren:—

> I am not in the least surprised that you have been compelled to make another call on us Freethinkers to help you to keep the flag flying. My only wonder is that you have been able to carry on at all, and hasten to send you all I can spare in these hard times. I wish it were ten times as much, as your weekly instalment of "Views and Opinions" comes to me like a tonic for the depression caused by the shallow and misleading verbiage of the ordinary press.

Mrs. A. Lawrence writes from the Willesden Freedom League:—

> Some of us are regular readers of your very valuable journal, and we generally consider your work of fundamental importance, and wish you the greatest success in your endeavour.

The above reminds us that at present quite a number of advanced Societies take the Freethinker for display on their bookstalls. A very welcome advance, and one that promises developments. We should like to quote from other letters received, but defer doing so until next week.

The following represents the subscriptions received up to the time of our going to press:—

To Correspondents.

A. J. Marriott.—Both Mr. Moss and Mr. Effel have had their say on the subject, and we regret that the restricted space will not warrant our enlarging the matter.

T. Pullock (Bristol).—The Truthseeker, 62 Vesey Street, New York, will, probably, meet your needs. There is no Branch of the N. S. S. in your city, but there ought to be.

W. Mowbray.—There is no question, we think, of our going under, hard as it is to keep afloat. We have several life-belts, chief of which is the loyalty of our readers.

J. Close.—You will be pleased to see that your expressed wish is being realized in the published subscription lists.

S. Clowes.—We feel that we may, without undue conceit, congratulate ourselves on the number of new readers secured; and in that we evidently have your support, as we have had your help.

T. White.—Pleased to learn you have heard from your son. It is a trying time, but we must hope that the end of the War is nearer than many of us think.

W. Mendez.—We plead guilty to enjoying a fight, when the object is worth fighting for. We hope we deserve some of the good things you say of us.

S. C. (Ireland).—Shall be very pleased to see you when you get leave. Hope the illness at home to which you refer will then be gone. Your letter was much delayed in reaching us.

MR. S. DOBSON.—The appreciation of such as yourself acts as a constant spur to renewed endeavours.

C. A. GODDARD.—We note you hope that the Fund will "beat all records." It is certainly doing well up to date.

R. SMITH.—The Secretary of the Manchester Branch, N. S. S., is Mr. H. Black, 446 Great Cheetham Street, Higher Broughton, Salford. We have been much interested in your letter.

ONE of our readers calls attention to the fact that Mr. Guy Aldred, who has been in prison since May, 1916, as a conscientious objector, has just been again sentenced to two years' imprisonment for disobedience of military orders. In the face of the Government promises, and the express provision made for such cases, there is only one word for such treatment, and that is—disgraceful. A man who has served two years in prison, and undertakes a third term, has given us strong proof of his genuineness as is possible, however mistaken some may believe him to be.

CAN any of our South Australian readers supply the address of Mr. F. Price, one time Freethought lecturer at Broken Hill, N.S.W.? If so, will they communicate with Mr. W. L. Rowe, Village Deep, Johannesburg, Transvaal, S.A.?

M. S.—We shall be glad to hear from you as to the success attained by your newsagent in selling the Freethinker, and also concerning the plan you mention. We certainly are not inclined to measure the feelings of anyone towards this journal by the size of the contribution.

ONE of our readers, Mr. T. Wadsworth, reminds us that the lines, "There's nane ever feared that the truth should be heard," etc., is from Burns' poem, "Here's a health to them that's awa'." As often happens, we remembered it when we were told.

B. DUPREE.—Pleased to hear of the successful opening meeting of the Branch on Sunday last. Hope it is prophetic of the rest of the course.

J. M. HINLEY.—We are grateful for all you are doing to help in a peculiarly trying time.

E. B.—Labels have been sent. Carter Paterson would do quite well. The "unsolicited testimonial" to the paper you enclose is very encouraging. Thanks.

J. M. GIMSON.—Thanks for reference, which we recalled on being reminded.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (Sept. 15) Mr. Cohen delivers two lectures—afternoon at 2.30, evening at 7—in the Grand Theatre, Aberaman. This is, we hope, the commencement of a revival of Freethought activity; and after the lectures Mr. Cohen will be pleased to see visitors from other districts with a view to a further extension of the work in South Wales.

Next Sunday (Sept. 22) Mr. Cohen opens the season's lectures at Birmingham. These meetings are held in the handsome new Repertory Theatre, and a good list of lecturers has been arranged. The experiment last year was so successful that the Branch was induced to repeat it. The course involves considerable expense, and we beg to draw the attention of Birmingham Freethinkers to the desirability of their lending the Branch full support, both moral and financial. Those who can help in either capacity, or in both, should communicate with the Secretary, Mr. J. Partridge, 245 Shenstone Road, Rotton Park, Birmingham.

Mr. J. F. Rayner sends us a good-natured grumble which deserves publicity:—

> I have much pleasure in enclosing £1 towards your Sustentation Fund, and wish you every success in your arduous undertaking. Your article on the ethical and social activities associated with Christianity, and erroneously supposed to be an integral part of it, is very suggestive. If these activities were, n any noticeable degree, associated with Secularism, our cause would flourish more. As it is, we are little more than critics, and a cause cannot live on criticism alone any more than man, woman, or child, can live on medicine alone. I was struck, on rejoining the N. S. S. after thirty years' absence, that it had made no progress, either in the extent or style of its propaganda. We are still slogging away with the same old arguments, and people ask: "What good do you suppose you are doing?" The answer: "Clearing men's minds of superstition and cant" seems hardly convincing, and we've been doing that for half a century, and still we find it has to be done, and what have we to show for our expenditure of energy? if we have cleared away superstition to any extent (I think we have) why don't we fill its place with positive Secular doctrine? but we only do this incidentally and inferentially. The Churches peg away, after their fashion, with guidance, such as it is, in the trials and puzzles of daily life, but we do little more than find fault. You will answer, well, what are you doing now but finding fault? So I am, but it is friendly fault-finding as the treasury note within may testify.

Mr. Rayner's letter deserves more attention than we can at present give it. Perhaps we may return to the subject later. For the moment we can only say, briefly, that much turns upon whether one regards the Freethought movement as building up a new sect in a world of sects, and giving all its associated activities a sectarian label, or whether we take our work to be that of liberalizing and rationalizing thought in all directions. Next, we think Mr. Rayner rather underestimates the influence our movement has in creating and popularizing "positive Secular doctrines." The pages of the Freethinker itself, during over more than twenty years' association with it, bears evidence of much that has been done in this direction. And the task of preparing the public mind for sane views of the universe and of men is itself a work of tremendous importance, even, if not of a spectacular kind. However, we can only glance at some of the important issues opened by Mr. Rayner's letter.

Mr. Cohen's meetings at Maesteg on Sunday last were very successful, the hall being well filled both afternoon and evening. There were a few questions, but no direct opposition. There was also a good sale of literature, the supply being exhausted at the afternoon meeting. The members were all highly delighted with the day's work, and are looking forward to a vigorous and successful season.

Readers in the Abertillery district will please note that Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures at Blaina to-day (Sept. 15), at 7.30. We do not know the name of the hall, but we daresay it may be easily found.

The Bethnal Green Branch concludes its season's lectures with an address from Mrs. Rosetti this evening (September 8). The lecture will be delivered in Victoria Park, near the bandstand, at 6.15. We think this is Mrs. Rosetti's first appearance in Victoria Park, and we hope local "saints" will do their best to see that the attendance is a good one.

While we are dealing with the subject of lectures, we beg to call attention of Branch Secretaries to the need of their getting notices of meetings, both for the Lecture List and for reports of work done, to this office not later than the first post on Tuesday morning. We are always pleased to insert reports, but they must reach us in good time. If secretaries would make it a point of writing a few lines before the Sunday meeting closes and posting it at once they would ensure its appearance in the following week's issue. This cannot be done when it does not reach this office before Tuesday afternoon.

We are asked to draw special attention to the Committee Meeting of the Manchester Branch announced in our "Guide" column. There is important business for discussion. The last "Ramble" of the Branch will be held on September 29.

One of the contributors to our Sustentation Fund asks, "What reason is there that the 1,300 new readers you have obtained should not become 2,000 during the next few weeks?" None whatever, so far as we are concerned. All it needs is for those who read the paper to make sure that others shall get it also. And it is not nearly so difficult to get new readers as many think who have not tried. Nothing would give us greater pleasure than to be able to announce that the additional 760 have been captured.

Paine: Prophet and Sage.

THOMAS PAINE is the Foe of Flunkeyism, the Terror of Toadies. His pen makes the knees of the Belshazzars to shake. In indelible words this great pioneer of Freedom has indited the fate of tyranny and autocracy.

Yet, comparatively, how very few are familiar with the facts about this great Englishman! This condition of things must be attributed to the sedulous efforts of courtiers and lying sycophants, who have vilified as brave a soldier of Justice and Progress as ever lifted voice or wielded pen.

Slanders cannot be transmuted into truth; but they can receive a currency and gain a credence only possible in the case of unfashionable prophets. For example, Theodore Roosevelt, without challenge from any organ of the press, is at liberty, or licence, to denounce Paine —whose shoe latchet he is not worthy to unloose—as a "dirty little Atheist"! Three lies in three words! Paine was neither dirty nor little, and he was not an Atheist. So much for the information of so-called eminent men! But George Washington appreciated and honoured Paine; and we take leave to say that Paine's services to America will be remembered and extolled when the name of Roosevelt is forgotten.

Paine never allowed his passion and enthusiasm for human liberty to override his reason. He was a stickler for accuracy in thinking and accuracy in statement. He was businesslike in the best sense, and had great organizing and administrative gifts. He had the mathematical mind striving after plainness and precision, yet full of appreciation for all the beauty of Nature.

Paine has been represented by his vilifiers as a red revolutionary and a firebrand. Nothing could be further removed from the truth. Paine's great aim was to advance the cause of humanity by peaceful means and methods; by getting the nation to recognize that the Government, or the State, is the nation's servant, and not the nation's master—really, and not merely in name. Can a man who writes like this be called a red revolutionary and a firebrand?—

> I have always held it an opinion (making it also my practice) that it is better to obey a bad law, making use at the same time of every argument to shew its errors and procure its repeal, than forcibly to violate it; because the precedent of breaking a bad law might weaken the force, and lead to a discretionary violation of those which are good.

All Paine's arguments are appeals to Reason, and not to Force. He was a convinced Republican, firmly opposed to all hereditary government. He has abounding and abiding faith in his fellow-men when they are not duped and deluded; when they are informed and enlightened. He writes:—

> To say that any people are not fit for freedom is to make poverty their choice, and to say they had rather be loaded with taxes than not. If such a case could be proved it would equally prove that those who govern are not fit to govern them, for they are a part of the same national mass.

Changes, Paine held, could be brought about "without convulsion or revenge." "It is not worth making changes or revolutions," he writes, "unless it be for some great national benefit: and, when this shall appear to a nation, the danger will be as in America and France to those who oppose."

Those who favour the formation of a League of Nations for securing the future peace of the world may find stimulation and instruction in the teachings of Paine. The incurable conservatism of many Britons unhappily turns their preferences into exclusions. It has been the fashion of the schools to read Burke. Some of our young intellectuals, who have been taught to worship Burke, the sentimental Monarchist, the weaver of sophisms, and to shun Paine as the coadjutor of the Devil, may be surprised to learn that Burke himself did not entertain a poor opinion of the personality and power of Thomas Paine. One hundred and twenty years ago Paine urged for the adoption of a scheme of Old Age Pensions. Now, you ladies and gentlemen who wish for a League of Nations, listen, please, to this:—

> Government founded on a moral theory, on a system of universal peace, on the indefeasible hereditary Rights of Man, is now revolving from West to East by a stronger impulse than the government of the sword revolved from East to West. It interests not particular individuals but nations in its progress, and promises a new Era to the human race.

Paine preached the doctrine (which was embraced by many Radicals after his time) that true reform more often consists not in the enacting of new laws, but in repealing many of those which already exist. "But how often," he exclaims, "is the natural propensity to society disturbed or destroyed by the operations of government! When the latter, instead of being ingrafted on the principles of the former, assumes to exist for itself, and acts by partialities of favour and oppression, it becomes the cause of the mischiefs it ought to prevent."

Paine is naturally impatient when he comes to deal with mystery-mongering. Government, in his estimation, is nothing more than a natural association acting on the principles of society. He conceives the hereditary element in government to be the great obstacle to progress:—

> Man has no authority over posterity in matters of personal right; and therefore no man or body of men had or can have a right to set up hereditary government. Were even ourselves to come again into existence instead of being succeeded by posterity we have not now the right of taking from ourselves the rights which would then be ours. On what ground, then, do we pretend to take them from others?.....I smile to myself when I contemplate the ridiculous insignificance into which literature and all the sciences would sink were they made hereditary; and I carry the same idea into governments.

This is his description of the American Government:—

> It is representation ingrafted upon democracy. It has fixed the form by a scale parallel in all cases to the extent of the principle. What Athens was in miniature, American will be in magnitude. The one was the wonder of the ancient world: the other is becoming the admiration and model of the present. It is the easiest of all the forms of government to be understood and the most eligible in practice, and excludes at once the ignorance and insecurity of the hereditary mode and the inconvenience of the simple democracy.

Surely Paine justifies a claim to the title of "Sage" in these wise and pregnant words:—

> Government is not a trade which any man or any body of men has a right to set up and exercise for his own emolument, but is altogether a trust in right of those by whom the trust is delegated, and by whom it is always resumable. It has of itself no rights: they are altogether duties.

How true of our own time is this passage also:—

> Governments now act as if they were afraid to awaken a single reflection in man. They are softly leading him to the sepulchre of precedents to deaden his faculties and call attention from the scene of revolutions. They feel that he is arriving at knowledge faster than they wish and their policy of precedents is the barometer of their fears. This political popery like the ecclesiastical popery of old has had its day and is hastening to its exit.

Paine anticipated Cobden in the view that free and extending international commerce would be a fruitful producer of international amity :—

> If commerce were permitted to act to the universal extent it is capable of, it would extirpate the system of War and produce a revolution in the uncivilized state of Governments. The invention of commerce has arisen since those Governments began, and it is the greatest approach towards universal civilization that has yet been made by any means not immediately flowing from moral principles.....There can be no such thing as a nation flourishing alone in commerce ; she can only participate ; and the destruction of it in any part must necessarily affect all. When therefore Governments are at war the attack is made upon a common stock of commerce, and the consequence is the same as if each had attacked his own.

What would have been Paine's attitude to the present conflict? This is not a war between Governments, at least so far as Britain and her Allies are concerned. It is really a struggle between nations, and, lover of peace as he was, can we doubt that Paine would have rejoiced to see the Alliance between Britain, France, and America —a project always close to his heart of hearts? Is it surprising that his contemptuous wrath was stirred by the unreasoning hatred of the English people of his own time against France and everything French? Burke had no little share in fostering that enmity. Is it surprising that Paine was roused to mordant criticism of the British statesmen of his day who so misread the signs of the times, and tried to strangle the infant American Republic in its cradle? The Alliance of to-day is the dream of Paine accomplished, and his heart must swell in the Elysian fields as he contemplates it. What we take to be the chief lesson to be learned from Thomas Paine is that each people must work out its own emancipation and salvation. Let our modern Socialists ponder this: national and international happiness and security are only to be attained through voluntary co-operation and socialization working from within. If we choose to subject ourselves to a bureaucratic system of State Socialism superimposed from without, we are but forging the fetters of a new tyranny. The sovereignty must remain in every case in the people as a whole.

IGNOTUS.

How Long Will They Wait?

"HOPE deferred maketh the heart sick,"—the Hebrew book of Proverbs said very wisely.

One of the key-words of the Christian religion is "expectation," in the sense of hope. We are now in the year—a very tragical year for mankind—1918. If Christians turn over the pages of one of their revered documents, written so long ago as the second century, or the latter half of the first century, namely, the Pauline manifesto called Romans, they will find these yearning words :—

> I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed to us. For the earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God.

The early Gospel was mainly the Gospel of the Poor, or (to use a term current in India to-day) the Depressed Classes. Such classes are always expectant, for life deals hardly with them, and yet the unconquerable human spirit hopes for a day of liberty and joy. They waited for heaven to open, and disclose, in glory, the God-Christ who would emancipate them from exploiters, from their own sin, from all the dullness and darkness of the earthly existence.

That was how Christians expressed themselves in the period 50 to 150. And Christians still wait.

The remarkable thing is that, in remoter ages, people did not expect God at all. They saw him. They saw him either as fire, or lightning, or luminous cloud, or as a Superman—that is to say, angel. When the slave-woman, Hagar, sat solitary in the wilderness, she beheld the Angel of Yahweh (the Lord), and conversed with him. Her master, Abraham, was visited one day by three such Angels, who ate and drank with him, and one of whom talked in terms that implied his God-hood. Moses shepherded his flock in Midian, and "the Angel of Yahweh appeared unto him in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush." The Israelite horde, in its emigration to Canaan, was guided by Yahweh in the shape of a pillar of cloud, which, at night, glowed brightly over the road. On one occasion, a Hebrew deputation ventured into the Divine presence on a mountain-top, thus :—

> Then went up Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel ; and they saw the God of Israel ; and there was under his feet a paved work of sapphire-stone.

In many a legend, the Yahweh-fire flickers, illumines, and sometimes devours. When the wandering Jews openly criticized the hard conditions under which they tramped the Wilderness, Yahweh's anger was kindled, and his flames consumed those who complained. Fire fell from heaven at Elijah's prayer, and licked up sacrificial bullocks, along with stones and earth. Elijah, having finished his earthly pilgrimage, was received into the heavenly palace in a fire car sent by the celestial King himself. Later on, this fire suffered a curious evolution. It was used, not so much as a garment to clothe the Heaven-God, as an instrument of punishment for God's enemies. In the second century B.C., a poet whose visions are found in the book of Enoch described the fate of the Fallen Angels :—

> I saw a horrible thing, a great fire which burned and blazed, and the place was cleft as far as the abyss, being full of great descending columns of fire ; neither its intent or magnitude could I see, nor could I conjecture. Then I said, "How fearful is the place, and how terrible to look upon!" Then Uriel answered me, one of the holy angels who was with me, and said unto me, "Enoch, why hast thou such fear and affright?" And I answered, "Because of this fearful place, and because of the spectacle of the pain." And he said, "This place is the prison of the angels, and here they will be imprisoned for ever" (Charles's translation, chap. xxi.).

Some three hundred years after this explosive poetry was published, we find similar fires lighted in the New Testament scriptures, as, for example :—

> The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that knew not God (i. Thessalonians i. 8).

It is, however, fair to add that the references to such fire are not so numerous in the New Testament as is often supposed. It was the monks of the Middle Ages who elaborated the idea so deeply and so widely. In any case, the progress of fire was from heaven to hell, so that, whether in Milton's inferno, or in Goethe's drama of Mephistopheles and Faust, popular fancy thinks of the Devil as having his home in flames and fumes.

Meanwhile, Yahweh was being displaced by the Christian imagination in favour of the God-in-flesh—Jesus. There are flashes of the ancient fire in the scene of the Transfiguration, when Christ's face shone like the sun, and in the descent of the Holy Pneuma (spirit) in the form of cloven tongues of fire on the Day of Pentecost. But, on the whole, the Fire and Thunderstorm element gives way to the human element; and God walks the earth as a carpenter, a teacher, a camp-meeting orator, a faith-healer, a prophet. So human is he that Roman soldiers crucify him. It is true, he is said to have risen again, but the figure of the Crucified captured the heart of Christendom more than the figure of the resurrected God.

Digitized by Google

At this point the Pauline voice is heard breathing a hope that this God will return to earth; and so earnest was this expectation of the Primitive Church that (by design or by chance) the New Testament Scriptures were so arranged as to make the Apocalypse the final book; and it ended thus:—

> Surely I come quickly. Amen. Even so come, Lord Jesus. (Rev. xxii. 20).

There is, of course, an ensuing verse, but it is merely a salutation to the reader.

A review of the facts which I have briefly set out will indicate a very notable process in theological thought during the last 2,000 or 3,000 years. I mean the disappearance of God. At first he came before men very visible and very obvious, as fire, cloud, angel, and the like. In the New Testament he is divested of these cruder attributes, and is chiefly presented as the Son of Man so evidently and characteristically human that he is penniless and homeless, and, at certain critical moments in Gethsemane, friendless. Then he is slain, he rises from the dead, he ascends, he is lost sight of, he is earnestly expected.

Why does he not reappear as fire? Why not again sit on a royal chair with a sapphire foot-stool? Why not fling once more volcanic torrents on his enemies? Why not labour again at the carpenter's bench, or give sight again to the blind?

"A cloud received him out of their sight," says Luke in his story of the Ascension.

The cloud remains. The human mind refuses any more to see God in gross Old Testament forms, or in the milder and homelier New Testament form. Still affirming its faith in the Incarnate God, it, nevertheless, experienced a secret doubt, and deported the God-Christ to heaven. And having, nearly two thousand years ago, "earnestly expected" his return and new revelation, it has allowed him to exist for centuries as a question for debate, and a subject for the speculations of argumentative preachers and Professors of Ecclesiastical History.

We have travelled a long way since Abraham and Yahweh ate and drank together as host and guest under the oak of Mamre! How near was Divinity to us then! In this day of World-War, how far!

Correspondence.

"MR. MANN AND THE SOUL."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Owing to the divagations of the Post Office and the newsagents, I did not see the criticism of "C. H." in the Freethinker for September 1 until it was too late for an answer in the next issue.

"C. H." accuses me of "stupidity" in countering Sylvanus Thompson's claim to "spiritual perception" by the statement that there are tribes and nations without any idea of a God. "C. H." says: "Sylvanus Thompson said in effect: Some men have a sense of the non-physical." This is quite false. Sylvanus Thompson was not a Spiritualist, and there is nothing in his book, A Not Impossible Religion—as "C. H." would know if he had read it before rushing into print—to countenance the interpretation which "C. H." attempts to force upon his words.

By "spiritual perception" Thompson meant a knowledge of God and worship of Jesus Christ. No doubt he also believed in a future life; but he does not treat of it in his book.

Thompson claimed that "the instinct of religion is then innate," and as natural as our other instincts; and I pointed out that this was diametrically opposed to the facts by the existence of Atheistic peoples. Where is the "stupidity"? There are worse things than stupidity. One of them is the calculated attempt to twist another man's words into conformity with our own belief.

"C. H." says he has lived before! One can only marvel that the experience gained in a previous life—or lives—has not resulted in better morals and better manners. If "C. H." wishes to receive any future notice, he must adopt the manners of common courtesy.

Views and Opinions.

God and Man.

It is part of the Christian myth that God suffered for the benefit of man. And if there is a God that is quite the proper thing for him to do. For, on the Theistic hypothesis, man, as a part of nature, is God's handiwork. God made nature with all its possibilities and consequences. Presumably, he could have made things different from what they are. He might have made men perfect, but preferred them imperfect. He might have made progress sure and rapid instead of uncertain and slow. Common sense might have been made violently contagious instead of the majority being immune to its attacks. But things being as they are, the suffering of humanity being what it is, the blunders of "creation" being what they are, the responsibility rests with God. If, then, God suffered for man, or with man, there is nothing magnificently generous in his suffering. It is no more than a recognition—or an attempted rectification of an original blunder or crime. For, we repeat, if God made man—directly or indirectly—the responsibility is his; and it is as idle to talk about God's judgment on man as it would be to talk of a parent's right to punish a child for developing an inherited disease. God is in no position to judge man. It is rather man's place to judge God. And in that trial the verdict of common sense would be that of sheer neglect, stupid bungling, or deliberate cruelty.

Who is to Blame.

Unfortunately, it is not true that God suffers for man. The truth is that man suffers for God. Man seldom blames his God—he blames himself. When disease raged he blamed, not God, but himself. When an earthquake occurred or the crops failed, it was man who had done wrong—not God. God was chastizing man for his faults, correcting him for his good. There is not a brutality in human records, not a cruelty in history, that has not pleaded this justification. Thousands of women and children were burned for witchcraft. It was God's will. Thousands were imprisoned, and tortured, and killed, for not worshipping God aright, or for refusing to worship him at all. It was God's will. People have been for generations shut off from rational enjoyment and healthy education one day out of seven. It was God's will. Children are born diseased, millions live in poverty, a few thousands riot in luxury. It is God's will. A war breaks out, it is God's judgment on our sinfulness. Always man's fault—never the fault of God. It once took a woman of more than average courage to throw a stool at a Scottish preacher; there have never been more than a few men and women with the moral courage to tell God—if there be a God—that the faults of the world are his, not ours. A better God would have made better men and women. We do not need his forgiveness for being as he made us; it is he who needs ours for his making us as we are:—

> O, Thou, who man of baser earth did make
> And e'v'n with Paradise devise the snake,
> For all the sin wherewith the face of man
> Is blackened—man's forgiveness give—and take.

The Antithesis of the Ages.

God and man! That is the great antithesis of the ages, conveying at one and the same time a colossal falsity and a profound truth. A falsity, because we know nothing of any gods save such as man himself has created. Good and bad, man makes them all. He creates them in his own likeness, and then prostrates himself before the creation of his own imagination. And it is precisely because the gods are all man-made that the antithesis it embodies conveys so profound a truth. The gods of the world's religions are no more, and no less, than the inherited images of the man of the past. The God of the Bible reflects the moral outlook of a semi-civilized Bedouin tribe; the God of Paul, who saves who he will and damns who he will, reflects the society of a bygone age. The conflict between God and man is thus fundamentally a contest between a less civilized past with a more civilized present. That is one reason why all religions place the golden age in the past, and why they all strive to perpetuate the past so long as it can be done. The war between religion and science is fundamentally the clash of two culture stages, and the fighters those who would have modern ideals spring from modern knowledge, aiming at the gratification of modern needs, and those who would keep men as nearly as possible at the mental level of the Stone Age.

Giving God a Chance.

It was an apt reply to the conceited person who boasted of being "a self-made man" that the statement, if true, removed a heavy burden from the Lord's shoulders. But the Christian will not have it so. He insists that God made man, that God made the world; and this being so, the full responsibility is his. He might have made both man and the world differently; he preferred them as they are. He designed that man should start existence hardly distinguishable from the brutes; that progress should be achieved through cruelty and bloodshed and unmerited suffering. He designed that the children should suffer for the faults of the parents; that the parents should eat sour grapes and the children's teeth should be set on edge. He designed that half the animal world should be compelled by their very nature to lead a parasitic existence at the expense of the other half. All the suffering and wrong of animal and human history are part of his plan; they result from forces which he called into being or forced into operation. If these things came without God, then indeed would a heavy responsibility be lifted from the Lord's shoulders. But how can the believer admit this? He is bound, so long as he believes in a God, to credit him with a plan, and power to execute it; and in his haste to credit God with the greatness of a creator, he inevitably endows him with a character at the side of which all the imaginable cruelty of human nature stands as a perfect monument of philanthropy. * * *

How Long?

God gives nothing to man; it is man who gives all to God. From man the gods derive their being, and from man they receive their death warrant. Like the fairies in Peter Pan, who are saved by extinction only by the belief of the children, so "God" lives upon the belief of his devotees. Cease to believe, and God ceases to be. Yet to this "figment of the mind" man has given of his best and of his dearest. Since the dawn of history he has covered the earth with temples, maintained an army of priestly parasites, sacrificed his wealth and his comfort, prostrated his intellect, and sacrificed his affections, all for the glory of gods who are literally no more than heritable products of primitive ignorance and credulity. How long will the tragic farce continue? How long will it be before people recognize that the gods of to-day are no more than the surviving representatives of a once numerous family, with no better claim to continued existence than had those who have already ceased to exist?

"Our Holy Mother Church."

V.

IT has been known for at least two decades that Protestantism is in a decaying condition everywhere. Both in quality and in quantity it is a visibly weakening, evaporating force. This we learn beyond a doubt from the annual statistics of the various denominations, as well as from the heart-breaking lamentations uttered by the leaders at their yearly stock-taking assemblies. We read of diminishing congregations, decreasing memberships, and depleting funds. At this year's Wesleyan Conference there was to be heard a note of despair, almost, when the declaration was repeatedly made that "the distinctive message of Methodism is being lost and that its passion and conviction are disappearing," and particularly when it was realized that in the last few years there had been a loss of nearly twenty-nine thousand members and of a hundred and fifty thousand Sunday-school scholars. The same mournful tale of persistent decrease is being told of the other Protestant sects in all parts of Christendom. But whilst this dirge is being sung in the Protestant camp, we are assured that the Catholic Church is enjoying a glorious revival, specially in Protestant countries, such as Great Britain and America. This is regretfully admitted by some Protestants who dread the triumph of Catholicism, and gleefully boasted of by the Catholics themselves. But is it true? No; it is the very opposite of true. For upwards of a century and a half the Catholic Church has been steadily losing ground, not only in Great Britain and the United States, but in the very countries which in the past were always loyal to Rome. Mr. Joseph McCabe, in his Decay of the Church of Rome, supplies statistics which show that in the year 1909 the Catholics numbered only 190,000,000, and that of these 120,000,000 were illiterate. And yet, utterly ignoring such official and Catholic statistics, the Catholic Directory for 1918 unhesitatingly declares that there are 301,960,485 Catholics in the world. Curiously enough, while Cardinal Gasquet, at the Catholic Congress in July, 1914, proudly claimed that there were 300,000,000 Catholics, Father A. King, O.P., in December, claimed only 250,000,000. In the same month the papal Monitor put the number at 350,000,000. In January, 1915, Bishop Foley set the total down as 400,000,000. Two years later still, the Catholic Herald (December 8, 1917) reduced the number to 300,000,000. It is evident that we cannot rely upon Catholic priests and journals for an accurate estimate of the Catholic population of the world; but, by putting together and comparing a large number of statistics, from official sources, it is safe to state that during the nineteenth century the Church of Rome lost at least 1,000,000 members.

Turning now to England and Wales, we find that in the Catholic Directory for 1917 the Catholic population is stated to be 1,894,243, the inhabitants being described as flying in crowds into the bosom of our Holy Mother Church. As a matter of fact, this claim is wholly false. Instead of gaining in England and Wales during the last hundred years, the Catholic Church has been losing on a large scale. According to Mr. McCabe, the Catholic population is, at the most, 1,200,000. Even according to the Catholic Directory, there has been a loss, for in its issue for 1914, the number of Catholics was given as 2,100,000. In 1890, Cardinal Manning estimated the Catholic population of England and Wales at 1,500,000, of whom only 200,000 were English; and it was his sorrowful confession that "we have lost the people of England." In Tract No. 6 of the Protestant Press Bureau it is stated that "during the last seventy years one million Roman Catholics have left the Church in Great Britain," while Mr. McCabe estimates the losses to be not less than 2,000,000. Cardinal Bourne has not the temerity to claim an increase, but is content to give the same total as Manning. As the Tablet observes, "it must be admitted.....that the estimate of the Catholic population in the British Isles, though made with every care, is full of uncertainties." It is true that there are conversions—it would be a miracle if there were not; but the conversions are outnumbered by the relapses. There are Catholic as well as Protestant revivalists, and probably the former ply their art with greater skill and success than the latter; but revivals, however scientifically planned and conducted, never prove of permanent benefit to the Church. London is no doubt a city which Rome is supremely anxious to win back, and with that object in view she spends money most lavishly in providing it with handsome churches and eloquent preachers. "Large colonies of Jesuits, Oratorians, Dominicans, Passionists, Franciscans, etc., devote their abundant and comfortable leisure to the conversion of England, especially of wealthy London. London seethes with Catholic intrigue, from the small manœuvres of the parish priest to increase his congregation, or of the Jesuit to attract wealthy women, to the secret plotting that is continually afoot round Westminster" (The Popes and their Church, p. 251). And yet the number of Catholics in the metropolis, with its population of over seven millions, is less than a hundred and fifty thousand.

The same thing is true of America. An impartial estimate gives the Catholic population there as 9,000,000. Catholics themselves claim that their number is at present 15,089,906; but some of their own scholars admit a loss of 20,000,000. Their losses are much in advance of their gains, so that we can reasonably conclude that the prospects of our Holy Mother Church are no brighter in the States than they are here. In both countries the War has already alienated tens of thousands of thoughtful people from the Church, Protestant and Catholic alike, and is calculated to alienate countless myriads more. The War is the mightiest eye-opener Christendom has ever had.

Now, why is the Church, both Catholic and Protestant, so conspicuously losing its power over the modern mind? Why are there such numerous secessions from its fellowship? The only answer is that the light of knowledge is dispersing the darkness of superstition which was the only soil in which the Church could have taken root and grown to its present dimensions. Deprived of that soil nothing awaits it but certain death. Such a General Council as that of Constance in the fifteenth century is no longer possible, because the Church of Rome is to day but the shadow of what it was then. Though the parish priest still wields a tremendous influence over his flock, his word is not the inexorable law that it was three centuries ago. His parishioners are beginning to realize that he is but a human being like themselves; and even the Pope's excommunications have been robbed of most of their awful terrors. The spread of education is having the effect of unmasking the Church and showing it in its true character. The Pope has been shorn, not only of his temporal power, but very largely of his spiritual sway over men's minds and consciences. When Pius X. found this out he broke his heart and died. So far as Christendom at large is concerned the present Pontiff is little more than a figurehead, while the Church is treated with something like silent contempt. The Church never was what it claimed to be, only mankind were too ignorant to discover it; but its false claims were so confidently and so skilfully put forth that they had the practical effect upon the multitudes of being true. The Church is being ignored or opposed to-day, not because it is in any sense or degree different from what it was in the days of its might, but simply because men and women are, at last, taking it for what it really is. During the Ages of Faith, when the Church was all-powerful, ninety-five per cent. of the people could neither read nor write, and were, consequently, wholly incapable of forming an intelligent judgment upon the nature of its claims; but now, the day of reason having dawned, its reign is for ever at an end. Our Holy Mother Church has ceased to be, except for an ever-dwindling minority, for most of whom it is still profitable to believe in and serve it.

America's Great Thinker.

Emerson is the sweetest memory of his land and century.
—G. W. Foote.

The books which help you most are those which make you think the most.—Theodore Parker.

No less a critic than Matthew Arnold has told us that Emerson's works are the most valuable prose contribution to English literature of the nineteenth century. If this be true, Emerson's well of inspiration will run for many a day. Of all his contemporaries he is now the strongest, the most influential, the most read. The latest voices in philosophy, like Nietzsche, simply repeat in varied language the golden message of Emerson, and send us all back with renewed interest to the master's writings.

It is natural to feel curious concerning the evolution of a great literary force that is really original. To watch Shelley as he grows from Queen Mab to Prometheus Unbound, or to trace Shakespeare's genius as he progresses from Venus and Adonis to the masterpieces of the world's literature, form the best introduction to a re-reading of the works of these authors. Nor is such curiosity wasteful in the case of Emerson.

This great Freethinker first saw the light in a parsonage, and he had clericalism in his blood. His father and his grandfather were clergymen. At first he followed in the footsteps of his ancestors, and was ordained as a Unitarian minister. Even in those early days his preaching was ethical rather than devotional. Emerson did not care for the threshing of old straw. There is a suspicion of chafing under the harness, and the bent is towards Secularism. The prime duty, he thought, was to be truthful and honest, and he revolted at the "official goodness" of the ministerial position.

Then his intellect rebelled. There was a question of the rite of the Communion, and his mind was brought to a pause. His elder brother, William, was even more rationalistic, and declined altogether to take "holy orders." Emerson's ethics took a practical form. He opened his church to anti-slavery agitators, and made the acquaintance of Thomas Carlyle, whom he visited at his Scottish home. This was the germ of a great friendship, notable in the history of literature.

Emerson's first book was, characteristically, a volume on Nature, and it revealed the fact that he found the Unitarian fetters none the less real for being simple and few. From the publication of his first book Emerson became a power, and his subsequent career is familiar to all who care for the higher things in literature. Lowell says:—

> Those who heard him while their natures were yet plastic, and their mental nerves trembled under the slightest breath of divine air, will never cease to say:
> Was never eye did see that face,
> Was never ear did hear that tongue,
> Was never mind did mind his grace
> That ever thought the travail long,
> But eyes and ears, and every thought
> Were with his sweet perfections caught.

Since that eulogy was written, time has only more assured Emerson's position among the really great writers. Those who have read his pages with attention know that his real and essential religion was the religion of humanity. He tells us plainly that the day will come when Churches built on Supernaturalism will be superseded and left behind by the conscience of the race:—

> There will be a new church founded on moral science, at first cold and naked, a babe in a manger again, the algebra and mathematics of ethical law, the church of men to come; without shawms, or psaltery, or sackbut; but it will have heaven and earth for its beams and rafters; science for symbol and illustration; it will fast enough gather beauty, music, picture, poetry.

A church founded on ethics! Is it not the trumpet of a prophecy? The superstitious may well laugh, for daily they are discarding their dogmas, and heading their Churches towards the Emersonian ideal.

What distinguishes Emerson from so many philosophers is that he had a shrewd Yankee head on his shoulders. Long before Ruskin declared "There is no wealth but life," Emerson said "The best political economy is care and culture of men." Years before attention was paid to ethics as a serious factor in religion, Emerson wrote: "I look for the new teacher that shall see the identity of the law of gravitation with purity of heart, and shall show that Duty is one thing with Science." This great American thinker dreamt of vaster accomplishments and nobler victories than man has yet witnessed. "We think our civilization near its meridian," he exclaims, "but we are yet only at the cock-crowing and the morning star." It is difficult to formulate the Emersonian philosophy. It is unquestionably individual. "Be yourself" is the keynote;

"Nothing is at last sacred but the integrity of your own mind." Emerson's counsel of perfection is like that which Shakespeare put into the mouth of old Polonius :—

To thine own self be true;
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou cans't not be false to any man.

Despite his Transcendentalism, Emerson was a Freethinker. Golden thoughts confront us on every page of his writings :—

A world in the hand is worth two in the bush.
Who shall forbid a wise scepticism?
Let us have to deal with real men and women, and not with skipping ghosts.
So far as a man thinks, he is free.
Knowledge is the knowing that we cannot know.
Whoso would be a man must be a Nonconformist.

In Emerson we have a notable contradiction of the adage which excepts a prophet from honour in his own country. He became a classic during his lifetime. His detractors are few and feeble. The joke that, when Emerson interviewed the Sphinx, she said to him, "You're another," explains their outlook very well. Certainly, no writer stimulates thought like Emerson. His maxims are a perpetual antidote to the insidiousness of custom and tradition.

The fragment of granite which marks his grave is a fitting symbol of his nobility of character and singleness of purpose. That grave reminds us that there were giants in those far-off days of struggle and stress. Let us take heart from this heroic American, who was ready not only to die for civilization, but to live for it. For his splendid literary legacy is the best philosophy at the worst of times.

A Search for the Soul.

XI.

WE now come to the localization of mental functions in the brain. I have just read an important medical work by Bernard Hollander, M.D., published in 1910, entitled The Mental Symptoms of Brain Disease, in which the localization of mental functions in the brain is spoken of as a fact well known to all physiologists and members of the medical profession. Though immortality is not mentioned, the book has a direct bearing upon the question. In introducing the subject Dr. Hollander says :—

> There is a mass of clinical evidence, already accumulated, which shows that psychical states, as well as the corresponding sensations and movements, are associated with definite regions in the brain.....It is through the histological studies of recent years that the localization theory has gained its most notable victory.....Every decided advance in the knowledge of the localization of functions has been due to the careful collection of cases with autopsies and the study of their common features.

Before proceeding further, it is necessary to refer to the well-known fact that we have some parts of our brain in common with the higher animals, while other and later-developed parts are distinctly human. By taking the lowest class of animal possessing some rudimentary kind of brain, and noting the gradual development upwards till we reach the highest ape (whose brain most closely resembles that of man) we perceive that there is a part of brain corresponding to the frontal lobes in the cerebrum of man, which is more developed in the ape class than in that of any of the other animals—though it is still smaller and less developed than in the human being. This latest portion of the human brain, which includes the reflective and reasoning faculties, is the anterior part—namely, that of the frontal lobes. The other lobes, being common to animals and man, are of a lower nature, and have largely to do with animal impulses and emotions. One has but to look at the receding foreheads in all our domestic animals, or in those at the Zoo, to see what portion of a man's brain is solely human. In the early part of his work Dr. Hollander says :—

> The first principles which we must consider as established are—Firstly, all mental operations take place in and through the superficial grey matter or cortex of the brain; and, secondly, that the cortex of the brain is not a homogeneous organ, but consists of a multiplicity of centres. The cerebrum is the material organ through whose instrumentality all the processes of thought and feeling are carried on.....The existence of facts, such as that injuries to the head affect not infrequently one or more of the mental powers, while others remain perfectly sound, makes it more than probable that different portions of the cerebral hemispheres have different functions allotted to them (p. 20.)

This last statement, which I have here italicized, is, of course, what is meant by the localization of mental functions—the functioning, for instance, of the frontal lobes, giving rise to judgment, reflection, and reasoning; the functioning of the posterior lobes to natural feelings, emotions, and animal spirits. These last acquired frontal lobes in man also exercise a restraining influence upon the functions of the lobes in the rear; and, in the absence of this controlling force, say by disease or the action of opium or alcohol, man becomes little more than a mere animal. Upon this subject Dr. Hollander says :—

> We find that when the frontal lobes are destroyed by injury or disease, the processes of judgment and reason are diminished, there is an inability to fix the attention, to follow a continuous train of thought, or to conduct intellectual processes.....We find, moreover, that in such men the struggle between the lower instincts and ethical feelings is diminished or does not any longer exist, and instead of a rational man, we see a creature given over entirely to the satisfaction of his lower desires. Such is the case in all forms of lesions of the frontal lobes, and it does not occur in lesions of other parts of the brain (p. 24).

In confirmation of the foregoing and other views expressed, Dr. Hollander cites the results of the investigations by many well-known medical writers (pp. 27-34), from some of which results I quote a sentence or two. These are the following :—

Bianchi.—The frontal lobes preside over certain higher mental faculties, and are, so to say, a centre for the intellect.

Flechsig.—In the frontal lobes is located the anterior association centre of attention, reflection, and inhibition. It is concerned with abstract concepts and other complex intellectual processes.

Durante.—Lesions of the frontal lobes are always followed by intellectual changes, and the frontal, especially the pre-frontal region, is the seat of the highest mental powers.

Professor MacAlister (British Association meeting, 1892).—Increased growth of the frontal lobes is the physical accompaniment of intellectual activity.

Allen Starr (American Journal of Medical Science, 1894).—The form of mental disturbance in lesions of the frontal region is rather to be described as a loss of self-control and a subsequent change of character..... This action of control involves judgment and reason, the highest mental qualities.

J. S. Bolton (Journal of Mental Science, 1906).—The pre-frontal region is the region of the cerebrum which is concerned with the performance of the highest co-ordinating and associational processes of mind.

Charles K. Mills (Professor of Neurology in the University of Pennsylvania).—The region of the brain in which focal lesions have produced persistent psychic symptoms has been the pre-frontal lobes. If these lesions are both extensive and deep-seated, disorders of memory, will, attention, comparison, and judgment may be present.

B. Sachs.—A defective development of the frontal lobes leads to a complete idiocy, even though the remainder of the brain has attained to normal growth.

Karl Vogt.—The brain formation of microcephalous idiots does not depend on arrest of the development of the whole brain, but chiefly of the frontal lobes.

Meynert.—All forms of dementia are due to brain atrophy affecting the frontal lobes.

Schuster, 1902.—Melancholia and paranoia are hardly ever observed in lesions of the frontal lobes, but mania and dementia are.

Ferrier states that all the monkeys which he operated upon (by removing their frontal lobes) lost the power of psychical concentration or attention.

S. J. Franz (Archives of Psychology, 1907) states that after training monkeys and cats, he destroyed their frontal lobes, after which he found that all freshly acquired habits and knowledge were lost; but if any other part of the brain was destroyed, the result of his training was not lost.

Here, it should be borne in mind, that all vertebrate animals possess rudimentary frontal lobes; it is from these that those in man have been so largely developed during the long process of evolution. A large portion of Dr. Hollander's book consists of cases showing the effects produced by lesions of different parts of the brain, his object being to show the importance to medical men of a correct localization of the cerebral regions which represent the different mental functions, in order the better to effect a cure. Hence, the soul is never once named. That this localization of the mental faculties does, however, affect the idea of a soul is unquestionable; for the latter imaginary being is alleged to be an entity, distinct from the brain, which thinks, wills, reflects, determines, and performs all the mental work ascribed to "the mind." If, then, the different parts of the brain produce all these phenomena, then the "soul" in man will at once be perceived to be purely imaginary.

The fact that mental functions can be localized in the brain is a proof, Professor Bonney says, that the mind "interacts" with the cerebral organ. He is mistaken; until it can be shown that "the mind" is something distinct from the body, it is a proof that all mental phenomena are produced by the brain.

Autumnal Notes.

For lords an kings I dinna mourn,
E'en let them dee, for that they're born;
But, oh, prodigious to reflect,
A towmond (twelvemonth) sirs, is gane to wreck.
—Burns.

ALREADY, at least, it is the evening of the year, and the quiet philosopher pensively contemplates the fading glories of the field. There is the War also, and those other flowers of the forest, trampled and torn on the fruitful fields of death.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And grasses wither at the North winds breath,
And flowers to fade, but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, oh, death.

And in quite superfluous addition, man, proud, impatient, imperial, invents a murder season of his own, and in which lethal atmosphere, man, deceived, devoted, destined, writhes, and gasps, and dies, and prematurely strews the earth like winter's withered leaves. The pity of it. The appalling stupidity of it.

All is so mute and still, and yet there seems a mild majestic eloquence in the sober scene, a voice insistent, solicitous, august. Even from the tomb the voice of nature cries: yea, but it is the echo of our own, not the voice of the dead—the still sad music of our living, and, we trust, growing humanity—the chord that vibrates in every breast, and by which alone there can be universal harmony—this is the creed of the Freethinker, let him be but worthy of it.

All is so mute and still. The very clouds and dappled skies seem to brood somnolent over the scene. And in the dreamy haze of those autumn skies appear, here and there, little wide-open, or half-closed eyelet-lakes of blue, like eyes of maidens half asleep, passively gazing over the changling earth as from the land of sleep and rest.

The nutweed is here, with its rough branching stem, hard, dark top, and crown of rich bluish purple. That "symbol dear," but jagged, the Scotch thistle, has also put on its red tam-o'-shanter, which it will doff so soon in the grey, incalculable descent of thistledown. There is an irregular yet harmonious display of large gowans, or marguerites, sadly seductive, suggestive of the summer's close. Beyond are the bluebells, or harebells, aerial-hued—invisible fairies ring their inaudible chimes—and mingled with the more sober button-shaped blue scabia, shading into, or succeeded by, the purpling heath, in the golfers' paradise. The numerous ragweed blooms, the golden glory of neglected fields. The little meadow has settled down to compose its latest masterpiece. How gloriously the summer goes, and, as it were, how lovingly it remains! The woods, "The dark woods, sombre and lonely," are still gloriously green; how august still and solemn in their own, and the shadows of eve and morn; but at noontide with more and more palpably bedraggled boughs, and leaves anticipatory dry and brown.

But there is no end. 'Tis but, as Bryant says,—

The lesson.....of eternity.
Lo! all grow old and die; but see again
How on the faltering footsteps of decay
Youth presses—ever gay and beautiful youth,
In all its beautiful forms.....

We apply the text to our own purposes—The harvest is past, and the summer is ended, and ye are not saved; that is to say, taught. Man is slow to learn the lessons of his state. But he has learned much, and is learning still. He must, in the eternal reiteration and repetition of Nature's universal language; in the real and most royal pageant of the autumn, in the simple facts of birth and life and death.

The Christian Evidence Society is asking for £100 to send literature to troops, in order to counteract the Freethought literature they are receiving. We are not surprised at this. Hitherto Christians have had it pretty much their own way in this kind of thing. But we made up our mind when the War started that this should be remedied, and we have done it to the best of our opportunities.

Some people are suggesting that in view of the coal shortage the evening church service might be abandoned, thus saving coal and light. A contemporary submits, however, that if they are continued at the churches, the firing would be saved in the houses of those who attend service. So that we may expect to see outside churches: "Come to service and save your coals." We are quite sure that our Ministry of Information would issue a poster to that effect if asked to do so. But what a change! Once upon a time people went to Church to escape hell. Now they are invited to go to get out of the cold.

Journalists write for money, but surely it is not necessary that they should pretend to share the ideas of the least intelligent of the community. In a leading article recently, the Evening Standard said, discussing an important subject, "the possibilities are enormous, so great, indeed, that one gropes instinctively to touch wood as one ventures to discuss them." There was no need for that journalist to grope far; he could have touched his own head easily.

Here is a chance of useful work by the Christian Evidence Society. At Greenwich Court a girl of ten stated that she had never heard of God or the Bible, and had never been to church, chapel, or Sunday-school.

A quaint remark of Canon Horsley is quoted in the Lady, which says that he never despaired of a criminal who retained an appetite for apple-pie. Yet, according to Christian tradition, it was "an apple" that brought sin into the world and all our woe.

At a Sunday concert for the American troops at the Palace Theatre, London, the programme included scenes from Tails Up. To a pious mind it might suggest the procession of the animals from the Ark.

An eleven-year-old boy earned £2 picking whortleberries while on a week's holiday in Exmoor, and the editors are making paragraphs about the circumstances. The editors do not call attention to the £200 weekly of the bachelor Bishop of London.

Dr. Davis, the American dentist, records in the Times his surprise when he saw the Kaiser in a red flannel undershirt. This sort of thing adds a new terror to civilization. He might have caught "God's Anointed" in his bath.

The Rev. Dr. John A. Hutton, of Glasgow, has just made a discovery that will certainly immortalize his name. We are anxious to do what we can to give this original discovery as wide a circulation as possible: "Ways of living and of thinking, beliefs, religious practices and manners, do not die so long as they are alive." We wonder at our stupidity in not having found that out for ourselves.

Before the War, British divines regarded Germany as an almost ideal Christian country, and theological students were sent there to complete their education. For the year 1908, the Daily Mail published a volume about the Churches, in which Germany was highly eulogized by the late Bishop Wilkinson for her devotion to the Christian religion. After four years of the War, this is what Professor David Smith testifies in the British Weekly for September 12:—

> For a century Germany has been filling the cup of her iniquity, and now God is letting his vultures loose upon her and her accomplices.

How circumstances dominate Christian opinion!

The Roman Catholics are doing their best to popularize their superstition in this country. On Sunday, a lengthy procession of girls, children, and priests paraded some of the City streets. The principal feature of the procession was a huge plaster and gilt religious figure, covered with a lace curtain, and carried by two men. "These be thy gods, O Israel!"

The Young Men's Christian Association is now devoting some of its spare energy to the exploitation of Shakespeare, and "evenings with the bard" have been arranged for the coming winter. Christians will find it a welcome change to laugh with Falstaff rather than sob with the twelve disciples.

Some beautiful nonsense passes for wisdom in religious periodicals. Here is the Methodist Recorder writing: "To the slow, solemn music of the Dead March of Paganism Christ has added a pæan chorus." Is this a poetical way of alluding to the shouting of the "immortal fry" in Hades?

The Jewish New Year, dated 5679, is based upon Biblical chronology. To educated people, the figures carry their own refutation.

The Bishop of Peterborough likes his left hand to know what his right hand has done in the way of charity. His lordship publicly dedicated his palace as a military hospital. Probably he agrees with the cynical remark, "Sweet are the uses of advertisement."

The Rev. George Frederick Cox, of Gourock Parish Church, has been charged at Edinburgh Sheriff Court as being an absentee from military service. Evidently he prefers preaching and ladies' afternoon teas to fighting for his country.

By thirteen votes to nine, Glasgow School Board have decided not to interfere with the new Education Bill regarding education in schools, and prefer the status quo to any alteration; but is the status quo fair to a large number of ratepayers who have no interest in the teaching of religion, but for which they have to pay?

The Rev. Wm. Ross, of Kilmarnock, has a letter in the press on religious instruction in schools, in which he states, "the conscience and common sense of the nation feel it ought to be mandatory." How does he arrive at this conclusion without the subject having been before the electorate? In answering the question, "Why should not the Church do it?" he says everyone knows how small a proportion of the children are to be found in the Sabbath Schools. Surely he cannot have the argument both ways. If the conscience and common sense of the nation demand religious instruction, surely the children would be sent to the Sunday-school to get it.

What a thing it is to possess a "conscience" in a Christian country! 625 conscientious objectors to militarism have been court-martialled twice; 510 three times; 210 four times; and 18 have received five successive sentences. In addition, large numbers have been deprived of their votes in Parliamentary elections.

The Vicar of St. Anselm's, Streatham, complains that the finances of the church are in a very grave condition. He writes to his parishioners: "I have never known the hour to be darker financially than it is at present," and "unless everyone at St. Anselm's very markedly increases his support in money disastrous consequences will arise." The revival of religion at Streatham is not very marked.

The Bishop of Pretoria has been getting into trouble for championing the cause of the Blacks in South Africa. He has suggested that the taxes taken from the natives should be returned in the form of education, and a Johannesburg paper of July 13, Life, Sport, and Drama, declares that "such speeches should be suppressed," and "the authorities should take steps to silence such traitors to their race and colour." It also reminds the Bishop that "the Church is an obsolete institution and the bishops are public nuisances." We agree with the latter sentiment, but we have, all the same, considerable sympathy with those who protest against the exploitation of the Coloured races in the interest of the Whites.

The Glasgow United Presbytery passed a resolution calling upon the Government to maintain equality among the religious sects, and to make the teaching of religion compulsory in the new Education Bill. And what of the people who are outside the Christian sects? Look after the sects and never mind the rest of the public. That is the policy of all the Churches. It is really time that lovers of justice taught these people that there were others in the world beside Christians.

After wandering through several churches, the Rev. A. J. Waldron has now turned up at Sale with a lecture on "Why I Became a Spiritualist." We wonder whether replies from the audience would be permitted?

The revival of religion is not very apparent in South London. In the Kennington Road a Presbyterian Church is up "to let," whilst in the Walworth Road a chapel has been transformed into a cinema theatre, and a "gospel hall" is being devoted to more useful purposes.

Although paper is very scarce, during the four years of War, forty million Bibles have been distributed by the British and Foreign Bible Society. No wonder the output of fiction is increasing.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

"THE ready response to the Sustentation Fund," writes Mr. W. R. Munton, in forwarding cheque, "is most encouraging." With that we quite agree. There is no doubt of the deficit of last year being cleared off, and there will be a balance left to meet the recurring weekly deficit which is inevitable under present conditions. Expenses are still going up, and where the advance will stop "No man knoweth." But the support of our friends bids us face the future without dismay.

Many have written expressing the hope that we will keep open the Fund for a longer period than we did last year. We hope these will not be offended if we follow our usual plan of closing the Fund so soon as it seems reasonably proper.

Mr. W. Higgins, in sending a first subscription of £3, writes:—

> I think you should make an exceptionally strong personal appeal to the numerous readers of the paper, as at present they have a special responsibility by way of ensuring its sound position until the present crisis is over.

Mr. C. Heaton would like to see "three thousand readers respond to the Fund." Mr. J. Robinson thinks "the response generally is magnificent." "Veteran" says, in the course of a deeply interesting letter:—

> Having been connected with the Freethought Movement for many years, and knowing something of the history of the party, I cannot but regard the response to your appeal as a splendid testimony to the affection for the paper, and also of confidence in your ability and leadership. I hope, when the War is over, to see your efforts during the past four years duly recognized.

To that we can only say that our efforts will be "duly recognized" if the paper maintains its position or continues to progress during the last, and probably the most trying, period of the War. We ask for no other recognition than this. And we are deeply grateful for all that has already been done.

Mr. S. Scott says:—

> If it were my last pound, it would go to the Freethinker Sustentation Fund. That paper is our standard in the great intellectual conflict of the age, and we must not let it go down. At all costs, we who contend for the "best of causes" must keep the grand old flag flying.

Mr. J. W. Wood writes:—

> I enclose cheque. A purely selfish act, as we should miss our Freethinker—yet, hanged if I know how you do it.

Well, sometimes we hardly know ourselves—except that it is not done without considerable anxiety and care.

And, as a further aid to cheerfulness, it has now been decided that the wages of compositors is to be advanced 10s. per week from the end of September. This means increases in other directions, and with the price of paper still advancing, we are not likely to die from want of excitement. Seriously, the addition of something between £75 and £100 a year on our wages bill makes one smile ruefully, but there is nothing for it but to tighten one's belt and go forward. From the point of view of wages, the Editor would much like to change places with one of his compositors.

Finally, we cannot forbear citing from one of our lady contributors, Mrs. E. Adams, who writes:—

> I enclose cheque value £5, and wish it were more. The deficit seems very little, considering all things, and I hope the response will be generous. It is surprising how in these times you can have managed so well. If no editor ever had a more loyal body of readers, no editor ever deserved it more. For the difficulties must have been great; and, after all, to give a little money, what is that compared to the worry and work?

The following represents the subscriptions received up to the time of our going to press:—

Third List of Subscriptions.

Previously acknowledged, £251 16s. 9d. J. H. Waters, 10s. Mathematicus, 10s. 6d. C. Hiles, 2s. S. Hudson, £1. W. R. Munton, £5. W. Waymark, 5s. Fredk. Dell, 10s. 6d. "Veteran," £1. Sergt. W. C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

September 15, Aberdare; September 22, Birmingham; September 29, Southampton; October 6, Manchester; October 13, Swansea.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—September 29, Birmingham; October 6, Leicester; October 13, Maesteg; October 20, Southampton; November 3, Manchester; November 10, Sheffield; December 1, Swansea.

"THOMAS."—Name and address must accompany all communications—not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of genuineness.

R. F. HILSLEY.—We are sorry we cannot spare space for your letter. We do not complain that religion is becoming an amusement, we merely note the fact as a sign of the change that has come over the situation. You undervalue the experience of Freethinkers. Most of them have been in the state in which you now are. Your experience has been theirs. Their experience has never been yours.

T. NORMAN.—We have no special fund for sending literature to soldiers, although we have received and acknowledged in this column several sums spontaneously sent by friends. But we have been sending parcels out to the Front right through the War, and have never yet refused a single application. And we intend continuing this policy. The good done will quite warrant the cost.

HERBERT BARNES.—It is not at all a "well-known fact" that "a child of fourteen years has not a particle of the body it possessed at seven years." In fact, it is not true. And if it were, it would not at all affect the position of the Materialist.

C. W. MARSHALL.—We know that what you do is no more than an indication of what you would like to do. We are fortunate in our friends.

H. J. EARTHY.—We hope, with you, that conditions will be better after the War. Glad to know you have been doing missionary work with our Pioneer Leaflets. We shall soon need to reprint.

JNO. HUDSON.—We also wish you nearer. We could often do with a little help such as you could give. When things are normal, and we get back our lost pages, we might develop the feature you suggest.

MR. A. MITCHELL sends his congratulations on our keeping the paper going, also a contribution to our Sustentation Fund, and hopes that we shall soon find things improved from a monetary and other points of view, and adds: "I find your 'Views and Opinions' a fine mental tonic in these times, and suggest your publishing them in book form." Others have made the same suggestion, and we intend publishing a volume of selected essays after the War.

H. S. WISHART.—You write cheerfully, in spite of being on your back, and we hope that is an indication of rapid recovery. Yes, the discussion is attracting considerable attention.

W. BINDON.—(1) The stamps were missing from your letter, but we have sent on twenty copies of Deity and Design, which, we hope, will be enough; (2) your friend's letter is no more than an expression of personal opinion, although an interesting one; (3) it is difficult to answer your question in a sentence. The chief defect is treating man as a lay figure, instead of as a centre of active and, so to speak, positive force.

SAPPER H. MORRIS.—MSS, to hand. Shall be pleased to publish, but not for some weeks, owing to the quantity of matter already in hand.

H. AUSTEN.—The Pioneer Press is quite prepared to open credit accounts with clients, they sending on money to be placed to their credit, to be drawn against as books or pamphlets are ordered. Some of our readers already adopt this plan as being more convenient, and saving the trouble of getting a number of small postal orders.

LIEUT. EASTERBROOK.—Paper is sent as desired. Your letter gives us great encouragement. Any balance left from your subscription we are using to send out literature to soldiers.

H. JOHNSTON.—There is a reliable translation by Professor Long which used to be issued by Bell & Sons. Also a seventeenth century edition, but we are uncertain if that is still in print.

SAPPER L. CHEETHAM.—We have no fear but that our readers will do their share. We shall look forward to your help in the way you indicate when peace returns.

D. G. MASSIE.—We do not know how far you are correct in saying that few would have pledged their whole private credit to keep the paper going, all we can say is it had to be kept going, and there was no other way open.

R. CHAPMAN.—(1) Pleased to have your congratulations, and note your opinion that in justice to ourselves the price of the Freethinker should be raised. But we are not so much concerned with that as we are with the ultimate welfare of the paper and of the Cause it serves. We believe we are acting for the best in keeping the price unchanged, and that events will justify our decision. We are looking well ahead. (2) The Psychology of Insanity (Cambridge Science Manuals, 1s. 3d.) forms a very good introduction. Freudian literature is now very extensive.

F. C. WYKES.—We will do our best in the matter.

A. RUSSELL.—Sorry we cannot, at the moment, give you the exact reference, but we believe it will be found in one of the letters in Fors Clavigra.

W. P. JACOBS.—Parcel of literature being sent. Glad to read the record of good already done by this means.

SHOULD this meet the eye of Mr. Chas. W. Stewart, of Maryport, Cumberland, perhaps he will kindly forward his present address to the Secretary of the Newcastle Branch, N. S. S., 107 Morley Street, Heaton.

INQUIRER.—Most of the Branches are fixing on September 29 as the day for Bradlaugh Sunday. The Birthday is September 26.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (Sept. 22) Mr. Cohen delivers two lectures in the Repertory Theatre, Birmingham; afternoon at 3, evening at 7. Tea will be provided for visitors from a distance, who should write to the Secretary, Mr. J. Partridge, 245 Shenstone Road, Rotton Park, Birmingham.

The awakening in Wales continues. Mr. Cohen had two splendid meetings in Aberdare last Sunday. The audiences were large, attentive, and sympathetic. Interest in the meetings was shown by the whole supply of literature being cleared out at the first meeting. Mr. Powell, of Mountain Ash, presided over the meetings, and made a capital chairman. Visitors were present from Cardiff, Mardy, Pontypridd, Porth, Mountain Ash, Merthyr, and other places. Several of the above are expected to commence work immediately. Wales is moving.

Mr. L. Cheetham writes:—

> Many thanks for parcel of literature received a few day ago. Am very pleased to say they are already doing good and going strong. They were read with much interest by the boys on this section, and very soon a most interesting discussion followed. I might say that the strongest Christian supporter openly admitted that much was true which appears in the Freethinker from time to time. He was a London schoolmaster in peace time. Am pleased to say that when the paper comes along one or two of the boys request me to let them have it first, and hardly a week passes but what the copy has gone round the lot.
> The following incident happened last week-end: Being my half-day off, I took a walk, and was busy reading your reply to Dr. Lyttelton when a Tommy from another camp came along and said: "Any news chum?" I had to reply it wasn't the daily paper, but the Freethinker. "Oh!" he replied; "I have heard a lot of that paper, but have never read it." I gave him a few leaflets, and told him where to find me if ever he wanted more. Well, to my surprise, he came again, and wanted more reading of that kind. So I gave him what Freethinkers I had, and also a few R.P.A. books; and they will be read and passed on. I enclose you a letter from another friend, and you can see for yourself what interest is taken in the best of causes.

Mr. Cohen's Determinism or Free Will? has been out of print for some time, and the call for it decided us on setting about reprinting. As the resources of the Pioneer Press are limited, we tried for an outside estimate. We got it—six times the original pre-War cost. However, we hope to get it out soon. But the opportunities for excitement in the publishing trade just now are unpleasantly numerous.

The West Ham Branch has arranged for a "Ramble" from Upminster to Warley on Sunday next (September 29), and all members and friends are invited to join. The London train reaches Upminster at 10.37. Those joining are expected to provide their own lunch, but tea will be provided at Warley.

The last "Ramble" of the Manchester Branch takes place to-day (September 22) as per. our Lecture Guide. Next Sunday (September 29) the Branch commences its meetings at Baker's Hall, and on October 6 Mr. Cohen formally opens the season's lecturing with two lectures at the Co-operative Hall.

Freethinkers in the Rhondda Valley are earnestly invited to attend a meeting in the Institute, Tonyrefail, to-day (Sept. 22), at 2.30, in order to consider the question of organization.

We publish this week a new work by Mr. Cohen on Christianity and Slavery. This is a careful and elaborate survey of the whole subject—we think we may safely say the most elaborate yet issued in this country—and should prove of much value to propagandists. No pains have been spared to make the work complete, and full references are given throughout. A chapter on "Christianity and Labour" meets the plea that Christianity abolished slavery by inducing a more humanitarian ethic towards labour, and a concluding one on "White and Black" deals with the relation of the white and coloured peoples in Africa. Two plates illustrating the stowing of slaves on board the slave-ship Brookes adds to the usefulness of the book. The published price is one shilling, postage three-halfpence. The need for some such work as this has long been felt, and is now met. We hope soon to publish a companion work on Christianity and Woman.

Religion and Life.

SIR,—You have set me a big task this time, as beside the huge question I raised about the meaning of your "Social Forces" you express a wish to hark back to the historical argument and challenge me to show "verification in truth and justification in utility" in religion. I propose, therefore, to deal with the first half of the latter point in this week's letter, and with the "Social Forces" in the following week, inviting you, mean time, to write more fully about them for the number which will come out on September 28. We can settle later how to proceed afterwards.

The points about the "Social Forces," which require some elucidation, are as follows:—I note your correction of what I said about their being confined to a very small number. Your view is that "their influence was felt by all," and that they "act as a selective factor." Mean time you marvel that I could call them God; and you give it as your conviction that they are not God. Very well, then, what are they? for if they are "selective factors" they surely are alive. They appear to be some living influence steadily making for good, purging the minds even of blind and besotted Theists (in time, though not very rapidly). Now, in estimating how far we agree as to this matter, I ought to explain what I mean by the word God, so as to show the relation between the Being, whom I believe in, and the social forces which I recognize much as you do. But it will clear the air more speedily if you will tell us something more of your idea of the social forces, on the assumption that they are not God. Does it not amount to this: that you conceive of men as possessed of a deep, powerful, subtle, instinct for something called "good" which, in time, prevails over another instinct also very powerful, such as for centuries has made them postulate a Creator, a personal invisible giver and guide of Life? If so, how stupendous the good influence must be which is able to dissolve so titanic and widespread an error as the belief in God! Yet it is an influence, I understand, originated entirely by man himself; the same being who started the huge and pernicious blunder of Theism. This is to attribute a very noteworthy faculty to mankind. Have you any theory how the faculty came into being? Also, what is your view as to man's criterion of what is good? Granting your assumption that the social forces are pressing steadily towards the establishment of truth and enlightenment, can you state your grounds for assuming that we all agree as to what are truth and enlightenment? So far, you have only told us that Atheism makes for cleanliness. What other good things does it make for, and do you hold that all men, roughly speaking, think these good things to be good?

If you clear up these obscurities, then I will put side by side of your interpretation of human life the Theistic interpretation, and we shall, perhaps, see which agrees best with the fundamental convictions we hold in common.

Now for the historical matter. Part of your answer would be to point to history and show that religion has been responsible for much evil. The reason why I fought shy of this subject is that, though we should differ, probably, as to any particular set of occurrences, we agree in the general statement; still, while it is of no use to flog a dead horse, it may be advisable to ascertain what killed it. I would, then, admit your contention in language quite as strong as any you have used, and say (with a living writer) that apparently the Infinite Perfect Spirit has instigated awful "crimes of deception, lust, injustice, cruelty," and has "required the aid of man's non-religious activites against man's religious apprehensions." This appears to concede most of your case.

But to be really fair, we must consider the following: "Man's personality is constituted by the presence and harmonization of a whole mass of energies and intimations belonging to different levels and values; and not one of these can in the long run, and for mankind at large, be left aside or left unchecked by the others, without grave drawbacks to that personality." Now, please leave aside the question as to whether this quotation is in perfect English, and consider only if it be true. Notice that the more we emphasize the hideousness of the result of isolating one set of energies, the more we corroborate the above statement. It is a tremendous fact, though not really bewildering, that religious people consecrated girls to lust, gave their own babies to the fire, denounced statuary, destroyed the great library of Alexandria; but all that was due to their refusal to harmonize their religious intuitions with those ordinarily called non-religious, viz., the æsthetic, the moral, the political or gregarious, and perhaps others. But the same disastrous results, though less dramatic, follow on the isolation of these other faculties and energies, either from each other or from the religious faculty.

Look what happened to Greek art when it lost the sustaining gift of religion. Or music. One knows of players who have isolated their technical skill from the sense of the sublime—the religious sense—and the result is a marvellous display of soulless fireworks. Similarly there have always been politicians who wish to divorce politics from morals; when they have succeeded, horrible things happen. Still more horrible things when business is cut loose from morals; or, rather, is not permeated with them. Please note that the hideous things are done in the name of the set of faculties which has been isolated. In the name of religion ghastly churches built; in the name of sport, men plunge into all kinds of life-wrecking gambling; in the name of bodily health, there supervenes hypochondria and manifold havoc of bodies; in the name of patriotism, the ravage of Belgium.

But I must stop, as you will have something to say about this. If you disagree with me here, please note that it means you are prepared to face and defend this policy of isolating one faculty from another in that complex and wonderful thing we call the human personality. If you agree with the above statement, then, Sir, we agree about a very important matter indeed, and I have good hopes of reaching an understanding of a perplexing divergence of opinion.

E. LYTTELTON.

The Dark Diamonds of the Earth.

V.

FROM prehistoric times onwards a pleasurable appreciation of the effects of colour has distinguished mankind. Primitive peoples paint their persons and decorate their dress, while races in a higher stage of development delight in dyeing their garments in striking colours. We gather from the Hebrew records that the high priests of Israel wore vestments of purple hue. Also the skins of rams were stained with red pigments, while blue, purple, and scarlet were favourite tinctures for their linen cloths. Of old, the stately Tyrian purple was prepared from two species of molluscs. In Egypt, India, and in the Mediterranean region, purple products were in keen demand. Purple became the emblem of kings, and robes of that colour commanded a regal price. Acquainted with the dyer's art were the Greeks and Romans, and among the ruins of Pompeii an ancient dyer's workshop with its appliances may still be seen. As culture spread, dyeing was introduced into many lands where the art was long practised as a domestic industry. And even to-day, in the more remote areas of Europe, the pigments of home-spun textiles are obtained from vegetable dyes. To some extent this custom still lingers in the Scottish Highlands. In England the dyer's trade has existed for several centuries, and to our native colouring substances the New World added a few woods and barks, as well as the famous cochineal. Until 1856 such dyes were substantially the only tinctorial materials known to man.

Aniline was discovered by Unverdorben in 1826 in the indigo plant. The term aniline is derived from anil, which is Portuguese for indigo. But this vegetable product has since suffered eclipse as the bulk of our aniline dyes are now evolved from coal-tar. Indigo was sent to Europe in the sixteenth century, and its introduction was strenuously opposed by the woad-growers whose occupation it menaced. Under Henry IV. of France the use of indigo as a dye was made a capital crime. Now that the indigo plant itself has been superseded by coal-tar, it is worth noting that the cultivation and manufacture of vegetable indigo forms a leading Indian industry, and that the Oriental Peninsular remains the main source of European supplies.

The researches of Hofmann and his pupils in London led, in 1856, to the discovery of the first synthetic dye, Perkin's long celebrated mauve. This dye was produced from crude aniline, a substance itself prepared from benzene, a product of coal-tar. In his new work, The Treasures of Coal Tar, Professor Findlay remarks that:—

> Starting from benzene, toluene, phenol, naphthalene, anthracene, and a few other constituents of the thick black liquid, coal tar, which less than a hundred years ago was a useless waste material and a nuisance to the gas manufacturer, synthetic dyes, to the estimated value of nearly £20,000,000 are now manufactured annually, more than two-thirds of this amount being produced in 1913 in Germany. These dyes have, by reason of their almost infinite variety and applicability, their range of colour, and delicacy of tone, ousted the natural dyes to a very large extent from the dye works.

These wonderful colours are the outcome of a prolonged series of chemical changes. From various primary constituents of coal tar there are derived, as a result of the action of sundry chemical reagents, nearly 300 "intermediate" substances. These in their turn are made to combine and interact so as to evolve the completed dyes of which over 900 are now in request in the industries and arts.

The earliest coal tar dye that Perkin placed on the market was designated "mauve," "aniline purple," or "Tyrian purple." Perkin's efforts to induce English manufacturers to utilize his product met with scanty success. The more progressive French calico printers, however, soon introduced aniline purple into their patterns, and the commercial importance of the new colour became apparent to all. Perkin's purple was now crowned with success, and the colour so largely predominated in feminine attire in 1859 that Punch facetiously referred to it as "The Mauve Measles."

Subsequent experiments produced aniline red or magenta. Everything then pointed to a prolonged English supremacy in the evolution of aniline colours, but our inability to realize the vital importance of systematic chemical research allowed Germany to annex this truly magnificent industry.

One of the earliest results of chemical inquiry into the properties of coal tar was the isolation of benzene, a coal tar hydro-carbon. In 1834, Mitscherlich showed that benzene—a substance first separated by Faraday from oil gas—when treated with concentrated nitric acid, becomes converted into nitro-benzene. A further advance was made when Bechamp discovered that nitro-benzene could be transformed into aniline. Through the application of this discovery, Perkin elaborated the first aniline dye. During his investigations, that scientist, while experimenting with "a solution of aniline in dilute sulphuric acid with potassium dichromate," succeeded in isolating from the liquid a dark-hued resinous mass. From this unprepossessing substance the first aniline colour—mauve, or purple—was produced. Mauve led to magenta, and now magenta formed the basis for the development of several new dyes. Among these were Lyons blue, and Nicholson's water-blue, which proved an excellent dye for woollen stuffs. The brilliant Hofmann violets were produced from magenta by that great chemist. In recent years immense strides have been made in this department of science, but even now the coal tar industry is still in its infancy.

Shortly after Professor Perkin's discovery of mauve, Dr. Griess, a chemist attached to Allsopp's Brewery at Burton-on-Trent, ascertained that nitric acid, when acting on aniline, evolves a diazo compound. The diazo compounds thus produced possess the supremely important property of combining with certain aromatic substances, or with phenol, from which carbolic acid is prepared. By this process the now famous azo-dyes were produced. These are highly esteemed as wool dyes. Hundreds of these tinctorial compounds have been prepared, and a large proportion are in eager request in the several dyeing industries.

In addition to the colouring matters directly and indirectly derived from aniline and phenol, naphthalene, another coal tar hydro-carbon, provides a basis for dye production. Naphthalene was, until recently, in little demand for industrial purposes, but its value has now been greatly advanced through the chemist's capacity to distil many new and useful dyes from this coal tar product.

A large proportion of the earlier synthetic colours will dye silk and wool when directly applied. Plant fibres, however, notably linen and cotton, must be previously mordanted if they are to absorb the dye from the vat. A very marked departure occurred when Bottiger elaborated a novel series of azo-dyes capable of dyeing cotton and linen without the help of a mordant. This advance constituted an epoch in the history of tar colours. One of these new dyes was Congo red—the first direct cotton dye prepared by the synthetic process. Congo red led to the production of an imposing array of novel dyes, which embrace the complete colour realm, and possess the highly serviceable property of dyeing cotton fabrics minus the aid of a mordant.

These improvements promoted further progress. After a fabric has been successively impregnated and immersed in two different chemical solutions, a red dye appears on its surface. A dye developed in this manner on a fibre is termed a pigment dye. This particular pigment—para-red—is extensively utilized in dyeing processes. Professor Green's dye product, primuline, stains cotton directly to a primrose shade. This colour is fugitive, but it has proved the parent of primuline red, primuline orange, and other fast hues. Aniline black is another pigment dye employed in the textile industry. This dye produces a fast black colour, and researches still in operation promise to lessen the cost of production, while sustaining the blackness of the pigment.

The Assistance of Literature to Science.

IN these days when the value of a scientific education is being so strongly urged and so widely recognized, it is necessary to remember that, while the study of literature is amply justified by the æsthetic pleasure which it bestows, it is also not without its value in the dissemination of knowledge.

Indubitably a wide reading of the great masterpieces of literature is of the greatest aid—if, indeed, it be not indispensable—to the cultivation of a lucid and concise literary style. To the scientist and educationalist clarity of expression is of supreme importance, since not only does it enable them to expound theories, illustrate principles, and state facts unequivocally and with economy in words, so that the student can fully apprehend their meaning without vexatious pauses to elucidate some ambiguous phrase or passage; it also renders the reading of an abstruse and sometimes tiring book less irksome: petty irritations such as occur when the reader is not certain of the author's meaning are eliminated; his time is saved by conciseness of statement; and the argument being unclouded by needless redundancy and superfluity of words is more easily followed. Moreover, where principles and hypotheses are decisively expounded, he is more likely to assimilate the knowledge communicated than where it is set forth in a vague and diffuse manner.

While, therefore, giving the study of science precedence to that of literature, we must beware of regarding the products of the art of writing simply as part of the efflorescence of civilized life—as something wherewith to gratify our æsthetic tastes in leisure moments. Science, even as literature, would benefit did every one with knowledge to impart follow the example of the great geologist Lyall, and deliberately cultivate a literary style.

RELIGION OF HUMANITY.

The essence of religion is the strong and earnest direction of the emotions and desires towards an ideal object recognized as of the highest excellence, and as rightfully paramount over all selfish objects of desire. This condition is fulfilled by the Religion of Humanity in as eminent a degree, and in as high a sense, as by the supernatural religions even in their best manifestations, and far more so than in any of their others.—John S. Mill.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

(In reference to the discussion, "Christianity and Dirt.")

Thousands of years ago, when barbaric races began to adapt themselves to civilized life, they had a concern for their bodily health and strength. In classic antiquity the care of the body by baths, gymnastic exercises, etc., was greatly developed, and connected with religious ceremonies. The splendid aqueducts and baths of Greece and Rome show how much importance they attached to the external and internal use of water. The Middle Ages brought reaction in this province as in so many others. As Christianity depreciated this life and said it was merely a preparation for the life to come, it led to a disdain in culture and of nature; and as it regarded man's body only as a temporary prison of his immortal soul, it attached no importance to the care of it. The frightful plagues which swept away millions of men in the Middle Ages were fought with prayer, processions, and other superstitious devices, instead of with rational hygienic and sanitary measures. We have only gradually learned to discard this superstition. It was not until the second half of the nineteenth century that a sound knowledge of the physiological functions and environment of the organism induced people once more to have a concern for bodily culture. All that modern hygiene now does for the public health, especially the improvement of the dwellings and food of the poorer classes, the prevention of disease by healthier habits, baths, athletics, etc., can be traced to the monistic teaching of reason, and is altogether opposed to the Christian belief in Providence and the dualism connected therewith. The maxim of modern hygiene is: God helps those who help themselves.—Ernest Haeckel, "The Wonders of Life."

Views and Opinions.

Points of View.

A great deal depends on point of view. And the point of view is, in turn, largely determined by habit, education, temperament—in a word, by personal equation. Psychology proves that what we think we see is a very small part of what we actually do see. The larger part of the image formed in the mind is really contributed by us, and not by the perceived object, the image being built up of the immediately experienced sensation plus the residues and memories of sensations previously experienced. Something of this nature must, I think, be held responsible for the view of the nature of the social forces held by Dr. Lyttelton, as illustrated in his article in last week's Freethinker. Dr. Lyttelton has been all his life a Christian. He has been in the habit of seeing "God" behind everything and through everything in such a way that phenomena are camouflaged expressions of Deity. My own prepossessions in the direction of Deity have never been of a robust character; ever since I reached years of discretion I have tried to reduce the personal equation to as small a compass as possible. What are the facts? What inferences do they compel? Not, be it noted, what theory may I frame without running the risk of refutation, but what theory ought I frame in the certainty of confirmation? And that seems to me to express the difference between the liberal religious and the freethinking point of view.

God and the Social Forces.

Now, let me take the case of the social forces, which Dr. Lyttelton treats as the equivalent of God, and is unable to see why I should not agree with him in so doing. And here emerges the power of the personal equation. By "social forces" I mean the sum of those relations, all the actions and reactions between human beings living in groups. Now, not having to marry these facts to a special theory, I am only concerned with their logical interpretation. And this interpretation follows the appreciation of the facts. Dr. Lyttelton being a Theist, has to harmonize the facts with a theory which precedes, and largely hinders, an appreciation of the facts. But adding "God" to the social forces gives us nothing in the shape of an interpretation of them. It does not help to an understanding in the slightest degree. Dr. Lyttelton says that if I am correct in calling the social forces "selective," they must be alive. Well, they are alive in the sense of their being active, and as an expression of the relations between living beings; but so far as they are consciously selective, the origin of the selection lies with man, not with God. Nor does it follow that because social forces are selective they are, of necessity, good. Selection, natural or social, implies only—selection. Whether social selection acts in the direction of developing a militarized State or an industrialized one, a religious type of individual or a rationalistic one, depends upon circumstances. All I submit is that, whatever the type, it must be one that does not involve the destruction of the group. And so far as I can see, there is no more need to assume "God" behind the operation of social forces than to assume "God" behind any other group of phenomena. Dr. Lyttelton agrees with me on the operation of the social forces; will he be good enough to explain in what way their action implies God, and in what way our understanding of their operation is furthered by assuming "God"?

The Nature of Morality.

Dr. Lyttelton puts to me a number of questions, and while quite alive to the dialectical advantage of asking questions instead of answering them, my case is sufficiently strong for me to acquiesce. First, let me say I do not conceive man as possessing a deep "instinct" for good, fighting another "instinct" for belief in God. The use of instinct in this connection is to me wholly unscientific and unwarrantable. It is one of those "blessed words" that serve no useful purpose. And I certainly do not assume that we all agree as to what are truth and enlightenment. It is quite plain that no such agreement exists. All that people agree on is in calling some things good and some things bad, some desirable, and some undesirable. And when we probe the matter deeply enough we come as a basis to the psychological reaction in favour of agreeable feelings, and a reaction against painful ones. The direction of these reactions and their development into more a complex structure is, with human beings, a matter of education; in other words, the play of the social forces. It is, indeed, on this educative capacity of man, particularly in the young of the species, that the whole question of progress turns. But this capacity admits of being trained in either a desirable or an undesirable direction. On this last point I think Dr. Lyttelton would agree; the point of difference would lie in his multiplication of "instincts" and "faculties" to explain a difference of conduct or of interpretation. And from the existence of sentient material capable of expressing a reaction, through its more elaborated expression of consciously felt pleasures and pains, on to the still more elaborate development in formulated moral notions and theories, I see no need and no room for "God." Perhaps Dr. Lyttelton will say at what stage in the process "God" emerges, or becomes necessary, and what precisely is the part played by "God" in this development.

Naturalism and Growth.

But I do believe that human society is, with lapses, pressing towards a better state. And Dr. Lyttelton thinks that in this belief I, unconsciously, concede "God." Why? On what compulsion? If I may be permitted the reference, Dr. Lyttelton will find this point worked out at some length in my pamphlet God and Man, and I can only repeat here what I have said there. The dice are loaded in favour of a progressive morality, because morality is fundamentally a question of social adaptation, and adaptation is the law of life, whether of ideas, of institutions, or of organisms. And what takes place in human development is not, as Dr. Lyttelton apparently assumes, the creation of new "faculties," but the transformation of existing qualities, and their application over a wider area under the guidance of wider knowledge. When nature developed a lung it did not create a new structure, it took an old one and adapted it. And what is the widest and most comprehensive humanitarianism but the gregariousness of the primitive herd expressed in a more enlightened manner over a wider area? If we stick to the facts there really is no mystery in human or social growth; these are only problems. The mystery begins, and the problems threaten to become insoluble, only when we add to the facts the unprovable and unnecessary theory of "God."

Art and Life and Religion.

I have space for only a word or two on Dr. Lyttelton's reference to Art, but I must not let it pass unnoticed. Religion is no more "a sustaining gift" of art than is any other form of mental activity or of social life with which artistic expression happens to be associated. Naturally, in a society where religious beliefs hold a dominating influence, artistic forms will tend in the direction of religion. Apart from the economic incentive, there is no more here than is to be seen in the fact of ethical and social life generally being expressed, in their earlier stages, in a religious form. And I may suggest, in passing, that a vital question for Dr. Lyttelton to face here is the universal phenomenon of the growing liberation of all forms of life from definitely religious influences. And why Greek art should be selected as an illustration of the power of religion puzzles me. For the improvement of art in the hands of the Greeks was due to the fact that in receiving art forms from Egppt, Assyria, and Phœnicia, it largely eliminated the religious motive, and substituted the human ideal of beauty of body and strength of mind. I cannot now pursue this point further at present, but anyone who compares the Greek statues of mythological heroes with the religious statuary that preceded it will see the truth of what has been said. And Greek art declined after, say, the days of Pheidas and Praxiteles, not because of the decline of religion (as a matter of fact, the sceptical element in Greek art and literature was always pronounced), but because of the decline of the old city life, the struggle of State against State, and the final collapse of Greece before a greater military power. If Dr. Lyttelton wishes to trace the influence of religion in art, he may see it in the degradation of art under Byzantine Christianity, or during the mediæval period; and on the other hand, its revival under the Pagan derived impulse of the Renaissance. But on the whole question I may conclude by saying that the interpretation of life in terms of religion is something that is admitted. The justification of that interpretation is the real point at issue, and I await with curiosity and interest Dr. Lyttelton's handling of that theme.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

The Virgin Birth.

IT is well known that the virgin birth of Jesus Christ is not a New Testament dogma. There is no trace of it in any of the Epistles, and two of the Gospels make no mention of it. Even the Gospels according to Matthew and Luke, apart from the passages in which such a birth is recorded as having actually occurred, contain not the remotest allusion thereto; and there is much internal evidence that even those passages were not found in the earliest copies. It is also a noteworthy fact that many present-day divines reject the doctrine of the Virgin Birth on the ground that it is not directly taught in the New Testament. While regarding the Incarnation itself as a veritable fact, they refuse to acknowledge that it was accomplished by means of a virgin birth. To us, however, the one is as inconceivable, being as contrary to nature as the other. But in the Anglican Church and in Nonconformity, there are prominent theologians who treat the Virgin Birth as a legend, if not as a myth. In a sermon which appeared in the Church Times for September 13, the Rev. A. E. Oldroyd, M.A., vicar of St. James's, West Hampstead, assures us that "on all counts, it will be found that those who deny the Virgin Birth will ultimately, because they must logically, make shipwreck of the Faith," a contention in which we heartily concur. If the Incarnation is an historical reality, we can see no necessity whatever to deny the Virgin Birth. If Jesus was not supernaturally born, there is no escape from the conclusion that he was a natural child. Mr. Oldroyd says:—

> I scarcely dare refer to the modern revival of the ancient Jewish calumny that our Lord and Saviour was a foundling, illegitimately born to Mary while betrothed but not yet married; and that she escaped the Mosaic punishment of stoning due to an adulteress only by a long period of lying and deception, in which Joseph acquiesced, after having been "minded to put her away privily," thus conspiring, like Ananias and Saphira, to lie to the Holy Ghost.

Let us now examine the Virgin Birth in some of its essential and most important bearings. Why did the Church formulate such a dogma? The Gospel Jesus is presented now as a human teacher sent from God, now as a man endowed with supernatural powers, now as the Word which was ever with God, and which was God, made flesh in some inexplicable manner. In the Epistles of Paul, Peter, and John, he figures as the Saviour of the world, who was holy, sinless, perfect, and as God made manifest in the flesh, who loved mankind and gave himself up for them. Thus, before the New Testament closes, the man from Nazareth has evolved into a Divine Being tabernacling in human nature, who, notwithstanding this alliance, knew no sin. But human nature is in a state of depravity, the victim of original sin. The innate sinfulness of our race is a fundamental article in the Christian creed. The following is the Pauline portrayal of the natural man:—

> As it is written, There is none righteous, no, not one; there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one (Romans iii. 10-12).

Such is the Pauline doctrine of man. Every child of Adam inherits a corrupt, debased, nature, and is doomed to everlasting perdition. There is no exception, and Nature offers no way of escape. Left to his own resources, every human being is both fallen and lost beyond all hope of recovery. But no sooner was Jesus conceived of as the Saviour of humanity than the idea of his own absolute sinlessness suggested itself. Paul declares that though born of a woman he "knew no sin," and Peter describes him as "a lamb without blemish and without spot," "who did no sin, and in whose mouth was found no guile." The cult-makers went further still and affirmed that he was, not only without sin, but incapable of sin. Even his impeccability became an article of the growing Faith. And yet he was true man as well as true God. Now, the question was how he could share our nature without sharing our sinful inheritance? It was in order to get over this difficulty that the notion of a virgin birth was adopted. We say "adopted," because all the great Saviour-Gods of Pagan mythology were believed to be virgin born. Adonis, Attis, Dionysus, Osiris, and Mithra, were archetypes or models closely followed by the founders of the Christian religion. As a matter of fact, Christianity cannot justly lay claim to any real originality. The world had teemed with Saviour-Gods for thousands of years before Jesus was ever heard of. The problems which Christian divines were called upon to solve were of secondary importance only. For example, they had to explain how Jesus escaped human sin by being born of a virgin, which was by no means an easy task.

Of course, virgin birth, as such, would not secure sinlessness, much less impeccability, because a virgin is as much a human being as a man. Mr. Oldroyd says that "in normal generation the mother supplies the matter, the father the active principle, and a new human person comes into existence round which this matter forms." Since the mother is by nature impure and sinful, the matter which she supplies necessarily partakes of her constituent qualities. The first explanation of the sinlessness of Jesus was wholly inadequate. The Fathers declared that he was without sin because the Holy Ghost had contributed "the active principle" of his personality, but they forgot that his mother, though a virgin, was still a sinful human being, and could not help imparting to him her own sinfulness. Mr. Oldroyd frankly admits this, saying that "the Blessed Virgin Mary supplied the whole human nature—body, soul, and Spirit"—of Jesus Christ, which nature could have been no other than blighted by original sin, although "the active principle" was supplied by a Divine Being. Birth of a woman was unavoidable, but birth of a woman meant a sinful inheritance. During the Middle Ages, and down to the latter half of the nineteenth century, the divines utterly failed to agree on any theory that would fully account for the absolute perfection of character almost universally claimed for the God-man. The theory advocated by many was that known as the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary; that is to say, her absolute immunity from the sin of Adam as the result of the miracle of her own sinless conception in her mother's womb. Milman tells us that neither St. Bernard nor St. Thomas Aquinas accepted such an absurd theory. He says:—

> It became the subject of contention and controversy, from which the calmer Christian shrinks with intuitive repugnance. It divided the Dominicans and Franciscans into hostile camps, and was agitated with all the wrath and fury of a question in which was involved the whole moral and religious welfare of mankind. None doubted that it was within the lawful sphere of theology. Wonderful as it may seem, a doctrine rejected at the end of the twelfth century by the last Father of the Latin Church has been asserted by a Pope of the nineteenth, and a Council is now sitting in grave debate in Rome on the Immaculate Conception (History of Latin Christianity, vol. ix., pp. 75-6).

The Pope referred to was Pius IX., who also promulgated Papal Infallibility. The Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary was proclaimed on December 8, 1854, after many centuries of fierce controversy; and after all it is but a theory which lies wholly outside the sphere of verification. We caudidly admit that the immaculate conception of Mary is not one whit more incredible than the virgin birth of Jesus, and surely those who believe in the latter ought not to boggle at the former. Again, a virgin birth is quite as unthinkable as an incarnation of God, and we can see no reason why those who firmly hold the latter should experience any difficulty in accepting the former. To us both are equally unbelievable and absurd, the Christian Saviour-God being every bit as mythical as Pagan Osiris, Adonis, Attis, Dionysus, or Mithra. A glance at the state of Christendom at this moment would convince any unprejudiced, fair-minded person that the Christian Redemption is as gigantic a farce as those found in Pagan mythology. The Virgin Mary and her son belong to precisely the same category as Isis and her son Horus.

The Task of Freethought.

> Rip Van Winkle fell into a stupor, and slept twenty years, to find his beard and all the world about him quite changed. —Nuttall's Encyclopædia.
> There is nothing else in history but the fight between freedom and tyranny.—Arnold White.

MR. J. F. RAYNER, a friendly critic, in a letter published in the Freethinker, says that "after thirty years' absence" he has rejoined the National Secular Society, and finds that it has made no progress "either in the extent or style of its propaganda." He adds further that if "ethical and social activities," as seen in the Churches," were associated with Secularism the cause would benefit.

It may be owing to Mr. Rayner's "thirty years' absence" that he has overlooked or forgotten the ideals aimed at by the National Secular Society, but it may be well to mention that its objects are to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalize morality; to promote peace; to dignify labour; to extend material well-being; and to realize the self-government of the people.

This is a fairly lengthy and ambitious programme for any single organization, even if supported by large resources, which the National Secular Society does not possess. Freethought is a poor, struggling cause, its members are comparatively few and scattered; and it has no wealthy endowments to defray the cost of a national propaganda. Still, the Society has kept the flag flying bravely for fifty years, and it has managed to relieve its necessitous members. The Benevolent Fund has, during its existence, been well supported, and is, probably, the only fund which is administered without a single farthing of expense. Until a very short time ago it was not possible to bequeath money for Freethought purposes with any real prospect of the trust being carried into effect, as it was always in the power of the next-of-kin to invalidate the legacy on the ground that it was illegal. The famous Bowman Case altered this, but Freethought was robbed of thousands of pounds before this memorable legal victory.

During Mr. Rayner's "thirty years' absence" two Presidents of the National Secular Society have died from the overwork and anxiety inseparable with such an onerous office. Despite the undeniable fact that the Freethinkers have compelled the clergy to refrain from thrusting their more repulsive dogmas on the public, the fight between Freethought and Superstition is by no means over. We have not yet succeeded in eliminating the clergy from our national councils, nor from our schools. In both these places the clergy still wield great power. There are not wanting signs that Church and Chapel may yet combine their efforts against the common enemy, and a recrudescence of superstition may yet cause us need for greater vigilance and activity in the near future.

Mr. Rayner complains that, during his thirty years in the wilderness, we have "made no progress." Surely, great changes have taken place. In the stormy days of Charles Bradlaugh the Freethought audiences were almost entirely composed of men, whereas, to-day, there are as many ladies as men. The literary appeal has been broadened, as anyone may see by comparing the later issues of the Freethinker with the earlier, or by contrasting the present-day Freethought publications with those of the earlier period. Thanks to the courage and devotion of Freethought leaders, heterodoxy is no longer the disgrace it once was to the citizen. Thirty years has added respectability to Freethought advocacy, placed its exponents on a strong platform, organized its forces, justified its rights to equal citizenship. Through the religious prejudices of our time a breach has been made large enough for the heretic to pass through in future, and in many other directions our lives have been made easier.

The "social activity" of Christians is not always entirely benevolent. Let Mr. Rayner ponder over the case of Stephen Girard, the American Freethinker. At his death, this large-minded and large-hearted man left substantial bequests to charities, the principal being a munificent endowment of an orphanage. By express provision in his will, no ecclesiastic, or minister of religion, was to hold any connection with the college, or even to be admitted as a visitor, but the staff of the institution was required to instruct the pupils in secular morality, and leave them to adopt their own opinions. This will has been most shamefully perverted, for the officials are all Christians, and, in order to keep within the letter of the law, only laymen are so employed. To-day the Girard Orphanage is pointed at as a proof of Christian philanthropy.

If Freethinkers do their own thinking in religious matters, they also do it in everything else. Spiritual and temporal authority are brought under the same rules, and they must justify themselves. Freethinkers are thus social reformers, and they are almost to a man on the side of justice, freedom, and progress. To make a new world, no audacity contributes that is not in the first place intellectual. Man's great need is boldly honest minds.

As for imitating the "social activities" of the Christians, Mr. Rayner should know, as a Freethinker, that whilst charity is very good in its way, what the world wants is justice. If the world were run on fair and reasonable lines, there would be no occasion for philanthropy to exist. Christian charity is largely a bribe to the working classes to keep them in order, and to attract them into the churches and chapels. In India and elsewhere, the missionaries bribe the natives with medical dispensaries, and at home the clergy use the lure of coals and blankets, soup kitchens, children's nurseries, Sunday-school "treats," Pleasant Sunday Afternoons, and other attractions. The cash-box and the cassock have always been on the same side, and will be to the end of the chapter. So long as wealthy men have "surplus" thousands derived from underpaid labour wherewith to found and endow churches and chapels, so long will "religion" be necessary to keep people quiet, and so long will thousands of places of worship mock the few lecture-halls devoted to Rationalism.

"Where's yer orspitals and lunatic asylums?" is a very old jibe of Christian advocates. Freethinkers need not trouble about this sneer. In common with their fellow-citizens, they contribute to their support. Maybe, Christians have a special interest in lunatic asylums. They may subscribe to them; certainly they help to fill them.

Freethought is not a religion, nor a substitute for superstition. It is not concerned chiefly with social reform as such; but it is actuated by the pure love of truth, and is justified in bending its whole energies on the destruction of delusions, ecclesiastic and supernaturalistic. Its mission is to free mankind from ancient error, and in so doing it is rendering a service to the human race. Human nature does not need a supernatural religion, does not need an other-world superstition. It needs to be freed from the shackles of clerical control, and it will then adjust itself naturally to the real conditions of life, material, physiological, and social. Although no ideal perfection may ever be reached, men will be all the happier for having escaped the control of the clerical caste. To be true to truth is man's first duty, and from it all other duties will be told. As truth-seekers, we live for the highest. This is the heroic life; and, as Meredith says finely:—

> Though few,
> We hold a promise for the race
> That was not at our rising.

MIMNERMUS.

A Search for the Soul.

XII.

IN November, 1916, the Central Control Board (Liquor Traffic) appointed an Advisory Committee "to consider the condition affecting the physiological action of alcohol" on the human organism. This committee consisted of eight distinguished physicians, with Lord D'Abernon as chairman, who finished their labours in December, 1917—the conclusions given in the report representing the unanimous judgment of all the members. Among the latter were: the Principal Medical Officer to the Board of Education, the Professor of Pharmacology at University College, the Pathologist to the London County Asylums, the Professor of Physiology in the University of Oxford, and the Medical Superintendent of the Rampton State Asylum.

With regard to the matters which this committee investigated I have nothing to say here; the only point to which I wish to draw attention is that it is tacitly assumed throughout the report that the so-called "mind," which is shown to be affected by the use of alcohol, is nothing more nor less than the sum of the functioning of different parts of the brain—the lower portion of that organ being common to other members of the animal kingdom, and the higher portion, that of the frontal lobes, being found only in man. Bearing these facts in mind, I will now quote two paragraphs from the book I have referred to—Alcohol: its Action on the Human Organism:—

> Alcohol undoubtedly diminishes the control of the intellect and the will over the emotions, and successively weakens and suspends the hierarchy of functions of the brain, and therefore of the mind, in the order from above downwards; that is to say, in the inverse order of their development in the individual and in the race. For the emotional dispositions or capacities are a very ancient racial endowment and have their seats in the basal ganglia, the lowest levels of the great brain, the part which alone is represented in the brains of the lower vertebrates. The higher intellectual faculties, on the other hand, are the latest acquired, and are connected with the anatomically highest and last developed parts of the brain. Intermediate between these come, in the order of development, the sensory and skilled motor functions (and their nerve centres).

Now, of all the intellectual functions, that of self-criticism is the highest and latest developed, for in it are combined the functions of critical judgment and of self-consciousness, that self-knowledge which is essential to the supreme activity we call volition or deliberate will. It is the blunting of this critical side of self-awareness by alcohol, and the consequent setting free of the emotions and their instinctive impulses from its habitual control, that give to the convivial drinker the aspect and the reality of a general excitement. In the mature and well-developed mind, this interplay of thought and emotion goes on under the checking and moderating influence of self-criticism; in social intercourse, especially, it is constantly checked by the thought of the figure one cuts in the eyes of one's fellowmen. In proportion, then, as alcohol hampers the mechanism of self-control, the liberation of intellectual or emotional effects goes on at a higher rate (p. 32).

In the foregoing paragraphs it cannot fail to be perceived that the members of the Advisory Committee are all in perfect agreement upon the question of the localization of mental functions (or so-called "psychical states") in the brain—that is to say, they are firmly convinced that all mental functions are associated with definite regions of that organ, so that what is called Mind is but another name for the phenomena produced by the functioning of different parts of the brain. We thus arrive at the indubitable fact that mental functions are materialistic.

Let us now look at a typical case in which whisky affects "the mind." The first effects of this spirit is perhaps a slight giddiness or lightheadedness, after which the drinker begins to feel a sense of careless well-being or bodily and mental comfort. Soon his conversation and actions become less constrained; he has a free flow of ideas, and becomes witty, lively, or satirical. He experiences, perhaps, a revival of old feelings which had seemed to have passed away for ever. All his emotional nature is in an agreeable state of excitement; he can become angry or compassionate according to the appeal of the moment. He laughs and smiles or makes jovial remarks, and becomes careless of the impression he is making on the company. He no longer thinks of weighing his words or acts, and laughs idiotically at the mere ghost of a joke. He feels an inordinate self-satisfaction at his own sayings and doings, and likes to hear himself talk. He sometimes becomes of an argumentative frame of mind, and freely gesticulates in laying down the law. His ideas, a little later, appear to get mixed, and to follow one another without order; while his speech becomes more or less incoherent. Later on, a feeling of depression overtakes him, and he is plunged into maudlin melancholy, from which in due course he sinks into a heavy stupour, and sleeps the sleep of the blessed.

That it was the whisky which produced all the abnormal effects here described is undoubted; the only question to be considered, then, is how the so-called "mind" could be thus affected. Let us see. After a dose of alcohol has been swallowed, about one-fifth of it is absorbed into the blood from the stomach. In the uppermost part of the small intestine about one-tenth more is absorbed, leaving seven-tenths to be accounted for. Of this more than half is absorbed in the middle part of the small intestine, and the remainder in the lower portion of that alimentary organ. Unlike ordinary food-stuffs, alcohol does not require to undergo digestion; it therefore makes its way rapidly into the blood. Being now a constituent of that vital fluid, the alcohol is carried by the circulation to every part of the body; but the only organs upon which it appears to have any particular effect are those of the central nervous system—by passing from the blood into the cerebro-spinal fluid, which bathes the brain and spinal chord.

We thus arrive at the fact that the alcohol in the whisky imbibed comes into direct contact with the brain, upon whose sensitive substance its narcotic or intoxicating principle exercises more or less effect, according as the individual happens to be an occasional or a regular drinker. But how does the spirituous property of alcohol affect the Mind? If what is called "the mind" be an immaterial "entity" apart from the brain, it is not touched at all, and could not therefore be affected in any way by any amount of alcohol. That it is so affected, however, simply proves that Mind is not what Dualists represent it to be; that it is, in fact, something produced by the functioning of the brain, and that the latter process is to a certain extent impaired by the influence of alcohol upon it. The portion of the brain chiefly affected appears to be that which was latest acquired, and which is found only in man—that of the greatly developed frontal lobes. Hence, the controlling and restraining effects of the latter upon the functioning of the other regions is relaxed, and the drinker feels free to give the reins to his emotional and lower animal nature without let or hindrance, and so becomes for the time being a different creature. If the mind were an entity separate from the body, this could not occur.

Acid Drops.

Talk about cheek! Here is the Bishop of London requesting the Lord Mayor to summon a meeting of laymen to consider how to place the finances of his diocese on a sound basis. This means, of course, a request that they will contribute more. Suppose the meeting suggests that the Bishop drops, say, nine out of his ten thousand pounds per year, just as a beginning. Will he do it? All we have heard of him is that he has invested his surplus money in War Bonds. But as this brings him in five per cent., his piety and patriotism is not of an unprofitable character. Some of the clergy, says the Bishop, hardly know how to get through the winter owing to the cost of living. We know of others who are in the same plight, and who do not believe in prayer or Providence. The Bishop pleads that he has the oversight of a million people. We think ninety-five per cent. would cheerfully dispense with his supervision.

Miss Maude Royden, the lady preacher at the City Temple, intends offering facilities for questions and discussion after the sermon. Now, that is a good step; but we doubt if it will last for long. It has been tried before, but invariably given up as being dangerous. It usually begins on the assumption that the questioner is simple-minded and uninformed. When it is discovered that the questioners have a position of their own and "make good," the policy is quickly changed. It is only the Freethought platform that maintains the policy of open discussion.

The Vicar of Heptonstall caused a mild sensation at the Parish Church on a recent Sunday by dismissing the congregation on account of talking going on in the church. In the midst of his sermon he pronounced the benediction, and brought the service to an end. That particular "benediction" must have been somewhat like the well-worn expletive of the villain of melodrama, "I love you; curse you!"

The "Holy Land" is being found out by our soldiers, and they are not all enthusiastic concerning its sacred attractions. A correspondent, writing in the Daily News, says:—

> Wherever the idea originated of consigning people to Jericho, no one who has been in the Jordan valley this summer will quarrel with the suitability of the selection. Day in, day out, the thermometer registers from 105 to 125 degrees in the shade. Dust, flies, and mosquitoes are terrible plagues. Very unpleasant, too, are the snakes.

Many people laughed when they read that the London County Council was running a "school of politeness" for waiters. We should smile, too, if we heard that the Christian Evidence lecturers were compelled to attend.

Some pointed remarks on Church War-memorials appeared in the Southend Standard. The editor says: "I am against all sectional efforts. The sentiment of the locality demands that any monument to their memory shall be something equally pleasing to Protestant and to Catholic; to Socialist and to Conservative; something in which the whole of the community has played a part; truly a town's memorial." This is a retort courteous to all those dear clergymen everywhere who wish to add stained-glass windows, side-chapels, and ecclesiastical sculptures to their churches under the pretence of erecting War-memorials to the fallen.

The clerical wheeze, "After death, what?" has no terrors for the Government official. Mr. J. M. Hogge, M.P., speaking at Liverpool, quoted from a letter to a discharged soldier, issued by the Pensions Ministry, informing the soldier that he was to receive "19s. 6d. for life, at the expiration of which you will again be medically examined with a view to consideration of your claim for further pension."

The neglect of science in this country is extraordinary During the four week's opening of the King's College Scientific Exhibition no member of the Government nor any representative of a State Department officially visited the exhibition or referred to it. Had it been a missionary exhibition or a Bible society show the place would have been crowded with Government officials—admirals and generals.

A foot-note to Mr. Cohen's new book on Christianity and Slavery is to be found in Cecil Torr's Small Talk at Wreyland, in which, in a letter written in 1849, it is stated that farm labourers "were put up to auction by the parish authorities and hired for sixpence to ninepence per day."

What sheer nonsense some divines do write and talk these days. A Dr. Morgan, of America, "regards Germany as personally guided and directed by Satan." The barbarism into which she has lapsed is so cruel, so ruthless, so dehumanized that this godly man can only describe it as the outcome of "demoniacal possession." The Americans, too, must mend their ways, or their "win-the-War" methods will be vain, their "sins of avarice, intemperance, immorality, graft, materialism, Sabbath desecration, profanity," crying aloud for heaven's vengeance. The only hope of winning the War is by making "the day of prayer the habitual attitude of mind and heart on the part of our people." Dr. Morgan is not far behind the Bishop of London in the art of trampling under foot the Christian commandment, "Love your enemies."

The Daily Chronicle estimates the number of regular book-buyers in this country at 50,000. As only a portion of this number is interested in serious literature, it says little for the national intelligence. Maybe, that is one of the reasons why the country is still under the influence of an Oriental superstition and a clerical caste.

An interesting trophy from Mesopotamia is now to be seen on the Horse Guards' Parade, London. This is a bronze Persian gun, weighing about five tons, captured by the British on their entry into Baghdad. The inscription on the gun reads: "Succour is from God." This reminds us of the advice of Cromwell to his men: "Trust in God, and keep your powder dry."

According to the newspapers, the Archbishop of Canterbury has joined the National Alliance of Employers and Employed. Does this mean that organists, choristers, vergers, and other Church workers are to receive a living wage?

"A War Widow" writes to the Leeds Mercury commenting on the Vicar of Marsden's complaint that the value of his living has been reduced owing to the prevailing high prices. This lady points out that the wives of soldiers have had their incomes reduced owing to their husbands being in the Army, and still have to face the higher prices. She adds that, instead of the War making people less selfish, the world seems "more selfish than ever, and it begins largely at the church, the place where people expect a better example." That should make the Vicar of Marsden reflect a little.

The unsettled state of Irish affairs reminds one of a slip made by the Duke of Wellington during a House of Lords' debate on Ireland. In the course of his speech he mentioned that two clergymen had been murdered in Ireland. A noble lord on the opposite side of the House rose at once to correct him: "No, no, only one." "Only one," rejoined the Duke, "Well, if I am mistaken, I am sorry."

Rev. Mr. McLean, of the South Indian United Church, speaking at the annual missionary meetings at Hamilton said the War had been a great stumbling-block to religion in India. The natives there asked: "Was not the German rajah Christian also?" I am afraid the Rev. Mr. McLean will find the War has been a great stumbling-block to many at home who used to profess Christianity. The beliefs and actions of Christians don't always square with one another.

Discontent seems to be rife amongst the Scottish Churches at present, else why the numerous calls from the Lord to other spheres of labour?

Mary Mullins now knows what value to place on the charity of Holy Mother Church. Two years ago she came from Ireland to Glasgow. Lately she got into trouble, and finding her baby an embarrassment in getting employment, and she herself absolutely destitute, she placed her infant with a bottle of milk beside him on the floor of St. Andrew's Pro Cathedral, Glasgow, in the hope that some charitably disposed worshipper would take care of the child. In this she was mistaken as the baby was handed over to the parish authorities and she herself traced and sentenced to two months' imprisonment.

Priests are the same everywhere. The Archbishop of Paris officiated at a service in the Church of St. Genevieve, expressing gratitude for the preservation of the French capital from the Germans. A marble plaque has been erected to the "saint" for services rendered. Yet the saviours of Paris were live soldiers and not plaster images.

A minister had been waiting at a Scotch station for a train from the North, and looked more than usually unhappy. Suddenly a woman, one of a group of mourners on the platform, approached him and said: "Excuse me, are ye waiting for the corpse fra' Stirling?"

Writing on the fascinating subject of "hair-cuts," a contributor to the dear Daily News refers to the Jewish prophet Elisha. The Bible tells us that this delightful old savage was "thin on the thatch," and some children called to him: "Go up, baldhead." The prophet fetched some hungry bears, who promptly gobbled up the children. Truly a salutary lesson of the evil effects of poking fun at a "man of God"; but what stuff to retail to children in a civilized country?

A publisher's announcement states that in a new book, "Colonel Roberts gives a deeply interesting analysis of our conception of life and death from the creation to the present day. It is refreshing to find one modest man in these pushful days.

A writer in the Daily Express suggests that curates might go on strike for increased pay. Well, we consider they would be quite justified in doing so where they are not getting a "living wage." Those who want curates ought to pay for them. The only difficulty we see is that the public in that case might dispense with them altogether. In any case, we cannot conceive any general enthusiasm being worked up on their behalf.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

September 29, Southampton; October 6, Manchester; October 13, Swansea.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—September 29, Birmingham; October 6, Leicester; October 13, Maesteg; October 20, Southampton; November 3, Manchester; November 10, Sheffield; December 1, Swansea.

T. C. LANGRIDGE.—You are not "worrying" us in the least. You will find some instructive pages on the colouration of animals in Dewar and Finn's The Making of Species. The point for a student to bear in mind is that while the general fact of evolution is demonstrably true, there is no room for dogmatism on the factors, or of their relative values. Sorry we are too busy in other ways to write at length on this subject—at least for the present.

H. ROBERTS (Christchurch, N.Z.)—There is something in what you say, and we will bear the matter in mind. The Bible Handbook would give what you require, but that, for the time, is out of print. We shall reprint as early as possible.

GEO. W. ROGERS.—The celebrated line in Lucretius runs thus in English: "To such vile deeds can religion persuade men"—such vile deeds as the slaughter of the modern Iphigenia on the altar of Artemis.

T. WADSWORTH.—Thanks for compliment. We have done our best.

R. BELL.—If you will send to the office, we will enclose in some of the parcels we are sending out weekly to France and other parts of the fighting line. We have every reason for believing that the discussion with Dr. Lyttelton is attracting considerable attention.

E. TRUELOVE.—Whether there is a "good round sum left in hand to meet future expenses" remains to be seen. There will certainly be something. Our readers are in earnest, as you will see.

J. F. AUST.—The author of the lines is Alexander Pope. Sorry your paper went astray, but the post nowadays is rather uncertain. Have sent on copy.

D. TURNBULL.—Thanks for name of new reader for paper, which is being sent. We hope the treatment will be effective; it generally is, save in the most obstinate of cases.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (September 29) Mr. Cohen opens the seasons lecturing at Southampton with two lectures in the Waverley Hall, St. Mary's Road, morning, at 11, "The Savage in Our Midst"; evening, at 7, "The New World and the Old Religion." We hope Freethinkers will do their best to advertise these meetings among enquiring Christians.

The Birmingham Branch made a good start with its season's work last Sunday. Owing to the very heavy cost of getting posters printed and posted, these were dispensed with on this occasion, which made the meetings the more gratifying. And there was a record sale of literature, which bore witness to the interest felt by the audience. To-day (Sept. 29) Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures in the Repertory Theatre at 7, on "The Value of the Bible in National Life," a reply to Rev. Campbell Morgan. We hope to hear of the theatre being crowded.

"B. F. B.," in subscribing to our Sustentation Fund, says: "When I think that I have lived in this country fifty-three years, and am now an old man, I consider it a hard fate that I became acquainted with the existence of your paper only three years ago." It is a hard fate, and we believe there are many thousands in the position in which "B. F. B." was, and who would count it a favour to make the acquaintance of the Freethinker. Those who read this paragraph should do their best to remedy a state of things that calls for redress. Last week's printing order reached a record figure, but we can do with more readers.

Miss K. B. Kough lectures to-day (September 29) at the Secular School, Pole Lane, Failsworth. Her subject in the afternoon, 2.45, is "Are We Still Savages?" and in the evening, at 6.30, on "Marriage: As it was, As it is, and As it might be." Pole Lane, Failsworth, is to be reached by tram ride from Manchester, and no doubt many Freethinkers from there will make it a point of attending.

One of our soldier-readers gives us his experience of Army life as under:—

> I joined the National Reserve in October, 1914 (I am now fifty-five years old), and when attesting I pointed out that I was an Atheist, the regimental sergeant major, fortunately, was present, and immediately took me on one side and swore me in by affirmation; but when being transferred to other Companies I have invariably got into hot water. As an illustration I will give my experience on joining this Company at Portsmouth, where a Battalion was mobilized for Ireland. On the Sunday morning we were all on parade, and the various denominations were formed into different parties. I was alone (although I knew of three who were Freethinkers), when a Jew fell in alongside me. I told him I was an Atheist and took a few paces from him, still he wished to come with me, he evidently did not like to be made a public exhibition of, neither did I; but some must make a stand. Along came R. S. M. with the O. C., and, in a loud voice said—referring to me: "This man doesn't believe in anything." The officer asked me my religion. I said: "I am an Atheist, and, probably, believe in more things than the S.-M, only our tastes differ." I am pleased to say that I have got on very well with all the officers ever since, and the Jew corporal has stuck to me ever since, and claims me as his special friend, he is very loyal to his religion, but I think I have got him "guessing," as the Americans say, especially about souls, spirits, ghosts, etc.
> I am pleased to say that I have been very successful in convincing my colleagues on the absolute fallacy of religion. Many at first I could not induce to read the Freethinker, but now I hardly get a chance to read it myself, and then it goes on board one or other of our patrol boats here. I had a lot of back issues at home so I had them sent on to me for distribution.

A discussion is to take place to-day (September 29) at Parliament Hill, North London, between Mr. E. Burke and Mr. Muir of the C.E.S., on "Free Will and Determinism." There is room on Parliament Hill for a large audience, and we hope to hear that it was present. The discussion commences at 3.15.

There is good raw material in the intellectual and emotional make-up of a small book of verse which we have just received, The Everlasting Quest and Other Poems, by John Roebuck (Avery & Co., 105 King Street, Aberdeen). But, unfortunately, ideas and feelings in their raw state are not poetry; they need to be wrought into things of beauty, and this means much hard work, directed by a fine or fastidious taste. To be quite frank—Mr. Roebuck will appreciate the compliment to his talent implied in our candour—the more ambitious of the poems come considerably short of the standard by which we judge poetry. The poem that gives the title to the book, the sonnets, and the other verses in rhymed pentametric metre, are noticeably weak on the technical side. Mr. Roebuck has not got the hang at all of this, the stateliest of English measures. It would need more space than we have now at our disposal fully to set out our objections; but if Mr. Roebuck will study Matthew Arnold's workmanship he will, no doubt, see what we are driving at. Plain living and high thinking are all to the good, yet they alone have never made a man a poet. It is the singing quality only that counts.

It is just this singing quality that we miss in Mr. Roebuck's more ambitious work; but we do get in a few of the poems. The Hodden-Grey is a charming fancy adequately and originally expressed; A Ballad of Barlinnie, although hardly a ballad, since it is rather an impression than a story, is its own recommendation. The best poem in the book, to our thinking, is Thochts. The poet sees in his mind's eye the hefty crofter, his wife and daughter, and wee bit of land they work; then he sees the pretentious modern mansion which has taken the place of the "canty cottage," and in the last of the four beautiful and heart-easing stanzas he sings:—

I can see a white road windin' ower to muir and past the mill,
Past the smiddy an' the schule-house, 'cross the burnie ta the hill
Wi' the kirkie on the croon o't, an' the kirkyard on its broo:
Eh, sirse! Tae think the three of them are a' there noo!

Mr. Roebuck will understand when we say that this lovely snatch of lyric inspiration gives us the same incommunicable thrill of æsthetic pleasure as does Mr. Yeats's Lake Isle of Innisfree. We can hardly give greater praise.

The uncertainty of the post is responsible for our not noting last week a meeting held by Mr. Lloyd at Blaina, Mon, on September 15. We are glad to report that the gathering was successful from every point of view, and that quite a number of intelligent questions followed the lecture. No one would welcome that kind of questioning more than Mr. Lloyd.

The Secretary of the Manchester Branch asks us to call special attention to the meeting of members to be held to-day (Sept. 29) at Bakers' Hall, 56 Swan Street, at 6.30. A good attendance is requested, in order to take effective measures for the season's campaign.

We are also asked to again remind East London Freethinkers of the outing of the West Ham Branch to take place to-day. It will take the form of a "Ramble" from Upminster to Warley. The train reaches Upminster at 10.37, and tea will be provided. "Ramblers" must bring their own lunches.

Mr. C. T. Shaw, of 64 Worcester Street, Wolverhampton, has kindly undertaken to collect waste paper in his district on our behalf. Will Freethinkers in the neighbourhood be good enough to leave their paper with Mr. Shaw, who will send on to us so soon as the quantity is large enough to be dispatched.

There is to be a meeting of South Wales Freethinkers, to forward the work of organization, at the Welsh Harp Hotel, Pontypridd, to-day (Sept. 29) at 2.30. Those in the district will please note.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

WANT of space prevents us this week giving our usual citations from the many interesting letters received, and we must, therefore, content ourselves with taking this method of acknowledging the encouraging and congratulatory messages to hand. In our issue for September 1 we gave a statement concerning the need for our opening of this Fund, and there is no need to repeat what was then said. It is in the strictest sense a War Fund, since it was made necessary by the War, and that necessity will, we regret to say, remain so long as the War continues.

The situation does, in fact, grow more threatening instead of easier. We mentioned last week that the last rise in wages—compositors, machining, etc.—means an increase of about another £100 annually on the cost of production, so that our friends will perceive the strain is not getting lighter with the progress of the War. And we have now received notice from our paper merchants that paper is to be one penny per pound dearer on future orders.

We hinted a week or two ago at a projected development that would have been of importance to the Freethinker and to the Cause generally. Owing to the increased expenses mentioned, we do not feel justified with proceeding with that now, and must postpone its realization to some more favourable occasion. Meanwhile, we shall continue to pay attention to increasing the circulation of the Freethinker, which, we are pleased to say, is still proceeding. So far as our limited resources permit, we continue to advertise the paper in likely quarters, but in the main we are compelled to rely upon the kindly efforts of our readers. These will be gratified to learn that our printing order last week touched the highest figure yet reached, and we hope to soon exceed that. We are out for a big circulation, and mean to get it.

The following represents our Subscription List to date:—

The Dark Diamonds of the Earth.

VI.

(Concluded from p. 502.)

THE development of indigo from coal tar is an outstanding triumph of modern chemistry. This dye, dating as it does from remote times, was derived exclusively until recently from the leaves of the indigo plant. Large stretches of soil were devoted to its cultivation. So late as 1896 more than one million and a half acres of indigo plantations existed, chiefly in India, and the value of the dye stuff was about £4,000,000. But familiar is the fact that the astute Germans gradually surmounted all the obstacles they encountered, and finally elaborated indigo synthetically from coal tar. In the autumn of 1897 artificial indigo appeared on the market with sad consequences to the Indian industry. The soil under indigo cultivation in 1896 (1,583,808 acres) had shrunk in 1912-3 to 214,500 acres, while the Indian export had been reduced in value from over £3,500,000 in 1896 to a meagre £60,000 in 1913. The price of indigo dropped one-half, and the industry had fallen into the hands of the Germans. Whether the Indian plantations will ever recover their former importance is doubtful now that synthetic indigo is so cheaply produced.

In the preparation of artificial indigo naphthalene, one of the commonest constituents of coal tar provided the basis for the succeeding processes of production. All the various transformations successively undergone by the several compounds built up during the synthesis proved easy of accomplishment save the first—the conversion of naphthalene into phthalic acid. The cost of this initial conversion threatened to prevent the commercial triumph of the undertaking when a trivial laboratory mishap served to solve the difficulty which handicapped the chemists. As Findlay states, it was due to—> the accidental breaking of a thermometer immersed in the heated mixture of naphthalene and sulphuric acid that it was discovered that mercury acts as an efficient catalyst in the conversion of naphthalene into phthalic acid and facilitates the process to such a degree as to allow it to be carried out with commercial success.

The foregoing method arose from the researches of Karl Heumann, while another productive process based on benzene is also founded on that chemist's inquiries. In company with the indigo plant, the several species of madder have been superseded by coal tar derivatives in the manufacture of dye stuffs. Anthracene oil is evolved from coal tar, and, in 1868, two continental chemists discovered that the colouring substance of madder could be prepared from anthracene. At this date some 70,000 tons of madder were each year grown in the madder fields. British imports of this pigment were then about 16,000 tons per annum, and the price was £50 per ton. Ten years later the importation of the vegetable dye had dwindled to less than 2,000 tons, while the price had sunk to £18 per ton. The cultivation of the madder plant is now almost extinct. Yet the production of this vegetable dye, which dates from early Egyptian times, was, until fifty years ago, a flourishing industry. Millions of acres long restricted to the cultivation in the East of indigo, and in Southern Europe to that of the madder plant are now available for the production of cereal and other essential crops. Two industries originally valued at several millions sterling yearly have now practically passed from the realms of husbandry into those of chemical science.

The magnitude of the synthetic madder dye manufacture is owing to its capacity for producing splendid purple, violet, black, red, and deep brown colours. The hues depend upon the mordant employed in impregnating fabrics subjected to the dyer's treatment. The colours depending on the use of madder include the most permanent kinds. One of these is the magnificent Turkey red which imparts to cotton a brilliant colour. Anthracene, the basis of these fine colours, now rapidly rose to a position of importance from a very lowly estate. To quote Professor Meldola: "In two years a material which could have been bought for a few shillings the ton advanced at the touch of chemical magic to more than 200 times its former value."

Fahlberg, in 1879, evolved from coal tar, toluene, a substance of surprising sweetness. A few years later this material was placed on a marketable basis as a flavouring substance which could be utilized in commodities that require sweetening, but in which sugar proves injurious. This, for instance, is of prime importance with the food stuffs of sufferers from diabetes. Fahlberg's product, now known as saccharin, possesses more than 400 times the sweetening power of cane sugar. This compound is very useful for several important purposes, and its value in medical treatment has secured its recognition in the Pharmacopœia. The discovery of a white crystalline powder so greatly outdistancing sugar for sweetening purposes seemed to menace the sugar industries with ruin. State intervention, however, promptly prevented the introduction of saccharin into commerce as a substitute for sugar. Licences were required for its manufacture, and the sale of this coal tar "sugar" was restricted to the druggist. It is essential to observe, however, that while cane and beet sugar possess high nutritive properties, saccharin contains no nutritive value whatever. It is an excellent medicament, and as such it occupies a high rank.

Perfumes are prepared from coal tar. Among these are sweet woodruff, various clovers, New Mown Hay, vanillin, hawthorn blossom, meadow-sweet, and other splendidly scented compounds.

Many important drugs are now derived from coal tar. Antipyrene is elaborated from aniline, which is itself evolved from benzene. From antipyrene was subsequently derived another important antipyretic—pyramidone; while a further derivative, antifebrine, has proved itself a useful febrifuge.

From the sinister activities of a micro-organism, the Spirochæte pallida, the venereal disease syphilis is generated. Ever since the Middle Ages, mercury has been regarded as a specific for this malady. Mercury, however, proves detrimental to the patient. Professor Ehrlich therefore endeavoured to evolve a compound containing some toxic substance which would be absorbed by the microbe but not by the tissues of the sufferer from the disease. After a long series of experiments, Salvarsan, the famous 606, emerged. This preparation, now available in Britain under the name of Kharsivan, is a benzene derivative, and consequently a coal tar product, although arsenic is also added to the compound.

The principle of selective absorption which guided Ehrlich in his researches has led to later victories. Dr. Browning's discovery that trypa-flavine, one of the coal tar dyes, possesses the remarkable property of destroying blood-poisoning bacteria while remaining harmless to the white blood corpuscles or "warrior cells" which form the natural defences of the body when attacked by disease, has promoted the use of this compound as an antiseptic. Obviously, a germicide which selects as its foes the malign microbes alone is far superior to ordinary antiseptics that slay "with equal impartiality the pathogenic organisms and their natural enemies, the white 'warrior cells.'"

When, in 1914, the World War opened, Germany's almost complete monopoly of the production and supply of synthetic drugs became painfully apparent. In a most instructive table, Professor Findlay shows the serious rise in prices which this drug-famine occasioned. There we find that phenacetin, priced at 2s. 9d. in 1914, rose in January, 1917, to 92s. 6d. per pound. Salol, which was selling at 1s. 10d. before the War, advanced to 47s. per pound in 1916, although it has since fallen to 10s. 6d. Generally speaking, there has been a marked decline in the price of drugs since 1916, the year of highest prices. This fall is due to the labours of our chemists, seconded by increased supplies from America and elsewhere. For a time the situation was very critical, and perhaps the experience has not been in vain.

Of the services rendered by coal tar derivatives to photography and to various other arts there is no space to speak. The writer trusts that no apology is needed for this short series of papers on the apparently prosaic subject of coal. To him science and Freethought are indissolubly linked, and he earnestly subscribes to the view expressed by one of our most thoughtful chemists that—> until the imagination of our people can be fired by the mental contemplation of great chemical achievements we shall never be able to gain for chemistry and for chemical study that measure of interest, respect, recognition, and encouragement which alone will enable this country to hold her own in the industrial competition of the world.

PROFESSOR C. H. HERFORD ON LUCRETIUS.

A FRIEND of mine with an admirable bias towards clear thinking reminds me that Lucretius, the great freethinking poet of old Rome, has always attracted strong and independent minds. A glance at the subject will be sufficient to show the justness of his remark. Those of my readers who know their Montaigne well will, no doubt, recall a passage in which he expresses his delight in the natural and sustained vigour of the Latin poets, whose manner of writing, he says, "does not so much please, as fill and ravish the strongest minds." After quoting some magnificent lines from Lucretius, he goes on: "When I behold these brave forms of expression, so vivid, so profound, I am inclined to say not that it is well said, but that it is well thought." That is the truth in a nutshell. But it was not so much the thought as the expression that appealed to Dryden, whose robust and matter-of-fact temperament found little interest in philosophical speculation. His versions of a few of the more famous passages give some of the fullness, the sonority, and dignified progress of the Latin hexameter. Yet it is hopeless to try to reproduce in English the closely packed thought of the original. Voltaire, Diderot, and Frederick the Great saw in Lucretius the impassioned opponent of religion and priestcraft. Their delight was not in the brilliant episodes, but in the firm logical texture of the great third book, in which is marshalled all the evidence for disbelief in the immortal nature of the human mind. In the last century, in that mid-Victorian period dishonoured and abused by every young criticaster nowadays, Munro published his text, commentary, and translation—a monument of sane and enthusiastic scholarship; J. A. Symonds wrote a luminous and eloquent study of the poet's ideas and style, and Goldwin Smith occupied his scholarly leisure by turning, or, rather, expanding, a few passages into excellent English stanzas. Gladstone could quote with effect the "noble and majestic lines" (Bk. ii., 646-651) in his speech on the Affirmation Bill, his commendation moving a pious member of the House to protest that the poetry of Lucretius was "only less objectionable than Mr. Bradlaugh's writings."

. . . . . .

Only a little while ago some of us were delighted to find Lord Morley checking the flow of his recollections to give us a discussion on the merits of the Roman philosopher-poet, and now Professor C. H. Herford, a man of letters, whose work reveals both vision and depth, has printed a lecture delivered in 1917 at the "John Rylands Library" in Manchester. As an introduction to Lucretius, it is well worth buying. With it and Munro's prose version—obtainable, I believe, in a cheap reprint—the English reader has some of the materials for appreciating the thought, and to a limited extent the style, of a great poet and a great Freethinker. Mr. Herford begins by noting that Lessing denied the title of poet to Lucretius because Aristotle had said that there could be no poetry worthy the name that was not the imitation of human actions. This was the eighteenth century standpoint. The Romantic Revival levelled these Aristotelian entanglements of critical barbed-wire, and extended the domain of poetry so as to embrace all human emotions. It is to Wordsworth rather than to Lessing that we turn for an adequate theory of poetry. For him poetry is the "spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings; the impassioned expression which is in the countenance of all science." For Lessing, as I have said, Lucretius was a mere versifier, because he did not imitate human action; yet if we dig deep enough, we shall find that "On the Nature of Things" has an epic grandeur. The characters are not men and women, it is true, but the immense forces of Universal Life. On the same ground, Lessing would have denied the name of poet to James Thomson ("B.V."), whose "City of Dreadful Night" is based, not on the interplay and clash of human actions, but on powerful and spontaneous emotions remembered in tranquillity. Goethe, Mr. Herford notes, owed much to the dry light of Lessing's admirably analytic method, and yet he rejected at once his narrow view of poetry; and, what is more to the point, he gave Lessing's theory a practical denial by writing a fine poem on "The Metamorphosis of Plants."

Mr. Herford tells us that "On the Nature of Things" is "at once a scientific treatise, a gospel of salvation, and an epic of nature and of man," and also that we are rarely conscious of one of these aims to the exclusion of the others. In none of these was Lucretius original. He got his science from Democritus, his way of salvation from Epicurus, while his master in philosophic poetry was Empedocles, the "poet-philosopher of Agrigentum, whom Matthew Arnold made the mouthpiece of his grave and lofty hymn of nineteenth century pessimism." The atomic theory of Democritus, a contemporary of Socrates, was an attempt to explain the universe by combinations of material particles, indivisible, and therefore indestructible, coming together fortuitously, and moving in a vacuum. It is a fruitful hypothesis, the possibilities of which are not by a long way exhausted. It has the advantage of leading directly to Atheism. This system was adopted by Epicurus, a philosophic and gentle recluse, who had little or no interest in its speculative aspect. For him it was valuable because it promised, as Mr. Herford says, an "effective relief from disturbing interests and cares, and especially from the fear of the gods, and a life after death." This was the gospel of salvation from superstition, which Lucretius embraced with the fervour of a disciple.

> He was not like Pope, in the Essay on Man, providing an elegant dress for philosophic ideas which he only half understood and abandoned in alarm when they threatened to be dangerous. He was the prophet of Epicureanism, and it is among the prophets of the faiths by which men live and die that we must seek a parallel to the passionate earnestness with which he proclaims the daring gospel of Epicurus.....What we admire unreservedly in him, declares a great French poet, who died only the other day—Sully-Prudhomme—is the breath of independence which sweeps through the entire work of this most robust and precise of poets.

Epicurus, the "timid and debonnair humanitarian, the quietist of paganism" in the imagination of the Roman poet, becomes a large heroic figure—a new Prometheus—whom neither the story of gods, nor thunderbolts, nor heaven with threatening roar, could quell; who passed beyond the flaming boundaries of the world, and traversed in mind and spirit the whole unmeasurable universe, returning a conqueror to tell us what can, what cannot, come into being; under whose feet in turn foul religion lay prostrate, and whose victory has raised human nature to the skies. It is precisely this upward lift—this passionate faith in the free play of the mind that converts what might have been a didactic treatise into an epic song of the world-wide conflict between reason and religion. The great passages, moreover, are not, as some would have us think, mere pleasant oases in an arid waste of expository science. They are as much a part of the tissue of the poem as are the more emotional, the more lyrical passages of (say) Romeo and Juliet. And as you will get no idea of the play by merely picking out a great scene here and there, so you will get no idea of the immense intellectual and emotional cogency of the De Rerum Natura if you confine your reading to selections.

. . . . . .

Mr. Herford notes that most of the recognized and famous poetry of the book is connected with the negative side of the subject—the annihilating criticism of religion based on fear of the gods, fear of death, and of what may happen to us after death. How surcharged with the emotions of indignation and pity is the famous passage in which he tells of the slaughter of Iphigenia on the altar of Artemis! (I. 84-101):

> Lo! on her tresses fair for bridal tire
> The sacrificial fillet they have bound;
> Beside the altar weeping stands her sire:
> In all the crowd no tearless eye is found.
> The priests make ready for their office dire,
> Yet pitying hide the knife. When gazing round
> The Maiden sees her doom, her spirit dies,
> Her limbs sink down, speechless on earth she lies.
>
> The first born of his children she in vain
> Had brought the name of father to the king.
> In arms upborne she goes, not by a train
> Of youths that the loud hymeneal sing
> Around a happy bride in joyous strain
> Bearing her home, but a sad offering,
> There to be slain by him who gave her birth.
> Such evil hath Religion wrought on earth.

How impressive is the magnificent close of the third book (lines 820 ad fin.) where he brings all he had of philosophy and science irradiated with ardent emotion to prove that the long night of the grave can be no more painful than the eternity before our birth! The personification of nature as the Eternal Mother of men who rebukes them for bemoaning an ineluctable fate is as moving as it is solemn. Its solemnity with that of other similar personifications have led critics, who could not see that Lucretius was both a poet and a man of science, to argue that he was in this way seeking after the comfort and support of a personal deity. What would they say to Meredith's rehabilitation of the Earth Goddess?

. . . . .

On the sadness of Lucretius—the sense of the "tragic pathos of sudden doom and inexorable passing away." Mr. Herford has an exquisitely phrased passage:—

> To say that he puts the "Nevermore" of romantic sensibility in the place of the dispassionate "give and take" of mechanics would do wrong to the immense vitality which animates every line of this athlete among poets. Of the cheap melancholy of discontent he knows as little as of the cheap satisfaction of complacency, or of that literary melancholy, where the sigh of Horace, or Rousard, or Herrick, over the passing of roses and all other beautiful things covers a sly diplomatic appeal to the human rosebud to be gathered while still there is time. No, the melancholy of Lucretius is like that of Durer's Melancholia, the sadness of strong intellect and far-reaching vision as it contemplates the setting of the sun of time and the ebbing of the tides of mortality; or, like Wordsworth's mournful music of dissolution, only to be heard by an ear emancipated from vulgar joys and fears; or, like the melancholy of Keats,—the veiled goddess who hath her shrine in the very temple of delight,—the amari aliquid, in Lucretius's own yet more pregnant words, which lurks in the very sweetness of the flower (p. 25).

MIND AND MATTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Professor Tyndall's difficulty in seeing how thought is to be accounted for by the action of the brain presents itself, to my mind, in this way. All material phenomena may be thought of in terms of extension and movement; they are all cases of something occupying space and moving. Extension and movement, then, are universal attributes of matter. Now, consciousness cannot be thought of at all in these terms, and being, therefore, inexplicable in terms of those attributes of matter which we derive from our experience of physical phenomena, it must, I think, be admitted that a real difficulty exists for the Materialist to face. This, however, does not, in my judgment, weaken the case for Materialism. On the contrary, I think it is strengthened by candidly recognizing difficulties which appear insuperable to its opponents.

After all, other systems have their own peculiar difficulties. The Dualists, for instance, have to account for the supposed interaction of two substances (matter and spirit) which have nothing in common but duration. This seems to me just as impossible as it is to think of spirits existing apart from matter.

There remains Idealism, the only monistic system which I regard as fundamentally opposed to Materialism. With regard to that, it seems to me that if I deny the existence of material things, except as perceptions, I should also deny the existence of people other than myself, since I only know them directly as material bodies. Their consciousness I infer from their physical manifestations, and if these exist only in my mind, so must that which is derived therefrom.

My idea is that matter has an attribute of a psychic nature that, under certain conditions, gives rise to consciousness, but that this attribute is undiscoverable from phenomena for the same reason that we can only know of the consciousness of others indirectly through physical means. In other words, I believe that not only organisms, but matter in general, has a subjective as well as an objective side.

Christian "Corruptions."

We have been reading an attack on the Roman Catholic Church by a Protestant, and a reply thereto. Each accuses the other of obstructing progress, of being bigoted, of foisting a false Christianity on the people, etc. Being a Freethinker, we sympathise with both sides. We agree with each that the other is bigoted; that each side has falsified history, distorted man's moral sense, and obstructed science. It is, indeed, curious that the only time when one gets a fair measure of truth from these controversialists is when they are showing each other up. And one is reminded of the maxim that when rogues fall out honest men are likely to get their due. For instance, each accuse the other of corrupting primitive Christian teaching. But neither appear to realize that this corrupting of primitive Christian teaching was an essential condition of its continued existence. Absurd and impracticable doctrines such as non-resistance, celibacy, etc., may remain uncorrupted so long as they are held by a small body of fanatics. Quakers may practise non-resistance while a police force is maintained by less "spiritual" Christians, or Shakers practise celibacy while others perpetuate the race. But let either dominate the State, and their teachings become corrupted or society ceases to exist.

The Meaning of "Corruption."

All sorts of Christians appear to miss this point. Had Christian doctrines been adhered to in all their primitive impracticability, Christianity would have remained of no more historic consequence than the long-haired followers of the Lost House of Israel who may be found in modern London. The corruption and secularizing of Christianity was in reality a rationalizing of it; an attempt to adapt it to contemporary needs and ideas. And, as a matter of fact, every attempt to govern society by Christian doctrines has necessarily ended in failure or corruption. Calvinism in Geneva broke down utterly after two hundred years of rule, during which period its higher intellectual life lagged behind the rest of Europe. Presbyterianism in Scotland went through a long process of secularizing in order to live. The reign of the Puritans in England, which was essentially an attempt to govern the nation according to ideas derived from the Bible, is one of the most ghastly failures recorded in history. To keep Christianity pure, therefore, is to keep it before the public in all its native absurdity and unworkability. It becomes rationalized in order to live. Its "corruptions" are the modifications forced upon it by the desire to live and rule. In this way the "corrupting" of Christianity has led to the dropping of Biblical inspiration and infallibility, eternal damnation, miracles, and the assumption of liberal thinking by various sections of the Christian Church.

The Benefit of Accident.

Much is made by Protestants of the circumstance that Roman Catholic countries are in general backward countries. And, of course, the difference is set down to the presence or absence of Protestantism. But to make the comparison of value, cases would have to be found where Protestantism and Roman Catholicism, with their respective clergy, have an equal quantity of political power, and therefore equal power to help or injure. As it is, any careful student will find that the only benefit conferred by Protestantism is an accidental and a negative one. Protestant countries are, on the whole, more progressive than Catholic ones, not because of what Protestantism does, but because of what it does not do. The divisions of Protestant bodies, their never-ending rivalry, prevent any one of them from securing supreme power such as that which for centuries was enjoyed by the Catholic Church, and so leaves a larger area of civil life outside religion. It is that which gives us the sole benefit of Protestantism over Roman Catholicism—it does not interfere to so large an extent with social life. The Roman Catholic priest avowedly aims at dominating life as a whole. The Protestant minister is forced by political conditions to disavow any attempt to coerce the State; and it is to this negative quality that the development of countries where Protestantism is dominant is due. But with this distinction, and allowing for the difference in the social powers of the two faiths, the Protestant clergy show themselves as inimical to progress as do the Catholic clergy. If the Roman Church punished the scientific workers of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, the Protestant Churches of the nineteenth century showed as bitter hostility to Lyell and Darwin. Protestant Churches, in their small peddling way, are as much given to heresy-hunting as are Roman Catholics—perhaps more so. And they are quite as greedy of State help, and as fond of State patronage. The whole lesson of history is that, once you place any Christian Church in power, the results are disastrous. Christianity is only harmless when it is powerless.

The Lesson of History.

Most amusing of all is it to find Protestants charging the Roman Church with intolerance. The charge is true enough, but it does not lie with Protestants to urge it. For, allowing for difference of opportunity, has Protestantism shown itself more tolerant of opinion than Roman Catholicism? We do not find that it has. On the contrary, it is to Protestantism we owe the circumstance that heresy was taken out of the hands of the Church, and its suppression made the business of the State. Historically, Protestant Churches have been hotbeds of intolerance and centres of persecution. For savage intolerance, it is hard to beat the early generations of Protestants. Calvin, Luther, Beza, Knox, are names that suggest an intolerance as bitter as anything displayed in the annals of the Roman Catholic Church. Luther believed in stamping out all who denied the principles of the Christian religion, and also that Jews should be confined as lunatics. Calvin's burning of Servetus was accompanied by every desire to prolong his victim's agony for the satisfaction of his religious bigotry. Knox was intolerance incarnate, and his followers openly taught that the killing of heretics was a justifiable act. In England, heretics certainly gained no more favour from the Puritans and their successors than they did from Catholics. It was under Protestantism that men and women were sent to prison, time after time, for selling Paine's Age of Reason. And in New England, wholly Protestant from the first, the reign of the Puritans was accompanied by every mark of savage bigotry and brutal intolerance.

Semper Eadem.

And even to-day it is an error to speak or think of persecution as being over. People are no longer burned, and not often imprisoned; but they are banned and ostracised. Their living is filched from them, and their peace of mind, where they are of a not sufficiently stern type, destroyed. And between the church that cuts off a man's living, or severs him from social intercourse, because of his dissent, and the church that burns for the same offence, the difference is one of degree only. There is no difference in kind. It is the same spirit in both cases, but in the former it can only express itself imperfectly. There is no greater delusion than this of accepting Protestantism per se as more tolerant than Roman Catholicism. The one is just as intolerant as the other. In brief, every form of supernaturalism, and in particular Christian supernaturalism, is necessarily intolerant and destructive. It ceases to persecute science only when science is strong enough to cry "Hands off!" It yields to reform only when it is too weak to resist. And it is the height of folly to mistake weakness for a virtue or impotency for goodwill.

Apologetics in a Quagmire.

The late Professor Bruce, of Glasgow, defined Apologetics as the science of stating and explaining Christianity defensively. It is a wonderfully illuminating fact that, after being in the world for so many centuries, Christianity still needs to be so stated and explained. Indeed, theologians have always been apologists; and, strangely enough, the apologies of one age have never satisfied another. More than that, no apologist ever arose who fully met the demands of his own age. In other words, at no period in its history has the Christian religion succeeded in convincing all the people of its own truth and efficiency. Even in the Ages of Faith there were doubters not a few, when doubt was treated as a crime. To-day, the masses in almost every country in Christendom have lost all interest in religion, while multitudes of the more thoughtful and reflective not only doubt, but openly disbelieve, all its doctrines. This state of things is causing the pulpit the greatest disquietude and alarm. Sometimes a note of despair is heard, usually sounded by those clergymen whose churches and chapels are comparatively empty. It has become a habit with them to indulge in angry tirades against the ignorance, materialism, and besottedness of the working classes, and against the worldliness, luxury, and love of pleasure which blind the minds and sear the consciences of the upper and middle classes. Others, who are more generously endowed, whose churches and chapels are full, cultivate an optimism which is anything but justified by the sum total of the facts. These, too, occasionally complain of the forgetfulness of God and the neglect of religious ordinances which seem to prevail in certain quarters; but they comfort themselves and their followers by giving vigorous expression to a confident hope that the present wave of religious indifference will soon spend itself, and that almost immediately the mightiest revival ever seen will be upon us. But all preachers alike, be they optimists or pessimists, are apologists. Recognizing the existence of numerous arguments against the Faith which prevent many people from accepting it, and realizing the fact that round about them there are thousands of well-informed men and women who even glory in their unbelief, they feel bound to do all they can to rebut those arguments and to enlighten the darkened understanding of their absent opponents. In the prosecution of this defensive mission, they often make use of their own press. As a rule, the religious newspapers are seldom read by non-believers, with the result that the apologies published therein rarely reach those for whom they are primarily intended. In the Christian World for September 19, there was a highly suggestive article, entitled "Wanted—An Interpreter," from the pen of J. A. Patten, M.A., M.C., C.F. By "an interpreter" Mr. Patten really means an apologist who will undertake to deal with religious questions defensively. He starts with the Genesis legend of Jacob wrestling with an angel through the dark hours of the night, and asking his Divine opponent what his name was. Mr. Patten treats that ancient legend as an historical fact. The wrestler is reported to have inflicted upon Jacob a bodily injury from which he suffered to the end of his life. This is how he puts it:—

> The Divine wrestler had overcome his human opponent by a touch that meant pain and weakness and humiliation. Jacob accepted the chastisement without a murmur, but he wanted to understand the why and wherefore of the strange occurrence. He must needs go on with his shattered, weakened life, but he longed for an interpretation of the angel's touch.

Thus is Mr. Patten led to discuss the problem of suffering in general. According to him our greatest need is, not an alleviation of suffering, but an interpretation of it. We are all constitutionally "fitted to bear an incredible amount of pain," he tells us; but that is not true. Many a suicide is exclusively due to a constitutional dread of suffering. John Davidson, poet and playwright, is believed to have taken his own life through his inability to face the prospect of becoming the victim of the horrible disease of cancer. It is false to state that "in the last analysis we are stoics" in relation to suffering and sorrow. Surely, Mr. Patten cannot be ignorant of the fact that there are myriads of our fellow-beings who are hopelessly groaning under burdens which are crushing them to the earth. What they desire above everything else is release from the awful pressure. Most people are bearing burdens unjustly thrust upon them by those in power. What troubles them is the fact of the burden, not the reason for it, which they understand only too well. At this point the writer quotes the dying cry of the great Goethe: "More light, more light," though the relevancy of it is very doubtful. It is quite possible, of course, that, as a Christian Theist, Mr. Patten is more concerned about the mystery of pain than about pain itself, but the Atheist is under no necessity to entertain any anxiety on that score. Naturally, everybody wishes to discover why he suffers, but only in order, if possible, to be delivered from the terrible ordeal. In any case, the mystery of suffering owes its existence very largely to the belief in an over-ruling, all-good, and all-loving Deity.

This applies with peculiar pertinency to the present War. To the Atheist the War is by no means an insoluble problem. For him the full explanation of it is be found in human nature itself. On the whole, evolution is an upward movement, a progressive tendency; but, as every scientist knows, it is a process characterized by numerous zigzags or fluctuations. There are national and international, as well as individual, lapses and relapses, religiously known as backslidings; and the War is par excellence a case in point. But on the assumption that there lives an infinite Being, in possession of infinite power, who sitteth as King for ever, the War becomes at once a perplexing, baffling mystery, a tragedy which no one can understand and explain. The parsons are utterly helpless, and yet they dare not leave the problem alone, though they are at sixes and sevens every time they touch it. It is no wonder Mr. Patten declares that "the world needs interpreters of the mystery in which it is enshrouded," and interpreters without number there are, whose interpretations, alas, are equally without number, no two of them alike, but all of them tragically futile. It is frankly admitted in the article under review that the true interpreter has not yet arrived, and that so far the War is an inexplicable enigma, an unrelieved mystery. The Bishop of London has several times removed his coat and rolled back his sleeves, intent upon tackling the difficulty with all his might, but each time nothing but humiliating defeat has been his reward. On one occasion he went so far as to confess that the War had already resulted in the partial defeat of God himself—had, in fact, completely smashed his first design of a porcelain vase of universal peace, and compelled him to substitute for it a second design of universal service. It is silly beyond compare to call theology "the queen of the sciences," and in its name to say that God inspired Darwin to discover the origin of species, a discovery which has done more than all other discoveries put together to bow God out of the Universe, as it led Darwin to evict him from his own consciousness during the latter half of his life.

One is gratified to find that Mr. Patten does not attempt to play the part of an interpreter in his well-written article. Interpreters of the Universe in terms of Theism are at best but idle dreamers. Mr. Patten alludes to Jean Paul Richter's exquisite dream in which a man is summoned to the vestibule of heaven to contemplate the immensity of space. "Then the man sighed and stopped, shuddered and wept. His overladen heart uttered itself in tears, and he said, 'Angel, I will go no further, for the spirit of man acheth with this infinity. Insufferable is the glory of God.'" Mr. Patten imagines himself much wiser than Jean Paul Richter, who was a man of genius, and finds fault with the utterance, "Angel, I will go no further," saying:—

> Ours is a nobler part than that—to believe that God, who planted the love of truth in our hearts, will lead us to the truth, however uphill the path may be.....The questions that demand an answer are far-reaching and perplexing: the relation of God to the War; the meaning of this universal suffering; the arrest of human progress, and the uncertain progress for the future—these and many other perplexed themes.

And these are questions which Mr. Patten, an ardent believer in God, does not even try to answer, but contents himself with expressing the hope that an interpreter may soon appear who will successfully resolve them. In the course of nineteen centuries there have come and gone innumerable defenders of the Faith, and even now, far on in the second decade of the twentieth, the cry is for more, the Christian religion still standing in as much need of being defended as ever. With this fact in mind, are we not justified in concluding that the Faith is in its very nature absolutely indefensible? The all-satisfying interpreter is yet to come. The truest thing written by Mr. Patten, on the present occasion, is the title of his very interesting article: Wanted—An Interpreter.

Christianity and Labour.

> We shall never enfranchise the world without touching people's superstitions; and even if we abolish the House of Lords we shall still dwell in the house of bondage unless we abolish the Lord of Lords; for the evil principle will remain to develop into new forms of oppression.—G. W. Foote.

The Modern Labour Movement has never proclaimed, and never sought after, an alliance with the clergy. So evident is this aloofness that, whenever a Trades Union Congress is held, the clergy are certain to break out into hysterical appeals to Labour leaders to remember that God and the Churches have always been on their side. But, as an old proverb assures us, in vain is the net spread in full sight of the bird. The instinct of self-preservation on the part of the Labour leaders prompts other and safer measures than a close contact with the Black Army.

Why this feeling of estrangement should exist between the Labour Movement and Christian Orthodoxy is explained by Mr. Chapman Cohen in his masterly Christianity and Slavery, with a chapter on Christianity and the Labour Movement (The Pioneer Press). A more powerful or opportune analysis of the Democratic indictment of Christian Orthodoxy it would be difficult to conceive. Mr. Cohen is not a writer who trusts to rhetoric and purple passages. His is the logical, judicial mind, prone to examine the present in the light of the past, that sees in the struggle between Democracy and Clericalism the efforts of priests to survive the fate of Destiny.

Stage by stage, calmly, dispassionately, the author develops his theme. Each chapter is an armoury of facts; an arsenal of argument. He shows the attitude of the Bible to slavery; compares slavery under Paganism and under Christianity; examines the institution of servitude in the Ages of Faith; outlines the history of the English Slave Trade, and of American negro slavery. Finally, the subject is rounded off with an acute and illuminative analysis of the Black and White Races, and of the attitude of Christianity to Labour. In the chapter on the attitude of Orthodoxy towards the working classes, Mr. Cohen has written some of the most telling pages of his book. Terrible as the earlier chapters on slavery are, this plain, unvarnished record of nineteenth century wage-slavery is one of the most appalling in the history of religious hypocrisy. Mr. Cohen does but recall the horrors inflicted upon women and young children by their employment in mines, collieries, and factories, but no one can read his masterly summary without a strong feeling of indignation that such things were possible in any country claiming to be civilized. Mr. Cohen's comment is well worth quotation:—

> It only remains to add that during the existence of these complicated horrors, and the systematic ill-treatment and slaughter of children for pure gain, the country was bristling with renewed religious activities, imprisoning men and women for publishing and selling Paine's Age of Reason, and fighting France in defence of civilization.

Mr. Cohen's careful and elaborate analysis of the whole subject of Christianity and slavery should be welcomed by every social reformer, for it is the most exhaustive and painstaking work on this important subject. He has worked to save his readers the trouble he took himself, and he deserves their gratitude as well as their admiration. The wonderful industry, the honest, previous toil of the writer is a thing to marvel at. He has read a pamphlet to write a sentence; he has spent hours in a study to make a paragraph. "Mr. Bradlaugh a great lawyer?" said an honest Secularist, discussing the Freethought leader at the height of his Parliamentary struggle, "why, he always has such easy cases." To make a simple thing complicated, as is the habit of ordinary journalists, will always attract more praise than to make a complicated thing simple.

Here is Mr. Cohen's considered verdict on the Christian Church:—

> It certainly could not be for lack of power that the Christian Church did not condemn slavery. For many centuries it exercised a position of commanding influence. It claimed the power to make and unmake kings, whole nations trembled at the threat of excommunication; it could set nation fighting nation for a difference of religious belief; it could send the whole of Europe on such a madman's errand as the Crusades; it could burn and imprison hundreds of thousands for witchcraft and heresy. The Church lacked neither power nor opportunity. And yet it not only failed to destroy slavery; under its auspices there was impressed upon the world the most brutal and degraded slave system known to man.

Men's memories are short, and the clergy's new found zeal on behalf of labour may deceive numbers of people. It is better to attach more importance to what the clergy do than what they say. In their hearts they care as little for the welfare of the working-classes as the Sultan of Zanzibar for his slaves. The votes of the clergy in the House of Lords prove it beyond dispute. The bare record is sufficient to rouse the lasting hostility of all right-thinking people, and their shameful opposition to all progress shows how hopelessly the clergy are out of touch with democratic aspirations and the humanist tendencies of the age. Scores of measures for the bettering of the conditions of labour have been opposed by these ecclesiastics, and their record carries its own condemnation.

Mr. Cohen's judgment anticipates history. In vain does the Black Army invite the representatives of labour to reconcile themselves with the Churches. Christianity has let the mastery of the democratic movement pass to other forces. It is the orthodox priestly attitude which is unchanged through the centuries, and which is the same in all nations, which convinces the long-suffering democrat to give in the verdict of guilty.

In view of political conditions, Mr. Cohen comes forward at the right moment with the right book. Admirably arranged, this impeachment of orthodoxy is crowded with illuminating facts relating to the subject. No single pen has revealed at once so clearly and so comprehensively the hypocritical affectation of the Churches with regard to their attitude to labour, nor has helped the busy reader to visualize better the conditions which obtained when the authority of the Church was undisputed and undisturbed. The present-day hypocritical pretensions of the clergy are nauseating. They have an aroma like that of the crowded cabin of a small Channel steamer on a rough day. Mimnermus.

An honest man has nothing to fear.—Robert Burns.

Religion and Life.

By E. Lyttelton.

Sir,—Enjoying, as we do, the very rare opportunity of carrying on a discussion at a leisurely pace, I find it is advisable at this point to make clear what I am aiming at. For in your second column you imply that I put certain questions to you as if I were seeking a "dialectical advantage." I had no such object in view. The last thing in the world that I want to do is to prove that you are wrong. My hope is to show that in certain great convictions you are right; my only dissent from you is because you don't push those convictions on to the next stage. I will explain.

First, as to these convictions. I wanted to be sure if you held them or not. You have answered the questions rather guardedly, but I think I have ascertained with sufficient correctness how the convictions enter into your interpretation of life; but I beg you not to suppose that I wanted you to make any admission which might enable me to score a point in argument. Arguing is a pretty pastime, but on great questions is about as profitable as playing Bridge.

Next, as to your view. You draw a contrast between the two positions as follows: "Not having to marry these facts to a special theory, I am only concerned with their logical interpretation.....Dr. Lyttelton has to harmonize the facts with a theory." I am at a loss to understand the first statement. Do you not hold there is no God? If so, surely it deserves to be called a theory; and if a sincere man holds a theory, can he avoid trying to harmonize facts with it? If you say your theory is that there is a God, then we have, indeed, been writing at cross purposes. But, perhaps, you would prefer to formulate your view as a via media—that there may be a God, but there is no evidence to show that there is; and if there is, there is no possibility of knowing him. Even that I should call a theory—not a good one, I admit, but still a theory; and my objection to it is that it is unintelligible and self-contradictory.

It is Herbert Spencer's; but he was unable to see that in saying God is unknowable he not only postulated his existence, but also affirmed something about him. If God is unknowable we could not say or think anything about him at all.

I hope this comment on your words will not be taken as a tu quoque, or as it is expressed in more modern parlance a common "you're another." The only reason I say you have a theory is because it seems to me to be a fact; and yet you deny it; and I hold that the neglect of any truth brings mischief with it.

It is possible, however, that you rest your emphasis on having a theory, but on the necessity I am under of marrying the facts to mine, while you are relieved from the necessity of marrying any facts to yours. I would suggest that we cannot judge how far either of us does this thing till we each have been more explicit as to our main position. I hope very shortly to be as explicit as possible as to what Theism and Christianity are, because that is required if I am to show at all clearly where your affirmations agree with mine, and where they fall short.

But in this letter I cannot go further than to indicate in very rough outline what I am sure is the cardinal point of difference between us. It is not conceivable to me that anyone who is not mad should tilt against the Christian doctrine of God if he really understood what it is. But it is exceedingly easy to misunderstand it, especially as it has been a thousand times obscured, distorted, wrenched out of its true relations, watered down, and so perverted as to become almost its own opposite, even in the hands of those who are doing their best to defend it. We need not waste time in speculating who has been most to blame; but it is a plain fact that all through his whole history man has repeatedly given way to a natural tendency to try to explain the Infinite; and in so doing he has unconsciously turned it into the Finite, and then wondered at finding it fails to satisfy thoughtful minds.

So far as I understand your position, you are attacking a doctrine which you believe to be fundamentally superstitious and fraught with manifold mischief to mankind. I say you have been doing a service to us all, in that you have helped to show that our most central doctrine is very easy to state erroneously, so erroneously that it naturally expresses to inquiring people something incredibly different from what it really is. In other words, you have been attacking a doctrine of a finite god, which I fancy, though it has been again and again dressed up by its votaries in quite attractive colours, is such nonsense that no one really believes it except a few lunatics who are happy in worshipping either a paltry figment of man's brain or some image fashioned by the joiner's hand. (For to try to worship a finite god is the very essence of idolatry.) I must do my best to prove that this statement of the divergence between us is sound.

Meantime, it is relevant to remark that this characteristic of Christian Theism (viz., that it is very easy to state quite erroneously) is common to many other spiritual doctrines or subjects of thought—I mean those which appeal to something in us other than the five senses—which I am pretty sure you hold to be true and of vital importance to man's welfare: such as Law, Order, Progress, Patriotism, Moral Goodness, etc. These have often been wrongly stated with results disastrous in proportion to the bigness of the doctrine or subject. Thus I hope you will resist the temptation to say that Religion must be nonsense because it is so difficult to explain. In the long run I fancy we shall see that this fact tells immensely in its favour, but that must come later.

Sir, in younger days I have occasionally indulged in the ancient pastime known as Aunt Sally; the throwing of short, stout sticks at a figure carved into a very rough resemblance to a human face, or merely a cocoanut set on a pole. A successful shot was rewarded by a good deal of clatter, and a strange sense of satisfaction felt by most healthy minded young people of the male sex. Such, I regret to say, has often been religious controversy: a species of intellectual Aunt Sally, in which the object of attack has been a sorry counterfeit of a living thing or a grievously misused natural product; misused because wholly misunderstood. To avoid such waste of time, I will endeavour in my next letter to substantiate what I have said above, and can trust to you to pull me up if any statements are obscure or seem to be contradictory. In the course of this I hope to answer the questions you put in your last article.

For He who has denied to the most devoted psalm-makers and moral poets all beautiful thoughts and all literary reputation, lest they should be praised too much by their earthly fellow-creatures, and thereby forget heaven, where the angels have already engaged board for them in advance;—He, I say, provides us other profane, sinful, heretical authors, for whom heaven is as good as nailed up, all the more with admirable ideas of earthly fame, and this indeed from divine grace and mercy, so that the poor souls, since they are really here, be not altogether wanting, and that they may at least enjoy upon earth some of that joy which is denied to them in heaven.—Heine.

Acid Drops.

Commenting on our discussion with Dr. Lyttelton, the Church newspaper, the Challenge, says: "It is naturally vexatious to the Atheist or Agnostic to be told that his (often very great) virtues, and his (often very noble) ideals, are the work in him of the God whose existence he doubts or denies." We can assure the Challenge that we are not at all vexed, but rather amused, by such a statement. And is it not astonishing that the God who can produce such noble ideals and great virtues in the Atheist falls short of producing a conviction of God's existence? And we might remind the Challenge of the sound rule that when things can be explained by known forces, there is no need to call in unknown ones. The Naturalistic theory explains all there is to be explained. The Theistic theory explains nothing, while itself ranking as another puzzle.

Sometimes there is an amusing outcome of the War-time regulations. At Rochford Session a fine was inflicted on a Jewish minister who came to bless the crops, but had forgotten to bring with him his identity book.

A clergyman has written a book with the title, The Hardes Part. It does not describe the position of the clergy in the great World-War, for in this country they are engaged in consoling the girls that the soldiers have left behind them.

You can always trust the dear clergy to use their opportunities. "Harvest festivals" have been held in some of the soldiers' "huts" in France.

A man named George Moss, found wandering about the country, suffers from the delusion that he has £10,000 a year and owns the Hotel Cecil. This is almost as curious a case as that of the Bishop of London, who has £10,000 a year, and imagines he is a poor man.

Scarce a week passes but some enthusiast leaves money for the endowment of superstition. This week, by the will of the late Mr. E. C. Burton, the Manchester City Mission receives a substantial bequest in the Longfield Hall, Salford, besides other gifts.

Some time ago the Bishop of London published a balance-sheet of his income showing that the more money he received the poorer he became. According to a newspaper report, the Rev. F. Pickford, of Farncombe, near Godalming, has the same delicate sense of humour. Replying to the suggestion that he had money, he preached from the text: "Silver and gold have I none," and afterwards gave details of his own and wife's private means. It may, of course, be explained that a man who really believes the dogma of the Trinity cannot be expected to be strong in the knowledge of arithmetic.

A Day of Prayer is to be held to return thanks for the liberation of Jerusalem from the Turks. Christians will meet to thank God for taking Jerusalem from Christians to give it to the Jews. The Mohammedan, who regarded Jesus as a prophet, is turned out. The Jew, who declares him to be an impostor, is to be ushered in! And the people who attend the Day of Prayer can keep a straight face! Oh for a lively sense of humour among the people!

A good story is going the rounds concerning the late Sir Samuel Evans, the divorce court judge. After the funeral service an acquaintance said: "Poor, old Sam! He's gone to heaven, but he can't be happy there, because in that place 'there is no marrying or giving in marriage.'"

The Rev. F. C. Spurr, who was a great "infidel slayer" in the Antipodes, writes in the Christian World that, when addressing soldiers, he was "pelted with questions concerning the value of prayer," and that one man wanted an assurance that he was not "talking into space" when praying. We should like to hear Mr. Spurr's opinion as to whether prayer could shift the bullets fired from a machine-gun, and if not, why not?

Canon Ring, of Westminster Cathedral, is stated to have said his first mass in a stable at Silvertown. Curiously, the Christian religion is also said to have been started in a stable.

According to the Evening News, the French Government has ordered four thousand Y.M.C.A. huts for use in the Army. Apparently they have not asked for the flannel-mouthed evangelists.

The civilizing effect of Christianity is not so apparent as the meat-roasting power of the meat-jack. A symposium of readers in the New York Herald War Magazine on the subject, "What's to be done with the Kaiser?" evoked the caustic comment of the editor, "Most of the letters are written by persons who can think of nothing so fitting as physical torture of the most extreme kind."

The Christian Conscientious Objector who told the Tribunal that he wouldn't kill a flea ought to try a course of cheap seaside lodgings.

Mr. Gompers, the American Labour leader, it appears, does not know where he was born, and he called at Fort Street, Spitalfields, when he should have gone to Tenter Street, near by. One remembers Mark Twain's story of the two rival Gardens of Eden. Mark's own choice was the one where the trees were not fully grown.

Cardinal Bourne dedicated at the Pro-Cathedral recently a War-shrine, with crucifix, to the memory of soldiers. This War-shrine movement is a clever dodge to popularize religious emblems, and also to exploit the War for the benefit of the Churches.

The endowment of superstition still goes on merrily. A large bequest has been left for the resident canons at the Anglican Cathedral of St. George at Jerusalem. It will be noted that the endowment of the Church means the enrichment of the clergy.

"Amid all the welter of this present tragedy, the one thing not observable is any sign of Providence as ordinarily understood. 'Bill prayed to God, and Bill had his head blown off,' is a soldier's rough summary of the dilemma." So says the Rev. Arthur Pringle, in the Christian World, and he ought to know. Well, really, Bill's summary is not unjust. Christians believe that some people are helped by Providence, and others have therefore a reason for thinking they are neglected. Providence does its work, apparently, in fits and starts. Sometimes it looks after things; at other times it lets things go to the Devil. It is as unreliable as a politician, as variable as an opportunist parson.

So Mr. Pringle says we must "explain this with all candour," because unless it is done, "there will be a dangerous leakage of faith." An explanation set about in that spirit is not likely to be very impressive. "We must be candid because it won't pay to be otherwise." In other words, "we must find an explanation that will remove the danger fronting us." Whether it is a sound one doesn't matter so long as it satisfies. And Mr. Pringle's explanation is, baldly, things are all right so long as our immortal soul is unharmed. But "Bill's" problem was not concerned with his immortal soul, but with his mortal head. He was not concerned with what Providence was doing to his "soul," but why Providence didn't pay more attention to his body. Providence in this War seems bent on remaining neutral. All the "Great" Powers are engaged; it is only the small and negligible ones that stand apart.

The editors of the illustrated papers have keen eyes for pictorial effect. In a recent issue of a London daily two pictures showed the procession of the Mohammedan Holy Carpet at Cairo, and a portrait of the American Archbishop Hayes in full war-paint. Both were fine examples of savage survivals.

Miss Mary Macarthur holds that "the great force in politics is going to be the baby. Why not? The great force in politics to-day is men in their second childhood.

Mr. H. G. Wells may have been converted, but he wears his rue with a difference. In his new work, Joan and Peter, he makes the lady ask, "If there isn't a hell, what does God do?" A palpable hit!

The Rev. James Drummond, formerly incumbent of Cross Street Chapel, Manchester, has died, leaving £14,164. This sum should be sufficient to prevent him handling a harp.

We see from the Christian World that in a discussion between teachers in theological colleges, held at Harvard, U.S.A., one of the speakers said he had found no revival of religion among the men in the ranks, but he had "seen a revival of religion among the chaplains." Now, that is decidedly rich. Putting on one side the consideration that it says little for the religion of the chaplains when they went out, a cynic might suggest that the revival of religion among Army chaplains is no more than increased business activity. Whether the enterprise will yield a fair dividend we have our doubts. It certainly has not done so up to the present.

The boys of Stoneyhurst Catholic College have sent to General Foch a list of 2,000 communions which have been offered in the school for victory. Now, we shan't be long!

A daily paper editor expresses astonishment that a London vicar was seen shopping, and adds that this is presumptive evidence of the shortage of servants. But why should a preacher of the Gospel of Poverty have servants?

"The German soul is God's soul; it shall and will rule over mankind. Verily the Bible is our book. It was given and assigned to us, and in it we read the original text of our destiny, which proclaims to mankind salvation or disaster, as we will it," so says a German Doctor of Divinity, quoted in the Ministry of Information's publications. The refining effects of God and the Bible is not very clear.

We hear much of the poverty of the clergy—from the parsons themselves—but they are not all near the casual ward. Here is a cutting from a provincial paper: "The vicarage at Grays, Essex, an old-fashioned house standing in large grounds, has been sold, and a modern up-to-date house will be erected for the incumbent."

The promised revival of religion is overdue, but there is a crudescence of barbaric Biblical habits, notably in the use of the stick in the case of juvenile offenders. At Southend six boys, charged with theft, were birched. Two of the elder boys were ordered to receive six strokes, and the four younger ones three strokes.

The Rev. J. J. Sandys, vicar of Gatacre, Liverpool, died in the parish church of Woolton whilst attending a service. There is no moral.

Church congregations are being urged by printed appeals to economize in the use of coal. Formerly congregations were frightened by appeals to avoid coal—in the next world.

The Christian religion is not the only one that is feeling the east wind of adversity caused by the World-War. The Chief Rabbi has sent a letter to all Jewish ministers protesting against the increasing number of mixed marriages between Jews and outsiders, which he regards as a grave menace to the Jewish faith. Another factor at work is the stoppage of immigration, which always helped the more orthodox party among the Jews, for most immigrants are more strict than those long resident in this country.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

October 6, Manchester; October 13, Swansea.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—October 6, Leicester; October 13, Maesteg; October 20, Southampton; November 3, Manchester; November 10, Sheffield; December 1, Swansea.

A. J. S.—We regret that our limited space prevents the insertion of your letter. But we do not say that evil comes through "Natural Law." Natural law is no more than a description of uniform processes. And as evil is the name given by man to processes which he finds unpleasant or undesirable, the Atheist has no need to ask whom it came from, or why it is here. These are Theistic, not Atheistic, questions. Nor do we see, from the standpoint of naturalism, why one form of existence should be called higher or lower than another. In nature things simply are. High and low are distinctions of our own creating.

R. H. Rosetti.—Pleased to hear from you, and to know that you are keeping well. We hardly need your assurance that your interest in Freethought is as keen as ever. We do not think you are made of the stuff that forms opinions lightly or discards them easily. Hope you will soon be back.

Mrs. B. Siger.—Your soldier son's contemptuous attitude towards "Days of Intercession" is, we have good reason for saying, that of very many thousands in the British Army. We wish him the best of good fortune.

W. E. Kerslake.—Thanks for sending on waste paper. It is urgently needed, and all helps.

Mr. F. E. Willis writes:—"I enclose cheque for my mite towards the Sustentation Fund for the best of causes. The manner in which you have kept the Freethinker going is itself a veritable triumph, and speaks volumes for the enthusiasm, sincerity, and intelligent discernment of your devoted admirers, and your own organizing skill. I do think, however, it would be wise to increase the price 50 per cent. to cope with some of the financial difficulties." We can only say we shall do this when we deem it necessary; but we are taking long views, and do not care to sacrifice to the ease of the moment the success of plans that will give the Freethinker its proper and an assured position.

M. Arthur E. Preece writes that we are wrong in saying that all religions place their golden age in the past. The Bible does not, and is quite opposed to the "superstitions" of the Church. Mr. Preece thanks the "splendid evidence for the true Christian religion," and encloses a six months' subscription to the paper. This is a pleasant way of heaping coals of fire on our head, but, all the same, we must point out that the Bible does place the golden age in the past, as is seen in the story of Eden.

T. Hensworth (Shrewsbury).—We do not care to make a special appeal for funds to send literature to the troops, bearing in mind that we have already to ask the help of our readers for the Sustentation. Such sums as are sent voluntarily we distribute, and, in any case, no request for literature has been refused since the opening of the War. We have supplied it ourselves when needed.

Mr. A. W. Davis writes, in forwarding cheque: "I have been a reader since 1888, and never liked it better than now." Thanks.

W. J. Wilmot.—We are very glad so warm an expression of attachment to the Freethinker from a reader of three years standing.

G. Grove.—Copies of the Freethinker are being sent to all the addresses. We are obliged to you for sending them.

C. Emwell.—We don't quite see the bearing of your question. So far as we are aware there is no difference in the original power of reproduction of somatic and germ cells. The reproductive power of somatic cells grows weaker as the cells themselves are, so to speak, allocated to other duties. This is what one would expect from what is known of the laws of evolution.

Hugh Higgins.—Yours is a very practical way of showing your appreciation. The ready response you received is also very gratifying.

Sapper Walder.—A man on joining the Army has the right to demand that he shall be entered as a Freethinker or an Atheist, or by under any other title. That being so, we imagine that few officers would decline to re-classify a man for any adequate reason. But we are not sure that re-classification can be demanded. Exemption from Church Parade is getting very common, and the more it is asked for the easier it will be to get. Thanks for what you have done.

T. Cresswell.—It is not only among Christians that prejudice is encountered, unfortunately. Your instance is a case in point. We imagine that the fear of religion is often only another name for fear of Mrs. Grundy. We are pleased to have your appreciation of the work of Bradlaugh and Foote.

W. H. Briden.—The cutting, as you say, quite bears out what we have said concerning the influence of the literature we are distributing among the troops. We are keeping it up. The full results will be seen when the War is over.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

There must have been something in what we said last week, in connection with the Sustentation Fund, to lead to the belief that we were losing heart in the continued and growing severity of the struggle. We are judging from a couple of letters to hand from the very warm friends of this journal. But we can assure them, and others, that this is not the case. The struggle is hard, and when it is recognized that the increased cost of paper, wages, and machining, leaving out other odds and ends, represents an advance of over £800 a year on pre-War cost, it will be seen that the task of carrying on is no light one. But in spite of this we were never more confident of pulling through, and of giving the Freethinker a better position than it has yet held in the country. We are so confident that we are already working at plans, which, although they may take several years to mature, will mature, unless something wholly unexpected occurs. What these plans are will appear as soon as the proper time arrives. Meanwhile we are not at all downhearted, or doubtful of our pulling through. We have too many sincere friends and well-wishers for disaster to occur. Our only concern is with the methods that must be adopted to overcome the ever-growing expenses and other difficulties. On that we may have to make a public statement in the course of the next two or three months.

The North London Branch opens its indoor work to-day (October 6) with a debate between Mr. Palmer and Mr. Muir, of the C.E.S., on "That the Evil in the Universe is Reconcilable with an All-knowing and Beneficent Creator." The discussion commences at 7.30.

Mr. T. C. Longridge writes:—

> Having just finished the reading of your Christianity and Slavery, I feel I must congratulate you on having produced a splendid propagandist work. The case you set forth is overwhelming in its completeness. But my object in writing is not to pay compliments, but to say that in my opinion the chapter on "Christianity and Labour" would make a capital pamphlet by itself, and if it could be reprinted would gladly take 500 copies for distribution. In any case, I enclose cheque for 50 copies of Christianity and Slavery, to be sent to soldiers at the Front. It will supply them with ammunition for many an engagement.

Another friend also sends us £2 for the same purpose. Needless to say, we shall be pleased to undertake the distribution of these copies if our readers will send on names and addresses. Particulars, please.

The Manchester Branch opens its session to-day with two lectures by Mr. Cohen in the Co-operative Hall, Ardwick. The afternoon subject at 3 is "God and the State"; evening at 6.30, "The Old Religion and the New World." Both subjects should give rise to plenty of discussion. In order to give the lectures a good "send off" it has been arranged that on this occasion admission is to be quite free, with, of course, a collection towards expenses. We hope those who do attend will bear this in mind, as otherwise the experiment is apt to bear adversely on the Branch funds, which are already sufficiently low. In any case, we hope that all Freethinkers, attached and unattached, will do their best to see that the hall is crowded on both occasions. It is a good opportunity for introducing new-comers.

As further evidence that our circulation of Freethought literature in the Army and Navy is telling, we observe a letter in the Daily Mail from a Mr. C. F. Wollouth, asking the Admiralty and the Army Council to "take action in the matter and issue such instructions to the authorities.....as will have the effect of safeguarding our men from the malign influences which are being brought to bear upon them." We feel quite flattered by this testimony to our "malign influence," and are strengthened in the resolve to pursue our evil course.

The weather was vile all over the country on Sunday last. It prevented Mr. Cohen's meetings at Southampton being as good as they would have been otherwise, but it didn't damp either the enthusiasm of those present or of those responsible for the work. The Branch Committee is full of energy, and intend to make things hum. At Birmingham, Mr. Lloyd, we are pleased to say, had a splendid meeting, with a rapid fire of questions at the close of the lecture. That always adds interest to the meeting.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures to-day (October 6) at the Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate, Leicester. The lecture commences at 6.30, and Freethinkers should make it a special point to introduce new-comers to the meeting. The hall is a fine one, and ought to be crowded.

We have been much struck by the number of women who have contributed to our Sustentation Fund. This is not observable to readers, as names do not always carry an indication of sex. But a very palpable feature in the list is the number of joint contributions from husband and wife. These are both features to be proud of. We are getting the women, we are getting the family. This represents an advance of great significance. We are forcing one of the great strongholds of the Churches.

A Search for the Soul.

XIII.

In the Weekly Dispatch of August 27, 1916, there appeared two articles by different writers, both dealing with the same subject. In introducing them to his readers, the Editor said: "While Sir Oliver Lodge deals with the purely scientific aspect of survival after death, Miss Estelle Stead deals with what she describes as actual experiences of spirit conversations between the living and the so-called dead." The words I have italicized plainly indicate how any writings of Sir Oliver Lodge are regarded by the press: they are all "purely scientific." It is mainly for this reason that I selected Sir Oliver's Man and the Universe as perhaps the most rational and scientific book on the Dualistic side of the question; for it professes to speak in the name of science without discussing Spiritism. I now make another extract from that remarkable work; in this the writer says:—

> Superficially, nothing is easier than to claim that just as when the brain is damaged the memory fails, so when the brain is destroyed the memory ceases. The reasoning is so plausible and obvious, so within the reach of the meanest capacity, that those who use it against adversaries of any but the lowest intelligence might surely assume that it had already occurred to them and exhibited its weak point. The weak point in the argument is its tacit assumption that whatever is non-manifest is non-existent; and that by destroying the mechanism of interaction between the spiritual and the material aspects of existence you must necessarily be destroying one or other of those aspects themselves (p. 92).

This argument, Sir Oliver says, is "so plausible and obvious, so within the reach of the meanest capacity," that it is fitted only to be employed against "adversaries of the lowest intelligence." If this be so, then the argument is not at all unsuitable; for in Christian countries the "lowest intelligence," at least upon this subject, will be found among church and chapel-goers and Spiritists, who believe in the survival of the soul after death, and who throw common sense, discrimination, and rational judgment to the winds. I can therefore quite understand why Dualists do not like to see it used. As an argument, however, it is perfectly sound; for it is simply a statement of fact.

Now, in the first place, it is not memory only that is affected, but all the mental faculties. The whole mind, during the period when the body is unconscious, appears to be absolutely non-existent, and unless the brain can be restored to its normal condition, the mental faculties will never be able to manifest themselves again. The significance of the latter fact is conveniently ignored. It is quite true that in this case a "tacit assumption" is made that what is non-manifest is non-existent; but this is perfectly legitimate, because the action of what is called "the mind" is known to be dependent in some way upon the molecular activity of the cerebral organ—a fact which is admitted even by Sir Oliver himself. Could it be shown that the mind, soul, or spirit is an entity distinct from the brain, its non-manifestation when the latter organ was damaged would not matter a scrap; it might then be admitted to be in existence, though quiescent. But this is not the case: the soul and mind are assumed to constitute an entity apart from the brain without a scintilla of corroborative evidence, and even in the face of the strongest evidence to the contrary. Hence, the fact that mental activities are non-manifest whenever the cerebral organ is unable to function is a clear proof that they are dependent entirely upon that organ for their existence. This is the main point of the argument which Sir Oliver says is "so within the reach of the meanest capacity," and it should be specially noted; for if the qualities or activities attributed to the Mind are always non-manifest when the brain is too damaged to function, it should become obvious even to the Christians and Spiritists of the "meanest capacity" that those mental attributes are really produced by the cerebral organ itself.

Let us consider this matter for a moment. Consciousness and thought are only found in connection with a living brain; and just as physical exercise exhausts the muscles of the body, so continuous thought exhausts the nervous substance of the brain. Long-sustained intellectual work is also accompanied by a loss of substance of the brain, which loss has to be made good—as in the case of the muscles—by suitable food. Again, arterial blood is absolutely necessary for repairing the waste tissues of the brain, without which mental activity ceases. Complete rest, especially by dreamless sleep, is to the brain what needful repose is to the fatigued limbs—the necessary condition of health.

In cases of the fracture of the skull or a blow on the head, by which a portion of the cranium is made to press upon the brain, the person stricken remains unconscious, and the mind is a blank, until the depressed portion has been removed, however long the period may be. When this has been done and consciousness returns, the man can remember everything that happened to him up to the moment of receiving the blow, but nothing whatever during the weeks he lay unconscious until the moment the pressure upon his brain was removed. This return to consciousness then appears to him to immediately follow the time he received the blow, and if he happened to be talking to any one at that time, he continues what he had been saying the moment he regains his lost consciousness. The latter fact proves that his mental faculties were non-existent during the time he lay unconscious; so that non-manifestation does mean non-existence.

Now, during the time he lay unconscious his brain was still a living organ; but consciousness and thought had ceased. Why was this? Simply because the brain which produced those sensations had not, by reason of the pressure upon it, the freedom to continue its molecular activities. It is thus perfectly clear that Mind, or so-called "spirit," is dependent solely upon the brain, and could have no independent existence apart from it; it is, in fact, something which is produced by the functioning of the cerebral organ, and is, therefore, continually changing; it is only the memory of what has gone before that makes it appear continuous. As a simple matter of fact, the latter theory is the only one which explains the complete absence of "mind" during a long period of unconsciousness. As already stated, we have no evidence that there exists in the human organism a mental faculty separate from the cerebral organ, and that is why we hear such nonsense as "the mechanism of the interaction between the spiritual and the material aspects of existence." We may admit the words "psychic" or "spiritual" as being synonymous with "mental"; but we have no reason for admitting a psychic or a spiritual "entity"; the latter is purely imaginary.

Dr. Maudsley, in his work on Body and Mind says:—

> When a blow on the head has paralysed sensibility and movement, in consequence of the disease in the brain which it has initiated, the patient is sent to the hospital; but when a blow on the head has caused mental derangement, in consequence of the disease of the brain which it has initiated, the patient is sent to an asylum.....When two persons undergo a similar moral shock, or a similar prolonged anxiety, and one of them goes mad in consequence, while the other goes to sleep and recovers his equanimity, it is plain that all the co-operating conditions have not been the same. In a great many cases there is something in the nervous organization of the person, some native peculiarity, which predisposes him to an outbreak of insanity (pp. 41, 42).

Here we see, as the physiological effect of a blow on the head, that whether the brain is rendered unable to function at all (i.e., total unconsciousness), or to function in some abnormal manner (i.e., mental derangement), the result is due solely to the condition of the cerebral organ itself, and has no relation whatever to an imaginary entity called "the mind."

(To be continued.) Abracadabra.

The Gods Afraid.

In a recent article, I traced the progress of the Hebrew Fire-and-storm God Yahweh from his visibility in the days of the Patriarchs to his disappearance behind a cloud in the first or second Christian century. The subject recurred to my mind when I read the interesting chapters of a book on The Lau Islands, and their Fairy-tales and Folklore, by T. R. St. Johnston,[1] British Commissioner. The islands are adjacent to the Fiji group. Mr. Johnston picked up folk-lore and myths from old inhabitants.

One day, he visited an old widow, whom he found seated on native grass-mats, and, while she smoked, she chatted, and told him stories of the times previous to the arrival of the Wesleyan lotu, or religion.

"Before the foreign ships came to Lau," she said, "there lived in an island yonder a God named Rasikilau."

She went on to describe how when Rasikilau walked, the hills trembled, and his head reached as high as the tallest palm-trees. A canoe from the mysterious North brought a Goddess, whom he married, and the divine offspring was two handsome and extremely robust boys. A favourite sport of the boys was to pull up big Mamekara trees by the roots. Another recreation was to stand, one at each end of the island and pelt each other with pebbles. But when they quarrelled over a catch of fish, and hurled enormous boulders at each other, their father reflected that two such strong youths would be powerful enough to turn him out of his possessions, and he endeavoured to restore peace. This he did by rushing in between, and knocking their heads together, with the result that they both fell dead. He broke the news—or part of it—to their mother by saying they had killed each other by throwing stones.

Not long afterwards, a God named Koroibo, who reigned over a neighbouring island, crossed the intervening lagoon, and brought gifts of friendship to Rasikilau, and he much enjoyed dining with his host under a shady Mamekara tree.

"I like these Mamekaras," he said, "and I have a proposal to make. I hear that accidents occasionally happen here through young people throwing stones. Now in my own island, the juveniles throw the soft fruits of the Dawa tree. Give me your Mamekaras to plant in my territory, and I will give you Dawa trees in exchange."

They agreed, drank out of a bowl together, and parted politely.

The Goddess died of grief.

No good came of the tree transactions, for the transplanted specimens all died.

When the old lady got thus far in her tale, Mr. Johnston asked her—

"But are these Gods never seen nowadays?"

She looked a little confused, and replied—

"No; not since the missionaries brought the light of the good lotu to us; but"——

"But?"——

"Well," she added, "of course, there was Adi Mailagi, who used to appear till a few years ago. And then there is Daucina, who lives a little way down the coast."

The old lady was really revealing one of the secrets of the Evolution of Gods, when she made this simple observation! And she wound up with another.

"All the other Gods now," she said, "only show themselves in their waqawaqa [earthly shapes] as birds, or animals, or fishes. They are the people of the dark times, and they fear the missionaries."

That was another way of saying that an inferior culture gives place to a superior. The missionaries would readily accept such a theory. They would not be so ready to accept the further conclusion that, in precisely the same manner, their own system of theology would have to yield before the advance of a humanist conception of the universe.

The reader may be edified by another anecdote drawn from Mr. Johnston's entertaining pages, though it has no relevance to the theme I have just discussed. It relates to the remarkable fashion in which the people of the village of Mabula (in the Lau Islands group) were persuaded to accept the Christian faith.

A native magistrate, named Samani, had himself become Christian under the more or less efficient instruction of the missionaries; and, hearing that, though Mabula possessed a church, many of the villagers were still unbelievers, he obeyed the call of duty and summoned a meeting. He ascended the pulpit and discoursed, but was vexed when his remarks were greeted with laughter.

Next Sunday, he returned, climbed the pulpit, and began again. The laughter began again. Mr. Johnston heard the following account of what happened next:—

> Great, then, was his anger, and he pulled off his white shirt (for he had on a foreign shirt which a missionary had given him), and stood upright in the pulpit, very fierce, and holding aloft his club:—
>
> "Men of Mabula," he cried, scornfully, "if ye will not listen to my Bible—the Bible of the lotu—ye shall at least listen to the Bible of Tui Lakeba" (the God of Lakeba).
>
> And he banged the club on the pulpit, so that he almost broke the desk.
> Then were the men of Mabula much afraid, and remained silent, and listened to his words, and never again did they mock in the church; for he warned them that he would return and beat them, should such a report reach him.

One cannot suppose that the zealous Samani had ever read a translation of Samuel Butler's Hudibras, otherwise it might be thought he had taken a hint from Butler's description of the Church Militant:—

> Such as do build their faith upon
> The holy text of pike and gun,
> Decide all controversies by > Infallible artillery,
> And prove their doctrine orthodox
> By apostolic blows and knocks.

At anyrate, it shows that philosophers speak truly when they say that the laws of human psychology act similarly in the most widely separated parts of the world.

Scottish Notes.

The "Wee Frees" have passed a resolution at the Edinburgh Presbytery meeting proposing that the new Education Bill should contain provisions which would prevent the use and exhibition of religious symbolism in the transferred schools during school hours; yet they are in favour of the amendment, which was lost in Scottish Grand Committee, that use and wont should be secured in the provisions of the Bill itself, and should not be left even to the option of the education authorities. What idealic notions of liberty these reverend Fathers in God possess! They want to keep their Church free from the State, yet they want the State to enforce their doctrine on the people through the teaching in public schools.

The Rev. Professor Kennedy Cameron says if they had been taught anything in connection with this War, he thought the importance that attached to religious teaching in a community had been forced upon them more than any other question. His own belief was that at the very root of all this conflict was the want of religion among the German people. How long are such men to be allowed to make such statements? Is Germany not the most religious nation on earth? The Kaiser is constantly thanking God for past favours, and invoking his help for those to come. Is not religion taught in all the schools of Germany?

The Rev. Hugh Armstrong, Winchburgh, says they want to take away from "careless" School Boards the power of determining the place of religious instruction in the school curriculum, and to make it a statutory duty on teachers to teach religion in the school. What proportion of the community does the Rev. Hugh represent, and who cares what he wants?

The Rev. A. Robb, Lauriston, says he is curious to know how it came about that the Roman Catholic and Episcopal bodies in Scotland had succeeded in gaining the ear of the Government to obtain public grants for the teaching of religion on a denominational basis in their schools while this was not conceded to the Presbyterian Churches. What we want to know is how long any privileges are to be given to religious denominations at the expense of Secularists.

What are the Secularists in Scotland doing to prevent compulsory religious education being thrust upon them? Are they making their voices to be heard in the matter? If not why not? Surely with so much squabbling amongst the various sects, the secular solution is the only logical position.

Dr. John Strong, Royal High School, Edinburgh, in his presidential address at the Educational Institute of Scotland, said as a profession the teachers held a strong and abiding belief in the value and necessity of religious instruction in schools. Does Dr. Strong think it would be in the interests of morality if he and his colleagues were compelled by law to teach the Bible from cover to cover, and to explain to children of tender years all the immoral practices of the ancient Jews? How would he like his female assistants to explain to a class of boys Numbers xxxi. 13, or the story of Boaz and Ruth? Does Dr. Strong draw no distinction between Bible teaching and ethical instruction?

Some ideas there are that lie beyond the reach of any catastrophe. He will be far less exposed to disaster who cherishes ideas within him that soar high above the indifference, selfishness, vanities of every-day life. And, therefore, come happiness or sorrow, the happiest man will be he within whom the gteatest idea shall burn most ardently.

"THE TASK OF FREETHOUGHT."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—My few and casual remarks on the present condition of Freethought advocacy have drawn a rather lengthy, very able and interesting article, under the above heading, from the pen of "Mimnermus." With much that he says no Secularist will disagree, but some will hardly appreciate his (and Mr. Cohen's) satisfaction with the merely critical work of Freethought, and their repudiation of Secularism as a sect. In my hot youth, "when George the Third was King," we used to talk of the "Secular Party," and looked forward to the time when it should assume the reins of government. Now it seems we must be content to remain for ever in "the cold shades of opposition."

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON SEPTEMBER 26.

The President occupied the chair. Also present: Messrs. Baker, Brandes, Davidson Eager, Gorniot, Heaford, Kelf, Lazarnick, Leat, Neate, Palmer, Roger, Samuels, Silverstein, Thurlow, and Wood; Miss Kough, Miss Stanley, Miss Pitcher, Mrs. Rolf, and the Secretary.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed.

The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were received for Coventry, Garw Valley, Maesteg, Regent's Park, and the Parent Society.

Permission was given for the formation of a new Branch at Garw Valley, and for the title "South Wales Divisional Council" to be used, conditionally, in connection with other Branches in that locality.

Mr. Cohen consented to allow his recent article, God and Man, to be reprinted for use as a propagandist tract.

It was reported that Branch secretaries had now received the printed report of the Special Committee on Re-organization.

The President ruled that any discussion by the Executive of this report was out of order, but all resolutions or amendments would be remitted to the Agenda Committee, which was then elected. November 17 was suggested as the date of the Conference meeting, and the Secretary was instructed to fix the meeting-place in a town that could be considered central.

Branch Secretaries are reminded that meetings of their members should be called as speedily as possible for the discussion of the Special Committee's report, as all notices of motion for the Conference Agenda must reach this office not later than October 12. Individual members can be supplied with copies on application.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Sonnet "Nature."

DEAR FRIEND: no man knows anything of God.
All men are Atheists, though they know it not,
Nature includes the All from star to sod,
And none can soar beyond her range one jot.
Being infinite she shall for ever be,
She knoweth no beginning and no end;
Revealing no design in earth, sky, sea,
In life or death; is neither foe nor friend.
She knoweth naught of evil nor of good,
She knoweth naught of darkness nor of light,
Of beauty or repose; earthquake and flood
Are all the same to her as truth and right.
She is one vast and self-existent whole,
And careth nothing for the human soul.

God.

In last week's Freethinker Dr. Lyttelton remarks that to say "There may be a God, but there is no evidence to show that there is; and if there is, there is no possibility of knowing him," is "unintelligible and contradictory." I have said so many times in these columns, and on that point we are in complete agreement. Unknowableness is not a property or quality of existence, and if there is anything unknowable, we can only prove it to be so by knowing nothing about it—not even that we know nothing about it. This, again, is a contradiction; but one can't help being contradictory when one gets into the region of the absurd. The fault committed by those who talk about "God" in the way condemned by Dr. Lyttelton is, I think, precisely the fault he himself commits. That fault lies in speaking of "God" as though it stood for some understood thing such as gravitation or natural selection. But "God" in the abstract stands for—what? To me, nothing. It is simply unintelligible. I no more know what is meant by "God," apart from particular gods, or defined conceptions of God, than I know what whiteness is apart from some object that is white. One can believe or disbelieve in the god of this or that tribe, or the god of this or that religion, as it is expounded in official creeds. Personally, I believe in none of these. More; I say unhesitatingly that, so far as they are defined and understood, they are pure myth. And I really think that Dr. Lyttelton agrees with me here—that is, if I have not misunderstood his repudiation of the gods in which other people believe, which he describes as "nonsense." If every god that the world has worshipped is a myth, if any god that man can conceive is false, what is meant by "God" used simply as an abstract term? Is it any better than the "unknowable" which we are rightly told is "unintelligible and contradictory"?

The Decadence of Deity.

The progress of scientific thought is from the indefinite to the definite. The more a particular subject is investigated by science, the more precise and definite become the accepted formulæ. In religion, we have quite the opposite process. "God" commences as a definite concept; it proceeds to a vague abstraction that means either nothing or anything. The scientific student feels himself baffled unless he is able to say definitely such-and-such is the case, and to submit a formula that will give birth to a definite conception. The religious student shrinks from a definite formula, and prides himself on producing something which he says baffles human mind to grasp intelligently. If Dr. Lyttelton will take the "God" of any primitive people he will find no abstract thing, no attempt to grasp the infinite; what he will find will be a perfectly clear and concrete deity built in the image of man himself. The indefinite deity comes later. He is born of the disintegrating effect of later knowledge on primitive ideas. Philosophy and criticism set to work. One by one the more intrusive human qualities are discarded, the less obvious ones are retained. The God who possessed mind and body becomes a God possessing mind and minus body—itself an impossible conception. Philosophical abstractions, such as "substance," get grafted on to the God-idea. Things originally give rise to names, afterwards names are taken as the equivalent of things. But throughout all, I am unable to see any other basis for the belief in God other than that born of the primitive savage—a belief which we know was based upon a mistaken interpretation of the facts. To me the God of philosophy, or of the most advanced Christian, is no more than the ghost of the God born of the fear-stricken ignorance of the savage. And I do not believe in ghosts.

Outgrowing God.

Dr. Lyttelton says that both of us have a theory concerning the world or nature. And I suppose that is true. To anyone who really thinks, a theory is almost indispensable. But when I said that not having to marry facts to a theory I was only concerned with their logical interpretation, while Dr. Lyttelton has to harmonize his facts with a special theory, I was proceeding on the assumption that he believed in a God before he examined the facts on which that belief is supposed to rest. If I am wrong in this I apologize, but it is certainly true of every other Theist I have met. And if the apology is unnecessary, then it follows that my theory succeeded an appreciation of the facts while his preceded it. And it surely needs little proof that facts examined in the light of a preconceived and strongly held theory are very likely to yield all they are expected to yield, while a theory which follows an appreciation of the facts and displaces a theory previously held, is far more likely to be nearer the truth. Let me say, in passing, that I did not for a moment believe that Dr. Lyttelton was asking questions with a view to scoring debating points. That is an interesting occupation for groundlings, but not for those who have attained maturity of years or of mind. I took it that he was desirous of finding out my real position, not because it was mine, but because in this matter I happen to represent others, and so proceeded to answer the questions put. And this leads me to add that the significance of the fact of so many being brought up to believe in Theism, with all kinds of social and other inducements to continue believing, who yet reject it, is often ignored. Yet, surely, the evidential value of the rejection of Theism under such conditions is much greater than its retention, which, on the face of it, may be no more than persistence along a path marked out by tradition, early training, and love of ease. And we have further to bear in mind that the case of individuals is here only a representation of the world of thought. That tends more and more to the rejection of the Theistic idea. Dr. Lyttelton may reply that it is the rejection of a grosser form of Theism in favour of a purer form. In that case, I can only retort that the purification is by way of attenuation, and a continuation of the process threatens complete dissipation.

The Theory of God.

Naturally, I am at a loss as to the meaning of that "Christian doctrine of God," which Dr. Lyttelton says all who are not mad will accept, once it is understood. All I can say is, that I do reject all the Christian conceptions of God I have ever come across, and find that a great number of my fellow-rejectors call themselves Christians. So far as I am aware, there is no Christian doctrine of God, although there are doctrines of God held by Christians. Naturally, then, I ask Dr. Lyttelton for his conception of what is the Christian doctrine of God, and I await its exposition with considerable interest. But if I may be rash enough to hazard a guess, I fancy it will consist in an interpretation of certain things in terms of God, which, personally, I find myself quite able to explain, so far as our present knowledge admits of an explanation—without reference to God at all. To me, so far as "God" carries any meaning at all, it stands as an hypothesis intended to explain certain things. But what are the things explained by this hypothesis I have never been able to discover. So far as I can discern, it throws no light into dark places, it solves no problems, it unties no knots. Man is left to find his way through the world as best he can, and not a few of the troubles he encounters are bequeathed to him by his less enlightened ancestors. Among the greatest blunders made by unenlightened humanity, I cannot but place that of the belief in "God."

CHAPMAN COHEN.

An Avenging Deity.

THE Rev. R. J. Campbell, during his sensational ministry at the City Temple, London, fell from the grace of theological orthodoxy, a lapse into the causes and motives of which it would not now be profitable to pry. The whole affair is rapidly fading into a dim, distant memory. The short-lived aberration is remembered chiefly for the vehement attacks that were made upon certain portions of the Bible, for the bitter denunciation of various forms of supernaturalism indulged in, and by the notorious volume, entitled The New Theology, written in feverish haste, and extravagantly "boomed" when published, but now long since withdrawn from circulation. Our excuse for recalling that religiously exciting time is the fact that several sermons were preached and published in which the Old Theologians were angrily addressed as "Liars," and the ancient Hebrew Deity was fiercely condemned on account of the cruel, brutal conduct attributed to him. No Atheist ever employed terms more contemptuous, satirical, and flamboyant than those which habitually dropped from Mr. Campbell's lips when the New Theology campaign was at its height. To him then Jehovah was a hateful monster who could send bears out of a wood to slay forty-two harmless little children because they playfully mocked a bald-headed prophet, who could deliberately visit Israel with a horrible pestilence which in a few hours killed seventy thousand men, or who could despatch an angel to cut off all the mighty men of valour, and the leaders and captains in the camp of Assyria. There were many other counts, some of them considerably worse than those just mentioned, in the reverend gentleman's case against the God who figures so conspicuously in the historical books of the Old Testament. The New Theology campaign came to a speedy end, and the Churches of to-day, though much less prosperous in the main, are even more orthodox, than they have been for some years. At any rate, journals like the British Weekly champion the Old Theology with renewed zeal and energy, and seem to have entirely forgotten that such a movement as the Higher Criticism was ever on foot. In its issue of September 22, the British Weekly has its Correspondence Column graced by one of Professor David Smith's typically Old School articles. This article was written in response to "A. S.," who made the following request: "Will you please say what you regard as the precise force of our Lord's question in Luke xviii. 8: 'Howbeit when the Son of Man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?'" Now, far be it from us to blame Dr. Smith for his orthodox views, or for his constant advocacy thereof. This journal has never shown any greater leaning or leniency towards the New Theology than towards the Old, for it is the sworn and uncompromising opponent of all theologies, of whatever age; but it may be admitted that if a man must be a theologian at all, he had better adhere to that which has naturally grown out of Biblical teachings. To this theology Dr. Smith is consistently and heroically loyal. He begins his article thus:—

> The Son of Man is the Judge of men (cf. St. John v. 22, 27); and every historical denoument which vindicates the righteousness of God and confounds the insolence of human iniquity is a "Coming of the Son of Man." The constitution of the Universe is a moral order, and therefore every unrighteous thing is doomed. It may flourish long, but there is a canker at the heart of it, and soon or late it decays and falls.

That is an ingenious introduction to a series of most astounding statements, for every one of which there is ample Biblical authority. Dr. Smith offers a firm defence of the very Deity whom Mr. Campbell so furiously assailed; and this defence is rendered in the name and by the authority of the Saviour of the world. The moral order is "an inexorable law" which Jesus is said to have enunciated "in two picturesque epigrams." That is at once well put and exceedingly plausible. The Gospel Jesus did undoubtedly believe in the reality of such a law of the Universe, and that his Father was its author. Did he also realize that a recognition of that law carried with it an irrefutable argument against the absolute and invincible sovereignty of God? But let that pass for the moment. Jesus said: "Every plant which my Heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." On that passage the Professor wisely makes no comment. The question that naturally arises is, Why should the human garden contain a single plant for which the Divine Gardener is not responsible? Who planted that which needs to be rooted up? Who made possible the existence of wicked people? Surely, the whole responsibility for an imperfect creation must lie at the door of its creator. It is only by having recourse to strange inventions of their own that theologians imagine they get over this insuperable difficulty. The second "picturesque epigram" is like unto the first: "Wheresoever the body is, there will the eagles be gathered together." Here, at any rate, we are in touch with a natural law that is in constant operation. Eastern travellers require no formal demonstration of its existence. Wherever the carcase lies, thither the vultures unfailingly flock, and soon nothing remains but white bones. The following is Dr. Smith's application :—

> This is a picture of the moral order. Iniquity is a rotting carcase; and wheresoever the carcase is, thither will God's vultures gather to their work. History is a long succession of examples. The aborigines of Canaan polluted the land with their nameless abominations; and the destruction of the Cities of the Plain was a premonition of the inevitable end. But it was only a premonition. God was patient, "long suffering and slow to anger," and he granted centuries of respite; and then when the iniquity of the Amorites was full, he let loose his vultures; Joshua and his army invaded the land and exterminated the foul breed. In turn Israel grew corrupt, and after centuries of warning and long-suffering the Roman eagles, the army of Titus, cleared away the carcase.

We are sorry to find the Professor in such a ferocious mood, and we are bound to add that he looks at history through shockingly coloured spectacles. Let us consult the records as they stand on the Biblical pages. Speaking generally, Dr. Smith's allusion to the aboriginal tribes of Palestine is as inaccurate as was his description of the Greeks, which appeared in the British Weekly several years ago, as a people who knew not the meaning of love as distinguished from lust. Students of Robertson-Smith's Religion of the Semites cannot possibly agree with the view that the original inhabitants were in any sense much, if at all, inferior to the invaders under Joshua. The truth is that Joshua's war of conquest in Palestine was, on its scale, quite as ruthless and brutal, and attended with as many atrocities as is the World-War now in progress. Take the siege of Jericho as a sample. The record says that "Jericho was straitly shut up because of the children of Israel; none went out, and none came in." The account is largely legendary; but when the city fell, there was no mercy shown, no quarters given, no prisoners taken :—

> They took the city, and they utterly destroyed all that was in the city, both man and woman, young and old, and ox, and sheep, and ass, with the edge of the sword (Joshua vi. 21).

Nothing more horrible than that has been perpetrated by the Germans in Belgium or Serbia. All that lived in Jericho was utterly destroyed with one solitary exception —the entire family of Rahab, the notorious prostitute, was graciously spared, by the order of the general of the army (vi. 22, 23). The same doom befell Lachish, Eglon, Debir, and numerous other cities. The soldier of the Lord "smote them with the edge of the sword, and utterly destroyed all the souls that were therein; he left none remaining; as he had done to Hebron, so he did to Debir, and to the King thereof; as he had done also to Libnah, and to her King" (x. 39).

The destruction of the cities of the plain is another sample. What geological disturbances may have occurred, in ancient times, in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea, we do not know; but there is no doubt whatever as to the purely legendary character of the narrative in Genesis xviii. and xix.; and, in any case, absolutely nothing is known concerning a primitive population that may possibly have been destroyed by a volcanic or some other geological activity. Assuming the actuality of a catastrophy of that nature, it is sheer superstition to imagine that it took place in order to punish the inhabitants for their wickedness. The absurdity of Dr. Smith's theory reaches a farcical climax when he comes to the clearing away of the Jewish carcase by the Roman eagles. We hold no brief to defend the Jews whom the Professor seems to vilify whenever it suits his convenience; but we cannot refrain from saying that on his own showing in multitudes of his British Weekly essays, the Jews at their very worst could not have been so low down in the moral scale as Pagan Greece and Rome must have been. He certainly forgets or deliberately ignores the fact that Rome perished long after it had suppressed Paganism and become a thoroughly Christianized State. His allusion to the French Revolution also is equally misleading. Does he not know that the Royalists—the Chouans as they were called in Brittany—fought against the Revolution with great heroism, because they regarded it as a movement against God and religion? We admit that France had suffered terribly from the oppression of her licentious and tyrannical kings and nobles, but to speak of the Revolution as "the red rush of God's avengers" is the very height of theological folly.

Dr. Smith loses himself completely whenever he refers to the present War. Exactly ten years ago Germany was described, by not a few leading evangelical divines in our land, as an exemplary Christian country; but this is how our war mad Professor now speaks of her :—

> For a century Germany has been filling the cup of her iniquity, and now God is letting his vultures loose upon her and her accomplices.

Dr. Smith's avenging Deity is very fond of his vultures, and never tires of employing them. The work they perform is most horrible and disgusting, the very thought of which fills one with unspeakable loathing; and standing face to face with it, at its very worst, we humbly venture to ask, would it not have been an infinitely worthier action on the part of God, if God there be, to have entrusted his angels of light and grace, for the century mentioned, with the mission of preventing Germany from filling that cup of iniquity, and of inducing her rather to fill to the very brim the cup of kindness and brotherly love? Does the Professor really believe that his Christ died utterly in vain for Germany?

J. T. Lloyd.

Keeping Hell Alight.

> If all religions but one are certainly wrong, what is the chance of one being certainly right?—G. W. Foote.

Christians are not all selfish, but they have an extraordinary passion for monopoly with regard to their religion. To associate with them is like dining with a man who has all the pudding and two spoons. In the present War they have done their best to transform the battle-fields into mission fields, and still sigh, like Alexander, for more worlds to conquer. Bible Societies have distributed sufficient copies of the Scriptures to build a garden city; the British and Foreign Bible Society alone boasting openly of a distribution of forty million copies. Tracts by the hundred tons have been circulated. Hosts of athletic young clergymen are acting as Army chaplains, and are drawing officers' salaries; whilst their clerical colleagues at home are exempted from military service, and are free to further their propaganda there. Thousands of pious laymen and women hand out tea and tracts at a safe distance from the fighting lines. With the object of winning the troops to religion, the clerical pill has been well covered with sugar. Cinemas, concert parties, and even chorus ladies and comedians have been used as lures for the religion of the Man of Sorrows. There is, however, a fly in the ointment. Despite all these blandishments, the fighting men do not display any great anxiety for their eternal welfare. Even compulsory church parades, and the persuasive powers of leather-lunged evangelists, have failed to penetrate the cheerful stoicism of the troops.

Digitized by Google

Finding that their propaganda produced but barren results, Christians have sought to mend matters by attempting to boycott all literature antagonistic to their Faith. To this end letters have been published in the newspapers, all bearing a strong family likeness. Here is a specimen printed in a recent issue of the Daily Mail:—

ANTI-CHRISTIAN LITERATURE.

Sir,—Several of the rationalist societies are making a great effort to circulate among our sailors and soldiers all kinds of anti-Christian literature.

In a recent letter a chaplain writes: "In every big military centre the reading rooms have been almost flooded with anti-Christian literature." These reading rooms, as we should expect, are not those of the Church Army or the Y.M.C.A., which are doing so much for the true welfare of our men both at home and at the front. Nor has the Camps Library been at fault.

But there are the regimental institutes and on board ship and at the naval ports the corresponding organisations for the men in their hours of leisure. These are not under the control of the chaplains.

Commanding officers are fully aware of the importance of maintaining a high spiritual and moral tone among their men. Is it too much to hope that the Board of Admiralty and the Army Council may see fit to take action in this matter and issue such instructions to the authorities concerned as will have the effect of safeguarding our men from the malign influences which are being brought to bear upon them?

Oxford. C. F. Nolloth.

This is a characteristic letter, and it will be well to examine the literature which Christians consider will maintain "a high spiritual and moral tone among their men." One religious tract, of which 50,000 copies have been distributed, bears the title, What is there after Death? and it preaches a hell of literal fire. Here is a passage which shows how far religion is in harmony with civilization:—

I wonder if you die unsaved whether you will see your believing wife after death? She, afar off, and happy with her Saviour; and you with the curse of unforgiven sin upon you in hell. And some of your children are in heaven, and others are on their way. And when you die your Christless death, will you for a moment see afar off your little ones with the light of heaven on their faces, and the peace of God upon their heads? Oh! these eternal separations! Families broken up for all eternity. Some in light and some in darkness.

Another tract, issued by the Central Bible Truth Depot, and sold in quantities for distribution, bates no jot of this fiery damnation. It bears the title, Is Death in Battle a Passport to Heaven? and has an illustrated cover. This is how it ministers to the "high spiritual and moral tone" among the sailors and soldiers:—

It is only through Him (Christ) you can be saved. You may go over the top and make the great sacrifice, or perish in some naval scrap, but if you die without Christ as your personal Saviour, you will die without mercy and without hope, and everlasting hell must be your portion. It is only true kindness to tell you so.

These tracts, which are selected at random from a large collection, raises once more the question not only of the value of the "high spiritual and moral tone" of the Christian religion, but also of the conduct of Christians themselves. These tracts voice emphatically very different views to those apologetic and invertebrate views put forward by artful defenders of the Faith in their contests with Rationalists. In controversy it is the fashion for the champions of Orthodoxy to explain smilingly that, in attacking the barbaric doctrine of hell-fire, the intellectuals are but flogging a dead horse. That horse, however, has a distressing habit of resurrecting, and that there is plenty of kick left in that ancient animal is demonstrated by the literature issued for the benefit of the fighting men, and also in that issued for the instruction of the unsuspecting young.

Away from the fighting lines the clergy are daily endeavouring to put back the clock of civilization. High Churchmen are as reactionary as Catholics and Salvationists. In a booklet, bearing the imprint of Mowbray & Co., and entitled The Blessed Sacrament; Drawn from the Writings of the Saints, the old barbaric views are stated with frank realism. This publication, it should be borne in mind, is used for young people who are preparing for their first communion, and these ideas are forced upon them at the most impressionable time of their lives. This is the kind of thing the clergy still teach privately, while, in public, they flatter the "intellectuals" by a pretended retreat:—

We have about us, or, to speak more truly, we are ourselves immortal souls. We are beings who have once been born, but who now can never die. We came out of nothing, but we cannot go into nothing again. O God forbid, the merciful great God forbid, we should pass into nothing! When they who have led lives of pleasure, of covetousness, of self-willed sin—where such, I say, come to be upon their death-beds, they may perhaps feel that awful, impossible wish that they could pass into nothing; for to be nothing were better than to be in the strong grip of Satan, and the intolerable heats of hell. Dying sinners may feel that their immortality is to be an unendingness of pain, of remorse, of despair; and the deadness and the dumbness of passing into nothing, though it surely would make even a dying sinner shudder, would be more bearable than to think of than the life in hell—the living in fire, the feeding on fire, the breathing fire, the being clothed in fire, the thirsting for cool water where all, all is fire—above, beneath, on this side, on that side, a far-stretching country of burning fire.

Rationalists who imagine that one of the oldest and most barbarous religious dogmas is losing its hold on the national mind because the clergy appear to be giving the old savage ideas faint support in their public utterances will do well to remember that, while the objectionable dogmas are still taught throughout the Christian world, the protests of the humanitarians are sought to be boycotted. Wherever the clergy retain their power they still preach a hell of literal fire. In the Great Republic of the West, Billy Sunday, and other cultured evangelists, flame the fires of hell over a continent. Roman Catholics everywhere have never damped a solitary spark of their fiery damnation. The Church of England, particularly the High Churchmen, who form sixty per cent. of that body, hold forth on brimstone; and the Salvation Army, which caters for the least-educated of the community, includes hell in its trademark, "Blood and Fire." It is worthy of the followers of a creed, who, outraging the spirit of the age, pray for rain, and that bullets may not hit our soldiers on the battlefield.

How small, mean, and contemptible such a creed as Christianity appears, after all, in comparison with a great Pagan religion like Buddhism. Were Gotama Buddha to reappear upon the earth and see great nations believing in hell, devils, and eternal torture, he would wonder what blight had fallen upon the human intellect after the lapse of twenty-five centuries. Hear what the wise old Pagan said, as rendered by Edwin Arnold:—

Pray not! the darkness will not brighten! Ask
Nought from the silence, for it cannot speak!
Vex not your mournful minds with pious pains!
Ah! Brothers, Sisters! seek.

Nought from the helpless gods by gift and hymn,
Nor bribe with blood, nor feed with fruits and cakes;
Within yourselves deliverance must be sought,
Each man his prison makes.

Rationalism in Ireland.

Friday evening last I was just about to dine when my maid handed me some very foul writings—genuine excrescences of the human mind. They were an old copy of the Freethinker and a couple of brochures superstitiously entitled Religion and the Child and The Mother of God, all conceived in the most malignant spirit. I am quite unable to understand how such dangerous explosives found their way into this obscure little village of Ballybacktown. At first I determined to burn the lot; but, after reflection, it appeared to me that others less impregnable than myself might have been recipients as well. In these circumstances, it behoves me, who am blued and starched and stiffened with the blood of Jesus Christ Our Lord, which copiously squirts from the daily sacrifice and the sevenfold prayer of the Breviary, to throttle the serpent of infidelity and preserve the souls of my parishioners from being blasted. One oration at next Sunday's oblation will be quite sufficient. But let me illustrate to you the absolute unassailability of the Rock of Saint Peter in Ireland.

The first article in the copy of the Freethinker dogmatically states that every civilized country in the world is growing steadily less religious. Dogmatism is the hall-mark of insanity and falsehood. Here it proclaims falsehood. For the sons and daughters of Ireland are, simultaneously, contemporaneously, and at one and the same time, the most enlightened, virtuous, and progressive, and withal the most religious, people of Christendom at the present day. For authority higher and more axiomatic than my own, see Plutarch's Lives of the Saints. Permit me to take another choice specimen of unspiritualism; this time from Religion and the Child: "The priest hovers round the cradle like a needy Chancellor of the Exchequer speculating on the taxable capacity of a developing industry." What do you think Irish mothers will think of that? All I have to do is to quote that single passage at the next women's confraternity; it will refute itself most beautifully. But the choicest of the lot is the suggestion in The Mother of God (written by a fellow the name of Foote; now dead, and probably not in heaven, I thank the Lord!) that the Blessed Virgin Mary gave birth to Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ through the instrumentality of Gabriel, who is represented as having blown into the bosom of her shift, and the carbonic acid gas of his breath, reaching her womb, caused the conception! This is the divinest blasphemy, Good God! how ill hast thou fashioned England. But all Protestant peoples exhale the aroma of damnation, as the Leader, an Irish broad-minded political journal, pointed out some time ago. I think I now understand more clearly the reason of the terrible moral depravity of you in Britain. As well as being absolute, however, it is comparative. It is set directly against the awful chastity of the Irish people, whom, no doubt, you ridicule as being squashed by our thumb and the Pope's great toe. Do you expect such immoral writings will sow perversion? No, no, no! You have to reckon with us, the unquestioned spiritual guides, who have only to motion our tongue a little, a very little, and—what do you think? Why, of course, your papers won't be read. In Ireland, God has his back up against the wall, while we, his appointed seconds, stand ready by with towels, basins, water, etc., whereby we add direction and perpetuity to his energy. Subject to our Principal's approval, your reign in Ireland is immeasurably remote. Just as Nano Nagle's knees were found at her death to be inflamed and ulcerated as a result of her almost perpetual kneeling to Mary, Bridget, and God, so will the knuckles of Ireland's soul and the souls of her children be found to be inflamed and ulcerated with an antagonistic passion of terrible significance when the chariots of infidelity pierce the Catholic bodyguard of the Lord, and inflict defeat upon the rewarder of victory.

The gentle readers of this twelve-page-for-twopence journal, without doubt, sneer at us in their self-sufficiency. Self-sufficiency! nurtured on stuff that must render their intellectual stomach like a peacock's! Absurd. Even granted, however, that we are unacquainted with the mechanism of the heavens; that we still regard the stars as candles, the moon as an oil-lamp, the sun as an incandescent burner. What then? Does it matter? there is no perfectability of knowledge. On the other hand, there is perfection within the wing of the Catholic Church. The only perfect thing in the whole world is the unbloody sacrifice of the Mass. During its offering we are spellbound; if, as the Cure d'Ars so learnedly pointed out, we were to realize its sublimity we should die. Do secular scraps of art attain to such beauty?

One other point. We in Ireland are, in our consanguinity with God, bound by the fetters of the same Communion to each other. Politically it may seem otherwise. In this connection I may mention that at present a great number of shops are displaying a post-card depicting a dozen men rowing a boat against the threatening swell of conscription. The rowers represent the various labour and political parties in Ireland; they are all pulling well together—why? because the man at the rudder is a bishop. And so in everything. Enter any house you please; you are confronted with a cheap impression of the Holy Face. Look round when the Angelus is ringing; people are doffing their hats and blessing themselves. Stand outside a chapel; you will see men on bicycles, in trams, cars, etc., invariably raise their hats. Enter our foremost colleges; all are supplied with chapels; the bedrooms are not without their saintly effigies—oh, I could go on recounting our many pieties ad infinitum. There are not many Catholic Irish in hell, I'll be bound; and any there are have crosses over their hearts.

At the beginning I mentioned a maid. She is a girl of forty-six, such being a reasonable age of innocence according to the Canon law. I think it as well to mention this fact in view of the minds of the readers of this paper.

Rev. R. G. Ingersoll, P.P.

Acid Drops.

We are used to the police acting in many capacities, and some of them very useful ones, but when they set themselves up as art censors it is time to call a halt. The Chief Constable of Huddersfield summoned a shopkeeper the other day for exhibiting "obscene" prints for sale. These "obscene" prints turned out to be copies of famous pictures, many of them in London and provincial public galleries. In support of the prosecution it was said that a policeman heard some youths making "improper remarks" about the pictures. The magistrate properly dismissed the case. We suggest that such delicate-minded policemen should seek some other occupation. They can hardly avoid running the risk of having their susceptible ears offended in their present one.

The Bishop of London laments that some of his clergy have to resign their benefices because they cannot face the winter. They have, he says, struggled along on £300 a year, and can do so no longer. Poor things! All we can say is that we should consider ourselves very lucky if our job brought us in anything like £300 a year. But we shall face the winter undismayed, and have no intention of "chucking it." But, then, we are only a freethinking journalist and lecturer, not a follower of Jesus and a preacher of "Blessed be ye poor."

"Sobriety has brought about family happiness all over the country," says the Bishop of London. The bachelor bishop ought to an authority on "family happiness."

Premises at Aldershot are to be opened as an hostel for soldiers' wives by the ubiquitous Salvation Army. Presumably, at the usual charges.

Poor old Providence was so busy counting the hair's of people's heads, and watching the fall of the sparrows, that he overlooked the entry of thieves into a Chesterfield church. The annexationists made off with a haul of silver plate.

Some of the German generals are almost as pious as the home-grown variety. A daily paper quotes General von Liebert as saying: "Let us pray to Heave that the winter may be long and bitter, so that the opposition shall be robbed of the joy of waging war." What an excellent thing it is that prayer is not answered!

There is to be a new religious order for women called "The Order of Evangelist Women." It appears to be an attenuated copy of some of the Roman Catholic orders, and it may even be engineered by Catholics, for there is a deal of subterranean work being done by Roman Catholics just now. But it is a thousand pities that these women cannot find a better outlet for their energies than this apeing of mediæval folly.

The New York Truthseeker has a smart hit at the Catholics in the following: "There is considerable talk about the Pope's charities. The Pope receives more charity than he dispenses."

Christ said, "Swear not at all," but Christians swear habitually. The latest form of oath is one imposed on Civil Servants. Does it not lend point to the ironical remark that Christ was the only Christian?

The clergy have a keen eye for finance. When they go into the Army as chaplains they get officers' pay; but when they want laymen to help them, the boot is on the other leg. An advertisement, asking "Churchmen to do their bit," contains the careful statement, "Adequate allowances where necessary." No sum is mentioned, but let us hope it is on a more generous scale than that accorded to vergers, bell-ringers, choirboys, organ-blowers, church-cleaners, and other workers in the Lord's vineyard.

The bigots in Wolverhampton have scored a victory by preventing cinema houses being opened on Sunday. The Chief Constable said that there was need for some form of entertainment to take the young people off the streets, but the Sabbatarians, led by the Rev. J. H. Veal, had their way, and licences were granted only for such places as were opened for helping in the prosecution of the War. Thus, so long as a Sunday concert is held to carry on a war, the conscience of the Wolverhampton bigots approves. If it is intended to give an evening's entertainment, and with no thought of war, the Wolverhampton Christian conscience disapproves. Of all the fungoid moral growths the world possesses, commend us to the modern Christian conscience.

And now let us point out that the action of the Wolverhampton Mayor and magistrates is quite arbitrary. They have no power to grant a licence, or to refuse one, for any entertainment, admission to which is by money or by tickets sold by moneys. Anyone can apply for a summons against those concerts "licenced" by the magistrates. They are illegal. Their illegality is determined by Statute, and it is ridiculous to think that a peddling mayor and a few chapel-ridden J.P.'s can override a Statute. They can ignore it, and that is what usually occurs. But if the picture-house folk in Wolverhampton wish to test the matter, we advise them to take one of two courses—either apply for summonses against all places opened on Sunday, or open their own places and tell the mayor and the justices to do their best—or worst.

Harry Lauder, the comedian, is rapidly becoming a pillar of the Kirk. He has presented an organ to a Glasgow Church in memory of his son.

Hero-worship is a wonderful thing. £94 was paid at an auction in Peterborough for a letter written by Robert Burns. This sum of money paid to Burns during his life would have eased his anxieties and prolonged his life.

A newspaper headline: "Archangel Advance." It has nothing to do with the reappearance of the angels who mobilized at Mons.

James McGranahan, Moderator, writes to the Belfast News Letter that he has been much distressed on observing the amount of crops beaten down by heavy rains, and thinks there is urgent need for a day of prayer for more favourable weather, so that the harvest may be garnered. But if God controls the weather, what is the use of praying to him to alter his arrangements? Of course, one petitions a Cabinet Minister, but that is because we assume that he is acting in ignorance, and the purpose of the petition is to enlighten him. Is that what this Presbyterian Moderator means by his day of prayer? Are we to remind God Almighty that he is making a sad hash of the weather? If so, why not say as much honestly and boldly?

While on the subject of prayer, we note that the Bishop of London says it is remarkable that the Allied successes should have occurred after the Members of Parliament had marched to church to pray. Anyone but Bishop Ingram would have reflected that ever since the War opened all the Churches have been praying for victory. And on the opening day of this year there was a National Day of Prayer—followed by the German advance on Paris. Seeing that we have had a succession of days of prayer, it is pretty safe to say that peace will follow. One can always get an answer to prayers for peace or war, or rain or sunshine—if one waits long enough. But the Bishop of London is evidently determined to retain his reputation for stupidity.

The Temperance Council of the Christian Churches, which includes representatives of the Government and Fancy religions, is launching a new crusade against the use of alcohol, and there are no less than nine points in its programme. Not any of the nine deals with the use of "Communion port" in places of worship.

Writing on "Young Padres," a contributor to the Daily Mail declares that soldiers do not want young chaplains, and that people at home do not want them either. This is not a compliment to the hefty young parsons who are too proud to fight, and of whom there are many thousands in the country.

Bishop Mitchinson, who died recently at the age of eighty-five, was formerly Bishop of the Windward Isles. It is a pity that the rest of the Bench of Bishops cannot be shipped to the vacant See.

Religious folk have a way of understanding one another. Charged as an Army absentee, Frederick Cooting told the Bristol Bench that he did not belong to this country, but to a heavenly country where Jesus was; his sister maintained him, as it was God's will. The Christian Bench fined Cooting £2, and handed him over to a military escort. Before this, a Christian Tribunal refused the man exemption on the ground that his conscientious objection was not real.

Two massive crosses have been smashed to pieces in St. Mary's Churchyard, Slough. Providence seems powerless against robust Protestants.

"It has pleased the Almighty Disposer of events to grant increasing victory to the cause of right." This is how the Daily Mail preaches primitive superstition in the form of leading articles.

According to the Daily News of October 4, Judge Rentoul has called down the wrath of the City Corporation on his head for saying, among other things, "how much the clergy had drunk" at a dinner given by the Lord Mayor. We quite see that is a very awkward revelation. We wonder how much they did drink! And who were the clergy in question?

Some impose upon the world that they believe that which they do not; others more in number make themselves believe that they believe, not being able to penetrate into what it is to believe.—Montaigne.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

October 13, Swansea; October 27, Nuneaton.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—October 13, Maesteg; October 20, Southampton; November 3, Manchester; November 10, Sheffield; December 1, Swansea.

W. H. Hicks.—Thanks for contribution to Fund. We are flattered by your thinking that "few could have undertaken what you have done and are doing." On that we can only repeat we have done our best. But the new rise in wages and in the price of paper looks as though it will prove the "last strain." It will be disappointing to have to alter the price of the Freethinker after having held out so long, but we can see that possibility coming nearer, unless a more promising outlook reveals itself during the next two or three months.

J. W. D.—A most interesting communication, but we do not see how we can comment on it publicly without disclosing the whereabouts of our informant. We shall find it useful nevertheless.

E. Lane.—Sorry we have no figures to hand on the matter. We presume Prison Chaplains are appointed by the Home Office.

G. Grove.—No doubt the text, "There was war in heaven," will prove pleasant reading to some of our khaki parsons. When the present War is over, they will then be able to sing "There is a happy land" with some amount of feeling.

F. Griffiths.—You say if the Freethinkers who attend your meetings were "strictly veracious," they would endorse your views. That strikes us as rather "tall." The Freethinkers might retort if you were less credulous and more critical, you would endorse theirs. We hope to visit Merthyr soon.

J. H. B.—Thanks for reminder. Will use at an early date.

L. Campbell.—Presumably the book you refer to is Dadson's Evolution and Religion. The only way a copy could be obtained would be through some second-hand dealer. Yes, we are proud of the way in which our readers are supporting the paper.

A. Atherton.—Your appreciative letter is encouraging reading. We do not suppose any of our present readers would object to an extra penny on the paper, but we desire to avoid, so long as is possible, any obstacle to our getting new ones. And they are coming along splendidly.

Mrs. M. Rupp.—We still think leisure is essential to well-being, but what is one to do? There is so much to be done, and these are not the times when one can get all the help obtainable under other conditions. So we must just peg away. We shall last long enough to see something done, and that is a consolation.

H. Organ.—Pleased you find our present staff of writers so acceptable. We are also proud of them, and we have many more in reserve.

North London Reader.—Pleased to know you so much enjoyed the discussion between Mr. Palmer and Mr. Muir at the St. Pancras Reform Club. We are informed that these meetings now commence at 7.30. This evening the discussion is between Mr. A. Eager and Mr. Friedberg.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The Manchester Branch made a good start with its winter's work on Sunday last, and at the close of the afternoon lecture the Secretary reported the accession of five new members. Unfortunately, the parcel of literature ordered for the day was delayed in transit, and had not reached Manchester in time for the meetings. This was one of the consequences of the War. Letters and parcels arrive nowadays any time, and anyhow. The Secretary, Mr. H. Black, of 446 Great Cheetham Street East, Higher Broughton, Salford, announced his intention to double the Branch membership, and we hope he will succeed. A pleasing feature of the meetings was the large number of ladies present, who followed the lectures with keenness and appreciation.

To-day (Oct. 13) Mr. Cohen pays another visit to South Wales, and lectures at Swansea. The meetings will be held in the Dockers' Hall; afternoon at 3, evening at 7 o'clock. Swansea was the starting point of the present South Wales campaign, and we have no doubt the audiences will be quite up to the usual excellent level.

"The Poisoning of Our Troops" is the heading to a letter in the Church Times. At first we thought it had to do with another "German atrocity," but, on reading the letter, we found the troops were being "poisoned" by Freethought literature. Thus a corporal writes from France:—

> A lot of sceptical literature has been knocking about lately. I can't quite make out where it comes from, but the chaps get hold of it and pass it on. As a rule they are only too glad to get something to read, and one can't be for ever reading stories. The result is a lot of argument against Christianity and the Bible. One fellow told me that everything in Christianity had been picked up from other religions and put together by the Church to exploit people's credulity. Another told me it was proved there never was any such person as Christ.

We feel awfully guilty, and wonder whether Dora has any application here. There is something about coming disaffection among the troops, but, curiously, nothing about poisoning them. So we shall keep on our poisonous course. And if our readers will send more soldiers' addresses we shall continue sending out our free parcels of "Poison" all warranted to kill—something.

Owing to delay in the post (the report did not reach this office until Wednesday morning) we were unable to report last week a gathering of the Newcastle Branch on "Bradlaugh Sunday." Mr. Martin Weatherburn, a sturdy old veteran of the Bradlaugh era, read a paper on "Charles Bradlaugh," which was much appreciated by both the older and newer members. We remember Mr. Weatherburn ourselves some twenty-five years ago, when he was then an "old hand," and we are pleased to see him as interested as ever in the cause. A new member was made, who, being in the Navy, took away with him a supply of literature for the benefit of his comrades.

We have received a number of addresses of soldiers to which to send free copies of Christianity and Slavery (paid for by two of our readers), and these have been sent. But we have still copies available for this purpose.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures to-day (October 13) in the Gem Cinema Palace, Maesteg. We hope to hear that the hall is crowded both afternoon and evening. This Branch is putting its back into the work, and deserves all encouragement.

A meeting of the Glasgow Branch will be held in the Good Templars' Hall, 122 Ingram Street, to-day (Oct. 13), at 12 noon. The business is important, and a good attendance is requested.

Mr. F. E. Willis lectures at the Repertory Theatre to-day (October 13), at 7 p.m., on the subject of "The Theory of Immortality." We hope that Birmingham friends will make it a point of being present, and, if possible, bring a Christian with them.

We are asked to announce that the Freethinker and all Freethought literature can be obtained in Glasgow at the Herald League Rooms, 94 George Street, and at Jail Square, on Sundays. Glasgow readers are also asked to note that the Freethinker can now be obtained from the "Popular" newsshop in St. Enoch Square—a very central position.

As an example of what can be done, take the following. Our old friend, Mr. T. Robertson, writes:—

> I induced a little shop, the busiest for its size in Glasgow, to take two dozen copies last week and display them. They were displayed to such purpose that they were sold out in little more than a day. I have ordered three dozen this week, and will go on increasing the order until it finds equilibrium.

That is the kind of letter that makes one face all difficulties with a cheerful face.

The Pioneer Press has been unable to discharge all the orders received for the editor's photograph owing to their being out of print. A fresh supply has now been received, but those who have already ordered will understand the cause of the delay.

We have in the Press, and hope to soon publish a small volume on Woman and Christianity, by Mr. Cohen, a companion work to his Christianity and Slavery. This will be followed by a new pamphlet from the pen of Mr. Mann, which will, we are sure, be welcome to our readers. We cannot give a date for their issue, as the shortage of labour is more acute than ever, and one can be certain only of disappointments. But we shall hurry them on as much as possible.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

The purpose of this Fund was fully explained in our issue for September 1. It is essentially a War Fund, designed to meet a part of the very heavy extra expenses incurred by increase in the cost of paper, rise in wages, and extra cost of production generally. It is not anticipated that the need for financial help of this kind will continue beyond the War period, but under prevailing conditions help is inevitable. A consolatory and encouraging feature of the situation is the generosity and readiness with which that help has been given.

A Search for the Soul.

XIV.

From the somewhat misleading work, entitled Man and the Universe, I make two or three more extracts before consigning it to oblivion. In the first of these the writer, Sir Oliver Lodge, says:—

> To suppose that we know and understand the universe, to suppose that we have grasped its main outlines, that we realize pretty completely not only what is in it, but the still more stupendous problem of what is not and cannot be in it—as do some of our gnostic (self styled "agnostic") friends—is a presumptuous exercise of limited intelligence, only possible to a certain very practical and useful order of brain, which has good solid work of a common-place kind to do in the world, and has been restricted in its outlook, let us say by Providence, in order that it may do that one thing and do it well (p. 102).

This choice sample of "high-falutin" is not very complimentary to Sir Oliver's friends whose work lies in other departments of science, but whose labours have not led them into the Christian or Spiritistic folds. With regard, however, to the problems as to what is in the Universe and what is not in it, Sir Oliver appears to have solved those problems himself. Not being an Agnostic "of limited intelligence," nor restricted by Providence in his outlook, he has settled the matter offhand, once for all. In the first category he has placed Life (which he calls a Vital principle) and Mind, as together forming an immaterial entity called the soul, the latter being quite distinct from the brain and endowed with immortality. In the same category he has placed the brain as the material organ which carries out the behests of the soul and acts as its "servant"; but the brain as an organ that generates thought he has relegated to the second category—"what is not in the Universe." Having settled these matters to his own satisfaction, he may, perhaps, think it "presumptuous" that the justness of his classification should ever be called in question. But whether this be so or not, he certainly knows what organ must be employed to carry out such a purpose, for he speaks of "a certain very practical order of brain." This is an admission, though perhaps made inadvertently, that it is the cerebral organ which actually thinks, and simple common sense tells us that a phantom without material organs could not possibly do so. Sir Oliver says again:—

> A purely spiritual agency may be active.....but the only evidence of its existence that can be adduced is the manifestation of that activity through matter..... Dreams, visions, thoughts, are enabled to enter our present consciousness solely by some action on, or action in, the brain.....It by no means follows that mind is itself dependent on matter, as we know it (pp. 160, 161).

Here we have such intangible things as impalpable moving pictures (assumed to have been generated by an imaginary indwelling Soul or Spirit) which are declared to possess the power of acting on or in the brain, and so entering our consciousness. One can conceive many kinds of abnormal things, but one cannot conceive a thought or an idea as having to act in some way upon the brain which produced it before it becomes known to the person to whom the brain belongs. A new or a definite thought, once it has arisen, may in a logical brain give rise to other thoughts; but the so-called "mind" is only a name for every kind of thought which arises from the action of the cerebral organ. One can imagine vibrations of luminiferous ether, say from a picture hanging in a room, to impinge on the retina of the eye, be transmitted along the optic nerve to the visual sensorium of the brain, and there become known to consciousness as a reflection of the real picture; but no rational person can conceive an immaterial nonentity, even if called a "soul" or "spirit," as creating or originating a picture of anything whatever.

It is not at all suprising, then, that Sir Oliver says (p. 94): "We have no glimmering conception of the process by which mental activity operates on the matter of the brain." Of course we have not, and we never shall have; for "mental activity" can no more operate on the brain than the chimes of a clock can operate on the striking apparatus which produced them. Mental activity is but another name for the thoughts or ideas generated by the cerebral energy and the brain-cells, whose combined action gives rise to all the states of consciousness which collectively are called the Mind. The Dualistic statement that thoughts or ideas cannot enter our consciousness unless they first "interact" with the brain is really a tacit admission that these thoughts or ideas were brought into being by the cerebral organ itself.

Leaving Sir Oliver and his book, I turn once more to Dr. Maudsley's lectures on "Body and Mind." Speaking of the influence of the blood in the production of insanity, that eminent physiologist says:—

> Poverty and vitiation of blood may certainly play a weighty part in producing mental, as they do in producing other nervous disorders. Lower the supply of blood to the brain below a certain level, and the power of thinking is abolished; the brain will then no more do mental work than a water-wheel will move the machinery of the mill when the water is lowered so as not to touch it.....If the state of the blood be vitiated by reason of some poison bred in the body, or introduced into it from without, the mental functions may be seriously deranged. We are able, indeed, by means of the drugs at our command, to perform all sorts of experiments on what is called the mind: we can suspend its action for a time by chloral or chloroform, we can exalt its functions by small doses of opium or moderate doses of alcohol; we can pervert them, producing an artificial delirium, by the administration of large enough doses of belladonna and Indian hemp. We can positively do more experimentally with the functions of the mind-centres in the brain than we can do with those of any other organ of the body. When these centres are exalted in consequence of a foreign substance introduced into the blood, it cannot be doubted that some physical effect is produced on the nerve-element, which is the condition of the increased activity.

To realize the full significance of the foregoing statements, we have but to assume for the moment that there is in the human organism a mental entity quite distinct from the brain. When opium or alcohol is taken, the stimulant passes from the stomach and intestine into the blood, and in the course of circulation enters the brain; the same is the case with belladonna and other drugs, which all produce well-known effects upon the cerebral organ. The point to be remembered, however, is that the blood does not, and cannot, come into contact with the mental entity, supposing such an entity to exist; for, not containing material blood vessels, the circulation cannot reach it; yet it is asserted by all Dualists that it is this mental entity—that is to say, the "mind"—which is affected by the drugs. As a simple matter of fact, the only organ acted upon is the brain; the mind, as already stated, being merely a collective name for the phenomena resulting from its various functions. Here we have a clear proof that the Soul or Mind, as an "entity," is purely imaginary.

In his work, Natural Causes and Supernatural Seemings, 1886, Dr. Maudsley says:—

> One of the effects of opium is the pleasing state of exaltation of thought and feeling which it engenders. .....It seems to impart a genial vital warmth to the whole being, suffusing the mind with expansive sentiments, stimulating the imagination to ethereal flights, giving large and lofty sweep to the projects of the intellect, and even expanding the natural forms of thought. .....A still more acute sense of intense mental illumination is produced in some minds by the inhalation of nitrous oxide gas, commonly known as laughing gas. This stimulating effect was experienced by Sir Humphrey Davy, who, when he first inhaled it, was astonished at the apparent exaltation of his mental powers, whereby difficulties of thought seemed to vanish as by magic, and no subject seemed too difficult of comprehension.

Here the reference to the mind is, of course, to the brain and nerve element. The nitrous oxide gas, mentioned in the last paragraph, entered the blood through the lungs, in which twofold organ the capillaries containing blood are separated from the air-cells by such thin and delicate walls that oxygen contained in the air within those cells passes into the blood, and waste matters in the blood pass into the air about to be exhaled. The process is the same in the case of chloroform, which produces temporary unconsciousness by stopping for a time the functioning of the brain. The poison gas now in use on the Western Front enters the blood in the same way.

Abracadabra.

(To be concluded.)

Intellectual Dishonesty.

Many of us who either grew up as Freethinkers, or became so at an early period of our lives, have probably been puzzled by the spectacle of apparently clever people adhering to orthodox Christian dogmas which seem to us manifestly absurd. I do not refer to conscious hypocrisy, such as is shown by those who continue to profess religion, though they do not believe in it, for the sake of livelihood or advancement. That is common enough, and needs no explanation. But many of us must have been acquainted with persons of known integrity, perhaps relations or friends of our own, who were distinctly above the average intellectual level, and yet who accepted in the religious sphere, without apparent hesitation, contradictions and absurdities which they would have laughed at in any other department of life. In our youth, the spectacle of such people puzzles us, and may even lead us, if we are ultra-sceptical, to ask ourselves if possibly they are right and we are wrong after all, and if there is not perhaps some grand, final, conclusive reason for religious belief which we are too dense to see. As we grow a little older, we begin to find the real solution, which is nothing nearly so sensational.

Love of truth is not the only motive by which human beings are actuated; and in most of us it is not even the chief motive. All are gifted with a certain degree of curiosity, which awakens on appropriate occasions; but with most, those occasions are rare, and become rarer as life goes on, and as the motive of curiosity is stifled by the successful competition of other motives, such as love of ease, love of gain, and so forth. It follows that most people end by "minding their own business," in the narrowest sense, and accepting religion as they accept the Bank of England—as something not worth their attacking or defending; something which presumably has a reason, because it is there, and which only fools and fanatics excite themselves about. There remains that minority of the human race who are cursed with an incapacity for merely "minding their own business"—the idealists, who cannot divest themselves of an interest in beauty, goodness, and truth. Here, at least, you might think would be found intellectual honesty. Not at all! It is precisely among idealists that the love of truth meets with its last and most insidious competitors. They are, on the one hand, Puritanism, and on the other, the artistic temperament.

By Puritanism I mean the intrusion of moral criteria into the non-moral sphere—the resort to conceptions of what ought to be to answer questions of what is. It is exemplified in the epigram of that otherwise most un-Puritan personage, Voltaire: "If God did not exist, it would be necessary to invent him"; in Rousseau's proscription of Atheism as dangerous to the State; in Kant's insistence on the necessity of believing in God, free-will, and immortality as postulates of ethics, in spite of their admitted undemonstrability by pure reason. It is at the bottom of much modern opposition to Freethought. It amounts to saying, "If there is no God, if all my actions are predetermined, and if death is the end of me, why should I behave well?" Those who use such arguments would probably be annoyed if one were to ask them if it was true that they only behaved well for the sake of future reward, or for fear of future punishment. To tell the truth, they are generally, when they reason thus, thinking not of their own conduct, but of other people's. They, no doubt, can be trusted to be virtuous for virtue's sake; but the other fellow round the corner? Their poorer neighbours? The ignorant working-classes? No, it really will not do to tell them there is no hell; you don't know what they will be up to! The attitude is one of unconscious Pharisaism.

Opposed in one sense to Puritanism, but in another sense allied with it against genuine Freethought, is the artistic temperament. As Puritanism intrudes moral criteria, so this intrudes æsthetic criteria into the decision of questions of mere matter-of-fact. The artist, by the nature of his calling, is accustomed to regard only the surface, the appearance of things. Unless he is also more than an artist, that is what he will regard. The world for him is a colour-scheme, a pattern, a play of sounds; the interpretation of it is more or less indifferent. This is more particularly the case with that development of art called Impressionism, with its corollaries, Post-Impressionism and Futurism. It is the aim of this school to reproduce impressions, or appearances, in such a way as to suggest as little else as possible; if any reality is suggested, it is better that it should be as absurd, as remote from common sense, as it can be. This, at least, seems to be the maxim of the later exponents of this development. So long as the effect is picturesque, what does truth matter?

So long as the Post-Impressionist confines himself to painting pictures or producing other forms of art, he need not detain us. It is otherwise when we are offered a Post-Impressionist philosophy as a serious answer to Freethought. This is, in effect, what Mr. G. K. Chesterton has done. To those who read his writings with an eye for their motive and meaning, it is evident that he suffers to excess from the artistic temperament. That, for one thing, is why Mr. Chesterton is chronically incapable of telling the truth about his opponents, whether in religion or politics. The world for him is primarily a picturesque pageant or spectacle. To explain it, or anything in it, rationally is to spoil the pageant. To seek to order it more rationally is equally to spoil the pageant. If you do either of these things, you are a spoil-sport, and he revenges himself by caricaturing you as a clown or a booby. Thomas Hardy is a "village atheist, brooding and blaspheming over the village idiot." Reformers of all sorts are wealthy and corrupt Jews, who aim at adding to the oppression of the poor, and taking away beer and battles and other amusements.

The disease from which Mr. Chesterton suffers is very well epitomized in one of his slighter works—the novel, The Man who was Thursday. This book exhibits the Post-Impressionist view of the world in an extreme form. Even the descriptions show it: sunset skies "full of feathers, and of feathers that almost brushed the face"; the Thames "like a stream of literal fire winding under the vast caverns of a subterranean country"; animals in the Zoo "like devils laughing and sneezing and blowing their devilish noses"—all this is the merest decadence. But there is more in it than this. The story as appears from its finish, is meant to be an allegory; and the point of the allegory, if words have any meaning is that God and the Devil are one and the same person, and that what we call evil was created on purpose that men might have the fun (as Mr. Chesterton thinks) of fighting and conflict. The world is full of suffering and agony, purposely staged by a God who eggs on the combatants to mutual slaughter; and Mr. Chesterton finds it very jolly.

I do not suppose he believes this, though it is what he seems to say in this book. He is probably enough of a sceptic at bottom to believe anything by an effort of will. Well, scepticism is all very well, and belief in some things is necessary if we are ever to act. If a man told me that he knew nothing at all, not even that two and two were four, I should call him over-modest. But if he told me that, though he knew nothing at all, yet, as he must believe something, he had decided to believe that two and two were five, I should put him down as a joker or a liar. Such is really the position of those who try to rear a superstructure of theology on a basis of scepticism.

Those only have complete intellectual honesty who are prepared to apply the same criteria of truth or falsehood to religious beliefs as they apply to their beliefs about everyday affairs. It is remarkable how few are prepared to do so.

MERCURY AND SALVARSAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—I was amazed to read in Mr. Palmer's article, "The Dark Diamonds of the Earth," the statement that mercury, as a treatment for venereal disease, "proves detrimental to the patient," and that therefore the German arsenical preparation, salvarsan, had been substituted as a "toxic substance which would be absorbed by the microbe, but not by the tissues of the sufferer from the disease." Mr. Palmer adds a reference to "this preparation, now available in Britain under the name of Kharsivan."

Now, apart from the fact that, salvarsan being a German secret, Kharsivan cannot possibly be described as the same thing, Mr. Palmer appears to have transferred the admitted element of danger from salvarsan to mercury. Many doctors fight shy of salvarsan, Kharsivan, and all the other imitations on account of their danger, and practically every member of the profession has now returned to the old mercury treatment. Where salvarsan is used, mercury is used as well, doubtless so that a smaller quantity of the more dangerous item may be used, and also because mercury is recognized as a far surer remedy, if slower. In fact, salvarsan only appears to clear up the symptoms suddenly and superficially, but to be able to effect no permanent cure.

Major J. E. Lane, a well-known syphilitic expert, after experience of several hundred cases, wrote to the Lancet on November 11, 1916, that he had decided to abandon the use of Kharsivan "for ever." He had experience of its causing toxic symptoms and death. As to salvarsan itself, several hundred fatal cases have been recorded by Gaucher and Mentberger.

The Vanished Fairies.

In France the woods are green and gold,
The sun smiles on the hills,
And flowers open as of old
By little twinkling rills.
All birds sing sweetly in the dell—
And other things I cannot tell.

There are no fairies to be seen,
In bush, or brake, or field.
I've searched the land where'r I've been
But none have been revealed.
Through woods the rabbits run pell-mell—
And other things I cannot tell.

A fairy banquet I have found,
No fairies there I spied,
The tiny cups lay on the ground,
And dishes tossed aside,
I wonder what had there befel—
And other things I cannot tell.

Yet still I hope, a day will break
When they will all return,
And all will then their pleasure take
For which I'm sure they yearn.
Their song will ring out like a bell—
Of other things I cannot tell.

In France the woods are green and gold,
The sun smiles on the hills,
And flowers open as of old
By little twinkling rills
Come fairies soon, let music swell—
To drown the things I cannot tell.

OUR ORIENTAL BIBLE.

This oriental Bible is at utter variance w ifh the vita beliefs, the political and social tendencies, and the ethical aspirations, of the present age. Science has destroyed its naive supernaturalism; reason has placed its personal God —the magnified, non-natural man—in his own niche in the world's Pantheon; philosophy has carried us far beyond its primitive conceptions of human society; our morality has outgrown its hardness and insularity, however we may still appreciate its finer ejaculations; even the most pious Christians, with the exception of a few "peculiar" people, only pay a hypocritical homage to its clearest injunctions; and the higher development of decency and propriety makes us turn from its crude expressions with a growing sense of disgust, while the progress of humanity fills us more and more with a loathing of its frightful wars and ruthless massacres, its tales of barbaric cruelty, and its crowning infamy of an everlasting hell.—G. W. Foote, "The Book of God."

Obituary.

Manchester Branch N.S.S.—It is with regret I have to announce the death of Mr. Richard Hollins, which took place, after only two days' illness, on September 28. He was with us on the previous Sunday Ramble, apparently in the best of health, and his death caused quite a shock to our members, amongst whom he was highly respected. His special request for a Secular Service was duly carried out at the Manchester Crematorium on Thursday, October 3.—H. Black, Hon. Sec.

Harassing the Enemy.

We have several times lately reprinted complaints from the general press as to the quantity of Freethought literature being circulated in both the Army and Navy. We are not alone in pleading guilty for responsibility for this, but we believe we are the oldest of the offenders. So soon as the War started, we saw a chance of propaganda; and as propaganda is our business, there was nothing surprising in that. But we saw in this War a unique opportunity. Our forces are recruited from everywhere, and when the War is over they will return to everywhere. Here, then, was a splendid audience collected for us by the Government. We deeply regretted the occasion for its assembly, but it would have been folly not to have availed one's self of its presence. So, in the Autumn of 1914, we set to work, sending out free parcels of literature to soldiers whose addresses we had received. The results have more than justified the expenditure. Thousands of men, who would not otherwise have come into contact with Freethought, have made its acquaintance. Hundreds will go back home, missionaries for their new cause. The casualties on the religious front have been many; and we pride ourselves on having, with the help of our readers, supplied many of the shells.

Cant.

Some religious organizations are shrieking out for ammunition to repel the attack. On the other hand, there is a demand, from those who realize what "duds" are the religious shells, that the authorities shall stop the circulation of this "poisonous literature" among the men. This last policy is characteristically Christian, eminently British. For, as it is Christian to suppress opinion, so it is British to do it in the name of morality. There is nothing in which the British Christian takes a keener interest than the task of moralizing someone. The old Biblical command was, "Love thy neighbour as thyself." The Christian loves his neighbour better than himself—at least, he is trying to bring him up to a standard of excellence seldom illustrated in his own character. The neighbour pursues the same policy, and thus both are provided with employment—without either being seriously affected. So it is suggested that a ban should be placed upon the circulation of Freethought literature on the score of morals. The Freethinker will undermine the soldier's character, sap his moral health. He can stand against poison gas and shells, the filth of the trench, and the de-socialization of warfare. But to a Freethought paper or pamphlet he succumbs. What a power we must wield! How interesting it would be to find the soldier debarred the Freethinker, with the commanding officer serving out religious tracts—and standing over the men while they read them.

"Good" and "Bad" Books.

But we are chiefly concerned with the suggestion because of the light it throws on the mental make-up of the average Christian. Suppression is the hall-mark of the tribe. And with literature there has been the dual policy of suppression and expurgation—sometimes assisted by falsification. When books were few, suppression was an easy method for a powerful Church to adopt. When they became more numerous, the task became difficult, and if they were at all popular the next best policy was to issue them Bowdlerized. The displeasing parts were left out or toned down. And all on the ground that these works were not good for people to read. And who were those who said they were not good to read? Notoriously such as were least qualified to form an opinion. Personally, we have little faith in books being either good or bad, save in an artistic sense. People will usually get from a book what they bring to it; and a book may be easily made, through suggestion, to appear indecent when it is not really so. But in the direction of suggesting indecency, a sermon on "The Social Evil," by Father Vaughan, or F. B. Meyer, or the Bishop of London, will be more effective than any book we have ever come across. As guides to the indecent, some of our clergy hold easily a front place. A really bad book suppresses itself. Time sees to that. It is only a good book that lives, and therefore it is only good books on which these moral ghouls have a chance of operating.

Books and the Young.

But there are the young people who need guarding. Oh, these young peoole! Perhaps a little less guarding might be to their benefit. It is certainly to be questioned whether adults are always the best judges as to what is suitable or unsuitable for young people to read. May it not be that the young people themselves might decide fairly well for themselves? No one will accuse Ruskin of a desire to place unclean or debasing literature within the reach of young people; and yet here is his advice, deliberately given, as to the choice of books for girls:—

> Whether novels, or poetry, or history be read, they should be chosen not for their freedom from evil, but for their possession of good. The chance and scattered evil that may haunt or hide itself in a powerful book never does harm to a noble girl, but the emptiness of an author depresses her, and his amiable folly degrades her. And if she can have access to a good library of old and classical books, there need be no > choosing at all.....Turn her loose into the old library every wet day and let her alone. She will find what is good for her.....Let her loose in the library, I say, as you would do a fawn in the field. It knows the bad weeds twenty times better than you; and the good ones too; and will eat some bitter and prickly ones, good for it, which you had not the slightest thought would have been so.

The censorship of books is, at bottom, a product of a conception of education which is summed up in prohibition. Don't do this! don't do that! A child is some one to be restrained, not an organism to be developed. Does not the Christian habitually illustrate the same thing in his reference to moral "restraints"? And it quite follows, so far as he is able to control social affairs, he has no other guiding principle save that of prohibition or suppression.

Christian Heredity.

So quite naturally, and in accordance with his history, the Christian takes to a policy of suppression as comfortably as a duck to water. And as soldiers are regulated as to their eating, sleeping, dressing, and washing, why not as to their reading? The soldier must be guarded against the poisonous influence of the Freethinker, etc., by an Army order prohibiting their circulation! And if not the soldier, why not the civilian? If this could be done then we might witness something of the revival of religion about which we have heard so much during the past four years. The genuine Christian is the Peter Pan of history. He never grows up. He has no desire to grow up. In leading strings himself he cannot appreciate the desire of others for freedom. Above all, he is supremely oblivious of the fact that where opinion is censored, and its discussion prohibited, an environment is created fatal to even genuine moral growth. The rising generation suffers because no genuine appeal is ever made to the better part of their nature. The one lesson fronting us is that if they do form opinions at variance with those of the crowd, the wisest policy is to hide them. They are trained to cowardice, and invited to become liars as a matter of policy. This has been one of the practical consequences of the establishment of Christianity. And the present state of Europe may fairly be taken as one indication of its influence.

"Ignorant Worship."

I.

The Rev. W. Garrett Horder, minister for many years of the Ealing Congregational Church, is deservedly held in high esteem by all who know him. He enjoys the reputation of being one of the sanest members of the clerical profession. In the Middlesex County Times for September 21, one of his sermons was published, bearing the title at the head of this article. Naturally, the text is Paul's oft-quoted words, "Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you" (Acts xviii. 23). We do not doubt Mr. Horder's sincerity, but after carefully reading and re-reading this specimen of his pulpit oratory, we are left no choice but to charge him with gross ignorance or hopelessly blind prejudice. Fully aware of the seriousness of such a charge, we at once set out to prove it. The text is taken from Paul's famous speech at Athens, and its first significance is said to lie in the fact that the Athenians "did worship at all"; but this is affirmed to be "suggestive of a still greater fact that men everywhere do worship." The reverend gentleman waxes bolder, and asserts that "the tribe, the people, the nation has yet to be discovered in which worship in some form or other is not found." "In other words—so far as our knowledge goes—worship is universal." Has Mr. Horder forgotten that several explorers have testified that they came across savages who entertained no religious beliefs, who even ridiculed the idea of a Supreme Being and a future life? Herbert Spencer quotes several testimonies of that import; and he also furnishes evidences not a few to show that deaf and dumb people are completely destitute of religion until they receive definite instruction therein. He cites the case of a deaf-mute American woman who had reached mature years before a missionary approached her, who found her to be absolutely devoid of belief in or sense of a God. The universality of worship is by no means a well-attested fact. In that false assumption, however, Mr. Horder discerns several tremendous implications. "First of all," he tells us, "it implies a human craving. Men feel that they want something, or they would not worship." But is it not indisputable that worship owes its origin to what has been called "the primal stupidity" of human nature? Primitive man felt that he was at the mercy of the strange forces by which he was surrounded. The storm destroyed his crops, the lightning killed his children as they played in front of the hut, the earth quaked and swallowed up his neighbours, and in utter desperation he wildly appealed to he knew not what for protection. The first form of worship, doubtless, was the frantic cry of helpless fear in the presence of Natural Laws, concerning which the densest ignorance prevailed.

Mr. Horder sneers at the people who say that "the priest gives birth to religion," dubbing them "people who do not think"; but will he be good enough to inform us what the mission of the priest really is, and how it arrived at the present stage in its development? As a matter of simple fact, is not the priest a functionary who slipped into existence on the back of that "primal stupidity" just mentioned? In a supercilious fashion the reverend gentleman exclaims:—

> Religion made by priests—No! It is the feeling out of which religion springs that makes the priest. Back of all religion lies a human craving for something which the world does not give—a craving found not only in those who worship in temple or church, but in all men everywhere.....Get at the heart of men and you will find this craving which is the germ of all religion.

Is not this really an unwitting giving away of the preacher's whole case? We readily concede, it is our fundamental contention, that "it is the feeling out of which religion springs that makes the priest"; but is it not equally true that the priest, playing upon the existence of that initial feeling, fear, or stupidity, is the author of religion—the maker of every deity, the shaper of every worship? What other purpose has he ever served, or is capable of serving? In order to make this clearer, we will take Mr. Horder's next point, namely, that the universality of a craving implies that there is something to meet it. With something like triumphant pride he cries out: "If you ask me for proof of God—it is here—that I crave him." Well, after his long career as a teacher of religion, no doubt the reverend gentleman does crave him; it would be a miracle if he did not; but that is no proof whatever that the craving is a human instinct, or is in any sense a part of our constitutional inheritance, like the eye, the ear, or the palate. We maintain that the craving for God is at best but an illusion. "The craving for God," Mr. Horder adds, "if it be universal, implies a God to meet it." We unhesitatingly deny the universality of the craving, and declare it to be nothing but a sheer illusion where it exists—artificially produced by the priest and his satellites. A moment's thought will convince any unbiased person of the truth of this statement. You say: "There is the eye, and there is the light to meet it." But you do not have to devote months and years to the task of convincing a child of the existence of light before it can see. Without any teaching at all vision becomes a reality. But it often takes many years of laborious instruction to instil into the young mind a veritable belief in God; and in numerous instances total failure is the only reward.

Surely, Mr. Horder cannot be blind to the fact that in so-called Christian Britain to-day there are tens of thousands of men and women who are absolutely without belief in a Divine Being, and who as certainly experience not the slightest craving for him. Among these are multitudes who, as children, received no religious instruction, and who, in consequence, have been all their lives entire strangers to divine worship. In America psychologists are devoting considerable attention to this subject, and have already issued statistics which show that among young men and maidens at colleges, as well as among educated people generally, the belief in God is possessed only by a minority. Scientific investigations have been made "in which the usual fatal defects of statistical researches have been avoided." In a most interesting work, entitled The Belief in God and Immortality, James H. Leuba, Professor of Psychology at Bryn Mawr College, describing these studies, says:—

> These inquiries have yielded results of considerable significance; and we are now for the first time in a position to make certain definite statements, valid for entire groups of influential persons, namely, college students, physical scientists, biologists, historians, sociologists and economists, and psychologists. We have been able not only to compare these groups with each other but also, among the students, the lower classes with the higher; and among the other groups, the more eminent persons with the less eminent. It appears, with incontrovertible evidence, that in each group the more distinguished fraction includes by far the smaller number of believers (pp. vi. vii.).

With reference to the scientists Professor Leuba says:

> The biologists produce a much smaller number of believers in God and in immortality than the physicists. The figures are, for the believers in God: physicists, 43·9 per cent.; biologists, 30·5 per cent. There are fewer believers among the greater men, whether physicists or biologists. The smallest percentage of believers is found among the greater biologists; they count only 16·9 per cent. of believers in God.....As many as 59·3 per cent. of greater biologists express disbelief in God (p. 254).

Mr. Horder's assertion of the universality of worship, and of the secure place of religion in the hearts of men thus falls to the ground; an assertion he must have made either in total ignorance of the facts or in wilful defiance of them. Our claim is that all worship is founded upon ignorance, and that the spread of knowledge is steadily uprooting it.

How the Clergy Starve.

> If I had been a bishop, with an income of five to fifteen thousand a year, I should have had an inexhaustible source of rejoicing and merriment in the generosity, if not in the credulity, of my countrymen.—John Bright.

The Bishop of London is in low spirits, not because the dear clergy are on strike, but from a feverish apprehension of what may never happen at all. The fashionable churches still display the latest and most expensive show of millinery in their pews; coins still rattle in the collection-plates; but to watch his lordship's face it would seem as though the end of all things was at hand. The bishop is in the dumps concerning the shocking poverty of the poor clergy. Speaking at an excellent lunch given by the Lord Mayor of London, he said he did not know how some of the clergy were going to get through this winter at all. There were, he added, amid the awed silence of his hearers, no less than 143 benefices in his own diocese where the income was below "£300 a year and a house." Some of the clergy contemplated resignation; they could not face the future. A rural dean said, "I just manage. I see that no meal for myself, wife, and children exceeds 6½d."

Is it not "too deep for tears"? Who in that gay assembly of lunchers ever thought of the dire distress of that poor "rural dean," who had to feed five human beings (for deans are always expected to have one servant) on sixpence-halfpenny? It reads like a romance, written by a magician, an idealist, and a eugenist, who could only have been bred in the wild and woolly West, where men's imaginations are as wide and untrammelled as the rivers. Here, in the old country, the parson with his big and expensive vicarage too often is a miniature reproduction of the bishop in a palace too large for him and for the times.

The mystery remains how that "rural dean" manages to provide food for his family, so that "no meal exceeds 6½d." Do they, like Nebuchadnezzar, eat grass? Or, do the ravens who fed the prophet Elijah bring them sandwiches? One cannot dine a la carte, or even a la Lockhart, on a beggarly sixpence. Perhaps the Bishop of London will explain. So skilful is he with figures, that he has already proved to an admiring world that the more money he receives the poorer he becomes.

There is a way of providing money for the poorer clergy which will, doubtless, find favour in the eyes of the Bishop of London and his ecclesiastical colleagues. It is to act on the advice of Shakespeare, as adapted from the lines in King Lear:—

> Take physic, pomp,
> Expose thyself to feel what deans do feel;
> That thou mayst shake the superflux to them,
> And show the heavens more just.

The higher clergy could afford easily to "show the heavens more just." Thirty-nine archbishops and bishops receive, between them, no less than £180,700 yearly, with emoluments in the shape of palaces and palatial residences. The Bishop of London is a bachelor, with an income of £200 weekly, and he could, if he wished, prevent that "rural dean's" family from watering their war-bread with their tears. Perhaps an innate sense of modesty alone prevents him from depriving wealthy laymen of an opportunity for disbursing charity in so sad and distressing a case. As for the bishops themselves, they could so easily mitigate the Spartan fare of the rural dean and his dependents. One cannot think for a moment that these descendants of the apostles would act like the selfish boy with an apple, who, when his young brother asked him for the core, replied, "Get away! There ain't going to be no core."

A former canon of St. Paul's Cathedral once said that some of the reasons why men remained in the Established Church were "purple, palaces, patronage, profit and power." And the right to appoint clergymen to benefices is sold for money in the open market, as if it were so much coal or a quack medicine. The clergy pretend, professionally, to be entirely uninfluenced by financial motives. Yet many of them manage to evade the blessings of poverty, and to leave large sums of money. The late Bishop of Colchester left estate valued at £60,848. Bishop Creighton, who used to talk of the fearful struggles of the wretched ecclesiastics to keep out of debt, left £29,500. Archbishop Benson left £35,000, and Archbishop Tait a similar sum. The biggest episcopal estate of recent years was that of Bishop Walsham How, who left £72,240. A good second to this was Bishop Tuffnell's £65,800, and Bishop Phillpot left £60,000 whilst Archbishop Thomson left £55,000, and Bishop Trollope £50,790. Compared with these sums, the £19,361 of Bishop Harvey Godwin, the £10,000 of Bishop Tozer, and the £12,605 of Bishop Pelham seem quite modest.

It was at a Mansion House banquet that the Bishop of London made his sad remarks concerning the rural dean who fed his family on sixpence halfpenny a meal. It must have startled his auditors as much as Banquo's ghost scared the amazed Macbeth. For Judge Rentoul has stated that at the annual banquets given to the clergy at the Mansion House seventy-four bottles of champagne were drunk which would cost about £40. He added that he actually saw those figures in black and white one year, and he was told that the figures were every year about the same.

Maybe, the plaint of clerical poverty is, after all, only a trick of trade. The Bishop of London may be only practising the arts of his profession, and probably laughs in his dainty lawn sleeve at his public performances. Perhaps he is merely seeking to excite the generosity of devoted Churchmen who have balances at the bank. Clerical performances such as this will only last so long as they produce the desired result. Some day the democracy of this country will turn to the clergy and say, echoing the words of Cromwell: "Be gone and make place for better men."

Sincerity makes respectable even absurd and wrong-headed causes; but sincerity is not a shining Christian virtue. The God of the Christians is no longer the sad-faced figure of the poor and despised Nazarene, but the rubicund, self-satisfied form of Mammon, with the leer of the miser. Gone are the crown of thorns, and the spear-wounds in his side, but in the bejewelled hands of the new deity are held the money-bag and the bribe. The purple robe covers the huge imposture of an organized hypocrisy. Could the pale shade of Christ that slinks past the gilt altar-rails but speak it would bewail an agony of spirit deadlier than that which drenched Gethsemane in blood. Mohammed has a direct influence over his professed disciples; Gotama Buddha still colours and controls human life; the teachings of Brahmanism still affects the lives of millions. Even Joseph Smith's revelations are held in honour by the Mormons, but where, throughout the length and breadth of Christendom, are the Christians who are faithful to the ideals and aspirations of the "Gospel of Poverty"?

GOD AND MAN.

A Search for the Soul.

XV.

(Concluded from p. 537.)

IN his Personal Religion in Egypt before Christianity, Mr. Flinders Petrie devotes a chapter to a comparison of "Body and Mind," based upon a work by Professor W. James in his Gifford Lectures. Commencing with the body, he draws attention to the following facts:—

1. That all the internal functions of the body are carried on without our consciousness, and that it is only where these come in touch with the external world that we have any control over them.

2. That all functional action is carried on by two opposing mechanisms—one of excitation and the other of inhibition.

3. That natural form and function are both due to heredity, and are determined in different parts by different hereditary sources.

Coming next to the mechanism of the mind, the same processes are found, thus plainly indicating that the mind is compelled to act through the same mechanical conditions as those relating to the body. These are:—

1. That processes of mind are mainly unconscious.

> Our normal waking consciousness is but one special type of consciousness, while all about it, parted from it by the filmiest of screens, there lie potential forms of consciousness entirely different.

2. That all mental action is performed by two opposing mechanisms.

> Our moral and practical attitude, at any given time, is always a resultant of two sets of forces within us, impulses pushing us one way, and obstructions and inhibitions holding us back.

3. That natural form and function of mind are both due to heredity, and descend from various hereditary sources. The persistence of mental tendencies, though much obscured by education, is so marked that the hereditary descent of mind cannot be doubted.

> Of the unconscious mind a very important part is the accumulation of experiences, the details of which have been entirely lost to memory or consciousness, but the effect of which is stored. This is the source of unconscious anticipation.....which forms the unseen framework and guiding lines of our actions; and we only become aware of it when it is obstructed.....The routine of life is a part of anticipation. Each daily event as it arrives prepares us for the next unconsciously, and much is thus done without calling up Will, or even consciousness, to direct our actions.

Looking now at the analogy between the processes of body and mind, the fact that these are practically identical is proof that both are carried on by the same influence of heredity, and that there is a manifest unity in the functioning of every part of the human organism. The alimentary organs convert the nutritious portions of the food into chyle, the liver secretes bile, the organs of respiration assist in the oxidation of the blood, the heart propels the vital fluid through every part of the body, and the brain with its energy generates consciousness and thought. Though the function in each case is of a different nature, the same methods are more or less employed throughout. If the function of the brain may appear to be of a less material character than that of any of the others, this circumstance does not alter the fact that that organ is alone responsible for the production of thought. An immaterial nonentity like the "soul" would be powerless to produce anything. As Buchner says:—

> A soul without a body, a spirit without physique, a thought without substance, can no more be realized or > exist than electricity, magnetism, gravity, can exist without those bodies or materials by the activity of which the phenomena designated by those names are produced.

Needless to say, this statement is undoubtedly true; a so-called "soul" without material organs, though it might perhaps be imagined, could not exist.

Now, if we consider that there was a time when every individual body and mind first came into existence, we shall also perceive that there must certainly come a time when each individual body and mind shall cease to exist. That which had a beginning will most assuredly have an end. This is, of course, admitted by all so far as the body is concerned, but not in the case of the soul or mind. With regard to the latter, however, it should be remembered that each man begins his individual existence at the moment when the two parental sexual cells meet and coalesce for the formation of a single simple cell—the individual stem-cell—with the formation of which the existence of the personality of the individual commences. Through this cell man, like all other complex animals, inherits all his personal characteristics, both bodily and mental, from his parents. Hence, the new personality which arises can lay no claim to immortality. All these characteristics are contained, in a latent state, in the stem-cell, and after birth, should the conditions be unfavourable, the mental faculties may never be developed. We have thus a proof that the so-called "soul" is not an indwelling entity of the body, and if circumstances prevent its development it remains through life not only non-manifest but non-existent.

Again, the individual stem-cell from which man is formed is undoubtedly a particle of matter; it follows therefore that what is called mind is, at the most, merely a property of living matter, or something that results from the activity of that matter, which, in the case of man, has been evolved far beyond that of any of the higher animals.

If, again, we go back through the ages we find that matter was in existence long before what is called mind had arisen, and that both must have been contained, either potentially or in capacity, in the primal world-mist, out of which our solar system has been gradually evolved. Says Buchner:—

> The development of mind from matter is the product of a protracted toil, rising step by step, through countless centuries, till reaching the height of humanity..... What is called "spirit" is a manifestation of life, and life, by the law of its being, is subject to change and therefore to death. Spirit is perishable, for it is absolutely indivisible from the perishable forms of matter, and it is a wholly natural force.....The spirit which resides in man is indissolubly bound up with a living organised brain. According to our experience, spirit is without exception found only in conjunction with a brain.

The foregoing statement is, of course, in perfect agreement with science; but opposed to it we have that of the great physicist, Sir Oliver Lodge, who says:—

> It does not follow that the brain generates or secretes thought, or that every thinking creature in the universe must possess a brain.....The manifold activities [of the mind] did not arise with us: they never did spring into being; they are as eternal as the Godhead itself, and in the eternal Being they shall endure for ever.

This, no doubt, is a grand theory; but science tells us that the most primitive forms of animal life were of a nature that cannot be credited with mental faculties, and though in the course of time higher animals possessing rudimentary brains came into being, many long ages elapsed before the highest parts of the human brain—those concerned with reason, reflection, and judgment—became fully developed. Again, when a child is born, it comes into the world without any psychical faculty whatever. Though possessing a brain, that organ is almost as smooth as a bagatelle ball, no impressions from the outer world having been registered upon it—without which there can be no thought. It should also be borne in mind that every kind of force or energy active upon this planet—including that of mental activity—ultimately arises from the sun, and takes its origin in the form of light and heat, which come to us by vibrations of ether particles.

Here I will leave this subject for the present—to return to it, later on, in a more irrational form, miscalled Spiritualism.

The Salvation Army advertised for October 9 and 10 "Two Days with God" at the Congress Hall, Clapton, and then thoughtfully added "General Booth and Mrs. Booth will also be present." That "also" is delightful. Perhaps they were there as a kind of understudy, in case the advertised guest of the evening was engaged elsewhere.

The Bishop of Hull says that 2,000 men at the Front have expressed a desire to enter the ministry. Some men in the trenches are far more eager to enter the ministry than the men in the ministry are to enter the trenches. The Bishop says £500,000 will be needed for their education. Perhaps lack of it is a cause of their desire to mount the pulpit.

The Bishop of Peterborough is alarmed at the "snaky selfishness which still lifts its head among us." Yet his Church has been fighting that reptile for twenty centuries.

Religion is a costly business. The first stage of the restoration of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, has cost £40,000, and a further sum of £60,000 is required to finish the work.

The Rev. E. F. Nicholas, a Congregationalist minister, has been selected Labour candidate for Aberdeen. "Woe unto ye rich" and "Blessed be ye poor" should be excellent election cries.

The Bishop of London is hostile to the idea of Sunday baseball. Presumably, the heavier the "gate" at baseball matches, the lighter the "gate" at the churches.

Dr. Biggs, Bishop of Worcester, has accepted the bishopric of Coventry, which has been carved from the diocese of Worcester. The income of the new bishopric is £3,200, but the newspapers state that Dr. Biggs has a large private income. "Blessed be ye poor."

The Church no longer commands the obedience of people as in the Ages of Faith. She forbids divorce—but the Divorce Court is busy. No less than forty-four decrees nisi were made absolute in the Vacation Court recently.

At the Guns' Exhibition and cardboard village display at Trafalgar Square, the opening service was conducted by the Bishop of Kensington, and choirs from Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's, and other churches sang. It is pleasant to find priests of the Government religion justifying their position.

It is an open question whether the proposed Hyde Park War-shrine will be "a thing of beauty and a joy for ever." According to the Church Crafts' League the design submitted for that shrine is "out of harmony with its surroundings and ugly in itself." In short, there is more craft than art in the design.

In view of the near possibility of a General Election, the Sabbatarians have issued a manifesto to secure the support of candidates "to the right of the people to retain their Sunday freedom for family life and religious worship." This rigmarole means that the Sabbatarians wish for a continuance of the Christian monopoly of Sunday.

Under the pressure of adversity, Church and Chapel are becoming quite friendly. At the City Temple, London, a Congregationalist place of worship, the Rev. G. W. H. Shaw, Rector of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate, preached recently in the place of Miss Royden, the lady pastor.

"God must have been waiting to give a blessing to our arms," says Bishop Taylor Smith. What exquisite humility on the part of the bishop!

Not so long ago religious folk frowned at novels; but a great change has taken place. At the Sunday School Union's shop in Ludgate Hill a new novel is boldly advertised, and a profusion of light literature fills the windows. A cynic might add that this was commercialism, and not Christianity.

The London correspondent of the Glasgow Herald says there is a widespread demand in Scotland for the insertion of a provision in the Education Bill making the teaching of religious instruction mandatory in the public, elementary, and secondary schools. Quite a number of public men have made statements to the same effect, but were unable to substantiate their statements when challenged. Is he aware that the paper he represents has received dozens of letters against the proposed religious clauses, but has not published them? With a prejudiced press, how is it possible to know the will of the public apart from a General Election?

A correspondent to the Daily Press makes an appeal to the authorities in Glasgow to provide Sunday entertainment, in the form of concerts or cinema shows, to the many soldiers and sailors staying over the week-end in town. He says if it is good enough for them to fight for us on Sunday, it cannot be bad for them to get some form of healthy entertainment on that day as well. Quite a good idea.

A puff in a daily paper asks for the gift of a portable organ for a chaplain going out with the troops to Northern Russia. Might we suggest that a concertina would be easier to carry such a great distance. It would also be less expensive.

I have ever looked on mankind in the lump to be nothing better than a foolish, headstrong, credulous, unthinking mob; and their universal belief has ever had extremely little weight with me.—Robert Burns.

The following is from the Times of Ceylon for July 20:—

> Cook-Appu. Must be able make good bread and pastry; energetic, registered, married man whose wife lives on estate essential; healthy climate. Salary Rs. 30, half-bushel. No old men, drunkards or Christians need apply. Bachelor. —D. 6094, c/o Times of Ceylon.

The italics are ours. It is quite a commentary on the elevating influence of Christianity.

The Chaplain of Pentonville Prison says that a prisoner once said to him: "Nobody who comes into this place and hears you preach, sir, can ever want to come here again." We have, no doubt, many outside prison have felt the same after hearing some sermons.

It appears that before the War some Anglican clergymen were passing poor on £300 a year, and now, everything being double cost, the poor dears are starving. The Bishop of London is now making a public appeal on their behalf, and wonders they have not gone on strike. His lordship forgets his Master's words, "Blessed are ye poor."

The Bishop of Glasgow, in a letter to the clergy of his diocese, says, that during these weary years the Church has never put forth her full strength in prayer. To prepare for this, quiet afternoons and evenings have been arranged in certain parts of the diocese. It is also proposed to make a special missionary effect throughout the Scottish Church to deepen a sense of responsibility for carrying out our "Lord's will." Is it not now nearly time the various sects were coming to an agreement to determine what they think the "Lord's will" to be. Secularists have no doubt in the matter.

The Vicar of St. Woollos, Newport, calls those who attend church on a rainy Sunday A1 Christians, while those who remain at home belong to Grade 3. After all, how simple and easy a thing it is to be a Christian, and how amazingly cheap heaven is!

Dr. Jowett says that "there has never been a period in the history of the world when there were so many people nestling in the Lord." Other clergymen complain that religion is at a lower ebb to-day than it has been for many ages. Perhaps Dr. Jowett makes his own popularity his standard of judgment.

Mr. Silas Hocking, the Methodist novelist, claims that the League of Nations "has its roots in the Sermon on the Mount." What an unspeakably poor soil that famous discourse must be when the roots of such a desirable institution have lain therein for nineteen centuries without giving any signs of their presence; and even now we have only the word of a writer of fiction that they are there at all.

According to the Dean of Exeter, God "gradually unveiled himself as the people could bear it." This is quite interesting, and reminds one of the plot of a good old-fashioned Adelphi drama. Everything is "wropt" in mystery until the last scene, and meanwhile the audience have to follow the plot as it best can. Only, as the Aristophanes of Germany said to the Aristophanes of the skies, the joke, or plot, is rather long-drawn out and threatens to become monotonous.

CHANGING RELIGION.

Human nature remains the same; but religion alters. Christianity has taken many forms. In the early Church it had the hues of a hundred heresies. It developed in the successive councils. It has been Roman, it has been Greek, it has been Anglican, Lutheran, Calvinist, Arminian. It has adjusted itself to national characteristics; it has grown with the growth of general knowledge.—J. A. Froude.

MY MADONNA.

I haled me a woman from the street,
Shameless, but, oh, so fair!
I bade her sit in the model's seat,
And I painted her sitting there.

I hid all trace of her heart unclean;
I painted a babe at her breast;
I painted her as she might have been
If the Worst had been the Best.

She laughed at my picture, and went away.
Then came, with a knowing nod,
A connoisseur, and I heard him say:
"'Tis Mary, the Mother of God."

So I painted a halo round her hair,
And I sold her, and took my fee,
And she hangs in the church of Saint Hilaire,
Where you and all may see.

IN MEMORIAM.

George William Foote.
Jan. 11, 1850—Oct. 17, 1915.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

November 10, Liverpool; November 24, Leeds; November 27 to December 1, South Wales; December 8, Leicester.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—October 20, Southampton; November 3, Manchester; November 10, Sheffield; December 1, Swansea.

J. Capon.—We hope we deserve some of the things you are kind enough to say. At any rate, we appreciate them from so old a Freethinker as yourself.

N. S. S.—The Freethinker can be obtained from Mr. F. Henderson, "The Bomb Shop," Charing Cross Road, W.C.

R. Thomas.—We would rather do anything than increase the price of the Freethinker if we can possibly avoid it. It is not a question of our present readers objecting to an extra penny per copy—we think very few of them would; it is a question of what is ultimately best for the Cause. It may, as you say, require courage to keep the price unchanged; but timidity is fatal to anyone who is entrusted with the Freethought standard. We nevertheless appreciate the kindness of your offer.

W. J.—The "cheap seaside lodgings" had no personal application. The best reply to your friend would be to ask him what is the use of praying without belief? No, we have never engaged in prayer for anything—at least not since we attained years of discretion.

Mr. T. Mozley writes that, having induced his newsagent to show a copy of the Freethinker, the result has been five new subscribers up to date. Good news, but not, we are glad to say, unusual.

A. D.—Pleased you found the Freethinker "a treat."

E. May.—Both of Barratt's books, Physical Metempiric and Physical Ethics, are full of meat, but marked by an awkward terminology. Still, he will repay close study. You will find the other matter discussed in Critical Realism, by R. W. Sellars (chapters iii. and iv.); New York, 1916.

E. Mills.—Thanks for contribution to Fund. We can assure you we do not feel discouraged. Why should we? We never went in for Freethought on account of its being a bed of roses, and the respect, confidence, and support of Freethinkers all over the country gives us every encouragement to push on. Shall be glad to see you when you are in town.

E. K.—No apology is necessary. You are doing what you can, and if all do that we can face the future without serious misgiving.

F. S. Kebble.—The spirit of your letter is quite enough to prevent our estimating your interest by the size of the contribution. But we are not inclined to do that in any case, and, certainly, not in yours.

A. Boyd.—Not at all a congenial occupation; but if it must be done, it is as well it were done well.

H. Cajrney.—Thanks for second subscription to Fund. Pleased to have your warm appreciation of what is being done.

The members of the Kingsland Branch of the N. S. S., in sending subscriptions to Fund, desire to say they are "very proud of the manner in which the cause is upheld and its principles disseminated by our chief and his colleagues." We return thanks on their and our own behalf.

F. Betts.—There is no legal right, but an application to the C.O. might be successful. Parcel of "poisonous literature" being sent to address given in France.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

A very successful commencement of the season's work was made by the Swansea Branch on Sunday last with two lectures from Mr. Cohen. The hall was well filled in the afternoon, and quite inconveniently crowded in the evening. A pleasing feature of the meeting was the large number of ladies present, and the keen interest with which the lectures were followed was both a compliment and an inspiration to the speaker. At the afternoon meeting, Mr. D. Morgan also spoke, and his speech on the need for Freethought work, was well phrased and well delivered. It made a capital impression, and contributed to the success of the day's proceedings.

Mr. Cohen has deferred his visit to Nuneaton—fixed for October 27—until a date later in the year. He is remaining in London for the next two or three weeks, and this will enable him to clear up some arrears of work that have accumulated. Week-end trips, under prevailing conditions, make a serious inroad into one's time, and as War conditions necessitate his doing everything connected with the paper single-handed, to say nothing of other work in connection with the Movement, a little break will be agreeable.

Mr. Lloyd lectures to-day (October 20) in the Waverley Hall, St. Mary's Road, Southampton. The meetings are held in the morning at 11 and evening at 7. We hope that local "saints" will do their best to see that the hall is crowded on both occasions.

We are again receiving complaints from readers who are unable to get their copies regularly from their newsagents. We shall be obliged if, in addition to writing us, they will insist upon being supplied with what they order. No excuse should be entertained. The copies can be obtained, and it is the fault of either the newsagent or the wholesale agent when they are not forthcoming.

We believe we have partly to thank our growing sales for this. Newsagents find their sales increasing, and the wholesale man is careless of increasing his order, and so some are left without enough copies. We trust our readers will help us to overcome this difficulty. They will be pleased to learn that the circulation of the Freethinker steadily grows. We have made substantial progress towards adding a second thousand increase to our weekly circulation, and we have some hopes, with the help of our friends, of starting on the third thousand early in the New Year. Considering this is War time, we have every reason to feel gratified. But we can always do with more readers.

The Barnsley Branch of the N. S. S. is holding a meeting on Wednesday evening, October 23, at Irving's Studio, for a discussion on "The Principles of Secularism." The meeting opens at 7.30 p.m., and we hope that all Freethinkers in Barnsley and district will make an effort to attend, as one purpose of the gathering is to organize the work in the district. All who can co-operate to this end should write Mr. H. Irving, 48 Sheffield Road, Barnsley, Yorks.

Freethought is developing well in England, there has been quite an outburst in South Wales, and now we have signs of movement in Ireland. We have had several letters lately from Ireland from correspondents saying they have recently "made the acquaintance" of the Freethinker, and how pleased they are with it. Meeting the Freethinker is not quite such an accident as these correspondents assume, as we naturally included Ireland in our general plan of operations for advancing the interests of the cause. When the War is over we hope to see a very definite Freethought advance in Ireland. Meanwhile we are glad to see signs of an awakening.

We are asked to announce that our contributor, "Keridon," lectures to-day (Oct. 20) before the Sheffield Ethical Society on "Theology; the Art of Squaring the Circle, or Solving the Insoluble." The lecture will be delivered at 6.30 in the Builders' Exchange, Cross Burgess Street. Sheffield Freethinkers will please note.

The Manchester City News of October 12 devotes a leading article to a review of Mr. Cohen's Christianity and Slavery. It calls it "a powerful and poignant work," containing an "overwhelming mass of facts," and adds that the whole forms "a terrible indictment" supplied "from history." Christianity and Slavery is evidently a work that was wanted. It is selling more rapidly than anything that has been published for years.

There is a new regulation that all Civil Servants must take the oath of allegiance. We have had some inquiries on the matter, and desire to say that the right to affirm holds in every case where an oath is required by law. Freethinkers in the Civil Service may therefore insist upon their right under the Oaths Act of 1888.

Religion and Life.

BY E. LYTTELTON.

SIR,—What you have written about our each holding a theory explains that part of the position sufficiently, and I will pass on to your challenge as to my repudiation of other gods as nonsense, and the use of the word "myth." Your last paragraph shows quite clearly where we stand, but I am doubtful if I can reach it in the present letter.

Yes, I should agree that the early statements made in the childhood of nations generally took the form of myths. But the word does not mean simply untrue and therefore worthless, but a story expressing an idea more or less valuable. You have read Homer's Iliad containing some immortal passages about the Trojan War? How much of the framework of the story is true? Nobody knows and very few care much. The historical truth of the framework is the least important question concerning it. Again, suppose you want to teach a child a moral lesson and construct a really good allegory skilfully, enforcing just the principle you want to convey, are you to call that allegory true or not? You would have to distinguish between the view of life presented and the framework or setting—much the least important part of the whole. Thus, the early chapters of Genesis are mythical; but if the principles or deep views of life taught by them are lofty, I should not like to dub them as untrue. A myth appears to be a way of expressing an idea natural to childhood.

Your challenge takes the following form: Dr. Lyttelton's fault lies in speaking of "God" as though it stood for some understood thing such as gravitation or natural selection. But "God" in the abstract is to me nothing. This criticism assumes that the word God expresses no more to me than it does to you. But supposing it means nothing to you that is surely no proof that it means nothing to everybody else.

Again, supposing my idea, or conception, or impression of God is real, does it follow that it would be explicable to another? In other words, there is no warrant for saying that A's knowledge of everything must be transferable to B or else be an hallucination. More than once you have implied the contrary, if I mistake not; anyhow, many writers do. Let us examine this point.

I presume you would agree that you and I have knowledge of other persons C, D, E, F, and so on. Supposing C and D are my friends, E and F are yours, and that for some reason I were anxious to convey to you my knowledge of C and D in return for your conveying to me your knowledge of E and F. Nothing either of us could say or do would go more than a very little way towards accomplishing the object. Nay, more: if C and D were people of what we call great personality, I might know them for years, and yet feel perfectly certain that there is much in them which remains to be discovered, but which I never shall discover in this world. If it were not so they would not be in the least interesting. As it is they are interesting as persons chiefly because there is a good deal, quite undefinable in amount, which is mysterious in them. Do you remember George Eliot's story called "Lifting the Veil" which turns on this fact, and I never heard that anyone disputed it.

Therefore, if you asked me to explain what I meant when I spoke of C and D, I should say I really cannot tell you unless you first make their acquaintance. Then we might have some interesting talk about them, but always as explorers.

Now, if that is true about great human personalities, and even of lesser ones, what can we say of an Infinite Person?

At this point I can imagine your saying, "Now he is talking about what he does not and cannot understand." Well, let us be careful how we use that word understand. Does a child of six understand his father? I doubt it. He certainly doesn't comprehend him, but equally certain he knows him, and that his knowledge is ever growing, especially if his relation to him is filial and affectionate. If he understands anything of him, it is very little, and if he were to sit in judgment on any of his father's actions, he would be a little monster, and not a child. If this is so, can we not know God, though He be infinitely beyond our comprehension?

But perhaps you bar the idea of Infinity. You may say it conveys nothing to you, and you may be right; but I fancy it conveys as much to you as to anyone. What do you conceive of the region on which your eye falls between the stars? Is it bounded or not? At any rate, if it is nothing to you, does that prove it does not represent a truth when a man of the colossal intellectual power of Pascal or Paul of Tarsus and a host of others were full of it?

Let me tell you a story about a great man whom I feel sure you hold in high honour, T. H. Huxley. He was once walking with an eminent Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, a man of acute brain power, and a Christian; and Huxley suddenly asked him a question in some such words as these: You are a clear thinking man, and well worth talking to on deep topics. Tell me how it is that all these religious notions which to me are nothing, are all the world to you? The answer was: Don't you think it is possible that in matters beyond the evidence of the senses, it may be that some people are afflicted with spiritual colour-blindness? Huxley's answer was nobly candid and true: Yes, he said, I suppose that is possible; and if I were afflicted in that way, I shouldn't know it.

Now, Sir, I do not mean to say that these words apply to those who think with you, because there are obviously spiritual truths which you not only believe, but live and move in them; and what I hope to go on to next time is to show that intellectual consistency forbids you to stop where you do stop, or rather try to stop; but beckon you on to certain beliefs which at present seem to you nonsensical, but which I firmly believe are wrapped up in the convictions you already hold and acknowledge. It is not a matter of trying to prove you wrong; but what I shall ask is that you attentively consider whether you are right in saying that the belief in the existence of God is to you unmeaning; further, whether, if so, that gives you the warrant for supposing that it must be unmeaning for every other thoughtful mind, or will be before long.

It will be necessary, too, for me to anticipate a misgiving which will have occurred to you already. You are expecting me to say something about faith being above reason: the kind of talk that galls some people sadly. I will therefore explain what I mean by faith before bringing it into the discussion. It is not what a schoolboy is supposed to have said about it. "Faith is a power of believing what you know is not true." The same authority tackled Hope and Charity in a similar strain. "Hope is the power of expecting what you know won't happen. Charity is giving away what you don't want." At present I will only say these definitions are not adequate, but that I have something better to talk about.

Whoever degrades another degrades me,
And whatever is said or done returns at last to me.
—Walt Whitman.

A Naturalist's Paradise.

Those favoured islands of the far eastern seas, Borneo, Sumatra, Java, and Celebes, were revealed to the Western World as biological treasure regions by Alfred Russel Wallace in his fascinating Malay Archipelago. Borneo is not only the largest island in the Malay region, but is one of the greatest islands on our globe, and has about five times the area of England and Wales. Yet, although encircled by isles of volcanic origin, Borneo betrays meagre evidence of volcanic commotion, and its deposits consist of ancient accumulations of igneous substances and of water-laid strata.

In 1912 two handsome and well-illustrated volumes from the pens of Dr. C. Hose and Professor McDougall were published under the title of The Pagan Tribes of Borneo. Still later, in 1916, the posthumous fragment of Robert Shelford, A Naturalist in Borneo, was presented to the reading public by Professor E. B. Poulton, the distinguished Oxford biologist.

At the early age of three, Shelford met with an accident which led to tubercular disease of the hip-joint, and the boy was doomed to lie on his back for several years. When ten years old, a painful operation was conducted, and he afterwards left his couch. Despite his lameness, he led an active life, and lived long enough to be esteemed as one of the most promising naturalists of the day. Born at Singapore in 1872, he died after an agonizing illness at the age of forty in 1912. Shelford's premature death was deplored, writes Professor Poulton, > by a wide circle of friends interested in the most varied sides of natural history, all of whom felt not only a keen sense of personal loss, but also the loss to the science to which they had devoted their lives. We in Oxford retain grateful memories of pleasant years spent in hard work and constant friendly intercourse, and his efficient control of the Sarawak Museum, and bright and attractive, many-sided personality, will be long remembered in Borneo.

Shelford enjoyed special advantages during his sojourn in Borneo for acquiring knowledge of the flora and fauna of that earthly paradise. As Curator of the Museum at Kuching, Sarawak, he was afforded the fullest facilities for collecting specimens from distant parts of the State. The white Rajah then ruling British Borneo—Sir Charles Brooke the second—was ably supported by the other officials at Sarawak in his ambition to secure a valuable and important Museum of Natural History. Moreover, Rajah Brooke ordained the restriction of the exhibits to the plants, animals, and ethnography of Borneo. Overlapping and confusion were thus avoided, and a splendid collection of permanent interest both to Europeans and natives has been established. Yet this praiseworthy achievement has met with characteristic national disregard. As Shelford mordantly notes:—

> Although foreign countries have been quick in expressing gratitude for the services he (Sir Charles Brooke) has rendered to naturalists visiting his country, the debt has never been acknowledged by a single English learned society.

Kinabalu, Borneo's principal mountain, rises to an altitude of 14,000 feet. This is a solitary eminence, and the remaining mountainous masses form ranges whose peaks sometimes attain an elevation of 10,000 feet above ocean level. With a copious rainfall, the island's river systems are extensive, and the largest stream of all, the Kapuas, flows from its source in Central Borneo for about 700 miles to the sea. The leading watercourses rise from the central highlands, and run north, south, east, and west towards the coast. As they wander to the ocean, the streams transport immense quantities of alluvium, which forms a marshy belt that almost everywhere surrounds the island.

Until recent geological times, the present island of Borneo was attached to the continent of Asia, and constituted its south-eastern extremity. In addition to geological proofs of this, the faunal kinships between Borneo and the adjacent continent provide powerful testimony to this truth. The quite modern separation of Borneo from the Asiatic mainland is indicated by the large array of Asiatic organisms still dwelling there. These include, among numerous others, the elephant, rhinoceros, wild cattle, swine and deer, various cats such as the civet and tiger cats, porcupine, little black bear, the flying lemur, several monkeys, and two manlike apes. Some of these mammals are also found in Sumatra, and the evidence supplied by their distribution clearly indicates the recent isolation of both Borneo and Sumatra from the neighbouring land mass, and the still later division of one original island into two.

The climate of Borneo is hot and moist. Rain descends very freely throughout the year, but the wettest season extends from October to February, while the finest period is that of April and May. Speaking from a quarter of a century's experience, Dr. Hose states that the average annual rainfall in Kuching totals 160 inches. But 225 inches fell in one year, while, in another, 102 inches only were recorded:—

> The greatest rainfall recorded in one day was 15 inches. The temperature hardly, if ever, reaches 100° F.; it ranges normally between 70° and 90° F. The highest reading in one year (1906) at Kuching was 94°, the lowest 69°. Snow and frost are unknown, except occasionally on the summits of the highest mountains.

The whole of this great island forms one vast forest. The mountains are mantled with diminutive trees and masses of moss. In the dense forests of the plains and valleys tall and majestic trees soar to a height of 150 or even 200 feet. Below these giants there flourishes a luxuriant undergrowth of smaller trees which await their turn to replace the older ones when these fall, while creepers, palms, and ferns of almost infinite variety strive and struggle for existence in their sylvan environment. Nearly 500 species of forest trees furnish superior timber, and yield most nourishing fruits, such as the mango, many varieties of bananas, the durian, and numerous others. The rattan and bamboo, however, provide the native peoples with the main materials for their habitations and arts. Several forest plants yield gutta-percha. Wild sago is usually abundant; rubber is extracted from the sap of a creeping plant, while some of the orchids excel in beauty those even of South America. The Bornean pitcher plants are justly celebrated for their splendour, and the gigantic Raffiesia found in the island is the largest flower in the world.

The birds of Borneo are extremely rich in species, and volumes would prove necessary for their detailed description. Many remarkable forms are special to the island, and this is also true of several mammals, including three species of our relatives, the apes and monkeys.

Reptile life is strongly represented by huge ferocious crocodiles, various lizards and tortoises, and over seventy species of snakes, the thirty-foot long python among them. The streams teem with edible fish. The insect order contains countless genera and species, and all observers have noted that at sunset the Bornean forest becomes clamorous when the ever noisy cicadas are joined by the croaking of frogs, and the humming, droning, whirring, and other sounds of innumerable insects which combine to make the evening hideous to all but the most hardened listener.

(To be continued). T. F. Palmer.

Notes From Scotland.

The Rev. G. S. Peebles, Uddingston, says if we are to have Sunday Evening Services at all, then they ought to be better attended. Is this another testimony to the intense religious fervour in Scotland, of which we heard from the House of Commons, or is it a common wail all over the country?

We have been having quite a number of harvest thanksgiving services of late. If we thank God for the bountiful crops, who should we curse for the rain that has spoiled them?

Scotch farmers are now becoming sensible. A good many of them took advantage of the fine weather last Sunday to secure their crops.

Are the religious clauses in the Scottish Education Bill to be the means of the whole Bill being dropp d? It looks very much like it at present; and perhaps that would not be the worst fate that could befall it.

"The Whigamore bullets ken unco little discretion, and will just as sune knock oot the harns o' a psalm-singing auld wife as a swearing dragoon."—Cuddie at Drunclog, in Old Mortality.

Why do our teachers, as a body, not let their opinions be known regarding the teaching of the Bible and Shorter Catechism in school. I have never yet met a teacher who approves of the latter, yet they go on teaching it. Are they afraid to offend the clergy, who are generally to be found as members of the Board? Fancy teaching children of seven years of age "Thou shalt not commit adultery"!

Is it not now time the Secularists in Edinburgh, Dundee, and Aberdeen were forming themselves into Branches of the N. S. S.? I am sure they are numerous enough in each of these towns. Perhaps next time our President comes North, meetings might be arranged for the purpose of forming new Branches.

MIND AND MATTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—I think (judging from your "Answers to Correspondents") in the September 29 issue that one of your correspondents, Mr. T. C. Langridge, has been raising the point that the distinctive colouration on some species of animals, e.g., butterflies, so far from making them invisible, makes them prominent, and that this involves a refutation of some evolutionary theories. If he has you might bring the following to his notice, or, in any case, it would be worth printing.

In Science Progress for July there is an essay on the colouration of animals, and the author shows that all the so-called prominent colourations of animals are not at all prominent to animals, as their colour-vision is extremely different from our own. In fact, most of the markings are such as render the animal invisible to others.

May I say a few words on the subject of the "Mind and Matter" correspondence. I entirely approve of what Mr. E. J. Hirst has to say on this subject, save that he seems to make the difficulties in the way of a Materialist explanation of mind on the same level as those in other explanations.

It is true that Materialism has not explained what consciousness is, but those who believe in a soul can draw no comfort from this, for, beyond assuming something else to experience things, it can no more explain the process of experiencing than Materialism. Indeed, it is the triumph of Materialism that it recognizes that consciousness is a process.

However, the soul theory has to face difficulties that are not present in Materialism. Suppose we grant that there is a soul, and that it has "made up its mind" to do an action. For that action to be done certain material actions have to take place in the nerves. Hence, at some point the soul has to make matter move in a way that it would not do before, i.e., it has to perform an exceedingly clever and complex miracle without knowing that it is doing so, and without being aware of the particles it has set in motion.

The behaviour of the particles of matter would also be directly against the laws of nature.

Sir Oliver Lodge has seen this difficulty, and has shown that it would be possible for a miracle to take place without breaking the laws of conservation of momentum and energy, but he quite ignored the fact that these are not the only laws of nature, and that a miracle must of necessity break at least one law.

R. H. Nisbet.

THE TASK OF FREETHOUGHT.

Sir,—Like your correspondent, "J. F. Rayner," I am also of opinion that it would be better if the N. S. S. had a constructive as well as a destructive policy. The objects of Secularism and the beliefs of Freethinkers are so often contorted by Christians that it is sometimes difficult to convince those who are seeking after truth that Secularism is superior to Christianity.

There is really a want of ceremony about the opening and closing of our meetings. This may not appeal to some, but there are others who, I think, would appreciate a little ceremony. Many people go to church solely for their love of music. Were nothing more than a sermon to be heard there, I am afraid the attendance would be meagre in the extreme. If this be an admitted fact, why should the N. S. S. not adopt means to draw this section of the community to its fold?

I think every meeting of the N. S. S. should be opened by the recitation of a creed on something like the following lines: "I believe that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. I know nothing of divine guidance or interference. I regard happiness as man's proper aim and utility as his moral guide. I believe that progress is only possible through liberty, and I believe in equal freedom of thought, speech, and action to all."

Views and Opinions.

God and the Savage.

There is no lack of gods in the world. Indeed, there never has been a shortage in that direction. Man, to follow Montaigne, who cannot make a flea, has nevertheless made gods by the score. He has made them in all shapes and sizes, colours and qualities. That wonderful procession of the gods in Flaubert's St. Antony by no means exhausts the list; it is only a sample from bulk. And from what resulted this extraordinary creative human activity? If I read Dr. Lyttelton's article aright in last week's Freethinker, primitive man was a philosopher struggling to express a great idea by means of a consciously devised fable or myth. Hence, in criticizing primitive presentations, we have to penetrate beyond their verbal form or face value to the deeper truth they embody. In this way all religions are true, because all religions embody truth. Our task is to get rid of the form in which the religion is presented to us, and hold on to the residual essential facts. This, I admit, is a theory that would save the religious idea. My only objection to it is that, in my judgment, it is quite wrong.

Getting Down to Facts.

Let us settle down to a few facts. Religion does not begin amongst civilized peoples; it does not root itself in developed knowledge. Civilized people never discover gods—they inherit them. Whether the gods express a fact or embody a truth or not, it is a fact that the belief in gods begins with people who were in the worst possible position to know what the truth was. The belief in spirits, in gods, in the supernatural, commences with the primitive savage. Of that there can be no question. And who was, or who is, for that matter, the primitive savage? On that again, information is easily accessible. The savage is not a philosopher—in our sense of the word; he is not curious about the causes of phenomena; he is not in the least concerned with presenting profound truths to others in the form of allegory or fable; he is, in short, a very matter-of-fact, incurious, ignorant person—very fearful of gods and ghosts, but neither loving them nor desiring them. His only desire is to keep on good terms with them. And his belief in these gods and ghosts is based upon a plain misunderstanding of things, the truth of which becomes apparent to later generations. When the savage says that a man tossing about in a fit of epilepsy is under the control of an evil spirit, he is not formulating an allegory—he is expressing what is to him a sober statement of fact. All the things around him, which are similarly explained, are equally statements of fact. Early religious beliefs are not fables, or myths, or allegories; they are statements of apparent fact. They become fables and myths and allegories to a later generation, which takes all the facts upon which the religious idea is based, and explains them in a completely non-religious manner. The curious thing is, that while the conception of the world upon which the religious idea is based is rejected, we still have the idea with us. In other words, we reject the world of the savage as false, but we retain a conclusion based upon admittedly false pretences. And man calls himself a rational being!

Error or Allegory?

Dr. Lyttelton says he would "agree that the early statements made in the childhood of nations generally took the form of myths." In that case, he would certainly not be agreeing with me. For to the people originating these religious "myths," they are not myths at all. They are as much statements of fact as are our own concerning the nature of an electrical disturbance or the motion of the earth round the sun. (There is a later stage at which myths may be consciously fabricated; but I am now concerned only with primitive thought.) Naturally, if we want to teach a child a lesson, we may construct an allegory with sole reference to the idea to be enforced. But that is a case of an instructed person teaching an uninstructed one. But with the savage all are uninstructed. Everything has to be learned; everyone has to learn. And it is surely approaching the absurd to assume that men who made the most grotesque blunders about common facts and everyday experiences should have deliberately concocted myths conveying profound moral and "spiritual" truths. Not to understand the body, but to know about the soul; not to understand man, but to know about God; to be completely ignorant of this world, but to be informed about some other state of existence, is a decidedly remarkable achievement. The truth to me is that religious myths are primitive errors. They represent man's first blundering attempts to understand the world in which he lived. And the endeavour to read into these primitive errors some profound moral truth is an attempt to put modern ideas into the brain of the primitive savage. Of course, it can be done, but so could one convert into a profound spiritual allegory Old Mother Hubbard or Jack the Giant Killer. And if these stories had by some chance appeared in the Bible there is not the slightest doubt but that their transformation would have occurred.

"God."

We are told that in saying the word "God" is used as though it stood for some understood thing, I am assuming that it expresses no more to Dr. Lyttelton than it does to me. Well, I certainly intended nothing of the kind. I do not know what Dr. Lyttelton means by God; he has not yet told me. I know what is meant by the God of the Bible, or of the Westminster Confession, because in these cases what is meant by God is set forth. My complaint was that in the absence of a definition God means nothing to me, and as under the usual conditions it means little more to others, it is a source of confusion to talk about "God" as though it had a settled meaning, such as gravitation or natural selection. Observe it is not here a question of completely understanding a thing (I doubt if we completely understand anything) so much as knowing what it is we are to try and understand. In the case of the child and its parents, the child knows there is something to understand. In the case of "God" that there is something to understand is the very question at issue. It is not understanding that is at issue here, but existence. And if Dr. Lyttelton can make clear the existence of his "God" all the rest will be a voyage of fellow-believers trying to know more about the subject. At present the difficulty is that we do not know there is anything about which to know. We are in the position of trying to understand what a thing is without knowing whether it exists.

A Restatement.

For the sake of clarity we may sum up the matter thus: What are called religious myths are fundamentally forms of primitive error. In a world of which he knows nothing, and concerning which the only way of learning is by experience, primitive man arrives at certain conclusions concerning natural happenings. These conclusions are expressed in terms of life and intelligence. Gradually a more accurate knowledge about things leads to the primitive animistic theory being discarded in one direction after another. But by that time religion has become an established social fact. It has gathered around it the support of vested interests and of various sentiments. The consequence is, not a complete and logical rejection of the religious idea, but an attempt to import into the primitive theory of things something that was not originally there. The religious explanation, wholly discredited and discarded, becomes the religious myth, and into that myth the modern apologetic mind reads its own feelings, ideas, and aspirations. That, as I have said, may be done equally well with any fable that one likes to take in hand. That it is done with Jonah and the Whale, or the Adam and Eve story in Eden, and not with Little Jack Horner or Old Mother Hubbard, is due to accident of position. Had these stories been in the Bible, I haven't the least doubt but they would have provided texts for hundreds of sermons, and afforded spiritual nourishment to thousands of thirsty souls.

TESTING OUR GODS.

A poor man, in our day, has many gods foisted on him; and big voices bid him, "Worship, or be ——," in a menacing and confusing manner. What shall he do? By far the greater part of said gods, current in the public, whether canonized by Pope or Populus, are mere dumb Apises and beatified Prize-oxen; nay some of them, who have articulate faculty, are devils instead of gods. A poor man that would save his soul alive is reduced to the sad necessity of sharply trying his gods whether they are divine or not; which is a terrible pass for mankind, and lays an awful problem upon each man. The man must do it, however. At his own peril he will have to do this problem too, which is one of the awfulest; and his neighbours, all but a most select portion of them, portion generally not clad in official tiaras, can be of next to no help to him in it, nay rather will infinitely hinder him in it, as matters go.—Carlyle, "Latter-Day Pamphlets."

"Ignorant Worship."

II.

As St. Paul declares—men do worship—therefore there is something to worship—therefore there is God. And so this leads me to say that for us all it is a question not whether we shall worship, we are sure in some form or other to do that, but whether we shall worship ignorantly or intelligently.

That is a sample of the method of reasoning pursued by the Rev. W. Garrett Horder, of Ealing, in a sermon published in the Middlesex County Times for September 21, which is the style generally followed in the pulpit. It may satisfy an uncritical, conventional congregation; but it is essentially fallacious and of necessity unconvincing. The mere fact that many people worship furnishes no manner of proof that there is something objectively real to worship. The so-called craving for God is confined to a minority that keeps getting smaller year after year. Mr. Horder declares that its reality is denied or doubted by "people who do not think"; but Professor Leuba, of America, has proved beyond the possibility of a doubt that it is the greatest thinkers who are the greatest disbelievers. American students are rapidly becoming Atheists. Touching the investigations as to their attitude to religion, the Professor observes:—

> The deepest impression left by these records is that, so far as religion is concerned, our students are grovelling in darkness. Christianity, as a system of belief, has utterly broken down, and nothing definite, adequate, and convincing has taken its place. Their beliefs, when they have any, are superficial and amateurish in the extreme. 'There is no generally acknowledged authority; each one believes as he can, and few seem disturbed at being unable to hold the tenets of the Churches (The Belief in God and Immortality, p. 213).

The most significant fact is that, in proportion as progress in education takes place, the number of disbelievers increases. Another deeply symptomatic fact is that "in every class of persons investigated, the number of believers in God is less, and in most classes very much less than the number of non-believers," and that "among the more distinguished, unbelief is very much more frequent than among the less distinguished." On this point Professor Leuba sums up as follows:—

> The students' statistics show that young people enter college possessed of the beliefs still accepted, more or less perfunctorily, in the average home of the land, and that as their mental powers mature and their horizon widens, a large percentage of them abandon the cardinal Christian beliefs. It seems probable that on leaving college, from 40 to 45 per cent. of the students with whom we are concerned deny or doubt the fundamental dogmas of the Christian religion. The marked decrease in belief that takes place during the later adolescent years, in those who spend those years in study under the influence of persons of high culture, is a portentous indication of the fate which, according to our statistics, increased knowledge and the possession of certain capacities leading to eminence reserve to the beliefs in a personal God and in personal immortality (Ibid, pp. 280-1).

We are convinced that what is true of American students is, to say the least, equally true of the same class in our own country, and that, generally speaking, unbelief among men of science is fully as rife here as there. It is well known that many of the most influential professors in our British Universities are non-believers in a personal God as well as in the Christian religion. Mr. Horder is, therefore, radically mistaken when he says that we are all sure, in one form or another, to be worshippers, and with that statement, the other, "Therefore there is a God," inevitably falls to the ground.

This popular Congregational minister, addressing Christian believers, pronounces the Christian conception of God the highest and best; but evidently he does not realize that in doing this he is representing the Divine Being as the creation of the people who worship him. According to him, the chief defect of Hinduism is the bewildering multiplicity of its deities, and the same fault characterizes the religions of Pagan Greece and Rome. With an air of conscious superiority he adds: "Well, this must have been perplexing, to say the least. Polytheism deserves the epithet of St. Paul—of ignorantly worshipping." Buddhism is condemned because originally it had no God at all, and because now it "provides itself with many objects of worship for the eye, if it still claims there is no God for the mind," which is "neither quite satisfactory nor intelligent." Mohammedanism comes in for a word of praise because it "offers one God—one God only—with no idol of any kind to picture him to the eye," which is described as "good—very good." But the Mohammedan Deity will not do at all, because, though exceedingly great, he is forbiddingly hard. Confucianism is dismissed because it substitutes the worship of ancestors for that of a Supreme Being. "Confucius tried indeed to meet the great human craving with an Ethic—a morality without religion. And the heart wants more than that. And so I suppose it may be said Confucianism is a fading faith." Mr. Horder then adds:—

> And so I might go over all the faiths of the world—and you would feel, as St. Paul did, that there was needed the declaration of something better. All the faiths of the world had elements which met certain needs, but not all the needs, of the human heart—and therefore something better was wanted. And St. Paul felt that he had that better faith to declare. To his mind Christianity came to meet all the cravings of humanity, as these other faiths had met only certain of them, or met them only imperfectly.

With all due deference to the reverend gentleman, we venture to remind him that his compendium of the characteristics of non-Christian faiths is not only "a poor substitute for seeing the religions themselves and their effects," but also unfair, inaccurate, and misleading. He expresses a wish that they could all be displayed in their true character and effects before our eyes; but is he not aware that in London there are accredited representatives of all of them, who would, doubtless, welcome the opportunity of stating their respective claims, and who would certainly challenge the accuracy of the reverend gentleman's summaries? In any case, is it not a somewhat cowardly action to decry other religions in the absence of their official defenders? Has Mr. Horder forgotten that at the beginning of the seventeenth century there was every likelihood of Christianity becoming the religion of the State in Japan, and that such a consummation was prevented by the bitter jealousies and rivalries between the different orders among its missionaries? In our own time desperate efforts are being put forth to force Christianity upon China in defiance of the fact that heathen China is morally and socially fully equal, if not superior, to Christian Europe.

Mr. Horder closes his interesting discourse with a perfervid panegyric of the Christian God as an object of worship. The eulogium is exceedingly eloquent and touching. It would be extremely difficult to improve upon it. We are offered an object of worship created in the image and after the likeness of an ideally good man endowed with the impossible attributes of infinitude and omnipotence. In other words, the Christian God is, as Matthew Arnold used to say, a magnified, non-natural, impossible man, and, of necessity, non-existent. The worship of such a Being cannot possibly produce either an individual or a nation of the purest and noblest character, because the powers with which he is clothed are wholly imaginary, like himself. He is declared to be sitting as king for ever; but that declaration is true only in the imagination of the pious. In the control of human affairs he has never had any more to do than the man in the moon. He is called the God of love and of peace, who doeth according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth; but in history he has never once made himself known. Here the powers of good and of evil have been at perpetual strife, victory falling now to the one and now to the other, the Prince of Peace having not yet begun to reign. What has God been doing through all the centuries, and, above all, what is he doing at the moment? Absolutely nothing because he is but an idol set up in the sanctuary of the religious imagination. His creators can do what they like with him both in public and in private; but he remains for ever silent and inactive, neither confirming nor protesting against anything they say or do. All parties to the present War passionately appeal to him for victory, but the fighting goes on year after as if he were not.

J. T. Lloyd.

The Exploitation of Death.

> We are such stuff
> As dreams are made of, and our little life
> Is rounded with a sleep. —Shakespeare.

"The angel of death is abroad in the land; you can almost hear the beating of his wings," said John Bright, addressing a hushed and troubled House of Commons at the time of the Crimean War. The words of the great orator come back to-day, when death has been the visitor at so many homes. One, whom we knew, who was near and dear to us, who moved in our little circle, has been met by "the fell sergeant, Death." And the mind circles ceaselessly around the labyrinths of life, that all lead in one direction, into the silent land, whither he whom we knew, he whose hand we touched but yesterday, has gone, never to return.

Since the dawn of the Christian era the fear of death and of pain has increased among the dwellers in the great cities. Fear of death scarcely exists among Asiatics, because, living in the open, their experience tells them that death and life are ever entwined in a struggle for mastery; that the victorious soldier of to-day is the corpse of to-morrow. Under Asiatic skies death is regarded as no less benign than birth, and the shadowy figure with the scythe is not to be feared as an enemy. Dwellers in towns necessarily acquire their knowledge of Nature from books, or from superficial and fleeting observation. For five months in every year Nature is represented in the towns by fog, rain, and snow, and the necessity for fires and artificial lighting. Dwellers in mean streets have no chance of meditating on the rigid processes of natural law.

The clergy exploit this ignorance. Death is, according to these pastors and masters, the "king of terrors." They heighten the effect by appealing to the fears of their hearers, and use the Devil and his fearful pyrotechnics as a lever. The terror such stories inspire is largely owing to the gross ignorance which surrounds the subject of death. Men fear it, like children do the dark, through not knowing what it is. The fear of the night can be dissipated by a little light. Death would be no bugbear if it were known better. And nobody is there to tell people, except a small number of devoted Freethinkers, who are anathema to all the Churches of Christendom. The sermons from the clergy, archaic in thought and inflated with nonsense, deal in generalities and exaggerations. "The wages of sin is death" is their idea of wisdom. The clergy is hopelessly out of touch with modern man and common sense. Hence the Churches are emptying of men. The "cure of souls" is passing into the physician's hands with the cure of the body. For it is now admitted that a healthy body and a healthy mind go together.

Why should men fear death? It is only our nightly sleep prolonged, without a waking. Shakespeare, the supreme genius of literature, has told us that "our little life is rounded with a sleep." Sleep! All that the human fancy can conceive of refreshing and delightful things is comprised in that gentle word. Poets in all ages and in all countries have sung its praises, but of all tributes uttered on this subject, the most striking, probably, is that which Cervantes puts in the mouth of the stout philosopher, Senor Sancho Panza: "Sleep! It covers a man all over, thoughts and all, like a cloak. It is meat for the hungry, drink for the thirsty, heat for the cold, and cold for the hot." Notice how the grand old Pagans look death in the face without flinching. Epicurus says proudly: "Why should we fear death? For where death is, there are we not; and where we are, there death is not." No less emphatic is Marcus Aurelius, who bids us regard death as a friend:—

> What is it to die? If we view it by itself, and stripped of those imaginary terrors in which our fears have dressed it, we shall find it to be nothing more than the mere work of Nature; but it is childish folly to be afraid of what is natural. Nay, it is not only the work of Nature, but is conducive to the good of the universe, which subsists by change.

Modern science shows that the Pagans are right. Sir Henry Halford, towards the close of his medical career, said few of his patients, in the last hours, exhibited signs of severe suffering. Sir Benjamin Brodie, the famous surgeon, stated that the mere act of dying is seldom, in any sense of the word, a painful process. The great anatomist, Sir William Hunter, bore his own dying testimony. Just before he died he whispered to his friend, Dr. Combe: "If I had strength enough to hold a pen, I would write how easy and pleasant a thing it is to die."

For thousands of years priests have chanted the old sad refrain of death as an enemy, but the Freethinker listens to far other strains. Death is the universal law of Nature, which befalls all living beings, though the majority encounter it sooner than man. After centuries of pious stupor, the world is rubbing its eyes and beginning to awake, and the priests are beginning to be found out. The wheels of progress may move slowly, but they do move. Those who drive her triumphal car through the shining fields of the world's to-morrow shall look back and see, far in the rear, a discredited ecclesiasticism. The hope that an ignorant and superstitious minority can always bend the intellectuals to its will is sheer illusion. The terror of death is passing away, because the Christian religion is decaying.

HIGHEST AND BEST.

The appeal to what is highest and best in men does not pay; a seeming appeal to what is highest and best does. I suppose the wealthiest corporations in the world are the Roman, the Greek, the Lutheran, and the Anglican churches. As a trade, as an art, Religion pays; but whenever there is an actual attempt to transcend, the crucifix and the stake are ready: ostracism for the man of independent means, death by starvation for the poor man, are prompt and inevitable.

—John Davidson.

Modern Methods of Salving the "Soul."

A few weeks ago a friend sent me a copy of Dr. McDougall's little primer on physiological psychology in Dent's series, inviting my special attention to his pathetic plea, on behalf of his fantastic "soul" theory, for a fuller recognition of the value of psychic research under the disguise of the euphemistic phrase, "new empirical evidence."

Long before, however, I had reached the end of even the introduction I had found that the author was out on a mission, for he had in this little book taken out his "soul" dogma from under the "bushel" of philosophic terminology and had put it upon the "candle-stick" of common speech so that all might see and be illumined by its metaphysical "light." So long as his views were confined to larger works the peril arising from his reactionary efforts was not such as to cause alarm, for it was more or less confined to cultured people who had sufficient knowledge to weigh his dogmatic pronouncements and estimate them at their true value. But, in the case of a primer, the matter wears an aspect far more alarming. His new and much wider circle of readers will consist largely of youth drawn from the rising generation whose adolescent minds are undisciplined, unfurnished, and unsuspicious, but thirsting for knowledge, and very susceptible to "authority" as sufficient guarantee of the truth of dogmatic pronouncements, and gratuitous assumptions.

This primer has, obviously, a two-fold object—to teach psychology and to inculcate, or at least to sow the seed of, a "soul" doctrine. And without straining the evidence it is quite justifiable to infer that the author regards the latter as the more important mission of the two. For there was no occasion for obtruding his "soul" theory on the attention of his readers. To do so in a small science primer on physiological psychology was useless, irrelevant, and superfluous—an entirely supererogatory task that vitiates an otherwise excellent primer.

He, moreover, displays that instinctive acuteness of vision possessed by insects in the detection of appropriate places for depositing their eggs; he never misses a promising opportunity of dropping a seed of his "soul" theory. And it must be admitted that he possesses rare aptitude for the task. Even if he were a professional dialectitian he could not be more proficient in the art of engendering belief in the minds of his readers, and observe more faithfully their cardinal rule—assume what you cannot prove, and discuss its alleged attributes and traits; make a liberal use of question-begging terms, phrases, epithets, and queries; deliver your theories, pronounce your dogmas, be oracular, and never introduce a gratuitous dogma buttressed with arguments. If, for example, you wish to engender belief in angels, do not attempt to prove their existence, but discuss their orders and functions, or the pros and cons as to whether or not they actually appeared to the soldiers at Mons. He is verily a past-master of the art of mystification. He delivers his creed with that complacent nonchalance that disarms criticism—that quiet unobtrusiveness that was never excelled by any disciple of the famous saint of Loyola.

When natural truths and principles which had an interpretative bearing upon the origin and meaning of phenomenal existence were first discovered and established, it was invariably found that they were in more or less obvious disagreement and conflict with some primitive dogma or myth of religious belief. As a natural result of this antagonism a state of war ensued between the votaries of religion and the supporters and advocates of natural knowledge. Goaded by the instincts of self-preservation, the religionists persecuted the innovators with every weapon that malicious ingenuity could devise. And the Deity, if "silence proves consent," obviously approved of the truth-suppressing policy of his priesthood, despite the fact that he himself is credited with being the fountain-head of all truth.

In the end, however, natural science prevailed and myth and dogma, one by one, lay dead or dying; and, like all things inanimate, they tended to subside beneath the waves of oblivion. But religion could not subsist without them. So something had to be done to keep them afloat on the surface of current belief; and the change of policy brought into existence a new functionary—the harmonizing apologist. His duty was to "prove" that there was in reality no contradiction, no conflict, between them. That the antagonism between myth and science was only superficial, and that it required only a little verbal manipulation of the divinely inspired records to bring the two into harmony. So gradually persecution relaxed its methods; it abandoned its barbaric savagery and brutality, and confined its methods to calumny and abuse, and to social ostracism and boycott. And the harmonizer was duly installed in place of the holy inquisitor to keep the contents of the Christian creed floating on the surface as orthodox belief.

Such was the antagonism between the "soul" myth and the gradually discovered fact that mind was the function of the cerebral system.

During the persecuting period the science of any hostile truth was ignored, scouted, and denounced in the name of God; but immediately the "salving" policy had come into vogue a complete volte face was effected. Defenders of the faith who had expert knowledge of science were soon at a premium. Intimate scientific knowledge became indispensable in order to endow the harmonizer with that authority to give his "salving platforms" the necessary buoyancy and stability. And for that reason no better man could be found than the author of Mind and Body to undertake the operation of "salving the soul."

Before we begin discussing the "barrage" he sets up in defence of his "soul" theory, let us, for an instant, glance at the predeliction and bias betrayed by a somewhat conspicuous inconsistency. He displays a considerable punctiliousness in the use of terms lest they should "commit him to theories and presuppositions." It is, if consistently observed, a most commendable practice. And more, it is a policy that one had a right to expect from the author of Mind and Body, and a Fellow of the Royal Society. But alas! he belies his solicitude in almost the very breath with which he avows it. While demurring to using quite innocent psychological terms he freely uses the term "soul" without a demur, apology, or any attempt at defining it. Now, if there is a term in the English language which should be avoided on account of "theoretical" implications, well, that word is "soul." It is imbued with vague notions of personality, immortality, and of "controlment of voluntary actions," besides the emotions of religious bias and sentiment with which it is swathed.

He refers to it as "common sense theory." To dignify a term embodying the superstitious ignorance of a semi-barbaric age as "theory" and as "common sense" is to betray a predeliction of some fixity and strength. And this honourable mention is not an isolated occurrence; it is his wont throughout the primer to allude to any spiritualistic pretentions which appear to harmonize with his gratuitous theory in terms as respectful as his references to established generalizations of science are uniformly disparaging.

Acid Drops.

Rev. J. T. Cox, Clerk to the Synod of Aberdeen, belongs to the good old school of theologians. We give him the same welcome that we should to a stray member of some almost extinct species. Mr. Cox naturally objects to religious instruction being permissive in the new Scotch Education Bill, and desires it to be mandatory. That, he says, is the only safeguard. It is one of the peculiarities of the situation that, although the clergy declare the people desire religious education, they will not have it unless it is forced on them. But there are some people, says Mr. Cox—Secularists and Agnostics—who object to religious education in the schools. Moreover, some of them are teachers. Here Mr. Cox rises to the occasion. His remedy is, "Clear them out of our schools. We have no use for such instructors of our children." Now, that is the "only way." Clear them out of the schools, also out of the country; that is the only way to check the growing feeling in favour of Secular Education.

The soldier, whose life was saved by a New Testament intercepting a bullet, has again turned up, this time in the Yorkshire Evening Post. The incident may be genuine, but a pack of cards would have done just as well. And we feel sure thousands of bullets must have been intercepted during the War by all sorts of things. The incident is only noticeable because of its testimony to the incurable stupidity of some people

The Daily News says that Christian Science literature is being supplied to the troops on a very generous scale. It is somewhat late in the day to apply Christian Science in the present War; but they might make a modest start in the Veterinary Department.

The Sabbatarians are unusually active in Hull, and are not only summoning tradesmen for opening on Sundays, but also including customers in the charge for aiding and abetting. Is this a part of the long-promised revival of religion?

A Bayswater clergyman says that optimists had been the curse of the nation. If one has the brains of a hen, surely it is unnecessary to advertise the fact unduly.

A newspaper paragraph states that the Corporal Correction League, which advocates the use of the hard hand on children of tender years, has the support of many clergymen. We can understand the clerical support, for these gentlemen are always flogging dead horses.

A correspondent, who signs himself "A Churchman," writes to say that he cannot understand why we continue to send the Freethinker to soldiers, as he considers it a very "one-sided" and "harmful" publication. Therefore, we "deserve to be suppressed." To demonstrate our iniquity, he encloses a cutting from the Daily Mail of October 15, containing an alleged interview with a soldier, who says there is one indispensable book for every soldier—the Bible. The character of the Daily Mail forbids our questioning the truth of this. Indeed, its veracity is evidenced by the way in which soldiers clamour for Bibles when they come home, write for them when they are abroad, and their constant reading of it in tram, train, and 'bus.

Candles have gone up in price enormously. Catholic priests will be delighted. We hope it will not mean a strike in Purgatory.

"Clerical Error" was a bold headline in a London daily paper. The accompanying letterpress referred to costing at a factory, and not to the blunders of parsons. The latter are past counting.

Says Life and Opinion, a Church of Scotland magazine, an Australian newspaper some time ago conducted a competition as to "Australia's best proverb," and the prize was given to this saying, "When your neighbour quotes Scripture, brand your calves early." It is a popular judgment on Christian profession that may well humiliate. But it is quite evident that the Australians who declared this adage to be the best must have had considerable experience behind them.

Superstitions die hard, but we did think the Mons angels were done with. Now, we really see no reason why some one should not start selling wing feathers as souvenirs. We feel sure many would purchase. At any rate, here is the Bishop of Durham, in a letter to the Spectator, saying he heard from the vicar of Crowthwaite, who heard from some British soldiers, who were told by some prisoners, how the Germans were led to retreat in 1914 because "they saw strong reinforcements" coming along. Now, the original story was not that British soldiers were seen coming, but that angels were seen in the sky. This story was confessedly manufactured by Mr. Arthur Machen, and was repeated as true, until he exposed the whole thing. Perhaps the Bishop of Durham thinks that after four years people may have forgotten its origin. What we should like to know is, does the Bishop of Durham believe it?

That such a story should be told, and believed, is enough to make one almost despair of human sanity. In any case, it is a reminder of how slight is our claim to be called a civilized people. The War itself was a challenge to that claim. The amount of credulity, hatred, lying, and brutality evidenced during these four years, whatever the qualities of a contrary character manifested; the general appeals for days of prayer, humiliation, repentance, etc., to achieve success in the War; the picture of the Prime Minister leading a procession of Members of Parliament to one of our "joss-houses" to pray for victory—like so many savages petitioning for the help of their tribal "joss"—are all evidence of how near the surface is the primitive savage. Talk about our work being done! Why, we have only just commenced. We are just making good our foothold. We have yet to tread a path broad enough for all to follow.

Many people imagined that the Devil was dead, but, on the authority of General Sir Ian Hamilton, this is not so. His Satanic Majesty is only on the retired list. The General assures us that "the Devil has had a seal set upon him that he will deceive the nations no more for a thousand years." Plainly, there is nothing to do but to disband the clergy for that period.

The Church frowns at divorce, but the public smiles at the Church. At the Divorce Court there has never been such a glut of work, no less than 935 cases being on the list for trial.

The Service Candidates' Committee has received names of 1,400 soldiers who wish to become parsons at the end of the War. Will someone tell these men of the unhappy "rural dean" who fed his family on 6½d. a meal?

The "godly" occasionally drop into evil ways. Here are two illustrations from the same issue of the News of the World. Harry Bowen, a married man, of West Bromwich, and a Sunday-school teacher, was summoned for the maintenance of an illegitimate child. The usual order was made. In the other case, a curate, of Rock Ferry, was charged with insulting behaviour towards women in Lord Street, Liverpool. Some of the evidence given by girls was of a rather startling nature. The Vicar of St. George's, Stockport, gave the accused an excellent character, but the magistrate said he never felt less doubt about any case before him. Result 40s. fine or one month.

The organist of an Isle of Wight church is also a hairdresser; so a London newspaper says. We can guess which is the better-paid employment.

The cause of the Allies' success is now given to the world. It is due neither to the strategy of Foch nor the bravery of the soldiers. On the authority of Alderman L. Pound (City London), just before the orders for the advance were given, "a bishop of the Church of England, who happened to be present," suggested to General Haig that General Headquarters should stop work and ask for divine guidance and protection. This was done, and success resulted. Now we know all about it. For no one would doubt the word of Alderman Pound.

The Dean of Carlisle is a gentleman who receives a comfortable salary for preaching the Gospel of non-resistance, and of returning good for evil. By way of showing that he earns his salary, he is reported in the Evening News of October 17 as saying that the way to stop the Germans destroying towns in their retreat is to destroy German towns. He thinks the destruction of some quarters of Berlin would be advisable. How, on earth, that will make good the damage done by the Germans we are puzzled to conceive. Punishment for those responsible for the wanton destruction of towns, we can understand, and advocate to not set about the work of destruction ourselves to show that we can be as brutal as others when occasion serves. And the advocate of this policy is a dean of the Christian Church!

The Northern Daily Telegraph reports a speech of the Vicar of Clitheroe complaining of the making of new bishops. He says that each new bishop requires the investing of over £70,000, and for that sum sixteen clergymen could be obtained. We agree that spending all this money on a bishop is a sad waste of funds; but if we are to have sixteen clergymen instead of one, we don't see how we are going to gain by not spending it on a bishop. Much better to spend it in a more reasonable manner.

The following is from a Johannesburg paper, the only reference on the cutting sent being July, 1918:—

> On Friday morning four natives were hanged at Bloemfontein gaol (says the Friend), three having been sentenced at the last Criminal Sessions for rape on a young white girl at Bethlehem, while the other one was the murderer of the warder at the Fiksburg gaol. All four died Christians. Two were Presbyterians, one Church of England, and the fourth, who was a heathen, was received into the Catholic Church at his own request a few days before he paid the penalty of the law.

We hope this striking testimony to the value of missionary work will be duly recorded in the missionary reports. For without mission work they might have died without the solace of the Christian faith.

CURSE OF INSINCERITY.

This is the sad condition of the insincere man. He is doomed all his days to deal with insincerities; to live, move, and have his being in traditions and conventionalities. If the traditions have grown old, the conventionalities will be mostly false; true in no sense can they be for him; never shall he behold the truth of any matter; formulæ, theologic, economic and other, certain superficial readings of truth, required in the market-place, these he will take with him, these he will apply dextrously, and with these he will have to satisfy himself. Sincerity shall not exist for him; he shall think that he has found it, while it is yet far away. The deep, awful and indeed divine quality of truth that lies in every object, and in virtue of which the object exists,—from his poor eyes this is for ever hidden. Not with austere divine realities which belong to the Universe and to Eternity, but with paltry, ambiguous phantasms, comfortable and uncomfortable, which belong to his own parish, and to the current week, or generation shall he pass his days.—Carlyle, "Latter-Day Pamphlets."

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

November 10, Liverpool; November 17, Birmingham; November 24, Leeds; November 27 to December 1, South Wales; December 8, Leicester; December 15, Nuneaton.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—November 3, Manchester; November 10, Sheffield; December 1, Swansea.

J. De B.—Received with thanks. We will send Freethinker with other literature to soldier as desired. For the information of other readers we may again state that we shall be glad to receive the names and addresses of soldiers and sailors to whom parcels of literature and copies of the Freethinker would be of service.

K. J.—There is really no need to apologise for the smallness of your contribution to the Sustentation Fund. We assume that those who help do so to the extent of their sympathies and circumstances. And that is all we have a right to expect. Of course, if all our readers did something we could laugh at all financial troubles due to the War. But we have no cause and no inclination to complain.

S. Clowes.—It is good of you to send along your fourth contribution to the Fund. The other matter is quite all right.

P. Murphy.—The address of the Secretary of the Liverpool Branch is: W. McKelvie, 68 St. John's Road, Waterloo, Liverpool. Mr. Cohen will be lecturing in Liverpool on November 10.

F. Jackson.—Thanks for cutting. The story might be true, but we do not care to publish it unless accompanied by stronger evidence than is supplied in the paragraph enclosed.

T. R. N.—There is no evidence, so far as we are aware, of an increase of insanity in the racial stock. There has been an increase in the number of lunatics, but that is due to the suppression of causes that served to eliminate those with a predisposition to insanity.

B. F. B.—Delays are apt to occur nowadays owing to shortage of labour and uncertainty of postal delivery. We have handed your letter to our shop manager. We appreciate your compliments concerning the Freethinker.

J. and J. M'Glashan.—In quite good time. Thanks for your appreciation and good wishes.

J. G. F. sends us 9s. for the purpose of distributing literature amongst the troops.

S. Lidgett.—We are sending one of our parcels to the address given. Hope it will do good.

W. J.—What is meant by praying in "a spirit of earnest inquiry"? Would it fill the bill if one prayed without expectation of an answer being received? And if one does expect an answer, one already believes in prayer, and proof is unnecessary.

G. Ogilvie.—We feel sure you will never be backward in doing what you can to help the Freethinker. The past four years has furnished ample proof of how many sincere friends the paper has.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The Special Conference ordered by the last General Conference will be held at Birmingham on November 13. The business of the Conference will be the consideration of a scheme of reconstruction drawn up by a Special Committee appointed for that purpose, with all amendments and suggestions that are offered. The Conference will meet in the Repertory Theatre at 10.30 and 2.30, and a public demonstration will be held in the evening. The President will occupy the chair on all three occasions.

As the business to be done at this Conference is of great interest to the future of the Society, we hope that as many members will attend as is possible, and that all Branches will make a special effort to send a delegate. Those who intend visiting the Conference should communicate with the Secretary, Miss Vance, as early as possible, so that accommodation may be secured. The earlier this is done, the better.

Birmingham friends will please note that Mr. Harry Snell lectures in the Repertory Theatre to-day (October 27), at 7 o'clock, on "Fifty Years of Darwinism: its Influence on Religion and Politics." We hope to hear that the theatre was crowded. It ought to be?

A commencement is being made with Freethought work in Pontypridd, South Wales, to-day (October 27). Mr. Saphin will lecture in the I.L.P. Hall, Graig, at 2.30. We trust that Freethinkers in the district will give the "Revival" a good start by making a special effort to be present. Mr. Cohen is hoping to visit Pontypridd towards the end of November.

Next Sunday (Nov. 3) Mr. Clifford Williams lectures at the Baths Assembly Rooms, at 7 o'clock, on "Secularism v. Christianity." The local Secretary, Mr. R. C. Hughes, 224 Lockhurst Lane, will be pleased to hear from anyone who is willing to co-operate in making the meeting successful. This will be a good occasion to give the new Coventry Branch a good send-off with its propaganda.

One of our readers tells us that after distributing some of our literature among his fellow-soldiers, one of his officers asked him to get some more literature, and they would pay for it. As a result of his propaganda, he has secured a number of new readers, and is expecting more. We hope he will not be disappointed. Meanwhile, we should be glad to hear from soldiers, either at home or abroad, who would care to receive parcels of literature, and would undertake the distribution thereof. It is good work all the time.

We are asked to announce that the Freethinker, with all publications of the Pioneer Press, can now be obtained at the Progressive Book Stall, 47 New Street, Paisley. This is one of many centres of distribution we hope to see established in the near future.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

The purpose of this Fund is to make good part of the deficit caused by the very heavy increase in the cost of paper, advance of wages, etc. A full statement on this head was made in our issue for September 1.

Eighth List of Subscriptions.

Previously acknowledged:—£392 0s. 3d. G. H. Green, 5s. W. H. Blackmore (second subscription), 5s. K. J., 2s. 6d. J. De B. and Wife, £1 1s. S. Clowes (fourth subscription), 4s. M. B., 5s. W. E. Hickman, 2s. 6d. W. Francis, 5s. A. B., 10s. J. and J. McGlashan, £2. G. Ogilvie, £1 1s. A. K. Ingarthdale, £1 1s. C. Bridger, 5s. E. Morrison, 10s. R. J. Hunter, 5s. Harold Elliott, 10s. S. Lidgett, 5s. G. B. Baillie, 10s. A. R. Richards, 3s. 6d. J. Stringer, 2s. 10d.

Per E. Pinder:—G. H. Folwell, £1. H. H. Woolley, 10s. W. Hopkins, 3s. E. Pinder, 3s. R. Wheatley, 2s. A. Martin, 2s.

Per Sec. Manchester Branch:—G. Brown, 3s. R. C. Cole, 5s. M. Greenwood, 2s. 6d. Mrs. Wilcock, 2s. 6d. Total, £404 4s. 7d.

Corrections.—"Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Browne, 5s." in our issue for October 6 should read "Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Broome." "A. W. B., £5" in our issue for October 13 should read "A. W. B. Shaw."

A Naturalist's Paradise.

II.

THAT intelligent creature, the orangutan, or maias, as the native Malays call it, is still comparatively common in Borneo, even in Sarawak itself. This ape's distribution throughout the island is, however, dependent on the course of the streams, for the animal never appears to cross any channel, even the narrowest. The orang, or maias, is now restricted to Borneo and Sumatra, although it formerly enjoyed a wider range.

Shelford unsuccessfully strove to ascertain the domestic arrangements of the maias. The animal is extremely difficult to observe in its arboreal home. Essentially a tree-dweller, it rarely descends to earth, save when in need of water, and its favourite trees root in swampy soil through which the inquisitive naturalist slowly progresses while the object of his search skips nimbly along the upper branches of the trees. Again, the investigator is seriously handicapped by the circumstance that, although a large organism, the maias is surprisingly inconspicuous in its leafy surroundings.

A fruit-eating creature, the maias wanders widely to gather food, and seldom lingers on any given spot. The rhinoceros and wild cattle of Borneo have practically disappeared, so ruthless has been their treatment. To prevent the extinction of the maias, the Sarawak authorities imposed a strict limit on the number any one collector was entitled to slay. The wholesale destruction of the island's orchids has also necessitated their protection. In their History of Sarawak, Gould and Bampfylde declare that: "Collectors would ruthlessly destroy all orchids, especially the rarer kinds, which they could not carry away, in order to prevent others from collecting them."

Dr. Hose secured an excellent photograph of the nest or couch which the maias (orang-utan) constructs in the branches of the tree in which it sleeps. This structure is little larger than a rook's nest, and is composed of leaves and twigs. Upon this arboreal bed the ape reposes on his back, and firmly clutches the nearest branches with his hands and feet. In this way the maias is supported both by the small nest and the boughs which he holds in firm embrace even in deepest slumber. Shelford possessed a young maias which always retired to rest in an empty apartment. This room contained an iron bedstead, and we are told that > on to the steel laths of this the ape would solemnly climb every evening at about 6.30; he invariably sprawled on the flat of his back, pulled over his head and chest a piece of sacking with which he was provided, and with his hands and feet got a good grip on the posts or frame of the bed. In a few minutes he would be asleep, and his snoring was so loud that he could be heard nearly all over the house.

According to the natives, the female maias, when her period of confinement approaches, arranges a great bed of branches in a trees, and remains there for several days. Most of the Bornean peoples regard this ape as an uncanny creature whose glance is unlucky, and at whom it is unwise to laugh. Both Kayans and Kenyahs view the maias with superstitious dread. Although a powerful animal, the maias is very docile unless enraged by persecution. But when infuriated the ape becomes a formidable antagonist, and will inflict serious injury even on his human enemies. In captivity the young maias proves an affectionate, entertaining, intelligent and cleanly pet. Its tricks betray numerous resemblances to the habits of small children. One of these is certainly suggestive. Shelford notes that the maias, when picking up a tiny object, > such as a pea or a pellet of bread, does so, not with the tips of the thumb and first finger, but pushes the object with the ball of the thumb against the side of the proximal phalanx of the first finger, all the fingers being flexed, and so holding it, lifts it up. A young baby nearly always acts in the same way when trying to pick up a small object.

Several varieties of gibbon are found in Borneo. These little tailless apes congregate in large numbers, and their musical voices hail the sunrise in the primeval forest. The gibbon is a favourite pet not merely with the white residents but with the natives also. The animal walks erect, holding his long arms aloft, although his gait suggests that of a tipsy man. In mental power the gibbon falls far below the other anthropoid apes. By the Kenyahs the gibbon is sometimes regarded as sacred. A Kenyah chief informed Dr. Hose that his people would never dream of killing a gibbon, although "other Kenyahs will kill and probably eat it." In this instance the ape is evidently a tribal totem.

Among the various monkeys there are two quite abundant species of Macaques. One of these monkeys—the pig-tailed Macaque, or Brok, is strikingly intelligent, and the Malays train them to gather coconuts. First we are told:—

> A cord is fastened round the monkey's waist, and it is led to a coconut palm which it rapidly climbs. It then lays hold of a nut, and if the owner judges the nut to be ripe for plucking he shouts to the monkey, which then twists the nut round and round till the stalk is broken and lets it fall to the ground; if the monkey clutches hold of an unripe fruit, the owner tugs the end of the cord and the monkey tries another. I have seen a Brok act as a very effective fruit picker, although the use of the cord was dispensed with altogether, the monkey being guided by the tones and inflections of his master's voice.—(A Naturalist in Borneo).

While the Moslem Malays thus employ the monkey, the Pagan Kenyahs and Kayans vaguely view the animal as a hairy relative. In the districts inhabited by these tribes the Macaque is very commonly engaged in plundering the rice fields. In such circumstances resentment banishes fear, and the rice stealer is slain. But its flesh is taboo to the people, and they never eat it, although various other Bornean tribes esteem the meat of the Macaque a rare delicacy. Officered and led by a powerful male, this monkey wanders in droves through the jungle, and will fight with savage fury when attacked.

The eminent naturalist, Mr. H. N. Ridley, F.R.S., states that the commonest simian in Borneo, the crab-eating macaque, is also gregarious. It appears that the leading male of one of these monkey bands enjoys special privileges both of bed and board. The young are delivered in the trees, and in cases of troublesome parturition, the other females act as midwives, frequently with tragic consequences to the baby.

The native name for this macaque is "Kra," from the curious cry the animal makes when angered or alarmed. But the monkey really possesses extensive powers of expression. Fear, rage, contentment, wonder, and other feelings are all indicated by special sounds or signs. Ridley assures us that it is quite possible to distinguish the alarm note of this animal in the presence of a tiger from that uttered at the approach of a man.

The remaining monkeys of Borneo are all representatives of the Semnopithecus or Presbytes genus, with the solitary exception of the singular Nasalis larvatus, as yet never encountered elsewhere. This large-nosed monkey is a very comical-looking creature, with a most curiously prominent proboscis. The native designation for this animal is Orang Blanda (Dutchman), presumably because its nasal organ is pointed like that of a European, while the noses of the native races are broad and flat. Contrary to a quite general belief, this monkey subsists exclusively on vegetable food. The stories of its cruel robbery of the eggs and fledglings of beautiful birds appear to be entirely apocryphal.

The island of Madagascar is the chief habitat of the lemur, but two species of these quaint creatures are resident in Borneo. The slow Loris is a tree-dweller, and dozes through the day. As the day declines, the animal awakes, and searches for the insects which form its main food. Like lemurs in general, it is of feeble mentality, and its weird appearance seems solely responsible for the numerous superstitions concerning it which prevail among the Malays. Perhaps a few of this lemur's water-drops might prove useful in hunting for spirits in our own latitudes, for the animal's tears, it is said, "when applied to human eyeballs.....impart such clearness of sight that ghosts become visible."

One of the most uncanny creatures on earth is Tarsius spectrum. This little lemur's dark furry body scarcely exceeds 5½ inches in length, while its naked six-inch tail, something like a rat's, is decked at its extremity with a tuft of scanty hair. Its ears are large and very sensitive, while its eyes are simply enormous. The tarsier's diet mainly consists of cockroaches and insects, which it seizes with its wonderfully efficient hands. The lemur remains dormant during daylight, but as the evening advances it becomes eagerly occupied in its hunt for prey. Shelford refers to a tarsier that was kept under observation as it searched for insects which had tumbled into the traps of Nepenthes—the insectivorous pitcher plant. These flies and beetles had been drowned in the water that had gathered in the receptacles of the Nepenthes, and they were now drawn forth and greedily devoured by the hungry lemur. It is a pity that this intensely interesting animal so speedily languishes and dies in captivity, because if available as a pet, far fuller knowledge of its habits and instincts might be obtained than is now possessed. The female brings forth a single young one at a time, and this she will bear in her mouth in much the same manner as the domestic cat will carry her kitten.

Sir Walter Raleigh (1552?-1618).

To the majority of educated Englishmen sentimental emphasis is as hateful as is his Holiness the Pope to an Orangeman. We are nothing if not cool and critical. We prefer under to over-statement. Yet there are times when a little sentimental enthusiasm is salutary, especially when we commemorate the life and work of some great man who has helped to make us what we are. With our equipment, a less critical people would be celebrating an anniversary or some sort of centenary every week in the year. We seem studiously to avoid such rejoicings, possibly because they imply a good conceit of ourselves. Now, modesty is an excellent thing; but it may be carried too far, and it is carried too far when it makes us forget or esteem lightly the men of worth who have given us of their best. Those of my readers who have noted our national idiosyncrasy will be glad to see that the tercentenary of Sir Walter Raleigh's death on October 29 is to be commemorated here in London, and at Raleigh, the capital of North Carolina. Mr. Gosse is to deliver a panegyric at the Mansion House, and, of course, the parsons are to have their say. To-day, at St. Margaret's, Westminster, they will sing the praises of a Lucretian Theist, the friend of the Atheist Marlowe and the founder of the first Freethought circle for the discussion of religion—Raleigh's "School of Atheism," as it was called by a Jesuit pamphleteer of the time.

Raleigh was born about 1552; he was a Devonshire man, and came of good stock, but not good enough to prevent his being looked down upon as an adventurer, a novus homo, by the great nobles. He went to Oxford at the age of twelve or thirteen, but how long he was there we do not know. He acquired there, no doubt, that love of reading and study which was a passion with him to the end. He was fighting for the Huguenots in France, and was in the South of France when the Catholics were turning Paris into a hell on St. Bartholomew's Day, 1572. He saw his Protestant friends smoke out their enemies who were hiding in the caves of the Languedoc hills. It is possible, too, that he saw some fighting in the Low Countries. In 1578 he was in England, joining his step-brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, in setting out a fleet of legalized pirate ships. In 1580 he was given the rank of captain in the English Army, and sailed to Ireland, to help in quieting that rebellious country. In this sort of work he did not disdain to employ the methods of the "devil-dogs of Spain," for whose brutality he had no words strong enough. In 1581 he was sent to London with despatches, and managed to attract the attention of the elderly queen, who had a passion for handsome young men. His wit, eloquence, and fine manners brought him immense wealth and unlimited power, while his overbearing temper caused the nobility to regard him as an upstart. Up to 1603, he was the best-hated man in England. Temperamentally, he was energetic and restless, and ill-satisfied with the petty intrigues of a court. His ambition was to discover new lands and found colonies oversea. He is said to have spent £40,000 of his own money on the Virginian schemes—a gigantic sum when we remember that the Elizabethan pound was worth eight of ours. Unfortunately, all his enterprises were immediate failures, and when he had lost the patronage of the queen by injudiciously marrying without her permission, he became a butt for the satirist and playwright. A friend of mine, the late Mr. H. C. Hart, identified Raleigh as Sir Puntarvolo in Everyman out of his Humour and Amorphus in Cynthia's Revels. With all her jealousy and uncertainty of temper, Elizabeth remained a good friend to Raleigh, but at her death he lost everything except that peace which the outer world cannot give. The hypocritical pedant, James, had him tried and condemned on a frivolous charge in 1603, and kept him in prison in the Tower for fourteen years. His confinement was alleviated by reading, meditation, and scientific experiments, and intercourse with his family and friends. There he wrote his political and philosophic essays, and also his long History of the World, beginning with chaos and getting no further than the successors of Alexander the Great. In 1617 he was released, and set out once more to discover the golden city of Manoa, on the banks of the Orinoco. He was unsucessful, and, unfortunately, came into collision with the Spaniards, for whose friendship James was anxious. When Raleigh returned empty-handed and broken, his head was presented as a peace offering to outraged Spain. The barbarous sentence of hanging, drawing, and quartering, originally passed in 1603 (he was then reprieved), was carried out at Westminster on October 29, 1618.

For many people, Raleigh is merely a brave soldier and daring adventurer. Others remember him because he introduced the potato into Ireland, and made the smoking of tobacco fashionable; but for the student of English letters he is a considerable poet in an age of great poetry, and at his best a master of prose style. Linked by close friendship with Spenser, he wrote a fine commendatory sonnet to the first edition of the Fairy Queen. It will be found in all the anthologies. His early verses are written in the style of the day; they are witty and full of frigid conceits; he plays with words and feelings. Later, the note of passion deepening, the thoughts take on a melancholy cast; the melancholy of a faith in man chastened and disabused. For him as for Jacques in As You Like It, the world is a stage, and men merely strutting players, with feigned words and lying actions:—

> We are dressed for life's short comedy,
> On earth, the stage.....
> The graves which hide us from the scorching sun
> Are like drawn curtains when the play is done.

As a prose writer he began with an anonymous tract describing the gallant fight of the little Revenge with the great Spanish men-of-war. This was published in 1591, four years before Sidney's Apologie for Poetrie saw the light. It is a model of simple and direct prose as this passage will show:—

> All the powder of the Revenge to the last barrel was now spent, all her pikes broken, forty of her best men slain, and the most part of the rest hurt. In the beginning of the fight she had but one hundreth free from sickness, and four score and ten sick, laid in hold upon ballast. A small troop of men to such a ship, and a weak garrison to resist so mighty an army. By those hundred all were sustained, the volleys, the boardings and entrings of fifteen ships of war, besides those which beat her at large. On the contrary, the Spanish were always supplied with soldiers brought from every squadron; all manner of arms, and powder at will. Unto ours there remained no comfort at all, no hope, no supply either of ships, men or weapons; the masts all beaten overboard, all her tackle cut asunder, her upper work altogether razed; and in effect evened she was with the water—but the very foundation or bottom of a ship, nothing being left overhead either for flight or defence.

This is the straightforward prose of a cultured man of action. Its beauty lies in its sinewy strength, its easy adaptability to all moods. With Raleigh it was to evolve into a style rich, complicated, and singularly harmonious, a style to which Sir Thomas Browne was to add the last perfection. It was the fruit of the long hours of thought and meditation spent in the not unpleasant solitude of the Tower—the most fruitful if not the happiest period of Raleigh's life. There he wrote his History of the World for the instruction of the engaging Prince Henry. It is a fearsome-looking folio full of painstaking and dull dissertations on impossible subjects, but enriched here and there with eloquent meditations and acute reflections that repay one amply for the trouble of looking for them. The apostrophe to Death, with which the book closes, "O eloquent just and mighty death," is too well known to quote. In the preface he says:—

> But let every man value his own wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the Rich man think all fools, that cannot equal his abundance; the Revenger esteem all negligent that have not trodden down their opposites; the Politician, all gross that cannot merchandise their faith: Yet when we once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all winds drive us, and when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can never be weighed again, the Navigation of this life takes end: Then it is, I say, that our own cogitations (those sad and severe cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our health and felicity) return again, and pay us to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our life past.....

He ends his historical reflections on the same note of sobriety:—

> It is therefore death alone that can suddenly make man to know himself. He tells the proud and insolent that they are Abjects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them cry, complain and repent; yea, even to hate their forepassed happiness. He takes account of the rich, and proves him a beggar; a naked beggar, which hath Interest in nothing, but in the gravel that fills his mouth. He holds a Glass before the eyes of the most beautiful, and makes them see therein their deformity and rottenness; and they acknowledge it.

. . . . .

I have noted that Raleigh was interested in free discussion of religious subjects, and numbered among his friends many who held heterodox, if not Atheistic, opinions. Like most men in those dangerous times, he made a formal profession of belief having no taste for martyrdom. He had pondered the Essays in Roman type, and had found many things to his taste in Charron's De la Sagesse (1601), transcribing passages from it in his History of the World. "By the audacity of his generalisations," says an acute foreign critic, M. Jusserand "Raleigh is closely related to a critical movement which was to develope unceasingly, beginning with Herbert of Cherbury, Hobbes and Locke, and ending with the deists and sceptics of the eighteenth century." But, I imagine, it is not this aspect of the great Elizabethan that will commend itself to our religious friends to-day at St. Margaret's, Westminster.

BUDDHISM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Your contributor, "Mimnermus," on page 532 of your issue dated 13th inst., makes two misleading remarks regarding Buddhism.

In the first place, those acquainted with the teaching of the Gotama Buddha will hardly need to be told that it took the form of a philosophy rather than a religion.

But worse still is the seeming support given to the somewhat vulgar error, that Edwin Arnold's purely imaginary poem, written with the direct object of drawing an analogy between the Founders of Christianity and Buddhism, was an actual rendering of the latter's words.

THE TEST OF EXPERIENCE.

Sir,—May I be allowed through the medium of your columns briefly to draw attention to a point which seems to militate against the Rationalist criterion? The theory that experience provides the only rational method of acquiring knowledge seems to me to be fraught with some difficulty. I mention it here as one seeking an explanation, which, very probably, you, sir, or some of your readers, may be able to offer. I notice that the Memorandum of Association of the R.P.A. says: "Rationalism may be defined as the mental attitude which unreservedly accepts the supremacy of Reason, and aims at establishing a system of philosophy and ethics verifiable by experience, and independant of all arbitrary assumptions or authority." But, if we are so determined to limit philosophy to what is actually verifiable, it follows that we are deliberately diminishing our possible store of knowledge. Is it not unduly confining Reason, that "King of Heaven and Earth," to make it embrace a field no wider than that of experience? Without in any way belittling the importance of sensation and sense-perception, it seems to me that certainty is also the property of thought, by which man is differentiated from the rest of the animal creation. Plato was one of the first thinkers to appreciate the great distinction between reality and appearance; and before him Heraclitus of Ephesus pointed out that experience ought not to be considered as the ultimate criterion of reality—a truth which many great thinkers of all ages have repeatedly emphasized. There are many commonly accepted scientific truths which owe their origin, not to observation and experience alone, but rather to inductive reasoning on the data supplied by observation and experience. If we were content to accept the test of experience only, we should no longer be able to believe in such scientifically established facts as the motion of the earth in space or the Copernican system. Thus, would not such a method of attempting to exclude a first cause by reason of which all things are—commonly labelled God by theologians—at the same time tend to eliminate Heliocentricism and other accepted scientific beliefs founded on a sound basis of probability? Moreover, it seems to me that such a philsophy must necessarily exclude that very inductive principle by which scientific hypotheses come into being; for this same inductive principle cannot be proved by any appeal to experience, and is itself essentially assumed. It is true that with regard to examined cases experience may be expected to confirm the inductive principle; but, in dealing with unexamined cases, it would appear that an inference from the examined to the unexamined can only be justified by the inductive principle. From this it appears that arguments, purporting to be based on experience, which attempt to argue as to the experienced, can only do so by assuming the inductive principle. Hence to endeavour to apply experience in proof of the inductive principle seems to me to involve a begging of the question.

Thus the Rationalist system of philosophy does seem to require assumptions, and the definition of the Memorandum to which I refer seems to imply a contradiction. Personally, I am inclined to believe that to arrive at certainty about anything, we are not bound to do so, only through the medium of sensation, though I admit that this is the more usual way. But certainty belongs as much as anything to thought as distinct from animal sensation, and it is a state of mind which may be brought about by inductive reasoning just as much as by direct evidence. This seems to me to explain why people can be certain of the existence of God without having any direct evidence, and in the absence of any infallible proof.

Obituary.

It is with the deepest regret that we record the death of an old and valued friend of the Freethinker in the person of Mr. William Mumby, of Newark, Notts. Mr. Mumby's interest in the Freethought cause dates back to the Bradlaugh days, and that interest remained keen until the end. The head of a large wholesale clothing firm, he stood well with his large staff of employees, and, in 1914, worked out a co-partnership scheme, shares being allotted to them in proportion to years of service. He was also a Justice of the Peace, and a liberal supporter of a number of local movements for the general betterment of the people.

We last saw him at his house some eighteen months ago, when, although unwell, he was quite cheerful, and evidenced his usual lively interest in the affairs of the world. Only about a month ago he wrote us much concerned to know whether we were not working too hard, and begging that we would take things easier. But he said nothing of his own health, and we found nothing in his letter for apprehension. A few days before his death he said to his family: "If I do not recover, I die with my mind at peace. I have always tried to lead an upright life, and I have done no man any harm that I know of." We can echo the local newspaper when it says that those who knew him best will readily concede that this was a fitting epitaph.

At Mr. Mumby's own request the body was conveyed to London and cremated at Golder's Green. His wife and children accompanied the body to the crematorium. The only wreaths permitted to go on the coffin were those from his family. They have lost a good husband and parent, Newark a worthy townsman, and the Freethinker and the Freethought cause a staunch and tried friend.—C. Cohen.

On Saturday, October 19, the Freethought Movement became the poorer by the loss of Henry Cowell, one of its most fearless, energetic, loyal, and honourable supporters. Mr. Cowell, who was a Vice-President of the National Secular Society and a Director of the Secular Society, Ltd., had been a Freethinker from his early youth, when, a staunch Radical and follower of Charles Bradlaugh, he worked for him assiduously in Sheffield. On leaving that town, he travelled widely, finally settling down in London, where he became the leading spirit of the Kingsland Branch N. S. S. When in health, he was a most regular attendant at meetings, and a generous supporter of all funds. He was absolutely devoted to principle, and whilst admiring and respecting his leaders, never hesitated to offer opposition and criticism, though in the most open and amiable manner. He lost no opportunity of expounding his views, and distributed much Freethought literature, often to the detriment of his business. His sterling qualities endeared him to all with whom he came in contact, and the grief of his sorrowing widow and youthful son is shared by all his friends. A few weeks ago, when paying what he felt was a farewell visit to the undersigned, he expressed a desire for a Secular burial, which he reiterated on his death-bed. Will friends please note that this will take place at Abney Park Cemetery, Stoke Newington, N., on Tuesday, October 29, at 3.30?—E. M. Vance.

Do justice to your brother (you can do that whether you love him or not), and you will come to love him. But do injustice to him, because you don't love him; and you will come to hate him.—Ruskin.

A Queer Defence.

Most people are familiar with the story of the man who informed a friend that he had been defending his character against the defamations of a mutual acquaintance. "Why," he indignantly exclaimed; "he said you were not fit to black his boots." "Oh," said the aspersed one, "And what did you say?" "I said you were." And for this defence he was expected to be thankful. Now, there is a certain defence of Christianity which reminds one of the above story. When the Freethinker argues that Christianity should be rejected because it is not true, a common retort is that the rejection of Christianity jeopardizes the practice of morality. Now, if Freethought and immorality, and Christianity and morality, went hand in hand, there would be at least a primâ facie case for the plea. But this is not the case. Freethinkers are not all monuments of vice, and Christians are not all paragons of virtue. We need not discuss the number of each that fall below a given standard of conduct, nor need we discuss how many of each in proportion to numbers betray moral shortcomings. It is enough that, taking the world as it goes, it is impossible to say of any man, by merely noting his conformity with accepted ethical rules, that he is a Christian or a Freethinker. To find out what he is we have to enter on an altogether different line of inquiry.

Conduct and Creed.

Now, the Christian of the type we are dealing with asserts that his morality is an outcome of his religious beliefs; and if we are to take his assertion seriously, some very curious conclusions follow. If he is married, we have to set on one side love of wife as having any great influence; if he is a father, affection for his children must be eliminated; as a friend, we must do away with any feeling of loyalty; as a member of society, we have to set on one side all feelings of duty. If we admit the moral force of these things we diminish the ethical importance of his religious beliefs. If affection for wife and children, loyalty to friends, and duty to society are admitted to be factors in determining morality, then it may happen that these may be strong enough to serve in the absence of religious beliefs. This kind of defender of the faith argues that he is only as decent as he is because he believes in God and a future life, and would be much worse than he is if he did not so believe. We are stating the case bluntly, so that it may be faced clearly.

Getting at the Facts.

Now, we are quite aware that humility is one of the Christian virtues, but this certainly seems like straining a virtue until it becomes a vice. It is carrying self-depreciation too far. That some Christians are the better for a little watching we should be the last to deny, but that all of them are not in this condition we strongly affirm. We do not believe that our Christian neighbours are only kept from burgling our house either because they believe in a God or because of the policeman on the beat. Were they so inclined they could easily evade the latter; and experience proves that when the latter can be avoided, the former is not an insurmountable obstacle to rascality. We do not believe that Christian husbands and wives, or parents and children, are what they are because of their religious beliefs, otherwise we should be denying them the possession of qualities that are obviously possessed by those who have no religious belief. We do not believe that all Christians are rascals held in leash by the fear of punishment. Many of their preachers say they are, a number of laymen think they are, and a proportion act as though they are. But all of them! Well, we have a much higher opinion of Christians than to believe it. We want to defend Christians against the slanders of the pulpit, and we claim that what the Freethinker can do the Christian can do. We believe in the substantial equality of the human race, and that all are alike in kind, however much they may differ in degree. And, therefore, we call attention to a significant fact, or series of facts. Freethinkers as husbands or wives, as parents or citizens, are as well behaved as Christians. No chief of police has ever reported that owing to the growth of non-religious opinions the number of crimes has gone up, and the police force has had to be strengthened. Freethought husbands and wives do not cut conspicuous figures in the divorce court. They are not notorious as child beaters. If Christians work for social and political reform so do Freethinkers. In extreme revolutionary movements Freethinkers have given their lives as cheerfully as have the religious. When the Christian asserts that only the power of Christ keeps him sober, the Freethinker legitimately replies that he can refrain from getting drunk without such assistance. There is really not a single social or domestic virtue practised by Christians that does not flourish with at least equal strength among Freethinkers.

Are Freethinkers Superior to Christians?

Are we therefore to accept the calumny of the pulpit, and say that the Freethinker is so much more richly endowed with the higher human qualities that he can do, without religious hopes and fears, what the Christian is only able to accomplish with their assistance. If that is so, what a superior kind of mortal the

Digitized by Google

Freethinker must be? We do not say he is, we do not even believe he is; it is the Christian who implies as much. We are putting the case bluntly because we want it to be seen plainly. But it is certain that if all men and women were as bad as the Christian apologist paints them, society could not hold together for twelve months. A policeman is a bad teacher of morals, and he is certainly not improved by being shifted to an infinite distance and placed in an unlocalisable heaven. The moral groundwork of social life lies in the feelings and instincts and ideas that are generated by social contact, and for this reason substantially the same moral phenomena is manifested by all, irrespective of their religious or their non-religious opinions. The goodness of the Freethinker is a standing puzzle to the Christian. It is quite contrary to what he is led to expect. On the other hand, the goodness of the Christian—or his badness either—is no puzzle to the Freethinker. His philosophy of life includes the Christian view in a way that the Christian philosophy cannot include Freethought. To the Christian the Freethinker is an opinion plus a man, to the Freethinker the Christian is a man plus an opinion. The Christian hates the man in the interests of an opinion, the Freethinker hates an opinion in the interests of the man.

Defending the Enemy.

Hence our defence of the Christian against the slanders of his leaders. We are standing up for the innate equality of Freethinkers and Christians, because we do not believe that Freethinkers are made of such superior clay that they can play the part of real men and women under conditions that would demoralize a Christian. The Christian can be just as good as a Freethinker is if he will only throw off the demoralizing influence of his creed. If a Freethinker can be sober, honest, and reliable without religion, so can a Christian. The Christian is not an incurable moral cripple that must go through life on crutches for the issuing of which the clergy hold the patent right. Underneath the Christian there is a man, or the nucleus of one, if we can only get at him. The trouble is that most of them have been brought up with the idea that the deeper the man is buried the better, and they resent all attempts to disentomb him. At any rate, in relation to the morality of non-Christians the follower of Christ is between the horns of a dilemma. Either he must admit that his analysis of the moral forces is wrong, and that religion is not the moral determinent in the life of man; or he must assert, inferentially, that non-Christians are the innate moral superiors of Christians, since they are able to maintain a standard of conduct admittedly as good as that of Christians—sometimes better—and without any of the adventitious aids and extraneous incentives which the Christian believes is essential to his own right conduct. We have tried to place the issue plainly; if we did not know Christians so well, we might expect them to meet it with an equally plain reply.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Matter, in relation to vital phenomena, has yet to be studied, and the command of Canute to the waves would be wisdom itself compared with any attempt to stop such inquiries. Let the tide rise, and let knowledge advance; the limits of the one are not more rigidly fixed than those of the other; and no worse infidelity could seize upon the mind than the belief that a man's earnest search after truth should culminate in his perdition. Fear not, my friend, but rest assured that as we understand matter better, mind will become capable of nobler and of wiser things.—John Tyndall.

"Our Daily Bread."

CHURCHES and chapels all over the country have been holding thanksgiving services for the harvest, but no notice has been taken by any of them of the fact that for many farmers in the Highlands of Scotland and Wales there has been no harvest, whole fields of grain having perished through bad weather conditions. Is God a respecter of persons, who smiles on the valleys but frowns on the mountains, who showers his favours upon the dwellers in the southern plains but wreaks his vengeance upon those who have the misfortune to till the northern hills? Some of the divines spoke of the harvest as "the annual miracle," but they omitted to mention that in multitudes of cases the miracle was not completed. Is the harvest an annual miracle, or is it an annual instance of man's mastery over Nature, won after countless ages of more or less blind, unintelligent, but always resolute struggle for survival? As Ingersoll so well says:—

> Many years ago our fathers were living in dens and caves. Their bodies, their low foreheads, were covered with hair. They were eating berries, roots, bark, and vermin. They were fond of snakes and raw fish. They discovered fire and, probably by accident, learned how to cause it by friction. They found how to warm themselves—to fight the frost and storm. They fashioned clubs and rude weapons of stone with which they killed the larger beasts and now and then each other. Slowly, painfully, almost imperceptibly they advanced. They crawled and stumbled, staggered and struggled toward the light. To them the world was unknown. On every hand was the mysterious, the sinister, the hurtful. The forests were filled with monsters, and the darkness was crowded with ghosts, devils, and fiendish gods (Works, vol. iv., p. 159).

Primitive man was utterly ignorant of the law of sowing and reaping; but as he had to live by his wits or starve, he kept on hammering at the door of the unknown until it began to open. Bread came to him, not as a free gift from the supernatural in answer to believing prayer, but as the reward of his own incessant strife with the very forces which often seemed bent on crushing him. He persistently wrestled with what he ignorantly feared, and ultimately prevailed. And yet, in a sermon published in the Church Times for October 18, the Rev. A. Hanbury Tracey, vicar of St. Barnabas' Church, Pimlico, describes food as God's gift to man, and as possessing, on that account, "a mysterious sacredness." As a matter of simple fact, food is a symbol of man's triumph over Nature, and God is not in it at all, except to the blind belief of the pious. Mr. Tracey says that "man's need of food is that not of a higher sort of animal, but of one destined for Eternal Life"; but that is not true in any verifiable sense. Food does for man just exactly what it does for all other living things, and in its absence all life ceases. Of course, it is a clergyman's business to connect everything with religion, and Mr. Tracey, true to his profession, observes that this yearly operation of Nature, which the Churches thankfully commemorate, "is still eloquent of man's dependence on religion." Two-thirds of his discourse he devotes to a most dogmatic assertion, not only of the superiority of Christianity to all other religions, but also of its absolute perfection.

In spirit this reverend gentleman illustrates the exclusive and tyrannical nature of the Christian religion. He tells us there are two ways of regarding religion. One is the world's way, and the other the Church's; but in reality the two are one. Sir Robert Peel may have been pre-eminently a man of the world; but it was as a hopelessly prejudiced religious man that he expressed himself thus: "It is not prudent as a rule to trust yourself to any man who tells you that he does not believe in a God or in a future after death." The truth is, on the contrary, that the world does not as a rule trust itself to people who indulge in loud religious professions. As a member of the Catholic party in the Anglican Church, Mr. Tracey declares that "the Christian religion is the only religion which can properly be described as a social necessity, that it is the only religion which spiritually, intellectually, and morally can supply man with that which, having regard to his higher nature, he stands in absolute need of." This is a truth of which, according to him, numbers of professing Christians, and even Church people, are in total ignorance. In a glib and careless way they talk about the various forms of religion as if there were not much to choose between them. In Mr. Tracey's opinion this is very shocking, and in ours it is equally shocking to find that the reverend gentleman can be so bigoted and intolerant. This is how he puts it:—

> The persons to whom I refer talk as if there could possibly be some comparison between a religion which makes its whole claim to be heard to depend upon the absolute truth of the self revelation of God in the Person of Jesus Christ, the Incarnate Son of God, born of the Virgin Mary, and a religion which does nothing of the sort. Such persons talk in their ignorance or their thoughtlessness about the mysteries and the dogmas and the moral excellences of such other religions as if the world were as much indebted to them as to the religion of Jesus Christ, as if, in fact, it were possible for one religion to advantage the world as much as another. It is shocking to note how some professing Christians and Church people thus dishonour their Faith.

To us the wonder is not that Mr. Tracy, holding his present views of Christianity, regards all other religions as utterly unworthy of comparison with it, but that in the present advanced state of the science of comparative religion he can honestly entertain such views. He is horrified to learn that any professing Christians can so dishonour their faith as to include other cults in the same category; but the most horrifying thing of all, from a religious point of view, is that Christians can so dishonour their God as to believe him capable of giving an absolutely perfect religion to less than one half of his children, and a great host of deplorably imperfect and corrupt ones to all the rest of them. Besides, with all available facts in our possession, it cannot justly be maintained that the minority who are Christians are on an average morally and socially any superior to the majority who are not. We do not in the least doubt Mr. Tracey's sincerity in regarding the Creed of Christendom "as an infallible utterance guaranteed by the consent of the undivided Church," but we do most seriously lay to his charge the offence of doing violence to the moral character of God whose servant he claims to be, and the merest tyro in history is fully aware that Christianity won its supremacy in the West, not by its intrinsic merit, but by repeated appeals to physical force.

This preacher's closing assertion is that Christianity is "a social necessity because of its unique moral value"; and this assertion is open to the criticism that it is radically false. Surely, a religion rooted in immorality cannot possibly make for an exalted type of morality in those who profess it. It may be true, but is by no means beyond doubt, that "it is the only religion which begins and ends with pure devotion to a Person"; but, unfortunately, that Person is at once its nominal creator and its real creation—a pure myth. Mr. Tracey's definition of a Christian is well worth quoting:—

> A Christian is not a man who lives a certain life and believes certain truths, but a Christian is a man who lives as he lives and believes what he believes out of pure love for him who is in himself the sum total of Christianity.

Being a sheer myth, Christ means a different thing to almost everyone who believes in him. Naturally, he is the sum total of Christianity, of which there are, in consequence, innumerable versions. No wonder Mr. Tracey goes to Napoleon for an argument for the Godhead of Christ, for there are divines not a few who curse Napoleon as a rank and blasphemous unbeliever. At any rate, his alleged utterances at St. Helena are almost as legendary as those of the Gospel Jesus.

Of all curious things, however, the most curious is the statement that our indebtedness to Nature for our daily bread is eloquent of our dependence on a religion so essentially anti-natural and immoral as the one so irrationally eulogized by Mr. Hanbury Tracey. All mankind enjoy the fruitfulness of the earth, which, apart from the light and heat of the sun, would be impossible; but there are millions of people who have no sense of dependence upon a Supreme Being, and millions more who have no faith whatever in a virgin-born Redeemer. Nature works in simple obedience to her own inherent laws, and our life consists in subjecting ourselves to her ordinances and utilizing her resources. It is highly instructive to note that those who understand her operations best are the least dependent on any form of religion.

The Revival of Devil-Worship.

> There is no darkness but ignorance.—Shakespeare.
> The vain crowds, kindly wandering, led by lies.
> —Lucretius.

The Christian religion places a premium upon ignorance. The Bible contains the warning that not many wise are called, and that "God" chooses the foolish things of the world to confound the wise. The Christian seldom speculates about his Deity. In the rapture produced by receiving a direct message from Omnipotence, he does not criticize, and if reason raises its still, small voice, it is his duty to show reason the door, and lock it afterwards. Reason may be a divine gift; but it must be kept in a burglar-proof, iron safe. Its free use is sinful, and may have awful consequences in the next world. Even to inquire into the cause of this anomaly is fraught with peril. The only liberty left to the religious citizen of a free country is to read the Bible for the purpose of finding out God's will and then obey it, or put up with the fearful results. To be a Christian, one must swallow the Bible whole. It is a worse job than evading the skirts of Dora, but it must be got through somehow. The only way is to chloroform or kill the reason.

The religious propaganda among sailors and soldiers has called renewed attention to this form of religion. The numerous tracts, written especially to entrap the fighting men, show conclusively that Christians, like the Bourbons, "learn nothing and forget nothing." Most of them appear to be written by men ignorant of the very alphabet of science. They blandly assume, not only that the Bible is true, but that it contains all truth. The writers of these leaflets have never a shadow of suspicion that history contradicts it, science flouts it, morality disowns it, and that superstition is twin-sister to it. These wooden-headed fanatics, in the first quarter of the twentieth century, put forward the fabulous rubbish of twenty centuries ago as being the highest wisdom of our time.

In controversy with Freethinkers, when defending their faith, the clergy act like cuttlefish, and raise a camouflage of words by means of which they evade the dilemma of dogmas. When they are addressing Sunday-school children, or haranguing village congregations, they forget their lame apologetics, and serve out unadulterated dogma. At a safe distance from the firing line, other things are served out besides cigarettes and currant cake. Here is a quotation from a tract, circulated among the troops, which shows Christianity in its most attractive guise. It bears the title, What is there after Death?

> You will never forget in hell. The chords of memory will be swept to the awful wailing of the lost. You may think of your loved ones left on earth, and seek, as Dives did, to send a message to them. But no, the stern silence of eternity forbids.....Oh! poor lost souls in torment! The drop of water to cool your burning tongues can never be given.....You chose death, and ye must die.

Let there be no mistake about it. The best-known Christian preachers from Charles Spurgeon to Billy Sunday have been men who imagined that the world's clock struck at Jerusalem two thousand years ago, and that it has never moved since. Moody and Sankey, Torrey and Alexander, in spite of their great popularity, were half-educated men appealing to ignorant folk. In spite of his parade of an American University degree, the Rev. William Sunday, Doctor of Divinity, is an ignoramus and a charlatan. Many years ago he was a baseball player, who was converted. Imperfectly educated, he has a keen eye for business, and he finds working in the Lord's vineyard a more profitable job than his former profession.

This popular Christian preacher, who addresses the largest congregations in the world, is an ignoramus, if not worse. For example, this is what he says, or shouts, of science:—

> Why don't we evolute a little now? I don't believe my great-great-great grandfather was a monkey, sitting up a tree, shying cocoa nuts with his tail across an alley at a neighbouring monk. I have too much respect for my ancestors. But if you think in that way, you can take your monkey ancestors and go to hell.

Sunday's command of slang is excellent, but, characteristically, he soils everything he touches. Recall the Biblical Story of the Prodigal Son, which, in its way, is not without art and dignity of a kind. This is how it emerges from the inspired mouth of this American evangelist:—

> He came up to his father and said, "Dig up, I'm tired of this, and want to see the world." His father didn't know what he meant, "Come across with the mazuma; come clean, divvy, I wan't the coin see?" Finally the father tumbled, and he said, "I got you."

Is it not enough to make a decent Christian ashamed? Once in his career Billy Sunday did deliver an oration worth listening to. That was when he addressed some old soldiers in Pennsylvania, and the newspapers praised him "not wisely, but too well." Unhappily, it was found that Sunday had used one of Ingersoll's old orations. Those who remembered the evangelist's language concerning Freethinkers were amused, for he had borrowed, without acknowledgment, from a man he was in the habit of consigning to the hottest portion of Hades. "You can tell the whole dirty bunch to come on," said the Rev. W. Sunday, D.D., in replying to the soft impeachment, "I'm here, and I'm giving hell the best kind of a run I know how."

It is, surely, the bitterest comment on Christianity that such a man as Billy Sunday should be regarded by the orthodox as a veritable Saint George attacking the dragon of Freethought. Freethinkers, we hope, will learn the lesson that the degrading supernaturalism they so justly detest is the mere result of a grossly imperfect system of education. Christianity draws the very breath of its life from the privileged classes, by whose money it is supported, because those classes realise that if working people trouble themselves unduly about a next world they will not care much about the conditions under which they live in this. So long as there are lower classes whose function it is to labour that the privileged few may enter into the fruits of their labour, so long will religion be necessary to keep the working-people in harness.

Christianity subsists to-day because it is profitable. Thirty-nine archbishops and bishops receive between them no less than £180,700 yearly, with emoluments in the shape of palaces and palatial residences. In addition 50,000 parsons have comfortable livings in peace, and an enviable position in war-time, when they are altogether exempted from the rigours of military service. Our work, as Freethinkers, is by no means over when tens of thousands of our countrymen are the prey of priestcraft. Any day the masses may be roused to an orgy of evangelism, for they do not lack credulity. The ghostly Russian army, the angels at Mons (vouched for by the Bishop of Durham), the regimental mascots, and the prevalence of charms among the soldiers, should make any Rationalist "think furiously." What critical acumen have those American citizens who kneel and weep at the bidding of an evangelist whose sickening utterances proclaim him a degenerate? The revival of devil-worship is a real menace. When Mark Twain was asked by a parson to subscribe towards the rebuilding of a churchyard wall, the genial humourist replied: "I do not see the necessity. The folks in the graveyard can't get out, and the people outside don't want to get in." When the democracy is educated, it will not see the necessity of paying money to hear the worn-out repetitions of orthodoxy any more than it will pay to see the revolutions of Tibetan praying-wheels. By directing men's thoughts to a to-morrow in heaven or hell parsons deter millions from thinking of to-day. And, as the schoolboy said: "to-morrow never comes." Our happiness is here, or not at all. Why should democracy sell its splendid birthright for paper promises on the Bank of Faith?

MIMNERMUS.

A Note on Miss Royden.

MISS ROYDEN, who preaches at the City Temple, and whose discourses are published by the Christian Commonwealth, may be taken as a sign of the times. Her moral teachings are quite excellent, and in close accord with modern Rationalism. They are certainly not Christian, though she seeks to gain acceptance for them by an attempt to reconcile them with the sayings of Jesus Christ, on which she puts a gloss unknown to the apostles, doctors, saints, and martyrs of the ages, and which in fact they would have repudiated with horror. Her very appearance in the pulpit is contrary to Scripture (1 Tim. ii. 11, 12) as it has always been accepted and acted upon. To argue that the doctrines of Christ have been everywhere misunderstood till Miss Maude Royden turned her attention to them is to brand Christianity as a fiasco.

In "Moral Problems, No. 1" and elsewhere she claims that Christ, our great exemplar, was no ascetic; but at all events his example did not include marriage. He was "tempted in all things even as we are," but the peculiar difficulties and stumbling-blocks of the married life he never experienced; nor did he lend any countenance to Miss Royden's pleasing views as to the "naturalness of man and woman desiring physical union"; on the contrary, he referred it to our hardness of heart, i.e., sinfulness (Matt. xix. 8, 11, 12); and St. Paul, the greatest of the apostles, who was converted to Christianity by a special miracle, strongly deprecated all sex intercourse (1 Cor. vii. 1, 7-9, 32, etc.). The Roman Catholic Church lays it down in so many words that sex intercourse, except for the purpose of procreation, is mortal sin, and the reputable Protestant Churches have never, so far as I know, repudiated this doctrine. The "purity" of Christian sex-morality has always been its greatest boast. Its fundamental idea has always been that sex-intercourse is a vile thing, and the less of it the better. So strongly has this notion permeated Christian thought that even in a typically modern work like Maxwell's Devil's Garden the hero is extolled for his "purity" in "ceasing to be a lover" to his wife. In her favourable notice of Islam as comparable to Christianity in its non-asceticism, Miss Royden forgets that Christians have all along denounced it as the "sensual creed of Mohammed."

Miss Royden's interpretation of "Take no thought," etc. (Luke xii. 22-34), as showing that Christ, with his allusion to "your Father who knoweth ye have need of these things," was concerned about bodily wants, is obviously forced. We all know we cannot exist without nourishment and (in cold climates) clothing, but the context plainly shows that the Christian is to take no interest in them, or even to try to get them. By the same rule he is to cast aside earthly possessions of all kinds (Matt. vi., 19), and so the saints have always seen it.

The lady's nerve reaches its climax in her treatment of Christ's teaching about divorce. It appears that when he said "Whosoever shall put away his wife.....and shall marry another, committeth adultery," he had no idea of its being taken literally. We do not act, says Miss Royden very truly, on his teaching about killing, or oath-taking, or judging—or, we may add, on any other of the injunctions of the Sermon on the Mount—therefore, argues she, just as we are now killing one another to an extent unparalleled in pre-Christian times, so we are entitled to divorce one another if we think fit. Christ was "laying down principles, not making rules." This remarkable opposition between rules and principles does not seem (so far as divorce is concerned) to have occurred to other Christian leaders, for they are pouring in petitions to Parliament against the Bill to relax the present divorce laws. In this they are quite consistent. It is an historical fact that freedom of divorce, prevalent in Pagan days, was abolished or greatly restricted by the first Christian Emperor, and never revived till the time of the "infidel" revolutionary Government of France.

If Christ, as Miss Royden asserts, "delighted in the beauty of health and vigour and strength" and the "needs of the body were as precious to him as the needs of the soul," it seems odd that his most devoted followers didn't notice it. Not to dwell on the hideous self-tortures of the early anchorites, we may point to the lady saint who boasted that she never washed except the tips of her fingers for the Mass, to St. Thomas of Canterbury, Chancellor and Archbishop, covered with lice, to Sir Thomas More with his hair shirt and his scourge. These were among the highest ornaments of Christendom, and its most characteristic products.

How much better it would be if Miss Royden were honestly to admit that she derived her ideas on the claims of the physical, of sex, and of women, not from the New Testament at all, but from Mary Wollstonecraft, J. S. Mill, Lecky, Buckle, Geddes and Thomson, Lea, Letourneau, Westermarck, and other Rationalists. But, doubtless, she knows her world. The Rationalist pill is bitter on the vitiated palate of the religionist, and the sugar of pious phraseology may help it down. She is, perhaps, wise in her generation. Still, the loyal Rationalist loves the plain truth, cost what it may.

Acid Drops.

The House of Commons has taken the leap, and decided that women are eligible to sit as Members of Parliament. The level of the House has fallen too low for it to be a compliment for anyone to be there, but the admission of women is at least an assertion of right. There were very few objectors to the proposal that women should sit in Parliament; "scraps of paper" and assertions of principle by old-time opponents to the enfranchisement of women were tossed on one side quite lightly, and politicians showed themselves the equal of parsons in swallowing their previous professions when it paid them to do so. For our part, we regard the measure as one of justice and common sense, and another indication of the waning influence of Christianity.

One thing worth noting, however, is that the avowed responsibility for the change of opinion with regard to woman and the vote is, not the nature or the dignity of woman, but the part played by her in the prosecution of the War. These good Christian legislators have made woman's right to the vote contingent upon her readiness to help in conducting a war. As an example we may cite Mr. A. MacCullum Scot who, on a previous occasion, opposed the vote being given to women on the ground that all laws rested on force (a perfectly false and stupid doctrine), this time voted for women entering Parliament because, he said, his views had been enlarged "as to the extent to which women were capable of serving their country in time of war." Thus is stupidity piled on stupidity. If the capacity for helping in war is to be made the ground for women voting, why not apply the same standard to men? And if this is not Prussianism, in its worst form, what is it? At the opening of the War we said that a large number of people in this country ought to try and make up their minds whether they hated Prussianism or were only jealous of it. We feel the same advice is timely now. It is a poor thing to be jealous, and if women justify their use of the vote, it will be as a war-preventing, rather than as a war-waging, factor. What the world needs is an end to Prussianism in both act and thought.

The Morning Post reports that the Kaiser is suffering from "a serious mental disease." The only symptom described is that he is "becoming more and more pious, praying the whole day." We do not know what other symptoms there are, but the one named seems conclusive.

The teachers of Scotland have at last taken their courage in both hands, and scrapped the Catechism. At the request of the Scottish Churches, the Educational Institute of Scotland (the teachers' professional union) undertook to draw up a Syllabus of Religious Instruction, and for eighteen months a sub-committee has been working at it. At the Council meeting held on October 12, Dr. Strong submitted the draft for approval. Dr. W. Boyd moved that the Catechism form no part of the Syllabus. There was a double objection to it. No educated person now agreed to the theological doctrines taught to children in the Catechism. Even if the doctrines were true, this would be a wrong way of teaching children. Miss Rattray seconded, and the motion to excise the Catechism was adopted.

A facetious writer in the Daily Chronicle says: "I asked a returning friend: 'What is war like?' He replied: 'Oh, you sit in a puddle and read one of last year's magazines.'" That friend must have been an Army chaplain.

An advertisement of St. Mary-at-Hill Church announces: "Sacred songs with orchestra and cinema. Speaker, Prebendary Carlile, on 'Hun Doves.'" It seems like the "old, old story" under a brand-new disguise.

Alongside of a poster on the Glasgow tramways announcing a great missionary meeting in the St. Andrew's Hall, is another poster appealing for funds for the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Is Mr. Dalrymple trying to play a joke at the expense of those organizing the missionary meeting? What satire in a Christian country.

The Very Rev. Canon McBrearty, St. Anthony's, Govan, has left £2,776. Quite enough to pay his passage over the Jordan.

The writer of the weekly religious article in the Times (the Northcliffe Press, by the way, never neglects religion) discovers in the defeat of the German Army evidence of the operation of a "retributive Power inflicting its awful sentence on the authors of a colossal wrong against the world." The same old cant, and the same old stupidity. This "Power" remains idle while the wrong is being done, and only becomes active in the direction of wreaking vengeance. Even then, thousands of other people must suffer in the very act of inflicting retribution. It is, surely, either a dulled or a distorted moral sense that can write such rubbish as an apology for God. And there is little wonder that a militaristic, God-drunken, people like the German leaders have reached their present position.

Is Spiritualism a religious denomination? The Sheffield magistrates have decided that it is not. The question was raised in a case in which the President of the Spiritualist National Union was charged with failing to render military service. Perhaps Sir Oliver Lodge will explain. He has so many "spirit" friends in the "next world."

America has a very sharp way with men with "consciences." In the House of Commons it was stated that forty conscientious objectors were tried recently in the United States and sentenced to penal servitude for life, which was afterwards graciously commuted to twenty-five years' penal servitude. Should they die in prison, such very wicked men will have, doubtless, a further sentence in the next world of several million years, 212 Fahrenheit. They must appreciate the blessing of living in a civilized and Christian community.

Restaurant music is not liable to the entertainment tax, and is in the same enviable position as church music. The dear clergy still make a charge for musical additions to wedding services.

In his inaugural lecture of the joint session of the Edinburgh University Divinity Hall and the New College, Principal Martin, D.D., said there must be an early restatement of the Church's faith. It was dangerous when the official creed of a church and the working faith of the average believer fell apart. Dangerous to whom? To the ministers or to those who were silly enough to believe what the ministers preach, but do not themselves believe?

In the name of freedom—press censorship, seizure of pamphlets without rhyme or reason, abolition of trial by jury (except in very special cases, freedom of speech severely limited, and now we have the Chief Constable of Preston prosecuting a newsagent for putting outside his door "Germans Confess Defeat and Accept President Wilson's Terms. War as Good as Over." And before the magistrate the Chief Constable said:—

> if people wanted to disseminate information they should go to him for it. He was responsible for the good government of the town, and did not ask for the assistance of newspaper agents or theatres; when he wanted their assistance he would ask for it.

We are progressing in our knowledge of freedom. The attitude of the Chief Constable of Potsdam—we mean Preston—deserves to be remembered.

Dr. Clifford, in an interview, published in the Daily News says that the clergy are "fettered by traditions." It is a sample of wisdom while you wait, but there is nothing novel in the remark.

Dr. Clifford says that after the War the Christian Churches were going on to "new heavens and a new earth." He forgot to mention that the stokers in another place will have entirely new uniforms.

The President of the Board of Trade has suggested that Church services should be held in daylight in order to save gas and coal. More daylight on religion should be very welcome.

"What's in a name?" asked Shakespeare. A Church of England curate bears the name of Herbert Spencer, and a private soldier is listed as "J. Cæsar."

A discussion on Christianity is proceeding in the Heywood Advertiser. A writer, who signs himself "W. Gibbs," tells two stories that deserve preserving. The first is about Bradlaugh. Bradlaugh went to lecture in Bristol. At the end of his lecture someone asked him, if he did not believe in faith, how did he account for Muller's Orphanage? Bradlaugh was silent, and never after spoke about faith. The second story concerns G. W. Foote. He was lecturing on "Did Christ Rise from the Dead?" W. Gibbs rose to ask a question, and "the men stood on the seats, pulled the pipes out of their mouths, and shouted at the top of their voices for me to sit down." We do not like to contradict Mr. Gibbs, but we think the story would have sounded more convincing if he had added that the audience threw pots of beer at him, that Mr. Foote escaped by the back door, and left the city without paying his hotel bill. Perhaps Mr. Gibbs charitably withheld these details.

The Archbishops of York and Canterbury are about to issue an appeal for five million pounds to carry "a big after War campaign of reconstruction." We wonder whether they will get it. We should not be surprised if five million fools could be found in the country who would give a sovereign each to such a stupid purpose. But we suspect that no small part of whatever is received will come from those who have made money out of the War.

The Bishop of Hull says the War has taught people to realize as never before "the real divine purpose of life." Quite evidently, then, the divine purpose of life is a funeral.

"It is a mystery how ministers of religion live," says Rev. P. Thomas, of Ferndale. It is a mystery to many people why they live. The how is simple enough.

No less than 22,500 teachers from elementary and secondary schools have joined the Army and Navy. The clergy are exempted from military service.

The Bishop of London is always talking of the dreadful poverty of the poor clergy, but they are not all in the casual wards and workhouses. The late Rev. Sir J. R. Laurie left estate of the value of £100,630. This should ensure his introduction to Dives in the place where there is no winter.

The Daily Chronicle points out that "the Prime Minister has two bishopric appointments to settle within the next few weeks." The dear clergy like people to think that the "Holy Ghost" makes the selection.

Providence still displays its playful partiality for human beings. A Reuter's telegram from San Juan de Puetorico states that nearly 200 persons were killed in the earthquake on that island, and much damage was done.

Giovanni Succi, who for many years puzzled the doctors by his ability to fast for periods of forty days, has died in Italy at the age of sixty-eight. No one regarded this ability to fast on the part of Succi as a proof of his divinity.

"Europe Smitten by Influenza" is a headline in a daily paper. A striking proof of the paternal regard of poor old Providence.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

November 10, Liverpool; November 17, Birmingham (N. S. S. Conference); November 24, Leeds; December 1, Ferndale; December 8, Leicester; December 15, Nuneaton; December 22, Glasgow.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—November 3, Manchester; November 10, Sheffield; December 1, Swansea.

S. C.—Received, and shall appear as early as possible.

J. A. Tomkins.—Crowded out. Shall appear next week.

R. Edmonds.—Women have been forcibly taken into the Navy. During the ages of Christian chivalry, namely, in 1379, when Sir John Arundel's fleet was overtaken by a storm, some sixty women were thrown overboard to lighten the vessels. Some of these women had volunteered to go with the sailors, others had been forcibly carried off.

F. Smith (Sheffield).—Sorry we are unable to use the MSS. submitted.

J. Williams.—We are not surprised at your wondering how we manage to keep the paper at the old price. It is not done without much trouble and anxiety. All our work is done by Trade Unionists, under Trade Union conditions. Thanks for contri bution to Fund.

H. Austin.—Free parcel being sent to address given.

J. Lauder.—Pleased to learn from a one year's reader that this paper has been of so much use to him.

F. Whatcott.—Bag of waste paper was received. Thanks for same. It is extremely useful to help in this way, and we need all the waste paper we can get.

C. A.—There is no such thing as blasphemy apart from the specific offence manufactured by Christians and other religionists. And no one can blaspheme unless he believes in a God. It is an impossible offence to one who does not believe in Deity. "Blasphemy" is an offence at law, but that is because Christians have made the law—and administer it.

T. Bell (Glasgow).—Want of space prevents our noticing your communication until next week.

E. Schofield.—Mr. Cohen's meetings will be held in Liverpool in the Clarion Cafe, Cable Street, at 3 and 7 o'clock.

Mr. B. Coupe (Glasgow).—We are sending on one of our free parcels to address. Shall be glad to hear of the result.

J. Roberts.—Glad to hear from you, and to know that you are keeping well. Pamphlet being sent.

H. W. Manon.—We are pleased to have been of use.

R. Popper.—We are sending copies as desired. Your experience has been a very hard one, and we sympathize with much that you say. We hope to see Mr. Effel's pen busy again at no very distant date.

Mr. E. Taylor.—We are very sorry to hear of your daughter's illness, and hope for better news soon. Shall hope to see you at the Leeds' meetings. Please make yourself known to Mr. Cohen.

W. P. Pearson.—If you will send on the papers here we will see to the rest. We have hopes of doing something in Ireland after the War.

W. J. Bourne.—Thanks for information which we have filed for future use.

J. Partridge.—Very pleased to know that Mr. Snell had such a fine meeting at Birmingham on Sunday last.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We regret that, owing to an oversight in proof reading, the date of the Secular Society's Conference at Birmingham was wrongly announced as November 13. The correct date is Sunday, November 17. We may take this opportunity of again expressing the hope that all Branches will be represented, and that as many members as possible will attend. Those who wish accommodation to be secured for them should write as early as possible to the General Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, stating their requirements. No time should be lost in doing this.

Manchester readers will please note that Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures to-day in the Co-operative Hall, Downing Street, Ardwick. The meetings are at 3 and 6.30 o'clock. Trams run past the door of the hall, and we trust that it will be well filled on both occasions. Freethinkers should make a special point of bringing a Christian friend with them. They could not choose a better occasion on which to introduce them to a Freethought meeting. Admission is free to these meetings, but those attending should remember that the expenses are quite as heavy as usual. Mr. Lloyd is spending some days lecturing in South Wales, and will proceed straight from there to Manchester.

During the discussion of the Scottish Education Bill in the House of Commons, the Glasgow Branch of the N.S.S. forwarded to the Secretary for Scotland and other M.Ps. a well-worded resolution protesting against the inclusion of religious instruction in any form. Of these gentlemen Sir John M'Callum replied:—

> Your letter of Glasgow Secular Society with Resolution received. I quite approve, and did my utmost in Committee to contend for the question at issue, but while we defeated the Government once, we were not successful in carrying this matter in the direction which you indicate, and therefore accepted the milder form of religious instruction without being mandatory.

We are glad to be able to publish this reply, and we hope to see Mr. M'Callum as active when the question of religion in English State schools comes before the House of Commons.

Next Sunday (Nov. 10) Mr. Cohen lectures twice at Liverpool. The meetings will be held in the Clarion Cafe, Cable Street, at 3 and 7 o'clock. Local Freethinkers are asked to do what they can towards making these meetings as widely known as possible.

We have received two works written by Mr. Theodore Schroeder, of New York, neither of which state any published price The first covers 120 pp., and is another contribution to Mr. Schroeder's more numerous writings on the erotogenetic interpretation of religion. It consists of an unpublished essay on "Heavenly Bridegrooms," by "Ida C.," and describes the experiences of various women with "Borderland Bridegrooms." It is a fine sample of the workings of the sex-instinct and its mistaken interpretations in terms of religious mysticism. Religious history and literature is full of such instances, and it is only of recent years that the real nature of much of the so-called religious ecstasy has been recognized. To this enlightenment Mr. Schroeder has helped in no small measure.

The second work is also of great interest to Freethinkers. It consists of a summary of Mr. Schroeder's prepared argument in the trial for "blasphemy" of a Freethought lecturer, Mr. N. X. Mochus, in Detroit, in 1916. After citing all the American statute laws on the subject, Mr. Schroeder gives an interesting survey of the various blasphemy prosecutions both in this country and in the United States, and the opinions of authorities thereon. It is an important publication, and, from the title page we gather, will form part of a larger work on Constitutional Free Speech. American Freethinkers owe Mr. Schroeder a debt of gratitude for his able and unwearying work in the cause of Free Speech.

Mr. Schroeder notes the importance of the House of Lords' decision in the Bowman Case, particularly as affecting that ancient shibboleth, "Christianity is part of the law of England." But he does not note another very important aspect of the judgment, which is that it makes a bequest to any Secular Society—that is, to a Society organized for the avowed purpose of destroying Christianity—perfectly legal. The fact of the Secular Society, Limited, being a registered body has led to the belief that a bequest to an unregistered Society was illegal. That is not, and never was, the case. Bequests to the National Secular Society, or to local Secular Societies, were set on one side solely because of the purposes to which the bequest was to be devoted. The decision of the House of Lords declares those purposes to be quite legal, and therefore legalizes a bequest to any Society, whether registered or unregistered. It is this which, in our opinion, gives the victory so sweeping a character.

We note that Mr. A. B. Moss made an "official" appearance at the Southwark Sessions the other day, and, as has been his custom for nearly thirty years, affirmed on the ground of being without religious belief. We should like to see Mr. Moss's excellent example followed by other Freethinkers who hold any post or office under local governing bodies, and whose appearance in courts is rendered necessary thereby. It has an educational effect on all concerned, and would serve to enlighten court officials who are sometimes painfully ignorant on the matter.

One of our Scotch readers and occasional contributors writes:—

> A chance remark sometimes helps to make a lifelong friendship. This week, in a railway carriage, I met an old gentleman, who passed the remark that it was sad to see so much grain spoiled by the rain while God was in his heaven, and did nothing to help the poor farmer. This remark led to an interchange of ideas. My chance friend was an out-and-out Freethinker, and anxious to get into touch with the N. S. S. literature. He has now got a start, and is likely to get more, as he has been supplied with the address where he can obtain same.

The same correspondent adds:—

> There is now such a demand for the Freethinker in Glasgow that usual readers are finding some difficulty in procuring a copy. Better give a standing order to your newsagent. The idea of ordering a few copies, and leaving your newsagent to dispose of them, has caught on. Very few copies are ever left over.

Another centre for the supply of Freethought literature is The Reformers' Bookstall, 126 Bothwell Street, Glasgow.

From the East Rand Express of August 3, we see that the Education Inspector of the East Rand Circuit reports that 318 children have been withdrawn by their parents from religious instruction. Our compliments to the parents of those 318 youngsters. We feel sure they will appreciate their parent's action when they grow older.

Many of our readers will no doubt miss Dr. Lyttelton's promised article in this week's issue. But up to the time of going to press nothing from that gentleman had reached us. We hope this is due to nothing worse than a postal miscarriage.

The Glasgow Branch tried the experiment of changing its hour of meeting from 12 noon to 6 in the evening. Mr. Lonsdale, the Secretary, gave a very much appreciated address on Jefferies' "The Story of My Heart," but it has now been decided to revert to the midday hour as the time for meetings. To-day (Nov. 3) the subject is "The Higher Criticism."

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

THE purpose of this Fund is to make good part of the deficit caused by the very heavy increase in the cost of paper, advance of wages, etc. A full statement on this head was made in our issue for September 1.

A Naturalist's Paradise.

III.

HAVING reviewed those nearer relatives of humanity, the apes, monkeys, and lemurs of Borneo, a few words are necessary concerning man's remoter congeners, the bats. Twenty genera, subdivided into forty-six species, of these flying mammals, reside in the island. The huge fruit bats, it is said,— > are as familiar a feature of the Bornean landscape at evening as are in England the rooks winging their way home to roost; the bats, however, are on their way to some fruit trees, where they will feed all night, yelling and wrangling the while like all the cats of Kilkenny. During the day they have hung in numbers from the branches of trees, often at a considerable distance from their last feeding place, and they look like bunches of some grotesque fruit.

These voracious creatures devastate the fruit gardens, and in the adjacent island of Java the cultivators are driven to harvest their fruit before it is mature, so as to preserve it from the predaceous bats. Then there is an army of smaller bats, with appetites so keen that one only of these gluttonous animals will gorge more than its own weight in bananas in a single night.

Like all other organisms, bats are afflicted with parasites. A curious earwig infests the brood pouches of one Bornean species; but although bats are usually plagued by wingless flies, the flea is seldom a source of annoyance to them. Presumably, most human beings have observed, or even been temporarily exasperated, by the presence of fleas at some time or other. Yet we are assured by a high authority, Harold Russell, that our cousins the monkeys, in a state of nature, are free from the attentions of these leaping, blood-sucking parasites. In captivity, monkeys are liable to the attacks of human and other fleas; but we learn from Russell that "no fleas have been found truly parasitic on monkeys." When to the onlooker the monkey appears to be energetically occupied in flea-hunting, it is really searching, as Professor Shipley puts it, for "little scabs of scurf, which is made palatable to its taste by a certain sour sweat" (Studies in Insect Life, p. 19; 1917).

Bats are very unprepossessing in appearance, and probably suggested the traditional Evil spirit. The membrane of their umbrella-like wings provides an extensive pouch, common to both male and female forms, in which the offspring are carried. Whether the male bat ever carries the young is an open question. Indeed, our knowledge of the habits of bats is still very imperfect; and of the Bornean species it is asserted that not one of them has been adequately studied.

The Cat group is well in evidence in Borneo; but these carnivores give little trouble to the natives. The Clouded Leopard is the largest of these creatures, but, distinctly unlike its relatives, the tiger and panther of the neighbouring peninsula, it avoids the vicinity of man. One of the wild cats of Sarawak proves a terror to the natives' fowls. Concerning another Bornean cat, Felis planicops, Dr. Hose, in his valuable Mammals of Borneo, relates "that the animal is extremely fond of fruit, and has frequently been known to dig up and eat the potatoes which are grown by the natives." This statement may seem strange in the light of the fact that all the Felidæ are carnivorous; but when we remember how omnivorous domestic cats have become, our astonishment is diminished.

Various animals announce themselves to friend, foe, and neutral by their conspicuous markings. Such striking advertisements are frequently associated with nauseousness of taste or odour. The North American skunk bears his large white tail erect in such a way that it serves as a warning. The appearance of a skunk's tail in the distance is sufficient to deter anyone in the least degree susceptible to evil odours from any nearer approach to the animal. Several animals of this type are common in the Malay region, and are studiously avoided on account of their disgusting stench. One of these creatures is abundant in the Natuna Islands, and a naturalist engaged in collecting there assured Shelford that his native assistants "flatly refused to skin the specimens that he shot on account of the revolting odour." Several of these malodorous organisms are found in Borneo and the adjoining islands, and are all conspicuously coloured. Moreover, in Java an edible Musteline carnivore mimics the odious Mydaus, and doubtless its marked resemblance to its nauseous model serves as a protection against predatory enemies.

The munsangs and monkeys of Borneo are very partial to the coffee berry, and seriously injure the crops. But Nature moves in a mysterious way her wonders to perform. The animals' digestive juices, while acting on the delicate pulp enclosing the hard kernel, permit the berries themselves to pass through the intestinal channels entirely unimpaired, and thus they are expelled from the body. Their strange journey completed, the discarded berries are carefully gathered. In terms of the received theory—> only the ripest and best fruit is selected by the monkeys and munsangs for their meal, the dejecta are regarded as of first-rate quality and fetch a good price in the market—a fact which is mercifully concealed from the British consumer.

While the rodents are represented by twelve species of rats, three species of porcupine, and at least sixteen of squirrels, the hoofed animals are very sparsely present in Borneo. The noble elephant survives in small numbers in British North Borneo. Although these quadrupeds may be the descendants of a herd of elephants originally introduced from one of the Malay States, there seems small doubt that the elephant was at an earlier period indigenous to the island. A fossil tooth discovered in a Sarawak cave is evidence of this. But, apart from the Malay term "Gajah," there is no name for elephant in the primitive native tongues, and no tradition lingers of the former existence of the animal in Sarawak.

Another giant mammal, the rhinoceros, is still extant in British North Borneo; but the animal appears mainly confined to the little-visited interior of the island, where it struggles on the brink of extinction. Those lesser Ungulates, wild swine, boast three species in Borneo. In the primitive jungle these pigs progress in great herds from place to place. The reason for these migrations is conjectural. Possibly the need for new pastures, or even the prevalence of swine fever, or some similar epidemic may explain these wanderings. In any case, the non-Moslem tribes take full advantage of these migrations, for when the animals emerge from the forest they slaughter them wholesale for food.

What Kropotkin termed "Mutual aid among animals is cogently illustrated by the naturalist, Ernest Hose. Hearing a tremendous uproar of wild boars grunting and squealing in the forest near his residence in Santubong, Mr. Hose went out to ascertain its cause. He discovered that a huge snake had seized a young swine and was trying to kill it. "The snake," writes Shelford, to whom Hose narrated the occurrence,— > was surrounded by a number of full-grown swine which were goring it with their tusks and trampling on it; so resolute was their attack that the python was compelled to relinquish its hold of the loudly protesting young pig, when the herd catching sight of Mr. Hose, hastily made off, the young one, apparently little the worse for its adventure, trotting away with its companions. Mr. Hose examined the snake and found it to be so slashed and mangled that it was unable to crawl away from the scene of battle.

The Bornean wild boar, Shelford contended, provides a powerful example of the transmission of an acquired character. In the young animal each side of the upper lip is "deeply notched to accommodate the tushes which, however, have not yet made their appearance." This is obviously a weighty circumstance, for we have every reason to suppose that this notching originally arose through the pressure of the enlarged tusks. Now, these notches precede the appearance of the tusks which originally caused them by several months. In this instance the acquired notches have become firmly fixed by heredity.

The Plandok or Bornean mouse deer is one of the most beautiful and graceful animals in the world. This pretty creature is the hero of a host of native stories, and it has, doubtless, always attracted attention through its diminutiveness and beauty, for the mouse deer is no larger, and far less heavy than a hare.

In addition to several species of more ordinary deer, a few wild oxen survive. The only other mammals of moment are the aquatic dugongs, porpoises, and an occasional whale stranded on the Bornean shores. The solitary member of the Edentate order is the scaly ant-eater, an animal which is credited by the natives with far greater guile and general intelligence than is usually conceded to it by the average European naturalist.

Modern Methods of Salving the "Soul."

II.

His prepossessions are likewise revealed in the fact that his theories and dogmas are oracular pronouncements and not reasoned conclusions from established truths. I will give one example of it from his Psychology (Home University Series). On p. 174 he states in quite his oracular strain that "progressive evolution has been primarily an evolution of mental structure and only secondarily one of bodily structure." We are not, by-the-bye, favoured with a peep into the metaphysical "cabinet of mysteries" and see the how and the why changes in "mental structure" occur in the absence of experience.

Now, the above statement by presenting a half truth as if it were the whole, is tantamount to a falsity. It has all the ugly look of a suppresso veri et suggestio falsi Why omit all mention and reference to the cerebral system —the brain and its appendages? Why slur over in dumb silence the premier system of the body, and the very one that "leads and controls" the rest? Why allude to the body with such culpable vagueness, by the phrase "bodily structures," as if all systems within it were co-ordinate—as if brain and ligaments, for instance, were apar in functional importance in the animal economy? Whether he intended it or not, his pet phrase, "mental structure," by drawing attention away from the whole truth, does suggest the false. And it is upon this suggestion that his "soul" theory rests. A full and accurate statement of the facts would rob it of any basis. No one could imagine from his language in that chapter that the body contains an organ of mind. One could think that "mental structures" were metaphysical self-existences in no organic relation with brain and nerves. Yet no one knows better than he that there is no "mental structure" except in absolute correlation with cerebral structure, and that every change in the one involves a simultaneous change in the other.

Had he said that "progressive evolution" has been primarily one of neural structure, and the rest of the body a secondary one, it would be an accurate statement of facts; for muscles, bones, ligaments, glands, cells, and secretions are merely the instruments of the brain to effect its ends. And as the series of changes, usually, if not invariably, originate in the creature's physical environment, it might be said without inaccuracy that the changes in "mental structure" follow the changes in neural structure, though strictly speaking they are simultaneous modifications.

The way to test his metaphysical dictum is to apply it to a familiar case in which its truth may be easily checked. For example, to become a smoker involves a complete change in "mental structure"—that is, from a feeling of disgust for tobacco to one of liking for it. Now, according to the above "principle," this liking for tobacco is acquired by the smoker before he ever puts a pipe in his mouth. Otherwise it is not "primarily an evolution of mental structure," for it would involve experience and the participation of the body in the change, and reverse the above order.

This example, though a voluntary one, is typical of the way in which every change in tastes, habits, and "mode of life" is effected by sentient creatures. It begins with a state of disharmony or antagonism between a stimulating environment (tobacco in this instance) and neural tissue; then, after a grim and often a protracted struggle, harmony is restored through a readjustment between the revolting neurones and the hostile environment.

Without pursuing the matter further, it is thus obvious that only a person in the firm grip of a prepossession would ever commit himself to such a "theory."

Again, he seems to shun the obvious lessons of his his own teachings. At all events, he slurs over them in dumb silence. He not only admits, but teaches, in the most unequivocal and praiseworthy manner, the absolute concomitance, correlation, or parallelism which exist between mental and neural processes. Lest the reader should miss the significance of this fact, I will summarize in the briefest manner I can the lessons taught in the book. The parallel movement between the structure and activity of mind and brain may be advantageously summed up under three orders of concomitance. (1) An ascending order. (2) A descending order. (3) A functional order.

That is to say, the level of mental development or capacity ascends in strict concurrence with complexity of neural structure from amœba to man, and from infant to adult. Again, degeneration, decadence, or disappearance of mental powers, as witnessed in senile decay, in insanity, and in cases of cerebral injury, keeps pace with neural conditions with the most absolute regularity. And, lastly, mental activity flows and fluctuates at every instant of life in strict accordance to the efficiency with which the brain functions as determined by rest, sleep, and the quality and abundance of the blood-stream that energizes it.

The irresistible inference or lesson from these facts is, that the mind is the offspring of organized neural substance, whatever may be its ultimate nature—whether it be a physical "something," a metaphysical "nothing," or a physico-metaphysical hybrid; and, further, that when the organization decays, is destroyed, or fails to function, mind vanishes. In other words, that mind is as mortal as body.

This lesson is further emphasized in his very remarkable but correct insistence upon extending the principle of causation so as to include, in the case of sentient beings, not only physical phenomena, but mental ones as well. That is to say, that alcohol and intoxication, for example, stand related to one another as cause and effect. Nobody, of course, outside Bedlam ever dreams of doubting that fact save those "extra mural patients," the pure metaphysicians. It should, however, be pointed out that Dr. McDougall does not adopt this most sane but novel view for the sake of emphasizing the absolute correlation between mind and body, but simply because he considers it favourable to his "soul" theory—an object that will save him the execrations and derisions of the metaphysicians.

Such, then, seems to be the lesson taught by this little primer; and I fancy that Dr. McDougall would readily acquiesce in the above summary statement of it, though he fails himself to express it in a manner so outspoken and categorical, as if afraid of his own conclusions.

To me this lesson is so complete and absolute that it carries with it the corollary that the idea of a "soul" or "spirit" is so unnecessary and useless an adjunct as to be a meaningless superfluity in the mental economy of sentient life. To Dr. McDougall, however, that is not so. He thinks a "soul" is necessary to complete the mental machinery, and so sets about to salve it in right earnest. What this "soul" is, apart from mind, he does not tell us; anyhow, he acts on the maxim that "Silence is golden." From the few vague allusions, however, we may hazard a negative description of this destitute and characterless vacuity: The "soul" is the mind's sleeping partner during life, but which may wake up at death and carry on the mind's business without the aid of its cerebral plant and machinery.

The Clergy and the Theatre.

(Reprinted from "Jack Canuck," Toronto, August 17, 1918.)

A few weeks ago the Rev. James H. Boyd, at the Middlesex and Lambton Ministerial Association, gave voice to a general denunciation of all worldly pleasure, he, in turn, attacking the dance halls, card-playing saloons, books, and the theatre. The reverend gentleman receives his answer in the following letter (so far as the theatre is concerned) from a Newark, N.J., lady, who "follows a stage career."

DEAR SIR,—As one of those "who follow a stage career," will you permit me a word of reply to your rabid indictment before the Middlesex and Lambton Association of Baptist Churches?

Let the card players and dancers speak for themselves, but as one who is making her way in this world by work on the stage, I think I have a few things to call to your mind which you, in your holy zeal, have entirely overlooked.

My home is in the U.S.A., but I can safely speak for the artists of the stage in Canada as well as in England when I say that, in the first place, when there is a great fire, a pestilence of any sort, a damaging flood, a catastrophe of any sort, to whom does the public first turn? Who are the first to offer their services free? Is it a minister of one of the many gospels? Not so you could notice it. The people of the stage are the first to stage a benefit, and thereby net huge sums which they turn over to the sufferers. When the Governments want to reach the people to have them conserve food, to buy bonds to defray the expenses of the present conflict in Europe, do they use the churches? Not much. They go to the theatres, where they are sure of courteous treatment by managers, actors, and other employees as well.

Would the ministers and priests surrender their pulpits as cheerfully as actors have their stages? Try the little matter out and see.

When the boys on the other side are in need of cheer and comfort, do the Governments call on the dominies to do the task? Yes, they do not. They call on the actors, and these respond gladly and cheerfully, and give their services free, which the ministers do not. Your ministers and priests may serve in some capacity, yes, but they go as paid chaplains, and not as voluntary workers.

Did the actors claim exemption in this world battle? They did not. But you ministers lost no time in getting on the exempt list.

Are actors paying their full fare on the railroads, and thereby putting themselves out of pocket by many dollars? They are. But ministers and priests still ride on the "half fare" graft, which they are not willing that returned soldiers, or soldiers about to go over, should enjoy.

Have you ever, my fine friend, looked up the statistics of the U.S.A. and Canada, which will tell you that there are any number of parsons in jails, while the number of actors, male and female, is a surprisingly small one in comparison? Of course you have not, because, in doing so, you might learn something about your trade, and those that pursue it.

Your actor is ever in the front rank of those that are giving—giving and doing it gladly—and without thought of recompense, while ministers and priests, the world over, dole out their salvation at so much per "salve."

"I do not see the U.S. Government getting together any number of parsons to go "over there" for the good of the morale of our heroes, but it certainly is getting together contingents of actors and actresses to bring cheer and comfort to the hearts of them that are fighting for us. If the theatre were the pernicious influence you and your kind are trying to make others believe that it is, the U.S. Government (in which I have every confidence) would try its utmost to keep actors far from the battle line, instead of sending them over. Think it over, and see if you will not learn something if it is not too late.

When you say that "Few of those who follow a stage career escape the meshes of the net" you are aware, of course, that you are attacking the women of the stage? Are you aware at all that when a woman works on the stage she is working harder for a living than ministers and priests. And that she gives the public, who pay the price, full value for money received, while you and others of your ilk dole out promises of a future hell and other stuff that should be banned for larger salaries than the average actress gets? She gives melody and artistry of some sort, while you give for the money you get only promises about something that will happen in the future life—which is all speculation, and nothing that you are positive of. The average actress has far finer ideals than the average minister, her life is cleaner and sweeter, even if you do not think so.

Consult your criminal records of murder, rape, and other bestialities, and compare the number of ministers and priests, not only accused, but convicted on these counts with surprisingly small numbers of actors and actresses that you will find.

Obituary.

Wm. H. Hall, aged fifty-five, of Seymour Place, Marylebone, died on October 23. His passing away will be regretted by all who knew him. For several years he and his wife devoted most of their leisure time in selling Freethought literature at open-air meetings, principally in the vicinity of Hyde Park. He met death at the very gate, and his brave resignation, after a long illness, was a splendid example to all who value intellectual freedom as the greatest treasure in life.—E. D.

Spiritual Vision.

In one of his writings Mr. G. K. Chesterton says that the real question at issue between the Christian and the Freethinker is, "Are there or are there not certain powers and experiences possible to the human mind which really occur when the mind is suitably disposed? Is the religious history of mankind a chronicle of accidental lies, delusions, and coincidences, or is it a chronicle of real things which we happen not to be able to do, and real visions which we happen not to be able to see?" As is not unusual with Mr. Chesterton, he succeeds here in saying nothing in particular, while apparently expressing a deal in a small compass. For, far from meeting the case of the scientific Freethinker, it shows no real appreciation of it. Mr. Chesterton's case is that the Christian saint or mystic is, by the exercise of certain spiritual experiences, brought into another world of being. The Freethinker does not deny the experiences —without the qualifying "spiritual"—but he submits there is another and more rational explanation at hand.

Witnesses to the Unseen.

Let us take a few examples. The Catholic Church will produce clouds of testimony from men and women to the effect that certain visions were seen in certain circumstances. These circumstances are usually long vigils, fasting, praying, a more or less solitary life, and constant meditation upon mystical matters. The witnesses will dilate upon the feeling of exaltation that accompanied and preceded such visions, and will describe the subjective experiences with all the detail that one might use in describing a fit of indigestion, or an attack of the toothache. Now, no Freethinker who understands his case would say these witnesses were all liars. Nor would he say that they were all insane in the general sense of the word. Neither would he deny that under the same conditions he himself would in all probability experience much the same kind of visions and feelings. What he would say, and what he does say, is that all this religious testimony can be explained on pathological grounds as due to an unwholesome nervous strain. If any modern cares to try the experiment, and sit, like some Hindoo fakir, for so many hours per day contemplating his stomach, and repeating the sacred word "Om," we do not hesitate in saying that he too will see visions; and in that case he need not cite a "cloud of witnesses"—he can cite himself.

Spirits and "Spirits."

Delirium tremens is not a spiritual, although it is a spirituous, complaint. Yet the visions seen by people in this state—the devils and curious animals crawling and rushing in and out—are as real as anything seen by St. Theresa or St. Anthony. But we do not suppose for a moment that anyone will argue that beer or whisky has the power of unlocking a new and real spiritual world to which ordinary people are dead. He will say, of course, that these people are real enough to the people who see them, but that they are in fact the creation of a brain and nervous system disordered by excessive alcoholic indulgence. But will he, or will anybody else, point out the essential difference, if any, between the visions of a St. Theresa and those of a confirmed dipsomaniac? It is beside the point to run off with the remark that the comparison of a "saint" with a drunkard is degrading. There is nothing degrading in a scientific inquiry; and in all seriousness we assert that the visions of saint and dipsomaniac, the exaltation of the religious mystic, and the exaltation of the opium-eater or whisky-drinker are in all essential features identical. They are each induced by excessive indulgence in one direction, and by the exclusion of counteracting agencies. The dipsomaniac enters into communication just as much, or just as little, with an actual spiritual world as does the Christian saint. And, as a matter of fact, a man suffering from delirium tremens would, in the Middle Ages, have been placed on the same level as the "saint." His visions would have been of the lower world exclusively; but there would have been no other distinction. All sorts of lunatics were also placed upon the same level. And we would suggest to Mr. Chesterton that any lunatic asylum would furnish him with quite as many people who have "certain powers and experiences when the mind is suitably disposed" as he can find in "the world-old chorus" of religious witnesses.

The Influence of Environment.

And here is another aspect of the matter that appeals to one conducting a really scientific inquiry. The Christian "saint" sees visions. So, too, does the Hindoo fakir and the Mohammedan dervish. On Mr. Chesterton's hypothesis they are each catching a glimpse of the spiritual world from which the more materialistic evolution of others has shut them out. Yet the Hindoo never saw the Christian form of the spiritual world, the Christian never saw the Hindoo form, the Mohammedan never saw either. Each sees his own or, to put it in another way, each sees what his education has led him to see. And while there is such an obvious explanation of these facts so ready to hand, it is almost insanity to propound such a fantastic hypothesis as that of a new spiritual world unlocked to the view of certain highly-favoured individuals. There is also the modern form of this spiritual exaltation. This no longer takes the form of visions. The man who nowadays went round seeing visions and hearing voices and fighting with the Devil, as did Luther and others, would soon find himself in a lunatic asylum. Nowadays people say they feel the influence of a spiritual world. They have left off seeing it, and have come down to the more general sense of feeling it. People are no longer moved to rush off to the wilderness, abandon soap and water, and even clothing, for their spiritual welfare. On the contrary, they talk much of the gospel of social work, of sanitation, advocate the building of workhouses for the greater glory of God, and behave in such a way that the earlier "saints" would, if they were here, denounce them as children of the Devil.

The Old and the New.

Why should the "spiritual vision" have undergone this change? If it teaches the holiness of social work in the twentieth century, why should it have taught the exact opposite in the tenth? Surely anyone whose mind is not given over to the fruitless labour of hatching ingenious theories to amuse an idle hour or to fill a couple of columns in a newspaper, must see that the whole explanation lies in the difference and influence of environment. The present day Christian, living in a community that calls itself Christian, coming of an ancestry that has been Christian, operated upon by the eloquence and influence of people whose business it is to see that he remains Christian, clothes his social feelings and his morality in a Christian dress, as naturally as he—in this country—expresses his thoughts in the English language, and for exactly the same reason. But his feelings and his morality are no more due to Christianity than his thoughts are due to his use of English. Both are mere accidents of the environment. If he did not think in English, he would in French, or Russian, or German, or some other language. And if his social instincts did not express themselves in Christian dress, they as certainly would in some other manner. The Freethinker does not, therefore, put on one side the "evidence" brought forward on behalf of religion. He accepts it and shows its real nature. The visions of the mediæval saint or mystic exist to-day, but they are differently understood, and differently explained. The "spiritual vision" of Jesus casting devils out of an epileptic, and the methods of the modern physician dealing with a similar case, represent the difference between the old and the new point of view. The modern world is hardly likely to go back to the standpoint of Jesus. Devils once exorcized by science never return. And that camouflaged mediæval delusion—"spiritual vision"—is doomed to one day follow the way of other superstitions.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Experience as Argument.

A VAST amount of importance is now being attached to religious experience, especially by those who no longer treat the Bible as an infallible document. Time was when the Protestant divine finally settled every religious dispute by stringing together as many proof-texts as he could find, bearing, however slightly, on the points at issue. Except for a steadily dwindling minority the Word of God has ceased to be, and in its place has arisen the admittedly not always accurate Word of Man about God and destiny. Argument, too, has at last lost its clinching efficacy, and few theologians resort to it. In an interesting article in the Christian World for October 24, the Rev. F. Townley Lord, B.D., describes "the increased demand for reality, and the complaint, heard in many quarters, that so much of our time is spent in theological disputation and so little in experiential religion." What does Mr. Lord mean by "reality"? Sometimes it signifies sincerity or single-heartedness, and sometimes that unknown, possibly unknowable something, which, by many philosophers, is supposed to underlie all phenomena. In the latter sense reality is not a commodity for which there is any general demand; but it is incontrovertible that the theologians spend most of their time is vain disputation. Every believer in God is to that extent a disputatious person. Has a preacher of the Gospel ever appeared who did not dispute with unbelievers? So-called experiential religion is rooted and grounded in beliefs which are in their very nature debatable. Mr. Lord is entirely mistaken when he affirms that "religion begins in experience." The present writer is acquainted with scores of persons who have never entertained a single supernatural belief, and not one of them has ever had any religious experience. One of the commonest forms of religious experience is prayer; but prayer is an appeal to, or fellowship with, something which is supposed to be an objective reality. Belief of some sort necessarily precedes and accompanies prayer. "He that cometh to God," we read in Hebrews, "must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that seek after him." Mr. Lord himself virtually admits this in the following passage:—

> In the first dim beginnings of tribal religion we find an Animistic conception of the world combining with the experimental factor to form the beginnings of religion.

The conception antedates the experience just as it antedates theology, while both experience and theology develop together and usually in the same proportion, being but too closely allied off-shoots of the same stem. Belief is the offspring of ignorance energized by fear, not of the consciousness of "some Greater which is conceived as ministering to the needs of life." The appearance of a Benevolent Greater marks a later stage in the evolutionary process. Mr. Lord is somewhat vague in several of his statements, as proved by the following passage:—

> On this Mount of Experience the great stream of our religious life took its rise. The great institutions of religion—Bible. Church—began here. This was the starting-point of Theology, and all the musty volumes which grace our libraries received their birth in experience.

There is, of course, some truth in all that. It is possible to conceive of ignorance and undefined dread as phases of experience; but, surely, Mr. Lord would not dream of dubbing that experience religious. In this connection reference is made to William James's Varieties of Religious Experiences; and all readers of that remarkable work are aware that the pragmatical philosopher depicts therein an experience he himself did not share in any of its varieties. He did not believe in the existence of a personal God, nor in that of the human soul. He believed neither in the spiritual world nor in immortality. Like Browning, he was an Agnostic, and, like Browning, he could accurately delineate beliefs and experiences of which he had no direct personal knowledge. He was merely a skilful psychologist. Speaking of personal religion all he maintains is that it is more fundamental than either theology or ecclesiasticism, and was the primordial thing with the founders of every Church who represented themselves as living in real communion with the Divine. But of necessity those founders believed in the Divine before they could have had fellowship with it. In reality, James does not support Mr. Lord in the least.

It is contended that the varieties of religious experience "reflect the free movement of the human soul towards the Divine"; but, generally speaking, such a movement has never been quite spontaneous and free, but painfully constrained, against the grain, a severe violation of the natural order. The natural trend of the human mind is away from, not towards, the Divine. By Nature we are all alike Atheists. Sainthood is a profession carried on by never-ceasing effort. Augustine, A Kempis, and Bernard, three of the most illustrious saints, experienced unspeakable difficulty in realizing the gracious nearness of their Divine Redeemer. Because their nature rebelled against God and religion they insulted it and its Maker by calling it corrupt, depraved, and lost, because of Adam's sin. To be natural was to be non-religious, ungodly; therefore, to be natural was the greatest conceivable offence against God. Religion was and is a perpetual fight against Nature, and the greatest saint is he who is most successful in subduing it. It is in order to counteract and overcome the natural resistance which the human mind offers to the appeal of religion that Christendom teems with crafty priests, Catholic and Protestant; but so powerful is Nature's antagonism to the heavenly calling, that their ministrations, so far from prospering, are becoming more and more futile each succeeding generation. Mr. Lord complains that the religious life is to-day far from what it ought to be. He says:—

> One cannot help feeling that too many to-day are content with the repetition of religious formulæ, and the observation of religious ceremony, without the all necessary life of which these are but the expression..... The same applies to all forms and ceremonies, which retain their power only in the measure in which they touch our lives.

Mr. Lord is convinced that the War is having the effect of reviving people's interest in religion, which may be true in a few instances here and there; but we have the testimony of several chaplains at the various fronts and at home that on multitudes the effect is of an entirely opposite character. This is how Mr. Lord states the case:—

> Religion, to be real, must be first hand. On this ground we are encouraged when we hear of men, hitherto careless of God, but now in these days of sore distress feeling in the depths of their being the inflowing of the Divine tide. At last many are beginning to hear the still small voice, and they can hear the tone above the din of battle. In their hearts they feel that thrill—the pulsation of the Divine heart. Life is becoming transfigured with new meaning, and words and things and values cast away before are appearing in their true colours. If there should be any revival of religion, it will begin here—not in acceptance of a statement previously rejected, but in a new impulse, a new force surging through the soul.

The writer of that passage evidently belongs to the so-called non-dogmatic school of theologians; but in reality there is no such school. Theology, of necessity, treats of God, including his being, his attributes, and his relation to the world and human destiny, and every statement concerning him can be no other than a dogma, a metaphysical speculation. Even the article we are now criticizing is of a highly speculative, hypothetical character. Whenever a man turns religious it is because of the stirring within him of a certain emotion or impulse as the result of his acceptance of specific declarations made in the name and by the alleged authority of God as revealed in and by Christ. By pure speculation Jesus blossoms into the Eternal Christ, his death into a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, and his Church into the temple of the third person in the Holy Trinity. Supernatural religion cannot even exist at all apart from dogmatic theology. Our contention is, however, that all theology, the New no less than the Old, concerns itself about nothing but its own creation, the objective non-existence of which is demonstrated by the fact that it appeals only to those who are superstitious enough to believe in it. To all others it is as if it were not. Somebody has said that God does not reveal himself to fools; but even the admission that there are fools is in itself a powerful argument against the existence of a personal God. The most illuminating of all facts is the fact that no Deity exists save as an object of faith. To the non-believing he is profoundly and eternally silent, and as inactive as he is silent. The tremendous significance of this fact has never been sufficiently emphasized by the advocates of Freethought; but its weight is being appreciated more and more by crowds of thoughtful young people as this terrible War drags on. Questions are being asked and answered. What is he doing? Nothing. Where is he? Nowhere. A few ardent believers in Germany, in France, in America, and in Britain, exclaim at one and the same time: "He is on our side, fighting for and with us." Surely, this is the very climax of absurdity, the repetition and circulation thereof being the best indirect service that can possibly be rendered to "the best of causes."

Meanwhile, the people who glorify religious experience, regarding it as the only effective argument for supernatural religion, are almost daily decreasing in number.

J. T. Lloyd.

Out of the Night.

> A world in the hand is worth two in the bush. Let us have to do with real men and women, and not with skipping ghosts.—Emerson.
> After all, a book (the Bible) cannot make a stand against the wild, living intellect of man.—Cardinal Newman.

The name of Cardinal Newman is known the world over; that of his younger brother, Francis Newman, is known to but few. Yet Francis did substantial good during his lifetime, which extended almost throughout the nineteenth century. Born at the beginning of the century, he lived until near its close, working, as he himself said, in a letter to a friend, to do something for the good of those who had fewer advantages than himself.

Francis William Newman was born in a religious family, and he had the same early training as his elder brother, who became a Cardinal of the Catholic Church. Educated at Oxford University, he was elected to a fellowship at Balliol College, but resigned, being unable conscientiously to comply with the regulations of the Test Act, then in force. After journeying into Syria as a missionary, Francis Newman abandoned all thoughts of taking holy orders as he had contemplated. While his brother, John Henry Newman, was attracted by the authority of the Church, Francis found himself seceding more and more from her, drifting slowly but surely into Freethought. The Church's loss was the world's gain, for the good work he was to do was not within the narrow confines of the cloister, but in the busy world. He became Classical Professor in Manchester New College, and subsequently Latin Professor at London University. By the middle of the century he had given up Christianity, and had written his memorable Phases of Faith, a work which still lives, and will continue to live, as an expression of a remarkable personality and a "human document" of extraordinary interest.

The book is a veritable pilgrim's progress from Christianity to Freethought. It is a plain unvarnished account of the reasons why Francis Newman gave up his belief in orthodoxy. Beginning as a believer of the narrowest type, he shows, step by step, how he relinquished article after article of his creed. Its great merit is the transparent honesty of the writer, which shines on every page. It needed courage, too, to write such a book, for Newman was a university professor and ran the risk of dismissal from his post. Indeed, ostracism was then, as now, a formidable weapon in the hands of the Church. A work which, for the first time, put the arguments for evolution in popular language, the Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation (1844), had to be issued anonymously, or its author would have been ruined. Professor Newman had more courage than Robert Chambers. Referring to his youthful creed he said plainly:—

> I knew not then, and I know not now, why bishops, as such, should be more reverenced than common clergymen; or clergymen, as such, more than common men.

It needed audacity to write such things. Such a declaration, over the signature of a university professor, was not pleasant reading for the orthodox. It was written in a way that all could understand, and not in the veiled language of the learned. Plain speech is not esteemed at its proper value. Ruskin once said, laughingly, that people no longer thought him a fine writer, because, if he thought a man's house was on fire, he only said, "Sir, your house is on fire," whereas formerly he used to say, "Sir, the abode in which you probably passed the delightful days of your adolescence is in imminent danger of conflagration."

Like so many Freethinkers, Francis Newman was a zealous reformer. No sooner did his eye alight on an abuse, or he became aware of a canker in society, than he burned to remedy the one and pluck out the other. In every civilization there will always be found, sheltering under the wall, evil things not yet brought to book, not yet revealed in their true nature, but still dragging back the wheels of progress and the betterment of humanity. Four of such evils Francis Newman spent years of his life in combating: cruelty to animals, intemperance, militarism, and the harshness of the criminal code. Newman was no half-hearted reformer, and he wielded a swift, live pen. How pertinent is his question, "Why does one murder make a villain, but the murder of thousands a hero?" And again, "Why do princes and statesmen, who would scorn to steal a shilling, make no difficulty in stealing a kingdom?"

Newman was a determined opponent of the system of long terms of imprisonment, and pointed out the evils that arose from the offences of one bringing in their train the pauperizing of many dependent on the criminal. His strenuous advocacy of land reform was by no means the least service rendered by this noble-hearted enthusiast. Hear his words:—

> That a man should be able to buy up large tracts of land, and make himself the owner of them—to keep them in or out of culture as he pleases—to keep or open roads, and dictate where houses should be built .....this is no natural right; but is an artificial creation of arbitrary law; law made by legislation for personal convenience—certainly not for the benefit of the nation.

This country is far behind the Continent in this matter. "We know not whither, beside England," he wrote, "to look for a nation living by wages, and divorced from all rights in the crops which they raise."

Brave old man! His famous brother, the lonely Cardinal of a reactionary Church, may be better known to the world, but to us Francis Newman is the greater and nobler man. He was of the stuff of which heroes are made. Always boldest where there was a cause that needed fighting for, or on behalf of fellow-citizens who were powerless to right their own wrongs, and who required someone to voice them, his pen was tireless on behalf of progress. We salute the memory of one who, in the midst of difficulties, and breathing an atmosphere heavy with superstition and corruption, yet showed himself a good and a wise man:—

> O framed for nobler times and calmer hearts!
> O studious thinker eloquent for Truth!

Religion and Life.

SIR,—I discern a danger ahead. A young philosopher of to-day has been criticized by his friends because, when he is tired, he has a way of repeating an argument which has been controverted in the same words but in a louder tone of voice. Have you not, in your last, girded at me again for not saying what I mean by God, without noticing the reasons for reticence which I have given? They amount to this: that it is a question of personal knowledge of an invisible spiritual Being, and such knowledge cannot be acquired second-hand. I should be glad if you would refer to what I wrote on this topic. This much, however, I will add. Any Christian to whom religion is a reality has learnt that the Being whom he worships can only be known by those who wish to know Him. We don't quarrel with this law, because it is bound up with the fact of our friendships with each other. If A gets leave to introduce B to C, it is because C wishes to know B. If C denies any such wish, A will be well advised to save himself the trouble of an introduction, because he knows C will not get to know B even if he is introduced. Still less would he get anything out of the introduction if he started with the conviction, or perhaps only the affirmation, that B had no existence. I once knew man who met an acquaintance in Bond Street, and the latter, after shaking hands, said, "Do you know, it is a funny thing, but I thought you were dead." A tactless remark, you will admit, and it led to their intercourse ceasing. The other man judged that if his acquaintance knew and cared so little about him, it would be a waste of time to continue any further relations. But if this gentleman had been convinced from the start that the other didn't exist at all, the acquaintance would never have got so far as it did; and no amount of well-meaning talk on the part of a third party would have helped matters in the least. That is how we stand. You assume that what we mean by God is a projection of our minds which, like other such things, we could explain if we liked. I ask you to consider that to us He is a Person, infinite and unspeakably wonderful, and that the account of Him given by many that He is a projection of our minds is wrong, because it contradicts our consciousness; just as it would have been absurd if anyone had told Disraeli that Gladstone was a projection of his brain. I daresay Disraeli often wished it were so; but none the less he would have thought the statement so mad that he would not have dreamt of trying to prove the opposite by any explanation whatsoever.

There is a further reason. Suppose the man who was told Mr. Gladstone did not exist was a passionate admirer of his, would he not feel that to controvert the allegation by descanting on his character, or his influence, or his personality, would be a gross violation of the respect due to a great man?

"Very well, then," you will say, "if I know nothing about God and you can't tell me anything, our friendly controversy comes to an end." Not so. I am only just coming somewhere near the heart of the positive side of the matter. So far I have been speaking from the bare Theistic standpoint. If that were all, I should go on to show that in your own convictions there is a great deal of unconscious Theism. But your repeated challenge induces me to leave that very interesting and relevant topic and give you a more definite answer from the Christian point of view. Vague as my answer has hitherto been, it is as clear, I fancy, as that of any of the greatest Pagans. You would get very little more from Plato.

But when we come to the Christian Gospel a profound change comes over the situation. Jesus never explained anything in order that an unsympathetic audience should be convinced against their will, that was the last thing he wanted, because He knew it would do far more harm than good. He is the greatest force for good in all history, because He dealt with men as free persons, and only drew them by persuasion; and His persuasion was amazingly powerful because it was the expression of a limitless love for man. His character is so sublime that among all nations and peoples it has been worshipped as divine. Those of us who reckon Him as divine—that is, God Himself become Man—are no longer groping in darkness as to the attributes and qualities of God the Father. We take it for granted that the justice, the love, the severity, the amazing combination of womanly tenderness and heroic courage which Christ showed are qualities which belong to the Deity; but being exhibited as they were by the human Jesus, they become tokens to us of what human nature at its best can achieve.

That is one point, only one, which makes the whole difference to our outlook on life. By itself it is enough to irradiate the prospect with a boundless hope. But in persuading men to conceive of God as a Personal Father bent on saving mankind, or rather, on enabling mankind to work out its own salvation, Christ appealed to a quality in us which he called Faith. What is faith? I promised to tackle this question.

Let us define it as the power to believe the best of persons and things and to act on the belief. It is the power which is at the back of every good action and every sympathetic thought, and every tactful word. It also is the secret of every friendship, of all good management of men, of every discovery in science, and in fact of civilization itself, for it inspires all noble endeavour and counteracts men's inherent tendency to conflict and distrust. It is essential to the whole higher life of humanity. Christ offered the Jews this higher life on certain conditions. That life is offered to us now, and men vary strangely in their answer. Two men once lost their way in the forest, and after wandering till they were terribly hungry, stumbled upon a cottage. No one was inside, but they saw a loaf of bread on the table. One says: "Here we are; this will keep us alive, anyhow." The other, who had been familiarized with the frequent harm done by people jumping to conclusions, said: "Wait a bit: there is no proof that that is not poisonous." The other replied: "Certainly, there is no proof; but if we wait for one we shall die. You may do what you like, I shall eat." Thus the quality to which Christ appealed is simply the opposite of lunacy in ordinary life; and though He offered something infinitely greater and better than rescue from starvation, where that quality were wholly wanting, He could do nothing at all.

E. Lyttelton.

Why, why was I born a man, and yet see the sufferings of wretches I cannot relieve! Poor houseless creatures, the world will give you reproaches but will not give you relief. The slightest misfortunes of the great, the most imaginary uneasiness of the rich, are aggravated with all the power of eloquence, and held up to engage our attention and sympathetic sorrow. The poor weep unheeded, persecuted by every subordinate species of tyranny; and every law which give others security becomes an enemy to them.—Goldsmith.

Acid Drops.

Now that Dr. Liebknecht has been liberated it looks as though in the Germany of the near future he will occupy a very high place. Cheers have already been given him as the President of the future German Republic. Dr. Liebknecht is a Freethinker, he has been a consistent opponent of militarism all along, and he will be remembered for telling the Prussian Diet a plain and wholesome truth, that "the militarizing of schools converts them into training stables for war. You educate your children to be war-machines." We said at the time that these were golden words, and we repeat that now. And we commend the saying to those of our own country who are so anxious to introduce military drill into our schools. Hands off the child is wholesome advice to both the soldier and the priest.

Said Sir Oliver Lodge at the Liverpool Royal Institution:—

> "Man's soul consists of the ether which holds the material body together. When the material body is worn out the ethereal body is as good as new, and by putting on some material concomitant can communicate with us still.

We congratulate Sir Oliver on having solved a very vexed question. If only we knew how he knows, and what precisely he means now he does know, we should be more content.

Mr. R. D. Holt, M.P., is either a humourist or one who understands human nature. According to the Daily Express of October 30, he told the Unitarian Association at Manchester that "One way to secure larger congregations would be to offer a glass of beer to every person who attends service devotedly and respectfully. The question seems to us to resolve itself into "How much beer is required to induce a properly respectful feeling towards a Church service?"

Just as we expected, the Sunday Observance Committee are protesting against Sunday band performances in the Glasgow Parks. They want to have the monopoly of providing entertainment for the people in the shape of Church services, a form of entertainment which is not appreciated by the majority of the citizens.

The band performance on the Glasgow Green last Sunday was well attended. The audience was orderly, and seemed to appreciate the music provided. A performance is to be given on the Green each Sunday afternoon up till November 17. Why should they not be continued in the Winter Gardens during the winter? It is to be hoped last Sunday's experiment will convince the Town Council of the demand for Sunday band performances in the parks during the summer months.

Speaking at Coatbridge at a meeting of the Hamilton Branch of the E.T.S., Mr. Anderson, Stonehouse, said that the Shorter Catechism should be at once abolished from the schools. It doctrines were antiquated, its teaching method was unsound, and it was no help in attaining the real object of religious training, namely, the improvement of character. Mr. Anderson strongly objected to the teaching of dogma or speculative opinions. The meeting passed a resolution opposing any attempt to impose religious tests on teachers.

Under the auspices of the New Operatic Club an excellent concert was given in the Alhambra Theatre, Glasgow, last Sunday evening in aid of the Glasgow Prisoners of War Fund. Sir John Ure Primrose, Bart., in moving a vote of thanks to the theatre management and performers, expressed the belief that such a delightful performance as they had listened to consecrated the Sabbath, and that, in any case, the cause for which it was promoted fully justified it. The theatre was filled to overflowing, and hundreds were unable to gain admission. Were there any Churches in the district crowded out last Sunday?

for offences connected with Church Parade. Three are cases of men who returned to barracks without going to church; one absented himself; the other laughed on Church Parade. Evidently the officer thought religion no laughing matter. He probably agreed with the clergyman who thanked God there had never been a Pleasant Sunday Afternoon in his church. We hope all these five will be duly impressed with the importance of religion.

The Congregational Board of Wolverhampton has written to the Town Council protesting against its erecting a War shrine provided by public subscription. We welcome the protest. This is one of the many dodges of the Church to exploit a public occasion in its own interests. People subscribe because they are desirous of expressing their appreciation of those who have fallen in the War. Then a Church shrine is erected, and the result exhibited as a sample of attachment to the Church. It is really an exhibition of the crafty and unscrupulous methods of modern religious organizations.

In Wolverhampton some of the Free Churches are following the Sunday evening picture performances with a religious service. We should much like to hear the comments of the audience.

The Rev. David Watson, of St. Clement's, Glasgow, writing to the Press, says while the Church must always remain non-political and non-partizan, it is in full sympathy with the just and legitimate aspirations of organized labour, and necessarily so, seeing her membership is so largely composed of the industrial classes. A perusal of Christianity and Slavery might enlighten the Rev. David Watson as to the attitude which has been adopted by the Church in all ages towards a betterment of the conditions for the working classes.

Professor Henderson asks: "What is your gospel which you wish to preach? Are the Churches themselves agreed as to what it is? Is there, then, no message with which the Church of Christ can with one trumpet voice proclaim as its message to this war-torn world?" What a wail after two thousand years of Christianity! Why doesn't he join the Secularists, and work for the uplifting of Humanity, which proclaims the message of love, brotherhood, and liberty?

Principal Sir Donald MacAlister, Glasgow University, says that the missionary efforts in China and Japan will receive new opportunities and a warmer reception than heretofore. Does he think China and Japan will forget all about the Christian barbarities of the War? He may be right about a warmer reception.

From the Daily Express:—

> An Army chaplain, meeting a Jock who had taken "a drop too much," offered to guide him to barracks. On the way Jock became discursive. "Ye ken, chaplain," he said, "ma faither is a very releegious man, and I'm that way inclined masel'. Noo I'd like to ha'e a bit argument wi' ye on predestination."
>
> The padre was much amused. "Hadn't you better wait until you are sober, Jock?" he replied.
> "Hoots, mon," said the Scot, "I don't care a d—— about predestination when I'm sober."

Considering that, on the authority of the Bishop of London, this War is God's War, and, on the authority of nearly all the clergy, we are fighting God's fight, Providence has behaved very shabbily in giving us the present epidemic of so-called influenza. And, strangely enough, it appears to be more fatal to those below thirty years of age—the fighting age—than those above it. That is God's way of showing his appreciation of our efforts. Some Christians will doubtless get consolation from the fact that people are suffering worse in Germany and Austria. But it is poor comfort, anyway, and we pity the mind that sees comfort in that direction, just as we pitied those who were gloating over the increasing number of child victims in Germany due to the blockade. These things are inevitable in war-time, but we ought at least to have decency enough not to rejoice at their happening.

The clergy emphasize the blessings of poverty in the pulpit; but they prefer the fleshpots of Egypt in private life. The late Rev. E. W. Tarbox, a Baptist minister, of Winchester, left £13,564, and the Rev. F. Bishop, of Torquay, left £11,927. These amounts are not large, but they do not spell poverty.

Mr. H. G. Wells may be religious, but he "wears his rue with a difference." In his latest novel, Joan and Peter, he says: "Progress is a religion in itself. Work and learning are our creed. We cannot make terms with any other creed." And, again: "Every step on the way to the world state and the real unification of men will be fought by the priests and the stagnant men." There will not be much joy in heavenly circles over this repentant sinner.

"The Christian religion is two thousand years old," said the parson, proudly. "Just so," replied the sceptic; "it looks its age, and needs re-upholstering."

With the object of increasing the stipend of a Surrey vicar, an effort is being made to raise £5,000 from among the parishioners. Prayer, it is said, can move mountains; but it cannot "raise the wind."

Rochester Cathedral has now a lady bell-ringer, a lady organist, and a lady verger. Presumably, the congregation is mainly composed of ladies also.

The Rev. Dr. Kelman, Edinburgh, in addressing the Office-bearers' Union of the Glasgow U.F. Church, said that, believing as he did in the reality, and the worth and the permanence of the Church of Jesus Christ, he could not be blind to the fact that in all our cities there were vast numbers who passed through their lives without knowing anything of the Church, and who did not wish to know anything about it. People to-day were not compelled to go to church, as in past generations, and that was a healthier state of society. It seemed to him there must be something wrong somewhere when such vast masses were passing the church door. He believed the cause of non-churchgoing was that they in the Church did not manage to interest vast numbers outside it. The whole atmosphere of our Church somehow had failed to catch their imagination. The secret of reality was intelligibility. How often had the Church kept dangling over our masculine young men a heaven they did not care about. Until the heaven the Church taught the young men to aspire to had got some young blood in it, and was a heaven that would make them feel strong and free and glad, it would never interest them. What a scathing indictment of the Church from within while others are proclaiming to the world that the War has been the means of causing the people in general to look to the Church for guidance in their spiritual troubles! The fact is, the Church is at sixes and sevens, and doesn't know where she is; but she is making a bold effort to be on the winning side, as usual.

Defenders of the Design Argument will read with interest that at an inquest at Grimsby it was proved that the deceased had an enormous heart, weighing over two pounds as against the normal eleven ounces.

The late Dr. W. Boyd Carpenter, formerly Bishop of Ripon, was buried in Westminster Abbey. Some years ago, when it was suggested that George Meredith should be buried there, the dear clergy informed the public that the place was "full up."

The Guild of St. George will be distressed to hear that the new ten-shilling Treasury note contains a picture of Britannia in place of the "C 3" saint.

At an inquest on a Chelsea resident it was stated that the deceased had been treated by Christian Science practitioners, and that the treatment consisted of prayer. At the last an ordinary doctor was sent for, but did not reach the house until death had taken place. It was admitted that the Christian Science practitioners were paid for their services.

The "Freethinker" and the War.

We are writing what follows in redemption of a promise made several weeks since to friends and readers who were wondering what we would do in face of the last advance in wages and prices.

When these advances occurred we thought that at last we should be compelled to vary our policy, and increase the price of the Freethinker to threepence. But during the past three or four weeks a change has come over the situation. The War seems nearing the end, and peace is likely to break out at any hour. In these circumstances we have decided to keep the Freethinker at twopence. We have held it at that price during more than four years of War, and it would be a thousand pities to have to give in at the end. We do not like giving in.

But on this decision there are several things that may be said. Heavy as the expenses have been hitherto, they will be heavier during this last year; for even though fighting ceases at once, there will be no drop in prices for some time. Wages will certainly not drop for nearly a year—if at all. And paper looks like being dearer in the immediate future. Our pre-War price for paper was just over £20 per ton. Our last paper was bought at over £130 per ton, with a warning that the next lot would be £10 per ton dearer.

Altogether the Freethinker is costing between £800 and £900 per year more to produce than it did when War broke out. This will give readers some notion of the difficulties we have to face—and overcome.

Thanks to our many friends these difficulties are being met. Those who have been sending along their waste paper have been giving us very real and valuable help. And we still need all we can get.

The Sustentation Fund has been well supported, as will be seen. The response has been better than last year, and we may be excused the conceit (if it be conceit) of taking this as a renewed expression of confidence in our work and general management. We appreciate this confidence more than can be put into words, all we can do is to transform appreciation into deeds.

The deficit of last year has been more than cleared off, and we should, following our usual rule, have closed the Fund by now. But so many of the subscribers have urged us to keep the Fund open longer, on the ground that it will ease the burden by meeting some of the loss as it accrues weekly, that we have decided to do so.

We still feel that the resolve to keep the paper at its old price was a sound one. The proof is that the circulation steadily improves. When we wrote in September, we mentioned that the circulation, besides making good all losses, was some 1,300 copies weekly better than it was in 1914. We have now improved on that, and are steadily climbing towards the completion of our second thousand new readers. And we don't intend to stop there.

The great thing we have kept before us is the fact that the Freethinker exists mainly as an organ of propaganda. And it has done more in this way than many people realize. It gives its services and space to all Freethought propagandist work absolutely free, taking nothing in the shape of subsidy or payment from any source. In addition, it has distributed large quantities of literature to soldiers and sailors, as our readers know, with good results. The publishing side of the work has also been resumed and extended.

For myself, I have the utmost confidence in the future of the paper—so much confidence that I have sunk a very large sum of money for use in purchasing supplies, and in issuing new publications. When I say that, it must not be understood that I am a man of means, although what little I could scrape together has gone that way. But it is chiefly borrowed capital, for which I am personally responsible. That, indeed, is one of the pressing difficulties—want of capital with which to undertake fresh enterprises. One cannot buy stocks of paper and issue new publications without capital, and I am pleased and proud that friends have had confidence enough in me and my plans to advance funds sufficient to meet immediate needs. As the plans I have in view are worked out, all this will right itself in time.

So the Freethinker will, short of something in the nature of a catastrophe, remain at twopence. Nothing will be placed in the way of its increasing sales, or its increased usefulness. All over the country friends of the paper are working with a will. We cannot mention them all by name; they are too numerous. But what has been done could not have been done without their help. We are all fellow-workers in a great Cause; the prominence of some is, perhaps, accidental; and when the War is done, and we get back to normal conditions, we are sure we shall all have reason to rejoice at the result of our united efforts.

Mr. Clifford Williams, of Birmingham, and one of the Society's Vice-Presidents, in forwarding his contribution to our Sustentation Fund, says that in his opinion the response to our appeal is an indication of the advance we are making. He adds: "The foregoing, coupled with the opening of new Branches, the increasing interest manifested (especially here in Birmingham), shows conclusively how we are progressing; and the barometer of public opinion, so steadily rising in our favour, proves how well justified has been your enthusiasm and optimism, backed up by your ability."

J. Hardie.—We take the will for the deed, and know you are doing all you can. No one can do more. We are glad to hear that by your outspoken confession of belief you have broken down a deal of opposition. We venture the opinion that something depends here upon character. With a poor character, frankness invites attack; a better one defeats it.

G. Finch.—We are greatly obliged for your letter. We will bear the matter in mind and write you when the proper occasion arrives.

E. J.—Send in the names of the soldiers and we will see to the rest. Of course, our parcels are sent out post free.

T. Zeiss (Shoreham).—There is no Branch of the N.S.S. near you. We are sending parcels to address given.

R. Berry.—We have the Bible Handbook, Infidel Death Beds, and a number of other things marked for reissue so soon as circumstances allow us do so.

G. E. Webb.—We quite endorse all you say as to the relative value of the Freethought versus the Christian ideal. But have you not missed the sarcastic note in our comments? For the rest our argument was that the same fundamental human nature is common to both Christians and Freethinkers, and that the better aspect of the Christian's nature is really injured by his devotion to Christianity, and by the influence of supernaturalistic ideals.

W. H. Briden.—Parcel sent. Hope it will prove useful.

R. Roberts.—We know nothing of the value of Pelmanism. It is well advertised—whether that shows virtue or enterprise we are unable to judge.

W. J.—We don't see how the question can be further discussed with profit to anyone concerned.

J. Griffith.—Something of what you desire is being done. Mr. Cohen is quite willing to pay Merthyr a visit if a suitable hall can be obtained. Thanks for good wishes.

E. Lyte.—We have handed your letter to one of the parties concerned.

J. Chapple.—Please send the papers along. We are obliged for good wishes.

We have another offer from a reader who is desirous of sending a weekly copy to someone who is not already a reader. We shall be glad to receive an address.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Cohen lectures to-day in Liverpool, at the Clarion Cafe, 25 Cable Street. The meetings will be at 3 and 7 o'clock, and there is likely to be discussion on both occasions. It has been found impossible to secure a larger hall, owing to the occupancy of other places by the military, etc.; but the Clarion Cafe is a good-sized, comfortable hall, and at any rate is the best that can be obtained in present circumstances. There is room for a strong forward movement in Liverpool, and after the War we feel sure it will be attempted.

This is the last opportunity we shall have of calling attention to the special N. S. S. Conference at Birmingham. A good gathering of delegates and members is expected, and we think all Branches will be represented. The meetings will be held in the Repertory Theatre, Station Street, Birmingham. The morning meeting opens at 10.30, afternoon at 2.30.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd visits Sheffield to-day (Nov. 10), and lectures in the Builders' Exchange, Cross Burgess Street, at 6.30, on "The Value of the Bible in National Life." Admission is free.

The freedom of the press is with the Freethinker a vital principal, and we have never concealed our dislike to the way in which the censorship of books and pamphlets have been carried on during the War. We have received from the Glasgow Socialist Labour Press, a statement which deserves some public attention. According to the statement of the Secretary to the Press, over three months ago the Press was raided, and the place closed for merely printing, not publishing, some works to which the military authorities took exception. Mr. Bell, the Secretary, affirms that no explanation of this action was furnished until October 8; even then, it is claimed, the reasons given were of a misleading character. At any rate, the policy of seizing printing plant and closing printing offices is of a very questionable character. It is punishing for an offence that might be committed in the future. Hitherto, English law has proceeded on the principle that an offence must be committed before a penalty can be inflicted. And any other policy in relation to publications is a covert attack on freedom of speech and of the press. To close a man's business and seize his printing plant because he has printed something to which objection is taken, and to do it without open trial, is a travesty of justice.

Thirty-nine new members were admitted to the N. S. S. at the last Executive Meeting, and permission given to form a new Branch at Rhondda. This makes the fourth Branch of the Society started in South Wales within the last two years, and there are more to come. At the end of the month Mr. Cohen is lecturing in new districts in South Wales, which will, probably, lead to further good results. When the War is over, and something like normal conditions return, an equally determined attempt at organization must be made in Ireland and Scotland. Both places are ripe for it.

The success of the two Pioneer four-page leaflets, What Will You Put in Its Place? and What Is the Use of the Clergy? has been so pronounced—large editions of both have been sold—that Mr. Cohen has written four more, making six in all. These are now in the press, and we hope to issue them in the course of a week or so. They are all specially written with a view to propaganda.

The Rationalist Press is issuing a very useful tract for use during the forthcoming General Election, on the question of Compulsory Church-going in Army and Navy. The tract calls attention to the injustice of compelling men to attend a religious service in which they have no faith, and cites from various chaplains and others as evidence of the feeling of the men against the practice. We wish the tract the widest circulation, and feel sure it will do much good. At present soldiers and sailors are the only ones who are compelled to attend a religious service, and we see no reason why enlistment should rob a man of what is regarded as a right in all civilized countries.

Mr. Percy Muir, of the Christian Evidence Society, who was announced to speak for the North London Branch last Sunday on "Internationalism" was, unfortunately, prevented owing to a bad attack of influenza. Mr. Storey, at practically a moment's notice, threw himself into the breach. He was opposed by Mr. Kelf, and a brisk discussion followed. It is hoped that Mr. Muir is making a good recovery, and will be able to deliver his lecture some time in the New Year.

South Wales friends will please note that Mr. T. F. Palmer is lecturing to-day (November 10) in the Workman's Hall, Ogmore Vale, at 2.30, and in the Gem Picture House, Maesteg, at 7.30.

Mr. John Drinkwater, whose play, Abraham Lincoln, has just closed a successful run at the Repertory Theatre, Birmingham, is lecturing in the same building for the local Branch of the N. S. S. on "Poetry and Conduct" this evening at 7 o'clock. We trust there will be a first-rate audience to receive the lecturer.

We note the death, on November 4, of Andrew D. White, ex-Ambassador of U.S.A., and author of The Warfare of Science with Theology. This work is in two large volumes, detailed and scholarly in character, and provides a very armoury of facts for all interested on the subject.

The Greed of Gold.

> Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal. But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal. For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.—Matthew vi. 19-21.

I AM not fond of attending funerals. In the course of my career I have had to attend a good many; I have always gone, however, as a matter of duty, and never out of any desire on my part for visiting cemeteries or taking part in the ceremony connected with the burial of the dead. Indeed, although I live within easy walking distance of three large cemeteries, sometimes an interval of as much as a year or more will elapse between my last visit and the call of duty to attend again. A few months ago I received an invitation to attend a funeral which I could not very well decline. A distant relative of mine had died, and Uncle Joe and I were requested to attend the funeral, seats in one of the coaches being reserved for us. And let me say just here that the business of an undertaker has always appeared to me to be a very melancholy one. No matter how he feels, whether cheerful or sad, he always has to wear a woeful countenance. He must not smile while in the performance of his duty; and while trying to cheer up the bereaved mourners, he must be careful that he says the right word in the right place, and in the proper tone, or he may offend those whom it is his greatest concern to please.

We have witnessed many funeral reforms during the past fifty years. I am old enough to remember when "mutes" were employed to stand outside houses from which the body of the "dear departed" was to be taken to the cemetery. Two of these gentlemen with top hats stood there for an hour or two, each holding a staff in one hand and a truncheon in the other, and looking as miserable as they could, with often a group of youngsters on the pavement as spectators. All the male mourners also were expected to wear great, heavy, black cloaks and top hats with big black bands round them, and streamers hanging down their backs; dingy black gloves, that had been worn by hundreds of mourners, were served out to the male followers, and large handkerchiefs with thick black borders were used on such occasions; and I was quite glad when my eldest brother, at my father's funeral, declined to wear either the cloak or the long streamer round the hat, although I remember this action on my brother's part grieved my dear mother very much. But action of this kind was needed to lead to reform, and reform came in time, though it seemed a long time in coming. When, however, it did come, reforms came rapidly, and funerals are not such painful performances as they were in my youth.

It was a fine afternoon last July when Uncle Joe and I attended the funeral in question. The deceased gentleman, who was an uncle of mine on my mother's side, having been a Christian and Churchman all his life, was buried in "consecrated ground," and the Church of England Burial Service was read over his remains.

After the service, we returned to the house, where a good tea awaited us. There were no "funeral baked meats" that Hamlet refers to as being customary in his day. We were living in War-time, and our coupons did not admit of us faring too sumptuously. But I remember in my youth that after a funeral the mourners were supplied with a "high tea," and fared like aldermen at a banquet. In fact, it reminds me of the old lady who boasted that she had buried ten members of her family, and "every one of 'em, thank gawd, was buried with a 'am." After tea, there was the usual conversation, and then we all sat solemnly round the drawing-room table, while the will of the deceased old gentleman was read. It was very brief. He did not leave much money, but all he had he left to his widow, with the earnest wish that if any of the children, who were all married and fairly advanced in life, should need any assistance, that it should be provided at the discretion of the widow. Now, that is the sort of will, as they say in legal circles, "without any complications." When this little ceremony was over, Uncle Joe started the first topic of conversation by telling us about the will of a rich employer of his when he was quite a youth. This employer, who had amassed a considerable fortune by sharp practice, made a will in which he left several large sums to charitable institutions, a large sum to the church of which he was a member for a stained glass window, but he left very little to his widow and children; but, instead, he left a large sum to a lady to whom he had been paying a good deal of attention, and a further sum to the two illegitimate offspring of the aforesaid lady.

When Uncle Joe had finished his interesting narrative, I thought I would have a sly dig at my respected relative's religious beliefs; so I pointedly asked him if he considered that his old employer was really a Christian.

"A Christian!" exclaimed Uncle Joe, "of course he was; a nominal Christian—and a bad one at that. Of course, there are bad Christians, just as there are bad Freethinkers. You will not deny that there are bad Freethinkers?"

"Certainly not. But if a Freethinker is bad there is no hope for him in this world, and he does not expect any in another. Every man has to suffer the consequences of his own misdeeds. In the case of the Christian, he hopes to get forgiveness in the next world, and a promise is held out to him in the words of Scripture: 'There is more joy in heaven over the return of one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just persons that need no repentence.'"

"In this case," responded Uncle Joe, "there was no evidence that my old employer ever did repent, and the probability is that he went his way to perdition."

"What, after giving a stained glass window to the church? Surely, not?"

"Oh, but the Church could not give him pardon for his offence. Don't you remember those lines of Claudius in Hamlet:—

> May one be pardon'd and retain the offence
> In the corrupted currents of this world
> Offence's guilded hand may shove by Justice;
> And oft the wicked prize itself buys out the law,
> But it is not so above. There is no shuffling,
> There the action lies in its true nature,
> And we ourselves compell'd
> Even to the teeth and forhead of our faults,
> To give in evidence.

"A fine passage, indeed, Uncle Joe. I did not think you were a student of Shakespeare. I am glad, however, to know it. But remember, Claudius was a villain and a murderer, and in that very speech was arguing for the efficacy of prayer to blot out sin, even the crime of which he was guilty. But we were talking about Christians amassing large fortunes contrary to the teachings of their Lord and Master."

"I know we were," said Uncle Joe. "Christians are like other people, they have their weaknesses as well as their strong points."

"I have observed that very often. Why some of the bishops have left enormous fortunes, notwithstanding the injunction of their Master to 'Lay not up for themselves treasures on earth,' etc. And many of the clergy have accumulated large sums, and in their wills have left none to charitable objects."

"Yes, I know it, and I deplore their inconsistent conduct."

"They seem to forget altogether the teaching of Jesus—I went on: 'Blessed be ye poor'; 'Woe unto you rich'; 'It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven.' Some of them assuredly seem to think that the camel will be able to squeeze his hump through the needle's eye. Or do they really in their hearts say: 'A bird in the hand is worth two in a bush.'"

"Oh, don't say that. That is a very old joke—in fact quite a chestnut," said Uncle Joe, rather maliciously.

"Very likely; but it's true nevertheless. Why, only a week or two ago my friend, 'Mimnermus,' gave a list of amounts left by ten bishops and two archbishops in the Freethinker amounting in the aggregate to the large sum of £611,154, certainly a considerable burden for these poor divines to stagger under while preaching the doctrine of the blessedness of poverty to their credulous followers."

"Yes, that's the sort of ridicule one expects from Freethinkers. You never hear that kind of thing from Christians."

"Oh, indeed; that shows that you are not acquainted with the methods of the Christian Want-of-Evidence Society and other similar bodies. But suppose we leave the bishop and the clergy out of the question, and deal only with the ordinary layman—look at the colossal fortunes many of them lay up? Take all their investments in 'War Loans,' all their deposits in banks, all their insurances, etc., surely all these are in direct opposition to the teaching of making no provision for the future? 'Take no thought for the morrow what ye shall eat, what ye shall drink, or wherewithal she shall be clothed,' etc. The fact is we must make provision for the future or we should perish. And, therefore, the Christian, like the Freethinker, ignores such teachings in his daily life, and acts upon teachings that are more practicable and suitable for the times in which he lives."

At this point we branched off into a discussion on food prices and the War, in which the ladies present took part, then a little port wine for one's stomach's sake for those who cared to imbibe, a nice refreshing cup of coffee for those who were total abstainers, a little further talk on various subjects and we rose to take farewell of my dear old aunt, the widow, who had lost one who had been a partner to her through a very long and happy life, and the members of her family who had lost a good father, and the community a very honest, straightforward, and respected citizen.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Soldiers of Freethought.

> And if ye cannot be saints of knowledge, then, I pray you, be at least its warriors. They are the companions and forerunners of such saintship.—Nietzsche.

AMIDST the hatreds and rancours of this World-War, Nature, to the thoughtless, irritates and provokes with her impassive "neutrality." There is an almost irresistible impulse in every man, which only true education can remove, to regard himself as nature's apex, and the world as his justification. This is a well-known characteristic of the child-mind, and unfortunately for civilization, the majority of us remain "children," thanks to "pap" served out to us in press, Parliament, and pulpit.

True knowledge, again, begets humility of intellect; the seeker after truth, if he is honest, realizes the elusiveness of his quest, and is content to follow the lonely dark pathways, leading he knows not whither, handing on the torch which lit him to posterity. The thinker grapples with Nature's problems, and himself her manifestation, knows from his studies, that if he and his kind only will, she can be made to attain greater heights. The danger lies in this latter class abnegating their natural instincts, and relegating to the "mob" the most important functions conducive to the life and progress of society. This reticence, this "conspiracy of silence" on the part of the more thoughtful is a real menace to the future.

We listen in vain for the views of a John Morley. On the greatest of issues we are treated to the unceasing platitudes of the Bishop of London and Mr. Bottomley. I must confess to a bias in favour of what is termed "Apostolic favour" in religious parlance. A Bradlaugh will effect more change in a lifetime than a score of his more compromising brethren. Unfortunately, iron men are as rare as candour in a priest, but we weaker ones, in our acquiesence in the present order of things, do not encourage their production. The great liberations of the past will have lived and suffered in vain if we fail to continue their work in the same fearless spirit and remain "slackers" to the cause. To live comfortably and happily is not the ideal of the true Freethinker, in fact he cannot be "happy" unless he is striving—striving for what—for that serenity of spirit which can brave bigoted, derisive, mobs, and can suffer poverty, sickness, and even death, in in his lonely search for richer worlds. It is the distinction of finer spirits to find joy in such a life, as the applause of the gallery, and "saved souls" is the "joy" of men like the Rev. Dr. Sunday and Mr. Bottomley. Life, bounding, red, radiant, life must be our war cry; let us shout it in the ears of the preachers of death!

Religion in the past has proved itself a deadly enemy of life; it sucked dry the noble forms of the ancients, and left a crafty, cunning, anæmic, priesthood to sing their mournful songs of death through the dark ages. Once, again, it extinguished with its book-worship the promise of the Renaissance. History affords us countless examples of the danger of that "latent superstition" Mr. Cohen so gravely warns us of. Do not let us share the complacency of the consumptive who is most hopeful when death is near. Read the jesting criticisms of the "Nazarenes" by the great Pagans of antiquity—where is their jesting now? A repetition of an historical catastrophe, such as the worst periods of the Middle Ages, is improbable; but who, bearing in mind the prosperous army of star-gazers, Spiritualists, and Catholic journalists, can say it is impossible?

In the work of our little paper lies the nucleus of a healthy endeavour for even the most obscure. In that way will saner influences sweep through the land, overwhelming the tottering strongholds of priestcraft, statecraft, and hypocrisy—that is, if every man to himself "be true." The answer to Chesterton's cheap gibe at Swinburne's Songs Before Sunrise, "the sun which never rose" rests with you.

Correspondence.

HERBERT SPENCER AND THE UNKNOWABLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Without presuming to intervene in the discussion between Dr. Lyttelton and yourself, may I point out that Dr. Lyttelton is mistaken in supposing Spencer was unable to see that the statement, "God is unknowable," involves a contradiction? Spencer admitted the contradiction, and endeavoured to explain it. In First Principles, Part I., chap iv., he quotes with approval the arguments of Hamilton and Mansel to show that the Absolute is unknowable, but to these he adds a qualification, which is, briefly, as follows: Though these propositions must be accepted in their entirety when viewed from a purely logical aspect, when contemplated from their psychological aspect, they are found to be imperfect statements of the truth. Besides that definite consciousness of which Logic formulates the laws, there is also an indefinite consciousness which cannot be formulated. Besides complete thought and incomplete thought admitting of completion, there are thoughts impossible to complete which are yet real in that they are normal affections of the intellect. "To say that we cannot know the Absolute, is, by implication, to affirm that there is an Absolute. In the very denial of our power to learn what the Absolute is, there lies hidden the assumption that it is."

In the Postscript to Part I., Spencer is still more explicit. After referring to criticisms of the assertion that the Ultimate Reality is unknown and unknowable, he writes:—

> .....The second objection is not thus easily met. It is doubtless true that saying what a thing is not, is, in some measure saying what it is;.....Hence it cannot be denied that to affirm of the Ultimate Reality that it is, in a remote way, to assert some knowledge of it, and therefore involves a contradiction.

But against this he contends that, as our intelligence is limited to the relative, and we are obliged to use words moulded to it, we cannot speak of the non-relative without introducing into our propositions meanings connoted by those words—meanings foreign to a subject-matter which transcends relations.

Much as we may admire the great work of Spencer, probably most of us find it difficult to adopt his Agnostic position, as, if we take this standpoint, everything becomes mysterious, inscrutable, and contradictory; nothing is intelligible. For example, Spencer tells us that the man of science, more than any other, truly knows that in its ultimate nature nothing can be known; that things in themselves cannot be known to us, and that knowledge of them, even if it were possible, would be useless. Again, having given an example to illustrate the meaning of such words as "explanation," "comprehension," "understanding," etc., and having clearly shown that they all involve merely the successive inclusion of special truths in more general truth, he concludes that the deepest facts cannot be understood. For, if the process is unlimited, then, since infinite time would be required to reach it, an ultimate explanation cannot be reached. While if, on the other hand, the process is limited, then, since the most general truth does not admit of inclusion in any other, it does not admit of interpretation; explanation must finally bring us down to the inexplicable, and comprehension must become something other than comprehension before the ultimate fact can be comprehended.

The mistake here appears to me to lie in supposing that when all facts have been included in some general truth, there still remains something to be done. Instead of regarding the most general truth as inexplicable, we should surely regard it as the end of explanation. We have completed what we set out to do. Beyond this point explanation becomes, not impossible, but, in the terms of the case, simply meaningless. If, when this point has been reached, the mind is still unsatisfied, it must seek for satisfaction in something other than explanation; comprehension must, indeed, become something other than comprehension, but not, as Spencer contends, for the ultimate fact to be comprehended. He seems to have forgotten the canon he has laid down.

THE TASK OF FREETHOUGHT.

Sir,—I note that in the Freethinker for October 20 there is another letter bewailing the lack of constructive policy on the part of the Freethought movement. Might I point out that those who indulge in so many regrets about the critical methods of Freethought are evidently taking a wrong estimate of the matter? True criticism, and that is what all serious Freethinkers aim at, is not entirely destructive. The object of criticism is to destroy the worst and bring into relief the best that is to be found in the subject under criticism. And in order to do this it is frequently, if not always, necessary to add fresh knowledge to what is saved from destruction, or it is necessary to give a new interpretation to facts from which false interpretations have been cleared.

It should not be very difficult for the average Freethinker to realize that in clearing his mind of obsolete and illogical intepretations of the known facts of the universe, and replacing them by accepting rational interpretations, he is doing something constructive as well as destructive. It is this double-sided critical work which the Freethought Movement aims at on a large scale. That much has been accomplished in this way can be realized by those who will read the works of Draper, Buckle, Lecky, or the masterly Short History of Freethought, by J. M. Robertson. Surely the circulation, throughout society, of the results of modern science and of rational views of life, is a constructive work of which Freethinkers may be proud.

That much improvement in the conduct of our meetings is to be desired I think most of us will admit. But that is a matter which rests very largely with each Branch Society, and will be determined to some extent by the material resources of each Branch.

We must not allow lack of ceremony at meetings to blind us to the fact of the great constructive work which is being done on intellectual lines. A work which has made itself felt in society, and will continue to be of social benefit.

Obituary.

Death is busy in our midst, and it has dealt a heavy blow to Mr. and Mrs. James Neate in the death of their only child, James Albert, at the age of seventeen and-a-half years. Delicate from his birth, the boy's parents had given themselves to their son's upbringing, and no child ever had more devoted parents. The reward of their efforts lay in seeing many of the dangers of their son's early childhood overcome, and the promise of a healthier maturity given. Unfortunately, he was stricken with the prevailing epidemic on October 25, and succumbed to pneumonia on the morning of November 2. Mr. Neate is a very old and one of the most devoted members of the N.S.S., a menber of the Executive, and of the Board of the Secular Society, Limited. Friends can offer nothing but sympathy in the face of such a tragedy, but we are sure that they will possess that in full measure from all who read these lines. Owing to the pressure under which undertakers are working, we are unable, at the time of going to press, to give either the time or place of the funeral.

Do We Know God?

There is an important distinction between describing symptoms and diagnosing causes. If I go to a doctor and tell him I have a pain in the head, or in the stomach, he will listen to me with respect and take my word for it. But if I proceed to tell him precisely what is the cause of my pain he will, in all probability, treat my diagnosis with contempt. When the founder of Christian science informed the world that a boil on the back of the neck was unbelief made manifest, she described a fact and expressed a conviction. The fact was the boil, the personal conviction was that the boil was an expression of unbelief. No one would question the fact or the existence of the conviction. They would say that the conviction was a mistaken one. Sitting quietly in my room I may have a conviction that someone is in a neighbouring apartment. The conviction is genuine, but it may be due to no more than an attack of "nerves." States of mind are indisputable and ultimate psychological facts. It is their trustworthiness, their correspondence with an external reality that furnishes the occasion for doubt or denial.

Hallucination or Truth.

Now, in the discussion between myself and Dr. Lyttelton, we appear to have reached a point where what has just been said seems relevant to the question at issue. Dr. Lyttelton says that the question of belief in God is that of "personal knowledge of an invisible spiritual Being," and that such knowledge "cannot be acquired secondhand." Well, there is a sense in which all knowledge is and must be of a personal character—that is, the thing to be known or the idea to be accepted as true, must be brought into direct personal relation with my consciousness. But, then, I fancy more than this is meant. What is meant, it seems to me, is that I must accept the existence of God as being a fact, because some Christian informs me that he has direct personal knowledge of such a being. But in that case am I not accepting a belief in the existence of God at secondhand? Am I not doing exactly what Dr. Lyttelton says cannot be done? Either that or the matter is ruled as altogether outside the realm of discussion. For you cannot discuss the existence of a personal conviction. If a man has a personal conviction that the moon is made of green cheese, there is no room for discussion on that. If the Kaiser really was convinced that he was God's agent on earth, or our bench of bishops convinced that this position was reserved for England, we cannot question the genuineness of these convictions; we can only discuss their rationality, or how far the conviction can be proved to be in harmony with fact. And if we cannot bring a personal conviction to some such test as this, in what way are we to discriminate? How are we to distinguish a conviction that expresses a truth from a delusion or an hallucination?

Conviction versus Accuracy.

Now, it would clearly be both useless and impertinent for me to deny that Dr. Lyttelton has a conviction that he possesses personal knowledge of "an invisible spiritual Being." On that head he must be the supreme authority. So, also, if we were writing in 1618, instead of 1918, we should have to make the same concession in face of the assurance of certain people that they had personal knowledge of "Old Nick." But the existence of a conviction is one thing, the reliability of that conviction is another and a different thing. If I did not take it for granted that Dr. Lyttelton has the conviction he states, this discussion would never have commenced. But, equally, if the reliability of the conviction is not to be called in question, discussion is impossible or unprofitable. The illustration concerning knowledge of a fellow human being seems beside the point. If I do not wish to make the acquaintance of B through A, certainly A would be foolish to introduce B. But there is no question of B's existence; or, if there is, A can soon settle that, leaving it open whether I desire a further knowledge of B or not. But, in the case of God, it is the very existence that is in question. And it is surely unsatisfactory to be told that someone else has knowledge of his existence, but that knowledge cannot be imparted, nor even be made the subject of discussion—it must be taken for granted, or accepted by C because D affirms that he is in personal touch with him.

Freethinkers versus Christians.

I have said before that in the Freethought philosophy of life there is a logical place for the Christian; but in the Christian philosophy of life there is no room for the Freethinker. Dr. Lyttelton's insistence upon a personal knowledge of God for all who desire it is an illustration in point. When will Christians bear in mind that in dealing with Freethinkers it is not a question of adepts v. the uninitiated, of adults v. children, or of a higher civilization v. a lower one? When will they realize that we understand their position in a way in which they cannot understand ours? We have been where they are; they have not been where we are. We do not represent a stage in a mental pilgrimage, the end of which is Theism. It is they who stand for a stage in a mental pilgrimage, the end of which is Atheism. The Christian can tell us nothing concerning his faith that we have not felt and experienced. And we know that this sense of contact with an "invisible spiritual Being," such as exists in the finer type of Christian, is no more than an expression of a sense of identity with a larger social whole. In political life we see the same thing expressed as patriotism, and, in sociological jargon, in a sense of "solidarity." It is again a question of, first, a wrong interpretation, and, second, an exploitation of a common human quality. A sense of a larger life which carries us outside the range of narrow egoistic desires, and a consciousness of being part of that larger life, are good things. And the Atheist knows that in divesting these evolutionary products of a wrong interpretation and in freeing them from harmful associations, he is giving them freer scope and more profitable action. We know exactly how the Christian feels in these matters. His position represents a past stage in our own mental development.

The Exploitation of Man.

May I say without offence that I quite fail to see the bearing of the eulogy of Jesus, and the definition of faith, on the present discussion? That Jesus was "the greatest force for good in all history" is a statement that Dr. Lyttelton would find it hard to justify, I think. And that "His character is so sublime that among all nations and peoples it has been worshipped as divine" is hardly in accord with fact. The historic fact is that it is not the character of Jesus, but his power to save people from damnation, that has been the principal feature of the Christian crusade through the centuries. And if we are to accept the definition of faith (it is, I think, open to question) as "the power to believe the best of persons and things," we can agree that this is all Dr. Lyttelton says it is, so far as its good influence on human relations is concerned. But what has this to do with faith in the Christian Christ or belief in the existence of God? Our quarrel with Christianity is not that Christian teachers have not appealed to good, and sometimes the highest, qualities of human nature, but that they have exploited these qualities, and squandered them in a useless or injurious manner. Without trust and confidence in one another, social progress is impossible; but this trust and confidence has no necessary connection with religious belief. It is rooted in the gregarious instinct of the race, it is strengthened and developed by the work of every generation, and it will remain even though every spark of religion dies, as it now remains with those who have definitely discarded all belief in God and a future life. Faith in man is historically not the outcome of belief in God; it is rather its negation. So long as man believes in the overruling power of the gods, he remains a slave mentally and socially. It is only as belief in his own powers and capacities develops that belief in gods weakens. And part of that development is expressed in the discovery that qualities which have hitherto been interpreted in terms of belief should be properly expressed in terms of the common social life of the race.

Futile Claims.

THE Rev. Dr. J. A. Hutton, of Glasgow, enjoys a great popularity both as preacher and writer of religious articles. Scarcely a week passes without a contribution from his pen gracing the columns of one or other of the Nonconformist journals. The organ most frequently favoured, perhaps, is the Christian World, in the issue of which for November 7 there appeared a notable article by him, entitled "A Light in a Dark Place." All Dr. Hutton's articles are based upon or suggested by some Biblical incidents or passages, and, as a rule, the papers open with a few general observations. That is true of the article just mentioned. We are told, indeed, that the Bible is "a book of guidance, a book of moral navigation" in a world which is denominated "a dark place." To this general observation we unhesitatingly return a general denial. In point of fact, the Bible is not "a map of life, a chart of the sea of things, with all the rocks and sandbanks marked," nor is it consistent with itself in the guidance it offers to the pilgrims of the earth. It contains two conflicting ideals of life, the sacerdotal and the ethical, and both are recommended with equal fervour. Naturally, Dr. Hutton ignores the discrepancies and contradictions of Holy Writ, which the Higher Critics delight in pointing out, and quite as naturally he summarizes in his own words what he wishes us to regard as the gist of the Book's message on the subject of life. According to him, God in the Bible assures us that we are "perfectly safe if we keep to the rules," or, in other words, if we "remain humble and do not presume." Among other things, God is represented as saying to us:—

> When you are at a loss or at a standstill, do not lose courage. 'Tis downward-looking that makes men dizzy. At such a moment, some sign will be given you, the flashing of some light at sea, or the appearing of some friendly star, some sign which you will understand.

The fundamental idea is that this world is a dark place that must receive light from another sphere; "a place of sicknesses and obvious cruelties, a place of apparently unjust and careless events, a place in which things go on and on in a horrible callousness, in which tides ebb and flow, and the sun rises and sets, and stars look down, with no apparent concern for our personal feelings, with no sympathy or respect for our tears and agonies and cries."

Having admitted so much, Dr. Hutton is fully aware that he is face to face with a puzzling problem. If the world in itself is thus dark and miserable, though it is God's world, and if man, though God's child, is incapable of directing his steps in and out of it, what about the essential goodness and love attributed to the Maker of both? This is how the reverend gentleman endeavours to meet the difficulty:—

> If the Bible bids us believe in God's love for us and interest in us, it does so with its eyes open and aware of all that passes in this world. Whatever the faith be which the Bible urges upon us and beseeches us to make the light and principle of our life, it is something which has taken account of the evil that is in the world, the pain, the disease, and the cruel play of chance. Therefore, let no one suppose that the evil which he sees in life, or the hard things which he himself has experienced, may be given as a reason for denying God, or hesitating to believe. On the very contrary, it is because life holds these difficult and staggering things that, by an impulse of heart, we protest that there is something more and something other, and we lift up our eyes in faith.

Surely, Dr. Hutton does not expect that anybody in his senses will be convinced by such flimsy argumentation. "Something"—always undefined—is a favourite term with the reverend gentleman, which occurs several times in every article he writes, and which he offers as an explanation of some terrible and very clearly defined reality. It matters not how strongly or how bitterly we may protest against things as they are, the fact that we protest affords no indication whatever that there is "something more and something other" in store for us. Mere protests are worse than useless unless they ripen into determined action or translate themselves into resolute upward-gazing and stepping. To describe the very protest against things as they are as "the breaking of the sea of eternity over the threshold of time" is at once to employ an unfortunate metaphor and to be hopelessly vague, for in the next sentence the spiritual life is likened to "a fire which glows within our hearts," which fire the waters of the eternal sea would naturally extinguish. Besides, "for every fire there is needed the dull material for burning, but there is needed also a wind from heaven," not waves from any ocean. Now, assuming the existence of "the fire of a believing life," of what practical use has it ever been or ever can be? Things are what they are in spite of the fact that a believing life has been burning for thousands of years. The Gospel Jesus predicted that, if he were lifted up on the Cross, he would draw all men unto himself. The record tells us that the lifting up actually happened, but the confidently promised result has not been realized. Christianity has been a woeful disappointment both as to the extent of its expansion and the benefits it has bestowed upon the regions where it has outwardly triumphed.

Dr. Hutton's reasoning at this stage is obviously fallacious: In his estimation the supreme thing in human life is the fire of faith, and man's chief duty is to get that fire duly kindled and to keep it burning brightly to the end; but this cannot be effected without the "dead difficulties of the world and of experience." These dead difficulties and obstacles exist, seemingly, for the sole purpose of producing the life of faith and piety; and in the overwhelming majority of instances they exist utterly in vain. Only in an insignificant percentage of the human race does the fire of faith burn at all, and even the few in whom it may be said to be "gloriously kindling" do not show any moral and social superiority over the huge majority who know it not. Dr. Hutton informs us that a world which presented no difficulties to faith would destroy faith itself; but he omits to explain how and why, in a world teeming with all sorts of difficulties and obstacles, the fire of faith is conspicuous only by its absence. Thus the theological argument is as absurd as it is fallacious. Take the following sample:—

> The Christian faith in God is the energy of God within us playing upon the contradictions of this present world. Faith is the indomitable perseverance of love, feeding on all things and triumphing over all things. It is the song of the nightingale out of a dark world. It is the spirit of music, of hope and gratitude and reconciliation, which, far from being quenched by life's darkness, in life's darkness finds its purest understanding of itself. Let no one say that life and the world contradict faith. It is not so. What they mean who say such a thing is that life and the world, considered by themselves, are dark. But faith is built upon darkness. Faith is the final wisdom of the soul—its escape in God when the dark waters would overwhelm it.

What gives character to that extract is the strange mixture of truth and error contained in it. Nothing could be truer than the admission that "faith is built upon darkness"; and the darkness remains and increases in consequence. It is equally true that faith is a cowardly attempt to escape from the evil that is in the world without abolishing it; but such an escape, when most successful, is purely emotional, imaginary, not real. True life consists not in fleeing from difficulties and obstacles on wings of supernatural faith, but in waging a deadly war against them, in heroically endeavouring to roll them clean away. Theoretically, at any rate, a Christian is a person who takes shelter behind a God of love and mercy that he may not perish with the wicked world, a modern Noah who sails in a Divinely devised ship and therefrom beholds the destruction of an ungodly race in the dark waters of a wrathful flood. It necessarily follows that the escape is not only sought in a cowardly spirit, but also of no genuine benefit to anybody concerned. The world's betterment is an extremely slow but perfectly natural evolution, the very opposite of a mighty miracle wrought by supernatural grace. Sometimes Dr. Hutton himself seems to recognize the truth of this statement, as, for example, in the following passage:—

> Life for you and me and all of us, one by one, is a pathway, a road from one place to another, from the cradle to the grave, and it is a road which leads right through the heart of the world. Our business is to get through honourably, learning all the way. We are born with the instinct to walk. We are born with the desire to set out. We are, that is to say, a bundle of coiled-up springs of action. We are each a home of energy, purpose, life.

But that is only a gleam, a moment's flash, of common sense, which soon gives place to the orthodox attitude of loyalty to the superstitious Word which has done so much to retard the genuine progress of the world. Dr. Hutton is professionally the slave of the Bible, and he always starts from and never fails to return to it. He believes in two worlds, the actual and the ideal, and so do we; but he believes further that both are of Divine origin, that both were created by the God of love who is now urging us all to flee from the one and find our home in the other. To us, on the contrary, the actual world is the ideal in the making, the sole makers thereof being ourselves.

The Perils of Thought.

> Understand that well, it is the deep commandment, dimmer or clearer, of our whole being, to be free. Freedom is the one purport, wisely aimed at, or unwisely, of all man's struggles, toilings, and sufferings, on this earth.
> —Thomas Carlyle.

Mr. Charles T. Gorham has put Freethinkers under another heavy obligation. In a previous work, The Spanish Inquisition, he has already told of the disastrous effects on social life and intellectual progress which were produced by its organized cruelty. In the present valuable and scholarly treatise, The Mediæval Inquisition (Watts & Co.), he again goes deeply into the subject, and gives us the result of his long and laborious study. No such history has till now been issued in England in so easily accessible a form. To his special knowledge of his subject, Mr. Gorham adds a wide range of general reading, and in this work he writes with a lucidity and a precision that adds materially to its attractiveness.

Few books that I have read have so entranced me; so lifted me up at times in admiration of man's heroism; so thrown me down at the vision of his ignorance and cruelty. The acts of the Inquisition are realities that no special pleading can remove. To read the tale makes one shudder, as if awakened from an awful nightmare. The Church of Rome made laws in the thirteenth century, enacting that heretics should be outlawed, that those who did not recant should be burnt. From that time onward the stake was a familiar form for the suppression of heresy, until the heretics became too numerous to be murdered. It was not until the nineteenth century that the Inquisition was abolished in Spain.

The enlightenment of the Inquisitors was only equalled by their humanity. Pope Innocent VIII. issued a Bull in which he asserted that plagues and storms were the work of witches. The Church condemned the theory of the Antipodes, and the books of Copernicus, and other scientists, were placed on the Index. Anatomy was forbidden. Out of this terrible twilight of knowledge a few great intellects shine like beacons: Roger Bacon, Giordano Bruno, Galileo. Their names flame out now to accuse their persecutors.

Mr. Gorham bids us face the conclusion that civilization was long retarded by the action of the most powerful Christian Church. Here are his words:—

> To us who live in the twentieth century it may appear very plain that priestly domination could not be favourable to improvement in morals or in knowledge. Prevent people from thinking, and you prevent them from improving. They lose the desire to improve; they become incapable of improvement; they neither know nor care for the pleasures of knowledge; they relapse into a state resembling that of animals. Can it be supposed that this has no effect upon their morals? And the class which puts forward the claims in question becomes equally debased. Selfishness, ignorance, and cruelty become as marked in the shepherds as in the flocks they are supposed to lead, with the additional vice of a tyrannical arrogance born of class privilege and the claim to superhuman authority.

This is Mr. Gorham's theory, and it has been carefully worked out with much learning and ingenuity. The chapter in which he deals with Catholic criticism, and which he heads, "The Gentle Art of Whitewashing," is of extreme interest. And his clever rejoinder to Catholic apologists should help to direct more attention to a writer who deserves an extended popularity. Historical writing, except that undertaken by university professors, is not too common in England. Mr. Gorham's brightly written volume, a noteworthy contribution to the subject on which he writes, should ensure a welcome that may induce him to further efforts in the field he has so fruitfully explored.

Religion in the Schools.

THE educational authorities of a large city in the provinces have recently established a day trades technical school for boys of ages varying from thirteen to sixteen years. Unlike other schools of a similar type, this one is opened with prayer. How long it lasts, how it is performed, and in what manner its efficiency is intended to be ascertained, the writer is unaware, though perhaps the latter will be worked out on one of the efficiency ratio machines installed in the mechanics laboratory.

However, some one in high circles has seen fit to condone, and very likely compelled, the giving of instruction to these youths, in the very questionable art of leaning upon the Almighty for guidance. As the school is understaffed, it might be that He is being politely requested to act as a "stop gap" until, as Micawber would say, "Somebody turns up."

How it is expected that these incantations will influence the welfare of the youths for good against evil it is impossible to say. Ostensibly these youths are to be given some kind of a useful scientific training to fit them for gaining a livelihood in the years to come. Now the nature and character of this training is based on the results of sound science, and the accumulation of a vast experience which has withstood the test of time and service.

How much, then, has prayer contributed to the progress of either? Do our scientific and commercial men pray for results? (The reason for the italics is that some people might hastily conclude that the latter certainly do prey for results). Would a physicist, for instance, go down on his knees and pray for supernatural inspiration in order to be able to solve, say, problems in low temperature research, or in the structure of the atom, or in the nature of solid and liquid solutions? Would an engineer pray for a solution to his difficulties with steam turbines, or electric motors, or petrol engines, or stresses in bridges, aeroplanes, docks, etc.? Of course not.

Everybody knows that prayer is never invoked under these and similar circumstances, for the simple reason that nobody believes it to be of any value whatever. What irony it would be to pray for the practical solution of, say, a thousand bullets, a second machine-gun, or a gyroscope that will be supersensitive to the vibration of an enemy ship's screw propeller going "dead slow" a hundred leagues away!

Yet if the leaders, and lesser men, too, of science and industry never require the services of the shaman's art, why do some pious hussies persist in thrusting it into the minds of schoolboys as a necessary corollary to their other studies? Do they think the youths will thereby be better able to solve, or puzzle out, the intricacies of quadratic equations? And how much assistance will it give them when they come "up against" a stiff piece of differentiation or integration, or (if they proceed that far) a knotty differential equation?

Will it make the mysteries of "work" any easier for them? Or will it enable them to understand the difference between "work" and energy—or laziness either?

Fancy a schoolboy praying for the solution of the bending moment of a loaded beam, or a pulley block and tackle, or geometrical plans and elevations, sections, and developments! He is more likely to get inspiration (in the "seat") from the business leg of a pair of compasses. Tom, Dick, and Harry, who have done their work, would laugh at Omega invoking the aid of the gods, and they would most likely tell him he ought to have gone in for a parson, and not an engineer. Most probably he would be sent to "Coventry," with the present of a soother as an indipensable companion.

And the reference to parsons shows that verily the mind of youth sometimes gives utterance to the most astute and ironical truths; for they seem to estimate pretty accurately, somehow, the value of a parson's services in civil life.

Evidently, then, prayer is not the stuff to give to growing youths. When they begin to realize that they are passing into the stage of manhood, they feel a healthy need for independence and self-assertion. Such virtues are a sign of physical, mental, and moral health, and they should be encouraged and developed so far as is humanly possible.

The way to do it is to develop their education along lines that will engender self-confidence and self-respect in their own power to say "I conquer." Explain to them the principles of Science—Geometry, Physics, Mechanics, Mathematics, etc.—by all means; help them when necessary to clear difficulties away; but don't warp their developing understandings by hinting to them, in the course of a preliminary canter in the hocus-pocus of prayer, that anything will come (from the Almighty) to him who waits, without the fundamental necessity of hard and strenuous thinking and reflection beforehand. As one who has been through the mill can safely prophesy, "It won't": and the Almighty will never get a correct answer to any problem for them unless they first obtain it themselves by their own exertions. More briefly, God helps those who help themselves; but God help those who don't.

Can you tell me why a sectarian turn of mind has always a tendency to narrow and illiberalise the heart? Acid Drops.

The War is at an end! God's day, to quote the Bishop of London has come to a close. For over four years the world has been illustrating on a gigantic scale the failure of Christianity as a civilizing force. Nations nurtured on Christianity, saturated in the Christian tradition, have shown how little Christianity did to smother the primitive savage in humanity. It is hard not to believe that some good will come out of the four years of horror. Thrones have vanished, and others are insecure. The king business has undergone a decided slump, and the Christian Churches have had one of the severest blows ever dealt them. The hollowness of their claims have been made plain to thousands, and their faith will have departed for ever. The king and the priest, springing originally from the same nest, are alike under a cloud, and the one institution cannot long survive the other. The two together contain the seed-plot of Militarism. The three have flourished together; let us hope they will perish together. The way should now be clear for the advent of man.

The War is over, said Mr. Lloyd George, "Let us thank God." In the name of man, for what? Are we to thank God for the twenty millions of deaths the War has cost the world? Or for the fact that we have had over four years of one of the most brutal wars in history? What has God done in the War, anyway? When homes were being burned and women outraged, God was silent. When passenger ships were torpedoed, God remained dumb. Human endurance, human perseverance, and human bravery have brought the War to an end. For all that God did, the War would have gone on for ever. A God worth talking about would have prevented the War ever occurring. Our priests will tell us that God worked by moving men's minds to crush the German peril. The defence is an accusation. If God could do that, why could he not order the minds of the creators of the War to move in a different direction? Really, the less said about God the better. God does nothing. That is certainly one of the lessons of the War.

Immediately after the Prime Minister had announced to Parliament the terms of the Armistice, the House of Commons adjourned to St. Margaret's to return thanks to God for the victory. We suggest that a fitting memento would be a record in all the churches of the millions of killed and wounded, with photographs of the ruined, shattered countrysides, as evidence of God's fatherly care for his children. There is reason for the Allies feeling grateful to those who achieved the victory. There would have been reason for the Germans feeling grateful had they been victorious. But God is the Father of both Germans and British. And imagine the absurdity of thanking him for helping one lot of his children to slaughter another lot. Such conduct on the part of an earthly parent would land him in a police-court.

The War is a punishment for our sins say the dear clergy. The Law Courts show that bigamy charges and crimes of violence are largely on the increase.

The late Dr. Boyd Carpenter, formerly Bishop of Ripon, was a royal favourite, and was much in request at fashionable weddings. He used to say: "I am not only a carpenter but a joiner, too." In this he resembled the founder of his religion.

"Which business takes the greatest variety of coins over the counter?" asks a London editor, and adds: "the Young Men's Christian Association's record in France would be hard to beat.

The following "In Memoriam" notice appeared lately in a Scotch daily: "No news, none at all. He's dead. That's all." Very true, when you come to think of it.

Glasgow Branch of the Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, in a report, point out that last year 19,814 ill-treated and neglected children were protected by the Society's Inspectors. And this is supposed to be a Christian country. How does this record compare with the countries that have not adopted Christianity as their standard?

The Very Rev. Dr. Wallace Williamson says the day after an effective armistice was declared every church in the country should be opened and the people invited to enter and render thanks to God. He looked forward with grateful and hopeful heart to the proclamation by the Government of a day of thanksgiving and dedication after peace was signed. Wherein do the people of this country owe thanks either to God or the clergy? Does the Rev. Dr. Williamson already forget that the clergy got themselves exempted from doing their share to help the country during her hour of need? If so, the people are not likely to forget the sorry figure cut by the young, able-bodied ministers strutting about the country while they allowed others to go forth and die in order that they might live.

Now we are getting at the truth regarding the great part played by the Y.M.C.A. At Lanark Presbytery meeting, The Rev. Mr. Hunter said the appeal for more help for the Y.M.C.A. huts should be made to men who had some knowledge of the grocery trade and were able to hand out provisions and wash up floors and counters, and not to ministers who had not been accustomed to this kind of work. He did not complain so much of the kind of work as the amount of work he got to do. If he wasn't content to serve and wash up for Tommy, why didn't he go and fight alongside of him?

A writer in a London newspaper suggests that the Junker press used to scream against "the decadent French" years before the War. Maybe, that was so; but the French clericalist press did so for a generation.

Lloyd's Sunday News tells a story of a child who, looking out of the window on a wet day, asked: "Mother, what does God have on when it rains?"

"Never in the world's history has Christianity been practised on such a scale as in the trenches," say the Daily Mail. Does our contemporary imagine that the opposing soldiers are kissing one another?

"It is beyond the power of God himself to make that which is past as if it had never been." This pretty piece of theology appeared in the Daily Chronicle over the signature of Sir Hall Caine.

The newspaper press is supposed to have some slight educational value. A leading London paper recently had a lengthy paragraph concerning the "luckiest destroyer" in the Navy, and suggesting that this immunity from disaster was due "to the ship's mascot, a monkey known as Jenny." Is it not clear that the editor's concern is not education, but circulation?

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle is the creator—after Edgar Allen Poe—of Mr. Sherlock Holmes. And a facility for writing detective stories and unravelling self-created mysteries seems to have placed him in a position of authority with regard to what will happen to man after death. At least, that is the only reason we can discern for his utterance of Spiritualism being taken so seriously by the newspapers. Sir Arthur has informed us that he can produce a number of parents who are convinced that they have held converse with their sons killed during the War. We are not at all surprised. Mothers sorrowing for the loss of their children, and already believing in a future life, strike us as admirable material for the spiritualistic medium; but an impartial outsider will hardly take them as valuable or impartial witnesses. It is as clear a case of the hope and the wish being father to the thought as one could desire.

Digitized by Google

Sir Arthur says that he has been on the quest for thirty years, which would imply that he was hoping to find what he has found. With so many people dying every day of our existence, it appears to us that the fact of a continued existence—which must be either true of all or none—should, long before Sir Arthur was born, have been one of the accepted and unchallengable convictions of the human race. That it is not so makes it at most a questionable hypothesis. Sir Arthur says that Spiritualism is the greatest revelation of the last 2,000 years. We would remind the author of Sherlock Holmes that supposed converse with the dead is not a new thing. The belief exists with savages, and we know the grounds on which that was based, and how mistaken these people were. If the belief was not justifiable then, and was not justifiable at later periods, we really see no reason for accepting it as sound now.

We agree with Sir Arthur that religion has broken down. We would prefer to put it that it has been found out. It broke down long ago. But it is almost comic to find this used as a stick wherewith to belabour Germany. We are told that Lutheranism has given us "these Prussian devils" and Catholicism "has given us the Bavarian." But it was only the other day that Luther was the great heroic figure of Protestantism. Both that and Catholicism exist outside Germany. We are the last to deny that the influence of both forms of religion have been bad; but why restrict the evil influence to Germany? Or, if it has been bad there, how comes it that it has been good elsewhere? As a reasoner, Sir Arthur strikes us as decidedly poor, and his efforts are not calculated to impress one with the value of his judgment in matters connected with a supposed life after death.

In a case concerning a horse at Bristol, it was stated that the animal, which was described as a "jibber," in a fortnight ate the cushions of a trap, two rungs of a ladder, a halter, some webbing, and a whip. This record was beaten by the whale mentioned in the Bible, which swallowed a prophet and provided him with unfurnished apartments for three days and nights.

Canon Hannay, in his new book, A Padre in France, tells the story of a chaplain who preached to a battalion before going into the firing line, and who selected for his subject "Tithes Considered as a Divine Institution." Canon Hannay adds that he is sure the story is not true, but he regards it as significant that it should be told at all.

The Daily Chronicle, referring to the Revolutionary Period of 1848, stated that many of the European thrones rocked, and "even the Pope fled disguised as a footman." It must have been a shock for His Holiness to leave off his petticoats.

In the Prisoners' of War debate in the House of Commons, Captain Craig, referring to those who object to reprisals, said: "In times of peace Christian ideals are all right, but ——" The concluding words were inaudible in the general laughter aroused by the frank admission of this facing-both-ways of Christians.

The Rev. T. R. H. Stebbing is ambitious. He has written a book on Faith in Fetters, in which he appeals to the "National Church to purify itself from a dense load of ignorance and prejudice." He will be delighted to hear that Freethinkers have been engaged in this pleasing pastime for centuries.

At a meeting in St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, called for the purpose of considering ways and means to increase the wages of the Scottish ministers, it was resolved that the meeting do everything in its power to raise the salaries of the clergy to at least £250 per annum with a free manse or sum equivalent. A discharged soldier enquired: "What about the discharged soldiers who were in the workhouse after having been invalided in the service of their country?" No notice was taken of this pertinent question, and now we have the spectacle of the men who fought and bled for their country being neglected while the clergy who stayed at home to keep the women company are to have an increase to their salaries. Is this how patriotism is to be rewarded?

The creation of bishoprics goes on apace, and we are wondering if the astute ecclesiastics perceive the coming of Disestablishment, and probable compensation. If they do not stop, the Church will resemble the Army of the Principality of Monaco—more officers than men.

The late Canon Cooper-Marsdin left the residue of his estate (about £10,000) for the founding of a new bishopric in Yorkshire. Perhaps he thought that would save him from the fate of poor old Dives.

What curiosities these Christians are! The Church Army is appealing for waste paper; the Salvation Army wants money; and the Young Men's Christian Association will be grateful for anything from billiard-tables to bank-notes. They all use the medium of advertising, just as if they were ordinary tradesmen or theatre proprietors. And, with characteristic modesty, they publish their good deeds before men in the largest type they can command.

The Bishop of London is visiting the troops in Salonika. An inspired correspondent in the Church Times says he intends to give to the soldiers "a message from God." We fancy they would prefer a packet of cigarettes, but what will happen if some soldier asks the Bishop to authenticate his message?

Preaching at Stevenage Parish Church, Canon Morgan Smith paid a tribute to the religious character of the Times' articles, and also to those "behind the great newspaper." The religious nature of Lord Northcliffe's operation is, we hope, widely recognized.

The long-advertised revival of religion appears to be taking some extraordinary shapes. Among the new publications of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge is a series, entitled Pioneers of Progress, and the books include monographs on "Galileo" and "Alfred Russel Wallace." At this rate of annexing famous names in support of Christianity, we may expect to find Bradlaugh and Ingersoll included among pillars of the Church.

Pastor Fort Newton, of the London City Temple, says "God is more popular to-day than he has been for a long time." Which "god" does the pastor mean?

It is not an extravagant calculation that, in England alone twenty millions a year are spent on religion. The figures fall glibly from the tongue, but just try to realize them! Think first of a thousand, then of a thousand thousand, then of twenty times that. Take a single million, and think what its expenditure might do in the shaping of public opinion. A practical friend of ours, a good Radical and Freethinker, said that he would undertake to create a majority for Home Rule in England with a million of money; and, if he spent it judiciously, we think he might succeed. Well, then, just imagine, not one million, but twenty millions spent every year in maintaining and propagating a certain religion. Is it not enough, and more than enough, to perpetuate a system which is firmly founded, to begin with, on the education of little children?

Here lies the strength of Christianity. It is not true, it is not useful. Its teachings and pretensions are both seen through by tens of thousands, but the wealth supports it. "Without money and without price," is the fraudulent language of the pious prospectus. It would never last on those terms. The money keeps it up. Withdraw the money, and the Black Army would disband, leaving the people free to work out their secular salvation, without the fear and trembling of a foolish faith.—G. W. Foote, "Flowers of Freethought."

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

November 17, Birmingham (N. S. S. Conference); November 24, Leeds; December 1, Ferndale; December 8, Leicester; December 15, Nuneaton; December 22, Glasgow.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—December 1, Swansea; December 8, Garw.

C. F. Bennett.—We do not think a leaflet on the Church of England's appeal for five millions would repay trouble of printing or of distribution. It would not get into the right hands. Your experience of Church schools in the case of your boy is not encouraging. But is there not a public school in your neighbourhood? Letter returned.

G. Crookson.—We are continually worrying agents for their delays in distributing the Freethinker. It is due to no fault at our end, and their excuse is "shortage of labour." However, will write about the delay.

R. Gunn.—We are pleased to have your appreciation of our work.

A. Radley.—Thanks, may write on the matter, but there are many things claiming space and attention at the present.

We have to acknowledge the sum of £2 10s. from Mr. F. J. Gould, to be spent in distributing parcels of literature among the troops. We shall be pleased to receive names and addresses to which these will be acceptable.

S. Clowes.—We are used to struggle, but such letters as yours does what can be done to make the fight easier. One doesn't work for appreciation, but it is none the less cheering when it is spontaneously offered.

C. H. Hill.—The comments were based on a report in a newspaper sent us by one of our readers. We do not preserve these after use, and so are sorry we cannot give the date you require.

J. O. M.—We deal with the Bristol slave trade in our Christianity and Slavery. We do not think the books you name have any commercial value, and books on chemistry should be of a very recent date.

J. James.—See "Acid Drops."

J. H. Kennard.—Florence Nightingale was not a declared Freethinker, but her views on religion were of a very heterodox character, and her beliefs were denounced by Catholics and Protestants alike.

H. P.—We note your remarks about the French sceptics. We were talking over the matter with one of our contributors a week or two ago, and may do something in the near future.

W. J.—Perhaps you had better take our reply to Dr. Lyttelton in this week's issue as an answer to your friend's question.

Mrs. H. Rosetti.—We are sending literature to addresses given.

F. W. Lloyd.—See "Acid Drops." Sir Oliver Lodge only adds more words, without adding any verifiable facts.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

Previously acknowledged, £418 0s. 7d. Artisticus, 5s.; F. J. Gould, £2 10s.; T. Teasdale, 2s.; S. Clowes (fifth sub.), 3s; R. Gunn, 5s.; Philip Weines, 2s.; J. Pugh, 5s.; G. Smith, £3 3s; T. Griffiths, £1; H. Bull, 2s. 6d. Total, £425 19s. 1d.

Correction.—"Per Sec. Manchester Branch," in last issue, should have read "E. C. Turner, per Sec. Manchester Branch."

This Fund will close on December 17.

The War is over. That is the great fact of the moment. When a certain character at the close of the French Revolution, and who was full of reminiscences of the period, was asked what he did, his reply was: "I lived." So the Freethinker may say: "We have lived." There are still hard times ahead, but the Freethinker has lived through the hardest period ever experienced by any Freethought journal, and comes out of it stronger than it was at the opening of the War. It has a larger circulation and a more assured influence than ever. For this we have to thank our readers who have helped loyally and generously. The War of brute force is over. The war of ideas goes on.

Next Sunday (Nov. 24) Mr. Cohen lectures at Leeds. It is a long time since Mr. Cohen visited that city, and large meetings are anticipated. The meetings will be held, afternoon and evening, in the Victoria Hall, which, we are informed, seats about 2,000 people. Admission is free, but there will be a number of reserved seats. Mr. Cohen hopes to meet a great many Freethinkers from surrounding districts.

We are pleased to say that the sales of Mr. Cohen's Christianity and Slavery has established a record. A first edition was printed, large enough, it was thought, to last until normal times returned. The demand during the first two or three weeks' issue was, however, so great that a second edition was prepared, and is now on sale. Of the first edition, published two months ago, a very few copies remain. And we are glad to note that the booklet is still selling steadily. The work evidently met a real need among Freethinkers and inquiring Christians.

From Salonika, Private Kennard writes:—

> With reference to religion in the Army, I am happy to state that I have invariably been excused Church parades, and my identity discs were stamped "Atheist" after calling the officer's attention to Army Council Instruction, No. 179, Jan., 1916. I look forward to the dear old Freethinker each week, and after reading it pass it along to my chums. It has lead to many interesting discussions, especially in hospitals, where soldiers get more leisure to read and think about philosophical matters. Sometimes one comes across an amusing case. Here is an instance. I had a chat with a comrade who stated that he had practically given up Christianity but refused to even look at the Freethinker because he did not wish to lose what little faith he had got! Such a person seems hopeless to me, but it shows only too well what religion can do in the way of cramping a man's intellect and moral courage.

S. M. R. writes:—

> Now that the War is over, I hasten to congratulate you and the Freethinker staff on having so successfully weathered the storm. The conduct of the paper under your guidance, and through such a trying time, has been admirable. A broad human sanity has marked it, that must have gained many new friends, and still further endeared it to old ones. It required no small amount of courage and ability to face the situation that is now happily at an end, but you have shown yourself equal to the occasion. You already have the confidence of Freethinkers, and have fully earned their congratulations and thanks.

We can only repeat what we have already said—we did our best. And we hope we shall never be found doing less.

We have decided to fix December 17 as the closing date for the Sustentation Fund. This is a month longer than we intended, and we have delayed the closing date at the request of friends. But by December 17 we have no doubt that all will have sent who intend sending. And some always wait till the end.

No power of genius has ever yet had the smallest success in explaining existence. The perfect enigma remains.

A Naturalist's Paradise.

IV.

(Concluded from p. 573.)

THE avifauna of Borneo embraces the Argus pheasant, flamingos, parrots, peacocks, pigeons, eagles, vultures, and many melodious songsters, with the swift celebrated throughout the Eastern World as the builder of an edible nest. This structure is immensely appreciated by the Chinese as an ingredient of soup. Three species of swifts prepare these remarkable nests, but the nest most highly prized is that of Collocalia fuciphaga or esculenta. This nest is a cup-shaped structure, and consists entirely of "a tough, gelatinous, translucent substance, which exudes from the bill of the bird as it builds." The physiological processes involved in this singular form of nidification are not yet understood.

Much as our swallows nest under the eaves or in chimneys, the Bornean swifts construct their cradles on the walls and roofs of caves. These favoured retreats form part of the native estate inherited by descendants. The white nests—those most valued—are usually found in low sandstone caves. The inferior nests are dark in colour, and are mostly erected in the capacious limestone caves at a height of about 100 feet from the surface. Three times in one season the birds are deprived of their white nests, while the darker nests are gathered twice only. During the nest harvest the natives dwell in temporary houses within the caves, and when their collections are complete the Chinese merchants purchase them. Dr. Hose states that the price paid for the black nests is about 100 dollars per hundredweight, while the white nests realize the princely sum of thirty or forty shillings per pound.

Human sacrifices to the spirits were once common among the Pagan peoples, and, apparently still, these occasionally occur, although now strictly forbidden. The Kayans formerly sacrificed slaves at the demise of a chief, so that they might accompany his spirit on its perilous voyage to the other world. As human victims are no longer available, the matter is compromised by placing a man's effigy at the head, and that of a woman at the foot of the chief's coffin as the ruler rests in state before burial. A third figure is commonly attached to the tomb, and this simulates the slave who paddles the chief's canoe to the spirit land.

Like the ancient Hebrews, the Kayans were long accustomed to the employment of a living human creature as a firm foundation for a new habitation. Into the opening designed to receive the first pile of the edifice, a fowl is now cast, and then the end of the pile is thrown on the fowl and kills it. The bird is a substitute for what was once a girl sacrifice, and, even now, declares Hose, "Kenyahs and Klemantans sometimes carve a human figure upon the first of the main piles of a new house to be put into the ground."

Independently of European influence evidences of the humanization of their religious rites may be detected among the native tribes. It is highly probable that human beings were once offered to the gods to secure a good harvest of edible nests. Buffaloes and birds are slain and deposited in the caves where the swifts place their nests. In one season of scarcity the natives returned to their darker superstition, and a slave was sacrificed as a propitiary offering in Brunei. In other parts of Borneo the human victim has been replaced by pigs and buffaloes at times when the gods are appeased.

The savagery so long associated with the head hunting observances of the native races was mainly religious in character. The sea Dayaks are certainly a remorseless people, but the fiendish customs so freely attributed to other Bornean stocks appear grossly exaggerated. Most merciless cruelty has disgraced religion even among ourselves, and were we solely judged by the torture and persecution of past ages, Europeans would seem as ruthless as the head hunters of Borneo. As Dr. Hose and Professor McDougall reminds us:—

> After our own race had professed Christianity for many generations, the authority of Church and State publicly decreed and systematically inflicted in cold blood tortures far more hideous and atrocious than any the Kayan imagination has ever conceived.

Like other uncivilized peoples, the Pagan Kayans populate their environment with spiritual entities of good and evil intent. Some of these ghostly beings are embodied in plants and animals, while the mountains, streams, caverns, and other natural phenomena are also the habitats of spirits. Animism is universal, and the fertility of the soil, lightning and thunder, storm and sunshine, disease and disaster, are all the handiwork of the ubiquitous gods.

In addition to these lesser divinities that preside over the course of Nature, and decree the prosperity or poverty of the people, there reigns a supreme regulator—Laki Tenagan—whose position above the inferior deities is similar to that occupied by the Greek Zeus and the Roman Jupiter in relation to the minor gods of the ancient world. Some of the departmental deities appear to be divine ancestors, and various subtribes still claim descent from these spirits. Chiefs recently dead are regarded with reverential awe, but those that died long ago are viewed as spiritual beings of more exalted rank. Hose and McDougall favour the theory that the Kenyah thunder-god is a deified chief. This noisy spirit is known as Balingo, and "all the Kenyahs and many Klemantans seem to claim some special relation to Balingo, while one Madang (Kenyah) chief at least claims descent from him" (Pagan Tribes, vol. ii., pp. 11, 12).

Possibly the leading god, Laki Tenangan, himself has been developed from a defunct chief. We naturally expect the customs of the island to be transferred to the ghostly realm. In Borneo, in addition to the local village chiefs, there is a supreme ruler whose will is law in times of strife. It is, therefore, no source of surprise to discover that "The social system of the superior powers should be modelled upon that of the people who acknowledge them."

Despite the terrible depredations of the ferocious crocodiles which infest the rivers and lagoons, the attitude of the tribes of Sarawak towards these dreadful creatures is more or less friendly. Superstition is mainly responsible for this, and excuses are usually made for the sanguinary reptile when he seizes a human creature. Either the guilty crocodile has been incensed by the misconduct of his victim, or the outrage has been committed by some strange reptile, and not by the friendly crocodiles resident in the neighbouring waters. Yet, with naive inconsistency, the crime is regarded as something demanding reprisals. The blood feud is aroused, and the reptile's aggressive action must be atoned for by the death of at least one of the crocodiles. The animal has the strange habit, it is said, of clutching the corpse of its victim for a short period before devouring it, when it carries its prey into a swampy inlet of the running river. A party vowing vengeance now explores the neighbouring creeks, and measures are devised to prevent the homicidal creature from escaping into another stream. Should the crocodile be discovered in company with his prey, he is promptly slaughtered, and the blood feud ceases. But when the hunt proves abortive, the natives scour the river, and usually succeed in slaying one or more of these beasts. The criminal, they consider, has now been punished for his transgression. But, save in circumstances such as these, the Kenyahs never molest the crocodile, and its flesh is strictly sacred.

The white-crested carrion hawk is a bird of profound importance in Borneo. This hawk is addressed and invariably referred to among the Kenyahs as Bali Flaki, and it is always consulted by the natives before they embark on a distant journey. Very elaborate are the rites associated with this ceremony, but no European can divine their precise meaning, supposing them to possess any. We gather from careful observers that the views of the natives themselves on these subjects "are hardly less vague and diversified than those of more civilized worshippers."

Two images of Bali Penyalong, a supreme divinity, stand near together, and before one of these the high priest postures and mutters, and then decapitates a fowl and smears its blood on the image. Other fowls are successively sacrificed, and then one of the priestly attendants gashes the throat of a young pig, and as its blood spurts forth, the priest scatters it over the image. Meanwhile, writes Dr. Hose, > the score of men standing round about put their hands, some on him, and some on one another; maintaining in this way physical contact with one another and with their leader, they joined in the prayer or incantation which he kept pouring forth in the same rapid mechanical fashion in which many a curate at home reads the Church service.

Other rites of a kindred character having been concluded, the party arranged for the projected journey is deemed secure from disaster, and the priest departs to cleanse himself from the blood with which he is liberally adorned. Thus is the favour of the hawks secured, and they will certainly protect the travellers from danger and death.

The majority, and perhaps all uncivilized peoples, attribute to the lower animals, or even to plants, such mental qualities as they themselves possess. The hawks and other Bornean birds are regarded by the natives as omen animals, and the hawk appears to officiate as a messenger to the principal god. Before the ceremonies already summarized begin, the flight of the hawks is eagerly observed; and the requisite omens obtained, the ceremonial is performed. The hawk's pre-eminence among birds in the native religion has doubtless arisen from its weird and mysterious habits.

It has been contended that the hawk's sudden emergence from the deepest blue of the heavens, its hovering instincts, its habit of circling in the sky in a seemingly purposeless manner, its custom of flying onward in front of a boat as it moves along the river, or rapidly sweeping through the air towards the boat, screaming as it approaches, all support the theory that these combined peculiarities suffice to explain why the natives, whose lives from the cradle to the grave are ceaselessly environed by virgin forest, waterfalls, and treacherous streams, should attach undue importance to the hawk and other mysterious creatures.

The Bornean theology is largely a reflection of the experiences of the people in their primitive home. As the authors of the Pagan Tribes of Borneo conclude, we are studying savages who are "extremely ignorant of natural causation, yet intelligent and speculative, and always looking out for signs that shall guide them among the mysteries and dangers that surround them." It is a fair inference that the people regard the hawk as an emissary of the supreme sky god.

> For this being is vaguely conceived by them as dwelling in the skies whence the hawk comes, and whither he so often returns. And then we may suppose that the messenger himself has come to be an object of worship in various degrees with the different tribes, as seems to be the rule in all religious systems in which servants of a deity mediate between him and man.

Some Reflections on a Recent Tract.

The National Council for Combating Venereal Diseases, a responsible body recognized by the Government, has, with commendable courage, inserted in an evening paper, a little treatise on the danger of venereal disease, setting forth the value of early treatment. Such facts as are contained therein cannot have too wide a publicity; but the publication of this little document should help, in some degree at all events, to discredit in certain circles some rather widely held points of view.

There is a type of mind which insists that the ills of man are a device of the Almighty invented for the purpose of effecting the moral governance of the universe. To persons who hold this philosophy of history venereal disease has always been one of God's masterstrokes.

If we are to believe these singular people we must suppose the methods of the Creator to be as follows. With the admirable intention of maintaining the race, the individual is endowed with a set of instincts which allows him to take an intelligent interest in this plan of the ages. But, alas, some people become too enthusiastic in this work, and they are neatly laid by the heels, and their ardour is cooled in a manner that may be read up in expensive medical works, but which can hardly be described in these pages.

The world is kept morally clean and sweet by the activity of an army of microbes, which, directed by the generalship which cast Satan out of heaven, attacks men, women, and children with a malignancy the militarists may admire and copy, but can never hope to surpass. It is a little strange that the Kaiser has never tried to inspire his soldiers with a quasi-Biblical quotation like: "Consider the gonococcus and be wise."

But it appears from the pamphlet that the little germs require time to effect their work. And here it is that the methods of Providence (if venereal disease is one of the methods of Providence) may be made of non effect. The Committee do not put much trust either in prayer or repentance, although, of course, these sources of solace are not forbidden to the victims. The words of the Council are so admirable that I shall quote them. "The table also shows, 'the longer one waits, the greater the risk.' It is far better not to take the risk at all, but those who succumb to temptation should immediately seek medical advice."

It appears, then, that moral laws may be broken in two ways; that is to say, if you are foolish enough to indulge in this rather irrational proceeding. You may do so blindly and ignorantly, when they are very like to break you; or you may be circumspect, and, like the one thousand one hundred and eighty mentioned by the Council, seek the doctor one hour after your fall. If you do this, the chances are that God's battalions will be broken up by the doctor's barrage. And even if, as happened in one case reported in the pamphlet, the enemy succeeds in breaking through, he can be counter-attacked by the man of science, and within two days thrown out.

Such facts make it impossible for some people to believe that God works by means which can at once be so fiendishly cruel to the ignorant and so easily circumvented by the wise. Yet it would be a mistake to think that this particular delusion of mankind will die either easily or quickly.

It can be argued that science may hoodwink God in time, but not in eternity. His plans may be laid in ruins here, but not in heaven. And it is as well to remember that the belief in heaven is a belief of a majority in these Islands, and is likely to remain so. And when we reflect that many of these people honestly think war has been sent by God as a judgment on the wickedness of man (and science has not yet been able to find the antidote to this particular poison), the only effect of such a pamphlet as that of the National Council for Combating Venereal Disease is to make the greater part of our believing countrymen tremble at the thought of what will happen to those poor fellows who evade the just punishment of God in the consultation rooms of a doctor, when finally they come to stand before the Great White Throne.

Notes From Ireland.

If there are any Freethinkers in Ireland they are mostly daubed a sickly white with the hypocritical veneer of acquiescence, as men hide diamonds, pearls, and precious things in ugly, untouchable safes. But they are the body of an organization that has yet to be moulded, directed, consummated. At present they are inaudible for their silence. But the unseen workings are in readiness to pump the vital blood of infinitude through the arteries and capillaries of the soul. All that is required is a Bradlaugh and a Foote and a Voltaire. Whoever he is must be plucky. Wanted a leader! a leader powerful enough to overcome the Almighty at his best; no salary, no war bonus, no commission, no thanks; a poppied grave. Any takers?

You people in England cannot even dimly realize the extent of the religious blight that hinders the efflorescence of the soul of this little nation. One has got to attend any service at any chapel on any Sunday to form a conception of the horrible credulity that obtains even in the capital. Mass is held every half-hour on Sunday, yet the chapels—and our chapels are vast—are full to overflowing at each oblation; every pew is crammed, every passage and aisle and porch is crammed with silent worshippers standing. The men behind the Leader, the Irishman, and all the rest of the Sinn Fein publications are members of the One True Church almost to a man. But there is hope in one or two directions. There is a tiny coterie of poets, painters, artists, and literary men in Dublin, every one of whom is a "free lance." But the arrows of their talent are never pointed openly against the Church; they are afraid of their reputation being jeopardized.

There is, however, one chink that permits the ingress of modernism—the Abbey Theatre. Not a few of the plays produced at this theatre are alarmingly heterodox. A week ago we had Shaw's "The Showing Up of Blanco Posnet." By Jove, how the clerical stomach must have experienced the pangs of indigestion and heaved some of its greasy cargo of luscious complacency at this sermon against religion! The plays of J. M. Synge, too, are barbed with the wittiest and most beautiful irony—an irony more delightful, because less bitter even than Hardy's. He speaks of—

> Prayers ascending naked to the saints of God.

Referring to the souls in heaven, he describes them as—

> Gazing through the bars of paradise.

With regard to the Pope and celibacy, he makes one of his characters say—

> Shure, the Holy Father must be very lonely on his golden throne.

We quaff a glass to the health and continued vigour of the manager, Fred O'Donovan, and his little band of courageous, pioneer actors.

Romish priests have succumbed to the "Flu."

DESMOND FITZROY.

To a Bereaved Mother.

[In the summer of 1885 a San Francisco mother lost her son, an only child, who had gone on a brief journey. His death was sudden, and the mother was apprised of it by telegram. Having been brought up in the Calvinistic creed, her natural sorrow was turned into an agony of grief by the fear that her unconverted son was suffering in hell. Her friends were apprehensive that her reason, if not her life, would be destroyed. One of them begged Colonel Ingersoll to write something that might possibly relieve her mind, and the result was the following letter, which she read "through blinding tears," and which brought her (in her own words) "the first peace I have known, real peace, since the terrible blow."]

MY DEAR MADAM,—Mrs. C. has told me the sad story of your almost infinite sorrow. I am not foolish enough to suppose that I can say or do anything to lessen your great grief, your anguish for his loss; but maybe I can say something to drive from your poor heart the fiend of fear—fear for him.

If there is a God, let us believe that he is good; and if he is good, the good have nothing to fear. I have been told that your son was kind and generous; that he was filled with charity and sympathy. Now, we know that in this world like begets like, kindness produces kindness, and all good bears the fruit of joy. Belief is nothing—deeds are everything; and if your son was kind, he will naturally find kindness wherever he may be. You would not inflict endless pain upon your worst enemy. Is God worse than you? You could not bear to see a viper suffer forever. Is it possible that God will doom a kind and generous boy to everlasting pain? Nothing can be more monstrously absurd and cruel.

The truth is, that no human being knows anything of what is beyond the grave. If nothing is known, then it is not honest for anyone to pretend that he does know. If nothing is known, then we can hope only for the good. If there be a God, your boy is no more in his power now than he was before his death—no more than you are at the present moment. Why should we fear God more after death than before? Does the feeling of God towards his children change the moment they die? While we are alive they say God loves us; when will he cease to love us? True love never changes. I beg of you to throw away all fear. Take counsel of your own heart. If God exists, your heart is the best revelation of him, and your heart could never send your boy to endless pain. After all, no one knows. The ministers know nothing. And all the Churches in the world know no more on this subject than the ants on the ant-hills. Creeds are good for nothing except to break the hearts of the loving.

Let us have courage. Under the seven-hued arch of hope let the dead sleep. I do not pretend to know, but I do know that others do not know. Listen to your heart, believe what it says, and wait with patience and without fear for what the future has for all. If we can get no comfort from what people know, let us avoid being driven to despair by what they do not know.

I wish I could say something that would put a star in your night of grief—a little flower in your lonely path—and if an unbeliever has such a wish, surely an infinitely good being never made a soul to be the food of pain through countless years.—Sincerely yours, R. G. INGERSOLL.

"The Curate."

SEE how he trots, emBibled—saintly man!—
To meet "deserving poor" at Sunday-school;
Anon he sits with spinsters, on a stool,
Smelling a "will," as any lawyer can;
Rubbing his hands, he works his wily plan.
You'll hear his voice wherever ladies are,
His silly talk delights the gay bazaar,
Giggling, he finds the apples in the pan.
"Endue thy ministers with righteousness"
He drones, as if it broke his heart to say't;
At "O Lord, save the King," he's simply great;
With genuflexions, rather more than less,
He circumnavigates the silver plate,
The dregs of wine he drains with eagerness.

James Albert Neate.

By His Schoolmaster.

The news of James Albert Neate's death stunned me. I saw him last on the 11th of September in front of the Royal Exchange. He was very anxious to know how I was getting along, and seemed concerned because I was wearing glasses. His sympathy was quite characteristic. Little did I think as I bade him good-bye that I should never see him again. I was fond of Albert, and I admired him greatly; he was so considerate, so transparently sincere.

When he came to my school he was very nervous, and physically weak. His health had been, and was then, I imagine, the despair of his parents. Love and money had been lavished upon him. His mother told me of her belief that Albert would one day be quite strong. I doubted it. For a short time in school he was quite a recluse. I was his only chum. Little by little, however, his nervousness disappeared. He began to enter into games with zest, and rapidly became a favourite. A nickname was given to him, "Old Nattie" (Nattie being another word for neat in school parlance).

After the free spirit of the school had removed his nervousness, the intellect of the lad began to assert itself. His mind advanced at such a rate that at times I feared it. Normally he was, as we North Country folk say, "old-fashioned."

But his thinking was abnormal. I don't think I ever met a youth with such an assimilative brain. He had an unusually large head. Had he been physically as well as mentally strong, he would have made himself useful in the world. Another noteworthy feature in his composition was courage. Albert at once condemned a thing if he thought it to be wrong. And there was no lack of reasons in the condemnation either. In this respect I saw in him a budding Freethought propagandist, a chip off the old block. Mr. Cohen said: "No child ever had more devoted parents." Let me add: No parents ever had a more devoted son. I knew how they loved him, and I knew how he loved them. This blow is a terrible one to Mr. and Mrs. Neate.

Having done the best that could be done they will be resigned, I quite know. That so many fondled hopes and such deep devotion be devoured by death is a terrible tragedy. He will live on the treasure-house of memory. Alas! what a number of my scholars are no more. Many are now lying somewhere in the graveyard of Europe. A good deal of my thirteen years of loving labour lies buried as a secular teacher there.

Birmingham (N.S.S.) Conference.

Delegates and members are reminded that the morning session of the Conference to be held to-day, November 17, at the Repertory Theatre, Birmingham, will commence at 10.30 sharp. The entrance is in Hurckley Street. The meetings are for members of the N.S.S. only. Delegates must show their credentials and members their current cards of membership at the door.

I am advised that it will be prudent for visitors to Birmingham to bring travellers' ration cards, which can be obtained from their local food controller, as, owing to War conditions, the supply of manna cannot be relied upon. I invite them to meet the President and myself at the Queen's Hotel, New Street Station, on Saturday evening at 7 p.m., when I shall be glad to give them any further information. Don't forget to wear the pansy badge.—E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

Obituary.

Our readers will regret to learn that Mrs. G. W. Foote has experienced another loss in the death of her niece at the age of twenty-six, and who had been a member of her household since her girlhood. The deceased was of a bright and cheerful disposition, capable, and for some time had been engaged in one of the departments of the War Office. Returning from business a few days before her death, she complained of violent pains, took to her bed, and, in spite of all the most careful medical attention and nursing could do, died on November 6. Both Mr. and Mrs. Foote were greatly attached to her and she to them. Her death leaves a sad gap in the home of which she was a member. The remains were cremated at the City of London Crematorium on November 11.

Views and Opinions.

The War After the War.

The War of armed force is ended; the war of ideas is about to begin. This war calls for not less courage and persistency than the other, but more of both qualities. For it is folly to assume that these four years of strife, ending as it has done with a sweeping triumph over the Central Powers, have destroyed that antagonism of ideas which existed before the European War opened. So far as this is concerned, the War is no more than an interlude. Absorption in the War, its dominating presence, may have blinded many to this; but the state of war is not and cannot be permanent. A war may rage round fundamental issues, but when the war is over the older and permanent conflict is resumed. The destiny of a political group may be determined on the field of battle; but the destiny of the race is determined on a battlefield where ideas take the place of high explosives, and ideals that of opposing armies. On the one side, our task is now to harness energies for four years spent on war to the more profitable arts of peace. On the other hand, we have to lift the fighting capacity of man from the level of brute force to that of ideas and ideals.

The War and the Churches.

Ours is the best of causes, and we are fighting the worst of religions. In fighting Germany, we were at war with a people that had been under the influence of Militarism for half a century. But the countries which waged that war, and which, by their policies of conquest and intrigue, and the piling up of armaments, had been for generations sowing the seeds of war, have been under the dominating influence of the Christian religion for over fifteen centuries. If two generations of training had sufficed to make Germany what it was, what might not more than thirty generations have made the world had the influence of Christianity been in the right direction? But when the War came it is safe to say that, while laymen were shocked at the outbreak of such a War, the Churches, both here and in Germany, took it with a callousness that carried its own condemnation. Both here and in Germany the clergy threw themselves into the War with an energy that surprised their friends and disgusted even their enemies. They showed the reality of their gospel of love by the readiness with which they preached the gospel of hate. They might have made it their business to stand as the representatives of those higher aspects of life that are always endangered during a time of war; they left the leadership in these things to other hands. With rare exceptions, the pulpits have, during these four years, pandered to passion and catered for prejudice. They have preached rigorously from the prophets, but have remained silent concerning the profiteers. They did advise us to cultivate potatoes in our back gardens, but they said nothing as to the need for a revision of the whole English land system. We hope Freethinkers will see to it that the record of the clergy during the War is not forgotten. They will do their best to bury it as the War recedes into the past. We must see to it that it enjoys a "blessed resurrection."

"Reconstruction" and the Churches.

It will not be denied that up to the present the Churches have lost heavily by the War. That is admitted, and lamented, on all hands. But it is certain that they will make desperate efforts to recover some of their lost ground; and already the air is thick with schemes and talk of Reconstruction. At the moment Churches are busy with thanksgiving services, praising God for ending a war which no God worth a shillingsworth of incense would ever have permitted. The Church of England is appealing for five million pounds, and the perennial fool-crop, combined with those interests which desire the people to be kept religious, may well supply a large part, if not all of this sum. How much the Archbishops of York and Canterbury intend subscribing out of their annual £24,000 we are not told. Nor the Bishop of London, out of his £10,000. But we recall that this latter gentleman explained that he had invested all he had in War Loan, and thus with rare Christian patriotism preserved his capital, and placed an extra tax of five per cent. on the community. And when the Church gets its five millions it will, as announced, use it for providing more clergymen—when already there are more than needed; for paying workers among the poor, who will thus play the game of doles and palliatives and so prevent radical reform; and maintain its schools, and give an inefficient Sectarian Education as against an efficient State system. In other words, the nation is invited to contribute five millions to be used against the best interests of the nation itself.

Freedom for All.

Now it seems that with the General Election upon us there is an opportunity for Freethinkers to help, as Freethinkers, in the work of "Reconstruction," about which so much is being said. Whatever is the ultimate form of Government adopted in Russia (one would like to get at the truth about the situation), it is fairly clear that a State religion there is doomed. And in a reconstructed Germany there will be no State religion. A State religion has already been abolished in France, with benefit to the nation. Is there any reason why England should not follow suit? In the modern

Digitized by Google

State a governmental religion is an anachronism. Religious equality means the absence of State patronage of religions. And Freethinkers when they are asked, as they will be asked, for their vote, might legitimately make the removal of this injustice one of their test questions. Only one, because there are others. But if that one is answered satisfactorily it will logically lead the way to a satisfactory answer to others. It would probably mean the abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, and would leave God to look after his own offended majesty instead of that duty being undertaken by a policeman. Blasphemy laws are always cruel: we have reached the stage when they have become supremely ridiculous.

Religion in the Army.

There is also the question of religion in the Army. There are two ways of dealing with the soldier. The fashionable method is to be interested in the man because he is a soldier. We prefer to be interested in the soldier because he is a man. And there is a world of difference in putting either the uniform or the man in the first place. Ever since the War broke out we have protested publicly and privately against the stupid and objectionable Church parades in the British Army. Soldiers themselves object to it. There is more cursing when soldiers are marched to church than over any other Army function. A soldier may dispense with the religious oath of allegiance when he joins the Army, and has the right to be registered as Atheist or Freethinker. Thousands have taken advantage of both regulations, and it has had quite an educational influence. But to take a man into the Army as an Atheist and then march him to church as a Christian is a piece of absurd tyranny that could only flourish in this country. In a civilized country freedom of worship is the right of every civilian. Is there any reason why a soldier should be treated as less capable than a civilian of selecting his religion? Soldiers now have the vote, and we suggest they should use it, and civilians should help them use it, in extracting a pledge from Parliamentary candidates that joining either Army or Navy shall not rob a man of the elementary right of deciding for himself whether he will go to church or stay away. This election is certainly the most favourable opportunity for raising the point, and we hope it will be raised all over the country.

Religion and the Child.

Then there is the question of Secular Education. And here another factor comes into play. Woman has now a vote, given to her by Christians, under pressure, on the avowed ground that she has helped in a War. And the Christian view of woman as an inferior being is so ingrained that even now she may not vote until she is thirty years of age. Still she has the vote, and if anyone is more than another directly interested in the training of children it is she. We have, we are pleased to say, a large number of lady readers, and they are not the least zealous of our helpers. To them, and of course, to the men, we would earnestly appeal to see that this question is brought before the candidates. Bearing in mind the plans of the Government with regard to religion in the schools, it is imperative that as large a number of members as is possible are returned to the House of Commons definitely pledged to Secular Education. And the case of France will help them here. France owes its recovery from the catastrophe of 1870, largely to its acceptance of Gambetta's message "Clericalism, that is the enemy." We must have the resolution to do ourselves what France has already done. Clear the priest out of the schools. We are asking for no sectarian or party advantage. And we desire none. We believe in the power of education, and we believe in the prevalence of justice. If the world is really to be made "safe for democracy" we must say to both the priest and to the militarist "Hands off the child." Give the child a chance; for in the child lies the hope of the future.

Chapman Cohen.

Theism.

Dr. F. L. Patten, a distinguished American divine, treats Theism as if it embraced Polytheism and Pantheism as well as Monotheism; but the late Professor Flint, of Edinburgh, in his scholarly work, entitled Theism, excludes from his definition of the term both Polytheism and Pantheism, maintaining that there are but three Theistic religions—the Mosaic, the Christian, and the Mohammedan. According to Dr. Flint, Theism provides Nature with a Creator, the nations with a Governor, and men with a Heavenly Father and Judge. Doctrinally, that is perfectly sound, no doubt; but doctrinal soundness does not necessarily carry with it its own truth. In the latest and best accredited science there is absolutely no room for a Creator, the fact of evolution implying the denial of the idea of creation. The history of the nations negatives the hypothesis of a Divine Governor, however earnestly a few individuals here and there may believe in his existence; and surely, if there is no moral Governor to keep the Universe in order, men cannot legitimately boast that they have a Heavenly Father and Judge on whom they may rely for a just and loving treatment. An entirely logical dogma may yet be utterly false. Never was a more logical body of divinity elaborated than Calvinism, but the defenders of Calvinism are to-day few and far between even among the most orthodox. As a doctrine, Theism may be beautifully self-consistent and have much to recommend it to certain temperaments; but of its truth there is no convincing evidence whatsoever. There are those who assert that they possess and enjoy personal knowledge of an invisible spiritual Being, whom they love and worship as ideally perfect, but they frankly admit that this is a knowledge which they are powerless to communicate to their fellow-beings. Curiously enough, however, such people completely fail to verify their claim to such knowledge by the display of either intellectual or moral superiority to those who indulge in no like profession. Their contention is that God can only be known by those who wish to know him. We allude to that contention merely for the purpose of remarking that it does but scant justice to the so-called invisible spiritual Being. By what right does anyone lay down terms on which alone he can be known? If there be a God who is the loving Father of all mankind, is it not his bounden duty to make himself known to every one of them? Is it conceivable that he does not wish to reveal himself to the offspring of his heart? As a matter of simple fact, that is absolutely inconceivable, and its inconceivability involves the non-existence of such a Father.

The all-significant fact is that no God has ever done anything to justify the belief in him, or to justify himself as an object of belief. The Old Testament was composed by men who believed that Jehovah was the greatest and mightiest of all existing Deities. In early times it was universally taken for granted that they were all equally real, though not all equally powerful. Like all other mythological writings, the Bible abounds in descriptions of the wars of the Gods, in which Jehovah was not always victorious. On one occasion, at any rate, he was made a prisoner and carried off to a hostile land, where terrible disasters overtook his captors. In the sixth chapter of the Book of Judges a highly suggestive instance of the rivalry between Jehovah and Baal is recorded. Gideon built an altar to Jehovah and called it "The Lord in Peace"; but his father followed the cult of Baal, and had raised an altar to his name. Jehovah, being very jealous, is represented as commanding Gideon to throw down the altar of Baal and cut down the tree or pole under which it lay. Poor Gideon lacked sufficient courage to perform the nefarious deed by day, and so he went and did it at dead of night. The devotees of Baal, when they discovered in the morning what had been done, were furious, and, on learning who the culprit was, angrily demanded his life. Their interview with Gideon's father is exceedingly instructive:—

> Then the men of the city said unto Joash, Bring out thy son that he may die, because he hath broken down the altar of Baal, and because he hath cut down the asherah that was by it. And Joash said unto all that stood against him, Will ye plead for Baal; or will ye save him? He that will plead for him let him be put to death whilst it is yet morning; if he be a God, let him plead for himself, because one hath broken down his altar. Therefore on that day he called him Jerubaal, saying, Let Baal plead against him, because he hath broken down his altar.

A true philosophy underlies those words so solemnly uttered by Joash. Largely influenced, no doubt, by parental affection, he perceived the essential injustice of his undertaking the responsibility of punishing a sin, if a sin, against Baal. The wanton destruction of the altar was clearly an act of persecution. Jehovah is pourtrayed as anxious to establish his supremacy by violence, to suppress all rivalry by brute force; that is, to forbid, in the most autocratic fashion, the exercise of any religious liberty whatever. In Joash's opinion that was the quintessence of unfairness. He himself believed in and worshipped Baal, the pulling down of whose altar was certainly an insult to all his followers; but the fact that the offender was his own son opened his eyes to the truth that vengeance belonged alone to the Deity concerned. If he be a God let him plead for himself. Unfortunately, no invisible spiritual Being has ever done that. Such a convincing proof of divinity has never yet been given. God is eternally silent and inactive, profoundly unconcerned amid the most horrible happenings. Men may bless or curse him, praise or blaspheme his name, affirm or deny his existence in any terms they please, and he utters not a word, affords not the least sign of approval or disapproval. The amazing thing is that the writers of the Bible even assert the truth of this statement concerning every deity but their own. It is Jehovah alone who is pictured as performing silly and sometimes cruel miracles in proof of his divinity. But in those ancient miracles only an extremely small number of theologians believe to-day, though they are all still convinced that they, and they alone, must plead for God. When asked for some evidence that they have really been entrusted with so tremendous a mission they can adduce none. Though they pretend to speak in God's name and by God's authority of their appointment as Heaven's ambassadors, they hold no certificate, no form of authentication, beyond their own mere word. Neither by their superior knowledge, nor by the transcendent wisdom of their declarations, do they furnish the slenderest evidence that they are authentic spokesmen of a Supernatural Being.

Besides, both professors of divinity and preachers of the Gospel disprove their own claim by their fundamental disagreements with one another. Scarcely any two of them see eye to eye on the most vital points. The multiplicity of theological schools or factions discredits every one of them; and they all alike ignore the great principle so clearly stated by Joash: "If he be a God, let him plead for himself." Full well do they know that he either will not or cannot do so, with the result that they appoint one another to plead for him, which they do in a ridiculously contradictory and self-condemnatory manner. The God they thus undertake to defend never breaks his silence, never interferes, never shows his hand. The Kaiser called him his "avowed Ally," and the entente nations declared that he was fighting with them; or, rather, that they were fighting with him, while he gave absolutely no sign. Divines, like Professor David Smith, unblushingly maintained that the Allies were but the vultures by means of which he was punishing the German nation. The heartlessness of the Christian God none can fathom. We have been repeatedly assured that the adoption of the policy of Secular Education in the Government schools would result in the conversion of the British nation to Atheism, and in its consequent reversion to the worst forms of barbarism. In reality, God is the creature of the theologians, made in their own image and after their own likeness, and it is they alone who produce and perpetuate the belief in him. Our only consolation is that, in spite of all their frantic efforts, the God-idea has just been dealt its deadliest blow and suffered its most terrific setback.

J. T. Lloyd.

Mother Church's Modest Request.

> In England men are full of opinions and empty of information.—Eden Phillpotts.

Dropping their role of splendid isolation, the authorities of the National Church have decided on a newspaper campaign in order to raise money, and Canon F. Partridge has kindly consented to act as treasurer. He has not the happy knack of the astute advertising staff of the Young Men's Christian Association, or of the Salvation Army, but he is quite as thoroughgoing in his zeal for the preservation of privileges, and his pious platitudes should be welcome reading to the zealous churchpeople who read the newspapers. With all the glory of Gothic capitals, he assures the public that "The Church of England is the Church of the Nation," and he asks for a very modest minimum subscription of five million pounds, so that the Church can "extend its religious activities as they require to be extended."

Five million pounds is, we are reminded, "the smallest sum which will enable the Church to bring the funds for its normal work up to an efficient figure," and one of the most important items in the programme is the matter of religious education. The Church wishes to maintain her schools—at public expense—because such schools aim "to produce good Christians, and in the effort produce good citizens." The Church further holds "that education without a definite religious basis is no education at all."

Further, the advertisements state that "the Church is understaffed. Its clergy are underpaid. There is no monetary attraction to draw men to the ministry of the Church. The War has deprived the Church of more than 2,000 clergy." The advertisements make no mention of the fact that thirty-nine ecclesiastics of the Church share £180,700 annually; the majority of them having seats in the House of Peers, and being addressed as "my lord." The clergy pretend, professionally, to be entirely uninfluenced by financial motives. Yet the vast majority of these manage to evade the blessings of poverty, and to leave large sums of money when they die. Recently, in this paper, a list of the wills of a dozen ecclesiastics was published, amounting in the aggregate to £611,154; and it is a matter of common knowledge that the vicarages are by no means the worst houses in any towns.

As for the claim that "the War has deprived the Church of more than 2,000 clergy," it must be remembered that there are about 25,000 Church of England clergymen, and that they were exempted from military service. A caste apart, when they joined the fighting forces, they did so as Army chaplains, with officers' pay and safe duties. One result of their appearance in the Army and Navy is that the soldiers and sailors are the only British subjects forced to attend religious services; a piece of petty tyranny that is more worthy of the twelfth century than the twentieth.

The circus rarely fulfils the expectations of the rainbow-hued posters on the walls, and the rosy testimonials of the value of the Church as an educationalist are discounted by the report of the Archbishop's Committee on The Teaching Office of the Church (published by the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge). This committee included two bishops, a number of clergymen, and some saintly ladies associated with religious institutions, and the report is sufficient to turn the raven hair of any Anglican clergyman snow-white, and curl it afterwards. The committee points out that "there is much truth in the charges of intellectual and social failure on the part of the clergy:—

> Freedom of research has been discouraged, the minds of the clergy have been cramped, and their authority weakened. Many people, especially among the clergy, owing to intellectual sloth and indecision, never seriously endeavour to make up their minds on disputed questions—such, for instance, as Biblical criticism. Sometimes they shut their eyes and refuse to allow that such questions exist at all.

Referring directly to the question of religious education the Committee says:—

> We have failed also to discriminate sufficiently between the Christian standards of character and conduct and those displayed in the historical books of the Old Testament. As a child's religious conceptions deepen, many of the Old Testament stories challenge his developing conscience.

The report of the Archbishop's Committee is like the skeleton at the Egyptian feast. It discounts the fears so vividly expressed in the display advertisements. Indeed, we may well begin to wonder if the dear clergy are not needlessly alarmed about Secular Education, as they are unnecessarily worried about clerical poverty.

To give an additional five millions to the National Church is simply to perpetuate a priestly despotism. Under the glamour of the Gregorian chants, wax lights, stained glass windows, antiquated liturgy, and vestments, is a tyranny none the less real because thatched by ecclesiastical stage properties. Such despotism meekly accepted by tens of thousands of nerveless Christians cannot be lightly regarded, especially when the average worshipper deems it profanity to call an ape an ape, if it but wear a clerical collar. The Established Church is no less intolerant than the Roman Catholic Church, and is as hostile to all modern impulses. A Church which includes King Charles the First among its "saints" and prays for fine and wet weather, is not entitled to the respect of liberal-minded men and women. A mere glance at the Parliamentary record of the Lords Spiritual is sufficient to carry its own condemnation. They voted against admitting Nonconformists to the Universities; against removing the civil disabilities of Jews; against abolishing compulsory Church rates; against permitting burial without Church service; against free education for the people. None voted for the abolition of flogging women in public, flogging women in prison; or flogging in the Army and Navy.

With such prelates and such a record the Church of England has no right to ask for a minimum subscription of five million pounds. It is this record of reaction, coupled with a two-thousand years' old superstition, which explains the manless congregations of this country. To give millions of money to such an institution is simply to clang massy gold gates against the hopes and aspirations of the enlightened citizens of a civilized country.

III.

LET us next examine the logical barrage which Dr. McDougall sets up to ward off hostile attacks. His first "argument" is a question-begging metaphor, to wit: That the brain and its system of nerves correspond to an electric battery and its system of wires; that the mind is the magnetic field created by the passage of neural currents through them; and that the "soul" is the ether—the medium—which makes the creation of such a field possible.

Had this simile been put forward with an honest desire to assist the reader to form a conception of how consciousness arises, one would have welcomed it with gratitude. Though I am not a metaphysician, pure or impure, who can slur over, as if it had no significance, the fact that "organization" is a prime factor and a sine-qua-non condition of the evolution of life; yet I cannot believe that mind can arise from a substance which has only physical attributes. The "raw material" or essence of mind must, therefore, be either in the substance itself or in the medium in which it is developed. So the idea of a psychic ether would be quite a helpful conception if it had not been prostituted, in the act of presenting it, to the blind gropings of barbaric ages. That Dr. McDougall's motive is not to illumine but to obscure and mystify is obvious from the fact that he calls this psychic ether the "soul," and that despite the fact of his professed dislike to using compromising terms!

In fact, the application of this term to the medium is so distorting in its effect as to rob his simile of all logical justification. One is at a loss where to look for a supposed similitude, whether to the ethereal medium or to the magnetic field. The "soul" is usually assumed to possess individuality, immortality, fixity, and initiative power. The ether has no individuality, and, so far as we know, is entirely passive, while the electric field has no immortality or fixity—it ceases to exist when the currents cease and moves as the wires move. He apologetically admits that his simile is somewhat "crude." Crude, indeed, as used by him, it is not an analogy at all, but a farcical travesty of one.

And he is apparently conscious of it all, for so soon as the simile has done its assumptive and suggestive work, he flings it to the winds and goes off at a tangent to ask question-begging queries which belie every attribute of his analogical hypothesis. And well he may, for if he consistently carried out the analogy he propounds, he would have razed his "soul" castle to the ground. For if the mind be evoked into existence, as in the case of the magnetic field, by the passage of currents through the wires disposed in it, so must it, if there be any genuine analogy at all, vanish when the currents cease. Why, in the name of all reason, should there be any resemblance at the start and none at the finish? It would be difficult to beat this as an example of unabashed mystification, and only he who is hindbound in a pre-possession could ever be guilty of it. His question-begging queries are obviously intended to divert attention away from the natural lessons of his simile and to forestall them.

Had he desired a consistent metaphor to convey the implications of the term "soul," he would have found a gramophone more to the point. He could get out of that some kind of individuality, immortality, and fixity, without distortion or desertion. Or had his object been to illustrate the Buddhistic Nirvana, the phenomenon of magnetic induction, would have been more or less apposite. But to exemplify a "soul" with it, it is probably the most unsuitable metaphor that physical science could supply him for the purpose.

He had obviously forgotten or overlooked his oracular dictum that "mental structures precede bodily structures" when he requisitioned magnetic induction as a metaphor of the "soul." The magnetic field surely does not precede the starting of the current!

But there; a metaphysician, like a triune God, is not subject to the laws of logical or arithmetical consistency. Self-contradiction will be "accounted unto him," by believing Spiritists, for profundity of thought! Even a "believer" without evidence was pronounced "blessed"; a believer against evidence must be the very embodiment of bliss.

Let us now come to his question-begging epithets, phrases, and assumptions.

He speaks of "interaction" in the most naive manner, as if that did not beg the very question in dispute.

"Interaction" should be discussed after proving the existence of the alleged "interacting" objects. To talk about the "interaction" of imaginary entities is a piece of palpable question-begging sophistry.

"Interaction" is a How problem. And a "how" problem does not arise until its two terms—cause and effect—are demonstrable and indisputable facts.

When he has proved the existence of a "soul" entity, he may then, without disingenuousness, discuss its "interaction," and not till then.

The Prayer of the Righteous.

THE fields are ripe to harvest—
The poppies, crimson, flare;
O Lord of Peace and Beauty,
Hear thou our righteous prayer.

From stately hall and palace,
Ancestral country seat,
O Lord of Death's red harvest,
We come, with praises meet.

Lo, here is peace eternal,
Marred not by hand of man;
And Beauty reigns supernal
Farther than eye can span.

This Paradise of Beauty
Is ours by lordly right;
We may not fight for Freedom,
But hear the guns at night.

Thy ways, O Lord, are wondrous,
Beyond the ways of man;
The chords of Hate's orchestra
Drown the sweet notes of Pan.

In Flanders, life's rich harvest
Falls 'neath thy sickle red;
Jesu, hear our righteous prayer
For blind, and maimed, and dead.

Acid Drops.

Inferentially the Church of England being established by law is, in the eye of the law, the only true religion. And the King is perforce a member of the Church of England. In his case the religion goes with the post. It is not selected by him, it is chosen for him. So the King went to St. Paul's to thank God for having ended the War after permitting it for four years. Then having prayed with the legally true Church, the King next goes to the other Churches—the Free Churches—and prays with them. Now, there are still Mohammedans, and Jews, and Roman Catholics, and numbers of other sects in the country, and we see no reason why he should not go and pray with the rest. One appreciates the intense religious conviction there must be behind this indiscriminate and commercial-traveller kind of piety. And if there's a God, one wonders what he thinks of the whole business. Will he be bored, or amused, or just disgusted with this saddling him with the responsibility for the four years of war?

A Thanksgiving Service was held in Paris at Notre Dame. The Archbishop of Paris, preaching, said:—

> It is to be regretted that our own Government is not represented. A few days ago the British Premier, after announcing the Victory, cried, "Let us proceed to church to give humble and reverent thanks for the great deliverance of the world from its great peril." All the members of Parliament followed him to Westminster.

We quite imagine the Archbishop's regret at the French Government not imitating the stupid mumbo-jumboism of the English Prime Minister and the Members of Parliament. But France is France, and having won the war without God there was no need to thank him at the end. But England is England, and without a display of pious humbug some of us would feel that something serious had happened to the old country.

How the clergy have entwined themselves in social life is seen in a paragraph in an Essex newspaper, which announces that a clergyman is removing to another living. It adds that he is a member of the Board of Guardians and District Council, a member of the Tribunal, and Vice-Chairman of the Food Control Committee. Quite an example of Christian humility!

Mr. G. H. Roberts, Minister of Labour, speaking on the ultimate effects of War-work, said some people thought there might be the development of a definite third sex, something neither man nor woman. On the Continent, priests have been called the third sex for generations.

The piety of the Sunday papers is peculiar. Here is a quotation from a leading article in Lloyds: "1914 took this easy-going life of ours by the scruff of the neck, and rammed its nose against the Sign-Post of The Great Cross-Ways, with a thunderous Up—or down? Heaven—or hell? Choose! and choose quickly!" Even the Christian Evidence lecturer who spoke of "the footprints of an Almighty Hand" could not beat this outburst.

Christians are enjoined that when a man steals their cloak they are to offer the offenders their coats also. It may be that Benjamin Small had read this when he stole a bishop's surplice. If so, he has had a disappointment, for a Christian magistrate has sentenced him to three months in a little room in which to meditate on the difference between Christian theory and practice.

The Rev. J. Petrie, of the Glasgow Evangelistic Council, says that, in the midst of all the problems facing the Church, that of exercising the best and strongest influence upon the youth, especially about the age of fourteen and upwards, should not escape notice. There seemed little doubt that if the Church failed to provide adequately for the well-being of the young, guided and guarded by religious influence, the State would step in to undertake the work on a purely secular basis. Is this not already being done by the Welfare of Youth Scheme, which is already in operation in many of the public works, but which is not generally run on evangelistic lines, recreation and sport being the incentive to better conduct.

The Glasgow United Free Presbytery has passed a resolution expressing thanks to Almighty God for the signal victories achieved by the forces of the Allies and for the signing of the Armistice. On what particular occasion did God give the Allies his special help during the course of the War? Was it when he sent the fogs to cover up the tracks of the Germans when they played the tip and run game on the coasts of England?

The Glasgow Presbytery thinks also the establishment of a League of Nations would safeguard the best interests of the nations and promote the extension of the kingdom of Christ. How these ministers do love to drag Christ into matters he has nothing to do with. Was it the clergy or the politicians who first thought of a League of Nations? As usual, the clergy were left behind, but no doubt they will claim the honour. The real spiritual father of Wilson's celebrated fourteen points is Thomas Paine. Jesus Christ has about as much to do with them as Nebuchadnezar.

The Bishop of Peterborough says: "All countries are now acknowledging and doing homage to the democratic ideals for which Great Britain has always stood." Coming from a clerical member of the House of Lords the remark is not without humour.

"Church and dissent," states the Rev. R. F. Horton, "to use the old phrase, have found out, each for itself, that it has failed." This is very like killing two birds with one one brick.

The news of the Armistice filled nearly everyone with gladness, but there was at least one person who felt sorry. A writer in the Parish Paper of St. Jude's-on-the-Hill, Hampstead, said:—

> To me last Sunday was—what shall I term it?—a peculiarly distressing day. I mean, to see the eagerness and the hope expressed in so many people's faces and voices at the prospect of an immediate peace. Well, it was painful. I tell you that any parley with the enemy at this moment is a crime before God, and an armistice a cruel mockery of the dead—and of the living. America fights by our side. And on the shoulder-straps of her men are three letters. Those three letters must be America's only answer to Germany as they are ours—Unconditional Surrender—Absolutely. Let Hindenburg and Ludendorff publicly surrender their swords and the Allies occupy Berlin and Vienna. If this be refused, then, by all that is holy, Fight on! Fight on!

Fight on! The slaughter of a few more thousands, the devastation of more miles of territory matters nothing. Fight on! It is much easier to rouse the beast in man than to put it to rest. And religion only aggravates its restlessness.

The Rev. Dr. Watson, Glasgow, says they would be insincere if they did not plainly say that they believed God had led them to victory. What about the generalship of Marshal Foch?

The Glasgow Corporation Libraries are now to be open on Sundays. Why not the picture-houses also?

Bernard Shaw once said that the only excuse for beating a child is that one does it in a temper. There is a Liverpool society—the Corporal Punishment League—that thinks otherwise. A circular we have received obligingly lays down regulations for the whipping and smacking of children. You are to whip the children over your knee, and in a "humbling way," so that the child "will feel shame as well as pain." You must take time in uncovering the child, "so that it may feel the disgrace the more." There should be intervals between the whippings, and a "short, broad, medium strap" may be used. Above all, "the only sure way to make your children have respect and obedience is to whip them."

The leaflet is not a humorous essay; it is written in all seriousness. The address of the Society is 121 Limekiln Lane, Liverpool, and help is solicited. Testimonials from unnamed mothers are also given. No names are given—nothing but the "Hon. Director, to whom letters are to be addressed." This same gentleman says that his views and his methods have "had the approval of clergymen of all denominations." The last is illuminating. And we feel as though we should like to convert ourselves into a Corporal Correction League for the benefit of the Director and his backers.

"Flag-day" collections appear to be a better way of "raising the wind" than reliance on prayer. At Southend-on-Sea recently a day was devoted to the "Southend Town Missionary Saturday Collection."

Truth crushed to earth will rise again. Sometimes it gets up in quite a hurry. Then Mr. Bonar Law says "Economic policy is not a religion. It is a question of common sense." The exclusion of religion from the sphere of common sense is delicious. We wonder whether he reads the Freethinker? He might do worse.

Bigotry is not dead, but only sleeping. A new Ethical Society at Blackwood, Monmouth, has been refused the use of a building in which to hold meetings. Gallant little Wales should be more progressive than Dunghill-on-the-Snazle.

The following news item should flatter the clerical dovecotes: "Taken ill in his room at the Law Courts, Captain Crawford, an elder Brother of the Trinity, died shortly afterwards."

The Salvation Army is concerned with many things besides salvation. Commissioner D. C. Lamb, head of the Emigration Department of the Salvation Army, has just returned from a visit to the United States and Canada, and will report on emigration schemes for women and ex-service men.

Speaking at Westminster Chapel on the subject of Temperance, the Rev. Dr. J. H. Jowett said: "I pray the Church will come to have fire and flame enough to burn it to death." Will the Church commence with the "communion port"?

The retiring Lord Mayor, speaking at the Mansion House, said he was in favour of stricter Sunday observance. Isn't the City dull enough on Sunday?

Now is the Time.

THE War has given the Churches one of the greatest shocks they have ever received. Thousands have, in consequence, definitely left it for ever, and other thousands are in the act of breaking away. The Churches are lamenting their plight, and not without reason.

But their adversity is our opportunity. Of the many thousands who have broken with Christianity, we have captured a number, but these represent but a small percentage of the whole. And we want them all, every one; male and female demand we them.

And this is where every one of our readers can help. Every one of them knows someone who is a likely subscriber to the Freethinker. See that he, or she, gets a copy without delay. Or send along the address, and we will see to it. It is really not difficult to secure new readers, and most of them will rise up and call you "blessed."

We are in for a season of mental readjustment. Old beliefs are in the melting-pot, and people's minds will be more than usually receptive to new ideas. Now is the time for us to strike; we shall not have so favourable an opportunity for a long time, and we must make the most of it.

We want those new readers, and we want them at once. We are getting them all the time; but our appetite grows constantly. And every fresh reader means a new helper in the cause of human progress.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

November 24, Leeds; November 30, Maesteg; December 1, Ferndale; December 2, Llwynypia; December 8, Leicester; December 15, Nuneaton; December 22, Glasgow.

To Correspondents.

J. T. Lloyd's Lecture Engagements.—December 1, Swansea; December 8, Garw.

L. J. Lee.—We are sending parcel of literature. Pleased to learn that the Freethinker is so eagerly read in your camp. Thanks for your promised help in the future.

R. Lee Bliss.—A capital letter, but we don't suppose it will have much effect on the Canon. The only way to stop him is to cut off his supplies by educating the people.

W. Barlow.—It is the spirit that counts, and you have nothing to reproach yourself with on that head.

E. B. Side.—We value congratulations from you and yours.

A. B. Hardy.—There are some points in your letter than can only be decided by yourself. But so long as teachers are compelled to give religious instruction the plan you adopt appears to us the best in the circumstances. The injustice is done, both to teacher and child, by having religion in the schools at all. Anyway, we are very pleased to see you are doing what you can towards popularizing the cause of secular education, and wish that all teachers had the same courage We hope to visit Edinburgh one day, and to have the pleasure of meeting you.

H. Bull.—Improvements in our meetings, such as you suggest, are mainly questions of organization and growth in numbers. Something in the line you desire may develop as the first grows and the membership becomes more numerous.

J. F. Cordon writes that it was only on changing his newsagent that he overcame the delay in getting the Freethinker delivered, and advises others to adopt the same plan where the paper is not regularly delivered. We hope that our readers will bring some pressure to bear. The Freethinker is published at a regular time, and delays in delivery are in no way connected with the office.

H. O. Boger.—It is rather difficult to say how much of the profession of faith in the Bible, or the Church, or miracles, by men like Galileo, was due to caution in offending the Church. One must bear in mind the convenient distinction that a thing might be true according to theology and false according to science.

F. W. Walsh.—Shall appear next week.

W. J.—We cannot undertake to answer a questioner until he is satisfied with the answer. That is a quite hopeless proposition.

W. (Glasgow).—See this week's "Views and Opinions." We may deal with the subject next week.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible."

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (Nov. 24) Mr. Cohen lectures in the Leeds Town Hall. The hall is a very large one, but the local Freethinkers seem determined to fill it, and we hope they will be successful. Admission is by silver collection, but there are reserved seats at 1s. and 2s. 6d. There will be two meetings, at 3 and 7 o'clock, and arrangements are being made to accommodate with tea those visitors who come from a distance. Those who wish to join in the tea should write Mr. A. Radley, 9 Grosvenor View, Blackman Lane, Leeds.

Next week Mr. Cohen visits South Wales. He is to lecture in the Town Hall, Maesteg, on November 31, at Ferndale on December 1, and Llwynypia on December 2.

We summarise elsewhere the proceedings of the Special Conference held at Birmingham on Sunday last. It says something for the revival of interest in the work of the N.S.S. that so many delegates travelled—under existing hotel and railway conditions—from so far North as Glasgow and West as S. Wales, to be present. The interest is there, and it must be made the most of; and there seems a common resolve to do this. The arrangements made for the Conference by the Birmingham Branch were excellent, and it added to the indebtedness of the Conference to find a tea provided at the expense of the Branch. In these days, the act showed a thoughtfulness that was greatly appreciated by all present.

The tract on "Compulsory Church-going in the Army and Navy," issued by the R.P.A., is now ready, and can be had on application to 17 Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C. Copies will be sent post free, and it is hoped that use will be made of the tract during the Election.

The Manchester Branch is holding its first Social at the Small Hall, Downing Street, on Saturday, November 30, at 6.30. Whist drive, music, and dancing. Tickets 2s. each, including refreshments. Members' friends welcome. Will intending patrons please drop a p.c. to the Secretary, 446 Gt. Cheetham Street, E., Hr. Broughton?

Mrs. Seaton Tiedeman, who is the Secretary of the Divorce Law Union, and a prospective Parliamentary Candidate, will open a discussion at the St. Pancras Reform Club under the auspices of the North London Branch of the N.S.S. on "Marriage and the Church." The subject in this lady's hands is certain to be dealt with in an able manner, and we hope North London Freethinkers, particularly ladies, will see that the meeting-place is crowded. The discussion commences at 7.30.

We are asked to announce that Mr. E. C. Saphin lectures to-day (Nov. 24), at the Waverley Hall, St. Mary's Street, Southampton. His subject in the morning is "The Sun, or Genesis and Jesus"; evening, "Christian Ritual and Art Explained." We trust that Southampton Freethinkers will do their best to make the meetings a complete success.

We are sorry to see that our admirable contemporary, the New York Truthseeker, has been getting into trouble with the Censor. Under the special law of May, 1918, no less than three issues of the paper have been witheld from dispatch through the post. This is a serious matter to a paper which depends largely upon the post for its circulation. The action has been taken on the ground that the paper was prejudicial to the conduct of the War. As the Truthseeker has been avowedly and fervently pro-War right through, and has supported all important Government measures, we think with editor Macdonald that religious influences are simply utilizing the War as an occasion for injuring a Freethought journal. We can rely upon our American brethren putting up a good fight in defence of their paper, and now that the War is over, the bigots will have to find some other mode of attack. It is useless expecting them to use honourable methods while dishonourable ones are available.

We are asked to announce that our contributor "Keridon" will be lecturing at Salford, Manchester, on November 27. Subject: "Why Faiths Die Hard." We are unable to give fuller particulars as none are to hand.

The Repertory Theatre, Birmingham, is occupied this evening (November 24) by Mr. Clifford Williams, who will lecture on "The Madmen of the Gods." Freethinkers should make it a point of bringing along a Christian friend or two. The meeting commences at 7 o'clock.

Owing to various circumstances, we are withholding until next week acknowledgments of contributions to our Sustentation Fund. Intending members will please note that this Fund closes on December 17.

The N.S.S. Special Conference.

THE Special Conference of the N.S.S. ordered to receive and consider the report of the Special Committee appointed to draw up a constitution for the Society met at Birmingham on Sunday last. There was a good attendance, the Society's Branches being well represented in addition to individual members. This, in spite of the difficulties and inconveniences attending travelling at this period.

With one or two minor alterations the report was adopted by the Conference. There is no need to print here the full constitution, much of which of necessity follows the usual lines. Moreover, these rules will be printed and available. The important alterations are: (1) All officials will, in future, be elected by the Annual Conference. The source of authority thus becomes in fact, as well as in theory, the whole body of members; (2) The country is mapped out in geographical areas, each area nominating either one or two members for the Executive, whose election will lie in the hands of the Conference. A Treasurer will be appointed, and the accounts will in future be audited by a certified accountant. The constitution also provides for the appointment of a press representative, and general and local organizers.

It is hoped that by grouping the country into areas closer co-operation between the Branches in each area will follow, and thus result in more sustained and effective work.

The Executive will in future (after the Whitsuntide Conference) consist of not more than fourteen members, with President, Treasurer, and Secretary. I think everyone will agree this is quite large enough for real business.

I feel sure that the constitution as drawn up provides the basis for a healthy and progressive organization, and that all well-wishers will do their best to make it a complete success.

CHAPMAN COHEN, President, N.S.S.

Religion and Life.

SIR,—I am sorry that the slowness of our War postal service made my last letter late as it must have given you some extra work. Your article, however, contains an indictment of Christianity too common to pass over, though I cannot, at present, give to it more than a brief notice.

You speak of defending Christianity by pointing out that Christians are not worse than other people, though they sometimes talk as if they were. In other words, you assume, as very many critics do, and as you began this discussion by doing, that the one grand test of a religion is the character of its votaries. But on what is this assumption based? You will observe there are two ways of dealing with your contention. One would be by arguing that Christianity has produced a special and noble kind of virtue which cannot be ascribed to any other influence. I have avoided this plea so far, because to defend it adequately would be a very lengthy business. But I cannot help referring you to a booklet by the Rev. J. K. Mozley, called The Achievements of Christianity, which can be bought for 1s. 6d. from most booksellers (S.P.C.K. The Haymarket). I appeal to the fair-mindedness of yourself and your readers not to neglect this temperate, well-written essay. We are, all of us, I hope, in quest of truth, and here is a statement in its defence too weighty to be ignored.

The other way, which I propose to adopt, is to consider the relevance of the test of character. I must remind you that I have twice invited you to answer my rejoinder, viz., that you employ this particular test for Christianity or Theism without scruple or hesitation, though you do not employ it for such a creed as Patriotism. Perhaps I have not made my argument clear. You may object that Patriotism is not a fair parallel because it only professes to produce patriots, not virtuous men; but Christianity, if it does not produce virtuous men, produces nothing. Now, granting this for the moment, I repeat that you single out religion for a test which ought consistently to be applied to Patriotism, and that the latter is an exact parallel to the former for the purposes of this argument. For consider: we reckon Patriotism a good thing. Then, supposing a vast number of patriots behave abominably, we still reckon Patriotism as good though we detest these particular patriots. Would you not call the sixty millions of Germans patriots? Would you not admit that many of them in the name and in the sincere service of Patriotism have behaved infernally, and brought their country to ruin? Certainly you would. That is to say, you discriminate justly between the wrong-headed and the right-minded votaries of Patriotism, and no matter how numerous the former may be your belief in Patriotism is just where it was before. As a principle it is sound, and its soundness is not undermined by the hideous things done in its name. I call that good sense, but why do you draw exactly the opposite inference in the case of religion?

At the same time, I am not disposed to press for an answer, because this is only an interesting bit of logomachy, not really so near the centre of the subject as we were last week. In other words, it is not a necessary tenet of Atheists that Christianity has failed to produce virtue, though a great many may think so. But, as I hope to show later, my plea is not part of the defence of religion on which I rely. It is a challenge of your intellectual consistency on a side issue, and I am anxious to get back to my main business which is to show what the Christian Gospel is, only remarking that the Founder of our religion evidently thought that His doctrine rested on other foundations than the character results on His professed followers, for he prophesied that there would be a great deal of sham Christianity. Thus the decay of Christian faith is not a proof of the falseness of His teaching but rather the reverse. It should be noted also that no other founder of any religion, or even religious sect, has ever begun by telling his followers that much of the support which was going to be given to the movement would prove to be hollow and insincere.

In your last issue you raise another point where a correction is needed. You justly remark, in reference to my argument about introducing one person to another, that the belief in A of the personal existence of B is no proof of that existence being a fact. The belief may be an hallucination. Certainly. But I used the illustration for a different object. It was to explain why I did not accept your invitation to state what I meant by God: not at all as a reason why you should admit the existence of God. My plea was that any such statement, even in the case of human personalities whose existence no one doubts, would be a waste of time.

Now for a different part of our vast subjects. I cannot state what I mean by God, but I can point out what the belief in Him, purified by the teaching and work of Christ, has done for mankind.

It produced a new virtue, in that perhaps the most loveable of all. We call it Humility. What I have to say on this point is supplementary to Mr. Mozley's book, and is an answer after all to your first challenge.

What is Humility? It is a quality, the absence of which causes any character, no matter how gifted, or how useful it may be, to be instinctively disliked by all of us in our sanest moments. Where it is present it disarms opposition, exercises a powerful influence for good, and enables A to take the mote out of B's eye without hurting him, because it ensures that there is no beam in his own. It is, in short, a supremely attractive quality. But it was so rare before the time of Christ that there was no word for it in Greek, and no evidence that the quality was exhibited clearly enough to be recognized by anyone. Take, for instance, Aristotle's well-known sketch of his ideal man, whom he calls the Man of Great Soul: it is powerfully drawn, and not ill-equipped with graces, but wholly lacking in Humility. Yet we find St. Paul, directly after Christ's work was finished, steeped in the thought of Humility, exhibiting it most beautifully in his own character, and urging on his followers to strive unceasingly after it: though he was obliged to employ a word which had the sense of "mean-mindedness." But the thing denoted was so winning and loveable, and so new, that it triumphed over the disability of this inauspicious start, and won its way to general recognition.

Now, what are we to make of this? I can imagine that some would minimize the phenomenon and dispose of it by airy denials: pointing to the number of people who are free from conceit but are not professing Christians; refusing to regard St. Paul or St. Ignotius as more humble than Socrates. Or, again, there might be the usual quasi-scientific explanation, assimilating the extraordinary to the ordinary, as if some rather obscure cause like suggestion or telepathy had been at work. What is the Christian explanation, and how far does it fit the facts?

We say that no amount of subsequent failure can alter the fact that at the time of the infant Church a new ideal of character came before men's minds: and that some astonishingly potent spiritual influence was at work not only presenting the ideal, but enabling man, in spite of his propensity or haughty self-assertion, to approximate to it in several instances and achieve it in a few: and that this triumph over human arrogance has been won not by coercion but by persuasion. How?

Simply because the conviction that God humbled Himself from infinite glory to the lowest abasement to save us, as soon as it becomes living in the mind, makes conceit impossible. We bow before the manifestation of limitless Love and Power, and are fain to renounce all self-congratulation, when we realize that by the gift of a higher life we are given the power to rise above ourselves, yet remaining morally free.

Observe that the whole power of the appeal depends on the belief that He who died on the cross was divine: the Creator of this world. If He is regarded as not more than a supremely good man no explanation of the facts is possible: for if Jesus was only a good man, he was not an example of humility but of colossal arrogance. Only the full Christian doctrine could have worked any such result. Moreover, to deny this claim is to fly in the face of the only evidence in the matter which is worth anything; namely, the testimony of the "holy and humble men of heart." That testimony is invariable. Whatever conquest over pride they have secured they one and all refer to Christ, and what right have we to say they are wrong?

E. Lyttelton.

There are states of moral death no less amazing than physical resurrection; and a church which permits its clergy to preach what they have ceased to believe, and its people to trust what they refuse to obey, is perhaps more truly miraculous in impotence, than it would be miraculous in power, if it could move the fatal rocks of California to the pole, and plant the sycamore and the vine between the ridges of the sea.—Ruskin.

Sir,—Mr. J. Fothergill's letter which appeared in the Freethinker (June 16) was very welcome, and gave me great hopes for the future. If he came to Aussie-Land, I would be very glad to see him, indeed, and I trust that he would be able to fulfil all his highest desires. What a wonderful man he must be! He is as delightful as Charles Lamb, as impressive as Carlyle, and as pessimistic as Schopenhauer, with, I may add, a good deal of his brilliant lucidity.

I have been giggling in a quiet way ever since I tried to explain the mystery of the universe, and when I wrote my short article on "What is Nature," I also tried to explain that the more you know, the more you find you don't know; or, as Herbert Spencer puts it: "The explanation of that which is explicable but brings into greater clearness the inexplicableness of that which remains behind."

But let us "get back to Nature"—an expression I have often heard people use, and I wanted to know what it meant. The answer isn't so easy as you might think. However, I ran a string of talk through it, and when you come to think a thing like this out, you soon get bushed, for you find it's a good deal of a tangle, but we ought to try and think it out, for the conduct of life hangs to it. I used to think I knew a lot, and by reading and studying hard, I would find out a lot more. But when I first discovered my vast ignorance, I sat me down and wept. I had no idea I was so ignorant. I wanted to know what all this muddle of things meant. But now I laugh, laugh, laugh consumedly, for I have discovered the jest of life. It is a wonderful jest, indeed, and I don't worry any more, either about my ignorance, or anything else. In Mr. Fothergill's words, I am "indeed a puzzle—a 'Riddle of the Universe,' in fact." I admit this. We talk about Nature as if we knew what "nature" meant. But do we? I made the "unmitigated staggerer" that "Nature's Laws are phrases with contents that differ according to the intellectual status of the people who use them," and, I added, "there is no law." But what is law? Is law anything, really, except what always happens? You will need to think that out. Nature to an educated man means the observed order of things. But there is no "law!" All we can understand is that Nature is at work, and the man who talks about the laws of Nature as a pivot upon which to hang his whole philosophy is simply groping round in a metaphysical fog of his own devising.

I would like to discuss mind as a function of the brain, but I had better leave that for the present. Any form of thought apart from the brain is more than I can understand. But it may be owing to some weakness in my brain centres; you never can tell. The scientist tells me that the paper upon which I write is a mass of dancing electrons. Well, it does not look like it. Experience seems all against it; but I can only believe on the principle of coherence of experience, and this philosophy is strong enough to make me doubt all the seeming evidence of my senses. "Are things what they seem, or are visions about?" When one looks around and critically examines his position in the world, he finds, firstly, that it is impossible to prove the very existence even of himself; and, therefore, that it is impossible for him to verify any evidence of external objects that may come to him. Let my friendly critic look into his mind rigidly and critically; he will find nothing but a series of recollections and presentations. As for anything he can label "J. F——" as such, anything of his own, and quite distinct from other men or other objects, he will look in vain for it. He will find that his every action is dependent upon some cause preceding it. If, therefore, "J. F——" can find no honest proof of his own existence, how can he be presumed to postulate Nature's laws, which only means that the same effects follow the same causes all the time?

The fact is that we appear to be in the grip of immeasurable and incomprehensible forces which we call Gravitation, Heat, Light, or more generally Energy, and that these forces go on their way with a supreme disregard of our convenience. If we oppose our little bodies to them, they silently destroy us. They have brought us into existence; they help us to live a moment; we grow old; they slay us, and we perish. Our own observation of a single day's newspaper shows the gruesomeness of it all, and that the unseen powers, so far as we can tell, appear to take no notice of us. A millionaire crushes thousands of people, robs millions, and accumulates every pleasure and comfort that this world can offer. An innocent little child wanders near a savage mastiff, and is horribly destroyed. What justice is there in it all?

The fact is that all thinking men sooner or later return to the despairing words of wise old David Hume. The whole thing is "a riddle, an enigma, an inexplicable mystery"; and if we open our eyes candidly to the truth, we shall see that Hume was right, for no one can thoroughly understand the miracle of life—the romance of existence.

Yes, Nature is kind, but she (or it) is also horribly cruel:—

> It spreadeth forth for flight the eagle's wings
> What time she beareth home her prey; it sends
> The she-wolf to her cubs; for unloved things
> It findeth food and friends.
>
> It is not marred nor stayed in any use,
> All liketh it; the sweet white-milk it brings
> To mother's breasts; it brings the white drops too
> Wherewith the young make stings.

Sydney, N.S.W. THE OWL.

God's Church.

"OH! there's the old lady going to church; or, I should say, chapel."

There was no reply.

"She's eighty years of age."

"Well! I suppose I shall be thinking of going to church when I am eighty."

"Yes, I expect so."

"But to-day I am going to the best church God made; the one with the blue sky over it instead of the vaulted roof."

An hour or so later the male speaker got out of a train at a little station, and walked into the road. It was just an ordinary road, with a few more or less tumble-down cottages on either side, and here and there, further on, a new villa or so. Still, the few people and the cottages were rural and pleasing, although the sky was dull, and not at all blue.

Down the road, over a little bridge, and along the side of a golf-course, thoughts of human company still spoiled the air. Cyclists passed, leaving dust and movement behind them. The walker hurried on, and tried to forget the road. Still, links and wayfarers were troublesome, and even two sparrows on the top of a gate, pecking craftily, did not rouse him. A crossway made more traffic and movement again. Energy was needed to decide which road to take, but one chosen haphazard led to a promise of quiet, bringing him at last to a footpath. No cyclists and golfers there! He passed a farmhouse with a gate bearing a warning to beware of the dog, which barked harshly, and through a field in which some full-blooded horses were galloping here and there. Then through another very large field with a sort of banked path. Not a soul or animal in sight! He breathed deep the soft, damp air. The sun tried to shine out for an instant, but failed. Grey clouds made the grass seem more green, and little pools from the heavy rain reflected the attempted glitter of the sunbeams and the greyness of the clouds.

At the other end of the field a railway embankment crossed it. Gates had to be climbed and men again to be met, but gratefully a still larger expanse of meadow spread away with the path through it. A humpy meadow! Water shone in the hollows and where the bank was broken, mud and slime lay thick. All things end, and tall hedge-row trees in the distance gave warning of a road. In the next field, too, were people. They were doing; only a short half-hour's respite!

Road again! Houses and human beings! Shrill voices of children! A crowd of cyclists, dusty, but happy! Gregarious these, and loving to recreate in crowds. Again an effort to choose a way, but soon a lonely path was reached again. A clump of elms, a stile, a narrow field! Another stile, a finger post! Decision! The clouds fly low, smoke-coloured and threatening. A thrush sings in one of the trees, which all are singing their own lay in the cool strong breeze.

Half-way over the next field a surprise is. Men have been doing, and are going to be doing here. A line of labelled pegs mark out some avenue in a new "estate." Estate forsooth, and it means the destruction of these tall hedges of hawthorn, and that great elm at least. Why must you be building ugly streets of uniform houses and gravel roads where once there were fields, my brothers? Is improvement so necessary?

Paths lead everywhere from these fields and one which leads to a church and house is chosen. Food is necessary, though the grey down of the clouds is floating by. Food is near a church, if it is not the universal church of God, and after food is the promise of a glorious afternoon. Away, then, to the church and consequent houses and "pub." Food and rest! The sun shines out on the whitey-yellow road. The passers look more cheerful.

More miles across fields, through muddy by-paths, where a primrose or two were found. Hedges in deep green! Sky blue, flecked with dark and light cloud! Road at last again! Cyclist, movement, and dust! A railway station with another incipient new estate. At last that feeling of fatigue so joyous that even human society is not disagreeable. A seat on a stile! A question of a passing rustic, genial beneath his tan and the touch of earth about him! Two more miles "across the field what I've just come thro', keeping to the right."

A melancholy railway station. Drab journey, and entry into home where everyone is "just going out." Thankful solitude again, and more food. Time for thought of the great religious service through which he has passed this day, and the weary footman sinks back into an easy chair, satisfied.

EXPERIENCE AS AN ARGUMENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—In these days when metaphysical research is occupying so big a place in the Western hemisphere it is curious to find Mr. J. T. Lloyd placing it on a level with "dogmatism." This attitude, to a reader of not very long standing, seems symbolical to the weakness of the "Freethinkers" position.

It cannot be denied that, even in the present age of scientific progress, there are certain facts that can only be investigated metaphysically. Is it not something more than a possibility that at the root of all religion lies a dim perception of those infinite things that we to-day are unable to comprehend, and cannot conceive of as being ultimately comprehensible.

It is impossible for us to conceive of space and time as finite, and yet the Infinite is necessarily beyond our knowledge. To this same sphere—that of the conceivable but incomprehensible—appear to belong love, life, truth, goodness. We do not and cannot know these in the absolute. That they are real forces is evident, and that they have actuated men of all times to pursue courses that have not demonstrably added to the sum-total of human happiness, and yet have, amid great physical torture, brought a sense of exhilaration to the sufferer, is admitted.

The great mistake of the rank and file to-day, as formerly, is the attempt to define the Infinite through a confusion of "consciousness" with "personality" and a belief in the permanence of the former (as little scientifically grounded, but as well metaphysically as the belief in infinite space) we have the origin of the belief in a personal God. This mistake has not been committed by the great teachers—Christ, Buddha, Confucius, etc. Insofar as they give us any definition at all, they are in such terms as love, truth, good—themselves indefinable.

Certain it is that for the thinker of to-day who flies to religion for a solution of such problems as the reason for the persistance of absolute memory in the subconscious mind, and the utility of a lifetime experiences if the ego on death ceases to be, you have nothing to offer.

Whilst the value of your attempt to shatter the fetters religion has placed on the average mind is apparent, it seems a pity that the Freethinker should be as dogmatic on matters outside the scope of mere rationality as are the religions it condemns.

"The True Believer."

He breathes the air as other people do,
Likewise he sleeps and dreams the happy dream;
Yet, somehow, it is hard to catch a gleam
Of reason why he's not like me or you.

He walks and eats; he reads the papers, too;
In outward parts he seems like other men,
And yet there's something funny, now and then,
Some oddity that's ever peeping through.

What is this queer peculiarity?
Some explanation, surely, can be found;
In organ, limb, he's absolutely sound:
I wonder,—is it his mentality?

Alas! it is. It is, alas! too true:
He "looks to Jesus"—not like me or you.

Christianity and Human Nature.

In the Freethinker for November 3 I wrote a defence of Christians against the statements of their religious friends. The defence was intended to be ironical, but some of my readers failed to detect the irony, for which I am quite ready to take full responsibility. I evidently failed to make myself clear, and that is, or ought to be, the unpardonable sin with a writer. But there was a serious purpose beneath the, perhaps I had better say, intended, irony of my writing. I wished to arouse in Christian minds a recognition of the truth that a great deal of the pulpit talk about religion and character is an impertinence and an insult. I quite fail to see anything but an insult in the saying that neither family, nor friends, nor country, nor humanity at large can rouse to the highest and nerve to the noblest without there is added the belief in God and Devil, in heaven and hell. I said, and I believe, that the Christian no more needs these extra incentives than does the Freethinker. And I put in a plea for the sanity and health of human nature, apart from all supernatural incentives of beliefs and for a fundamental unity of impulse and motive.

Creed and Conduct.

Therefore, I must confess to a little surprise on Dr. Lyttelton saying in last week's Freethinker that I "assume.....the one grand test of a religion is the character of its votaries." I neither assume nor believe anything of the kind. And I think I can defy Dr. Lyttelton to find in anything I have ever written ground for such an inference. In reply to the statements of Christians concerning the beneficial influence of Christianity on character, I have pointed out how certain deplorable actions have resulted from Christian belief, and that reply seems to me quite justifiable. But I have protested over and over again that, even though every Christian were a monument of virtue, it would not prove the truth of Christian doctrines or the sanity of Christian beliefs. There is no common denominator between good conduct and belief in the divinity of Jesus, the existence of God, or heaven or hell. Feeding the hungry and clothing the naked may be good work, but it will not prove the resurrection of Jesus; nor can you prove the existence of God by distributing coals and blankets. My case is that human goodness, in all its forms and in all its degrees of development, is independent of religion. My proof is that it exists in all its forms and in all degrees of development apart from religion. And my further statement is that, instead of religious belief leading to moral development, it is moral development that humanizes and modifies religious belief. Finally, I do not test religion by its influence on character. I only cite illustrative disproof of the statement that its influence is universally beneficial. My main charge against religion is that its doctrines are either demonstrably untrue or completely unverifiable.

A Question of Relevancy.

Dr. Lyttelton reminds us that to deny the claim that Christianity did work an astounding change in human character is to "fly in the face of the only evidence in the matter which is worth anything, namely, the testimony of 'holy and humble men.'" These "all refer to Christ, and what right have we to say they are wrong?" Now this raises a direct issue, and on it I have to remark simply that by itself the evidence is quite valueless. And here I must refer Dr. Lyttelton to my article of November 17, which I think is vital to the issue, and to which no answer has been returned. If human testimony possesses the quality of infallibility ascribed to it by Dr. Lyttelton how are we to discriminate the true from the false? And if the cloud of witnesses is trustworthy in this one case why not in others? Surely, unless we do question testimony, even when given by honest witnesses, we shall end by coming very near the ridiculous. All that Dr. Lyttelton's case proves is that a number of people ascribe a certain change of temper or mental attitude to Christ. That is too plain to admit of denial. It is equally true that other people quite as honest ascribe their recovery from certain diseases to "cures" that can be shown to be quite useless. What I have asked Dr. Lyttelton for is evidence that his witnesses were correct in their diagnosis of the causes of their own mental states. What he does is to repeat the diagnosis and to tell me that it was made by good men. It is not the honesty of the witnesses, but the relevancy of the evidence that is challenged. To deny the existence of the kind of testimony cited would be stupid. Every Salvation Army or revival meeting will supply instances. But it is surely futile to deny the possibility of error or the need for verification.

Is Humility Christian?

Here I am pulled up by the remark that faith in Christ "produced a new virtue"—Humility. Now that, I admit, if correct, is a remarkable, nay, a unique achievement. To give to an existing quality a greater or lesser value is not unusual; but to produce a new virtue is something unprecedented and unmatched. But as Dr. Lyttelton goes on to say the quality was so "rare before the time of Christ, that there was no word for it in Greek," perhaps, after all, what was intended was that Christianity, emphasizing the importance of humility, gave it a new value in the scale of human qualities.

Digitized by Google

But is even this quite accurate? Dr. Lyttelton gives only a negative description of what he means by humility, and all I gather is that it implies an absence of arrogance and conceit, and the presence of gentleness. And here, surely, Dr. Lyttelton has overlooked the Buddha and his teaching. He does cite Aristotle, but omits Epictetus, whose description of a good man was one who is quiet concerning himself, despises praise, cares nothing for censure so long as his own conscience upholds him, and that he should neither blame nor accuse, is as fine as anything ever preached by a Christian. So also is Marcus Aurelius overlooked with his "Shall anyone hate me, let him look to it; but I will be gentle and benevolent towards every man, and ready to show even him his mistake." The Dhamanapada describes the good man as one who is tolerant with the intolerant, mild with the violent, and free from greed among the greedy. Says Lao-Tsze, "I have three precious things which I hold fast and prize—compassion, economy, and humility." In the Book of the Dead the soul of the Egyptian cries, "I am not swollen with pride." "Avoid pride and arrogance," says Cicero. In the Talmud we have, "He who humiliates himself will be lifted up." Indeed, even amongst people such as the Fijians, the Tonga Islanders, and other primitive peoples, humility often has its place.

Preaching and Practice.

As a teaching, then, humility, in the better sense of the phrase, is not peculiar to Christianity. What of its practice? Was that more pronounced among Christians than among others? Why, in this respect, Buddhism and Confucianism leaves Christianity hopelessly in the rear. Dr. Lyttelton instances St. Paul. But Paul's character after his conversion, was exactly the same that it was before. The same zeal, the same qualities that made him an ardent persecutor made him a zealous propagandist. And when we are told that the winning quality of the Christian graces captured the world I am driven to ask, Where? There is not, so far as I know, a shred of evidence that the world was impressed by the mildness, the humility, or the wisdom of Christians. It was impressed by their fanaticism, their hatreds, and their quarrelsomeness. Look at the Christian nations since? Let anyone take a map of the world and mark the places "owned" by Christian England. Have these been "acquired" by humility? Is it, as Jesus said, a fulfilment of the Biblical "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth"? Even beneath the professed humility of pope and priest and monk, is it very difficult to discern the most overbearing arrogance? Who but the Christian nations have covered the seas with battleships and the lands with armies? Whose example but theirs forced Japan into militaristic development, and is forcing China along the same road; and who but they have just concluded a war that has meant over twenty millions of killed and wounded? As a mere teaching, that of humility is not peculiar to Christianity. And one must surely close one's eyes to the records of the Christian peoples in all parts of the world before one can credit them with pre-eminence in the practice of a quality that was taught and practised before anything of Christianity was heard of.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

We are not endeavouring to chain the future, but to free the present. We are not forging fetters for our children, but we are breaking those our fathers made for us. We are the advocates of inquiry, of investigation, and thought. This of itself is an admission that we are not perfectly satisfied with all our conclusions—philosophy has not the egotism of faith. While superstition builds walls and creates obstructions, science opens all the highways of thought.—Ingersoll.

"Who Giveth Us the Victory?"

Now that God's children are no longer slaughtering one another in the name of their common Father there is universal rejoicing. United thanksgiving services are being held in all parts of the country. Free Church ministers are invited to preach in Anglican Church pulpits, and a few Episcopal clergymen have had the courage to represent the God of love in Dissenting Chapels. A new era of ecclesiastical confraternity is confidently predicted as one of the most beneficial results of the War. Preaching in the Central Hall, Manchester, Dr. Clifford informed his hearers that "God was really ruling the world," and that peace had come as the direct result of negotiating with the Almighty rather than with the Germans. "The State was as Divine as the Church," he maintained, "and he did not recognize any great leader as having been specifically designated by God until the advent of President Wilson." Dr. Jowett, speaking at the Free Church Thanksgiving Service at the Albert Hall, said that they were gathered there "to consecrate a great victory by thankfully acknowledging that the springs of that victory are to be found in the power and favour of Almighty God." It is our duty, according to him, "to hallow the remembrance of a mighty conflict by vitally relating it to a Providence which has enlightened our counsels and blessed our arms." Dr. Fort Newton devoted a whole sermon to showing that "it is not a secular but a spiritual victory, won not by human but by Divine might." These preachers are not appalled in the least by the fact that Almighty God has permitted British casualties to reach the grand total of over three millions. Dr. Newton does, indeed, admit that our hearts, while overflowing with wonder and joy, are "touched to wistfulness at thought of what it has cost in sacrifice of our best"; but the keynote of his discourse is gratitude to heaven for so glorious a triumph of right over might. He says:—

> The Lord reigns, and those who defied him are fallen. Thus much is manifest, if we have eyes to see and the inner clarity to divine the meaning of the hour. It is in this assurance, and with this insight, that we must face the crises of the future.

That extract alone proves Dr. Newton's unfitness for leadership. To characterize those who disagree with him as blind and inwardly dull is to betray the essential weakness of his case. We boldly assert that God's reign is either non-existent or a colossal farce; and we have as good a right to hold this opinion, to say the least, as the reverend gentleman has to hold his. During the last four years many who were zealous believers formerly have become deeply convinced Atheists. Very charitably Dr. Newton declares that such people have lost their way, but we are equally certain that they have found their way to an intelligent and intelligible interpretation of the world and its affairs. To them the War was no mystery, and the Germans have lost because, in the end, they were outnumbered and out-manœuvered by their enemies. It is perfectly true that the hour has brought many pressing issues, and that by far the most vital is "the inner contest which is to decide whether the ultimate outcome of all our struggle shall be a victory for faith or for unbelief." Already for many thousands in this country the outcome has been a distinct victory for Rationalism.

Let us examine a few of Dr. Fort Newton's propositions, as published in the Christian Commonwealth for November 20. The first is thus expressed: "Never in the long story of mankind has there been so august, so awful, a demonstration of the moral purpose of God in history." The reverend gentleman pretends not to be quite sure whether there are unbelievers or not, but is absolutely sure, if there are, that they, as well as men of all faiths, "must have felt amidst the rush at the end the peace that comes of knowing, as Carlyle would say, that 'the great Soul of the World is just.' If the mills of God grind slowly, they grind exceeding fine, leaving dust and ashes where iniquity sat enthroned." Here again the reverend gentleman is completely at sea. Men of no faith recognize no great Soul of the World, just or unjust, no Divine purpose running through all history, no "one far-off Divine event, to which the whole creation moves." The only purpose in the world is man's, and whether this is good or bad depends upon those who cherish it. Dr. Newton represents God as employing one set of his children to inflict punishment upon another set. Germans are God's offspring quite as much as the British and their Allies; and yet in the great War the latter suffered almost as severely as the former, while for nearly four years the Father of all seemed to favour those who are now said to have defied him. A million and a half of Germans met their death on the battlefield; but is not the reverend gentleman aware that seven hundred thousand Britons lost their lives by the sword, and that their Allies lost of their best on a similar scale? If God's object was to overthrow Pan-Germanism, or Prussian militarism, why did he for so long a period appear to uphold it? If he sits as king for ever, there is no escape from the conclusion, as regards human life, that, in the words of Omar Khayyam:—

'Tis all a chequer board of Nights and Days,
Where Destiny with Men for Pieces plays:
Hither and thither moves, and mates, and slays,
And one by one back in the closet lays.

It is easy for a preacher to affirm that God rules the world now that we have won the War; but what would he have said had the Germans been victorious, as only a few months ago there was every chance of their becoming? What about the victories won by Frederick the Great, who, in his way, was no less selfishly ambitious than William II., who has so ignominiously fallen? What about God's purpose in the Franco-Prussian War of 1870? Was the moral law triumphant in the result of that conflict?

Dr. Fort Newton declares further that the Divine purpose in history is social. He says that "if we had doubted this before we cannot doubt it to-day." The reasoning in support of this statement is puerile in the extreme. Bear in mind that the God whose moral purpose has been so overwhelmingly demonstrated by the War is said to be love, and the contention is that the ruthless killing of millions of fine young men has had the effect of enabling us to realize the solidarity of the human race. Listen:—

> No isle of the sea, however remote, but has felt the shock of this vast tragedy. No man, no woman, no child on earth but has had added burdens laid upon him, upon her, as a direct result of the War. Vividly we have been made to realize that for good or for evil—for evil certainly, if not for good—we are members one of another, tied together by innumerable ties. For better or for worse, in joy and in tragedy, it has been shown us that humanity is one, and that we are brothers to the last man of us, for ever. If the solidarity of the race has been held as a theory, it is now revealed as a fact.

And the God of love got up the bloodiest war on record on purpose to convince us that we are all brothers, members one of another. That is how the Heavenly Father brings home to his children the splendid design of universal service which he has prepared for them.

This leads the City Temple oracle to expatiate on the mystic law of vicarious suffering, which law he finds beautifully exemplified on the Cross of Calvary. He is persuaded that it is pre-eminently right for the innocent to suffer with and for the guilty. He plays upon the feelings of his audience by saying that no one can deny that law, "remembering our gay and gallant dead who gave all, and now lie 'dark to the triumph which they died to gain,' who suffered not for their own sins, but in obedience to a red law which runs through all the life of God and man, revealed in all its splendour by the Divine Sufferer on the Cross." Far be it from us to suggest that Dr. Newton does not believe all this, though it seems to us utterly incredible. It would be the sheerest folly to deny that the world is full of vicarious suffering, and that much of it is most honourably borne by those who are absolutely innocent; but it is an indisputable fact that the need for it, in the overwhelming majority of instances, is rooted in injustice and wrong. Had the world been ruled by a just and loving God, there could have been no war; and yet Dr. Newton holds that God reigns because we have won, which clearly indicates that if the Germans had been the conquerors it would have been a proof that God does not reign.

Towards the end of the sermon the reverend gentleman describes God, not as the ruler of the world, but as one of the fighters in it. He quotes the following verse:—

The sorrows of God must be hard to bear
If he really has love in his heart,
And the hardest part in the world to play
Must surely be God's part.

If God there be, he is surely the most unfortunate of all beings, his self-styled servants being his worst enemies.

The Kaiser's Downfall.

Why squat here spinning crafty labyrinths,
Jetting your filthy network o'er the globe?
You think to bind the future? Poor grey spinner!
Fate, the blind housewife, with her busy broom,
Shall shrivel at one sweep your giant web,
And leave a little naked scuttling spider!

—Israel Zangwill.

The last of the great despots has gone. William, King of Prussia and German Emperor, who shook the mailed fist on the European stage for a generation, has gone amid universal execration. A king after Charles the First's own heart, the last of the feudal monarchs, he was the best-hated man in the world. Till the day of his abdication the Kaiser associated the Christian God with his rule, and invoked that deity as the witness of his authority. Democracy, which had frightened the White Czar, and which had overawed the Sultan of Turkey, crouched quietly at the foot of his throne. Now, he is unpacking, in a strange house in another country, from a handbag, the battered crown of Germany.

A country which builds upon an outworn superstition must, sooner or later, rue it. If there was one thing certain about Germany it was that it acquiesced far too long in this divine right of kings. A hundred years ago the poet Shelley pointed the finger of scorn at "king-deluded Germany," and the terrible aftermath was seen in the world-war promoted by a neurotic degenerate who imagined himself as an instrument of "God" divinely appointed to the task of establishing Teutonic supremacy. "There is only one master in this country, That is I," he said arrogantly, "who opposes me I shall crush in pieces." And again, "God will guide the German people through battle to victory, to the goal appointed to the German people by Providence." It was the language of Tamerlane, or that of the megalomaniac obsessed to the point of self-deification. It ended with the royal oak of the monarchical forest crashing to the ground and dragging the kingly saplings in its train.

The Kaiser was fond of referring to his great ancestor, Frederick the Great. William the Second was the ninth King of Prussia, and Frederick was the third. There the resemblance ended. Dining with Queen Victoria, after the publication of his history, Macaulay said "the queen talked of her poor ancestor, James the Second." "Not your Majesty's ancestor," replied Macaulay, "but your predecessor." William does not descend directly from Frederick, but from the great king's nephew, Frederick William, who succeeded him, and allowed his Army to fall into such a state as afterwards to become an easy prey to Napoleon at Jena.

As for William's "sainted grandsire," he was, to use Bismarck's caustic phrase, "a lathe painted to look like iron." His mental processes were slow, and not in the least clever, like so many present-day politicians. It is said that, whereas Bismarck required the largest-sized hat, his Imperial master was accommodated with one that would have fitted a schoolboy. The ex-Kaiser's versatility came to him through his mother, the Princess Royal of England, and the daughter of Prince Albert of Saxe Coburg Gotha, the husband of Queen Victoria.

Powerful as he was, the Kaiser never realized one of his dearest ambitions. It was always his wish to be not German Emperor, but the Emperor of Germany. He found, however, the other Teuton princes less amenable than the democracy of his nation, and to the end he remained the uncrowned German Emperor, not the crowned Emperor of Germany. When the subject was discussed in the presence of Bismarck, the old statesman said, "Sausage is sausage, whatever the name." He had made a nation in twenty years, and was indifferent to mere titles.

Such a man as the ex-Kaiser brooked no rivals. When he ascended the throne, the mighty figure of Bismarck dwarfed him, and he dropped the pilot. Yet the revelations of the Moltke-Harden trial showed that the "god-inspired" monarch was the puppet of the subtlest and most insidious of influences.

It was the German military leaders, and the consenting Kaiser, who made the World-War, which cost millions of lives and countless treasure, and has shaken civilization to its base. And the God-anointed William was an infamous man. He might have spoken the word that would have saved Belgium from martyrdom; he might have spared the innocent passengers on the Lusitania and other ships; he might have respected the civilians in the French and English towns. He might have conducted the War in such a spirit that his name should not have become a hiss and a byword throughout the civilized world. The crowning dishonours of his soldiers were his also, for he was their over-lord. Napoleon passed through Europe like a tempest, but wherever he passed the political and social air was left cleaner and better. For a generation he was our incessant and untiring foe, but he fought us in such a way that Englishmen can hang his portrait in their houses, and stand with respect by the tomb in the Invalides. But William has fallen so low that there is none so poor to do him reverence.

Germany is immeasurably better without such a monarch as the God-anointed Kaiser. Freed at last, may the old German spirit awaken, and the finer elements of the Teutonic character restore her to her rightful place among the democracies of the world.

MIMNERMUS.

Faith and Food.

WE have now, I believe, all received our ration books, probably for the last time, on account of the approaching peace, and during the next few weeks we shall be considering how to use our coupons to the best advantage. Many of the people I come in contact with waste their coupons because they do not take the trouble to ascertain how to use them on all occasions, and what to buy with them and get the best value for their money. I can understand some Christians who believe in prayer and faith wasting coupons, supplied to them by the Food Controller for their advantage; but I cannot understand practical Secularists making such a blunder, especially as information can be so easily obtained. I have been wondering lately how some prominent Christians use their coupons. For instance, the Lord Bishop of London is a bachelor. He has four meat coupons to use per week. Now suppose he spends two meat coupons from Monday to Thursday, and has a fish dinner on Friday, he has only two coupons left for Sunday's dinner. We can imagine him discarding for the nonce his shovel, hat, and gaiters, and, attired like a modern young curate, gliding into one of Lyons' restaurants and spending half a coupon four days a week on a nice light meat dinner; or, if he felt especially hungry, venturing into one of Lockhart's establishments and going in for a good substantial meal of beefsteak pudding, cabbage, potatoes, haricot beans, and some rice pudding and jam, for about one shilling. But still he would only have two coupons left for his Sunday joint. Now, we cannot suppose for a moment that the Right Rev. Father-in-God would pool his coupons with those of his servants, and thus get a bit more from each of them, for that would be a distinct infringement of the order of the Food Controller. True, as a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus, in principle his Lordship is a Communist, and believes that Christians should have everything in common—except, perhaps, ten thousand a year and a palace to live in.

We know that it was said of old that a man with the "faith of a mustard seed could remove a mountain," and no doubt the Bishop's income and palace are obstacles that he finds no difficulty in removing metaphorically when ever occasion arises. If, however, he uses two coupons during the week on "uncooked meat," I repeat, he would only have two coupons left for Sunday's dinner, and unless he dealt with a butcher who extended favour to a high dignitary of the Church, which, in a Christian community, is almost an "unthinkable proposition," as politicians say, he could only get eight pennyworth of uncooked meat for his Sunday's joint. Now that would be distinctly hard on a Right Reverend Father-in-God. But suppose he had meatless dinners all the rest of the week, he would still only have one shilling and fourpence to spend on his Sunday's joint. And when we remember that a prime cut is something like one shilling and eightpence to two shillings a pound, the Bishop's messenger or housekeeper would not require a large handbag in which to convey it to the Episcopal Palace. What I want to know is, how by faith could the Lord Bishop increase the quantity of his uncooked meat if he dealt with a scrupulously honest butcher? And in what way could prayer and fasting help him?

Of course, I know that if the noble Lord Bishop were hard-pressed he might get some sheep's-heart, some tripe, or some black sausages without coupons, but we could scarcely expect him to do this on many occasions, especially as the food controller supplies him with four coupons a week to spend on "uncooked meat."

But, joking apart, there is a tragic side to the great food problem that is not understood or appreciated by the vast majority of the people. People with small fixed incomes, large families, and with little or no War bonus, find it extremely difficult to get enough food to maintain a healthy existence. They may have plenty of coupons but not enough money to pay the high prices that are charged for the common necessities of life nowadays. Thousands of poor people, therefore, have to subsist on food that has very little nourishment in it, and I have noticed of late that hundreds of poor women and children appear to be very anæmic and weak, and I have no doubt that is one of the reasons so many of them have fallen an easy prey to that strange but malignant fever called "Spanish influenza."

Most of the poor people I refer to are very religious. They may not attend church or chapel with any degree of regularity or display many outward signs of piety, but the mere mention of the name "Infidel" or "Atheist" would nevertheless arouse such a feeling of horror and detestation in their minds that any rational person would be easily satisfied they had not outgrown many of the primitive superstitions of their forefathers. These poor people have plenty of faith; but as a man by taking thought "cannot add one cubic inch to his stature," so neither can these people by faith nor prayer add one pennyworth of value to their coupons, or one shilling per week to their scanty incomes. Some people say that the masses were never better clothed nor fed than they have been during the four years of this terrible War. That may be true. I, for one, will not dispute it. But it has to be remembered that from 1881 up to 1914 hundreds of thousands of children—nay, millions—have had to be fed first by voluntary efforts like "the Referee Children's Dinner Fund," and afterwards at the ratepayers' expense in the various schools throughout the kingdom. And though they prayed every day to their Heavenly Father to "Give us this day our daily bread," if it had not have been for the generosity of the ratepayers they would never have got it. And I expect in a few months' time, when their fathers return home from the Front, and find some difficulty in getting work at anything like a subsistence wage, the children will have to be again fed in the schools at the ratepayers' expense. And how does prayer or faith assist them in this case? I remember once reading a poem in the National Reformer, over thirty years ago, three of the lines indelibly fixed themselves on my memory, and I have thought of them many times since. The poem was by Dr. Arthur Lynch, the Irish Member of Parliament, who has proved himself such a fine patriot in this great War. The lines ran something like this:—

> The cry went up for bread,
> "O my lord, it's a frightful doom,
> To be praying for bread in a mother's womb."

And whatever people may say to the contrary, it is a painful fact that thousands of children have been fated to hunger from the very moment of their conception. Their mothers have been half starved, and they have come into a world in which hunger and misery have been their chief inheritance. Let us, in the name of Humanity, see that children in the future have a brighter prospect of a healthy and happy existence, and we may be sure that this result will be brought about, not by faith in the goodness of God or belief in the efficacy of prayer, but by the thoughtful consideration of human beings for the children of the struggling masses, whose health and careful training will help so much towards making them the useful, intelligent, and happy citizens of a brighter and happier world than most of us have ever known.

Acid Drops.

Now that the War is over, and we have had prayers and thanksgiving services from the Christians engaged in it, some of them are settling down to business and getting ready for more war if necessary. Thus, the Daily Telegraph of November 22, reports that a three years' battleship building programme has been approved by President Wilson for the United States. The Daily Telegraph cites the Central News as saying:—

> Should Great Britain decline to limit the building of warships on the ground that she has large colonies to guard, then Congress would wish to be in a position to authorize the immediate building of big fighting ships. Should Great Britain consent to cut down her programme, then the United States would consent to limit her fleet to its existing strength.

The extent to which these Christian nations trust each other is quite touching. But why limitation of armaments? The only way to prevent war is the abolition of armaments. The other plan only makes getting ready for war a less costly process.

Miss Annie B. Weichick, in a letter to the Daily Record on the "Real Jewish Spirit," says the Church of Scotland would do better to leave the Jews to themselves to find their own way to heaven. If these believers in God cannot agree here, how do they expect to get on with each other when they meet in heaven?

To commemorate the signing the Armistice several friends of Stirling Royal Infirmary have sent substantial donations to the funds of the Institution. This is a much more sensible method of thanksgiving than going to church to thank God for what he didn't do.

Sabbatarianism is dying a slow but certain death. The Church Times for November 22 devotes a leading article to a discussion of "Sunday Newspapers," the first sentence in which is as follows:—"The time is past for protests against the existence of Sunday newspapers." So it is; but will not our able contemporary go a step further and frankly admit that the time ought to be past for ecclesiastical opposition to the Sunday opening of places of entertainment? Sabbatarianism is a crime against humanity.

A case of "clerical poverty" was revealed at the inquest on the Rev. F. T. Minchall, Vicar of Cotheridge, Worcestershire, who was found neglected and dying from want and exposure. At the inquest the Dean of Worcester said the "case was not one of real poverty, for the deceased had enough to live on, and he was taken to the infirmary as a paying guest."

At a debating society discussion in North London on "My Favourite Book," one speaker selected the Bible and another pronounced in favour of his ration book.

The newspaper advertising campaign on behalf of the five million pound fund for the Church of England is being conducted with a vigour worthy of a better cause. Advertisements have appeared in a very large number of papers, provincial and metropolitan, and, obedient to the nod of the advertising managers, the editorial comments have been laudatory. The result is that the Church has muzzled most of the newspapers; for what self-respecting editor can afford to offend a good advertiser? Oh, the divine comedy!

It is not quite clear what "the business men of the Church" mean to do with the five million pounds they are asking for, should they get the money. Are the poor bishops to get a bonus to help them keep their palaces in first-class condition? Or may the organists, choristers, and church workers look for a living wage in the near future?

Miss Maude Royden, in movingly eloquent words, exonerates God from all responsibility for most of the suffering in the world, which would cease if we but did our duty;

but after carefully perusing the good lady's passionate tirade against the selfishness of society, we are bound to ask, "Where, then, does God come in at all?"

For stealing a shillingsworth of apples, a railway employee was fined forty shillings at Westminster. For a similar offence, Adam and Eve were not only punished, but their descendants were included in the punishment, and the effects are to be seen to-day. This is the orthodox view of justice.

Purple passages in the press are often a joy to readers. One of the best appeared recently in the Daily Chronicle, under the signature of the pious Mr. Harold Begbie. Describing the Free Church thanksgiving service held at the Albert Hall, at which the King and Queen were present, the writer said: "'Our Father,' led by Dr. Clifford, had new meaning." A hasty reader might assume that "Our Father" was crowded into a frock coat, and actually upon the platform.

Folly is like greatness. Some are born to it, and others easily acquire it. But whether a man is a fool through heredity or by acquisition, there is no need for him to advertise it—although that may be part of his folly; in which case his position is more than ever deplorable. Now, Mr. Arthur Mee, who was once connected with a child's encyclopædia, and who probably still thinks he is talking to children, tells the readers of the Daily Chronicle that the Allies have "saved mankind from the loss of faith in God." Mr. Mee should tell that to the marines, or to the soldiers, and he would undergo enlightenment. And Mr. Mee is as well informed as to the cause of the War as he is as to its results. "It is Professor Haeckel who helped to sow the seed of the war; it is the gospel of materialism according to Haeckel." Now, we are not defending Haeckel against Mee. That would be like protecting the sun from the glare of a candle. We are only exhibiting Mee. And one can imagine reasonable people reading such drivel and, if they believe in God, saying, "Thank God I'm not Mee."

But Mr. Mee writes, "deeper than we knew was the depth of the bottomless pit." And the man who can write that is capable of anything.

A Derbyshire clergyman, the Rev. G. Hazelhurst, recently declined to officiate in a marriage with a deceased wife's sister, although the husband had been a widower. He told the intending bride that such a marriage was "wicked and immoral." Subsequently the pair were married by a Wesleyan minister at Bakewell. It is a pity they did not go to the registrar. But it is a piece of impertinence for a Church of England clergyman, who is really a State official, to decline to carry out the law.

With the approval of Governor Burnquist, the Angelus, or daily minute of prayer, was adopted as an all-Minnesota observance about the middle of last month. If the course was pleasing to the Deity, he chose a strange way of signifying his approval, for a big forest fire followed, destroying a dozen Minnesota lives, and 100,000,000 dollars worth property.—Truthseeker (New York).

We know what Dr. Fort Newton, of the City Temple, thinks of God, but it would be much more interesting to discover what God thinks of Dr. Fort Newton. The reverend gentleman professes to be on the most intimate terms with the Supreme Being, and to possess the minutest information as to his daily doings. If God there were, how hugely amused he would be by the following description of himself:—

> "Let us keep God out of the War," said an officer to me on a ship far out at sea. It cannot be done. He is here, as my dear dead teacher used to say, in the mud and litter of things, toiling, struggling, conquering. He is no spectator, no playwright, no looker-on at the human struggle. He is here in it all, through it all, sharing our bitterest woe.

Formerly, the divines were firm believers in the omnipotence of God, but henceforth it will be their duty to dwell upon his impotence and consequent helplessness. Dr. Newton says that "God is limited," and Dr. Newton knows.

Innocence is always interesting—even in adults. We observe that Lord Crawford said in the House of Lords it was evidence of good management that he, "as an ordinary newspaper reader, was quite unaware that any censorship existed." Censorship of the Press is a poor business at best, and if our censorship had been as straightforward as the continental system, and left blanks where the excised passages once stood, everyone would have been aware of what was taking place, and the innocence of Lord Crawford would not have been exploited. But by closing the gaps in the articles, people were both misinformed and befooled.

A concert in aid of the Glasgow Prisoners of War Fund is to be held in the La Scala Picture House on Sunday, December 8. Let us hope there will be a large turn-out, and so justify the demand that this class of entertainment would be available every Sunday evening during the winter months.

Notwithstanding the protestations of the large and influential deputation from the Churches and other Christian organizations, Edinburgh Town Council have decided to provide Sunday evening concerts in the Waverley Market for overseas soldiers. Quite a knock-back to the Church, and a good hint to mind its own business.

The pulpits of our land are now ringing with extravagant pæans of thanksgiving and praise, the predominant note in which is "The Lord our God has given us a glorious victory." But has he? Is it not a fact that so long as the Germans had superior numbers and equipment we were far from winning, but that so soon as we had unity of command and could concentrate a superior force against our enemies the tide turned in our favour, and the end of the War came into sight? Nothing in history is more certain than this, that if there be a God he "is always on the side of the big battalions."

The attendance of the King and Queen at a Nonconformist thanksgiving service is a sign of the times. The Daily News was jubilant, and remarked that "King George might worship at Westminster Chapel with almost as much fitness as at Westminster Abbey or St. Paul's, for if he is an Episcopalian in England he is a Presbyterian in Scotland." Is the King a Catholic in Ireland, and a Mohammedan in India?

The clergy are sometimes accused of being quick-change artistes; but the following description in a daily paper of Dr. Clifford praying is really noteworthy: "At one moment this octogenarian looked like Homer, then like Darwin, then like Ulysses, and then like a nameless patriarch of Israel." It seems as if the reporter had been lunching freely.

The Vicar of St. Gabriel's Church, Cricklewood, has been appearing as "Hamlet" in a presentation of the play in the Church Hall. That is far better than acting the part of the Angel Gabriel.

The clergy tell us that the War was a chastisement from God for our sins. Some folk have turned this chastisement to their own financial benefit. At Christie's Sale Rooms recently a necklace of pearls was sold for £4,100, and a diamond and emerald ring for £2,850.

In a paragraph on the religious views of men in the public eye, the Evening News said Mr. Arthur Henderson is a Methodist, "who has had experience on the penitent form, and on the doormat at 10 Downing Street.

The conversion of the Chinese to Christianity goes on apace. A Chinaman at Gateshead Court was asked his religion, and replied: "Munition worker."

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—December 1, Swansea; December 8, Garw.

T. BERRY.—The "tangible results" of Freethought work are seen in the breaking down of the power of superstition and in the growth of a saner human kind. You are impressed by Parliament going to a Thanksgiving Service when the Armistice was declared. To us it seems like making God responsible for the War. And in that case the less honest men have to do with it the better. As one writer expressed it, a thanksgiving service now is like rejoicing in a cemetery.

H. DAWSON.—We know we have your good wishes. Still we appreciate your congratulation on our "sticking so successfully to the best of causes."

J. SANDERSON.—Paper was received all right. Thanks. Your having sent 600 back numbers of the Freethinker to the soldiers was excellent work.

R. N. CRUDDAS.—We sincerely hope the desire that your child, whom you have named Charles Bradlaugh, will grow up worthy the name. It will not be the parents' fault if events turn out otherwise.

C. J.—We are obliged by your interest in the Freethinker and our work.

MAJOR WARREN.—Pleased to hear from you. It is a pity that so many should attempt to exploit in the interests of superstition, the misery caused by the War, but one can expect nothing else.

G. GERRARD.—We hope you will be successful in linking up Freethinker readers in Chester with a view to organization. We appreciate your good wishes.

D. SUTHERLAND.—Literature has been sent. Yes, it is something to have pulled through the War; but our troubles are by no means over.

MR. T. MARSON writes:—"Enclosed please find P.O. for four shillings and fourpence which makes the cost of my Freethinker, for a year, threepence per week—than which it is worth much more. You have kept the flag flying throughout the War; I don't think there is an easy time ahead, but the Freethinker will pull through all right with its present staff to pilot it.

"PHŒNIX" (South Shields).—We intend reprinting a number of things as early as possible. Conditions in the printing trade have not yet improved, and may not for some time. However, we are getting on with things, as you will see. Your getting six new subscribers is good work, and with you we wish all our readers would do as well—or better.

T. OSBORNE.—There are numerous works that give a general reply to and a general explanation of Spiritualism. But it is foolish to attempt to "explain" a statement as presented to one without some means of checking it. With the best of intentions a statement may be unconsciously "coloured."

GRATEFUL.—We deeply appreciate your concern. But please see our comment on Mr. Rickard's letter in "Sugar Plums."

F. SMITH.—Sorry we are unable to find room for your letter. So soon as conditions permit our enlarging the paper more space will be available for correspondence.

L. AUSTEN.—We are pleased to have your congratulations on having pulled through the War. But are we through? We have some hard times immediately ahead, and having got through so far with safety we face the future without fear.

S. W. ALABASTER.—So soon as printed will see that you are supplied. Your letter contains excellent news. Thanks for what you are doing.

A. W. SKILLING.—An exposure of Pastor Russell appeared in the columns of Truth. The office of that paper could supply you with the dates. A libel action was threatened, but never occurred.

W. BARNET.—We are pleased you raised the question of Secular Education with your candidate. We are attending to the matter, and seeing he is supplied with the required information.

"SCOTIA" writes that several Glasgow secularists have now joined the Secular Education League. We hope more of them will follow this excellent example.

SAPPER WALDER.—Parcel is being sent; hope it will prove effective.

RAMSGATE.—We should be very pleased to visit Burnley and see what could be done, if arrangements could be made.

J. DUNCANSON.—Pleased to learn that Mr. Palmer had a successful meeting in South London on Sunday last.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sunday's meetings at Leeds were a pronounced success. The handsome Town Hall, one of the finest municipal buildings in the North of England, was well filled both afternoon and evening with an interested and appreciative audience. Every point in the lectures was well taken, and quite an ovation was given to Mr. Cohen when he sat down after replying to opposition at the close of the evening lecture. The meetings had been well advertised, and everything seems to have been organized on an adequate scale. For this the local friends deserve all credit. Mr. Greevz Fisher presided with dignity and efficiency at both meetings. Visitors were present from Huddersfield, Sheffield, Bradford, Barnsley, Wakefield, and elsewhere; and in all probability the meetings will lead to work being commenced in some of these places. Mr. Cohen took with him to Leeds a nasty cold, but returned none the worse for his experience. The experiment involved considerable expense, and its success was evidence of what can be accomplished when the work is undertaken in the right spirit.

Mr. Cohen is having a busy week-end this week. In order to visit as many places as possible he will be leaving London early on Saturday morning for Maesteg. There will be a meeting of Freethinkers in the late afternoon whom he has been asked to address, with a public meeting in the evening in the large Town Hall. On Sunday he will lecture twice at Ferndale, and on Monday at Llwynypia—thus opening up ground in two new places. This will mean either travelling overnight or leaving very early on Tuesday morning in order to get the next week's Freethinker out. And by Tuesday evening he will have earned a night's rest, if nothing else.

We are now in the midst of the Election turmoil, and there is a good opportunity for Freethinkers bringing their views before the public. Candidates should be questioned on at least four points:—

1. Their attitude with regard to the abolition of religious instruction in all State-supported schools.
2. The abolition of the Blasphemy Laws (such as the 9 and 10 William III., c. 35).
3. The complete disestablishment of religion, as in France.
4. The abolition of compulsory Church Parades and of compulsory attendance at "Divine Service" in both Army and Navy.

For over four years politicians have all been calling the universe to witness our devotion to freedom, and what we were prepared to undergo to secure liberty. We have now a chance of proving that our talk is not mere lip-service. None of these four points claim any sectarian or party advantages. They each involve a plain and simple act of justice towards all citizens. They leave all opinions on religion absolutely equal before the law. They affirm the duty of leaving the child with an unbiased mind, and the adult, whether in or out of the Army and Navy, free to choose the religion that seems to him best, or to reject them all.

Sir James Frazer has added to the debt all Freethinkers owe him by the publication of a new work on Folk-lore in the Old Testament, Studies in Comparative Religion, Legend, and Law. Like the author's Golden Bough, the work is a mine from which all students may dig, and while themselves enriched, leaves wealth for all. We intend, at an early date, dealing with the book at some length, and merely call attention here to the publication of a work that a great many of our readers will be anxious to possess. The work treats of the Creation, The Flood, The Tower of Babel, The Story of Sampson, The Mark of Cain, and numerous Biblical customs and legends In each case the reader is treated to a wide survey of corresponding customs and stories among primitive races. There are also a couple of deeply interesting chapters on Primogeniture and Unigeniture, which open up quite a number of associated subjects. The work will help still more clearly to emphasize the savage origins of Christian religions, and we hope that one day Sir James will do for the New Testament what he has here done for the Old Bible. As we have said, we intend dealing with the work at some length as early as possible. Folk-lore in the Old Testament is published in three volumes, uniform with the Golden Bough, price 37s. 6d.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures twice to-day (Dec. 1) in the Dockers' Hall, Swansea; at 3, "The Value of the Bible in National Life"; at 7, "Science, Religion, and Morals." Good audiences are certain, but we hope to hear that the hall is crowded out on both occasions. On Tuesday, Dec. 3, at 7, Mr. Lloyd lectures at Ogmore Vale, where a new Branch of the N. S. S. is being formed.

We have in the press, and hope to issue in the course of two or three weeks, a small volume of literary essays by our contributor, Mr. Andrew Millar. Readers of the Freethinker have for long appreciated Mr. Millar's essays as they have appeared in these columns, and many will no doubt be pleased to have them in a more permanent form. Mr. Millar's natural taste for the picturesque has won him many admirers, both in the Freethinker and other journals.

The R.P.A. Annual for 1919 is well up to its usual level of varied excellence. Mr. Eden Phillpotts opens with a poem on "The Fruit of the Tree," in which a good idea is well worked out, but ends with a rather lame line. Professor Gilbert Murray manages to say all he wishes about the War through the mouths of Aristophanes, Erasmus, and Voltaire. Professor Bury writes on the Censorship, in which he makes a rather uneasy defence of a bad institution, while the objection to a censorship is evaded rather than refuted. Mr. William Archer, Mr. McCabe, Mr. F. J. Gould, Mr. H. S. Salt and others complete the issue. The price of the Annual is now One Shilling.

Extract from a sergeant's letter:—

> The Battalion is being disbanded, and we leave this camp in a day or two. The C. of England parade this morning was somewhat interesting by reason of the fact that the chaplain, in saying farewell to us, lamented that his work had been a failure. It seems that the soldier can be compelled to attend the Church service, but he cannot be made to partake of the food provided for his spiritual and mental refreshment. The address would not have been remarkable, except for its honesty, had it not been obvious that the chaplain thought the fault lay with the soldier, not with him or the Church. Poor parsons! four years' of war have taught them nothing; but Tommy has learnt many things. If the afore-mentioned gentleman could have heard the latter's after-church remarks, he would have realized that. But few parsons have ever been sufficiently in touch with the private soldier to understand his mental make-up. Already the rank and file look forward to the day when there will be no compulsory Church Parade. Perhaps the padre's gloom was deepened by a vision of empty churches, for he looked anxious as he passed out, conscious of defeat, but sublimely, pathetically unconscious of the reason.

Mr. C. Rickard writes:—

> May I offer you my congratulations on your splendid courage in keeping the flag flying during the terrible time we have just passed through, and trust you will give your readers an opportunity of showing their appreciation in a practical manner in the near future.

We hope they will all show their appreciation at once by helping us to give the Freethinker the circulation it deserves.

The following reaches us from one of our naval units:—

> Enclosed you will find note, value 10s., a small contribution from four stalwarts on the above-named ship.
>
> I regret that the contribution has been so long in being sent, but you will quite understand that the exigencies of the Service are to blame.
> We all wish that we could be of more use to the Freethinker, but are doing our best. It may interest you to know that the circulation aboard has now reached twenty copies.

Mr. M. Westlake writes:—

> I am late in sending my mite, but, though undischarged, my duty was not forgotten. I owe the Freethinker a debt of gratitude, and regret that the help I can now give is but small. I am only a poor man, and for your sake wish it were otherwise; but although the world will benefit but little, financially, from my death, I think it but right to inform you that the Freethinker has not been forgotten. In planning the disposal of my small estate, at such time when I have joined the "choir invisible," nothing gave me greater satisfaction than the knowledge that the Freethinker would be amongst the few who would benefit by my death.

We can only say with all sincerity that, while appreciating to the full the spirit of the above, we hope that Mr. Westlake may keep the Freethinker for many years from benefiting by his death.

For some unexplained reason, Mrs. Seaton-Tiedemann failed to keep her appointment with the North London Branch on Sunday last. A fine gathering had assembled to listen to this lady, and, under the chairmanship of Mr. Collette-Jones, various members debated the subject of Divorce, the discussion being interesting and enlightening. To-day, Mr. Ben Purse, of the National League of the Blind, will open. His subject, "Socialism v. the Policy and Programme of the Liberal Party," is most opportune, and Mr. Purse, we hear, is a good speaker and debater. We hope he will have a large audience.

Will Freethinker readers in and about Chester be good enough to communicate with Mr. D. Sutherland, 30 Francis Street, Chester, with a view to organization and propaganda?

The New York Truthseeker reprints Mr. Cohen's article of September 8 on "Materialism," with suitable acknowledgments.

Religion After the War.

The Church and the War—these are the two engrossing topics of the day.....From every rank of life comes eager questioning. "Why is all this?" "How can God permit it?" "Has Christianity no better record of its two thousand years than this murderous flood of evil deeds?—this cruelty, and lust, and bloodshed?" And the Church apparently cannot explain why Christianity has failed in its teaching, or why the blasphemous outcries of a ruthless tyrant are permitted to ascend to Heaven as excuse or explanation.—"Rita" (Mrs. Desmond Humphreys) "The Wrong End of Religion," pp. 3-4.

This War by its surpassing magnitude and almost incredible horror has.....compelled men.....to subject the deepest problems of religion to an analysis from which most of those who are attached to specific creeds would certainly have shrunk as profane before these floodgates were unloosed.....many of them are driven against their will to the despairing conclusion that either there is no God, or that He is not good, or that He is not all-powerful. If they say, there were a God, just and omnipotent, He could not have permitted this awful waste and suffering when he might so easily have prevented it all. They only feel irritated and insulted when they are told that they must submit without question and believe in Him in the teeth of evidence which they cannot controvert.—M. H. Temple, "The Failure of the Church," the "National Review," January 1918, p. 571.

Have the Churches gained or lost by the War? After four years of this barbarous and savage War it is time to look round and see how the Churches have stood the test. Have they advanced or gone back in public estimation?

We think there can be but one answer to the question; the Churches have lost enormously in prestige. A storm of hostile criticism is beating against the Churches. Books, like The Wrong End of Religion, by "Rita," The Questions of Ignotus, The War and the Churches, by Joseph McCabe, and the same writer's Bankruptcy of Religion, and many others, fiercely attacking the Churches, have been bought and read by thousands.

There has also been a deluge of criticism, advice, and exhortation in the magazines and the daily and weekly press. Never have the Churches been so faithfully dealt with, so openly and publicly criticized, denounced, and derided, as to-day. And as the daily and weekly press are very careful not to publish anything but what the public want, it may be taken that they represent the great majority of public opinion in the matter.

And the criticism often comes from the most unexpected quarters. For instance, Mr. Harold Begbie, the author of several religious novels, whose occasional articles in the Daily Chronicle so reek with pious sentiment—there is nothing to be compared with them outside the columns of the War Cry—one would think that he would be one of the first to rally to the defence of the Church; or, at any rate, of religion, from the attacks launched against them. On the contrary, we find him denouncing them in good set terms. In an article, entitled "The Rout of Religion," contributed to the Royal Magazine for August, 1915, after declaring that the War was caused by commercial rivalry. He observes:—

Religion could not prevent the war because it had not previously prevented commercial competition; it cannot stop the war because it has never attempted to stop trade wars, or sweating, or price-cutting, or trusts, or commercial selfishness. Religion has been a looker-on. It has played no active part in existence. It has occupied the seat of a spectator, or has been the considerate physician to those whom the battles of trade fling broken and almost dead out of the firing-line. Religion has never stood up to industrialism, and called it a devil. The tables of the money-changers are fastened to the ground; those who sell doves fear violence only from the Suffragettes; from the Church they expect protection.

He advises us to go through the streets of any of our centres of industry and study the faces there, "and ask yourself whether the wounds inflicted by rifle, and steel, are not cleaner wounds than the maimings of commerce .....look at the packed public-houses, the atrocious architecture, the dreadful clothes, the vulgarizing theatres, the hypocritical journalism, and the nauseous literature of these great centres of commerce. Who would live there, except to make money? Why has religion looked on and kept silence? Life's object is not the making of money." He continues:—

Is it so amazing, then, that we find in this war a man like Bishop Gore upholding British arms, a man like Eucken upholding German arms, a man like the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris upholding French arms, and the priests of Bavaria to a man upholding German arms? Catholics are slaughtering Catholics; Protestants are slaughtering Protestants. The French soldier and the German soldier expire kissing the same cross and breathing the same prayer. On both sides men are singing hymns, reading the Bible, praying through Christ to the One True God.[1]

Mr. Begbie says, and we agree with him, "that men will take a more intelligent interest in religion," that they will decline to be fobbed off with the answer "that such and such is the tradition of the Church." They will say to themselves: "'Religion did not avert this horrible war; religion was powerless even to mitigate the waste and destruction of this hideous catastrophe; religion has really done nothing at all for the brotherhood of humanity.' They will reflect that religion has had a long innings, that religion has enjoyed enormous wealth and influence, that religion has had the means and the inspiration to make a brotherhood of the human race. Is it not certain that they will reject the existing organization of religion which has so disastrously failed humanity."[2] Mr. Begbie records: "I heard a well-known man say at a luncheon party the other day that what most impressed him in this War was the collapse of ecclesiasticism. He spoke of the Church's ignominious silence in this world crisis. No one contradicted him." Mr. Begbie says: "The present generation of Christians will pass away sorrowful and dejected." But expresses the pious hope that in the new generation to come the Church will be born again. If it is, there is not much doubt that it will be still born. For, look you, it is the fundamental dogmas of religion itself that are being questioned to-day, more widely and more drastically than ever before. God himself is being tried in the balance and found wanting. People are saying, "What is the use of praying to God for help if he was unable, or unwilling, to avert this frightful catastrophe that has engulfed the world?"

So far from the Church providing any intelligible answer to this agonizing demand for a satisfactory explanation of God's indifference or ill-will, says Mr. H. Temple, "Such authority as exists in the Church of England has occupied itself with the beatification of that very doubtful character Charles the First, and with the expurgation from the Psalter of certain verses which never seemed more appropriate than at the present time. But of anything like an organized effort to come to the help of the people whose faith is being shaken to its foundations by this grim but most undeniably real figure of war, there is hardly a trace."[3]

Another writer, who attacks the Church as the opponent of true religion, observes:—

The pagan Greeks of old were honest enough to close their temples of peace when the nation went to war, and kept them closed until peace was restored. Not so the modern representatives of what is euphemistically called Christianity. Far from having any religious objections to warfare from the Christian standpoint, the preaching fraternity, as usual, showed a united front in favour of the international slaughter.....the parsons and priests of the various brands of Christianity represented in the several belligerent countries at once plumped for bloodshed, declared God to be on their side, and began at once to pray to the Prince of Peace for victory. What can the God of orthodox Christianity be expected to do in such an extremity? Obviously, He cannot answer the prayers of all the Allies and those of their enemies at the same time. The gravity of His situation would be intense if the humour of it were not so apparent.[1]

And having beaten the patriotic drum from the pulpit, the Church straightway obtained exemption from military service for its clergy—a class of men who produce nothing; are, in fact, parasites on the nation, who could be more easily spared than any class in the community, and yet declined to serve their country in the hour of its most desperate need.

As Mr. M. H. Temple observes:—

> The original refusal by the Anglican Bishops to allow the younger clergy to join the ranks when the first call came for men was a mistake which inevitably emphasized the divorce between the clergy and the people.....If, as Article 37 asserts, "it is lawful for Christian men, at the commandment of the Magistrate, to wear weapons and serve in the wars," why were the younger clergy forbidden to serve in a war so just as this, and at a time when the need for men was so imperative?

In my opinion, as a mere matter of policy, the Church made a fatal mistake here, and lost the last shred of respect the ordinary man still retained for her.

ANOTHER glaring instance of question-begging is given in the phrase "psychical energy." If the phrase were used simply as a metaphor to denote the mental state of restless striving and action which accompanies pent-up neural energy of vigorous youth and health, no exception whatever could be taken to it. All mental states or processes are expressed in terms of physical similes, however effaced by now may be their birth-marks—so artificial a "creation" is man's world of ideas or thought.

Dr. McDougall, however, does not use it as a term of descriptive analogy, but as expressive of something which has a fundamental affinity or kinship with physical energy, for they are assumed or declared to be mutually transmutable.

We have, therefore, a right to ask, What is this "psychical energy"—what are its attributes? What property has it which identifies it with energy and entitles it to be denoted by it, and in what way does it differ from it?

There is no ambiguity as to the meaning of physical energy. It is "that which can do work"—that is, overcome physical resistance either of "force" or of inertia. In other words, it is that which can effect spatial displacement or movement.

Now, can "psychical energy" produce movement or strain in physical substance? If it can, why call it "psychical"? If it cannot, why call it "energy"?

To discuss its transmutability is therefore as disingenuous as the thing itself is gratuitous and baseless.

[1] W. Bell, The Exodus from Houndsditch; 1916; pp. 11, 12.

Another potent "argument" is to cast doubt upon established generalizations of science, which directly negative his pet "soul" theory.

He speaks most disparagingly of the premier and best established principle of science—"The Conservation of Energy." He refers to it as "merely a generalized statement of an empirically established fact."

That which rests on the solid bed-rock of uniform human experience, to which there is not a single recorded exception, is scoffed at as "empirical," while the guesses of the perfervid imaginations of ignorant and blind fanatics, which have not the empirical basis of even one demonstrable fact, are held up to honour.

He sneers at the phrase "potential energy" as a "convenient fiction."

It is difficult to refer to this jibe without apparent discourtesy. One is at a loss to know whether to regard it as a "cheap sneer" over the crude efforts of science at naming things in the days of its youth, or to his having no clear conception of the meaning of "energy."

The term "potential" as applied to energy is obviously crude and misleading. The energy usually referred to by the term is in no sense "potential." It is as actual as the kinetic form. When the term was first used by infant science, energy was conceived as that which is possessed by mass in motion. And the word "potential" had reference to the word "kinetic" rather than to the word "energy." It is an instance of an unfortunate act of wrong-naming a thing, as was often the case with infant science. Energy has two distinct forms: the kinetic and the static; one is due to mass-motion or momentum, the other to position or strain. A spatial element is equally essential to either kind—as displacement in the one and as movement in the other; both of which are familiarly exemplified in the swing of a pendulum, during which they alternate at every instant, as it paces and re-paces its arc. But the one form is just as much energy as the other—a fact which makes Dr. McDougall's disdainful comment sorry reading.

In the same question-begging strain Dr. McDougall devotes some space to "proving" that the "inconceivability" of the notion of transmutation of "psychical energy" into the physical and vice versa does not imply the impossibility of the process. I agree; but it is a question-begging discussion and settles nothing. Such a plea helps the Materialistic view more than it does his own. In the case of the "Materialist" the inconceivability of the "movements and gyrations of atoms becoming states of consciousness" is usually urged as the fatal gap in his theory. If, therefore, "inconceivability" is no barrier to itself, the main objection to "Materialism" is gone. The Materialist has no gratuitous figment on the other side of the gap with which he must try and correlate it.

Dr. McDougall's first task is to produce evidence of the existence of his postulate—the soul of its energy. It is then, and only then, will it be relevant to discuss the "conceivability" of transmutations between plupical and psychic.

FREETHINKERS AND THE GENERAL ELECTION.

QUESTIONS FOR CANDIDATES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—For some mysterious reason the Prime Minister has decided not to wait till the general treaty of Peace is signed, but to launch forth on a General Election for a new Parliament before Christmas. Naturally and rightly we are all highly enthusiastic in having shattered the power of the Militarist caste in the West, which, supported by all the forces of a reactionary superstition, has, for over forty years, held the nations in thrall. But in placing within the reach of all that priceless liberty and freedom for which our brethren have so gloriously fought, suffered, and died, let us not be unmindful of the fact that complete liberty and equality in matters of religion has still to be won at home.

It must be clear to all that the new Parliament will be faced with tremendous issues. The Churches are already on the war-path, and it behoves all who believe in the supremacy of reason and man's unconquerable mind to be on the alert lest the best of causes suffer a setback. Therefore, I would urgently impress upon all Freethinkers, Positivists, Rationalists, and Progressive thinkers the vital necessity of forcing from all candidates an unequivocal declaration of their attitude to the following questions:—

Whether the candidate is in favour of and will actively support measures for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of England, and the abolition of all tithes, and resolutely oppose every effort to endow any religious sects at the public expense.

Whether he will support the complete elimination of clerical control in every form in the education of children, and a policy which will give the child of the poorest member of the community an equal opportunity in every respect with the child of the rich man to rise to the highest rung of the educational ladder.

Whether he will support the complete repeal of the Blasphemy Laws, and will urge the removal of all restrictions interfering with complete freedom of speech and writing.

If all your readers will make a point of insisting upon straightforward answers to the above questions they will be doing a great service in enlightening public opinion and forwarding the progress of the cause we all have at heart.

Frederic W. Walsh.

LIFE AFTER DEATH.

Sir,—In an article in the Daily Chronicle of the 5th inst., Sir A. Conan Doyle asserts that Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism have been proved beyond a shadow of possible doubt. These phenomena consist mostly of certain movements of material things, table-turning and the like, without any apparent material power to cause them. Granted that such phenomena occur, it by no means follows that because the material power is not apparent therefore it is not there. Any professional conjurer can do things quite as mysterious without any appeal to spiritual forces, and the late Mr. Maskelyne once offered to bet £1,000 that he would reproduce any of the Spiritualist physical phenomena by material means—a bet which was never accepted by the Psychical Research Society.

Apart from such phenomena, however, it remains for Spiritualists to furnish some reasonable explanation as to why the communications received from the spirits of the departed are invariably of the most silly character, and utterly useless in clearing up questions of great interest and importance. Many innocent persons have been accused of murder, and, indeed, actually hanged, when a communication from the spirit of the murdered person might have prevented such a gross miscarriage of the law. Again, the mystery of Edwin Drood has been a puzzle to the literary world for many years, yet a communication from the late Charles Dickens could easily solve it. Ships, with their whole crews, have been lost mysteriously at sea, yet no word of explanation has come from the spirit world—why?

National Secular Society.

Report of Monthly Executive Meeting held on November 21.

The President, Mr. C. Cohen, occupied the chair. Also present: Messrs. Brandes, Eagar, Kelf, Leat, Palmer, Quinton, Roger, Samuels, Thurlow, and Wood; Miss Kough, Miss Pitcher, Mrs. Rolf, and the Secretary.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed.

New members were received for Coventry, Glasgow, West Ham, and the Parent Society—eleven in all.

A letter was received from Miss Alma Stanley tendering her resignation as Vice-President and member of the Executive. It was resolved that the resignation be accepted with regret, and a letter written to Miss Stanley expressing the Executive's appreciation of her past loyal services.

The President reported the result of the Special Conference held at Birmingham was that the scheme of re-organization presented by the Special Committee had been carried with a few alterations.

A request from the Conference that certain minutes of October 31 be expunged was not complied with.

It was proposed that a Committee to consider the division of groups and areas as provided for in the new Constitution be elected, but after discussion it was decided that this and other matters remitted to the Executive by the Conference should stand adjourned.—E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

Religion and Death.

It is false to say that death is the supreme test of character. That is a philosophy preached to cowards by fools or knaves. The true test of a man is not death but life; for how a man will face death will be determined by his character, and character is not a thing of the moment. It begins with each one in the cradle, and the call of death is only the occasion for a last expression of its quality. But on the observer death has its inevitable and universal reaction. A tribute of silence, if not of respect, is wrung from all. Instinctively the voice is lowered, the manner becomes quieter, the most thoughtless recognize the presence of one of the great—perhaps one of the most significant—facts of existence. A world without death is an inconceivable world. It would be a place in which affection would die of inanition, where before and after would almost lose their meaning. Love finds its occasion in birth, but it is deeply rooted in the complementary fact of death.

A Good Beginning.

For over four years death has been more than usually busy in our midst. War, famine, and disease have been active. Never before has the grim reaper swung his scythe with such vigour; never before, and in so short a time has he reaped so rich a harvest. In France scores of thousands of our kith and kin lie buried. The dead have given their all, and the living can give them nothing in return but affectionate and respectful remembrance. The whole nation is at one here, and it is fitting that some attempt should be made to preserve and to clothe with some sign of outward dignity the places where our dead lie so thickly. It is, therefore, only just that the care of these graves should be taken from the hands of private individuals, and made the concern of the nation as a whole. So far the Imperial War Graves' Commission is well conceived. So, also, it is good to find Sir F. Kenyon, Director of the British Museum, in his just-issued report on the care and treatment of these cemeteries, recommending that private memorials be not allowed. It is well that in this matter individual caprice and wealth should be eliminated. Sir Frederic well says:—

> The sacrifice of the individual is a great idea and worthy of commemoration; but the community of sacrifice, the service of a common cause, the comradeship of arms which has brought together men of all ranks and grades—these are greater ideas which should be commemorated in these cemeteries where they lie together.

That is well put; and a logical carrying out of the idea would have been the recommendation of a monument which should eliminate everything of a sectional or sectarian character. Service in a common cause should be symbolized in a way that would strike no jarring note, and rouse no mocking or contemptuous spirit.

With a Bad Ending.

An earlier recommendation, from Sir E. Luyten, was that the memorial in each cemetery should take the form of "one great fair stone" raised on three steps, with suitable inscriptions. This, says Sir Frederic Kenyon, goes "far to meet our requirements," but it is not enough—

> It lacks the definitely Christian character, and it does not represent the idea of self-sacrifice. For this the one essential symbol is the Cross. The Jews are necessarily interred with their Christian comrades, but it is believed that their feelings will be satisfied by the inclusion of their religious symbol in the design of their headstones.

But, in the name of all that is sensible, why should this national memorial to the nation's dead have a definitely Christian character? Does Sir Frederic wish us to infer that they who are dead had all a definite Christian conviction while alive? Sir Frederic must know, as everyone else does, that the vast majority of the soldiers thought very little about Christianity, one way or the other. And of those who did think, a by no means negligible number thought of it only to reject it. Surely the "service of a common cause," in which these men died, was not the service of the Churches. How many would have died for that cause? And by what moral right will the Graves Commission erect a cross above the grave of men who while living repudiated the cross and Christianity? It is an outrage on the dead. Sir Frederic may reply that the majority of the dead were Christians. Let it go at that. But right or wrong, decency and indecency are not determined by questions of majority and minority. An injustice must be done to an individual if it is done at all. These men died in "the service of a common cause." Sir Frederic Kenyon, in the interests of a discredited and a dying creed, repays their sacrifice by almost an insult.

Exploiting Death.

Clerical influence, we feel sure, is behind it all, and it quite accounts for the impertinence of the suggestion. Only the Cross can represent the idea of self-sacrifice! Was the Cross responsible for the self-sacrifice of the French soldier and the French people—whose sufferings were a hundredfold greater than ours? What of the Mohammedan, the Jew, the Buddhist, the Hindoo, the men who went into action with "Atheist," "Agnostic," or "Freethinker" written on their identification discs? Did self-sacrifice mean to them the Cross? It is the arrogance of the Christian who takes to himself a quality that belongs to humanity as a whole, and stamps it with his sectarian mark. Christianity has for centuries made life hideous with its sectarianism; it cannot suppress its sectarianism even in the presence of death. Above the grave of the French soldier stands the inscription, "La Patrie." It stands to him for all that he holds dear—for home, for friends, for national greatness. Does the British soldier need more? Does he ask for more? No, it is not he who asks for aught else; it is the request of a class that sees in death little more than an occasion for advancing its own sectarian interests.

The Sign of the Cross.

And yet there is a grim, even though unconscious, irony in erecting the Cross over these huge repositories of the nation's dead. For the War, with its twenty millions of killed and wounded, represents the part product of over fifteen centuries of the rule of the Cross. The most contented people under the Cross have always been dead ones. It has stood as a sanction for some of the worst outrages that the history of the past fifteen centuries has furnished. When two civilizations were blotted out in South America, and nearly three million natives killed, the banner of the Cross floated above the ruins and over the corpses of the people. When Christian Spain murdered thousands of its Mohammedan and Jewish subjects, and robbed and expelled the remainder, what, again, was the symbol employed? The Cross. When the streets of Paris ran red with the blood of a St. Bartholomew massacre, and the fires of our own Smithfield blazed around the limbs of heretics, it was under the shadow of the Cross. It was held aloft over the horrors of the black slave trade, and over the fiendish brutality of the Inquisition. It has provided the occasion for bitterness and brutality in Ireland for over three centuries. It has divided families and set nations at each others' throats. And now it is to stand as a symbol over the graves of hundreds of thousands in France. A symbol of what? The thoughtful man or woman of the next generation may well see in it the symbol of the the failure of a religion that possessing almost fabulous resources demonstrated its own dishonour in the world-war of the twentieth century. The satire of its erection will be lost on the dead. Let us earnestly hope its significance will be fully recognized by the living.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Metaphysics.

MR. J. DOWELL JONES, in a letter which appeared in this journal for November 24, in a perfectly friendly manner, finds fault with me for placing metaphysics on a level with "dogmatism." I have no recollection of ever having committed such an offence, and I am quite certain that I did not intend to do so in my article on "Experience as Argument," which is to be seen in the issue for November 10. However, I am grateful to Mr. Jones for affording me an opportunity to express my views on the important subject of Metaphysics. My critic regards my supposed attitude to it as symbolic of a weakness in the Freethought position generally. Every scholar is aware that metaphysics is the term which Andronicus of Rhodes is supposed to have applied to those writings of Aristotle that came after the physics, and that, therefore, it merely indicated the place of those writings in that edition of his works, but was not intended to be descriptive of their nature. Later, mystics of the Neo-Platonic school maintained that it signified beyond, not merely after, physics. In the work thus called, Aristotle treats of the principles of Being, as such, and of theology, or the existence of God. In other words, metaphysics concerns itself with subjects which lie beyond experience and knowledge, but which have been the pet toys of speculative jugglers in all generations. Mr. Jones refers to certain "facts" which, "even in the present age of scientific progress, can only be investigated metaphysically"; but those facts are entirely unknown to me. The existence of "those infinite things that we to-day are unable to comprehend," is an assumption, not a fact. Is it not likely that my friend has ventured a little beyond his depth here? He says: "It is impossible for us to conceive of space and time as finite, and yet the Infinite is necessarily beyond our knowledge." Then, as if he had already forgotten that sentence, he adds: "To this same sphere—that of the conceivable but incomprehensible—appear to belong love, life, truth, goodness." Can the same sphere be at once conceivable and inconceivable? Be that as it may at present, the point of importance is that Metaphysics has not devoted itself to the investigation of facts, but to the discussion of questions relating to the nature of reality. It has been called a theoretical science, which, many Neo-Platonists declared, "could not be attained except by one who had turned his back upon the natural world." But it is a well-known fact that Neo-Platonism flourished only when dogmatic theology was prominent and the natural sciences had been forcibly suppressed. Indeed, the overwhelming majority of metaphysicians have been themselves zealous advocates of dogmatic theology, and it was certainly with this fact in view that, in my article, I placed the doctrine about God "a metaphysical speculation."

When Mr. Jones says that "metaphysical research is occupying so big a place in the Western hemisphere in these days" he must either be labouring under a delusion or attaching an unusual meaning to the adjective "metaphysical." I admit that in the nineteenth century there was a slight reaction in favour of metaphysics; but already that reaction is a thing of the past, and the natural sciences are everywhere all-victorious. Scholasticism, which was based on Aristotelianism, is now as dead as Queen Anne. This is by no means a faith-ridden age, but an age which, wholly dissatisfied with the unverified and unverifiable assumptions of dogmatic theology, is wistfully endeavouring to interpret the facts of life in terms of natural knowledge, and not of supernatural belief. I find that the generality of present-day thinkers are flying, for a solution of all pressing problems, not to but from religion; and to all such Freethought offers, not vain guesses, speculations, and hypotheses, but all the light already obtained and obtainable as the direct result of the scientific investigation of the mechanism of Nature. Mr. Jones alludes to people who want to know why memory persists in the subconscious mind, and what utility have experiences that extend over a lifetime if the ego ceases to be at death; but, surely, such "thinkers" look at social life through selfish eyes, and fail to realize that the utility or inutility of experiences is not affected by what happens to the ego at death.

I hate all dogmatism except that which inevitably accompanies actual knowledge, and I cannot see what justification I have given for the charge of being dogmatic which Mr. Jones appears to make against me. In the article which occasioned his letter I indulged in no dogmatism, but confined myself to characterizing all theological statements about God and his relation to human destiny as purely speculative dogmas. Does not Mr. Jones agree with me on that point, and is he not aware that the schoolmen regarded speculative theology as the proper sphere of metaphysics? I am, of course, aware that in Great Britain metaphysics is often used as a synonym of philosophy, especially by thinkers like Carveth Read, who regard philosophy as "the attempt to unite the sciences in one system, and to expound their mutual relations and the harmony of their laws. In his excellent book, entitled The Metaphysics of Nature, Professor Read says :—

> Positive philosophy is such a manifest demand of reason that almost at the beginning of European speculation it was felt by Plato (Rep. B. VII.); at the beginning of modern thought, by Bacon; since Comte the idea has become popular, and the first problem of the Positive Philosophy, the Classification of the Sciences, is now a common exercise. The great body of the Positive Philosophy (not merely Comtian) is constituted by those sciences which give an account of the genesis and history of the world—Astronomy, Geology, Biology, Psychology, Sociology: the Analytic Sciences, treating of the modes of energy or activity which the genetic Sciences imply, are,—Mechanics, Physics, Chemistry, Physiology, Economics, etc.; the Formal Sciences, Logic and Mathematics, investigate the conditions of proving the relations and laws of phenomena in general, so far as proof is possible from accepted premises (pp. 1, 2).

Another critic of the same article, who has written to me privately, says he often detects bad logic in the Freethinker, but that I, in the article under consideration, have provided him with the worst specimen he has seen yet. This is the passage he pounces upon :—

> Mr. Lord is entirely mistaken when he affirms that religion begins in experience. The present writer is acquainted with scores of persons who have never entertained a single supernatural belief, and not one of them has ever had any religious experience.

And this is the comment thereupon :—

> That does not refute what Lord says. It confirms it. Lord might answer: "Well, if they have had no experience, I would not have expected them to have any religion, because religion begins in experience.

I may be very stupid, but with all due deference to my logic-grinding critic, I am utterly unable to trace the slightest illogicality in that quoted extract. Its truth is not questioned; but if it is true what it proves is, not that religion begins in experience, but that it never begins at all, in the absence of belief. Unless Mr. Lord or Mr. Harpur can produce a person by whom religious experience was enjoyed prior to his entertaining any religious belief my contention stands, not only as absolutely true, but also, because true, as entirely logical. Why are the people to whom I referred without religious experience? Whose is the responsibility for the lack of it? If there is a God, why has he never spoken to them? Whose fault is it that they are without knowledge of him? If through the influence of their parents and school teachers children are not induced to believe in God, why are they allowed to go through a life as Atheists? If their so-called Father in Heaven is not a myth, how can he have a moment's happiness while they are in total ignorance of him? Full well do the priests know that unless they secure the child they will never win the man. It is that knowledge alone that accounts for their burning zeal in the cause of religious education.

What I maintain is that God, the alleged giver of religious experience, is either a supernatural Being, metaphysically conceived, or an idealized abstraction; but, in either case, an imaginary creation, and, of necessity, no experience of him is possible except to those who believe in him. Consequently, and, of equal necessity, the degree of experience invariably corresponds to the intensity of the belief. In other words, religious experience owes its existence to metaphysical theology. Therefore, while I greatly admire many metaphysical systems because of their beauty, ingenuity, and subtlety, I attach no practical value whatever to them; and I agree with the following estimate by Ingersoll :—

> There is no propriety in wasting any time about the science of metaphysics. I will give you my definition of metaphysics: Two fools get together; each admits what neither can prove, and thereupon both of them say, "Hence we infer." That is all there is of metaphysics (Works, vol. vii., p. 17).

J. T. Lloyd.

The Freethought Orators.

> Liberty, a word without which all other words are vain.
> —Ingersoll.

What a volume could be compiled of Rationalist oratory! For near a hundred years the Freethought Movement has contained some of the foremost speakers in the country. From the stormy days of Charles Southwell until the present day the bead-roll of Freethought advocates has included men and money who could sway popular audiences as a musician plays on an organ. Owing, however, to the press boycott, scant records are to be found of some of their best efforts, although there is sufficient left to justify any claim of oratorical pre-eminence. To think of Charles Bradlaugh is to recall the personality of one of the greatest of orators; an artist in words who could rival Leon Gambetta and Emilio Castelar. His Parliamentary speeches were tame as compared with the volcanic orations delivered before Rationalist audiences; but, in spite of their judicial note, they are magnificent examples of their kind. Perhaps the speech on the Oaths Bill is the best—so suave and dignified—as befitted such an audience as the House of Commons. The address at the Bar of the House, too, is a masterpiece in its way; but neither display that Gallic fervour which was so marked a feature of his platform speeches. For it is the French orators, above all, who excel in this way. There is always logic and thought in what they say, and at the same time a volcanic emotion which can alone give it value for popular audiences, and enable them to turn votes by their eloquence. It was in the lecture halls that Bradlaugh uttered his most passionate appeals; there that the gage of oratorical combat was thrown down. A master of rhetoric, Bradlaugh could be solemn or volatile, grave or humorous, persuasive or denunciatory, pathetic or scornful at will. How magnificently these addresses would have read, only those who heard them hot from his great brain and heart can ever realize. For > that fiery heart, that morning star

> Of re-arisen England, whose clear eye
> Saw from our tottering throne and waste of war
> The grand Greek limbs of young Democracy
> Rise mightily like Hesperus.

Mrs. Annie Besant's name leaps to the mind. How vividly do her speeches come through the mist of the years, recalling the time when she was regarded by the younger soldiers of Freethought as Marie Antoinette was regarded by the youthful Royalists of France. Ladies were scarce on lecture platforms in those tempestuous days; and she was queen of them all. When she chanted the Galilean's requiem, or retold in awed accents the awful story of Bruno's sufferings, the audiences cheered themselves hoarse in their admiration at her consummate oratory. At her farewell address in the old Hall of Science, London, after fifteen years devoted service to the cause of liberty, she made a most moving speech. Some of her audience actually broke down, and men were not ashamed to be seen in tears. For, in those far off days, Mrs. Besant was one of the most fascinating and impressive speakers it was possible to listen to—"O noble music with a golden ending."

Bradlaugh's colleagues were men of exceptional ability. As orators, some of them rivalled their chief, and they richly deserve mention. Charles Watts was a consummate master of language, possessing a most persuasive style. I shall never forget my delight at hearing him again after his return from America, when his lectures were enlivened with witty Transatlantic stories, told with inimitable skill. As a debater, he was, to my mind, easily first of them all, and the reason was that he always wore the velvet glove over his steel gauntlet. He was urbanity itself in such dialectic encounters. Gilded with happy phrases, his speeches sparkled with effervescence and laughter, and became part of the intellectual capital of his audience.

George Foote's speeches and lectures had a literary touch peculiarly his own. His best lecturing period was during the time when he occupied the platform at the Athenæum, Tottenham Court Road. The perorations were wonderful, poetic, and illuminative. The pity remains that they were unreported. Of his published orations, the best is his defence before Lord Coleridge, and, in a far more intimate vein, his oration at the funeral of his dead colleague, Joseph Wheeler. These should serve to show his quality to a younger generation who never had the privilege of hearing the leader at his best. Ever a fighter, the sword was always in his hand. It is difficult to describe the vigour with which he swept off opposition from the field. He was the Prince Rupert of the Army of Progress.

What do we not owe to the fact that Ingersoll's orations were reported, and, in many cases corrected by the speaker? Easily the foremost orator of his generation in America, he flamed the evangel of Freethought over a continent, and, thanks to the reporters, many of his happiest efforts have become part and parcel of the language. In England his reputation is as secure as in his native land. So ardent was his love of Shakespeare that his own orations are enriched by turns of expression caught from the Master himself. Ingersoll's chief claim was his incomparable humour and intense humanism. Who can ever forget his words at Napoleon's tomb? He would rather have been a peasant, worn wooden shoes, lived in a hut, with his wife by his side, and his children on his knees, than have been Napoleon the Great. Recall, too, his beautiful description of a child's laugh—"the laugh that fills the eyes with light and every heart with joy," and puts to shame the "harp strung with Apollo's golden hair." Always, he was the banner-bearer of Freedom—"liberty, a word without which all other words are vain." As one reads, one can almost see the outstretched arm, hear the beautiful and resonant voice. Under the glory of the rhetoric the trumpets ring to battle.

To-day the great Freethought tradition is carried forward by men and women of outstanding ability. They represent a type of public speaking carried to higher perfection than by anyone else. Let us see to it that their happiest efforts do not go unreported. For their life-work is a positive contribution to the conception of a new civilization, a world new-born. Our children's children cannot fail to enhance the estimation in which we regard these standard-bearers of Liberty.

MIMNERMUS.

Whatever mitigates the woes, or increases the happiness of others, this is my criterion of goodness; and whatever injures society at large, or any individual in it, this is my measure of iniquity.—Robert Burns.

Let us have more science and more sentiment—more knowledge and more conscience—more liberty and more love.—Ingersoll.

Religion After the War.

II.

From the day when we awoke to an adult perception of the life of the world we have been aware that the established system of settling international quarrels was barbaric, and might in any year lead to just such a catastrophe. How comes it that such a system has survived fifteen hundred years of profound Christian influence? Whatever we may think of the clergy of to-day, with the more powerful clergy of yesterday, we have a grave reckoning.

If they had directed to war the smallest particle of the ardent rhetoric they poured on disbelief in dogmas which they are to-day abandoning, the public mind would have awakened long ago. There is no intrinsic difficulty in substituting arbitration for war.—Joseph McCabe, "The War and the Churches," pp. 24-47.

In the early days of the struggle we grew accustomed to the reports of enthusiasiic chaplains and others who told us that "contact with the realities of life and death" had brought great numbers of the men of the New Armies back to the faith and practice of traditional Christianity. But after four years of war we are now told, by most interpreters of the signs of the times, that neither the Army nor the civilian population has been to any appreciable extent affected by what has happened since August, 1914.

We lament that our soldiers are not Christian in any vital sense of the word.—Rev. Cyril E. Hudson, "The Nineteenth Century," November, 1918, pp. 880-886.

AT the commencement of the War the Churches declared that the disaster was due to the Materialistic teachings of science. Just before the War, it will be remembered, the clergy, both Church and Nonconformist, were unanimous in declaring that Materialism and Atheism were utterly discredited, and nobody but the ignorant and vicious believed in them any longer. Then when the War broke out they suddenly discovered that the Germans were a nation of Materialistic Atheists! That is just another sample of the utterly unscrupulous methods adopted by the Churches towards those who oppose them. And the falsehood is still being propagated. I take up to-day's Daily Chronicle (November 19th, p. 2), and find an article by Mr. Arthur Mee, entitled "The Churches' Ordeal," in which he declares that "it is Professor Haeckel who helped to sow the seed of the war: it is the Gospel of Materialism according to Haeckel that was supposed to have superseded the Gospel according to St. John.....It is his god of steel that has been set up above all others in Berlin."

We hold no brief for Professor Haeckel. In all the years of our advocacy of Atheism we have never recommended, or even referred, so far as we can remember, to his much-belauded—by many Rationalists—work, The Riddle of the Universe. His use of the word Soul, where he only means Mind, plays into the hands of the religious. The same may be said of the claim that his philosophy of "Monism" provides "a connecting link between religion and science." We do not want any connecting link between religion and science any more than we want a connecting link between science and witchcraft or astrology. His description of Christ as "that noble prophet and enthusiast," so full of the love of humanity," is open to the same objection.

It may be said that Haeckel does not mean by "Soul" and "religion" what the orthodox mean. Well, then, he should not use the words.

But to say that the teachings of Haeckel had anything to do with the preparation or launching of this War is absolutely false. As Mr. McCabe has pointed out in reply to a Catholic writer, Haeckel—

> Is one of the few German professors who have for decades, in spite of the Emperor, drastically condemned the duelling and beer-swilling which sustain the military ardour of German middle-class youth. The influence of the Monists, as far as it goes, is emphatically on the side of humanity. But it does not go far. For a Catholic writer, who knows that there are in Germany about 20,000,000 Catholics and more than 20,000 Catholic priests, to ascribe the conduct of a nation to a few thousand unorganized Rationalists, with no salaried servants, is the depth of fatuity.[1]

In addition to the 20,000,000 Catholics, the Protestant Churches claim 38,000,000 members, and, as Mr. McCabe further remarks, "the only men to stand firmly against the war and condemn its conduct were freethinking Socialists (like Liebknecht). And in the face of all these facts our religious writers would transfer the guilt for the crimes of Germany from its 60,000 organized and professional clergy and their 60,000,000 followers to a scattered handful of Rationalists and less than two million notoriously humanitarian Socialists!"[2]

One would think, to hear some Christian preachers and apologists, that before the Christian era peace was unknown—that Christ brought peace to a warring mankind a peace which continued through the Middle Ages until the modern period, when the Atheists started the fighting again.

The exact reverse of this is the truth. Under the wise and beneficent rule of the Pagan Emperors, the famous Pax Romanum—the Roman Peace, was an accomplished fact. "During a long period of forty-three years," says the great historian Gibbon, "the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius offer the fair prospect of universal peace. The Roman name was revered among the most remote nations of the earth."[3] This was from A.D. 117 to A.D. 161, more than a century and a half before Christianity became the established religion of the State. Gibbon declares:—

> If a man were called to fix the period in the history of the world during which the condition of the human race was most happy and prosperous, he would, without hesitation, name that which elapsed from the death of Domitian to the accession of Commodus. The vast extent of the Roman empire was governed by absolute power, under the guidance of virtue and of wisdom.[4]

Never for a moment has the world been so governed since the establishment of Christianity. And this was accomplished with an army of less than 400,000 men. What would the ancient Pagans think of our armies now? They would declare that their verdict, that the new religion of Christianity was a wicked and debasing superstition, had been justified by the result. After Christianity was established by the Emperor Constantine as the State religion in the fourth century, the Church seized the sword, and used it to coerce other nations to the Faith. Christianity propagated itself by the sword; during the Middle Ages it organized Crusades and Holy Wars, and mail-clad bishops rode at the head of their troops, leading them to the slaughter. "Onward, Christian soldiers!" The Crusades, undertaken by the Church to obtain possession of the tomb of Christ, lasted intermittently for 200 years, and drained the resources of Europe of men and money Millions of lives were sacrificed in the mad enterprise. The Thirty Years' War of the seventeenth century was a wholly religious war: and yet, in spite of all this bloody record, Christians have the hypocrisy to pretend that the present conflict was caused by the teaching of Materialistic Atheism! But nobody is deceived, and the false charges of the clergy rebound on themselves.

Religion: the Loveless and Limiting.

It has more than once been said that the noblest duty of Secularists is to add something to the sum of human happiness. But is it so? Is that conception of duty not even susceptible of extension? Yes, surely. Because if human happiness by itself is to be secured through the pain, suffering, and sorrow of beings that are not human, we desire no share in such happiness.

The whole teaching of Christianity regarding the "brute" creation is based upon the fundamental assumption that the beasts "perish." Man is immortal but (face Dr. David-Smith) his dog may not attain the golden shore. The Bible provides no place in the ambit of human affection for animals. "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" "Doth God care for cattle?" And so on.

And, observe, it is only the elect of mankind—those saved by grace—who have been born again and been washed in the blood of the Lamb who are to have the dubious privilege of walking the golden streets. The rest go with their dogs. There was a custom prevalent in the Highlands among hunting chiefs for their staghounds to be buried beside them—the idea, doubtless, being that man and dog might in some unknown future hunt together in fields Elysian. A Pagan idea and a beautiful one.

How many fair young lives have we seen blighted and withered by a fervid embracing of the "faith once delivered to the saints"! The inhuman precepts of religion have turned the rose garden into a desert. The best thoughts of men are quenched by supernatural inhibitions. What we have got to bear constantly in mind is that these inhibitions were devised and enacted with the definite object of retaining power over the masses. Death was the sentence on those who aspired to eat of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.

Human love is cramped and stunted and prostituted to base ends by the influence of religion. Young people are adjured, with abundance of florid and violent emotionalism, to love One whom they have never met—never seen—never heard—even on the telephone. Lay up treasure in heaven, says the Bible, and where your treasure is there will your heart be also. An injunction based on a sordid idea. The great ones—the wealthiest ones in the world—know well how to work the spiritual hocus-pocus so as to secure their own material ends. In the world that now is the poor may have a superabundance of spiritual nourishment—probably a synonym for the blessings of poverty!

Religion blasts or constricts human love. It is the refuge of cowards, and the destroyer of heroism. No matter what your record has been, if you are willing to be a devoted servant of Mother Church, she will connive at your past; nay, all your transgressions will be blotted out—like a thick cloud! Religion shelters the whining sneak, the slimy slanderer, the shallow-pated but cunning self-seeker. There is nothing big or courageous or free about the manhood that the Church values Blind and servile devotion is only possible to those mentally and spiritually emasculated.

There are so-called Agnostics who have made great names for themselves in the world, but who have bartered their manhood for their positions. There is no use in trying to mix oil and water. The power of religions consists in the power over material possessions. It matters not that eloquent preachers tell us a very different story. Religion makes man little, and it makes him a liar. It is a constricting, limiting, stunting, devitalizing thing. The Churches never rise to the occasion. When Attila is thundering at the gates, they are arguing about rules of precedence and the colour ceremonial robes should be! There is nothing expansive or uplifting or inspiring in religion. It distorts human thought and feeling by insistence on the reality of things unknown and unseen, and ignores the clamant needs of the factual present.

Acid Drops.

A competition for winter evenings might be "Who Won the War?" There seems at present considerable doubt about it. A general impression appears to be that the soldiers and sailors won the War. But Father Bernard Vaughan says that Marshal Foch told him that God won the War. But as God is God of all, and no respecter of persons, it follows that God also lost the War. Then, again, a Parliamentary candidate in our division sticks up a big circular advising people to vote for him because "We won the War." But if God won the War for us, what is the meaning of three millions of our people killed and wounded? And why the deuce did he take over four years to win it? The position is certainly mixed.

Dean Inge, in a sermon at St. Paul's Cathedral, pointed out pathetically that the struggle in the world-war "was not between democracy and monarch, but between Christ and Machiavelli." This view suggests a duel, and not a fight between embattled millions, and, further, one of the antagonists would be nineteen hundred years old, and the other four centuries. We wonder if the congregation smiled at "the gloomy Dean"?

Canon Patrick Rogers, a Catholic priest, of Suffolk, has died from the effects of a fall while walking to church. There is not the smallest sign of a moral in this case; but had the gentleman been a Freethinker there would have been a very solemn one.

The secret of the singular and touching piety of Marshal Foch is out at last. The French Generalissimo has a Jesuit brother, and there can be little doubt that some of the stories of the great soldier have been coloured by the association. How, otherwise, should we know that the Marshal has under his tunic "a little crucifix hanging from a twist of twine."

The public has become accustomed to "potted plays" and "potted literature," and it looks as if the next thing is to be "potted" piety. The Rev. R. Pyke, writing in the United Methodist Magazine, suggests a time-limit for prayers, and criticizes invocations extending over twenty minutes. He complains that some prayers are "actually disquisitions." Mr. Pyke has been fortunate in his researches. Some ministers have the distressing habit of presenting a full and complete summary of the week's news at the Throne of Grace in the hour of supplication.

No less than 19,000 clergymen preached on drink-prohibition on Temperance Sunday. We wonder if all these gentlemen drink lemon-squash or orangeade in private life?

A daily paper states that there is a famine in hairdressers, and that, in many cases, people have had to cut their own locks. Does this herald a return to the tonsorial fashions of the Twelve Disciples?

An officer, says a daily paper, wrote from the East to his father, a North-West London vicar, "The Bishop of London is here, camouflaged as a full colonel." We don't see why this officer should sneer at the Bishop. His is a pantomimic business; the Bishop is simply living up to his part.

According to the Times, German Catholic newspapers foreshadow a complete separation of Church and State, with a stoppage of payment of clerical stipends. We hope this will turn out to be correct. It is no more than a measure of justice, although we feel sure it will be the occasion for a great many English papers to commence harrowing our feelings with stories of brutality to the Church. This occurred in the case of the revolution in Portugal, also with the disestablishment of the Church in France, and later with the abolition of the State Church in Russia. The man whose library is made up of his daily paper kindly forgets to-day what he read yesterday, and so is ready to swallow anything that may come along to-morrow.

The clergy like to turn things to their own account. At a Catholic church at Maidenhead the musical items at a thanksgiving service included "Rule, Britannia."

The star-turn at a special Y.M.C.A. service at the Albert Hall was General Townshend, the hero of Kut. Probably more people attended to see the gallant soldier than to listen to other items in the programme.

The dyer's hand is subdued to the colour it works in, and the dear clergy look at things from a purely (and sometimes petty) ecclesiastical standpoint. Here is the Archbishop of Canterbury saying that the one thing which aroused his indignation during the War was that it had put a stop to the ringing of church bells.

The Star has many good things among its "Asterisks." The following is a brilliant example: "Cardinal Piffl, who says a restoration of the Austrian monarchy is probable, seems well named."

There is quite a Biblical touch in the press announcement that Mr. Joseph Smith, the head of the Mormon community, has passed away. Five widows and forty-two children mourn Mr. Smith's loss. His income was derived from tithes.

Under the heading of "A Happy Conversion," the Daily Chronicle says:—"Formerly a hostel for German governesses, The Swallows, at West Ealing, was opened by the Bishop of Kensington as a home for unmarried mothers." Educationalists will note the delicate suggestion that ladies who have taken the wrong turning are superior to mere governesses.

The Roman Catholics are not far behind the English Churchmen in imitating the pushful methods of advertising so successfully exploited by the Young Men's Christian Association. Recently large display advertisements have appeared in the newspaper press, asking for support for Catholic institutions. It is all vastly entertaining that the agents of "Omnipotence" should be so reduced as to be compelled to imitate the methods of the patent medicine vendors.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle has been saying some plain things about the Bishops—and other things. Speaking of the Bishops, he said: "Bishops may be estimable gentlemen personally, but politically and collectively they are a curse to the country. They have no place in politics. They ought to go back to the Church to which they belong." Another discovery made by Sir Arthur is one that we have dwelt on more than once. This is that "We in this country are more priest-ridden not only than in any Protestant country in the world, but far more than in any Catholic countries." We are priest-ridden, but our national capacity for humbug—where religion is concerned—induces us to pretend it is otherwise. Priestcraft here works by more underground methods—that is all.

Few will quarrel with Oxford University for offering to confer an honorary degree on President Wilson; but this seat of learning is sometimes rather reckless in conferring honours. Some years ago it gave the degree of Doctor of Civil Laws to—General Booth the First.

The religious world is taking to advertising in the press as a duck takes to water. Maybe the results are comforting to the faithful; but to the mere outsider it is a little disquieting to find an impassioned appeal for Sunday observance sandwiched between advertisements of Buggins' Baking Powder and invitations to use Somebody's Cure for Bunions.

With the people, and especially with the clergymen, who have him daily upon their tongues, God becomes a phrase, a mere name, which they utter without any accompanying idea.—Goethe.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

December 8, Leicester; December 15, Nuneaton; December 22, Glasgow.

To Correspondents.

J. T. LLOYD'S LECTURE ENGAGEMENTS.—December 8, Garw.

T. H. GUNNING writes: "Hearty congratulations on your success in bringing the Freethinker safely through all difficulties caused by the war: outsiders can only dimly comprehend the qualities necessary for such an achievement. Although comparatively a recent addition to your readers, I have become truly appreciative of the truths so ably enunciated, and I wish you continued and increasing success in the killing of superstition."

A. F. THORN.—Card received. Hope to see you home soon.

W. B. D.—We don't wish anything of the kind, much as we appreciate the spirit responsible for the desire. We are content to see things going ahead.

W. J. CLEESBY (France).—We are sending a parcel of literature for distribution.

C. L.—We know nothing about it. While we value the feeling indicated by such a move, we hope it will not be persisted in. It will certainly not be with our sanction.

SAPPER RONALD.—Your previous letter never reached us. Probably it was torpedoed. Are we to return the letter you enclosed for our reading? If so, please send full address. The events related are peculiar. We have no doubt that other observers would have reached a different conclusion, and the value of the statement that there was no room for deception depends upon the observer. There is always room for deception, both deliberate and self-deception.

S. W. HAYNES (Durban).—We should be willing to print your article, but as it stands our readers would be in the dark as to what it is all about. It requires some information concerning the local circumstances which led to the article being written. We are returning the MSS.

W. J. BUTCHER.—We quite sympathise with your attitude, but we are bearing in mind other things of which you appear to have lost sight. The end will come soon we expect.

H. J. PORTER.—One day we hope to realize your ambition—which is also ours. Pamphlets are being sent. Thanks.

A. B. HARDY (Edinburgh).—Will this gentleman please send his address to the Editor? We have mislaid his letter.

W. HETSON.—We were not surprised, nor, we note, were you. Writing in the Freethinker for January 10, 1915, Mr. Foote said: "Calumnies fill the air every time Mr. Foote talks of change.....There promises to be much venomous opposition to any sort of change. Mr. Foote will therefore not throw himself into this herculean task until the litigation connected with the Bowman bequest is ended." The "herculean task" was left to us, and it would have been cowardly to have evaded it. And, besides, we knew we could count on the support of the party. For the rest, we did not look for a bed of roses when we took on the posts of President of the N.S.S. and Editor of the Freethinker.

N.S.S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges: "Collection, Birmingham Conference," £1 2s. 6d.

"SCOT."—As you give no address we are compelled to answer you here. We deeply appreciate your action, and also your opinion that "we have done wonderfully well for the Freethinker and the Society during these trying times." But please don't think we are sentimentalizing when we say that it was not a period when one could afford to think overmuch of one's personal interest. The great theory was to revive the movement and place the paper on a secure footing. If we have done anything towards these ends we are content.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Freethought was busy in Wales this week-end. Mr. Lloyd was in Swansea on Sunday, and, we are pleased to say, had capital meetings. Mr. Cohen had a good meeting on Saturday evening at Maesteg, and another good one on Monday evening at Llwynypia, in spite of a torrential downpour. And on Sunday there were two magnificent meetings at Ferndale. The large town hall was well filled in the afternoon and quite full in the evening. Mr. Cohen was in good form, and every point in the lectures was well received by the audience. The two last-named places represent new ground, and there will be good work done there, we think, in the future.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures to-day (December 8) at Pontycymmer. We have no doubt that Freethinkers in the locality will make it a point of being present.

To-day (December 8) Mr. Cohen lectures in the Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate, Leicester, at 6.30. His subject is, "The New World and the Old Faith."

Some time ago one of our readers, Sapper Povall, wrote us on the question of church attendance. Acting on our suggestion, application was made to the O.C. for relief from church attendance. With quite Solomonic judgment, the O.C. decided that the matter should be settled in discussion between the chaplain and the soldier. At the end of two and a half hours' discussion, the soldier was deemed to have so far made his case good, in the opinion of all who listened, that exemption was granted. We cannot say this was the best way of settling the matter—a soldier should be able to demand exemption as a right—but it is a good way. And if all chaplains were put through the same ordeal, we should see things. Imagine the khaki-clad Bishop of London trying to hold his own with a decently educated soldier!

A meeting of all interested in Freethought principles will be held in the City Studio, 3, High Street, Belfast, on December 13, at 7.30 p.m., with the object of forming a branch of the N.S.S. All friends are urgently requested to attend, and those in sympathy with the movement, particularly those in the country, who are unable to attend on that evening are cordially invited to call or write to Mr. John F. Lessels, photographer, The City Studio, 3, High Street, Belfast. We sincerely hope that all Freethinkers, both old and new ones, will see to it that so large a city as Belfast is not left without a representative Freethought organization. Other places in Ireland will follow.

Our contributor, "Keridon," pays his first visit to the Manchester Branch to-day (Dec. 8). He will lecture—afternoon at 3, evening at 6.30—in the Downing Street Co-operative Hall. We hope that Manchester Freethinkers will do their best to see that there are good audiences on both occasions. The lecturer deserves them. Tea will be provided at the hall for those coming from a distance. There will be a selection of music before the evening lecture.

A rush back from Wales on Tuesday morning, in order to see the Freethinker through the press, left the editor with no time to attend to anything but the most pressing matters. A number of letters are, therefore, held over until next week, and acknowledgments of contributions to the Sustentation Fund are also held over. Intending subscribers are reminded that the Fund closes on December 17.

Religion and Life.

BY DR. E. LYTTELTON.

SIR,—I am reluctantly being led to abandon the hope of finding a common intellectual platform of agreement on fundamentals, for we are arguing, or tending to argue, on different planes: and there is no waste of time quite so abortive. It is extremely difficult to indicate even dimly what this means, but I will try. I think it possible that some of our readers may find it easier to understand what I am trying to say than you do. Anyhow, in the hope that this is so, I will ask for the hospitality of your columns for a few more letters, while I continue the statement of what Christianity is.

A word first about Humility. I was aware that there were traits in the character ascribed to Buddha which we should call traits of gentleness, and passages in commendation of such may be culled from pre-Christian writers. But first let me emphasize the fact that the virtue is something vastly more impressive and inexplicable than gentleness or want of arrogance. It is not a negative quality at all, but a wonderful power which springs from self-forgetfulness—the very quality which the Greeks seem not to have recognized at all, and the achievement of which is the most surprising triumph, perhaps, over our lower nature that man has ever reached. The Greeks preached "Know thyself" as a principle essential to a wisely ordered life; and Aristotle, the pupil of the prophetic Plato, drew a sketch of his ideal man, and we find that not only does this personage think a great deal about himself, but a great deal of himself. This differs toto cælo from the Christian conception of self-forgetfulness which I will venture to say is not only an amazing secret of strength but the most beautiful thing in character, except what St. Paul calls agape, to which it is too closely akin to be contrasted. In a Christian country you find instances of that striking simplicity which gives to the orator, the actor, the statesman in council, and the missionary as he preaches a wholly mysterious power. The Christian mystic alone gives any account of it as the fulfilment of Christ's promise to be present with His faithful followers; but the gift of self-forgetfulness seems to be native to others besides the conscious servants of the Master. In the case of many Christians it is not a natural endowment but a triumph of self-conquest, enjoined by Christ in the new command that we are to deny, i.e. ignore, ourselves—the most difficult conceivable, the most unlikely to have been invented by self-indulgent man; the most unpractical, Utopian order ever given; had it not been for two arresting facts (1) Jesus fulfilled His own order to the uttermost; and (2) promised to any who would trust Him that He would give them the power to do likewise.

Now, Sir, I am well aware that this sort of talk must be to you the veriest rhodomontade; and more than that, you are bound by fidelity to your own principles to rate it as rubbish, and doubtless, if you were not too courteous, you would say so. That is because we are not looking at the same set of facts: nor are we reasoning from quite the same set of assumptions.

To take the latter point. You remember I quoted H. Spencer's dictum that all knowledge is a verification of assumptions. It is a remarkable saying, because it was uttered at a time when scientific thinkers poured cold water on assumptions as such. Unless one began by denying that one assumed anything, there was no chance of being listened to by anyone who thought himself—as a great many did—to be a superior person. Subsequently, it was found that without assumptions not only knowledge, but life itself, became impossible: because you might condemn yourself in theory to live only by sensation, but you at once debarred yourself from forming a moral judgment on anybody else's conduct, or even on your own. Thus a reputable citizen who happened to fancy himself an advanced thinker—that is to say, as content to guide his actions by sensation only, because it was distasteful to him to assume the existence of an unseen world—was brought up short when, for instance, his own offspring betrayed unmistakable leanings towards gluttony. He was fain to admit that gluttony in a child is often the precursor of unclean habits in a boy; just as they are precursors of various ugly things in manhood, the Divorce Court or the home for inebriates. But to check the early symptoms he had to draw upon assumptions which not only were outside the area to which he had confined himself, but flatly in opposition to the principles he professed. He had to make an excursion into a region of obscurities where his goings became very unsteady and his voice sounded hollow as he spoke. In other words, he had to act on a moral judgment for which his materialistic principles gave no warrant whatever.

Similarly I conceive that I am throughout expressing judgments based on moral and religious principles, without which the judgment would be nonsense. You, on the other hand, draw all your judgments from a more restricted area; I am not at present able to say whether it is the Materialist's area or one slightly more extended. I should conjecture it is the latter, and the extension beyond the region of matter and sensation would be into the region of some generally accepted morality. For instance, if a correspondent were to send you an article advocating "Free Love," you would refuse it as likely to be pernicious to society: at least, I fancy so. Now, it would not be strange if by the same post another correspondent—a man of sanguine temperament—sent you a disquisition upon the eternal value of Tory principles, or on the desirability for each one of us of spending half an hour daily in brooding upon the higher life. I fancy the former would speedily find its way to the same waste-paper basket as the homily about "Free Love"; but I am not sure what would happen to the latter. It might depend on whether you conceive or deny that there is such a thing as a higher life: a form of existence above ours, as we believe ours to be above that of animals; and as to that I am still in the dark. But, anyhow, your action would indicate that you make certain assumptions dealing with matters extra-sensational: that is to say, drawn from what is sometimes called the unseen world, lying beyond all possible verification through our five senses. That is, I believe, a thoroughly reasonable thing to do, and, for my part, I find myself impelled to do it more and more. But when I engage in discussion with an Atheist, I find that while he invariably uses assumptions of the kind which show he is not a thorough Materialist, he rigidly bars out others drawn from the same unseen world, for no reason that I can learn, except that they are not verifiable by the senses—a reason which, in the other cases, he has discarded. In the case of yourself, or any other editor of a well-conducted and somewhat "advanced" journal, if my conjectures given above are correct, you would assume certain large principles about virtue and human welfare in morals and politics, irrespectively of any verification by the sense; and, what is more to the point, you would assume that there is such a thing as Truth in the abstract, yet in touch, so to speak, with human life; and that one or more of the contributions with which you were favoured was in conflict with this Truth, and, therefore, only fit to be "flung," as a Cornishman would say. In other words, you would, I should say, practically admit that there is a "higher" life; but, at the same time, deny that there is a Personal God. Now, this denial cannot rest on the impossibility of sense verification, because you show that, in the other cases, you disregard it. It appears to me to rest on an exceedingly daring assumption impossible to verify by the senses, or in any other way, the bald, barren, naked dogma that there is no God.

That is how the situation presents itself to me. Doubtless, you will correct my statement where it is incorrect. But, so far as I have gone, it is, anyhow, an attempt to explain why there is a great diffiulty in our arguing on the same level, or looking at the same facts from the same angle of view.

Next time I hope to grapple with the question, nowadays widely discussed, how do we Christians reconcile our doctrine of God with the existence of misery, strife, bloodshed, etc., on the vastest scale throughout the world.

Modern Methods of Salving the "Soul."

V.

(Concluded from p. 622.)

Before I take my leave of the subject I wish to ask Dr. McDougall a few pertinent questions in respect to the "soul."

He pleads "ignorance" of any definite knowledge of it; and well he may, for the word stands for a mere vacuity.

But strange to say that this consciousness of "ignorance" does not prevent him from always alluding to it as if it were the best known of "knowable objects." He surrounds it with a bodyguard of question-begging queries, which have the effect, whatever be his motive, of diverting attention away from this confessed "ignorance," and despite of it, of insinuating a belief in its reality.

Let me therefore put a few questions in turn with the avowed object of directing the reader's attention to the fact which Dr. McDougall apparently tries to avoid—viz., that the term "soul" is an idealess word—a sound or symbol devoid of any ascertained significant meaning; or, if I am mistaken, let Dr. McDougall enlighten us by answering the following questions.

What is the "soul" as a distinct entity apart from "mind"? What is its function? The "ether" metaphor shed not a ray of light; it rather "made darkness visible"—it only exemplified the "divine art of obfuscation" in excelsis.

As he has not supplied a scintilla of evidence of its existence, how is he assured of it? If it be an intuition, why not frankly tell us so instead of buttressing it up with the travesties of argument?

What part is played by the "soul" as distinct from "mind" in the life of the following: an amœba, a worm, an insect, a snake, a cat, or an ape? And upon what evidence or known fact is the answer based?

How does the "soul" of a human embryo differ from that of an infant? Does it vary as it passes through the stages of childhood, youth, manhood, and senile decay? Or is it an *un*changeable entity?

If the former, which "soul" endures after death, and why? If the latter, how does the *im*mutable "soul" adjust itself into co-operation with mutable mind from the impregnated ovum through all its infinite changes till it finally disappears in death?

What relation has the "soul" of an idiot to an idiot's mind? Is its "soul" sane or insane? If the former, why does it not come to the rescue of the idiot during life? If the latter, does the soul remain insane after death?

Again, does or does not the "soul" share in the derangement of "mental structure" in cases of insanity and of cerebral injury? If it does not, why does it not manifest itself and take pity upon its "allied" victim and "come to the breach" with assistance while life lasts? The victim would not, apparently, be one whit worse off if it were without a "soul."

But as we are kept absolutely in the dark as to the attributes and functions of the "soul," possibly "sanity" is not one of its predicable attributes. Will Dr. McDougall condescend to tell us?

Does the "soul" of a genius differ from that of a dull person? If that is so, in what way does it participate in the mental activities of a gifted monomaniac—one, for example, quite sane in, say, a branch of science, and a hopeless imbecile in religion or spiritism?

In such a case, if the attribute be predicable of it, is the "soul's" sanity, like that of the mind's, confined within water-tight compartments; or does it alternate between sanity and insanity as it attends to the sane or insane section of mind? Or, as a possible third alternative, Can the soul be sane and insane at the same instant? For there seems to be no limits or restrictions to the possibilities of this mystic entity.

Where is the "soul" during sleep? Is the soul asleep too? If so, why? Is it subject to the physical fatigue? The mind is, which proves its correlation with the laws of energy. If it is not asleep, why does consciousness vanish till mind returns?

In short, why does it do nothing that is knowable at any period or under any condition during life? And why does it confine all its alleged activities to the time when life is extinct, when it is impossible to obtain any evidence of its doings. Can an essential factor or element of our being be so fantastically worthless and useless during life and likewise so grotesquely absurd after death?

This will suffice for the present, not that the "list" is by any means exhausted; but because I have little or no expectation of receiving any replies to them. For definite categorical statements would be as deathdealing to the "soul" as high explosive shells are to the body. The "soul" must on no account leave the protection of mist and fog. To come out in the open would be fatal. He will therefore, as is invariably the case with omniscient self-proclaimed oracles, adopt an attitude of supercilious silence. Should this forecast, however, prove inaccurate, I await his replies with no little interest.

The Hour-Glass.

It is the quiet hour, and, being in a sweetly contemplative mood, we turn and view our hour-glass. It is popularly supposed to be held by a gaunt old gentleman, who is also armed with a scythe, with which he at the appointed time mows us down. "There is a reaper whose name is Death," etc. We well remember the time when a contemplation of this apparition brought the keenest terror to us; every dark corner was full of terrible possibilities; we were ever in fear of the inevitable. But, thanks to the teachings of Secularism, we are now freed from all these unworthy fears, the saddest burden which poor humanity has to bear. We can now view our hour-glass with equanimity. It is a peculiarity of this imaginary article, through which the sands of time are ever running, that we only see the lower chamber! we can, however, estimate quite accurately the number of grains in the heap as it steadily grows. But the upper chamber is, in the majority of cases, obscured from us. Some have been allowed to peep through this obscurity, but mostly under tragical circumstances. Grand old Socrates saw his small amount of grains when he was handed the cup of hemlock by his tearful executioner; Francisco Ferrer saw the upper glass to be nearly empty when he faced the rifles in the trenches of Montjuich. But with all this, we think it well that we should from time to time remember that the sands are ever running higher in the glass. This will tend to remind us that we should ever be asking ourselves whether we are taking our full part in the emancipation of the race, which we believe can only be accomplished in accordance with the principles of Secularism, which "teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide." We sometimes wonder whether adherents of Secularism fully appreciate the significance of all this. It is an unmistakable profession, in which we conceive all our activities to be essentially limited to this our life between birth and death. This is fully in accordance with science and education. The work of Secularism is being carried on in all sorts of places; we can claim that even the Universities are with us. Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, in his Preface to An Introduction to the Study of Social Problems, says:—

> In a certain sense we may say that the principal function of Universities is the negative function of knocking nonsense out of people's heads and filling the vacuum with orderly habits of intelligent curiosity about the things that really matter, It is never the business of a University to propagate an opinion; that is the function of missions and clubs, of churches and parties. A University exists for knowledge, and, as the Greek philosopher pointed out, knowledge is a very different thing from opinion. A University does not dictate opinion, but trains the mind to scrutinise its prejudices, to dispel its ignorance, and to ground its notions upon a basis of tested knowledge. It opens the doors of hospitality to any honest exercise of thought.

We quote this to show that Secularism is a profession of no mean order. It is in accordance with the great democratic movement which is known as Western Civilization.

Much of this is, however, encrusted with the tendrils of superstition. The Rev. W. Temple can still say from his important position as President of the Workers Educational Association, that "beauty, goodness, and truth are things of the spirit and not at all things of the flesh." Here we have an expression, from high places, of the old barbaric notion of the separate entities of spirit and matter, with its usual laudation of the unknown and its implied degradation of the known, of the very stuff of life with all its handshakes and smiles, aye! and with all its sorrows and tears. The work of the Secularist is clear cut from all this, we must recall men from all these vain illusions. We must ever learn to look, and think, and to more and more understand the world. To understand the world is to love it, it is the home of our race, and it is useless to encourage petty views. We must keep ourselves well in hand and not confuse our idiosyncracies with the outside world. The great river of life will flow on, and posterity will smile at our extravagance; but we venture to think that it will look kindly on our little efforts for its welfare. Our happiness is, of course, purely an affair of this life, our religious friends assure us that life would be unbearable if there were to be no future life in which rewards and punishments will be meted out. This has no basis of proof apart from tradition, it is not supported in any way by modern knowledge. Happiness is best secured by being in accordance with proved knowledge, it is vain to endeavour to square life with imaginary assumptions. Let us rather provide ourselves with the power of happiness, which consists in a proper appreciation of the world. It has been well said that "he who understands the past will not be discontented with the present." Children are usually happy, their future unhappiness is largely the result of wrong teaching; they are taught that their home is not here; their minds are diverted from the real to the unreal, and a false estimate of the world is the result. Let us view the world as we would view a garden which we found in a certain state of perfection. It is capable of much improvement, but much work has been done in it, and it is sacred to us because of this. Our happiness will be best secured by endeavouring to leave it better than we found it. However, we turn to our hour-glass with serenity and view the heap of grains that calmly remind us of our duty, and whether it grows or has about reached its limit we will say with George Eliot:—

> Oh may I join the choir invisible
> Of those immortal dead who live again
> In minds made better by their presence; live
> In pulses stirred to generosity,
> In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
> For miserable aims that end with self;
> In thought sublime that pierce the night like stars,
> And with their mild persistence urge men's search
> To vaster issues. So to live is heaven.
> May I reach that purest heaven, be to other souls
> The cup of strength in some great agony,
> Enkindle generous ardour, feed pure love,
> Beget the smiles that have no cruelty;
> Be the sweet presence of a good diffused,
> And in diffusion even more intense.

The Grave of Keats.

I.

WHERE silver swathes of newly fallen hay
Fling up their incense to the Roman sun;
Where violets spread their dusky leaves and run
In a dim ripple, and a glittering bay
Lifts overhead his living wreath; where day
Burns fierce upon his endless night and none
Can whisper to him of the thing he won,
Love-starved young Keats hath cast his gift of clay.
And still the little marble makes a moan
Under the scented shade; one nightingale,
With many a meek and mourning monotone,
Throbs of his sorrow; sings how oft men fail
And leave their dearest light-bringers alone
To shine unseen, and all unfriended pale.

II.

Oh, leave the lyre upon his humble stone,
The rest erase; if Keats were come again,
The quickest he to blot this cry of pain,
And first to take a sorrowing world's atone.
'Tis not the high magistral way to moan
When a mean present leaps and sweeps amain
Athwart the prophets' vision; not one groan
Escapes their souls, and lingers not one stain.
They answer to their ideals, and their good
Outshines all flare and glare of futile marts.
They stand beside their altars while the flood
Ephemeral rolls on and roars and parts.
It shall not chill a poet's golden blood;
It cannot drown the masters' mighty hearts.

More Popular.

In the preaching of Dr. Fort Newton on the Soldier's Religion, the Daily Mail has found the inspiration of a really humorous leader. It winds up with :—

> He [the British soldier] has shared in the greatest and last Crusade and passed through dangers which it seemed impossible to escape. Is it a wonder that the soldier is religious, and that in the rough language of the soldier whom the preacher quoted : "God is more popular to-day than he has been for a long time" ?

That last sentence betrays the humourist, rough hew him how you will. God is more popular! Think of it! Think of it! After all these years! The Creator of suns, planetary systems, electricity, radium; all these things are interesting enough in their way, but the mere making of these things and the laws that govern them is not enough to make the Creator really popular in the opinion of man and other maggots. In fact, his popularity had reached such a low ebb that, rather than spit on the earth and roll it up into another one, he decided to restore his popularity by a four years' bout of slaughter, lust, cruelty, suffering, grief, and misery. More popular!

Where the Almighty went wrong was over granting man a free wheel. I mean will. So soon as man discovered his own free will he began to go his own gait, and thought more of his own popularity than of God's. The Germans, of course, have overdone the brutality business, and it is more than probable that man's free will will shortly be withdrawn; God having almost entirely regained his lost popularity by means of the somewhat drastic remedy of the War, will shortly make other arrangements in response to the universal appeal of "never again." With the abolition of war his popularity will reach the unaugmentable maximum.

Max O'Rell modestly admitted that the French were the most humorous nation in the world. Oh, that he had lived to hear the great revival of British optimistic religious humour of 1918!

LIFE AFTER DEATH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Since Major Warren mentions my name in connection with Spiritualism, and quotes me as saying that "the phenomena have been proved up to the hilt for any reasonable man," let me say that I added elsewhere "but no evidence is of any use to those who refuse to examine it." Major Warren's letter shows that he is quite out of touch with the subject. The S. P. Research is not, as he seems to imagine, a Spiritualist Society, and could not possibly take up the self-advertising challenge of Mr. Maskelyne. As a matter of fact, if my memory serves, the challenge was taken up by Archdeacon Colley, and Maskelyne entirely failed. I remember reading an account by Dr. Russel Wallace, who had seen both the original phenomenon and the imitation, in which he said that there was no comparison at all between them. But in any case, would Major Warren seriously assert that because a thing can be plausibly imitated by an expert, therefore the thing itself must be false?

The other difficulties raised in Major Warren's letter would cease to trouble him if he read more of the subject, and realized the limitations as well as the powers of psychic phenomena. The other world has its own work to do, and if it interfered continually in ours (presuming that it could do so), we should all become automata.

COAL IN CANADA.

Sir,—In T. F. Palmer's article on "The Dark Diamonds of the Earth" in your issue of September 15, p. 485, it is stated that "British North America has poor supplies of coal." As Canada has one fourth of all the coal of the world, and our Province of Alberta has one seventh, I wish to bring this to your attention. We have coal on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and nearly the whole Province of Alberta is underlain with it. I am writing the Department of Mines, Ottawa, to forward you a copy of their Report. On page 12 you will see the estimate for the Western Provinces is as follows :—

	tons.
Anthracite and semi-anthracite...	769,000,000
Bituminous	242,313,000,000
Sub-bituminous	847,321,000,000
Lignite	86,422,000,000
Total	1,176,825,000,000

As Member for Peace River in the Provincial Legislature, I have made a study of our resources, and am conversant with an area of high-grade coal extending over several hundred square miles. The fixed carbon runs as high as 81 per cent., ash as low as 3 per cent., and moisture 1 per cent., British thermal units 14,500 to 14,750. This coal is a smokeless variety, and the development of this field will be one of the big factors in after-war reconstruction. I hope you will see that justice is done to us in this very valuable resource we have.

Folk-Lore in the Old Testament.

To his monumental work on comparative mythology, The Golden Bough, Professor Sir James Frazer has just added a worthy appendix in Folk-lore in the Old Testament: Studies in Comparative Religion, Legend, and Law.[1] To say that the work is thoroughly well done, is almost unnecessary. But it might easily have been either larger or smaller. It could have been smaller by giving the analogical evidence supplied in less detail, and it would certainly have been larger had Sir James given a complete account of all the survivals of savagery to be found in the Old Testament, which have come down to us in the Christian religion. But for these other evidences he refers his readers to the eleven volumes of his chief work, and those who have already gone through them would probably have complained had they had the same things served up again. Still, as it stands, the work is a mine in which for years students will dig, and never with disappointment at what they find. This time it is the Old Testament. We hope that before long Sir James will issue a companion volume dealing with the New Testament. For the material there is of the same kind; and one very real value of the work of this author, as that of Tylor and others, is the light it sheds on the great enthroned superstition of to-day.

Religion and Savagery.

At the outset it may be noted that Sir James calls his work Studies in Comparative Religion. We may take it that the word has been chosen deliberately. There is no pretence here of saving the face of contemporary religion by calling his work studies in comparative mythology, or comparative theology. The favourite distinction between theology and religion is quite fanciful and wholly false. There is no religion without a theology, there is no theology without a religion. In practice the two things are identical, and the distinction may safely be ignored. All civilized races, Sir James believes, have emerged from a state of savagery, and all civilized races carry with them survivals of their savage origin in the shape of customs, institutions, and beliefs. And prominent amongst these survivals in the civilized world is religion. However refined or disguised, the savage lurks beneath every religion in the world. If we take the Christian practice of the Eucharist, the eating of the body and drinking the blood of Jesus carries us back to the primitive practice of god-eating. The Christian confirmation rests on the initiatory pubic ceremonies still existent amongst savages. The medicine man is the father of the priest, as the belief in an intelligent deity dominating nature has no better ground than the animistic assumption of the primitive savage. There is no need to dig, you need only scratch religion to find the savage. And the life work of Sir James Frazer has no greater significance than this. However much some of his speculations may be questioned the main principles stand proof against all criticism. Had civilization been primitive, religion would never have existed.

Some Biblical Legends—

Sir James Frazer takes his starting point from the first legend in the Bible, the Creation, and he brings to bear upon this a mass of stories from all parts of the world which are no better nor worse than the Biblical one. All peoples have speculated more or less upon the origin of things, and without scientific guidance their speculations have naturally followed the same main forms. Following the Creation comes the Fall of Man, the Mark of Cain, the Great Flood (treated with very great fulness), and the Tower of Babel. All of these Sir James traces to their savage originals, and, working both backward and forward, claims, with justice, that, observing the gaps in the Hebrew story, "it has been left for the comparative method, after thousands of years, to supply the blank in the ancient canvas, and to restore in all their primitive crudity the gay barbaric colours which the skilful hand of the Hebrew artist had softened or effaced." All these stories had already been collated with Chaldean, Assyrian, and similar legends current among semi-civilized peoples; the value of the present book is that it collates them with the much larger group of stories current among uncivilized races. And the significance of this is too obvious for comment.

And Savage Customs.

We have no space in which to deal with the chapters on Primogeniture and Ultimogeniture, with their review of marriage customs and the regulations governing inheritance. These throw a strong light on both social and religious customs, and may form the basis of articles on some future occasion. We have space only for a rapid review of some of the analogies presented by Sir James in the course of his work. We have the struggle of Jacob with the Angel, the drinking-cup of Joseph, the passage through the Red Sea, the Witch of Endor, the test of Drinking Bitter Waters, the boring of a slave's ear as a sign of perpetual servitude, the superstition underlying the command "Thou shalt not seethe a kid in its mother's milk," the sin of a census—for the taking of which the Lord slew thousands of the people, etc. All these and other Biblical stories are placed in their appropriate settings. And exhibited as Sir James sets them forth their air of absurdity disappears. They are seen as part of a group of myths and folk tales that belong to the childhood of the world. And that expression reminds us that Professor Frazer would probably reply that a much smaller proportion of the world's inhabitants have reached maturity than many would imagine.

How to Read the Bible.

Finally, we may remark that Professor Frazer has shown the Christian how to read the Bible. It is always the Freethinker who has done this. In making a fetish of the Bible, the Christian succeeds only in making it ridiculous. He makes it, not a book or a collection of books, but a monstrosity. As the Christian presents it, the Bible is false as history, outrageous as a manual of ethics, and absurd as a text-book of science. He makes it ridiculous, and then seeks to protect an absurdity by penal enactments and social boycott. It occupies a privileged position only because it is the charter of an established religion, the warranty of a caste, the documents on which rest the pretensions of a hundred and one absurd sects and ridiculous doctrines. As the Freethinker would have it, the Bible may be read with pleasure and studied with profit. The childhood of the race, like the childhood of the individual, is interesting and instructive. There is nothing ridiculous in the savage, and there is nothing absurd in childhood. Absurdity commences only when the man attempts to regulate his life by the thoughts of the child, and when civilization insists upon maintaining the view-point of the savage. In the Bible we have savagery at different levels, but the primitive standpoint is maintained throughout. The Bible should be read as a reservation of beliefs and customs, the true analogues of which are to be found to-day among the uncivilized peoples of the earth. Read as it is read by large numbers of people, it is an outrage on common sense and scientific knowledge.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

Sin and Death.

THE Rev. Professor David Smith, D.D., in his Correspondence Column in the British Weekly for Nov. 28, dealt with the following passage submitted by an inquirer: "I have often wondered why contact with a corpse should render a person ceremonially unclean (cf. Numb. vi. 6). In our day our dead are regarded with particular tenderness." Dr. Smith explains that the Jews regarded death as at once the consequence and the penalty of sin, and that such is indeed the doctrine of Scripture. Both in Genesis ii. 17 and Romans v. 12, as well as inferentially in numerous other texts, death is represented as wholly due to Adam's transgression. If the first man had obeyed God, the human race would have been naturally immortal. Because Pelagius rejected this doctrine, and maintained that Adam would have died even if he had not sinned, mortality being a natural law, he was accused of heresy by St. Augustine and St. Jerome, and certainly those two Fathers were fully justified in bringing such a charge against him. Paul believed that until Adam partook of the forbidden fruit there was no such thing as death in the world. The world was young; life had only just appeared; disease was unknown; it is more than likely that when the apple was eaten, neither plant nor apple had died. No doubt the apostle looked upon the creation story as literally true, and on that assumption his view of death might have been literally as well as doctrinally correct. Of course, Dr. Smith cannot ignore the fact that the science of geology has utterly disproved the Pauline doctrine of death, but instead of frankly making that admission, he asserts that "the Jews misconstrued it." As held by St. Augustine and St. Jerome, he propounces it "an untenable notion." Then he adds:—

> Death is no curse entailed by sin, but, as the Stoic philosophers recognized, an ordinance of Nature. It is a natural law, and its operation is universal. The leaves and flowers, the birds and beasts, no less than sinful man, obey it. And it is a beneficent ordinance. "Death," says St. Bernard, "is the door of life." It is not destruction, but transition into a larger, richer, and nobler condition, as our Lord taught when he said, "Except a grain of wheat fall into the earth and die, it abideth by itself alone" (St. John xii. 24). This is the Christian conception.

Now, Professor Smith is distinctly unfair both to the Jews generally and to the apostle Paul in particular. He himself declares the Scripture teaches that death is "the consequence and penalty of sin," but that the Jews misconstrued it because they understood death as "physical dissolution." Well, what else does death mean? Surely, that is what St. Bernard understood by it when he called it "the door of life"; and it is equally certain that Paul used the word in that sense when he said that it entered into the world through sin. But this is how the Professor interprets the Apostle:—

> It may seem indeed as though St. Paul contradicted it (the Christian conception) when, in a much debated passage (Rom. v. 12), he affirms that "through one man sin entered into the world, and death through sin," and again (1 Cor. xv. 22): "As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive"; but what does death here signify? If it be merely the dissolution of the body, then his argument breaks down. For Christ does not exempt his people from death in this sense. All still die, believers and unbelievers alike. But in his magnificent argument on the Resurrection of the Body the Apostle affirms the necessity of the dissolution of the physical organism in order to attain to the fuller life which is the goal of redemption (1 Cor. xv. 36-44); and hence it is evident that it is not this necessary and beneficent process that he means when he says that "through sin death entered into the world." He means not the physical process but its distressing concomitants.

Dr. Smith's exegesis does grievous injustice to the Apostle. Even Dean Alford admits that in Rom. v. 12, death bears the primary meaning of physical dissolution. To Paul death was, in itself, a necessary evil, caused by sin, and nowhere does he speak of it as a beneficent process. In 1 Cor. xv. the theme is Immortality as secured by the resurrection of Christ. The teaching is that Christ, by dying and rising again, robbed death of its final victory, or extracted its sting. By reason of our federal relation with Adam, all must still die, but the Heavenly Man's victory over death makes us all immortal. Some divines believe in conditional immortality only, regarding "all" in the clause, "so in Christ shall all be made alive," as applicable to none but the redeemed. Be that as it may, the blessing which Christianity is said to have brought into the world is conquest over death, and the Apostle joyously exclaims, "Death is swallowed up in victory." Dr. Smith has no right to say of him, "He means not the physical process but its distressing concomitants," nor do the Pauline Epistles contain a single statement which either directly or indirectly supports the following inference:—

> Thus the Apostle's meaning is not that if man had never sinned he would have continued for ever on the earth, but that his dissolution would have been, according to the Creator's design, a natural and easy transition, without grief or apprehension, from the lower condition to the higher, like the passage from childhood to manhood, or the bursting of the bud into flower.

That is a theory which cannot legitimately be fathered upon the Apostle Paul or upon the Gospel Jesus. It finds no endorsement in the New Testament. It is perfectly true that death is just as natural as sleep, and all its "distressing concomitants" are of religious origin. So far as we know, death is the end of individual life, just as sleep marks the end of the day's work. All beyond this is sheer speculation, and cannot possibly be demonstrated. It is only too true, alas, that in Christian phraseology, death never signifies the mere dissolution of the physical organism, but "the gloom and terror wherewith sin has invested that natural, necessary, and truly beneficent process"; but both the gloom and the terror, as well as the sin, are the artificial creation of supernatural religion. Death is not a curse but a boon when it comes naturally, as sleep comes to the tired child. Dr. Smith claims that the Christian conception of death is attested by the teaching of Christ, but the only attestation he cites is the fact that the Gospel Jesus never speaks of his disciples' "death," but always of their "falling asleep"; but that proves nothing at all. Even Lucretius, the disciple of Epicurus, one of the most original, beautiful, and dignified Roman poets, employs similar phraseology. In his great work, De Rerum Natura, Book III., this is how he sings of the final dissolution:

> For thou shalt sleep, and never wake again,
> And, quitting life, shalt quit thy living pain.
> But we, thy friends, shall all those sorrows find,
> Which in forgetful death thou leav'st behind;
> No time shall dry our tears, nor drive thee from our mind.
> The worst than can befall thee, measured right,
> Is a sound slumber, and a long good night.

To Lucretius, as to his master, supernaturalism was a horrible nightmare, of which he did his utmost to relieve his fellow-beings by presenting them with a sane and wholesome outlook upon life, and by urging them to observe the wise counsels of Epicureanism. He was confident that some good had already been accomplished, for he says:—

> So the times change; and now religion lies
> Trampled by us; and unto us 'tis given
> Fearless, with level gaze to scan the heaven.

The Christian doctrine of sin and death has done more to darken and blight human life than all else put together, for under its dominion myriads of men and women have spent all their days in frightful bondage to fear, death being to them, because of their superstitious sense of sin, a veritable king of terrors. They were so instructed as to the nature and consequences of sin that the very thought of death caused them to tremble like a leaf in the wind. They would read: "It is appointed unto men once to die; but after this the judgment." When little children laughed somewhat hilariously they were instantly asked in a lugubrious tone of voice: "What if you were to die to-night? Don't you know that it is a fearful thing to fall (unsaved) into the hands of the living God"? Some of us will never forget the awful pictures of the torments of the damned in hell with which our innocent young days were overshadowed and utterly spoilt. It was the false Christian doctrine of original sin that was responsible for all the gloom and depression that characterized life in Puritan homes. That doctrine is being considerably modified by the preachers and Sunday-school teachers of the present day, and yet it must not be forgotten that in some form or another it still lies at the foundation of the Christian religion and gives a sombre colour to all its dogmas. It will die hard, for when it is gone the ministrations of the pulpit will no longer be needed. What we need above all else just now is to get close to Nature's heart and there commune both with her and ourselves, listening with reverence and docility to Reason's voice as it points out to us the true path of social life.

Swinburne and Some Others.

> Time writes many wrinkles on criticism's clouded brow.
> —Augustine Birrell.

"The true life of a man is in his letters," said John Henry Newman. "Biographers varnish, they assign motives, they conjecture feelings, they interpret nods, but contemporary letters are facts." Yet some letters are the most natural, and others the most artificial of compositions. They may be written with the fear that they may be published, as in the case of statesmen and politicians. But if Newman's remarks are true of any class, they are true of poets and literary persons.

Think of Byron, who is one of the few English poets who have a world-wide reputation. His correspondence is amongst the best in the language, and full of that reckless fun which is one of his surest passports to the attention of posterity. He confesses that his handwriting is as bad as his character. His letters are full of literary quotations always most happily applied. So full of Shakespeare was he that he cannot describe a crush at the opera at Venice without saying that in pushing his way into the building he almost beat a Venetian and traduced the State. Jokes about mothers-in-law are as plentiful as leaves in Vallombrosa, but Byron gets a laugh by saying that his mother-in-law "has been dangerously ill, but is now dangerously well again." The perennial charm of Byron is that he knew the book of the world no less than the world of books. In an age when everybody is bent on saving somebody else's soul, it is a delight to turn to the work of a writer swayed by no worse influence than an easy conscience and a sense of humour.

Matthew Arnold, no mean judge, pronounced Shelley's prose as being superior to his poetry. He was not so far wrong with regard to Shelley's letters, which are simply wonderful. They are not only written in exquisite language, but they reveal the man himself more perfectly than even the incomparable lyrics. Italy has been described by thousands of pens, but Shelley's pen-pictures are among the worthiest. Nor does Shelley confine himself to clouds and sunsets. Byron emerges more truly from his descriptions than from the bulky volumes of Thomas Moore. The letters on Keats form the truest criticism of his brother poet. One must go, of necessity, to Shelley's letters to understand the personality of the author of Adonais, for if he had never written them, or if they had been lost, we should never have known the full powers of his wonderful mind.

Swinburne's letters, which have been edited by Edmund Gosse and Thomas J. Wise, form another case in point. His letters are as natural as his conversations, and throb with his enthusiasms and his objurations. One can hardly imagine Swinburne as a Member of Parliament, although his gift of language might have enlivened and extended political controversy, and added to the revenues of the lawyers. But he was invited to become a candidate by the old Reform League. "I appealed to the man I most loved and revered on earth," says the poet. Mazzini (for it was he) was against the idea, and so Swinburne dismissed the matter. It was not a question of modesty, for Swinburne had as good a conceit of himself as Bernard Shaw. Here, for example, is a pleasant piece of arrogance:—

> I should very much like to see the play of Euripides which contains five hundred consecutive lines that could be set against as many of mine.

Humour is not Swinburne's strong point, but he is amusing in comparing Oliver Cromwell and Frederick the Great. "Trust in Providence," he says, somewhat spoils heroism; to me at least—

> A God-intoxicated man, of course, can fight, but I prefer a man who fights sober. Whether he gets drunk on faith or on brandy it is still "Dutch courage," as the sailors call it. I must say Frederick's clear, cold purity of pluck, looking neither upward nor around for any help or comfort, seems to me a much more wholesome and more admirable state of mind than Cromwell's splendid pietism.

Like old Dr. Johnson, Swinburne was a good hater. He hurled the whole vocabulary of a poet's scorn at anyone he disliked, but his passion was frequently too frothy to last long. His moods alternated. At one time he hailed Walt Whitman as a great poet, and at another he vehemently denounced him with a veritable Niagara of vituperation. He saw very little good in Emile Zola, and regarded L'Assommoir as "the most horrible and loathsome book that ever got into print," which is a statement that makes a judicious critic grieve. Happily, Swinburne's adjectives were not always misplaced. On the whole, few writers have been more generous in their enthusiasm for the best in literature, and he never withheld his tribute to his contemporaries. Victor Hugo, Tennyson, Matthew Arnold, Browning, Charles Reade, Dickens, Wilkie Collins, and hosts of others, evoked his hearty praise no less than the great Elizabethans and the master-minds of literature.

These letters of a real and unmistakable poet entertain and rouse. To read him is like sitting at the poet's fireside, listening to his gossip on books and authors. To woo the world with a soft tongue was not Swinburne's way, and his letters are characteristically outspoken. Swinburne himself, with his nervous energy, his troubled passion, his restless sense of beauty, was, in real life, somewhat too much of a recluse and a bookworm, and this defect is written boldly in his letters. We must leave it at that. It does not in any way detract from his rare and exquisite gifts as a singer, which make him so striking and even unique a figure in the literature of his country.

MIMNERMUS.

Religion After the War.

III.

At once the most crushing and the most appalling aspect of Christianity is the aspect of an apparently Christian nation committing every possible crime, inventing every possible infamy, and applauding itself in every atrocious enterprise as the chosen weapon of God! The whole blasphemous business is so revolting that even the neutral-minded historian will never be able to gloss over its degradation.—"Rita" (Mrs. Desmond Humphreys), "The Wrong End of Religion; 1917; p. 114.

The moans of the dying who have sacrificed their lives on the altar of Christianity are mingled with the prayers of the grief-stricken multitudes in the several fatherlands; and this monstrous human discord is called: The Christian Nations at War. Was there ever such a horrible cacophony in the history of our planet? Never in the annals of Churchanity has there been a carnival of blood and tears to equal it. Never before has the God of War celebrated so great a feast of human bodies—offered up spontaneously by His disciples, the rival Churchaniteers. Glutted with blood, He, the mighty War-God, will quench His thirst with the tears of weeping humanity—the tears which are the first by-product of Churchaniteering Militarism.—W. Bell, "The Exodus From Houndsditch," pp. 165-166.

The most wonderful part of this infernal enterprise (War) is, that each chief of the murderers causes his colours to be blessed, and solemnly invokes God before he goes to exterminate his neighbours.—Voltaire, "Philosophical Dictionary." Article "War."

THE German Army was the only army thoroughly prepared for war. When the frontier fortresses and towns fell like ninepins before the giant guns of their advancing army, and the religious among the Allies turned to God for help, they discovered, with dismay, that the great War Lord, the Kaiser, had made an alliance with the Lord of Hosts.

Nothing has so disconcerted and exasperated the pious among the Allies as the prominent and whole-hearted religious professions of the enemy. Every German soldier bears the inscription "Gott mit uns" (God with us) on his belt. The cry, "God strafe England," was in every German mouth. Strange sentiments, these, for a nation of Atheists, as the religious would have us believe. Every speech of the Kaiser reeked with piety, and he never lost an opportunity of declaring that God was on the German side. He has been compared with the praying Mantis, a beetle which assumes a praying attitude while seeking its prey. The frenzied rage of the pious vented itself by describing the Kaiser as "The blasphemous bully of Potsdam."

France did not call upon God for help. If any nation can be described as an Atheistic nation it is France. They have disestablished the Church and turned the priests out of the schools. We have not forgotten the torrent of abuse from the religious and Conservative Press in this country over these proceedings, coupled with the prediction of speedy vengeance from an angry God—a prediction which seems to have missed fire. Or perhaps God arranged for the defeat of France in this war; but, as on another occasion, recorded in the Bible, the enemy was too much for him. For we read (Judges i. 19) that the Lord was with Judah, and drove out the inhabitants of the mountains, "but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valleys, because they had chariots of iron," the "tanks" of those days.

Our clergy called on the Lord for help, and they claim that he responded with the "Mons angels," at a very early stage in the War. Since then nothing has been heard from him.

Since the War began, the clergy, while attributing the origin of the War to the Atheism of Germany, have been discreetly silent as to the Atheism of France, about which they used to be so eloquent. If France had been fighting against us, then we should have heard something about it—"not arf," as the vulgar say.

But ordinary people will not fail to note that infidel France was victorious over the loudly declared religiosity of Germany. We append a few extracts from the Kaiser's speeches: they are characteristic of them all:—

God's goodness will guide the German people through battle to victory—to the goal appointed for the German people by Providence.—December 19, 1914.

Germany knows her strength, and she relies on God's help.—July 31, 1916.

All Germany contemplates with pride her brave sons whose deeds, with God's help, will be a landmark on the road to final victory.—December 6, 1916.

If only we cast our burden on the Lord He will smite the foe, hip and thigh, as He did Amalek, the prototype of perfidious England.—March, 1917.

U-boats are not going to rest until the enemy is beaten with God's help.—November 16, 1917.

The year 1917, with its great battles, has proved that the German people has in the Lord of Creation above an unconditional and avowed Ally, on whom it can absolutely rely.—December 22, 1917.

The German people, convinced of its just cause, resting on its hard sword, and trusting in God's gracious help, has confronted a world of enemies.—August 1, 1918.

Remember that you are the chosen people! The Spirit of the Lord has descended upon me because I am the Emperor of the Germans! I am His sword, His Agent. Woe and death to all those who oppose my will! Woe and death to the cowards! Let them perish, all the enemies of the German people! God demands their destruction; God, who by my mouth, bids ye do His will!

As Professor Gilbert has pointed out:—"Very frequently and explicitly the Kaiser avows his Christian faith. No other ruler in history has publicly declared his faith so often as he has done. He preaches, he brings religion into his addresses to military and naval recruits, he takes a prominent part in the dedication of churches, he is concerned for the religious education of the young, he assures his people that not a morning or evening passes without a prayer by him on their behalf, and he concluded his address to the residents of Berlin at the outbreak of war with a solemn command to go to their homes and pray."[1] The same writer also observes, the Kaiser "has given common currency to a warlike and nationalistic designation of God in the term 'the great Ally.' And again: "When speaking to the recruits in Berlin, in November, 1897, the Kaiser said, 'He who is not a good Christian is not a brave man, and is no Prussian soldier,' for the highest qualities of a Christian are 'self-control and self-abnegation,' the latter quality being identical with 'unconditional obedience and subordination' to those who are appointed over one.'"[2] The Kaiser being evidently of the opinion of Constantine, when he adopted Christianity as the State religion, to use the caustic comment of Gibbon: "The throne of the Emperors would be established on a fixed and permanent basis if all their subjects, embracing the Christian doctrine, should learn to suffer and obey."[3] The Kaiser has been charged with hypocrisy; but there is not an atom of evidence to prove that he is acting a part, or that he does not really believe in what he preaches. On the contrary, all the evidence goes to prove that he does. For we are told by those acquainted with his private life, of his morning and nightly devotions. Even in his bed-chamber, where he is secluded from the eyes of the world, and pretences may be laid aside, the Bible lies on a table beside his bed so that he can console himself with it in his waking moments.

Moreover, we have the conclusive testimony of the Archbishop of York as to the Kaiser's spiritual fervour; for, as Mr. Temple complains:—"His Grace of York thought it seemly and fitting to dilate in public on the spirituality of the Kaiser as revealed in private conversation with himself."[4] And if an Archbishop is not an expert upon such a matter, we should like to know who is.

Our clergy called on God for help, but the English people put more trust in the Navy than in all the God's ancient or modern, and the results have amply justified their faith. The attempt of the Church to exploit the War with the mission of repentance and hope, was an acknowledged and unmitigated failure. The people would have none of it.

Now that Germany is definitely beaten, people will reflect that, in spite of her loudly vaunted alliance with God, she has been defeated by infidel France and her Allies, and they will draw the obvious inference that it is better to rely on yourself than rely upon God.

Another loss sustained by religion during the War is the breaking down of the sacredness of the Sabbath. In response to the request of the Government, the Church grudgingly granted permission—many of the clergy vehemently protesting—to believers to work on Sundays for food production on the allotments. Many thousands who, before the War, would not have dared to risk public odium by Sunday work, have taken advantage of the situation, and it is safe to say, they will never go back to the old rigid Sunday observance again. Still worse—from a religious point of view—in spite of the moans of the clergy, the Americans have been publicly entertained with baseball, and boxing matches have been promoted for their recreation on the same day. Moreover, some of the most strenuous fighting of the War has taken place on Sunday. That is another religious barrier broken down.

Acid Drops.

Father Bernard Vaughan once distinguished himself—as a Christian priest—by asserting that it was our duty to go on killing Germans. This may have been true enough, but it scarcely seemed the function of a man whose mouth was full of the Gospel of love and brotherhood to say it. From the brief report of an address before the Guild of Glaziers, we see that he is now in great fear lest the ex-Kaiser should not be executed—which shows stupidity as well as vindictiveness—and vindictiveness is always stupid. Really, the most cruel punishment would be not to kill William, but to restrain him from further mischief, and keep him alive. If punishment is aimed at, there could be no more severe form than this. The cry of "Hang the Kaiser" is the cry of the unthinking mob, and many who join in it are quite consciously playing to the mob. To suffer one must live, to atone one must live. To die is to end suffering, and Father Vaughan is too vindictive to desire an end to the ex-Kaiser's sufferings.

Father Vaughan says, "He boasted of being the All-Highest, and therefore he could at once have stopped, as well as started, the war." The crude sociology of the thing is appalling. But Father Vaughan believes in a God whom he affirms is the real "All-Highest." And he could certainly have stopped the War, or prevented the War ever starting. What does Father Vaughan propose in relation to him? If William of Hohenzollern deserves the scorn of all honest men and women—and we should be the last to question this, though we have too much contempt for our modern kings to be vindictive—what does Father Vaughan's "All-Highest," who might have controlled the Kaiser, deserve? Hang the Kaiser for causing the War, says Father Vaughan, but praise God for not having prevented it! Whose, now, is the greater guilt? Perhaps Father Vaughan will tell us.

Christians say that the streets of the New Jerusalem are paved with gold, and they manage to get hold of a lot of money in this vale of tears. The American Young Men's Christian Association asserts that it has received subscriptions to the amount of £30,000,000; and the more modest British branch has expended £2,500,000. The Church of England is trying to raise £5,000,000. Yet the founder of the Christian religion was sold for thirty pieces of silver.

The value of prayer is always emphasized by the dear clergy—when they are addressing their congregations. In actual life they take no risks themselves. The sandbags, which were placed in Westminster Abbey as a protection against air-raids, are now being removed.

The merry birthday of the Man of Sorrows will be shorn of some of its delights this year. The old-time Christmas pudding cannot be managed as there is a shortage of currants, raisins, and sultanas.

The War was God's War, shrieked the Bishop of London. We were out to end war, said other reverend gentlemen. So we read that as the War was to end war, a new ammunition combine is to be formed in this Christian country with a capital of over fifteen millions. Presumably, they will go in for firework-making as a means of paying dividends.

Cardinal Bourne is quite certain that the "Finger of God" is to be seen in the Allied victory. We hope the same finger will be equally busy in preventing trouble between those who have won the War, and if the "Divine Finger" is not heavy enough, then the whole divine anatomy might plump itself down on the armament rings in the Allied countries, and on the new race in armaments that appears to be developing between various countries. After so much cant about "moral force," it is surely only fitting that the civilized world should rid itself of the constant incitement to war arising from the existence of huge armies and navies.

The Church Times, in noting the Labour meeting at the Albert Hall on November 30—it ignores the Sunday meeting with true Christian hypocrisy—asks plaintively, "But where were the clergy?" It finds "something alarming in such a gathering without religion having a place," and we concede the ground for apprehension. It remarks that the workers have a religion of their own; but as it points out that the chairman, George Lansbury, confessed to being "one of the few men in the movement who has retained faith in religion," what is left does not appear of a very robust quality. The truth is that the last few years has led thousands in the Labour Movement to realize that the less they have to do with Christianity the better. Freethought is coming to its own there as elsewhere.

The Church Times says there seemed to be an absence of clear thinking on the part of some, else why so much enthusiasm for the present tyranny of force in Russia? We must remember that the Russians have disestablished the Church, and that is quite enough to antagonize the Church Times. One ought to remember the campaign carried on in the English Press when the Portuguese Republic was established a few years ago. Then, too, we had carefully prepared accounts of the tyranny of a few, etc. Freethinkers will certainly not forget the way the Press was "worked" against France in pre-War days on account of its secularizing policy. What is going on in Russia, no one knows. As we are living with a muzzled and Government-controlled Press, we are not likely to know for some time. We lost our freedom of the Press to win the War, and we are to do without it, apparently, to keep the peace.

"God" appears in quite unexpected and unnecessary places. The London Chamber of Commerce, in a circular to its members, dated November 23, 1918, records the passing of the following resolution:—

> That the Council of the London Chamber of Commerce places on record its heartfelt thankfulness to Almighty God on the success of the Allies and the United States in bringing the war to a victorious end.

"Almighty God" must feel flattered on receiving the congratulations of the London Chamber of Commerce, but we think that the Chamber would have been much better occupied attending to its own affairs, and thus avoid offering a gratuitous impertinence to many of its members. We believe that a protest has been made, and although it was too late to prevent this particular stupidity, the protest may serve a purpose by preventing its recurrence.

"God" is also taking a hand in the Chiswick election. At least the Vicar of St. George's, Brentford, says he has a conviction that God had raised up the candidate, Colonel Grant Morden, to help rebuild this mighty empire. So the Kaiser's God upheld the German Empire. So others affirm that God upholds the British Empire. So, still others, on the "divine mission" of this or that nation. Is it any wonder that our political life is what it is when so many of our public men are so little removed from the level of savages in the substance of their thinking. And if the Vicar of St. George's is right, everyone who votes against Colonel Morden will be opposing God. The political fool is bad, so is the religious fool, but when we get a combination of the two, the outlook is poor indeed.

Religious instruction in public schools is one of the main topics on which the "hecklers" in Bellshill (Glasgow) bombarded their Parliamentary candidates. Unfortunately, neither candidate would satisfy the aspirations of Freethinkers in this respect. The Coalition candidate is quite satisfied with the present arrangement, and the Labour candidate says he does not wish to raise sectarian matters at this Election.

Is it an indication for good or for ill of the Secular Cause in South Shields that the two candidates, official and unofficial, both held forth to enthusiastic audiences on the Lord's Day? Last Sunday no less than three great mass meetings, two indoors and one out, took place, and the intelligent and worthy electors seemed quite oblivious of what is ordinarily meant by the Sabbath.

God, says Dr. Clifford, sends pastors and teachers for the Churches and statesmen for the nation. All we can say is, "Look at 'em!" Of course, if God does send them, it explains a lot and excuses a lot. Hitherto we have blamed the people for having selected them. But if God sends them, we can see it is not their fault. God sends them. God save them! And God help the rest of us.

Among the things which Dr. Clifford says the nation needs for the new Parliament is "The abolition of theological and ecclesiastical tests for State teachers, the removal of sectarian teaching from the rates." We don't think that Dr. Clifford quite says what he means. Read literally, it should mean complete secular education in the schools. But Dr. Clifford does not, we think, mean this. His removal of sectarian teaching would allow the retention of a form of Christian teaching that suited all Christians. As though Christianity is not in itself a sect in this country, and as though its retention in the schools is not an endowment of sectarian teaching.

A Christian World writer remarks that when the Jews get back to Palestine, there is no reason why the Jews "should not be able again to give the world a distinctive civilization." What we should like to know is, when did the Jews give the world a distinctive civilization? The Greeks did, the Romans did, the Egyptians did. But there never was a distinctive Jewish civilization, and we venture to say there never will be. The only distinctive thing about the Jew to-day is his religion; and once the pressure of Christian bigotry is removed, his religion is hardly worth a century's purchase.

The attitude of the clergy towards advanced thinkers is often amusing. In a life of Canon Barnett, written by his wife, it is stated that Herbert Spencer was one of the party that went with the Canon to Egypt in 1879. The Canon's impressions of the great philosopher are characteristic. "Herbert Spencer," he wrote, "has a world-wide reputation, and is looked up to by some clever people as their great light. I have not read his books; I found them alien and dull." Is it not delightful? And the writer who confessed that he found Spencer's books "alien" and "dull" without reading them was not a common or garden curate, but a Canon of the Church of England.

The Bishop of Southwark is one of the vice-presidents of the National Society for Combating Venereal Diseases. An advertisement issued by that body is headed: "An Enemy which Knows No Pity," and refers to the ravages caused by such diseases. Does the Bishop endorse this delicate impeachment of Providence?

Providence cares as much, or as little, for churches as for other buildings. In March last the church of All Saints, St. Ives, Hunts, was damaged by an aeroplane, and the cost of restoration is estimated at £7,090. There are only 3,015 inhabitants in the little town, so the church is a somewhat expensive luxury.

Mr. Kennedy Jones suggests that much of the industrial trouble is caused by indigestion from bad cooking and feeding. As Ingersoll associated indigestion and religion, we may look forward to a revival on a large scale.

The "Freethinker."

A New Year "Push."

EVER since the signing of the Armistice I have been receiving congratulatory messages on the Freethinker having so successfully pulled through the War. I think we all have reason to congratulate each other on that. We have all fought together, and we have all triumphed together. Not that our troubles are yet over; we have only seen them at their worst. For some months there will be no decrease in the cost of production, although there will not be the same anxiety about supplies.

But, in addition to sending me congratulatory letters, many have written expressing a desire that Freethinker readers should have an opportunity of giving their appreciation of what I have done—"a substantial form"—in the shape of some personal testimonial. It has also come to my knowledge that letters have passed, and some steps have been taken to give this desire a concrete form. I discovered this quite by accident, and it leads me to say what I am saying.

In the first place, I have no desire that anything of the kind should be done; more, I desire that it should not be done. As some of my friends know, I have big designs ahead, and it will be time enough for any general expression of public appreciation when the Freethinker has been placed upon a thoroughly self-supporting basis. When that has been done, and when there has been created a really strong Secular Society in the country, something tangible will have been accomplished. Until these things are done we must all keep up the struggle with all the vigour we possess. And the only expression of appreciation for which I ask is co-operation in realizing these aims.

But the desire to which I have referred emboldens me to suggest a way in which a good lift may be given to help the Freethinker. In three weeks' time we shall be issuing our New Year's number, and commencing our thirty-ninth volume. For a Freethought journal that in itself is an achievement. No other journal in this country has had so long a life, and none have lived with greater distinction.

Now this New Year's number may be made the occasion of giving the Freethinker a good lift forward. Nearly everyone of my readers will know someone who does not read the Freethinker, but who ought to read it. For that one week I want each of our readers who will to see that this new man, or woman, gets it. I want several thousands of our readers—the more the better—to order one extra copy of the "Freethinker" for January 5, and post it to a likely subscriber. The cost to each will be twopence-halfpenny, and it will be a useful New Year's gift to Freethought; as for myself, I will gladly take that as a welcome expression of appreciation for anything I may have done during the War period.

This is a simple, an easy, and an inexpensive way of lending a hand. So far as the office is concerned, care will be taken to make the issue for January 5 an extra good one, and it may even be enlarged for that one week. But on that point we cannot yet be certain. Still, the issue will be a very readable one.

The effect of several thousand copies of the Freethinker finding its way into new hands in one week is certain to be good. But the copies must be ordered beforehand, otherwise they will not be obtainable. Our circulation is still mounting, but the bigger the circulation the better.

Remember, it is the issue for January 5, 1919, that must be ordered, and the Order should be placed with the Newsagent not later than December 21. A wrapper and a halfpenny stamp will do the rest.

Each copy of the Freethinker so sent will reach a new reader, and we shall be surprised if in a large number of cases he does not rise up and call the sender "Blessed."

CHAPMAN COHEN.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

December 15, Nuneaton; December 22, Glasgow.

To Correspondents.

R. CHAPMAN.—Mr. Cohen is pleased to learn that your Branch desired to express its continued confidence in his Presidency of the N. S. S. The confidence and support of the members of the Society is all Mr. Cohen desires in the pursuit of a common labour, and it is gratifytng to him to know how very general that support is. Sorry to hear of Mr, Shiel's death.

L. ERENBERG.—No one who knows anything of the superstition of the Russian peasantry would be surprised at what you say. The power of the Russian czars rested on the ignorance of the people, and ignorance and superstition are two sides of the same thing.

W. P. ADAMSON.—Have sent your candidate some literature and information. The poor man probably is ignorant of the facts—hence his qualification for Parliament.

W. E. C.—You may rely on our treating your letter with the utmost confidence. A long and strong pull on one's self, with occupation in some form of mental work, is the best antidote.

T. OWER.—We don't blame God for anything. It is the Christian who saddles him with the responsibility. All we do is to point the moral of the religious hypothesis.

G. B. TAYLOR.—We are hoping for great improvements as conditions approach the normal. At least, things should be easier. We haven't gone grey over it, but that might have happened.

N.S.S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges: H. Reeve, 3s.; Fred. Hall, 10s.

STOKER W. PALMER.—Pleased you find the parcel of literature useful. We will send more if necessary.

F. BETTS.—Certainly there should be a branch at Northampton. We hope you will succeed in forming one. Will use MS. if possible, but have little space, and piles of unpublished articles.

F. INGHAM.—My People and Capel Sion are published by Melrose, price 5s. See "Views and Opinions" for other matter.

WELL-WISHER.—We quite appreciate the motive underlying your suggestion, but names become assets in the course of time, and the thing is not so simple as many imagine. However, we always welcome suggestions from readers, whether it is possible to act on them or not.

J. WILLIAMS.—It is help such as yours that carry the greatest encouragement. Shall we arrange for your having the paper regularly? Please let us know if it will help in any way.

R. L. M.—We quite agree with your comment, as you will see from this week's issue.

B. DUFREE.—It is simply untrue that Horatio Bottomley was ever invited to become President of the N.S.S., or that he made application for the post on the death of Mr. Foote.

A SCOTTISH CORRESPONDENT writes:—"Are Freethinkers doing all they might do in airing their legitimate grievances during the present Election campaign, or are they more interested in their politics than in their Freethought principles? Some Freethinkers are refraining from asking questions relative to Freethought because they might jeopardize the chances of their candidates."

H. LANCASTER.—We vrry much regret to hear of Mr. Wilson's death, and feel sure he deserves the good things you say of him. Please convey our sympathy to all concerned.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (December 15) Mr. Cohen lectures twice in the Palace, Queen's Road, Nuneaton. We hope that all Freethinkers will do their best to induce a Christian friend to accompany them to the meetings. The meetings are at 2.45 and 6.30.

Next Sunday (December 22) Mr. Cohen visits Glasgow, and lectures there, 12 o'clock and 6.30, in the Burgh Hall, Hamilton Crescent, Partick. The usual meeting-place is not available on this occasion owing to the hall being taken by the Government. However, trams run to the Burgh Hall, the stopping-place being Peel. Journeying from London to Glasgow is no holiday task nowadays, and advertizing is very costly, so we are asked to request Glasgow Freethinkers to do their best to make the meetings well known among their heretical and religious friends. There will be music before the evening meeting.

We are not replying at length this week to Dr. Lyttelton's article in our last issue. This is not from any discourtesy to our able and courteous critic, but because we feel there is much in his contention that as it is almost impossible for us to agree on fundamentals, we are, therefore, arguing on different plans, and, under such conditions, discussion is apt to be wordy without being either enlightening or conclusive. Moreover, as Dr. Lyttelton promises to deal with the question of the way in which "we Christians reconcile our doctrine of God with the existence of misery, strife, bloodshed, etc., on the vastest scale throughout the world," we feel that we may let the discussion rest where it is, until this justification appears. We can then deal with the question at length.

Now that the War is over, the Glasgow branch, N.S.S., is entering upon a campaign to increase its membership. Lapsed members are earnestly requested to renew their connection. All Freethinkers are welcomed to the regular meetings of the Branch, which are held every Sunday at noon in the Good Templars' Halls, Ingram Street, Glasgow. Quite a number of young ladies have joined recently, but but the Secretary is still open to receive many more applications for membership.

We are constantly receiving complaints from readers who are unable to get their copy of this paper delivered from their newsagent. We are doing what we can from this end to bring pressure to bear, and earnestly ask our friends to do what they can to set matters right. They should insist upon a regular delivery; and if failure to do this meant a transfer of custom for all papers, we have no doubt greater care would be shown in giving a regular delivery.

We venture, once more, to remind intending subscribers to our Sustentation Fund that the closing date is December 17. That is the day on which we go to press and remittances for the final list must reach us by the first post of that date.

"Freethinker" Sustentation Fund.

This Fund closes on December 17.

The Curse of the Church.

THE Church, as an institution which presumes to decide what is true by majority vote, and uses its power to reward obedience with wealth and honour and office, and to punish objectors with poverty and ostracism, is a curse to the world.

There is no tangible thing corresponding to the word Church any more than to the word State. When a number of men assemble and by majority vote decide that something pertaining to politics shall be done, this assembly is called the State. When a number of men assemble and by majority vote decide that something pertaining to religion shall be done, that assembly is called the Church. But there is no such identical thing as the Church or the State.

It would be well if everybody could understand this, for it would then be plain that such words as Church and State are merely convenient expressions for shifting responsibility from individuals to an alleged something that does not exist.

For example: a custom-house officer examines a traveller's baggage and either steals his goods or makes him pay something to be allowed to keep them. The custom-house officer is no better than a common thief, but he satisfies his conscience by the thought that he is an officer of the State.

But when you clearly understand that there is no such entity as a State, and, therefore, that the custom-house officer is simply a person employed by a number of other persons to rob travellers, you also understand that he is nothing but a common thief. In Italy there are bandits, and in England we also have bandits, only we call our bandits protectionists. We appeal to the superstition of the people by throwing over our bandits the sacred name of the State, the stealing is called collecting customs duty, and what is a crime in Italy becomes a virtue in England. To say that this stealing is done by the State deceives nobody but the ignorant and superstitious, for you can be robbed only by a man. Start out to hunt for the State, and see if you can find anything but a politician and his underlings—and a politician is generally and almost necessarily a man beside whose true biography the life of Dick Turpin would be a Sunday-school book.

And what is true of the State is true of the Church. Certain parsons and laymen meet together and decide by majority vote to do certain things, and then to escape responsibility declare that the Church has done everything.

In the first place, this imaginary thing called the Church is a curse to the world, because in its name both parsons and laymen will be guilty of crimes that none of them would commit on his own hook. Just as a hangman, who, on his own hook, would not kill a sparrow, will, in the name of the State, kill his neighbour—so a parson, who, as an individual, would not lie or treat anybody unkindly, will in the name of the Church, subscribe to statements he does not believe and cruelly cut his best friend. Where is there a creed that expresses the honest personal opinions of the men who either made it or subscribe to it? There is not one; and this means that a few hundreds of parsons and laymen will assemble, and in the sacred name of the Church, declare that they believe what no single one of them believes. For themselves they may be truthful enough, but for the Church they will lie. And, consequent on the steady advance of Freethought, there are very few parsons nowadays who would say to one who differs from them in opinion: "Depart, sir; you are a heretic, and therefore unfit to enter my house or sit at my table." But they will assemble at some synod and excommunicate a man whose only offence is that he will not subscribe to a creed that he does not believe. In their private relations they are kindly, but in the sacred name of the Church they are as cruel as Calvin's God.

In the second place, the Church is a curse to the world because it tries to paralyse the brain. It forbids men to reach conclusions contrary to the statements of the Creed, notwithstanding that no thinking person in the Church really believes those statements. The moment a parson begins to openly question the creed and honestly state his doubts, that moment he begins to be treated like a criminal. Promotion becomes impossible for him. He is left off all committes, and receives the cold shoulder. He is regarded with suspicion, and treated as a disturber and a traitor. More than one honest parson has died from such unmerited contumely, coldness, and ostracism.

A parson may be intelligent, devout, and stainless in his character and life, but if he is driven by his reason to conclusions contrary to the Creed, he is doomed to suffering, to poverty, perhaps even to death—doomed by the Church which professes to wear the garments of an angel, but scratches with the claws of a cat.

On the other hand, a parson may be intellectually feeble, mechanically conventional in his piety, weak in character, and unsavoury in reputation; he may be a moral coward and harsh in nature; he may have an impure mind and gross instincts; but if he is orthodox, any position in the Church is open to him—he can become a father in Israel, living in luxury and dying in all the odour of sanctity.

In short, the Church is a curse to the world because it rewards mediocrity coupled with conformity, and punishes superiority coupled with independence and originality, thus paralysing all the advance it can. The direct and necessary result of this policy is to make parsons mentally dishonest, and I have no doubt that with the possible exception of politicians, no class of men are more dishonest in their public utterances than parsons. The constitution and necessities of the Church are such that every parson must be either a fool or a knave; for he must either have no doubts, in which case he is a fool, or he must conceal his doubts, in which case he is a knave. Many good parsons have, no doubt, convinced themselves that it is right for them to conceal their doubts, on the plea that truth is dangerous unless generously mixed with error. They believe that it is their duty to God and man to be hypocrites, and so they are conscientious knaves, but all the more dangerous for that very reason.

Moreover, the Church is a curse to the world because it energetically bolsters up a false system of morals, and by doing so harbours and clothes with respectability some of the vilest people, while it denounces and vilifies some of the best and purest people, as well as many who are not so very good, but who are certainly not so bad as some of its prominent members.

A Freethinker, though he conform his life to every precept of the Sermon on the Mount; though he be true to his friends and love his enemies; cannot belong to the Church. But a Calvinist, though he rule his children with a rod of iron; though he be false to his friends and vindictive to his enemies; though he violate every maxim of the Sermon on the Mount; can. A common prostitute cannot belong to the Church, but a young woman who in legal prostitution sells herself to a rich old man, can. A common murderer cannot belong to the Church, but a hangman can. The hand that adjusted the noose and pulled the lever on Saturday can take the Communion bread and wine on Sunday. The most ignoble criminals in this country are the men who are deceiving the workers by misleading articles in the subsidized Press while they are robbing them wholesale by "profiteering," who are starving them by keeping them from the free use of the land, and by limiting the supply of banking facilities; and these men are all members of the Church, or may be.

The Church wants God in the constitution, but it cares nothing for justice in society. It wants the Bible in the national schools, but it cares nothing for the Golden Rule in business. It says we must not break the Sabbath, but it does not say to the greedy capitalist: "You must not break that poor woman's back over a sewing machine." It tells you to worship Christ, but if you try to follow his precepts it will persecute you. It tells the workers to be thrifty and contented instead of telling their exploiters to get off their backs. It tells the idle rich to be charitable instead of telling them to stop robbing the workers. It encourages the suppression and imprisonment of reformers instead of studying and trying to answer what they have to say. It points the eye of faith to a future world of everlasting bliss, but encourages the hand of the profiteer to lay up treasures in this poor vale of tears. It preaches the blessedness of poverty, while its high priests revel in the luxury of wealth. It loves respectability much more than righteousness, and hates social obscurity worse than sin. It is intrinsically and necessarily bad. It cannot be reformed. It must go!

Arnold Bennett.

Many of us must have rubbed our eyes with astonishment when, a few weeks before the end of hostilities, it was announced that Mr. Arnold Bennett had been called to the Ministry of Information. To any one who knew what a Government department was like, the fact that our rulers had ever heard of the existence of Mr. Bennett, let alone that they should have decided to trust him with so important a branch of war-work as publicity and propaganda, must have appeared to signalize the end of an epoch.

Mr. Bennett is, with the solitary exception of Mr. Thomas Hardy, the greatest living writer of English fiction. He stands above Mr. Hewlett and Mr. Wells—his two closest competitors—by his freedom from the one's slight affectations in style, and from the other's recurrent tendency to caricature. It is a sign of the times that all these four first-rate novelists are Freethinkers. Each one of them is certain to be banned by any orthodox religious family as "unpleasant"—the best compliment that the orthodox religious public are able to pay to any writer. Yet, with all their community of thought, these writers are curiously contrasted, particularly Mr. Hardy and Mr. Bennett. Both are Rationalists and Monists to the core; but while Mr. Hardy's outlook on life is mainly pessimistic, Mr. Bennett is an aggressive and infectious optimist. He gives the impression of enjoying life, even at its worst; and he nearly, even if not quite, succeeds in making you enjoy it too.

Mr. Bennett stands at the head of the small group of novelists and playwrights, among whom the late Stanley Houghton was the principal of the lesser lights, whose function it has been to give literary expression to the life of the industrial north. To us southerners—I speak as one who is bound by iron chains to the metropolis, and whose visits north of the Trent have been few and fleeting—this literary movement has been a delight and a revelation. "Bursley" and "Knype," "Hanbridge" and "Bleakridge"—to quote the names under which Mr. Bennett thinly disguises his native haunts—may be quite horrible places to those who dwell therein, but to his southern readers they are holy ground, like Mecca and Medina to good Moslems. Some day I shall make a pilgrimage thither. Probably the trams and shops and mud in the Five Towns are very like the trams and shops and mud in other towns; but to me they will not be so. They will be transfigured by the imaginary presence of Mr. Bennett's creations—Edwin Clayhanger, the romantic master printer; the goodly fellowship of the Orgreave family; and the tyrannical, incalculable, but irresistible Hilda Lessways.

The trilogy of which these characters are the centre is Mr. Bennett's masterpiece. The three novels, Clayhanger, Hilda Lessways, and These Twain, form a veritable prose epic of the Victorian era. Let no clerical hand open these profane volumes: let good church-goers eschew them, and let Pleasant Sunday Afternoons be kept pure from their polluting influence! The spirit of Freethought, humanitarianism, the love of this world, blows through them from cover to cover like a fresh breeze. Begin at the beginning; read the burning description of early Victorian industrialism in the fourth and fifth chapters of Clayhanger, with its child-slavery and Methodist religiosity. That is the City of Destruction from which Mr. Bennett's pilgrims start upon their journey. In its progress we come across, in due order, all the main incidents of the fight for freedom: the Colenso controversy and the Bradlaugh episode duly figure in the story. The last is, in fact, made the occasion for the first mutual encounter of the hero and heroine. No reader of Mr. Bennett will forget the scene at dinner, where Edwin is asked by his host: "Are you a Bradlaugh man?"

"And Edwin, uplifted, said: 'All I say is—you can't help what you believe. You can't make yourself believe anything. And I don't see why you should, either. There's no virtue in believing.'"

Nor will any reader forget the scene later that night, when Hilda pursues Edwin into his garden to ask: "Did you mean it when you said—you know, at supper—that there's no virtue in believing?"

"Did I say there was no virtue in believing?" he stammeringly demanded.

"Of course you did!" she remonstrated. "Do you mean to say you can say a thing like that and then forget about it? If it's true, it's one of the most wonderful things that were ever said!"

Or the description of the Sunday-school Centenary, with the crowds in the Square singing, "There is a fountain filled with blood," and Edwin's comment: "Look at it! It only wants the Ganges at the bottom of the Square—"

Thus do Mr. Bennett's characters slowly win their way from mid-Victorian superstition to the freer atmosphere of modern days. But it is not only to religious orthodoxy that he flings down the gauntlet. Thomas Hardy issued a terse challenge to conventional morality when he gave his novel, Tess of the D'Urbervilles, the subtitle, A Pure Woman, in protest, as he says in the preface, against the current "inability to associate the idea of the title-adjective with any but the artificial and derivative meaning which has resulted to it from the ordinances of civilization." Mr. Bennett's challenge is less terse, but no less emphatic, when he makes his heroine, after falling victim to a bigamist, end up as the admired and respected mistress of a prosperous household. If the book had been written twenty years earlier, there would have been an outcry. In the second decade of the twentieth century it was a safe venture; the teeth of Grundyesque convention must by now be nearly all drawn. Mr. Bennett himself had helped to prepare the ground in one of the best of his earlier stories, Sacred and Profane Love, in which the distinction between sanctity and profanity certainly does not turn upon the presence or absence of the wedding ring.

If Mr. Bennett's readers have any just cause of complaint against him, it is that his Hilda and Edwin, after going through fire and water in two whole novels to get each other, develop in the third volume a rather disconcerting predilection for quarrelling on small occasions. Two people of such superior metal, we cannot help feeling, ought to have taken a shorter time to discover the secret of success in marriage. It may be that Mr. Bennett, having allowed some years to elapse between the second and third novels of his trilogy, had a little lost touch with his characters. More likely it is only his way of showing us, incorrigible optimist as he is, that he enjoys life and everything in it—matrimonial quarrels and all!

In Mr. Bennett's interest and sympathy with life in all its phases, there is something reminiscent of French rather than English fiction—particularly recalling Anatole France. This native of the Five Towns, going forth into the world and becoming imbued with the free spirit of Gaul, has returned, as it were, to turn the rays of French common-sense and reason upon the uncouthness and angularity of English provincial Puritanism. It may safely be said that English fiction will never again be quite the same as if he had never touched it. A Democrat, a Freethinker, a Materialist in the best sense of that vilified word, Mr. Bennett has borne a gallant part in the war of human liberation, and contributed not a little to the downfall of the doleful cult of Stiggins and Chadband in this corner of the planet.

EDUCATION AND THE WORKING CLASS INTERNATIONAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to draw attention in your columns to an education movement (based on the subjoined proposals), which but for the War would have been definitely established at the International Socialist Congress arranged to take place at Vienna in August, 1914? The movement is of necessity of an anti-clerical character, and is much needed in the British Labour movement, whose "leaders" have so shamefully capitulated to the forces of reaction in the matter of the clerical education legislation of 1902 and 1903, legislation, by the way, which the Labour Party were returned to Parliament in 1906 pledged up to the hilt to reverse. How far those pledges have been fulfilled is shown by the meek, indeed enthusiastic acceptance by the Labour Party of Mr. Fisher's Education Bill, which was frankly based on the legislation of 1902 and 1903.

It is worthy of note that an amendment moved by Mr. Joseph King that there should be no religious tests for teachers, received no support from the Labour Party.

I suggest that the many capable Freethought lecturers who visit industrial centres should invite their Trade Union sympathisers to discuss with Labour M.P.'s the following question: "How far has the advent of Organized Labour as a political force tended to further democratic principles in education politics?"

This question was one, which prior to the War, engaged the attention of capable research students in this and other countries, and it became ever more clear that there was need for an international working-class education movement, by means of which rank-and-file students of the British Labour movement could obtain the assistance, in matters educational, of educationists in those Labour movements in other countries, which are not, like the British Labour movement, so dominated by clerical influences.

Therefore, a movement was set on foot based on the following proposals:—

Digitized by Google

1. An International Federation of such Labour colleges in various countries as are provided and controlled by working-class organizations.

2. An International Working-class Students' Union; and in order to secure the rank and file character of this union, the unit to be, not Labour and Socialist "leaders," or great committees of such "leaders," but the class (controlled by the workers) for the study of the principles of International Socialism.

3. An International system of travelling scholarships to secure an interchange of lecturers between various countries, and also to enable working men and working women students to visit, and to study the educational systems of, other countries than their own, and to report to their organizations.

4. An International Socialist Library, to bring within reach of working-class students translations of the best works on Socialism and Education published in various countries.

5. That, under the auspices of this Education Movement, there should be held, side by side with the International Socialist Political Congress, an Education Congress, for the purpose of furthering the education of the workers in all countries.

This scheme will ere long be carried into realization. The difficulties will be great, in spite of the fact that it will receive warm support from many influential fighters for intellectual liberty in other countries. In the meantime, it is desirable that the proposals on which it is based should be known to, and discussed by, all Britishers who wish to help the younger and brighter spirits in the British Trade Union Movement in their uphill fight against the forces of reaction in British education. Amongst those forces of reaction, I myself, after over twenty years' work in the Labour Movement, unhesitatingly place the British high Labour and Socialist bureaucracy.

LIFE AFTER DEATH.

Sir,—Sir Arthur Conan Doyle attempts to answer my question as to why the spirit communications are never of any general interest by stating that I do not realize the limitations of psychic phenomena. But surely it is as easy for the spirit of a drowned sailor to say how he came by his death as to say how happy he now is having the enjoyment of spiritual whisky and cigars, as revealed by Sir Oliver Lodge's son Raymond.

I have just finished Sir Arthur's New Revelation, and find there is nothing new in it beyond the title, the spiritual yarns therein recounted having been forestalled by that of the Witch of Endor in the quaint old Book, and not nearly so well told. And, so far from Mr. Maskelyne's tricks being plausible imitations of spirit phenomena, it is much more true to say that his clever tricks were exploited by smart "mediums" for the gulling of simple and honest Spiritualists. Like all the other spiritual revelations I have read, Sir Arthur's book only confirmed my previous view, that when the spooks fly in at the window common sense walks out at the door.

Obituary.

On the 4th inst., at West Herrington Churchyard, near Fence Houses, were interred the remains of Mr. Andrew Shiel, who died in his sixty-first year at New Herrington. At the graveside the Secretary of the South Shields Branch through whom deceased had kept in touch with the Secular Movement in recent years, in a few words expressed the sympathy of the Party with the sorrowing relatives and friends. It was with deep regret they had received the last request for a Secular Burial Service. Mr. J. Fothergill gave an impressive reading of Mr. Austin Holyoake's appropriate words, and Mr. R. Nuttall, General Secretary, Northumberland and Durham Colliery Officials' Association, added a touching tribute of respect, acknowledging the loss of a useful and worthy member. Mr. Martin Weatherburn (Newcastle) and Mr. and Mrs. Wright (Penshaw) and others were present. Mr. Shiel was born at Tweedmouth, and many years ago was an active worker in the Cramlington (Northumberland) Branch. Up to his last serious illness he was a steady supporter of the Freethinker and the Cause.—R. C. (South Shields).

On December 7 a small gathering of relations and friends attended the funeral of Mr. Jas. Wilson, of Falkirk, who died on December 5 from influenza-pneumonia. He was fifty-one years of age, and leaves a widow and four children. He was a staunch Freethinker, and had been a loyal and zealous Secretary of the local Branch of the N.S.S. since its inception. He was keenly interested, and took an active part in social economic questions. More for the sake of propaganda than for profit, he ran a bookstall, and at most meetings could be seen with a selection of progressive literature for sale. To know him was to like him, and he will be greatly missed by a large circle of friends. Mr. Wilson viewed his approaching end with characteristic courage, and gave instructions that his funeral was to be a purely secular one. Accordingly the ceremony at the graveside consisted merely of a short address by the writer of this notice, who feelingly referred to Mr. Wilson's many excellent qualities of head and heart.—Handel Lancaster.

Christians and Christmas.

From beginning to end Christianity is a bundle of contradictions. Its doctrines and beliefs are as contradictory to each other as are its precepts to its practice. It has an almighty Creator whose will is always being overcome by his creatures, and whose wisdom is seldom equal to the cunning of man. It preaches love and has been more successful in rousing hatred than any other religion in the world. It prescribes peace and Christians are everywhere foremost in waging war. Young Men's Christian Temperance Associations are evidence that it has, after centuries of rule, failed to make sobriety a habit among Christians. Societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals and to children prove how far Christianity is from making kindness characteristic of its followers. It has sown history thick with falsehood in the service of religious truth. The records of popes, and priests, and of the Churches prove that Christian history gives an air of plausability to but one orthodox doctrine—that of human depravity.

Christmas and Christ.

The contradiction that obtains in Christian doctrines and practices dogs it in its festivals. Look at the present festival of Christmas! Traditionally Father Christmas is a jolly, red-faced fellow, full of kindness and good nature. But Jesus Christ, whose birth is supposed to have been on Christmas day, is the very reverse of this—a pale, emaciated figure of suffering, as far removed as possible from plum pudding, and turkey, and general jollification. Christians believe in the one, their practice points to the other. If the youngsters saw Father Christmas enter the room they would shriek with delight, and he would reign the unquestioned king of their affections. If they saw the traditional "Man of Sorrows" they would shriek with fear and run to the sides of their mothers. Human nature has been too strong for the Churches. The logic of life has shown itself more powerful than the logic of faith, and as December the 25th was a period of rejoicing long before Christianity was born, so it may remain such when Christianity has taken its place in a museum of anthropology. About the pre-Christian rejoicing there was reason and logic even though of a crude kind. Christianity succeeded only in making the festival religiously ridiculous.

Who was Born on Christmas Day?

Was Jesus born on the 25th of December? Nobody knows. Irenæus and Tertullian give the year 3 B.C. as the date of his birth. Luke's account would make it about seven years later. Canon Farrar thought it should be 4 B.C. Some have placed it much earlier, and others a little later. Our accepted chronology really dates from the sixth century. The monk Dionysius decided the exact date. And imagine the trustworthiness of fixing the date of a birth that was believed to have occurred some five centuries and a quarter before, and in a period when registry offices were unknown and no records were available. But there is a reason for fixing the 25th of December as the birthday of the Son of God; it was a favourite day for the birthdays of gods, and there is a fashion in these things. In pre-Christian Syria and Egypt, says Frazer, writing of the annual rebirth of the solar deity, "the celebrants retired into certain inner shrines, from which at midnight they issued with a loud cry, "The Virgin has brought forth. The light is waxing!" In the Mithraic cult, which bore so striking a resemblance to Christianity, the birthday of Mithra was celebrated on December 25. The Egyptians exhibited a new-born god, lying in a manger, on that date. Bacchus and Adonis also had their birthdays on this date, and a Syrian Christian writer, cited by Frazer, says very frankly:—

> It was a custom of the heathen to celebrate on the same 25th of December the birthday of the sun, at which they kindled lights in token of festivity. In these solemnities and festivities the doctors of the Church perceived that the Christians had a leaning to the festival; they took counsel, and resolved that the true nativity should be solemnized on that day.

Decidedly, there is a fashion in these things. And for ourselves, we believe the evidence for one birth is quite as good as the evidence for another.

What Happens on Christmas Day?

The truth is that December 25 does not connote the birthday of a particular historic person; it is the anniversary of an event. The recognition of this event dates far beyond the time of Christianity, and to a much wider area than is covered by Christian influence. And one cannot even understand the origin and nature of Churches without putting one's self in the mental position of our primitive ancestors, to whom "natural law" was unknown, and who saw in all natural processes the operations of supernatural agents. To these, the decline of the power of the sun and the dying of vegetation were portents full of disaster. Magic is resorted to in order to help the sun regain its lost strength; and, as Frazer suggests, we have in the kindling of the Yule log a survival of a wide-spread sympathetic magical ceremony which aimed at strengthening the heat of the sun by kindling fires on earth. And as a matter of fact, the African Bushman to-day follows exactly this plan at midwinter, to the same end. At any rate, there is no doubt whatever that Christmas is the old Pagan festival, which in its turn was derived from the s belief already noted. And with this as a key, all the customs connected with Christmas are explainable. The misletoe comes to us from the Druids, who saw in it the retreating place of the spirit of vegetation. The rebirth of the infant Sun-God is plainly a symbol of the recovery of the sun after reaching its lowest point in the heavens. The general rejoicings is the delight of a people on receiving assurance of the continuance of the life of vegetation. Even the decoration of houses with evergreens is a practice of Pagan origin, the purpose being, as one authority writes, to provide the sylvan spirits with a shelter, so that they might remain "unnipped with frost and cold winds, until a milder reason had renewed the foliage of their darling abodes." In their origin all these things have a crude logic attaching to them. As survivals, they are interestingly pretty. But Christianity, by the attempt to connect them with an historical event, only ends in making them ridiculous.

The Origin of Gods.

There is no longer room for reasonable doubt that both Christmas and Easter are very ancient festivals, or that the current form of the Christ-myth represents a blend of the vegetation and solar deities—the two being ultimately one. Sacred trees are among the commonest objects of religious worship, and the god, as Robertson Smith points out, inhabits the tree "not in the sense in which a man inhabits a house, but in the sense in which his soul inhabits his body." And if we ask why this belief, we are brought back to the very origin, or, at least, one of the main sources, of the belief in gods. There is room here for some doubt as to the precise stages of the process, but none as to its main character. To begin with, primitive people invariably attribute the operations of nature to "spirits," amongst whom the tribal ghosts are prominent. If the crops are plentiful or scarce, it is because the tribal spirits are pleased or angry. And Mr. Grant Allen, in his essay on The Attis of Catullus, has given a very plausible theory why ghosts or gods should have become identified with vegetation. First, the tumulus over a dead body is freshly turned earth. Next, food is scattered over the grave to feed the ghost. Animals are killed on the grave, and their blood soaks into the earth. The result is that vegetation is likely to be richer on and around the grave than elsewhere. But this is not due to the better-fed soil, but to the activity of the ghost. It is the life of the ghost manifesting itself in vegetation, and the extension of the idea to vegetation in general is not a difficult step. And from the belief that fertility is due to ghostly action to the practice of creating a ghost, or a god, for the purpose of securing good crops is another easy step. And Professor Frazer has shown universally this has been taken. In this connection we must refer readers to the last-named author for proof that Christ is one of a group of vegetation deities annually slain to be born again in the new crops. Professor Frazer will supply scores of examples of the practice of killing someone annually, and either burying him whole or in parts to secure abundant crops. All the details of the Christian myth are there. The selection of a victim, the giving of royal or divine honours, the killing of the god, and his resurrection in the renewed life of the world. Other and later ceremonies naturally get associated with Christianity, but anthropology supplies the key to the whole. In the beliefs of the most primitive of contemporary races, we see a survival of that original frame of mind which gave religions birth. The Christian religion is to-day a principal representative of a dying superstition.

Christmas.

It is beautiful to give one day to the ideal—to have one day apart; one day for generous deeds, for good will, for gladness; one day to forget the shadows, the rains, the storms of life; to remember the sunshine, the happiness of youth and health; one day to forget the briers and thorns of the winding path, to remember the fruits and flowers; one day in which to feed the hungry, to salute the poor and lowly; one day to feel the brotherhood of man; one day to remember the heroic and loving deeds of the dead; one day to get acquainted with children, to remember the old, the unfortunate, and the imprisoned; one day in which to forget yourself and think lovingly of others.....; one day in which bonds and stocks and deeds and notes and interest and mortgages and all kinds of business and trade are forgotten, and all stores and shops and factories and offices and banks and ledgers and accounts and lawsuits are cast aside, put away and locked up, and the weary heart and brain are given a voyage to fairyland.—Ingersoll, "Works," vol. xii., pp. 351.

Christmas is here:
Winds whistle shrill,
Icy and chill,
Little care we:
Little we fear
Weather without,
Sheltered about
The Mahogany Tree. —Thackeray.

SUCH is the day we are about to celebrate—a day of universal rejoicing which all mankind in the Northern hemisphere can justly claim as their own; a day on which to say, with the poet:—

Sorrows, begone!
Life and its ills,
Duns and their bills,
Bid we to flee.

It is the day of great and precious promises which have never yet been broken, the anniversary of the sun's return and life's sweet birthday. In short, it is Nature's supreme Gift-day, and it has, in consequence, become a day of general giving. On this account it is a pre-eminently popular day with both young and old. The Christmas-box and the Christmas tree, with Father Christmas behind and above both, how eagerly they are looked forward to, and how thoroughly enjoyed when they come. "What I want for Christmas" is by no means an uncommon expression, and the following is a partial list of the late Colonel Ingersoll's Christmas wants:—

I would have all the nobility drop their titles and give their lands back to the people. I would have the Pope throw away his tiara, take off his sacred vestments, and admit that he is not acting for God—is not infallible—but is just an ordinary Italian. I would have all the cardinals, archbishops, bishops, priests, and clergymen admit that they know nothing about theology, nothing about hell or heaven, nothing about the destiny of the human race, nothing about devils or ghosts, gods or angels. I would have them tell all their "flocks" to think for themselves, to be manly men and womanly women, to do all in their power to increase the sum of human happiness. I would have all the professors in colleges, all the teachers in schools of every kind, including those in Sunday-schools, agree that they would teach only what they know, that they would not palm off guesses as demonstrated truths (Works, vol. xi., p. 375).

Christmas is an egregious misnomer, and represents stolen property. Christ belongs to the region of mythology, like Attis, Adonis, or Dionysus, and Christianity put itself in line with other supernatural religions by fixing the date of the birth of its Redeemer on the 25th of December. It is highly significant, to say the least, that the two most important Christian festivals—Christmas and Easter—should owe their origin to the sun and be closely associated with vegetation. As a cult, Paganism was forcibly suppressed, but most of its customs, and not a few of its doctrines, were appropriated without acknowledgment by the Christian Church. Yes, the Lamb's Bride waged brutal wars against her rivals, and, having gained the victory, indulged in wholesale looting, although by an ingenious system of camouflage, she has endeavoured to cover up all traces of the theft which becomes, in her vocabulary, sanctification. Thus, as we closely scrutinize it, the Christ mass is seen to be the worst species of fraud attached to a myth. On Christmas Day the pulpit will repeat the old lie under the guise of holiest truth, and the congregations will respond in some such deeply poetic lines as the following:—

O come all ye faithful,
Joyful and triumphant,
O come ye, O come ye, to Bethlehem;
Come and behold Him
Born the King of Angels;
O come, let us adore Him,
O come, let us adore Him,
O come, let us adore Him, Christ the Lord.

Sometimes Freethinkers are accused of the unspeakable folly of flogging a dead horse; but, unfortunately, the sentimental trash enshrined in the doggerel just quoted is not an outgrown weakness of which the present generation of Christians is heartily ashamed, but a living absurdity, gloried in by myriads of devout believers throughout Christendom, who, while listening to or joining in the singing thereof, are lifted up to what they regard as an altogether seraphic frame of mind. We even pay the clergy the compliment of admitting that multitudes of them sincerely believe that they are in touch with the grandest reality in the universe when they interpret the message of Christmas in terms of the Evangelical Christian faith; but that admission does not blind us to the fact that, despite their intense sincerity, they must be placed in the same category as all the Pagan priests of whom they often speak with withering contempt. The herald angels' song, "Glory to the new-born king, Peace on earth and mercy mild, God and sinners reconciled," is fully as unreal as the angels themselves; and they who repeat it to-day dare not seriously face the facts at which they so pitifully mock. In the Christian Commonwealth for December 11, there is an exceptionally eloquent sermon by Dr. Fort Newton, in which he deals with the question: "Does God speak to man now? If so, how?" We agree with the reverend gentleman when he says that "what was true in the long ago is true to-day"; but we totally disagree with his bold assertion that God did speak to man in the long ago, an assertion of the truth of which he adduces not a single scrap of evidence. With seeming naivete he says: "Argument is not needed; the fact proves it." We respectfully ask, which fact? We challenge him to produce a single fact from any period in Christian history which may honestly be taken as a verification of the angelic song recorded in the Gospels. There is nothing easier for a person of an emotional temperament than to appeal to what he calls religious experience in the conviction that what is true in experience is also true in outward fact. Benvenuto Cellini enjoyed daily communion with God, and he could not find words sufficiently strong to describe the rich, uplifting, spiritual visions graciously vouchsafed to him from time to time; but the whole world knows that God's dealings with Cellini did not result in the transformation and ennoblement of his character. And history supplies us with innumerable instances of the same kind. Cellini had the experience because he had the faith; but that there was a God behind his faith who really revealed himself to him is utterly incredible to those who are familiar with the man's Memoirs, written by himself. The new-born King came to redeem the world, to deliver it from its devastating evils, and to fill it with the love and practice of righteousness and truth; but no one acquainted with the history of Christendom can have the hardihood to affirm that his self-appointed mission has been fulfilled. So far as the regeneration and purification of human society is concerned he was born absolutely in vain, and Christmas is the ghastliest farce in existence. But the grand old Sun has never failed us, never broken a promise, never been a moment before or behind the appointed time, and him, as the world's only real Saviour, we may, at this season of the year, address in the words of the Hebrew poet:—

Thou visitest the earth and waterest it,
Thou greatly enrichest it;
Thy river is full of water;
Thou providest them corn, for so preparest thou the earth.
Thou waterest her furrows abundantly;
Thou settlest the ridges thereof;
Thou makest it soft with showers;
Thou blessest the springing thereof.
Thou crownest the year with thy goodness;
And thy paths drop fatness.

J. T. Lloyd.

A Footnote to History.

Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties.—John Milton.

Universal tolerance is the very soul of happiness to a populous and enlightened nation.—Napoleon.

The year 1881 was an eventful one. Two things happened which thrilled the world. Amid the Northern snows the white czar Alexander was assassinated, and away in the Great Republic of the West President Garfield met with a similar fate. During that year Charles Bradlaugh, the intrepid leader of English Freethought, was dragged out of the House of Commons during a struggle that was so fierce that the muscles of his arms were ruptured and his clothes torn to ribbons. For all that, he was as cool and self-possessed as he was on the day when he handed the N. S. S. presidential hammer to his successor, George William Foote, the first editor of the Freethinker, which was founded the same year.

The story of the Freethinker is one of the publishing romances of the world. Its advent in 1881 created a furore in advanced circles, for the new periodical was the last word in audacity. Orthodoxy, so far as it condescended to notice it, dismissed it with a sneer or a light laugh. But it was not to be sneered or laughed down, and presently it was seen that the editor knew his business. There were brains and enterprise in its pages, and it began to be talked about. Its avowed policy was waging war against superstition in general and the Christian superstition in particular. Published at a popular price, edited in a lively style, it succeeded from the first. Curiously, it was the infamous treatment of Bradlaugh by the bigots that created Foote's militancy. He has told us that he was until then practically ignorant of the spirit of persecution, and with the generous enthusiasm of youth, he fondly imagined that the period of combat was ended, and that Freethinkers had nothing else to do but to devote themselves to purely constructive work. He was rudely disillusioned by the logic of events. The illusions of hope were rudely dispelled by the insults levelled at Bradlaugh; by the disgraceful scenes in the House of Commons; by the continuous and crippling litigation; by the attacks on Mrs. Besant, when ruffians struck her and threw lime at her. It was then that Foote recognised that it was war to the end. He drew his sword, threw away the scabbard, and rushed to the side of his chief.

Like the brave Spartan that he was, Foote drew the enemies' spears to his own breast. Three times was he tried for blasphemy, and he was sentenced to a year's imprisonment as an ordinary criminal. "Thank you, my lord, your sentence is worthy of your creed," he remarked to the Catholic Judge North, who tried him. His sacrifice was not in vain. During this Homeric struggle the Freethought party increased in numbers and influence, and since then there has been no looking back.

Probably no journal in the world had so loyal a staff as the Freethinker, and this was one of the things that contributed to its success. The capital at command was a drop in a bucket, but the enthusiasm of the writers was as boundless as the ocean. To merely recite the names of the contributors is to mention some of the best-known names in the Freethought movement. Indeed, the services of the Freethinker can hardly be over-estimated. It kindled a new spirit in intellectual circles, popularized secular propaganda, and gave the apostles of liberty a new feeling of actuality and power. For thirty-eight years it has stood for Liberty of Thought. Thirty-eight years—half an old man's life, and the whole of a young man's. During those years Freethought, it may confidently be asserted, has progressed more rapidly than during any preceding half century.

The canvas of 1881, the year in which the Freethinker was born, was crowded with men and women of strong personality. It seems so long ago that many are but clouded memories now. Gone are most of the familiar faces, but through the clouds appear the smiling features of our old comrades-in-arms: F. J. Gould, Arthur B. Moss, and William Heaford, three of the staunchest veterans who ever wore the uniform of the army of human liberation.

For sixteen years the pages of the Freethinker were enriched by the scholarly contributions of Joseph Wheeler, the sub-editor. A journalist, he belonged to a profession of which not even the leisure is leisurely. The gentlest and most lovable of Bohemians, he carried a weight of learning easily. His frail body harboured an indomitable spirit. Away from his beloved books, he was whimsical, cross, kind, and amusing. We all loved him, and wondered "one small head could carry all he knew." The acquisition of knowledge was an instinct with him. As Chopin took to music, he took to books from boyhood. He handled them and made them part of himself. Into the pages of the Freethinker he put all his talents. A quiet scholar, he did his duty throughout a very stormy period. Instead of repining, he turned with unappeasable energy to help the Cause through greater ordeals than it had yet weathered. That was the sort of man he was, and that is why his memory shines with a spotless and concentrated lustre.

The contributors pass, but the journal remains. The Freethinker is thirty-eight years old, and, under its present editor, is more alive, more active, more full of ideas, and more widely circulating to-day than at any period of its long and eventful history.

MIMNERMUS.

There is no hostility so admirable as the Christian. Our zeal performs wonders, when it seconds our inclinations to hatred, cruelty, ambition, avarice, detraction, and rebellion; but when it moves against the hair towards bounty, benignity and temperance, unless, by some miracle, some rare and virtuous disposition prompts us to it, we stir neither hand nor foot. Our religion is intended to extirpate vices, whereas it screens, nourishes, and incites them.—Montaigne.

Justice, Human and Divine.

SOLEMNITY oft struts the stage too long, and tearful Tragedy, her tawdry trappings torn, loses our regard, for in the midst of death we are in mirth.

I have been cursed with a sense of humour, but I am not one of those who see "humour in all things." To my mind there is not a redeeming feature about the horrible murder of a little Belfast child by an epileptic youth, and one can only sympathize with judge and jury whose duty it was to deal with the sordid story, and to determine the fate of the perverted wretch guilty of such an appalling act. But when I read of seven learned judges sitting in solemn conclave in Dublin—during the progress of the War—to discuss and to argue the point, not whether Joseph Fitt was to be executed for murder, but whether it was in accordance with the law that a judge should pass a sentence upon him which everyone knew would never be carried out—then, I must admit, the comic opera aspect forced itself upon me.

In his famous theory of value, Karl Marx speaks of "socially necessary" labour. That phrase burnt itself into my mind, and fired my imagination so much, that it has become a habit with me to divide things—broadly speaking—into the "socially necessary" and the "socially wasteful." I cannot dismiss the meeting of the seven authorities on justice merely with a laugh and a shrug of the shoulders. The social aspect of their council is untouched by their decision as to whether a murderer of fifteen years of age may or may not be sentenced to death. What does concern me, as a serious-minded man, is the frightful waste of human labour involved in the administration of "Justice" in this and similar cases. We have been told that only by the most rigid economy could the War be won. I have scrupulously obeyed the requests to refrain from burning unnecessary lights (and even necessary ones) in the "halls and corridors" of my Ballymacarrett dug-out, although we have found it impossible to "cut down the number of hot baths in our household." Lest ambiguity may obscure my meaning here, let me say that the only place one could take a bath is in the yard, which a neighbouring lady actually does, to the infinite amusement of the lieges. We never have a fire in our bedroom, there being no grate; besides, we have no coal, so we have been doing our bit. But when I think of the seven occupants of my seven-foot square kitchen, in which physical exercise with a feline would be somewhat restricted, and our enforced "economies," and then think of the appalling waste occasioned by the seven learned jugglers with the jargon of justice, my humour is apt to be a trifle acid. Seven highly educated men, trained in universities, and living cultured, easy lives, fed, clothed, and housed in comfort and security by honest men's toil, and at a time of great national stress, the best service they render society is to split hairs concerning the age when a miscreant may receive sentence of death!

There might be some consolation if any justice emerged from the Dublin deliberations, but the crime and its problem remain just as they were. The inefficacy of punitive vengeance considered as a synonym for justice was illustrated to me several years ago by the facts of an execution in France. The culprit had outraged and murdered a young girl, and her father had been allowed to witness, at close quarters, the expiation of the crime. When Deibler's victim had "spat in the basket"—to use the playful argot of the French mob—a fatuous functionaire remarked, "Now monsieur would be satisfied." "Yes," replied the bewildered parent, "justice has been done, I know; but that does not give me back my daughter." I am making no maudlin plea here for the better treatment of assassins; certainly it would appear kinder and saner to cut short the career of a ruffian than to waste the lifetime of several men in caging him up. But I am thinking of justice in this respect; not what the wicked flee from, our enemies are brought to, and the unfortunate have "administered" to them, but rather the feeling that "to know all is to forgive all." Certainly, to have this in mind, to avoid all punishment that is vindictive, to give wherever possible a real chance for evil-doers to mend their ways, are ideas which are commending themselves to progressive thinkers the world over. Even the seven luminaries whose deliberations I have ridiculed were occupied in discussing the application of a point which, after all, has something humane about it—that the death penalty should not be imposed on a child under sixteen.

When, however, we turn from the human to the divine, we find that if there is sometimes a glimmering of kindness, a soupcon of sanity, here and there a spirit of forgiveness in our all too unjust "justice," earthly judges, even of the flogging and hanging variety, are all gentleness and wisdom when compared to the Great Judge whose monstrous verdicts and sentences are applauded by believers. Granted that the laws of the land might be saner, and that the wise ones might with advantage be better administered, it is nothing short of cant to talk of squaring our justice with humanitarian principles, while glorifying this unreasoning and bloody-minded Jehovah. I like a little consistency now and then. To blame the human, to approve the divine, for the same or worse conduct is the method of Christians. No sane man can give a good excuse for the Germans' sinking of the Lusitania in war-time; but every Christian will say there was "some good purpose" in the torpedoing by iceberg of the Titanic in time of peace by the Heavenly Hun! Now, if I were a Christian judge, and living up to the principles of counting hairs and visiting iniquities of the parents on the children, I'd give a man fifty years' penal servitude for saying "damn," and hang a little child if it was proved that his grandfather stole apples; for if God is good and wise and just in holding every soldier to account for each idle word spoken, in suffering the good to be killed to point a moral to the wicked, to "punish" the innocent for the faults of others, to forgive ruffians a lifetime of villainy merely for an act of credulity, to condemn to eternal suffering noble-minded men and women whose time was too fully occupied in making this world a better place to live in—then it is illogical to carp at our judicial errors. Yes, if that frightful Ogre is to be believed in, and little children taught at school that all the hooligan characteristics of the Bible God are compatible with love and charity, the less we say about the injustice of human beings, the better. There are no juries, no consultations, with God (unless the three persons debate among themselves), no counsel for the defence, no Appeal Court, no half measures, no short sentences. With Judge Jehovah, Jefferies is out-bloodied, and God's justice is infinitely more drastic than Cromwell's "To hell or Connaught."

Justice, even in the narrow sense in which the word is ordinarily employed is not at all a simple matter, and the factors are so many and diverse that even crediting men with the best of intentions, only approximately just verdicts can be arrived at. If a drunk man blacked his wife's eye I would not condemn the magistrate who disregarded the man's plea that his heredity was to blame, and sent him to the cells; but I would stick up for the ruffian who used the same argument to Almighty God. A police magistrate might well say: "I've no time to discuss Determinism here with a man who knocks his wife about. Seven days without the option." But if the drunkard told God all the facts of the case (if that were not superfluous) then he ought reasonably to expect that the All-wise Father would acquit him, instead of which he would be told peremptorily to go to hell, unless in his last earthly drunken delirium he had expressed a belief in Jesus the Saviour, when the verdict would be heavenly glory (and uncongenial company) for eternity.

Freethinkers are willing to believe that Christians are better than their creed, although humanitarian reformers have had the greatest obstacles put in their way by men of profound religious conviction who have always justified cruelties and horrors in the name of the God of love. Until the fear of a Heavenly Father, who seems to be a celestial Whackford Squeers, and the reliance upon brutal precepts from Holy Writ, as guiding principles for our conduct are completely banished from men's minds, social evils can scarcely be appreciably ameliorated, for, even in the restricted sense in which human justice is commonly regarded, Christianity has proved to be a positive hindrance to humanitarian effort.

High-souled men and women, whose lofty ideals transcend the police-court, see more in justice than the birching of boys, the jailing of housebreakers, undignified wrangling about a hypothetical black book, or repulsive strangling dignified by the black cap. While acquiescing in the principle of justice for all, these same reformers are chiefly concerned with justice for all well-doers. But such idealists whose conceptions of justice are based on a knowledge of the evolution of social forces, a wide toleration, fostered by experience, of all the idiosyncracies of individuals, a profound pity for the weak, and an instinctive detestation of punishment that merely perpetuates cruelty, such men and women have long outgrown the belief in the God whom Holy Willie apostrophizes:—

> Oh, thou, wha in the heavens dost dwell.
> Wha, as it pleases best thysel',
> Sends ane to heaven and ten to hell
> A' for thy glory,
> And no' for ony guid or ill,
> They've done afore thee.

For fear the British people will not be so vengeful as they might be, the Christian World ex-Berlin Correspondent reminds its readers that a leading Roman Catholic journalist wrote in the early part of this year praising the sinking of the Lusitania with "joyful pride," and cites the Rev. Dr. Baumgarten as saying that the man who did not view that act with pride could be no true German. For our part, we beg to observe that both these expressions come from thoroughly Christian sources. And we have noticed throughout the War that, just as it was the civilian who—in his talk—was far more bloodthirsty than the soldier, so it was the keen Christian who showed most pleasure in the unavoidable brutality of warfare. We have culled quite a number of passages from religious sources gloating over shortness of food in Germany, and the mortality amongst women and children caused by the Allies' blockade. Less religious people regarded these things as some of the hateful—if inevitable—consequences of war, and said little about them.

The editors of the religious papers are trying hard to minimize the ex-Kaiser's piety, and the hired pen-pushers are obeying the editorial nod. The Christian World says: "All through the thirty years of his (the ex-Kaiser's) ascendancy men and women pointed to him, and declared that if he was the bright and shining example of the influence of religion on the hearts of men they would prefer to be without religion." Dear, dear! and the British and Foreign Bible Society used to point to Wilhelm as a "bright and shining example" of a Christian monarch, and solicit subscriptions on the strength of it.

The ex-Kaiser used to figure among the subscribers to the British and Foreign Bible Society, and only since the War has his name been deleted from the annual reports. His piety was so pronounced that on one occasion he actually forbade the erection of a statue to Heine on the grounds of the poet's infidelity. As a fact, no one doubted Wilhelm's religiosity until Christians found it convenient to drop him.

In the columns of a religious contemporary there are no less than twenty-two advertisements relating to patent medicines, hygiene and health. No wonder devout Christians declare "There is no health in us."

Busmen are supposed to take holiday by riding on other 'buses; but policemen have higher notions. Here is an advertisement from a provincial paper: "The Inspector of Police from Leman Street Police Station, London, will (D.V.) preach the Gospel in the —— hall on Sunday." This is a decided change from the announcement that a "reformed burglar" will speak, and, doubtless, the congregation will appreciate it.

Dr. Clifford, speaking at the National Liberal Club, said "the most religious document sent out recently was the 'Aims of Labour.'" The document, be it remembered, is pure, unadulterated Secularism.

A correspondent, writing from New Malden, Surrey, tells us that at a Rummage Sale held in his locality for the benefit of a church, there was found among the articles offered for sale a German Prayer-book. A discussion ensued as to what was to be done with it, for no English Christian patriot would read prayers in German. The suggestion that it should be thrown on a dustbin was rejected, and a Catholic clergyman —the name is given—decided that it should be publicly spat on and then burned. This was done, and the incident offers a fine example of the chastening and refining influence of religion in a time of war. Whatever unthinking savagery there is about people in war-time is certain to be intensified by religion.

A Sunday paper expresses astonishment that Westminster Abbey should contain the tomb of John Broughton, a former champion prizefighter. Some of the other deceased persons buried there were not nearly so respectable.

Godliness and gluttony are old stable companions. Commenting on the celebration of Thanksgiving Day by the Americans in England, the Daily Chronicle pointed out that the festival "shortened the lives of a great many turkeys." Anyhow, the birds had little reason for thanksgiving.

A special service was held at Southwark Cathedral to commemorate the baptism of John Harvard at the same church in 1607, and the sermon was preached by the Archbishop of York. It is fitting that a dying Church should hold services for dead men.

Newspaper paragraphs state that a sum of £60,000 is still required to complete the restoration of St. Paul's Cathedral. We should like to know the exact amount expended on that building from first to last. Supplying the clergy with money for its upkeep seems very like feeding sharks with sponge cakes.

How is it that so much literary criticism in the daily press seems as if it were written by the cricketing reporter temporarily out of work. In a review of Mrs. Barnett's book, Canon Barnett: His Life, Work and Friends, in a London newspaper, it is calmly suggested that Herbert Spencer is the "most ludicrous of philosophers," and that it is the figure of Spencer "who gives most of the comic relief of Mrs. Barnett's book." Fortunately, Herbert Spencer's reputation is not in the hands of clergymen's wives, or even of penny-a-liners.

The Daily News recently published a letter urging that the clergy should be represented in the House of Commons, and stating that a movement was on foot to attempt to remove the political disabilities of parsons. The votes of the Bishops in the House of Lords should make anyone pause before entrusting more political power to the clergy.

The Heathen Chinee will soon be as extinct as the dodo, if the religious newspapers are to be believed. A real, live Chinaman has been consecrated Bishop of Che-Kiang. Will the almond-eyed Christian require the same salary and emoluments as his dear brother in Christ, the Bishop of London?

Rev. W. Askwith, Vicar of Matlock Bath, has been good enough to fix the date of the second coming of Christ. It is to be 1935. Only sixteen years to wait. But some people are talking of an indemnity from Germany that may take fifty years to pay off. And soldiers who are in the Army of Occupation are wondering when on earth they will come home for their discharge. Well, in 1935 they may be needed to keep the streets clear for the Second Coming—perhaps for some Jewish Lord Mayor to present the freedom of the City to our celestial visitor.

In a new book on Tory Democracy, by Lord Henry Bentinck, the author suggests that Lord Beaconsfield worked hard for the establishment of a "truly Christian Commonwealth." This provoked a reply from the Daily News: "Wherever he may now be, let us hope that Lord Beaconsfield is in a position to read this. He would have enjoyed it so heartily."

The Salvation Army unites business with its piety. In an Essex newspaper the following notice appears: "The musical members of the Salvation Army are arranging to give a few suitable vocal or instrumental selections in your neighbourhood, and ask for a generous response to their uniformed collector." This reminds us of a picture-postcard that was popular years ago, showing a Salvation Army band playing "Christians, Awake!" outside the house of a Jewish financier, who is emptying the water-jug on the musicians.

It looks as if the advertising staff of the Salvation Army Emigration Department has been feeling the strain of the War. In the columns of a daily paper, an emigration advertisement included the sentences "Book at Once! Register Now. Wives and Sweethearts and other Relatives of Overseas Service Men," etc. Is it not delicious? The words wives and sweethearts are sufficient to make the lions in Trafalgar Square guffaw.

The Rev. H. L. C. V. de Candole has been appointed Canon of Westminster. That ancient borough will be able to hold "de Candole" to the Devil.

The Calvinistic Methodist.

THE Methodist! Incomparable theme!
E'en as the flow'r enfolds the probing bee,
The Methodist invites, nonchalantly,
And suffocates with ample self-esteem
The bold intruder on his sacred dream.
Communing with th' Invisible, he moves;
Elect of God, he goes in rigid grooves;
A Tulkinghorn at Jahweh's door he'd seem.

Phylacteries of Mother Church he's kissed,
The while he fingered precious Non-con. cash;
In "choker" white he loves to make a splash,
Hoping some day to swell the "Clergy List";
To lift humanity he's never rash,
That lovely hypocrite, the Methodist. D. V. T.

Our Day—January 5, 1919.

LAST week we asked all our readers to take an extra copy of the Freethinker for January 5, and post it to a likely subscriber.

Of course, we cannot expect that every reader will do this; but certainly two or three thousand should do it, and the effect of sending these round should be permanently beneficial to the paper and the Cause.

On the part of the reader, the expenditure will amount to twopence-halfpenny, plus a little labour. On our part, we are increasing the size of the paper that week to sixteen pages, which, with the present cost of labour and materials, is no meagre contribution. We shall also try to make the issue as interesting as possible.

Remember, the copy to be ordered is for January 5. This should be enclosed in a wrapper and directed to someone who is likely to be interested in the paper. The word "Freethinker" must be written on the back of the wrapper, in order to bring it under the newspaper postage rate of one halfpenny. As we cannot send out the paper on sale or return, all orders should be placed with newsagents by December 21, or as soon as possible, so as to avoid disappointment.

While dealing with this matter, may I, as the Sustentation Fund closes this week, heartily thank all those who have contributed to make it so great a success? The steady support given has been a great stay during the harassing War period, and the Freethinker stands to-day stronger than ever—one of the few papers in Britain that has not raised the price to its readers.

I have not hesitated to ask for help when needed, because I have taken it that we were all fellow-workers in a common cause. And if I have asked, I have also given. Those intimately concerned know that, apart from work, I have been one of the largest financial contributors to the paper. If I could not give in solid cash, I have kept down expenses by going without. I did not feel warranted in acting otherwise while compelled to ask others for support. And as we have all struggled through together, so I look forward to a brighter future in the same loyal and cheerful company.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

C. Cohen's Lecture Engagements.

December 22, Glasgow.

To Correspondents.

E. D. BROWN (Victoria).—Sending on portrait. Things will no doubt be brighter presently.

R. HORWOOD.—The wish was father to the statement, which is only to be expected in a clergyman. As a matter of fact, the National Secular Society is larger, in a healthier state of activity, and exerts more influence than has been the case for many years.

J. J. DARBY.—Please call and see us when you return. If you have any difficulty in getting the Freethinker let us know, and we will have it sent on from the office. Hope you will soon be home again.

H. ROSSDALE AND R. H. HEYS.—We cannot, at the moment, undertake to write lengthy letters to the paper you name. We are at it all the time, and we are being warned that we may over do it. But your own letter is a good one, and you seem quite capable of handling W. Phillips—whoever he is. All we can say is that the man who attributes the "Reign of Terror" to Atheism writes himself down an ass. The excesses of the Revolution were mainly due to the intrigues of the English Government with Continental powers with a view to restoring the Monarchy and undoing the work of the Revolution.

P. A.—Will do our best, but we have over a score of articles mutely appealing for publication, and with no space available at present.

TREVOR T. BERRY.—Sorry we cannot spare space for your communication.

HUGH P. MARSHALL (Dunedin).—Sorry to learn of the disappearance of W. W. Collin's Examiner. We can quite appreciate the difficulty of keeping a Freethought paper going in these days. Your communication is interesting, but we are afraid the event is too far off to be interesting to readers here.

T. LOVE.—Cheque received. Shall hope to soon hear that you are home again.

J. GIBSON.—Hope to see you when we visit Glasgow. The War has settled the religion of many, and, we think, stirred up many others to the necessity of more energetic propaganda.

MRS. C. M. RENTON.—We are obliged for cheque. There is no "religious wave" sweeping over England, although some of the clergy would like to make people believe otherwise. You may rely on our keeping at it. We are not easily discouraged, and the good wishes of our readers give us every encouragement to persevere.

J. PUGH.—We wrote you acknowledging receipt of paper, etc., and have had the letter returned. Evidently we have the wrong address.

LIBRA.—Shall look forward to seeing you on Sunday.

W. J. PITT.—Not quite there, but almost. Thanks for good wishes.

W. J.—We are really not anxious to score points, and are quite content to leave the whole matter to the judgment of our readers.

W. DODD.—We know we have your good wishes. Thanks.

J. ROLLASON writes thanking us for literature sent for distribution amongst the troops, and tells us it is being eagerly read and discussed.

M. ROGERSON.—We are pleased at getting through so well, so far. But we have had many willing helpers, and without these we should have been powerless. Will bear other matter in mind.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

To-day (December 22) Mr. Cohen lectures in the Burgh Hall, Partick. Good meetings are expected, and we hope that local friends are doing their best to see that results will exceed expectations. Trams run from the centre of Glasgow to the hall, the stopping-place for which is Peel Street. The hall is situated in Hamilton Crescent, and the times of meetings are 12 noon and 6.30. There will be some good music before the evening lecture—from 6 to 6.30.

Owing to the Christmas holidays we have to get two issues of the Freethinker ready for the press this week. The issue dated December 29 will be in the newsagents hands on Monday, December 23.

We should like to hear from our readers how many candidates have replied to the question addressed to them on Secular Education, the abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, or the question of general religious equality. We have written quite a couple of score of letters during the past fortnight, in answer to requests for guidance, and a fair number of skeleton questions to help those who distrusted their own power of putting them tersely and effectively. This has meant a deal of extra labour, and we should like to know the result—if any.

Quite inadvertently we omitted to notice last week the publication by the Pioneer Press of Mr. Andrew Millar's booklet, The Robes of Pan, and Other Prose Fantasies. Some of these essays have already made their appearance in the Freethinker, and some in other journals. Mr. Millar's writings have a charm of their own, and are infused with a sense of the picturesque and the human that make them delightful reading. Elsewhere in this issue we print a brief notice of the work from the able pen of Mr. George Underwood. The price of The Robes of Pan is one shilling, postage three halfpence.

Another new work we have been waiting for space to notice is Mr. Joseph McCabe's The Growth of Religion (Watts & Co., 6s.). The fault from which the writings of the masters of anthropology suffer is their bulkiness. This is inevitable owing to the vastness of the field to be surveyed, and the necessity for giving the evidence its full weight. But it is perplexing to the lay mind, which often finds itself unable to see the wood for the trees. Mr. McCabe's work, which strikes us as among the most satisfactory of his writings, not only avoids this, but he carries his survey into the comparatively neglected region occupied by races of people who have not yet definitely outlined teachings concerning super-human, or extra-human, existences. Religious beliefs, like beliefs in general, do not come into existence fully formed. A belief is only the conscious recognition of a frame of mind that he has been gradually developing, and if we are ever to understand religion, we must gain a clear comprehension of the mental conditions that exist among races of people immediately below many well-known races of "savages." Mr. McCabe deals with this aspect of religion very satisfactorily, and in the closing chapters of his work traces the development of religious ideas on to higher levels. The author's conclusion strikes the right note :—

> We distrust the whole content of religion. It seems to be merely a case of the evolution in human consciousness of a primitive illusion. The philosopher kneeling to God—if any modern philosopher ever does—is only the other end of a series that starts with the Andaman islander pondering over his "shadow" in the water.

We are glad to note the growth of a more determined effort to get rid of the "whole content of religion" instead of crediting it with some lofty etheral impulse or aspiration to which it has no legitimate claim.

Mr. Erle B. Side writes us:—

> No doubt you have read, in the plans for demobalizing our war horses, that those who have served in the Eastern campaign are to be sold to the natives of Mesopotamia—either Arabs or Russians, etc. What a fitting reward after playing such a great part in securing victory. One shudders to think of the terrible treatment that will be meted out to these poor creatures should the suggested plans be carried out. Yes, it is the East, the birthplace of so many of the "merciful" and "loving" leaders and heroes of religion that our horses must fear. Ever since the announcement of demobilizing was published I have watched the papers carefully, but have failed to discover a protest from any of our well known shining lights of the Christian faith.

Mr. Side has written to Major-General Sir W. H. Birkbeck a protest against the callous treatment of the horses in disposing of them to people whom our own officers have noted treat their animals with extreme cruelty and neglect, but we are afraid his letter will not avail much. The bottom fact is that war, however justifiable, involves a progressive brutalization, and, with regard to the treatment of defenceless animals, the callousness is likely to be the more pronounced and the less noticed. Still, it is well that the protest should be made, and Mr. Side has made it in a very effective manner.

We are asked to announce that there will be no meetings of the Manchester Branch at the Bakers' Hall on December 22 and 29, owing to the holiday season, but a full rally of members and friends is hoped for at the President's next visit to Downing Street on January 5. The next Social will be held at the latter place on the 28th, commencing at 6 p.m. A cordial invitation is extended to members' children, for whose enjoyment special arrangements are in progress at the hands of a ladies' committee.

Owing to want of space, we are compelled to hold over, until our next issue, letters from Mr. D. Jones and "H. V. T."

"Conceivability."

THERE was a point raised in Dr. McDougall's defence on behalf of the "Soul" that calls for a fuller notice than was practicable or even relevant in the middle of a critical discussion.

He contends that "inconceivability" is no valid objection against his assumption. With this I fully agree. But why did he not have the candour to point out that this contention, if valid, favoured the opposite or Materialistic theory more directly and obviously than it did his own? The contention is one of general application, and not one to be employed solely on behalf of superstition.

The one outstanding "argument" against the Materialistic position has been its "inconceivability"—that it was impossible to "conceive" how the physical was changed into the psychical; how the spinnings and gyrations of atoms and the dance of molecules became transmuted into feelings and thought—that is, into consciousness. And it must be freely admitted that such a transformation is absolutely inconceivable. But mere "inconceivability," as Dr. McDougall points out, is not an atom of reason against the hypothesis being true. Though I am not myself a believer in the so-called Materialistic theory, yet it is not because the change is *in*conceivable. There are, to my mind, insuperable difficulties to accepting the dualistic conception of the process—from physical stimulation to psychical awakening. I am therefore forced to believe that it is not a case of "change" at all, but one of concomitance. At all events, no one can ask the question "how" the "change" takes place without being guilty of begging the very question at issue. He must first prove that it is a "change" before a "how" can be addressed to it.

That, however, is a diversion. My object in this paper is to point out the "reason why" mere "*in*conceivability" is no argument against, or "conceivability" no argument for, any proposition, hypothesis, or theory.

The "conceivable" is simply the familiar, the known, or anything which the mind can picture like it. If you cannot picture it as resembling anything known, it is "inconceivable," but by no means impossible on that account. Most modern inventions based upon discoveries of unknown natural powers were more or less inconceivable before they were "born."

For example, before the advent of steam and of the steam-engine, it was not possibly "conceivable" that a combination of iron plates and bars could be made "to pull like a horse." And, conversely, had we been conversant only with mechanical powers of transport and traction, an animal machine, like a horse, would be absolutely an impossible conception.

Had Nature evolved creatures which only could crawl or walk on the surface of the earth, a bird or a fish would be quite "inconceivable," and therefore, according to the old "argument," impossible creatures.

Before the discovery of electricity and its applied inventions, a statement which said that you could dispatch messages from continent to continent in the "twinkling of an eye," or that you could hear a person speak 500 miles away, would be received with derision—they would be quite incredible, because such processes would be then "inconceivable."

Similarly, an announcement which stated that the dead could be heard speaking, laughing, singing, or sobbing in the same familiar voice as he did when alive, would be met with the same incredulity before the invention of the phonograph made it "conceivable."

Likewise, before the discovery of the Hertzian waves and the invention of wireless telegraphy, a profession to transmit messages without wires would not be credited, because it was not conceivably possible.

In all this babel about the "inconceivable" hardly ever any distinction is made between the mystery implied in a "why" or a "how" problem. The mental attitude of curiosity or inquisitiveness in the two cases is wholly different. The answer to a "why" supplies a cause to a given effect.

An answer to a "how," on the other hand, simply lifts the veil from over a gap in the chain of causation—brings to view the hidden links in the sequence of "Cause and Effect."

A "why" makes an inquiry about an unknown cause, whereas a "how" implies the fact that both "cause" and "effect" are assumed as known. Hence the best-established principles and the most credible theories are often the most inconceivable.

Gravity, for example, is undoubtedly a universal physical cause; but "how" it acts across "empty" space is quite "a mystery," but that fact has no effect upon our implicit belief in its truth.

Similarly every living creature resembles its parents in form, in size, in organs, in habits, in instincts, and in mental capacities. Every butterfly reproduces those spots and hues which distinguish it from every other species with the absolute regularity and certainty of the recurrence of the seasons.

There is no disputing of the causal relation of parents and offspring. But "how" this virtual identity is effected—by what "mechanism" are these replicas eternally reproduced—is enveloped in profoundest mystery.

But the question, why should a child resemble its parents does not seem in the least mysterious or inconceivable; it is our universal experience. The mystery would be if it occurred otherwise. Should the offspring of a cow be a dog or a lizard, it would be an extremely bewildering experience.

Though a "how" problem is never intrinsically insolvable, yet it is often susceptible of no conceivable solution. A solution to a "Why" problem, on the other hand, is seldom inconceivable, but is never final. The "forces" and urges of substances—the "causes" of Nature—are conceivable enough, because they are "pushes" and "pulls," but in themselves they are ulminate and absolute mysteries.

Now the mystery which is attached to the relation of mind and body is of the "how" order. It arises from the fact that we cannot fathom the nature of substance sufficiently deeply "to see it at work." There is not the slightest doubt as to the causal relation between physical and mental. One fact alone, out of a million, need be cited—the fact that a pin-prick causes pain. No sane person ever doubted the causal relation between them. But we have no "conception" of "how" the neural disturbance produced by the pin-point awakens the accompanying sensation.

But our ignorance in no way affects our belief in the fact that he who is prodded with a goad is conscious of agony if his neural system is normally active. "Inconceivability," I therefore repeat, is in itself no valid argument either against or for a contention.

Keridon.

Man's Feline Friend.

Even in the piping times of peace, numerous official, or, for that matter, unofficial persons busy themselves in searching for something to tax. With the appalling waste of wealth incidental to war these inquisitive people increase their efforts, and the sinister glance of the licenser fell on the harmless and homely cat at an early stage of the recent struggle. It is reported that one of the belligerent Powers imposed a tax on our feline companion, with the plainly obvious consequence that the natural prey of that useful animal multiplied beyond measure with disastrous results. For, when unchecked, the procreative capacities of destructive rodents become truly enormous, and their devastations when conducted on a large scale attain colossal proportions.

The ravages of the mouse are relatively unimportant, but those of the rat soon assume a menacing magnitude. The multiplying powers of these loathsome creatures are almost incredible. They damage property, poison food as well as destroy it, and are only too justly suspected of spreading disease. Were it not for our cats, and in minor measure our dogs, London and other populous riverside cities, with their suburban areas, would soon swarm with rats. As it is, the rat population of the metropolis must mount to millions. All our sewers are infested with these vermin, and the drains and cellars of the older houses, particularly when near the Thames, are the habitats of rats. Various were the estimates of the vast numbers of rats roaming in the basements of Holywell Street (Bookseller's Row) at the period of its demolition, some thirty years ago. At the London Docks powerful cats of the ratter type are well in evidence, and the services these animals render are keenly appreciated by those who know from bitter experience the havoc wrought by rats when these creatures run unchecked among the merchandise. Nor are the depredations of rats confined to teeming cities resting on the banks of the river. In the country the farmer has solid reason to dread the losses sustained in fields and barns and granaries where rats abound.

The writer remembers an experience at a Sussex farm where no cats were kept, and on which the professional services of the human rat-catcher had been neglected. A stack of unthreshed wheat mounted on a high stand had been left from the previous harvest to the succeeding summer, and the interval between the hay and corn gathering was selected for the threshing operations. No sooner was the thatch uncovered, and the first cornstalks thrown into the machine, than the rats were seen scampering in all directions. Some attempted to escape altogether, but the majority burrowed more deeply in the corn stack. Several hundreds were killed, but for many months afterwards the farm buildings and neighbouring hedges and ditches were alive with rats. What little corn remained was dark and discoloured, utterly unfit for either human or animal consumption, and represented a serious loss to all concerned. An instance such as this enables us to form some conception of the fate that would befall our large cities were our guardian cats to disappear. It is indeed difficult to estimate in terms of money our huge indebtedness to our faithful felines for their services, not only in checking the increase of the rodent race, but also in scaring the animals away.

One has only to glance at a cat's canine teeth to notice how large and powerful these organs are, and how well adapted for tearing flesh. The numerous species of the Felis genus are perhaps the most specialized of carnivorous animals. The fondness of the domestic cat for fish food apparently indicates some kinship to the Indian Fishing-cat, which subsists almost entirely on fish and molluscs.

Small when compared with the giant cats such as the lion, leopard, panther, jaguar, and tiger, yet the wild cat of Europe reaches very fair proportions. This fierce animal lingers in continental woodlands, but it has long been extinct in Southern England, although it survived in Wales down to a few generations ago. The animal was occasionally encountered in Yorkshire as late as 1840, while it lingered in the Lake Country still longer. In the Scottish Lowlands it is extinct, and the animal is becoming very rare in districts where it was common 100 years ago. A leading authority, J. G. Millais, considers North-Western Inverness and Western Ross-shire as the last retreats of the wild cat within the British Isles. The formidable character of this sharp-clawed, strong-toothed creature may be gathered from the fact that one shot by Millais in 1889, in Northern Scotland, measured nearly four feet from nose-tip to tail-end. In Ireland the animal is entirely absent.

The European wild cat is not the ancestor of our domesticated varieties. In company with various plants and other animals, the domestic, short-furred cat appears to have arrived from the East. And there are several reasons for concluding that our household pets are descended from the ancient Egyptian cat, which was about the same size as the modern cat, with tabby markings on a coat of sandy gray. Egypt was a densely peopled state in classic times, and constituted the granary of the Roman world. What more likely, then, than that the cat of the Nile country should be dispersed throughout Europe as that continent's agricultural arts extended and developed?

The wild cat was well known in our Island in British, Roman, and Saxon times; but the earliest reference to the domesticated animal seems to date from the tenth century. The English and Persian cats form two outstanding varieties of the organism. The English breed is of far greater practical value than the fancy Persian variety. It is an excellent mouser and ratter, unless reduced to a condition of dullness and inactivity by petting and over-feeding, while it is less subject to parasites than the long-haired and bushy-tailed Persian. It is also a hardier animal, and far less liable to disease. But from the standpoint of beauty of form, colour, and markings, the Persian stands unrivalled.

The short-cropped Russian cat is usually characterized by its fine blue, glossy coat, occasionally of a somewhat woolly texture. This animal is a handsome creature, and the finest specimens are distinguished by dark blue nose-tip, eyelashes, and "whiskers." Various explanations have been put forward concerning the term "Cyprus cat," which is applied to the tabbies of Norfolk and Suffolk. Some assert that this cat was introduced into East Anglia from the island of Cyprus, while others assign the name to the resemblance of the animal's markings to the pattern of the textile known as Cyprus cloth. A third theory attributes the designation to the fact that Cyprus "signifies a red or a reddish-yellow colour," and that the term simply indicates a rufous or yellow brindled cat.

The Isle of Man is famous for its tailless cats, while other felines destitute of a caudal appendage are native to the Crimea and Japan. One variety of Manx cat carries a stumpy tail, while another possesses a very long tail which sometimes measures ten inches in length. The most celebrated Manx cats, however, have no visible tail whatever.

The Siamese cats are descended from a breed long carefully confined within the royal residence. This jealous restriction has now ended, and although these animals are of a highly delicate constitution they are at times successfully reared by fanciers in Britain. Numerous other varieties exist including the beautiful Angora cat from Western Asia. It is reported, and for the sake of the residents in those regions it is to be hoped that the story is true, that the cats imported into one American country never agonize the night with their horrible screams, yells, and wails.

Writers and Readers.

THOSE of my readers who have a natural or cultivated taste for the excellencies of prose style will have noted with pleasure the essays which have appeared from time to time in this paper over the signature of Andrew Millar. Of these a small selection, together with a few that were contributed to Scottish newspapers, are now printed and published by the Pioneer Press at the price of one shilling. The Robes of Pan and other Prose Fantasies is, I believe, Mr. Millar's first venture as a bookman, and it makes a promising beginning. It will become in time a bibliographical treasure, the cherished firstfruits of a literary talent which, if I am not greatly mistaken, will carry its lucky possessor a very long way. Like Theophile Gautier and our own accomplished stylist, Mr. Arthur Symons, Mr. Millar is an impressionist. He is a writer for whom pre-eminently the exterior world exists. He has something more than the normal sense of sight, and among primitive folk would have been hailed as a seer, that is, one who sees clearly what other people only half see. He has also the other equipment without which there can be no artistry, the power to make others see with his eyes, to evoke in adequate and beautiful words the impressions that come to him from the world of Nature. As an example of the power of re-creation manifested throughout this slender and delightful booklet let me quote this paragraph:—

> The amber streamlet—babbling amid its mossy stones, dinning and splashing like a child's water-mill, or gliding and dimpling in swift and silent motion, channelled in brown mould and emerald turf, in that bend by the gap in the hedgerow, where the yellow largesse lies so richly spent—the streamlet has been busy bearing away those fallen shreds and patches with, here and there, the gleam of brambles, the red of hips and haws from the faded finery of the sylvan god..... There is a red on the rim of the hills—red, richer than rose petals, or than beauty's lip—a still, deep, crimson bar of red, far away, and low down, in a hollow of the dim brown hills, as though the vestal Eve had but gently barred the gate behind the god of to-day, and quietly curtained his retreat..... Diana, Huntress of the Morn, with silver arrows bright and sped afar; and twilight Eve, of soft and slumbrous eye, spreading the mantle of night upon the couch of day—saffron and yellow, and gold, and tumultuous grey, above the dusky skyline, and through the still, illumined spaces, we seem to be gazing into the realms of perfect beauty and eternal rest! What a glory doth the world put on! Sombre at times, and sad, the minstrelsy of the winds, or wild their joy and rude their unseemly mirth; but though without purpose, the winds are calm or convulsed; and though without desire to be benign, the natural scene is full of beauty and repose—the deeper, truer significance of life is caught from those varying but eternal aspects of the earth and skies.

The essays are sprinkled with purple or silver patches equally beautiful and appropriate. Landscapes of delicate beauty sketched in with a facile and flowing brush, felicities of phrase and epithet, and here and there grandiose impressions of Nature in her mood of splendid anger. The reader who knows a good thing in literature when he sees it will agree with me in honouring the writer of the last paragraph in the essay "At the Old Harbour: Saltcoats." The description of a storm is one of the finest things I know outside the work of the greater masters of prose-style.

I have given Mr. Millar great praise, but not, I think, too great. The worst fault a writer can be guilty of is enthusiasm over an unworthy object. Mr. Millar himself makes a bad slip in this way when he talks of Watts-Dunton's "glorious" "Ode to Mother Carey's Chicken" as a "magnificent inspiration." It is really a pretty piece of respectable fifth-rate verse which stands in the same relation to the great poetry of Tennyson or Browning as does the preposterously silly romance Aylwin to the novels of Meredith or Hardy. This want of sure critical judgment lies at the bottom of all Mr. Millar's defects; it accounts for his occasional and distressing lapses of style, the loose construction of sentences, the want of sequence in ideas, the inability to see that matter may be good in itself, but very bad when it is in the wrong place. We note one little essay which is made up of a quotation from a friend's letter. It is a delicate compliment to the friend, but rather hard on the reader who is interested only in Mr. Millar.

If Mr. Millar will allow me to say what I think, I would suggest that he does a little more reading and use his remarkable power of intelligent observation on the work of men who have made the prose-poem an effective and lovely form of art. He need only study three masters: Tourgueniev, Baudelaire, and Poe. He will see at once—his clairvoyance as an artist will ensure his not missing the lesson—that what he needs is a more closely knit form, a greater clearness of idea, a rigorous inhibition of every thought that does not help forward the idea and an insistence on the correspondences between Nature and the human mind. I don't suggest that Mr. Millar does not recognize these conditions of the prose-poem; he does and yet he doesn't. What he has yet to learn is the immense difference between literature and mere journalism. An essay that is pleasant enough to glance through in an evening paper is not always worth the relative immortality of the more permanent form. Still, the good things more than outweigh the bad, and it has promise, which is more than I would say of more pretentious collections of impressions.

JUSTICE.

Justice, Justice: woe betides us everywhere, when, for this reason or for that, we fail to do justice! No beneficence, benevolence, or other virtuous contribution will make good the want. And in what a rate of terrible geometrical progression, far beyond our poor computation, any act of Injustice once done by us grows; rooting itself ever anew, spreading ever anew, like a banyan-tree, blasting all life under it, for it is a poison-tree! There is but one thing needed for the world; but that one thing is indispensable. Justice, Justice, in the name of heaven; give us Justice, and we live; give us only counterfeits of it, or succedanea for it, and we die!—Carlyle.

Obituary.

South Shields.—On Saturday, December 14, at the Harton Cemetery, Mr. J. Fothergill read a burial service selected from Mr. F. J. Gould's book at the graveside of Percy Hannan, three-and-a-half years' old, who died of pneumonia after a brief illness. Deceased was an exceptionally bright, sturdy, little boy, and deep sympathy is felt with Mr. Hannan and family by local members and friends.—R. C.

Views and Opinions.

The Reign of Cant.

The Election is over, although the results are not yet known. For several weeks the air has been vocal with the virtues of one party and the vices of all the others. But which owned the one, and which the other quite depended upon the point of view. I daresay most of the speakers believed all they said, while they were saying it, the power of the human animal for self-deception is so great. Besides, they all do it, people look for it, and candidates must "play the game." It might be argued that as the thoughtful are not deceived, and the thoughtless soon get over the illusion, little harm is done. Party followers were waiting for a lead to find out what it was they were to shout for; and party leaders—who more to-day than ever lead because they follow—were quite as eager to find out what the people expected. The followers follow because they see their own prejudices offered them by someone with a louder voice or a greater gift of verbal presentation. That a leader should lead because he is a clearer thinker, of greater moral courage, or indicates new lines of progress, is not thought of.

Gregarious Coercion.

If this insincerity, self-deception, and lack of independence were characteristic only of election time, the harm done would be trifling. The serious thing is that it is symptomatic of a wide-spread evil. The number of people capable of really independent thinking always represent the minority in a nation. Those who have the courage to express their thoughts, represent a still smaller number. Society at large cares little for independent thought, still less for fearless speech. It reads and listens not so much for instruction or stimulation as to see its own prejudices placed before it in the most attractive manner. The man or woman who breaks in on the closed circle of ideas that forms the mental furniture of most people is not hailed as a deliverer—he is hated as a disturber. Against the assertive individuality of the few is arrayed the coercive gregariousness of the many. Society, as Emerson put it, is in a conspiracy against the manhood of its members. It promises protection at the price of individuality; and this conspiracy of society against its creative individualities is in final analysis the one great obstacle to reform. Expressed dogmatism may be fought and conquered. In the act of expression dogmatism reveals its weakness and challenges opposition. But the apathetic conformity of the crowd provides no individual strength to which an appeal may be made, no consciousness of mental independence that may be roused to activity. There is only apathy, delusion, and cultivated ignorance; and against these even the gods are powerless.

The Power of Religion.

Greatest of all the forces that make for the maintenance and prevalence of this frame of mind is religion. The note of insincerity, evasion, subterfuge, runs right through modern theology. Preachers, one feels, would not believe as they do if they had the courage to submit their beliefs to careful examination and the ability to appreciate the weight of evidence. And even with those that are of a bolder and more able type, what they discard makes us more than ever suspicious of what they retain. It is impossible not to feel that they who say so much must know a great deal more, which is not said because of the consequences that would follow. Preachers do not speak out because of their congregations; congregations maintain an outward conformity because of their preachers. One-half the world is busy inoculating the other half with the virus of hypocrisy in the interests of honesty. For the peculiar feature of all deterrents—legal or social—to heresy, whether the heresy be of a religious, a social, or a political nature, is that it punishes courage and honesty only. The man who will tell a lie or act one escapes scots free. It is like promising a boy a thrashing if he tells you a lie—with the inevitable result that you get it. The necessity for a religious qualification could not shut out a dishonest Atheist from any office in the State. But it could, and does, shut out the honest ones. Among all the people burnt by the Christian Church for heresy, there was not put to death a single sturdy liar. The Church could bag only the honest heretics, because only the honest ones would say what they were. It is surely a delightful and truly Christian arrangement which provides that heresy added to lying may prosper, but heresy added to honesty and courage shall be sternly repressed.

The Social Pressure.

Curiously enough, the most mischievous punishments for heresy are not those that are legally enforced—even when the law is sternly and peristently applied. In England a king is not supposed to have political opinions. He is permitted to have opinions in religious matters, but here no one bothers about them. For they go with his office, they are fixed by law, and it is quite recognized that his private opinions might be different from those selected for him. So with the rest of the people. Where people are openly compelled to profess a particular opinion, the profession may be made without one sinking either in one's own estimation or in that of one's neighbours. The compulsion is obvious, and it is generally recognized that conformity under such conditions is no indication of conviction, any more than a Republican paying—through taxation—a part of the King's income would indicate a belief in monarchy. In such cases the conformity is wholly on the surface. The more morally mischievous conformity is that enforced by social custom and opinion. If for no other reason, because it is in operation at all times and under all forms. A legal enactment must be consciously and openly applied, and can only be set in operation in specified cases. A social enactment may be applied in all sorts of disguises, and in an almost indefinite number of directions. It commences with the child at school; it operates in the choice of a career, in the choosing of a wife; nor does it relax its hold on an individual until he sinks into the grave—and even then it will exert a supervision over his character. Legal restriction would be defied by hundreds who wilt before this many-headed tyrant of social conformity. People connected with advanced movements will be at no loss to recall cases of characters that have held out for long against this social pressure, only to go under in the end. It is not a case of frank and open surrender. People do not say, I am tired of the struggle; or, I am hopeless of good by struggling; or, I value a position in the world more than aught else; or, I have sons and daughters, and wish to place them in life. Were any or all of these reasons avowed, the one who offered them would be acting honestly towards himself and others. Instead of this, his action is covered with a hundred-and-one excuses which serve to blind others and to deceive himself. The moral effect of this social coercion is far greater and much more deplorable than that exercised by any legal coercion that has ever existed.

An Appeal to Heretics.

The strongest and greatest obstacle to-day to real Freethought, whether religious or political, is this social terrorism which people profess to despise even while they yield to it. It is the last refuge of a detected falsehood, and it can only be broken down by all who disbelieve in the customs and beliefs it defends saying as much with unmistakable voice and manner. There is only one time suitable for anyone to call a lie by its proper name, and that is the moment they recognize it as such, not to wait until there are singers enough to make a respectable chorus. In this case delay is a real danger. It is usually much more difficult to palter with one's sense of rectitude at the beginning than it is after a long course of dissimulation. Excuses will wait on inclination, and the truth is apt to look less alluring when we contemplate it through the distracting media of a socially easeful conformity. In strict truth every man who sees a belief to be false, and continues acting as though it were true, is doing what he can to give it a fresh lease of life. And if Freethinkers do not speak out, who shall? In these closing days of the old year we are appealing to all heretics. Theirs is more than a personal responsibility; it is a social one. Behind each opinion stretches a long heredity; the individual merely expresses the last stage in the process. Ultimately all opinion belongs to the race, and is one of the chief instruments by the aid of which progress is made. Unbelief thus brings its responsibilities no less than belief, nonconformity as much as conformity. There is no real reason why the heretic should go through life with his mouth closed or his voice attuned to a minor key lest he should hurt the feelings of the believer. There is nothing praiseworthy in paying homage to a lie because it is ancient. This policy has been followed too long, and its practical results are seen in the insincerity and moral cowardice that are among the most deplorable features of contemporary life.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

"Does God Speak to Man Now? If So, How?"

THE above is the sub-title of a remarkable discourse by Dr. Fort Newton, delivered at the City Temple, and published in the Christian Commonwealth for December 11. The real subject is the Bible and what its message involves for mankind. The sermon is remarkable chiefly for its vagueness or ambiguity, a characteristic which may hide a multitude of theological sins. Dr. Newton prides himself upon being free from all dogmatic shackles, forgetting, evidently, that the proclamation of a supernatural gospel in any shape or form is a species of metaphysical dogmatism. For example, he begins the address in question with the dogmatic assertion that "the Bible is a unity in faith, in spirit, and in purpose"; but every thoughtful student knows that the Bible possesses no such unity at all. It contains several different and contradictory conceptions of God. Jehovah is invariably a reflection of the people who believe in and worship him. Mr. R. J. Campbell used to describe him as a monster of injustice and iniquity. He is "a man of war" and the "God of Hosts" long before he is conceived of as light and love. Is there a unity of spirit between the Book of Joshua and the Gospel of John? Joshua was Jehovah's commander-in-chief, whose wars of extermination and enslavement were as cruel and savage as the worst on record; and even in the New Testament the avenging Deity occupies a very conspicuous position. Again, the Bible records a violent conflict between two different types of religion, the priestly and the prophetic, or the ceremonial and the ethical. The priests and the prophets were at never-ceasing strife even as to the very nature of the religious life. There is absolutely no indication that the Biblical writers had the least idea that they were assisting in creating a sacred literature or library through which an increasing purpose, like a golden thread, would infallibly run. It is perfectly true, as the reverend gentleman observes, that the Bible "nowhere speaks of itself as a whole," for the simple reason that it never knew itself as such. It may also be a fact that "in the Bible the name 'Word of God' is never once applied to anything written"; but such a statement has only the effect of pulling the Holy Scriptures down from the high pedestal upon which the first sentence in the sermon places them. And yet the object of that statement is to justify the inference that the Word of God is "a power at once so august and intimate that no book, nor all the books in the world, can contain it." Consequently:—

> Every land, every people, every age hears it, each in its own tongue; and because there are always listening ears, however few,
> One accent of the Holy Ghost
> The heedless world has never lost.

If Dr. Newton is right, then Paul is wrong when he declares (Rom. iii. 2) that the Jews had much advantage, profit, or pre-eminence, "chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God." In the Apostle's opinion, the Jews were the only people who had been entrusted with such precious treasures; and it was the general belief that, in consequence of this pre-eminence, it was only through them that other nations could be blessed. Curiously enough, Dr. Newton says that "God speaks in the Bible, but that he does not write"; but it surely follows that, if God speaks in the Bible, he of necessity, speaks in words, and that the words, whether he wrote them or not, are distinctly his, and it follows further that, the Bible being claimed as the divinest book in the world, God must have spoken with greater clearness and fulness to the Jews than to any other nation under the sun. The reverend gentleman's piety puts the Bible in a category by itself, and, inferentially, gives the Jews the prominent place among the nations, though his logic represents the Almighty as treating all nations alike, as speaking to and being heard by all of them. Unfortunately, however, in his case, piety wins a complete victory over logic.

In a preacher, piety makes rhetoric its favourite vehicle and flings logic down the wind. Argument is eschewed because it tends to act as a damper on piety, and reason is held in check because it cools the zeal and restricts the flight of faith. Reason says: Assuming the existence of a Heavenly Father we are bound to think of him as the very opposite of a respecter of persons, as one who, if he speaks, speaks to all alike. Piety knows better and unhesitatingly affirms that the Supreme Being chose Israel "to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all peoples that are upon the face of the earth," to make them high above all nations which he had made, and that, naturally, he spoke to them more freely and intimately than to all others. Dr. Newton's whole sermon is based on this pietistic but wholly irrational assumption, and, consequently, the Bible is to him God's supreme message to mankind. He says:—

> Something reaches us from its pages and pulls us into the play of its realities. It is not a fiction of what life might have been; it is life itself speaking to us. Nor is this to disparage literature and its service to the human spirit. Far from it. How we love to wander in its Chamber of Imagery, amid forms lovely and haunting, where Homer sings, and Plato speaks, and Hamlet dies; and there are lines in the great poets—often even in lesser poets, which open, in the light of a flash, a vista half on earth and half in heaven. Literature is bountiful and benign, free, ideal, and richly rewarding. But the Bible is more compelling than persuasive. It does not entertain; it commands. No other book has such power to comfort and command.

That is sheer declamation, resounding rhetoric or artificial eloquence, and every word in it points to God's immoral behaviour towards the offspring of his heart. It is seldom Dr. Newton descends to concrete instances, but when he does so his selection is unfortunate. On this occasion he chooses the 51st Psalm, and maintains that when a man tries to read it "as he reads any other poem, he finds himself face to face with God and the soul, humbled, subdued, exalted"; but he is radically mistaken. Reading that Psalm, like any other poem, the natural man sits in judgment upon the character of the speaker therein who is generally supposed to represent King David. Now, David was a notorious sesualist, who committed the worst crimes for the gratification of his passions, of which he did not repent until the dread of dire punishment from above had seized him; and even his repentance was entirely onesided and selfish. He thought only of himself in the hands of an angry judge, and, like a coward, cried out: "Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done that which is evil in thy sight; hide thy face from my sins, and blot out all my iniquities." He made no reference whatever to the women and men whom he had seduced, injured, and slain. We do seriously doubt the inspiration of this Psalm, and can see in it nothing but a wretched, frightened criminal basely cringing before a Being whom he believed capable of destroying both him and his house.

Dr. Fort Newton is an unrestrained idealizer. His exaggerations are boundless, his eulogy of the Bible ignores all the canons of criticism, and his practical deductions can be justified at the bar of no well-attested facts. He avers that if we let the Bible have its way with us "it will lead us infallibly in the way everlasting." "Yes, infallibly," he adds. Perhaps no persons were ever more heroically obedient to Biblical maxims than the Puritans, and the inevitable fruit in their character was narrowness, bigotry, intolerance, which gave rise to the most hateful and odious system of persecution known to history.

Dr. Fort Newton utterly fails to produce any convincing evidence that God has ever spoken, much less that he speaks to-day, and his very attempt to establish such a thesis has but one effect, namely, the reduction of the Divine Being to the human level. Indeed, in one illuminating passage he gives his whole case away:—

> Primarily, men are inspired, not writings. Wherever a man, by any means soever, learns what reality is, and what are the laws of the world, he is reading the Word of God. Often he can decipher only here a line and there a stanza, but God is speaking to him.

What a mean, contemptible apology for God. The God revealed by the action of events, the God who spoke in the terrible events of the last four years, certainly deserves neither worship nor belief, for he is robbed of sovereignty, and becomes only another name for man. For ourselves, we much prefer the old name, and to interpret all historical events without any reference whatever to supernaturalism. We learn only by experience, the art of life being acquired solely by actually living. Life is an evolutionary process, a process of outgrowing unworthy elements by reaching out towards nobler and ever nobler achievements. In the well-known words of a modern poet this point is beautifully put:—

> I held it truth, with him who sings
> To one clear harp in divers tones,
> That men may rise on stepping-stones
> Of their dead selves to higher things.

"God's" Birthday.

> It is a lie—their priests, their pope,
> Their saints, their —— all they fear or hope
> Are lies, and lies. —Robert Browning.

Why will the worldly minded man smile when his eyes rest upon the title of this article? It is severely simple. And why, if this were an orthodox publication, would the editor run his blue pencil through the offending headline? And why, if I were writing in a pious periodical, should I have to use grave words and check any desire towards criticism or light-heartedness? It speaks ill for a religious institution when it can only be discussed from one narrow point of view.

"God's" birthday is associated with humour and mirth, with feasting and merriment. At this particular season of the year the antics of the clown evoke the laughter of children, and the red-hot poker of tradition has not wholly lost its power to please. The shop windows are brilliantly decorated, and little people crowd the pavements and press their tiny faces against the glass. In countless homes folk are trying to get a little colour out of a drab existence, to impart a little warmth to life at this dullest season of the year.

The convivial features of Christmas have been noted frequently to the discomfiture of the dear clergy. For it is among life's little ironies that the alleged birthday of the "man of sorrows" should be a time of rejoicing; and that the festival of the "prince of peace" was fixed in December from the urgent necessity of fighting Pagan rituals. Like all human institutions, the Christian Churches and their feast days have had to contend in open warfare for survival. The festivals of Pagan Rome were as numerous as plums in a pudding. The public holidays were so frequent that they threatened to make life a siesta, and the hard-hearted Roman emperors curtailed them. It was to counteract the attractions which these Pagan holidays exercised over the people that the leaders of the Christian Churches sanctioned and incorporated some of these feasts.

Thus it is that "God's birthday" is a godless saturnalia. Years ago, grim old Thomas Carlyle made an entry in his diary on Christmas Day. It reads: "On looking out of the window this morning I noticed my neighbours were more drunk than usual, and I remembered that it was the birthday of their Redeemer." The association of gluttony and godliness is by no means the only criticism that can be levelled at this Christian festival. Why God, who is described as eternal, should have a birthday at all is a matter that Christians ought to settle among themselves. Other folk regard life as being too short for wasting time in such pleasing and unprofitable speculations. Non-Christians regard Christ as a mythical person, like all the other sun-gods and saviours of antiquity, whose careers were embellished with marvels.

The merry birthday of the "Man of Sorrows" was not kept regularly until many generations after the supposed date of the birth of Christ. In the earlier stages of the custom it was held on varying dates. The precise time of Christ's birth, like that of James de la Pluche, was "wropt in mystery," but it was not in December, even according to the legends. For shepherds do not watch their flocks by night in that unromantic time of the year. Why, then, do Christians keep "God's birthday" on December 25? The answer plucks the heart out of the Christian superstition.

It was in competition with the feast of Saturnalia, one of the chief Roman festivals, that "God's birthday" was fixed in December. The anniversary of Saturn and his wife was held from December 17 to 20, and the Emperor Caligua added a fifth day of rejoicing. On these five festal days of old Rome the schools were closed; no punishment was inflicted; the toga was replaced by an undress garment; distinctions of rank were laid aside; servants sat at table with their employers; and all classes exchanged gifts.

The propensity of converts from Paganism to cling to custom proved invincible. If the apostates were to be retained in the new religion it became necessary to incorporate the old under the mask of the new. The struggle for survival also incorporated other features. In the far-off centuries white-robed Druids cut the sacred mistletoe with a golden sickle, and chanted their hymns to the frosty air. These features were absorbed, and the mistletoe and carol-singing still play their minor, if amusing, part in the celebration of "God's birthday."

This struggle for survival is still going on. In the past the Churches sought for adherents by increasing their festivals, and crushed opposition by bribing the weak and killing the strong. In the twentieth century they are cajoling apostates all over the non-Christian world by means of medical missionaries, and at home by instituting Pleasant Sunday Afternoons in the place of painful Sabbaths; and by hypocritically identifying themselves with social measures which appeal to the working classes.

"God's birthday," with its pharisaical profession of goodwill to men, is largely pretence and make-believe. There is no "god" nor "devil" there at all except the men who make millions out of this sham, and who hiss at the "intellectuals" who would free mankind from their influence. The clergy are not deceived; they are clever actors. When Edmund Kean as Iago, was wringing the heart of his huge audience he could still whisper in his son's ear, "We're knocking 'em, Charlie."

Religion After the War.

IV.

How can one speak of the fatherhood of God in any universal and all-embracing sense in the light of the terrible calamities which have fallen upon so many innocent sufferers all over the round world? How can one believe in the goodness of God when one contemplates this unexampled harvest of agony, of bitterness, and of death? How the whole dilemma that in every age has haunted the imagination of man, the dilemma: either God would not, and then He is not good, or He could not, and then he is not in control—how this dilemma has been sharpened until it seems as if it could not be evaded?—Professor W. Adams Brown, "Hibbert Journal," January, 1916; p. 339.

The individual doubter can perhaps be brushed aside, but a gigantic evil compels millions to doubt, and clamours for an explanation. In the North, the millions are asking what is the good of prayer, of intercession; things go on just as before. The thousands are saying: "Here in this vast crime God could not help interfering if He had any heart, even as much goodness as any human being. He is, therefore, either not good, or else He is not powerful enough—not capable of interfering." The charge of criminality is preferred against the Deity in a way it has never, perhaps, been before.—E. D. Priestley Evans, "Hibbert Journal," April, 1916; p. 643.

WHAT answer has the Church to the charge of not preventing the War—to the culpability of God in allowing the War, with its resulting 26,000,000 casualities, at a cost of £30,000,000,000, and its trail of desolation, famine, and disease? The apologies offered, in most cases, only aggravate and exasperate, instead of consoling the seeker after a solution of the desperate enigma. For instance, Dr. Ingram, the Bishop of London, preaching at St. Paul's on August 4 of the present year, said: "Men were asking in their hearts to-day, 'Why does God not stop the war.' Why did He not stop the Whitechapel murders of thirty years ago?"[1] Well, why didn't he? Such reasoning—if it is allowable to call it reasoning—would not satisfy a child, let alone an adult. Nor is this an exceptional example of the Bishop's reasoning powers, for not long ago he is reported to have said: "Some men said there was no God. But there must be somebody above the Devil." Fancy basing the existence of God upon the existence of the Devil, in which no educated person now believes! If this is all that one of the most influential dignitaries of the Church can offer, what must we expect from the rank and file? The Church appears to be perishing from senile decay. The vast majority of the people have lost all respect for it. The more clear-headed of the clergy know, and admit it. The Bishop of Woolwich, speaking at the Lower House of the Convocation of Canterbury on July 11, declared: "That the state of religion in England to-day gave cause for serious anxiety. The educated and refined were for the most part either antagonistic or apathetic. The mass of the workers did not trust the Established Church, which they regarded as the hereditary enemy of their ideals."[2]

The Nonconformist Churches are in the same position. The Rev. W. E. Orchard, after admitting the failure of the Churches, with all their unrivalled influence and opportunities for teaching, to bring home to the conscience of humanity the wickedness of war, observes: "It is useless to plead that this war is different: the attitude of the Church has been the same in all wars. It is no wonder that thousands are turning from the Churches in disgust."[3]

Another leading light of Nonconformity, the Rev. R. F. Horton, comparing two religious works dealing with the War, representing the Church and Nonconformity respectively, says of the first, entitled The Church in the Furnace, by Seventeen Church of England Chaplains: "Loyal Churchmen, startled by the discovery at the Front that the Church has lost the manhood of the country, cry out for drastic changes and reforms in the Church they love." Of the other work, The Churches at the Cross Roads, by Mr. Shakespeare, Mr. Horton observes: "In this volume a Free Church leader makes a similar almost agonising discovery of the failure of the Free Churches, and turns his whole strength of mind and heart—and it may be observed that Mr. Shakespeare is a very strong man—to find a remedy." [1]

No remedy will be found. The great Mission of Repentance and Hope, which was to start a new revival and fill the empty Churches was a dead failure from the start. The fact is, the War has only accelerated a movement which was in progress long before the War began, namely, the secularization of life. All the Churches, for years before the War began, were reporting, with monotonous regularity, an annual loss of membership. With an increasing population there was a decreasing membership. A state of affairs which cannot continue indefinitely. The War with its staggering atrocity—which God allowed to start and did nothing to terminate, for it was fought out to the bitter end—only accentuated the fact, which many among the congregations were already beginning to suspect, that, as Carlyle lamented: "God does nothing now." To say nothing about raising irrepressible doubts as to the existence of any such Being.

The panic-stricken Churches are calling upon one another to join forces, to amalgamate and form a huge religious combine, or Trust, in order to stay the rout and recover the deserters. But it is too late. Nothing the Churches can do now will rehabilitate them. It is religion itself that is discredited. A fact that the Churches decline to face.

The Churches could afford to ignore the criticism of the poor and unpopular little band of Freethinkers of the past, but the seed they have sown is bearing fruit now, and the foes of the Churches to-day are of her own household. The pews are revolting against the pulpit. They are demanding more intelligence, more honesty from the clergy, and that their teaching shall be more in accordance with the scientific knowledge we now possess. As Mrs. Desmond Humphreys—better known under the pen name of "Rita" the popular novelist—observes:—

> The Church seems to ignore the ability of the laity. It has not reckoned with the force of an advancing tide of criticism—criticism born of the Church's own supine stupidity; its long and tacit acceptance of unprovable facts; its aggressive attitude towards science; its blind adherence to proved errors; above all, its belief in its own appointed supremacy over the minds and souls of mankind. [2]

The child finds, when he grows up, that he must unlearn all he has been taught. "And therein," says Mrs. Humphreys, "lies the fundamental mischief at the root of all Religion. It has taught wrongly from the beginning, and it has gone on teaching wrongly because it does not possess the moral courage to say, 'I am wrong.'"

The Protestant priest fares no better than the priest of Rome:—"Even empty Churches and a growing tendency to criticism have not quite awakened him. He is still a slave to his own narrow-mindedness. He has accepted the Thirty-nine Articles, and all they involve, and he dares not go back upon one for fear of being compelled to recant all." [1] The Church of to-day: "must recognize that the spiritual life of the nation has passed almost beyond its influence. That the world is up against ecclesiasticism and all the old futile explanations of life's mystery." [2]

(To be concluded.) W. Mann.

Acid Drops.

Months ago we warned our readers to take with a grain of salt tales that would appear in the ordinary Press concerning Russia. Just as men like the Bishop of London and Mr. Stephen Graham romanced concerning the devotion of the Russian people to a pure religion, so we knew that the moment the Revolution disestablished the Church and Religion in Russia the stream of lies would be in the other direction. The Church Times has from time to time published accounts of the way in which the Russian Government is oppressing religion. Now we see the Christian World of December 18 publishes an account of the Baptists in Russia, from their leader, Pastor Fetler. This states that since the last revolution the Baptists have been very active in propaganda, they have opened new mission halls, holding open-air services, and establishing new schools. So much for the Bolshevik suppression of religious freedom. This quite agrees with our information from other sources, which also runs that greater efforts are now being made towards the education of the people of Russia than has ever been the case before. In a year or two, perhaps, the general public may learn the truth of the situation.

A story is told of the late Dr. John Percival, Bishop of Hereford. The Bishop once entertained a colonial divine at Hereford, and the latter said: "Well, bishop, you've got a fine cathedral, a beautiful palace, a salmon pool in the river, and a decent hope of heaven. You must give up one of them." Presumably, the Right Reverend Father-in God responded in the negative.

According to a daily paper, the profits from military canteens are very considerable, and these profits are to be used for the benefit of soldiers. As the Y.M.C.A. huts made similar charges to the troops, their profits ought to be considerable. Who is to benefit by the Y.M.C.A. profits?

The Churches regard marriage as indissoluble; but during the past five years the divorce rate has doubled, and bigamy has more than doubled.

Bishop Gore approves the Labour Party, and, after throwing flowers at it, concludes: "And may God give it wisdom and understanding." A similar prayer has been offered on behalf of Parliament for generations, and the results have been exceedingly unsatisfactory.

The Rev. Professor David Smith, the ultra-Evangelical divine, says that "every time we write a date we unwittingly confess the glory of the Name which is above every name," which is complimentary neither to the Lord he pretends to serve, nor to his own intelligence. The reverend gentleman mistakes Christendom for the world, and seems to convey the impression that the Christian Calendar is the only method of distributing time into periods in existence, whereas, as a matter of fact, the calendars, now in force in different parts of the world, are practically innumerable, such as the Mohammedan, Hebrew, Mexican, Mongolian, Nepalese, Peruvian, and so forth. A calendar is simply an orderly arrangement of the division of time, and in writing a date we merely conform to the calendar in use in the part of the world in which we dwell. The act has no religious significance at all.

Now that Glasgow has got a start in the breaking of the Sabbath, it is difficult to know where she will stop. The principal libraries are to be open for a few hours every Sunday from the beginning of the year. We are to have regular band performances in the parks during the summer months on Sundays, and now it is announced that the two captured German submarines which have been sent to the Clyde are to be open for inspection every day for the next three weeks—Sundays included.

Is the Socialist movement in Scotland being captured by the Church? It looks very like it at present. One Labour candidate said at a recent meeting that Socialism was only an exposition of Christian ethics, and immediately thereafter threw out an appeal to his Masonic brethren for their support.

Not content with being exempt from taxation on churches, an appeal is now being made for the exemption of all property held by the Church. It is high time that churches and all church property should pay their fair share of taxation. Do they not enjoy the same protection as other properties.

As evidence of revival of religion in Scotland, we may note that the U. F. Church of Scotland Central Fund shows a decrease of £2,226. Karl Marx said that the Church of England would sooner sacrifice thirty-eight of its Thirty-nine Articles than one thirty-ninth of its income. And we are quite certain this holds good of Churches the other side of the border.

A poor old grey-headed Leinster woman was sentenced to death the other day for murdering her daughter-in-law. The accused, it was said, was suffering from religious mania, and was never tired of reading her Bible. She deserves sympathy rather than a sentence.

We feel sure our readers will be deeply grieved to learn that the Vicar of St. James, Clerkenwell, announces that the Parish Magazine is bound to cease publication owing to the expenses of production. We don't know whether the vicar has tried prayer as a means of saving the paper.

We are told that humility is a grace specially created by the Christian religion; and yet in daily life Christians are the proudest and haughtiest people on earth, always looking down upon and despising all who differ from themselves. To Catholics all Protestants are schismatics, while to the latter the former are followers of the scarlet woman. To the Anglican Church the Free Churches are unauthorized "mushroom growths," and Free Church people find the Established Church people sorely lacking in true spiritual religion. The truth is that humility is not a religious product at all, but a purely human virtue, rare everywhere and at all times, but by no means confined to the disciples of Jesus.

"Those whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder," is a sentiment pleasing to clerical ears. It has no terror for lawyers, however, as may be seen in the fact that thirty-five undefended divorce cases were disposed of by Mr. Justice Coleridge recently in four hours.

The Young Men's Christian Association is advertising for handkerchiefs, pipes, woollen underclothing (presumably for men) and other spiritual additions to the Faith once delivered to the Saints.

The Battersea Free Church invited the six candidates for the two divisions of the Borough to their Pleasant Sunday Afternoon to state their views. The rules were no questions, no applause or dissent, and no voting. Surely, a limited-liability idea of liberty.

The Bishop of Oxford has been coquetting with the Democrats, and, in an article in a daily paper, he said: "No citizen has a right to exist unless he is a labourer with hand or mind or both." Logically, the Bench of Bishops should be shepherded to the dust destructor.

Dean Inge says that the Englishman "looks like a fool and talks like a fool"—but he wakes up when his back is to the wall. Maybe that is one reason why the dear clergy like to keep people asleep.

The dear editors are doing their best (or their worst) to discredit everything unless it is home-grown. One says: "You may hear the whisper that Santa Claus came from Germany," but he dismisses the notion with scorn. If this sort of thing goes on we shall hear presently that Jesus Christ was a Welshman.

The leading article in the British Weekly for December 12 is entitled "The Calmness of Jesus Christ." Two sentences therein are noteworthy. One is as follows: "The footprints of God are hidden." No statement could be truer; of the Divine existence and activity there are no traces whatever. This is the other: "Jesus Christ was always calm." Change was into is, and this statement also is perfectly true. Christ never does or says anything; but was the Gospel Jesus calm when he cursed his enemies, calling them "hypocrites," "serpents," "offspring of vipers," as recorded in Matt. xxiii.?

A sum of £64,000 is to be raised for the new Bishopric of Bradford. £37,000 has been already received, and it is hoped to secure the rest this year. This creation of new bishoprics strikes us as a scandalous waste of money, and a trading upon the gullibility of a too gullible people. Perhaps a larger circulation of the Freethinker in the district and a more vigorous prosecution of Freethought work might have a salutary effect.

Wise Men, and Holy!

WHEN Holy Men
Are wise
They tell most lies,
Most terrible lies!
But then,
They are but wise
For their creed!
A deed
They rarely do,
And when they do,
They do belie
Their creed,
And so give the Lie
To all Their Breed!
When they rave—
As they sometimes do—
They save
Truth,
Forsooth!—
They save
As they never saved before.
And after,
In the calm,—
Increasing the Doubter's laughter
They do deplore
All such ravings,
And do their best—
Just like each other similar pest!—
So then to cancel
All such savings
By devious ways,
Such as are full known to them,—
And to all who enquiry condemn—
By prayer or praise,
By wise stealth,
Or wealth
Spurned from the Unwise!—
By such wordy embalm
That slings ever to Their Chancel!
How Wise!—Holy Men,—How Wise!

Our Day.

OUR New Year's Push has, we are glad to say, caught on. We have had many letters from readers saying they intend to do their share, and some have sent postal orders with lists of addresses for copies of our New Year's issue to be sent direct. We shall be very pleased to attend to these instructions.

What we are asking is that each of our readers shall take an extra copy of the issue dated January 5, place it in a wrapper, and send it to a friend or acquaintance to whom it will be acceptable. Freethinker should be written across the back in order to secure the benefits of the halfpenny newspaper rate.

We are increasing the paper for that week to 16 pages. This is costly, but if we are not deceived as to the number of copies that will reach new readers it will pay ultimately.

At the cost of twopence halfpenny each one can give the Freethinker a good send off for the New Year, and perhaps secure a regular reader.

There are thousands of potential readers scattered about. We hope to pick up a fair number of them by this method.

Readers must order their copies early from their newsagents. They must also bear in mind that in an effort of this description everyone counts.

We see that some have been giving substantial sums to Churches as a thank-offering for the War having come to an end. Let each Freethinker reader take the suggested plan as a thank-offering for survival. Our War is still proceeding, and we are proposing a method of peppering the enemy with explosives of the highest order.

Don't forget, then, to secure an extra copy of the Freethinker for January 5. It is the opening of a new volume. The first shot in the campaign of 1919.

CHAPMAN COHEN.

To Correspondents.

F. AGATE.—It is a good plan to leave used copies of the Freethinker in train or tramcar, and it is adopted by many of our readers—with good results.

HUGH THOMSON.—We agree with you that we need to be on our guard against the after-War reactionary forces. They are very active just now, and Prussianism in Britain may be even more difficult than Prussianism in Berlin.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss Vance acknowledges:—"Ernest," 2s. 6d.

N. S. S. GENERAL FUND.—Miss Vance acknowledges:—"Ernest," 2s. 6d.

"FREETHINKER" SUSTENTATION FUND.—E. Lyons, 2s. 6d.; George Proctor, 2s. 6d.; S Clowes, 5s.; W. F. Ambrose, 2s; W. Darge, 2s.

A. J. PREECE.—You are quite mistaken. The Secularist is asking for no sectarian teaching in schools. The Education Code itself defines the meaning of "secular," and all the Freethinker asks is that the education in State schools shall be confined to subjects that come under that head.

VERA C. DICKINSON.—Pleased to hear from a new reader who is so interested in the paper. See "Acid Drops."

T. H. GUNNING.—Copies of January 5 issue will be sent to addresses given. Thanks.

J. HIBBOTT.—Pleased to hear from so old a Freethinker as yourself, and to learn that in your opinion the Freethinker stands to day higher than any of its predecessors. Sending what is required. Please accept with our compliments. Papers sent are interesting and useful.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

The National Secular Society's office is at 62 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, giving as long notice as possible.

Lecture Notices must reach 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Business Manager of the Pioneer Press, 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4, and not to the Editor.

All Cheques and Postal Orders should be crossed "London, City and Midland Bank, Clerkenwell Branch."

Letters for the Editor of the "Freethinker" should be addressed to 61 Farringdon Street, London, E.C. 4.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favour bf marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

The "Freethinker" will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d. three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

On January 5 Mr. Cohen opens his New Year's work with two lectures in the Co-operative Hall, Ardwick, Manchester. We hope that Manchester Freethinkers will do their best to make the meetings as widely known as possible. There is no advertising like personal effort. The Manchester Branch has made splendid headway, but it is only a mere skeleton of what it ought to be in a city with a population of well over half a million,

The Glasgow Branch adopted a new, but a very admirable, method in advertising Mr. Cohen's lectures. The notice of the meeting was accompanied by a reprint of "The Principles and Objects of the N.S.S." This should be effective in calling attention to the purpose for which the Society exists.

Strong efforts are being made by the Glasgow Saints to get the Freethinker placed in the reading rooms of the public libraries.

We mentioned some time ago that Ireland would be moving in a Freethought direction after the War. We are glad to note that a well-attended meeting was held recently in Belfast, and it was decided to form a Branch of the N. S. S. in that city. Mr. Cohen has been asked to pay Belfast a visit, and he will take the earliest opportunity of doing so. Meanwhile, will Belfast Freethinkers note that meetings are held in the City Studio, 3 High Street, Belfast, every Friday evening? Secretary, Mr. J. F. Lessels.

We have received Dr. Lyttelton's promised article, but owing to getting out two numbers of the paper in a week, we regret our inability to publish until January 5. As, however, that issue of the Freethinker will reach a much larger number of readers, the author will lose nothing by the slight but unavoidable delay.

THANK GOD!

Cassander was one of the greatest geniuses of his time, yet all his merit could not procure him a bare subsistence. Being by degrees driven into a hatred of all mankind from the little pity he found amongst them, he even ventured at last ungratefully to impute his calamities to providence. In his last agonies, when the priest entreated him to rely on the justice of heaven and ask mercy from him that made him; if God, replies he, has shown me no justice here, what reason have I to expect any from him hereafter? But being answered that a suspension of justice was no argument that should induce us to doubt of its reality; "let me entreat you," continued his confessor, "by all that is dear to be reconciled to God, your father, your maker, and your friend." No, replied the exasperated wretch, you know the manner in which he left me to live, and (pointing to the straw on which he was stretched) you see the manner in which he leaves me to die!—Oliver Goldsmith, "Citizen of the World."

ANNE MARKS, in her instructive and entertaining volume, The Cat in History, Legend, and Art, notes an instance in which the warmth-loving cat has been completely adapted to intensely cold conditions. "A special breed of cats," she states,— > is used in American (and possibly in other) cold-storage warehouses. The ordinary cat could not live in the temperature, but some robust individuals having at length become acclimatized in one such place, their offspring—strong, thick-furred animals—able to withstand the cold, are now domiciled in these warehouses, and the variety, sturdy and answering the purpose, continues to flourish.

An ardent lover of cats, our authoress enters her protest against the vulgar error that these animals rank far below dogs in the scale of intelligence. Doubtless some clever cats easily excel many dogs. Individual felines and canines vary widely in mental power. In certain cases the dog's sagacity proves superior, while in others the cat shows itself quite equal or even greater in intelligence than its canine competitor. One shrewd and experienced American trainer claims, as a result of long and patient study of the animal, that the cat is really more intelligent than the dog. In reply to the complaint that while man has made the dog an obedient and trustworthy companion and servant, and has trained the horse and other creatures to labour for his benefit, the cat has invariably refused all human attempts to induce it to toil in man's service, this observer answers that the cat's obstinacy is the outcome of its astuteness. In any event, it is indisputable that cats > thoroughly understand their own wishes and the way to realize them, and they invariably succeed in compassing the end they have in view, unless prevented by resolution and patience equal to their own, aided by the superior resources at the command of a human opponent.

The cat group ranges throughout the Eastern and Western Worlds. The lion may be regarded as the head of the family, even ranking above that terrible carnivore the Bengal tiger. The jaguar, leopard, ounce, ocelot, puma, serval, the civet cat, mungoose, and caracal are all members of this extensive order. Another famous feline is the Caffre Cat, the probable ancestor of the domesticated European cat. This animal occurs in Africa where it extends from Egypt and Algeria to the Cape, while it is native also to Syria and Arabia. Formerly common in Cape Colony, it has receded with the spread of civilization into the less-frequented regions where it is still abundant, and constitutes the representative wild cat of the once Dark Continent.

The Caffre cat was tamed at an early period in ancient Egypt, where it became the object of adoration and worship. But, although the modern house cat is mainly descended from this stock, there can be little doubt that a fair amount of intercrossing has occurred with the native wild cats of the various European countries. Moreover, the untamed Caffre cat once dwelt in Europe, and its fossilized remains have been discovered in the cavern deposits of Gibraltar. The presence of the animal in Spain presumably dates from the period when the Iberian Peninsular was still united with the African land-mass.

From remote times the cat has been familiar in China and India, but nowhere else has the animal occupied so exalted a position in the estimation of the people as in ancient Egypt. There it was venerated; it possessed its peculiar divinity; cities were dedicated to its service; sculptors and painters made it the subject of their respective arts, while at its death its remains were solemnly embalmed in costly raiment, perhaps to await a glorious resurrection. The cat-cult of Old Nile varied locally, and the feline goddess Bast bore many names. Bast is portrayed in art with a human body surmounted with the head of a cat, while figures of cats and kittens were adored as emblems of the divinity. Medals stamped with the likeness of a cat were worn as charms, and from their sale the priests of Bast derived a handsome revenue. We gather from the Greek historians that pet cats resided in all the Egyptian temples.

The cat was associated with solar ceremonies, and the animal seems to have been worshipped in the great City of the Sun—Heliopolis—because, it is said, "the pupil of its eye was observed to vary with the height of the luminary above the horizon."

A world-wide superstition connects the cat with the lunar orb. The size of the cat's pupil was supposed to fluctuate with the phases presented by the waxing and waning moon. The pupil of the eye was believed to expand with the orb's increase, while it contracted with its dwindling. Further affinity between the silver moon and the cat was evidenced by their common nocturnal preferences. The queen of the nightly skies was regarded as the mistress of the feline race, and the lunar divinity was thought to be influenced through the reverence of the people towards her terrestrial servants.

When Hamlet meditated over the skull in the Elsinore graveyard his thoughts turned to the ignoble employment to which the dust of Cæsar and Alexander might one day descend. But little did the early Egyptians imagine the unromantic if practical purposes to which a less religious age would devote the embalmed bodies of their sacred cats. Yet, when quite recently thousands of mummied cats were unexpectedly unearthed in an Egyptian cave in which they had for centuries reposed, many were spread over the adjacent fields to enrich the soil, while the remainder were shipped abroad for the same purpose.

The cat became man's companion in prehistoric times, and conclusive proofs of this relationship are of great antiquity. The "cat" employed by the ancient Greeks was probably the marten. But there can be little doubt that the true cat was domesticated in Europe centuries prior to the Christian era. Professor Mivart, in his splendid monograph, states that:—

> There are signs that it was domesticated amongst the people of the Bronze Period, and the supposition that it was first introduced into Western Europe by the Crusaders is of course an altogether erroneous one."

In the East, the monuments of Babylon and Nineveh, in addition to those of Egypt, preserve evidences from remote times of man's close acquaintance with the animal. The earliest known representation of the cat occurs in the Necropolis at Thebes, and dates back at least 4,000 years. Various extremely ancient models of the animal may be seen in several European museums.

Mainly from religious motives, the crime of cat-killing was in old Egypt visited with the punishment of death. In later Europe the penalty was mitigated, but the value of the cat as a vermin-destroyer was clearly recognised, and the heavy fines inflicted on a human cat-persecutor sufficed to protect the animal from fatal injury. During the Middle Ages the death of a cat incurred the forfeiture of a ewe, or of a quantity of wheat—a commodity both scarce and costly—sufficient to cover the animal's body "when it was held up by the tip of the tail with the nose touching the ground."

The traveller in Persia who expects to greet the splendid long-furred beauties so familiar in England will be greatly disappointed. The native cats of Persia are miserable emaciated felines, and these animals are regarded by the people with cold indifference. As a matter of fact the magnificent Persian specimens so admired in Europe are the artificial creations of the selective breeders of pedigree cats.

With the Arabs, on the other hand, the cat is affectionately treated, and Arabian folk-lore contains several stories of the native fairies assuming the form of the cat. The Jinns, or fairies in feline form were believed to hallow the dwellings which they entered.

In the Far East generally the cat is both venerated and valued. It is stated that in China the cat's eye serves as a chronometer. The pupil of the animal's eye contracts with the advancing hours after dawn until it becomes a mere slit at noon. Then it begins to dilate until its full expansion approaches as the twilight deepens into night. By observing these fluctuations the people tell the time much as our own rustics note the hour by looking at the sun. The Celestials appreciate the cat as an article of food, and the animal's flesh is considered a dainty. Large cats are exposed for sale on the provision stalls in Eastern lands. The animals are chained up on the farms where they are fattened for the market. The cat was formerly a much commoner comestible than at present. We gather that after the removal of the head and tail, and presumably the intestines also, the cat's carcass is suspended in the open air to purge it of its powerful flavour, when, after the interval of a day or so, it is ready for cooking, and is by some "considered almost as sweet as rabbit."

The City and the Coast.

It seems to the writer that an impression of "Glasgow Fair," 1918, will not be out of place in the pages of the Freethinker, but may even be a diversion as agreeable as the holiday itself. On this hint he speaks.

They are "Fair" folk, and folk who are very fair—beautiful, he means, especially the women-folk. Health and happiness and freedom have a way of making even the plain face beautiful. The city, when it comes to the coast, transforms the hamlet there; and when the weather is superb, as it has been, the natural beauty of the particular scene transforms, nay, transfigures, the citizen. The clouds and azure, the rocks and seas, the island alps and fairy isles, the wonder of the woods, the winding ways, the wistful splendour of the maturing summer; and always over all, transcending all, that great inverted bowl we call the sky, with tranquil fleecy clouds, or "barred" horizon, turned to incandescent gossamer and silvery filagree, still white vapours between the earth and the dazzlingly splendid sun, loftily poised in the intense inane, so wondrously, weirdly suffused and shaped and shaded in the perfect dome of azured light. The inland hills are solemn and sublime, steeped in the sunset haze, when the quiet West from silver turns to gold, anon to deeper red, expiring fires.

And the sons of God looked upon the daughters of men, and behold they were very fair. And it is so to this day, only more so. The pensive penman is quite positive the ladies dressed not so daintily of old; and evolution, with selection, in a word, refinement, has been beautifying the human form divine, and shaping and irradiating the female face, in colour and contour, eyes that mislead the morn, eyes that shine eternally pure and bright and soft and sweet and holy even over the brutal paths of glory and the grave.

It is said fine feathers make fine birds. It is not true; not wholly so; but rather fine birds desire—and deserve—fine feathers. And surely never in the history of the world were our womenkind so attractively, so fittingly, attired—not even the mythical Mother Eve herself in all her unadornment—nor the goddesses of old Greece and Rome. In the forefront of his picture the writer sees a bevy of four—if four is a bevy—four girls, arm in arm, and dressed in white, or shading off into indescribably delicate hues—fine feathers and fine birds, young and sweet and wholesome, winged beauty, with fairy draperies waving in the wind—a poem, a picture in petticoats, or the very essence and inspiration of poetry and art. Were they morally good or otherwise? Oh, ye moralists, ye dream-dispellers, ye joy-killers, ye undertakers! know ye not that health and happiness and liberty, and the desire to be good and beautiful and beloved, are the true safeguards of, and incentives to, morality itself? These were truth and beauty, and tending towards the light as do all delicate and beautiful things.

. . . . .

The wagonette rides east and west are popular. The brake horses, and the broken horses, have not quite the fun of the Fair. One salutes the dumb animal, and hopes he will receive his well-earned corn and water, bedding for his weary bones and galled hide, and for the repose of his mortal soul!

. . . . .

There is the cry-baby, and the urchin's tears, and the sad-faced man and woman here and there. We cannot all be happy at once, or all the time, and yet it is so easy, and so natural, to be happy. The Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, which is the Gospel of misery, is out of date. The gospel of hope, and gladness, and realization, is breaking at last in waves of light on the shores of chaos and old night. The writer noticed it particularly, even the plain face was pretty; and he felt quite handsome himself!—the past relegated, the future undreaded, the present moment the life and opportunity of man. Those darlings, in those dresses, are foam flakes on the crest of those rolling, glittering, glorious waves. The plain root virtues, the natural strength, fertility, and growing goodness and intelligence of the race, in murmurous music, in hoarse strivings, in deep calling unto deep, in soundings near and far, in the universal sub mer, make possible this adorable beauty, this flower and fruit of the ocean of existence, which, as the Holiday Spirit, is now rolling, and will more and more advance upon the world-weary shores of human kind.

. . . . .

Some reader may ask: whence this wholesale optimism in one who professes to be a free and serious thinker? Well, it is in the air, in the sun, and partly inspired by a wonderful companion from the city whom the wise will know as Ingersoll Redivivus, who imparted so much information, who made the world larger, brighter, better, by his very presence. This man, as a Freethinker and a philosopher, as the fountain of a thousand generosities, mental, moral, and material to all he meets with everywhere—this man, and this woman, and this superb summer scene, are the proofs of what despised Nature can produce, and the prophesy of better still to come, when man at last exchanges the jangle and the shadow of the creeds for the harmony and the light of earth.

. . . . .

It was fitting, also, that the writer and his friends should stand on the little rocky eminence, known as

Digitized by Google

Ardrossan Hill, and observe the passing of the perfect day. The inevitable preacher was young, and glib, and earnest, with much more faith than knowledge, "most assured" indeed. The setting sun made a path of silver o'er the deep to where the Cumbraes dwelt in shade. The silver turned to gold and dusky dreamy red. The ancient ruin on the hill alternately frowned and grinned as the passing shadows fell. The party heard but heeded not the youthful exhorter; theirs were older heads and richer imaginations, and there was an infinitely grander, nobler, sermon in the silent stones of the grim old castle wall, and in the soundless eloquence of that sunset splendour amidst the hills and sea.

ANDREW MILLAR.

Writers and Readers.

IN commenting a little while ago on the preposterous Billing case, I called attention to one of Mr. Justice Darling's many foolish remarks. The counsel had been pointing out instances in Salome where Wilde had transcribed the actual words of Holy Writ. The "learned" judge, who is supposed, by his legal friends, to cut something of a figure in polite letters, was astounded. Poor Wilde was then a rank plagiarist. He was not only abnormally vicious, he was also a mean pilferer of other people's phrases and ideas. I suggested that, by condemning Wilde for using the actual phrases of his source our "learned" Judge was equally condemning Shakespeare. Now, it would seem that there are still some people who resent any censure of Shakespeare, our literary fetish. If we do not fall down and worship, we are blasphemous unbelievers. A correspondent who thinks that I am too hard on the God of his idolatry, has asked me to say where Shakespeare is guilty of "lifting" other men's ideas and phrases.

. . . . . .

The difficulty is rather to say what Shakespeare did not borrow than what he did borrow from other people. In the first place, the Wilde count is paralleled by Shakespeare's treatment of North's Plutarch in the Roman plays. The prose of the translator is often turned almost literally into blank verse. It is not recast; the poet was in too much of a hurry to get his play on the boards. With the sole exception of Love's Labour Lost, the construction of which is singularly inept, the plots and the plays are all borrowed. Even the great plays are the revisions of the work of hard-working contemporaries and predecessors. Scenes and characters he "lifted" entire. In The Winter's Tale he appropriated the whole of the plot from a novel by Robert Greene, who at the time could not object, poor man! because he was dead. He had an irritatingly high-handed way of treating the work of his fellow-dramatists; and everyone, I presume, knows Greene's indignant reference to him as an "upstart Crow, beautified with our feathers." His way at first was to take plays which had gone out of fashion, touch them up a little, and allow them to pass as his own. Anyone who does not think with the late Mr. Foote and others that Shakespeare is understood better the less we know about the conditions of his workmanship, will agree with me that there is much in even the great plays that was not written by him, while Titus and the Henry VI. group were in all probability the work of his minor contemporaries. We have just to make up our minds to accept facts as they are. Shakespeare never invented a character, a scene, or a plot if he could come by it honestly or dishonestly. Justice Darling's gibe at Wilde was simply another instance of legal foolishness.

. . . . . .

Talking of the fatuity of "learned" judges reminds me of a good story Coleridge tells of Lord Kenyon, who tried a bookseller, Thomas Williams, in 1798, for publishing Paine's Age of Reason:—

> In his charge to the jury Kenyon enumerated many celebrated men who had been sincere Christians; and, after having enforced the example of Locke and Newton—both of whom were Unitarians and not Christians—proceeded: "Nor, gentlemen, is this belief confined to men of comparative seclusion, since men, the greatest and most distinguished both as philosophers and as monarchs, have enforced this belief, and shown its influence by their conduct. Above all, gentlemen, need I name to you the Emperor Julian, who was so celebrated for every Christian virtue that he was called Julian the Apostle?"

Kenyon was consistently ignorant to the very end. He left instructions that Mors janua vita should be cut on his tombstone. His legal friends explained the bad Latin by saying that he was too parsimonious to pay the extra charge for the diphthong in vitæ, but it is more likely that his acquaintance with Latin was on a par with his knowledge of Christian origins.

GEO. UNDERWOOD.

Christianity and Labour.

IT is with cordial concurrence that one reads a recent appreciation by "Mimnermus" of Mr. Cohen's Christianity and Slavery. The facts garnered by Mr. Cohen need to be continually presented and driven home. How true it is, as "Mimnermus" observes, that the clergy "in their hearts care as little for the welfare of the working classes as the Sultan of Zanzibar for his slaves"! Even in Nonconformist Churches, which like to think themselves democratic, and free from the vices of the Government religion, class distinctions are firmly established, although the pastors are for ever killing these distinctions "with their mouths," loudly proclaiming that in the House of God all meet together on an equal footing, and that the Lord is no respecter of persons.

Unfortunately for these statements, some of us have inside knowledge of the manner in which the business of Church and Chapel is transacted. In this connection let it be said that the observation and experience of the writer goes to show that the Conformists are more democratic than the Nonconformists. It is true that a working man may be found acting as a member of a managing board of a chapel—a point which "Mimnermus" must not forget—but how often are his views adopted and acted upon in preference to the views of his minister or his wealthy fellow-member? Not once in ten thousand times. Can we wonder that workmen with any brains or independence of character turn from this kind of snobbery and toadyism with disgust?

At the same time, we must not be deceived by an easy optimism. Certainly, I believe that a great many Labour men are opposed to priestcraft and the pretensions of clericalism; but many "Labour Leaders" are permeated by religiosity, and pay homage to the "Lord of Lords" with all the fervour of the cleric. Mr. W. Adamson, M.P., is a prominent Baptist, and officiates regularly at religious services. Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., is an outstanding Wesleyan, and one of the most popular lay preachers of his communion. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, M.P., is a Godite also, and not so long before the War was, on a United Free Church Assembly Platform in Edinburgh, expatiating upon the happy co-operation between Christianity and Labour. Mr. R. J. Campbell on one occasion dubbed Mr. Snowden, M.P., the "Bishop of Blackburn." The same Mr. Campbell was responsible for the ill-mannered and insulting statement that Mr. Robert Blatchford was a Christian without knowing it. The writer was once present at a Sunday meeting of a large I.L.P. Branch when the addresses, given by two Unitarian ministers, were on the subject of "Religion and Socialism." These two gentlemen took up very much the Campbell position, which found favour with their hearers, and when a questioner of the N.S.S. type got up and described the religion expounded that evening just as much superstition as any other sort, a pained "ooh" went through the audience, being particularly audible amongst the women.

In view of all these facts and considerations, is it quite safe to conclude that there is marked and universal hostility on the part of the labour leaders to the clergy? Frankly, the writer has not heard any "hysterical appeals" by clergymen to labour leaders to remember that God and the Churches have always been on their side; and he thinks that the clergy are astute enough to prefer other methods. Is it quite safe to conclude that "Christianity has let the mastery of the democratic movement pass to other forces"? We would be glad to think so; but is it the case?

Most labour men choose to call themselves Socialists. Now, logically, no man can be simultaneously both a Socialist and a Theist. Necessarily the Socialist must disapprove and seek to destroy many things "ordained of God." "Christian Socialism"—taking the term "Christian" to describe the Churches and Chapels as we see them—must be a contradiction in terms. If we, however, use the adjective "Christian" in the primitive impracticable sense, then, of course, the terms of the expression are congruous; but, in that case, the expression describes something that has no existence—which is absurd.

What Freethinkers ought to strive to make people (including the clergy themselves) understand is that they are out not to patch up but to completely renew. Thus, we do not make it our policy to change or modify the power of clerics. We seek their total abolition. Plainly our objective is, first, to eject the Spiritual Lords from Parliament; second, to disestablish all Established Churches; and third—well, the third—will be able to take care of itself, when we think of the new vigour which the Freethought movement throughout the whole world has lately shown.

SOUL-SALVING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I have read with interest and appreciation the articles by "Keridon" criticizing the obscurantist views of Dr. McDougall. There are, however, some points in the articles open to criticism, and, in order to assist the writer's endeavours to introduce some clear thinking, to replace the question-begging methods of Dr. McDougall, I venture to ask for some of your valuable space to continue the discussion.

In the issue for December 1, "Keridon" defines energy as "that which can do work," thus laying himself open to the charge of viewing energy as an entity. This is also the interpretation which might be put upon his conception from his other references to energy in the article. Knowing full well the poorness of our language to express our ideas clearly, I recognize the necessity of personifying abstractions in ordinary conversations and discussions, and it may be thought that I am hypercritical in calling attention to a possible interpretation which I think "Keridon" himself would disavow. Justification, however, may be admitted when it is pointed out that energy is frequently asserted to be an entity even in the writings of authors of considerable scientific attainments.

Another point open to criticism is his strictures on Dr. McDougall for the reference to "potential energy" as a "convenient fiction." This is my own conception, and, in referring to it in this way, I should not like to be thought to "sneer" at a convention whose utility is recognized. "Keridon" may be right in his description of the original meaning of the term, but, if so, its meaning has completely changed, as a reference to a modern text-book on physics will show. Therein potential energy is usually referred to as a distinct form of energy, and, moreover, it is used as a proof of the theory of the conservation of energy, or alternately, as a deduction from the theory. It would take up too much of your space to enter into a discussion upon the correctness of this view, but if any of your readers desire further information, I would refer them to an article, entitled "Meta Mechanics," by An Old Millwright, in Engineering, for August 30, 1912.

I gather from his remarks that "Keridon" does not accept the common view, and, in that case, I fail to see how he can object to Dr. McDougall referring to "potential energy" as a "convenient fiction."

METAPHYSICS.

SIR,—May I say, in regard to the article by Mr. J. T. Lloyd in your issue of December 8, that I used the word "Metaphysics" in the letter on which he comments in the popular sense? This, in addition to the definition Mr. Lloyd gives, embraces those subjects that are now more correctly classified under "Psychology" and "Ethics."

When I referred to the large amount of attention paid to metaphysical research, I had in mind the spread and growth of Christian Science, Theosophy, and the New Thought teachings, together with the increasing number and circulation of books on "Mind Power." My reference to love, life, truth, goodness, should have made this obvious.

Mr. Lloyd's attitude towards metaphysics in the article on the subject is curiously ambiguous. He regrets that he should have been thought guilty of placing metaphysics on a level with "dogmatism"; he regards metaphysics as an important subject; he hates all dogmatism except that which inevitably accompanies actual knowledge; and agrees with Ingersoll that metaphysics is (in brief) "the Science of Fools"!

It is by a careless reading of my letter that he accuses me of forgetfulness. I wrote, not that it is impossible to conceive of space and time, but that it is impossible to conceive of these as finite.

Is it not true that the tendency even of scientific discovery is from the finite to the infinite? Has not the discovery of the disintegration of the atom and the subsequent electron theory of the composition of matter tended that way?

Mr. Lloyd's plea that people who desire answers to such questions as those I propounded (viz., why absolute memory persists in the subconscious mind and the utility of the experience of a lifetime if the ego ceases to be at death) look at life through selfish eyes, is quaint. Does he not agree that all desire is selfish? In any case, the point is that the subsequent annihilation of a mind equipped with experience and knowledge acquired through a lifetime conflicts with the law of the conservation of energy.
